back inside to oversee their breakfasts and to get their homework started. In case they needed something, he worked on Hal’s tree in the solarium to be nearby. It was pleasant to work in the light-filled room with the sound of the fountain gently bubbling among the ferns, and soon he was satisfied with the way it looked. Now for the leaf. A quick sketch, a few colored pencils, and an artist’s knife, and he soon had a realistic maple leaf anchored at the end of one of the branches. He took the quartz base for the tree out onto a sunny spot on the terrace, positioned the clay model of the tree on top of it, and flattened himself on the flagstones to snap a few pictures with his mobile level with the piece. He wasn’t a prize photographer, but when he viewed the pictures on Thran’s computer, they looked good enough to send to Hal with a note that he was welcome to stop by to see the model in person anytime except tomorrow afternoon.

Bard wasn’t surprised when his mobile chimed only a few seconds later.

“Hi, Hal.”

“Oh, my god, Bard! It looks incredible. I can’t believe how incredible it looks. Do you know how incredible it looks?”

“Something tells me it looks incredible,” Bard grinned. “But that’s just a guess.”

“Oh, you,” Hal snorted. “Look, I’m in the city, but I can be there anytime today. Is that doable?”

“As long as you don’t mind a little chaos, Hal. We’ve got house painters working on the exterior, Thran’s got his company dancing in the ballroom, and children in all shapes and sizes are running around. But you’re more than welcome to come take a look. You might even be able to snare a muffin or two from the hungry dancers, and we’ve always got a cup of tea in the house.”

“You know me – I love a party,” Hal laughed. “Um, I’m with a friend, so do you mind if I bring him with me?”

“The more, the merrier.”

“Excellent! Thank you. Hang on, just a second, Bard...” Hal muffled his mobile, but it sounded like he talked to someone else, likely his friend, for some seconds. “Bard? I’m back. We’ll be along in an hour, maybe two?”

“I’ll be here all afternoon until about two-thirty, and again from about three-thirty on.”

“We’ll be there long before then. See you soon, Bard. Ciao!”

“Bye, Hal,” Bard laughed, and clicked off his mobile. He carried the sculpture back into the solarium, and set it carefully in the middle of the marble-topped table, out of the way until Hal could see it. Then he had to dash back into the village to get Legolas from fencing. By the time they returned, it was lunchtime, so he dug out sandwich things for him and the children, and chicken and vegetables for Thran. The fridge had run low again, so he decided he’d head to the market tomorrow after he dropped Sigrid off at the bistro when it would not be so crowded. Lunch came and went in a blur, the dancers headed back into the ballroom, Sam appeared to deliver Elanor to play with Tilda, then Hal was at the door. A tall, dark-haired man stood behind him.

“Afternoon, Hal!” Bard greeted the blond man with a firm handshake. Both he and his friend were dressed casually in jeans. Hal wore a fuchsia Hawaiian shirt covered in bright green parrots. His friend wore a much more subdued teal tee shirt, but he didn’t need bright parrots to draw attention – he had a mane of dark waves that fell to his shoulder, a beautiful olive complexion, and soft green eyes in a handsome face. Chiseled chin covered in dark stubble, very broad shoulders to balance very narrow hips and swelling thighs – the man must be a model or bodybuilder, or maybe he was about to try out for a film role as a Greek god. He had the presence as well as the body to carry it off.

“Hello, I’m Bard Bowman.”

“Bard, this is my friend Ari,” Hal gave Ari a caressing smile. “Ari, Bard’s the brilliant artist working on the tree I told you about. I can’t wait to see it. The pictures were amazing.”

“Welcome, Ari. Come in.” Bard shut the front door and led the way down the hall to the sitting room, and then into the solarium. Through the windows, they could see Legolas and Bain kicking a soccer ball back and forth, shouting and laughing. Behind them, thumps on the stairs and chirping giggles signaled Tilda and Elanor’s descent to the kitchen for a snack. The strains of music came faintly from the ballroom, and occasional thumps from outside reminded everyone that painters were at work.

“You said you were busy today, and you meant it,” Hal grinned.

Bard chuckled. “I did. We’ve got painters, we’ve got ballet dancers, we’ve got children... quite the zoo.”

“And you’re the artist at the center of it all,” Hal said. “I like it. It’s happy. That’s not true everywhere. So enjoy it to the hilt, I say.”

“I do, I admit,” Bard confessed. “I wouldn’t have it any other way, either. So... this is the solarium. Your tree is by the window, Hal. Can I get you and Ari a cup of tea while you look at it?”

“I’d love one,” Hal agreed, and Ari nodded. He wasn’t the talkative type, then. That was good – Hal likely made up for them both.

“Herbal, black, green?”

“Earl Grey?” Ari finally spoke, with a glance at Hal. His voice was deep but soft, and yes, the accent was faintly Greek.

“I’ve got that,” Bard nodded.

“It’s perfect,” Hal said. “Don’t change a thing. Just like this.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. “You’re sure? Once I cast, I can’t change it.”

"Perfect," Hal agreed, then turned to look at his tree. “Oh, my god, look at it, look at it, look at it!”

Hal put one hand over his heart and the other one over his mouth. He approached the table with reverent steps, crouching down to look at it this way and that. “Oh, my god, Bard, it’s perfect!”

“I’ll let you take a good look while I get our tea,” Bard said. “This is just the clay model, not the finished metal piece, of course. So please don’t touch it or try to pick it up, as the clay is soft, and the tree’s not anchored on the rock the way the finished one will be.”

“Of course, of course,” Hal hastened to assure Bard. His eyes never left the piece, so Bard left him and Ari to consider while he made a pot of tea. There were a few muffins left from the dancers’ basket of treats, so he set them on the tray beside the tea things and carried it into the solarium. Hal was still studying the tree, but Ari stood by quietly, looking around the solarium.

“Quite a beautiful room,” the tall man nodded.

“Thanks.” Bard set the tray down beside the tree on the marble-topped table. “Please help yourself.”

“It’s perfect,” Hal said. “Don’t change a thing. Just like this.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. “You’re sure? Once I cast, I can’t change it.”
“Good. I don’t want you to. I want it to look just like this.” Hal turned an uncharacteristically solemn look on him. “It’s beautiful, it’s sad, it’s hopeful, it’s not of this world, it’s completely of this world... it’s exactly everything I wanted it to be.”

“You’re still happy with the grey-green finish we talked about, not tan like the clay?”

“I’m still good with that, yes.” Hal swallowed, and his usual happy smile returned. “You’re amazing, Bard. Just amazing.”

“I appreciate the kind words. I’ll keep you posted on how the casting and so forth goes. I do need you to sign a release, that you’ve approved the model and give your permission for me to start casting.”

“Of course, of course,” Hal nodded. “I couldn’t be more thrilled.”

“I’ll get the form for you to sign, then.”

“Um, Bard, I wonder...”

Here it comes. I knew this was too easy.

“What do you wonder, Hal?”

“I was disappointed to miss your gallery show, I really was. So... I wonder if you’d let me sneak a peak at some of your sketches? The ones I saw on your website are beautiful, and I’d love to see some firsthand.”

“Sure, if you’d like to,” Bard agreed, surprised but gratified that Hal hadn’t come up with the change to the tree that he’d expected. “I’ll bring a couple of my sketchbooks back with me when I get the form.”

“Great,” Hal grinned widely, clearly delighted. “That’d be a treat.”

Bard ran up to the bedroom to get the release form – he really needed to turn one of the upstairs rooms into an office, and get the untidy box of papers and such into some semblance of organization – then snared a couple of his sketchbooks from the sitting room. Hal and Ari had helped themselves to tea, and Hal was waxing rhapsodic about the cranberry orange muffins.

“Didn’t I tell you the muffins would be divine?” Hal insisted.

Ari’s laugh was indulgent and soft. “You did, and they are. Now do you see why I want you to expand from just cupcakes to include these delights, too? You’d be a natural in the catering business.”

“Oh, you,” Hal murmured. “You just want to suck me into your catering business, you dear man.”

“Among other things,” Ari murmured back. Bard grinned at the implications of that, so he made a little noise before he came back into the solarium. He still caught a clear view of the tender expression on Ari’s face as he looked at Hal, and the pink tinge that suffused Hal’s cheeks. Gods, had he and Thran looked that star struck when they’d first met? No wonder Sigrid had called them mooning lovers. Hal and Ari didn’t look any different.

“Here’s the release form, Hal,” Bard said, blithely ignoring the covert glances his guests exchanged. “We can go into the sitting room where there’s more room to sit down.”
“I suppose I can tear myself away from your beautiful tree,” Hal exhaled with his typical theatrical flair, but he gave Bard a smile that proved he knew exactly the impression he made.

“I’ll make it easier and bring the tea tray with us,” Bard grinned back.

“Let’s do the boring part first,” Hal said, pulling out a beautiful blue and copper fountain pen to sign Bard’s form. “There you are, Bard. Now for the fun part – your sketches!”

Bard handed over one of his sketchbooks, and let Hal and Ari page through it as they pleased. He offered any explanations as Hal asked for them, but mostly Hal was content to ooh and aah over Bard’s sketches of the children, Thran’s ballet classes, and his figure studies.

“I have a few sketches I did of you, if you want to see them,” Bard offered tentatively.

“Do you?” Hal turned a wide-eyed look on him, then looked gleefully at Ari. “Ooh, of course I want to see them! Every one!”

Bard proffered the sketchbook with the sketches he’d done of Hal back in January. Ari leaned close to his friend to look at them closely, smiling in fond appreciation. Bard took advantage of their distraction to pull out his pencil and flip the remaining sketchbook on his lap to a blank page. Ari was too distinctive a person not to want to draw him, so he did two or three small renderings before turning to another sheet to do something a bit more dramatic.

“I love it, love it, love it!” Han enthused. “Bard, these are so amazing! They’re me! Every one of them.”

“Especially this one,” Ari pointed to a portrait that showed Hal with his zest for life at full blaze, eyes dancing, head back as he laughed. “That one is you in a nutshell, Hal.”

“Oh, stop it,” Hal blushed bright red. “That’s not me at all.”

“You stop it,” Ari teased, but quietly. A private man, then. What would he be like if he ever got angry? “That is exactly you. That’s just the way you laugh, and the way your eyes smile. Exactly.”

Hal looked at Bard with a mixture of pride and embarrassment. “Is that me, Bard? I ask you, is that the real me?”

“I’d say it’s part of the real you,” Bard allowed as he leaned forward. “There’s one a couple pages on that I’d say is another part of the real you.”

Hal sniffed, but he didn’t hesitate to turn the pages.

“That one,” Bard pointed. “I like that one very much, too.”

This portrait showed Hal with a thoughtful expression, unsmiling, but not unhappy or grim. Bard liked it because it was Hal fully aware and without façade, gazing out to meet the eyes of the viewer without pretense or apology. Hal gazed at it without moving for a long few seconds, then he swallowed and looked up at Bard.

“Oh, you are such a bastard,” he said.

Bard grinned. “Thran calls me that all the time. What’s your reason?”

“Well, he’s right. I can’t let you sell this one, because you’ll give away all my secrets. I’ll have to buy it for self preservation.”
Bard’s chuckle was self-conscious. “Maybe I shouldn’t tell you this, but I can’t sell it unless you sign a model’s release, anyway.”

“That’s a relief. But I still want to buy this one. And the one Ari likes. They’re both incredible. I know how much you charged for your sketches at your show, so how is four hundred for the pair?”

That was exactly what Bilbo had charged for Bard’s unframed sketches at his show, so Hal was well informed.

“Wellllll,” Bard ran his hand through his hair. “I’m having a special today. Buy two, get one free. So... with my compliments.”

He carefully took the portrait he’d done of Ari out of his sketchbook, wrote an inscription on the bottom, then signed and dated it before he held it out to the pair.

“Ares, God of War, in Repose,” Hal read. His jaw dropped, and Ari turned red. The sketch was just of Ari’s head, but his expression was the soft one he’d turned on Hal, with just the barest smile touching his lips. Hal looked up at Bard, but he was smiling. “Thran’s right. You really are the worst bastard.”

Ten minutes later, Bard waved farewell as Hal and Ari drove off in Hal’s blingy Audi. In Bard's hand was a check for four hundred dollars, and the signed form that meant he could move from model to finished piece for Hal’s tree. He also had a signed model’s release form that would let him sell the other sketches he’d done of Hal.

He couldn’t wait to tell Thran.
Chapter 128

Chapter Summary

A saint and his eldest cherub have an adventure, and an angel dances.

Once Hal and Ari left the house, it was time for Bard to collect Sigrid. He alerted Bain and Legolas to watch over Tilda and Elanor, then he set out in the truck.

Bard was half a block away when he spotted Sigrid outside the bistro beside the sidewalk tables, waving at him. He put on his flashers long enough for her to dash across the sidewalk and into the truck without holding traffic up too much.

“Hi, sweetness,” Bard greeted, as Sigrid pulled the door shut and scrambled to get her seatbelt buckled. “Good day, I hope?”

“Really good,” Sigrid nodded. “Yes, I went into the vintage shop, and yes, I want to go back because there’s some cool stuff in there. So can we now, or is the ancestral home of Clan Ffyrnig in an uproar that demands our attention?”

Bard grinned. “We’re good for a bit. I wanted to stop at the secondhand place on the way home, anyway, to see if we can find you a bicycle.”

“That’d be good, too,” Sigrid agreed.

Bard turned into the parking lot, and let Sigrid drag him up to the main street and across to the vintage clothing store. Vintage was a word that got bandied around a lot, but he imagined it meant clothing from anytime in the past fifty years; anything before that had likely fallen into dry-rotted shreds long before now. He let Sigrid move ahead of him as he took in the quaint ambiance of the place, complete with an old red plush covered Victorian sofa and a heavily carved sideboard topped with stands full of old hats – cloches, plumed wonders, and a floppy thing that reminded him of one Daphne had worn back in art school. Several customers perused the cases near the register that held a lavish display of vintage rhinestone jewelry, as well as a few Bakelite bracelets. Several others leafed through the racks of clothes – all women. There were few things for men in house, though a military jacket of black wool and a chest full of silver braid caught his eye. That would look stunning on Thran, so he took it off the hanger to see if it fit him.

“Ooh, Da!” Sigrid appeared as his side. “That looks sharp!”

“I thought Thran might like it,” he replied. “If it fits me, it might have a chance to fit him.”

“It looks like him, yeah,” Sigrid agreed. “Sleeves are too short, though.”

“Tight across the shoulders, too,” Bard agreed. He glanced at the price tag. “And it’s pricey for something that would need to be altered.”

“It’s a cool jacket, though,” she said regretfully. She held up a very short purple dress, heavily embroidered with small mirrors and sequins at the edges of neck, sleeves, and hem. “What do you think of this?”
Bard rubbed his chin. “It’s... really short.”

Sigrid rolled her eyes. “I’d wear it with leggings or jeans, Da. Not as a dress. I don’t wear dresses, remember?”

“Just checking. Does it fit? Have any holes or stains or missing buttons?”

“Two or three of the mirrors are gone, but everything else is fine. It’s not very much, either. But I haven’t tried it on yet.”

“Okay, it’s a possibility. Go try it on.”

“That’s not how you do it, Da. You wait until you have a bunch of stuff, and try it on all at once, remember?”

“I’m out of practice,” Bard winked as he took off the braided jacket to hang it up again. “Carry on, Number One.”

“Aye, Captain.” Sigrid turned back to the racks to continue her perusal, so Bard returned the jacket to the rack and kept looking. He noticed that Sigrid circled behind him to take the braided jacket off the rack, but he held his tongue. Maybe it’d fit her better than it fit him. He hoped it didn’t — even if it didn’t need to be altered, it was expensive. But there was no point in debating until she tried it on. If it didn’t fit, then that solved the problem.

When Sigrid had an armload of things, she pointed to the dressing room door, drawing Bard’s nod. She threaded through the other customers to ensconce herself in the endmost dressing room, beside a rack of long, frilly, party dresses. An edge of blue green tulle with small rhinestones caught his eye, so he wrangled the hanger out to reveal a very pretty dress with a simple bodice, thin spaghetti straps, and a long skirt of several layers of varying blues and greens. The tiny rhinestones were sprinkled down the front.

He tapped on the dressing room door. “Sigrid? What size are you?”

“I don’t know, Da. Most likely anything from eight to twelve. Stupid girl sizes.”

Bard checked the tag. “I think you might like this, sweetness.”

The door opened. Sigrid had on the purple top, but her eyes widened when she saw what Bard held up. “Oh, gods, Da, that’s beautiful! What size is it?”

“Ten.” He cast her a look. “I know you said you didn’t wear dresses, but I thought you might make an exception in this case. If girls still wear such things to a prom any more, that is.”

“I think it’s perfect.” Sigrid took the dress with eager hands. “Keep your fingers crossed.”

“Will do,” Bard smiled, as the dressing room door shut in a rush. He lingered close by, ignoring the glances the female customers gave him. He’d had ten years to get used to people looking askance at him when he took his daughters shopping. It was tougher when the girls had been small, and he’d had to go into the dressing rooms with them. A few customers in the men’s dressing rooms of various stories had been surprised to see him with small girls, but as he couldn’t go into the women’s dressing rooms with them, how else did they expect him to make sure their clothes fit? It had gotten easier once Sigrid was old enough to help Tilda.

“What do you think?” Sigrid asked breathlessly, coming out of the dressing room.
“Um... wow, sweetness. You look spectacular.”

Sigrid rushed over to the full-length mirror beside the dressing rooms to regard herself. The very simple and plain design of the dress suited her as ruffles and poufs wouldn’t have, but the beautiful fabrics left no doubt as to the richness of the dress. The underskirt was a shiny blue green satin, and the overskirts of three different shades of blue green tulle cast lovely shadows. The bodice was of the same satin, with more of the tiny rhinestones. It fit very well, and the color was beautiful against Sigrid’s dark hair and eyes.

“I couldn’t get the zipper all the way up, Da,” she came close to whisper. “Can you get it?”

Bard bent to see what he could do. “I see the problem. There’s a small tear near the top, and the zipper’s jammed in the edges. But there’s a hook...” He got it fastened, which snugged the bodice a little better. “It’s not too bad. I could get it undone without much trouble, and then a little mending would fix the hole so no one would notice. If you like it, of course.”

Sigrid went back to the mirror to turn this way and that, letting the skirt unfurl around her. One of the other customers, an older woman, leaned close with a reminiscing look in her hazel eyes.

“One minute they’re roughhousing on the playground, and the next minute, they’re grown up and going to the ball.”

“Oh, you’ve got that right,” Bard rubbed the back of his neck and offered a rueful smile. “Quite takes my breath away.”

“It always does,” she whispered back. “I have two daughters of my own. Grown, now, each with children of her own. But I remember the same moment with each of them. You have to get her that, you know. You’ll never find another that fits so well, that looks so perfect. She’s absolutely stunning.”

“Thank you, she is,” Bard agreed. “So we’ll see what the verdict is.”

As Sigrid turned back to Bard, the woman moved away to observe from the sidelines, smiling when Sigrid’s face lit up with a big grin.

“I love it, Da. I really do.”

“So do I. Let’s go over by the window, and make sure there aren’t any stains or anything that would keep it from looking nice.”

“Oh, Da.”

They did just that, and Bard stooped down to carefully check all the layers of fabric for tears or stains. By this time, they’d attracted the attention of the owner, who bustled over to help them go over the gown. The small tear was all that detracted from the dress, but if Bard was careful, he could repair that.

“I think it’s okay, sweetness,” he pronounced it.

“How much is it?”

Bard had already seen the price tag. “Doable. Go try on your other stuff.”

The smile that Sigrid bestowed upon him was pure Daphne – laughing, almost tearful, excited, and oh, so affectionate. His daughter hadn’t been oblivious to the trials of the last ten years, so appreciation of where they’d been and where they were now was also in her smile. Bard made shooing motions to chase her back into the dressing room, so she went, and just in time, thank the gods – it was all he could do not to get teary-eyed himself. He swallowed hard, and hoped everyone in the shop didn’t know just how much of a sentimental fool Sigrid’s Da was.

He snuck a look around. Eh... the grandmother who’d spoken to him earlier gave him a thumbs up and a sweet smile, but maybe none of the other customers had caught on.

Maybe.

Sigrid came out to show him the other pair of tops she liked – both as bohemian as anything her mother had worn back in the day – plus the braided jacket, which swallowed her. That went back on the rack, but the dress and the three tops went with Sigrid up to the register. Bard handed over his credit card without a blink. The dress was less than half the cost of anything new, and the tops were equally thrifty purchases. Sigrid had suffered alongside Bard through their lean years, and she deserved everything they’d bought.

When the dress had been carefully folded and bagged, then the tops, Bard and Sigrid headed back to the truck. Bard opened the door for her to hop in, but first she carefully laid her dress on the back seat. Then she turned to peck Bard’s cheek with a shy kiss.

“Thanks, Da. That was really sweet of you.”

“I’m glad I can finally do some of the things I’ve wanted to for a long time.”

“You’ve always gone over the top for us, Da. Really – I know exactly why you won’t ever eat ramen again. And even though things are better now, that was still really sweet of you.”

“You’re welcome,” Bard gave her a crooked smile. “So let’s see if our luck holds at the secondhand shop.”

They maneuvered out of the parking lot and drove to the same secondhand shop where Bard had found their kitchen flatware. The place was lively and full of browsing tourists, so Bard and Sigrid took their time to drift through the rooms as traffic allowed. He picked up another dozen teaspoons, as they always seemed to be in short supply – except in the dishwasher. Sigrid pointed out a pair of small wire plant stands that would look nice on the porch, so she took the spoons from Bard and he carried the plant stands. They eventually got to the back of the building, where an attendant watched over a yard full of garden sculptures, lawn furniture, and planting pots. They found a few bicycles stacked nearby on the covered porch. All of them had been wiped free of dust and grime, but most had been nicked and dinged, and a big placard nearby read AS IS. Bard put down the two plant stands to help Sigrid sort through them.

“This one’s pretty good,” Sigrid offered. “Wait, that one looks sturdy. That one, next to the end.”

Bard leaned the other bicycles this way and that to free the one Sigrid had spotted. It wasn’t a true mountain bike, but it looked reasonably decent, though the paint was badly scraped and battered.

“We could sand it down and paint it,” Bard suggested. “A little of that Majorelle blue that I got for the benches, maybe?”

“That’d look cool, yeah,” Sigrid agreed. “Let’s see how it rides.”

Under the watchful eye of the attendant, she got the bicycle off the porch and rode it down the path between all the garden ornaments, but walked it back.
“No back brakes,” she called.

“Let’s see,” Bard beckoned. A quick look told him all he needed to know. “It’s nothing I can’t fix, sweetness, but the whole back brake assembly has to be replaced.”

“That’s probably why the paint’s so wrecked,” Sigrid surmised. “I’ll try that first one I saw.”

“Good idea,” Bard agreed. This one had two functioning brakes, and the paint, while battered, was in better shape than the first one. Even the tires looked reasonably new, without any dry rot, scuffs, or punctures. They went over this one an inch at a time before Sigrid gave it a test ride. Sigrid could still repaint it if she chose to, but it was ready to ride now, without need of repair. “This one looks good, then.”

“It’s not very much, either,” Sigrid checked the tag, then the tags of several of the other bicycles. “A little more than some, a little less than others.”

“What’s the high end look like, just for comparison?”

“That green one. It’s a fancy brand name.”

“You’re good with this one, then?”

“I’m good.”

“Okay, let’s tell the minder.”

The attendant gave them the bottom of the tag to take to the register for payment, then they went around the back with the truck to pick up the bicycle. They made a quick stop at a gas station to fully inflate the bicycle tires, then they were on their way home.

As they came up the driveway, they spotted the boys with Tilda and Elanor in the back, playing kickball. Darla and her crew waved from up on the scaffolding, then turned back to their painting. Bard and Sigrid got her bicycle and the plant stands out of the back, and set them in the empty bay of the carriage house before they put the truck away. Sigrid got her clothes, Bard got the teaspoons, and they headed towards the porch.

The house looks so great,” Sigrid said, looking up at the painters. “What color will they paint the porch?”

“The ceiling’s pale blue. A lot of the floor is stained, so I figured black would look good to even it all out. We can get some old-fashioned wicker furniture, maybe. Or those big rattan things your Mam liked. I haven’t decided yet.”

“I like the wicker,” Sigrid mused, as she paused at the top of the porch stairs, then paced slowly to the round section where Bard and Thran had replaced so many boards. “Didn’t Gran have that?”

Bard nodded. “She did. I remember she had some in Wales, and when we got to Canada, no matter how cold it was, she still wanted her wicker chairs. They were on the back terrace, remember?”

“I do remember. Hers were dark brown. Ours should be white. With bright green cushions. They’d match the house.”

“With lots of flowers all around.”

“We’ve got all those pots in the carriage house.”
“As soon as the painters are done, we’ll fill them up.”

“Mr. Sam will help us with the front garden, too, right?”

“All over,” Bard assured her.

“This place will look like a dream,” Sigrid sighed. “It already does. Imagine what it’ll be like this summer with all the flowers.”

“Pretty amazing,” Bard does. “Hungry?”

Sigrid shook her head as she and Bard headed back to the front door and went inside. “Miss Dís is the nicest boss anyone can have, Da. She lets her staff make our lunches out of the ends of things, stuff that she’d have to throw out. And she donates free coffee and lunch to the two police officers who patrol the village during the day. It makes you want to work hard for someone that generous. And we do. She tells me the summer weekend traffic gets really frantic, but that I’ll be up to speed by then. Kane’s a good teacher, and Dana’s really fast on the register, and Miss Dís says she’s got another barista coming back who’s still in college right now, so we’ll be okay.”

“Does she do all of the baking?” Bard asked, laying his package of teaspoons on the kitchen counter by the sink.

“She contracts with a bakery for the sandwich breads, but she makes the scones and the cinnamon buns herself. She’s very particular that things be just so, just the way she wants them. That’s why she doesn’t do chicken or tuna or potato salad – because she doesn’t have time to make them herself, and she thinks the commercial ones have too much mayonnaise. She contracts with our grocery store for the meats, cheeses, and salad things, and we don’t make up anything until it’s ordered. Everything’s really good. I had turkey and Swiss on an onion bun today.”

“Mmm, onion buns,” Bard savored as he unwrapped the teaspoons to wash them. “I haven’t had one of those in a long time. I love those.”

“This one was good. The bakery’s called Elven Mills. Maybe our grocery store carries them.”

“I’ll put it on the list. I’ll have to refuel Clan Ffyrnig before long.”

Sigrid giggled as she put her bags of clothing on the kitchen table and got a clean dishcloth to dry the spoons as Bard washed them. “The way we go through food is alarming, Da.”

“That’s why I buy food at an alarming rate,” Bard exhaled. “Four hungry children, a ballet dancer, and a welder. Every one of them hungry.”

“An artist welder,” Sigrid amended, opening the silverware drawer to add the clean teaspoon to it. “You have to get the barn cleaned out, Da. You’re going to need it soon, with all the work you have coming in.”

“That’s tomorrow morning’s job,” Bard agreed. “I’d planned to go to the market when I dropped you off tomorrow, but since you can get yourself to work, maybe I’ll get an early start in the barn and leave the market until Monday. I think we’ve got enough stuff to hold us until then.”

“Course we do,” Sigrid said firmly. “It’s time you put your stuff first, Da. No one will die if we have peanut butter sandwiches for lunch on Monday.”

Bard grinned. “Thran will be delighted. If he’s not in the ballroom tomorrow, he’ll be right there, wanting to help in the barn.”
“He’s so funny,” Sigrid snickered. “The simplest things fascinate him. The thermostat, making breakfast, figuring out how to make supper. It’s kind of sad, really. I guess he didn’t get to do any of that when he was little.”

“No.” Bard squeezed out the sponge and rinsed it. Sigrid tossed him the dishtowel so he could dry his hands as she put the last teaspoon in the drawer and closed it. “He told me when I was sick what it was like. He’s danced and done almost nothing else.”

