Ori’s grin was gleeful. “It’s a standard voice recognition system, but how I use it isn’t standard.”

“Voice recognition?” Thran considered Ori dubiously, then his expression cleared. “Ah. You record what Irmo says, and the voice recognition turns it into text on the computer?”

Ori leaned close, his eyes bright with suppressed glee. “No, that’s the brilliant part! It’ll record my voice!”

Thran blinked. “Yours? Ori, how will that help?”

“Look, from what you tell me about this Irmo, he won’t hold still to let me calibrate the voice recognition system to him. He won’t be bothered to wear the device, either, will he? But I’ve already got the system calibrated to me, and I know how to make the most of it. So all I have to do is to stay close enough to hear Irmo.”

Thran considered his grinning companion. “So tell me what I miss, Ori.”

“I’ll show you.” Ori unzipped his bag and pulled out a small tablet with an earpiece cabled to it. Ori held up the earpiece. “This is a microphone. It can be wireless, but until I know how much interference there is around here, I’ve got it cabled to my tablet. So it goes in my ear like this,” he inserted the microphone in his ear, “and I’m ready. Now, pretend that you’re Irmo, and I’m following you around, and someone asks you to describe the first scene of this ballet. You say...?”

“The first scene is a violent battle with the full corps ~”

“The first scene is a violent battle with the full corps,” Ori echoed a fraction of a second after Thran.

“What, you repeat everything I say?”

“What, you repeat everything I say?” Ori kept repeating.

“But Irmo speaks in French much of the time ~”

“But Irmo speaks in French much of the time ~” Ori repeated.

“Et qu’est-ce qui se passe quand il parle français ? Pouvez-vous répéter cela aussi?” Thran said swiftly.

“Et qu’est-ce qui se passe quand il parle français ? Pouvez-vous répéter cela aussi?” Ori repeated just as swiftly, grinning.

“Suka blyad!” Thran exclaimed, laughing. “To repeat the English so swiftly, that is amazing enough. But the French, too? Do you speak it?”

Ori shook his head. “Not a word. But that’s the way my brain works – whatever I hear, I can repeat. I can’t remember it, but I can mimic it as you say it. I’ll need to fine-tune the system to spell the French correctly, but once that’s done, I can run the French through a translator to get everything in English. Then everything will be converted to text files on the computer.”

Ori held up his tablet, showing Thran the text that the voice recognition software had converted from Ori’s spoken words.

Thran sat back. “Brilliant. Just brilliant! As long as you can stay close to Irmo, we will capture his ideas, and make sure they get to who should follow through on each one.”

“There’s only one thing about this,” Ori ventured, as he put his tablet back in his bag. “If Irmo’s the sort who needs only three hours of sleep, I won’t get everything. I need at least seven hours of sleep every night.”

Thran gave Ori a resolute look. “We will impress upon Irmo to make the most of your time.”

* * *

“Good morning, Bard!” Bilbo gave a wave as Bard opened the front door. “What a beautiful house this is! And goodness – is this piece yours?"

"It is," Bard admitted. "Her name is Hope. One of my favorite pieces."

Bard told Bilbo the story of the inspiration for the golden antelope, and how Sigrid had named her. Bilbo’s eyes were bright as he peppered Bard with questions about how he’d made the piece, how long it had taken to construct, and so on.

“A wonderful piece,” Bilbo said warmly.

"Thank you," Bard allowed, closing the door behind Bilbo. “Before you take off your coat, I can give you the tour of the barn, or we can have a cup of tea first. Your choice.”

“The tour would be perfect.”

“All right. Come on through, and we’ll go out the back.”

“Lovely kitchen,” Bilbo complimented, looking around as Bard led him though to the mudroom.

“It’s the heart of the house,” Bard replied, pulling on his boots and arming his way into his coat.

“I well believe it,” Bilbo nodded. “It hasn’t been long since you moved in, Rosie told me?”

“Just since a couple of days after Christmas,” Bard nodded, leading the way out to the barn. “Rosie said you haven’t been long in Greenwood Dale by the Lake, either?”

“Three years, last July,” Bilbo replied, thrusting his hands deep in his pockets as Bard unlocked the front door of the barn, then slid it wide. “I’ve represented several artists in the village for twice that, so I was back and forth quite a bit to work with them and some of the shops in the tourist district. I loved the village so much that one day I decided to stop commuting and buy a small cottage just a short distance from here. It overlooks the lake, and suits my nephew and me very well. I’m sorry Frodo wasn’t available to come out with me today, but he’s finishing his college degree this term, and he has class this morning. Oh, my – you have several different styles, don’t you?”

“Some clients have a look they’re after,” Bard allowed. “When it’s my choice, the metal influences what I do with it.”

“Which of these were commissions, and which were your choice?”

“These are all mine,” Bard replied. “But there are still pictures on the Internet of several of my commissions, if you’d like to see them.”

He nudged one of the intertwined rings of his hollow sphere sculpture, which set it in motion. Bilbo oohed as the rings undulated in shades of copper and purple and blue.

“This is amazing! So light... but it’s a mechanical marvel, too, isn’t it? To mesh the rings so carefully?”

“I like that interplay,” Bard nodded. “To design the mechanics to look like something lighter than metal. That’s a theme I’ve played with several times. I have a pine tree in the back garden that’s another example of that. The natural world is another theme I like, too. Hope the Lope and the Sea Spot Run Pillar over there are examples of that.”

“See Spot Run?” Bilbo repeated curiously.

“Most of the fish in the piece are a variety called spot. They’re just humble fish, nothing fancy, but good to eat for bigger fish, as well as people. I liked the play on name of the old school primers that they use in this country, where Spot was the dog. So of course that meant I had to throw in a few catfish at the bottom, just to keep the pun going.”

Bilbo laughed appreciatively. “Very clever. Now, what about this one?”

When Bilbo pointed to the iron knot, Bard chuckled. “Alexander's Downfall. That’s what a metal sculptor does when he scrounges a lot of free scrap iron out of a construction dump.”

Bilbo’s eyebrows went up, and his mouth fell open, but he quickly joined Bard’s laughter. “Really? This was scrap?”

“It was,” Bard shrugged. “I was on a welding job when a lot of bent rebar got thrown on the rubbish heap, so I asked if I could have it. The foreman said it was too badly damaged to reuse, so I hauled it out, one truckload at a time, then figured out what I could do with it. There’s still a pile of it in the back I haven’t used yet. So there you have it.”

“Wonderful,” Bilbo nodded.

Bilbo asked for a quick look around the shop in the back, so Bard pointed him around. He was glad he and the children had done a cursory cleaning of the place, so it didn’t look so neglected as before.

“I appreciate the look,” Bilbo nodded.

“Care for a cup of tea, then?”

“Yes, please,” Bilbo agreed. “Rosie and Thran tell me you’ve got some wonderful sketches, too?”

“They’re both kind to say so. I like them, so I hope they speak to other people, as well.”

* * *

It wasn’t long before Lettie Johnson arrived, and she led Thran and Ori into her office to hand him a copy of the contracts that detailed what all parties had agreed upon. Thran passed it immediately to Ori; he intended to read it fully himself, but he wanted Ori’s sharp eyes on it first. Ori was well aware of what it contained, and Thran relied on him to see if all had been spelled out as everyone had agreed. As soon as Ori finished a page, he passed it back to Thran, who began his own close review. Lettie had her own copy, and she, too, read silently while they waited for the others to arrive. Before long, Irmo arrived, on time for once. He wanted to launch into several ideas he had about the choreography, the set, the Underworld characters, but Thran reminded him that the boring but essential paperwork had to be finished before he was willing to go further, which Irmo reluctantly agreed was important. Ori leaned close, pointing out a small discrepancy, which Thran and Lettie agreed needed to change. Another one appeared in short order, this one not so small, but Ori’s memory served them well to hammer out what needed to change.

By the time Abebe and Rada appeared, Thran and Ori had completed their review, and had noted the things that required changing. On their heels came the set designer, Círdan Boatwright, whom Thran had met previously only in passing; Thran didn’t have time to do more than shake his hand before the remaining two members of the ballet’s board arrived. There was no room in Lettie’s small office to hold so many people, so they moved to the floor of the studio itself, where a table and chairs had been set up, and the slow process of getting everyone to agree to the changes began. Bless Ori, who had a gift to explain everything clearly in a neutral yet sincere way that settled everyone’s tensions. An hour and a half later, signatures went on the copies, and handshakes went around.

The drive to create the Death ballet was now underway. A thrill went up Thran’s back; he preferred to think of it as excitement more than apprehension.

“The photographers and the publicist are here,” Ori murmured to Thran, tapping his mobile. “We’ll have a press release out this afternoon to start the spin.”

The wry cant to Ori’s eyebrows revealed what he thought of such things, but they were necessary if they wanted to start the buzz about their efforts. Not only would this encourage people’s familiarity about the upcoming ballet, but also interest potential donors to help bear the cost of the production.

“Bring them in,” Thran nodded, and Ori slipped out as Thran leaned to his left to remind Lettie of the impending appearance of the press. She nodded, as excited as he was, yet also as apprehensive, but she was as determined for her company to succeed as Thran was.

Ori soon reappeared with a pair of rugged, equipment-toting young men – dark-haired, dark-eyed twins – who quickly busied themselves setting up tripods, cameras, lights, and deflectors. While they worked, a third young man, this one tall, slender, and blond in a nicely cut if trendy blue suit, talked softly to Ori. As Ori stood off to the side, speaking softly into his tablet, the blond directed the two cameramen to set up the shot he wanted. He was assured, if a bit brash and staccato.

“No, not that wall, Elladan – the other one, with the ballet logo. Frame the shot around that, please. Good, good – softer light, Elrohir; anything brighter will wash out Mr. Oropherson’s hair. A little more, please. Still more – no, too much; that’s too soft. Take it back up, please. All right, that’s a start. Ladies and gentlemen, would you take your places, please? Elladan, how’s it look?”

“No bright enough for me, Rúmil, but take a look for yourself.”

The blond took a quick sight through the camera. “Right you are, Elladan. Elrohir, more on that left side, please. How’s that look?”

“A hair more, ‘Ro,” Elladan waved, so up the lights went a bit more. “Good. That’s got it.”

Rúmil took another quick look, and nodded. “That’s got it, indeed. All right, everyone. Let’s have a group shot with everyone, please...”

Thran posed, smiled, and shook hands with the other principals as directed for the next fifteen minutes. For all his brashness, Rúmil was efficient, and the publicity shots were soon done. By the time Rúmil decided everything that could be photographed had been photographed, Ori approached with his tablet. Thran leaned close to hear the slight man tell Rúmil that he’d sent the text of the press release to him via email. Rúmil pulled out his mobile, confirmed he’d received it, read through it briefly, then suggested a tweak here and there. Ori and he conferred until they’d agreed, then the deed was done. Rúmil and his two dark-haired photographers packed their equipment and made their exit.

Contract signed, publicity underway. Ori caught Thran’s eyes and winked.

* * *
“You said you had a sculpture of a pine tree?” Bilbo prompted, once Bard had put on the teakettle.

“Sure, you can see it from the solarium,” Bard led Bilbo through the sitting room and into the solarium.

“My word, it looks very lifelike,” was Bilbo’s pronouncement. “May I go out and look at it close up?”

“Of course,” Bard opened the door to the terrace. “It’s another piece that has hidden mechanical aspects that you don’t see until you’re close up.”

“Oh, I see!” Bilbo exclaimed. “The needles move, don’t they? How extraordinary! Again, it seems so much lighter than seems possible for metal.”

“Thanks,” Bard held the door open to the solarium. “Now you can stay inside where it’s warm.”

“And where there’s tea,” Bilbo grinned. “One of my favorite comforts, tea. Nothing like a steaming cup of it on a cold day, and a tall iced glass of it cools the worst hot summer day. Oooh, what’s this? A work in progress?”

“It is,” Bard nodded, taking the cloth off the model of his angel. “It’s called Rahmiel.”

He explained in a few words about the angel of mercy and love, the mixture of metal, feathers, and fibers, and the small human figure that appeared below the angel alighting upon the earth. He pulled out his sketchbook to show the preliminary drawings he’d made of the sculpture, which led to the other sketches he’d made of fencers, dancers, children. Bilbo particularly liked the ones he’d done in Thran’s ballet classes of the pianist and the dance master.

“You have quite a knack for capturing the essence of a person in a few lines,” Bilbo said. “It’s very much like the calligraphy that is such a high art in China and Japan.”

Bard told him how he’d come to his style from exactly those sources.

“I think Rosie and your husband are right,” Bilbo said frankly as they sat in the sitting room with their tea and a few of Bard’s cookies. “Your sketches are certainly worthy of any gallery. To be sure, your sculpture is wonderful, and will certainly interest collectors. But you have the potential to reach a much wider market with your sketches. I don’t want you to think that all I’m interested in is quantity, but I’m sure you can produce more sketches in less time than sculpture, which would present collectors with examples of your work that are, let us say –”

“Cheaper to buy,” Bard smiled. “I understand the economics of art.”

“Exactly,” Bilbo nodded, relieved at Bard’s pragmatic comment. “Then I don’t have to point out that your sketches would provide you a means to subsidize your sculpture.”

“Not at all,” Bard agreed. “I enjoy sketching, and if there’s a market for it, I’m game. I’m not an artist who thinks it’s crass to make money off his labors. Groceries aren’t free.”

“No, they aren’t. Good, you’ve got a realistic understanding of how the business of selling art works.”

“I do. So what do you think?”

“Several things. You’re a talented artist. There’s a market for your work. I can help you find that market. May I talk about what help I can provide, and how much it will cost?”
“Please do,” Bard said.

In plain terms, Bilbo laid out what avenues he would pursue for Bard, where he would advertise his work, and what percentage he would take for each sale. Before he could do any of those things, however, Bard had to produce enough material for Bilbo to work with. The quickest way to begin this process was for Bard to sketch, sketch, sketch, until he had enough that would allow Bilbo to arrange a showing. There was a small gallery in the tourist district with which Bilbo had an arrangement to show works he represented, and which would provide a venue for Bard’s showing.

“I suggest you take a week or two or three to produce a number of sketches, then you and I can talk about where we are, and how to proceed,” Bilbo summarized.

“I can do that,” Bard nodded. “Let me ask you... I would think that the subjects of the sketches would be more interesting if they weren’t merely portraits of people, because portraits won’t speak to many people other than those who know the subjects. Scenes with something going on, that tell a story... I’d think they’d be more intriguing.”

“Exactly!” Bilbo nodded vigorously. “Like your fencing sketches.”

“What about... more unsettling stories?” Bard probed, thinking of the sketch he’d done in Thran’s pillow book last night.

“How unsettling?” Bilbo asked directly.

“War, discord, conflict?” Bard suggested.

Bilbo nodded. “Much of the world is more provocative than a Degas or a Renoir painting. Draw what moves you, and we’ll talk about it all.”

“Fair enough,” Bard nodded.

In a few minutes, he and Bilbo agreed to meet again in three weeks to review as many sketches as Bard could produce.

As Bilbo waved goodbye from his car and drove away, Bard shut the door and returned to the kitchen. It was lunchtime, but he was too excited to want to eat.

Thran wasn’t the only artist in the house anymore.
Chapter 69

Chapter Summary

While an angel holds forth about the importance of lunch, a saint delays his to follow his muse. When they reconvene, excitement gives way to realities, tradeoffs, and compromises. The saint cites the truth of an old adage, but neglects to let it temper his worries.

Will angst be in the offing?

The members of the UVB board stayed only a few minutes, mostly to chat with Thran. He made nice professional noises with both of them, smiling with the European charm so many casual acquaintances seemed to expect from a Russian ballet dancer. Why did none of them expect him to act like a Cossack, or Josef Stalin? The rhetorical question gave him something to smile about inside until the board members took their leave. He passed them on to Lettie to see them out of the studio, then he and Ori adjourned to the small break room. It was after one in the afternoon, so both of them were happy to sit down at one of the two small tables and pull out something to eat. An old campaigner, Ori pulled out a water bottle and a collection of energy bars, fruit cups, and a plastic bag full of trail mix. Thran unfolded Bard’s bento box lunch, heated the rice and chicken, and sat down to wield his chopsticks. Ori was still exclaiming over the cleverly nested boxes when Lettie came in, a small lunch bag in her hand.

“Oh, you two are wonderful!” she exclaimed, sinking down into the remaining chair with Ori and Thran. “I was sure I’d have to wolf down a power bar or something before we’d plunge right into things.”

“This will be my first decree as principal and major investor,” Thran replied with a flourish of his chopsticks. “We will have lunch every day, without fail.”

“You set a high standard,” Lettie observed, nodding at the nested boxes.

“That is courtesy of my husband, Bard,” Thran said. “He and I have a pact not to skip any meals, because we both do when we are absorbed in something. So he provided me an elegant lunch that I cannot resist.”

“Does he cater?” Lettie teased. “Because I wouldn’t resist that, either.”

“I am blessed,” Thran agreed.

Irmo burst in, closely followed by Abebe, Rada, and Círdan. “What is this? Eating? We must start!”

“We will start shortly, Irmo,” Thran said firmly. “You are right that we have much to do, and so we must see to the care of those who will work so hard. We will have lunch every day, for those who choose to have it. I cannot ask so much work of myself, much less the rest of our company, without proper attention to the things that keep us strong. Ergo,” he waved at his collection of boxes, “lunch.”

“That’s music to my ears,” Abebe avowed. “I’ll be right back.”
The ballet master and set designer disappeared, the former returning shortly with a couple of power bars; the latter, with a wrapped sandwich. “Are you serious about this, Thran?”

Thran nodded firmly. “Very. I do not doubt that we will all work very long and very hard to make this ballet live. It is too much to ask ourselves to dance, make the scenery, sew the costumes, and do the other important jobs, without proper attention to the body. For a few short minutes every day, we will eat, and not think about ballet. Then we can return to our tasks refreshed.”

“I’m all for it,” Lettie seconded, and everyone else offered enthusiastic agreement.

“Then tomorrow I’ll bring something better than this,” Abebe looked at his wrapped bar.

Irmo looked exasperated, but Rada quietly inched a packet of cookies out from under his furry Tibetan hat, surreptitiously opened it, and snuck one cookie after the other into his mouth.

“But this is time that we can put to better use, as we are all together,” Irmo waved his hands.

“We put it to good use now – reflection after the morning’s tedium,” Thran said, grateful for the crunchy vegetables Bard had put in one of the small nesting boxes. They gave him something to chew rather than biting Irmo’s head off. “Be patient, and we will soon be ready to begin on other topics.”

“I’m through mine, Mr. Oropherson,” Ori said quietly, capping his water bottle. “I can explain the voice recognition system to Mr. Lórien, so he’ll understand why I’m following him around and repeating everything he says.”

“I thank you, Ori,” Thran gave the small man a nod. “But first, let me make my second pronouncement. We will not stand on titles. To make our ballet, we will all find ourselves doing more than what our supposed titles define. We will all work however we can at whatever we can, yes?” Nods went around. “Good. So I am Thran, and you are Ori, and you are Irmo, Lettie, Abebe, Círdan, and Rada. We can be respectful without so much formality, I hope. If all of you agree?”

Nods went around again.

“Then Ori, while the rest of us finish our meal, please explain how we plan to capture Irmo’s ideas – actually, the ideas of anyone within Ori’s earshot.”

Ori gave a quick summary of the voice recognition system, producing the microphone and table and showing everyone how it worked. That provoked great interest and discussion that persisted until everyone was through eating.

“Then we will adjourn for a moment to tend to necessities, and then we will try Ori’s system out as we discuss the list of scenes we have so far for our ballet,” Thran directed.

Everyone agreed, and in a few minutes, the group was back in the small break room, ready to begin. Ori handed around copies of the ballet scenes and details that Thran had worked out with Irmo previously, and let everyone peruse it for a few seconds before beginning the discussion. It took a few moments for everyone to get used to the background echo of Ori repeating words a fractured second after someone said them. The obtrusiveness lessened as Ori adjusted his voice until it was barely above a whisper.

First, they discussed the story and scenes; this was the first time Círdan had heard a lot of this, and Rada, as well. Then they discussed the general look of what Irmo and Thran had come up with. People began to sit up and voices grew animated as everyone was drawn into the vision that had begun with Thran’s knife dance and his husband’s apt characterization.
Finally, finally, finally – the days of bureaucracy and legalities were over, and the excitement of creation had begun.

* * *

Bard’s first instinct was to snatch up his sketchbook and pencils, and never mind lunch, never mind ballrooms that needed painting, never mind chores and renovation and laundry. Despite the importance of all of those mundane things, he knew better than to ignore the muse when she was so engaged. So off to the sitting room he went, out came the sketchpad and pencils, and he blanked his thoughts as he opened to the first blank sheet.

He must have done ten or fifteen before the initial rush of excitement calmed. There was Tilda looking back at Sigrid as they were about to fly down the snowy hill on the sled. There were Bain and Legolas, running through the house and laughing. There was Thran standing pensively at rest in the ballroom, one hand on the barre and the other at his side as he looked out of the window. Another appeared of Thran leaning forward on the sitting room sofa to pour tea into his cup, one leg elegantly curled under him, his soft sweater draping his lean frame, one strand of hair falling in front of his shoulder. Thran in a backbend, one foot on the floor and the other arched elegantly overhead, expression serene. One of the double images he liked so much – his favorite was Tilda looking away from the mirror and over her shoulder at the viewer, while her reflection also looked at the viewer, both of them startled, as if the viewer had interrupted their conversation. The moodiness, the unsettled sense of which was a reflection and which was not, intrigued him enough that he did several like that, each a bit more unsettling than the next. He didn’t know what story had preceded each of the sketches, and what might come after was far from clear, but he liked that ambivalence.

When the muse let him go, he found that three hours had gone by, and it was almost four o’clock. He refused to regret missing lunch. Nothing could make him do that.

He ducked into the fridge and made a peanut butter sandwich, which he wolfed down with a big glass of milk. He’d have some fruit with the children when they came home, so he could in good conscience say that he’d had lunch, albeit a late one.

He’d just gotten the peanut butter and bread back in the fridge and had gotten out the cutting board and chef’s knife in anticipation of supper when the door to the mudroom banged.

“Bard! I am home!”

His husband sounded jubilant, bringing a smile to Bard’s face. “I’m in the kitchen, angel! It sounds like you had a good day.”

Thran swept through, his pale grey dress coat aswirl and a wide smile on his face as he came up behind Bard and put his arms around him. “At last, we are through the wrangles and papers and games of poker! The ballet commences!”

“That’s got to be a relief,” Bard grinned, as Thran bounced away to put his coat and scarf in the hall closet. “Go change out of your nice suit, then come back downstairs and tell me about it.”

“Come up with me!”

Thran sounded so ecstatic that Bard chuckled as he followed the tall dancer upstairs and into the bedroom. He sat on the bed as Thran babbled from the closet, the gist of it being that the contract was signed with minimal effort, and the afternoon was spent in intense discussion with Irmo, the set designer, the costumier, the ballet master, and the artistic director as they began to bring their ballet to life. Mr. Nori’s brother, Ori, was also on board to record Irmo’s brilliance in a useful form. It was wonderful to see Thran so animated and engaged after the days of endless jousting about terms. He was so elated when he came out of the closet in his Henley and leggings that he pounced on Bard, pushing him flat on the bed and perching on hands and knees above him to kiss him thoroughly.

“You do feel better,” Bard teased, draping his arms around Thran’s neck and kissing him back.

“It has been nearly three months since I last worked on a ballet,” Thran shrugged without apology. “As much as I have loved our time together, it is good to be a dancer again.”

“Did you get to dance today?”

“No, but at least I got to talk about what I will dance before long. That is a great relief.”

Bard kissed Thran again. “I’m sure.”

Thran rolled off Bard and flopped onto his back beside him as he continued to babble about how the day had gone and how Ori and his marvelous device would capture Irmo’s ideas and how much he liked the set designer. Bard listened patiently, happy that his husband was so animated and full of life. When Thran’s spate of words slowed, Bard twined his fingers with Thran’s and turned towards him.

“It all sounds great, cariad. I had some good news today, too.”

“Do you know what we need?” Thran stared up at the ceiling. “We need a name for our ballet. We cannot continue to call it the Death ballet. That is too negative. What would be a better, more enticing name?”

“I don’t know; something like... Deathfall, or King of the Dead, or Fall of the King of the Dead, or The Death of Death, or The Son of Dracula Returns...”

Thran snickered. “The last one has already been taken, long ago. It was a terrible film.”

Bard snickered, too. “I missed that one.”

“I should have missed it.”

“You could call your ballet Immortal. That covers both Death and Love.”

“I like that one,” Thran hummed, still staring at the ceiling. In mid-thought, however, his eyes sharpened, and he looked over at Bard. “Did you say... you had good news?”

Bard smiled, gratified that the Death ballet hadn’t swept Thran completely away. “I did.”

Thran sat up all at once, propping himself up on one elbow. “You called Shire Hills! What did Bilbo say?”

Bard sat up completely, cradling Thran’s long hand in both of his to massage it. “He did more than say, angel – he came out to look at my stuff. He loved Rahmiel and the other sculpture, but he really loved my sketches. He thinks that I could make a good show out of them.”

Thran threw his arms around Bard and pressed a loud kiss against his cheek. “Of course they are good! They are much more than good! Oy, lyubov moya, that is the best news! What else did he say?"

Bard took a deep breath. “The good news is that he thinks my sketches will appeal to a larger market than my sculpture because it’s quicker to produce, of course, and more affordable to more people, also of course. He has ties to a gallery where I could hold a show, even include a couple of pieces of my stuff from the barn to build interest in that, maybe attract some commissions.”

“That is wonderful, my saint.” Thran looked deeply into Bard’s eyes, concerned. “But if that is the good news, and it is very good news... is there bad news?”

“No really. It just... it means we – I might need to change a few things for a couple of weeks.”

“Tell me.”

“The only hitch is that Bilbo thinks I don’t have enough sketches. He’s right – I don’t. He’s asked me to see what I can produce in the next three weeks, and then he and I will see where I stand. The problem is... if I work on my sketches, then I don’t work on the ballroom, and you need the ballroom to work on the ballet. I called two plasterers to come out to make estimates, by the way; they’ll be out later this week. So I want to ask how soon you think you’ll need the ballroom so I can see what juggling I need to do to get it ready. I can put Bilbo off –”

“No, no, no!” Thran’s hands tightened on Bard’s shoulders. “For you to put off your sketches is no better than for me to put off the ballet. So you must sketch. We do not need the ballroom right away. We have much work to do first – cast the parts, choose the music, choreograph the dances... many, many things.”

The mudroom door banged open downstairs, signaling the children’s arrival from school. Both of them winced as that same door slammed shut.

“Let us greet the horde,” Thran suggested. “We will make supper, and then do homework, and then talk of what to do about the ballroom.”

“Okay,” Bard agreed, pulling Thran to his feet after him. “Steak tonight. Is that okay for you? I’ve got plenty of chicken breast if you’d rather I grill that for you.”

“I have not had steak in forever,” Thran admitted as they trotted downstairs. “Perhaps a small piece will not ruin me.”

“I don’t think it will,” Bard replied, as they headed into the kitchen to greet the children.

As everyone got ready for supper, the children were full of discussion about school. Sigrid had another track meet this coming Saturday, a big regional one with several schools in attendance, so Bard made sure that was noted on their schedule. Bain had a field trip on Thursday to the MOMA in the city. Legolas had to study for a big English test tomorrow. Tilda had a note from her art teacher asking Bard to email him.

“What’s that about, little doll?” Bard asked with some concern, his chef’s knife pausing over the cutting board.

Tilda’s expression was considered. “I don’t know. I’m not in any trouble that I can think of. Mr. Rohan liked my last two assignments.”

“Okay, I’ll email him after supper,” Bard agreed. “Table all set?”
“That’s Legolas tonight,” Tilda confirmed, waving a spoon. “I’m doing the fruit salad.”

“Table’s set,” Legolas confirmed.

Supper was soon ready. This was the first time since they’d moved in that Bard had grilled steak on their new gas stove, and it was met with enthusiasm. Even Thran ate more than the miniscule portion he originally took for himself, which relieved Bard; he still worried about how little Thran ate. That was not a concern he had about any of the children; the amount all of them ate, especially the boys, was stunning. They all seemed to eat like vacuum cleaners on full suck, too – one second the food was there, and the next second it wasn’t. There were no leftovers to put away, either.

As the children settled to their homework around the kitchen table, Bard settled in the sitting room with Thran. He borrowed Thran’s computer to send the email to Tilda’s teacher, set the laptop aside, then picked up his sketchbook. A reply appeared less than a half hour later, alerting Bard with a soft chime. As he read the man’s reply, a big smile appeared on his face, attracting Thran’s attention.

“What is it? Good news?”

Bard nodded, then pitched his voice to be heard in the kitchen. “Tilda, would you come in for a second?”

Tilda duly appeared. “Yes, Da?”

“I just got a reply from your art teacher. He didn’t just like your last two assignments, little doll. He thinks you’d do well in a drawing class rather than just the basic one you’re in, and wants to know if I’d be okay with that. What do you think? Would you like that?”

Tilda’s smile was wide. “I would love that! So can I, Da?”

“It might mean more work, so think about that. Do you think you can handle that and the rest of your homework, too?”

Tilda’s nod was vigorous. “I want to, Da. I really want to.”

“Then I’ll email him back right now.” Bard opened the reply window. “Dear Mr. Rohan: I appreciate the chance for Tilda to change her general art class to a drawing class. She is very excited about it, and I am sure this will improve her skills a great deal. Thank you for giving her the chance. Kind Regards, Bard Bowman.”

Tilda threw her arms around Bard. “Thanks, Da. I can’t wait!”

Thran sat up to offer Tilda a hug. “Congratulations, Kukla! You will become a great artist before you know it!”

“Just like Da,” she beamed, hugging Thran. “I wonder when I’ll get to move to the drawing class?”

The computer chimed again, and Bard checked the mail queue, smiling when the answer to Tilda’s question appeared. “Mr. Rohan says he’ll talk to you tomorrow about that.”

“Goodie!” Tilda jumped up and down. “I can’t wait!”

She bounced back into the kitchen to return to her homework as Bard tapped a reply to Mr. Rohan thanking him for his offer. When he was done, he logged off, and passed the laptop to Thran. He picked up his sketchbook and pencils again, and did a quick drawing of Tilda’s smile and sparkling eyes.
“That is exactly her,” Thran hummed, leaning over to look over at Bard’s book. “Oooh, you have done several sketches today, yes? May I see?”

Bard handed his sketchbook over. “I admit that I spent all afternoon sketching, rather than painting the ballroom.”

Thran shot Bard a stern look as he paged through the sketched Bard had done this afternoon. “Do not sound one bit guilty. This is a great chance you have, and you must take it, just as I take my chance to do the ballet.”

“When do you think you’ll need the ballroom? A month? Two months? A week?”

“I am not sure, though I am sure that whenever it is done, we will make use of it. Understand that we will never make our ballroom into the perfect ballet studio, Bard. I do not expect that, so we should not try. It is only to supplement UVB’s regular studio only.”

“Okay,” Bard exhaled. “Then what’s good enough to make it a supplemental space? Is it enough just to refinish the floors? Do the floors and lighting? Do the walls and ceiling need any work at all? Of course, having the whole thing done would be ideal, and it’d make a good backdrop for publicity shots.

“The other side of the equation, as Sigrid would say, is how to get the work done. I think the floor will need someone to come in and do it. The plaster isn’t essential to, but I want to make sure it’s stable before we hang any chandeliers. The paint I can do myself, though it’ll take a while. If we hired someone to do it, they’d likely be done in a week. Or we can hire day labor to help me do it.”

Thran mulled. “The most important part is the floor. Ours is old, it is wood rather than the new composites, but it is springy, and not slippery – both of those are essential. I do not want to do much to it, because sanding and varnishing would make it much too slippery to dance upon. We could add a top layer of the more modern material, but that is a great expense, and the herringbone floor is too beautiful to cover unless we must. One advantage of working on the wood is that whatever venue hosts our performance will probably have a wood floor, and so we must get used to dancing on it.”

“Okay, not much to do to the floor. Just leave it alone? Keep it swept?”

Thran nodded. “Yes. No grit, no shoes.”

“That’s easy. What’s next? Lighting?”

Thran nodded again. “Yes, we need the chandeliers. The side sconces alone do not make enough light. That will be a great expense, yes?”

“Likely,” Bard exhaled, scribbling figures on the back of one of his sketches. “We need three chandeliers, and each one needs to be about forty-five inches tall by forty-five inches wide. Crystal ones will be an arm and a leg. Maybe brass ones would be less. I have no idea. The size we need will likely need special ordering, and that may take time.”

Thran opened his search engine on his laptop and called up pictures of chandeliers. Bard slid closer to watch the screen. “I like the crystal ones. And look – they are expensive, but far less than the brass ones.”

“I guess that’s not surprising, now that I think about it,” Bard conceded. “All the metal arms have to be exactly the same, and that takes work, and good brass costs good money. The crystal ones rely a lot on gravity to make all the crystals hang the same way, and the wire doesn’t have to be so fine. So that’s something.”
“It seems that these are not special order, so that is something else,” Thran mulled. “I wonder how long it takes them to ship?”

“I wonder how much they weigh?” Bard added. “I think the places in the ceiling to hold them line up with the roof joists so they’ll take the weight, but I’ll need to check.”

“I don’t understand that,” Thran cast him a puzzled look.

“Click on that crystal chandelier you like. Okay, scroll down... there, it weighs sixty-five pounds. Unsupported plaster can’t hold that, so you have to anchor the chandelier to the beams in the ceiling under the plaster. Those beams are called joists, and they’re heavy wood to support the roof, as well as the chandeliers. So given that the ballroom once had heavy chandeliers, and the ceiling shows where they went, I assume that the original ones were well anchored. But you know what they say about assume, right?”

“What?”

Bard wrote the word, ‘assume,’ on his paper by his calculation, and drew a circle around the first three letters. “Assume makes an ass,” he circled the letter u, “out of you,” he circled the letters me, “and me.” He gave Thran a wry grin. “That means I’ll haul my ass up to the crawl space and make sure.”

Thran’s snicker was rich. “A wise as well as a funny man. So if we use this chandelier as an example, it will cost somewhere five and seven thousand dollars for three chandeliers.”

“It’ll be at least a couple of weeks to ship then, which is okay; the ceiling has to be in shape before they go up, anyway.”

“What about painting?”

Bard exhaled again. “Not cheap, but it’d be faster than me doing it. It runs about a dollar a square foot. I’d figure at least twenty-five hundred to three thousand dollars to have a crew come in and do it.”

“So the painters and the chandeliers will be ten thousand dollars.”

Bard winced. “That’s a lot. It might be cheaper to rent studio space.”

Thran winced, too. “Studio space starts at about seventy-five dollars an hour. So ten thousand dollars translates to about one hundred and thirty hours of studio space. Even at only fifty hours a week, that is less than three weeks of studio rental. Irmo will consume that in a single gulp. Perhaps the expense could be a tax deduction for business expenses?”

Bard shook his head. “I don’t know.”

“Nor do I,” Thran agreed. “That will be a question for Ori or Mr. Nori tomorrow.”

Thran fell silent, and stayed that way as the children began to filter in, saying they were through their homework and heading upstairs to bathe. Bard’s old worries about money flitted around the edges of this thoughts – Thran hadn’t batted an eye when Bard had spent almost ten thousand dollars on kitchen appliances, or a roof, or updated plumbing. Maybe the financial gamble to put on this ballet was more severe than he’d thought. When Sigrid stuck her head in to say she was done and heading upstairs to talk to Finn, Bard worked hard to keep his worry out of his voice.

“Most of the expense of this is for the chandeliers,” he said casually. “If what you need is good lighting, then we can get industrial fixtures to hold us until after the ballet. That’ll cost less than a thousand dollars for the lot, and it’ll provide better lighting, too. And I don’t mind dividing up my time, half on painting, and half on sketching. That’ll preclude us having to hire painters. That’d bring down the cost of the ballroom to just a thousand dollars for the lighting. I’ll have an idea about the plaster work once I get the estimates later this week.”

Thran swallowed. “The painting takes time away from your sketching, Bard. How can I ask you do to that?”

“I can’t sketch nonstop for the next three weeks. I can at least get the ceiling in shape for industrial lighting so you can see what you’re doing, even if we let the walls go for a bit. That’ll save you from having to rent studio space.”

Thran shrugged, conceding the truth of that. “That would avoid a large expense I would prefer not to incur. I accept, then – you will care for the ceiling, and we will hang industrial lighting for now. But your sketching must occupy fully half of your time, lyubov moya. Please agree to that.”

Bard nodded. “I will, especially if you let me sneak into some of your sessions to sketch?”

“Of course.” Thran mustered a smile. “Then once our ballet is a huge success, you will make a beautiful book from your sketches and call it ‘The Art of Immortal,’ and it will be a huge success on top of a huge success.”

“That’d be stunning,” Bard smiled.

Later, when Bard settled into bed beside Thran, he thought about Thran’s quick agreement to spend as little on the ballroom as possible to address the immediate need. This ballet was more of a gamble than Thran had let on, then. Had Bard contributed to that gamble because he’d spent too much on the house renovation so far? Granted, Bard had done only things that had been necessary to make the house habitable – roof, plumbing, kitchen appliances, and so on – and he hadn’t been too flamboyant with anything. But maybe he could have done more of it himself, or... something.

He’d find some way to get the ballroom in proper shape, because Thran needed it. Even if he had to put off his sketching for a little, it wouldn’t be forever. Bilbo and his show would still be there once the ballroom was fit for Thran and the company to dance in.

After all that Thran had done for him, he’d get it done, whatever it took.

* * *

Technical Notes:

For you house geeks out there (and math geeks who fondly remember the phrase, be sure to show your work), here’s how to calculate the size chandelier you need for a space:

- Allow 2.5-3 inches of chandelier height for each foot of room height. This gives you the height of the chandelier.
- Add the width of your room in feet to the height of your room in feet. This is approximately the diameter in inches of your chandelier.
Bard’s ballroom is 60 feet long by 30 feet wide by 15 feet high:

- The height of each chandelier is 15 feet high x 2.5 inches = 37.5 inches high (minimum), or 15 feet high x 3 inches = 45 inches high (maximum)
- The diameter of each chandelier is 30 feet wide + 15 feet tall = 45 inches wide

So Bard and Thran need three chandeliers to fit the original configuration of the ceiling, each about 45'' high x 45'' wide.
Chapter 70

Chapter Summary

The ballet continues to take its toll.

Chapter Notes

Most people remember the "Kyrie" section of György Ligeti’s "Requiem" for its inclusion in the film, "2001 - A Space Odyssey." It’s the eerie voice part that accompanies the appearance of the mysterious monolith.

Long after Bard relaxed into sleep, Thran remained awake. So many things flitted through his thoughts, a few logistical – how to manage Irmo, the set to be built, the publicity and the venue and the dancers – but many exciting – to dance again, to create something new, to work with so many good people. Over and over again, he forced his body to calm, only to find arms and legs and shoulders tense with desire to dive back into the madness. The constant shifting and turning would only wake Bard, so Thran stealthily slid away from his sleeping husband. Yet no sooner did he move away than Bard stirred, rolling over to stroke a slow hand over Thran’s back.

“Hard to sleep tonight, angel?”

“I am sorry. I had hoped not to wake you.”

“All of the day’s excitement.”

Thran sighed. “Very much so.”

A warm chest came to rest at Thran’s back. A strong left arm slipped under his and around his ribs, easing him close. “Maybe I can help.”

As the hand across his ribs stroked slowly, lightly, warm breath and soft lips caressed his neck, flooding his body with endorphins. Bard’s right hand slid under Thran’s body and wrapped around his shoulder; his left traced down Thran’s ribs, loin, hip, groin, then rubbed his cock gently. Teeth nibbled at the juncture of neck and shoulder, tensing Thran’s skin into gooseflesh. As his breath caught, his cock stiffened, only to be engulfed in Bard’s hand. A leg went over his to pull it back, and the hand around his cock would not be ignored. He was overwhelmed in seconds to gasp, then release, in the arms of his husband. Hands stroked him as he calmed, and a soft kiss at his nape sent another wave of gooseflesh over him. When he was spent, Bard passed him a small towel to blot himself and the sheets.

“Better?” Bard murmured, his soft voice blurry with sleep.

“You treat me far better than I deserve,” Thran whispered back, his hands tightening on Bard’s resting on his shoulder and hip.
“I love you, angel. That’s all.”

“I love you, too, lyubov moyya. Very much.”

Bard’s hands tightened on him, silent acceptance, then he resettled himself at Thran’s back. His breath deepened quickly as he drifted off. The comforting sound blessedly soothed Thran to sleep in only a few minutes.

Two hours later, Thran woke with his brain on fire, his thoughts spinning and racing and careening once again.

* * *

The next several days raced by so fast that Bard was hard pressed to distinguish between them. There were the children to see off to school, Thran to see off to UVB, and the house to manage. Plasterers made estimates – one outrageous, the other much more reasonable. Bard liked the second woman, who acknowledged that to restore all of the plasterwork was excessive, unneeded, and expensive, given that most of it was stable, if a bit worn around the edges. Just to re-anchor the one loose ceiling medallion didn’t cost too much and took only a couple of hours, so that’s what Bard chose to do. Even while the plasterer was at work, Bard spent more hours on the scaffolding, scraping and painting the ballroom ceiling, than anything else. Still, he’d learned from all the bedrooms that paint with included primer was a blessing, because it cut the number of coats that the ceiling needed to two. He ordered three industrial ceiling fixtures in white, which would come next week.

Even the weekend saw Thran off early to the UVB studio, so Bard shuttled Legolas to fencing, then he and the other children took Sigrid off to her track meet. Her events weren’t for a couple of hours, so Bard, Tilda, and Bain headed to the market, stocked the fridge, returned to pick up Legolas, and then went back to Sigrid’s meet to watch. Finn joined them there to cheer Sigrid on in her races. By two, the meet was over, so Bard brought Bain, Tilda, and Legolas home while Sigrid went out for pizza with Finn. He made tacos for lunch, put stuff in the crockpot for a supper of chicken and dumplings, threw laundry into the washer, then got everyone started on homework while he resumed work on the ceiling. When Sigrid and Finn came home, both of them joined the homework table. Bard climbed down as the washer and dryer required, or to answer homework questions as they arose.

Tilda finished her homework first, then came into the ballroom to keep Bard company while she worked on her drawing. It was fun to hear her impressions of her new art class, and Bard climbed down a time or two to elaborate on something she’d learned in class. Despite the diversions, Bard was able to finish the first coat on the ceiling without delaying supper too long. He threw the brushes and rollers into the mudroom sink to soak, then hustled up the supper crew to help get the veg and fruit ready to accompany with chicken and dumplings.

He’d hoped that holding supper late would give Thran a chance to get home in time for it, but the ballet had a solid hold on his husband. Supper was over, cleanup commenced, and Finn bade the family farewell. Bard felt bad that he hadn’t spent much time with Bain and Legolas, so after the family read the next bit of Harry Potter, he asked the boys to teach him how to play one of their video games. Taking pity on him, they spared him the zombie apocalypse, and chose car racing instead. He lost the first several races miserably, but once he got used to the controller, he steadily improved. When he finally won a race, he was elated.
“Finally!” Bain jibed with a grin. “At least now we can get out of the practice phase and try a real race!”

“What was this – the infant race?” Bard snarked back.

“Just about,” Bain returned. Beside him, Legolas smothered laughter in his hands. “It’s true, right, Legs? This is the baby race!”

“Um, kind of,” Legolas admitted with a guilty smile at Bard.

“Then bring on the real race,” Bard snorted. He’d stand no chance against his younger competitors, but he put on a brave face, all the same. Given the eager chortles from the boys, a brave face would likely be all that he’d get out of this, but onward he went. To everyone’s surprise, he held his own, and if he didn’t win many races, his losses were at least respectable.

“Can I play Dinky Farm now?” Tilda asked plaintively. “You’ve played at least a hundred car races, so it’s my turn.”

Bain groaned, but not loudly, so a four-hand round of Dinky Farm replaced the car races. Tilda had a wonderful time explaining all the nuances to Bard, and he was much better than all of the children at weighing the tradeoffs of one expense over another, so he was the winner of the game, much to everyone’s surprise but his own.

Just as Tilda headed upstairs to shower, the door to the mudroom opened. Bard turned over his video controller to the boys, but Legolas was quick to run into the kitchen; Bard followed close behind. Thran was just coming through. He’d shed his coat and boots, and was still in bedraggled dancewear. He looked tired and pale as Legolas greeted him with a hug.

“Papa! I’m glad you’re home at last! I was starting to worry.”

Thran wound arms around his son to return the greeting. “All is well, Legolas. I am sorry I was away so long today.”

“Is everything all right with your ballet?”

“It is very well, yes. We made very good progress today on the choreography. I am very happy... but tired.”

“Okay. I’m glad you’re okay. The Gondors said to tell you that they missed you today.”

“That is kind of them. I missed fencing with them, too. But I am well exercised, even so.”

Legolas smiled, encouraged at his father’s wry grin. “Okay. Bain and I are playing a game, so I should go back to it.”

“Of course. Good luck against the zombies.”

Chuckling, Legolas dashed back to the sitting room, leaving Thran to meet Bard’s eyes. He looked so weary that Bard offered him a hug.

“Welcome home, angel. You look all in.”

Thran nodded. “I am very tired.”

“Understandable. It’s going on ten. What can I get you to eat?”
“I am almost too tired to eat. Is there any soup?”

“There’s soup. Chicken with veg and a few noodles, or potato leek. I made chicken and dumplings for supper, so there’s that, too.”

“The chicken soup sounds wonderful.”

“I’ll put it on while you wash.”

“If I wash, I will only fall into bed after, so I should eat first, or I will not eat at all.”

“At least put on something comfortable while the soup heats. I can get you some leggings and a dry shirt if you want.”

“I have them in my bag. I will change in the pantry, so as not to offend the sensibilities of our children.”

Bard chuckled as he got out the bin of soup. “Go ahead, then. Anything with your soup? Salad? Rolls? Cheese and crackers?”

“A warm roll with butter would be perfect.”

“On its way.”

Thran rooted through his bag, dug out some clothes, and disappeared into the pantry. Bard busied himself heating a big bowl of the soup in the microwave, and put a plate of cracked wheat rolls in the warming oven. Out came the butter, salt, and pepper to go on the table. Bard had just turned back to the kitchen when Thran reappeared; his husband shivered and quickly pulled a long, woolly cardigan and equally thick socks from his bag and put them on.

“Tea?”

“Lemon with ginger?”

“Okay. Sit down; your soup’s almost ready.”

Thran went without comment, moving as if his arms and legs were too heavy, leaning on the table as he sat down. Bard put the bowl of soup and utensils before him, then brought the plate of rolls.

“Do you mind company? Or if you’d rather just eat, that’s fine, too.”

Thran looked up at him. “It would be nice if you would sit with me. Though I am not very good company. I will likely babble about the ballet to keep myself from falling asleep.”

Bard sat down opposite Thran. “Eat first. Then you can babble away as much as you want.”

Thran dug into his soup without further urging. His first couple of bites were tentative, but as the warm broth hit his stomach, he sped up, humming in relief. He downed that bowlful fast enough that Bard ladled more into it, which Thran didn’t protest. He paused long enough to butter a roll and chew it gratefully.

“Maybe I need to make you a bigger lunch,” Bard ventured.

“I would not turn it down,” was Thran’s frank admission.

“Chicken,” Thran nodded, then he smiled guiltily. “I do like peanut butter.”

“Maybe nuts? Or you can just keep a jar of the stuff at the studio with bread or crackers. Or a spoon.”

Thran snickered. “Rada – the costumier, yes? – eats the most bizarre collection of things. Mostly sweets. He has this voluminous coat full of everything, as if he were some sort of snack emporium. And a hat under which he keeps packets of ginger snaps. He carries around a jar of chocolate nut spread that he eats out of with a spoon – or he dips the cookies into it.”

Bard grimaced and laughed at the same time. “Gods, that stuff’s too sweet for me.”

“Then you would starve in the midst of Rada’s great bounty. He eats nothing but sweets, I think.”

Tilda came downstairs and into the kitchen. She was in her nightclothes, and her hair was wet from the shower. “Ada! You’re home! You must be tired!”

“At long last, I am home,” Thran gave her a smile. “I am tired, but your Da’s good chicken soup is a great restorative. Comment ça va, ma petite?”

“Très bien, Ada. Nous avons été au magasin et à la course de Sigrid.”

“Your French is coming along so well!” Thran complimented.

Tilda dimpled. “Legolas helps me a lot. He’s a good teacher.”

“That is kind of you to say.”

“He’s helping all of us. Sigrid sounds a lot better now, or so Legs says.”

“Excellent.”

“Before long, I’m going to be the only one who doesn’t understand what’s going on,” Bard shook his head.

“Then we’ll be able to talk about what to get you for Christmas without you knowing what we want to get you.” Tilda smiled, but put her head on Bard’s shoulder to take the sting out of her poke. “Can I have some of my cheese, please?”

“Dry your hair first, little doll, so it’s not wet when you go to sleep.”

“Sigrid’s got the dryer in her room.”

“Go knock politely on the door, and ask her for it. You can bring it downstairs and I’ll help you get the back.”

“Okay, Da.”

As she trotted off, Bard gave Thran’s bowl another look. It was empty again. “More soup, angel?”

Thran shook his head. “Perhaps another roll, though. I like these.”

“I saw them in the market today. They were on sale, so they didn’t cost much, so I thought I’d try them out. If you and the children liked them, I can make something similar.”

“You look out for us very well,” Thran sighed. “Would you think me terrible if I wash my dishes, then wash, and then crawl into bed?”

“Of course not. Leave the dishes; I’ll get them. Just tell me what your schedule is tomorrow, so I can work around it.”

“I expect I will be at the studio again after breakfast. I am sorry.”

“We talked about it, Thran. If it’s what you need to do to get your ballet off the ground, then it’s what you have to do.”

“You are a saint, indeed,” Thran looked up at him with gratitude. “Thank you for taking Legolas to fencing, and seeing to the food, and taking care of me, and everything. I love you, lyubov moya.”

“I love you, too, cariad, and you’re welcome. You see to the ballet. I’ve got the rest.”

“You have more than ‘the rest,’ lyubov moya,” Thran smiled. “You have a big part of the ballet, too. You came up with Death Collecting Souls on the Battlefield, and most of the story that follows the battlefield, and then the name of the story. It will say so in the credits.”

“What, as chief cook and bottle washer?” Bard teased, taking Thran’s bowl and utensils to the sink and returning with his tea.

“No, as lead writer of the story. It will say Bard Bowman and Thran Oropherson.”

Bard blinked, and a small smile pricked at his lips as he thought about Thran’s revelation. “Well. That’s... that’s very nice of you.”

“It is the least I can do for one who gives so much.”

“And... it’ll really be called Immortal?”

Thran chewed his roll. “It is a very good name. No one has come up with a better one.”

“Wow.” Bard’s smile spread across his face. “Just... wow.”

Tilda came down with the hair dryer and her brush, so Bard put aside his delight to tend to her while Thran went upstairs to wash. He chased the boys upstairs to take their showers, got Tilda her cheese, then decided what he needed to prepare for tomorrow’s supper for the children to make. Maybe a shepherd’s pie? While the boys showered, he and Tilda put the humble concoction together. All the children would have to do was put the filling into a dish, boil and mash potatoes for the topping, and sprinkle it with cheese. He slid the bin of filling into the fridge, made his rounds, then headed upstairs with Tilda. The children were ready for bed, so Bard bid them all goodnight, and finally made it into his bedroom.

His husband was already sound asleep in bed. Bard washed and dried quietly, then slipped in beside Thran. His angel was so exhausted that he never stirred.

Thran hadn’t asked about the family tonight. Just as he hadn’t yesterday, or the day before.

Bard refused to worry. Thran had told him how consuming this ballet would be. If anything, Thran’s exhaustion was just more evidence of how much he needed Bard to back him. He’d made good progress to finish the main color on the ballroom ceiling; only the white trim paint remained. He’d finish that on Monday, and see how far he could get on stripping the rest of the woodwork. Tomorrow, he’d work on his sketches for Bilbo; with any luck, the muse would favor him, and he’d get several done during the day. The children would help with cleaning the house and finishing the laundry, so that would be in good hand.

There was no need to worry. Everything was going well.

* * *

Despite Thran’s eagerness to reach the UVB studio, guilt simmered in his stomach as he waved goodbye to Bard. What a saint his husband was – never a word, never a question, always a patient ear to listen, and a bowl of hot soup whenever Thran dragged himself home. Thank the gods for Bard’s steadying presence, and his more than competent management of their children and home. What a blessing it was to know that all was safe and secure, and in the best hands! What a blessing it was to not have to worry – if there were problems, Bard would tell him.

Until then, he was free to concentrate on this ridiculous ballet.

This ridiculous ballet was more than enough to worry about – Irmo alone was a handful, although Ori mitigated a great deal of that, just by capturing the frequent zigs and zags of Irmo’s inspiration.

Then there was casting the two other leads, the Maid and the Soldier. UVB’s first male principal was ailing, a stress fracture that had been the original reason that UVB had called for auditions, but the young dancer they had hired had the potential to play the Soldier. He was small and dark-haired, reminding Thran of Legolas’s friend, Kíllian, and would provide exactly the right physical contrast with Thran’s tall, pale elegance. Unlike Kíllian, however, Luka did not balance his easy-going personality with precision of technique. In fact, at times, Thran thought him a bit slapdash. Thran expected to have to take him aside at some point to reiterate the need for focus, but for now he had left that to Abebe to settle the youngster.

Thran’s friend, Charisse, badly wanted to accept the role of the Maid, but UVB would have to pay a premium to her current company to get her on loan. Of all the things to pay for, this was worth the expense, but it was still an expense.

Another concern was the licensing fee to use the music that had started this effort – the Prokofiev piece from Romeo and Juliet. The fee to use those two minutes of music would cost several thousand dollars, even for a short run. But again, it was an expense that would make the ballet. Both Thran and Lettie and told Irmo firmly that the rest of the music for the ballet had to be from the public domain, which would cost nothing for them to use.

Of course, Irmo had ignored that, insisting that the “Kyrie” section of György Ligeti’s Requiem was the only music that could adequately accompany the ballet’s chaotic opening battle scene. After hearing it, Thran had to admit that the music was a brilliant complement, and so there was another expense for rights to use those six and a half minutes of music. If they used the same music for the second battle, then that meant another fee. At least the music Irmo considered for the introduction to the Underworld was in the public domain - Camille Saint-Saëns’s Danse Macabre. He also had an interesting idea to overlay different bits of music to signify the Soldier’s travels through the underworld as he moved from place to place. But if he included any modern music, that meant more fees.

Thran winced. How was one supposed to create anything original when constrained to just the music of Mozart, Bach, and Beethoven? No modern classical, no pop, no metal, no rap, no jazz? He didn’t want to think about the tangle that using any world music would cause –
What if they could use some of the student musicians from the Imladris Academy to lay down something atmospheric? He’d have to ask Irmo what he thought, and Ori about the legal requirements. Of course, he could commission a composer to create all of the music – he didn’t want to think about how much that would cost. They would have to muddle along somehow.

Thran stopped worrying about the tangle of music licensing fees as he pulled the SUV into the UVB parking lot. It was only eight o’clock, but Lettie’s car was already there, and so was Ori’s. To his delight, Charisse pulled into the lot just after him.

“Ma chère!” he heralded, waving, and the tiny woman waved back and hurried to join him as they walked through the parking lot. “I am delighted to see you, but how are you here? I thought your company still had not agreed to the price to let you join us.”

“I talked to the front office,” Charisse confided. “I told them I really wanted to dance this role, and they’d get a mention in the credits, so they finally gave in.”

“Merci,” Thran smiled, hoping that the mention of the company in the credits might reduce the price they’d wanted, but expecting not. “Merci beaucoup.”

“Pas de quoi,” Chairisse shrugged. “So tell me, how has Irmo been?”

Thran rolled his eyes, but explained about Ori as they came in through the door. He introduced Charisse to Lettie and Ori, and he was relieved that his fellow dancer’s sweet disposition made her a friend to both in short order. That would go a long way to keep everyone working well together. They separated to change into their dance attire, then began on their barre work, interspersing their stretching with a discussion of things so far. When Thran told Charisse how he wanted her to help reinforce Luka’s attention to technique, she grinned.

“I can give him a good jolt,” she said, putting her hands on her hips. It was an assertive pose at odds with her usual girlish and sprightly demeanor. “I’ll dance the feet off him, and he’ll have to try to keep up with me. Once he realizes that you and I will make him look so bad in comparison, he’ll straighten up, or he’ll be out.”

“Ruthless lady, you are,” Thran teased, drawing her raised chin and confident smile.

“We’ve both paid our dues, Thran. It’s time this young one does, too.”

The door opened to the studio, and there was Luka. Thran whispered a few words to Charisse, and he partnered her across the floor with effortless precision, lightly sweeping her into a fish dive, and then back across the way they came. They ended with a bow to each other, and straightened with playful smiles. Thran winked at Charisse and turned towards Luka.

“Luka, come and meet our Maid. This is Charisse. Charisse, Luka is our Soldier.”

Luka offered his hand, which Charisse took gracefully. “Nice to meet you, Charisse. Thran’s told me a little about you, and I’m looking forward to us dancing together. You’ve danced with Thran before, right?”

“Oh, many times,” Charisse nodded, dimpling at Thran. “We are old friends. I have learned so much technique from him, and how to project on stage, too. There are no better teachers than those who have trained at Vaganova and Mariinsky, are there?”

“Um, no, there aren’t,” Luka agreed. At least he was quick enough to realize that despite her tiny stature and bright smile, Charisse was a seasoned performer.
“This is a dream, to dance something new, and with one of the world’s most skilled dancers, isn’t it?” Charisse enthused. “Thran sets a very high standard, you know. You and I must be on our toes to live up to that standard, I think. It will be so exciting!”

“Oh, ma chère, you have set a high standard for me, too, I think,” Thran laughed. “Come, let us resume the barre, so that we will be ready when the rest of the company comes in, and then Irmo!”

“I’m ready for it,” Luka nodded, smiling at the winsome Charisse.

Thran was pleased to see that their young principal put more effort into his barre than Thran had seen so far. Charisse had already improved their effort, and she had barely danced a step yet.

Irmo and Abebe came in shortly, and Ori and Lettie followed. At this point, only the three principal dancers would help in the creation of the choreography; the rest of the company would follow once Irmo blocked out the major portions of the story. Thran lost himself in the delight of dancing again with Charisse, the back and forth with Irmo and Abebe – even the background murmur that was Ori catching Irmo’s pronouncements was exciting. The hours sped by uncounted as slowly, slowly, the ballet began to emerge...

* * *

Sunday came and went in a blur. Bard might not be atop a paint scaffold, but there was more than enough to do – breakfast for the children, marshaling laundry, the usual tidying and cleaning. After lunch, Bain and Legolas went off with friends, and Finn came by for Sigrid. Tilda was happy to have her Da all to herself, so they expected to spend the afternoon in the sitting room with their drawing pads. No sooner than they’d settled, however, when Bard came upon water spreading all over the mudroom floor – a sock had fallen into the laundry sink, clogging the drain when the washer emptied. Even with Tilda’s help, it took over an hour to set that right, and several pairs of boots and shoes needed to dry out. Together, they got the laundry back on track, and Bard set up a small fan to circulate the air to speed the drying of footwear. Crisis dealt with, they went back to the sitting room to resume their sketching; Bard got a few more done for his meeting with Bilbo, but he spent a lot of time explaining things to Tilda because he enjoyed working with her. Before he realized it, the children were home, supper was on, eaten, and cleaned up, and the children got ready for the new school week. Thran came home at nine, managed to speak to all of the children before he devoured whatever Bard put in front of him, and took himself off to the shower. At least tonight he was alert enough to be awake when Bard crawled into bed with him, and wrapped himself around Bard.

“Everything’s all right, angel?” Bard asked, snuggling Thran close.

“Everything proceeds,” Thran allowed, and told him how well his friend Charisse was doing, and that the slightly lackadaisical Luka had stepped up his game a little, if still not enough, and Irmo was a little easier to deal with given Ori’s presence, and Abebe would bring in the company starting tomorrow to continue the work on the choreography.

“It does not sound like much, I am sure,” Thran murmured. “It is the same thing, over and over and over. Work on the scene, try the steps, see how the dancers work together, keep what Irmo likes and try something new for what he does not, on and on and on. It takes a very great deal of time.”

“How long does it take to make the entire ballet?”
“Weeks, perhaps months. Then there are so many meetings about where the final venue will be, so that we can design the set and lighting, and more meetings about publicity, fundraising, and so on. A long process.”

Thran sounded so tired, and he was already half asleep. Bard stroked and soothed and listened. When he pressed a kiss on Thran’s hair, he got a soft hum of appreciation just as Thran fell asleep. Bard nestled beside him, and shut his eyes.

There was no need to worry. Everything was going well.

* * *

The next week zipped by. Bard got children off to school, Thran off to the UVB studio, then set to work. Mostly that involved painting. It took two more days to finish the second coat on the ballroom ceiling, working virtually nonstop. The industrial light fixtures came in, so up they went; Bard had already prepped the wiring and mounts for all three, so they went up with a minimum of fuss. Thank goodness these weighed far less than crystal or brass chandeliers, so he could hoist them atop the scaffolding himself. White paint went on the plaster bits. Because the woodwork was minimal – most of the embellishment was plaster – stripping took only another two days. He got the walls scraped in record time. He got one long wall done in another two days, working all day with his lunch in one hand. The first coat on the window wall and the fireplace wall took another day. That left him on Saturday with one more long wall to do, so he got Legolas to fencing, put Sigrid on the bus to another track meet, picked up Legolas, made lunch, then set to. A teammate dropped Sigrid off at home, which was a big help. She and her siblings did homework while Bard got the last wall done before supper.

Again, Thran did not get home for supper.

“Is Papa all right?” Legolas asked at supper. “I hardly see him.”

“I’m sure he’s all right, Legs,” Bard said from the end of the table. “He’d tell us if something were wrong. Making a ballet from scratch is a lot harder than just rehearsing for one that’s already been created. Thran’s got to help the choreographer make up all the steps, and see to all the pieces that go with it. It’s very complicated.”

“I wish he didn’t have to work so hard,” Legolas looked at his plate.

“He warned all of us how hard this would be,” Bard said quietly, though he heartily echoed Legolas’s sentiment. He’d seen his husband only seconds longer then Legolas had, and Thran was so tired during those few moments that Bard didn’t have the heart to distract him any longer than he already did. “This ballet is very important to him, and we’ll all help him by taking care of everything here for him. Once more of the ballet settles, he won’t have to work so hard. And soon he and the company will be able to work in the ballroom, because it’s almost finished. That’ll mean we’ll see more of him, which will help us all feel better.”

Sigrid gave him a look, but didn’t say anything. He tensed, expecting her to be her usual forthright self, but she only got up to bring the ice cream and cookies to the table – both store bought, as Bard had opted to spend more time painting than baking.

Thran came home very late – almost eleven. He looked so stressed and exhausted that Bard mutely put his supper before him, offered a gentle hand on his back, and sat with him while he ate. Only half a dozen words made it out of his mouth before he headed upstairs.

Bard swallowed. Something was wrong. Nothing could exhaust Thran to the point that he wouldn’t offer a smile, a warm word.

But Thran had promised to speak up if something were wrong. Bard trusted him to honor that.

Bard washed and crawled into bed. Thran was already asleep, so Bard settled into his pillow, and shut his eyes.

There was no need to worry. Everything was going well.

* * *

Thran dragged himself out of bed. He dressed. He packed his bag. He ate whatever Bard put in front of him. He packed whatever lunch Bard had made him into his bag. He got into the SUV. He drove to the UVB studio.

He danced.

* * *

Bard was surprised when Sigrid came down to the kitchen shortly after he did.

“Morning, sweetness. You’re up early.”

“I’m here to help you paint the ballroom.”

“It’s Sunday. I’m not supposed to paint anything, much less the ballroom.”

“You’re going to, though. I knew it the minute you talked about getting the ballroom in shape to get Ada back here. You’re worried about him. So am I. I’m worried about you, too.”

“I’m fine, Sig. And you’re right... I was going to paint today. Every day that ballroom’s not done is another day that Thran’s paying for studio space elsewhere. If he’s here, maybe I can get him to eat more, too.”

“So let’s get on with it. I don’t have your steady hand, but I can do the rolling while you cut in. You’ve still got all of the second coat and the woodwork to do. You need me.”

“Keeping tabs on my progress, are you?”

“Of course I am. I sneak in there every night while you pretend to sketch in the sitting room while we do homework. It’s blatantly obvious what you’re doing, too – you, not baking? Store-bought cookies? Come on, Da. You aren’t making it hard.”

Bard sighed. “Thran told us that this ballet would consume him, but I didn’t have any idea how much it would. This is the biggest thing I know of that will help, so I want to get it done.”

“You haven’t done much sketching, have you? For your meeting with Shire Hills?”

Bard swallowed. “Just like your Mam, you are. Persistent to the end.”

“Da, your art is important, too.”

“Yes, it is,” Bard nodded, pouring cups of tea for them both and sliding one across the kitchen island to Sigrid. “But right now, Thran’s art takes precedence, and there’s no deadline to my meeting with Shire Hills. If it slips a week, it’s okay. Once I finish the ballroom, I can stop painting anything for a while and get my portfolio up to snuff. I’m willing to do that if it helps Thran.”

Sigrid sniffed, but she didn’t argue with Bard’s logic. “So you need me even more than I thought you did.”

With a sigh, Bard conceded. “I won’t turn you down, sweetness. If I can get this done, then that helps Thran, and I can get back to sketching and cookies and better suppers than I’ve put on the table lately.”

Sigrid grinned. “There’s nothing wrong with chicken five days in a row. And we had steak once, too.”

“Still.”

“Okay, so make a pot of porridge, then let’s get to it. I turned down a visit from Finn to do this, I’ll have you know.”

Sigrid’s joke didn’t get the jibe back she expected, for Bard gave her a guilty look. “I’m sorry about that, Sigrid. You shouldn’t have to give up time with your friends.”

“It won’t kill me. More to the point, it won’t kill Finn, either. He was likely going to want to watch hockey or something, and I can take that only so much. So take advantage of my cheap labor while it lasts.”

Bard pulled out the box of porridge while Sigrid got out the pot. As his daughter held out the pot for him to dump in the porridge, he grinned. Finn’s loss was his gain. It wouldn’t always be this way, but today, he was grateful for it.
Chapter 71

Chapter Summary

The perfect storm arises. Will the angel and the saint weather it well, or is wreckage on the horizon?

Sigrid and Bard finished their porridge and tea, and headed into the ballroom. They positioned the scaffolding on a section of wall between the ribs of trim work, draped the drop cloths, poured the paint, and Bard climbed up with his brush to cut in around the trim work. As he progressed, Sigrid came behind him to fill in with the roller, and Bard moved on to the next lower section, perching under the scaffolding until Sigrid was done. They moved the scaffolding out of the way, then Sigrid could fill in the next section as Bard continued to cut in. They finished one section and were onto the second before Tilda and Legolas came in, the latter rubbing his eyes sleepily.

“It’s Sunday, Da!” Tilda protested. “You’re not supposed to paint today!”

Sigrid kept rolling as Bard nodded to the younger children. “It is Sunday, and normally I would work on my art, yes. But Ada needs the ballroom to help with his ballet, and I want to finish it for him. It’d mean he’d be home more, and we can take better care of him. So I’ll trade one day next week to work on my art for the chance to finish this.”

“I want to help,” Legolas said, his mouth thinning in determination. “I don’t know how to paint, but I can learn.”

“What’s going on?” Bain yawned sleepily, coming after his siblings. His eyes widened. “Da, you said you’d do your stuff on Sunday!”

“We’re going to finish the ballroom for Ada,” Tilda explained. “Legolas and I are helping, too. So Ada doesn’t have to be away all the time. So Legolas doesn’t have to miss him so much.”

Bain gave Legolas a quick glance, and he grimaced. “Yeah. That’s no good. So I’ll help, too. What do you want us to do, Da?”

Bard gulped, but Sigrid punched his arm. “Don’t bother to argue, Da. We’re doing this. Let’s get the white elephant room painted, and at least then Ada will be around for us to make sure he eats. Just tell us what to do.”

“You all are troupers, you are,” Bard graved. “Okay, help would be great. First, you three need breakfast. What would you like?”

“I can make scrambled eggs,” Legolas volunteered. “Is that good, Tilda and Bain? Scrambled eggs?”

“With cheese?” Tilda asked.

“I can add cheese.”

“That’s good by me,” Bain agreed. “I’ll do tea and juice, and Til, you do toast.”

Tilda nodded. “Okay.”
Legolas met Bard’s eyes. “We’ll do our breakfast, and then we’ll be back.”

“Thanks, Legs – thanks, all of you. Remember to put on old clothes before you come back. And get your hair out of your way.”

“Okay, Da; okay Bard,” the children murmured, and disappeared. Bard swallowed the lump in his throat, drawing Sigrid’s tsk.

“Don’t get all mushy, Da. What’d you expect, anyway? You trained us this way.”

“I... guess I did a good job of it, then,” Bard gave her a crooked grin.

“I’d say so,” Sigrid grinned, and brandished her roller. “You’d better think about what you want everyone to do before they get back, or we’ll end up with Provence Crème everywhere.”

“Aye-aye, Captain,” Bard saluted her with his brush, and went back to cutting in.

By the time the younger children were through their breakfast and were back in the ballroom, Bard had figured out how they could help. Tilda was too short to reach very high with the roller, and it was awkward for her to handle, but she had a good eye for detail. Legolas was the tallest, so Bard put him with Sigrid to roll paint. Bain wasn’t particular about how he helped, so he and Tilda got out the roll of painter’s tape and started taping the floor where it met the trim. Even under Bard’s careful hand, the old herringbone wood would soak up any miscue faster than anyone could blot it up, so the tape would minimize that. Bain and Legolas switched off to work with Tilda as they chose, and so they made rapid progress. They reached the end of the wall and were able to start on the next one in good time. After a break for a hearty lunch, they were back at the paint, and finished in late afternoon. Everyone was elated when they finished, and Bard was lavish with his praise. They made an extravagant supper of meat and bean tacos with all the condiments, and topped those off with equally decadent ice cream sundaes. After all the hard work the children had put in, Bard refused to insist that they eat vegetables other than the lettuce and tomato taco fillings. They deserved every bite of ice cream, every lick of chocolate syrup, every dollop of whipped cream.

He wished Thran could have been there.

This couldn’t go on this way.

Maybe once he had the ballroom in shape, Thran wouldn’t spend so long at the UVB studio. He’d be here. Maybe Bard couldn’t shorten Thran’s effort, but he could at least make sure Thran had enough to eat.

Was that all he could do?

That question nagged at him throughout the evening – the children’s showers, the packing of backpacks and readying of lunch things for tomorrow, the making the rounds to see to all the doors and locks. It did more than nag at him when he had to see Legolas into bed.

“I wish Papa would come home,” Legolas admitted, as Bard helped him pull up the covers. “I wanted to tell him about the ballroom.”

“I want him to come home, too, Legs,” Bard replied. “But he’s working hard to make this a success for all of us. He told us how much work that would be. Did he work this hard when you were with him, before you went to boarding school?”

“Sometimes,” Legolas said reluctantly. “I had a babushka who looked after me – a nanny, you call them here. I was often in bed before Papa came in to tell me goodnight. But that was often true when Maman was with us, too – they both often worked late.”

“Then this is what he’s used to,” Bard offered, but it sounded lame even to him, and Legolas looked no more satisfied. “Have you texted him at all?”

“Every night, as I used to do when I was in boarding school,” Legolas nodded. “He doesn’t keep his mobile with him when he dances, but he always sends me one back when he can.”

“Has he sent replies back to you so far?”

“Not every night,” Legolas hedged. “But almost every night.”

“That’s something,” Bard smiled. “I’ll send him one tonight, too. I’ll say we all miss him and hope he’s well.”

“That’d be good,” Legolas nodded.

“Okay, sprout,” Bard patted his leg. “Sleep well, and I’ll see you in the morning for breakfast.”

“Okay, Bard. Sleep well, too.”

“I will. Night.”

“Good night.”

Bard let himself out, shutting the door quietly once Legolas had turned off his bedside lamp. He’d already tucked in the other children, so he headed downstairs to wait for Thran in the sitting room. He pulled out his mobile, and chewed his lip for a second, unsure if he should interrupt Thran.

Legolas had said that Thran didn’t carry his mobile while he danced, so Thran wouldn’t get his text until he took a break.

* * *

Just wanted to say I love you. We all miss you. Please take good care of my angel, he typed quickly, and pressed Send.

He didn’t expect an immediate answer, but he was still disappointed when his mobile stayed silent. Rather than worry about the silence, Bard left a small lamp on in anticipation of Thran’s impending arrival, then went back upstairs to shower and shave. He didn’t look at his mobile until he was done, but once he was clean and dry, he checked, sure he’d see a text waiting.

Nothing.

It was after eleven. Almost midnight.

Now what?

For the first time, doubt crept into Bard’s heart.

He crawled into bed with mobile in hand, turned off the light, and lay there in the dark.

Even after the silk and cashmere bedding warmed, Bard shivered.

* * *
“... and it has to be this piece! Has to be!”

Thran winced as Irmo banged his fist on the table to emphasize his point. It seemed that Irmo did more banging than anything else these days, passionately defending every aspect of his vision for Immortal. It was not enough that Thran patiently danced every phrase, every consideration, every variation that Irmo came up with on the ballet floor, while he and everyone else slogged through the morass until just the right sequence appeared. Charisse did even more duty, noting the sequences in dance notation for Irmo – always in pencil, until the final iteration appeared. Several members of the company stood in for the side characters, but for the most part, it was Thran, Charisse, and Luka doing most of the work with Irmo.

Luka – he was the second trial to endure. He was very young, and not used to the rigors of such long hours, but he tried to soldier on as best he could. Unfortunately, his soldiering involved too many outbursts of frustration, most often taken out on the trashcan. He was smart enough not to kick it, but any soccer player would envy the deft way Luka could shove the unfortunate trashcan from one end of the studio to the other. He did try to direct it away from anyone, but he did it so often that Lettie replaced the metal can with a plastic one, to save both floor and dancers. Given the long hours everyone was working, the reprimands had been mild, but Luka’s outbursts had increased, and before long Thran would have to shake their puppy by the scruff of the neck.

Irmo finally took a breath in the middle of his rant. Today’s topic of outrage was his insistence on using pieces of music that required high licensing fees. Thran had agreed that they would use the Prokofiev piece for the entrance of Death onto the battlefield. He’d gone along with Ligeti’s Kyrie. He’d agreed to consider Krzysztof Penderecki’s Threnody to the Victims of Hiroshima, but the fee for that was so high that Thran had said no. That refusal was the subject of Irmo’s current rant.

“The budget does not allow for it, Irmo, and in any case, we already have a piece for the battles in the Kyrie. We have nothing for the trip to the Underworld, or the romances between the Maid and Soldier,” Thran said patiently for the third time, but this time even he heard the edge in his voice. Irmo, unfortunately, did not hear that edge, and held up both arms in exasperation.

“But it is the only piece that conveys the chaos of battle –”

“Which was exactly your argument for why we had to have the Kyrie,” snapped Thran. “No more, Irmo. We do not have the budget for the Threnody – the fee for it is higher than for the Kyrie, and it is redundant. It is settled.”

“I cannot create a ballet if all I am allowed to use is the same Bach Toccata and Fugue in D Minor that is in every hackneyed vampire and Halloween film!"

“Why would you even consider something so overused?” challenged Thran. “All that would do is make our audiences think of something less than what we show them. So better we choose less well-known pieces, both to reduce the licensing fees, and to help us create a new vision for the audiences. I do not want to rehash something else! Think of the other music we need, Irmo – I offer you my own consideration, the Rachmaninoff tone poem, The Isle of the Dead. It was written in 1908, so there is no licensing fee to use it, and it would be excellent to convey the journeys of the Maid and the Soldier to the Underworld. Or look at Franz Liszt’s Totenanz. Or Tchaikovsky’s Hymn of the Cherubim. None of those require fees.”

Irmo’s eyes threatened to bug out of his head, but he stopped shouting. His mouth opened, then closed, and his eyes calmed to consideration. He nodded, thinking about Thran’s challenge. “Yes. Yes. Those perhaps. I will consider. Yes.”
And so ended another argument, the latest of many, and likely the first of many more. It was a draining process, but Thran had a few minutes to marshal his scattered thoughts as Ori keyed his tablet to play the Rachmaninoff piece Thran had mentioned. The small, quiet man had proved his worth over and over again, not just in capturing Irmo’s ideas, but also by expediting their review of things available by computer, eliminating delays. As the somber tones of Rachmaninoff’s tone poem began, Thran sat back and nibbled whatever was left of his supper. Bless Bard for packing more food for him – between the hours of dancing and wrangling, he burned calories fast. He felt stretched, like an elastic band under constant tension.

Before many more minutes had passed, they were back in the studio, Ori’s tablet playing music while Irmo stepped and swayed, testing whether the music was acceptable to his muse. While Irmo meditated, Lettie and Thran whispered about financial matters, which only increased Thran’s tension. They needed to have a piece of the ballet in shape to begin making the rounds of other backers, and the press. So far, they did not have that piece.

Rada wandered in, his sketchpad in his hands like an afterthought, looking as if he’d wandered in off the street, lost to all thought. But Thran had learned that the soft-spoken Rada was far more perceptive than he appeared. He was a gentler spirit than Irmo, but just as visionary with fabric and designs as Irmo was with music and dance steps. He’d already come up with a beautiful image for Charisse’s Maid, which was no surprise. He and the tiny dancer had struck up a close friendship, and he had poured much time and attention into making her costume. His relationship with the mercurial Luka was less harmonious, but Rada had responded playfully, imbuing the Soldier’s costume with youthful brashness as well as military foolishness. He’d begun on the costumes of the supporting soldiers and the battlefield mourners as well, so at least that part of the production was proceeding without incident.

It was the only part that was.

When Irmo’s meditation ended, the dancers went back to the floor. The choreographer might as well have been a child in a playroom full of dolls, staging mock conversations, battles, rivalries, for all the consideration he gave. So the evening went, back and forth, up and down, left and right –

Almost without realizing, Irmo’s vision from the muse slammed into sharp focus, and the Maid, the Soldier, and Death spun around each other, no longer tired, sweaty dancers wilting under the glare of florescent lights, but three eternal forces. The brash Soldier fought and died, the Maid mourned, and Death descended to separate one from the other. A tremor went up Thran’s back as he strained to embody the muse’s will in his dancing. Back and forth the Maid passed between Death and the Soldier, oblivious to the former because of her craving for the latter. He was vaguely aware of Irmo’s enthusiastic encouragement, so deeply had the dance taken him. When they stopped, the letdown was painful enough to make his stomach clench. He walked over to the corner to compose himself, eyes shut, panting, swallowing hard.

This was why he danced.

When he looked up, Abebe and Charisse had huddled over the pad of notation paper, rushing to capture what had been bestowed upon them. Charisse called to him urgently, so he danced one of the phrases again, then again, so that they could capture it. Lettie had seen the transformation, in time to film a piece of it on her mobile, and held out the device so the notation would match the short film. The exuberance in the air was palpable. They forged ahead...

... and just as quickly, the muse retreated. Supplicating her for another hour did nothing but wear everyone out that much more, and so they ended before everyone descended into too much of a funk. Ori was hoarse and limp, and Thran shooed him out before Irmo could corral him. He went with a grateful smile to Thran. The dancers filtered out next, then Abebe, and finally Lettie. She and Thran firmly escorted Irmo into the parking lot so Lettie could lock the studio doors. As the choreographer launched into something else, Thran escorted Lettie to her car and sent her on her way. Thran headed for Irmo’s car, the man trailing behind, still talking.

“Irmo.” Thran shut his eyes, no longer able to bear the unending stream of words, regardless of whether they were the utterances of a genius or not. “It is late, we have been at it for fifteen hours, and I am exhausted. Go home and write down whatever you want us to consider tomorrow, for I can no longer absorb another word tonight.”

“But if we –”

“No more, Irmo. Not tonight. Please. I do not want to yell at you, but if you cannot listen to me, then I will have to. I cannot absorb any more tonight.”

The choreographer finally fell silent. He sighed, and nodded. “I am sorry. I am. I cannot help it, sometimes. I can’t.”

“I know, Irmo. I understand. Just... please. The human body can take only so much, and mine is done.”

Irmo nodded. “I will wait until tomorrow.”

“If you cannot sleep, then think about music for the death scene, and for the Underworld.”

“I will. Until tomorrow.”

Thran nodded, and left Irmo at his car. His SUV was the only other car in the lot, so he climbed in –

He’d left his bag in the studio. He almost decided to leave it where it was, but it held his driver’s license, and as tired as he was, he wouldn’t risk even the twenty-minute drive home without it. He got out of the SUV, trudged to the studio door, and let himself in. His bag was in the changing room, so down the hall he trudged. It was so tempting to sit down on the small settee, to shed his dancer’s slippers for warmer socks and shoes, to lean back just for a moment before he faced the cold outside and the drive home...

* * *

The alarm went off softly, jolting Bard awake. He’d hardly slept last night, worrying about Thran, keeping one eye and ear open for sound of him, but the house and his mobile had both remained silent, and the right side of the bed was still empty and cold. How he swallowed his panic down, he didn’t know. He grabbed his mobile, hoping against hope that he just hadn’t heard the device chime, but no, there was no message. He texted again.

Where are you?

He dove into the bathroom, then into his clothes, but his mobile remained maddeningly silent.

He rang Thran’s number.

He was sent right to Thran’s voice mail.
Was his mobile off?

He called information, asked for the number of the local hospital, and rang it.

Thran wasn’t there.

That was a relief. But on the heels of that relief came the worst feeling in the world – Thran was somewhere else.

Where else could he be?

He called UVB.

Lettie answered, groggily. “Hello?”

“This is Bard Bowman. Is Thran there?”

“Bard? It’s Lettie. I’m not at the studio. The off-hours phone rings at my home.”

“I’m sorry. I woke you, I’m sure. Do you know where Thran is?”

“The last time I saw him was last night. He was in the UVB parking lot, about to come home.”

Panic dove in on him as he ran down the stairs. Maybe Thran had made it home and was downstairs?

The sitting room was empty.

Bard ran into the mudroom and jerked open the door.

Thran’s SUV wasn’t there.

“Bard?”

“Thran didn’t make it home last night.”

“Oh, gods!” Lettie gasped. “Did you call the hospital?”

“I did. He’s not there. Where else could he be?”

“I don’t know. I don’t know. Irmo was bending our ears even in the parking lot last night. It was after eleven. Maybe Irmo corralled him?”

Bard swallowed, but couldn’t bring himself to ask the obvious question. He asked a coward’s question instead.

“Could they still be at the studio?”

“I locked the door behind us on the way out, but Thran has a key. Look, I’ll get dressed right now and head to the studio. I live an hour away, though, so it’ll take a while for me to get there.”

“All right. Okay. Um, I’ve got to get the children off to school, but I’ll leave my mobile on in case you find them – him. Would you call me?”

“Of course! I’ll head out as soon as I can.”

“I appreciate it. Thank you.”
Bard gave Lettie his number, then ended the call. He managed to swallow down everything he was feeling, and mechanically set about the children’s breakfast and lunches. At this point, the children were so used to Thran being away that none of them asked after him, not even the normally preternaturally aware Sigrid. He got the children fed and packed, then took them to the bus stop. After waving goodbye to them, he headed back to the house.

He checked the house methodically, hoping to find any sign that Thran had been there during the night.

The fridge hadn’t been touched.

The mudroom had no new laundry.

The warm wool throw in the sitting room was still folded on the edge of the sofa.

Bard got his wallet, the keys to his truck, his coat.

He got in his truck, and drove to the UltraViolet Ballet studio.

* * *

A hand fell on Thran’s arm, shaking gently.

“Thran?”

Thran got his eyes open. Luka squatted beside the settee, his dark eyes full of concern. “What?”

“Are you all right?”

“I am fine.” Thran rubbed his eyes. “I fell asleep for just a few minutes. You are kind to wake me - thank you. As much time as I spend here, I do not have to stay here all night. I will be glad to get home.”

Luka’s brow wrinkled. “Um, I think you did spend all night here, Thran. It’s almost eight o’clock in the morning. Monday morning.”

Thran stared at him. Whatever expression was on his face, it was enough to make Luka gulp and hold up his hands. “I swear, Thran, I’m not pranking you. It’s seven fifty-two a.m. on Monday morning. I think you’ve been here all night.”

“Oh, gods!” Thran’s mouth went dry. Bard must be frantic. He scrabbled for his bag, found his mobile – dead as the proverbial doornail. He looked at Luka with wide eyes. “May I borrow your mobile?”

“Sure.” Luka handed it to him. Thran typed Bard’s number immediately, but there was no answer.

“Oh, gods, gods, gods!” Thran gulped again. “I must go home! Right now!”

“Angry other party?” Luka tried to make a joke out of it, but Thran was too upset to reprove him. He gathered up his bag, jerked to his feet, and bolted out of the changing room. He came out into the hall off balance, stumbling against the wall on the way to the lobby. Luka grabbed him from behind to keep him from falling, steadying him so he could catch his balance.
The outside door opened, and there was Bard, skittering to a stop.

Luka looked from Thran to Bard and back, and belatedly let Thran’s arm go, pointedly clasping his hands behind his back. “Oh. I guess that’s the angry other party.”

Bard’s face flushed a deep red. His eyes burned with a fury Thran had never seen before, not even when they’d fought the drug gang. His lips thinned, and his hands clenched into fists. When he exploded, nothing would stand before that much rage –

Bard turned on his heel, and shoved through the outside door with such violence that it slammed against the glass panel beside it with a resounding clang. He passed Lettie running towards him, but he sidestepped her without a word, and made a direct line for his truck. Thran lurched out of his shock and shoved through the door to shout after Bard.

Bard’s truck pulled out of the parking lot without slowing.

“What’s going on?” Lettie wheezed, grabbing at Thran. “Your husband called me at six this morning, frantic to know where you were. I thought you left after me. Did Irmo latch onto you?”

Thran’s heart pounded. He wanted to howl to the sky. Instead, he clutched the keys to his SUV.

“I have to go home.”

Luka appeared behind him, drawing Lettie’s attention. She looked from Thran to Luka and back again, then at Bard’s retreating truck. She didn’t have to speak for Thran to put words to her thoughts, thoughts that were surely only a pale imitation of Bard’s.

Oh, gods.
Chapter 72

Chapter Summary

Rage and regret, shock and shame, disillusionment and despair.

Bard turned his back on... him... before his fury got the better of him. The last thing his children needed was for their father to end up in jail for assault. Justified assault, but assault nevertheless. Desperate for the cold air to blunt the shock of adrenaline racing through his body, he slammed through the glass door, piled into his truck, and got the key in the ignition despite how badly his hands shook. He didn’t look in the rear view mirror as he drove out of the parking lot and headed home.

Home. What a travesty that was. There was no home to return to. Only a house, one built on lies and deception, and nothing more.

What was the point of even going there? To be flooded by just how easy he’d been to fool, how stupid he was, how fucking blind naïve trusting he was? So he could wander from room to room, each of them just as empty as he was, empty of everything but rage? What was the point? Why not just drive off a bridge somewhere?

Because he had children, and he wasn’t cruel enough to abandon them as someone had abandoned him. He’d survived loss once before, if not betrayal, and he’d hang on for the children.

There was one thing that wouldn’t survive, though – that mass of wire and clay in the solarium, that naïve paean to his blindness.

Rahmiel. Angel of love and mercy.

Like hell he was.

Even thinking about Rahmiel made Bard’s stomach clench, and forced a growl from his throat. He was stupid, stupid, stupid... Why hadn’t he seen that the source of his vision of love and mercy had had neither? That source had been with someone else – probably not for the first time, given all the hours Thran had been away.

Bard’s stomach roiled. He swallowed the sudden moisture in his mouth, and forced his attention on the morning traffic, the red light ahead, the left hand turn, slow progress through the commuter traffic waiting to turn onto the highway, four blocks more, then left into the lane, and then into the driveway. He managed to fling himself out of the truck before his stomach knotted in spasms he couldn’t subdue, forcing him to retch over the grass. When his stomach finally calmed, he spat out the meager remnants of breakfast and dragged a shirtsleeve over his mouth. Straightening up sent his stomach into hard cramps again, and he smashed a fist into the side of his truck, trying to regain control over himself. He was only partially successful, and ended up stumbling towards the mudroom door bent over, his arms wrapped around his midsection. He got the key in the lock, shoved through the door, and hurled his coat onto the top of the dryer, choking down spasms all the way. He thought he was about to spew again, but he was too empty to do more than dry heave. He drove himself out of the mudroom, through the kitchen, into the sitting room, and finally into the solarium. There in the corner was his benighted, half made, failed travesty of Rahmiel with his long, beautiful body, perfect extension, ethereal grace –

Bard unclamped the metal armature from the base and squeezed the figure in his hands.

* * *

Thran lurched into a run, throwing himself at his SUV. He jerked open the door, hurled his bag into the front seat, then hurled himself into the driver’s seat after it. He careened out of the parking lot, searching for Bard’s truck in front of him, but there was too much morning traffic for that. He was hyperventilating – quickly, slow the breath, slow the breath now, or he’d pass out on the road. His vision cleared as he held his breath for a few seconds, then forced himself to take long, deep breaths for several more seconds after that.

Oh, gods, oh, gods, how had so much vanished in a single second?

Just let him get home, home to lyubov yego –

What if Bard didn’t go home? What if he went somewhere else?

Where else would he go? No matter how badly betrayed Bard felt, he wouldn’t go anywhere else. Thran had to believe that.

He bit his bottom lip hard, using the pain to keep from screaming. If only Luka hadn’t made that damning remark about an “angry other party.” If only Thran hadn’t been in such a panic that he’d stumbled and forced Luka to grab him. If only he hadn’t fallen asleep last night –

Or stayed so late, or forgotten to charge his mobile, or to text his family, or to do so, so, so many other things over so, so, so many days and nights...

The turnoff to the lane was ahead. Thran cursed the thick traffic, begrudging each second that kept him from making the turn. Finally! He zoomed down the lane, turned into the driveway –

Oh, thank the gods! Bard’s truck was here – but skewed across the driveway, with the driver’s side door agape.

Oh, gods, oh, gods, where was his husband?

Thran got out of his SUV, shutting the truck door as he passed it. Was Bard in the house, or still outside? No, the barn door was shut, but the mudroom door wasn’t. He fled inside, listening for Bard. The sitting room? No, the solarium! Thran raced through both kitchen and sitting room and burst into the solarium.

Bard had the shreds of Rahmiel in his hand, and the most terrible rage still burned in his eyes.

“Oh, gods, Bard, don’t! Please don’t!”

Bard would’ve heaved the ruined sculpture at Thran, but Thran scrambled forward to grab Bard by the arms. Bard shoved him away, his greater strength sending Thran stumbling backwards against the doorframe.

“Why not?” Bard snarled, all but spitting. “Can’t you bear to see your lovely little image of love and mercy get the treatment it deserves? Go the way of all false idols?”
“Stop!” Thran held his hands out to beseech Bard. “Please, stop! Oh, gods, Bard, I am so sorry! Let me explain! This is not what you think!”

Bard looked down at the mass of clay and wire in his hand, the center of it already mangled, bent, and crushed under his hand. He hurled it at the wall opposite the windows. Thran flinched at the power and violence in Bard’s throw as the clay made a dull thwack on impact, then fell to the floor in a nearly unrecognizable lump.

“Neither was that,” Bard spat. “Which one of us were you going to tell first? Legolas, or me?”

“There is nothing to tell, Bard! I have not betrayed you!”

“Really? What did he call me? The ‘angry other party?’”

“Luka is a fool. I fell asleep –”

“You fell asleep? When? Where? In his arms?” Bard held his arms wide in disbelief. “You didn’t think to call me? I would have come and gotten you! You didn’t think to answer my text? Or your son’s? What the hell, Thran? You couldn’t have fucked this up more if you’d tried!”

Thran put both hands over his eyes. “I know. I know. I have made such a mess of this. I am sorry, lyubov moya –”

“DON’T call me that! Just don’t! Because I’m not, am I? I’m just someone convenient to see to your son, your soup, your bed until something else comes along –”

“No, you are not! You are my husband! Let me explain –”

“No, let ME explain – explain just how stupid I’ve been. In fact, I’ll do better than that – I’ll show you. A picture is worth a thousand words, right? Let me show you a picture, Thran!”

Bard grabbed Thran’s upper arm and hustled him through the sitting room, down the hall, through the main room, and into the ballroom. Thran went without resistance, without a cry at how badly Bard’s grip hurt. With a shove, Bard sent Thran stumbling into the middle of the room.

“See this? Do you fucking see this?” Bard threw up both hands, indicating the ballroom. Thran didn’t know whether to look at the ballroom or his husband. He kept his eyes on Bard, who shook with suppressed fury. “It’s got lights. It’s got paint. Do you know how it got this way? Because I fucking did it instead of working on my stuff, and that’s not all of it. My children and your son chose to work on this, too – I didn’t ask them, Thran; they volunteered, because they wanted to get this to the point where you could be here, with us. But we weren’t fast enough, were we? It’s one thing for you to do this to me. But Legolas, your son, has missed you, too. He told me you didn’t even bother to return all his texts to you. What has that fuckboy Luka got that could distract you from everyone and everything here? How could you be so heartless? Gods!”

Bard slammed a fist into the plaster wall with such force that Thran recoiled. When his husband turned away to stare out of the windows, the new paint and lights registered. Somehow, in ten days, Bard had managed to put twenty-five gallons of paint on the walls of the ballroom, plus several more on the white plaster of the ceiling. He’d hung lamps, too. And the children had helped.

Shame descended upon Thran in such a thick shroud that he sank to his knees. He was so lightheaded that he felt dizzy and his vision greyed. As his stomach roiled, the taste on his tongue turned thick and metallic. If he hadn’t been so empty, he might have thrown up.

“I am sorry, so sorry.” His voice was little more than a wisp, but something in it drew Bard’s gaze.
Thran bowed his head, unable to bear that cold stare. “You are right. I do have a lover. But it is not the one you think. There is no person who could take me from you, our children, all we have here. But I cannot deny that I have a mistress, one I cannot resist. Her name is The Dance, and that is the only thing that has consumed me.”

Bard stood bristling, arms akimbo, shaking his head. “You know, even if I hadn’t seen your fuckboy turn as white as a winding sheet when he set eyes on me, I’d still call you a liar –”

“I do not lie to you!” Thran shouted back. “What I say is not a lie!”

“Yes, it is, you bastard!” Bard snarled. “Do you want to know why it’s a lie? Because if it's The Dance instead of a fuckboy that besots you this badly, then it's not a mistress you have riding on your back, Thran. It's a fucking addiction, and it's made a liar out of you to me, and to the children. Hell, you’re not even being honest with yourself! Go look at yourself in a mirror – you’re emaciated! You've chewed through your body as fast as any addict does with his drug of choice. Now you’ve found someone just as addicted as you are to give you a little on the side, without having to come home when you want to take the edge off.”

Thran’s jaw dropped. “You have gone mad!”

The terrible rage flared in Bard’s eyes again. “Have I? Get up.”

Thran swallowed. “If you want me to get up so you can punch me, I will decline the privilege.”

Bard’s hands clenched, but he turned on his heel. He was leaving? Thran scrambled to his feet. “Gods, Bard! Don’t leave! I am sorry! I am sorry!”

“Not sorry enough,” Bard growled. He kept walking, his boots pounding through the house on the wooden floors, heading upstairs. Seconds later, the sounds heralded Bard’s return, and his husband stalked back into the ballroom. He put something on the floor and sent it skidding towards Thran with a rough shove of his boot. It was the scale that Bard had put in their bathroom two weeks ago, the same scale that Thran had studiously ignored ever since. Bard pointed an accusing finger at it.

“You want the truth about your addiction, Thran? There it is. It’s the same thing that happens to every junkie. They give up everything for a high – their family, their happiness, their bodies. If that’s what The Dance is to you, then I’m done. I won’t be second in your life to an addiction.”

Bard turned his back on Thran and disappeared again, leaving Thran alone but for the racket of Bard’s boots clattering away, then a few seconds later, the slam of the mudroom door. After that, the only sound was the rasp of Thran’s panicky breathing, short, fast, and shallow.

Thran put both hands to his mouth, as if that would keep him from hyperventilating again. He tried to calm his breath, if only to ease the stench of his fear in his nostrils. Gods, gods, how to ease his husband’s fury, his own disorientation, the madness of the spheres?

Without noticing how he got there, Thran stepped on the scale that Bard had confronted him with in such anger.

It read 175 pounds.

That was impossible. Thran stepped off of it, fiddled with the adjustment knob until the scale read zero, then stepped back on it.

It read 172 pounds.
 Somehow, in three weeks, Thran had stripped at least thirteen pounds off his already lean frame.

Gods. Oh, gods. Everything Bard had said was true. Everything was gone – his husband, his family, his happiness, even his body. He had whored everything away for a ballet.

Thran slid to his knees, and cried.

* * *

Bard stormed out to the barn in a haze of fury – crippling, consuming, setting every nerve aflame past bearing. He went back to the workbench and yanked a piece of scrap rebar from its bin and pounded it again and again on the anvil until his hands were sore. When that didn’t dissipate enough of his anger, he threw himself atop the wooden crates underneath the chin-up rafter, tore off his ratty sweater, and heaved himself up and down until he could no longer breathe. He let himself drop, regained his breath, then hurled himself up and had at again until his shoulders were afire and his back ached and his breath rasped from his throat. When that didn’t help, he tore off his shirt to stand bare chested in the cold, and had at again. Yet even when sweat streamed off him in icy rivulets, fury still raged inside him. His muscles screamed in too much pain for him to heave himself up to the rafter again, so he fell to his knees atop the crate to pound it, over and over and over again.

Before long, Bard’s hands were raw and bleeding, and he didn’t have the strength to do anything other than curl in on himself. All his exertions had done was force his body to bear a pale shade of the pain echoing in his thoughts. He managed to get himself down from the crate, but he staggered as he jumped down, falling against the crate and scraping a wide swath across his right shoulder blade. Salty sweat turned the raw wound into another conflagration, but he slumped uncaring against the crate, hoping that pain and cold would take the edge off his fury.

Nothing touched it.

The cold soon had Bard shivering so uncontrollably that he got up to stumble back to the house. When he got there, he paused at the mudroom door. What was he going to do when he got inside? He didn’t know – get warmer, but other than that, he didn’t know. He came inside, throwing his shirt and sweater on top of the washer. He leaned on his elbows over the dryer, head bowed, until he stopped shivering and his hands were warm enough to unlace his boots. He tugged them off, almost losing his balance in the doing. He’d trashed himself well and proper – sweat and blood mingled in streaks over his torso, and his hands were a mess. He was too filthy to sit on anything, even his ratty furniture. If he got in the shower, all that raw flesh would burn hotter than a volcano, but maybe that would dull the pain of his thoughts.

Fat chance. That old phrase that had tortured him so badly after Daphne had died, Love Never Dies? Yes, it did, it self-immolated just like every other stupid delusion had since the dawn of time. His love had died today, and the pain of soap and water burning in a few minor scrapes would be woefully insufficient to cauterize the hole that was left inside him.

He shuffled through the kitchen and into the central hall, refusing to look at Hope the Lope. She had no balm for him –

A murmur of sound came through the main room from the ballroom – crying? No, sobbing. Abject sobbing.
Bard’s fury spiked again. Enjoy it, fucker. Enjoy the carnage you’ve left behind you. No matter how well you dance, you’ll never dance Death as well as you did this morning. You had everything, and you killed everything. You reign victorious. Long live the king.

Bard turned to go upstairs, but that sound, that broken sound...

It was what a traitor should sound like when he realized the irreparable damage he’d wrought.

Bard swallowed. That sound wasn’t just broken. It was heartbroken. Gods, if he were honest, it was the sound of his fury, fury that was only a mask for grief, despair, and loss. That sound was exactly the shape of the emptiness inside him.

Thran had spent his entire life bereft of everything but his dancing. It was all he knew how to do. He’d had handlers and nannies and caretakers who’d taken all of life away from him, all but his dancing. He’d been trained to sacrifice himself this way, no different than a Thoroughbred trained to leave everything on the track. But Thran wasn’t a horse – he’d delighted in making a life here with Bard, helping as he could with the renovations. He’d done homework duty, he’d gone to track meets and fencing practice and markets. He’d given not just money, but time, effort, and attention.

Maybe Thran was addicted to The Dance. But what if he’d done what he’d done in some part because it was all he had to give to his family?

Bard shut his eyes. How sick was it to feel this about the man who’d betrayed him, destroyed him? He’d seen Luka’s guilty look, all but felt his flinch away from Thran, heard his flippant dismissal.

Would Thran be attracted to that kind of man? Really?

Not the Thran that Bard knew.

Did Bard know Thran at all?

Bard swallowed again, and ventured through the main room to stand by the ballroom door.

Thran was curled in a knot in the middle of the floor, his body racked, his hands clasped at his nape, his forearms wrapped around his head like a vice. Bard had never heard a man – anyone – sob with such abandon. There were no words to the sobs; Thran keened more than he sobbed. The sound was even more desolate up close than it had been when he’d heard it in the hall.

So was the emptiness inside Bard.
Chapter 73

Chapter Summary

Have our angel and saint weathered their storm?

How long did it take for his sobs to wring him out like so much limp laundry? Thran’s head pounded, his stomach knotted, and his body felt as broken as if he really had been flattened between rollers. He lay in the middle of the ballroom floor, without strength to move.

There was no point to moving, anyway. Everything was gone. Everything was cold. Everything was splinters and shards, desolation and despair. Everything.

He shut his eyes. Maybe he fell asleep. Maybe he wished he had. Whatever the case, after long seconds, he tried to sit up.

He couldn’t. There was no strength in his bones, his muscles. Of course not. He’d wasted his body on an ephemeral dream, and had nothing left for the real world. A real world that he had destroyed with a thousand small acts of neglect.

He had destroyed the saint in the center of that world, too.

His keening rose again, but even a few seconds of it exhausted him further. He pressed hands to his mouth to silence himself, to keep some breath in his body. Should he, though? Without his saint, there was no reason to keep breathing. It would be so much easier just to let everything go. It was the only fit penance to offer.

He still had a son. Legolas. He had lost his saint, but perhaps he hadn’t yet lost his son. There was a reason to keep breathing.

Thran allowed himself a breath. He managed to roll onto his back and lay there breathing. In, out. In, out. Gods, his neck hurt after so long in such a cramped position. He turned his head gingerly from left to right, left to right, left to right –

Bard sat slumped against the ballroom doorjamb.

His head was down, his legs were bent in a semblance of a cross-legged position, and his hands lay palms up in his lap. Limp, sodden hair hung in his eyes. His bare chest was streaked with sweat and blood. The worst were his hands – bloody and battered.

Oh, gods – what had he done?

Thran managed to roll over, but his body was far from under his control, jerking and slipping as he tried to crawl to Bard’s side. As he floundered, Bard raised his head and opened his eyes. The rage they’d held was gone, but the despair and desolation that replaced it were awful.

His saint was broken.
Thran crawled within reach and reached out to touch Bard’s knee... but he didn’t touch him, unsure if Bard would allow it. His sobs threatened to overwhelm him again, so he pressed both hands to his mouth.

That single word might as well have been the final, uncomprehending plea of a victim to his murderer. It was an apt analogy, and Thran choked back another sob.

“Because I am a fool. I am not an adulterous one, but I am a thoughtless one. I am so sorry I have hurt you so badly.”

Bard swallowed hard, his eyes searching Thran for something, but it was impossible to tell whether he didn’t find what he wanted, or was too disillusioned to believe in what he found, because he shut his eyes and looked away.

Thran inched closer, and took Bard’s bloody hands in his. “What have you done?”

“Mourn.”

Bard’s voice was soft and low, but shattering all the same. Whimpering, Thran crowded between Bard’s legs, wrapped his arms around Bard’s waist, and buried his head in the angle of Bard’s hip.

“Please, lyubov moya, please, I am so sorry!” Thran begged. “You are right that I am such a fool! I cannot bear how I have hurt you! Tell me what I can do! I will do anything!”

The chest under his hands heaved a breath, a second, a third. All were long and labored, more shudders than anything else. A deep swallow followed them.

Slowly, slowly, one bloody hand stroked Thran’s disheveled hair. The touch was light and tentative, but it was something.

“Oh, lyubov moya,” Thran whispered, as his eyes flooded with tears again.

Bard’s hand stroked his hair again. “I can’t bear for you to cry. I thought my heart was broken already, but... to hear you cry... I guess it isn’t, not yet. So... please... stop.”

Thran gulped down his sobs, and sat up. Bard was as wrung out as he was, leaning against the woodwork without strength, but one hand was on Thran’s knee, and the other one reached up to smooth Thran’s hair out of his eyes. Thran caught his hand, and winced at the wreckage of scrapes and splinters.

“Where is your mobile? I will call the EMTs.”

Bard shook his head. “I don’t need the EMTs.”

“Tell me what you do need, then. I will do it.”

Bard swallowed painfully, eyes searching Thran’s face without hope. He swallowed again. “Just tell me the truth. You didn’t.”

“No. Never. I am yours, as you are mine. Always.”

Bard heaved a sigh. It would be a lie to say that he smiled, or looked less than desolate. But his rage was gone, and that was better than a few minutes ago.
“I will tell you everything. Everything. I promise. But first, let me see to you. You are hurt.”

Bard swallowed. When he spoke, it was with regret. “So are you. No one cries like you did unless they’re hurt.”

Thran winced. “Most of my hurt was self-inflicted. I inflicted most of yours, too. I am well ashamed. Let me take you upstairs to the bathroom and tend you.”

With a sigh, Bard tucked his legs underneath him and got to his feet. He held a hand out to Thran, but in deference to Bard’s wounds, Thran took Bard’s wrist. He felt lightheaded as he rose, and put a hand out to steady himself against the wall. They walked slowly upstairs. Thran was embarrassed that he stumbled up halfway up the stairs, but Bard’s arm was there to catch him. As they limped into the bathroom, Thran turned on the light, wincing at the reflection of Bard’s scraped back in the mirror.

“You need to get in the shower,” Thran ventured. “Though that will hurt very much.”

“So do you,” Bard allowed. “You’re rank.”

“I am,” Thran said. Before he could stop himself, he blurted, “I hope it is obvious that all you smell on me is me, and no one else.”

Gasping, he clapped both hands over his mouth. But Bard’s reaction was neither anger nor humor. Rather, he sank down to sit on the closed toilet and hung his head.

“You’re right. It is. I’m sorry I doubted you. I’m such a fool, too... I should have known better. It’s just... I was frantic. I thought I’d lost you. I even called hospital to see if you were there. So when... and he looked so guilty....” He winced. “That’s no excuse.”

“I have done so many things wrong, so many things.” Thran knelt by Bard, his hands on Bard’s knees. “Please, Bard, say that I have not broken your heart so badly that I cannot try to repair it. I love you.”

Bard’s bloody hands went atop Thran’s. “I love you, too, Thran. More than I can tell you. But we can’t keep on like this. We can’t. I know it’s the way you’ve been trained, to work this hard. But you’re gone so long, and I wonder and worry... then when you come home...” He waved a hand up and down Thran’s body. “It kills me to watch you work yourself to death like this.”

“It kills us both. I will not spend so much of every day on this ballet again. We will decide together what we both can live with. Yes? Please, yes?”

When Bard nodded, his face eased from its tight, closed expression. The expression that replaced it, however, wasn’t a smile. It was desolation, loss, pain. He took a fractured breath, then wrapped an arm around Thran’s neck, and groped for Thran’s hand. He pulled Thran close.

“I’m sorry, cariad. I don’t know what I’d do if I lost you. I don’t.”

Thran shut his eyes as he returned Bard’s embrace. “No more than I, lyubov moya. No more than I.”

They clung to each other for a long time.

* * *
Eventually, Bard’s exhaustion eased him out of Thran’s arms. Thran was in no better straits, so they undressed and helped each other into the shower. The sting of the soap and hot water on his back was awful, despite Thran’s gentle touch to do the actual cleaning. Once they’d washed, the sight that greeted them in the mirror was dismal. It had been days since Bard had seen Thran in the shower, and he was shocked at how emaciated and pale he was. His eyes were red, and his eye sockets looked like bruises. Bard looked like he’d been in a fight with his scraped back and battered hands. Not the most auspicious pair, to be sure. He held out Thran’s robe for him, because he was already shivering. The tall dancer huddled it close gratefully and got out the hair dryer. While Thran dried his hair, Bard sat on the stool with his surgical kit open on the counter, patiently drawing the splinters from his hands. Only one looked evil, but as it was a big piece of wood, it came out easily. It was the only wound that needed a bandage. When he put the kit aside, and started to stand up, Thran urged him to stay where he was.

“Stay there. I will dry your hair for you.”

“You don’t have to,” Bard said. “It’ll dry on its own.”

“I want to. Then it won’t drip into your scrapes.”

The dryer went on. The warm air felt good, and eased his tight muscles. “Thank you.”

“You are welcome. Do you need a bandage on your back?”

Bard swallowed. “Um, I have to ask you for a favor.”

The corners of Thran’s mouth turned down, as if he’d picked up on Bard’s uncomfortableness. “Anything. Anything.”

“I know you don’t like to look at wounds. But I can’t see my back myself. Are there any splinters?”

Thran swallowed, but that was the only sign he made of his distaste for poking at wounds, and he looked carefully. “Just one that I can see.”

“Can you get it out? Or I can wait until Sigrid comes home to do it.”

“I think I can do it. Where are the pliers?”

“Tweezers,” Bard handed him the implement. He couldn’t suppress the small smile on his lips at Thran’s misnomer, and at sight of how Thran’s eyes lit up at it, he was glad he didn’t.

“Tweezers, then. Turn towards the light.” Thran tsked. “It is too high. Lean your elbows on the sink.”

Bard did, and Thran draped himself over Bard’s back to brace his arms. He tried once, twice, three times before the offending piece came out. Thran held it up. “There. It is out.”

“Thanks. You’re a trouper.”

“You are welcome,” Thran replied with a grateful smile.

Bard got to his feet, but Thran's reflection was so pale that Bard turned towards his husband at once. He managed to grab Thran’s arm just as the dancer seemed to cave in on himself.

“Oh, gods, Thran, I’ve got you,” Bard stuttered, and quickly got Thran out of the bathroom and onto
“I should’ve waited for Sigrid to come home. I know you’re not thrilled with the sight of blood.”

“It is not that,” Thran protested, but he didn’t resist when Bard pulled one of the blankets over him. He pulled it close, shivering. “It has been a very long time since I have eaten, and I feel quite faded.”

“How long? Last night?”

“Lunch yesterday, though I had a bit at five.”

Bard tsked. “Almost twenty-four hours. What am I going to do with you?”

Thran eyed him. “And did you have breakfast this morning?”

“Technically, yes.”

“What is this ‘technically?’”

Bard gave him a shamefaced look. “I was... sick when I got home this morning.”

Thran’s stricken look was back. “I am so sorry. So sorry.”

“I shouldn’t have doubted you. He just looked so guilty...”

Thran grumbled deep in his throat. “Luka thinks he is funny. Most of the time, he is not. This morning, even he realized how unfunny he was. That is the look you saw.”

Bard felt a little better. “Can I make you an omelet?”

Thran’s smile was tender. “I would love an omelet. And then we will talk. I want to tell you everything.”

“Okay. Stay here; I’ll bring you some clothes.”

“Thank you.”

Bard found a clean Henley, underwear, warm socks, and leggings for Thran. As his husband – yes, thank the gods, his husband – dressed, he fetched Thran’s favorite long sweater to keep him warm. Then he put on his clothes, and the two of them went down to the kitchen where Bard made omelet, and Thran made tea and toast. They settled in the sitting room to share their food. When they were done, they stayed side by side, and talked.
Chapter 74

Chapter Summary

The reconciliation continues.

“I’ll get the dishes,” Bard said, leaning forward to pick up their plates. “What else would you like to eat?”

“I am full,” Thran said as he refilled their teacups.

“I can bring you another slice of toast, at least,” Bard coaxed, giving him a concerned look.

Thran sighed. That look all but shouted you’re so thin. He was, but overeating after such a traumatic morning was not the way to address it. “I truly am full, Bard. If I eat any more, I will not want lunch.”

“It’s only just after ten. Lots of time before lunch.”

“I am full enough for now.”

“Okay. How does bean and ham soup sound for lunch?”

“Very good. Is it made, or do you start it now?”

“It won’t take long to put it in the pot.”

“Then I will help. First, I will call Lettie and tell her that I will not be there today. Then I will chop with my favorite knife.”

Bard gave him a startled look, but his small smile revealed relief. “That’d be great, Thran. Just great.”

Thran smiled shyly back. “May I borrow your mobile? Mine is dead.”

Bard dug into the pocket of his sweat pants, pulled out his mobile, and handed it to Thran. “Sure.”

While Bard got out the things to make soup, Thran made a quick call to Lettie. He stayed in the kitchen where Bard could hear the call.

“Hello, Lettie.”

“I am fine. We are fine. I will not be with you today. I am exhausted, and I will take today to recover.”

“Are you sure you’re all right? If you can’t talk, just say yes or no. Do I need to call the police?”

Thran winced. After seeing the rage in Bard’s eyes, he understood Lettie’s worry.

“Not at all. We are about to make bean soup for lunch. Would you like to talk to Bard? I am sure he will give you the recipe.”

“No, no, I’m just glad you’re all right.”

“I am.” He looked at Bard, hefting the big pot onto the stove burner, and tilted his mobile towards him. “Say hello, Bard.”

“Hi, Lettie,” Bard called. “Tell Thran if you want soup, and I’ll send you a care package with him tomorrow.”

“Did you hear that? Bard says hello, and if you want soup, he will send you some tomorrow.”

“Okay, you’re all right. Good. Take the time you need.”

“I am sure that the rest of the company is equally exhausted – it is nothing but ruination to treat ourselves this way.”

“Irmo doesn’t think so.”

“Irmo is likely the only one who is not exhausted, but that must change, Lettie. We must let go of the burden to keep up with him, and give him the burden to accommodate us more. We will consider that tomorrow.”

“I won’t complain, and neither will anyone else. You’ve had the biggest part of that burden, but I agree that we’ve all suffered from it.”

“If you can keep Irmo away from me today, I will be most grateful. If he protests, tell him that I will not answer either my mobile or the door. I must rest.”

“It’ll be my pleasure. And I’m sending Ori home now. There’s someone else who’s exhausted. He’s been a trouper.”

“He has. I heartily approve. So I will see you tomorrow, sometime between eight and nine.”

“All right, Thran. And I hope Luka didn’t create too much of a mess for you. Even he realized what an ass he was this morning.”

“He did not help, no. But we recover. So farewell until tomorrow, ma chère.”

“Bye, Thran. Thanks for calling.”

Thran disconnected the call, and handed Bard’s mobile back to him. “You will find an unfamiliar call on your mobile from this morning. I called you on Luka’s mobile. I want you to know this.”

Bard put the wrapped chunk of ham down on the cutting board, and hung his head. “What happened yesterday?” he said lowly, not looking at Thran.

Thran grimaced. “Yesterday... like so many days before it... so long, so difficult. Irmo argues about everything. So much wrangling... fifteen hours of arguments, and yes, dance, some of it good, but... I was exhausted. I was so exhausted that when Irmo followed me out of the studio, still so full of arguments, I forgot my bag. I sent him home, then went back into the studio for my bag, because I did not want to risk the drive home without my license, because I was so tired. I sat down for just for a moment...”

Bard grunted in understanding. “You fell asleep.”
Thran nodded. “Luka woke me up not five minutes before you saw me. He said it was seven-fifty-two on Monday morning. I knew you would be frantic. I was frantic. When I tried to call you, I found that my mobile was dead, so I called you from Luka’s mobile, perhaps two minutes before you arrived. I was so frantic that Luka made a stupid joke to ask if I called an angry other party. When I did not reach you, I ran out of the changing room so fast that I stumbled. Luka caught me so that I did not fall just as you came in, and when he saw you he said, ‘oh, that is the angry other party,’ which sounded very bad even to me. I do not fault you because you took it the wrong way…”

Bard looked up as Thran’s voice trailed away. “But?”

Thran met his eyes. “But what?”

“Just say the rest of what you’re thinking. No matter how bad it is.”

Thran extended a long finger to roll a couple of the carrots back and forth on his cutting board. “You were so quick to think I had cheated on you. That hurt.”

Bard’s grimace was ashamed. “I did jump to a contusion, as they say.”

“The saying is to jump to a conclusion, yes? What is this contusion?”

“It’s a fancy medical term for a bruise. It’s another way of saying that ASSUME makes an ASS out of U and ME. So I made an ass out of myself when I saw you with Luka’s arm around you.”

Bard sighed, and his fingers plucked at the wrapper around the ham. “So now it’s my turn to confess the nasty. I thought you were with Irmo, just because he and you are so attuned to each other when your visions align. I know, I know – that’s stupid. So fucking stupid. But you’re away so much of the time, and you wouldn’t be if you didn’t love what you were doing, and that’s why I pushed to get the ballroom done, so at least you’d be reminded of your home and family some of the time. But then I saw you with Luka, and…”

Thran hummed. “I understand. I do not like that you doubted me, but I have certainly strained all credibility because I chose to be here so little. I have neglected you and our children badly, and that will stop. But I would also like you to know that Irmo has no thought for anything but his visions. I do not think sex or even the most basic ideas of companionship or interaction exist for him. Ori thinks that he is on the autism spectrum – many savants are. As for Luka, he is straight. He has a girlfriend. Even if he were gay, I would not be attracted to him. He is very fond of Wagner and petrol station burritos, and he does not take his practice as seriously as I would like.”

“Wagner,” Bard muttered with a shudder. “That’s a death knell, right there.”

Thran smiled as he began on the carrots. “Indeed. How small with the carrots?”

“Minced, please. The potato can be bigger dice.”

“So it will be.” As Thran plied his chef’s knife, Bard unwrapped the ham and sliced it into cubes. Thran chopped carrots, then a potato and onions, which went into the pot with olive oil and a little parsley. In went the ham with chopped tomatoes and garlic, and then four kinds of beans and a bit of pepper. While Thran busied himself with washing the cutting boards and knives, Bard took the empty bean cans out to the mudroom to go in the recycling bin.

Soon the kitchen was clean. Thran followed Bard back into the sitting room, but his husband had ducked into the solarium. Thran found him contemplating the remains of Rahmiel.

Thran put a hand on Bard’s shoulder. “I am sorry I ruined your vision. I never meant to.”
“That wasn’t your doing. It was mine.” Bard rubbed his neck as he regarded the tangle of clay and wire, and half glanced at Thran without meeting his eyes. “I’ve had too many stars in my eyes, ever since we met. You’re overwhelming – so beautiful; so, so talented. Why you saw anything in a welder is beyond me.”

“A mere welder, no. An artist, much more talented at many things than a dancer, yes.”

“Maybe. In any case, you saw something, and I...”

Thran’s throat tightened as he put both arms around Bard’s shoulders. He didn’t squeeze, but only in deference to Bard’s scraped back. “And you loved me back.”

“I did. But... I put you on such a pedestal. That was wrong. I thought you could do no wrong. And you didn’t. But I thought you did, and...” He grimaced, and ran both hands through his hair. “Gods. I don’t know.”

“Oh, lyubov moya,” Thran whispered in Bard’s ear, and turned him around into his embrace. They stood there for a few moments; Thran was glad to have the solid substance of Bard’s body against his. “I think I understand.”

“What?”

“What we both have done. We have not allowed either of us to be mortals.”

“I feel pretty mortal right now.”

Thran’s lips curved up in a chagrined smile. “So do I, because I did do wrong. Maybe you jumped to your contusion, but I neglected everything but the dance. I left everything else for you to shoulder – the children, the house, the laundry, all the other chores. Only a superman could do so much, but you did, without complaint. Before long, you and our children would learn to do without me.”

A tremor went through Bard.

“Ah,” Thran’s hands tightened on Bard’s shoulders. “That has already happened.”

“Not quite. I missed you so much. The children all missed you. That’s why they wanted to help me paint the ballroom. We spent all yesterday on it. The only thing that’s left is some of the woodwork.”

“You were supposed to spend Sunday on your art,” Thran scolded.

“That should tell you how much everyone wants you back. I got no argument when I said I’d work on the ballroom, and all four of them volunteered without a second thought.”

A hard lump formed in Thran’s throat, and his eyes stung. “Oh, gods.”

“I won’t. I won’t. But we must not let this happen again, Bard. Never again.”

“Never again.”

“Then what do we do? I have never had a family like this before, and it is clear that I do not know how to take care of it. So tell me what I must do.”

“We both have things to do. You need to spend more time here. I need to not let things run so long without saying anything.”
“In the nutshell,” Thran agreed. “And so perhaps we should talk each day of how things progress.”

“That’s good. I don’t want us to get so out of step again. I haven’t got too many rages in me to match today.”

“I suspect that I did not see the worst of it... whatever you did in the barn. Is it a shambles?”

“No. I took most of it out on me. Appropriate, considering how stupid I was.”

Bard eased away from Thran, bent to pick up the mangled Rahmiel, and laid him on his work stand in the corner. Even unfinished, he had been beautiful, and to see him as a ruin made Thran’s stomach knot. It was not his place to say a word, but he did anyway.

“I hope you remake him. He was beautiful.”

Bard’s hand paused over the ruin, his fingers smoothing a bit of the clay that had sheared away from the armature. It was such a despondent gesture that Thran went up behind Bard to stroke his hair, his arm.

“I know that I am mortal now, and no longer your angel. But Rahmiel was already a rare piece, and I hope that you will not abandon him. If you can bear to continue him, I hope you do.”

Bard swallowed hard. “So... I’m not your saint anymore, either...”

His voice was half a question, which Thran was quick to answer. “You will always be my saint. We had a terrible, terrible moment, but I hope it is only a single moment in the midst of all that came before, and all that will come after.”

Bard’s hand paused over the clay and wire, then he moved closer to the base and took up the twisted armature. Under his deft fingers, the bent wire straightened – it hadn’t done much more than twisted, and a turn or two here and there realigned it without much effort. He clamped the armature back to the base, and stripped the clay from it in careful bits. When it was bare, he rolled the clay into a ball and set it in the bin with the rest of the block.

“There. Ready to start over.”

“Will you?”

Bard nodded. “It’s not every day an angel gives me a commission.”

The wide smile on Thran’s face was probably very silly, but he didn’t care. He brushed a kiss on Bard’s hair. “Thank you, lyubov moya.”

That got a sheepish shrug out of Bard. “You’re welcome. So... I suppose we have only one more thing to figure out?”

“Do we? What is that?”

“What do we tell the children?” Bard held up his hands. They looked better now that the blood was washed away, but bruises had started to purple the base of each hand under the little finger. He’d balled up his fists and pounded something, then. Thran suppressed a wince. “They’ll know something was up, because I look like I’ve been in a brawl, and you look like death.”

Thran shivered, not at Bard’s words, but the cooler temperature of the solarium had finally seeped into his bones. Bard realized at once, and led them back to the sitting room sofa, Thran huddling close to Bard because he was cold. His husband grabbed the throw on his end of the sofa and shook it open to drape it over Thran.

“I do not know,” he admitted, snuggling the throw close. “Is it better to tell them that we had a fight, or is it better to concoct a story? Both are bad.”

Bard shook his head. “Both are very bad.”

“Very, very bad. I do not want to lie. But if we tell them the truth, I do not want them to think you hit me.”

Bard’s face spasmed with the first humor Thran had seen today. “They think you’re a god with knives. Since I’m still breathing, they won’t think I fought with you.”

Thran hummed, as he laid his head on Bard’s shoulder. “They think you are very strong, and since I am still standing and have no bruises or broken limbs, they won’t think I fought with you, either.”

“Lying is out. Right out.”

“Agreed. So...”

“So... we’ll tell the truth. We’ll tell them we had a disagreement, and we worked it out like civilized people.”

Thran snorted. “What did you do in the barn? Was that civilized?”

Bard pursed his lips, and darted a quick, furtive glance Thran’s way before looking away. “I pounded a lot of metal and did a lot of chin-ups.”

“Relatively civilized, then,” Thran amended. “So we do not lie if we tell them we were civilized.”

“As long as they don’t ask for particulars. They’ll ask what we argued about.”

“Tcha, that is none of their business.”

“Welcome to the new generation, Thran. They don’t have the boundaries you grew up with.”

“No one in this country has the boundaries I grew up with,” Thran scoffed. “That does not mean I must answer every question a child puts to me.”

It was Bard’s turn to scoff.

“All right, all right. They will ask. What do we say?”

“The truth again. That I got worried about how much time you were away, and we... had an argument, but we worked it out, and you’re going to be home more. They’ll be happy about that, and won’t ask anything more.”

“What if they do?”

“Then... we’ll say that you realized that you had gotten so thin, and that you missed us, and so you decided to fix both. And we’ll just leave out the part about you not coming home last night and me being stupid this morning, and they’ll be satisfied – no, we won’t leave all of my stupid stuff out. We’ll say that I was stupid not to say how worried I was about you earlier, and I should have, before things went so far. Then we both look equally stupid, and equally smart.”
Thran hummed. “That is a good solution. We tell the useful parts of the truth, and forget the rest.”

Bard’s hand tightened on Thran’s knee. “I won’t ever forget the rest. But that stays between us, so that we do better from now on.”

“I agree.”

“Okay. Last problem solved.” Bard eased his arm around Thran’s shoulder. “Getting warmer now? I can make a fire if you’d like.”

“How long must the soup cook before it is ready?”

“That’s the great thing about soup. It’s ready whenever we want it to be.”

“What time is it now?”

“About eleven.”

“So... perhaps it is soup at one?”

“Sure. No sooner.”

“Then I want to go upstairs and crawl into bed and get truly warm. Perhaps I will nap.”

“That’s fine, Thran. You need to rest. I can start on the woodwork for the ballroom while you sleep.”

“Perhaps... you would come upstairs with me?”

Bard gave him a guilty look, then fiddled with the fringe on the throw draped around Thran’s shoulders. “I... haven’t been the kindest man this morning, Thran. I don’t know how you can look at me, to be honest.”

“I have neglected you for many more days than today, and myself. I am much too thin. Can you still look at me, despite those?”

Bard still stared at the throw, but his lips curved just the least bit at the corners.

“Then I want to get warm, and I want my saint back.”

It took only a little nudge to convince Bard to get up from the sofa. They made a quick detour through the kitchen to check on the soup, then Thran coaxed his husband upstairs. Bard was tentative as he stripped his clothes and got under the covers, so Thran curled around him, careful not to brush against the scrapes on Bard’s shoulder. He slipped an arm around Bard’s ribs and eased him close, sighing in relief as his chilled body soaked up Bard’s body heat.

“Mmm,” he breathed, shutting his eyes. “Gods, to be warm. Are you comfortable? I do not hurt your scrapes?”

Slowly, slowly, Bard relaxed, and he stroked Thran’s arm. “I’m fine, Thran. I... it’s good to have my angel back. I’ve missed you.”

Thran stroked Bard’s chest. “I am sorry. I will not be so neglectful again.”

“I won’t be so silent again.”

“Then we will take good care of each other.”
Thran nuzzled his nose into the crease where Bard’s neck met his shoulder, savoring the scent of Bard’s skin, the warmth curled against his stomach, the soft hair on Bard’s chest under his fingers. A tension he didn’t know had been coiled in his body eased as he warmed, and he shut his eyes.

Thank the gods tenfold. He had redeemed himself, and his saint was back in his arms...

* * *

Bard was relieved as the body at his back relaxed almost immediately into sleep. Good. After such a hellacious morning, sleep was the best thing for Thran. Between the rigors of the past three weeks and their cataclysm this morning, he looked so wan, so worn, so ravaged. Bard had been such a fool to hold his silence for so long, to let his husband waste away so badly. He wouldn’t let that happen again. He’d find one of those online websites that estimated how many calories the human body burned doing various activities, and see what it said about dancing. Then he’d make sure Thran got enough calories to hold his weight from now on. Maybe showing Thran some hard numbers would convince him that he wouldn’t die if he ate more.

As for what had happened this morning...

In deference to his scraped right shoulder, he got out of bed without waking his exhausted husband, circled around to Thran’s side, and eased back under the covers. He eased Thran into his arms, humbly aware of how much he had to be grateful for. They’d weathered a terrible storm, and were back in rapport.

There was only one more trial to come, but they would bear it together.

In five hours, the children would be home.

Sigrid would give him a fit.

Despite himself, Bard grinned, imagining the intense glare that would soon be turned on him. But that was five hours from now. For the moment, he was safe in bed with Thran.

Bard shut his eyes and snuggled into the warmth that was his husband.

His angel.
Chapter 75

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint face a hard discussion, then the Cherubs' Inquisition. The latter will be tougher by far.

Thran woke gradually, luxuriating in the pervasive warmth that cocooned him so deliciously. Gods, what luxury, not to have to move, only to soak up the heat gloved in silk and cashmere, pillowed in down. With eyes still closed, he reached out to draw his husband closer...

He was alone in bed.

Blinking, Thran found the clock radio that sat on his husband’s nightstand. After two. Two? In the afternoon? He was in bed at two in the afternoon?

All that had happened this morning filtered back into conscious thought.

Panic rose, but only for an instant. On the heels of that, he recalled the reconciliation he and Bard had forged one painful breath at a time – thank the gods. Still, that was only the start. They both had work ahead of them, but Thran more than Bard. How long ago had it been since he’d supplicated the gods to keep him from plunging into \textit{Immortal} without regard to anything else? Yet despite his resolve, in less than three weeks, he had done just as he’d feared, and forgotten everything else – his saint Bard, his treasured son Legolas, his excellent co-conspirator Sigrid, his mischievous Bain, and his small Kukla Tilda.

Well, then. If he could not keep his head above water, and the gods could not, then he would beg Bard to help him. Bard would help him keep his balance.

Thran grimaced. Bard could help him only if Bard spoke up. Clearly, he still didn’t see himself as an equal partner in their marriage, or he would have asked for more from Thran before now. His saint was so used to just... bearing whatever life gave him, without complaint or protest, no matter the sacrifice. How many sketches had he done in the past two weeks? Probably not many. Clearly, Bard needed as much prompt to make time for on his art as Thran did to make time for their family.

They would help each other do these things. They must, or both would be unhappy, if not now, then somewhere down the line.

A sudden smile broke his somber mood. There was always Sigrid. She suffered no fools, even foolish parents. She would relish the chance to ride herd on both her Da and her Ada.

Still smiling, Thran eased back the covers, found his clothes by the side of the bed, and got dressed. When he went into the bathroom, he was gratified that his eyes were no longer red, and his eye sockets didn’t look so bruised. He still looked pale, but a good night’s sleep would cure that. He padded downstairs to find Bard.

The kitchen smelled wonderful; the soup that he and Bard had put together earlier simmered gently on the stove, and a bowl of flour was out on the counter. Light streamed in from the big windows by the table, and the house was quiet. How had \textit{Immortal} seduced him from this sanctuary? Perhaps Bard was in the ballroom, painting as he’d mentioned earlier, patiently working to bring their sanctuary for its full beauty. Just to make sure, Thran stuck his head in the sitting room – no, there was Bard, comfortably slumped on the sofa with his sock feet propped on the fruit crate and Thran’s laptop cradled in his lap. At Thran’s entrance, Bard looked up with a relieved smile.

“The sleepyhead arises,” Bard greeted. “You look better. I hope you feel better, too.”

“Very much. The soup smells divine. Have you eaten?”

“I had some fruit earlier. I thought you’d be up soon, and I’d have soup with you.”

“You did not have to wait for me.”

“I wanted to.” Bard put the laptop carefully aside, still open, then got up. “I’ve got biscuits started, so in ten minutes they’ll be ready.”

“You are a delight,” Thran hugged him, then they came into the kitchen. “You need the milk, yes?”

“Yes, thanks,” Bard acknowledged, as Thran put the carton on the counter. The milk went in the bowl, the biscuits went on the cookie sheet, and the cookie sheet went in the oven – already preheated; Bard had heard Thran stirring upstairs, then. They got out bowls and plates, utensils and cups, honey and butter. Thran ladled out the soup while Bard fished the biscuits out of the oven.

“Would you put a little more in your bowl?” Bard asked quietly, when he saw Thran had given himself less soup than Bard.

“This is plenty,” Thran protested.

Bard swallowed, took an uncomfortable breath. “I found out while you were asleep that it’s not enough. So try to eat a little more. Please.”

“What is this that you have found out?” Thran asked him curiously, as he duly put a bit more soup in his bowl.

“Let’s sit down, and we can talk about it. Or we can eat first. I’ve got two uncomfortable things to talk about, so if you’d rather eat first, that’s okay.”

Thran took his seat at the table. “Are they uncomfortable because of... this morning, or because of what came after this morning?”

“It’s... not because of this morning... exactly,” Bard ventured, taking the chair beside Thran. “It’s... how we get better. But it’s hard to talk about.”

Thran considered. “Hard to talk about because of the things themselves, or hard because you find it hard to talk about them? Or perhaps hard because I will not like them?”

Bard looked at his soup, not at Thran, as if he were not sure of what to say.

Thran gulped. “Is this about us?”

Bard’s glance was startled. “No! No, that’s the one thing I know. I love you, and whether you’re crazy or not, you love me, and that’s a grace, one I have a hard time believing is mine. But...” He took a deep breath, maybe a little shaky at the end. “This morning rattled me. I thought I was okay, but while you slept, I started looking at things to help us, and... now...”

Bard looked so uncomfortable that Thran’s throat knotted in distress for him. He snaked his hand out to capture Bard’s. He stroked Bard’s wedding ring before he intertwined their fingers. “We will get through it, whatever it is. We will eat our soup, and as you can tell me, you will.”

Bard nodded. “Okay.”

“If it helps, I woke up with the thought that I have failed to find my balance with this ballet, even though I promised myself that I would. I will need your help. But... it is hard for you to speak up about such things, even now. You are too much the saint.”

Bard’s hunched posture straightened, and he gave Thran a relieved look. “I don’t know about the saint part, but yes, it’s hard to know when I should say something. It’s not my way to tell you what to do.”

Thran considered. “I do not like to tell you what to do, either. So perhaps we will not do that. We will ask questions instead. You will not tell me that I am not home enough; rather, you will ask me why it is a good idea for me to be away so much.”

Bard’s shoulders relaxed still more, and his expression lightened. “That I can do. Yes. That makes it something to discuss, not one of us telling the other something and that’s it.”

“I like that, too. So I will start. Do you think it is a good idea to spend so much time to make such delicious soup only to look at it?”

Bard’s chuckle was chagrined. “No, I don’t. Let me remedy that right now.” He shoveled in a big bite, drawing Thran’s laughter. “What if you ate a little more, too? If only to keep me company?”

“Of course.”

They ate in companionable silence for a few moments before Bard looked at Thran again. “Um, so the things I looked at while you slept... I wanted to find out how I could help, where I could help. I won’t tell you about dancing, or the ballet... that’d be like you telling me how to cast metal. You don’t know about that, just like I don’t know about dancing. So that’s one boundary. We ask all we want, but the artist rules his art.”

“That is good, yes. It makes sense.”

“We decide together about the house, because we both live here.”

“I defer to your knowledge of such things, but I appreciate that you offer me a vote when such things arise.”

“Okay. So... food, eating... that’s a problem... for you more than me.”

Thran nodded, and belatedly took another spoonful of soup, which drew Bard’s wry smile as he followed suit. “I cannot deny that.”

“I looked on the Internet. There’s a medical site that offers health calculators – I thought it’d be easier to know what to do if we had numbers to help us.”

“Numbers about what?” Thran asked curiously, eating more of his soup.

“About how much calories you burn every day, because that would tell you how much you need to eat to keep up with yourself. You have lost weight, am I right?”

Thran winced. “I am embarrassed at how much. I do not understand – I eat lunch every day at the UVB studio, Bard! The rest of the company loves it, because they eat then, too. I am the envy of the company because of the lunches you make me in the fancy boxes. Several have asked if you cater, so that is a compliment to how well you feed me. And we also eat during our evening discussions. How I managed to lose so much weight not only surprises me – it worries me, too.”

“Me, too. Today’s the first good look I’ve had of you for two weeks, and you’re noticeably thinner. So clearly you need to eat more. I looked up a website that told me how many calories ballet dancing burns per hour. Another one told me how many calories a thirty-four-year-old male who’s six-five, weighs one-eighty-six, and does what they call a ‘heavily physical job’ needs to hold weight. Then I estimated how much you eat now, and it’s no wonder you’ve lost weight. You need to eat a quarter more to hold your weight, and a third more if you want to gain some of your muscle back.”

Thran’s jaw dropped. “So much?”

Bard nodded. “I know. I didn’t expect that, either. I think stress burns calories on top of your physical exertion, too. I’ll show you when we’re through eating so you can check my math, but it looks like to me that you can eat pretty much anything you want, and still be in no danger of gaining an ounce. So if you want another bowl of soup or another biscuit or ice cream, have at.”

“Perhaps a biscuit, then. Supper is in less than four hours, and I suppose you will want to stuff me then, too.”

The tension was back in Bard’s spine. “I want to help you take care of yourself. I don’t want to nag you, or make you do anything that you don’t want to.”

Thran winced at his inept phrasing. “I know, lyubov moya. I should not have said it the way I did. Because that plays into how uncomfortable you are to say the things I need to hear.”

Bard nodded mutely.

“I need you to say those things, even when I do not want to hear them – especially when I do not want to hear them. It is bad enough that I neglected you and our family, but for a dancer to abuse his body is unconscionable. I cannot do that, Bard. I cannot – but I have. So please, you cannot hold back. Promise me that you will not.”

Maybe the intensity of Thran’s insistence lent credence to his words, because Bard’s jaw twitched, and he nodded. “I promise. And I know I’m prone to carry too much, which is why I looked on the Internet. I thought numbers would give us both some guides – objective ones, and not just me or you guessing. We’ll have to do some math for a while until we figure it out, but it’ll get easier.”

Thran didn’t resist a smile. “I did not think that artists were so good with math.”

“I didn’t think dancers were, either, funny Russian. We ought to be able to handle addition and subtraction, which is all this is. We’d better – you don’t want Sigrid to take this over, do you?”

Snickering, Thran took another bite of biscuit. “I thought of her this morning, if I am honest. But I would prefer not to give her the satisfaction to chastise her Da or her Ada for anything.”

“Gods, no,” Bard winced. “About that... no matter what we tell the children when they get home, she’ll find a way to have a private word with me. So once we get the rest upstairs, I’ll linger down here and let her ambush me. Better to get it out of the way rather than let her stew.”

“Will I need to apologize to her?”

Bard winced again. “No. I’ll be clear about that. We fought about you not being here and not eating.
I won’t let her glare at you because I was stupid.”

“But you think she will speak of what you feared was true this morning.”

Bard folded his arms atop the table and sighed. “I don’t know. I’m ready for anything. You have to be with a teenaged daughter. In about two years, we’ll have Tilda at that stage, too. They’re irreverent, nosy, snarky, moody, and proddy, and at the same time, they’re loving, mature, thoughtful, and wise. It’s never a dull moment. You’ll see before long, once the glamor of beautiful Ada wears off and you become just plain old Da.”

“If I become a plain old Da on par with you, then I will be honored.”

With a smile, Bard scraped the last spoonful of soup out of his bowl. “I hope you still think that the first time she snarks at you. Any more soup for you?”

“I am quite full.”

“I’d try to talk you into half a cookie, but they’re just store bought.”

“I will save myself for your decadence, whenever it arrives.”

They cleaned up the kitchen, then spent a half hour side by side in the sitting room, looking at the nutrition numbers Bard had gleaned. It was a revelation to see just how much energy Thran burned every day – no wonder he had thinned so much.

“I ordered this nutrition guide to food for us, because a book’s better in the kitchen than the laptop – spills are easier to wipe off a book,” Bard finished.

“That will be a good help,” Thran agreed. “So we are well on our way to handle the food, yes?”

“Just one more thing,” Bard grinned, finally relaxed. “I found this website that talked about what Olympic athletes eat during training? You work that hard, too, so I thought you’d get a kick out of reading what your peers eat.”

He navigated to the page, and Thran bent close to read about the outrageous breakfasts of one Olympic swimmer, and the collection of smoothies favored by a runner.

“Gods, Bard! I would double our food bill if I ate all of that!” Thran exclaimed.

“They’re intense,” Bard agreed. “I imagine some of this was for show, but not most of it. They’re all eating a lot of protein to keep their muscle. So you need a lot of that, too.”

“We will work it out.” Thran linked his arm with Bard’s and leaned his head on Bard’s shoulder. “Thank you, lyubov moya. This will help me not be such a fool.”

Bard’s hand strayed to Thran’s thigh and squeezed gently before he closed the laptop and put it on the fruit crate.

“So... about the second uncomfortable thing,” Bard ventured, as his hand tightened on Thran’s thigh again.

“The first one was not so bad,” Thran observed, refusing to tense. No matter what the topic was, he would not telegraph his apprehension to Bard. That was not fit encouragement for Bard finding the courage to bring whatever it was up without a prompt.

“This one’s harder – for me, anyway. It’s come up before, and I know what you’ve told me, but... it’s part of the reason why I didn’t say anything for so long.”

“What is it?”

“It’s... oh, hell, I’ll just spit it out. It’s money. It’s still money.”

Thran kept a tight rein on his tongue. “What about money?”

“Is money tight? Because of the ballet? Have I spent too much on the house? Because I can cut back –”

No, no, no – Bard’s worry about money had resurfaced! Hadn’t they put that behind them? Before he’d realized it, he’d tensed, and right after him, Bard did the same thing. Oh, gods, he couldn’t let this turn into another conflagration, not when things were still tenuous from this morning. He forced himself to relax, to rub Bard’s leg in reassurance.

“ – it is tight, isn’t it?”

Thran took a deep breath. “Stop. Do not jump to another contusion because I flinched. Let us both calm down. Please. No contusions.”

Bard gulped, he looked at Thran with an almost panicky worry, but he clamped his jaw on whatever he was about to say, and took a deep breath to settle himself. “You’re right. No contusions. I don’t need any more contusions.”

“Money is hard for you. I understand.”

“Money is not hard for me,” Bard gave a short, nervous chuckle. “It’s lack of money that’s hard. Is lack of money a problem because of the ballet?”

“No,” Thran said firmly. “The ballet costs a great deal of money, yes. But it does not put you or our family or our house or anything else at risk. I wince at how much everything costs, yes, because I insist that the money I spend is appropriate and provides a good return or a good result. I will continue to wince. Ori and studio space and set designs cost a great deal. But those things do not affect your work on the house or our children. If it would help for you to look at financial statements, I will show them to you.”

Bard looked a little easier. “I don’t know how much I’ll understand, but yes, I would like to see.”

Thran leaned forward to pick up his laptop. “If you see something that does not make sense, then tell me, and I will explain.”

Over the next half hour, Bard backed up his claim that he was not the world’s most astute financier. He was more than adequate when it came to their household expenses, and he was painfully frugal. But he struggled to understand more than that – investments, trusts, commercial accounting, and so forth were not things he knew much about. Thran well understood how adrift he must have been when Daphne had died, leaving him to struggle through her estate, the children, the house, his art, and the business of his art. Fortunately, Mr. Nori had already vetted Shire Hills as a reputable and fair business, so if Bard signed with Bilbo, he would be in good hands there. As for the rest, Thran had some ideas on how to reassure Bard.

“So... the only thing I have to understand is that this is the household money, and that is the ballet money, and one doesn’t take from the other?”

Thran nodded. “That is right. They are completely separate. So you see that all is well for the
If Immortal falls badly on its face, then it will be painful, but it will not affect what I have put aside for the household.”

Bard looked at the ballet accounts, and gulped. “That’s... so much. So much.”

“It is. But so is this,” Thran pointed to the household accounts. “So if we need more paint, buy paint. If we need more groceries, buy groceries. The money is there.”

Sitting back, Bard heaved a breath. He met Thran’s eyes, and nodded. “Thank you. I understand better now.”

“I am glad to show you, lyubov moya. I want you to understand everything so that you are comfortable. The house is safe. You and the children are safe. If anything happens to me, may the gods forbid it, you and the children are safe. If anything happens to you, may the gods also forbid that, the children are still safe. We have a financial planner if we need one. And when your career as an artist emerges into full glory, you will have someone to help you see to your assets for the children. I hope this puts your mind at ease.”

Bard’s expression was thoughtful, but he nodded. “It does. Not knowing... I thought the best thing I could do was to handle whatever I could, so that you didn’t have to worry about things. But... that wasn’t good for either of us. This is better.”

“It is. I do not like us to be at odds, so badly out of step. I do not want that to happen ever again.”

“Nor do I,” Bard gulped. “We need to talk about these things every couple of months to make sure we’re clear about everything.”

“I agree. Now, it is I who must bring up something uncomfortable.”

Bard sat up straighter. “I’m ready.”

“How many sketches have you done for Bilbo?”

He winced. “More than you think, but not enough.”

“Then just as we must see that I eat, we must see that you work on your art. Do not misunderstand – I appreciate your urge to push on the ballroom. But now that it is mostly done... please, Bard, you must take the time for your art. Nothing can happen until you make your sketches.”

“I know.” Bard stared at the floor. “The children scolded me about it yesterday, but when I told them why, no one complained. And I promised them that I’d take one day this week to work on my stuff. So I figure another two days, and the ballroom is done. Then I’ll take my day.”

“I want you to take as many days after that as you need to get what you need for Bilbo. No, I will not debate this. You must do this – for you, for me, for the children. Please.”

Bard didn’t protest. “I appreciate that. But I warn you – you’ll need me to work on more than my sketches once you get a few more dancers in the ballroom.”

“What more is there to do there?” Thran held up his hands in puzzlement.

“Oh, the ballroom will be brilliant. But even ethereal dancers need to take a piss now and again, and the closest bathroom is not in great shape,” Bard pointed at the door to the half bath. “At least it’s bigger than a broom closet. And it’ll be fine for just a few dancers, maybe. But more than that, and they’ll need to head upstairs.”
“I had not thought of that,” Thran admitted. “If I ever want to teach master classes here, they will have to be small, or else we must look into an addition. But that is not something to worry about now. This small room... all the plumbing is correct, yes?”

“It is. New sink and toilet. Walls, ceiling, floor... they need the same business as every other room in the house. But it’ll be a walk in the park after the ballroom.”

“But it is usable now, so we will make do until you make more of a portfolio. You must not put this off any longer.”

“I can live with that. Tomorrow and Wednesday, ballroom woodwork. Then on to the sketches.”

Thran stuck out his hand. “That is a deal.”

Grinning, Bard stuck his hand out to shake Thran’s. “It is.”

“Good. So our crisis is done.”

The mudroom door opened signaling the arrival of the children home from school. The look that Bard gave Thran was half grimace, half smirk. “Not yet. We still have to face the Inquisition.”

“Tcha,” Thran waved an airy hand. “As long as we are back in resonance, we will manage.”

“Ah, ignorance is bliss,” Bard warned, smiling. “I’ll remind you of your blitheness later.”

“Do so. Until then, allow me to sweeten my naïveté with a kiss.”

He brushed a kiss on Bard’s lips, drawing a chuckle from his husband, as well as a kiss back.

Finally, they were back on keel, and smiling again. Just in time – they’d need all the humor they could muster when the children descended upon them.

* * *

The amount of tension that fell away from Bard’s shoulders made him feel twenty pounds lighter. He was the most fortunate man alive to have a husband who, despite being accused of the most despicable betrayal, found the compassion and forbearance to forgive, comfort, and explain to his accuser. A volatile Russian husband, at that. Bard was the one who was supposed to be so patient and longsuffering, yet this time it was Thran who’d kept them away from the brink.

They’d settled just in time, too. Bard didn’t have a second to reflect on Thran’s financial revelations before all four children clattered into the kitchen.

“Da?” Bain yelled. “Da, we’re home!”

“In the sitting room, Bain,” Bard replied. “And someone’s come home to roost, too.”

“Who?” Tilda called. “Who is it?”

“Papa?” Legolas’s eyes widened, and his grin was wide – but just as quickly the expression changed to wrinkled brow and downturned lips. “Oh, no – is anything wrong?”
“I am well,” Thran assured him, getting up to hug his son warmly. “I am even better now because you and the other children are here.”

“Ada?” Tilda called from the kitchen. “Ada’s here?”

“He’s here!” Legolas replied, letting his father go. “Are you sick, Papa? You look pale.”

Sigrid had hurried in after the other children, but she was too busy studying Thran, then Bard, then Thran again, to say anything. Bard had seen that look before, both on Sigrid’s face and on her mother’s. Both of them backed that penetrating, skeptical expression with persistent probing – prying, if Bard was honest. So while he offered her a smile in welcome, he didn’t expect that to placate her.

“What happened to you?” was her far-from-subtle challenge. “Da, are you all right? What did you do to your hands?”

“Da hurt his hands?” Bain looked quickly at Sigrid, then at Bard. “Da, what happened? Are you all right? Did something happen in the ballroom?”

“Da’s hurt? What’s wrong?” Tilda was swept into the interrogation, and even Legolas gave Bard a worried look, as Bain and Tilda clamored anxiously.

“Ada, you don’t look so good, either,” Sigrid’s frown deepened. She swallowed, the only sign of apprehension in her otherwise critical demeanor. “Gods, what have you two been up to?”

Bard gave Thran an I-told-you-so look. Thran looked back with uncertainty in his eyes, and he nibbled his upper lip. Gods, Mr. Confidence would be no help to start this discussion, so Bard gave him a wink before he looked back at the children.

“Why don’t you get out the cheese and crackers, and we’ll have a sit down,” he invited.

“Uh-oh,” Bain gulped, looking at the other children. “It must be serious if they won’t tell us straight out.”

“Just get the cheese and crackers, Bain,” Bard gave his son a look. “Til, Sigrid, Legs, you can help him.”

The children went reluctantly, Sigrid last, and only after a stern look at her father. He winked at her, which got a smile out of her, but she ducked into the solarium before she went after the others, shaking her head. Bard could guess why she went out there, and what implications his very smart daughter would make of what she saw. Bard glanced at Thran, only to meet his eyes. He was likely making the same inferences that Bard was, but both of them held silence. In a few seconds, a platter of cheese appeared with three boxes of crackers. For once, the children didn’t dive into the bounty, but searched their fathers’ faces for reassurance.

“So give,” Sigrid folding herself down on the other sofa so she faced both men.

Bard had already taken a marshaling breath while the children had rummaged in the kitchen for their snacks. He had Thran’s hand clasped in his.

“We had a fight,” he said in his mildest tone.

“I knew it,” Sigrid muttered to herself, shaking her head and throwing her hands up in the air. “What about?”
“I have been very heedless,” Thran said quietly. “I have let the ballet consume me more than I should, and I have worked much too hard, and I have neglected all of you. Your Da was much too longsuffering, and it was not until he saw how thin I was this morning that he finally spoke out, as he should. I did not want to hear this, and so we had words. But then I discovered that he was right – I have become much too thin. He told me what all of you did to paint the ballroom yesterday to help make a place for me to be at home more. So I am very sorry that I have worried him so much, and all of you. I will not let the ballet consume me so much again.”

“So you’ll be here more?” Legolas asked.

Thran nodded. “I will, and gladly so.”

“Did you yell?” Bain blurted, drawing Bard’s sheepish laughter.

“We yelled,” he nodded, glancing at Thran.

“Both of us,” Thran nodded, too, looking back at Bard.

“But it’s okay,” Bard shrugged. “I was worried about Thran, and he was surprised, but we worked it out.”

“What about those?” Sigrid pointed to his hands.

“Um, we had to call time out, so I did a lot of chin-ups in the barn.”

“Did you trash the place?” Sigrid pressed, her lips a thin line.

“No,” he replied, then let the mildness of his tone sharpen subtly. “Let’s remember courtesy, okay?”

Sigrid’s intense frown crumbled into contrition. “Sorry, Da.”

Bard nodded acceptance. “Just to make this a teaching moment, this wasn’t all Thran’s fault. I was worried, and I know you were, too. I should have said something about our worries before this morning, before Thran got in too deeply. So I didn’t do as good a job of taking care of him as I should have. He didn’t do as good a job of taking care of us, either, so we’re going to watch out for each other better from now on.”

Thran sat forward and pointedly took a piece of cheese and a cracker. “I will do a better job to eat more, and to be here with our family more. Bard will do a better job to watch out for me. And I will also watch out for Bard to see that he works on his art more. This will be better for all of us.”

“Everyone okay now?” Bard asked, also taking a piece of cheese.

The children looked between themselves, trading glances and silent questions. Tilda was the first to turn back to their fathers.

“Okay,” she pronounced, and helped herself from the platter. “Now we can read the next part of Harry Potter. We haven’t for a while because you weren’t here, Ada. We knew you wanted to hear it, so we waited. Legolas really wants to hear what comes next.”

Thran’s hand tightened on Bard’s, and Bard wondered if he’d tear up again. But Thran kept himself in control, and gave Legolas a rueful smile.

“I am very sorry to have delayed the story, Legolas. You were all kind to wait for me. So perhaps tonight, after the homework, we will have time to read the next part. I would like that very much.”
“Oh, goodie!” Tilda exclaimed. “Everyone, get your homework done so we can read!”

“Fine by me,” Bain shook his head. “I don’t want to spend any longer on that old pre-algebra than I have to. I hate it!”

“I don’t like it very much, either,” Legolas agreed, wrinkling his nose. “Kukla, did you get new French words today?”

“Yes! These are about animals!” Tilda divulged, and the discussion quickly turned to the day’s events at school and the homework to be done this evening.

All told, he and Thran had gotten off easily – for now. The considering look on Sigrid’s face revealed that she was not completely convinced. Bard sighed, not surprised that he’d typed his eldest daughter’s reaction so accurately. The weight of the day’s rigors descended on him all at once, from the ache in his shoulders and back from his exertions in the barn, to the knot in his stomach that had only recently started to ease. Even the caring and positive way he and Thran had talked this afternoon had taken a lot of energy. All he really wanted to do was put supper on the table, then retire to the soaking tub until all tension melted away. The last thing he needed was to let Sigrid ambush him later tonight, once the other children were in bed, when he’d have even less energy to talk sense to her.

He squeezed Thran’s hand before letting it go, then caught Sigrid’s eye as he got up. He looked out to the kitchen, then back at her, and she got up to follow him without hesitation. He led the way through the hall and main room and into the ballroom.

“All right, have at,” he exhaled.

“About what?”

“About whatever’s simmering behind those big brown eyes.”

“I know Thran didn’t come home last night.”

“Oh?”

“My room overlooks the driveway, Da. I listen every night for him to come home, and I know he didn’t last night.”

“And?”

“And you went out this morning. You did a lousy parking job when you came back, because you were upset. Thran’s parked beside you, so he came in after you. And Rahmiel’s gone.”

Bard nodded.

Sigrid’s expression hardened. “Did he cheat on you?”

“No.”

“Would you tell me if he had?”

“I wouldn’t have to. It’d be obvious. Wouldn’t it?”

“Ye-e-es,” Sigrid allowed. “What happened? Where was he?”

Bard exhaled. “He worked fifteen hours yesterday. He fell asleep in the UVB studio. One of the other dancers found him this morning and woke him up. He was appalled.”

“So where’d you go after we got on the bus?”

“The UVB studio. He was in sad shape. The guy who found him was helping him up just as I came in looking for him, and...” Bard grimaced. “I was stupid.”

“So you thought he’d cheated. You drove home, destroyed Rahmiel before he came home, and then the two of you had it out.”

Bard nodded.

Sigrid swallowed. “You’re sure he didn’t?”

“Absolutely and positively,” Bard was quiet, but adamant. “And don’t you pester him about it. He’s had one of the worst days of his life today, and it’s my fault.”

“He looks like death, and I don’t mean the character in that blessed ballet.”

Bard nodded yet again. “He’s exhausted. I said he can’t keep on the way he has been, and when he realized how much weight he’d lost, he agreed he'd let things get out of control. But that’s not just his fault, Sig. It’s mine, too, because I was worried and I didn’t say anything. So I’d let things get out of hand, too. We both made the problem, so we’ll both fix it. Does that answer everything you want to know?”

Sigrid folded her arms over her chest, and nodded at Bard’s hands. “Chin-ups have never done that to your hands.”

Bard grinned. “There’s always a first time.”

Sigrid rolled her eyes. “Gods, Da.”

Bard looped an arm around her shoulders. “Gods, Sig.” He jostled her. “Okay now?”

“Are you and Thran?”

Bard nodded. “He’s still your Ada. And my fy nghriad, my cariad.”

“Ew,” Sigrid mugged, pushing Bard away playfully. “Too much information, Da.”

“That’s never happened before,” he teased.

“It’s the second time in twenty-four hours,” Sigrid said, but without a smile, drawing Bard’s frown.

“Oh? Something I should know about?”

Sigrid nodded. “I talked to Finn last night.”

“You talk to Finn every night.”

“Yeah, I do,” she shrugged. “But last night he told me that Lance Dunmont’s never been back to school since Christmas.”

Bard’s eyes skewered hers. “He hasn’t?”

She shook her head. “The official story is that he’s moved with his grandmother to Florida or someplace.”

“I take it there’s another story that’s not so official.”

She nodded again. “Finn says the word is that the drug gang didn’t like him getting Angelo in trouble with us.”

Bard’s mouth went dry. “What else did Finn tell you?”

She shivered, and rubbed her arms with her hands as if she were cold. “Just that no one knows what really happened.” She looked up. “Have you heard anything?”

“Not a peep.”

“Finn offered to ask around, but I told him to stay the hell out of whatever it was.”

“He does not want anything to do with those thugs. If you’ve got any influence with him, absolutely tell him that if he brings it up again. He needs to stay away from them.”

“I’ve already told him, twelve ways ‘til Sunday,” Sigrid shivered again. “Finn’s such a doofus, Da. He really is. But he’s a sweet doofus, and I don’t want anything to happen to him.”

“If he keeps his nose of it, he’ll be fine,” Bard reassured her. He hoped that was true.

“I hope so.”

“Thanks for telling me. Now we’d better get back to the others before they eat all of the cheese and crackers.”

Sigrid smiled at him, and let him draw her back into the sitting room.

As the chatter resumed, Bard did his best to forget about a certain drug gang. He’d ask Thran to send Mr. Nori a discreet inquiry with all due speed.

Forewarned was forearmed.
Chapter 76

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint end a very long and trying day on a better note.

Chapter Notes

Translation Notes:

ty zoloto moyo = you are my treasure (Russian) ti yw fy drysor mawr = you are my treasure (Welsh)

Tilda is not the only one who loves John Astin (father of Sean Astin, who played our favorite Sam Gamgee) who played the dapper Gomez Addams who blew up his trains on a regular basis. So did I!

When Bard wandered into the kitchen with Sigrid close behind, Thran kept the other children focused on the cheese and crackers, and the stories of their school day. Better to give his husband and their eldest child the privacy Bard wanted, so as to clear the air completely. The glares he’d endured from Sigrid already were pointed enough; he well appreciated Bard’s warning about the depth of her anger once it was aroused. May all the gods favor them when Bard answered whatever questions she had – Thran did not want to face the claws of Clan Ffyrnig’s fiercest lioness.

He wouldn’t want to endure little Tilda’s disappointment, either. Sigrid might want to disembowel him if she thought he’d harmed her Da, but his little Kukla’s tears would be no easier to bear. Bain would show disgust, also not easy to suffer, but not as hard to swallow as the rage of the girls.

The worst would be Legolas. His son was so happy here, with a family at last. To force him from it would be unconscionable. That was another reason why Bard’s first instinct of his infidelity had stung so – how could Bard think he’d hurt their children so badly?

He had to put that hurt past him. Bard felt worse about it than he did, and no matter how relieved they both were at reconciliation, Bard would feel too ashamed to touch him past a hug. It would be up to Thran to ease him. That was fitting – it was Thran’s neglect that had put them in this situation, so it would be Thran’s attention that put them past it.

It wasn’t long before Bard and Sigrid rejoined them. Sigrid looked much lighter, and met his eyes with warmth. How funny it was to feel so relieved! Bard looked pensive, but winked at him and gave him a surreptitious thumbs-up. So the lioness was satisfied, and would not seek to disembowel him.
Bard stayed part of the general conversation long enough for the children to relate all of the day’s news. When they scattered to unpack their backpacks and change out of their school clothes, Bard headed to the kitchen to peruse the refrigerator for supper.

“What deliciousness do you plan for us tonight?” Thran asked as he followed Bard, the ravaged cheese platter in one hand, and the three boxes of crackers tucked under his other arm. He closed the boxes and put them in the pantry, and found the wrappers to package the leftover cheese for the refrigerator.

“I thought grilled salmon, fruit and nut quinoa, maybe roasted sweet potatoes, your usual stir fry veg, and some kind of fruit. We’ve got fresh raspberries, or canned peaches.”

“You know I am a glutton for raspberries,” Thran admitted. “All of the rest sounds delicious.”

“Tomorrow, I’m going to make you a big chicken pie, or Tandoori chicken. Or maybe Chicken Kiev. Russian food for a Russian dancer.”

Thran snickered as he got out the cutting board and his favorite chef’s knife. “Chicken Kiev is very much more French than Russian, but I like it. I want to take you to the Russian restaurant that Legolas and I like so much in the city. I think you and the children would like it. Then you can sample my favorite lamb stew, in the hopes that we could make something like it here.”

Bard gave him a smile. “We would like that. The children loved my description of the seafood café we went to on our first date. We could take them there, too. They’d love Kasim.”

“He would enjoy them, too. We will go there soon.”

“That’s a great idea,” Bard enthused, getting out the pantry bowl of sweet potatoes and the bags of dried fruits. “I’ll sort out the potatoes if you chop chop with your favorite knife on the veg.”

Thran decided tonight’s vegetables would be broccoli, red peppers, onions, carrots, and water chestnuts, so he peeled and chopped and sliced a big bowl full while Bard scrubbed six potatoes, poked each one several times with a knife, and put them in the oven to roast.

“Why do you stab them so many times?” Thran asked curiously. “Do you seek vengeance upon them?”

Bard laughed. “If you don’t stab them, they blow up in the oven. The water in them gets hot as they cook, turns to steam, and if you don’t put holes in them, there’s no way for the steam to vent, so they blow up. Bain thought that was funny, until I made him chisel the hard, dry remnants out of the stove once it was cold. He wasn’t so eager to make them explode after that.”

“Ah. Perfectly sensible.” Thran shook his head. “Why are boys so fascinated with ‘more stuff blows up?’”

“Not just boys,” Bard assured him. “There’s an oldie but goodie TV show that Tilda loves where one of the characters blows up his toy trains on a regular basis. She thinks that’s hysterical.”

“Our Sigrid does not like things that blow up?”

“She doesn’t need to. She’s fierce enough all on her own.”

“So she is. Did she grill you mercilessly?”

“As thoroughly as I’m about to grill this piece of salmon.” Bard exhale was long and audible, but his Thran smiled reassured Thran. “Don’t worry. You’re in the clear.”

“I admit I am relieved. I would not want to disappoint her. Not that this will happen again, but I want you to know that not only would I never think to hurt you, I would not think to hurt our children. That would be unbearable.”

Bard’s hands paused over the small bowl in which he’d mixed olive oil and spices. “I know. I’m so sorry, Thran.”

Thran circled the island to stand beside Bard. He stroked Bard’s back with a consoling hand. “You would never have thought what you did if I had not been foolish first, and I am sorry for that, too. We know what to do to help each other from now on, so let us think only about how to go on. And this excellent supper we make.”

He pressed a kiss on Bard’s hair, and offered him a squeeze. Bard smiled guiltily, and glanced at him before going back to mixing his spices. “I don’t deserve you.”

“You do, as much as I deserve you. Come, tell me how much of the fruit to chop chop for your quinoa.”

Thran chopped dried apricots to go with the raisins, dried cherries, dried cranberries, pine nuts, and pecans, as well as a whole onion. Bard set the quinoa on the flame, then shoveled the onions into their second biggest skillet to caramelize. He had a strange wire mesh contraption that he put the salmon into, then put it on the grill to cook. The mesh, Bard explained, kept the fish from falling apart when he turned it, and it also made it easy for him to tend it as well as the other dishes on the fire. While Bard worked his magic, Thran mustered Legolas and Tilda, who were today’s table crew; Sigrid and Bain would clean up after supper. When the quinoa was cooked, Thran dumped it into the skillet with the caramelized onions, then the dried fruit and nuts after it. Bard laid on with several Indian spices, which lent an exotic patina to the already delicious aromas. The vegetables went on to stir-fry, and very quickly everything was ready. Bard plated the fish, Thran fished the potatoes out of the oven, and the skillets went on the island with everything else.

“Go ahead and start the queue,” Bard beckoned as Thran stacked the plates by the fish. “That way you can have your pick before the horde descends.”

Snickering, Thran pointed behind Bard, where the children were already heading for the plates. “The horde has descended in a surprise attack.”

“We’re not a horde,” Tilda said with great dignity, as she took the plate Sigrid handed her. “We are a clan.”

“A hungry one,” Thran replied, ruffling Tilda’s dark hair. “I defer to the hungry children.”

“No, you don’t.” Sigrid pointedly put a plate in Thran’s hands. “We defer to the hungry dancer.”

Taking the plate, Thran offered Sigrid an ironic bow. “Yes, madam, as your Da would say.”

“Just somebody go,” Bain grumbled from the back of the line. “Some of us are hungry!”

The family dished their plates full. While it was no hardship for Thran to take something of everything, given Bard’s delicious dishes, it was a decidedly different situation to be able to eat everything he wanted, even dessert, though it was only store-bought ice cream and cookies. When was the last time that had been the case? Perhaps when he was a teenager in Russia. He mused about those days as he helped put the few leftovers into bins for the refrigerator, then made tea. As the children settled to their homework around the kitchen table, Thran regarded them with curiosity.
“The upstairs is now painted, and all the detritus is out of your nice study now. Why do you still choose the kitchen table?”

The children looked up, but Bain was the first one to speak. “No lamps.”

“Of course,” Bard winced as he filled his teacup. “I forgot about them, didn’t I? We’ll do a run on the junk shops again this Saturday, if any of you want to go. Or Sunday, depending on when you’ll be home, Thran, if you want to go, too.”

“Sunday is for your art. I will see how things go with the ballet for Saturday.”

“Saturday it is, then. Who’s coming?”

“I am,” Tilda announced. “Could we stop at the bookstore?”

“What not the cheese shop, too?” Bard teased.

“I guess I can go there, too, if you really, really want me to,” Tilda teased back.

“Oh, you will, will you?” Bard grinned. “What about the rest of you?”

“Finn’s coming out to see Killian,” Sigrid looked up with pleading eyes. “He asked me to come along with them and Tara to see a film in the afternoon, then have supper at Tara’s house. May I go?”

“You know the deal, Sig. If your homework’s done.”

Sigrid bit her lip. “I know it won’t be, Da. I’ve got a paper to write, but if I work on it all week, Saturday morning, and then Sunday to finish it, could I still go?”

Bard considered. “I appreciate your honesty, sweetness. You’ve been great so far about getting everything done this year, so we’ll give this a shot. Just don’t leave so much for Sunday that you can’t finish it.”

Sigrid’s smile was grateful. “I won’t. Thanks, Da.”

“What about you two, lads? Maybe after your fencing, Legs? Bain, you can come along with us when we drop off Legolas at the Gondors’.”

“I’m not particular about a lamp, as long as it’s not one of those weird globular flower things,” Bain shrugged.

“Oh, I like those!” Sigrid exclaimed.

“No surprise there,” Bain rolled his eyes.

“I’m not particular, either,” Legolas said, “but I don’t want a flower one any more than Bain does.”

“Okay, two non flowery lamps on the list,” Bard grinned. “Til, it’s you and me, and maybe a dancer who’ll be just as glad to go to the cheese shop as you will.”

“Goodie!” Tilda clapped her hands, looking at Thran. “I hope you can come, too, Ada, but if you can’t, I’ll get you something.”

“Thank you, Kukla. Tomorrow we will hammer out a new schedule for the ballet, so I will see about Saturday. Bard, do you think the ballroom will be ready by Friday?”
“That’s my plan,” Bard nodded. “Oh, I received an email from the children’s school this afternoon while you were napping. Children, we’ll let you get back to your studies. We’ll be in the sitting room if you need us.”

Thran and Bard carried their tea into the sitting room, where Bard settled on the sofa. Thran found a CD to play, an interesting collection of Middle Eastern instrumental music that provided a good if exotic ambient background for the children’s homework.

“Where did this CD come from?” Thran asked.

“The resale bin at the library,” Bard explained. “It was fifty cents or something. It looked interesting, and the price was right. I found it helped the children focus on their homework, because it’s not obtrusive, it cuts background noise, but it’s interesting at the same time. A bit exotic. I like it.”

“Do they have a resale bin at our local library? We should look for it. And get a card.”

“Good idea. Maybe I’ll stop in for one on Friday when I go into the school.”

“Yes, you said you got an email from the school? I hope none of the children are in trouble.”

“Not at all. I’m going in Friday to see what we need to do to qualify for our tuition reduction. Once the ballroom is done, I’ll have more time, and I’ll take care of that for us.”

“What time on Friday?” Thran asked. “I do not want you to shoulder all of this for us, lyubov moyav.”

“I don’t mind going in and finding out the particulars for us. I’m sure they have a packet of explanation or something about it. That’s what the paper said that was in the introductory packet they gave us when the children first enrolled. So I’ll get that, hear what they have to say, and then you and I can decide what we want to do.”

“All right,” Thran agreed. “Now, until the children need us for their homework, Bard, would now be a good time for you to work on your sketches for Bilbo?”

Bard’s smile was wry. “Thank you for making it a question. Yes, I would like to work on my sketches. Maybe I could get you to pose for some?”

Thran lowered his lashes and gave his husband a small smile. The expression brought a flush to Bard’s cheeks.

“I didn’t mean those kind of poses.”

“Pity. What kind did you mean?”

“Poses I can display in public, you.”

“I suppose I can manage that.”

Bard smothered a grin, and got up to fetch his pencils and sketchpad from the solarium. He settled on the sofa to Thran’s left, made himself comfortable, and considered the blank sheet only briefly before he started to sketch. In short order, a belly dancer appeared, surely brought to mind because of the exotic music playing softly in the background. One arm stretched up, fingers gesturing like a flame; the other curled out and then down towards her hip. Skirts swirled to reveal bare feet, and a sinuous torso spoke of powerful feminine mysteries. A musician curled around his tabla went in the background to offer a crouched contrast to the dancer’s elongated limbs.
“I like that one,” Thran complimented. “Does it bother you if I watch you so closely?”

Bard shook his head. “Not at all. In fact, you can help. Tell me something to draw.”

“Hmm,” Thran considered, intrigued. “Did Tilda ever play the schoolyard game of hopscotch?”

“She did,” Bard nodded, eyes brightening. “That’s a good one.”

The expressive lines that defined Bard’s spare style flickered over the page, and soon Tilda as a tot appeared in mid-jump, laughing. Her father’s affection permeated each line, making it a joyful celebration.

They sat there side by side for several minutes, Thran providing inspiration for Bard’s efforts. When he’d done four sketches, Bard gave Thran a glance.

“Would you hold up your left hand? There’s this way you hold it when you dance that I like. It’s like this,” Bard stretched out his arm, palm down, fingers extended, the ring finger a bit lower than the others, “only more elegant.”

“That is how I hold it in an arabesque.” He turned slightly away from Bard so that he could stretch his arm out in front of them both. “It is like this?”

Bard nodded. “Almost. Would you pretend you’re reaching out, but move very slowly so I tell you when to hold still at the part I like?”

“Of course.” Thran hitched forward a bit on the sofa until his spine was properly aligned, then looked back at Bard. “My hand will be roughly here when I reach out. That is the right place for you to draw it?”

“That’ll be perfect.”

“All right. I start to move... now.”

He moved just as he would on the dance floor, but slowly, arm stretching out, fingers extending the expression that began at the shoulder –

“Right there.”

Thran stilled.

“Perfect. I’d like to do a more detailed one, so tell me when you get tired.”

Thran held the pose for perhaps three minutes before his shoulder grew painful. “I put my hand down now.”

“Thank you, cariad. I’ve got it.”

Thran slid back against the cushions to peer at Bard’s sketchpad. This one was not in Bard’s usual spare calligraphic style, but a more delicate drawing of thin, pale lines that looked like something out of an ancient book, perhaps as Da Vinci would have drawn in his notebooks.

“This one is so different,” Thran observed as Bard continued to fill in his outline with more detail.

“Every now and then I like to do one that’s more realist than impressionist,” Bard replied, his attention on the paper. “A realistic one takes me a lot longer, and I have to concentrate on different things, so it has to be a subject that I enjoy so that I don’t rush through it. Believe it or not, your hands are one of the most beautiful things about you. They’re a joy to watch, whether you’re dancing or not. Such long fingers, and that little dip of your ring finger... that makes it.”

“You make it,” Thran said softly, as the sketch appeared one small line at a time, as if it emerged from the mist. “I have never seen you sketch like this before.”

“It takes a lot of warmup,” Bard admitted. “Give me a few minutes...”

Thran sat quietly as his husband worked on the sketch, oblivious to all else. His expression was very internal as if listening to his muse, an almost frown of concentration. The only break in his efforts was to sharpen his pencil not once, but twice, to keep the lines from thickening. To watch it develop was magical, for all that there were no tricks involved. Perhaps forty minutes went by before Bard looked up.

“You were in deep conversation with your muse,” Thran offered.

Bard blinked, then nodded. “I was. It’s not quite finished yet, but it’s close.”

“It is beautiful, even if you say it is unfinished. So expressive.”

Bard’s right hand reached out to span his thigh. “Of course it is. It’s a dancer’s hand. The hand of an angel.”

“Oh, lyubov moya, I speak of the drawing, not the hand.”

Bard’s hand tightened on Thran’s thigh. “I draw what I see, that’s all.”

“You draw what you feel, too. That is what I see in this. And great skill.”

Bard gave Thran a crooked smile. “I’d like to do more like this, if your hand is willing.”

“My hand is ready to pose for you however and whenever there is a moment. Also the other one. It already feels quite jealous that you have not yet immortalized it.”

That roused a chuckle from his husband. “I’ll remedy that another time. I’m good for only one example of realism at a time. It takes it out of me.”

Tilda stuck her head in the sitting room. “Would you do my French words, Ada?”

“Of course,” Thran beckoned. “They are about animals, yes?”

Tilda trotted in with her vocabulary sheet. “Yes! We saw a film about them today. It’s all in French, but I sort of got the idea about part of it. Once we learn the animal names, it’ll make more sense, and then Monsieur Cornett will help us understand the verbs. It’s not a very hard film. It’s for little children, but we kind of are about the language, even though we’re older, so it’s fun. It’s to get us used to what French sounds like when real French people speak it.”

“Very wise,” Thran nodded, taking the paper Tilda passed to him. “So let us see what sense we can make of the animals.”

“If you and Til sit on the other sofa, I can sketch while you practice,” Bard asked.

“Of course. Come, Kukla, let us give your Da a good scene to sketch.”

As he and Tilda ran through the words, Bard sketched away. A few more shreds of his upset from this morning drifted away, as he and Tilda played with the words, and Bard sketched easily. Before long, the other children drifted in as they finished their homework. Sigrid was the last one to appear.

“I like that music,” she commented, experimenting with a couple of dance steps. “Sounds like belly dance music. Very hypnotic.”

“It makes me think we’re in a bazaar,” Legolas agreed.

“Have you ever been in a real bazaar?” Tilda asked.

“I haven’t,” Legolas shook his head, “but Papa has. Istanbul, I think?”

“Really?” Bain asked, wide eyed. “Did it have those cobras in the baskets?”

“If they did, I did not see them,” Thran demurred, laughing. “I think they are in Indian bazaars more than Turkish ones. I saw a lot of everything else, though. The Turkish Grand Bazaar is famous all over the world for all its beautiful wares. Jewelry, lanterns, clothing, shoes, so many things. There is a pair of lanterns in the main room with the other boxes that I bought there. I had forgotten about them until now, Sigrid. Perhaps we could put them in the solarium this summer, Bard?”

“Oh, I remember those lanterns, Papa!” Legolas exclaimed. “I liked them, too. Yes, let’s put them in the solarium!”

“Can we see them?” Tilda asked in a hopeful voice.

“Of course,” Thran got up. “Where is the torch, Bard? We have no light yet in that room, either.”

“It’s in the mudroom,” Bard put his sketchbook aside. “I’ll get it. You lead the horde to the box.”

“Clan, Da, not horde!” Tilda rolled her eyes.

“You look just like Sigrid when you do that,” Bard teased her as he headed for the mudroom. He came after the rest of the family into the main room where the boys were already prowling through the boxes.

“Here they are!” Legolas announced, easing a tightly packaged cardboard carton out of the mix and handing it to Sigrid. He took another slightly smaller box in his arms. Both were shabby, evidence of their journey from halfway around the world.

“Let us bring them into the sitting room,” Thran urged, and they retraced their steps back into better light. Bard had already seen how well wrapped the boxes were, so when he returned the torch to the mudroom, he came back with a box cutter. Thran neatly slit the heavy tape from the seams of the first one, and opened the flaps as the children gathered around. He lifted out a huge wad of packing material, inside of which was a beautiful melon-shaped lamp in deep blue ribbed glass with brass fittings at the one of the rounded ends, and a brass finial at the other. A chain at the top end showed how it would hang.

“That’s amazing,” Sigrid breathed, reaching out to touch the glass. “Such a deep color.”

“The market was amazing,” Thran said, holding the lantern out to Legolas to hold. “Imagine so many of these beautiful lamps, hung from the roof of the stall in all colors. The other one is also blue, but not a solid color – a mosaic.”

Thran got the second box open. This lantern was more of a squashed sphere – an oblate spheroid, Sigrid called it with a laugh – with brass fittings on top and bottom, but instead of the solid blue glass, it was a mosaic of small tessellations in blue, white, green, and yellow, with small spots of red “Wow,” Bain leaned forward to look at it closer. “How did they get all those small pieces together in such a curved shape? That’s something!”

“I like this one best, too,” Legolas grinned at Bain. “It looks like the inside of a kaleidoscope.”

“It does,” Tilda agreed.

“They’re both amazing.” Bard carefully took the melon lamp from Legolas. “They’d be perfect out in the solarium.”

“Will you work on that room next, Da?” Bain asked.

“I’ll do the bathroom down here next, then we can vote on the next room. The solarium, dining room, main room, and mudroom are all still on the list.”

“Solarium!” was the unanimous chorus from the children.

“Yeah, Da,” Tilda bounced on the sofa. “Spring is coming, and we can have our garden room ready for it.”

“I like that, too,” Bard agreed. “Thran?”

“I make it unanimous. The solarium after the bathroom.”

“That’ll be fun to work on. Did you ever hear back from Mrs. Mathom about whether she found screens like you wanted?”

“I think she did, but I have not gotten back to her. I will check and tell her that perhaps Saturday we will visit?”

Bard nodded vigorously. “That’s good. Okay, you lot, the renovation schedule’s set for the next bit. Has everyone finished their homework?”

“I want to work on my paper, so I’ll head upstairs and get through the shower,” Sigrid said.

“The rest of us are done. So we can read!” Tilda declared. “Harry Potter!”

“One more thing before we read,” Bard asked. “I’m off to the market tomorrow. If you have a request that’s not on the list in the kitchen, speak now.”

While the children discussed what they wanted for lunches this week, Bard helped Thran pack the lanterns away with care. They set the lantern boxes in the solarium while Legolas got out their book. The next chapter was duly read, and the younger children headed upstairs to shower and get ready for bed.

“I may have to get in the tub tonight,” Bard grimaced, as he and Thran relaxed on the sofa. “I ache all over.”

“I am not surprised,” Thran offered a consoling stroke on Bard’s arm. “How many chin-ups did you do this morning?”

“Enough to make me regret it now,” Bard gave a shamefaced wince. “The less said about that, the better.”
“I will run the tub for you. May I join you?”

“Of course. I might need to find the ibuprofen, too.”

“Then let us go upstairs, and see to the children, then we will see to each other.”

“Rounds first.”

“Of course.”

They circled through the rooms, checking doors and windows and lights, then slowly headed upstairs. Tilda was already in bed, glad to settle with Mr. Bun in her arms. She bid her parents goodnight with a sleepy smile and a kiss for each.

“I’m glad you’re back, Ada,” she murmured, drawing the covers close. “I like to do my French words and read with you.”

“I like both of those, too, Russkaya Kukla,” Thran stroked her hair out of her eyes. “I will see to it that we do more of both, and many other things.”

Thran moved out of the way for Bard to hug his daughter good night. “Night, little doll. You and Mr. Bun sleep well.”

“Monsieur Lapin,” Tilda dimpled. “Bonne nuit!”

“Bonne nuit,” Thran grinned.

“Just plain bye from me,” Bard chuckled. “See you in the morning.”

They left Tilda to her slumber, then split to see to their sons. As Thran came into Legolas’s room, his son looked up from his bed with a somber look.

“What is it, synok?”

“Is everything all right with Bard now?” he asked diffidently.

Thran sat beside Legolas and put an arm around him. “Everything is all right, Legolas. I have been very foolish to let myself get so swept away. I apologize to you for being so thoughtless. I did not answer all of your texts, and I missed so much of everything. That was not right of me.”

“I missed you,” Legolas admitted. “Which is sort of strange. I mean, in boarding school you weren’t there, and while I thought about you many times, I didn’t miss you as the term went on, I suppose because I got used to knowing that you were not nearby.”

“But now you are not at boarding school, and I am not away, and we live in a house together with the rest of our clan. It is more normal, until I made it not normal. Again, I apologize to you.”

“Thank you,” Legolas’s arm tightened around Thran’s waist. “Did Bard... try to hit you?”

“No. A thousand times no. In fact, even though he was very, very angry with me, and rightly so, he took great pains only to yell, nothing more. He went out in the barn and did many chin-ups until his anger passed. Our Bard is not one to use violence, no matter how angry he is.”

“He punched the drug gang people in the park. I was glad he did that. I was glad you did that.”
“He defended us well. That is the man he is – fierce on our behalf, but gentle with us.”

“I’m glad he didn’t hit you.”

“It is not in his nature, Legolas. Rest easy. He is a good man.”

“Okay, Papa. I like him. I like being in our clan. The other children don’t tease me, they like me for being me, and we help each other. I don’t want to leave here, ever.”

“We will not leave here, ever – at least not until you go to college. By that time, you may be glad to go from this house of such a fierce clan, yes?”

Legolas smiled at Thran’s joke, easing his tension.

“We are safe here, and loved here. Do not worry. Bard cares about you very much, as well as me.”

“He played video games with Bain and me. He isn’t very good yet, but he kept trying, and he was a good sport. And he’s really good at Dinky Farm. I know Bain says he dislikes that game, but he doesn’t dislike it that much. It was fun playing it with him, Kukla, and Bard.”

“He looks after us well. I am glad that he was here with you when I was not. There will still be times when I will not be here. I do not like that, but I feel better knowing that Bard will see to things when I cannot.”

Legolas nodded. “Yes, that’s good. And if it means that you will be here more, then I’m glad he got mad.”

“Life makes things that seem bad turn out well,” Thran gave an exaggerated shrug. “Now, it is time for bed. Rest well, and I will see you at breakfast tomorrow.”

“I love you, Papa.”

“I love you, too, Legolas.”

Thran gave both of Legolas’s green braids a gentle tug, then a kiss on the forehead, and let himself out. Bard was waiting outside to tell Legolas goodnight, so Thran went in to wish Bain goodnight. He didn’t expect Bain to say much more than goodnight, so he was surprised when Bain looked up at him and shrugged.

“I’m glad you and Da aren’t mad at each other.”

“So am I. But he was right to be angry with me. I needed him to tell me to take better care of myself, and of all of us. Your Da is a good man.”

Bain smiled unexpectedly. “Thanks. I think he’s the best. But don’t tell him I said that.”

Thran held up his hand. “My lips are sealed. He is very proud of you, too. Sleep well, and I will see you tomorrow morning.”

“Oh, Thran. You sleep well, too.”

“Thank you. I will.”

Thran shut the door behind him, to find Bard exiting Legolas’s room. “One more to go,” he grinned, pointing to Sigrid’s door. “Brace yourself.”
“I am braced,” Thran mugged, and in they went.

“How’s the paper coming, sweetness?” Bard asked, when Sigrid had answered his knock.

“It’s coming. ‘The Medical Implications of the Assassination of James Garfield.’ I thought it’d be boring, but it’s not bad at all. He was an interesting guy.”

“Ah,” Thran said. “He was the president who was assassinated around 1900, yes?”

“1881,” Sigrid nodded. “That’s the one.”

“There were medical implications?” Bard asked.

“There will be when I finish my paper,” Sigrid grinned. “It’s my opinion he wouldn’t have died if he’d gotten good medical care. The whole thing was mishandled from the get go, and he died of sepsis because of all the people poking at him, and so on and so forth. He was pretty smart, and if he hadn’t died, he would have likely changed a lot that followed for the better. Medical care changed because of his death, too. That’s the point of my paper.”

“I’m sure you’ll make it very convincing,” Bard gave her a kiss. “Don’t stay up too late.”

“I won’t. And don’t you two get so out of sync again. I’m going to hound both of you to make sure you stay on track from now on.”

Thran bent down to give Sigrid a hug. “I am sorry I was so neglectful. I hurt you and your siblings and especially your Da. I love you all very much, and do not want to worry any of you. It is good that you will help me with this.”

Thran’s ready apology caught Sigrid off guard, and her mock sternness fell away. Her arms went around Thran’s neck and she gave him a swift, hard hug. “I’ll hold you to that, Ada. I mean it.”

“So do I. Now tell your Da good night, and we will leave you to your paper.”

“Okay. Night, Da. Sleep well.”

“I will, sweetness. Sleep well, too. See you in the morning.”

She nodded as Thran and Bard drew her door shut behind them.

“We’ve apologized to everyone at last,” Bard exhaled, giving Thran a weary look. “I’m for the tub.”

“With all speed,” Thran agreed.

In a few minutes, they settled in the soaking tub. Thran wound his braid around his head and got in; poor Bard swallowed a dose of ibuprofen before he followed Thran. He hunched down until his shoulders were under the water, humming with relief as the warmth soaked into him.

“Gods, that’s the last time I try to do fifty chin-ups without working up to them,” Bard groaned softly.

“Fifty!” Thran echoed, appalled. “Not so many!”

Bard hung his head and exhaled. “I was angry. Now I’m paying for it. Fitting, that.”

“It is over. We have apologized to each other and the children, and we have plans so that such a thing does not happen again. So do not despair. We have weathered the storm. That makes me very “I’m happy, too. But I’m still ashamed of myself for what I did. If I’d just stayed there, I would’ve known soon enough what’d happened.”

Thran sighed. “Perhaps. But... as awful as this was, perhaps it had to be, to make enough of an impression that we changed. Little else could have shaken my obsession with Immortal, or convinced you that you had to speak up.”

Bard stayed hunched under the water, his back against Thran’s chest, for some seconds. “Do you really think so, or do you say that to help me feel better?”

“I want to help you feel better, but I think I said the truth, too. My obsession and your reticence are both deeply rooted. We needed a conflagration to wake up. Both of us.”

A hand under the water snaked around Thran’s leg to grasp his knee. “I think you’re right.”

“So do not despair. All is well. We are stronger going forward.”

The body against his relaxed, and Bard’s head came to rest against his chest. “Okay. Okay.”

Their conversation lapsed as they soaked in the hot water. Bard might be the one most in need of the heat, but it worked its magic on Thran’s weary body, too. By the time the water cooled, he was relaxed and ready for bed. That didn’t mean he was ready for sleep, however. One he and Bard were warm and dry and ensconced under the covers, Thran curled at Bard’s side, his head on Bard’s shoulder and his arm over Bard’s chest.

“How are your scrapes?”

“Not so bad. It’s just one part that stings, so it’s bearable.”

“Good. Your shoulders are easier, too?”

“Thank goodness. The ibuprofen’s kicked in, and the hot water helped, too. I won’t have any trouble getting to sleep.”

Thran’s hand traced over Bard’s chest lightly, tracing circles over it. As one finger grazed a nipple, Bard’s breath caught, so he did it again, this time more purposefully. Bard’s hand caught his.

“Thran –”

“Don’t make me stop,” Thran whispered. “Please, lyubov moya.”

“After what I did, how can you –”

“Because I love you. Because you blame yourself, and I do not want you to. If I had not been so thoughtless, you would not have thought what you did. Please, lyubov moya, let me show you how much I love you.”

“But I was so stupid –”

“Shh,” Thran urged, slipping atop Bard to kiss him. “All is well. All is well.”

Thran crouched atop Bard, his hands full of Bard’s hair as he kissed lips, throat, shoulders. He traced fingers down Bard’s chest to find nipples that had not been touched in two weeks, and there was no more talk of anything as Bard’s arousal took him. It was such a delight to suckle both of them, to feel Bard’s muscular cock rise hard against Thran’s abdomen. Thran rolled over, drawing Bard with him, to reverse their positions.

“Please, my saint, make love to me. I want to be your angel again.”

“You’re sure?”

“Very sure. Please, lyubov moya. Make me yours again.”

Bard reached for the lubricant, but it was Thran who slicked himself, then Bard’s cock. A few seconds of Thran’s stroking and petting were all that Bard could endure before he eased inside Thran. Thran wrapped legs around Bard and pulled him close to kiss and stroke.

“Oh, gods, I’ve missed you so much,” Bard whispered. “So, so much.”

“Mmm... mmm. I love you inside me so deeply, so completely.” Thran arched his back, then bowed forward, shuddering as each little movement sent ripples of pleasure through him. He traced fingers up Bard’s back, then down over his buttocks to knead and massage, as he drew him deeper into him. “Slowly, my saint. Please, make it last. It is so good, so good...”

“You’re so tight... I don’t know if I can last very long – oh, gods, angel, I’m in so deep – No, don’t – don’t touch my nipples, or I won’t be able to stop – stop myself! Gods, no! Oh, I’m coming, I’m coming now – ”

Bard spasmed deep within Thran, his hips thrusting over and over as his orgasm consumed him. Before either of them could touch Thran’s cock, he followed his husband over the edge, wrapping himself around Bard to join him in release. He bit back a cry as ecstasy took him, and wound hands in Bard’s hair to pull him into an all-consuming kiss.

“Oh, gods, oh, gods,” Thran whispered, as Bard’s weight pressed against him. He stroked Bard’s back and kneaded his buttocks, savoring the solid substance of him as he pressed a kiss against Bard’s temple. “Ty zoloto moyo, velikoye zoloto. Ya lyublyu tebya.”

Bard eased out, and slid up enough to kiss him tenderly on the lips. “Ti yw fy drysor mawr, cariad. Garu di.”

They lay there for some seconds, savoring their closeness and the release they’d shared. They rose together to wash, and slipped back to bed to hold each other close. Thran was nearly asleep when Bard spoke softly into the dark.

“You’re still my angel, Thran. You always will be.”

“My saint,” Thran breathed, and pressed a kiss on Bard’s wedding ring.

Thran’s last thought before he fell asleep was relief.
Chapter 77

Chapter Summary

Harmony has been restored, a ballroom moves closer to its debut, and Ori proves his worth not once, but twice.

The Tuesday morning ritual was far from old hat this morning, because the atmosphere in the house was so much lighter. For one thing, Thran didn’t bat out of the house before the children; he was beside Bard in the kitchen as they made the children’s breakfasts and lunches. Bard made a quick omelet full of veg and cheese for them both, as well as tea and toast, which they ate alongside the children at the table, rather than over the kitchen island as they worked. Thran dashed to pack his bag as the children collected their things, and then it was time for the bus stop run. Bard was touched to see that all of the children, even Bain, hugged Thran goodbye as the bus trundled down the lane.

“Don’t you dare let UVB kill off their prize dancer!” Sigrid hissed as she hugged Thran. “I mean it, Ada! What good is their ballet if they kill you before it’s ever performed?”

“She has a point,” Bard observed, standing beside Thran as Sigrid headed for the bus with a wave.

“So she has,” Thran exhaled. “A most excellent point. One I may be so crass as to state today if needed. Lettie and I will talk about what we will do so that we do not kill any of us from now on. Ah, I forgot to mention yesterday – when you go to the school Friday, would you please ask who we might talk to about whether the school is a possible venue for Immortal during the festival?”

“I will. I found out from Rosie that the Greenwood Dale on the Lake Art Festival is July sixteenth through the twenty-fourth. So I’ll ask the school. Oh, there’s something I forgot to mention yesterday, too. When Sigrid and I talked, she told me that Lance Dunmont, the boy who started the mess in the park on Christmas Day, has gone missing.”

Thran shot him a serious look. “That is not good.”

“No, it’s not. Finn told Sigrid that the official story was that he relocated to Florida with his grandmother. The unofficial story is that the drug gang took him out because he got Angelo in trouble.”

“Oh, gods,” Thran gulped.

“My sentiments, exactly,” Bard jammed his hands into his pockets and hunched into his coat against the cold. “I told her to tell Finn to keep the hell away from those guys, and she said she’d already told him that, in the same emphatic fashion. You might want to ask your Mr. Nori about it.”

Thran hummed. “It might be wise to inquire, yes. I will ask Ori if he knows anything. I would hate to think that we are at risk.”

“I hope they decide to claim a moral victory because they drove us out, and let it go at that. Or figure out that without their boy trying to show off, this whole thing could have been avoided.” Bard winced. “Lance was stupid, granted. But that’s a hell of a reason to end up in a ditch somewhere.”

Thran shivered as they came in through the mudroom door. “I do not know what they expected us to... do, either. From what the children told me, the gang boys attacked Legolas before he could retreat. The children tried to retreat after they freed him, too, and the gang prevented them once more. Did they think I would not defend my son? That you would not do the same?”

“I don’t know, angel,” Bard shook his head as he hung up his coat and followed Thran into the kitchen. He had the bento boxes for Thran’s lunch already out, and he pulled food out of the fridge to fill them. “To our lights, there’s no sense in it. But to theirs, there’s turf to defend, and even though we tried not to engage, the gang’s rivals might have seen our score as a sign that Angelo’s gang is weak and ripe to take over. Let’s hope we’re far enough away that we’re not worth bothering about.”

“I will talk to Ori this morning. If he knows nothing, I will speak to Mr. Nori directly.”

Despite the serious nature of their conversation, Bard couldn’t suppress a grin. “Mr. Nori gets a title, but Ori doesn’t. Is Ori’s full name Ori Nori, then, or does the mysterious ginger-haired expediter choose to go by his first name?”

Thran’s face eased into a smile. “Their surname is Goldman. From the little I have gleaned, Mr. Nori chooses to... distance himself from others of that name. His business interests range... farther afield.”

Bard’s chuckle was rich. “I bet they do. I’m putting the rest of the quinoa in with your salmon and veg. And grapes. And a stack of peanut butter crackers. And here’s a bin of the bean and ham soup for Lettie.”

“Such a lot of food!”

“So you’ll have a choice. What you don’t eat, bring back, and the children will.”

“And then they will yell at me for not eating.”

“Probably,” Bard grinned. “Don’t cop out and feed the leftovers to any other hungry dancers.”

“Or Ori,” Thran conceded. “Irmo has run him ragged, but Ori has kept up with him. I will speak to him about how we can rein Irmo in from now on.”

“Another reason to get a library card,” Bard observed, stacking Thran’s boxes and putting the elastic strap around them. “If Irmo’s autistic, maybe there are books we can read.”

“Another good idea. Now, I must go. Thank you for the bin of soup for Lettie. I’m sure she will enjoy it. I will be home at a reasonable hour for supper if I have to quit the ballet to do so.”

Bard looked up, swallowing as he handed Thran the bento boxes to tuck in his bag. “I don’t want you to quit, angel. I know doing Immortal means a lot to you. Just... as Sigrid said, don’t kill yourself doing it. Please.”

“I will not. I will text you when I leave the UVB studio, so you know when I will be here.”

“Okay.” Bard took Thran’s shoulders in his hands to give him a kiss. “Safe journey, and good luck with Irmo.”

“I will need it. But the rest of the company will be with me, so we will prevail.”

Bard followed Thran to the mudroom, holding his husband’s bag so he could put on his coat. He handed the bag over, put on his own coat, and offered one more kiss before they went out together. “I’m off to the market, See you tonight.”
“I love you, my saint. Until later.”

“Love you, too, angel.”

They got into their vehicles, and Bard followed Thran out to the lane. He waved when he turned into the market parking lot, and Thran waved back in the rear view mirror. Then it was into the market to stock Clan Ffyrnig’s empty pantry.

As much painting that waited for Bard at home, he didn’t rush down the aisles. Visiting the market was something he enjoyed, and he took time to savor the sights, sounds, and smells. The colorful produce displays, the tempting aromas emanating from the bakery ovens, the variety of seafood, even the colorful stacks of canned goods and yogurt – all offered possibilities for delicious meals his family would enjoy. The amount of stuff that ended up in his cart still made him wince, but all were things he needed to keep six busy people well fueled. He chose several things to add to Thran’s diet, such as dark meat chicken as well as white meat. He got some lamb, too; he’d look on the Internet for a recipe for Russian lamb stew that might approximate Thran’s favorite treat.

The hour was still early, so there were few people in the market to slow Bard as he made his way methodically down the aisles and through the checkout line. He loaded everything into the back of the truck, headed home, and got everything stowed. After a quick trip upstairs to change his clothes, he headed to the ballroom. He had woodwork to paint.

The morning proceeded quickly as he carefully embellished the ballroom’s freshly painted walls with glossy white woodwork. The day was so overcast and gloomy that not much light filtered in through the ballroom windows, so Bard was glad of the new fixtures he’d put in the ceiling. They might not provide the best aesthetic match for the rest of the room, but their bright light was welcome, and the portable CD player added a variety of music to speed Bard’s work. It was easy to imagine the dancers who would soon grace this room, bringing their artistry and beauty to the restored space. He worked steadily, plying his paintbrush and plastic paint guard to keep his brush strokes from impinging on the freshly painted walls. Thank the gods that most of the woodwork was straight expanses up the wall; the curved sections took more care to keep smudges from the walls, and therefore more time. He broke for lunch, eating the last bowl of the bean and ham soup as he pounded chicken breasts flat for Chicken Kiev. Thran wasn’t one much for fried food, and Bard generally had too much going on in the kitchen to want to mind a frying pan full of hot oil, so he’d found an online recipe for a baked version that sounded good. He made the garlic butter and froze it for a few minutes, then put small pieces of it on the flattened chicken breasts. He rolled the pieces up tightly, dipped the packets in egg and seasoned flour, and put them in a pan in the fridge to wait for dinner. Then it was back to the ballroom.

He hoped Thran had made out as well as he did this morning.

* * *

Good, Lettie’s car was already in the UVB parking lot when Thran pulled in. So was Ori’s. Irmo’s, thank the gods, was not. Thran hefted his bag and strode in with purpose, intent on making the most of the time they had before Irmo appeared.

“Thran!” Ori heralded as Thran came in. The small man was still in his coat with his scarf bundled around his neck, and a thick knitted watchman’s cap was pulled down over his ears. His face was all wrinkled brow and worried eyes. “Good morning! I hope you’re feeling better.”
“Very much so,” Thran greeted. “And you? I hope you are somewhat restored, as well.”

“I slept all day yesterday,” Ori admitted with a shrug. “I was so tired I thought I’d never catch up! But the long nap and a full night’s sleep after, and I’m feeling human again.”

“I have something to ask you,” Thran said. At Ori’s inquiring look, he drew them down into two of the lobby chairs to pass on Bard’s story about the missing Dunmont boy. Ori’s expression never twitched, but his gentle appearance was not the extent of his true nature; his lips tightened the slightest bit, giving him something of his brother’s hardness.

“May I ask you how you heard this?” Ori murmured.

“A previous classmate of one of the children. We have passed the word back to this person in the strongest terms not to inquire further.”

“A wise precaution, though in this case, it’s likely no longer material.”

Thran arched an eyebrow at Ori, who tapped a finger against his bottom lip and looked thoughtful.

“May I ask what that means?”

“It’s not a good idea, no,” Ori sighed, shaking his head. He picked distractedly at the fringe of his knitted scarf.

“I want only to know whether my family is in danger from retaliation over a situation we tried to avoid.”

“Understandable.” Ori considered, debating with himself, before he turned solemn brown eyes on Thran. He hugged his bag close to his body, and leaned towards Thran. “Please, you will be discreet? Nori won’t like that I’ve told you.”

“Of course.”

“I don’t know the particulars about the Dunmont boy, I don’t want to know, and neither do you. Whatever happened, Angelo decided that serving twenty-five years for the charges pertaining to you, your family, and Sergeant Fundin was preferable to facing charges about the boy. It’s no longer material, because Angelo suffered a... setback his first week in prison, and won’t be directing anyone to retaliate against anyone else again.”

“A setback?”

“A... permanent setback.” Ori’s dispassionate voice quieted, and he looked up at Thran. “A proxy for a rival, I understand. Please don’t ask me any more. I don’t want to know, and the less you know, the better. And don’t tell Nori.”

“Of course not. You may trust my discretion. And thank you.”

Ori nodded. “You’re very welcome.”

“I must thank you for your patience with Irmo, too. How he has not managed to exhaust you, I cannot say.”

“It’s not as bad as I thought it would be,” was Ori’s surprising reply. He looked thoughtful again. “I’m beginning to understand how he thinks. Very lateral, very parallel, rather than linear.”

“Is Lettie in?” Thran asked. “I wanted us all to discuss changes in our approach, so that we are not so worn out and do not spend so many hours each day. We will all burn out before we are halfway through this if we keep on this way.”

“That’s what I think, too,” Ori nodded at once. “And yes, I think she’s in. I just arrived a minute or so before you, but I saw her car in the lot.”

“Let us see, then we can talk about Irmo,” was Thran’s suggestion, so he and Ori got up from their chairs in the lobby and headed back to Lettie’s office. Her door was open, and she was checking through some papers as Thran and Ori came up.

“Good morning?” Lettie looked up expectantly, but her brow was creased. “A better one than yesterday for both of you, I hope?”

“Better for me, yes,” Ori nodded, looking at Thran. “I hope it’s a whole lot better for Thran.”

Thran nodded. “It would not take much to be a better morning than yesterday. So yes, a much better one.”

“How is Bard?” Lettie asked.

“He is well, happily.” Thran dug into his bag for the bin of soup Bard had given him. He handed it over to Lettie. “Bard sent you some of the soup he made yesterday, with his compliments.”

“Oh, how sweet of him! Please tell him how much I appreciate this,” Lettie said as she put the bin of soup on her desk. “Honestly, I was very worried about both of you yesterday. I’ve never seen anyone as furious as he was.”

“I had given him much to be angry about, long before a silly comment from our young Luka added to it, and I do not blame him for being so angry,” Thran winced. “Too many hours away, four children and a house to manage, plus all the renovation work he has done. But he is not the only one stretched so thin. All of us are, as well. This must stop, or as my Sigrid said to me this morning, we will all die before Immortal is half done.”

“I agree with that.” Lettie was adamant as she turned her desk chair around to face the rest of the room and sat down. Thran and Ori took the two other chairs. “You look so drawn, Thran, and not in a good way. And Ori, I don’t know how you’re putting two words together, after so many hours of repeating everything that Irmo says. I’d be a babbling idiot by now.”

“That is one reason why Bard was so angry with me,” Thran admitted. “I have lost too much weight in three weeks, and I cannot afford that if I am to last through this effort to create Immortal, much less if I am to dance it. I am also aware of how so much time in the studio forces UVB to cancel several of its classes, which does not improve the flow of cash.”

“That’s a big concern, yes,” Lettie nodded. “I didn’t think it’d be more than a couple of classes, but that’s not the way it’s turned out.”

“In just another day or two, the renovation of the ballroom in my house will be complete. I propose that we locate Irmo, Ori, Charisse, Luka, and myself to there and focus solely on the choreography. We need to complete that first and foremost. From that will come costumes, scenery, lights, and so forth, but most particularly the material we need for publicity and promotion. That will relieve the rest of the company from the long hours, and in your case, let you tend to UVB business. Charisse, Luka, and I will do our barre with Irmo, and then we will give him eight hours of our complete attention, no more. He will take responsibility of whatever he comes up with after that. Then perhaps one day a week, perhaps Friday, we will meet here with the whole company with the choreography done so far to discuss scenery, costumes, and so forth.”

“If I may make a small request, please?” came a soft voice. Turning, Thran found Rada, the eccentric costumier, standing in the doorway.

“Oh, of course,” Lettie nodded. “Good morning, Rada.”

“Good morning, all,” he nodded, slipping sideways into the room, one small tiptoe at a time. He slipped behind Ori’s chair to stand by the window. “I would very much like to be with you as you work on the choreography, if I may. I’ll stay out of the way, and I won’t say very much, but it helps me a great deal to watch the dance develop.”

“Oh, of course, Rada,” Thran nodded at once. “You will be the voice of sanity many times, I think.”

“What an idea,” Rada considered that with concern, then smiled at everyone reassuringly. “I prefer just to sketch.”

“And sketch you will. You will be welcome.”

“So how are we going to break this to Irmo?” Lettie asked, looking uncomfortable. “He won’t like not having our undivided attention, especially given how short our time frame is. Do we have a date for the festival yet?”

“July sixteenth through twenty-fourth,” Thran related. “We will need to line up a venue. Bard will broach the subject with the Imladris Academy this Friday. The auditorium is said to be quite good.”

“That is a nice facility,” Lettie nodded, turning back to her desk to look through a drawer. She pulled out a handful of business cards and passed them to Thran. “I’ll be glad to look into that, too, once Bard’s contacted them. If he gives these to the people in charge, I’ll take it from there.”

“I will,” Thran nodded.

“So, back to how do we break this to Irmo?” Lettie repeated.

“I think I can do that,” Ori mused. When everyone looked at him, he shrugged. “As I told Thran, I’m beginning to get a handle on how Irmo thinks. It’s really quite beautiful, in a way. He doesn’t think in a straight line the way most people do – A to B to C to D, for example. He thinks laterally – A goes right to D, which goes over to G and sometimes Z. It’s hard to explain.”

“Can you give an example?” Rada asked quietly. He folded himself cross-legged on top of the two-drawer filing cabinet besides Ori’s chair, slipped a packet of ginger cream-filled cookies from a pocket, and munched quietly.

Ori mulled. “Hmm... suppose I asked you how many costumes we need for the first battle scene, Rada. You might say the Soldier, the Maid, and Death, plus twenty-five of the company, so that’s twenty-eight costumes. But Irmo wouldn’t approach it that way. He’d say a costume for Death, which must be blue and include a mask, and it must accommodate a flying harness and that means special rigging and the lighting must be able to follow Death’s descent to the battlefield, where the soldiers lie dead, so the lighting must look a certain way, and would a single costume have the desired effect, or would a cape during the descent work better, and that means the whole stage is for the battlefield, empty, so that the Underworld is the only real set, and should Death look one way above ground and another in the Underworld, which is the full set so maybe the other sets aren’t set at all but merely scenes before the curtain which will call for special lighting which will reflect differently on the costume before the curtain and it has to be a contrast with the Soldier and that means that costume is the same as the other Soldier costumes and there must be a pocket to hold the “Sometimes he thinks in parallel, on top of it, which is why we think he can’t focus on the subject. He does, but he focuses on several other subjects at the same time, all about the original topic of costumes, but not just the count of them but the lighting, the staging, the metaphorical meaning he’s trying to instill, and so on. He’s wired upstairs very differently than we are. In fact, he thinks we can’t focus as well as he can, and in a way, he’s right.”

“So how are you going to explain the changes we make so that we don’t exhaust the rest of us single-minded creatures?” Lettie asked.

“He’s a successful choreographer already, isn’t he?” Ori shrugged. When everyone nodded, he leaned forward. “I looked it up – he’s never been so much trouble as he has been with us. I think we’re over-stimulating him. We’re giving him too much input, so we’re getting much too much output. If we put him with just the three principals and me, and Rada stays in the background, and it’s only about the story we want to tell, maybe that will keep him from throwing out so many ideas. In fact, it might be as much relief to him as it would be to us.”

Thran and the others exchanged glances. Lettie was nodding, and Rada chewed his cookie with thoughtful consideration.

“That makes sense,” Rada nodded. He offered Ori a whimsical smile. “Good sense.”

“I think it does, too,” Lettie exhaled. “Wouldn’t it be something if we’ve been causing our own overload all this time, trying to get so much done quickly?”

“It does offer a large dose of irony,” Thran grinned perversely. “So perhaps our perceptive Ori has found a solution for us. We have only to find the words to tell Irmo.”

“Tell me what?” the choreographer called from the hallway. Lettie and Rada both started, and Thran winced, but Ori held up a hand, urging silence. When Irmo appeared in the doorway, Ori turned around to face him.

“We’re talking about how badly we’ve distracted you, Irmo,” Ori said without preamble. “Much too much goes on that keeps you from your choreography, and that fractures your vision for Immortal. Without your choreography, the rest is immaterial. So you, Thran, Charisse, Luka, and I will work in Thran’s ballroom away from the rest –”

“What is this?” Irmo interrupted, eyes wide. “No, no, this will not work, Ori, not in the least! To work separately, when there are so many things that are intertwined!”

“Yes, they are intertwined, Irmo,” Ori kept on firmly, raising his voice. “All things are intertwined, but they all begin from a source, a single source, and that is what we have neglected — no, let me finish, Irmo. We have the story of our ballet, the words, don’t we? From that source must come the steps — your choreography. All the rest is immaterial without that. Until you create that, then any plans for costumes and lighting and design are tentative, at best. We have only the first part of your steps, not the middle, or the end — stop, Irmo, let me finish; you know what I say is true. What must the lighting be for those end steps? We don’t yet know, do we? So there is no point to doing tangential work until we have the main spine, the steps. We do you a disservice to distract you with details until you complete your choreography. So to banish distractions, you, Thran, Charisse, Luka, and I will work in Thran’s ballroom, and we will devote ourselves to your vision of the steps. Only when that part of your vision is complete does the rest matter.”

Thran held his breath as Irmo’s eyes bugged out and his mouth gaped wide. It was all he could do to smother a giggle, because the choreographer looked like nothing so much as Harpo Marx about to express great indignity, albeit without the silly red wig. He stared at Ori, who folded his hands over his stomach and sat back to meet Irmo’s piercing stare without a blink. Irmo stared back unmoving for long seconds, then clapped his hands once with so much explosive energy that everyone in Lettie’s office jumped at the sharp noise.

“Yes, yes!” Irmo threw up his hands and seemed to grow three inches. “Of course! Yes, Ori, you are right to tell me not to talk, to listen to you, for this is a most revealing observation. Yes, you are right about a single source, and from that flows the rest, and we need the steps, and so it makes sense to work apart. I like this. I like it very much! With only the principals and an empty room, then yes, we can buckle down and consider less, and Ori, you will be there to capture the other things that come up, and yes, perhaps that will help us find those last few pieces of music, and we may use that beautiful ballroom both as Underworld and before the curtain, and have a better sense of space because of the height of the room, yes. Yes, I like this idea very much!”

“Brilliant,” Thran nodded, but his smile was for Ori, who reddened. Rada said nothing, but he smiled wisely and offered Ori a pat on the shoulder.

“So we will start this today?” Irmo pressed, hugging his bag to his chest.

“Bard finishes the ballroom today and tomorrow,” Thran replied. “I had thought Friday would be a good time to start. Perhaps Thursday, if we are sure this is a good idea.”

“It is, and one I hate to delay,” Irmo pressed, his lips turning down. “What delays Bard?”

Thran didn’t bridle at Irmo’s question. Irmo had no idea of the monumental amount of work Bard had already done to get the ballroom to its current state. “He finishes the paint. The walls are done; only some of the trim remains.”

“Can we not work around that?” Irmo pressed. “If there are but the four of us who dance, and Ori can stand to the side, we can work around Bard. Or dispense with the paint for now. This is important.”

Thran made a quick decision. “It is too late today to move our efforts there. I will call Bard at lunchtime, when I know he will be there, and discuss with him whether we can begin our efforts there tomorrow. Today, we will keep the principals apart from the rest as we begin this new effort. Then we will be ready to begin tomorrow.”

Everyone nodded at that, and even Irmo looked agreeable.

“Then that is what we will do. So let us go to the barre. Lettie, Rada, and Ori, perhaps you can put together lists of what we have come up with so far that others can work on while we work in the ballroom.”

“Perfect,” Lettie revealed her first wide smile of the morning. “We’ll get right on that.”

Thran got up, smiling. As Irmo bounded from Lettie’s office to head for the studio, he exchanged a smile with the others, and offered Ori his palm to slap.

“My compliments,” Thran grinned, as the others exchanged high fives.

“I’m stunned,” Lettie shook her head. “Ori, I’m in awe.”

“Let’s hope it lasts,” Ori offered, reddening again. “We’ll just have to work hard to keep everything focused only on the steps, to keep Irmo from running off on more tangents.”
"We will do our best," Thran vowed. "So, to the barre."

Thran headed for the changing room to change his clothes. When he came into the studio, he flagged down Charisse and Luka, huddled with them quickly to explain the changes, and was relieved when both of them heartily approved of the change.

Now, if only Bard could accommodate dancers two days early, all would be well.
Chapter 78

Chapter Summary

Clan Ffyrnig enjoys the resumption of their domestic bliss. Will a cautionary tale disrupt that? Along the way, an angel resumes his dance, and a saint toils with his paintbrush.

Bard climbed up on the scaffolding, uncapped his paint, and eyeballed the expanse of woodwork to be painted. He took up his brush and paint guard, and began to transform the dull, greyed finish to a bright, glossy, white one. He got perhaps three feet down from the top, far enough that he sat comfortably cross-legged atop the scaffolding, before his mobile chirped. He set down his tools, fished out his mobile, and checked the caller ID. It was Thran.

“Hello, angel. How’s the ballet world?”

“I love to hear you call me that.”

Bard’s cheeks warmed, and a crooked smile twitched at the corners of his lips. “I’m glad. Everything’s well?”

“Very well, from my perspective. Ori managed Irmo with a deftness that is beyond mortal. Irmo is very excited to have his three principals and Ori at his beck and call in the ballroom. I think Rada will make an appearance, as well.”

“That’s great,” Bard nodded.

“I have a great favor to ask, lyubov moya. Irmo wants to launch us on this new path as soon as possible. Would it interfere with the last of your painting if we were in house tomorrow?”

“Not if you don’t mind working away from one long wall at a time. I think I’ll get the first coat on completely today, so it'll dry overnight. Then I can put the second coat on tomorrow. So if there are just four or five of you, would the scaffolding leave you enough room?”

“I am sure it will. If this would not put you out too much, it would help us a great deal. The sooner we can get Irmo focused, the sooner the rest of the effort calms down – and the sooner you can move on to your sketching. That must be your next effort.”

“What is it you always say? ‘I hear and obey?’ I can hear and obey, too.”

Low, rich laughter whispered over the mobile. “I will find an appropriate way to thank you for such... compliance, svyatoy moy.”

“Mmm,” Bards eyebrows quirked up despite there being no one in the ballroom to see his pleased expression. “I don’t know whether to hurry up and finish the painting all out, or to save enough energy to enjoy wasting it in bed with a certain angel.”

“I will just wait long enough that you enjoy everything completely. In all seriousness, do not exhaust yourself. We will work around whatever you need us to for a day or so.”

“Okay,” Bard agreed. “Let me get on with it, and I’ll see you when you get here.”
“Until later, then. Love you.”

“Love you, too, angel.”

Thran disconnected the call, and Bard tucked the mobile back in his pocket. He got back to his painting, considering as he proceeded down the strip of woodwork to the floor. Four midribs of woodwork per side, plus two end ribs, then the plaster work around three wall sconces per side, so that was eight midribs, six sconces, four end ribs, the trim around the faux-painted wooden fireplace mantel, and around the windows. The windows themselves would wait with all the other windows for warm weather when he could take them out to work on them. The faux-painted mantel wasn’t in bad shape, and if he wanted to touch that up later, he’d need only a ladder, not the scaffolding.

He exhaled. It was still a lot of work. Thank the gods the ceiling plasterwork was done!

He went back to work; sooner started was sooner ended. He’d already done three midribs, one end rib, and all three sconces on this side, and around the fireplace, so he had only this midrib and the second end to go before he finished this side. If he prevailed upon the children to help with supper and Thran with homework tonight, he should be able to finish the first coat before bedtime.

He helped the time to pass more quickly by thinking about the next room to renovate – the half bath. The secondhand rug in the sitting room had a beautifully faded red center around a stylized floral border. The border was interesting enough, all muted jewel tones of emerald, sapphire, topaz, amethyst, and even a bit of darker ruby. But the center had been the reason he’d bought it – it was the same dark, muted red that Rembrandt had used so beautifully in many of his paintings. The small half bath had no windows, so was suited to an over-the-top, nighttime pallet. At first, he’d thought about a lot of black marble, which would please Bain no end – his son had teased him for years about having one room in solid black, just because. But the red of the rug had him thinking about red walls, maybe over-stenciled in gold, something vaguely Russian... maybe a dark blue floor to match the sapphire in the rug, flecked with topaz and gold...

He enjoyed his musings as he steadily worked his way through the rest of the wall around the windowed end, and down the other side. By the time the children thundered in from the bus, he had just two midribs and an end rib to go. He climbed down to greet the children, bring out the cheese and crackers, and collect empty lunch bags. His mobile rang in the thick of things.

“Thran’s on his way home!” Bard heralded. “Where’s Legs?”

“In the bathroom,” Bain replied, stuffing cheese in his mouth. “Hey, Til, I like this Double Gloucester cheese you got.”

“I like it, too,” Sigrid agreed, taking a piece. “Get more of this next time, Til. You picked a winner.”

“Thank you,” Tilda beamed. “It’s a pretty color, too! A nice, crayon yellow.”

“Crayon yellow?” Bain repeated incredulously. “I’ve never heard cheese described that way before.”

“Did someone call me?” Legolas asked, rejoining the other children.

“Your Papa’s on his way home. He’ll be here in about twenty minutes.”

“Really?” Legolas smiled widely. “That’s great! Just great. What’re we having for supper?”

“Chicken Kiev, except baked. You know how your Papa is about fried food.”

“It’s not fried?” Legolas looked disappointed. “I like the crunchy part.”
“I think this’ll be crunchy, if not as much as if it were fried. But it’s still got the garlic butter on the inside.”

“Sounds good.” Sigrid considered the cheese plate before she opted for a slice of Swiss on a wheat cracker. “It’s about time Ada made it home for supper. He’s gotten so thin! I bet he’s never been so thin before. Has he, Legs?”

Legolas nodded solemnly. “He was that thin when Maman... left us. He didn’t think I noticed, but I did.”

“We’ll take good care of him, once he starts working in the ballroom, Legolas, don’t worry,” Tilda assured him. “Da will make him eat lunch every day, and we’ll make him eat supper every night. And snacks.”

“Ice cream at ten o’clock,” Bain chortled. “That’s my favorite snack.”

“How can you tell?” Bard asked, feigning surprise. “So far, we haven’t found much you won’t eat at any time, boyo.”

Bain refused to look embarrassed. “Hey, some kids are picky. I’m a gift because I’ve never been picky.”

“A gift, hmm?” Bard grinned. “If the lack of pickiness at the table makes you a gift, then you’re the biggest gift ever.”

The children laughed as Bain puffed out his chest and made muscle arms. “The winner!”

“So Ada will be back in the ballroom on Thursday?” Sigrid asked.

“Tomorrow,” Bard exhaled. “Apparently the campaign to corral the choreographer went a little too well, and he wants to start right away. I’ll have just the one coat of paint on the trim to do, so tomorrow they’ll work around me while I finish, then they’re on their own.”

“And then you can do your sketches, Da,” Tilda said. “You have to spend one whole day sketching this week, to make up for Sunday. And next Sunday doesn’t count.”

“I’m looking forward to it,” Bard agreed. “I’ll get to watch Thran and the other dancers work, so I’ll have a lot of inspiration.”

“That’ll be neat,” Tilda helped herself to more cheese. “I’m learning to draw spheres and cubes in my drawing class, just like you showed me, Da...”

Bard and the children chatted around the cheese and crackers for long enough that they were still snacking when Thran came through the mudroom door. He was met with loud cheers and a hug from Legolas, which brought a wide grin to his face. Bard gave him a quick hug and kiss as he got up to turn the oven on and bring out the pan of prepared chicken breasts. The children made room for Thran around the table, and badgered him into sampling each of the three cheeses while they told him their news.

“The chicken’s going in the oven, so supper’s in an hour,” Bard said as the news died down. “Who are our sous chefs tonight?”

Legolas checked the list. “I am, and Tilda.”

“Do you think you two can do a couple of veg and a starch?” Bard asked.
Legolas and Tilda looked at each other. “Macaroni and cheese?” Tilda suggested.

“Broccoli and... um, carrots?” was Legolas’s contribution.

“You’ll have to cut up the carrots, and but I can peel them for you,” Tilda offered.

“How do you make the cheese part?” Legolas asked. “I know the noodle part, but...”

“I know the cheese part,” Tilda said with a confident nod of her head. “So we’re set, Da.”

“Sounds good. So if the chicken comes out in an hour and you want the noodles done at the same time, when do you put on the noodles?”

The two children looked at each other. “Read the box?” Legolas guessed. “We need to get the box, Kukla.”

They ducked into the pantry, and a discussion of what shape of noodle ensued, drawing both Bard and Thran’s grins. The children duly came out with two boxes of spiral pasta.

“Sixty minutes for the chicken minus twelve minutes for the pasta, so we put the pasta on in forty-eight minutes,” Legolas announced.

“When the timer says twelve,” Tilda nodded.

“Okay, you turn on the water to cook the pasta ten minutes ahead, so it’s boiling when you want to start the pasta,” Bard explained. “And add five more minutes so you have time to add the cheese at the end.”

“So we turn the water on when the timer reads twenty-seven,” Legolas surmised. “What about the carrots and broccoli?”

“Fifteen minutes ahead for the carrots, and seven for the broccoli.”

Tilda and Legolas looked at each other, and Legolas got a piece of paper and a pencil. He and Tilda conferred as he wrote down numbers, then when they agreed, he recited from their notes. “So in thirty-three minutes, when the timer says twenty-seven minutes left, turn on the noodle water. When the timer says seventeen, put the noodles in the water. Timer says fifteen, put the carrots on. Timer says seven, put the broccoli on. Timer says five, take the noodles off, and add the cheese to the noodles.”

“Timer says zero, we eat!” Tilda finished.

“You’ve got it,” Bard nodded, pleased at how fast they’d sorted it out. “So let’s get everything prepped.”

“I appoint myself corporal of cutlery, and will set the table, Captain Bard,” Thran offered. “Will we need butter on the table?”

Everyone set to. Bain and Sigrid cleaned away the cheese and crackers, Bard got out the heavy pans for the side dishes, Legolas and Tilda rummaged for vegetables and cheese, and Thran got out flatware, glasses, and napkins for the table. As Tilda began to peel carrots over the sink, Bard grinned at her explanation to Legolas of how to make the simple cheese sauce for the macaroni. Tilda cooked just as Bard did – a little of this, and a little of that, until it looked and smelled right. Her description was replete with words such as a bit of butter and a splash of milk and a dash of cayenne pepper, which weren’t the most enlightening for the blond-headed boy.
“That’s okay,” Tilda assured the dubious Legolas. “It’ll come out all right when the noodles are cooked. We mix it up right in the pot, and you’ll see. We need a biiiiig spoon…”

Bard had originally planned to duck out to do more painting while the children worked on supper, but it was so much fun to watch tall, blond Legolas and short, brunette Tilda work together that he stayed in the kitchen, doing the cleanup for the children as they finished with knives and cutting boards and bowls. He got out the colander and drained the heavy pot for them when it was time, then dumped the noodles back in the pot so Tilda could show Legolas how to do the cheese. Tilda added the ingredients while Legolas stirred, and when the oven timer beeped the noodles were properly cheesy.

“You’re right, Kukla,” Legolas agreed. “It was easier to do it than explain it.”

“And see? It’s crayon yellow, like the Double Gloucester cheese.”

Smiling, Legolas shrugged agreement. “You’re right, Kukla. It kind of is.”

Bard got the pan of chicken out of the oven, Thran had the stack of plates ready at the end of the island, and they called Bain and Sigrid in from the sitting room. Everyone was quick to dish a plate full and sit down to eat.

“That makes so much sense, using the oven timer,” Legolas observed as they took their places around the table. “It’s like a rocket launch – you just back everything up from zero!”

“The secret of good cooking,” Thran smiled.

“Or at least getting everything done at the same time,” Bard amended. “So is the chicken crunchy enough, Legs?”

“Not as much as fried, but yes, it’s still crunchy,” he nodded. “It’s good!”

After the meal, Sigrid and Bain took over the cleanup, and Bard excused himself back to the painting. Thran came in behind him to keep him company while he painted.

“This is a beautiful room, even with your so-called industrial lamps,” Thran said appreciatively as he looked around. “So bright now, and the paint is beautiful. It is the perfect cake, like the room I saw as a child.”

“I’m glad you like it. I’ve got just this rib, the next one, and the end rib to finish the first coat. Tomorrow, it’s around again to do the second coat, and that’s it. I’ll do the window in the summer with the rest, and the fireplace will hold for a while. The faux painting looks good for right now.”

“I did not realize it was painted,” Thran said, leaning forward to regard it closely. “Amazing! It looks like real marble. Such patina.”

“I think it being wood was the only thing that saved it from being stripped out of the house like the one in the main room,” Bard speculated. “If it’d been marble or limestone, Jerry likely would have sold it, but it was in rough shape, and maybe he thought the wood would be hard to remove intact. Not too many houses can handle a fireplace that large, either. Anyway, for whatever reason, it was still here when Daphne and I moved in. It was such a wreck that Daphne used it to learn faux marble painting. She figured that if she made a mess of it, it didn’t matter, but I think it turned out well. She claimed that the left side’s better than the right, because she got better as she worked on it, but I can’t tell the difference.”

Thran leaned closer to examine it. “Tcha, both sides are perfect. It goes well with Sigrid’s Provence Crème paint. Why not leave it, as a memento of her?”

“I’d like that,” Bard agreed. “Speaking of her, and by extension Vileria, we need to get frames for the children’s pictures of their mothers.”

“An item for the Saturday chore list,” Thran hummed. “We will ask them to choose the pictures they like, and then we will know what size frames to get. And I have another thing to show you. Mrs. Mathom did send pictures of screens. One I like, but the other not so much. I will show you after the paint. Is there any part that I can help you with?”

“I’ve got it. Decide what kind of soup you’d like tomorrow for lunch. And tell me about that lamb stew you had at the restaurant. I got some lamb at the market, and I thought I’d look for a recipe on the Internet, once you told me what the one you like tastes like.”

They chatted back and forth until Bain came in with a worksheet that he didn’t understand, so Thran sorted that out for him. Bard climbed off the scaffolding, slid it over so he could do the bottom of the midrib, then positioned the scaffolding for the second midrib. While he worked on that, Tilda came in for Thran’s help with her French words. In another half hour, Bard moved the scaffolding for the last time, and worked his way down the end piece while the children came in to read the next bit of Harry Potter so he could listen as he painted. Sigrid headed upstairs to shower, and the other children went back into the sitting room to play Tilda’s Dinky Farm.

It was just past nine when Bard capped the paint, climbed down, and washed his brush in the mudroom sink. He came into the sitting room, glad to sit down and watch the end of the children’s video game beside Thran. When Tilda headed upstairs for her shower, the boys coaxed their fathers into a quick car race game, which provoked much hilarity as Thran and Bard sorted out their controllers and the maneuvers.

“It is a very good thing that I am a better driver on a real road than I am in this game,” Thran shook his head when he crashed for the third time. “That is the second time I have hit that same guard rail!”

“Next time, sideswipe Legolas,” Bard advised. “He pushed you into that guard rail.”

“No coaching!” Legolas protested. “Don’t listen to him, Papa!”

“Better I listen to him that to you,” Thran snorted. “You do not want me to sideswipe you so that you may do it first? I think not!”

“Uh-oh, Legs,” Bard teased. “You’ve made the tall Russian dude mad.”

“We’re at the end of the game,” Bain hedged.

“No, we go again, so I have a chance for my revenge!” Thran grinned evilly. “Come, Bard, let you and I play the partners as our sons so nicely have, and we will sideswipe them!”

“Game on,” Bard mirrored Thran’s evil grin. “Better watch out, Bain – Clan Ffyrnig’s out for blood this time!”

The game led to so much loud mayhem that Sigrid came downstairs with mobile in hand. “What are you all doing? I can hear you upstairs, you’re so loud!”

“We win the race!” Thran chortled. “See, Legolas, I sideswipe in your general direction!”

Thran’s enthusiasm sent Legolas’s virtual car careening over an embankment and down a hill to explode in a bright fireball, which brought yells from both Legolas and Thran – the former in protest,
“Papa, you wrecked me!”

“Yes, I did!” Thran held up his hands in victory. “Now, Bard, finish that blue pile of snake junk, and we will win the game!”

Sigrid watched in incredulity as Bard ran Bain’s blue Viper off the road and zoomed after Thran to drift over the finish line in a spray of gravel. As confetti rained down, Sigrid spoke into her mobile. “It’s my Da and Ada. They just mopped up the floor with my brothers playing this car race thing. They’re both hoodlums.” She laughed. “Finn says to tell you congratulations.”

“That is Finn?” Thran instantly sobered. “May I speak with him, please, Sigrid?”

“Sure. Finn, Ada wants to talk to you, so I’m putting him on. Here he is.”

Bard took Thran’s controller as the tall dancer got up to take Sigrid’s mobile. Hmmm... had he learned something from Ori this morning?

“Hello, Finn; I hope you are well this evening. Yes, thank you, I am well, too. I will not keep you from Sigrid long; I want only to tell you that she relayed your speculation about Lance Dunmont. I appreciate the information, but please, do not inquire further, you understand? Those are dangerous people, and I want you to remain safe from them. Let all mention of them pass, please. You will do this? Yes, I understand your concern, but we are well. Yes, please. Thank you. Until I next see you, stay well. Here is Sigrid back again.”

Sigrid took the mobile back, but quickly disconnected the call. By the time the boys had turned avid eyes on Thran, Sigrid was right there beside them.

“What happened to Lance?” she pressed.

Thran looked at Bard. “I did find out some things this morning. They are not suitable for Kukla. But I think I should speak of it to all of you.”

Bard swallowed. “Okay, if you think we need to know.”

“I do.” Thran turned a very serious expression on Bain, Legolas, and Sigrid. “You must all promise not to speak of this except to the two of us. This is not something to brag about to friends, or to frighten younger children. Do you make this promise?”

All three of them nodded at once.

“Wait,” Bard gulped. “This sounds serious. Why do the children need to know?”

“Because I want to put their minds at ease in one way, and offer a cautionary tale in another.”

Bard didn’t like the serious light in Thran’s eyes, but he trusted his husband’s judgment, so nodded. “Okay. Go ahead.”

Thran turned back to the children. “I do not know what happened to Lance, but he will not bother anyone again. Anyone. You understand me?”

The children nodded soberly, and unconsciously moved closer to one another.

“You understand who has done this?”
More nods.

“You understand why I do not tell Tilda this? She is afraid of Lance, but this would give her worse to be afraid of. This is not where the story ends, either. The beast who visited such savagery upon a child will not bother anyone again, either.”

Sigrid’s breath caught, but her face never changed expression. As the boys revealed more apprehension, she asked, “What happened? Someone got him in prison?”

“‘A proxy for a rival,’ I was told,” Thran replied. “That is all I know, and all I care to know. I speculate that this rival might be more grateful to us than not, because we brought about Angelo’s downfall, and so he will not retaliate against us. So perhaps the danger to us has lessened, though I cautions you all to remain careful. More importantly, if ever you needed a cautionary tale as to the danger of involvement with a gang, let this be it. Once you begin such an association, it is nearly impossible to end it. Please, all of you, stay away from such vermin.”

“Gods,” Bain breathed, looking at Sigrid with a sick expression on his face. “All Lance wanted to do was look important, and...”

Sigrid’s jaw was clenched and her eyes were hard. “I’m not sorry about Angelo. I didn’t like Lance, and I’m sorry he ended up... however he ended up. But I’m glad he won’t be around to scare Tilda anymore.”

“That’s the only good thing about it,” Legolas murmured, swallowing.

“The only thing, indeed,” Bard agreed. “I think we need to end the evening on a better note. How about one more car race? Sigrid? You want a hand?”

“I’m good,” she nodded soberly. “I told Finn I’d call him back. I won’t say anything about Angelo.”

“Okay, sweetness. As long as you’re good.”

“I’m fine. It takes more than hearing that a rat got what he deserved to rattle me.”

She went upstairs with her head high, drawing Bard’s smile. The boys she left behind, however, weren’t so nonchalant, and welcomed the distraction of another car race. By the time the sideswiping and barrier jumping and extreme disobedience of all traffic laws had ended, both Bain and Legolas looked much happier, and headed upstairs in better spirits.

“Perhaps I should not have said anything,” Thran murmured, as Bard turned off the boys’ gaming system.

“Sigrid’s tough,” Bard shrugged. “This was likely a shock for Legolas, though. Bain... borderline.
But they know now, and that’s that.”

“Are you angry with me?”

Bard shook his head. “I’m just sorry any of us have to deal with the fallout of what happened Christmas Day. This wasn’t pretty, but let’s hope it’s the last of it. Though I’ll bet the lads ask to sleep in the same room tonight, or that they end up in one room or the other if they don’t ask.”

“I am glad they will have each other as company through this,” Thran exhaled. “Let me make it up to you with a sip of nalivka and pictures of wooden screens from Mrs. Mathom.”

“Sounds good,” Bard agreed, so Thran got up to fetch the small glasses while Bard stowed the game
Thran brought the glasses of cherry cordial, and they looked at Mrs. Mathom’s pictures. One of them was more rustic than the other, without the finer details that the other revealed. Bard preferred the same one that Thran did, so Thran emailed Mrs. Mathom back about their preferences. Then Bard told Thran about his ideas to redo the half bath. As Thran sipped his cordial, he was not sanguine about the dark red paint at first, but when Bard talked about the gold stenciling, he was intrigued.

“I leave it to you, lyubov moya,” Thran said comfortably. “It will match this rug, yes? I like these colors, so I am sure the small room will look like the little jewel box that you imagine.”

“I’ll trade you. I’ll decide about the half bath, and you decide for the main room. That’d make sense, especially if you teach classes in the ballroom one day. Your students might come through there, so pick something that looks suitably impressive.”

Thran snickered. “Perhaps lots and lots of pink tulle?”

Bard nearly choked on his cordial. “I said, suitably impressive, not ridiculous.”

“It is a beautiful room. It will be more so with a suitable mantel. I will give it some thought.”

“You can make it your salon, where you hold court with all the besotted little ballerinas.”

Thran’s snicker grew to a snort of laughter. “You want me to design a pristine white room, then, all very sleek and modern, adorned with perhaps a fluffy white poodle or some such ridiculous creature? The very idea.”

Bard grinned. “Better do it all in grey, with a fluffy grey poodle. With four children, it won’t stay white for long.”

“Very true. I will consider. It will be some time before we get to that room. I suspect it will be the last one, as we do not have much use for it yet. Let us wait until everything else is done, and see what appeals to us.”

“Maybe the sitting room should be last. We’ll have to move into the main room while I redo the walls and floors.”

“Perhaps so.” Thran yawned, then sipped the last of his nalivka. “I am ready for the shower, my saint.”

Bard finished his. “Me, too. Hot water will feel good tonight.”

“For both of us.”

They headed upstairs and settled the children in bed. Tilda was nearly asleep, and accepted her parents’ kisses with a mumbled goodnight. Sigrid was at ease, despite the earlier news about Angelo, and Bard didn’t worry about her as he bid her goodnight. The boys seemed okay as well, so Bard kept his goodnights brief. He was relieved, to be honest; between his angry stint with the chin-up bar yesterday morning and today’s all-day painting marathon, his shoulders were quite sore. All he wanted was to dive into the shower and turn the water on as hot as it would go until he stopped aching. He downed some ibuprofen before Thran came into the bathroom. His husband didn’t need to know how sore he was; if he could just get through the last coat of the ballroom woodwork tomorrow, he could ease off a bit while he worked on his sketches.

He got into the shower and scrubbed off the day’s labors, then lingered under the hot water, hoping his husband would join him. Thran must’ve gotten waylaid by one of the children, though, because he didn’t make an appearance. Bard got out, dried off, and headed into the bedroom for leggings and tee shirt to go find his husband when said husband finally came in, drawing the doors shut behind him.

“Everything all right?” Bard asked, pausing with his leggings half on.

Thran nodded. “As you expected, the boys are a little nervous, so I said it was fine if they wanted to share a room for the night, but that they were not to play games or stay up. Tomorrow is still a school day. So they are in Legolas’s room.”

Bard winced. “I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to leave you to sort them out. I thought Sigrid was okay, and the boys didn’t say anything, so…”

“Our fierce lioness is okay, as you say. The boys will be. As I was the one to make them nervous, I did not mind to sort them out. So all is well. Get into bed and be warm while I wash. I will be in quickly.”

Bard was quick to strip off his leggings and clamber into bed. “Don’t have to ask me twice. I’m knackered. I’ll probably fall asleep thirty seconds after you hit the water.”

Thran came to his side and offered him a kiss. “Then I will kiss you now to make sure I do before you fall asleep.”

Bard kissed him back. “Mmm. Better go wash before I get other ideas.”

“I go,” Thran grinned. “When I come back, the bed will be nicely warm, and I will enjoy that very much, whether you are asleep or not.”

“Glad to know I’m good for something,” Bard teased. “See you when you’re clean.”

“Only in body, lyubov moya. Never in mind.”

Bard snickered as Thran eased off the bed and disappeared into the bathroom with a backward look. It didn’t matter that the look was all lowered lashes and seductive smile; Bard was so tired that his eyes shut as soon as the bathroom door closed. But his weariness didn’t keep him from smiling as he sank towards sleep. When a long, elegant body slid under the covers to snuggle him close, he even managed to smile a little wider. He fell asleep cradled in an angel’s arms.

* * *

The next morning saw Clan Ffyrnig muster at the usual time for lunch assembly, breakfast mess, and early maneuvers out to the bus stop. Back at headquarters, Bard put together a pot of chicken soup for lunch while Thran changed into his dance attire. He came downstairs to find that Bard had seared the chicken and set it to simmer, and was just chopping the last stalk of celery to go with the carrots and onions he’d already prepared. He scooped the rounds into the bowl with the other vegetables, and set it in the refrigerator to be ready to add during the last hour of cooking. Bard looked up as Thran came in.

“Noodles or no?” he asked. “I made enough for the lot of you, if you’re inclined to share. So will the others be averse to the noodles?”
"You can safely put in the noodles," Thran replied. "Everyone has worked very hard, and a few good noodles in a good soup will be welcome. You are kind to make such a bounty."

"I thought it might sweeten the opening day," Bard shrugged. "I expect Luka’s a bit nervous. And I wanted to make Charisse welcome. I like her."

That was delivered in such an even voice that Thran snickered. "Luka has reason to be nervous. He is about to meet my formidable husband. And Charisse will appreciate both Luka being nervous, and your kind welcome. She asks after you often."

Bard’s grin was sheepish. "I’ll remember my manners today, I promise. Okay, the soup’s ready to simmer for a bit. Time to drag my ass up on the scaffold, brush in hand."

"I turned the heat up earlier, so the ballroom should be warm by now."

Bard waved a hand as he headed upstairs to don his painting clothes. "Thanks, Angel. Down in a tick."

Thran wandered into the ballroom slowly, wrapping his sweater around his torso as he surveyed the room. The sun was not well up, and the sky was overcast, but even in the dimness the ballroom was beautiful. He tied another sweater around his ribs to add more warmth, then took up the wide floor mop to remove the dust and detritus Bard had stirred as he painted. His husband came in shortly after clad in boots, jeans, tee, and flannel, all well used. He had a bandanna tied around his forehead to keep his hair out of his eyes, and his silver earrings added an exotic touch to the Welshman. Bard offered a smile before he looked around, nodding once.

"Almost done."

"It looks wonderful already. Where do you plan to start today, so I know where to put the barre?"

Bard switched on the overhead lights, then pointed to the end rib to the right of the fireplace. "That’s where I started yesterday, so it’s dried the longest. I’ll go from there around, and end up where the scaffold is now. I’ll move the garden furniture out of the way, if you want."

"We have plenty of space for four dancers already, and perhaps Rada and Ori will want to sit there. I will set the barre in the middle near the other end, so we will be out of your way until this afternoon."

"That’d be good. I’ll move the scaffolding over, then move the barre for you."

"Tcha," Thran waved a hand. "I can move the barre myself, lyubov moyo. Do you need help with the scaffolding?"

"I’m good. It’s on wheels, so it’s easy."

Bard pushed small levers to unlock the wheels, rolled it into place, and locked the wheels again. He slipped old toweling under each wheel to spare the floor before he set his can of paint and brushes on the platform. After a kiss for Thran, he climbed up and set to his painting. Thran finished mopping the floor, then moved his barre. But for the occasional sounds of Bard as he painted, the room was almost silent, like a cathedral in the morning. That sense of reverence made Thran smile as he began his yoga – reverence was supposed to be the state in which every dancer approached the warmup, or so one of his childhood instructors at Vaganova had insisted. Perhaps it was how Mlle. Zabotkina’s over-arched eyebrows regularly ascended nearly into her hairline that gave him reason to smile every time he thought of her, which was not the reverence she’d hoped to instill in him. But it relaxed him, and he began his warmup in good spirits.
He hadn’t gotten far before a knock sounded on the front door. When he came through the main room into the central hall and opened the door, there stood Charisse, bundled in her bright red coat, white scarf, and white cap. They exchanged hugs of greeting, then Charisse exclaimed over Hope the Lope, as Thran had expected. He’d wanted his colleagues to see his husband’s artwork right from the start, so that no one would think that Thran was the only talent in the family. Even the scuffed walls didn’t detract from the antelope’s satiny golden glow. He’d only just hung up Charisse’s coat when the door sounded again, and there was Luka, with Rada close behind.

“Wow, that’s a stunner!” Luka exclaimed, as Thran hung up his coat. “Where did you get that beauty? India?”

“It is beautiful, is it not? My husband is a metal sculptor – this is one of his works. We will have several other pieces in place eventually, once our house is further restored. There is another outside in the garden already, but the rest must wait until the weather warms before they move from his studio in the barn.”

Luka was suitably impressed, but the interesting one was Rada, who regarded the antelope with his usual thoughtful consideration. He reached out a single index finger to gently touch the metal, then withdrew it to rub his fingers together, as if to feel microscopic atoms of the metal. He looked back up at the piece again as Thran offered to hang up his coat. He demurred with an absent-minded smile, and trailed after the three dancers to go into the ballroom still in his voluminous coat. His eyes lingered on the scraps of Indonesian daybed stacked against the wall of the main room as they went by.

Bard had progressed from the top of the scaffolding to the floor to paint the bottom part of the end rib, and he got up to greet everyone as Thran came in with them. Luka swallowed uncomfortably as Bard gave Charisse a smiling welcome, doing a credible job of the triple air kiss that was so very French. But Bard gave no sign of unease as he offered Luka his hand and a genial good morning.

“Good morning, Mr. Oropherson – Mr. Bowman,” Luka stammered, taking Bard’s hand. “I – I’m glad to see you again under better, um, circumstances. I’m sorry about Monday.”

“Call me Bard. Thanks for offering Thran a hand on Monday. It was kindly meant, I’m sure.”

“Uh – th-thanks,” Luka’s eyes widened at Bard’s mild tone. Only Thran understood how hard Bard worked not to growl or chuckle at the young dancer’s disconcert. “Um, your antelope sculpture in the hall is amazing. Really.”

“I’m glad you like it.”

“And this is Rada Brown, the costumier,” Thran completed the introductions. “Rada, this is Bard Bowman, metal artist and my husband.”

“It’s good to meet you, Rada,” Bard leaned forward to offer his hand. “Welcome to the ballroom.”

“It’s really quite beautiful,” Rada looked around with placid eyes. “So is the rest of your house. I hope perhaps you would let me see the rest at some point?”

“I’ll give you the tour at lunchtime,” Bard nodded, as another knock sounded at the front door. Rada offered to answer it, and padded off quietly. “For the moment, though, I’ll let you all get on with your ballet work while I get on with the paint.”

“This room is beautiful - exactly like a cake, just as Thran described,” Charisse said with a winsome smile. “Such a luscious color!”
“My daughter picked it out. Provence Crème. She thought it sounded delicious.”

“And it looks no less delicious, too,” Charisse held her hands out, taking in the room as she looked around. “And this beautiful floor! We will dance in a palace, won’t we, Luka?”

“It’s the fanciest studio space I’ve ever worked in,” Luka nodded as Rada came in with Irmo in tow. “Uh-oh. Here comes Monsieur Fermez.”

“Shh,” Charisse hushed the other dancer with a reproving glance. Bard smothered a smile; even when she frowned, the petite dancer could not dissipate her air of grace and charm. “That wasn’t funny the first time you said it, Luka, and it’s still not funny now.”

Charisse stepped away to greet Irmo with her pretty French hello, so Bard glanced at the shorter man. “Monsieur Fermi?”

Luka’s face crumbled into a mischievous grin. “Yeah, Monsieur Fermez. As in, Monsieur, fermez votre gueule, je vous prie. Mister, shut your trap, I beg of you. He talks a lot, you know?”

“I guess I’ll find out,” Bard said neutrally, giving Thran a surreptitious wink. His husband likely found Luka’s epithet funny, given how many times Thran had complained about Irmo’s nonstop talking, but it was sweet that he didn’t encourage Luka’s irreverence. Bard greeted Irmo briefly before taking himself back to his painting, and soon Irmo and the three dancers took themselves to the barre and began their morning ritual.
Chapter 79

Chapter Summary

Work in the Clan Ffyrnig ballroom commences for an angel, and continues for a saint. Such rigors leave neither one with energy for more than a little sexy talk, but maybe that'll lead to fun later on.

Rada introduces the children to a friend, too.

Chapter Notes

I don’t hold rights to any piece of the wide and wonderful Star Trek universe. It, however, holds a large piece of my affection ❤️. Live long and prosper, y'all.

Bard kept most of his attention on his painting, but Thran’s practice CD playing on the old portable player offered a calm background to his work. Irmo’s voice as he called out the positions and combinations was not unpleasant, possibly because the dancers were silent as they warmed up. Rada was also silent, but he wandered about the room, sometimes staring out of the windows, sometimes sketching. Bard itched to see what he drew, but he kept on task despite his curiosity; once he was through with the woodwork, he’d have many days to peek at the work of a fellow artist. For now, it was up and down the scaffolding and around the room.

He’d done the two end pieces at this end of the room as well as around the mantel when a knock came on the front door. Rada padded out again to let Ori into the house, and he met everyone with a bright smile and a wave. He came over to introduce himself to Bard. Was this small, slight, bookish young man brother to the worldly and mysterious Mr. Nori? Thran had said he was an expert data analyst, with a close to eidetic memory, but in his Fair Isle sweater vest, button-down collar shirt, and corduroy pants, he seemed the perfect candidate for children’s librarian at the local branch. How interesting it’d be to watch Ori in action when Irmo and the dancers moved past their warmups and began the day’s work on Immortal’s choreography.

He spent the rest of the morning quietly painting ribs of woodwork on one side of the ballroom. He made better time today than yesterday; the first coat of glossy white was much easier to coat than the prepped wood had been. Consequently, when the dancers moved from their barre and on to working on the ballet, Bard could have paid more attention to them, but he tried not to. If he could just dispense with this seemingly endless expanse of white woodwork, then he could look as much as he wanted, and sketch besides. So mostly he listened as he moved up and down the scaffolding.

Perhaps it was the lack of visuals that made Bard pay more attention to the voices of dancers and choreographer. Right away, he noticed the soft background of Ori’s voice, quietly repeating Irmo’s words. It took some moments to figure out that Ori didn’t repeat absolutely everything that Irmo said, which was what Thran had led him to believe. No, the soft voice didn’t repeat every name of a position, or every sequence of steps. Somehow, Ori had learned how to sift through what he saw and heard to repeat only the relevant portions as they worked on the reunion between the Maid and the Soldier, after the first battle. When Bard allowed himself a glance, Charisse and Luka were sorting out a pas de deux with Irmo; Thran hovered in the background as Death, watching the mortals in their exuberance. He hardly moved, compared to the other two, but the weight and gravity of those moves clearly set him apart as more than mortal. There was also a sense of want each time Death drew near to the Maid. Bard had to tear his regard away from the scene.

Damn so many endless miles of woodwork!

“No, no, that is not what I want, Luka! Yes, you play a young soldier, but you have been in many battles, and you are well hardened to it, and no, you must not flaunt your wounds! Let the Maid see them and lavish her care upon you! She is not your mama about to bandage your knee! You understand this, yes?”

“I’m trying to show that I love her and don’t want to hurt her!” Luka protested.

“Then why is it that you simper like so much applesauce?” Irmo protested in return.

“I don’t even know what that means!” Luka threw up his hands.

“Non, Irmo, c’est pour moi, allow me, for I am the only woman here, n’est-ce pas?” Charisse held up her hands in placation as Irmo started to sputter. She turned to Luka and softened her voice. “Luka, the Maid is so happy that her Soldier has survived, oui? When he sweeps her into his arms in such wild relief, she does not mind. She is as exuberant as he, and he does not feel the sting of his wounds until the Maid hugs him as hard as he hugs her. Perhaps there is some way to put blood in the costume, so that I can mark my hand in it, hold it up, and then we discover the Soldier’s wounds, which allows us to call the attendants, and we leave the battlefield with them. Is that what your vision shows you, Irmo?”

“Yes, yes, exactly!” Irmo nodded excitedly. “That is wonderful! Yes!”

“And then perhaps Death reaches out for the blood, too, only to have the Maid and Soldier swept away,” Thran suggested.

“Yes! I like that, too! Rada, blood in the costume? Can you make it so?”

Rada held up his hand in assent, and he scribbled a note in the corner of his sketchpad.

“Excellent! Yes! You will dance this again, as Charisse so perfectly described.”

“You are okay with this, Luka?” Charisse asked. “It makes sense?”

Luka’s expression wasn’t so wrinkled. “Yes, I like it. I understand it. It will make the Soldier appear braver, and more relieved to see his love, and the Maid will meet his passion with hers.”

“Perfect,” Charisse gave Luka a big, pleased smile. “Oui, this is much better.”

Bard allowed himself to watch the next run-through of the sequence, and yes, it was better, for all three dancers. As they bent over the papers to note the steps they had chosen, Bard turned back to his painting.

Gods, let him rip through the rest of this damned woodwork in record time. His fingers ached to hold a pencil and a sketchpad, not a woodwork paintbrush!

It was nearly two when the dancers called a brief break. Bard had climbed down from his scaffolding over an hour ago to add the veg to the chicken soup, and again just a few minutes ago to add the noodles. He threw together some biscuits, then let Ori know that food was ready anytime anyone wanted it. He drifted back into the kitchen to have his bowl of soup, and before long the others came in. Charisse had brought something, but she decided to have the warm soup instead. Luka had his usual schlocky burrito, but admitted that the soup smelled better and had a small bowlful. Thran, Rada, and Ori were elated to have something warm, and Irmo was prevailed upon to sit down and have a little. None of the dancers ate a lot; Thran had explained that dancing on a full stomach was neither easy nor desirable, and that most dancers made do with a few bites here and there throughout the day; they ate their biggest meal of the day at night. The biscuits were nice in that they were easy to eat and could be nibbled off and on. When Charisse confessed that she and many dancers loved cake as their nibble of choice, Bard filed that away, and decided an occasional batch of muffins might be welcome. Unlike many troupes, Thran’s decree of lunchtime meant that the dancers ate a bit more because they had time to let it settle as they discussed work they would do in the afternoon.

Bard left the four of them at the table to take Ori and Rada around the house on the tour he promised. He didn’t mind taking them upstairs to see the children’s rooms and the bathroom, as that was where most of his effort had been so far. Rada was interested in the bits of daybed in the main room and how it all fit together, but mostly he peered closely at everything with interest. The sitting room was where he finally had something to say, because Bard’s sketchbook lay open on the fruit crate coffee table, revealing the belly dancer he’d sketched recently.

“May I?” Rada asked, pointing to the sketchbook.

“Sure,” Bard shrugged. “I’ll do a lot more of that once I finish all the miles of white ballroom woodwork.”

“How interesting,” Rada mused, as Ori looked over his shoulder. “So many instants in time.”

“How long does it take you to do a sketch like this?” Ori asked, pointing to the one of Thran and Tilda sitting on the sofa for the little girl to recite her French vocabulary words.

“I took a bit longer for that one, because Thran and Tilda – that’s my youngest daughter – sat there for a bit. Maybe six or seven minutes. I worked my way through art school doing a lot of caricatures at carnivals and festivals and such, so I learned to work fast.”

“You put so much life in them,” Ori observed. “It doesn’t look staged at all, as if you sketched them without them knowing you were there.”

Bard grinned. “Thanks. Tilda was concentrating on her vocabulary words. She’s used to me sketching, so it doesn’t bother her. Thran’s used to being stared at, he told me, so both of them ignored the funny man with the pencil, and it made a good pose.”

“When you finish your woodwork, do you plan to sketch our dancers, or do you move on to more of your renovation?” Rada asked.

“I have a lot of sketching to do,” Bard ran a hand through his hair. “I’m working with an artist’s rep to help me get back to my art, and I owe him a lot of sketches. Just as soon as I can get the ballroom finished, I’ll trade the paintbrush for a pencil, and I’ll be in there.”

“That will be wonderful,” Rada said in his quiet, unexcited voice, but his eyes twinkled. “Most wonderful. I will be most delighted to watch you work.”

“I’m looking forward to seeing you work, too. I’m always interested to see how another artist approaches the same subject. But for the rest of today, I’m the house painter. I’ll head back in there so I can move the scaffolding before the dancers start again.”
Ori and Rada rejoined the dancers around the kitchen table, so Bard headed back to the ballroom with a marshaling breath.

Only half of the trim left to go.

* * *

Oh, such a difference in their work today! Bless Ori for understanding such a fundamental point about working with Irmo – narrowing his focus eliminated so much of the scattering of his thoughts. Here in the ballroom with only Charisse, Luka, and Thran to deal with, Irmo stuck to plotting their choreography. Most of the morning was spent on the first pas de deux between the Soldier and the Maid, danced to Juliet's theme from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet. While Thran watched that work closely to make the most of Death’s lurking presence, he had time to cast surreptitious looks Bard’s way. His husband did nothing to draw attention to himself, so it only was Thran’s affection that drew him repeatedly to see where Bard was and what he did. He stood atop the scaffolding, carefully painting the trim, then sat cross-legged, until the top portion was done. He climbed down with assured, spare grace, quiet despite his heavy boots, to perch on the lower rung of the scaffolding to continue down the strip of trim, and finally rolled the scaffolding out of the way to reach the bottom portion. The funny part was the very bottom, which was apparently easier to paint while upside down; Bard bent forward with hips against the wall as if he held a variation of the basic Uttanasana yoga pose, gave a half twist to his torso, and painted from the very bottom edge up to meet the part he’d already painted. He moved on to the next rib and repeated the same steps.

Thran couldn’t wait to get that painter’s body into the shower tonight and then into bed. That was the only suitable retaliation for Bard teasing him all morning with his grace, however unstudied and unconscious.

His husband went back to work in the ballroom before Thran, Irmo, and the rest. He was perched atop his scaffold, patiently tending to the trim on the second side of the ballroom. Now that the dance was roughed out for the Maid and Soldier’s reunion after the battlefield, Irmo moved on to consider the end of the second battle, where the Soldier fell. This music would be a reprise of the Prokofiev piece where Death collected souls from the battlefield, because this time He would collect the Soldier’s soul. Thran had much more to dance in this portion, so he couldn’t indulge in as many glances at his husband. By the time the children clattered home from school, he was surprised to see that Bard had completed all but one midrib and one end rib of the trim. Bard climbed down to greet the children, skirting around the dancers to disappear into the kitchen to get out their snacks for them. In a few minutes, the children appeared at the door in their sock feet, eager to see what the dancers were doing. When Irmo paused, Thran beckoned the children in for introductions. Legolas came right to him to give him a quick hug, and offered a smiling greeting to the others in the room as Thran made introductions. Charisse was her usual charming self, and even Luka managed not to put his foot in his mouth too badly. Rada was instantly drawn to the children, drinking up their laughter and answering it with silent chuckles of his own – no, not just silent laughter. What – what was he pulling out of his coat pocket? That didn’t look like a packet of ginger cookies!

“Oh! It’s a hedgehog!” Tilda gasped. “A real hedgehog! Look, Legs! Look, Bain! Sigrid, Mr. Brown has a hedgehog!”

“Gods, he does!” Sigrid exclaimed, drawing closer. “Oooh, look how cute he is!”

“He is cute!” Tilda said. “May I hold him? Or is he a she?”
“Oh, my dear, this is Sebastian, and he’ll sit quite nicely on your hand, but you have to hold him carefully. He’ll flex his quills at you if you frighten him.”

“Oh, I won’t frighten you, Sebastian,” Tilda breathed, as everyone but Irmo gathered around Tilda to look at the little animal. “There, you’re not afraid of me, are you?”

“Oh, tellement mignon! Si adorable!” Charisse cooed at the little animal sitting up in Tilda’s hand. “What a cute little thing you are!”

“Here, my dear,” Rada dug in another pocket and produced a bag of what looked like cat food. He sprinkled a couple of niblets in Charisse’ hand. “He’s quite polite. Just hold it for him by your fingertips, and he’ll take it quite nicely.”

Bemused, Luka scratched his ear. “Why do you have a hedgehog in your pocket?”

Rada looked apologetically at Irmo, who’d finally come over with a glare to see what had caused the interruption. “They hibernate, you know. But it’s not really safe for pets to hibernate in most situations. They need to stay warm. They’re most active at night, so it’s really no problem to carry him with me during the day to make sure he stays warm.” Sebastian took the bit of food from Charisse’s fingers with both tiny hands and nibbled away industriously, charming the dancer as well as Tilda. “I’m sorry. I thought the children would like to see him.”

“I do,” Bain nodded. “He’s neat! I’d like to hold him, too, please?”

Bard put his hand on Bain’s shoulder. “Why don’t you and the children take Mr. Brown into the sitting room, and you can all look at Sebastian while the dancers finish their work?”

“Great! Thanks, Da!” the children chorused. As they led Rada away, Bard snagged Sigrid long enough to tell her that he had about another hour’s work, and then he’d be in to start supper. She nodded, and then hastened after the other children. Bard winked at Thran.

“As long as you eat eventually, the rest is your call,” Bard nodded. He pointed to the wall. “So back on the scaffolding for me. I’m ready to be done with this part.”

Thran grimaced. “Until later, lyubov moya.”

Bard gave him a smile then climbed back up to resume his painting.

Thran and his two fellow dancers made good progress over the next hour, working with Irmo to do a suitable pas de trois for the Soldier’s death, the Maid’s frantic despair, and Death’s collection of the Soldier’s soul and escort to the gates of the Underworld. He was vaguely aware of Bard clambering wearily down from the scaffolding for the last time, finishing the lowest stretch of the last end rib, and easing out of the ballroom. After he left, there was no distraction from the ebb and flow of movement, rhythm, music, the steps of the other dancers swirling around him. The muse snapped into even clearer focus, and as the music played once more, the Soldier fell amid the rest of the fallen, Death descended to collect His harvest, and the Maid cast herself on the body of her love in utter futility. He could all but taste the emotions that poured from all three of them as Irmo’s muse guided and refined and nurtured. Yes, yes, yes – this was what the dance had to be!

He bore the faltering Soldier towards the gates of the Underworld. With one gesture he swept them open; with another, he shepherded the gathered souls before him, making sure he left none behind. That bright spark of life that ran after him so heedlessly? He ignored it – the living had no place in his kingdom. When the dead were all before him, he turned away from the world above, and gestured a third time to draw the gates closed behind him. The souls wavered around him, lost beacons atop a long descent, so he strode forward to lead them home. As for the spark behind him, banging at the gates, he was unconcerned. Her turn would come soon enough, as it did for all mortals. Only then would he turn towards her, collect her soul tenderly, and lead it home...

“I’ve got it, I’ve got it!” Charisse breathed, on her knees as she scribbled notations on the paper. “C’est parfait, vraiment. La perfection.”

Thran turned with a blink. For a moment, just a moment...

“Gods, Thran,” Luka gulped. “Oh, my fucking gods. You were Him, Thran. You were Death. You nailed it.”

Irmo gulped. Were his eyes damp? “Yes. Yes. Yes. You are sure you have it properly noted, Charisse? You cannot miss a piece of it, not a piece of it!”

“I think so. Check me, all of you. Thran, mon ange, you felt that, yes?”

Exhaustion crashed in on Thran; hosting the lord of the Underworld, even for just those few minutes, had sapped him. “I did. I very much did. That is what you wanted, Irmo? Because if it is not, then you do not have the right vision.”

“No, no, that was exactly it. It was. And yes, dear Charisse, you have it properly noted. Thank you. Thank you. Thank all three of you. This is so much better, so much. I am quite overwhelmed.”

“I think we can do no better tonight,” Thran said tiredly. “We have done something wonderful, without doubt. It is a good note to end on.”

Not even Irmo protested. In fact, he put both hands to his mouth as if he didn’t know whether to cry, scream, or laugh, so instead of doing any of them, he merely bid everyone a brief, subdued, humble goodbye, and let himself out.

Ori looked after the maestro with incredulous eyes. “That’s the first time I’ve seen Irmo so overwhelmed.”

Thran mustered a smile. “Then we will take that as a sign that we have progressed. We are done at a human hour, and happily so. We will see you again at eleven tomorrow.”

“Righto,” Ori smiled happily. “This was the best day yet!”

The three dancers laughed at Ori’s enthusiasm as they bid him farewell for the evening. Charisse and Luka stayed only long enough to properly cool down with Thran, then they, too, bid Thran goodnight. Thran turned off the ballroom lights and padded into the kitchen to find the children around the table working on their homework. Bard was beside Tilda, helping her with her geography. Everyone looked up as he came in.
“Everything okay?” Bard asked.

“More than okay,” Thran nodded. “I am very tired, but an amazing thing happened – the muse arrived, and three dancers became who we had only imitated just a moment before. It was such a feeling... I cannot describe it.”

Silence greeted his admission, and when he regarded his family, they gazed back with a gamut of emotions as he sank into a chair, glad to take his ease at last. Bain and Tilda revealed mostly incomprehension, but Sigrid and Bard seemed awed; Legolas had seen the dance take Thran before, and his face conveyed understanding. He smiled. “It was a very wonderful moment. It will make a very wonderful ballet even more so.”

“I’m glad it’s coming together,” Bard offered. “Do you want to savor the moment a bit longer, or can I bring you something to eat?”

“I would love something to eat. What did you have for supper?”

Bard looked guilty. “Just spaghetti. I wanted to get the last of the woodwork done, so I didn’t start anything earlier. I’ll have something more substantial tomorrow.”

“It was fine, Da,” Sigrid exhaled. She’d said that at least once before, apparently. “Legs and Bain ate buckets of the stuff. We had a good salad, and fruit, so no one’s suffering. And you made it through the woodwork once and for all. It’s all good.”

“Yeah, Da,” Bain muttered.

“We had cheese, too,” Tilda supplied, drawing Legolas’s laughter.

“Lots of cheese. It was really good,” his son nodded.

Thran held up both hands. “Then all is well. Did our horde leave any pasta uneaten?”

“No, but I can make you some, anyway. Or there’s soup from lunch left.”

“The soup, I think. That would be wonderful.”

“I’ll help you, Da,” Sigrid offered, but Bard shook her head.

“Thanks, sweetness, but I’d rather you keep on with your paper so you can have the free time this weekend for your meet.”

“I’ll help,” Legolas got up with Bard. “I can do the biscuits and milk.”

“What is this?” Thran looked up as Tilda and Bain got up, too, leaving only Sigrid at the table. “A track meet, then?”

“It’s regionals, all day Saturday,” Sigrid explained. “I didn’t think I was going, but I am for the four hundred. That’s pretty cool. But I’ll be there probably all morning and afternoon, so Finn, Killian, and Tara changed the early film we were going to see for a later one after supper at Tara’s house so I could go, too, which was nice of them. So I’m trying to get most of my paper written before Saturday so I don’t have to worry about it.”

“Such a busy day you will have on Saturday, then,” Thran smiled as Legolas put a glass of milk and a plate of warmed biscuits beside his place at the table. Tilda followed behind with a bowl of salad, and Bain with another bowl of peach slices. As the children all resumed their places at the table,
Bard followed with a big bowl of steaming soup and a handful of utensils. “Look at this! A huge feast appears as if by magic! Thank you, each one.”

“How does your paper progress?” Thran asked, eagerly spooning up his soup.

“I like it so far,” Sigrid replied, studying her computer screen. “I’m up to the part about the sepsis setting in, and I have notes on what Garfield’s doctor did after that made it worse, so I think I’ll make a convincing case of it. I’m trying to get it all done by Friday so I can forget about it Saturday, then review Sunday to make any little cleanups. And I’ve got a trig test Friday, which doesn’t make it easy.”

“Don’t remind me,” Bain grumbled. “Legs and I have a pre-algebra test Friday, too. I hate pre-algebra!”

“I have an art test Thursday,” Tilda ventured. “But I like art.”

“How does one take a test for art?” Thran asked.

“We draw a bunch of things,” Tilda explained. “I can’t exactly study for it.”

“Okay, let’s be a little quieter so everyone can study,” Bard asked gently. “And let Thran eat. He’s had a long day.”

Silence descended as the children turned back to their work. Thran was grateful for the silence, so that he could concentrate on his meal. The hot soup brought welcome warmth into his core, easing his tight muscles. The salad and fruit and milk were also welcome, and he nibbled a biscuit gratefully. Bard brought him another bowl of soup without asking, and he ate every bit of it. He sat back to enjoy a warm, full stomach.

“Tea?”

He nodded, too comfortable to speak.

“Go wash, then. Get warm and comfortable, and I’ll have tea ready when you’re done.”

“That bears no argument, my saint,” Thran exhaled deeply. “I will be down in short order.”

He took himself upstairs, undressed, and tried not to moan in ecstasy when hot water cascaded down on him in the shower. Such complete, total, utter bliss...

His fingers were as wrinkled as raisins when he could finally bear to turn off the water. He dried his hair and dressed in soft leggings, Henley, and thick socks to rejoin the family. Sigrid had taken herself to her room to work on her paper, Tilda and Bard were in the sitting room drawing, and Bain and Legolas were side by side on the other sofa playing the car race game. Thran sat down beside Tilda to look at her sketchbook. She had painstakingly copied a simple vase that Bard had drawn for her, carefully shadowing it and matching the curves on both sides. He was content to listen to her and Bard talk back and forth about her efforts as he sipped the tea Bard had put on the coffee table for him.

“What do you think, Ada?” Tilda said at length, when she’d decided her drawing was done.

“I think it is very nice – I can tell that the light comes from the right, and it is even one side to the other, and it is not something you see through like glass. I think it looks like a blue vase.”
“We can’t use colors yet,” Tilda sighed. “But when we can, I’ll make you a blue one.”

“I would like that very much, Kukla.”

“It’s getting late, little doll. Sigrid’s through her shower, so you head up before the lads decide to.”

“Okay, Da. Can we read tonight?”

“It’s a bit late, so let’s put it off until tomorrow. The next chapter’s a long one.”

“Okay,” Tilda replied, clearly disappointed. “I hope we can tomorrow, then.”

“Me, too. Upstairs with you.”

Tilda closed her sketchbook and stowed her drawing pencils in their box before she went upstairs. The boys wound up their car race and headed upstairs, probably to sneak in a bit of zombie apocalypse before they had their turn in the shower. Thran was happy to slide over into Tilda’s vacant seat and slump comfortably beside his husband. When Bard’s arm went atop the sofa cushions behind his head, Thran leaned his head on Bard’s shoulder and wrapped his hand around Bard’s thigh. He rubbed slowly, appreciating the warmth beside him.

“A good day,” Bard murmured.

Thran hummed assent, letting his eyes close. A soft chuckle reached his ears.

“You’re too big to be a lap cat. A very large Borzoi, maybe.”

Thran grinned, though he kept his eyes shut. “Shall I roll over and let you rub my... belly?”

“Hmm. I’m not sure exactly what to think about that.”

“I promise not to woof while you do it. Though I might moan.”

Fingers insinuated themselves into Thran’s hair. “How about I stick to the G-rated bits until the children are safely in bed?”

Thran heaved a sigh. “I suppose that would be wise.”

Bard chuckled, and stroked Thran’s hair until he was all but asleep. Or perhaps he did fall asleep, because when Bard shook him gently, he found himself flat on his back on the sofa with his head in Bard’s lap. He blinked, and looked up to find Bard smiling fondly at him.

“Did I fall asleep?”

“You did.”

“For how long?”

“Maybe twenty minutes. One of the lads is still in the shower, so you didn’t miss much, other than the blowjob I gave you. You seemed to like it.”

Thran shut his eyes. “You did no such thing. I would never sleep through such a sacrament.”

“You smiled a lot, I grant you.”

“Tcha, silly man, do not tease me. But I am sorry to make a pillow out of you.”
“Don’t be. It gave me a wonderful excuse not to move for the twenty minutes you were asleep.”

Opening his eyes again, Thran looked up into Bard’s tired but smiling brown eyes. “Oh, lyubov moya, you are just as exhausted as I am after you painted all day without stop. Every muscle must ache.”

Bard’s fingers soothed a path through Thran’s hair. “The ballroom’s done. You had a good day today with Irmo and the others, and tomorrow will be better. I’ll get the scaffolding out of there, and you’ll have your sanctuary without a painter in it.”

Thran found Bard’s hand and brought it to his lips to kiss. “There will always be an artist in my sanctuary, whether he is there in body or not. Each time I look at such a beautiful room, it will remind me of how hard you worked to make it so.”

Bard snickered. “Make it so... did you hear Irmo say that to Rada this morning, something about the costumes? The bloody captain of the Starship Enterprise, telling everyone to make it so.”

Thran’s snicker joined Bard’s. “He is much more imperious than any of the captains of that legendary ship, no? I do not mean to be imperious when I say that you have made something so.”

“You’re not. It’s very sweet the way you say it. Come on; the shower just finished, so the lads are done. Let’s put you to bed before you fall asleep again, and put the children to bed, and put me in the shower. I am rank.”

“Honestly so,” Thran sighed. “I do not mind. You smell good even when you say you are rank. I cannot wait to ambush you in the barn this summer when you are truly are rank.”

That got a guffaw out of Bard. “You’ve got a rank kink?”

A low, deep rumble was Thran’s reply. “You know this already. It snared a certain sexual vampire quite completely.”

“I thought it was the smoke.”

“That was entrancing, yes.”

“Any other kinks you want to tell me about? Ladies’ underwear? Bondage? Whips and dungeons?”

Thran laughed. “No, occasionally, and no.”

“Occasionally? What occasionally?”

“I do like leashes. You know this already, too.”

“I do. What about more bondage than that? I admit I don’t understand the attraction.”

“Oh, I can explain that to you. The bonds are to keep you safe.”

“Safe? How do you mean?”

“Some people, who would otherwise be inhibited, find that the bonds free them to enjoy themselves. The bonds mean they do not have to refuse the enjoyment that follows. They are safe to enjoy whatever comes.”

Bard silently stroked Thran’s hair for some seconds as he digested that. “I never thought about it that way. I thought it was just coercion.”
“Some may use it thus, I suppose. But that verges into nonconsensual, a matter of power rather than arousal. I am not interested in that at all. But the freedom to enjoy oneself, that I can understand.”

“Have you ever tried it?”

“I have never had a partner whom I trusted so much. It is perhaps similar to how you did not want to bottom with anyone before me.”

“Makes sense.”

“Why? Do you want to try it?”

“I haven’t decided. Do you?”

“I will try anything twice, but only if you want to, too.”

“Hmm. Maybe I’ll have to get my seer a leash.”

Grinning, Thran hummed as he sat up to stretch. “You can borrow mine. But not tonight.”

“Not tonight,” Bard echoed. “We’re both well knackered.”

“We are happy and in accord, and that is a blessing.”

Arms went around him, and Bard rubbed his cheek against Thran’s back. “It is.”

The hands clasped around Thran’s waist were both well bruised and scratched. Thran winced to think how they must have pained his husband through so much painting, though he’d never spoken of it. Bard must do no more renovation until he healed, until he had filled at least two sketchbooks full of wonders for Bilbo. Thran would insist on this. But now was not the time to think about more work, not as tired as they both were. He tightened hands on Bard’s wrists.

“Come. Upstairs with the two of us.”

“No argument from me,” Bard murmured, pressing a kiss on Thran’s neck. “Rounds first, then up we go.”

They circled the house as they usually did, then headed upstairs. The children were put to bed, all but Sigrid who still labored on her paper. She promised to put it aside shortly, so Thran and Bard kissed her goodnight and then retreated to their bedroom. Bard headed right into the shower, leaving Thran to turn down the bed and crawl in. He left his Henley on until the sheets had warmed a bit, then stripped it off to snuggle into the warmth with a sigh of relief. Before long, Bard came out of the bathroom to crawl into bed beside him.

“Lyubov moya?” he said drowsily, as Bard stroked his braid.

“Hmm?” Bard answered, just as drowsily.

“These kinks you asked me of?”

Bard chuckled and stroked Thran’s arm that crossed his chest. “What about them?”

“Tell me what kinks are yours.”

“You already know what mine are.”
“Tell me anyway.”

“I’ve never done fantasy with anyone but you. I like that a lot.”

Thran smiled. “I like that, too. To be someone else, to make a story, to fuck you in so many different ways... all are so, so nice.”

Bard snorted in laughter. “For an ethereal creature of the light, you swear like a minion of the devil.”

“I like to because it shocks you. It turns you on.”

“Only when you talk about fucking me. When you swore at Angelo in the park, it turned my blood to ice.”

Thran refused to let the drug gang sour another moment of Clan Ffyrnig’s life. “I am Russian. That is how we meet any threat. Tell me another kink.”

“His name’s Thran Oropherson. He’s every kink I could ever want – angel, devil, vampire, dancer, sous chef, Mandarin, sultan, royal seer, pirate’s spoils, husband, every lover I could imagine, all rolled into one hellaciously beautiful body. How lucky am I?”

Thran looked up at his husband, who tilted his head to meet Thran’s eyes. He was smiling.

“You quite take my breath away.”

“See what it’s like, angel?” Bard stroked Thran’s jaw. “That’s what happens to me, every time you smile.”

Bard slid down to press a kiss on Thran’s lips, a kiss Thran humbly returned before they settled in their usual tangle of arms and legs to sleep. Gods, just two days after a terrible, terrible fight, Bard had put aside his hurt and disappointment to affirm how closely he still held Thran in his soft warrior’s heart. He curled around Thran to keep him warm, nestled his nose in Thran’s hair, and stroked Thran’s ribs slowly before he drifted into sleep.

Bard wasn’t the lucky one, not at all. Thran was.
Chapter 80

Chapter Summary

A saint finds himself snared by Immortal's siren song, and an angel incurs a cherub's wrath. And will a special guest soon appear?

Chapter Notes

Many, many thanks to johnnysmitten for allowing Hal Galadhrim to appear, if only in a brief mention, in this chapter. He'll pay us a visit in a chapter or two, so be prepared. Hal is entirely johnnysmitten's character from the story, "Heartsigh," and the most fun ever!

At last, a day without renovation! Bard zipped through the children’s lunches and breakfasts with anticipation, because today he’d be back in the ballroom not as a workman painter, but as an artist. Maybe he’d get to watch Rada work, too. He knew little about costume design, but imagined it began the same way as so much of his sculpture did – with a picture, whether a rough pencil sketch or a more polished color piece. He couldn’t wait to find out. And if he could manage to be in the ballroom when Irmo’s muse struck – how amazing would that be?

He laughed at the children’s usual chorus of how they were off and leaving, too, then wished them the expected response to do their best, just as always. Beside him, Thran waved a smiling farewell, then trotted to keep up with him as he headed home.

“Your spirit is light and quick today, my saint,” Thran observed, lengthening his stride to keep up as they headed home.

“I’m excited to sketch today,” Bard admitted. “No more woodwork!”

“Your plan is to sketch all day, then?”

Bard’s nod was emphatic. “Even if I didn’t need the sketches to show Bilbo, I would. I’d finally gotten to a place where I could, then we needed the ballroom, so I put it aside. I missed it.”

“I am sorry to take you from your art for so long,” Thran stroked Bard’s hair as they paused for Bard to unlock the mudroom door. “And I am glad you plan to resume your sketches today. That means that I do not have to insist. Your hands must have hurt a great deal through so much painting. I would like it if you do no more renovation until they have healed.”

Bard looked back at Thran, gratified at the worried wrinkles that creased his husband’s brow. “I appreciate that, angel. It’d be great if I can spend a few days away from a paintbrush, I grant you. The more sketches I can do for Bilbo, the better, too.”

“When do you plan to see him again?”

Bard led the way into the kitchen. “He said three weeks, so I thought I’d use as much of the next week as I could to work on my stuff, then see him maybe a week from Monday or so.”

Thran nodded. “Then I have an unpleasant but necessary piece of business that we both must see to.”

“What, did one of the toilets back up?” Bard teased. “No, that can’t be it. I’m the only one who knows how to fix that.”

“Funny saint,” Thran sniffed. “The house is fine. I speak of the dreaded chore to file income taxes.”

Bard winced. “Oh. That. The thing I put off as long as possible every year. Not that it takes me very long. I just don’t like being reminded that I live below the poverty line.”

Thran shot him a look. “Do you make a joke?” he ventured.

Bard smirked as he got eggs out of the fridge. “No. Until you came along, the children and I did live below the poverty line. Welcome to the new America. We have a few folks richer than Croesus, a dying middle class, and a whole lot of working poor.”

Thran looked stricken.

Bard shrugged. It was hard to know what to say. No, it wasn’t fine, and no, he hadn’t stopped worrying about it, and no, he didn’t take Thran’s money for granted. There was no point upsetting Thran about any of that, so instead he got out the frying pan. “Omelet, or scrambled eggs, or hard boiled?”

Swallowing, Thran took a deep breath and looked away. “Scrambled is fine. Whatever you prefer.”

“Don’t worry, angel. You knew I was poor when you met me. I got by. I was more worried for the children than myself. So as much as I love you, I also thank you for sparing my children hardships they didn’t deserve.”

“I forget these things because we are not poor here. You did not seem poor in the city, not given how well you managed for your children. I just...”

Bard nodded as he cracked eggs into a bowl and stirred them with a fork. “That’s why I don’t like figuring my taxes. I usually get most of what’d been taken out of my wages back, because I had the children, which helped. Still, it’s demoralizing, seeing in black and white how little I have for them. So what makes you bring up such a cheerful subject?”

“My – our financial planner emailed me my tax workbook yesterday. I have already received all the documents that I expected, so I prefer to schedule an appointment to dispense with this as soon as possible. We did not marry until January, but I thought I would offer you the chance to have Hal file yours as well as mine. He is very astute, and I would like you to get to know him before we file next year. How long will it take you to collect your documents?”

Grinning, Bard ducked into the pantry and came out with a shoebox. “Documents collected.”

Thran’s jaw dropped, drawing Bard’s laughter. “It’s not like I have a lot of stuff to collect, angel. A few W-2 statements are the bulk of it. Here, hold that while I scramble the eggs. Have a look if you want. Toast?”

“Yes, please,” Thran’s answer was automatic as he took the shoebox. “You?”

“Please. Two slices of rye.”
Thran opened the box long enough to see the few slips of paper that barely covered the bottom. He sat the box down on the island, and got the bread and toaster out. He loaded it with three slices of bread, started them toasting, and found the honey and butter for the table. He collected plates and put them beside Bard busily scrambling eggs, and checked that the teapot still held enough tea for the two of them. In short order, they sat down at the table to eat. Thran ate, but he was so distracted that Bard leaned over to touch his arm.

“Hey. Your eggs are getting cold.”

Thran met his eyes, then looked back at his plate, shaking his head. “I am sorry, Bard. That I pay your breakfast so little attention, and that your life before us was so hard.”

“We’re both better off now. My children are better cared for, and you and Legolas have a home and a family. We’re okay.”

Thran sighed, but sketched a nod. “You are right. It does no good to brood over what is no more. Though it is a very Russian thing to do.”

Bard chuckled. “So tell me about your financial planner. Hal. When do we go to see him?”

Thran smiled. “Oh, we do not go to him; he comes to us. That is one advantage to have wealth. We have found that it works better for him to visit me, for he generally has one question or another, and all of my records are here, so better to answer it when he poses it than to wait. He will sort through our things for last year, but I also want him to prepare us for next year. For example, some of the renovation work you did may qualify for a deduction – things such as insulation and energy efficient appliances, perhaps. Hal will know.”

“He sounds like a savvy guy.”

Thran’s face finally cleared as a perverse grin swept over his face. “He is exceptionally so. But he is also a person it takes time to appreciate.”

Bard swallowed his eggs. “Oh? Why is that?”

Thran considered, smiling through two bites of toast. “There is no delicate way to say it. Hal Galadhrim is what they call a flaming queen.”

“He’s a – gods, there’s a story behind this.”

Thran continued to munch his toast. “He was highly recommended to me about two years after I emigrated. I was a name, and I had done well with my investments early on, mostly because while Legolas recovered from the trauma at the train station, I did not dance. I had much time to... consider how else to occupy myself when my son did not need me.”

“You played the market,” Bard surmised.

“I did,” Thran shrugged. He sipped his tea. “I needed the distraction, and so I did very well. Hal specializes in the finances of the untraditionally wealthy – dancers and artists, among others. I am one such, so it seemed a good match. He was not what I expected at all. Much more flamboyant by far.”

“Flamboyant... how?”

Thran’s chuckle was rich. “Women love him. He is the perfect girlfriend, and has an opinion on everything. Quite the gossip socially, though notoriously closemouthed about his clients, which is exactly what one wants in a good financial planner. He will be on his good behavior to meet you the first time. But once he knows you, he is prone to the most outrageous observations.”

Bard put his elbow on the table and cradled his chin in his hand to regard his husband. “He sounds like a character. I’m curious – you could have any financial planner you want. Why Hal?”

“I trust him,” Thran said without concern. “He is unapologetic of what he is, comfortable in his own skin. He is also very funny. He suffers no fools, and he is unsparing in his financial advice to the benefit of his clients. His expertise in the world markets has earned me several thousands of dollars, and saved me several thousands more. He is honest, and refuses to finagle the ledgers for anyone. I am assured that I pay my proper taxes and am unlikely to be audited.”

“There won’t be much to interest him in my paltry box of nonsense.”

“Perhaps not this year. But next year, I do not think that will be true.”

Bard scraped up the last of his eggs. “I hope not. I appreciate you looking out for my interests, cariad. Gods know I need all the help I can get. Arrange away.”

“Perhaps early next week? You do not need to sit in on my part, though you are welcome to, and I encourage you to, not just to hear of my concerns, but also to see how Hal works. I expect mine to need perhaps an hour, perhaps half an hour more. Your portion may be another hour or less, depending on what Hal has to say.”

“Right now, only sketching’s on my plate for next week, and maybe seeing Bilbo towards the end. And I’ll look for some marble or such for the half bath floor. That’s it.”

“I will send Hal a message this morning, then. But for now, I must get to the barre.”

“I’ll leave you to it. I’ll be in here for a while, figuring out what to make for lunch and supper. Maybe I’ll do some muffins, too. Charisse says she likes cake.”

“She is very sweet, is she not?” Thran smiled. “I hope you get to see another side of her at some point, though. She is a very experienced, very tough in the most delicate of ways. She slaps Luka on a regular basis, so gently that he does not realize how she keeps him in line. She might actually make him a decent dancer over the next several months.”

“He’s not good?” Bard looked at Thran in surprise. “He seems very good to me, but I admit ignorance.”

“Technically, he is very good. But he needs to pay more attention to his work ethic, and I hope that we can soon get him not to try to make the joke about everything he observes. He is not very funny. Only young and awkward.”

“We’ve all been through that phase.”

“Most of us get through that phase. So far, Luka remains dismally mired in it.”

Laughing, Bard got up and collected the dishes. “Good luck with that, then.”

“Thank you. Here, I will help with the dishes.”

They washed and wiped in comfortable silence, then headed upstairs to brush teeth, make the bed, and change into the day’s attire. Thran disappeared into the ballroom, and Bard puttered in the kitchen until knocks on the front door signaled the arrival of the dancers. He greeted Charisse, Luka, and Irmo in rapid succession, and sent them all back to the ballroom. He went back to the kitchen to finish his stew prep – lamb and vegetables – and got out chicken to marinate for supper. Then he hastened to collect his sketchbook and pencils. He sat in the sitting room to jot down a list of what he wanted to sketch today, and did a few warmup sketches before heading to the ballroom.

Damn – the scaffolding was still in place. It was too late to take it down now, given that the dancers were already at the barre. Maybe it’d offer him a different perspective, so he climbed up to arrange himself for sketching, liking the unusual view of the proceedings. He sketched quickly, not thinking but observing, letting his hand flit over the paper to reveal what had caught his eyes. Irmo was as nuanced in his physical movements as the dancers, if not as emotionally; from the precise way he moved, he must’ve danced at one time. Slowly, the differences between the four sorted themselves out – petite, delicate, feminine Charisse; robust, exuberant, puppyish Luka; elegant and otherworldly Thran, and technically precise Irmo. He got several good sketches done before it grew close to eleven. He climbed down from the scaffolding to check on his soup, and to hear the knock on the door when Ori and Rada arrived.

He’d just thrown the veg into the pot along with a good slurp of red wine when the first knock came. That was Ori, who came into the kitchen long enough to sniff appreciatively before he headed to the ballroom. His batch of cranberry orange muffins went into the oven before Rada appeared; the costumier headed right for the ballroom as soon as he bid Bard a cordial good morning. Bard lingered in the kitchen until the muffins were done, and brought a plateful into the ballroom when he went back to his sketching. Both Ori and Rada were quick to help themselves, and Bard had one himself as he decided to station himself near Rada for his next sketches, in the hopes to see how the costumier worked.

Today, the dancers ran through the choreography they had for Immortal’s first act. This lacked the battle scenes that the whole company would dance, but they had blocked the rest out. They ran through it slowly, without the full emotional portion, only the technical to see how the steps flowed together. This was a fascinating process that Bard took full advantage of, making several sketches of Irmo gesturing and talking. Now that the choreographer was more narrowly focused, his genius stood out as the dancers moved, seeming by instinct to know when just a small adjustment in a hand or the addition of an extra step or turn evoked much more emotional content. Bard’s training as a caricaturist stood him in good stead as he sketched rapidly, sometimes getting two or three sketches of the same exchange between Irmo and the dancers.

Charisse was a delight to sketch, and Bard had no problem finding ways to express her sunny outlook, whether she danced the Maid or was just herself during a discussion. He did one he particularly liked when Luka’s Soldier swept the Maid into his arms, for her face was aglow as he bore her aloft and across the floor. Contrasted with that was Thran’s expression as Death, struck dumb at how a living mortal drew Him so completely. The lost expression on Death’s face was both chilling and heartbreaking, for the god did not understand His predicament in the least, or what fate awaited Him.

“You are a joy to watch,” Rada murmured softly at his elbow, startling Bard. “Oh, I’m sorry. You were very caught up in your work. I’m sorry to interrupt. But I’ve been watching how quickly you work, and yet you capture the essence of each sketch so completely in just seconds. It’s wonderful.”

“Thank you,” Bard ran a hand through his hair. “It’s true I get caught up in it. It took a long time before that happened – I used to think too much about what I drew, and everything came out too stiffly to suit me. Now... I try not to think so much. Everything turns out better that way.”

“You’ve found what works for you so well. I wonder...” Rada tapped his pencil against his front teeth meditatively, then brought out Sebastian to absentlly feed the little creature a corner of his muffin. “I wonder if perhaps we might trade ideas to help my costume sketches along? The essences you’re so adept at capturing... they would add so much to the costumes, and I’d like to work with you more closely. I’d give you full credit with me on them, to be sure.”

Bard blinked. “I’d love to work with you, however you’d like. I don’t know anything about designing costumes, but I’d like to learn, and if I can help, I’m glad to.”

Rada offered the widest smile Bard had seen so far. “Oh, that would be fantastic. Would you like to see what I’ve come up with so far?”

“I would,” Bard said with enthusiasm. “There’s plenty of room to spread out on the kitchen table or the sitting room, if you need it.”

“We likely will. We can leave the dancers alone with Ori to manage for a while without us, then this afternoon when they move on to the second act, you and I will be more prepared to think about how to translate that work into the appropriate costumes.”

“That sounds exciting,” Bard nodded. “We can tell Ori what we’re up to, and then take over the sitting room.”

They made their exit, and soon were ensconced in the sitting room with fresh tea. Rada laid his sketchbook on the coffee table, but didn’t open it yet. He savored his tea deeply, inhaling the fragrant steam, and letting the cup warm his fingers. Bard let him proceed in his own time, glad to enjoy his tea as well. Eventually, Rada looked up from his concentration.

“I suppose it doesn’t look like I’m doing very much,” he offered with a whimsical smile. “I’m told that I look like I’m somewhere else a lot of the time. But it’s just my version of trying not to think too much at first. I want to hear what Irmo says, and how he and the dancers go back and forth, and especially the brief snippets of meta-level discussion about symbolism and intent and purpose. That gives me so much insight into what my costumes must reveal to the watcher.”

“That makes sense,” Bard nodded. “You don’t want to make costumes for Roman soldiers if the choreographer wants hip hop street warriors.”

“Exactly!” Rada’s eyes grew wide, and he leaned forward in excitement, but his voice stayed as soft as ever. “Exactly right.”

“Have you picked up anything so far from Irmo and the dancers yet?”

“Quite a bit, actually,” Rada tapped his finger against his chin as he looked off into space. “It’s really quite fascinating. For example, have you noticed that the music is very modern for the sections that the Soldier and Maid and other mortals dance? The music for the Underworld is much older, much richer, much more across several old cultures. That’s what made me realize that this ballet is a story told from Death’s point of view, not from any of the mortals.”

“Really?” Bard sat back to consider that.

Rada nodded with confidence. “It is. Death is very, very old. Think about the Underground, His kingdom. It’s full of enclaves from hundreds, likely thousands of cultures. Think of how many tongues are spoken there! How many songs are sung there? How many forms of dress would we find? How many rituals must be conducted there every day? How rich a place it is! How can the world above compare to that? It’s a temporary, transient, superficial place compared to Death’s kingdom. Much more stripped down. Mostly black and white and grey, compared to all the colors in the Underworld.”
“That makes perfect sense,” Bard agreed.

“So I must make that more obvious in my costumes, you see. But that’s not all – the mortals are all alive, and so their costumes must reflect the spark of their lives. Those in the Underworld are not alive, but their souls retain something, so their spark must be far dimmer. Death must be the brightest thing in the Underworld, for He is a god. Yet even his spark can’t outshine the spark of the Maid. So I want to make that distinction, too.”

“That’s a lot to do with just fabric,” Bard said.

Rada nodded quickly. “I think so, too. So I thought to make some of this obvious by making the costumes of the Maid and Soldier and other mortals very simple, almost like a cartoon – rather one-dimensional. They will have light elements that show the brightness of mortal life – I think a single element over the heart. The costumes of the denizens of the Underworld will be much richer, and their hearts will glow with a much dimmer light.”

“Maybe you can also mix up the Underworld costumes a bit, too,” Bard offered. “Over the ages, maybe the souls lose focus, or become richer, whichever makes sense to you. Either way, they’re together through the ages with all this mixup of cultures. Maybe the fez of the Arab is now on the head of the Nordic skier, and the Cretan dress is on the Spanish Moor, and so on.”

“I like that very much,” Rada nodded, taking up his sketchbook to flip to the page that held his notes, and scribbled a new entry on the page. “We will see which interpretation Irmo likes better – do the souls grow richer and nuanced, or lose focus and become more diffuse yet uniform? That also makes it much easier to make the rich environment that Irmo wants for the Underworld set. Lots of shadowy artifacts from so many places... yes, that will be very useful.”

“This fits with what I’ve heard Thran say about the troll market set being the only set, and the rest being very stark. Compared to the Underworld, the world above must seem very empty and stark to Death.”

“The troll market?” Rada asked curiously.

“Oh, it’s what Thran and I have been calling the Underworld set. Have you seen the Hellboy film about the Golden Army?”

“Ah, of course,” Rada nodded. “Yes, I have seen those scenes, if not the entire film. It was professional curiosity, you see. That is a most wonderful set, and the costumes are entirely engaging. Yes, that is a good concept to keep in mind. That same level of complexity would be a good model for the Underworld.”

Rada leaned forward to show Bard the concepts he’d worked up so far. As he paged through his sketchbook, many whimsical designs appeared one after the other. Rada’s style seemed almost from another age – he’d be the perfect illustrator for Alice in Wonderland with his trailing curlicues and tendrils. Several of the costumes bore faint watercolor washes of filmy blues, greens, ambers, and roses. The Maid in her simple shift and peasant vest was well captured, evoking all of Charisse’s charm, vitality, and devotion to her Soldier. The Soldier’s costume, breeches and tunic with an armored breastplate, helmet, shield, and sword, was almost as far along. Here and there were concepts for mortal civilians and Underworld denizens. The one costume that was conspicuously missing was for Death Himself. When Bard asked Rada about that, the costumier sighed heavily.

“That is the hard one, yes. I don’t think the trappings of a king are right. Nor do I want to do anything that resembles a Grim Reaper in yards of black gauze and carrying a scythe. He needs to be much more formidable than either.”
“I’ve had this thought...” Bard ventured.

Rada smiled. “I thought you might.”

“The way Thran dances his Death Collecting the Souls of the Dead solo... it’s a ritual, isn’t it? It’s a sacred rite, no matter how gruesome we mortals find it, and calls for ceremonial robes. I saw a kabuki troupe once. The dancers were from another world, metaphors for things I didn’t understand, but I understood that they performed much more than a representational dance. So what if Death on the battlefield looks very kabuki-like, or like a samurai warrior? Not Japanese, but very stylized, a metaphor for things no mortal understands. He could shed those for something more elaborate or different in the Underworld. And when He tries to woo the Maid, He could be down to just tights and tunic and some kind of headdress that makes Him very tall compared to the Maid, to show him at his most vulnerable.”

“I like all of that,” Rada nodded. “That is well thought out about Death. I would like to tell Irmo your thoughts about this at lunch, and see what he thinks. That will filter into the dance, and then when we sketch, we’ll have more to work with.”

Bard grinned. “That’d be great. Just great.”

“Then if you in your sketches find those moments of essence, I will add them to my sketches, and around we’ll go again.”

“We’ve got a plan,” Bard agreed. “I’m going to enjoy this, I have to confess.”

“So am I,” Rada leaned forward conspiratorially. “I do enjoy having another in league with my musings.”

“It’s a good feeling when you’ve got someone else to help you get into trouble,” Bard snickered. “Let me check the stew, and maybe we can coax a few people out of the ballroom.”

“Oh, the smell alone would draw me. It smells quite delightful. Lamb, isn’t it?”

It wasn’t long before Ori appeared, then Charisse and Thran after him. Irmo and a subdued Luka appeared last, but the young man’s demeanor perked up as Rada distracted Irmo with the ideas about Death and the costumes that Rada and Bard had come up with. Lunch was very animated as the group batted the ideas back and forth. Ori displayed pictures of kabuki artists and videos of their dances on his tablet for everyone to look at. Thran sat at the table trying out the stylized head movements that they saw on Ori’s tablet, and Charisse and Luka offered their critiques. Bard found it all so exciting that he well understood how Thran had gotten so caught up in the ballet to the exclusion of all else. Maybe Bard drew and the dancers danced, but he felt so much more alive in the company of others as busily creating as he was regardless of the different media.

The rest of the day swept by, filled with sketching as well as collaboration with Irmo, the dancers, and Rada. It was hard to believe how fast the hours had passed, even when the children came home from school. Bard was sorry to leave the dancers to their work, but he wanted to make sure the children were welcomed home with more than an empty kitchen. Rada trailed along behind him, delighted when he was greeted with smiles and questions about Sebastian. The little animal quickly made an appearance, and he was well on the way to being spoiled rotten with attention.

Bard was in the middle of supper prep when Luka, Charisse, and Ori came into the kitchen to bid everyone goodbye for the day. That was a surprise – it was only five o’clock, early for Irmo to call a halt. Charisse paused when Bard commented to that effect.
“It is not so early for Thran, I fear,” she shrugged. “Rada is still there, too. Please, in an hour, go in there and tell them to stop. It is not good for Irmo to work Thran so hard for too long, and at this moment he works Thran very hard.”

Bard’s jaw tightened and he paused in arranging the marinated chicken into the baking pan. At the kitchen table, Tilda looked up from her drawing pad with an uncertain expression. “I’ll stop that right now. I won’t let Thran get so overwhelmed again.”

Luka gave Charisse an uncomfortable look. “I, um, understand now why you were so angry on Monday, Bard. I’m sorry I made you worry – it wasn’t like you think, and I’m straight, so – um, so I mean –”

“Oh Luka,” Charisse sighed, “you do not know what you mean. As I say so often, very little is about you, and very much is about the world around you. So do not further concern Bard over something that was never a concern to begin with.”

Luka grimaced. “I’m sorry – again.”

“As you should be, but you make progress, in that at least this time you know you have reason to be sorry. So, Bard, let me try to explain. Irmo and Thran thrash out something important, something radical. Luka and I add nothing to that effort, and so we depart, and Ori wisely takes himself out of the effort, too. This effort is necessary, because it defines the character of Death, but it is very intense. So do not let it go for more than an hour, or I think anything productive will vanish. They are both so intense, and such intensity should not burn too long.”

Bard swallowed his alarm. He swallowed again when Tilda edged close to him and slipped an arm around his waist. He looked down at her with a reassuring smile, enough that she relaxed and smiled back at him. “Okay, I’ll let it go until six, then I’ll break up the party.”

“That is good,” Charisse gave him a fond smile. “Take good care of our Thran, mon cher. La petite Tilda, you take good care of ton père, oui?”

Tilda nodded. “Toujours, mademoiselle.”

Charisse’s eyes widened, and her mouth flew open. “C’est génial! La petite parle le français!”

Tilda grinned. “Juste un petit peu.”

“You do very well! Thran, he teaches you?”

“I have lessons in school, but Thran and Legolas help me a lot. My brother and sister are learning, too.”

“I’m the only ignorant one,” Bard shrugged, ruffling Tilda’s hair. “But so far, they’re not talking about me behind my back, so I’m good.”

“That is wonderful,” Charisse declared. “Eh bien, time for Luka and Ori and me to make our escape, before anyone thinks of a reason for us to stay. Jusqu’a demain.”

“Til and I’ll run interference for you,” Bard teased, following the three to the front door to see them out. “And thanks for the heads up, Charisse.”

“Ça me fait plaisir,” she waved.

“See you tomorrow, Bard,” Ori wished.
“Give my regards to your brother,” Bard grinned, drawing a wry shake of the head from Ori. “See you tomorrow, Luka. Hang in there.”

“I’m trying,” Luka slowed, letting the others go ahead of him. “I really am sorry about everything, Bard. I’m such a dork. I hope you’re not still mad at me, because I’m learning a lot about everything with this company, and I really don’t want to piss anyone off. This is my first big company position, and I’m trying to do a good job, even though it looks like I just put my foot in everything.”

“This is a tough crowd, and a tough job. You’re the new man in, so it’s your job to listen all you can, and soak everything up. Let Irmo and Thran and Charisse take the lead. They’re all good teachers.”

Luka nodded. “That’s what I think Charisse tries to tell me. I’m surprised she hasn’t smacked me yet.”

Bard laughed. “Charisse is a lady, Luka. A rare breed these days. She won’t smack you. But you’ll impress her if you do what my mother used to tell me over and over and over – just act like a gentleman.”

“What did she mean?” Luka asked, his brow wrinkling.

“My mother was a smart woman. She used to tell me that it was better to remain silent and be thought a fool, than to speak and remove all doubt.”

Luka smothered a laugh. His gleeful snicker reminded Bard of no one more than thirteen-year-old Kíllian, the young fencer and archer. Luka probably pulled the same pranks as that rascal did not even ten years ago. Unsurprisingly, Bard felt more kindly towards this young dancer when he thought of Kíllian.

“Yeah, I’ll try to remember that. Charisse says I need a filter between my brain and my mouth.”

“She’s right,” Bard agreed, but he smiled to lessen the sting of his words. “We all need some of that, to be honest. So I’m good. Don’t worry about me.”

“Thanks. I’ll see you tomorrow.”

“See you tomorrow.”

Luka headed to his car, and Bard headed back to the kitchen.

“Is Ada okay, Da?” Tilda asked, back at the table with her drawing pad.

“He’s fine, little doll. Sometimes he needs our help so he doesn’t get too worn out, that’s all.”

“Okay,” she agreed, and looked down at her picture. “Does this look like an elephant to you?”

“Hmmm. Maybe a cricket?” he teased.

“Da! It’s an elephant!”

“It is. A pretty good one, too. I can tell it’s an African one because it’s got big ears.”

“Really?” Tilda looked up with bright interest in her eyes. “They have big ears?”

Bard nodded. “Indian ones have smaller ears. You can look them up on the Internet to see the difference. Maybe one of your brothers or sister can show you on their computers. Or I’ll borrow Thran’s computer after supper to show you.”
“I’ll go ask Legs. He’ll show me if he’s not busy.”

She scampered off to look for Legolas.

Tilda really needed her own computer, rather than relying on the good humor of her siblings. She’d need one for sure next term when she started middle school, and it would likely help with some assignments now in fifth grade. That was something that he wanted to talk to Thran about; computers weren’t cheap, and not something to just take out of the household budget without discussion. But for the moment, Bard had supper to prepare, and a husband to rescue from an intense choreographer before the hour was out.

To his surprise and gratification, Thran appeared to escort Rada and Irmo out before Bard had to rescue him. The mood was interesting – Irmo was distracted, intent on his own thoughts, but he waved farewell at least, and seemed positive. Rada was warmer, but equally thoughtful as he wished Bard and the children goodnight. The only sign of concern was that he patted Thran’s arm in seeming consolation before taking himself outside.

“How long before supper?” Thran asked when he returned to the kitchen.

“However long you need,” Bard replied.

That got a smile from Thran. “I would greatly appreciate a shower beforehand.”

“So... twenty minutes?”

Thran nodded. “That is perfect.”

“Consider it done.”

Thran pressed a kiss on Bard’s temple. “Zoloto moyo.”

Thran took himself upstairs without a backward look. Sigrid stood at the sink scrubbing sweet potatoes and gave Bard a look.

“He’s subdued.”

Bard nodded. “Very.”

“Wonder what Irmo’s done this time.”

“Maybe we’ll find out at supper.”

“I think Irmo’s loony,” Bain commented, sitting on the stool as he chopped celery for the stir-fry.

Bard laughed, thinking of another person who could benefit from his mother’s advice about remaining silent. “He’s visionary, Bain.”

“Yeah, that’s just a polite word for loony.”

“Whether the man is or not, let’s give him the benefit of the doubt and say he’s visionary,” Bard said with a look at Bain.

“Yes, Da,” Bain conceded, keeping his eyes on the celery.

Thran reappeared as supper was going on the kitchen island. He looked cleaner, more alert, and less subdued, but he still had an air of consideration about him that nagged at Bard. Bard intended to probe for the cause soon as they had a private moment, but he didn’t have to. As soon as they sat down to eat, Legolas asked how the day’s dancing had gone. Thran put down his fork, sipped his milk, and considered what to say. That brought Bard’s fork to a stop in midair as he waited for Thran to speak.

“Today we worked on the pas de deux for Death and the Maid. He is in love with her, and tries to woo her. Irmo wants Death to be at His most vulnerable for this dance. So he has asked me to dance it on pointe.”

“He what?” Sigrid and Legolas gasped in unison.

“That’s impossible!” Sigrid exclaimed. “You’ll break your feet!”

“What’s on pointe? Tilda asked, equally confused.

“It’s when the ballerinas dance on their toes,” Sigrid explained. “Female dancers. Not guys. Guys don’t dance on their toes. It’s too hard for them, because they weigh too much.”

“So... Thran’s supposed to dance on his toes like a ballerina?” Tilda asked.

“I told you Irmo was loony,” Bain shook his head and stuffed more sweet potatoes in his mouth.

“You’re not going to do it, are you, Papa?” Legolas asked. The corners of his lips had turned down.
The thoughtful look on Thran’s face was answer enough.

“You’re seriously considering this?” Bard blurted. “Wait – didn’t you tell me that you’d never dance on pointe because you’re too tall, too heavy to support your weight on your toes? What the hell, Thran!”

Thran held up his hands as the cacophony of protests rose. “Stop, please. This is not the instant death you make it out to be. It is for seven minutes only, and there will be no jumping, no flying in the air, only a few seconds on a single foot. I will certainly need custom pointe shoes to properly support me.
I have not yet decided if this is something I will do. But it is possible.”

“Guys don’t dance on pointe!” Sigrid argued with characteristic vehemence. “They don’t!”

“They do,” Thran gave Sigrid a half smile. “What is it that Bain always says? Go look on YouTube?”

Sigrid cranked up her protests again. Bard was more inclined than not to let her run, but Thran didn’t deserve the full force of Clan Ffyrnig’s fiercest warrior. “Sigrid, you’ve made your point, sweetness.
Dial it back, please.”

“Yes, Da,” she muttered, but the angry expression on her face was vivid proof that she didn’t like this latest development for Immortal. “But you don’t like it, either.”

Bard exhaled, as all of the children looked at him. “My first reaction is not to like it, yes. But Thran is the dancer, not any of us. He knows what his body can do and what it can’t do. It sounds like he hasn’t completely made up his mind. So let’s give him the benefit of the doubt and agree that he’ll make the right decision.”

“You said that earlier, Da,” Bain noted.
“Said what?”

“That benefit of the doubt thing. That Irmo’s not loony like I think, but visionary like you think.”

“You two just had this big fight about whether Thran knows what he’s doing,” Sigrid argued, “because you didn’t think he did because he’s gotten so thin, and —”

“Stop,” Bard barked, sharper than he meant to. “Everyone, just stop —”

“I can’t!” Sigrid barked back, with a glare at Bard that was both furious and scared. “I just can’t, Da! And you can’t, either. We can’t let Thran do something so dangerous! What if he hurts himself so badly that he can’t dance anymore? Where are we all then? What happens if —”

“Hold on, Sigrid – calm down!” Bard protested. “Stop yelling. Take a deep breath. Come on.”

Sigrid stuttered to a stop. She grabbed her napkin and pressed it to her mouth, then shut her eyes, but neither action kept tears from leaking from her eyes. She stumbled to her feet and fled.

“Whoa,” Bain whispered into the silence, cutting his eyes at Legolas. The blonde boy met Bain’s eyes, but his only reply was a gulp.

“Da?” Tilda wavered, biting her lip. “Sigrid was crying.”

“I know she was, little doll. She’s upset now, but she’ll be all right in a few minutes. I’ll talk to her. You stay here and eat your supper with your brothers and Ada.”

“I will go,” Thran said, standing up. “She is angry with me, not the rest of you. So I will see to her. Do not worry.”

“She’s going to yell at you,” Bain warned.

Thran’s lips curved into a faint smile. “She is very fierce, your sister, so perhaps she will. I promise not to yell back.”

As Thran headed after Sigrid, Bard wished his husband luck. This might not be the first time Thran would endure Welsh fury, but Clan Ffyrnig’s elder lioness was a far dirtier fighter than Bard was. Once Sigrid started to vent her righteous indignation, Thran might be very sorry he’d promised not to yell.
Chapter 81

Chapter Summary

An angel's week continues to be fraught with upset. A saint, however, gets a glimpse of heaven.

Clan Ffyrnig’s reaction to Thran dancing on pointe was not unexpected. In fact, it was all too similar to the reaction he had had when Irmo first suggested it. How on earth Irmo thought a dancer of his size and weight – even as underweight as he was – could put such pressure on his long, narrow feet bore no contemplation. It’d come out of an innocent remark from Rada, but that was often the way of Irmo’s inspirations, to come out of something seemingly innocuous, seemingly unimportant.

“Bard and I were talking about Death appearing in layers, yes,” Rada had replied to something Irmo had asked. “The outermost is the mystical collector of souls on the battlefield, a skin He sheds to reveal the Lord of the Underworld. And then He sheds that one to try to woo the Maid, in only a simple doublet and tights. Bard thought perhaps some sort of crown would exaggerate the height difference between Death and the Maid, but I don’t think it should be much, because He’s at his most vulnerable, revealing His love for the Maid –”

“Yes, yes, yes, His most vulnerable!” Irmo had gestured vigorously, one hand low to represent Charisse’s height, and another high to represent Thran’s. “But still, so different from human. He is a god, much more than mortal, and no crown is suitable – Thran’s white hair will be crown enough, loose like the hair of an angel, for that is what Death is in many manifestations – no, no crown, but height, yes! Height –”

Irmo had skewed around to stab Thran with his sharp, imperious gaze. “Beside her, beside Charisse, yes, yes! Now, up, up, up on the toes, yes!”

Thran had done as Irmo asked, standing beside the diminutive Charisse, standing his tallest, then on his toes...

“On pointe!” Irmo had barked. “Of course! Death must be on pointe! This makes Him very tall, and very precarious, just as He must be, balanced on the edge of a razor, not only to love a mortal, but to confess it! Thran, you can do this?”

Charisse had put a hand to her mouth. Luka had put both of his over his mouth, and walked away, trying not to burst out with anything. Rada’s hands had fluttered for a moment, and his expression had turned worried, but he hadn’t spoken. So it had been left to Thran to say anything.

“No.”

“But it must be! Death will float, He will defy physics to loom so high –”

“I cannot defy physics, Irmo,” Thran had said flatly. “Even so thin, I weigh too much and I am too tall to support myself on my toes. I will not ruin my body for this more than I already have.”

“This is possible for other men!” Irmo had declaimed, his eyes bugging out and his hands thrown wide. “How is it not possible for you, the best in the world?”
“How is it not possible for you to see that the physical stresses are much more for someone six-five than someone five-eight?”

“All right, all right, all right!” Irmo flapped his arms. “There will be no jumping, no leaping, no flamboyant spins and twists. Does that reassure you? Surely you can manage mere steps, then? Charisse, is it so hard to take a few steps on pointe that Thran cannot manage that?”

“I cannot tell you what is possible for a body so different from mine, Irmo,” the little dancer had said calmly, with dignity. “I am half his weight; seventeen inches shorter. There is no one so tall who dances on pointe, so it is Thran who must decide if this is possible, not I.”

Snorting in exasperation, Irmo had stalked back and forth. Luka had edged beside Ori, for once not trying to make a joke or draw attention to himself. After several seconds, Irmo had whirled and stalked up to Thran, spouting irate French that did not bear repeating. Thran had summoned his Prince of Ice stare.

“Enough. This is not productive. Charisse, Luka, Ori, Rada, we are finished for the day. There is no reason for any of you to be subjected to this. I will work this out with Irmo, and we will resume tomorrow at the usual times.”

All but Rada had hastened out of the ballroom. The costumier had remained by the door, so Thran had ignored him to narrow his glare on Irmo again.

“That was not acceptable. My ballet and my company do not tolerate bullies, even when the one who tries such shit is a gifted choreographer. You cannot bully me in any case, no matter how you may construe it as constructive criticism within your purview. You understand me? Try it again, and you are out.”

“Then I will take my ideas elsewhere!”

“Take them. But you do not take one bit of Immortal. I own the story, I commissioned it, and I fund the company that will dance it. Try to put it on elsewhere, and you will pay me for the privilege. You agreed to the conditions I set to work with UltraViolet Ballet. So you do not and will not bully, or you are free to go elsewhere.”

Irmo had lapsed into silence – angry silence, but silence. Thran had taken himself to the barre and begun his cool-down stretches, letting the movements still his anger as well as his body. He had shut his eyes on Irmo, forcing himself to make the moves precisely and completely.

“You are right.”

“I am,” Thran had said with brutal coldness.

“I said so, yes.” That had been said with exasperated terseness. "What do you want from me?"

“An apology. You will not harass like that again, no matter that choreographers are known for such things. Immortal is hard enough without that. I will not tolerate it.”

“You suffered worse in your Russian academy than you have from me.”

“Which is why I will not suffer it again.”

Thran had kept bending and stretching.
Another sigh, softer. “I am sorry. I cannot always help myself.”

“Try harder. Is that not what you tell me? The others? Try harder.”

A sort of chuckle. “That is true. Then yes, I am sorry.”

“I forgive you.”

“Then may we talk about this? It is the perfect vision, Death on high, about to fall so low?”

“I agree; it is a vision, but one that may not be possible. I have no technique, no training. Nor do I exaggerate the strain on my body. I will not risk my career for another six inches of height.”

“It is a single scene. No jumping. No turns... well, perhaps one or two. But in a seven-minute scene, perhaps only three minutes on pointe?”

Thran had sighed. It would be a spectacular vision, his tall, attenuated Death contrasted with the petite, vibrant Maid... it would cause a sensation... if he could manage it.

“I will consider. I will see if it is possible only if we find proper shoes, and a teacher. Then I will see what wear and tear it causes me. I must dance the rest of the ballet, not only those three or four minutes.”

“Yes, yes,” Irmo had agreed quickly. “All wise precautions, yes. Yes.”

“Then we are done for tonight. The physical hurdles are not the only ones I must surmount. My family will not like this.”

“They do not decide about the ballet or your dancing.”

“I consider them when I decide. I have already distressed them a great deal. I do not like to add to that.”

“Then don’t tell them.”

Thran had shaken his head. There had been no point in trying to explain further to someone who had little understanding of social interactions and none at all of family dynamics. He had merely escorted Irmo out, and put off talking to his family until he had showered and dressed. But the time in the shower had not softened his family’s reaction when he had told them of Irmo’s latest inspiration. Their protests had been exactly what he had expected.

What he hadn’t expected was Sigrid’s upset.

What had she said?

We can’t let Thran do something so dangerous! What if he hurts himself so badly that he can’t dance anymore? Where are we all then?

She was so much her father’s daughter.

He sighed as he headed upstairs. He knocked on the door to Sigrid’s room softly.

“Go away, Da! Just go away!”

“It is Thran, Sigrid. Please, I would like to talk to you.”
A long silence followed.

“Please, ma chère. I am sorry I upset you so. I come to make amends.”

A soft rustle or two, and the door came open. Sigrid had wiped her eyes, but they were still red, and her face was blotchy. But her gaze was hard and angry, and her posture was ramrod straight.

“So you aren’t going to try to dance on pointe?”

“I did not say that. I did not say that I would, either. Please, may I come in?”

She stood aside in silence, and plunked herself down on her bed to lean against the wall, a pillow clutched to her stomach. That left the desk chair for Thran, or the floor. He chose the latter, and folded himself down on his heels.

“I appreciate that you worry on my account. I am most grateful to you.”

Glaring, Sigrid looked away and swallowed hard.

“I appreciate that you worry more on your Da’s account. For that is the reason for your upset, yes?”

She gave him a look that was chagrin, anger, and worry, and she bit her bottom lip.

“It is a sign of your love for your Da that you are so worried for him. You fear that if I do something so foolish that it means I can no longer dance, then your Da will be poor again. You and your brother and sister and your Da will go back to the precarious life you led not three months ago, and all we have here will evaporate like a mirage.”

Sigrid’s glare froze, but it lasted only a few seconds before it crumbled. She buried her face in the pillow. She made no sound, but her ribs heaved, and her arms tightened on the pillow. Swallowing, Thran eased off the floor to sit beside her. He drew her gently close, and put his arms around her.

“Ma pauvre petite,” he murmured, as Sigrid gave into her tears and edged an arm around him. “Je suis désolé. Je suis vraiment désolé de t’avoir inquiété.”

“How can you even think of doing something so incredibly stupid?” she spat through her tears. “You can’t do that to Da, Thran! You just can’t! I won’t let you risk everything on this stupid fucking ballet!”

Her epithet brought her up short, and she cast him a glance that was decidedly rattled. Thran offered her a sympathetic smile. “I have called Immortal this stupid fucking ballet many times myself. Sometimes, it is that. Other times, it is a wondrous thing. That is true of anything done for the first time – so fraught with drama, upset, confusion, many things, none straightforward. But that is not what you need to hear. What you need to hear is that nothing about this ballet or the dance will send you or Tilda or Bain or your Da back to your old life. I have provided for all of us, no matter what happens. There will be no more grotty apartments, no more worry about money for food, no more slavery for your Da. You have my promise.”

Sigrid kept her face buried against Thran’s chest for several more seconds. Her hand tightened on his arm, and she sat up to rub the heel of her hand over her eyes. “What about the pointe shoes?”

“I have not said either yes or no. I have said I will consider, but only with proper shoes, and only with a teacher. It may be physically impossible for me, and it may not.”

“Da said that you told him you’d never do it, it was stupid for someone as tall and as heavy as you to
“I did tell him that.”

“Then why do it now, Thran? Why? If you said it was stupid up until now, then why all of a sudden is it not stupid anymore? After the past three weeks, and then Monday, you’re not impressing me with your understanding of stupid.”

Thran sighed. “I have made many mistakes in the past three weeks, I agree. I want badly to do this ballet, Sigrid. It is like your Da wanting so badly to sculpt, to draw. When he began again, he glowed like an angel, for all that he calls me one. That is what the dance does to me. I let it pull me away from my home and family, and that lapse has hurt us all, your Da most of all, which shames me badly. So he and you and all our clan now know to speak up, to help me stay on track. I can only offer that as an apology, and as a promise not to be so foolish again.”

“But on pointe, Thran? Really? Do you think I don’t know what that means, what stresses are involved?”

Thran smothered a smile when Sigrid flounced off the bed, but she wasn’t merely flouncing. She grabbed her laptop off her desk and flounced back down beside Thran, opening the laptop and mousing quickly over the desktop.

“I’ve spent hours on the Internet since I first met you, since I saw Da light up like a Christmas tree every time he so much as thought about you. I knew who you were before he did. I’ve seen every video of you that’s been posted anywhere. I’ve watched so many ballet videos that I can practically dance them myself. I’ve read all the reviews of your dancing, and I know you don’t, but most of them are good, in case you didn’t know. I’ve even seen the pictures those stupid paparazzi posted of us at the county office when you and Da got married. They were pretty funny, actually; the paparazzi got roundly razzed for thinking you’d married me instead of Da. What wasn’t so funny was what they wrote when they figured out whom you did marry – they called Da a one-time artist, a has-been artist. That made me so mad, and now they’re writing all this speculation around about you and UltraViolet Ballet and that maybe you’re doing a new ballet with wacko Irmo because Da’s making you do it for the money. It makes me sick.”

Under Sigrid’s fingers, images appeared one after another, from pictures of Thran at old premieres, in costume for various roles, even a few paparazzi shots. Sigrid was right about how funny the wedding day pictures were, but Thran paid them little heed. He’d been an expert at avoiding his own publicity for years.

“You have been most thorough,” Thran agreed.

“Do you know why I have been?” she said with an edge to her voice.

“Tell me.”

“Because I love my Da. He’s the sweetest man in the world, and he’s the best father, and he’s a brilliant artist now, not a one-time has-been. But he’s got the business sense of a hamster, and I will not let anything put him in a situation where he’s got to try to cope the way he did before. He was slowly dying with each and every day that passed. I can’t let that happen to him again.”

“And you read all these things on the Internet because...”

“I don’t know.” She picked disconsolately at the pile of her sweater. “Because I thought that the more I knew about everything, the better I’d be able to help him. You love him so much, and I thought, perfect, you’re looking out for him, too... then Monday...”

Thran sighed. “Again, I am sorry. Not just that I worried and upset your Da, but that I worried and upset you and your brothers and sister. I have so many reasons why I cannot let such a thing happen again. And I do not want your Da to ever worry about money again. I cannot stop what is said on the Internet, but I can tell you that I have provided for us all in such a way that no matter how Immortal turns out, we are protected. I have shown your Da the proof of this, so if you ask him, he will confirm what I say to you.”

“Why did they say those things about my Da?”

“Because their aim is to sell articles, Sigrid, not to tell the truth. Who would read the truth that our family is happy? It is a better story to talk about how low I stoop to marry an underage girl, or a gold digger artist, or perhaps next week a cave troll. This is why I do not read such things. They are cruel and hold no truth. It is better that you do not read them, either. You live in the truth, and if you have any questions about it, you have only to ask your Da and me, and we will answer them.”

Sigrid searched his face, swallowed, and nodded. “Okay. Okay. I’m glad you told me. Now you just have to convince me that this pointe shoe thing is not the dumbest idea ever.”

Thran grinned. “Ah, ma chère, it may be. I will not know until I try. And to try is all I have agreed to. I must be comfortable with it. I must be able to do it. I must not risk the ability to dance the rest of Immortal, and then many ballets beyond this one.”

“Why did you even agree to try?”

Thran considered. “Because it is hard, and it would be quite the spectacle if I can manage it. It is only for a few moments – I will not dance more than three minutes in such a way. So I will educate myself, and then we shall see. You have seen videos on the Internet of men doing this, yes?”

Sigrid shrugged. “I didn’t think to look for them. I didn’t think men did it, so...”

“So let us look.”

Sigrid looked up at him, so he pointed to her computer. She typed M-E-N – D-A-N-C-I-N-G – O-N – P-O-I-N-T-E into the search engine, which displayed a list of several videos in the search results. She selected one at random, and there was a professional dancer in pointe shoes taking his first tentative instruction, learning to balance at the barre.

Sigrid snorted. “He’s probably shorter than I am.”

“I know him by reputation,” Thran replied. “Anthony Ngele. He is perhaps a bit taller than six feet.”

Sigrid watched the rest of the short video in silence, then started another. Thran sat beside her, as interested, but for different reasons. He paid attention to the build of the dancers, how wide or narrow their feet were, and how arched. Several were more muscular than he, which boded well for his slender build, though none were as tall. One of the instructors opined that the men she’d taught came to it easily because of their greater strength, which also boded well for Thran; his legs and feet were in good shape, even the ankle he’d injured in November. The dancers in the videos he watched with Sigrid seemed to perform easily, so perhaps this was not as mad as it had first seemed.

“It doesn’t look as bad as I thought,” she admitted, drawing Thran’s smile at how quickly she echoed his sentiments.

“Perhaps not. I understand if you do not approve that I try this, but after seeing these videos, I hope you accept why I do.”

Sigrid sniffed, but her jaw unclenched a little, and she took a breath. Her nod was slight, but it was a nod.

“Are we friends again?”

She bit her lip, and her finger traced over the track pad of her computer in aimless circles. She kept her regard on the screen as a male dancer in practice attire made one rapid, seemingly effortless turn after the other across the stage, all of them on pointe. “I hope so. Just...”

“Your Da?”

She nodded.

“He is my greatest treasure, Sigrid. And you and Bain and Tilda are very important to me, too, just as Legolas is. I did not like to let you down, and I will do everything to make sure I do not again.”

“Okay.” Sigrid took another breath. “Okay. Just... be careful, not just for Da, but for you, too. He loves you a lot. I love you, too, not just my Da.”

“You are very generous, ma chère. I love you, too. You are my most excellent co-conspirator, and I am glad to have another care about your Da as I do.”

“Please, don’t tell Da about what I read on the Internet. He doesn’t need to know.”

“He does not, so I will not tell him. But neither do you need to know. Please, let such vicious things go. There are better ways to take care of yourself.”

“You better take care of yourself, too, Ada,” she muttered. “Honestly, this place needs a zookeeper.”

“Perhaps so,” Thran chuckled. “So, would you come downstairs with me so that we may finish your Da’s supper? It is no better for a budding runner and scholar to miss a meal than a dancer.”

She gave him a look. “That’s fighting dirty.”

He shrugged. “It is also true.”

“I guess it is. I’ll wash my face, then I’ll come down.”

“I will wait, and we will go together. Then neither of us will have to face the Inquisition alone.”

“Good point. All right, let’s go.”

Thran headed back to the kitchen with Sigrid, feeling both relief and determination. The former was because Clan Fyrynig’s lioness had let him off easy – this time. He would never escape so lightly again, and that’s where the determination came in. Nothing, not even the dance, would let him risk his lioness’s disappointment again, because next time it would not be mere disappointment he’d face. It would be fury, as fierce as her father’s own, and deservedly so.

* * *
As Thran and Sigrid came down the stairs, Bard got up to put Sigrid’s plate in the microwave to warm it. She’d been crying, that much was obvious, but she looked reconciled, and offered a small smile and a murmur of thanks when he put her warmed plate before her. Thran’s expression was calm as he sat down at the end of the table beside Sigrid, so Bard took his plate to warm it as he had Sigrid’s. The tall dancer also offered thanks for the warmed plate, and gladly took up his fork to take a bite of chicken.

The other children looked at the two returnees with a mixture of apprehension and curiosity.

“Did she yell at you?” Bain blurted.

“No,” Sigrid shot back, glaring at her brother. “So just stuff it.”

“Both of you,” Bard warned, giving them both a look.

“It’s none of Bain’s business,” Sigrid protested.

“It’s not. But courtesy is appreciated nevertheless.”

Sigrid huffed a bit, but not much under Bard’s eye. “Sorry, Bain.”

“Sorry, Sigrid,” came the immediate response, and both children looked to their suppers.

Bard arched an eyebrow at Thran. His husband met his gaze with a reassuring look, then concentrated on his supper. Bard let it go, and gradually the atmosphere grew calm again as Tilda and Legolas began to clear the plates and condiments from the table, and brought out bowls and spoons for ice cream. When conversation picked up about a new ice cream store that was about to open in the village, Bard relaxed. The crisis was over, at least for the moment.

He sat with Thran as he worked his way through a hearty supper, and even a small dish of ice cream. Tilda and Legolas began the cleanup, Sigrid retreated to her room to concentrate on her paper, and Bain sat at the kitchen table to begin his homework. Bard and Thran retreated to the sitting room with tea and a last cookie or two. Thran looked so tired that Bard didn’t question him as he poured Thran’s podstakannik full of tea and handed it to him. His husband gave him an appreciative smile for his consideration and sipped the steaming tea between bites of a spice cookie.

The children didn’t have a lot of homework today, though the boys had their pre-algebra test to study for. Tilda came in with her French vocabulary, but she made quick work of it, and eagerly waited for the boys to finish so they could indulge in more of Harry Potter. Thran remained mostly silent through that, other than when it was his turn to read. As Bard had warned it was a long chapter, and after they finished reading it, the children all went upstairs to cycle through their showers and prepare for bed. Thran went to spend a little time with Legolas, so Bard stuck his head into Sigrid’s room.

“Oh, sweetness?”

She looked up from her computer, stretching cramped shoulder muscles. “I’m okay, Da. I’m sorry I got upset. Everything’s fine.”

“I’m here if you want to talk.”

“I know. I’m okay.”

Bard nodded. “Paper’s okay, too?”

She brightened. “Yeah, it is. It’s written, so I’m editing now. I think I’ll be finished tonight or tomorrow, so won’t have to work on it at all this weekend. That would be a gift."

Bard chuckled. “That’d be great. What time do you need to be at the meet Saturday?”

“Eight to catch the team bus. Finn, Tara, and Killian are coming to watch, so when we get back to the school, they said they’d bring me back here to shower, then we’ll go to Tara’s for supper, then we’ll see the film.”

“I’m okay with that. Curfew’s midnight, same as usual.”

“The film’s at seven-thirty, so I’ll be home before then.”

“I appreciate it, sweetness. I’m glad you’re making friends. It’s been a lot easier out here than in the city.”

“A lot better, too. I love it here.”

“So do I.” He bent down to brush a kiss on the top of Sigrid’s hair. “Even if we do have our share of ups and downs trying to learn about making a ballet.”

Sigrid rolled her eyes. “That’s the truth. I told Ada we need a zookeeper.”

“What did he say?”

Sigrid’s grin was impish – good, she was her usual feisty self again. “Wellll, he didn’t disagree with me.”

“I wouldn’t, either. Sleep well, sweetness.”

“Night, Da.”

He bade the rest of the children good night, and was happy to retreat to the shower. While he indulged in hot water and lots of soap, Thran returned from Legolas’s room, ensconced himself in bed, and was well settled in the pillows by the time Bard was done. Bard made sure his Henley and leggings were beside the bed in case one of the children needed him during the night, then crawled in beside his husband. They settled into their usual tangle of arms and legs, with Thran’s head on Bard’s shoulder.

“Did she yell at you?” Bard murmured.

“She did not,” Thran confirmed in the same low murmur. “She confirmed only that she is very much your daughter.”

Bard grimaced. “That sounds ominous. She didn’t hit you, did she?”

Thran raised his head to give Bard an affronted look. “Of course not. Have you ever hit me? Would you ever think to do such a thing? Tcha, such an idea.”

“Then what did she do?”

Thran sighed and put his head back down on Bard’s shoulder. “She was afraid that if I hurt myself, then you and she and Bain and Tilda would be poor again. I assured her that I had no intention to hurt myself, but even if I did in any fashion, our family will be well cared for. All of us. Then she and I watched Internet videos of men who dance on pointe, and she was reassured that it is not complete madness. So all is well.”
Bard’s throat knotted, and he shut his eyes. Gods, Thran had stated only the truth, that Sigrid was entirely his child, worrying about all the same things that he did, money – or the lack thereof – being the main one. A long, slender hand rubbed his chest slowly.

“Do not worry, please? Sigrid is well, I am well, you are well. There is nothing to worry about. All is well.”

As Bard wrestled the lump in his throat down, the faint pleading tone of Thran’s voice registered. “You sound like you’ve had a long day, angel.”

Thran exhaled. “I have worked very hard on the ballet. I have had a fight with Irmo. I have made amends because I angered our lioness. So yes, a long day. I hope yours was not so fraught.”

“You had a fight with Irmo?”

“Yes, we had words. He conceived of the pointe dance, I demurred. He acted the bully, I was the Prince of Ice. I threatened to fire him, he apologized, I accepted, it is done.”

Gods, if only he’d been a fly on the ballroom wall for that! Thran, however, looked too wan and sounded too tired to want to rehash it, so Bard let it go. Instead, maybe telling his husband about how well his day had gone would ease him.

“I can’t tell you how great my day was,” he offered, stroking Thran’s braid as it trailed over Bard’s chest. He found the spot on Thran’s hip that his husband loved for him to stroke. Thran’s hum was nearly soundless, but clearly conveyed the depth of his enjoyment. “Rada asked if we could collaborate on some of his costume designs, which was flattering. He’s a treat to work with, and we got on very well. This is the first time that I’ve ever worked with another artist like this – the day just flew by. I haven’t had such a good day in a long time. I’m sorry yours wasn’t so good.”

“Rada told me that he liked to work with you very much, too,” Thran smiled. “I am very happy for you. The ritual kabuki-esque costume will be wonderful. He said you talked about silver armor?”

“We haven’t decided yet. White, silver, black, something stark. Maybe blue, to offer a contrast to the blacks, greys, and reds of the mortal world. I made the joke about using ultraviolet as a little nudge, nudge, wink, wink pointer back to the name of the company, but we’ll need to see what looks best under the lights.”

“Listen to you,” Thran looked up at him again, but this time his expression was teasing. “You are truly one of the company now, first as a storyteller, and now as a costumier. Where I am only a dancer, my husband is a man of many talents.”

“I’ve got a ways to go. But I understand how easy it is for you to get swept up in this. It nearly did the same thing to me today. I felt like I did something worthwhile today.”

“You do so many worthwhile things every day,” Thran protested softly.

“Artistically worthwhile,” Bard amended. “I feel like maybe you do when you dance. I did something with my sketching that made a difference to Immortal. That’s a good feeling.”

“It is, my saint. Oh, lyubov moya, it very much is.”

Thran slid up to brush a kiss on Bard’s lips. It was slow and tender, so very easy to reward with a kiss of his own. Without conscious thought, their bodies shifted to lie side by side, facing each other to nuzzle and stroke and kiss. Bard savored his husband’s beautiful body as their arousal grew, neither of them in a hurry to rush into sex. How delicious it was to savor the caress that was each touch of that pale body against his. The slow brush of fingers against his skin, the nip of lips at his throat or the base of his collarbone, the tickle of Thran’s chest against the hair on his torso... how divine was each touch after such a long day? When a tight glute flexed, then equally tight abs rubbed against his cock, he was eager to cup that glute in his hand, to knead and massage it as Thran’s lips swallowed his. Thran was no better at resisting such enticements – he moaned and groped for Bard’s cock. At the first touch, the first squeeze, Bard’s loins ached, craving release. His arousal spiked again as long elegant fingers wound around his cock, as a long tongue dove deeply into his mouth. Gods, he wouldn’t last a second under such an assault, so he groped for Thran’s cock, growling when he found his husband just as hard. So sweet, so sweet, to work Thran’s cock as brazenly as Thran did his, until both of them were straining and moaning, desperate for release...

Thran spasmed first, his soft, unrestrained whimpers too compelling to resist, so Bard didn’t relent until Thran was completely wrung dry. His angel lay consumed before him, eyes shut, head back, silky white hair coming loose from his braid. But Thran’s release hadn’t loosened his hold on Bard’s cock, and he rolled over onto Bard’s chest to smother the last of his cries as he suckled first one of Bard’s nipples, then the other. Such a concentrated assault drove Bard after his husband to release in seconds. When a moan fought its way past his lips, Thran swallowed it in a kiss.

“Oh, gods,” Bard when his body had calmed. “Gods, angel. We both needed that.”

“We did.” Thran retrieved a towel from the side of the bed, and wiped them both clean. “It is a good way to end a day fraught with so much upset.”

Bard turned out the light, then nestled Thran closely beside him. As he stroked Thran’s ribs, he smiled. “It’s a good way to end a wonderful day, too.”

A soft chuckle escaped Thran, and his hand rested on Bard’s. He squeezed gently. “A good way to end any day, then.”

“Amen.” Bard pressed a kiss on Thran’s hair, and they rested together, warm and content, until they both fell asleep.
Chapter 82

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint have a weekend away from Immortal, discuss school obligations, and find an interesting way to deal with their taxes.

Chapter Notes

Hal appears courtesy of johnnysmitten's story, "Heartsigh." Thank you, my dear! Check out that story for Hal's awesome scene where he combines cupcake baking and disco dancing in a way no one has attempted before or since!

I don't own an Audi, own any stock in Audi, have anything to do with Audi, or even want an Audi. But Hal likes his R8.

Friday raced by. The only break in the routine was Bard’s brief visit to the Imladris Academy to collect the materials about ways to contribute to the school that would reduce their children’s tuition, but he was back quickly. Thran was happy to see him and Rada in close conversation as they sketched out ideas for Immortal’s costumes – how excited Bard had been to work with the eccentric costumier, an excitement that Thran hoped would continue. Thran was also happy to find Irmo much less fractious, if no more straightforward in his approach to anything. They put in a full day of hard work on the choreography, and had the principal dances for the first two acts largely blocked out. Irmo was not happy when Thran decreed that there would be no work on either Saturday or Sunday, and that work would resume on Monday. At the end of the day, everyone but Irmo was excited about the work they had done, and looked forward to their much-needed break.

Supper was animated as the family planned their Saturday errands together, but the children were more excited to light a fire in the sitting room fireplace and toast marshmallows while they read Harry Potter. The next morning, after a substantial breakfast, Bard took Sigrid to meet the team bus that would take her to her track meet, then headed to the market with Bain and Tilda. Thran and Legolas left at the same time to enjoy their two hours at the Gondors’ studio. After so much concentrated dance work, Thran was in excellent shape to hold his own against all but the expertise of the Gondors themselves, and he delighted in the time with Legolas. When fencing was over, the family headed off in Thran’s SUV to watch Sigrid’s race, scheduled for noon. How wonderful it was to see their fierce lioness place third at a level she’d never expected to reach with so little prior experience! Bard was even more elated than his daughter was, and the whole family whistled as loudly as they could so Sigrid knew they were there to support her. Thran smothered a grin at the exuberant way Finn greeted her later, sweeping her into a big hug, because Bard’s face was such a study.

“She grows up, our lioness,” Thran observed, leaning closer to Bard on the gym bleachers.

“And I thank you for it, cariad,” Bard swallowed, as Tara, Kíllian, Legolas, and Bain surrounded Sigrid and Finn in laughing exuberance.
“That credit belongs to you, lyubov moya, not to me.”

“Oh, it belongs to you, too. If you hadn’t come along, she would have had to grow up in that grotty apartment rather than out here. Thank you, more than you’ll ever know.”

Thran offered only a warm smile, given their reluctance for PDAs. “I know. Just as you know how happy I am that Legolas is not in that boarding school, and I am not in that cold and sterile apartment.”

“We both made out like bandits,” Bard conceded.

Thran snickered. “How does one make out like bandits? Perhaps we should try it.”

“Cut it out, you,” Bard grinned, cutting his eyes at Tilda sitting on the bleacher in front of them, whistling at her sister.

“Only for now. I intend to consider it for later experimentation.”

The pair collected Bain and Legolas, confirmed Sigrid’s plans about a ride home with Finn, then set off for Tilda’s favorite cheese shop for lunch. Errands took up the earlier part of the afternoon, then they headed home. In the afternoon, the children took care of their homework, and helped to clean up the dust and debris from the week. To end the day, they read the next bit of Harry Potter in front of the sitting room fireplace with Tilda, Bain, and Legolas, toasting marshmallows and making s’mores. Finn escorted Sigrid home by eleven, stopping in politely to exchange a word or two before departing. One by one, the children bedded down, and the house calmed.

Sunday was decidedly relaxed, a much needed calm after the last frantic couple of weeks. Thran helped Bard prepare an extravagant breakfast of blueberry pancakes, sausage, and fruit. While Bard put a big pot of potato leek soup on for lunch, the children decided to make hamburgers for supper, since Bard was not allowed to cook today. Once his husband headed to the solarium to work on his art, Thran did an abbreviated barre, enough to keep him well limbered and ready for tomorrow’s resumption of work on Immortal. The children finished their homework, then Kíllian came over to fence with Legolas under Thran’s watchful eye, and Bain had a schoolmate from down the lane over to kick a soccer ball around the back yard. Tilda was pleased to draw with her father in the solarium, propped comfortably on a couple of big cushions from the sitting room.

Once Kíllian headed home, Thran ventured into the solarium to find Tilda drawing Mr. Bun, Sigrid wiping down the disassembled fainting couch, and Bard working on Rahmiel.

“Such industry!” Thran observed, smiling. “Sigrid, your chair is done! And what is this? You have become so adept that Bard has loosed you on the fainting couch?”

“I got to help Sigrid take it all apart,” Tilda looked up from her drawing with a big grin. “That was fun. I’ve never gotten to take anything apart before. It wasn’t very hard. The glue was all crumbly.”

“It turns a much nicer color by far.”

“What, you like fruitwood better than molasses?” Sigrid teased. “It was about as sticky as molasses, too. Yuck!”

“Too yucky for me,” Tilda shook her head, making a face. “So I drew Mr. Bun instead.”

She held up her drawing pad for Thran to see. It was still the picture of a child, but it showed Tilda’s continued improvement, for the outline was not too stiff, and it was credibly shaded. “It is a good picture, Kukla – it looks very like him. Even the way his whiskers turn down on the left. You have captured him very well.”

Tilda gave her drawing a critical look. “I need to make the left ear more up.”

“I think he moved while you looked away,” Thran winked at her. “Just to see if you paid him close attention.”

Tilda gave Mr. Bun sitting innocently on one of Sigrid’s refinished chairs a stern look. “Sometimes he does that. Da says he has a sense of humor.”

“He would have to have one, to live so long with you and the rest of our clan. We are a humorous lot.”

“Da’s working on Rahmiel,” Sigrid said, with a nonchalant glance Thran’s way. She kept most of her attention on the wooden strut she wiped with a cloth soaked in stripper, but she caught Thran’s small smile before he turned towards Bard perched on his stool. A thrill of excitement jolted up Thran’s spine to see Rahmiel once more emerging from the wire and clay clamped to Bard’s workbench.

“So he is!” Thran exclaimed, holding up his hands in surprise. “Oy, lyubov moya, you have brought Rahmiel back even more vividly than before.”

Bard looked up with a big smile. “It’s still the same pose, but he’s a little softer this time.”

“You have done the legs and torso again, but now you have added the arms. And the wings will flow behind?”

Bard put his hands at the back of his model in imitation of wings. “Something like that. I’m not sure whether I’ve got the arms the way I want yet.” He gave Thran a critical look, as if he looked at another model for his sculpture. “Would you mind? Hold your arms up, as if you were just about to land from jumping off of something?”

“Of course.” Thran stripped off his fencing jacket just as Legolas appeared behind him.

“What’s going on?” Legolas inquired, taking the jacket from Thran.

“I become the sculptor’s model,” Thran gave his son a smile. “The crash dummy, as you and Bain would say.”

Legolas snickered as Thran held up his arms. “You need those funny black and yellow circles stuck all over you to be a crash dummy, Papa.”

Tilda giggled. “That’d be funny, Legolas.”

“Very funny,” Bard grinned, fingers pinching off bits of clay and pressing it onto the armature. “Hang on, I have to move the wire a bit... there. Move your arms a bit wider apart, and more out in front of you? Lower the left one a bit more, and raise the right one – your weight’s coming down on your left leg. Yes, that’s good. Hold it only until you get tired.”

The children looked back and forth between Bard and Thran, one posing, the other sculpting. Should he offer to take off his tee shirt? If the children had not been present, he would have just peeled it off, but Bard seemed content with him as he was, so he held the pose as he was. He thought about what it would be like to have wings, and how he would land from on high if he did, and subtly shifted his weight.
“Oh, that’s perfect, angel,” Bard said, working quickly. “Try not to move if you can, just for another minute... I’ve almost got it...”

Thran relaxed as if he held a yoga pose, using his bones rather than his muscles to hold himself in position, and concentrating on his breathing. Before him, Bard worked with assurance, angling the armature this way and that, adding clay, and smoothing curves with his fingers, then with small tools. When it got to be too much, he said, “I put my arms down now.”

“It’s okay, go ahead,” Bard said, his regard intent on the clay and wire before him. “Needed a hitch to the right in the torso, so I’ll have to touch up the clay a bit, but that’s easy enough. But I’ve got the shoulders at the right angle to the hips, and the arms in the right place.”

Thran and Legolas drew closer to see the model. Legolas gave an experimental poke to the wad of clay beside the sculpture. “Oh! It’s stiffer than I expected.”

“That’s because that bit’s cold,” Bard explained. “Take a bit if you like, and warm it in your hands. That makes it more pliable and easier to shape.”

“It does,” Legolas agreed, kneading a small lump of the clay. “I like the way it smells.”

“I do, too,” Bard smiled in recognition. “One room of the art department at my school reeked of the stuff all the time, because that’s where the potters and sculptors worked. The painter’s studio smelled like linseed oil and paint. The welding shop sometimes smelled like hot metal. All good smells.”

“Interesting,” Thran considered. “I think of art as such a visual thing, not an aromatic thing. But to those who make the art, creation smells.”

Bard and the children laughed. “I’m sure ballet does, too. All those sweaty dancers!”

“Thank the gods that the audience wears so much perfume that they cannot smell us!” Thran grimaced. “Else we would never get the funds to put on a single act of anything.”

“Track meets are like that, too,” Sigrid shook her head. “All those teenagers – ugh!”

“It’s all honest toil,” Bard grinned. “I say that now just so you won’t lock me out of the house when I start working in the barn this summer. Rank doesn’t begin to cover it.”

“Yeah, Til, you’re the only one of us who doesn’t reek yet,” Sigrid teased her sister. “Lucky you!”

“I don’t smell very good after I go to my sport class,” Tilda stuck out her tongue at Mr. Bun. “No one does!”

“So we all smell,” Thran shrugged. “That reminds me – Legolas, we must put the fencing things in the washer so that you will have them clean for this week.”

“I’ll put them in now. Which cycle?”

“Permanent press, warm water,” Bard supplied.

“I will go put on different pants, then,” Thran said. “Then everything can go in the washer, Legolas.”

“Okay, Papa. I’ll change, too.”

“Come back down when you’ve changed, angel,” Bard invited. “I didn’t get a chance yesterday to tell you about the options we have about helping the school. There’s one I think you might like, and it’s a one shot, which will be easier for you this term.”
“Back in a tick, then, as you say,” Thran replied, and headed after Legolas to change. Once he and his son got the fencing attire into the washer, Legolas headed outside to play with Bain and his friend, and Thran returned to the solarium. Sigrid had finished stripping the fainting couch, and was carefully smoothing it with a pad of fine steel wool.

“So, the school things,” Thran prompted, setting the seat back in the frame of one of Sigrid’s chairs so he had a place to perch.

“There are a lot of options,” Bard began. “A lot amount to being a teacher’s assistant, helping during class and such. Despite the number of artists around, a lot can’t make time during the day, so they were glad when I said I could do that. So I’m going in once a week for a couple of art classes. That actually covers us both, but there was one item that I thought might interest you, and it could potentially give the school a big boost. Each spring, the school holds a talent show. There’s a lot of singing and acting, but not much dancing. Your reputation precedes you, because Halina, the lady who told me about everything, specifically mentioned you. I gather you’d be quite a catch for the show.”

Both Tilda and Sigrid looked up, but it was Sigrid who spoke. “The show’s a big deal, or at least that’s what my classmates say. It’s called the April Fool’s Follies, and it’s always on the Saturday afternoon that’s closest to April Fool’s Day – April 2, this year. The talent acts are in the auditorium, but in the halls there are other things – a bake sale, of course, and a silent auction of donated artwork, and craft booths for the artists who sell jewelry and things. It’d be cool if you could do a dance, Ada.”

“I heard about it at school, too,” Tilda added. “There’s a girl in my class who’s going to sing with her Mam, and two brothers who are doing an acrobatic act. It sounds like fun.”

“I would do that,” Thran nodded. “I will be in good trim for dancing, with all the work I do for the ballet. But if these are the Follies of the April Fool, perhaps I could do something not so serious? Charisse and I danced together for a donor’s gala once. She was a rag doll and I was the doll maker, and she would put herself into all sorts of contortions even as she made a fool out of the doll maker. It is not too long, and fun.”

“That sounds like just the thing,” Bard nodded. “Do you think Charisse would do it with you?”

Sigrid sat up from her rubbing to give Thran an inspired grin. “What if you were the doll, Ada, and Tilda was the doll maker? Think how funny it would be for little Tilda to try to pose such a big floppy doll.”

Thran laughed. “That would be very funny, Sigrid! What do you think, Tilda? Would you like to have such a big doll to play with?”

Tilda looked dubious. “I don’t think I can move you, Ada. You’re so tall!”

“I would help you,” Thran offered. “Suppose your Da carries me on stage, and then you sneak in to play with the doll you’re not supposed to play with, and I will be very floppy.”

“That sounds cool, Til!” Sigrid enthused. “But if you don’t want to do it, that’s okay. I’d like to do it.”

“Let’s try it,” Bard got up from his stool. “Okay, rag doll. I’m going to pick you up.”

Thran struck a stiff pose as Bard wound arms around his waist and carried him into the sitting room. As the children followed, Bard plunked Thran down on his feet in the middle of the floor, then backed away. Thran held the pose just for a second, then slowly sagged down into a split and half flopped over like the saggy toy he pretended to be.

“So what should I do?” Tilda wondered, looking at Thran dubiously.

“Just sort of poke him at first, to see if he moves,” suggested Sigrid. So Tilda tiptoed up to him and gave him a little push on the shoulder. Thran collapsed his torso flat over his leg. He really did look like a limp rag doll.

“Oh, Ada; you’re funny!” Tilda giggled.

“What if you tried to push him up again?” Sigrid asked.

“Okay,” Tilda nodded, getting into the spirit of the game. She pulled on Thran’s arm, and he sat back up, only to flop over the other way. So she pushed him to the front, and he fell over again. When Tilda pushed on his back, he rolled all the way over and sat up again.

“Keep pushing my back, Kukla,” Thran told her, and so she did. This time, he rolled onto his feet, but his arms were still flung wide on the floor, and his head hung limply. “Now pull my hair – gently, please!”

As Tilda pulled, Thran stood up, legs still wide. As Tilda kept pushing, he straightened up, only to flop over her shoulder. That made her laugh, and Bard and Sigrid with her.

“That’s amazing,” Bard shook his head. “You really do move like a rag doll. What do you think, little doll? Do you want to do this with Ada? If you don’t want to, it’s okay.”

“Maybe Sigrid can do it with me?” Tilda said. “The children in my class said a lot of people come to watch. That sounds a little scary.”

“If you would like Sigrid to play with us, or if you do not want to do it at all, that is okay,” Thran assured Tilda. “Tomorrow, when you get home from school, I will ask Charisse to help me show you our silly dance, and you can decide whether or not you want to do it.”

“I’d like that,” Tilda nodded.

“So would I,” Sigrid nodded vigorously. “I think it’d be fun.”

“So I can call the school tomorrow, and tell them that you’re in for a dance?” Bard asked.

“Yes,” Thran nodded. “It will be fun to do something not so serious.”

“That’s great,” Bard grinned. “Halina will be delighted.”

They returned to the solarium to continue their progress on clay, paper, and furniture. Thran was glad to relax with them until Legolas and Bain came inside, well winded from their soccer game. Before long, it was time to start supper, so Thran and the children left Bard in the solarium while they prepared the meal. Supper was simple – hamburgers, salad, fruit salad, and roasted potatoes, beets, and onions. The evening wound down to a comfortable end, and soon Thran and Bard settled in their soaking tub.

“Lyubov moya?” Thran ventured, when Bard reclined against his chest.

“Hmm?” Bard rumbled, sipping his glass of nalivka.

“Did you think to offer your caricatures at the school Follies?”
“I did,” Bard said. “I’m ashamed to admit that I didn’t for selfish reasons.”

“You? Selfish? What is this? I cannot imagine!”

“Okay... maybe not selfish reasons... exactly.”

“Tell me.”

Bard’s hand stroked Thran’s knee restlessly. “You and Bilbo and Rada tell me that my sketches are pretty good...”

Thran waited, but Bard didn’t continue. He pressed a kiss on Bard’s neck. “They are more than ‘pretty good,’ Bard. They are distinctive, masterful, evocative, unique.”

“Okay-y-y...” The trailing sound of Bard’s last syllable conveyed his uncomfortableness. “If they are, then maybe it’s not the best business decision for me to do caricatures at the school Follies? I’m not a snoot, Thran, but I want to be taken as a serious artist again, not just some want-to-be who happened to marry a famous and wonderful dancer. I don’t know. I’m no good at this part of the business.”

Thran had just enough time to keep himself from tensing. Of course Sigrid had not said anything to Bard about what she’d read on the Internet; this was just Bard speaking of a tangent to his money concerns. He took a sip of nalivka to give himself time to think, and to appear unconcerned.

“Why not wait to decide anything until you show your new sketches to Bilbo?” he suggested. “If he thinks they are as good as Rada and I do, then perhaps it would be a better to donate a nice piece to the silent auction. That would mean that you did not flood the local market with many quick pieces of children who simper, and when you have your show, whoever bought your more thoughtful piece at the Follies would feel as if he or she had purchased a treasure.”

Bard had chuckled at Thran’s characterization of fair-going children, but at the same time his body relaxed the slight tension that had crept into it. “You put me to shame, angel. You came up with a good solution without thinking hard.”

“Neither of us can know everything about everything.” Thran set his empty glass down on the edge of the tub behind him, shut his eyes, and enjoyed the body cradled against his. “I could not have done one tenth of the things you have done on our home to make it beautiful. I cannot sketch as you do, or make sculpture. You cannot dance as I do, and yes, I have more expertise with the money side of life than you. So it is good that we have each other, yes? Together we have everything we need.”

Bard’s answer was silent, merely a kiss on the back of Thran’s hand, and another on his wedding band.

Once they dried and got into bed, however, Bard rewarded Thran’s thoughtful compassion with more than a pair of kisses on the hand.

* * *

Had life finally settled into a routine? “Routine” seemed like a dull, inadequate word to describe the rhythm of Monday morning, because despite the early hour and the rainy weather, Bard took pleasure in each moment. He made school lunches and breakfasts with Thran, saw the children off to school, and concocted the day’s soup – ginger carrot – while the dancers worked through their barre. He perused the Internet on Thran’s computer to look at floor tile for the half bath. So far, he hadn’t seen anything he liked to go with the Rembrandt red, but a beautiful white, grey, and silver star mosaic had seduced him so badly that he was considering relegating the Rembrandt red to accents so he could pair the floor mosaic with silver tea paper on the walls and ceiling. It’d be just as decadent as Russian gilded red, but imagine how beautiful little Charisse would look against a silver backdrop, or Thran. Add a comfortable chair where a dancer could adjust her shoes, or gaze at a vase of flowers, Rembrandt’s lady in red, or a Degas ballerina, and it’d be perfect. Marble mosaic tile was expensive, but the room was small enough that that wouldn’t be such a big deal. As for the walls, he found something that looked just like silver origami paper that wasn’t too expensive. It’d be easy to put up, and the hand-applied look would be nice. He filed that away when Rada and Ori appeared, and hastened into the ballroom with sketchbook and pencils in hand.

The morning proceeded calmly, without upset. Whatever Thran had said to Irmo during their argument, the choreographer was well behaved and focused. They worked on the pas de deux in Act II where the Maid pines for her Soldier gone to the Underworld, and the pas de deux in Act III where the Soldier pines for his Maid gone to the Underworld. The consensus was to parallel the dances so that the steps would be almost identical, but the parts would be reversed in the two acts. That would reinforce the idea of how closely bound the Maid and the Soldier were in their love for each other.

Over lunch, the discussion centered on which culture would be the reference point to make the Soldiers’ costumes. World War I? Ancient Greek? Very modern ones where abandoned because they called too much attention to a specific political situation. Identifiable ancient ones were also abandoned, because they clashed with the modern music chosen for the mortal scenes. In the end, Rada and Bard put forth the idea that the conflict was a mythical, hand-to-hand conflict, and that the two factions should look almost identical, to further suggest the inanity of war. Irmo liked that, so simple tunics bearing vague insignia, swords, and pikes were all that was needed.

As lunch wound down, Thran pulled Bard aside before he went back to the ballroom. “We have our meeting with Hal this afternoon at two, so I told him to come to the front door.”

“T’ll keep an ear out,” Bard nodded. “I’m mixing up Tandoori chicken for tonight. Shall I serve tea to the fancy financial planner?”

Thran snickered. “Hal would love that. He has become something of a tea snob, he tells me – his best friend has quite the taste for exotic blends, and has pulled Hal into that discerning world with him. His latest fad is green matcha tea.”

“Is that the stuff that looks like pond scum?” Bard raised a skeptical eyebrow.

“It does, but do not say that to Hal unless you want to see him recoil in horror. He can be quite histrionic.”

Bard had a mischievous grin on his face. “Maybe I will say that, just to twit the fancy financial planner.”

“He is great fun to tease. But please, do not twit him about anything before he is through all of our financial endeavors, or we will be at them all afternoon. Charisse is anxious to show the doll dance to Tilda, so we cannot poke at poor Hal for very long.”

“I’ll serve tea, then, but Hal will have to take solace in spice tea to go with the muffins. Orange cranberry, blueberry, Nirvana... what’s your preference?”
“I leave it to you, lyubov moya. If you are kind enough to make muffins, then you should have the pleasure to make the kind you want.”

“I’ll come up with something. It’s after one now, so let me get on with the cooking before I have to explain my paltry box of paper to the nice financial planner.”

“I hear and obey, my saint,” Thran stroked Bard’s hair with a smile, then headed after the rest of the ballet crew.

Chuckling, Bard mixed his chicken marinade, thoroughly doused chicken pieces with it, and stuck the mixture to chill in the fridge. He decided to make both orange cranberry and Nirvana muffins, given how much the children liked them. He got both mixed up, baked, and on the kitchen island to cool before he heard the knock on the front door. Bard wiped his hands off with a grin of anticipation, and headed for the central hall.

Bard opened the door to reveal a slim man about Bard’s height clad in understated but expensive clothes. He wore the front and top of his shoulder-length blond hair pulled straight back and pinned at the back of his head. Each long slender ear bore a diamond stud in the lobe. Clear, green eyes flecked with blue swept Bard with just as much curiosity as Bard’s brown eyes swept him. Such beautiful clothes – calf-length camelhair coat with a shawl collar, green plaid cashmere scarf at the neck, and supple brown leather driving gloves, understated, tailored wool trousers in a dark blue and grey herringbone, black calfskin leather oxfords with thin black laces. The requisite briefcase was rich brown leather with gold fittings, and the matching satchel was the same brown leather. Behind this vision, beside Bard’s well-worn tradesman’s truck, sat a pristine white Audi R8. All in all, he was quite the prosperous-looking financial planner.

“You must be Hal,” Bard greeted, offering his hand.

“I am. And you are most definitely Bard,” Hal replied with a smile, clasping Bard’s hand with his own. “You’re just as Thran described you. It’s a pleasure to meet you in person.”

Hal was the picture of decorum, but Bard was well ogled, albeit in the most discreet fashion. Bard smothered a grin. “Glad to meet you, too. Come on in. Let me take your coat, and we’ll drag Thran away from the ballet to go over our stuff.”

“Oooh, Thran told me about this ballet of his,” Hal confided, letting Bard take his coat. As Bard hung it up in the closet, Hal looked around at the hallway, then took in Hope from top to bottom. “Oh, my god, this is such a beautiful piece! What a beautiful finish, and so expressive! Thran said you were a metal sculptor – is this one of yours?”

“She is,” Bard nodded. “Hope the Lope, as my children call her.”

“Stunning,” Hal looked up at Hope’s outstretched hoof. As he studied the antelope, Bard noted the deceptively simple braid that held Hal’s hair at the back, the elegant dark blue blazer, and white shirt with impeccable French cuffs. Thran was right that the man had a sense of humor – his cufflinks were small, white gold crowns that twinkled with diamonds, and his pocket square was bright fuchsia. The queen, indeed.

“Thanks,” Bard smothered another smile. “You can leave your things in the dining room, then we’ll pry Thran free.”

“Thran said you’re in the midst of restoring the house,” Hal said as he put his bags down by one of the dining room chairs.
“It’s still rough around the edges,” Bard shrugged. “Most of the work I’ve finished is upstairs – bathrooms, the children’s bedrooms, the children’s study. We have four children, so I wanted them settled first. The kitchen’s done, too, and the ballroom. But I’ve still got a lot of work to do downstairs for the public rooms. The ballroom’s this way.”

“Did you say ballroom?” Hal’s distinctive blue-flecked green eyes widened. “Really, or are you speaking metaphorically?”

“Oh, we have a real ballroom,” Bard assured him, leading the way into the main room. “So far, we’ve had soccer games and fencing matches in it. Now we’ve got a troupe of dancers, a choreographer, and a few more people creating a ballet in it.”

Bard escorted Hal into the ballroom, gratified when the financial planner’s eyes popped wider still, and his mouth fell open.

“Oh. My. God!” Hal mouthed silently, putting his hand over his heart. “You’ve got a ballroom!”

“That we do,” Bard agreed.

“It’s beautiful! It’s amazing! It’s just like something out of Cinderella! Look at the herringbone floor! And so much gorgeous plasterwork! And the color’s divine! I can’t believe it!” Hal gave him a rapt stare. “You redid this yourself? It must have taken you weeks!”

“I had someone fix the ceiling plasterwork, but the rest was just a lot of elbow grease, spackling, and paint.”

“Well, it’s stunning,” Hal assured him, as Thran broke away from his huddle with Irmo, Luka, and Charisse and came forward with a welcoming smile. “Just stunning. The perfect setting for the perfect dancer. Thran, good to see you again.”

“Welcome, Hal,” Thran greeted the financial planner warmly with a hug. “I am pleased to see you again, too. You have met my husband, Bard?”

“I certainly have,” Hal purred, grinning. “You’re quite the lucky man, old friend.”

“I am,” Thran purred back, causing Bard to roll his eyes.

“Gods, you two. I’m having tea. Do either of you want any?”

“I’d love some,” Hal agreed with a delighted smile. “Did Thran tell you, I’ve gone into tea in a big way lately?”

Bard led the way back to the dining room. “He did. No green matcha, I’m afraid. Indian spice.”

“Sounds perfect.”

“Righto,” Bard replied. “Cariad, go ahead and start in the dining room. I’ll collect my stuff, and bring in the tea.”

Thran winked at him, and his smile widened just the barest bit, but it had faded by the time Hal cast his husband a look. Bard shook his head, and retreated to the kitchen. Those two reminded him of nothing so much as a couple of cats who hoped to indulge in a game of pat the ball, with Bard standing in as the ball.

He’d take his time collecting his shoebox and the tea tray.
Hal’s smooth demeanor lasted all of three seconds after Bard disappeared into the kitchen. Then he smirked at Thran for all he was worth, and put his hand over his heart. That was Hal’s favorite gesture.

“Oh, my god, Thran! He’s gorgeous! Please tell me he’s got a brother somewhere, a cousin, a halfway decent friend!”

Thran sat back in his chair and allowed himself an amused smile. In truth, it was hard not to laugh outright at Hal’s typical flailing. “What happened to the biker I thought you were so enamored with?”

Hal waved a hand as he took off his blazer and draped it over the back of his chair. “Oh, that was so last year, Thran. He was so last year. Ran off with a waitress, if you believe that. I’ve moved on, onward and upward.”

As Hal adjusted the cuffs of his shirt with his usual fastidious precision, Thran chuckled. “Crowns, Hal? Gods, that is gaudy, even for you.”

“You certainly do.”

“So tell me about this,” he waved his hands, indicating the house. “You’re married? You, the Prince of Ice? The man with the untouchable heart? You could have knocked me over with a feather when you told me you were married! Though seeing Bard, I don’t blame you. He’s a catch and then some.”

“It is quite a story, and I am as surprised as you are. It was not something I expected, not at all.”

“Well, it can’t be that you got him pregnant – or he you, for that matter,” Hal looked at him skeptically. “You aren’t going to tell me a fairytale about true love and destiny, all swans and violins, are you? Really.”

“It is nothing less,” Thran shrugged, smiling. “Though so far we have seen neither swans nor violins.”

Hal rolled his eyes. “Oh, no – you ran into him on a rainy day trying to catch a cab. Honestly, Thran! That is such a cliché.”

“It was rainy, but there was no cab. I had to walk home in the rain and my radiators were ice cold, and Bard was the night super who had to face my wrath. He was quite patient with me, as it was not his fault. Then he made me chicken soup, and Thanksgiving dinner, and I was quite entranced.”

“He seduced you with soup?” Hal’s face revealed astonishment. “Oh, Thran – that’s an even bigger cliché! Snaring a man through his stomach. He sounds devious to me.”

“He is anything but – it was I who seduced him. Though I must warn you that Bard is a very good cook. Do not let his muffins incite you into something foolish.”

“No longer. In a few minutes, you will see that my husband is more than a beautiful man who is patient and cooks well. He is a gifted artist, a wonderful partner, excellent father –”

“Oooh, Legolas likes him, then? That’s gold.”

“He does. Bard has three children of his own, too. We are a large clan.”

“You certainly are,” Hal’s brow wrinkled. “That’s a surprise – I never saw you as the type to want more children.”

“I have two lovely daughters now, and another son. They are all gems, and I am lucky to have them, as well as Bard. But quickly, before Bard returns...”

“Yes?” Hal leaned forward conspiratorially.

“Bard has suffered badly in the ten years since his wife died. He has worked harder than you and I could imagine, all to care for his children, who are his treasures. He has not much money sense, but he knows it, and he has done the best he can. I expect that because he can now work as an artist again, he will soon find himself with more money than he expects.”

“He’s good, then,” Hal said, his teasing façade gone. His face was sharp and focused now, down to business.

“He is more than good, Hal. He will soon sign with a reputable artist’s representative who will market his work more widely. A show is in the plans. He has contributed much to this ballet I pursue, too – he has written most of the story, and he so impressed the costumier that he collaborates on that, too. I expect that his sketches may well play into the publicity for the ballet. And I wonder if a collection of his sketches of the creation process would not make a wonderful book. This is all in addition to his sculpture.”

“So he’ll have a brand to manage, and the money that follows to manage, too.”

“That is what I expect. He worries very much about money, so when you see his so-very-thin paper trail, do not fault him. You and I have no idea what it is like to live the way he has, nor could we cope the way he has. Be gentle.”

Hal’s nod was sober. “Of course. I appreciate your trust in me to help him. So whatever he’s got now is next to nothing, and probably in a mess. Going forward, he’ll need a plan for his assets; and help to understand what he can do with them, as well as grow them for his children. I’m guessing that’s foremost in his mind – providing for his children.”

“Exactly so.”

“Right.” Hal steepled his fingers and pinched his bottom lip between his index fingers. “Several ideas come to mind right away. But we’ve got time, and as things move along, we’ll see what makes sense.” He smiled and gave Thran a fond smile. “Does he know what a gem he’s got in you?”

“I know to a fine point,” Bard said, coming into the dining room with a tray on which rested the black iron teapot, Japanese porcelain cups, small plates, a basket of muffins, and a crock of butter. “I’ve got a dancer I have to badger to eat, who pretends not to know how to do the laundry. But he’s cute, so I keep him.”

“I know how to do the laundry,” Thran protested, smiling, as Bard went back in the kitchen to retrieve his box of receipts.

“True. You do. So I guess I have even more reason to keep you.”

“You are very good to me,” Thran batted his eyes at Bard, drawing a snort from Hal.

“Oh, my god, you two are disgusting – I’m about to die from the sugar overload.”

“Then perhaps you should not eat any of Bard’s muffins,” Thran teased, as Bard sat down on the other side of Hal. “They have sugar in them, yes, Bard?”

“A little,” Bard conceded, taking one. Ah, his husband had outdone himself – both cranberry orange and Nirvana muffins graced the plate.

“There’s nothing wrong with a little sugar overload,” Hal sniffed. “Honestly, Thran.”

“Then perhaps you should try these,” Thran pointed to the darker muffins. “Nirvana muffins. Bard’s speciality.”

“There’s nothing wrong with a little Nirvana to go with my sugar high, either,” Hal grinned in anticipation as he took one to butter, then sampled a bite. “Oh, my god, Bard, these are to die for! Quick, we’d better get started, or I’ll eat the entire plateful! Which of you wants to go first?”

“I will,” Thran replied, reaching for his packet of papers that lay on the table. “As usual, I thank you for your excellent workbook, which makes the cataloging very nice and easy...”

Little more had to be said before Hal dropped his histrionics to focus on Thran’s finances. As funny as Hal could be, it was a carefully cultivated persona that masked a sharp mind. Hal ticked through Thran’s documents, forms, and spreadsheets in sequence, asking clarifying questions as needed, answering Thran’s questions in a crisp, no-nonsense tone. Sitting across from Thran, Bard sat patiently, likely not following most of what was said, but watching both of his companions to gauge the discussion.

“... so everything’s in good order,” Hal concluded, after an hour’s concentrated study. “I’ve got everything to complete your returns, Thran. Going forward, though, I’d suggest you keep an eye on those eastern oil shares. Those two companies are heavy in coal, and given how low oil prices are going to be for the next year, coal’s not coming back anytime soon – the cost to mine is much higher than the cost to drill. Think about trading that position for a company with less coal, or even some alternative energies, if you’re feeling adventurous. I’ll look into some alternatives if you want to think about it.”

“Sounds prudent,” Thran nodded. “See what you think about the solar offerings. I am interested in that.”

Hal scribbled a note to himself, nodding. “Righto. All right. Anything else we need to talk about?”

Thran took another bite of his muffin. “We have covered everything, my friend.”

Hal scribbled a few more notes, stacked his papers neatly in a folder, and put the folder aside. He gave Bard a smile. “All right, Bard. Let’s see where you stand.”

Bard gave Thran a wry look as he opened his shoebox and took out a few slips of paper. He slid them over to Hal. “I don’t think it’ll take you as long to see to me as it did to Thran.”
“What a relief!” Hal rolled his eyes with a grin. “Those complex Russians are exhausting!”

Hal sorted out Bard’s documents with the finesse of a Las Vegas dealer, taking each one in with a glance. “So... three W-2 statements; interest statement on a bank account; one, two, three receipts for medical expenses; and a stack of rent receipts.”

“That’s the lot of it,” Bard nodded.

“Do you have any records of the hours you put in for the night supervisor position?”

“I do,” Bard nodded as he slid over a battered ledger book. “I’ll tell you before you look at it that it won’t match whatever that bit of paper from Steffen Masters sent me. It never has.”

“Why not?” Hal flicked a frown at Bard before Thran could catch his eye. When he did meet Thran’s eyes, he winced before looking back to Bard. “Ah. This Steffen Masters shorted you.”

Bard nodded. “I think by about a hundred hours. Has Thran already told you why?”

“He hasn’t.”

In a calm, unemotional voice, Bard explained that he hadn’t complained about the chronic shorting of hours because he hadn’t wanted to lose his subsidized apartment, and what it would have meant to Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda if he had. Hal probed whether Bard had copies of any of the time cards he’d turned in to Steffen. Bard pointed to the ledger book.

“They’re in the back, but it won’t make any difference,” Bard shook his head. “The differences amount to a couple of hours a week, and nothing I could ever prove, though I admit I didn’t try too hard. I didn’t want to risk my apartment.”

Once more, Thran saw how precarious Bard’s situation had been just three months ago. His anger must’ve shown on his face, because Hal’s jaw tightened in commiseration.

“No, it wasn’t right, and yes, I wish it hadn’t been the case,” Bard exhaled, taking in Thran’s and Hal’s expressions. “But I get the impression that Steffen’s gotten in trouble for a lot more than shorting my hours, and I’m out of that situation, and into a better one. So whatever numbers are on his bits of paper, let them go.”

“Did you receive anything for those extra hours?” Hal pressed.

Bard shook his head. “Not in money. Does the rate reduction count?”

“How do you have any receipts for the rent you paid?”

“I do – the green papers are the rent receipts.”

Hal looked at them. “Do they list the amount of the original rent, or the rent you paid? Oh, never mind; at that amount, clearly, that’s what you paid. Hmm. Creative financing doesn’t begin to cover it. But if your ex-landlord’s in trouble, the chances are slim and none that you’ll collect anything from him, though I can put through the paperwork if you want.”

Bard shook his head. “I’m out of there, my children are safe, and I’m taking care of them better now. I’ll take that, and a chance for better this year.”

Hal didn’t argue, but Thran thought he regarded Bard more thoughtfully than before. “Good enough. All right, I know what I need to do with this. I suspect that I’ll be able to get you the amount you paid in for taxes back, given the total amount you made last year. Do you have a copy of your previous year’s return that I can take with me for comparison?”

“Sure. I’ll get that for you. Back in a tick.”

Bard headed upstairs for his slender box of records from previous years that he kept in the closet. As soon as he was out of the room, Hal narrowed his gaze on Thran.

“What that bastard did to your dishy husband amounted to slavery, Thran.”

“Oh, it was much worse than that, my friend,” Thran growled. “But please, honor Bard’s request to let it go. Steffen Masters is currently in so much hot water that he will soon be nothing but greasy broth. I have made sure of that.”

“Have you, now?” Hal’s eyebrows went up. “How wonderful! Nori Goldman, I assume?”

Thran nodded.

“Most excellent. Give him my congratulations when you talk to him next. I might have to look into this, purely for my own shameless self-gratification. He’s always fun to watch.”

“So he is.”

Bard came back with the copy of his tax return that Hal had requested, and after a few more moments of chat, Hal collected the documents, stowed them in his satchel, and pulled out a business card to give Bard. “I’ll be in touch with you both when I’ve got your returns ready. After that, I’d like to come out again for some more of your delicious muffins, Bard, as well as to talk about ways to handle your finances from how on. In case you have any questions before that, please give me a call.”

Thran’s husband grinned at the flamboyant fuchsia card with Hal’s information on it. “It’ll be hard to misplace this, won’t it?”

“Well, that is the point,” Hal looked up at the ceiling with an exaggerated shrug. “Isn’t it?”

“It is,” Bard agreed, as Hal resumed his jacket and they escorted him to the front door. Bard retrieved Hal’s coat from the closet, and passed it to Thran to hold for Hal.

“All right, lovebirds,” Hal turned back to Thran to give him a farewell hug. “Thran, old friend, it’s always a pleasure.”

“It is for me as well, Hal,” Thran returned Hal’s hug warmly.

“And Bard, my new friend?” he invited, arms wide.

Bard gave him an unruffled but amused smile. “As long as it doesn’t cause too much excitement.”

Hal put his hand to his heart and eyed Thran. “Oh, he’s a saucy one, is he? Oh, my god, you must have your hands full with him!”

“As often as possible,” Thran teased, as Bard opened the door.

“Then I definitely need to give him a hug! Bard, it’s been a pleasure. And the muffins were absolutely divine!”

Bard hugged him back without reservation. “You’re welcome, Hal. Thran told me I’d get a kick out of meeting you, and he was right. I appreciate you stooping to deal with my slim pickings so gracefully.”

Hal put his hands on Bard’s shoulders without any theatricality. “Next year, you’ll have a lot more for me to deal with, Bard, and deservedly so. I’ll talk to you soon about ways to make the most of what you earn for yourself, Thran, and especially your children. Don’t you doubt it for one single moment.”

“That’s exactly what I want,” Bard nodded, as Hal went out on the porch and turned back to wave goodbye. “Thank you.”

“You’re very welcome,” Hal smiled, and went down the stairs

Thran took in the outrageous Audi R8 sitting in the driveway, and couldn’t resist a snort as he waved at the car. “Really, Hal? That is over the top, too, even for you.”

Again, a grinning Hal shrugged without apology. “I told you, Thran. I love bling.”

“Bling, indeed. Safe trip home, my friend. Until next time.”

Hal winked. “Until next time. Ciao!”

As Hal revved up his blingy car and disappeared down the lane, Bard chuckled.

“You survived well, lyubov moya,” Thran observed, as he and Bard came in from the porch and shut the front door. “You did not let Hal discommode you in the least.”

Bard wasn’t able to suppress a snicker. “Actually, I was trying not to ‘discommode’ either of you. I felt like a cat toy between a pair of Siamese.”

“You handled us both very well. What was your secret?”

Bard shrugged, but his eyes twinkled with suppressed humor. “I pretended I was straight. It worked.”

Laughter bubbled out of Thran as he snared Bard by the shoulder and backed him against the door to kiss him. “Oh, my saint, you are a most resourceful man. Would you let me tempt you from your straight path back to a crooked one later tonight?”

Grasping Thran’s wrists, Bard kissed him back with a smile. “I think you’ve already done so.”

“I want to be sure.”

Bard pulled Thran into another kiss. “Hmm. You perform better when faced with a challenge, but given that you’ve got to go back to the ballroom, maybe I’ll go easy on you.”

Laughing, Thran pushed away from the door, and headed back to the ballroom. “When I am done with you, you will go very easily. Until later, lyubov moya.”

Bard’s chuckle followed Thran back to the ballroom. It was a most anticipatory sound.
Chapter 83

Chapter Summary

A pair of cherubs try their hands at the dance, complete with music. Later, an angel confesses his compulsion to meet a bandit, and a saint considers the riches a bandit might plunder.

Chapter Notes

The music that accompanies this chapter is "Valse Pour Jeanette," by Tonny Eyck (the doll's dance), and "Carnival of Souls (Theatre Organ and Calliope Instrumentation)," by Verne Langdon (the ghost's dance). Both are wonderful, but "Carnival of Souls" has just made it into my top ten rotation. Both are available on YouTube, so play them while you read.

I don't own any rights or whatever to YouTube. But they've been my go-to site when I wanted to find music for this story!

After Hal left, Bard had an hour to fill until the children came home. He could've followed Thran back into the ballroom to work with Rada, but he decided he’d add to his growing collection of sketches for Bilbo, and spent that hour at work on pictures of the flamboyant financial planner. Hal offered so much to work with, so Bard had a good dozen portraits of him completed before the children rattled through the mudroom door. He got up to muster the usual snacks of cheese and crackers, which disappeared in seconds down four hungry throats. Bard followed them as they ducked into the ballroom to wave hello to Thran. When Legolas gave Thran a big hug, Bard’s throat tightened. The boy had missed his Papa more than he’d let on, but at least his happiness with Thran’s presence was open and unrestrained.

“Bain! Sigrid! Tilda! Welcome home!” Thran called to the other children as he draped an arm around the shoulders of his tall son. “You have all had a good day, I hope?”

“I have new French words today!” Tilda waved. “Words about l’école, the school.”

“We’ll make quick work of those,” Legolas looked up at his father. “Won’t we?”

“We certainly will, synok,” Thran grinned, hugging Legolas. “But first, we will have a treat before supper. Have you had your fromage et craquelins, mes petits?” At the assorted nods, Thran pointed to Charisse. “Good. Charisse has happily agreed to do the doll dance with me. When Irmo is finished with her and Luka, we will show you.”

Tilda’s eyes brightened as she and Sigrid traded gleeful expressions. “Will she be the doll, or will you?”

“She will be the doll first, then I will be. So you will see our original dance, and then what you or Sigrid might do as the child who wants to play with the toymaker’s new doll.”
“That’ll be so cool,” Sigrid exclaimed. “What do you think, Tilda?”

“It will.”

“Ahh. Here comes Charisse.”

The little dancer gave the children’s welcoming chorus a warm smile. “Hello, children. My friend Luka has generously told Irmo that he wants to go over a part of his dance alone, so I can slip away to dance something fun with Thran. We had such a good time when we did this dance two years ago, so I’m glad to do it again. We’re doing the original dance first, aren’t we, Thran?”

Thran nodded, and held his hand out to Charisse. “Shall we, ma chère?”

“Wait,” Sigrid asked. “Don’t you need music for your dance?”

“We can do it without for now, just to show you,” Thran shrugged.

“Tell me what it is, and I can play it on my laptop,” Sigrid offered. “I’ll go get it.”

Sigrid retreated to the kitchen to retrieve her backpack, and returned with it cradled in her arms.

“How’s the name of the piece?”

“It’s a very light and pretty waltz – Valse Pour Jeanette, by a Dutchman named Tonny Eyck,” Charisse supplied. “But on the accordion, it sounds very French, very sunny.”

“I’ll check YouTube,” Sigrid said, clicking away. “Oh, there it is. Say when, and I’ll start it.”

With a smile, Charisse gave her hand to Thran, and he escorted her to the end of the ballroom. He looked back at Bard and the children, and pointed to the area in front of the tall windows. “We will make this the stage. So face the windows, and we will begin.”

Once Bard and the children were in place, Thran nodded to Sigrid, and she started the music. Charisse froze into a rigid pose, all wide unblinking eyes, wooden face, and stiff legs and arms. Thran tucked her under his arm to carry her to the middle of the floor, then set her down on her feet. He then walked around her, rubbing his chin, considering this wonderful doll. He pushed down on her head until she slid into a split, moved her arms upright, and tilted her head. Then he turned away to fetch a tool. As soon as his back was turned, the doll made a naughty face at him, and slid upright into her original position. When Thran turned back to her, Charisse’s face was once again wide-eyed and wooden. Thran made a show of looking all around for whom had moved the doll, but of course there was no one, so he repositioned the doll, then bent for his tools again. The doll put her thumbs in her ears to waggle her hands at the doll maker, stuck her tongue out at the same time, and flopped into a new pose. Again, the doll maker looked unsuccessfully for the culprit, but was now too suspicious to look away. He poked and prodded the doll into ever more contorted poses, finally satisfied that the doll would not move again. This time, however, when he turned his back, the doll leaped up and kicked the doll maker’s backside to knock him over before slipping back into immovability. A battle of wits ensued, until the doll maker found himself bowled over and the doll flopped atop him in a ridiculous pose. The harder the doll maker tried to extricate himself, the limper she became, but finally he got himself upright and the doll back on her feet. The dance swirled again from one ridiculous pose after another. Finally, the flustered doll maker ended up on his belly with the doll standing atop him, arms upstretched. When the doll maker cradled his chin in his hands and heaved a sigh, conceding defeat, the doll made muscle arms and smiled triumphantly, ending the dance. That met with enthusiastic applause.

“That was terrific!” Bain declared, clapping as hard as the girls. “You made it look so easy, like you really were a rag doll, Mlle. Charisse!"

“Thank you!” she laughed. “Oh, it is still fun to do that, even two years on, Thran. So much fun!”

“It is nice to do something lighthearted,” he agreed. “Shall we switch roles?”

“I will have to pretend to wheel you out on a cart or something,” Charisse decided. “For certainement, I cannot lift you.”

“That’s where I come in,” Bard held up his hand. “The story we started with was that I’d be the toymaker who carries the doll out, and Tilda or Sigrid would be the little girl who isn’t supposed to play with the doll. But she sneaks in anyway, and tries to get the doll to dance. But of course, he just flops around. Then I thought about what should come next. Maybe the doll breaks a dish or something, and the doll helps her hide the bits, then they put him back into his original position. When the toymaker comes in to ask who did it, the little girl disavows all knowledge. After the toymaker leaves, the girl and the doll think they’ve put something over on him, and dance around until they end up in a heap.”

“That’s a good story!” Charisse clapped her hands. “Let’s try it, Thran.”

“I need my ride,” Thran winked at Bard, and struck his stiff pose. Bard duly picked him up, carried him in front of the window, set him down, and pretended to brush him off. Charisse moved close to the windows.

“I stick my head out of the curtains,” she said, miming that. When Sigrid started the music again, Charisse looked left, then right, then tiptoed from behind the imaginary curtain, still looking to make sure the doll maker hadn’t seen her. She walked around the doll, poking and prodding, pulling on his arms to make him dance, but he merely let her flap his arms until suddenly he slumped over into a split, the rest of him leaning floppily to one side. Charisse recoiled in shock, then pushed him to and fro into the most impossible positions. When she got him into a backbend, then she pushed him over, and laughed when he fell into a heap. She was so delighted in her mischief that the doll sat up with an exaggerated frown, and sent her tumbling, pretending to laugh at her. When Charisse picked herself up, of course, the doll was immobile. So she put him in another impossible pose, but a swinging arm tumbled her over again, and the doll flopped down on top of her. She struggled to get out from under him, glaring at him when she finally did. The battle of wits went back and forth until an errant foot flapped wildly around.

“So I break the dish,” Thran called, as he and Charisse froze, both of them with their hands over their mouths in shock. The doll and the girl looked at each other with exaggerated alarm, and they hurriedly swept the bits of broken crockery away. Then Charisse struggled to put the doll in his original position.

“Now the doll maker appears, because he heard the noise,” Thran called. He stood awry from his original pose when Bard stepped forward with hands on hips. He held his hands wide, miming a sharp question. Charisse put her hands behind her and looked innocent as she shook her head vigorously. Bard put his hands on his hips, frowning at Charisse, then shaking his finger at her. Charisse shook her head again just as vigorously, holding her hands up mystification.

Bard looked around suspiciously, but exited when he didn’t find anything. Charisse mimed glee at putting something over on the doll maker, and the doll did, too. The girl mimed wanting to dance with the doll, who offered a floppy bow, and the pair danced around in a circle twice before the doll stumbled, tumbling on top of the girl. She ended up on her stomach, with the doll sprawled face up on top of her, her chin in her hands as Thran had done the first time. To end the dance, Thran turned towards the audience and grinned, waving his arms wide.
“That was great!” Sigrid clapped enthusiastically. “That was so great!”

“It was!” Tilda agreed. “It really was!”

Charisse and Thran got up and offered bows. “That was fun,” Charisse laughed. “You make a very good doll, mon cher.”

“And you make a very good playmate,” Thran replied. “What do you think, Kukla? Would you like to be my playmate in the dance?”

“If you don’t want to, I will,” Sigrid offered. “It won’t be a cute as if you do it, because you’re smaller than I am, but it looks like so much fun.”

“It does look like fun,” Tilda considered. “Do you think I could learn to do it?”

“There’s a time limit of no more than five minutes for each act,” Bard said.

“Our music is three and a half minutes, no more. That will be a perfect time.”

“Three and a half minutes?” Tilda considered. “I can do that.”

“We will practice until we both know it,” Thran said. “It will be fun.”

“Why can’t you do zombies?” Bain shook his head, looking at Legolas. “Dolls are okay, but zombies would be a lot more fun.”

Charisse laughed. “Ah, remember how we all danced the zombies from Thriller at the end of the gala?”

“I do,” Thran grinned. “Also much fun.”

“If Tilda’s going to do the doll dance, would you do another dance with me, Ada? Please?” Sigrid ventured. “I found this piece of music last night. It’s not zombie music, but it’s eerie. It’s a waltz.”

“Two dances?” Thran looked to Bard. “I would be glad to do it, ma chère, but is there a limit on only one act per person?”

“I’ll call Halina tomorrow and ask,” Bard offered. “I don’t think they have many dance entries, so maybe they’d be glad for you to do two. Anyway, we’ll just tell them different children are in the sketch.”

“It’s really neat music, Ada,” Sigrid pleaded. “It’s called Carnival of Souls, and I love it.”

“Then let us hear it,” Thran winked at Bard. “Show your Da how to start the music, and then we will waltz.”

Sigrid’s delighted grin was so wide that Bard wondered if his daughter had caught a little of the performance bug from Thran. She showed him which button to click on his computer, then scrambled to take her place in front of Thran. He showed her how to position one hand on his shoulder and the other in his hand, and he led them through the basic waltz step for a turn or two.

“Ready for your eerie music, ma chère?” Thran asked.

Sigrid nodded. “Okay, Da.”

The music started, as eerie as Sigrid promised, a combination of a massive Wurlitzer theater organ and circus calliope. Thran swung Sigrid rapidly around to the music, occasionally murmuring an instruction or a direction. Sigrid kept pace with him as they danced round and round the ballroom, the wide grin never leaving her face. When they passed Irmo and Luka, the pair paused, and Luka made his escape to swing Charisse around after Thran and Sigrid, laughing. The music evoked abandoned circus tents at midnight when old spirits ventured out for one more dance, one more memory. Maybe it wasn’t the zombies the boys wanted, but with the right costumes and lighting, it would be a ghostly performance.

“Oh, I liked that!” Sigrid exclaimed when the music ended. “That’s amazing, so amazing! Please, Ada, if you can do two dances, would you do this one, too?”

“I love this music!” Charisse enthused. “So eerie, not quite mortal. So wonderful. Would you play it again, Bard?”

“I like it, too,” Thran nodded at once, as Luka and Charisse circled around to the music. Watching them, Irmo got caught up in it, and began suggesting steps, which the two dancers did in time with the music. “Very odd, but very beautiful. Of course, we will dance this, Sigrid. Your Da must come up with a story for us that fits such evocative music.”

“I’m halfway there,” Bard said. “An abandoned carnival at midnight, when the spirits of the performers come out to dance. Maybe not zombies, but ghosts.”

“That’s perfect!” Sigrid nodded. “We can dress up as a little bit creepy, a little bit decaying.”

“It is a fast waltz,” Thran observed. “But we must make it light, like ghosts.”

“I can do that,” Sigrid nodded. “All the running has done my lungs wonders.”

“Let us go again, then,” Thran offered, and Sigrid agreed with alacrity. This time, Sigrid was more assured, more relaxed, and even managed a twirl under Thran’s arm with reasonable finesse.

Tilda came to stand beside Bard. “That looks like fun.”

“It does. Want to give it a try, little doll?” Bard offered.

Tilda looked up at him with such appreciation that Bard held out his hand. “Let’s do it, then.”

“A waltz is one-two-three, one-two-three,” Tilda supplied, drawing Bard’s chuckle.

“Got it. Ready?”

They waited until both pairs went by them, then swung after them. They did passably well, keeping up with the others, keeping good time.

“Switch partners!” Luka called, handing Charisse off to Thran. Sigrid went to Bard, and Tilda went to Luka without a hitch. Rada stepped in to restart the music, and with a taller partner, Bard got the full force of the pace and the dance. When Luka called again, Bard sent Sigrid on to Luka, Tilda went to Thran, and Charisse came to Bard. The little dancer was a joy to partner, and Bard flew around the ballroom with her, both of them laughing. When the music ended this time, Bard was sorry no matter how winded he was, for the eerie music had a hypnotic quality that drew him. In whatever purgatory the carnival lingered, this music never stopped.

Bard had the worst urge to snare Thran and dance with him to this eerie music. But now was not the time for it. One night soon, when the children were in bed, he’d light a candle in the ballroom, play this music, and see what ghosts he’d lure to his midnight carnival. If a tall, ethereal, white haired apparition appeared, Bard would have his dance.

That gave Bard something to anticipate as they sorted themselves out. Interestingly, the eerie mood of the music fit so well with Immortal’s troll market scene that Irmo had snared Thran, wondering aloud whether it was something they should incorporate. Thran waved to Bard and the children as work shifted back into gear after the short interval, so Bard led the children back to the kitchen. Bain and Legolas were happy to play a video game while Tilda and Sigrid helped Bard start on supper prep.

“Luka dances like a dream,” Sigrid mused, as she leaned on the kitchen island to watch Bard pull out food from the fridge.

Bard eyed his oldest daughter over the bag of green beans. “He does?”

Sigrid nodded as she opened the bag of beans and took out enough for supper. “Ada does, too, of course. But it’s a little easier dancing with someone who isn’t so much taller than I am.”

Bard hummed noncommittally. Sigrid didn’t say any more, so Bard was willing to bide his time. “That was a great piece of music you found.”

She grinned. “I know! I love it. I figured that once Tilda saw what Charisse and Thran did with the doll dance that she’d want to do it, so I looked for something maybe I could do with Ada. I hope they’ll let him do two, Da. I want to dance with him, too.”

“It’ll be a lot of work,” Bard warned her. “For you, too, Tilda. Make sure you’re both willing to do the work it’ll take to get your dance ready. Once I tell Halina that you want to be in the show, you’re committed.”

“I want to,” Sigrid said quickly.

“I do, too,” Tilda agreed firmly.

“Okay,” Bard nodded. “You think about it overnight, then let me know for sure in the morning before you go to the school, then I’ll talk to Halina.”

The girls began to talk about what costumes they could put together, so Bard put chicken in the oven and a pot of farro on to simmer. Tilda put together fruit salad, Sigrid chopped veg for the steamer, and Bard set the table. Before long, Charisse, Luka, Rada, and Ori stuck their heads in to say goodnight, and soon after Thran escorted Irmo to the door. Supper was almost ready, so Thran hurried upstairs to divest himself of his dancing attire and put on something more comfortable. Supper was replete with good food, as well as a lot of talk about the girls’ dances with Thran.

“What about you, Legolas and Bain?” Bard teased. “Do you want to do an act, too?”

“No!” Bain said at once, and Legolas shook his head just as fast. “No way!”

“You, either, Legolas?” Thran made an exaggerated look of surprise.

“No, thank you, Papa,” Legolas said hastily. “Unless they let me fence or do archery or play zombie apocalypse, I leave the performing to you and Kukla and Sigrid.”

“Just as well,” Bard smiled at the boys. “Three hams in the family are enough.”

“Four, Da,” Sigrid corrected. “You’re the doll maker.”
“A nonspeaking, nondancing part. Just a mule. Which is just fine with me.”

“Bard is our storyteller,” Thran said. “He comes up with the story for Immortal, and then for the doll dance, and then for the carnival dance.”

“The carnival dance isn’t much of a story,” Bain said. “Just two people dancing.”

“He’s right,” Bard agreed. “If you want a story, it wouldn’t take much to add one.”

“Like what?” Sigrid asked.

“Hmm,” Bard thought about his idea to lure Thran down for a waltz. “What if Thran wanders into the abandoned carnival at night, and the ghost of a long dead performer appears, lures him into a dance, then disappears as the music fades? That’s all the story you need.”

“I like that!” Sigrid sat up straighter with a delighted grin. “And I get to be the ghost! That’s cool!”

“It is a good story,” Thran nodded. “So the audience stays interested, because it wants to see what happens when the dance ends. Will the ghost lure the boy to his death? Steal his heart? Vanish into smoke? Well done, my saint!”

“I still think it’d be better with zombies,” Bain cradled his chin in his hand, drawing Legolas’s laughter.

“With lots of blood,” Legolas muttered, mimicking Bain’s posture.

“Yeah! Blood!” Bain exclaimed.

“Ew, you two,” Sigrid grimaced. “No zombies! Next thing you know, you’ll want my arm to fall off in the middle.”

“That would be cool,” Legolas giggled.

“Yeah, we could rig her up with a false arm –”

“Bleah!” Tilda covered her eyes with her hands and shuddered. “I couldn’t watch that.”

“No, no, no!” Sigrid tapped the table with her fists for emphasis. “No zombies, no arms falling off, no blood! I’ll be a ghost who dances with a mortal at midnight. That’s it. That is it.”

“The queen has spoken,” Bard grinned.

“So let it be written, so let it be done,” Thran seconded, also grinning. “So we will have a cute dance between a doll and a very smart little girl, and an eerie dance between a mortal and a ghost. We have our assignments.”

“And some children have homework assignments,” Bard prompted. “Let’s have our dessert, then it’s time to crack the books.”

“I wish someone would crack my pre-algebra book,” Bain groaned. “Right in half, never to be repaired!”

“Une doleur,” Legolas grumped, hunching down when Thran eyed him.

“What’s that mean?” Bard asked.
“A pain,” Thran translated. “We do not have to add what kind of a pain, no?”

“No, Papa,” Legolas said as the boys got up to collect the plates from the table. Dessert proceeded without further comment, then cleanup, but as Bard carried his teacup into the sitting room with Thran as the children settled around the kitchen table, he overheard Bain murmur to Legolas.

“What’s une douleur really mean, Legs?”

“Just a general pain. Not a pain in the ass or anything.”

“How do you say pain in the ass?”

“Just say merde. That means shit. It works for everything, even pre-algebra.”

“Especially pre-algebra,” Bain muttered back. “Merde, merde, merde. Beaucoup de merde!”

“Merde complète,” Legolas agreed with heartfelt exasperation.

Muffled snickering ensued, even from Tilda. Thran was about to get up, but Bard put his hand on his husband’s thigh. “Let them alone. That’s probably one of the most useful things they’ve learned today.”

Thran’s face crumbled into rueful amusement. “Perhaps so. All right, lyubov moya. I will let the children alone.”

“Maybe I can give you something else to think about.”

Thran’s eyes slid to Bard’s, and his lips curved up. “Oooh. I hope it is about how bandits make out.”

“Mmm. That’s a lot more interesting than what I was about to say.”

“What were you about to say?”

“That some night before too long, I want to light a candle in the ballroom, and dance with a white-haired carnival ghost to Sigrid’s waltz.”

“Oh, lyubov moya, how can you think that is not interesting? You are the romantic, which is always interesting, and delicious. I want to do that, too. But I will not leave you at the end of the dance.”

“I’ll find some way to reward you for that.”

“Most deliciously. But tonight, I want bandits who make out. I have thought of nothing else since Saturday.”

Bard gave a quick look towards the kitchen, but the children were quiet. He brushed a kiss on Thran’s lips. “Tell me what you’ve thought about.”

“I thought about what it would be like to stumble upon such a sly fellow while he rifled my closet, only to have him decide that I offered much more to steal than my closet did.”

Bard shut his eyes, thinking about that. “I’m surprised that such a formidable warrior as my husband didn’t take exception to that.”

“The bandit knew that I did not really want to resist, so made sure that I could not. Then he took his time.”
“A brazen fellow, then.”

“A veritable highwayman. Is that enough for you to spin a tale to delight us both?”

“I think I can manage that. Any twists in the end?”

Thran’s grin was evil. “Only in the ropes, lyubov moyya.”

“You’re a bastard.”

“Your bastard, entirely. Later, then?”

“I hope you can wait that long.”

“I wait with bated breath.”

Bard smothered a snicker. “You’ll be the death of us.”

“I will be the life of us, and so will you. Think how delirious we will be for many years.”

“If I do, I’ll never make it upstairs.”

Thran chuckled. “That has its own allure.”

“Stop it, you bastard. We’ve got children in the next room.”

“That is a tragedy. It would be a challenge to see how fast I could reduce you to ashes, merely with my fingers.”

“Gods, and you want to bottom with a bandit? He doesn’t stand a chance.”

“He will not stand for long. He will be too eager to take me to bed.”

“What’re you giggling about in there?” Sigrid called. “You sound like the boys when they’re up to something.”

“I am not up yet, but soon will be,” Thran teased in a whisper.

Bard shushed his husband with a smirk. “We are up to something. I’m telling Thran my favorite bad pun. You interrupted me at the punch line.”

“If you haven’t told him the punch line yet, then why is he laughing?”

“Because I’m laughing, and he’s laughing at me laughing. So let me tell him, okay?”

“I bet he groans,” Bain called.

“Tell me, quickly,” Thran whispered.

“Why did the Frenchman use dynamite in his kitchen renovation?”

“I have no idea. Why?”

“Because he wanted to see linoleum blown apart.”

“Linoleum? That is the floor? Then why – oh, I see! Napoleon Bonaparte, Linoleum blown apart! Oh, lyubov moyya, that is a terrible pun.”
“That’s the best kind,” Bard snickered. “It’s my favorite.”

“It is awful. Yes, Bain, I did groan.”

“Told you,” Bain’s voice came from the kitchen. “It was the linoleum one, wasn’t it?”

“It was.”

“Linoleum?” Legolas asked. “I don’t know this one.”

Bain related the joke and the punch line. Legolas, however, didn’t groan, but laughed uproariously. “Oh, that’s hilarious! What, don’t you think it’s hilarious? It is!”

“It was the first sixty times Da told it, but that was a long time ago,” Bain groaned, but Sigrid snickered in the background.

“I still think it’s funny,” Tilda inserted. “It’s my favorite joke.”

“Thank you, little doll,” Bard called.

“Welcome. Can I come in to do my French words now?”

“Of course,” Thran called.

Tilda came in with her sheet, and Bard enjoyed watching her and Thran go through all of the words. This was an easy list, for Tilda got most of them on the first time or two. So Thran told her how all the terms for ballet steps were French, and a little about why they were. As this was the last of Tilda’s homework, she and Thran tried a few things for their dance. It was fun to watch Tilda become more confident that she could handle such a large doll, because Thran would do most of the work. Bard pulled out his sketchpad, and added a few more drawings to his collection. Tomorrow morning, then, he’d call Bilbo and arrange to visit him with his growing portfolio. He was both excited and apprehensive about what Bilbo might say, but there was nothing unusual about that – every artist worried about how his or her work would be received, but he wouldn’t let that apprehension keep him from creating. The only person he had to please, ultimately, was himself.

“This is fun!” Tilda giggled, as Thran flopped over onto his back, arms and legs awry. She pulled on his arm to sit him up again, and he came up with a smile.

“That is the important thing, Kukla – that we have fun. If we have fun, then the people who watch us will have fun, too.”

“Is it scary, having so many people look at you?” Tilda asked.

Thran sat up, and gathered Tilda into his lap on the floor. “It is for some people. It does not scare me, as long as I like what I do. Perhaps if I had to give a talk about something I knew nothing about, I would be scared.”

“What if I get scared?”

“We will practice a lot, to make sure we know what to do. That will help. But if you do get scared when we dance, it will be all right. You will just look at me, not at the people who look, and we will get through it.”

“There will likely be some rehearsals, little doll, so you’ll get used to it before you do the dance in the Follies. That’ll help, too,” Bard offered.
“It won’t be so bad, then,” Tilda decided.

“Not at all,” Thran agreed. “You will be an old pro by the time we get to the Follies.”

“I like that music that Sigrid chose for her dance,” Tilda said. “It sounds like a carousel. An odd one.”

“Very odd,” Thran agreed. “A haunted one.”

“And I’m the ghost,” Sigrid came in, smiling. “I can’t wait to do it. Are we reading tonight? I finished my homework and my paper’s done, so I can help read tonight.”

“Goodie!” Tilda crowed. “This next chapter’s exciting – Ron’s going to play the big chess game. Hurry up, Bain and Legs! I want to read!”

“Almost done, Kukla,” Legolas called. “Just this last problem. Sigrid, would you look at it, to make sure I did it right?”

The math problems were soon dispensed with, and reading commenced. Ron completed the chess game bravely, and Harry went on to confront Professor Quirrell. The second book in the series would soon be underway, and the children headed upstairs to clean up and get ready for bed.

“I’ll head up for a shower, too, angel.” Bard stretched before he stood up. “Then you can have your turn before a bandit makes an appearance in your closet. In the meantime, I did some sketches of Hal this afternoon, if you’d like to see them.”

“Yes, I would.” Thran leaned forward to pick up Bard’s sketchbook. “Are they in this one?”

“Just before the pages of you and Tilda that I just did,” Bard nodded. “Be back down in a tick.”

He left his husband to peruse his sketches, and enjoyed a leisurely scrub and dry. When he rejoined Thran in the sitting room, his husband had a glass of nalivka ready for him. He sat snickering over Bard’s sketchbook.

“These pictures of Hal are exquisite, lyubov moya. Every one of them is perfection. He would love them!”

“If I gave him one of them, do you think he’d sign a model’s release to let me use them?”

“I think he would be honored even if you did not give him one. He would be overjoyed if someone bought one of your sketches of him – if he does not decide to buy the lot of them himself.”

“I’d better talk to Bilbo, then,” Bard ran a hand through his hair. “I don’t have any idea of how much to charge for any of these.”

“Then call Bilbo.”

“I plan to, as soon as he’s open tomorrow. I think I’ve got enough for him to look at. I’ll need to get model’s releases from everyone associated with Immortal. And I won’t include any of the costume designs for Immortal in the first batch I show Bilbo. Maybe after the ballet’s done, but not before.”

“I had a thought about what a nice book you might put together of your sketches of the ballet.”

“That’s a neat idea,” Bard nodded with a smile at his husband. “A companion piece?”

“Just so. I have the feeling that after we perform Immortal in the school auditorium for the festival, it will shortly appear on a much more prominent stage.”

Bard looked up at Thran in surprise. “What, has someone approached you about that?”

“Not yet,” Thran shook his head serenely. “But I have the feeling, Bard. This ballet will see more performances than those we give in a school auditorium. Your story is wonderful. The costumes you and Rada will devise will be wonderful. And Irmo’s choreography... he is a difficult and sometimes unpleasant man. But his choreography is divine. Immortal will be like nothing else.”

“Oh, I almost forgot!” Bard grimaced, squeezing his eyes shut. “I did ask about whether the school auditorium could host Immortal during the festival. The rumblings sounded good. I gave them Lettie’s name and number, and I called Lettie to let her know who in the school was the contact. So I hope that’s getting underway.”

“Most excellent,” Thran said with satisfaction. “So for tonight, we have done all that we can do. So let us bid the children good night, and then I will shower. Perhaps when I am done, I will stumble upon a bandit in my closet.”

“I’ll see what I can do about that,” Bard drawled with a slow stare for Thran. “Rounds first. I’m the only bandit I want in my house.”

“Prudent,” Thran agreed, as they began their usual check of doors and windows and light switches. When all was secure, they headed upstairs, and made their comfortable rounds of the children. When they’d bid all four goodnight, they retreated to their room with anticipation. Bard drew his husband close, filling his hands full of tight glutes.

“Enjoy your shower, angel,” Bard breathed, nuzzling a kiss on Thran’s neck.

Humming, Thran cradled Bard’s chin in his hands to kiss his lips. “Not a very long one, I think.”

“The longer you take, the more time you give the bandit to think about what he wants to steal.”

“He will have to think fast,” Thran kissed Bard again before he slipped away and backed into the bathroom.

Grinning, Bard flopped down onto the bed to consider just what was worth stealing from an angel. So many things sprang to mind.

When the water stopped running in the shower, and the hair dryer switched on, Bard got up, and took himself into the closet. He had a few things to collect before he turned into a bandit.
Chapter 84

Chapter Summary

The game's afoot - or is it?

Later, the saint's work receives a critique, and an angel has news about pointe shoes.

Thran combed the last lock of his hair, and smoothed the last bit of oil on the bottom of the long white strands. He loved the exotic scent of the oil, and rubbed the last traces of it into his hands. Tonight, however, the last traces of that scent weren’t enough. As expensive as it was, he couldn’t resist warming just a little more of it in his palms, then rubbing it slowly into his skin, from top to bottom. It was a faint smell, but delicious, and the calming touch of his hands, the silky feel of the oil... such a sensual delight.

As delicious as this was, Thran didn’t linger over it. Even more deliciousness awaited him in the bedroom. What would he find in the closet? Had Bard spun another of his tales? The man was amazing at how quickly he came up with an enchanting story – the ballet, the dances he would do with Tilda and Sigrid for the Follies, the artist and the vampire, pirates, musketeers, kings and seers... Sheer anticipation already had his skin tingling.

He put on his silk robe, but didn’t bother to button it – it would likely be off before long. Instead, he wrapped it around himself to savor the touch against his skin. Mmm. Another tactile pleasure, so eagerly enjoyed, even more so tonight in the face of his anticipation. He came out of the bath and into the bedroom –

Hands took his shoulders from behind. The touch was soft, but Thran stopped, shutting his eyes when Bard drew close enough behind him that he felt body warmth through his robe.

“You asked for bandits and bonds tonight. I’ll give you both, but maybe not exactly how you expected. If you want the latter, you need to give me something first.”

“Anything.”

“You know I’ll never hurt you, always treasure you. Do you trust me to keep those promises tonight?”

“I trust you with my life, lyubov noya.”

“Then take off your robe.”

Thran let it slide to the floor, skin tingling as the cool air touched it.

“Middle of the bed, on your heels.”

Thran crawled into position, not turning around. His heart sped up a hair, and the brush of his hair against his back was the worst teasing touch. Even the smell of his exotic oil seemed more beguiling.

“Put your hands behind you.”
Thran offered his wrists.

Bard was behind Thran, out of his sight. A loop of something – soft, giving fabric, itself a sensual delight – went around his wrists, then looped between them, binding them oh so softly together. Bard’s fingers moved carefully, methodically, but even that was arousing. Thran’s heart jumped again when the soft fabric looped around his ankles, binding them to his wrists. The loops were comfortable, not too tight, but if he tried to move much, he’d only fall flat on his face.

Bard moved in front of him to regard him in the dim light. “All right so far?”

Could Bard see how aroused he already was, just from anticipation? He veiled his eagerness behind lowered lashes. “You have me.”

“Not quite,” Bard stroked his face. “I want you to enjoy every moment of this, without reserve, without inhibition. That’s something I won’t trust to a bandit, only to me. So this isn’t a game – it’s you and me, and I need one more thing to help you enjoy yourself.”

“What is it?”

“Something that will steal your inhibitions better than any bandit, so I can give you what you’ve never had before.”

“What is this thing that can do so much?”

“It’s why I asked you if you trusted me. Do you?”

Oh, gods, the anticipation would kill him before Bard so much as laid a hand on him! Thran bent his head in assent. “I do.”

Bard kissed his lips. “You know our trigger word. Tell me when you get uncomfortable being so confined.”

“I will.”

“Then the only demand I make of you is to enjoy.”

“I hear and obey, my saint.”

Bard was out of his sight again. What was about to happen? Where would Bard touch him first? His hair? His ribs? The exposed soles of his feet? Or would Bard not touch him at all, content to let Thran’s anticipation build on the strength of his imagination?

Unexpectedly, a soft scarf went around his eyes, and was knotted behind his head. He gasped at the sudden loss of sight – now he was blind as well as immobile. Immediately, other senses scrabbled to fill in the gaps – touch, smell, hearing. For long seconds, there was little to sense; Bard was not on the bed, and silent wherever he was. The smell of the oil on his skin changed subtly as a faint hint of sweat joined it. Gods, the waiting was unbearable! As the seconds went by, Thran’s imagination went wild, trying to fill the blind void that engulfed him.

A single finger traced up his back from the top of his glutes to his shoulders. Gasping, he spasmed against his bonds. How his body trembled! The provocative touch of Bard’s hand, the tickle of his long hair against his back, the prickle of gooseflesh racing over his body... gods, the sensations were electric. He was given no time to relax before a faint tickle – nothing human; perhaps a feather? – traced down his cheek, over his chest, and down his abdomen. It twitched up his arm, under his chin, over his shoulder, and down his back to brush against his bare feet. When it brushed against his nipple, so much arousal rushed through him that he jerked against his bonds again. The restriction intensified the sensation, because he couldn’t dissipate it through movement. He bit his lips, trying not to move or speak.

A sharper, more defined touch – no, several parallel touches – traced up one thigh, from knee to hip. Now and again the touches were more definite, as if a cat’s paw flexed to reveal its claws. Whatever it was, it reversed track to slide down towards his knee, and now the touch was smooth and cool – a fork, perhaps? But no sooner had he relaxed than Bard was behind him, tracing fingers up his thigh in time with whatever he used on the other, and brushing a soft kiss at the juncture of neck and shoulder. Thran leaned into him, head back, letting the touches overwhelm him, savoring the warmth of Bard’s skin against his.

“Oh, gods,” he breathed, wanting more. “So good, so good…”

Bard’s arm went around his waist, pulling him close. Teeth claimed his earlobe just before an ice cube pressed right above the top of his cock. It traced a narrow but freezing path up the centerline of his abs, veering off to circle one nipple, then the other. The sudden shock had every muscle taut as the ice melted against his skin, sending cold rivulets down his torso. As Bard ran the ice cube directly over his nipple, Thran gasped and writhed, but he was held fast. A hand went around his cock, massaging and coaxing, mixing icy shock with carnal arousal, turning both sensations upside down. Just when he thought he’d scream, the ice ran up his throat, over his lips, and into his mouth. Bard released his ear and ran both hands down to Thran’s groins, rubbing and massaging and teasing. It was a thoroughly consuming combination that grew in intensity when Bard dragged his hands up Thran’s torso, over both nipples, and down his back. After the shock of the ice, Thran arched up at the pleasure of this warmer touch, shocked at how quickly his body responded to the unexpected change. His heart sped up when hands slipped under his glutes to squeeze them, then traced around his hips to massage his groins again. Oh, gods, what that did to his cock bore no contemplation –

He should have expected the hands that rubbed his groins with such expertise would trace up his chest, up his sternum, across his clavicles, then down to find his nipples. They were still cold, which made the warmth of Bard’s fingers even more pronounced. As his body flooded with endorphins, his shiver was so consuming that he got a whispy chuckle from Bard. Between his legs, his cock spasmed and twitched, mindlessly aching for the least touch. As if Bard knew, he trailed a filmy bit of silk over Thran’s cock; the random and half imagined touches were so maddening that Thran panted for more. The silk flicked over his shoulders, his bound hands, his hair, his cheeks. When it touched his cock again, he whimpered. The silk became a veil that pressed over his face, then his mouth, rubbing his lips until Thran whimpered again.

The silk tightened, and went between his teeth like a gag. The body behind him vanished, and he was left quivering and alone. As the seconds went by, Thran’s body didn’t know what to do – calm, or anticipate another teasing.

A mouth engulfed his cock, working it hard, nipping and sucking, licking, flicking little touches against the head of it, until he arched up, pumping his hips in time with that warm, insistent teasing –

Then it was gone. Thran was left in silence, in emptiness, every nerve ending on fire, his cock aching and dripping, desperate for something, anything –

The gag slid away. The faintest aroma of fruit enticed him, then a finger tasting of raspberry pressed against his lips. Thran sucked it into his mouth before he realized he’d invited Bard to penetrate him, claim him – what would follow that? But Bard let him suck his finger only for a few seconds before he eased it out, traced it down his chest and abdomen, then his cock, trailing circles around the head of it. A raspberry touched his lips, teasing him into opening his mouth. When he did so, however, the berry was pulled away, and teeth caught his bottom lip. It wasn’t to the point of pain, but it was unexpected, and he flinched. The teeth let him go, and the berry slipped into his mouth. The flavor was so intense – was there a tiny bit of chocolate inside? The taste so distracted him that he didn’t immediately identify the touch against his chest – his own hair, caught in a tuft and stroked over his skin. Another chocolate-studded raspberry rubbed against his lips before it went into his mouth, giving him something to taste, something to lick. What would he do if Bard wrapped a hand around his cock and stroked him? Instead Bard spread broad hands over his thighs to rub them, then dug thumbs into the creases of his groins to massage and manipulate without ever touching his cock again. He jerked against his bonds, desperate to free himself from such relentless stimulation before he was completely possessed, but as soft and yielding as those bonds were, they held him fast.

Another raspberry slipped in his mouth, but as soon as he bit it, a tongue licked the end of his cock. When he spasmed, that tongue licked first one nipple, then the other. An arm went around his waist, a hand twined in his hair to pull his head back, and a torso pressed against his. Lips dragged across his ribs, fastening onto his nipple to suckle hard. After so much teasing, this was much more intense – torso scraped against rough chest hair, nipples bitten, back arched over Bard’s arms. A hand engulfed his cock to jerk him to even more painful hardness before falling away. The feather was back, teasing and tickling his nipples and cock like a goad, not increasing his arousal, but not letting it fade, either. Gods, his cock and balls ached so badly for release that he whimpered again.

All that got him was a hand at his nape, drawing him forward into a hard kiss. A hand cupped his balls, squeezing and pulling, and all he wanted to do was drown in the kiss. He kissed back eagerly, craving everything offered to him. But even his concession didn’t earn him a reprieve; he was torn from the kiss, and his head pressed down as if he bowed to his husband. Oh, this was no bow; Bard’s cock pressed against his lips, demanding entry. Willingly, Thran took as much of it as he could, sucking and licking. But even that didn’t last long; Bard eased away scant seconds later, leaving him alone yet again.

His emptiness didn’t last; again, hands went around him to soothe and entice, but this time they were slicked with oil. It took some seconds to realize that the oil had something in it that warmed his skin. His back and glutes were flushed when Bard set on his nipples, kneading softly, rolling them in between his fingers. Gods, they were already sensitive enough, but now the heat in them grew into urgency for release. Bard was relentless, shoving Thran’s knees wide apart so that he had complete access to Thran’s cock, balls – oh, gods, oil went around his opening, then inside it, all while Bard kissed Thran to oblivion. In seconds, his most sensitive points were afire, throbbing, and desperate for any touch, and he was almost past thinking. When Bard left him this time, he nearly sobbed in desperation.

His silk bonds loosened, freeing his ankles, but he didn’t have time to react before he was flat on his stomach, draped over a stack of pillows. Bard kneaded Thran’s glutes as he inched his cock inside with maddening slowness, so slow that Thran pulled his knees up under him and pushed his hips back to impale himself on Bard’s cock. Bard pulled him back until his glutes were pressed hard against Bard’s groins, which soothed part of his overwhelmed body even as it wound the rest of it tighter. As Bard arched and bowed above him, Thran stopped thinking of anything, and reveled in the sensations flooding him. It was an exquisite torture when Bard slowed his stroking to lean over him, pressing his chest against Thran’s back and wrapping his arms around him, fingers worming through the pillows to find his nipples. The slow caress of fingers, the even slower slide in and out of him, left him gasping. But Bard didn’t take that to mean Thran wanted him to speed up, but rather slow down. Hands and lips danced over him, first here, then there, so randomly that his body couldn’t stop spasming, unable to calm, unable to release. The parade of sensations began again, one after the other, but more this time – feather, fork, silk, ice, soft fur, rough sandpaper – all touching him without pattern from head to toe, all punctuated with enough thrusts inside him to keep him delirious.
When Bard pulled out, he thought he’d die. Perhaps he moaned or begged for release – he was past thinking coherently. He barely registered the bonds loosening on his wrists, but it was only to lengthen the silk between his wrists, not to free them. Bard wormed his way between Thran’s bound arms and his body, effectively binding Thran to his torso. Three raspberries went into his mouth, then he was impaled again, but there was no slow, maddening stroking this time. When Bard raised himself to his hands and knees, Thran hung beneath him, unable to move as his husband slid in and out of him. Gods, gods, Thran wasn’t strong enough to withstand such an onslaught, and his body spasmed, seconds from release. Bard felt it, because he put both of their faces in the sheets to take Thran’s cock in one hand and his balls in the other. He knee’d Thran’s legs wide, then he delivered as thorough a fucking as Thran had ever received.

Control vanished, sentience vanished, everything but sensation vanished as a wildfire of orgasm consumed Thran. His body flailed as he was overwhelmed, and the only things that muffled his scream were the sheet and mattress pressed against his face. That was welcome, especially when Bard convulsed atop him, thrusting over and over into him past Thran’s ability to resist. He was merely a vessel.

When the fire of release faded, but before Thran’s arms started to cramp, Bard wormed his way free, released Thran’s wrists, and carefully eased Thran onto his back. He slipped off the blindfold, and pulled the sheet and blankets up to cocoon Thran warmly. Then he took one of Thran’s hands in his to massage, making sure that there was no bruising or hurt. By the time Bard got to Thran’s other hand, Thran remembered how to breathe again.

“All right, angel?”

Thran mustered a silent chuckle. “‘All right?’ I think, lyubov moya, that the correct term is ‘wasted.’ I can barely talk.”

“Oh, gods – did I hurt you? Shit, angel, why didn’t you say something? Where do you hurt?”

Thran put out a hand, grasping Bard’s arm when he found it. “Please, do not spoil such a completely delirious fucking with worry. I do not hurt. Merely lie here and pretend that you are still a saint, rather than the grebanyy huiesos who has just wasted me as no one has before.”

Bard relaxed beside him. “So the experiment was a success, then.”

“You have no idea. I highly recommend it.”

“What was it like?”

“You were right to add the blindfold. Every touch, every scent, every taste became so much more vivid. The anticipation was unendurable because I did not know where the next sensation would come from, or what it would be. It is impossible not to live in such a moment, without distraction. I was completely consumed. And now I am completely relaxed.”

Bard pressed a kiss against Thran’s hair. “I’ll wash and be back.”

Thran found Bard’s hand and squeezed it in acknowledgement, and shut his eyes as his husband got up and went into the bathroom. He was gone only a few seconds, but Thran’s eyes were already closing before Bard got back. He registered Bard mopping up the sheets, and the warm body that slid beside him. Sleepily he curled around his husband, resting his head on Bard’s shoulder and stretching his arm across Bard’s chest. He snuggled close with a sigh.

“Thank you, lyubov moya.”
“You’re welcome.”

“You take good care of me.”

“You deserve it.”

“So do you. If you decide to try it, I promise to take as much care as you did.”

“Maybe I will. But for now, sleep well.”

Thran smiled. “You, too, my saint. Ya lyublyu tebya, zoloto moyo.”

“Garu di, angylis. Ti wv fy drysor mawr.”

* * *

As soon as Bard got back from taking the children to the bus stop Tuesday morning, he rang Halina at the Imladris Academy to talk about Thran’s willingness to dance in the April Fool’s Follies. She was delighted to confirm that Thran was welcome to dance with both children, so he’d have good news to tell the girls when they arrived home from school today. Not long after, right at ten o’clock, he gave Bilbo a ring. The artist’s representative was happy to hear from him, and arranged to come out for a visit with his nephew, Frodo, late this afternoon.

Bard spent the morning hastily collecting all of his sketches and putting them in the dining room, then hurried into the solarium to at least put a head on Rahmiel before his guests appeared. The sculpture looked gruesome with just wide-flung arms and legs poised to land, like a chicken beheaded for the night’s stew, but adding a head brought the pose into sharper focus. Bard shaped only a suggestion of a face, but the neck was nicely done, and the head was at the right angle to regard the saint who would appear below. On a whim, he plucked a couple of strands from the ostrich feather he’d used on Thran last night to waft from the top of Rahmiel’s head to approximate the flowing hair he wanted for the angel. Then it was a rush to collect model’s releases from the crew working in the ballroom in anticipation of good news from Bilbo.

“I’m happy to sign one,” Ori agreed at lunch, scribbling his signature on the form that Bard had given him. “But I don’t think any drawing of me will be much good to you.”

“Don’t say that,” Bard cautioned him, riffling through one of his sketchbooks. “I’ve got a couple of you that I really like. This one, for instance.”

Ori’s face was a study as Bard held his sketchbook out to the young man. The sketch showed Ori seated on one of the garden chairs with his tablet cradled on his thighs, his hands in mid gesture above the tablet, as much conductor as typist. But what made the sketch was the way Ori’s head cocked to the left as he looked up, eyes bright and aware, as if he’d had the perfect idea just at that moment. No one else was in the sketch, so Ori could have as easily been listening to some internal muse as Irmo or Thran. It captured so much of Ori’s magic that it was one of Bard’s favorite sketches from the ballroom.

“Oh, my – is that what I look like when I’m listening to Irmo?” Ori’s mouth fell open and he gave Bard a surprised look.

“I don’t know if you were listening to Irmo,” Bard’s shrug was sheepish. “But you look like that fairly often. You look in the moment, centered... happy. I like it.”

Ori looked around, but everyone else was laughing at something Charisse said. He leaned closer to Bard. “I like it, too,” he said softly. “Don’t get me wrong; I love a lot of the things that Nori sets me loose to do. But this has been amazing, even when Irmo yells. The way he sees A and B and goes right to F, not C or D first – that’s incredible. I’m beginning to understand how he does that, because I want to do it, too. He sees so many details, but he doesn’t realize it. He doesn’t know. But I see it, and I’m this close to doing it myself – not intuitively, as Irmo does, but consciously, when I’m fully aware of it. I would never have had the chance to learn something so amazing if Thran hadn’t asked for me.”

“How do you do it? Figure out how Irmo goes from A and B right to F?”

“I think he’s got an eidetic brain as I do, but he doesn’t know he does. All these things he doesn’t remember knowing combine in different ways, all the time. At lot of the time, he doesn’t know he’s doing that, either. Then something random appears in front of him, like the color blue or the sound of the music that reminds him of another piece that reminds him of a gesture of the assistant ballet master last year, and that fits into one of those half formed patterns, and out it comes as a full idea without him being aware of all the middle steps.”

“So... knowing that, you’ll be able to think like Irmo does?”

Ori shook his head. “No one thinks as he does. He has different memories, different interests than I do. But that means no one thinks as I do, either. The trick is to let everything come in, and get stored away however which way. Then one day, I’ll get one more impression, and out will come a combination I didn’t expect.”

“So stay in the moment, and don’t pre-judge what comes to you.”

“It’s not completely new for you, either, you know. You think like that already. The way you sorted out that working on so many parts of Immortal in the UVB studio was too much stimulation for Irmo, which just made his scatterbrain worse, was brilliant.”

“I did do that, didn’t I?” Ori looked surprised and pleased, as if Bard had given him a gift. “I guess I did.”

“You certainly did, and everyone’s better off for it,” Bard patted his arm. “Thanks for the release, Ori.”

“You’re very welcome.”

The afternoon passed by as quickly as the morning, so much so that Bard had little chance to savor last night’s adventure with Thran. He’d no sooner settled himself with his sketchbook, idly sketching something that was more appropriate for Thran’s pillow book, than Rada drew near with an excited gleam in his eye. He’d made some preliminary drawings of the costume that Death would wear on the battlefield, an intriguing mixture of armor and ritual robes, both stark and arcane. Bard especially liked the mask that framed Death’s face, with its thin gossamer veil that would allow Thran to see through it, but removed almost all resemblance to mortals. It would be an eerie, attenuated face that would appear on the battlefield, in shades of silver, ultramarine, and white. Bard quickly turned to a new page in his sketchbook to work with Rada, and by the time the children came home, they’d come up with several refinements to Rada’s initial drawing. Rada trailed after Bard into the kitchen to keep sketching while the children chatted over their cheese and crackers, and Sebastian came out to play for a bit. Bard was mixing up meatloaf and had almost forgotten about his appointment with Bilbo when a knock echoed from the front door.

“Who’s that?” Bain looked up towards the door. “You want me to get it, Da?”

“Oh, I almost forgot – that’s Bilbo, the artist’s rep. He’s brought his nephew to see my sketches. Yes, please, get that, Bain. Bring him into the kitchen, and I’ll be done in a moment.”

“I can finish the meatloaf for you,” Legolas offered. “Tilda can help me if there’s more stuff to put in it.”

“Yes, I’d like to help,” Tilda jumped out of her chair and trotted up beside Legolas. “Have you smushed the crackers yet?”

“Smush?” Legolas turned a bemused smile on the small girl.

“Yes, smush. It’s a fun word that means crumble into tiny bits,” Tilda explained.

“Not yet. Just the eggs. Not the crackers or the spices. Do you know which ones, little doll?”

“I know. Come on, Legs. Let’s look in the pantry.”

The two children ducked into the pantry just as Bain led two people into the kitchen – the sandy brown hair was Bilbo’s, so the much darker brunette hair must belong to his nephew, Frodo. Bard finished washing his hands, waved to Bilbo, then grabbed a kitchen towel as he came around the kitchen island. “Hello, Bilbo. It’s good to see you again.”

Smiling, Bilbo came forward to shake hands with Bard, then turned towards his companion. “Hello, Bard. Allow me to introduce my nephew, Frodo Baggins. Frodo, this is Bard Bowman.”

“I’m pleased to meet you, Bard,” Frodo offered his hand. “Uncle’s told me so much about you. I’m glad to meet you at last.”

“Welcome to the bedlam. Everyone, this is Frodo and Bilbo Baggins. That’s Sigrid, Bain, Rada Brown, and little Sebastian at the table,” Bard explained, as Tilda and Legolas came out of the pantry, each clutching several bottles of spices and a packet of crackers. “And that’s Tilda and Legolas. Um, Legs, Tilda, that’s a lot of spices for one meatloaf.”

“Is there a difference between minced onion and onion powder, and paprika and smoked paprika?” Legolas asked.

“Either onion and either paprika is fine,” Bard supplied.

“Then we’re good,” Legolas nodded.

“Yes, we’re good, Da,” Tilda seconded.

“Okay. Little doll, you’re in charge of the meatloaf. Legs, you know how to make mashed potatoes, so that’s for you. Tilda, you choose the veg, but let Legs cut them up. I’ll be in the dining room with the Bagginses if you need me.”

“Okay, Da; yes, Bard,” the children chorused, as Bard led the Bagginses through the kitchen.

“Would you like some tea?” Bard asked.

“I never turn down a nice cup of tea,” Bilbo agreed.
“Yes, thank you,” Frodo nodded.

“I’ll get it, Da,” Sigrid called, getting up from the table.

“Earl Grey okay?” Bilbo and Frodo both nodded as Bard ushered them to the dining room. “Thanks, Sig.”

“My, you have been busy,” Bilbo commented, as he took in the stacks of drawings on the table.

“I hope I have as many as you wanted,” Bard admitted, as he and the Bagginses took seats around the table. “We’ve got a company of ballet dancers in the ballroom, which meant I had to finish renovating it for them so they could get on with their work, but I’m back to my stuff now.”

“Uncle said you were restoring your house yourself,” Frodo offered.

“It’s still rough downstairs,” Bard shrugged, as he slid his sketchbooks towards Bilbo. “I’ve got the whole upstairs done for the children, and the kitchen’s done, and the ballroom’s done for Thran and his company. So the big push is over for things that needed doing yesterday. I can split my time now, and get back to my art.”

“You’ve got some lovely pieces, Bard,” Bilbo said, pondering the first of Bard’s sketchbooks. “You see what I meant about the calligraphic lines, Frodo?”

“I do,” Frodo nodded, leaning closer to his uncle to study the drawing. “It’s amazing how you get so much out of a single line.”

“Thank you,” Bard nodded, as Sigrid came in with the tea tray. She’d set out the pot with cups and saucers, milk and sugar, and a plate of warmed muffins and butter. “Thank you, too, sweetness.”

As the Bagginses smiled their thanks, Bard poured the cups full. He was thankful to have something to do with his hands while the two men looked over his drawings. Bilbo’s comfortable and kindly face turned thoughtful as he turned the pages of Bard’s sketchbooks, but Frodo’s was more expressive. He was not many more years older than Sigrid – perhaps the same age as Luka – but his wide and expressive blue eyes would remain youthful throughout his life. His mouth was quick to twitch into a smile, revealing his delight in the world around him. He was also quick to express his delight with a word or two; if his frequent murmurs and intent expressions were any indications, he liked Bard’s work quite a bit. But it was Bilbo’s reaction that meant more to the future of Bard’s hopes.

“These are so expressive,” Frodo said when halfway through the first sketchbook. “So distinctive, but not just the style of drawing – I feel as if I’d recognize the subject if they walked into the room, too. Do they reflect what the subjects look like as well who they are?”

Bard nodded. “More times than not, I’d say. I don’t always concentrate on faces. Sometimes the way someone moves makes a better subject.”

“This is your daughter,” Frodo continued, pointing to one of Bard’s drawings of Tilda and Legolas reading together on the sofa. “And your son? The meatloaf makers.”

“The very pair,” Bard grinned. “They read quite often together in the evenings.”

Wide blue eyes smiled. “They enjoy it; that’s clear. It makes me want to read along with them.”

“A lot of us do, every night. It’s become a common ritual for us.”
“How long does it take you to draw a picture like this?” Frodo asked.

How interesting that Bilbo’s concentration was on Bard’s sketches, leaving the questioning to Frodo. Of course Bilbo had already seen some of Bard’s work, and he was the experienced member of the pair, so perhaps he expected to find the answers to his questions in the sketches before him. But Frodo was young and inexperienced, so Bard leaned forward for one of his sketchbooks and a pencil. He flipped through it, found a blank page, and shrugged.

“That depends on the subject. The one that your uncle’s looking at took a couple of hours, because I used it as an exercise to draw a hand the way you first learn in high school or college – exactly as you see it. The one on the page before it was less technical and more emotional; that one took maybe fifteen minutes. It’s the same hand, just different styles of drawing.”

He turned his sketchbook around. Frodo’s quick inhalation of breath was more obvious, but Bilbo’s eyes widened, too. Bard hadn’t done all of Frodo’s face, only his expressive eyes, guileless and inquiring, just as they’d been when Frodo had asked how long Bard’s sketches took to produce.