Bard gave Sigrid an abbreviated version of what Thran had told him, which drew Sigrid to shake her head and murmur sympathetically.

“That sounds awful. I hope Legolas doesn’t go through that for his fencing, or Bain for his soccer. Or any of us about anything. I mean, sacrifice is one thing, but to give up everything but that one thing is too much.”

“Sometimes it happens before you realize it, or circumstances don’t give you a choice,” Bard shrugged. “That’s what happened to us when your Mam died. But we forged Clan Ffyrnig on last Christmas day out of a bad circumstance, and look where we are now. Thran and Legs have the family they never had; you, Bain, Tilda, and I are in better circumstances; I’m an artist again, and we’re all here in a real home. So you never know. You just have to keep on, that’s all.”

“Hello, the house!” Sam’s cheerful call echoed from the mudroom. “Anybody home?”

“Come on in, Sam!” Bard called with a grin. “Welcome to Bedlam!”

“Oh, now, now!” Sam came into the kitchen proper with little Merry in tow. “It’s not Bedlam – it’s a happy home! Hi, Sigrid! Can you say hello, Merry-Merry?”

“Hi,” the little boy waved. “Daddy pulled me in the wagon! I held the tree!”

“The tree?” Sigrid bent down beside Merry. “What tree is that, Merry?”

“Your palms came in, so I brought them home with me,” Sam explained. “Merry decided he wanted to help, so out came the wagon. I figured that Elanor would be tired after running around all afternoon, so the wagon won’t go home empty.”

“That was great of you, Sam. Can I help you get the palms inside?”

“Sure, they’re just outside the solarium, so we don’t have far to go.”

“Come on, Merry,” Sigrid offered. “I bet I can find you a cookie, if your Da says it’s okay.”

“Sure, Merry-Merry,” Sam agreed. “But just one. Your mother will have my hide if you won’t eat your dinner tonight!”

“We’ll find a small one, won’t we, Merry-Merry?” Sigrid smiled. “Come on, let’s look in the pantry while our Das move the trees.”

“Okay!” the little boy grinned, and happily followed Sigrid into the pantry. Bard and Sam headed into the solarium, then out to the terrace to bring in the two big palms that Sam had hauled over in the children’s wagon. As they put them in place, Sam explained that they were Areca palms; they didn’t like direct sunlight, which made them perfect for the north-facing solarium. They grew not much more than eight feet high, which meant they wouldn’t take over the room, too. As they set the palms on either side of the marble-top table, Sam noticed Hal’s tree model, so Bard explained that he’d cast the final piece once he got the garage cleaned out.
That’s so exciting, Bard, it really is,” Sam enthused. “And the place looks wonderful. You and Thran have made a real home out of it, which is just what it and the two of you deserve.”

“I hardly believe it myself, Sam. It’s been a long time coming. Every day is more amazing than the next. I keep worrying I’ll wake up and find out it’s all a mad dream, and I’m still a night super for a grotty city landlord.”

Sam thumped Bard’s shoulder. “No, none of that, now. You’re right were you belong, and you’re not going anywhere. This is as real as houses.”

“This house, anyway,” Bard grinned. “Thanks for bringing over the palms, Sam. In another week or so, once the painters are done, I hope we can get started on the gardens.”

“I’ve got the plants for the back terrace in the greenhouse now, hardening off,” Sam replied. “We need to talk about what bushes you want for the front.”

“Something evergreen, maybe, that’ll look good in the snow?” Bard asked. “And some flowers, too. Lots of flowers.”

Sam and Bard walked out to the front to talk about appropriate shrubs, and soon Sam had a list of things that Bard liked. “I’ll work up a plan for you to look at,” he promised, as they looped around the house to collect Elanor from the soccer game.

“That’s great, Sam. I can’t wait to see it. Thank you.”

Sam called to Elanor, and Sigrid came out with Merry, who still munched his piece of shortbread as he and his sister got into the wagon for the short ride home. The trio disappeared across the yard with waves and calls of goodbye.

“Merry is so cute,” Sigrid said as she followed Bard back inside. “He told me thank you very much for the shortbread, but he really would prefer a cookie, please. I had to explain that shortbread is a cookie. He was dubious, but one taste did the trick.”

“It always does,” Bard grinned. “Thran’s acquired quite a taste for it.”

“Good,” Sigrid snorted. “He’s still too skinny.”

“Wait until after he’s done with the pointe dancing to nag him about that, sweetness. It’s hard enough even when he’s thin.”

“Stupid pointe dancing,” she muttered under her breath, but held up a hand when Bard eyed her. “I know, I know, it’s his business, not mine. I won’t say a word, but I can’t promise that I won’t think it. So what’s for supper?”

As Bard and his daughter rummaged in the fridge, he smothered a grin. His daughter was smart, kind, generous, and strong-willed. Not only that, this afternoon had proved that she was quite the stunner in a party dress. He hoped Finn had a strong spine, or he’d soon find himself wound helplessly around Sigrid’s little finger.

Her Da, of course, would never find himself in such a position.
Thran’s day went by in a blur as Immortal wove a net worthy to ensnare him. This was so much better than wrestling with paperwork, logistics, priorities, the press, donors, and on and on and on. No more of that. The UVB dancers were slowly, slowly becoming their characters, no longer merely a collection of dancers who traced steps over a floor. He saw it happen around him, and felt the same transformation inside – Death, Lord of the Underworld, was seeping into his thoughts, his steps, his gestures. With every turn and step, Thran welcomed Death and drew Him closer. To hasten the transformation, he wore Rada’s practice crown and gloves to remind him how alien the Lord was. He had begun to make odd reptilian head movements even in conversation with his colleagues. He flexed his hands wide and rippled his fingers until they danced like spider legs.

He vaguely registered Bard putting lunch in front of him. He ate sparingly, given how soon he would fling himself into the role again, but it was good food, just what he needed to sustain such concentrated effort for the rest of the afternoon.

Back to the ballroom and the dance... Irmo had them make their first run-through of the entire ballet, from start to finish, with the music. This would give them a rough idea of the actual length, and would also allow them to gauge the endurance the three principals must muster. Thran, especially, would be onstage for almost every scene. Even though every little fillip was not yet blocked out, it was still a relief just to dance the role without Irmo’s constant interruptions to adjust a step or gesture. The sense of the Lord of the Underworld snapped into strong focus, something that happened only with a complex and meaty role – it certainly never happened when he danced the Poet in Les Sylphides, no matter how pretty a role that was. To feel that hyperawareness so early in rehearsal... how high it would build in eight weeks, and he would not need wires to fly across the stage.

He sailed onto the first battlefield, a dark and imposing figure as He collected the souls of the dead, saw the Maid, longed for her, and retreated with the souls of the newly dead to the Underworld. After the second battle raged, He descended again, but this time, the Soldier was forced to join Death’s entourage, no matter how the Maid raged, no matter how the Soldier pleaded. Down, down, Death led the souls, until they reached the gates of His kingdom, barred from mortal eyes by huge gates that opened only for the Lord. He led the souls in, then gestured the gates closed, leaving the distraught Maid prostrate before them.

Act II saw Death lead the souls of the newly dead through His kingdom. Here for all to see was the vast array of cultures that populated the Underworld, represented with various forms of dance. Thran had this act to recover his strength from the rigors of the battlefield scenes, and to marshal it for the upcoming scenes with the Soldier, then the Maid. He still danced, but it was in partnership with Death’s subjects, and for the most part in the background; Charisse and Luka, in contrast, bore much more of the emotional content with the longing and despair between Soldier and Maid.

When the Maid marshaled her grief and traveled to the Underworld, she was shown into the presence of the great Lord to beg Him to let her trade places with her Soldier. They danced a beautiful pas de trois where Death oversaw the argument between Maid and Soldier, for the Soldier did not want Death to accept the Maid’s offer. Death had His own argument to endure, His internal struggle to resist His obsession with the Maid. Ultimately, He could not resist, and so He accepted the Maid in place of the Soldier. Once again, the gates of the Underworld closed and a mortal despaired outside of it, this time the Soldier.

Act III began with Thran’s biggest ordeal – the seven-minute pointe scene between Death and the Maid. He bestowed wonderful gifts upon her – a beautiful gown, a glittering bower, all manner of finery – but though she wore the gown, she paid no attention to it or any of the things Death had given her. All she saw was the spectre of her Soldier, even when Death came to her stripped of His field armor and fine court robes. On pointe, He towered over the diminutive Maid, who cowered before Him and could not bear to look at Him, no matter how He entreated her. When she at last fled, He fell to His knees, devastated at her rejection – no, not a rejection, for she hadn’t so much as noticed anything but His looming presence. His mere presence, so alien, so foreign, had been so daunting that she had never heard a single one of His entreaties.

Meanwhile, the grieving Soldier dreamed of the Maid as she had of him, and he resolved to travel to the Underworld to take his rightful place there rather than the living Maid. Here came the Soldier’s petition, his death, and the Maid’s ejection from the Underworld. Here came the Maid’s death, and her joyful reunion with her Soldier. Death made His final pleas, but once again His words were not so much as noticed. Forced to concede defeat, He collapsed while the Maid and Soldier danced their passionate pas de deux de reunion, ecstatic that nothing would part them for the rest of eternity. Recognizing the power of the love between them, Death escorted them outside the gates of His kingdom, turned them into stars, and transported them into the heavens where they would serve as a beacon of love and devotion to all mortals forever. As they rose, the denizens of the Underworld filtered back behind the gates, leaving Death alone to gaze up at the lovers. Death made His last dance alone, full of despair, loss, and sorrow. He cast one last longing look to the lovers, offered His concession with a bow, then retreated to His kingdom. He gestured, and the gates closed for the final time.

When the music stilled, Thran fell back into the real world with a wrench. Death’s despair still filled his heart and his thoughts, and he mourned for the loneliness of the ancient Lord. It must have shown on his face, because even Irmo left him alone for a few moments to compose himself. When he could breathe again, he looked around and nodded, thanking those who had respected his silence.

“Not bad,” he shrugged.

If the understanding smiles were any indication, it was a lot more than not bad. He appreciated the sentiment, but the company still had so much to do if they were to deliver the stunning performance they needed to make Immortal truly immortal. But it was an auspicious beginning, without doubt.

Irmo returned the company to the important scene that began Act II, where Death’s kingdom was first revealed. The timing and sequencing needed so that a small stage and a large cast didn’t result in collisions and confusion was crucial. Even though the company could not completely refine that timing to the exacting standard they needed here in the ballroom, the practice was still useful, because all of the company dancers but Charisse would be onstage. Most of the dancers had joined Thran in wearing bits and pieces of their costumes to remind everyone that Anna was belly dance, and her look-alike friend Cecily was modern, while Linus was Latin, and Shun was hip-hop, and so on. Thran did have a turn or two to make with some of the dancers, but for the two hours they worked on the scene, he was able to wind down from the exertion of dancing the entire ballet. By the time they ended their work for the day, the timing had improved. Irmo proved his versatility and skill as he added a few more fillips between the different types of dance, which most of the dancers seemed to enjoy. As the high lord, Thran had to remain above the souls’ squabbles, but he enjoyed adding a fluid exchange with the modern dancers, and then a balletic interpretation of a tango partnering with the Latin dancers. The dancers settled to their cooling stretches in good spirits, not yet so depleted that they couldn’t exchange conversation.

That moment would come in just a few weeks.

When the last dancer had headed home, Thran padded into the kitchen to find the rest of his family. They were all at the table, halfway through supper. He looked at the clock on the oven – seven o’clock, late for his family’s usual suppertime. They had hoped to hold it for him, then, which was generous on their part.
“Hello, everyone,” he smiled. “Remember me?”

Bain and Legolas both snorted. His son was becoming more open, thanks to Bain’s irrepressible exuberance. Sigrid rolled her eyes, but Tilda’s grin was welcoming.

“You’re Ada, silly!” she scolded. “How could you think we’d forget?”

“I am glad to know you have not forgotten me, Kukla. If I go upstairs and put on comfortable clothes, do you think I can still have supper with you?”

“We saved some for you,” Tilda nodded.

“We did,” Bard agreed, giving him a warm smile, then nodding to the boys. “But it won’t last long around the twin megalodons, so you’d better hurry.”

“I fly,” Thran promised, and hurried upstairs to exchange dancewear for leggings and tee. As he sank into his chair at the kitchen table, Bard handed him a plate filled with a nice slice of pork roast and berry sauce, a big pile of steamed vegetables, and a small pile of quinoa with fruit and nuts. The children handed down a basket of biscuits and the butter crock, and he set to. All of the children had tales to tell of their day – Legolas’s fencing, Bain’s new personal record for bouncing a soccer ball on his knees without dropping it to the ground (four hundred and eighty-two bounces, to be exact), Tilda’s excitement over having Elanor over to play, and Sigrid’s adventure at the bistro, then at the vintage store and second-hand shop with Bard.

“What is this? You found a beautiful dress for the ball?” Thran smiled. “You are so excited, it must be wonderful.”

“It is, Ada. Da found it, believe it or not. Can I put it on to show Ada, Da?”

“Be careful with the zipper,” Bard reminded her. “But sure, I’m sure he’d love to see it.”

“I would indeed,” Thran affirmed.

“I’ll be right back.” Sigrid jumped out of her chair and ran upstairs. “Don’t tell Ada what it looks like, Da!”

“Never,” Bard grinned, winking at Thran. “Maybe I boosted my karma a little bit, finding her dress.”

“We shall soon see.” Thran surveyed the children, grinning at how the boys still shoveled in mass quantities of food, while Tilda had kneeled in her chair so that she faced the hallway. “I take it the children have not seen this spectacle yet?”

“It’s a dress,” Bain shrugged, giving Thran an incredulous look. “It’s just a dress.”

“I’ve seen party dresses at boarding school,” Legolas shrugged with equal disinterest. “They make the girls look weird, and act funny.”

“Sigrid doesn’t look weird,” Tilda observed, looking back at her brothers with a frown. “I think she looks pretty.”

Sigrid swept in in a beautiful confection of sparkling blue and green, drawing Thran to greet her with a delighted smile.

“Look at you!” he exclaimed, holding his hands wide. “Prekrasnaya doch’ moya! Ma jolie fille! Tu es adorable!”
“Gee, sweetness, I think Ada’s disappointed,” Bard teased.

“Oh, I am not!” Thran snorted, waving his hands at Bard in dismissal. “Your Da is so ridiculous – how can anyone think you are not the most beautiful daughter? More elegant and beautiful than Cinderella!”

“Uh-oh, he must be serious – he’s gesticulating,” Bard continued to tease. “You’re a winner, Sig – you got Ada to gesticulate.”

Thran waved his hands at Bard again as he got out of his chair to offer Sigrid a bow. “You are lovely, milady Sigrid, and will be the most beautiful on the dance floor, yes?”

He waltzed a laughing Sigrid into the sitting room for a quick turn before returning her to the kitchen. “There. We have proved that the beautiful dress is well able to navigate a good waltz. Not that your dance will offer such a thing, but now you know you can do one so attired, yes?”

“Yes,” Sigrid laughed. “Honestly, you and Da are too much.”

“Perhaps so, but you are just right,” Thran bowed over her hand to kiss it. “Enchanté, mademoiselle.”

“Merci, Ada,” Sigrid dropped a curtsey, but she couldn’t disguise her flushed cheeks. “Um, I’d better go take it off before I spill something on it.”

She dashed upstairs, leaving Thran to resume his place at the table. He eyed the boys both studiously intent on their plates, then shared a silent chuckle with Bard.

As if he felt the silent exchange, Legolas looked up. “She did look nice.”

Bain’s head shot up and he favored his brother with another of his incredulous looks.

“Well, she did,” Legolas shrugged.

Bain rolled his eyes, but wisely remained silent.

The rest of supper proceeded without further revelations from the children. Thran talked a little of how his ballet rehearsal went, and how he was pleased with the progress so far. Then he reiterated that starting Monday, he would be working from noon to late in the evening because the company would be on site at the Imladris Academy during the week, so to please help Bard see that all went smoothly.

“Will you be here during the day on the weekends?” Legolas asked.

“Definitely Sundays,” Thran nodded. “I hope on most of each Saturday, too. We must see how the ballet progresses.”

“The weekends would be good, Papa,” Legolas nodded with a hopeful look in his eyes. “I hope it will be both days on the weekend.”

“I hope so, too,” Thran admitted. “But as we get close to the premiere, it may not be so. But I hope at the minimum that Sundays will be ours.”

Once everyone was through, the children got up to begin the cleanup. Bard and Thran went into the sitting room with their tea and a plate of cookies. He was excited to hear Bard’s tale of Hal’s visit, his approval of the tree model, and his friend.
“He bought two of my sketches, too,” Bard concluded. “At two hundred apiece. How amazing is that?”

“Not at all,” Thran shook his head, slipping his arm around Bard to give him a welcome hug. “Your sketches are well worth the price, lyubov moya.”

“Eh, I gave him a third one,” Bard admitted. “Just spur of the moment, of his friend. He had a great face to sketch.”

“You are a generous man.”

Bard shrugged. “It was five minutes’ work, and it made both of them happy.”

“What was Hal’s friend like?”

Bard described the dreamy Ari in thoughtful words, but the faint smile on his husband’s lips told him all that Bard didn’t say.

“Ah, so perhaps this is romance, yes?”

“I’d say so.” Bard grimaced a bit as he turned a rueful smile on Thran. “They reminded me of us back in November, and look what came of that. Gods, we probably looked just as sappy then as they did this afternoon.”

“Tcha,” Thran sipped his tea and settled at Bard’s side comfortably. “If they looked like we did in November, then they did not look sappy, my saint. They looked... luminous.”

Bard’s snort was affectionate. “As luminous as the full harvest moon in October.”

“You would prefer they look like the small, demure little violets in the spring grass? Should we look that way, as well?”

“Demure little violet in the grass is not what you were in the barn yesterday, angel. In fact, neither of us were demure little violets. We never have been. And I thank the gods for that every day.”

Thran stroked Bard’s hair. “So do I, my saint. So do I.”
Chapter 129

Chapter Summary

When an angel plays hooky on Sunday, he makes quite a day of it :-)

Chapter Notes

As requested, this chapter includes the epic shopping expedition to the mall for the children's clothes. It's dedicated to all you good parents out there ❤️.

As usual, I don't own any rights to the wonderful Star Trek universe. But my clan's been known to say, "Make it so, Number One," and "Beam me up, Scotty!" innumerable times.

What a rare luxury it was to sleep in Sunday morning! After uncounted days of getting up at six to get children off to school, or a bit later last weekend to get Sigrid to the bistro, it was so much of a delight not to get up that Bard slept right through it. When Bard finally roused, it was after eight. He padded into the bathroom to deal with necessities, then, because he wouldn’t rest without checking, he stuck a head into Sigrid’s room to make sure it was empty. Yes, she’d gotten up, so he headed back to bed with an easy mind.

A long, pale arm snaked out to ease him close. “Our lioness is off?”

“And she’s left, too,” Bard murmured with a sleepy grin. “It doesn’t feel like the octopus in my bed has left, though.”

“Shh,” Thran hummed in his ear. “You ruin the ambience of the morning.”

“Oh, pardon me,” Bard snickered, as Thran curled at his back and insinuated arms around him. “How exactly do I ruin the ambience of an octopus?”

“An octopus does not like prey who talks so much.” A hand stroked down Bard’s ribs so lightly that it teased his skin into gooseflesh. Across his abdomen it traced, then stroked through his pubic hair to tickle his cock. “Although moans are a delicious garnish.”

“Oh, that’s what you want,” Bard grinned. He shut his eyes to better appreciate his husband’s attentions.

“Tcha, you are the worst prey ever. Here we have at last the lazy Sunday morning, and you want to waste it on talk.”

“Mmm,” Bard hummed. “I guess you’ll just have to give me something better to do.”

“You are something better to do. So let me.”

“If you insist,” Bard teased.
“Chert!” Thran bit Bard’s ear hard enough to make him gasp. “Ah, yes, so much better. Do not say I did not warn you.”

“Of course not,” Bard egged on his husband with another impudent snicker. That wasn’t easy to do while Thran’s insistent hand worked its magic, making it hard for him to think. It was worth the effort, though – with a hiss of another Russian curse, Thran wound his leg around Bard, pulling his top leg back, slithered one hand underneath him to cradle his balls, and engulfed his cock with the other hand to stroke and squeeze. Teeth seized his shoulder just at the base of his neck, so he was well trapped, not that he wanted to escape. He shut his eyes, and managed to get one hand free to squeeze Thran’s thigh. Words were forgotten as Thran played his body like an instrument, bringing him to climax in seconds. As his body writhed, Thran held him tightly to ride his spasms with him.

“Oh, my saint, you are so sweet, so delicious,” whispered Thran into his ear. “Such a delight on a lazy Sunday morning... mmm.”

“Gods, the things I do to humor a voracious husband.” Bard rumbled deep in his chest. “I lead a hard life.”

Chortling, Thran tightened his hand around Bard’s cock. “If you were not just as voracious as I, then you would not get hard so often.”

“Guilty as charged,” Bard grinned. He eased Thran’s leg from atop him, and shifted until he lay face to face beside him. “Let’s see if the hardened criminal can get a rise out of the octopus.”

“Tcha, that is one of your mixed metaphors – oh, gods, Bard!” Thran tensed as Bard slid down to suckle his nipples. Before Thran could flinch again, Bard had rolled his husband onto his back, then half rolled on top of him to further attend to his nipples. Bard had very little work to do farther down; when he slid his hand down to find Thran’s cock, it was already hard and erect, filling Bard’s hand.

“Gods, angel, you’re so easy,” Bard teased, twining his free hand in Thran’s mussed braid to keep him on his back. “Not even a challenge.”

“Oh, you bastard, you fucking bastard!” Thran gasped. His head went back and his hands clawed at the sheets as Bard set about driving him to ecstasy as ruthlessly as he’d driven Bard.

“That’s right, pretty angel,” Bard goaded him. “Show me how much you hate this.”

Thran was beyond speech, but his moans grew increasingly frantic until his body had no choice but to release. How much of a rush was it to see that beautiful, angelic face consumed with the most primal carnal lust? Bard smothered his husband’s helpless cries in a deep kiss, which deepened Thran’s orgasm until he was completely spent.

“You are such a fucker,” Thran spat, when he had caught his breath.

“You should have thought about that before you started on me,” Bard replied without remorse.

Thran’s face waxed in an impudent grin. “I did. I was well rewarded.”

“You’re a bastard, too.”

“I very much am.” Thran gave a luxurious stretch from head to toe, reveling in it so much that Bard felt his loins stir again. Thran opened his eyes, took in Bard’s reaction, and offered him a soft look under his lashes that drew Bard’s laughter. “So very much.”

“Now you’re a royal bastard. You and your eye fucking.”
“Does it make you want me again?” Thran played up his posing.

“I always want you, cariad. But only if you want me, too.”

“Always the gentleman,” Thran dropped his posing and drew Bard into his embrace. “I am the happiest and most fortunate of men.”

“I am, too.” Bard stroked Thran’s hair, his cheek, his throat, then pressed a kiss on Thran’s shoulder.

They lay in each other’s arms for a few more moments to savor their closeness. Eventually, they got up to wash and don clothes, then went downstairs for a leisurely breakfast. The Egg Puff was Thran’s creation this morning, while Bard made a batch of pumpkin muffins. As they ate, they talked about what to do today before they took the children shopping in the afternoon. When Bard mentioned that he’d hoped to clean out the barn in anticipation of shortly casting Hal’s tree, Thran quickly agreed.

“Of course we must do that,” Thran insisted. “Nothing must stand in the way of your return to your art, Bard. You have labored long and hard for us here in the house, and now that it is mostly done, you must have the time to see to your workshop. I will help.”

“No dancing today?”

Thran exhaled. “Yes, I should do my barre. But chert, lyubov moya, I will be sick and tired of so many barres, so many rehearsals, very soon. Today, I want to play hooky to be with you and our family.”

The look on Thran’s face was so wistful that Bard couldn’t resist it. He reached out to stroke Thran’s hand with a single finger.

“They come play hooky with me in the barn, then with the children at the mall. We’ll have a day of fun before Immortal gets serious.”

Thran’s snort couldn’t disguise his appreciation, or his glee. “Yes, yes! Come, finish your breakfast, my saint. The barn awaits!”

Bard didn’t protest. He shoveled the last bit of his muffin in his mouth – this was a new recipe, rich with molasses and raisins, well worth making again – and hastened after his husband to clean up the kitchen. They dressed in sturdy work jeans, shirts, and boots, left a note on the kitchen island for the children about where they were, and headed out to the barn.

“Were there ever animals in this barn, Bard?” Thran asked as he helped Bard to put the two remaining porch floorboards up into the rafters with the rest of the spare lumber. “It seems very small for that. And there are no stalls.”

“I don’t think so, angel,” Bard agreed. “It’s a great size for a workshop and then some, but you’re right, it’s too small for horses or cows. It doesn’t smell like it’s ever had animals in it, either. Plus it’s got a concrete floor underneath the floorboards, and the construction’s a bit more modern than what was used for the house. Somebody might’ve built it as a folly, I suppose, but I think it was a workshop right from the start. Maybe carpentry – I’ve found a few old nails and such, and when we moved in there were some scraps of nice wood – cherry, walnut, and so forth. I made the walnut countertop in the butler’s pantry from one of the pieces.”

“That is a beautiful piece of wood,” Thran nodded. “Such a beautiful, satiny finish.”

“A lot of paste wax and elbow grease,” Bard grinned. “But worth it. It looks like it’s always been
“It does.” The last board went up, and Bard climbed down from the crates under the chin-up bar. “So what is your plan for this?”

“Mostly just clean out the dirt,” Bard exhaled. “There’s not much mess to speak of – even at the end, I kept things more or less in place. But I don’t want to crank up the forge or the metal furnace with so much dust in here. That stuff’s flammable.”

Thran hummed, looking around the workshop. “We need a lot of cloths, then. Everything is well coated.”

“Oh, I can go one better than that,” Bard grinned, pulling out a wheeled vacuum from under one of the workbenches. “Dust cloths move the dust around, but don’t actually get it out of here. The faithful industrial shop vacuum will be just the trick.”

“So do we vacuum first and then arrange, or the reverse?” Thran asked pulling his bottom lip as he studied the vacuum.

“Both,” Bard conceded. “Arranging stuff will stir up a lot of dust, so we should try to get the worst up first, then six times along the way, then once again with feeling at the end.”

Thran chuckled. “I know how to vacuum, so perhaps I should start with that?”

“Sounds good. We’d better clean off the overhead lights first, before they get too hot to touch, then we can see what we’re doing. And I’ll wash the windows – more light is good.”

“Then I will vacuum the walls and the floor. Floor first, I think. It is very dusty.”

Bard fetched the stepladder to reach the light fixtures, wiped them clean, and then set on the big window at the end of the barn, both inside and out. While he washed, Thran vacuumed the walls and floor thoroughly. Despite their care, they still stirred up a lot of dust, so Bard switched on the exhaust fan and opened the windows, which soon cleared the air.

Once the worst of the loose dust was gone, Bard moved the boxes and bins of things from under workbenches and out of corners so Thran could vacuum the spaces. A quick wipe of the bins, and back they went in place. After an hour or so, Tilda roused, so they got the boys up to join her for breakfast. They engulfed most of the rest of the muffins and a lot of eggs. Then the children wanted to see what their fathers were up to. Legolas in particular seemed drawn to poke around the workshop, asking what this or that was for. Tilda was her usual generous soul, and collected the loose remnants of rebar that had rolled here and there and stacked them upright in a corner. They puttered through the various bins and containers, Bard offering commentary about what was what when asked.

“Don’t you get cold out here in the winter, Bard?” Legolas asked.

“Not when I’m casting,” Bard replied. “The furnace that heats the metal keeps things quite warm, and so does the forge. If I’m not doing either of those, I have a space heater.”

“How will you make the metal tree from your clay model?”

“There are a couple ways to go,” Bard said. “There’s the lost wax method, which is very time consuming. Well, all of it takes time, but the lost wax takes a very long time because you have to coat the mold you want to cast from with lots and lots and lots of coats of wax. There’s forging, of course, which is what blacksmiths do. But for the tree, I’ll make a mold from a special kind of sand called green sand. It’s good for small pieces. I’ll do the tree in sections, then weld them together. It’s been a while since I last cast anything. It may take me a try or two to get it right.”

“I hope it goes right from the start,” Legolas wished, drawing Bard’s appreciative smile.

“So do I,” he said. “But it’ll be fun, either way. That’s the important thing.”

They puttered in the barn until lunchtime, at which point Thran gave the barn floor one more thorough vacuuming. No longer did the workshop look abandoned – it was ready to host an artist again. Bard’s fingers itched to get started on Hal’s tree.

Thran switched off the vacuum and looked around with a satisfied smile. “I hope you did not have to sell much of your equipment?”

Bard shook his head. “I didn’t sell any of it. For the small pieces I cast myself, I don’t need anything too bulky. I’d cobbled together some of it myself, so it wasn’t anything I could sell. When I needed to cast a larger piece, I contracted it out, or worked in trade.”

“So you are officially back to work now, because we have cleaned,” Thran said, but then his expression turned into something inspired. “We must properly toast the reopening of the Clan Ffyrnig forge, yes? Wait here!”

He ran into the house, leaving Bard and the children to look after him with mystified expressions.

“Don’t look at me,” Legolas shook his head. “I have no idea what Papa intends to do.”

The mystery was soon solved when Thran reappeared balancing a small tray of shot glasses. As he walked briskly back to the barn, Bard saw that two of the glasses contained something clear, and the other three contained juice.

“The juice is for you, children.” Thran held out his tray to Legolas, Bain, and Tilda. “Come, each of you take one, so we can toast the rejuvenation of the barn. Now, you, Bard, and me.”

Bard took one of the small glasses to sniff – vodka, icy cold. Thran took the last glass, set down the tray, and held his free hand up in an imitation of a conjuring wizard. “Hold up your glass, everyone. I will make the blessing, and then we will drink. Ready? Okay! Blagoslovi etot saray i khudozhnika v nem! Now drink!”

Thran tossed back his shot of vodka, and the children imitated him to gulp down their juice. Bard held his glass up to Thran in amused salute, and tossed his vodka down. The icy mouthful silked a cool trail down his throat and coiled in his stomach where it quickly warmed. It was too high in quality to make him wheeze or cough, but he’d better follow it with some lunch soon if he didn’t want to feel more of its power.

“What did we just drink to?” he asked. Gods, the warmth rising in his belly would raise a dead man frozen in the Arctic.

Thran smirked, all too aware of what Bard felt. “We Russians do not have a lot of formal toasts, so I made my own. I asked to bless this barn and the artist in it. Short, and apt.”

“Then I guess I’m open for business,” Bard agreed. “What do you say, children? We give it three cheers?”

“Yeah, Da!” Tilda agreed, jumping up and down. “Three cheers!”
“Hip, hip!” Bard said to begin.

“Hooray!” Bain and Tilda chorused with Bard.

“Hip, hip!”

“Hooray!” Legolas and Thran joined the rest.

“Hip, hip!”

“Hooray!”

“Now Clan Ffyrnig Forge rises like the phoenix!” Thran said grandly, drawing Bard’s laughter.

“I think it’s time to have some lunch to offset the effects of the toasting lubricant.” Bard unplugged the shop vacuum, coiled its cord, and stowed it back under the workbench. “What about you, children?”

“Yes, lunch,” Tilda agreed.

“Thank you, everyone, for helping;” Bard said, as everyone filtered out of the barn. He shut and locked the windows, then pulled down the bay door to follow them to the mudroom. “Come tomorrow, I can work in there for the first time in a long time. That’ll feel great.”

He already felt pretty good, and not just thanks to a shot of high-test vodka on an empty stomach. His silly husband and three cheering children had much to do with it, too.

* * *

Lunch was hearty – thick sandwiches for the children and Bard, and a thinner one for Thran. Despite all the labor he’d exerted in the barn, Thran still didn’t indulge in too much bread. He had a very nice chicken sandwich on thin wafers of bread, seasoned with a little cheese and a lot of lettuce and tomato and seasoning. The boys, on the other hand, made massive pumpernickel bagel sandwiches piled high with everything Bard put on the kitchen island. Tilda preferred to eat just the chicken and fillings, but she didn’t stint herself on the cheese and crackers. A big bowl of raw vegetables was soon emptied, and so was another of fruit. Bard had finally stopped waiting for everyone else to eat before he did, thank the gods, so he had a full plate with the rest of them. After lunch, everyone did a quick cleanup of the house, and collected laundry. Bard made the grocery list for tomorrow’s shopping, and Thran and Bain started the first load of laundry while Tilda and Legolas scrubbed the children’s bathroom. Bard did the half bath, so by the time Sigrid came through the mudroom door the house was in decent trim and the laundry was well underway.

“Hooray, Sigrid’s home!” Tilda ran through the house announcing her sister’s arrival. "Now we can go shopping!"

Off they went.

As Thran drove, he listened with a smile as Bard laid out the afternoon’s itinerary. First to the local department store for socks, underwear, basic shorts, and tees. After that, the mall for whatever they hadn’t found at the department store, and if they had time to look, a dress for Tilda.
“So lads, you’re with Thran, and lasses, you’re with me,” Bard finished. “Everybody got it?”

“Aye, Captain,” Thran gave Bard a crooked grin. “The crew is ready to beam down to the department store.”

Bard pointed through the windshield at the parking lot ahead. “Then make it so, Number One.”

They forged into the department store. Ah, good – the boys’ and girls’ sections were beside one another, so Thran could observe how Bard shopped with the girls. Each child had a list of things to get, and Bard held the basket and the list to tick off each item they chose. That kept the children from having to carry everything, and gave Bard the chance to oversee their selections. Bain and his sisters were well used to the routine, sorting through the boring part quickly. Legolas was no more interested in socks and underpants than Bain was, but they lingered over the selection of printed tee shirts and shorts. Bard was already outside the dressing room, waiting for Tilda and Sigrid, when the boys ran in to try on shorts.

“You’re about to get a lesson in the hard part,” Bard murmured as he set down his basket full of the girls’ clothing.

“Am I? How so?”

“Oh, gods,” Thran winced. “Our Sigrid?”

“Brace for impact, Number One.”

Tilda and the boys appeared first, but none of their selections raised much of a stir, other than the rude tee that the boys tried to sneak past their fathers. Thran unleashed enough of his patented Prince of Ice stare that the boys meekly returned the shirts to the rack. Tilda’s shorts and tops were sturdy and comfortable, and Thran was glad to see that none of the shirts had princesses on them. Cute animals, however, were frequent adornments. The one-piece swimsuit was bright aqua with white polka dots, and a distinct lack of ruffles. At least one of the Clan Ffyrnig girls was of practical mien in the pool; whether Sigrid would be remained to be seen.

“All good, little doll,” Bard nodded. “How’s your sister doing?”

Tilda rolled her eyes, looking remarkably like both her older sister and Bain at the same time. “Sigrid takes a long time.”

“I do not,” the girl in question retorted. “I helped you with your things, didn’t I?”

Sigrid had on a pair of blue twill shorts and a pale yellow camp shirt. Bard nodded at her outfit.

“Those are good, sweetness.”

“I’ve got another three pairs of shorts to sort through, and six tops.”

“And how many swimsuits?”

“Six. And don’t say it. I know the drill about the swimsuits.”

“The drill?” Thran leaned close to murmur to Bard when Sigrid went back into the dressing room.
“What is this drill, lyubov moya?”

“She has to be able to actually swim in the swimsuit,” Bard leaned close to murmur in reply. “That tends to keep the flimsy ones at bay.”

Thran smothered a chuckle. “And what about the boys?”

“They’re usually easy. They either get wild flowers or bright things that Piet Mondrian would love.”

“What, no Speedos?”

“Gods,” Bard grimaced in laughter. “This isn’t Europe.”

Thran eyed him. “Pity. You would look delicious in one.”

“Look who’s talking,” Bard snarked back. “I’ll stick to my usual cut off jeans.”

“You will look delicious in anything, or nothing.” Thran teased.

“What are you two sniggering about?” Sigrid reappeared to put her hands on her hips.

“Speedo swimsuits,” Bard shot back. “For guys.”

“Ew, Da.” Sigrid made a disgusted face. “They make great suits for females, but there aren’t many guys who can wear one with any authority, present company excepted, and that’s only because neither of you eat enough, and you’re too skinny.”

Thran cast Bard a commiserating look. “The lioness flexes her claws.”

“We’ll have our chance to flex ours, just as soon as she tries on her choice of swimsuit.” Bard made shooing motions. “Hop to it, sweetness.”

Sigrid stuck her tongue out at her father, drawing both his and Thran’s laughter, so Sigrid gave a snort and flounced back into the dressing room. By the time she came out again in another pair of shorts and top, she ignored them both to look at herself in the mirror.

“That are good,” Bard called.

“I have two more just like these shorts in different colors. Do you need to see those, too?”

“That’s the rule.”

She rolled her eyes again and flounced back in the dressing room, but she dutifully appeared in both pairs. In between appearances, the boys appeared in swimsuits and shorts and tees, all run of the mill. It was interesting to see Legolas watch Bain, then Bain watch Legolas, who tended to like things with more tailored lines. They both ended up with a pile of things right from the start; after the rude tee, neither ventured into that again.

Sigrid finally appeared in the swimsuits, all one piece, all attractive, all swimworthy one-pieces, until she got to the last one. It was a small bikini, but not outrageously so. The look of pale defiance on Sigrid’s face was matched by an equally mild look on Bard’s – how would the contest turn out?

“That one’s nice,” Barn nodded, without cracking a smile.

“Really?” Sigrid blurted, too surprised to stifle her outburst.
“Yes, really,” Bard nodded, giving his daughter an amused look. “What? You don’t like it? Oh, I get it – you put on one you really don’t like, trying to crank your old Da.”

“No, no, I like this one,” Sigrid hastened to assure Bard. “I just... didn’t think you’d...”

“It looks very nice,” Thran offered. “No, that is not the right thing to tell you, lioness. I will tell you what I told your Da about how to shop. Buy only clothes that you wear. Not clothes that wear you. You want people to look at you, not your clothes, you see? So you wear that very nicely, as you do all the things you have chosen, except perhaps the pink blouse. I did not think the color suited you as well as the other things you chose.”

Sigrid’s face waxed thoughtful, then she smiled. “You’re right, Ada. That’s a smart way to look at it. So... I want to try the pink one again, now that you’ve told me that.”

She disappeared into the dressing room yet again. Legolas and Bain rolled their eyes and muttered about being here forever, so Thran turned to them.

“Have both of you gotten everything on your lists? If no, then find the rest. If yes, then you may go look at the games, but only look. We are here for clothing, not games.”

The boys took the armload of clothes from Thran to sort them out and make sure their list was complete. Tilda did the same thing with her stack, but by the time they were through, Sigrid came out with her armload of things.

“All right, I’ve decided. You were right about the pink blouse, Ada, so I got a green one instead. Um, Da...”

Bard went off to the side with her to bend an ear down to her whispered words. He nodded, agreeing to something, which earned him a grateful smile from his oldest child. Everyone gathered up their things, and they headed for the registers.

Their next stop was the mall, where they aimed for the specialty shoe store; all of the children needed good athletic shoes. As the children moved ahead of them, Thran gave Bard a close look.

“What did Sigrid ask you in the department store?”

Bard smiled. “She asked if she could get two swimsuits. Since one of them was practical, I let the bikini go. It looked fine, and it earned me a little karma.”

Thran chuckled. “You need no more karma, lyubov moya. But you do need shorts, and you got none.”

“You didn’t get any, either.”

Thran waved a hand at the children ahead of them. “It was more important to sort through their things. I can go another time.”

“Spoken like a parent. I thought the same thing. You and I can go some morning if we want.”

“Perfect, my saint. Today, then, is the children’s day.”

They sped up after their children, invaded the shoe store, engaged in a flurry of shoe fitting, and soon emerged with four new pairs of athletic trainers. They descended upon an outdoor outfitters’ store for sturdy sandals.
“Can we look for my dress now?” Tilda asked plaintively, looking up at her father as they came out of the outfitters’ store and back into the mall.

Bard pulled out his mobile to check the time. “We’ve got time, little doll. So let’s go see what we can find.”

“Do we have to go, too?” Bain protested. “Legs and I don’t care about a lot of frilly dresses!”

“May we go down to the media store and look at the new games?” Legs asked on the heels of his brother’s protest.

Thran gave Bard an inquiring look. At Bard’s miniscule nod, he said, “You have both been very patient, yes. So perhaps half an hour at the game store would be a good reward.”

“Yes, that’d be awesome,” Bain replied with his usual enthusiasm. “Yeah, Legs?”

“Yes, thank you, Papa.”

“Then we will meet you...” Thran looked around, and pointed. “There. By the fountain in thirty minutes.”

“Okay!” Legs managed, but Bain was already pulling him towards the game shop.

“That’ll reduce the noise level,” Bard shook his head, chuckling. “All right, little doll, off to the dresses.”

Thran took the lead now, choosing a store that he knew carried well-made clothing for adults. It stood to reason, then, that their children’s department would be equally well stocked. So it proved, and Tilda had several racks of dresses to choose from. Bard let Tilda look through the selections herself, which she did by touching all the fabrics. This one was too scratchy, that one felt sticky, and this one was a weird color.

“Look at this one, Til,” Sigrid offered. She held out a pale yellow sleeveless dress with a beribboned Empire waistline. It came to just past the knee and had a small bumblebee in the center of the ribbons.

“Ooh, it’s a bee dress,” Tilda smiled. “And it has the same kind of fluffy stuff on top as your blue dress does.”

“It comes in green, too,” Sigrid pointed.

“I like the yellow one. It’s like my room,” Tilda decided.

“Turn around, then,” Bard wiggled his finger at her. “Let’s see which one might fit you.”

He held the dress up to Tilda’s back, checking if it fit her shoulders. “I think this one might be too small, Til. Sigrid, would you find the next bigger one?”

Sigrid looked through the rack, but shook her head regretfully. “There’s one two sizes bigger. Try that one.”

She exchanged the smaller one for the bigger one, and Bard held that one up. “I think it’ll be okay, Sig. Tilda, why don’t you try this one on?”

“I’ll help you, Til,” Sig said. “It’s got a zipper in the back.”
“Okay, Sigrid. Thank you.” Tilda headed towards the dressing room, so Bard put the dress in Sigrid’s hands, and off they went. In a few moments, Tilda appeared, looking very pleased with herself.

“It looks great with your trainers,” Bard teased.

“Oh, Da,” Tilda put her arms akimbo to frown at him. “You always say that.”

“You’d miss it if I didn’t,” Bard replied. “But it looks nice even with your trainers.”

“It does, indeed,” Thran supplied, for the little girl did look sweet so dressed up. “I think you have grown a great deal since Christmas, yes? Two whole sizes!”

“I think I have,” Tilda agreed. She looked at herself in the mirror. “I like it. It’s not scratchy on the inside, and it’s nice and airy so I won’t get too hot, and it has a bumblebee on it.”

“Perfect all around,” Bard agreed. “Let’s just check the price –”

“The price is fine,” Thran inserted smoothly. “It suits our Tilda exactly, and it is comfortable and pretty and cute, and that means that it is perfect, and whatever it costs is the cost of perfection.”

Bard’s eyes met Thran’s, but Thran kept his gaze serene and smiling, so Bard nodded. “All good points. So you’re sure that’s the one? Don’t you want to try on any of the others?”

“No, I like this one,” Tilda nodded definitely enough that Sigrid rolled her eyes.

“Gods, another one afflicted with the Bowman shopping curse,” she sighed. At Thran’s inquisitive look, she chuckled. “We go in, we see what we want, we try it on, we buy it, and then we leave. It’s not just Bain who does it – it’s all of us.”

“Very efficient, indeed,” Thran agreed. “So we need only one more thing. You and Kukla need shoes to wear with your dresses.”

“I’d forgotten about that,” Bard exhaled. “Okay, on to the shoe department.”

“Better to go to the discount store for those,” Sigrid suggested. “We won’t wear them very often, right? Tilda might even grow out of them by the time we have another fancy thing. So don’t waste money on expensive shoes if we’ll only wear them once or twice.”

“An excellent point,” Bard agreed, so they paid for Tilda’s dress, and found the discount shoe store. Sigrid found some strappy silver sandals, and Tilda opted for black ballet flats to match her bumblebee dress. At last, laden with bags, they returned to the fountain in the center of the mall court to wait for Bain and Legolas.

“Bet you have to go in a haul them out,” Sigrid warned.

“Maybe we will,” Bard agreed. “But that’s okay. They’ve behaved themselves all day.”

“It’s good to sit down for a minute, anyway,” Sigrid sighed.

“Yeah,” Tilda agreed, leaning back to look over her head at the splashing fountain. “I’m hungry. What’s for supper?”

They considered the possibilities while they waited for the boys. At about ten minutes after their meeting time, just as Thran was about to go into the game store after them, the boys straggled out. Spotting the rest of the clan, the boys trotted over.
“Did you see the next generation of zombie apocalypses?” Bard teased.

The boys looked at each other. “Actually, we did,” Legolas admitted. “It looks awesome.”

“Yeah,” Bain agreed. “There was this really nasty ogre zombie that spurted –”

“La, la, la!” Tilda babbled, sticking her fingers in her ears, and crossing her eyes. “I don’t want to know, la, la, la!”

“All right, everyone,” Bard got up from his chair. “Time to beam up, Scotty!”

That got a laugh from the rest of the clan, so they handed around the bags of shoes and clothes and returned to Thran’s SUV. It took little time to return home, where laundry resumed – supplemented by various bits of newly acquired clothing – and supper got underway.

“A successful foray,” Thran observed, as he and Bard lay in bed later that evening. The children were all in bed, restoring themselves for the new week of school that would begin in just a few hours.

“A successful day,” Bard amended, drawing Thran close. “A decadent one for you, cariad. You played hooky from the dance, you messed about in the barn, you climbed on ladders and wrested order from chaos with a shop vacuum, and we kept the mall and then some financially afloat for the next month.”

Thran chuckled. “I feel like quite the superhero who adventures in the comic books, yes?”

“They call them graphic novels now.”

“Oh. Graphic novels, then. Excuse me. But no matter the fancy names, I have lived the fantasy life today, yes? Ventured where no mortal dares go, into a dusty barn armed only with my trusty vacuum and broom. Dared the ire of annoyed teenagers who want rude tee shirts and skimpy swimsuits and upgraded zombie apocalypses. And narrowly avoided a life of slavery at the feet of a small Kukla in an adorable bumblebee dress.”

“You have had a busy day,” Bard chuckled as he stroked Thran’s hair. “Don’t yell at me for saying thank you for making the financial aspect of the day possible. I provided the family bit, which was just as important. And you don’t know the peace of mind you gave me today. To see the children have a few new things, especially Tilda’s dress, and not worry about whether we can afford them... the best present of all.”

“I did not have to buy Legolas things and know that I would not see him wear them, enjoy them, outgrow them, because we would be apart. That is another good present.”

“Then we both got presents that money can’t buy,” Bard murmured, pressing a kiss on Thran’s hair. “Better than gold. So much better than gold.”

As Thran stroked Bard’s chest, he heartily agreed.
Chapter 130

Chapter Summary

Both the angel and the saint have reason to invoke the gods on a Monday.

Chapter Notes

To all of you:

This has been a painful and shocking day for me, as I'm sure it has been for so many of you. For the first time in years, I wasn't able to write. So while this is a short chapter, consider it my act of quiet defiance that I would not let setbacks keep me from something I loved, or from offering my love to all of you.

Stay strong, stay safe, and know that I love you.

EldritchMage

Monday could have been the start of Thran’s new routine for the next eight weeks. Starting today, he would go to the children’s school at noon, and work there with his fellow company members until late each night. He would be late going to bed, and would correspondingly be late to rise if he wanted to stay properly rested for these last few weeks of effort before Immortal’s premiere. That meant, of course, that all the morning preparation to feed the children, make their lunches, and see them to the bus stop would fall to Bard. All the evening supper preparation, homework duty, and bathing would also fall to Bard. In between times, Bard would labor to support a fledgling artistic career. His husband would bear a heavy load, then.

Thran would bear a heavy load, too. Of course the concentrated effort to bring Immortal to life would take its physical toll. But to see his family so rarely – perhaps only on the weekends – was a heavy mental load, too.

So many heavy loads were what kept Thran from beginning his new routine today. Today, at least, he would be beside Bard to help with the morning tasks, and to see his children.

When Bard’s clock radio alarm went off, Thran let his husband take his turn in the bathroom first, then he dressed and prepared himself for the morning routine. With Bard, he made porridge and sandwiches and tea, packed lunch bags, and saw the children onto the bus. With Bard, he checked the pantry and refrigerator for missing items, added to the shopping list, and went to the market to replenish the family’s stores. That was no chore, really; the market was a constant source of wonder – Bard called it the place of infinite possibilities – that never failed to entice him to taste an unfamiliar kind of cheese, admire an unexpected flurry of beautiful flowers, or smell hot bread and rolls coming out of the vast ovens. Neither was it a chore to help Bard unload their purchases, stock their pantry, decide what to have for supper today and tomorrow, and load the refrigerator and freezer accordingly. They dashed out again to the department store to buy themselves a few pairs of shorts, plain tees and shirts, and a couple of swimsuits. Then they shared an early lunch so that Thran would have a couple of hours for his meal to digest before he danced. Despite Thran’s excitement about Immortal, he savored this time with his husband to share the everyday duties that kept Clan Ffynig running in top form.

“Bard? I am off, and I leave, too,” Thran called, as he came downstairs in his dancewear with his bag over his shoulder.

“In the kitchen, angel. I’ve got your supper packed.” Thran came down the hall to find Bard stacking his bento boxes and strapping them together. “If you text me when you leave to come home, I’ll put on something warm for you.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya.” Thran took his bag off his shoulder to put the stacked boxes inside. “I have little idea of what to expect today, so we may end early, or we may stay late. I will text you as soon as know something.”

“I’ll be here,” Bard said easily. He gave Thran a grin. “Do your best, just like always.”

“So I shall. And you do your best, too.”

“Always.” Bard walked out with Thran to the carriage house. “Call if you need anything, and I’ll see you when you get home.”

Thran offered Bard a humble kiss. “You are the best husband. Here I go to work the evening shift, and you are gracious throughout.”

“It’s not forever, cariad. Besides, the barn will have my time now just as the ballet stage will have yours. We both have muses to serve, and we have to serve them away from each other. That’s what life is now.”

“True,” Thran nodded. “I accept that without complaint. But as soon as the painters are gone, lyubov moya, let us have our game in the solarium. That is the last room of the house that we want to christen, and let us do so in glorious fashion sooner rather than later.”

“Oh, I think we’ll manage that,” Bard gave him a caressing look up and down before pressing a kiss at the edge of Thran’s jaw. “Without doubt, we’ll manage that the first chance we have.”

“Then I go to school reconciled. Speak to your muse, then, while I speak to mine.”

“Until later, angel. Love you.”

“I love you, too.”

Thran got into his SUV, gave Bard a smile and a wave as he went by, and headed out into the lane. Behind him, Bard stood watching him until he was out of sight.

The Imladris Academy was barely a few miles away, but Thran sighed. This was the beginning of much more than a fifteen-minute journey, and he tensed as he thought of the hazards that hid among the glories he knew so well. To bring a ballet to life, especially a brand new one, was exhausting, frustrating, nerve-wracking, and desolate. At the same time, it was intoxicating, glorious, transcendent, and transformative.

It was also as addictive as light to a moth.

Thran had already flung himself into that light with such abandon that he’d forgotten all else, and driven his longsuffering husband so far past rage that it had taken his breath away. He couldn’t do that again. He just couldn’t.

All the gods, help me.

* * *

Bard headed back inside once Thran’s SUV disappeared. He waved to Darla and her two apprentices, already up on their scaffolding to continue their work on the outside of the house. The first coat was almost complete, and in a day or so, the painters would start on the second one. That one would go faster, and once it was done the porch would be next, and the interior doors. Bard worked in the kitchen to make cookies for the children’s lunches and a simple sheet cake for supper’s dessert, then started a basic chicken soup for Thran’s late evening supper.

Finally, at last, it was time to head to the barn. Today, for the first time in years, he would go into his workshop and work on his art.

First, he replenished his supply of green sand, the molding medium into which he poured liquid metal during casting. Green sand was a mixture of fine play box sand – what Sigrid had once dubbed as sugar sand, so fine was it – plus bentonite clay and water. It was easy to make from raw materials he already had on hand. Bentonite clay was nothing more than clumping cat litter ground as fine as flour, something he did in a homemade grinder. He still had a bucket of that, tightly sealed against moisture, so he got his mixing bucket, measured out one part clay to nine parts sand, mixed it thoroughly, then spent the next several hours painstakingly adding water and thoroughly mixing the combination until a handful of it held a tight shape. Tomorrow, it would be ready to make the molds for Hal’s tree.

Next, Bard set up the frames to hold the green sand molds during casting. He had a supply of those, but none were long enough to accommodate the base of the tree, so he sorted through his scrap lumber for boards the right size. A few brackets, and he was set. While he worked, he thought about how best to do the delicate branches of the tree – in pieces, of course, but he had to decide how to divide the branches up for casting. He’d have to weld all the pieces together after casting, and he wanted the resulting assembly to look seamless.

He grinned. It was so good to have a technical challenge again.

Thank you, gods.

* * *

Thran passed through the lobby of the Imladris Academy on his way to the administrative offices. He, like everyone in UltraViolet Ballet who would work at the school, had to register with the office staff, and sit for the photograph that would appear on his access badge. In one of their many conversations, Lettie had told him that the administrative staff had wanted all of the dancers to wear these badges at all times when they were in the building, but had finally conceded that that was impractical given the nature of the their work, so they could set them aside in the auditorium and its close environs. Badge acquired, Thran carried his bag down to the auditorium and slipped inside. Ori, Lettie, and Abebe were already there, conferring with Círdan as several students scurried to and fro to work on the Immortal set, so Thran joined them.

“Hi, Thran,” Lettie greeted. “Círdan’s telling us where he and his crews are on the stage design.”

“I am in good time, then,” Thran replied, smiling a greeting at everyone. “Please excuse my interruption, Círdan.”

The set designer nodded in appreciation of Thran’s courtesy, and resumed his explanation. He pointed to the large circular platform as he spoke.

“The metal frame underneath looks almost like a spider’s web,” Círdan explained. “There are ribs from the center to the edge, and concentric circles that brace the ribs. At each intersection of circle and rib is a wheel made of a composite that turns quietly. Tracks underneath the wheels hold the platform steady. A plywood floor is laid over top of the frame, and a membrane dancing surface is on top of the plywood. The membrane is expensive, but it provides an important level of safety for the dancers.”

“The vertical walls that separate the troll market from the blank part are on top,” Ori said. “That’s a lot of weight. Will the students be able to turn it as you planned?”

“They will,” Círdan affirmed. “The composite wheels make the platform easy to turn. We’ve finished the edge of the platform to include small handholds, so the team of students who will turn the platform – they’d dubbed themselves the Theatre Ninjas – will space themselves along the back edge, and push and pull out of sight of the audience to turn the platform as we need.”

“The Theatre Ninjas?” Ori grinned.

“Yeah! Go, Theatre Ninjas!” A short, muscular boy loping past exhorted Ori with a muscle man flex of his arms and a big grin.

“Thank you, Marvin,” Círdan waved a hand at the boy. He cast an amused smile on those around him. “The wrestling team volunteered en masse to do the turning.”