“That—that’s amazing,” Frodo stammered, then looked at his uncle. “Those are my eyes.”

“The very image of them, and the very expression, too,” Bilbo chuckled. “You don’t know it, Bard, but that’s Frodo’s favorite expression. He does marvel at the wonder of the world more times than not.”

“Uncle,” Frodo rebuked, reddening.

“There’s nothing wrong with marveling at the wonder of the world, is there, my boy?” Bilbo smiled fondly at his nephew.

“Nothing at all,” Bard agreed, nodding.

Bard let conversation lapse, preferring to give Bilbo the time he needed to look at his sketches. Or was he just reluctant to hear that his work wasn’t… something? It didn’t matter that Thran, his children, Rada, or even Bilbo himself during their first meeting said his sketches were something special – it was still nerve-wracking to wait for judgment. Had he done enough sketches? Were they distinctively his, or all too much alike? Maybe he should have done a wider variety of scenes, or more of the detailed technical ones, or something more provocative –

Just sit still, and stop worrying. You liked what you did, and let the rest go.

That was wonderful advice, and impossible to follow.

Bard managed to sit still, determined to wait for Bilbo’s determination without asking for it. Eventually, Bilbo did meet Bard’s eyes with a smile. “I like everything I see, Bard. I do think you’ve got many wonderful things to bring to a show. I especially like the double images you do so deftly. So many things are happening in most of those – seen and unseen. They pose a lot of questions, I think. Was that what you meant about venturing further afield, as you mentioned in our first meeting?”

Bard took a marshaling breath. “I… did venture further afield, and I did start with the double images, and whether they’re truly mirror images, or different realities, and which one is the so-called real one. I pushed on that, and what started to emerge was more than just the double reality I drew. Those were still there, but so was whatever the viewer felt. I liked that… moral ambiguity, for lack of a better term.”

“I’m intrigued,” Bilbo leaned forward. “Do you have some examples of that that you’d be willing to show me?"

“I have a couple. Neither are for sale. I’m still experimenting, but I’d like your opinion.”

Bard had debated long and hard about showing these two sketches to Bilbo, especially without telling Thran that he might. But he wanted a read on this direction, even if it wasn’t something he chose to show at first. So he pulled out two of the sketches he’d done for Thran’s pillow book – first the one of Thran’s glute with Bard’s hand on it, and then the image of a mirror that reflected an artist and a vampire in the midst of their rapture. Where Bilbo’s eyes widened, Frodo gasped, turned bright red, then gulped.

“That,” Bilbo pointed to the deceptively simple sweep of lines that revealed Bard’s hand and Thran’s glute, “is a beautiful image. But this,” he picked up the other, “is a very powerful one. I see exactly what you mean about how it adds the viewer’s patina. That patina will be radically different for every viewer.”

Bard nodded. “I like that, which is why it’s not for sale.”

“It’s certainly provocative. But the story shifts, doesn’t it, more you look at it? My first impression is not my second impression, or even my third.”

Bard nodded again. “That’s one of the reasons why I like it so much. I drew it, yes, but every time I see it, I get a different reaction. I’d like to go in that direction with more pieces, whether there’s a market for that or not. It’s not tourist fodder, by any means.”

“No. It is not.” Bilbo’s tone was firm, but he continued to regard the piece thoughtfully. “I’m happy to represent a few artists who are content to address that market, to be sure. But I’m much more interested to represent a few artists who want to push beyond that market and into ones for serious collectors. If you add a few of your moral ambiguity works to the mix, I’d welcome them. They’d make a nice addition to a show, and even if they don’t sell, they’ll be noticed. That’s a good way to raise the interest in your work in that more rarefied market.”

Bard nodded at once. “I’ll do my best, then.”

“Good. You’ve got a distinctive style that’ll raise that first bit of interest, but it won’t necessarily hold it. It’s true that provocation, creating a stir, you might say, is a good way to show your depth, so let yourself roam, Bard. But yes, I do think you have plenty here to offer for a small show at the gallery I talked to the gallery owner yesterday, in anticipation of a few clients who might be ready for an exhibition, so I have a list of available dates you can look at. And of course, I’ve got a contract spelling out everything I explained in my previous visit that I want to leave with you. Have your lawyer review it, to make sure it’s what you expected and that you think it’s fair, and then we can start work on your show.”

Bilbo opened his small satchel, took out a few sheets of paper covered with small legal print, and handed it to Bard. “I hope we can get started on your show very soon, as soon as you’re comfortable with everything.”

“That’s brilliant,” Bard swallowed, leaning forward to take the sheets. “Um, how many works should I get ready? Do you want them framed, or just matted?”

“I’d think no more than thirty to start with. We’ll choose that many, then see which ones would combine to make a good flow between them. That’s key, you know – we want the energy of the gallery to encourage people to look, reflect, discuss, and then buy. Frodo here’s in his last term of school, and he’s taking a most interesting class about art restoration as one of his electives, and another about how to marry the presentation to the piece, as it were. He’s developed quite a good eye for that sort of thing, haven’t you, my boy?”

“It’s kind of you to think so, Uncle,” Frodo murmured, glancing at his uncle with a distracted smile. Maybe he hadn’t quite recovered from Bard’s sketch yet.

“I do. So just looking at the sketches here on the table, how would you choose to present these? All the same, perhaps?”

“Oh, no, I wouldn’t do that,” Frodo shook his head at once, and his eyes sharpened on Bard’s sketches. “We don’t want potential buyers to think they’re all alike, not at all. This one, for instance.” Frodo sorted out a drawing of Thran in mid turn, drawn with loose strokes. “This one looks very Japanese, like one of the traditional Buddhist ox paintings. It’s larger, too – a thin, black lacquer frame might work. Certainly not a faux bamboo – that would call too much attention to itself rather than the drawing. This other one, though, the detailed one of the hand... that looks more like an Old Master, so a bit more of an ornate frame would work better.”

“Your uncle is right,” Bard complimented. “You do have a good eye.”

“Oh!” Frodo looked accusingly at Bilbo, who smiled proudly at the result of his little trick. “That wasn’t fair, Uncle Bilbo.”

“It was harmless, and it proved my point. So once we work out the contract, we’ll sort out which pieces we all agree to show, and then we’ll see about framing and matting.”

“What prices do you think you want to set?”

“The price will include the framing costs, so you won’t be out of pocket for those,” Bilbo explained. “And I’m inclined to ask a bit more than the standard tourist rate, because I don’t think these are tourist fare. Not as high as maybe you were expecting, but that’s just at first. As the market for your work grows, the prices will rise accordingly.”

“That’s what I expected,” Bard hastened to explain. “I had another reason for asking. My children’s school has an art fair coming up –”

“The April Fool’s Follies?” Bilbo’s eyebrows went up.

“That’s the one,” Bard nodded. “I had thought about contributing a piece to the silent auction, just the one, but wanted your opinion about that. I want to support the school, because my children love it there. But I want to support my career, too.”

“It’s a generous gesture, and will do your career no harm, and possibly some good,” Bilbo nodded. “The artwork is a much higher caliber than what you’d see in other schools, just because of the number of good artists we have in the village. A nice piece, not too large, would be a good contribution, and not out of place. One of the dancing sketches would be a good choice, or one with children in it. If you did one of the sledding hill, that would be an excellent subject.”

“That’s good to know,” Bard sat back in relief. “I’ll choose a piece to contribute, then.”

“Have you made any progress on your model of the angel?” Bilbo asked. “I so wanted to show it to Frodo.”

“I have,” Bard got up. “It’s still in the solarium, if you’d like to see it.”

Bard led the way through the kitchen and sitting room to the solarium, and uncovered the clay model on his stand. “I’ve given the fellow a head at last, so he looks a bit better now.”

“He does, indeed,” Bilbo agreed. “And what’s this? Ostrich feathers for hair?”

Bard described his plans for feather wings and wafting hair, which both of his guests greeted with interest and enthusiasm.

“How do you plan to make the wings?” Frodo asked.

Bard chuckled. “There are lots of videos on the Internet about making wings of one kind or another. Even better, though, the costumier working with my husband’s ballet company has a lot of experience about how to build frames and armatures. I’m looking into where I can get feathers in bulk, so I can experiment with dyeing them if I can’t get them in the color I want. I want dark brown feathers for the wings and hair to match the dark bronze patina of the metal, so the piece will be one color, but with three different textures.”

“That’ll be wonderful,” Frodo agreed. “Incredibly stunning.”

“I hope so,” Bard agreed. “The first one will be small, as that’s all my studio can handle. But ultimately, I’d love to do a life-sized one.”

“It will be an amazing piece,” Bilbo agreed. “So take a few days to make sure everything you expected is in the contract, and then we’ll get started.”

“I will,” Bard assured the small man. “I appreciate you coming out so quickly, Bilbo. Frodo, it’s been a pleasure to meet you, and I hope I’ll work with you soon.”

“So do I,” Frodo smiled as they retraced their steps back to the sitting room. “I’ll give some thought about frames and mats, so I’ll have some ideas for you soon.”

“Thanks, Frodo,” Bard nodded, then spotted his husband standing by the kitchen table, still in his dancing attire as he snared a remnant of cheese from the children’s snack plate and chatted with Tilda while she set the table. When Thran looked through the doorway to meet Bard’s eyes, Bard lifted a hand in greeting. “Thran, do you remember Bilbo? This is his nephew, Frodo Baggins. Frodo, this is my husband, Thran Oropherson.”

“Of course I remember,” Thran smiled, offering his hand. “It is good to see you again, Bilbo. Frodo, it is good to meet you.”

“A pleasure,” Frodo shook Thran’s hand, looking up at the tall dancer.

“For me as well,” Thran replied.

“It smells as if supper is well under way,” Bilbo smiled at Tilda and Legolas. “We’ll take our leave, Bard, and hope to hear from you very soon.”

Bard collected coats for the Bagginses, and saw them outside with a wave. He headed back into the kitchen with a good feeling about the meeting. He found Thran in the dining room, nibbling his cheese as he looked at Bard’s drawings scattered over the table.

“Done for the day, angel?” Bard asked, coming to stand by his husband. Thran held out his piece of cheese for Bard to have a bite. As Bard moved closer to sample the treat, his hand strayed over Thran’s glute.

“I am. We made good progress today. The only new excitement is that Wednesday I go into the city to be fitted for pointe shoes. How was your meeting with the Bagginses?”

Bard related the gist of his discussion, which brought a smile to Thran’s face. “That is wonderful, lyubov moya! We will scan and email the contract to Mr. Nori tonight, so that he can look at it tomorrow for you. How many sketches will you need for the show?”

“Somewhere between fifteen and thirty,” Bard replied, sorting through a few of the pages.

“I am excited for you...” Thran’s eyes widened as he picked up the mirror sketch that Bard had taken from the pillow book. “What is this? Why is this one here? You took this from my book? How could you think to sell this?”

Bard chuckled. “At least you’re not upset about me showing it to Bilbo in the first place, though you would have smiled to see how red Frodo was when he saw it. But to put your mind at ease, I have no intention of selling it. I made that clear.”

“Then why did you –”

“Show it at all? Because it’s the prime example of the kind of thing I want to do more of. Not the sexual aspect, but the multiple viewpoints, the way the viewer engages, and I wanted a professional opinion of whether there was a market for that or not.”

Thran slid his gaze from the drawing to Bard. “What did Bilbo say?”

“He said it was a powerful piece. He wanted to see more.”

Thran’s lips slid into a proud smile as he handed the drawing back to Bard. “He has discerning judgment.”

“So do our children. Since this isn’t something I’m ready for them to discern, I’ll take it back upstairs.” He sorted through the sketches to find the one of Thran’s glute. “This one, too.”

“You showed them that one, too?” Thran pretended shock.

“I did. Bilbo called it very beautiful. He was polite and didn’t ask if it were drawn from life.”

“That is something,” Thran conceded, grinning. “So is my ass soon to hang in a gallery, for sale to whoever fancies it?”

Bard shook his head, smiling. “Not in this or the next six lifetimes, angel. The only one with the privilege to fancy your ass is me.”

Snickering, Thran snuck a hand out to squeeze Bard’s hip. “Then my ass is in good hands, exactly as I would have it.”

Thran took the drawings from Bard and headed upstairs to put them safely away before he changed out of his dancing things for supper. Bard watched him go, then straightened the sketches scattered over the table and arranged them carefully in folders and books.

One step closer.
Chapter 85

Chapter Summary

An angel encounters the Weird Sisters of the ballet world, and a saint draws a line in the sand.

Chapter Notes

I took a page out of Sir Peter Jackson’s book, who usually sneaks a personal cameo into his works, so here is mine. My friend johnnysmitten also makes an appearance, so together we are the Weird Sisters. I hope you forgive my whimsy :-).

Also, those of you familiar with my Kiliel tale, "Innikh Dê," might recognize a certain tattoo. I couldn’t resist ;-).

Thran had much to smile about as he pointed his SUV into the city Wednesday morning. Bard had been so excited after his visit from Bilbo and Frodo yesterday, because at last someone from the art world had told him how good his sketches were. So good, in fact, that a show of those sketches would soon be in the offing. He and Bard had read through Bilbo’s contract together last night; it had seemed more than fair to both, but just to make sure, Thran had sent a copy of it to Mr. Nori via email. This morning, as soon as Ori had arrived, the young man had found Bard in the kitchen to tell him that he, too, agreed that the contract was good, so Bard had signed it and sent it off to Bilbo posthaste. So Bard had a representative now, one who was honest and fair, and who would set about making something of Bard’s work. His work with Rada on the costumes for Immortal was also progressing, so soon Bard would no longer have to rely on wishes. He’d be the equal partner he wanted to be with Thran.

Thran already considered Bard to be his equal, but bringing in money to the family was important to Bard, and Thran welcomed the time when that would be so, because of how much that would boost Bard’s confidence.

He’d left Bard back at the house to work with Rada; Charisse and Luka would continue their work with Irmo in the ballroom. The choreographer had calmed down considerably in the past several days, thanks in large part to Ori. Several times, the young man had retrieved some thought or other that Irmo had come up with earlier, and had detailed what actions they’d taken on it. After the third time, Irmo didn’t protest so much because Ori’s kind and quiet phrasing had calmed the storm before it began, enough so that Thran was comfortable to leave the group to work without him for a few hours. He was off to the city to be fitted for pointe shoes.

Pointe shoes... should he feel excited, or ridiculous? Worried, or excited? Watching YouTube videos with Sigrid of men dancing on pointe had proved it plausible for some, though he was not yet convinced if it was for him. He’d called a dancer from his previous company, Dario, who had talked about dancing on pointe not for performance, but because he claimed it made his ankles and legs so much stronger. In the long discussion that followed, Thran had not revealed why he was interested in dancing on pointe, but had merely asked if Dario continued to see a benefit from such practice. At Dario’s enthusiastic response, he’d asked after an instructor, which had led him to discuss the possibility of lessons with Mme. Morgelle. Before long, he had an appointment set up at the shop that provided Dario’s pointe shoes.

He parked his SUV and made his way into the small shop. The long, narrow store was crowded with shelves, all stuffed full of boxes and bags of dancing shoes. Ha, it could be a sister to the wand shop described in the Harry Potter book the family had just finished reading, albeit not so dusty. He was early, as was his preference. There were no other customers here, but the clerk at the register had clearly expected him. As she turned towards the back of the shop, he had time to scan the wall of autographed photos behind the register, all of dancers who patronized the shop.

“Hey, Weird Sisters, your guest is here!” The clerk called, then turned back to give Thran a reassuring smile. “Don’t worry, Mr. Oropherson. They just look odd. They’re both really good. Go on back.”

Chuckling, Thran headed to the back of the shop, but a tall woman had already appeared from behind a curtain that screened the back room of the store from the public area, and walked towards him. She was comfortably dressed in faded blue denim jeans, and a deep blue, heavily embroidered, cotton kurta. A distinctive bright white streak of hair at the front of her hairline enlivened wavy, shoulder-length, light brown hair, the front of which was held back with half a dozen tiny cobalt blue clips. Grey blue eyes peered at him over small silver-rimmed glasses. A trio of bright cobalt teardrop earrings sparkled from each earlobe as she came forward to greet Thran. The only brighter color about her were her black flat shoes, each embroidered with a bright red dragon.

“Good morning, Mr. Oropherson,” she grinned, meeting his eyes frankly and extending her hand for a firm handshake. There was a small tattoo on her wrist of a tiny wolf – no, a fantasy beast that looked like a wolf – and rider. “I’m Elle Mage, the senior fitter. Welcome to our sanctum.”

“Good morning,” Thran offered her a smile. “I hope you are well today.”

“I am, thank you, and I hope you are the same. Jessa and I are ready for you in the back, Mr.
Oropherson. We thought you’d like a little privacy for your fitting, so you can concentrate on your feet, not all the adoring fans.”

“I hope to spare you that,” Thran grinned, following Elle back through the curtain.

“More is not merrier when you’re trying to get the best fit,” Elle agreed, as a shorter woman crouched on the floor looked up from the stack of shoes she was sorting and slotting into spaces on the shelves. “This is Jessa Smitts, our other fitter.”

Jessa was thinner and six inches shorter than her colleague, with pale blue eyes and very long, straight blond hair, the front of which was pulled back at her nape into a braid down her back. If Elle was the older bohemian of the pair, Jessa was the younger counterculturalist, with small royal blue ear gauges, a silver septum piercing, and multiple tattoos of fantastic beasts visible at the neck and sleeves of her grey and teal sweater. Her jeans were grey, and her shoes were black ballet flats. She, too, wore glasses, with thin turquoise frames. She scrambled to her feet to offer her hand.

“It’s an honor, Mr. Oropherson.”

“I hope it will continue to be, and I will not cause the two of you to pull out your hair,” Thran shrugged, shaking Jessa’s hand.
“Between the two of us, we’ll figure it out,” Elle assured him. “I’m good with the technical stuff, and Jessa’s good with the hands-on bit. So what can we help you with today?”

“Pointe shoes.”

Jessa’s eyes got round. Elle didn’t look surprised, but she did give Thran an assessing look up and down. “More and more men are getting into that, because they claim it strengthens their legs in a way regular work doesn’t.”

“A colleague has described the benefits, yes. I sprained ligaments last November, and thought a regime such as he suggested would help me to build strength now that I am back to the dance again. So I am here. I understand you have several men as clients, and have shoes big enough for us.”

“We had one guy in last week who was a size fifteen, believe it or not,” Jessa said, glancing down at Thran’s feet. “You don’t look like your feet are quite that big.”

“Not quite. But they are very long and narrow, with long toes. It may not leave me with a wide enough base.”

“Let’s take a look,” Elle said. “Did you bring tights and a dancer’s belt with you? We need to see a full line to make sure the fit’s right.”

“Dario – my colleague who advised me – so informed me,” Thran nodded.

“Dario?” Jessa smiled. “Dario Sansonne?”

“The same.”

“He’s a regular,” Jessa nodded. “He was one of the first men we fitted.”

“So he said. So yes, I have transition tights on under my leggings, rather than the footed ones I usually wear.”

“You found a pair in your size?” Elle asked. “I’m impressed.”

“It was not easy. But they will suit to make sure my shoes fit properly.”

“Exactly so. So when you’re ready, we’ll get started.”

As Thran unlaced his hiking boots, then peeled off his socks and leggings, Jessa put a Brannock measuring device on the floor. “If you’d put your bare foot in here, Mr. Oropherson?”

“Of course,” Thran stepped on the device. Jessa directed him how to stand on both feet evenly while she measured first one foot, then the other.

“Size thirteen,” she called to Elle, who noted that on a pad. “C width. Long toes, second longer than the first, at least a modified Egyptian, and a high arch.”

“Got it,” Elle nodded. “Go right to the cheaters, I’d say. He’s too tall to mess about with a shoe that doesn’t provide as much support as possible.”

“Cheaters?” Thran’s brow wrinkled in curiosity.

Elle chuckled. “Some of the newer makes of shoes dare to use materials other than the traditional burlap, glue, and so forth to build the toe box and shank. They’ve improved on the traditional models so much that they don’t need breaking in, they last a lot longer, they offer a better fit, and they’re more supportive. They did such a good job for so many dancers that of course the traditionalists called them a cheat, which they most certainly are not. As tall as you are, with such narrow feet, I’m going right to those because if they fit you, they’ll take better care of your feet. Do you expect to perform on pointe?”

Thran kept his expression guileless. “I do not say never. But first, I think it would be better to find out whether I can stand on pointe at all. If not, this may be a very short visit.”

Jessa’s eyes were full of mischief. “We’ll get you up there. Whether you want to stay up there, once we get you up there, is another story.”

Jessa headed to the shelves to consider the selection of shoes, so Thran turned towards Elle. “I should expect this to be painful, then. I hear that it is from so many of my female colleagues.”

Elle shrugged. “It’s unnatural from the get go, isn’t it? Putting all your weight on the tips of your toes? That’s a lot of weight, a lot of strain. But a lot of the men we fit say they have an easier time than the ballerinas, because they’re stronger. The right shoes will make it as easy as possible, though I strongly recommend that you practice only with a good instructor, or you’ll cripple yourself.”

“So I have been advised.”

“Do you think the higher arches and a strong shank, Elle?”

Elle got down on her knees to squeeze Thran’s foot at the metatarsals, then at the heel. “The strongest shank we have – he’s got a lot of height and weight to manage. And the sleek fit for those narrow heels. A fair amount of compression.”

“I agree. Mr. Oropherson, I hope you’re not upset if your shoes are white satin, rather than pink.”

“Devastated,” Thran purred, smiling perversely.

Jessa giggled as she brought out several pairs of shoes. “Some men are, believe it or not.”

“I am more than content with white ones.”

“Okay, have a seat,” Jessa invited. “Would you put the footie part of your tights on, please?”

Thran did, and then Jessa sat at his feet to slip on the first pair of shoes. She eased them over his heels, and adjusted the drawstrings until the shoes sat properly on his feet. Elle had him stand in first position, then second, then plié. His toes were supposed to touch the box inside the shoe, not be too crunched or too loose. They kept up a steady stream of questions, asking him how this one and that one fit. It took a couple of tries to find the right size.

“Okay, time for the barre,” Elle said, studying Thran’s feet. She had him stand face on to the mirror, feet absolutely straight, then hold onto the barre, then point one foot, then the other, without putting any weight on either foot. As he answered many more questions, Elle and Jessa debated back and forth. Jessa’s gentle fingers pinched the shoe at the heel, and checked whether the shoe gaped at the side. Finally, Jessa slid back and nodded at Elle.

“Okay, pointe time,” Elle said. “Hands on the barre, then go up carefully.”

“One foot at a time?”

“No, roll up both feet at the same time. Be careful not to go over.”
Thran did as requested. Because of the care the two women had taken, he rolled up easily, then stayed balanced on his toes. It was a weird sensation, to be balanced on the ends of his toes...

“Come down,” Elle and Jessa chorused, and he quickly found his shoes stripped off. Another round of questions ensued. The women bent their heads over the shoes to fit very tiny, very thin bits of this and that inside, not in the toe or heel, but on the side, then put them back on his feet. Ah, that was better - a snugger fit around the knuckles of his big toes. The women peppered him with still more questions, adjusting the shoes according to his answers, until they decided they’d adjusted the shoes as much as they could. Finally, finally, he was allowed to roll up onto his toes again, then take a step or two, but still while holding onto the barre. When he assured the women that he was comfortable, he was allowed to release the barre to see if he could stand up under his own power.

He could.

Never had such a simple thing seemed like such a monumental accomplishment. Jessa gave Elle a look.

“Take a step,” Elle said. “Carefully.”

Thran took a small one, then another, then another. He did a very ginger walk across the wooden platform before the bar, and back. When he held his hands wide, Elle shook her hair back over her shoulders and folded her arms over her chest. It made him smile when Jessa made the same adjustments.

“Okay, see if you can roll up to pointe without the barre,” Elle requested.

When Thran managed that without a tremor, Elle and Jessa gave each other high fives.

“Another impossible mission accomplished,” Elle chortled.

“The Weird Sisters rule again,” Jessa pumped her fist.

“What is this Weird Sisters?” Thran looked back at them, smiling.

“The witches from Macbeth,” Elle laughed. “They have magical powers. So do Jessa and I.”

“Yeah,” Jessa held out her arms in triumph. “We can fit anybody with pointe shoes.”

“You have certainly have fit me,” Thran agreed, joining their laughter. “So what other wisdom do you have for me?”

The two women gave him a quick rundown about elastics and ribbons and so forth, and how waxed dental floss was the best thread to use. Jessa even drew tiny marks on the inside of his shoes where he should put both, and told him to check with his instructor to help him get the exact placement. Then Elle explained about the padding they’d put in the shoes. Six pairs of shoes later, he was saying goodbye to the Weird Sisters.

“Remember, those shoes don’t need to be broken in, so don’t go slamming them in any doors,” Elle cautioned. “And you don’t need any of the traditional lamb’s wool padding, either. If they don’t feel right, come back for any adjustments before you put in any padding or inserts. We’ve got your specs now, so the next time won’t take as long.”

“It has been a pleasure,” Thran shook Jessa’s hand, then Elle’s. “Thank you for your care, mes chères.”
“Oh, it’s been my pleasure – I mean, our pleasure, Mr. Oropherson,” Jessa blurted, drawing Thran’s chuckle. “The rest of the day will be anticlimactic, to say the least.”

“It probably will,” Elle shrugged without apology. “Thanks for coming in, Mr. Oropherson. It’s been an honor.”

They walked him to the front of the store, where he paid for his shoes. He left the shop with a wave, and not only for the two fitters and the clerk – three young dancers and their mothers waited for the Weird Sisters’ expertise, so he had an autograph or two to sign, and a picture to pose for before he could head back to his SUV.

The autograph he’d been happiest to sign had gone on the picture the clerk printed out of him standing between Elle and Jessa. He grinned as he headed home, thinking of how they’d stood on a chair to pin it high on the wall above the other photographs, a sight gag about his height.

Impossible mission accomplished, indeed.

* * *

Bard saw Thran off to his shoe fitting appointment, then thought about how he’d spend the day as he chopped carrots and ginger for today’s soup. He had pages marked on the Internet to show Thran tonight about the tile and tea paper he wanted to use for the half bath. He could start work on the dining room. He could work on more sketches, inspired by either his imagination or the dancers in the ballroom. Or if Rada had more work for Bard to do on costumes, he’d help however he could. Or he could continue his work on Rahmiel.

If he started on the dining room, he’d be back to stripping woodwork, but he was heartily sick of that. Instead he’d patch the dining room walls –

Wait, Sigrid’s upholstery class would start in another week or so. He’d promised to take it with her, so he headed into the solarium to put the fainting couch back together so he’d have it to work on while she tended to her chairs. His daughter had done a good job stripping and cleaning the wood pieces, and the light fruitwood color would go well with the carved wooden screens that Thran liked so much. Those were due to arrive in Mrs. Mathom’s shop in a few days, so he’d have to plan a pickup for them. He got the fainting couch pieces together quickly, using elastic bands and clamps to hold everything together while the glue dried. The broken table with the marble top that Thran had hauled home was nearby, and Bard spent another hour or two with stripper and steel wool cleaning off the battered paint. His efforts revealed wood that was a little darker than that of the fainting couch, but still an attractive fruitwood finish. When he was done, he upended it to reglue all of the legs back into place, not just the broken one. When it dried, it’d be a sturdy base for the marble top again.

He wandered into the ballroom, hoping to add a few more sketches to his portfolio before lunch. He also wanted to talk to Rada about where he might get the Majorelle blue velvet he wanted for the fainting couch. Ori was in his usual spot, on one of the garden chairs with his tablet on his lap, softly murmuring into his microphone. Rada stood by the windows, but slipped quietly towards Bard when their eyes met. The corners of Rada’s mouth were downturned, giving him a bit of a comic expression, but that was the beginning of a frown, not laughter. Bard quirked his eyebrows up at the generally placid costumier.
“Luka is bearing the brunt,” Rada whispered, nodding at the young dancer out in the middle of the ballroom. Perhaps he and Charisse were working with Irmo on one of their partner dances, because Charisse stood beside the young man, her hand on his shoulder. Was she consoling him? Luka certainly looked downhearted, staring at the floor while Irmo gesticulated and talked rapidly. Thran had an endearing habit of waving his hands around and talking fast when he was excited, but Irmo’s interpretation was not endearing – it was angry.

“No, no, no! Why do you insist on that stupid half step before you do the lift, Luka? It throws off the entire sequence, as I have told you and told you and told you! It puts you on the wrong foot every time, yet you insist on it, like some sort of ridiculous automaton! Why, why, why?”

“Because I’m on the left foot the beat before, not the right foot, as I should be,” Luka tried to explain. He was calmer than Bard expected he’d be. “You want me on the right foot to be in the correct position for the lift, but look at the steps, before the lift. One, two, three; not one two three, four. Left, right, left; not left, right, left, right. So I keep trying to put in the extra step so that I’m in position, but there’s no place for me to do that. So where am I supposed to put the extra step?”

“No at all, idiot!” Irmo’s voice went up. “How hard is that? Not at all?”

“Irmo, Luka’s right,” Charisse inserted, laying her hand on the choreographer’s arm, trying to calm him. “The measure before the lift right now has only three steps in it, not four, and so Luka tries only to put himself in the correct position that you want, oui?”

“No, no, no! Has that same inability to count infected you as well? Gods, there are four steps before hand, as we have danced all morning!”

“Non, maestro, non,” Charisse said gently. “We have four beats, yes, but only three steps, so perhaps there is another you meant to put in the measure, or perhaps the second one is meant to be held as the fourth is –”

“Impossible! Impossible!” the choreographer snapped. “Augh, both of you have lost the ability to count!”

Luka gulped down his frustration, but even Charisse’s consoling look didn’t help, and he jerked away to boot the plastic trashcan that appeared the first day the dancers had been in residence. It had never seemed to collect any trash, and Bard had wondered what it was for. Now he knew – it was how Luka kept from snapping back at Irmo in kind.

“Oh, the child decides to throw his toys again rather than admit that he cannot count to four?” Irmo threw up his hands again, then put his arms akimbo to stare at the young dancer’s back.

“Luka knows how to count, maestro,” Charisse again tried to soothe the agitated choreographer. “So let us count the previous measure again, and decide where the extra step must go –”

“There is no extra step!” Irmo roared. “Not one! Not a single one! Augh, both of you have not just lost the ability to count – you are both idiots, too! Idiots!”

“That’s enough.”

Irmo swung around to stare at Bard. “What did you say?”

Bard blinked – he hadn’t been aware of speaking aloud. But it had been his voice that had drawn the choreographer’s glare. His jaw tightened, but he had no intention of backing down, now that he’d put his foot into it.
“I said that’s enough. Confusion over whether someone counts to three or four doesn’t mean you can insult them.”

“What business if it of yours? Do you know anything about what we do here?”

“I know what common courtesy is, and I know that shouting insults at people isn’t common courtesy. It isn’t the way to resolve your problem, either.”

“I will say what I choose, however I choose, in the best fashion to get my point across to idiots—”

“Not in my house, you won’t,” Bard said. His voice was soft, but firm. “You’re here by my invitation, just as Luka is, and Charisse, and Ori, and Rada. If you disagree with one of my guests, that’s your business. But if you insult them, that’s my business. You’ll treat my guests with respect, or you’ll leave.”

“You can’t tell me to leave in the middle of—”

“I don’t care what you’re in the middle of. Luka’s doing his best to follow your direction, and so is everyone else here, and if you can’t offer your best to them in return, then leave now.”

Irmo’s face went purple and his eyes bugged out at Bard. “I will not stand for interference from you or anyone else!”

“That’s your choice,” Bard growled, as Irmo marched straight up to him. “But I won’t stand for anyone acting like a three-year old having a temper tantrum in my house and insulting anyone. Calm down, or out you go.”

“You are as much cretin as he is!”

“That’s it.” Bard hefted Irmo in his arms and gave Ori and Rada a look. “Someone get the front door, please.”

He had just time to catch sight of Luka putting both hands over his mouth in wide-eyed disbelief, and Charisse gasping in French before he carted the irate choreographer through the house. Ori ran ahead of him, scrambling to yank the front door open; Rada, Luka, and Charisse ran after him to see the end of the spectacle. As he lugged Irmo out through the doorway, across the porch and down the porch steps, Thran’s SUV pulled into the driveway and parked beside Bard’s truck. Bard set Irmo down beside his car; Ori came up behind him with Irmo’s coat and satchel, setting both on the hood of Irmo’s car and backing away to join Rada, Charisse, and Luka on the porch. Thran got out of his SUV with a look of open-mouthed consternation, but Bard kept his eyes on Irmo as the choreographer sputtered in outrage.

“I don’t care what excuse you claim, whether it’s autism, or savantism, or a day without your favorite breakfast cereal,” Bard stared deep into Irmo’s eyes. He spoke with conviction, but without raising his voice. “You owe everyone here an apology for acting like a raging bully. Regardless of that excuse, and no matter what your vision is, it’s no vision if you can’t make it happen without abusing your colleagues, and my guests. You’re not welcome in my house until you understand that you cannot and will not treat anyone here like that again.”

Irmo turned to Thran, who looked less shocked after hearing Bard’s admonishment. “You will let this happen? You will ruin Immortal because of his thin skin?”

“I will not ruin Immortal because of your viciousness,” Thran said flatly, coming to stand beside Bard.
“This is an argument over nothing! Nothing!”

“If Bard says it is something, then it is something.”

“He doesn’t have the right to throw me out. My work is with you, not him.”

“Ah, but the house is Bard’s, Irmo, and we must behave in accordance with his rules. If Bard says you have acted the bully, then he is right to escort you out. We have talked about this – I do not condone a bully. So act the bully and go, or practice restraint and stay.”

Irmo muttered under his breath, snatched up his coat and satchel, threw himself into his car, and drove off.

Thran’s eyes were on Bard in an instant, but to Bard’s relief, Thran didn’t look angry, merely thoughtful.

“What did he do, lyubov moya?”

Bard exhaled. “He went after Luka. Then he started on Charisse for sticking up for the lad. I don’t like my guests mistreated, and I said so. He took exception, so I put him out.”

Thran’s sigh was philosophical as they turned towards the quartet standing on the porch – Rada grimaced, Charisse looked affronted, and Ori and Luka exchanged similarly appalled looks. “It was bound to happen. At least we have much of the solo work done, and no one has had a breakdown yet, so it could have been worse.”

“Gods, Bard, thank you for standing up for me, but – but – I didn’t mean for him to storm off like that –” Luka stuttered, as Bard and Thran walked up the porch stairs.

“I did,” Bard gave Thran a wry smile. “It doesn’t matter whether you counted the three that you thought or the four that he thought. It didn’t merit getting the dressing down you received.”

“No, it didn’t,” Charisse shook her head. “So rude, so rude...”

As they came inside the house, Thran’s colleagues hastened to explain what had happened. Bard let them precede him back to the ballroom, grimacing all the way. Despite Irmo’s insulting words, despite how much the choreographer had merited a dressing down, despite the support of Thran’s colleagues, Bard still winced. He’d likely just made Thran’s life much more complicated.

Chapter End Notes

For all you geeks out there, I spent a loooooonnng time looking at videos and reading stuff about how to fit pointe shoes, and I have a healthy respect for the amount of expertise that goes into fitting shoes. The so-called "cheaters" that Elle refers to in this chapter are a nod to the Gaynor Minden shoes that are a relatively recent development (the past 20 or so years). Normally, a dancer provides an outline of his/her feet, and the company produces shoes customized for that dancer. As this process takes time, and because my story is a fairytale, I took artistic license to have Thran visit a shop rather than get his shoes in the usual fashion.

I found a fascinating (that means I understood most of what I read :-) paper called "A Comparative Mechanical Analysis of the Pointe Shoe Toe Box - An In Vitro Study -
The American Journal of Sports Medicine June 1998” that did the most amazing technical comparison of pointe shoes. To quote that paper, “(t)he Gaynor Minden uses a patented design in the shank and toe box. The toe box is formed from an elastomeric material sandwiched between layers of shock-absorbing foam. In contrast, the Capezio, Freed, Leo’s, and Grishko toe boxes are composed of materials such as burlap, cardboard, or paper— or some combination thereof—saturated with glue. The high threshold of elastic limitation, evident by the long fatigue life, presents itself as the distinguishing mechanical characteristic of the Gaynor Minden pointe shoe.”

The paper went on to say that the cycles of failure and vertical strength are both much higher for Gaynor Minden shoes than other shoes (Capezio, Freed, Leo’s, and Grishko). That means they last longer, and have provide more of certain kinds of strength. A lot of dancers described how much more comfortable they were than traditionally constructed shoes, too. As a geek, I couldn't resist going for the new tech version of such traditional footwear.

Who said a beautiful art can't benefit from technology?
Chapter 86

Chapter Summary

An angel and a saint deal with a dragon.

It took little time for Thran to sort out what had preceded Irmo’s summary ouster from the house. Rada and Ori provided a quiet explanation, while Charisse explained the troublesome dance sequence that had caused so much consternation. Luka was uncharacteristically silent, but his tight, nervous posture telegraphed his apprehension. Bard stayed in the background with a neutral look on his face, but Thran knew better. His husband likely catalogued a whole list of trouble he thought he’d caused Thran, felt guilty about it, and bided his time before he offered an apology. He would see to Bard soon enough. First, however, he wanted to reassure Luka. Rada was right about how often the young man had borne the brunt of Irmo’s withering irritation, and while the dancer had thankfully become more serious in his attention to details and techniques, Thran didn’t want him to be so demoralized that he lost his love of the dance.

“No, no, Luka, there was nothing you could have done,” Charisse was saying. “You were right—you must take another step to put you in the right position for the lift. Thran knows this as well as you and I, so we will fix the step.”

“But Irmo’s out,” Luka spread his hands and looked up at the ceiling of the ballroom. “I pissed him off, and now he’s gone, and I’ve made yet another blunder. Gods!”

“Irmo’s out because I threw him out,” Bard stepped forward with a shrug. “Luka was not out of line, Thran, and Charisse tried to calm Irmo down, too. This is on my head, not Luka’s.”

“This is on Irmo’s head only,” Thran took in everyone with his regard. “I have warned him more than once that I will not tolerate a bully. What we do is hard enough, and requires much trust on all our parts. We do not have a place for anyone who cannot practice the respect. So none of you have reason to worry or to regret or to feel guilty because Irmo has been put out. We will go on, and Immortal will become what we want it to be. Please, do not worry.”

“What are we going to do about a choreographer, though?” Luka asked.

“Nothing for the next three hours,” Thran smiled. “Let us see if Irmo is smart enough to realize that he needs us more than we need him. It may be that he will see this, and reappear with an abject apology in hand. If by tomorrow he has not reappeared, then I will consider.”

“That is wise,” Charisse nodded firmly. “We will work out the steps ourselves, Luka, and when that ridiculous man reappears, we will show him how smoothly it works, and he will be abashed that he didn’t listen to us long before.”

Luka’s lips trembled into a grateful smile. “That’s just what we’ll do. He’ll wonder why he didn’t think of our solution himself.”

“Of course. Such a ridiculous man, sometimes,” Charisse put her hands on her hips. “Come, let us try it—oh, but wait! Thran, what about your fitting? How did that go?”
“Yes, did you find any shoes?” Rada asked, perking up.

“I did,” Thran nodded proudly. “Tcha, I left them in the SUV. I will bring them in and show you all.”

Thran trotted outside, fetched his bag, and rejoined his husband and colleagues in the ballroom to unveil the shoes, the ribbon, and the elastics to a collection of murmurs and exclamations.

“Oh, they do make them in your size!” Charisse grinned as Thran handed one of the shoes to her. “Oh, so plush in the inside! Very nice. These are the modern ones, so controversial. And they are not pink – c’est dommage.”

“No pink,” Thran offered a theatrical sigh, much to everyone’s amusement. “I received quite an education about them from the fitters. They call themselves the Weird Sisters. I enjoyed them very much.”

“Oh, they’re famous!” Charisse laughed. “So good, both of them! And funny!”

Thran described his visit, which provoked much discussion. Charisse gave him a careful lesson in how to sew on his elastics and ribbons, even bringing out her sewing kit to show him how to make the small stitches that would not rub, nor puncture the outer satin. Once he had tailored a pair to her specifications, of course he had to model them, and laughed when Charisse fussed at him to tie the ribbons correctly and tuck in the knots. He took a few steps in them to get used to the feel of the ribbons, but stayed flat – until Bard looked up dubiously from his sketchbook, fingers pulling at his bottom lip.

“So... you’re supposed to stand on your toes in those?”

“I did stand on my toes in them,” Thran confirmed. “I even took a step or two.”

Charisse tsked, shaking her head. “Be careful, Thran. You should wait for the instructor.”

“I should,” Thran grinned, going to the barre. “But perhaps I will indulge in a single step, merely to illustrate.”

Charisse tsked again, but everyone else looked so eager that Thran made sure his feet were straight to the barre and rolled up just as he had in the shop. When he was sure he was steady, he released the barre and held out his hands.

“Oh, my,” Rada breathed, cradling his chin in his hand as he looked up and down Thran’s height. “Oh, my...”

“Oh, oh, my,” Ori seconded. “It’s not as if you’re not tall enough already, Thran. But now you’re...”

“It will look spectacular, will it not?” Thran drew himself up to his tallest and raised his arms above his head. “Death so tall, and the Maid so small?”

Charisse took a position beside Thran. She extended one leg forward, bent over it, and looked back at him, further exaggerating the height difference between them. “Vraiment – truly. It will be formidable.”

Rada tugged at Bard’s sleeve. “We must draw that, while we have it.”
Bard patted Rada’s arm in agreement, and they both turned to clean pages in their sketchbooks.

“This is the scene,” Thran looked to Charisse. “Death brings the Maid to the Underworld, and makes the case for His love.”

“Yes, yes,” Charisse nodded vigorously. “But the Maid, she is still so in love with her Soldier, and hardly sees anything around her but her memory of him. Luka, come, be the memory of my Soldier.”

Luka scampered into place, caught up in Charisse’s enthusiasm. As the three arranged themselves, Rada and Bard sketched madly. Thran forced all thought of them away, and considered only Death afire with his love for the human Maid, desperate to offer Himself to her. But she was so inflamed with the loss of her Soldier that she didn’t notice Him enough to reject him. All she saw was the spectre of the Soldier who was lost to her.

“Hold that – yes, that!” Bard pleaded. “Right there. Can you hold that?”

All three of them froze. Thran put himself in his yoga trance, relaxing muscles even as bones held him in the pose, until the stress on his feet grew too much.

“I am sorry, Bard – I must come down,” he warned, and let his feet roll carefully flat.

“That’s okay, angel; I’ve got it. I’ve got it,” Bard said distractedly, not seeing the smiles that everyone exchanged at the endearment. Thran allowed himself a fond smile to go with the rest.

“You most certainly do,” Rada murmured, looking over Bard’s shoulder. “Bard, you have the whole story in a single sketch.”

“Show us!” Charisse exclaimed, as Bard drew one last line. “Ah, such anticipation!”

She and Luka drew close, their arms around each other’s waists, and Thran looked between them as Bard turned his sketchbook around. Thran’s breath caught at the spare yet evocative drawing that depicted the Maid and Soldier reaching out to one another, with Death behind and above them, impotent to distract either of the pair. The movement of the figures was palpable, as were the urgency of the mortals and the inevitability of Death.

“May I?” Rada asked, with pencil poised in his hand.

“Yes, of course,” Bard turned his pad towards the costumier. “Please.”

“Just here, and here,” Rada mimicked a pair of lines.

“Yes, you’re right – that’s great,” Bard nodded, adding the lines, then turning the pad around again. The extra lines extended the Maid’s dress and the Soldier’s tunic. “More motion, and a better hint at the costumes.”

“I like it very much,” Charisse agreed.

“It’s wonderful,” Ori nodded. “And the way you’ve drawn Death’s long legs... that’s good, Bard. It hints at him being up on his toes, but doesn’t show it explicitly. It’d be a great poster for the ballet, and a great marketing tease.”

“It will be, indeed,” Thran agreed. “If I can back up the sketch with the shoes, then it will be perfect. So I must arrange for instruction quickly. Charisse, do you know this Mme. Morgelle?”
“Of course – she is very good, and has familiarity with other male dancers who dance on pointe. Your friend Dario, he recommended her?”

Thran nodded.

“She is an excellent choice. She is very insistent about precision, but for someone as tall as you, that is good. Balance will be even more important to you than it is for a small ballerina.”

“Then I will call at lunch – ah, it is that time now. Come, we have paused, anyway, so let us have our meal, and then we can resume afterwards.”

“What... what will we work on?” Luka asked. “Without a choreographer...”

“We have plenty to work on.” Thran’s voice was firm. “We will review what we have done, and what we have left to do. We still lack music for the troll market. We have costume work to consider.”

“I’d like to organize my most recent notes, too,” Ori volunteered. “I’ve kept up with most of it, but I have some questions that I’d like to fill in. So I’m set for the afternoon.”

“To lunch, then,” Thran invited, and the group filed out of the ballroom and into the kitchen. Bard’s soup went into bowls, Luka nuked his burrito, Rada fished out a packet of cookies, and Ori brought out a thick corned beef sandwich. They assembled around the kitchen table in good spirits to share their meal.

Take that, Irmo.

* * *

At first, Bard thought Thran was merely putting on a good face over Irmo’s ouster. Was he just trying to make him and the rest of the folks in the ballroom feel better? But as lunch went on, it was clear that Thran was not glossing over any resentment, frustration, or displeasure about it. If anything, he looked excited, even anticipatory. What was Thran up to?

The tall dancer made sure that the lunch conversation was light at first, and positive, but when the talk turned to the music for the troll market, he let it run on its own as everyone threw out ideas about what background would best convey the diversity of the Underworld. Rada started the best part of that, reiterating his ideas about the different enclaves of souls that inhabited Death’s realm. With typical irreverence, Luka teasingly called the enclaves ‘hoods, and made beat box noises to accompany his joke. At long last, the young dancer’s teasing had a positive result, because Rada wondered what if the music ebbed and flowed as Death led the newest souls through His realm – Luka’s hip hop here, Beethoven’s Für Elise there, and Indian tablas over there. Perhaps a dreamy background could underlie all the bits, such as Ravel’s Daphnis et Chloé? Ori quickly called up the Ravel piece on his tablet, and found out that it had premiered in 1912, so UVB would not have to pay any licensing fees if they chose to use that piece of music. As the dreamy sounds of the music played, everyone agreed that it was a good choice to anchor the Soldier’s travel through the Underworld.

“So we have the last piece of the music,” Thran nodded with satisfaction. “See, we make good progress. Ori, would you please add that to our list of music for each scene?”

“I will,” Ori nodded, fingers tapping rapidly. “Just a moment...”
When Ori turned his tablet around, Bard leaned forward with everyone else to scan it. Typically, Ori had organized a tidy chart that listed the acts and scenes of the ballet, the music chosen for each one, who the dancers were, and how approximately long each scene ran.

“So our ballet runs about ninety minutes,” Thran tapped his finger against his lip, then gave Bard a smile. “That should not be too much for those who dislike overlong operas to endure, no?”

“I think that’s manageable,” Bard grinned in return. “How long are the pauses between acts?”

“It depends on the set design,” Thran mused. “We have only one complicated set, so perhaps not long. It is time to bring Círdan into the mix. In fact, soon it will be time to bring the rest of the company into the mix, too. We have the basics of the principal choreography done, and so now we must work on the battles and the troll market.”

Discussion evolved into details of the ensemble work that would soon begin. Bard confined himself mostly to listening, soaking up the details, sketching now and again as he could, sometimes ideas about what he heard, and sometimes the scene of his companions around the table. At times, he imagined a big Italian family gathered around a Sunday dinner table to argue, laugh, tease, and generally fill the air with loud affection. It made him smile as he sketched Luka laughing at Charisse wondering what an enclave of Eskimos would make of a skirt of leaves, or tropical islanders of a fur anorak.

Soon enough, the gathering returned to the ballroom, and Luka and Charisse worked through the sequence that had caused Irmo so much trouble in the morning. Together, they thought to add exchange two of the steps in Luka’s part to a single full turn. That gave him a chance to add more emotion to the dance, and brought him around on the correct foot to the correct position to hoist Charisse aloft.

“What do you think, Charisse?” Luka asked, lowering the woman to the floor. “That’s a lot easier for me, yet it feels more like what the Soldier would do.”

“I agree,” Charisse gave an emphatic nod. “And if I make my step just before a little wider, then it brings me to you with more passion, which suits the Maid. Thran, see what you think of our refinement.”

The two dancers retraced the steps, both of them humming the music that would accompany them.

“Yes, that is very nice!” Thran applauded. “The extra half step is no more, the emotion is there for both the Soldier and the Maid, and the lift comes naturally after. Where is our notation?”

“I have it,” Charisse hastened to the papers that recorded the choreography, and quickly sketched the revision, reciting the steps as she wrote them so that Luka and Thran could check her. How anyone made anything of the mysterious marks was arcane knowledge, and Bard was thankful he wasn’t the one who had to make sense out of them –

A knock came at the door.

Everyone paused to exchange glances. “Irmo,” most of them murmured, albeit with varying degrees of dread, exasperation, and amusement.

“I’ll get it,” Bard put up a hand. “You all carry on.”

“Not just carry on,” Thran said swiftly. “If that is our errant choreographer, let us show him that we are well able to progress, and happily so. We do not revolve so much around brilliance that we allow it to burn us.”
Thran was all but trembling in anticipation. Oh, it was clear now – why he’d been so animated since Irmo had stormed away, why he’d smiled so much during lunch...

Thran was gambling.

What had Bard’s husband said before lunch? Right now, with Immortal’s story set and most of the principal dances sketched out and notated, Irmo needed Immortal much more than Immortal needed him. A lesser choreographer could fill in the rest, perhaps not as well as Irmo, but with less ill will. If Irmo knew that, then he might be so desperate to finish the work himself that he’d put a rein on his bad behavior far better than anyone else could.

That was the gamble – how badly did Irmo want to finish Immortal?

Bard’s grin spread slowly across his face. “I’ve got you, Thran. We just need to make Irmo see that we’ve got him by the short hairs, and he’ll police himself better than we can.”

The expression on Thran’s face wasn’t quite a malicious grin, but close enough that Rada smothered a chuckle. “Exactly, lyubov moya. Exactly.”

“I can help with that,” Ori said into the silence, as a second knock sounded, this one more urgent. His expression was even more mercenary than Thran’s as he explained himself in a few words.

“Yes,” Thran nodded, taking them all in. “We must all follow what Ori starts. Bard, you begin at the door. The rest of us will take our places here.”

“On my way,” Bard agreed, taking up his sketchbook and turning to the page where he’d drawn the sketch Rada had so liked from this morning. “Ori, you hang back and come in wherever you think is best.”

Ori waved a hand as he tapped on his tablet. Bard headed for the front door, taking a marshaling breath before he put a busy expression on his face. As he passed the main room, he snuck a peek through one of the windows – yes, there was Irmo’s car. He looked back at Ori, nodded, and reached for the knob as the small man ducked back into the ballroom to alert the others.

Bard pulled open the door, still looking at his sketchpad, only belatedly looking at who stood there – Irmo, of course – after a second or two. He sharpened his gaze on the choreographer.

“Hello, Irmo.”

“I want to speak to Thran.”

Not an auspicious start, but Bard kept his expression neutral. “He’s busy at the moment.”

“Bard?” Ori hurried in from the ballroom. “Oh – hello, Irmo. Bard, Thran wants to see that sketch you did for the promotion. I’ve got the list of choreographers he wanted, too, so I thought we could interrupt him just the once –”

“Choreographers?” Irmo repeated, blinking in surprise. “What other choreographers do we need?”

“You walked off the job this morning, if you remember,” Bard gave Irmo a pointed look. “We are considering whether another choreographer can help us fill in the rest of the ballet, or if Thran will take that on himself. He’s already doing so much, though –”

“That is absurd!” Irmo exclaimed. “It is unnecessary and pointless! I want to speak to Thran myself and explain this!”
Bard stuck his pencil behind his ear and regarded Irmo frankly. “I meant what I said about respect this morning, Irmo. Do you hear yourself making demands? No one comes into my house by making demands. If that’s the best case you can make to see Thran, it doesn’t pass muster with me.”

“Come on, Bard,” Ori murmured. “Thran’s waiting for this.”

Bard handed Ori his sketchbook. “Sorry, Ori. I finished the sketch, so if you take it in, I’ll be right there.”

Ori took the sketchbook reluctantly. “Okay, Bard. Oh. My. That is a wonderful sketch.”

“Thanks. Irmo, I’ve got to go—”

“I am sorry,” Irmo said hastily, as if the words tasted so bad that he wanted to spit them out as fast as possible. “Of course, you have the right to set the rules for your house, and of course, it is right that I meet them. So yes, I will meet them, and please, I would like to talk to Thran.”

Bard and Ori exchanged dubious looks. Ori especially had endured Irmo more than the rest of them, and no hint of a smile touched his face. Bard had more reason to snicker, but the stakes were too high for that. Ori gave a slight shrug, which Bard mirrored before he looked back at Irmo.

“I appreciate the rephrasing. I’ll see if Thran’s at a point where he can come out. He’s in the middle of something with Luka and Charisse.”

“I’ll go,” Ori offered, and hastened off, leaving Bard in the hallway with Irmo. He didn’t want to engage Irmo, so he looked around the hall, then back towards the ballroom. He really needed to paint this space. It’d do so much to improve the air of the place if Hope the Lope’s sanctuary wasn’t so dingy—

“He says bring Irmo on through, Bard!” came Ori’s voice. Bard beckoned to Irmo, and led the choreographer through the main room to the ballroom, where Thran was in the middle of watching Luka and Charisse dance to taped music. Rada had scattered a lot of sketches near the garden benches, and Ori stood beside Thran like an attentive scribe.

“Yes, yes – excellent!” Thran approved. “That is very smooth, very nice. Once more, please?”

Ori queued the music again, Charisse and Luka danced, and Thran watched critically. “Yes, that is it exactly. That is a good fix. Charisse, let us note that.”

“Certainement,” Charisse and Luka bent over the notation, leaving Thran free to notice Bard standing with Irmo.

“Ah. Irmo. Good afternoon.”

“If I may have a word with you... please?”

“Of course,” Thran assented, and the pair took themselves away from the others, standing in low but animated discussion by the fireplace. Bard sidled up to Rada and they bent over their sketches. Ori soon joined them, and Charisse and Luka began their dance from the beginning so that they stayed busy.

“Oh, to be a fly on the wall,” Rada murmured, winking at Bard and Ori.

“That’s the truth,” Bard breathed, flicking a glance at the pair. “This must be part and parcel of a lot of your jobs, Ori.”
“Yes,” Ori admitted, not bothering to look away from his tablet. “But don’t tell my brother I said that. He’d kill me.”

“Quite the intriguing man, your brother,” Bard observed. “Exactly what is his job, anyway?”

“He considers himself an… expediter,” Ori said guilelessly. “Don’t tell him I said that, either.”

“Exactly how does one become an expediter?” Bard teased, but Ori’s look back at him was not a smile.

“We’ve got an older brother – a hairdresser. He’s a bit of a motherer and a fusser, but he’s a good soul… generous to a fault. Someone like Angelo burned Dori’s shop because he wouldn’t pay protection money, and because he was gay. Up to that point, Nori had been more on the wrong side of things than the right, but it changed after that.”

Bard skewered Ori with his stare, but Ori’s normally friendly brown eyes were hard and angry.

“There was a hairdresser named Dori in my old building.”

Ori nodded. “That’s my brother, yes.”

Bard swallowed. “He’s a sweet guy.”

Ori nodded again. “He likes you, too. You were always nice to him.”

So the man who’d brokered the deal to put Clan Ffyrnig’s drug dealing harasser in prison had seen to his brother’s harassers, too. And to Steffen Masters’ downfall. And likely to Angelo’s demise, as well. Bard didn’t need to know what form the retaliation against Dori Goldman’s arsonists had taken – it had surely been decisive and final. A cold shiver went up Bard’s spine. It was one thing to tease Thran about being in the Russian Mafia. It was another to know that Ori’s brother and Thran’s “expediter” was in another league entirely. And how many people had found themselves in a world of trouble because the gentle soul sitting cross-legged beside Bard on the floor had tap-tap-tapped his way through damning data?

“Give my regards to both your brothers when you see them,” Bard said.

The anger eased from Ori’s eyes, and the man gave Bard a gentler smile than he would have a moment ago. “I will. Dori in particular will be touched that you asked after him.”

Bard didn’t ask whether Mr. Nori would be touched or not. He hoped not.

“The harpy approaches,” Rada warned softly.

Bard looked up – yes, Thran and Irmo had ended their discussion and approached. Thran’s expression was even, but a hint of smugness flickered in his grey eyes. Irmo looked abashed, something Bard hadn’t seen before, but he took it as a good sign.

“I am sorry for so much bad behavior,” Irmo began without preamble. “Over and over, I have made little of you and much of myself, when it should be the other way around. Yes, I set the steps, ask for the sets, ask for the costumes, but it is you, Charisse and Luka – and Thran, of course – who make the steps live. It is Rada who makes the costumes live. It is Ori who organizes my rambles and makes them into a tidy web rather than a jumbled maze. It is Bard who captures the essence of so many things and provides this wonderful place to create. I know these things. I do not forget these things. I have an angry and impatient muse, sometimes, and from now on I must work very hard to calm her temper so that it does not insult and belittle you. I hope you know these things are true, and will forgive me so many lapses, and will allow me to continue to work with you.”
This recital, which surely reflected what Thran wanted to hear as much as how Irmo felt, was met with silence – not surprising, given how many incidents Irmo had precipitated. Thran gestured to all of them.

“We will vote – with one caveat. If Bard agrees that Irmo remains, well and good – the rest of us will also vote, and the count For or Against will determine whether Irmo is back with us or not. But if Bard is not happy with this at all, and says that Irmo must go, then it is done. Agreed?”

“Agreed,” chorused the others.

“Then I’ll vote last,” Bard replied. “I want to hear how the rest of you feel before I vote.”

“As you say,” Thran nodded. “I will vote next to last, then, because I am the one in charge. It is Charisse, Luka, Ori, and Rada who must vote first.”

Rada raised an index finger. “May I start the vote? I will vote yes, Irmo may stay, but I also suggest that if any of us reach a point where we cannot follow Bard’s most excellent house rules, then we must excuse ourselves for an hour? That means that we are not part of any decisions made in that hour of our lapse, and we must live with those decisions accordingly. Also, we must work to reestablish our rapport with the rest. That is a stiff penalty.”

“Oh, very much so,” Charisse nodded. “I will also vote yes, and agree that we should add Rada’s suggestion.”

“I can go with that, too,” Ori agreed, smiling. It wasn’t lost on Bard that the three quickest to agree were the even-tempered ones.

“That leaves me,” Luka grimaced. “I don’t like being yelled at when I don’t understand. And please, don’t take away my trashcan. Sometimes, I just have to vent, and better I kick my trashcan than yell at any of you when it’s not your fault. You take a lot of everything out on me, Irmo, and I don’t like that one bit, not when I’m trying hard to do my job. But... if I can still have my trashcan, then okay... I’ll do my best.”

“The trashcan is allowed, and for all of us,” Thran agreed. “So I cast my vote for yes, also. You understand, Irmo, that yes does not mean it is back to the rudeness. If that returns, then Bard will escort you out again at his discretion, and for good. You understand this?”

Irmo nodded. “I understand. I will do my best. Though... maybe sometimes I will resort to the trashcan, too.”

“Acceptable. So Bard, it is up to you.”

Thran stood slightly behind Irmo, so the choreographer didn’t see Thran’s surreptitious wink at Bard. Bard didn’t acknowledge it, but he made a show of rubbing his chin as he pretended to consider. After an unconscionably long time, he gave a slow nod.

“I can live with that. I hope you appreciate what a good company this is, Irmo. They embrace your vision, just not the way you choose to convey it. You’ve got a good thing going. Think how much better it’ll be when you encourage instead of discourage. This’ll be the ballet to beat them all.”

“You are right. You are very much right,” Irmo replied, and for the first time he seemed moved. Maybe Bard had done the right thing, to speak to what drove Irmo most – his visions. “Terpsichore, that muse is a hard one. This I know. But she is right, and true. I will try to be a better mouthpiece for her.”
Bard nodded to Thran, so Thran turned to Irmo. “Then we welcome you back, Irmo. We have made good progress while you were gone, so let us inform you of these things...”

Ori moved to catch Irmo’s coat as the choreographer shrugged it off his shoulders, exchanging a shrug and a grin with the rest of the company as Thran crouched with Irmo beside their notation notes. Maybe the threat of expulsion would register, and Irmo would mend his ways.

Maybe.

If it didn’t, Bard would have no compunction about hauling Irmo out again, this time for good.

* * *

Thran grinned as Bard got into bed beside him and fell back into the pillows with a deep exhale. He snaked a hand out from under the sheet and blankets to stroke his husband’s arm.

“What a day, yes?”

“Oh, that’s no lie,” Bard graved. “I signed a contract with an artist’s rep and will have a show before long. You got pointe shoes and can actually stand on them. We fired a choreographer and then hired him back. Rada and I drew some good stuff, and Luka and Charisse fixed up their dance. It’s a roller coaster that never stops.”

“I have never been on a roller coaster,” Thran mused, snuggling into Bard. “They look terrifying.”

Bard reached over to turn out the light, then gathered Thran close. “Bain loves them. Tilda does, too, surprisingly. Sigrid can take them or leave them. She says the wait in line is too long to justify a scant two minutes of excitement. Has Legolas ever been on one?”

“No.”

“Maybe he’d like to take a ride or two. If he does, we can take the children to a coaster park this summer. Then you and I can ride one, too.”

“I know such contraptions must be safe or they would not exist, but I am dubious to entrust my life to something that looks so flimsy.”

“That’s half the fun, pretending to do something dangerous that really isn’t.”

“So it is said. I am not convinced.”

Bard snickered. “So says the man who dares to put on a ballet, dance on his toes, and gamble on the reappearance of errant choreographers. All in one day.”

“Those are all acceptable risks, risks I understand.”

“A lot of the people who ride roller coasters would never take your risks. It’s all in what you know and what you’re comfortable with. But I think I’m going to start calling you the gambler.”

“What is this gambler, lyubov moya?”

“You are, that’s who. That look in your eyes all through lunch... you were betting that Irmo would come back. And when he knocked on the door, you almost crowed, you were so sure it was him.”

Thran grinned. “I did. If that is a gamble, then it is a gamble I won.”

“You certainly did. Getting on a roller coaster would be anticlimactic after that.”

Thran sniffed. “To go upside down and around and back in defiance of gravity seems much more dangerous, Bard. Perhaps I should stick to the carousel. That is only around and around. No up and down or upside down.”

“It makes no difference either way. The important thing is to enjoy yourself, and if all you do is watch the children enjoy a little mayhem, that’s okay.”

“I did think of something I would enjoy,” Thran purred.

“Oh?” Bard drawled, drawing out the syllable. “And what might that be?”

“This time, I thought of a game for us to play.”

“Mmm. Tell me more.”

“It will be for the dining room. Remember that I said how we could have a picnic on a beautiful Oushak rug, once you restored the room?”

“I do.”

“I have a better idea. It will reward the lord of the house, who has worked so hard to make it beautiful for his family, who today defended the rights of his guests so stoutly.”

“If it calls for the lord to wear a suit, it’s no good. I don’t own one. And a crown is right out.”

“We will do without either. Though soon enough, we will buy you a very nice suit. I assume you have something suitably artistic to wear to your art show, but you will need a suit for my ballet premiere. As for our game, you may choose to wear what you like when your loyal valet serves you a delicious meal on a table laid with all of our finest things, and then gratifies your choice of positions for dessert. I would take great pains to ensure that the lord of the house is well satisfied.”

“Mmm,” Bard rumbled, turning towards Thran to nuzzle a kiss at the base of his throat. “You could serve me a toaster pastry and I’d think it was perfect.”

“Tcha, those horrible cardboard things with artificial fillings and overly sweet icing? I can make nice scrambled eggs with toast, or perhaps a warm muffin.”

“Sounds perfect. I’d better get painting, then.”

“It will come in good time. I like the beautiful marble tile you showed me for the half bath, and the silver tea paper with the red accents.”

“That marble will take a while to come in once I order it. I’ll probably get the tea paper up, the central hall painted, and the dining room painted before it does.”

“As I said, it will come in good time. Until then, imagine how your valet may best please you. It will give you something to anticipate.”

Bard’s nuzzling gave way to a long kiss. “I have a lot to anticipate right now. Maybe I won’t have to anticipate for very long, if a certain dancer is in the mood.”
Thran smiled in the dark as he enjoyed his husband’s caresses, rewarding them with his own. “With such a beautiful artist in my bed, it is very hard not to be in the mood.”

Hands stroked down his body, soon gloving the most sensitive part of him. “Mmm. It is very hard, indeed. I can do a lot with that.”

Bliss soon warmed the dark.

* * *

Author's Note!

For you music geeks out there, here is Ori's scene list with the specific pieces of music that the company is considering. It's subject to change, but I thought some of you might find it fun to listen along. I apologize for the formatting - this doesn't support table lines, but I hope you can read along anyway!

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Act</th>
<th>Scn</th>
<th>Description</th>
<th>Dance Type</th>
<th>Music</th>
<th>Time</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>I</td>
<td>i.</td>
<td>First battle</td>
<td>FC</td>
<td>Kyrie, Requiem, György Ligeti</td>
<td>7:38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>ii.</td>
<td>Death collects souls of the fallen</td>
<td>Solo</td>
<td>Knight’s March, Romeo and Juliet, Sergei Prokofiev</td>
<td>1:44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>iii.</td>
<td>Maid searches for and finds Soldier; Death retreats; Maid and Soldier rejoice</td>
<td>PDT w/ SC</td>
<td>Herzgewächse, Opus 20, Arnold Schoenberg</td>
<td>3:36</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I</td>
<td>iv.</td>
<td>Second battle; the Soldier falls</td>
<td>FC</td>
<td>Kyrie</td>
<td>7:38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>v.</td>
<td>Death claims Soldier and leads to Underworld; Maid pursues, Underworld gates (UG) close</td>
<td>Principals, FC</td>
<td>Knights Reprised</td>
<td>7:00</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Underworld revealed; Death leads Soldier around; Soldier wanders but cannot forget the Maid

Principals, mixed up, fading in and out as each enclave steps forth; underneath is Daphnis et Chloé, Maurice Ravel

Maid grieves Above; dreams of Soldier; travels to Underworld

Solo; Lachrimosa, Requiem, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart

Maid petitions Death; Death accepts; Soldier and Maid trade places; UG close

Principals, The Isle of the Dead, Sergei Rachmaninov; Knights Reprised

Death woos Maid; she is blind to all but Soldier

PDD; Elegy for Viola and Piano, Opus 30, Henri Vieuxtemps

Soldier grieves Above; dreams of Maid; travels to Underworld

Solo, Valse Sentimentale, Pyotr Ilyich Tchaikovsky

Soldier petitions Death; Death refuses; Soldier dies; Death collects his soul and ejects Maid; Maid dies; Maid and Soldier reunite despite Death; become stars; UG gates close for the last time

Principals, Knights Reprised

Hymn of the Cherubim, Pyotr Ilyich Tchaikovsky

Dark ambient music fills in between scenes as needed

FC = Full Company

PDD = Pas de Deux

PDT = Pas de Trois

SC = Selected Company
As spring draws near, the pace quickens for an angel and a saint - an art show, a ballet, and a talent show are all in the offing!

Life raced by for several days. The UltraViolet Ballet corps joined Thran, Charisse, and Luka in the ballroom for morning barre, followed by work on Immortal. Some days, as many as twenty or thirty dancers worked on the troll market scenes, embracing an exotic combination of urban, ethnic, and jazz styles as well as the traditional ballet. Ori remained in residence, working his soothing and organized magic on Irmo, and Círdan made an occasional appearance to discuss set design. Bard missed Rada more days than not, as the costumier was now back in his workshop to draw colored sketches of the Immortal costumes, gather fabric swatches, and make costume patterns. Abebe, UVB’s ballet master, became a fixture in the ballroom, freeing Thran from running the morning barre and other practices. Surprisingly, Irmo managed to smother the worst of his bad behavior, and with Ori’s help became much more collaborative. Three afternoons a week, Thran traveled to take his pointe instruction from Mme. Morgelle. He made good progress, and he and Irmo gradually introduced pointe work into Death’s courting dance with the Maid.

Bard made regular forays into the ballroom to sketch. It was exciting to capture the exotic combination of dancers on paper, and he helped Rada as the costumier asked. In addition, it was awe-inspiring to see Thran progress with his pointe work, and Bard loved the several sketches he did that featured the tall dancer on his toes.

Bard also resumed the reclamation work on the house. His children deserved a proper home, from Legolas who hadn’t had one before, to Tilda, Bain, and Sigrid who had endured their grotty apartment for so long without complaint. At the same time, something told him that Thran would soon be more in the eyes of the world, and Bard wanted to surround his husband with a beautiful house to match the acclaim. He dismantled the scaffolding in the ballroom and moved it into the central hallway to patch plaster gouges and dings, and to repair the damaged plaster in the ceiling. That ended up to be a bigger job than he liked, because a whole section crumbled under his ginger probing one morning, scattering debris over most of the floor. Thank the gods he’d moved Hope the Lope carefully into a corner of the main room before he’d started, or the plaster would have showered down on her. He ended up having to replaster a large section. Of course the woodwork needed stripping, which was a chore and a half. But the oak trim that emerged from under the layers of old paint was still in good shape, and seemed to glow with a bit of the same golden color that radiated from Hope. In a week of long days that stretched into nights, he’d repaired, primed, and painted the ceiling; stripped and sealed the oak trim; and painted the walls. After much deliberation, he’d chosen a pale grey-green paint that complemented the iron balustrades with their crystal globes; the oak bannisters, woodwork, and floor; and Hope’s golden patina. It would also match the slightly darker grey green that would finish the dining room walls, which were plainly visible from the hall.

When the last of the painting was done and the scaffolding was moved into the dining room, all the central hall lacked was a chandelier to cascade light down over Hope like a rainstorm. He found antique fixtures online, showed them to Thran, and ordered them. It’d take some time before they arrived, but already the hallway provided a beautiful welcome to visitors. He polished the oak newel posts and bannisters to a soft glow, shined the fluted crystal globes of the balustrade, and mopped the Once he finished the dining room and main room, he’d bring in a professional to refinish the floors, and no one would recognize the once shabby spaces.

The dining room took another several days, for it needed the same ceiling and wall repairs that the hallway had required. Thankfully, the central plaster medallion was in good shape, and he found a dilapidated chandelier at one of the salvage shops missing several of its crystal drops. Once Bard cleaned, repaired, rewired, and reassembled the bits, he added replacement crystals to fill in the gaps, and soon the fixture cast sparkles over his battered dining room table. The table was too small for the restored room, but it would do for now. As Bard wheeled the scaffolding into the main room, he looked forward to the day when Thran would offer himself as dessert in their reclaimed dining room.

March rolled around. The children continued to settle into school well, especially Legolas, who relished his classes as well as his new life with his extended family. Sigrid and Bard began their upholstery class. As the chairs she’d wanted to cover were basic, she finished the first one in the first class, then the other two during the week, because she wanted to help Bard with the fainting couch. The Majorelle blue velvet from the shop Rada had recommended was stunning, but it would take father and daughter working together to wrangle the plush fabric into the elegant smoothness that made the most of the fainting couch’s simple lines.

The ballroom was almost as busy during the evening as it was during the day, for the girls had their dances with Thran to work on. Sigrid was thrilled to be the eerie carnival spectre that drew the bemused Thran into her haunting waltz, so she and Thran quickly had their act in place. Tilda grew more and more confident each time she practiced getting Thran to flop over as the rag doll, so their act came along quickly, too. Sigrid found a simple costume pattern at the craft store to make bloomers, a top, and a conical hat for Thran’s doll costume, and she and Bard figured out how to make it on the old sewing machine. At Tilda’s request, they sewed immense pompoms down the front of the top and on the top of the hat. With a red nose and exaggerated makeup, Thran would make a ridiculously silly doll for Tilda to play with, which delighted the tall dancer no end. For his dance with Sigrid, Thran would wear only a simple Henley, jeans, and trainers, but he borrowed a small tutu and a tiara from the UVB costumes for Sigrid to wear with a leotard and tights for her circus costume.

To make sure that Legolas and Bain didn’t feel neglected during the girls’ efforts, Bard ran so many car races with them that he began to win regularly. In desperation, the boys introduced him to the zombie apocalypse game, and soon he was blasting away at decaying corpses with impunity. While it wasn’t his favorite form of entertainment, he came to enjoy it as the silly, guilty pleasure it was. When he finally got the best of Legolas and Bain at their favorite game, he enjoyed their howls of outrage even more.

Frodo Baggins visited several times with Bilbo to choose the sketches for Bard’s show. It would be the Saturday four weeks after the April Fool’s Follies – April thirtieth – and just before Bard’s birthday on May 2. The thirty sketches that the Bagginses ultimately chose were a mixture of pieces, but it gratified Bard that several of the mirror images went into the mix. Frodo’s eye for framing materials impressed Bard, for his works looked twice as good matted and framed as they did when they’d come out of his sketchbooks. As press releases and notices for the show appeared in the media and around the village, a fluttery sensation grew in Bard’s solar plexus, especially when he worked on Rahmiel, for he wanted to finish the clay model for his show. He was a working artist again!

As if the bustle of children, ballets, and art shows weren’t enough, Bard began his weekly volunteer stints at the Imladris Academy. At first, he was happy merely to help set out supplies for the classes, clean up, and help the teachers as they requested. He got to know Theodred Rohan, Tilda’s art teacher, and found him personable. The young man was popular with the young children because he was funny and patient, and the older children appreciated his calm demeanor, even as he challenged them to stretch the limits of their materials. As he and Bard chatted, Bard’s caricature experience drew special interest, as the teacher was trying to start a class in comic, manga, and graphic novel work, but hadn’t had much luck in making his case with the administration.

“There’s so much fantastic art out there in those areas,” Theodred explained to Bard. “So many people, not just the young, love them. A class would help a lot of young artists realize they’re legitimate fields, and instead of tagging buildings and semi trailers, they’d be pursuing degrees in art and putting their works in galleries and museums.”

“For what it’s worth, I think they’re great fields, too,” Bard shrugged as he carried a tray of paint back into the supply room to store. “Drawing caricatures paid a lot of my college tuition, and I still use that training every day – the dealing with people as much as the drawing.”

Theodred paused as he shuffled the bottles of paint from Bard’s tray to the shelves. “Could I prevail upon you to talk about that to my drawing students? About plying the craft fairs, and what skills you took from away from it that you use today?”

“Sure, if that’ll help. I’d be glad to.”

“Great, just great!” Theodred smiled. “I know they’d be interested, never mind the posturing. You know the age – every one of them wants to blend in, yet stand out, sometimes at the same time. They don’t know whether they’re coming or going, or even in which direction.”

“Oh, that changes as you grow up?” Bard teased.

“Only sometimes,” Theodred laughed in return. “By the way, I saw the sign in the Blue Mountain Coffee Shop about your gallery show. It’s in just a few weeks, isn’t it?”

Bard nodded, and resisted the urge to run his hand through his hair. “It is. The first one in a long time. I’m excited.”

“I can well imagine. So many of my students are excited about the April Fool’s Follies for the same reason. I’ve got several who plan to exhibit pieces, and more have offered something for the silent auction.”

“I’ve got a piece for that, too. You know, it’d be great if you could get an exhibit together from your manga-graffiti-graphic novel crew. I know it’s short notice, but it’d be a great example of why the class you want to teach would be a real asset to the school.”

Theodred gave up his semblance of fiddling with the paint bottles, and turned his full regard on Bard. “I have encouraged many of them to put in their work they do outside of class, but I didn’t think to turn it into a plea for the class. That might be just the thing to encourage more students to put their work into the show, as well as explain to Headmaster L’Eärendil about the kinds of artwork involved, and why it’s a worthy medium.”

Bard grinned. “A little not-so-subtle pleading, especially when accompanied by wide puppy eyes from earnest art students, never hurts. You could have a petition at the exhibit to ask people to show their support for your class, and if you get enough names, that might give you some leverage, too.”

“That’s another great idea,” Theodred nodded, smiling. “Maybe I could prevail upon you to talk to some of those students, too?”

“I’m game. Do you want me to just talk? I’m better with a sketchpad, so if I sketched while I talked, it would be easier for me, because I can show them what I mean.”
“I like that, too,” Theodred agreed. “Maybe next week?”

And so Bard soon found himself talking to a lot of art students. With his sketchbook in hand, he didn’t have to say so much, something he was too self-conscious to enjoy at any length. Drawing to illustrate his points was easier, because it urged the children to ask questions, and it was always easier to answer questions than to make a speech.

He was gratified when Theodred emailed him that night to tell him several students had committed to hosting what they’d dubbed an urban art booth for the Follies.

Bard’s visit with the art students turned out to be good practice, for Bilbo called the next day to ask him when he could film a short video segment about his show for both online and broadcast play. Bard swallowed his apprehension, even as he agreed to do the segment. He told the rest of the family at supper about the upcoming filming, which provoked much discussion.

“You’re going to be on TV?” Tilda asked, pausing as she sprinkled cheese on her taco.

“That’s what Bilbo says,” Bard said. Damn, he’d run a hand through his hair before he’d even realized it – always a dead giveaway of his self-consciousness. “He’s bringing some of my sketches that Frodo framed to show, too.”

“Cool,” was Sigrid’s pronouncement, as she smiled proudly at her father. “What are you going to wear?”

“What is he going to wear?” Bain repeated, raising his eyebrows. “Clothes, duh!”

Sigrid rolled her eyes at Bain. “Just because the sum total of your wardrobe is soccer jerseys, jeans, and trainers doesn’t mean everybody else’s is so limited.”

“Papa always takes a long time to get ready for such things,” Legolas said unexpectedly, drawing the regard of the other children to him. He shrugged. “It never looks like he does, but he does.”

“Of course I take a long time.” Thran took a deliberate bite of his taco and chewed slowly. He’d put a little weight back on his bones, so he didn’t look so emaciated, which meant his smile was more self satisfied and assured, rather than mere gallows-humor bravado. “I want to look just so, very calm, very elegant. Such things take care. It is hard to look elegant when my hair is not smooth, or a button is loose, or the color of my shirt does not match that of my pants.”

“I bet your buttons have never been awry, and you’ve never looked anything but elegant,” Sigrid observed tartly as she popped a cherry tomato into her mouth, but Bard smiled at the affection behind her words.

“Of course not, because I take the time,” Thran gestured wide with his hands, half amusement at Sigrid’s opinion and half wry comment on his vanity.

“Then you’d better be my wardrobe consultant,” Bard exhaled. “I’ve never been interviewed on camera before.”

“Papa has, lots of times,” Legolas said. “It’s not that terrible. I did one for my fencing two years ago. Not so bad.”

“When is it?” Tilda asked. “Can we watch it, too?”

“They’re going to record it during the day, when you’re at school. I have to go to the station, which isn’t far. Bilbo will be there, so it won’t be so bad.”
“Then you’ll be on TV?” Tilda asked.

“Not right then. They make a video of the interview, like the ones that you play on YouTube. Then they play it whenever they like.”

That satisfied the children, and the discussion had drifted to other topics, specifically the upcoming Follies. But after supper, when Bard settled on the sitting room sofa while the children did the dishes and began their homework, Thran brought in their tea and sat down beside him. As Bard leaned forward to take his cup, Thran’s long hand came to rest on his thigh and rubbed slowly.

“I could go with you for this interview, but only if you would like for me to,”

Bard put his hand atop Thran’s and squeezed gently. “It’s during the day, angel. You’ll be with the ballet. I don’t want to interrupt that.”

“If this is something you want to do alone, that is fine. But if you would like company, the ballet could do without me for an hour or two. It is your decision.”

“Bilbo will be with me, so I won’t be completely thrown to the wolves.”

“True. Whatever you are comfortable with.”

“I’ll need wardrobe advice, though.”

“You have nice things, all suitable. But I am at your disposal as you choose.”

“You’re the expert at these things, not me, so all advice cheerfully accepted. It’ll be good practice for you, anyway. You’ll be doing your own interviews for Immortal’s premiere before long.”

“So let us practice for what may become a more common event for both of us, my saint.”

Thran sat back to enjoy his tea with his usual aplomb, but while Bard was quiet, inside he wasn’t as calm as his husband. Drawing and sculpting and renovating a house were all so much easier than presenting a public face! But art promotion was a necessary evil of the business, so Bard resolved to see it through with as much grace as he could muster.

The day of the interview, after the children headed off to school, and Ori and Abebe arrived to take charge of the dancers. Bard’s appointment was at ten. He’d decided to take Thran with him for moral support, so Thran did his barre and yoga early, then marched both of them upstairs to the bedroom. Shaving, combing, grooming, more combing, more grooming... Thran was as exacting with Bard’s appearance as he was with his own, and while Bard thought his husband’s focus on hair, skin, and nails bordered on obsessive, he had to admit that the results were polished. In contrast, the actual dressing part of Thran’s routine took less than ten minutes. He felt comfortable in a grey-blue shirt over a soft blue tee shirt, and darker blue trousers. His brogues, grey coat, and blue scarf topped everything off. Thran looked his usual impeccable self in black silk tee, pale grey sweater, and black velvet jeans, but Bard would hold his own with his exotic husband.

“Make sure you take your sketchbook and pencils,” Thran reminded him.

“I’ll need them,” Bard grimaced. “I’ll sketch in the lobby or something while we’re waiting, to stay calm.”

“You could do a sketch of the host, too — a nice one. Perhaps that would impress her.”

“She’s been a big booster of the arts for a long time,” Bard explained as they headed for Bard’s truck. “Mavis Davis has been the arts reporter for both the local public television station and the village newspaper since before Daphne and I moved here, and she’s still at it. Her show’s called _Heartbeat of the Art Beat_. Rosie told me she’s been one of the biggest advocates for the art festival in July, where you’re hoping to premiere _Immortal_. Maybe after my bit, you can talk to her about your bit, and get her on the case.”

“That is a good idea,” Thran conceded. “If you do not mind, I will call Lettie and see if she has already talked to her, and if I should say something now, if the chance arises.”

“No, go ahead.”

“I will not press, whatever Lettie says. Today, the focus is on you and your gallery show, _lyubov moya_.”

“I’d just as soon divert a little of that focus, _cariad_, but I appreciate the thought.”

Bard drove while Thran talked briefly to Lettie. From the sound of it, Lettie was all in favor of Thran talking to Mavis Davis if the chance came up. Listening to Thran’s half of the conversation gave Bard something to draw his attention away from his impending interview. At least he didn’t have to worry about putting on airs. He was too down to earth for that – in fact, his biggest worry was that he’d be as boring as a corpse buried in that earth. He sighed. What would come would come, and soon it’d be over, and then he could get back to working on Rahmiel and the house. First Rahmiel – Rada had explained to him how to make the framework for wings to fit his model, and he’d had the idea to buy a package of turkey wings at the market to look at the musculature so he could see just how the anatomy worked. Now all he needed were feathers...

In a few minutes, he pulled into the parking lot of an innocuous one-story building faced with grey stone. The glassed entrance looked little different from the front of the UVB building – the only difference was the name on the door. Was it some sort of unwritten rule that the places that housed creative endeavors should all look so boring? That gave Bard something to smile about as he and Thran got out of the truck and paced up to the entrance. A man at the modern reception area alerted someone that they had arrived, and in a few minutes a smiling teenaged boy not much older than Sigrid appeared to lead them to a set dressed like a small library, with a pair of chairs arranged to the side of a fireplace. Bilbo and Frodo had preceded them, and had already set up a tabletop easel with one of Bard’s framed sketches on it between the two chairs. Bilbo spotted them, and came up with a warm smile and a wave.

“Good morning, Bard, and Thran, too! How are you this morning?”

“Well, thank you,” Bard replied, glad to see Bilbo’s welcoming face. As Thran greeted the artist’s rep, Bard waved to Frodo, who waved back before turning back to the technician helping him with the easel. “Already hard at work, I see.”

“Yes, indeed,” Bilbo beamed. “I’ve brought four of your sketches with me. The routine generally is that Mavis will chat you up a bit, then you’ll talk about your pieces, and they’ll finish with information about when and where your show is. It won’t take very long. No nerves, I hope?”

“Not unless I think about it,” Bard grinned. “Thran’s the media expert, not me.”

“You will do fine, _lyubov moya_,” Thran assured him with a wink at Bilbo. “Just be yourself, yes?”

“That’s exactly right,” Bilbo nodded vigorously. “Mavis will do most of the work for you. I’ve already talked to her about you and your work, and she’s looking forward to meeting you. Let’s get you in place.”
Bilbo led Bard and Thran forward, and one of the technicians waved Bard towards the leftmost chair, explaining something about lighting levels, so Bard handed his coat and scarf to Thran, and gingerly sat in the chair, sketchbook in hand. People came and went, and someone came forward to pin a small microphone to his shirt. Then he was left to himself, so he opened his sketchbook to draw Thran, Frodo, and Bilbo gathered together to talk. He did another one of one of the cameramen squinting into the eyepiece of his camera. And here came Mavis Davis herself, pausing to talk to Bilbo, Frodo, and Thran. She was in her seventies, with golden strawberry blonde hair styled in an attractive pouf and twinkling green eyes. Her clothing was stylish, a bright apple green tunic and slim black pants with black half boots, and a chunky clear crystal necklace and earrings added sparkle without overpowering her. She came over to shake Bard’s hand.

“Hi, Bard. I’m Mavis, and I’m very happy to meet you.”

“Likewise,” Bard got up to take her hand firmly. “I appreciate the interest.”

“You work offers a lot to be interested in,” she smiled appreciatively. “It’s a delight to draw more attention to such a talented local artist, but I’ve come to expect that of Shire Hills. They have a knack for finding top flight artists, over and over again.”

“They’re a joy to work with, both Bilbo and Frodo,” Bard agreed.

“So has anyone explained to you how this works?” Mavis asked, as she sat down in the other chair.

“I’m all ears,” Bard grinned.

“Pretty simple, really. I’ll introduce you, and ask you some general questions, then we’ll chat about the pieces you’ve brought, then we’ll talk about when and where your show is to wrap things up. It’ll seem like a long affair, but that’s so we can make several short spots, each one with the intro, a look at one of your pieces, and the show details. So don’t worry about the crew milling around during the whole process. You and I will just chat back and forth, and this herd of people running around will do their thing to make us look good. Right, Bella?”

Mavis winked at the young woman who came forward with Mavis’s microphone. Bella gave Bard a friendly nod as she fastened the microphone to Mavis’s collar. “Give Mavis the good stuff, Bard, and we’ll take care of the rest.”

“I’ll give it my all,” Bard promised.

“So while we’re waiting for the herd of turtles to get themselves in gear, can I see what you were drawing?” Mavis tilted her head to look down at Bard’s sketchbook. “Oh! That’s me talking to your husband and Bilbo and Frodo!”

Bard nodded as he turned the pad around to show her the picture right-side up. “I liked the energy of the conversation, so away I went.”

“Just that fast?” Mavis marveled.

“Sure. It’s all about being in the moment to catch people in the moment – to capture something spontaneous,” Bard said, turning the book around and turning to a fresh page. “I imagine that’s what it’s like to do an interview like this one, too – you look for something unstudied that captures the essence of the person you’re talking to.”

“Exactly right!” Mavis nodded understandingly. “I understand you came to that technique in art school?”
Bard grinned as he sketched. “I did. It’s a cliché about starving artists, but in my case, it wasn’t far from the truth. I worked as a caricature artist at a lot of art fairs to pay for my tuition. I learned to chat a bit, to help people relax, and get them talking, and pretty soon they forgot about me sketching, and then I’d pick out something distinctive that I could draw.”

He turned his sketchpad around to show the quick line drawing he’d done of Mavis, leaning forward in the comfortable wing chair, one elbow on the chair arm and her chin resting on her fingers as she listened to Bard with an alert smile on her face. He’d suggested her elegant clothing and jewelry with a few emphatic lines, and the artful fall of her hair with lighter ones. He’d completed the sketch to show one leg crossed over the other and the small heels on her boots.

“That is amazing!” Mavis gaped. “That must’ve taken you all of two minutes, and it’s stunning!” Bard hoped his face wasn’t as red as it felt, but he managed a small smile and nod. “Thank you.”

“You’re very welcome. Is that typical of how fast you work?”

“Only for quick studies. Most other things take longer.”

“I would imagine that would be true of a piece like this one,” Mavis gestured to the picture on the easel, which was the very detailed study of Thran’s hand in the ballet position he so liked.

“That one took much longer, yes,” Bard nodded. He talked a little bit about that one, and why he liked to do such detailed ones, though it was so different from his usual style. A technician came into the set to exchange the hand picture for one of the mirror image ones, and he and Mavis talked a bit about that one and the different versions of reality it reflected as well as the viewer’s own impressions. That picture was replaced with one he’d sketched of Charisse in the ballroom, standing at ease with her hands on her hips, laughing. The final one showed Legolas and Tilda reading together on the sofa.

“How do you choose your subjects, Bard?”

He looked blank. “The problem is generally which one thing to draw out of so many. There’s something interesting going on just about everywhere you look. I never have any lack of things to draw.”

“You don’t just draw, though – you’re also a sculptor in metal?”

“I am. That’s the medium I concentrated on during my formal training – iron and bronze, for the most part. Some of them have mechanisms for movement, because I like the challenge of making the heavy metal look as light as possible.”

“Will you have any examples of your sculpture at your show?”

“I will have a few finished pieces, yes, as well as a look at the clay model for the piece I’m working on now. It’s called Rahmiel, who is the angel of love and mercy. It’ll ultimately mix metal with textiles, so I’m excited about that.”

“So let’s remind our viewers when and where they’ll get a chance to take a closer look at all these wonderful pieces.”

“It’ll be April thirtieth at the Ilithien Gallery at 13 East Galway Place, from six to nine in the evening.”

“Excellent! Thank you for sharing some of your artwork with me today, Bard.” Mavis looked away from Bard towards the camera setup. “I’ve been chatting with Bard Bowman today, who’ll display several examples of his work on April thirtieth at the Ilithien Gallery in Greenwood Dale on the Lake. If you’d like more information about Bard’s show on April thirtieth, please call the Ilithien Gallery at 555-555-5555. It’s sure to be an exciting event, so don’t miss the chance to see Bard’s wonderful pieces up close, and talk to the artist himself. I hope to see you all there. Until next time, I’m Mavis Davis for Heartbeat of the Art Beat. Thanks for joining us.”

“Cut,” a voice sounded from behind the camera.

Bard’s jaw dropped. “Have you been filming the whole time?”

Mavis gave him a mischievous smile. “Pretty much. You were so natural, it was too good of an opportunity to waste, and we got almost everything we needed in one take. You would’ve been much more nervous if I’d told you, right?”

“Oh, you’ve got that right,” Bard wrung a hand over his mouth, but he was smiling. “That was sneaky.”

“I’m pretty good at catching people in the moment, too,” she shrugged. “Forgive me?”

“I’m more liable to thank you,” Bard exhaled. “This is not my favorite part of being an artist.”

“A lot of artists feel the same way. You did great, by the way, so the only part you’ll have to do knowing the camera’s on is the introduction. Ready for that?”

Bard gave Mavis a smile. “Sure. Whenever you’re ready.”

That was much easier than Bard expected, just Mavis introducing herself as the host of Heartbeat of the Art Beat, and then Bard. For that part, all he had to do was smile at Mavis, then say hello and how glad he was to be here.

“I’m here talking with Bard Bowman, a wonderful artist and sculptor, whose work will be featured on April thirtieth in the Ilithien Gallery in Greenwood Dale on the Lake. Bard, what can you tell us about the pieces you’ll have on display at the gallery?”

“The focus will be on my sketches, most of them in pencil, but a few in charcoal.”

“What’s your preferred subject to sketch? Landscapes, seascapes, animals, people, or something else?”

“People are my favorite subjects to draw, hands down. Sometimes it’s just the way someone moves, or how two people laugh when they share a joke, or maybe it’s the winner of a race rejoicing while the loser despairs. There’s never a lack of moments to capture in a sketch.”

“Why did you choose to draw in pencil rather than say, pastels, or chalk?”

“It’s a lot easier to work in pencil most of the time, especially when I have to work fast to capture the moment that catches my eye. Charcoal, pastels, and chalk let you do a lot with color, and I like them for impressionistic works. But they’re not so easy for me to carry around. I’ve always got a pencil to hand and paper, so they work well in more situations for me.” He flipped his pencil up with a smile. “Now’s no exception.”

There was a bit more banter, but before long the lights dimmed. Even though Bard was more relaxed than he had been when he first sat down, he was relieved that the session was over. Mavis patted his hand.
“Not so bad, was it?”

“No,” Bard agreed with a sheepish smile. “But that was entirely due to you. Thanks for going easy on me.”

“I enjoyed chatting with you. And expect me at your show, Bard. I’m anxious to see more of your sketches, and the sculpture that mixes the metal with textiles sounds quite intriguing.”

“I hope it will be,” he nodded, as Bella came forward to remove the microphone from his collar. “I donated a piece to the April Fool’s Follies coming up. My children attend school there, so I hope you do a piece about the show to get out the visitors to help the school. My husband’s dancing in the talent show, too.”

“Yes, I’ve done a couple of pieces on the Follies already, and I’ve made mention of your husband’s intention to dance.” Mavis looked at him expectantly. “The rumor is that he’s working on a new ballet. What can you tell me about it?”

Bard grinned. “I can tell you that I think it’ll be the most amazing ballet I’ve ever seen, but as I’ve never seen a ballet before, that might not be the most ringing endorsement it could be. But it will be stunning, even to someone who’s seen fifty ballets before this one. Why don’t you ask Thran about it? He won’t mind.”

“He won’t?”

“Sure. You can have an exclusive,” Bard prodded. “Come on.”

Bard headed to Thran’s side, glad to divert focus away from himself. Thran was more at home with such things, and he was his usual courteous self as Mavis asked him about the ballet. He wasn’t surprised when Thran quickly ended up in the chair he’d just vacated to chat about Immortal. Far from feeling upstaged, Bard was happy to watch his elegant husband finesse his way through Mavis’s questions with charm and humor.

After Mavis’s profuse thanks, Bard and Thran helped Frodo and Bilbo carry Bard’s sketches to Bilbo’s car. Bard made sure he thanked both of the Bagginses for setting up his interview just as profusely as the reporter had thanked him.

“You did an excellent job, my boy!” was Bilbo’s pronouncement. “That’ll get a fair amount of airplay, I’m sure. Brilliant move on your part, to sketch Mavis like that!”

“I’m glad it turned out so well,” Bard confessed. “Thanks again, Bilbo. And Frodo, the framing’s brilliant on every piece.”

“Thanks, Bard. I can’t wait to see them on the gallery walls, all together,” Bilbo’s young nephew replied.

“Neither can I. Won’t be long, though,” Bilbo waved as he and Frodo got into his car. “See you soon, both of you!”

Thran and Bard waved back as Bilbo piloted his small car out of the parking lot and away. As Thran got into the truck and fastened his seatbelt, he chuckled.

“What’s so funny? Other than me being interviewed?” Bard teased.

“You did very well, my saint. And Bilbo was right – to draw the reporter was brilliant. You were very fast, and the sketch was very magical, as so many of your pieces are.”
“I never would have had the nerve to do that if I’d known the camera was on.”

Thran’s smile was smug. “I know. That is why I told them not to tell you.”

Bard skewered Thran with a surprised stare, but quickly focused on the road as they left the station parking lot. “You told them?”

“Oh, Bilbo and Frodo agreed, so I suppose I cannot take all of the blame – or credit, however you choose to look at it.”

“Mavis said she decided not to tell me.”

“She decided so only because the three of us told her that would make for a better interview. You were most natural, and assured. I am very proud of you for doing such a good job.”

Bard snorted. “A good job because of ignorance, it was.”

“A good job all the same.”

“Thank the gods I got to go first. If I’d had to follow your interview, it would have been anticlimactic. You knew the camera was on, but you were natural and assured and elegant anyway.”

“Perhaps so. But I did not do magic. You did, with your sketch of Mavis. People will be eager to see more of you and your work.”

Thran put out a hand to squeeze Bard’s thigh. “Be sure, lyubov moya. Your turn comes. I am sure of it.”

The conviction in Thran’s voice was firm and unruffled. Bard didn’t look away from the road, but he smiled.

He really was married to an angel.
Chapter 88

Chapter Summary

An angel and a saint may not be able to christen their most recently restored rooms, but they manage to find other ways to indulge. Then it's on to rehearsals for the April Fool's Follies.

Is a little angst in store?

“I owe you an apology, lyubov moya,” Thran said that night as they stood in the bathroom. He had just finished drying his hair, and his husband had gotten out of the shower to towel himself briskly.

“What for?” Bard paused in his rubbing to give him a mystified look.

“You have beautifully transformed both the central hall and the dining room, and we have not christened either of them yet.”

“And why is that your fault, and not the whirlwind of stuff that’s taking our time? Ballets, art shows, dancing acts, interview taping – gods, it’s a wonder either of us have time to breathe.”

“And all the beautiful restoration work you do. That takes time, too. Perhaps we do not have the time to breathe, but I still want you to know that I notice these beautiful things you do, and marvel at how everything blossoms about us. The children are happy, we are happy, and all is well.”

“So what is there for you to apologize for, then?” Bard put the towel over his head and continued his vigorous rubbing. “Sounds to me like everything’s fine.”

“Everything is fine. Everything is more than fine. But that does not mean that I am sorry we have not had the chance to fuck ourselves blind – oh, so sorry, ‘christen’ the two new spaces you have reclaimed for us.”

Bard snorted with laughter and threw his towel at Thran, who ducked it, then caught it before it hit the floor. “After spending all day in constant motion, how you manage to muster even the thought of fucking anyone anywhere is beyond me.”

“Is it?” Thran hung Bard’s wet towel up on its rack and turned a disappointed face on Bard. “The tragedy of the day. Je suis désolé.”

“Je suis désolé. I am desolate,” Bard translated, as Thran took his arm to draw him into range of the hair dryer. As Thran urged Bard to sit on the stool, then directed the warm air over Bard’s hair, his husband hummed in appreciation. “Are you?”

“Entirely.”

Bard looked up at him through his tousled locks, offering Thran his favorite come-hither smile. Thran bit his lip as he wielded the hair dryer, easing his fingers through Bard’s hair as he dried it. Bard closed his eyes to deepen his enjoyment of Thran’s attentions, humming again as Thran caught one of his earrings to pull gently. It took little time to dry Bard’s hair, but Thran lingered over it, enjoying the chance to please his husband. Bard worked so hard without complaint, simply because he enjoyed making his family happy, and he did so without thought of reward. But after what had happened when Thran had fallen asleep in the UVB studio, Thran would not neglect to tell his husband how cherished he was. How easy it was to offer a little pampering with a hair dryer and his fingers, and how good it was to hear Bard’s hum of enjoyment, see him relax, feel the hand that took his, then savor the lips that graced his fingers with a soft kiss.

“Maybe I can offer to ease your desolation, angel.”

Oh, that caressing note in Bard’s voice sent a flutter through Thran faster than he expected. As Bard got to his feet and eased Thran into an embrace, Thran traced a finger down Bard’s cheek, smiling when Bard nipped at it. “It is I who wants to offer you something, lyubov moyya. A small reminder of how much I love you, and appreciate all you do for the children and me. You make such a beautiful home for us, such good food, such a graceful life. You are zoloto moyo.”

Thran threaded his fingers through the hair at the back of Bard’s neck, cradling his head as he bent to kiss Bard’s lips. Bard leaned into the caress, his hands tracing down Thran’s back to cradle his buttocks and massage gently. “Mmm. You spoil me.”

“I want to spoil you rotten. You deserve nothing less. So savor. Savor all I give you.”

Thran traced his lips down Bard’s throat, across his pectorals, so enticingly firm from all the chin-ups Bard had taken to doing in the barn every day. Maybe his husband did them in preparation to work metal again, but the swell of muscles across shoulder and chest was a delicious enticement regardless of why it had come to be. He got a gasp out of Bard when he licked first one nipple, then the other; the sound was so charged that Thran sank to his knees, dragging his lips down Bard’s torso until he engulfed Bard’s cock in his mouth. It wasn’t soft for long, rising hard and fast under Thran’s attention. He’d positioned them carefully so that Bard had a full profile view of them both in the floor-length mirror on the far wall of the bathroom, as well as a front-on view in the mirror before him of Thran’s long hair and back as he offered his attentions. For the few seconds it took before Bard’s cock hardened into more than Thran could take in his mouth, he stroked legs, back, groins, and abs as Bard’s soft moans guided him. Then his hands came into play, teasing and tickling the shaft of Bard’s substantial cock, until Bard could not keep himself from thrusting into Thran’s mouth. Thran cradled Bard’s balls gently in one hand, and tightened the other around Bard’s shaft while he teased the head of Bard’s cock with his lips and tongue.

“So good, so good...” Bard whispered, stroking Thran’s hair with distracted fingers. “Gods, angel, I’m lost, I’m so lost...”

“I have you safe, my saint,” Thran whispered. “Come home to me. Come now.”

“I’m coming, coming, oh, gods –”

Bard’s hips flexed, thrusting back into Thran’s mouth. Thran took all he could, wrapping an arm around Bard’s hips to steady them as Bard spasmed hard. Thran swallowed quickly as he carried Bard over the edge and into oblivion, holding his lover firmly until he was back in control of his body, then sucked all of Bard’s spent cock into his mouth to caress it. He let it slide out when Bard trembled against him, then he rose to take Bard in his arms and rub his back slowly.

“Zoloto moyo,” Thran repeated, pressing a kiss against Bard’s hair. “Velikoye zoloto moyo.”

Strong arms wound around him. One hand caressed his buttock as the other stroked down Thran’s spine. “Gods, you bastard, do you know how erotic it is, to watch the world’s premiere dancer kneel in front of me and suck my cock like a common bath slave?”
Thran grinned. “Tell me.”

“Too erotic for me to be satisfied with just a blow job. You planned that, didn’t you?”

“Still hungry, then, my saint?”

“You’ve only whetted my appetite. A mouth like yours makes me want to fuck the rest of you.”

Thran’s cock twitched in feral response. He growled low in his throat and bit where Bard’s shoulder met his neck, hard enough that Bard jumped. “Fuck me like a slave if it pleases you, but I will not be a common one.”

Bard wound a hand in Thran’s hair, pulling him into a kiss. “Oh? What kind will you be?”

Thran growled again as he cupped Bard’s balls and bit Bard’s lips. When Bard swallowed a curse, Thran grinned and backed out of the bathroom. He got the lubricant out of the drawer of his nightside table, and perched on the end of the bed on his heels. He slicked his hands, arched his back as he caressed himself with his lubricated hands, then looked over his shoulder at Bard as he prowled after Thran. “One worth fucking. Well trained to delight you in a thousand ways. What would you like to do to me? Or would you prefer to watch me fuck myself?”

Thran shut his eyes as he stroked himself, teased his opening with his fingers, thinking of how he’d used his mouth to bring Bard to release. If Bard was content to watch him, then so be it. He was shameless enough to finish himself – no, Bard took his hands.

“If my slave needs a fucking, far be it from me to deny him. I’m a generous master when it comes to gratifying those kind of needs.”

“Most generous,” Thran breathed, as Bard rubbed Thran’s lubricated hand over Bard’s cock until it was well oiled. Then Bard tossed a towel between Thran’s knees.

“Wipe your hands. I won’t have you taking yourself. That’s my privilege.”

Thran cleaned the lubricant off his hands quickly. As soon as he put the towel aside, Bard pushed him onto his hands and knees and slid inside him, drawing a gasp from Thran. Gods, all inhibitions melted as Bard filled him so completely. Hands dug into his groins to pull his hips back tightly against Bard’s thighs, thighs that shifted from side to side to more deeply seat the cock within him. The scrape of skin and hair against Thran’s glutes sent waves of pleasure through him, so much that he arched his back sharply, dropping to his elbows to intensify the stretch. Yes, gods, yes, that was the rhythm that consumed him, such a seductively slow pull out, then the faster, more staccato stutter stroke in. He flexed and bowed in time to Bard’s thrusts, moaning softly on each stroke in, sighing on each stroke out.

“You’re right,” Bard whispered, pulling Thran’s hips back even farther so that he could stroke faster. “You’re far from common. Tight, warm, soft... so pretty on your knees with all that beautiful hair in disarray... a rare treat, indeed...”

“I’m anything you want,” Thran whispered, shutting his eyes and reveling in every sensation. “Anything.”

Bard muscled him forward towards the pillows, them pressed him down until his chest was against the mattress and his back was hard against Bard’s chest. Wrapping arms around Thran’s hips, Bard pulled them tightly together, keeping his prize close. He pressed his knees out against Thran’s thighs to splay him wider, then with a grunt of satisfaction, pushed in deeper, sending a tremor through Thran as he sank lower. Gods, he was stretched so wide, nothing but an open vessel for whatever
Bard chose to give him. What little movement he could make only drove Bard more deeply into him, and the extreme splay of his legs made each twitch and spasm that much more intense.

“Give me your wrists.”

Thran twisted his arms behind him. Bard coiled his long white hair into a rope, crossed Thran’s wrists, then wound his hair around his wrists, further deepening the arch in his back and neck. That put his opening at the perfect angle for Bard to work him hard. With his wrists bound in his hair, Than could only gasp when Bard’s hands snaked underneath him, one to cradle his balls, the other to take his cock in hand and stroke so rapidly that his whole body shuddered. The cock sliding in and out of him fell into the same rapid rhythm. Bared teeth grabbed him at the juncture of shoulder and neck, and rough breathing was harsh and feral in his ears. His body erupted all at once, but he was too pinned to buck against the weight atop him. His orgasm rose even higher when Bard spasmed atop him. He lay unresisting as Bard reached his peak, then quieted.

“Had enough?” Bard growled, holding him pinned beneath him.

“Mmm,” Thran grinned, savoring the last vestiges of his release. “Have you?”

“I should be ashamed of myself, the way I let you get under my skin.”

“I prefer you shameless. You are so delicious that way.”

Bard eased out, and carefully unwound Thran’s long hair from his wrists. As Thran eased back onto his knees, Bard pitched him the towel so they could mop up the sheets, then leaned in for a kiss.

“Look who’s talking. You don’t know the meaning of shame.”

“But I do know the meaning of delicious,” Thran purred, kissing back. “I trust you are well sated, my saint.”

“Gods, yes. Come on, we’re both trashed. A quick rinse, then bed.”

In a few minutes, Thran snuggled under the covers with his husband, luxuriating as the sheets warmed around him. “So good, to be so warm.”

Chuckling, Bard stroked Thran’s hip. “You’ll be reincarnated as a cat some day, content to look elegant as you bask in the sunshine.”

“Perhaps so. You... I cannot think of an animal that fits you well. So you will have to be reincarnated as a saint again. For you are very much so.”

“Then you’ll have to be an angel, so I can find you again. I can’t wait to see you with wings.”

This time, it was Thran who chuckled. “You make turkey wings for Rahmiel. I hope it will look better than that sounds.”

“I’m just trying to sort out how the bones go together, and how the feathers attach. I want it to look as natural as possible. Rahmiel’s wings will be more elongated, so they look like they’d actually bear his weight.”

“How will you make them? Will you fashion bones in some way?”

“I’ll use a wire armature, just as what’s inside the clay, then I’ll start padding it with something, something that will hold a rigid shape, then put a stiff cloth covering on top – maybe buckram – to hold the feathers. That’ll be the hard part, to get them to line up correctly. Rada’s offered to find a place that sells feathers for such things for me. I hope he’ll have some names of places tomorrow.”

I cannot wait to see Rahmiel in his glory. He is already beautiful.”

“So is a certain dancer when he’s on his toes. I hope that’s not stressing you too much, the pointe work. It looks amazing.”

“It is a paradox,” Thran mused. “It is hard, and painful, but I am careful. At the same time, it is the most indescribably light feeling, even when my feet hurt. At moments, I feel very centered, like a meditation. Though I am glad that I must do only a few minutes of it during a performance. It is tiring because it takes so much control.”

“We’d better get to sleep, then, so you’re fresh for tomorrow. More dancing in the ballroom, I assume.”

Thran rumbled an assent. “And for you?”

“Rahmiel’s wings, mostly. The tea paper for the half bath, now that the dining room’s done. The floor tiles won’t be here for another bit, so I could start on the main room or the solarium. If it’s the main room, though, you have a decision to make.”

“The main room needs a fireplace mantel. That’s your room to arrange, if you want to. So think about what kind of mantel you’d like. We need to know what it’ll look like before I paint and such.”

“Have you had any ideas?”

“The room has an eastern exposure, so it’ll get morning light. You could go for a nice wood one, either natural or painted, or stone, or marble. It’s not as big a fireplace as what’s in the ballroom, but it’ll still be a pricey piece. We can look at the salvage shops again and on line to see what strikes your fancy.”

“We will look. When will you work on the solarium? I thought we decided you would work on the solarium after the half bath, but then you did the hall and dining room...”

“We’re starting to have more people troop in and out. I wanted the public areas to look better.”

“Ah,” Thran acknowledged. “They do not merely look better. They look beautiful. But if we must wait for a mantel and floor tile and chandeliers, then no one will fault you if you work on our solarium paradise. That will be a wonderful sanctuary for all of us.”

“That one will be fun,” Bard agreed. “It’ll all get done eventually, even the sitting room. I’d done some research, and I think the paneling in there is pecan. If I can get it cleaned up, then it’ll look amazing, especially with the rug.”

Thran hummed appreciatively. “The entire house will look wonderful. But I will not let you do the outside painting yourself. Or the windows. Or the millions of doors that need so much paint stripped. Those, my saint, we will hire others to do.”

“That’s the best Christmas present anyone could ever give me,” Bard nuzzled a kiss into Thran’s hair.

Thran pressed a kiss against Bard’s chest. “You are an easy man to please.”
“When it comes to letting someone else strip paint, yes, I am.” Another kiss fell on the top of his head. “When it comes to loving an angel, I am, too.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya,” Thran whispered. “Spokojnoy nochiu.”

Bard snuggled closer to Thran with a sigh. “Garu di, angel. Cysgu yn dda.”

* * *

The last week of March, the one preceding the Follies, was hectic. The girls practiced their dances with Thran for the Follies, so much so that Bard worried about the toll it took on his husband, who spent all day with UVB working on Immortal. But no matter how tired Thran was after the UVB company went home, he still found a smile for the girls each time they circled the ballroom. Sigrid’s dance was the easiest, as it was mostly waltzing, with only a little acting. Tilda’s took more rehearsal, but the little girl stuck to it without complaint.

There were enough acts for the Follies talent show that rehearsals would stretch over the four days before the show. Each act would attend two rehearsals, so Thran made arrangements to be home early for the Thursday and Friday slots they’d been assigned. The first rehearsal would be just a technical run through to make sure lighting and music were properly set up for each act, but the second would be a full dress rehearsal, just as if it were a professional production. Both of the girls were excited about finally getting to wear their costumes, even though both of them had worn them several times to practice in the ballroom.

While the boys were not performing, they were both excited about the show for a different reason – all of the teachers had suspended homework for the week, because so many children were either in the show, working as crew for the show, or setting up exhibits for the show. This was the Imladris Academy’s biggest fundraiser of the year, and the teachers did their part to help make it a success.

On Thursday night, Clan Ffyrnig’s supper was beef pot roast and vegetables that had simmered most of the afternoon, so it was quick to eat and quick to clean up. As Bard took charge of the CDs of the girls’ music, he noted Thran’s anticipation as they put on coats and piled into Thran’s SUV to head to the school. This was the first time he’d seen Thran in rehearsal for a performance, and there was a noticeable change in his husband’s bearing. He was calm, but clearly excited, even for a school production, and his carriage was alert and aware. Sigrid pointed to the auditorium so that Thran knew where to park, then they headed into the school.

“There’s the check-in table,” Sigrid pointed, and led the way with Thran. Bard followed with Tilda, and the boys brought up the rear.

“Hi, Sigrid!” A smiling girl in a bright turquoise hijab and long sleeved turquoise and white kurta waved to them. “Are you here for the rehearsal with your retinue?”

Sigrid laughed at the mischievous grin dimpling across the girl’s face. “Hi, Zuhayra! Yes, Clan Ffyrnig’s here in force tonight – this is my Ada, Thran Oropherson; my Da, Bard Bowman; my sister, Tilda; and my brothers, Bain and Legolas. Are you singing tonight?”

The girl shook her head as she checked them off her list. “I did my stint Tuesday and Wednesday, thank goodness. Tonight and tomorrow, I get to watch the fun, not be the fun. I can’t wait to see your dance!”
“My sister’s got a dance, too,” Sigrid pointed to Tilda. “Right, Til?”

Tilda came beside her sister. “Mine is the cute one, and Sigrid’s is the eerie one.”

“I can’t wait to see them,” Zuhayra gave Tilda a thumbs-up, then pointed them to the auditorium doors. “Tell Jason and Esme down near the stage that you’re here, then take a seat. And break a leg, both of you!”

“Thanks, Zuhayra,” Sigrid laughed, as the group moved ahead.

“She wants me to break my leg?” Tilda looked up at Thran with a frown. “That wasn’t very nice!”

“She did not mean for you to really break your leg, Kukla,” Thran assured her. “That is only the way people in the theatre wish each other good luck. So she offered you a wish for a good performance.”

“Oh,” Tilda looked relieved. “So it wasn’t bad, but good.”

“Exactly,” Thran gave her a smile. “Come, let us find this Jason and Esme.”

“The boys and I’ll find seats for us,” Bard offered, as Thran went down with the girls towards the stage. “Oh, wait – your CDs!”

Bard trotted after his husband, passed him the CDs with the music for both dances, then headed back to the boys. “Let’s find some seats. Do you want to pick?”

“How about ten rows back?” Legolas suggested, pointing. “That’s close enough to see their faces, and far enough away to that we don’t get sore necks looking up so much.”

“The voice of experience,” Bain grinned, and he and Legolas scrambled down the aisle to choose just the right seats. By the time the boys found six in the middle of a row that suited them, Thran and the girls came back up the aisle to join them.

“So what’s the plan?” Bard asked.

“A lot of sitting and waiting out here for you and the boys,” Sigrid replied, smiling. “We get to go lurk in the back hallway, because Ada has to warm up for Tilda’s dance. They’re going to do our acts one after the other – first mine, then Til’s.”

“I’ll stay with the lads, then, until after you and Thran are done,” Bard decided. “Then I’ll come up to help move your doll, Til.”

Tilda nodded. “Please do, because I can’t move him myself!”

Bard ruffled Tilda’s hair. “I’ll get him out on stage, and be there to do my bit at the end. The rest of the doll posing is up to you.”

Tilda clapped her hands gleefully. “Goodie!”

“We will go warm up,” Thran winked at Bard at Tilda’s enthusiasm. “We will see you shortly. Come, mes petites.”

Thran and the girls headed back to the entrance of the auditorium, so Bard and the boys settled into their seats. The boys had brought books to read, and Bard had brought his sketchbook and pencils, so they all had things to occupy them through the first half hour or so of acts. There were a lot of singers, a clever acrobat act with two sisters, and several musicians. Killian was one of the latter, teaming up with a guitarist to fiddle a couple of Irish reels. He waved at Bard and the boys as he came off the stage, heading over to sit with them for a few minutes. When they heard about the dances Sigrid and Tilda were doing, the boys sat down to chat until the girls appeared. Bard got a good sketch of the four of them, Killian leaning over the back of the seat in front of Bain to laugh at something. A couple of acts followed, then the announcer called for Sigrid and Thran to take their turn.

“On stage now, Sigrid Bowman and Thran Oropherson, with Midnight at the Carnival. On deck, Tilda Bowman and Thran Oropherson, with The Doll."

The stage darkened, then a single spotlight appeared. Thran walked into it. The spotlight followed him as he walked about the stage looking around, his hands in the back pocket of his jeans. A second spotlight appeared. There was Sigrid, tiara in place and tutu over her leggings, posed with one hand on her hip, the other upraised as if she were a circus acrobat or trapeze flyer making her entrance.
Thran mimed startlement, as Sigrid walked around him, smiling and posing, then she raised her arms.
As her hands fell, the eerie Carnival of Souls waltz began, startling Thran a second time. Sigrid circled him again, this time dancing, inviting him to join her. Drawn into her spell, Thran joined her to waltz arm in arm around the stage. In one section, they danced side by side; in another, Sigrid flitted aside, teasing, then Thran spectacularly flung himself into the air after her, whirling with such abandon that his feet arched back to nearly touch his head. There were a pair of lifts, both prettily done, and another round of straight waltzing around and around until Sigrid spun out of his arms, blew him a kiss, and disappeared. The dance ended with the strains of the waltz dying away, and abandoned Thran looking after Sigrid with arms outstretched.

Enthusiastic applause greeted the end of the dance, and Sigrid reappeared with a big grin on her face.
Her grin grew wider when Thran offered her the bow he offered his ballerina costars, and she curtseied back before they came forward to answer a question about the lighting and when to cue the music.

“That was terrific, sweetness!” Bard beamed at her, as he came onstage to help Thran and Tilda with their dance. “Just wonderful!”

“Thanks, Da!” Sigrid returned Bard’s hug enthusiastically. “That was so much fun!”

“It looked like it. You were so good!”

“I could get used to that kind of thing,” she confessed. “Now it’s your turn to break a leg!”

“I’ll do my best to provide clueless comic relief,” Bard winked, as the announcer called for Tilda and Thran.

He jogged into the wings with Sigrid to join Thran and Tilda. His husband had his clown nose on, and he’d stripped off his jeans to reveal his tights. He pulled on a pair of leggings that would allow him to slide easily over the wood floor, and exchanged his trainers for ballet slippers. Sigrid helped Tilda put on the big hair bow that was part of her costume, then collected Thran’s jeans and trainers.

“Ready, Russkaya Kukla?” Thran asked.

“Ready!” Tilda nodded firmly. “I should go hide behind the center curtain, shouldn’t I?”

“Yes. I will tell them where to put the spotlight. Remember not to look right at it, because it is very bright, and then you will not be able to see.”

“I remember. Okay, Da? Time to carry the doll out.” Tilda gave him a big smile, and scampered off to take her place.
“Good luck!” Sigrid called after her, as Thran walked out onto the stage.

“The center light goes there,” he called to the lighting operators, pointing to where Tilda stood by the curtain. “Then Bard and I will come from stage left. The music does not start until Tilda tells you, yes?”

A wave signaled that Thran’s instructions had registered, so Thran waved back and rejoined Bard and Sigrid in the wing.

“You and Sigrid were great,” Bard offered.

“Thank you, lyubov moya,” Thran smiled at Sigrid. “Our lioness makes a good ghost indeed. Now, it is Kukla’s turn to shine.”

The spotlight appeared at the center of the back curtain. “Now, Kukla!” Thran called, and Tilda’s head appeared, looking out from behind the curtain first right, then left. “Now we go,” Thran prompted Bard, taking his stance. Bard hefted him around the waist, and carried Thran out onto the stage. Tilda disappeared behind the curtain, then peeked out as Bard set Thran down, brushed him off, adjusted an arm, tilted his head, then stood back to admire his work. He gave a nod, then headed offstage. After a second, where Thran stood there stiffly, Tilda crept out to consider this strange doll. She gave it a poke, without reaction, then turned to the techs.

“Start the music, please,” she called calmly, drawing smiles. When Valse Pour Jeanette began, she and Thran began the battle of wits between small girl and large doll. Bard had seen Tilda and Thran practice this many times, but to see it for the first time on the stage was exciting. Thran’s flexibility was amazing enough, but Tilda held her own through sheer persistence and cuteness. He was so busy admiring them that he almost missed his cue when a crash interrupted the music. Thran and Tilda scrambled to mimic the sweeping up of broken bits, then get Thran back into his opening pose just as Bard stamped out, his hands on his hips. He pointed to the doll standing a bit crookedly, then at Tilda, who shook her head vigorously. Behind Bard’s back, Thran surreptitiously straightened, drawing Bard’s suspicious notice. He circled around to pointed at the doll again, then Tilda again. Tilda shook her head even more vigorously, so Bard shrugged, and walked offstage, mimicking confusion. Behind him, Thran and Tilda mimed uproarious laughter that they’d put one over on the doll maker, then they circled the stage together twice in a silly little dance, then collapsed into a heap.

This dance met with enthusiastic applause, too, led by Sigrid and Bard in the wings, and her brothers and their friends in the seats. As Thran went to answer the tech’s questions at the front of the stage, Sigrid put a hand on Bard’s arm.

“Tilda and I have to get our bag, then we’ll come around to the seats,” his eldest daughter said. At Bard’s acknowledgement, she and Tilda disappeared backstage, so Bard headed downstage to join Thran. Once Thran had answered the tech’s questions about lights and music, he and Bard left the stage to rejoin the boys.

“That was cool!” Bain heralded, as they approached. “Boy, Da, Thran and Tilda sure got the drop on you!”

“They were supposed to,” Bard laughed. “A fine job they did of it, too.”

“Hi, Thran!” Kíllian waved. “That was amazing!”

“Thank you, Kíllian,” Thran waved. “I enjoyed the music you and your friend played, too.”

“Thanks! This is my mate, Derry. This is the first time we’ve done anything for the Follies, so we’re pretty pleased at how well it went.”

“Sounded like the old country,” Bard offered. “Nicely done, both of you.”

“Oh, are you from Ireland, then?” Derry asked.

“Wales. But a lot of music from Wales sounds like what you played.”

Tilda came running down the aisle to join them, with Sigrid close behind her. Bard was about to offer her a big congratulatory hug, until he registered the look on her face.

She was frightened.

“What’s wrong?” he said at once, stooping down as she ran to him. Tilda threw herself into Bard’s arm and clung to him, but she didn’t speak. “Tilda, little doll, what happened? What frightened you?”

She pushed away far enough to look deeply into Bard’s eyes.

“I saw him, Da. I saw him. He’s here.”

“Who, Tilda? Who’s here?”

“Lance Dunmont.”
Chapter 89

Chapter Summary

Clan Ffyrnig takes precautions after the unexpected reappearance of a certain goblin.

“Lance Dunmont!” Bain gaped. His eyes went to Thran. “No way, Til! He’s –”

“Bain,” Bard cut in quickly, as quietly as he could manage, cutting his eyes towards Tilda.

His son smothered whatever he’d been about to say, but Tilda was too smart to let the interrupted outburst pass unnoticed. As Legolas and Bain looked guiltily at each other, Tilda’s gaze flitted between them and then latched onto Bard.

“He’s what?” Tilda asked, her voice sharp and strained. “Da, what did Bain mean? Lance Dunmont is what?”

Bard’s arms tightened around Tilda. “Tell me what you saw, little doll. Take a deep breath, then tell me what happened.”

Tilda’s deep breath was long and exaggerated, but it served to calm the little girl enough to ease her panic. “Sigrid and I went back to the hallway to get our bag. One of Sigrid’s friends kept it for us. So we got the bag. Sigrid wanted to talk to her friend, so I decided to come back here, so I went down the hall. I turned the corner where the front of the auditorium is, and that’s where I saw him. I screamed, and he ran out of the school.”

“What was he doing before you screamed?”

Tilda shook her head. “I don’t know. Just standing at the door of the auditorium, looking in here.”

“Did he see you?”

Tilda nodded hard. “When I saw him, when I thought it was him, I froze. I kind of gasped. He must’ve heard me, because he turned around and looked right at me. That’s when I screamed – because I knew it was him. Then he ran out through the door.”

Bard looked up at Sigrid, but she was looking away from him. So was Thran – gods, both of them were looking around like bodyguards, eyeing everyone near them. “Sigrid, did you see him?”

His eldest daughter swung around to look at him. Her hard expression eased into something more neutral when Tilda looked up at her, but her lips tightened in regret. “I heard Tilda scream, so I ran after her. This boy ran out of the door just as I came up, so I saw only the back of him in the dark. He was about the right size, and his hair was about the right color, but I can’t be sure of anything else.”

Why would the boy have run if he were anyone else? Bard left that thought unsaid.

“What did Bain mean, Da?” Tilda persisted. “What about Lance Dunmont?”

“It means that we’re not sure,” Bard replied. “That’s all it means. We have to find out.”
“Da, I’m scared,” Tilda whispered. “And I don’t understand what Bain was about to say.”

“He was about to say that he thought Lance was in Florida with his grandmother,” Bard hedged. “That’s what we’d heard, that he’d moved to Florida.”

“So how come he’s back here now?”

How was he alive at all, if what Ori had told Thran was correct?

“I will ask,” Thran murmured quietly, reaching into the bag Sigrid held for his mobile. “Stay together here.”

* * *

Thran headed for the back of the auditorium, scanning all of the people coming up and down the aisle as the rehearsals continued on stage. When he reached the doors, he unlocked his mobile, but paused before he called; Legolas was coming up the aisle after him.

“Bard asked me to stay with you, Papa. Not to watch you, but to watch everyone around us.”

“He is a cautious man,” Thran replied, “and wise. I welcome another set of eyes.”

They retreated to the far corner of the open space inside the auditorium, where Legolas stood between Thran and everyone else. As Thran waited for someone to pick up his call, he scanned the auditorium again, but no one seemed anything but calm and focused on the stage. After a pair of rings, the usual gruff voice answered.

“Mr. Nori, please. It is urgent.”

Another silence of some seconds stretched, then, “Nori.”

“I am at the Imladris Academy with my family. Two of my children think they saw Lance Dunmont. When he saw them, he ran. I am concerned.”

A curse, perhaps German or Yiddish, whispered across the aether. Thran had never heard Nori curse before. “Things are... unsettled.”

“How unsettled? Is Angelo –”

“He’s out of the picture. I confirmed that personally.”

Thran didn’t know whether to feel reassured, or wonder how Nori had “confirmed that personally.”

“What remains unsettled, then? Something to do with the boy?”

“He’s a flea on the tail of a dog. Not even small change.”

“I was told the boy went down.”

“The source of that information is no longer... reliable,” Nori hedged. “I’m still running down what happened – or didn’t.”
“I must have more to work with. I will not risk my family. What is unsettled, and should I care about it?”

“I don’t know... yet,” Nori conceded. Thran had never heard him claim ignorance before, and it was clear from the reluctance in Nori’s voice that he didn’t like being ignorant. “Angelo went down because a second party saw the chance to acquire his business. A third party saw opportunity in that. The result is a dogfight between two, maybe three groups. Some of my people are affected.”

Shifting alliances, Thran translated. Some of Nori’s “affected people” were surely embroiled in the gang war and were not able to fill Nori in, or were no longer willing to. Some might have been lost in more unsavory ways.

“Speculation?”

“Too early to tell.”

“Are you in danger? Or Ori?”

“Install a security system at your home, if you haven’t already.”

“We have not.”

“I’ll send someone out. It’ll alert me as well as the authorities.”

The willingness to extend protection worried Thran. Nori never volunteered anything without reason.

“I will report this to the local police.”

“Tell your local politsey to contact Thor Oakland in the city. That might shake something loose my way, too.”

“I will.”

“I’ll be in touch,” Nori said, and hung up.

Swallowing, Thran disconnected his mobile. He took a moment to compose himself, so that the face he turned towards Legolas was calm and untroubled. Legolas’s face, however, was not calm. When Thran put a hand on his son’s shoulder, Legolas pointed to the rest of their family in the aisle of the auditorium. A policeman stood with them, talking to Bard.

“Good,” Thran murmured. “That is the person we want to see.”

“It is?” Legolas looked up at him.

“It is. Let us join them.”

Thran and Legolas hastened to rejoin Bard and his children. The policeman stood silently listening as Bard spoke. From the fragment Thran overheard, Bard had related Tilda’s story to the officer.

“Officer Kelso, this is my husband, Thran Oropherson, and his son, Legolas,” Bard said. “Thran, this is Officer Kelso. He heard Tilda scream and wanted to make sure she was all right.”

Thran offered his hand to the officer. “I am glad to meet you.”

“Likewise,” the officer nodded.
“Any news?” Bard asked.

“A little. Children, would you wait here for us while Bard and I speak to the officer?”

“That’s not good,” Bain shook his head as he muttered to his brother and sisters.

“Sit tight for a few minutes, Bain, let us talk to the officer, and we’ll find out what’s what,” Bard said mildly, but with a look in his eye that brooked no discussion.

“Yes, Da,” Bain conceded, and the four children filed into a row of seats, and sat down together. Thran’s jaw tightened to see Tilda want to sit with Sigrid, then he, Bard, and Officer Kelso moved a few feet out of earshot.

In brief terms, Thran explained to Officer Kelso about what had happened on Christmas Day in the city, and the resulting battle for control among the gangs. The officer listened impassively, nodding and taking a few notes. Thran gave him Thor Oakland’s name and telephone number, which Officer Kelso also noted.

“We’ve had a few instances where the city gangs try to make inroads out here,” Kelso commented. “This is a nice, sleepy little village for the most part, but with our high concentration of artists and musicians, the gangs think they’d have an eager market for the drug fad of the day. We keep a pretty close watch on it.”

“Chief Inspector Oakland may have good information for you, then,” Thran urged. “I do not think this is related to a gang’s attempt to expand their territory, but if a war wages between factions in the city, it may affect what happens here.”

“I’ll call him tomorrow morning,” Officer Kelso nodded, handing small cards printed with the officer’s name and numbers on it to Bard and Thran. “In the meantime, keep your eyes open, and watch your step. There’s not much we can do just on a sighting, because there’s no crime in coming to a school event. Tell your kids to stick together to and from school, and don’t any of you go off alone. If you see him again, report that right to me at my number on the card.”

“Will do,” Bard nodded, holding the card up in acknowledgement. “I appreciate your time, Officer Kelso.”

The officer nodded. “You’re welcome. I hope I don’t hear from you, but if I do, I’ll get right on it.”

The officer moved away. Thran belatedly noted that the rehearsals were winding up, and people had begun to file out of the auditorium. Before they headed back to the children, Bard put his hand on Thran’s arm.

“What did Mr. Nori have to say?”

“Little. Our troubles on Christmas Day have set off a gang war, which has put some of his people in disarray, which is a concern. He will be back in touch when he knows something. He sends someone tomorrow to arrange a security system for the house.”

Bard grunted. “That was the first thing I thought of, too. He didn’t have anything else to say?”

“He said he had personally confirmed that Angelo is no longer with us. I did not ask about the particulars of that.”

“What about Lance?”
“The reports of his demise may have been greatly exaggerated, as it is said. Our Tilda is not a foolish child. I believe she saw whom she thinks she did.”

“So do I.”

“So what do we do?”

“Take care going home, make damned sure no one’s broken into the house and the doors and windows are locked, and then tomorrow... let’s talk about that later. Right now, let’s take the children home, and put the best face on it that we can. Though if we say it’s likely that Lance is hanging around, we’ll have a small addition in bed with us for a while.”

“If that comforts her, then she will have it,” Thran said firmly. “Come, you are right that we must go to the children. They are worried.”

Bard led the way back to the children, who got up from their seats when their fathers approached.

“What did he say, Da?” Sigrid asked as soon as they were in earshot.

“We’ll talk when we get home,” Bard replied. “Put your coats on, everyone. Lads, don’t forget your books. Tilda, would you hold my sketchbook for me?”

The children all put on coats and hats, then collected books and bags and sketchpads. Bard led the way out of the auditorium and through the lobby. Many other people drifted out to the parking lot to head home, so they walked briskly to Thran’s SUV, got in, and quickly headed home.

No one saw any sign of Lance Dunmont, but his spectre was certainly foremost in everyone’s mind.

* * *

It was almost ten before Clan Ffymig reached home. The drive home was mostly silent, which was far from the children’s normal habit. Each time Thran looked in the rear view mirror, he caught glimpses of all four staring out the window, almost as if they expected to see the boy who’d started so much trouble over an errant soccer ball three months ago. Even Bard glanced out of the window now and again, but it was mostly to peer in the side view mirror. He looked to see if they were followed, then. Thran kept a similar check, but no one and nothing appeared behind them. They pulled into the lane, then into their driveway, without incident. Neither Thran nor Bard had to urge the children to hurry into the house. Sigrid grabbed Legolas and Bain, muttering softly to them as she pulled them into the kitchen ahead of Tilda, Thran, and Bard. They didn’t bother to take off their coats before they scattered throughout the house.

“What do they do?” Thran asked as he hung up his coat.

“In a hurry to get home, I expect,” Bard replied, cutting his eyes toward Tilda. “I’ll see what they’re up to.”

“Then Tilda, you and I will take off our coats, and we will make cocoa. I would like some – would you, too?”

Tilda’s solemn eyes brightened a bit. “That would be good, Ada. But I know how to make just a mug of it in the microwave. Da knows how to make a whole pan full.”
“Cocoa I know how to make, because Legolas has always loved it. You can help me get out the ingredients. Here, Kukla, hand me your coat.”

Thran ushered Tilda into the kitchen, listening to the sounds of his husband and the three older children going methodically through the house. Thran’s favorite crime drama told him what they were doing – sweeping the house for intruders. The bald phrase seemed more fraught with tension tonight, because the search was not some scene from a television show, but part of his family, his home, his life. He paid no attention to Bard ducking down into the cellar, or Legolas and Bain casing the sitting room and solarium. Nor did he comment when Bard ducked outside, probably to check the barn, but he caught Legolas’s eye and silently sent him and Bain after Bard. Sigrid passed through the kitchen and went into the mudroom to hang up her coat, then came back to give Tilda a big smile.

“What’s cooking, Til?”

“We’re making cocoa for everyone,” the little girl explained. “He’s not here, is he?”

Sigrid didn’t try to dodge Tilda’s question. She shook her head emphatically. “He’s not here, Til. We made sure.”

“Good.” Tilda took a deep breath. “Ada, do you want me to pour just the milk in the pan, or mix in the chocolate and the sugar, too?”

“First we must put the cocoa and the sugar in the pan with a little hot water and mix that well. Then we whisk in the milk.”

“Okay. How much sugar and cocoa?”

“We make cocoa for six, so six heaping tablespoons of the cocoa, and twelve level tablespoons of the sugar.”

Sigrid got the measuring spoons for Tilda, then leaned on the kitchen island to watch her sister carefully measure out the sugar and cocoa. Thran added a little hot water from the tap, just enough to whisk the mixture together smoothly. Then he added enough milk to fill six big mugs, and Tilda whisked that smooth. The pan went on the burner and warmed gently until Bard and the boys came in.

“Mmm, cocoa!” Legolas sniffed deeply.

“Oh, that’s great!” Bain exclaimed. “Great idea, whoever came up that that.”

“It does smell great,” Bard agreed, bringing up the rear. Thran assumed that the trio’s casual air meant that they’d found nothing untoward in the barn.

“I will tell you a secret ingredient for cocoa,” Thran said as he ladled the warm beverage into mugs. “Legolas likes a little orange extract in his, to make delicious chocolate orange cocoa. You can also add a little peppermint extract if you want chocolate mint cocoa. Or coconut for chocolate coconut cocoa.”

“Oooh, I want chocolate orange, too,” Sigrid said, going into the pantry. She came out with several bottles of extract. “How much in a mug?”

“Just a few drops,” Legolas explained, taking the orange to show Sigrid. “See?”

The children doctored their cocoa accordingly, and everyone settled around the kitchen table to sip the warm drink. As Thran expected, Sigrid was the one to start the discussion.

“So what did the cop have to say?” Sigrid leaned forward over her elbows.

“Office Kelso will keep an eye out,” Bard said. “He’ll talk to Chief Inspector Oakland tomorrow morning to see if he knows anything. In the meantime, we’ll keep an eye out, too.”

“What if he comes to our school tomorrow?” Tilda asked.

“He can’t come into your school, little doll,” Bard said. “No one can, unless they buzz the office on the intercom, and then the office people have to unlock the door for them. The office people don’t unlock the door for anyone who doesn’t have business in the school, remember?”

“That’s true,” Tilda allowed, looking slightly less tense.

“What about sport after school?” Legolas asked.

“That is a good point,” Thran nodded. “Bain, you are on the soccer field with your mates, so be sure to stay with them. Legolas, tomorrow is archery?”

“Yes, Papa.”

“You also stay with your mates. Tilda, what does your sport group do tomorrow?”

“We’re in the gym tomorrow. I can jump rope, or play kickball, or do the wall climb.”

“Then you will be fine. Sigrid, you will be on the track?”

“Yes,” Sigrid nodded. “The first week of outdoor track. I’ll stick with the other middle distance runners. There are five or six guys I can run with, so I’ll be okay.”

“All right,” Bard nodded. “The only other thing you need to be careful about is getting on and off the bus. Thran and I will be with you in the morning just like always. When you get to school, stick together until you get inside. At the end of the day, stay inside the school until you’re all together, then go out to the bus together. We’ll meet you at the bus stop.”

“So it really was Lance Dunmont?” Bain asked.

“We don’t know for sure,” Bard shrugged. “But I believe Tilda, and if she says it was him, then we’ll assume it was until someone tells us differently. If it’s him, we don’t know what he wants. Maybe he’s got a good reason to be here. Until we know, we’ll be careful, and keep our wits about us. If anyone sees anything, you call the police, then you call one of us.”

“What if he tries to get in here?” Tilda asked. “When we’re asleep?”

“Tomorrow someone comes to put a security system all through the house,” Thran said. “No one we do not allow will come here, Kukla. Do not worry.”

“It’s getting late, and you’ve still got school tomorrow, plus we have the dress rehearsal for the Follies after supper tomorrow,” Bard noted. “Let’s finish our cocoa, then get through the shower. Who wants to go first?”

“I will,” Tilda said, but she looked up at Bard. “Will you go upstairs with me, Da?”
“Course,” Bard nodded. “Put your mug in the sink, little doll, then I’ll go up with you.”

Bard gave Thran a look as he got up with Tilda, and headed upstairs with the little girl. As soon as their footsteps sounded on the stairs, Thran found three sets of eyes fixed on him.

“What’s really going on?” Bain whispered. “You told us Lance was dead!”

“So I was told,” Thran nodded. “Tonight, I hear another tale, so perhaps that is not the case.”

“What happened?” Sigrid asked.

“I do not know. This may mean nothing, but I am not the one to assume that without proof. So be careful, and say nothing to frighten our Tilda more. Can any of you tell me why this boy so frightens her? She did not see the fight we made against the gang. Did she know him before?”

“She didn’t know him,” Sigrid shook her head. “She didn’t know the other two boys, either. But she saw them at the park, and she heard me call him out, and when she came up after the fight was over, she thought Da was dead. Lance is the only name she heard, so that’s who she thinks caused the whole thing. It makes perfect sense to me that she’s terrified.”

“That’s not all,” Legolas said softly, drawing everyone’s eyes. “We were reading once, just the two of us, and she told me that she heard us say that Lance grabbed you, Sigrid. I didn’t say anything, because we all thought Lance... wouldn’t bother us anymore. But I think she’s worried that he’ll try to hurt you, because you hurt him.”

“That makes perfect sense, too, synok,” Thran nodded. He sighed. “Poor Kukla. We must all wear the brave face so that we do not scare her any more than we do. You will tell me or Bard if she says anything about why she is frightened, so that we can take good care of her.”

“Bet she ends up in bed with you tonight,” Sigrid observed.

“We have already considered that, and if it comforts her, of course she will stay,” Thran replied. “The rest of us will close ranks around her, and around each other. Do nothing foolish, and we will get through this.”

“Yes, Papa; okay, Thran; okay, Ada,” the children murmured.

They got up to wash and dry all the mugs and the cocoa pan, then filtered upstairs to get ready for bed. When the children were done, Thran took his turn in the shower, Sigrid retreated to her room to talk to Finn, and Bard played cards with Tilda and the boys in the study. When he was clean and dry, it was time for the children to turn out the lights. Sigrid and the boys settled with little apprehension, but Tilda was not so sanguine.

“We’ll leave our doors open tonight, little doll,” Bard said, as the girl settled into bed. “Try to sleep in your bed, but you know you can come get me or Ada anytime you need to.”

She nodded. “Okay, Da. I’ll try.”

“Do you want more of your toys?”

“I want all of them. They help me sleep better.”

Thran and Bard piled close to a dozen plush toys around Tilda. She gave Thran a smile when he made Mr. Bun hop over the bed to plunk down into her arms. “I think Mr. Bun likes to have all his friends here, too. I hope they do not jump on the bed all night.”
“Sometimes they do, but tonight they’re all tired,” she said. “I’m tired, too.”

“We had a busy day today,” Bard said, kneeling by the bed to press a kiss on Tilda’s forehead. “We’ll be busy tomorrow, too – you get to wear your costume and do your doll dance with Thran again.”

“I like our dance,” Tilda yawned, tucking Mr. Bun under her arm.

“I like it, too,” Thran said, kneeling beside Bard to offer Tilda his goodnight kiss. “Sleep well, and soon we will dance it again. This time in our costumes.”

“Even the makeup?” Tilda asked, shutting her eyes.

“Even the makeup. I will give you pink cheeks and big eyes.”

“That’ll be fun,” Tilda murmured, nearly asleep. “Night-night, Ada.”

“Goodnight, my Russkaya Kukla.”

“Night-night, Da.”

“Sleep well, little doll.”

Thran and his husband eased from Tilda’s room, making sure her nightlight was on before they pulled the door ajar.

“I hope she sleeps,” Bard murmured, as they went into their room.

“Go wash,” Thran urged. “I will watch, so if she does not, I will bring her in with us.”

“I’ll take my night clothes in with me, in case we have a guest sooner than I expect,” Bard replied, scooping up his soft sleep pants and tee shirt as he disappeared into the bathroom. He didn’t take long, and soon climbed into bed beside Thran. Both of them kept their night clothes on, for both expected Tilda to arrive at some point. But for now, the house was quiet, and they were grateful to lie back in the pillows together.

“Do you know when you and the older children searched the house, that Tilda knew exactly what you did?”

“What, she said something about it?”

“When Sigrid returned to the kitchen, Tilda said, ‘He’s not here, is he?’ Sigrid did not try to deny what you did, and merely assured Tilda that no, he was not here.”

Bard exhaled. “They’ve grown up in a not great part of a big city. All of them are used to watching their backs. What other revelations did she reveal?”

“She was not the only one with a revelation. While you were upstairs with her, Legolas said that she might not be worried so much about herself as her sister.”

“Oh?”

Thran repeated what Legolas had said, as well as what Sigrid had said about why Tilda was so frightened.

Bard hummed. “They all make a lot of sense.”
Thran hummed back. “We are blessed with four very smart children. I hope Mr. Nori has something more for me tomorrow.”

“He might be in a lot more trouble than we are,” Bard considered, stroking Thran’s back. “If he’s got informants on various sides of this war, he likely doesn’t know which of them he can trust anymore.”

“That matches what I thought,” Thran agreed, snuggling closer. “But I will not think about it any more. I am very tired, and tomorrow will be another long day. I want to do the dances with our girls justice, and to do that, I must sleep.”

“Let’s hope we all do,” Bard yawned as he shifted, trying to get comfortable. “Though it’ll be harder in clothes.”

“It will.”

Bard snickered. “For ten years, I slept in these same clothes without a blink. Now I feel confined. You’ve turned me into a hedonist, angel.”

Smiling, Thran snuck a hand under Bard’s shirt to stroke his chest. “I was a hedonist before. But thanks to you, now I am a shameless hedonist.”

“Go to sleep, then, shameless hedonist. Before both of us have to wake up and be good parents.”

Thran pressed a kiss against Bard’s chest. A similar caress graced his hair, and Bard settled around him with a sigh. As Thran’s eyes closed, his last thought was a wish that Tilda’s well-loved toys would keep all evil dreams at bay.
Chapter 90

Chapter Summary

Clan Ffyrnig makes it through the night, then presents a strong front for the new day. In the midst of it all, divine Rahmiel alights.

Chapter Notes

Look for another pair of cameos - a more adult version of a certain pair of Dwarvish brothers. I just couldn't resist :-)

Flitting images, like kites on the wind... flying soccer balls... green sneakers... ham sandwiches and pumpkin pie for a plainclothes policeman... a Wolverine tee shirt... so many images, all swirling out of the mist and then into it again...

Weird, hollow voices and organ music... ghosts, dancing out of the mist and then into it again...

A red clown nose that grew and expanded into a blood red moon illuminating a desolate land where zombies ran in packs like hyenas, out of the mist and then into it again...

A scream, a child’s scream...

“Fuck off, lowlife! Back off, back off!”

“They’re children, Angelo! Just children!”

Lightning streaked across his ribs so fast and so hot that the pain stole his breath, can’t breathe, can’t breathe, Can. Not. Breathe...

Falling, tumbling head over heels, plummeting into a bottomless chasm that glowed blood red where children wailed, “Da! Da!” –

Bard flailed, trying to right himself, only to find himself tangled in bed sheet and blankets. He was soaked in sweat, and his lungs heaved in a harsh rasp. The light on Thran’s side of the bed was on.

“Fucking hell...” he graved, as tension dribbled out of his body. “Oh, bloody fucking hell...”

“Yes?” A voice penetrated his haze. “Are you awake now?”

Am I?

He didn’t remember pushing the covers back or sitting up; for all he knew, he could’ve magically levitated. He found himself leaning over his knees on the side of the bed. That voice... whose voice? Thran’s. Thran’s voice. He reached out, groping for his husband’s arm, leg, something, but the bed was empty. Gods, was he gone? Was Thran gone? Oh, gods, was he hurt? Or had he left Bard – no, no! – oh, shit, shit, shit...!
Gods, let me still be dreaming – Thran’s got to be all right –

“Bard. Lyubov moya.”

Shit! He was dreaming. Thran wasn’t in bed, but he heard his voice. He heard it –

“Thran! Don’t –”

“Bard. Please, lyubov moya. You must wake up.”

In a panic, Bard twisted around. Where in hell did that voice come from? How did he hear Thran when his husband wasn’t in bed –

Thran stood beside his side of the bed, clutching a pillow.

Bard found his breath. He was awake, after all. Finally. Thank all of the gods for blessings small and large.

“I’m awake.”

Thran eased his tight stance.

“Are you sure? Do you know where you are?”

Bard cleared his throat. It was nearly impossible to swallow, as dry as his mouth was. “At home. In bed. Sort of. I hope.”

Thran dropped his pillow back on the bed, and came to sit beside Bard. He put an arm around Bard’s shoulder. “You dreamed.”

“Hell, yeah. A hellacious fucking nightmare.” He wrung a hand over his face. “I hope I didn’t flail you out of bed.”

“I could not wake you,” Thran squeezed Bard’s shoulders. “I tried.”

“I was deep in it, then.” Bard put a hand over Thran’s knee and rubbed it slowly. “I’m sorry, angel. I’m sorry I woke you.”

“Can I get you a glass of water?”

“I’ll get it. I’m soaking wet, so I’ve got to dry off, anyway.”

He got up to strip off his sodden tee shirt and sleep pants, then padded to the bathroom for his water. He would have preferred to shower, but in deference to the children, he made do with a wet washcloth and a towel. He tended to the obvious necessity, had his water, and felt a little better. When he got back to bed, Thran was back under the covers. Bard rummaged for dry sweatpants and tee, dropped them on the floor by his nightstand, and sat on the edge of the bed.

“Do you remember what you dreamed about?” Thran murmured.

Bard snorted, but not loudly. “That day in the park, dancing ghosts, clown noses that turned into blood moons and the zombie apocalypse, the children screaming... and when I woke up, I thought you’d left me...”

Thran snuck a hand out to rub Bard’s back in comfort. “Suka blyad, Bard. Everything of the day, and then some.”
“We thought it was Tilda we’d have to worry about, but it was me. Gods, I didn’t yell, did I? I didn’t wake the children?”

“You made no sound. Just... I could not wake you up. You seemed in such pain that I thought you might be in the middle of a heart attack. And you fought against something.”

“I dreamed about getting shot. I couldn’t breathe, no matter how hard I tried. Then I fell into this deep abyss, and all of the children were screaming... then... you were gone...”

Bard fell silent, but eventually got under the covers and lay down. When Thran realized that Bard wouldn’t put his tee shirt and sweats on, he sat up to strip off his clothes, turned off the light, and lay beside Bard. He stretched his arm across Bard’s chest to stroke it.

“All is well, my saint. You are in bed, the children are safe and asleep, I am here, and all is well.”

“What time is it?”

“Only just after one.”

Bard smothered a groan, and laid a hand on Thran’s arm to cradle it against his chest. “Still early. Damn. I hope the rest of the night isn’t more of the same. You didn’t hear Tilda, did you?”

“All of the children are asleep,” Thran assured him, drawing him close. “Come, lyubov moya. Three deep breaths, as you tell me, and try to think of nothing.”

Bard allowed himself a rueful smile. “Do I really tell you that? Mab i ast, it’s impossible to think of nothing after a nightmare like that.”

Thran nuzzled his ear, lips pulling on his earring just a little. “We will think of something else. What should it be? Ah, I know – would you let me buy you new earrings for your birthday? One of yours turns dark. Or perhaps they are sentimental?”

“No surprise, there,” Bard grinned in the dark. “They’re just junk I bought at some teen palace when I was eighteen. So not sentimental.”

“I will buy you new ones in white gold. I could add a matching cock ring, but since neither of us suffer from lack of frequency or endurance, to buy you one would be an insult.”

Bard snickered, relaxing in Thran’s arms. “If I last any longer, I’m liable to kill you, and I don’t want that.”

“Dying in ecstasy will be a glorious way to go when I am one hundred years old, but not now. If I reach one hundred, then I will buy you a cock ring in hopes that you put it to good use.”

“You’ll kill both of us,” Bard managed to reply through smothered laughter. “Me when I try, and you when I succeed.”

Thran giggled. “We would go together, then. That would be a good end for a man of one hundred, and his love of one hundred and four.”

“Let’s focus on the fucking we can do between now and then,” Bard exhaled, shutting his eyes.

“Mmm, delicious,” Thran purred, stroking Bard’s arm. “I love you, my saint.”

“I love you too, angel.”
Thran snuggled next to him. “Sleep well.”

I hope I can. Gods, I hope I...

Bard’s eyes closed, and he was gone.

* * *

Thran stayed awake long enough to register when Bard fell asleep in his arms. He didn’t last much longer than his husband, and before he knew it, Bard’s clock radio was playing softly. This morning’s wake-up music was the Tchaikovsky piece he hated most, Marche Slav. It was so overwrought, nothing but heaving histrionics – he’d hated it the first time he’d heard it as a child, and time had not improved it. As Bard stretched, then sat up, Thran muttered a curse under his breath and pulled Bard’s pillow over his head. Despite the padding, Bard’s snicker still penetrated.

“What, no desire to get up this morning, angel?”

“To get up is one thing. To listen to that atrocious rag of a march is another. That piece has accounted for more hatred of all Russian music than the rest of the repertoire put together.”

The bed shifted as Bard leaned over to turn off the clock radio. Thran pushed the extra pillow away with a sigh of relief.

“Thank you, my saint. I have always loathed that piece.”

“It’s too much to take first thing in the morning, I grant you. You want the bathroom first?”

“Take it. I will pretend to wake up without that wretched march in my ears. A pox on the Slavs who inspired an otherwise brilliant composer to such a low.”

Chuckling, Bard got up, headed for the bathroom, and was soon back to collect clothes to begin the morning routine. Thran had his turn to wash the sleep from his eyes and tend to necessities, then joined Bard to scrounge for jeans and tee shirt, socks and flannel. As Bard armed his way into his Henley, he paused to look over at Thran.

“Tilda made it through the night.”

“She did.”

“I didn’t, though. I had a nightmare, didn’t I?”

Nodding, Thran cast Bard a concerned look. “You seemed to sleep well afterwards. I hope that was the case?”

“I did. I’m sorry I woke you.”

“I slept well afterwards, too, so all is well.”

Bard looked out of the window. “Rainy this morning. That should discourage a certain unwelcome party from prowling about.”

“I hope so, too.”
Bard’s expression was inward as they headed downstairs, started the morning porridge, and began the assembly line for the children’s lunches, but slowly it turned into puzzlement. “Did I dream the part about the cock ring, or did you really say that?”

Thran snickered. “I said only that we do not need one.”

“Ah. Okay. I wondered how that fit into the nightmare.” Bard shot him a skeptical look. “What possessed you to talk about cock rings at one in the morning?”

Thran’s grin was perverse as he got the crock of raisins out of the refrigerator and set it on the table. “Yours was a very intense nightmare. I was forced to resort to extreme measures that would hold your attention long enough for you to fall back into sleep.”

“Oh, that’s no lie. If you don’t mind, though, I prefer to fuck my husband without mechanical aids.”

“You have no need of mechanical aids, of course. I prefer your cock unadorned, besides. I was merely concerned.”

“I’m surprised I didn’t dream about a cock ring that grows to the size of a circus hoop that I have to jump through – or maybe I’d make you jump through it.”

“As long as you do not make either of our cocks jump through it,” Thran shot back. He leaned over the kitchen island to snare Bard’s tee shirt, and pulled him over the island far enough to kiss him. “Suka blyad, all this talk of cocks so early in the morning! After the children go to school, maybe I should drag your ass back to bed and pillage you.”

The first thump from the children sounded overhead, drawing both of their gazes up to the ceiling. Thran grinned, but Bard sobered.

“Maybe I should take the children to school, rather than let them ride the bus.”

“It rains steadily,” Thran noted. “I think they will be all right on the bus.”

Bard leaned both hands on the island and stared down at the line of bread slices atop their waxed paper sheets. “What in hell does Lance want with us? Or was it even him?”

“I do not know, lyubov moya. All I can offer is the perspective of one who has lived in the eye of the public for many years. Sometimes, the eye that watches is a cruel one, but I will not let it change my life, make me retreat. Let the children ride the bus.”

Bard looked up. “What if Lance has a gun, Thran? This is America – everyone’s got a gun.”

“Do you have one?”

“No.”

“Neither do I. So not everyone has a gun.”

“Nearly everyone in a gang has a gun.”

“Sigrid said that Lance was only a spotter for Angelo’s gang, and only recently taken on. Would such a child have a gun?”

“Maybe not.” Bard looked away. “But he’s sixteen, Thran. That’s old enough to steal one.”

“Lance did not have a previous record of a weapons violation. It seems to me that if he had just gotten a gun, he would have brandished it quite proudly in the park as part of his newfound rise in the world. But he was not accused of a weapons violation when the police took him, so he did not have one. Then last night, when a ten-year-old girl surprised him, he ran before he did anything else.”

“True,” Bard conceded. “But I’d feel better about it if Mr. Nori calls you back with whatever light he can shed on this. I’m not okay with risking my children’s lives on what I ‘think’ might be the case.”

Sigrid appeared in the hallway. “Morning, Da, Ada. How was Tilda last night?”

“Slept through, as far as we know,” Bard replied, brushing a kiss on the top of Sigrid’s hair. “She didn’t make a peep.”

“Good,” Sigrid breathed, circling the island to give Thran a hug. “I slept, she did, and you both did, so unless the boys had trouble, we’re okay. Oooh, Muenster cheese! Would you put a slice of that on my turkey sandwich, please?”

Thran kept his features neutral when Bard shot him the expected look, telling him not to say anything about his nightmare. His husband was so predictable, not wanting to upset the children.

“Muenster cheese, on the sandwich,” Bard replied mildly. “Yellow or spicy mustard?”

“Half and half?” Sigrid smiled as she dished up porridge for herself. “So are you going to let us ride the bus this morning the way Thran wants, or will you bundle us into the truck and take us to school the way you want, Da?”

Thran snickered. “She is very perceptive, our lioness.”

“Not really,” Sigrid shrugged, but she looked proud of herself nevertheless. “It’s just that you’re both so predictable. I vote for the bus, personally.”

“Why is that, sweetness?” Bard looked up at her.

“Because it’s pouring rain, and Lance won’t dare try to tackle any of us in a crowd, and a crowd is what we’ll be in, from the moment we get to the bus stop this morning until the moment we come back to the bus stop this afternoon. I’m not even sure the boy I saw was Lance, anyway. The only thing that persuades me that it was Lance is because it was Tilda who saw him.”

“Tilda might be overreacting,” Bard ventured, but before Thran could protest Sigrid had scoffed. “Come on, Da – you know better. Tilda’s got your artist’s eye for detail, for faces. If she says it was Lance, it was Lance. She had a good, long look, too. She wouldn’t make a mistake.” She glanced away from them as Bain and Legolas came into the kitchen. “Ask the boys about the school bus. I bet they’ll agree with me.”

“What about the school bus?” Legolas asked as he got his usual juice from the refrigerator. Bain already had a slice of ham from the lunch assembly stuffed in his mouth, but he looked up in inquiry.

“Thran thinks we should ride the school bus today. Da thinks he should drive us to school.”

“Told you,” Bain mumbled to Legolas around his mouthful of ham.

“I told you I agreed with you,” Legolas looked back. “I’m okay either way. Whatever you like.”

“Always the diplomat,” Bard grinned sheepishly. “Bain? What’s your choice? Quickly, before Til “I’m fine with the bus,” Bain nodded. “There’s more of us on the bus than in the truck, yeah? Safety in numbers.”

Bard’s glance at Thran was wry. “Then you all do what we said last night – stay together, keep your eyes open, and don’t go out to the bus this afternoon until you’re all together. I’ll meet you at the bus stop at four-fifteen.”

Tilda came silently into the kitchen, yawning cavernously. “Morning, Da. Morning, Ada. It’s raining.”

“So it is,” Thran leaned down to kiss the top of her head. “But it is Friday, so not so bad. Porridge for you this morning, ma petite? Apple or raisins?”

“Both,” Tilda sighed, and carried the bowl of porridge to the table to sit with her siblings. “Morning, everyone.”

“Morning, Til; morning, Tilda; morning, Kukla.”

Conversation lapsed as the children began their breakfast. As Thran brought a plate of chopped apples to the table, the three older children regarded Tilda with concern, then exchanged glances among themselves, but Tilda remained oblivious to their silent scrutiny. Once Thran and Bard finished the children’s lunches, they sat down with the children to eat one of Bard’s quick omelets full of vegetables and cheese. Between them, they’d eaten a lot of eggs since their nutrition guide had arrived; Bard had learned that both of them needed more protein in the morning, and eggs were an easy and delicious solution. Thran also liked having a choice of something that wasn’t sweet for his first meal of the day.

The children quickly devoured their breakfasts, collected their things for school, and soon set out with their fathers for the bus stop with umbrellas in full force. Thran had time to appreciate that the bitter chill of winter had finally lost its hold, and the air, while cold and damp, definitely felt like spring. Shrubs and bushes were greening, and even the tree buds had poked out their first tinges of green. Tilda pointed to a clump of snowdrops well in flower, and to another of daffodils with swelling buds about to burst open.

“Spring is finally here,” the little girl observed with a smile up at her fathers.

“It’s been here officially for a week and a bit more,” Bard nodded, his tense expression finally easing into its usual warmth. “It just hasn’t felt like it until now.”

“Morning, Bard, Thran!” Sam waved from the bus stop. “Morning, Sigrid, Tilda, Legolas, and Bain!”

“Morning, Mr. Sam!” the children waved, and Tilda finally ventured away from between her fathers to run over to little Elanor. Sigrid watched her go before she slipped between her fathers.

“We’ll be fine,” she said, before she slipped away again. “We’re Clan Ffyrnig.”

“My hair will be as white as yours in a year,” Bard murmured to Thran, but he was smiling. “And that girl will be the cause if it.”

“We will still be a striking couple,” Thran patted Bard’s shoulder in comfort as Sam came up to talk. “Good morning, Sam! It seems that spring is here at last, yes?”
The conversation turned to the quickening season and Sam’s excitement for his favorite time of year. They chatted about the Japanese garden he and Bard wanted to make around Bard’s pine tree sculpture, and Sam offered to come over on Sunday to talk to them about it. He was eager to draw up a plan for them, and if they wanted unusual plants, he could see about ordering them. The bus arrived, the children chorused that they were off and leaving too, and Bard and Thran replied for them to do their best, just like always. Sam reiterated their plans to meet about the garden on Sunday, then they headed home. Bard’s step was lighter as they made their way inside, which lightened Thran’s concern as he dressed in his dance attire for the morning’s work.

“You be sure to keep an eye out when you drive to your pointe lesson this afternoon,” Bard said, when Thran came down from the bedroom. He was in the kitchen, mulling the day’s possibilities for lunch and supper.

“I will not go this afternoon, but not because of Lance,” Thran replied when Bard looked from the depths of the refrigerator at him. “The Follies dress rehearsal is tonight, so I chose to stay here today so I finish in time for a timely supper. This means very much to our Sigrid and Tilda, so I will not disappoint them.”

“You’ve been wonderful with them,” Bard reached out to tug Thran’s braid with affection. “You’re a good Da as well as a hot lover.”

Snorting with laughter, Thran flicked one of Bard’s earrings. “I enjoy both, if for different reasons. What do you make for us today?”

“I was thinking chili. I have a lot of ground turkey left in the freezer, and soon it’ll be too warm for anyone to want chili, and turkey burgers are not too good – bland, in a word. If I make a big pot to use all the turkey, it’d be enough for lunch and supper.”

“Perhaps you will convince Luka that there is a viable alternative to petrol station burritos,” teased Thran.

“I’m not sure anything can do that,” Bard shook his head. “I’ll make bread to go with it. Then it’s back to Rahmiel’s wings, at least until Mr. Nori’s man shows up about a security system.”

“Do you know anything about a security system?” Thran asked.

Shrugging, Bard ducked into the pantry to bring out cans of beans for his chili. “Enough that I could generally repair things that went wrong with Steffen’s disaster of a system. Enough to ask questions, anyway. We have too many children running in and out, especially during the summer when they’re not in school, to make a lot of wires and such a good choice. Such things are wireless now, just like our home computer network, so we’ll see what Mr. Nori’s expert has to say.”

“Please call me aside when he comes, so that I understand what he thinks we should do, too,” Thran asked. “Until then, I will be in the ballroom.”

“Imagine that,” Bard mimicked surprise. “I’ll let you get through your barre and such first, though.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya,” Thran stroked Bard’s hair. “Until later, then.”

“Happy pliés,” Bard grinned, saluting Thran with the chef’s knife.

Thran took himself off to the ballroom, relieved that Bard was less apprehensive.

Thank all the gods that humans were not telepathic. If a certain sixteen-year-old hooligan knew how much trepidation he’d ignited in Thran’s family, he would be ecstatic.
Once Thran went off to the ballroom, Bard concentrated on his chili. Brown the turkey with chopped onions, no stirring until the crumbles had colored well, otherwise they turned to mush. Four kinds of beans, canned diced tomatoes, lots and lots of chili powder, then several kinds of spices, including a hefty dose of cumin. Then on to the bread as the chili started its long simmer. A little Parmesan cheese and Italian herbs into the bread, a little pepper, and into the warming oven to rise. Maybe some more brownies? Not chocolate ones this time, but vanilla brownies, which had chocolate bits in them. The delicious aroma of chili mixed with that of yeasty bread and then the chocolate cookies, and all was right with the world...

Except all was not right with the world. His youngest daughter’s three-second glimpse of a teenaged boy had changed all of that, and no amount of cooking would ease Bard’s worry.

Worry changed nothing. When the cookies were done, Bard took the pan out of the oven and headed into the solarium to work on Rahmiel. Rada had emailed pictures, instructions, and sources for feathers, so Bard called around until he found a supplier that could provide black turkey feathers rather than the regular white ones from commercial farming enterprises. They cost more, but given how much time he’d save not having to dye them, the higher price was worth it. He could have some sent to him, or he could come pick out what he wanted. He decided to drive out tomorrow for that. He disconnected his mobile for the last time with a feeling of accomplishment, then turned to the armature he’d been building for Rahmiel’s wings.

It had taken some doing, but he’d finally come up with a frame proportioned to his liking. He hated to do it, but the only way to anchor the wings to the rest of the figure was to remove the clay, and weld the two armatures together. He carefully cut the clay off the torso section of the armature, and headed out to the barn. It too very little effort to weld the wing and body armatures together – so little effort, in fact, that he was almost disappointed. This was the first time in years that he’d welded something other than construction materials, and he would have liked to savor it, but that would come soon enough. Right now, advancing his art meant reapplying clay to Rahmiel’s armature. Once back in the house, he carefully clamped the cooled armature back on his board. He was in the middle of reapplying the clay to Rahmiel’s torso when a knock came on the front door.

A short, stocky man with black hair disarranged into spikes faced the door. Behind him, a shorter yet just as stocky man with a blond buzz cut stood looking out across the yard. Both of them wore dark green coveralls emblazoned with Dale Security Services on the right breast. Despite the professional attire, both of them looked no more than a decade older than Sigrid, and seemed to be more professional computer gamers than security experts.

These days, a lot of computer gamers were security experts.

“Mr. Bowman?” the dark-haired one asked politely, a friendly smile on his face.

“I am.”

“Fritz and Karsten from Dale Security Services, at your service.” Karsten offered Bard his company ID, and Fritz offered his in turn. “Mr. Nori sent us. Said you’re in need of a security system for your home.”

“You’re in the right place,” Bard nodded. “Come in.”
“Thanks. We understand that you’re in a bit of a rush, so we can skip all the blather, if you like, and get right down to it.”

“And what’s that entail?” Bard asked mildly, smiling at the young Karsten’s forthright humor.

“We walk through your house, doing our best not to tread on the carpets, counting all your accessible windows and doors, and then we walk all around your house, doing our best not to tread on the shrubbery,” the heretofore silent Fritz explained, brandishing a clipboard. “Then we figure out how to keep the undesirables out. And just so you know, we’ll ask a lot of nosy questions along the way about valuables and such, so I hope you don’t think we’re two of the undesirables you wished you’d kept out of your house.”

Bard laughed. “Fair enough. Would you like to start in the dining room?”

“As good a place as any,” Karsten grinned. “Lead on.”

Bard led the two young technicians through the lower level of the house, listening as they counted windows and fingered window locks and sashes, and looked out into the yard through said windows. He left the main room and ballroom for last and led them upstairs to survey the bedrooms, then the two empty rooms and attic on the third level. Then it was down into the cellar, out to the barn, around the house and grounds, and finally back inside to the main room.

“So no jewelry, no electronics to speak of, a little heavy equipment...” Fritz looked up from his clipboard to regard his partner thoughtfully, who looked back with the same neutral expression. “If you don’t mind me asking, why do you need a security system?”

“We have four children, and we’ve acquired a stalker.”

The glances went back and forth again. “Ah,” Fritz murmured. “That explains the urgency. So we’ll just finish with this room, put our heads together, and see what we come up with.”

“There’s one more room,” Bard pointed to the door at the end of the main room. “The ballroom. My husband’s dance company is in rehearsal. I’ll ask them to take a break long enough for you to make our checks.”

“No need,” Karsten demurred. “We’ll stay near the windows, if that’ll help.”

“It would. And if you’d leave your boots at the door, that’ll help, too. We don’t have much in the way of carpets you have to watch out for, but the dancer’s floor is pickier than any carpet.”

“Righto,” Fritz nodded. “All right, Kar, I’ve got this room done. On to the ballroom.”

Bard preceded the two security techs, leaving his boots by the door and going inside. The whole company was not in residence today; only Irmo, Ori, Charisse, and Luka. Thran was in his pointe shoes, weaving a spidery dance of alien longing around the tiny Charisse. Despite how many times Bard had seen bits and pieces of this part of the ballet, it still raised goosebumps. How Thran managed to convey both longing and a gap of understanding that was too much for a mortal to overcome was clear testimony to his technical and emotional sophistication. Ori sat on his garden bench with his tablet, and Luka was at the barre in the corner, staying limber. Irmo stood halfway down the ballroom against the wall watching Thran and Charisse as they danced past him. Bard held Fritz and Karsten back as the pair of dancers continued their phrase.

“Gods, that really is Thran Oropherson,” Karsten shook his head. “Incredible! I got the name, but... it just didn’t register...”
Fritz gave his partner an exasperated glare. “I told you. But did you listen? No, you didn’t.”

“I thought you were joking,” Karsten shrugged. “Do you have an older brother, Mr. Bowman? Mine delights in pulling my leg so often it’s three inches longer than the other one.”

“Only child, I’m afraid. But the four resident children do a bit of that from time to time.”

Fritz sniffed at Karsten’s triumphant expression. “Only to pay little brothers back for being such pains, I’m sure.”

“Bollocks,” Karsten muttered, but under his breath. “Well, it’s registered at last, Fritz. That’s the guy I saw on the tube last night. Something about the local art follies show tomorrow.”

“He’s dancing in it,” Fritz supplied with a longsuffering sigh, peering at his clipboard again. “All right, just a quick look at the windows, then we’ll be out of the dancers’ way.”

The two technicians crept behind Ori to check the bay window components, then circled around to check the outside door, the fireplace, and the windows that flanked the fireplace. They retraced their steps so as not to disturb Luka, and returned to Bard by the door. By then Thran and Charisse were done, and Thran came forward to meet the two young men, smothering a smile at Karsten’s awed hello when he shook Thran’s hand.

“They’ve seen everything,” Bard explained. “And they know our situation.”

“Thank you, Bard,” Thran nodded. “I am sure that my husband has answered all of your questions, but if you have any for me, please ask.”

“I think we’ve got enough to start on a plan,” Fritz said. “Let us do a think, then we’ll explain our recommendation, and answer any questions you have for us.”

“Of course,” Thran nodded. “Bard will get me when you are ready to talk.”

Thran bowed himself back to his colleagues, and Bard ushered the two technicians back into the main room, where all of them resumed their boots.

“If we can use either your dining room or your kitchen table, Mr. Bowman, we’ll get ourselves organized,” Fritz asked. “It shouldn’t take us but half an hour or so.”

“There’s probably more room for you to spread out in the dining room,” was Bard’s suggestion. “I’ll be in the solarium if you have questions.”

He left the two young technicians muttering away about motion detectors and window alarms. By the time he’d retreated to the kitchen, they’d lapsed into another language, either German or Yiddish, going back and forth at lightning speed. He poured himself a cup of tea, and went back to Rahmiel. He finished replacing the clay over the armature, excited to see the angel’s spirit emerge with each bit he added. The wing armature might not yet be filled out, but already it intensified the impression of the angel at the very moment he alighted on the earth. Inspired, he laid down more clay at the angel’s feet, and quickly formed the armature that would support the saint’s torso and outstretched arm as he beseeched the angel. A little clay fleshed out that figure, and he carefully aligned the gaze of the saint with that of the angel hovering above him.

As he stepped back to check it, another chill went down his back. As much as Thran’s spirit called to Bard when he danced, it called just as strongly from clay and wire. Soon, when Rahmiel’s wings were fully fledged, when his hair drifted about him in a cloud, that call would be even more compelling.
Death, lord of the Underworld, would immortalize Thran's name in the dance world. Rahmiel would immortalize Bard's name in the art world just as decisively.
Chapter 91

Chapter Summary

Security systems, the repercussions of gang wars, welding, dancing, garage cleaning, interior decorating, cooking, sculpting, upcoming rehearsals... it's a full day for an angel and a saint.

After Bard escorted the two security technicians out of the ballroom, Thran went back to his rehearsal. He’d been glad of the break, because Irmo had been particularly intense this morning, and would likely remain so all day. The choreographer been polite, and had not resorted to any of his previous outrageous behavior, but still, it was hard for him to stomach the shortened rehearsal today, and Thran’s unavailability tomorrow or Sunday.

The Follies accounted for the disruptions today and tomorrow, and Irmo grudgingly accepted that Thran’s efforts for the event would stir up interest in Immortal’s upcoming premiere in July. The Imladris Academy had agreed to provide their auditorium as the venue, in exchange for allowing qualified students to intern on the set, lighting, sound, and costume crews. Once Lettie had confirmed those arrangements, Thran had had UVB’s publicist place an advertisement in the Follies program for the UltraViolet Ballet Company, which included the teaser line, “Please join us at the Seventh Annual Greenwood Dale on the Lake Arts Festival for the World Premiere of UVB’s New Ballet – Immortal.” Bard’s sketch of Charisse, Luka, and Thran as the Maid, the Soldier, and Death was featured in the ad, and provided a stark yet elegant counterpoint to the words.

While Bard had gladly given permission for Thran to use his sketch in the ad, he hadn’t seen the ad itself yet. Tomorrow night, then, should bring a welcome affirmation of the power of Bard’s abilities, but not just from the program ad; the sketch Bard had donated to the silent auction was wonderful, depicting Aragorn and Arwen Gondor when they’d visited to fence in the ballroom. Both Gondors had generously signed model releases, so Bard’s sketch revealed them quietly smiling at each other, Aragorn with his mask under his arm and épée in hand, holding Arwen’s hand to kiss it. Where Aragorn’s face was more in profile, Arwen’s was a three-quarter view as she met Aragorn’s eyes. Her beauty and his devotion glowed from Bard’s lines, and the love the two shared was palpable. Frodo Baggins had framed it beautifully in a black filigree frame that complimented the romantic nature of the subject, so it should present well in tomorrow’s auction, even at its premium opening bid.

If Irmo understood the importance of the Follies for the children’s school, Bard, and Immortal, he did not understand Thran’s decision not to rehearse on Sunday. There were no other pressing duties, no draws on Thran’s time that Irmo could see – of course not; the choreographer didn’t know the meaning of down time. But Thran was desperate for just that. While he had not regretted a single moment of his work with Sigrid or Tilda for the dances they would do tomorrow night, they had been in addition to countless hours of pointe work, weight training to strengthen his legs, barre work, choreography development, and ballet rehearsals.

Thran wanted – no, needed – a day off.

He wanted to sleep late with his husband, enjoy a decadent breakfast with Bard and the children, perhaps go into the village to peruse the shops, sit quietly in the solarium while Bard worked on Rahmiel or his sketches, talk with the children, hear Sam Gamgee’s suggestions for their Japanese garden, watch the light change from dawn to dusk throughout the beautiful house that grew ever more beautiful each day...

None of those things meant anything to Irmo, so Thran didn’t mention them. Rather, he reminded Irmo of how many days he had worked without a break, noted the devastation that would result if Thran didn’t allow his body a respite, and declared Sunday to be a much-needed break for the three principal dancers as well as the stalwart Ori. Irmo was not happy, but he conceded.

Still, the prospect of not having Thran for two full days at his disposal had made Irmo very focused and very intense all morning. While the concentrated work had resulted in several welcome refinements, it was tiring, and even something so mundane as a discussion of a home security system was a welcome distraction.

In an hour, Bard reappeared as expected. Thran had urged Irmo to work with Charisse and Luka on the Soldier and the Maid’s opening joyous pas de deux so that his absence would not be so disruptive. He left them with Ori to follow Bard into the dining room where Fritz and Karsten waited for them.

“How does their work go?” Thran asked, as he pulled on a sweater, then tied the arms of another around his ribs to keep warm.

Bard shrugged. “Well enough, I hope. They’ve done the whole thing in German or Yiddish, and they’ve been quite animated. So we’re both about to find out.”

“It is likely Yiddish,” Thran surmised. “Many of Mr. Nori’s associates speak that regularly. Few do these days, so it is an effective means to hold privacy.”

“The real Russian mafia,” Bard murmured softly. As he led the way to the dining room, his expression was too sober to be teasing.

“They are more likely to be German,” was Thran’s assessment. “I believe Mr. Nori’s family was one of the many Jewish lineages who fled Europe during the nineteen-thirties.”

Bard winced. “At least they got out. A lot didn’t.”

“A situation many still face in many countries, regardless of religion or other differences.”

Bard swallowed as he took Thran’s arms to shake him gently. “At least a certain Russian got out of his bad situation. He saved another émigré’s life.”

“We saved each other, lyubov moya, for which I, too, am grateful.”

Bard hummed his agreement as Thran pulled his leggings over his tights, then they headed to the dining room.

“Here’s Thran,” Bard said, as they came in. “So what do you suggest for us?”

What followed was a very professional presentation of how Fritz and Karsten had assessed the house, the potential threats, and possible solutions. Thran found no fault with any of it, but despite the serious reasons for a security system, his overall impression was that their two young technicians were every bit the savvy computer hackers that Bard had been reminded of. They might also be excellent at computer games of war and strategy, too – or make a good team of cat burglars, if they’d been so inclined. The ruthless way they catalogued the security weaknesses was impressive; so were their solutions to eliminate those weaknesses.
Given how often the children ran in and out, both Thran and Bard noted their concern over false alarms. In reply, Fritz explained about the different modes they would have at their disposal, from the full alarm capability when they were out, including a night mode that would detect any break-ins without going off if someone got up at night, an in-residence mode, and completely off.

“We’ve planned for your barn, too, given that it holds all your metal-working equipment as well as your finished art, Mr. Bowman,” Karsten continued. “But we also recommend that you alarm the carriage house, too. And the sooner you can put your vehicles in it at night, the better. That’ll be the best protection for them, better than any alarm system you can install on the SUV. Your truck’s old enough that installing one on it isn’t cost effective, and none for a model that old would be much good, anyway. You can still park them out on the driveway during the day, but at night, it’s better to have a snug place for them.”

Bard glanced at Thran. “That’s a good idea. Vandalizing either the SUV or the truck would be just the act of revenge a stalker might resort to, if he couldn’t do anything else.”

Both technicians nodded. “You don’t want to make it easy for them to vent,” Fritz said. “At the same time, you want to make it easy to manage all this for yourselves. Of course you’ll want to manually set things if you want, and just like your thermostat you can set up typical settings. But you’ll have computer access, too, so if you’ve got a tablet or a smart phone, you can modify your settings through them. Say you’re out shopping one evening, and you run late. You can adjust the settings with your phone so you don’t have to rush home. Very convenient.”

“Indeed,” Thran nodded. “So let us talk for a moment, and then we will reconvene.”

“Of course,” Fritz nodded. “At your leisure.”

By tacit consent, Thran and Bard headed upstairs to their bedroom. Thran took the chair in the corner, and Bard lounged on the bed.

“I think we should do the whole thing,” Bard said before Thran could speak.

“So do I. We have little of value other than our children, but they are the most important things we will ever have. I do not want them to worry, or us to worry about them while they are in the house.”

“Exactly my thinking,” Bard nodded. “And that’s a good idea about the carriage house. I should have thought of that before now.”

“What is in the carriage house that precludes our use of it?”

“Mostly construction supplies and garden equipment. If I work at it, I can get the construction supplies in the barn, and that would give us plenty of room for the truck and SUV. It’s actually big enough to get a third vehicle in there, but don’t tell Sigrid or Legolas that. They’ll both be ready to drive soon.”

“Oy, vey,” Thran shuddered. “Nothing will provide us a sense of security when that happens.”

“No,” Bard shook his head. “More white hair for me, I expect. You’re already there.”

“I will still cringe.”

Bard exhaled. “All right, looks like I need to change my plans. If the security lads don’t need me, I’ll start this afternoon to move enough of the stuff out of the carriage house for us to get the vehicles in there. Tomorrow, I’ll commandeer the lads to help me – Bain, anyway, as I assume Legolas will go to the Gondors’ to fence. Are you going, too?”
“Perhaps Legolas will do without me tomorrow. I want to help you.”

“You’ve got to dance tomorrow night, angel.”

Thran waved a hand. “For a grand total of ten or eleven minutes. An hour to warm the body, a half hour to cool it, and that is all. I will behave myself in the carriage house and not try to lift massive amounts of boards or bags of cement or whatever is in there, but I can certainly use a broom or wash windows or arrange things on a shelf. Even if I do all of those, it will still be a vacation from Immortal. And I can at last say that I have helped with the work on the house.”

“You’ve helped paint and clean floors and scrub woodwork. That counts.”

“So will to clean the garage. This is a time-honored task of families, yes? So I will help my family with this ritual, as is right.”

Bard’s face dissolved into a crooked grin, and he shook his head. “I haven’t seen you so excited since you learned to program the ballroom thermostat. The ballet dancer’s becoming domesticated.”

Thran grinned. “Happily so. As for the security system, we will do it all, then?”

“I think we should. I want the children to be safe, not just feel safe. And us, as well.”

“I agree. So let us tell our two security experts.”

They went down the stairs together, informed Fritz and Karsten of their decision, and the pair soon had their paperwork completed and ready for Bard and Thran to sign. As he reviewed it, though, Thran frowned at one particular clause.

“What does this mean, waiver of installation cost?” Thran reversed the contract for the two technicians to read. Both, however, glanced at each other rather than at the paperwork.

“That’s courtesy of Mr. Nori,” Karsten said, after some deliberation.

Thran skewered them both with sharp eyes. “Explain.”

More glances back and forth, and Karsten’s lips tightened. It was the older brother, Fritz, who ventured to speak.

“Consider it appreciation for a long business association.”

“Ah,” Thran didn’t lower his gaze. “The gang war, yes?”

Karsten’s eyes widened and he looked at his brother, but Fritz met Thran’s eyes without a blink. “You, ah, know about that, then.”

“I am the cause of it,” Thran reposted. “Is Mr. Nori in danger? Or perhaps I should rephrase that – is Mr. Nori in more danger than he normally is, given the nature of his business?”

Karsten muttered something under his breath, a Yiddish curse if Thran had to speculate.

“Nori Goldman,” Thran pressed, “is caught up in a war between drug gangs because some of his associates have, shall we say, a vested interest in one or more of those gangs, and in the chaos he may be compromised. I have had nothing but good dealings with him, and do not wish him to come to harm. But it is not like him to reward our dealings with a waiver of fees. You understand my concern, then?”
The younger brother murmured something in Yiddish to the older, but Fritz’s expression remained impassive. He didn’t quail at Thran’s concentrated attention.

“Mr. Nori thanks you for his concern. The waiver’s his way of saying so. He’s a tough old fox, and he’ll be all right.”

“What of his brothers, Dori and Ori? Are they safe?”

Karsten muttered again, and this time Fritz hummed a concession. The younger brother met Thran’s eyes. “Dori’s gone on a well-deserved vacation. Ori’s here a lot of the time, and that’s a big help.”

“Does Ori need a place to stay?” Bard asked quietly. “We’ve got a spare room here. It’s as much of a construction site as the rest of the place is, but he’s welcome to it, if he likes. If you need to talk to him, he’s in the ballroom.”

“It’s kind of you to offer,” Fritz replied. “Ori’s spoken of how generous you’ve been to him, and I see the proof of that in your offer. But he’s all right, and should be until things settle.”

“Yah, he’s bunking with us. Our place is pretty well secured,” Karsten volunteered with a slight smile.

“I would think so,” Bard agreed. “Ori’s a good soul.”

“The best,” Fritz agreed firmly.

“I have read everything, then,” Thran handed the paperwork to Bard. “See what you think.”

Bard read carefully, asked to clarify a minor point or two, but in a few minutes they agreed to terms. Fritz and Karsten outlined what they needed to do to begin their installation, then headed out to their van for the necessary components. As Thran prepared to go back to the ballroom, Bard hauled out his bowl of bread dough, gave it a quick punch, and shaped it into long French loaves.

“I'll head out to the carriage house to assess the chaos,” he gave Thran a wry smile. “I hope it’s not as bad as I expect it to be.”

“Everything will get done,” Thran reminded him. “Just so that you do not worry, I will tell you now that I will not stop at noon for lunch. Irmo is already unhappy that he must stop early today, not to mention not work at all tomorrow and Sunday, so I will delay lunch until three, when I have told him I must stop. So eat something for yourself as you need to, and I will eat when we are through.”

“Okay,” Bard agreed, if reluctantly – he was not thrilled about the delay. His saint watched every bite that went into Thran’s mouth more than Thran did. “I’ll take a quick look, and plan my attack on the mess accordingly.”

“Until later, then, my saint.”

“You know where I’ll be, angel.”

Thran headed back into the ballroom. As much as he loved to dance, today he would have rather stayed with Bard to oversee installation of their security system, and help with Bard’s efforts in the carriage house. But for the next four hours, he would remain the ballet dancer, if a distracted one.
Bard had a lot to think about as he grabbed the key to the carriage house and headed outside. He made sure that the security techs knew where he was in case they needed him, then he hurried to haul up the middle bay of the carriage house and get out of the steady rain. He hadn’t ventured in here for years, and the dust that coated everything gave proof to that. There was a jumble of lawn and garden equipment – rakes, shovels, loppers, hoes, a mountain of flower pots strewn every which way, and a half-full bag of potting soil so old that the plastic wrapping had dried out and crumbled, spilling dirt in a ring around it. Paint cans, some empty, some not. A pile of rebar he should have put in the barn years ago. Stacks of lumber for a playhouse that Daphne had wanted to build for the children. A few shutters off the house – those, at least, could be stripped, painted, and put back on the house if he wanted, or recycled if he didn’t. Bags of garden stone, another pair of garden benches, two ladders, a broken snow shovel… so many dribs and drabs that long ago had held promise, only to have lost it when Daphne had died. Maybe most of these things would find purpose again, now that a family was back in residence.

Most of the avalanche of garden pots was on the far right side of the carriage house, so by default that bay would become the potting shed. Bard heaved up that door so he could see what he was doing. The carriage house had once had light fixtures overhead, but they’d been vintage enough that Jerry had sold them, just as he had the interior house fixtures and fireplace mantel, trying to stay afloat. Daylight would have to do until Bard could see about some new fixtures. He found a broom and swept out the rightmost bay, then cleaned off one of the old wooden shelves against the back wall to hold the pots. He got most of those brushed out and stacked before Karsten came trotting out to ask a question. Soon after, he got another three shelves cleaned off and into place beside the first, and piled most of the gardening supplies in rough order on them. Tools got stacked against the wall. The spilled potting soil went into the wheelbarrow and hauled out into the yard to fill a hole or two. He moved the mower from the barn back into the carriage house, then lined up the barrow and garden cart next to it. Empty paint cans went into the big rubbish barrel, and so did cans full of solidified paint. Only one or two cans held anything liquid, so Bard put them on a shelf; he’d look later to see if any of them held anything worth keeping.

The rain had slowed to a drizzle, so Bard took the chance to haul the rebar into the barn. The lumber would take more effort, because he had to clear space before he could move it. For now, he’d stack it on the floor of the third bay so he could get the SUV and truck in the other two. His stomach growled, but he pushed on, wanting to at least get the carriage house floor swept before they put the vehicles inside. The water dripping onto the floor would turn the dust and dirt into mud, which would be that much harder to remove. He relented once he got the lumber moved, and dashed inside to down a thick ham sandwich. Minutes later, he was back to tackle the cobwebs that festooned the carriage house rafters and walls. As he swept, the air grew so thick that he sneezed repeatedly, and clouds of dust billowed out into the rain. It wasn’t a great cleanup, but it would hold them until tomorrow. He checked that the window locks were still secure – he’d been scrupulous about maintaining such things over the years – then backed Thran’s SUV into the leftmost bay and his truck into the center one. It would be a tight squeeze until he could get the lumber stacked in the barn, but at least the vehicles were under cover.

He heaved down two of the three bay doors, leaving the third one open in case Karsten and Fritz needed access to complete their work. Before he headed back to the house, he shook out his coat, grinning at the cloud of dust that resulted. Better he leave that much grit outside rather than in the house. Life had been so hectic that no one had cleaned anything for a week, and the dust balls had grown to alarming proportions. Once the Follies were over, everyone would have to chip in for some serious cleaning.

When Bard came back inside, he found that the security technicians had made good progress.
Karsten was in the central hall, checking that the components he and his brother had already installed were working properly; Fritz was upstairs, installing window monitors.

“Last one in the yellow room’s in,” Fritz called down.

“Got it,” Karsten called up, tapping his tablet, smiling at Bard as he came in. “Hi, Mr. Bowman. Once everything’s in place, we’ll show you how to access your system on your computer and your phone, but we’ll get everything installed first.”

“Sounds good,” Bard nodded. “I’m done for the moment in the carriage house. I left one of the doors open for you.”

“Thanks,” Karsten replied. “We’re almost done here in the house, as that’s the most important part. Then we’ll head outside for the barn and the carriage house. Those shouldn’t take too much longer.”

“Let me know when you need us,” Bard agreed.

He headed back to the kitchen to check on the simmering pot of chili. He’d left the bread to rise longer than he should have but it would taste fine anyway. He switched on the oven, then headed back to the solarium for a few more minutes of work on Rahmiel while the oven preheated. Once the bread was in, its rising aroma gave Bard something delicious to anticipate while he worked. His ham sandwich was long since gone, and his mouth watered as the bread baked.

Just as the bread came out of the oven, he heard voices in the central hall – Charisse, Luka, and Irmo were leaving. He stuck his head out to wish them a good weekend, which Luka and Charisse returned with wishes of their own. Irmo seemed disgruntled more than anything else, but at least he raised a hand in farewell as he headed through the door. Soon only Ori’s car remained in the driveway; the young man stood talking softly with Karsten. Thran made his appearance from the ballroom, looking tired, but he smiled widely at Bard.

“Look! No ballet until Monday! Two days and a bit more away! I am beside myself!”

“A holiday, indeed!” Bard grinned. It was good to see Thran look forward to a little home life, and Bard easily caught a little of Thran’s festive spirit. “Do you want lunch first, or a shower? The bread just came out of the oven.”

“Tcha, how do you expect me to care about a shower in the face of such a delicious aroma of fresh bread?”

“I don’t,” Bard teased. “You need to eat, so come eat.”

Ori was still in the hall with Karsten, and the pair still murmured back and forth quietly. Ori looked so concerned that Thran interrupted the quiet conversation.

“Ori, all is well with your brother?”

Ori glanced at Karsten, who muttered what sounded like an explanatory sentence, then studiously turned his eyes on his tablet. Ori met Thran’s eyes directly. “Nori’s fine, Thran. He’s not in any real danger, or so he’s led us to believe. He’s concerned about some of his employees, that’s all. He’s asked me to stay with my cousins for a day or so, until things blow over. It’s just a precaution.”

“I told Karsten that we’ve got a spare room here, if you need it,” Bard said. “It’s not much, but it’s here if you need it.”

“That’s kind of you, but I’ll be fine with Kar and Fritz. If I could stay here until they’re done with your security system, though, I’d appreciate that. That we we’d all end up home at the same time.”

“Of course,” Bard nodded. “We’re about to have lunch, if you’d like some.”

“That’s kind of you, too, but I brought a sandwich, and I can help Kar and Fritz with the computer interface.”

“Good enough,” Bard replied. “We’ll be in the kitchen if you need anything.”

Bard and Thran left Ori and his cousins to their work, and headed into the kitchen for a much-needed meal. Thran sliced the warm bread and fetched the crock of butter while Bard ladled chili into bowls. Both were so hungry that neither spoke for some minutes until they’d taken the edge off their hunger. Even after that point, conversation was sparse; Thran was likely as relieved for a chance to sit as Bard was.

“We must run the dishwasher,” Thran observed when they took their dishes to the sink, “or we will not have enough bowls and cups for supper.”

“That’s not all that needs doing around here,” Bard exhaled. “With everything going on, the laundry needs doing, the house is about to be taken over by dust balls, the bathrooms are appalling, and every one of us has scattered stuff from one end of the house to the other. Tomorrow and Sunday, we have to muster the troops.”

Thran hummed in agreement. “I will start the dishwasher now, then I must wash. I am much too foul to go to the Follies rehearsal as I am.”

“I’m no better,” Bard agreed. “Let’s head up for a scrub, then we can enjoy a cup of tea.”

“Perfect,” Thran agreed, and before long, they were back in the kitchen much the cleaner for their scrub. Bard put the kettle on the stove while Thran found two mugs in the cupboard.

“What kind of tea do you want?” Thran asked, peering at the glass containers that held their various kinds of tea.

“I’m not particular, angel. Whatever one you want is fine.”

“Green?”

“That’s good. Either the plain or the jasmine.”

“Jasmine, then. A counterpoint to the spicy chili.”

“Kettle’s hot.”

Thran got the tea into the pot, and passed it to Bard to fill. “The sitting room?”

“With a side trip to the solarium? I worked on Rahmiel this morning, in and around everything else. I’d like to see what you think of him.”

“Does he have wings now?” Thran asked, eyebrows raised and lips curved in a smile.

“He’s got wing armatures now,” Bard amended. “So you can see what they’ll look like.”

“Let us look,” Thran grabbed the pot and the mugs and hurried into the sitting room. He plunked everything on the fruit crate without ceremony, and pulled Bard into the solarium. “Chert, Bard, he is wonderful! Such a wide sweep of his wings – and you have made the base and there is the saint.
Look, the armature for his wings comes right out of his back! How did you manage that?”

“Two minutes of welding, if that,” Bard explained.

“Suka blyad!” Thran put his arms akimbo to glare at Bard, but they didn’t stay still for long. As Bard expected, Thran threw his hands up in the air, as he was wont to do when he was exasperated. “I missed you weld? Ty grebanyy huiesos! I would have thrown Irmo and the rest of them out hours ago if I had known you would sneak into the barn and do that! I have waited so long to see it, and I missed it!”

Bard dissolved into laughter. “It was only two minutes, angel, and nothing like what you expected. It took me longer to prep the torch than to do the actual weld. Wait until the weather’s warmer, and you’ll get your chance to indulge your kink for grungy welders.”

Thran sniffed as he folded his arms over his chest and gave Rahmiel a close inspection. “Tcha. You owe me for this, lyubov moya.”

“Put it on my tab,” Bard teased. “You missed the grungy carriage house cleaner, too.”

Thran’s lips curved up in a sly smile. “Him I will see tomorrow, I hope. How did the cleaner’s efforts go?”

“Both vehicles are inside. The driveway’s empty but for Ori’s car and the techs’ van.”

“You have been your usual unbelievable self again, then, to work so hard,” Thran exhaled, still regarding Rahmiel. He swallowed, then offered Bard a shy glance. “I am very humbled when I look at him. He is me, but so much more. I know I am biased, my saint, but he is magical. The wings have drawn the focus so much clearer. Such movement, such life...”

Bard stuffed his hands in his front jeans pockets. “I was worried that after our big fight, he’d never capture what I originally saw when you flew down the stairs that day. But we came through it stronger than before, and so did Rahmiel. He’s better now, just as we are.”

The look that Thran turned on Bard was somber as he put his arms around Bard. “We are better, yes. But you still have so many stars in your eyes – it quite takes the breath from me.”

“Paybacks,” Bard snuck arms around Thran’s waist.

“What is this paybacks?” Thran held him at arm’s length to frown at him in puzzlement.

“You took my breath when you flew down the stairs, and you still do it more times than not when I watch you dance. You’ve got your own magic, don’t doubt it.”

Thran’s smile was pleased, then he mugged an exaggerated shrug. “So we both have a little magic.”

“We both have a little tea waiting for us in the sitting room. We ought to drink it before it gets cold.”

“Soon we will drink lots of cold tea,” Thran said, drawing Bard back into the sitting room. “In the summer, nothing slakes thirst as well as tea over ice. Black tea with spearmint is my favorite – so good.”

“We’ll make sun tea. That’s easy – you fill a clear bottle with water, add tea bags, and set it in the sun. In a couple of hours, take out the teabags, and you have a bottle full of tea.”

“Mmm,” Thran hummed in anticipation. “It will be delicious, whether in our solarium or in the main room – chert! The main room! I have something to show you for it, Bard.”

Thran picked up his laptop and opened it. He opened the browser and quickly navigated to a particular page.

“There!” he pointed to the thumbnail of a sofa on the page, and quickly clicked on it. “I like this. What do you think of it?”

Bard slid closer beside Thran to regard the screen. The sofa looked to be a sectional, but it was a sweeping, curved oval, rather than the usual three-sided U-shape. It was sleek without being what Bard thought of as airport modern, and seemed to be covered in a soft, pale green, sueded fabric. There were no legs, but sat flat on the floor, and the cushions were luxuriously plump, comfortable enough to nap on. It could easily sit eight or nine.

“I’ve never seen a sofa like that.” Bard admitted. “It’s got great lines, and the fabric looks great. I can see you lounging on that, looking very... compelling.”

Thran snickered. “Then shall I show you la pièce de résistance?”

“Go.”

Thran clicked on the screen, and the sofa turned blue – a greyed one, maybe hinting towards turquoise, or maybe lapis. Bard hummed appreciatively.

“Very nice.”

“Very nice, indeed. Imagine it before the fireplace, perhaps with a silver gilt table with a glass top?”

“I like it. Can you send for a fabric swatch? I can’t tell if it’s turquoise or bluer than that.”

“I will find out. And we should check that the measurements fit the main room. If it is too large or small, it will look ridiculous.”

“If we like the fabric, we can get paint to complement it, and I’ll lay about with a brush again.”

“And we will get a mantel that matches the sofa. It will look beautiful.”

“It will.”

Bard’s mobile chimed. He sobered instantly, fished the device out of his pocket, and silenced it. Thran gave him a concerned look. “What is it, Bard?”

“Time to head to the bus stop. I set an alarm so I got there before the bus arrives.”

Thran sobered just as fast. “I will change and go with you. If you will shut down my computer?”

“Go,” Bard nodded. Thran ran upstairs, so Bard shut down the browser and closed the computer. He headed for the mudroom, fetched jackets and umbrellas for him and Thran, and was waiting for Thran in the central hall when he came clattering down. They headed outside through the front door, calling to Karsten and Fritz who were in the carriage house. The rain had slackened, but the air was still misty as they hiked up the lane.

“See anything?” Bard asked, as they drew near to the bus stop.

“Nothing,” Thran replied just as tersely, looking around them. They waited in silence for a few minutes, then greeted Rosie as she came up from her house to wait for the bus. She looked at them in surprise for it was not their habit to meet the bus, but Bard steered the conversation to tomorrow’s Follies. Rosie had donated a small piece of stained glass to the silent auction, and they chatted about that, Bard’s sketch, and Thran’s dances with the girls. In a few minutes, the bus arrived, and all the children spilled out. All four of the children looked happy and carefree, which lightened Bard’s thoughts. They bade Rosie and her brood goodbye, and headed home.

“How was your day, sweetness?” Bard heralded Sigrid.

“As long as he’s not there,” Tilda said, and no one had to ask who “he” was.

“Maybe you scared him off, Til,” Bain said.

“That’s true,” Legolas said firmly. “He ran away from you last night as soon as he saw you, so I bet he won’t be anywhere near us ever again.”

Thran smiled at Legolas, proud of his son’s attempt to reassure Tilda, and patted his shoulder in thanks as they headed back to the house.

“Hey! What happened to the truck? And Ada’s SUV?” Sigrid exclaimed, as they came up the driveway.

Bard explained about the security system being installed, and how he’d gotten the carriage house cleaned out enough to get the vehicles inside. As they approached, Karsten came out of the barn to say that he and Fritz were finished, and wanted to install the administration software on Thran’s laptop and phone. While Thran fetched both devices to give to Ori, Bard shepherded the children into the mudroom to shed jackets and boots and shoes, clean out backpacks, and retrieve lunch bags.

By the time Thran had had his lesson on how to use the security system and seen Ori, Karsten, and Fritz on their way, supper was underway. Even though Bard and Thran had just eaten two hours ago, both ate something with the children. Both Sigrid and Tilda were also light eaters, because both of them were so excited about tonight’s dress rehearsal; still, neither turned down Bard’s vanilla brownies. Bain and Legolas more than made up for their sisters’ lighter portions, wolfing down everything that passed either of them. If either of the boys felt any apprehension, it certainly hadn’t affected their appetites.

The family shared the cleanup, then Tilda and Sigrid put on their costumes, and Thran dressed in the jeans, Henley, and trainers he’d wear for his dance with Sigrid. He also collected his box of theatrical makeup, as well as his doll costume. Bard had on jeans and a flannel shirt, and his boots, and he had a workman’s apron to wear when he carried Thran onto the stage.

“Everyone ready to go?” Bard called. “Lads, you have your books?”

“I’m ready,” Tilda called, skipping into the kitchen. She had on a red corduroy pinafore atop a white pullover, both of which she and Sigrid had found at the thrift store, black tights, and her black snow boots to which she’d fastened big red pompoms. Bard had braided her hair into two pigtails just above her ears, and the big red hair bow was pinned to the top of her head.

“You look great, little doll,” Bard complimented.

“Thank you,” Tilda said primly, striking a pose. “Ada’s going to give me pink cheeks when we get to the school.”
Sigrid came into the kitchen. She had a white leotard and tights under the tutu, and her hair was wrapped into a tight bun and crowned with the ballet tiara Thran had borrowed for her. She pulled on leggings over her tights, and a loose sweater over the leotard. With her ballet slippers, she looked just like an aspiring ballerina.

“You could pass for a student in any dance class,” Thran nodded approvingly. “Very nice.”

“That’ll change when you make me up like a ghost,” she grinned. “That’ll be fun.”

“So let us go,” Thran beckoned, ushering the family out of the mudroom door. "Oh! Bard! Remember to bring your sketch for the silent auction!"

“I’ve got the sketch, angel. Wait, don’t we have to set the security system?” Bard paused before he locked the door behind them.

Thran pulled out his mobile. “I will do that once we get the SUV from the carriage house. Ori and Karsten explained it all to me, and the program is very easy to use. They set up different modes for us, so all I must do is choose the Away mode, and everything is set.”

“I’ll get the door open, then,” Bard said, handing his sketch to Bain, and soon the family was ensconced in Thran’s SUV. Bard closed the carriage house bay and climbed into the SUV beside Thran.

“So now I arm the security system,” Thran said, holding up his mobile. Bard leaned close to watch – it was as simple as Thran had promised, merely a display of modes, one labeled Away, which Thran selected. Other than the appearance of a couple of new outside lights, nothing seemed to be different.

“That’s it?”

“Indeed,” Thran nodded.

“Hmm,” Bard exhaled. “We’d best be off, then.”

“And we’re leaving, too!” the children chorused behind him, drawing Thran’s laughter as well as his own. Thran pulled out of the driveway, and they were on their way to the Imladris Academy auditorium.

Now, if only the rest of the evening passed by with as little fanfare...
Chapter 92

Chapter Summary

It's on to the dress rehearsal for the April Fool's Follies! How will a ghostly acrobat and a mischievous little girl fare on a cold and rainy night?

Rain still fell steadily as Thran piloted his SUV out of the driveway and down the lane. It might be the first of April, but the cold, damp evening felt more wintry than springlike. It wasn’t cold enough to turn the rain to snow or sleet, but it still was miserable enough to remind Thran of the night he’d walked home from his old ballet company’s studio, out of a job, ankle aching, and frozen, the same night he’d first set eyes on the man who would become lyubov yego. It brought a smile to his lips—four months later, he was husband to a talented artist, father to four delightful children, living in a beautiful house full of laughter, and head of a new company that was about to bring an exciting new ballet to the world.

Before he’d dance as Death in Immortal, though, he’d dance as a young man with a beguiling ghost, and as an oversized rag doll with a small, mischievous girl.

His smile widened. Playful dances these might be, and nothing monumental to the dance world, but in his new world, no amount of cold rain would dim his pleasure or his pride.

In deference to the time Thran would need to properly warm up for the dances with his daughters, Clan Ffyrnig had set off early, so arrived at the school in time to find a parking space close to the building. Everyone piled out, Sigrid holding an umbrella over her father’s head as he carried his plastic-bag-wrapped sketch in his arms. Thran had his makeup box, and the boys had their books. Tilda stayed close to her father as they walked into the school, but she was calm; only her intent inspection of everyone around her revealed that she was wary about spotting Lance Dunmont again. Both of the boys noticed her watching, for they positioned themselves on either side of her—or perhaps they’d decided beforehand to provide a reassuring presence for their sister. It would be like them to do so. When Thran caught Legolas’s gaze, he smiled and offered a thumbs up in appreciation.

“I’ll drop off my sketch, then I can play dance roadie,” Bard gave Thran a smile.

“The silent auction’s in the lunchroom, Bard,” Legolas pointed. “I saw some of it as they began to set everything up after lunch. There are several amazing things already.”

“Yeah, Da,” Bain seconded. “I saw Miss Rosie’s stained glass. I bet you’ll like it, Til— it’s a sun catcher, shaped like a sunflower.”

“Oooh!” Tilda brightened. “Elanor told me about it, but it wasn’t here yet when I had lunch. They’d just started to set up the tables.”

“Let’s go see,” Sigrid invited, and led the way with Tilda. They came into the lunchroom, transformed into a gallery with many pieces of art already in place. Bard waved at the young man helping a group of students to set up an exhibit.

“Hi, Theodred!” Bard called. “Look at this—you got your urban art students’ collection after all!”
You’ve got some nice pieces, lads.”

“Thanks, Mr. Bowman!” several grinned in appreciation. There were a variety of pieces – a pair of big, graffiti-inspired paintings in a bright kaleidoscope of colors, several manga pages, a scattering of colorful anime cels, some kinetic art. Several posters around the art explained the different genres and their history, and the final one made a plea to sign the students’ petition to add a class to the school’s art curriculum. While this kind of art was not Thran’s favorite, he was still impressed at the skill and range of subjects, and the attractiveness of the exhibit.

“Theodred, you know Tilda, of course...”

“Hi, Mr. Rohan,” piped Tilda.

“This is my husband, Thran Oropherson, and these are the rest of our children, Bain, Legolas, and Sigrid.”

“Hi, Tilda,” the young man smiled. “Nice to meet you, Thran, and you, too, Bain, Legolas, and Sigrid. Tilda, you’re going to dance tonight with Thran, aren’t you?”

Tilda’s face warmed to her usual sunny enthusiasm. “I am, and Sigrid, too! Tonight we finally get to wear our costumes, and Ada’s going to make up our faces and everything. He’s going to turn Sigrid into a ghost.”

“Pretty exciting,” Theodred grinned.

“I can’t wait,” Sigrid admitted.

“So here’s my sketch for the auction.” Bard hefted his armful of wrapped picture frame. “Where do you want me to put it?”

Theodred craned his neck, finally pointing to the line of tables that ran down the center of the lunchroom. “Over there, about halfway down, I think.” He turned to the four students working to arrange the exhibit. “I’ll put Mr. Bowman’s donation up, then I’ll be right back, guys.”

“Okay, Mr. Rohan,” the students waved.

Theodred led the family to the easel set up for Bard’s sketch. Once unwrapped from its protective plastic, the sketch went on the easel. Even in a school lunchroom surrounded by other artwork, it still drew attention.

“Wow, that’s a great piece,” Theodred nodded, as Bard stood back. “It ought to bring a good price.”

“I hope so,” Bard shrugged. “You can use the funds to bring your urban art class in house.”

“That’d be perfect,” Theodred agreed, chuckling. “We need all the help we can get. Enjoy your dances tonight, ladies. Break a leg! And Thran, Sigrid, Legolas, and Bain, I’m glad to meet you.”

The family left Theodred hastening back to his students to make the final adjustments to their exhibit. As they strolled out, Thran was impressed at how many different contributions already festooned the lunchroom tables – woven tapestries, jewelry, paintings, sculpture, stained glass, handmade paper collages, and many more. Tilda pointed to Rosie’s sunflower sun catcher, which was only one of the treasures to be found.

“So many beautiful things,” Thran murmured to Bard as they headed for the auditorium. “And all so professional! For the first time, I realize how talented our village is. This is a delight. I would like to
“So would I. It goes on all afternoon, just like the talent show and the craft booths, so we’ll have lots to see around your dances with the girls. Do you know what times your dances will be?”

Thran shook his head. “I asked only that there not be too much of a gap between them, so that I do not have to stay warm for more than an hour, especially if I do Sigrid’s first. Tilda’s requires me to be well limber. But however it ends up, I will manage.”

They made their way into the auditorium. Bard and the boys found seats while Thran, Sigrid, and Tilda headed for the sign-in table near the stage.

“Hi, Mr. Oropherson!” Zuhayra, the girl they’d met last night, waved at them. “Hi, Sigrid, hi, Tilda! Good to see you again! Oooh, Sig – you’ve got a crown! Nice!”

“It is good to see you again, too,” Thran smiled. “Tomorrow is the big day when we will hear you sing, yes?”

“Tonight’s pretty big, too,” she agreed. “We get to see you dance again! The guys told me you need about an hour to warm up tonight, right?”

Thran nodded. “I do. I hope that does not disrupt your schedule tonight.”

“It doesn’t. Tonight, it’s pretty much first come, first served. Tomorrow, though, we are doing a schedule. Do you have a preference for which dance you do first, and how long do you need between them?”

“I prefer to dance Midnight at the Carnival first, please. Tonight, I need only a ten-minute gap to change my costume and makeup, then I can dance The Doll. Tomorrow, I would prefer an hour between them, if possible.”

“That’s no problem,” Zuhayra nodded, scribbling a note beside the entries for Thran and the girls. “I’ve got that written down here. I don’t know where you’ll be, but if I had to guess, I think Ms. Ktinga and Headmaster L’Eärendil are going to put you nearer the end, to encourage people to stay longer at the Follies. You’re the big talent draw, from what I hear.”

“Ahh, that is because of my beautiful daughters,” Thran looked at each of the girls. “They get the best of me in our dances. One will convince me to run off with a ghost, and the other will make a very large fool out of me.”

“It’s fitting,” Sigrid winked at Thran. “You’ll be just the April Fool the Follies needs. Right, Til?”

“Right,” Tilda nodded firmly. “Except when he falls over me, then I’ll be the April Fool.”

“To the back hall with us, again?” Sigrid asked Zuhayra.

“That’s the place. Ingrid’s back there; when you’re ready, she’ll send you out.”

“Thank you,” Tilda murmured politely, drawing Zuhayra’s smile.

“You’re welcome. And break a leg, Tilda!”

The little girl grinned. “You break one, too, tomorrow!”

The trio retraced their steps to find Bard and the boys. When they spotted them, Thran found Kíllian, Finn, Tara, and Kíllian’s mate Derry with them. Sigrid exclaimed in surprise when she saw Finn in his ubiquitous hockey jersey, reddening just a little when her aspiring beau waved at her.

“Hi, Sig! I’m up with Kíl for the weekend, and when he told me he had to do his bit with Derry tonight, I thought I’d come along to cheer him on.”

Kíllian snickered. “And it doesn’t matter to you at all that yon pretty lass and her sister are here to rehearse their dances, does it?”

Now it was Finn who reddened, but he gave Sigrid a wider grin. “I must admit that they’ll make a much prettier picture than you and Derry will, by far.”

That met with a chorus of hoots, and even the normally even-tempered Bard had to smother laughter.

“Maybe not,” Sigrid riposted through the laughter. “When next you see me, I’ll be a ghost, so there.”

“A pretty one, all the same,” Finn insisted, drawing more hoots. “So go on, then. Go do your dance, and I’ll see you afterwards, maybe?”

“It’ll be a bit,” Sigrid explained. “We have to do our makeup and then our warmup. But I’ll see you afterwards, whenever.”

“Okay,” Finn nodded.

“Papa,” Legolas murmured, and drew Thran a few steps away with Bain. Bard followed as a matter of course. “Kíllian and Tara said Bain and I could hang with them while you and Bard and the girls dance,” Legolas explained, and Bain seconded that with a nod. “So we’ll be together, with people, if you know what I mean, so you and Bard can stay with the girls.”

Thran knew exactly what Legolas meant, and a glance at Bard showed that he understood, too.

“Bard, are you comfortable with that?”

“I am, if you are,” Bard agreed.

“I am. But you and Bain must stay together with your friends, synok, if you know what I mean.”

“Yes, Papa; yes, Thran,” the boys murmured.

“This is very serious. You cannot be casual about this.”

“We won’t be, Papa.”

“If you think you see something, don’t chase it,” Bard said. “Find the policeman in the lobby, or one of the teachers, if you can’t find us.”

“We will, Da.”

“Okay,” Bard exhaled. “Let’s get the girls. Lads, stay together, and we’ll see you soon.”

Thran waved to Sigrid and Tilda, who stood talking with Tara and Kíllian. Both came to join their fathers, and they headed to the back hall reserved for the performers’ preparations.

Thran felt at home as theythreaded their way down the back hall. How many dressing rooms, rehearsal halls, and performance venues had he seen with just this bustle, just this flurry of excitement? Here was a pair of giggling girl acrobats, sharing a joke while stretching in the most outrageous contortions. In one of the side rooms reserved for musicians was a pair of fiddlers, rolling up their sleeves and tuning their instruments. Many offered smiles and greetings as Sigrid headed to a vacant space halfway down the hall where they could pile their things and do their makeup. Behind them, a laugh of greeting went up as Derry and Killian squeezed by to join the two fiddlers. Another side room was for singers, who warbled scales to warm their vocal chords. The din was happy and relaxed, and Thran’s excitement for the coming performance started to build.

“First the makeup, then the warmup,” Thran said to the girls. “Tilda, would you like to be first?”

“Yes!” she replied, an excited smile on her face. “Remember, pink cheeks.”

“Of course.” Thran nodded, folding himself down on his knees. “Sit here, ma petite, and I will make the pink cheeks.”

He opened his makeup box, which was just a portable paint box, and little different from the small toolbox that Bard kept in the back of his truck. Instead of screwdrivers or pliers or paintbrushes, his held small jars and pads of theatrical makeup, sponge applicators, cotton swabs, tissues, makeup brushes, and a jar of cold cream. He took out a clean sponge wedge, opened the pot of red, and dabbed the sponge gently into the pot.

“Make the nice smile for me, Kukla,” he invited, and dabbed the sponge over the apples of her cheeks until bright circles of color appeared. He handed her a round mirror. “See, the pink cheeks appear. Now for the bright eyes.”

He carefully drew thin, dark lines around Tilda’s eyes, then a little pale shadow on her lids, then smaller dark lines to exaggerate her lashes. The final touches were bright red lips in a Cupid’s bow. “Et voila! The mischievous little girl is ready to play with the big floppy doll.”

Tilda examined herself in the mirror, unable to resist a big smile. “The red goes with my pinafore.”

“It does,” Bard nodded, as Tilda got to her feet. “You look great, little doll. Exactly like the girl who’d sneak into the doll maker’s workshop to play with his latest creation.”

“You look so cute, Til,” Sigrid smiled. “Everyone’s going to love you.”

“Thank you,” Tilda said with great dignity, offering a curtsey. She snuck Thran a look. “I’ve been practicing my bow, Ada. It’s much better, I think.”

“It is very nice,” Thran chuckled with Bard and Sigrid. “Now it is Sigrid’s turn. Come, I will make you into a ghost.”

With a big grin, Sigrid scrambled to sit down. “Oh, this is so exciting, Ada. Tilda, hand me the mirror so I can watch what Ada does!”

“First, I turn you pale, but not too pale – we do not want the audience to think you are a skeleton! Just enough to match your leotard and tights.”

Thran used a fresh sponge to dab white over her face, neck, and upper chest and back where her white leotard didn’t cover. Thank goodness that Sigrid’s leotard had long sleeves, or he would have been painting for much longer to turn her exposed skin white. The interesting part was next, contouring her face with grey and black and blue. The hard part was to coax Sigrid to stop grinning as she watched the transformation take place – it was hard to turn cheeks hollow and gaunt when they were so busy smiling. As he worked, he was aware of Bard watching with an artists’ eye as he made shadows and lines, and Tilda. But several others around them came to watch, too.

“Wow, that’s amazing,” someone said in a hushed tone, as Thran blended two dark lines into the white to make a sharp shadow under Sigrid’s cheekbone.
“Geez, Sigrid!” a girl called. “You really look tired tonight!”

“I don’t know what it is, April, but I just feel dead,” was Sigrid’s joking return. “It must be something I ate.”

“Something you ate a hundred years ago,” another boy laughed.