An appreciative chuckle rippled through Círdan’s audience.

“How quiet is the platform when it turns?” Thran asked.

“Very,” Círdan answered. He looked towards the retreating boy. “Marvin! Would you collect enough of the Ninjas to turn the stage for me, please?”

“Absolutely!” Marvin gave a goofy bow in reply before turning to several of the students scattered about the stage. “Ninjas! Time to rock and roll!”

Five other boys sorted themselves out, all of them wearing black tees that bore the same logo printed in white on the front. As they drew closer, the logo revealed itself to be a high-soaring ninja warrior at full kick; their name, Theatre Ninjas, appeared above and below the ninja.

“Great shirts!” Abebe applauded.

One of the boys gave the ballet master a wave. “Thanks! My mom’s a silkscreen artist, and she made these for us. For a little esprit de corps, she said.”

“Yeah, as if we needed any,” a third boy laughed. “But Takashi’s Mom is great like that.”

“She is,” Ori agreed. “Very cool!”
“A full turn around, gentlemen, if you please,” Círdan asked.

“Coming up, Mr. C.,” Marvin replied, as the boys positioned themselves. “Hop on for the ride.”

“Yes, do,” Círdan waved the group onto the platform. “Thran, you especially will want to find out what the platform feels like in motion.”

“Of course,” Thran nodded, stepping up onto the platform. Once everyone was aboard, the Ninjas turned the platform. As it rotated easily, Thran walked forward to keep his position to the boys so he could watch how they worked. The motion of the platform was smooth and even, without jerks or bumps, which would help. When the platform had completed its revolution, the boys stopped it. The boys on each end slipped wedges against two of the wheels to hold it steady.

“Nothing to it!” one of the boys gave his observers a cocky grin. “Smooth ride, too, right?”

“Very,” Lettie agreed. “Well done!”

The boys offered pleased smiles.

Many of the dancers as well as Irmo had come into the auditorium while the Theatre Ninjas had demonstrated how the platform rotated, and stepped forward now for a closer look. The Ninjas set the platform in motion again for the new arrivals, so Thran stepped off to confer with Lettie, Irmo, Abebe, and Ori about the plan for the day. A girl came in, asking about where to put portable ballet barres, so Ori scurried off to point her to the gymnasium. The barres would fit into an equipment room out of the way of the students during the day, then unfolded when the dancers arrived to do their warmups. He returned a few minutes later to say that the barres were in place, and ready for the dancers to begin their warmup. Thran and the rest of the dancers followed Ori to the gymnasium, and the dancers began their limbering stretches. Ori found a dry mop and unabashedly ran it up and down the floor, drawing appreciative smiles from the dancers. He drew applause when he pushed an upright piano into the gymnasium a few minutes later.

The dancers took their places at the barre, and began the day’s work. Lettie played the piano for them, and Thran set aside all but the familiar routine and discipline of the dance. By the end, he was thoroughly warmed and centered, and ready to begin the day’s rehearsal.

They trooped en masse back to the auditorium. For the rest of the afternoon, they got used to the confines of the stage, and walked through each scene one by one, first to adjust their positioning relative to the physical set, and then to actually dance it. The rotating central platform was set a little to the back of the space, so they had the front of the stage as well as both sides of it to fill. Abebe and Irmo wanted to make sure that all of the dancers became comfortable with the step up from the stage to the platform and avoided injury.

As Thran expected, this first rehearsal on stage was disjointed and distracting. For the first time, the lighting crew was seeing dancers onstage, and made frequent adjustments to the lights. Círdan and his students and assistants prowled the set to consider side scenery as well as the structure of the troll market. Sound came and went as the crews considered how to cue the music. But this was typical, and Thran and the other dancers were used to such turmoil early in rehearsal. They kept their focus on the scenes on the mortal world and ignored the hammering and banging and calls back and forth as so many people labored on the other side of the platform walls to bring the troll market to life.

A brief break allowed Thran to snatch a few bites of the meal Bard had packed for him. While he munched, he kept his body moving gently, staying warm so that when he resumed dancing he didn’t have to warm up again. Irmo came to stand beside him.
“These are not easy conditions for rehearsal,” the choreographer grumbled, rubbing his chin with an exasperated hand. “The lights are not right, the sound is off, the stage is not yet built.”

“That will settle in a few days,” Thran offered. “We have practiced a great deal in the studio, in the ballroom. We need this time onstage so that our placement is perfect, our timing is perfect – we are perfect.”

Irmo’s shrug was reluctant, but conceded the validity of Thran’s points. “I hope so. I want to bring in the rigging crew for the flying. The Maid and the Soldier... it will be relatively easy to have them fly to heaven, because it will merely be from the floor of the stage straight up. To fly Death onto the battlefield will be more difficult.”

“Because you want me to fly over the audience,” Thran pointed up to the auditorium ceiling. “We do not know if that is possible yet.”

Irmo shrugged again, and with as much reluctance. “So we need to bring in the rigging crew as soon as possible to find out.”

“Ori works to arrange it,” Thran replied. Poor Ori – the young man already had so much to do, but Thran would have a word with him once Irmo turned his attention elsewhere. “He will let us know what is possible as soon as he knows.”

“Soon... please,” Irmo remembered to say.

“Of course,” Thran replied blandly, not smiling at Irmo’s hard won courtesy. Even if the choreographer sounded more truculent than not, at least he’d made the effort. Irmo nodded, and drifted away to talk to Abebe. Thran took the chance to find Ori and relay Irmo’s latest request.

“I knew he’d want to get on that sooner rather than later,” Ori said, scrolling over his tablet. “I’ve got a list of three firms to call. I’ll do that tomorrow, and let you know what I find out when I see you.”

“Thank you, Ori. I do not have to tell you to find one exquisitely concerned with safety, since it is I whom Irmo wants to hurl atop the heads of the audience. At least Charisse and Luka have only a shorter trip up, and a much gentler trip down.”

Ori grimaced in commiseration. “Oh, I know it. Maybe they’ll all say that across the top of the audience isn’t a good idea, and you’ll have just the shorter ride down, too.”

“We will soon see,” Thran agreed. “Ah, I am wanted onstage again. Please let me know what you find out tomorrow.”

“Okay, Thran,” Ori waved, and went back to his tablet.

Thran went back to his dancing quickly enough, but he couldn’t resist a look up at the ceiling of the auditorium. It seemed a long way up. From up there, it probably looked like an even longer way down.

He grimaced.

* * *

Gods help me.
Bard still tooled in the barn when the children came home from school. He’d made his molds, finished his green sand, and had decided how to divide the model for Hal’s tree for casting. He’d scrounged up his small bronze ingots left over from casting Sea Spot Run and his pine tree – he had more than enough left for the small tree. He’d cleaned out his melting cauldron and checked over his furnace. On top of all that, he got a sign that more good things were on the way – he’d signed the delivery driver’s recoder for the package of test aluminum spheres for his galaxy sculpture. As the children came breathlessly into the barn, he gave them a big smile, and not just because he was happy to see them. He’d put in a good day’s work, too.

“Hi, children! How was school today?”

“I saw Ada at school today, Da,” Tilda said. “I waved to him. He was doing ballet things in the gym when I went out for sport.”

“Today’s a big day for him,” Bard agreed. “First day on the job, in a way. Have any of you seen the set yet?”

Both Bain and Legolas had, so they described the scene as they went inside to divest themselves of backpacks. The lot of them thundered upstairs to change into their afterschool clothes, then bustled about the kitchen making snacks. There was a flurry of discussion about homework and what to make for supper and whether Thran would make it home in time to eat with them or not. Bard reminded Tilda that Thran might not be here tonight to help her with her French vocabulary words, but Legolas offered to do that duty if she wanted, which pleased Tilda no end. After a few cheese and crackers, Bard sorted out the assignments for the sous chefs and cleanup crew, and got supper underway. Tonight’s menu was poached salmon in broth with dill and onion, onion gratin, green beans, and macaroni and cheese. While everything was in the oven or simmering on the stove, he made a quick vanilla icing to slather over his sheet cake. The children dug in enthusiastically, and even though Bard missed Thran’s smiling presence at the other end of the table, he enjoyed the children’s playful conversation. Once they’d stuffed themselves with as much of the main course as they could, Bard brought out his sheet cake, laughing when the boys’ eyes lit up.

“Whoa, icing!” Bain breathed, nudging Legolas. “Look, Legs! Icing!”

“Yessss,” Legolas licked his lips. His eyes darted to Bard’s. “Spice cake, I hope?”

“Spice cake indeed,” Bard nodded. “Cinnamon, cardamom, allspice, nutmeg, and mace.”

“Oh, yes, yes, yes,” Legolas edged to the front of his chair in anticipation. “Sigrid, if you don’t want yours, I’ll be glad to eat it.”

“Not a chance,” Sigrid grinned in friendly challenge. “I’m not missing Da’s spice cake for anything, icing or not.”

“I like the icing,” Tilda offered, as Bard handed her a slice to pass down to Sigrid.

“I loooooove the icing,” Bain sighed, grinning. “Love, love, love!”

“Pass it down,” Bard said, handing another plateful to Bain to hand to Legolas. He loved to see his family enjoy a meal with such obvious delight.

Thank you, gods.
Chapter 131

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint engage in a little domestic bliss. The saint reaches a milestone, and the angel anticipates flying lessons.

Is a new game in the offing?

Chapter Notes

Hi, all. Thank you so much for all the encouraging messages you've sent me during the last week. You have no idea how much comfort they provided. It's a scary time, but I hope this chapter eases a few jitters. Hang in there, take care of each other, and keep your fingers crossed.

Take a deep breath, everybody. We'll be okay.

❤ ❤ ❤

Bard was in the sitting room when the mudroom door opened. The boys sat in front of the TV, playing the car race game, and Tilda and Bard were on the sofa, sketching together. Sigrid was upstairs, working on a paper. It was just past nine o’clock.

“There’s your Papa, Legs,” Bard called, for the blonde youth was entirely focused on running Bain off the road before Bain did the same to him.

“Papa?” Legolas tore his eyes away from the TV, but jerked his gaze back to the TV before Bain could capitalize on his inattention. “Oh, no you don’t, Bain! I saw that!”

“No, you didn’t,” Bain chortled, speeding up his car to surge ahead of Legolas’s. “It’s clear sailing to the finish line now!”

Legolas madly worked his controller to send his car racing after Bain’s, resulting in a dead heat at the finish line. Bain snorted in disappointment, Legolas grinned because he’d pulled a tie out of the game, and Tilda shook her head.

“I like it better when you drift over the finish line,” she sighed, looking up from her art class workbook.

“I couldn’t let Bain skunk me, Kukla,” Legolas explained earnestly. “No time for flashy moves – I had to get to the finish line as fast as possible.” He set aside the controller and bounced off the sofa to dash into the kitchen. “Papa?”

“I am here,” Thran’s voice came from the mudroom. “Hello, synok!”

“Well, come on,” Bain exhaled as he beckoned to Tilda with mock reluctance. “Show me what you got in your drift, girl.”

“Really?” Tilda’s eyes widened in delight. She put down her workbook and scrambled to take up Legolas’s controller. “Okay!”

“Make it a quick round, you two,” Bard asked as he got up. “It’s after nine, and Bain, you still have to get through the shower.”

“Okay, Da,” Bain said, letting a big grin vanquish his pretended disdain as he and Tilda started a new game. “Here, Til, I’ll call up your Angry Bumble car…”

He left the children’s voices behind as he came into the kitchen. Thran had his arm around Legolas’s shoulders as they bantered in Russian. Both of them were smiling, so Bard took that as a good sign for how Thran’s day went.

“Welcome home, căriad,” he lifted a hand. “I’ll turn up the soup a tad for you. Can I get you anything, Legs? Some mac and cheese?”

“Mmm, mac and cheese,” Legolas smiled in hungry anticipation. “That does sound good. I’ll get it, Bard. Thank you.”

Bard nudged the heat under the pot of chicken soup a hair, then got utensils and plates and bowls out for two and arranged them on the table. Thran disappeared for a few minutes to change into comfortable clothes, and Legolas popped a big bowl of macaroni and cheese into the microwave. As Thran came into the kitchen, Bard put his soup and rolls on the table, then offered him a kiss.

“You two enjoy your snacks, angel. I’ve got water on for tea and afters.”

Thran gave him a grateful smile. “Thank you, lyubov moya. I will say hello to the children, then I will have my soup with Legolas.”

“No hurry. I’ll be in the sitting room. Sing out if I can get you anything.”

Thran stuck his head into the sitting room long enough to greet Tilda and Bain, then retreated to the kitchen table to have his soup. Bard lingered only long enough to make sure Thran had all he needed for his late supper, then left him and Legolas to enjoy their time together. With the sound of soft Russian conversation in his ears, he returned to the sitting room to chuckle over Bain and Tilda’s game. Tilda worked her car gamely; even if the little girl was still learning how to finesse her performance, Bain was no less glad to have someone to indulge in a little video mayhem with him. Bard took up his sketchpad to record the moments – first Bain’s grin and Tilda’s frowning concentration, then a pause as Bain leaned over to show Tilda which button to push and her nod of appreciation, then Bain’s startled chagrin when Tilda gleefully slid under her brother’s car as they careened around a curve. At the end of the game – Tilda accounted for herself respectably – Bard sent Bain upstairs to bathe. Tilda returned to her art workbook, crawling up beside Bard to carefully work through the lesson on perspective.

“You’re going to finish your whole workbook ahead of your class and before the end of school, little doll,” Bard teased her gently. “And then where will you be?”

“I have my other drawing book, the one I got at the used book store,” she reminded Bard, unperturbed. “And after that, I’ll get another one.”

“That’s the best thing for you,” Bard said. “Just keep drawing, over and over and over, anything that strikes you.”
“That’s what you do, and you’ve gotten pretty good at it,” Tilda said with a straight face, though she dimpled when Bard slid her an amused smile.

“That’s thanks,” he returned, just as deadpan. “Maybe if I keep practicing, I’ll be a great artist someday.”

“Oh, Da,” Tilda exhaled gustily. “You already are.”

“Maybe so, little doll. But I still have to practice every day. Just like a musician, or Thran.”

“It takes a lot of work to be a dancer,” Tilda observed.

“It takes a lot of work to be anything,” Bard amended. “Everything worth doing takes practice.”

“That must be why I have to work so many math problems,” Tilda sighed again. “That’s what my math teacher thinks, anyway.”

“They all think that,” Legolas mumbled through a big bite of spice cake. The remains of his chunk were in his hand. “Every single one.”

“Maybe that’s how you know what you should do when you grow up,” Tilda looked up at Legolas. “It’s the subject with homework that you don’t mind doing.”

“Then I’ll never work in anything related to government,” Sigrid said as she came in from the hall. “I’ve never seen anything more boring in my life! Though maybe it’s not the subject, but the teacher. Mr. Saur gets weirder and weirder every day. I can’t concentrate on the subject because he’s just... odd.”

Thran appeared with two big mugs of tea. “Hello, Sigrid! The adventures of the weird Mr. Saur continue, then?”

“Ada! I didn’t know you’d gotten home yet!” Sigrid gave him a welcoming smile. “Oh, who cares about the weirdness of Mr. Saur? How was the ballet today?”

“It comes along.” Thran set one of the cups down in front of Bard and the other beside it so that he could return Sigrid’s hug. “The students are fun to be with, and the school has been very kind to let us practice in the gymnasium until the stage is ready for us. I hope that will be soon, because in a few days the gymnasium will turn into a fantasy for the junior dance.”

Sigrid blushed, and her smile was sweet. Bard sketched quickly; as his daughter appeared on the page, he thought this one would make a great study for a more detailed piece. Sigrid’s expression would make all parents celebrate the blossoming young woman it heralded even as they mourned the child that was no more.

“I don’t think the Imladris Academy stays still for a second,” Bard commented. “Ballets, dances, summer programs, and who knows what else as well as a full schedule for all the students.”

“It’s a busy place,” Legolas agreed. “Maybe your public school in the city was like that, Sigrid, but my boarding school wasn’t. It had lots going on, but it was... quieter, somehow.”

“My city school was busy, but it all seemed like drudgery,” Sigrid replied. “All concrete block, linoleum floors, battered lockers, just... very utilitarian. The Imladris Academy looks like Hogwarts Castle or something. It’s more exciting just to look at.”

“That’s true,” Legolas nodded. “My boarding school was very modern. It was sort of like going to school in an airport terminal. This school is much more beautiful.”
“My old school was grotty,” Tilda declared, wrinkling her nose. “It’s a lot easier to pretend that I go to Hogwarts here, even if I don’t get to learn Potions or Defense against the Dark Arts.”

“No, but you do have Herbology,” Bard pointed out.

“Yes! I love that,” Tilda nodded vigorously. “We planted marigolds and zinnias for the front garden. We’ll plant them outside in another week or so, I hope. Mine are already six inches tall.”

“I hope soon we will be ready to plant flowers in all our pots,” Thran offered as he sat beside Bard. “Once the painters are done, we will have Mr. Sam to help us.”

The conversation considered what sort of flowers to get until Bain returned from the shower, then he and Legolas drifted upstairs to play zombie apocalypse. Sigrid went after them to give her paper a final edit. When Tilda made no move to get up from the sofa, Bard patted her head.

“You, too, little doll,” Bard prompted. “It’s nine-thirty, so time for bed.”

“Oh, Da,” Tilda grumped. “I have to go to bed before all the other children!”

“Yes, you do,” Bard agreed, smiling. “You have more growing to do, and a lot of that happens when you’re asleep. You don’t want to stay the smallest forever, do you?”

“Maybe,” Tilda pouted. “I bet I’d still grow if I stayed up a little longer.”

“We won’t take that chance, at least not tonight,” Bard demurred. “It’s only Monday night.”

“Ada?” Tilda gave him a pleading look.

“Ah, ma petite, you must rest in order to grow. And perhaps to let the last of the ear medicine work? You should be through it soon, yes?”

“The last dose,” Bard confirmed, getting up from the sofa. “I’ll get it and a cup of water for you, Til. Then it’s up to bed.”

“Alllllll right,” Tilda groaned, pouting a little, but she obediently swallowed down the last half pill that Bard brought her. “I’m not very sleepy, though.”

“You will be, as soon as you see Mr. Bun,” Thran assured her. “Come, I will go with you and your Da, and help to tuck you in.”

They took the little girl upstairs, and soon had her ensconced in bed. Thran had been right; Tilda’s eyelids started to flutter as soon as she crawled into bed. Once Mr. Bun and his favorite cohort, Nelephant, had stationed themselves on either side of their charge, Thran and Bard bid Tilda goodnight. Their next stop was Legolas’s room, to call an end to the zombie apocalypse so that the boys ended the day with something quieter. Once the boys were settled in their beds with books, Bard and his husband decided to shower before it got any later.

The warm water felt good after a productive day, and Bard savored a good scrub. Thran chuckled to see him apply his washcloth with such vigor.

“Are you so dirty that you need to scrub so hard, lyubov moya?” Thran teased as he stood under the water to wet his hair.

“Not quite, but it’s good to be clean. I spent almost all day in the barn after you left this morning. I made green sand, and casting molds, and I got the samples of the aluminum spheres I ordered for the
“And you made soup and cake and supper,” Thran added, soaping his scalp with gentle fingers. “A busy man.”

“I managed to fill my time,” Bard grinned. “I didn’t do a single thing on the house today. That’s the first time since we moved here.”

Thran was covered in shampoo suds, so he merely gave Bard a thumbs up sign before he resumed his rinsing. Bard followed suit, slathering suds through his hair. It had gotten long again; he ought to visit Rowan again for her to do her magic before the weather warmed much more. He didn’t have enough hair to make a good tail, so it’d hang heavy and wet on his neck out in the un-air-conditioned barn. Better to shear a bit off, if only for comfort.

As soon as he rinsed his hair, Bard blinked the water out of his eyes to find Thran smiling at him. He grinned back, unabashed about his happiness.

“So how did the ballet go today? How does the stage look? Did Irmo behave himself around the students?”

Thran chuckled. “You are very happy, my saint. I am very happy for you. And before I tell you of the ballet, thank you for the time with Legolas. I enjoyed it very much, and so did he.”

“It’s something we should probably have thought about before this,” Bard mused. “Legolas is so used to being on his own, or having you to himself. There must be times that he gets tired of all of us rattling around.”

“He is very happy here, and with you and the other children. He has told me so many times. But yes, the occasional quiet moment is something he enjoys, such as Kukla does so often.”

“She likes being the baby sometimes, yes,” Bard agreed. “Sigrid’s happy on her own more than the others now, and Bain loves having another brother. I hope he’s not being too much of a nuisance to Legs.”

“No at all,” Thran assured him. “Legolas has spent too much time alone, and he and Bain seem to have come to a comfortable togetherness. I have often caught them together as they read – separate books, but in the same room. They seem to like that.”

“Tilda adores Legs, if you hadn’t noticed,” Bard grinned.

“She does. She has quite captured him, as she has me. Our Russkaya Kukla. We are very fortunate, Bard. Our children have come together far quicker than we had any right to expect.”

“We’re fortunate about a lot of things.” Bard traced a finger down Thran’s water-slicked chest. “Did you get enough to eat when you came home?”

“I did. I ate all of the soup, and the buns, and even sampled the cake. Legolas highly recommended it.”

Chuckling, Bard squeezed out his washcloth and hung it on the rack. “Did he leave any of it for tomorrow?”

“A small amount, for appearance’s sake,” Thran shook his head. “I think children do that not because they cannot finish whatever is in the pan. I think they do that because they do not want to wash the pan if they empty it.”
“You’ve caught on,” Bard nodded. “I’ll mix up something else in the morning.”

“You are good to us,” Thran tugged a lock of Bard’s hair. “I am ready to get out now, if you are.”

“I am,” Bard agreed, and they dried off and settled in bed. Without prompting, Thran described the scene at the Imladris Academy – the emerging stage, the Theatre Ninjas, and the eager faces of the other students. Yes, Irmo had behaved despite his uncomfortableness with the unfinished stage, and the unfamiliar goings and comings of so many people. But they had made good progress once most of the students had gone home for the day, when it was only the ballet company and a few light and sound people to help them. While Luka and Charisse had worked on their pas de deux, Thran had gently done his pointe exercises to strengthen his ankles and feet, so all had gone well. The tall dancer seemed content and not overly tired as he lay against the pillows beside Bard, so Bard was encouraged to give him an update on the painting.

“Darla thinks she and her two helpers will be done the outside of the house later this week,” he told Thran. “The porch will be next, then the carriage house. I hope I’ll be through casting Hal’s tree by that time, so they’ll do the barn last. Then they’ll be done until the new windows arrive. Once the windows are in, they’ll be back out here to paint the window trim.”

“What about all of the doors?”

“I’m okay with them getting all the exterior painting done first, then they can do the doors. It’s kind of six of one and a half dozen of the other – either they have to haul a dipping vat out here to do it on site, or they haul all the doors to their place and do it there, then haul them back. They haul either doors or paint stripper.”

“I would think that the nature of so many chemicals would mean that they would rather confine that to their shop, and just haul the doors,” Thran said after consideration.

“That’d be my guess, but because we’ve got the barn and the carriage house, they might prefer to set up something in one of those, because the stripper is contained, out of the weather, and can be locked up at night. I could work around that, especially if they can set up in the carriage house. We’ve got a right lot of doors, and it won’t hurt us to park the SUV and the truck outside for a few days.”

“Yes, Lance is not likely to bother us,” Thran agreed.

“Have you heard anything more about him?”

Thran shook his head. “I have not. Just that Sergeant Fundin said he would go to the wilderness program. Perhaps tomorrow morning, I should call him and ask.”

“It’d be good for peace of mind,” Bard agreed. “But back to the ballet...”

“I have revealed all, my saint.” Thran leaned over to turn off his nightside table lamp, and slid down flat. “I am quite ready to rest.”

Bard turned out his lamp and snuggled beside his husband. “If you can stay awake for another minute or two, I have one more thing you might want to think about.”

The slight increase in tension in the long, elegant body beside him revealed Thran’s curiosity. “Oh? What is this one more thing, lyubov moya?”

Bard’s grin was anticipatory. “It has to do with the week’s weather forecast.”

Light fingers traced over Bard’s chest. “Does it? And what is this forecast?”
“It’s supposed to rain Wednesday morning.”

“It is? What does that have to do – ah, I see, my saint. When it rains, the painters cannot paint.”

“That’s right.”

“So we will be here alone Wednesday morning.”

“That’s also right.”

A light, breathy laugh. “If it rains hard enough, the sky will be dark, and the lamps in the solarium will look beautiful when they are lit.”

“They will.”

“So at last we can have our game.”

“If you’re amenable, so am I. If the ballet needs more of your attention, we can put it off.”

“Even if it does, it will have to wait until a mysterious dancer thanks the one who has made such a beautiful refuge.”

Bard hummed in anticipation. “The artist will be greatly honored.”

“So will the dancer.”

“Do you need anything before the moment?”

“I am prepared. I have music, I have my costume, I have what comes next.”

Bard nuzzled his nose into Thran’s hair. “You’re cruel, cariad. How am I supposed to wait until Wednesday after hearing a line like that?”

“Do you have a costume?”

“I planned to borrow your haori, if that fits with your costume.”

“Tcha, that will leave the rest of you in jeans. Take my kimono. Not the crane one – the blue one suits you better.”

“You have a blue one?”

“It is very soft cotton. You have seen it.”

“I don’t remember it. It’s in the closet?”

Thran tsked. “Tcha, I forgot that you have not seen it. How could you, when it is folded in a drawer in my dresser? I will get it for you now.”

“That’s all right, angel, you don’t have to get up.”

“I want to. It is perfect for you, and I want you to see it. Cover your eyes while I turn on the lamp.”

Bard did so. By the time his eyes had adjusted enough for him to blink, Thran was out of bed and stooping by his dresser. He pulled out a compactly folded packet of fabric and brought it to bed. He slipped under the sheets and handed Bard the packet, who sat up to look at it. Thran was right – the fabric was soft, and intricately dyed into beautiful geometric patterns of indigo blue.
“You’re right, this is perfect.” Bard sat up to shake out the folds. The bottom edge of the kimono was carefully dyed to reveal a stunning pattern of small tessellations that contrasted nicely with the softer curves dyed across the body and shoulders of the garment. “Too fine for a artist and gardener.”

“He is a well known and revered artist and gardener, and merits a beautiful kimono,” Thran shrugged with a smile, as Bard got up to give the kimono a shake, then ducked into the closet to hang it up. “I am pleased that you like it.”

“What’s the chance that the lowly artist will get a preview of the dancer’s costume?”

“No chance at all,” Thran gave Bard a smug grin. “How can I remain mysterious if I reveal myself too early?”

“Bastard.”

“Entirely.”

“Unrepentant, too,” Bard teased, as Thran turned off the light and they resumed their tangle of arms and legs.

“Also entirely,” Thran sighed without apology. “It is your fault. You reward me so well that I cannot stop.”

“Then hope for rain on Wednesday, pretty dancer, and I’ll reward you again.”

Thran’s chuckle was silent, but Bard felt it through his chest. “Anticipation abounds.”

A fair amount of anticipation coiled in Bard’s chest, too.

* * *

Tuesday morning saw all the children off to school. Thran had gotten a full night’s sleep, so he’d gotten up with Bard to help with the children’s morning routine. He and his husband were halfway back home when Bard’s mobile chimed. It was Sam, already at his garden center despite the early hour. Bard put the call on speaker so that Thran could hear it, too.

“I’m sorry for the early call, Bard, but I forgot to call you and Thran last night. I got a new shipment of tropicals in yesterday, and there are some nice hibiscus in the lot that would go with the one you already have, as well as a gardenia that smells like a dream when it blooms. Would you like me to set anything aside for you to look at?”

“We could go look now,” Thran said quietly.

Bard gave a quick nod of assent. “Are you open yet? Than and I just got the children off to school, so we could take a run by if you are.”