“At least,” Sigrid returned.

“Just one more minute, and then you are done. Take this,” Thran said, dipping a swab into the black and handing it to Sigrid. “As you put on your usual lipstick.”

Sigrid quickly painted her lips black. “Okay?”

“Perfect. You are done.”

Sigrid admired herself in the mirror. “Positively ghoulish, Ada.”

“You look creepy,” was Tilda’s pronouncement.

“She will not look quite so creepy while on stage, Kukla,” Thran explained. “With all the lights, the audience who sits farther away will think she looks like a ghost, not the zombies your brothers are so enamored with.”

“Good,” Tilda decided. “Ghosts are okay, but zombies are creepy.”

“All right, Bard, it is your turn,” Thran beckoned.

“Me?” his husband blinked in surprise. “I’m just the guy who does the heavy lifting.”

“Just a little,” promised Thran. “Come, sit.”

“I hear and obey,” Bard murmured, taking Sigrid’s place, which drew Thran’s chuckle.

“Not here, put perhaps later,” Thran parried in a whisper, enjoying Bard’s spasm of laughter as he bent over his box. “Just a little base so that the lights do not reflect so badly...”

He sponged a flesh-toned color over Bard’s face, then made up his eyes with a little dark shadow and liner. He added a few darker lines for wrinkles, and a little silver in the edges of Bard’s hair, in his mustache, and in his beard tufts, then proffered the mirror for Bard’s inspection. “There, you are a bit older, that is all. All doll makers are old, or so they seem to be in every story I have read.”

“So now I match the stories,” Bard grinned. “I hope the doddering old fool isn’t so feeble that he drops the doll.”

“I trust that he will retain all of his vigor,” was Thran’s reply. “So the makeup is done. Now for the warmup. Sigrid, Tilda, I will do my stretches now.”

“Okay, Ada,” the girls chorused. Both had found friends nearby to talk to, so Thran began his slow flexing of ankles, toes, fingers, and wrists, then legs and arms, then neck, then back and hips. Bard sat on the floor nearby, keeping an eye on the girls as well as him, offering a smile now and again as Thran slowly warmed his body. As he extended himself, the two girl acrobats came up to watch, and soon the three of them chatted as they limbered. Those around him were kind enough to give him room to lengthen into splits on the floor, then up the wall.

“I never get tired of watching you do that,” Bard murmured as Thran slid his foot up the wall until he was in a split, then grasped his foot to ease his torso flat against his thigh. “I swear you have no bones at all, or at least none of the joints us regular humans have. You’ve got elastic bands, if anything.”

Thran grinned as he altered his balance enough that he stood on one foot with the other stretched high above his head. He pulled his torso against his thigh again, then leaned gracefully forward until his hands were at his foot on the floor. “Perhaps so. Whatever the case, it feels good to stretch so deeply, so completely.”

He brought his other leg up to join the first, then curled first one leg, then the other, out of his handstand and over his head into a back bend, and up to his feet again. A scattering of applause rippled down the hall, which he accepted with a hand to his heart and a nod. He felt warm and centered, and well ready to dance.

“Sigrid? I am ready,” he called, and the older girl came forward with a big smile.

“All right! I’m ready, too – I did the warmups you showed me, so let’s go.”

“Kukla? We will go in perhaps ten or fifteen minutes?”

“Okay, Ada!” Tilda nodded vigorously. “Break a leg!”

“Thank you!” Thran replied with a laugh. To Bard, he offered a wink. “Off we go.”

“Til and I will run around to see your dance, then be back,” his husband said. “Enjoy, cariad.”

As Bard and Tilda hastened down the hall, Sigrid and Thran alerted Ingrid that they were ready. Thran kept himself in motion for the few minutes they had to wait for the previous act to finish, then it was their turn to take the stage. Just before they separated, Thran gave Sigrid’s hand a squeeze.

“Enjoy, ma chère. Have fun, and the audience will, too.”

“That won’t be a problem,” Sigrid grinned. “I can’t wait! Get ready to dance with a ghost, Ada!”

Sigrid flitted to stage left, leaving Thran to stand at the right side of the curtain, waiting for his cue. He had to smother a thrill of excitement as the announcer’s voice echoed in the auditorium.

“Next up, Sigrid Bowman and Thran Oropherson present Midnight at the Carnival.”

Thran slipped onto the darkened stage, took his reflective stance with his hands in his jeans pockets and looking up. He held the pose as the spotlight caught him, then walked towards center stage slowly, looking around himself. When he had almost reached stage left, he turned and retraced his steps, still looking about him. The change in the lighting told him that the second spotlight had slowly brightened, revealing Sigrid behind him. He took another couple of steps, seemingly oblivious to the spectre behind him, then turned, miming surprise and apprehension as he spotted Sigrid. How ghostly she looked! Her mostly white clothing and the pale makeup turned her into an eerie vision, yet the sparkles in her tiara and tutu gave her a theatrical glamour that her stance only reinforced. One foot slightly before the other, knee slightly bent, one hand on her hip, the other aloft asking for applause, head held high with a confident smile... Sigrid had become the spirit of a carnival artist.

The ghost circled him slowly, pirouetting once, then again, as he turned to keep his wondering eyes on her. Then she raised both hands, looked up, and brought her arms down decisively as the music started. She circled him again, capturing him with her allure. When she beckoned, he rushed forward to sweep her into a waltz. Around and around they went, and even the heavy makeup on her face couldn’t disguise her utter delight in their dance. When they separated, she was no longer the fierce lioness of Clan Ffyrnig, but the teasing, enticing carnival spirit that drew a bedazzled mortal after her. Faced with such a beguiling partner, how could he not fling himself after her into the flashy C-jump, then sweep her into his arms again for one more waltz around the stage? She spun herself out of his arms, eluded his desperate lunge to prolong their dance, and flitted offstage as the music faded. Thran fell to his knees in despair, one arm stretched out after the vision that was no more.

When the spotlight faded, he got to his feet, found Sigrid at his side, and they joined hands to take their bow when the spotlight reappeared at center stage. Those in the audience applauded enthusiastically, but the cheering was from Finn, Kíllian, Bain, Legolas, Tara, and Derry. Bard and Tilda were there, too; the former whistled shrilly through his fingers while the latter jumped up and down as she clapped.

“One, two, three, bow,” Sigrid recited, grinning, and Thran fell into the count without thinking. Then he offered his partner a bow and applause, inviting the audience to reward Sigrid’s enthusiasm. She did a credible bow, then grabbed Thran’s hand to point at him and beckon the audience to applaud. They joined hands to take one more bow, waved, then exited stage left.

“That was so much fun!” Sigrid gasped, as they came out into the back hallway. “Oh, Ada, that is the most fun I’ve ever had!”

“You were magnificent!” Thran swept her up in a hug. “Such a ghost you made! And it is not even opening night!”

“You were amazing! That C-jump was over my head if it was an inch! And we just flew around the stage! It was incredible! Da! Da! Did you see us? We were wonderful!”

“Yes, you were,” Bard avowed, a huge grin on his face as he hugged his daughter. “You were fantastic – the best ghost ever! I am so proud of you! And this guy here, he was okay, too.”

Thran snickered. “I am glad I measured up to our lioness’s performance. It was an inspired one, to be sure.”

“Oh, Ada, you were perfection. Did you see that C-jump, Da? Did you see, it, Tilda? Wasn’t it amazing? It was over my head!”

“It really was!” Tilda offered, holding a hand about a foot over her head. “It looked like it was this high over Sigrid’s head, Ada!”

“Perhaps not that high, but high. Your sister was the best inspiration. Now it is our turn, Kukla, to make everyone laugh. Come, let me put on my funny nose, and paint my face, and then we will be ready.”

“I’ve got your costume,” Sigrid said, retrieving the bag and handing it to him.

“I have it. Now, let your Da take you to Legolas and Bain and your friends, before he carries the silly doll onstage.”

“Break a leg,” Sigrid quipped, as she went off with Bard.

Smiling, Thran quickly stripped off his trainers and jeans, revealing his white tights. Tilda handed him the baggy bloomers that reached only to his knees, then his dancing shoes with the red pompoms. Off came the burgundy Henley, on went his baggy top with the outlandishly huge red pompom buttons. As Tilda stuffed his clothes into the bag, he dove into his makeup box to draw the clownish red smile and exaggerated eyebrows, then on went his red nose and conical hat topped with another enormous red pompom. He settled his braid at his back, and waggled his eyebrows at Tilda.

“We are ready, Kukla?”

“We’re ready, Ada,” she nodded with a smile as Bard trotted into view.

“Sigrid’s with the lads and their friends,” Bard panted as he came up. “All set?”

“All set,” Tilda nodded.

Thran held out his hand to Tilda. She took it, then her father’s, and pulled them towards Ingrid.

“We’re ready,” she announced. “Tilda Bowman, Thran Oropherson, and Bard Bowman with The Doll.”

“Tilda, Thran, and Bard up next with The Doll,” a smiling Ingrid repeated into her headset. She switched it off to tell Tilda, “A couple of minutes while the singers finish, then you’re up.”

A few minutes’ wait, then Ingrid waved them onto the stage. “You’re up.”

Thran led Tilda forward to center stage, finding the break in the curtain where she would peek out. Before he could squeeze her hand, she’d squeezed his.

“Enjoy,” she whispered. “If we do, they will.”

“Exactement, Kukla. Enjoy.”

He and Bard hurried to stage left. “Ready, angel?” Bard whispered, putting his arms around Thran’s waist in preparation.

“The doll is ready,” Thran grinned, as their introduction came over the loudspeaker.

“Next up, Tilda Bowman, Thran Oropherson, and Bard Bowman present The Doll.”

“Here we go,” Bard whispered.

Thran stiffened his pose as Bard hefted him in his arms to cart him out onstage. Laughter rippled, evidence that Tilda had stuck her head out from behind the curtain. As Bard lugged him out, she dove behind the curtain again, peeking out when her father set him down in the middle of the stage. Bard made a show of straightening Thran’s costume, even fiddling with his hat, then rubbed his beard as he considered his doll. With a nod of satisfaction, Bard exited stage left.

Another ripple of laughter revealed that Tilda had reappeared behind him. He stared straight ahead with a wooden expression as Tilda appeared. As the music began, she gave him a poke or two without getting a reaction, but with the third, he let his legs slide into a split, and leaned drunkenly over his leg. Another poke put his torso flat on the floor. A pull of the arm, he flopped over the other way, all as bonelessly as the rag doll he emulated. The war of wits began, with Tilda trying to get the doll upright again and the doll doing his best to get into the most ridiculous poses. At one point, when he managed to drape himself over Tilda, she gave the most exasperated sigh, which was so perfect that Thran had to smother a laugh. Finally, he let her get him to his feet, only to flail about the stage as she tried to get him to hold still. Here came the thunderous crash of crockery, and they both froze. Hastily, they mimed doing their best to hastily sweep up the bits, then shove Thran into his original stance. When Bard came out again with thumping steps, Thran was on his feet, but badly crooked. Bard mimed his cross-examination of Tilda, who was all innocence as she shook her head and shrugged her shoulders not once, but twice. As Tilda held Bard’s attention, Thran straightened himself, then froze as Bard whirled around to glare at him. Again, Tilda protested her innocence, so after a thorough head scratching, Bard exited again with baffled exasperation. Behind him, Thran and Tilda mimicked delighted laughter at their misdirection, had a silly dance around the stage before they collapsed into a heap. The spotlight went out, giving Thran and Tilda time to get to their feet up at center stage. The light came back on, and the two took their bow. Thran beckoned to Bard, who joined them for another bow. Again, enthusiastic applause rewarded their efforts, led by their children and their friends. Tilda was beaming in breathless excitement, but remembered to offer her best curtsey when Thran and Bard applauded for her. Then they were off, and back stage again.

“You were terrific, little doll!” Bard gave her a big hug. “Just terrific! You didn’t let this silly doll give you a minute’s trouble!”

“No, you did not!” Thran agreed, holding out his hand for her to slap, which she did heartily. “The most mischievous playmate you were, my Russkaya Kukla! You looked as if you enjoyed yourself very much!”

“I did,” Tilda avowed, giving the firm nod that was her favorite gesture. “I did, a lot, Ada. We were good!”

“Very good,” Thran agreed. “Let us collect our things, and then we can go out with your brothers and sister and enjoy the performances that come after us.”

Thran collected his makeup box and bag, quickly exchanging his doll costume for his jeans, Henley, and trainers. He swiped a little cold cream over his face and tissued it off to remove the worst of his makeup, then offered to help Tilda take hers off. The little girl shook her head.

“I want to wear mine home,” she asked. “It’s the first makeup I’ve ever had on.”

“Of course,” Thran smothered a chuckle as Bard put a hand over his mouth to cover his amusement. “Sigrid likely feels the same way.”

“She wears it all the time,” Tilda shook her head. “I don’t.”

“Of course not,” Thran nodded, as they headed down the hall and back towards the auditorium doors.

“I wonder how long that will be true?” Bard murmured behind him, as Tilda took both their hands. Any reply Thran might have made died away as Tilda slowed just at the end of the hallway. She pulled her fathers to a halt, and looked around the corner at the auditorium doors cautiously. Thran scanned the area, as did Bard, but none of them saw anything.

“That’s where you saw him, Til?” Bard asked.

She nodded. “Right there. By the door on the right. But not tonight.”

“Not tonight,” Bard repeated. “He’s not here tonight.”

“Good.” Tilda pulled her fathers forward and into the auditorium with quick steps, clearly not wanting to linger. They headed down the aisle and the group of teenagers waving to them. Tilda’s apprehension evaporated as the older children cheered her performance. Finn came out of the aisle to offer her a high five and an enthusiastic compliment.

“You were great, too, Mr. Thran,” Finn offered with a smile.
Thran nodded appreciation. “Thank you. I had two wonderful costars to dance with.”

“Yeah, Sigrid’s dance was amazing! You were both great.”

Thran thanked the boy again, but Finn’s smile had sobered as his eyes went to Bard.

“What is it, Finn?” Bard asked quietly.

“Um, Mr. Bowman, could I... talk to you a minute? In private?”

Thran’s eyebrows went up.

“Sure,” Bard said mildly, but his posture had tightened as only a father’s could.

Oh, gods, it couldn’t be that Finn and Sigrid...

“I have something to tell you,” Finn said lowly, as he and Bard moved away. “It’s about Lance Dunmont.”
Chapter 93

Chapter Summary

The saint has an interesting conversation, then he and the angel engage in a little domestic bliss before the April Fool's Follies. The solarium begins to emerge. The cherubs are busy - the first helps Rahmiel acquire his feathers, the second introduces the third to the joys of a Trash Lunch, and the fourth shows she is truly a fierce lioness at heart.

Bard didn’t know whether to laugh or curse when Finn revealed what he wanted to talk about. He hadn’t really considered that he might be about to become a grandfather, but... well, wasn’t that every father’s knee jerk reaction when a boyfriend of his daughter, even as tenuous a one as Finn, made such a stammering request? When had Sigrid spent enough time alone with anyone outside of the family? Ohhhh, there was that one Saturday, when they’d said they were going to the cinema with Tara and Killian, but Sigrid had described the film so well afterwards that he’d never considered that they’d done anything else...

“Uh, Mr. Bowman?”

Bard jerked out of his reverie to find Finn regarding him with some concern. Okay, take a deep breath, no funny teenaged stuff, at least not this time, but decidedly unfunny teenaged stuff was tonight’s topic.

“What about Lance, Finn?”

“I just thought – I mean, I did come out to Killian’s this weekend to see him and Sig – Sigrid, I mean – but I’d hoped to see you, too. About Lance.”

“What’s he up to?”

“The rumors around school said first he’d gone to Florida to live with his gramma. His ma wanted him away from the gangs, because he’d started drifting that way. Then the rumors said that he’d already gotten involved with Angelo, and he’d fu – screwed up on some deal, and Angelo’s gang had it in for him. Then they said the gang had offed him. Sigrid told me a little of what happened on Christmas Day – not very much, so please don’t be mad at her. I wanted her to tell me, but she didn’t, just that it was bad enough that you all moved out here, and then she made me promise to keep my nose out of it. So I didn’t say anything. But I listened hard, and I pretty much figured out what happened. Lance was stupid, Angelo was even stupider, and Angelo ended up in jail, and now he’s dead, and the gangs that are left are fighting over his turf.”

“Ohay,” Bard nodded, unwilling to say more because he wanted Finn well out of the gang war that Angelo’s demise had fomented.

“But that’s not what I wanted to warn you about,” Finn hastened to say. “You already know everything I just said. But... you know Sigrid’s old school is pretty rough, right? It’s hard not to hear what goes on about stuff you don’t want anything to do with. Like where the potheads toke after lunch, and who’s selling one thing or another, or who’s recruiting. You know.”
Bard nodded. “Hard not to know, sure.”

“So it was hard not to hear some low-level runners talk about how Angelo tried to have Lance taken down in payment for getting him charged for attempted murder. But the guy Angelo got to do it... he said he did, got a nice bonus, then skedaddled. But he didn’t – I don’t know why – and Lance laid low. So after Angelo went down, the other gangs thought they owed Lance something for starting the whole thing, even though he fu – screwed up. So they won’t kill him, but not a single one will take him on, on account of how bad he screwed up. So he’s gutted because he’s nothing anyone wants. He’s not even worth killing. They call him Lance the... um, Fuckup.”

“So he bailed out of the city?” Bard murmured.

“Not completely. No one sees him for days at a time. No one knows where he goes. But when he’s in the city, he still has a friend or two, or so he thinks. Two of them are in my homeroom, and they aren’t his friends – they laugh about him. I just listened until they let drop what Lance said about everyone laughing at him for being such a, um, fuckup. And this is the part I wanted to tell you. I haven’t said anything to Sigrid, but... don’t let her go anywhere by herself for a while.”

“Why?”

“Because Lance blames her for what happened. She called him out, she broke his foot, she took him down. He doesn’t get that if he hadn’t been so stupid at the park, Sigrid would never have said or done boo to him. He doesn’t get it.”

“Do you know what he’s planning?” Bard said, fighting to keep his voice soft and even.

Finn shook his head. “No. I can imagine, though, and you better than me.”

“Has he been violent before?”

“A lot of fights, yeah. He’s got a chip on his shoulder about so many things it ought to be a tree trunk. Girls stay away from him because he’s mean. But I’ve never heard anything about him... doing more than mouthing off at them.”

“What does he get out of going after her? A place in a gang? Did a gang put him up to this?”

Finn shook his head again. “The gangs aren’t interested in you, as near as I can tell. Just like they think Lance gave them an opportunity to get rid of Angelo, they think you and yours did, too. Besides, you’re not there anymore, out of their territory. I don’t think that any of them will take on Lance, no matter what he does. He got the head of his gang killed and the rest of it scattered, Mr. Bowman. That isn’t something they forget.”

“So the good news is that the gangs aren’t in this. The bad news is that a humiliated lad is out to hurt my daughter for revenge. At least that narrows the threat.”

“It doesn’t make me feel any better,” Finn blurted, then reddened. “Well, it doesn’t. Not one bit. I like Sigrid, Mr. Bowman. A lot. She’s brave, smart, funny, stubborn, feisty...”

Despite his worry for Sigrid, Bard had to smother a smile at the awkward praise stumbling out of a short, stocky hockey player crowned with a shock of disarranged blonde hair. “She’s fierce, no doubt about it,” he agreed.

“That’s no lie,” Finn grimaced, darting a look at Bard to see if Bard were angry. When the boy realized that Bard agreed with him, he ventured a smile, then met Bard’s eyes straightly. “You should be really proud of her. She didn’t take shit from anyone in school, but she was nice to everyone at the same time. She’s a good math tutor, too, thank the gods, or my parents would have had my ass over my trig grade, believe it. I really miss her – oh, for more than her math tutoring, I mean, but not like…”

“I am very proud of her,” Bard smiled mildly. Had he been that flustered about girls – or boys – when he’d been sixteen? Then again, Bard had never had to talk to a father about a stalker after his daughter, so Finn had reason to be flustered. “I’m glad you think so highly of her, too.”

“I do. So... just... look out for her. Just look out for her.”

“I will. Thanks for telling me. Just keep a heads up while you’re out here this weekend, if you would.”

“Oh?”

“Lance was here last night. Now we know why. So if you see him, tell the police.”

Finn’s eyes widened. “Oh, that’s why Legs and Bain said we had to stay together. I wondered – neither of them is a Nervous Nellie, not at all.”

“They’re doing what Thran and I asked them to do. No one’s to go off alone, or even in pairs, not until we know what’s up. Thanks to you, we know a little more. But still, stick together as much as possible.”

“Okay, Mr. Bowman,” Finn nodded. “Thanks for hearing me out.”

“Thanks for telling me.”

They rejoined the others without fanfare, but Thran locked eyes with him as soon as he was close, dying to know what Finn had said. While the teenagers and Tilda continued their rehash of the girls’ dances, Thran glued himself to Bard’s side.

“No, I am not about to be a grandfather,” Bard murmured, smiling perversely.

“Of course not,” Thran replied, so offhandedly that he had clearly considered that. With a few short words, Bard gave Thran a condensed version of what Finn had told him, drawing a growl from Thran. “Stupid. Understandable, but stupid. I think we should tell the police.”

“I’ll call Officer Kelso when we get home. Unless he’s here tonight, in which case I’ll talk to him, now. Can you hold down the fort here for a bit longer?”

“Of course. The children enjoy themselves, I enjoy to see them do so, and the acts in rehearsal are good. So see if Officer Kelso is in the lobby.”

“Righto.” Bard trotted up to the lobby, but the officer standing by the door wasn’t the one they’d seen last night, so he quickly returned to Thran and the children. “He’s not here tonight. I’ll give him a ring when we get home. I’ll likely get his voice mail; it’s almost nine-thirty now.”

“Then I suggest we go home,” Thran said. “If the older children want to gather, we can certainly host them.”

“That was my thought, too,” Bard agreed. “I think I have enough stuff in the kitchen for nachos if they’re hungry, or we can order pizza.”

“They are always hungry,” Thran exhaled.
They rounded up the children, invited Finn, Killian, Tara, and Derry over if they’d like to come, and headed out into the rain for the trip home. The children were still animated about the evening’s rehearsal, and when their four guests piled into the sitting room to consume a mountain of nachos, the rest of the evening passed quickly. At about eleven-thirty, Derry, Tara, Finn, and Killian made their way out to be home by their midnight curfew. Tilda was almost asleep, but she’d been determined to stay awake, delighted to be included in the older children’s gathering. It was hard to convince her to wash her makeup off her face – in fact, it was Thran who managed it by opening his makeup box and showing Sigrid how to use the cold cream and tissues to wipe off the white coating off. He got Tilda to help get the color off Sigrid’s neck, and when her sister was delivered from her ghostly persona, he wheedled Tilda to take off her pink cheeks.

“Very careful around the eyes, Kukla,” Thran coaxed. “See how Sigrid does it, one eye at the time? Keep it closed so that the cold cream does not get in your eye.”

“Will it sting?” Tilda asked dubiously.

“It doesn’t sting,” Sigrid assured her. “But it can get awfully blurry. Do you want me to help?”

Tilda nodded, so Thran held the jar of cold cream while Sigrid carefully dabbed.

“Okay, it’s all gone now. You just have to wash off the cold cream when you get a shower.”

“I’m too sleepy,” Tilda yawned. “Can’t I get a shower tomorrow?”

“Come on, little doll,” Bard picked her up and cuddled her in his arms. “Let’s get you through the shower before you think about it. Tomorrow’s a busy day.”

“Ohhhhh, Da,” she mumbled, drawing chuckles from Thran and Sigrid.

“I’ll get her started,” Bard said. “Lads, wrap up your game so that when Til and Sig are done, you’ll be ready for the shower, too.”

“Yes, Da; yes, Bard.”

Through sheer force of doing everything except the actual undressing and washing and drying, Bard coaxed Tilda through her shower and into bed. He managed to get Mr. Bun in her arms and a kiss on her cheek before her eyes closed.

“Sleep well, little doll,” Bard wished her.

“I will. I’m glad we didn’t see Lance Dunmont tonight. Maybe we won’t see him ever again.”

“Let’s hope not. Don’t worry about him anymore. I’ll see you in the morning, okay? Eggs or porridge?”

“Porridge,” she mumbled. “Maybe with peaches.”

“We don’t have any peaches yet, remember? Too early in the season.”

“Apple, then. Night, Da.”

“Night, Tilda.”

Bard tiptoed out. Sigrid was already in the shower, and the boys were upstairs to wait their turns. Bard headed downstairs to make the rounds of the house, checking doors and windows, a circuit that Thran soon joined.
“So how do we set the security system?” Bard asked, as Thran checked his mobile.

“It is very easy. See, we are inside now, and here are the modes, and so I choose the nighttime mode, which does not go off when we move around inside, but does go off if any of the outside windows and doors are breeched.”

Bard followed Thran back to the sitting room, where they sat together on one of the sofas. Bard leaned close to watch Thran set the system. “Oh, not so hard, then.”

“Not at all. What you see on the security panel display is the same as what you see here, or on the computer. Thank the gods that someone at this company understood that consistency is a virtue.”

Bard snickered. “The rare geek, indeed. Someone once told me that the definition of a geek is someone whose favorite phrase is, ‘wouldn’t it be cool if....’”

Thran snickered, too. “Apt, indeed. Though I have never heard Ori say that, and I believe he is a geek.”

“He’s a rare bird. Incredibly smart, and a nice guy. I’ll miss him when he doesn’t need to follow Irmo around anymore, or come here.”

“As will I. Oh, did you call our Officer Kelso?”

“I did, while the children were making nachos. As I expected, I got his voice mail, but I left a message. So I hope tomorrow sometime that I can pass on what Finn told me.”

“What should we say to the children?”

Bard exhaled, and put a hand on Thran’s thigh to massage it restlessly. “I don’t know. I don’t want to scare them, especially Sigrid. But... it’s not right to leave them clueless about Lance. At least we should tell them to be careful.”

“And they will ask to be careful about what, and out it will come,” Thran agreed.

“I won’t say anything until tomorrow, anyway,” Bard rubbed his eyes. “There’s no need to give them a reason not to sleep well, and we’ll have them under our eyes all day tomorrow. I suspect that Finn intends to glue himself to Sigrid’s side all afternoon tomorrow, too. So... I’d say let the children enjoy the excitement tomorrow. They already know to keep a watchful eye out. If we have to say more, we will on Sunday, assuming Officer Kelso doesn’t have something different to tell us.”

“A good plan,” Thran yawned. “What is it you always say? That you are knackered? I think I am, too, though I do not know what knackered means.”

Bard grinned. “In the old days, the knacker was the guy who rendered down dead or dying farm stock that wasn’t fit to eat. So being knackered meant that you were ready for the knackers to dispose of you.”

“So, very, very tired.” At Bard’s nod, Thran grinned. “Then I am not quite knackered, but quite ready for a shower and bed.”

“I’m right behind you.”

Bard and his husband turned out the lights and headed upstairs. Bain was reading in bed, and Legolas was just getting out of the shower. Sigrid was in her room, still smiling over the evening’s excitement.
“I think you have caught the performance bug,” Thran teased her as he offered his goodnight kiss.

“Maybe,” Sigrid gave him a teasing shrug. “It’s been the best fun dancing with you, Ada.”

“And with you, too, my ghostly dochka,” Thran replied. “Tomorrow, we will wow the audience, yes?”

“Yes,” Sigrid grinned. “I won’t out-cute Tilda, but I’ll out-ghost her.”

“To be sure. Sleep well.”

“Not so fast,” Sigrid gave Bard a look. “You haven’t told me what Finn had to say yet.”

“Nothing that can’t wait until tomorrow.”

“Da!” protested Sigrid.

“Have mercy on your old doddering Da,” Bard protested right back. “I’m knackered, and have to find my pillow before I fall over.”

Sigrid’s snort was indignant. “What, did Thran’s paint give you an instant dose of the old man? Though the silver in your hair looks good.”

“Thanks,” Bard snarked.

“You’re welcome. And don’t try to tell me he had nothing to say, because I know you called that policeman when we got home.”

“Yes, I did. Finn confirmed that Lance is still among the living, and I wanted to pass along the word to the police. Happy now?”

“No, but that’s something.” Sigrid snorted in exasperation again, but her expression softened into a smile. “So go find your pillow so I can find mine. I’m knackered, too.”

“Finally,” Bard bent to kiss her cheek. “Sleep well, sweetness. I’ll see you in the morning.”

“Night, Da. I love you.”

“Love you, too.”

Bard and Thran retreated, tucked the boys into bed, and finally drew the doors of their bedroom shut behind them. Bard exhaled.

“We got off easy with Sig.”

Thran went into the closet to strip off his clothes. “We did. I am most relieved.”

“Me more than you.” Bard tossed his clothes in the hamper. “I’ll start the water.”

He got into the shower, scrubbed and shampooed the remnants of Thran’s makeup off his face and out of his hair, and quickly washed the rest of the day’s rigors away. Thran got in when he was done; his hair was braided and wrapped around his head to keep it dry; apparently he was too tired to indulge in his regime of washing and drying his mane tonight. Bard dried his hair quickly, and settled into the bed long enough to warm the sheets before Thran joined him. As they curled into their usual knot, Bard let out a long breath.
“No sighting today, but at least some information.”

Thran hummed. “It occurs to me, lyubov moya... Something I have learned over the years of being known.”

“What’s that?”

“The people who are intent on another, whether a celebrity, a dancer, or a fierce lioness... It is rare that they know where their quarry lives, so they go to the places where they know their quarry will be, the public venues. It is my name that has been in the media for the April Fool’s Follies, and Lance may have come to the school to find me in hopes that I would lead him to Sigrid.”

“That makes sense,” Bard agreed.

“So tomorrow I would expect Lance to appear at the school. So many people to hide among, and such a bustle and stir.”

“That makes even more sense. If I talk to Officer Kelso in the morning, I’ll mention that.”

“We should remain careful, and together. If Lance cannot get to Sigrid, he may decide that a strike at one of us would make her suffer.”

“Also valid. Mab i ast, angel – you’re not making it easy for me to get to sleep.”

“I am sorry,” was Thran’s contrite apology. “I am so tired. I feared that I would not remember to say this tomorrow morning.”

“I’m tired, too,” Bard admitted, yawning. “I hope I don’t have a nightmare tonight.”

“I hope not, my saint. Remember that all is well. The security system is on, and we are safe inside.”

“I know,” Bard rubbed Thran’s arm. “I know....”

His eyes fell shut without resistance, and he was gone.

* * *

Oh, now nice was it to wake and remember that today was Saturday, and there was no need to get up yet? Almost as nice as it was to snuggle back under the covers with his fine, muscular saint of a husband, to soak up his warmth, to smell the scent that was his alone, to feel his tangled curls tickle his nose...

“You’re decadent this morning,” came Bard’s drowsy mumble.

Thran curled at Bard’s back and brushed a kiss against his nape. “I merely enjoy the bounty before me.”

“Your cock is pressing against my back, hard as a rock.”

“You say that as if it were a problem.”

“The life of a dissipated dancer’s boy toy is almost as hard as the dissipated dancer’s cock.”
Thran snickered as he stroked Bard’s arm. “Such a story you begin about this boy toy! Tell me what happens to him when the dissipated dancer wakes up. Does the dancer get up to have a sedate breakfast in the kitchen, or does he get up to stay in bed for a decadent dessert?”

“Oh, gods,” Bard made a longsuffering rumble deep in his throat. “I know that soft little voice. It means that either the boy toy has to make the dissipated dancer’s breakfast, or he’ll be the dissipated dancer’s breakfast. Probably both. The only question is which of the dissipated dancer’s appetites does he have to satisfy first.”

Thran leaned away only long enough to fish the tube of lubricant from his nightside table drawer, then pushed Bard over on his stomach and laid atop him. When Bard sleepily drew his knees up to accommodate Thran between his legs, Thran slicked his cock quickly. He eased inside with a soft moan, then curled over Bard’s back and wrapped his arms under and around Bard’s shoulders to hold him close.

“Mmm, you are a sweet dessert,” Thran breathed, flexing deeply into Bard. He buried his nose in Bard’s hair, nipping at his ear. “Such a delicious toy, so willing, so submissive...”

He tightened his grip on Bard’s shoulders, humming at the tight warmth that gloved his cock so delectably. Each flex in and out drew a moan from him, a moan that only deepened at sight of the powerful body lying so willingly beneath him. He drew his knees up under Bard’s thighs, deepening the arch of Bard’s back – the perfect way to present Bard’s ass for Thran’s attentions. He wormed a hand underneath to take Bard’s cock in hand and stroked it slowly until Bard pushed up onto his hands to thrust his hips back over Thran’s thighs.

“Gods, angel, I can’t resist you,” Bard whispered. His head went back and his eyes closed as he rocked in rhythm to Thran’s thrusts. “So good, so good...”

“Such a picture you are,” Thran whispered back, loosing Bard’s cock to drag both hands down Bard’s flanks, not scratching deeply, but leaving long, red streaks that spiked his arousal even higher. Before today, Thran had resisted the urge to mark Bard’s skin, tacit acknowledgement of Bard’s care for Thran’s. But the red streaks across Bard’s darker, hairier skin were feral mating marks, claiming marks, driving Thran’s urges to something just as feral. Growling, he fell over Bard’s back, fingers digging into Bard’s groins as he thrust hard and fast into his prize. As his orgasm flooded through him, he bit Bard’s shoulder, sending a spasm through the body beneath his. He groped for Bard’s cock again, manhandling it until Bard stuttered into his own orgasm. As the body beneath Thran bucked and flexed, the pressure around his cock alternatively rose and fell to send more waves of pleasure surging through him. He wrapped arms around Bard’s shoulders again, holding his prize close as he milked the last drops of ecstasy from their release.

“I swear I’m taking away your vitamins,” Bard panted. “You’re an animal.”

“And you look like you just mated with one,” Thran grunted, unable to resist one more bite of Bard’s shoulder. “Mmm, such a turn on.”

“You bastard, you’ve left marks all over me. It’s a good thing you don’t have claws and canines, or I’d be in ribbons.”

Bard pushed up to sit back on his heels. Thran let him, but kept his arms wrapped around Bard’s torso to stroke and pet. Bard looked down at the red streaks slowly fading on his thighs and ribs and shook his head.
“You certainly do – and you’re not letting me go. Do you need to claim me again?”

Thran ran his teeth over Bard’s shoulder, and his hands down Bard’s ribs to massage his groins on either side of his cock. “You are well worth claiming, so yes, I am tempted to master you again. But better I restrain myself now. We clean the garage this morning, so I will think about how sweet it will be to savage a certain hunky handyman after we come home from the Follies.”

Bard wormed an arm around Thran. Before Thran could stop him, he’d laid Thran flat on the bed, taken both of Thran’s wrists in one of his to pin them over his head, and slid atop him. He kissed Thran thoroughly and stroked a nipple, grinning when Thran moaned under his attentions.

“Maybe I’ll master the Follies dancer first.”

“Oh, lyubov moya, if you kiss and caress me like this tonight, I will let you do anything.”

“Anything?”

“Anything. I will be seer to your king, slave to your master, oda to your sultan. Whatever you desire.”

“I’ll take that as a promise. Right now, though, I need a wash and breakfast.”

“Both would be welcome.”

They rose together to clean up, dress, and make the bed, then headed downstairs to enjoy omelet and toast and tea. They still lingered over the last sips of their tea when Bard’s mobile chimed. Fishing it out of his jeans pocket, Bard glanced at the display, then at Thran.

“Officer Kelso,” he said, as he held the mobile to his ear. “Hello?”

Thran got up to take their plates to the sink as Bard relayed Finn’s information to the officer. He rinsed the plates and cooking utensils and put them in the dishwasher, washed and dried the silver flatware, and carefully washed the heavy cast iron pan that had held their omelet. By the time the kitchen was clean, Bard was just ending his conversation with the officer.

“My timing is impeccable,” Bard observed as he got up from the kitchen table. “I missed all of the kitchen cleanup.”

“You did most of the cooking. I did not mind to do most of the cleanup,” Thran shrugged. “What did the officer say?”

“About what I expected,” Bard exhaled, putting his mobile back in his pocket. “He thanked me for the information, and even admitted that we’re probably right that Lance is looking for Sigrid. But until Lance actually does something, the police can’t do anything. There will be police at the Follies today as part of the usual security for such things, so if Lance turns up, we won’t be completely unprotected.”

Thran tsked. “I am disappointed, but not surprised.”

“He did say he’d talked to Chief Inspector Oakland. The gang war is strictly a city stir. There’s no indication that it’ll blow out this far.”

Thran hummed. “That is good, I suppose. It means that our problem is only one angry teenaged boy, rather than an entire gang.”
“True. We’ll keep careful watch, that’s all.”

Bard’s posture was tight, mute evidence that their conclusion was far from satisfactory. Thran rubbed his back, but it was little consolation to either of them that Sigrid’s protection was on their shoulders until Lance Dunnmont actually presented a threat that the police could pursue.

“So we will,” Thran said at last. “Come, let us order the garage to distract ourselves.”

“Do you know what time you’re supposed to dance this afternoon, angel?” Bard asked. “We can work on the garage anytime, now that we’ve gotten the vehicles under cover. Today, your dances with the girls take precedence.”

“I was supposed to receive an email,” Thran said, pulling out his mobile. “Let me see if it arrived. Oh, suka blyad, the poor Follies organizers – the email arrived at two this morning. They have worked very hard to make the Follies a success. Yes, a schedule is attached. It will be easier to read on my laptop, so let me open it there...”

Bard followed Thran into the sitting room, where they perused the schedule the school had sent. “Look, angel – there must be forty or fifty or acts on that list.”

“Plenty to run continuously from one to six, indeed,” Thran agreed, scanning down through the list. “Ah there is Midnight at the Carnival at three, and The Doll at four fifteen. That is good. I have time to eat a sensible lunch before I must warm up. And we have time to see the auction and the craft booths before we dance.”

“Don’t forget the bake sale,” teased Bard. “All those frosted cupcakes and decorated cookies.”

“I leave those to the children,” Thran waved a hand. “So if we arrive at the Follies at one, we have an hour to look before I must warm up. So lunch at noon, and it is only eight now, so we have time to play in the garage.”

“What about Legolas’s fencing? Isn’t he going today?”

Thran tsked. “Sukin syn, I forgot the fencing. Yes, I will take him. And I must stop at Mrs. Mathom’s to pick up the screens for our solarium.”

“We can go in the truck and put the screens in the back.”

“Then the girls and Bain must come with us, and that is too tight a fit. No, I will take Legolas, and you stay here with the others.”

“That makes the most sense,” Bard agreed reluctantly. “I hate to miss a trip to the salvage shop, though. But we’ll be back there soon enough.”

“I will restrain myself at the salvage shop if you do not do all of the garage yourself.”

“Why is the garage such a fascination for you, angel?”

“It is not the garage itself. It is the chance for me to be part of our restoration. I want that.”

Bard put his arm around Thran’s waist and gave him a consoling squeeze. “Then here’s what we’ll do. You take Legolas to fencing, and get the screens. I’ll work on Rahmiel. Then tomorrow morning, we’ll have a big breakfast, and then spend all day playing in the garage. Oh, until Sam comes over to talk about our Japanese garden. You’ll have time to do your barre and yoga, and then the rest of the day you’ll be on the restoration crew.”
Thran’s lips curved into a pleased smile. “That would be very nice. Today we are the artists, and tomorrow we will be the renovators.”

“We have a plan, then – oh, hell. Now I’m the one to forget something,” Bard winced.

“What have you forgotten, lyubov moya?”

“I can’t do Rahmiel’s wings without feathers. I’d planned to visit this shop in the city – it’s in the garment district, and supplies all the theatrical companies. Rada says it’s got the best selection, and will likely have exactly what I want in stock. It opens at ten.”

“Then I will take Legolas and come home. Then you go out for the feathers and come home. Then I will get Legolas, who will help me get the screens, and come home. Then we will all be home, until we all go out again.”

Bard chuckled. “Now we really have a plan. We’d better roust the troops, then, if only to get them through breakfast before they have to eat lunch.”

“To eat is their favorite activity,” Thran sighed as they headed upstairs. “I do not think they ever stop.”

* * *

As Bard expected, getting the children up on a Saturday morning wasn’t easy. Usually they could sleep as long as they wanted, but given this afternoon’s festivities, an earlier wakeup was in order. Legolas got up easily, as he was eager to go to fencing. Sigrid and Bain were less sanguine about it, and Tilda was impossible. Given how late the youngest member of the clan had gotten into bed last night, Bard decided it was a good idea to let her sleep so she’d be fresh for her dance this afternoon. The rest of the children headed downstairs for porridge, then Thran and Legolas left for fencing.

Forty minutes later, Thran was back, and Tilda was up, if still sleepy. She grew more alert when she heard about Bard’s pursuit of feathers. That intrigued Tilda, so she came along with him, speculating during the ride about what a shop that sold feathers would look like. She was disappointed that it was not the exotic-looking shop she expected, but looked little different from a shoe repair or dry cleaners. Inside, though, her eyes brightened to see boas as well as packets of different colored feathers hanging on racks. A few bins offered a selection of unusual feathers. Bard didn’t linger over any of those, but went right to the small counter in front of a back room stacked with boxes. Rada had helped Bard make a list of the kinds of feathers he would need, and how many of each kind. Not only could he buy feathers individually, and by the pound and half pound, but also by left and right wing, important if he wanted Rahmiel’s wings to look natural.

In direct contrast to the bright packets of feathers around him, the rotund, rumpled man behind the counter was a grizzled character clad in dark green workman’s pants and a white polo shirt emblazoned with the shop’s name and logo on the breast. He had only wisps of dark grey hair around his ears, and his half moon glasses sat so low on his nose that they seemed ready to fall off at any second. He perched on his stool flipping through a stack of paperwork, but his hazel eyes skewered Bard as soon as the string of bells clattered on the back of the door. He took in Tilda, smiling slightly as she looked around her. Tilda met the man’s eyes with cautious reserve, then looked up at Bard.
“Where are all the other feathers, Da?” she asked Bard. “The kind you need?”

“I expect they’re in boxes in the back, little doll. Why don’t we ask the man behind the counter?”

“Okay.”

“We’ve got a lot of stuff in boxes in the back, Rosy Posie,” the man leaned on his elbows to regard Tilda over his glasses. “Lots and lots of stuff. What kind can I get for you?”

“Oh, they’re not for me,” Tilda demurred politely as she pointed to Bard. “They’re for my Da.”

“So what kind can I get for you, Da?”

“Goose feathers, I think. Black or dark brown, if you have them.”

“We got ’em in just about every color of the rainbow, including some colors that ain’t in the rainbow. You know what shape you want?”

Bard explained that he needed flight primaries as well as secondaries, in fact, all the kinds that made up a bird’s wing, enough for both a right and left wing. The man brought out various samples of goose, turkey, and chicken feathers, and before long Bard had bundles of fifteen primaries for each wing, and an equal number of secondaries. He also had boxes of the smaller feathers that covered the rest of a bird’s wing, and a few ostrich plumes for Rahmiel’s hair.

“What’re you making, Da, if you don’t mind me asking?” the clerk asked.

“No lie?” the clerk chuckled. “That’s a first. I’ve supplied feathers for every kind of production, Broadway, off Broadway, Lower Schlobservia, High Dudgeon, and everything in between, but this is the first time a sculptor’s come in here. Good luck with it.”

Bard handed over his credit card. “Thanks.”

The clerk rang up Bard’s charges, passed him the ticket to sign, and packed everything in a bag with a care that belied his casual air. He turned to consider the boxes behind him, opened one, and chose a long blue feather to hand to Tilda. “See ya around, Rosie Posie.”

“Really?” Tilda’s smiled in surprise as she took the feather. She dropped the curtsey she’d been practicing for her dance bow. “That’s very nice of you. Thank you very much.”

The man barked in laughter. “You’re a sweet little one, aren’t you? You’re welcome. Take good care of your Da, and tell him to come back soon, okay?”

“I will.”

“Thanks,” Bard nodded, taking his bag. “Ready to go, little doll?”

“Ready,” Tilda nodded, giving the man a wave. “Bye, Mr. Feather.”

“Bye, Rosie Posie.”

“He was nice,” was Tilda’s pronouncement as they walked back to the truck.

“Very nice. That feather he gave you is very nice, too.”
“Maybe it’d make a good quill pen, like the kind in the Harry Potter books,” she said, climbing into the truck. Bard shut the door, went around to the driver’s side, and climbed in.

“I think it would. It’s the same kind of quill, I think. All buckled?”

“All buckled.”

Bard pulled out his mobile. “I don’t think we’ll get back home before Thran has to pick up Legolas, so I’ll call to let him know.”

After making a quick call to let Thran know to take Sigrid and Bain with him when he went to pick up Legolas, Bard turned the truck towards home. They made good time, pulling into the driveway at about eleven twenty-five. They were just getting out of the car when Thran’s SUV pulled in behind them. Legolas sat in the front seat beside his father, and Bain and Sigrid were behind them. Everyone piled out of the SUV with calls of hello.

“Da!” Sigrid called. “These screens are wild! So pretty! That place is the most fun ever!”

“The call of the juvenile renovation junkie bird,” Bard teased, pulling his daughter’s braid. “How many did you get?”

“Four! So cool. I love them, and they aren’t even up yet,” Sigrid grinned. “What are you going to do with them? Hinge them together in a screen?”

Bard watched the boys help Thran unload the four panels from the SUV. “I have to see how everything fits, but I was going to put the archway on the wall opposite the windows, and the screens around them. The fountain would go on the wall in the middle of the archway.”

“And lots of flowers around the fountain,” Tilda came up beside her sister, blue feather in hand. “Look at this, Sigrid – the feather shop man gave it to me!”

“It’s beautiful, too. He gave you that?”

“He called me Rosie Posie and said I was sweet,” Tilda grinned. “All I did was be polite.”

“That was probably sweet to him,” Sigrid laughed. “What are you going to do with it?”

“I thought a quill pen, like in Harry Potter?” Tilda considered as she and Sigrid followed the boys carrying the screens into the house. Thran came beside Bard to kiss him hello.

“I hope you found more than one blue feather for Kukla,” Thran greeted.

Bard kissed Thran back, then hefted his bag. “I found much more than one feather. I found lots of feathers. Now, I just have to figure out how to attach them to the wings.”

“You will sort it out,” Thran assured him. “They will look wonderful. So will the screens. I am very happy with them. They are a lighter color than they looked in the email, but that makes them a good match for the archway and the fainting couch and the table. It is exciting to see so many pieces come together for our solarium.”

“Let’s see how they look in the solarium, then we need to get lunch before the Follies,” Bard invited, as they went inside together.

“Yes, the solarium comes together,” Thran enthused, as the boys propped two screens up on each side of the archway. “And look, the color of the wood is almost the same.”
“Bain, Legolas, if you’d set the table upright, under the windows? Now we’ll set the marble on top...” Bard took one end of the marble and the boys took the other, and they set it in place atop the wooden base. “Yes, that’s great.”

“Tilda, let’s move my chairs out of the way,” Sigrid invited, and she, Thran, and Tilda carried the three chairs that Sigrid had refinished for her upholstery class into the dining room. Bard rearranged two of the palms to flank the table and the others at each end of the wall of screens, and moved the ferns to ring the two palms against the lattice wall. The fainting couch, almost complete but for its gimp trim, angled near where the fountain would be. It was slowly, slowly becoming an exotic sanctuary.

“I think we must talk to Sam about more than the Japanese garden tomorrow,” Thran observed, looking around. “This is wonderful, and will be more so when we have greenery.”

“And flowers,” Tilda chimed in.

“I like those plants with the big flowers,” Legolas offered. “Hibiscus, I think? Aren’t those the ones with the big flowers? They come in red, yellow, a lot of bright colors?”

“They sound good,” Tilda nodded. “And nasturtiums. I like nasturtiums. They’re smaller, but red and yellow and orange. Sort of like marigold colors.”

“Maybe a banana tree!” Bain suggested. “Or maybe it’s too cold in here. I’ll look on the Internet, or Mr. Sam can tell us.”

“What about an orange tree?” Sigrid suggested. “Aren’t there small ones? Bain's right that it’d be neat to have a real fruit tree in here.”

“We’ll ask Mr. Sam tomorrow. He’s coming over to talk to us about the Japanese garden. But for now, let’s get our lunch, so our dancers have time to digest before they have to hurtle around the stage.”

“What’s in the fridge, Da?”

“Lots of leftovers,” Bard replied.

“Yes! Trash Lunch!” Bain exclaimed, pumping his fist.

Legolas’s eyebrows went up at Bain’s excitement, and so did Thran’s. “Trash lunch? We’re going to eat... trash?”

“That’s just what the children call the meal where I pile all the bits and bobs from the fridge onto the island, and everyone eats a little of this and a little of that until everything’s gone. The fridge gets cleaned out, nothing ends up in the trash, and tomorrow we get to eat new food. Trust Bain to call it Trash Lunch rather than Smörgåsbord.”

“Then let us pile.” Thran opened the fridge and peered inside. “All these bins, yes?”

“All the bins,” Bard confirmed. “The dishwasher always gets a workout after Trash Lunch.”

As Thran got out the bins, the children got out plates for the table and spoons for the various bins. Legolas dumped some of the leftovers into bowls, which Bain ferried in and out of the microwave to heat. Tilda arranged cheese on a platter, Sigrid washed fruit, and Thran poured milk. Bard combined the various bits of veg into a big bowl, and found salad dressing as well as the lemon that Thran used to dress his salad. In a few minutes, the kitchen island was piled high.
“Have at,” Bard shooed the children towards the plates, and serving began. Bard was right; no one had the same things on their plates, and some of the combinations were interesting.

“Nacho on saltines, Bain?” Bard shook his head.

“Tastes fine,” Bain mumbled through a mouthful. “We ate all the corn chips, didn’t we? Saltines work just fine.”

Thran ate mostly salad, but Bard was glad to see that he’d added a chicken thigh and a hard-boiled egg to his bowl, and had few slices of cheese with crackers on the side. Bard was content with the last of the farro mixed with chicken, salad, and fruit. No one went hungry, and when the carnage was complete, the pile of empty bins was substantial.

“I’ve got enough to get us through tomorrow, Monday breakfast, and Monday school lunches,” Bard said as he put away the few remaining leftovers, mostly cheese. “I’ll head to the market once the children go to school.”

“Any cookies?” Legolas asked.

“They’re done for,” Bain shook his head. “But there’s the bake sale at the Follies – the kids at school said the stuff is usually great, and there’s lots of it.”

“We’d best make our way there,” Bard said, loading the last of the bins and utensils in the dishwasher. “Thran and I want to look around before he’s got to warm up for your dances. Brush your teeth, all of you!”

The thunder of children running upstairs made Bard grin, an expression he shared with Thran as they followed at a slower pace. Thran dressed in his dance belt and tights, slipped his jeans and trainers and Henley on top, and combed and braided his hair. He made sure his costume and makeup box were in his bag, and then went to help Tilda collect her things. Bard stuck his head in Sigrid’s room to see how she was faring.

“Oh, tights, extra tights, shoes, leotard, tutu, tiara... I’ve got everything,” she said, packing things in a large bag. “I’m not going to wear my costume there, because I want it to be a surprise when I come out on stage.”

“Good idea,” Bard nodded. “Ready to go?”

“Ready. But before we go downstairs...”

“Yes?” Bard drawled.

“Finn’s going to be with me when I’m not with you and Thran and Tilda getting ready for our dances. Just so you know I’ve got some more backup.”

“Nice of him,” Bard nodded. “Quite the gentleman doofus, then.”

Sigrid rolled her eyes. “Da...”

“Sig...”

“Okay, he is a doofus. But he’s a sweet one.”

“He seems to be a nice guy.”

“He said...”
“He said what?”

“He said he was trying to convince his parents to let him stay with Kíllian next year, so he could go to the Imladris Academy, too.”

“What do you think about that?”

“He’s smart. He shouldn’t be in that school – not that it’s that terrible, but parts of it are rough, and he could maybe get into a better college if he had a little more help.”

“And for yourself?”

Sigrid looked Bard right in the eye. “I wouldn’t mind seeing him more. But don’t get any ideas, Da. I want more than what we had in the city, too, and now that I have a way to get it, I’m going to take advantage of it. I want to go to college, a good one.”

Bard put his arms around his daughter. “I’m sorry I couldn’t give you more until now. But we have it now, and I’m very happy that you want to take it as far as you can. I won’t ever stop telling you to do your best, just like always.”

“And I won’t ever stop doing just that,” Sigrid gave Bard a hard hug. “Ada calls me Clan Ffyrnig’s fierce lioness.”

“I call you that, too.”

“I am. And I’m going to be.”

Bard stroked Sigrid’s hair, determined to swallow the lump in his throat. “That’s my sweetness. So let’s go be fierce at the Follies.”

“Let’s go be ghostly at the Follies,” Sigrid snickered as she bent to pick up her bag. “Then I’m going to have a cupcake!”

Bard’s warm glow lasted until Clan Ffyrnig piled into Thran’s SUV and headed down the road. Then he thought about what Sigrid had said – Finn would be with her throughout the afternoon, backing her up.

Sigrid was no fool. Finn hadn’t told her anything, but he hadn’t had to. She’d figured out on her own that she was the one Lance Dunmont was after.
Chapter 94

Chapter Summary

An angel, a saint, and a host of cherubs do their best to enjoy the April Fool's Follies. Will they succeed, or will a certain dark shadow cast a pall on the day's festivities?

By the time Clan Ffyrnig reached the Imladris Academy, Bard had reached a decision. As they joined the stream of people heading into the school for the festival, he drew Thran aside.

“Go ahead with Tilda, would you?”

“Of course,” Thran said instantly, without questioning the request, and took the little girl ahead with him.

“All right, you lot,” he said quickly, drawing Sigrid, Legolas, and Bain close. “There’s a chance Lance will turn up here today. He may look for any of us, but especially Sigrid. Finn already knows this, but you can speak to Tara and Kíllian if you need to, just so they understand why you need to stay together and be watchful. If you see him, tell the security people. Thran and I will be close by until it’s time for the dances.”

He dug into his pocket and pulled out three ten-dollar bills, passing one to each of the children. “Tilda doesn’t know about this, and I’d prefer to keep it that way so that she doesn’t get even more scared than she already is. Any questions?”

“Did you tell the cops last night?” Bain asked.

“I did. Until Lance does something stupid, the police can’t lift a finger. That doesn’t mean you provoke him. It means you keep yourselves out of whatever stupid thing he does. Do NOT go off anywhere alone – even the ladies’ room, Sig. Get Finn, one of your brothers, or one of your mates to wait for you. Keep Thran and me in sight as much as you can.”

He scanned faces. Had he put too much on their shoulders? They weren’t that much older than Tilda. But Sigrid’s jaw was set at its most stubborn, and Bain’s was no less resolute. Legolas was worried, but calm as he glanced at his siblings.

“We’ll be okay, Da,” Sigrid murmured. “That dickwad won’t mess with a pack of us.”

“Keep your eyes open, all the same.”

“Okay, Da; okay Bard.”

They headed after Thran, with purpose in their steps.
“Why is Da talking to the other children without me?” Tilda said, looking back at her father huddled with her siblings.

“I do not know, Kukla,” Thran hedged. He suspected, but he didn’t know for sure, so he hadn’t lied to Tilda. When Bard pulled out his wallet and handed some money to the children, he was relieved – he had something plausible to say. “Ah, that is the answer, see? He gives them some money for the bake sale, or the trinket booths.”

“Oh,” Tilda said, squeezing Thran’s hand. “But... does that mean that I won’t get any?”

“Of course you will. But you are with your Da and me, and the others will likely find Finn and Killian and Tara, so he gives them their share ahead of time.”

“Oh, okay. That makes sense.”

Thran breathed another silent sigh of relief. Sometimes, being a parent meant feeling protective and dishonest at the same time.

* * *

Bard let Sigrid, Bain, and Legolas move ahead of him before he rejoined Thran and Tilda. “What would you like to do first, Tilda? Maybe get a treat before you have to dance, then see the art?”

“Yes, a treat,” Tilda decided, smiling. “Sigrid said there were cupcakes.”

“Let us see, then,” Thran said as they came into the main school entrance. The auditorium was to their right, the central hall had the craft booths, and the hallway off to the left near the lunchroom had the bake sale. Even though the Follies had just opened, the halls were already full of people. Bard was pleased to see two uniformed police officers in the lobby, one of whom was Officer Kelso. He nodded and smiled at the officer, who returned the greeting, then Thran forged ahead, heading to the bake sale. Bard took Tilda’s hand and followed closely.

Tables set up down the corridor leading to the lunchroom were crowded with all sorts of treats – the expected cupcakes and cookies, but also small fruit tarts, bags of candied nuts and brickles, truffles and fudge, trail mix, brownies, fruit cups, and various beverages.

“So much sugar,” Thran tsked, as they filed past one display after the other. “What is it called – a diabetic coma? To breathe in too much is to risk one.”

“A truffle or two won’t hurt,” Bard grinned. “What looks good to you, little doll? Not too much, okay, because you have to dance in a bit.”

“I know.” Tilda craned her neck. “I was hoping for a coconut cupcake. But I don’t know if anyone made those.”

“Coconut cupcakes?” The boy manning the table they were just passing looked up at Tilda. “Try down at the end, on the left. See, just before the exit sign?”

Tilda craned her neck, then turned back to the boy. “I see it. Thank you!”

“No problem,” the boy grinned. “I like ‘em, too. Mrs. Hobbs’s booth. She makes really good ones.”
“Thanks,” Bard nodded in appreciation. “Let’s try down there, then.”

He turned back to find Sigrid, and found her with Tara, Bain, and Legolas in tow, and pointed down the hall. She nodded, and the children trailed along behind.

“Oooh! There they are!” Tilda exclaimed, pulling Bard forward. “All sorts of them.”

“Pick just one,” Bard asked, and after due deliberation, she chose a coconut frosted one. As Bard passed over the money, she looked back at Legolas and held up her cupcake.

“Coconut!” she called, pointing to her treat.

“Really? Coconut?” he said, blue braids swinging as he hurried over. “Hey, it is! I want one, too.”

Soon the rest of the children descended on the cupcake table, so Bard and Thran stood off to the side while the children made their choices. Out of the crowd came Finn, Killian, and Derry, so Bard had time to scan the sea of faces. So many people coming and going! It wasn’t going to be easy to spot anyone at any distance...

“What is a cheese straw?” Thran asked Bard.

“What?” Bard blinked. “Oh, a cheese straw? I have no idea. Where do you see those?”

Thran pointed at the next booth, where small bags of ribbon cookies lay next to the mysterious cheese straws. “They look like some sort of crisp wafer. I will ask.”

The woman behind the table gladly explained that the straws were a mixture of very sharp cheddar cheese, a little flour, and cayenne pepper, piped into thin wafers, and baked. Thran bought a bag of those and pronounced them quite tasty. He offered them to Tilda and Bard.

“Maybe we can find a recipe and make some, lyubov moya,” Thran said. “I like them.”

“Mmm, they are good,” Bard agreed, sampling a small piece of the treat. “Spicy.”

They moved on, following the older children ahead of them. Killian yelped as he passed a table selling homemade beef jerky, and quickly bought a bag.

“What? I love this stuff!” he laughed at Tara’s roll of the eyes. “Gives me the strength to hit all the notes in those Irish reels I have to play in a bit!”

He offered Legolas a piece, who’d never sampled it before. The tall blonde youth pronounced it very chewy, but delicious.

“Nothing for you, my saint?” Thran asked.

Truth be told, Bard was too busy watching the crowd to look much at the treats, but he’d already seen what he wanted on their way down the hall. “I’ll get some of the peanut brickle we passed on the way in. I don’t make a lot of candy, so that’s the treat for me.”

He got his bag of brickle, offering it to Thran, who chewed a tiny piece appreciatively. “Very buttery. I like that, too.”

“Sweet and salty at the same time,” Tilda said. “I like the cheese straws, too, Ada. Those are cheesy and spicy at the same time.”

“Delicious,” Thran agreed.
“How about if we look at the art now? Thran’s got to get ready to dance soon, so let’s give him a chance to see everything first.”

“Okay,” Tilda agreed. “On to the art!”

As they caught up to the older children, Bard leaned close to Sigrid to tell her they were headed to the lunchroom to peruse the silent auction offerings. She nodded, and pulled the older children after them.

The lunchroom was busy, but far less crowded than the bake sale tables. Bard paused as he saw the older children huddle. Tara’s expression was perplexed, then grim, then determined. She linked arms with Sigrid, and Finn stationed himself at her other shoulder. The other boys ranged farther away, but they wouldn’t make it easy for anyone to get close to Sigrid without passing them first. When Bard and Thran steered Tilda down the first row, the older children followed.

Despite his preoccupation with the people around him, Bard enjoyed seeing the entries for the silent auction. There were many beautiful pieces – pottery, paintings, encaustic tiles, textile wall hangings, sculpture, and more. A hand-painted silk jacket dazzled in greens and blues. A small wooden box was painstakingly inlaid with shell and jade in a twining pattern of leaves and flowers. Bard particularly liked a small lamp shaped like a beautiful blue water lily made from origami-like folds of silk, nestled on a base of green silk lily pads, with a small yellow light aglow in its center. He was pleased to see that his sketch already had several bids. He made sure to sign the urban art petition for Theodred’s class, and so did Thran.

“How do you plan to bid on anything, lyubov moyya?” Thran asked.

“I might,” Bard hedged. The truth was he’d seen several things he’d liked, but he wasn’t comfortable with spending Thran’s money on them. “What about you? Does anything pique your interest?”

“Other than the beautiful sketch of Aragorn and Arwen?” Thran winked.

“I will not bid on that, angel. I’ll give you any of the ones I kept. Or I’ll draw you something special.”

“I will not bid on yours, then, as much as I like it. But there was a small inlaid box I thought was very beautiful. It would make a good box to hold our wedding rings when we cannot wear them, such as when you weld and I dance.”

“The one with the jade and the shell? I liked that, too.”

“So let us bid on that one. And perhaps one other, one you choose.”

“The box is good enough for me.”

“Oh, it would not hurt us to try for one other, would it?”

“I guess not.”

“So which one did you like?”

“Did you see the lamp shaped like a blue water lily? Those flowers were sacred to the Egyptians. They’re in a lot of their temple carvings – the big columns at Karnak, for example.”

“I liked it very much. I thought it would be perfect for the solarium.”

“I saw it, too,” Tilda piped up. “It was pretty.”
“So we will bid on that one, too,” Thran decided. “Come, let us write down our names.”

They retraced their steps to the two items they liked. Bard waved Thran forward to make his bids, and he purposely didn’t look to see how much those bids were. He was reconciled to Thran having more money than he did, but he preferred to let Thran decide how much of it he wanted to spend on nonessentials. He took the chance to scan the people around him again, just to keep a wary eye out. The children lingered by the door, waiting for them to finish.

“I have made our bids, lyubov moyaa,” Thran announced. “Ah, the children are ready to move on. Where next?”

“Then let us go after them. What do you think we will find there, Kukla?”

Tilda considered. “If Miss Rosie is here, maybe she has a little sunflower sun catcher, like her big one, but smaller?”

“I think she does have a booth,” Bard replied. “Let’s see if we can find it. Usual rule – ten dollars and under.”

“Okay, Da.”

They followed the older children out of the lunchroom and down to the craft and art booths. The variety of offerings was even larger than what had been on exhibit in the lunchroom – several jewelry booths, etched wood, and leather goods among them. Rosie’s booth was near the front, and Tilda pulled Bard forward with a smile and wave to their neighbor.

“Hi, Tilda!” Sam greeted her with a big smile. “Hi, Bard, Thran! Quite the crowd this year!”

“That’s great!” Bard said, waving at Rosie who helped another customer. “You got roped into being an artist in something other than greenery today, did you?”

“The children are all at Gran’s, and I’ve learned that the garden center is not the draw in this village on Follies day,” he grinned. “Rosie’s pretty longsuffering when I work so late during the summer, so I like to return the favor when I can.”

“Wise move,” Bard grinned. “Tilda was hoping to find one of Rosie’s sunflower sun catchers.”

“We’ve got several flower ones,” Sam smiled at Tilda. “All kinds, all colors. That row. See if any of those suit you, Til.”

While Tilda perused with her usual consideration, Bard chatted a little longer with Sam while his daughter made her choice. She held up a yellow sunflower with an orange center and green leaves around the edge.

“This one, Da?”

“Good choice,” Bard nodded. “How much is it?”

Sam started to speak, but Bard flicked him a glance, so he fell silent as Tilda checked the reverse for the price sticker.

“Oh, good – it’s eight dollars. So with the dollar for my cupcake, that’s nine, so I’m still ten dollars or less.”
“You are,” Bard nodded, handing her a ten-dollar bill. “So give Mr. Sam your money, and he’ll give you your sun catcher.”

“Thank you, Tilda,” Sam took the money, gave her the change, wrapped her sun catcher in tissue, and stowed it in a small bag. “Nice to do business with you.”

“Nice to do business with you, too,” she said, tucking the bag under her arm. She handed Bard one of the dollars. “There, that’s for my cupcake, Da. So I have one dollar left. Maybe I’ll get another cupcake after I dance.”

“Good plan. Thanks, Sam. We’re looking forward to seeing you tomorrow. We’ve got some ideas about the Japanese garden, and our solarium’s coming along, too, so maybe you can offer some advice for that.”

“Glad to,” Sam nodded. “Enjoy the rest of the Follies. And break a leg for your dance, Til!”

“Thanks! Bye!” Tilda waved as they moved on.

Thran was instantly at Bard’s side. Bard tensed, but his husband was not upset or agitated; rather, he was excited. “Bard, come look at the next booth. They have something I think you will like.”

“Oooh, jewelry,” Tilda commented, drawn to the sparkly display. “Lots of earrings. Can I get my ears pierced, Da?”

“Not until you’re sixteen,” Bard said automatically. “You have to be old enough to take care of them yourself while they heal.”

“That’s what you always say,” Tilda sighed, regarding the rows of rings and studs and dangles.

“Until you’re sixteen, yes,” Bard ruffled her hair.

“Look there,” Thran pointed to a locked case full of earrings. “Do you like any of those?”

Bard followed Thran’s finger, and spotted a pair of small rings in the lowest row of the case. Each one was subtly faceted, reminding him of his wedding ring. When he pointed to them, Thran gave him a triumphant grin.

“The exact pair. I want to buy them for you.”

“They’re nice, angel, but you don’t have to do that.”

“But I want to. They are white gold, they remind me of our rings, and you need nice ones. So it is done.”

Bard smothered a chuckle. “You’re excited. Any minute now, you’ll start to wave your hands around and your accent will become very Russian, and you’ll talk very fast.”

Thran waved his hands at Bard, rattled off something in Russian, likely vulgar, and concluded his performance by sticking out his tongue. “There, silly welder. Now I will see about your earrings.”

Thran flagged over the artist, who was pleased to show Thran the earrings. After holding them up to Bard’s ears, they both liked them, so the woman carefully cleaned them before holding them out to Bard.

“If you want to wear them home, you can. There’s alcohol in the cleaner.”
He didn’t have to look at Thran to agree. The woman held a mirror for him to extricate his old ones and put in the new ones. These didn’t feel any different to wear, but they looked much better than his old ones, and Bard liked the bohemian air they lent him.

“They look nice,” Tilda said, looking up at him.

“Very nice,” Thran purred.

Gods, his cheeks felt warm. Was he blushing? Just keep moving, just keep moving...

“They suit you very well,” the woman smiled, handing him the small box that had held the earrings. “I hope you enjoy them.”

They thanked the woman, and continued their perusal. Belatedly, Bard remembered to look for the older children, but they were all still nearby, Sigrid and Tara poring over the offerings in another jewelry booth, and the boys checking out some braided leather belts. By the time they’d covered the rest of the craft booths, it was close to two, and time for Thran and the girls to get ready for their dances. They collected Sigrid to find their way to the back hallway. Finn and Tara came with her.

“Tara’s going to help me with my costume in the restroom,” Sigrid explained. “Then she’ll go with the boys to see Killian and Derry – they’re on in just a few minutes. They’ll hang out together until we’re done. Finn says he’ll stay in the back with me.”

The pleading expression on Sigrid’s face belied her casual words, so Bard nodded. “Good plan. Can you both help Tilda into her costume, too?”

“Absolutely,” Sigrid said, and Tara nodded. “Come on, Til. We’ll get dressed now.”

They all headed into the back hallway. Bard was relieved to see a table blocking free access to the area, and a pair of attendees behind it making sure that only performers and their helpers were allowed past them. That made sense, as the hallway was too small for any more people than the performers. Once Bard saw the girls safely ensconced in the bathroom to change, he snared Bain and Legolas to ask if they’d seen anything, but none of the group had. The boys asked if they could pay another trip to the bake sale, but agreed to wait until Tara was ready to go with them, and after they’d watched Killian and Derry’s performance. Thran went on ahead to find a vacant space for them, and Bard waited by the restroom door for the girls. When they emerged, Tara went off with Legolas and Bain, and Tilda, Finn, and Sigrid followed Bard down to join Thran. Bard and Finn collected all the bags while Thran did Sigrid’s makeup, then began his warmup. Time was shorter than they’d planned, but Thran was calm as he stretched and limbered. It was warm with all the performers coming and going, so Thran had peeled down to tights and tee, substituting dancing shoes for his trainers.

“Yes, time is a little short, but Sigrid’s dance does not call for so much flexibility,” he reassured Bard, stretching backwards and over into a backbend, rocking back and forth to limber his shoulders, back, and hips. That sent a murmur of comments rippling through the other performers who watched, and Finn’s mouth was agape, which gave Sigrid something to smile about. At times like this, his husband was at his most exotic, elegantly contorting himself into positions most people couldn’t think of, much less do, yet still able to carry on a conversation with ease. “Yes, the C-jump is extreme, but my spine and legs are ready. I will take a little more time with my hamstrings and quads before Kukla’s dance.”

Beside Thran, Sigrid did her much more sedate stretches, shaking her head at the tall dancer in his backbend. “You were right, Da. Ada doesn’t have ligaments. Just rubber bands.”

Snickering, Thran flowed upright again. “Perhaps I am jointed like a marionette, then. Some of them have rubber bands.”

“Sigrid and Thran, Midnight at the Carnival, five minutes,” Ingrid called down the hall. Thran waved acknowledgement, then stripped off his tee. How provocative was it to see that lean torso exposed in such an industrial setting against a green-painted concrete block wall? Thran was serenely oblivious to the notice he attracted, though he offered Bard a small smile when he beckoned for his Henley. He pulled on his jeans and trainers, and settled himself with one more stretch. He offered his hand to Sigrid.

“Shall we dance, dochka?”

“Da, Ada,” Sigrid grinned, putting her hand in Thran’s.

“We’ll circle around to watch,” Bard said, and Tilda nodded.

“Break a leg!” Tilda called, as she and Finn helped Bard gather up their bags.

“Yeah!” echoed Finn. “Nail it, Sig!”

She laughed, as she and Thran found Ingrid. Bard, Finn, and Tilda shared out the bags between them, then hurried to the auditorium entrance to find seats to watch the first of Clan Ffyrnig’s dances. The place was so crowded that it wasn’t easy to get through the press, but just as the announcer spoke, they found seats on the outside aisle halfway down.

“Next up, Sigrid Bowman and Thran Oropherson present Midnight at the Carnival.”

Bard took a quick look around the auditorium before the spotlight revealed Thran. Nearly every seat was taken, and he thought he spotted a film crew in the back. So many people, so many people...

He spotted Officer Kelso and another female officer stationed at the door in the back, so he relaxed a little, and turned forward in his seat to watch his husband and daughter weave their spell. It didn’t matter how many times before he’d seen them practice, this was their first public performance, and the ripple of anticipation that ran up his spine echoed the excited murmur that went through the audience. Everyone was here to see his husband, the renowned ballet star, dance with his daughter. Beside him, Tilda bounced in her seat, just as caught up as he was.

The spotlight came up, Thran wandered, and Sigrid appeared as a glamorous and ghostly spirit. The eerie and compelling Carnival of Souls waltz began, prickling all of Bard’s skin into gooseflesh as Sigrid circled the bedazzled Thran. When he swept her into the first partnered steps, a gasp went up all over the auditorium. The pair circled and circled, the ghost flirting with her mortal partner as she wove her spell. Thran followed helplessly, too snared to realize that a ghost teased him. When she broke away, he flew into the spectacular C-jump, braid flying, arms outstretched, head back, so enthralled that his feet nearly touched the back of his head. That tore another gasp from the audience. When Sigrid abandoned him to flit off as the music faded, Thran fell to his knees, devastated that his ghostly partner was gone. As the spotlight faded, the place erupted into cheers. The spotlight came up again to reveal Thran and Sigrid at center stage to take their bows amid thunderous applause. Many people got to their feet, which brought a huge smile to Bard’s face. Beside Tilda, Finn was up on his feet to whistle and cheer.

“I can’t see!” Tilda tugged on his arm, so he stood up and pulled her into his arms to see Thran stand to the side, one hand behind him, the other offering Sigrid his recognition. She took a solo bow, then her exuberance got the best of her as she did a little dance and pointed to Thran, urging the audience to recognize him. They needed little encouragement to do so, which he accepted with a wide smile, a hand on his heart, and a deep bow. He took Sigrid’s hand once more for another pair of bows, then they retreated.

“Come on, Til,” Bard beckoned. “Time to get you ready.”

He bumped Finn, so the three of them threaded their way through the crowd and out of the auditorium. The film crew was interviewing people about Thran’s performance, so he skirted that to duck down the back hall. He found Sigrid and Thran in a knot of other performers who congratulated them on their efforts. His daughter was breathless with excitement, still bouncing up and down. Thran had stripped off his Henley, and was glad to dig a towel out of the bag Bard held out to him to mop his face.

“That was amazing! Just amazing!” Finn exclaimed, enveloping Sigrid in a bear hug. That spontaneous display disconcerted both of them, enough that Finn snuck a furtive glance at Bard.
Bard managed to return it with an understanding smile, but Thran chuckled as he pulled on his tee and shed his jeans and trainers.

“Thanks,” Sigrid finally said. “It was pretty amazing, wasn’t it?”

“Stellar,” Bard pronounced it. “What’d you think, Til? Your sister did a pretty good job, don’t you think?”

“You were a good ghost,” Tilda agreed. “Not like a zombie at all.”

“Thanks, Til. Ada, I’m going to take off my makeup, just in case.”

“I think that would be wise, ma chère,” Thran agreed, opening his makeup box and getting out the tissues and cold cream. “There is a clean towel in my bag to help you wipe off all the white.”

“I’ll help you get the back,” Bard offered, before Finn could. Not that tissuing cold cream off his daughter’s back was so enticing, especially in a crowd, but... such were a father’s instincts.

“Come, Kukla, it is time for the pink cheeks,” beckoned Thran, so while Bard and Sigrid worked to banish the ghost, Thran and Tilda worked to create the mischievous little girl. Bard’s lined face and silver hair were next, then Thran took back the mirror to make his doll face. After much wiping, Sigrid finally got most of the white off, and as Thran began his warmups, Finn went to wait outside the restroom while she changed out of her costume. Wisely, she’d brought a different top from what she’d worn earlier, in case Lance had spotted her in the first one. She came back to their space in the hall with Finn in tow.

“I want to see Tilda’s dance, Da,” she said, as Tilda joined Thran in some stretches. “So can Finn and I sneak into the auditorium for it?”

Bard was already collecting bags, and he had Thran’s doll top, bloomers, and hat in one hand and Tilda’s hair bow in the other. “I’d rather you be with a group, sweetness. Finn, do you think you can round up the boys or Kíllian and Tara?”

“Sure, Mr. Bowman. Be right back, Sig.” The stocky boy jumped up and trotted off.

“I know, I know, keep my eyes open and so forth and so on,” Sigrid sighed. “I could just slap Lance Dunmont, causing all this stir.”

“It’s a pain, but a pain I want you to take, Sigrid. It’ll be easier once Thran and Til are through their dance, and we can watch each other’s backs a lot easier. Just stay with it.”

Surprisingly, Finn was back in a few minutes with Killian and Derry. “That’s because we set up a meeting spot,” the boy explained. “We’ve got seats in the middle of a row, too, and Legolas pulled up his hoodie so his blonde hair’s not too easy to spot. So we thought it out.”

“I appreciate that,” Bard nodded. “Okay, Sig – here, you’ll have to hold the bags until we’re done. Once we’re finished, we’ll meet back here, okay?”

“Aye, Captain Bard,” Sigrid nodded. “Hey, Tilda!”

The little girl looked up from her stretch.

“Break a leg when you out-cute them, okay?”

Tilda’s grin was pleased. “Thank you! I will!”

Bard’s jaw tightened as Sigrid retreated between Finn and Killian, with Derry just ahead. Such care, so many precautions... while his watchfulness hadn’t ruined the day, it had put a pall on his usual lighthearted enjoyment of such festivals.

“Tilda, Thran, and Bard, The Doll, five minutes,” Ingrid called down the hall.

Bard waved a hand in acknowledgement, and beckoned to Tilda so he could fasten the big bow in her hair. Thran pulled on his bloomers, top, and hat, added his red nose, and they were ready. They queued up before Ingrid.

The applause died for the act preceding them. With a wink at Tilda, Ingrid nodded them towards the door.

“You’re up.”

Thran led the way into the darkened backstage. Tilda went to the center of the curtain, and Bard and Thran headed left.

“Ready?” Bard whispered, putting his arms around Thran’s waist.

“To be sure,” grinned Thran.

“Next up, Tilda Bowman, Bard Bowman, and Thran Oropherson present The Doll.”

Bard craned his neck to watch Tilda stick her head out of the curtain, drawing chuckles from the crowd. When she pulled her head back in, Bard tightened his grip on Thran.

“Here we go,” he whispered, and Thran stiffened into his pose.

Bard hauled Thran out to center stage, fussed to arrange him in just the right stance, brushed his hands off, and retreated offstage. Again, the auditorium was packed to see Thran, but Tilda didn’t seem to notice, and went through her steps as easily as if she’d been in their ballroom at home. From the wings, Bard watched Tilda’s tiny girl and Thran’s huge, floppy doll engage in their battle of wits, laughing silently at their antics, proud when they got a swirl of laughter or applause from the audience. There came the crash of crockery, the frantic scramble to sweep up the evidence, and then the shoving and poking to prop Thran up into a semblance of his original stance. Bard stamped out, arms waving, pointing at Thran then at Tilda, who was all innocence as she stood with hands primly behind her, shaking her head. Of course not – how could she have managed to move such a huge doll? Bard whirled and mimed surprise now that Thran had straightened into his original stance, and confronted Tilda again. She looked even more innocent than ever, so he threw up his hands again and stamped out in bewilderment. Back in the wings, Bard laughed to see Tilda and Thran so delighted to have put one over on him. The pair made their silly, exuberant dance, and collapsed in a heap right as the music ended. Down went the spotlight, giving the pair time to get in place to take their bows. As the applause and cheers swelled, Bard came out to join them for their second bows, proudly clapped for his daughter and his husband, and exited to leave them to their enthusiastic and well-deserved applause.

“Well done, Kukla!” Thran exclaimed as they came back into the hallway. “You were perfect! So funny!”

“You were great,” Bard praised, grinning to see his youngest child’s excitement. “There were a lot of people out there, and you gave them a good show, one and all.”

“It was fun,” Tilda smiled. “It really was fun.”

“Then you made it fun for all who watched,” Thran assured her, taking off his hat. “And you made it fun for me, too.”

Sigrid and Finn appeared, bags in hand. “Wow, Til, that was great!” Finn declared. “Was it tough to push Mr. Thran over like that?”

Tilda shook her head. “Ada did most of the work. I just had to look like it was hard work.”

“It was terrific,” Sigrid assured her. “The audience gave you and Ada a standing ovation.”

“Not bad for your first public dance performance, is it?” Bard observed.

“Not bad at all,” Tilda nodded. “It was mostly because of Ada, but it was still nice. I had a good time.”

“That is all that counts,” Thran said, taking his bag from Finn. “I will put the doll aside, cool a little, and then we can enjoy the rest of the Follies.”

“I want another cupcake,” Tilda said. “Sigrid, will you go with me to the bathroom so I can take off my costume?”

“Sure. Finn will wait outside for us, too.”

“Okay, good. Thank you, Finn.”

“No prob, Til. Come on.”

The children went off to the restroom, so Bard stayed with Thran to hold the bags while his husband exchanged his doll costume for his tee and did his cooling stretches.

“No aches or pains, angel?”

“It was an easy day for the body. All is well. After I change, I want to see how the silent auction goes for our two items.”

“Good idea. Good, here come the children.”

Tilda, Sigrid, and Finn reappeared, waiting patiently for Thran to complete his stretches. He slipped on his jeans, Henley, and trainers, hefted his bag, and held out his hand to his companions.
“We are through our performances for the day. Now we can enjoy the rest of the Follies.”

But that might not be the case – as soon as the group came out of the hall, a swarm of reporters clamored for Thran’s attention. A smooth expression flowed over Thran’s face as he realized.

“Protect the children,” he said quietly to Bard. “I will deal with them.”

Thran immediately steered a path through the group, heading for the main lobby. “Of course, I am glad to speak with you, but let us not ruin the time for those who enjoy the Follies, yes? A place that is out of the traffic will be better.”

Bard drew Sigrid, Tilda, and Finn off to the side, letting Thran and his trail of reporters pass them by to congregate outside, just past the lobby doors. Bard chewed his lip; should he stay close, so Thran wasn’t alone in the midst of that crowd, or should he take the children elsewhere, in case Lance was here to notice the stir? Before he could decide, Tilda grabbed for his hand.

“Da!” she screamed.

Lance Dunmont was across the lobby, as frozen as Bard was.

Everyone spasmed into motion at once – Lance’s face twisted in fury as he jerked towards the quartet. Finn, cursing, tried to push Tilda and Sigrid behind him and Bard. Tilda went; Bard made sure Tilda was behind him before he took a step forward. Sigrid, however, would have no part of retreat – she stood shoulder to shoulder with Bard and Finn as the tall boy with straight brown hair and angry black eyes raised his hand to point at her.

“I see you, Sigrid Bowman,” he spat. “You’re gonna pay for what you did. Pay.”

“You bring it, Lance Dunmont,” Sigrid spat back, bristling. “Just you bring it.”

Lance might have said something else, but a tall white-haired dancer rushed into the lobby from outside, eyes wide with fury. Lance flinched at Thran’s sudden appearance, and stupidly charged at him with head down and arms swinging. As two police officers converged on the lobby, Thran dodged the worst of the barrage, but Lance grabbed his arm – why? Did he think to use Thran to get away? Thran went with him, forcing the boy back, then shoving him away when the boy lost his balance.

“Hold him!” the police barked as they careened forward.

Belatedly, Thran tried to reel the boy in, managing to keep one hand on him as the police drew near. Balance restored, Lance twisted his arm hard, and yanked himself free, dodging through the confused gaggle of reporters with the police in full pursuit. Wincing, the tall dancer watched the pursuit through the door, shaking his hand and muttering under his breath.

“I do not think they will catch him,” Thran muttered, as Bard joined him. “Are the children all right?”

“We’re fine. What about you? Oh, gods, Thran – your arm.”

Thran’s left arm bore dark red bruises from elbow to wrist. From the ginger way Thran held it, bruises were not the extent of the damage.
Chapter 95

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint are determined that an ambush will not ruin the end of their day at the Follies.

“Is it broken?”

Thran stared out of the lobby doors, tracking the police officers who raced after the elusive Lance Dunmont. As fast as the officers were, the wiry Lance Dunmont was faster. They wouldn’t bring their quarry to ground today.

“Thran. Is it broken?”

Blinking, Thran met Bard’s concerned gaze. “Is... what broken?”

“Your arm. Did he break your arm?”

The pain hit, then the noise, then the sight of so many people milling around him – reporters, a police officer, uncounted others, all talking and babbling at once. Bard’s arm went around his waist. Where were Tilda, Sigrid, and Finn? Yes, there against the wall, Tilda standing between the older children and clinging to both of them. What about the boys? Where was his son? And Bain? He shut his eyes against the overload before it overwhelmed him –

“Thran – look at me! Did Lance break your arm!”

“Papa! Let me through! That’s my father!”

“Mr. Oropherson, do you know your assailant? Was this a targeted attack or a random one?”

“Is there any truth to the theory that –”

“Why did you choose to dance at a school funct –”

“Please, move back, move back! Give him space!”

“Do you expect the police to catch your attacker, and if so, will you press charges –”

The cacophony grew louder and louder, so much so that when he focused on Bard’s grim face, he couldn’t hear his husband’s voice. The jostling and shoving grew more urgent, more dangerous –

“SILENCE!” he shouted. “ALL OF YOU! NOW!”

Everyone froze, and the din immediately around him was silenced. Oh, thank the gods –

“I am fine. My arm is not broken. Please, all of you, calm yourself.”

“Papa!”

“Where is my son?” Thran demanded, summoning his Prince of Ice glare. Under his adamant regard, the crowd parted to let Legolas shoulder through to his side, unscathed.

“Papa, are you hurt?”

“I am fine. Please, everyone, calm down. I can tell you nothing of what happened. You must let the police do their jobs, so please help them however you can. I have nothing more to say.”

Two uniformed police officers moved through the crowd to disperse it, and Bard drew Thran back into the performers’ area to regroup. Office Kelso came after them, but Thran let Bard and Legolas ease him into a chair. He suddenly felt very tired.

“Do you want to lie down, Thran?” Bard’s face appeared, brown eyes full of worry. “You’re as white as your hair, and you’re shaking.”

“The joys of an adrenaline rush,” he managed to smile. “I will be fine. I am fine.”

“Do you want the EMTs to look at your wrist? It’s starting to swell.”

“It is a sprain or a strain, but it is not broken.”

“Then it needs ice. Lads, a couple of you go down the bake sale aisle and see if you can get some ice from the drinks booth.”

“I’ll go, Mr. Bowman,” Finn said. “Back as quick as I can. Come on, Bain.”

“Thanks. Until he gets back, Thran, prop it up on the table. Elevate it to keep the swelling down. Sigrid, get your spare tights out of your bag. I can wrap them around Thran’s wrist until we get him home.”

“Got it, Da.” She thrust them into her sister’s hands. “Give those to Da, Tilda.”

“Okay, Sigrid.” The little girl ducked under the table to appear beside Thran’s chair. She handed the tights to her father and gazed at Thran with worried eyes. “Does it hurt a lot, Ada?”

While Bard wound the stretchy tights snugly around his wrist, Thran gave the little girl and Legolas beside her a reassuring smile. “Not very much, Kukla. See, the wrap makes it feel better already. Do not worry.”

Finn appeared behind Officer Kelso, and slithered beside Bard with a cup of ice. Bain appeared at his side with a second one. The young hockey player pulled a plastic bag out of his pocket. “Here, Mr. Bowman. Bain’s got some more.”

“Great. Thanks, Finn. Bain, you and Finn get the ice into the bag...”

“Here, Da,” Bain passed over the bag. Bard unwound enough of the tights to bind the bag around Thran’s wrist.

“Okay, that’ll help keep the swelling down. Just rest your arm on the table. You’re good otherwise?”

“The rest of me is fine,” Thran mustered a grin at the waiting police officer. “I have a good family, yes?”

“You do, indeed. They make quite a medical team, I have to say. Not to mention a good security team, too.”

“Security team?” Thran repeated.
Bard pointed past the table. Thran followed his husband’s gaze to find Tara, Kíllian, Bain, Sigrid, Finn, and Derry forming a screen between him and the rest of the Follies crowd. He gave his husband a wry grin.

“They do,” Thran nodded. “Thank you, children. So, you have questions for me, Officer Kelso.”

“Just a few. A couple of the reporters got the whole thing on film, so we can see what happened. A couple of civilians got the initial confrontation on their mobiles, so we have that, too. That was this Lance Dunmont you called me about, correct?”

Thran nodded, and so did Tilda beside him.

“Who saw him first?”

“I did,” Tilda said, looking shamefaced. “I screamed. I’m sorry, Da. I didn’t expect to see him, and I just... screamed when I did.”

“It’s okay, Til,” Bard assured her. “It was likely the best thing, because you got everyone’s attention. That’s just what we needed.”

“Your father’s right,” Officer Kelso nodded. “What happened after you saw Lance?”

“Finn pushed me behind him, and so did Da. Sigrid got in front of me, too. I stayed behind them. I didn’t see very much, but I heard Lance Dunmont say he saw my sister and she was going to pay for what she did. Then Sigrid told him to bring it, just bring it, and then Ada came in, and there was a fight. Then a lot of people got in front of me so I didn’t see very much after that at all.”

“I was outside with the reporters, so that they would not bother the people who came for the Follies,” Thran took up the tale. “I heard Tilda scream, and ran back inside. Lance ran at me to grab my arm, we scuffled, I tried to pull away. The police officer yelled at me to hold him, so I tried, but he wrenched my arm and slipped out of my grip.”

“When we catch him, do you want to press charges?”

“Yes,” Bard and Sigrid both growled, drawing Thran’s rueful smile.

“Yes,” Thran echoed. “I do. He has caused enough trouble.”

Officer Kelso nodded. “I’ll have to photograph your injured arm, then. I’ll bring a camera around.”

The officer snared one of his fellows to fetch the camera, then he directed a few more questions to Sigrid and Bard. Other officers were questioning bystanders, getting testimony as well as mobile videos, so Officer Kelso didn’t have too much more to ask his family. His arm was duly unwrapped long enough to be photographed – gods, so many dark, terrible bruises! His arm was livid from elbow to wrist – then Bard carefully wrapped it again. Legolas brought him a bottle of water, which he welcomed. The bottle was iced, and the cold liquid felt so wonderful going down his throat that he drained it in a single draught.

“So much better,” he sighed, giving Legolas a grateful smile. “Thank you, synok.”

“I’m glad you’re better, Papa,” Legolas replied, looking easier. “You were so pale. Does your arm feel better now?”

“It aches, but nothing more. Thanks to you and so many others, I am much restored.”
“Then let’s get you home,” Bard urged. Gods, he looked so worried that Thran mustered indignity.

“Of course not! How can we leave the Follies before Tilda has had her second cupcake? Besides, I want to see how we fare at the silent auction.”

Bard regarded him with longsuffering patience. “You don’t have to prove a point, angel.”

“I don’t have to shorten my enjoyment of the Follies before it is over, either. Come, my arm is well cared for, and I want to finish the day as we wanted, not as a spindly miscreant wanted.”

“Okay,” Bard conceded with a shrug. “What do you think, Tilda? Do you think you can pick out another cupcake?”

“Yes,” Tilda nodded, and gave Thran a considering look. “I think a cupcake would help your arm a whole lot, Ada.”

Chuckling, Thran touched her nose with a fingertip. “Perhaps so. What of you, Legolas? Another cupcake?”

“I’ve had three,” he admitted. “But some of that beef jerky that Killian had would be good.”

“Yeah, beef jerky!” Killian turned around and gave Legolas a grin. “That stuff makes everything better!”

“Then let us go.” Thran stood up and cradled his left arm against his chest. Good, he was steady on his feet, and other than the ache in his wrist, he felt his usual self. As he came around the tables, the children, including Killian, Tara, and Derry, closed ranks around him. “Oh, children, you are most kind, but I do not think there is any more reason to fear the reappearance of a certain angry boy this afternoon. Please, go enjoy yourselves at the rest of the Follies.”

“There’s them,” Derry pointed at the flock of reporters swarming towards them.

“Oh, gods,” Bard groaned. “Vultures, the lot of them.”

“They are,” Thran sighed, as the horde descended.

“Mr. Oropherson, are you all right?”

“Is your arm broken?”

“Who was your attacker?”

“Is this another example of the lack of discipline that’s been responsible for so much youth crime –”

“I am fine. My arm is not broken, only a little sore. I thank you for your concern. I also thank my husband for standing by me today, and also my friends. Look at them, will you? You see that they are young, and they have nothing in common with those you blame for crime. They are caring, talented, and a pleasure to be with, just as are most young people. This wonderful school, the Imladris Academy, as well as many others, nurture equally wonderful children. So do not tar all of the young with that brush of yours. Everywhere, there are many children who merit our respect and guidance, many more than there are those who stray, and those who stray need more help than vitriol. Again, I thank you for your concern, and that is all I will say today. Please, let everyone enjoy what remains of the April Fool’s Follies.”

“Just a few pictures, Mr. Oropherson, with your posse –”
“Posse?” Kíllian snorted, shaking his head at the reporters. He spread his arms wide with his typical enthusiasm. “Do this look like a posse to you? A bunch of dancers and musicians? We’re a troupe, aren’t we?”

The children murmured in enthusiastic agreement, and Thran chuckled as he gave Kíllian a thumbs up sign with his uninjured hand. The boy’s exclamation served to break the tension enough that things began to calm. Smiling, Thran posed in the middle of the children for several pictures, and after a few minutes the reporters drifted away.

“At last,” Sigrid exhaled. “Gods, I don’t know how you’ve managed to put up with them all your life, Ada. You were even nice to them! One day, and I’m ready to run off the lot of them!”

“An annoyance, to be sure,” Thran agreed. “So at last they are gone, and we can enjoy ourselves again. Tilda, let us find your cupcake.”

“And the beef jerky,” Kíllian grinned at Legolas, as the group headed for the bake sale.

* * *

Keeping careful watch, Bard walked beside Thran towards the bake sale hallway. He was confident that Thran’s wrist had suffered only the sprain or strain that his husband said it had, but the pain was likely more than the ache Thran claimed it to be. It was hard to ignore how pale Thran had turned during the fight, as his body pulled blood from his limbs and into his core. It had made him an icy warrior, to be sure, but Bard didn’t want him to pay for it by collapsing after the fact. Still, Thran seemed calm and steady as Tilda found her cupcake – no more coconut remained, but a chocolate one with raspberry frosting was a good second choice – and Legolas and Kíllian and Bain indulged in bags of beef jerky. Bard bought a few truffles, thinking a small bite of sugar might energize Thran a bit; his husband must have thought similarly, because he took one without argument.

“Mmm, a coffee filling, yes?” the tall dancer considered his treat thoughtfully before putting the rest of it in his mouth.

He looked equally comfortable as they checked the silent auction – neither of their bids had been supplanted yet. They had only a few minutes left before the bids were closed, so they perused the offerings during the remaining time. At five, when the bids were closed, Thran seemed delighted that they would bring home the small inlaid box and the lotus flower lamp. But other than handing over his credit card and signing the tickets, he was content to let Bard and Legolas collect their trophies. The children had one to collect, too, a small, nearly spherical vase of clear and green glass swirled together.

“Sigrid, Bain, and I all put in money for it,” Legolas said, as the artisan wrapped the prize in bubble paper. “We thought Maman and Daphne would like it for our memory shelf, to hold the flowers.”

“That’s perfect,” Bard said. “That shelf will go up tomorrow, and I’ll get some flowers at the market on Monday. What kind would you like?”

The children discussed that on the way back to the SUV. Derry, Kíllian, Tara, and Finn invited the Clan Ffyrnig children to share pizza with them at Kíllian’s house, and given that Lance was likely in no position to bother them, Bard and Thran gave their blessing. They would follow Finn back to Kíllian’s house to drop off the children, then make their way home.
“I want to drive us home, angel,” Bard murmured as the children piled into the back, but he needn’t have spoken; Thran already held the keys out to him.

“Thank you, lyubov moya,” his husband murmured in reply. “You are the only one of us who can keep two hands on the wheel, as they say.”

Thran climbed into the passenger side, following the children’s patter with a smile, and quickly seconded Bard’s reminder that he’d pick them up no later than eleven-thirty.

“But our curfew’s midnight!” Bain protested.

“Tilda’s is eleven, so we’ll split the difference. Once all those carbs hit your system, everything that happened today will hit, too. By the time you get home, you’ll be ready to crash.”

“Do we have to shower when we get home?” Legolas asked.

“I think we can pass on that tonight. What do you think, Thran?”

“I think yes. The children have been brave and faithful and fun all day, and they deserve the pass.”

“We’ll wash tomorrow. In fact, we’ll wash a lot of things – us, the sheets, the mountain of dirty clothes. We need to do some cleanup of the house tomorrow, too, but then we’ll have the rest of the day free. Sound fair?”

The children grumbled a little, but the grumbling was half-hearted, more formality than anything else, drawing Thran and Bard to grin at each other. When they got to Kíllian’s house, his parents, Siobhan and Ian, came out to say hello. Finn came out to ask when the children needed to be home.

“I’ll come get them at about eleven-fifteen, if that’s not too late,” Bard said, looking at Siobhan.

“I’ll be glad to bring them home, Mr. Bowman,” Finn offered. “Derry and Kíllian will take Tara home, so I’ll bring Sig, Legs, Bain, and Tilda home.”

Kíllian’s head appeared behind Finn. “You’ll be doing my mom and dad a favor. After an evening with this lot, they’ll be glad to have half an hour of quiet.”

Siobhan laughed. “He’s right, the scamp. Finn’s a good driver, but I understand if you’d rather pick them up yourselves.”

“That’ll be great, Finn,” Bard agreed. “Thanks for offering.”

“Thanks, Da,” Sigrid leaned in to give Bard a kiss. “Take good care of Ada. Make him some chicken soup!”

“That cures everything,” Thran grinned. “You know the routine, yes? Behave yourselves, be polite, and help to clean up?”

“We know it,” Bain rolled his eyes. “Believe me, we know it!”

“Good,” Bard gave his son an eye. “Tilda, you have a good time, okay?”

She nodded vigorously. “I will. Finally, I get to be with the big kids!”

“And the kittens,” Kíllian said enticingly. “Oh, didn’t I tell you we have a new kindle of kittens?”

“Do you?” Tilda eagerly followed his crooked finger. “Can I see them?”
Tilda scampered off with Killian and Tara, drawing Siobhan’s laughter. “Don’t worry about your youngest, Bard. Killian and Tara have a thriving career as babysitters. They’re both really good at keeping their charges interested, so Tilda won’t be lost in the shuffle. And I expect that Killian and Derry will pull out their instruments for some singing. I hope your children like that.”

“They do. They know some Welsh songs that Killian and Derry might like to learn.” Bard looked at Thran. “Does Legs know any Russian songs?”

“Quite a few,” Thran nodded. “So I think they will have a good time together.”

“Wonderful,” Siobhan grinned. “Thanks for letting your children visit us. And both Ian and I loved your dances, Thran. It was sweet of you to dance with your children. You all looked like you had so much fun together.”

“I enjoyed it even more than the children,” Thran admitted. “I am glad that came through, and that you enjoyed it.”

“All right, we’ll see you later, then,” Ian waved.

“Bye, Da! Bye, Ada! Bye, Bard! Bye, Thran!” the children waved, and Bard pulled away from the curb.

“You can let down now,” Bard murmured, eyes on the road as he pointed the SUV towards home. “We’ll be home in fifteen minutes.”

The only sound from Thran was a long exhale. When Bard glanced over, his husband had draped his jacket over his chest, leaned his head back against the headrest, and closed his eyes. It was hard not to voice his concern, but Bard held his tongue, instead concentrating on the drive home. It wasn’t long before he turned into the lane, then into their driveway. He got out long enough to open the carriage house bay, then backed the SUV inside. He got out again to collect auction prizes and dance bags, and came around to tap on Thran’s door. His husband opened his eyes, smiling to see Bard so laden, and got out of the SUV.

“Give me some of the bags,” he beckoned as he shut the door of the SUV.

“I’ve got them, angel. If you can close the bay door, that’d be good.”

“I can close the door.” They came out of the carriage house, and Thran reached up to pull down the bay.

“Garage door openers,” Bard murmured. “So we don’t have to do it the old-fashioned way for too much longer.”

“It would be more convenient, but it is not that much of a hardship. Here, pass me your key, and I will open the mudroom door.”

Bard passed it over, and Thran soon had them inside. While Bard divested himself of dance bags, Thran keyed the security system to inside mode and hung his jacket on a peg. Bard put their auction prizes in the dining room, then ran upstairs fetch something from their closet. He ran back downstairs to find Thran still in the mudroom, unwrapping Sigrid’s tights from his wrist.

“Let me help you,” he urged, and Thran offered his wrist for Bard to unwrap the last bit. He tossed the tights onto the washer, and dumped the melting bag of ice in the sink. Thran’s arm was still mottled with angry red bruises, and his wrist was still visibly swollen.

“We need to immobilize that,” Bard said, not reacting to the ugly marks. “Bain sprained his wrist playing soccer a couple of years ago, so I brought down his arm brace. It’ll help.”

He eased the brace over Thran’s hand and around his forearm, sensitive to any flinch or twitch his touch might elicit from his husband. But Thran bore it without apparent discomfort, merely smiling in appreciation.

“Thank you, lyubov moya.”

“Come on. Let’s sit you down.”

Thran went without complaint with Bard into the sitting room, and sank onto one of the sofas. When Bard sat beside him, he rested his right hand on Thran’s thigh, offering mute comfort. Thran folded his left arm in his lap and slid down until he could rest his head on Bard’s shoulder. As he sighed, his body relaxed, molding against Bard’s side, so Bard put his arm around Thran’s shoulders to ease him close.

“Long day,” Bard said.

“Indeed. Do you know what is the hardest part of such a day?”

“Not the dancing?”

“Never the dancing. Always the performance. Not the performance on the stage, you understand.”

“Not the stage part? I don’t see...”

“I speak of the performance of everything but what I present on the stage. To present the public face is hard to sustain for so many hours. There is always someone to take a photograph, or to overhear a conversation, or to make much from nothing, so one must smile, be pleasant, be unruffled, be poised. The state drilled all of its performers on how to present the public face so that it is second nature, but it still takes so much energy.”

“Oh, I see. You’re saying that it’s hard to ‘be on’ for so long.”

“That is it.”

Bard rubbed Thran’s arm slowly. “You don’t have to be on now, so let it go.”

“I don’t, and I have. I know you wanted to ask me six times if I were all right, or what you could do, or what I wanted. But you trusted me to say if I needed something more than the quiet, which is exactly what I needed. Thank you for such a gift.”

Bard chuckled. “I’m learning. So I won’t ask you if you’re hungry. I’ll just say that I am, and I’m going to see what’s in the fridge, so if you’d like something, say the word, and I’ll scrounge for two.”

“Mmm,” Thran rumbled softly. “But we ate all of the leftovers at lunch. What is left?”

“The question of the hour. I’ll go see.”

“I will come with you.”

They peered into the fridge, and found little but cheese, eggs, and half a jar of spaghetti sauce.
“I can dig out some chicken breasts and make you some soup, just like Sigrid suggested.”

Thran sighed. “Do we have pasta in the pantry?”

“We always have pasta in the pantry, cariad.”

“That would taste very good right now, lyubov moya. With lots of cheese. Perhaps a salad to go with it?”

“Sounds perfect. I’ll put the water on.”

Bard filled a pot full of water and set it on to heat while Thran rummaged in the pantry. He came out with a box of flower-shaped pasta, drawing Bard’s chuckle.

“Do not laugh,” Thran said, handing Bard the box. This is the shape that cooks the fastest.”

“Good point. If you get the cutlery, I’ll chop the salad.”

With a nod, Thran saw to the table while Bard made their salads. He watched Thran surreptitiously as he worked, relieved that his husband moved thoughtfully, but without any physical distress beyond his left arm. He was learning how to tend his angel well, and it made sense that after so many hours of busy excitement, silence and calm were the only things Thran needed to restore himself. They sat down to supper in the same silence, content to enjoy their pasta together without the strain of unnecessary small talk.

“So good,” Thran sighed, sitting back in his chair when his pasta and salad were gone. He nibbled on a piece of the Pecorino-Romano cheese he loved so much. “I will likely fall asleep very quickly because I ate so much pasta, but it was very good.”

“Why don’t you get a shower while I clean up, angel? Or do you need help in the shower? I can get in with you and help you scrub.”

“You turn me into quite a self-indulgent man, lyubov moya. I would be grateful for help.”

There wasn’t much to clean, just the pasta pot and the silver flatware; the rest got rinsed and put in the dishwasher. Thran lingered in the kitchen while Bard tidied, maybe because he expected to fall asleep if he headed upstairs on his own. Once in their bedroom, he managed to get himself undressed, but he let Bard turn the water on for them. He didn’t take the arm brace off until the last moment, and then held his arm out of the way while Bard helped him wash. Bard did a credible job with Thran’s fancy shampoo and other potions, and Thran slipped out to dry off while Bard finished washing. Between the two of them, they got Thran dried off, his hair dry, and the brace back on his arm.

They were soon back downstairs in their sleepwear to await the children’s arrival home. Bard expected Thran to settle on the sitting room sofa right away, but instead, he detoured through the dining room to fetch the water lily lamp.

“It is a lamp for the night, yes?” he explained, holding it out to Bard. “I want to see how it looks in the solarium.”

Bard unwrapped the lamp carefully, and carried it into the solarium. Thran followed, pointing to the marble-topped table under the windows. “There. Can you see to plug it in?”

“I think so.” Bard crawled under the table to find the outlet. “Thread the cord down to me, from the back of the table.”
“Here it is,” Thran said, poking the cord down the gap between the edge of the marble and the window ledge.

“Got it. All right, it’s plugged in. It’s on a toggle switch...”

“Yes, I see it. Come out, and you can watch it come on.”

Bard clambered to his feet, and stood next to Thran, putting his arm around his husband’s waist. When Thran thumbed the switch, the yellow center of the lamp glowed.

“I like it,” Thran murmured. “When we have this room finished, with my Istanbul lamps hanging, and perhaps another one in among the plants, this will look beautiful at night.”

“It looks pretty good now,” Bard stroked Thran’s back. “Magical.”

Thran hummed agreement. They regarded it a while longer, then switched it off to go back to the sitting room. This time, it was Bard who detoured, heading to the kitchen to grab a bag of frozen peas and a kitchen towel.

“It’d be a good idea to ice your wrist again for about twenty minutes,” he said, holding out the bag of vegetables.

“What is this?” Thran said skeptically. “We do not eat frozen peas.”

“We don’t. I keep a bag around just for these occasions. It molds better to your arm than a bag of ice cubes, and it doesn’t make such a mess. So off with the brace, and on with the frozen peas for twenty minutes.”

“You fuss like a babushka.”

“Flattery will get you nowhere. Ice your wrist. Do you want some ibuprofen?”

“I think that would be wise, yes?”

“It’d reduce the swelling, yes.”

“Then I will take it.”

“Coming right up. And some tea.”

“You embarrass me with all this attention,” Thran said plaintively. “I am fine.”

Bard paused in his pursuit of painkillers only long enough to give his husband an assured look. “You will be, when I’m through with you. So you stop fussing about my fussing.”

He put the kettle on, fetched the pills, and soon presented them to his husband with a cup of water and a mug of hot tea. “Down the hatch with those beauties.”

Thran downed the pair of pills with a sip of water, then sat back with his tea. “So I ate my supper, washed, took the pills, iced with the peas, put on the brace, and now I have my tea. You are a most thorough doctor.”

“You still have to rest and keep your arm elevated. Good old RICE.”

“Rice? First peas, and now rice? Do you try to make a pilaf out of me?”
“RICE means Rest, Ice, Compression, and Elevation. It’s how to treat strains and sprains.”

“Ah. I liked the pilaf idea better. Much more imaginative.”

“Maybe so, but my RICE will spare you a trip to the doctor better than your pilaf will. We got ice on your arm fast enough that you shouldn’t need any follow up.”

“As I said, you are a most thorough doctor.”

“I’ll send you a bill.”

Thran tsked. “Even if you send me a very expensive one, I will not care. You have seen to me most completely, and I am very grateful. I hope such care means that I can still play in the garage tomorrow.”

“I wouldn’t expect to heave lumber around, if I were you.”

Thran tsked again, this time with more annoyance. “Suka blyad, this Lance Dunmont causes so much more trouble than he should! May the police run him to ground soon, though I do not expect them to.”

“That would be too easy,” Bard agreed, draping an arm around his husband’s shoulders. “At least we know what his issue is – it’s exactly what Finn said. He blames Sigrid for what he did.”

“He chose to appear at a public venue, so likely he does not know where we live.”

“He knows where the children go to school, though. Five days a week, he’ll know where to find them.”

“Perhaps he does; perhaps he does not. Perhaps all he knows is that I danced at the school for a festival. Even if he decides that our children attend the Imladris Academy and thinks to lurk nearby, on each of those five days the police will know where to look for him, while the children will be inside a secure place. I do not minimize our concern for our children, but he is on record for assault for the second time now. Though he has not been armed either time, the police still have reason to look for him, and to look out for our children.”

His husband was right. Bard’s worry wasn’t completely assuaged, but Thran had been through enough today, and agitating him about Lance would not help him rest, which he needed. Tomorrow would be a quiet and restful day, even if he had to sit on Thran to enforce it.

He grinned. Maybe after a good night’s sleep, Thran would feel good enough for Bard to tease him into staying a little longer in bed. Thran wasn’t the only one who could act like an animal in the morning.
Chapter 96

Chapter Summary

The saint continues to care for his angel, which incites the angel to do a little caretaking of his own.

Despite how tired Thran was, it was not that late when he and Bard sat down on the sofa to drink their tea. Only a little time passed before Bard got up to lay a fire in the fireplace, and soon the soft crackle of flames and the pleasant smell of wood smoke cast their comfortable ambience over the sitting room. Thran retrieved the small box they’d bid on at the auction, and unwrapped it so he and Bard could admire the painstaking inlay work. The box itself was a medium brown wood, a fitting background for the jade stems and leaves with nacre-petalled flowers nestled between them. Inside was finished with mossy green velvet, and would be a good place to store their rings when professional demands precluded them from wearing them.

Once they put the box aside, he was content to slump on the sofa beside Bard, prop his feet up on the fruit crate coffee table, and gaze into the flames. His husband slumped beside him, knees drawn up to support his sketchbook as he recreated several scenes from the Follies. He drew Killian and Legolas chortling over their bags of beef jerky, then Tilda and Legolas mooning over coconut cupcakes. Another revealed Theodred and one of his urban art students earnestly explaining their petition to a Follies patron. Another showed Thran in his full C-jump, braid flying around him, and Sigrid looking back at him with a siren’s smile and beckoning arms. There were Finn and Bain, faces grim and intent when they’d brought ice for Thran, though Bard had drawn only their faces, not their hands. He’d even drawn Lance, his face transfigured with fury and hatred as he’d snarled at Sigrid. The last drawing depicted Thran’s face at its coldest and most menacing; it had likely looked like that when he’d confronted Lance, but Bard had cast him as an exotic, stylized king, vaguely Asian, and crowned with a diadem of swirling vines.

“Do you ever draw yourself?” Thran asked, as Bard turned to a fresh page.

“How soon you forget your pillow book,” Bard gave him a wink.

Thran snickered. “Other than in illustrations for my pillow book, do you ever draw yourself?”

Bard glanced at him with a perverse smile. “I’ll give you two. Here’s what you imagine welding to be.”

As he watched, Bard drew a well-muscled, bare-chested figure in work pants and boots, welding mask in place, sweat glistening as the welding torch spewed sparks far and wide. Thran purred in appreciation, drawing Bard’s laughter.

“I thought so. Now, here’s what welding really is.”

The next figure was the same pose, but the welder was covered from head to toe in heavy, shapeless protective gear, and looked like some underground gnome in an infernal workshop. Thran tsked.

“They are both well done. But the first is much more fun to consider.”
“I’d burn myself to a crisp without the protective gear, angel. The first sketch is nothing you’ll see in real life.”

“If you make me a present of that one, I do not need to see it in real life.”

Bard carefully tore the page out of his sketchbook and handed it to Thran. “With my compliments.”

Thran’s expression was entirely too gleeful, but he didn’t care. He sat up to press a kiss to his husband’s cheek. “It will go in my book. In fact, I will take it upstairs now. The children will soon be home, and it is not one I wish to share with them. And I will take our box, too. I will be back in a moment.”

Thran took box and sketch upstairs. The former went on his dresser; the latter he slipped into his pillow book. It was a struggle not to linger over the sketches that filled the first pages, but he was very tired, and he still had a parent’s duty to perform, to stay awake and alert until the children arrived home. He shut the book quickly so as not to be tempted, and went downstairs to rejoin Bard. He found his husband with his mobile in one hand, the TV remote in the other. He looked up as Thran came into the room.

“Your mobile just chimed, too. It’s likely Legolas telling you to turn on the local eleven o’clock news. That’s what Sigrid just sent me.”

As Bard found the right station, Thran checked his mobile. Yes, it was from Legolas, and the message was exactly as Bard had surmised. He settled on the sofa beside Bard to regard the TV.

“...the eighth annual April Fool’s Follies held at the Imladris Academy today was marred by an unprovoked attack on premiere ballet dancer Thran Oropherson. Mr. Oropherson was the star attraction at the Follies talent show, appearing in a pair of dances...”

What a surreal thing it was to see Lance Dunmont snarl and gesture at an off-camera Sigrid, then himself appear in the school lobby, then Lance charge at him. As the scene played out, the announcer continued to speak.

“The assailant is alleged to have threatened someone in the crowd, then to have attacked Mr. Oropherson. Upon arrival of officers on the scene, the alleged assailant fled on foot with officers in pursuit. The alleged assailant has been identified to police as a male juvenile, whose name has been withheld pending contact of his next of kin. Fortunately, Mr. Oropherson was not badly injured, and spoke to reporters after the incident.”

There he was again with the children around him, countering the reporter who had spoken about youth involvement in crime.

“...this wonderful school, the Imladris Academy, as well as many others, nurture equally wonderful children. So do not tar all of the young with that brush of yours. Everywhere, there are many children who merit our respect and guidance, many more than there are those who stray, and those who stray need more help than vitriol...”

“That was great for you to say that,” Bard murmured, rubbing Thran’s thigh. “My children went to the same school that produced Lance. We lived in the same neighborhood. I was a poor single parent, probably like his mother is. It’s not like every child in that situation grows up to be a thug. Sigrid and Bain remember being here before we were there, but Tilda doesn’t. She didn’t know anything but being poor in the city, and she didn’t turn out like Lance.”

Thran winced; trust Bard to feel sympathy for Lance’s situation, if not his vitriol. “Lance did not have you for a parent. Likely he did not have even the few advantages that your children had, either. But that does not mean that I will let him harm any of our children with his vendetta.”

“No,” Bard said grimly. “Not at all.”

The scene switched to show Headmaster L’Eärendil, commenting how unfortunate it was that the scuffle had detracted from the otherwise great success of the Follies, and how pleased he was at the show of support for the students and parents of the academy. He reiterated Thran’s belief in supporting the young in their efforts, whether artistic or otherwise. It ended with a short clip of Thran’s dance with Sigrid showcasing his flashy C-jump, then another of Tilda poking him into a split.

The news went on to the next story, so Bard clicked off the TV. “The children will be a few minutes late getting home, but I say we give them a pass.”

Thran nodded. “They likely stayed to see the report, yes, so I give them the pass, too.”

Indeed, the mudroom door opened about ten minutes after eleven-thirty, revealing all four children plus Finn, who came into the sitting room with Sigrid.

“I’m sorry, Mr. Bowman, Mr. Oropherson. We’re late because we stayed to see the news,” he started to explain. “We were all on it, from the Follies today. My aunt saw it, and...”

“Sig and Legs texted us,” Bard agreed. “We watched it, too. But thanks for coming in to explain.”

“Oh, okay. I need to get back, so thanks for understanding. Night, all!”

“Bye, Finn,” the three younger children chorused.

“I’ll see Finn out,” Sigrid said, and led her friend out.

“Did you see it, Papa?” Legolas asked. “And is your arm better? Why is there a bag of frozen peas on it?”

“Yes, we saw, and the peas are Bard’s improvement on messy ice cubes to better cool my wrist. Did all of you have fun at Kíllian’s house?”

“They had three kittens!” Tilda exclaimed, but her animation was quickly swallowed in a big yawn. “Kíllian let me hold them. They were so cute!”

“It was fun,” Bain nodded. “We had pizza, and we sang a lot. Legs sang this cool Russian folk song – Kalinka? He sounded like you, Thran.”

“What’s it about?” Bard asked.

“It roughly translates to red berry, red berry, red berry of mine, in the garden is a raspberry, raspberry of mine! The singer goes on to sing how he wants to sleep under a pine tree. A very popular ditty with Russian flash mobs in grocery stores,” Thran grinned at Legolas. “I am glad to hear that you have not lost your accent when you speak Russian, synok.”

“Of course not, Papa,” Legolas grinned, as Tilda tried unsuccessfully to hide another cavernous yawn.
“It’s time for Clan Ffyrnig to get to sleep,” Bard said. “Upstairs with you.”

“It’s not midnight yet, and Sigrid’s still out,” Bain, naturally, protested.

“She won’t be out for long, so just you lead the way upstairs, boyo,” Bard pointed at the doorway to the hall. “Tilda’s head is about to split open, she’s yawning so hard. I’ll go get Sigrid.”

“Bet she’s snogging a certain hockey player,” Bain muttered to Legolas, who snickered.

“Bet you’re grounded if you aren’t upstairs in twenty seconds,” Bard shot back.

“And a certain Russian blonde with him if he is not also upstairs in twenty seconds,” Thran added, giving Legolas a stare. As the boys took off, he gave Bard a grin. “I will leave Sigrid to you. Kukla, let us go upstairs and find Mr. Bun.”

Tilda was so tired that she took Thran’s hand without a peep.

Bard would likely not have so easy a time getting Sigrid upstairs. Imagining that gave Thran a reason to smile as he and Tilda climbed the stairs.

* * *

Bard made the rounds of the house before he went to check on Sigrid and Finn. Yes, everything was secure, so he had no excuse not to head to the mudroom –

What if Lance had sorted out where they were, and had been lurking outside when Sigrid went outside with Finn?

That brought him to the mudroom door in seconds.

He edged open the door cautiously, but it wasn’t Lance he interrupted. Just Finn and Sigrid, not embracing, but just at that second when the boy brushed a peck of a kiss on Sigrid’s cheek.

“You’re so brave, Sig. Don’t let that bastard hurt you. Just like you told me – stay out of his way. Please.”

“I’m doing my best, Finn. It’s not like I told him I was going to be at the Follies. He must’ve heard all the publicity about Thran, and decided to show up on the chance that I’d be there.”

“Probably so. Still...”

“I’m worried about my Da’s art show. There’s stuff on the TV and on the Internet, and every shop window in the village has a flyer with my Da’s name on it. If Lance stays loose long enough, he might try to interrupt that, too.”

“What if you don’t go to that?”

Sigrid snorted with typical teenaged distain. “And miss my Da’s show? Hell, no! I’m going to be there when he finally gets a clue about how good his stuff is. Not just his sketches, but his sculpture, too. You should see the angel he’s working on – it’s already amazing, and it’s not even finished. I want to see that moment when the rest of the planet realizes how amazing it is, too.”
“Okay, okay. But I’ll be there, too. So will Killian and Tara. If Lance shows up, we won’t make it easy for him.”

“That’s sweet of you, Finn. It really is. Have your parents said any more about letting you come out to your aunt’s for next year?”

“My aunt and uncle are okay with it. And my mom is. My Dad… he’s old school. Not so big on arts and stuff. Wants me to go to trade school after high school, be an electrician like him. A good, solid job, you know? I wouldn’t mind that, but… maybe I could go to college and be an engineer? Eh, you’ve heard this a million times already. I need to finish high school well, and I’d need financial aid no matter what school I apply to… you know the drill.”

“I know it. I’m there with you about the financial aid, too – Da’s got three of us to put through school, so I want to leave some for Bain and Tilda. We’ll keep looking, both of us. We’ll figure it out. So keep working on your Da.”

“I won’t just work on my Dad. Don’t be mad, but I went up to that headmaster of your school today.”

“What’d you tell him?”

“I told him I hoped to attend his school next year. I couldn’t pay much, but I was willing to work at anything, as long as it took, to make up the difference. Janitor, grounds maintenance, office help, anything.”

“Gods, Finn! You didn’t!”

The boy nodded. “Yes, I did. It was no lie, either. I’m not proud. I can be a janitor if that’s what it takes.”

“What’d Headmaster L’Eärendil say?”

“He said that if I was willing to work that hard, and my grades were what I said they were, then he was willing to find the means. So I just need to convince my Dad.”

“Oh, Finn.” Sigrid took Finn’s shoulders firmly in her hands, and gave him an equally firm kiss on the cheek. “It’d be great if you can work it all out. Really great.”

“You think so?” Finn’s grin was awkward. “Wow. That’s, um… that’s great, too. Really great.”

“So you better go home, Mr. Really Great. Before your aunt and uncle ground you before you ever get out here.”

“You’re right. I’ll see you tomorrow, maybe?”

“Hope so. I’ll call you.”

“Okay. Night, Sig. I’m glad you’re okay.”

“You, too. Night.”

Finn leaned forward quickly to brush another peck on Sigrid’s cheek, then got into his car and drove away. Once Sigrid headed back to the house, Bard left the door ajar and leaned against the washer to wait for her to come inside.

The smile on Sigrid’s face was considering, but she met Bard’s eyes straightly. “So how much did “You hear?”

“Most of it,” he nodded.

“Are you upset?”

Bard shook his head. “He’s a decent lad, and you’ve got a level head on your shoulders.”

Sigrid snorted.

“I’m all for Finn trying to help his situation, too. But I hope he’s doing it mostly for himself, and not just because he likes you. I understand why he’s partial to you – I kinda am, too.” Sigrid snorted again, but she was smiling. “But the radical change he’s trying to make will be easier if it’s best for him, not just you.”

Sigrid leaned against the dryer, crossed her arms, and smiled. “You’re living proof of that, Da. You lived like a troll for Bain and Tilda and me for ten years and never said a word about how much of a soul killer it was. I’m glad we’re someplace that’s better for all of us, not just expedient. Speaking of the angel who helped to make that possible, how is Ada?”

“Tired, but okay. He’s not quite the hothouse flower you think he is.”

“He’s not a hothouse flower. He’s an artist and an athlete like no one else. His arm’s a wreck, though.”

“That pale skin bruises easily. I put Bain’s arm brace on him. He’ll be fine. So will you, after a good night’s sleep. So upstairs with you.”

“Is it okay if I shower? All that cold cream is sticky, and I’d rather wash it off now and sleep clean.”

“I don’t blame you. But we’re still washing all the sheets tomorrow, just so you know.”

“Ew, Da. Of course we are.” Sigrid rolled her eyes as she pushed away from the dryer. “And most everything in everyone’s closet, too. I’m down to a pair of ratty sleep pants and a torn tee shirt.”

“We’ll set to first thing. Or whenever you and the rest of the clan rouse. So you’re for the shower, and I’m for bed.”

“Did you hear what I said about your show?” Sigrid said, her gaze as penetrating as ever.

Bard nodded mildly. “I thought about Lance showing up there, too. We’ll keep an eye out.”

“Did you hear the rest?”

Bard smiled. “Don’t I always?”

Another snort. “You’re so clueless, Da.”

“Frequently.”

“Your stuff is good, Da. Rahmiel’s incredible. Everyone’s going to know it when you have your show. And I’m all for that. You’re every bit as good at your stuff as Ada is at his.”

Bard looped an arm around Sigrid’s shoulders. “I appreciate the kind words, sweetness. It’ll be good if I have a way to contribute to the clan again.”
Another snort. “You’re clueless about that, too, Da. I’ll tell Ada to explain the facts to you about that, if he hasn’t already. I’m just a teenager, and right now, I desperately need a shower.”

Chuckling, Bard gave his daughter a nudge towards the kitchen. “Off with you, then. I’m for bed.”

They went upstairs together, and he pressed a kiss on the top of her head before she went into her room.

“Night, sweetness.”

“Night, Da. Love you.”

“Love you, too.”

He stuck a head in the other children’s rooms, wished Legolas and Bain a good night, and offered the sleeping Tilda a kiss on the cheek after he tucked the blanket around her and Mr. Bun. Then he retreated to his bedroom, where Thran already drowsed in bed.

“Did they kiss?” his husband murmured sleepily when Bard crawled into bed beside him.

“Sort of. More a peck than anything else.”

“And how is Da about that?”

“I’m okay.” He summarized all he’d heard from Sigrid and Finn. “I think they’re okay, too.”

“I thought about your art show, too,” Thran murmured drowsily. “Oh – did you set the security system?”

Bard grimaced. “I didn’t. I’ll go back down and do it.”

“No need.” Thran rolled towards his nightside table and reached for his mobile. He woke up enough to call up the security system on the device, tapped several times, then held out the device to Bard. “Check me. It is set to nighttime mode, yes?”

“It is. All secure.”

Thran put his mobile back on the nightside table, then snuggled back into Bard. “We need to upgrade your mobile so you can set the system, too.”

“I’ll add it to the list. I swear the list grows faster than we can clear it out.”

“It will not always be so,” Thran murmured, unconcerned. “Do not worry.”

“How’s your arm?”

“It aches a little, but not as much as before. The brace helps. I hope I do not thump you with it during the night.”

“You’ll be fine.”

Thran sighed deeply. “I am already fine. I am here in bed with you, all is quiet, and all is well. I am quite ready to sleep.”

“Me, too. See you in the morning, angel.”
“My saint.”

Thran’s breath quickly deepened into sleep. Before too many heartbeats passed, Bard followed him.

* * *

Thran drifted slowly awake, but the lure of warmth, total ease, and rare laziness pulled him right back into slumber. He dreamed briefly of a king who named him seer, who banished all fear and pain with gentle touches of fingers and lips, who overwhelmed him with rising desire, and then held him close with complete, unconditional love. Perhaps he dreamed of war and bloodshed, of strife within a kingdom and without, but his king stood firm, and he stood just as firmly beside him. Then the images faded for the last time, and he roused again.

“Shh,” a soft voice urged him. “Everything’s fine.”

Thran smiled at that sleepy voice. “Everything is fine but my bladder. I must get up.”

“Come back to bed after,” the sleepy voice beckoned. “Please.”

“I will.” Thran got up, took care of necessities, had a swallow of water, and snuggled back into bed. Bard got up to tend to the same needs, then eased back against Thran’s back. A hand slid over his skin, tracing light circles over it until Thran’s eyes closed. The rush of endorphins lulled him into a trance until he was neither asleep nor awake, but completely relaxed. Everything blurred into mindless appreciation of warmth and softness for untold minutes. Even when he roused, he lay there without moving, soaking up his husband’s caresses, until guilt made him speak.

“You are too generous, lyubov moy. Let me reward you for so much attention.”

“My attention isn’t generous. It’s part of a nefarious plan.”

Thran grinned. “Is it? What is this nefarious plan?”

“A conspiracy to keep you in bed to rest. The R in RICE.”

“Ah, you and your RICE. But this cannot be a conspiracy, because there is only one of you. A conspiracy must be between two or more, yes?”

“This one is between me and your body; your brain just doesn’t know it. We conspire to make you feel so relaxed that you won’t want to get up. It’s already worked for the past hour.”

Thran’s eyes opened in surprise. “What time is it?”

“It doesn’t matter. Just relax and soak up what feels good. Be the hedonist you claim to be.”

“But, my saint –”

“Shh, or I’ll pull out the big guns.”

That sounded provocative, so Thran turned onto his back. “But –”

“Shh.” Warm brown eyes met his as Bard carefully moved Thran’s left arm in its brace out of the way so that he could lay his head on Thran’s shoulder. Bard’s left hand traced over Thran’s chest, stroking his ribs, up his sternum, and up his throat. As he ran fingers along Thran’s collarbone, Thran’s breath caught, and he let out a silent moan. “That’s right. Just shut your eyes and let everything go. Try to see just how relaxed you can get. Try not to move at all.”

Any protest Thran might have made dribbled away as Bard’s caresses sent more endorphins flooding through him. Gods, when was the last time he’d been so cosseted in the morning? If he ever had been, it was likely Bard’s doing, but he couldn’t be sure – it was too hard to think under such a barrage. He half fell into his trance again, not quite completely out, but his thoughts blurred as his skin tingled under Bard’s fingers. Lips brushed kisses on his temple, his ear, his hair, then his shoulder, collarbone, and neck. He barely registered the warm body beside him shifting under the covers, moving over him to kiss and stroke his nipples, and one thigh pressed between his legs to rub against his cock. His ease vanished when light bites nipped down his flanks and groins; he tensed as a warm mouth engulfed his cock to suck gently. He lay under the covers, so warm and cocooned, but as that mouth licked and nibbled and kissed, the warmth grew suddenly too hot, and he pushed down the covers to reveal Bard’s dark hair masking all that happened below. Still, as fingers tempted, as lips and tongue teased, Thran bit his lips and tried to relax. That was impossible, and grew more impossible the longer he tried to resist it. He didn’t consciously intend to brush his fingers across his nipples, but once he did, there was no chance of him stopping. He held off his arousal as long as he could, but his body could bear only a few seconds of so much stimulation. Bard sensed it, and wound arms around Thran’s hips just as Thran spasmed in release. He clawed the sheets as his orgasm took him, breath stuttering out in a soft, deep moan.

His spent cock slipped free of its warm, slippery cocoon, and Bard slid up to lay his head on Thran’s shoulder. A hand massaged his abdomen in slow circles just above his pubic bone, drawing the last twinges of release from him in delicious waves.

“Gods,” Thran whispered. “Gods, you are such a gift.”

A soft chuckle. “A little spice for the RICE.”

Thran’s chuckle matched Bard’s. “You are a most delicious cook. And I am most relaxed.”

“Good. Go back to sleep. Make the most of it.”

Thran didn’t want to. He wanted to indulge Bard as thoroughly as his husband had indulged him, but the warmth, the gentle strokes, the strong body lying next to him urging him to ease all conspired against him, and he did blur out. Again he drifted, letting everything go without care or concern.

When he roused again, he was thoroughly relaxed – and thoroughly determined to stay awake. He shifted against Bard, but his husband refused to let him roll over.

“Let me go,” he urged, pushing at Bard’s arm across his chest.

“Uh-uh,” Bard mumbled. His eyes were closed and he refused to let Thran budge the arm across his chest. In fact, he rolled Thran over on his side and wrapped arms around him from behind, snuggling him close with a sigh. “Mine.”

Thran tsked in exasperation. “Sukin syn, there is an octopus in my bed.”

Bard’s reply to that was to slide a leg over Thran’s and snuggle him closer. “Still mine.”

“Of course I am. So please, let me up.”

“Say the magic word.”
“Ty grebanyy huiesos .”

Bard snickered. “I am a fucking cocksucker, yes. But that’s not the magic word.”

“Let me up, or I will make you change the sheets.”

“Today’s laundry day anyway.”

“And the mattress pad.”

Bard’s arms and leg slid away as he rolled over. “If you insist.”

Bard sighed, enjoying a stretch as Thran got up and headed to the bathroom again. He washed his face, smiling because there was nothing to wash lower down; Bard had seen to that. He combed his hair, then returned to find Bard sitting on the edge of the bed, stretching arms wide. Rib cage flared, arms flexed, head fell back... such an enticing sight was the saint who had treated him so well this morning. He was tempted to fall to his knees before him, and return the pleasure of Bard’s lips with that of his own, but something more compelling beckoned. He would let a little time pass to lull his husband into thinking he was safe from ambush, and then spring his trap. He leaned down to offer Bard a kiss, then padded to the closet for leggings and Henley.

“I am well ready for breakfast,” Thran observed. “What would you like?”

“The children will sleep for a couple more hours so we can have anything we want,” Bard said, ducking into the bathroom. When he came out, he rummaged through his dresser drawers, but didn’t come up with much. He scratched his beard in chagrin. “Sigrid wasn’t joking last night when she said everyone was down to rags to wear. I’m past that. I’ve got my night clothes, and that’s it.”

Thran pulled open a drawer, and held out a pair of sweats. “These are old, but they are clean, and I think they should be loose enough.”

“Thanks.”

As Bard pulled them on, Thran hoped they wouldn’t be all that loose. He’d enjoy the chance to admire the shape of Bard’s backside until clean clothes came out of the dryer. Ah, yes, they clung very nicely to Bard’s curves, very nicely indeed. His enjoyment must have shown on his face, because Bard took one look at him, then at his reflection in Thran’s dresser mirror. He snorted.

“Gods, Thran. We’ve got four children in the house.”

“They will be asleep for hours yet. We have time to have breakfast in comfort, then we will put on our jeans and boots and see what to do in the garage.”

With another snort, Bard ducked back into the closet and came out with one of Thran’s long sweaters over his old tee. Thran grinned, but didn’t speak.

“How’s your wrist?”

“It feels sore, but not nearly so painful as last night. The brace kept it supported and protected all night. I will wear it all today, too.”

“I want to put some arnica on all those bruises to help them fade. You know Irmo’s going to have a stroke when he sees them tomorrow.”

“Likely. I will not lift Charisse for a few days, to be sure. But the rest of me is still fit.”
Bard disappeared into the bathroom and came out with the tube of arnica, so Thran gingerly pulled the Velcro tabs free and eased off the brace. The previously livid red bruises were now purple and black, if possible looking worse than the red. Bard was impassive as he dabbed the arnica all over Thran’s arm. “Rub that in. I’ll leave the tube out to remind us to put more on later.”

“I will take it downstairs with me,” Thran agreed, rubbing gingerly. He bent his wrist carefully to gauge how sore it was. “Not so bad. I think it is mostly bruised rather than badly wrenched. Certainly better than how it felt yesterday.”

“That’s good,” Bard nodded as Thran eased the arm brace back on his wrist. “So, on to breakfast. What sounds good? I think I’ll mix up some waffle batter for the children so when they get up they can just pour it into the iron for a hot breakfast. I can make us some, or I can do eggs if you want more protein rather than carbs.”

“Such a hard decision you give me,” Thran observed as they went downstairs. “The temptation of waffles... the delight of eggs and cheese and vegetables...”

“I can make you a waffle for breakfast, and an omelet for lunch if you’d rather.”

“That sounds perfect. Maybe I will have a hard boiled egg with my waffle for the protein.”

“Make one for me, too.”

They set to in the kitchen, Thran putting on the eggs to boil while his husband mixed up his waffle batter. How simple was it for Bard to do that – the batter was ready before the waffle iron was hot enough to bake. Cooking so many things wasn’t as hard as it seemed, once Bard revealed his secrets. Of course, Bard added things to his batter that made it special – today it was cinnamon and nutmeg, wheat germ, vanilla, and a little flax seed. He set out honey, butter, and various jams on the counter to go with Bard’s efforts.

“Where are you going with the flatware?” Bard looked up from the waffle iron when Thran carried utensils into the dining room.

“The day is bright and sunny, and the dining room looks beautiful in the morning light. I want to eat there this morning.”

Bard’s eyes brightened. “That’d be nice. We haven’t had a chance to organize a meal there yet. The table’s too small, and most of the chairs are in the kitchen.”

“There is room for two. Would you like tea or juice?”

“A little orange juice would be great. But I still want my cuppa, too.”

Thran poured them both small glasses of juice, and got the teapot ready. He had the cups and pot on the dining room table, and put the boiled eggs in a bowl just as the waffle iron was done. Bard plated the waffles, and they were ready to add toppings.

“Do you want another waffle after that one? If so, I’ll leave the iron on.”

“Two with the eggs is enough for me.”

“Me, too.” Bard slathered his waffles with butter and orange marmalade, grabbed the bowl of eggs, and headed into the dining room. He paused to look around the room as Thran followed him. “You’re right. The light in here is nice, even if the room’s virtually empty.”
“It will not be for long.” Thran put his plate on the table and sat down. “Whenever you decide that you have done all you want to do inside, the paint and the plaster and the floors, we will enjoy ourselves with a search to find things we like to fill it. Hal has several friends who are designers of curtains and rugs and such things, and we can ask him to recommend one to help us if we want. That reminds me – I must call Hal and see if he is through our taxes. I want to sign them and send them off – a necessary chore that I am always glad to dispense with.”

“The deadline’s getting close,” Bard nodded, taking a big bite of waffle. “I’d just as soon get that bit of nasty necessity done, too. Waffles okay?”

“More than okay, my saint. Delicious.”

“Good. So you want to hire a designer?”

“Perhaps for draperies. I look forward to prowling the junk shops and antique stores for the things we want. Perhaps a bigger table in here, yes?”

“Agreed. This one’s not much, just something that was cheap and fit into the apartment. Not that we have to eat in here every meal, but Sunday dinners are something I’d like to do, and they’d be good in here. We can use our nice stuff.”

“All of our stuff is nice stuff,” Thran grinned, “but I understand what you mean. I do not want to hire someone to turn our house into some showplace fit only for a magazine spread. I want us to choose everything that goes in it, only things we like. But I admit that I do not know how to choose draperies. So someone to help with that, perhaps.”

“A good idea,” Bard agreed. “Right now, there’s not a curtain in the place, and most of the rooms are still empty other than the bedrooms and the sitting room. We’ll have quite a hunt.”

“I look forward to it,” Thran smiled. “The day we bought the desks for the children? I enjoyed that.”

“It was fun. I liked pottering around the day I got our flatware and the dishes and the fainting couch, too.”

“And our bed,” Thran added. “I am most intrigued to see that come together.”

“As soon as I get the rooms into shape, I’ll work on that. It’ll be nice to see the main room turn into something other than a junk room. We’ll have to clean it out sooner or later, especially if you get that sofa you like.”

“I asked for fabric swatches. And we need to measure whether it is big enough for our room.”

“I hope so. It fits you.”

“It will be the perfect place to ravish you when we christen that room.”

Bard grinned. “I hope there will be firelight, a little wine, and a very amorous angel involved.”

“I will make sure of that. But for now, we will enjoy this beautiful morning light and our waffles. And perhaps a bit more.”

Thran got up, angled Bard’s chair away from the table so that he could kneel in front of his husband. Before Bard could react, he had insinuated himself between Bard’s knees and put a hand on his crotch.
“Gods, Thran, I thought I took care of you this morning,” Bard protested weakly, hands gripping the arms of the chair. Thran grasped the two sides of the chair back to keep Bard in his seat.

“You did. Now I will take care of you.”

“The children –”

“Are asleep. Now do as you bid me – relax, and let me see to you.”

Thran didn’t wait to hear Bard’s reply before he’d pulled the front of his old sweats down to reveal Bard’s cock in its tangle of dark curls. He engulfed it in his mouth, humming and smothering a grin at Bard’s stutter of a curse.

“You bastard – gods, you bastard!”

Thran didn’t waste time on words, just attended to his husband well enough that in seconds his cock was hard and his curses took on a reverent tone. When Bard’s cock grew too large for Thran to take all of it in his mouth, he wrapped a hand around its thick base and stroked until Bard moaned.

A thump sounded upstairs. Someone was up.

“Thran – the children!”

Thran grinned. “We have time to finish. Concentrate.”

He intensified his attentions, until even Bard’s parental instincts were overwhelmed. As another thump sounded, Thran sped up, hardly able to keep himself from laughing at Bard’s battle between lust and parental devotion.

“You bloody cocksucker, you’re going to get us in so much trouble!” Bard panted, as yet more thumps echoed.

Thran’s reply was to fondle Bard’s balls. When he squeezed gently, Bard erupted in climax, even as the first steps clattered on the hall steps. Thran delayed just long enough to make sure he took every drop of Bard’s essence, then eased back into his chair. It was all he could do not to laugh as Bard scrambled to pull up his sweats as Bain and Legolas tumbled into the kitchen.

“You fucker!” Bard hissed, his face red as he wrenched his chair back into place. “You bloody fucker!”

“Da! Papa?”

“We are in the dining room,” Thran called in a calm voice, still grinning at Bard. “We enjoy the morning sun and our breakfast.”

“Good morning, Papa,” Legolas came into the room. “Oh, you’re eating something other than hard boiled eggs?”

“It was quite enjoyable to eat something different for breakfast this morning,” Thran said without turning a hair, though Bard was all but choking. “Bard made waffle batter, so all you have to do is turn on the waffle iron and bake one for yourself.”

“Oh, that’s brilliant,” Bain said, coming in after Legolas. “I love waffles – are you all right, Da?”

“I’m fine,” Bard managed to spit out, though he sounded strangled.
“Your Da choked on a bit of his breakfast, that is all,” Thran explained, which sent Bard into a coughing fit. After Bain came to thump his father’s back, Bard calmed enough to shoot a glare at Thran.

“Thanks, Bain. I’m fine now.”

“Okay, Da. You’re sure?”

“I’m sure. The waffle iron’s still warm, so it won’t take long to heat.”

“Cool. Come on, Legs – waffles!”

The boys scampered back to the kitchen. As Bain explained how to tell when the iron was hot and the waffles were done, Bard shot a final glare at Thran.

“You are one bloody son of a bitch, you cocksucker,” he whispered.

Thran’s shrug was just as unrepentant as his grin. “I got you off, yes? And we christened this room in decadent fashion.”

Bard’s glare crumbled into embarrassment. “All right, you did, and we did. But gods, Thran!”

Thran speared a bite of his waffle. “I regret nothing. You made a most delicious breakfast, lyubov moya.”

Defeated, Bard swallowed, then took his last bite of waffle. When Thran glanced at him, his husband was smiling. Reluctantly, sheepishly, but a smile was a smile.

Thran enjoyed the last of his waffle with smug satisfaction.
Chapter 97

Chapter Summary

The angel, saint, and cherubs dig into a mountain of domestic chores. When one of the cherubs feels put upon, the angel indulges in his passion for investigating a crime scene. Later, however, does he skirt the other side of the law with a call to a certain elusive personage?

Chapter Notes

Hal appears courtesy of johnnysmitten. Thank you, my dear!

It took effort, but somehow Bard managed to finish his breakfast with some semblance of calm – not easy, given that his decadent husband had just ambushed him and laid a blow job on him that had overwhelmed all resistance. No matter that children had thundered down the stairs, about to burst into the dining room – Thran had finished him off without mercy, then had smugly sat back and shot one double entendre after another at him while their sons had stood by oblivious. Thran was the devil incarnate with no semblance of shame, decorum, mercy...

What did that make Bard, then? He should be ashamed of himself for loving his husband’s decadence… but he wasn’t. Was Not. Not one bit. Thank the gods Thran had gotten him off before the children had learned just how depraved their fathers were.

Besides, it was cute to see Thran smile so smugly over his tea, too.

Bard shook his head, and blessed ancient radiators that had seen fit to break down in the middle of a snowstorm.

Sigrid appeared while the boys were in the middle of baking their third batch of waffles. Bard left them to negotiate whether Sigrid would eat two of theirs and bake another batch for them, and headed upstairs to check on Tilda. It was past nine, but the little girl was still asleep when Bard eased open the door. As he backed out, however, her eyes opened.

“Morning, little doll,” Bard greeted, coming to her side. “You slept a long time this morning.”

“What time is it?” she asked sleepily, stretching. When Bard told her, her eyes opened a bit wider. “Did I miss breakfast?”

“Course not. Waffles, or porridge if you don’t want waffles. I know they’re not your favorite.”

“Da!” Tilda scolded, sitting up. “They are, too, my favorite! Are there any left?”

“Plenty. By the time you wash your face and come downstairs, I’ll have a nice hot one for you.”

“Mmm,” she smiled. “I think I have to wear my nightclothes downstairs, though. I don’t have any clean clothes.”
“None of us do. You’ve got all your dirty ones in the hamper? I’ll start a load while your waffle bakes. Bring your sheets down with you, okay?”

“Okay, Da.”

Bard got the hamper from the children’s bathroom and carted it downstairs to dump the contents in the mudroom. The boys were between batches of waffles, so Bard put more on to bake for Tilda while Thran headed upstairs to get their basket of laundry and their sheets.

“Mega wash marathon today, children,” Bard called from the mudroom as he sorted the pile of clothes. "Go get everything you didn’t put in the hamper and your sheets, so it all gets in the queue.”

“Yes, Da; yes, Bard,” came the children’s replies as they headed upstairs. In a few minutes, enough clothing was piled on the floor to stock a store.

“We let things run a bit too long this time,” Bard exhaled, contemplating the heaps.

Thran hummed agreement. “What is it you say so often? Sooner started is sooner ended? Though this will not be sooner ended. So many piles!”

“Now you see why I got us the extra capacity washer and dryer,” Bard quipped. “All right, tees and jeans first, so everyone has something to wear before too long.”

“Will we finally get to the carriage house today? If so, then I will wear jeans and a shirt that are already filthy. There is no reason to wear clean ones only to get them dirty again.”

“I think we can get in there. Let’s set the cleaning duties first.”

Bard threw the first load of clothes into the washer, then they gathered the children around the kitchen table to settle who’d do what to bring the house back to order. Each would be responsible for his or her room – tidying, dusting, and sweeping. The boys would take care of the sitting room and half bath, given that they played video games there so often. Tilda would take the dining room, central hall, steps, and landing outside the bedrooms, and Sigrid would do the children’s bathroom. Thran would see to the ballroom, and Bard would take the kitchen. All of the children scattered except Tilda, who was still enjoying her waffles. Thran headed for the ballroom, and Bard worked on the kitchen so that he could keep Tilda company while she ate. There wasn’t much for Bard to do other than the floor, given that he was meticulous about keeping the room he spent so much time in clean. A few swipes along the counter behind the tea caddy, a few spills dripped down the cabinet doors, a scrub of the stove hood, and most of his work was done. The kitchen table was in a state, though – tons of crumbs, several spatters of one thing or another, and scattered condiment bottles left from previous meals. He put everything away, wiped up the crumbs, and then got a broom from the mudroom to sweep the floor clean. Tilda skirted his broom as she put her dishes in the dishwasher, and washed her knife and fork. She helped Bard with the floor under the table by moving all the chairs out of the way for him to sweep, then set them all back into place.

“Would you help me, Da?” she asked with a hopeful look as he mixed up a marinade for the pork chops they’d have for supper. “I can’t reach all the cobwebs in the hallway.”

“Cobwebs already? I just painted.” He gave a sigh. “Sure, I’ll do the cobwebs for you, little doll, then you can sweep. I’ll get started while you brush your teeth.”

Tilda was right about the cobwebs – a few spiders had decided that Bard’s renovations made the hall ceiling a perfect place to spin new webs. He escorted as many as he could outside, then cleaned off the webs from the hallway and dining room ceilings. He did the main room, too, just on general purposes, and tidied the remaining boxes, bundles, and bits of bed frame against the wall. Thran stuck his head in from the ballroom to see what the stir was about.

“The ballroom is ready for tomorrow,” Thran announced, mop in hand.

“Do you remember the measurements for that sofa? We could lay it out on the floor, if you do.”

“I do not, but I can get them easily enough,” Thran called, ducking back into the ballroom to put his mop back. He trotted through to check his laptop; Bard headed for the mudroom to get a tape measure. Thran soon rejoined him with a slip of paper in hand. “I think it is very large, which is good for such a large room.”

Bard looked at the paper. “Okay, you take the tape measure and go that way, and I’ll tell you when to stop.”

When the tape measure had spooled out far enough, Bard held up his hand. He found the halfway mark, and matched that with the center of the fireplace. “Okay, that’s the center.”

“We should mark the ends,” Thran pulled at his lip. “Something small? Cans from the pantry?”

“Good idea,” Bard agreed. “I’ll get some.”

Cans in hand, they marked the ends, then the width.

“It looks like it’ll be the right size to me,” Bard said, eyeballing the cans. “You?”

Thran nodded. “I do. I will look to see if there is a place that sells it nearby so that we can look at it. If it is not suitable for me to ravish my husband on it, then I do not want it.”

“You’re in a mood today.”

“See what happens when you keep me in bed so long? I am rejuvenated.”

“Note to self – no more vitamins for Thran, and no more keeping him too long in bed.”

Thran made a sad face. “It will be your loss as well as mine, lyubov moya.”

“You’re right. Forget I said anything about your vitamins and how long you stay in bed.”

“Wise decision. Now, I am through the ballroom, and I hope you are through the kitchen, so can we finally see to the carriage house?”

“As long as we check on the cleaning crew, and put in another load of laundry on the way out.”

“Excellent!” Thran was gleeful –

“Da!” Tilda’s voice was full of outrage. “Da, Bain swept all of the dirt off his floor and into the landing upstairs after I’d already swept it!”

“I did not! You didn’t sweep it the first time!”

“I did, too, Bain! I already swept this whole part!”

“How could you have swept the landing? I’ve got the broom!”

“I used the brush from the dustpan! You just don’t want to clean up your dirt! Da!”
“Time out, both of you!” Bard took the steps two at a time. “One at a time – Bain, what’s your side?”

“Tilda says that I swept all the dirt out of my room out onto the landing. She just doesn’t want to sweep the landing, that’s all.”

“Tilda?”

“I swept the landing already, Da! Look!” She waved the brush in her hand and pointed to the dustpan full of detritus. “Then Bain swept all of the stuff off his floor out onto the landing, because he doesn’t want to use the dustpan!”

“Okay, both of you assume you know why the other one’s done something. You don’t know whether Til wants to sweep the landing or not, Bain. And Til, you don’t know whether Bain wants to use the dustpan or not. So strike both of those. That leaves us with Til saying she swept the landing, and Bain saying she didn’t, and Til saying that Bain swept all the stuff off his floor and onto the landing, and Bain saying he didn’t.”

“Ah!” Thran spoke up. “We can pretend this is a crime scene, yes? To determine just the facts. So first we must establish whether Tilda swept the landing or not. So I will look.”

Bard watched in amusement as Thran made much of looking around the landing. Bard watched the children – Tilda looked confident, and Bain didn’t.

“I see no detritus except in the dustpan and by Bain’s door, so clearly someone has swept at least part of the floor. Since Tilda has the brush, we know she has swept at least part of it. That brings us to the second task, to establish whether Bain swept his floor. So...”

He swept into Bain’s room, examined the floor, and came out. “There is no detritus on Bain’s floor. He has the broom in his hands, so clearly he swept his floor. But the detritus outside his door is in the characteristic scatter pattern that indicates it has been swept from Bain’s room out, so I can only conclude that Bain has swept the detritus from his floor onto the landing. Since I see no dust balls on the landing other than those in the dustbin, then Tilda must have swept the landing before Bain swept his detritus out. The conclusion is inescapable.”

The sound of a dust mop behind Bard brought everyone’s attention around to Legolas’s door, where dust scattered out from the door and onto the landing.

“See?” Tilda pointed in exasperation. “Legs is doing it, too!”

The boy noticed everyone looking at him – he had his earbuds in and hadn’t heard the exchange. He paused in his mopping, and pulled out one earbud. “What’s everyone looking at?”

“You and the detritus you put onto the landing,” Thran folded his arms across his chest. “Tilda has already swept it.”

“The evidence is clear here, too,” Bard took up the thread. “I find Bain and Legolas guilty of scattering detritus without regard to previous sweeping. I sentence both of you to clean the landing – which does not include sweeping the mess down the stairs. Court dismissed.”

Sigrid stood in her doorway, laughing as she applauded. “You two are hysterical. You ought to go into standup, I swear.”

“We’re appearing shortly in the carriage house. We’ll practice our routine in front of all that lumber that needs to be moved.”
“Can I help?” Legolas asked shyly. “I can help Papa because his arm is still sore.”

“Yeah, I can help, too,” Bain said. “I can show Legs how to climb up in the rafters of the barn. That’s where you’re going to put the lumber, right, Da? We can build a fort up there.”

“Up in the rafters?” Legolas said. “How?”

“All the lumber makes a floor, then we can –”

“Aren’t you both forgetting something?” Bard interrupted. “Clean your rooms, then the sitting room? Get that done before you get too excited about the barn and a lot of lumber.”

“Da!” Bain protested. “Helping you with the lumber’s helping, right? We can do the sitting room later!”

“Consider the sitting room and half bath to be the price of admission to the lumber amusement park,” Thran said. “What is it you call it, Bard, the rushed chores? No slapdash.”

“Exactly,” Bard nodded. “So chop chop, both of you. Tilda and Sigrid, carry on.”

“If I get my room and the bathroom clean, can I go to the movies with Finn and Tara and Killian?” Sigrid asked. “It’s the three o’clock matinee, so it doesn’t cost as much.”

Bard looked at Thran. “Get your chores done first, and then come out to the barn. We’ll talk about it.”

“Okay,” Sigrid said, and went back in her room to hurry through her tidying.

“What about me?” Tilda asked plaintively. “My room is clean already, and I’ll be done sweeping soon. Then what can I do?”

“Anything you want – within reason,” Bard amended quickly. “You can help in the garage if you want, or work on your drawing, or do you have something else in mind?”

“You said you got the broken shelf thing for me, the one in the main room?”

“The étagère that I brought home, yes?” Thran asked. “Yes, I thought you could use it for your toys.”

“I want to try to put it together. It doesn’t look that bad.”

“If you want to, sure,” Bard nodded. “You can bring it out on the porch if you want, or by the carriage house, so if you need help, we’ll be nearby. Sweep first, though.”

“Goodie!” Tilda took up her brush. “I’ll do the steps now.”

Thran and Bard did a quick look in all the children’s rooms, and found them all reasonably neat and swept, so the children scattered to their other tasks, eager to move beyond the mundane to the things that were more interesting.

“We must do our room, too,” Thran observed. “I will start. You see to Sigrid.”

Gods, less than three months after they’d gotten married, they were already able to read each other’s minds! Thran had understood his hedged response to Sigrid, and had accommodated accordingly. After a quick smile at his husband, Bard followed Sigrid into her room, where she was wiping a dust cloth over her desk.
“About the film,” Bard said lowly, so Tilda didn’t overhear. “I know it’s a pain, but you have to promise me that you’ll stay with all three of your mates – not just Finn, but Tara and Killian, too.”

“Because of Lance,” Sigrid exhaled.

“Because of Lance.”

“I can’t stop living because of that dickwad, Da –”

“I know you can’t, and I won’t ask you to. But I absolutely will ask you to take all reasonable precautions. Stay with at least two of your mates at all times, tell me exactly where you’ll be, and if plans change, call and tell me so before the fact. That lad is not fooling around.”

“I don’t guess the police have tracked him down yet.”

“If they have, they haven’t seen fit to tell us. But I’d hazard not.”

“Of course not. That would be too easy.”

Sigrid rolled her eyes and exhaled again, drawing a reluctant grin from Bard. “It would. So don’t you make yourself an easy target. Stay in public places, know where the exits are, and where the police are.”

“Okay, Da. Thanks for not getting all clingy.”

“Don’t give me a reason to start, okay?”

“Okay.”

“Now I’m going to take the Russian out to clean the garage before he explodes. For some reason, he’s really hot about that.”

Sigrid giggled. “Ada is so funny – mostly when he’s not trying to be funny. I love how he gets all Russian and gesticulates with his hands. And that thing about the crime scene was hysterical.”

She demonstrated, drawing Bard’s snicker. “He’s one of a kind. We’re lucky to have him.”

“He’s just as lucky to have you, too. So let me finish all this busywork. I’ve got to chisel the bathroom before Finn and Killian and Tara come pick me up.”

“Already arranged, I see.”

Sigrid reddened. “I figured you’d see reason. And I already told them exactly what you just told me, so... we kind of figured.”

“Just be responsible, and careful. You’re all smarter than Lance. Let’s keep it that way.”

He left Sigrid to finish her room, and headed into his room to change into his work clothes. There was Thran, contemplating a microfiber dust cloth and a lamb’s wool duster. He looked up at Bard.

“Another thing I have never done – dust. Which of these to I use?”

The duster is quicker; the cloth is more thorough. Given how dusty everything is, use the cloth.”

Bard grabbed another one, and wiped off his dresser top. Thran studied him for a moment, then followed suit for his dresser, then his nightstand. “This is very boring and tedious.”
“Most cleaning is. That’s why no one does it very often. Then when you do, everything’s so filthy that it takes forever, which makes you even less inclined to do it, and around you go again. Cleaning the bathroom is worse.”

“Can we do that later?”

“What kind of example does that set for the children?”

Thran sighed. “True, but let us not dawdle about it. I will distract us with an idea I had about our ring box.”

“What’s that?” Bard ducked out to retrieve the broom that Bain had abandoned.

“When I dance, and I put my ring in our box, it will sit on your dresser. When you weld, and you put your ring in our box, it will sit on my dresser. So that we each see to the other.”

“I like that. But I’m about to throw a monkey wrench into the proceedings.”

Thran looked up. “What is this monkey wrench?”

“It means I want to know what we should do with our box when both our rings are in it, as they should be while we work in the carriage house?”

Thran hummed as Bard dusted the light bulb in his bedside lamp. “Good question. Why do you dust the light bulb, lyubov moya?”

“Because they get dirty, too, and then the bulb gets hotter and dimmer. Except that these are fluorescent, so they don’t really get hot. But they do get dim.”

“Hmm.” Thran dusted his light bulb. “Sensible. Are we done with the dust cloths?”

“More or less. How about if, when we both aren’t wearing our rings, we put our box on the children’s memory shelf – which I promised to hang today.”

“That is perfect. Go, go hang it. I will clean the bathroom. I will ask Sigrid to show me how to do that.”

“That’s easy. Bleach in the toilet - don’t spill it on the floor, or it’ll stain the marble. Baking soda in the tub and shower and on the sink. Mop the floor with water.”

“Ah. I will manage. Go hang the shelf.”

Bard changed into his work pants and shirt. The shelf was on the floor of the children’s study, so Bard fetched hammer, level, and measuring tape from the mudroom, and set about measuring where the shelf would go. Bain and Legolas heard him, so came in to help him place it. He screwed the brackets into the wall, set the shelf on top, and screwed the shelf into the brackets.

“And still even,” Bard said, eyeing the level one last time. “Done.”

“Kukla, Sigrid!” Legolas called. “Our shelf is up!”

Both of the girls came in, with Thran behind them. “It looks good, Da,” Sigrid pronounced. Where’s our vase?”

“Downstairs on the dining room table,” Bain replied. “I’ll get it. You get our pictures.”
“And we will get our old rings,” Thran added. Soon, everyone had something for the shelf. As the pictures and the vase found their places, Thran added the wedding rings he’d shared with Vileria, and Bard added those he’d shared with Daphne.

“All we need is flowers,” Tilda said, smiling. “Our Mams look happy.”

“They do,” Thran murmured, touching Vileria’s picture. He murmured something in Russian as he took his hand away, and Legolas swallowed hard. He quickly smiled, though, when Bain’s hand went on his shoulder, and his father’s arm went around his waist. “All is well, Legolas. Your Maman would be very happy to see this, and to know how well you remember her. And Daphne would be just as happy to see it, too. You are all good children.”

“You are, indeed.” Bard nodded. Daphne would be proud of them, indeed, especially to see them help with the cleaning. She’d liked such chores no better than the children, and had laughed about it often. He imagined her and Vileria watching over them from some other plane, comparing notes, and smiling at how happy their husbands and children were together. Regardless of whether his imaginings were serious or frivolous, he sent both women silent appreciation and thanks for their regard.

“Did your Maman like roses, Legolas?” Tilda asked. “Sigrid told me that we have a rose bush outside, so when it blooms, we can put some of the flowers here.”

“She liked all kinds, Kukla,” Legolas said quietly. He was having a hard time mustering an even voice. “Any-any kind would be good.”

“I’ll get some at the market tomorrow,” Bard promised. “What you don’t put up here, we can put in the kitchen, so we’ll enjoy them in both places.”

“Good idea,” Sigrid nodded, patting Legolas’s arm. “So, Ada, you need help in the bathroom?”

“I do,” Thran gave her a rueful smile. “What do I do with the baking soda?”

“You’re cleaning the bathroom?” Bain blurted.

Thran shrugged. “I have never done so before. It is time I learned.”

“Oh, that’s brilliant,” Bain grinned in envy. “I wish I’d never had to clean a bathroom before! If you want to practice, I’d be glad to let you do the half bath downstairs.”

A chuckle dispelled the last of the somber mood. “You and Legs need to practice your technique,” Bard teased. “It’s not of the best, is it?”

“I have no technique at all,” Thran shook his head.

“I’ll help you do your bathroom, then you help me do mine, and we’ll call it square,” Sigrid proposed.

“Done,” Thran agreed, holding out his hand for Sigrid to slap. “Let us do so now, or I will never get to play in the carriage house!”

“II’ll vacuum the rug, then we’ll be out there,” Bard said. “Let’s go, troops.”

The family scattered. In a half hour the boring stuff was finally done, and the next load of laundry had gone in the washer. While Sigrid called Finn, the rest of the family put on boots and jackets and headed outside. Thran was so excited that he was almost giddy.
Wait until the tall dancer found out what a dusty and dirty job awaited him. How long would it take before the novelty wore off?

* * *

Finally, finally, the tedium of laundry and dust cloths and vacuums and bleach cleaner was done! A bright April day beckoned, brisk and sunny, and Thran was thrilled to finally feel the breeze on his face. Yes, he had put on his sunscreen, and yes, he had on his arm brace, and yes, his hair was braided out of the way. He even had put one of Bard’s bandannas around his forehead to keep sweat and stray hair out of his eyes as he worked. His wedding ring lay in the inlaid box with Bard’s and was on the children’s memory shelf, out of harm’s way. Everyone helped Tilda to carry bits of her étagère from the main room out onto the porch, and she took the broom to sweep part of the porch clean for her efforts. Then he and the boys heaved open the bays to the carriage house while Bard slid open the barn door.

“What a mess,” Bard shook his head, looking into the barn. “I shouldn’t have let this go so long, but...”

“It is no matter now,” Thran murmured. “Soon you will want to see to the Rahmiel you will make from your clay model, and you will arrange all of this as you see fit. For now, we will bring the carriage house into good use, and we are one step further along.”

“You’re right,” Bard nodded, shaking himself out of his reverie. “There’s a lot of work to be done in here, but for now, I just have to figure out how to get all the lumber from the carriage house in here without having to make more work for myself. Bain had the best idea, to put it all in the rafters. I just have to make sure it doesn’t get close to the forge. The last thing I need is a lot of wood right over the exhaust.”

“A sensible precaution. And we do not want to put it someplace now, only to have to move it again later.”

“Another sensible precaution. Let me climb up and see what’s what.”

Bard clambered up on the crates that let him reach his chin-up rafter. A dark stain Thran didn’t remember was smeared on the side of the lower crate. Oh, gods, that was Bard’s blood streaked across the wood, memento of the terrible Monday morning when they’d fallen so badly out of step. His skin recoiled into prickles, imagining the burn of those rough boards against his husband’s shoulder. It recoiled again to further imagine the pain of Bard’s hands when he’d pounded the upper crate in such fury. There was likely a second stain where Bard stood now, one that Thran didn’t want to see. Never again did Thran want to fall so badly out of step with his family.

That determination was only one reason why he wanted to help his family work in the carriage house. Yes, the lure of doing something so mundane yet so alien appealed to him. But just as pressing was his desire to work alongside Bard on the house, in no matter how small a capacity, so that he was part of this long reclamation effort.

“Okay, I think I’ve sorted it out,” Bard called. “I’ve got a couple of boards to move, but that’s a quick job. That’ll leave plenty of room on the right side to hoist the two-by-fours by the eave, and the plywood can go in the center. That’ll be far enough away from the exhaust to keep everything safe.”
“So what do we do first?” Thran asked.

Bard climbed down from the rafters with an easy athleticism that Thran savored, no matter how well his husband had tended him this morning. Watching that graceful body move was another joy of working alongside his husband.

“We’ll cart all the lumber out and pile it here,” Bard pointed to the space directly in front of the barn. “Then you and the lads can lift it up to me, and I’ll set in in the rafters. Shouldn’t take the four of us long.”

The procession began. Legolas and Thran teamed up to move their boards; Bain and Bard followed suit. When all of that was piled in front of the barn, the four of them maneuvered a sheet of the plywood out.

“Let’s see how hard it is to get that in the rafters,” Bard pointed to the plywood sheet. “That’d give me a good base to get the boards in place.”

“This is not very heavy, but it is very awkward,” Thran said, trying to hold his corner of the sheet with one hand.

“I think Bain and I can get it, Papa,” Legolas ventured. “If we stand it on end, and push up...”

“I follow you,” Bain nodded. “That’d be easier than three of us trying to fit in the space. Da, can you reach it?”

“Hang on... yes, I have it. Can you push it any higher?”

Legolas and Bain extended their tallest, then Thran came between them to lend the strength and reach of his right arm.

“Yes, that’s great. Got it!” Bard heaved the sheet of plywood up, and let it thunk down across a pair of the rafters. A few more shoves, and it was evenly set across three rafters.

“Okay, send up the boards.”

Those went easily up and across the rafters. That left three sheets of plywood to move, which the boys saw to. Those went up atop the first sheet, and the biggest part of the effort was done.

“There is already so much more room,” Thran observed.

“Time to make a little more,” Bard grinned. “I’ll move the truck out. If you move your SUV, we’ll have a lot easier time.”

“Of course,” Thran agreed, pulling out his keys. “I will park near the house to be out of the way, in case we must move more things between the carriage house and the barn.”

With the vehicles out of the way, Legolas and Bain washed the windows, not a simple effort given the years of accumulated grime, and Thran took a broom to the cobwebbed walls. When he was done, he helped Bard sort through the shelves full of accumulated stuff. They found a few more cans of dried paint, a few more flowerpots, and a few more empty cans and bottles. Both of the big trashcans were full.

Thran contemplated the shelf full of flowerpots. “There are so many! If we fill them all this summer, we will look like a tropical paradise.”
“Daphne and I both liked lots of flowers. She started seeds in the spring, which takes a lot of patience, but it’s cheap, and we had tons of plants all over the terrace and the front porch. It was beautiful.”

“Then we will fill them all,” Thran nodded. “But they need cleaning first.”

“Da, can I help, too?” Tilda stood in the doorway.

“What happened to your shelf, little doll? It didn’t go together?”

“It did go together. I figured out that it screws together, which is neat. But there’s one broken part that I need help to glue, and Sigrid’s busy, so can I come over here with you?”

“Course. Let me see if I can glue the broken part of your shelf, then you can help Thran stack up the flowerpots, or you can sweep.”

“Okay, Da.”

Bard went with Tilda to see about her shelf, so Thran busied himself with ordering all the bags of gardening supplies on the shelf. The boys were still scrubbing away at the windows, but their efforts had begun to show results, as the carriage house interior was brighter. The remaining windows were high up in the front and the back of the carriage house, so Thran had the boys brace the ladder for him to climb up with sponge and bucket and squeegee. He got both finished by the time Bard and Tilda reappeared.

“So much brighter!” Tilda exclaimed.

“It is,” Bard agreed. “Anybody but me ready for lunch? It’s going on one, and Sam’s coming over at three to talk about the Japanese garden.”

“How much do we have to do before we finish this?” Thran asked.

“Clean and stack the pots, sweep the floor, move the garden benches... that’s it.”

“I would rather finish, and eat afterwards,” Thran said.

“Okay with me. Lads, can you haul the two benches out to the gazebo?”

“Sure,” Bain looked at Legolas. “You get one end, and I’ll get the other.”

As the boys hauled away the benches, the rest brushed the clinging dirt from the pots and shelf, and restacked everything. Dust billowed out into the bright sunlight as the floor got a good sweeping, and at last they were done.

“We have a working garage again,” Bard grinned, as he finished brushing cobwebs from under the eaves.

“It’s not a garage, Da,” Tilda said. “It’s a carriage house.”

“That does sound more refined,” Bard chuckled. “But whatever we call it, it’s clean and tidy. A good day’s work, all.”

“Can we eat now?” Bain asked. “After all those waffles, I wasn’t hungry until you said you were, and now I really am.”

“I really am, too,” Legolas agreed.
“Lunch it is,” Bard nodded. “Cheese and veg omelets? Or there’s peanut butter and jelly.”

“I’m saving that for your school lunches tomorrow, little doll. So we have eggs and cheese and veg for today.”

“Omelet, then,” Tilda agreed. “Just cheese for me, please.”

“Bring the brooms in, lads,” Bard asked. “They go in the mudroom.”

Thran hurried to wash his hands in the mudroom sink so he could help Bard with lunch. As he took off his arm brace, Legolas grimaced at his bruises.

“It looks very bad, but it does not feel very bad,” he assured his son. “You know that bruises always look horrendous on my skin.”

“I will put more arnica on it. That helps bruises to fade. In a few days, it will not look so bad.”

“I hope not. And if I catch that dickwad, I will give him a few bruises for hurting you, and for threatening Sigrid.”

“You will not do any such thing, Legolas,” Thran said firmly. “It is one thing to protect yourself when attacked, and another to be the attacker. He is dangerous, and if you try to hurt him, he may hurt you, because he has no scruples to hold his hand. Leave him to the police.”

“But is isn’t fair to let him get away with hurting you.”

“It is not. That is why the police pursue him. They are professionals. Let them catch him, and then we will see that he faces charges for what he did yesterday.”

From Legolas’s expression, Thran’s words hadn’t satisfied him. Such anger... how hard was it to see that on his son’s face? He would call Mr. Nori, both to check on the welfare of that mysterious person, but also to see if he had any information that would bring Lance Dunmont into custody any sooner. The longer he remained on the loose, the more it would wear on everyone.

Lunch appeared in waves, as Bard made a series of omelets. Cheese was first, which Tilda and Sigrid shared, as the latter expected to leave shortly when Finn, Kíllian, and Tara arrived to go to the cinema. Cheese with various vegetables appeared in succession – the boys and Thran wanted theirs with everything; Bard liked his with onion and chives. Finn, Tara, and Kíllian came in about halfway to say hello and collect Sigrid. After doing the dishes and cycling more laundry through, the boys settled to one of their video games. Tilda looked after the boys, not saying anything, but Thran was not the only one who noticed her sigh. Bard pulled his mobile out of his pocket, tapped in a number, and put the device to his ear.

“Sam? Hi, it’s Bard. Yes, we’re still on. I wondered if you’d like to bring Elanor with you? I’ve got a little girl over here who’d love to have a visitor, if Elanor is inclined. Yes? Okay, great! We’ll see you both in a bit. Thanks, Sam.”

“Is she coming?” Tilda asked, smiling.

“She is. So think about what you two would like to do.”
Tilda’s smile widened. “Goodie! I can’t wait!”

She scampered upstairs, leaving Thran to smile at his husband. “You are a very observant Da, and a very thoughtful one.”

“She’s been patient all day. Sigrid’s starting to be with her friends more, and the lads have each other, so it’s easy for her to feel left out. But do you know she sorted out that étagère all by herself? She realized that the posts threaded through the shelves and screwed into the finials, so the pieces weren’t so much broken as disassembled. One of the posts was broken, but a little glue fixed that. Eventually I’ll strip it for her if she wants to paint it, but for now, she’s got a complete shelf for her stuffed toys.”

“She was a good helper in the garage today, too.”

“Carriage house,” Bard amended.

“As Tilda said,” Thran grinned. “How soon before Sam arrives?”

“About a half hour.”

“Then I will call Hal about our taxes, and then I will call Mr. Nori. I will inquire as to his situation, and also tell him of ours. Perhaps we can help each other to bring the saga of Lance Dunmont to a quicker close.”

“Good idea. Give both of them my regards. I’ll jockey a little more laundry.”

Bard headed to the mudroom, so Thran retired to the ballroom to make his calls. Hal picked up immediately, and was his usual flamboyant self.

“Thran! Hello! Don’t tell me, I know why you’re calling. Yes, your taxes are done, and so are those for your very hunky husband. How is your very hunky husband? Well, I hope?”

“Very well. He sends his regards.”

“Such a sweetie you’ve got! Listen, my dear, your taxes are pretty run of the mill this year, nothing out of the ordinary, so if you prefer, I can email you the files – password protected of course. You can review them, and just send me back the efile signature page. But I’ve been baking today, and I’d love to bring you and yours a few things to thank Bard for his to-die-for muffins. Anytime late tomorrow afternoon works for me. I just need to know four things.”

“What four things, Hal?” Thran asked, smiling at his friend’s usual ebullience.

“The favorite cupcake flavors of your very hunky husband and his beautiful children, of course! How hard is that?”

Thran chuckled. “Tilda loves coconut, as does Legolas. Anything with chocolate pleases Bain and Sigrid. Bard is partial to chocolate, too, but paired with orange is his favorite.”

“Perfect! You’re still partial to chocolate raspberry, of course.”

“You know me well, Hal. I would welcome a visit. It would be good of you to go through Bard’s with him, so that he understands everything. I will have tea ready. Four o’clock, perhaps?”

“Perfection, my dear. I’ll see you then, treats and taxes in hand. The latter might be a pain, but I promise that the former will ease the pain.”
“Then until tomorrow, mon cher.”

“Until tomorrow. Ciao!”

Thran disconnected the call with a smile, but sobered as he rang Mr. Nori. He waited for the usual gruff man answering the call to get Mr. Nori.

“Nori.”

“Thran Oropherson. I hope you weather the current situation well.”

“Well enough.”

“Your people are safe?”

“I appreciate you asking after them.”

“I take that to mean that your situation is volatile.”

“Not as much as it was.”

“I have some information for you.”

“Lance Dunmont.”

“The same.” Thran described yesterday’s events, the deductions he and Bard had made about Lance’s appearance at the Follies, and Lance’s resentment of Sigrid.

“The kid’s not with his mother. She doesn’t know where he is. No one’s seen him in his usual digs that I’ve heard, but I admit I’ve had bigger concerns. Between the warring factions and the politsey, some parties are in hiding, some are out of commission, and a lot of the rest aren’t talking. You’re right that no one wants to take on your piss ant, so you’re clear of the rest of the factions as far as I can tell. Keep your security system on in case he finds out where you live.”

“He has not been armed thus far. Is that likely to change?”

“He won’t get anything from the factions. That doesn’t mean he won’t resort to breaking and entering if the opportunity presents itself. I’ll keep my ear to the ground, as much as I can given everything else.”

“I appreciate that. Your brothers are well?”

“I appreciate you asking after them. Your husband’s offer to Ori was kindly made.”

“Bard is a good man. I am concerned that the boy will decide to make another attempt at his art show.”

“A valid concern. Mention that to Oakland and Fundin. You’re not in their jurisdiction, but both of them might develop a sudden interest in art. Bard’s show might be very interesting to both of them.”

Thran grinned. “Perhaps so. I appreciate the pointer.”

“Keep me posted, then.”

“I will. Bard sends his regards, as do I.”
“Mine to both of you.”

The line went dead, so Thran switched off his mobile. He stood still, venturing a wry smile. Bard might tease him about being in the Russian mafia, knowing full well he wasn’t. He could only imagine what Bard would say about Mr. Nori.
Chapter 98

Chapter Summary

The saint does his best to concentrate on happy plans for Clan Ffyrnig, despite his worry about a vengeful renegade.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Bard didn’t let Thran’s description of his conversation with Mr. Nori detract from his anticipation of Sam’s visit – Lance already preoccupied him more than was comfortable. Gods, how terrifying had it been yesterday afternoon when Sigrid had stood with him and Finn, her brown eyes flashing, her voice calm and low and absolutely implacable as she faced Lance without fear? Terrifying, yet exhilarating at the same time. His daughter was truly the lioness that Thran had named her, and while he was proud of how well she’d kept her head, her poise had likely infuriated Lance all the more.

Would he have preferred her to cower? Of course not. This was one of those moments that he knew too well – one with no good path to take, only paths that were bad and worse. Of all those they could have taken to deal with Lance, at least they’d taken the unified, unafraid, resolute one.

Too bad Lance had taken one that was so malicious.

He hoped Mr. Nori and his family – literal, as well as... associates? – would continue to fare well. He suspected that that ginger fox was used to periodic crises, soon weathered without much cost to life or limb, whether personal or associated. Bard would reserve most of his concern for his own family, because they didn’t have Mr. Nori’s resources.

Thankfully, Sam came by with Elanor before Bard could brood too deeply on the fallout of vicious teenaged stupidity. Tilda was delighted to have a visitor her age, and they clattered up to her room to play.

“I’m glad you called,” Sam confided, as Bard escorted him into the kitchen. “Rosie’s in the middle of a really complex piece of glass for a commission. It’s due Tuesday, and she’s tearing out her hair. Her sister’s over to handle the small ones, but Elanor doesn’t take to that. I was glad to get her out of the house, and me with her.”

“I know that grind,” Bard winced. “What kind of tea can I get you, Sam?”

“Straight black or green, whichever you’ve got.”

“Black it is.”

As Bard put on the kettle, Thran appeared from the laundry room, a basket of clean clothes in hand, and a grin on his face. “Welcome, Sam, to the Clan Ffyrnig laundry. We have opened our own business, as you see.”

Sam’s laugh was rueful. “Oh, we have one of those, too. Four children under ten, an artist, and a gardener – the washer never stops running.”
“It doesn’t get any better as the children grow up, either,” Bard said, measuring the loose tea into the pot. “The clothes get bigger, so the washer gets fuller.”

“I was afraid of that,” Sam grimaced.

“I will dispense with this,” Thran said, indicating his basket, “and be back. I would like tea, too, please, lyubov moya.”

“I’ve got your cup,” Bard called after Thran, who had headed upstairs with the basket of clean clothes.

“I see Thran’s got an arm brace,” Sam said, lowering his voice. “I heard what happened, of course. It was on the news last night, too. How is he?”

“Well enough to help clean the carriage house this morning,” Bard grinned. “He’s mostly just bruised, and should be fine in a few days. Thanks for asking. Mugs are in the same place.”

“I’m glad bruises are the biggest part,” Sam said, opening a cabinet and getting out three mugs. “Was it just a random happening, or did that boy have something against Thran?”

Bard weighed what to say, but Sam was a good friend, and a close neighbor. He also had four small children. “We’ve acquired a stalker of sorts.” As he gave a brief summary of what had happened Christmas Day and afterwards, Sam’s eyes got rounder and rounder. “I don’t think he’s figured out where we live yet, but he hasn’t been the smartest egg in the basket, so just keep an eye out. I don’t want you or your children hurt because of this boy’s wounded pride.”

“Course I’ll keep an eye out. Rosie wondered what was up when she saw the security system truck outside your house on Friday. That’s why you cleaned out the carriage house, too, right? To get your vehicles under cover.”

Bard nodded. “Thran had a ball, though. He’s funny – he’s one of the world’s best dancers, but he couldn’t wait to get out there and mess about like one of the guys.”

“No lie?” Sam snorted in laughter. “Oh, that’s funny! I’ve got a garage so full the roof goes up an inch every time you manage to get the door closed. Send Thran over and I’ll put him to work!”

“Call us when you need help with that. I’ve got two teenaged boys and a very tall dancer, plus me. We can help you move just about anything.”

“Don’t say that – come fall, Rosie will get it into her head again that the garage needs a weed out, and then you’ll be sorry you offered to help.”

“We’ll make a day of it. A little grilling, a little beer, some potato salad and brownies, and it’ll be fun,” Bard said, pouring water into the pot. “Let’s go into the solarium and you can see how it’s coming along, and where we’d like to put the Japanese garden is just outside. I hope you can recommend some good plants for us to put in there. Legolas mentioned hibiscus?”

“Those are great plants, if you know how to take care of them,” Sam began, following Bard into the solarium. “Oh, my, you’re busy in here!”

“It’s sort of an informal art studio right now,” Bard confessed. Tilda’s drawing things lay on the fainting couch, and Sigrid’s upholstered chairs were in the far corner, and his covered model of Rahmiel was under its sheet in the near outside corner. “We’ve collected some pieces for what we want it to become. Thran got the table off the street in the city, believe it or not – just needed stripping, waxing, and a little glue. The screens and doorframe are from Mrs. Mathom’s, and will go on the inside wall with the fountain. The fainting couch was in pieces in a junk shop, so Sigrid and I are working on it. We’re taking an upholstery class together, so we’ve almost got that redone. The walls and ceiling need some work before I put up the door frame, the screens, and the fountain, but I think it’ll look great after that.”

“It certainly will!” Sam exclaimed. “So you want a few tropicals, I’m thinking?”

“Nothing too maintenance heavy,” Bard shrugged. “Bain wants a banana tree, but I don’t know how feasible that is. Legolas, as I said, remembered hibiscus. Tilda wants bright flowers. I like a lot of greenery with the flowers. But before that, I want to check the windows. I expect a lot of them need to be reglazed. I just hope they all don’t need to be completely redone.”

Sam took a close look at the windows that stretched from the top of the marble-topped table to just six inches from the ceiling. There were four of them, turning the whole outside wall into a nearly uninterrupted view of the terrace outside. The short walls to either side of the windows had matching windows, narrower but just as tall; they met the window wall at an angle, about one hundred and thirty-five degrees rather than the expected ninety. The ceiling featured a pair of skylights to bring even more light into the space, welcome given the room’s northern exposure.

“A few panes do look like they need reglazing,” was Sam’s opinion. “If you’re planning to strip and repaint them, you’ll catch all of that. But given how much glass you’ve got across this wall, you might think about replacing them altogether with something more energy-efficient. These old windows are murder on the heating bill in the winter, and murder on the cooling bill in the summer, no matter how well you reglaze them, because they’re just single pane. We replaced the ones on our sun porch last year with double-paned glass – it made a big difference in our heating bill, even though we didn’t touch the ones in the rest of the house.”

“Custom windows aren’t cheap,” Bard said.

Sam shook his head. “Windows in general aren’t cheap. But neither is heating and cooling. I’d rather see the smaller monthly bills, to be honest.”

“I’ll put it on the list,” Bard agreed.

They chatted about plants for the solarium until Thran joined them, recapping their discussion for him so he could add his ideas as he chose. They had a whole list of plants to consider before they headed outside to show Sam where they wanted to put the Japanese garden.

“Yes, you can make a beautiful garden here. I made a couple of sketches. One’s more traditional. The other’s less formal, with some different plants mixed with the traditional.”

He opened the folder he’d carried outside, and passed a sheet of paper to each of his hosts. “Thran, you’ve got the traditional one. I put a dwarf red maple over there, and a couple of rhododendrons – I don’t know your color preferences, but there are some beautiful deep red ones, all the various pinks and purples, whites, and some mixes. Very pretty in the spring, and nice foliage for the rest of the year...”

He went on to describe the rest of the design, from sculpted bushes and feathery evergreens.

“That is a beautiful plan,” Thran nodded. “I am glad you included pictures of the plants. I know little about them, so it is much easier to visualize the design with pictures.”

“So I’ve got the nontraditional one?” Bard passed Thran the sheet.

“You do.” Sam went through that one in just as much detail; it was hard not to get caught up in his enthusiasm for his subject. This plan included some tropical elements for the summer, such as huge elephant ear plants flanking Bard’s pine tree sculpture, and more kinds of ferns. If Bard had to characterize the difference between the two plans – both of which were beautiful – the traditional was more formal and elegant, while the other was more flamboyant and playful. Both, however, included plants with sculptural forms so that the winter display would not be completely barren.

“We’ve got at least six weeks before we can plant a lot of these outside,” Sam pointed out. “So think about which design you like, or if you’d rather do something else entirely.”

“I like the nontraditional one more,” Thran said right away, looking at Bard. “We are not very traditional, and I like the elephant ears. So large!”

“I agree,” Bard nodded. “They’re both beautiful plans, but I like the playful one more, too. And it has the shrubs with the red bark. Think how amazing they’d look in the snow.”

“They do look amazing,” Sam nodded. “I put one outside our kitchen window over the sink, and it’s a pretty thing to take your mind away from washing the dishes, all winter long.”

“An extra benefit,” Bard chuckled. “Do you have time to look at the front along the porch, Sam? The bushes are pretty straggly, and probably need replacing. It gets a lot of sun, so it’s a hard climate.”

“Sure! And I have some ideas for your wild Welsh garden outside the ballroom, too.”

Bard and Thran spent another hour outside with Sam, discussing what plants they liked, how much time they wanted to devote to upkeep, and even landscape lighting to make the most of the plantings. Sam would make up a plan for all of the areas around the house, and a list of the work that needed to be done to prepare the beds. Sam and his employees would do the prep and the planting, with an eye to Bard and Thran doing the upkeep thereafter with monthly visits during the growing season to keep everything in shape. When he and Elanor headed home, Bard savored his anticipation of how the outside of the house would soon be transformed.

“It will all be beautiful, my saint,” Thran agreed, as they came in from the porch. “Not fussy or pretentious, but down to earth, and beautiful.”

“Add some porch repair to the list,” Bard exhaled. “We’ll have to wait a few weeks for that. The inside’s got the half bath, the main room, and the sitting room to go. I hope the marble mosaic tile comes in soon. I’ll probably start on the tea paper this week.”

“Tea paper,” Thran mused. “Why is it called that, when it looks nothing like anything that would hold tea?”

Bard chuckled. “I have no idea. This stuff’s not even tea paper, when it comes down to it. I was looking for real tea paper online, but I found this website that described what a nightmare that was to use as wallpaper because it was too thin and wrinkled like all hell. It pointed me to this stuff that looks like plain, silvered origami paper, but it’s heavier, and can handle wallpaper paste without wrinkling. So that’s what I got. It’ll still look hand applied.”

“And beautiful, as does everything you have done here.”

Bard smiled. “I’m glad you think so. This has been a long time coming, but the place is starting to look even better than I imagined it.”

“That is because you have tailored it to all of us who live here. Not only does it beautiful, it fits us very well.”
“I think it does,” Bard conceded with a smile as they came into the kitchen. “I suppose I’d better start supper. Tomorrow the children go back to school, you go back to Immortal, and I go back to renovations. We ought to get to bed a little earlier tonight.”

Thran sighed. “As much as I love the dance, I do not love the thought of how hard it will be to calm Irmo tomorrow. He will be agitated because we have not worked since Friday, but he will be even more so when he sees my arm.”

“How does it feel, after working so hard today?”

Thran tsked and waved a hand. “I hardly worked. I did enjoy it, though – the beautiful day, the arrival of spring, the reward as we returned the carriage house to useful purpose again, and mostly to work alongside my family. Legolas has never seen me do such things before.”

“That’s all great, angel, but I hope you aren’t avoiding my question – does your arm hurt?”

“It is still tender, but it improves. I was careful not to use it when I lifted anything bigger than a small flowerpot. I still marvel at how many flowerpots you collected, Bard! Dozens, from this big to immense!”

Bard laughed as Thran made a small circle with his hands of about eight inches across, then widened that circle to at least three feet across. “I don’t remember buying so many. They’ve been in there undisturbed for at least eight years... maybe the big ones bred a batch of the small ones.”

Chuckling, Thran eased off his arm brace to wash his hands in the kitchen sink. “That must be the answer. Now that they are clean, comfortable, and nested together, we must check in a few days to see if we have gained any more.”

“We’ll do that,” Bard grinned, as he got the bowl of marinating pork chops out of the fridge. He and Thran had to work to come up with a complete supper, given how sparse the stores were; that would be Bard’s first task tomorrow after the children left for school and Thran settled to work in the ballroom. Still, by the time Sigrid returned from the cinema, they had salad in progress, farro cooking, muffins for the oven, and chops on the grill. Supper was its usual lively feast of food and conversation, spiced with Sigrid’s description of the silly animated film she’d seen with her friends. Cleanup progressed as Bard cycled yet another load of laundry through the mudroom.

“How much more is left?” Thran exhaled, as Bard carted another basket of clothes through the kitchen on his way upstairs.

“One left in the dryer, and one in the washer. The one in the washer is your stuff, so it gets hung up when it’s done. That’s the last of it. After the kitchen’s clean, everybody upstairs to put your clean things away. No heaps on the floor.”

“Can we read after that?” Tilda asked.

“What comes after clean clothes? Clean children,” Bard grinned. “Except for Sigrid, all of us are filthy from the carriage house. So if there’s time after everyone’s washed, we’ll read.”

“Me first!” Tilda called, rubbing her dishcloth over a plate with more speed. “I want to find out what happens next!”

“Hair, too, little doll. You’ve still got cobwebs in it.”

“Yes, Da,” Tilda sighed with longsuffering exasperation, drawing Sigrid’s suppressed laughter. When Tilda had dried the last plate, handed it to Legolas to put in the cabinet, and hurried upstairs, Sigrid gave her amusement full rein.

“She’s not the only one with cobwebs in her hair. But I take it you got the carriage house back to form?”

“We did,” Bard nodded. “What, you didn’t stick your head out the window to laugh at us while you cleaned your room? You had the perfect view.”

“My room took ages,” Sigrid sighed. “I had my mobile to my ear half the time, trying to explain trigonometry to Finn. That’s a lot harder on the mobile than it is in person, but I think he got it. He’s got a big test tomorrow, and he’s kind of nervous about it.”

“All of you will be back to the homework tomorrow,” Thran observed. “That will be hard, after a week off.”

“That’s no lie,” Bain groaned, and Legolas murmured in sympathy. “I didn’t miss pre-algebra homework, not one bit.”

“Or writing essays in French class,” Legolas continued.

“At least you actually speak French,” Sigrid pointed out as she wiped off the stove. “The verb tenses are so much easier for you than me.”

“That is all well and good,” Legolas shook his head. “But you are a better writer than I am. I can’t think of what to say in any language.”

“Just pretend you’re telling someone about what you’re going to write, then write that down. That’s a big help,” was Sigrid’s advice.

“I’ll try that. Even if I come up with not much of anything, it’s better than nothing at all.”

The children finished tidying the kitchen, put away their clothes, and cycled through the shower. While Thran got the last of his laundry hung on the mudroom line, Bard used the last of the wood they’d cleared out of the yard to kindle a fire in the sitting room fireplace. Everyone appreciated the chance to calm from the day’s efforts by enjoying the fire while they read the next chapter in their Harry Potter saga. Before long, it was time for bed. All of the children headed to bed with reluctance; the past week had been so full of excitement, most of it good, and they were sorry to head into a week that settled back into the pre-Follies routine...

Except Tilda.

“Is Lance going to try to hurt Sigrid?” she asked Bard as he came to tell her goodnight.

Gods, how to answer that, and just before bedtime, on top of it?

“He’s not very smart, little doll,” Bard finally said. “He got into big trouble with the police at Christmas, and then he got into even bigger trouble at the Follies. The police are doing everything they can to find him, so he doesn’t hurt anyone else. He doesn’t know where we live, and he can’t get to you at school, so it’s going to be very hard for him to even find Sigrid, much less get near her. So try not to worry.”

“I’ll try.” Tilda pulled Mr. Bun a bit tighter. “He looked kind of scared at the Follies. Am I bad because I was glad he was scared?”

Bard suppressed a swallow as he smiled at his youngest child. “No, I don’t think you’re bad, Tilda.
Lance is a bully. Most bullies aren’t very brave on the inside – that’s why they pick on those they think are weaker than they are. On Saturday, he found out that we’re not weaker than he is. We stood together – that’s what scared him. I don’t blame you for being glad that we’re stronger than he is.”

“Okay,” she nodded, smiling a little. “Okay, I’m glad I’m not bad.”

“You’ve got a good heart, and a kind soul, little doll. Sleep well.”

“Love you, Da.”

“Love you, too. See you in the morning.”

“See you in the morning.”

As Bard switched Tilda’s light off and pulled the door ajar, he clenched his jaw. He hoped the police ran Lance Dunmont to ground soon. He was running out of measured words with which to reassure his children.

Chapter End Notes

Technical Note

Just a note about Bard's silver "tea paper" wallpaper - I had a specific look in mind, but did not find anything in my research that did the job exactly as I wanted it to look. I did some test runs of my own with origami paper and Modge Podge, which produced terrible results, as the thin paper ripples when it gets wet. So I did what every good writer does - I waved my hands, intoned, "make it so!" and invented the heavy paper squares Bard talks about. I can't believe someone hasn't come up with this, but I suppose they prefer to sell stuff in rolls and sheets, such as the "Erte" wallpaper from Brunschwig & Fils.

So do not attempt this with regular origami paper and Modge Podge, or you'll get one big, wrinkled mess!
Chapter 99

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint are determined to carry on with life, despite a pall that neither can shake entirely.

Chapter Notes

The fabulous Hal Galadhrim appears courtesy of johnnysmitten. Thank you, my dear ❤❤❤! If you'd like to see pictures of the wallpaper and floor tiles that Bard chose for the half bath, please check my Tumblr page - eldritchmage.tumblr.com

Thran was in the closet getting undressed for the shower, when Bard came into the bedroom. He threw his dirty clothes into the hamper and came out with robe in hand, but his teasing welcome for his husband died on his lips. Bard’s back might be to Thran as he drew the pocket doors to their bedroom closed, but his disquiet was obvious in his tight posture, his downcast eyes, his long exhale. Thran dropped his robe onto the bed and laid a hand on Bard’s shoulder.

“What is it, lyubov moyя?”

Another sigh, then a shake of the head that was not negation but regret. “Tilda asked me if Lance were going to hurt Sigrid. I won’t lie to her, but I won’t make her live in fear, either. So I said the police were looking for him, and we’ll stand together, but it... doesn’t sound like much.”

“It is all we can say,” Thran offered, but that was hollow reassurance – no different from how Bard regarded his own words.

“I know.” Bard’s expression was unsatisfied. “She said she thought Lance looked scared, then asked me if I thought she was bad for being glad that he was scared.”

“Oy, chert,” Thran winced. “Ten years old, and worried about the state of her morality. I would not have known how to answer her. What did you say?”

“I told her that Lance was a bully, used to picking on the weak, and he got scared when we stood together, when he realized that we weren’t weak. I said I didn’t think she was bad for being glad that he realized we were stronger than he was.”

Thran’s hand tightened on Bard’s shoulder. “That is a good answer. I would not have thought of it. But it is true, all of it. And it does not make her feel guilty because she recognized the courage to confront a bully.”

Bard looked no more reconciled. “I stood next to my sixteen-year-old daughter when that bully threatened her. She didn’t waver, and neither did the boy on the other side of her. I didn’t know whether to be terrified, or proud.”

“Be both, but more of the second than the first. Sigrid is our lioness, and Finn is her warrior. She has you and me and Bain and Legolas, too, and also Tilda in her own way. That gave her some of that strength you saw.”

“I know that,” Bard said, but he sounded as if he were reminding himself, not agreeing with Thran. “We’ll come through this, I know we will. But we can’t let any of us face that wretch alone. I know it’s a pain, but we’ve got to make sure that none of us is alone when there’s a chance of Lance being about. If he can’t get to Sigrid, one of us in an off moment might offer him just as good a chance to take his shot.”

“True,” Thran agreed. “So we will plan accordingly. One of us will always be available for the children. That will go a long way to reassure them, and thwart Lance. Maybe once he sees that over and over again, he will decide he would be far better served to return to Florida and his grandmother.”

“I hope so,” Bard nodded. “That would make sense, so... maybe he’ll see sense.”

Bard turned from the door and slowly shed his clothes, but his preoccupied mien showed that while Bard had nothing more to say about it, his thoughts still wrestled with the subject. Likely he didn’t expect Lance to back off any more than Thran did.

How typical – Bard was an expert at silent worrying. But as Thran got into the shower with his husband, he was no less concerned. If Lance had relied on the public notices to know about Thran’s participation in the Follies, then likely he’d seen the notices for Bard’s art show, too. That would be the next chance for him to confront Clan Ffyrnig.

Tomorrow, he would call Detective Oakland, as Mr. Nori suggested. And Sergeant Fundin, too. Maybe he could interest one or both of them in Bard’s art show, and the potential appearance of a certain shadow.

Lance.

* * *

Monday dawned, rainy and dreary. The children were equally unenthused about the start to another school week, so breakfast was quiet and glum, and poking them to get dressed and out the door wasn’t fun. Thran was not much more motivated, but at least he smiled when Bard offered him an umbrella to escort the children to the bus stop. The other children and their parents were no more animated, so once the bus lumbered down the lane, everyone made do with shrugs and commiserating waves before they drifted home.

Was Bard the only person happy to start the morning? The weather didn’t bother him because he’d start the renovation of the half bath off the sitting room today. This small room was in the physical center of main floor, without windows or skylights. Whether the outside world endured rain, snow, sleet, or sun, it all looked the same from the half bath.

Before he got started on that, however, he had one unpleasant chore to do. He called the Imladris Academy and asked to speak to Headmaster L’Éärendil. As soon as he gave his name, he was put right through. It sounded as if the headmaster half expected Bard to complain about security at Saturday's Follies, threaten to remove the children from the school, or contemplate legal action, but Bard quickly disabused him of all of those. He told the headmaster how much all of the children loved the school, but wanted to alert him of Lance’s vendetta, and the possibility that he might try to attack any of the children at the school. He also asked that school personnel refuse to release his children to anyone other than him, Thran, or the Gamgees. The headmaster was quick to reiterate that that was the school’s policy, and that he’d inform all of the sport teachers to keep a sharp eye out for anyone lurking near any of the outside athletic sessions. Bard felt a little better to hear that, so he assured Headmaster L’Eärendil that he’d convey his best wishes to Thran for his recovery, and disconnected his mobile.

Thank the gods, it was on to the half bath.

Originally, Bard had thought that because the half bath had no external light, it would be the perfect room to dazzle in deep Rembrandt red walls and a dark marble floor. But as he looked for tile, he’d been seduced by beautiful white and grey marble mosaic tile, cut in triangles that made beautiful snowflake patterns on the floor. The style wasn’t the same, but the colors and the materials reminded him of the Taj Mahal. Those tiles led to matching silver tea paper walls, and a glossy white ceiling to reflect light from flamboyant silver and crystal light fixtures, so the room would be a source of light rather than a consumer of it. As soon as he saw Thran off to the ballroom, he moved a lamp from the sitting room to the half bath to provide light, put his exotic Middle Eastern CD in the player to set the tone, and went to work.

He sanded and dusted the walls and ceiling, got out the paint tray, roller, and brush, and primed the ceiling. After working so long on the ballroom, it was a relief to work on a room where he accomplished something in an hour, rather than days. To see the ceiling go from patched white and grey to a smooth, unblemished white so quickly was a gratifying improvement. He climbed down from the ladder to greet Ori, Luka, Charisse, Irmo, Abebe, and the rest of the company back to their regular routine, then, since Thran was far from alone in the ballroom, he set off for the market. That was likely his favorite chore, given how much he enjoyed cooking good food. Mountains of food later, he was back at home, stowing staples in the pantry, veg in the crisper bins, meat in the special drawer, and the children's flowers in a vase on the kitchen table. He put on chicken breasts for Thran’s soup, then hurried back to his painting. He got the ceiling coated with its bright glossy white by the time a heavy knock sounded at the front door. He opened the door to find boxes of his long-awaited mosaic floor tiles being stacked on the porch. Once he confirmed that everything he’d ordered was there, he offered to sign for it, but the deliveryman shook his head.

“Got a few more boxes for you,” he said, heading back out to his van. What was this? It wasn’t until the remaining cartons appeared on the porch that Bard recognized the company name – these contained the antique fixtures that would appear in the central hall above Hope. Bard signed his name with anticipation, and hauled everything inside. More of the house would soon be in place.

Thran wandered through the kitchen as Bard chopped veg for the day’s soup, gracing him with a smile.

“You look happy, lyubov moya,” he observed, detouring long enough to brush a long, elegant hand over Bard’s hip. “Because you have been to the market, yes? You are always happy when you have been to the market.”

“I am, but that’s not the only good thing about a rainy Monday. The mosaic tile was delivered, and so were the light fixtures for the central hall. And the ceiling’s painted in the half bath. Tea paper this afternoon.”

“Ooh, the tile is here?” Thran craned his neck for a look down towards the hall. “Where is it?”
“In the sitting room. Take a look – one of the boxes is open. It’s exactly what I wanted.”

“I will – I was on my way to the half bath anyway. Back in a moment.” Thran disappeared into the sitting room, reappearing quickly. “It is beautiful, like pieces of colored ice. And the ceiling is brighter. It comes along.”

“It does. How was Irmo this morning?”

“Suka blyad.” Thran waved his hands as if he still tried to forestall a tirade. “I did not even show him the bruises, only the arm brace, but it was still such a volcanic eruption that I had to glare at him, even though he was very careful not to insult. Charisse and Luka and Abebe – in fact, half the company – were no less alarmed, but none of them were so crass as to descend into hysterics. It was not as if I injured myself willingly, or did something foolish. That Lance Dunmont has caused me more trouble than should be possible. I am sure it would give him spiteful amusement.”

“I’m sorry I missed Irmo’s performance. I hope you’re able to work around your bruises – I imagine you’ll want to wait a day or so before you try to lift anyone.”

“A few, yes. And of course Irmo was already irate about no work on Immortal for two and a half days, so he was in full voice. He works us hard this morning, to be sure.”

“Please, cariad, don’t let him push you faster than your body can handle. Remember that, okay?”

“I have learned my lesson, Bard. I will not let him or Immortal consume me so badly again. I promise you this.”

Bard nodded gratefully. “How’s Ori?”

“He seems untroubled. I hope he is. But he has enough of his brother’s circumspection about him that I would not recommend that anyone play poker with him, if in fact he plays.”

“That’s my sense, too,” Bard grinned. “I’ve got soup brewing for lunch. What time do you think you want to break, so I know when to put in the veg?”

Thran looked at the oven clock. “It is twelve now – perhaps at twelve-thirty? Much of the company breaks now, while Irmo works on the pas de trois with Luka, Charisse, and me. After that, the work continues on the troll market. Oh, and Hal comes with our taxes at four.”

Bard scraped the slices of carrots and onions into the pot, laying the shreds of bok choy beside the pot to go in at the last moment. “Soup at twelve-thirty then, and Hal at four. Biscuits with the soup?”

“Delightful,” Thran nodded. “Of course, you will remember to eat your share of this bounty despite your lust to lay a beautiful mosaic floor, yes?”

“Tea paper first, then the floor. The floor won’t go down until tomorrow, maybe. Everyone will have to troop upstairs to the children’s bathroom until I get tile down, grouted, and sealed.”

“We will adjust,” Thran assured him, snaring an errant carrot slice on the counter to munch it. “So back I go to the dance. I will meet you here for lunch before long.”

“Dance well, cariad,” Bard wished his husband.

After Thran headed back to the ballroom, Bard busied himself making biscuit dough and watching the soup. As he slipped in the shreds of bok choy and chopped scallions, Ori wandered in, sandwich in hand, looking none the worse for wear for his sojourn with his cousins. He was still with them, but seemed unconcerned.

“They’re a good pair, if a bit fonder of late hours than I am. But their guest room is quiet, and this time they remembered to stock the kitchen with more than energy drinks and junk food. I do a lot of the cooking, which they can’t be bothered with, so they’re happy to have me because they eat a lot better than when they have to fend for themselves. This time, they’re even happier – I’ve stolen half a dozen of your soup recipes, so they’re eating even better.”

Laughing, Bard put the pan of biscuits in the oven, then got out a pair of soup bowls from the cabinet. “You’re welcome to them. Both your brothers are well, I hope?”

“Dori’s having a wonderful time in the Bahamas. Wherever he is, they serve British tea every day, so he’s in his element.” Ori sat down at the kitchen table to unwrap his sandwich. “He’s so enamored with British tea that I’d hoped Nori would send him to the British countryside, maybe the Lake District, but Dori wanted warm, so he got the Caribbean.”

“How is Nori?”

Ori’s smile didn’t falter as he chewed a bit of his sandwich, but his eyes sharpened a hair. “He says he’s fine. I believe he is – Nori’s never been one to stick his neck out like a common fool. But the fallout of this gang war has been slow to settle, which tells me that it was a bigger shakeup than any of us expected.”

“Maybe Angelo’s turf was worth more than anyone realized, and it’s still being fought over?”

“I expect that that is exactly the case,” Ori nodded. “The proverbial fence is very crowded with people waiting to see who ends up with what. So far, as soon as someone claims anything of Angelo’s, someone else challenges, a fight ensues, and soon another claimant appears. It’s gone through three changes of hands already.”

“So a lot of your brother’s people are probably leery of doing anything until things settle, so they don’t find themselves on the wrong side of whatever power structure prevails.”

“Then you’ve got the boy who started this whole thing after you, too.”

Bard gave Ori a look. “Is there anything you can tell me about that?”

Ori shook his head as he swallowed his mouthful. “Other than he’s not with his mother in the city, he’s not in Florida with his grandmother, and he’s not in his usual digs. But he got out to your children’s school twice.”

Bard nodded.

Ori considered as he took another bite of his sandwich and chewed thoughtfully. “I had a thought...”

“Anything.”

“He was there Thursday and Saturday, but not Friday that you know of.”

Bard nodded.

“What was different about Friday?”

Bard shrugged. “I don’t know – likely a thousand things.”

“Maybe so. But what comes to my mind is that it rained Friday night. Not Thursday, and not Saturday.”

“Which means... what?”

“I don’t know. Maybe he didn’t want to schlep through the cold and the wet. Which makes me wonder... maybe he’s on foot.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. “Interesting. Maybe he’s alone, having to rely on what he sees on the media for where we’ll be, then he’s got to walk there.”

Ori nodded. “That’s plausible.”

“I think so, too.”

“Are there any gangs out here?”

Bard shrugged. “I would think so, but I haven’t seen any sign of them, and the children haven’t said anything. Two of them know the signs, and I think they’d have said something about it. But I’ll ask them tonight. Why do you ask?”

“Maybe you should talk to the police officer whom you talked to about Lance. Ask him if any of the local gangs have seen him. If he’s on his own, he might try to find a port in the storm.”

The oven timer dinged, but Bard gave Ori a respectful look before he took out his pan of biscuits. “That’s a good idea. I’ll do that.”

He turned off the burner under the soup, then put out the crock of butter, some jam, and the bottle of honey on the table with the biscuits. He ladled out a big bowl of soup for himself, and sat beside Ori to talk about inconsequentials while they ate. Ori was an easy companion, and Bard enjoyed having his company. Before long, Thran, Charisse, and Luka came in to take their break, and enjoyed a very brief few minutes of eating, followed by a few more of conversation and relaxation. Irmo must have remained as intense as Thran had mentioned earlier, for none of the dancers ate much, sure sign that they’d be back in action before long. When they rose to go back to the ballroom, they took Ori with them, so Bard prepped a couple of whole chickens to roast in the oven for tonight’s supper. Then he was back in the half bath, ready to start the tea paper.

Once he drew his level lines, and figured out how wet to make each square, he made good progress. He didn’t have much cutting to do except at the top and bottom of the walls. There was no woodwork in the room, but he planned to put both crown and base molding, so his cuts didn’t have to be so exacting as to be a pain. He’d have to take the sink and toilet out to do the last bit of wallpaper behind them, but since he’d have to remove both before he put down the floor tomorrow, he’d do the last few squares then.

He’d gotten all of it in place before a knock sounded on the front door – that must be Hal. Sure enough, he opened the door on the flamboyant financial planner with his R-8 parked behind him in the driveway. The tall, slender blonde was resplendent in a sleek, form-fitting black leather jacket with blue jeans, kiltie loafers, a crisp white shirt, and a lavender suede vest. Today his cufflinks were small, golden cupcakes, to match his pastel lavender tie embroidered with small, pastel cupcakes. On anyone else, this combination would look ridiculous; on Hal, it was the height of chic. He had his usual briefcase in one hand, and a gold foil box was carefully balanced on the other.

“Bard!” Hal greeted with a delighted smile. “How wonderful to see you again! Oh, my god, I’ve interrupted you in the middle of something, I see! More renovation?”

“It never ends around here, I’m afraid,” Bard grinned. “It’s good to see you, too, Hal. Come on in.
Put your things in the dining room, and I’ll grab the dancer from the ballroom.”

“T’ve you will,” teased Hal, as he set the box carefully down on the table and then his briefcase. “How is the world’s most elegant and ethereal dancer?”

“He’s well,” Bard replied, heading for the ballroom with Hal in close pursuit. “Come on, let’s see if we can pry him away from things for a few minutes.”

Bard and Hal came into the ballroom to find Thran in his pointe shoes, moving as easily as if he were floating. When he balanced in an ethereal arabesque, Hal’s mouth gaped and his eyes were wide as he put one hand to his heart, and the other on Bard’s shoulder.

“Oh. My. God,” Hal breathed, then swallowed. “That should be illegal. Oh, my god, so illegal.”

Bard smothered a chuckle, and hoped that the price for such unbelievably airy, alien grace wouldn’t be the permanent crippling of at least one long, slender foot. “As you said, the world’s most ethereal dancer.”

“And the hottest,” Hal said without apology, drawing Bard’s chuckle. “Absolutely the hottest.”

Hal was right, but Bard wasn’t about to say so in public.

Thran finished the sequence of steps, and came out of character to listen to something Irmo said. Charisse spotted them at the door, waved a greeting, and pointed them out to Thran. Thran gave them a smile, then spoke to Irmo, who looked disgruntled, but waved a hand in dismissal. Thran crossed to them with a small, wry smile on his face at Irmo’s displeasure, but it widened as he drew closer.

“Welcome, Hal,” he met Hal’s hug with his own as they came into the main room. “It is good to see you again, my friend.”

“I can’t tell you what it’s like to see you in pointe shoes, Thran,” Hal exclaimed. “Oh, my god, you just about gave me a heart attack! You look like an angel!”

Thran chuckled as he pulled on a pair of leggings to keep his muscles warm. “I take that as the highest compliment, Hal. It is not easy to balance so much of me on toes alone. I cannot contemplate it too much, or I am not able to do it at all.”

“It’s spectacular. You’re spectacular. Is this for this new ballet of yours?”

“It is only an exercise at this point, trying to get more deeply into my character. He is very tall. But whether pointe work is safe enough for me to include it in any sort of regular performance schedule is a different story. It takes a great deal of strength.”

Bard didn’t say anything. As far as he knew, Thran was expecting to put his pointe work into a single scene of the ballet. But his husband had also told him that Hal was a notorious gossip about everything except his clients’ finances. Until the ballet was finally set, Thran wouldn’t want to commit himself to dancing on pointe.

“It looked divine, Thran. Absolutely divine. You’d have the ballet world groveling at your feet in those pointe shoes if you’d do it.”

“You are kind to say so, Hal,” Thran nodded, shrugging into his sweater, and wrapping another around his ribs. “Now, I am sorry that I cannot linger over your visit as I would like to, but my choreographer is already most annoyed with me for daring to take the weekend off, so perhaps we could see to our tax papers?”

“Of course, Thran,” Hal nodded understandingly. “We’ll get right down to it.”

Bard’s mobile chimed. At Thran and Hal’s inquiring looks, he explained, “Thran, the kettle’s hot. Why don’t you pour Hal a cup of tea and start on yours? I’ll get the children at the bus stop, and be back in a moment.”

“Oh, I was hoping I’d get to meet your children, Bard,” Hal smiled, patting the gold box he’d carried in with him. “I brought treats. I bake in my spare time, you know, and I wanted to bring you something to thank you for the muffins you made at my last visit. They were over the top.”

“Hal is a very good baker, too,” Thran affirmed, smiling. “Cupcakes.”

“Always,” Hal pointed at his tie. “The perfect little gems. I never get tired of them. So I brought along a few for you and yours.”

“That’s kind of you, Hal,” Bard said in appreciation. “I’ll be back with the children, and they’ll be your friends for life.”

Hal looked pleased at Bard’s prediction, drawing his husband’s smile, too. But as Bard made his excuses, Thran gave Bard a sober look.

“Take Ori with you, lyubov moya. He expects you.”

Bard’s expression didn’t change, but he nodded in agreement as he headed to the ballroom.

Lance.

* * *

As soon as Bard left the dining room, Hal’s happy expression sharpened. His blue-green eyes met Thran’s without a blink.

“Since when does your very hunky husband need an escort to the children’s bus stop?”

Thran didn’t try to evade Hal’s question. “Since we have acquired a stalker. The aftermath of our fight on Christmas Day.”

Hal listened impassively to Thran’s brief explanation as he got out the papers for Thran’s tax return. “I assume Nori Goldman’s aware?”

Thran told him of Mr. Nori’s situation.

“The boy’s a rogue, then.”

Thran nodded.

Hal sighed, all flamboyance forgotten. “Security system on the house, I assume? And no one goes anywhere alone?”

Thran nodded again.
“So your children are protected most of the time. Sensible. You know to watch for those one-off moments, I’m sure.”

“I expect the next one-off, as you call them, to be Bard’s art show on April 30 at the Ilithien Gallery.”

Hal nodded. “So would I. It might be interesting to attend it myself.”

“I appreciate the offer, but I must ask... how long has it been since you were in a karate studio, Hal?”

As the front door opened, signaling the arrival of Bard and the children, Hal’s face waxed with its usual teasing grin, and he waved both his hands. “Oh, pfft, Thran. Don’t expect me to save the day for you with any of that. I’m only looking out for myself, you know – or don’t you? Honestly, it’s not rocket science, Thran! Art shows are the best places to meet artsy men! I’m always happy to meet more of those!”

Thran laughed at his friend’s joke as the children tumbled into the kitchen. Hal meant what he said about enjoying the chance to make new acquaintances. Still, he’d had to deal with too many incarnations of anger over the years, just because he was open and unapologetic about who he was. His claim of rusty karate skills, then, was a lie.

Lance.

* * *

“Nobody should go out alone, that’s what Thran said,” Ori shrugged, as he and Bard slipped out the front door to head for the bus stop. “And I don’t mind a breath of fresh air, even if it is still raining. It is nice to get away from Irmo for a few minutes. He still takes a lot of concentration.”

“I don’t know how you do it,” Bard admitted as they headed out of the front door. “So much energy, a focus that’s nothing but sharp, and so many ideas.”

“It’s not so bad now, because he’s learned to trust Thran, Charisse, me, Abebe – even poor Luka, believe it or not. Luka’s settled down a lot, and Thran’s bringing him along very well. Your husband is very smart with him.”

“Smart how?”

“He ignores the stupid bits, and rewards the good bits, and Charisse does the same thing. So even a puppy like Luka figures out to stop the stupid bits and do more good bits, because he gets a reward. He’s going to be really good before long, if he’s smart enough to keep listening.”

“Do you think he is? Smart enough, I mean?”

Ori nodded, breaking into a grin as they headed out of the driveway and down the lane. “Irmo isn’t insulting the way he was before you threw him out, but he can be terribly scathing. When Luka does something stupid that attracts Irmo’s wrath, no one says a word, and Luka’s just got to put up with whatever Irmo dishes out. When Luka does something smart, and Irmo gets in his face, everyone jumps to Luka’s defense. That’s strong incentive not to do something stupid.”

“It is,” Bard smiled.
The children arrived in a few minutes, greeting Ori and Bard with glad waves. They chatted with Bard and Ori on the short walk home. Homework had resumed, which made none of the children happy, but at least Monday was over, and they had a few minutes’ respite before they had to worry about tackling their assignments. Ori went back to the ballroom with a wave, and the children dove into the kitchen, intending to get out their usual snack of cheese, crackers, and fruit, but Bard put a hand on the fridge door before Tilda could get it open.

“Hang on,” Bard asked. “We’ve got a guest in the dining room, and he’s brought you a present. So let’s go in and say hello. Remember your manners, all.”

“Who is it?” Sigrid asked. “That policeman?”

Bard shook his head. “No, this is our financial planner. He’s here for Thran and me to sign our tax returns. He was nice enough to bring treats.”

“What is it? Food, I hope?” Bain asked hungrily.

“Is it Mr. Galadhrim?” Legolas asked with an eager expression on his face.

“That’s him.”

“The cupcake man!” Legolas exclaimed. “He makes the fanciest ones I’ve ever seen. They’re good, too. Really good.”

All of the children oohed, even Sigrid, drawing Bard’s grin. “Don’t drool, okay? Don’t be grabby, say please and thank you, and don’t wolf whatever he’s brought you down like you’re starving.”

“I am starving,” Bain groaned. “Where are they – I mean, where is he?”

“Dining room. Sedate walk, please.”