“Course I’m open!” Sam laughed. “It’s prime time spring, so come on over.”

“We’ll be there shortly, Sam. Thanks for thinking about us.”

“A morning adventure,” Thran grinned at Bard as his husband stuck his mobile back in his pocket. “I have seen the garden center only once, and that was in the winter. It was a wonderful place then, and will be even more so now that it is full of spring flowers.”

“Wait until you see how right you are. We’ll want two of everything,” Bard warned.

They changed into jeans and tees and climbed into Bard’s truck for the ride to the garden center. Thran had guessed right that it would be full of spring flowers. A beautiful cascade of blooming hyacinths and daffodils in planters to either side of the entrance welcomed visitors in style. Inside, a lush display of flowers surrounded a small fountain near the checkout registers. Beyond the registers were shelves full of colorful bags of gardening supplies, from specialty plant fertilizers to soil amendments and the usual tools to deter pests, whether animals, insects, or weeds. Bins full of tiny onion bulbs for spring planting beckoned. Hoses, tools, pots of all descriptions, lawn decorations, wind chimes, pennants, birdhouses, animal feeders – Thran didn’t know where to look first.

Thran followed Bard to the back to the greenhouse. So many flats of bright flowering annuals in every color! So many rows of perennial plants and ornamental grasses! It was a mouthwatering display. He and Bard walked up and down the rows to admire the full-color pictures above each group of plants that showed what they would look like in full bloom. They gradually made their way back to the tropical section, where Sam was busily transferring potted shrubs off a wooden pallet to fill in the empty spots of the display. He greeted them with a happy smile and a wave. Here was a man in his element – just as Bard had smiled last night when he’d talked about his work in the barn, so Sam looked equally delighted to be schlepping large plants around the floor of his greenhouse.

“I know you got a yellow hibiscus last time you were here, Bard,” Sam said, pointing to a group of plants still waiting on their pallet. “I thought one of those bright fuchsia ones would look wonderful with the yellow one, and really pop against the green walls of your solarium.”

They picked out a bushy fuchsia hibiscus.

Sam led them back to a display of the gardenias he’d told them about. “Normally, I wouldn’t recommend these, because they’re particular about light and humidity. Have you got a humidifier on your furnace?”

Thran had no idea what such a thing was, but Bard nodded.

“Good. You’ve got your fountain basin, too, which should do the trick. And your solarium gets a lot of indirect bright light, which a gardenia wants – it doesn’t like direct sun. It likes a good misting more than not, too. If you can give it all of that, you’ll be well rewarded. It smells like paradise.”

“Paradise is what we have in plenty,” Thran winked at Bard. “So a plant that smells like the same will be welcome, yes?”

“No argument here,” Bard agreed. “I’d like one more fern, too, Sam, to sit on the back of the fountain basin and hide the tubing. Something that likes a splash of water.”

“Got lots of those,” Sam led them off to the fern table. “These foxtail ferns aren’t strictly ferns, but they look like them, and they’re a fun plant to look at, and not picky at all if you’ve got the humidity for them. If you want to stick to real ferns, there’s maidenhair, asparagus – be careful of the thorns on those – Boston, all sorts.”

They mulled the choices, but eventually settled on a foxtail fern. Once Sam helped them carry their purchases to the truck and bade them a warm farewell, they headed home.

“What is a humidifier, Bard?” Thran asked as they got underway.

“That’s a thing that attaches to the furnace to make sure enough moisture goes into the air inside the “Most houses are way too dry in the winter, and it messes with more than the plants in the house. It dries out your furniture, for one. But worse, it plays havoc with your skin, your nose, your lungs, your hair, everything. We’re all healthier and happier with a little more moisture in the air.”

“You are an amazement,” Thran shook his head. “So many ways you look out for us.”

Bard flushed slightly pink, but he gave Thran an appreciative smile. “That’s my job, angel. That’s all.”

“Tcha – it is not merely a job. It is a saint’s act of love.”

Bard chuckled. “You’re funny. You get so excited about things like thermostats and humidifiers and garage door openers.”

“And welding,” Thran said with enthusiasm. “All the mechanical things I knew nothing about until I met you. No, do not say I am funny by myself. I am just as funny as you when you profess amazement at the dance, or the technical things that go into the effort to make Immortal. We are both properly appreciative of things we have never considered before. It is good to have an open mind that can marvel at new things.”

Grinning, Bard conceded with a shrug. “You’re right, angel. Every artist needs an open mind to see new things.”

“You see, I am right,” Thran nodded. “We serve our muses well when we marvel at new things.”

They turned into the driveway, waving to Darla and her assistants as they carted their new plants into the solarium. Bard put the gardenia to one side of the fountain to take advantage of the nearby humidity, then arranged the foxtail fern on the board he’d laid across the back of the fountain basin. He fluffed it to disguise the clear plastic tubing that stretched from the basin up to the lion’s head spout.

“We need another couple of chairs in here,” Bard said, looking around. “Not enough places to sit down yet.”

Thran gave him a sly look as he arranged the hibiscus in front of the tall palms. “We will look for some on the weekend, perhaps. But do not worry, lyubov moya. Our fainting couch will be all we need tomorrow morning.”

Bard swallowed, exhaled, and eyed Thran up and down. When he ran his tongue slowly over his lips, Thran sly look widened into a smile, drawing Bard’s chuckle. “You are such a bastard.”

“You reward me deliciously when I am. I hope you do so tomorrow.”

Bard’s chuckle was half growl. “Now you’re a royal bastard.”

Thran put a hand to his heart and offered a bow to go with his self-possessed smile. “Mmm. That bodes well for tomorrow.”

Bard’s growl deepened. “I think I’d better disappear into the kitchen. Otherwise, the painters are going to get an eyeful of your pretty ass and a lesson on what to do with it.”

Thran laughed hard enough that Bard stuck his tongue out at him and headed for the kitchen. Thran followed him into the pantry, eased Bard’s back against his chest, and breathed softly against Bard’s neck until Bard’s skin flexed into gooseflesh.
“Stop it, you fucker.” Bard’s voice trembled, and his body leaned into Thran’s without resistance. “Or you won’t have a thing to tease tomorrow morning.”

“I am tempted,” Thran nosed Bard’s ear, then pressed a soft, nipping kiss at the edge of Bard’s jaw where it joined his neck. “Does the pantry count as a room that we can christen?”

Bard grinned. “Do you remember what happened to the last sous chef I interviewed in my kitchen?”

“Then decide. Do you want a demanding chef to trash his sous chef in the pantry now, or can you control yourself long enough to let an artist worship a beautiful dancer in the solarium tomorrow?”

“Both sound delectable,” Thran whispered, letting one more kiss trail off Bard’s hair. He stroked his fingers from Bard’s shoulders down his arms, then backed away. “But... I admit that to christen the solarium is a delight I have anticipated for a very long time.”

Bard gave him a look over his shoulder, then pulled the flour bin of the shelf and handed it to Thran. “So have I. So don’t make me take the edge off. I want tomorrow to be worth all the anticipation.”

All the anticipation... Thran’s anticipation preoccupied him the rest of the morning as he helped Bard bake. After a good lunch, he left for the Imladris Academy with the mouthwatering aroma of Bard’s orange cookies to follow him out to the carriage house, and his husband’s kiss and final wave to send him on his way. He headed into the school, making sure he had his identity badge around his neck, not that he needed it for everyone to know he had reason to be in the halls. Many of the children and teachers greeted him with a smile and a cheerful, “Hi, Mr. Thran!” as he passed by. He didn’t mind; Mr. Oropherson was hard for a lot of the youngest children to say, so he was content with his new moniker. He went into the gymnasium where Mr. Faramir had several children already setting up the portable barres for the dancers who would soon arrive. He chatted briefly with the children, then with Mr. Faramir about Legolas’s archery, then set to his barre early. He would have to repeat the first part when the other dancers appeared, but that would be no burden. For the moment, he could retreat into the familiar sequence that his body knew so well. That was a perfect cover to let his thoughts savor tomorrow’s game all over again.

Very quickly, he had to let his anticipation fade once more into the back of his thoughts, as the rest of the company arrived and set to business. A young boy sat at the piano today, learning how to tailor his music to what the ballet master wanted. Around the edge of the gymnasium, several students, mostly girls, lingered to watch the dancers work. Many murmured amongst themselves, pointing to one or another of the dancers, or trying an experimental step themselves. Did the Imladris Academy offer dance classes? He would ask his children; perhaps the students were here to study technique. With that in mind, Thran gave a critical eye over his fellow dancers. Yes, most of the ballet dancers were much sharper now than they had been when he’d first joined UVB. Even the dancers who specialized in other traditions had taken the barre warmup to heart, and were carefully preparing for the upcoming rehearsal. Good; his example of hard work had rubbed off. It must, if UVB expected to hold its own with more established companies once Immortal debuted.

Warmup completed, Thran and the other dancers got the portable barres stowed in the equipment room so that the gymnasium was ready for the children’s afternoon sport. Faramir appreciated the gesture, and smiled his thanks while Ori did his stint with the dry mop. Yes, the company could have left their cleanup to the children, but it was better for the dancers to offer a helpful and friendly gesture where they could, so the school didn’t regret its decision to host them.

On to the stage. The troll market had begun to take shape; in the back at the juncture of the two walls were the beginning components of Death’s throne. To either side of the revolving platform were the two halves of the gate that blocked mortal entry to the Underworld. Right now, they didn’t look like much, merely utilitarian frames of the same white PVC tubing Thran had seen at the homeowners’ meccas in the plumbing sections. Thran smothered a grin when he thought about what Bard would say about the lowly material being put to such unorthodox use, and that brought a resurgence of his eagerness for tomorrow’s game.

He had to take himself strongly to task before his cock soon made itself visibly embarrassing. What did Bard tell him to think about? Baseball? Thran snorted. He had no more idea about baseball than he did about plumbing. He would just have to think about the thermostat, or humidifiers – how exactly did one attach to the furnace? He would have to get Bard to show him, after which he would reward his knowledgeable husband in the most outrageous of ways –

Sukin syn! Now he had to start all over again to find a distraction...

Thankfully, Ori appeared to talk to him about the three companies he’d called about rigging the dancers for flying across the stage. Thran’s preoccupation with Bard faded as the young man explained what he’d learned about each of the three, and why he thought one was a better choice than the other two. The firm Ori preferred was used to theatrical performances, as well as working with dancers, and they had a solid reputation for safety. Once again, Thran was gratified at how much work Ori had put into his consideration, and told him so. Ori smiled in relief and confessed that he’d taken the liberty to set up an appointment with the firm on Friday morning for Thran, Luka, and Charisse to have their first flying lesson, if that was enough notice for the three dancers.

Thran agreed for himself at once. When Ori trotted off to talk to Luka and Charisse, Irmo and Abebe pulled Thran into rehearsal.

With all the bustle and stir, it took a few minutes before Thran realized that on Friday, he would have his first experience to soar above the stage powered by more than his muscles.

He looked up at the high ceiling of the auditorium again. It still looked very far away, but despite that, he smiled.

An artist served the muse when he kept an open mind. So he would not worry – yet. After all, it wasn’t as if he were Icarus.
Chapter 132

Chapter Summary

An angel deals with the rising demands of his ballet, and a saint balances sculpture, children, and a house. Soon, art will claim both above all else.

First, however, one more room in a rejuvenated house awaits its welcome back to beauty.

Chapter Notes

Nice reader IMK took pity on my terrible attempts at Russian and offered me more accurate translations, so I have updated the story accordingly (yes, all 132 chapters, ugh!). Thank you, my dear ❤️!

As Tuesday progressed, Thran played two roles. The first one was obvious – he was UVB’s premier principal dancer who would dance the lead role in Immortal. That was an important and weighty position, so he did his barre, he worked the hours of rehearsal, he did his pointe practice, he worked more rehearsal, he did another barre to cool down, all with the same intensity as he had always embodied since his earliest days in ballet school. The intense, laser focus on position, technique, stage presence, keeping the body warm and pliable no matter how tired he was... nothing new intruded on this part of his day.

But now he had another role to play – he was the artistic head of the effort to stage Immortal. He could not pay attention only to his form, his role, his body – he had to assess and weigh the worth of every dancer around him. Though he was aware of the cold-blooded and ruthless nature of that role, this was the first time he had fully felt the truth of it for himself. All of a sudden, things that had nagged at the edge of his perception since the company had taken the stage pushed to the forefront of his awareness, where they sharpened into lethal focus. The company had seemed so much sharper when they’d done their barre in the gymnasium. What had happened? Had the dancers worked so well there because they’d had so many onlookers, which was not the case now? Was it merely their need to get used to the stage? Whatever the reason, now the company looked ragged and lackluster. How many times did that ballerina’s not-quite-one-hundred-and-eighty-degree split beg for him to correct it? How many times did that male dancer’s pirouette go just past one complete rotation without a word from him?

Chagrin flooded through him.

UVB’s future reputation depended on more than how Thran, Charisse, and Luka performed. He did not want to read “brilliant performers, but weak chorus” in the reviews the day after Immortal’s premiere. At the first break, then, he headed right for Abebe.

“Yes, Thran?” the ballet master looked a question at him.

“A moment, please,” Thran murmured lowly, and they stepped off the stage to confer in the audience seats out of earshot.

“I see too much inattention.” Thran’s voice was soft, but implacable. “A lack of precision, of crispness, in the movements. We will face sharp scrutiny with this ballet, with this company, and we cannot afford such casual execution.”

Abebe swallowed. “They’re a little ragged yesterday and today, Thran, I agree with you. It’s just the coming and the going to get the stage done—”

“If we cannot be precise in the middle of this, then we will not be precise in the chaos that always comes with a premiere. The construction must be of no consequence. Nothing must be of any consequence. I want everyone to perform each move as if it is the very last one they will ever do, as if they expect to be judged before the thrones of all the gods on that last move. Otherwise, we have no chance to make the impression we want. Look and tell me I am wrong—should we settle for what I see?”

For a moment, they stood watching the stage.

“There,” Thran murmured, when the less than straight split appeared. When the over-rotated pirouette appeared, he murmured again. “And there. I have seen other instances. It is not acceptable, even in rehearsal.”

Abebe visibly straightened. “No, it’s not. It stops now.”

Thran returned to the stage without further comment, but Abebe pulled Irmo aside for a quick consultation. Ori edged beside him as he stood at the side of the stage.

“What’s going on, Thran?” the young man whispered.

“Perhaps the change in venue to a school has made some of our company think they go back to school themselves,” Thran whispered back. “They do not dance like professionals. That will not continue.”

Ori pulled his ear thoughtfully. “Ah. Anything I can do?”

Thran shook his head. “If Abebe does his job, no.”

Ori nodded in understanding. “If it helps to set your mind at ease about something, Círdan has done his job and then some. He says the set construction will be done in the next two days. He’ll work on the set dressing right after, but you’ll have the stage itself, so we can work on the film projections, set rotations, and so forth.”

“Please pass him my sincere thanks, Ori. He has done a masterful job with so many students. All goes well with Lettie?”

Ori nodded. “She’s plugging away hard at the donor’s list to see if we can scrape up a bit more cash.”

Thran flicked Ori a look, but kept the concern from his face. “How goes the funds, then?”

“We’re struggling, no doubt,” Ori exhaled. “But we’re hanging together so far.”

Thran closed his eyes. A third role, that of creative financier, wasn’t one he wanted. “We can pay all the urgent bills?”
Ori nodded. “All but the one to the company who’ll rig you and your two cohorts for flying.”

“How much?”

Ori whispered an amount, enough to make Thran wince inside. “I will transfer money to our account today. That is not one I want overdue.”

“Understandable,” Ori offered him a pained smile. “Oh, looks like Abebe and Irmo are back to business, so I’ll talk to you later.”

“Thank you, Ori,” Thran wished the young man. At the center of the stage, Irmo called for a repeat of the scene the company had just rehearsed, straight through, so Thran took his place with the rest. However, the company got only part of the way through it before Abebe waved everyone to a stop to bestow some frank language on the dancers about precision and follow-through and standards. He heard his own words about dancing as if each move was the last one a dancer would perform, but did not smile. He might have prompted the rebukes, but when he danced, he was subject to them as every other dancer was.

Only eight weeks remained before the cost of rigging and imprecise dancers would be immaterial. So much work remained to be done!

Too much.

Perhaps he should tell the dancers to do their warmup barres at home before they came to the school, so that they could begin rehearsals that much sooner. They could start this tomorrow morning –

He winced. Tomorrow morning, he was to meet his husband in the solarium.

He should ask Bard if they could defer their liaison –

No. He could not, would not, disappoint Bard so badly.

Círdan said that the stage construction, if not stage dressing, would be done in two days. When that happened, the dancers could arrive earlier than noon to do their warmups, which meant that they could resume rehearsal earlier. So on Thursday or Friday, he would see that they did.

Not Wednesday.

On Wednesday, he would savor the solarium with Bard.

He sighed. Despite all the practical reasons to forgo them, he wanted those two hours with Bard. After all the care and love Bard had lavished on the solarium, not to mention the rest of the house, were two hours so much to give his husband?

A cynical voice in the back of Thran’s head whispered that he’d be better off to spend those two hours with Bard now rather than later, before he was too tired to do anything but dance, and his feet were so battered that Bard noticed.

He winced again. More hiding, more sins of omission.

This was why so few dancers sustained a life with those who were not also dancers. Outsiders didn’t understand the toll, the sacrifices, the single-mindedness...

Bard had labored in a grotty city apartment, enduring misery and want to care for his children. Then he’d labored to make a family and a home for Clan Ffyrnig before he’d returned to his art. Bard wasn’t a dancer, but he’d paid tolls, made sacrifices, and focused single-mindedly, just as deeply as any dancer.

Tomorrow morning, Thran would be the mysterious dancer that Bard had asked for, because they both deserved the indulgence.

This would be his last indulgence before Immortal premiered. After he and Bard had savored their game to its fullest, he would talk to his husband, preparing him for what was to come.

He let none of this show on his face when he took his place at the center of the stage.

* * *

As soon as Thran left for the school, Bard took his clay model of Hal’s tree out to the barn. It was time to make his green sand molds, commonly called flasks, because they held the molten metal.

On went the barn lights, and out came the bucket of green sand. Yes, it was nicely ready, neither too damp nor too wet. Yes, his wooden frames were clean and ready to hold the sand for molding, but he couldn’t mold yet. First, he had to carefully dissect the clay mold into the pieces he’d decided to cast, which required precision, delicacy, and patience. There was a reason why he didn’t have a clock in the barn – the passage of time didn’t matter, but the care he took did. So he had no idea how long it took to divide the model. When he was satisfied with that, he made sure he had the right-sized frames for each piece. Only then could he begin to make the flasks for each piece.

Making a flask wasn’t hard in theory; all he had to do was pack sand into the frames, sprinkle talc over the model of the piece to be cast into the sand, press half of it into the sand, sprinkle more talc, then pack in the other half of the sand, remove the model, and add gates, which were holes into which he’d pour the molten metal. In practice, this took just as much precision, delicacy, and patience as dissecting the model did, as well as a steady hand. He took his time so he’d have as little mending and patching to do when the castings came out of the molds.

Gods, how amazing was this? It didn’t seem like it had been years since he’d done this, so surely did his hands move. He had six pieces to cast – roots, trunk, and four sections of the tree canopy. The delicacy of the branches had driven his decision to cast it in four sections, just to make sure the molten bronze flowed completely into so many small channels.

Now for the casting. He set his furnace outside where it would have plenty of ventilation, set his crucible in place, and lit it –

“Hi, Da! Hi, Bard! Ooh, you’re lighting the furnace! Are you going to cast the little tree now?”

Gods, how had it gotten to be so late? He could have sworn he had at least a couple more hours before the children came home. Were they home early? No, there was no reason all four of them would be home early, not when they weren’t sick, so it really must be four-thirty...

He turned off the gas to his furnace before anything got very hot. He’d have to leave casting until tomorrow.

“Just making sure the furnace is ready to go, that’s all,” he replied, as the children all gathered a respectable distance away. “If it doesn’t rain tomorrow, I’ll cast then.”
“When will you do Rahmiel, Da?” Tilda asked breathlessly.

“Not for a bit, little doll,” Bard shook his head. “I’ve got paying work now, so that comes first. But it won’t be long before I get to him.”

“How does it work?” Legolas asked. “You heat the metal, and then what happens?”

“A lot happens before I pour the metal,” he explained, and showed Legolas his six flasks lined up on the workbench. He described how he’d made them, and how he’d pour the molten metal into them, assemble them, and finish them. He was gratified at how interested Legolas was in the whole process.

“So tomorrow you’ll cast all the tree parts?” Legolas asked.

“If the rain holds off, yes.” Bard looked up at the overcast sky. “It’s supposed to rain tonight and tomorrow morning, so it may be the afternoon before I can do it.”

“What difference does the rain make?”

“I like to heat the metal outside, where it’s well ventilated,” Bard explained. “The furnace burns propane, and gets the crucible – that’s the vessel that the metal goes in to melt – very hot, so when I can do it outside, I’d rather.”

“How hot?” Tilda asked.

“That depends on the metal, but upwards of a couple thousand degrees Fahrenheit.”

“Wow!” Legolas blinked in surprise. “And then you weld all the pieces together, and put the finish on it, and you’re done.”

“The metal part, yes,” Bard grinned as he and the children trooped inside. “This one’s a little different in that I have to fasten the metal to a rock, and then put the paper leaf on the branch. But right now, I’ve got something else to ponder - what to make for supper. I didn’t prep anything.”

“I’ve got something to ponder, too,” Sigrid said, flushing slightly pink. “I found out today at school that I’m supposed to get Finn a flower for the dance.”

“A flower?” Bain and Legolas chorused, both of them giggling. “What for?”

“Stop it,” Sigrid snapped, brushing the loose hair from around her face with a flustered sweep. “And I don’t know what for, just that I’m supposed to, and I don’t know what to do.”

“A boutonniere?” Bard guessed. “It’s a small flower that you pin on the lapel of his jacket. He brings you a corsage, too.”

“Oh, is that what it is?” Sigrid’s face cleared. “It makes sense now. I just didn’t understand the word. I thought it was some French thing, and I’d misheard.”

“The word is from French, yes,” Legolas said, still trying to smother his grin.

“So where do I get a boutonniere?” Sigrid asked Bard, pointedly not looking at her brothers.

“The florist shop in town, I’d guess,” Bard replied. “Did you tell Finn what color your dress is? And do you know what color suit he’s wearing?”

Sigrid nodded. “He knows it’s blue and green. He said his suit is dark blue.”
“Maybe a white boutonniere, then. The dance is next Friday, right?”

Sigrid snorted. “Saturday, Da. Really – you can’t expect most of the girls to go to school all day and then get ready for a dance in a mere two hours, do you? They need all day!”

“Good point.”

“They have to do hair, nails, make up…”

“Oh, so should we mark the bathroom off limits to everyone but you next Saturday, sweetness?”

She snorted again. “You know better, Da. I’ll be one of the few ready in two hours.”

Bard laughed. “No matter what day it is, you could call the florist before it closes today and order Finn’s boutonniere.”

“Oh, so should we mark the bathroom off limits to everyone but you next Saturday, sweetness?”

She snorted again. “You know better, Da. I’ll be one of the few ready in two hours.”

Bard laughed. “No matter what day it is, you could call the florist before it closes today and order Finn’s boutonniere.”

“Okay, I’ll do that right now.” Sigrid grabbed her backpack and pulled out her laptop. “First I’ll find the florist shop…”

Sigrid dashed into the sitting room to sort out Finn’s boutonniere. Tilda gazed after her thoughtfully for a long moment, drawing Bard to fluff her hair.

“What’re you thinking about, little doll?”

“Why does Sigrid get all fumbly and silly when anyone brings up Finn?”

Bain and Legolas dissolved into gales of laughter at Tilda’s innocent question. They laughed harder when Sigrid’s indignant denial echoed from the sitting room.

“Because she likes him in a special way,” Bard explained. “Kind of like Bain how turns red when anyone mentions Angelica Crofton.”

Bain’s laughter came to an abrupt end, and he blushed furiously when Legolas laughed. “Da! I do not! Stop it, Legs, or I’ll bring up a certain brown-haired girl on your archery team –”

“You’d better not!” Legolas snorted, becoming the third indignant, red-faced child. “Just because I said Tara’s best girlfriend was a good archer –”

“I knew it! You’re sweet on Gloriana!” Bain teased. “I knew it! I am not!” Legolas blustered in the face of Bain’s laughter, and they both ran off upstairs to continue their teasing.

Tilda watched all of this with dubious eyes. “Oh,” she ventured, then glanced at Bard. “I get it now. It’s all that liking and loving stuff.”

“That’s what it is,” Bard agreed, giving her a comfortable pat on the back. “No big deal.”

Tilda exhaled. “It’s kind of dumb.”

“Sometimes it is,” Bard smiled. “But it’s not to the people who feel that way. You’ll see one day.”

Tilda turned a solemn expression on Bard. “Promise you won’t laugh at me then, please?”

Bard held up a hand. “Scout’s honor.”
“Thank you,” she smiled “Oh, I know - we can have spaghetti for supper.”

“We can,” Bard nodded, smothering a smile at the unintended humor of children and their love lives. In eight years, when Tilda went away to college, he’d miss such mayhem, so today he savored it for the sweetness it was. “Do you want to choose what shape, little doll?”

* * *

Thran didn’t leave for home until nearly ten. A slow, steady drizzle was falling when he came out of the school to go home, so he walked swiftly to his SUV. Once he pulled out of the school parking lot, he was cautious on the glistening roads; at least the late hour meant no traffic, and he got home without incident in fifteen minutes. He put his SUV into the carriage house, dashed to the mudroom door, and went inside, shaking raindrops off his hoodie before he hung it up. What reception awaited him? He grimaced, imagining worry or irritation. How relieved he was when Bard came in from the sitting room to kiss him in welcome! There was no tension or resentment on Bard’s face or in his bearing as he rubbed Thran’s back, stroked his braid, only pleasure in seeing him again. At least that was one worry he could relax. All was well at home.

“You got caught in the rain, I see,” Bard wiped a trickle of rain off his cheek.

“It does not fall very hard, but it is steady, as if it might be happy to rain all night.”

“Tilda’s already asleep, but Sigrid and the boys are still awake.” Bard gave him a subtle nudge towards the stairs. “Go say hello while I get your supper. I’ve got leftover spaghetti and salad from supper, or chicken, or chicken soup, if any of those suit you, or the house short order cook can wrangle almost anything else you’d like instead.”

“The soup would be wonderful, lyubov moya,” Thran gave him a gratified smile. “And tea? Something soothing?”

“We have chamomile, perfect for before bed.”

“That sounds good. I will see the children, and then change. Would you mind if I shower first?”

“Course not. I washed after the children earlier, so have at.”

“Thank you, my saint. I will be down shortly.”

“Righto,” Bard agreed.

Thran went upstairs, spoke to Sigrid and Bain who greeted him with welcoming smiles, then spent a few minutes with Legolas. After assuring himself that his son was well and happy, he bid Legolas good night, stripped his dancewear, and ducked into the shower cabinet for a warm, soothing shower. It felt good to let weariness and worry flow away with the soapsuds. He dried his hair, and dressed in comfortable leggings and tee. When he padded downstairs, Bard had soup and tea ready for him. Thran filled his bowl and sat down; Bard followed behind with his own cup of tea to keep him company.

“Go on and eat,” Bard urged Thran when he looked longingly at his soup bowl. “I’ll provide silent moral support.”
Thran’s lips curved into a grateful smile as he picked up his spoon. “Would you tell me about your day while I eat? That would be good company.”

“It’s not that exciting except to another metal sculptor, but it was a good day. I have everything set to cast Hal’s tree, rain depending. The furnace gets very hot, so I do that outside when I have the chance...”

Bard talked softly about his progress, but despite his low voice, his excitement and happiness was clear. It calmed Thran to hear about his husband’s work, which didn’t seem like work to Bard at all. When his husband described Sigrid’s dilemma about a boutonniere and the resulting conversation with the boys and Tilda, Thran chuckled.

“That is funny. Our lioness is so self-assured most of the time. To hear of her so flustered... she is not always as old as she seems.”

“I’ll see how old she seems next Saturday. Finn, too, for that matter. I have a feeling that he’ll look even more fumbly and flustered than she will.”

“I would like to see that,” Thran admitted with a wistful smile. He met Bard’s eyes. “But... I cannot promise to be there. So pay attention very hard, so that you can tell me everything afterwards.”

Bard’s hand snaked across the table to stroke Thran’s. “You know, it’s okay if we want to postpone our game in the solarium tomorrow. It really is.”

The lump in Thran’s throat made it nearly impossible for him to swallow his mouthful of soup. How did Bard know what he’d wrestled with all day? “I don’t want to.”

“I know you don’t. But if you have to, I understand. You’re in the final push to get Immortal off the ground. I know the next eight weeks will be a grind. If you need to sleep tomorrow, or go to the studio or the school, go.”

Thran sighed. “I think you are a mind reader, lyubov moya.”

“How’s that?”

“Because I thought about just this thing this afternoon. About how much of a grind, as you call it, it will be. You cannot imagine.”

“Maybe not, but I have a little better idea today than I did yesterday.”

Thran gave Bard his full attention. “Do you? How did this happen?”

“Are you done your soup, or would you like some more?”

“I am finished.”

“Then let’s go into the sitting room where we can relax.”

Thran and Bard cleaned up the remains of Thran’s late supper, then settled side by side on one of the sitting room sofas. Bard’s arm went around Thran’s shoulders, drawing him close, and his fingers stroked through Thran’s hair.

“I borrowed Sigrid’s laptop tonight while she was in the shower,” Bard began without preamble. “I found this video about what a dancer’s day is like during rehearsal for a show. It was about a ballerina, but I figured the same thing would be true for you. She started at ten in the morning with barre, then went to rehearsals – two, in fact, for different ballets – then physiotherapy, then more classes, then a three-hour performance. She got home at midnight, and then talked about how hungry she was, but she couldn’t afford to eat too much because she’d gain weight. I saw several, even one about your Vaganova School and Mariinsky Company, and they all said more or less the same thing. So yes, I know a little more about what you have to do over the next eight weeks. It won’t be easy. So... the solarium will be here for the next fifty years, and so will we. It’ll be ready whenever we both are. Tomorrow morning, do what you need to do.”

The lump was back in Thran’s throat. “The only downside to a marriage between a dancer and a nondancer is that now I worry about the time the dance takes. I cannot expect you to understand the unending string of days where I work fourteen and more hours. I do not want us to come to another crisis as we did not so long ago. I should have explained this before we became so entwined.”

Bard snickered. “What, three minutes after we met? Because we both fell hard about four minutes after we met.”

Thran grinned. “True. We did not have a lot of time before we were a fait accompli.”

“School ends in about three weeks. There’s a week off before the children’s camps start. The camps start at nine, not seven-thirty, so everyone’s schedule will shift later, and that’ll help. So we’ll be okay. You focus on Immortal, and I’ve got the rest.”

Thran let out a long, slow breath. “You are a saint. I know this. So I will not worry about you and the children... tcha, what do I say? I will try not to worry about you and the children. In return, you must not worry about me. Perhaps I will have only part of Sundays off, or perhaps not even that. I will be tired, hungry, and good for very little. But I will always answer your texts when I get them, and I will always come home to you, and I will not be so oblivious as I was before.”

Bard nodded. “I won’t jump to any more contusions.”

Thran couldn’t resist an impish grin. “I might, though.”

Bard angled his body to give him a surprised look. “You what?”

“Jump to the contusion – literally, not figuratively. Friday, I have my first flying lesson. So that Death will swoop onto the stage from on high.”

“Really? I have to say that that looks like fun.”

“I hope it is. Luka, Charisse, and I will all go. I look forward to it.”

“Wait until the lads find out. They’ll be envious. Hell, I am.”

Thran chuckled. “I will tell you all about it when I come home Friday. But first, we must get through Wednesday and Thursday.”

“We’ll make it,” Bard asserted in a firm voice. “We’ll get through the next eight weeks, too.”

“We will. But before the grind begins...”

Bard slid a look at Thran, who met it with a small smile.

“If it rains tomorrow morning, the solarium beckons our attendance. As soon as the children are off to school.”
Bard rubbed Thran’s shoulder slowly. “The gardener will be there.”

“The dancer will be, too. So let us go to bed, my saint. It is late, and I want us both to be well rested for whatever happens after the children go to school.”

“Rounds first.”

They made their usual pass around the house before heading upstairs to climb into bed. As Thran settled into his husband’s arms, much of his worry and apprehension faded. Everything would be all right. It would.

“What is it you always tell me, angel?” Bard whispered, stroking the sensitive spot on Thran’s hip that felt so good.

“What, my saint?”

“All is well. And it is.”

Thran chuckled silently. His husband was a mind reader extraordinaire.

* * *

The school bus sloshed away from the bus stop. Bard huddled under his umbrella and turned towards home just as eagerly as the other parents did, though they probably weren’t nearly as excited about what awaited them there as he was. So much anticipation coiled in his belly! As the rain fell steadily, not a painter was in residence, so Thran was back at the house transforming himself into... someone mysterious. Bard’s blue kimono was ready for him in the children’s bathroom, and when he got home, he’d shed the metal sculptor, father, and home renovator to become a simple gardener who had built a beautiful secret garden for an enigmatic dancer.

Would Thran wear his crane kimono? No, he’d worn that for their ballroom rendezvous. He’d said he’d venture into the delights found on the Indian subcontinent. Could that mean he’d wear a sari? That would certainly play to the feminine aspects that had piqued Bard so much more than he’d expected. Would he show up in drag? Maybe, maybe not... Thran had left Bard with the impression that he’d combine masculine as well as feminine aspects. That sounded... well, Bard didn’t know what it sounded like, but it reminded him strongly of Buddhist tantric thangkas – tapestries and paintings – that represented complementary spiritual concepts as sexually linked deities. The images were not merely sexual; rather, for an illiterate population, the highly symbolic representations were meditation tools that extended esoteric and subtle ideas from the physical to the metaphysical. Everyone understood how two lovers joined; so, the implication was, could the concepts that the lovers represented. This was no different than the purpose so much medieval European church art served for their illiterate population – cross, dove, nails, thorns, and so on, were just as symbolic, and just as beautiful.

Wasn’t that what all art was? Physical manifestations of beautiful mysteries?

Bard’s angel was beautiful and mysterious, and being with him was a grace Bard cherished. How would Thran embody that mystery as his dancer?

Whatever Thran did, he wouldn’t merely show up in a costume. He’d become the beautiful dancer who had commissioned a garden. Gods, if that dancer favored the gardener with a private performance, he’d have the gardener at his feet in an instant, ready for whatever enlightenment he cared to bestow.

He ran back into the house through the rain, left his dripping umbrella in the mudroom sink, and kicked off his muddy boots. He ran upstairs – yes, the doors to their bedroom were closed, though he made out the vague outline of a figure moving within.

“I’m back!” he called. “Five minutes, and the gardener will be in the solarium!”

“Five minutes more, and the dancer will follow!” Thran called back in reply.

Bard ducked into the children’s bathroom, shedding clothes as he went. He stripped down to nothing, and wound the traditional Indian langot around his hips. The langot was more comfortable than the traditional Japanese fundoshi would have been, which was little different from the dancer’s belt that Thran wore every time he danced, if not so elastic. The langot wasn’t quite so... invasive, which gave him something to grin about as he slipped on his kimono. Gods, Thran was right about how soft the fabric was. It felt wonderful against his skin. He shook out his hair – it was at the unruly stage, and really needed a trim, so it suited a humble gardener who cared more about his plants than his appearance. He knotted the sash around the kimono, and came out to the bedroom landing.

“Gardener’s in the house,” he called, and headed downstairs without waiting for an answer. He ducked into the kitchen, set out on the kitchen island the teapot and cups that Thran had asked for, and the small basket of muffins. He made sure the teakettle simmered on the stove. Then he headed for the solarium, dim and shadowy against the backdrop of overcast skies and falling rain. He switched on the lamps, and turned on the fountain.

He waited.

* * *

The gardener gave his creation one more critical look. Was it finished at last? It had been no easy battle to wrestle this oasis out of a dark and decaying courtyard, where iron grilles and heavy wooden shutters had condemned any plant placed here to a dark and stifling death. It had been no easy battle to get him to even consider the effort, either, much less agree to do it – it had been such an obvious disaster that he’d rejected the plea to do the work four times. How could he nurture a beautiful and thriving garden here when anything, plant or animal, put in such a sunless, airless hole would die in days? The impossible location was not the only worry – the client was mysterious and unseen, and the impassive faces of the client’s shadowy representatives did not inspire comfort. Who knew what to make of that? Perhaps the client was a rich crime boss who sought to enhance his questionable status with a courtyard garden for his harem of concubines. He snorted. Designing a pretty prison was nothing he would do.

But the client’s representatives had come back again and again and again, always courteous, always respectful, always solicitous. The gardener had enough work for reputable clients who wanted a small, happy garden for their children, or to turn a battered piece of soil outside a family home into a beautiful oasis for all who passed by to enjoy. He’d even done a large park for the town government house for many to enjoy. He had enough work to stay busy until the monsoon without venturing into something that smelled so questionable.

But again the client’s representatives had come back, murmuring pleasant compliments and offering more money. The client, he had finally been told, was a famous and enigmatic dancer who wanted a refuge, who appreciated the gardener’s care and patience, and who was willing to pay well for his skill. Even though the gardener was not free of the need of money, it had held no allure for him this time. The black hole he had been shown was nothing he could transform.

Finally, the representatives had come back one more time, murmuring the same pleas, making the same offers. No one else could make anything out of this ruin but him.

“I can’t make anything of it, either!” the gardener had argued in exasperation. “It’s nothing but a dark pit! There’s no air, no light, no anything! It’s a prison! No one can make anything grow there as long as all of those things remain true!”

“My client offers you free rein to do whatever you deem necessary to build your garden,” the representative had said calmly.

The gardener had turned a jaundiced eye on the speaker. “That’s what you say. But does your client really want to tear down walls and grates and barriers? A garden needs light, air, space. Without that, nothing is possible.”

“My client understands. You would be free to change all you see fit.”

“Such things are expensive.”

“You will be paid well.”

“It won’t be me you need to pay well. It’ll be the masons, the builders who must create the light and air and space first before I do anything.”

“My client agrees. You will have free rein to do all that it requires.”

Despite his better judgment, the gardener had agreed.

So the builders and the masons and the glazers had come to dismantle the prison. Grilles were banished; shutters were burned. Light now streamed through wide windows and expansive skylights. In such a light-filled space, he had rebuilt pale stone floors and walls, and then he had built a small fountain so that the hard stone would reflect the soft, soothing sounds of splashing water. He had taken carved panels from a junk heap to give climbing vines a place to curl and flourish. He had hung brightly colored lamps to extend the day’s sunlight into night with a soft, friendly glow. He had brought in tall palms and feathery ferns to soften the stone walls and floor. He had brought a small lamp shaped like a glowing flower to cast a little magic among the pots of low-growing shrubs. His final touch was a comfortable lounging bench, soft with velvet cushions, so that the mysterious dancer could rest easily in the heart of this garden.

All was done, all was complete. The gardener had already been paid for his work, so he had nothing more to do with the small oasis he had built. And yet...

How many times had he felt eyes on him as he worked? How many times had he heard a soft step on the stone tile, only to turn and see nothing but the merest corner of richly embroidered cloth that vanished out of sight? How many times had he smelled the faintest exotic scent, or heard the faintest chime of bracelets as they rubbed against each other?

Had the mysterious dancer watched him as he worked?

He had made inquiries. His client was no mere street dancer who shimmied for coins cast in the dirt. His client was widely acclaimed as the most beautiful, most skilled, most accomplished dancer, without par. Those who had seen his client’s performances had fallen silent, unable to answer his questions, though whether awe or some other emotion silenced them, he could not say. Nothing more had he learned.

This morning, the last morning he would ever set foot in this small oasis, he resolved to come here hoping to finally see the most beautiful, most skilled, most accomplished dancer for himself.

The morning was silent and quiet, but for the soothing sound of the fountain. He gave the ferns that surrounded the fountain one more critical look, and stooped to pinch off a broken frond that would soon brown –

That same soft step whispered across the stone floor behind him, followed by faint music, dreamy yet sensual, soothing yet exotic. He looked up at once, sure that all he would see was the same scrap of enigmatic fabric that he had seen before.

He was wrong.

The fabric became a hem of deep purple, more blue than red, and richly embroidered with purple and silver threads, even small mirrors. The hem brushed the stone floor like a caress, and then swept aside to reveal two long, gracefully arched feet. As the gardener looked higher, the richly embroidered hem became the border of a sumptuous sari.

This dancer was a maiden, then?

He was wrong again.

The sari draped at the waist in the expected deep pleats, topped with an intricately beaded belt sewn with dangling coins and flashing jewels. The free end did not sweep around a delicate feminine waist, but taut abdominal muscles, and the chest above the belt and sari pleats was bare, broad, and masculine. The end of the sari did not modestly drape a demure maid’s head, but swept over a broad, powerful shoulder. Long, pristine, white hair gloriously crowned an otherwise bare head, and flowed over sculptured shoulders as sensuously as any woman’s mane. Pale, pearly skin was the perfect partner to the pale hair. And such jewelry – a cuff of delicate silver tracery adorned each wrist, and a wide collar of the same tracery edged in silver teardrops gilded the broad chest as handsomely as any Egyptian pharaoh’s sacred jewelry. A matching tracery of silver formed a diadem that held the pale hair out of the dancer’s face.

The gardener’s mouth fell open, but as splendid as sumptuous fabric, beautiful jewelry, and spectacular body were, what held him spellbound were pale silver-grey eyes, limned in the thinnest of black lines, shadowed in smoky grey and silver, and fringed with the longest black lashes he’d ever seen. Perfect black brows arching over the eyes only intensified their power.

Before he could move, those eyes widened in surprise, and the ethereal creature turned to retreat in a swirl of regal purple.

“Please, don’t go,” the gardener pleaded. When the purple fabric hesitated, the gardener salaamed over his knees, his eyes on the floor. “I... I just... wanted to make sure the garden was everything I could make of it before I relinquished it to the one who commissioned it.”

“You are the renowned artist who has made this place?” The dancer’s voice was soft, exotic, melodious.

“Am I... um, I don’t know how renowned I am, but yes, I made this garden. And... are you the dancer who commissioned it?”
“I am.”

“I’m honored.”

With a swish of fabric, the dancer stooped before the gardener. He took the gardener’s hands, and drew him to his feet. Before the gardener could protest, the dancer made a deep bow to him.

“I am grateful for this beautiful sanctuary you have made for me. It is beautiful, and green, and peaceful, and I will enjoy it very much.”

The gardener offered an awkward bow in return. “You’re welcome. I... think I owe you an abject apology.”

One exquisite eyebrow went up, and two perfect lips spread in a faint smile of surprise. Were those lips faintly rouged to complement the high cheekbones? “Do you?”

The garden nodded. “I do. I didn’t agree to make your garden for the longest time. Your representative was so inscrutable that I was sure you must be a gangster.”

The dancer laughed. “You must tell me more of this. Please, let me offer you tea in exchange for your story.”

The gardener’s first thought was to refuse. Gardeners were in a different guild than dancers, a slightly less distinguished one, but didn’t so many villagers claim that guilds no longer were the sole determination of a man’s merit, that one’s own hard work and good deeds also generated merit? Oh, hell; that was merely a polite excuse. If everyone in the village had loudly proclaimed guilds to be the sole determination of anything, the gardener would have still nodded acceptance.

“You’re most kind.”

“Wait here.”

The dancer swept away. Gods, what an elegant creature! The gardener had always admired the graceful sway of a maiden’s sari, but he had no idea how much more compelling a male dancer could make it, combining strength as well as grace – if male was the correct designation for this dancer. The body was so deliciously male, but the trappings so seductively female that the gardener was dazzled by both aspects. Before he could think about that, the dancer was quickly back, bearing a tray of tea things, a basket of small muffins, and a crock of butter. He set the tray down on the marble-topped table under the windows.

“Please, sit,” the dancer asked, so the gardener tucked his kimono around him and squatted on his heels. The dancer gave him another amused smile, drew him up again, and held a hand out towards the lounging bench. “You are a very modest gardener. Please, sit here.”

He sat on the end of the lounging bench, whereupon the dancer poured a cup of tea, sipped it to show it held no harm, and offered it to the gardener with a humble bow. The gardener managed to bow back without spilling his tea, and appreciated the dancer’s precise movements as he selected a muffin, buttered it, and took the traditional nibble to show no harm before placing it on the small plate and offering it to the gardener. Once the gardener had tea and muffin in hand, the dancer poured tea for himself, and made his own muffin. It was as if the dancer presented a time-honored and carefully choreographed ritual. Surely it took years of study and practice to render the simple movements with such subtle beauty.

“So you thought I was a great and powerful gangster, did you?” the dancer grinned, seating himself beside the gardener.
“One with a harem of unhappy maids imprisoned in the dark,” the gardener admitted with a sheepish nod.

The dancer sipped his tea delicately. “Tell me how you came to think so poorly of me.”

The gardener reddened. “Did you see this space before you sent your representative to me?”

The dancer shrugged. “Only briefly. I have not been long in this house, and it has needed much work. Was it cursed, or the scene of a terrible murder?”

The gardener allowed himself a quiet snort. “I can’t say about the rest of the house, but this benighted room was a walled-in, airless, boarded-up pit. That was all the curse it needed to murder any life that tried to survive here.”

“Ah,” the dancer nodded, nibbling a corner of a muffin. “So you thought that the gangster imprisoned his enemies here, or his harem of wives, who are often the same thing. Am I right?”

The gardener nodded. “So every time your representative appeared, I said no, because I didn’t want anything to do with a prison. Then finally he told me you were a dancer who longed for a retreat, which made me more sympathetic. But whether you would commit to the expense to tear out the iron grates and shutters over the outside, and open the space to the light and air that all living things need to grow, was not assured. Only when your representative told me that yes, you understood the structural work that was needed before I planted a single fern or palm, did I agree. Once that was done, any fool could turn it into a garden.”

“You are no fool.” The dancer looked around the transformed space with appreciation. “A fool would not have chosen warm, light stone to make the most of the lack of direct sunlight, or a fountain to soothe the ears. A fool would not have taken the discarded screens from a harem, which is the prison you say it is, and made them into artwork for a beautiful oasis. All this you did, before you added your welcome greenery and exotic flowers. You have a gift.”

The gardener offered a gratified smile. “I’m happy you like it. I hope you’ll spend many peaceful hours here, away from the weariness of the world.”

“I will. You have made a ceremony here, much as I do when I serve tea, or when I dance. There is more than just to drink the tea, yes? There is the grace of the teapot, and of the cup, and then of the one who pours and presents it. There is the smell of the tea when it is just brewed, and the first, fresh taste of the tea, then the deeper taste as it brews over good conversation. There is the first surprising flavor of the muffin, and of the fresh butter before it melts, and how the combination complements the tea. Then there is the lingering flavor of the tea on the tongue when it is gone. There are so many layers of enjoyment and appreciation, yes?”

The gardener nodded.

“Your garden does the same thing. First come the layers of materials – stone, wood, water, earth, plants. Next are the layers of sound and scent of the plants and water. Then the beautiful vision of the stone fountain that contrasts with the wooden screens and the soft plants. Yet unlike my tea ceremony, your garden offers its ceremony each time I enter it, just through its mere presence. That is a magical thing.”

The gardener breathed in, but more than the scent of water and greenery came to him. A subtle hint of exotic perfume – yes, that was the elusive scent he’d smelled so often as he worked – wound its allure with that of the garden and urged him to linger. He invariably found it difficult to leave any garden he made when he had finished it, but this one would be particularly hard, especially now that the owner had cast his glamour over it.

Over him, too.

“Please, more tea?” the dancer urged, holding the pot in ready hands. Oh gods, those beautiful silver grey eyes, so artfully painted, so beckoning, so alluring, calling to both halves of him, and those long, elegant, graceful fingers cupping the teapot like a lover...

He held out his cup with both hands, both asking and receiving in a single act. His fingers warmed as the hot beverage filled his cup, and he sipped, grateful for a reason to drop his eyes. If he gazed too long on his exotic host, he would...

Never mind what he would or wouldn’t think, want, need... or do.

He murmured his thanks softly, trying not to look too hard at the dancer. But the dancer fell silent to sip his tea and admire the garden, which emboldened the gardener to speak.

“Once I began my work here, and I understood that you were not the evil gangster I imagined, I asked in the village about you. You are known as a wonderful dancer, full of fire as well as subtlety, technique as well as passion. So... such an artist would not be happy with a few wisps of kitchen herbs and perhaps a tree unhappily plunked in a pot. I imagined the rigors of your art would make you long to escape to a peaceful and tranquil place, and so I added all the things that I thought you would enjoy. You have noticed the fountain, the carved screens, the warm stone. You have added your own music to my sound of the fountain. But you will find other things in time. That plant will soon bloom with very fragrant flowers. And the one in the corner has the most ridiculously huge pink flowers, as silly as a clown. I thought it would make you laugh, which is never a bad thing.”

The dancer chuckled. “You are right. Happy laughter is always welcome. I will savor your clown flowers all the more because you chose them for me. They are a gift.”

The dancer finished his muffin as neatly as a cat accepting a treat, and sipped his tea. The gardener thought his respite was at an end, and steeled himself to take his leave. But the dancer set his teacup and small plate aside and gave him a smiling look through lowered lashes. Gods, gods, the jolt of adrenaline that flashed through him...

“I would like to offer you a gift, in return for all that you have done to make this sanctuary.”

“You don’t have to,” the gardener scrabbled, too overwhelmed by his racing heart to be graceful. “I mean, you paid for my work, and you paid me well. I am already well rewarded.”

“I paid for a garden, and you could have filled it with your kitchen herbs and a sad tree in a pot, but you were generous to offer much more than that. So I would like to repay your artistry with my own. Will you let me dance for you?”

The gardener swallowed down his eager anticipation, and put his palms together to bow over them. “I would be most honored if you would.”

When the dancer rose, the music rose with him. The confines of the garden were small, but that meant that the gardener could not miss any of the subtlety and grace that went into the dancer’s offering to him. The slow beginning, merely a flex of fingers, a curve of the arms, an exquisite roll of the shoulders, then a fascinating pulse of muscles that started in one wrist, darted up through the arm and across the shoulders, down the other arm, to the wrist, and finally to the very ends of the fingers... the tilt of the head left, then right, following the dancer’s shifting gaze... oh, gods, the undulation of chest, then stomach, then abdomen, and the slow twist and sway of hips in circles, figure eights, ripples up and down... impossible back arches that let fingers brush the floor only inches behind arched feet, and then rise like dancing cobras before falling back to the floor again... the flex of powerful thighs to lower the arched back to the floor, where more undulations from collarbone to pubic bone made a pale torso writhe with passion... the equally impossible rise up to vertical again, when the free end of the sari traced a feather’s light, teasing path over the gardener’s arm, shoulder, cheek...

The music changed from slow and sensuous to a faster, more passionate throb. The dancer’s undulations turned sharper, more intense, and the silver coins decorating the beaded belt at the dancer’s hips flashed and beckoned. If only he had the daring to touch them, to take the end of the sari and pull until all the pleats were undone...

His longing must have shown in his face, because the dancer flicked the end of the sari into the gardener’s hands, and backed away, hips still swaying, abdominals still undulating, shoulders still shimmying. Gods, gods, the fabric ran through his nerveless fingers like water before he could suit action to thought. At the last second, he caught the end of the purple sari before it escaped him. It was impossible not to pull it towards him and gather the unspooling fabric in his arms, unveiling the dancer like a divine gift. In seconds, the dancer was bare but for his beaded and jeweled belt and his silver jewelry. The belt hid the most human part of what otherwise was a celestial deity, but the gardener’s imagination was more than enough to tell him what remained concealed.

“Oh, gods,” he managed to breathe, but it was enough to draw the dancer down beside him.

The dancer kissed him deeply, until every nerve of him tingled with desire. Damn all thoughts of guild rankings – he kissed back with all the passion the dancer had kindled in him, until the dancer’s soft laughter graced his ears. Did he dream that the dancer urged him flat on the lounging couch, still smiling at him? Did he imagine long, nimble fingers insinuating themselves in the knot of his kimono, or did his kimono fall open of its own accord?

He didn’t imagine the jeweled dancer perched atop him. But the mere sight of the beguiling dancer wasn’t enough – he filled his hands with muscled glutes, and his eyes with the dazzle of silver-bound hair and glimmering grey eyes, then his mouth with the sweetness of the dancer’s beckoning lips.

He was not the only one to savor. The dancer sat up on his heels to run his hands over the gardener’s bare chest, humming in delight when his touches garnered the gardener’s sudden intake of breath. The gardener made no protest when deft fingers slipped under him to ease the end of his langot free, but he couldn’t suppress a moan when those same fingers teased loose the knot that held the langot in place. The dancer eased the cloth away to leave the gardener’s cock fully exposed, already hard and aching.

“Such a gift,” the dancer breathed, as he bent over the gardener. He enfolded the gardener’s cock in a warm, moist caress, sucking and stroking until the gardener couldn’t keep himself from thrusting into the dancer’s mouth. In seconds, he wouldn’t be able to keep himself from climaxing deep down the dancer’s throat –

“So eager, so strong,” the dancer whispered, leaving the gardener to groan at the loss of his soft, sucking mouth. “So much pleasure in such a beautiful body, more than I can hold that way. How badly you make me ache for you, I cannot resist...”

Something slick and slippery soothed over the gardener’s cock, and before he could bless his good fortune, the dancer had impaled himself with a gasp and a shudder of pleasure.

“Oh, gods, you are huge,” the dancer hummed, shutting his eyes to savor. “You are in so deep... I am well filled, sweet gardener.”
Impossibly flexible hip joints allowed the dancer to hold all of the gardener’s cock inside him as he leaned forward for a kiss. The gardener kissed back eagerly, pushing his tongue past the dancer’s teeth, and his cock further inside the dancer. The dancer moaned, and pushed away from the kiss, though he still held the gardener’s cock.

“You will have me in seconds, before I can give you one more gift,” the dancer panted.

“You’ve given me so much already,” the gardener whispered, pushing himself up onto his elbows. “Let me return some of the pleasure you’ve given me, so we share it together.”

Greatly daring, the gardener sat up on the end of the lounging couch, and wrapped the dancer’s long legs around his waist. He crossed his legs underneath the dancer’s hips to give him a stable seat, then reached around to find the fastening to the dancer’s belt. He unclasped it, and eased it free. There, freed from its tight confinement, was the dancer’s long, elegant cock. The dancer sighed in relief.

“You are more overwhelming than I imagined,” the dancer murmured, wrapping his arms around the gardener’s shoulders. “How many days have I watched you toil here, such a patient soul within such a beckoning body? How many days did I almost interrupt your work, no matter how I told myself that I must wait for the right moment, when you would see how much I understood your passion for your work, your drive to create such beauty?”

“I knew you were with me, just out of sight,” the gardener replied, stroking the broad shoulders and back under his hands until the dancer rewarded him with a groan of pleasure. “I felt your eyes on me, heard you sigh and the soft step of your foot. That’s when I asked who you were, but those who had seen you dance were struck speechless, and I thought I’d never know the truth about the one who had asked me to transform a black pit into an oasis.”

“I waited until your work was done, so that it received a proper ceremony,” the dancer fluttered long lashes as he stroked the gardener’s kimono off his arms, then cradled his head in long hands to kiss him thoroughly. “One rife with mysteries.”