The children walked briskly into the dining room, where Thran and Hal were sipping tea and shuffling papers. Bard tried not to snicker at how quickly four sets of eyes went right to Hal’s gold foil box sitting temptingly to one side of all the paperwork. The man smothered a grin, but he was as excited as the children were, so Bard didn’t drag things out.

“This is Mr. Galadhrim, children. Hal, you know Legolas; this is Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda.”

“Hi, Mr. Galadhrim,” the children chorused.

“Oh pfft,” Hal waved a hand. “That’s my father. Just call me Mr. Hal. Your father makes the most delicious muffins, so I thought it was only fair to bring him a cupcake in appreciation. But it’s so silly to bring just one cupcake, so I brought a few more, on the off chance that some of you might fancy one.”

“I already told everyone how good your cupcakes are, Mr. Hal,” Legolas said. “So I don’t think whatever you brought will go lacking.”

Hal laughed outright at Legolas’s bluntness. “I’m glad to hear that, Legolas. So go ahead, let Uncle Hal spoil your dinner with a little treat.”

The children all looked to Bard and Thran, who both nodded assent. Bard wasn’t about to deny the children after such a buildup, so Hal chortled as he opened his box. Legolas was right – Bard had never seen such beautifully frosted and decorated treats. Two were lavishly covered with frothy coconut frosting, then sprinkled with small gold stars. A raspberry nestled atop swirls of white and dark chocolate frosting. A candied orange slice perched in the middle of small dark chocolate rosettes. Candied violets were sprinkled over more curls of paler chocolate. The final one had a spiral of peanuts circling more chocolate frosting.

“Wow,” Bain breathed. “I’ve never seen cupcakes like this.”

“Told you,” Legolas gave Bain a sideways look.

“Yes, you did,” Bain nodded.

“They’re almost too pretty to eat,” was Sigrid’s comment.

“No, they’re not,” Tilda said firmly. “Mr. Hal, may I have one of the coconut ones?”

“You certainly may, Tilda!” Hal waved a hand. “The other coconut one is for Legolas. There are two chocolate ones for Bain and Sigrid – the chocolate peanut, and the other’s chocolate cherry, which are boring as decorations, so as I’m celebrating spring, violets are perfect for that one. The chocolate orange is Bard’s, and the chocolate raspberry is Thran’s, of course. Please, enjoy!”

The children didn’t have to be asked twice, and while Bard had decided he’d defer his treat until after dinner, he didn’t have the heart to deny Hal the pleasure of watching them enjoy his efforts. Even Thran had his, and seemed to enjoy every bite of his cake. If the children’s hums were any indication, they were just as entranced. As a baker himself, Bard appreciated the taste of excellent chocolate combined with the deep, nuanced flavor that spoke of orange liqueur, essence, and oil. The frosting was rich, the cake was dense and moist – the combination was devastating. No one would need dessert after supper tonight.

“That was awesome,” Bain breathed, as he licked the last bit of chocolate and peanut icing from his fingers. “Completely and totally awesome.”

Hal’s smile was wide. “Thank you, Bain. That’s the best compliment a baker can have.”

The other children were no less effusive, which pleased Hal no end as they drifted back to the kitchen to clean out their backpacks. The delectable treat did make it a bit easier to go through the tedium of reviewing his tax return. The papers reflected a pathetic existence, but it was a past existence, and Bard refused to allow it to dampen his spirits or the lingering taste of his treat. Life was different now, and would only improve, so he didn’t care how little he’d made last year. If his show did well, he’d make almost as much from it as he did in any six months of last year.

He sat through the review of Thran’s return, understanding more than he expected, if not everything. He was learning, then. He signed his papers, consigned them to Hal, and after a few minutes of chatting, he and Thran walked Hal to the door with profuse thanks, both for the completion of an onerous chore as well as for the cupcakes. The children appeared to offer their repeated thanks for Hal’s treats, which the financial planner met with a promise of more treats next time he came to visit.

“Thanks for thinking of the children, Hal,” Bard offered his hand as they stood on the porch to bid Hal goodbye. “That was above and beyond.”

“I bake a lot,” Hal shrugged as if it were no consequence. “It’s my therapy. Nothing’s better to cheer you up than a blingy cupcake.”

“You could open a catering company,” Thran told him. “Custom blingy cupcakes for every special event.”

“Maybe I will,” Hal said coyly as he went down the porch steps. “Though god knows who could afford me. I’m a very expensive baker!”

Thran laughed. “You have lots of clients who can afford your blingy cupcakes, Hal. Of that, I have no doubt.”

“I do,” he admitted with an unapologetic smile. “So keep in touch, love birds. Ciao!”

Hal got into his blingy car, offered a wave, and drove off.

“Such a character,” Thran shook his head fondly.

“He is,” Bard agreed. “It was kind of him to think of the children.”

“He is a very good uncle. He has always been so, despite a precarious and difficult path in his youth. A good friend, a good heart, a good soul... I am glad to know him.”

Thran’s thoughtful voice drew Bard. “What?”

Thran stared after Hal for a second or two more, then headed back inside with Bard. “I merely consider another who has trod a precarious and difficult path, but he is neither generous nor thoughtful.”

Bard exhaled. “There’s no rhyme or reason to it.”

“There is not. Nor is there much else to say about it.”

Thran’s hand came to rest on Bard’s shoulder as they came back into the kitchen. It was a kind gesture, but it didn’t chase away the spectre of an angry child who wished them ill.

Lance.

* * *

Thran went back to the ballroom, so Bard intended to start on supper preparations when he came into the kitchen. The children, however, had spilled into the sitting room to discover Bard’s boxes of floor tiles sitting by the half bath door.

“Oooh, Da!” Tilda exclaimed, holding one up. “They’re like dominos, except hexagonal!”

Sigrid was in the half bath, studying the walls. “Wow, the wallpaper’s up, too! This looks so amazing, Da, like little silver tiles.”

The other children had joined Tilda to take a few tiles out of the box, and soon the boys and Tilda were laying out tiles on the wooden floor, arranging them in different patterns. “They’re all different,” Legolas commented, holding one up. “So... there’s no pattern to how you put them down, I guess?”

Sigrid came out of the half bath to watch them. “It looks like a pattern to me, Legs. See, look, when you put them next to each other, they look like little boxes stacked up, like that quilt pattern, Tumbling Blocks.”

Legolas looked up. “Really? I think they look like diamond shapes, put together like flowers.”
“No, they’re triangles,” Tilda insisted. “A lot of triangles.”

Bard laughed. “They look like all of those. That’s why I liked it, because it looks different any way you look at them. And the marble colors are amazing. It’s called Zebra.”

“It does look sort of like a zebra pattern,” Tilda said, turning her head this way and that. “But Legolas is right; they’re all different. So how do you put them together?”

“Just like Legolas thought – any way you want. I’ll just lay them as they come out of the box. Then you can make all sorts of patterns, every time you look at them.”

“They’re gorgeous,” Sigrid declared, kneeling down to put a few more tiles beside the ones her brothers and sister had arranged. “And such cool colors.”

“Reminds me of geometry,” Bain said. “Which is a million times more fun than pre-algebra. I miss it.”

“Me, too,” Legolas groaned. “Next year’s real algebra. Yuck!”

“So you’re doing the floor tomorrow, Da?” Sigrid asked, grinning at the boys’ complaints.

“It’ll take a couple of days for the floor, so you’ll have to hike upstairs until it’s done. A lot of sticking and sealing and grouting and more sealing to do.”

“But it’ll look so worth it when you’re done,” Sigrid encouraged. “It already does look amazing.”

“Thanks,” Bard tugged Sigrid’s braid. “So put all the tiles carefully in the box, please. Make sure you don’t scratch them, so put the paper inserts back between them. So who are sous chefs tonight?”

“I am,” Bain said.

“I am, too,” Legolas looked up. “What are we making tonight, Bard?”

“Roast chicken, sweet potatoes, green beans, kale, and fruit salad.”

“Roast chicken,” Bain hummed, smiling hungrily. “My favorite.”

Bard laughed. “You say that for every meal. And that’s not a complaint. So let’s get started, all. The chickens take an hour.”

The children separated, Sigrid and Tilda to start their homework, and Bain and Legolas to help Bard prepare supper. When the prep was done, the boys got the vase from their memory shelf and joined the girls around the kitchen table to fill it with some of the flowers from the big vase. Once they’d arranged the yellow and white tulips to their satisfaction, they took the vase upstairs, then worked on homework until it got close to suppertime. They put their books and papers aside to set the table, and by the time the ballet company appeared to go home, supper was close at hand. Thran ran upstairs to get out of his dance things and into comfortable leggings and Henley and socks, and appeared in time to sit down with the rest of the family.

It was just a Monday night, devoid of fanfare. The food was delicious, but nothing fancy. Why, then did Bard look around the table so often to savor the conversational trivialities as if they were treasures, from reports of upcoming tests and school projects, to a silly joke from Luka, to comparison of cupcake flavors, to guesses about what to do with leftover marble floor tiles?

Because a shadow hung over Bard’s thoughts.
Lance.
Chapter 100

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint are determined not to let a shadow keep them from making the most of their lives.

Chapter Notes

Hi, all. Welcome to Chapter 100! Who expected a holiday tale to take on such a life of its own? I certainly didn't!

Thank you for being such generous readers who leave me so many wonderful comments - it's such a thrill to see them appear in my inbox. Also, thank you for loving our ethereal angel, hunky saint, choir of cherubs, and cast of eccentric supporting characters so much. They've all been the best playmates!

Muffins all around!

After supper, Thran, Sigrid, and Tilda worked in the kitchen, putting the few leftovers away, washing the silver flatware and pots, loading the dishwasher, and tidying everything to Bard’s usual immaculate standards. How funny it was – Bard worked this beautiful kitchen as hard as professional chefs worked theirs, but when he wasn’t cooking, it always looked as if no one ever ventured here. When Thran had teased him about it, he’d gotten a grin in return.

“It makes sense, doesn’t it? I cook a lot more when I don’t have to clean up the previous meal first.”

No one could argue with that. So Thran and the girls scrubbed and dried and wiped until everything was ready for Bard’s next foray.

As the girls joined the boys to work on their homework, Thran brought his tea into the sitting room, but he didn’t expect to see Bard at work on his sketchbook. All during the kitchen cleanup, the high whine of a drill and a saw had punctuated the proceedings. Indeed, the half bath sink and toilet languished like Dada-esque sculpture in the corner of the sitting room, and thin grey something now overlaid the wood subfloor. His husband sat in the middle of the grey expanse, setting out the floor tiles.

“Children play with blocks. Their parents play with floor tiles,” Thran quipped, squatting on his heels to peek into the half bath.

Snickering, Bard took another tile out of the box. “We have just as much fun, too. Maybe more.”

“So it seems. The wallpaper is beautiful.”

“Thanks. I just got the last bit up where the toilet and sink were, just before I put down the backer board. I like the way the tea paper turned out. Tomorrow, it’ll be completely dry, so I can put up the sconces and the chandelier. Then it’ll really sparkle.”

Bard got to his knees to reach the cardboard box that sat in the corner. He unwrapped tissue paper from the contents and held up a silver sconce with a ring of crystal prisms dangling at the bottom. “Daphne found these in a junk shop a long time ago. I liked them, too. There’s a small chandelier that’s a close match, so they’ll look great in here. Lots of light.”

“I like them, too. There will be room for a chair or a stool, yes?”

“Uh-huh.” Bard set the sconce aside, but didn’t meet Thran’s eyes as he went back to placing the tile.

“Ah. You have found one worthy of this beautiful setting.”

Bard’s expression was chagrined. “That’s the second time in twenty-four hours that you’ve read my mind.”

“Have I?” Thran worked to keep his voice casual as he came to sit beside Bard. He studied the floor, then reached into the box of tiles, took one out, and placed it beside a row of other tiles. “I improve, then. You already read mine so well.”

“You knew I wanted to talk to Sigrid about going to the cinema yesterday. Now you know I saw the perfect chair to go in here.”

“Tell me about it.”

“It’s not out of a junk shop, and it’s expensive.”

“That is hardly descriptive. What does it look like?”

“I repeat, it’s expensive.”

“So what?” Thran shrugged without heat as he placed another tile. “Food is expensive. We still buy it.”

Bard exhaled. “All right, all right. It’s beautifully shaped, it’s got a Rembrandt red seat cushion, and... it’s transparent.”

“Transparent?” That had not been what Thran had expected, not at all. The surprise made him smile as he met Bard’s eyes. “Ah, I have it! It looks as if it were carved out of ice, yes? Or crystal, like the pieces of the sconces? Already I like this chair! You have a picture, I assume?”

“I have a picture.”

“Show me.”

Bard got up to fetch Thran’s laptop from the sitting room. He resumed his seat beside Thran as he called up a picture of exactly what he’d described – a traditionally styled arm chair cast in utterly transparent acrylic, with a tufted mohair cushion in the rich red Bard liked so much.

“Think of how beautiful Charisse will look perched on this chair, Thran, fixing her pointe shoes. That’s what did it for me.”

Thran wrapped his arm around Bard’s waist as he peered at the picture. “Your vision is perfect, lyubov moya, and so is this chair. We will find one.”
“There are three places in metro New York where we can get one.”

“Put it on the list.”

“You’re sure?”

“Yes. I like it. You have worked so hard on so much of the house, Bard. We can buy a few new things that add to your perfection. This is one such. I attend my pointe class in the city tomorrow, and afterwards I expect to stop at the shop that has the sofa I like. Perhaps they sell this chair there, and I will see it at the same time. If not, I can stop on another day at another shop.”

“That sounds great. Just make sure the chair is sturdy enough, and looks like it’s made of crystal, not cheap plastic. You know elegance – that’s what we want.”

Thran nodded, pleased that Bard trusted him to decide if the chair suited them or not. “Where are the shops that sell this marvel?”

When Bard looked it up, they discovered that the shop with the sofa Thran liked also carried this chair, so tomorrow Thran would evaluate both after his class. They discussed the tile as they laid it in place, checking to see how best to align it to that it looked well arranged. Bard gave him a quick summary of all the steps to put in this floor, which he expected would take at least two and likely three days until everything dried completely.

“So the company will need to venture upstairs for those days,” Thran surmised.

“Have to, yes – no sink or toilet down here. It’s not the work that takes so long, but the drying. Just like the floor upstairs.”

Thran hummed. “It may be prudent to hold our session in the UVB studio for those days, just so that so many people do not wear a path through the house. On the other hand, that would leave you alone in the house, which I do not like.”

“We have a security system. If you work in the UVB studio, I’ll set it to the nighttime setting. Most of the day, I’d be inside, anyway – I can put up the central chandeliers, paint the second and third floor landings, stencil our bedroom, put our bed together –”

“Or work on Rahmiel,” Thran interrupted, laughing. “You cannot forget your art, Bard. I hope that you finish Rahmiel enough to have it appear in your show. It is wonderful, and would be the best incentive to get people excited about your sculpture. Which of your finished pieces do you plan to show?”

“The rings would be the easiest to move. Sea Spot Run won’t be, but it’s the kind of work I like to do. Or maybe the pine tree, because of the moving parts.”

“Have you heard from Bilbo?”

“Not for a few days. He knew we were tied up with the Follies.” Bard looked up from the tiles to catch Thran’s eyes. “You know, I was so wrapped up in our business at the Follies that I forgot to find out how much my sketch brought, or if it even sold.”

“I am sure it sold, lyubov moya. Perhaps you can ask Mr. Rohan when you go to the school this week.”

“I will. I go Wednesday this week, so I’ll be sure to ask him.” Bard exhaled as he eyeballed the tiles he and Thran had laid. “See, that ends up with more half tiles on both of the side walls. So if we slide everything over half a tile...”

Thran helped Bard to shift the tiles they’d put down, then his husband stood up to eyeball everything again.

“That’s better,” he cocked his head as he considered. “More full tiles on both sides.”

“Ah, I see what you mean,” Thran agreed, as Bard pulled a pencil out of his shirt pocket to scratch out a mark on the backer board and make a new mark to show the new starting point. “It is good that you thought to lay everything out first before you glued.”

“You’ve heard the expression, ‘measure twice; cut once,’ yeah? When it comes to tile, the saying is, ‘dry fit first, then glue.’ That avoids a lot of wasted tile and torn out hair.”

Thran snickered. “Prudent. Oh, put a different tile down for that dark one. The one next to it is also dark, and the combination stands out too much. A lighter one would look better.”

Bard swapped the offending tile with a lighter one. “You’re right. Better?”

“Much. How will you know which ones to put where?”

“I’ll lay out the whole floor, make sure that we like the layout, then I’ll number all of the tiles so they go back down the way we liked them.”

“So much work!”

Bard shrugged. “It doesn’t take long. Better than being unhappy about two dark tiles next to each other for the next fifty years.”

Thran looked up at Bard. “Fifty years. Imagine what it will be like when we have lived here together for fifty years.”

Grinning, Bard continued to lay down the tiles. “As long as I don’t have to imagine you complaining about those two dark tiles next to each other.”

“Or that you complain about two light tiles next to each other.”

“That’s why I’m laying them out, cariad. So neither of us has a reason to complain.”

“We will be forced to think of something else to talk about after fifty years, then.” Thran lowered his voice to a whisper. “How I fucked you on this cool marble floor in the heat of summer, perhaps.”

Caught off guard, Bard flushed red as he paused in the laying of tiles. “Now there’s an image I won’t get out of my head for a while.”

“I will give you the reality behind what you imagine on the first hot day when we are alone.”

“Not if I nail you first.”

“Even if you nail me second, it will be a wonderful thing to smile about fifty years from now.”

“I’m smiling right now.”

Thran glanced out of the half bath towards the kitchen, but the children were intent on their homework; Sigrid was explaining some point of math to the boys. He took advantage of their preoccupation to insinuate his right hand behind Bard’s nape and draw him close to kiss. “So am I.”
“You’re a menace.”

“If I did not have this brace on my arm, I would not merely kiss you.”

“What, would I get a little of this?” Bard kissed back, fingers stroking Thran’s crotch.

“Now you are the menace.”

“I bet you won’t complain about that fifty years from now.”

“No more than I will now. But I suggest you stop before you find yourself upstairs in bed on your back with me about to desecrate your ass.”

“Da? Can I have some cheese and crackers?” Tilda called.

Thran snickered at how red Bard blushed as he struggled to answer his daughter. “Are you through your homework?”

“Not yet. I’m too hungry.”

“So am I,” whispered Thran, drawing a whispered curse from his husband.

“How much do you have left to do?”

“I have new French words, and I have half of my geography map to do.”

“Finish your map first, then you can have your cheese and crackers while Ada does your words.”

A long sigh. “Okay. I’ll do the map first.”

“Thank you, little doll.” Bard shoved Thran’s shoulder, smiling ruefully. “No thanks to you, you fucker. You’re determined to get us in trouble with the children.”

Thran grinned. “You are funny when I make you blush. Such a shy man you seem then.”

“Don’t push it, bastard. Or you’ll find out how shy I’m not in private. You’ll be too sore to dance in the morning.”

“Such temptation,” Thran purred. “But I will behave myself, if you insist.”

They went back to lay the last batch of tiles, then spent a few minutes rearranging them until they had a layout of the varying stripes that pleased them. Thran came out into the sitting room to listen to Tilda recite her French vocabulary words, leaving Bard to pull out his pencil again and label all the tiles. He stacked each row of tiles up carefully outside the half bath in preparation for tomorrow’s effort. He had a length of board, the bucket of mastic, and a bag of small things he called tile spacers ready, so he’d be able to start work as soon as the children were off to school.

As Tilda came in with her cheese, crackers, and vocabulary list, Bard took the box of sconces and chandelier into the mudroom to clean and polish so they’d be pristine when he put them up tomorrow morning. Sigrid headed upstairs to shower and study for a physics test. Thran moved to the other sofa to let Tilda, Bain, and Legolas play Dinky Farm; when Bard came back with the cleaned light fixtures, he and Thran took the boys’ places so they could cycle through the shower after Sigrid. At the end of the game, Tilda headed upstairs to take her shower, leaving Thran and his husband alone in the sitting room.

“Before you ravish me on the sofa,” Bard said, putting a hand on Thran’s chest to forestall the kiss he was about to bestow, “I called the children’s school today to tell them about Lance.”

Thran sobered. “I should have thought to do that, but I did not. What did you tell them?”

“Just that the boy had a grudge against the children, but might strike at anyone, and not to release the children to anyone but you, me, or the Gamgees. Headmaster L’Eärendil said he’d alert the sport instructors to keep an eye out for anyone who hangs around.”

“I am glad you called, my saint. I am glad the school will watch out for all of the children. Now I have my own confession to make.”

“Yes?” Bard turned concerned eyes on him.

“I did not think to call the school, but I did think to call Detective Oakland, and Sergeant Fundin. This was not entirely my idea; Mr. Nori suggested it when I talked with him last.”

“We’re not a city jurisdiction out here, angel, so I don’t know that they’d be able to do anything for us.”

“You are right – officially, they cannot. However, I called to suggest that as intelligent and discerning people, they might well find a display of beautiful artwork worth their perusal.”

Bard laughed outright. “Gods, angel! That’s hilarious! What did Mr. D have to say to that?”

“I admit it – he laughed. Very loudly. But he did not say no. He did ask if there would be food.”

“There’s always food at an art show. Around here, it used to be that the grungier the art, the more elegant the food. I’ll talk to Bilbo and see what he has in mind. Usually, it’s what the children call party food – little bites of things, stuff that doesn’t need utensils, or heating or chilling, and won’t sully the art. It’s stuff that I imagine Hal would love. Mr. D, not so much. Too fiddly for him.”

“At least I told him there would be food. I said nothing about alcohol.”

“That’s a loaded gun, to be honest. Sparkling cider looks fancy, but doesn’t send people careening out into the streets afterwards. I’ll bet Bilbo opts for that. I would.”

“Wise,” Thran nodded. “I do not know if either will come, but I let them both know about our suppositions and why we think it is likely that Lance will appear. To their minds, he is a very small fish, not worth bothering about. But Mr. D asked that I offer you and the children his regards, so perhaps he will out of friendship.”

“He’d do something like that,” Bard admitted. “That reminds me – Ori had a good suggestion for me this afternoon, but I forgot to follow through with it. He suggested I call Officer Kelso and ask him about any local gangs. If Lance is on his own, he might try to find a place with one of them.”

“I had not thought of that,” Thran agreed. “Yes, I think you should call him, too. We do not presume to tell him his business, but it does not hurt to offer a suggestion, either.”

“I’ll call him now, then, and leave him a message.” Bard pulled out his mobile, checked for the officer’s number on his caller ID, then called it. He got the officer’s voice mail, summarized what he and Thran had just discussed, left his number, and disconnected the call.

“We’ve done everything we can think of to do,” Bard exhaled.

“One more thing,” Thran prompted, pulling out his mobile and pushed a few buttons. “The security system is armed now. We are as secure as we can be for the night.”
“Y’ll still make the rounds,” Bard said, rising. “Just to say I have.”
“And I with you,” Thran nodded.

They circled the house, from sitting room and solarium; to kitchen, mudroom, dining room, and central hall; to the main room and the ballroom; and back to the central hall to go upstairs. Tilda was ready for bed; Sigrid continued to study for her physics test. Legolas and Bain were in Bain’s room with a pre-algebra book open between them.
“I remember it when I see it written down,” Bain explained, holding up a sheet of paper. “Sigrid wrote it all out for us. I just... can’t remember it when I’m not looking at the paper.”
“So I’m helping Bain to memorize it. I have a hard time with it, too.”
“Not as hard as me,” Bain groaned. “What’s Step Four, again?”
“Divide,” Legolas prompted.
“Divide!” Bain grimaced. “Why can’t I remember the divide!?”
“You can make a memory word for each step, then remember each of the memory words,” Thran offered. “So if the first step is...”
“Group the terms,” Legolas said.
“So that is Group. The second is...?”
“Add the terms.”
“So that is Add. Step three is...”
“Put one term on one side, and the other on the other side.”
“Hmm. We will call that Separate. Step Four is Divide. What comes next?”
“Substitute the value for the first term into the other equation, then solve for the second term, then put the second term back in the first equation, and solve for the first term.”
“You’re still having trouble with that?” Bard observed.
“In the worst way,” Bain agreed.
“So after Divide, you have Substitute 1, Solve 1, Substitute 2, Solve 2.” Thran mulled. “So Group, Add, Separate, Divide, Substitute 1, Solve 1, Substitute 2, Solve 2. Eight memory words.”
“That’s about six too many,” Bain snorted.
“So make a word out of the first letters of the memory words?” Bard suggested. “G-A-S-D-S-S-S-S? Hmm. Maybe not so good. Too many esses.”
“Yeah, but I can remember that,” Bain brightened. “Gas Dee Esses. Yeah, I can remember that!”
“That is a lot easier,” Legolas remembered. “So can you get all the steps now, Bain?”
“I think I can, Legs... Group, Add, Substitute – no, Separate! – Divide, Sub 1, Solve 1, Sub 2, Solve “Excellent!” Legolas gave Bain a high five. “I can remember that, too. Gas Dee Esses. Thank you, Papa and Bard.”

“Yeah, a big thank you from me, too. That’s stellar. Just brilliant.”

Thran’s grin was pleased. “I have no idea what any of these steps mean, but I am glad that we helped you to remember them.”

The boys’ goodnights were profuse and relieved as they put their book away and separated to get into bed. Before long, Thran and Bard could retreat to their room.

“Fifty years from now, I will still not know what Gas Dee Esses means, but I will remember the silly memory words,” Thran chuckled as he got into the shower and let the warm water rain over him.

Bard came in behind him and shut the door. “Maybe I should give you some other silly words to remember.”

“What words?”

Muscular arms eased him back against an equally muscular chest, and light fingers stroked his hair slowly. A kiss pressed against his shoulder. “Oh, I don’t know. How about Getting a little Ass, ‘Specially A Divinely Shaped One, in the Shower is Seductive?”

Hands traced down Thran’s flanks to massage his groins, and a hairy torso pressed against his back, making it hard to talk. “Th-that is too m-many Aaas and Ells and Ohs, and not-not enough Esses.”

“Trivialities.” Bard’s voice was low and caressing. Kisses pressed against Thran’s nape, shoulders, spine. “There’s just one thing missing from your divinely shaped ass.”

“Oh, g-gods,” Thran stuttered, as Bard’s hands ran up from his groins to massage pectorals and nipples. Expensive body oil splashed over and between Thran’s glutes, and a well-oiled cock slid inside him, one fraction of an inch at a time.

“This is what happens when you tease me so badly in the middle of a construction site.”

Thran propped his elbows on the shower wall and pushed his hips back against Bard, savoring the warmth of water splashing against his back, of Bard filling him so completely. “Oh, lyubov moya, if-if th-this is how you – oh, gods – you reward my teasing, then I will n-never stop.”

“Never?” Bard’s voice silked over him. Hands ran just as softly down his back, around his ribs, and down his flanks to engulf his cock. “Not even in fifty years?”

“G-gods, oh, gods – n-never.”

“Promise?”

“Oh, you fucker, you royal f-fucker – I-I p-promise!”

“That’s quite a promise, beautiful dancer. Maybe I should reward you very, very well.”

“You are about to kill me, you bastard!”

Hands pulled his hips back, impaling him so deeply on Bard’s cock that he gasped, then slipped around his hips. One hand engulfed his cock, the other his balls, and the thighs pressing against his glutes slapped hard as Bard’s thrusting grew faster. Thran widened his stance and arched his back, craving the deluge of sensations that flooded him until there was no resisting them further. As Bard tore orgasms from both of them, he gasped and his knees buckled. But Bard held him steady as his overwhelmed body spasmed in waves of pleasure.

“You are no saint, but the devil’s child,” he rasped, as Bard slipped from inside him and pressed a kiss against his nape.

A soft chuckle whispered against his shoulder. “And your angel’s wings are as black as the devil’s heart.”

A grin twitched at Thran’s lips and he shut his eyes to better savor the last lingering pulses of pleasure coursing through his body. He eased around, leaned against the shower wall, and gathered Bard into his arms to engulf his lips in a deep kiss. “Then we are well matched.”

His saint’s warm brown eyes softened in a smile. “Now, and for the next fifty years.”

They helped each other wash and dry, and soon were nestled in bed in their preferred tangle of arms and legs.

“Sleep well, my saint,” Thran murmured, drawing Bard close until his unruly curls tickled Thran’s nose.

“Beside you, angel... always,” Bard replied, stroking Thran’s ribs with a light caress. “Garu di.”

“Ya lyublyu tebya.”

Thran didn’t resist the secret smile that pricked at his lips as he fell asleep. For two who accused each other of alliances with the devil, their goodnights were soft, tender, and not demonic at all.

* * *

Tuesday morning... the children’s breakfasts and school lunches, a lunch for Thran in his bento boxes, shared omelet with cheese and vegetables, the trip to the bus stop, then Thran’s rummaging as he packed his dance bag for the day’s session at the UltraViolet Ballet studio. Bard got the half bath crystal sconces up and had almost finished with the chandelier before Thran padded through the house to bid him goodbye.

“Ready, angel?” Bard looked down from his perch on the ladder as he held the chandelier in his hands.

“I have a few minutes,” Thran replied.

“Can you lend a hand, then? Just hold the chandelier up while I connect the wire?”

Thran stretched up both arms to take the chandelier out of Bard’s hands. “High enough?”

“That’s good. Just have to fit the wire nuts...” Working quickly, Bard got the three sets of wires twisted together and safely capped with the wire nuts. “That’s it. All right, I’ve got it...”

He threaded the chandelier bolt onto the mounting bar that spanned the electrical box, tucked the capped wires into the electrical box, and fit the chandelier canopy over the electrical box. The chandelier was finished.

“Beautiful,” Thran pronounced it with an elated smile. “Shall I fetch the bulbs?”

“They’re on the sofa,” Bard said, climbing down. “The sconce bulbs are there, too. We just have to screw them in, then I’ll reset the circuit breaker, and if the gods are with us today, we’ll have lights.”

Thran put in the two sconce bulbs, then handed him the five small chandelier bulbs. A quick trip to the cellar to throw the circuit breaker, then he ran back upstairs. “Okay, angel, give it a switch!”

“Come watch, then!” came Thran’s reply. When Bard reached the sitting room, Thran pressed the toggle switch, and all the lights came on. “As I said, beautiful. See how the light dances off the prisms and onto the walls and ceiling?”

“One more step,” Bard nodded in satisfaction. “A good one. Just the floor, and it’ll be spectacular.”

“Indeed. You have made a dark hole light and beautiful.”

Bard grinned. “The story of this old place, in a nutshell.”

Thran offered a grin of his own as he stroked a long, elegant hand over Bard’s back. “It is a beautiful home, and grows more beautiful each day. So I am off, and I am leaving, too, lyubov moya. Remember to set the security system after I am gone. I will text you when I arrive at the studio so that you know I am well.”

“I appreciate that. I’ll text you if I plan to go out, or if anything comes up.”

“Remember to call Bilbo, and to work on Rahmiel.”

“That’s my plan, angel. I’ll get the tile down first, then I’ll do artist things.”

Thran and Bard walked to the mudroom for Thran to collect his bag and his jacket. “Remember that I have my pointe lesson today at one, then I will visit the shop with the sofa and the chair. I will ring you with what I find out.”

“Then we’ve both got a plan. Dance well, angel.”

Thran kissed Bard goodbye, and stroked a hand over Bard’s tangled hair. “I will. You tile well, make angel wings well, and do whatever else your day brings you well. I love you.”

“Love you, too.”

Bard grabbed his house keys as he walked Thran out to the carriage house and opened the bay for him. With a wave and a smile, Thran headed off to the UVB studio. Bard closed the carriage house, jogged back inside, locked the mudroom door, and set the security system.

For a few seconds, he listened to the uncharacteristic quiet that settled over the house. Yesterday’s rain had given way to a pale spring morning, and light shone in through the front windows of dining room and main room. The kitchen faced north, but despite that, enough light from the big windows by the table cast a warm glow. Everything was slowly, slowly coming together.

Enough savoring. On to the tile.

Because he’d taken such pains yesterday to fit and number all the tiles, the actual laying of the floor went quickly, as Thran’s text that he’d arrived safely at the UVB studio interrupted him only briefly. He had to cut the tiles he needed to fill in the sides and around the toilet pipe, but all in all, he was done before lunchtime. Even with tiny tile spacers sticking up and grout not yet in place, the floor was stunning. He sat back on his heels by the door, smiling at it all. In another couple of days, another room would be finished.

Completing the floor so inspired him that he opened the box that contained the set of three fixtures that would hang in the central hall. The central roof beam ran right over the center of the hall, sturdy enough to support the combined weight of the three brass fixtures Bard planned to hang from a central chain. The bottommost one would hang over Hope; the second would illuminate the bedroom floor landing, and the third would light the third floor landing. He’d have to rig a heavy hook to one side of the point where the combined fixtures would hang, so that he could manage the weight of the fixtures while he hooked up the wires. He also had some fiddly measuring and test fitting to do to make sure each of the three fixtures would hang at the right level on each of the floors. That would call for at least Thran and the boys to help hold and measure the distances between the fixtures. That meant a weekend rather than a weekday chore, because he wouldn’t take time from the children’s homework. He also wanted to make sure he had lots of spotters to make sure he didn’t fall off a ladder or a scaffold trying to hang the things.

Today, though, he’d at least make sure everything was wired properly. Antique fixtures usually meant antique wiring, and he’d rather replace that from the start rather than having to do it at some point once the fixtures were already up. Sure enough, all three of the pieces needed rework, so he fiddled with that for a while until his stomach growled too loudly to resist any longer. He made himself a thick sandwich, which was tasty enough that he made himself a second one. He mixed up two pans of brownies for the children’s lunches, then pulled out his mobile to call Bilbo while the brownies baked.

“Bard! Hello!” Bilbo’s cheerful voice answered. “How are you? I saw on the news about Thran at the Follies Saturday. I hope he wasn’t hurt badly.”

“I’m well, thanks. Thran got a bit of wrench, but he’s more or less back to normal. He was very lucky.”

“He certainly was. I’m glad it was nothing worse than a wrench, though that’s bad enough. Have the police run the boy to ground?”

“Not yet. That’s one of the reasons I called.”

“Oh?” Bilbo’s voice sobered. “You’re not canceling your show, are you?”

“No! Not at all!” Bard assured him. “Never. But I wanted you to be aware...”

Bard gave Bilbo a summary of the trouble his family had had with Lance, and their speculation about whether Lance might try to interrupt Bard’s art show.

“It’s a valid concern, yes,” Bilbo agreed, but his voice was reluctant. “I’d hate to cancel your show at this late date, especially since you don’t want to cancel it, either. I’ve already ordered the food, and of course all the publicity is up. I’ve had several strong indications of interest, even from the city, so I want to hold it if at all possible. It’s not in me to let a bully have the satisfaction of thinking we’re afraid of him.”

“No more than I am. But I might have a way to stack the deck a bit more in our favor.”

“What’s that?” Bilbo asked at once.

Smiling, Bard said, “That depends on what kind of food you’ve planned for the show.”
“The food?” Bilbo sounded baffled. “Well! It’s certainly not the old cliché of plastic cheese cubes on a plastic tray and red wine out of a plastic box, you can be sure of that! Alcohol is problematic, but I’ve got some nice sparkling cider. As for the food, how do ham buns, cheese tartlets, four kinds of gourmet cheese with water crackers, crudités and hummus, a basket of fruit kabobs, and a selection of mini éclairs and cream puffs sound?”

Bard nodded. “Delicious. I think Mr. D could make a meal out of that.”

“Who’s Mr. D?”

“A hungry off-duty policeman, and a friend. I think he might develop an interest in art for the night, if the food’s right.”

“Ah, I see,” Bilbo chuckled. “By all means, tell him the menu. Based on the interest I’ve seen, I’ve ordered enough for a hundred. Your Mr. D will be welcome.”

“I’ll pass the word. And if I happen to slip him a case of good beer after the fact, no one will complain.”

“Not at all. Everything’s arranged, then, but for moving the sculpture.”

“I can bring that, if you let me know when...”

Bard and Bilbo discussed which pieces would be best for Bard to bring in his truck on the Thursday morning before the show. Bilbo would meet him at the Ilithien Gallery at eleven to help him get the pieces in place, and to put the last touches on the display of sketches.

“Not too long, now,” Bilbo said. “Hope for good weather, my boy. We’ll have everything in place on Friday, night, so we can pick up traffic from the Saturday swell all day long. Good weather on a spring day always brings a big crowd throughout the village.”

“I will. Thanks for working so hard on the show, Bilbo. This has been a long time coming, and I’m grateful for all you’re doing to help me make the most of it.”

“Just promise me you’ll do everything you can to have Rahmiel ready to bring in. That piece alone, even just as a clay model, will generate a lot of interest in your sculpture, Bard. The combination of your sketches and your sculpture will show you as a multitalented artist to a lot of potential patrons.”

“I’m working on him this afternoon. He’s got wings now, all but the feathers, and I’m placing those today. So yes, Rahmiel will be ready. I’m excited at how well he’s coming along.”

“Send me a picture, would you? Just as he is now. I can talk more about him if I can see how he’s progressing.”

“I will, right after this call. Text me to let me know that you got it, would you?”

“I will. I’ll talk to you soon, Bard.”

“Thank you, Bilbo. Picture on the way.”

Bard disconnected the call, and went into the solarium to ease the swatch from Rahmiel. He took several pictures, sending each one to Bilbo –

The oven timer dinged. Brownies.

Bard hurried to set his pans of cookies on wire racks to cool. His mobile chimed, so as the smell of chocolate mint and chocolate orange brownies filled the kitchen, he dug out his mobile again.

Magnificent! Bilbo’s text message read.

Thanks, Bard texted, but that seemed woefully inadequate. So he added, So many thanks.

Even that didn’t do Bard’s gratitude justice, but he didn’t send any more messages.

Instead, he got out his bag of feathers and his sheets of high-density foam, and perched on his stool. It was time to make Rahmiel as magnificent as Bilbo had called him.
Chapter 101

Chapter Summary

The angel dances, strategizes, negotiates - and falls.

Thran’s early morning passed in seeming seconds. Barre, yoga, the work on Immortal’s choreography with Irmo and the company... such a familiar routine, but Thran loved it as much today as he had every day since he first set foot in a dance studio thirty years ago. It had been his mother’s idea, born of desperation when she couldn’t stand an energetic four-year old thumping around the house anymore in imitation of the musical variety shows that were her standby to get through what he now realized was a dull and bare existence. Every Monday, off they would go for his dance lesson – he looked forward to them even more than his mother did. How many times had he cried when the lesson was over, because it would be another interminable week before he came back? It had been a relief for both of them when he’d turned six, and his teacher had suggested that his parents let him try for a place in a ballet school – not just any school, but one that would lead to the Vaganova four years later, but he hadn’t known or cared about how rarefied his path was. All he’d cared about was that if he did well for the group of frowning adults, he’d get to dance all day, not just the meager hour here and there. So dance well he had, and he’d never lived at home with his parents after that.

From then forward, he’d danced, whether sick or healthy, sore or not, every day, even all day when it hadn’t damaged his body to do so. He’d danced harder when he’d started to grow so tall, fighting to adjust his technique to a changing body. His height, his startling hair, his emerging sexuality... the dance had been his anchor and his constant when everything around and about him had changed. Even now, even with his family to anchor him, there was still nothing that compared to his excitement and anticipation when he set foot on the dance floor. Time suspended, all else vanished. All that existed was the dance, and his endless pursuit of the perfection to express it.

After Thran’s barre, his yoga, his work on the scene where Death led the Soldier into the Underworld, Irmo switched gears, deciding to work with the dancers who would populate the Underworld scenes. Thran took the opportunity to talk to Lettie about the logistics of bringing Immortal to life. This was a much less entrancing way to spend his time, but it was a necessary one. He was grateful that he didn’t have to lead the effort – Lettie was an able and tireless administrator and booster. Already she’d worked out the details of having the Imladris Academy theatre students work on the lights, sound, and set construction for the ballet. She’d also set the company’s public relations team in motion, issuing initial press releases and drumming up interest.

“We’ve gotten a good response on those efforts so far,” Lettie said. “It’s time to up those efforts, so you know what’s coming... interviews, meetings with donors, publicity photos of the Immortal principals, and so forth.”

Thran nodded. He was well used to this, after so many years in a state company with a following that bordered on the fanatic. “The cult of personality. How does Rada proceed with his costumes?”

“He’ll have final drawings complete in a day or two, so once you and Irmo sign off on them, we’ll schedule fittings and so forth. After that, you know the routine – photos in costume to boost the PR.”

Thran nodded. “I know.”
Lettie leaned forward. “I hesitate to bring this up, but... have you made a decision about whether you’ll include your pointe work in the ballet?”

“I want to,” Thran nodded. “But it is not a question of desire. I have only a few hours of lessons to my credit, and I do not yet dance on pointe with the ease and the abandon that the role should embody. Death must cast all caution aside, all concern about how to balance on the toe, when He woos the Maid. I do not yet do that.”

“It’d be one more way to draw interest, but I don’t have to tell you that. You know as well as I that half the audience will want to see you dance on pointe, and the other half will want to see you fall when you attempt it.”

Thran’s nod was philosophical. “That is always so. Will the gladiator fall under the lion, will the Formula 1 driver crash in flames, will the dancer break his foot? The question varies, but the morbid fascination is always the same.”

“Sadly, yes.”

“I go for my lesson this afternoon. I will ask Mme. Morgelle what her assessment is. Though to be honest, it may create much more stir if you do not make any official statement about it, but merely hesitate each time you deny such speculation.”

Lettie’s smile was sadly cynical as she nodded understanding. “Use rumor and intrigue to our advantage.”

Thran shrugged. “Why not? Rumor and intrigue will happen whether we want it to or not. If they concern themselves with whether I will dance on pointe or not, that is better than whether Irmo has created havoc, or we are over budget, or it is idiocy to make an offseason debut at an arts festival.”

When Lettie winced, Thran didn’t telegraph the tightening of his gut. All of those things were true, but he had done his best to minimize them. Irmo was under rein, at least for the moment. Dancing in the ballroom had greatly reduced rental fees for rehearsal space, though the tangle that would result on his taxes bore no consideration. As for the idiocy of debuting offseason at an arts festival, at least that minimized competition, and using the school venue and student crews had reduced the production budget.

“We will survive,” he said in encouragement. “We will more than survive. Our ballet is wonderful, and soon everyone will agree with us.”

“I’ll let you know when Rada’s got his final drawings in, so he can get them underway. Once we get the preliminaries done, we’ll schedule the photos, and then the round of promotion begins.”

Thran nodded. “That is well. Irmo is through with me for the morning, and I have my pointe class shortly, so I will see to that. I will likely see you tomorrow, as Bard will not have the half bath finished for another day or so.”

“What’s he up to now? Plumbing, too?”

Smiling, Thran summarized the time needed to let floor tiles, sealer, and grout properly dry. Then he bid Lettie farewell, dropped into the changing room long enough to pull jeans and trainers on over his tights, and headed out to his SUV.

He was happy to encourage Lettie in this mad venture. He would have liked similar encouragement for himself, but he would not worry Bard with this, nor would he worry anyone in the company. Ballet dancers were not fools; they knew how tenuous resources were for any artistic troupe. But to make that worry more overt would only affect their performance, and none of them could afford that.

Any distraction from these worries must come from within.

Thran grinned as he got behind the wheel of his SUV. Perhaps a little shopping therapy would work for him as it had for Vileria. Her preference had been for clothes. Today, his would be sofas and chairs.

He sat in the SUV for a few minutes to wolf down the lunch Bard had made him – chicken, raw vegetables, a small clutch of raspberries. He’d have time to let it settle before he attended his pointe lesson with Mme. Morgelle. Then he drove into the city, to the furniture shop where he hoped to find an unusual blue sofa and a crystal chair. The city streets were full of traffic and people, a bustle that put off many people, but not him. He liked the vibe of a big city, where it was easy to lose himself in the excitement that flowed down every block. Would he find a bit of that excitement in this oh-so-modern furniture store?

This shop was all studied emptiness and isolated specimens of the furniture makers’ arts, and flooded with natural light that streamed in from multiple skylights. It would likely be staffed with pretentious clerks, but Thran had his own methods to deal with such things. So he registered the artsy young man – honestly, how long would it take before the head-to-toe black attire down to thick glasses frames, nerdy gawkiness, and a terribly self-conscious urban trendiness wore themselves out? – who languidly came forward to greet him. Thran took out his mobile and tapped a few keys.

“I have come to see this,” he said pleasantly before the clerk could mouth a greeting, holding up his mobile with a picture of the sofa. His tone was calm and cultured, not preemptory, but used to being obeyed.

“Uh – oh, yessir, that’s the Firenze sofa, it’s right over there –”

Thran didn’t wait for the clerk to escort him, but made his purposeful way without rushing. Yes, there in the corner was the sofa he’d come to see. Large, but the streamlined design kept it from looking too bulky; stark, with few seams or divided cushions to detract from its elegance. The cushions that lined the center back, but not the last seat at either end, were sensuously plump without looking overinflated. The upholstery was not leather, which would be sticky in summer and icy in winter, or hackneyed tweed, which was harsh on the skin as well as ugly. Rather, it was linen velvet, softer than mohair, but almost as durable.

It was modern, but nothing like the thin, uncomfortable pieces that reminded Thran of cold airport lounges. So far, so good.

Without waiting for an invitation, Thran sat himself in the middle of the sofa, shifting to settle himself in the cushions. Yes, the seat was firm, but giving, and the back cushion flexed to offer comfortable support.

“It’ll seat a crowd in style,” the clerk offered.

“The fabric is linen velvet? Not silk?”

“Yessir, it’s linen. Not that many people ask, but the linen wears well. It’s treated to be stain resistant, too, so if someone spills a cocktail or a canapé on it, you can clean it up easily if you’re quick about it. Of course, if the stain sits a while, it’s a bit more problematic.”

Thran slipped off his trainers and stretched out, flipping his braid out behind him. The clerk’s eyes flickered, but more in recognition than affront.
“It’s pretty comfortable, isn’t it?” the clerk offered, smiling a little. “It’s big enough that the curve doesn’t make it hard to stretch out, even for tall folks such as you.”

“It is,” Thran offered a smile in return. “That is one of the most important qualities of a sofa, I think – it must accommodate a good nap.”

The young man’s smile widened, giving him a friendlier mien that was far less pretentious and trendy. “I think so, too. This sofa’s pretty good for that. We had one Italian model in here a while ago that looked really hot, but man, was it a brick to lie on. Maybe people like that to chase people out of their parties when it starts to get late.”

Chuckling, Thran sat up and replaced his trainers. “I have been to parties like that. So dull! The advantage to be a guest at such a thing is that I can leave at my convenience.”

“Not much fun,” the clerk nodded.

“What colors do you offer for this?”

The clerk reached for a ring of fabric squares that lay unobtrusively on the side table that flanked the sofa. He sat down beside Thran to offer the samples. “It comes in three leathers, if you like that. The leather’s more durable than the linen velvet, but it’s a different look – a bit harder, a lot more aggressive. There are four linens, too, for those who want the other end – that Newport casual, status wrinkles thing, you know. The velvets are the most popular – we offer five of those. This is an unusual sofa, because it’s modern, but not so sharp and angular. It’s comfortable, but not Dad’s Old Den. It’s elegant, but not pretentious. There really aren’t a lot of sofas with that combination. It just lends itself to the velvet texture, I think, and the colors aren’t muddy or trendy. More timeless.”

“Ah, a company that has carefully considered its market. It will likely go bankrupt because it does not follow any of the trends you mentioned, but seeks to make the best of them all. That would be a tragedy.”

The clerk smiled appreciatively as Thran looked at the samples. “I hope not. They’re pretty popular, though this sofa’s a bit larger than typical. You won’t find it in every living room on the planet, which is good, just enough of them that the company stays afloat.”

The samples that Thran looked through showed linen velvet in caramel, muted forest green, pale charcoal grey, muted burgundy, and a wonderful frosted amethyst – but no blue. When Thran asked about that, the clerk nodded reluctantly.

“Everyone asks about that blue. It was a great color – my favorite, actually. But apparently there were issues about the colorfastness of the fabric, and so the maker chose not to offer it in that color rather than produce a product that wasn’t up to their standards. I admire that, but so far, they haven’t found another supplier. The grey’s got blue undertones in it, though, and it’s a great color. Blends with a lot of other colors, not so obtrusive that you’ll get tired of it after a year or two, and ages well. I’ve got a bigger sample in the back – let me get that so you get a better idea.”

He headed off, giving Thran a chance to test the sofa cushions a bit more aggressively – bounce on the seats, pummel the back cushions, make sure that the workmanship on the back of the piece was as expertly done as it was on the front – ignoring the one or two other patrons who stared at him while they perused the shop. He imagined his husband’s muscular body draped over the cushions, perhaps with a magazine over his face as he napped – as if such a thing would happen. Bard was no more inclined to take a nap than Thran was... but perhaps this sofa would give them both a reason to change that. While he waited for the clerk, he read through the small flyer about the nature of the foam cushioning with its down cover, and the origin of the linen for the velvet. It was not an inexpensive sofa, but it was well made, and beautiful. All that remained to discern was if he liked the grey velvet as much as the blue.

The clerk came back with a length of fabric large enough to drape over the back and seat of the sofa. It was pale, with a few of the blue undertones that the clerk had mentioned, but Thran liked the silver highlights more. He fished the sample card of the grey-green hall paint out of his wallet. Yes, that was a nice match. He flipped the smaller samples to the amethyst velvet and put it atop the grey.

“I like the grey and the amethyst together,” Thran observed.

“That’s a great combination,” the clerk agreed. He pointed to the three small burgundy oblong pillows that punctuated the caramel sofa. “The toss pillows come with the sofa. You can get them in any of the fabrics, so if you like the grey for the sofa, you could get the pillows in the amethyst.”

Thran nodded, holding out his paint sample card. “Both colors blend well with this color. This is the color of the hall, which leads to the room that would hold the sofa.”

“They do. What color are the walls around the sofa?”

“Bare plaster, as yet. It is easier to choose a paint to match the sofa than the reverse,” Thran replied.

“You’ve got that right,” the clerk nodded. “Even if you have to mix a custom color, a few gallons of paint isn’t anywhere near the cost to reupholster furniture.”

“Exactly. I am also interested in this chair.”

He displayed the picture of Bard’s crystal chair on his mobile to show the clerk, who nodded at once.

“That’s an incredible chair. The Contessa. It comes as an armchair or side chair, and the seat’s mohair. Five beautiful colors. It’s over here. Six or eight of them make a stunning dining room. One makes a very striking specimen piece, such as in a hallway or foyer.”

“A specimen piece, as you call it, is what I look for. The armchair in red,” Thran explained, as the clerk led the way to the display of dining room furniture. There it was, paired with its matching side chair. It sparkled under a nice spotlight, showcasing the utter transparency of the acrylic material. The sample chair had the red cushion, and it was a clear, deep cranberry, not a tomato red. Yes, Bard would like this chair, and it would be perfect in the half bath. It was generously sized, and felt comfortable when he sat down. The clerk told him about how it was made and how sturdy it was, and how to keep it from scratching floors or from being scratched, all very useful information. But he needed to say nothing about how elegant the chair was. It looked every bit as if it were made of ice or crystal, not the cheap plastic that Bard had feared, and the red was the rich color that Bard liked so much.

“I will excuse myself to confer with my husband,” Thran explained, to which the clerk nodded in understanding. “We are in agreement on the chair. I want to see what he thinks of the grey for the sofa.”

“Why don’t you take a picture of it and send it to him? It’s a great color, but I’m sure both of you want it to be the right one before you buy it. It wears well, so you’ll be living with it for a long time.”

“Exactly so. And thank you for the suggestion about the picture. I will do that.”

“Take your time. I’ll be here when you need me.”

“Thank you.”
The clerk took himself off to see to other patrons, so Thran went back to the sofa display and took a picture of the grey sample fabric still draping one of the seats. He sent it to Bard with a message to call him, and sat on the sofa to wait.

His mobile chimed immediately. “Hello, angel.”

Thran smothered a pleased smile. No matter how many times Bard called him that, it still delighted and humbled him. “My saint. You are well?”

“I’m working on Rahmiel. He’s getting fledged. Doesn’t look half bad. How’re you?”

“I am well. The chair is exactly as we hoped. The red is beautiful, and the frame looks like the purest crystal. So that is fine. The sofa is also all that I hoped, but for the color. There is no blue.”

Thran explained about the issues about the blue, and listed the colors that remained. “The one I sent you is a very nice silver grey, very slightly blue, but the blue is hardly noticeable. I like it, but wanted you to see it. It comes with the three oblong pillows in the same velvet. I like the amethyst ones. Both colors look beautiful with the hall’s grey-green.”

“Did you check the colors in natural light, not just fluorescent? The colors can look different in different lights.”

"The shop is full of natural light rather than fluorescent, so yes, the colors look as they would in our house."

"That sounds perfect, Thran. If you’re good with the grey, then I am, too. That’d probably be a better choice than the blue, because you could just change the color of the pillows and draperies and such to get a new take on the room, and not have to reupholster the sofa and repaint the walls. A lot faster."

“Do you tire of your paintbrush, then?” Thran teased, smiling as he imagined his husband sitting on a ladder somewhere to talk to him.

“Not yet, but I will be once I finish the entire house,” bantered Bard. “You asked about delivery and such?”

“Not yet, but I will. I wanted you to see the color first. Did it come out well? You can see that it is grey?”

“I can. The purple looks great, too. Like sugared fruit.”

“What an image,” Thran teased. “Then I will order both, lyubov moya. Then I have my pointe lesson. I will be home after as soon as the traffic allows.”

“Be safe. You know where I’ll be. The floor looks amazing, by the way.”

“I am eager to see it. Before long, then. Ya lyublyu tebya, lyubov moya.”

“Garu di, cariad.”

Thran ended his call. The clerk who’d helped him was busy with another patron, so he continued to look around the gallery while he waited. There were many interesting pieces to look at, none that interested him as much as the sofa and the chair, but he was entertained while the clerk finished talking to the other patron. When he was done, Thran caught his eye, and the clerk came over.
“How’d it go?”

“We agree on the grey with the amethyst pillows. And the chair.”

“That’s great. I’ll write up the tickets. If you’d follow me…”

Thran was glad to see that the clerk was meticulous about specifying the pieces and the exact colors that Thran wanted, and about collecting Thran’s information. The chair would arrive at the house in anywhere from two to four weeks. The sofa would take longer, about eight weeks. That would give them time to clear the main room’s current collection of boxes and bits out of the way, and to get the floor refinished. It would also preclude Bard from having to paint the main room right away; better to see the sofa in the room before choosing a color. That meant that Bard could work on the solarium sooner, a room that Thran awaited with anticipation.

He could wait to christen his saint on a grey sofa. In an exotic solarium... that needed to happen sooner rather than later.

After offering warm thanks to the clerk for his help, Thran headed to pointe class in good spirits. He was a few minutes early, but didn’t complain about the extra time to relax and warm up. He took especial care to limber toes, ankles, and knees, but hips, shoulders, neck, and spine all received his usual attention. He felt comfortable and relaxed when Mme. Morgelle bid farewell to her previous student. She waved to Thran as he continued to warm up in the corner, then let herself out for a few minutes’ respite. Thran waved back, settled on the floor to put on his pointe shoes, then continued with his familiar, comforting routine.

Five minutes later, Mme. Morgelle was back to briskly see to Thran’s lesson. More of the careful rolling up and down on the toes, the careful work at the barre, the delicate steps in the middle of the floor. He repeated movements designed to strengthen his ankles, and exercises to refine his balance, all the while paying constant observation to his reflection in the mirror to marry muscle memory and appearance. Despite his fit conditioning, nearly an hour of such concentrated work had his feet and ankles aching, his legs trembling, his back and shoulders tight because of the unfamiliar redistribution of weight, balance, strength. New skills were always a struggle to build, especially in a body so attuned to flatwork and demi-pointe. His body was not ideal to endure such intense stress on toes and ankles, but he had only to manage seven minutes of it, only seven minutes –

His left ankle rolled over, too tired to hold the position, and he fell off his toes. He threw out his left hand to catch the barre before he fell completely, but the brace on his arm kept him from getting a firm grip on the wood, and he stumbled badly, banging a knee on the floor, hissing when an all-too-familiar pain flooded his ankle.

"Suka blyad!" he swore, grabbing the barre with his right hand before he fell completely flat. "Chert, chert, chert!"

“Rolled right over,” Mme. Morgelle tsked in concern, stooping quickly beside Thran’s ankle as he held it off the ground. Her hands took his foot firmly, feeling for a break. “Thank the gods, there’s no break that I can feel, Thran. I’ll get some ice. Down with you, then. Sit, sit!”

Thran eased himself to the floor, grimacing as the intense pain flooded through him. That rush of pain was little different whether the injury was sprain, strain, or merely a twist, so he shut his eyes and breathed deeply, willing the sensation to ease. He slid over to his bag, digging out sock and trainer, unlacing the ribbons of his pointe shoe only when he had its replacement in hand. Off with the pointe shoe – yes, his ankle was swelling, turning purple – and on with his sock and trainer, which would offer more support than the pointe shoe. Mme. Morgelle hurried back with a bag of ice chips, which she wound around his ankle with an elastic wrap.
“I intended to ask you what you thought my prospects were to include a short section of pointe work in a performance. But perhaps I have my answer before I ask it.”

Mme. Morgelle sighed. “You’re very tall, and even as lean as an eyelash, you’re too heavy to push your feet this way, Thran. I wouldn’t advise it even for our lessons. Perhaps a half hour rather than our usual hour, but even that... my recommendation is that you don’t. You’re a marvelous dancer – more than that, you’re an angelic and important one. Dancing on pointe is not worth the risk to your body or your career.”

Thran hummed, not surprised to hear her blunt assessment. “I appreciate your candor. I will take myself home, and ice my ankle as soon as I get there. I will call you about our Friday lesson. Perhaps only a half hour then.”

Mme. Morgelle sat back on her heels to regard him with a resigned but intent expression. “No role is worth this, Thran.”

He smiled; the pain had cleared a little, and so he could hope for merely a twisted ankle rather than a sprained one. “This one is.”

A philosophical sigh. “Why are the best ones so intent on flying into the sun?”

Chuckling, Thran bent forward to unlace his other pointe shoe. “Because it is hard, it has never been done before, and it will look unbelievable. Why else?”

Mme. Morgelle hummed, her expressive hands gesturing – why else, indeed, she meant. “Sit for a few minutes. I don’t have another student until four, so let your ankle rest for a few minutes before you get in the car to go home. It’ll start to swell as soon as you put any weight on it.”

Thran leaned over to his bag and pulled out his jeans. He maneuvered them gingerly over his iced ankle, got them buttoned, and put on his other sock and trainer. “Better to get in the car sooner and home sooner.”

Mme. Morgelle shook her head again. “I don’t know why I say these things to mad dancers. They never listen.”

Thran smiled impishly. “I thank you for saying them, nevertheless.”

“Where are you parked?”

“Just a block down.”

“I won’t fuss about you not listening to anything else I’ve said to you. But you will listen to me about this – you will let someone help you to the car, or you will do real damage to yourself. No argument.”

“No, Madame,” Thran said meekly, smiling. And so he found himself between two male dancers who half carried him to his SUV. They put him into the front seat and his bag beside him, and sent him on his way with wishes for a quick recovery.

He hoped so. Despite the ice and the elastic wrap, his ankle hurt, not quite to the point of nausea, but badly enough. Thank goodness it was his left ankle, or he would not have been able to drive home. As it was, he was glad to reach the turnoff for the lane, and then the beckoning driveway. He parked as near to the mudroom door as he could, switched off the SUV, and considered the distance from vehicle door to mudroom door.
He sighed, shook his head, and pulled out his mobile. Bard answered quickly.

“Hello, angel. Where are you?”

“I am just outside the mudroom door. I am sorry, but I need your help to come inside. I have twisted my ankle, and –”

His mobile went dead as the mudroom door flew open. Bard stuffed his mobile in his front jeans pocket and hurried out beside the SUV, his face tight with worry. Thran disconnected his mobile, and offered his husband a chagrined smile as Bard opened the SUV door.

“It is not that bad –”

“Just bad enough that you can’t walk on it,” Bard cut him off, eyeing Thran’s left leg. “Can you slide out? I’ll take it from there.”

Thran slid out carefully. Bard was there to slide a shoulder under his arm, supporting most of his weight as he limped inside. Once they were out of the mudroom and into the kitchen, Bard picked him up and carried him into the sitting room to ease him down onto one of the sofas. Oh, thank the gods, propping his ankle up on the sofa felt immeasurably better, and so did Bard’s bag of frozen peas supplementing the ice already wrapped around Thran’s ankle. The relief must have shown on his face, because Bard relaxed a little.

“You’ll be all right while I get your SUV into the carriage house? I’ll get the children from the bus stop, too…”

“I already have the ice and the compression of your RICE, and now I have the rest and elevation. That is exactly what I need for now. I will be fine.”

Bard pretended that he wasn't worried by plastering an impassive look on his face, but he didn’t argue, merely nodded. “Won’t be long. I’ll bring you a cup of tea after.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya. I am sorry to be such a worry.”

Bard’s impassive expression slid into a crooked smile. “You’re a right trial, you are. But you’re cute, so you’re safe.”

Thran favored Bard with an exaggerated look of contrition. “I am relieved.”

Chuckling, Bard gave a tug on Thran’s braid before he let himself out to see to Thran’s SUV and collect the children. Thran let his head flop onto the back of the sofa, and he breathed a big sigh. Now that his ankle wasn’t the lowest part of his body, it didn’t throb so badly, and his stomach eased. But before he got too comfortable, he got up, leaning on the sofas until he could look into the half bath. He stood carefully on one foot as he switched on the light to better admire the floor. Even unfinished, the marble was stunning, and would be the perfect backdrop for the Contessa chair that would soon arrive. Smiling, he switched off the light, and hopped back to the sofas. This time, he made his way around to the other side of the room to the solarium. He stood in the doorway to see a scattering of black feathers strewn across the floor. His eyes sought Rahmiel in the corner to the left of the door –

His breath caught. There stood Rahmiel, no longer just loops of wire and lumps of clay, but sculpture. Dark bronze feathered wings flexed high above the angel’s head, straining to carry a divine creature down to the mortal plane, where he would comfort the small, despairing figure at his feet.
“Oh, lyubov moy,” Thran whispered, as he tried to swallow the lump in his throat.
Chapter 102

Chapter Summary

Angst, so much angst! Who will suffer it most - the angel, the saint, or their cherubs?

Shit, shit, shit! Thran was going to kill himself trying to dance in those damned fucking pointe shoes! Even he hadn’t thought this was the best idea, even he said Irmo was crazy, even he said he was too tall and too heavy to manage so much weight on his toes! I am going to chain him to the bed and MAKE him rest until whatever he’d done to himself heals, I am going to call Irmo and tell him to forget about such a stupid, dangerous idea, I am going to –

Bard leaned back against the outside of the mudroom door and took a deep breath.

What he was going to do was... calm down. Just... fucking calm down.

If Thran were seriously hurt, he’d be in the hospital, not sitting on Bard’s ratty sofa after driving forty-five minutes from the city to get home. He’d iced his ankle, he’d put a compression bandage on it, and he’d asked for help to get inside to keep his weight off it. He’d done everything anyone could have asked him to get home safely.

He shouldn’t have put on those damned pointe shoes in the first place. The rest wouldn’t have been necessary, if he just hadn’t done that in the first place.

That wasn’t Bard’s call to make. No matter how much Bard thought it was a lunatic idea for a six-foot, five-inch dancer weighing one hundred and eighty pounds to balance on the long, slender toes of his long, slender feet, Thran had a different idea. Thran was the dancer, not Bard. Thran knew his body’s capabilities, not Bard. So Bard would just have to do the best he could to take care of Thran, and make the best of whatever Thran chose to do.

What if Thran chose to drive that exquisite body of his into the ground?

He’d come close to doing it once already.

Bard gritted his teeth, and pushed away from the door. He housed the SUV, collected Thran’s bag, and headed for the bus stop. He was a few minutes late, and the bus passed him a couple of houses down the lane. As children tumbled out, his quartet waved goodbye to their friends, and ran up to Bard.

“You’re late, Da!” Tilda caroled with a big grin. “Late, late, late!”

“And welcome home to you, too,” Bard grinned back, ruffling Tilda’s hair. “How’s everyone? Good day at school, all?”

“Stupid pre-algebra,” Bain snorted, waving his arms wide. “It’s just so stupid!”

Legolas snickered, cutting eyes at Bard. Bard gave them both a mild look. “Ah. Aced your quiz, did you?”

“Oh, Da, you ruined the surprise!” Bain protested, but he was grinning. “But yeah, I did, and so did “Legs. That Gas Dee Esses did it. That is so cool!”

“Congratulations to both of you,” Bard offered his hand for them both to slap. “Well done!”

“Is that Ada’s?” Sigrid asked with her usual sharp look at the bag slung over Bard’s shoulder. “Why do you have Ada’s dance bag?”

“Because I just put his SUV in the carriage house, and his bag was in it,” Bard hedged. “As a certain someone noticed, I was running late, so I just carted it along to meet the lot of you.”

“And why couldn’t Ada put his SUV away himself?” Sigrid kept on.

Legolas’s face tightened. “Is Papa all right?”

Bain and Tilda sobered, too, and all four children looked among themselves with alarm.

“Did Lance hurt Ada again?” Tilda gulped.

That ratcheted up the tension tenfold. Before the children panicked, Bard held up his hands. “No,” he said emphatically. But you don’t know that for sure. “Thran got home just a few minutes ago. I think he turned his ankle in class, that’s all. He drove himself home, he’s not in a lot of pain, and he’s got ice on his ankle. There, you know as much as I do.”

Sigrid snorted, and Legolas with her. Both of them, with Tilda close behind, ran ahead to the house. Bain fell into step with Bard.

“Sigrid’s going to yell again,” Bain said lowly.

Bard was inclined to let her, but that wasn’t the thing to say to Bain. Instead, he smothered all reactions – no flinch, no exhale, no tightening of lips. “Guess I’d better get in there and hold her off.”

He sped up to a trot, Bain keeping pace beside him. By the time they got into the house, he expected to hear Sigrid’s voice at volume, but the murmur of voices was low. Still, the tableau in the sitting room was what he expected – Thran sat on the sofa with his leg stretched out and the bag of peas atop his ankle, Sigrid stood with arms akimbo and an exasperated look on her face, Legolas sat beside his father to adjust the bag of peas, and Tilda stood beside her sister, looking nervously back and forth between everyone, her lips downturned.

“– pointe shoes?” Sigrid was saying.

“Sigrid.” Bard came into the room. “Thran doesn’t need an inquisition.”

“He’s too tall and he’s too heavy,” Sigrid said without apology. “He’s as skinny as a rail, but he’s still too heavy to put all that stress on his feet. Those don’t make an inquisition. Those are facts.”

“Enough,” Bard said firmly. “I know you’re worried about Thran. But give him some space. Why don’t you all make your plate of cheese and crackers and fruit, and relax for a few minutes? Hang up your jackets and collect your back packs, too – right now, everything’s all over the kitchen floor.”

When Bard made shooing motions, the children went into the kitchen, but with varying degrees of reluctance and several backwards glances. He sat beside Thran, who was biting his bottom lip. Bard leaned close.

“The first thing that Tilda asked was whether Lance had hurt you again. It crossed my mind, too. Did he?”
Thran grimaced, but out of concern for Tilda, not whatever pain he felt. “He had nothing to do with it. I twisted my ankle in class.”

“On pointe?”

Thran sighed. “It was the end of a hard hour, my ankle was tired, and it went over.”

“I agree with Sigrid. You’re too tall, and you’re too heavy. But that’s all I’ll say about it. What do you need? More ice? That cup of tea I promised?”

Thran sighed again. “I would like to get out of my tights.”

“I’ll bring you some clothes. The children can stay in the kitchen until you’re changed.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya,” Thran said meekly, but Bard shot him a look before he headed upstairs.

“You don’t fool me, you know. You’ll do exactly what you want, no matter what anyone says.”

Thran’s smile was small, if unrepentant. “About the dance, yes. Nothing else. I am sorry.”

“You aren’t, but I forgive you. Back in a tick.”

Bard fetched underwear, long-sleeved tee shirt, and leggings for Thran, and kept the children in the kitchen while he helped Thran change. Except for being careful about his ankle, Thran moved easily and without discomfort. Bard put the discards in the mudroom laundry basket, and came back with the tube of arnica.

“While you’re tending to things, it’d be good to tend to your wrist, too,” he said, tossing Thran the tube. “Now for tea.”

“Your answer to many things,” Thran observed as he caught the tube, but his smile was affectionate.

“Because it works,” Bard returned, and headed into the kitchen. The children were busy assembling their plate of cheese, packages of crackers, and bowl of fruit, so Bard put on the kettle and got the teapot ready. Shortly, he carried in a tray with the teapot, cups, and saucers, and the children followed with their snacks. Legolas, Bain, and Sigrid settled on the other sofa. Bard sat down beside Thran and propped his sore ankle on his lap. Tilda squeezed in at the end of the sofa beside Bard. Thran had left the arm brace off his arm after he rubbed on the arnica, and had his arm cradled comfortably in his lap.

“Your arm looks much better,” Legolas ventured.

“It is much better,” Thran agreed, regarding it. He flexed his hand, turning his wrist this way and that. “It does not hurt, and the bruises are not so bad.”

They still looked livid, but purple fading to yellow and green were an improvement over the black, red, and purple that had discolored Thran’s arm yesterday. That seemed to mollify some of the children’s concern, but Sigrid still looked angry as she leaned forward to take a piece of cheese and a cracker from the plate. Legolas regarded his father with clear worry, and Bain kept looking at the other boy with concern. Beside him, Tilda snuggled close, draping Bard’s arm around her shoulders.

Maybe he should tell the children to back off.

No. Not this time.

This time, Thran would have to assuage the children’s concern all by himself. If he wouldn’t listen to sense from Bard, maybe the children could guilt him into it.

“Such long faces, and such accusing eyes,” Thran said at last, with an apologetic smile.

“You deserve it,” Sigrid muttered, not looking at Thran as she took a cluster of grapes from the fruit bowl.

“Yeah,” Bain mumbled, with a guilty look at Legolas. “Legs worries about you.”

“I do, Papa,” Legolas nodded. “So do they. And Bard. We all worry.”

“We all do,” Sigrid went on.

Thran’s eyes went to Bard, half pleading for help. Bard’s smile had a hint of perversity as he nodded to Legolas. “We do.”

Thran offered him a martyred expression; Bard let his smile widen just enough for his husband to know that he enjoyed Thran’s predicament. It waxed even wider as he leaned forward to snare some grapes for himself, offering one to Tilda, who opened her mouth for him to pop it inside. Thran regarded them all, but no one’s gaze relented. Finally, he gave a thwarted sigh.

“I merely turned my ankle. It is not broken, not even a sprain or a strain. It will be fine in just a day or two, without repercussions. Please, do not worry. All is well.”

“So it wasn’t Lance?” Tilda asked, looking around Bard at the dancer.

Thran shook his head. “No, Kukla. No one and nothing else contributed to this but me. I was in class, and my ankle turned because I still learn how to dance in this new way. I overbalanced, that is all. It merely means that I must be more careful, and proceed more slowly.”

“But you’re still going to dance on pointe,” Sigrid said flatly.

“I have not yet convinced myself that it is impossible, no. I make this promise to you all. The moment I am convinced that this is too dangerous to continue, I will stop.”

“That’s what every addict says about giving up his drug of choice,” Sigrid muttered.

“That,” Bard growled, “is over the line. It’s one thing to disagree, but entirely another to be insulting. Whatever plans you had for Saturday, they’re right off, because you’re grounded for the day. Apologize, please.”

“I’m sorry, Ada,” Sigrid looked down at her hands.

“I accept,” Thran murmured softly. “I am very sorry to worry you, ma chère. I know you only wish me to take care of myself. I do my best.”

The silence in the sitting room was painful, fraught with Sigrid’s upset and Tilda’s worry and the boys’ disinclination to say anything, though they were quick to trade uncomfortable looks. Bard exhaled; once again, it would be up to him to dissipate the tension.

“Finish your snack, children. We’ve got an hour before we’ll start supper, so you can start your homework if you want, or just relax. I’ll call the sous chefs in a bit.”

The children murmured one thing or another in acknowledgement. Sigrid looked no more reconciled as she got up and disappeared upstairs. The boys opted to play a video game upstairs, and Tilda went into the solarium to fetch her sketchbook and art workbook before following her siblings upstairs.
Thran remained impassive only until the children left, then he slumped against the arm of the sofa.

“Chert, they are worse than any inquisition. All sad puppy eyes and downturned mouths.”

Bard prodded the bag of peas with a finger. “I’d better put these back in the freezer. They’re thawed. Your bag of ice is nothing but water, too.”

He unwrapped the sloshing plastic bag and carried it into the kitchen to drain. The peas went back in the freezer, then he returned to the sitting room, where Thran had gingerly removed his trainer and sock. His ankle wasn’t black and blue as Bard expected, thank the gods, mostly red from the pressure of his shoe, with a slight stain of purple. Not so bad.

This time it wasn’t. What would it look like next time?

Thran flexed his toes experimentally. His face eased, so it didn’t hurt as much as he’d expected. Bard sat down beside him again, beckoning for the elastic wrap.

“I am glad you came back from the kitchen. I am not yet completely ostracized, then.”

Bard put gentle hands on Thran’s foot, probing gently to check the swelling. He was forced to admit that the damage wasn’t as bad as he’d feared, so he wound the elastic wrap around Thran’s ankle to support it.

Thran tsked. “Please. Say something. Even if you must chastise me. That would be easier to bear than this silence.”

“I’m too busy praying like hell to talk,” Bard finally said. His words were blunter than he meant, so he didn’t continue until he was sure that he could keep voice soft and calm. “I promised that I wouldn’t tell you what to do about your dancing. I’m praying that you can keep your promise not to let your dancing consume you. That same worry is behind all those sad puppy eyes and downturned mouths, too.”

“I realize that,” Thran exhaled. “I am sorry to worry all of you. I am sorry I have given you reason to doubt me.”

“You family loves you, angel. No one wants you to hurt yourself any more than we want Lance to hurt anyone.”

“Do you want me to stop the pointe work?” Thran asked wearily.

“You decide that, not me. Either way, I will support you. But don’t ask me to help you push yourself so hard that you never dance again.”

“I will not do that,” Thran protested. “I will not. This is not a break, not a sprain, not a strain. A misstep only, a small twist only. It does not merit so much worry.”

Bard’s bare nod elicited an unhappy grimace from his husband. Could he find words to explain the children’s concern so that Thran would understand it?

“I can’t speak to what Legolas feels,” Bard ventured. “But I can tell you why my children think your small twist merits so much worry. They’re too used to living on the edge, and not enough time has passed yet that they take our life here for granted. They know that I can’t support them yet, that you’re the one who does. So yes, they love you and care about you, but they also worry that all this will end if something happens to you. Right or wrong, it’ll be a long time before that worry eases. If anything will give you pause about the risks you take when you dance, then let the children be it.”
Thran swallowed hard, but he met Bard’s gaze steadily. “I know that I do not fully fathom how hard it has been for you and your children, but I see their worry in their eyes, I feel it in my heart. I do. I will not let this consume me as before. I will not cripple myself. I am not yet convinced that the pointe work is beyond me, but I will proceed slowly and carefully, to keep myself safe.”

Thran’s voice was quiet, but emphatic, and Bard tried to take comfort in it. “And if you find that it’s beyond you, will you stop?”

Thran sighed. “I did not lie to Sigrid, and I do not lie to you. If it is beyond me... then yes, I will stop.”

Thran’s sigh, his bearing, the regret in his voice, told Bard the truth – Thran would go to the very edge of hell before he’d give up, but he’d go no farther.

If the edge of hell stopped short of broken feet and failed ballets, Bard would count that as a blessing for both of them.

* * *

Bard sat in silence, doing his best to hide his worry as he gently wrapped the elastic bandage around Thran’s ankle, but Thran knew Bard too well to be fooled. Bearing the pain of his husband’s unrest hurt more than his ankle did. Again Thran regretted his earlier lapse to Immortal’s rigors, which had caused his family to worry that he would lapse again. Sigrid’s accusation about addiction hurt even more because her father had made the same accusation in the depths of his fury only a few days ago.

It wasn’t an inapt analogy, either. If his own misgivings weren’t enough, then Mme. Morgelle’s should be – she was an excellent teacher, and well familiar of the demands of pointe work given her long and renowned career. There was no excuse for his refusal to heed her assessment, much less his own, or that of his family, no matter how unknowledgeable the last one was.

Still, if he could manage seven minutes, a mere seven minutes...

He shut his eyes. He was mad. That was the only name for it. Pure madness –

No, there was another name. Bard had said it first, and now Sigrid had, so he could not dismiss it, no matter how unpleasant he found it.

Addiction.

Not to a drug, only to the dance, but addiction nevertheless. How ironic would it be if he had achieved such dominance in the dance because he was no different from any junkie who craved his next high – “Tired, angel?” Bard’s soft voice soothed over his restless thoughts.

Blinking, he found his husband regarding him with concern as he rubbed Thran’s shin slowly. “I am fine. I merely reflect.”

“Okay. Just checking.”

“I looked at the floor in the half bath,” he offered, hoping that would allay Bard’s concern as well as his own. “It is magnificent, even without the grout.”
Bard’s face eased into a smile. “I’m glad you like it. I think it’s the most amazing marble tile floor I’ve ever seen. Even better than the one in our bathroom upstairs.”

“They are beautiful in different ways. The one upstairs is serene and calm. This one is showy and stunning, magical with the tea paper and the crystal lamps. The Contessa chair will look wonderful with it. It looks like the clearest ice, poised to melt in the next second, but somehow it does not. The red cushion is wonderful, too. It looks to be suspended in air.”

Bard’s expression grew more animated. “I’m glad it lived up to its picture. It could easily have looked like a plastic lawn chair. An expensive plastic lawn chair.”

“It should be called the Cinderella chair. A crystal chair to match her crystal slippers.”

“Tilda will like that,” Bard agreed.

“The floor is not all I looked at before you arrived with the children. I looked at Rahmiel, too. Such a sweep of wings, filled with motion and energy, so light and full of grace. I have no words for him. He is beyond all words…”

Thran’s throat closed. He had been Bard’s inspiration for that heavenly angel alighting on the mortal plane to bestow his grace. But Thran wasn’t heavenly, and he had no grace to bestow. He was a madman driven by a compulsion he couldn’t resist. Despite his husband’s worry, his children’s fears, his teacher’s recommendation, and his colleagues’ concern, he had no intention of stopping his pursuit of all that the Lord of the Underworld demanded. He would make Death live like no role before or since.

What would that gain him? What would he do if he achieved this impossibility? How could he ever take Immortal on the road, where he would have to dance the impossible however many times a week? There were no gods in heaven that would help him do that.

Yet on he went, intent despite all concern, even his own.

He was nothing like Bard’s angel of love and mercy. He was selfish, irresponsible, and gambling with his family’s happiness.

He didn’t have to. All he had to do was consign his pointe shoes to someone else, and tell Irmo that this was too dangerous and foolish to attempt.

But he could not.

“Gods, Thran,” Bard’s voice came to him. “You just turned white as a winding shroud. What’s wrong? What hurts?”

Thran gulped, and his eyes closed. As his husband scrabbled to grab his healthy wrist, searching for a pulse, Thran took his hands. “Nothing hurts, Bard. I am only ashamed of myself. So ashamed.”

“Ashamed?” Bard’s voice was incredulous. “Why? Because you turned your ankle?”

Thran shook his head. “Because I am nothing like your Rahmiel. Nothing at all. And I am so sorry. Forgive me.”

Bard scooted forward on the sofa to enfold Thran in his arms. Thran wrapped arms around Bard and buried his face in the crook of Bard’s neck, and tried to swallow down guilt, shame, helplessness. Hands rubbing softly against his back tried to soothe him, but they intensified his dismay more than allayed it.
“You can’t give up the pointe shoes, then.”

Thran shook his head.

The ribs under his hands flexed in a long exhale. “Do what you have to do. Just... don’t hurt yourself so badly that you can’t dance. The rest of us can survive that. You can’t.”

Whether Bard knew it or not, his stark assessment was likely the only thing that could penetrate the depths of his madness. He had to take care, or he would lose much more than a role in a single ballet – all roles in all ballets going forward. Then the best he could hope for would be to live vicariously though the work of students and colleagues. He felt a little better, for his single-mindedness paused for however briefly, considering a future without dance practice, much less performance. He took a deep breath, and eased away until he could meet Bard’s eyes.

“You are right. I will be very careful, and very cautious.”

“And you will rest,” Bard added firmly. “Are you planning to go to the studio tomorrow? Because if you are, I intend to hide your car keys.”

Thran sighed. “I will not dance, though I intend to do as much of my barre as does not stress my ankle. I should ring Lettie and Irmo, and inform them. Lettie tells me that the PR campaign for the ballet begins, so perhaps there is something I can do there.”

“I don’t envy you those conversations,” Bard gave him a pained look. “Lettie’s one thing, but Irmo...”

“He will be furious,” Thran agreed. “I should ring them sooner rather than later, given the hour.”

“Go ahead and talk to them. I’ll clean up my stuff in the solarium, then get supper started,” Bard said. “When you called from the driveway, I scattered a few feathers getting out there. I might need them, so I want to get them off the floor before they get trampled.”

“I understand, my saint. And that you understand me, support me... I am most grateful. I will not abuse your trust.”

Bard gave Thran’s braid a tug, and brushed a kiss on Thran’s hair before he got up and carried the tea tray into the kitchen. When he was out of sight, Thran winced. It was one thing to say that he would not abuse his husband’s trust. It would be entirely another to keep the dance from abusing him.
Cups and saucers into the dishwasher, tea tray into the butler’s pantry, leftover cheese and fruit into the fridge, crackers into plastic bags and then into the pantry...

Tidying did not bring Bard the solace of order and peace that it usually did.

He went into the solarium to collect the feathers that had scattered when he’d bolted outside at Thran’s call, carefully tucking them into their bags and boxes. Rahmiel remained in view, poised in his landing; his wings were too delicate to be covered with anything, even gossamer spider silk.

It had been tricky and frustrating to figure out how to anchor Rahmiel’s feathers – the sheets of high-density foam he’d fastened to the wing armatures had not been rigid enough, so the feathers had flopped this way and that when Bard had tried to set them in place. Foam core board hadn’t worked either; it was too rigid to bend, which forced the feathers into a flat array rather than a realistic, three-dimensional one. In frustration, he’d wandered out to the barn to clear his head. A lot of the stuff he’d used throughout the renovation was piled in a tangle and a twist, because he’d been too intent on completing the house for his family to arrange his materials with his usual neatness. He’d have to remedy that before the barn would be a proper workshop again. A huge pile of paint cans, some empty, was over there, and a stack of plate glass left over from repairing windows was on the workbench. Buckets of joint compound, tubs of plaster repair, and pots of window glazing were scattered willy-nilly among the paint cans. He’d nudged aside a box full of tubes of bathroom caulk and aerosol cans of...

Foam insulation?

Bard had found a piece of old window screen, cut a rough rectangle out of it, and sprayed the foam insulation over it. The stuff had bubbled and expanded, but within minutes had set into a rigid but light blob. It had been easy to ply a sheet rock knife to trim it into a sculpted shape. Bard had grabbed the two cans of foam insulation and the roll of screen wire, and hurried back to the solarium. Was it worth the risk to cut the sheets and boards of foam off the armature of Rahmiel’s wings, on the chance that maybe, just maybe, the screen and foam insulation would provide the stable base he needed to hold the wing feathers in place? If not, he’d have to replace everything he’d torn out...

Twenty minutes later, Bard had smiled in triumph. The thin screen had gone within the armature, the foam had gone on top, and when the foam had solidified he’d used a serrated steak knife to carve the excess away. Now, the feathers...

Success! The foam had held the feathers exactly in place! He’d used tiny squirts of more foam to seal each row, carved away the excess, and gone on to the next row. It hadn’t taken long to finish the first wing, though it’d seemed otherwise. Feeling more confident, he’d placed most of the feathers for the second wing before he’d received Thran’s call.

Looking at Rahmiel now... maybe he’d used unorthodox means to fledge the angel, but the resulting organic sweep of wings matched what Bard saw in his imagination. This was the best sculptural model he’d ever made.

Why, then, was his stomach still tight?

He passed through the sitting room, on his way to start supper in the kitchen. Thran was still stretched out on the sofa, mobile in hand as he talked. His tone was calm, but his body was a disconsolate slump, his head was propped up on the arm of the sofa, and he rubbed his forehead as if he had a headache. If he talked to Irmo, he probably did have a headache. Bard didn’t linger to overhear the conversation.

By the time he reached the kitchen, Bard’s stomach had tightened even more.

He opened the fridge to pull out his old staple, chicken, cut it into small bits, and scraped it into a bowl. A quick hoisin sauce went in the bowl to coat the chicken, then Bard put the mixture into a pan to roast in the oven. He started a big pot of brown rice, chopped up veg, and set the table. A bowl of mixed fruit salad went on the table, then Bard got the big skillet ready to stir fry the veg. When the chicken and rice were almost done, he called up to the children.

“Ten minutes to supper, all! Wash your hands!”

“Already?” Legolas appeared at the top of the stairs. “I thought you were going to call the sous chefs?”

Bard had been grateful for the time by himself in the kitchen, forcing him to focus on something other than his unsettled state of mind. It hadn’t calmed him, though, and he was no closer to understanding what needled him. He kept his upset out of his voice, though, when he answered Legolas.

“I was on a roll. Round up the rest of the clan, and come on downstairs.”

“Okay, Bard.” Legolas disappeared, so Bard stuck his head into the sitting room.

“Supper’s almost ready,” he said, when Thran looked up. His husband met his gaze with a pale smile. He looked so subdued that the knot in Bard’s stomach tightened a little more. “I’ll get everything on the island, then I’ll give you a hand while the children load up. Or I can help you to your chair, and make a plate for you.”

“I will manage,” Thran replied quietly.

A tall, pale dancer was no more settled than Bard was.

Veg went in the skillet, chicken and rice went on the counter, and as the children came down, the stir-fried veg went beside the chicken. The children filled their plates; Thran followed slowly and gingerly, favoring his ankle, and he didn’t linger over making his supper. He sat silently, listening to the uncharacteristically muted conversation that passed back and forth, but he didn’t engage in it. He wasn’t the only quiet one – Sigrid simmered, staring at her plate as if she wanted to melt it into the table, and Tilda looked back and forth between everyone, aware of the tension but unwilling to counter it. Legolas and Bain murmured to each other, and at length Legolas braved the silence to tell his father of his excellent results on today’s pre-algebra quiz. Brightening, Thran congratulated his son and Bain on their success, which lightened the children’s mood. Why did it worsen the knot in Bard’s stomach?

“Mr. Rohan gave me a letter to give you,” Tilda murmured.
“Did he?” Bard managed a smile for his youngest. “Is it to tell me how well you’re doing in your new art class?”

“I don’t know,” Tilda shook her head. “He said it was important, though, to make sure I gave it to you.”

Before Bard could say that he’d look at it as soon as they got through supper, Tilda had slipped out of her chair and gone to find her backpack. She trotted back with an envelope in her hand. It had the formal school logo and address in the upper left corner, and his name neatly typed on the front.

“It looks very official,” Bard observed, turning the envelope over, then back again. He unsealed it and shook out the single page inside.

It was a tax receipt for his donation to the Follies silent auction – a donation of four hundred dollars.

Bard’s mouth fell open.

“What is it, Da?” Bain asked in a worried voice. “Is something wrong?”

Four hundred dollars? Four hundred? Someone had bought his sketch for four hundred dollars?

Bard closed his mouth. His eyes fell on Thran, who gazed back warily.

“Um... you didn’t... buy my Follies sketch, did you?”

Thran’s face was mystified. “No. You asked me not to bid on it, so I did not.”

Bard smothered a reverent but profane exclamation. “Um... someone bought it for... four hundred dollars.”

The atmosphere turned electric as everyone’s eyes flew to Bard. The boys hooted in triumph, and Sigrid’s smiling eyes shone with pride. Tilda clapped her hands and exulted with her brothers.

“I am very happy for you, lyubov moya,” Thran said without hesitation. His smile was wide, warm, and affectionate, and his earlier withdrawal was forgotten. “And so, so proud of you.”

At those quiet words of affirmation, everything snapped into place. Of course Bard was unsettled! How could he not be?

“Thank you, cariad. And I owe you an apology. I’m sorry I didn’t give you the same support today as you just gave me, even though I said I would.”

If Thran regarded him with confusion, so did the children. “What is this?”

“I’m a sculptor, but with your encouragement and support, I’m going beyond that. I’m doing my sketches, and I’m adding feathered wings and hair to Rahmiel, and who knows what I’ll do after that? That’s what every good artist has to do – he has to risk going beyond the norm, or he’s just recycling what’s already been done before. You understand that, and you’ve supported all of my efforts to do that.”

The children looked even more confused. What Thran felt was less clear, but Bard pressed on.

“You’re an artist, too – a great one – so of course you have push Immortal to go beyond the norm. My risk is to give Rahmiel wings and hair so he’s unique. Yours is to dance on pointe so the Lord of the Underworld is unique, too – something no one’s seen before, and likely never will again. Now I understand why you want to take that risk, and why I should support you the way you’ve supported “Da, no!” Sigrid protested, all but erupting out of her chair. “You can’t say that! You can’t! He’ll hurt himself, he’ll –”

“Maybe he will,” Bard agreed, which made all the children gasp; Thran put his chin in his hand to regard Bard with incredulity. “Maybe he won’t. None of us wants him to hurt himself, but none of us has the right to dictate whether he takes that risk or not.”

“But what if he does hurt himself?” Sigrid argued fiercely. “What if –”

“What do Thran and I say to each of you every morning, when you get on the bus?” Bard asked.

“Do your best, just like always?” Tilda murmured, looking up at Bard.

“That’s right. That goes for Thran and me, too. So telling Thran not to do his best on his ballet is like telling me not to work metal because I might burn myself, or Tilda not to go into a more advanced art class because it might be hard, or Legolas not to try to get to the Olympics with his archery or fencing, or Bain not to try out for the soccer team, or Sigrid not to write a paper that makes a case for an unexpected premise.”

“But the pointe stuff is stupid!” Sigrid argued. “It’s stupid and unnecessary –”

“It’s not stupid, and it’s not unnecessary,” Bard said in a quiet but deliberate voice. “I know you’re worried about Thran, but your bigger worry is that if he hurts himself, then we’ll have to go back to a grotty apartment in the city, isn’t it?”

If the panic on Sigrid’s face was answer enough, the fear on Tilda’s was doubly so.

“B-b-but Lance Dunmont is there!” Tilda gasped.

“Shit!” Bain muttered, then clapped his hands over his mouth when Legolas stared at him aghast and tried to shush him. “Oh, gods, I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to say that –”

“Stop. Everybody stop.” Bard looked around the table. “All of you, take three deep breaths. Calm down.”

When everyone had, Bard leaned forward over his elbows folded on the table. “Nothing Thran does for Immortal will make us move from this house. Nothing. This house is ours. We have money, we have each other, we have everything we need to take care of each other. If Thran and I never work another day, we’ll still have more than enough. So there is no reason why Thran has to do less than his best to make Immortal the best.”

The children looked at each other, but Bard willed them to believe him when he met their gazes without flinching. When they were calmer, he met Thran’s eyes.

“I’ll still worry about what might happen if your body can’t handle the pointe dancing. But I understand and support why you have to try it. So do it. Just be smart about the cost. That’s all any of us have the right to ask.”

Thran sat with his fingers steepled over his mouth. As the children turned to regard him, he bowed his head to press his mouth against his folded fingers. He swallowed before he looked up with a crooked smile so full of love and appreciation that Bard gave himself a mental kick for not figuring this out sooner.
“I am quite overwhelmed, lyubov moya. I do not know what to say, other than thank you.”

“You’re welcome, cariad.” Bard gave Thran an equally crooked smile, then glanced at the children. “Everyone all right?”

“We won’t ever have to move away from here, then, right?” Bain asked.

“No,” Thran and Bard chorused.

“No matter what happens?” Tilda said in a very small voice.

“No,” Thran and Bard chorused again.

“You understand now, Legolas? Sigrid?” Thran asked softly. “You are all provided for. You will never go back to the grotty apartments. Here we are, and here we stay.”

“I understand, Papa. I’m glad. I love it here.”

“Sigrid?”

Their oldest child swallowed, still looking at her lap. “I... apologize to you, too, Ada. For being so scared of you getting hurt. Not just because of what it might mean to me, which was selfish, but because of what it would mean to you, too. And... I apologize to you, too, Da, because I was worried that you... hadn’t had time to get back to your art, and... that was selfish, too.”

“In a few weeks, I’ll officially be a working artist again, sweetness. The Follies piece was the prelude, and the main event begins with my show in just a few weeks. Everything’s coming together.”

Gods, he hoped that were true, and not just for Sigrid’s sake – for his own, too. But Sigrid looked up at him with a proud smile.

“It’s going to be wonderful,” she said firmly.

“It will be, yes,” Thran echoed, smiling at Sigrid. “Go into the solarium and look at Rahmiel, and then try to tell me otherwise.”

“You did the feathers?” Sigrid scrambled out of her chair, and disappeared into the sitting room.

“Did you?” Tilda looked up at Bard.

Smiling, he nodded. “Most of them.”

“I want to see, too.” Tilda followed her sister.

Bain gave Legolas a look and a shrug. “Come on – I want to see this, too.”

“Right behind you.”

Bard and Thran were left at an otherwise empty table. They shared a private smile, and then Thran shook his head, chuckling silently to himself.

“It still amazes me, this ability you have to conjure the worst disquiet into resolution. It always ends well.”

“I guess this is where I offer to bring you a dish of ice cream.”
“To end the supper well, too, of course,” Thran nodded. “I would like that, my saint. Coconut?”

“One scoop or two?”

“Just one. But with the chocolate syrup.”

Bard grinned as he got up to collect plates. “Living large at last, I see.”

Thran went to get up to help, but Bard waved him to stay in his chair. In a few seconds, the children tumbled back into the kitchen, exclaiming over Rahmiel’s feathered wings, which gratified Bard that his trial and error had produced such a good result. Bard put the children to work cleaning up the supper dishes, since he’d done all of the prep alone, so he and Thran retreated to the sitting room with tea and ice cream. As they sat side by side on the sofa, Bard squeezed Thran’s knee.

“I’m sorry I didn’t sort myself out sooner,” Bard exhaled.

Thran exhaled, too. “Your concern was not entirely misplaced.”

“How do you mean?”

“You called the dance my addiction when we had our fight, and today Sigrid said the same thing. You would not have told her that part of our fight, so she used that word on her own. To hear it twice means I must give it attention, no matter how ugly a word I find it. I worry that you both might be right. Some days... the difference between pursuit of the vision that an artistic muse bestows, and pursuit of a junkie’s next fix, is very small.”

Bard considered. “I have to say that’s true of my art, too, though I take physical risks only when I make the piece. You take yours very time you perform.”

“That is why, Bard, for my sake, you must not to return to your silence that came before our fight. I appreciate that you understand why we both take risks to make our art live. But please, continue to watch out for me. I have already ventured into the land of the obsessed once. Despite all I want for Immortal, I do not want to venture there again.”

Thran’s voice might be a low murmur so that the children didn’t overhear, but his expression was somber. Bard rubbed his husband’s thigh again in reassurance.

“I’ve got your back, angel. I might need yours before long, too. If my art finds an audience –”

“When your art finds an audience,” Thran inserted.

Bard shrugged acceptance. “Okay, when my art finds an audience, I’ll need you to help me through all that that entails. Keep me from making a fool out of myself.”

“We will see to each other,” Thran sighed, looking down at his dish of ice cream. “It is a great relief to have each other, because we will tell ourselves the truths no one else will.”

Thran’s kiss on Bard’s hair was soft, but still conveyed the depth of Thran’s emotion. Without conscious thought, Bard put an arm around Thran’s shoulders and hugged him close.

As long as they kept talking, they’d be all right.

* * *

"To end the supper well, too, of course,” Thran nodded. “I would like that, my saint. Coconut?”

“Just one. But with the chocolate syrup.”

Bard grinned as he got up to collect plates. “Living large at last, I see.”

Thran went to get up to help, but Bard waved him to stay in his chair. In a few seconds, the children tumbled back into the kitchen, exclaiming over Rahmiel’s feathered wings, which gratified Bard that his trial and error had produced such a good result. Bard put the children to work cleaning up the supper dishes, since he’d done all of the prep alone, so he and Thran retreated to the sitting room with tea and ice cream. As they sat side by side on the sofa, Bard squeezed Thran’s knee.

“I’m sorry I didn’t sort myself out sooner,” Bard exhaled.

Thran exhaled, too. “Your concern was not entirely misplaced.”

“How do you mean?”

“You called the dance my addiction when we had our fight, and today Sigrid said the same thing. You would not have told her that part of our fight, so she used that word on her own. To hear it twice means I must give it attention, no matter how ugly a word I find it. I worry that you both might be right. Some days... the difference between pursuit of the vision that an artistic muse bestows, and pursuit of a junkie’s next fix, is very small.”

Bard considered. “I have to say that’s true of my art, too, though I take physical risks only when I make the piece. You take yours very time you perform.”

“That is why, Bard, for my sake, you must not to return to your silence that came before our fight. I appreciate that you understand why we both take risks to make our art live. But please, continue to watch out for me. I have already ventured into the land of the obsessed once. Despite all I want for Immortal, I do not want to venture there again.”

Thran’s voice might be a low murmur so that the children didn’t overhear, but his expression was somber. Bard rubbed his husband’s thigh again in reassurance.

“I’ve got your back, angel. I might need yours before long, too. If my art finds an audience –”

“When your art finds an audience,” Thran inserted.

Bard shrugged acceptance. “Okay, when my art finds an audience, I’ll need you to help me through all that that entails. Keep me from making a fool out of myself.”

“We will see to each other,” Thran sighed, looking down at his dish of ice cream. “It is a great relief to have each other, because we will tell ourselves the truths no one else will.”

Thran’s kiss on Bard’s hair was soft, but still conveyed the depth of Thran’s emotion. Without conscious thought, Bard put an arm around Thran’s shoulders and hugged him close.

As long as they kept talking, they’d be all right.

* * *
The rest of the evening passed smoothly. The atmosphere was lighter, and the children worked on their homework and got their showers without upset. Thran stayed on the sofa to rest his ankle, so Bard brought the refrozen peas to ice his ankle for a few more minutes. Thankfully, the swelling had gone down, and the bruising looked minimal. After his shower, Thran wrapped it with the elastic bandage for support while he slept, and seemed to sleep through the night without disturbance. The next morning, he awoke refreshed, and followed Bard downstairs to start the children’s breakfasts and lunches.

“How does it feel this morning?” Bard queried as they laid out the bread on their waxed paper sheets.

“A little tight, a little sore, but only a little,” Thran replied, coming behind Bard with the packages of ham and turkey. “I could dance on it if I had to, but better that I refrain from most exertion today. Tomorrow, it will be fine.”

“So you’ll be at the studio today, or here?”

“I will go there. I can help with the chorus, or answer costume questions, or set design questions, or likely many other kinds of questions.”

“The fount of all knowledge,” Bard teased. “Just stay away from cryptic couplets, or they’ll call you the Delphic oracle.”

Chuckling, Thran said, “That would only raise more questions, and then nothing would get done.”

“I’m sure.”

“You go to the school today to help the art classes?”

Bard nodded. “I’ll seal the half bath floor tiles before I go, so I can grout when I come back.”

“You seal them so that the grout does not stick to the tiles, yes?”

“That’s right. I’ll have to do it again once the grout’s dry, but this first coat will keep the grout from dulling the finish.”

“A good precaution. I like how the tiles shine so well, like ice.”

“Grout today, seal tomorrow... I hope to get the sink and toilet back in there tomorrow night, so Friday you can have the company back here if you want.”

“If we must wait until Monday, we will survive.”

“I hope Saturday I can have you and the children help me with the hall chandeliers. Mostly I need help to support them while I figure out the spacing between them. And spotters are always good when you’re trying to work thirty feet off the floor. Not the thing to do when I’m in the house alone.”

“No,” Thran agreed, adding cheese to Sigrid’s sandwich. “Please, do not do that.”

“I won’t. I want to get the bedroom and the third floor landings painted, since we won’t paint the main room until the sofa gets here, because we have to match the paint. And clean up the pecan paneling in the sitting room. That just takes a lot of oil soap and elbow grease. Then I’ll finally get to
“I admit I am eager to start work on the solarium,” Thran gave Bard a smile. “With the screens and lamps, and then Sam’s plants, it will be wonderful. But do not exhaust yourself, Bard. We have time.”

“I’m pushing to get done before my show, because if my show is a success, I want to be the artist full time again, angel. Just like you miss the dance when you don’t do it, I miss the art when I don’t do it. Still, it’s a kind of art to turn the house into what we want it to be. I enjoy that.”

“I think we should get the floors redone in the hall, main room, and dining room before the sofa arrives. It is very large, and solid, and will be hard to move, even if it can be divided into pieces to move it.”

“That’s a good idea. The hall steps should get done at the same time. Let’s hope we don’t have to spend a night in a hotel, or camped in the sitting room while the finish dries. I think the process has come a long way in the past few years, so maybe it can go down and dry all in one day now.”

“We will adjust. If we must stay in a hotel, we will find someplace to visit on a day trip, and make a holiday of it.”

“That’d be fun,” Bard nodded. “I’ll make some calls in a day or so about the floor. Once I paint the landings, we can schedule that any time the workmen can come.”

“So it progresses,” Thran nodded.

Bard gave Thran a grin as he brought out the fruit for the children’s lunches. “Do you think you can learn to live in a house rather than a construction site?”

“I think I will manage well,” Thran’s lips curved up in a sly smile. “Perhaps I will find more opportunities to seduce my husband after the children go to school when he does not work so hard on the house.”

“I’ll be out in the barn to work on the art.”

“Even better. What is it you call it – my grunge kink? I will have the chance to show you just how much I savor grungy welders.”

Bard grinned. “If you go too far with that, you’ll end up a grungy dancer.”

Thran hummed, ogling Bard up and down. “Such a hardship? I do not think so.”

Bard edged around the kitchen island until it was between him and Thran. “I think I’d better stand over here for a while.”

“It will not save you.” Thran followed Bard to press a kiss on his neck, and fondle his glutes. “I will restrain myself now, but when you are back in the barn, I will not. Be ready.”

“Hmmmm, cleaning the barn just moved higher on the to-do list,” Bard teased.

“Good. Where are the children? They are late today.”

“You’re right. I’ll go roust them if you check the porridge.”

Legs and Bain came down the stairs just as Bard went to run up, and he heard both of the girls rummaging, so with a call to breakfast, Bard went back to the kitchen. Tilda and Sigrid soon appeared, breakfast was consumed, the children went to the bus stop with both fathers in tow, and Bard and Thran walked slowly back. Thran headed upstairs to collect his things for his day at the UVB studio, and Bard shed his boots to paint tile sealer on the marble. He was about a quarter of the way through when his mobile rang.

“Sean Kelso here, Mr. Bowman.”

That was the police officer who had been with them at the Follies last Saturday. “Good morning, Officer Kelso. I left you a message last Sunday.”

“You did, and I’m sorry for not returning your call before now. But I followed through with your suggestion about checking the local gangs about your husband’s attacker. It was a good one – our boy’s been in contact with two of them.”

Bard scrabbled to put down his small brush, and hurried upstairs to flag down Thran. “Has he? Does anyone know what he’s up to?”

Bard put his hand over the mobile speaker to mouth to Thran, “Lance has been seen.”

“He was looking to join either of them, but the first has had a rash of trouble, and frankly thought our boy was a plant from a rival, so they turned him down flat. The second one is smaller, on the way up, so they’re recruiting, and was more amenable. We passed the word to both factions that this kid is in big trouble with both sides of the gang world in the city, which is a poison they don’t need. They also know that if they can deliver the kid to us, we’ll look kindly on some of their concerns. I hope that’ll cut down on the safe harbors our boy can hide in.”

“So he’s in the area, at least some of the time. Do you know if he’s staying here?”

“I don’t have much to tell you about that, Mr. Bowman. But my take is that he’s looking for a spot, and I can fathom why as well as you can. We’re on the lookout for him in abandoned barns, houses, that kind of thing, in case he decides to squat. Just be watchful, and don’t let any of your family go anywhere alone. The boy might be most interested in your daughter, but it’s clear he’ll take a shot at whichever one of you he can along the way.”

“We’ve been careful,” Bard assured the officer. “We’ll continue to be. Did any of your contacts say whether he’s armed or not?”

“Not so far as they could see. That the best we can do for now. We’ve got people actively looking for the boy, so I hope we’ll have better news soon.”

“I appreciate that, Officer Kelso. I’m glad I could help with a suggestion.”

“So am I. I’ll let you know when more develops.”

“Thank you, sir. Goodbye.”

“What did he say?” Thran asked excitedly, so Bard quickly relayed everything that Officer Kelso had told him.

“So he is still at large, but more people are on the watch for him,” Thran mulled. “So progress of a sort.”

“A bit.” Bard exhaled. “I know what he said about not going anywhere alone, so do you want me to drive you to the studio? I’ll head to the school after that, come back here, then come get you when you’re ready?”
Thran rubbed the back of his neck. “I suppose that would be prudent, but... suka blyad, so much annoyance on the account of a single angry boy! I think we will be all right, me to go to the studio, and you to go to the school. You will watch me leave here, and I will call you when I am on my way home so you can watch for me to arrive. And I do not think the boy will be so foolish as to try to tackle you. You are too strong for him by far.”

“As long as he isn’t armed,” Bard amended. “But since Officer Kelso says he doesn’t seem to be, I think we’ll be all right. I just have to remember to be careful when I go out to the barn. I blundered out there yesterday, and never thought once that he might lurk about.”

Humming in concern, Thran offered Bard a wince. “Because you were in the arms of your muse. Please, at least look when you go outside, yes? The artist’s reverie is just the thing to offer Lance the moment he needs.”

“You’re right. Mab i ast, you’re right about this being such a pain. I’ll put a note on the mudroom door so I don’t fly out there without thinking first.”

“A good idea. Now, I am almost ready to go to the studio, so I will make myself a lunch while I wait for you to seal the rest of the tile. Then we can leave together.”

“That’d be great, angel. Won’t take me long. I’ll get back to it.”

Bard took his usual pains, but painting the sealer over the tile took little time, and soon he and Thran ventured outside.

“I want to stop on the way home from the school and get some garage door openers,” Bard told Thran as they locked the house door. “I can put those in this weekend when there are a lot of us around.”

“Is it complicated to do that?” Thran asked.

Bard shook his head. “There’s one in there already, but it’s never worked. Jerry wasn’t the best at keeping things up when he got into trouble. I looked at that one, and the mountings are okay, just the unit needs replacing. So I’ll get three and a lot of angle iron to hold them, and then we won’t have to get out of the vehicles to move them in and out.”

“That would be safer, and a welcome luxury on rainy days,” Thran observed. “I leave that to you, lyubov moya, but I will be glad to provide cheap labor to help the Clan Ffyrnig general contractor this Saturday.”

Chuckling, Bard gave Thran a quick kiss as they headed to the carriage house. “You may be sorry you offered. There will be three to install.”

“I am sure that I can think of ways for you to reimburse me for my efforts,” Thran teased back. “Now, we are off, and we are leaving, too.”

Bard hauled up the two bay doors. “Do your best, just like always.”

“And you. See you soon, my saint.”

“You, too, angel.”

They traded hugs, then got the vehicles out of the carriage house. Once Bard closed the doors, Thran armed the security system. Thran offered a wave from behind the wheel of his SUV as Bard got into his truck, and they headed down the lane.
Bard saw Thran into the UVB parking lot, then continued to the children’s school. Today he would help Theodred in a couple of his classes, Tilda’s included. His daughter greeted him with an excited wave when she came in, and he had a good time working with her and the other students on Theodred’s lesson about perspective. His second class was for older students well versed in clay sculpture, which he enjoyed a great deal. One or two had an innate sense of the material, but he enjoyed watching them all work on their pieces. When class was over, he had a few minutes’ chat with Theodred on the success of the April Fool’s Follies.

“How did the petition for your urban arts class turn out?”

Theodred’s grin was delighted. “Better than all of us expected. We got six hundred signatures! I’ve already told Headmaster L’Eärendil, so he’s agreed to look at a plan for the class. Diana Glorfindel’s excited about it, too, so she’ll help me. She offered to teach some of the painting sections.”

“That’s great!” Bard congratulated the young art teacher. “The more art, the merrier.”

“Absolutely,” Theodred nodded. “And congratulations on your sketch selling so well. We had several big sellers this year.”

“So you know who bought it? Not that it matters, but I’m curious.”

Theodred grinned. “I think the Gondors bought it. They both really liked it. It had a nice medieval vibe to it with the swords, the queen and her knight, courtly love, and all that. A great piece.”

“I’m... honored,” Bard grinned crookedly. “That’s a great compliment, when your subjects like your work enough to buy it.”

“Agreed. So, you’ll be in next Wednesday?”

“I’ll be here, Theodred. I enjoy being with the children, and being around any kind of art.”

They discussed the couple of sculpture students that Bard had noticed for a minute or two, then Bard bid Theodred goodbye. He made a run to the homeowners’ mecca that had the garage door system he’d decided would work for their carriage house, and headed home with the mechanics as well as enough heavy angle iron to hang the drive units. He did remember to look carefully around him before he got out to put the truck in the carriage house, but he got that done, the door openers stowed on a shelf, and into the house proper without problem. With a few taps on the keypad, the security system was armed.

A quick lunch went down his throat, then he opened the tub of grout and carefully filled the gaps between the marble tiles, wiping off as much excess as he could so as not to mar the tile surfaces. Once that was done, he had three hours before the children and Thran would be home, so he patched the plaster dings in the second and third story landing walls. The ceiling above the third floor landing was in decent shape, so he primed it with a long roller. Sand the patches, paint the ceiling, prime the third floor landing walls and woodwork. At least he didn’t have to scrape this woodwork; he’d replaced the cheap pine trim with nice oak way back in December, when Thran had first brought Legolas to fence in the ballroom. That was four months ago, but it seemed far longer, given how much everything had changed since then. It gave Bard something to smile about as he wielded his paintbrush.

His mobile chimed, alerting him to the children’s impending arrival. He hurried to prime the last little bit of the wall, then headed out to the bus stop –

Wait, take a careful look outside... okay, all clear. So off he jogged. He was late, but the made it to The small, curly blonde mimicked grabbing handfuls of hair and pulling it in frustration. “Oh, Bard, everything that could have gone wrong with that dratted thing did! If it looked half as elaborate as the trouble it caused, it would have been twice the size. Never, ever, ever, do I want to do anything like it again! But thank all the gods, the client was happy with it, and paid on the spot, so I’m relieved.”

“Some of them go like that,” Bard agreed, grinning in commiseration. “I hope the next one’s an easy one. Tilda loves her sun catcher, by the way. It’s hanging in the window of her room.”

“Oh, I’m glad. She got the sunflower, right?”

“That’s the one.”

“It’ll look better than a real one when the sun hits it. I hope she enjoys it. Sam told me you’re working on a sculpture already? That’s great – and I’ve seen two of your interviews on TV for your upcoming show. So exciting!”

“It’s coming up,” Bard widened his eyes in exaggerated anticipation. “I’m trying to get most of the house done by then, so I can start full time in the barn. Not too much more left to do.”

They chatted briefly about their various home projects until the bus came, then each collected their quartet of children to head home. Tilda was excited about seeing Bard in her art class today, and Sigrid was happy about doing well on a pair of tests. The boys, however, were a bit subdued.

“Got something to tell you at home,” Bain leaned close to whisper while Sigrid got Tilda to tell her about what she and Bard had done in her art class. “Sig knows. Don’t want Til to hear.”

That meant it was about Lance.

Bard gave Legolas a look, who nodded when they met eyes. So the boys were both in on this. Neither looked particularly worried, so Bard banked his concern. He let them all in the house, and the usual scramble to shed jackets and shoes and backpacks and lunch bags flurried between the mudroom and kitchen.

Bard’s mobile chimed again. Thran. He was leaving the UVB studio, and would be home in about twenty minutes. Bard relayed that to the children as Tilda and Sigrid got the cheese and crackers ready. He gestured the boys back into the mudroom.

“Can your news wait until your Papa gets home?” he asked Legolas.

The boys traded considering looks. “I think so,” Legolas offered. “It’s just twenty minutes. There’s nothing about to happen, if that’s what you mean.”

“Then sit tight. Your Papa will want to hear it, too, so you’ll have to say it just the once.”

“Okay, Bard,” Legolas whispered back. “One of my mates at school told me something, and I told Bain and Sigrid before Tilda met us to catch the bus.”

“I’ve got some news, too,” he confided. “So we’ll get it all sorted soon.”

“Okay, Bard; okay, Da.”

The boys came out of the mudroom and made a beeline for the plate of cheese and crackers with Tilda none the wiser. Bard followed after them, snared a piece of cheese for himself, and contented himself to wait by asking the children about their school day. He watched the three older children, but none of them seemed particularly distressed, so he decided that whatever the boys had to tell him, it wasn’t critical.

Then again, everything related to Lance Dunmont’s whereabouts and intentions where critical to Clan Ffyrnig.

Bard hoped that today’s traffic between the UVB studio and home was light.
Chapter 104

Chapter Summary

Despite a sore ankle, the angel makes good progress on his ballet.

Chapter Notes

Hi, all! It's Olympics season, so work on this story will be spotty for the next couple of weeks as I get my biennial fix of world sport. I will be back regularly at the keyboard once all the excitement is over. Please join me in cheering on all the athletes, regardless of country. They've all worked so hard to get to Rio, so best wishes, deep salaams, and much love to them all ❤️!

For once, Thran wasn’t thrilled that the morning traffic was light, and wouldn’t keep him from reaching the UltraViolet Ballet studio in good time. He didn’t savor the uproar that would ensue only moments after he’d walk through the company’s doors, when Irmo would erupt in exasperation because Thran’s ankle would not allow him to dance safely today. While Irmo had been the one to urge Thran to attempt dancing on pointe, he did not understand that just because he wanted it to happen did not make it happen. So much more strengthening, so much more practice, remained before Thran would be fit to dance those crucial seven minutes in Immortal’s Act III, Scene i.

How many years did ballerinas labor to learn and refine this delicate art?

He had five months.

Listening to Irmo castigate him for carelessness or inattention wouldn’t help anything, but knowing the tirade was coming allowed Thran to put it aside. The harder part to ignore would be Lettie’s silent worry. UVB’s fortunes rode on Immortal, and Immortal rode on Thran, and any injury he suffered made her nervous. He would reassure her that his ankle would plague him only a day or two, and he would be quickly back to work without any repercussions. During that day or two, he’d be available to help her with the logistical demands of bringing Immortal to life, which she would appreciate.

Still, just because he knew what awaited him and had a plan to manage it did not make him look forward to it.

He pulled into the UVB parking lot, took a careful look about him before he got out of the SUV, and walked quickly inside. Once he was within, he slowed his pace to keep his ankle as stress-free as possible. He was early, and went right to Lettie’s office, where he found Ori already talking to the company’s artistic director.

“Good morning, Thran!” Lettie greeted with a relieved smile.
“Hi, Thran!” Ori offered his usual bright and open smile.

“Good morning, Lettie, Ori,” Thran gave both a warm smile.

“How’s your ankle this morning?” Lettie queried, looking at his foot.

“Much better. I will modify my barre this morning, and I will not dance, but I will be back to my usual in a day or so. Until then, I am your willing assistant to deal with the logistics and whatever else you would have me do.”

“I’ve got lots of that,” Lettie agreed with a relieved expression. “Ori and I were girding our loins to endure Irmo’s displeasure when he arrives this morning.”

“I considered that on my drive in, too,” Thran offered his companions a wry smile as he sat beside Ori.

“Lettie called me last night to warn me.” Ori cradled his knee in his hands and leaned back in his chair to consider thoughtfully. “At some point, Thran, you’ll be in the middle of the effort to publicize the ballet, talk to donors and sponsors, and so forth. A lot of your part of the choreography is in good shape, so I wondered if we could cast this as a chance to get an early push on the publicity? Irmo won’t like that you can’t dance today, but we might divert him if he knows you’re helping to get the word out about Immortal. He can’t say that isn’t a good use of your time.”

“That’s a good idea, Ori,” Lettie nodded. “I can head Irmo off if I tell him that I’ve wanted to get Thran more involved with that, and this is the perfect opportunity to do so.”

“I agree,” Thran nodded. “We have the principal dances mostly choreographed, and Irmo has several more things to decide about the troll market scenes. We need to get Círdan and Rada to refine his vision with the set and the costumes, so that the characters take better shape, and then Irmo can refine his choreography even more.”

“All good points,” Lettie nodded. “Rada’s nearly done his final sketches. I’ll call him and see if he can come in with those in the next day or so. He’ll have more of the troll market costumes to do once he sees what Irmo’s put into place for the modern dancers. And Círdan and I need to get over to the Imladris Academy to look at the space, and talk about how to set up the internships for the students. So we have many things to work on, which should mollify Irmo a bit. You dancing isn’t the major focus right now.”

“Just so,” Thran agreed.

“I have to ask, though,” Lettie leaned over her desk, and unconsciously lowered her voice. “About the pointe work. Is it in or out?”

Thran sat back with a sigh. “I will be honest with both of you, though this goes no further than this room. Mme. Morgelle is not sanguine. I do not yet have the strength to keep my height and weight from unbalancing me when I am on pointe. Even at strength, my balance will be precarious – if I am even the slightest bit off center, I cannot hold the pose, as I confirmed yesterday.” Thran circled his foot gingerly. “I must add much more strength work for my ankles and legs – flat work, not pointe work – to prepare as best I can. This does not mean that I think it is impossible. If it is at all possible, I will do it. I give myself another month to strengthen myself, and then I will decide.”

“Irmo acts like it’s a done deal,” Ori murmured.

Thran nodded. “If it is not, then he will have to live with it. I would rather dance Death on demi-pointe than not at all.”
“So would I,” Lettie nodded. “More to the point, UltraViolet cannot afford for you to injure yourself so badly that you can’t dance.”

“I am well aware, and so I will take care. So for now, we have our plans. Come, let us look at our logistical efforts, to see what we should do first.”

The three bent their heads to the effort, and by the time Abebe and the rest of the company appeared for morning barre, they had a good idea of how to proceed. Thran changed into his dance attire, but made no secret of the wrap on his ankle as he took his place with the other dancers to begin. Still, he made sure his manner was relaxed and open as the dancers joined him, and so Abebe began. About half an hour into it, Irmo made his presence known with a lot of noise, but when he appeared in the studio with Ori close behind, he took in Thran with the other dancers, and the noise abruptly stopped. Thran nodded to him, but kept his place, and Irmo retreated with Ori whispering in his ear.

Good. Let Lettie and Ori take the brunt of Irmo’s irascibility this morning. Maybe they could blunt it by the time Thran finished his barre and yoga...

Then again, maybe not. When barre work was done, Thran remained in place for his yoga, but Irmo came with determined steps through the door and headed right for him. With perverse satisfaction, Thran upended himself into a handstand, lowered his legs into a split, and held the pose without wobble or strain. Irmo could talk to Thran’s feet if he chose, but Thran didn’t make that easy, either, tilting his split legs so that first one foot touched the floor at his back, then the other touched the floor at his front. He scissored his legs to split the other way, repeated the touches to the floor, planted his right foot over his head, and flowed upright.

“Good morning, Irmo,” Thran greeted with serene calm, internally smiling at Irmo’s exasperated expression and agitated posture. “I trust you are well.”

“And do I hear that you are not? You cannot dance today?”

“I turned my ankle in pointe class yesterday, yes. I will let it rest for the most part today and perhaps tomorrow, so that I do not make a simple twist a sprain or strain. Lettie tells me that she has very much for me to do to publicize the ballet, so this is a good time for me to help her. She has ambitious plans for the next few weeks. As I expected to be needed for them, anyway, this is a good segue.”

“I need you for the choreography!”

“You work mostly now on the extensive needs of the troll market scenes, yes? So much work remains there so that it is as spectacular as we all want it to be. So your place is there, and my place is with Lettie for a short time to bring Immortal to the world’s attention.”

Ori appeared through the doors, and hurried to Irmo’s side. “Good news, Thran, Irmo – Rada’s got final costume sketches for the principals done. And Círdan has his drawings of the set design. They’ll be in this afternoon, so we’ll need both of you to review them.”

Ori winked at Thran out of Irmo’s sight, so Thran followed the young man’s prompting at once. “Excellent! It will be good to see the world we create for Immortal become real, yes?”

That served to divert the choreographer into a better humor, and he went off with Ori to see when Lettie expected the set designer and costumer to arrive. Thran managed to complete his yoga and cooling stretches before he found himself swept into the ado. As he didn’t plan to dance further today, he changed to more comfortable jeans and shirt, and then sat down with Lettie to review the list of promotional activities that she’d planned. The list was crammed with the usual things – a fundraising dinner, a series of radio and television interviews, visits to donors, and so on. These performances had been a staple throughout Thran’s professional life, though for the state their focus had been to garner political glory rather than to raise money; here, in his adopted country, it was the reverse. Both were performances, regardless of what they hoped to accomplish, and they were necessary evils in a country where artistic endeavors received no state support.

Once again, Thran appreciated the chance he’d been given to leave a socialist state, and have a better life in a new country. This one was often confusing, frequently infuriating, and its inhabitants consistently fought amongst themselves with the ferocity of cats and dogs. It was not perfect. But it had made room for so many, he and his husband among them, and he appreciated his better life.

Still, Thran would not allow the unrestricted access to his family that the state had required. For how many fundraising events had he and Vileria been forced to trot out baby Legolas in one adorable outfit or another, the state’s shameless attempts to engage patrons through sheer cuteness and the mirage of a “traditional” family? Bard would’ve liked that no more than he, nor would he like the scrutiny their children would be subjected to in similar situations. He would understand why Thran would attend all of Immortal’s fundraising events alone.

Rada and Círdan arrived, the former with full-color costume sketches, and the latter with a three-dimensional model of the Immortal set design. Both reflected a great deal of thought and consideration as well as creative inspiration. Círdan’s set was a study in opposites. The mortal world was echoingly empty, stark lines, and little color beyond black, white, grey, and red – how ironic, for they were the colors of war and death, not life. The Underworld, land of the dead, in contrast, teemed with the color, complexity, and trappings of a thousand cultures. The reversal was intended, for one of the core themes of the ballet was to show how temporary and sparse the land of the living was in comparison with the ancient variety of the land of the dead. Even Rome, the living city that rested on the remains of so many kingdoms, both ancient and modern, would look pale compared to the Underworld with its countless layers of patina.

The set was round, and built on a rotating stage. The complex Underworld – what everyone had dubbed the troll market – covered two thirds of the circle. The remaining third was the sparse mortal world. This meant that all the set crew needed to do was to rotate the set to change the scene, rather than constantly dress and redress the same space. This would also provide for a much quicker and more elegant change, which in turn would detract far less from the audience’s belief in what they saw.

“This is brilliant,” Thran complimented Círdan. “Changes between the two sets will be easy and fast. My only concern is whether the Imladris auditorium can manage the mechanism to rotate the set.”

“I went out to the school to discuss this with their theatre department,” Círdan replied. He was a big, burly man with a deep, rumbling voice, and with his neatly trimmed brown and grey beard and shaggy hair he looked like a Viking seafarer. “They have a beautiful facility, but not a sophisticated stage such as you’d find in the city at the Met. But I have compensated for that. The stage will be a rotating platform, but it does not need a motor to turn it. The central gimbal will be the point of rotation, and the edge will be supported on wheels. All the set crew has to do to rotate the platform is to push it. It will take perhaps fifteen or twenty stagehands to provide enough strength, but that eliminates the need to mechanize it. Dressed in black, they will not be noticeable. This means a lower cost as well as a simpler design – both of those are good, and offer less chance of breakdown.”

“I like it very much,” Irmo nodded. “Such a simple, elegant design! Well done, indeed!”

“Thank you!” Círdan beamed at the mercurial choreographer’s praise. “There is more to the mortal side, as well – because it is so plain, we can make use of the school’s projection system to project images of different Underworld enclaves as Death leads the soldiers from the mortal surface. That gives us another way to suggest the vastness of the immortal realm. And during the battle sequences, we can also project different backdrops of the fighting, to suggest the violence of the fight – rearing horses, perhaps, or swarms of soldiers racing up hills, and so on.”

“Perhaps we can project film clips,” Ori suggested. “Little snippets of the battle, like those swarms of soldiers racing up the hill. That would give it a lot of life and motion.”

“I like that,” Irmo, Círdan, and Thran chorused, drawing laughter from the others.

“Yes, again, it simplifies the set without sacrificing the life,” Lettie nodded. “Perhaps some of the Imladris students could make the film loops as well as the static scenes?”

“We can ask,” Thran nodded. “Círdan, this is a wonderful set. Simple to manage, I hope simple for the high school students to build, and an elegant presentation.”

“Yes, yes, beautifully done,” Irmo nodded vigorously. “You have given more of the space to the Underworld without shorting the mortal world. That will work very well.”

The group discussed a few more particulars, but by and large the set design was well underway. Lettie and Círdan expected to talk to the Imladris theatre department on Friday to see if the design was within their capabilities.

Rada stepped forward with his sketches. The Maid was just as Thran envisioned her, all sweetness and grace in a short gown with long sleeves and embroidered bodice, its filmy skirt falling from the Empire waistline to a few inches below the knee. The Soldier uniforms were generic enough not to point to any specific culture, with trousers tucked into tall boots, and vaguely military tunics that could have been from any of a hundred cultures. There were peasant costumes for the few mortals who would attend the dead on the battlefield, all in dull, muted colors of grey, beige, off white, cream, and taupe, enough to show variety with little color. Small LEDs at the heart of each costume burned brightly when the mortal was alive, died when the mortal fell, and then settled to a low glimmer once the dead arrived in the Underworld. Their costumes slowly washed with more color in that kingdom.

Death’s costumes, however, were all stunning. The battlefield armor was silver highlighted in an otherworldly electric ultraviolet – a tongue-in-cheek visual pun on the name of the ballet company, perhaps? A thin, gauzy veil over Thran’s face removed all sense of mortality from the character. Armored gloves featured very elongated fingers, reminding Thran of ancient mandarins with their long fingernails.

“How easy will that be to dance in?” Thran questioned Rada, pulling at his lip dubiously. “It is a stunning design, but Death must move fluidly, as if His armor is his skin.”

“It will look metallic because the fabric has a very hard shine to it, but it’s a synthetic knit that’s lightweight and flexible. The plating is a molded material used to make costume armor, so it will look quite formidable yet be very lightweight. It will be easy to move in it.”

The headdress that went with the armor got a thorough discussion all its own. Thran had little to say about it, as he liked the spiky, alien design. His only concern was that the veil must not obscure his vision. Death could not stumble and fumble across the stage like a myopic teenager. Laughing at Thran’s analogy, Rada assured him that he would be able to see quite clearly, so the discussion moved on to Death’s other costumes.

Death’s costume to preside over the denizens of the Underworld was rich and elaborate, with a cream colored base richly embellished with glittering jewels and multicolored embroidery. He would be the brightest creature in His kingdom.

Then came the shocker – the costume Death would wear to woo the Maid. Rada had sketched two versions. Both featured gloves with elongated fingers, and a headdress that was less crown than device to make Thran’s face and head more elongated and alien. The difference between them was the body of the rest of the costume. One was a simple nude body stocking with a small loincloth. The other dispensed with the body stocking entirely, leaving only the loincloth to cover little more than Thran’s dancers’ belt.

“Either one makes a spectacle of me,” Thran teased the quiet costume designer. “Does Death seek to tempt the Maid to His side with sheer animal magnetism?”

“Very funny, your pun about sheer animal magnetism,” Rada grinned at Thran. “But I do have a reason for such a spare costume. Death will be at His most vulnerable in this scene with the Maid. He will not seek to scare her in His armor, or dazzle him in His robes of state. He will woo her only with what He is, not with trappings. So I drew the simple body stocking first, which would remove almost all features from the character. That perhaps is too stark, and so I considered the minimal one. If you intend to dance on pointe, Thran, then the minimal one will remove all distraction from it. Death throws Himself at the feet of the Maid he loves, he balances so precariously, he wavers this way and that, desperate for her regard. I quite liked that risk.”

“Don’t get me wrong,” Lettie spoke up. “This costume, or lack of one, would sell a lot of tickets because of the body in it. It would be sensational. But is it the right one? Does it make Death look too much like a mortal? I think it would be wise to keep more of the alien about Him.”

“I ask myself the same question,” Irmo nodded. “Sensation is one thing, valuable in its place. But I want the audience to see how different Death is from the Maid he woos. Though... I wonder – Death is the brightest creature in the Underworld – he glows brighter than his subjects, but not as brightly as the living. Could the body stocking be infused with an allover glow, yet one fainter than the glow of the living? Blue, like his armor? So the gloves and the pointe shoes and the crown would distort Death’s body proportions into the alien creature I seek, and the glow would reinforce that?”

“If not with lights, perhaps with fabric, or some combination of both...” Rada scribbled in his sketchbook. “Yes, I think that is a good solution. We will get the long, attenuated figure, and the alien netherworldliness, too. Let me consider that. Perhaps the body stocking could be painted with luminescent paint...”

“Yes, yes, I like that!” Irmo exclaimed. “Then we may add details to further delineate and accentuate Death’s figure, also!”

“I like that, too,” Thran agreed. “So we have a little work to do with this costume, but the others are well on their way.”

The group continued to work out details of the principal costumes, then Rada and Irmo went into a huddle to discuss costumes for the troll market. Círdan and Lettie began to bat ideas around about how to work with the school. There was little more that Thran could contribute to either discussion, so he checked his mobile. It was already past four-thirty, far later than he expected, which showed how engrossed he’d been in the exciting details Círdan and Rada had revealed. He made his exit, called Bard from the lobby of his imminent arrival, and set off for home, elated at the progress that the day had brought.

In twenty minutes, Thran pulled into the driveway of the Clan Ffyrnig home. Legolas and Bain came out as soon as Thran maneuvered the SUV in front of the carriage house; Bain hauled up the bay door, and Legolas pretended to be an airline ramp agent, waving his arms to direct Thran as he backed the SUV into its bay. He got out, laughing as Legolas and Bain continued to wave him forward through the bay door so that Bain could haul it back down.

“Hello, Legolas; Hello, Bain! You both have fine careers ahead of you as directors of planes!” he teased the boys, as Bard came through the mudroom door. “Hello, Bard!”

“Welcome home,” Bard greeted. “Before we go in, the boys have something to tell us.”

When the boys’ expressions turned serious, Thran sobered, too.

“A boy in my history class told me that he saw Lance at the Follies,” Legolas said. “Scottie said Lance was asking whether Sigrid attended the academy, and where she lived. He also said that one of his friends saw Lance talk to a couple of boys who’d caused a lot of trouble in the past.”

“Did either boy hear Lance say anything other than to ask where Sigrid lives?”

Legolas shook his head. “I asked Scottie that. Lance said he was supposed to meet Sigrid, but had missed her in the crowd. But the people Lance talked to didn’t know Sigrid, so he didn’t learn anything from them. Scottie didn’t know what happened after that.”

“We got a call from Officer Kelso this morning along the same lines,” Bard said. “Apparently Lance made a pitch to join a couple of the local gangs. The word’s gone around that Lance is no asset to anyone, and if the gangs turn him in, the police might cut them a little slack.”

Bain gulped. “Can’t the police grab him because he hurt Thran? And he threatened Sigrid? Everybody heard him. Isn’t that enough?”

“It would be, if they could catch him,” Bard exhaled. “Apparently catching him isn’t so easy.”

“Of course not,” Bain growled. “That creep has got it out for my sister, and nobody’s doing anything about it!”

“They aren’t doing nothing,” Bard consoled.

“Not at all,” Thran agreed. “But it is that adage in action – to find a needle in a haystack.”

“Exactly,” Bard went on. “Lots of places to look, but only one boy to find.”

“Maybe so,” Legolas shook his head. “It’s just... so frustrating.”

“Worse,” Bain growled, kicking the grass. “It makes me want to hit something.”

“Maybe a quick dash around the back yard with a soccer ball would help,” Bard suggested. “Might be good for all of us.”

“I just got off the soccer field,” Bain grumped. “I don’t need to kick any more soccer balls. I need to kick Lance Dunmont!”

“It’s hard to sit and wait,” Bard agreed, looping his arm around Bain’s shoulders. “Just hold on to your patience, boyo, and we’ll come through it all right.”

Bain ducked his head. “I don’t know how to do that, Da. That bas – creep is after my sister!”

Bard and Thran locked glances. “He is. But he’s alone, and we’re not. We’ve got the six of us, plus the police. As long as we stand together, Bain, Lance will have a very hard time getting through us.”
Bain let Bard jostle him into a little lighter mien, finally smiling, if only a little. Thran took heed of the exchange and nudged Legolas. “Just as you have proved, Legolas. You heard something from a boy at school, you passed it on to us, and we are forewarned. We will pass it on to the police, and they will be forewarned, too. Lance has no one to pass him information about anything.”

Legolas’s lips curved in a gratified smile as he took Thran’s bag for him. “I hope not, Papa.”

The boys were calm enough to walk into the house with their fathers, and Thran pulled the back of Bard’s shirt to keep him in the mudroom as the boys ran ahead.

“I assume we discussed this outside because of Tilda,” he said lowly as he hung up his jacket.

Bard nodded. “I don’t like keeping her in the dark, but she’s been so scared that I guess it’s better not to tell her.”

Thran hummed. “It is hard to know what to do.”

“It always is,” Bard shook his head as they came into the kitchen. “Did everything go okay at the studio today?”

“It did. Rada and Círdan came in with designs for the costumes and set, and both were amazing.”

As Bard opened the refrigerator, Thran perched on the stool at the end of the kitchen island to describe the afternoon’s excitement. Tension diffused as the conversation turned to more positive topics, and soon Tilda and Bain came in to begin the day’s sous chef duties. Sigrid came in long enough to give Thran a happy welcome before she headed upstairs with her homework. How self-possessed she was, able to smile and laugh and concentrate on homework despite the threat of an angry and vengeful boy intent on mayhem.

Exactly what satisfaction did Lance think he’d gain against Sigrid? No matter what he did to her, it would not restore his standings with the gangs he sought to join in the city. Why wasn’t he smart enough to cut his losses, return to Florida, and make a new start there?

Thran sighed. The more he learned of Lance Dunmont, the more foolish his actions became. Dumb, as the boys would call it. Yes... Lance might be dumb about going after Sigrid, but so far he was smart enough to stay out of police hands.

Thran didn’t want to think about what that said about either party.
Chapter 105

Chapter Summary

The saint's public debut draws near, but he still has time to bring beauty to his family's house. Meanwhile, the angel offers a new take on "tradition."

Bard watched Thran closely as he started supper. Was he still limping, or holding his arm so carefully against his chest? He was gratified to find no sign of discomfort. The arm brace was off now, and Thran moved easily about the kitchen to make a big salad for the table. While Tilda assembled individual cups of fruit and Bain made farro, Bard seasoned two pans of rainbow trout fillets with garlic, spices, and pecans, and stuck them in the oven to bake quickly. Flatware, glasses, and condiments went on the table, then everyone queued up by the kitchen island to fill their plates. Conversation around the table was animated and happy as Thran talked about the stage and costumes for Immortal, the children chatted about their day at school, and Bard described the day’s renovations. When Bard said he expected to have the half bath finished tomorrow, Legolas shook his head in amazement.

“Everything’s getting done so fast,” Legolas commented. “Every day, it’s like coming home to a new house!”

“Thank our master craftsman,” Thran agreed, offering a playful salaam to Bard at the other end of the table. “He will have us in a magic castle in no time.”

“I want to get as much done as I can before my gallery show, so I can get back to being a full time artist,” Bard explained, reddening at Thran’s praise. “I’ve got a big piece of renovation on deck for this weekend.”

He described the logistics of hanging the chandeliers in the central hall, and how he’d need everyone to help him with it.

“Even me?” Tilda perked up. “Finally! I’m always too small or too light or too young. What do I get to do, Da?”

“You’ll write down all the measurements,” Bard explained. “I’ll be on the scaffolding, and the rest of us will have to help hold things, but the measurements are very important so that we get everything at the right height.”

Tilda regarded Bard dubiously. “That doesn’t sound like much, just writing down a bunch of numbers.”

“There are three chandeliers all strung together, little doll. They all have to hang at the right height. If we don’t keep good track of all the measurements, the whole thing looks off, and it has to be done over. We don’t want everyone who comes into the hall to think it looks funny.”

“I didn’t think of that,” she admitted, brightening. “Okay, so I get to do something important at last.”

“So you do,” Bard grinned, glad that Tilda understood that her job wasn’t just a sop to make her feel important, but actually was important.
Before long, Sigrid and Legolas organized the supper cleanup, and then the children settled to their homework. Thran and Bard retreated to the sitting room to discuss the next steps of the renovation as well as the ballet until the children joined them to read the next bit of Harry Potter. The only reminder of their trouble with Lance came when Tilda went upstairs to take her shower; Bard left Officer Kelso a voice mail that summarized what Legolas had learned from his classmate. Once the children were tucked into bed, Bard and Thran were quick to make their rounds, set the security system, and enjoy a warm shower together. Again, Bard scrutinized Thran as they showered, but aside from the bruises still mottling his pale skin he seemed to be in no discomfort. His husband didn’t wrap his ankle before he got into bed, though he did carefully rub arnica on both wrist and ankle, but that was likely more to help his bruises fade more quickly than to relieve any pain. Once Bard turned off the light, he snuggled Thran in his arms.

“I think I am through with the arm brace,” Thran murmured, rotating his wrist experimentally.

“The ankle wrap, too, it seems,” Bard replied. “On the mend, then.”

“On the mend.”

“Good. I assume you still plan to take it easy on it tomorrow?”

Thran hummed in affirmation, then tsked. “Tcha, I forgot to look at Rahmiel today. Are his wings fully fledged now?”

“They’re the same as yesterday. I wanted to get the half bath along so the company can come back. Then I went into the school to help Theodred, and then I got on with the painting. I’m getting close to the end, Thran. I can taste it – half bath will be done tomorrow, the landings in another day or so, the chandeliers and maybe the garage door openers this weekend... The main room has to wait until the sofa comes in, so next week, I’ll scrub the sitting room paneling, and then finally get started on the solarium. That’ll be exciting. Then we can get the floors refinished. By the time my show comes around, the inside will be done, all but the main room and the solarium. We’ll be on to getting the outside painted, the gardens started, the barn up to snuff... I can’t tell you how excited I am that we’ll have two fulltime artists in residence – by June at the latest.”

Thran rolled over to kiss Bard thoroughly. “Everything about the house is beautiful, and grows more so every day. But please, my saint, you must make sure you finish Rahmiel’s wings, and his hair. He is such a vision. As popular as your sketches will be, he will be more so. I want the rest of the world to see him, and know what wonders you have yet to create.”

“He’ll be ready,” Bard replied, struck at the conviction in Thran’s voice, and humbled by it. “I want to do more pieces like him, too. How amazing would it be to do a life-sized one? Though I don’t know what I’d do for feathers – they don’t make ones big enough for him.”

“You will figure out what to do,” Thran said, kissing Bard again. “I am sure of it.”

Bard stroked Thran’s cheek. “Do you know how often I thank the gods for lousy apartment radiators, lazy-ass landlords, and nasty November rain? If you hadn’t been cold, wet, and pissed, I never would have met you that night, and everything that’s happened since would never have been.”

Chuckling low in his throat, Thran returned Bard’s caresses with his own. “The gods must be very amused at the perversity of mortals, then, because I thank them for the same things just as often. Out of bad pipes, bad landlords, and bad weather came grace, love, beauty, and happiness.”

“Quite the fairytale,” Bard rumbled. “One that I’ll do my best to keep going.”
“As will I, lyubov moya,” Thran breathed. “I love you. Sleep well, my saint.”

“I love you, too, my angel.”

Bard savored the slow caresses that Thran brushed over his skin, that he returned with his own, until warmth and comfort and love blurred into sleep.

* * *

The next three weeks raced by. Bard finished the half bath, which earned him admiring compliments from his family, as well as the UVB dancers when they resumed their practice in the ballroom on Friday. The walls of the second and third story landings got their coat of grey-green paint, and the wood trim was waxed to a warm glow to match the beautiful stained glass pocket doors to Bard and Thran’s bedroom.

The chandeliers went up in the central hall, an effort that took most of the day and all of the family to get the chain of three separate chandeliers properly spaced, wired, and hung. Despite the effort to erect so much scaffolding, then the tedium of repeated measuring and fitting, the end result was worth the trouble – three polished brass fixtures resplendent with candle bulbs brightened the open space beautifully. What a feeling of accomplishment it was when Bard and the boys dismantled the scaffolding and stowed it in the main room. Almost everything in the house that had required it was done.

The sitting room walls and coffered ceiling got a thorough scrub back to their original brightness, and a coat of paste wax to protect them. In the main room, Bard hauled all of the boxes that still hadn’t been unpacked up to the empty third floor room. The Indonesian bed frame and blue inlaid table that he’d bought at the junk shops so long ago went temporarily into the end of the ballroom. He painted the ceiling of the main room, stripped and cleaned the mahogany woodwork, and patched and primed the walls. Once Thran’s big sofa arrived, they’d choose a mantelpiece and a paint color to finish the room.

It was finally time for the last step in the restoration of the public rooms. Bard, Thran, and the children moved everything out of the sitting room and into the ballroom, then workmen arrived to clean, wax, and polish the inlaid floors. It took three days to restore so many – main room, dining room, sitting room, central hall, all of the stairs, and the second and third floor landings. Fortunately, the workmen staged their efforts so that the family didn’t have to move out, though no one wore anything but socks for the duration, and Thran’s company practiced at the UVB studios. Bard spent most of the time in the barn, tackling the mess that his years of absence and months of renovation work had generated. He was pleased to banish dirt and disorder, and prepare the tidied space for future work.

When the floor refinishers left in midafternoon, Bard left the barn and returned to the house. For the first time in a long while, the house was silent and still, and Bard was grateful that the children and Thran weren’t here. He didn’t have to explain the emotions welling within him, or speak of memories. It was a pretty April afternoon outside, and sunlight filtered in through clear windows, illuminating all that had been restored. How different it had been twelve years ago when Daphne had stood here beside him in the central hall, skeptically shaking her head at the disrepair around them when they’d first moved in with two small children. They’d had just two years of hope together. For ten years after her death, he’d been the one to shake his head, but in despair, wondering how he’d manage to rescue the house, the children, or himself from their dire situation. However improbably, five months ago, he and an ethereal Russian dancer had met, fallen in love, and begun a new life here, rescuing themselves and their children, as well as the house along the way.

For just the briefest moment, Daphne seemed to stand beside Bard in the central hall again, still shaking her head – but without skepticism. This time, she smiled with appreciation and pride because he’d coaxed so much beauty out of the ruin, and made a new life for the family she’d had to leave behind. She was happy for him, and the new life he’d made.

“Thank you, my darling,” he whispered, smiling. “I love you, too.”

As sense of her faded, Bard appreciated anew how Hope the Lope basked in the glow from elegant chandeliers and light filtered through stained glass. Iron balusters echoed the same color as the floor’s dark inlays, and the fluted glass globes on the balusters gleamed. Underfoot, the restored floors were silky smooth, and shone like satin. He wandered through the adjoining rooms, where restored woodwork once again revealed carving long hidden under layers of sloppy paint, and beautiful plaster ceilings once again looked like fancifully decorated cakes. The sitting room was a warm and cozy nest; the half bath was a hidden jewel.

It didn’t matter that the rooms were emptier than not. Bard, Thran, and the children would have the best time prowling the junk shops for material treasures. The rooms were already full of Clan Ffyrnig’s laughter and love, and the heart of the house was restored.

So was Bard’s.

* * *

The day of Bard’s art show grew near. Though one room still remained to be restored – the solarium that everyone in the family so eagerly awaited – Bard turned more of his attention to his art. At Bilbo’s request, he stockpiled sketches, because offering unframed sketches for sale at his show would attract buyers who couldn’t go to the expense of framed ones. He sketched the restorers working on the floors, Legolas at his fencing, Thran at the ballet, Sigrid at a track meet, Bain and Tilda giggling over Dinky Farm, all of the children laughing over pizza. He captured a wonderful juxtaposition of Legolas and Thran in the ballroom, the former in his fencing gear as he feinted at his father, the latter in his dancewear as he made a spectacular jeté over Legolas’s épée. He sketched a single delicate Siberian iris that appeared in the yard, then a shattered tree, but most of his sketches reflected his favorite subjects – people of all shapes and sorts. One of his best depicted a pair of cheesmongers in Tilda’s preferred shop, laughing over a shared joke. Thran said it reminded him of a scene in Paris.

Rahmiel had not been neglected. His wings were completely fledged now, and he had a full head of long, wafting hair. Those drifting tresses had been almost as much work as his wings had been. At first, the strands of dark brown ostrich feather had refused to stand up the way Bard wanted them to. Then Tilda had dropped her pen while working on her homework, and the tiny parts bouncing over the kitchen floor had given Bard the idea he needed to finish Rahmiel’s hair successfully. He’d gone to the office supply store, bought six dozen cheap pens, and stripped them of their small internal springs. Those springs had anchored the filmy strands of feathers in the clay atop the angel’s head. He had wound other strands with very thin, stiff, transparent optic fiber. The combination of springs and transparent fibers had made Rahmiel’s hair stream and drift around his head, just as the backwash of air from outstretched wings would disarray it as he alit upon the earth. The picture Bard had sent to Bilbo of the finished angel had so excited the artist’s rep that he’d come out to take pictures to send around in last-minute publicity announcements for Bard’s show.

As magical as life for Clan Ffyrnig had become, it was not completely carefree – there had been no progress on tracking down Lance Dunmont. Neither the local hooligans nor the police had seen him since the April Fool’s Follies. He hadn’t been spotted shadowing the children’s sport activities in the afternoons, nor had he been seen around Greenwood Dale on the Lake, nor had he turned up in any of his haunts in the city. The police thought that the boy had gotten in his licks and had taken himself elsewhere, whether Florida or elsewhere. Sigrid flatly didn’t believe that. Neither did Bard, so he continued to meet the children at the bus stop each day, kept an eye out during the family’s travels, and kept the security system armed.

The other nagging concern was Bard’s alone – the toll that Immortal took on Thran. Some days he seemed so exhausted, but it took Bard several days to puzzle out potential reasons why. His husband continued to work on his pointe work, but he had not had any more mishaps. The terrible bruises on his arm faded, and his wrist gave him no trouble. He never missed his barre or yoga or strength training, and no matter how strenuous his workouts, Thran was energized and happy when he completed them.

The issue wasn’t physical exhaustion, then. What else could it be?

Around the children, or in the company of others, Thran was smiling and content. But when he was alone with Bard, Thran dispensed with public displays of ease and confidence. He slumped on the sofa or lay in bed like a limp rag, and soaked up all of Bard’s little attentions and considerations, not as if he took them for granted, but as if he was grateful beyond words for them. He craved far more cuddling than sex, which declared his need for comfort and reassurance clearer than if he’d shouted it.

Of course, the first thing that came to mind was Bard’s old nemesis – money. But the household accounts were in such good shape that Bard had started to interview painters to work on the exterior of the house. He would also have them strip all of the internal doors of paint, which would save him hours of grueling manual labor. Depending on the state of the doors underneath all the paint, Bard could decide how to refinish them at his leisure. In addition, he was still debating whether to strip and refinish windows, or replace them all completely to improve the insulating quality of the house. But he digressed – the point was that the household accounts had plenty of funds for whatever he decided about exterior paint and windows.

Was the problem the cost of Immortal?

Stage productions were horrendously expensive to put on, so that was feasible. But if that were the problem, then surely Thran would have said something, wouldn’t he?

Maybe not, if Thran thought such a revelation would worry Bard.

What else could it be, if not money?

This time, Bard wouldn’t wonder in silence. He’d learned his lesson with the fiasco over Luka.

This time, he’d ask.

* * *
Thran pried his eyes open. Bard stood on the other side of the fruit crate coffee table, holding the tray of the teapot and cups for their favorite after-supper brew, plus a small plate of cookies. Today’s presentation simmered in the black iron teapot, with two small porcelain cups – all three were Japanese, which probably meant jasmine green tea. That was Bard’s favorite. Thran sat up from his slump on the sofa, and leaned forward to clear a spot on the coffee table for the tray.

“Thank you, lyubov moy,” Thran smiled up at Bard. “Once again you look after me far better than I deserve.”

“No, I don’t,” Bard exhaled, setting down the tray. He sat down beside Thran, and stretched one strong hand over Thran’s thigh to squeeze it gently. “You deserve everything I can give you. Have a cookie.”

Bard offered him the plate. Thran considered the thin wafers, half dipped in chocolate. “This is a new recipe, yes?”

“Chocolate orange slices. I thought they sounded decadent. Hope they are.”

As Bard poured their tea, Thran sampled one of the treats. “Mmm – no, I mean tcha, these are horrible, I do not recommend that you or the children waste your time with these. I will sacrifice myself and eat them all so that none of you have to.”

Snickering, Bard gave him a wink. “Oh, that line won’t work on me, cariad. The children have tried that so many times that when I hear it, I know the recipe’s a keeper. But I’ll see for myself.”

He managed to snitch a cookie from the plate that Thran held so protectively, chewed thoughtfully, and nodded.

“I cannot eat them all myself, I see,” Thran made a sad face.

“I don’t think so. These really are decadent. Worth every minute it took to dip them in the chocolate ganache.”

“I am sure you hated to lick the ganache bowl clean when you were done.”

Bard’s grin would have looked at home on Tilda’s face. “Oh, yes. That was truly a fate not to be endured. Here, let go of the plate. I want another one.”

“If you insist,” Thran sighed, handing Bard the plate. He picked up his teacup, then snuggled at Bard’s side. He took a sip of tea, then a bite of cookie, and shut his eyes. It was such a gift to let everything go but the delicious taste of the cookie and the comfortable closeness of his husband’s strong body.

“Another long day,” Bard murmured, munching his cookie.

Thran rumbled in response.

“Would you tell me about it?”

Interviews, logistics, decisions, and so, so many questions; and so little of the dance to leaven the rest...

“Angel, I’m sorry I can’t think of a way to make this a question rather than a flat statement, but I’m worried about you.”

An arm went around his shoulder, and a hand rubbed his upper arm slowly. “Because you’re exhausted so much of the time. I don’t think it’s physical. I hope it’s not money issues. Whatever it is, you seem so drained, but you don’t talk about it. What can I do to help?”

Thran sighed. “I am sorry to worry you.”

Bard kept rubbing Thran’s arm in slow, soothing strokes. “And I’m sorry to bother you. Now that we have our usual posturing out of the way, would you please tell me what’s worn you out so badly?”

Thran mustered a sheepish smile at the humor in Bard’s voice. “You are right that I am not physically drained, funny saint. In fact, I do not dance nearly as much as I would like. No, I am not overly concerned over money, though yes, the price to bring a ballet to the stage is high. No, I do not try to hide anything from you, and if I am silent, it is because you already do so much of exactly what I need, and I savor all of that.”

Bard digested that as he ate another cookie. “So no physical issues, no money issues... what’s left?”

“Perhaps it is a kind of... mental exhaustion?” Thran ventured. “It will likely seem very self indulgent to you. But I am just... talked at, all of the day. I seem never to have a minute’s peace without someone who asks for a decision about this, or an opinion about that. I do not dance full time – I talk to donors to plead for money, I give interviews, I pose for photos in costume, I make decisions about costumes or set design or public relations or sponsorship... It seems never to end. So yes, I am exhausted. By the time I come home, I cannot bear to hear another word, even from the people I actually want to talk to. I cringe when I hear anyone’s voice, mine among them.”

“I don’t think it’s self indulgent,” Bard said. “It makes perfect sense. It’s no wonder all you want to do is hibernate in bed in the quiet and the dark. You’re suffering from sensory overload. Mental fatigue.”

“If that is what it is called, then that is what ails me. I confess that I was not prepared for it, Bard. The rigors of the dance are physical, yet internal at the same time to understand the character I am to dance. This is exactly the opposite – completely unphysical, and very external. So much talk! So very much talk! I do not understand why so many people think I am the one to decide so many things.”

Bard snickered, but not unkindly. “You’re the Russian with the rubles and the Prince of Ice glare, angel. No one wants to incur your wrath.”

Thran winced. “Likely so. I do my best, but... there is so much of it, lyubov moya. I do not know how Lettie manages – she handles far more of it than I do, and she is always there to advise me. But even with her help, I am pulled in so many directions that I have taken Ori from Irmo to help me. He is so efficient, so well organized, so calm. When Immortal is done, I want to ask him if he’d consider a permanent position with the company. He would be a wonderful addition.”

“He would,” Bard agreed. “I like Ori a lot. He’s a decent person as well as a genius. His brother might be loath to let him go, though.”

“Perhaps. I will ask him, anyway.”

“Is there anything I can do to help, other than keep pouring the tea and offering back rubs?”
“Perhaps you can teach me some of your Welsh curses. I run out of Russian ones.”

“That I can do. I wish there were something more I could do.”

“Your show is this Saturday. Your focus should be on that.”

“It doesn’t feel quite real yet. I suppose it will tomorrow. I’m taking a couple of my sculptures over to the gallery.”

“Which ones? Rahmiel, of course.”

“Sea Spot Run, the Ring Thing, and Rahmiel. Bilbo’s sending over a couple of men to help me get Sea Spot Run in the truck. That one’s a bastard to move.”

“Then just two days until your show. I am excited enough for both of us.”

Bard was silent, but the faint slowing of his hand over Thran’s arm telegraphed his hesitation. “You aren’t?”

“I am,” Bard agreed. “But I... wonder if we won’t get a visit from our elusive stalker.”

Thran hummed. “I hope not, but I resign myself to expect so.”

“So do I. I called Mr. D to make sure he still planned to come to the party. As I expected, a case of good ale swung the deal. He’ll be there. For a fifth of good scotch, he offered to bring Inspector Oakland with him.”

“Cheap at the price,” Thran murmured. “Are there more cookies?”

“A couple.” A cookie waved under his nose, so he opened his mouth to take it from Bard’s fingers. “Like I said – a keeper recipe.”

Thran hummed in heartfelt agreement. “A dangerous one. They are so good that they make me into a glutton.”

“Three cookies don’t make you a glutton.”

“I hope not. Oh, you talk of who will attend your show. Our friend Hal sends his regrets. Saturday is the birthday of his best friend, and he plans a small fest for him.”

“Understandable. I’m sure he’ll be baking all day.”

Thran grinned. “Likely so. I shudder to think of the mayhem.”

“I take it he isn’t the neatest in the kitchen,” Bard chuckled.

“Far from it. When do you move your sculpture tomorrow?”

“After lunch. I’ve got a lot of sketches to take with me, too. Hmm. I guess I am getting excited.”

Thran took his last bite of cookie and rubbed Bard’s leg. “Good.”

Bard lapsed into silence, perhaps out of consideration for Thran, but it was a comfortable silence, and Thran felt no pressure to break it. His eyes closed again as he savored the lingering taste of chocolate and orange, the quiet murmur of the children as they worked at the kitchen table, the solid presence of Bard beside him.
“It’s okay if you want to head into the shower, even soak in the tub if you want.”

“I will not abandon you to do the homework duty alone.”

A snicker. “It’s been weeks since either of us have had to answer anything for anyone.”

Thran’s snicker echoed his husband’s. “True. I will go. Just a shower, though. I do not want to fall asleep in the tub.”

“If you’re not out in twenty minutes, I’ll come find you.”

“A wise precaution. Thank you, my saint.”

Thran took himself upstairs to wash, settling into bed when he was done. He drifted into a doze until it was time to bid the children goodnight, then returned to bed. Downstairs, Bard roamed through the house to make his usual rounds and set the security system, then came upstairs to shower. Thran heard the water start to run, but the next thing he was aware of was Bard slipping into bed beside him.

“You are out of it tonight, cariad,” Bard murmured, when Thran sleepily reached out an arm to draw Bard close.

“Tomorrow will be better,” he mumbled. “I have pointe in the afternoon, so less talk, more dance.”

“For me, it’ll be better, too. The sculpture comes out of the barn and goes into a gallery.”

“The sketches, too.”

“The sketches aren’t in the barn.”

“Of course not. Why would you think that? You are silly tonight.”

Arms went around him, drawing him close, enfolding him into Bard’s warmth and affection. A silent chuckle rumbled in the chest beneath his ear.

“You’re too sleepy to make sense, silly Russian. So go to sleep.”

“As you wish...”

Sleep overwhelmed him before he finished the thought.

* * *

Thursday morning. Two days before his gallery show. Despite Bard’s protestations to Thran last night, anticipation coiled in Bard’s solar plexus as soon as he got up. He was through the bathroom and into his morning clothes in seconds, and went downstairs with purpose, leaving Thran asleep in the bedroom. As tired as the dancer had been last night, Bard thought it best to let him sleep as long as he wanted this morning. So Bard started on breakfasts and school lunches by himself. In another six or seven weeks, the school term would be over, and the children would have the summer to relax, that being a relative term. Legolas would be in fencing and archery camps, Bain would be in soccer camps, and Sigrid wanted to get a summer job at one of the village shops, or perhaps an internship at the local gazette office. Tilda wanted to attend an art camp. Thran, of course, would be deeply into rehearsals for Immortal by then, probably on site at the Imladris Academy at least part of the time. As for him...

Better to wait until after Saturday before he sorted through what he’d be up to this summer. His solar plexus tightened in anticipation, then the rest of his body followed suit. Gods, this was what Sigrid felt before one of her track events, or maybe Legolas before a fencing bout, or Thran before a performance...

Gods, to spend the next two days so keyed up, to agitate over so many endless questions – would his show be well attended, and would his sketches sell, and would anyone would like his sculpture enough to offer a commission? There was nothing left to do to entice people to attend. Bilbo had done a marvelous job of publicizing the event, from notices in publications, teaser videos and notices on the Internet, and flyers in almost every shop in the village. This morning, Bard would get his sculpture to the Ilithien Gallery, and tomorrow he’d go in to make any last adjustments. His work would be on display all day Friday and Saturday, and the actual reception would be Saturday evening.

So much hope rode on this, but not just hope for his artistic future. Bard wanted to be the partner equal to his dancer husband, the partner that Thran deserved...

Couldn’t think about that. Couldn’t think about any of it. Gods, he needed a distraction so, so badly!

Think about the solarium. Yes, that was a good distraction, the room that everyone in the house awaited with such anticipation, the room that he’d planned to work on weeks ago, until practical considerations led him to focus on the less exciting but more necessary tasks of painting landings and hanging chandeliers and restoring floors. All of those, thank the gods, were finally done. Now came the fun room.

The solarium would be more than the same old patching and priming and painting of plaster. This would reclaim a room that had begun life long ago as an afterthought, tacked on to the rest of the house, perhaps at the whim of a previous owner who wanted a garden room to savor during the cold New York winters. For this room at least, Bard had opted to follow Sam’s advice to replace the old windows completely, but it would be some weeks before replacements would be ready. He could still work on the ceiling, walls, and floor –

“You must have gotten up early, my saint,” came a sleepy voice. “The breakfast is ready, and the lunches are done.”

Bard jerked back to reality. Yes, the children’s lunches were all made and in their bags on the counter. The pot of porridge simmered gently on the stove. Sigrid’s bagel was ready in the toaster, and Tilda’s apple was sliced and waiting in her cereal bowl. Bard looked up to find Thran leaning on the kitchen island beside him, smiling.

“Um, yes, lunches done, porridge on. What would you like for breakfast? Eggs? Porridge? I can make you an omelet if that suits you.”

Thran offered a light good morning kiss. “What would you like this morning? I want to practice what I have learned so well. The Egg Puff, with cheese and onions and chives?”

“That’d be great,” Bard nodded, returning Thran’s kiss. “It looks like someone got a good night’s rest.”

“I did. And I get to dance today more than talk. It is a good day for an Egg Puff.”
“Have at, then. The children ought to be down in a few minutes.”

“They stir. There was a race for the bathroom this morning, but as I was up, I sent the loser into ours. I think we must let Bain try the tub out soon. I think he lost on purpose, just so he could go into our bathroom and ogle it.”

“The next time he comes home aching from sport, I’ll dump him in there. He might not be so eager once he hears that he has to shower first, and clean it out when he’s done.”

“I heard that,” Bain said, bouncing into the kitchen. “I’ve got soccer for sport after school today. So I can I try out the tub when I get home?”

“Shower first, clean out after,” Bard reiterated. “Porridge is on.”

“Sweet,” Bain murmured, pumping his fist. “I’ll make sure I’m good and grimy.”

“One more time, Bain,” Bard repeated. “Shower first, clean out after. That’s what’ll get you time in the tub.”

“Okay, Da.” Bain shoveled porridge into a bowl, clattered to the table, and proceeded to dump raisins, cinnamon, and milk on top. Bard shook his head, smiling at the production. Legolas and Tilda came in, and finally Sigrid.

“I get to use the tub this afternoon after school,” Bain poked Legolas with an elbow. “Sweet, huh?”

Legolas’s eyes went immediately to Thran. “Does that mean I can use it sometime, too, Papa?”

Thran’s eyes met Bard’s with resigned laughter. “There are rules. Shower before, and clean the tub after. But yes.”

“I want a turn, too,” Tilda piped up, sprinkling cinnamon on her apples and porridge. “So when can I go?”

“We’ve created a monster,” Bard shook his head.

“What is the adage?” Thran winked as he worked on his Egg Puff. “Perhaps we should sell tickets?”

“We’d be rich,” Bard agreed, as the children clamored in protest, or at least three of them did.

“Nope, doesn’t tempt me at all,” Sigrid laughed, sticking her tongue out at Bain. “Too full of guy cooties!”

“Hey, I don’t have guy cooties!” Tilda protested in injured tones, which set all of the children off laughing and teasing. By the time they sorted themselves out, Thran’s Egg Puff was on plates, and he and Bard sat down to eat it while the children ran upstairs to brush their teeth and make their final preparations for school.

“Not bad for a sous chef,” Bard teased Thran as he took a big bite. “Light, fluffy, golden brown on the bottom, cheese perfectly gooey, onions nicely sautéed, a good sprinkle of chives. I give it an A plus.”

“I improve, then,” Thran held up his index fingers in mock celebration. “Number one in the Egg Puff. Next, I will learn brownies. Or perhaps those cookies from last night. Both are outrageous.”

“Brownies are easy. Mix in a bowl, dump in a pan, bake. And chocolate. What’s not to like?”
“Nothing,” Thran agreed. “Ah, the horde descends. It is like a herd of rhinos thunders down the stairs every morning.”

“Time for the bus run,” Bard agreed, getting up to take his plate to the sink. “Give me your plate.”

Together they tidied up the kitchen detritus, then escorted the children to the bus stop.

“Good luck moving your stuff, Da!” Sigrid wished him as she waved goodbye at the door of the bus.
“Bye, and we’re leaving, too!”

“Do your best, just like always!” Bard and Thran chorused in reply as they waved to all of the children. After the bus pulled away, Rosie came over to say hello.

“Saturday’s the day,” she grinned, rubbing her hands together in anticipation. “So exciting! You’re moving your sculpture pieces this morning, I gather?”

“That’ll be entertaining,” Bard smirked. “I’ll likely have to make three trips. Sea Spot Run’s a bitch to move, so that’s one trip all by itself. The Ring Thing’s not so heavy, but it takes up a lot of space.
And Rahmiel... I may decide to take him in Thran’s SUV tomorrow, because I can take the seats out to keep him upright. Those wings won’t withstand a lot of bumping.”

“Do you need help with any of it?” Rosie asked. “Rahmiel might fit perfectly in Sam’s garden van, and you and I can help keep Rahmiel steady while he drives. Oh, no, it’s not all altruism, Bard. To be honest, I can’t wait to get a look at him now that he’s finished.”

“I’ve got a couple of big burly guys to help me wrangle Sea Spot Run and the Ring Thing, but if I need help with Rahmiel, I’ll give you a call. I’d hate to have him damaged in transit.”

“Just ring,” Rosie nodded, “and we’ll be over. Sam’s working on a couple of garden designs at home today, so he’ll be around whenever you need us.”

“Thanks, Rosie. I’ll see how the big pieces go. If these guys can take the proper care, I’ll use them. If not, I’ll ring.”

“Okay, Bard. Good luck! See you later, Thran!”

Rosie headed home, and so did Bard and Thran. Thran got ready for his day’s work at the UVB studio and his pointe class, so Bard headed out to the carriage house to get the SUV out, then opened the barn to dust off his two sculptures again. He must have wiped them down six times in the past two days, so neither needed it now. Just nerves. He’d give both of them a final wipe when they were in place in the gallery.

“We must find places for both of them after your show,” Thran said, appearing by the door. He had on his jacket, and his bag was over his shoulder. “Or do you already have places for them in mind?”

“If we had a fish pond, or a lily pond, that’d be the perfect site for Sea Spot Run,” Bard mused. “I don’t know how much work that would be to maintain. We can ask Sam. As for the Ring Thing, maybe outside the big ballroom windows?”

“In the midst of your Welsh garden? That is a good place.”

“We’ll see. Gods, I finished most of the house, but there’s still a lot to think about.”

“It comes in its time. The house is so beautiful inside, and Sam will come soon to work his magic on our gardens.”
“Painting comes first. We don’t want to have Sam go to all the work of planting everything only to have painters stamp through it.”

“True. You said you have talked to painters?”

Bard heaved the barn doors shut, and locked them. “I have. I have two coming out Monday. So I hope that can get started soon.”

“What should we do about the windows?” Thran asked as they walked to the SUV. “I leave the decision to you, but if you think they should all be replaced, that is fine. We will spend more on replacements, but less on energy.”

“It’ll be a horrendous expense either way, whether we refurbish or replace. I’ve got a window company coming Tuesday. If we’re going to replace them, we should do it before we paint.”

“Sensible,” Thran nodded, as Bard opened the SUV door for him. “I leave it to you, then, my saint.”

“I hope all goes well today. Less talk, more dance,” Bard leaned forward to give Thran a kiss goodbye.

“Mmm,” Thran breathed, smiling at the caress. He returned it with a longer one, tracing fingers down Bard’s back and squeezing his glute. “On Sunday, perhaps we can indulge ourselves to make up for too many busy days.”

“I’d like that,” Bard agreed at once, easing Thran against him. When he rubbed his hips against Thran’s, his husband hummed deep in his throat.

“Do not be a bastard, or I will drag you into the back seat and fuck you as if we were in high school.”

“You’re the bastard, conjuring up an image like that. I never fucked anyone in high school in the back seat of anything.”

“That is a tragedy,” Thran purred, slipping hands under Bard’s shirt to stroke his nipples. Bard gasped – it’d been days since they’d last made love, and his body responded instantly to Thran’s teasing – but he got no sympathy, only a wicked smile, and a seductive whisper. “I want to see you spread out on the back seat, hear you too consumed to smother your moans, and feel you sweat because I light such a fire in you.”

“You first, you fucker,” Bard growled, grabbing the back of Thran’s jeans, then the handle of the passenger door behind the driver’s door. He jerked open the door, and shoved Thran towards it. “Let’s see you spread out on the back seat, moaning and sweating.”

Thran threw his bag into the front seat like a shot, vaulted into the back seat, and yanked Bard after him. By the time Bard tumbled in after him and shut the door, Thran had shed his jacket, torn off his trainers, and stripped off his jeans and underwear, then he yanked at Bard’s clothes. As soon as he got Bard’s jeans open, Thran manhandled Bard’s cock hard, slicked it with spit, then pulled it into him with a groan.

“Oh, yes, yes, it has been too long since we played, ty grebanyy huiesos,” Thran panted, biting at Bard’s lips. “Chert, ty zastavlyayesh’ menya konchit.”

As long fingers raked his sides, Bard bared his teeth to bite Thran at the base of his throat, teasing a moan out of his entranced dancer.
“You like getting nailed in the back seat like a horny teenager, you bastard? Not too angelic today, are you?”

“Hell, no,” Thran snarled, grinning at Bard as he yanked him deeper inside him. “Fuck me hard and fast, like your horny teenager. Like you mean it. Make me moan.”

Long legs went over Bard’s shoulders, and hands dug into his glutes, driving him deeper into Thran. Bard muscled his husband into a better position, then dove in to bite Thran’s throat again. Shutting his eyes, he gave Thran what he wanted, stroking hard, fast, and rough, until Thran whimpered.

“Ohhh, yeah, angel, you sing so sweet,” Bard crooned, biting Thran’s shoulder. “I love to hear you moan.”

“You fuck like a kitten,” Thran sneered, biting at Bard’s lips. He curled around Bard as well as the car seat would let him. “So pretty, so cute, so delicate. Where is the tiger? The savage? That is what I want. Make me scream.”

“You won’t sit down for a week once I’m through with you,” Bard snarled, scratching his fingers over Thran’s nipples. At his husband’s gasped curse, Bard stroked faster, harder, deeper, until Thran writhed underneath him.

“Hard enough for you now, fucker?” Bard rasped, thrusting hard enough that Thran whimpered with each one. Fingers clawed down Bard’s back and over his glutes, leaving trails that stung and throbbed.

“Never,” Thran gasped, so close to release that he could barely speak. “Give me all of you, you slacker, not just half of you. Make me come.”

It took just two powerful thrusts to bring Thran to climax. As he erupted with a howl, the tight pressure around Bard’s cock spasmed into uncontrolled waves, dragging Bard to release. He hauled Thran onto his cock one last time, muffled his curses against Thran’s quivering chest, and let everything explode.

After so much profane posturing, release was beyond sweet. Bard pressed a kiss against Thran’s heaving chest, and managed to prop himself up on his elbows. Thran brushed Bard’s tangled hair out of his eyes, and kissed his lips tenderly, drawing Bard’s laughter.

“Oh, now you want to be gentle and shy.”

“I am properly fucked. I like to show my appreciation to the animal who did so.”

Bard snickered as he grasped the knees that rested on his shoulders. “Let’s just hope the neighbors aren’t either applauding or calling the police. We made a right racket.”

With a giggle, Thran eased his legs off Bard’s shoulders, then winced as he and Bard managed to disentangle themselves. “If they are watching, then they will get an eyeful when I dash inside the house. I cannot appear in the studio like this.”

Bard squeezed Thran’s glute. “At least you don’t have bloody streaks over your back and ass.”

“Neither of us have such marks,” Thran grinned, leaning in to snatch a kiss from Bard. “Though I admit that you have red marks over your back and ass. Such a nice ass, too.”

Laughing, Bard reached back to retrieve Thran’s jeans from the rear seat, and plunked them in Thran’s lap. “At least put your pants on your nice ass before you dash into the house. And your trainers. You don’t want to step on a rock and hurt your feet.”

Chortling like a couple of schoolboys, they managed to pull on enough clothing to dash into the house. Thran had more to wash, but he seemed no worse for the wear after their feral pairing. When Bard expressed concern, Thran gave him a quelling look.

“Do not mar such an outrageous fucking with inquiries about your conquest’s health,” he proclaimed. “I am fine, you are fine, and we are both AFO.”

“Not quite,” Bard gave Thran an evil leer. “But I can wait until you get home tonight.”

Thran snorted as he resumed his underwear and jeans. “Should I skip my pointe lesson? I can have you on our virgin marble floor.”

Bard wiggled his eyebrows and grinned. “Should I call Bilbo and tell him to send his men to help me with my sculpture tomorrow?”

Thran exhaled in mock exasperation. “Chert, the demands of life continue to conspire against us, so we are still not able to fuck ourselves blind. I will go to class, and you will move your sculpture. If we are still hungry after that, we will make do after the children go to bed.”

“We have a plan,” Bard agreed. “Come on, I’ll help you destroy the evidence.”

“Quickly. I am so late.”

“You’re the boss, angel. The boss is never late.”

“Everyone will know why I am late.”

“Only if you keep grinning like that. Try to glare a bit, and no one will be the wiser.”

“Wise advice.”

Snickering, Thran and Bard quickly mopped up the SUV, and lingered only long enough to exchange a last pair of kisses.

“May all go well with your sculpture today, lyubov moya,” Thran offered through the window.

“May all go well with your pointe shoes, too, angel. Be safe, be strong, and come home in one piece.”

“You, too.” A sexy grin spread over Thran’s face. “You are the most fun, my saint. I will smile all day.”

“So will I.”

Thran offered a final wave before he headed out of the driveway and down the lane. Bard stood still a moment, then headed back inside. As he poured himself another cup of tea, he winced – his balls ached, his skin burned where Thran had clawed it, and his shoulders ached from contorting himself in such cramped quarters. What Thran felt like after such a rough pairing bore no consideration. If either of them had anything left once they got into bed to night, he’d be surprised.

Still, wouldn’t it be fun to find out?
Chapter 106

Chapter Summary

Both the angel and the saint make progress - the former on his toes, and the latter towards his public introduction.

Thran headed down the road to the UVB studio with a grin that had nothing to do with physical comfort. He had a nasty rug burn on his tailbone, a twinge in one hamstring, and scraped nipples; as for inside... that bore no consideration. Still, the price of goading his husband out of his usual serene demeanor was nothing compared to feeling that muscular body heave and strain against his, seeing that feral light in Bard’s brown eyes, smelling sweat and essence smeared over their bodies. To be lusted after, then opened and taken and driven to release with such savagery, was delirious. It was all Thran could do not to turn the SUV back towards the house. How decadent would it be to storm through the house, hunting down the man who’d so possessed him, then enslave him and repay that possession in kind?

Sadly, duty called.

With a sigh, Thran continued to drive to the UVB studio. At least he could consider all the ways he might reward Bard for his indulgence this morning.

His hamstring twinged again, and more than his nipples stung. He might have to wait a day or two before he retaliated. It would be wise not to play so roughly so soon, too, but that was no burden. There were other ways to goad Bard past his composure. Thran’s retaliation would be less frantic – the better to savor it – but just as thorough. A long, slow, tease...

Perhaps he should do more than just threaten to chain Bard to the bed.

* * *

Bard’s morning was spent getting his sculpture moved from house to gallery. As he expected, Sea Spot Run, his tall column of intertwined fish, was a bear. It was seven feet tall, and despite its slenderness was heavy enough to require Bard and two burly men to get it into the back of his pickup. With proper padding and careful driving, they delivered the piece safely to the Ilithien Gallery. Bilbo was already there with the owner, Celebrían L’Eärendil, both of them wisely staying out of the way as the three men edged the column into a prominent position in the center of one room of the gallery. After a quick trip home, Bard and Bilbo’s helpers brought the lighter but more awkwardly shaped Ring Thing to place in the center of the gallery’s second room. Bard decided he’d take Rosie up on her offer to help move Rahmiel in Sam’s garden van rather than risk the fragile clay and feather sculpture falling over in the back of his pickup, so after a quick ring, Rosie promised she and Sam would be ready to help by the time he got home.

Sure enough, Bard pulled his truck into the driveway to find Sam’s van already waiting. Rosie and Sam stood beside it, waving as he got out.
“Hello, Rosie, Sam!” Bard lifted a hand in greeting. “Thanks for coming over.”

“Are you kidding?” Rosie exclaimed, drawing Sam’s chuckle. “I can’t wait to see your Rahmiel!”

“And that’s no lie, Bard,” a grinning Sam held up his hands at his wife’s enthusiasm. “Rosie’s talked about nothing else since she came in from taking the children to the bus stop.”

“Come on in, then,” Bard waved them towards the mudroom door. “I hope he measures up to the hype.”

Both Sam and Rosie oohed and aahed over the glimpses of Bard’s renovations as they headed for the solarium. “You’ve done so much work, Bard!” Sam said, looking around. “I’ve always liked this house. It’s not so fancy that it looks stiff and pretentious, just fancy enough to look special as well as comfortable. You’ve done it up right – not flibbity at all. The house shines through.”

“Thanks, Sam. It’s still empty for the most part, but we’ll get there. Easier to get all the work done without a lot of furniture around.”

“It looks like you’re almost done,” Rosie said, looking down the center hall. “Oh, you’ve done the floors! The inlay just shines now.”

“Just finished a couple of days ago,” Bard nodded, following Rosie into the central hall. “Got the chandeliers up at last.”

“That must’ve been a bear,” Sam said, looking up as Bard turned on the lights. “Chaining them together like that? Wow. It’s beautiful.”

“It sure is,” Rosie nodded, and stuck her head into the main room. “What color are you going to paint in here?”

Bard described Thran’s sofa that would arrive in a few weeks, and how they’d wait to see it in place before they chose a paint color to go with it. “We need a mantelpiece, too, but again, we want to see the sofa in place before we go down that route. Maybe wood? Maybe stone? Whatever Thran decides he likes. This room is his to play with.”

“Something glamorous, I’d guess,” Rosie grinned. “That’s his style.”

“A little of his glamor’s rubbed off on me,” Bard admitted, beckoning the two into the sitting room. He opened the half bath door and turned on the lights.

“This is a wow, too,” Rosie murmured. “Oh, Bard, it’s beautiful. Absolutely beautiful.”

“It is, that,” Sam agreed. “A real stunner. I wish we had time to see the whole place, but we’d better see to your Rahmiel before the gallery wonders where he’s flown off to.”

“You’re right. Maybe you’d like to come over Sunday for a cookout? Chicken, maybe? Nothing fancy, but it should be warm enough that we can sit on the terrace, and if not, there’s always the kitchen table.”

“I think we can do that, if it’s for supper,” Sam raised his eyebrows at Rosie, who nodded agreement. “The garden center’s heating up, so I’m open until four on Sunday.”

“We can do that,” Bard replied. “Come on, let’s take care of Rahmiel, then I’ll stand you lunch in the village.”
“That’s a deal,” Sam agreed.

Bard ushered his friends into the solarium, where both of them were quick to lavish praise on Bard’s beautiful angel. With Rosie to hold open doors and direct Sam and Bard around obstacles, they got Rahmiel and Bard’s work stand into the delivery van. Rosie and Bard kept the statue braced as Sam drove them slowly to the gallery, hazard lights flashing. Then they carefully maneuvered Rahmiel on his board out of Sam’s van.

“Oh, my goodness,” Celebrían breathed when Bard and Sam appeared with Rahmiel between them. The gallery owner’s deep-set brown eyes widened in astonishment. “You did show me a picture, Bilbo, but it didn’t do the reality justice. This is spectacular.”

“Isn’t he?” Bilbo folded his arms over his chest to survey the scene with proud satisfaction. “I’ve never seen anything like him.”

“Thanks,” Bard nodded in appreciation. “He’s been a labor of love, but I like the way he turned out.”

“So do I,” Celebrían agreed in a soft voice. Bilbo had told Bard that the tall, willowy gallery owner was a wonderful painter in her own right, as well as the wife of the Imladris Academy’s headmaster. She had deep reddish brown hair, the color of polished mahogany, that she wore piled atop her head in a loose, elegant twist. Soft, stretchy fabric printed with a small floral of green, russet, and apricot gave her capped-sleeve, calf-length dress a graceful swirl, and she wore small earrings, necklace, and bracelet, none of them matching, but all featuring twinkling garnets in gold fittings. “We need to put your beauty someplace where visitors can admire him, but not get close enough to touch. I’d hate for anyone to mar the clay. Hmm, yes, in the window, I think. He’ll look stunning from out on the sidewalk. We’ll hold off his admirers in here with some velvet roping.”

Rosie came forward to set Bard’s work stand in the center of the bowed window. Celebrían draped the stand with a long swath of cloth to present a more aesthetic appearance, then Sam and Bard bolted Rahmiel’s base to the draped stand. Bilbo and Celebrían positioned him to best effect, then Bilbo leaned an attractive sign against the front of the stand that listed the angel’s name, Bard’s name, and the time and date of his show on Saturday. Even Bard thought the arrangement looked glorious.

By Saturday, the entire gallery would look glorious, if he were honest. Two of the gallery’s four rooms would feature nothing but his pieces, and to see his framed sketches going up on the wall was wonderful. Frodo stayed intent on arranging Bard’s framed sketches on the gallery walls, but Bilbo looked up from where he backed each loose sketch with cardboard and wrapped the combination in clear cellophane to keep the pencil strokes from smearing. He offered Bard a warm smile as he arranged the wrapped pieces in cradles for easy perusal.

“Quite a nice arrangement, I think,” Bilbo said, nodding at Frodo when Bard came to stand beside him. “I hope you’re not too attached to any of these. I expect your show to do quite well.”

“Just the sculpture,” Bard shook his head. This was almost an out-of-body experience, or perhaps one of those silly teen movies where two people traded bodies. Because surely he wasn’t the artist whose work was so beautifully displayed, was he?

He was. This was his work, his passion, his talent on display. No one else’s.

“I assume you’d be delighted if someone offers a commission, either for the sculpture or the sketches?”
“That’s... an understatement,” Bard smiled self-consciously. He caught himself before he ran a hand through his hair. “Within reason, of course. I don’t think I want to draw, um... some subjects.”

Bilbo didn’t turn a hair, but merely nodded. “Of course not. I think we can keep interest focused on worthy subjects. There are certain kinds of patrons to avoid, as well, but we’ll steer clear of those, too. Well, most of the work is done, my boy. I expect we’ll have a fair amount of press to dip in and out tomorrow and Saturday morning. Frodo and I will keep close tabs on it.”

“I’ve asked a couple of friends to make an appearance Saturday,” Bard ventured, and explained that Mr. D and Inspector Oakland would be on hand in case Lance decided to make an appearance. Bilbo looked relieved, and noted that the local police were aware of the show and would make extra patrols tonight and Friday in case Lance decided to strike early. Bard took one more look around, offered his thanks to Celebrían, Bilbo, and Frodo, and left the gallery with Sam and Rosie.

“Look at him,” Rosie slowed as they passed the window where Rahmiel perched. “He’s the best thing you’ve done so far, Bard.”

Bard smiled. “I think so, too. He’s everything I hoped he’d be.”

Sam clapped him on the shoulder, and Rosie gave him a proud smile. “Welcome back, then,” Sam said in his comfortable, down to earth voice. “He’s a glorious new start.”

So was the angel who’d modeled for Rahmiel, but Bard kept that to himself. He gave Sam and Rosie a grateful smile as they walked down the sidewalk.

“Come on, you two. Time for lunch. Anywhere you want.”

* * *

Thran managed to escape from the UVB a little early today. He needed it – the spate of talking had begun as soon as he’d walked in, and he’d never gotten to the barre for his morning routine, much less his yoga. From now on, he’d take time for these necessities in the Clan Ffyrnig ballroom before he ever left home, just to make sure he got them in. Lettie must be hard pressed if she had to take precedence over his barre; as a dancer herself, she knew the importance of the morning routine to ensure as much mental peace of mind as physical. Consequently, Thran didn’t complain or insist, but merely did all that she asked of him. He even ate his lunch during their meetings without complaint. But when the spate of details was over for the moment, he took his leave without delay. Mme. Morgelle wouldn’t mind if he arrived early and indulged in a long, slow warmup before his pointe lesson.

Ah, how good it was to stand at the barre! He shut his eyes, grateful to let everything but the dance slip away. No longer director of a company, approver of set designs and costumes and choreography, beggar pleading for money from donors and sponsors. No more smiling face to the media trying to drum up interest in the midst of so many others craving the same attention. He was only a dancer, alone in a corner, who coaxed his body into the same positions that hundreds of thousands of other dancers did every day. Relief washed over him – thank all the gods, every one of them, that he could let everything else fall away, and dance.

He took his time, as if each movement were precious, as if each movement were the last he would ever do. His sore hamstring eased; his cramped shoulders did likewise. Before he knew it, the tension of so many meetings and discussions and debates had melted away, and he felt calm, centered, and happy. Mme. Morgelle came towards him with a nod of approval.

“Yes. You have settled yourself well.”

“I have,” Thran replied simply. He sighed, then offered the instructor a smiling bow. “Bonne après midi, Madame. What will you have me do today?”

“I had thought to continue with your strengthening exercises, but seeing how settled you are today, I would like to see about this ballet of yours.”

Thran blinked. The ballet instructor stood before him, her hands on her hips, but with her fingers pointing backwards and down, which made the pose more considering rather than challenging. Despite her casual stance, Mme. Morgelle’s posture and bearing spoke of her years of training in the same discipline that had shaped Thran. Though she was in her fifties, she was still as slender as a ballerina, though her bowl-cut steel grey hair, red-framed glasses, and chic green wrapped sweater channeled a more playful mien. Under her sweater, she wore a lighter green tee and black leggings. She also wore white pointe shoes – she was not one to merely explain what she wanted from Thran, but she showed him as well. She stood before him now, however, looking more thoughtful than ready to dash into exercises.

“It is a ninety-minute endeavor, Madame,” Thran ventured.

Mme. Morgelle waved her hand dismissively. “I am interested only in the parts that put you on pointe, mon cher. Tell me of those.”

“There is only one part, and it is only seven minutes. But perhaps it is the most pivotal scene for my role,” Thran began. He sketched the bones of the story behind Immortal, then the scene where Death revealed His love for the Maid, and why Thran thought that dancing the scene on pointe would enhance it. Mme. Morgelle listened closely, nodding, asking an astute question here and there. When he was done, she folded her arms across her chest and dropped her chin to her chest as she considered.

“Seven minutes, then, to convey an alien love that is doomed before it begins,” Mme. Morgelle mused.

“Worse than that,” Thran replied. “The Maid is so entranced with her Soldier that she hardly notices Death’s appeal.”

Mme. Morgelle nodded. “I want to see these seven minutes. Slowly. Not on pointe. Do not fling yourself into it, as you must when you dance it. Merely show me the steps.”

Thran took a moment to compose himself, settling into the frame of mind that Death would evince when he tried to woo His Maid. As Mme. Morgelle asked, he went though the steps with control, talking through what would go on in the rest of the scene, when he would be on pointe, how Death would abandon all reserve. Along the way, the ballet instructor asked for clarification of Death’s character and emotions, where the other dancers would be in relation to Thran, what the accompanying music was, and so on.

When he’d run through the scene, Thran regarded Mme. Morgelle with a questioning look. “And your considered opinion, Madame?”

“I think it is doable,” she said at once, without fanfare. “Your legs will be strong enough, and your balance improves. But to be effective, you must be more than workmanlike, Thran. The pointe work can enhance the scene exactly as you would like it to, but only if you are not tentative or conservative. To merely go through the motions will pull the audience out of the fantasy. It will no longer be Death they see. It will be Thran Oropherson trying to do a parlor trick. You must appear unaware of the effort you make, or you must not do it at all.”

Mme. Morgelle beckoned to him with both hands. “From the beginning.”

For the next half hour, the ballet instructor worked Thran through his pointe scene, breaking it into segments. The few flat segments, Thran already performed well; others with only a few steps on pointe, were adequate. That left three segments that consisted entirely of pointe steps, and those left much to be desired. Rather than feeling discouraged, Thran was pleased; it was much easier to mentally accept that almost half of his seven-minute scene was already within reach.

“Enough,” Mme. Morgelle declared, after Thran had danced the scene again, though slowly through the pointe sections. “We will work more on this next time. For now, you have done enough. Continue your strengthening exercises each day as I have told you. I will see you again on Friday.”

“Yes, Madame,” Thran replied, offering her the slight bow that she liked so much. As her lips curved up, so did his. “Merci.”

“Pas de quoi,” she shrugged, pretending royal disinterest, but joined Thran in a chuckle. “Go. You make me late for my next student.”

“Oui, Madame. À Vendredi.”

Thran ducked into the restroom to remove his pointe shoes, and exchange his dancer’s belt and tights for more comfortable jeans and underwear. He made a quick check of his mobile – oh, thank the gods, there were no calls from anyone – then packed his bag to head home. He took the indirect route to the highway through some residential areas on the off chance that he might find another treasure on the sidewalk free for the taking, but he had no such luck today.

No matter. He might not have any physical treasures to bring home today, but Mme. Morgelle had given him a mental one. He knew what he had to do to make Death live.

* * *

Bard enjoyed a lighthearted lunch hour with Rosie and Sam. On their recommendation, they visited the Blue Mountain Bistro just down the street from the gallery, which specialized in stuffed sandwiches made with a variety of breads baked in house. Indeed, the aroma was mouthwatering when they came through the door. The shop also had a nice selection of soups, salads, and other side dishes in addition to their sandwiches, so the hardest part was deciding which treat to order. After due deliberation, Sam happily dug into a big bowl of potato soup and a ham and cheese hero on cheese bread. Rosie had half of a turkey sandwich on honey wheat and a cup of vegetable soup, and Bard tried an Italian hero on – what else? – Italian Parmesan bread. Gelato made a good dessert, then Sam drove them home. Bard waved goodbye from their driveway, and walked the short distance across Sam and Rosie’s back lawn, then across the Whitfoots’s lawn to his own. He remembered to keep a cautious eye out as he went, but the only item of interest was how green the shrubs were getting, and where sprigs of plants that might be more than weeds poked up shoots and leaves. He came inside, energized from the seeing his show come together, and from having a good time with friends. It was the perfect frame of mind to tackle a new project.

But what to do? Rahmiel was finished, and he was now in a gallery with other pieces of Bard’s sculpture and his sketches. Bard was too fidgety to want to sit in the sitting room to sketch or plan a new sculpture. The barn was more or less cleaned up, but he needed to catalog what supplies he needed to replace before he could start his metal work. That was not the effort he wanted to make today, either.

Renovation, then?

There was nothing more to do on the main room until the new sofa arrived.

The two attic rooms? Both needed the usual cleaning and renovating, but he was in no hurry to do either. The empty one held all the leftover boxes from the main room, which would be hard to work around. As for the one holding his old bed... it had been the perfect setting for an erotic rendezvous between a dodgy artist and a sexual vampire. Gods, the jolt that went through his loins when he recalled Thran in leather pants and heavy motorcycle boots bore no consideration. The chance to revisit that erotic adventure was too tempting to remake the stage of it just yet.

That left the solarium.

Everyone in the family was eager to see that oasis come to life, but more than the desire to create a beautiful room spiked Bard’s anticipation. Thinking about his rendezvous with Thran in the attic room had given him an idea for the next game he and his husband would play. Upstairs, their play had been rough, feral, and gritty. Their beautiful oasis, then, would be the perfect place for a pairing that was as far removed from rough, feral grittiness as could be imagined.

Renovation first, though. He had to create the setting before anyone played anything.

He considered the work that needed to be done while he mixed up a pan of peanut butter brownies. When they went in the oven, he seared slices of pork in a big Dutch oven, added sautéed onions, spices, and molasses, and set the concoction to simmer. In a few hours, the mouthwatering smell of pork barbeque would greet the family when they arrived home. When the brownies came out of the oven, they smelled so good that he pried one out of the pan while it was still hot and gooey, blowing on it until it was cool enough to stuff in his mouth. Good thing the children weren’t around to watch him, or the rest of the pan would be gone under their assault.

Supper and snacks under control, Bard fetched spackling compound, putty knife, and ladder, and headed into the solarium. Why was the first step always to patch walls and ceiling, prime, and paint?

He had a lot to think about as he patiently patched and smoothed. The solarium might have been added on to the house as an afterthought, but the materials that had gone into it were solid. The floor was a nice limestone with a solid base underneath, mostly in good shape, though one or two of the tiles were cracked. Tilda and Thran had pored over Bard’s book of Islamic tessellations together, wondering if they could make one or two – to replace the broken limestone ones or to hang on the wall, maybe? Thankfully, the walls and ceiling were solidly built, so Bard wouldn’t have to add any insulation to either. Just as fortunately, no one had slathered layer upon layer of thick paint over the trim work, so cleaning that down to bare wood wouldn’t take as long as it had in so much of the rest of the house. He planned to stain it to match the wooden panels they’d gotten from Mrs. Mathom’s.

But what color to paint the walls? The wooden screens and the archway would cover only the inside wall; the two side walls and the window wall would be left exposed. Maybe a pale green would enhance the lush greenery? It would have to be one that harmonized with the Majorelle blue velvet on the fainting couch, and the blue glass of Thran’s lanterns from Istanbul’s Grand Bazaar. Definitely a blue for the ceiling, and clouds, to reinforce the sense of the room being a beautiful hidden garden, fit for an even more beautiful odalisque.

An odalisque with long, white hair.

Bard worked quietly away, smiling as once again thoughts of an angel made light work as he coaxed an old house back to new life. He had a couple of hours to himself before the mudroom door opened.

“Bard, I am home!” Thran called.

“In the solarium!” Bard replied, climbing down from his ladder.

“Mmm, the kitchen smells good!” Thran crossed the kitchen and came into the solarium. “And what is this? You work on the solarium? I thought you moved your sculpture today.”

Bard gave his husband a welcome-home kiss. “Sculpture’s all moved, angel. Bilbo’s helpers made quick work of Sea Spot Run and the Ring Thing. Then Sam and Rosie helped me move Rahmiel in Sam’s delivery van. I stood them lunch, and invited them and their children over to grill on Sunday.”

“How does he look in the gallery?”

Bard didn’t try to keep the excited grin off his face. “Better than you can believe, angel. He’s in one of the gallery’s front windows, and he looks as great from outside as he does inside up close. Then to see the sketches go on the walls, too...”

Thran enfolded him in his arms to deliver a loving hug. “I cannot wait to see him, lyubov moya. In a gallery, with all your sketches and Sea Spot Run and the Ring Thing to complement him... but that will not be the most wonderful thing that I will see there on Saturday. That will be you when you see how many others realize what an amazing artist you are.”

Lips pressed a kiss on Bard’s hair, then fingers ran through it. “Tcha, I should have thought to call Rowan for you. You have not had a haircut since you first visited her.”

Bard chuckled. “I thought about it, but decided to hold off until afterwards.”

Thran’s silver grey eyes met his with surprise. “What is this? The haircut after the show?”

Bard’s chuckle grew into a laugh. “I can’t look too neat, Thran. People expect their artists to be a bit rough around the edges, not like some immaculate soccer dad.”

Thran’s surprise melted into arousal. “Ah. So I am not the only one who indulges a grunge kink around artists. One particular artist.”

Bard rolled his eyes. “I’m not showing up looking like your dodgy garret artist, Thran. A lot cleaner, for one thing.”

“What a pity,” Thran purred. “I would not suggest you smoke, either. That was erotic beyond words.”

“Around my artwork?” Bard gave him a skeptical snort. “Not a chance. My sketches wouldn’t last long around fire, and neither would Rahmiel.”

Thran suppressed a shudder. “Oh, gods. I should have thought. I am sorry, my saint. I suppose I understand our game in the garret a little better. You smoked to show your disregard for more than your lungs.”

Snickering, Bard squeezed Thran’s glute. “I smoked because I wanted to see if the same thing that snared my wife might also snare a vampire.”

Thran giggled. “What, not a husband?”

“I already had the husband. I was after a vampire on the side.”

“You are not a saint.”

“This is where I shamelessly steal my husband’s favorite line. You love me that way.”

“I crave you that way,” Thran purred. “Such a man you are. You nail me against a wall, in the back seat of my SUV, on the bare attic floor. I cannot wait until we devise our next game.”

“I thought about that while I spackled the walls,” Bard said.

“Did you?” Thran looked around in interest. “Ah, I see, the walls and ceiling progress. What about those prompted you to think about a game? Oh, you devise a game for our oasis, yes?”

“Only the beginnings of one. But before we get into that, tell me about your pointe lesson. Your feet are all right?”

“All is well,” Thran agreed, as Bard led him into the kitchen. Thran described how his pointe instructor had had him go through Immortal’s crucial pointe scene, and how she’d divided it up into pieces to help him know where he needed the most work. Bard stirred his pork barbeque, now falling apart into shreds quite nicely, and got out a package of buns from the freezer to thaw before supper.

“So this will help her know how to help you, as well as help you manage that scene better?” Bard surmised.

Thran nodded. “Very much so. I am encouraged. That smells very good, my saint. What is it?”

“Pork barbeque. More of a dish you’d find in the southern states than up here, but a friend in college put me onto it, and it’s great. Want a taste?”

“Of course.”

Bard got a spoon to scoop out a bit for Thran and held it out. “Better blow on it. It’s hot.”

Thran bent to do just that, then nibbled the sample. “Mmm! So spicy! Lots of cumin, yes?”

“Among other things. That’s more Indian than Southern US, I suppose, but I like it.”

“Very good. It goes on a bun?”

“Usually, but you don’t have to if you don’t want to. I can make farro if you’d rather have that.”

“I am still thinner than I prefer. Do we have whole wheat buns?”

“We do.” Bard pointed to the package thawing on the counter. “I’m looking out for you, angel.”

Thran kissed Bard’s ear. “You take very good care of me. I am humbled.”
“We promised to look out for each other. Giving you a whole wheat bun rather than a plain one is part of that.”

“And for my part, I will play the proud husband Saturday at your show. But that will be no chore. That will be entirely my pleasure. You must give me a few of Bilbo’s business cards to hand out for you, in case anyone seeks to talk to me.”

“They will, just because of who you are. You don’t have to go, you know.”

“Tcha, nothing can keep me away. Nothing! This will be a triumph, and I want to be with you to see it.”

Bard’s cheeks warmed. “I want you there, too. But I’d toyed with thinking it might be better for the children not to be there... because of Lance.”

Thran sobered. “You will not have an easy time of that. Sigrid will insist to be there.”

“She will, which is why I didn’t think about it very seriously. The other thing that came to mind is that if the children are elsewhere, then there’s the off chance that Lance will find out where they are, and try something while I’m at the gallery. So better that we’re all together.”

“We stay in force,” Thran nodded. “Plus we know that Mr. D and Inspector Oakland will be with us. That strengthens us while we are there.”

“That clinched it,” Bard nodded. “But I wanted to at least offer you the chance to stay clear of Lance. I can’t imagine that he won’t make an appearance at some point.”

“I think as you do. But we will be prepared. I will stay very close to Tilda – all of our children, of course, but especially her. I do not want Lance to frighten her again.”

“We have a plan,” Bard exhaled.

“We do,” Thran nodded firmly. “Good. Now you can tell me about this new game you devise for us.”

“It’s not like anything we’ve done before,” Bard warned.

“All the better. We try something new.”

“It’s not a couple of predators having at.”

“Do not play coy, lyubov moya,” Thran looked at Bard from under his lashes, an anticipatory smile tugging at his lips. “Tell me what you want of me for this new game.”

Bard paused for effect, until Thran was as intent on him as a cat on an oblivious mouse.

“I want a geisha.”

Thran’s eyebrows went nearly to his hairline, and he blinked at Bard for several seconds. Then his gaze sharpened.

“A geisha? Do you know what you ask? They are not what most people think they are.”

Thran nodded. “You are well informed.”
“I try to be.”

“And what part do you play in this game?”

Bard matched his husband’s anticipatory smile. “I let the geisha decide.”

“Ooh,” Thran’s eyes widened. “Delicious. I will consider.”

“You’ve got plenty of time,” Bard reminded Thran as his mobile alarm chimed. “I’ve got a ways to go before the geisha’s beautiful garden is ready.”

“But not a ways before supper,” Thran grinned, pointing to Bard’s mobile. “Time for the bus run, yes?”

“Yes,” Bard agreed, turning off the oven burner under the pot of barbeque. He followed Thran to the mudroom to head out to the bus stop. “But while we wait for the children, I want to tell you about this idea I had for the solarium ceiling.”

“Whatsoever your plan, it will be beautiful,” Thran gave him a wink to accompany the soft caress on his glute. “Worthy of all the delight that will come after.”

Bard’s chuckle was silent. No matter how much care he lavished on the solarium’s renovation, it wouldn’t come close to the pleasure he and his husband would share when it was complete. How glorious was that?
Chapter 107

Chapter Summary

The cherubs look forward to the future, and the angel savors the moment. Meanwhile, the saint does both of the things he does so well - look after his family, and worry.

I don't hold any rights to Big Bird or Sesame Street, but I do love all of the Muppets!

The children bounded into the house with their usual enthusiasm, delighted to be free of their classrooms for the day. Thran never failed to smile at their exuberance, but watching them brought him more than simple amusement. He also had to swallow down the lump in his throat each time tall, blond Legolas appeared amid his shorter, darker-haired siblings – how much of a gift was it to see his son every day, no matter how busy they both were? Even after four months together, his elation to welcome his son home every day had not dimmed. And to see him happy, with a family who supported him, was an even greater pleasure.

Today being Thursday, Legolas was full of excitement about the Gondors’ fencing lesson. He was even more excited about the summer intensives that his instructors would hold starting in June after the end of the regular school year. Of course, Thran wanted Legolas to attend just as much as his son did – he delighted to see Legolas’s skill at his favorite sport grow. There were also archery camps in the offing, which Legolas wanted to attend with Tara and Killian. Bain embraced a similar enthusiasm about soccer camp, so it was clear that both boys would be busy during the summer.

“What about you, lasses?” Bard asked Sigrid and Tilda as they all gathered around the kitchen island for their pre-supper snack. “Sports for either of you?”

“I was thinking I’d get a job,” Sigrid offered. “Maybe in the village? In one of the shops, maybe, or maybe the local newspaper offers an internship for writing or journalism? Or the library? If nothing comes of that, then maybe the writing intensive at school, and running camp.”

“All good choices,” Bard nodded. “There’s your driver’s class, too.”

“Lucky,” Bain muttered under his breath, which got a commiserating murmur from Legolas.

“I want to see whether I can get a job or an internship first,” Sigrid said, poking her tongue out at Bain. “If I do, then I’ll hold off the driver’s class until next fall. If I don’t, then I’ll take the driver’s class and something else this summer.”

“I can take you Saturday morning to make the rounds in the village if you want,” Bard offered. “It’s a bit late in the year to be looking for a summer job, but maybe you’ll get lucky. It’ll have to be early, as I don’t know if they’ll need me for something at the gallery before my show.”

Thran leaned on the kitchen island beside Bard and glanced at him. “Or I can take our Sigrid when I take Legolas to fencing, if you like.”

“We’ll make it happen, either way,” Bard nodded. “I’m sure we’ll need something in the village that needs a run.”

“Cheese?” Tilda piped from her perch on the stool at the end of the island where she arranged three kinds of her favorite treat on a plate. As her family laughed, she pushed the plate into the middle of the island. As hands dove toward the plate, she offered a mischievous grin. “We always need that. See?”

“That’s what Til will do all summer – eat cheese,” Bain teased.

“I will not!” Tilda protested through a mouthful of cheese and cracker, drawing even more laughter. “I have the same flyer you do, and it has a whole bunch of art things this summer. I’d like one of those. And swimming, maybe?”

“Ooh, swimming!” Bain perked up. “That’d be cool, too!”

“How is there swimming at the school?” Thran asked in surprise. “There is no pool!”

“I expect that the Y in the village is the place for swimming lessons,” Bard explained, looking at the sheet that Bain had handed him. “But the school seems to offer just about everything else you could possibly want.”

“The Imladris Academy does not stay still for a moment,” Thran observed. “Much like your old boarding school, Legolas.”

His son snorted – how much did he sound like Bain? “There’s no comparison, Papa. The summer sessions here include so many fun things, not just boring school subjects. People go to these because they want to, not because they have to.”

“The theatre department’s got three special ones that start the day after school’s out,” Sigrid added. “Lighting and sound crew, set design crew, and stage crew. Seems there’s some ballet going on in mid July that everyone’s hot to work on.”

Thran blinked as everyone’s gaze fell on him. “Is there? I have no idea what that is about.”

This time, everyone sounded like Bain, drawing his laughter. “Ah. I see I must work on my poker face.”

“It won’t help,” Bard poked Thran in the ribs with an elbow. “When all the people in the room know you just uttered a bald-faced lie, no poker face can convince them otherwise.”

“I suppose not,” Thran gave an exaggerated sigh. “Though such a tactic seems to work well for many politicians.”

That observation got a lot of hooted agreement. “Funny dancer,” Bard quipped, grinning.

“The politicians are not funny,” Thran grimaced. “But there is nothing to do about them – they are like mosquitoes, a constant menace. So we will leave them. I think we should look at the flyers for the summer classes, decide what everyone would like to take, and then we will see what the schedule becomes. Perhaps I will be able to deliver children to the school in the morning, as I will be in the final rehearsals for this mysterious ballet I know nothing about. But I do not know when such programs end during the day, so we must make sure that Bard can manage pickups. He will be a busy artist by then, and will have many demands on his time.”

“Maybe I should take the driver’s class, Da,” Sigrid noted. “If I took an early one, I could help drive people around.”
“As opposed to just drive us all crazy?” Bain needled.

“You’re just envious because I get to learn to drive before you do, twerp,” was Sigrid’s pert reply.

“Respect, both of you,” Bard inserted quietly.

“Yes, Da,” both children murmured, but Bain wasn’t quelled for long.

“It’s not like you’ll get to drive Thran’s fancy SUV around,” the boy riposted. “You’ll be stuck in Da’s truck.”

“That’s exactly the way I want it,” Sigrid said with a superior smile. “It’ll improve my street cred.”

“Street cred?” Bain gave his sister an exaggerated, gaping look of astonishment. “Street cred? This ain’t the city, Sig!”

“No, it’s not,” Legolas said soberly. “But from what all of you have told me, your city school had something in common with my boarding school – so many people postured and jockeyed and tried to one up everyone else. So many cliques! The Imladris academy is a lot more relaxed, and the people don’t put on so many airs.”

“More down to earth,” Bard summarized.

Legolas nodded, but a smile touched his lips. “That’s not to say that people don’t care about their image, or it’s not important to have good friends. Killian knew me from archery, and he knew Sigrid through Finn, and he and Tara are in several of our classes. So he and Tara included all of us in their group pretty quickly. But even without that, Sigrid’s got a pretty strong reputation.”

“Oh, do I?” Sigrid challenged, but her cheeks were red.

“You know you do, Sig,” Bain snorted. “How many times a day does somebody ask you to bring it?”

That was what Sigrid had said to Lance at the April Fool’s Follies.

The older girl darted a quick look at Tilda, and Bain winced as he, too, glanced at his younger sister. Tilda bit her lip in response.

“They stopped doing that ages ago,” Sigrid tossed off with studied nonchalance.

Tilda shot her a look. “They still say it on the bus,” the little girl murmured, and everyone fell quiet. Tilda looked around and gave a shrug that was just as studied as her sister’s. “Well, they do. And I know you talk about Lance when you think I can’t hear you.”

“We don’t want you to worry, Kukla,” Legolas said, his lips turning down.

“I know,” Tilda admitted. “But... it’s kind of hard not to worry, because you all keep talking about him, so... maybe there’s something to worry about? Anyway... I think I’d rather know what you’re talking about. Then I’d worry about just one thing, instead of everything.”

The three older children did exactly as Thran expected – they all looked at Bard. Despite the serious subject, Thran had to smother a grin. Whenever anything worrisome came up, everyone looked to Bard to sort it all out and make it right again. Bard met Thran’s eyes, divined exactly what he thought, and set about calming everyone with characteristic gentleness.

“There’s a saying about that, little doll,” Bard said easily as he leaned his elbows on the kitchen “Better the devil you know than the one you don’t.”

“If that means I’d rather know what’s going on about Lance than not know, I understand it.”

“It can explain why some people are afraid to take a risk, but this time, yes, it means that you’d rather know what’s going on than not. So what would you like to know?”

“The police haven’t caught Lance yet, have they?”

Bard shook his head. “Not yet. No one’s seen him anywhere near here, or in the city in our old neighborhood, either.”

“Maybe he went to Florida?” Tilda asked with a hopeful light in her eyes.

“Maybe he did. But we don’t know for sure.”

“But we have the security thing to protect the house now, right?”

Bard nodded. “We do. So no one but us can come in here, or the barn, or the carriage house, without the police knowing about it.”

“Okay,” Tilda nodded, taking a deep breath. “That’s good. So maybe he’ll leave us alone now.”

“I hope so,” Bard agreed. “But we’ll keep watch for a while longer, just to make sure everyone’s safe. That’s why tomorrow evening, we’ll all go to my art show, so we’ll all be together. And I heard from an old friend – Mr. D’s going to stop by.”

“Mr. D?” Tilda’s face lit up. “I’ve missed seeing him. It’ll be fun to see him again. Maybe we should bring him a sandwich.”

If the older children took anything from that other than a visit from a fixture in their old neighborhood, none of them revealed it – surely to keep from upsetting Tilda.

“There’s going to be food at the show, but we’ll eat supper ahead of time. We want to leave all the little nibbles to the people who come to the show.”

Both the boys groaned under their breath at that, drawing Thran’s smile.

“I have a consolation prize for hungry children who generously leave the small snacks to art patrons,” Thran said, his smile widening into a grin as the children’s eyes all riveted on him. Bard’s eyes, however, were more mystified than eager. “Tomorrow is Bard’s show, and Monday is his birthday, yes? So Sunday would be a good day to celebrate both, yes? Perhaps to see my friend Kasim for a big lunch?”

How gratifying was it to see Bard’s eyes wax with warm affection? “I’d like that a lot, angel. We had such a good dinner there. It’d be great to go back.”

“Then we will,” Thran nodded.

“Is that the place with the raw oysters?” Tilda asked.

“That’s the one,” Legolas nodded vigorously. “And so many other good things, too, Kukla – wait’ll you see! So many kinds of fish, and the best tiny octopus in sauce, and clams, and this great beet salad, and these special tiny muffins –”

“Muffins?” Tilda interrupted. “What kind of muffins?”
“All kinds. Two different kinds, every time. I like the cherry ones.”

“Cherry muffins?” Tilda repeated, giving that serious consideration.

“Better than Da’s?” Sigrid asked with a bit of a territorial skepticism that made Thran snicker.

“Well... not quite,” Legolas conceded tactfully. “They’re different flavors than Bard’s. But very good.”

“I’m in,” was Bain’s decisive answer. “Muffins, octopus, it sounds great.”

“I don’t have to eat any oysters or octopus, do I?” Tilda said dubiously.

“Of course not, silly,” Bain snorted. “It’s a restaurant. They bring you stuff you want, not stuff you don’t want.”

“I’m not silly,” Tilda corrected, frowning at her brother. “I just don’t want to eat... squirmy things.”

That sent a laugh around the table.

“You do not have to eat any squirmy things, Kukla,” Thran assured her. “They have a nice dish of small shrimp with a lemon butter sauce, or a small fish pie with a crust like your Da’s pot pie, or salmon, or many other things. And if by accident any squirmy things should appear on your plate, you will have several of us to eat it for you. Kasim also makes a most delicious crème brulée au chocolat avec des framboises, which I know you would enjoy very much.”

“Chocolate crème brulée with raspberries?” Tilda translated, her eyes widening. “Ooh! Yes, I’m in, too!”

“Me, too,” Sigrid nodded, laughing at her siblings. She poked out her tongue at Bain. “And I might just try one of those squirmy things. Maybe an oyster, or a piece of octopus. As long as none of it’s still moving.”

“Ewwwwww!” Tilda made a horrified face and clapped her hands over her mouth. “That’s disgusting!”

“Wow, I bet it slithers all the way down!” Bain teased.

“Yuck! Stop it!” Tilda put her hands over her ears. “I don’t want to hear anything about slithering, squirmy food!”

“That’s enough, Bain,” Bard cautioned, laughing. “Don’t worry, Til. Kasim will take good care of you, and make sure no slithering, squirmy food comes your way. It’ll be fun.”

“Okay,” Tilda agreed. “Even if anyone else gets squirmy things, I don’t have to, and there’s crème brulée, so I’m ready.”

“Then I will call Kasim tonight and make a reservation for lunch on Sunday for us. We will have a good time.”

“All right!” Legolas cheered, sounding almost as boisterous as Bain. How the past four months had changed his son, and for the better! Legolas was still quieter than Bain and Sigrid, but he was more open with his thoughts and feelings, and he laughed more than Thran remembered since before his mother’s death. Their new family had brought his son as much happiness as it had Thran.

As the children bustled about to pull out lunch bags, unpack homework, and ask about supper duties,
Thran stroked a surreptitious hand over Bard’s back.

“What?” Bard murmured, turning his gaze on Thran.

“Life is sweet,” Thran murmured in reply. “Nothing more.”

Bard squeezed Thran’s glute in mischievous reply, and his smile was impish. “That’s good. That’s all we need.”

It was.

* * *

Bard was glad that supper was a busy affair, as was the long discussion after homework about which child wanted to sign up for which summer program. It was a distraction from his rising anticipation – all right, his worry – about his upcoming art show. He managed to get to sleep reasonably well, but he thought he dreamed a lot, though what those dreams were about, he couldn’t recall. He was further distracted Friday morning, as Thran, Imo, Ori, and the UVB dancers were back in the ballroom, and there was a lot of going and coming. He threw a pan of chicken into the oven for Thran’s lunch, then retreated to the solarium. He moved most of the room’s contents into the main room and laid down drop cloths all over the limestone floor so that he could prime the ceiling and walls without worrying about paint staining anything. His nervous energy was enough that he got the primer on before lunchtime.

After lunch, he headed to the homeowners’ mecca to look for paint that would match the scrap of velvet left over from reupholstering the fainting couch. He had a couple of leaves from the palms and ferns, too, as well as a piece of one of the screens to see what greens would work best with the wood and the plants.

Nothing there matched his samples as closely as he wanted, but they had the metal primer paint he wanted, so he bought that. Then, with some trepidation, he headed to the fancy designer paint store. He found a premium color that exactly matched the velvet – of course it was called Ultraviolet – so he got a gallon of exterior gloss for all the garden furniture. He also got a quart of the same color in interior matte, because he’d mix that with white in varying amounts to make his cloud-strewn sky.

The green was an interesting challenge. The woman helping Bard listened to his description of the room and the impression he wanted to make, looked at the pictures of the solarium he showed her on his mobile, and studied his samples of fabric, wood, and leaves. The paint card she pulled out of the rack showed a vibrant lime green with a tinge of yellow in it. It was much brighter than Bard expected, and Bard said so.

“It is,” the woman nodded. “But you won’t see much of it, really. You’re going to cover the house wall with your screens and archway, and your tall windows cover most of the facing wall. The other two walls both have a doorway in them. Your palms and other plants will further screen those walls, so that only the tops of them show. The vivid green will help bounce the light around, and make it a little more tropical.” She laid the sample card next to that for the ultraviolet paint, and Bard had to admit that the combination was striking. “You could buy a sample-sized pot, try it on the wall where it shows most, and see what you think.”

Bard nodded. “That’s a good idea. You’re right about how it makes the blue look so much more vibrant, so I’ll see how it looks on site. If it’s right, I’ll be back.”

“I’ll be here,” the woman smiled, as they walked over to the cash register.

The price of the blue paint and two sample pots of the green nearly took his breath away, but Bard handed over his credit card without a tremor. Paying less for the wrong color was stupid, because every time he’d go into the solarium, he’d wish he’d bought the right one. The right color, then, was worth more than what it cost.

Heading home, Bard stopped at the market for the week’s groceries, got home to stow everything away, and got his truck snugged away in the carriage house. Thran and company were still dancing away, so he headed back to the solarium. It took only a couple of minutes to smooth one sample pot of the green onto a side wall. He fished out the bit of blue velvet to hold it against the green. It looked good so far, but he wanted to wait until it was dry before he made his final decision. He wanted to see the color as the light changed during the day, too.

He still had an hour before the children’s bus would arrive. He was still too antsy to sit, so he brought one of the garden chairs from the gazebo up to the terrace. Another drop cloth went down, the wire brush came out, and Bard scraped the intricate ironwork of the chair down to as much bare metal as he could manage. A small grinding tool from the barn helped him get the stubborn bits of paint out of the crevasses. He brought the chair into the solarium, where he gave it a good coat of the metal primer. After it dried for twenty-four hours, he’d repaint it with the ultraviolet blue, and then he could better judge whether the unexpected green was the right color or not.

It did look great peeking out from behind the Moroccan screens...

His mobile chimed, so he cleaned up the painting things before he made his run to the bus stop. From then through the rest of the night, life was too busy for him to think about his show. Bain was a grimy mess from soccer, part of his plan to encourage Bard to let him have his turn in the soaking tub, so Bard sent him upstairs to clean up while the other children helped get supper ready. Bain reappeared, much cleaner and certainly better smelling, in time to sit down to grilled salmon, farro, various stir-fried veg, and fruit with the family. Discussion around the table was extra-animated – all of the children were excited for the weekend, and what they wanted to do during the summer, and could they please bring in their signup fees and forms to school on Monday so they made sure they would have first choice at the spots? Thran was full of details about the ballet, how the set would soon be built, and when costume fittings would begin. After supper, everyone was still too excited to settle down to read Harry Potter, so the video games got a heavy workout. Bard didn’t say much throughout, but he was glad to laugh at all of the stir. He did have to moderate a discussion about the green paint on the solarium walls; the jury was still out, mostly because the dimming light wasn’t enough to do the color justice. When at last he fell into bed, he was grateful to be physically as well as mentally tired, and fell asleep quickly.

A couple of hours later, though, he was awake with mind churning and stomach fluttering. Waiting until something happened was the worst thing to endure, because no one could speed time on its way. Bilbo hadn’t called him all day – was that good, or bad? Maybe he should stop into the gallery tomorrow morning when he took Sigrid around the village – or would that make him look nervous? Eager? Desperate? Or outright egotistical?

Beside him, Thran slept quietly. Bard held himself still, not wanting to wake his husband. Or maybe he should – a comforting word might calm him a little, unless it made him feel worse...

Gritting his teeth, Bard shut his eyes, and forced his breathing to be deep and even. Ugh – this was pointless! He was not the least sleepy. He’d end up lying here like a board all night –
Music wound its way into his ears. Morning already? He had fallen back to sleep, then, thank the gods. Thran roused beside him, rolled over to give him a good morning snuggle, then padded into the bathroom. Bard followed him in, and they dressed quietly. Bard was aware enough to notice that this morning Thran didn’t pull on his leggings with his tee, but a pair of blue athletic shorts. They weren’t the long, baggy things that were so popular with many of their children’s friends, but were as well fitting as anything else in Thran’s wardrobe. Honestly, his husband could wear a plastic garbage bag and look elegant and ethereal –

“What?” Thran looked up as he pulled on his shorts, his beautiful white hair sheeting around him like silk.

“You’ve got the longest legs on the planet,” Bard shook his head.

“Ah,” Thran smiled as he put his hand to his heart and offered Bard a pleased bow. “Thank you, my saint. It is good to hear you speak. You are very preoccupied this morning. Did you sleep at all?”

Bard gave his husband a look of chagrin. “I thought you were asleep. How long did I keep you up?”

“You did not. But the time or two I stirred, I think you were awake. I did not want to intrude.
Perhaps I should have.”

Bard ran both hands through his hair. “Gods, I don’t know myself. I’m sorry, angel. I thought I was quiet.”

“You were. But I am familiar with pre-performance excitement, you understand.”

“I used to be.”

Thran came to enfold Bard in his arms, and stroked his back slowly. “This will go well, lyubov moya. You have worked hard, your sketches and sculpture are brilliant, and Bilbo has outdone himself for you. You will see.”

“I hope so.” Bard didn’t speak of his anxiety, mostly because saying it aloud might make it more than he could bear. Instead he soaked up the comfort of Thran’s embrace. “Gods, I need to stay busy so I don’t think about it. What would you like for breakfast?”

“Hmm, let us consider. Legolas must have a good breakfast before his fencing. I will not fence today, because I am well exercised from the ballet. If I delay my barre, we may all eat together, and then I can go into the village with you and the children. Tilda and I can visit the cheese shop, and Bain will like the bookstore and the used game store, and you can shadow Sigrid on her rounds. So we need a big breakfast for so many endeavors. Perhaps eggs and muffins? No, we will have muffins tomorrow with Kasim. Biscuits, then.”

“Eggs and biscuits are good,” Bard nodded. “Let’s roust the troops.”

The children soon joined them in the kitchen. Bard stayed busy boiling and frying and scrambling eggs, and shuttling both plain and cheese biscuits in and out of the oven. He wasn’t hungry – mute testimony to his nerves – but just when he thought no one had noticed his lack of appetite, all of the children badgered him to the table. A soft-boiled egg and a couple of biscuits settled his stomach a bit, and trying to jockey four children into dressing and moving towards Thran’s SUV was engrossing. They delivered Legolas to the Gondors’ studio, then headed to the village’s main thoroughfare. Thran, Bain, and Tilda set off for the cheese shop, and Bard and Sigrid began their rounds of the shops where Sigrid might find a summer job.

In deference to Sigrid, Bard didn’t stick to her shoulder. He let her decide where and how she wanted to ask about a job, and stayed outside while she went inside. He’d brought a sketchpad and pencils with him, which gave him something to concentrate on while he waited for Sigrid.

That’s not to say that he didn’t also keep an eye out for a certain angry teenager, but so far, Lance was nowhere to be seen.

“Da! Da!” Sigrid called as she hurried out of the Blue Mountain Bistro, the shop where Bard had stood Sam and Rosie lunch before his show. “This place offered me a job on the spot, but only if I can work on the weekends before school ends. I want to. Is that okay?”

“They did? What’s the story?”

“Don’t worry, I asked,” Sigrid replied, her eyes dancing with excitement. “The lady who runs the place was expecting to need help soon because one of her employees is pregnant, but the baby came six weeks early, so she’s short-handed. She says I can have a summer job if I can start now on weekends for the breakfast and lunch crowd. I’d be a barista and a waitress, and I’d make up salads and sandwiches, too. It smells really good in there, too, not that that means one thing or another. And she was nice. So what do you think?”

“The food’s good, without a doubt. What do you think about the owner?”

“A lot of the customers know her by name, and she remembers a lot of their usual orders by heart, if the fifteen minutes I’ve been talking to her is any indication. She smiles a lot. And even though she’s a little frantic right now, she still took the time to answer everything I asked. She asked me good questions, too.”

“We’ll need to get you there and back. What do you think about that?”

“What if I got a secondhand bicycle? It’s just a couple of miles, so I could take care of that.”

“What about your driver’s test?”

“There’s an afternoon class the first two weeks of the summer session. So I could still do both.”

“What about Finn?”

“That’s the hard part, yeah,” she admitted. “But I’ll still have Saturday and Sunday afternoons free when he makes it up to Killian’s. And if he can convince his Da to let him go to the Imladris Academy next year, I’ll see him every day. I want to save up a little money for college, at least for some textbooks, so it doesn’t all land on you.”

“I appreciate the thought, sweetness. Just one more thing to think about – it’s important to keep up your grades for college, so will having a job interfere with that?”

Sigrid nodded eagerly. “I thought about that before I said I wanted to look for a job. I know I’ll have to work hard, but I’m willing to do it, and not just to make a little money. Having a job might help me when I apply to college, because it shows I know how to work hard.”

“Sounds like you’ve thought it through,” Bard nodded. “I think we can swing it.”

“I need a loan for the bicycle, but I’ll pay you back when I get paid.”

“That’s a good plan.”

“So it’s okay? She wants me to start next Saturday.”
“It’s okay by me. Just make sure you understand what you’re committing to, and can do what the job requires. It’s not fair to the owner if you can’t.”

“I can do it,” Sigrid said firmly. She gave Bard a quick hug. “Thanks, Da. Thank you!”

Sigrid bounced out of his arms and back into the bistro, leaving Bard to smile. His fierce, sweet daughter was on her way into the world.

Twenty minutes later, Sigrid reappeared, flushed with success. She’d filled out the proper paperwork, so was all set for her first day next Saturday morning. When she and Bard caught up with Thran, Bain, and Tilda, she was still excited.

“You’re willingly going to get up early every Saturday and Sunday morning?” Bain exclaimed. “Boy, that is so not me!”

“I’ll be done by three, every day. Lots of time to do stuff,” Sigrid said stoutly.

“Like nap,” Bain rejoined. “That is so me!”

“You sports camp doesn’t start much later than that,” Bard pointed out. “Nine a.m.”

“Seven and nine are two hours apart. Two hours of sleep apart,” Bain pointed out. “Two very important hours of sleep, I might add. And it’s not for all summer. Just eight weeks.”

“It’s too hot to run around outside all summer,” Tilda said, munching a bit of her latest cheese purchase. “I’d rather be in the shade like Sigrid.”

“That’s right, Til,” Sigrid grinned. “You ought to smell it in there – coffee, cinnamon, bread, the best smells outside of Da’s kitchen. Miss Dís has gelato, too.”

“That is the lady who owns the bistro?” Thran asked.

Sigrid nodded. “Dís Durin is her name. But everyone calls her Miss Dís.”

Bard pulled out his mobile to check the time. “We have to pick up Legolas before long. I want to check in with the gallery to see if there’s anything they need from me, then we can go. On the way back, we can check the bike shop to see if they have something Sigrid can use.”

They made a quick stop at the gallery. Celebrían nodded when he came in, and greeted the rest of the family with a pleased smile and handshakes all round.

“No, everything’s in order, which is typical of Bilbo,” the gallery owner shook her head at Bard’s inquiry. “I think tonight’s show will go well, Bard. I’ve already sold a pair of your loose sketches, believe it or not, and several people have expressed interest in some of the framed pieces. Of course, we’ll hold those until the show. But the biggest stir is over Rahmiel. He’s drawn several people in off the street already.”

“Of course he causes a stir,” Sigrid said as if it were obvious. “He’s amazing.”

Celebrían laughed. “He certainly is. Bilbo will be here at about four-thirty or five. So I’ll see you shortly after that, I hope.”

“I’ll be here. With entourage,” Bard waved his hands at Thran and the children.

“The more the merrier,” Celebrían nodded, laughing. “Until later, then.”
“Until later,” Bard echoed, and the family trooped out.

“Wow, Da, the framed stuff looked amazing,” Bain commented as they walked back to Thran’s SUV.

“I liked the angel,” Tilda said. “Are you going to sell him?”

“No,” chorused Sigrid and Thran in emphatic voices.

“I guess not,” Bard said mildly to Tilda. “I think your Ada and your sister want to keep him around.”

“I do, too,” Tilda said, slipping her hand into Bard’s. “I like his wings and his floofy hair. I wish my hair did that.”

“You need a floofy Muppet hat,” Bard teased. “But a brighter color. Maybe red?”

“Bright green, like that paint you bought, Da,” Bain teased. “With some yellow and orange mixed in.”

“That’d be cool,” Tilda said. “Or maybe that green with purple and turquoise. Ada, you could get a white one with red.”

“Better than a yellow one,” Thran deadpanned. “Otherwise, someone might mistake me for the tall bird on Sesame Street? Big Bird?”

That got a laugh as they piled into the SUV. Legolas was soon in the back beside Bain, and they made their way to the bike shop. Nothing hit their fancy, so they headed home. While Thran disappeared into the ballroom to do his barre, Bard mixed up jambalaya for lunch. Sigrid and Legolas made a quick raisin and cardamom snack cake for dessert, while Bain and Tilda made salad. By the time Thran was through his work, the kitchen smelled delicious.

Lunch didn’t last long. Not for the first time, Bard wished the food lasted as long as it took to prepare it, but as long as Clan Ffyrnig remained so busy, appetites would remain healthy. During the cleanup, the lime green paint of the solarium came up, and everyone had to troop into the room and weigh in on what they thought. On such a bright, sunny day, the lime green glowed, even when one of the wooden screens went over it. Bard and Tilda dabbed the new blue paint over the chair he’d primed yesterday, which everyone liked. The boys carefully brought in the fainting couch to see how well it matched the chair, and suddenly the room came into focus.

“Yes, the blue paint matches the velvet, and yes, the green paint makes the most of both of them. The palms, too,” was Thran’s conclusion, as Legolas trailed in with another palm, and Sigrid brought in one of the ferns. “Yes, it is a very unexpected color in the store, but it looks wonderful here.”

“I like it,” Tilda nodded. “Not shiny. That would look weird. But this looks soft.”

“You mean you like the matte finish better than a gloss finish,” Bard said.

Tilda nodded again. “Yes. It’ll look like a big green forest, not like car paint.”

Everyone laughed, but no one disputed Tilda’s characterization.

“You’re going to put clouds on the ceiling, too, Bard?” Legolas looked up. “That’ll look amazing.”

“Cool,” Bain pronounced it.

“Very cool,” Sigrid nodded. “So yeah, I thought the green looked a little weird last night, but in the sun, it's wow.”

“The pundits of paint have spoken,” Bard teased. “The green stays.”

“Awesome,” Bain grinned. “So, Legs, maybe soccer in the back yard?”

“Sure,” the blonde boy agreed. “Aragorn’s told us we need to work on our endurance, but it’d be a lot more fun to do that playing soccer than just plain running.”

“Can I play, too?” Tilda asked plaintively.

“Sure, Til,” Sigrid said. “I'll come, too. Just let me put my shorts on.”

As the children headed outside, Thran helped Bard move the fainting couch back into the main room, and the plants next to the big windows in the ballroom. He got a big package of chicken out of the freezer to thaw in the fridge for tomorrow’s feast with the Gamgees, and decided hamburgers would be good for tonight’s supper. Thran helped him make a big pot of beans, then Bard looked around for something more to do.

Arms went around him from behind. “What you need,” purred a silky voice in his ear, “is for me to haul you to bed and fuck you dry, until you cannot muster the energy to worry. We would not eat, we would not rest, we would not get out of bed until the last second before your show. But that would scar our children for life, so we must find another way to distract you.”

Bard stroked the forearms that held him so close, and rubbed his cheek against the lips that offered him a lingering caress. “For any reason other than the children, I’d let you. But... gods, angel, this waiting, this fucking waiting...”

“I know,” Thran sighed. “But we will find something to do. We have the supper in hand. There is no painting we can do right now. Ah, there are many more garden benches, yes? We can begin on the next one. Or we can look at the gazebo. Perhaps it needs to be swept, or... something?”

“It needs a lot of something,” Bard admitted, leaning against Thran. “Too much to sort out today. But we can scrape a bench or two, if you want. That’s reasonably therapeutic.”

“Then let us do so.”

Thran urged Bard out to the terrace, so Bard fetched another bench, set it on the drop cloth, and then showed Thran how to scrape off all the loose paint with a wire brush. Thran kept up a running line of patter as they scraped to distract Bard from worrying. Between the two of them, they got the bench down to bare metal, brought it inside, and coated it with the rustproofing primer. By then, it was time for everyone to cycle through the showers before supper. Hamburgers and beans went on the table quickly, disappeared even more quickly, then at long last, they were back in Thran’s SUV and heading for the village.

As Thran drove, so many emotions flitted in and out of Bard’s thoughts until he felt like a very small boat in the middle of a very large, seething storm. Was it better to wish the gods would strike him dead now out of mercy, or to wait until he found out that his show had been a dismal flop? It hardly seemed possible to believe that it would end up otherwise, no matter how many times Thran or the children or Bilbo or Celebrían told him how distinctive and beautiful his stuff was. Ten years had passed since he’d had the balls to call himself an artist – what if he didn’t have the right to do so anymore?

What if he wasn’t Thran’s equal, or able to see to his children? What if he was fit for nothing other than scraping woodwork and priming garden benches?
Don’t let the past ten years make you doubt. Your stuff is good. It’s better than good. Believe in it. Believe in yourself.

It was one thing to say that. It was another to shake off the pall of ten years of misfortune, where hope had been nothing more than bait that attracted shattering disappointment.

Bard clamped his mouth shut, and shut his eyes as he marshaled his strength. Somehow, he had to get through the next three hours.
Chapter 108

Chapter Summary

The saint's art show has arrived. Expect to see a flurry of friends.

Will a malevolent sprite show up as well?

Thran cast a quick glance at his husband. Bard stared out of the window of the vehicle, silent and nervous. His poor saint had been distracted and apprehensive all day, though he had managed food with his usual care, and bench scraping with reasonable thoroughness. All that proved was that Bard had cooked and made home repairs for so long that he did both well without thinking, because today all the poor man could think about was the impending failure that he feared awaited him at his gallery show. Everyone in the family, even Tilda, knew how keyed up he was. Why else would he have forgotten about Lance Dunmont when Sigrid proposed bicycling alone into the village for her job? As soon as Thran had figured out why they’d stopped at the bicycle store, he’d gathered the younger children aside before any of them spoke their worry aloud. He’d reminded them of Bard’s show, and assured them that he would take up the matter soon enough. He was glad that they hadn’t seen a bicycle at the shop that Sigrid or Bard wanted to buy. That meant Thran hadn’t had to speak up immediately, which would have added the family’s concern with an angry teenaged stalker to the anxiety that roiled Bard’s thoughts.

If only Thran had been able to keep Bard in bed for the afternoon! If the children had been older, and if Lance Dunmont’s whereabouts hadn’t been a concern, he would have sent them to the cinema, then made sure that Bard would be too exhausted to waste energy on worry. But he’d managed to divert Bard by asking so many questions about painting a garden bench, and how he would hang the Moroccan screens and the archway on the solarium walls, and whether they should paint a trompe l’oeil mural around the lion’s head fountain, and how to replace the cracked floor tile with the tessellation he and Tilda wanted to make. He asked anything that would make Bard think about something other than everything that could go wrong with this evening’s show.

Thran had never felt nervous about performing. If dancing in rehearsal, or even standing at the barre, was a pleasure, then performing was ten times more of a delight. The fanciful costumes, the smell of hot lights and theatrical makeup and sweat, the swell of the music, and the gasp of the audience when he executed a jeté were aphrodisiacs in everything but name. Even the most difficult ballet became a love affair once the performance began, and he didn’t feel the bruised feet, the cramping calves, the aching lungs, or the overstretched back until the curtain fell.

Bard didn’t have that act of creation to look forward to tonight. Where Thran’s ballet performances were ephemeral, never to be experienced in the same way again, Bard’s performances had taken place days and weeks and months ago when he drew and sculpted. The results of his performances, however, were preserved as Thran’s were not – they left pictures and figures behind, not memories. Tonight, then, was not a performance, but a judgment of the results of many performances. The closest thing in Thran’s world that might be comparable was if someone had filmed one of Thran’s performances, and now held a public critique of it.

Ah, no wonder Bard was so worried. Anything deemed a flaw, a misstep, an incorrect interpretation, was preserved in Bard’s sculpture and sketches for all to see, and couldn’t be changed. There was no
Thran took a marshaling breath. There were no missteps in any of Bard’s distinctive sketches, his expressive sculpture. His saint’s art was beautiful. A single glance would make that obvious –

To anyone but his husband, that is. Bard had endured so much disappointment, and his nervousness tonight showed that he still didn’t dare hold faith that his situation would change. Very well – Thran would hold faith for both of them. Tonight would be the recognition and acclamation that Bard deserved. Tonight, people would see the same magic that Thran did, and nothing would prevent Bard from finally, finally believing in his visions. No art critic would dare demean his saint’s work, and no one would resist Rahmiel’s appeal for love and mercy.

No fucking wastrel of a want-to-be street thug teenager would ruin tonight, either.

Bard liked to tease Thran about being a covert operator for the Russian mafia. He was not. But if Lance Dunmont tried to interrupt one second of his husband’s show tonight, he would face more than a deathly glare from the Prince of Ice. After everything this pathetic excuse of a child had done to terrorize his Kukla, threaten his fierce lioness, and incite a drug lord to shoot lyubov yego, Thran craved any chance to make Lance Dunmont beg to be turned over to the nearest policeman. Thran would oblige him... eventually.

He parked the SUV in the big lot behind the row of shops that included the gallery, and everyone climbed out.

“How do you want to take Mr. D’s present in with us?” he asked Bard before he locked the SUV.

“What?” Bard gave him an absent-minded look. “Oh, the case of ale and the Scotch. Gods, I’d forgotten about both of them.”

“I did not. Both are in the back of the SUV.”

“I think it’d be better to leave them here. We can deliver them after the show.”

“So we will. Children, remember your books and your games.”

Bard shot him another distracted look. Thran had been the one who’d asked the children to bring something with them, in case the novelty of looking at art patrons palled, because Bard had been too preoccupied to do so.

His poor saint.

Thran duly locked the SUV. Clan Ffyrnig walked up to the main street, turned right, and headed for the Ilithien Gallery.

“Ooh, look, Da!” Tilda caught Bard’s hand to pull him forward. “Your angel is all lit up in the window!”

He certainly was. Celebrían had framed the display window with white novelty lights; each bulb was veiled in wisps of organza to look like floating seed puffs, or perhaps small sprites. Whichever the case, they made a whimsical accompaniment to the angel with outstretched wings. A can light at the base of Rahmiel’s stand cast warm light up and over the full stretch of the feathers, and beautifully illuminated his face so that he seemed to smile. Why hadn’t Thran noticed before how Rahmiel held one hand out to the saint’s upstretched arm? The two limbs made a strong diagonal line that told a story of the saint’s plea for help and the angel’s response.
Thran’s throat knotted. Despite the misunderstandings that had destroyed the first Rahmiel, Bard had recreated him with more beauty and depth. The angel was not quite so physically perfect, but he was warmer, more immediate, more alive. So many things came to mind that he needed to tell Bard – how beautiful Rahmiel was, and how humble Thran was to see the concrete evidence of Bard’s regard for him. But no words came out, and his eyes stung.

“He’d look better if I’d done him in darker clay, but the stuff doesn’t come in any other color,” Bard shook his head.

“Do not say one word in criticism,” Thran murmured. “Not a single one. He is divine, and I will not let you say otherwise.”

“I won’t, either,” Sigrid said with a gulp. She turned a fierce glare on Bard. “He’s amazing and spectacular and wonderful, and anyone with eyes knows it. You’ve got eyes, so why you and you alone haven’t figured it out yet is beyond me.”

“Yeah, Da,” Bain said stoutly.

“He is very beautiful,” Legolas agreed. “I’ve never seen anyone make anything like him.”

“No one else can make an angel with feather wings and floofy hair,” Tilda said to Legolas. “Nobody at all. Just my Da.”

Bard’s face eased into a sheepish smile. “Um, I’m glad you all like him. He turned out pretty well.”

Sigrid’s snort was supreme disgust. “Oh, ye gods and little fishhooks, Da, you’re dense! Come on, let’s go in.”

When Bard preceded everyone into the gallery, Sigrid shooed the rest of the children in front of her, then gave Thran a high five before she followed her siblings. Thran gave a quick look up and down the street before he trailed his family, but he saw nothing and no one untoward.

As Thran shut the gallery door behind him, Bilbo came forward to greet Bard with a warm, wide smile. He had a word for each of the children, and Celebrían appeared with a glad expression. As they chatted, Thran took the moment to look around the gallery. The entrance room and the room off to the left were tastefully staged to showcase a variety of art, from oils and watercolors to small ceramics and sculpture. Another room behind the room on the left spoke of more display space, but Thran didn’t venture there. The rooms on the right were the ones where Bard’s work was displayed, and he wanted to see how Bilbo, Frodo, and Celebrían had arranged the sketches and sculpture. He offered a warm smile of welcome to Celebrían as she greeted him.

“How nice to see you again, Mr. Oropherson,” Celebrían said, holding out her hand.

He took her hand, and offered his usual small bow over it. “Please, call me Thran.”

“Thank you. I’m Celebrían.”

“My husband’s angel Rahmiel looks divine in the window. Thank you for such a beautiful display.”

“The piece creates its own divinity, really,” the gallery owner shrugged with an appreciative smile. “I can’t tell you how many people stopped in today, just on the strength of Bard’s stunning angel. I’ve sold eight of his loose sketches already, and I hope to sell many more tonight.”

“That is wonderful,” Thran smiled. “It is the most amazing thing to watch him make those sketches, Celebrían. I understand you are a painter, so perhaps you understand how he is able to draw the
“His work is so spontaneous,” Celebrían nodded. “Much more so than mine. The thing I like most when I work in oils is how much depth it offers. I love the different effects I discover when I layer the colors, so my work is a discovery over time, rather than an immediate revelation. Bard’s sketches come so fast, Bilbo tells me, and yet that spontaneity endures in the sketch itself. It’s a wonderful gift.”

“I cannot wait to see how the framed pieces look together on the gallery wall,” Thran said.

“I’m more than pleased. Bilbo has a good eye, and his nephew, Frodo, is following right in his uncle’s footsteps. Some of his framing choices are inspired. Please, enjoy the show.”

Celebrían excused herself to speak to new arrivals, so Thran checked to see where the children were. He found them circulating in the two rooms featuring Bard’s pieces, looking at the sketches and commenting on them, so he took a minute to scan the art for himself. Yes, Frodo’s frames were lovely; some were simple and stark while others were very elaborate, but each was tailored to the subject of the sketch. Several people were already clustered around Rahmiel, even though there was still a few minutes before the show officially started. The Ring Thing and Sea Spot Run had also attracted attention. Frodo knelt by the former, adjusting a small fan behind it to keep the rings in gentle motion. Someone had threaded a string of small point lights down the middle of Sea Spot Run to illuminate it from within, an effect that Thran liked very much. He came to stand beside Bard as he talked to Bilbo.

“You don’t want to know how nervous I am,” Bard was murmuring to the artist’s rep.

“You look quite calm,” Bilbo soothed. “I don’t believe you have anything to worry about, Bard. Everyone I’ve talked to, or heard talking about your pieces, has been very positive.”

“All will be well,” Thran agreed. “Frodo has done a masterful job of framing your pieces, and Bilbo and Celebrían have arranged everything so perfectly.”

Bard’s swallow wasn’t too obvious, but Thran’s stomach tightened in sympathy all the same. “You’re right, Thran. Everything looks perfect.”

Tilda appeared at Thran’s side. “Da, may we please have one of the little cakes? Just one apiece?”

“Not to worry,” Bilbo gave the little girl a warm grin. “I thought one or two of you might accompany your father tonight, so I set aside a few things just for you. What do you think about that?”

Tilda’s eyes sparkled. “Oh, yes, please! Thank you very much!”

“Right this way, then,” Bilbo held out his hand, indicating a small room at the back of the gallery. “Miss Celebrían’s kindly offered her office so you and your brothers and sister can have your own private party.”

“Please be polite and courteous, and do not rearrange the papers,” Thran said hastily, following along behind.

All of the children looked affronted except for Tilda, who looked up at him quizzically. “Why would we do that, Ada? That’s too much like homework, and I don’t think I can do Mrs. L’Eärendil’s homework very well.”

“An excellent point, Kukla,” Thran nodded. “I am sure you are correct. I thank you for your consideration.”

“Look, there’s Mr. D!” Sigrid pointed.

Thran turned, and sure enough, there was the short, squat Scotsman shouldering his way through the growing crowd like any old rugby prop half. Mr. D had on his usual jeans and heavy boots, and his plain black tee revealed a variety of colorful tattoos that stretched from knuckles to shoulders. His permanent glower lightened a hair when the children rushed over to say hello.

“Hello, ye bonny lasses, ye braw lads! ‘T is good to see ye all!”

“Hi, Mr. D!” Tilda gave him a big smile. “I wanted to bring you a sandwich so you’d remember who I was, but my Da said he had a present for you, and Mr. Bilbo made sure to order some good stuff to eat that you’d like. It’s ham biscuits. I know you like those.”

“Aye, lassie, I do,” Mr. D replied. Thran managed to catch his eye. “Thran, good to see ye again. Not so pale this time, are ye?”

“I am not,” Thran agreed with a smile. “Children, I must take Mr. D from you for just a moment, so that Bard knows he is here.”

“Okay, Ada; okay, Thran; yes, Papa,” the children chorused, and let Thran draw Mr. D away.

“Tilda does not know that Lance might be here tonight, but the older children do,” Thran murmured lowly to the much shorter policeman.

“I thought that might be the case. I’ll stay mum around the wee one, then,” Mr. D rumbled in reply, his usual grim visage returning to his face.

“Bard is quite preoccupied, which is only natural. I, however, am not. I will not let Lance ruin tonight. If you need me, I am here.”

“Good man,” Mr. D gave him a glower, but it was a conspiratorial one rather than a confrontational one. He nodded to the taller man behind him. Thor Oakland had on nice trousers, a polo shirt, and brogues, which did no more to dispel the air of off-duty policemen than his smile did, but at least the smile was sincere. “Ye remember this bonny lad, I’d guess.”

“I do,” Thran nodded, offering his hand to the officer. “Chief Inspector Thor Oakland. I am grateful that both of you have stopped in. We have a small token of appreciation for each of you in our SUV.”

“Good to see you again,” Thor said, shaking Thran’s hand, but he gave Mr. D a sharp look. “And what’s this about a small token?”

“Ach, don’t get yer knickers in a twist, Thor,” Mr. D growled. “Just a thing between old friends, ye ken.”

Thran smothered a grin as Mr. D returned Thor’s look with impassive nonchalance. “Yes, just between friends. I know some patrons of the arts prefer a more substantial beverage than sparkling cider to accompany their hors d’oeuvres, and made provision for that.”

“Aye, that’s a bonny way to look at it,” Mr. D nodded sagely. “I thank ye kindly.”

“I see,” Thor gave his sergeant another look. “I’m glad you clarified that so quickly.”
“Indeed,” Thran said. “Come, Bard is just over here, and I know he will want to greet you.”

Thran caught Bard’s eye as he talked softly to Bilbo, so led the two policemen over. “Bard, here is Mr. D, and you remember Chief Inspector Oakland, yes?”

“Good to see you, Mr. D,” Bard nodded with a welcoming smile. He was calmer now, thank the gods – or thank Bilbo, more likely. Thran resisted the urge to repay Bilbo’s calming influence with a bear hug. “And Chief Inspector, I’m glad to see you under better circumstances this time.”

“Ye look a lot more chipper today, laddie, that’s for sure,” Mr. D growled, as Thor nodded a hello. “No problem with those stitches, I hope.”

“No a one,” Bard confirmed. Beside him, Bilbo’s eyes had grown round, and his hand strayed to his mouth.

“St-stitches?” he stammered. “Er... that sounds serious.”

“It could have been,” Bard allowed. “Chief Inspector, Mr. D, this is Bilbo Baggins, my artist’s representative. Bilbo, this is Chief Inspector Thor Oakland and Sergeant Dwalin Fundin, Mr. D to his friends. They’re the two policemen I invited here tonight because of those earlier circumstances that weren’t so ideal.”

Bilbo’s eyes got rounder. “Oh... er, yes, those circumstances. Um, I’m very glad to know both of you, and to see you here tonight.”

“I’m just here for the food,” Mr. D growled. “And to make sure yer bonny lads and lasses are still to the good.”

“They miss seeing you, Mr. D,” Bard grinned. “Tilda wanted to bring you a sandwich.”

“So the wee lass said,” Mr. D nodded. “She knows the way to an old rugger’s heart, she does.”

Said wee lass wormed her way to Mr. D’s side and pulled on his hand. “Come on, Mr. D. I’ll show you where the ham biscuits are.”

“Will ye, now?” the sergeant let her tug him away from the group. “A wee bite would be welcome.”

Thor shook his head at the sight of his sergeant’s retreating back. “It’s all becoming clear.”

“What is?” Bard asked.

“Sergeant Fundin has never professed interest in art before. I should have known that children and food were the bigger draws.”

Bard’s laugh was unforced, which eased a little of the tightness that had coiled in Thran’s gut. Good, his saint was relaxing a bit more. “Not a huge art fan, is he? Other than the kind he wears, that is.”

“No.” Thor’s word was rich with exasperation as well as grudging fondness. “I can’t say that I’ve been in a lot of galleries myself. I’m not used to this modern stuff. A lot of self-indulgent blather, most of it.”

“Oh?” Bilbo piped up, his eyes bright with interest. “Then I’d say that you’ve come to the right gallery, Chief Inspector. Bard’s work embraces both the modern and the ancient, and it’s very accessible. Very engaging, really, no matter what kind you like. I’d be glad to take you around and show it to you, if you’d like.”
Thor gave Bilbo a very formal look, but maybe Bilbo’s warmth touched something within, for he offered a stiff nod. “Very gracious of you, Mr. Baggins.”

“Call me Bilbo, Chief Inspector. Mr. Baggins is so formal.” He put a gentle hand on Thor’s elbow, and steered him towards the first gallery. “Now, you like art that’s more representational than symbolic, I gather, so I think this sketch might appeal to you. It’s of Bard’s children…”

Frodo came up to them, his eyes wide with interest. “What’s this? Uncle’s talking to an attractive man? Who is he?”

Bard and Thran locked eyes, and Thran smothered a grin. Bard folded his arms over his chest to look after Bilbo and Thor with a benevolent grin.

“That,” Bard murmured, glancing at Frodo, “is Chief Inspector Thor Oakland from the New York City Police Department.”

“Is it?” Frodo’s lips twitched with suppressed laughter. “He’s quite handsome, isn’t he? It’s been ever so long since Uncle looked at anyone like that. In fact, I don’t think I’ve ever seen him look at anyone like that before.”

Bilbo gestured at Rahmiel, talking quietly but with animation, then gazed up at Thor with interest as the taller man offered a thoughtful reply. As the conversation continued, both men drew a little closer.

“Maybe your uncle will make an art convert out of the inspector.”

Mr. D appeared beside Frodo, following everyone’s gaze to take in his superior’s interaction with the slight artist’s rep. He snorted, but quietly.

“Well, that’s it for him. He’ll be no damned good to me now,” Mr. D grumbled. He cut Thran a glance. “Maybe ye can help me with something, laddie. Bard, Mr. Baggins, ye will excuse us.”

Mr. D jerked his head toward the children, so Thran followed him. A cluster of patrons pounced on Bard, which gave Thran a reason to offer his husband a triumphant smile before he saw to Mr. D. The gruff sergeant was grumbling to himself.

“... swear I’ll keep his fifth of bloody fucking Scotch for myself.”

“Shall I fetch the bloody fucking Scotch for you now?” Thran teased.

“Oh, hell, no,” Mr. D waved a hand. “I like my Scotch, and his, too, for that matter, but I dinna drink when I’m working. Come on. Ye and I will ‘case the joint,’ as the parlance goes.”

“Of course,” Thran grinned. “I have already studied the inside of the gallery. There are two rooms to the left, two to the right, and the center hall offers a restroom and Celebrían’s office, a narrow stair up, and an exit to the back of the building. There is no basement.”

“Not bad for an amateur,” Mr. D gravedled, sounding truculent as well as dismissive, but Thran’s grin didn’t diminish. “Good to know if the bastard gets inside. The trick, laddie, is to make sure the bastard doesn’t get inside.”

“Excellent point,” Thran agreed, following Mr. D down the narrow central hall to the back door. He gave a good, hard look at the steel door. “Door’s fine, good deadbolt in place, but the frame’s wood, not steel. Still, it’s heavy enough – it’d take a right lot of heaving to jimmy that open. Yeah, good – heavy chain on it at night. All right, laddie, I’m poking me head outside, so just ye keep yer head,
They went out of the back door, but the line of service entrances to the left and the right of the gallery was deserted. A dumpster sat in the parking lot near the edge of the line of shops, and Mr. D gave it a hard stare.

“Stay by the door,” he ordered, and strode out to have a gander. He circled it warily, then scanned the parking lot. Aside from a few pallets stacked outside of the wine shop, there was nothing that would offer any cover to anyone hoping to sneak up on the gallery. The parking lot beyond was lit well enough that Thran easily picked out his SUV. A few cars circled slowly, and one or two people made their way up to the street. Nothing seemed untoward.

“Aye, looks clear,” Mr. D rumbled, striding back towards Thran. “For now.”

“So I am not the only one who thinks Lance will appear tonight.”

Mr. D shook his head. “The lad’s not the brightest bulb in the box, is he? I dinnae expect that to change tonight.”

“I am disappointed that no one has seen him since he appeared at the school a month ago. Where does a child hide so well that no one can find him? And no, I do not think that he has given up and taken up with his grandmother in Florida.”

“He’s not there,” Mr. D confirmed. “He’s not at home, not that I fault him that. No father, mother who’s nothing but the same mean streak that her son will be in fifteen years, if he lives that long, and persona non grata with the turf lords for getting his overlord killed.”

“I cannot imagine.”

“Verra few can. And those that do think a lot of soft words and hand wringing will get them gratitude. That lad is little better than the feral cats that roam the street, and he ain’t grateful to anyone for anything. Sooner cut ye from stem to stern than anything else.”

“So what becomes of such children when they are caught?”

Mr. D’s sigh belied his fierce expression. “Some find redemption in a wilderness program. Ye use real wildness to tame theirs. The nearest one is in the Catskills. ’T isn’t an easy way, ye ken, but sometimes Mater Nature can knock sense in a few. The ones She can’t set straight... once the prison system gets them, it’s usually too late.”

Thran hummed in commiseration. “I pity them, then. But as I told my husband – no matter how much I pity them, I will not let them strike at my family again.”

Mr. D clapped Thran on the arm. It was a weighty, forceful blow, but without anger – Mr. D was just a very physical man. “Fucking right. Now, we’ve given it the once over. I’ll check every fifteen minutes, so stand by.”

“I will,” Thran affirmed as they came back inside the gallery. “I will circulate with eyes open. I will back you as you need.”

“Excellent. Now, perhaps a few more ham biscuits...”

Mr. D winked at Thran, for all that his expression never changed. Thran wouldn’t be the least surprised to find out that the scowling sergeant volunteered at the Catskills wilderness camp he mentioned. If anyone could help Mother Nature impress a wayward child to think about the stupidity too...”
of his ways, Mr. D could.

Legolas, Bain, and Tilda looked up from their seats in Celebrían’s office as he went by, smiling and waving. Their tray of treats still had several examples of food nirvana on it, and they were happy to describe all the different kinds to him. Thran thanked them for their recommendations, and their good behavior, before he went back into the public areas.

The gallery had gotten much busier while Thran and Mr. D had been outside. He spotted Bard with a group of patrons by his Ring Thing, describing how he’d put the patina on the metal. His saint was relaxed and attentive, his usual gracious self, all to the good. He paused a moment to admire how nice his husband looked in the comfortable trousers and shirt they’d bought on their New Year’s Day shopping excursion. His only adornments were the earrings Thran had bought for him at the Follies, and his wedding ring, but he needed nothing more. And yes, Bard had been right not to get his hair trimmed back to Rowan’s vision; the two extra inches of tousled locks curled around his earrings created just the right bohemian appeal.

That was interesting – Bilbo was still talking with Thor, and the tall police inspector seemed fully engaged, listening intently, even smiling faintly. Thran smothered a gleeful smile. Was something more than polite conversation in the offing? There did seem to be an extra intensity to Thor’s regard, and a brighter spark to Bilbo’s usual affable ease.

Before he had a chance to ponder it further, Sam, Rosie, and their children came through the door to call a greeting. As they stopped to greet Thran, Finn, Killian, and Tara passed outside by Rahmiel’s window. Sigrid had stationed herself by the angel, and she waved to her friends as they passed by. The three young people met her at the door with happy words, and Finn gave her a big hug. Sigrid looked over Finn’s shoulder to flick Thran a glance, but he gave her an amused shrug.

"They grow up fast, don’t they?" Sam said, grinning.

"They do. But it is an amusing process. One moment the boyfriend is a doofus, and the next he is a sweet charmer."

"Your turn will be here before you know it, Sam," Rosie laughed. "And won’t that be fun to watch?"

Sam groaned as Rosie pulled him into the first gallery room.

Seconds later, he was caught up in a flurry of patrons who recognized him, and wanted to talk about this ballet he was rumored to be working on. No, not all of them were art patrons; at least one was an art critic, angling for substance to add meat to the skeleton of the rumors that swirled about Immortal. Thran was pleasant, but circumspect. At length, Mavis Davis, the TV personality who had interviewed both Thran and his husband for her Heartbeat of the Art Beat program, saved him with a glad herald. She looked her usual stunning self in a simple mandarin jacket of pale peach silk over darker peach slacks, jeweled sandals, opulent coral and jade earrings, and a pale green silk stole. Thran’s white mandarin shirt and grey trousers were a nice complement to her attire, and he quickly found several cameras snapping pictures of them together. Yes, there were representatives from a couple of newspapers and wire services, and they quickly surrounded Bard. Thran excused himself to Mavis, and went to stand behind the representatives. As tall as he was, he could offer a wink of encouragement over the heads of the throng. He didn’t venture closer; he had no intention of diluting Bard’s moment by inserting himself in it. The last thing he wanted was to see a headline anywhere that cast Bard in the light of a famous person’s lesser skilled partner. The cameras could snap as many pictures of Bard as they wanted, but none with Thran at his side.

Bard met his eyes with an amused grin, but was quickly drawn into another question, another photograph. Thran drifted away, pleased to note that several of Bard’s sketches were missing from the gallery walls. Another passed him on its way out through the gallery door, clutched in the arms of a buyer. He saw Theodred Rohan wave from across the room, but Sigrid came up to him with Finn at her side before they had a chance to speak.

They love Da’s stuff, Ada!” Sigrid said quietly, but her smile was gleeful. “They’re badgering Da to sell Rahmiel every three minutes. But don’t worry – he’s not budging on that.”

“Good,” Thran nodded. “Hello, Finn. You are well?”

“Very well,” the boy nodded. “Any sign of you know who?”

“So far, none,” Thran agreed. “You saw Mr. D, yes? I need to ask him something.”

“I did. He’s been in and out a few times since we got here, but right now he’s making inroads on the ham buns.”

“He is allowed,” Thran snickered, as Tara and Kíllian passed by with glasses of sparkling cider. “Please, would you keep Tilda, Bain, and Legolas with you for the next few minutes?”

“Sure,” Sigrid nodded. “Any reason?”

“Mr. D and I make the rounds outside. Your Da is busy, and I do not want any of you to be alone while we are gone.”

“We’ll get them right now,” Sigrid nodded, glancing at Finn. “We’ll get Tara and Kíllian, too, so we’ll all be together.”

“Good. Thank you.”

Thran let himself get drawn into a discussion about ballet and art and the gods knew what else as the children unobtrusively slipped back to the office. When he could politely do so, he excused himself and found Mr. D looking for him.

“Rounds again?”

Mr. D nodded. “Yer bairns are safe?”

“Three of the older children’s friends are with them. So they are together in the gallery office.”

“Righto. Won’t give anyone the time to slip off – we’ll go round from the front this time. Let me drag Thor away from his new friend.”

They threaded through the crowd, some snacking, some sipping sparkling cider, and all filling the small rooms with a steady buzz of animated conversation, until Mr. D nudged Thor. He was still in conversation with Bilbo, but his face sharpened at the murmured words from his sergeant. The three of them slipped through the front door of the gallery into the quiet of the street. The gallery was two shops down from one end of the street, and seven from the other. Thor headed down the longer way, so Mr. D and Thran took the shorter way. They rounded the corner, traveled down to the edge of the parking lot, and cut across a small, grassy plot lined with ornamental pear trees to reach the back of the buildings.

A figure was bent over a pile of something beside the gallery’s back door.

Before Thran could point to him, the pungent smell of gasoline hit his nose. The figure got to his feet – yes, the dark hair identified him as Lance – and proceeded to try to jimmy the gallery’s back door open with a crowbar.

“The little fucker,” Mr. D swore under his breath as the sound of splintering wood reached their ears. He pushed Thran back under the trees. “Stay here.”

Thran did so as the policeman ran straight for Lance. The sound of his heavy boots brought the boy up short, and he spasmed up to dash away in the opposite direction, crowbar in hand.

“Stop right where ye are, Lance!” Mr. D roared. “Give it up right now!”

The boy didn’t slow – but Thor barreled down on Lance from the opposite direction. The boy swung his crowbar, barely missing Thor, but the wild strike unbalanced him enough for Thor to wrench the crowbar away. As Lance dodged back, Mr. D pounded behind, shouting, but without avail. Lance twisted away from both of the officers to veer across the parking lot. A departing car nearly ran over him, and with both officers in pursuit, Lance had to dash back towards the buildings. He sprinted towards Thran, cursing and swearing.

As the stench of gasoline reached him again, Thran’s fury flared. The boy had hoped to strike at his family with fire? Toss a Molotov cocktail inside the broken door to burn the children just inside? Destroy all of his husband’s artwork? Only the gods knew what he’d try next time – no, Thran would not allow him a next time. He would not let this elusive boy escape again to lie in wait for another chance to attack his family.

He waited until Lance was too close to avoid him before he flung himself into the air – no grand jeté, but martial arts side kick. His boot caught Lance full in the ribs, and sent him careening into one of the tree trunks. He hit with an audible crack that shook the tree from top to bottom and scattered a swirl of flower petals over the grass, and then ricocheted to the ground in a heap. Before he could groan, Mr. D was atop him, wrestling his wrists back into handcuffs, spitting the required statement of Miranda rights at him as if each word was a curse.

“Nicely done,” Thor stood beside Thran to watch Mr. D subdue their quarry. He pulled out his mobile to dial 911. “I’ll let the locals know we’ve got someone for them.”

“Don’t either of you move,” Mr. D snarled. “I want a colleague and a civilian to testify that this little beastie didn’t have his wee rights violated by me or anyone else when he got caught for attempted arson. Did ye, ye little bit of –”

“Understood, sergeant,” Thor cut in smoothly as his call connected. “Yes, I want to report an attempted arson at the Ilithien Art Gallery on Lakefront Road...”

“Take a picture of the fucking tree, too,” Mr. D growled. “And my knuckles. I want it clear as Scottish mountain air that our wee beastie didn’t get his conk on the noggin from me.”

“I will remind your colleague,” Thran promised, as Thor spoke to the 911 dispatcher. In a few minutes, two police cars came into the parking lot, and a great stir and bustle began. Thran watched with great satisfaction as a groggy Lance was loaded into the back of one police car. Mr. D and Thor handled most of the discussion with the local police, though Thran did receive a cursory interview before he was allowed to go back into the gallery. He had no idea how much time had passed since he and Mr. D had first ventured out, so he jogged back around to the front of the block. Bain was waiting for him at the gallery’s front door, and signaled to someone inside as he came in.

“Where’s Mr. D?” Sigrid asked breathlessly. “Did something happen? It must have. You’re panting. We heard this cracking sound outside the back door. Was it Lance?”
Legolas appeared right behind Sigrid. Thran gave his three oldest children a triumphant look.

“Lance is in the back of a police car. I helped to catch him.”

“Mr. D, his detective, and I found him at the back door of the gallery, trying to break it open. Mr. D tackled him, and the detective called the local police. Lance is on his way to jail.”

“And what did you do?” Sigrid gave him a stare. Thran gave her a stare back.

“He tried to get away. So I kicked him into a tree trunk, and when he fell down, Mr. D jumped on top of him and put on the handcuffs.”

“Wow!” Bain gaped. “Wow, you kicked him into a tree trunk? Gods, Thran, that’s awesome. You kicked him into a tree trunk!”

“Shh,” Thran urged, as people turned towards the group. “I will tell you more later. Let Bard have the end of his show in peace, in triumph. It still goes well?”

“The walls are just about bare,” Bain nodded.

“He’s had tons of people begging him to sell his sculpture, but so far, he’s holding firm,” Legolas added.

“I’m so happy for him. So happy,” Sigrid gulped. “And you, Ada – kicking Lance Dunmont into a tree trunk is the perfect ending.”

Thran found himself engulfed in a big hug. “I hope so, dochka. Where is Kukla? She is safe?”

“She’s with Da,” Bain grinned. “She decided he needed a dose of cuteness, so she’s been attached to his hip for the past ten minutes. The camera people are eating it up.”

“And Finn, Kíllian, and Tara are also safe?”

“We’re all fine, Ada,” Sigrid gave him a grin. “Everyone’s fine, Da’s show is a big hit, and you caught the elusive Lance Dunmont. The perfect trifecta.”

Before Thran returned Sigrid’s wide grin with his own, he offered silent but heartfelt gratitude to the gods. Finally, after four months, Clan Ffyrnig could breathe again.
Chapter 109

Chapter Summary

After a most eventful evening, the saint lays down a heavy burden.

Bard didn’t know how he got from home to gallery parking lot. Thank the gods for Thran, who’d kept him busy all day, who’d helped him pick out clothes to wear, who’d rallied the children and drove the SUV and even remembered the gifts for Mr. D. Bard had all he could do just to follow along. No wonder so many performers had entourages to keep them distracted yet on track! Maybe not – ego was probably at the root of so many people surrounding themselves with so many hangers-on, not worry.

Just relax.

He couldn’t relax. If he relaxed, he took things for granted that he couldn’t afford to take for granted. Nothing was sure. No sooner did he think something was sure than it failed, and he was left to scramble to take care of his children. Better to treat everything as temporary, and keep half a dozen contingencies in his back pocket against need.

But so many people have told you that your art is good, and your show will be successful –

Thran was his husband. Sigrid, Legolas, Bain, and Tilda were his children. Bilbo was his artist’s rep. Rosie and Sam were friends. Of course all of them would say that his sketches and sculpture were good, even if they weren’t –

Bilbo wouldn’t have taken you on if your art was no good. Celebrían, the owner of the Ilithien Gallery and an artist in her own right, wouldn’t have agreed to host your show if your art was no good. Mavis Davis wouldn’t have interviewed you so extensively for her broadcast if your art was no good. Rada Brown wouldn’t have asked to work with you on the costume sketches for Immortal if your art was no good. Even you can’t think of a reason to dismiss those people and their interest and belief in the quality of your art. So just fucking relax!

That was impossible.

Then at least get a fucking grip on yourself so you don’t start to blither like an idiot!

By the time he got himself in hand, he and his family were in front of the gallery, and there was Rahmiel in the window.

Oh, gods – Rahmiel looks incredible. Everything you poured in to him shows. Everything.

He mumbled something about the color of the clay. When he would cast the angel in bronze, he’d add a darker patina to the metal to match the feathered wings and hair, which would look better than the tan clay. To his surprise, all of his family jumped to the angel’s defense, which embarrassed him. He mumbled appreciation for their regard, and then found himself inside the gallery. Bilbo latched onto him at once, and while Bard didn’t register the exact words the artist’s rep said, he felt calmer after hearing them. Bilbo and Celebrían led him around for one last check of his artwork – he nudged one of the frames a bit straighter, and then helped Frodo connect a string of white lights that the young man had strung down the center of Sea Spot Run. When they got the lights lit, it revealed so many details of the sculpture that Bard was dazzled. What a difference that simple strand of holiday lights made! Frodo wanted to put a fan on the Ring Thing to spin the circles into motion, which was another brilliant idea. The rings of copper, purple, and blue wafted in slow cycles, undulating just as they would under the influence of a gentle breeze, and looked wonderful.

The first of many people came up to him to exchange a few words. Bilbo stayed with him, but now that the show had begun, his usual calm returned, and Bilbo faded into the background. People were so complimentary of his sketches, and wanted to know about the mechanism that made the Ring Thing spin, and asked about the punny name of Sea Spot Run. So many, many people wanted to talk about Rahmiel. How many times did he explain about the immortal angel of love and mercy, alighting on the earth to offer salvation to the mortal saint?

How many times did people urge him to sell it?

He explained about how he’d made the angel, that it was just the model, and how he’d make the molds from the clay that would allow him to cast Rahmiel in more permanent metal.

Several people begged to buy Sea Spot Run and the Ring Thing. Bard gently declined.

Mavis Davis greeted him like an old friend. Maybe there was a brief interview with her? She was so complimentary of his sketch of Thran’s hand. A lot of cameras seemed to be on display. Bilbo brought by two patrons interested in sculpture commissions. An art critic whose name Bard recognized came over to exchange a word. He was surprisingly positive. Where were the children? Oh, there were Sigrid and Finn greeting Tara and Kíllian, and Legolas strolled by with Tilda’s hand in his. He caught a glimpse of Thran’s head sticking over the back of the group of people gathered around him, smiling encouragement. He was asked repeatedly about his drawing process, if it was as spontaneous as it seemed, or if he thought hard about it first. Someone put one of his loose sketches in his hand with a pen and asked if he’d sign the back of it, even though the sketch bore his signature on the front.

To Sara, best wishes, Bard Bowman, he wrote.

How surreal was this? How unbelievable was this?

Don’t think about that now. Stay in the moment, pay attention to all that happens around you. You can reflect later.

Bilbo and Thor Oakland seemed to spend a lot more time talking in front of one of his framed sketches than Bard expected. He wished he had his sketchpad – how the tall inspector leaned forward to consider something the shorter, slighter artist’s rep said was worth capturing. He’d have to remember it to sketch later.

Thran and Mr. D seemed intent on something – ah, likely Thran had told Mr. D about the case of ale. Good; the Scotsman deserved it for trekking all the way out here.

More people came close to talk. A professorial gentleman wanted to know if Bard had studied Chinese calligraphy, so Bard trotted out his story about the mixed media artist who’d told him about it and how it’d helped him develop a looser style. Then he asked if the several mirrored images Bard had drawn were metaphysical references to Aristotelian philosophy.

He had no idea how he answered that question, but it seemed to satisfy the gentleman.

Someone – Frodo, Bard thought – put a glass of sparkling cider in his hand. That was welcome – so much talking had dried his throat. Despite all the talking, the swirl of people, the number of mobiles and cameras and recording devices, he noticed how many of his sketches, both framed and loose, left the gallery in the arms of buyers.

Buyers.

The walls were emptier than they were full.

The number of people diminished for a moment. Tilda appeared at his side to offer him a small cheese tart, but he wasn’t hungry, so she ate it for him, then stayed by his side. She ended up in his arms for a couple of photographs, then answered a couple of questions that one person or another directed at her in jest. She opined that her favorite piece was Rahmiel, but she liked the sketches her Da did of her and her siblings a lot, too. Yes, cheese was her favorite snack, particularly Double Gloucester, and yes, she hoped one day to be an artist like her Da.

“He’s very, very good, though, so it’ll take a lot of work before I’m as good as he is. But that’s okay. I like to draw, so it’ll be fun,” she said artlessly.

“What do you like best about your father’s work?” someone asked, angling to get another cute reply from the little girl.

“I like the animals in his sculpture. I like the things that move. And I really like the feathers he put on Rahmiel. His sketches are different, though.”

“Different how?”

“Mostly they’re about people. I like how they make each person look interesting and special. They look like pictures out of a story that you want to hear more about.”

“You’ve got quite a career ahead of you as an art critic,” someone chuckled.

Tilda looked at Bard, then looked back at the person doubtfully. “Thank you, but I’d rather draw pictures than talk about them.”

“So would most art critics,” someone else quipped, drawing a laugh.

The group shifted again as it had so often during the evening, and a new group of people drew near. During the shift, Bard caught a glimpse of Thran grinning and talking excitedly with the children. Sigrid gave Bard a big smile as she waved at him. He waved back. Tilda slipped out of his arms to join her siblings, leaving Bard to concentrate on his answers to another round of questions. So many were ones he’d already answered, but he was gratified at the interest, so he took pains to answer each one thoughtfully. He explained again how he chose what to draw – “everything that’s in front of my eyes, to be honest” – and whether Rahmiel was a metaphor for anything – “he’s the angel of love and mercy, that’s what his name means” – and who he looked up to as a mentor – “anyone who creates something and is brave enough to show it to the world.” He was asked why he chose pencils over pastels – “less laundry to do when I carry pencils in my pockets rather than pastel chalks” – whether he had a favorite subject to draw – “people are always interesting” – and whether there were subjects he’d never draw – “never is a dangerous word, but for the most part, I stay away from advertising logos and political figures.” More queries flew at him, but he answered patiently.

When people finally drifted away and no more replaced them, blank gallery walls stared back at him. Almost all of his framed sketches were gone – there went another one under someone’s arm, wrapped in thick brown craft paper. Celebrían and Bard chatted with a few last visitors; just beyond, Bilbo continued his conversation with the chief inspector. Thran and the children had gathered in a corner by Rahmiel to talk quietly; Tilda was bouncing up and down as she talked to Mr. D, who squatted down beside her. Bard was about to join them when Bilbo broke away from Thor and intercepted him.

“Bard, congratulations!” the artist’s rep wrung Bard’s hand with satisfaction. “I felt sure that you’d do well tonight, but I’m delighted to see that your art attracted even more interest than I expected. There aren’t more than six or eight of your loose sketches left, and only two of your framed pieces. Well done, my boy!”

Bard glanced at Bilbo. Had he heard Bilbo correctly? He scanned the walls – yes, they were still empty. He scanned the table that had displayed his loose sketches – yes, it was still mostly empty, too. So...

He’d sold almost everything that hadn’t been nailed down.

That was too amazing to grasp.

Then don’t think about it now. Just get through the last bit, and you’re home free.

“Thanks,” Bard replied calmly. “Thank you very much, Bilbo. You put on quite a show for me, and I’m very grateful for everything you’ve done.”

Bilbo looked at him strangely, but patted his arm. “You provided all the incentive anyone could ask with your sketches and your sculpture, Bard. It was my pleasure.”

Celebrían appeared at his other side. “Your sketches just flew off the wall, Bard. I don’t think there are more than the two framed pieces and perhaps seven of your loose sketches left. Would you allow me to hold onto those? I wouldn’t be surprised if those would sell, too, if you’d allow me to display them.”

Bard looked to Bilbo with a question in his eyes.

“We’d be quite happy to accept your offer, Celebrían,” Bilbo smiled. “It’s kind of you to offer.”

“It is,” Bard nodded. “That’d be great.”

“You’re very welcome,” Celebrían nodded with a warm smile, handing him a folded sheet of paper. “Here’s an accounting of what sold tonight. Congratulations, Bard. I hope all of your shows will be as successful as this one was.”

“Thank you,” Bard nodded, folding the paper again and stuffing it into the back pocket of his pants. “Between Frodo’s framing, your beautiful gallery, and Bilbo’s promotion, you all made my sketches look so good. I appreciate it.”

“You’re very welcome. I hope you’ll want to show your future work here. It’s like no one else’s.”

“You have a great gallery, Celebrían. I’ll let Bilbo know when I have more things.”

The gallery owner nodded a pleased smile at Bard’s praise, and took her leave to tidy the remains of the hors d’oeuvres from the serving table.

“Come on, my boy,” Bilbo steered Bard towards Thran and the children. “Let’s get you back to your biggest fans.”

“They are my biggest fans,” Bard agreed quickly. “I don’t know what I’d do without them.”
“Here he is, safe and sound,” Bilbo said cheerily to the collected family and friends. “I think he’s a bit stunned yet, but he’ll calm down soon enough.”

“You do look kinda pole axed, Da,” Bain grinned. Beside him, Legolas and Finn smothered smirks. “Quick, Sig. You’d better ask him now, before he falls off Cloud Nine.”

“Ask me what?” Bard bent a mild look on his daughter.

“Finn, Kíllian, and Tara are going out for pizza, and asked me along. So please, may I go?”

Bard frowned at the big grin on Sigrid’s face. There was a clear joke lurking in this somewhere, but Bard couldn’t divine it yet.

_Gods, you’re slipping. Best try to brass it out._

“You know the routine, Sig. Until Lance Dunmont is off the streets, you have to stay together, and be home by midnight.”

“Wellll... even though Lance Dunmont is off the streets, and therefore nothing any of us has to worry about anymore, we’ll still stay together, and I’ll still be home by midnight,” Sigrid shrugged with cavalier nonchalance.

Bard blinked. “Um... I really must be out of it. I thought I heard you say that Lance is off the streets?”

“I did say that,” Sigrid nodded calmly.

Bard narrowed his eyes at his daughter, but it was Bain and Legolas and Kíllian snickering that alerted him to everyone grinning – except for Mr. D.

“Ach, fer love of the highlands, put the lad out of his misery,” the scowling Scotsman whuffed under his breath.

That resulted in nothing but wider smiles and more chuckling. It was a happy, relieved sound, which served only to confuse Bard more. “I don’t...”

Mr. D smothered an imprecation. “We got Lance, Bard. He’ll not bother ye for a while to come.”

It took several seconds for that to sink in, but when it did, Bard’s eyes bugged out and his jaw dropped. “Oh, gods, Lance was here? What in all the hells happened? Is everyone all right?”

“Everyone is fine, _lyubov moya,_” Thran gave him a wide smile. “The only one who suffered from Lance’s stupidity tonight was Lance himself.”

“The wretch tried to put on a show to ruin yers, Bard, ’t is true,” Mr. D explained. “But he wasnae prepared for the wee reception committee we had ready for him. For his trouble, he won a pair of bracelets and a private ride in the back of a police car for an extended personal tour of the local hoosegow. When they’re through with him, yon inspector and I plan to offer him a similar tour of the city hoosegow. So, let the bairns have their pizza, and I’ll take that case of ale with a clear conscience.” He gave Thor a stern glare. “And the Scotch, too.”

The world was running by entirely too fast. “Tha—that can’t be all there is to it. What happened?”

“Let us go home, and we will tell you everything,” Thran urged.

“Make sure yer braw husband tells his part in the tale.” Mr. D nodded at Thran, and offered a half “Thran?” Bard gasped. “Gods –”

“Your husband is fine, Mr. Bowman,” Thor assured him. “You can be very proud of him.”

“Oh, gods –” Bard gulped.

“I am fine, Bard,” Thran soothed. “Come, let us go to the SUV, and give Mr. D and Thor their presents, and then we will go home, and savor all of the good things that happened tonight.”

Bard found himself swept towards the gallery door in the midst of seven happily chattering children, two grinning police officers, and his triumphant husband. He managed a wave to Frodo and Bilbo before the throng drew him down the street and behind the row of shops to the parking lot. A pair of police cars was stationed there, and uniformed officers busied themselves near the back entrance of the gallery. He didn’t have time to ask any questions before Thran brought them to his SUV, where a case of ale and a fifth of good Scotch were bestowed upon the squat police sergeant and his inspector colleague. Through all the chattering, Bard divined that Thran, Thor, and Mr. D had run the fleeing Lance to ground, and that he’d been in no condition to resist when he’d been handcuffed and loaded into the police car for his trip to jail. Bard’s thanks to the police officers were profuse and sincere.

“Anytime either of you’re in the village, I’ll stand you one of those,” Bard said, nodding at the case of ale in Mr. D’s hands. “Anytime.”

“I appreciate that,” Thor nodded.

“Aye, I’ll take ye up on that, laddie,” Mr. D nodded. “Now, I’ll just see this lot safely snuggled into the boot, then Thor and I’ll see what else we can tell the local constabulary. Good night to ye both, and to all of yon bairns. Thran, pleasure doing business with ye.”

“Good night,” Thor murmured, nodding, and retreated after his sergeant. Bard had just a second to see Thor veer off his path to intercept Bilbo who was carrying an armload of things to his car before Sigrid swept him into a big hug.

“I’m heading out with Finn, Tara, and Kíllian,” she said. “I’m so proud of you, Da. Your show went so well. I’ll be home at midnight.”

“Thanks, sweetness,” Bard hugged her back. “Have a good time. I’ll wait up for you.”

“You always do,” Sigrid rolled her eyes, but she was smiling.

The four young people headed across the parking lot to Finn’s car, all calling good wishes to the rest of the clan. Thran shooed the remaining three children into the SUV, and held the front passenger door open for Bard. Before Bard climbed inside, he put a hand on his husband’s shoulder.

“You do work for the Russian mafia, don’t you?”

Thran snickered. “If I were to reveal all of my secrets, I would have to kill you, lyubov moya.”

“That’s answer enough,” Bard grinned. “Though you’d make a good Black Butler, too.”

Thran looked blank. “What is this Black Butler?”

“A classic Japanese manga character. He’s a demon who makes everything happen. You, to a tee.”

“I shall look up this creature on the Internet. He sounds interesting. But first, I must take us away from the night’s excitement.”

“Then home, James.”

Thran laughed at the classic request to a chauffeur, and offered a suitably low bow. “Of course, my lord. Right away.”

Bard climbed into the passenger seat, Thran shut the door behind him, and took his place behind the wheel. As they drove home, the children badgered Thran for details of what had happened with Lance, but Thran demurred.

“I will tell all when we get home. For now, you tell which of the small snacks were the best ones. Were there small cheese pastries, Legolas?”

“There were, and Tilda ate six of them,” Legolas teased.

“I did not! You ate six. I had only four. The ham biscuits were nice, too.”

“Did you see how many of those Mr. D ate?” Bain exclaimed. “At least a dozen!”

“He could have had all of them,” Thran declared. “He deserved each one. Were there no sweets, then?”

“These small cheesecake things, and raspberry tarts,” Bain replied. “I didn’t like the cheesecake – there was some weird taste in the filling.”

“I think it was amaretto,” Legolas observed. “It was okay, but I liked the raspberry tarts better.”

“You’d just had supper,” Bard turned around to look at the children. “How were you still hungry?”

“It was a party, Da,” Bain shrugged. “There’s always room for party food.”

“Yes,” Legolas nodded. “Party food goes into a different stomach from regular food.”

“It does?” Tilda frowned thoughtfully, then turned around in her seat to stare at Legolas. “Wait – there isn’t a party stomach and a regular stomach, Legs!”

“There ought to be,” Legolas sighed.

Bard and Thran laughed as the turnoff to the lane drew near. In a couple of minutes, Legolas and Bain got out to pull up the bay door to the carriage house, and Thran backed the SUV into place. Soon, the family was inside the house, shedding shoes in the mudroom. As Thran and Bard settled in the sitting room on one sofa, Bain flopped down on the opposite one.

“So what happened?” he asked simply, as Legolas sat beside him with eager eyes fixed on his father. Tilda crawled between her brothers to look just as eagerly at Thran. The tall dancer described how he and Mr. D had checked the parking lot, finding Lance outside the door the second time. Mr. D had charged at the boy as he worked to pry open the door, driven the boy towards Thor, then into the parking lot, then towards Thran.

“I would not let Lance get away again,” Thran concluded, “so I let him come close. He did not see me until too late, and I kicked him very hard into a tree. He fell down, and was so stunned that Mr. D put on the handcuffs without the least trouble. So it was done.”

“That’s it?” Bain challenged. “Just like that, you kicked him, and he was done?”
Thran nodded triumphantly. “Just so. One kick, and he was done. I am quite proud of myself. What is the saying? No fuss, no muss?”

“That’s so amazing!” Bain exclaimed. “You rock, Thran!”

“And Lance will go to jail now, and he won’t get out?” Tilda asked.

“He will be there for some time,” Thran nodded. “We do not yet know for how long. But he is not free to bother us now.”

“I’m glad,” Tilda sighed. “I’m very, very glad.”

“So am I, little doll. Your Ada’s done a very brave thing for us.”

Tilda got up and kneeled on the sofa beside Thran to plant a firm kiss on his cheek. “Thank you very much, Ada.”

“It was my pleasure, Kukla,” Thran gave her a hug and a big smile. “It was very much my pleasure. Now, let us forget about Lance Dunmont, and instead think about what a wonderful thing your Da’s show was. He sold almost all of his sketches! Bilbo said he got three very solid requests for commissioned works.”

Bard blinked as he regarded his husband. “He did?”

Thran’s nod was firm. “He did. He was most delighted. He told me to tell you that he would speak to you on Monday about them, and ask how you want to proceed. That is wonderful, lyubov moya.”

“Yeah, Da, you rocked your show,” Bain grinned.

“I’m glad you didn’t sell Rahmiel,” Tilda said, sliding out of Thran’s arms to sit between him and Bard. She twined her fingers in Bard’s. “I like him too much.”

“He’s just the model, but he’s important,” Bard told her, giving her hand a squeeze. “I can’t make molds for the metal casting without him. So I won’t sell him, ever.”

“Good,” Tilda nodded.

“So we will have much to celebrate tomorrow when we visit Kasim,” Thran said. “And then for supper we will celebrate again when Sam and Rosie and their children visit us to grill.”

“Two parties in one day?” Tilda looked back and forth between Bard and Thran. “That’s a lot for an unbirthday day.”

“I think everyone should sleep in, get up in time to have a piece of toast or something small, then we’ll have Kasim’s good lunch, and we’ll have a picnic with the Gamgees,” Bard suggested.

“That’s got my vote,” Legolas said quickly. “Especially if it means that we can stay up late playing the zombie game tonight.”

“The same rule that applies to our Sigrid applies to your bedtime,” Thran replied. Bard smothered a grin – his husband had picked up good parenting quickly. “No later than midnight.”

“Agreed,” Bard said, when Bain started to protest. “Midnight. You’ll likely sleep until ten as it is.”

The boys grumbled, but quickly figured out that arguing with their fathers cut into game-playing time, so they rumbled upstairs to set to. Tilda was happy to accept her fathers’ offer to play Dinky
Farm with her, and they spent a good hour playfully competing in carrot growing and honey production. At length, Tilda’s yawns took on monumental proportions, so Bard and Thran escorted her up to bed.

“It was a good day today,” Tilda yawned as she settled Mr. Bun in her arms. “I played soccer with the big kids, and a lot of people came to see your art, Da, and Ada caught Lance, and I played Dinky Farm.”

“Good all around,” Bard nodded with a smile. “Thanks for being so good at the show tonight, and eating the pastries for me. I was too busy.”

“I can do that any time you want, Da,” Tilda dimpled. “They were cheese!”

“They certainly were,” Bard gave her a big kiss on the cheek. “Sleep well, little doll, and I’ll see you in the morning.”

“Night, Da. Night, Ada. Thank you for getting Lance.”

“That was my pleasure,” Thran avowed, kissing the top of Tilda’s head. “So you can sleep well tonight, and wake up tomorrow ready for more cheese.”

“Do you think Kasim has any?” Tilda asked curiously.

“We shall see what wonders he has tomorrow. But sleep first.”

“Okay. Love you, Ada. Love you, Da.”

“Love you, too, Kukla, little doll,” Bard and Thran murmured.

They slipped out, ducked into Bain’s room long enough to check on the boys, then Thran excused himself to the shower.

“Just a quick wash. My prowl around a parking lot has left me too grimy to sleep comfortably,” Thran sighed.

“I’m going to perch in the sitting room,” Bard replied. “Just to let everything soak in.”

“Understandable. Perhaps you would like to share a little nalivka with me when I come down?”

“That’d be great. See you in a bit.”

Thran stroked Bard’s cheek with long, elegant fingers, and offered him a kiss on his temple. He disappeared into the closet to take off his clothes, so Bard headed downstairs.

The sitting room was quiet as Bard sat in the middle of his old sofa, propped his feet up on the fruit crate coffee table, and slumped comfortably – hmm, not entirely comfortably. His wallet was still in his back pocket, and so was a crumpled bit of paper. He pulled out both, and put the wallet on the coffee table to remind him to take it upstairs when he went up to bed. The crumpled bit of paper he almost tossed on the table beside his wallet, until he remembered that it was the accounting sheet Celebrian had handed him at the end of his show.

Before he shied away from it, he opened the paper.

Almost all of his sketches were listed – so many of them! Yes, he’d known how many pieces Frodo had framed, and yes, he’d known how many loose sketches he’d provided, but to see all of them listed in such stark terms, almost filling the page...
He didn’t dare look at the price column. He’d told Bilbo to price them as he saw fit, and had never really had the nerve to look at what those prices were. He’d studiously avoided looking too closely at the little cards Celebrian had pinned beside each sketch with the name of the piece, the medium, and the price. He knew what the names were, and that they were all pencil on paper. The rest...

Don’t be such a coward. This is the moment where you know how the rest of your life will go. Your sketch at the April Fool’s Follies sold for four hundred dollars. Four hundred. Bilbo knew that, so these didn’t go for ten and twenty dollars a pop. So look at the prices. Just do it.

He forced himself to look at the figures listed beside each sketch. Not scan them, but stare at them hard until they registered.

The amounts took Bard’s breath away.

He looked at the bottom of the page at the total.

It was a lot.

It was thousands of dollars. Not hundreds of dollars. Thousands.

It was so much more than he’d hoped for.

Oh gods oh gods oh gods –

He got himself off the sofa, through the solarium, and outside onto the terrace while he could still see. Once he was safely away from the eyes and ears of his family, he sank to his knees on the flagstones. He gulped and put his hands over his mouth, but nothing could stop the all-consuming wave of relief that overwhelmed him. Pure relief. After ten years of worry and want, desperation and despair, after carrying on without ever daring to believe in hope, he could finally, finally believe that the worst was over. What a relief it was to let go of so much fear! To know, really know in his bones, that he could take care of his children again. That they were safe. That they would not go wanting. He finally had the wherewithal to send them to a decent school and then on to college, to nurture Bain’s soccer and Tilda’s art and Sigrid’s writing and math. He could feed them well, make a good home for them, and be on hand when they needed him rather than away, hosing out Steffen’s grotty sewer lines, or working clandestine scab jobs on dodgy, dangerous welding sites...

Oh, gods oh gods oh gods –

Arms went around his shoulders, and gathered him close. “My brave saint. Zoloto moyo.”

He tried to say something, anything, but his sobs precluded that.

“It is not important to talk, lyubov moya. You are safe, and you have worked so hard, and I have you. Let your sorrow go.”

For once, Bard took the comfort he was offered without guilt. He shut his eyes and let down as his husband urged, trusting his body to know when it could calm. Thran didn’t protest, merely offered the comfort of his arms around Bard. Soft words soothed over his release, some in Russian, some in French, some in English, but all full of love and compassion.

“Ya lyublyu tebya. Ty velikoye zoloto moyo,” Thran crooned softly. “I love you, and you are my great treasure, lyubov moya. You have been brave for so long. All is well. All is well.”

Slowly, slowly, his emotions calmed. His sobs eased, then stopped. His breath evened out of its gasps. He swallowed again without his throat spasming in protest. He heaved a great sigh without dissolving into tears again. Thran held him quietly, rubbing his back slowly.

“I think I need to change Rahmiel’s name,” he graved.

“Do you?” Thran murmured, smiling.

Bard nodded. “He’s just a statue. You’re the real angel of mercy and love.”

“Tcha, lyubov moya. I am nothing so lofty. I am the husband who loves you, who is proud of you. Not just tonight, but always. You have always seen to our family and me so well; you have always been a gifted artist. All that has changed tonight is that the rest of the world knows what I have known since I first saw you... oy, perhaps one more thing has changed.”

“What’s that?” Bard whispered.

“You know, without doubt or denial, that your children are safe. You do not have to worry. You can see to them as well as you have always wanted to.”

The knot was back in Bard’s throat, and his eyes filled again, but this time, his relief didn’t overwhelm him. This time, it was a quieter emotion, not a flood that swept him away.

“Yes,” he whispered. “Gods, yes.”

“I am happy for you, and proud of you. I love you more than I can tell you.”

Bard sighed. “I still think I should change Rahmiel’s name to Rahmiel the Second.”

A soft chuckle. “And what does that make me? Rahmiel the First, Supreme Angel of Mercy and Love on High?”

“Something like that.”

“That is a very cumbersome name, funny saint.”

“But apt.”

A kiss pressed on his hair. “Must I dub you Saint Jude, the patron saint of lost causes, then, because you thought yours was lost and yet never gave up? I confess I like Bard better than Jude, no matter how apt Jude might be.”

“I like Thran, too.”

“So perhaps we can dispense with the urge to rename either of us.”

“I guess we can.”

“So you will remain my saint Bard, just as I am your angel Thran.”

“Always.”

“Then all is well.”

It was.
Chapter 110

Chapter Summary

The saint has weathered his release. Now it's time for all the sweetness that Clan Ffyrnig can bestow upon him.

Thran finished his quick shower, well pleased with the evening’s events. A young miscreant was captured, and his husband’s gallery show was a success. And what a success – in the space of two hours, nearly all of Bard’s beautiful sketches had flown out of the gallery as if they had wings as powerful as Rahmiel’s. And such a stir that glorious angel had caused! He’d looked wonderful in the gallery window with wings at full extension, smiling down on his despairing saint. The lights had gilded those wings until they looked alive, and the gallery had certainly been alive with his admirers’ marveling conversation. Bilbo had said that he’d gotten three very strongly worded offers of commissions for sculpture in large part because of Rahmiel’s shining appeal.

What a powerful message that would send to Bard – that his art was as glorious as everyone had told him, that he was eminently capable of magic as well as craftsmanship. How good it would be to see Bard’s confidence wax, and his worry wane. That gave Thran much to smile about as he shook his hair out of its braid, combed it smooth, and found comfortable tee and leggings and socks.

As he came downstairs, he ducked into the butler’s pantry to pour small cordial glasses full of nalivka, and brought them into the sitting room. Bard, however, wasn’t there. The only signs of his husband’s presence were his wallet on the coffee table, and a piece of paper discarded on the sofa. Thran set down the glasses and retrieved the paper – ah, the accounting of Bard’s show. He scanned it quickly, smiling proudly at the total listed at the bottom. Indisputable proof of Bard’s triumphant return to his craft, and a promise of more triumphs to follow!

But where was Bard?

Thran circled the house, through the kitchen, dining room, hall, main room, ballroom, before he returned to the sitting room. Not even in the solarium – but the door to the outside terrace was ajar. Thran slipped outside –

Bard was folded on his knees, face buried in his hands, silently sobbing.

Thran’s throat tightened in sympathy. Of course, he should have divined this. What had Bard always needed? Not outside acknowledgement of his talent – he didn’t have an ego that craved that. Not confidence in himself as an artist – he was fully aware of how good his work was. Not money for itself – that was only the material symbol for what mattered most to him. No, what Bard craved most was the assurance that he could provide for his children. Tonight’s show, then, had given Bard back his faith that he could care for Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda.

He went to his knees beside Bard, and eased him into his arms. “My brave saint. Zoloto moyo.”

Bard didn’t have the breath to speak, but he tried.

“It is not important to talk, lyubov moya. You are safe, and you have worked so hard, and I have you. Let your sorrow go.”
Bard collapsed in Thran’s arms and let his sobs consume him. Oy, so many years of struggle that needed to be released! His husband mumbled a fragment of something, perhaps a mention of his children.

“Ya lyublyu tebya. Ty velikoye zoloto moyo,” Thran murmured. “I love you, and you are my great treasure, lyubov moya. You have been brave for so long. All is well. All is well.”

Slowly, slowly, Bard’s emotions waned, and his sobs eased until he breathed evenly again. Thran held him quietly, rubbing his back. At long last, Bard sighed. He mumbled something about Thran being the real angel of mercy and love rather than his sculpture, but Thran gently reaffirmed all the things Bard did so well, and reiterated what Bard held most important, that his children were safe.

At length, the body in Thran’s arms relaxed, and Thran pressed a kiss on Bard’s hair. “This has been a very emotional day for you, lyubov moya. Come inside with me, so that I can properly see to you. A warm shower, then a sip of nalivka, will help you relax.”

“Gods.” Bard’s voice was raspy, and his body trembled as he sat up. “I feel like I’ve run a marathon.”

“You have. Ten years is a long time to struggle as you have. It is only natural to feel so weary.”

Bard’s chest spasmed again, and he put his hands over his mouth. “I... just want to take care of my children, Thran. That’s all I’ve ever wanted.”

Thran slid closer to put his arm around Bard’s shoulder again. “It is all any good father wants. You are the best one I know.”

“Sometimes I wasn’t.”

“You were to the best of your circumstances. I know that, and the children know that. Now, your circumstances are better, and you can be at peace.”

Bard’s chest heaved again, and he drew a long, shuddering breath to calm himself. “I can. It’s been a long time coming, but I finally can.” He put a hand on Thran’s thigh. “Thank you for making that possible.”

“You are welcome. You have made so many things possible for me and Legolas, too, so I thank you for those. We have both brought so much to each other and our family. And now we are happy.”

“We are.” Bard heaved another sigh, but even in the dark it was easy to see that he hung his head. “The difference is that now I deserve to be.”

“Ah,” Thran smiled, squeezing Bard’s shoulders. “We come to the second part.”

Bard looked towards him. “The second part? What part is that?”

“You accept that you can care for your children. That is the first part. The second part is that you accept that you are a worthy partner in our marriage, and deserve all that we have together. Your show tonight was such a emphatic success that perhaps you can acknowledge that now, yes?”

Bard chuckled softly. “I’m still coming to grips with that. I sold almost everything I showed. It’s...”

“It is wonderful. What is the vernacular... it is fucking amazing?”

Another chuckle. “Um, yes, even I have to say that it is truly fucking amazing.”
“So you see, my saint? You are the wonderful artist, and my worthy partner. Your show proved both without doubt.”

Bard exhaled deeply. “Yes, it did. So... I am.”

“See? I have been right all along. I am smarter than you think.”

Bard leaned over to kiss Thran’s lips. “I think you’re pretty smart. And an angel to boot.”

They got up together, and came back inside. Bard’s face was ravaged – red eyes, tear-streaked cheeks, and red nose. But his expression was peaceful, and Thran took that to be the true measure of the evening.

“Come, a warm shower will feel good,” Thran urged. “Then comfortable clothes and a sip of something. Are you hungry? You ate nothing at the show. I can make you a snack.”

“Maybe a shortbread cookie.”

“I will take you upstairs, and then I will make you a plate. Come with me, my sweet saint.”

Thran drew Bard upstairs, and saw him into the shower. Then he returned to the kitchen to rummage for the tin of shortbread in the pantry. Tcha, how did Bard manage to bake yet another pan of cookies with everything else he did? Because he didn’t treat it as a chore, but as something he enjoyed, just as he did much of the renovation work he did – his sketching, too, for that matter. Bard was happiest when he created something to be enjoyed, whether a beautiful room, or a sketch, or a humble pan of cookies. Thran arranged a few of the small treats on a plate and bore it into the sitting room. He didn’t have long to wait; Bard soon reappeared in clean tee and sweats, barefooted, with his dark curls still damp from the warm shower. His face looked less haggard, if tired, but he was at peace.

“Better?”

Bard nodded as he sat beside Thran. “Much.”

“Good.” Thran offered him the plate. “Your shortbread, lyubov moya.”

With a smile, Bard took a cookie, and held it up to Thran. “These are guaranteed to cure all ills in the world.”

Thran grinned as Bard nibbled the edge of his cookie and hummed in appreciation. “How can that be, my saint? There is no chocolate.”

“They have the next best thing.”

“What is that?”

“Butter.” Bard nibbled another corner, humming again. “Lots and lots of butter. They’re very good with your nalivka.”

“Tcha,” Thran scoffed gently, teasing. “I will be the judge of that for myself.”

Bard passed the plate back. “I warn you, I’m not responsible if you suddenly find yourself craving more than one of these little gems.”

Thran nibbled one of the cookies, and quickly found himself humming as much as Bard had. “Oh, you are right, Bard. Such a buttery crispness, and the perfect foil for the sweet cherry of the nalivka.”
Leaning forward, Bard retrieved his small cordial glass to sip its contents. “One of the many comfort foods in this house.”

“That is all you know how to make. Delicious food, yes, and healthy food, yes, but also comforting food. So much better than boiled chicken breast and steamed broccoli.”

Bard smiled. “It’s funny – you like so many kinds of food, and you know about so many kinds of food, but you never learned to make much beyond boiled eggs, boiled chicken breast, and steamed broccoli. Not that I’m complaining – you make my cooking look good.”

Thran took another small bite of his cookie, then a sip of his nalivka. “There was no need to learn in Russia – Vileria and I did nothing but dance. We had a babushka to care for Legolas, and a maid who cooked and cleaned for us. When we traveled, we ate in restaurants or in embassies. When Legolas and I came here, we had a live-in maid until Legolas went to boarding school, and then I ate mostly in restaurants. There was no time to learn, and very little need. I did not suffer.”

Bard hummed. “It might be fun to eat in restaurants all the time for a while, but I think I’d get tired of it.”

“As I said, I did not suffer,” Thran shrugged. “I ate to dance, not for pleasure. Just one of the many reasons I enjoy what we eat here. You take the pains to provide the right things for me, so I still eat to dance. But I enjoy it so much more.”

“It’ll be fun to watch the children at Kasim’s tomorrow,” Bard smiled in anticipation. “Legolas already has an educated palate, but the rest of the children don’t. It’ll be fun to let him lead the way for once, and for the others to try new things. Sigrid will be adventurous, and Bain won’t want Legolas to show him up. Tilda will be the cautious one.”

“No squirmy things,” Thran chuckled.

“No squirmy things,” Bard echoed. “But that’s okay. She’ll watch everything with great interest, and ask lots of questions, and long as no one tries to trick her into anything, she’ll edge out of her comfort zone, which is all I ever ask of her.”

“Wise,” Thran mulled, munching his last bite of cookie. “Encourage, but do not dictate. I learned that with Legolas. Neither Vileria nor I ever demanded that he eat something. But he would watch us to see what we liked to eat, and then he would be curious to try something. Some things he liked, and some he did not. I was very proud of him the first time he tried something that I did not like, because he did not let my dislike turn him away.”

“Oh? What did he try?”

“Eggplant.”

“Ugh,” Bard shuddered. “I don’t like that, either.”

“Neither does Legolas. But I was proud that he tried it. So it will be fun to see him with Tilda tomorrow.”

“She trusts him more than she trusts Bain. Except when they knocked on the study walls while I was working on her room, Legs has never tried to trick her about anything.”

“Our Kukla is very sweet. It would most difficult to want to trick such a child.”

“She’ll cute you to death,” Bard chuckled. “Exactly the opposite of Sigrid. She’s so like Daphne – fierce lioness, indeed. Her birthday’s in August, appropriately enough. A true Leo.”

“When are Bain’s and Tilda’s birthdays?”

“Bain’s the next one after mine, the eleventh of June. Sigrid’s next, thirteenth of August. And Tilda’s is the ninth of September. Yours is October 2. When is Legolas’s birthday?”

“The twenty-third in November. His is another appropriate one – Sagittarius, the Archer.”

“Do you do anything special for birthdays?”

“Sadly, we have not for some years, as Legolas was in boarding school. But when he was younger, we had presents and cake.”

“We do cake, too, and little presents. I never had a lot of money to spend on them, so we did outings to places that didn’t cost much to visit – a free park or a museum, or the market to buy a special treat. The bigger presents I saved for Christmas, not that I had much for those, either. I don’t want to change that much, even if I have more money now. I want to put money aside for school, or new computers, or things like that.”

“We will have enough for small presents and small treats and small lunches,” Thran assured Bard. “Mmm. You are right about the shortbread. So addictive!”

“Extremely,” Bard snickered as he helped himself to another cookie. He took a bite, and barely managed to chew it before a big yawn took him. “Gods. The day’s caught up with me.”

“It is close to midnight. Sigrid will be home soon, and then we can go to bed. Or you can go to bed now, and I will wait for our lioness.”

“I’d never hear the end of it if I crashed before Sigrid got home,” Bard yawned again. “How long before she’s due?”

“Twenty minutes.”

“I’ll make it.” Bard finished his cookie, and then the last of his nalivka. He slid down to rest his head on the back of the sofa, leaned against Thran’s shoulder, and shut his eyes. “That doesn’t mean my eyes will be open the whole time.”

Thran snickered and patted Bard’s thigh. “I will put away the cookies and wash the glasses, then I will be back.”

Bard straightened up. “I’ll help you.”

“I will see to this. Sit.”

Reluctantly, Bard let Thran urge him back against the sofa to rest while Thran put the remaining cookies back in their tin, washed the cordial glasses, and replaced them in the cabinet in the butler’s pantry. By the time he came back into the sitting room, Bard was almost asleep. Thran reseated himself beside Bard, urged him to lie down with his head in Thran’s lap, and took his husband’s hand to massage gently in the silence. He got a hum of appreciation, so he continued to massage fingers and palm gently until the mudroom door opened.

“Sigrid is home,” Thran murmured, and Bard roused. By the time Sigrid called to her father softly, he was fully awake.
“In the sitting room, sweetness,” Bard replied, sitting up. “How was the pizza?”

“Really good. It’s that brick oven place in the next block over from the gallery.” Sigrid came into the sitting room to regard her parents. “What, no celebratory wine, or whatever?”

“We had celebratory cookies and nalivka,” Bard smiled.

“Huh. Living large, aren’t you? I guess selling all your sketches and hearing how amazing Rahmiel is was too much for you to stand too much more excitement, Da.”

“That was pretty overwhelming,” Bard admitted without rancor. “Nothing would top that, anyway, so shortbread and nalivka were perfect.”

“Gods, Da, your shortbread would be a party for anybody,” Sigrid affirmed. “So is everybody else is in bed?”

“Kukla is asleep. The boys dispatch zombies,” Thran grinned. “But they must go to bed when you do, so that will not last much longer.”

“Do I have enough time to ask what happened with Lance, Ada? Finn and Tara and Killian didn’t know, and I got a lot of ribbing for going out with them before I’d gotten the lowdown on the excitement first.”

“There is little to tell,” Thran shrugged, but gave Sigrid the same story he’d given the other children and Bard earlier, leaving out the part about the gasoline. Only he needed to know about that now; he’d tell Bard when his husband had recovered from the night’s emotions.

“I’d tease you about subduing Lance with a tree, but I’m too glad that you did it at all to care about how,” Sigrid stretched and yawned. “I’m for bed.”

“Everyone’s sleeping in tomorrow,” Bard informed his daughter. “Toast around nine or ten, then we’ll head for Kasim’s after. When is our reservation?”

“Eleven-thirty,” Thran supplied.

“So we’ll leave about ten-thirty, have lunch, and head back here. The Gamgees are coming over to grill at about six-thirty.”

“Got it,” Sigrid yawned. “I still have a little homework to do, so I’ll finish that after lunch tomorrow.”

Bard got up with a stretch. “I’m for bed, too. I’ll see you in the morning, sweetness.”

Sigrid came around the coffee table to give Bard a big hug. “I’m so happy about your show, Da. Everyone said so many great things about your stuff. That’s so amazing. You’re back doing what you ought to be doing.”

Thran’s throat tightened to see Bard hug his daughter close. “Thanks, Sigrid. I’m happy it all went so well.”

Sigrid hugged back hard, and didn’t let him go for a long moment. She gave him a peck on the cheek. “You deserve it, Da. You so deserve it.”

She eased out of Bard’s arms with a smile. “See you in the morning, Da. Sleep well.”

“You, too.”
Sigrid came to Thran and hugged him, too. “Thanks,” she whispered softly, before she pushed away. In a louder voice, she went on. “You sleep well, too, Ada.”

“I will, thank you,” Thran replied, returning Sigrid’s hug with his own. “Good night, lioness.”

A chuckle accompanied Sigrid as she headed upstairs. Thran and Bard did their usual round of the rooms and doors, set the security system, and climbed the central stairs together. They got the boys settled in bed with minimal fuss, then settled in their own bed with sighs of relief. Tonight, Bard was happy to bask in the comfort of his husband’s arms. Thran didn’t urge anything more provocative – soon enough, there would be time to enthrall his husband as he’d wanted to earlier. For now, it was more important to hold him close as the treasure he was, to offer him the comfort he’d needed for so long.

“My saint,” he breathed, stroking Bard’s still damp hair, and his arm. “I love you very much.”

Bard roused enough to give him a long kiss, then snuggled beside him with a sigh. “I love you, too, angel. More than anything.”

Nothing more needed to be said. Thran shut his eyes, and sent a silent thank you to the gods, wherever and whoever they were, for finally smiling upon his saint. Then he fell asleep with a smile.

* * *

Bard roused slowly, reluctantly. Mmm, it felt so good to lie in bed with every muscle loose and eyelids heavy. What day was it? Sunday? Yes, Sunday. Good. He didn’t have to get up, then. He let himself drift away again, thoughts as diffuse as air, drifting and blurring without focus or pattern. Dimly, from far away, water ran briefly, then stopped. The shower? A low hum followed... yes, a hairdryer... hmm, Thran’s hairdryer. That soon fell silent, too. He lay with his eyes shut, floating slowly back to awareness until the bathroom door opened. He cracked an eyelid open enough to register the beautiful naked dancer who appeared. So divine, with long, white hair cascading over his shoulders and down his back and chest like silk. Such long legs and arms, elegant fingers, lean and chiseled torso, glutes to die for, and that angelic face, all high cheekbones and striking silver grey eyes. Bard hummed in appreciation, drawing those silver grey eyes to his.

A smile crossed the angel’s lips as he sat on the side of the bed. Fingers insinuated themselves in Bard’s hair, stroking and caressing until Bard hummed again.

“You’re so beautiful,” Bard murmured sleepily. “Such a beautiful angel.”

“And you are a sleepy treasure in my bed with your soft eyes and mussed hair, and a delicious body that begs to be touched,” Thran purred, leaning over to brush a kiss on Bard’s hair. “Oh, how you draw me, sweet saint.”

Bard reached out an arm to find Thran’s, and rolled onto his side, drawing Thran with him. A long, spare, but divine body slid under the covers beside his, pressing close to scatter kisses over his cheeks, lips, throat, chest. At the sweet touch of lips on his nipples, Bard shut his eyes and moaned.

“Oh, gods, angel... I can’t resist when you do that...”

“What else can I do when I find such a morsel in my bed?” Thran whispered. “You burn so brightly, mortal saint. So tempting, so delicious, so vital and alive as an ethereal angel is not.”
Bard bit his lips, trying to suppress a gasp. “Oh, gods, you’ve got me, beautiful angel. Whatever you want, you can have.”

Thran ran his lips over Bard’s nipple again, and his fingers stroked down his abdomen to massage his cock. “Today I am the angel of light, not dark. I do not take, only give, for you are my most loved jewel, and you deserve all the bliss I can give you.”

A well-lubricated cock eased into him, stroking slowly in time with the hand that caressed his cock. What a vision his pale angel was, kneeling over him, his beautiful white hair drifting with each stroke, his divine face full of both arousal and love. When he leaned forward to kiss Bard’s nipples, white hair tickled over his face and chest like the lightest blanket. Bard filled his hands with those perfect glutes and matched his rhythm to Thran’s, letting Thran’s ministrations urge him closer and closer to release with each lick, each stroke, each thrust.

“You’ve got me, you have me, I’m going...” Bard stuttered.

“Then come to me, my saint,” Thran breathed as he kissed Bard’s cheek, his jaw, his throat. “I love you so much.”

Lips nuzzled his nipples, fingers tightened hard on his cock, and inside... gods, inside... there was no resisting so much pleasure. Bard spasmed, unable to keep himself from pulling Thran’s cock as far inside him as he could take it. No matter how he bit his lips, a whimper still trembled past them, then a second as his climax consumed him.

Not only he was consumed – the sounds of Bard’s release were the final embellishment that teased Thran after him. The pale angel hovering above him arched back in ecstasy and his fingers clutched Bard’s thighs. Bard could almost see soaring angel wings stretched high behind his husband; the consumed look on his face was real, though, not imagination, and no less worthy of a benevolent angel. Thran’s hips lurched a few times more as he milked every drop of pleasure out of their lovemaking, then he sighed and opened his eyes to meet Bard’s loving gaze.

“You are so good to me,” Bard breathed, rubbing Thran’s knees under his legs. “Five months, and I still can’t believe you’re mine.”

Thran smiled, but shut his eyes and stroked Bard’s thighs. He bent over Bard’s chest as he savored the last tremors of his release, then pressed a kiss on Bard’s sternum. “I am yours as you are mine, lyubov moya. We belong to each other. It is my joy.”

“Mine, too.”

Thran slipped out of Bard, and he got to his hands and knees to kiss Bard’s lips. “I will wash, and come back.”

Bard enjoyed a deep, slow stretch, and clambered out of bed to follow his husband into the bathroom. “I guess I’d better wash, too. What time is it, anyway?”

Thran let himself into the shower cabinet to ply the handheld showerhead. “Just after ten.”

Bard’s eyes widened. “That late? Gods, I had no idea!”

Thran looked at him over his shoulder with a smug grin as he washed. “Good. You needed a long rest to properly recover from yesterday’s tension. That made you ripe for me to remind you most deliciously that your angel loves you. You are better off for both, yes?”

With a chagrined smile, Bard had to admit that he was, which widened Thran’s smug smile.
“I thought so. Please, come in with me, and we will wash.”

Bard let Thran rinse him off, then he dried and brushed his teeth. At Thran’s inquiring look as he got out of the shower, Bard shrugged. “It’s too late to bother with toast, isn’t it? We need to leave about ten-thirty to get into the city, so I’d just as soon roust the children and be on our way.”

“I am very hungry,” Thran admitted. “I got up just after eight to do my barre, so a small bite of something would be wise before I go into the city.”

“The boys will likely feel the same way,” Bard agreed. “I’ll go roust them, assuming they’re not already up.”

“None of the children were awake before I came up to shower.”

“I’ll change that,” Bard grinned as he ducked into the closet to find a clean shirt and pants. “Prepare for the deluge.”

With Thran’s laughter in his ears, he quickly dressed in one of his nice shirts and pair of trousers, then hit the children’s rooms, one by one. Sigrid was up, talking on her mobile to Finn, so she offered Bard a wave and nodded when he asked her to get dressed for their upcoming lunch. Tilda was also awake, propped up in bed and reading a book. She bounced off the bed to find clothes, excited about their upcoming adventure. Bain and Legolas were just about to start the zombie game, but put the game console aside when Bard appeared. Everyone assembled in the kitchen for a quick bite of toast – Thran had peanut butter on his for the protein – and in a few minutes the family set out for the city.

Conversation was animated as Thran drove them towards the city. Tilda asked Legolas whether anything on Kasim’s menu had cheese in it, which sparked a detailed discussion with all four children about the delights they expected to see. Legolas had eaten there before, so he was kept busy describing everything he’d tasted or seen there. Bard just listened, still basking in the glow of yesterday’s successful gallery show, and the assurance it had given him about his ability to care for his family. His husband’s delightful attentions had calmed him, too. His stomach rumbled softly as he thought about the upcoming feast. They found a parking spot close to the restaurant, and piled out of the SUV. The children were so excited that Bard and Thran found themselves pushed and pulled down the sidewalk towards the small restaurant.

“Oooh, it smells good in here,” Tilda murmured, sniffing appreciatively.

“Look, there’s the raw bar,” Bain said, nudging Legolas. “Wow, look at how fast that guy is, shucking those oysters!”

“It’s always the same man,” Legolas nodded. “When I was little, I asked Papa whether he lived here.”

“Maybe so,” Bain returned, watching the man expertly slice open shells and arrange the mollusks in their shells on plates. “Amazing.”

Kasim, clad in his usual spotless white shirt and long white apron, came towards them with a big smile on his face. He was about Bain’s height, bald, stocky without being fat, and held both arms out wide in welcome. “Thran! Bard! Welcome! So good to see you again! And what is this? Look how tall your son is! Legolas, you are six inches taller than when I saw you last! And now you have three companions? Hello, children!”

“Kasim, it is good to see you, too,” Thran said, exchanging a handshake with the chef. “Yes, here is Bard, and our so tall Legolas. May I introduce Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda, my husband’s children? They are very excited to meet you.”

Kasim shook hands all around. “Welcome, welcome! I am glad to meet you all. Please, I have your table ready, so come make yourselves comfortable.”

Kasim led them to the pair of tables he’d slid together in the back of the tiny dining room. Baskets of the much-anticipated muffins – today’s flavors were corn and almond apricot - already sat atop the blue-gingham tablecloths, blue-handled flatware was ready at each place atop blue gingham napkins, and water glasses were full. Because the only other customers were a pair of diners seated at the raw bar, Kasim lingered to chat as everyone settled – how was Legolas’s archery, and what things were the other children interested in, and was today a special occasion?

“Tomorrow is Da’s birthday,” Tilda volunteered. “And it’s Sunday, so he’s not supposed to cook for us today – it’s our turn to cook for him. So we want to give him a very good lunch.”

“And of course you would come here – I am Kasim, and this is the best place for the most excellent of birthday lunches!” He struck a comical pose, winking at the children. He handed small menus around. “There are, of course, all the good things listed on the menu. Shall I tell you what else is good today?”

At everyone’s eager assent, Kasim launched into an animated description of appetizers – the last of the season’s oysters, the calamari that Bard had enjoyed so much, small skewers of grilled shrimp, other skewers of grilled scallops, small samples of grilled octopus. A special chilled salad of scallops, the beet salad, the mixed seafood salad. The day’s catch that could be sautéed, baked, or grilled – never breaded and fried, as that was “an insult to the sanctity of seafood” – and casseroles of seafood in various combinations with various sauces. All of the children listened intently, but Tilda was especially intent. She’d insisted on sitting next to Legolas so he could explain all of the things that she wasn’t familiar with. She studied the menu just as intently, and asked her tall brother about scallops and squid and mussels. Even when everyone else had selected a dish, Tilda still hadn’t made up her mind, but her hesitation didn’t bother Kasim.

“Of course you may take as long as you like to decide,” he assured her. “Tell me what your favorite things are, and maybe I can help you to decide.”

“Well...” Tilda hesitated, “mostly, I don’t like squishy, squirmy things. So which of these are not squishy?”

“Ah, the infamous squishy things,” Kasim nodded understandingly. “The raw oysters, the mussels, the clams. I will not bring you any of those. I can bring you a nice piece of salmon in an orange glaze. That is not squishy, but very buttery and nice. Or if you want to be a bit more adventurous, perhaps you like the shrimp, the scallops?”

“I like shrimp, and Legolas says that I’d probably like scallops. And I like most kinds of fish, but I don’t think I’m ready to try any octopus.”

Kasim nodded. “Then I will make you a nice casserole, Tilda. A little shrimp, a little scallop, a little crabmeat, a little fish, perhaps a small bite of lobster just to taste. Would you like that? In a nice lemon butter sauce, or just for you, perhaps a nice cheese sauce?”

“Cheese?” Tilda brightened. “I love cheese!”

Kasim spread his hands wide. “We have a decision. I will make a new dish, Tilda’s Special Seafood Casserole, with a nice cheese sauce.”
“That sounds great, Kukla,” Legolas nodded, looking torn.

“Ah, should I make two?” Kasim teased.

Legolas debated. “No, I’ll stick to the scallop scampi. That’s so good.”

“One of my favorites, too,” Kasim nodded. “So we are decided. I will bring your appetizers and salads.”

Kasim whisked away with the menus, humming to himself as he set about preparing their lunch. Very soon, plates of raw oysters, crispy sautéed calamari, and very small octopus bits in sauce arrived, then a beet salad for Bard and Tilda to share, arugula salad for Thran, and mixed greens for the rest. Tilda eyed the oysters with skepticism, but after seeing Bard, Thran, and Legolas down one apiece, Bain and Sigrid tried them. Tilda watched in horrified fascination as her siblings slurped down the mollusks, and pronounced them not bad at all.

“You really ate that?” she breathed as Legolas chewed his with gusto.

“I really did,” he nodded. He speared the last one on the appetizer plate with his fork and cut a miniscule piece of it off. “If you want to try it, maybe just a little piece will let you see how it tastes without being so squirmy?”

Tilda eyed the tiny bit on Legolas’s fork with suspicion, then eyed Bard. “I don’t have to eat it, do I?”

“Of course not,” Bard assured her. “Only if you want to.”

Her face tightened in resolve, and in one quick motion, she leaned forward to take the bite off the fork. She mouhted it gingerly, ready to spit it out at the first indication of squishiness, but her expression turned thoughtful, as she swallowed. “Hmm. It didn’t taste like what I thought it would at all. It tasted like the ocean smells, like salt.”

“More?” Legolas asked, ready to cut a bit more for her, but Tilda shook her head.

“I think I’ve been adventurous enough,” she demurred. “But thank you for letting me try it.”

“Yay, Tilda!” Sigrid grinned at her. “You tried an oyster!”

“Just a little bit. That’s easier than a whole one. I don’t think I could do that,” Tilda shuddered.

“It’s not that hard, Til,” Bain teased her. “I mean, you eat beets. They’re a lot nastier than oysters!”

“They are not,” Tilda said with great dignity. “They taste good, and they’re pretty! Red, yellow, and white, and there’s a striped one, too. I’ve never seen striped beets before.”

“They’re still yucky,” Bain grimaced. “Hey, next you’ll have to try the calamari, Til. That’s pretty good. It’s crunchy, not squishy.”

“He’s right, it’s not squishy,” Legolas assured her. “Some places, it’s kind of rubbery, but Kasim knows how to make it tender and crispy. I like it a lot.”

“Maybe I will,” Tilda said, leaning forward to spear a small ring to dip in the marinara sauce. “Mmm, I like that. I like that a lot. What is a calamari, anyway?”

“It’s squid,” Bain snorted, laughing because he thought he’d fooled Tilda into eating something she wouldn’t like. But Tilda stuck her tongue out at her brother.
“It’s nice and crispy squid,” she informed him, “and I still like it.”

That sent a laugh around the table, Bard’s among them. It was good to see his children enjoy themselves as they tried new things, and to see Legolas get a chance to be the knowledgeable one. He shared a smile with Thran at the opposite end of the table, who was equally pleased at how much fun the children were having as they worked their way through all of the appetizers. Tilda demurred the chance to try the octopus – “too many tentacles!” she declared – but the other children were daring enough to follow Legolas’s lead.

With his typical clairvoyance, Kasim reappeared at just the right moment to take away the empty plates. Next came their entrees. Sigrid had opted for shrimp scampi, Legolas for scallop scampi, Bain for sautéed redfish topped with crabmeat, Thran for baked grouper, and Bard for mixed scallops and shrimp in lemon-butter sauce. Kasim set Tilda’s special casserole before her with a flourish.

“Enjoy, Tilda,” he smiled.

“I will,” Tilda gave him a big smile. “It smells so good.”

“Of course it does,” Kasim winked at her. “I do not allow anything in my restaurant that does not smell good.”

He went away with a smile, but as Tilda took up her fork, Bard caught him hovering within view, waiting to see whether his creation was met with approval or not. The big smile on Tilda’s face was answer enough and Bard gave him a surreptitious thumbs-up. Kasim raised both arms in triumph as he disappeared back into the kitchen, drawing laughter from both Bard and Thran.

As everyone began the main courses, several bites were traded back and forth to accommodate whoever wanted a small sample of another dish. Bard traded a buttery shrimp for one of Tilda’s cheesy ones, and both agreed that the two versions were delicious. Tilda’s cheese sauce was light and mild, a good foil that didn’t mask the delicate seafood flavors; the buttery lemon sauce was the perfect enhancement for Bard’s dish, too. From the hums of enjoyment going around the table, the rest of the family enjoyed their dishes just as much.

“That was delicious,” Tilda told Kasim, as he came to take her empty casserole dish. “Thank you for making it for me. I liked it a lot.”

“You are very welcome,” he gave her a gratified grin. “Did you know that you are the best patron to cook for, Tilda? Why? Because you are very quick to thank your chef. That is the best way to get the best food. Be lavish with your praise. Thank you very much.”

The rest of the children were quick to add their praise, until Kasim was beaming. “Ah, Thran, you have the most excellent taste in families as well as food. They are a delight to any chef. But we are not yet done, I hope? There is still dessert!”

“La crème brulée au chocolat avec des framboises!” Tilda clapped her hands. “Oh, I hope that’s on the menu today!”

“Listen to you!” Kasim put his arms akimbo to regard Tilda with astonishment. “Vous parlez français!”

“Mon Ada et mon frère Legolas m’aident, mais oui, je parle un peu français,” Tilda came back. “All of us except Da.”

“They have an unfair advantage, talking behind my back in a foreign language,” Bard chuckled.
“Ah, perhaps so, but you are still the Dad, and yes is yes and no is no regardless of the language,” Kasim comforted him. “But yes, we have la crème brulée au chocolat avec des framboises today, as well as a coconut flan, and an orange syrup cake studded with chocolate curls. All very decadent.”

“Coconut flan?” Legolas looked up. “Ooh, that’s for me.”

“Coconut?” Tilda asked. “That sounds good. But I don’t know what flan is.”

“It’s custardy, like crème brulée,” Legolas explained. “But soft, without the crust on the top.”

Sigrid opted for cake, and Legolas for flan, but everyone else opted for the chocolate crème brulée. Kasim reappeared with a trayful of their desserts, plus small cups of espresso for Thran and Bard. Tilda tapped her spoon on the top of the crème brulée, confirming that it had the proper crust, then tapped it again until she reached the creamy chocolate underneath. Legolas traded her a bit of her treat for a bit of his flan, which she pronounced delicious. Sigrid’s cake was thick and moist, covered with a scattering of chocolate curls and a piped chocolate icing rosette on top.

“It’s divine, and I’m not sharing it,” she teased. “Da, we are so learning to make this.”

“I’ve got my orders,” Bard grinned at her. “It looks just as decadent as Kasim said.”

“More.” Sigrid took another bite and shut her eyes to better enjoy it. “Sooooo good.”

All too soon, the desserts were gone, leaving behind only very empty plates and sighs of regret. Kasim came to take their plates away, laughing to see so many sad faces.

“Now you know my secret,” he teased them. “I make everything so good that you are sad to be finished, and so you will vow to come back very soon. I love to see my friends often.”

“It’s a really good trick,” Bain nodded. “Because everything was amazing. Even the octopus.”

“Ah, I have made a convert!” Kasim grinned. “And perhaps another, Tilda? You liked the special casserole I made for you?”

She nodded. “It was the best seafood casserole I’ve ever had. It’s the only one I’ve ever had, too, but you know what I mean. I liked it a lot.”

“Then I am happy,” Kasim nodded. “You are most fun to cook for.”

“You are the most generous host,” Thran said as he took care of the bill. “You never fail to outdo yourself, Kasim. Each time I visit, I think you cannot do any better. But each time I come back, you prove me wrong.”

The chef drew himself up. “Of course I do. I am Kasim!”

His theatrical response got a laugh from the clan, and they trooped out with waves and thank-yous and farewells. As they walked back to the SUV, Bard savored a full stomach and the pleasure of the delicious adventure Kasim had given them.

“That was soooooooo good,” Bain moaned as he climbed into the back seat of the SUV. “The best breakfast I’ve ever had in my life.”

“That’s the truth,” Legolas sighed, settling beside Bain. “Coconut flan..... sooooo good.”

“Everything was soooooo good,” Sigrid agreed. “Even the oysters.”
“Hmm, they were... okay,” Tilda admitted. “But my casserole was amazing, and so was the chocolate crème brulée. Kasim is the nicest chef I’ve ever met.”

“He is,” Thran agreed, giving Bard an amused smile. “But of course he was, because you were so nice to him. As he said, he does his best for the nicest people.”

“Then we all must’ve been really nice,” Bain groaned in the back seat. “Because I’ve never had anything so wonderful in a restaurant before. Who knew octopus could taste good?”

“I didn’t,” Bard turned around to give his son a smile. “That’s the best birthday lunch I’ve ever had.”

“Can we come back here for my birthday?” Bain asked. “That’s next month.”

“What, you don’t want pizza for your birthday?” Bard teased.

“Before today, I thought I did,” Bain admitted. “But after that... wow. Lots better than pizza.”

Bard turned back to look out of the front window, smiling. If Bain decided that he really did want to come back to Kasim’s for his birthday, Bard would have the wherewithal to make it so.

That was the best birthday present of all.
Chapter 111

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint continue to savor many things on the day after a certain triumphant art show.

Thran drove home from the city well satisfied. The children had had a wonderful time, thanks to Kasim’s generous personality and his fascinating food. He had so enjoyed Legolas having the chance to lead the other children, describing all of the different seafood in such delicious, beguiling terms. He hadn’t even disparaged eels or mussels, neither of which he liked. How gratifying was it to see Tilda clamor to sit next to Legolas so that she could ask him questions? Or to count how many times Bain and Sigrid leaned across the table to ask about one thing or another, too? Bard’s children were naturally curious and eager to sample new things, whether food or experiences, but they were also kind, because they never thought to tease Legolas for knowing so much.

The best part was how much Bard enjoyed the children enjoying themselves, because now he was convinced that he could provide such treats, without merely relying on Thran to foot the bills. It was still a mystery why Bard had felt that Thran was the only one who contributed to the family’s support – how hard had Bard worked on the house, lavishing so much attention and effort on it because he wanted it to be worthy of his family? Thran had no idea how much they would have had to pay someone to do all Bard had done, but it was substantial, more than enough to offset a few lunches in Kasim’s delightful restaurant. But no matter – after last night, Bard had begun to understand, even savor, how much he brought to Clan Ffyrnig. May the next several days only reinforce that understanding.

The children were a bit let down when they reached home, because chores loomed. Bard’s preoccupation and their trip into the village yesterday had not given the children much incentive to tidy their rooms before now, and after today’s wonderful lunch, it was hard for them to forsake their festive mood and return to mundane tasks. But with the enticement of supper with the Gamgees’ ahead of them, they settled quickly. Thran supervised the collection of laundry while Bard doled out mops and dust cloths.

While the children scurried to clean their rooms and tidy the rest of the house, Bard, of course, chose to work in the kitchen in preparation for the Gamgees’ arrival. A call to Rosie had confirmed that yes, they would arrive at six-thirty with four children, a baked bean casserole, and a big salad in tow. Thran was put to work mixing up a couple of marinades for the chicken – mild Italian and spicy Southwestern – while Bard made blueberry crumble. The chicken went in the marinade and then into the refrigerator, and the crumble went into the oven. It seemed to consist of little but fruit and raw oatmeal and butter, but Bard assured him that it’d turn out delicious. The truth of that was quickly born out as the concoction cooked, for a delicious aroma permeated the house. While it baked, Bard decided to dab a quick coat of paint on the garden bench he and Thran had cleaned and primed yesterday, so Thran helped with that. Once the crumble was done, they had a turn around the yard, envisioning the gardens that Sam had planned for them.

“Are you still okay with white paint for the house and black for the shutters?” Bard asked, as they stood in the front yard to regard the house. “I’ve got two house painters coming tomorrow to talk about it. And a window company on Tuesday.”
“I agreed with Tilda when she said she liked the white house. I still like that, too. It will look very nice with the grey roof. And yes, a red door. And pale blue on the ceiling of the porch, as you spoke of from one of your friends?”

Bard nodded, gratified that Thran had remembered. “Yes to all of those.”

“Then the shutters should be a color that harmonizes with all of those. Mostly white and grey, with a little red, and a little blue. Black, or a dark grey?”

“Both will fade after a while, so probably better stick to black. Grey would fade more. At least there aren’t many shutters,” Thran hummed. “Did you tell me there were shutters in the carriage house that you moved to the barn?”

“I did.”

“Where were they on the house? There does not seem to be room for any?”

“There isn’t, to my mind. At some point, someone put shutters on all of the second floor windows, which wasn’t original to the house. I thought they looked too crowded, and they were falling apart, anyway, so I took them down.”

“So were any of them original to the house, and could you tell which ones were?”

“Only the ones for the two round windows in the central hall, I think. I like those – the shutters are half moons.”

“I have never seen shutters that shape,” Thran mused. “But it would be a shame to cover up such interesting windows. They let in so much light into the hall.”

“The shutters are only decorative, so they stay fastened to the outside wall,” Bard explained. “I think both windows were stained glass at some point, but they were taken out and sold, or broken, or something. The replacements aren’t so great. I should’ve thought to measure them when I had the scaffolding in the hall to put up the chandeliers. We could see if Mrs. Mathom could get us replacements, or maybe Rosie would make us some.”

“I would like that, too,” Thran agreed, looking up at the two round windows. “Something with lots of colors. Perhaps we could ask Rosie later?”

“Let’s. Depending on what she tells us, I can always get the ladder out and measure from one side or the other, whichever’s easiest. Maybe she’d tell us to put in a plain window and hers would go inside it. That’d be good to keep it from the weather.”

Bard was so at ease that Thran was loath to speak about a darker subject, but he had yet to tell Bard all the details about Lance’s aborted attack last night. He wanted to do so while they were alone.

“There is something I must tell you,” he said softly, stroking Bard’s hair.

“Anything,” Bard said without thinking. His eyes fell on Thran, sobering when he took him Thran’s serious expression. “Um. I’m not going to like this, am I? Is it about the ballet?”

“Not yet,” Thran offered a wry smile. “Though we are ten weeks from our premiere, and that means much work, but we will discuss that later. This is about last night.”
“About Lance?” When Thran nodded, Bard’s posture grew tight. “I thought your story seemed a little... cut and dried. He didn’t pull a knife or something on you, did he?”

Thran shook his head. “All that Mr. D and Thor and I did last night happened exactly as I described. It is what Lance did before that I did not tell you. That is why he made me so angry, and so when he ran towards me, I made sure he went no farther.”

Bard gave him a long look. “What was he up to?”

“I smelled gasoline when Mr. D and I found him behind the gallery. I thought he intended to pry open the back door and throw in a Molotov cocktail – you know what such a thing is, yes?”

Bard paled, but he nodded soberly enough. “I know what such a thing is. He planned to firebomb the gallery.”

Thran nodded. “Mr. D told me that the evidence agreed with my guess. Lance had a crude one ready to light, but the back door to the gallery was stubborn when he tried to pry it open, which gave Mr. D time to run at him. When I stood in the trees to watch, I thought about our children, and you, and so much of your artwork, all so close to that door, not to mention so many other people just beyond, and the other shops that would be in danger if any fire spread. So when Lance ran at me, I was as hot as the fire he hoped to light. I did not let him see me, and I was very... unforgiving with my blow. So was the tree he crashed into after I finished with him.”

“Gods.” Bard wrung both hands over his face. “I wish you’d told me last night.”

“After you have waited so long for your triumphant return to your art, I had no intention of letting an angry child ruin your moment. You saw nothing of Lance last night, so the police had no reason to talk to you, and I had no need to burden you when you were so exhausted. Better I tell you as I do now, when we are both calm and rested.”

“Do the children know?”

Thran shook his head. “I did not want to frighten them last night. I cannot decide if they need to know or not. It might terrify Tilda, and she is already frightened enough. The older children... perhaps we should wait to see how Lance progresses through the juvenile justice system.”

“Maybe so... but I still wish you’d told me.”

“There was nothing you could do whether you knew or not, lyubov moy. That boy has ruined too many moments for us, and I did not want him to ruin another. That is the only reason I did not tell you last night. I wanted you to be happy, to celebrate, to savor. I am sorry if I did not tell you as soon as you would have liked.”

Bard looked away, and his posture remained stiff and wary. Thran bit his lip. Oh, gods; what if what he had done started another argument? He didn’t want to be at such odds with his husband again, so he took Bard’s hand in his to stroke Bard’s wedding ring.

“Please, Bard, I am sorry if what I did upsets you. That was not my intent. I wanted you to have your moment after you have waited for it for so long.”

Bard forced himself to take a deep breath, and his fingers tightened around Thran’s. Grimacing, he hung his head, but after some seconds, he offered a nod. “You’re right. There was nothing I could have done, other than be angry, and that would have put a pall on the day, to be sure. So thank you for letting me savor yesterday. It was amazing.”
Thran let out a long sigh of relief. “Oh, thank the gods. I could not have borne it if you had been angry at me.”

As Bard finally met his eyes, a slight smile crossed his lips, and he stroked Thran’s braid with appreciative fingers. “I think it’s finally sunk in that I should think before I jump to another contusion. You were looking out for me and the children last night, and today, too. That’s a gift, not something to get angry about.”

He drew Thran’s hand up to his lips for a kiss, making Thran smile. It was likely a ridiculously relieved expression, but he didn’t care – to be in harmony with his husband was worth the humor of a silly expression.

“So now we can go back to the consideration of paint and shutters,” Thran prompted. “Or perhaps we have finished with those, and can consider the windows. You have someone who will see us about them on Tuesday, yes?” Bard nodded. “You have explained about the windows before. To restore them is tedious and time-consuming, and when they are done they will still not be energy-efficient. To replace them is expensive, but we will pay less to heat and cool the house. So I would be inclined to replace them.”

“That’ll cost close to thirty thousand dollars,” Bard warned.

“And to restore them?”

“Probably half that.”

“But consider the cost benefit analysis. Over fifty years, would we spend more than fifteen thousand dollars to heat and cool the house?”

Bard grinned. “You’re pretty good with that money stuff, cariad. I’ll see how much it’ll cost to replace the windows, then.”

They continued to walk around the yard, considering what needed to be done to the porch and gazebo to restore them – Bard said mostly lumber and labor, then paint. The gardens would come after the house was painted. They decided that the Ring Thing would look beautiful outside the ballroom windows. Sea Spot Run had a similar dark bronze patina as Bard’s pine tree, so that would make a good anchor for the other end of the terrace outside the kitchen windows.

“I hope you decide to light the inside of Sea Spot Run as it was in the gallery,” Thran told Bard as they perched on one of the railings inside the gazebo. “I liked that very much. The small lights made so many more details visible.”

“That was amazing,” Bard agreed. “Frodo’s got a great eye for that. Rigging the fan to make the Ring Thing turn was something, too. I hope it’ll catch the breezes outside the ballroom in the same way.”

Thran slid over to drape an arm over Bard’s shoulders. “So many plans, and so many beautiful visions. This is all so exciting, Bard. I have never lived in such a beautiful place.”

“I didn’t imagine it’d ever turn into anything this amazing,” Bard admitted, looping his arm around Thran’s waist. “Imagine what it’ll look like at Christmas. Everything will be finished then. We’ll have a big tree in the ballroom, and maybe a small one in the sitting room, and greens and poinsettias around Hope the Lope, and greenery and ribbons along the balustrade...”

Thran chuckled. “It will be very festive. It will also be beautiful this summer as we find furniture to fill it. The solarium will be our Moroccan paradise, and the terrace will be green with Sam’s plantings, and we will put bright flowers in all of the pots in the carriage house for the porch and the terrace, and you will have your Welsh garden full of bright flowers to accent the Ring Thing, and we will have lemonade and tea cake in the gazebo.”

Nodding, Bard gave Thran a sideways look. “I’m relieved to find out that my husband is just as much of a sap about this stuff as I am.”

“Tcha, I am merely a romantic, and so are you. There is nothing sappy about the love of beauty, or to share that beauty with one’s beloved.”

“You’re right. There isn’t. It means a lot to me that we’re both so entranced by simple things – good food, beautiful surroundings, being together. And doing our art. Once the house is mostly finished – one never really finishes a house, you know – that’ll be how we spend our time every day. You’ll dance, and I’ll sculpt.”

“Perfection, indeed. It is already so.”

“It is.”

A herald rang out from the house – Legolas and Bain appeared with a soccer ball between them.

“Housework all done, lads?” Bard called back.

“All done,” Legolas said with satisfaction.

“What about Tilda and Sigrid?”

“Tilda’s done,” Bain replied, toeing up the soccer ball to bounce it on his knees. “Sigrid is, too, but she said she wanted to get started on the paper she said her English teacher will assign tomorrow, so she’s in her room.”

“A little two on two, then?” Bard gave Thran an inquiring look.

“Of course,” Thran assented, and the foursome spent a vigorous half hour trying to send the soccer ball past one pair or the other. They played Bard and Bain against Thran and Legolas, then Bard and Legolas against Thran and Bain, and finally fathers against sons. The boys were faster, but the fathers were more strategic about their teamwork, so they were evenly matched all three times.

By the time the Gamgees appeared across the back yard, Thran and Bard were ready to retire from the fray, and let the children take over. Both Gamgee parents were laden with pots and pans of one thing or another, so clearly they bore more than beans and salad.

“I brought some deviled eggs, and some rolls,” Rosie said. “I know this lot is nothing but bottomless pits, so I wanted to do what I could to fill them up, as if that’s possible!”

“We’ve got two kinds of chicken marinating, and a big blueberry crumble, so that ought to put a dent in them,” Bard returned, laughing, as Tilda ran outside to greet Elanor and her brothers and sister. “Just in time, Til! You can have my place in the soccer game!”

Little Merry was only four, and too small to keep up with the older children, so the six other children split into teams of three to start a new game. Thran was gratified to see Bain and Legolas moderate their enthusiasm so that six-year-old Rose and eight-year-old Frodo got to play as much as ten-year-old Tilda and Elanor. Sam passed his big pot of beans to Bard and the carton of beer to Thran, then he hauled Merry over his shoulder.
“You’re just a big old sack of oatmeal, aren’t you, Merry-Merry?” Sam teased, dodging one of Merry’s small blue trainers when the boy squirmed gleefully.

“Are you oatmeal?” Thran teased Merry as he lay over Sam’s shoulder. “I have never heard a sack of oatmeal giggle so much before.”

“He’s the giggliest oatmeal in the world, aren’t you, Merry-Merry?” Rosie laughed as they headed inside.

“Wiggly, too,” Sam dodged another small blue trainer. “Hang on, there, wiggle worm, before your dear old Dad drops you by accident!”

They left the Gamgees’ salad and beans in the kitchen, then Bard gave Rosie and Sam the tour of the house he’d apparently offered when they’d helped him move Rahmiel to the Ilithien gallery on Thursday. Seeing Bard’s work through the Gamgees’ admiring eyes increased Thran’s appreciation of how much his husband had accomplished since they’d moved here. When they got to the center hall, Rosie was glad to answer their queries about how to replace the two round windows with stained glass. The upcoming work on the solarium was the subject of a lot of discussion, too, just because it was such a different undertaking, and a gardener was involved. By then, the children were tired of their soccer, and Bain and Legolas peppered Sam with questions about banana trees and fruit trees, which he was delighted to entertain. Sigrid came down when she heard all the to-do, and was drawn into the discussion about Rosie’s stained glass as everyone marshaled supper. Rosie asked about his ballet, given her work on the local arts council, so Thran explained about the internships the Imladris students could take on to work on the set and stage crews. Conversation continued in the kitchen as Bard grilled chicken and Rosie saw to the beans, while Sam and Thran kept them company to set the table, and collect enough chairs to seat everyone. It was fun to see Bard and Sam enjoy bottles of beer, while he and Rosie savored glasses of wine. The kitchen island was full of good things to eat when the adults called the children to the table.

“I love deviled eggs,” Bain mumbled through a mouthful of the same as he went through the line. “These are so good, Miss Rosie.”

“Thanks, Bain,” Rosie laughed. “You’re lucky to get one with Elanor and Frodo around. They’re both gluttons.”

“I would be, too, and that’s no lie,” Bain nodded. “I like ‘em with pickle relish. The best.”

“Leave some for everyone else,” Bard asked, when Bain went to snatch a third one off the plate. “Have some salad.”

“It’s a feast, Da,” Bain protested. “You don’t eat salad at a feast.”

The boys groaned, but both put an ample helping of salad on their plates. Conversation flagged only until everyone had taken the edge off their hunger. Frodo eyed Legolas and Bain sandwiching pieces of chicken in Rosie’s rolls, which he decided seemed like a good idea, especially when that meant he didn’t have to use a fork. Tilda chatted away with Elanor, oblivious to the laughter that surrounded them when Merry tried to stuff an entire deviled egg in his mouth, only to find his mouth so full that he couldn’t chew. He was finally distracted from the egg plate when Bard brought out the blueberry crumble and vanilla ice cream, and the conversation calmed once again while everyone indulged in the treat. Once everyone was through, the adults pitched in to clean up the kitchen.
Despite the revelry, the Gamgees didn’t linger long after dessert. Tomorrow was a school day, and they had four small children to get bathed and settled for bed.

“I know you’re having a good time, Rose, but we have to get you ready for school tomorrow,” Sam explained for the seventh time. The gardener was as patient explaining this to his daughter as he’d been the first time.

“We’ve got to get ready for school tomorrow, too,” Bard stooped beside Rose. “Next time, we’ll get together on a Saturday, so you and Elanor can play with Tilda longer, all right?”

“You better,” Rose turned an accusing and disconsolate face on her parents. “It’s no fair that we have to go home early because of school! You don’t have to go to school!”

“That’s because I have to go to work, remember, Miss Rosy Toes?” Sam gave Rose a benevolent expression, refusing to let her bait him into ill humor. “Mr. Thran, Mr. Bard, your Mom, and I all have to go to work, which is longer than school. So we’ll come back again soon, or maybe we’ll have Tilda and her family over to our place.”

“Soon?”

“Soon,” Sam nodded. “So let’s head home, and let Tilda and her family get ready for school and such tomorrow, too. Say thank you for the chicken, and you’ll see them again soon.”

“Thank you for the chicken AND the blueberry crumble,” Rose said primly with a pointed look at her father. “And I hope we get to eat supper together again soon.”

“Thank you, and we’ll get together soon,” Bard nodded. “Thanks for all the good stuff, Rosie, Sam. Up to snuff, as usual.”

“We had a great time, Bard, Thran,” Sam collected Merry over his shoulder again, and took Rose’s hand as they came outside. “Congratulations about your show yesterday, Bard, and Thran, keep us posted about the ballet. Sounds exciting.”

“More than exciting – thrilling,” Rosie exclaimed. “I can’t wait to see it first hand.”

“Neither can I,” Thran gave an exaggerated sigh, drawing laughter. “Ten weeks seems like so much time, but it is not. It will be very busy.”

“You know it,” Rosie waved as they crossed the yard. “Thanks again, you two. Everything was delicious!”

“It was!” Bard sent back, waving. “See you at the bus stop tomorrow, all!”

The Gamgees sent goodbyes as they headed home, leaving Thran and Bard to shoo their children inside to start on the round of baths and backpack checking and paper organizing.

“I am full,” Thran sighed, once he and Bard had followed the children to bed. “So much good food, first with Kasim, and then with our friends. It was very hard for me not to eat too much, because everything was so good.”

“I did eat too much,” Bard lay flat beside Thran with his eyes closed. He heaved a deep sigh and grinned, even though he kept his eyes closed. “What a way to go.”

“With such good food on the table, gluttony becomes a very attractive sin.”
Bard chuckled as Thran turned out his nightside light. “No argument here.”

“Your blueberry crumble is decadent, even without ice cream.”

“Everybody else thought so, too. There isn’t any left.”

“There was nothing left of anything. How did so much food disappear so completely?”

“Eight hungry children, and four adults who all work very hard. Not a piker in the patch.”

“Indeed.”

Bard reached out an arm to gather Thran against his chest, and they settled into their usual close embrace.

“Lyubov moya?”

Bard rumbled an inquiry.

“I had a thought this afternoon.”

“Something about the house?”

“Something about our family. Something that we must do.”

“What’s that?”

“We need to get our medical insurance in order. We have been very lucky that none of the children has gotten sick, or either of us, for that matter. So tomorrow when I come home from the ballet, I will look at what I must do to make sure that you and your children are listed on the medical insurance. I should have done this before now, but life has been most busy.”

“I should have thought about it, too,” Bard roused. “Gods, after going so long without insurance, you would’ve thought I would’ve remembered to do something about it. You’re right about how lucky we’ve been. I thought sure all of the children would have gotten sick as soon as they started at the Imladris Academy, because it was a new set of germs.”

“So I will do this tomorrow for us. There is more we need to do.”

“What else?”

“We must write wills so that if anything happens to you or me, we and our children are protected. That is easy to remedy – Kell will help us see to it. But along with that, I wonder if you would consider one more thing.”

“What?”

“I wonder... because you want to protect your children as best you can, and I want to protect Legolas just as much... we both think of all our children as our children, yes? Not as children and stepchildren, only children. But the law, what the authorities think, is another story, so perhaps... perhaps we should adopt each other’s children, so that they are as much our children to the authorities as they are to us.”

Bard was silent for a long second, and Thran thought he’d overstepped himself. But Bard pulled him close, and pressed a kiss on Thran’s hair.
“You’d do that? You’d adopt my children?”

Thran raised up on his elbow to regard Bard in the dark. “You would adopt Legolas as your own, too. It would not change how either of us regards our children, I think. But it would protect them, and I hope it would show them how much we love them.”

“You want to get us so entwined that we’ll never get divorced, don’t you? As if that'll ever happen.”

“That will never happen. I won’t let it.”

Bard swallowed. Did his breath quaver just the smallest bit? “You must be serious. You never use a contraction unless you’re really serious.”

Thran snorted. “Tcha, now is not the time to debate a Russian’s English grammar. The next thing you know, you will want me to use that most ridiculous of verb tenses, the gerund. I am going, I am eating, I am waiting for anyone to tell me why the gerund is so prevalent in this country. I am standing in the hall proclaiming that I am going to the market, when clearly all I really do is stand in the hall and proclaim, which does not get me to the market at all. Better to say I will go to the market later, or I go now. No standing, proclaiming, going.”

“Are you going to gesticulate now?” Bard’s soft voice revealed the fond smile he hid in the dark.

Thran took hold of Bard’s wrist and shook it back and forth. “There. We have both gesticulated.”

Bard chuckled. “That makes it official, then. You are serious. Contractions, gesticulations, a long declaration... I stand humbled at the depth of your seriousness.”

Thran gave Bard a raspberry as he lay back down. “At least you did not say that with a gerund. So foolish. I gesticulate in its general direction.”

Bard’s arms went around him. “I don’t have any words that can tell you how floored I am that you’ve offered to adopt my children. Three children are a lot to take on.”

“You would take on another, too. Then we would both have four. We do already, but to adopt all of them as ours, not merely yours and mine, would see to them in the event that one of us cannot. So please consider it.”

“I don’t need to. If you will, I will, too.”

Thran’s smile spread across his face, and he stroked Bard’s chest slowly. “Then I will talk to Kell about it, as well as how we should make our wills.”

“Okay.” Bard pulled Thran even closer. “I wish I knew what I did to deserve you, angel, because whatever it was, I’d do it again ten times over. You’re the best thing that ever happened to me. Now you’re the best thing that ever happened to my children, too.”

“You are my salvation too, my saint. We are good for each other.”

“And our children, too.”

Thran smiled in the dark. “Our children, too.”

A patch of Thran’s hair was damp, but he didn’t mention it. There was no need.
Chapter 112

Chapter Summary

The saint’s rosy glow translates into a renewed sense of purpose. While the cherubs prepare a celebration, the angel and the saint consider the future, including the practical, the familial, and the carnal.

Bard awoke on Monday with a renewed sense of purpose. He had so many reasons to feel good, to forge ahead – the success of his Saturday show, the emerging beauty of the house, the happiness of his children, and a loving husband he still wondered how he’d been so lucky to find. Last night, that husband had spoken about adopting their children, which was the most unselfish, loving, brave, generous, trusting, and hopeful act Bard could have expected. Just thinking about it put a lump in Bard’s throat. If ever he worried that Thran might have reservations about their marriage, his pitch for them to adopt each other’s children nixed them all.

Gods, he had so much to live up to, to be the equal of a divine Russian ballet dancer! No matter how often Thran told him that he was, he still didn’t quite credit it. But he was getting there. At least now he was down to thinking Thran was out of his league only twenty percent of the time.

Getting there... Bard chuckled. Thran had been at his most endearing last night when he’d riffed on the silliness of the English gerund verb tense. Every time he launched into such a declaration, Bard melted. The rapid-fire, Russian-accented stream of words, the animated delivery, and those gesticulating hands... his beautiful Russian dancer was funniest when he didn’t realize he was being funny –

Gods, another gerund. If Thran could hear Bard’s thoughts, he’d be apoplectic, and hilarious.

Thran wasn’t at the house this morning to rattle about Bard’s verb tenses, however; he’d headed off to the UVB studio soon after the children had left for school. Work on the emerging ballet would soon become more intense, because in a few days, Thran and company would no longer develop Immortal’s choreography – they’d rehearse it. Soon the Imladris Academy’s auditorium would be home to armies of students and their professional mentors to build the set, rig the lights, and record the sound that would bring Death’s story to life. That meant afternoon and evening rehearsals, rather than morning ones, to accommodate the primary use of the school building until the end of the school year.

Bard headed into the solarium. He wanted to finish the family’s Moroccan oasis before Thran’s rehearsals and his artwork became too intense, so he’d have a chance to tempt a geisha to visit after the children left for school. As he plied steel wool and stripper on the wood trim, he wondered what Thran would ask of him to please the geisha. Gods, it’d been months since they’d veered into fantasy, which he’d missed. They needed to make this one worth the wait, as well as the exotic surroundings. Not that that would be hard. They’d managed more heat than Bard could have imagined in a completely empty garret, then again in an almost empty garret. Imagine what they’d come up with in here!

The day progressed, even if Bard’s work on the solarium wood trim didn’t. The two painters came to estimate the exterior painting. Bilbo called about the three potential commissions for sculpture that he’d gathered Saturday, and next steps for his promotion campaign. Bard needed to update his portfolio, schedule client meetings, talk to Bilbo about pricing and time frames, and so forth. The window company made a mistake and arrived to do their estimate a day early, but Bard was just as glad to have all the interruptions in one day. In the middle he managed to grab lunch, then after the window company left, he drove to the market to replenish the depleted kitchen stores. He came home to find all of the children in the house, an hour and a half earlier than they usually were. All four helped him haul in the sacks of groceries and put things away.

“Didn’t any of you have sport today?” he asked in a concerned voice. “Did something happen at school that they sent you home early?”

Sigrid rolled her eyes. “It’s your birthday today, Da, remember? We decided to come home early to make supper for you.”

“It’s a good thing you went to the market first,” Legolas said, setting bags of flour and sugar on the counter. “We had a hard time deciding on what to make because the refrigerator was so empty.”

“I got more than a ton of food,” Bard said, handing Sigrid a bunch of mixed blossoms. “Would you put these in water so they keep until you can put some upstairs on your memory shelf, Sig?”

“Sure, Da. Which ones are the daffodils?” Sigrid ducked into the butler’s pantry to find a vase. “Or are they narcissus?”

“I think the small ones are the narcissus,” Legolas offered as he carried the flour and sugar bags into the pantry to transfer their contents into the big storage bins. “The big ones are the daffodils.”

“The carnations looked peaked, and the roses were kind of droopy,” Bard commented, sliding one of the cloth grocery sacks towards Tilda at one end of the island, and another towards Bain at the opposite end. “These were nice and bright. I thought your mams would like that.”

“Springy,” Tilda pronounced, sniffing them as Sigrid went by.

“Ooh, more potatoes!” Bain exclaimed, pulling a plastic bag of tubers out of the sack. “Shepherd’s pie tonight!”

“It’s Da’s birthday,” Tilda prompted. “He should get to choose what he wants for supper. Just like we get to.”

“You do?” Legolas came out of the pantry with the empty paper sugar and flour bags.

Tilda nodded vigorously. “We all get to choose on our birthdays. I had macaroni and cheese last year.”

“I had chicken pot pie,” Sigrid smiled in remembrance. “And yes, Bain had shepherd’s pie.”

“So you’ll have to think about what you want, Legolas,” Tilda summed up.

“I have a ways to wait – all the way until the end of November. I think Papa and I have the latest birthdays in Clan Ffyrnig. His is October second, and mine is November twenty-third.”

“August thirteenth,” Sigrid said.

“September ninth,” chimed in Tilda.

“And mine’s next after Da’s – June eleventh,” Bain chortled. “And I so want to go back to Kasim’s.”
“We went to Kasim’s for my birthday yesterday,” Bard reminded the children. “So do you think I need a second birthday supper?”

“That was lunch,” Tilda corrected. “This is supper, and it’s our supper. From us. So what would you like that we know how to make?”

“I’m making cake,” Sigrid announced. “Chocolate with chocolate icing.”

“Mmm,” both Bain and Legolas chorused, drawing Sigrid’s chuckle.

“Cake is good,” Bard nodded. “We need a lot of veg for your Papa, Legs, so he stays strong.”

“But not chicken, please?” Legolas asked. “We had chicken yesterday. Two kinds.”

“Can I make that gelatin fruit yogurt thing?” Tilda asked. “Orange?”

“That’d be good for tomorrow’s supper, little doll; there’s not enough time for it to set before supper tonight.”

“Oh, I forgot,” Tilda confessed. “I can make mashed potatoes, then. Legolas showed me how.”

“Mashed potatoes are good,” Bard agreed. “Maybe sweet potatoes rather than white ones? You make them the same way.”

“Yeah, with cinnamon,” Legolas amended. “That’d be good, Kukla.”

“Then I’ll do those. What main dish do you want, Da?”

“What about hamburgers?”

“Can I grill?” Bain asked quickly.

“That leaves me with the vegetables,” Legolas sighed.

“You two decide. The rule is that whoever grills this time, the other grills next time.”

Tilda gave Bard a hopeful glance. “I’ll help you with the veggies, Legolas. I can peel and chop everything when I do the potatoes, and then you can wiggle them in the pan.”

“You would?” Legolas looked at Bard, too, waiting to see what he’d say about Tilda using the big chef’s knife.

“Why don’t you peel the veg for Legs, and he’ll put the potatoes on the stove for you, and I’ll help you chop?”

“Because it’s your birthday, and I want to do it myself,” Tilda protested.

“That’s sweet of you, little doll. Okay, here’s what we’ll do. Let’s let Sigrid make the cake down at that end of the island, and I’ll give you a lesson about how to use the knife at this end. That way you’ll have all the veg cut up for supper, and then you and Legs can cook the potatoes and the veg at the same time.”

“Is that okay with you, Legolas?” Tilda asked.

He nodded. “Okay, I’ll do the veggies. Are you going to give Bain a grill lesson after the knife lesson? Because I want to watch that one, too.”
“Good idea,” Bard agreed. “Knife lesson first, then grill lesson.”

While Sigrid tended to her cake, the other children got out carrots, potatoes, onions, red peppers, and bok choy. Then Tilda sat on the stool in front of the cutting board to have her first lesson with the big chef’s knife. Under Bard’s tutelage, she carefully sliced one half of a potato, then the other. Carrots were a bit trickier, being round and therefore harder to steady, but Tilda acquitted herself well. Bard explained how to peel the onions under running water, then slice them quickly to avoid the dreaded teary eyes, but they still had to cover the bowlful of slices with a kitchen towel to keep them from making everyone weep.

“Ugh,” Sigrid waved at the onion fumes as she slid two filled cake pans into the oven. “This might be a chocolate onion cake!”

That raised a groan from the children and a chuckle from Bard. “I hope not. I like both, but not together.”

Tilda made a face. “Double ugh. Quick, put the onion bowl in the fridge!”

Peeled and sliced vegetables went into the fridge, then Bard had four attentive students as he explained how the oven-top grill worked, how to cook the meat properly, and how to prevent a grease fire. The last part about how to clean the grill after it cooled wasn’t received with as much enthusiasm, but Bard was firm – if the children wanted to grill, then they had to clean up afterwards. That put only a slight damper on Bain’s enthusiasm.

The next lesson, of course, was which spices to mix in the ground beef. Sigrid and Tilda already knew this part, so they worked on cake icing while Bard guided the boys to mix and shape the patties. By the time Thran came through the mudroom door, everything was prepped for the evening’s supper.

“Such industry!” Thran exclaimed, venturing into the busy kitchen with his bag over his shoulder. “It seems we will have a mighty feast for Bard’s birthday tonight.”

“Including cake!” Tilda said triumphantly, pointing to Sigrid’s iced layer cake waiting on a platter on the counter by the fridge. “Sigrid made it, and I helped mix up the icing. And I learned how to use the chef’s knife, and all of us learned how to make the grill work.”

“You all have been very busy,” Thran gave Bard a quick kiss on the cheek, then gave Legolas a hug. Bain sneaked under Thran’s other arm to give him a hug, which he returned, then Sigrid came over to offer hers. Bain watched this without saying anything, but Thran gave him a grin all the same. “Such a touchy-feely clan we are when we all arrive home, yes? It is very nice to be so welcomed. But perhaps you prefer a handshake, or the fist bump, or a wave?”

Bain offered a sheepish grin. “Um, maybe...”

The boy held out his fist, which Thran tapped with his own. “Thank you. I am properly home now. And what part do you make for this feast?”

“I’m the hamburger griller,” Bain said, relaxing enough to take a superhero stance. “And the bun slicer.”

“Kukla and I are potatoes and vegetables,” Legolas added. “But I get to grill next time.”

“You have left nothing for me to do,” Thran made a sad face.

“Oh, yes, we have,” Sigrid refuted with a sharp look at Bard. “You take Da into the sitting room and keep him out of the kitchen. Otherwise, he’ll be in here, supervising.”

“Yeah, Da, you need to get out of the cooks’ way,” Bain grabbed a spatula to shake at Bard.

“Hmm, I could do that more often,” Bard teased. “You do know to put the potatoes on first, then ten minutes later put the hamburgers on the grill and heat the skillet for the veg. Put the veg in the pan when the potatoes are done, and you’ve flipped the hamburgers to the second side.”

Sigrid made shooing motions with her hands to urge Bard out of the kitchen. “We’ll sort it out, Da. I’m here to set the table and get the timing right, so everything’s covered. So go.”

Bard held up his hands. “I’m going. Yell if you need anything.”

“We won’t,” Bain chortled, brandishing his spatula. “We’ll be fine.”

“Yeah, Da,” Tilda agreed. “We can do everything. All I need is the potato smasher.”

“Third drawer, on the left,” Bard supplied, which met with groans.

“Papa, please make Bard go away so we can cook the supper,” Legolas shook his head, smiling.

Thran put his arms akimbo and gave Bard a quelling glare. “You have heard the children. You must go.”

“Gone,” Bard grinned. “Happy cooking, all.”

Thran followed Bard into the sitting room, still carrying his dance bag and chuckling at the children’s endeavors.

“They are very funny, our children,” was Thran’s comment.

“They are very sweet, our children,” Bard amended. “They all skipped sport today so they could come home early to muster supper. That’s as much a present as the actual cooking.”

“It is,” Thran agreed, dropping his bag on the sofa.

“Well played with Bain, too,” Bard said as he went into the solarium.

Thran trailed after. “He and Legolas have a harder time to know how to treat us than the girls. I have wondered what I should say to them to help them be more comfortable, but this is the first time I have thought of what to say when the moment came. I hope it was not too awkward.”

Bard exhaled. “It’d be awkward any way we tried to handle it. I figured the best thing for me to do was to let Legolas decide how close he wants to get. I won’t push.”

“Nor will I push Bain. I try to play the video games so that we have something to do together.”

“Me, too. Maybe we want to rethink all the sports camps this summer,” Bard mused, looking up at the solarium ceiling. “Choose some, but not book every minute of the school break. We want to give ourselves time to have fun together. That might help the lads feel more comfortable. Maybe make some day trips to various places, or do something outdoors. I always wanted to try one of those whitewater rafting trips. Tilda’s old enough now.”

Thran looked dubious. “Is that where you hurtle down an enraged river in a small inflatable raft and scream in terror just before you are dumped out onto the rocks?”
“That’s the one.” Bard gave Thran a brash grin. “Oh, come on. It sounds like fun.”

Thran considered for some seconds. “Perhaps you should clean out your ears.”

Laughing, Bard turned to his husband to poke him in the ribs. “You’re such a city dweller.”

“I admit it,” Thran shrugged, unperturbed. “I have never wanted to live in a tent or do without a shower for extended days. Also, I am too tall for the cots, and there are too many mosquitoes that make sleep impossible. But I do like to hike, and be outside, and cook over the fire. So perhaps this adventure in a raft would not be so terrible, as long as we can come home to our soft beds and warm showers afterwards.”

“That’s fair. And we’ll choose something reasonable, nothing at flood stage. It might improve our mojo with the lads, too.”

Thran hummed agreement, then looked back up at the ceiling. “What do we look at, lyubov moya?”

“I started to scrub down the woodwork this morning, before the mobile and the doorbell decided to ring without end.” He described the tradesmen who’d visited, and noted that Bilbo had called about the commission inquiries.

“The commission inquiries come first, of course,” Thran nodded firmly. “Just as the ballet comes first for me, so your art comes first for you. There is no debate about that.”

“Just one little niggle,” Bard ventured, and gestured around the room. “The paint and the screens and the arch won’t take too long. I want to finish those, and then the muse of sculpture can have me full time.”

Thran looked around with Bard, and his serious expression gradually melted into a sly smile. “I admit that I am eager to christen this room.”

“So am I,” Bard stroked Thran’s back. “We haven’t played a game in quite a while. I’ve missed that.”

Thran’s hum was more purr than anything else, and the fingers roving over Bard’s glutes were as soft as a kitten’s fur. “I am eager for the new one you started. I have so many questions to ask you about it.”

“What kind of questions?” Bard gave Thran a considering look.

“Later, when we are in private. For now, tell me about these commissions.”

“I’ll go into Bilbo’s office tomorrow to talk about them, as well as some other things. Frodo thinks I need an Internet web site about who I am and what kind of art I do, and he wants to augment the information he put on their Shire Hills website. Then there’s whether I want to write a contract with clients – I do; Daphne taught me that – and what I need to do to help promote myself, and fee structures, and my portfolio, and schedules, and a raft of other things.”

Thran looked surprised. “I thought some of this was already done when you signed the contract with Bilbo.”

“That was the mostly about the contract between me and Shire Hills. This is to sort out the contract between me and whoever offers me a commission. Bilbo’s ecstatic about how well the show went, so he wants to keep the interest going. I’m grateful, to be honest. I’m not a good self-promoter, so I need all the help I can get. This will allow Bilbo to do a lot of the business negotiation for me, but not all, by any means. It’ll also help me know what things to think about from the business end, so I get more comfortable. I’m glad that Bilbo and Frodo are so patient with me.”

“Will he go with you when you have meetings with the people who want commissions?”

“Probably not. He’ll do the upfront contact and negotiations, and I’ll visit the client about the actual work. So I won’t have to do as many cold calls. I’ll have a reason to be talking to someone other than to yell, ‘hey look at me, buy my art.’”

“It is all very involved,” Thran conceded. “I had no idea that it was so involved.”

“So many things to do,” Bard exhaled again. “I have a lot of work to do out in the barn to get that up to snuff. After the solarium, that’s next on the list.”

“That is the last big thing to do inside,” Thran agreed. “When the sofa for the main room comes, we can choose a paint, and that will be done, too.”

“The house has come a long way since New Year’s Eve,” Bard smiled. “Soon we’ll be down to traipsing through the junk shops like the rest of the tourists to find stuff to fill the house.”

“That will be our pleasure,” Thran brushed a kiss on Bard’s hair. “As the ballet allows, of course. Full rehearsals will begin soon.”

“Busy time for all of us.”

The subject changed to Bard’s impressions about the contractors he’d seen today. They were still in the midst of that discussion when Sigrid called them to supper.

“It smells pretty good,” Bard teased. “No burnt buns, or meat, or anything else.”

“If you’d wanted blackened food, you should’ve ordered blackened food,” Sigrid riposted with a grin.

“I never understood blackened food,” Thran said, with a sidelong glance at Bard. “To order good food, then ask for it to be charred? It seems absurd.”

“I think that’s Cajun, right?” Legolas said, as they came into the kitchen. “Don’t they blacken redfish?”

“Burnt redfish?” Tilda grimaced. “That you have to eat? That sounds yucky.”

“I think it’s just the spices that turn black when you sear it in the pan,” Bard offered. “But even so, a black piece of anything on my plate does sound yucky.”

“That’s good,” Bain declared, pointing to the platter of cooked hamburgers. “No black hamburgers.”

“Or veggies,” Legolas and Tilda chorused, pointing to the bowls of potatoes and vegetables.

“Then it’ll be a good supper,” Bard ruffled their heads.

“So start, Da!” Bain urged. “I’m hungry.”

“Are you ever not?” Bard teased, but started through the line. When he got to the table, he noticed several small presents piled on the windowsill by his chair. “And gifts, too?”

“Course, Da,” Bain snorted as he put his plate down with a thunk. “But you have to eat first.”
“That won’t be hard,” Bard shook his head. “Everything looks and smells great.”

Bard didn’t have to pretend to enjoy his supper. The children had done a solid job of producing juicy hamburgers on toasted buns with lots of condiments, crisply stir-fried vegetables, and cinnamon-laced sweet potatoes – clearly Tilda had decided a dose of Legolas’s favorite spice would add a festive touch to her humble tubers. The children seemed to enjoy their sandwiches more than usual, too, because they’d prepared it all. Sigrid’s chocolate cake was the final flourish to the meal.

“No, you can’t cut it yet, Bard!” Legolas protested, when Bard took up the knife. “We’re going to sing, aren’t we?”

“We certainly are,” Sigrid agreed, and launched into the tune. The effort was a bit ragged as everyone joined in, but strengthened by the second line. Bain was the one who kept singing after the rest, adding the variation about smelly monkeys.

“You know what that smells like, boyo,” Bard razzed back. “You know what a sock monkey is? You’re the original sock-er monkey.”

“Ha, ha,” Bain mugged. “So slice the cake, and open your presents!”

“Pass ‘em down, then,” Bard said, as he put the first slice on a plate and handed it to Bain.

Once a slice of cake sat at everyone’s place – even Thran indulged – Bard unwrapped the gifts the children had gotten him. A jar of cashews from Bain, a box of chocolate orange crèmes from Legolas, a big wedge of cheese from Tilda, and a box of peanut brickle from Sigrid soon festooned the table. Thran had followed the children’s lead, and provided a big box of cheese straws to accompany the other treats.

“I’ll have to throw another party, with all of this,” Bard surveyed the bounty. “It was great of you to give me all my favorites. Thanks, one and all.”

“Now cake!” Bain chortled, taking up his fork. “The smell’s enough to drive me crazy!”

“That’s a compliment, I think,” Sigrid laughed, but she was no slower to take a bite of her slice.

“If it’s not, this is,” Legolas said through a mouthful. “So good!”

The chocolate cake was delicious, with two thick layers of cake and decadent ganache icing. How long would it take the children to come down from the sugar high this indulgence would give them? Maybe they’d burn it off while they cleaned up the kitchen, which all of them proceeded to do once they were through their cake. They settled to their homework afterwards, leaving their fathers to return to the sitting room and resume their discussion about contractors.

“Why did you talk to only one window contractor?” Thran asked with more curiosity than disagreement.

“I talked to Sam about who’d done his windows a while back,” Bard explained. “I also used one of those online business rating services, and the one Sam used had very high reviews. I’d had a couple in when I was interested in replacing the solarium windows, and this is the one I chose, so I just called the same one again. Very professional, and he offered a substantial discount to do the whole house. He’ll be back out Wednesday to measure all the windows and get them ordered.”

“Sensible,” Thran nodded. “And the painter?”

“One’s a bit more expensive than the other, but she also got a high customer rating. She made a point to say that she was careful to keep the paint chips out of the flowerbeds. I liked that attention to detail. So I’ll probably go with her.”

“And which goes first, the windows, or the paint?”

“I’d prefer to do the windows first, but that’d push the paint into late spring or early summer, and then scheduling gets to be a problem. So I’ll probably go with the painting as soon as the contractor says she can do it. One more thing out of the way.”

“Agreed. At least you will not have to do it, only oversee it.”

“I wonder if I’ll be able to stand it?” Bard leaned forward to put his elbows on his knees, then rubbed the back of his head. “To watch someone else do the work?”

Thran stretched out a hand to rub Bard’s back in consolation. “If the feeling is too much for you, you can go out to the barn and work while they paint, lyubov moya.”

“First things first. I’ll meet with Bilbo and Frodo tomorrow morning, then I’ll finish in here. In a few days, I’ll be back in the barn fulltime. It’s time to be an artist in metal again, rather than in paint, spackling, wood stripper, plaster, and carpentry.”

“Mmm.” Thran quirked his eyebrows in anticipation. “I cannot wait. We will have our game with the geisha to consecrate the solarium, yes. It will be exotic and beautiful and refined. But you will forgive me if I anticipate a much less... refined ritual for the barn when it comes back to life.”

“You and your grunge kink,” Bard breathed, looking back at his husband with a sly smile. The hand stroking his back paused, then strayed over his hair, playing with a curl that threatened to fall into his eyes. Bard leaned into the caress, but kept his eyes locked on Thran’s.

“You and my grunge kink. Such an irresistible and divine pairing.”

“Filthy, but divine.”

Thran’s smirk was unrepentant. “Of course. The best of both. We deserve no less.”

Despite Bard’s anticipation for the elegant rendezvous he and Thran would make in the solarium, he also looked forward to a more primal celebration in the back of his workshop.

First chance he got, he’d stash a tube of lubricant in the workbench drawer.
Chapter 113

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint consider the sensibilities of the cherubs, a house and a ballet progress, and chicken soup has a reason to make an appearance.

The racy banter between Thran and his husband stopped when Tilda came in with her usual Monday list of French vocabulary words. As much fun as it was to tease each other, it was not something either of them did when their children were present. It was hard for any child to think of parents as anything other than nurturing creatures, with little life that extended beyond the day-to-day concerns of caregiving. That was fine with Thran – he loved his son, and he was grateful that they were finally able to live together in the same house again. He’d come to love Bard’s children, too, and now it was his responsibility, as well as his pleasure, to see to them as well as Legolas. He’d have time to tease Bard later, when doing so wouldn’t discomfit their children.

Discomfited children... his earlier exchange with Bain in the kitchen might have been an example of that. Both Tilda and Sigrid had been so quick to take to Thran, which humbled and pleased him. How much richer his life was with his excellent co-conspirator Sigrid as his ally, and his little Russkaya Kukla as his delightful fellow cheese sampler. But Bain was trickier, not so easy to get close to. Bard had found the same to be true with Legolas.

How much of this had to do with the sometimes-problematic relationship between boys and their fathers, and how much had to do with the even more problematic relationship between boys and their stepfathers? And then there was the gay factor...

All of these made any discussion about adoption just as problematic.

It was unreasonable to expect Bain to love Thran as much as the boy did Bard, or for Legolas to love Bard as much as he did Thran. Neither he nor Bard expected that. Happily, both boys seemed content to live with them as a married couple. Legolas was very impressed with Bard’s renovation skills, his artistic talent, and his cooking, and he appreciated Bard’s easy guidance. He’d never showed signs of being uncomfortable around Bard. But would he accept Bard’s offer to adopt him? Or Thran’s offer to adopt Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda?

How would Bain feel about the reverse?

It didn’t feel right to spring this on all the children at once. Any confusion or hesitation on anyone’s part might cause misunderstandings and hurt feelings, and damage the good relationship the children shared. The better thing would be for him to talk with Legolas alone first. Similarly, Bard would talk with his children; whether separately or together would be his call.

When he and Tilda had finished her French words and she went upstairs to shower, Thran got up from the sofa where he’d worked with Tilda, and sat beside Bard on the other one. As usual, Bard had his drawing pad on his lap and a pencil in hand, sketching, but for once Thran didn’t look at the image. He entwined his left arm with Bard’s right, and leaned close to Bard’s ear.

“I think about our idea to adopt the children,” he murmured lowly.
Bard leaned close, but kept one eye on the door to the kitchen and the other on his sketchpad. "Tell me."

As Thran described his musings in a soft voice, Bard listened intently, nodding along the way.

"What do you think, lyubov moyu?"

"I think you’re right," Bard said without hesitation. "You talk to Legolas, and I’ll talk to Sig, Bain, and Til. We’ll see what they think, and then decide where to go from there. The salient points are that we love them the same whether we do this or not, but doing it protects them in case something terrible happens. I don’t want any of them to end up as foster children because of some messed-up bureaucratic thing."

"You have no other family?" Thran asked. "I know you said your parents are dead, but what about Daphne’s?"

"Her father died just after we graduated from art school. Just dropped dead from a cerebral hemorrhage one day. Evan was in good shape, very calm, and a great guy, no indications at all that anything was wrong. It was a devastating blow to all of us, but of course Moira was the hardest hit – she was never the same after. Still strong, still supportive, but no more bubbly Gran, even around the children, no matter how much she adored them. She soldiered on, though, even if she never lost that sadness.

“But when Daphne died...” Bard winced, and rubbed a hand over his mouth. "Moira was a lifesaver for the first year, staying here to help with the children, but... she faded pretty quickly after that. She decided to move into a nice assisted living facility, where she had her own space as well as people to help her. But no matter how nice the place was, the move wasn’t easy for her. I think that was the final straw. She’d lost her husband, her daughter, so much of her strength, and now her longtime home. A lot of people in that situation fail. In fact, it’s called ‘failure to thrive.’ So... three years into it, Gran was gone. Tilda was four. I never told her that I’d had to move to the city. That would’ve been another blow."

Thran hummed sympathetically. "It could not have been easy for you to watch that, either."

Bard shook his head, and his lips tightened into a wince. "Beyond grim. I felt like... well, you don’t want to know what I felt like. What about you? Are Vileria’s parents dead, too?"

Thran nodded. "She was an orphan, and never knew her parents. All they had left her was her name, not even the knowledge of whether she had brothers or sisters. She told me that she did not miss them, because she had never known the traditional family. She was fortunate that someone noticed how much she loved to dance at the slightest provocation, or imitate the great Russian gymnasts when she saw them on television. So she was sent to the state school for dance as I was, and there we made our friendship, and later, our family. She so delighted in it, despite its contrivance, especially when Legolas was born. She said it was magical. I did not think so at first, because of the obvious reason. But she made me understand that what she delighted in so much had nothing to do with the act of sex, or one’s preferred sexual partner. It was the reassurance that an orphan without family now had one. She belonged to something."

Bard’s pencil stilled over the paper, and he swallowed. The warm, brown eyes that met Thran’s were somber. "That’s how we should explain this to the children, Thran. Just like Vileria, we have no family but this one, and no matter what happens, we want to this one to last. No foster homes."

"Yes. Let us say these things as we can in the next several days, and then we will decide what to do next."
“Do you know what’s involved legally? Maybe we should hold off to talk about it until we know whether we even can do this.”

“Hmm. Good point,” Thran nodded. “I called Kell this morning, and he will find out what we must do, and if the children must consent – not that I want to do something that the children do not like. I will tell you what he discovers.”

Bard’s hand tightened on Thran’s. “Okay.”

“I did hear from Officer Kelso this morning about Lance,” Thran went on.

“Oh?”

“He is in the juvenile jail, and faces several charges, including those for the April Fool’s Follies fight. I do not know what happens next, but Officer Kelso did say that both Mr. D and Chief Inspector Oakland were involved.”

“Did they say that Lance might get bail?”

Thran shook his head. “I do not think he was offered it. Apparently Lance was most angry about all he thought had been done to him, so much that he felt justified to risk everyone else in the gallery if it allowed him to punish Sigrid. Arson is a serious crime, and so is an indiscriminant attack on a public place. So this has moved beyond the threat he poses only to us.”

Bard considered that, rolling his pencil between his fingers. “I have to say I’m relieved. Maybe we’ll have some peace. But if they try him as a juvenile, he’ll likely get out at some point, and we may go through this all again.”

Thran’s nod was unhappy. “Perhaps so. But he does still not know where we live. In two years, Sigrid will be in college, and it will not be easy for him to find out where she is. So she will be more protected.”

“Maybe he’ll see counselors to help him get past what happened. Juvenile offenders do work with them a lot, so I’ll keep my fingers crossed.”

“Mine with yours,” Thran agreed, holding up both hands with all of his fingers but his thumbs crossed, then he linked his thumbs together for further emphasis. Bard laughed, and the conversation drifted to less fraught topics.

Maybe the gods would send a counselor who could penetrate Lance’s obsessive fixation on Clan Ffyrnig as the sole cause of his troubles. But Thran wouldn’t count on it.

* * *

The next several days were busy for Thran and the UVB company. So many meetings! Irmo’s choreography was largely done, though he would make refinements once the company began their rehearsals in the Imladris Academy’s auditorium. That would happen only once the Immortal set was built, so Thran met with Círdan and his seconds to discuss their progress to set up the internships with the students. Other gatherings detailed how light and sound crews came together. Rada was in full swing with his costumes, and the principal costumes were nearly done. Every morning, Thran did his barre, his yoga, and his strengthening regime for his feet and legs. His continued work with Mme. Morgelle led to progress in his pointe work, though he was still not satisfied with it, but at least his feet continued to bear the strain, though they were a bit ragged looking. Endless meetings with potential donors, lawyers, and public relations representatives loomed. He, Luka, and Charisse posed and danced for promotional shots, film clips, and interviews. Never had he spent so much time working on a major ballet while dancing so little. How would he gain the stamina to dance a major role this way?

The cost of all this, even using unpaid student labor, was breathtaking. The tickets they’d sell for the three performances during the festival week would not come close to covering their costs, but that was true of every ballet. That’s why patrons and donors were so important to every company. A promising new investor who would have brought a welcome infusion of money into the effort backed out, citing the off-cycle schedule. So around Lettie and Thran and Ori went to find and attract others to take up the slack. If Thran broke even, he’d be ecstatic. Even if he didn’t, if the losses weren’t too severe, he’d be content. Getting Immortal off the ground was only the start of a long, complex campaign to position Ultraviolet Ballet as an innovative company with a fresh take on a classical art that could draw a devoted audience. Licensing fees, touring companies, companion books – Bard would be perfect for those – and future ballets would follow, but only if Immortal rose like a phoenix from the ashes of all the money that had been burned on it.

Lettie was forced to bow out for a few days as she coped with her ailing father. Thran and Ori jumped into the breach despite everything else they scrambled to handle. Thank the gods for Ori’s eidetic memory and superb organizational skills, or they would have not have navigated Lettie’s absence so well. Thank the gods again for Ori’s calm throughout the effort, because his thoughtful and methodical approach to any question, no matter how bizarre, helped to narrow the focus for Thran, so he was not so frazzled. Even so, much of the time he felt like a hapless crab stretched between three octopuses.

Not everything was fraught with worry about money, aching feet, and logistics. Mr. Nori sent word through Ori that his situation had stabilized because the ruckus over the late, unlamented Angelo’s business was finally settled. Bilbo sent word through Bard that why, yes, he had struck up an interesting acquaintance with a handsome chief inspector from the city. Legolas’s archery efforts began for the spring now that the weather was warm enough to keep the archers from shivering. Sigrid’s outdoor track program also began, and Tilda was back to Double Dutch jump rope. Bain’s soccer had given away to lacrosse, which he was not enamored with, but the running kept him in good condition for next fall’s soccer.

At home, Bard’s renovation efforts slowed because he spent several mornings with Bilbo to get his artistic endeavors underway. He had an attractive website now that showcased many examples of his work, including pieces he’d sold in the past. His physical portfolio was up to snuff, and he had meetings scheduled with all three of the clients who had expressed interest in commissions. Sea Spot Run and the Ring Thing came home from the Ilithien Gallery and found homes on the terrace and side garden respectively. Rahmiel was back, too, now ensconced in the main room until Bard could make his casting molds. The remaining completed sculpture in the barn, the knot of rebar that Bard had dubbed Alexander’s Downfall – a playful poke at the Gordian knot that Alexander the Great was rumored to have solved by slicing it apart with a knife – went into the Ilithien Gallery with another collection of sketches. Interest in the artistic endeavors of a certain Bard Bowman was certainly on the rise.

In and around Bard’s artistic efforts, he pressed on to bring their house closer to completion. The beautiful Contessa chair arrived and took its place in the half bath. Windows were on order, and the painters would start on the exterior in a week. Inside, Bard refinished the solarium wood trim to match the exotic wooden screens, and reassembled the scaffolding to turn the ceiling and the top of the wall into a most realistic blue sky, shaded and swirled with clouds, and dotted with a pair of darting swifts. He smoothed the lime green paint on the walls, then stripped the hideous scabs of peeling lavender paint off the arched doorway, and anchored it to the wall.

His next effort would be to hang the carved wooden screens to either side of the arched doorway. He’d added another three screens to the four they’d already bought. Two of them were damaged, but that hadn’t deterred him, given the low price. Bard expected to dismantle some of the screens to fit the walls, anyway, so he’d work around the broken bits.

If Thran ignored the rising cost to bring Immortal to life, life progressed beautifully. But even things that progressed beautifully encountered bumps, as he discovered when he came downstairs one morning to help Bard with the children’s breakfasts and lunches. He found that while breakfasts were well in hand, lunches were still in progress. Bain sat at the table shoveling down porridge with his usual intensity, but his concerned expression was for Legolas, sitting beside him. Bard stood beside Legolas, his hand on the boy’s forehead.

Thran’s brow wrinkled. “What is wrong?”

“Legs is sick,” Bain mumbled though his porridge. As if to punctuate those words, Legolas pulled up the hem of his tee and buried his face in it to smother a hard sneeze.

“It’s nothing serious,” Bard reassured both Legolas and Thran. “A slight fever, that’s all.”

“I feel dizzy,” Legolas graved, leaning his elbows on the table to support his head in his hands.

“Is something going around the school?” Bard asked.

“A lot of colds and stuff,” Bain confirmed.

“If he has a fever, he cannot go to school,” Thran ventured. “I remember that from our first talk with Headmaster L’Eärendil.”

“That’s right. So you’re in for the day, Legs.” Bard looked over the boy’s head at Bain. “Can you and Sigrid collect Legolas’s homework assignments for him? Bring any of his textbooks home you think he’ll need?”

“What’s wrong with Legolas?” Tilda asked, coming into the kitchen. “You don’t look very good, Legs.”

“I’m sick,” he sniffed. “My head feels like it’s stuffed with cotton.”

“Oh-oh,” Sigrid commented as she followed Tilda into the kitchen in time to hear Legolas’s sneeze. “You’ve got the spring crap cold that’s gone around school. A lot of students are out with it. It sounds like one of those three-day things.”

“I just asked Bain if you and he could collect Legolas’s assignments for him today,” Bard repeated.

“Sure,” Sigrid dished Tilda a bowl of porridge, then another for herself, and sat down with her sister. “I’ll get French, history, and English, Bain, if you get math, science, and computer lab.”

“I’ll tell Mr. Faramir that he won’t be in archery,” Tilda offered. “I go past his office on the way to the lunch room.”

“That is very kind of you, children,” Thran thanked them. “Bard, what is your schedule today? I can stay here in the morning if you planned to be out —”
“No need, angel,” Bard said easily. “I don’t have any reason to go out today. I’ll work on the screens in the solarium, and then some sketches for one of my commissions, so Legs can keep me company in between naps if he wants. Maybe some hot soup for lunch, then?”

“That sounds good,” Thran said.

Legolas nodded. “Can I play video games?”

“Good luck with that,” Bain exhaled, as Sigrid and Tilda both shook their heads.

“The house rule has been no video games,” Bard explained to Thran apologetically. “I don’t think they’re the best things to help children rest when they’re sick. And it’s never happened that children try to stay sick for an extra day or two so they can stay on the game console,” he shot Bain a telling look, which Bain met with a sheepish smile and a shrug. “I learned that when Bain was in fourth grade.”

“It is a good house rule, then,” Thran agreed, smiling. “Better to nap between chapters of a good book, yes?”

“Reading books, puzzle books, and quiet music are all good, but the best is lots and lots of liquids, and lots and lots of naps. And warm food, like soup and porridge.”

“I’m not very hungry,” Legolas admitted in a clogged voice.

“Have your juice, then,” Thran asked, “and then go back to bed. Rest to help your body fight the germs.”

“I’ll get you some acetaminophen to help lower your fever,” Bard said, heading upstairs. “You can take it with your juice.”

“Okay,” Legolas nodded.

“Hope you feel better soon,” Tilda wished him.

“Thank you,” the boy tried to smile, as Bard returned with the two pills. Legolas scarfed them down with his juice, then got up to go upstairs. As Thran went with his son, Bard already had his head in the freezer, looking for chicken to make soup.

“What?” Bard asked, when he heard Thran snicker.

“You are so predictable, lyubov moya. You will fight the evil spring cold with warm chicken soup.”

“Of course I will,” Bard winked as he dumped the frozen chicken into a pot and added hot water from the teakettle. “The stuff works.”

“Even if it does not, there are few more delicious remedies,” Thran grinned. “I will tuck Legolas into bed, and sit with him until you take the rest of the children to the bus stop.”

“Righto,” Bard waved a hand as he went back to the children’s lunches. “Do you want some hot tea to keep by your bed, Legs?”

“That would be nice. Thank you,” the boy replied, preceding Thran down the hall.

“Lemon ginger’s good for colds, but any kind is helpful.”

“Lemon ginger, then.”
Bard bustled to get the tea ready, then passed it to Thran. “Have a good snooze, Legs.”

“Thank you. Bye, everyone,” Legolas with a snuffle as he and his father headed upstairs.

“Bye, Legolas; bye, Thran; bye, Ada,” the children chorused in reply.

“Brush your teeth before you get into bed, please,” Thran asked, when they had climbed the stairs and gone into Legolas’s room. He extricated Legolas’s sleep tee and shorts from the bedding and handed them to his son. “And you will be more comfortable in your pajamas than your school clothes, I think.”

Legolas took the clothes from Thran and shuffled towards the bathroom. “Okay, Papa.”

Thran put Legolas’s tea on the nightside table, then busied himself unwinding the tangle of bedding before Legolas returned. Honestly, how did one boy manage to make the bedclothes look like a snarled magpie’s nest? He plumped the pillows, and straightened the sheets and blankets. The lumps at the bottom of the bed turned out to be a paperback copy of Mary Stewart’s The Crystal Cave, and a thicker hardbound copy of Howard Pyle’s Adventures of Robin Hood, drawing him to smile. As Legolas shuffled in, he set them beside the tea.

“You read exciting books, synok.”

That got a little smile from his ailing son. “The Crystal Cave is about Merlin. Sigrid loaned me that one. The Robin Hood one is from Bain. They’re both good, Papa. I don’t like having a cold, but I won’t turn down a chance to read more of them.”

“Rest must come first, please,” Thran said, as Legolas clambered into bed. He pulled the covers up over his son’s legs and chest, then helped him to plump the pillows at his back. “If you tire of your bed, you can rest in the sitting room. Stay warm, and be sure to drink your tea. We also have lots of juice and water.”

“Yes, Papa.” Legolas tried to roll his eyes, but he sneezed in the middle of it, and ended up looking miserable more than anything else.

“I think I must bring you a box of tissues.” Thran got up to fetch one from the linen closet in the children’s bathroom. He put it on the bed by Legolas’s knees, then retrieved Legolas’s discarded jeans and shirt from the floor. As he returned the clothes to the closet, Legolas snuggled into the pillows with a sigh.

“Oh, that feels better,” his son sighed.

“Good.” Thran sat on the side of the bed to give Legolas’s braid a little twitch, drawing a pale smile from the boy. “Rest as much as you can. Bard makes you a nice chicken soup with vegetables for lunch, so it will be ready whenever you wake up.”

“He makes good soup,” was Legolas’s sleepy comment. “Maybe he’ll make those biscuits to go with it, too.”

“I am sure he will do so gladly.”

“I hope this goes away soon. My head feels as though there’s a pillow stuffed inside it.”

“I hope so, too. It sounds most uncomfortable.” Chuckling, Thran gave one more twitch to Legolas’s braid, and smoothed one last fold in the sheet. “Rest well, Legolas.”
“All right, Papa. I hope the ballet goes well today.”

“Thank you. Enjoy your books, synok. Bard will bring you anything you need. I will see you later.”

Thran gave Legolas a comforting smile of farewell, then took himself into the bedroom to dress in his dance clothes. He also arranged a pale grey shirt and his Armani suit on a hanger, and packed appropriate accouterments in a small bag to take with him downstairs. Bard was in the kitchen, chopping vegetables for the soup pot.

“The children are on the bus?”

Bard nodded. “Safely away. How’s Legolas?”

“In bed with his tea, several pillows, and at least two books. He is very sleepy, though, so I do not think he will get far in the adventures of Merlin and Robin Hood until later. He hopes you will make biscuits to go with your chicken soup for lunch.”

Bard’s smile was pleased. “Glad to.”

“I gave him a box of tissues.”

“Much more practical than a handkerchief, no matter what my old gran used to say.”

Thran sighed, drawing Bard’s glance. “I feel guilty to leave Legolas here for you to watch over.”

Bard gave him an arched eyebrow. “Why? It’s just a cold. He’ll be fine, and no, I won’t have to change anything I intended to do today.”

“You seem unperturbed. That reassures me.”

Bard’s grin was wry. “I am unperturbed, as you say. All the times I didn’t have the wherewithal to stay home with my children when they were sick... now we do. That reassures me, too.”

“What did you do when they were sick?”

“Thank the gods they weren’t sick often. Sometimes, I could get one of the neighbors to look after them. Ori’s brother, Dori, is a good soul. The Ur brothers are good, too, especially Bo, and none of them minded to sit with the children. A time or two, I resorted to the sick children daycare that one of the city hospitals runs during the school year. I didn’t like to do that because it’s so expensive, but it’s cheaper than not working. So this is a luxury. Besides, Legolas isn’t hard to look after. We’ll be fine.” Bard nodded at the stacked bento boxes on the island. “I made your lunch. The chicken wasn’t ready, but there’s farro, the usual veg, a hunk of cheese, and some grapes. I hope that’s enough.”

“It will be plenty,” Thran assured him, then indicated the hanger that held his shirt and suit. “I may be late tonight, lyubov moya. Lettie and I go to see a potential donor at three. I will text you when we finish, but do not hold the children’s supper for me. I will eat when I get home.”

“I’ll have something warm for you,” Bard nodded. “Don’t know what yet. Probably salmon or trout.”

“Either will be delicious,” Thran came around the island to give Bard a kiss. “I appreciate that you will see to Legolas today.”

“He’ll be fine, and so will I,” Bard said easily, returning Thran’s kiss. “Think about Immortal with a clear conscience, cariad. What is it you always tell me? ‘All will be well?’ This will be, too.”
Thran gave his husband a sheepish grin. “As you say, I am off, then, and I leave, too.”

“Do your best, just like always,” Bard gave the standard reply, but he gave Thran’s glute a pert squeeze.

“Oh,” Thran hummed. “If I do, may I expect a reward?”

“I’ll do my best, just like always,” Bard smirked. “Off with you, then. I can’t concentrate on the soup when you hum like that. You don’t want to mess up your son’s soup, do you?”

“No, lyubov moya. The chef, however, is another story. But we will have to wait for that. Until later, then.”

“Love you, angel.”

“You, too, my saint.”

Thran came out of the mudroom with a smile, as well as his collection of bags and hangers and bento boxes. He let himself into the carriage house by the side door, locked it behind him, and loaded his things into the back seat of his SUV. With great satisfaction, he got behind the wheel, thumbed the small control now clipped to the visor, and enjoyed a silly feeling of power when the garage door opened for him to drive out. That had been Bard’s project this past Tuesday, when it had rained so hard that Bard had come out with Thran to close the bay door after he’d gotten the SUV out. By the time Thran had come home, Bard had installed the openers for all three of the bays, so no one had to huddle under an umbrella to open the bays anymore.

Thran headed to the UVB studio, grateful once again that his husband was more than a loving, thoughtful man and a talented artist. Bard was adept at so many practical things that made their lives better, be it installing garage door openers or painting or making soup. He was also a devoted parent who would admirably see to Legolas and help him though his cold. Thran was relieved to leave his son in such good hands.

He was a little envious, too.

***

Bard dumped the last of the potatoes, carrots, celery, and onions into the soup pot, added a scattering of peppercorns, and then tossed in a handful of candied ginger bits. He set the heat to simmer, and cleaned up the cutting board and the knives. The soup would soon be ready for whenever Legolas wanted some of it. He headed upstairs to brush his teeth and put on his working clothes, and ventured a quick look in on Legolas. The boy was sound asleep, but his teacup was empty, and a few crumpled tissues already dotted the floor and his bed. Bard moved the wastebasket from under Legolas’s desk to beside the bed, tossed in the tissues that had landed on the floor, and eased out.

On to the solarium! Bard was eager to see how he could arrange the collection of screens around the arched doorway. When Mrs. Mathom had emailed him about the second set, she’d been very upfront about how damaged they were, so he hadn’t been sanguine about them. But from the pictures, each of the three looked to be nothing more than two similar motifs joined with some other stray pieces into a single rectangle. On closer inspection, he figured out that he could take the two broken ones apart, put the pieces along the bottom of the wall on either side of the archway, then place the screens he already had above them to extend almost to the ceiling. The new screen that wasn’t broken could fit above the archway all the way to the ceiling. So he got out his pliers, pry bar, and tack hammer, and carefully began to disassemble the damaged screens.

Once he got everything apart, he turned the components this way and that until he found an arrangement that put the heavier medallions from the broken screens near the floor with the more delicate whole screens above. Two such columns fit well on either side of the arch, with only a gap of a few inches on either side by the edges of the walls. The medallions from the third screen fit above the archway, and the fragments from the edges of the broken ones made a nice border on top. For each piece, he carefully marked where the anchor bolts would go into the wall. Once Legolas woke up, Bard would drill the pilot holes in the plaster to hold the anchors that would let him screw the panels into place.

“Wow,” a sniffling voice rasped by the doorway. Bard shifted atop his ladder to see Legolas standing in the doorway to the sitting room. “Did one of them fall apart? Or maybe two? There are a lot of pieces on the floor.”

“Hi, Legolas,” Bard greeted. “No, nothing fell apart. Two were broken, but I had to take them apart to get them to fit anyway, but I’ve got that much done. I just have to set the anchor bolts, and then I can hang all the pieces. How are you? Feel better after your nap?”

Legolas nodded. “I do feel better. Not quite so stuffy.”

Bard guided the panel he held down to the floor, then climbed down from his perch. “Ready for some more tea? Or lunch?”

“I’d like tea. But I’m not very hungry yet.”

Bard pulled out his mobile. “It’s not quite noon. You don’t have to eat yet. Where would you like to settle? Back in bed for another nap, or down in the sitting room?”

“Are you really about to hang up all the screens? I’d like to watch.”

“Sure, we can make you a perch in here. You can be the first person to try out the fainting couch. But go get some socks and a sweater, and a blanket. It’s important to keep warm to help your body fight the germs. I’ll get your tea, and make you a nesting spot.”

“Okay, Bard,” Legolas nodded, and disappeared back upstairs. Bard got out the teapot and a couple of mugs, and made a big pot of lemon ginger tea. When Legolas came back down, he had on leggings, socks, and a hoodie, and he carried one of his fleece blankets, a couple of pillows, and a book. Bard angled the fainting couch so Legolas would have a good view of the proceedings, and set the tea tray down on the marble-topped table by the windows. He retrieved the thermometer from the kitchen table, and held it out to Legolas.

“Check your temperature before you have any of the tea,” Bard asked. “Let’s see if your nap helped to bring it down.”

Legolas nodded, and put the thermometer under his tongue, holding it there until it beeped. He took it out, looked at it, and held it out to Bard.

“A little less, but still a fever.”

“About a degree’s worth,” Bard nodded. “But better. Come on, bundle up.”

He helped Legolas arrange his pillows on the fainting couch, then spread the fleece blanket over top. When the boy was settled, he handed him a mug of hot tea.
“You said you had to take the screens apart?” Legolas asked, looking at the pieces.

After Bard explained what he’d done, Legolas was interested enough to ask about how he’d anchor the pieces to the wall, so he explained that, too. He retrieved his drill from the tools arranged in the corner, and squeezed the switch briefly to make sure it was properly working. Then he lined up the partial panel against the right side of the archway to check that the markings still lined up correctly. When they did, he drilled the pilot holes, and slipped in the anchors. Next, he drilled small holes in the panel, threaded the screws through, and set them in the anchors.

“First one done,” he said, looking over at Legolas. To his surprise, the boy was sitting up on the end of the fainting couch to watch him closely.

“That was fast,” Legolas offered. “It’s not as hard as I thought it’d be.”

“It takes a lot longer to do paint and trim and such,” Bard agreed, smiling. “Too bad you’re running a bit of a fever, or you could help with the next one.”

“I would,” Legolas looked disappointed. “I like to know how things go together, but I haven’t had much chance to learn. Papa’s not very interested in that.”

Bard slid the ladder over, took one of the full panels, and held it above the one he’d just installed to check the anchor markings. They were still true, so he put the panel down, changed to the bigger drill bit, and drilled the first anchor hole. “I don’t know that your Papa isn’t interested so much as he’s been so focused on his dancing for so long. In some ways, he hasn’t gotten to see or do a lot of things in his life.”

Legolas crossed his legs under him, clearly interested enough to stay perched at the end of the fainting couch. Bard gave him a look.

“Does it bother you if I talk to you while you do that?” Legolas said instantly.

Bard shook his head. “Not at all. Just wrap up in your blanket, so you stay warm.”

Legolas pulled his blanket over his shoulders. “You’re right about Papa. All he does is dance.”

Bard drilled the next hole. “He’s very good at it.”

“He is. He ought to be – he works so hard at it.”

Bard slipped in an anchor and moved to the next hold to drill. “I don’t think he sees it as work all the time. All the business to put on Immortal, yeah, that’s work, but the actual dancing part isn’t. He loves that. He’d have to, or he wouldn’t do it so much.”

Legolas hummed. “I guess so.”

Bard glanced at him, then put in the next anchor. “You love your archery and your fencing a lot. Doing those isn’t work like doing homework is, right?”

A clogged snort was half laughter, half drippy nose. “Absolutely not. I’d much rather spend the school day on either or both of those instead of pre-algebra and history.”

“So the way you love archery and fencing is the same way your Papa loves dancing.”

“I haven’t thought of it that way before. It was just something Papa did. But it makes sense. What are you doing now?”
Bard carried the drill over to show Legolas. “This is a drill bit, the part that makes the holes. The wall needs bigger holes than the screen. So I take the big bit out like this.” He did so, and handed it to Legolas. “Here, hold that. Then I put in the smaller one for the screen like this.” He slipped in a much thinner bit and tightened it. “Then I can drill the holes in the screen.” He placed the four holes, then showed Legolas the screws he threaded through the holes. “Now all I have to do is slip the screws into the anchors and tighten them.”

“What do the anchors look like?”

Bard fished one out of his pocket. “It’s just a plastic sleeve that helps the screw hold in the wall. When I tighten it, it compresses a bit, which makes it fatter around the middle, which wedges it even more tightly into the wall, so it can’t pull out.”

“Oh, I see,” Legolas nodded.

“So, up with the screen.” Bard carried the screen up the ladder, lined it up, and fastened it to the wall. “See? Not too hard.”

“No, that was easy,” Legolas nodded. “So now you’ll do the next bottom piece?”

“That’s right,” Bard nodded. “Just like the first one.”

He got the bottom panel and the full one above it put up on the right side of the one he’d just installed.

“It’s starting to look like a real doorway already,” Legolas nodded.

“I’m a little hungry, but I’m more interested to see you do the screens.”

“Okay, I’ll do the other side, then we’ll eat.”

“That’d be good.”

“Okay.”

Bard checked his markings, and started on the bottom panel to go on the left side of the archway. He drilled pilot holes, threaded in the anchors, put the screw holes in the screen, and anchored it in place.

“You love to do all the house stuff,” Legolas said, when Bard stepped back to admire the screen.

“I do. It’s a kind of art.”

“Art you live in.”

He chuckled. “Absolutely. Useful art.”

“Does it feel the same when you do the house stuff as it does when you do your art stuff?”

“Inside, you mean?” Bard queried. At Legolas’s nod, he replied, “A little. I feel a certain way when I know a line in a sketch is right, or the clay is the right shape. I get a bit of the same sense when the paint color matches what I envisioned, or the chandelier’s at the right height.”

“I get this feeling when I aim my bow, when it’s just at the right place to send off the arrow,” Legolas said. “Or when I know which way to parry to score when I fence.”
“Makes sense,” Bard nodded. “I’d bet that your Papa feels something like that when he dances, to know just how to extend a foot or lift the ballerina or something.”

“I know he does,” Legolas nodded. “He’s told me that many times.”

“So you’re an artist in archery and fencing,” Bard grinned. He got the next tall panel anchored above its base. “Which one do you like better?”

“Whichever one I’m doing,” Legolas gave a garbled chuckle. “It’s going to be hard to give up one or the other before long.”

Bard paused to look at him. “Why do you have to give one of them up? Don’t you do fencing in the fall and winter, and archery in the spring and summer?”

“At the high school and college level, yes. But they’re both summer Olympic sports, and if I want to reach that level of skill, I’ll have to decide which one and practice accordingly.”

Bard checked the alignment of the next bottom screen. “That’s a hard choice. Your Papa says you’re amazing at both already.”

Legolas smiled proudly. “He’s always been the best encouragement.”

“You give him a lot of talent, skill, and dedication to encourage. He knows from his own life as an elite dancer how much of all three it takes to be the best in anything.”

“He does. He tells me that whichever sport I choose, he’ll support me.”

“He’s cool like that,” Bard nodded as he anchored the last bottom panel. “Okay, just one more to go, then we’ll have lunch. Which do you think you’ll keep, the archery or the fencing?”

“I don’t know. It’s hard to decide. Archery’s so still, so much concentration. It’s very inward. Fencing’s just the opposite – always in motion, constant movement that’s become instinct, so you’re very in the moment. I hope I can still do both for as long as possible, but right now, I think when I have to choose, I’ll choose fencing.”

“What makes you lean that way?”

Legolas shrugged. “The Gondors. They’re both Olympic caliber, and they’re here. I won’t have to move someplace to receive their instruction. I’d have to move to receive the same level of archery instruction. That might not be so bad, if I knew Tara and Kíllian were going to be at the same place. But I don’t, and...”

Bard paused in his drilling. “And... what?”

Legolas darted a quick look at Bard. “The Gondors are great. I really like them, and they’d teach me a lot. I’d have a huge shot to be on the Olympic fencing team if I studied with them, absolutely. And they’re right here. I’d be home every night. I’d see Papa, and the other children... and you... and I’d be at the same school, at least for the classes I need to graduate.”

“Sounds like you’ve thought about it a lot.”

Legolas nodded. “I did before we moved here, but after meeting Kíllian and Tara... if I’m honest, Kíllian’s better than I am at archery. Really good. He’s got this amazing instinct. I’ve actually learned a lot from him already, and he’s a year younger than me. As good as he is with his archery, I learned that I’m just as good with my fencing. So I’d have an edge there...” He sighed. “I could learn to be as good an archer as he is. But... I don’t want to go away to learn it. It’d be another boarding school. I like it here, in a family.”

Bard threaded the last screw through the screen, and gave Legolas his full attention. “I’m glad you like it here. I do, too. Clan Ffyrnig is something special.”

Legolas offered him a crooked smile of agreement.

“So let’s see how the last screen goes up.” Bard said, returning Legolas’s smile. He positioned the screws in their anchors, and screwed them into place. “There. Sides are done. No screw-ups so far.”

Legolas gave the screens a critical look, and nodded. “I don’t think you’re supposed to say that. Or you jinx the rest of it.”

“Maybe so. So I might as well double jinx it. I like it. It looks like a real archway.”

“It looks great. There, I’ve triple jinxed it.”

“We’re in real trouble now. Better stop for lunch, and let all the jinxes evaporate. Plain biscuits, garlic chive, or cheese with your soup? Your choice.”

“I like the garlic chive ones?”

“Coming right up.”

Bard washed his hands in the kitchen sink, and quickly put together the biscuits. Legolas snorted and sneezed though several tissues to clear his runny nose, but came into the kitchen as Bard put the pan of biscuits in the oven. He leaned over the steaming pot of soup, breathing in deeply.

“Oh, that helps,” he groaned. “I’m so clogged!”

“Just don’t drip into the soup,” Bard teased, but gently. “Some more tea might help. What kind this time?”

“Chamomile. I think I’ll need another nap after lunch.”

Despite Legolas’s claim of a reduced appetite, the boy filled his bowl full, and carried it carefully to the table. Bard brought butter, honey, blackberry jam, and pepper jelly to the table, then his own bowl of soup and spoons and knives. He sat opposite Legolas in Sigrid’s place.

“It’s been five hours since you had anything for your fever, so you can have some more in about an hour.”

“Okay.” Legolas had a sip of his soup. “Ugh. I can’t taste it very well, but the steam and the warmth feels good.”

The oven timer dinged. “Maybe a little garlic will help.” Bard got up to fish the biscuits out of the oven, and placed the pan between them.

Legolas took one, buttered it, and nibbled the edge of it. “I can taste that a little better, so something’s working.”

“That’s good. Tonight you can take a hot shower to steam you open a little more. Or maybe you’d like a soak in the tub this afternoon after your nap.”
“Can I?” Legolas brightened.

“Sure. Just make sure you stay warm, and get out before you get chilled.”

“That’d be great. Lots better than saying I have to take a nap. Sounds like I’m a kindergartner all over again.”

“Don’t diss a good nap. They’re golden.” Bard took a biscuit, split it open, and buttered it. “Just like these.”

“Where’d you learned to make them?”

“My Gran, back in Wales. I don’t remember her very well now, but she wasn’t much bigger than Tilda. She used to tell me to eat a lot of mutton to grow tall.”

“Mutton?” Legolas’s brow wrinkled. “That’s... sheep? Lamb?”

“Mutton is old sheep. Tough, old sheep. But it’s good if you put it in stew, if a bit strong. Lamb like we get in the store these days is a lot better.”

They chatted about inconsequentials as they ate. They both had a second bowlful, and a few cookies afterwards. Legolas got sleepy once the hot food hit him, but he insisted that he wanted to see the last bits of screen go up over the top of the archway before he napped. So Bard made a big pot of chamomile tea and got Legolas ensconced back on the fainting couch, then pieced the remaining sections of the broken screens into place. This took longer than the other pieces, because now that the side sections were in place, the measurements altered just enough that he had to redraw a few of the anchor holes. But in an hour or so, he got the last section in place.

“Thanks. I like it, too. It came together well. Now, you need to burrow into bed, Legs. You can hardly hold your eyes open.”

“I haven’t finished my tea yet,” he protested.

“Then bottoms up, and go brush your teeth. You can crawl into bed after that.”

“What’re you going to do?”

“Admire my handiwork for a few minutes, then I thought I’d work in the sitting room on the sketches for one of my commissions.”

“Will it bother you if I stay down here, too?”

“Course not. Take your pick of the sofas. I’ll take the other one.”

“Okay. Thanks.”

Legolas managed to summon the energy to finish his tea, brush his teeth, and settle in the sitting room with his box of tissues close by. But not five minutes after he got himself swathed in his fleece and his book in his hands, he nodded off, and the book fell aside. Smiling, Bard kept still on the other sofa, keeping watch until he was sure the boy was sound asleep. He laid The Crystal Cave on the coffee table, made himself comfortable on the other sofa again, and opened his sketchbook.

His first sketch would not be for his commission. There would time soon enough to coax the blank paper to reveal a Japanese maple at the first flush of spring. Bard already saw the image in his mind that would appear for that. But the sleeping boy opposite him was a more ephemeral vision, and wouldn’t wait.

Bard gave himself to the sketch with a smile.
Chapter 114

Chapter Summary

Conversation consumes both the angel and the saint.

Chapter Notes

I don't own rights to "The Dark Crystal," the wonderful Muppets, "The League of Extraordinary Gentlemen" graphic novels or film, or the Lara Croft games or films. I just enjoy them very much.

Thanks to johnnysmitten for letting Hal figure into this chapter ❤️.

On my way home, see you in 20, Thran tapped on his mobile, then pressed Send. He put his mobile in the cup holder in the console beside the driver’s seat, then rubbed his forehead in a futile attempt to dissipate the ache in his temples. What a frustrating afternoon it had been – no, it had been frustrating before that, almost from the moment he set foot in the studio. All the details that had to be settled to put on this fucking ballet had interrupted his barre, had kept him from dancing most of the morning, had even canceled his pointe work with Mme. Morgelle. All these details were important, but how was he supposed to actually dance the ballet when these so-important details kept him from preparing for it?

He picked up his mobile again. Don’t warm supper. Nothing is wrong. Will explain when I see you, he typed, and pressed Send again.

He drove home. For someone who’d just reassured his husband that nothing was wrong, he certainly didn’t feel like nothing was wrong. Thank the gods that traffic was light through the village, though the flip side of that was that it was late, probably after six. He turned onto their lane, and then into the driveway with relief. Thank the gods again that he could just push a button to open the carriage house bay, pull straight in, and push the same button to close the bay behind him. He collected his bags from the back seat, locked the carriage house door behind him, and came into the mudroom with a sigh.

“I am home,” he called, when he heard voices in the kitchen. There was no clothing to unpack from his bags given how little he’d been able to dance today, so he carried them into the kitchen. “Hello, children. How goes the homework?”

“Hi, Thran; hi, Ada,” Bain, Sigrid, and Tilda chorused. They sat around the kitchen table, and looked up from their schoolbooks and computer screens as he came in.

“Sometimes, it’s boring,” agreed Tilda with a sigh. “I already know how to find the area of a rectangle, so it’s not very interesting to do it over and over.”
“You look nice, Ada,” Sigrid grinned, nodding at Thran’s clothes. “Suit, tie, even a vest!”

“You do.” Bard came in from the sitting room. He looked behind him, back through the doorway. “Legs, your Papa is home.”

“Hi, Papa,” a gravelly voice drifted in from the sitting room, followed by a muffled sneeze.

“Hello, Legolas,” Thran called, unpacking his bento boxes from his bag. Bard favored him with a casual kiss as he took the boxes to wash them. “Hello, my saint. How was Legolas today?”

“He was great. Slept a lot, ate his soup, drank his tea, and kept me company in the solarium while I put up the screens. His fever spiked a little around four, but only a degree, and we drowned as many germs as we could in juice and tea and water. So he’s doing well.”

“That is good news,” Thran said, offering the other children a wave as he went in to see Legolas. He found his son amid pillows and a blanket, with one of Bard’s art boards on his lap as he worked on his homework. He leaned over to press a kiss on Legolas’s head. “Do you feel better, synok?”

“I didn’t late this afternoon, so I had some more acetaminophen and took another nap. That was my third one today, but I feel better now,” Legolas grinned. “I got to eat supper in here on a tray. That was cool.”

Thran snickered. “Excitement abounds. I am glad you feel better. Bain and Sigrid brought your assignments, I see.”

Legolas nodded. “I didn’t miss much that was new, which is good. But I missed archery, which is bad.”

“I missed my favorite thing today, too,” Thran said. “Meetings, meetings, meetings! All day, meetings! I did not dance at all today. I did not even get to finish my barre. Most frustrating.”

“Does that have anything to do with why you texted me not to warm your supper?” Bard asked.

Thran nodded. “I should have texted Do not warm supper yet. I will eat, but I must spend time in the ballroom first to do what I could not do earlier – dance. Otherwise, I will be unfit to dance the ballet when we get to the ballet.”

Bard nodded. “As long as you eat eventually, that’s okay.”

“Of course. I have learned my lesson. I must not miss meals. But today, one must be later than usual.”

“Then take yourself off to the ballroom, cariad. Sooner started, sooner ended, and all that.”

“I hear and obey,” Thran gave Legolas a wry grin, who grinned back. “You see? I have homework, too. So off I must go to do it. I will return soon, synok.”

“Okay, Papa,” Legolas settled back into his pillows to consider his worksheet.

When Thran headed upstairs to change, Bard trailed behind him. “Sounds like you had a long, frustrating day, angel. Did the suit help?”

Thran slipped off his suit coat, and laid it on the bed. He went into the closet, sat on the stool to untie his shoes, and slipped them off. “A little. We did meet with a receptive audience, and we did get a donation, but it was half what Lettie had hoped. I had no expectations either way, and something is better than nothing, but the more times UVB must trot me out like a circus pony to entice a donor to the ballet, the less time I have to prepare to dance the ballet. I did not even complete a whole barre this morning, Bard. Nor did I Monday. I will soon become the proof of what Rudi Nureyev said.”

Bard leaned on the doorjamb to watch Thran hang up his suit. “What did Rudi Nureyev say?”

“‘When I miss class for one day, I know it. When I miss class for two days, my teacher knows it. When I miss class for three days, the audience knows it.’ Thran intoned, ‘I have missed class twice this week. I know it. My teacher, Mme. Morgelle, does not know it only because I could not attend her class today, but likely the entire UVB company knows it. So I must remedy that in the ballroom so that an audience does not know it, and then I will eat supper. I will be at least an hour and a little more.’”

“Take the time you need,” Bard said easily. “I’ll have something hot for you when you’re done.”

Thran put his hands on Bard’s shoulders and gave him a grateful kiss. “I am sorry to be so much trouble, lyubov moya.”

“I’m sorry the ballet is so much trouble to you. This is the first time you’ve been on anything other than the dancing side, which has to be a big adjustment.”

Thran nodded. “More than I expected. But if I can balance it all for the next nine weeks, then so many more things will be possible.”

“Such as?” Bard asked, settling himself to listen as Thran took off socks, shirt, and underwear to toss them in the hamper.

“Oh, so many things. Perhaps a tour with Immortal, perhaps a book about it – I would like you to do one, if you are so inclined – and of course more ballets. But you have so many things to tell me, too. How was Legolas today, and will he go to school tomorrow, and did you get to work on your commissions today, and did you say the screens are up in the solarium?”

“We do have a lot to talk about,” Bard admitted with a regretful chuckle. “So get yourself into the ballroom, and do what you need to do to take care of yourself, and then we can talk over supper.”

Thran sighed as he tried to go past Bard into the bedroom. His husband, however, snared him in an embrace.

“I won’t take advantage of a naked dancer on a mission, but I do want you to know that you’re hot even when you’re intent on business.”

Thran sighed again, but allowed himself to melt when Bard nuzzled his neck. “Oh, lyubov moya, for three rubles I would beg you to take me to bed and keep me there until tomorrow. But I am desperate to coax a little dance out of the day. If the children can spare you, perhaps you would come into the ballroom with me, and we can talk as I work.”

“Can you talk and dance at the same time?” Bard snickered, but the sound was affectionate, and accompanied by a soft kiss on Thran’s hair.

“Can you sketch and talk at the same time?” Thran put his hands on Bard’s arms to massage gently.

“Hmm, point taken.” Bard conceded with a shrug. “I’ll bring my sketchpad. Then we’ll see if either of us can do art and talk at the same time.”

“Perfection,” Thran grinned, sneaking a hand behind Bard to squeeze his glute. “I will dress, and I want to see the solarium, but then I will dance.”

Bard backed out of the closet, drawing Thran with him, and dipped in for another kiss before releasing him. “I’ll go turn on the lotus lamp in the solarium. I got your Istanbul lamps up, too, so we can get the full effect.”

“Ooh...” Thran hurried to his dresser to find a clean dancer’s belt, tights, and shirt. “I will be right down. I cannot wait to see them!”

Bard grinned as he headed downstairs. Thran fumbled into his clothes, grabbed his dancing slippers and leggings and sweaters and wraps, then took the stairs two at a time. As he flitted through the sitting room, he found Legolas in the solarium, looking up at the faceted glass lamps he’d bought in the Istanbul Grand Bazaar. On each side of the archway, Bard had anchored two gracefully curved iron hooks between the wooden screens to hold the lamps. On the opposite wall, the lotus lamp glowed atop the marble topped table. The fountain wasn’t installed yet, and the wall under the arch was still featureless white, but already the effect was magical.

“This is spectacular,” Thran breathed, as the other children came in behind him. Tilda and Sigrid both oohed, and Bain muttered, “Wow!” under his breath.

“Wow, indeed,” Thran agreed. “I thought you would hang the lamps from the ceiling, but this is so much better.”

“That’s what I originally thought I’d do, too,” Bard agreed. “But then I painted a sky on the ceiling, and if I hung the lamps from there, it’d ruin the illusion. So then I thought I’d hang them on the side, but the electrical outlets are on either the screen wall or the outside wall, not the side walls, so I’d have to run the cords all hither and yon. So Legolas suggested that if I put them on the screen wall, the screens would hide the cords, and then it all looks like it’s done with magic. And the lamps look amazing against the screens.”

“You made a most excellent choice, synok!” Thran gave Legolas’s hair a playful twitch. “I give you both high marks in set design.”

Bard and Legolas exchanged fist bumps, which gratified Thran. Legolas might have missed school today, but it seemed that the time he’d spent with Bard was more than an even trade. He would look for the chance to have such time with Bain. But now, all had to be put aside, even the consideration of their emerging Moroccan sanctuary, while he deferred to the dance.

“I am sorry I cannot enjoy it more now,” Thran exhaled. “But I did not dance today, and I cannot prepare for Immortal if I do not. Forgive me, children, but today, I have homework, too.”

The children offered sympathetic murmurs as they filed out of the solarium. Bard thumbed off the lotus lamp, then proudly flipped the wall switch to turn off Thran’s Istanbul lamps.

“Not only is it magic, but it’s instant magic,” he quipped, as the solarium returned to darkness.

“Quite impressive,” Thran replied in an admiring tone.

“I’m going to sit with Thran for a bit, children,” Bard said, as they passed through the sitting room. “I’m still homework help, so I’ll be in the ballroom if you need me.”

“Okay, Da; okay, Bard,” the children chorused. Legolas settled back on the sofa, Sigrid went upstairs to work on her paper in her room, and Tilda and Bain went back to the kitchen table. Bard lingered to make sure Legolas had tea and Tilda had notebook paper, then he fetched his sketchpad and pencils from the coffee table and followed Thran into the ballroom. He padded in on sock-clad feet, blinking in the bright light that illuminated every inch of the ballroom, and settled on the floor against the wall, halfway down the room, opposite Thran’s barre. He didn’t open his sketchbook yet, but gave Thran a smile.

“Shall we discuss domestic affairs before we tackle international ones?” he teased.

“Domestic matters should always take precedent,” Thran teased back. He started his stretches slowly, relieved to finally throw off the day’s tedium and indulge in more important things. “How is Legolas? Will he be fit for school tomorrow?”

“He’ll be home at least another day.” Bard replied. “He was still running a fever this afternoon. That seems to be the time of day when everyone’s spikes, so I’m not surprised.”

“I trust he behaved himself. Did he sleep all day?”

“He slept most of the morning, then he kept me company in the solarium. I enjoyed that. He wanted to know about how the screens went up, and I showed him how the drill worked, and we talked about his archery and fencing. We had lunch, then he napped on the sofa while I worked on my sketches. I have a couple of good ones of him I think you’ll like, along with some for one of my commissions. When he woke up, he helped me figure out about your lamps. I hadn’t thought to put them on the screen wall, but they look better there than hanging freeform from the ceiling as I originally thought. We had a good time.”

Thran’s hum was pleased. “I am sorry he is sick, but I am glad that you and he could spend time together.”

“He’s a graceful lad, and not just because he’s an athlete, or his father’s son,” Bard observed. “He reminds me of one of my mates in art school. Zameer. He was the son of a Bengali diplomat, and had lived in several countries. He was the most socially adept person I’ve ever met – courteous, tactful, able to quickly put someone at ease, a good listener. He did canvases as well as sculpture, but all in paper pulp with incorporated elements. Some of it was pretty wild, and some of it was very pointed politically, and it occasionally attracted some rude comments at shows. No matter what shit someone said about his art, he was always gracious. He said he’d lived in too many cultures to think any of them were the only way to live, so he was very philosophical about people who had a narrower or a different view than he did.”

“A wise man,” Thran agreed, bending into a plié. “Legolas has not lived in so many countries, but he has lived in more than this one, and he has met many artists from around the world, so yes, he has been schooled in a kind of diplomacy. We have been in this country only seven years, and citizens for only two. So in some ways, we are like your mate, because we are still something of the outsiders.”

Bard hummed. “I was in Wales until I was fourteen, but we moved a lot – my Da had a restless soul. We came to Canada, and stayed pretty much in one place until I was eighteen when I came to the States for college. I’ve been here since. I didn’t became a citizen until I was twenty-six, but I’ve lived here for twenty years. So I suppose I feel more American than Canadian or Welsh, but if I had to move someplace else next week, I’d adjust.”

“You have moved many times, then,” Thran mused.

“Too many to count,” Bard nodded. “Daphne called me a nomad, but once we came here, I wasn’t. I’ve lived other places longer, but this is home.”

Thran gave Bard a look. “I have lived here only a few months, but I call it my home. I am grateful that Legolas and I are here with you and your children.”

“I’m glad we’re all here,” Bard said simply. “It’s finally worthy to be called a home, too. The solarium just needs the fountain, and a bit of paint on the wall around the fountain, and that room’s done.”

“Then we will have our game,” Thran purred, smiling in anticipation. At Bard’s chuckle, he quirked an inquiring eye at his husband.

“You look like you did that first morning,” Bard said with a rueful gleam in his eye. “I had no idea what I was getting into.”

“I did,” Thran grinned, shutting his eyes as he arched back. He straightened, and traced the same figure he had made to seduce Bard into their first kiss, which won him a snort from Bard.

“You were a fucking bastard that day, and you still are.”

Thran arched his neck and looked at Bard from under lowered lashes, but his smile was much less demure. “You were delicious then, and you still are. I look forward to our new game very much. I have many things to ask you about it, lyubov moya, but I will wait until I hold you in bed to ask them of you. Let us dispense with the rest of the domestic and international debriefing first.”

Bard chuckled as he opened his sketchbook. “Hmm, how am I supposed to concentrate on anything with a provocative tease like that?”

“You will manage.”

“I guess so. Let’s see, you’ve seen the solarium and were suitably impressed. I’ve told you about Legolas – oh, not entirely. He told me that he expects he’ll have to choose between archery and fencing at some point, because they’re both Olympic summer sports, and he can’t compete in both because of the amount of training that’s involved.”

Thran paused in his forward bend, then resumed it. “Yes, I had expected that, though I wish it were not the case. He enjoys both, and is highly skilled in both.”

“He said he thought Kíllian was a better archer than he was. He thought he was a better fencer, that he has an instinctive feel for it that he doesn’t with archery, and working with the Gondors would make him all but a shoo-in on the Olympic team. So he’s leaning towards fencing rather than archery.”

“I am somewhat surprised. Master Schroeder had dampened his enthusiasm to an unconscionable degree this past fall. I would like to slap that cretin because he spoils the sport for so many young hopefuls. I must thank the Gondors because they compensated for Master Schroeder’s incompetence so well.”

“The Gondors are partially responsible, yes. It might interest you to know what else is.”

Thran leaned over to grasp one leg while he stretched the other over his head in a standing split. He looked over to meet Bard’s eyes. “What?”

“He said that if he wanted to, he could develop the same level of instinct and competency in his archery as he already has in his fencing. But he’d have to move away to do so, and he didn’t want that. He wanted to stay here, with us, in our home, and not go to what amounted to another boarding school. That’s the nicest thing anyone’s said to me since a certain rarefied dancer agreed to marry me.”
Thran straightened out of his split to regard Bard somberly. Despite his best efforts, he swallowed and looked away.

“Oh, gods, angel – I didn’t mean to upset you. I thought you’d be happy to know that Legolas is happy here.”

“I am, very much so. But I cannot help but regret the time that I forced him to spend in those boarding schools.”

Bard was by his side in an instant, his hands on Thran’s shoulders shaking gently. “Hey, you’re not allowed to infringe on my territory. I’m the one in the family who specializes in guilt, not you. I’ll call in the union if you keep it up.”

Thran mustered a soft laugh. “As a specialist, you should understand why I feel the same way. I only emulate my betters.”

“Both of us have been in circumstances that offered no good solutions, only bad and worse ones. We have more options now.”

“True. I merely regret that the children, yours and mine, have had to endure the results of those circumstances without good solutions.”

“I could mouth some platitudes about how those circumstances built character in our children, but neither of us would like them. So focus on our better circumstances instead. The children are all right, give or take a few germs.”

Thran repaid his husband’s urgings with a quick kiss and a smile. Reassured, Bard released him so he could resume his barre.

“So we have discussed the children, and the solarium,” Thran continued in a light tone. “You said you worked on your commissions?”

“I did,” Bard nodded. “They’re wildly different, but very interesting so far. You might be interested in one more than the others – it’s for Hal.”

“Hal, our financial planner?” Thran blinked in surprise.

“Hal, our financial planner,” Bard nodded.

“But he was not at your show,” Thran said in a puzzled tone.

“He wasn’t. His request is in addition to the three that Bilbo received at the show. Hal took the time to look me up on Bilbo’s web site, and then again when Frodo got my site out there. He saw my pine tree that’s out on the terrace, and called Bilbo about it. He wants me to do a tree for him. Smaller, thank goodness, so I can cast it myself – maybe three feet tall. He wants a Japanese maple growing out of a rock with a single leaf on it. The tree’s suffered lightning damage and looks dead, but for that leaf.”

Thran mulled that over. “Did he tell you anything more about this piece, why he wants it?”

Bard gave him an interested look. “He was a bit vague at first, other than about the rock – it had to be either malachite or white quartz. He didn’t know what kind of tree, other than it had to have leaves, not needles, and the trunk couldn’t dip down, like the Japanese bonsai I originally thought he wanted – it had to rise up. When I asked about the leaf color, he said whatever I wanted, the color wasn’t important. So I told him the color would change the entire meaning of the piece – if the leaf were red or gold or orange, then that meant fall, and the leaf and maybe the tree were dying. If the leaf were green, though, that meant spring, and the tree was coming to life despite the winter and the damage done to it. That’s when he started to get excited. He said yes, absolutely, he wanted a green leaf. So I suggested that if he wanted the piece to speak of a new start, then the tree could show some growth over the lightning damage, that it was on the mend. He got even more excited about that, so I was able to talk him out of the malachite in favor of the white quartz.”

“Why did you choose one stone over the other?”

“Malachite’s a stunning stone, very showy and beautiful. But if Hal wants the emphasis to be on the tree and its leaf, then a malachite base would take away from that. The white quartz will provide a nice angular, craggy base for the more organic tree, and the green leaf will stand out more. The tree will be metal, with some nice roots growing over the stone, and a grey green finish, lighter on the lightning scar and darker over the rest. The leaf took a little figuring, as Hal wants the leaf to move realistically, like the needles on my pine do. So that cut out malachite for the leaf, which isn’t a spring green, anyway. Silk might work, and could embody that pliability that brand new leaves have. But it frays, which doesn’t look leaf-like. I think a thin artisanal paper would work well, because I could paint it realistically, and it’d look fragile, which is what Hal’s after. There’s a practical advantage to paper, too – if it ever tears or comes off, you can easily put on a new one. I’ll provide several with the piece, and instructions on how to replace the old one with a new one.”

“This is fascinating, lyubov moya,” Thran said. “It will be very beautiful. Hal is a great appreciator of beautiful things...”

Bard looked up from his sketchpad. “But?”

“But this piece is not his style. I do not think it is for him. I think he means for it to be a gift.”

“Hmm. Interesting. Any ideas for whom?”

“His best friend, I would hazard. Your tree would be very much his style. I do not know the particulars, and I do not pry, but Hal’s friend is sorely troubled. I know you will be considerate. But the metaphor is clear, which is clearly applicable to Hal’s longtime friend. Hal is a good soul to commission such a piece for him.”

Bard tapped the end of his pencil on his lips. “That’s good to know. My sense is that the piece should be a bit ritualistic, very naturalistic, and positive in a Zen way.”

Thran nodded, then leaned over to stretch into another split. “You have it well in hand.”

“I think so. One aspect of so much Japanese art is to embrace the imperfect, the ephemeral, and appreciate the fleeting beauty in both. That’s what I’ll do with the lightning scar. Out of damage comes grace and beauty. I’ll talk to Hal again, to make sure that’ll work with what he envisions.”

“I am sure you will make it beautiful. You said Bilbo had three other commissions?”

“He did. I haven’t talked to one of the clients yet, so I don’t know what that one’s about. One of them sounds like a wonderful mechanical challenge. Do you know what an orrery is?”

Thran upended himself on his hands. “I do not.”

“Did you ever see one of those mechanical things that shows the motion of the planets? You turn a crank and all the planets move around the sun?”

“Oh, yes! I have seen one of those! I remember a film that Legolas liked when he was small, from the man who invented the Muppets – The Dark Crystal. I think there was one in that film?”

“There was one in the first Lara Croft film, too. Both were huge.”

“Will this one be so large?”