“Tantric ones?” the gardener grinned. Who couldn’t help but feel confident when a creature both god and goddess held him so intimately?

“Ah, a devotee,” the dancer smiled. “Let us see if we can reveal one such mystery.”

“Which one? There are so many good ones,” the gardener begged.

His answer came not in words, but in a powerful flex of muscles deep within the dancer, a flex that tightened around and teased his cock most deliciously. His breath catching, his head went back as the pulses teased him thoroughly.

“Yes, you know this one,” the dancer cooed, kissing his lips, chin, jaw.

“I’ve never had the pleasure.” The gardener’s breath hitched again when another flex massaged the whole length of his cock. “Oh, gods... that’s intense.”

“For both of us,” the dancer whispered, pulling the gardener close. “Let us see if I can take us both to nirvana...”

The gardener buried his nose in the notch at the base of the dancer’s throat. He held him close as the dancer alternatively flexed and released the muscles that held the gardener’s cock so tightly. As the flexing sped up, so did the gardener’s urgency, and he spread his hands over the dancer’s ribs, searching for his nipples. At the first touch, the dancer shuddered, his entire body spasming as his pleasure rose. Just the sight of the dancer’s delicious body so wracked by his rising made the gardener’s cock all the more sensitive. He had the worst urge to plunge even deeper into the bounty before him, but he had only curled the slightest bit before the dancer was consumed. The steady pulse of contractions around the gardener’s cock exploded into irresistible spasms. All he needed to release was to look at the dancer’s contorted face as his orgasm enveloped him. How could he not follow headlong?

He pulled the dancer hard over his cock and let himself go with a stuttering gasp. Still riding out his release, the dancer curled around him, softly moaning as each spasm shook them. Did he cry out? Was his cry act of worship or carnal release?

It was both.

* * *

They stayed in each other’s arms for some seconds, letting delirium fade, heartbeats slow, breathing steady. Bard twined one hand in Thran’s silky hair and stroked his nape lightly, drawing a hum of contentment from his husband.

“You reduce me to a puddle, lyubov moya,” Thran whispered.

“Welcome to my world.” Bard kissed a soft kiss on Thran’s collarbone before he gave into an irreverent grin. “That was so stunning. Everything. The way you looked, the way you moved, and such a dance I’ve never seen. And after... gods. You have the most amazing ass in the world.”

Snickering, Thran gave him one more internal squeeze. “The Buddha position gives me so much of you to work with, my saint.”

“But that you needed it. You had me at the sari. It was all I could do not to drool.”

“I noticed,” Thran replied with a smug smile, but his kiss took the sting out of his teasing. “For a moment, I worried that I had done too good a job to entice you, and you were overwhelmed.”

“Your dancer was everything a humble gardener asked for.” Bard reached up to draw Thran into a long, thorough kiss. “More. Beautiful, graceful, refined, and so, so talented. I love you, angel. Gods, I love you.”

“You are zoloto moyo, my saint.” Thran’s hand on Bard’s cheek was a tender caress. “My treasure. The way you looked in the langot, with your hair in your eyes... you nearly had me in a second. I have never been so worshipped. Oh, my saint... there are not enough words to tell you how much I love you.”

Bard put his arms around Thran’s legs to keep him close as he stood up. He was soft enough to slip out of Thran, and his husband eased his feet to the floor. They stood embracing for a long moment. The rain still fell, the fountain still chimed, and the plants still lent their green scent to the air. But his husband’s elegant body was warm, and his hair and skin and lips were soft, and the scent of their indulgence lingered.

The moment didn’t need words, so they went upstairs in silence, to become themselves again.
Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint speak of this and that before the former flies back to the ballet, and the latter makes his first casting. Painting progresses, and cherubs enthuse.

Hope you all had a Happy Thanksgiving Day, no matter where you are.

Chapter Notes

As a technical note, I freely admit that casting and welding are very complicated and technical businesses, and in no fashion could I begin to get all the details right for Bard's artistic endeavours. So I have done what all good writers do in such situations - I have waved my hands and made it so. We'll just trust that Bard knows his business, and he gets everything done the way he's supposed to.

As Thran paced slowly up the stairs, smiling at the pleasure he and Bard had shared in the solarium, a soft hum of appreciation whispered behind him.

“You,” Bard rumbled, “are one hellaciously beautiful angel.”

Snickering, Thran cast a look over his shoulder as he reached the bedroom landing. His husband had thrown his kimono back on, but it hung loose and open on his shoulders because he hadn’t bothered to wrap it around him, leaving Thran with a full view of all of Bard’s assets from head to toe. He had his langot in his hand, his carriage was loose and relaxed, and the smile on his face was sly as he pointedly stared at Thran’s backside.

“I do not think I am the angel you think you see,” Thran countered with just as sly a smile. “When I see you look at me as you do now, I think very unangelic things.”

“Mmm. Maybe I can help that along.” Bard’s grin grew a little wider as he sauntered up the last stair and came face to face with Thran. He bent Thran back over one arm into his favorite swashbuckling kiss, caressing thoroughly until Thran was putty in his husband’s arms. Once Bard bought them back to vertical, he closed in for another kiss, nipping at Thran’s lips rather than caressing them gently. Thran hummed in arousal, but Bard eased away to give a pert squeeze to Thran’s glute, then backed towards the bedroom with a mischievous smile.

“Bastard,” Thran growled, prowling after Bard.

“Oh, really? To quote a certain unangelic angel, ‘ Entirely,’” Bard said without apology. “To quote myself, ‘You like me that way.’”

“Gods, I do,” Thran murmured with just as much unabashed enthusiasm. “I must wash, if I am to appear before the company without revealing how I spent the morning. Join me?”
“I won’t turn that down,” Bard agreed. “Though I’m sorry to see my beautiful dancer in his sari and jewels depart for dreamland again. He was perfect.”

“He will come back one day, if you want him to,” Thran replied, stroking Bard’s hair with a loving hand. “I enjoyed his visit as much as you did.”

Thran dropped his sari and belt on the bed and followed Bard into the bathroom, where his theatrical makeup kit still lay open on the sink counter. He removed his diadem, braided his hair loosely, and pinned it back before he tackled his makeup. As Thran took a cleansing wipe from its container and began to gently wipe away the silver, grey, and black makeup from his eyes, Bard watched in the mirror. When most of the paint was gone, Thran soothed on oil to remove the rest, then washed his face with gentle fingers.

“You’re so careful,” Bard commented thoughtfully.

Thran nodded in agreement. “A dancer does not speak during a performance, so his or her face must speak instead. So it is not unusual for us to use makeup to make our faces mirror the role. To rush it on, then scrape it off, can take a toll, especially when we add or change makeup between acts, so we learn to be gentle, or pay the price.”

“You do your own makeup for your performances?”

“I do,” Thran nodded, blotting his face with a towel. “Every dancer does. All dancers are taught this at an early age, and most come to find their own style after a year or two. It is rare for any ballet to have a makeup team – only if the makeup is elaborate or extreme. I have never danced a ballet with such a team, but then the men’s roles do not usually call for that, even if the women’s roles do. There were rare occasions that the female corps had hairdressers to help with wigs or hairpieces, but for the most part we do our hair ourselves, too.”

“What do you do with yours for a performance? Do you have to pin it up?”

Thran grinned. “It depends on the choreographer, the director, the people in charge. At school, my teachers did not approve, so I wore it in the infamous man bun, little different from the girls. It was a pain, but it was my small act of rebellion that was let go because I was very good. There was less issue when I danced at Mariinsky, because once I was known, people wanted to see my long hair, even if I usually braided it. In this country, it has always been up to me. I have never danced with it loose before Immortal, though; usually I have at least some of it pinned out of the way.”

“I badly need a haircut,” Bard observed, shaking his hair until it fell into his eyes. “I thought I’d call for an appointment today. I hope Rowan doesn’t spank me for letting it go so long when I finally get in to see her.”

“I must make an appointment as well,” Thran said, wrapping his hair around his head and stepping into the shower cabinet to turn on the water.

“Do you want me to make an appointment for us both?” Bard asked. “Or would it be quicker if I made you a separate one so you don’t have to wait for Rowan to do us both?”

“I would like us to go together,” Thran admitted. “We could at least talk on the way to and from, and it would not take that much longer for her to do us both. And I like to watch you enjoy yourself.”

Bard grinned. “I’ll call her today, then. I assume you’d rather go in the morning?”

“As early as she can take us, yes,” Thran agreed. “It may take a while to get such an appointment, but as long as it is before the premiere, I am not particular as to the day.”
“I’ll take care of it.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya.” He turned a questioning look on his husband. “To be spanked... is that a kink of yours?”

“Is it a – ?” Bard shot a look at Thran before his face spasmed with laughter. “Oh! No, it’s not for me, sorry to disappoint you. I know what aficionados say about it, but I’m not one of them. It reminds me of when I was a misbehaving little brat far more often than I should have been, and my Gran took after me with a wooden spoon when she’d had enough of my idiocy. Distinctly not sexy.”

Snickering, Thran took off his cuff bracelets, and finally his collar necklace. “It is not for me, either, and for similar reasons – too many ballet masters and their ways to encourage attention in class, or to mete out punishment for misdeeds in the dormitory. One in particular was infamous for his beatings, even of very young children. He did not like my long hair, and sought to... encourage me to cut it, so it became a test of wills. Given the enthusiasm he put into his side of the test, and similar tests he forced upon other children, he was finally reprimanded, which did no good, and eventually he was dismissed. That is unheard of in a system that is so matter-of-fact about harsh discipline. I did not like to be made to feel like shit because of my hair, or punished because I was a very tired ballet dancer pushed beyond what my body could do.”

“I’m glad. I couldn’t hit you, even if you claimed it felt good. It...” Bard’s voice trailed away as he soaped and washed, then he grimaced. “It would be cruel, like your story.”

“And you are not a cruel man.” Thran stroked a hand over Bard’s chest. “Even when you were the king to my seer, you were gentle. Ruthless, but gentle.”

“The dodgy artist who provided the fucking a certain sexual vampire deserved wasn’t particularly gentle,” Bard gave Thran a wink. “And seems to me that neither of us was particularly gentle when we christened your SUV. We both ended up with rug burns after that one.”

“Badges of honor,” Thran proclaimed, laughing when his pretentious words got a guffaw out of his husband. “Though not ones I intend to display for public admiration.”

“Hell, no,” Bard agreed, still laughing. “So what were you saying about either of us being gentle?”

“Perhaps we have not been physically gentle in every one of our games,” Thran conceded with a shrug as he lathered his abdomen. “But we have never struck each other, either.”

Sobering, Bard considered that, then grimaced. “No matter what the kink world says, I think of blows as anger, not foreplay, and I just... it’s just not in me, to give or receive, I still feel guilty about how I grabbed your arm and hustled you into the ballroom when we had our fight. That wasn’t a blow, but it was angry, and I don’t ever want to do it again.”

Bard’s tone was mostly matter-of-fact, with only a tinge of regret, so Thran kept his demeanor philosophical. “We both learned a great deal then. Now that we know how to stay in harmony, how to watch out for each other, we can leave the spank kink to others.”

“Good,” Bard hummed in emphatic agreement before smiling perversely. “It could never compete with our fantasies, anyway. Those are a delight.”

Thran’s growl was a low rumble in his throat as he gathered Bard into his arms to kiss him. “Entirely and spectacularly.”

With a chuckle, Bard kissed back. “All right, I’m done. It’s time we make a good lunch and send you to the ballet, and me to the barn.”
“Indeed,” Thran grinned, turning off the water. “Something with protein.”

“Always.” Bard grabbed Thran’s towel and tossed it to him before grabbing his own. As he stood drying himself off, his eyes fell on Thran’s silver jewelry. “Those are nice pieces. Not merely costume pieces, I think?”

Thran nodded, smiling. “They are very nice silver, yes. Would it bother you to know that they belonged to Vileria?”

Bard shot him a mixed expression, but Thran shrugged without concern. “This was not the first time I have worn them, so put your mind at ease.”

Bard’s expression grew speculative. “Oh? That sounds like a story.”

“A very small one. We bought the pieces for her to attend a party, and because they suited her very well. But for another party, a somewhat... dubious costume party, I wore them.”

“With the sari?”

“Oh, no, I wore harem pants and the funny shoes with turned up toes, yes? Vileria went in the sari as Scheherazade, and I went as the paranoid prince who threatened to kill her every night. You know the story, yes? The Arabian Nights?”

“I do,” Bard nodded. “So what was so dubious about this party?”

“We would have been more in character with the general mood if I had been on a leash, and not a prince but a slave.”

Bard snorted in laughter. “Oh, spanking isn’t your kink, but a little B and D is?”

Thran snickered in kind. “Have you forgotten how we spent our official wedding night, lyubov moya? I enjoyed it immensely. If you would like to make such a pet of me, I would let you.”

“I did that the night you wanted bandits and bonds,” Bard stuck his tongue out at Thran.

“Tcha, my saint,” Thran grinned. “That was sensory arousal, not B and D.”

“So speaks the connoisseur,” Bard parried. “Maybe the king should lead his seer around on a leash. Oh, Vileria already did that. The woman had balls, that’s for sure.”

“She never led me around on a leash, but she did have balls, as you say. That night, we made our appearance and enjoyed the party for the short length of time before matters... deteriorated, and then went home to baby Legolas.” Thran’s grin was wry. “We loved Legolas very much, but we were also often relieved to have him as an excuse to leave such parties early. We were the old, sedate, married couple.”

“At what? Twenty? Twenty-one?” Bard tutted, but gently. “Those are generally the hell-raising years.”

“Neither of us was foolish enough to engage in liaisons with anyone at a party, straight or gay,” Thran explained. “Even if we had faked an interest in someone of the opposite sex, there was still the danger of having official people know of one’s choices. So we made our jeweled appearances, and then we went home.”

Bard shook his head. “Art school was a lot easier. No official government agency gave a rat’s ass about what any of us did, as long as we didn’t burn down the campus.”

“A better situation by far,” Thran nodded. “I am quite ready for lunch.”

“Let’s see what we can scrounge,” Bard agreed, as they came into the bedroom to pull on clothes.

In less than an hour, Thran was well fortified with a chicken sandwich on a wheat bun with lettuce and tomato, his usual chopped vegetables, and a handful of grapes. He shouldered his dance bag, bolstered with Bard’s snacks for him to nibble until he came home, and aimed his SUV out of the driveway.

As he waved farewell to his husband, he savored thoughts of the delightful game he and Bard had played in the solarium. How dazzled Bard had been when he first saw Thran in his finery, his makeup, his beautiful sari. How dazzled he had been to admire his husband’s delicious body in his kimono and langot. He was such a tease, pairing that hard warrior’s body with a gardener’s soft and humble demeanor. How much fun they had had, resisting so much physical bounty to pique each other with their tea ceremony and genteel conversation. Then Bard’s inspired Buddha position – how compelling that had been! It’d hardly taken anything from either of them to rise in such a deep, intimate position. Thran had found it as irresistible as when Bard took him off the ground. To be so supported, yet so deeply impaled, was divine. When Bard had massaged his nipples, Thran had not been able to keep himself from exploding, never mind that neither of them had so much as looked at Thran’s cock. Sublime.

How delicious would that position be if he teased Bard into a more... alpha role? He’d give that some thought –

Thran winced. It was good their solarium game had been so spectacular. Any variations might have to wait until after Immortal’s premiere, eight weeks from now.

Sighing, he drove to the school, and headed for the gymnasium. As usual, he was early, but one or two other dancers were there, already setting up the portable barres. Thran put down his bag and hastened to help them so that they could get started on their work as soon as possible. One by one, more of the dancers joined them. As Ori was with Lettie today, Thran was the one to mop the floor, while Abebe found the piano in the nearby music room. A young girl took her place at the piano, Abebe called the dancers to take their places, and the day’s work began.

As Abebe called the first figures, a dancer at the barre opposite Thran smothered a cough. Thran said nothing, but after spending time with so many sick children in the past week or two, he knew the difference between a cough to clear the throat, and a cough that signaled a cold. This was the latter.

Thran winced again. The Imladris Academy had been inundated with colds and flu for weeks. Late spring it might be, but was it any surprise that germs still lingered, looking for new hosts?

So it began.

* * *

The rain continued steadily after Thran’s departure for the school, so Bard didn’t progress any on Hal’s tree. He had no lack of work, though – he spent the afternoon working on more sketches of the steampunk orrery, and fiddled with the sample aluminum spheres to see how he could get them to stick together. He spent time on his mobile, first with a call from Bilbo asking for more sketches for Celebrían’s gallery, then with Rowan, setting up appointments for him and Thran in three weeks’ time. He also talked to the orrery client about the two directions he had come up with, and emailed sketches for him to consider. Bard’s sense was that the client liked both ideas, but wasn’t too familiar with Greek or Roman mythology, so the gods didn’t resonate with him as much as they did with Bard. That didn’t upset Bard; he still liked the idea of making totems with the heads of the gods, or perhaps a mobile.

He also called Mr. D, to ask about Lance.

“Aye, Bard, he’s at the wilderness camp I told ye about,” the old rugger confirmed. “I half expected him to come of his cage fighting and spitting like any young wildcat, and he did at first. But he seems to have settled a wee bit. I’m nae sure sure how much I trust that, ye ken, but as long as he behaves himself, I’ll take it.”

“How long might he be out there?” Bard asked cautiously.

“Open ended,” the sergeant replied. “It’s up to him more than anything else. He knows that he came a hair’s breadth from getting his sorry ass thrown into the adult justice system rather than the juvenile one. Attempted arson, almost up-in-flames arson... it’s hard to call that a juvenile misdemeanor, isn’t it?”

“I guess it is.”

“Damned straight, it is. The least little dust-up, and he’ll find himself back into that adult justice system, I tell ye. So keep your fingers crossed that he settles down, and finds something to think about rather than how fucking stupid he’s been for the past year.”

Despite himself, Bard smiled at the sergeant’s vehemence. “I’ll keep them crossed, Mr. D.”

“Good lad. Ye take care of your bairns and your husband, and with bit of the grace of Mahal, ye won’t see the likes of yon fool again.”

“You take care of yourself, too, Mr. D. Tilda especially sends her regards.”

“She’s a bonny lass,” Mr. D said gruffly. “I miss seeing her, and her brother and sister, too. Offer them my regards, would ye, lad?”

“I will. Thanks for the update, Mr. D. Take care.”

“I thank ye, Bard, and ye do the same.”

Mr. D rang off without further comment. Bard stuffed his mobile back in his pocket, and went back out to the barn to contemplate three kinds of epoxy and several sizes of small aluminum spheres.

Thursday dawned bright and blustery, so Darla and her two assistants were back painting – today they’d begin on the porch. Thran lingered long enough to watch them set up ladders and set to work before he left to be at the school by ten. The Immortal stage was finished enough for dancing, so rehearsal was now in full swing. Bard’s sculpture was also in full swing at long last – he was excited to head out to the barn for his first casting. While he set up his furnace the barn, the last part of the house received its final coat; the porch ceiling, its first coat of pale blue; and the door, its first coat of red. The porch trim also got its first coat of white, which made a huge difference in the appearance of the entire house. The once-peeling balusters and support beams looked like new, even with just a single coat of paint. If the weather held, the second coat would go on the door, ceiling, and trim tomorrow, and the first coat would go on the floor. After that, Darla would set on the carriage house and the barn, so the place would look stellar by the end of next week. All that remained were the replacement windows –

Bard’s mobile chimed. Could he be there next Wednesday to oversee the start of the window replacement?

Hmm. Had he started to develop ESP?

His furnace was set up, hot, and ready to melt bronze. Bard set his crucible in place, and melted enough small bronze ingots to fill the six flasks for Hal’s tree. He had the flasks lined up and waiting in front of the barn, and the pour went off without a hitch. He wouldn’t know whether the flasks had filled successfully until they cooled, but he’d taken all the care he could, and everything looked promising. He’d leave the flasks to cool outside for the rest of the afternoon before he put them inside the barn overnight. The children would be home soon, and it’d be time to see to them. Despite his excitement, tomorrow morning was soon enough.

Friday came in a rush, and everyone had something to be excited about. All of the children were excited to reach the end of the week; Sigrid, however, was particularly excited. Today was the college open house to supplement the one two weeks ago that had been poorly attended because so many children had been sick. Thran was excited because today he would meet Luka and Charisse for their first flying lesson. Bard was excited to see the results of yesterday’s bronze casting. As soon as the painters arrived, Bard trotted out to the barn, threw open the bay, and switched on the overhead lights. The six flasks waited on his workbench, and he opened the first one with eager fingers. Had it properly modeled the trunk? Had the bronze filled it properly? He unbolted the two halves of the mold and gently brushed the green sand from the metal.

It looked perfect.

He unmolded the other pieces of the tree, and they all looked to be properly filled and cast, without dimples or excess bits.

Thank you, gods.

He returned the green sand to its bucket to await his next casting, and carefully cleaned the pieces. Now to weld them together. He thought of Thran, smiling at his husband’s fantasy of a hunky, bare-chested Frank Frazetta-esque warrior as the archetype for a welder. As he’d warned Thran, he wasn’t such a vision when he fired up his torch – this might be a small piece of sculpture, but he still put on heavy welding jacket, tough jeans, steel-toed boots, heavy gloves, and his welding mask. Not only that, he put on sunscreen, too – the light reflected off many metals, particularly shiny ones, could cause a nasty sunburn anywhere his protective gear didn’t completely cover. This piece might be small and not shiny, but he put on sunscreen, anyway, as a matter of course. Out came his torch, on went all his gear, and on went the torch –

No, not yet. Before he turned on the torch, he warned the painters to stay out of the barn until he was done; an arc-welding torch burned brightly, and could damage eyesight if one looked at it too long.

Painters warned, he headed back to the barn, clamped the tree trunk in his vice, put the roots to hand, and turned on the torch. After so many years of commercial welding, he could consider Hal’s tree as trivial, but that would be a mistake. It called for a delicate hand to join the pieces together without leaving residue that he’d have to polish away later, or damaging the two pieces so that the join would be visible no matter how much polishing he did. He took his time, ensuring each join was solid and stable before moving to the next one.

About halfway through, he remembered to surface for lunch, and made himself a hefty ham sandwich before heading back out to the barn. This time, he remembered to put his warning sign –
Metal In Progress – Go Away – outside the bay so that no one would venture inside in the middle of his welding. This time, however, he completed all his welds to his satisfaction without interruption. He propped the tree up on rebar braced with heavy boards to keep it steady while it cooled, and came out into the open air for a much-needed stretch. He wandered over to the porch to see how it progressed, and was gratified to find that the second coat on the ceiling and trim was done, and the floorboards gleamed with their first smooth coat of black. Darla put down her brush to ask if he’d be around tomorrow for her crew to get another day’s work in, and he’d just agreed when the children came walking up the driveway from the bus stop.

“Da!” Bain heralded, waving excitedly. “You’ve got your welding jacket on! Did you already do it?”

“I did,” Bard confirmed with a satisfied grin. “Mr. Hal’s tree is all put together now.”

“I want to see!” Tilda shouted, skipping up beside him. “It’s really all in one piece now?”

“It is, little doll. It’s in the barn, cooling.”

“I’d like to see, too,” Legolas came up behind Tilda.

“Sure,” Bard led the way to the barn. “Welcome home, sweetness. How was your college thing today?”

“It was amazing,” Sigrid enthused as she followed the other children into the barn. “I’m so glad they had another one. I talked to six different schools about a whole bunch of things.”

“Oh, look, Kukla!” Legolas pointed at the tree propped up on the workbench. “It really is all in one piece now! It’s almost done!”

“It’s got a ways to go,” Bard amended. “Polishing, working to smooth the welds, then the patina. Then I fasten it to its rock base, and put on the leaf. After all that, then it’ll be done.”

“How long will all that take?” Legolas asked.

“Best of all possible worlds, another week or so. No more than two, I hope.”

“It looks like a real tree already,” Tilda nodded. “I like it.”

“Thank you, little doll.” Bard shrugged off his welding jacket before he ruffled his youngest daughter’s hair. He hung it up on its hanger, and led the way out of the barn. “Everyone’s ready for a snack?”

“I am!” Bain and Legolas chorused, drawing Sigrid’s laughter. Bard pulled down the barn bay door and everyone headed for the house. As Bain and Legolas ran ahead, Bard warned them about the wet paint on the porch, so of course everyone had to detour to inspect the day’s progress.

“Wow, Da, it looks amazing,” Sigrid breathed. “I never realized just how beautiful this old place could look.”

“I love the red door,” Tilda nodded emphatically as she pointed to the red in the side lights and transom glass. “Look, it matches the red in the stained glass.”

“It does,” Sigrid agreed, linking arms with Bard. “Oh, Da, it all is just the most amazing thing. All of it.”
Bard patted Sigrid’s arm. “The old girl’s a young beauty again. A fit home for the lot of us.”

“The ancestral home of Clan Ffyrnig,” Legolas smiled, coming to stand next to Bard. “It’s the most beautiful place I’ve ever lived.”

“Even better than Saint Petersburg?” Sigrid looked around Bard to gaze inquiringly at Legolas.

The boy nodded as firmly as Tilda had. “Even better. I don’t remember it very well, but it was a flat, not an entire house. This is a lot nicer, and we have a yard, and a solarium, and a ballroom.”

“A ballroom that looks like a cake,” Bain grinned. “Oh, I shouldn’t have said cake. It reminds me how hungry I am. Head for the kitchen!”

The boys raced off, Tilda between them, leaving Bard and Sigrid to follow them more sedately. She squeezed Bard’s arm and gave him an affectionate smile. “Now, aren’t you glad I made you call the guy in 5B back in November to come out here with you?”

Bard chuckled. “Oh, you’re taking credit for all this, then?”

“Maybe,” Sigrid snarked back in kind.

“No maybe about it, sweetness. You did us proud. Now look what’s happened – we’re happy and healthy, I’m an artist again, we have Ada and Legolas, and we live here.”

Sigrid gave him a surprised look. “Oh, come on, Da! It wasn’t just me – you had a little something to do with it, too.”

Bard gave her a fond smile. “We all did, sweetness. All six of us.”

Sigrid held onto Bard’s arm a little tighter, and her smile grew to match his.

“So,” he said as they strolled to the mudroom door. “Tell me about your college fair.”

As Sigrid launched into a nonstop monologue, Bard was content to listen. So much excitement, enthusiasm, and hope were in Sigrid’s voice, and all were worth savoring.

Who said Thanksgiving came only in November?
Chapter 134

Chapter Summary

The Maid, the Soldier, and Death learn to fly.

Chapter Notes

Rigging a performer to fly is very exacting and demanding. The research I did for this chapter gave me a healthy respect for the people who design and implement flying elements for theatrical productions, which is why I emphasized the precautions they take to make sure performers fly safely. They literally have the lives of their charges in their hands, and I salute them one and all.

For the sake of this story, I have simplified the procedures and processes expert riggers employ, so please, don't take this story as the end all and be all of the profession, and Don't Try This At Home. It is a mark of the importance of this element of theatre that it has its own safety certification process, the Entertainment Technician Certification Program (ETCP), to make sure that its members scrupulously safeguard rigging crews, performers, and audience members. ETCP certification is the professional standard for any theatrical rigger, which is why Fly By Nighthawks included notice of their certification on their signage. They are among the best of the best.

The next time you see a production with flying performers, take a moment to salute the folks behind the flying that make the magic happen :-)

As usual, I don't hold any rights to The Incredibles, or to the incredible Edna Mode. But boy, wouldn't it be fun to be Edna??? I could so do that!

The 1,000 Pound Club is a real thing. Hugh Jackman lifted the amounts I listed for Half Ton to earn his entry into the elite club, so our rigger is in good company :-)

Luka Caragiale's name is taken from the Romanian poet of the same name, just because. Charisse LaFleur recognizes what a sprightly flower our petite dancer is, again, just because.