“No, thank goodness,” Bard grinned. “The gentleman liked the Ring Thing, but it sounded like he wants to veer into steampunk.”

“Steampunk?” Thran gave him a look. “What is this steampunk?”

“Think of an alternative Victorian England, where steam powers a lot of science fiction machinery, such as great airships. There is a whole genre of stories and graphic novels that riff on it. The League of Extraordinary Gentlemen was a film that captures the look of the thing – it’s got a beautiful version of Captain Nemo’s Nautilus submarine in it. Steampunk machines have lots of gears and handmade details, brass and wood where we would use form-stamped metal, and so forth. It’s intrigued me for a long time, but I’ve never done anything with it before. A steampunk orrery would be a great project.”

“That sounds wonderful,” Thran nodded.

“The other one... inspiration hasn’t struck yet on how to do it, but the idea’s simple enough. It’s the Andromeda galaxy, turning. In metal. That one will take some thought.”

“An entire galaxy in metal, turning?” Thran frowned. “I have no idea how to do that.”

“I don’t, either,” Bard agreed, but he looked more thoughtful than worried. “It’s not like an orrery, where you attach each planet to a pole and have it twirl around the center. A galaxy has millions of stars. So I’ll have to think long and hard about that one... hmm... maybe a ton of different-sized anodized aluminum spheres... they’d be lightweight, and the colors are amazing...”

“You have much to work on now.”

“The barn will get a thorough cleanout as soon as I get the solarium done. I need to think about my commissions and do the preliminary sketches first, which will give me time to get the barn in shape. So that’s the last of my domestic news. What’ve you got in the international ballet arena?”

Thran grinned at Bard’s allusion. “I will reveal all in a few minutes. I must do the steps and the jetés now, which are not so easy to talk through.”

“I’ll be forced to sketch, then,” Bard winked. “Or depending on how long you think you’ll be, I’ll put your supper on. I saved a piece of the salmon to grill when you got home, so it’d be a real supper and not leftovers.”

“Perhaps forty minutes?” Thran estimated. “To do the steps and jetés, then to properly cool.”

“I’ll sketch for a few minutes more, then get your supper,” Bard decided. He waved a hand at Thran. “Step and jeté away.”

“I hear and obey,” Thran teased his husband with a smile, and gave himself to the dance. Bard sketched quietly until Thran finished his grand jetés, then excused himself with a wave. Thran methodically worked through his yoga and his cooling stretches, and when he came at last into the kitchen, his frustration with the day had vanished. Bard was at the stove, grilling Thran’s salmon, but he wasn’t too busy to give Thran a pleased grin.
“You look better. You’ve got time to put on your comfy clothes, then your supper will be on the table.”

“I fly,” Thran grinned back, and was soon seated at the table with a warm plate in front of him. Bain was the only child still at the table; he sniffed deeply.

“Mmm, that smells good,” he offered wistfully.

Bard laughed as he put a dish of raspberries beside Thran’s plate. “You’ve already had yours, boyo.”

“I’m still hungry.”

“There’s still a lot of peanut butter toast, cheese and crackers, bread and butter, bananas, other fruit, and milk in the fridge.”

“Mmm, maybe peanut butter toast,” Bain mulled.

“Finish your homework, please, then you can eat.”

“I’m too hungry to do math,” he grumbled. “What about a bowl of ice cream?”

“What about you finish your math and then have peanut butter toast?”

Bain snorted in plaintive disgust. “You’re harsh, Da.”

Legolas appeared in the doorway, his blanket wrapped tightly around him. He smothered a sneeze. “May I get in the tub now, Bard?”

“Sure,” Bard nodded. “You know the routine – shower first, then get in the tub. You get a reprieve from the scrubbing afterwards since you’re sick.”

“Okay, thanks,” Legolas shivered, but he mustered a smile for Thran. “I was supposed to get in the tub this afternoon, Papa, but I helped Bard with the lamps, and then I fell asleep.”

“It has been an eventful day,” Thran conceded, smiling. “Go soak and get warm, synok – I see that you are cold, and that is not good. Turn on the water to the tub before you get into the shower, and then it will be full when you get out. And better that you do not wash your hair until you are no longer sick – a wet head will not help you.”

“Okay, Papa,” Legolas smiled gratefully. “Enjoy your supper.”

“Thank you. Enjoy your soak.”

“There!” Bain exclaimed, as Legolas disappeared down the hall. “Finally done! Now for the peanut butter!”

“Clean up your things first,” both Bard and Thran chorused, which drew a chuckle out of both of them, as well as a groan from Bain.

“Geez, both of you!” he complained, piling his papers and books messily together. “A guy can’t catch a break at anything!”

“If you know that, then why do you think that you can smush everything together like that and expect to pass muster?” Bard asked mildly. “Put everything away the way you know it should go, then you won’t have to come back and do it again later.”
“All right, all right,” Bain muttered as he rearranged his papers neatly in folders and loaded his books and folders into his backpack. “There. Done. All neat and tidy. Now may I have something to eat?”

“Have at,” Bard waved a hand at the kitchen. “And I don’t have to remind you to clean that up when you’re done, right?”

“No,” Bain exhaled. “May I use the broiler?”

“Because...?” Bard asked.

“Because I like to toast the peanut butter, too. It tastes different that way. Nuttier.”

“Go for it,” Bard agreed. He carried a cup of tea to the table and sat in Legolas’s usual chair to sip it. “Domestic crisis averted. Now, for the day’s international news, we go to our Russian correspondent.”

Thran snickered, then summoned a pseudo-serious expression, as if he read for a news broadcast. He affected a sonorous voice to answer Bard’s question. “The day’s activities ground to a standstill as all parties convened around the UltraViolet Ballet conference table. Discussions encompassed set design, costume design, lighting design, and sound design. The result of these discussions were all good, but at times the duration of the conference seemed designed to keep principal dancer Thran Oropherson from the barre, the yoga, and the dance.” Thran dropped his talking-head impression to throw up both hands. “How am I supposed to back up costumes and lights and sets and music if I am not fit to dance?”

Bard leaned over his folded arms to consider. “Maybe you need to take a page from Irmo’s book, and throw a tantrum.”

Thran speared a bite of salmon, chewed, and swallowed. “I might do that tomorrow. Better, perhaps I should stay home, do my barre and yoga here, and then go to the studio.”

“That works, too. I’ll grab a bit of rebar from the barn and chase off anyone who tries to interrupt.”

Snickering, Thran took a bite of the stir-fried vegetables that accompanied his salmon. “What is the expression? I would pay a dollar to see that?”

Bard slid his gaze towards Bain, who still rummaged in the kitchen to make his peanut butter toast, then leaned forward. Thran leaned forward in response.

“I didn’t say I’d do it without a shirt,” Bard whispered.

Thran smothered laughter. “I would pay much more to see that.”

“You would. I don’t work cheap.”

“Stop,” Thran chortled. “I try to do justice to my supper. It is very good, I must say. An orange glaze this time?”

“Thanks. Yes, orange and a little ginger. Just olive oil on the veg, and nothing on the farro.”

“I admit I like butter on the farro. No, sit,” Thran urged Bard to keep his seat. “You were kind enough to make my supper. I get the extras for myself.”

He fetched the butter and returned to his seat. He ate in silence for a few minutes, savoring each bite, so carefully prepared, so flavorful. Bard was content to sip his tea and commune silently with his thoughts, so Thran took his time, unwilling to bolt everything down with abandon, for that would be crass after the effort Bard had made to prepare it. When he was done, he got up to rinse his dishes and load them into the dishwasher, again gesturing for Bard to keep his seat.

“The dishwasher is full, so I will turn it on,” he observed.

“It’ll wait for you to have a cup of tea and some dessert if you want,” Bard said. “There’s ice cream and a few cookies left. I’ll have to make some more cookies tomorrow.”

“Those orange ones with the chocolate?” Bain piped up as he licked peanut butter off his knife, then washed it, dried it, and put it back in the flatware drawer. “Those were amazing. Tilda liked them, too.”

Thran looked at Bard. “Where is Tilda? In her room?”

“She was in the sitting room with Legs,” Bard got up to stick his head in the other room. “Uh-oh.”

“Uh-oh?” Thran paused in his rummaging in the pantry for cookies. “What does uh-oh mean?”

“It means that Tilda’s asleep on the sofa.”

Thran got his cookies from the tin, shut it, and hastened after Bard into the sitting room. He found Bard beside Tilda, rubbing her back.

“Little doll?”

Tilda made a soft moan as she sat up. “Da?”

“You fell asleep on the sofa, Til. It’s only eight o’clock. How do you feel?”

“I’m okay,” Tilda rubbed her eyes as Bard put his hand on her forehead. “Just tired.”

“Why don’t you go get your shower, and then crawl into bed? You don’t have to wash your hair tonight.”

“Okay,” the little girl agreed, rubbing her eyes again. “Hi, Ada. I fell asleep.”

“So I see,” Thran nodded. “A warm shower will feel good.”

“I’ll help you get organized,” Bard encouraged, as Tilda got to her feet.

“That’s good,” Tilda agreed, sighing. “I’m still tired.”

“Up with you, then,” Bard took her by the shoulders to guide her towards the hall. He gave Thran a look as they went by. “Back in a few minutes, angel.”

Thran waved a hand as Bard steered their youngest upstairs. He sat on the sofa to sip his tea and nibble his cookies until Bard returned. Bain came in, chewing the last bite of his toast.

“Bet she’s sick,” Bain said.

Thran nodded. “It is not like her to fall asleep this early.”

Bain shrugged. “Maybe she’s just going through a growth spurt. I did when I was ten. I was always falling asleep because I was growing so fast that I couldn’t keep up. I’m kinda going through one now, I think. I’m hungry all the time.”
“Legolas grew vary fast last year,” Thran offered. “Six inches in four months. He still grows very fast, but not as fast as last year.”

Bain brightened. “Cool. Maybe I’ll keep growing. I want to be taller than Da. Legs is almost taller than him now.”

“Legolas wants to be taller than I am, too,” Thran grinned.

“That’d be really tall. Would it affect his fencing?”

“A tall épée fencer has an advantage,” Thran shrugged. “He must still be very skilled, but given two fencers with equal skills, the taller would have an edge. It becomes less of one as the skill of the fencers increases, of course.”

Bain thought about that. “So if Legs grows taller than you, that’d be good.”

“It could be. A few épéeists are almost as tall as basketball players.”

“Wow.” Bain looked impressed. “It helps to be tall for soccer, too.”

“For many sports. But not for gymnasts and ice skaters.”

Bain snickered. “No, not for them. I guess dancers are usually shorter than you?”

“For the most part, they are. The great Baryshnikov is only five-eight. Shorter dancers have less to launch into the air than I do. So it is important to take good care of the body, especially the feet and joints.”

Bard reappeared, drawing Bain’s eyes as well as Thran’s. “Is she sick?” Bain asked.

“Not yet. Just very tired. She said her legs hurt, so it might be a growth spurt. We’ll see come morning. How do you feel, Bain?”

The boy held up both hands. “I’m fine. Besides, I can’t be sick tomorrow, Da. I’ve got this English test I want over and done with.”

“Good enough. Tilda won’t be in the shower long, so you be on deck to get in right after her.”

“Okay, Da. I’ll head up now. And yes, the kitchen’s clean.”

“Good lad,” Bard grinned, sitting beside Thran. “Sig’s still working on her paper, so be courteous.”

Bain’s reply was a good-natured wave as he went upstairs. As soon as the boy was out of earshot, Thran cocked his head at his husband.

“Is she sick?”

Bard exhaled. “I’d give it another day or so. Tomorrow morning, I’ll call Rosie. With four children, she’ll be a font of knowledge about a good pediatrician. We may not need one right now, but the day will come that we do. Better to be prepared ahead of time.”

“Wise,” Thran agreed, munching his cookie.

“So, to resume about the ballet...” Bard paused with a meaningful look at Thran.

“I have nothing more to tell of it today,” Thran waved a hand. “You saw most of the day’s ballet in our ballroom before supper.”

“You alluded to what you want to come after Immortal,” prompted Bard.

“Ah, that,” Thran nodded. “Yes, I think of more than all these thousands of problems and questions and details that beset me. I keep in mind how you prepared for your art show. You sketched, you moved your sculpture, knowing that your show was only the prelude to what you hoped would come after – your commissions, new works, new chances. So all the details to make Immortal are important in the same way, because Immortal’s premiere is the prelude for me, too. There are immediate things that will come – perhaps an Immortal tour, perhaps a book – I would like you to do one, if you are so inclined. But I want long-term things to follow, too – new works, like your commissions. If UltraViolet can position itself as an innovative company, a source of new ideas, then we infuse new life in a classic art. We help it evolve and remain fresh.”

“It sounds exciting. You’re the perfect one to bring that fresh take on a respected tradition. But you’ve got to get Immortal onstage to get it all started.”

Thran nodded.

“And it’s all on your shoulders.”

Thran heaved a long sigh, and nodded.

Bard rubbed Thran’s thigh. “It’ll be a grind, but that won’t matter, angel. It’ll all happen, just the way you want it to. Nothing can stop you or Immortal.”

Bard’s words were few, but the conviction in them was unshakeable. Even though they were the same words Thran had told himself so many times, to hear lyubov yego voice them so firmly was both comfort and affirmation. He leaned into Bard and shut his eyes to better appreciate his husband’s solid warmth. Bard wrapped an arm around his shoulder, and they sat quietly together, listening to the water running upstairs. When it stopped, Bard patted Thran’s arm and sat up.

“I’ll start the dishwasher, then see how Tilda’s doing.”

Thran sat up, too. “And I will see if Legolas has disappeared down the tub drain.”

Bard snickered. “Let’s go, then.”

By the time they got upstairs, Bain came out of his room with his pajamas in hand to take his turn in the bathroom. The light was off in the master bathroom, so when Bard ducked into Tilda’s room, Thran went into Legolas’s. His son was curled in bed with his book.

“How was your soak, Legolas?” Thran asked as he sat on the edge of his son’s bed.

“That tub is amazing,” the boy grinned. “I got in all the way up to my neck, and it was so warm. Maybe if I’m still sick tomorrow, I can get in again.”

“You must stay home again tomorrow,” Thran confirmed. “The rule is that you must be without a fever for twenty-four hours before you can go back. But you may not be the only one to keep Bard company tomorrow. Tilda was very tired tonight.”

Legolas’s lips were downturned. “Oh, no – did she catch it from me?”

“Likely both of you caught it from all of the other sick children at school. No matter how many sneezes everyone smother, the germs go around. There is no way to avoid all of them.”
I guess not. But I hope she’s not sick.”

“We have been very lucky to have gone so long with all of us so healthy. We will weather this with little problem. You must do your part and rest as much as you can.”

“And soak in the tub,” Legolas grinned. “That’s pretty cool.”

“Of course,” Thran gave him an affectionate smile. “Do not read too long, please. Sleep lets your body fight the cold better than anything.”

“Bard said I should have some more acetaminophen before I go to sleep.”

“I will get it. Then rest.”

“Okay, Papa.”

Thran fetched the two pills and a cup of water from the bathroom, and returned to Legolas’s room. He saw the medicine down Legolas’s throat, then straightened the sheets and blankets that covered his son. “You have your tissues and your water, so I will leave you to settle, synok. Rest well.”

“I hope this is gone soon,” Legolas sniffed. “I hate being so clogged!”

“No fun, indeed.” Thran pressed a kiss to the top of his son’s head. “See you in the morning.”

“Night, Papa.”

Bard stuck his head in. “You got your acetaminophen, Legs?”

“Yes, Papa gave it to me.”

“Okay. Sleep well then. That’s the best thing.”

“I will. Night, Bard.”

Thran followed Bard out of his son’s room, and he pulled the door ajar behind them. “How is Tilda?”

“I hope she’s just very tired. She said so many children were out of sport this afternoon that she overdid the Double Dutch. She says her legs ache, and she doesn’t have a fever, so if she stays that way overnight, I’ll write her a note to skip sport and come home on the early bus.”

“Prudent,” Thran agreed. “How is Sigrid?”

“Deep into her paper,” Bard replied. “And she says she feels fine.”

Bain came out of the children’s bathroom, clad in his sleep pants and tee. His hair was damp, but not soaked, mute testimony that he thought a dry head was wise for him as well as his siblings. “Legs and Til in bed, then?”

“Both in bed,” Thran nodded.

“Sig’s still working on her paper,” Bard added.

Bain snorted, but with a smile. “She’ll be a writer one day, I swear. Or a drill instructor. I still can’t get over how tough she was about Lance.”
“She’s the house lioness,” Bard grinned, looping an arm around Bain’s shoulders to hug him close. “And you’re the house bottomless pit. Did you fill up enough to get through the night?”

“A bowl of ice cream would fill up the last few crannies, Da,” he wheedled.

“So would a bowl of cereal. Get one if you need it.”

“Ugh, that nut and twig stuff that Sig likes,” Bain grimaced. “I’m good.”

“Okay. You can read if you want, but don’t stay up past eleven. It’s still a school day tomorrow.”

“Yeah, and I’ll get that rotten English test out of the way,” exhaled Bain. “Night, Da. Night, Thran.”

“Night, Bain,” both men chorused, as Bain slipped into his room.

“Shower?” Bard gave Thran a sideways look.

“Bliss,” Thran sighed. “You start. I will say goodnight to Sigrid and Tilda, then be in.”

“Righto.”

Tilda was already asleep, and Sigrid was immersed in her computer screen, so Thran was quick to follow Bard into their bathroom. Bard had just given a quick scrub of baking soda over the tub so it’d be ready for whoever used it next, so they got into the shower together. Despite the pleasure of his husband’s water-slicked body so close to his, Thran didn’t linger long in the shower cabinet. They exchanged a few caresses, but as Bard seemed as interested in getting out and drying off as Thran did, they were soon back in the bedroom.

“Bed, or sitting room?” Bard asked, as he contemplated his sleep pants.

“Either is welcome. Wherever you feel most inclined to tell me about this geisha.”

Bard’s lips curved up slyly. “Hmm. Depends on how... rousing a conversation you want.”

“If it becomes that kind of conversation, then the location will not matter.”

“Been that kind of day, has it? Better the bed, then. Less to clean up.”

Chuckling, Thran padded to his side of the bed and drew down the sheets and blankets. “You are a practical man, my saint.”

“And you’re a curious one. What do you want to know?”

Thran waited until they had settled side by side, with Thran’s head resting on Bard’s shoulder and his arm draped across Bard’s chest. As the dark settled around them, he sighed.

“Such a way to end the day,” he murmured, rubbing his hand over the dark hair on Bard’s chest, savoring the tickle against his palm. “So much better than endless meetings.”

“It’s still two people talking,” Bard chuckled as he twined his fingers in Thran’s hair.

“With fringe benefits. Soft sheets, warm blankets, hunky welder. No meeting can compare.”

Bard pressed a kiss on Thran’s hair. “I hope not.”

“Of course not. So... these geishas. What about them appeals to you?”
Bard sighed. “They’re exotic. So elaborate, like mysteries. So refined. So beautiful. I know they’re Japanese, and our solarium is more Moroccan or Indian or tropical, so I’m mixing up different cultures, but for some reason, I just thought of them. I thought it’d be fun to pretend we were in an exotic fairytale.”

“As you said, the geishas are not courtesans. So do you seek one who stays true to her calling and offers you a chaste meeting, or do you seek a tryst with an exotic partner in an exotic setting?”

“Mmm,” Bard hummed, tracing figures over Thran’s flank, his glute, his ribs. “The second. Definitely the second.”

“Are you enamored of only the geishas, or would you consider an exotic from a different culture?”

“Hmm. Do you have one in mind?”

“You seek mysterious, exotic, seductive, yes?”

“Oh, yes.”

“What of the Indian subcontinent? Saris, beautiful jewelry, henna, heady perfumes... and so many forms of seductive dance.”

Bard’s hand paused in its light tracing over Thran’s skin and tightened on his glute, drawing Thran’s secret smile.

“Ah. Something of interest, then.”

“A tryst with a mysterious dancer? Hell, yes, angel.”

“Good. I like this, too. I have already worn a kimono in our games, but not yet a sari. I like that.”

“Why am I not surprised?”

“Because you are as eager for new things with me as I am with you. So I have one more thing to ask you.”

“Anything.”

“The geishas... in the modern world, there are no male geishas.”

“That’s right,” Bard said easily, then paused. “Um... what’re you getting at?”

“You are bisexual; the female as well as the male appeals to you. I want to know if you ask your exotic to offer... feminine aspects.”

Bard tightened, but Thran leaned up to press a kiss at the base of Bard’s jaw. “Stop. It does not bother me if that is what you ask for, whether consciously or not. I take no slight from it. In fact, I find it intriguing to think that I might learn to seduce my husband even more completely than I do now.”

“I... hadn’t thought about that, but... there might be something to what you say.”

“Something, as in yes, you are still attracted to the female, which is nothing new and concerns me not in the least, or yes, an exotic with female as well as male aspects sounds exciting?”

“You’re not bi.”
“So? If you think your gay husband cannot tempt you with more than masculine allure, you do me a disservice. I would enjoy it, but only if it appeals to you, too.”

Bard lay quietly beside him, considering. Thran shut his eyes and stroked softly, thinking of richly embroidered saris, beautiful jewelry, seductive, smoky eyes, rouged hands and feet. So many possibilities for pleasure, so many ways to tease Bard out of his quiet control and into unrestrained passion...

His hum was more purr than anything else.

He found himself on his back, his no longer quiet and controlled husband on top, stroking soft kisses over his throat. Hands ran over Thran’s ribs, down his abs, then back up again. As hips rubbed against his, fingers caught his nipples to roll and pull.

“You’re such a fucking bastard,” Bard breathed, as Thran groped to open his nightside table drawer for a tube of lubricant.

“Always,” Thran grinned as he set about teasing Bard further away from his quiet and control.

He had his answer – a most delicious one.
Chapter 115

Chapter Summary

The saint receives a double reminder of his appeal, but remains focused on the things most important to him.

Chapter Notes

I don’t have any association with the wonderful tribal fusion dancer, Rachel Brice, or with YouTube. I do, however, enjoy Rachel’s wonderful dancing as viewed on YouTube :-).

Bard woke up with a smile, courtesy of his husband’s thorough ministrations last night. He hadn’t enjoyed going to bed early so much in a long time, not that he’d gotten to sleep for at least an hour after he’d crawled under the sheets. Thran and his seductive words about trysts with mysterious Indian dancers had made mere sleeping no part of his thoughts. But more than Thran’s allusions to the exotic rendezvous they planned had kept him awake. There also had been his unexpected offer to pique Bard’s... dual nature, for want of a better term.

He’d never thought of Thran as feminine, but as soon as Thran had mentioned saris, he’d imagined his tall, pale dancer in a blue one and ornate silver jewelry, his beautiful hair loose over his shoulders, hips undulating slowly, fingers beckoning to him with arcane gestures. How compelling would Thran be when he veiled his powerful dancing in seductive draperies, provocative glances, and sinuous gestures? It would be tribal belly dancing at its most erotic, that’s what it’d be.

Thank the gods that the lights had been off last night, or Thran would have realized just how interested Bard was in Thran’s gender bending – or combining – offer.

_Whether the lights were on or off made no difference, fool. You nailed him to the bed like you hadn’t gotten any in a month, and all he did was egg you on, trilling like a damned cheetah over a meal. He owns you body and soul._

Bard’s smile turned sheepish.

His husband was a fucking bastard. Such a fucking bastard, and Bard loved him for it.

It was just a couple of minutes before six, when the alarm would go off. He switched it off, and got up – or tried to. A long arm wound around his ribs and nestled him against a pale, muscled chest, and a nose nuzzled into the angle between his shoulder and neck. A kiss pressed against his back, a soft, lazy voice hummed softly in his ear, and a hand stroked the hair on his chest.

“Mine,” came a throaty whisper.

Damn. The fucking bastard had read his thoughts.
Bard snared the hand tickling his chest and raised it to his lips to kiss. “It’s six, angel. Time to get the children ready for school.”

With a discontented growl, an insistent dancer snuggled closer.

“It’s okay if you want to stay in bed. I’ll see to the children.”

“Mine.”

“I am. Owned like a slave. So let your property go so he can see to the children, your majesty.”

That roused a snicker. “I like it better when you call me a fucking bastard.”

“What’s gotten into you this morning? I still have to see to the children, no matter what I call you.”

Another snicker. “You were into me last night, up to the root. It was delicious. Do not fault me because I still savor it.”

“Never. Savor it all you want while I put on the porridge.”

A long-suffering sigh. “You are a devoted father. I hope our children appreciate how well you see to them.”

“They do. So don’t make me disappoint them. Let me go so I can make the porridge.”

Long arms unwound from around him. Rolling over, Bard buried his nose in the hollow at the base of Thran’s throat and stroked fingers down his ribs, flank, and hip. He caught a bit of the skin over Thran’s collarbone between his teeth, let it go, and rolled back over to get out of bed. He carried his sleep pants and tee into the bathroom with him, tended to necessities, and came out to find Thran still lounging sleepily in bed. He looked like the reclining cheetah Bard had called him, or the languid ruler after a night of pleasure – tousled hair, drowsy eyes, and a sensuous hand draped over the edge of the mattress. Gods, imagine how decadent he’d look on that Indonesian bed frame that languished in the upstairs garret room. Now that the house was almost done, fixing that bed frame would be a good weekend project.

Bard grinned. In this house, there was always something to do on the weekend.

He gave a gentle tug to a lock of Thran’s hair, getting a rumbling murmur in response, then headed downstairs. On went the teakettle and the porridge. Out came the raisins, the cinnamon, and the milk for the table, then the bowls and spoons to stand ready by the stove. Wax paper sheets for the sandwiches, bread on top, then lettuce, cheese, meat, and mustard, or peanut butter and jam. Fruit, cookies – he needed to make more today – water bottles. Everything into the lunch bags lined up on the kitchen island – only three, as Legs would be at home today. He hoped the long sleep had refreshed Tilda, and she wasn’t suffering from the same thing that plagued Legolas.

The kettle was hot, so he made himself a cup of lemon ginger tea, dished a bowl of porridge, and sat at the table to eat his breakfast.

Bain was down first. He was his usual self, clattering through the kitchen to fill his porridge bowl and teacup. He plunked down beside Bard already shoveling his mouth full, offering a wave of greeting. Bard saluted him with his teacup and a grin, then eyed Tilda as she came in from the hall. She looked quieter than usual, but not sick. Tilda was a trouper, though, and so Bard called to her as she came in.

“Morning, little doll. How’re you this morning?”
“Sleepy,” she yawned. She stood on tiptoe to reach the porridge pot on the back stove burner, filled her bowl, and came to the table. “Is there any apple?”

“We have apple. Half? And tea?”

“Yes, please.”

Bard got up to retrieve an apple from the fruit bin in the fridge, cut half of it into pieces, and brought the cutting board and Tilda’s tea to the table. “Here you are, Til. How do you feel?”

“I’m okay,” she sighed, putting the apple pieces in her bowl and sprinkling cinnamon on them. “Just sleepy.”

“Sleepy, or tired?”

She thought about it, then reluctantly admitted, “Tired.”

“If you want to come home on the early bus, I’ll write you a note to excuse you from sport.”

She thought about it some more. “Okay.”

Tilda’s willingness to come home early wasn’t lost on Bard. Maybe she felt more or less okay this morning, but by afternoon, maybe she wouldn’t. Bard found a sheet of notebook paper and a pen, wrote the note for Tilda, and tucked it into her backpack.

“If you feel okay in the afternoon, you can stay and come home with Sigrid and Bain on the late bus,” Bard said. “If you don’t, take the early bus and come home. I’ll be here either way.”

“Okay,” Tilda nodded, and concentrated on her porridge.

“Sigrid’s late this morning,” Bard observed, as Thran came into the kitchen. He had on his tights, dancing slippers, top, and various wraps. “Morning, angel. Did you hear whether Sigrid is up?”

“She is in the bathroom and will be down soon,” Thran confirmed, pouring himself a big mug of tea. “Legolas was awake, but I told him he could go back to sleep if he wanted, so he decided he would.”

“Does he feel any better?”

“A little. Many coughs and sniffles, so the cold progresses. The good news is that he has no fever.”

“Good,” Bard nodded. “Just the snorts and snuffles to get through.”

“I hope so. Do you need me to take the children to the bus stop today?”

“I’ve got it,” Bard said easily. “Take yourself off to the ballroom, angel.”

Thran bent down to kiss Bard’s cheek. “Thank you, lyubov moya. Have a good day at school, children.”

“Bye, Thran,” Bain and Tilda chorused, as Thran took his tea down the hall. He barely missed running into Sigrid who hurried towards the kitchen.

“Oh, I am sorry!” Thran exclaimed, barely getting his teacup out of the way. “I did not splash you, did I?”
“I’m sorry, Ada,” Sigrid said hastily. “It’s okay, nothing got on me.”

“All right, good. Have a good day at school, lioness. I am off to the barre.”

“Bye, Ada.” Sigrid hurried into the kitchen. She grabbed a bowl to dish some porridge and carried it to the table. “Morning.”

“Morning, sweetness. Everything all right?”

Sigrid nodded quickly. “Just running late. I stayed up late to work on my paper, so it was hard to get up this morning.”

She shoveled down her porridge, more like Bain rather than her usual decorous self. Bard gave her a close look, but kept quiet. Her brother, however, was not so silent.

“Bet you were talking to Finn.”

“No, I wasn’t,” Sigrid said sharply. “He had a government test, and I had the paper, so we talked all of three minutes at about eight o’clock, and not a second after that. Not that it’s any of your business.”

“Ooh, touchy, touchy,” Bain jibed, rolling his eyes and holding up his hands. “What, did you and the hockey player have words?”

“Shut up!” Sigrid snapped.

“Why?” Bain needled.

Sigrid’s eyes flashed, and she looked to Bard. “Da, tell him to shut up!”

“Da, tell her to stop yelling at me!”

“Both of you,” Bard said mildly. “Bain, leave your sister alone. Put your dishes in the dishwasher, and go brush your teeth. Sigrid, a milder tone for your brother, please.”

“Yes, Da,” two voices murmured. Bain got up from the table with an exaggerated flounce, but subsided when Bard’s gaze sharpened on him. Sigrid looked unhappy, but kept her eyes on her food. When Bain had gone upstairs, Bard leaned forward.

“Everything okay, sweetness?”

Sigrid swallowed. “I’m fine, Da. Everything’s fine. I just stayed up too late because of my paper, and I’m tired.”

That made two tired children who’d soon head off to school.

“Okay. If you want to come home on the early bus, I’ll write you a note.”

“I’ve got one,” Tilda piped up.

“No, I’ll be fine. If I’m not, I can bring an excuse note tomorrow.”

“It you decide to come home, text Bain so he’ll know not to look for you on the late bus.”

“I will,” Sigrid glared at her bowl. “Even if he is a brat.”
“Enough,” Bard growled. “Whether he’s a brat or not, you don’t have the right to make him worry about you, and he would.”

Sigrid looked like the last spoonful of her porridge had gotten stuck halfway down her throat. She forced it down with a wince. “I’m sorry, Da. You’re right.”

“Apology accepted. Finish your breakfast, sweetness. You, too, little doll. The bus will be here in a few minutes.”

“Yes, Da,” the girls chorused. Tilda finished first, put her dishes in the dishwasher, and went upstairs to brush her teeth. Sigrid was just a few moments behind her, leaving Bard to rinse his bowl and put it in the dishwasher. He ducked into the ballroom to let Thran know they were about to go to the bus stop, then he shepherded the three children down the lane. Just before they boarded the bus, he reminded Sigrid and Bain to get Legolas’s assignments for him.

When the bus headed for school, he trotted back home. Thran was still in the early stages of his barre, and looked up at Bard’s entrance.

“Neither of the girls are themselves this morning, so I expect one or both of them back on the early bus, if not before,” Bard said. “I don’t want to leave Legs home by himself when he’s sick, so I’ll dash out to the market while you’re still here. I want to stock up on juice and soup stuff, and I have a couple of things to get at the homeowners’ mecca.”

“Good idea,” Thran nodded. “Poor girls. Sigrid seemed very disordered this morning.”

“She and Bain snarked at each other at breakfast, so she’s definitely out of sorts. Come to think about it, she was scarce last night. Bain said something about her and Finn having a disagreement, but I don’t put much stock in that. Anyway, I’ll head out, and be back as soon as I can so you can get to the studio.”

“I will take care of my dance first, in the proper time,” Thran assured him. “And I will see to Legolas if he wakes up. Take the time you need.”

“Okay. Back soon.”

Thran made an elegant turn and drifted to Bard’s side with a pair of dance steps, arched into an arabesque, and dipped close enough for a kiss. “Adieu, my saint.”

Bard kissed his husband back, then smiling, headed for the solarium. He hefted the lion’s head fountain into his arms. In the mudroom, he stacked cloth grocery sacks atop the fountain, snared his keys, and let himself out. Once the fountain and bags were safely arranged in the front passenger seat of his truck, he headed down the lane to the homeowners’ mecca. Into a cart went the fountain, and he wheeled it inside. At this hour, the only other customers roaming the aisles were contractors, so he quickly found the concrete adhesive and rubber tubing he needed. Then it was on to the paint aisle. That took him past the discounted, discontinued, and seconds section, so he scanned the offerings out of long habit. Yes, there were the usual cans of returned paint, the incorrectly cut window blinds, the returned appliances and wheeled carts and closet shelving, and a huge bucket full to overflowing with rolls of discontinued or returned wallpaper. No, there was nothing he could use. Onward to the paint aisle.

Bard pulled his cart up to the display rack of paint sample cards. He wanted a grey that matched the color of the fountain as closely as possible. When a clerk saw what he was doing, she came over.

“Hi there. Are you looking for a contrast color, or an exact match?”
“Oh... hi, yes, I want an exact match, if I can find it.”

“I can help you with that. We’ve got this amazing color-matching wizard thingie that lets me analyze a sample and calculate the pigment needed to match it exactly.”

The young woman smiling at him had lots of freckles, bright jade green eyes, and a nametag that read Janice. Her long, straight, carrot-orange hair clashed terribly with the red store tee shirt she wore, but it didn’t dim her sunny demeanor – in fact, she made the tee shirt look bad, rather than the other way around.

“Really? That sounds amazing. But...” Bard pointed to the fountain in his cart, “that’s the sample.”

“You’re a big strapping guy, right? If you can hold your spouty lion for the camera, I can make you paint to match.”

“Fair enough,” Bard nodded. “Where’s the, um, amazing color-matching wizard thingie?”

She chuckled. “Behind the counter. Just so you know, there’s secret paint info back there, so if you see any of it, you have to promise not to tell anyone.”

Holding up three fingers, Bard solemnly intoned, “Scout’s honor.”

“All right, you’re in. Let me show you the thingie first before you haul over the spouty lion.”

The woman led Bard behind the counter and explained where the camera lens was and how the device worked. Bard hefted the fountain and held it patiently while the woman made sure it was properly lit for the camera. She tapped on the keyboard to start the analysis, and in a few seconds, a big square of grey appeared on the computer screen.

“Hmm,” she said typing rapidly. “Let me calibrate the monitor to make sure it displays the color properly... yeah, thought so. It’d gone kinda too red. That’s better. Can you hold up your spouty lion near the screen?”

Bard shifted it carefully, angling his head to see the color on the screen next to the fountain.

“That looks pretty good, yeah?” she asked.

He nodded. “It does indeed.”

“Great! You can put it down now. How much paint do you need?”

“Just enough for part of a wall, so a quart.”

She looked thoughtful. “Mind if I make a suggestion?”

“Not at all. Go ahead.”

“If you want your wall to look like stone to match your fountain, get two quarts, a sample pot of black, and a sample pot of white. For the first coat, paint the wall the solid grey. For the second coat, mix some kinda lighter and some more kinda darker, so you have three colors. Then sponge the three over the first coat, kinda mottled. That’ll get you a more stony look.”

“I like that,” Bard nodded, putting the fountain carefully into his cart. He fished out his wallet to retrieve the samples of lime green paint and blue velvet, and pulled out his phone to find the picture he’d taken of the screens in place. He described the solarium with the screens and the archway, and how the fountain would hang under the archway.
“That looks and sounds amazing!” the young woman enthused, bending to see the picture on Bard’s phone more clearly. “You’re doing it all yourself? Wow, so talented! Yeah, the mottling will be a cinch for you, and it’ll make your wall look great. It won’t be boring, but it won’t compete with your beautiful screens, either.” She pointed to a rack holding brushes and sponges, and led him over. She chose a rough natural sponge and held it out to him. “You want a kinda rough textured sponge to give you good mottles. Does your fountain have a base?”

Taking the sponge, Bard gave it an experimental squeeze as he described the half circle basin that would rest below the fountain to catch the water.

“Oh, that’ll be cool. They make some really small water lilies now – one would look great in the basin, if it’s deep enough. And you could add a little green mottling to the wall, like moss is growing on it, just near the basin. That’d give you some subtle atmosphere.”

“That’s a good idea. I’ve got some of the green left, and I can mix it with the black until I get the right shade. So yes, I’ll take two quarts of the grey. I’ve got plenty of white at home, so I need just the sample pot of black.”

“Coming right up,” the woman smiled, and she bustled to mix Bard’s paint. She recommended he use a bathroom base paint that would resist moisture, so soon he added the sponge, two quarts of grey paint, and small pot of black to his cart.

“Thanks very much for the help,” he nodded as he headed for the checkout line.

“It’ll look awesome!” she grinned. “Would you take a picture when you’re done? I’d love to see it the next time you come in.”

“Will do,” Bard agreed. “I’m in here so often that people are starting to think I work here.”

“Oh, that’d be no bad thing,” she winked. “Take care, and hope it all goes well!”

“Thanks. I appreciate the help.”

Bard headed for the checkout. He was halfway back to the truck before he realized that Janice had been flirting with him, big time. For the second time today, his grin was sheepish.

Next, the market. Despite his lengthy sojourn at the homeowners’ mecca, the market was still far from crowded, and he quickly picked up a bag of onions, a big piece of fresh ginger, and two bunches of scallions for soup. More flour, because he expected to bake cookies sometime today or tomorrow. Aluminum foil, more almond milk, more cows’ milk, more eggs, and a package of chicken breasts. Four cans of frozen orange juice concentrate, two bottles of cranberry grape juice. He got everything into the truck, and headed home.

Than stood at the sink in the kitchen when Bard came through laden with the bags from the market.

“The soup ingredients arrive,” Thran greeted as he rinsed his hands. “Are there more bags? I will help you carry them.”

“This is all the food,” Bard replied, as they unloaded the bags. “I’ve got the homeowners’ mecca stuff still in the truck, but that’ll wait until we get the stuff in the fridge. How’s Legs?”

“Still asleep.” Thran handed Bard the veg, juice, and chicken to stow in the fridge, then the orange juice concentrate for the freezer. “I had the rest of the porridge and two of the hard boiled eggs. Do you want tea? I will refill the kettle.”
“Tea’s always good. Thanks. I’ll get the rest of the stuff.”

“Do you need help?”

“You’d save me a trip, so yes, help would be great.”

Thran put the kettle on the stove and padded after Bard. He slipped on his trainers by the door and came outside to take the cans of paint and bag of other supplies that Bard handed him. When Bard got the fountain into his arms to bring inside, the dancer’s eyebrows rose in curiosity.

“Oh, did you need to replace a part to the fountain?”

“I did, but the main reason I carted the fountain with me was so I could match paint to it.”

“Oh,” Thran nodded. “So that the fountain will look as if it belongs on the wall.”

“Exactly.”

Thran’s grin was pleased. “See? I learn. So you will paint the wall today?”

“I will.” Bard thought about the clerk who’d flirted with him and smothered the same sheepish grin that had plagued him all morning. It did no good, of course; Thran’s eyes narrowed in speculation as they came into the house. Bard carried the fountain into the solarium, and had just set it gently on the floor out of the way when Thran padded in barefoot after him.

“You blush,” his husband said, setting down the bag and cans of paint. He cocked his head at Bard with an amused expression on his face. “Why is that, lyubov moya?”

“Um, the clerk in the paint aisle... flirted with me.”

“Oh,” Thran nodded sagely, his smile widening. “You blush more. Tell me about this clerk.”

“She had this amazing red hair and freckles, and beautiful green eyes, just lovely,” Bard teased. “She told me how use this,” he pulled out the sea sponge and pointed to the pot of black paint and paint cans, “and those to make the wall look like stone to match the fountain. And then she quite obligingly mixed me a custom color that exactly matches the fountain. She even invited me into her inner sanctum behind the paint counter. All delicious. What? Stop smirking at me.”

Thran’s grin widened even more. “I do not smirk. I merely enjoy my husband’s embroidered story of adventure. Did you flirt back?”

Bard’s snort was self-deprecating as he dropped his teasing. “Oh, you have to kill my fantasy, don’t you? Don’t laugh, but I was halfway through the parking lot before I realized that she’d been flirting. So I missed my chance to flirt back.”

Thran laughed. “Oh, my innocent saint. You are adorable.”

“She asked me to take a picture to show her how the wall turns out, so maybe I’ll have my chance next time.”

“Perhaps I should go with you. I will linger in the background to see how she flirts with you, and how you flirt back. It will be research for my role in our game to christen this room.”

“Oh, I’ve got something better for you to research,” Bard grinned.

“Do you?” Thran gave him a look of anticipation. “I cannot wait to hear it.”
“Tribal fusion belly dance. Look up Rachel Brice. Her costuming is amazing, but made me think of her last night was the control she shows when she dances. You’ve got such amazing control when you dance, too, so I’m sure you’ll appreciate her. You’ll like her attitude, too.”

“Ooh, I look forward to see her. She is on YouTube?”

“Lots. She’s amazing.”

“How is it you are familiar with her?”

“Daphne, of course. She was into a lot of exotic stuff. Astrology, the Tarot, belly dancing, metaphysics – and quantum mechanics, believe it or not. Very interested in the mystical side of life. I can’t explain the quantum mechanics part to you, so you and I will just have to trust her when she insisted it correlated with some other mystical stuff.”

“I take her word for it,” Thran waved a hand. “And she knew of this Rachel Brice?”

“Absolutely. Tribal fusion style isn’t for everyone, but I understand why she liked it. I liked it, too. Powerful stuff.” Bard quirked his mouth at his husband. “Ought to be right up your alley, angel.”

Thran mirrored Bard’s expression back at him. “Perhaps so. I will research as you suggest. Now we must come up with your part of this game.”

“I asked for the mystical geisha, who’s become the mystical dancer. So you have to come up with my part.”

“Perhaps the mystical dancer wants to thank the handsome and talented artist who has crafted such a beautiful sanctuary.”

“Perhaps the artist has crafted the beautiful sanctuary for the beautiful dancer.”

Thran drew Bard to him, rubbing his hips gently against Bard’s. “Perhaps the dancer has not appeared during the construction, and the two meet by accident on the day the sanctuary is finished.”

Bard filled his hands with Thran’s glutes. His husband still had on his dancewear, so only thin, stretchy tights covered the firm muscles that filled Bard’s hands. When he stroked slowly, those firm muscles flexed, and Thran hummed softly. “Perhaps the artist has caught a few glimpses of the enigmatic dancer, and lingers on that last day in hopes that they will meet.”

“Perhaps the dancer has watched the devoted artist, and comes early on that last day, in hopes that they will meet,” Thran murmured.

“Mmm,” Bard hummed. “We have a plan.”

“A delicious one.”

“Very. Not that this isn’t delicious, too.”

Thran sighed as he stroked Bard’s hair out of his eyes. “You tempt me so, my saint. But I have ignored three calls from UVB already, and I cannot linger here much longer, no matter how much I want to.”

“It’s all right.” Bard’s hands stroked up Thran’s back. “Better I keep you a little hungry while I’m still working on the solarium. Sating you now might dull your enthusiasm for the christening.”

Thran’s eyes narrowed. “Such challenges are dangerous, lyubov moya. If you indulge in too much silly talk about certain kinds of hunger, you will find yourself stripped naked on our new marble floor, where I will give you another reason to call me a fucking bastard.”

“Promises, promises,” Bard grinned. He squeezed Thran’s glutes once before he urged his husband away from him. “Off you go, and I’ll get on with the paint. It’ll dry while I make another pot of soup.”

“I will look in on Legolas before I change,” Thran said, as he backed out of the solarium.

Bard waved assent as Thran slipped away. Bard already had on his work clothes and boots, so he unfolded his paint cloth and moved the ladder nearby, then retrieved his paintbrush and roller from the mudroom. Before he started to paint, however, he carefully affixed painter’s tape on the edge of the doorway. The wood was old, and if Bard inadvertently brushed any paint on it, it’d likely soak it up before Bard could wipe it away, so he preferred to take the time to protect it. That took only a few minutes, so he was up on the ladder to paint the top of the wall by the time Thran came back into the room.

“Legolas is still asleep, Bard,” Thran informed him. He had on comfortable pants and shirt, and he had his dance bag over his shoulder. “I will see you this evening. I hope all the children will be well when they get home tonight.”

“Oh, wait,” Bard climbed down from the ladder. “You need a lunch.”

“Tcha, so I do,” Thran realized with chagrin. “No, lyubov moya, keep on with your paint. I can make myself a lunch.”

“Promise me you’ll make yourself a good one,” Bard put his arms akimbo.

Thran held up his hand as if he took an oath. “I will try to live up to the high standards of a Bard Bowman lunch.”

“See that you do,” Bard snickered, climbing back on his ladder. “I’ll be in to inspect in five minutes.”

Thran stuck his tongue out at Bard. “Suka blyad. Idi k chertu.”

“You’re welcome,” Bard snarked, and resumed his painting.

Thran rattled through the kitchen, eventually appearing with his bento boxes. “I have chicken, several kinds of vegetables, brown rice, and grapes. And cookies.”

“Cookies? Oh, my – you’re living large, angel.”

“I am sorry to say that your shortbread has cast a spell upon me.”

“It does that.”

“So now I am off, and I leave, too.”

Bard leaned down to return Thran’s kiss. “Hope all goes well today, angel. Do your best, just like always, and remember that your best means you dance.”

“I hear and obey,” Thran nodded. His lips widened in a perverse smile. “The UVB company will hear and obey, too.”

“Good. See you tonight, cariad.”
Thran gave him a smile and a wave as he left, and Bard was alone in the solarium.

He turned back to his painting, and the plain white wall soon wore its first coat of grey. After Bard left his brush and roller to soak in the mudroom, he busied himself in the kitchen to make the day’s soup and cookies. While the chicken simmered in its pot, Bard chopped veg, then started on the cookies. He didn’t have time for fancy sweets today, so he made brownies and a quick applesauce raisin sheet cake. Brownies out of the oven, veg into the pot, cake out of the oven. Ginger, scallions, and a few herbs went into the pot, and there came Legolas down the hall, rubbing his eyes.

“Morning, Legolas,” Bard greeted. “How’re you and your cold today?”

“I think I’m winning,” the boy smiled sleepily, “because I feel better, and the cold doesn’t.”

“Excellent. What would you like for breakfast? Porridge? Eggs?”

“Fried eggs?” Legolas graved. His voice was raspy, but he seemed in good spirits. “Mmm, brownies – and is that raisin cake?”

“It is. You must be on the mend, if you can smell the cake. How many eggs?”

“Three, please. I can smell a little, thank goodness. Mostly soup. I’m tired of being so clogged!”

“Kettle’s hot. Make yourself a cup of tea.”

“I liked that lemon ginger. Where is that?”

“Pantry with the rest of the tea. Are you good to eat at the table, or do you want a tray in the sitting room?”

“I’m okay for the table.”

“Okay, eggs’ll be up soon.”

Legolas rummaged for his tea, and Bard put his eggs in front of him with salt, pepper, and toast. He wolfed them down, making Bard smile. While Bard finished the soup, Legolas cleaned up his dishes, brushed his teeth, and brought his blanket, pillows, and book down to settle in the setting room. While Legolas read, Bard worked on sketches for his three commissions, rang the fourth one to leave a message that he was available to talk about what the client wanted, and checked on the soup. Legolas fell asleep and slept until lunchtime, then wolfed down two bowls of soup and several slices of bread, then a brownie and more tea. By then, the solarium wall had dried, so Bard could hold the fountain up to the wall to see how it’d look. Yes, the paint was an excellent match, if flatter than the textured fountain. He mixed a few small cups of darker and lighter paint to sponge on the wall until he got the feel of the sponging. Once he figured out how heavily to cover the wall to his satisfaction, he mixed up enough of the darker and lighter for the whole wall, and had at.

“That looks great,” Legolas came in to perch on the fainting couch. “The color’s perfect, and the splotches match the fountain almost exactly.”

“It’s about as close as I can make it,” Bard agreed, stepping back to eye the wall. “Just that lower left corner to do.”

As Legolas watched, Bard sponged the last portion of the wall. “There. Does it look even?”
The boy nodded. “I think so. How long does it take to dry?”

“Thirty minutes to the touch, solidly in a couple of hours. I won’t put up the fountain until tomorrow, to make sure it’s completely dry.”

Legolas looked around. “This will be so amazing in the winter. No matter how cold and icy it gets outside, it’ll still be tropical in here.”

“Exactly. It’ll be great all year round, but we’ll really appreciate it in February when it’s the nastiest weather of the year. It won’t be so bad being snowed in when we have this to remind us of summer.”

Legolas gave him an impish grin. “It’s never bad to be snowed in, no matter where you are.”

“As long as there’s food in the fridge and wood for the fireplace, I agree with you.”

“That’s true,” Legolas conceded.

Before their conversation could continue, the mudroom door opened. As Legolas craned his neck to look into the sitting room, Bard pulled out his mobile – yes, this was the time that the early bus dropped off children.

How many of the Clan Ffyrnig children had it dropped off?

Bard and Legolas looked towards the sitting room to find out.
Chapter 116

Chapter Summary

Two members of Clan Ffyrnig throw tantrums. While one is calculated, the other is full of disappointment only a saint can ease.

Chapter Notes

I don't own any rights to the film "White Christmas." I do, however, have a long-standing ritual to watch it every holiday season with friends and a million plates of tacos!

“I am fine,” Thran replied to Ori’s anxious inquiry, made right in the parking lot of the UltraViolet studio. The young man had stationed himself by the front windows of the lobby, watching for him, and had dashed outside as soon as Thran got out of his SUV.

“You’re sure nothing’s wrong? You’re so late this morning –”

“I am NOT late,” Thran cut Ori off. When the young man winced at the sharp tone, regret surged through Thran. He should not bark at the young man for being worried – he’d probably borne the displeasure of at least one person this morning because he had not been able to produce Thran on command. Likely Irmo, who despite improvements in his attitude was still subject to snappish behavior when something didn’t agree with him. Poor Ori! Thran would be three times as harried as he was now if Ori weren’t beside him to keep so many details organized and on track. He was indispensible for more than his organizational skills, too – some days, he was the only one who kept a calm head amid so many agitated people.

“I am sorry, Ori. I do not mean to snap. I assure you, I am not late,” Thran said in a softer, more reassuring voice, gratified when Ori’s expression eased. “I am not sick, or distressed, or anything else. I wanted only to save my career as a dancer. I stayed home to do my barre and yoga, because it has been impossible for me to do them here.”

Ori’s face eased a little more. “Oh, good, Thran. That was smart. I was worried that something had happened. You said your son was sick.”

“He improves, though perhaps the other children will not before long. But they are in good hands, as you know. Better that you save your worry for what will happen if I do not dance more than I have lately. All this stir to put on our ballet will be for naught if I am not strong or practiced enough to dance it.”

Ori winced again. “It’s been a very hectic few days, indeed.”

“How are the finances? Do they improve at all?”

Ori’s hum was neutral. “What’s that quote from White Christmas? ‘Right between ouch and boing?"

Thran and Ori traded pained glances.

“Difficult, then, but not impossible,” Thran shrugged, hefting his dance bag. “We will manage.”

“Nori sent along a little something,” Ori said.

“Did he?” Thran paused, giving Ori a surprised look. “That was kind of him, but you know that I do not sell shares in the ballet profits. Please, send his money back with the most abject of apologies.”

“If you would sell shares, we’d have more money than we’d know what to with,” Ori said.

“Probably so. But you know I reserve the shares for those of us who make the effort, who take the risks. We cannot afford to allow others to demand changes, or certain dancers in certain roles, or a thousand other things. UVB cannot make its future if we serve up only the whims of investors. It would be a mishmash.”

“I agree with you, Thran,” Ori nodded simply. “But we won’t have to send Nori’s money back, because he didn’t ask for a share of the profits. That shocked me, to be honest. He never invests in anything that he doesn’t think will pay off exponentially in time. On the rare occasion that he does, he always insists on a hefty percentage of the profits. But this came gratis. I nearly fell over in a faint when he handed me the envelope. Cash, of course. He said he wanted to express appreciation that you inquired after him, and stood by him during the gang business. He appreciated Bard’s offer to let me stay with you for a while, too. He says you’re both good folk. He doesn’t say that about many people.”

Thran regarded Ori with surprise. “I have no words. That is very kind and generous of your brother. I will write him a note.”

It didn’t escape Ori that very few people chose to give anything to his enigmatic brother in writing, and he offered an appreciative smile. “That would mean a lot to him.”

“I will bring it tomorrow, if you would be so kind as to convey it.”

“Of course.”

“So what awaits me inside? Clearly someone has given you reason to rush out to greet me this morning.”

“Oh, the usual stir-that-is-Irmo is front and center. Actually, he’s upset about the same thing you are – no dance time with a certain principal dancer. So you might be able to use that as leverage against the rest of the clamor – liability insurance for the school, how much to charge for tickets, the license fees for one of the pieces of music went up while another went down, and so forth and so on.”

Thran sighed. “I had hoped that by now more would have settled. What can we do about it? Bard suggested I throw a tantrum, but that may not be the wisest idea.”

Ori snickered. “I think it’s a great idea. If you want a suggestion as to what to throw a tantrum about, I’ve got a good one.”

Thran gave his slight right-hand-man a perverse smile. “I await the wisdom of the oracle.”

“It’s right out of Management 101. The classic game goes like this – someone confronts you with a problem they want you to solve for them. You look at them and say, ‘I don’t pay you to bring me problems! I pay you to bring me solutions! Where are your solutions? Are you saying you can’t do the job?” And then they must go away to solve the problem themselves.”

“So how to you propose I adapt this to our situation?”

“Well... what’s the one thing that only you can do? Only you can dance Death, Lord of the Underworld, in Immortal; other people can do everything else. But what’s the one thing you can’t do right now? Dance Death, Lord of the Underworld. So wait until six or seven people clamor at you –”

“That will take less than two minutes after I walk in,” Thran grinned.

Ori grinned, too. “If that, then throw your tantrum. Say you thought they were the experts in their areas, but here they are asking you to make their decisions. Was your impression of their expertise misplaced? If you must do their jobs, then you can’t do yours, and if you can’t dance Death, Lord of the Underworld, then all of this is for naught. That ought to make most of them blanch.

“You can’t stop there, though. Before any of them rally, announce that you will be in the studio working on your part – the dance. At two o’clock, you will chair a meeting to think about how to solve this or that problem, so you expect them to come with suggestions. Then leave – don’t look back – and go into the studio with Irmo and the company, and dance.”

Thran eyed Ori thoughtfully. The young man’s words had been sober, and he didn’t smile. So this was no prank he suggested Thran play on their colleagues. “This is delegation, yes?”

Ori nodded. “You can’t do everything, and it would be better if we can push decisions down to the people who ought to make them. You’re a wonderful dancer, but you don’t need to decide where the set crew gets the lumber for the set design. You set guidelines about reasonable costs and being able to justify the costs that we accrue, but you don’t need to pick one lumber firm over another. Círdan can do that.”

“And better than I can,” Thran agreed.

“For what it’s worth, I suggest that you hold daily summary meetings to go over the decisions that everyone has made, perhaps late in the day so you have the mornings to dance, and everyone else can run around and do what they’re supposed to do. That gives everyone a time they know they can bring things up to you, so they don’t interrupt you every three minutes.”

“Agreed. And I think I will ask Lettie to schedule donor meetings for only once or twice a week, if possible. Or perhaps all on the same day.”

“Another good one, though if potential big donors want to see you, go whenever they ask.”

“Agreed again. Thank you, Ori. Once again you have brought order to the world. I cannot tell you how much I rely on you. I wonder... once Immortal is off the ground, and if we do not all burn in the process, perhaps you would consider an offer to stay with UVB permanently?”

“I would like that, very much,” Ori said at once, without guile. At Thran’s surprised expression, he grinned. “Oh, maybe you expected me to be coy about it. Nori would, no doubt. I love my brother, and I’ve done a lot of interesting work with him, but there’s a certain... tension associated with his projects. Working with you has been frantic and long and tiring and maddening, but it’s... a different kind of tension, and I like it, and you’ve been straightforward with me right from the start, which Nori’s work rarely is. So yes, I would like to stay. Nori will just have to get himself another data analyst.”

“I appreciate your candor. Keep your fingers crossed. We have yet another reason to hope that “Immortal goes well.”

“I won’t say anything to Nori until after,” Ori promised.

“That is likely wise. If he does not appreciate that I want to steal his brother, he might ask for his money back.”

“I can’t give it back. I deposited it this morning before I got here,” Ori said.

Thran snickered. “That was certainly wise, and I thank you for it. So let us go in, and see if I can throw an epic tantrum.”

“It’ll be stellar,” Ori assured him, as they made their way to the studio door. “Do you want to surprise them, or do you want me to go first and sow seeds of apprehension by saying you’re in a mood?”

Thran laughed. “You intend to enjoy this, I see.”

Ori grinned. “Absolutely. You’re not the only one everyone drives crazy to handle all the stuff. I’m your assistant, so I am, too. So help us both, okay?”

Thran offered Ori a wink. “I have my assignment. And no, we will not warn them. Better we come upon them unawares.”

Ori’s expression was entirely too gleeful. “All right. If you need anything during your performance, just pitch me a line. I can usually improvise pretty fast.”

Thran nodded. “I will change into my dance things and go into the studio, or try to. We will see how far I get before I must perform.”

“Got it. Good luck.”

They came into the UVB lobby, and Ori ducked into the lunchroom while Thran strode down the hall to the changing room. He managed to get into his dancing belt and tights before Irmo burst into the room. Before the choreographer could say a word, Thran held up his hand and skewered him with a pointed stare.

“I will be in the studio in two minutes.”

“How are we to put on a ballet if you do not dance? How can –”

“The very question. Two minutes.”

“But –”

“We agree violently, Irmo. Two minutes.”

The choreographer paused in mid word with mouth agape. Smiling, Thran held up two fingers and his dancing slippers. The absurdity of Thran’s last calm statement brought a delighted grin to his face, and he nodded with great satisfaction.

“Yes, then. Yes. Two minutes.”

Irmo retreated. Thran resumed his dressing, pulling on his top and easing his feet into his slippers. He folded everything else in his bag, hefted it, and went into the studio after Irmo. Finally! Just to step onto the dance floor was calming. Most of the company was there, most in the last stages of their barre. Thran moved off to the side to warm up. Abebe hurried over to him, racing Irmo to get to him first.

“You missed the barre –”

“I did mine at home, just to ensure that I was not interrupted,” Thran informed Irmo and Abebe. “I will take a few minutes to warm up, then I will join the company. What do we dance this morning?”

Both Abebe and Irmo looked elated. “Act One – the battlefield and Death’s dance after,” Abebe said quickly. Irmo seconded quickly with a vigorous nod.

“Then begin,” Thran urged, nodding at the door to the studio. “Before the deluge begins.”

“You’ve got it,” Abebe nodded firmly. He turned away, clapping his hands briskly to attract the dancers’ attention. “Quickly, everyone, while we’ve got Thran to ourselves! Battlefield, right now! Right at the end of the scene, just before Death steps onto the field!”

As the dancers scattered, arranging themselves over the floor, Luka and Charisse hurried over to Thran warming up on the side.

“What’re you doing, mon cher?” the little ballerina regarded him with arms akimbo as he bent and stretched.

“I try to dance,” he gave her a small smile. “Without the cloud of gnats that plague me.”

Luka grimaced. “Oh, gods, Thran; they’ll come thundering in here any minute.”

“Let them,” Thran replied, calmly working his legs to warm them. “I will send them out again. What else can I do? If I am not fit or practiced to dance our tale, then where will we be?”

“Exactement!” Charisse exclaimed. “They must let you dance, or all is lost.”

“That’s no lie,” Luka glanced nervously at the door. “It’s been days.”

“I danced at home last night, so I hope that I will be respectable today. But if I am not, then I will have even more reason to insist that this is where I must be.”

“Luka!” Irmo shouted as the music started, pointing onto the dance floor. The dancer bolted into the scene, taking his place in the ranks of soldiers, lunging and falling among the wounded and the dead. Charisse patted Thran’s arm.

“Go. They won’t interrupt once you are in the scene. If they try, I’ll stop them.”

“Do not, ma chère. Let them interrupt,” Thran said.

“What? After you make the statement that you will dance, you will let them stop you?” Charisse gave him a frown.

“I will let them try,” Thran amended. “And then I will... well, we will see what I will do after that.”

Charisse’s lips curved up. “This I will like to see.”

“I hope so. Now, there is my cue. Off I go.”

He grabbed the prop knife that he wielded in the scene, fastened the belt that held it around his waist, and took his opening stance with excitement. Irmo had made a wonderful dance for this scene, where Death alit, surveyed the devastation that mortals had inflicted upon one another yet again, and then collected the souls of the fallen. Death’s entrance would be spectacular – Irmo had this wild idea to suspend Thran from the rafters of the Imladris Academy’s auditorium, and fly him down onto the stage, but Thran didn’t worry about that risky entrance now. At the first terrible chord that heralded the start of Prokofiev’s chilling music, he became Death. At the second, Death set foot on the battlefield proper, and began His grim task.

At first, Death merely surveyed his temporary domain in the mortal world, walking among the bodies. Soon, however, He paused by a soldier who had died. He drew his knife to cut the soul’s connection to the body, and the fallen rose to follow Death through the carnage. All too soon, He had several soldiers from both forces in thrall behind Him. Those who had not died cringed from His regard as He passed. When He came upon a mortally wounded soldier, He stood patiently, as if in contemplation, until life faded, then added the soul to the others that trailed Him. Another lived long enough for the civilians now edging onto the battlefield to find him, but when the soldier died in their arms, he rose to follow Death despite their screams and cries. Throughout the scene, Death was dispassionate, patient, and methodical, seemingly serene, but His calm only reinforced how inexorable Death was – always unrushed, always waiting, always victorious.

It wasn’t until Death stooped with His knife to gather one more soul that His dispassion crumbled. Onto the other end of the battlefield ran the distraught Maid, eluding the searchers who would have kept her from the carnage. Death paused to watch her frenzied search through the remaining bodies, searching for her Soldier. Something about her drew him. He abandoned the soul he had been ready to gather, and approached the Maid to dance beside her. He was no more than a hand’s breadth away from her, but as one of the living, she was oblivious to His presence. What was this little creature, so frantic that she danced like a wild thing through the bodies? Perhaps it was the strength of her agonized spirit, or perhaps her beauty. Whatever it was, Death’s curiosity grew with every second that passed, until it was desire. The Maid, however, knew nothing of the spell she cast on the Lord of the Underworld – all that mattered to her was to find her Soldier, and she threw herself from one body to the next, hoping to find her Soldier still alive.

At last she fell on the body that Death had abandoned, crying and sobbing. But at the sound of her sobs, her Soldier rallied, and the Maid’s dance changed from lament to joy. As she helped her Soldier rise, nearly overbalancing him with her frantic kisses and hugs, Death circled them, but touched neither. Once the Soldier grew stronger, the Maid helped him off the battlefield, one slow, painful step at a time. Death watched them retreat, but His demeanor was no longer so dispassionate. One hand reached out as if to touch the Maid’s hair as she helped her Soldier past Him.

When they were gone, He turned to resume charge of the souls he’d gleaned from the battlefield. Before he led his new charges to the Underworld, however, He cast a long, lingering look after the Maid. Then he, too, left the battlefield.

“Yes!” Irmo raised his arms in triumph. “Yes, that is it! The contrast between the mortals and Death is clear. Thran, can you angle your head a bit as you study the Maid, to appear more alien?”

Thran took his stance as Death, arching his back more and cocking his head to one side. Luka perked up at this.

“Hey, have you seen any of those dinosaur movies? The velociraptors? They have this really unnerving way they cock their heads – try that!”

“No, no, no!” Irmo snorted. “No dinosaurs!”

“Hang on,” one of the other dancers spoke up. “No dinosaurs, but Luka’s right about how the raptors had this weird way of cocking their heads.” He demonstrated. “Just a little of it might add that “I will try it,” Thran said over the stir. He’d seen only a fragment of the film they talked about, just what he’d seen one night with Legolas some time ago. He tried to recall the raptors, and angled his head a bit more –

The studio door opened.

Thran ignored whoever came in, and concentrated on what he remembered about velociraptors. If he couldn’t remember much about the animals, he understood reptilian coldness, and gave Charisse an experimental look. He danced around her, trying out this new element.

“Yes, yes, you are right, that is better,” Irmo waved his hands. “Now, I want to see the pas de trois again –”

“Thran, if you’re at a break, I really need to talk to you about this insurance contract,” Lettie called to him. Her voice was reluctant; she had been a dancer once, too, and of all the people clamoring for his attention, she understood the cost. He was sorry that she would bear the uncomfortable burden of his annoyance, but better she did now before he was unfit to dance.

“I am not at a break.” Thran held his pose, arms stretched wide, back arched, head thrust forward. He altered it subtly to be more threatening; why not take advantage of the role to help him make his point? He rotated on one foot to face Lettie; Rada, Círdan, and Rúmil were arrayed behind her. Belatedly, Ori slipped in behind the others to remain by the door. “I am in the middle of the morning’s practice.”

“This won’t take but a minute,” Lettie pleaded.

“And how long will everything that they want take?” Irmo accused, waving his arms in frustration, then pointing at the three people behind Lettie. “How am I supposed to put on a ballet when I cannot have my principal dancer to work with? How?”

“How are we supposed to put on a ballet when we cannot have our primary investor and business director to make the decisions needed to put on that ballet?” Rúmil, the public relations rep, shot back. “Honestly, Irmo, this isn’t just about you! We need sets, costumes, lighting, sound, and then press, adequate liability coverage –”

“What need do we have of public relations or anything else if there are no ballet dancers?” Irmo shot back.

“You’ll have your ballet dancers. But there are decisions to be made –”

“It’s just a few minutes, about the contract –”

“Costume changes won’t take long –”

“And what about the schedule for the set design –”

Irmo stamped forward to argue his point, but Rúmil wasn’t ready to back down, and in seconds, the lot of them was talking loudly and not listening. Thran let them get entrenched in their frustration as he glanced at the dancers, most in various stages of pained silence. Behind the combatants, Ori gave him a nod, so he drew himself up, and summoned his most formidable glare.

“ENOUGH!” he shouted. “Every one of you – SILENCE!”
Silence fell. The full weight of everyone’s regard riveted onto Thran.

“This is NOT the way our company behaves! This is NOT the way we conduct ourselves! I am outraged at such disregard, such rudeness, such disparagement! You will never do this again! NEVER!”

Thran hadn’t thought that the silence could deepen any more, but so it did. It was as if everyone had forgotten how to breathe. Good. He had the perfect stage. He focused a fierce glare on each of the arguers.

“Each of you is so caught up in your concerns that you do not see that everyone else has concerns, too. You fight among yourselves about which concern is more important, and now you come to me to tell you what you should already know – that each of us does things vital to Immortal’s success. But do all of you forget what I must do? I am the one who dances the lead in this new ballet. No one else. Me. I must be perfect, or we are just another company with ideas bigger than its abilities. Yet three times this week, I have not been able to dance here because of your clamors – I have had to dance alone, at home. But I cannot dance alone to be ready, much less perfect – I must dance here with the company. Is this hard for you to fathom?”

Rúmil and Lettie and Irmo all drew breath to speak, but he glared all three into silence. “NO! Not one word, for I am not done! It is not time for you to ask me anything – this time, I ask you something. Tell me – are you not the experts in your areas, not me? Can you not follow the guidelines we set up when we started this effort to make most of the decisions about sets, costumes, lights, PR, insurance? Why are you in this company if you expect me to solve your problems? I expect you to bring me solutions! DO THAT! Do that, and let me I dance so that I do not let down the rest of you!”

Lettie tried to speak again, but with a slash of his hand, Thran cut her off. “I lay down the law. Every morning, I will dance. Each day at noon, I will sit down with you at lunch to hear of the day’s progress – a succinct report, you understand? I will hear your recommendations, and I will make what decisions you require. Then we will decide how to proceed further. Three days a week, I will continue my pointe lessons. The other days, I will dance again in the afternoon. I will also delegate some duties. Ori can make decisions about contracts. He will continue to help you to condense matters down to important points. Each of you who needs Ori’s help will take pains in all ways so that he helps you expeditiously. Lettie, I understand the need to see to donors. Please consolidate these duties to one or at most two days a week. Dancers, please prepare your roles as you so ably do. And Irmo and Abebe, you will respect the need for me to attend to other things, and schedule rehearsals for scenes where I do not dance for the times you know I will be away.

“All of you,” Thran raised his voice, and gave everyone without exception a glare. “I want efficient action. Efficient action. Do not waste my time or that of others. We cannot afford this. Ori will be my gatekeeper. Only he is allowed to interrupt me when I dance. You understand this?”

There were nods all around. Rada covered his mouth with a hand; he likely hid a smile. He had not been one to make unreasonable demands on Thran’s time, but he understood Thran’s predicament, and took it in stride. Ori’s expression was carefully neutral, mostly hidden because he appeared to stare at his shoes. Abebe and Irmo both looked mixed; they were happy to have Thran so much of the day, but because it wasn’t all of the day, their happiness was incomplete. Lettie bit her lip, she wasn’t happy, but perhaps Thran’s point about how he had to dance perfectly for Immortal to pay off resonated with her. Rúmil looked put out, but that was his normal demeanor. Círdan had folded his arms over his chest, and seemed to study a freckle on one wrist.

Had he made a fool of himself, or had he made them feel foolish? No one met his eyes, so perhaps the latter.

“So. It is over. The stir is done. I will dance now, and I will meet at noon for the discussion you need.”

The silence remained, but Thran did not smile. He hadn’t enjoyed chastising his friends, no matter how necessary it had been. He nodded to Abebe and Irmo.

“Come; we resume our rehearsal,” he prompted, and the dance master, choreographer, and dancers scurried to resume their practice as the interrupting contingent made a subdued retreat. Ori caught his eye long enough to offer the briefest of winks at the center of an otherwise impassive face before he, too, exited the studio.

As Thran bent his regard on Abebe and Irmo’s instructions about refinements to the scene, he gave brief consideration to his so-called tantrum. At least he hadn’t spat out his words at the speed of a rifle, or blistered everyone with an outpouring of Russian curses.

He might have gesticulated, though.

* * *

“Welcome home!” Bard called. “Legolas and I are in the solarium!"

Footsteps – one lighter, the other faster – sounded in the mudroom. Tilda and Sigrid; Bain would have thumped more. When Bard and Legolas exchanged looks, the boy seemed to have made the same deductions that Bard had. He grabbed a tissue from his box to blow his nose, sounding very congested, but he got up with Bard to go into the sitting room to see the girls.

“Tilda?” Bard called. “Sigrid? How do you feel?”

“I’m fine,” Sigrid said too quickly. She didn’t meet Bard’s eyes as he came into the kitchen. She dug into her backpack twice, once for her lunch bag, then again for a book and several sheets of paper. “I got your assignments for English, French, and government, Legs. Plus your Literature book, because you’ve got a reading assignment. I saw Bain – he’d gotten the rest of your stuff, so he passed it on to me to give you. So everything’s there.”

“Thank you, Sigrid,” Legolas smiled as he took the book and the papers. “That was nice of you to get all my assignments.”

“You’re welcome. I’m heading upstairs to work on my assignments now, Da. I’ve got a lot to do, and I’m not hungry, so I’ll see you at supper, okay?”

Sigrid headed upstairs with her backpack without delay.

“There goes a girl who’s on a mission, and it’s not to get her homework done,” Bard observed thoughtfully, as he considered the hallway.

Legolas had stooped beside Tilda, but now he looked up at Bard. “What’s going on?”

“I think she’s sick.”

“I think Tilda is, too, Bard,” Legolas patted Tilda’s back. “She said she’s so tired that she wants to Bard stooped beside Tilda. Her complexion was pale, and her eyes looked a little glassy. He laid a palm on her forehead. “You’re warm, little doll. I think you’ve got the same cold that Legs has. How do you feel?”

“Not very good,” she shook her head. In fact, she looked almost sad enough to cry. “My head hurts, and it’s too hot, and my nose is stuffy, and I’m so tired. I just want to go to sleep.”

“I think that’s just the right thing to do,” Bard said, giving her braid a little tug. “We’ll check your temperature, but you do feel warm. A little acetaminophen will help your head feel better and your fever go down, and a nice long nap will help your body fight the germs. So let’s go upstairs.”

“Okay, Da,” Tilda nodded without argument.

“Legs, can you hold the fort while I get Tilda settled and see what’s up with Sigrid?”

“Sure. I can go up with Tilda if you want. I’ll help you tuck in Mr. Bun, Kukla.”

“He’d like that. I don’t think he feels too good, either,” Tilda shook her head.

“Oh, okay, upstairs, everyone,” Bard shepherded the two children down the hall. “Legs, make sure you stay warm.”

“I’m warm,” Legolas confirmed as they went up the stairs.

“I’m the wrong kind of warm,” Tilda groaned as she struggled up the stairs. “I’m hot!”

“Almost there, little doll,” Bard coaxed, as they reached the bedroom landing. “I’ll get the thermometer for you.”

He ducked into the children’s bathroom to retrieve the thermometer, then came into Tilda’s room to find Legolas getting her pajamas from the closet. “Here, Kukla. Pajamas are more comfortable than school clothes. I’ll wait outside for you to change.”

“Okay,” Tilda wavered, drawing Bard’s smile. Yes, Tilda had a cold and slight fever, but it wasn’t serious, despite her plaintive voice.

“I’ll wait outside, too, Til,” Bard said. “Get into your night clothes, then I’ll check your temperature.”

He and Legolas waited outside the door until Tilda said she was ready, then came back inside. Bard helped her crawl into bed and settled Mr. Bun in her arms. While Bard got the thermometer into Tilda’s mouth, Legolas perused her shelf of toys and chose a stuffed elephant.

“She,” Tilda corrected through a mouthful of thermometer. “That’s Nelephant.”

“Oh, sorry – she looks like she’d be good to hold onto for a nap.”

“She is,” Tilda mumbled.

“Let the thermometer do its work before you talk,” Bard urged, and the little girl fell silent. When the thermometer chirped, he took it out to look at it. “Yes, you’re a couple of degrees warmer, so you and Legs get Mr. Bun and Nelephant tucked in beside you while I get the acetaminophen and a cup of water.”

“Okay, Da,” Tilda nodded, then sneezed violently.

“Tissues,” Legolas said, quickly. “They’d be good, too.”

“They certainly would,” Bard grinned. “Back in a tick.”

In a minute, Tilda had downed the pill and water, a new box of tissues sat beside her on the bed, and she was tucked in with her toys.

“Do you want your light on, or just your night light?” Bard asked, as he moved the wastebasket near to her bed to catch the used tissues.

“The light, please.”

“Okay, light on. Close your eyes and try to rest, little doll. That’s the best thing to kill a cold.”

“I thought it was chicken soup,” Tilda murmured, rubbing her eyes.

“That, too. I made a big pot this morning. You can have some when you wake up.”

“It’s good soup, too. I had some for lunch,” Legolas supplied.

“Mmm,” Tilda hummed. “I love chicken soup. And grilled cheese.”

“Nap first,” Bard said. “Then you can see how hungry you are when you wake up.”

“Okay, Da.”

“Sleep well, little doll.”

“You’re welcome. See you later.”

Bard and Legolas left Tilda to rest. On the landing, Legolas gave Bard a mischievous smile. “Would you rather I go downstairs to rest in the sitting room, or can I rest in my room for the off chance that I can hear what Sigrid says?”

Bard gave him a grin. “That depends on whether you’re more polite than curious.”

“I’m polite most of the time. Is it okay if I’m curious for once?”

“Suit yourself. In either place, stay warm and quiet. You’re not through the woods yet.”

“Okay, Bard,” Legolas gave a pleased grin as he headed for his room. “I’ll be warm and quiet and curious.”

“Good lad.”

Bard waited until he heard Legolas crawl into bed and turn on his light. He went into the children’s bathroom to wash off the thermometer, then stuck it in his shirt pocket. Then he knocked on Sigrid’s door. “Sweetness?”

A slight flurry of sound – maybe she’d been lying on the bed? “Y-yeah, Da?”
“May I come in, please?”

“I’m working on my paper.”

“This won’t take long, Sig. It’s important.”

“Okay, come in, then.”

That was one reluctant assent, without doubt. He smothered a sympathetic grin before he eased the door open.

“What’s up?” Sigrid said, turning around in her chair before her desk. Her computer was open, but the desktop displayed, not the application Sigrid used when she wrote her papers. Her papers and books were still in her backpack, and she hadn’t changed her clothes yet. The bed was rumpled – yes, she’d been lying down when he’d knocked. Bard scanned her face, finding exactly what he’d expected – the same feverish eyes and pale skin that Tilda had shown.

“I want to check your temperature,” Bard said, pulling out the thermometer. “Because I don’t think you feel any better than Tilda or Legolas does.”

“I’m fine!” Sigrid insisted. “No, Da, I mean it! I’m fine! There’s nothing wrong with me!”

“Just humor your old Da, please,” he held out the thermometer. “I don’t like it when my children are sick. Makes me worry.”

“Da, I told you, I’m fine!” Sigrid got up from her chair and flounced down on her bed. She spread her hands in exasperation. “I’m really fine!”

“Sigrid,” Bard asked quietly.

His daughter’s face spasmed with anger, then guilt. She grabbed the thermometer from him and stuck it in her mouth as if it were coated with poison. “There. Happy?”

“Reasonably. Come on, Sig. Seat it properly.”

She shifted it in her mouth and tried to look sulky, but it was a sad attempt. When the little device chirped, she pulled it out. “See? Normal. I told you.”

Bard retrieved the thermometer, but Sigrid had already cleared it. He gave her a look. “We can do this one of two ways. You can tell me what it read, or I can ask you to measure it again and hand it to me without turning it off.”

Sigrid held his gaze for a long second, then her eyes dropped to her lap.

She started to cry.

Bard sat down beside her, and put his arms around her. “Aw, sweetness... getting sick has put a crimp in something.”

“I’m not sick!” she cried, clinging to Bard. “I’m not. I can’t be. Oh, Da, I just can’t be!”

“Why not, sweetness?”

“Because my paper is due and the college fair is tomorrow and Saturday I’m supposed to start my job and I just can’t –”
Sigrid gulped, but she couldn’t hold everything in any longer. Her arms tightened around Bard, her body shook, and Bard’s shirt soaked up a deluge of tears. For long seconds, Bard didn’t try to speak, but merely gave Sigrid someone to cling to as he rubbed her back.

“I’m sorry, sweetness,” he murmured, when the initial rush had passed.

“I just can’t be sick, Da!” she repeated. “My paper’s due, and I have to finish the last little bit, and then there’s the big college fair tomorrow afternoon – three of the colleges I’m interested in will be there, with people I can talk to about their programs, and let them know who I am which might give me a little credibility when I apply, and then on Saturday, I have to show up at the bistro or Miss Dís will think I’m just a screw-up, and I’ll lose the job, and-and – oh, Da!”

“Hang on, Sigrid,” Bard urged, still rubbing Sigrid’s back. “One thing at a time, okay? Come on, sweetness. Try to calm down. Getting so cranked up won’t help your cold any, will it?”

“I guess not,” Sigrid sat up, rubbing the heel of her hand over her cheek in a futile attempt to wipe the tears away.

“Sure. That’s right; take a deep breath. Now, what’d the thermometer read?”

Sigrid’s face was desolate, and she tensed under Bard’s hug. “An even hundred.”

“Okay,” Bard soothed. “How long have you had a fever? Yesterday, too?”

Sigrid’s nod was shamefaced. “It was only ninety-nine yesterday.”

“So you tried to work through it, and today it’s higher. So that’s no good. You need rest to knock it out. I’m sorry, but school’s right out tomorrow.”

Sigrid hiccupped and her face twisted in misery.

“Let’s think about contingencies. Can you finish your paper in bed, then email it to your teacher?”

Sigrid thought about that. “Hmm. That’s a good idea. I think I can do that.”

“Okay, paper solved. There isn’t anything you can do about the college fair, but I’d expected to take you to visit schools this summer, so maybe we can see the ones you’re interested in if they aren’t too far away.”

“Okay,” Sigrid sniffed. “But my job...”

“We’ve got two days. Maybe you can rest enough to get your fever down in time. If it stays down tomorrow, and if you’re not too snuffy, a decongestant can get you through Saturday and Sunday. We didn’t get you a bicycle, but I’ll drive you into town so you don’t have to walk in and wear yourself out before you get there. By next week, you should be fine, so you can get yourself there and back again.”

Sigrid sniffed and laid her head on Bard’s shoulder. “You make so much sense, Da. I should have thought of all those things.”

“You might have, if you hadn’t spent the past two days trying to hide that you were sick,” Bard grinned, giving Sigrid a one-handed hug. “You know you can’t fool me for long.”

“I can’t,” Sigrid sighed, wiping her face again. “I should know better than to try.”

“You just want to keep me on my toes,” Bard chuckled. “So get into bed while I get the acetaminophen. Try to finish your paper and email it off, then rest. Don’t worry about your homework for now; you’ve got all day tomorrow and the weekend.”

Sigrid took a tremulous breath. “I guess you’ll have to make a big pot of soup with all of us down for the count.”

“Already been done. I made a fresh pot this morning. I’ll dish you a bowl after you’ve had a rest.”

“Okay, Da. Thanks.”

“Welcome, sweetness. Get into your nightclothes, and I’ll be back with the pills.”

Bard fetched the fever reducer and Sigrid’s cup from the bathroom, and yet another box of tissues. Thank goodness he regularly bought both in bulk, so there was no danger that he’d run out before the colds had run their course. For the second time, he settled an ailing child in bed with as many comforts as he could provide – fever reducer, tissues, and warm blankets. Sigrid lay back, propped up on pillows with her laptop on her knees, ready to finish her paper.

“Tea?”

She nodded. “That’d be great, Da.”

“Okay. How much of your paper do you have left?”

“Just the last part of the summary. I hope it’ll be just a paragraph or two.”

“Try to tie it up and send it off soon. The best thing you can do for yourself is rest.”

Sigrid ventured a thin smile. “I know. I’d hoped to finish it last night, but I was just so tired that I couldn’t see the screen anymore. So I’ll finish as soon as I can while still doing a good job.”

“That’s all I ask. I’ll bring your tea when it’s ready.”

“Okay,” Sigrid thanked him as he left her room.

Bard detoured to Legolas’s room before he went downstairs. The boy was asleep, so Bard went down to the kitchen, got Sigrid’s tea, and brought it up to her. His oldest child looked a little easier, so he left her to finish her paper. He looked in on Tilda, and found her sound asleep with Nelephant and Mr. Bun both tucked into her arms.

Bard went downstairs into the kitchen, checking the clock on the oven timer. He still had almost two hours before Bain would be home, and longer than that before Thran would likely appear. He considered the contents of the freezer, and pulled out a frozen beef roast to stash in the fridge to thaw overnight. He’d put it with carrots, onions, and potatoes into the crockpot tomorrow morning, and let it cook slowly into a tasty and tender meal that would be easy on scratchy throats.

He wandered into the solarium, smiling at the painted wall. He hoped he’d get to hang the fountain and get the basin in place tomorrow. The basin needed some patching before he could fill it with water, but just getting it into place would look great. He’d get Bain off to school, then start on the fountain first thing. Then he’d keep working on his commission sketches. He had several ready to send to Hal depicting his maple tree.

He snickered. Plans for tomorrow were well and good. But with three sick children in the house, he’d likely spend most of the day playing nursemaid. Not that he minded. For the first time in a long time, he had the wherewithal to take care of the children properly. Even the prospect of innumerable games of Dinky Farm and glasses of juice and cups of tea and too many sneezes couldn’t dim Bard’s relief.

He fetched his sketchpad, and sat down in the sitting room to think about a spinning galaxy, a statement tree, and a steampunk orrery. For the first time in a long time, guilt had no part in his thoughts.
Chapter 117

Chapter Summary

While the angel is grateful to dance again, the saint contemplates the end of renovations, the start of sculptures, and the state of Clan Ffyrnig's medicine cabinet.

Chapter Notes

I don't own any rights to "The Treasure of Sierra Madre." It's a great film :-)

Hal appears courtesy of johnnysmitten. Thank you, my dear!

The rest of Thran’s morning passed smoothly. He made good progress on the dance, even venturing a complete run through of the pas de deux with Charisse when Death confesses His love for her. Half of it was really a pas de trois, because Luka’s Soldier flitted in and out to show why the Maid had no eyes for the Lord of the Underworld. Thran was still not happy with his pointe work – it was too studied and careful for his likes, but at least his attention to strength work kept him steady on his feet.

At noon, he sat down with his lunch and everyone who had items for him. Ori, he was glad to see, had helped everyone prioritize and optimize, so they dealt with each item expeditiously. Círdan had already begun constructing the set at the school with the student interns, to the students’ enthusiastic delight. In a week, the company would have the bare bones to rehearse on, so the company would begin their work there in the afternoons and evenings. The lighting and sound crews were in place, again making heavy use of student interns. Rúmil and Lettie were in better moods because Ori had gone over their PR plans, insurance information, and several other bureaucratic considerations to take care of as many as possible. Ori gave Thran succinct summaries of everything, and Thran signed the forms that they needed to complete the rest.

Rada’s report was last. The costumes were complete for the mortal soldiers and civilians; so was the Maid’s mortal dress, as well as the more elaborate one Death gives her in the Underworld. The costumier was in close discussion with Abebe and Irmo about the costumes for the troll market scene – the basics were done, and the company dancers were bringing in personal touches to further customize them appropriate to their characters. Thran took that moment to mention that he had heard rumors of the amazing costumes of tribal fusion belly dancers. Since part of the troll market’s allure was all the different styles of dance that would be on display, a belly dancer might add even more excitement. Ori quickly had pictures on his tablet, which looked as exotic as Bard had claimed.

“I understand Rachel Brice is one of the stars in the genre,” he ventured, keeping his anticipation to himself. But he had no need to worry that anyone would notice his interest, as Ori quickly brought up one of her videos to play. As everyone gathered around to ooh and aah, Thran had the luxury to appreciate the dancer’s supreme control, serene expression, and fantastic costuming. The consensus was immediate – the troll market needed a belly dancer.

“I’ll ask if anyone in the company is a belly dancer,” Abebe quickly volunteered, then he grinned at Lettie. “If none of them is, why don’t you volunteer to step in, Lettie?”

That brought a chorus of playful encouragement, Thran’s among them. Lettie might not dance professionally any longer, but she was still slender and able.

“You wish!” Lettie joshed, laughing. “Besides, I’m not from India, am I? I’m a Hakka from Jamaica, or at least my parents were. They came over here in the sixties along with a lot of the other ethnic Chinese Jamaicans. I’ve never been anywhere near India!”

“Not all belly dancing is from India. It’s bigger in the Middle East, and it’s got roots all over the world. Look at that dancer,” Círdan pointed at Ori’s tablet, where a trio of dancers undulated across the stage. “She’s Chinese, and she looks fantastic. You’d fit right in.”

“My niece is a big fan of tribal, and I agree with Círdan,” Abebe seconded. “You’d look great in any of those costumes.”

“As if,” she shook her head, still laughing. “I’m not so sinuous as that.”

“Too bad. I’ll ask around, then,” Abebe conceded.

Thran had kept one eye on Ori’s tablet during the teasing, studying the videos the young man had played one after another. Bard was right about how wonderful this form of dance was. Whether the troll market acquired a belly dancer or not, he’d see that the Clan Ffyrnig solarium hosted a variation of one very soon.

The final costume item to discuss was the body stocking that Thran would wear when Death confessed his love to the Maid. It needed a final fitting to make sure that the contoured painting had been placed properly to match Thran’s physique. Rada had brought it with him, so Thran put aside his lunch to ease the body stocking on in the changing room, then the small, closefitting loincloth that went over it. He still had on his pointe shoes, so he came out into the studio for Rada to examine the costume in front of the mirrors.

“Oh, that is amazing.” Lettie circled Thran to check the fit and the markings.

“Here.” Rada pulled a pair of gloves from the bag he carried and handed them to Thran. “Let’s go for the complete look.”

When Thran eased them on, the point of the tight-fitting gloves was obvious – they extended the colors of the body stocking over his hands, and lengthened each finger by three inches into a long, attenuated point. The next item Rada pulled from his bag was Death’s headdress, which was as much wig as crown. Rada had long since removed all the veiling from the piece, because obscuring Thran’s vision was too dangerous to risk. This iteration extended the line of Thran’s skull up and back, and silky white hair blended the piece into Thran’s own hair. A simple diadem provided the only sign of Death’s lordly status. Thran sat on the nearest chair for Rada to seat the headdress properly and blend the strands of hair into his own. He got up to consider himself in the mirror, struck this pose that, then hazarded a sequence of steps. The murmurs around him revealed how well Rada’s costume had been received, so he beckoned to Charisse who watched nearby. As she came forward, he danced around her, angling his head like the velociraptor they’d discussed earlier. When he drew himself up on pointe to step this way and that, emphasizing his attenuated appearance, Irmo was beside himself.

“Yes, yes!” he exclaimed. “Yes, that is brilliant! Both the dancing and the costume! Yes!”

“I have one more suggestion for the costume,” Rada said in his quiet way, smiling at the reception.
Thran’s performance had garnered. “It isn’t necessary, but I wondered if adding light reflective contact lenses would further emphasize Death’s otherworldliness?”

“That’d be amazing,” Lettie nodded. “Imagine Thran looking out over the audience, and his eyes would reflect the light just like a cat’s do.”

“I like it! Yes!” Irmo declared with a single emphatic nod.

“Amazing, as you say,” Thran agreed. “However, I would have to learn how to properly care for my eyes.”

“I agree, it’d be a fantastic look,” Lettie nodded. “But as you said, it’s a concern for your eyes, Thran, and it’s an extra expense.”

“It isn’t essential,” Rada assured the group. “I suggest it more with an eye to future performances, rather than the three at the school.”

“I agree,” Thran said. “Let us keep it in mind for the future. With a mere nine weeks left before our premiere, we must concentrate on the major concerns of staging and story. Rada, this costume is wonderful on its own. It does not need the contacts to make Death alien.” He rose up on his toes again, and extended his arms above his head. “Death is already alien enough.”

Rad offered him a pleased bow, thanks for Thran’s praise as well as acceptance of his decision about the contacts.

“Before you take off the costume, Thran, I’d love to get a few pictures for the PR campaign,” Rúmil asked eagerly, already pulling out his digital camera. This was the happiest he’d looked today, so Thran was glad to stand against a plain part of the studio wall and strike a suitable pose. The PR rep snapped eagerly until he had at least a dozen shots. “Perfect. Just perfect. I can use these to tease the media about Immortal, until we can get a few more formal shots. Next week? More costume shots with you, Charisse, and Luka?”

“Of course. That would be ideal. Ori, would you and Rúmil please choose a day next week with Rada? Rada will need to know what costumes to bring on which day.”

“Will do, Thran,” Ori nodded, so he and Rúmil drew together to coordinate schedules.

“Perhaps we can revisit the scene with Death, the Maid, and the Soldier?” Irmo asked just as eagerly. “To see how the costume fares?”

Thran turned his gaze on Rada. “Is the costume ready for that, Rada?”

The costumier nodded. “It is. I’d love to see how it moves in performance, too.”

“So let us warm up, and dance the scene,” Thran nodded.

Thran, Luka, and Charisse limbered arms and legs, torsos and backs, and soon Vieuxtemps’s Elegy for Viola and Piano, Opus 30 began its sonorous chords. As Thran caught sight of himself in the studio mirrors, he subtly modified the steps to increase the sense of an ancient god who suddenly and unexpectedly finds himself in the throes of desire and worship. It was a little easier to lose some of his studied caution when he was on pointe, because the costume gave him a much clearer sense of being Death, rather than merely dancing a role. At the end of the seven-minute scene, he was met with applause from the entire company. With hand on heart, he offered a gratified bow to his colleagues. Even more gratifying was Lettie’s expression. She looked more confident, less worried. When he caught her eyes, her smile widened, and her chin rose a little.
“We are going to make a hell of a noise with this,” she clenched both fists in affirmation. “We really are.”

Thran offered her a regal bow replete with Death’s gravitas. “So we will.”

“Death will have a little more to offer the audience in that costume,” Rada said, with his usual inward smile. “It’s been out of its bag for long enough now, so if you all would remain still for just a moment…”

Rada went to the light switches on the side of the wall by the door. “Three, two, one.”

The lights went out. Two seconds later, oohs and aahs filled the studio. Thran looked down at himself – yes, his costume glowed with a blue fluorescence.

“Amazing!” he declared. “Back up, everyone – I will dance a few steps.”

People shuffled out of the way. When silence fell, he took a few steps across the floor, then back. The murmur of voices was excited, and he distinctly heard Luka murmur, “That is so cool!” to Charisse, who giggled in response.

“Lights, please, Rada?” Thran called. When the studio was lit again, he searched the faces of his colleagues. “How did it look?”

“I liked it.” Charisse had a big grin on her face, an expression that most of their colleagues shared. “Such a simple thing, but so effective.”

“All of the costumes have some sort of fluorescence,” Rada explained. “We had originally talked of LED lighting, but while it is possible, the cost is too high for so many costumes, so I looked for alternatives. Glow sticks are inexpensive, widely available, and come in several colors. So I sewed a pocket over the heart of each costume to hold the glow sticks. Red is for the living mortals; pale green is for the dead. Blue, of course, is the signature color of the Lord of the Underworld. His costumes also have fluorescent paint so that he remains the brightest in the Underworld.”

“That is brilliant,” Ori declared, tongue firmly in cheek, which drew a laugh. “Fits the budget, simple technology, and reinforces the story.”

“Indeed,” Thran offered Rada brief applause. “Well done, Rada!”

“Thank you,” the costumier offered a humble smile.

“Does anyone have anything else for us to consider?” Thran asked, looking around.

No one spoke.

“Then I will give Rada back his costume, and we will resume our rehearsal. I thank all of you for your understanding and your help with all that we discussed. We have much to do, but we make good progress. Everything goes well.”

It wasn’t the best of motivational speeches, but it was sincere, and Thran was gratified to see smiles and nods greet his words. As he left the studio, Abebe and Irmo called the dancers to the next scene. Thran was glad to retreat to the relative privacy of the changing room, where he took a deep breath. He eased off his pointe shoes, then carefully slipped Rada’s costume off.

Ori stuck his head in. “I don’t want anything,” he said hastily as Thran gave him an inquiring look. “But I thought you’d like to know that everyone’s reasonably happy with how things turned out today.”

“That is welcome news,” Thran took another deep breath. “Thank you, Ori. Your advice this morning was sound.”

The young man waved a hand. “I’m glad it helped. I’m still learning my way around a ballet company. There’s a lot to learn.”

“For us all,” Thran grinned as he eased on a clean pair of tights and belted them into place.

“Let’s hope that we stay ahead of the curve,” Ori sat on the bench to shake his head wryly.

“Perhaps we should all learn to surf, so that when the curve crashes upon us, we can stay afloat,” Thran joked.

“That’s no lie,” Ori chuckled. “I’ve got Rúmil’s costume shoot set up for next Tuesday. And I’m going to help Lettie this afternoon on the donor list, unless you need me for anything else.”

“I plan to devote myself to Abebe and Irmo all afternoon, so yes, however you can help Lettie will be perfect.”

“Okay, Thran.” Ori looked at him sideways, shyly. “I appreciate your trust in me. It won’t be misplaced.”

“I do not expect it to be,” Thran smiled back. “Thank you.”

Ori nodded, and slipped out as quietly as he’d slipped in.

After Thran finished dressing, he put on his dancing slippers, went back to the studio, and danced.

* * *

After Bard brought Sigrid her tea, he took advantage of the quiet to call Hal Galadhrim to let him know that he had sketches ready for him. The flamboyant financial planner gave him an email address, so Bard scanned in his sketches on Thran’s printer, and sent them off. It seemed that the email could hardly have arrived before Hal had called him back with effusive praise. Even better, he gave enthusiastic approval for Bard to begin on the model for the tree. Bard asked a few more questions, most to confirm that Hal hadn’t changed his mind about the particulars of the piece, then thanked Hal for his speedy response. His next call was to Bilbo to let him know the progress of the project, so that he could send out the appropriate paperwork to Hal. The artist’s rep was delighted at his quick follow up with Hal as well as the other clients. Bard gave Bilbo a quick rundown on the orrery and galaxy projects, but explained that he hadn’t heard from the remaining client.

“That happens sometimes,” Bilbo mused. “I’ll follow up as well, but in the meantime, I’m delighted that you have three confirmed contracts. You’ll be a busy sculptor.”

“I’ve no complaints about that,” Bard assured him. “I can start the model for Hal’s tree right away, but I’m still thinking about the other two.”

“I don’t have to tell you to take the time your pieces need,” Bilbo cautioned. “You’re not doing art fair caricatures with these. You’re a fine artist, and clients understand that that takes time.”
“Absolutely,” Bard assured him. “But I appreciate the affirmation all the same. I’ll keep you posted on how things go, Bilbo.”

“Thank you, my boy. I’ll talk to you soon.”

Bard and Bilbo made their goodbyes, then Bard wandered back into the solarium to look at the drying wall again. It was the last wall he’d paint as a full time renovator. Once the fountain went on the wall and he repaired the basin, the house was more or less finished. Yes, there were closets and the main room to paint, but next week, painters would come to restore the exterior, and strip all the interior doors. Soon the window company would replace all the windows. After that, there would be only the occasional project for him to undertake. He’d be in the barn full time from now on.

Despite the excitement of returning to his art, Bard still felt a pang of regret. He’d loved working on the Clan Ffyrnig homestead, seeing it come back to life. But he didn’t get too nostalgic. Despite all the things he’d replaced and repaired in the house – roof, heating and cooling, plumbing, wiring, windows, appliances, insulation – this was still an old house, and old houses never stayed fixed for long. He’d have no lack of chances to tinker around the house for years to come.

Bain rattled home, full of energy and smelling of green spring air. The other children were still asleep, so Bard explained that both Tilda and Sigrid had joined Legolas in the ranks of the sick. Bain wasn’t surprised about Sigrid; he’d thought she hadn’t looked herself when he’d passed her Legolas’s assignments.

“Guess I’ll be making the homework rounds for all three of them tomorrow,” he shrugged, pulling cheese out of the fridge, then ducking into the pantry for crackers.

“That’d be great,” Bard thanked his son. “You’re not feeling any of the same symptoms, are you?”

“Nope,” Bain assured him, shoveling in a huge chunk of cheese. “Fine so far.”

“Good. If you start to feel off, though, please don’t pull a Sigrid and try to tough it out,” Bard asked. “As she found out, that just makes it worse.”

Bain grimaced as he assembled more cheese and crackers. “Why was she so hot about trying to fake it?”

“The college fair’s tomorrow, she has a paper due, and she was worried about not being able to start her job on Saturday.”

“I forgot about the job,” Bain admitted, chewing. “That’d stink, missing the first day of a new job.”

“It would,” Bard agreed. “We might end up eating supper in shifts tonight. I don’t know what time Thran will get home, and I want the other children to sleep as long as they can. So we’ll plan for you and me to eat at the usual time, so you can get started on your homework after, and I’ll dish up something for the rest as they appear.”

“Let me guess – we’re having chicken soup for supper, right?” Bain grinned as he sampled more cheese.

“Got it in one,” Bard chuckled. “You and I aren’t sick, but a little chicken soup might help us stay that way.”

“With biscuits, maybe?”

“Course. I made brownies and applesauce raisin cake for afters.”
“Sweet,” Bain breathed. “Hey, I can still play video games because I’m not sick, right?”

“Right,” Bard nodded.

“Sweet again,” Bain pumped his fist. “Would you play one with me before supper?”

“I’d prefer to crash cars than shoot zombies, but other than that, sure. Or maybe you’d rather play Dinky Farm.”

“Da!” snorted Bain. “That’s okay with Tilda, but with anybody else? Come on!”

“Hey, don’t diss the one game I can win,” Bard teased.

Bain stuffed more cheese and cracker into his mouth. “What is it you always tell me? You won’t get better at something if you don’t keep doing it?”

“Hoisted by my own petard,” Bard mock groaned.

Bain looked blank. “What does that mean?”

Bard grinned. “It means we’re playing Car Crash Five Thousand.”

“Yes!” Bain cheered. “I’ll start the game.”

Bard put away the remains of cheese and crackers, then followed Bain into the sitting room, where they spent the next hour gleefully running each other off the road. Legolas wandered in to watch for a few minutes, then the three got ready for supper. Legolas was coughing and sniffling too much to help with the food, but he managed to get the flatware and condiments on the table without spreading too many germs while Bard made biscuits and Bain poured milk and dished small cups of fruit. Bard refilled the teakettle, then they sat down to bowls of soup, hot biscuits, and Bain’s fruit cups. Bard kept the conversation light so as not to wear out Legolas too badly, and sent him into the sitting room to prop himself up on pillows to work on his homework. Bain helped Bard clean up supper, then asked if he could bring down his pillows to join Legolas. He’d just gotten settled when the door to the mudroom opened.

“I am home!” Thran called.

“Welcome home!” Bard called back, then gave the boys a smile. “Get started on your homework, lads. I’ll bring your Papa in, Legs.”

He met Thran in the kitchen to give him a welcome home kiss and a pat on the back. “How’d it go today, angel?”

Thran returned Bard’s affectionate kiss, then grinned. “I threw the tantrum you recommended. It was most instructive.”

Bard blinked. “You did? Gods, that must have caused a flurry. Did you get to dance at least?”

“I did,” Thran nodded, his satisfaction evident in his triumphant smile and erect carriage. “Ori thought your idea was excellent, and offered many good suggestions so that I crafted it perfectly. So I danced more today than I have in several days. We make good progress.”

“I want to hear all about it,” Bard nodded. “Why don’t you go in and say hi to Legolas and Bain, and then put on something more comfortable while I get your supper? It’s chicken soup, of course, but the boys did leave you a few of the biscuits.”
“Mmm, biscuits,” Thran hummed. He gave Bard a frown of surprise. “Where are the girls?”

“Both down for the count with the same stuff that got Legolas. I’ll tell you about it over your soup.”

“All right,” Thran agreed, and went into the sitting room to greet the boys. Bard busied himself with Thran’s supper, but didn’t fill the soup bowl until Thran came in clad in his comfortable leggings, socks, and tee.

“It smells wonderful,” Thran said as Bard handed him the filled bowl. He leaned over it to take another deep sniff. “I am very hungry. Is there more? I think I will need two bowls.”

“There’s plenty,” Bard assured him. “You must’ve danced up a storm today, if you’re that hungry.”

Thran gave him a resigned sigh as he sat down. “I did dance a great deal, yes. But I must also confess that I did not get to eat all of my lunch today. The chicken, yes. The vegetables, yes. Even the cookie, yes. But the rice? No. Tomorrow, I will bring things that I can eat with only one hand, that do not need to be heated up. Although perhaps today the circumstances were not normal. Rada had the costume for the scene where Death confesses his love for the Maid…”

Bard listened to Thran’s description of the day’s events. Rada’s costume sounded amazing, and to hear Thran describe how wearing the costume helped him refine his dancing made Bard itch to sketch him in it.

“Rúmil, Rada, and Ori have scheduled a photo shoot for me, Charisse, and Luka next Tuesday,” Thran divulged, helping himself to a biscuit. “You are more than welcome to come and sketch all you want.”

“The painters are coming Monday, so I’ll probably need to be here,” Bard said regretfully. “There might still be a child or two in the ward, too.”

He told Thran about Tilda and Sigrid, and how upset their oldest child was. Thran winced in sympathy. “La pauvre petite. Let us hope she sleeps away much of her cold, so that she can at least make her debut Saturday as the barista.”

“If she wakes up with a fever tomorrow, I’ll insist that she call the owner to explain. I don’t want her to infect any customers, and she needs to allow the owner time to get a replacement.”

“Sadly necessary, but courteous,” Thran called it. He got up to refill his soup bowl and returned to the table. “Legolas said that you painted the solarium wall this morning, so I went to look before I went upstairs. It is amazing – in the lantern light, it looks like a smooth stone wall.”

“Just the fountain left,” Bard said. “It’s my last act as your general contractor. After that, I’m a full-time artist who does home repairs on the weekends.”

Thran paused in his single-minded consumption of soup to offer him a surprised look. “That is true. In December, I asked you for six months to act as general contractor, and so you have done.” He looked around the kitchen, and smiled. “It has gone by so fast. And look at the beautiful home you have made for us, lyubov moya. There is none finer.”

Bard’s grin was pleased. “It turned out well. Guess you got lucky and hired the right man.”

Thran snickered. “I did. I hired another right man this morning – a right hand man. Ori. We have particulars to work out, but he accepted.”

“That’s great, angel. Ori’s a gem, and then some. I had a conversation with a gem today, too. I sent sketches to Hal of his tree, and he’s already come back with an okay for me to start on the model. Time for me to hit the aquarium store.”

Thran gave him another surprised look. “That is a store that sells fish, yes? Pet fish?”

“Exactly right. They also sell everything you need for aquariums – tanks, pumps, models of sunken ships, and so forth. A lot of people don’t want models of sunken ships; they want rocks. If they have a big tank, they want big rocks. So I’ll see if they have something I can use for the base of Hal’s tree.”

Thran took a warm biscuit to butter. “How big of a rock do you need?”

“A pretty big one. Hal says he wants the whole thing to be eighteen to twenty-four inches high. Not only do I need a big rock to balance the tree, but I need a big rock to anchor the whole thing so it doesn’t topple over.”

“That is a big rock,” Thran murmured dubiously as he nibbled at his biscuit.

“A few pounds worth, yes. Hal was very specific that it had to be white quartz, too. I don’t know how easy that will be to find. I might have to talk to a mineral shop, if I can find one. Or maybe I’ll just have to find someplace where it occurs naturally, and ask the landowner if I can do a little collecting.”

Thran gazed at him in fascination. “What would you do? Go out with a pick or chisel or some such thing? Perhaps with a mule, like Humphrey Bogart in that old film, The Treasure of Sierra Madre?”

Bard laughed. “Was there a mule in that film? I don’t remember. But no; no mule, no pick, no chisel. A chiseled rock wouldn’t look right – the face that got chiseled would show the tool marks, and likely the color would be different from the other faces. So keep your fingers crossed that I find something at the aquarium store that Hal’s okay with, or he agrees to a smaller piece.”

Thran hummed as he munched another bit of biscuit. “Oh, before I forget, I want to tell you that Círdan has begun set construction at the Imladris Academy. The students are most enthusiastic, and Círdan says that enough of the construction will be complete that we can dance safely in a week. So we will begin our rehearsals there in the afternoon and evenings. It will be good to work on the stage where we will perform, but unfortunately it will put me on a different schedule than the rest of our family, at least until the school year ends.”

“That’s only four weeks,” Bard replied, getting up to refill his teacup. “Maybe not too bad, depending on what time you and the company will start your day.”

“We have permission to enter the school at noon, so that the interns will have their last class of the day with us, and then the time where our children are in sport, the interns will be with us as well. The dancers will do our barre at noon, so as to be ready to dance at one-thirty. Then we may run until eleven.”

Bard considered. “That’s a big difference, but we’ll sort it out. The only time you’ll have to eat a substantial meal is in the morning, so I could make you a big breakfast. Then we’ll pack you stuff to nibble in the afternoon and evening. It’s up to you how much you want to eat when you get home, but once you decide, I’ll have it ready.”

Thran took his last bite of his biscuit. “I regret that much of the morning flurry to get the children to school may fall upon you, so I will not have you stay up late to make a meal for me. I know how to make eggs, and if I am hungry, they are good for a late night meal. You are a working artist now, and you must focus on those now, not eggs for a night owl dancer.”

“We’ll find a rhythm, one way or another,” Bard shrugged. “As long as we remember to have a moment for each other now and again, and see to the children.”

Thran’s nod was firm. “No more out of harmony. We have both learned our lesson.”

“Gods, yes.” Bard got up to refill his teacup again. “Are you ready for afters? Tea and either brownies or applesauce raisin cake.”

“Tea, yes. And the raisin cake.” Thran got up to carry his dishes to the sink.

“Spice tea?”

“Perfect.” Thran washed off his dishes and put them into the dishwasher while Bard made his tea. The cake was on the counter, so Thran sliced a small square and put it on a plate. He couldn’t resist taking a bite of it as he stood at the kitchen island. “Mmm. I do not understand the boys. They think this needs a thick layer of icing to be good. I think it is good all by itself.”

“They’re lads. They need rocket fuel,” Bard snickered, putting Thran’s cup of tea by his hand. “Speaking of which, I wanted to check Legolas’s temperature. If it’s still down, he can go to school tomorrow. If not, he’s in for another day.”

Thran sipped his tea. “I will get the thermometer.”

“No need.” Bard reached into his shirt pocket and pulled it out. “It’s gotten a workout this afternoon. It’s clean and ready for the next examination.”

Thran beckoned for it, examining it as he sipped his tea. “Ah. Once for on, once again for off. Under the tongue and wait for the beep, yes?”

“You’re an expert.”

Thran rolled his eyes. “Hardly. But I improve.”

He put the last small bite of cake in his mouth, put his plate in the dishwasher, then carried the thermometer into the sitting room. “Legolas, it is time for the temperature check. How do you feel?”

“A little dizzy,” he said reluctantly, smothering a cough as he took the thermometer from his father. He put the device under his tongue. In a few seconds, it beeped, and he took it out. The grimace on his face confirmed the result, but Bard peered around Thran’s shoulder to look at it anyway. Legolas still had a just under a degree of fever.

“Then you’re in tomorrow,” Bard exhaled.

“That’s what I expected,” Legolas sank back into the pillows with a disappointed expression, and coughed again. “But I wish I’d been wrong.”

“Since you will be home tomorrow, if you want to put aside your books now, you may,” Thran said. “It is more important that you rest.”

“I’m through most of it, all but the writing assignment in English, and another one in French. I’d like to put those off. It’s hard to think in any language right now.”

“Wish I had an excuse to do that, too,” Bain sighed from the other sofa. “I know, I know – I don’t. So I’ll plug away just like always.”
“Good lad,” Bard offered his son in encouragement. “Looks like you’ll be Clan Ffyrnig’s lone representative at school tomorrow, boyo. So make sure everything’s done.”

“I’m working on it,” Bain promised. “I don’t like it, but I’m doing it.”

“When I finish this set of problems, I’ll get into bed,” Legolas said. “I haven’t been up for very long, but I’m really tired.”

“The effect of the germs,” Thran agreed. “As Bard says, rest is the most important thing. Do not worry about the shower. Stay warm in bed.”

“Yes, Papa,” Legolas agreed. His eyes widened, and he frantically groped for his box of tissues. He managed to grab one before he erupted into a terrific sneeze.

“That’ll be Clan Ffyrnig’s tribal call this weekend. The sloppy sneeze.” Bard shook his head in commiseration and gave Thran a glance. “I think I’ll check on the girls, then get a shower. I want to go to bed early tonight. Unless I miss my guess, we’ll have a few children wake up in the middle of the night because they’ve got clogged sinuses, feverish brows, or chills.”

“And Doctor Da will be there for the rescue,” Thran surmised. “Since every superhero needs a Boy Wonder sidekick, that will be my role. Nurse Ada.”

“I’ll marshal the meds to get us through the night. I hope everyone will be good with bed rest and such tomorrow. If we need more than that, I’ll call Rosie for a recommendation for a pediatrician.”

Thran smiled in triumph. “I did that. Remember when I said I would get our health insurance in order? So I did, and I called Rosie as you planned to. The children are already set up with the doctor she recommended. It is a whole practice, with several doctors, so no matter when we call, someone will be there to help us. I liked that. I set you and me up with a different practice, so we are prepared, too.”

“That’s great, angel,” Bard beamed. “Thanks for seeing to that for us all. I should have seen to it weeks ago. We’ve been lucky not to need one.”

“I hope we still do not. But in case, we are ready.”

“I’m ready for bed,” Legolas moaned, rubbing his nose. “Oh, this is so annoying! My nose itches and it’s clogged and runny at the same time, and I can’t stop coughing, and it’s all going to drive me crazy!”

“Upstairs with you, then,” Thran urged. “I will help you settle while Bard looks through our medicines.”

They left Bain to work on his homework while Thran took Legolas upstairs and Bard sorted through their stock of remedies. After some debate, he and Thran decided on more acetaminophen, a decongestant, and a cough lozenge.

Thran stayed with Legolas while Bard looked in on the girls – both still slept soundly – and then headed for the shower. As soon as Bain finished his homework, Bard would get into bed and rest while he could. The night shift would start before long.
Chapter 118

Chapter Summary

A saint offers comfort to a host of ailing cherubs, and an angel contemplates the nature of his saint's heart.

Chapter Notes

I don't own rights to any part of the Star Trek universe. It's a fun one to visit, though :-)

I don't own rights to any part of WALL-E, either, especially their cockroach :-)

The first ailing child woke at one-thirty. Bard had left the bedroom doors ajar so he’d hear anyone get up, so he was instantly awake as soon as Sigrid’s door creaked open. He’d have to oil the hinges in the morning. Thran lay asleep beside him, so he got stealthily out of bed, pulled his tee and sleep pants on as silently as possible, and padded out onto the landing. Sigrid shuffled out of the bathroom.

“How’re you doing, sweetness?” he asked softly.

“Sucky,” she sniffled. “I don’t think I have a fever, but I’m really clogged.”

“Come on,” he beckoned her back into the children’s bathroom. “Let’s see.”

Sigrid followed him in without comment. She was right; the thermometer showed her temperature was normal, but her nose streamed steadily. Bard doled out a dose of decongestant, which she downed, and she agreed to a shot of nasal spray.

“I’ll get you a cup of tea,” Bard offered as he wiped the spray bottle with alcohol, but Sigrid shook her head.

“No, Da; I’m fine without it. I want to go back to bed to knock this stuff out as fast as I can. And you know that Tilda will be up soon. Colds always hit her hard.”

“They do,” Bard agreed. Tilda rarely got sick, but when she did, she took a long time to recover. “All right, sweetness. Hope you get back to sleep quickly.”

He leaned over to brush a kiss on her hair, but Sigrid held him off. “Da, no! I don’t want you to get sick, too! You’re the glue that holds everything together around here, not that Thran doesn’t do stuff, but he’s got to stay healthy for his ballet. So go back to sleep while you can. I’ll be fine.”

Bard tugged a bit of her hair as he grinned. “Thanks for looking out for me, too, sweetness. See you in the morning. Sleep as long as you can.”

“Okay, Da. Night.”

“Night.”
Bard saw Sigrid back to her room, then eased back into bed. Thran didn’t stir, so he breathed a sigh of relief. He shut his eyes, then willed himself back to sleep.

The second ailing child woke up at two-thirty. Bard recognized the familiar liquid coughing that was Tilda’s usual response to a cold. He hadn’t bothered to take off his tee or sleep pants after he’d seen to Sigrid, so he rolled out of bed again, and slipped into Tilda’s room. The little girl was half asleep, but her breathing was raspy, punctuated with congested coughs. Before she woke completely, he retrieved the box of tissues that had fallen on the floor.

“Da....” Tilda wavered between crying and coughing.

Bard sat beside her. “Right here, little doll. You’re very clogged, aren’t you? Come on, sit up a bit, and we’ll take care of things.”

Tilda’s reply was an inarticulate moan as she came into Bard’s arms like a limp puppy. He mopped up her streaming nose, then got her to blow it – that was a messy three-tissue job. Her forehead was hot, so there was no point in trying to take her temperature; she couldn’t breathe well enough for him to get a good reading, anyway. He carried her into the bathroom to manage the essentials, then gave her both a decongestant and acetaminophen to swallow with a cup of water, which she managed without too much trouble. She even managed to let Bard give her a couple of squirts of the nasal spray – something she normally hated, so she must be terribly clogged to endure it willingly.

“My throat burns and my ear hurts,” she whimpered as Bard picked her up. She pressed the side of her head to Bard’s chest. “And I can’t breathe!”

“I know, little doll. I know,” Bard crooned, rubbing her back. He grabbed the tube of mentholated chest rub and a cough lozenge, and carried her back to her room. “I’ve got your favorite medicine, through. You know that’ll help you get unclogged.”

“The rub stuff?” Tilda said, relaxing a bit against Bard’s chest.

“The rub stuff.”

She sighed. “I like the way it smells.”

“I know you do. So let’s rub a little on your chest and throat. I’ve got a cough lozenge for you, too, so you’ll feel better soon.”

“Okay,” Tilda coughed. Bard unwrapped the lozenge for her, then smeared a fingerful of the mentholated cream over the top of her chest and her throat. Then he wrapped her in a blanket and sat in the rocking chair with her in his arms to comfort her until she eased. Gradually, her wheezing and coughing eased as the medicines did their work. The familiar pungent smell of mentholated rub permeated the air, which made Bard smile as he shut his eyes and rocked Tilda. The stuff wasn’t quite eye-watering, but it certainly was a sinus-clearer. May it work as well on Tilda as it did on him! He hummed a bit of an old air his mother had sung when he’d been a small lad with a cold, but softly, so as not to wake anyone else.

“A little better?” he murmured, when Tilda’s breathing sounded easier.

The little girl nodded sleepily. “My cough lozenge is gone.”

“Okay. Let’s get you back into bed, little doll. Sleep’s the best thing for you.”

Tilda’s assent was an inarticulate mumble, so Bard carried her to bed and tucked her in with Mr. Bun and Nelephant on either side. She snuggled in with a sigh, so Bard sat beside her until she fell asleep.
He eased out, ducked into the children’s bathroom to reorder his medicines, wash his hands, and clean the nasal spray bottle. Then he tiptoed back to bed.

“Tilda?” a sleepy voice queried as he crawled between the sheets.

“Yes.”

“What is that smell?”

Bard grinned in the dark. “Mentholated rub. Tilda swears by it.”

A hum. “It is very pungent.”

Bard snickered. “It is. That’s part of its charm.”

A cough – Legolas this time. Bard snuck a look at his clock radio, which read three-thirty. Right on schedule. He lay quietly with his eyes shut, waiting to see if Legolas quieted, or if his cough worsened. As he expected, the boy went into a coughing jag. He sat up again, but Thran’s hand fell on his arm.

“I will see to him, Bard.”

“It’s okay, angel. I don’t mind.”

“You have been up twice already. I can do my part.”

“Of course you can. But I’m already dressed, so it’s okay.”

Thran leaned over the edge of the bed to get his shirt and leggings. “You are a good father, lyubov moya. Let me be one, too.”

“Okay. Everything’s in the children’s bathroom. The nasal spray’s clean.”

“Clean?” Thran looked back at him from the bedroom door.

“Sigrid and Tilda both needed some. I wiped the bottle down with alcohol after each of them used it so it’d be ready for the next victim.”

“Ah. Sensible. I will follow your precedent.”

Thran disappeared. Bard lay still with his eyes shut, but wasn’t surprised when he couldn’t go back to sleep. He was too intent on listening for whatever went on in Legolas’s room. Yes, there were the soft footsteps to the bathroom, and a nasty string of wracking coughs. The turn of the faucet to fill the drinking cup meant medicine – with any luck, decongestant instead of fever reducer. Low voices, the snuffling of Legolas blowing his nose not once, but twice, then the sniffs that meant nasal spray. The faint rustle of the wrapper around a cough lozenge. Gradually, the deep, throaty coughs slowed, calmed, subsided. Footsteps shuffled from the bathroom back to Legolas’s room. Several minutes passed of mostly silence, broken only with the occasional murmur of voices, so low that Bard hazed towards sleep. He roused again when Thran came back to bed.

“How’s the lad?” he mumbled as Thran snuggled into his pillow.

“No fever, but so much congestion,” Thran murmured. “I gave him the decongestant and the spray and the cough drop. His nose is very sore after so many tissues, so I put coconut oil on it.”

“What, no pungent rub?” Bard smiled in the dark.
A soft chuckle. “He put it on by himself. So the whole house will smell of it very soon.”

“Maybe it’ll chase a few germs away,” Bard said.

“Hmm. Go back to sleep while you can, lyubov moya.”

Bard went.

* * *

Thran was vaguely aware of Bard stirring beside him once more during the night, but he fell back asleep before Bard came back to bed. When he roused, he found it was seven o’clock, and the bed was cold beside him. Had Bard never gotten back to bed, then? He shoved back the covers, hurried into the bathroom, then yanked on his clothes to hurry downstairs.

The teakettle was hot, porridge was on the stove, and an empty bread bag lay on the kitchen counter, so Bard had gotten Bain off to school with his usual hot breakfast and bag lunch. It was past the time that Bard would be out to see Bain to the bus stop, so he looked in the sitting room. There sat Bard, leaning against the back of the sofa with his eyes closed. Tilda lay on the rest of the sofa, bundled in a blanket. Her dark hair straggled over the pillow, and her eyes were closed, but her eye sockets were dark and the rest of her face was pale. Still sick, then.

Bard opened his eyes, found Thran’s, and blinked sleepily. He glanced at Tilda, then eased off the sofa to draw Thran into the kitchen.

“How is she?”

“Reacting as she usually does, poor mite. She’s not often sick, but when she is, she goes right to bronchitis or something worse. Her ears hurt because they’re clogged, too. Do you have the name of the pediatrician? As soon as the doctor’s office opens, I’ll call to make an appointment for her. I’ll need an ID card for the medical insurance, too.”

“I have both,” Thran assured him. “I will get them right now.”

He fetched his laptop, printed the card that Bard needed, and wrote down the name and address of the children’s doctor. Bard called the doctor now on the off chance that someone would pick up, but he got the off hours recording.

“I can call back at seven-thirty,” he told Thran as he disconnected the call. “I’ll do that right on the button, because I’ll bet we’re not the only family who wants to bring a child in today.”

Thran hummed. “What time did you get up with her again?”

Bard rubbed the back of his head. “Probably around five. She was miserable with all the coughing and her ears, so I just brought her down here so we wouldn’t wake up everyone else, and I could watch over her while I got Bain ready for school.”

“And how is Bain?”

Bard snorted. “Healthy as a horse. I can count on one hand the number of times he’s been sick in his life. He must have the immune system of a cockroach.”
Thran gave his husband a skeptical look. “A cockroach?”

“Nothing kills a cockroach,” Bard shrugged. “I read once that they’ll rule the planet long after we’re gone. Just like the little guy in WALL-E.”

“Ah, at last a film I have seen! Legolas likes that one,” Thran grinned. “Have you eaten?”

Bard cast a look back at their youngest child, then shook his head. “Do you want to eat now, or are you going to do your barre here?”

“I will do my barre here, because I want to know when you will take Tilda to the doctor. I will see to the other children until you come back.”

Bard didn’t argue, merely nodded. That wasn’t like him, but of course it wouldn’t be – Bard had gotten perhaps two hours of sleep all night, and he was too intent on Tilda to think about much else, including his breakfast.

“You have a few minutes before you can call the doctor, lyubov moya. I will watch our Kukla while you eat. You are tired and hungry, and you cannot see to her as well as you usually do in such a state.”

Bard’s eyes sharpened on his. Ah, that was the best way to get Bard to see to himself – tie it to how well he could look after his children. It was such an obvious ploy – why hadn’t he thought of it before? No matter. He’d thought about it now, and now he had it to use another day.

“Go,” Thran pushed Bard into the kitchen. “Porridge, eggs, whatever you like. I will call you if your little doll needs you.”

He got a reluctant smile, but Bard got out a bowl and spoon. “Thank you, angel.”

Thran sat himself on the sofa opposite Tilda, but the little girl didn’t stir. She probably hadn’t slept much last night, either. Bard padded in with a large mug of tea and a bowl of porridge, which he sat down on the table before Thran.

He returned to the kitchen to fetch another bowl and mug, then came back to sit next to Thran while he ate his porridge. He ate it absent-mindedly, though whether it was weariness or preoccupation with his daughter’s illness that distracted him wasn’t clear. Thran nudged him with his shoulder.

“She will be all right, lyubov moya.”

Bard’s expression was startled. “What? Oh, I know she will.”

“Then what preoccupies you so?”

Bard hand came to rest on Thran’s thigh. “I’m just... appreciating things. I don’t have to scrabble because the children are sick. I don’t have to dump them in a sick children’s clinic until I get off my shift. I won’t lose my job if I stay home with them. It’s... a big relief.”

Thran looped one arm around Bard’s shoulders and brushed a kiss on Bard’s hair. “I do not have to dump Legolas in a boarding school, or worry about him in the infirmary when he is sick. That is a big relief to me, too.”

“We both have a stable family life now, thanks to a certain angelic dancer.”
“And a certain hunky welder.”

“Angel –”

“Hush. I speak no less truth than you do.”

Bard’s cheeks tinged with a faint pink, and his smile was the same sheepish one he’d revealed when he told Thran about the flirty paint department clerk at the homeowners’ mecca. Such a modest man, uncomfortable with compliments! Would there ever be words to convince Bard of how much he brought to his family? Perhaps not. That was the only downside to his modesty. Fortunately, Bard didn’t try to refute Thran’s sentiments, but only offered an appreciative smile as he resumed his breakfast. Thran finished his porridge, and savored the warmth of his tea mug in his hands. Bard spooned up his last bit of porridge, then glanced at his mobile.

“Seven-thirty. I can call the doctor’s office now.”

“Go,” Thran urged. “I will sit here with the small one.”

Bard nodded agreement, then went into the kitchen to find the paper Thran had given him with the doctor’s number on it. Thran heard the small beeps that were Bard typing the number on his mobile; in a few seconds, Bard stuck his head into the sitting room.

“I’m in the queue,” he said.

Thran lifted a hand in acknowledgement, then contented himself with quietly sipping his tea as he watched over Tilda. She still slept without disturbance, though her breathing was congested. Ten minutes later, Bard’s low murmur revealed that he’d reached someone in the doctor’s office. He heard “bronchitis,” and “ear infection,” and “possible strep throat.” Thran winced at that last one; strep throat was painful and contagious. After few more murmurs, Bard returned to the sitting room.

“I can take her in at nine. That’s good. I worried that I wouldn’t get her in to see anyone until late this afternoon.”

“I will call Lettie to tell her that I will be in as soon as you are home from the doctor with Tilda.”

“I hope we won’t have to wait long when we get there. I asked if I needed to fill out paperwork, and could come in early for that if it’d help. Of course, there is always paperwork, so I’ll leave here about eight-fifteen.”

“Then take a brief nap, Bard. You did not sleep most of the night, and even a short nap will help. I will wake you up in time.”

“I need to get Til dressed, and I want to look in on the other children.”

“Why make Tilda get dressed? She is in her pajamas, so she needs only socks and shoes and sweater. I can look in on Sigrid and Legolas while you nap. Please, lyubov moya. You must be tired.”

“It goes with the job,” Bard protested. “I’m fine.”

“You are,” Thran nodded. “And you are tired, too. Now, lie here and shut your eyes. I insist. I will wake you in half an hour.”

“All right, all right,” Bard conceded. “Just look in on Sig and Legs, okay? I’d rather know that neither of them need to see a doctor before I take Tilda.”
“I will. So rest. What the popular adage? Do not make me come down there?”

“That doesn’t apply to you. You’ve already descended from heaven, so you can’t go any lower. Except as Lord of the Underworld, which doesn’t count here.”

“Tcha. You waste valuable time, my saint,” Thran chided, but with a smile. “Go to sleep.”

He got up and urged Bard flat, even unfolding the wool throw over him. Bard mugged an embarrassed roll of the eyes, but didn’t argue. Thran went upstairs to check on Legolas and Sigrid; both were still asleep. He dressed in his dancewear, then called Lettie to explain about Bard’s trip to the doctor. Before he went downstairs, he rummaged through Tilda’s room for socks, shoes, and sweater, so that he could let Bard sleep as long as possible.

Ah, that was a revelation – Tilda’s clothes were few, and worn. Thran detoured into Bain’s room to do a similar search of closet and dresser drawers, which told the same story. Sigrid’s things were likely in no better state. He and Bard must remedy that as soon as everyone was healthy again. It would take delicate handling so that Bard didn’t feel ashamed of his inability to provide many clothes for his children. He had no reason to feel that way – almost daily, Thran found a new reason to marvel at his husband’s resourcefulness to make do as well as he had. All the skills he’d learned – cooking, all the tasks of renovation, and welding, in addition to his artwork and parenting – showed how hard he worked.

Thran considered as he returned to Tilda’s room to collect a pair of socks, her trainers, and her favorite green sweater. He would frame their shopping trip as a celebration for both of them working –

No, no, no – that would only draw attention to exactly what Thran didn’t want to draw attention to, that Bard’s marriage to Thran meant clothes for the children, and his previous single-parenthood didn’t. The most obvious approach was to say that everyone had grown out of their old things, and needed bigger things. They would not shop at the most expensive shops, but better ones than the second hand places that Bard had had to frequent before. To treat this as a regular, normal chore without regard to previous hardships would be the best way to proceed.

He came downstairs to retrieve his mobile from the kitchen. He still had twenty-five minutes before he had to wake Bard. He stuck his head into the sitting room – yes, Bard had dropped off – then padded to the ballroom. He set an alarm on his mobile to alert him as to when he should rouse Bard, then gave himself to the first warming stretches of the morning. He limbered and warmed until the alarm chimed softly, then went to wake Bard.

His husband opened his eyes as soon as Thran touched his leg. “Is it time?”

Thran nodded. “Five after eight. I have Tilda’s things, so you have only to dress yourself.”

“Thanks, angel. I’ll get my jeans and shoes, and be back down.”

“I will sit with her.”

Bard headed upstairs. Tilda still slept, so Thran sat on the end of the sofa, and unwound the bottom of her blanket to find her bare feet. He was awkward, but he managed to get her socks on before she roused.

“Da?” she said in a very congested voice.

“Ada is here, Kukla,” he replied. “I put on your socks, and now I put on your shoes for you. Your Da will be back in a moment. He takes you to the doctor to see about your cold. Can you roll over so “I can do your shoes?”

“Okay.” she sniffled, and edged over onto her back. She opened her eyes to regard him in confusion. “I’m going to a doctor?”

“You are. You will feel better soon.”

“Not the clinic?”

“No, Kukla. This is a new doctor.”

“No, Ada, we have to use the clinic,” she mumbled. “A doctor is too much money. Sigrid said so.”

A hard, angry lump rose in Thran’s throat, but he forced it down. “We have enough money, Kukla. And medical insurance.”

“What’s insurance?”

“It means we can see a doctor whenever we need to, not the free clinic. Do not worry.”

“Okay,” she breathed, and shut her eyes again.

Thran eased her shoes on and tied the laces, glad that he didn’t have to say anything. Suka blyad, when even a ten-year-old worried about the cost to see a doctor... “Kukla, can I help you to sit up? I have your favorite green sweater to keep you warm while you see the doctor.”

Tilda pushed herself up, grimacing. “I’m dizzy.”

“I know, Kukla.” Thran got her arms into the sweater. “There, you can lie down again, until your Da comes down. Just rest.”

Bard came in, dressed in jeans and tee, a hoodie over his shoulder. “Little doll? How are you doing?”

“I feel dizzy and my throat hurts and my ear hurts and I’m stuffed up. Ada put on my socks and shoes and sweater. He said we’re going to a doctor.”

“That’s right, little doll. I want to make sure you don’t have bronchitis or strep throat or an ear infection.”

“I hope not. They’re all yucky.”

“Very. Okay, let’s get you into the truck.”

Thran moved out of the way so that Bard could pick up his daughter. As Tilda snuggled into his arms, Bard gave Thran a reassuring smile. “Thanks, angel. I’ll be back as soon as I can.”

“Take the time Tilda needs. If you must stop on the way home for medicine, do so. I set up our information at the pharmacy in town, the one next to the bagel shop. I will see to the sleepy ones.”

“Do your barre, at least,” Bard urged as he carried Tilda towards the mudroom door.

“I will,” Thran assured him. “First, I will open the carriage house door for you.”

He slipped on his trainers, and saw Bard and Tilda safely into the truck. Once Bard drove out into the driveway, Thran locked the carriage house door and came to Bard’s window.
“Good luck,” he wished his husband. “I will see you soon.”

“Before too long, I hope. Hold down the fort.”

Thran grinned. “I will.”

Bard offered him a smile, then headed off. Thran walked slowly back to the house, which was uncharacteristically still and silent. He made the most of the quiet, and went into the ballroom to resume his barre.

He had much to think about.

* * *

Bard drove silently, casting an occasional glance at Tilda as he navigated through the early morning traffic to the doctor’s office. The little girl looked straight ahead through bleary eyes for a few seconds, then shut her eyes. Despite her ailment, Bard felt more relief than anything else. He was on his way to a children’s specialist, not an overworked, general clinic physician’s assistant. He wasn’t about to lose his job. He had the wherewithal to pay for medicine if Tilda needed it without worrying if his family would have to do without something else. It was almost surreal, this descent into plenty.

Maybe he was asleep and dreaming. Gods, what if he were, and what if he woke up to find out doctors, insurance, houses, angels, commissions were only the yearnings of a tired brain?

“I’m awake,” he murmured firmly, pinching the skin on his wrist hard when he stopped at a traffic light. “I am awake.”

“What, Da?” Tilda murmured.

“We’re almost at the doctor’s office, that’s all,” he soothed.

“Okay.”

Bard pulled into the hospital parking lot, found the office building next to the main hospital, and parked. He gathered Tilda into his arms, and carried her inside. Up the elevator to the third floor, down the hall, into the reception area. He spoke to the receptionist, settled Tilda in a chair, and settled himself beside her to fill out the expected paperwork. Once that was done, Tilda crawled into his arms to press her aching ear against his chest. They were not the only people in the waiting area; from the sounds of the other children, the doctors would be busy today dealing with the same stuff that Tilda had.

When their turn came, he carried her to the examination room, where a smiling physician’s assistant took stock of Tilda’s symptoms, and left them to wait for the doctor. Tilda immediately climbed down off the examination table to crawl back onto Bard’s lap. In a few minutes, the doctor came in.

“Hi, I’m Doctor Firenze,” the middle-aged woman greeted them. “Hello, Mr. Bowman; hello, Tilda. You’re under the weather, aren’t you?”

Tilda nodded, but didn’t say anything or move.

“I’m sure you’d rather sit with your father, but it’d be a big help if you’d sit on my table here, so I can take a look at you.”

“Her ear hurts,” he explained. “It feels better when she presses it against my chest.”

“Because it’s warm there,” Dr. Firenze nodded understandingly. “Let’s take a look, Tilda, so we can help you feel better.”

“Okay,” she agreed, and Bard set her back on the examination table. She grimaced as the doctor took a look in her ear. “Oooh, that hurts!”

“I’m sorry, sweetie,” the doctor said. “I’ll try to be quick, but I need to take a look in both your ears. Yes, I’m sure this one does hurt. You’ve got a nice collection of bacteria in there. Let’s look down your throat, too.”

The doctor took a look at Tilda’s throat, then her nose and eyes. A careful probing of neck glands followed, and a listen to Tilda’s heart and lungs. A gentle feel of abdomen and ribs. An assistant whisked away a quick swab of the throat to check for strep throat. The doctor stepped out to see other patients for the twenty minutes it took for the culture to complete, then was back.

“The good news is that you don’t have strep throat, Tilda,” Dr. Firenze informed her and Bard. “You do have a nasty touch of the flu, but it’s not bronchitis, which is also good. Your Da knows that the flu and bronchitis are viral infections, not bacterial ones, so you just have to wait those out – antibiotics don’t work on them. You also have an ear infection, which is a bacterial problem, so I’ll write you a prescription to help you get rid of that. Make sure you take all of the medicine the way your father tells you. And I’ll bet you know what to do to keep the flu from turning into bronchitis, right?”

Tilda nodded. “Da’s chicken soup, hot tea, and a lot of tissues. And lots of hand washing. And rest. Books, not video games.”

Dr. Firenze chuckled. “Da’s trained you well, I see. You already know how to be a good patient.”

Tilda nodded. “The soup is the best part.”

“I’ll bet it is.” Dr. Firenze glanced at Tilda’s chart, then at Bard. “Any other children, Mr. Bowman?”

“Three,” Bard said. “My other daughter’s sixteen, my oldest son is fourteen, and my youngest son is thirteen. The two older ones have a milder version of what Tilda has; they’re at home with my husband. The younger boy’s generally got the constitution of an ox, so he’s at school.”

“You know the routine about washing hands four ways ‘til Sunday, and not sharing drinking glasses, then,” Dr. Firenze nodded.

“Absolutely,” Bard nodded.

“Good. What pharmacy do you use? I’ll send off a prescription to address the ear infection, so it’ll be ready for you to pick up when you head home.”

“Is it that weird pink stuff?” Tilda piped up.

Dr. Firenze’s hand hovered over her tablet. “It is.”

“Are there some pills instead, please? I hate that pink stuff.”
“Absolutely, there are pills. Most children don’t like pills, or they can’t swallow them.”

“Tilda’s a champion pill swallower,” Bard supplied. “I don’t blame her. That pink stuff is nasty.”

“It is,” Dr. Firenze gave a theatrical shudder. “All right Tilda, pills it is. All I need is the name of your pharmacy.”

Bard supplied the name of the pharmacy, which Dr. Firenze tapped into her medical tablet. “All right, it’s there now; I’ve gotten an acknowledgement back. It’ll say on the label, Mr. Bowman, but I just want to make sure you understand that you’ll have to cut the pills in half. There’s not much call for pills for children because they have trouble swallowing them, so most come only in adult doses. Tilda needs only half a pill for each dosage. Make sure you do that, all right?”

“I will,” Bard nodded. “I appreciate you pointing that out.”

“It was nice to meet you, Tilda, and you, too, Mr. Bowman. I hope you’ll be on the mend very soon.”

“Me, too,” Tilda replied. “Thank you.”

“You’re very welcome. Enjoy your chicken soup.”

Bard shepherded Tilda out of the examination room to the checkout desk, where he got his receipt. He pulled out his wallet, expecting at least a copay to be due, but the administrator explained that the HMO that provided their coverage had a variable copay, depending on services rendered and deductibles and so forth. What that meant was that the doctor’s office staff would resolve things with the insurance company, then send Bard a bill for the remainder.

He carried Tilda back to the truck still bemused. He’d taken a child to a doctor and hadn’t had to pay cash up front. What a strange experience...

When he got to the pharmacy, he was happy to find the he didn’t have to wait long to collect Tilda’s medicine. It was a generic form of a common antibiotic, and the cost was minimal. Bard paid for the medicine, and got Tilda back in the truck for the brief ride home. By the time he carried her inside, she was wilting. He read the instructions for the medicine – half a pill, three times a day, for ten days.

“Okay, little doll, let’s get you some water for your first pill, and then you can go to bed for a nice long nap.” Bard filled a glass of water, and tapped out one of the pills. He got the cutting board and carefully chopped the pill in half, handing her one piece. “Down the hatch.”

“It’s down,” Tilda confirmed. “Though it wasn’t very easy to swallow. My throat is sore.”

“You’ll be uncomfortable for a few days more,” Bard nodded. “That’s good incentive for lots of naps, though. The more naps, the faster you’ll feel better.”

Thran came in from the ballroom. “Hello, Kukla. How did you fare with the doctor?”

“Okay,” Tilda graved.

“No strep, no bronchitis, just a touch of flu and an ear infection,” Bard translated. He held up the plastic bottle of pills to show Thran, then put it in the kitchen cabinet with the glassware. “She has medicine to take. And naps to take, too, right?”

“I’m glad I have to take naps because I really want to take one right now,” Tilda sniffled. “I’m tired again.”
“Do you want anything to eat first?” Bard asked.

Tilda shook her head. “I’m too tired to eat now.”

“Upstairs, then,” Bard urged. “I’ll bet Mr. Bun is already waiting for you.”

“Come with me,” she pulled on his arm.

Bard gave Thran a look. “I’ll be right down, angel, unless you have to leave right this moment.”

“See to Kukla. I will be here.”

“Thanks.”

“Bye, Ada,” Tilda grumbled, which drew a sympathetic smile from Thran.

Bard let Tilda pull him upstairs. She didn’t take long to settle, and was asleep almost before her head touched the pillow. He stuck his head in Legolas’s room, then Sigrid’s; both children were still asleep. It was almost ten o’clock, so likely neither had gotten up yet. Thran confirmed that when Bard came back down to the kitchen.

“That’s good. They’re both sleeping. I hope you had time to do your barre.”

“I did. How was the doctor? A good one, I hope?”

“I liked her, and Tilda did, too. Dr. Firenze. Pleasant, and very thorough. The thing I liked the best is that she talked to Tilda, not just to me. And before I forget, just so you know, those pills are an adult dosage because most children don’t want pills. They want that nasty pink stuff, but Tilda hates that. So we have to cut each pill in half so that she gets the right dosage.”

“How often must she take it?”

“Three times a day, for ten days.”

“I will remember,” Thran nodded.

“So I’m back now, and the children are settled,” Bard said. “Get yourself to the studio, angel. We’re fine here.”

Thran looked torn. “I do not like leaving all this to you, lyubov moya. You are tired, and should rest.”

“I’ll nap down here until one of the children gets up,” Bard said. “It’s okay, angel. I’m an old hand at this, so I’ve got it down to a routine. No worries.”

With a sigh, Thran nodded reluctantly. “I will do my best to be home at a reasonable hour to help with supper and homework.”

“That’d be great. The children will be tired of looking at me by then,” Bard gave Thran a reassuring grin. “You can give Bain a run for his money on the speedway.”

Thran snickered. “You are better at that than I am – more practice.”

“I’m sure Bain will be delighted to give you the chance to practice.”

“I’m sure he will,” Thran exhaled. “I will get my things and go, then. As you say, sooner started is Thran went to collect his bag, so Bard opened the fridge to collect things for his husband’s lunch. The ubiquitous chicken breast, of course, and the chopped veg. No rice, because yesterday Thran didn’t get to eat it. He made up a few peanut butter cracker sandwiches, and slipped in a piece of the applesauce raisin cake. A water bottle went beside Thran’s bento boxes. Thran stowed the collection gratefully in his bag, and wrapped his arms around Bard in a hug.

“You look after me very well, and the children, too. You are the best husband, and the best father.”

Bard needed no encouragement to twine his arms around Thran’s ribs to better savor the warmth of his husband’s body. Was it any wonder Tilda had pressed so closely against him in the doctor’s office? The comfort of another body was a pleasure that soothed many ills. He found himself humming in enjoyment.

“You’re a damned good hugger,” he murmured, grinning when Thran hummed back. “Which I quite enjoy.”

That coaxed a chuckle out of Thran. “Oh, my saint, you are such a temptation. I must leave now, or I will not leave at all.”

Bard let Thran ease out of his arms. “As much as I’d welcome you to stay, you need to dance.”

“I do. Good luck with the children, and I will see you at supper.”

“Okay, angel. Dance well.”

Bard walked Thran out to the carriage house, and saw him off with a wave. He came back inside the house.

So quiet.

It was the perfect time for a nap on the sitting room sofa...

... but he really should put the roast he’d gotten out of the freezer yesterday into the crockpot first. He made himself a cup of tea, then got the beef into the crockpot with a mound of carrots, potatoes, and onions. A good splash of red wine went into the pot with some pepper, thyme, and garlic. He switched on the crockpot to slow cook, and took his tea into the sitting room...

...and detoured to the solarium. Yes, the wall looked great. Before he could stop himself, he eyeballed the wall to decide on how high to hang the fountain. It’d be easier to tell if he slid the basin in place, so he set his teacup aside and got the half-circle basin centered on the wall. It wasn’t very big, but if he put a few plants around it, it would look bigger, and the plants would also cover up the cracks he needed to repair. He moved the ferns around the bottom, then held up the lion’s head portion to gauge the correct height. When he thought he had the right height, he marked the top, then set it aside. He slid the basin aside, and found the tape measure to find the center of the wall. Three inches to the left for the first fastener, then three to the right for the second one, then level the marks. He drilled pilot holes, ran in the heavy-duty anchors, then the bolts. He sorted out the plastic tube that would recirculate the water from the basin up to the lion’s mouth, and poked it into place. Leaving the end of the tube to dangle, he set the fountain onto its anchors, slid the basin and the plants over, and stepped back to gauge the effect.

It looked fantastic. Just fantastic.

With a grin, Bard moved the ferns out of the way, and got the tube of crack repair he’d set on the marble topped table, and carefully sealed the couple of cracks in the basin. Once the repair compound cured, he’d line the basin with a piece of heavy-duty black pool membrane to make sure it stayed watertight, and it’d be ready to fill.

He rearranged the ferns around the basin. Another one would look great at the back of the basin to hide the plastic tubing that recirculated the water. With satisfaction, he collected the tools and bits and bobs that littered the floor, and put everything away. A quick sweep of the floor removed the remaining traces of his repairs, and he arranged the fainting couch – the room still needed another chair or two – and arrayed the palms around the room. All that remained was to dress the reclaimed space with more plants.

“Wow, Da,” a gravelly voice spoke from the door. Sigrid stood looking in, with Legolas behind her. The children edged in to admire the room. “You got the fountain up.”

“Tomorrow, I hope,” Bard replied. “The basin was cracked, so I just patched it. But soon, yeah.”

“I love it,” Sigrid smiled. “It’ll be fun to go to Mr. Sam’s garden center and pick out a few things, won’t it, Legolas?”

“I hope they have hibiscus,” the boy said. “Have you seen them, Sigrid? The flowers are the size of your hand, and they come in all sorts of reds and pinks and yellows.”

“Sounds like both of you feel loads better,” Bard gave them both a close look. “No fever, no dizziness?”

“So far,” Sigrid said, holding up her crossed fingers. “I’m still clogged, and but I’m going to do nothing all afternoon, because I want to be good to go to my new job tomorrow.”

“I don’t know if I’ll be good to fence tomorrow,” was Legolas’s reluctant assessment. “But I won’t do anything today, either, except my homework. I’m tired of being sick!”

“You both know the drill, then,” Bard shooed them into the sitting room. “Or Legolas, you don’t, do you? First, we check your temperatures, and dose accordingly. Then tea and something to eat.”

Bard put the broom away in the mudroom, then had both children take their temperatures. Thankfully, neither had any fever. Sigrid was especially jubilant.

“Okay, we’ll see to the sniffles and such,” Bard said. “The kettle’s hot, so make yourself some tea. And both of you put some socks on. It’s important to stay warm to help your body cook the germs. Please tiptoe upstairs, would you? I took Tilda to the doctor this morning, and she’s asleep in her room. The trip wore her out.”

“Oh, poor Kukla,” Legolas murmured.

“This always happens to her,” Sigrid explained to Legolas. “Her colds always seem to turn into the flu, or bronchitis, or strep, or something nasty. Which one was it this time, Da?”

“A touch of flu and an earache, but no bronchitis or strep, which is good. But she’ll be down for a bit. So get your socks, then come down for either breakfast or lunch, whichever suits you. What would you like?”

“Something hot,” Legolas said, looking at Sigrid. “Something hot would be good, right?”
Sigrid nodded. “Eggs or chicken soup?”

“Eggs for me.”

“Eggs are good for me, too. Scrambled?”

“Scrambled it is,” Bard agreed, when Legolas had seconded Sigrid’s suggestions. “Get your socks, and sweaters won’t hurt, either. Eggs are on their way.”

Bard put a bowl of chicken soup into the microwave for himself, then got the children’s eggs started. They soon sat down to a hot meal, punctuated with the last of yesterday’s biscuits. When they were done, Bard got them settled on the sofas in the sitting room with blankets and pillows and their homework. He got the kitchen cleaned up, and was about to jot down an idea he had about the steampunk orrery he was to design when a light step came down the hallway.

“Tilda?” Bard called.

A moment later, a small, unhappy girl came into the kitchen with the faithful Mr. Bun under her arm. “I’m stuffed up, Da. It woke me up.”

“Sounds like you need a few tissues and some hot tea, little doll,” Bard said, coming around the kitchen island to stoop beside her. “Come sit at the table and I’ll make your tea. Sigrid and Legolas are in the sitting room.”

“They are?” Tilda rubbed her eyes. “Where’s Bain?”

“He’s at school. Come on, let’s blow your nose.”

Tilda obligingly did so, an effort that took repeated tries before she was clear. Bard washed his hands before he got Tilda’s tea and brought it to her with the squeeze bottle of honey.

“Do you want anything to eat?”

She shook her head. “All that goop has made my stomach feel funny.”

“I’m sure. Maybe a little toast with some butter would help it. Or a scrambled egg.”

“Maybe egg. Toast would hurt my throat.”

“Bread and butter, then?”

She nodded. “May I take my tea in the sitting room and lie down?”

“We’ll ask the big kids to make room for you.”

“Okay.”

Bard led her into the sitting room, where both Legolas and Sigrid greeted her with sympathetic words. Sigrid curled her legs up on her sofa.

“Here, Til. You’ll fit on the end.”

“Okay. Thank you.” Tilda got comfortable on the end of the sofa, and Bard wrapped the wool throw around her. She snuggled into it with a sigh, and gave Legolas a little wave. “Hi, Legolas.”

“Hi, Tilda,” the boy waved back. “I’m sorry you’re sick, too.”
“I’ll feel better soon. I have pills.”

“Oooh, pills,” Sigrid grinned, winking at Legolas. “They’re almost as good as that rub stuff, right?”

“Almost,” Tilda pulled the throw up over her nose. “I think I need more. I don’t smell like it very much any more.”

“Eat a little something first,” Bard said. “I’ll bring your egg and bread, and you can snack on that. Then you can fumigate yourself with the rub stuff.”

“I like that stuff, too, Kukla,” Legolas told her. “It smells to the heavens, but it clears my nose just like that.”

Tilda looked a little more animated. “It does that to me, too. So it doesn’t just smell good.”

Sigrid made a grimace. “I don’t know whether I’d call that a good smell, Til, but it’s certainly a big smell.”

Chuckling, Bard left the children to get Tilda’s breakfast ready. He refilled the teakettle, too, and was happy to have another cup of lemon ginger tea to warm him. Tilda managed to eat most of her egg and bread, and she drank all of her tea. She immediately fell asleep after, despite the close quarters on the sofa.

“Poor Tilda,” Sigrid shook her head. “She really is sick.”

“She’ll be okay in a day or two,” Bard assured Sigrid. “I’ll take her back upstairs where we won’t bother her. Sleep will do wonders for her, even without the infamous rub stuff.”

“I’m going back upstairs, too,” Sigrid closed her government book. “I don’t know whether it’s my cold, or this boring government book, but I’m ready for a nap, too.”

“I guess I should, too,” Legolas looked torn.

“If you’re comfortable, stay where you are, Legs,” Bard suggested. “I’ll work on my sketches in here, but it won’t bother me if you work on your homework or nap.”

“Okay,” Legolas smiled. “I am comfortable, and it’d be nice to be out of bed for a little while.”

“Sigrid, if you’re going to nap, may I borrow your computer? I need to do some research for one of my commissions.”

“Oh, sure, Da,” Sigrid waved her hand at her laptop on the coffee table. “Which commission is this for?”

“It’s an orrery,” Bard said, and described what that was. “It’ll look like the Victorian steampunk vibe.”

“Oooh, steampunk?” Sigrid sat up. “That sounds neat! Didn’t Mr. Rohan’s urban art exhibit at the April Fool’s Follies have a couple of examples of that?”

“Oh, is that what that bust was?” Legolas also looked interested. “I thought it was some sort of Star Trek thing about the Borg.”

“Ha, I never thought of the Borg that way, but you’re right, Legs. They’re kind of a modern vibe of steampunk,” Sigrid laughed. “There are a lot of comics and stuff about it. A steampunk orrery will look cool, Da.”
“I hope so,” Bard agreed. “I know what Tilda will ask about it, though.”

Sigrid grinned. When Legolas looked blank, she said, “Tilda is a kind soul, Legs, and she was very unhappy about Pluto being demoted to a dwarf planet in the same year she was born. She said she felt sorry for it. So she’ll be the first one to ask Da whether he’ll put Pluto in his orrery.”

“Will you, Bard?”

“Technically, I shouldn’t. Steampunk usually reflects the Victorian world around 1850 or so. Neptune was discovered in 1846, so the first eight planets would be authentic to the period. Tilda’s pet planet Pluto wasn’t discovered until 1930, so the Victorians wouldn’t have included it in their instruments. But I’ll ask the client what he’d prefer. Some Pluto fans are very staunch supporters.”

“Of course we are,” Sigrid said. “It’s not Pluto’s fault that humanity can’t sort itself out about what’s a planet or not. We said it was once, so it still should be. Just because it’s small shouldn’t matter.”

“That’s Tilda’s position,” Bard grinned. “So I want to look at a lot of steampunk art and such to see how I want to do my take on it.”

“I could help you look,” Sigrid offered.

“That’s fine, sweetness, but would you rather to that, or rest so you can get to your new job tomorrow?”

“I want to do both,” Sigrid made a face. “But I want to make a good impression, so I’ll go nap.”

“Good girl. Sleep well.”

“Okay, Da.” She got up and collected her blanket to go upstairs. “No, just worry about Tilda. I’ll get myself upstairs, and you don’t need to get any closer to my germs to kiss me. See you in a while.”

“Bye, Sigrid,” Legolas offered a wave. “I hope you feel better in a little while.”

“Me, too, and you, too!” Sigrid waved as she left the sitting room.

Bard grinned as he collected the sleeping Tilda to take her upstairs. Sigrid was feeling better, if she could joke with Legolas.

“I’ll settle Tilda, and be back down, Legs. Do you need anything? More tea?”

“I left my box of tissues upstairs. Would you bring it down for me?”

“Righto. Back in a tick.”

Bard got Tilda into bed, and stuck his head into Sigrid’s room, where she gave him a sleepy smile and wave as she arranged her pillows. He collected Legolas’s tissues to give to him, then gave a quick stir to the crockpot. He added a little parsley and some paprika for color, then got his sketchpad and pencils to sketch any ideas he found on Sigrid’s computer. Legolas finished some portion of his homework, set his books and computer aside, and lay back to nap. Bard soon found himself fascinated by the wide array of interesting facts, pictures, and ideas. So many good ideas came to him that he quickly filled several pages of his sketchbook with snippets of designs. Hmm... what if he represented the planets as the ancient gods and goddesses who had inspired their names, as interpreted by a Victorian steampunk artist? That led to more research about each of the deities. He got so caught up in his creating that he didn’t notice the time fly by.
The mudroom door opened. Bard looked up, startled. Gods, was it four-thirty already? As he pulled out his mobile, Legolas roused at the noise.

“Is that Bain?” he murmured sleepily. “I must’ve slept all afternoon.”

“It’s only two-forty,” Bard replied, casting a look at the door to the kitchen, then at Legolas. “If that’s Bain, he came home on the early bus.”

Oh, gods – had the indestructible Bain succumbed to the rampant family disease, too? From Legolas’s expression, he’d come to the same conclusion that Bard had.

“Uh-oh,” Legolas said.

Uh-oh, indeed.
“Hello? Bain?” Bard called from the sitting room.

“Yeah, it’s me,” Bain replied, rattling into the kitchen. His backpack thunked into the corner by the table, and he appeared a moment later. “Hi, Da. Hi, Legolas.”

A frown wrinkled Bard’s forehead. “Are you sick, boyo? You’re home on the early bus.”

“I’m fine,” Bain shrugged, “but a lot of the school isn’t, including the teachers. Mr. Boromir was out, and so was Mr. Faramir, so there weren’t enough teachers to cover all of sport today. The lacrosse group is already down by almost half, so the school canceled it for today. They canceled archery, too, Legs, so you didn’t miss it. I got everyone’s homework stuff, and just made the early bus by the skin of my teeth.”

“I’m glad you’ve still dodged the germs,” Bard replied.

“I’m glad I didn’t miss archery,” Legolas exhaled. The deep breath made him cough, but he didn’t launch in to a coughing jag as he’d done early this morning. He smothered it in his blanket – that’d need a good washing in a day or two – and the spasms quieted quickly. “Thanks for getting my homework.”

“Not a problem,” Bain gave his brother a quick smile. “How’s Sigrid? And Tilda? She looked pretty bad this morning.”

“I took her to our doctor –”

“Wait... what?” Bain interrupted. “We have a doctor? I thought we had to use the clinic.”

“Not any more,” Bard assured him. “We’ve got health insurance now, and a pediatrician for all of you. Her name is Dr. Firenze. She checked Tilda over from top to bottom. Tilda’s got a touch of flu and an ear infection, but nothing worse, so she’ll be fine in a day or two.”

“Oh, that’s good,” Bain’s worried expression eased. Bard kept a straight face; it was one thing for Bain to feel protective about his sister, and quite another for anyone to call him out about it. “She always gets the worst of stuff.”

“She’s upstairs, sleeping, and so is Sigrid. So please keep the clatter to a dull roar when you go upstairs, so they both stay asleep.”
“Course, Da,” Bain nodded. “Where’s Thran? At the studio? And what’s in the crockpot? Can I have a snack?”

“Thran’s at the studio, pot roast is in the crockpot, and I don’t know; can you have a snack?”

“May I have a snack?” Bain amended hastily. “And the pot roast smells really good.”

“Help yourself to the usual,” Bard agreed. “Thran said he wanted to get home at a reasonable hour today, so I expect we’ll have supper about six.”

“Biscuits, I hope? Or muffins?”

“I like those orange cranberry ones,” Legolas suggested helpfully. “Or the corn ones. Or the Nirvana ones...”

Bain snorted. “Geez, Legs. Why not just say that you like any kind of muffins?”

The other boy grinned. “I do. And so do you.”

“Maybe spoonbread instead of muffins or biscuits,” Bard countered. “You both need a whole grain. And a lot of greens. You need the iron and calcium, too. Maybe with a little spice. The hot spices would help unclog you, Legs.”

“Oh, I don’t think anything can do that,” Legolas grimaced. “It’s about to set me crazy!”

“Sounds like it’s time for more tea. Did your Papa give you any meds this morning?”

He nodded. “Decongestant, nasal spray, and a cough drop at nine-thirty.”

“Maybe another round of those, and some hot tea.”

“Anything,” Legolas rubbed his nose. “This is awful!”

“Okay, I’ll get your stuff. Bain, help yourself to snacks. Tea for you, too?”

“Tea’s always good, Da. That chocolate mint oolong is cool.”

“I haven’t tried that one,” Legolas looked interested.

“It’s more mint than chocolate, but I like it,” Bain shrugged. “You want anything to eat, Legs?”

“No, thank you. Just the tea.”

Bain gave his brother a skeptical glance. “Huh. You must be sick if you’re not hungry.”

“I’m sure I’ll have room for whatever this spoonbread is at supper,” Legolas grinned.

“Oh, it’s the best. It’s my Gran’s recipe. She was from Wales...”

Bard left the boys to discuss the origins of his mother’s cornmeal-based spoonbread recipe as he put on the kettle and collected the medicine for Legolas. He dosed Legolas while Bain collected his cheese and crackers and came to join them in the sitting room.

“Do you want the mentholated rub, too?” Bard grinned.

“Oh, Tilda swears by that stuff,” Bain rolled his eyes. “I swear it kills mosquitoes and fleas at fifty paces by the sheer smell alone.”
Legolas chuckled. “I don’t care what it smells like – it helps. So yes, I want some of that, too. Anything to help unclog my nose!”

Bard handed him the tube. “Have at, then. Doesn’t take much.”

As Legolas squeezed out a little of the ointment and then stuck his hand under his tee to rub it over his chest, Bain gave Bard a hopeful look. “It’s Friday, Da, and there’s no school tomorrow, so can – may Legolas and I play a video game?”

“Maybe tomorrow, boyo. Legs is still too under the weather for my likes. I want him to rest so that he gets well faster.”

“Are board games okay?” Legolas asked.

“Those are fine,” Bard agreed.

“Oh, Da, we’ve played all the board games so much that they’re boring,” Bain complained.

“I have a chessboard and the pieces,” Legolas offered. “Papa got them for me in China when he went to dance there. The kings look like dragons, and the queens look like phoenixes.”

“That sounds cool,” Bain conceded. “But I don’t know how to play.”

“I don’t play very well,” Legolas admitted, “but I know enough to show you the moves. They aren’t that hard, but the game is different every time.”

“That sounds neat. Sure, let’s give it a shot.”

“I’ll get it, then,” Legolas smiled. “I’ll be right back.”

Legolas returned shortly with a box under one arm. Tilda was with him, holding his other hand. She held Mr. Bun and she looked a bit more restored, if not completely comfortable.

“She says she’s hungry,” Legolas said, looking at Bard. “That’s good, right?”

“It is. Thanks, Legolas,” Bard nodded. He gave Tilda an encouraging smile. “Some soup, little doll?”

She nodded. “My ear still hurts.”

“It will for a little longer, Til. But it’ll get better now that you’ve got your medicine. In fact, it’s time for your next dose.”

“Okay.”

“Come into the kitchen. You can have some tea while your soup gets warm.”

Bard busied himself in the kitchen. He gave Tilda her half pill and water, put Tilda’s soup in the microwave to warm, made four big mugs of tea, and handed the tea around. He kept Tilda company in the kitchen while she ate, listening to Legolas explain the different chessmen and how each one moved. The boys started a practice game, occasionally laughing at a move one or the other made. Tilda didn’t say much, but her smile as she enjoyed her soup was comment enough. After she was through, she was happy to sit on the sofa in Bard’s lap to watch the boys. Bard got one of his small sketchpads to draw little animals for her, which she liked. Before long, Sigrid came down to join the mix.
“Ooh, is that chess?” her eyes widened.

“Legs is teaching me how to play,” Bain replied.

“Wow!” Sigrid enthused. “Will you teach me, too?”

“Sure,” Legolas nodded. “We just finished sort of a game, so I’ll show you, too. You and Bain can play, and I’ll watch to help where I can.”

“Just let me get something to eat.” Sigrid dipped into the kitchen long enough to get a container of yogurt and a spoon, which drew a lot of interest from Tilda. She sat up in Bard’s arms.

“Is that yogurt?”

“Strawberry. Would you like one, too, Til?” When the little girl nodded, Sigrid fetched another container and spoon for her sister. “There you go.”

“Thank you,” Tilda said, putting Mr. Bun down so she could take the yogurt.

“That’s a good snack,” Bard encouraged his youngest daughter. Sometimes antibiotics upset small stomachs, so yogurt was a good counter to that. “It’ll feel good on your throat.”

“It does,” Tilda nodded. “Really good.”

Her hum of enjoyment was good to hear, and relaxed a little of Bard’s concern for her. He was surprised at her interest in the chess game. She carefully watched the other children as Legolas explained about the pieces again.

“It’s... sort of like checkers?” she asked Legolas at last. “Except all the pieces move in different ways?”

“A lot like checkers, except you want to keep the king from moving at the end,” Legolas nodded.

As the children studied the chessboard, Bard quietly sketched them. He got several good studies of each of them as their game progressed. At one point, when neither Sigrid nor Bain reached forward to move a piece, Tilda sucked the yogurt off her spoon and leaned forward.

“Whose go is it?”

“Mine,” Bain murmured, studying the board.

Tilda reached forward to take one of Bain’s bishops to take one of Sigrid’s knights. “Like that, Legolas?”

“Just like that,” Legolas laughed, as Sigrid made a raspberry.

“Wow, thanks Til!” Bain exulted.

“Yeah, thanks, Til,” Sigrid growled. “That doesn’t count because Tilda did it, Bain.”

“Well, now I’m doing it,” Bain retorted with an impudent grin. “She caught on faster than either of us did, and I’m not too proud to take advantage of it.”

“I hope you’re going to help me, too, Til,” Sigrid gave an exasperated look at her sister. “Any suggestions?”
After deliberate consideration, Tilda slid Sigrid a look. “Um, maybe...”

Sigrid waved at the board, so Tilda picked up Sigrid’s bishop to take Bain’s queen.

“Hey!” Bain protested, as Legolas laughed harder. “Til, what did you do to me?”

“Yeah, thanks, Til,” Sigrid grinned at her sister, “and this time I mean it. I’ll take a queen for a knight any day.”

Laughing at the children’s antics, Bard picked up Bain’s captured queen to study the carving. Maybe it was jade or a close relative, a dark, mossy green stone that was a nice match to the lighter green of Sigrid’s pieces. The board was alternating squares of the same materials, with a carved edge. The small phoenix that Bard held was carved in painstaking detail, with a flourish of ornate tail feathers. Bard made a sketch of it, enjoying the smooth feel of the stone that warmed quickly in his hand. When he had to give it back so the children could start another game, he cobbled together a nice composite of a smiling Legolas holding the phoenix up beside his face. It was only a head shot, but it was a nice composition that Bard liked enough to refine from the quick sketch he’d originally thought to draw. By the time the mudroom door opened again, he had completed a nice portrait of the boy. If Thran liked it, he’d give it to him.

“I am home!” Thran heralded.

“We’re all in the sitting room,” Bard called back.

Bento boxes rattled into the sink, then Thran appeared in the doorway. “Hello, children! Hello, Bard! Ah, you play chess?”

“I wouldn’t call it playing, exactly,” Bain gave Thran a smirk. “Right now, it’s more just moving the pieces around. Legs is still explaining it to us.”

“Tilda caught on pretty fast,” Sigrid said. “I think I’m getting it, though.”

“And look at this wonderful picture!” Thran said, squatting beside Bard to give him a welcome home kiss. “Legolas, did you see this? Bard has drawn you with the queen.”

The boy glanced at the drawing that his father held up, and reddened quickly. “Oh. I didn’t know he was drawing me.”

“You’ll get used to it,” Sigrid advised casually. “Da’s been drawing us for years. He never makes us look bad or stupid, so we just tune it out. It’s not a big deal.”

“I guess I’ll get used to it, too, then,” Legolas ventured, looking at the drawing. “Wow, that is me, isn’t it?”

“It is,” Thran’s nod was emphatic. “I like it very much.”

Bard signed and dated the drawing, and carefully took it out of his book to hand to Thran. “I thought you’d like to have it, cariad.”

“I would, very much. Thank you, lyubov moya.” Thran took the picture with a glad smile. “And how are you, children? Better, I hope?”

After the children gave Thran the details, Bard reached out to give Thran’s braid a playful tug. “You made it home early. Irmo must be beside himself.”
Thran’s lips briefly thinned, so Irmo must have been as annoyed as Bard guessed. “As I told him, our ballet is important. So is my family. Much of it is sick, and its heart is weary from seeing to the rest of it. Those things need my attention, too, whether Irmo understands why or not.”

“We’re okay, Thran,” Bard reassured his husband. “The children slept most of the day, Bain got everyone’s homework from the school, and supper’s in the crockpot.”

“Bard finished the fountain, too,” Legolas added. “The lion part is on the wall, and the bottom part is patched, and it looks amazing.”

Thran’s eyebrows went up with as much concern as surprise. Oh, he was worried about Bard doing too much again. He’d likely say something about it later, but not in front of the children, but Bard would assure him that he’d wanted to do it. How could he leave something undone? More importantly, how could he resist coaxing something beautiful out of disrepair? It would be as if Thran danced half of a scene and then stopped. He bet Thran couldn’t do that, either.

“The patch has to cure before we can put water in it, but it’s in place,” Bard said casually, setting his sketchbook aside. “Took all of about an hour. Not long at all.”

“The fountain’s finished?” Tilda looked towards the solarium and slid off the sofa. “I want to see!”

She led the way into the solarium with Thran close on her heels. Bard left the older children to their chess game to follow his husband and daughter into the garden room. It was less than an hour away from sunset, but the room was dimming rapidly, so Bard flipped the switch to light Thran’s Istanbul lanterns.

“Oh!” Tilda murmured, looking up at the lanterns. “It looks so pretty!”

“It is beautiful,” Thran agreed, smiling. “Now we can add more plants to make it fully tropical.”

“A couple more chairs, too,” Bard agreed. “And some more lamps. And you two want to make your tessellation to put somewhere.”

“Perhaps as a table top,” Thran suggested. “Look, Kukla – the fountain has covered one of the cracked floor tiles, and the other will likely hide under a plant. A table top would be more noticeable.”

“I like that,” Tilda nodded. “We could put it on top of one of the old plant stands in the carriage house.”

“Sure,” Bard said. “I could make a metal frame for your mosaic, and then weld it to the plant stand.”

“Weld it?” Thran turned a sly smile on Bard that raised gooseflesh all over his body. “Hmm. That is a good idea.”

“Yeah, and it’d use something old in a new way,” Tilda said, blithely unaware of the spark that passed between Bard and his husband. “Da says it’s a virtue to make something old pretty again.”

“I agree,” Thran purred, but discreetly, but Bard still rolled his eyes at him when Tilda wasn’t looking. “This room is a perfect example of your Da’s virtue, Kukla. It was once so sad and shabby, but now it is magical. We will all enjoy this room now, all year long.”

“When can we go to Mr. Sam’s garden center and pick out some more plants, Da?”

“Not until everyone’s healthy again,” Bard said. “So maybe next weekend. I’ll have the fountain working by then, I hope.”

“Can we get some with flowers?”

“We’ll see what Mr. Sam can suggest for us.”

“That’s a good idea. He knows everything about flowers.”

“That he does,” Bard agreed. “Enjoy the view a little longer, angel. I’m making spoonbread for supper, so I’ll go put it in the oven so it’ll be ready when we’re ready to eat.”

“This is a new dish?” Thran offered him an interested look. “A bread to be eaten with a spoon?”

“It’s my Gran’s spoonbread,” Tilda explained. “It’s soft and you put lots of butter on it. I love it.”

“I think I will help your Da make this confection,” Thran told Tilda. “I want to see it come to be myself.”

The trio returned to the sitting room, where Tilda crawled onto the sofa to retrieve Mr. Bun and watch her siblings play chess. Bard headed into the kitchen with Thran trailing behind him. Bard was well aware of his husband’s scrutiny, so he nodded towards the pantry. “Yellow cornmeal. And baking powder. And salt.”

Thran gave him a pale look of exasperation, but his smile took away any sting, and he obediently disappeared into the pantry to retrieve the three things that Bard asked for. Bard got milk and eggs from the fridge, and a casserole dish from the cupboard. He turned on the oven, then set about making his concoction with Thran attending carefully. Bard was particularly fond of this dish because it was easy to make, delicious, and reminded him of happy times with his mother and father. He urged Thran upstairs to change his clothes, and then put him to work setting the table and making a big vegetable salad and small cups of fruit while they talked about Thran’s day at the ballet. Thran was well aware that Bard wanted to keep him busy and focused on the day’s events at the UVB studio, but after a few pointed looks, Thran acceded to Bard’s tacit request without complaint. When the spoonbread was done, he took it out and set it on the kitchen island to cool slightly while Bard plated the pot roast and vegetables.

“This smells wonderful,” Thran offered as he leaned over the smoking spoonbread. “Is it a sort of custard inside, because of the milk and eggs?”

“It’s soft, a little stiffer than oatmeal,” Bard replied as he sliced the beef. “And Tilda’s right – it’s best with lots of butter.”

“Lots and lots of butter!” Bain called from the sitting room. “Is it done?”

“It’s done,” Bard confirmed. “All of you, wash your hands, please. Lots of soap and water! We don’t need any more germs at the table.”

“Okay, Da; yes, Bard,” the children chorused, and were soon ready to fill their plates. Tilda didn’t want a lot, given how recently she’d had her chicken soup, but Bard was happy for her to confine herself just to spoonbread, fruit, and a little salad. Bain more than made up for his sister’s slight appetite, and Sigrid and Legolas had close to their normal amounts. Bard was happy to see Thran put reasonable portions on his plate.

Supper was subdued, well punctuated with sniffles, sneezes, and coughs, but for the most part, the children contained their explosions in their napkins, and everyone remained in good if quiet spirits. Bain helped Thran and Bard clean up the dishes as the other children went into the sitting room to choose a film to watch. In deference to Tilda, the boys didn’t push for their usual “more stuff blows up” genre, and the foursome settled on Howl’s Moving Castle.

“You’ll like this one, angel,” Bard said to Thran as everyone settled on the sofas. “It’s about a wizard with long white hair.”

“He has black hair at the end,” Tilda said.

“And red, too,” Bain added.

Thran snickered as he sat next to his son. “This wizard cannot seem to make up his mind.”

Sigrid plunked next to Bard. “Wait until you see his bathroom. Makes the boys look like clean room techs.”

“Hey!” Bain complained, plunking down on the other side of Legolas. “We’re not that bad!”

“Only because somebody cleans the bathroom once a week,” Sigrid shot back.

“You sound better,” Bard grinned at her as Tilda climbed into his lap. “Looks like you’ll get to Miss Dís’s tomorrow after all. What time do you need to be there?”

“Seven, half an hour before the shop opens,” Sigrid replied.

“I’ll get up at six-thirty to get your breakfast, then take you into the village,” Bard stifled a yawn. Sitting down was definitely not the wisest move for someone who hadn’t gotten much sleep last night.

“Shh,” Tilda fussed from Bard’s lap. “There’s Sophie!”

Conversation lapsed as the story of Sophie, Howl, and Calcifer unfolded. While this was a film that Bard enjoyed, it wasn’t unfamiliar or exciting enough to keep the efforts of the last twenty-four hours at bay. With Tilda in his lap, he couldn’t pick up his sketchbook to distract himself from the heaviness that seemed to pull him deeper into the sofa cushions. About halfway through the movie, Tilda fell asleep, so Bard carried her into the kitchen to give her her last dose of medicine for the day, then took her upstairs to settle her into bed. He took the chance to shower, hoping it would wake him up enough to get through the rest of the evening. Much cleaner and slightly more awake, he rejoined the rest of the family to see the end of the film. Without Tilda on his lap, he was able to sketch a bit to keep himself focused and awake without anyone the wiser.

When Sophie, Howl, and Calcifer reached their happy ending, the three older children went upstairs to cycle through the shower. It was just past nine o’clock when Sigrid came downstairs to bid Thran and Bard goodnight.

“I want to get as much sleep as I can, so I last through the day tomorrow,” she yawned. “I work until three.”

“Good idea,” Bard said, getting up to give her a goodnight hug. “Let’s get you one more decongestant so you sleep well, and you can have another one in the morning. Do you need a lunch?”

“I guess I do. Just a sandwich and some fruit and my water bottle. Thanks, Da. Night, Ada. I’ll see you when I get home tomorrow afternoon.”

Thran gave her his own goodnight hug. “May all go well tomorrow, lioness. Listen well, smile, be your most gracious self.”

“I will. Night.”

“Sleep well.”

Bard went upstairs again to give Sigrid her medicine, and said goodnight to Legolas, who had been next in the shower. Bain decided to say goodnight as well, despite the early hour; he planned to curl into bed with a book when he finished in the shower. Thran came out of Legolas’s room to wish Bain goodnight before the boy disappeared into the shower.

“Now.”

Bard perked up at his husband’s firm tone. He turned to find Thran regarding him with arms akimbo and a determined look.

“What?” Bard said in his mildest tone.

“What am I to do with you?”

Thran’s tone was not purring arousal, or playful teasing, but from somewhere, Bard summoned the energy to give Thran a thorough look up and down. “Hmm. Anything you want.”

Thran snorted and pointed towards their bedroom door. “You did not sleep all day, did you? Now you are exhausted. Please, Bard; you weigh more than I do, so get yourself into bed before I must carry you there. No, do not try to brass it out any longer, lyubov moya. Go to bed.”

Bard exhaled, and gave Thran a rueful smile. “I meant to nap, but...”

Thran nodded. “The house was quiet, the solarium beckoned, then the kitchen, and then the children woke up, and so you went back to the kitchen, and so it went all day. Yes?”

“Something like that,” Bard admitted. He didn’t improve his standing in Thran’s eyes when a yawn would not be suppressed despite his most determined efforts.

“Tcha! Go, go, go!” Thran made shooing motions with both hands towards the bedroom. “Look, I gesticulate. Do I have to swear very fast, too?”

“No, I’m going.” Bard suited action to words, and preceded Thran into their bedroom. As Thran turned down the bed, he stacked jeans, tee, underwear, and socks on the chair to be at hand in the morning, then stripped off his nightclothes to crawl under the covers. “Don’t expect me to be awake when you get out of the shower.”

“I will be most displeased if you are,” was Thran’s pert reply as he slid their bedroom doors closed.

“Leave the doors open a little, please?” Bard asked. “The older children are probably fine, but Tilda’s still in the woods a bit, so...”

“There.” Thran left the doors open about two feet. “Now, I will shower, and be in bed with you soon.”

“Promises, promises,” Bard grinned as his husband began to shed his clothes. His mistake, however, was to draw up the bedclothes. When the covers settled softly around him, even watching Thran’s long, pale, elegant body appear as he shed one article of clothing after the other could not keep him awake. Sleep wound soft arms around him and consumed him before Thran’s shirt fell to the floor...
“Da...”

Bard pried his eyes open blearily. Gods, every limb felt like lead. He fumbled his tee and sleep pants on, and was padding out of the bedroom before he fully registered it. Tilda sat up in bed, too clogged to cry, but the sentiment was certainly there.

“I’m here, little doll. Where’s your box of tissues?”

“I don’t know...”

“I’ve got it. It’s okay. Come on, blow your nose.”

Four tissues later, Tilda was a little clearer, enough to whimper.

“Ear?”

She nodded.

“Okay, let’s go in the bathroom and get some medicine.”

Bard took advantage of her clearer nose to dose her with nasal spray; she was too miserable to complain or refuse it. Decongestant was next, then a cough lozenge, then more of Tilda’s favorite mentholated rub. Then they were back in her room to rock in the rocking chair until all the remedies had made her a little easier. He was so desperate for sleep that he drifted off in the chair with Tilda in his arms, her aching ear pressed against his chest. He didn’t rouse until the clock read after five. Tilda was sound asleep, and blessedly stayed that way when he put her back in bed. He fumbled his way back to bed, wincing when he realized that he’d have to get up again in an hour to get Sigrid to her job. Thran seemed to rest easily on his side of the bed, so Bard grabbed for sleep with both hands...

“That was Bach’s Toccata and Fugue in G Minor —”

The clock radio. Bard groped to turn it off before Thran roused. Gods, every muscle ached, as if he’d tried to swim the English Channel during the night. He grabbed his clothing from the chair and got into the bathroom to dress. Downstairs he went to make Sigrid a bowl of porridge, and a turkey and cheese sandwich with lettuce and mustard. He got it into Sigrid’s lunch bag with a pear as she came downstairs, looking excited despite the early hour.

“Morning, Da. Gods, you look ragged. Was Tilda up again?”

He nodded. “Her ear. I hope the antibiotics kick in soon.”

“Me, too. It sucks to feel that bad.”

“How’re you?”

“I’m good,” Sigrid nodded vigorously. “I’m still clogged, but I feel a lot better. I’ll take it slow, though. May I have some decongestant, please?”

“Got it right here.”

Sigrid swallowed her medicine, and shoveled in the rest of her porridge. “Okay, I’ll brush my teeth, then I’m ready.”
“I’ll get the truck out, so come on out when you’re done.”

“Okay, Da."

Sigrid bounced upstairs. Bard got his keys and let himself out of the house, rolling his shoulders and stretching his arms, trying to ease the achiness that made every step uncomfortable. He got the truck out of the carriage house and was ready to leave when Sigrid came out of the door with her lunch in hand. Despite how tired he felt, he smiled at his daughter’s excitement for this new venture. She wondered how long it would take her to learn how to make espresso, and if she’d get the hang of the cash register, and how busy the shop would be on a Saturday. Traffic was light, so it took just ten minutes to pull up before the shop. Sigrid pressed a kiss on his cheek before she bolted out of the truck. He rolled down his window to wave goodbye to her, and didn’t pull away until someone came to let her into the shop.

As he turned for home, he didn’t have Sigrid’s excitement to distract him from the pervasive weariness that flooded him. Gods, he was getting old – two days’ lack of sleep had never stopped him in college, but here he was, as achy as an eighty-year-old. And how had a New York day in May turned so hot? Gods, it was so hot that he felt dizzy.

He got home and snugged the truck in the carriage house before he put all the clues together.

Oh, shit.

He got through the mudroom door, and staggered into the kitchen. It was too overwhelming to think about climbing the stairs to bed, but he could make it to the sitting room. If he could get to the sofa and lie down, he’d rally by the time anyone else woke up...

Thran appeared in the doorway to the sitting room, blocking Bard’s straight path to the sofa. “Lyubov moya?”

The room started to spin, then greyed.

Oh, gods, please don’t let Thran freak out...
Chapter 120

Chapter Summary

The angel exercises his right to free speech, and the cherubs help him conspire.

Thran took two swift steps forward to catch Bard before he crumpled to the kitchen floor. Bracing himself, he kept his husband upright long enough to get his arms under Bard’s, then clasped his wrists across Bard’s chest. He labored to haul so much dead weight across the kitchen and into the sitting room – suka blyad, Bard’s heavy boots caught on the rug, which didn’t make getting across the room any easier – and deposited him on the sofa. He unlaced the offending boots, tossed them aside, and propped Bard’s feet atop a couple of pillows so they were higher than his head. Then he sat beside his husband, who met his worried gaze with a bemused expression.

“You aren’t going to freak out, are you?” Bard mumbled faintly. “Please, don’t freak out.”

“Ty che, suka, o’khuel blya, Bard?” Thran spat, glaring at his husband’s anxious expression. “You are whiter than milk, ty grebanyy huiesos! You are hotter than the August sun, suka blyad! You pass out in the kitchen, sukin syn! Then you ask me if I freak out? Idi k chertu!”

Bard’s lips curved up slightly, and his gaze tracked Thran’s hands. “Oh, this must be serious. You didn’t just swear and talk fast. You gesticulated, too.”

Sosi moy chlen,” Thran muttered.

“I’m all right, angel.”

“Oy, idi na khuy!” Thran threw up his hands again. “Even you cannot believe what you try to tell me! You are most certainly not all right! No one who is all right passes out in the kitchen!”

“I didn’t completely pass out,” Bard protested weakly. “It just got grey for a second.”

“You passed out,” Thran said flatly. “You will not argue with me about this. You have not slept in two days, you have nursed all the children, you have seen to me, you have worked too hard on the house, you have sketched without end to keep yourself awake, and now you are sick! You will not try to pass it off as nothing, do you hear me? I won’t let you!”

“Okay, angel, okay,” Bard put a hand on Thran’s thigh. “I’m sorry to worry you. I’ll be okay.”

“You have no idea what it means to be okay,” Thran snapped, hands waving. “You tell me not to let the ballet consume me, and then what is it that you do? You let our family and our house consume you until you are rags! Sukin syn, ty grebanyy chlenosos! Now, you will tell me the symptoms, and I will decide whether you are okay. First, I get the thermometer. You will not move even an inch until I get back.”

Thran stalked off to the children’s bathroom without looking to see if Bard obeyed him or not. He retrieved the thermometer and went back downstairs, fuming. What a ridiculous man his husband was, to drive himself into such a state of collapse – but Bard was not completely to blame. He, Thran, had not helped. He had barely registered Bard getting up to tend to Tilda in the middle of the night, and hadn’t been able to stay awake long enough to register when Bard had come back to bed.
It had likely been hours after he’d gotten up. Then Bard had gotten up again to take Sigrid to work. Thran had almost fallen back asleep, then Sigrid had slammed the mudroom door with such force that the whole house had shaken. He’d gotten up to check on the children; thankfully, they all had remained asleep. He’d gone downstairs to the kitchen to make tea, then wait for Bard to return.

Thank the gods he had. What if Bard had been alone in the kitchen when he’d fainted? He could have hit his head on the marble top of the kitchen island, or the corner of the table, or even just the floor itself...

Thran was so angry that he trembled. He stopped in the hallway and forced himself to take three deep breaths, because so much fury would not help Bard. Then he went back to the sitting room.

Bard lay on the sofa with his knees drawn up, and his head cradled on one of the pillows that had been under his feet. His eyes were shut, but he opened them when Thran padded back into the room. He didn’t argue when Thran poked the thermometer at his mouth, but put it under his tongue with mute obedience. Thran was silent for the few seconds it took for the device to chirp, and he batted Bard’s hand away to take the thermometer himself.

“One hundred and two,” Thran announced, leveling a stern glare on Bard. “As I suspected, you are not all right. You have a fever, you are dizzy, you are very tired. What else?”

“Achy,” Bard conceded.

“No congestion, no ear ache, no cough?”

Bard shook his head.

“Then I will get Bain, and we will haul you upstairs to bed between the two of us, and you will sleep until you cannot sleep any more.”

“You don’t need to wake up Bain, Thran,” Bard protested. “I can get myself upstairs.”

“Don’t try to shit me,” Thran growled. “You have no idea what you can and cannot do. For all I know, you will pass out again while I have you on the stairs, and then where will we be? At risk of life and limb when we tumble down and crash into Hope the Lope. That is no good for either of us.”

“I don’t want you to wake Bain up.”

“Tcha,” Thran waved a hand. “He will survive, and so will we. A good deal all around.”

“I’ll rest here until he gets up, and then I’ll go upstairs.”

Thran snorted. “If I leave you down here, you will not sleep because you will want to be involved in everything. So I will get Bain, and we will take you upstairs, and we will shut the doors so that you will have nothing to distract you from the rest you need.”

Bard sighed. “Would you just give me an arm, angel, and I’ll take care of the rest? Please?”

Thran sighed, too, but in exasperation. With a smothered curse, he got up from beside Bard, and held out a hand. “All right. My arm is here.”

Bard grasped Thran’s wrist, and let Thran pull him to his feet. Then Thran hustled his husband down the hall, up the stairs, and into their bedroom. Once he’d eased Bard onto the bed, Bard immediately lay on his back with a silent groan.
“Yes, it was a close thing,” Thran growled. He sat next to Bard to undress him, unbuttoning jeans, sliding them and his underwear off, then his socks, and finally his tee. He helped Bard slide between the sheets, and pulled the covers over him. Bard shut his eyes and heaved a sigh.

“I will bring the acetaminophen,” Thran murmured with less vehemence. “Stay awake that long, please, lyubov moya.”

“Okay,” Bard whispered, eyes shut.

Thran wasted no time in collecting the fever reducing pills and a cup of water, then helped Bard sit up enough to take them. When Bard was flat again, Thran brushed the hair out of his husband’s eyes.

“Sleep, my saint, please,” he pleaded. “Restore yourself. You have worn yourself to a thread.”

Bard managed a half smile before his eyes closed. In two breaths, he was asleep.

Finally. Finally.

* * *

Thran sat beside Bard long enough to ensure that his husband was solidly asleep. What was the best thing to do next? It was just barely eight o’clock, so the Legolas and Bain would likely sleep for some hours yet. Tilda might be another story – she might awake in pain because of her ear or stuffy nose, or because she had to use the bathroom. If she awoke in pain, she might call for her Da, and then he would try to see to her, no matter how sick or exhausted he was. So Thran must take steps to intercept her if that happened.

He went down to the kitchen and made himself a light breakfast and a large pot of tea. Then he tiptoed into the bedroom. Bard remained unmoving, so Thran eased a clean set of dancewear out of his drawers, and went into the children’s bathroom to change. Then he took over the children’s study for a temporary dance studio, moving the petite rug out of the way, and using one of the chairs as a stand-in for his barre. He would have preferred merely to settle in the room with a book to wait for the children to rouse, but with Immortal’s premiere little more than eight weeks away, he could not afford to skip the practice, even if the company had not planned to meet today. The rare Saturday off was to give all the dancers a deep breath before rehearsals at the school ramped up next week. Despite that, he did all of the stationary sequences, then risked going into the ballroom for the steps and jumps. He did his strengthening repetitions for his feet and ankles, and went upstairs to complete his yoga. His pot of tea was empty by the time he completed his work. He changed back into his leggings and tee in the children’s bathroom. Then he stationed himself in the children’s study.

What the study needed was a cozy chair or settee, and an accompanying side table. Or perhaps a table that folded away when the children did not need it, and a pair of settees that encouraged lounging with a good book? He tugged the rug back into place, and threw the bedraggled flowers that remained in the vase on the children’s memory shelf out of the window. The three chairs that sat before the bookcase desks did not look particularly conducive for lounging, so he made himself comfortable on the rug with a book he chose at random. He hadn’t read but a page or two before Bain’s door opened and the boy traipsed to the bathroom. When he came out, he spotted Thran and raised a hand in greeting.
“Morning, Thran. What’s up?”

“Your Da has the flu. He is asleep, thank goodness. I wanted to be near if you or Legolas or especially Tilda woke up in need of something, so that I could help you while your Da rests.”

“Da has the flu?” Bain gaped. “Oh, that’s bad. Da never gets sick.”

“He has this time. He has a fever and is too dizzy to stand up.”

Bain gave Thran a worried look. “What are we going to do?”

“You and I will figure that out. We are the healthy ones, yes? So it is up to us.”

Bain considered that. “I guess we are. What do we do first?”

“See to the sick. I will be the dispenser of medicines and so forth. Legolas will not need much, but he should not bounce too much.”

“Did Sigrid get to her job?” At Thran’s nod, Bain considered again. “So she’s out of the picture until this afternoon.”

“Do you know when Sigrid’s job finishes? Three o’clock?”

“I think that’s what she said,” Bain nodded, coming to sit down on the rug facing Thran.

“So I will pick her up then. You and Legolas will be in charge while I am gone. So that leaves Tilda. She was up during the night again, I think because of her ear. So she will not be her usual self. She will need her pills and distraction.”

“I would say lots of games of Dinky Farm, but Da doesn’t like us to play video games when we’re sick.”

“We have plenty of books and drawing things and games,” Thran suggested. “And homework. We will decide once we see how she feels.”

“What next?” Bain asked.

“Food. We all need food. Breakfast and lunch, they are not so hard. Supper... I will need your help with that.”

“Maybe we can do something in the crockpot again? That’d be easy.”

“We will see what the freezer has for us.”

Another door opened, and Legolas appeared. He looked into the children’s study with curiosity. “What’s going on?”

“Take your turn in the bathroom, then come back,” Thran asked. “We plot strategy for the day.”

“Da’s got the flu,” Bain added.

“Oh, that’s not good,” Legolas breathed. “Okay, back in a minute.”

He disappeared into the bathroom, reappearing shortly with a clean face and combed hair. He sat with Thran and Bard on the floor.
“Why are we up here?” he asked.

“Because Kukla is still asleep, and I do not want her to wake Bard if she needs something,” Thran explained. “He has not slept more than an hour or two in the past two days, and he is exhausted. He must rest or he will get sicker. So until Kukla wakes up and we explain that we will see to her until Bard feels better, someone must stay near.”

Legolas nodded. “Makes sense.”

“So Thran’s the medicine man,” Bain explained. “We were just about to figure out the food.”

“Breakfast and lunch we will do as always,” Thran said. “For supper, Bain and I will see what the freezer offers us, then we will figure out how to cook it.”

“I can help, too,” Legolas protested.

“You still recover from your cold,” Thran replied. “So Bain and I will see to the food preparation. Are you hungry? If you would listen here for Tilda, Bain and I could make us something to eat. Eggs, or chicken soup, or something else?”

A third door opened, and there came Tilda, rubbing her eyes. She caught sight of her brothers and Thran in the children’s study, and came over. “Why are you in here?”

“Good morning, Kukla,” Thran wished her. “Here, take your turn in the bathroom, and then we will tell you. Are you hungry?”

A sleepy nod. “And I’m not so stuffed up this morning.”

“That is good. So go, and then you can hear what goes on.”

“Okay, Ada,” Tilda yawned and took her turn in the bathroom. When she came out, her hair was still rumpled.

“Let us go downstairs, children. Bain and I will make breakfast, and Kukla and Legolas will rest quietly in the sitting room.”

“Go get your brush, Kukla,” Legolas asked Tilda. “While Papa and Bain make our breakfast, I’ll brush your hair for you. It’s very tangled.”

Tilda brightened. “Would you make braids for me like yours?”

Legolas nodded. “On both sides and in the back, too, if you like.”

Tilda’s return to her room was faster than she’d moved in several days, which brought a smile to Thran’s face. When she had her brush and comb, the foursome started down the stairs. As they came into the kitchen, Tilda craned her head to look in the sitting room.

“Where’s Da?” she asked. A confused frown wrinkled her brow.

Both of the boys looked at Thran, so he led them all into the sitting room to sit down. “Your Da is upstairs in bed, Tilda. It is his turn to have the flu, so he is asleep.”

Tilda sat stock still for a heartbeat, then gulped. “Oh, no... I made Da sick. He got it from me, didn’t he?”

Her face scrunched up as she started to cry.
“No, Kukla, no,” Thran scrambled to gather her up into his lap. “You did not make your Da sick, no more than anyone else did. Please, do not worry. You did not make him sick.”

“Yes, I did!” she sniffed. “He sat with me all night because my ear hurt, and it’s my fault!”

“Oy, tcha, moya Russkaya Kukla,” Thran hugged her. “He comforted you when you felt so bad, and that did not make him sick, not at all! In fact, I think his love for all of us has kept him well for a very long time. But today he has done too much, to see to us and the house and his art, and the germs found him to be an easy target because he worked so long and so hard at all the things he loved. So he must rest, and then he will be well again. But we must work together to make sure that he does rest.”

“Oh, that’s no lie,” Bain exhaled, patting Tilda’s knee. “Trying to get Da to stop doing stuff is like trying to stop the zombie apocalypse, or that annoying pink rabbit with the drum.”

That got a chuckle from Legolas and Thran, and even Tilda managed a thoughtful look.

“He doesn’t ever stop,” Legolas admitted.

“No, he does not,” Thran agreed. “So, Kukla, this is why your brothers and I were upstairs. We planned ways to see that your Da rests, without worry. So far, we have agreed that I am the one to give out the medicines.”

“Thran and I are the cooks,” Bain chipped in.

“So what do Legolas and I do?” Tilda asked.

“Mostly rest,” Thran answered. “It is important that both of you get well, too. Tomorrow, if both of you feel better, we will think about other things. Perhaps he would like someone to read to him. But today, we will be quiet, and work on the homework. And when your Da wakes, we will all insist that he must stay in bed. We will bring him food on a tray, and lots of tea, and books if he wants to read. But he must spend most of his time at rest.”

“Should we let him draw?” Tilda asked.

“Perhaps a little,” Thran shrugged. “We will all watch carefully to make sure he does not get too tired, yes?”

Three children nodded in reply, drawing Thran’s reassuring smile. “Good, we have our plans. Soon, Bain, you and I will sort out the supper. But first, a light breakfast. What would everyone like?”

Eggs seemed to be the children’s consensus, so Thran made scrambled eggs while Bain scrounged for the last of the muffins, butter, and jelly. As Thran worked, he studied how Bain sliced the muffins, buttered each half, and ran them under the broiler once the eggs were close to done. He also kept an ear tuned to Legolas and Tilda as the former combed the latter’s hair. When he called them to the table, Tilda appeared with a big smile to accompany Legolas’s neat braids. Thran was quick to compliment his son’s handiwork, and to comment how nice Tilda looked with them. He also made sure to give Tilda her antibiotic and some yogurt with her eggs.

After breakfast, Legolas and Tilda went back into the sitting room to rest while Bain and Thran cleaned up. Then Bain considered the freezer.

“What looks good?” Thran asked, as he put away the egg bowl.

Bain shook his head. “Wow. Da’s got more stuff in here than a store. There must be two weeks of “Then we can have our pick,” Thran looked over Bain’s shoulder. “Of things we know how to cook, at least. We have enough chicken soup for today’s lunch. We can make more if we think we will need it tomorrow. But perhaps something different for supper.”

“Look at this,” Bain dug out a package. “A bag of corn tortillas. We could make enchilada casserole.”

“Do you know how?” Thran cast Bain a look.

“More or less,” Bain hedged, shrugging. “Da mixes up a lot of ground beef with Mexican spices, then layers the tortillas with the meat and cheese in a big pan, then he bakes it.”

“That sounds within our abilities,” Thran agreed. “Perhaps we can find a recipe on the Internet to help us make such a thing?”

“That’d be good,” Bain nodded. “That’d give Legolas and Til a way to help – they can find the recipe.”

“Good idea,” Thran agreed. “Let us pose the challenge to them.”

The children quickly put their heads together around Legolas’s laptop to look up interesting recipes. That was another thing Thran needed to see to – Tilda had no computer, nor did Bard, and Sigrid’s and Bain’s were likely old. Tilda would surely need one by the next school year, as she would enter the middle school grades. Bard needed one to check his art website, and to email clients and Bilbo. Sigrid might be able to coax hers to last through her senior year of high school, but she would need a new one for college. Bain would make good use of one for high school, and would need a new one for college. This summer, then, they would make some computer company very happy.

The children found several recipes that sounded interesting, but given their collective cooking expertise, they discarded the ones with too many ingredients, or too complicated instructions, or ingredients they didn’t have. At last Legolas pointed to the screen.

“What about this one? It’s for taco filling, but that’s mostly what we need, anyway. If we have the filling, we can do whatever we want with it – make tacos, or the layers in the pan.”

“See what it says, then,” Bain agreed.

“Hm, maybe not,” Legolas said. “This one calls for a beef roast that you put in a crockpot.”

“So we use ground beef instead of a roast,” Bain shrugged. “Check the spices.”

“Taco seasoning, cumin, pepper, and cilantro,” Tilda read. “We have all of those, right?”

“Right,” Bain nodded. “How much beef?”

“They say three pounds, and three packages of taco seasoning,” Legolas read.

“We have that much ground beef,” Thran called from the kitchen.

“It’s easy,” Legolas read. “Just put everything in the crockpot and cook for a long time.”

“I vote for that one,” Bain said. “We have all the stuff, we don’t have to do much, and when it’s done, we can make tacos, or burritos, or enchilada casserole.”
“Uh-oh,” Tilda said. “The meat’s supposed to be thawed. Ours is frozen.”

“Aha, I know the answer to that one,” Thran said with a grin. “We will thaw the meat in the microwave, and then put it in the crockpot.”

“Perfect,” Bain nodded. “Okay, we’ve got supper planned.”

“Can we make that gelatin fruit thing I like?” Tilda asked. “It’d feel good on a sore throat.”

“I’m sorry, Kukla. I don’t know how to make that,” Thran said regretfully.

“I do,” Tilda smiled. “Bain knows, too. It takes only five minutes and then it goes in the fridge to set.”

“Then we will do that,” Thran agreed. “So, Bain, let us see whether we can make more supper than mess!”

Bain snickered. “Is that a challenge?”

“Remember that we must clean up after ourselves.”

“Oh, that’s no good, then,” Bain sighed. “I guess we’ll have to go for the supper.”

Thran put the ground beef in the microwave to thaw while Bain perused the pantry for gelatin and fruit. While the boy assembled the gelatin concoction, Thran got the meat and spices in the crockpot and turned it on. The only things to clean up were the bowl and utensils Bain had used, so they were soon back in the sitting room to savor a sense of accomplishment. Thran went upstairs to check on Bard; blessedly, he was still sound asleep. He looked comfortable, so Thran left him undisturbed. The children worked quietly on their homework in the sitting room until lunchtime, when Thran warmed up Bard’s chicken soup. After lunch, while Tilda and Legolas napped, Bain cajoled Thran to play a video game with him, so Thran allowed himself to get sucked into the zombie apocalypse. Bain, sensing an easy time of it, chortled to himself with unseemly glee, but after a few games, Thran improved, and even had Bain on the run a time or two.

“Aha, I have you!” Thran grinned, as he sent his zombie racing after Bain’s hunter. “Die, zombie hunter!”

“No, you die, zombie!” Bain exhorted, as he sent his avatar milling after Thran’s with a huge machete. “Off with your head!”

“No, off with yours!” Thran shot back, as his zombie ducked Bain’s attack and circled around. “Then I eat your brain for lunch!”

Thran’s mobile chimed. He was so intent on the game that he didn’t recall why it had a reason to ring. Ah, Sigrid! He had to pick up Sigrid at the bistro. He charged his zombie in a furious attack against Bain’s zombie hunter, until it had grabbed Bain’s machete to hack at him. A few bloody seconds later, he was rewarded with a garish scene of his zombie stuffing its decaying face with the bloody remnants of zombie hunter brains.

“That sucks,” Bain exhaled in exasperation.

“Yes, that is what my zombie does – it sucks down your brains, ha, ha!” Thran set the controller aside. “So, I must leave to pick up Sigrid. You have the helm, Lieutenant Bain.”

“Aye, Captain Thran,” Bain grinned. “You’re getting too good at this game.”
“There is hope for me yet,” Thran offered Bain a slight bow. “I will be only a few minutes.”

“Don’t worry,” Bain waved a nonchalant hand. “If Da tries to get up, I’ll rally the security forces and we’ll hold him down.”

“Very good, Lieutenant. Back soon.”

Thran got the SUV out of the carriage house, and was soon on his way to the village. He didn’t find a parking space in front of the Blue Mountain Bistro, so he parked down the street and walked back to the shop. The aroma by the door was alluring enough, but inside, it was a far better incentive to indulge in a decadent coffee than any advertisement. Thran took a deep, appreciative sniff as he studied the open bags of coffee beans for sale; then the racks of syrups and flavorings; then the menu of pastries, sandwiches, soups, and beverages. He spotted Sigrid behind the counter, and waved a greeting.

“Hi, Ada!” Sigrid waved back. “Miss Dís, this is my Ada, Thran Oropherson.”

“It is nice to meet you,” Thran offered his hand. The hand that met his was firm and assured. “You have a most deliciously aromatic shop.”

Dís was a short, stout, vigorous woman, with curly, dark brown hair just touched at the temples with grey. She wore it in two long braids wound around her head and fastened with carved silver clasps. A handsome headband threaded with sparkling sapphire beads circled her head in front of the wrapped braids, looking more like a tiara than utilitarian head wrap. She heaved a new bag of coffee beans effortlessly up to the counter for display, brushed off her hands, and offered Thran an appreciative laugh. “Aye, it’s that. That’s the best sales pitch I can make. In warmer weather, I just leave the door open, and business doubles, even in August.”

“I well imagine,” Thran grinned. “I apologize to interrupt, but I wanted to tell Sigrid that I am parked up the street when she is ready to go. I will run some errands, so at your convenience.”

“Goodness, it’s three already,” Dís checked the wall clock. “That’s it for you today, lass. You pulled your weight, and I thank you for it. Eight-thirty tomorrow, remember.”

“Yes, ma’am,” Sigrid nodded. “I’ll be here. Thanks for showing me everything.”

“More thanks to you for catching on so fast. It’ll be as busy tomorrow, but the Sunday crowd likes a bit slower pace, so you’ll have more time to catch your breath. I'll see you then, Sigrid.”

“All right,” Sigrid untied her apron and hung it up on the row of hooks behind the counter. “Bye! Bye, Dana!”

“Bye, lass!” Dís smiled, and the other girl behind the counter smiled and waved farewell. Thran held the door for Sigrid to exit the shop, then followed her out.

“All right,” Sigrid’s sharp eyes skewered Thran. “What’s wrong with Da?”

Thran snickered, then explained how sick Bard was, even revealing how he’d barely made it into the house before fainting. The girl’s eyes grew round and her mouth shaped a silent O.

“Oh, gods,” she breathed as Thran opened the SUV door for her.

“And how did you fare today?” Thran asked, when he’d gotten behind the wheel.

“My cold wasn’t too bad. In fact, Dana’s was worse, I think. But I washed my hands a lot, and Miss Dís made up most of the sandwiches, so all we had to do was to put the pastries on a plate and make the beverages. We had gloves to wear. I haven’t learned the cash register yet, but I’ve got the espresso machine down, and I can do the coffee scale, so it was a good day. I saw Da’s rep, Mr.
Baggins, and his nephew. They came in for lunch, and said to tell Da they said hello.”

“So a good day,” Thran concluded. “So I will tell you what the other children and I have done today...”

He detailed their efforts at food, which seemed to impress Sigrid. “I’m surprised Da wasn’t in there with you, no matter how sick he is.”

“I put him to bed, and he has slept all day since eight this morning. He is exhausted.”

Sigrid’s expression turned hard. “He’s been exhausted for ten years. And that Steffen Masters... he’s nothing but a maggot. He took such advantage.”

“He is in deep shit, as they say, so waste no anger on him,” Thran assured the girl. “Instead, you must plot with the rest of us to make sure your Da stays in bed asleep as long as possible, and then he stays in bed until he is over his flu.”

Sigrid’s expression turned impish. “We should take turns doing what Da does to us when we have to stay in bed. He tells the most amazing stories, all of them made up. They weren’t in a book where we could read them for ourselves; we had to stay in bed if we wanted to hear the end. Worked like a charm.”

Thran filed that away. It might be the perfect solution to many of the things he’d thought about in the past several days.

They reached home without mishap or delay, and came into the house to find Bain hadn't moved from in front of the TV, happily blasting at zombies. Legolas and Tilda were still asleep, and Bain had heard nothing from Bard. Thran saw for himself that Bard remained asleep when he peeked into the bedroom.

Good. Bard was resting, supper was in the crockpot, and the children were at peace.

Thran allowed himself a small smile. It seemed that the gods were just as interested in Bard’s recovery as he was. As he came back down to sit with the children, he sent them a silent thank you.
Chapter 121

Chapter Summary

While a saint drifts, an angel is just the anchor Clan Ffyrnig needs.

Chapter Notes

I don't hold any rights to Hellboy, Abe Sapien, or Liz, but I think they'd be fun to have as friends :-)

Bard floated in darkness, far away from all physical sensation except ease without effort. Was he floating? Was he even in his body? He certainly wasn’t on earth. In the dark, a veil seemed to hang before him, a veil that was normally invisible and impenetrable, but today, it was the simplest thing to pass through it like so much colorless vapor. And what lay on the other side was magical – a world full of trees and glades, a forest that stretched as far as he could see, but what a forest it was! It was aglow with so much more of every sensation, be it color, life, freshness, tactile depth, or smell. He seemed to see each leaf individually as it grew, each blade of grass as it lengthened. Each creature among the trees and glades – coral red birds, mossy yellow butterflies, and sooty black squirrels – seemed effused with an aura whose color fluctuated as the creature moved. The temperature was slightly cool, but comfortably so, and the sun was out in a deep blue sky full of puffy clouds that cast dancing shadows over the land.

Above it all, he floated, drawn this way and that, towards whatever caught his eye...

What was that flash of white?

Without effort, he was beside the flash of white.

An angel stood straight and tall on a small, treeless hillock, his head thrown back and his arms stretched wide to embrace the sun.

Long, white hair blew and drifted on an unfelt breeze around his head like a corona.

Even longer white wings at full extension flared high over the angel’s head.

Pale, translucent skin pulsed with life, so delicate that arteries and veins traced impossibly thin paths over arms and legs and chest. Despite his dark eyebrows, only a delicate fuzz of white clothed the rest of his body. A cloud of white pubic hair enrobéd a cock as long and as elegant as the rest of the angel, an earthy touch that did nothing to dissipate the ethereal aura that surrounded him.

The angel opened his eyes. They were silver grey, luminous, and warm, and met Bard’s eyes with a smile. He furled his wings, and dropped to one knee in a graceful bow.

“You came.”

Bard felt mild surprise as if from a lifetime away. “Did I?”
“I had only just thought about you, and here you are.”

“Where is here?”

“A fair, green land.”

Bard hummed as he looked around. The angel rose to stand beside him, watching him with a tender smile as Bard took in the surrounding forest. Each leaf, each creature, even those unseen, were known to him, and pulsed with life and breath.

Bard cast the angel a bemused look. “Am I supposed to be here?”

“I asked for you to be here.”

“Why?”

The angel enfolded him in his arms, and his wings unfurled to surround him, too. “Is that so hard to divine, my saint?”

“Um, because I’m dead?”

The angel laughed softly. “No, because you have worked much too hard, and you need a rest. This is a beautiful place to rest, yes?”

Bard looked around again. “It is. I’ve never seen anything like it.”

“Likely you won’t again for a long time.”

“It’s so alive here. And beautiful.”

“So it is.”

“I don’t understand.”

The angel brushed a soft kiss on Bard’s hair. “You don’t have to. Just be.”

Bard inched his arms around the angel’s torso, shut his eyes, and soaked up everything the angel had to give him – warmth, softness, calm. When he opened his eyes, the forest around him had faded. When the angel’s feathers encircled him, the light turned pale alabaster, filtered as it was through the angel’s pearly wings of pink, cream, white, and pale ecru. The feathers buffered the sun’s warmth into a delicious cocoon that lulled him back to sleep. He floated away again on a cushion of air. He couldn’t remember the last time he’d felt so relaxed and peaceful.

When he opened his eyes again, the forest and the angel were gone. This was his bedroom. He felt impossibly thin and light, without an ounce of strength in his body. It was an indescribable blessing to lie in bed, so swathed in sheets and blankets, without having to move. But he had to move – his bladder was full almost to the point of pain. He managed to untangle himself from the bedding, though it almost made him cry to force such a spent body to move. The bathroom seemed miles away, years away. But he managed to stagger there, get the job done, and stagger back to bed without collapsing. Exhaustion grabbed him with both hands and pulled him down into sleep.

He had the most vivid dreams...

He walked in an endless bazaar, pausing before a shop where beautiful lanterns festooned the rafters like molten fruit.
A little farther on, a spice shop stretched to infinity with sacks and bins full of spices he’d never heard of, but which smelled heavenly.

Two people in suits and stern eyeglasses fit for the high court dispassionately discussed the merits of replacing a belly dancer’s arms with snakes.

To one side, a dark passage radiated down into the depths of the earth, lit down its length with a string of overhead light bulbs, and shadowy tables gleamed underneath with more displays of wares. People seemed to come back and forth from that passage without emotion, but as Bard passed it a dark sense of all-consuming, primal terror radiated forth, and he scampered through the throng to pass it by as quickly as possible.

Ahead, a rainbow of draperies whirled in a pinwheel as a shop clerk stood before it, working the crowd with a spiel fit for any used car lot – or strip joint.

Baskets of jewelry beckoned next, children’s strings of pop beads and native fetish charms intermingled with bangles from Cartier and Tiffany.

Was that a wand shop?

Two fur trappers in head-to-toe frontier costumes squatted near a flickering campfire as they smoked clay pipes and dickered over the price of beaver pelts.

In a used book shop, a familiar ten-year-old girl with warm brown eyes and curly dark brown hair caught in an untidy braid looked up from a book of fairytales, but she was gone too quickly for Bard to speak to her.

A hulking red demon with a flame over his head and wide-arching horns stomped by with a cigar clenched in his teeth. Beside him, a slight, blue-skinned biped with huge eyes and some sort of breathing apparatus kept pace. Bard lifted a hand in greeting.

“Hey, Hellboy, Abe. Give Liz my regards.”

“Why, thank you,” Abe replied politely. “I’ll be sure to do so.”

“Man, that one’s flying far afield today,” Hellboy grunted to Abe, who gave Bard a sympathetic smile as they passed.

A teahouse loomed ahead, so Bard drifted inside. Or was this an opium den? Or a bathhouse? Everything seemed to shift and drift and change each time Bard looked around. A small girl in a cleaner’s robe and sandals led him to a room with a bathing tub in it, so he thought away his clothes and sank into the nearly boiling water with a sense of relief. Gods, such fiery heat would burn away all the impurities inside him. It would be bliss to lie there forever until the water cooled, but it turned icy at once and he was too chilled to climb out. A bedraggled stuffed rabbit took his hand to pull him out of the tub – not a drop of water clung to him – and into a warm bed. He didn’t have the strength to wrap the covers around him, but they snugged close of their own accord, and he dove back into the beckoning arms of sleep.

After an eon, he slowly, slowly roused. He was back in the bedroom. The room had darkened as if the sun had just fallen below the horizon, and a tall figure moved silently around the room. He managed to shift his index finger, hoping to get the attention of the figure, but it was such a small gesture that he didn’t expect to succeed. To his surprise, though, the figure turned towards him.

“It is time to get up,” the figure said into the dark.
“Is it?” Bard said faintly. “I feel so tired.”

“You have to get up. The circus is here.”

“The circus?”

The tall figure raised a hand, and the wall of the room behind the bed vanished. To the north in an open field, a big white pavilion topped with a long crimson pennant rose above the grass. No sooner had Bard registered the pavilion than he and the tall figure stood just outside it. Yes, the tall figure was the same angel he’d seen before.

“I thought you said I wouldn’t see this again.”

The angel turned towards him with a fond smile. “This is not the forest. This is the circus. You have not seen this before, and you likely won’t see it again, either, so look closely at all you see. It is a rare sight.”

They went inside the tent. A throng was already there, most staring at the stage where the angel stood, whirling around and around on pointe like a top while juggling at least seven small red balls. His hair streamed around him in that same corona, but a close-fitting Harlequin suit of black and green and white clothed him from head to wrist and toe, and his wings were tightly furled close to his body. Frowning, Bard looked at the angel beside him, who smiled in appreciation of the juggling dancer’s skill. He was now clothed in the same livery as his dancing counterpart.

“You have a twin?” Bard asked.

The angel beside him shook his head. “Even twins are not identical. See?”

The angel pointed to the juggling dancer on stage as a second figure in matching livery joined him. Was that he? His counterpart smoothly received the juggling balls that the angel tossed to him, spinning them around a time or two before he sent them back to the angel. A small glowing circlet hovered a few inches above his head.

“Right. I’ve turned into a nightlight,” Bard observed as his counterpart circled the spinning dancer, tossing the balls back and forth. The angel beside him laughed softly.

“It is not such a bad thing to be a light in the dark,” the angel teased gently.

“It might be helpful during a power failure,” Bard allowed. “Saves a hand to hold the torch.”

The two performers completed their dance, offered the crowd a bow and a wave to their counterparts, then disappeared in a blink. The audience vanished with them, and the tent was empty and lifeless, but for one small illuminated point on the stage. When Bard found himself beside it, the tent disappeared, leaving him in the field. The small circle still glowed, so Bard stooped and reached a hand out to it – it was the saint’s halo. But no matter how he tried to pick it up, it ignored his touch, and continued to lie gleaming in the grass.

“Why do you want to touch it?” the angel beside him asked curiously.

Bard tried again to pick up the halo, but he felt only a sense of warmth, without substance that he could grasp. “I just want to see what it feels like.”

“That is another thing you already know,” the angel shrugged.

“I don’t think it is,” Bard looked up at the angel. “All I feel is a faint warmth.”
"That is all it is."

"Why does it glow?"

"Because it is a halo, yes?" the angel explained. "The metaphysical manifestation of sainthood is a halo."

Bard blinked. "I have no idea what that means, or if it's even right."

The angel turned mischievous eyes on him. "That is a good answer. Such a trinket cannot fool you, then."

"That makes no sense."

"Ah, my poor saint, always trying to make sense, to make order. Think of what is behind the symbol, then."

Bard stared down at the halo, and thought about Old Masters paintings and long-suffering nurses. It wasn't until he thought about fighting dragons and phoenixes in Chinese scroll paintings that the halo faded into the grass, and corresponding warmth grew in his body.

"Yes, it is time to go back," the angel said, drawing him up. "Too much of anything generates heat."

He was back in bed, lying flat, but he plummeted towards sleep again as if from an immense height. He fell without hesitation.

Eons passed. Stars turned, seasons changed, snow fell and melted and fell again. The heat within him melted the snow and warmed the earth, and he woke again, feeling as wrung dry as bones in a desert. The bed, yes, the dark room, yes, the tall figure moving silently, yes. He moved his whole hand this time, and the figure turned towards him to sit on the bed beside him. A long, slender hand pressed against his forehead.

"Are you awake, lyubov moya?"

"That depends," Bard mumbled. Gods, the effort to form words had grown exponentially harder.

"That depends?" the figure repeated. "Depends on what?"

"On whether you want to talk metaphysics again. If you do, I'm not."

"Not what?"

"Awake."

The figure paused. "This sounds suspiciously like metaphysics to me. But you still run a fever, so perhaps you merely talk nonsense."

"Look who's talking. You just told me that the metaphysical manifestation of sainthood was a halo."

A soft chuckle. "Did I?"

Bard nodded. "It was just outside the circus tent."

"Of course."

Bard pried his eyes open to look at the figure suspiciously. "Where are your wings?"
“I thought they might frighten you, so I made them invisible. Are you hungry?”

“I don’t think so.”

“Is your stomach upset? Do you feel nauseated?”

Bard thought about that. His head was light, his body felt boneless, and he was alternately hot and cold, but his stomach was quiet, so he shook his head.

“Perhaps you would humor me to sip a few mouthfuls of broth, then.”

“Is it chicken?”

“Yes.”

“What, no carrots or onions?”

“There is essence of both in your broth, yes. Perhaps a little celery, too. Come, let me prop up your pillows for you.”

The tall figure leaned down to switch on the light beside the bed, which made Bard blink at the sudden illumination. Before his eyes adjusted, two hands took hold of the pillow under his head and eased it up to slip another one behind it. Bard fell back against the pillows, his strength too thready to shift one way or the other. Thran sat down on the side of the bed and took up a mug and a spoon.

“Now, just a spoonful or two. You need a little something to sustain you until your fever breaks.”

Thran dipped a spoon half full of broth, and brought it to Bard’s lips. It smelled good, so he opened his mouth and let the broth trickle in.

“Good,” he whispered.

“Thank our Sigrid,” Thran murmured with a smile. “We made tacos for supper, and of course that would be too hard for you to eat, so when she said so, Bain and I made soup for you. For now, you must confine yourself to the broth, but it is full of good things, so it will help you.”

Thran fed Bard several spoonfuls of broth. With each one, the surreal floating sensation faded, and Bard felt more rooted. He glanced at Thran sitting beside him so patiently.

“I dreamed you were an angel, and we went to the circus.”

“I gathered as much,” Thran admitted. “And you and your angel discussed metaphysics, I think?”

“He wanted to, but I was too tired. So we just watched the jugglers. And before that, we were in a forest. It was so amazing, Thran. I thought it was heaven.”

“Tcha,” Thran gave him a tender smile with his next spoonful of broth. “We are in heaven here, are we not? We are in our house, and our children are here, and all is well.”

“Are the children all right?”

“They are well, lyubov moya. Do not worry. Legolas and Sigrid are on the mend, and Tilda is not far behind. Her ear is much improved. So all is well.”

“Okay.” Just swallowing a few mouthfuls of soup and asking a few questions had exhausted him, and his eyes fell closed no matter how much he wanted to keep them open. He managed to swallow his last sip of broth before he fell into the void again.

* * *

Thran set the mug of broth aside. His poor saint, so drained that a few words and even fewer sips of broth were all he could manage before he fell back into sleep. He could hardly call it dreamless sleep, given the hints of what Bard had seen – magical forests, circuses, and angels who discussed arcane minutiae were surely not all of the wonders he’d experienced. If Bard remembered his visions once his fever broke, perhaps he would tell Thran more about them. They sounded fascinating.

He made sure Bard was well swaddled in his sheets and blankets, and left the light on to orient Bard if he woke again. Then he took the broth downstairs, dumped what little remained down the sink, washed the spoon, and put the mug in the dishwasher. Supper was done – the tacos had met with approval – the kitchen was clean, and the children were reading together in the sitting room. Sigrid was all but asleep, and Tilda and Legolas were quiet, so Bain had handled the majority of the reading chores. When Thran came in, Bain paused in his reading, and all of the children looked up at him.

“How’s Da?” Bain asked.

“He took a little of the broth. He still has the fever, but he sleeps now. He told me he has had several vivid dreams.”

“Dreams?” Tilda looked thoughtful. “I had dreams last night, too, when my ear didn’t wake me up. I thought Mr. Bun and I went to the cheese shop, but when we got there, he said he didn’t like cheese, so he bought a box of clover blossoms instead. I didn’t know you could buy those in a shop.”

“I don’t think you can, Kukla,” Legolas considered.

“It seemed so real,” Tilda said.

“The dreams I have when I have a fever seem so real, too,” Legolas replied. “And I think they stay with you better than regular dreams do.”

“Why is that?” Sigrid murmured, though her eyes were still closed.

“The doctors of the West might tell you that the heat of the fever does it.” Thran sat down between Tilda and Sigrid. “But other people say that when you have a fever, the boundaries between this world and others become very thin, and it is easy to slip through to other places.”

“Other places?” Sigrid’s eyes opened, alive with interest. “What other places?”

“No one can say for sure.”

“Maybe they’re other dimensions in the multiverse,” Bain grinned.

“Perhaps so,” Thran grinned back. “Some cultures say that clowns and fools were originally the gatekeepers between here and there, which I think gives clowns a more magical glamor than a humorous one.”

“So they’re shamans,” Sigrid summarized. “Intercessors to the gods.”

“They’re creepy,” Bain snorted. “I don’t like them.”
“That one in the zombie apocalypse game is worse than creepy,” Legolas made a face. “He’s the best advertisement for why you should never trust a clown.”

“That’s the truth,” Bain shook his head. “I go for him first. Get him out of the way.”

“I like my clown doll,” Tilda observed. “She’s cute.”

“She’s not a real clown,” Bain protested. “She’s a pixie pretending to be a clown. That’s not scary.”

“Not all clowns are scary, Bain,” Sigrid sniffed. “You think that the only real clowns are the scary ones, but they aren’t. Tilda could tell you that your zombie clown isn’t a real one, it’s a zombie pretending to be a clown, and she’d be just as right as you are. But we’ve gone off point, as my English teacher would say. So Da’s still got a fever, and he’s had dreams. Did he say what he dreamed about?”

“The circus,” Thran teased, which got a laugh from the children. “But no clowns. Jugglers, he said, and a magical forest. He may have wonderful things to tell us when he wakes up.”

“Maybe so.” Sigrid stood up with a groan. “Ugh. I’m tired.”

“A long day,” Thran observed. “A new job with so many things to learn, and recently recovered from the flu.”

Sigrid nodded. “I’m off to the shower, and then I’ll go to bed, because when I wake up, I have to go to the bistro again.”

“Eight-thirty, yes?” Thran prompted. At Sigrid’s nod, he said, “Then I will get up at quarter to eight to make your breakfast and get you to the bistro on time.”

Sigrid leaned over to kiss Thran’s cheek. “Thanks, Ada. I’ll see you in the morning. Night, everyone.”

“Night, Sigrid,” the children and Thran chorused, and Sigrid took herself upstairs with a smile and a wave. Bain resumed his reading, and continued while the shower ran. In a few more minutes, Bain reached the end of the chapter of their Harry Potter tome, and Legolas went upstairs to bathe. Bain went with him to get ready for his turn, leaving Tilda with Thran.

“Will Da be all right tomorrow, do you think?” she asked as she climbed into Thran’s lap.

“We must wait and see, but I know we both hope so, Kukla,” Thran replied, gathering Tilda into his arms. As the little girl pressed her ear to Thran’s chest, he stroked her back. “Does your ear hurt?”

She snuggled against Thran’s chest. “Not any more. I guess the medicine has worked.”

“It has begun to work. You must take all of it to make sure that it continues to work.”

“Okay.”

“Tonight, if your ear hurts, you will call me, and I will come to help you, yes? We must let your Da rest.”

“I’ll remember,” Tilda nodded. “I hope it doesn’t hurt. I just want to sleep.”

“I will ask Mr. Bun to whisper a lullaby into your ear so that it does not hurt.”

“Can you do that?” Tilda sat up to look at Thran. “He doesn’t listen very well.”
“He will listen this time. He loves you very much and would not want you to feel bad. So I will tell him that, and he will agree that it will be a good thing to do.”

Tilda accepted that with a hum of agreement. His saint was so good at using humor and whimsy with the children, so how gratifying was it for Tilda to affirm that Thran had learned to employ them, too? He was content to sit with this small gem in his lap, chatting of this and that, until the shower stopped running. He urged Tilda upstairs to take her turn, and saw to the boys while he waited for Tilda to wash. Legolas was ready to sleep, so Thran got him comfortably tucked in. Bain didn’t need to go to bed so early, as he didn’t suffer from any of the ills that plagued his siblings.

“Is it okay if I play video games for a while?” he asked Thran.

“I will get Tilda into bed, and then I will wash. You must take the helm to listen for trouble up here until I am done. Then I will watch over the sick. If you want to play your games until eleven, that is fine. After that, you can read in your room.”

“Okay, Captain,” Bain grinned. “It was fun being in charge today. Getting to cook and stuff.”

“I am glad you liked it,” Thran returned Bain’s grin, “because we will do so again tomorrow. We have enough of the meat to make the casserole for supper, perhaps? We have soup for your Da.”

“So we’ll need lunch, that’s all.”

Thran nodded. “We will have fun to figure out something. But for now, I will see to Tilda.”

“Aye, Captain Thran.” Bain threw a crisp salute.

Thran returned the gesture with a chuckle. “You are a good lieutenant, Bain. With you to help me, we will get through tomorrow very well.”

“Okay, Thran. See you in a bit.”

Thran raised a hand in acknowledgement, then went into Tilda’s room. He helped her comb her hair, and made a big show of whispering into Mr. Bun’s ear about the lullaby to soothe her ear. She rewarded him with a big smile and a hug, and settled quickly into bed.

Thran eased into his bedroom, but Bard was solidly asleep. Thran wrapped his braid around his head, washed his face in the sink, and then got into the shower to wash off the day’s efforts. When he was clean and dry, he let Bain know that he was back on duty, so Bain scampered downstairs to indulge in his video game.

Thran came back to the bedroom to consider his husband. Bard remained quiet, so Thran shed his shirt and leggings and laid them by his side of the bed, close to hand if any of the children needed him during the night. He laid a light hand on Bard’s forehead; yes, still warm. It was hard to tell whether he dreamed or not, but Thran eased as delicately as possible under the sheets so as not to disturb him. Should he curl around him, to help him stay warm? Should he stay away, to reduce his chances of catching Bard’s flu?

Thran smirked. The entire house was bathed in so many cold and flu germs that holding his husband would make no difference. Let him do what he could to comfort lyubov yego, then.

Just as he slid closer, Bard began to shiver. That seemed to affirm Thran’s decision, so he eased closer until Bard fit snugly against his chest. In a few seconds, Bard’s shivers calmed, but just as quickly, his temperature spiked again. Thran didn’t find the excess heat unpleasant, so stayed close at Bard’s back. The sudden increase calmed after a few minutes, and Bard lay quiet. Thran closed his eyes, and let himself drift towards sleep...

“Thran?”

Blinking, Thran stroked Bard’s shoulder. “I am here, Bard.”

“I have to get up.”

“Do you?”

“Toilet.”

“I will help you, lyubov moya. All is well.”

Thran supported his husband as they made their way into the bathroom, where Bard managed to do what was needed without making too much of a mess. Thran got him back to bed, and quickly brought him some acetaminophen and some water.

“For your fever, Bard,” he coaxed. Bard was glassy eyed and seemed halfway to somewhere else, but he got the pills and water down before he fell back into his pillow. Thran got him under the covers again, and by the time he returned the glass to the bathroom and came back to bed, Bard had fallen fast asleep again.

Steps on the stairs announced the end to Bain’s video game foray, so all of the children were in bed. Thran turned off the light, and lay back with a sigh.

This might be a very long night.

* * *

Bard wandered so long and so far that he forgot about ever having a home, a family, a life as an artist. Maybe he’d become a travel writer or photographer, but he wrote nothing and took no pictures. Maybe he was an itinerant monk, but he spoke no verses or mantras, and no one asked for his blessings. He saw the winged angel again many times, but never close enough to speak to again, and he had no conversation with any of the people who crowded the paths of his travels. Was he merely an observer, then? It was too much to think about – the least moment of consideration exhausted him, and the air around him grew alternatively hot and cold. He was content to drift without regard to what he saw. What kind of place was this? There was no sensation but heat and cold, sight, and an exhaustion that dogged every breath, every step, every moment. No memory of touch, smell, taste, sense of effort, pain...

Almost unnoticed, the visions grew calmer, less vivid, and finally faded. He caught a fractured glance of the bazaar again, and that primal tunnel down to something too terrifying for words, but he steered away from it with great effort. So hard did he fight to move away from that place that his next vision revealed a vaguely familiar bedroom.

His bedroom.

He had a bedroom?

Like snowflakes falling silently to the ground, pieces of memory filtered back into conscious thought.
Yes, he had a bedroom. He had a house. He had a family, three children... no, four children, and a husband. How many eons ago had he married, had children, been widowed, married again, and come to live in a long-neglected house? A thousand? Maybe half the lifetime of the universe. Several more lifetimes passed before he recalled enough of that life to understand that yes, he was back in that life, that world. An arm around his ribs was warm and comforting. That was his husband’s arm... Thran’s arm. Thran was the angel he’d seen so often over his eons of wandering. He eased off his side and onto his back, and stroked the arm that lay so protectively over his ribs.

“Bard?”

“I’m here,” Bard whispered. He felt heavy, and too comfortable to move.

“Your fever has broken, my saint. That is welcome news. Lie still now, and rest.”

Bard didn’t have the strength to turn his head to look at Thran, but when his husband sat up beside him to feel his cheeks and forehead, Bard searched for his silvery eyes.

“Where are your wings?” Bard mumbled softly.

“They are hard to see with your eyes open, my saint,” Thran’s soft voice replied. “Close your eyes, and I am sure you will see them again.”

“Okay,” Bard breathed, and was asleep before he’d completed the syllable.

This time, he had no dreams as he slept.

* * *

Thran’s alarm went off at seven forty-five. He shut it off quickly, but Bard remained soundly asleep beside him. His forehead was cool, and he didn’t shift when Thran climbed out of bed. He slipped into the bathroom, then the closet to change into his clothes, and then downstairs to see to Sigrid’s porridge. She appeared close after him, and made quick work of the cereal while he assembled her lunch of sandwich, fruit, and a cookie. The run to the bistro in the village was uneventful, and she wished him an easy day as he let her out of the SUV. He replied with similar wishes, a smile, and a wave, and returned home. The house was still quiet, but Thran made a quick round of all the children’s rooms – no one had yet stirred, but that would soon change – before going back into the bedroom. Yes, Bard was still asleep, so Thran headed back downstairs to think about the day’s food. He’d just decided on eggs for his breakfast when Bain and Legolas came down, and Tilda soon joined them. Except for a lingering cough, Legolas said he felt almost himself again.

“And Kukla, you slept all night!” Thran smiled at her. “Your ear is better, then?”

She nodded with a relieved smile. “It is! It feels almost normal now.”

“I think Mr. Bun must have sung the lullaby I told him about last night. But let us not rely only on his lullaby to help your ear. Here is your medicine for the morning. And please eat some yogurt after you take it to protect your stomach.”

Tilda took her pill with water, and then perused the refrigerator for the yogurt. “Ooh, vanilla! I’ll have that.”
“Kukla, your ear is not the only good news. Your Da’s fever broke last night at just after four this morning. He must still stay in bed and remain quiet, but he is on the mend.”

“Good for Da!” Tilda grinned.

“Yeah, that’s great,” Bain exchanged a relieved smile with his sister and brother. “But now the hard part starts.”

Legolas hummed agreement. “To keep him in bed, you mean.”

“You got that right,” Bain shook his head.

“We will be ready,” Thran avowed. “But first, what should I make for our breakfast, children? Eggs, perhaps? They would feel good on scratchy throats.”

The consensus affirmed that eggs were the right dish, so Thran scrambled a bowlful while Bain saw to the tea, toast, and butter. As they ate at the table, they considered what to make for lunch, and decided that the soup that Bain and Thran had concocted last night was a good start.

“Maybe with grilled cheese?” Tilda asked with a hopeful glance at Thran.

“We can make grilled cheese, yes,” Thran nodded. “I have Lieutenant Bain to help me with that. But lots of soup, too. I want all of you to be well and rested, so you can go back to school tomorrow. After breakfast, then, the homework.”

That met with groans, but not terrible ones. Thran had the children carry their empty dishes to the sink to rinse and put in the dishwasher, then settled them at the table with a pot of hot tea and their homework while he washed the flatware, skillet, and cooking tools. When the kitchen reflected Bard’s usual pristine order, Thran came to the table.

“I go to see to Bard, children.” He held up both hands with his fingers crossed. “Wish me luck that he sees the wisdom of rest.”

“Good luck, Ada; good luck, Papa; good luck, Thran,” the children chorused.

Thran poured a mug of tea from the pot, and carried it upstairs and into the bedroom. Bard was curled into a knot under the covers, but he rested quietly and his expression was peaceful. As Thran tiptoed closer, though, his eyes opened. They gazed blankly before gradually tracking on Thran as he put down his cup of hot tea on Bard’s nightside table.

“Good morning, my saint,” Thran murmured, stroking a dark curl off Bard’s forehead. “No, you do not have to move.”

“I’ve been gone a long time,” Bard said softly.

“Are you back to stay now?”

Bard blinked several times. Each time, his eyes grew clearer, until he regarded Thran with thoughtful awareness. “I think so. It feels like my fever broke.”

“It did. It did so just after four this morning.”

Bard considered that until his expression waxed with regret. “I kept you awake, then.”

“No, lyubov moya. You were quiet most of the night, just as you were all of yesterday, I think because you were exhausted. I woke in the night and realized that your fever had cooled, and you were peacefully asleep. So all is well.”

Bard shut his eyes, and managed a single nod.

“I brought you some hot tea, if you would like it. Or if you would rather rest, that is fine.”

Bard hummed. “I feel so comfortable. But I’m parched.”

“I will arrange your pillows for you again. Then you can sip a little of the tea.”

At Bard’s nod, Thran propped three pillows behind Bard’s head so that he was upright enough to sip the tea that Thran held for him.

“Mmm. Good.”

Thran helped his husband to several sips of the hot tea until he’d drunk almost half of it. At that point, Bard rallied enough to want to tend to necessities, so Thran helped him into the bathroom for that. Once he was back in bed, he didn’t immediately fall asleep again, which Thran took as a good sign.

“Are you hungry?” Thran asked. “I have more soup broth for you, or perhaps a scrambled egg with some toast, or a bowl of porridge?”

“Mmm, an egg sounds good,” Bard nodded. “But you’ll have to help me down the stairs, I’m afraid.”

“I will bring you a tray, because of course you will want to sleep again afterwards, which, as a certain Welshman has been wont to tell me, is the best thing for you to do to get well.”

Bard smiled sheepishly. “So I have. The only reason I won’t argue with me is because it feels so good not to move right now.”

“Good. I will make your breakfast, then. Please, lyubov moya, do not get out of bed while I work in the kitchen. Promise me.”

“I’ll be good,” Bard agreed with a sleepy sigh.

Thran nodded acceptance before he returned to the kitchen. All of the children looked up at his entrance.

“Is he awake? Is he better?” Bain asked quickly.

“He is awake, and he is better,” Thran confirmed. “He is very weak, though. I will make him breakfast and then he will be a little stronger.”

“Can I go see him?” Tilda asked

“Perhaps you can help me bring his breakfast up to him,” Thran suggested. “You can take the toast, Kukla, and I will take the egg. Bain can take the butter, and Legolas can take the salt and pepper. We must not stay long, however. He will need to sleep again once he has eaten. That will help him get better faster.”

“So on to the breakfast. Perhaps two eggs, and a slice of toast...”
Thran busied himself with the pan and eggs. As second in command, Bain got out the bread, butter, and condiments, and readied the lap tray with utensils and a napkin. Soon Bard’s breakfast was ready, and Thran and the children trooped upstairs to deliver it to their patient.

“We announce the arrival of breakfast,” Thran said as the children followed him into the bedroom with hellos and waves. Bard was alert to greet the entourage with a smile. “We bring you eggs with salt and pepper, and toast with butter.”

“I hope you feel better, Da,” Tilda chimed in.

“Me, too, Da; I do, too, Bard,” Bain and Legolas added.

“That’s good of you, children. I do feel much better. And the breakfast is spot on. Thank you,” Bard said, struggling to sit up a little more.

“No, stay where you are,” Thran urged. “You are not strong enough to sit up any more, so we will see to things. Bain, would you please find a clean tee for your Da? Legolas, if you and Tilda would help me to arrange the tray breakfast…”

Bain helped his father slip the tee over his head, then lie back on the pillows, while Thran and the other children put Bard’s breakfast on the tray.

“There, you are ready to have your breakfast,” Thran prompted as he placed the tray over Bard’s legs. “Thank you, children. I will see that our Bard eats everything, while you continue your homework. Lieutenant Bain, you have the lower deck.”

“Aye, Captain,” Bain made his best salute. Then he gave his father a stern look. “Thran says you have to stay in bed to get better, which is what you always tell us, so you’d better do it. Don’t make us come up here.”

“Yeah, Da; that’s right, Bard,” Tilda and Legolas agreed.

“I guess I’d better, then,” Bard gave them an amused smile. “I appreciate you all looking out for me.”

“Feel better soon, Da,” Tilda waved on the way out. “And eat all of your breakfast!”

“Yes, ma’am,” Bard nodded as the children trooped back downstairs and Thran sat beside him on the bed.

“Come, while your breakfast is still hot.” Thran speared a bit of egg and held it out to Bard.

“I can feed myself, angel.”

“You can. But you have had a long, wearying time with your fever, so let me help you save your strength.”

It was a mark of Bard’s lassitude that he protested with only a self-conscious look. While he chewed his eggs, Thran buttered his toast and cut it into four small triangles. When he held out one of the triangles, Bard took it with an affectionate smile.

“It tastes good.”

“I am glad. You need to eat after going so long without. It will help you get stronger.”

Bard ate quietly as Thran doled out the bites of egg and toast, and handed him his mug of tea when the food was gone.
“Can I bring you more?”

Bard shook his head as he sipped his tea. “I’m good. Just very sleepy again.”

“You see the wisdom that the children and I quote to you, then, that you need more sleep to recover your strength.”

“That won’t be hard,” Bard sighed. “My eyes are already closing.”

“Let them.” Thran set the empty tray aside, and helped Bard to slide flat. “Sleep, and you will soon be better.”

Bard nodded as his eyes shut, and he was asleep before Thran could take the tray out of the room.

He had done well to get Bard to eat something and to convince him to stay in bed. He had also reassured the children that Bard was on the mend. The next time Bard woke up, however, he would not be so compliant.

Thran grinned in anticipation. He had a plan to deal with that.
Chapter 122

Chapter Summary

When a saint emerges from his dreams, an angel is determined to ensure his recovery by whatever means necessary.

Bard drifted away after his breakfast without effort. His dreams slipped from one scene to another without pause, as if he paged through one of his college art history books without ever looking closely at any of the pictures. No sooner would one detail come to the forefront than it slipped away again, and the scenery changed. Maybe here was a Monet café in Arles, and maybe there was a bright Rousseau jungle. Maybe an H R Giger biomechanical alien stalked through them both... or maybe not. Was that a Robert Arneson pillar? No, perhaps it warped into Calder’s Red Stag? As soon as Bard tried to identify the wonders he saw, they disappeared, so after a while, he stopped trying, and let them stream by. It didn’t matter that the time of day and season shifted from brightest summer noon to deep pearlescent winter afternoon to rainy spring night, or that some of the beings he passed were not human. He let everything drift past – hmmm, that reminded him of The Wizard of Oz when cows, rocking chairs, and witches on bicycles and brooms streamed by in the throes of a tornado. Mostly he felt regret that he wasn’t able to fully appreciate the visions he’d been given, but even that emotion was muted.

After a while, the visions slowed, then turned much spottier – was his connection to the source of these images dissolving? Complete, boneless relaxation swept away the last of the surreal visions, and he fell solidly into deep sleep. Time might have passed or not; he had no way to know, but at some point even oblivion waned, leaving him without any sensation beyond a velvety greyness.

A bright shaft of light appeared. He opened his eyes, and made out a bright patch of sunlight splashed over his blanket. Ah. The skylight above the bed had let in that rectangle of light, and now it warmed his legs through blanket and sheet. He lay unmoving, still savoring the deep relaxation that made lying in bed so irresistible. Muted voices drifted by at sporadic intervals, lilting and smiling, the voices of children. Turning over onto his back, he let the pervasive warmth lull him into thinking of nothing else. But a full bladder goaded him tottering and shivering into the bathroom; when he’d dealt with that, he made a beeline right back into bed, and let himself wallow in the welcome warmth again. He shut his eyes, and thought of crocodiles basking on the banks of the Nile, old dogs curled on sunny porches, housecats luxuriating on bright windowsills.

“Bard? Did you get up?”

Bard cracked open one eye. Oh, he was still in dreamland, because the angel wafted gently into the bedroom and sat down beside him, one long, slender hand brushing Bard’s curls aside to feel his forehead.

“Still don’t understand manifestical metasomething of physical halohood.”

A soft chuckle. “I claim no knowledge of that, either, lyubov moya. You will have to go back to sleep to find any answers to that.”

“I’ve tried, but no go.”
“Ah. Then perhaps you have met your quota of sleep and you must return to this world until the next bout of flu.”

Bard pried open both eyes. Yes, the bedroom was still here, and the angel still sat on his bed. “Where are your wings?”

“In your dreams, with your halo and the rest of your wonders, my saint. Do you want to look for them again?”

Bard shut his eyes, wanting nothing less than the respite the angel offered him. But that door had closed, and he was solidly in the world again. His sigh was regretful, so he turned over on his back. When he opened his eyes, there sat Thran, gazing down at him with a welcoming smile.

“Welcome back, my saint. You have had many adventures in the past two days.”

“Two days?” Bard blinked in surprise. “What day is it? Is it Monday? Oh, shit, the painters –”

“Calm yourself,” Thran patted his arm. “It is one o’clock on Sunday afternoon, so you have been in bed just a few hours more than twenty-four. You had a fever. Do you remember that you took Sigrid to her job yesterday, and then passed out when you came home?”

“I remember,” Bard murmured, as it all came back. “Gods, did Sigrid have to walk home? And what about the other children –”

“I retrieved our Sigrid, and the other children are fine, too,” Thran soothed him. “All is well. I have been the captain, and Bain is my lieutenant, and we have made meals, we have done the homework, we have gotten Sigrid to and from her job. So calm yourself so that you do not undo the good of your sleep. There is nothing you must do right now, except recover.”

Bard eased the sudden tightness in his limbs. If he were honest, to lie back was the most wonderful thing in the world, and the only thing he wanted to do, so he let himself do so, albeit with a little guilt.

“Chert, perhaps I lie a little,” Thran shrugged with a mischievous look on his face. “There is something you must do in addition to take your ease in bed. You must eat lunch. I will bring you a nice bowl of chicken soup and perhaps a roll, and of course tea. Can you manage that?”

Bard’s stomach growled softly as he thought about hot chicken soup. Thran nodded as if in reply to the noise.

“I thought so. I will bring you some, and keep you company while you eat. Please, lyubov moya, stay in bed until I come back.”

“I will,” Bard promised, and lay back as Thran rose and went downstairs. He was content to keep his promise for the few minutes Thran was gone, because he still felt lightweight and thready, as if all that kept him grounded were the bedcovers atop him. After a deep breath, he was seduced deeper into the pillows and covers, and he lay with his eyes closed again.

Sloth had never felt so divine.

A step on the stairs alerted him to open his eyes again. There was Thran with a bowl of soup cradled in his hands, and a trio of children behind, all carrying something. Legolas had the lap tray with a soup saucer, mug, utensils, and napkin set atop it, so Bard pushed himself up against the pillows to that the boy could set the tray over his legs. Bain had the teapot, which he set on the nightside table while Thran put a steaming bowl of soup on the tray. Tilda was last with a small bowl of leftover spoonbread and the butter crock, which she set on the tray by Bard’s soup.

“Hi, Da!” Tilda smiled. “You look better now.”

“Yeah, not so pasty,” Bain said with his typical tact. Legolas snickered behind him, but he raised a hand in greeting to Bard.

“You do look better,” the boy admitted.

“I feel better,” Bard replied. “And look at this – bedside service.”

“An exclusive offer available only to our most valued clientele,” Thran said as smoothly as any hotel concierge.

“Eat it while it’s still hot,” Tilda suggested. “Bain and Thran made it yesterday. It’s got lots and lots of noodles.”

“So I see,” Bard said, dipping his spoon into the bowl to pick out a ribbon of egg noodle. He took a bite. “Mmm. Pretty good. Needs parsley, though.”

Thran snickered; maybe he thought about the day after they’d met, when Bard had first taught him how to make chicken soup. “Of course it does. Shall I bring you some to sprinkle over your noodles?”

“It’s good just the way it is,” Bard grinned. It felt strange to smile so widely. He was used to drifting along in a crowded bazaar, merely observing rather than interacting with anyone he passed. “And spoonbread is perfect.”

“All right, children,” Thran said. “I will see that Bard eats all of his lunch. If you could decide on something we can make for supper, it would be helpful. We have lots of chicken.”

“Okay, Thran, Ada, Papa,” the children replied, and gave Bard reassuring smiles before going downstairs. Bain was already lobbying for Tandoori chicken, while Legolas and Tilda seemed to think something plainer would be better for Bard’s recovery.

“But the spicy Tandoori would fight the germs better because of the turmeric,” Bain said as they retreated.

Bard chuckled, but applied himself to the soup. It wasn’t highly spiced, which his stomach appreciated, and the warm broth soothed his hunger pangs without overstressing it. The spoonbread was nicely crusty on the top, yet soft and buttery underneath, and that eased his stomach, too. With each bite, a little more of his strength came back. When his dishes were empty, Thran leaned forward for the teapot so that he could pour Bard’s mug full.

“Better, yes?”

“I am,” Bard nodded, and was surprised that he meant it. “Much better by far.”

“Perhaps more soup? That was the last of the spoonbread, so I am sorry that I cannot bring you more of that. Or we have the rolls I mentioned before. Tilda thought you would like the spoonbread.”

“She was right,” Bard nodded. “I’m fine just with the tea. If you can get me some clothes, I can come downstairs to join the family.”

“You are not yet rested enough to come downstairs,” Thran objected quietly. “Please, Bard, stay in bed for a while longer. You have been sick, and you need to restore yourself.”

“I can restore myself in the sitting room, can’t I? That way you won’t have to run up and down the stairs to keep an eye on me.”

“I knew you would suggest such a thing as soon as you stayed awake for two minutes,” Thran gave him a stern look. “It is not good for you. You will want to be in the middle of everything, because that is what you do, and then you will forget to rest, and then you will relapse. Better you stay in bed, so that you sleep and sleep and sleep until you are well.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. “I’ve done nothing but sleep for the past twenty-four hours. More than that.”

“Tcha, you have not slept. You have told me tales of jugglers and circuses and magical forests and angels who speak of metaphysics. You have traveled a long way to get here, and only now can you sleep properly. You must stay in bed so that you may do so.”

Bard sighed. “I am not the least bit sleepy, angel.”

Rather than continue the argument as Bard expected, Thran sat back with a wide grin on his face.
Suspicious, Bard narrowed his gaze on him.

“You look like the Cheshire Cat, Thran. What are you up to?”

“I am prepared for this moment, that is all. I will make a deal with you.”

“What sort of... deal?”

“If you will eat a little more soup, and drink very much more tea, I will offer you a distraction from the horrible fate to stay in bed. What do you think of that?”

“What sort of... distraction?”

If anything, Thran’s grin grew wider. He didn’t answer for a moment, as if he savored the moment.

“You promise to stay in bed, drink the tea, eat the soup?”

“I promise.”

“Ha!” Thran clapped his hands in triumph. “I will get the soup, then. Do not get out of bed. You promised!”

“You still haven’t told me what this distraction is.”

“I will tell you, then. I will do what all good parents do when their children are fussy and do not want to stay in bed. I will tell you a story.”

The anticipatory look on Thran’s face was enough to make Bard’s lips tremble into a smile.

“It must be one hell of a story. You’re all but gloating.”

“We shall see. But first, I bring the soup, and more tea. It is a thirsty tale.”

Thran scampered downstairs with the teapot and Bard’s tray, leaving Bard to wonder just what tale he was about to hear. One of Thran’s Russian fairytales? Something about a ballet he danced once? Or something entirely unexpected? In anticipation, Bard ducked into the bathroom to deal with his protesting bladder, then padded back to bed. He plumped his pillows, and straightened the sheets and blankets before he crawled back into bed. He settled comfortably against the pillows and crossed his legs, ready to give Thran his full attention when his husband returned from the kitchen with a full tray.

“Don’t fuss,” Bard said quickly, as soon as Thran’s mouth opened to protest. “Getting out of bed to pee doesn’t count. It’s not like you can do that for me.”

Thran gave him a quelling stare as he set the tray across Bard’s legs. “Of course not. So here is your soup, and tea for the both of us.”

Thran fetched more pillows from the closet to pile against the headboard on his side of the bed, then settled himself in the middle of them. He mimicked Bard’s cross-legged posture and pulled the sheet and blankets up over his knees, but loosely. He took the teapot to pour his mug full, then set the pot on his nightside table.

“So, the soup,” he waved his hand at Bard’s bowl.

“Where’s my story?”

“Soup first,” Thran waved his hand again. “Then you can be comfortable for the story.”

Bard gave Thran a mock look of affront. “Is this a bait and switch?”

“Tcha, you are not a fish, and I am not a fisherman. I merely want you to eat your soup.”

Bard didn’t try to explain the idiom to Thran; he had a sneaking suspicion that Thran already knew exactly what it meant. So he spooned up the shreds of chicken, the small bits of carrots and celery, the thick ribbons of egg noodles. There was a distinct flavor of ginger and star anise, and a sprinkle of spring onion that brought a fresh green taste to the well-simmered meat and vegetables. He didn’t rush through it, but ate slowly not to overload his stomach, as well as to appreciate the taste. When he was done, Thran poured his mug full of tea, and then set the tray aside.

“Now, you are comfortable?” Thran asked.

“Comfortable,” Bard nodded.

“Then it is time for my story.”

“Does it have a name?”

“You may choose one when I have told it. So, I begin in the time-honored fashion, yes? With once upon a time.”

“I’m ready.”

Thran nodded acceptance. “Once upon a time, in a city called Daugavpils –”

“Dog of Pills?” Bard repeated incredulously. “What kind of city name is that?”

“DAU-ga-pils,” Thran pronounced in an exasperated tone. “It is the name of the second largest city in Latvia. It means Castle on the Banks of the River Daugava. Now hush, or I will not tell you any more than that.”
Latvia? That was where Thran had been born. So was Thran about to tell him something about his childhood?

“I’m sorry, angel. I’m just an ignorant Welshman. Carry on.”

“Thank you. So, I begin again. Once upon a time in Daugavpils, there lived a small boy. One day, when he was just four years old, he saw an amazing sight on the old television in his parent’s front room – a group of dancers who were to perform at a celebration of local folk dance. Such colorful costumes, such spritely music, the dancers who look like little dolls, but most importantly, such beautiful steps of the dance... the small boy was transfixed. So transfixed was he that for the next several days, he drove his poor mother mad with his constant attempts to imitate what he saw. His poor father was angry to have such a dervish whirling to and fro every second until bedtime, for his poor father worked hard, long hours in the local factory and wanted only stillness and silence when he came home. So to keep the family peace, his mother took the small boy to the folk dance festival, thinking that that would sate the small boy’s fascination.

“But did it? Of course not. The small boy found himself consumed even more completely when he saw so many dancers in person. The music, the colors, the performances... he became twice as much the whirling dervish. In desperation, his mother found a dance studio with a teacher willing to tend to the small boy for an hour once a week. This will not last long, the mother pleaded to the father, who was not thrilled at the cost of such a thing given an already tight budget. But he went along, especially when the small boy quickly became less of a dervish and more of a serious student. Even though the small boy was only four, he attended the preschool classes to learn his letters and numbers and other simple things. He could not go to the dance lessons unless his classwork was impeccable, and so it became.

“Two years passed. The small boy achieved a little more in height, but very much more in his abilities at the dance. Folk dance at first, for that was the local tradition. The ballet came next, because the dance instructor thought the discipline would deter the small boy, only to find that the small boy did not just love that discipline, but craved it, adored it, excelled at it.

“When the small boy was six, the dance instructor confided to the mother that a scout for the state – Latvia was still a Soviet state then, you understand – the state’s program to identify potential dancers for the Russian ballet had come to the school. This scout had been very interested in the small boy, no matter his youth, and had invited him to audition for a spot at one of the youth ballet schools. Thus began a great argument between the small boy’s parents. His mother wanted to accept the tickets for her and her son to attend the audition, which was a very long distance away in St. Petersburg, because she thought it would mean a better life for her son. The father wanted to reject them, because he did not think much of the ballet, and he was too tired from his labor in the factory to think of very many things beyond his supper and the ice hockey games on the television. He relented only when his wife told him that if the small boy earned a spot in the ballet school, his parents would receive a stipend for their contribution to the glory of the state.”

“That must have been hard for the small boy to listen to,” Bard murmured, then sipped his tea.

An airy hand waved. “Tcha, the small boy knew nothing of this until his father spoke of it many years later. All he was told at the time was that he would have the great treat of a train ride all the way to St. Petersburg, and a chance to show people how well he danced. Even better, if he danced well, he would be able to go to a school where he could dance many hours every day, rather than just the single hour each week that he danced now. He was deliriously happy. So happy, that his mother dipped into the family’s meager coffers so that the small boy could spend three days a week with the dance instructor to learn just how best to impress those he would dance for in the great Russian city.
“Some weeks passed, until the time came for the audition. Mama packed a bag with our things, and I said goodbye to my Papa the night before, because he would be away at the factory when Mama and I would leave for the train station the next morning. He did not have much to say, but I was too excited to notice. I hardly slept that night. The next day, after a good breakfast, Mama and I went to the train station, and when the train from Vilnius stopped in Daugavpils, we got on, and away we went to St. Petersburg. I cannot tell you how many times I had seen the trains come and go, for the city is a great rail hub for the region. Estonia is to the north, Lithuania is to the south, Russia is to the east, and Riga, the famed port on the Baltic Sea, is to the northwest. Trains, as many industrial as passenger, come and go all day. So at long last, after all the trains I had heard and seen, here I was to travel on one myself! The trip takes ten hours, and there are several stops along the way, but I thought everything was wonderful. How could I not? I had never been outside of Daugavpils before, nor had Mama.

“Someone from the ballet program met us at the train station, and took us to a hotel for the night. It was a very modest place, but I thought it was quite grand, and to have a man in the dining room bring me a bowl of lamb stew with a warm roll was the height of luxury. Then came the room that was bigger than my parents’ front room, with a bed big enough for both Mama and me to sleep in it! Such opulence was not to be believed. Fortunately, I was very tired by then, and so I slept very well that night.

“The next day? First, a bowl of porridge and another warm roll. Then it was on to the audition. There were so many other children there! Many older, but almost none younger. My dance instructor had told me to expect this, so I was not surprised. It would not have mattered to me if I had been surprised. I had been told that if I danced my best, then I would earn the right to dance more. So I thought of that, and not all the other children.

“The audition was not what I expected – so much of the tape measure, and repeated stretches of the limbs, and so many questions! I was impatient, and wanted to ask over and over, you asked me here to dance, so when may I? But I did not want to jeopardize my chance for any reason, so I held my tongue.

“Finally, finally, came the dance! But even that was not straightforward. First the dance in a big room with so many other children – not so many as had been with me this morning, but still many. The instructors walked back and forth, so I did each thing they asked as best I could. There were many children trained only in the folk dances, and many fewer in the ballet, and only one or two as young as I. So I did many of the things you have seen me do at the barre for the first time. Eventually I was allowed to do my small dance that my instructor had taught me, which embodied a little folk dance, a little ballet, nothing sophisticated, but it was not the dance of a six-year old, either. All day this took, without a break but for the toilet, but not lunch. I was very hungry, but again I held my tongue. And at the end of the day, I was told that yes, I had earned my place at a ballet school. So I told Mama goodbye, and when she went home on the train, I did not go with her. I went to the ballet school.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. “Wait... just like that, you were accepted on the spot and went right to the school? You didn’t even go home again?”

Thran’s face waxed in the smile of a man wiser than a six-year-old boy. “Ah, you ask for more than a fairytale, then. You ask about the adult reality behind the child’s naïveté.”

“I guess I do. It just seems... kind of heartless.”

Thran looked thoughtful. “I did not see it that way then. Only later did I understand. I will tell you all that I came to understand when I have gotten a little further along in my tale. But for now, I will tell you that yes, the usual practice was to send all of the children home while the judges considered and bargained to make their choices. But it was very clear on that day that I had great potential to bring all glory and honor to the state, so there was no need for the judges to debate about me. They were unanimous. Of course, now I know what a great sacrifice this was for Mama. She loved me so much that she gave me up to the program because I was so enamored with the dance, and would have been unhappy to work in a factory as my Papa did. She had a premonition that Papa would need the stipend I provided soon enough, too, which was the case. And it was easier for her to give me up all at once, rather than take me home only to make this same trip again in just a few days.”

“Of course, I was not told that if I won my place, that I would go to school in St. Petersburg, far away from Mama and Papa. I knew only that I had won the prize I wanted, the chance to dance more. So Mama and I went with a strange lady to see the school. I was shown a dormitory like the one I would share with several other children, and there in the farthest corner, by a window, sat one of the beds with a small cabinet beside it. Mama helped me put my clothes and other few things in the cabinet to see how everything fit. I thought it was pretend, you see? Then we were given supper in the dining hall. It was another very thick lamb stew, very hot and full of carrots, and good.

“And after that, Mama told me goodbye. Ah, perhaps I was to stay here tonight to see what the dormitory is like? Very well; I told her I would see her in the morning. But no, she said, she would return to our hotel, and in the morning she would take the train home. Only then did I realize that I would not go back to Latvia with her. I would not go to a school in Daugavpils like this one – this very school was where I would live now. But who would look after me, I thought, though I did not ask aloud. As if she heard me, Mama pointed to the lady who had been with us during supper. She was what you call the dormitory housemother, yes? She would look after me now, Mama said. I foolishly thought that if I said anything, I would lose my place at the school, so I merely nodded, and hugged Mama. At least I told her that I loved her before I said goodbye. Then away she went, and I was now a beginning student in a dance academy.”

Bard let out a long breath. “That sounds awful.”

Thran shrugged. “Again, I did not see what I lost in that moment until some years later. Though later that first night, when I was told to go to sleep in the bed they had given me, it was so strange that I cried into my pillow, because I did not want anyone to hear, in case it would make them send me away from the dance. I was the only student there that night, and there was no sound of the hockey games that my Papa listened to, or the sound of Mama as she went into my parents’ room to sleep. The light that shone under the door of the lavatory was too bright, and the sheets smelled different, and the pillow was too flat. It was the first time I missed things that I had never noticed before. But the long day and the excitement and the strangeness of everything had worn me out, so eventually I fell asleep.”

Bard had a hard time swallowing his next sip of tea. “That sounds even worse.”

The next morning, the sun came though the dormitory windows so brightly, and it did not look so bad. My dormitory housemother – the grand Mistress Galina Vladimirovna Petrova – came to wake me up, but I was already awake. She took me to have breakfast, and then to the classroom, but there were no other children as young as I, so I was given a book to read about the greatest Russian ballet dancers. It was too old for me, but I picked my way through it well enough, and the pictures entranced me. Then it was on to lunch with Mistress Petrova, and then finally to the dance mistress, who with Mistress Petrova found dance clothes for me, and I was able to dance for the rest of the afternoon in a class of older children. It was too advanced for me, but I did not care, and thought that all the corrections that the mistress did were only extra attention.

“So it went for several days, until eventually the dormitory filled, and the classes for my level began.
In a few days, I met Vileria when she came from Moscow to attend the school – she was as young as I, so we shared much of the same instruction, but we became instant best friends, and the world seemed perfect, to have a good friend, and the dance.

“That continued for four years, until the auditions came for the Vaganova School, the most prestigious ballet school in all of Russia. This school accepts no students younger than ten, but Vileria and I had worked hard to be ready for this as soon as we both turned ten. We passed easily, even doing a pas de deux together. So I moved from one dormitory to another, and Mistress Galina Vladimirovna Petrova became Master Pyotr Ivanovich Bermanov, who was not nearly so nice as Mistress Petrova, but at this point, I was quite well able to look after myself in the dormitory, the classroom, the dance studio. Vileria and I became regular partners, and we went on to great success. Our wedding was quite showy, and the cake was beautiful and tasted of cherries and chocolate, and we had an entire two days off for a honeymoon.”

“Two whole days?” Bard gave Thran a sober look. “Nice of them.”

“You know, of course, how close we were as friends, Vileria and I, how we kept each other such close company through the endless hours of practice, the pressure of our sexuality. We played matchmaker for each other – I found Lily for her, and she found Sergei for me, and we covered for each other to maintain a discreet privacy. Legolas was unexpected, but we were delighted to have our small son to be a new joy in our lives. I loved Vileria more when I watched her play with him, and the same was true of her feelings for me. If she had not died, we might well have been happy after a fashion for many years. Or perhaps if we had emigrated here together, we would have separated our union, but still remained close friends. But that was not to be – she died, Legolas and I came here without her, and a new tale began.”

“That is a sadder tale than I expected,” Bard admitted.

“You must bear a little more sorrow, lyubov moya,” Thran gave him a smile. The warmth in it was unexpected given the nature of his comment, which made Bard raise his eyebrows. “I have told you the fairytale of a small boy, and I promised you the reality behind the fairytale, so now I will do so. Perhaps this is the Brothers Grimm version? At any rate, do not distress yourself at this tale. It has a happy ending, and soon you will see why I tell you this version of it. Are you ready?”

Bard held out his mug. “I’d like a fresh cup of tea before I hear this one.”

“Excellent idea,” Thran said, taking up the teapot to pour both their mugs full. He took a long draught of his, smiling at Bard when he swallowed. “Storytelling is thirsty work.”

“It is,” Bard said, toasting Thran with his mug. “So carry on when you’re ready.”

“So. Now comes the adult understanding of the small boy’s tale. Daugavpils is a heavily industrial city. It has been so since the end of the world war, thanks to the Soviets. My father was the locomotive mechanic; my mother was the domohozyayka, the housewife. We lived in a very small flat in an apartment building built for the factory workers – just a kitchen, a front room, a small bath, and two small bedrooms. It was not so hard a life for my parents before I was born, because then the Soviet system made possible so much of the subsidies for the Latvian industry. Perhaps eighty percent of the goods went to the military. But as glasnost and perestroika approached, the Soviets no longer supported the Latvian industries, so life became harder for a time. So when I was born, there was much depression in Papa, and much worry in Mama. I was lucky to be no younger, because shortly after I was sent to school, those programs to scout for dancers stopped. But regardless of the timing, I went to ballet school when I was six.

“St. Petersburg was brighter and bigger than anything in Latvia, and of course the city is full of... beautiful monuments and architecture. It is very cosmopolitan. The ballet schools, however, are very old school, and very hard on their children. There is so much to learn, to do, so many rules, and because so many children clamor to be dancers, if a ballet student fails to be less than perfection, he or she is farmed out to a regular school and is no longer in the dance school. The discipline is very strict, and often very cruel. Teachers are obeyed instantly. Weariness, frustration, mistakes, and any transgression often draw physical punishment – slaps, blows with the hand, beatings, things this country no longer allows. Each student carries a full load of schoolwork, and of course there is the ballet, but there is also the history of ballet to learn, and the piano.”

“You play the piano?” Bard blinked in surprise.

Thran grinned. “I do. I am very much away from it, because I did not like the practice required, and my knuckles suffered often. You understand why I associated the piano with unpleasantness for many years. But if one day we get a piano for the ballroom, I would enjoy to play a few things. I like Chopin, of course.”

“Of course,” Bard shook his head in amazement. “Who else?”

“Oh, Scott Joplin is very much a master,” Thran nodded, his eyes brightening in recognition. “I played the Maple Leaf Rag so many times that the instructor banned it from the practice hall. But that just meant that I occasionally snuck out into the city to a café that had a piano, and I played it there in the early evenings. One day, I would love to make a dance to match his music.”

“I’ll bet you make a good one,” Bard nodded.

Thran smiled in appreciation. “But to continue... the school load is very arduous. There is very little free time. There is never enough time to do all that must be done. Those who are not a quick study, whether in dance or the languages or the maths, do not last, because there is no time to let them catch up. There are three languages to learn – Russian, which of course I spoke at home as well as Latvian, French for the ballet, and English because performers must learn to speak to the media when they travel. There are endless lessons about deportment and manners, which are even more arduous than the ballet at times! As the students get closer to their final years, the maths and sciences are less frequent topics of study, and ballet instruction intensifies. I reveled in that, because academics had never held the fascination for me that the dance did. But ballet of course is very demanding physically. The girls cannot gain too much weight, or they are dismissed. The boys must develop the strength to carry their partners and to endure through four acts of Swan Lake, or they are dismissed. Food is rigorously administered with the precision of medicine. One learns to live with hunger many times, even the boys. And the constant repetitions, over and over and over again... make no mistake, my saint, the smallest swan is physically tougher than the brawniest footballer. The pain and the devotion required to defy gravity, to seem the lightest feather floating meters above the stage, would drop a team of oxen.”

“I don’t know how anyone survives,” Bard said simply. “I can’t conceive of how much work it must have been.”

“There is still more to the burden,” Thran replied. He took a deep swallow of his tea before he went on. “This sounds like torture, like slavery, like bondage, like forced labor, yes? But there is no dancer in these schools who does not want to be there, who does not know and accept the suffering involved. We all know that if we cannot find it within ourselves to give everything, we will be replaced. So competition is fierce. The dancers have rivalries, of course – how could we not in such an arena? But I saw little sabotage. We all had too much to do to maintain ourselves to waste effort in such things. But we all knew that as friendly as we were, as much as we commiserated together over a difficult routine, a bastard teacher, an impossible standard, if any of us fell, few would shed tears.
The lion pulls down the slowest gazelle, and the other gazelles feel relief that they are not the ones consumed. That is the nature of such places.”

Bard swallowed. “It’s as if you all were gladiators. Beautiful ones, but in just as competitive a setting. Merciless.”

Thran nodded. “Very much so, though again, I did not think of it in that way for a long time. It just was.”

“Did you ever get to go home to your parents at all? Get some semblance of family life?”

Thran’s smile was ironic. “I was home only a handful of times, and most were after Latvia ceased to be my home. Mama came to see me a few times when I was too small to travel alone. She died when I was ten. Her lungs had never been strong, and an industrial city does not have the cleanest air, and in the winter the bronchitis is frequent, and so she succumbed. Papa had also suffered from the industry – an improperly secured tram motor came loose and broke his arm and leg past his ability to work again. He received a small pension from the state, and the stipend for my school, so he made do, if not in any great luxury.

“Papa was no fan of the arts or travel, so he never visited me at either of my schools. So when I was eleven, I was deemed suitably old enough to take the train to Latvia myself. Usually one of the train attendants looked after me to make sure I knew when to get off the train. I liked to ride the train, but once I got off in Daugavpils, not so much. An industrial city in the midst of a recession is no comparison to St. Petersburg, and Papa and I had nothing in common. He was a tradesman; I was an artist. He was a peasant; I was cosmopolitan. He spoke Latvian and bad Russian, I spoke four languages fluently. When I came out as gay, he had even less to say to me. So I went back to Latvia as little as possible, because it was so uncomfortable for both of us. Once Vileria and I went to Mariinsky to dance, we lived in St. Petersburg, but Papa was often ill, and did not visit. He did enjoy to meet Valeria when we went to see him, and he doted on Legolas, so that was a welcome reconciliation for us both. But he died of a lung illness similar to what had claimed Mama when Legolas was five. I dispensed with his things, and that was the end of my ties to Latvia. I returned to St. Petersburg with no expectation that I would ever see my birth country again. I was a Russian now.”

Bard winced. Thran’s recitation was matter-of-fact, apparently long past any regret, but to hear the story for the first time was to make Bard appreciate his very different childhood anew. He’d thought his own tale had been rootless, but it was no comparison to the isolation that had been Thran’s lot.

“Do not despair, my saint. The sad tale is almost done. I have only to speak of how I came to realize that I was no more a citizen of Russia than I was of Latvia. You know, perhaps, the tale of Mikhail Baryshnikov, the great dancer? He, too, was from Latvia, from Riga, and he, too, went to Russia to dance. But he was shorter than the average male dancer, and despite his great skill he was faced with the prospect of only secondary roles because of it. He also yearned to dance with choreographers from the West, not just Russian ones. His discontent became so great that he defected in the late seventies. I speak of that because even just seven years ago, Russian ballet was still slow to allow outside influences into their ballet. I, too, wanted to dance new things, try new things. I was in constant disagreement with the ballet lords because of it. The knife dance commissioned for me was offered as a compensation, but as much as I like it, it is still a thing very much of the empire, rooted in folk traditions. Vileria was no happier than I with this, but she loved St. Petersburg, and was reluctant to leave it. So when she died, and Legolas suffered so because of it, there was no reason to remain. The Soviet empire was no more, and when my contract with Mariinsky was up at the end of the year, I emigrated with Legolas and came to this country. Perhaps a man and his son who had no home would find one here. And of course, you know the end of that tale, for you and I found each other, and we fell in love just as happens in the best fairytales, and here we live happily ever after.”

Bard grinned, giving Thran a sideways glance as he sipped his tea. To his surprise, however, Thran didn’t offer a similar grin, but instead looked soberly at Bard. Bard’s smile faltered. What had cast a pall on the end of Thran’s tale?

“So why did I tell you such a long tale of a small dervish of a boy?” Thran asked, his voice as soft as if he asked himself rather than Bard. “To keep my dervish of a husband in bed so that he could heal, yes. But is that the only reason? No. It is one thing to tell the story as the child saw it, and another to tell it as the cynical young man understood it. But I want to be honest and tell it from a new perspective, one I have only recently come to understand.”

Bard nodded. “Okay.”

“Last November, in the middle of snow and cold and aggrieved ligaments, I met you. Last November, in the middle of despair and poverty and worry, you met me. We fell in love, and we are very happy. We have both become so much more together than we are apart, and we have healed much in each other. But you think that is all my doing, because I had the money we used to restore this house to more than its former beauty, and to send our children to a good school far more humane than those I attended, and to eat well. Yet you have brought something much more important to my life, my son’s life, your children’s lives. You are the one who has made you and me and my child and your children into a family, and your house into our home. It is the greatest gift I have ever received, and so much more important than money. I wish you to understand this, so that you come to value your gift as much as I do.”

Bard reddened, and he looked into the depths of his teacup. “I just wanted to make up for everything you’ve done for us, Thran –”

“No, no, no!” Thran barked. His cheeks flushed pink, but it was the color of frustration, not embarrassment, and his angry glare skewered Bard. He set his mug on the nightside table with a bang, briefly balled his hands into fists, then let his open hands fly wide around him. “There is nothing to make up for, do you understand? No, I will not let you continue to say this! Have you not heard anything I have said to you in my tale? Have you not understood it? The small boy infatuated with the dance was blind, and the young cosmopolitan artiste was blind, even the world-renowned dancer was blind, but you, you have no excuse to be so blind! You, the one who has supplied what the story has lacked from the first moment of it, regardless of who tells it! Suka blyad, how can you be so blind?”

“Wha – me?” Bard gaped, hunching down into the pillows.

“No, no, no!” Thran barked. “Yes, you! You, you, you! You see the child who has only the dance, who loses his Mama, who is looked after by a dormitory matron who has seven or more other children to mind, or a dance master who slaps and yells, or a piano teacher who whacks the knuckles with a stick! You see the young man who discovers he is gay and must marry a woman who is also gay! You see a father who must have a babushka to see to his tiny son because he must dance to glorify the state! You see a father who must put his son in boarding school because he must dance to make a living for the son! What is missing in all of that? What?”

“Thran –”

“Do not be evasive! Just say it – say what you know is no part of all I have told you!”

Bard swallowed, and shut his eyes. “Love. Not love of the dance, certainly that was there. But there was nothing else.”
“No! Try again! Think of what I have said to you, Bard. Please. This is very important to me.”

“No, angel. If it’s not love you want me to say, then it’s any sense of belonging to very much.”

“No, no, no!” Thran snorted. “Chert, you are just as blind as I say you are, or you think to cushion me from some blow. What is the saying? ‘I have been in there with the pros?’ Tell me what I want you see.”

“Family,” Bard finally ventured. He didn’t know whether to be happy or distressed when Thran’s face cleared and he nodded. “No family.”

“Finally, finally,” Thran exhaled. “At last you say it. Yes, there is no family in my tale – a dear friend in Vileria, yes, but no real family. Then I meet you because of stupid radiators, and in only a few days, you give me more of what it is to be in a family than I have ever had. We watch the parade, make the soup, share a meal, laugh with the children, even fight a common enemy. I have never had these things, Bard! Never! Only now, after I become part of a family, do I see how soulless my life has been. Vileria was an orphan, and she knew no better than I did, but we did the best we could, though we had no idea what we lacked. Thank the gods I know what is a family now and not then, because the emptiness of my life might have crushed me. But you! You have known these things for so long that you have forgotten every one of them. You do them, but you do not know that you do them, and so you have no idea how much of a gift they are. Then you are a modest man, and so of course you demur and say, oh, no, no, what I do is of no consequence, it is nothing to value, but of course it is, and you are such an idiot that you dare not see it through my eyes! So each time you say that all that matters is that I bring the money, I wince.

“So now at last I am angry, because I will no longer let you dismiss as trivial something that I value so much. You make the best of all of us – me, you, the children – and if you love me – and of course I know you do, lyubov moya – if you love me, then you will never dismiss the family you have made for us ever again! It is worth more than money, more than material things, more than anything! Do you hear me? Do you?”

Thran’s hands fell into his sides, and after such an outpouring of words his chest rose and fell rapidly, as if he’d run a marathon. Maybe he had, to speak so long and so completely about a world that was as alien to Bard as a normal family life was to him.

Bard choked down an uncomfortable knot. In all the months that he and Thran had been together, Bard had not made much of what he did to care for his family. Before he’d met Thran, financial resources had been as ephemeral as a rainbow’s treasure trove, and Thran’s generosity with them had been as much a gift to Bard as the sense of family had been to Thran. Yes, he wasn’t comfortable taking plaudits for doing what he’d always done to see to his family. And maybe taking any credit for their situation was presumptuous and dismissed Thran’s contribution. But listening to Thran’s impassioned words... when he’d devalued his part, he’d also devalued the sense of family that Thran had never had.

What would Bard have without his children or his husband who looked out for one another? Suppose he lived in a house full of people who were just roommates without connection, without affection? How soulless was that?

Just as soulless as the dormitories Thran had lived in for most of his childhood – if he could even call Thran’s youth a childhood.

Bard set his teacup aside, and linked his arm in Thran’s to urge him closer. “I’m sorry I’m such a doofus, angel. I didn’t realize the things you’ve never had, or why they’re important to you. I’m glad that I’ve given you the family that you haven’t had before. But I didn’t create Clan Fyrrnig all on my own, you know. I may have started it, but you and the children have responded in kind, and that’s what keeps us going.”

Thran leaned back in the pillows, and rested his head on Bard’s shoulder. He exhaled deeply. “You are right. Legolas, Sigrid, Bain, Tilda, and I have taken all that you have given us and returned it, and we have grown strong together. But please, my saint, I want to hear you say just once that you understand how important your part is. I want you to believe in your heart that you are an equal partner in our marriage, our family, our lives. You are the heart of Clan Ffyrnig, and you always will be. We would not be without you.”

Bard caressed Thran’s long, white hair that pooled in his lap. “I can do that, angel. I am your equal partner, and proudly so.”

The corners of Thran’s lips curved up, and he raised his head to brush a kiss on Bard’s cheek. “Thank you, my saint. You make me very happy.”

“You make me very happy, too. Just promise me something.”

“Anything.”

“Because I am such a doofus, you have to promise me that you won’t stop gesticulating. That’s how I know you’re serious, and I need to pay attention. I don’t like to distress my angel.”

Thran chuckled. “I love you,” he said and waved his hands for a second or two. “There. Now you know I am serious.”

“I do,” Bard said.

It was the perfect ending to an angel’s fairytale.
Chapter 123

Chapter Summary

The angel and his troupe of cherubs mount a campaign to keep their saint on the path to recovery, and a new week begins.

The knot eased from Thran’s throat. Suka blyad, to tell the tale of his childhood had been harder than he expected, even given Bard’s sympathetic hearing. He so desperately wanted his husband to understand why he treasured their family so much, because it loved and nurtured unconditionally, and its affections were not so tenuous that they dissolved when misfortune fell. This family met misfortune as a unified front to rout it, drive it away, reject it utterly. No matter that this family snarked and teased and complained – it also helped with homework, read stories together, tackled chores en masse, and loved fiercely. All of this was thanks to Bard, the heart of the clan –

Thran’s mobile chimed.

Bard had his arm around Thran’s shoulders, and his hand squeezed Thran’s upper arm at the sound. “Uh-oh. What’s up, cariad?”

“There is no uh-oh, as you call it. It is merely time for me to get Sigrid from the bistro. At the perfect moment, yes? It offers you the chance to recover from my long tale, and nap for a while.”

Bard winced, just as Thran expected him to. “I’m sorry, angel. I should be the one to get her.”

“And why is that?” Thran gave him a smile. “It is a ten-minute drive, and the bistro smells deliciously of coffee and pastry, and Miss Dís is a pleasant acquaintance. Perhaps I will buy us some scones to enjoy after supper, or buns.”

“Did you have time to do your barre today?”

“Of course I did. The ballet approaches, and I will not miss a day of practice until it is over.”

“At least I can go downstairs and help the children with supper.”

“No, you cannot. This is Sunday, and we are all at home to help with the meal. You must do your part, which is to rest so that tomorrow you can answer the door for the painters, and work on the sketches for your commissions, and so forth. I cannot, because I must be at the studio. The children cannot, because they must be at school. So do not shirk your duty, or you will throw us all into disarray.”

Bard shot him a thwarted look. “That’s low – using my own guilt against me.”

Thran favored his husband with a smug grin. “I am ruthless beyond redemption. So rest, my saint, and I will be back soon with our lioness. Perhaps she will have an enthralling tale for you when you wake up.”

Bard held up his hands in surrender. “Safe journey, then, angel.”

“You, too. Tell the angel in your dreams that I salute him.”
Thran kissed Bard’s temple, then collected the lunch tray, the mugs, and the teapot. He headed down to the kitchen to put the dirty dishes into the dishwasher and rinse the teapot to be ready for the next round of the genial beverage. The children were in the sitting room – Tilda drew, and Legolas and Bain had the chessboard between them.

“I go to collect Sigrid, children,” Thran informed them. “Bard has had his soup, and will nap for a little longer before supper. Have you chosen something for us to make?”

“I wanted Tandoori chicken, because of the spices, but Tilda and Legolas convinced me that maybe the spices wouldn’t be so good for Da’s stomach,” Bain explained. “So what about pot roast with chicken instead of beef? We’ve got a bag of chicken breasts, and a bunch of veg.”

“Yeah,” Tilda looked up from her drawing pad. “We can put it in a casserole, and it’ll get nice and mushy.”

“Mushy?” Thran looked at her askance. “That does not sound good, mushy food.”

“She means the carrots and potatoes will get soft, and the meat will be tender,” Legolas translated with a smile. “I made the same comment about mushy, too.”

“Hmm, that sounds more appetizing, and good for a patient in recovery. It makes broth, yes?”

Bain nodded. “It does. Nice and juicy.”

“Very well, Lieutenant. It seems that you, Ensign Legolas, and Ensign Tilda have picked a suitable dish. If you can start on the vegetables, I will get Sigrid, and be back in about twenty minutes to help. Perhaps it would be nice to have a few scones from the bistro for dessert?”

“That’ll keep Bard from having to bake tomorrow,” Legolas agreed. “We all know he’ll want to, unless we have treats already.”

“Excellent point, Ensign Legolas. So off I go, and will return soon. Bard is supposed to nap now, and he knows he is not allowed downstairs until supper.”

Bain and Tilda exchanged gleeful smiles. “Take your time, Captain,” Bain grinned. “The crew will make sure that the prisoner stays in the brig.”

Tilda couldn’t resist clapping her hands, or grinning in anticipation. Thran headed upstairs to get his jeans, wallet and keys, eager to tease Bard about his jailors’ excitement, but Bard had fallen asleep. Thran’s smile faded. How exhausted Bard must have been to fall asleep so quickly... but he looked peaceful, and breathed easily. Had the hard-working saint finally learned to follow his own advice?

The drive to the bistro was uneventful, though the roads and sidewalks were more crowded than Thran expected. Tourist season had begun, for all of the shops Thran passed seemed busy with visitors out to enjoy the mild, pleasant afternoon. He didn’t find a parking space on the street, so had to resort to the big lot where he’d thwarted Lance’s bid for escape. Was the boy still in police custody? He’d make a call to Dwalin Fundin tomorrow to find out. But for now, he parked the SUV and headed to the main street.

The cheese shop was on the way and open, so he stopped in to buy a little of the Double Gloucester that Tilda liked so much. Then he went into the Blue Mountain Bistro to peruse the display of pastries. He was pleased to see that the shop was busy, with several patrons sitting at the half dozen small tables with plates of sandwiches and pastries, and cups of various coffee beverages. Sigrid bustled over from behind the counter to greet him with a smile.
“Hi, Ada! Are you just waiting for me, or may I bring you a treat?”

“Hello, lioness. I await you at your convenience, yes, but I also want to consider the pastries. Some scones, perhaps, or buns, for after supper? It would keep your Da from his bake pans tomorrow, so that he rests a bit longer. What do you recommend?”

“Ooh, that’s a great idea,” Sigrid nodded. “Everything’s good, but I especially like the cinnamon raisin buns, and the orange current scones. The lattes are good, too, if you’d like to indulge.”

“Mmm, the coffee smells wonderful, but I have had much too much tea this afternoon while I sat with your Da to make sure he stayed in bed. I will try the latte another time. So... perhaps half a dozen cinnamon buns, and a dozen scones?”

“Coming right up,” Sigrid nodded, and got two paperboard boxes to hold Thran’s treats. While she selected the buns, Dís came over to say hello. They chatted cordially for the few moments it took Sigrid to fill Thran’s boxes. Dís rang up his purchase for Sigrid, and passed him his receipt.

“It’s after three, Sigrid, so hang up your apron, and I’ll see you next Saturday. You were a good help today, and I thank you.”

“You’re welcome, Miss Dís,” Sigrid replied, her cheeks turning a bit pink at the praise. What that any surprise? She was her father’s child in many ways, and her reaction to honest appreciation was just one of them. She hastened to tidy up the last crumbs from packing Thran’s treats, then took off her apron.

“See you next Saturday, Miss Dís. Thanks for showing me everything, and you, too, Kane. Have a great rest of the day.”

“Thanks, kid!” The lanky young black man with a full head of dreadlocks clasped at the nape of his neck looked up from the coffee machine to wave. “You’re a champion sandwich slinger!”

Laughing, Sigrid raised a hand in farewell and preceded Thran out the door.

“So a successful day, then?” Thran asked as they proceeded down the sidewalk.

Sigrid grinned. “It was incredibly busy. I had a lot of sandwiches to make, but I did what Da does, and made an assembly line, and we managed okay for having a newbie – me – on the crew. Kane’s one of the college students that Miss Dís has back each summer, except this summer, which is why I got the job. He’s studying archeology, and this summer he’ll be on a dig in Greece. Thank goodness he’s really patient with the newbie, or this would be uncomfortable. There’s not a lot of room behind the counter for us to stay out of each other’s way.”

“Very little,” Thran smiled. “The SUV is in the back lot. The tourists have begun to come out, I see.”

“I did,” Thran said proudly. “And he sleeps now, thank goodness. So I think we may safely let him venture downstairs for supper. The other children have chosen a chicken pot roast to make.”

“Mmm,” Sigrid hummed as they neared the corner to head down to the lot. “Ooh, I ducked inside the Imladris Gallery on my lunch break. All of Da’s sketches are gone, and the owner told me to tell Da that someone’s interested in buying Alexander’s Downfall, and for him to call her to discuss if he wants to sell it.”

“That is wonderful,” Thran murmured, smiling. “I am so happy for him, whether he sells the piece or not. I cannot wait to see him back fulltime at his art. Yes, he has enjoyed the renovation, but he will enjoy his art more, I think.”

“I barely remember him working on it,” Sigrid said thoughtfully. “I was only seven when he had to stop. So I’m just as excited to see what he does as you are. Gods, I’m glad you and he ran into each other. Everything’s been so amazing since then.”

She linked arms with Thran as they walked to the SUV, and Thran basked in the regard of his teenaged daughter. From what Bard had told him of the sometimes-mercurial temperaments of such creatures, and his own experiences with youthful ballerinas, he appreciated the moment for its rarity as well as its sweetness.

They were soon home, and Sigrid ran upstairs to say hello to her father. She was quickly down again to inform the rest of the family that Bard was still asleep, so everyone helped to put the chicken and vegetables together into a casserole dish, and it went in the oven to roast slowly. Sigrid got out her books to work on her remaining homework, and Tilda went upstairs to crawl in bed for a nap. The house was serene, slowly filling with the inviting scent of supper, so Thran took the chance to venture into the ballroom to practice his pointe work.

Despite the short time that remained before Immortal’s premiere, Thran warmed up slowly and methodically. He could not risk an injury to his feet. They were more battered than they ever had been before, thanks to the stress of bearing all of his weight on such slender toes, and featured callouses, rough skin, even a blister on his smallest left toe. But many ballerinas bore far worse, so he took what care he could to coax his longsuffering feet into the needed steps while keeping the wear and tear on them as minimal as possible. He smirked – how ridiculous was it to do something that ravaged his feet at all? All for an illusion.

Still... it was a spectacular illusion. So on he danced.

The ballroom lacked the fixtures that were so ubiquitous in most ballet studios, the banks of floor-to-ceiling mirrors that kept every dancer ruthlessly aware of the smallest movement. It was a rare luxury to dance without that constant visual feedback, one that usually came only during performance. It allowed Thran the chance to sense each step almost entirely from within, rather than from a chorus of external images. If anything, it sharpened his sense of balance, which was essential for him to dance on pointe without injury. As his body warmed, he segued from practice to rehearsal, carefully tracing the steps that revealed the unexpected passion that the Maid had lit in the lord of the Underworld. He had grown more confident in moving in and out of the pointe work, but he still didn’t venture into the unrestrained passion that would need to suffuse his execution when he performed for an audience. He didn’t trust himself yet to know just how close to the edge of injury he could push his feet, but he didn’t dwell on his reticence; in nine weeks, he’d find his limits.

He went through the entire scene three times with the utmost concentration to ingrain the steps into muscle memory. Yes, he had become more confident of this new skill, thanks to Mme. Morgelle’s guidance, and his feet continued to get stronger. Carefully, carefully he pushed his body to the point of instability, but not past it. He finished the scene for the third time with the dramatic rise to his greatest height, then the precipitous collapse to the floor as the Maid brushed him aside to pursue the ephemeral memory of her Soldier. He held the desolate pose for a pair of heartbeats, the rolled to his back to remove his pointe shoes. It felt good to flex his feet this way and that, and he gave both a thorough massage. Then he rose to complete his cooling stretches. By the time he felt relaxed and centered, the angle of the sunlight coming through the big windows opposite the fireplace revealed that supper was not long off.

As he came through the main room – he hoped that his sofa would appear there before long – the sound of laughter whispered from the sitting room. Bain and Legolas were amused about something, so he headed for them rather than the kitchen to check on the pot roast as he’d planned. As he came through the door, a small object flew across the room and through the open door to the half bath to bounce on the tiled floor.

“Almost, but not good enough, doofus,” Legolas chortled.

“Like you can do better, smart ass,” Bain snarked back.

“Like I can, and you’re the smart ass,” Legolas shot back, snickering. “Come on, it’s my turn – oh! Um, hello, Papa.”

Thran eyed the boys crouching on the floor under the windows, and put his hands on his hips. “What do you do, and what is this doofus and smart ass?”

Bain tried to slide something behind him, but Thran caught the movement, and beckoned with his hand for Bain to produce the mysterious item. The boy produced a small catapult made of wooden popsicle sticks, a plastic spoon, a spring clothespin, various small nails and tacks, and a rubber band. Legolas unsuccessfully tried to put his hand over a small pile of dried beans, but moved away when Thran waved him away. Shamefacedly, Bain put the catapult in Thran’s outstretched hand, and Legolas bit his lip as the two boys exchanged looks.

Thran gave an experimental flick to the little device, enough to make the spoon fly up. Ah, the boys had made some sort of game out of flinging dried legumes into the half bath. He gave the tiled floor a look – yes, a handful of beans scattered far and wide over the floor. Thran squatted beside the boys, selected a bean to load into the spoon, and sighted carefully before releasing the clothespin that would fling the spoon forward. His bean rose in a graceful arc to bounce across the half bath floor.

“Very inventive. I assume this game awards points for how the beans land.”

The boys exchanged relieved looks, and launched into an explanation of how bounces on the floor were worth more than those on the walls, and how knocking an opponent’s bean off a tile added points, but getting theirs knocked off subtracted them. He made a few more exploratory shots before he looked at the boys.

“This would be a better game with castles to shoot at – perhaps made of cards or blocks,” he decided.

“We’ve got some cards somewhere,” Bain grinned with excitement, happy that he wasn’t about to get into trouble for flinging his father’s dried legumes all over.

“Fling the beans, but no doofus and smart ass,” Thran gave both boys a look. “And do not put the beans back in the pantry bin. Put them in a bag so you can use them for another game later. I do not want to eat them, and neither does anyone else.”

“Yes, Papa; yes, Thran,” the boys murmured in subdued tones. Thran smothered a grin.

“‘Yes, Papa; yes, Thran,’” he echoed. “So you reveal that you knew you should not call each other these things, nor should you try to sneak used beans back into the pantry, but you intended to do so. I am not as ignorant as you think.”

Legolas started to say something, but Bain shook his head quickly and sawed his hand back and forth over his throat. Thran didn’t resist a laugh at that, and launched one more bean into the half bath.
“Bain teaches the truth of an old adage, synok. ‘It is better to remain silent and be thought a fool than to speak and remove all doubt.’ Consider it as the two of you clean up the beans before supper.”

“Yes, Thran; yes, Papa.”

The boys crawled over the bathroom floor to collect their missiles, so Thran went into the kitchen to check on the pot roast. Yes, it was ready to serve. He took the pot roast out of the oven to rest as Bard had taught him, and turned off the oven. Now he would go upstairs to change out of his dancewear, and rouse Bard for their meal –

“Ada, you’ve got to see this,” Sigrid appeared in the kitchen. At the sound of the boys’ voices, she stuck her head into the sitting room, then looked back in curiosity at Thran. “What’re they doing?”

“They clean up from a game,” Thran waved a hand.

“Oh. Um, anyway, you’ve got to see Da upstairs. It’s so sweet.”

“I was about to wake him for supper. All we must do is to assemble salads.”

“What, no biscuits?” Sigrid gave him a surprised look, and turned the oven back on. “I can do those. Go upstairs and wake up Da, but make sure you appreciate the cuteness factor before you do, okay?”

“I will consider this cuteness factor,” Thran agreed. “Will I know it when I see it?”

“Oh, you’ll know it right off,” Sigrid grinned. “It’s cute enough to take a picture of, which is what I did. I’ll start the biscuits, so you’ve got fifteen minutes.”

“Okay,” Thran agreed. He stuck his head in the sitting room. “Bain? Legolas? Come wash your hands, and help with the supper. We need fruit and a green salad before we sit down at the table.”

“Okay,” the boys chorused, so Thran headed upstairs on quiet feet, hoping to catch Bard in whatever this cute thing was. He needn’t have worried; the bedroom doors were open, and there was Bard with Tilda beside him, both of them sound asleep. As Sigrid said, it was an adorable tableau, and Thran pulled out his mobile to take a picture of the pair as they slumbered. He went into the closet to change from his dancewear to comfortable leggings and tee and socks, then into the bathroom to rinse his face and comb his hair. When he emerged, Bard was blinking sleepily at his daughter nestled at his side.

“I seem to have acquired a fellow hibernator,” he quipped, which drew Thran’s chuckle.

“Kukla takes very seriously her part to help keep her Da in bed to rest,” Thran observed with a smile, crossing his arms and leaning against the doorjamb.

“I didn’t hear her come in,” Bard admitted. “Sound asleep, I was.”

“More dreams?”

Bard thought about it, but shook his head. “Not that I remember this time. I feel much better.”

“That is good,” Thran agreed. “The crew has decided to allow the patient out of the brig – I mean the medical bay – to come downstairs for supper. Or if the patient prefers, I will bring a tray supper to him.”

“Oh, I’m ready to get out of bed,” Bard avowed. “Um, all I’ve got on is this tee, so in deference to the young one, would you please bring me some underwear and pants?”
“Of course,” Thran agreed, and rummaged through Bard’s dresser for socks and underwear, which he handed over with Bard’s sleep pants. His husband eased into them before he rubbed Tilda’s back gently to wake her.

“Little doll? Time to get up for supper,” he urged.

Tilda stretched. “Supper? It’s not time for supper, Da. It’s time for breakfast.”

“Usually it is when you get out of bed. But this was just a nap, little doll, and it really is time for supper.”

“But that’s silly...” Tilda yawned, sitting up, but when she saw Thran and Bard, she looked out the window, and blinked with more alertness. “Oh, I guess it is time for supper. It’s still Sunday.”

“It is,” Bard agreed. “Go wash your hands, and I’ll do the same, and then we’ll go down for supper.”

“Okay, Da. Hi, Ada,” Tilda murmured, as she clambered out of bed and went yawning and stretching into the children’s bathroom.

Bard rolled out, passing Thran with a smile as he ducked into the bathroom. “Everything go all right while I was asleep?” he asked, when he came out again.

“I fetched Sigrid, buns, scones, and cheese, I did my pointe work, Sigrid did her homework, and the boys invented a game that involves a catapult.”

“Eh, Bain’s catapult,” Bard’s smile was full of remembrance. “I showed Bain how to build that when he was in fourth grade. It was for a school project about the Medieval era. It caused a bit of an arms race, because in the next week the things appeared all over school flinging one thing or another. I don’t think the school staff appreciated the children’s enthusiasm quite as much as they could have.”

Thran snorted in laughter. “I appreciate their chagrin. Be careful when you use the half bath. The floor was the target practice.”

“Typical,” Bard rubbed the back of his head before giving Thran a sideways look. “What was the ammunition?”

“Dried beans. Do not worry, svyatoy moy. I told them not to put the beans back in the pantry.”

“Killjoy,” Bard grinned. “You’ve caught on, so that means you’re no more fun than I am anymore.”

Thran put a limp wrist to his forehead and pretended to sigh in despair. “I struggle to survive such desolation. Now, come, Sigrid has made hot biscuits for us, and we have chicken pot roast, and salad, and fruit, as well as scones and buns.”

“A feast, then,” Bard rubbed his hands together in anticipation. “It’ll be nice to taste someone else’s cooking for a change.”

Sigrid’s biscuits had just come out of the oven when Bard and Thran came downstairs. They quickly sat down to supper, and Bard was most complimentary to the day’s cooks. He ate well, and didn’t seem to tire too quickly after the meal, so he was allowed to sit quietly on the sofa in the sitting room with his tea and scone while Thran and the children took care of the kitchen. Afterwards, as everyone gathered in the sitting room, he and Thran urged the children to make sure their backpacks were ready for the new school week that started tomorrow, and that their lunch bags were clean and ready.
“I will get up with the children tomorrow,” Thran told Bard. “You sleep in a little, because the painters come tomorrow to work on the outside of the house, and you will want to be well for that.”

“Don’t argue, Da,” Sigrid cut Bard off before he’d only just opened his mouth. “There are five of us who can help with the lunches and porridge and such, so there’s no reason why you can’t have a day off. You’ve got to hurry up and get well, so the rest of us can slack off again!”

That brought a round of laughter, not the least of which was Bard’s. “I see what I’m good for,” he teased, but without malice.

“Everything, of course,” Sigrid shot back. “So, no bus run tomorrow, no baking because we already have buns and scones, and no house stuff. We took a vote – you can deal with the painters, as long as you don’t actually paint anything, and you can do your art stuff. That’s it.”

“Yeah, Da, and if you don’t behave, you’ll be restricted to the same again on Tuesday,” Bain shot.

“Yeah, Da; yeah, Bard,” Tilda and Legolas affirmed.

“Okay, okay,” Bard held up his hands. “I appreciate you all looking out for me. I feel much better, and I’ll be quiet tomorrow to make sure I stay that way. But that doesn’t mean I can’t tell you all to start cycling through the bathroom for your showers. It’ll be a busy day tomorrow for all of you but Bain, because you’ve missed a day or two.”

The children scattered to see to their backpacks, and Tilda went to take the first turn in the shower. Bard wasn’t inclined to get back into bed yet, so Thran brought him his drawing pad and pencils, and when Tilda reappeared after her shower, she settled beside her father to practice her sketching.

When the children’s bedtimes drew near, Thran ran upstairs to see if Legolas had corralled all of his homework in his backpack.

“Yes, Papa, it’s all ready,” the boy pointed to his backpack leaning against the wall by the door.

“Good, synok,” Thran nodded. “You should catch up easily from your cold. You understand all that you were assigned, yes?”

He nodded. “Sigrid explained one bit of the math, so that helped. I knew all the rest. Um... Papa?”

Thran sat down on the bed beside Legolas and gave him his full attention, for the boy’s expression was a frown of concern. “What is it, Legolas?”

“Is Bard all right now? His flu is gone? He’s not just saying so, is he?”

Thran shook his head. “No, I think it is mostly done with him. He is strong, so he recovers quickly.”

“Good. That’s good.”

“You were concerned?”

Legolas nodded. “Because of what Bain said when he heard that Bard took Kukla to the doctor. He said they had to go to the clinic, not a doctor. What clinic? One in the city? Is their doctor there? It would have been a long way to go for Kukla.”

Thran sighed. “When Bard and the other children lived in the city, they could not afford to go to anything but the free clinic, Legolas. They were like many poor families, without medical insurance. But now that we are a family, we all have medical insurance, which means that we all can go to the doctor when we are sick.”
“Bard, too? Not just the children?”

Thran nodded. “Bard, too. So if he were still sick, I would take him to my doctor. But he recovers, and if we can convince him to take the next day or so slowly, he will be fine.”

Legolas considered that, and nodded. “So... they were poor.”

Thran smiled. “They had little money, yes. But they were rich in everything else, yes? They were a family before we joined them, and now they teach us well how to be one. That is worth much more than money.”

“I think so,” Legolas agreed. “I... just didn’t understand, exactly.”

“It is why they are frugal, and so competent at so many things, because they have had to rely only on themselves and very little else to do things. That is why most of their things are not new. It was much less expensive for them to buy used things, things they could fix or make new again.”

“Like the fountain in the solarium, or the CD player, or the TV.”

“Exactly.”

“But... those things don’t seem so bad.”

“They are not bad, not at all. In fact, if Bard had not bought these things, they might well have been thrown away, which would be wasteful. Not everything needs to be new.”

Legolas chuckled. “Bain says shoes, underwear, and food need to be new, and not much else. He’s right.”

“He is. So settle yourself for tomorrow, and I will see you in the morning.”

“Good night, Papa. I love you.”

“I love you, too, synok. Sleep well.”

“You, too.”

After Thran bid the rest of the children goodnight, he went downstairs to make the rounds around the house to make sure all was secure. Bard was still in the sitting room, but he had laid aside his drawing things, and was about to head upstairs.

“Do you want the shower first, cariad?” Bard asked, pausing as Thran came into the room.

“We can shower together, or if you would rather go first, that is fine,” Thran shrugged. “I have made the rounds, and the security system is set.”

“I don’t think I’m still contagious, but I understand if you’d rather avoid what’s left of whatever I’m carrying.”

Thran snorted. “I intend to sleep beside you tonight as I did last night, so the shower is no closer than that.”

“True. Together is fine, then.”

“I will start. The children are all in bed, so say your goodnights, and then join me.”
Bard suited actions to words, so before long they were both clean, dry, and in bed. Bard’s temperature was normal again, which in the light of Legolas’s worry, reassured Thran that Bard truly was over the worst of his flu.

“I am glad you feel so much better,” Thran murmured, nuzzling Bard’s hair.

“I do. Thanks for seeing to everything so well. The children, picking up Sigrid, and the food. Supper was delicious.”

“It is not true, then, what the old adage says,” Thran snickered. “The one about too many cooks spoil the broth. We had five, and the broth did not suffer.”

“Oh, that’s because you all proved a different adage, angel. I bet that each of you worked on a different part – the old divide and conquer.”

“We did. So we are set for tomorrow. Once the children go to school, I will go to the studio, and you will see to the painters. How long do you think it will take them?”

“I hope no more than a week for the exterior. I don’t know if they’ll want to dip the doors here or take them into their shop, but there are a lot of doors. We’ll get to them when we get to them.”

“I am excited to see the exterior painting done. Then Sam can restore our gardens, and we will be complete.”

“More or less, we will. We’ll be out of renovation mode and into weekend do it yourself, like half of the regular world.”

“They will paint the barn and the carriage house, too?”

“They will. The whole place will look like rich people live here.”

Thran grinned. “Rich people do live here, Bard, and I do not talk of money. We are a rich family, and we are very happy.”

Bard’s hand strayed down to rub that special spot at Thran’s hip that never failed to drench him in blissful relaxation. “We are, angel. Thanks to both of us.”

Thran smiled in the dark.

Finally. Bard had finally gotten it.

* * *

The alarm went off – Monday morning, six a.m., the start of a new week. This morning, it was Thran who padded into the bathroom first, while Bard luxuriated in bed. Once Thran headed downstairs to get the children’s breakfast and lunches ready, Bard shut his eyes, and willed himself back to sleep. But sleep was the farthest thing from his mind – he’d been in bed for two days, and he was too alert to stay there any longer. He went into the bathroom, pulled on his clothes, and went downstairs to join Thran in the kitchen.

“Tcha, Bard. You were supposed to sleep this morning,” Thran chastised.
Shrugging, Bard snared the loaf of sandwich bread and laid out slices atop the waxed paper that Thran had lined up on the kitchen island. “I did try, angel, I promise. But I’m ready to be out of bed, so there’s no reason why I can’t help you with the lunches today. Or would you rather I start the porridge?”

“The porridge is on,” Thran nodded at the stove. “And the tea. So let us make the sandwiches.”

They settled into their comfortable morning routine to pack the children’s lunches, and Bard made a quick omelet for two to give them a hearty start to the day. As the children came down, each one delivered one admonition or another about Bard taking it easy for the day. He took the comments in good humor as he wrote a steady stream of absence excuses as well as permission slips to miss the day’s sport if they felt it was necessary. He reminded them to meet at their usual spot by the buses to make sure they knew who would go home early and who would stay for sport. Once that was all sorted, Bard let everyone persuade him to let Thran see them off at the bus stop, so after hugs and the old saw about being off and leaving, too, he waved goodbye to them from the mudroom door. He returned to the uncharacteristically silent kitchen to see what he could assemble for Thran’s lunch.

He had a lot to do today, even if little of it was physical labor. First, of course, he’d await the arrival of the painters. How exciting would it be to see their old house sparkle on the outside? In a week or so, that would come to pass, and maybe then he’d believe that their renovation was almost done.

Next on the list – call Bilbo. At supper last night, Sigrid had relayed the message from Celebrían at the Ilithien Gallery that someone wanted to buy Alexander’s Downfall, and he was seriously considering it. He’d held on to it because it was the last piece he’d made. He and the children had moved to the city by then, but he’d stubbornly kept working on weekends as best a widower with three children younger than seven could. He hadn’t had a client, and his material was scrap rebar scavenged from a construction site. It had been an act of will to turn refuse into art, and when he hadn’t had the money to market it, he’d put it in the barn with the other pieces he’d managed to hold onto, as if he could bank them towards a better future. Against all odds, he was back at work now. He had Rahmiel waiting to be cast, and sketches, and commissions, so it wouldn’t be so hard to let the last sculpture from his previous life go. He’d see what Bilbo had to say about it, and then decide.

After he called Bilbo, he had sketches to do. He could even start on the clay model for Hal’s tree. Wouldn’t that be great to do so in the newly finished solarium? Bard’s fingers itched to tease a beautiful tree out of Hal’s tale of lightning strikes and an emerging spring.

First, though, a dancer’s lunch.

The larder was depleted, but Bard managed to cobble enough together to make Thran a solid lunch – chicken from the leftover pot roast, a selection of mixed vegetables, the last pear, and some cheese with the last of the wheat crackers. Tomorrow, he’d have to get to the market to stock up. He got out another package of chicken to roast for Thran, and a couple of steaks to thaw for tonight’s supper. They had sweet potatoes, so he could roast those, and he had enough vegetables for a stir-fry, so no one would go hungry tonight. As he set enough potatoes out on the counter from the pantry, Thran reappeared through the mudroom door.

“I’ve got your lunch done, and supper planned,” he said. “I’ll need to restock tomorrow at the market, but I’ve got today covered.”

Thran took the mug of tea that Bard handed him and took a sip. “Thank you, lyubov moya. I was not happy for you to be sick, by any means, but I still enjoyed the chance to cook with my stalwart Lieutenant Bain. We got on well.”

“I enjoyed my time with Legolas, too. Neither of us has had a lot of one-on-one time with them before. We need to make a point to have more of it, for us as well as them.”

“I agree, very much. But now, I must dress and be off to the ballet. The next weeks before the premiere will require very long hours and careful plans so that I do not burn myself out before the premiere. Please, you must speak up if I become too obsessed, so that we do not have another meltdown. Promise me, lyubov moya.”

“I learned my lesson, Thran. We have to stay in sync.”

“We do. And you must not work yourself so badly again, either. I want us both to survive Immortal’s premiere to enjoy your success, and the children. And I want us finally to have time to prowl the shops from high to low to find treasures for our house.”

“I look forward to that, too,” Bard stroked Thran’s glute. “So go tackle the ballet world, and I’ll wrangle the painters and my sketchbook and such.”

“Have you decided what to do about Alexander’s Downfall?”

“I’ll call Bilbo this morning as soon as he gets in to see what he thinks. If he likes the idea and the price is right, I’ll sell it. I’ve still got a lot of rebar in the barn if I want to make another one, and it’d be nice to make a sale after so long.”

Thran enfolded him in a hug. “That is wonderful, Bard. So I will dress, and be back in a few minutes.”

By the time Bard washed the few dishes remaining on the counter, and put the chicken breasts for Thran’s lunches in a pot to simmer, his husband was dressed and ready to leave. He stowed his lunch in his dance bag, and bid Bard farewell.

“Remember, do not bake, and do not renovate, and do not clean out the barn today,” he admonished Bard. “Give yourself one more day to recuperate, Bard, please? And take a nap this afternoon.”

“Mmm, naps,” Bard wiggled his eyebrows at Thran. I can’t wait for some nice, warm spring day when we can nap together – assuming we don’t have other things to do.”

“We will christen our solarium very soon,” Thran purred, his lips twitching with anticipation. “That will be most divine. I will make sure we both need a nap after that.”

“So will I.” Bard leaned in to brush a kiss on Thran’s jaw. “So off with you, angel. Go soar above the dance floor.”

Thran returned Bard’s kiss with one of his own, then he made his way out. Bard enjoyed a few seconds of anticipation about their upcoming adventure in the solarium, smiling as he checked the chicken. Satisfied that it was simmering nicely, he headed upstairs to brush his teeth. Then he made the rounds to haul all the dirty laundry that lurked in hampers and baskets down to the mudroom.

Maybe he wasn’t supposed to bake, renovate, or shop for groceries, but there was no reason why he couldn’t push a few buttons on the washer and dryer. Given how big the pile of dirty clothes on the floor was, he wondered if anyone in the family had anything clean left to wear.

He had everything sorted, the first load washed and in the dryer, and the second load in the washer when a knock on the front door echoed through the house. The painters were here! He greeted Darla and her crew, and soon they began to drape big tarps on the ground around the house to catch all of the chipped paint they were about to strip from the house. They wouldn’t start on rounding up the interior doors today, as the weather was forecast to be nice for several days, and Darla wanted to get as much done outside while they had the cooperation of Mother Nature. Bard made his call to Bilbo to tell him about the interest in his rebar knot sculpture – yes, his agent thought that was wonderful, and promised to look into a suitable price and call him back. After that, he tended to the laundry and his sketches to the tune of rasps, scrapers, and sanders, and scaffolding rose on the side of the house. He ate a hearty lunch, and made a point of resting afterwards on the sofa, even dropping off for a few minutes until the dryer beeped, signaling the completion of the next load of laundry. Once he got that folded and distributed, he carried Rahmiel into the ballroom and carefully set him on the garden table there so he could use the swivel base to set up the board for Hal’s tree. That was another thing he had to put on his list of chores – he had to visit the aquarium store to look for a rock to make the base, and failing that, he had to locate a mineral dealer. In between more loads of laundry, Bard got another board and wire for the armature from the barn, and happily worked to set everything in place. It was exciting to start a new piece, and soothing to feel the wire and clay under his fingers again. Before he knew it, Tilda and Sigrid were coming through the door.

“Wow, Da!” Sigrid called as she and her sister came into the solarium. “There’s scaffolding all over the side of the house, and paint chips on these big tarp…”

“And that scritch-scritch-scritch sounds like squirrels fussing,” Tilda joined in.

“That won’t last long,” Bard explained. “They have to chip off all the loose paint so that the new paint doesn’t flake off. So the house will look a little worse for a bit before it looks better. I take it Legs and Bain are at sport?”

Tilda nodded. “Legs doesn’t have to run around for archery so much, so he wanted to stay. I didn’t feel like jumping so much today. Maybe tomorrow.”

“Yes, I didn’t feel like running today, either,” Sigrid agreed. “But so many people are still sick that there wasn’t a stink about not being there. I heard Lewis say that the meet this Wednesday was canceled because it’s with two other schools in the county, and they’re pretty badly hit with the flu, too. Oh, there was some good news, though. The college thing on Friday? So many people were sick that they’re doing another one in two weeks. So I didn’t miss much after all.”

“That’s great, sweetness. And your teacher got your paper all right?”

“She did. So I didn’t lose any points for not turning it in on time.”

“What about you, little doll? How was your day?”

“I have new French words, of course. And a new drawing assignment. I have to draw something mechanical.”

“Mechanical?” Sigrid looked at her sister. “You mean like a television or a mobile phone?”

“Those are technological. I mean mechanical, like a pair of pliers, or an eggbeater, or something like that.”

“We have lots of things like that to choose from,” Bard grinned. “The barn’s full of stuff, and so is the kitchen.”

“I thought maybe an egg whisk? Or that funny shaped bottle opener with the twisty thing on the bottom.”

“Oh the wine bottle opener,” Bard guessed. He led them into the kitchen and pulled out said object from the drawer next to Thran’s wine fridge. “This? It’d be a good one.”

“Yes, that thing.” Tilda took the bottle opener and pulled the two lever arms up as far as they would go, which exposed the corkscrew. “It looks like a space ship or something.”

“Have at,” Bard agreed. “Just make sure you tell Ada you have it, in case he wants to use it.”

“Okay, Da,” Tilda nodded.

The girls cleaned out their backpacks as Bard pulled another load of laundry out of the dryer, then settled in the sitting room to get as much of their homework done before supper as they could. Bard joined them on the sofa to doodle ideas about the steampunk orrery, as if each planet was the head of the god or goddess. He had to remember to talk to the client about how many moons to include, and if Pluto was to be included or not, so he scribbled a note to that effect on the side of his current sketch. They passed a pleasant hour or so, interrupted only when Darla knocked on the door to say she and her crew were done for the day and would be back again tomorrow early. Bain and Legolas returned home shortly thereafter, and before the children had gotten the cheese and crackers out and settled around the kitchen table, the mudroom door opened again.

“Thran?” Bard called.

“Yes, I am here.” Thran bustled into the kitchen, his face alive with excitement. “Hello, children! Hello, Bard! Ah, I have so much news today! Wait until you hear it all!”

“Is it good news, Papa?” Legolas asked. “It must be, because you look very happy.”

“I am, Legolas,” Thran said, giving his son a big hug. “In three days, we reach a big milestone in the drive to stage Immortal. We move our rehearsal to the Imladris Academy auditorium. This is a big step! But that is not the only news I have.”

As the family gathered around the table, Bard was not the only one eager to hear more.
Chapter 124

Chapter Summary

Clan Ffyrnig takes a big step.

Thran’s eyes sparkled as he let his dance bag slide off his shoulder and drop beside the children’s backpacks. His excitement brought a smile to Bard’s face as he took his usual seat at the sitting room end of the table.

“Pass the cheese and crackers down to Thran,” Bard encouraged. “He looks like he wants to celebrate.”

“I do, but only a bit of cheese, thank you,” Thran said, taking a small slice of the Double Gloucester when the board had made it down to him. “Ah, some of the grapes, yes, please. So I will tell you my news. Círdan, the set designer for Immortal, told us today that the stage is well under way at your school, children. The base is very simple – a very large circle. Two thirds will be for the troll market, and the rest will be bare, so that we can project films on its wall for the other scenes. While the troll market part will take time to finish, the partition between it and the other third is done, and we may practice on it in just a few days. On Thursday, UVB will be at the school for a special assembly for the students, to explain what we do. It will introduce all of us who will soon be among you after your classes are done, and we will dance a little, to show what all the excitement will be about. I am most excited.”

“Ooh, nice!” Sigrid exclaimed. “Will you dance something from Immortal?”

“We plan to showcase the troll market, which includes many dance forms, not just ballet. Some modern, tap, hip hop, belly dance, others. The dancers will perform just a few minutes of each kind of dance. At the end, when all of the dancers will be onstage in our different costumes, we will do the zombie dance from Thriller. It is an old dance, but everyone knows of it, and likes it. I look forward to it.”

“Zombies!” Bain and Legolas crowed, grinning widely. “That’ll be great!”

“That ought to create a buzz,” Bard grinned. “The whole village will talk about nothing else the next day.”

“Exactly as we hope,” Thran nodded. “It ought to generate a lot of interest in all of the village festival, not only Immortal, so that both will be successful.”

“So we’ll get to see all of your company dance at the assembly?” Tilda asked. “Miss Charisse and Mr. Luka and all the others, too?”

“You will see us all,” Thran confirmed. “With our most spangly costumes.”

“Goodie!” Tilda clapped her hands. “That’ll be a much better assembly than the last one.”

Sigrid rolled her eyes, and Bain grimaced. It was left to Legolas to explain to Bard and Thran. “It won’t take much to be better than the last one. It was about the schedule for next month’s final exams. No one wants to think about final exams!”
“UVB won’t have to try very hard to do better than that,” Bard agreed. “But I know they’ll will put on a good show regardless.”

“We will,” Thran nodded firmly. “We want the students to be excited – about Immortal, of course, but also proud that their school will host it, and of course about the whole festival. Perhaps they will tell their families about what they have seen, and encourage them to visit.”

“I hope so,” Sigrid leaned over her elbows on the table. “Miss Dís told me on Sunday that most of the village shops count on the tourist traffic during the festival for a big part of their yearly income. One year, it rained all week, and a lot of the shops, especially the food ones, lost a lot of money because no one came. The artists and the trinket shops could eventually sell the extra stock they bought, but the bistros and food vendors couldn’t because food doesn’t keep.”

Thran held up crossed fingers. “Then we must hope for good weather, children. For the bistros, the artists, and the trinket shops, as well as Immortal.”

“That was all exciting news,” Legolas said, reaching across the table for another slice of cheese and a cracker. “We have exciting news, too. Or did Sigrid and Kukla already tell you?”

“I forgot,” Tilda admitted. “I guess you did, too, Sigrid?”

“I was so focused on getting through my homework, Til,” Sigrid said. “So no, Legs, we didn’t say anything. Go ahead.”

“Okay. We got our summer camp schedules today,” Legolas informed Bard and Thran. “They’re not final, as no one’s paid anything yet, but it shows whether we got into the ones we wanted. I got into the Gondors’ fencing intensive, and the school’s archery one, too, so I’m happy.”

“I got into the soccer one,” Bain seconded.

“I got into both the afternoon driver’s ed one and writing, but I’ll have to pick one, because driver’s ed is at the same time as writing. There may be a second writing one after the first one, because there is a lot of interest, but I don’t know that yet,” Sigrid explained. “Did you get your drawing one, Til?”

“I didn’t apply to the drawing one,” Tilda said. “Mr. Rohan said that I’m already learning everything in the drawing one in his class, so I should do one of the other art ones instead. So I chose pottery, and I got into that one.”

“Sounds like you all hit the jackpot,” was Bard’s comment. “Let Thran and me look at your schedules, to make sure we can cover everything. Thran’s going to be very busy until the festival, and after that we don’t know yet. We’d hoped maybe later in the summer that we could do some day trips, like maybe a rafting trip, or a railroad excursion, or maybe some museum trips into the city.”

“Rafting? You mean, whitewater, and all that?” Bain looked gleeful. “That’d be awesome!”

“Nothing too battering,” Bard cautioned. “Thran’s got to take care of himself so he can dance, and you and Legolas have to so you can take advantage of your sports.”

“I don’t want to be thrown out of a raft into a river,” Tilda looked dubious. “So nothing too scary for me, either.”

“I’m good with any of it,” Sigrid shrugged. “The train sounds neat, too.”

They talked a little longer about their summer plans, then started supper. Bard tossed sweet potato wedges with olive oil and herbs and put them into the oven to roast, while Thran cut up veg for the wok. The steaks went on the grill, the fruit went into a bowl, and soon Clan Ffyrnig sat down to a hearty supper. To Bard’s relief, all of the children looked to have recovered from the worst of their colds and flu, though Legolas still nursed a deep cough that would likely take another week or two to pass. Given how much the boy ate, though, his cough clearly hadn’t interfered with his appetite. They finished off the last of Miss Dís’s cinnamon buns for dessert. After cleanup, Thran and Bard retreated to the sitting room while the children claimed the kitchen table for their homework.

“You should be a lawyer,” Thran exhaled as he sat beside Bard.

“Oh, gods, don’t wish that on me,” Bard mimicked a shudder. “I have no head for all those whereases and wherefores. What makes you think I should do something so ludicrous?”

Thran snickered and sampled his bun before answering. “Because I see the empty laundry hampers upstairs, and all the clean clothes in drawers and closets. You were supposed to rest today, at least a little. Instead, you ran the Clan Ffyrnig laundry single-handed. Of course you did – I did not exhort you not to do so. You exploited the loophole, like any good lawyer.”

Bard’s grin held no remorse. “Laundry isn’t nearly so hard as renovation, or barn cleaning, or even baking. I did everything else I was supposed to do – I called Bilbo, who’s working on a price for Alexander’s Downfall. I greeted the painters, and admired their expertise to put up a scaffold and scrape paint. I set up my stuff to work on Hal’s tree in the solarium – by the way, Rahmiel’s in the ballroom. I needed the base for Hal’s tree, and I figured Rahmiel would be okay in the ballroom rather than the main room. Eventually your new sofa will arrive, so I didn’t want to have to move him out of the way when it came. So laundry wasn’t such a big deal. It’s not as if we didn’t need clean stuff. That reminds me – your dance things are still in the washer. I have to hang them on the line.”

“I will get them,” Thran insisted. “I will do them now, then I will tell you what other news I received today.”

“Oh?” Bard looked at his husband with curiosity. “Good news, or bad?”

“Both good. I will hang up my things, then I will tell you. No, sit. Work on your sketches. This will take me only a minute or two.”

When Thran pointed firmly at Bard’s sketchbook on the fruit crate coffee table, Bard took it up with uncharacteristic meekness, but he ruined the effect when he stuck his tongue out at his husband. Laughing, Thran returned the gesture, then got up to see to his laundry. Bard doodled a quick sketch of an orb that suggested Mercury’s head, complete with winged hat and caduceus. Another of Neptune included a beard of seaweed and a trident. Jupiter had storm clouds for hair and beard, and a crown of lightning bolts. By that time, Thran was back to rejoin him on the sofa.

“Ah, for the orrery,” Thran sat close, looping his left arm in Bard’s right to sit close enough to view the sketches. “You will make the planets as faces?”

“That’s one design,” Bard nodded. “I don’t know if the client will like that whimsy, but I’ve got another idea that will show the planet surfaces more realistically, as they appear in the Hubble space telescope, but the metal bits that hold the orbs will have the mythological signs of each planet and some feature, such as Neptune’s trident, Venus’s mirror and the clamshell, and so on, all done in steampunk style. Both will be fun to do, so I’m not particular as to which he chooses.”

“Whichever one he does not choose, you can use the design for another piece,” Thran suggested.
“Absolutely. I kind of hope he decides he wants the planet surface one. The faces would make a great totem pole.”

“Ooh, my saint, they would!” Thran agreed, his arm tightening on Bard’s in his excitement. “So we will wish that he wants scientific endeavor rather than mythological whimsy.”

“We will,” Bard chuckled. “So what other news came your way today?”

Thran dropped his voice to a low murmur. “Kell called about our adoption questions.”

Bard locked eyes with his husband. “And?”

Thran smiled. “It will not be hard for us. New York recognizes our marriage, of course, so it also recognizes our right to adopt. In our case, because we are already legally married, we want to adopt our stepchildren – I Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda, and you Legolas. Normally, the main concern would be to obtain a release of parental rights on the parts of the children’s mothers, but as they are both beyond this world, we do not have to do that. So we complete some forms that Kell will provide to us. Bain, Legolas, and Sigrid are over twelve, so they must each complete a form that states their agreement to the adoption. Tilda does not have to complete a form, but I would want her to agree to it just as the other children do. We file the forms at the same county office where we were married, and then we wait for the legal wheels to slowly grind to a conclusion.”

A grin spread across Bard’s face. “That’s all we have to do? That’s great!”

“I am just as excited,” Thran agreed, squeezing Bard’s arm. “Kell has sent me the forms we need. So we must talk with the children separately – you with yours, and I with Legolas, and see how they feel about it. We will tell them that we want to do this because we love them, and because we want them to be protected in the eyes of the law in all circumstances.”

“Exactly,” Bard murmured. “If something happens, we want to keep everyone together, not scattered in foster homes. I think Sigrid and Tilda will be okay with it, hands down. I hope both of the lads will.”

“When do you want to talk to the children?”

“Sooner rather than later. What do you think?”

“I agree. Perhaps after they finish their homework? When Legolas goes upstairs to shower, I will go with him, and then you can talk to Sigrid, Bain, and Tilda down here.”

“We’ll see what we can do,” Bard nodded. “Oh, wait – you said you found out something else?”

“Tcha, I nearly forgot,” Thran tsked. “I did not want to say it in front of the children –”

“Hmm, then it must be about Lance,” Bard breathed with a grimace.

“It is,” Thran’s voice dropped to a whisper. “I talked to Mr. D today. Lance has not been out of police custody. The seriousness of what he did was enough that he narrowly escaped being charged as an adult. But because of his age – he is only fifteen – he will be placed in one of the wilderness programs that Mr. D told me about. It is in the Catskill Mountains, some two hundred miles away, secure, quite remote, and well staffed with counselors and so forth to encourage the children to take a different tack. He has been told that his behavior in this program is all that stands between him and the adult criminal justice system. He will be placed in this program in a few days. So he will be well away from us for some time to come.”
Bard let a long breath go. “That’s good news. I hope he can turn himself around, but more than that, I’m just glad he won’t be anywhere near us, particularly Sigrid. Why he fixated on her when Bain, Legs, you and I – even Tilda – also fought against him bothers me.”

Thran’s jaw tightened. “Because she is what he calls an ‘uppity bitch,’ Bard. She not only stood up to him, but she physically fought him, and she defeated him. He cannot countenance it.”

“If he’d left Legolas alone, if he hadn’t attacked her, she wouldn’t have laid a hand on him,” Bard protested.

“I agree. But he thinks his way is the only way, and no female should cross him, or so Mr. D told me,” Thran replied. When Bard tensed, his husband rubbed his thigh in consolation. “No, I agree with you, Bard. But Lance does not. Let us hope that this wilderness program can change his mind.”

“Agreed.” Bard tried to relax the tension out of his body, but was only partially successful. “There’s nothing we can do about that, so I’ll try not to worry about it. Instead, let’s think about the adoption, and hope the children are as for it as we are.”

Thran leaned his head on Bard’s shoulder. “Now it is I who agrees. Let us see how the homework progresses, and perhaps we can broach the subject with our children. I am excited with the chance to make your children and my child our children in all of the world, not just within our home.”

Bard hummed agreement. Thran fell silent, happy to sit beside him to watch him sketch. He doodled a few ideas for steampunk fittings for the orrery globes, regardless of whether they featured faces or landscapes, and a fanciful base. Before long, Tilda came in with her list of French vocabulary words for Thran. Their conversation was almost entirely in French, evidence that the concentrated attention from his husband and Legolas continued to improve her fluency. She went through the words perfectly the first time, which brought a proud smile to his face as well as Tilda’s.

“Monsieur Cornett said that I’ve gotten so much better that next year he’d recommend me for the conversational French class,” Tilda said proudly. “Then I could talk like you and Legs, Ada.”

“That will be wonderful, Kukla,” Thran beamed. “Now we must encourage your Da to take a class, so that he will know what we all say.”

“Maybe that should be my summer camp,” Bard teased. “We’ll have to see if the barn and the carriage house leave me time for that.”

“The barn and the carriage house?” Tilda looked up, her brow furrowed in confusion.

“The barn because I’ll have metal to work, and the carriage house because I’ll have chauffeur duties to get all of you to your camps and so forth. Maybe later in the summer, after most of your camps are done, and Ada’s ballet is on.”

“What happens after you do your ballet at the festival, Ada? Will you make another one?”

“Without doubt,” Thran nodded. “But perhaps not for a while. If people like Immortal very much, perhaps we will go on tour, across the country.”

“Really?” Tilda asked, looking interested. “So you’d go to a lot of different cities and show them Immortal?”

“We will have to see how it is received at the festival. And tours take time to arrange, so we will have to see how that develops, too. It is a lot to coordinate.”
“Will you have to do all that arranging, Thran?” Bard asked.

“Thankfully, no,” his husband shook his head. “That will be the task of our public relations people, and Lettie, and others. I hope I can concentrate on refinements to Immortal, and the dance, and work with Irmo on new ballets.”

“So... you’re the artistic director?” Bard asked.

“That is what I hope my place evolves to be,” Thran nodded. “Until we have the company on a solid foundation, I am everything, Lettie is everything, we are all everything. We cannot afford to specialize right now.”

“What does that mean, Ada?” Tilda struggled to understand. “The studio building is broken? That happened once to our house, because Da had to brick up part of the cellar wall that cracked. Maybe he can fix it for you?”

“The studio building is in fine shape, Kukla,” Thran reassured her. “I mean only that our ballet company is very new, very young, very inexperienced, very unknown. That is good because we come up with new things. But it is also bad because people who would come to see our new things do not know about us. So that is why we work very hard to make Immortal so special – so people will discover we are here, and will want to see more of our work.”

“Oh,” Tilda’s face cleared. “Like our school put up signs in the halls and around the village about the April Fool’s Follies, to let everyone know when and where to come.”

“Exactly,” Thran nodded. “You have it, Kukla.”

Legolas stuck his head in the sitting room. “I’m done all my homework, Papa. I’m very tired from archery today, so I’d like to take my shower and read my book for a while.”

Bard and Thran exchanged glances. At Bard’s miniscule nod, Thran turned back to Legolas. “That is fine, synok. Restore yourself for tomorrow.”

“Okay, Papa.” Legolas gave them a grateful smile and went upstairs.

Thran squeezed Bard’s leg, offered him a smile of hopeful anticipation, and got up to follow his son. Bard let a few moments pass before he beckoned to Tilda, and they both went into the kitchen.

“How’s the state of the homework?” Bard asked casually to Bain and Sigrid.

“I’ve got one more math problem, but that’s all,” Bain looked up.

Sigrid’s fingers never stopped moving over her computer keyboard. “Just another sentence or two, Da. What’s up?”

“Finish your sentences and your math problem, then I want to talk to you all.”

Sigrid shot him a frown, but tore her eyes away to focus resolutely on her computer screen. “Okay, just a couple of minutes...”

Bard busied himself getting another cup of tea while his children finished their studies. Tilda asked for another cookie, so he put several on a plate and brought it to the table.

“When you’re finished,” he told Bain, whose hand automatically strayed for the plate.

“Aw, Da,” Bain grumped, but his grin was sheepish; he knew the routine. In a few minutes, he put down his pencil with satisfaction. “Okay, done.”

“Put everything away,” Bard directed. “Just like always, boyo.”

“I know,” Bain exhaled, digging through his backpack for his green math homework folder. “That doesn’t mean I don’t hope otherwise.”

“If you didn’t, I’d think you were sick,” Bard agreed. “Okay, have at. One.”

“Da!” Bain protested again, but took the single cookie without delay.

“Okay, I’m done, too,” Sigrid announced as she clicked a few more keys. “Done, saved, and backed up. So what’s up?”

Bard waited until everyone had a cookie. “I want to talk to you about something Thran and I have been considering. It’s something to make sure we can take care of all of you and Legolas in case anything bad happens.”

“Lance isn’t coming back, little doll. And nothing else bad is going to happen that we know about. But you know bad things can happen, like someone gets sick or hurt. If it ever does, Thran and I want to make sure that we all stay together as a family, that’s all. So let me explain what we’ve talked about, okay?”

“Okay,” the children said.

“Thran and I are married, so that means he’s your stepfather, right? Just like I’m Legolas’s stepfather. We wondered how you’d feel if Thran adopted you, so he’d be your legal father, not your stepfather. I’d adopt Legolas so I’d be his legal father, not his stepfather, and all of you would be brothers and sisters, not stepbrothers and stepsisters.”

The children looked around at each other. Sigrid was calm, even smiling slightly, so she was likely already agreeable. Tilda looked confused, and Bain was thinking about it.

“This won’t really change anything,” Sigrid observed. “This is for legal protection, am I right?”

“That’s right,” Bard nodded. “It won’t change anything for us, likely for the rest of our lives. But because of what happened to your Mam and Legolas’s Mam, we all know bad things can happen. We want to make sure that if anything happens to Thran, then Legolas would stay with us, here in our home, and not have to go to a foster family. We want to make sure that if anything happens to me, then you would stay with Legolas and Thran, here in our home, and not have to go to a foster family. No one could break us up, ever. Does that make sense?”

Sigrid nodded. “I’m for it.”

Bain, however, looked a little dubious. “So... Thran would be my Da, just like you are.”

Bard nodded. “I’m your biological father as well as your legal father. Thran would be your legal father, too.”

“What about Mam?” Bain asked.

“She will always be your mother, and Vileria will always be Legolas’s mother. This won’t change that.”
“Will I have to stop calling Thran Ada, and call him Da?” Tilda wanted to know.

“You can call him Ada for as long as you want. I think he really likes that name, anyway. And Bain, you can call him Thran just as you do now. This really doesn’t change anything for any of us, other than to protect you against bad stuff.”

“And Legolas would be our real brother, not our stepbrother,” Tilda pursued.

“Exactly right,” Bard nodded. “Have I explained everything so you understand?”

“Can I say no?” Bain said quietly, looking scared. He winced when Sigrid snorted in disagreement.

“You can,” Bard nodded calmly. “I won’t make you do anything about this that you don’t want. If it makes you feel better, you and Sigrid are over twelve, which means that you have to sign a form that says you agree to let Thran adopt you. So if you don’t want him to, he can’t. Legs is over twelve, too, so he’d have to sign the same kind of form to let me adopt him.”

“What about me? Don’t I get to sign a form?” Tilda asked.

“You’re too young to have to sign a form, little doll, but if you don’t want Thran to adopt you, then he won’t. You get to say yes or no, just like the other children.”

“What do we have to do to get adopted?” Sigrid asked.

“We all fill out a bunch of forms –”

“Of course,” Sigrid smirked.

“Of course,” Bard grinned. “We fill out the forms, we take them to the same place where we got married, and then we wait for however long it takes for the people in the county office to approve it.”

“Can they say no?” Bain asked.

Bard shook his head. “Whatever we say goes.”

The children looked at each other. Sigrid was still calm, though her smile was a bit wider. Bain still seemed torn, but Tilda’s expression revealed her usual thoughtful consideration.

“Would you like to take a few days to think about it?” Bard said. “It’s okay if you do.”

“What if Legolas doesn’t want to?” Tilda asked.

“Then it’s okay, same as it is now,” Bard replied. “Thran’s upstairs talking to him just as I’m down here talking to you, so after they’re done, maybe the four of you might want to talk about it together.”

“But you want us to do this, right, Da?” Bain pressed.

“I would like to know that you’re protected in case something happens to me,” Bard nodded. “But I want you to be comfortable with this, and with Thran. No one will think differently if you don’t want to do this.”

The children exchanged looks again. Tilda ventured, “I’d like Legolas to be my brother, not just my stepbrother.”

Bain nodded slowly, but with increasing confidence. “Yeah. Me, too, Til. And Thran... he’s a good guy. I like him. He’d look after us right if anything happened to you, Da. So... yeah. I’m okay with it.”

Sigrid grinned. “Oh, I was in from the start. I just hope the prospect of having the three of us as his full brother and sisters doesn’t scare Legolas to death.”

“Hey, it’s not me he’s scared of, Sig, or Tilda. It’s you.”

Sigrid’s smirk was smug. “Hey, he knows I’ve got his back.”

“You’re all sure?” Bard pressed. “You don’t have to decide right this second, all right? You can think about it.”

“No, I’m good,” Tilda said with a definite shake of her head.

“Let’s hope Legolas wants to take us on, then,” Sigrid looked past her father towards the hall. “Sounds like they’re coming downstairs.”

Tilda bit her lip. “Oh, I hope he said yes, too.”

Bard joined his children in looking towards the hall. Despite himself, he tensed as the tall, blond youth and his father appeared. Had Legolas had said yes, or no?

He was about to find out.

* * *

Thran stuck his head in Legolas’s room. “May I come in?”

Legolas had picked up his sleep pants and a tee. “Of course, Papa. What is it?”

“I have something to ask you. Come, let us sit.”

He explained about the adoption. Legolas grew very still, and for the first time in a long time, he seemed as reserved as he had been when he’d first come home from boarding school. Thran folded his hands in his lap and gave his son a thoughtful look.

“What do you consider, Legolas? This is not something either Bard or I intend to force upon you or the other children. If you are uncomfortable in the least, then it will not be done.”

“What do the other children think of it?”

“I do not know, synok. Bard speaks of it downstairs with them now.”

“So... what exactly does it mean, adoption?”

“To us, in our lives, it means very little. We will be Clan Ffyrnig as we already are. Bard will not treat you any differently than he does now, nor will I treat Sigrid, Bain, or Kukla any differently than I do now. It will matter only if something happens to Bard or me. If something happens to me, then you would stay with Bard and the other children as you do now. If something happens to Bard, then Sigrid, Bain, and Kukla would stay with us. There would be no chance for the courts to put any of you in a foster family. That is the reason Bard and I consider this. It is like the medical insurance – it is there if we need it.”

Legolas bowed his head. “Does this mean that Maman won’t be my mother any more?”

Thran looped his arm around his son’s shoulders. “Of course not, Legolas. She will always be your mother, and she will always love you as her son. It means that you are very lucky to have had three parents who love you, that is all. And you will also be the full brother to Sigrid, Bain, and Kukla.”

“What if something happens to both you and Bard?”

“You know I have set up provisions so that you would be cared for in our home. That will extend to the other children, too. None of you will have to go into a foster home, or be separated.”

Legolas nodded, and looked down at his hands again. Thran’s arm tightened around his shoulders, offering comfort.

“What are your thoughts, synok? Did I not explain everything completely?”

“Bard would adopt me, and you would adopt Sigrid, Bain, and Kukla. Bard would be my father, and the children will be my full brother and sisters.”

Thran nodded. “You have it.”

Legolas looked up at him with a troubled expression. “You won’t think that if I say yes, that I don’t want you as my father anymore, will you?”

“Of course not! This is not to take me from you, or Bard from Sigrid, Bain, and Kukla. It is to give all of you more, you see?”

Legolas nodded. “Bard has done so much for me – he fixed up my room, and our home here, and all the cooking... he looks out for me; he even plays zombie apocalypse. I like being with him. I just wanted to make sure that you know I still love you, and that I want you as my Papa always.”

“And I want you to know that you will always be my son, whom I love very much, too. Sigrid and Bain and Kukla are more children, not replacement children.”

Legolas nodded, finally smiling. “They are a lot of fun, especially our Kukla.”

“I enjoy them very much, too.”

“Then I would like to, Papa. I want Clan Ffyrnig to be together for a long time, no matter what happens. But... do you think the other children will feel the same way?”

“I hope they will. Shall we go down and find out?”

Legolas nodded, so they got up from his son’s bed and went downstairs. As they came into the kitchen, Legolas ahead of him, four heads turned towards them. He caught Bard’s wink – thank the gods, all was well. A wide grin spread across his face as Tilda turned around in her chair to peer excitedly at Legolas.

“Did you say yes? Please say that you said yes.”

Legolas gulped, but he managed a crooked smile. “I did. I hope you did, too.”

“We all did,” Tilda nodded vigorously.
Sigrid pulled a plate of cookies within reach and held it out to Legolas. “There’s two left, if you and Ada want to help us celebrate.”

Legolas took his with a big smile. As Thran took the last cookie, he met Bard’s elated eyes, and held up his cookie in silent salute. The treat was a sweet one, but not nearly as sweet as their children’s unanimous decision. That was without equal.
Chapter 125

Chapter Summary

A teenaged rite of spring translates into plans for a Clan Ffyrnig shopping expedition. A saint's efforts continue on house and art, and an angel works his magic on a captive audience.

Chapter Notes

I own no rights to Wagner's Thus Spake Zarathustra, the Thriller music, nor the Thriller dance choreography.

Despite Tilda’s happy applause, Bain and Legolas exchanged bashful, awkward looks. Thran locked eyes with his husband, sharing silent congratulations at their children’s unanimous agreement to their adoption plan, so it was left to Sigrid to break the ungainly silence. She did so with her usual forthrightness, rolling her eyes and snorting.

“Oh, ye gods and little fishhooks,” she sniffed. “It’s not as if anything’s changing. We’re still going to rumble and roll the same way.”

“Me!” Tilda hopped out of her chair, put one hand on her hip, and stuck the other one up to point at the far wall, striking a silly superhero pose. “It came from me! Your real sister. If you want to help me celebrate, you can play Dinky Farm with me.”

Legolas laughed outright. “I have a better idea.”

“Oh? What?”

“What if I show you how to play the car race game?”

“Oooh, really?” Tilda’s eyes lit up. “You’d show me how to play that? Da, can I?”

“Knock yourself out, little doll,” Bard grinned. “Make sure Legs shows you how to drift, yeah? That’s the most fun.”

“Ooh, drifting!” Tilda echoed. She looked up at Legolas. “What’s drifting?”

Bain put a hand over his eyes in mock suffering. “Oh, Tilda...”

“Maybe Bain can help us, Kukla,” Legolas smiled. “He’s really good at that.”
“All right!” Bain dropped his seeming indifference. “Sure, Til, I’ll help. Come on.”

The three children dashed off to the sitting room, leaving Sigrid to shut her computer, then crack her knuckles in such a resounding ripple of snaps and pops that Thran cringed. “Ah, my evil plan proceeds apace. The shower is mine, all mine!”

Bard laughed at Sigrid’s fiendish laughter. “Go revel in your ill-gotten gains, then, you nefarious villain. Before Legolas remembers that he’s tired.”

“I will.” Sigrid bounced up to press a sound smack of a kiss on Bard’s cheek, then bestowed the same to Thran. “You two are the limit, and I thank you both kindly. Especially you, Ada. It’s one thing for Da to adopt Legolas – he’s so well behaved. But you’re getting the three crazy Bowmans. You must be as crazy as we are.”

Thran snickered. “What is the adage? Who needs to watch TV? The comedy is already in the house.”

“Oh, that’s no lie,” Sigrid laughed. “All right, I’m off to the shower. Then I’m going to call Finn and tell him the good news.”

“Okay, sweetness,” Bard waved her towards the hall. “Enjoy the warm water.”

As Sigrid skipped upstairs, Thran sat down beside Bard and drew him close to kiss his temple. “I am very happy, lyubov moya. No, that is not quite right. Happy, yes... but also very honored that your children trust me enough to do this.”

“I feel the same way about Legolas. I hope it wasn’t a tough sell.”

“Not at all. His concern was mostly that he did not want me to feel as if he no longer wanted me as his Papa. I told him this was not to take anything from any of us, but to give us all more. And he was very taken to be Kukla’s full brother.”

“She felt the same way. Sig was in from the first word, which was no surprise. The big thing for Bain was to know that no one would end up in foster care. We saw a lot of the worst of that in the city, and the children want Clan Ffyrnig to stay together.”

“I will print out all of the paperwork tonight, then,” Thran murmured, his hand straying over Bard’s back. “We can fill it in tomorrow or the next day, and then we must file it. I do not think all of us must be present to file it, but I will ask. If the children do not need to be present, then one or both of us can go into the office one morning. Once UVB starts work at the school in the afternoons, I could do it easily.”

Bard stroked the hair away from Thran’s face with the lightest touch, prickling Thran’s skin into gooseflesh. “Before you get too deeply into those afternoon rehearsals, I have an idea about how I want us spend one of those mornings.”

A sly smile teased the corners of Thran’s lips. “Do you?”

“I do.”

“Does it have anything to do with a certain solarium?”

“It does.”

Thran hummed deep in his throat, and his smile grew wider. “Oh, my saint, let us not wait to indulge in such a beautiful way. Sooner rather than later, please.”

“I would have said this week, but the painters will be here.”

“The solarium is most beautiful at night, but we have already discovered the rarity of uninterrupted time when the children are here, so we will indulge as soon as the painters are gone and we are here alone.”

“That’s a date, then,” Bard breathed, running his lips down Thran’s throat. The touch was so soft, so arousing... “The first day the painters are gone.”

“I cannot wait for the dancer to meet the rare artist who has made such a beautiful garden,” Thran breathed.

“Maybe the mysterious dancer will favor the artist with one of the dances that have earned him such renown.”

“He will savor the chance to share his new sanctuary with an appreciative audience, and who is more appreciative than the one who created it?”

“I can’t wait to see how appreciative the dancer is,” Bard bit Thran’s earlobe.

“Ooh, my saint...”

“Da! Come look! I’m doing it!” Tilda yelled.

Grinning, Bard gave a last nip to Thran’s earlobe before he looked towards the sitting room. “Doing what, Til?”

“Drifting!” she crowed. “Come see!”

Bard winked at Thran before he climbed out of his chair and ambled into the sitting room. There was Tilda, eagerly working her game controller. On the TV, a bright yellow Mustang with two wide black stripes rocketed down the straightaway of a banked racetrack.

“Watch!” Tilda ordered she bounced up and down on the sofa. “Here I go!”

The yellow Mustang – Angry Bumble, the screen read at the top – whipped into full drift to get through the corner, showering rubber in every direction. It snapped back once it hit the next straightaway and roared towards the next corner.

“See! My car drifted! I did it!”

“You certainly did,” Bard nodded, as Thran offered applause. “You catch on fast.”

“Yeah – too fast,” Bain snarked. When Tilda stuck her tongue out at him, Legolas chuckled and chose that moment to drive his car past Tilda’s. With an outraged yelp, Tilda worked her controller madly to get her car to chase after Legolas’s.

Thran left them to it, and drifted into the solarium. As Bard followed him, he switched on his Istanbul lamps, setting them aglow in the darkness. It was the first time they’d turned the lamps on at dusk, and he was delighted at how exotic it looked. Gods, with a few more plants for background and the fountain softly splashing, it would be a vision right out of the Arabian Nights. How easy it would be to tease Bard into all manner of sensual delights...

Maybe their first dalliance in this room wouldn’t be at night, but it’d be their private oasis regardless of when they met here. But if ever all four of the children managed to be out on the same night, he knew exactly how he’d spend the evening. Bard would put up no resistance, either.

He’d only just snuck a hand over Bard’s glute, only just enjoyed Bard’s hum of pleasure, when Sigrid’s urgent call echoed from upstairs.

“Da! Da!”

Bard exhaled and gave Thran a chagrined look. “Gods, it’s like they know,” he murmured.

“Da-Ada radar,” Thran offered with a snicker.

“Or something,” Barr agreed. He looked back towards the sitting room. “In here, Sig.”

“Da!” Sigrid burst into the solarium with breathless speed. “Da – ooh, wow, it’s gorgeous in here!
Just gorgeous.”

“Thank you,” Bard’s tone was mild. “Where’s the fire?”

“Fire – what? Oh, that! Da, I just talked to Finn, and he asked me to the Imladris junior prom!”

“He did? Well, of course he did. You’re the prettiest girl in the school, aren’t you?”

“Oh, Da – I wouldn’t be one of those girls who primp all the time for anything.”

“Of course not,” Bard agreed.

“Did you tell him yes?” Thran smiled.

“Wellllll...” Sigrid hedged. “I want to, but...”

“But what?” Bard turned his whole regard on his daughter.

“I need a dress.” Sigrid’s expression was more wince than anything else, and she clasped her hands together in unconscious dismay. “Maybe we could go to the second-hand store this weekend?”

“Absolutely not.” Thran put his arms akimbo. “This is an important thing, this prom, yes?”

“Well.... not as much as the senior prom, but for juniors.... yes.”

“Then you should have a nice dress, don’t you think so, Bard?”

“I think we can manage that,” Bard nodded with a smile.

“In fact, that will tie in nicely to my plan for this weekend,” Thran said smoothly. “Legolas has outgrown his jeans again, and I suspect the rest of the children have grown almost as much. We need to get them all new clothes.”

“Gods, you’re right,” Bard winced. “I should have thought of that before now. It’s getting warmer, and there’s likely nothing from last year that’ll fit any of them. So yes, we need to make a pilgrimage.
We can look for a dress for Sig at the same time.”

“Really?” Sigrid’s face was wreathed with a huge smile. “Oh, that’ll be so amazing! Can I call Finn back now and tell him?”

“Absolutely. We’ll go this weekend after you finish at the bistro, and see what we can find.”
Sigrid threw her arms around Bard, then Thran. “Oh, thank you, thank you so much! Thank you!”

“You’re welcome,” Bard and Thran offered, but Sigrid had already sprinted upstairs to relay her acceptance to Finn. They exchanged glances and rueful chuckles.

“I should have thought about their clothes long before now,” Bard grimaced, rubbing the back of his neck. “I wash all their laundry, so I can’t claim that I don’t know the state of their clothes. My three are used to shabby things, but Legolas isn’t. I wouldn’t have minded if he’d said something.”

“I think he liked letting his things become not so pristine,” Thran observed, coming to stand beside Bard again. His hand strayed over Bard’s glute again, coaxing another hum from Bard. “The Imladris Academy is not the style-conscious place that his boarding school was, and is more relaxed. He likes that.”

“Oh, the children are more style-conscious at Imladris than you think, but it’s a different vibe. More boho, more artsy. Makes sense, given that the village is more of an artist colony than most places. Not a lot of the preppy stuff. I figured it out the first few days I volunteered. By the way, you said that you and UVB will be at the school on Thursday for the assembly?”

Thran nodded. “We have just time to teach the Thriller dance to the company, so that will be tomorrow’s fun.”

“I think I’ll do my volunteer day then. I can sneak into the assembly to see you dance.”

Thran’s fingers traced teasing circles over Bard’s back. “I will make sure that your dancer offers you something delicious in the solarium very soon.”

“Mmm,” Bard growled, offering Thran a furtive kiss on his collarbone. “I look forward to that. In the meantime, I’ll get a kick out of you on Thursday, and then on Saturday or Sunday, we can take the children to shop. Or if you have to work on Immortal, I can take them.”

“I want to attend this ritual,” Thran mused. “It will fun to watch the children enjoy themselves, and who would not want to see our lioness in a beautiful gown?”

“Will the children need something nice for your ballet premiere?”

“That is the tradition,” Thran nodded. “I generally rent something for Legolas, because he grows too fast to buy something so formal each time. But Kukla would like a pretty dress, perhaps?”

“Probably so,” Bard nodded. “I guess I need a suit, too. I can follow the lads’ example and rent something, too.”

“I will enjoy that,” Thran purred. “We will do that on another day, when we have time to focus on formal things. This weekend, we will see to comfortable, practical things for school and home. And Sigrid’s dress.”

“Oh, we have a plan,” Bard nodded. “Who knows? Maybe I’ll break down and buy a couple of tees and some shorts for myself.”

How delightful would that be? Very. But not as delicious as it would be to tease and entice a humble garden designer. Thran had his sari ready...

Something pricked at the edge of his thoughts.

Tcha – nothing could interrupt his anticipation for the next game that he and Bard would share.
Nothing.

Something important could.

Think, Thran, think... what had Bard just said?

Oh, gods – it was so obvious.

Just a day after Thran’s fairytale and the ensuing heartfelt discussion, as clear as diamonds, the thing he had so hoped to see –

Actually, the most important thing was what he hadn’t seen.

This weekend’s shopping expedition was sure to be an expensive proposition, given four children who needed so many things, including at least one frothy party dress. Yet Bard had not blinked, flinched, or worried at the prospect of it. Oh, gods – had he finally accepted that he and Thran were partners, and that together they could care for their children as they both wanted to? He must have – he’d even thought about buying a new shirt for himself. And he hadn’t said a single word about the cost of any of it.

Thran’s smile was elated, then tender. Finally, his saint was easing.

---

Tuesday and Wednesday raced by. Thran left early and came home late as UVB worked on their presentation to the Imladris Academy students, and prepared to move their rehearsals to the school auditorium. He filmed a trio of promotional spots with Mavis Davis about the upcoming festival where Immortal would make its premiere. Even when he was home in the evenings, he was frequently on his mobile with Lettie and Ori to discuss items. Despite that, he had taken the completed adoption papers to the county building to file them in the midst of all his goings and comings, so they had done all they could to begin the process.

Bard made sure that Thran ate and slept well when he was at home. When his husband was away during the day, though, Bard’s focus was on his own endeavors. Once the painters arrived on Tuesday, he worked on the clay model of the tree for Hal’s commission, and by the early afternoon had it well along. He took a break to get the fountain running in the solarium, and made a quick run to Sam’s garden center to splurge on more ferns, the bright yellow hibiscus that Legolas liked so much, and some twining vines to accompany the fountain. Sam would deliver a couple of large palms as soon as they came in. It would have been wonderful to prowl through the junkshops for another chair or two for the solarium, but Bard had too many other things going on to indulge in that. The coming weekend was filling up, so there likely wouldn’t be time then, either. But that was okay – he was happy to be so busy with his commissions.

While he had the trunk for Hal’s tree mostly done, he couldn’t do the final arrangement of the roots without the chunk of white quartz that would make the base of the piece. To remedy that, he stopped on the way to the market Wednesday morning to peruse the aquarium center’s rock offerings, but nothing suitable appeared. Sam hadn’t had anything in the landscaping section of his garden center, either. As Bard continued on to the market, he considered other options as he bought the family’s provisions and made his way home. There was a construction crew blocking the road on his way home, so he had to detour down a residential street that he normally didn’t traverse. The traffic was much thicker than the small road was used to handling, so he made slow progress. He was patient, though; there wasn’t anything in the groceries that would suffer another ten minutes in the back of the truck, so he checked out the gardens on either side of the street to see how they were laid out. He wanted to have some ideas to bounce off of Sam for the front yard, once the painters were done next week –

The house on the right, in the middle of the block, had two white rocks in the front yard, one on either side of the driveway, right at the curb. They looked to be about ten or fifteen pounds apiece, maybe a bit more, and beautifully angular. And quartz.

Without thinking, Bard clicked on his blinker and pulled out of the traffic to the curb in front of the house. He got out of the truck, trotted up to the front door, and rang the doorbell. After some seconds, the door inched open, then a little more, then a little more, then went all the way wide. A rotund man in his late sixties peered up at him from a wheelchair though thick glasses. He had on a tidy red flannel shirt with two breast pockets, sturdy dark blue moleskin pants, and comfortable oxford shoes. The wheelchair was sleek and fit the man’s body well – maybe that meant a long-term injury or illness.

“‘Yes?’

“Hello, my name is Bard Bowman, and I’m an artist. Those two rocks at the end of your driveway... would you consider selling them to me?’

The man gave him a suspicious look. “Is this a joke?”

Bard chuckled. “No sir, it’s not. I really am an artist, and I really am interested in buying your rocks.”

He dug for his wallet, pulled out one of his new business cards, and held it up to the storm door. When the man beckoned to him, he opened the door and handed the card over. “I have this commission...”

Bard described the tree Hal had asked him to make, and how he needed a sizeable chunk of white quartz to form the base for the metal tree.

“I hadn’t seen the right rock so far, but I think yours would fit the bill perfectly. Would you consider it?”

The man’s expression had eased from its suspicion to one of more consideration. He looked once more at the card, then studied Bard closely.

“Bard Bowman, you say? You wouldn’t be the artist who had an exhibit at the Ilithien Gallery a week or so ago, are you?”

“On April thirtieth? Yes, sir, that was me. I had a lot of my sketches on display, plus a couple of pieces of sculpture.”

The man nodded. “One of my neighbors told me about it. She actually bought one of your sketches. It was of a little girl.”

Bard nodded again. “I had one of my daughter Tilda playing hopscotch, and another one of her and her brother reading together.”

The man nodded once more. “The hopscotch one it was. I saw it. Nicely done.”

“Thank you,” Bard smiled. “So about the rocks...”
The man’s grin was sudden, and surprisingly mischievous. “I’ve always hated both of them, if you want to know the truth of it. They were my wife’s idea. She thought they’d make it harder for our son to miss the driveway and drive over the grass, but all it accomplished was to make me have to take that damned car in for a realignment twice as often as I would have if he’d just run over the curb.”

Bard’s chuckle was rueful. “My older daughter’s just about to start driving. I expect I’ll be right there with you before too long.”

“Oh, lordy, they’re a handful – teen drivers,” the man held up both hands in resignation as he shook his head. “How old is your girl?”

“Sixteen going on thirty-five,” Bard rubbed the back of his head. “Right now, she’s closer to sixteen, because her boyfriend asked her to the prom, and she’s pretty excited about it. How old is your son?”

“He’s thirty-two, but he still drives over the damned rocks like a sixteen-year old. So if you want ‘em, they’re yours. It’d be nice if they’d turn into something other than a source of steady business for my mechanic.”

Bard pulled out his wallet again. “How much do you want for them?”

“Twenty and they’re yours.”

Bard pulled out a couple of tens and opened the storm door to hand them to the man. “Done, and I thank you kindly.”

The man leaned forward in his wheelchair to take the bills. “My wife won’t, but what she doesn’t know now won’t hurt her later. I hope they do your tree proud.”

“I think they’ll be perfect. Thanks again.”

The man waved, and watched as Bard loaded both chunks into the back of his truck. Bard waved his thanks again, and got a wave and a satisfied smile in return before the man closed the door. Bard got back into his truck and inched his way back into the line of traffic with a glad feeling of accomplishment.

He got home, stowed all the groceries, plotted supper, checked with the painters – Darla’s crew was making great progress – and hauled both of the rocks he’d bought around to the back terrace. He gave them a thorough wash with a scrub brush and a bucket of water, and left them to dry in the sun. He was considering which one would make the better base when Darla came around to talk about the broken balustrade on the front porch. They went around to the front of the house to consider; he got it free from the railing and took it into the barn to glue and clamp. It’d be ready to put back in place tomorrow. The missing one... after discussion with Darla, he freed the one from the back of the side railing to fill the missing space. At some point, he’d see about a replacement to fill the empty space, and if he couldn’t get an exact match, at least a replacement wouldn’t be so obvious. He had several rotten boards on one side of the porch to replace, too, so he’d have to see about that as soon as possible so that the painters could paint them. Maybe Friday? Tomorrow, Thursday, he’d do his volunteer stint at the school, and see Thran dance at the assembly. Maybe he could buy the lumber first thing tomorrow morning...

Welcome to working on an old house. Something always needed to be done.

Darla also wanted to talk about the front door. It was original to the house, and beautifully carved, but the finish was well weathered, and some of the wood was badly stained. They talked about restoring it, but neither Darla nor Bard thought that it would ever look more than shabby, despite the beautiful carving. Tilda had asked for a red door, and when he ventured that with Darla, he was relieved when she agreed that a painted finish would rejuvenate it nicely. As the stained glass sidelights and transom both featured green leaves and amber and red flowers, a red door would match it very well. The brass work – lock, knocker, and knobs – was still in good shape despite the dull finish, but a little polish and elbow grease would bring that back to life.

Something else to do, he smiled to himself. There was always something else to do.

By the time the children came home – everyone was well enough to stay for sport today – Bard had decided which of his two rocks would be the base for Hal’s sculpture, and he’d had figured how much lumber he needed to replace the rotten porch boards. He got supper on the table for himself and the children, then started them on their homework.

When Thran got home around eight, the children made room at the end of the table for him to eat his supper. All four plied him with questions about tomorrow’s assembly, but he would only smile mysteriously and tell them that they would have to wait and see with the rest of their classmates. That provoked loud complaints, which he met with a mischievous grin.

“Now that I have outraged you beyond contemplation, are you sorry that you filled out the adoption papers?”

“Filling out the forms means that we have license to yell even louder,” Sigrid riposted.

“I shudder at the prospect,” Thran teased. “I will tell you a little, then. We will have a belly dancer, a step dancer, and a swing dance couple. You must be content with that.”

“That’s not much,” Legolas snorted. “Won’t you tell us if you’ll dance, too?”

“Of course I will dance,” Thran shrugged. “What will everyone say if I do not dance?”

“But what are you going to dance?” Tilda persisted. "Will you still dance the zombie thing?"

Thran chewed his bite of trout with great deliberation, swallowed, and had a sip of water before he answered. “It will be a surprise.”

“Augh!” Tilda complained, but Thran would not be moved. When the clamor got too insistent, Bard gave all of the children a look.

“Let Thran eat his supper, children, or he’ll be too hungry to dance anything. Just wait until tomorrow, and you’ll see what he has up his sleeve.”

“Okay, Da,” Bain snorted in exasperation as he went back to his pre-algebra homework. “Bummer, though.”

“Maybe so. You’ll find out tomorrow.”

The complaints eventually subsided, and homework continued. Still amused, Thran gave Bard a wink as he finished his rice, green beans, and salad. They soon retired to the sitting room to share tea and small dishes of ice cream.

“I should bake tomorrow, but I’ve got lumber to buy in the morning, then my stint at the school. So we’ll have to make do with ice cream for a day or two,” Bard said, as he brought in the teapot.

“Lumber?” Thran’s eyebrows went up. “What is the lumber for?”
“The rotten section of the porch.” Bard explained about that, the door, and his adventure to buy the big chunks of quartz for Hal’s tree. They carried their ice cream into the solarium for Thran to see the rock that Bard had chosen.

“I’ll have to do this properly in the barn, because the rock’s a bit weighty,” Bard grinned as he unclamped the clay model of the tree off of its board, then stooped beside the rock to arrange the still-bare wire roots over the craggy face of the rock. “But that’s more or less what it’ll look like.”

“I like it,” Thran stooped beside Bard to view the tree from several angles. “Is that how the roots will be?”

“Oh, no, that’s just the bare armature,” Bard hastened to explain. “I haven’t done the roots yet because I needed the rock first. Now that I do, I’ll make the roots look like they’re growing right into it. The rock’s got a nice, wide base to it, too, so I don’t think I’ll need anything underneath to balance it, or to keep the piece from being top heavy. I can put it on one if Hal wants it, but I think that will make it look less spontaneous. I’ll see what he thinks.”

“I like it as it is now,” Thran cocked his head as he considered it. “So you will finish the clay, and then make a mold of the clay, and then cast metal in the mold?”

“I will make molds and cast from them, yes,” Bard nodded. But because the roots and the branches are spread out, I’ll likely cast in pieces and then weld them together. That’ll make for a better piece.”

Thran hummed appreciatively, drawing Bard’s grin as he clamped the tree back to its board.

“Don’t get your knickers in a twist, angel. This won’t be that kind of welding.”

Thran waved his spoon over his dish of ice cream. “You tell me that none of your welding is that kind of welding. So I take what I can get.”

Bard chuckled. “You’ll be so disappointed when you finally see me weld.”

“Never.” Thran led the way back into the sitting room. “It will be artistic endeavour, and well worth the sight.”

“Hardly scintillating.”

“Tcha,” Thran cast him a look as they sat down. “You like to watch me at the barre from time to time. I want to see you work at your art, too.”

“You’re welcome in the barn anytime, except in the middle of casting.”

“I understand. That is a delicate time.”

“It can be...” Bard described a little about the complexities that could arise on some piece. Thran listened intently, nodding from time to time. Before long, the children joined them as they finished their homework, the Harry Potter book came out for another chapter, and the children cycled through their showers. Sigrid and Tilda seemed none the worse for wear from their colds and flu, though Legolas’s cough was still substantial. Apparently many children at school were still fighting the illnesses as well. Bard made the boy a cup of lemon ginger tea with honey to help ease it before bed, and the evening wore down. He and Thran made their usual rounds, then showered and crawled into bed.

He had intended to tease Thran about what he intended to dance tomorrow at the school assembly, but he fell sound asleep in his husband’s arms before he could manage a single sentence.
Clearly, he still had some recovering to do from the flu, too. At least he could do so in an angel’s arms.

* * *

Bard saw the children and Thran off Thursday morning with their usual breakfasts and lunches. The painters arrived as he returned from the bus stop, so he set off for to look for boards for the porch. This time, he didn’t bother with the homeowners’ mecca, but went straight to the lumberyard, which tended to have a better grade of stock and a wider selection of boards. Because he expected that to find a few more that needed replacing once he started ripping up the old ones, he got six more than he needed. He hurried back, stacked the boards in the barn, took a long few seconds to admire how well the front of the house looked with its first coat of fresh white paint, then exchanged his jeans for nicer clothes before heading to the school. He’d work with Theodred in his last class before lunch, then his first class after lunch. The period after that was the special assembly where Thran and his company would appear.

Today’s classes were one intermediate and one senior class. The senior one was more challenging, as one of the students was in a mood and wanted nothing more than to splatter paint over her canvas, almost throwing it. Theodred was well used to this, so he grabbed a sheet of frisket and a craft knife and quickly cut a shape out of the middle.

“May I, Rachel?” When the girl paused, Theodred smoothed the frisket over her canvas. The masking material was sticky on one side, and stuck to Rachel’s canvas. “Now, have at.”

The girl smacked her brush against the canvas for several strokes until Theodred nipped in and ripped the frisket away, leaving the silhouette of a giraffe in the middle of the mess. That distracted the other children enough to comment.

“Hey, how’d you do that, Rach?” another girl demanded. “That’s wild!”

By the time Theodred and Bard showed how to make frisket masks, Rachel was calmer. She made a mask shaped like a flower, and painted that in over the giraffe’s ear with more control.

“You can use the same kind of mask when you’re airbrushing, or using spray paint,” Theodred inserted smoothly. “And when the paint dries, you can come back with other masks on top to add details, like stripes, or other colors. It’s a great way to add a crisp edge to your figures.”

Relieved, Bard let Theodred do his magic as he collected the discarded brushes to wash them out in the sink. Four children at once were enough for Bard to manage.

He joined Theodred in the cafeteria for a quick sandwich, then they worked through a sophomore class working with pastel chalk. That class was less fraught with teenaged angst, and passed quickly. Bard helped Theodred return the pastels to their boxes and mop the tables down before he waved goodbye.

“See you next week, Bard,” Theodred wished him.

“That was quick thinking with Rachel.”

The young teacher’s smile was rueful. “She’s still figuring out how to handle her moods, so distracting her was the best thing. Distracting her to learn something positive was even better.”
“I have a lot to learn,” Bard said. “My oldest daughter is so level-headed for the most part. We’ll see in a year or two when Tilda gets a little older.”

“Tilda’s very deliberate and considered most of the time,” the art teacher agreed. “So keep your fingers crossed. Are you staying to see the assembly?”

“I am,” Bard smiled. “Thran’s company’s going to dance, so I’m excited to see that.”

“Are they?” Theodred’s face sharpened with interest. “Oh, that’s right, this will alert the students about the production that’s going on in the auditorium for the village’s summer festival. So it won’t be just a boring blah blah blah about what’s going on, then?”

“I don’t think so, no. Thran said last night that several of the company’s dancers will be on hand to do a little show and tell, but he kept mum about what exactly they’d do, just that it would be more than ballet.”

“Interesting!” Theodred replied. “I think I want to see this assembly, too. Come on; everything’s about as clean as we can get it, so let’s see if we can snare a couple of seats.”

They headed down to the auditorium, which was already nearly full of students and teachers. Bard and Theodred had to make do with standing along the sides.

“Good afternoon.” Headmaster L’Eärendil walked to the middle of the empty stage. Behind him were the blank, matte black walls of the Immortal stage; he stood on the two-thirds of the circle that would soon become Death’s ornate Underworld. “As you know, this summer, our school has the great privilege to host the premiere of a new ballet that will be the highlight of Greenwood Dale on the Lake’s summer arts festival. This is the first time that the festival will host a ballet, much less the premiere of one that has never been seen before.

“Many of you are already aware of the effort that has begun here to stage this new work. The UltraViolet Ballet Company has generously provided a wonderful opportunity for many of you to learn that’s involved to stage such a work though several kinds of internships. We have students already busy on the construction crew to build the sets and scenes for the ballet. We also have others who will manage lights, sound, and music. This is a rare chance for those of you who want to continue your studies in the performing arts to work on a real production. So to officially kick off the effort to bring this exciting ballet to our school, our stage, our village, and our world, I’d like to introduce Thran Oropherson, executive director and principal dancer for UltraViolet Ballet.”

A good round of applause went up from the students as Thran appeared from the wings of the stage to take the microphone from the headmaster. He was clad in his usual cream tights and dancing slippers – thank the gods, no pointe shoes today – with a thin, cap-sleeved top of pale grey tucked into his tights. His hair was smoothly braided into an elegant fishtail braid. His eye sockets were painted in smoky blacks and greys, and his cheekbones were highlighted to make them more prominent. He offered a graceful bow to the retreating headmaster, then to the students.

“Good afternoon, students, teachers, visitors, and everyone else!” Thran waved, smiling when he received many waves and murmured greetings in return. “Thank you for this chance to make a new dance in this beautiful school, and to meet so many of you. UltraViolet Ballet is delighted to be here!”

That got some nice applause.

“I might know what many of you think at this moment – here is this strange person, he will talk us to death, we will all be bored, but at least it is better than to stay in one classroom or another, yes? Am I
“YES!” came back so resoundingly that Thran’s laugh was hearty.

“Oh, then it is too bad that I will disappoint so many of you, because I will not talk very much. I will tell you that our new ballet is called Immortal, and it is about the great Lord of the Underworld.” Thran pointed to himself. “Yes, that is me, I dance the role of this great lord. Do you know what his name is? Can you guess?”

A lot of names echoed, making Thran laugh again. “No, his name is not Bob. But I think you might know his name. It is Death. Sort of scary, yes?”

The murmur indicated that yes, it was sort of scary.

“Perhaps it will be sort of scary. But it will be scary for Death, too, because something happens to him that has never happened before. He falls in love with a mortal Maid.”

Charisse appeared from the wings, came to stand beside Thran, and offered a winsome smile and graceful bow.

“This is Charisse, our Maid. But does the Maid love the Lord of the Underworld?”

Charisse shook her head most emphatically to show that no, she certainly did not love Death. Thran put a hand to his heart and looked sad.

“No, the Maid does not love the Lord of the Underworld. She loves the Soldier.”

Out came Luka to offer his enthusiastic bow and a wave.

“This is Luka, our Soldier. He and the Maid are very much in love.” Charisse and Luka embraced tenderly, to which Thran shook his head in mock annoyance, which made the audience laugh.

“There is no reason to love, I suppose. So our ballet is what happens to the Lord of the Underworld, the Maid, and the Soldier. If you want to know what happens, you will have to come to see us dance Immortal at the festival.”

That got a lot of protest, which brought smiles to all three of the dancers.

“Ah, that is good, you want to know the end of the story!” Thran nodded at the students. “But we cannot give away what happens, can we? Instead, Charisse, Luka, and a few of our friends will give you a sample of what you will see in Death’s great kingdom called the Underworld.”

Headmaster L’Eärendil reappeared to take the microphone from Thran, and a dozen dancers appeared from both sides of the stage, all dressed differently in brightly colored practice wear. In addition to the motley collection of earrings, head wraps, bandannas, and scarves, one woman wore a belly dancer’s belt stitched with rows of silver coins around her hips, and one man wore heavy Irish clogging shoes. Two wore what looked like saddle shoes, and another wore exotic sandals that laced almost up to her knees. Music began, and the dancers took turns showcasing different forms of dance. Luka and Charisse, both in ballet shoes, did a quick waltzing pas de deux; the pair with the saddle shoes did a wild Lindy hop. Blazing fast Irish step dancing followed acrobatic hip-hop, and sinuous belly dancing followed that. Thran did a flashy turn with Luka and Charisse of at least two dozen perfectly synchronized pirouettes followed by an equally flashy grand jeté. That earned cheers and loud applause, Bard’s among it.

As the music ended, the dancers came forward to take a bow to even louder applause. Headmaster L’Eärendil reappeared to thank the dancers, then held the microphone out to Thran.
“We have one more treat to show you, in thanks for such a warm welcome,” Thran teased. “Would you like to see it?”

Applause was answer enough. The headmaster held out a hand, inviting Thran to take the stage again, so Thran did so. The other dancers disappeared into the wings, leaving Thran alone in the middle of the empty space. Bard watched with avid curiosity – hadn’t his husband mentioned the dance from Thriller? This solo posture didn’t look like that, so maybe Thran had changed his mind...?

A low buzz signaled the beginning of something, and the lights lowered until a single spotlight centered on Thran. He stood completely straight in first position, with toes turned out and arms crossed over his chest. As the first strains of Richard Strauss’s Thus Spake Zarathustra began, Thran raised his left leg until it formed a vertical split with his right leg. No other part of his body moved. The control and the extreme stretch raised a gasp from the audience. As the music rose, Thran raised his arms slowly over his head, still keeping that absolutely straight vertical line, then gracefully lowered his arms and torso to his lower leg. At the next rise of music, he stretched his lower leg straight up, putting him into a handstand. Over his head one leg went forward, the other back, again to make a split parallel to the floor. That straight split never trembled as first one foot touched the floor, then the other. When the foot over his head was firmly on the floor, Thran rolled from his hands and upright, still keeping his legs in a split while he lifted his torso back into his vertical split. In time to the last rushing chord, he clasped his hands above his upraised foot. As the music ended, Thran returned his upraised foot to the floor and his arms to their original position.

It was the most stunning example of flexibility and control that Bard had ever seen, and without thinking he broke into cheering applause. He wasn’t alone – it seemed as if everyone in the auditorium reacted in kind. Thran didn’t move, though, and with all the noise it took some seconds before the pulse of new music registered. The rest of the dancers appeared from the wings as Thran raised his head to look out into the audience. A sly smile appeared as the company formed around him, and he raised his arms like a not entirely benign magician. The company did likewise, then the lot of them swung into Thriller.

Now the beautiful ascetic dancer of masterful control turned into a creepy zombie – not the Lord of the Underworld, but one of its denizens. The dancers hammed up their performance with twitches and drunken rolls of the head and nerveless flops of their hands, even as they executed the steps with exquisite perfection. At once, the students were on their feet to jump and sway in time to the music. At the last chord, the dancers froze, and the lights went out. When they came up again, the dancers had lined up across the stage with Thran in the middle, holding hands to take their bows. The cheers and applause were thunderous, especially when the dancers took a step back to let Thran take a solo bow. Headmaster L’Eärendil reappeared, applauding with as much vigor as his students to encourage the dancers to take another bow.

“That was wonderful! Just wonderful!” he enthused. “Students, please give one more well-deserved round of applause for UltraViolet Ballet!”

The headmaster held the microphone out to Thran, but the dancer had his arms around two of his colleagues, so he contented himself by leaning close enough to speak into the microphone.

“Thank you for such a warm welcome! We look forward to our time with you very much! Immortal thanks you!”

The applause didn’t lessen even after Thran and the company left the stage, but when the stage remained empty, the students reluctantly filed out.

To Bard’s delight, the students’ chatter was excited and enthusiastic. With any luck, the parents of every Imladris Academy student would get an earful about the excitement that took shape in the school auditorium. Would a little more luck see that excitement turn into record ticket sales for Immortal’s premiere?

They’d find out in just eight short weeks.
Chapter 126

Chapter Summary

Clan Ffyrnig plans a weekend foray, and the saint has reason to appreciate the rain.

Bard and Theodred waited until the auditorium was mostly empty before they made their way out. The art teacher turned to Bard as they came into the auditorium lobby.

“That was the most amazing thing I’ve ever seen in a school assembly,” he shook his head.

Bard ran his hand through his hair. “I’ll second that. Thran’s the only person I know who can do something so over the top and make it look easy. And then he goes off and plays a zombie for an encore.”

Theodred shook his head. “If you’d drawn your husband in any of those split poses, I would have said you were making it up, because no one can move like that.”

“He does stuff like that on a daily basis, but not often enough for me to think he’s anything other than the best dancer in the world.”

“No,” Theodred pursed his lips as he shook his head. “Tell him how much I enjoyed his performance, would you? And I’ll see you next week.”

“Okay, Theodred,” Bard offered a wave. “Next week it is.”

Theodred smiled as he offered his own wave of farewell, leaving Bard to head for the hall beside the auditorium. He wanted to see what the rest of the day held for Thran before he said goodbye. He found the company coming towards him, surrounded by excited students who clamored to talk to the dancers. Bard retraced his steps back to the lobby to wait for the rush to pass. It took at least twenty minutes, but Bard enjoyed watching the company interact with the children. Luka was not that much older than many of them, so he was right in the midst of a group of boys and girls, talking about what it was like to dance and what he ate and how often he went to rehearsal, excitedly talking and expansively gesturing with his hands. Charisse was her usual poised and confident self as several girls gathered around her – in fact, all of the dancers had an eager band of children asking questions, including Thran. It gave Bard a warm feeling to see his husband banter with the children, teasing and laughing as he fielded their barrage of questions.

Legolas appeared out of the throng to greet his father, who returned the greeting warmly. Was that calculation on the boy’s part, or oversight? Hmm, likely oversight, given the way Legolas’s eyes widened in apprehension when a lot of the girls turned their attentions on him. He was a handsome youth with his long blond hair and tall, slender frame, attributes that weren’t lost on those around him. He quickly excused himself and made a beeline to Bard, trailing girls behind him.

“Hi, Bard,” he said quickly.

“Hi, Legolas. Quite the crowd.”

The boy grimaced. “Too much of one. Could you look... teacherly or something, just until they go away?”
“Absolutely,” Bard grinned. “So, what do you think about your latest assignment in history class?”

Legolas launched into a monologue that apparently was to clarify something about some paper or another, and the few girls who had followed him drifted away. Bard kept one eye on them until the last one was out of earshot.

“You’re clear.”

“Oh, good,” Legolas breathed. He snuck a look behind him, and finally joined Bard to lean against the wall. “I didn’t think when I said hello to Papa. They’ll follow me all over school now.”

Bard’s hum was sympathetic. “Kind of a pain.”

“A real pain. Are you going home now?”

“I’ll see what your Papa’s schedule is first, once he’s clear of the crowd, but then yeah, I’ll head home. Are you going to fencing, or do you want a lift home?”

“I’m just waiting for Kíillian and Tara, then we’ll go to fencing.”

“Okay. So I’ll see you at the regular time, then.”

“Yes, the regular time. Oh, there’s Kíl. Thanks for bailing me out.”

“Anytime. Enjoy your fencing, and say hi to the Gondors for me.”

“I will. Bye, Bard.”

Legolas scrambled off to join Kíllian, who waved to Bard before grabbing Legolas’s arm and dashing off. Tara came down the hall, looking for her cohorts, so Bard waved to her and pointed after the boys. She flashed a bright smile and waved as she ran after them. Tilda was the next to appear, skipping down the hall as she saw Bard.

“Hi, Da!” she exclaimed with a bright smile. “Did you see Ada? That was something!”

“I did, little doll,” he smiled. “Are you off to sport now?”

She shook her head. “They canceled sport for the lower grades because so many children are sick, and so are the teachers. So can I go home with you?”

“You sure can,” Bard grinned. “I want to talk to Ada before I head home, so do you already have your things to take home?”

“No, I have to go to my locker to get everything.”

“Okay, I’ll wait for you here, all right?”

“Okay, Da. Be back in a minute.”

Tilda scampered off. By this time, most of the students had said their farewells to the dancers, and Bard made his way to Thran’s side.

“A bit over the top with the Strauss, don’t you think?” he teased, when Thran turned a welcoming smile on him.

Thran’s smile turned gleeful. “Entirely. But I know my audience, yes? I have to be bombastic and over the top to distract them from their mobiles, iPods, and so forth. It is a good thing I am tall. Only a tall person can carry off Zarathustra.”

“It had nothing to do with the impossible splits, no,” Bard teased back. “Theodred passes along his compliments. He was quite impressed.”

Thran smiled in appreciation. “That was kind of him.”

“Hi, Charisse, Luka,” Bard waved to the two dancers who had waved to him. “You were both wonderful. And good zombies, too.”

“Thank you!” Charisse called. When Luka imitated a lumbering, looming zombie, Charisse offered him a fond shake of the head and a playful nudge. Laughing, the young dancer dropped his play-acting, and linked arms with his companion as they turned to speak to others of their company.

“Does something blossom between those two?” Bard murmured.

Chuckling, Thran shrugged. “Who knows? Luka is quite the puppy, yes. Charisse is more seasoned, but he is quite endearing, so perhaps. As long as they are happy and do not disrupt the company, yes?”

“Absolutely. I won’t hold you, angel. I just wanted to hear what your schedule is for the rest of the day so I can time supper.”

“I understand. We will be here to see how possible it is to work on the stage today, so I hope I will be home in time for supper at the regular time. We hope we can begin our work here starting tomorrow, but it now may be Monday before that is the case. If so, then tomorrow we will be at the UVB studio. And Saturday, we may be in the ballroom, if that is not an issue.”

Bard shook his head. “It won’t be as far as I’m concerned. I’ll get the porch boards replaced tomorrow, then Saturday I’ll work on my commissions to make up for taking the time out to do the porch. I hope to get Hal’s piece to the point that he can come out to see it in a day or two.”

“That is exciting!” Thran’s eyes brightened. “So the children are all at sport now?”

“I saw Legs, and he’s off to fence with Killian and Tara. Tilda’s sport was canceled because of all the flu, so she’ll come home with me. I haven’t seen Sigrid or Bain, so I’ll assume they’re at lacrosse and track. I’ll walk around back to make sure before Tilda and I head home.”

“All right, lyubov moya,” Thran replied. “I am off to the stage. I will text you when I am ready to leave so you have a little warning.”

“Perfect,” Bard nodded. “Dance well, and I’ll see you soon.”

“Hi, Ada!” Tilda hailed, trotting up to her fathers. “I liked your zombie dance. It wasn’t too scary!”

“I am glad, Kukla,” Thran replied. “No sport for you today?”

She shook her head. “I saw Bain and Sigrid, though. They’re both in sport, and Legolas went to fencing, so it’s just me who doesn’t have it this afternoon.”

“Let’s head home, then,” Bard said. “Say goodbye to Ada – he’s off to dance in the auditorium for the afternoon.”

“Bye, Ada! Break a leg!” Tilda grinned, and a laughing Thran waved goodbye as she and Bard left the school and went out to the parking lot. The two chatted as they drove home; Tilda didn’t have a lot of homework today, and when Bard mentioned that he’d work on the porch tomorrow, she wanted to help. So once they got home, Bard gave Tilda her next dose of her medicine with some yogurt, and then she hurried into her grubbiest clothes to help Bard pull out the nails from the rotten boards in the porch. Once Bard identified a rotten one, Tilda drew a big X on it with a heavy black marker. As Bard pried each nail up, it was Tilda’s job to put it into a metal can. Most of the rotten pieces were on the leftmost end of the porch, under the circular section at the corner of the house and down the left side. That was the western side of the house, which got little morning sun and so took longer to dry each day. He left the boards in place, because it would save him time tomorrow if he could use each board to measure its replacement. The right, easternmost end had avoided the rot, but one board had badly warped and needed replacing. When Bard removed the last nail, he carted two of the garden benches from the gazebo and put them on the left side of the porch to block anyone from stumbling over the loosened boards. Then he and Tilda swept the porch and stairs.

“Da, I think this one is rotten, too.” Tilda called as she wielded her broom down the western side of the porch.

“You’re right, Til,” Bard agreed. “Good catch. Time for the pry bar again.” He freed the nails from the offending board and Tilda dumped them in the can. “I’m going to cut a new board for that one warped one outside of the main room. It’s the only one I have to replace over there, so let’s measure it and I’ll cut its replacement now.”

“Oh, Da. I’ve got the tape thing.” Tilda held the end of the tape measure so that Bard could see how long the board was, then she followed him into the barn. He set up a pair of sawhorses, put a board on top, and then Tilda helped him measure the board to the right length. A quick cut with the circular saw, and then the two carried the board to the porch. Bard grinned to see how proud Tilda was to be able to carry her end of the board, help slide it into space, and then stand on the board to hold it in place while Bard drilled the screw holes and fastened it down.

“Let’s check for any other ones over here before I put the saw away,” Bard said. Tilda’s reply to that was to jump up and down on the boards to see which ones made suspicious crackling sounds. “No, Til, that’s not a good idea!” he hastened to say. “What if the board breaks? You’ll go right through the porch!”

“Oh... I didn’t think of that,” Tilda admitted. She bounced with less force. “No, I think the rest are okay.”

“Good,” Bard exhaled as he looked over the Xed boards at the opposite end of the porch. “It’s a good thing I got extra boards. There are more rotten than I thought. It’ll take all of tomorrow morning to replace them.”

“I wish it wasn’t a school day tomorrow,” Tilda said, coming to stand beside Bard to survey the Xed boards. “I could help.”

Bard ruffled her hair. “You’d be a good helper, too. You could hand me the screws and stand on the boards.”

“If you did it on Saturday, I could help,” Tilda looked up with a hopeful expression.

“The painters need me to finish before Saturday, little doll,” Bard explained. “They might be able to start on the porch, but they won’t get far with all these rotten boards in it. They wouldn’t be safe putting their ladders and stuff on them to paint the porch ceiling, would they?”

“No, they could get hurt,” Tilda agreed, if reluctantly.
“We’re going to be very busy on Saturday anyway, little doll. Thran will be here with his ballet company, and Legs will go to fencing, and Sigrid will go to the bistro.”

“Everybody will have some place to go except me,” Tilda sighed.

“Bain probably won’t, but even if he doesn’t, maybe you’d like to ask Elanor to come over to play?”

Tilda nodded vigorously. “That would be good.”

“I’ll give Miss Rosie a call tonight about it. Then remember on Sunday, we’re going to look for some new clothes for everyone.”

“A party dress for Sigrid, too?”

“We’ll need to get you one, too, before long. When Ada’s ballet opens, you’ll need something nice for that.”

“Really?” Tilda brightened again. “That’ll be cool.”

“I hope it is. His premiere will be in July, when it’s hot as fire. So it’d be good to get something light and cool, so you won’t hate to have it on.”

“Ugh, that’d be no good at all,” Tilda agreed.

“Wow, you’ve got a great helper, Mr. Bowman!” Darla exclaimed as she came up the porch stairs.

“I do,” Bard gave Tilda a wink. “She’s the best.”

Darla chuckled. “Lucky guy, then. I just wanted to let you know that we’re ending a little earlier today, just so we don’t start the next section and get it half done. The forecast is for rain tomorrow, so if it starts, we won’t be out, and I don’t want the paint to look streaky.”

“Makes sense to me,” Bard nodded. “So I may not see you until Monday?”

“If it rains tomorrow, but clears up on Saturday, we’ll be back out on Saturday,” Darla replied. “I like to get a full week in when I have the chance, so my crew doesn’t have to short their paychecks.”

“I know exactly,” Bard said. How many times had he had to scramble when a paycheck was less than he’d wanted, through no fault of his own? “We’ll have someone here all day.”

“Great, Mr. Bowman. I appreciate you being flexible.”

“Not a problem. The house looks better already, even with just the single coat. I appreciate the careful job.”

“You’re welcome,” Darla thanked him. “So I hope I’ll be back out tomorrow, but if not, we’ll try for Saturday.”

“Great. See you one day or the other, then.”

“Have a good evening, Mr. Bowman. You, too, Miss Helper!”

“I will! Thank you!” Tilda waved, as Darla and her two helpers carried their brushes and pans into the barn to wash them out in the big tub sink there. Bard and Tilda knocked around the yard, talking about what kinds of plants and such that they might like, until the painters reappeared with their cleaned tools and headed home for the day. Then they went inside, Tilda to start on her homework and Bard to consider what to make for supper.

As usual, the old reliable chicken breasts were in abundant supply. Because they tended to dry out unless they were in some kind of sauce, Bard put them into the oven to roast. When they were done, he’d shred them and put them into a casserole that the children particularly liked called Mexican Mix-up. It had black beans, corn kernels, tortilla strips, tomatoes, and lots of enchilada sauce, with cheese on top. With fruit and veg, it’d make a hearty supper. He put a couple of extra chicken breasts in the oven for Thran’s lunches, and some big sweet potatoes in case the casserole wasn’t enough to fill up the bottomless pits named Bain and Legolas.

While the chicken and potatoes cooked, Bard worked on his sketches for the elusive Andromeda galaxy commission. He wanted to order a few aluminum spheres to try out some ideas, but he’d have to wait until someone with a computer came home, as the suppliers were all online etailers. By the time he’d sketched a few more ideas and made some notes, the children were home from school, and they chattered about the day’s events while they had their usual snack and helped Bard assemble the big chicken casserole and a green salad. Thran appeared just as the casserole came out of the oven, so he ran upstairs to change out of his dancewear and into comfortable clothes.

The casserole disappeared in record time. The amount all of the children ate was prodigious, given all the exercise they got in their afterschool activities. Thank the gods he was finally in a position where he could watch them fill themselves up without worrying about every mouthful, and without applying for public assistance. Thank every one of the gods.

Everyone had lots to talk about around the supper table, from Tilda’s sojourn as Bard’s construction helper to Thran’s description of progress on the Immortal set in the children’s school auditorium.

“The floor is done,” he reported. “It is a big wheel on a central spindle, with wheels around the edge. We will have students in black costumes who will rotate the set as we need. The walls are done, as well. That is fine for the one third of the stage where we will conduct the battle, the travels between the mortal world and the Underworld, because that will be only bare floor, bare walls. But the rest must become the troll market. There will be a great throne for Death that comes apart to make other pieces of the Underworld, and lots of set dressing. That remains to be done. But it comes along.”

“Will you be able to dance there tomorrow, Papa?” Legolas asked.

Thran shook his head. “There are a few more safety things to be done. So Monday will be the day. We will work tomorrow at the studio, then Saturday here in the ballroom. Sunday we will have off, then Monday we will begin our noon-to-whenever efforts at the school.”

The discussion veered away from the ballet to whether the children had turned in their checks to pay for their summer programs – they had – and their plans for their shopping trip on Sunday. Bard got paper and pencil and made a list of the minimums that everyone needed, and they decided where they would shop. Even though they didn’t have to confine themselves just to the secondhand shops, Sigrid made a pitch to visit them anyway, especially a vintage shop in the village that she’d wanted to visit.

“Why don’t you take a look on your lunch break on Saturday?” Bard suggested. “See if there’s anything you want, and we can pick it up when I get you at three.”

“That’s a great idea, Da,” Sigrid smiled. “They’ve got some neat old stuff in the window.”

“We can hit the department store for basic stuff – socks, underwear, tees,” Bard continued. “Then the mall for other stuff.”
“And my dress?” Sigrid asked.

“And maybe mine?” Tilda piped up.

Thran nodded. “We have several places to go, it seems. This will call for efficiency if we are to get done in a reasonable time.”

“Spoken like a guy,” Sigrid shook her head. “Shopping for clothes is not an act of efficiency.”

“Some girls think it’s a roving party,” Legolas smirked. “Some of the girls in my boarding school spent every weekend shopping at the mall. They bought stuff, but mostly they spent time talking to their friends, or eating in the food courts, or trying out stuff at the makeup counters.”

“A lot of them do that,” Sigrid nodded. “I don’t have the patience for that, but I’m not like Bain, either. He goes in one store, buys one thing, and then comes out and goes home.”

“I don’t need anything else!” Bain shrugged, as everyone laughed.

“We’ll aim for a happy medium,” Bard suggested. “Who’s ready for dessert?”

While the children cleaned up from supper, Bard arranged with Rosie and Sam for Elanor to come over to play with Tilda Saturday afternoon, so the little girl dug into her homework in good spirits. Thran helped him look for the aluminum spheres on his computer, and he ordered a few in three different sizes and colors. It would save him a lot of time and effort if he didn’t have to color the spheres himself, but he got some plain ones to experiment with, in case the colored spheres weren’t what he wanted. He also ordered three kinds of epoxy to test what would best make the spheres stick together.

After homework and showers and bedtime, Thran and Bard gratefully settled into bed. Tonight they didn’t need all of their blankets, mute testimony to the gradual warming of the season.

“The house already looks better with the paint,” Thran murmured with a soft sigh.

“It does. It’s supposed to rain tomorrow, so Darla and her two compatriots may not be in residence tomorrow.”

“Oh? They cannot work on the porch, since it is out of the rain?”

“All the moisture in the air messes with how the paint goes on. That’s okay; I can still work on the porch boards whether it rains or not, so it’ll give me a chance to stay ahead of them.”

Thran murmured understanding and stoked Bard’s chest softly. “It will be so beautiful. It already is.”

“It is. Everyone’s happy and healthy, coughs notwithstanding, you’re dancing, and I’m working. I couldn’t be happier.”

“Nor I, lyubov moya. Nor I.”

Bard half expected Thran’s soft whisper to turn amorous, but the rigors of the day had been enough that his husband was content to rest in his arms. Despite the stir in his loins, Bard respected his angel’s weariness, and shut his eyes. It was a peaceful way to fall asleep, and Bard embraced it without complaint.
The next morning started quickly, much to Bard’s satisfaction. He and Thran saw the children off to school, then Thran headed for the UVB studio. He’d barely turned into the lane before Bard was trotting into the barn. Clouds in the overcast sky loomed low, threatening to drop their rain at any moment, so before it started, Bard hauled the sawhorses, circular saw, and all the lumber onto the porch so he could work there without dashing out into the rain.

The first drops fell before he got the last of the boards from the barn. There was no wind, so he left the bay open in case he needed something while he worked. The rain intensified, but he made it to the porch with the last three boards before the rain really opened up. As it sheeted to the ground, Bard stood at the top of the stairs to watch it until it slowed into a steady soft rain. This was just the kind of rain the burgeoning grass and shrubs needed to shoot into full growth; likely in a few days he’d have to get the lawnmower out...

Imagine Thran in a pair of ratty jeans, an equally ratty tee, and his hiking boots, mowing the lawn like any other family man, his braid swinging behind him. Maybe with a pair of sunglasses, and a trucker’s cap –

What a ludicrous image. Especially the hat.

Laughing, Bard set up his sawhorses. He measured, cut, drilled, and screwed down two boards before he stopped chuckling.

He worked steadily, enjoying the soft sound of the steady rain as he replaced one board after another. He’d gotten maybe a fourth of the boards replaced when the roar of a large truck caught his attention. It turned into the driveway, but not before Bard read the name on the side of it. Thran’s sofa was here! He stepped away from the sawhorses and lumber as the truck turned around by the carriage house to back up to the porch.

The driver rolled down his window. “Oropherson?”

Bard raised a hand in confirmation. “This is the place. Big sofa?”

“That’s the one, mac. Where’s it going?”

“Inside the front door, and turn right.”

“Got it. It’s covered in plastic, so the rain won’t bother it.”

“Righto. I’ll get the door.”

The driver was a tall, broad-shouldered, muscular man, with a head of thick brown hair and deep-set, dark brown eyes. Two equally doughty comrades were crammed into the front seat beside him. “Okay, Grimbold, Erkenbrand – let’s get the big bast – I mean sofa – out of the truck.”

Bard smothered a snicker. He hadn’t seen the sofa, but the measurements he’d laid out on the main room floor had been large enough that he wasn’t surprised to hear the deliverymen curse it. Thank the gods he’d already finished the floor in that room, so he wouldn’t have to try to move the thing himself once it was in place. He propped the front door open, then stood by as the men got the back of the truck open. He winced at the expanse of plastic-wrapped upholstery – it was a behemoth, and no mistake. They maneuvered it carefully to the edge of the truck, but even with three of them, it was an awkward, bulky thing to move. Bard came down the stairs to help lift the middle section.

“Thanks, mac,” Grimbold panted. “This thing’s a killer.”
“We need to do a one-eighty when we get it off the truck,” Bard said. “Then straight up the stairs and bear right. Watch out for the statue in the front hall.”

“Okay, you heard the man,” the first man said. “Come on, Erkenbrand, move your butt so we can get this sucker up the steps!”

“Hold your horses, Elfhelm,” Erkenbrand grunted. “All right, I’ve got my end now. On three... one, two, three!”

The quartet hauled the massive sofa off the truck, swung it around, then heaved it up the porch steps and through the front door. They maneuvered around Hope the Lope and got it into the main room.

“Centered to the fireplace, please,” Bard requested.

“Bring it this way another foot,” Grimbold directed. “Yeah, another six inches, and down on three – one, two, three. That the right place, mac?”

“Spot on,” Bard agreed. “That’s a load and a half.”

“Solid as a brick,” Elfhelm shook his head. “Great piece, without a doubt, but it’s hell and a half to move. Ought to come with a crane, y’know? Thanks for the hand.”

“Welcome,” Bard nodded.

“We’ll get the plastic off, then you can check it over. And I hope like hell that it’s fine, because I don’t want to put it back on the truck!”

Bard chuckled as the three men methodically unwrapped the plastic from around the massive curving sofa. Mmm, the grey velvet was beautiful, drawing Bard to run his hands over it, but they were too dirty for that, so he had to admire it from a distance. He carefully checked it over from front to back and side to side, and found it without scuff or tear or break. The three toss pillows were there, too. So he signed the delivery receipt without complaint, and saw the deliverymen back to their truck. They threw the discarded plastic wrappings in the back, slammed the back door down, and climbed back into the front.

“I hope that’s the hardest delivery you have today, and the rest of the stuff goes easier.”

“Thanks, mac,” Elfhelm grinned. “We hope the same thing. Enjoy.”

Bard waved, and the truck trundled away. When it was out of sight, Bard headed to the kitchen to wash the sawdust and rust marks from his hands, then returned to the main room to admire the sofa. It was amazing how instantly a single piece of furniture turned an echoingly empty warehouse of a room into something almost inhabited. The grey linen velvet felt as delicious as it looked, and the three amethyst toss pillows looked like frosted grapes. And the shape! It curved around the fireplace beautifully, and Bard imagined a white marble mantel to match the sensuous curve of the sofa with equally sensuous carving. But maybe Thran would prefer something more modern? It didn’t matter. Whatever mantel he chose, it’d certainly be a beautiful one.

How beautiful his pale, pristine angel would look draped over this sofa, too. Bard’s cock twitched in such anticipation that he had to rearrange his jeans. Gods, gods... he needed to take the edge off soon. There was no possible way he’d wait until the room was painted before he seduced Thran into something as decadent as this sofa deserved.

With that promise in mind, he tore himself away from the sofa, and went back to his porch boards.
He worked steadily, careful to measure the boards so they aligned properly over the supporting joists, making clean cuts, and then drilling the holes for the deck screws. He liked the fresh, organic smell of the cut wood on the rainy air. It was the smell of reclamation, of restoration, of making something strong and secure again. Think how great it would look when the whole porch was painted, with wicker chairs like his Mam liked so much. Or maybe some of those big overstuffed things that Daphne had loved, the huge wicker frames with big, round, plump cushions covered in wild tropical prints? If the main room was Thran modern, and the solarium was Morocco, then maybe the porch was either Victorian summer, or Tahitian ease.

That modern main room... his cock twitched again. It was hard to think about what color of paint or what style of mantel to put there when all he really wanted to think about was seducing Thran on that sofa. Life had gotten busy again, then children and he had gotten sick, so he and Thran hadn’t veered into anything more erotic than comfortable cuddling for a week. If anything spoke to his recovery from the flu, it was a rise in his desire for more than cuddling. Gods, as soon as the painters were gone, he’d tempt Thran away from his morning barre and into something...

He dragged his thoughts back to the porch. Circular saws weren’t hard to use, but a whirling cutting blade was in play, which demanded attention –

His mobile rang.

Sighing, he set the saw aside, pulled his mobile out of his jeans pocket, and checked the number. It was Bilbo, so he picked up at once.

“Good morning, Bard!” his agent’s warm and cheery voice said. “Or it is if you like rain, I suppose, which I do. How are you?”

“I’m very well, thank you, and you?”

“Quite well, thank you for asking. I have a couple of things to tell you. Do you have time?”

“Absolutely. What’s up?”

“Ah, good, good. First, I have a price for your Alexander’s Downfall.” He named a figure that made Bard’s eyebrows go up. “I did a survey of your other pieces currently in collections – several are quite well regarded, my boy. And I looked at the market in general, and I think this is a fair price. I’ve underpriced it just a hair, you understand, just because we want more of your things in the market. So if you’re amenable to that price, I’ll handle the transaction for you.”

“It’s wonderful. It’s more than I expected, so yes, whatever you think is perfect.”

“Excellent! I’ll get on it right away. How are you coming with your commissions?”

“I’ve got Hal Galadhrim’s tree in clay now. I hope to call him in another day or two to come see the model and approve it. I can set up the casting as soon as he does.”

“Wonderful!”

Bard described where he was about the orrery and the galaxy, which Bilbo met with interest. When Bard said he still hadn’t gotten in touch with the third client, Bilbo was philosophical.

“I’m not surprised. I do have some word – the principal is on an extended trip, so may not be back for another few weeks. I’ll stay in touch with the client’s rep, who has assured me that his client is very interested. But I’d use your time to work on the three pieces you have, and leave the calling to me.”
“That’s good to know, Bilbo,” Bard said. “I hope to see the orrery client soon with sketches, as I have two directions I can go. I hope he goes one way, to be honest, because the other direction would lend itself to another piece that I’d really like to do.”

“That would be terrific,” Bilbo enthused. “Celebrían tells me that all of your sketches have sold from her gallery, and she’d love to have more. So I think we can keep you busy for some time to come.”

“I’ll get right on it, Bilbo. I can’t tell you how pleased I am. Thank you for all your attention.”

“You’re very welcome, my boy. Thank you for creating such wonderful art! So I hope you stay out of the rain, and I’ll talk to you again soon, especially if your Alexander’s Downfall sells.”

“All right, Bilbo. Enjoy the day.”

“I will! I hope you will, too. Goodbye.”

Bard disconnected the call and stuck his mobile back in his pocket. Maybe he’d just sold a piece of sculpture for twice the amount he’d set as his base limit. And Celebrían wanted more sketches. And he had three commissions with a fourth in the offing. And he had Rahmiel to cast.

First, he had a porch to finish.

He turned back to his saw and drill with purpose.

Noon came and went while Bard worked to replace the rotten porch boards. With all the interruptions, he was anxious to finish them so he could move on to the bounty of paying work he had on his plate. First, Hal’s tree, then the orrery, then the galaxy... maybe he should cast Rahmiel first? It’d been years since he’d cast anything, and if he made a mess of it, he could always recast it without anyone complaining about the cost of materials. He’d slip off the wings, and remove the hair plumes, and...

Ugh. Despite the prospect of seeing Rahmiel in the bronze he deserved to be, it would feel like sacrilege to remove the clay model’s feathered wings and hair, as if he did that to Thran. Better to think about better ways to enjoy his husband –

Oh, gods; he just couldn’t seem to get his mind off hauling Thran to bed, to the solarium, to the sofa, to anything. Hell, he’d tease him onto the half bath’s marble tile floor, if that’s what his angel wanted to do. He wasn’t particular.

The sound of another vehicle turning into the drive brought him up with a muttered curse. What now? He’d never get this rotten lumber replaced with so many interruptions, no matter how nice the interruptions were. He straightened to see who had appeared in the driveway this time.

It was Thran’s SUV.

Before he could worry, the driver’s side window went down and Thran waved.

“The power is off in the studio! So I hope you have not had lunch yet?”

No, but I’m about to have dessert, thank you very much.

Bard put down his drill, and went to the top of the stairs. He looked up at the falling rain, then at Thran, and when he was sure his husband’s eyes were fixed on him, he ambled down the stairs. At the bottom, he casually peeled off his tee and tossed it back onto the porch. He held his hands out, arched an eyebrow, and let a sly smile drift over his lips.
Thran bit his bottom lip, and the window went up. The SUV engine turned off, and Thran erupted through the door to engulf Bard in a hellacious kiss.

“You fucking bastard,” Thran hissed as he clutched Bard’s shoulders, drawing Bard’s laughter. “You are such a filthy, fucking bastard –”

Bard found himself hauled towards the barn by his belt buckle. He went without complaint, a teasing smile on his lips. As soon as they were out of the rain, Thran pressed him against the side of the crates he used to climb up to the chin up bar, and roundly engulfed his smile in another inspired kiss. He wound bare, wet arms around his dancer, who pressed close despite the sawdust, sweat, and rain that spattered Bard’s torso.

“Oh gods, gods, what you do to me!” Thran growled. “You tease me, you make me want you without mercy, so I will have you without mercy. Right here!”

“But right here is so filthy, pretty angel,” Bard teased.

“So are you, you fucker. You know what that does to me. Oh, you bastard –”

Bard picked Thran up in his arms and carried him farther into the barn, back to his workshop. No sooner had he put Thran down than the dancer’s hands stroked over Bard’s chest, and fingers dragged red marks down his flanks. Thran muscled him back against the anvil, pressing close as he rubbed thumbs over Bard’s nipples.

“Yes, yes! That is what I want to hear!” Thran stuttered when Bard gasped. “I want you as frantic as you have made me. More. So much more!”

As wound up as Bard had been all morning – hell, even last night – arousal flashed through him, as hot as any fire he’d generated at the forge. The least touch would have been enough to make him melt; under Thran’s barrage, he all but dripped into a heap at Thran’s feet, craving anything Thran offered him. But Thran held him upright against the anvil, kissing, licking, nuzzling, massaging, and then fumbling for his belt buckle. Bard groped for Thran’s in return, but his husband was still in his dancewear, and he couldn’t loosen the belt that kept Thran’s tights up. It didn’t matter. As soon as Thran breached Bard’s jeans, a hand engulfed his cock. He leaned back, supporting his weight on his hands on the ends of the anvil, his head back and his eyes closed, and let Thran fondle him. A soft moan forced its way past his teeth, then was smothered in Thran’s greedy kiss. Gods, every touch was electric. His lips were bitten, then his tongue, then a long tongue filled his mouth as that hand possessed his cock. He barely had the presence of mind to point to the shelf above the worktable.

“Up there,” he rasped, when Thran came up for air.

His husband backed away just long enough to find the tube of lubricant Bard had stowed there the last time Thran had talked about possessing him in the barn. With a snarl, Thran shoved him around and over the anvil, yanked his jeans off his hips, and slid a well-slicked cock deeply inside him. Feet kicked his ankles wide, and he adjusted his stance to accommodate without thought. As soon as Thran was fully within, he fell over Bard’s back with a whimper, wrapping both arms around Bard’s torso. Long, white, disarrayed hair fell over Bard’s shoulders, and teeth clamped over his spine at the base of his neck. Long, elegant fingers scrabbled for his nipples, pinching and rolling.

“Oh, gods, gods, you filthy bastard, you are too much, too much,” Thran moaned as he worked his cock slowly in and out. His hips jerked erratically as the urge for release got to be too strong to resist. “You have me, you have me –”
“Then fuck me, bastard. Go on. You want to. You know you want to.”

Thran exploded in release, so overwhelmed that he couldn’t spit a single curse with any coherence. He went limp over Bard’s back, but his hands still clutched at Bard spasmodically, and his teeth still nipped up and down Bard’s spine. Bard kept himself steady to support Thran’s weight until his husband regained control of his body. The clutching fingers eased into gentler stroking, and the nips turned into soft kisses.

“You have no shame,” Thran finally whispered. “No scruples, either. How could you do that to me?”

“Because you’re easy,” Bard murmured, grinning. Thran slipped from inside him, but he still lay against Bard’s back, rubbing and stroking. “You’re sooooooo easy. All I have to do is look at you.”

Thran’s chuckle was chagrined. “You are right. You have me well trained. All you have to do is look at me with those bad boy eyes and I come.”

“Bad boy eyes?” Bard repeated, laughing. “Is that what you call them?”

Thran snorted. “Tcha, you stand in the rain, wet and filthy and bare-chested, and you look at me like a devil who invites me to sin in the most decadent of ways, and then you pretend innocence about what I call your eyes? What else should I call them? Cherr, I think of them and want to come all over again. But first I want to reward the devil who leads me into such divine temptation. Tell me that you want to despoil an angel the way the angel despoiled you.”

“I have a better place to despoil an angel than in a barn,” Bard teased. “Or haven’t you exorcised your grunge kink enough yet?”

A sexy giggle revealed that Thran was torn between more play in the barn, and curiosity about what else Bard had in mind. “Oh, how will I ever exorcise such a delightful kink when you insist to tease me in the rain? You will never be safe from my grunge kink.”

“What if I tempt you with something else?”

“What?”

“Pull up your knickers, and I’ll show you. Or is your cock still too hard to get it in your fancy jockstrap?”

“If you can get your cock back in your jeans without injury, I will let you show me. Otherwise, I will let the grunge kink roam free.”

“Mmm, that’s tempting,” Bard admitted, grinning. He half turned around to let Thran see his expression. “But you’re on top right now. Either fuck me again, or let me up.”

Thran muttered a curse, but with a smile, and eased away to pull up his tights. Bard managed to get his jeans over his cock without too much of a grimace; burying it in his underwear did not make it happy. But he wasn’t about to forgo the chance to christen another room of the house if he didn’t have to.

“I am here and ready, my sweet devil,” Thran purred, stroking Bard’s chest, then cupping his hand over Bard’s cock. “Why do you wait?”

Bard grabbed Thran’s hand, held it wide, wrapped his other hand around Thran’s waist, and pulled him hard into his embrace. “Be careful, angel. Or you might be sorry about what you missed.”
“Show me,” Thran kissed him softly. “Show me now.”

Bard pulled Thran with him out of the barn, pausing only to yank down the bay before they ran through the rain to the porch. Bard pushed open the front door, got them both into the hall, and wordlessly pointed into the main room.

Thran’s mouth fell open as he gaped at the sofa. Bard took advantage of his husband’s surprise to gather him into his arms and give him a deep kiss.

“Upstairs. Shower. Then I’m going to make love to you on that sofa.”

“Yes, you are,” Thran breathed, and took Bard’s hand to hurry him upstairs.
Chapter 127

Chapter Summary

The saint balances the angel's devilry in the barn with a little romance, and Clan Ffyrnig whirls into a busy weekend. A couple of friends come to visit, too.

Chapter Notes

Hal and Ari appear courtesy of the very kind johnnysmitten. Thank you, my dear! ❤
❤

Thran had gotten to the UVB studio late because of snarled traffic, an accident that made the normally twenty-minute commute twice as long. The village lanes and streets were adequate to carry the local flow of cars and trucks each morning, but when the wider road that led to the highway ended up the site of an accident at the most heavily-traveled intersection, everything stopped.

After a long slow crawl forward through the rain, Thran finally reached the site of the accident. It was still a mess. The traffic signal was out, and two police officers had to divert traffic around a large delivery truck smashed into a utility pole. All that could be said for the chaos was that no one seemed to be hurt. As Thran guided his SUV around a police car, a fire truck, and a massive tow truck, he pieced together what must have happened – the small blue car askew by one corner had skidded on the wet pavement, and the truck had swerved to avoid it. The truck had clipped the car's fender, crumpling it badly enough that it could no longer be driven, and then veered into the utility pole hard enough to snap it. Removing the truck, then, would be a delicate operation. Yes, on the other side of the intersection were three utility trucks, ready to help sort out the tangle of wires. No wonder the roads were so clogged.

Once Thran was through the intersection, he traveled the two short blocks farther on to the UVB studio. Several people stood outside huddled under umbrellas – Lettie, Ori, Luka, and several dancers – so he pulled the hood of his rain jacket over his hair, got out of the SUV, and joined them. The power was off – probably because of the accident he'd passed – but as the rain increased, Lettie opened the door and they huddled in the lobby by the windows to see if the power would return quickly. One or two additional dancers arrived as they escaped the traffic, and after perhaps fifteen minutes, the lights came on. Everyone hurried to change, and took their places on the studio floor. Neither Irmo nor Abebe had arrived yet, so Lettie led the barre. Though the power flickered a few times, they managed to complete their morning routines. Finally, Abebe bustled in, and Irmo a few minutes later, so they took over from Lettie.

The company set to work on the scene where Death leads the Soldier through the Underworld. This scene was lavishly choreographed with the dances of so many other traditions – belly dance, Lindy, modern, jazz, hip-hop, Middle Eastern, even a dervish – and through it all Death would take a hand of a dancer here, or the Soldier would be embroiled in a madcap ensemble there. The goal was to make the interactions look spontaneous and fresh, but that took a great deal of careful choreography.
They’d worked through the sequence once when Lettie called to them from the studio door.

“I’m sorry to interrupt, but a rep from the power company just stopped by. Because of the accident so many of you passed this morning, they need to put in a new utility pole to replace a snapped one, and then reattach all of the lines. Of course they can’t do that safely without turning off the power, so they’re letting all of the businesses in the area know that they expect the power to be off most of the afternoon.”

The dancers looked among themselves. Thran wasn’t concerned for himself, because he expected to have his pointe lesson with Mme. Morgelle this afternoon.

“What do you want to do, Thran?” Lettie asked.

“We will work here until the power is no more, and then we will reconvene tomorrow at the ballroom,” he said. “The school will not be ready for us until Monday, and to reach the ballroom would take us through the same accident zone that delayed us so much this morning. We will not die if we lose the afternoon. Tomorrow, though, we will work hard to make up for today. Everyone, please be in place to dance at nine.”

That met with everyone’s approval, so they went back to work. They got through the scene several more times, and Thran was pleased at how well the various groups of dancers had begun to mesh their performances. The Lindy hop and hip-hop groups had even put together a little Montagues-and-Capulets spat between them, which Death quelled with a wave of His hand. It delighted Thran to see such initiative, and even Irmo didn’t get upset about the added fillip. It also gave Thran the chance to practice with the gloves Rada had provided for Death’s costume that featured such elongated fingers. The belly dancer was kind enough to show him some of the exaggerated finger movements she employed in her dancing, which helped him make his movements more exotic and realistic.

When the power finally went out, the dancers made their way out of the studio with the help of the dim, yellow emergency light. Thran wished everyone a safe journey home, then embarked on his own.

He didn’t want to sit through the traffic snarl again, so he looped wide around the center of town to avoid it. It still took him a very long time to get home, but at least he was moving, and despite the steady rain he enjoyed sights of the village and surrounding area that he hadn’t seen before. He was, however, glad to finally reach the lane that ran by the house, and then the turnoff up the driveway.

Bard was on the porch, and looked up from his saw and boards with a worried expression. Thran turned his SUV so that he could lean out of the window to wave and call a reassurance.

“The power is off in the studio! So I hope you have not had lunch yet?”

Bard came to the top of the stair to look up at the rain clouds, then looked back at Thran. What was he up to?

Oh, gods, look at him slink down the stairs – oh, now look at him strip off his tee to stand bare-chested in the rain – did he flex his abs on purpose, hinting at what was below?

Chert, his husband was such a fucking bastard – look at him spread his hands wide in the most blatant invitation! Just wait until Thran spread Bard’s legs and then his cheeks and paid him back for that come-hither smile and those bedroom, bad boy eyes –

What happened next was delirious, explosive, carnal, fierce, maddening. Through it all, Bard smiled that same, intoxicating smile, and those eyes...
Taking him once was not enough. Not at all.

“What if I tempt you with something else?” Bard teased, rubbing his hips back against Thran’s thighs.

Nothing could do that. “What?” Thran managed, as those tight glutes against his thighs urged his cock to rally again.

“Pull up your knickers, and I’ll show you. Or is your cock still too hard to get it in your fancy jockstrap?”

Thran snarled something equally provocative in return, which only drew Bard’s laughter. Gods, gods, the way Bard hitched up his filthy jeans like the dodgy artist who had so completely snared a sexual vampire snared him with no less surety. That rain and sweat-slicked skin, those unruly curls messily spilling from behind a bandana... it was as if Thran had never touched his husband, so aroused was he. Why did he let Bard pull him through the rain and up on the porch? Why did he let Bard pull him through the door? It was more than he could stand. As soon as Bard shut the door, he would drag him to the floor and have him again in front of Hope the Lope as if he were a ritual sacrifice –

All thoughts of ritual sacrifice vanished when he saw his new sofa. When his mouth fell open, Bard drowned him in a long, slow kiss.

“Upstairs. Shower. Then I’m going to make love to you on that sofa.”

Oh, that would be so much better than rutting in front of a golden idol.

“Yes, you are,” Thran breathed. He grabbed Bard’s wrist, and they fled upstairs and into their shower, shedding clothes all over the bedroom. Thran fumbled to wind his braid around his head to keep it dry, but they weren’t in the shower long enough for it to get too damp. Then they stormed downstairs, Thran in the lead and hauling a laughing Bard behind him, to dive into the main room. Bard managed to get a dry towel over the sofa before Thran fell across it and dragged Bard down on top of him to smother him with uncounted kisses.

“What’s your hurry, angel? There’s no need to rush.”

Bard’s chuckle was quickly swallowed in Thran’s kisses. “Gods, angel. It’s you who went, not me, but no one would ever know it to look at you. You’re all but panting.”

“See what you have done to me? You and your grunge kink and your rain and your discarded shirts, and those come-fuck-me eyes.”

“It’s your grunge kink, not mine. Here, slow down.” He pressed a soft, languorous kiss on Thran’s lips. “Listen to the rain on the roof, and the beat of your heart.” He pressed another kiss on Thran’s temple. “Savor the smell of the spring rain, and the soft velvet under your hands.”

Thran growled as he kneaded Bard’s glutes. “I already savor the sweet ass under my hands, you bastard. I want to desecrate it.”

Bard snickered as he gentled a third kiss on his throat, as soft as the rain sounded outside. “Revel because we have a rare moment to ourselves on a moody day.” A fourth kiss returned to his lips to caress them. “And think about how good it’ll feel when I make love to you slowly and completely.”
Thran’s breath hitched, and he caught the distinctive scent of Bard’s hair and skin. How soft was the touch of Bard’s velveted chest on his? Almost as soft as the look in Bard’s warm brown eyes as he regarded Thran. Such a look of love and appreciation... Thran’s urgency retreated, and he met Bard’s slow kisses with his own.

“That’s better. Not that I don’t like a frantic angel, not at all. But what’s better to follow a frenzy in the barn than a slow seduction in the parlor?”

“Mmm,” Thran breathed. “You tell the best stories, my sweet saint. But you have left yourself with nothing to seduce. I am already yours.”

“Let’s see if I can find a way to thank you for that,” Bard breathed, and set about a most thorough exploration of how one could physically worship another. Such sweet kisses, such soft caresses, such a talented tongue and lips and teeth... Bard drew Thran to sit up against the back of the sofa, pulling him forward enough that Bard could kneel before him to slip a well lubricated cock inside him. Despite having just released, desire and pleasure coursed through him in equal part. How delicious it was to have Bard’s loving eyes on him as his urgency returned, to know that his husband took such pleasure in Thran’s pleasure? But he couldn’t return such attentions with only passive enjoyment – no, he wanted to see the same urgency in Bard’s eyes. He reached up to stroke Bard’s nipples, which were already nearly as hard as the sweet pearls they resembled. A surge of arousal swept through him when Bard’s head went back, his eyes closed, and his breath caught, so consumed was he by Thran’s touches.

“Such a beautiful sight,” Thran whispered, dragging his fingers over Bard’s nipples, down his abs and groins, and up his flanks. “So beautiful, lyubov moya, svyatoy moy, zoloto moyo. Ty velikoye zoloto moyo.”

“My angel,” Bard whispered. “I love you more than I can tell you. So much; so, so much...”

“Come for me,” Thran urged. “Give me all of you, my beautiful saint. I want all of you.”

“You-you always have all of me,” Bard stuttered. “Oh, g-gods, angel, gods, this feels so good, it’s so sweet...”

Thran rubbed his thumbs over Bard’s nipples hard, drawing a gasp from his husband. The cock so deeply within him throbbed in response, so he spread himself wide, and put his hands on Bards’ glutes. He pulled Bard forward, again and again and again, teasing him into a faster rhythm that would soon exceed Bard’s ability to resist it. Yes, yes, the flexing muscles under his hands spasmed without conscious thought to match Thran’s encouragement. He wound his legs around Bard’s torso and positioned his feet on Bard’s back to drive him forward at an even faster pace. The body above his grew more and more taut, until in a fractured second, it convulsed. Such ecstasy flooded Bard’s face as he drove over and over into Thran, urging Thran to rise to a second orgasm. He wrapped himself around Bard with a whimper, and Bard kept up his rocking thrusts until he was sure Thran had completely released. Bard held himself up on his hands as he calmed, but Thran drew him close until they reclined side by side along the curve of the sofa.

“You are perfect, lyubov moya,” Thran whispered in his ear, as Bard shut his eyes and nestled his nose into the angle between Thran’s neck and jaw. “You are sublime devil and delirious romantic. How am I to resist you?”

“Do you want to?” Bard murmured, smiling as he snuggled into Thran’s embrace.

“No. A thousand times no.”
A chuckle was half smothered in a kiss against his throat. “That’s a lot of nos.”

“Do you complain?”

Another chuckle. “No. Another thousand times no.”

“Tcha, we drown in nos.”

“The best kind of nos.”

Thran hummed in agreement as he savored the scent of his release, of Bard’s skin and hair, of the oil he’d used in the shower. The rain still came down at a steady clip, rumbling softly on the roof. In the dim light, his lover’s face was nothing but a smiling shadow, dark lashes, dark curls against a smooth brow. The warmth of Bard’s body next to his was soothing, and the caress of linen velvet against his cheek was luscious –

He looked up. Oh, not to worry – Bard’s forethought had put a thick towel under the worst of their indulgence. He sat up carefully, taking pains to stay on the towel.

“Thank the gods one of us is practical,” he shook his head. “Or we would have had to explain to our children why we have a sofa with suspicious stains on it.”

Bard snickered as he sat up, too. “We’ve still got evidence to destroy. Your SUV is out across the driveway, and my shirt is somewhere on the porch. And both of us have to wash again.”

“We are a reckless pair.” Thran stood up and offered a hand to his husband. “Hedonists, both.”

“No complaints here.” Bard grabbed the towel and the tube of lubricant before they headed upstairs to clean up. “So what should we do for an encore? Lunch? Or are you off to your pointe class?”

“I had intended to go, yes. But at this point, no pun intended, I know Madame’s routine, and the steps I must do for the scene, so I will call her to tell her I will not be there, and then I will do them here. But first, how much more on the porch do you have to do?”

“Another couple of hours, that’s all. Why?”

“Because I want to help.”

“That’s sweet of you, angel, but you don’t have to –”

“I know I don’t have to,” Thran interrupted gently as Bard tossed him the tube of lubricant to stash in his nightside table. Bard ducked into the closet to put the towel in the laundry hamper, then they went together into the bathroom to wash off. “But I want to, if I can. You have done everything, and I have done very little. So if there is something I can do to help, I want to.”

“Let’s have lunch and talk about it,” Bard suggested as he dried off.

“All right. I will put the SUV in the carriage house, and then we will eat.”

Once they were clean, dry, and dressed, Thran dashed out with an umbrella to house the SUV. He brought in Bard’s wet shirt, and hung it on the mudroom line next to Bard’s wet jeans. They rummaged in the refrigerator, and ended up with the last of the Mexican Mix-up for Bard, and chicken and vegetables for Thran.

“You’re sure you don’t want any of this?” Bard questioned. “You eat chicken every day, so if you want something different –”
“That is chicken,” Thran pointed to the casserole remnants. “We both have chicken.”

“Yes, you’re right, I just thought you might be tired of your chicken and want some of this chicken.”

“My chicken is fine, lyubov moya. It has bacon and chive spices on it.” Thran held up the spice shaker and sprinkled his chicken liberally before putting it in the microwave. “Quite delicious.”

“Just checking,” Bard shrugged.

“I appreciate your attention to see that I have good food,” Thran nodded. “Will you want tea after?”

“Always.” Bard scraped the casserole remains out of its bin and onto a plate.

Thran put on the teakettle. “So tell me about the porch boards.”

“It’s not hard. Tilda and I pried up all the nails yesterday, so all I have to do is cut new boards to replace all the old boards, drill pilot holes for the screws, and then screw them in place. Nothing hard.”

“Ah. So I can help.”

“If you really want to, I’d love the company. It’d be faster with help, too. I’m anxious to get them done, because work’s piling up. I heard from Bilbo today...”

While Bard told him the latest about Alexander’s Downfall and his commissions, Thran got out his bento boxes to arrange the rest of his lunch on a plate. Bard warmed his casserole, and they sat down to eat. Thran was thrilled to see Bard so animated about his commissions, so full of ideas about how to build his orrery and his galaxy.

“That is why you need me to help you this afternoon,” Thran declared. “We must clear the decks so that you can go full steam ahead into the barn.”

Bard snickered. “I think that’s a mixed metaphor, but who’s counting? You’re just as busy, angel. Your ballet’s only eight weeks from opening night.”

Thran heaved a sigh. “That is one reason why I want to help today. This weekend is likely the last free moment I will have until the premiere. So I want to work on the porch and shop with the children while I still can.”

Bard’s hand slid across the table to caress Thran’s. “I guess it will. It’ll get crazy and you’ll work too much, and tempers will flare with Irmo, if not the rest of the company. But Immortal will be wonderful, Thran. It will, and we’ll be fine.”

“You will see that I eat, and I will see that you make the time for your art.”

“Deal.”

“Deal.”

“So finish your lunch, and we’ll tackle the porch. Then you’ll go in the ballroom and do your pointe stuff. You can’t skip that.”

Thran held up a hand as if he took an oath. “I will do every step.”

“We have a plan,” Bard smiled. “Let’s get to it.”
Bard enjoyed the rare private lunch with his beautiful husband. He had to remind himself not to fall into the trap he’d been ensnared in before, the one where he worshipped an ethereal dancer whose every gesture was elegant, an angel whose wings were all but physical fact. He had to remember that he and Thran were both human, not beings to be worshipped, but loved and supported. If their play in the barn wasn’t proof of their deep humanity, then Bard just wasn’t paying attention.

Still, he made no apology of putting a little worship into the act of love they’d shared in the main room. They’d had the gasoline-fueled conflagration in the barn, so it was fitting that the main room was the site of something softer and tenderer.

On to the porch. With Thran’s help, the second half of the boards went quickly. It was so much easier to have four strong hands to lift the boards to the sawhorses, brace them for the saw, and hold them to be fixed in place. In a couple of hours, the last one went down.

“Done,” Thran said with satisfaction, brushing his hands together. He looked over the stack of rotten boards stacked on the porch. “What do we do with these?”

“There isn’t much we can do with them, given how rotten they are,” Bard said with regret. “I hate to dump stuff in the landfill, but we can’t burn them in the fireplace because they’re treated with chemicals, and we can’t use them in the yard because they’re too rotten, and we can’t compost them. So I’ll cut them in pieces to fit in the truck, and then tomorrow, after I drop off Sigrid, I’ll take them over to the landfill.”

“Show me how to use the saw?” Thran asked. “If the boards are nothing we can use, then I cannot ruin them, no?”

“Sure. It’s not hard.” Once Bard explained how to cut the boards, Thran was the one who neatly sliced them into halves. Bard got out the truck for them to toss all the pieces into the back so that he didn’t have to load them in the morning, then he put the truck and tools away. The porch was ready for the painters.

They spent the rest of their time before the children came home in the ballroom, Thran working through his pointe lesson, and Bard sketching. He could have worked on the last details of Hal’s tree, but he wanted to spend time with Thran, even if they worked on their individual pursuits. Most of his sketches were for the fittings for his orrery. He’d found several good sources on the Internet that defined all the gear ratios he needed, and several other companies that would produce laser-cut brass gears to his specifications. Given his client’s preference for bright finishes rather than dull ones, he planned to do the piece in bright brass. He had sketches for both sets of orb designs, and he was coming to a plan for the base. That was what he sketched now, trying to refine the shape of the three legs that would support it...

Thran stood in the middle of the ballroom, on pointe, in arabesque, with the most serene expression on his face.

Bard turned to a clean page and sketched quickly. Thran moved calmly and slowly, and when he arched back into another arabesque, Bard raced to add more detail to his sketch. He didn’t think about what he saw, only accepted it, and let it flow from eyes to fingers to pencil and onto paper however it chose to. He flipped to a clean page to draw a lunge, then to another to draw Thran with... one leg on pointe at a forty-five degree angle to the floor, the other one stretched behind in a split, his arms outstretched parallel to his legs, and braid arcing around him. As long as Thran danced, Bard drew, pose after pose after pose. When Thran paused, Bard still drew, just his husband’s head tilted at an angle, eyes closed and downcast, as if he were dreaming. Those beautiful cheekbones and deep eye sockets, the braid of hair falling to one side... it was no whimsey to sketch the merest suggestion of wings arcing behind either side of Thran’s face.

“Oh, lyubov moya,” Thran murmured, kneeling beside him to stroke his hair. “I think you are dazzled again.”

Bard’s smile was crooked. “How can that be, cariad? I have to see to draw, you know.”

“You see a mirage.”

“Call yourself whatever you like. I’ll still draw you this way.”

Thran snorted, but the sound was soft and affectionate. “If only I danced as lightly as you draw me. Then my feet would not hurt so much.”

Bard shot him a look, but Thran was unperturbed.

“It is the nature of the art, Bard. Dancers’ feet hurt. Mine do, even when I do not dance on pointe. A lot of me feels the aches and pains. That is why you see no old dancers in regular performance. It is an ephemeral art.”

Bard swallowed as he looked back to his sketchpad. “That sucks, Thran.”

Thran shrugged. “Dance is no different from most things. One day, you will not want to replace porch boards or renovate a house, and you will let Bain or Legolas or someone else do it, yes? So one day, I will either not be able to dance, or not want to, and I will let someone else do it while I do something else. But today, I am able, and willing, and both are gifts.”

“The Russian philosopher speaks,” Bard rubbed Thran’s shoulder.

“The Russian philosopher must stretch properly after his pointe work, so that he does not hurt himself and bring that day when he does not dance closer. I hope that you were able to draw things for your commissions, as well as a Russian dancer.”

“I did. I’ll tell you about it when you’re done.”

“I can cool properly and listen at the same time. You worked on the orrery? How does one build such a complicated thing, to make all the planets go around in the proper time? Mercury is faster than Venus, yes, and Earth is slower, and the outer planets slower yet, and I cannot fathom how you are to make that happen.”

“It’s all a lot of gears,” Bard explained, and Thran listened closely as he stretched about how the gears regulated how fast the globes turned, and how they had to mesh to orbit to match the real planets.

“I cannot fathom how you do all of this with just paper and pencil,” Thran said at last. "It is all very mathematical and precise. Would a computer help you? With some sort of application that lets you draw the pieces and how they would go together?”

Bard looked up at him in surprise. “Don’t laugh, but I never thought of that. Shows how back in the Dark Ages I am.”
“We should look into this. Perhaps one would help. I realize that this piece is likely more of a mechanical device than some of your art, but you do other mechanical things, so would it help? Or are you a purist who thinks a computer is a cheat?”

Thran’s expression was teasing, so Bard stuck his tongue out at him. “Hell, no, I don’t think anything is a cheat, really. A computer is just a tool. I still have to come up with the ideas, and the designs to make the ideas live.”

“Then we should see about one. We likely need several. Tilda will need one for school next year, and Bain and Sigrid likely need new ones.”

“I thought about that the other day, too,” Bard admitted. “Sigrid will need a new one when she goes to college, too, so there’s that to figure into the mix.”

“We have time for the children’s,” Thran said comfortably. “We could get them in the summer, so they have time to learn to use them easily by the fall term. But you need something now. We will look at them online and see what suits you. We can visit a store, too, not to buy one, for the online deals from the makers are likely better. But to talk to a person about the software would help. There, I am done. We have a few minutes before the children come home, yes?”

“We do.”

“Then let us put aside everything else, and survey our domain.”

Bard chuckled as Thran pulled him to his feet. He put his drawing things in the sitting room while Thran went upstairs to change out of his dance wear, then they slowly walked through the house, talking of nothing in particular as they savored the momentary pause. They talked about what color to paint the main room, and what kind of mantel to look for. Surprisingly, Thran was less inclined to look for a modern mantel as he was an antique one in the marble Bard had considered. They went into the solarium and turned on the fountain to hear the soft murmur of the water. They looked out over the yard and debated whether to screen in the gazebo against mosquitoes or to leave it open. They ended up in the kitchen to decide on what to make for supper, where the children shortly joined them when they arrived home from school. As the clatter of eight feet breached the mudroom door, Bard turned a soft eye on his husband.

“I love you, too,” Thran murmured, and snuck a hand behind Bard to squeeze his backside.

Trust Thran to find a fit end to their private afternoon, one both sacred and profane.

* * *

Saturday started early, and didn’t seem to slow down for a second. Bard got Sigrid to the bistro – they needed to get to the bicycle store sooner rather than later – and then dropped off his load of rotten porch boards at the landfill. Then he was back home to make breakfast for Thran and Legolas, and two batches of muffins for the UVB company. The sky had cleared, so Darla and her two helpers arrived around eight-fifteen, so he checked with them to see if they needed anything before he took Legolas to fencing. By the time he returned, dancers had began to filter in; it was good to see Ori, Charisse, Luka, and the other dancers again after so many days. As the dancers got to work in the ballroom, Bard took the chance to head out to the barn to see what headway he could make to clean and organize his workshop. He worked an hour or so before the children got up, so he headed