Thran was thankful to have a day away from the Imladris Academy and the rest of the UVB company, but not only to have a respite from the increasing number of coughs and wheezes that had punctuated yesterday’s rehearsal. He had weathered Clan Ffyrnig’s bout with colds and flu, so he hoped that would provide him some immunity from the germs that flew around the dancers who rehearsed on the school’s stage. But today, he, Charisse, and Luka would have their first lesson in how to fly with more than the power they generated through their bodies. Today, they would fly on wires.

As he drove to his first flying lesson, he had no idea what to expect. A flying harness of some sort, yes. Perhaps large burly men would heave him aloft and let him gently down? Or would some sort of mechanical pulley provide the impetus? Thran was excited to find out.

He found the business easily enough – on the front of the building housing the firm was a huge image of a bird with wings spread wide, clear indication of the firm’s name – Fly By Nighthawks. The smaller print below the name read Riggers Extraordinaire, and below that read ETCP Certified.

Certification boded well. Ori had told him this company had an excellent safety record, as well, so he expected to be in good hands as he learned the particulars of how to effectively bring Death from on high down to the battlefield. It would ruin the whole effect of Death soaring so spectacularly above the stage if he stumbled upon landing, or fell flat on his face.

Luka was already in the lobby, peering with great interest at the many framed still shots from various productions the company had rigged. Several Peter Pans, of course, and almost as many Mary Poppinses. Pictures of Tarzans – who knew that was a musical? – and Easter pageants and Christmas angels mixed with pictures of several Broadway productions – Thran recognized one or two Billy Elliotts among them. That further reassured Thran that he and his fellow dancers would be in good hands.

“Good morning, Thran!” Luka waved. Thran’s lips curved up at the excited, gleeful expression on the young dancer’s face. “I told them we’re here, so our instructor will be along in a minute. I’m so excited about this! Aren’t you? The chance to fly around on stage – how cool is that?”

“Very cool,” Thran admitted with a grin that was likely as gleeful as Luka’s own. Both of them could easily be Bain and Legolas presented with a new zombie apocalypse game. “I have looked forward to this very much. My children are quite envious.”

“My girlfriend thinks I’m crazy,” Luka admitted, looking disappointed. “But... she says that about dancing in general, so... maybe she won’t be my girlfriend for much longer. It’s hard to explain the long hours to her, and the things I can and can’t eat, and working on Saturday, and doing barre even on Sunday, and now flying...”

His shrug was not as disconsolate as it could have been, and to see his face light up when Charisse came through the door explained why. Thran recalled his own pangs of worry about whether Bard could understand all the rigors Luka had just listed. As long as Luka’s infatuation with the lovely Charisse didn’t interfere with his work, Thran was content to let matters proceed as they would.

“Bonjour, mes chers!” Charisse heralded with a sunny smile and a wave. “Ça roule?”

“Comme d’hab,” Thran grinned in reply.

“Bonjour, Charisse,” Luka murmured softly, which Charisse rewarded with a wider smile.

“So, today we learn to fly comme des oiseaux,” Charisse laughed. “Like the great bird on the sign outside.”

“I just told Thran how excited I am about it,” Luka replied. “Though you and I get to fly up and that’s all. Thran gets to fly down.”

“Mr. Oropherson?” A very strange man came towards them. He was big and burly, with bright red hair in dreadlocks topped with a knitted beanie, and a lush bushy beard. His clothes were even more eccentric – a silver grey kilt, thick knitted socks, and heavy black construction boots, topped with a black and baggy Fly By Nighthawks tee. He was almost as heavily tattooed as Mr. D.

“I am Thran Oropherson,” Thran took the brawny hand that extended out to him. “May I introduce my colleagues, Luka Caragiale, and Charisse LaFleur?”
“Good to know you. I’m Robbie MacPhearson, senior head rigger for Fly By Nighthawks. I’ll be your flight attendant today, ha, ha. Just call me Robbie, or Rob, or dammital Robbie when you get to know me better,” the man gave them a mischievous grin.

“Thran, Charisse, and Luka, and we hope we do not give you reason to call us those damned foolish dancers once you get to know us,” Charisse replied without batting an eye, but with plenty of humor.

“All right! I think we’ll get on just fine,” Robbie’s grin was appreciative. He nodded towards the far door. “Come on. Let’s go flying.”

“I can’t wait!” Luka bubbled, as the three dancers followed their instructor. He led them into a large empty space, three sides of which featured bright green walls. The high ceiling was festooned with an incomprehensible collection of rigging, from wires, bars, tracks, and ropes, as well as lights and other components of theatrical stage equipment. As Thran and his compatriots took in the sights, Robbie held his arms wide.

“Welcome inside the world’s biggest lime,” Robbie said with another wide grin. He very much reminded Thran of Bain when he teased his siblings.

“It’s... very green,” Charisse admitted, taken aback at the intense color. “A very bright green.”

“It is, that,” Robbie agreed. “We do a lot of green screen work for films, hence the nerve-wracking color. You get used to it after a while.”

“I imagine it’s... very invigorating,” was Luka’s comment.

“It’s obnoxious, but that’s okay,” Robbie grinned. “Come on, let’s get you into harness.”

Two other riggers in black company tees were to one side of the big room, crouched on the floor beside three flying harnesses. They stood at Robbie’s approach. One was a burly black man who wore a close-fitting crocheted cap on his bald head, and had well-muscled arms and shoulders. The other was a tiny Vietnamese woman with thick black hair in a queue almost as long as Thran’s.

“Hey, guys,” Robbie waved to his colleagues. “Charisse, Thran, and Luka, that’s Fong Shiv, and that’s Mustafa Garland.”

“Tink,” the woman waved.

“Half Ton,” the man grinned.

“Interesting names,” Thran laughed.

“Tink’s trained so many Peter Pans that she’s become the patron saint of Pans,” Robbie explained. “Half Ton became a member of the elite powerlifting Thousand Pound Club when he deadlifted four hundred and ten pounds, squatted three hundred and fifty-five pounds, and benched four hundred and ten pounds a couple of years ago.”

“Ah, so we are in good hands, then,” Thran nodded approvingly. “A man who can bench press four hundred and ten pounds will have no problem to heave me into the air.”

“What are you, about one-eighty?” Robbie looked Thran up and down.

“Five pounds less,” Thran corrected.

Robbie nodded, then eyed Charisse and Luka. “A hundred, and one-twenty, about?”
Both dancers nodded.

“Okay. So let’s get you fitted in the harnesses, and we’ll talk about what you need to do in your show. Thran and Luka, if you don’t already have on your dancer’s belts, put ‘em on. I want to rig both of you in what you expect to wear in the show, as much as I can.”

“Luka is probably all right in his tights,” Thran explained, “but my costume is more involved. And it has a cape.”

“No capes,” Tink muttered to Half Ton with a rueful smile.

“A cape does complicate things,” Robbie conceded. “But Tink just likes to channel Edna Mode from The Incredibles."

“One of my children’s favorite movies,” Thran nodded. “And I understand the problem. But my choreographer insists that the cape is an essential part of the scene, a very dramatic entrance. I dance Death, Lord of the Underworld, who descends upon the carnage of a battlefield to collect the souls of the dead. The cape is very light and billowy, and is to stream behind me as I descend to, shall we say, make the grand entrance.”

“I talked to your choreographer about it a little. He’s a bit of an excitable dude, isn’t he?”

All three dancers laughed. “To say the least,” Thran confirmed.

“We’ll make it happen. It shouldn’t be too hard, given the harness we’ve got for you. But first, you need to learn to fly.”

The fitting took longer than Thran expected, but as Robbie explained, the company took its safety certification very seriously, and making sure the correct harness was snug and properly seated was important for both safety and comfort of the performer. It was a simple enough contraption, a vest-like thing made of tough, form-fitting fabric pieces and mesh strapping that went tightly over both shoulders and around both thighs. The wire attached at the back, between the shoulder blades.

“This is a single point harness,” Robbie explained as he worked on Thran’s harness. Beside him, Tink adjusted Charisse’s harness, and Half Ton, Luka’s. “From the discussion I’ve had with your folks, none of you will have much to do other than go up or down one time – no flipping, no sailing back and forth – so a single-point harness is all you need. It calls for only a single cable to do the lifting from the back. If you were turning flips in the air, we’d put you in a different harness that would support you at the waist with two cables, so you could somersault.”

“Thran goes down, and Luka and I go up,” Charisse shrugged. “Simple, I hope?”

“It’s never simple,” Robbie shook his head. “Every job’s got its bits and bobs. We take as much pains with your up and down as we do with Peter Pan where we’ve got as many as four people in the air at the same time. Safer that way.”

“Good,” Charisse gave an emphatic nod. “We dancers work so hard for many years to do what we do. I don’t want to undo so much work with a single flight.”

“We’ve worked with a lot of dancers,” Robbie assured her. “You’ve got a lot more going for you than most amateurs, exactly because of all that work. You know your bodies well, you know balance well, you know control well. Those will help us keep you safe, too.”

The trio of instructors made a few more adjustments, then Half Ton attached a wire to Charisse’s harness. “Ladies first, as they say,” he winked at Charisse.
“I’m ready!” she clapped her hands in excitement.

“Okay, this is just to check the adjustment of your harness, that everything’s as comfortable as it can be,” Robbie explained. “We’ll take you up a bit, and we’ll check the fit again. Thran and Luka, you watch how this goes, because your turns are next. Ready?”

At Charisse’s excited nod, Half Ton hauled on her rope, and up she went about three feet. She lifted both arms out as if they were wings streaming behind her, and arranged her legs in a fish dive. “Oh! It is much harder to hold the pose when the lift is so high up to the shoulders!”

Half Ton lowered Charisse slowly to the ground, making sure she got her feet solidly under her before he released the tension. All three of the dancers had their harnesses adjusted to make the lifting point slightly farther down their backs.

“This will make your position easier to hold, but also to tip over, so take it slowly,” Robbie cautioned, as Half Ton lifted Charisse up again.

“Oh! So I see!” Charisse agreed. “The balance is a bit harder, but it is much easier to hold the position.”

Luka was next, and with the adjustment, he, too was soon a few feet off the ground in the same fish dive position. When Thran followed him aloft, it was momentarily disconcerting, then exhilarating. He tried the same fish dive as his colleagues had, with the same success.

“You’re ready to fly,” Robbie grinned. “So here’s the deal. You stand over there, and we hoist you up over here. That’ll get you flying from there to here. Ready to give it a go?”

“Absolutely,” Luka said with bated breath, making Charisse and Thran laugh. Tink went with them to show them where to stand, then attached the wire to Charisse’s harness. At Tink’s signal, Robbie counted three, and up Charisse went, then across the huge space. An ecstatic cry of glee punctuated her brief flight.

“So amazing!” she called to Luka and Thran, when she was safely back on the ground.

“Oh, my gods, it is!” Luka yelled as he went aloft.

“All right, Thran,” Tink warned him. “You’re going to get a bit higher, because both Robbie and Half Ton will boost you. Keep your core strong, that’s the trick.”

“I hear and obey,” Thran grinned back, as he stooped down to let her attach the wire to his back. Tink waved their readiness, Robbie counted three, and up Thran sailed across the room. “Oy, suka blyad, Death flies through the air!”

The riggers gave them several more flights until all three felt comfortable with the basic take off, flight, and landing. Their next instruction was tailored to the specifics of their roles, where Luka and Charisse would fly up together, and Thran would fly down. A tall tower was the takeoff point for Thran, and the landing point for Luka and Charisse. His colleagues seemed to have no fear of the height to which they were boosted, though Thran was very much more aware of it. It was far easier to stand on the ground and look up than it was to stand at the height and look down, much less be hoisted off that height and then lowered down.

After several practice runs, the riggers worked with Luka and Charisse to fly up to the platform hand in hand. Thran had an easier time of it, and even managed to think about just how Death would swoop from on high. He thought of Rahmiel with wings fully extended, and experimented with that a little to see what worked best.
As he took a break to watch Luka and Charisse work in tandem, he asked Robbie, “Do you know the Imladris Academy auditorium, where our ballet will appear?”

The rigger nodded. “I’ve done two shows out there. Nice facility. The building’s not that old, unlike the rest of the place. An old church or something, if I remember.”

“Monastery, yes,” Thran amended. “But the auditorium is a new addition, you say?”

“Yeah, and a good thing,” Robbie grunted. “The old stuff’s cool to look at, but hell to put an up-to-date presentation space in it. The new addition’s got nice features for a secondary school space. More thought went into allowing for lighting, rigging, all that stuff, so while it’s not anything as elaborate as a Vegas show spot, it’s got a solid structure to support fliers. You’ll be safe – of course you will. We wouldn’t have agreed to the job if the space couldn’t support it.”

“The school’s attention to such things does not surprise me,” Thran said. “It was begun for children of many artists, and it would not neglect the performing arts.”

“Imladris supported us big time when we moved out here from the city into a bigger facility,” Robbie nodded. “So we support Imladris in kind. When your man told us about expanding the arts festival to include more performing arts, we were all over it, because it means more business for us. We cut the cost of our services for your ballet in half, so you get a cost break, but we get more than you do out of the deal. We get a tax deduction, we help the school, we help the arts festival, and more companies see the school as a good facility and us as a good production partner. Winners all around.”

“Indeed,” Thran agreed. “Our ballet company has many hopes pinned to this production, too. More work, more patronage, and the chance to bring a new ballet to the world.”

“Even better.”

“You said that you talked to our choreographer. Did he tell you about his wish that I fly not just over the stage, but over the audience, too?”

Robbie stopped to look at him in surprise. He waved to Half Ton and Tink to hold off on the next flight for Luka and Charisse to give Thran his full attention. “No, he didn’t mention that little detail.”

“I thought he might have overlooked that. From your expression, this wish is not a good one, no?”

“No.” Robbie’s shake of the head was emphatic. “It’s not. Like I said, Imladris’s auditorium’s got a lot of nice features. We’ll have no problem flying you and your two friends onstage, none at all. But over the audience – no. That’d call for a whole other set of supports and rigging, and the building’s not set up for that. Sure, you can throw a hellacious lot of money at it, but for a thirty-second flight? It’s not worth it. Even if you decided to throw money at it, you won’t get the construction and certification done in time for your premiere, much less the rigging design. Stick to stage flying at Imladris. Save the buzz over the audience when you take the show to Vegas.”

“That is sensible,” Thran agreed, not at all perturbed. At his easy acceptance, Robbie gave him a penetrating look.

“Ah. You weren’t too eager to be the one who buzzed the audience, were you?”

Thran chuckled. “It would have been a wonderful spectacle. It will be, one day. But for now, I am content if my first flight is not so precipitous. I will deal with the disappointment of the choreographer.”
“Good luck with that,” Robbie snorted frankly. “That Irmo... he’s famous, you know? And not just for his brilliant choreography.”

“I am well aware,” Thran offered a considered shrug. “But despite his... animation, he has made a brilliant ballet out of my story, and so I deal with the rest. He has learned that he cannot always get exactly what he wants from me, so he will adjust accordingly.”

“Good enough.” Robbie waved at Tink and Half Ton that they were back to attention on the three dancers, and their practice resumed.

At the end of two hours, all three dancers had made good progress on their flying. They would have four more lessons here at the Fly By Nighthawks studio, and then in another three weeks, with less than a month to go before Immortal’s premiere, Robbie and his crew would be onsite for several run-throughs of the dancer’s flights. They would also be present for all the full rehearsals to practice the rigging and unrigging. This was of little concern for Charisse and Luka, whose flights were in the last scene of the ballet. Thran’s, however, presented a bit more of a challenge, because he had to dance full scenes immediately after his descents onto the battlefield. They would have to figure out how to unhook Thran from his line onstage without the audience seeing it.

“We’ll pick that up onsite,” Robbie assured Thran as the lesson came to an end. “Maybe we dress one of our riggers as one of your dead bodies, and when you land he stands behind you to unhook the line. We’ll see what we have to work with before too long.”

“I thank you for your consideration,” Thran nodded, as Half Ton helped him out of his harness. “And for your expertise, too, Half Ton, and Tink. You have all been good teachers.”

“This was amazing,” Luka grinned. Despite two hours strapped in a tight and sometimes uncomfortable harness, as well as a lot of sailing around a big space, the young dancer’s enthusiasm was undimmed. “This was so much fun, and I learned a lot.”

“I liked it, too,” Charisse added with a wide smile. “It was hard work, but very enjoyable hard work.”

“We’ll see you back here soon,” Robbie led them out of the studio and back towards the lobby. “You lot were pretty easy. There’s a lot to be said for disciplined fliers, and you all were.”

“Oh, heck, yeah,” Tink made an exaggerated sigh. “So much easier than that last bunch of Tarzan fliers. Remember that one boy, Half Ton?”

“The one who tried to fly around the other fliers and tangle the lines? Oh, lordy, that kid nearly did me in.” The rigger made tsking noises and rubbed a hand over his face in exasperation. “I was ready to hogtie that kid in the rafters until he settled down. Robbie finally set him straight.”

“Easy,” Robbie shrugged when the three dancers gave him inquiring looks. His grin took on an evil cast as he pointed to an imaginary miscreant. “You do that again, and you’re grounded. Literally. Worked better than it does with my own kids. He didn’t cause any trouble after that.”

“Thank gods,” Tink muttered, looking up at the heavens for patience. “And no one got hurt.”

“Even better,” Thran agreed. “So we will see you again soon. You took very good care of us, and we appreciate it.”

“Our pleasure,” Robbie held up a hand in farewell as the dancers shouldered their bags. “Take care, and good luck with Irmo.”
The dancers waved, and headed for their cars.

“That was brilliant. So cool,” Luka continued to murmur, as they crossed the parking lot. “So very, very cool.”

“It was a lot of fun,” Charisse agreed. “I am afraid that today’s barre will seem anticlimactic after our lesson.”

“I will do what I can to enliven it,” Thran grinned. “I will explain to Irmo how he cannot have me fly over the audience.”

“Oh, that’ll throw gasoline on his fire,” Luka winced.

“It will, but it will not change the outcome. The auditorium cannot support it, so I will not support it, and we will just have to distract Irmo from his disappointment in some fashion.”

“Tell him we take the show to Vegas as Robbie suggested, and he will not be disappointed for long,” Charisse giggled.

“That might distract him from our premiere entirely,” Thran laughed. “We will sort it out, however it needs. So a bientôt, mes amis. We will meet again shortly at the school.”

With smiles and waves, the three dancers separated, and Thran climbed into his SUV well pleased with the day’s progress.

He couldn’t wait to tell Bard and their children what it was like to fly.
Chapter 135

Chapter Summary

The angel has an exciting tale to tell, and the saint shows his youngest cherub how a certain tree grows close to maturity.

It was just after eleven o’clock in the evening at the ancestral home of Clan Ffyrnig. Bard was in the sitting room, idly watching Bain and Legolas play their car racing game. His sketchpad was on his lap and his pencil was in his hand, but he hadn’t sketched anything for a good half hour. The day’s rigors in the barn had worn him out, but it was a good kind of worn out, so he enjoyed the boys’ snarky banter back and forth without guilt. He’d cast his first metal in years today, and it had come out fine. He’d sketched ideas for the next ones, ideas he loved. He’d fooled with so many tiny aluminum spheres that he expected to dream of being inundated with them tonight. Sigrid was upstairs, he hoped not still talking to Finn, given the late hour; Tilda had gone to bed an hour ago. The only reason the boys were still downstairs was that Legolas had pleaded to be allowed to stay up until his father came home, and Bain wanted to keep him company. It was the end of the school week, and while Legolas still expected to go to his fencing lesson tomorrow at nine, he was young enough to make up for the lack of sleep later in the weekend. So Bard had said yes. Who would be mean enough to deny a child the chance to see his hard-working father?

Bard would be happy to see his angel, too. He missed not having Thran’s smiling presence to anchor the supper table, to share tea with him in the sitting room, and to tease Tilda as they went through her French vocabulary.

When the mudroom door finally opened, Legolas almost hurled his game controller into Bain’s lap and bounded off the sofa with a whoop.

“Papa’s home!” Legolas crowed, drawing Bain’s laughter.

“That’s one way to win a race,” Bain snickered to Bard, as he maneuvered his car across the finish line. “He was ahead, too, so thank you, Thran.”

Bard grinned. “I think it’s safe to turn the whole thing off now.”

“Yeah, likely,” Bain agreed. “Can I have something to eat?”

“The usual stuff,” Bard replied, as he got up to head into the kitchen. “Nuts, cereal, peanut butter, fruit, yogurt…”

“Stuff that’s good for me, yeah, I know,” Bain exhaled as if he carried a huge burden. “Really, Da – would a bowl of ice cream kill me?”

“Can’t be too careful,” Bard teased back.

“Oh, Da,” Bain pouted, but followed Bard into the kitchen nevertheless.

“Welcome home,” Bard greeted Thran with a wave. His husband looked tired, but not exhausted, and his smile was unforced. “Good day, I hope?”
“Such a morning I have had,” Thran grinned, hugging Legolas, then fist-bumping Bain. “I had my first flying lesson today, and it was wonderful!”

Footsteps skittered down the central steps, and Sigrid trotted into the kitchen. “Ada! You’re home at last! Did you do the flying lesson today?”

“I did, I did!” Thran confirmed. He gave Bard a quick hug, then Sigrid. “I know it is late, but I want to tell you all about it, rather than wait until tomorrow morning.”

“I want to hear, too,” Bard agreed, grinning at how four faces turned towards him, as if he were the keeper of bedtime... well, he was for most of the family, but it was funny to see Thran’s expression turn just as inquiring as the children’s. “Are you hungry? Bain was about to have a snack, so what can I get you, angel?”

“I want soup, if there is any,” was Thran’s request. “And I want to be out of my dance belt. I will dash into the half bath with my leggings and so forth, and be right back.”

“All right, lads and lass, let’s get some food on the table for the hungry ones.” Bard opened the fridge door. “Sweetness, do you want anything?”

“Is there any popcorn left?” the girl asked quickly.

“Ooh, popcorn!” Legolas echoed. “That’s for me, too.”

“That does sound good,” Bain brightened. “I’ll get it out of the pantry.”

While Bard warmed a pan of soup for Thran, the children busied themselves with making the popcorn, and assembling the different spices they liked to sprinkle on it. Legolas had never tried cinnamon on popcorn before, but despite Bain’s grimace of distaste, he thought it sounded good.

“Ugh, Legs!” Bain protested. “What you want is cheese and bacon sprinkles!”

“Bacon sprinkles?” Legolas looked skeptical. “Do we even have bacon sprinkles?”

“No, but I keep asking Da to get some,” Bain gave Bard a pointed look. “I had them on popcorn at a birthday party once. Totally awesome!”

“I like Parmesan cheese,” Sigrid said. “And oregano. It’s like pizza popcorn.”

“I am back!” Thran dashed back from the half bath, now clad in tee, leggings, and socks. “Gods, I am starving!”

“You’re in a very good mood,” Bard observed, smiling as he stirred a pan of Thran’s soup. “It must have been something special, this flying lesson.”

“It was!” Thran grinned, taking the plate of seeded wheat rolls and butter that Sigrid handed him to put on the table. “As soon as we all sit down, I will tell you –”

“What’s going on?” a sleepy voice came from the door to the hallway. There stood Tilda with Mr. Bun under her arm, rubbing her eyes. “Is it a party? I smelled popcorn.”

“Three bags full!” Bain chortled, cycling the next bag through the microwave. “Come on, Til! There’s lots!”

“Why is there popcorn?” Tilda looked around in blurry confusion. “It’s not a holiday, or did I forget one?”
Sigrid came to pick her up, though with difficulty. “Ada had his flying lesson today, Til. He’s hungry, so we’re making soup for him, and popcorn for us. I’ll bring you a bowl if you’d like some, too.”

“I’d rather have cheese,” Tilda said sleepily, leaning her head on Sigrid’s shoulder as her sister carried her to the table. As Sigrid deposited her in her chair, the little girl’s eyes sharpened. “Flying lesson? Ooh! Ada flew today?”

“I did,” Thran stooped by her chair and tapped a long index finger playfully on her nose. “I am sorry we woke you up, Kukla, but I am very excited, and everyone is very excited with me.”

Tilda blinked until she was more awake. “Then I’m glad I woke up. I want hear about it, too.”

Sigrid brought a stack of small snack bowls to the table, as well as a small board bearing a chunk of Tilda’s favorite Double Gloucester cheese and a cheese knife. Bain dumped the last bag of popped corn into an enormous serving bowl, and handed it to Legolas to bring to the table. Bard handed Thran a serving bowl from the cabinet, then followed him to the table with the pan to fill the bowl with warm soup. As soon as Bard sat down, Tilda crawled into his lap to sleepily munch her cheese curled against his chest. He cuddled her close to listen, though she perked up as Thran launched into a description of his lesson with Charisse and Luka. Despite the late hour, Thran was all smiles as he told them about how green the studio walls were, what his outlandish instructor looked like, how small Tink was and how she got her name, why Half Ton had earned his nickname, and what it was like to stand atop a metal platform some twenty feet in the air and leap off it.

“You jumped off?” Bain gaped. “You really jumped off a twenty-foot platform?”

“I did,” Thran grinned proudly. “Many times!”

“Was it scary?” Tilda sat up on Bard’s lap to peer down the table at Thran.

“At first, very scary,” Thran nodded emphatically. “Twenty feet does not sound like much until you stand atop something that high and look down, because then it seems twice as high. That is almost three times as high as I am, yes? Perhaps at the school, I will have to be higher. I do not know. But the riggers who worked with us are very careful and very exact, and I felt as safe as one can feel to stand so high up. I was always on the wire when I climbed up, and at least one of the riggers always had my line in hand in case I fell, and of course Half Ton or Robbie held my line when I flew. It was very exciting.”

Bard grinned. “I can tell. You’re gesticulating.”

Thran made a raspberry and let his hands flap high above his head. “If you think I am excited, you should have seen Luka. He could not contain himself. He flew very well, and so did Charisse. She looked like the most elegant of birds, soaring up to heaven. Me, I did not fly up. I flew down to alight upon a battlefield. I pretended to be Rahmiel, but not quite so tenderly did I fly. I am Death, after all.”

“Of course,” Bard nodded sagely. “You ought to make quite the impression soaring over the audience.”

“Ah, that I will not do.” Thran explained that the Imladris Academy’s auditorium didn’t have the rigging platforms to allow him to fly above the audience. “So of course, I had to explain this to Irmo in the afternoon.”

“Uh-oh,” Sigrid paused in her munching of popcorn. “That must’ve provoked fireworks.”
“He was not happy at first,” Thran conceded. “But before he launched into a full tantrum, I distracted him to suggest that if there were a place onstage for Death to stand to watch the battles, he would look like a vulture on high that contemplates the carnage, and that this would add a most dramatic design element. Ori picked up on that right away and helped me made a most convincing confection of it, and before long Irmo almost believed that he had come up with this most dramatic addition himself, which of course bothered me not in the least. He busily conferred with Círdan about how to do this most of the afternoon, and so Abebe could lead us through our exercises and then our rehearsals without upset. It was a most productive day, if very long.”

The children had many other questions to ask about Thran’s adventure, and the dancer was so animated that he hardly touched his soup. Eventually, however, the questions and the excitement calmed, and Tilda was curled nearly asleep in Bard’s arms.

“Let’s get you back to bed, little doll,” Bard murmured, when the conversation lulled.

Tilda struggled to open her eyes. “Not yet. I want to hear more about the flying.”

“I have revealed, all, ma petite Kukla,” Thran replied from the other end of the table. “Perhaps I will think of more things to tell you when I am not so excited, but they will wait until tomorrow.”

“Someone needs to get some sleep before he has to fence tomorrow morning, too,” Bard added with a glimpse at Legolas. “And a couple of other children look pretty sleepy, too.”

“But there’s still popcorn,” Bain protested.

“Not much, boyo,” Bard countered gently. “Come on, lads and lasses. It’s time all of you went to bed.”

“I’ve got to get up early to go to work,” Sigrid remembered, getting up. She gave Thran a kiss on the cheek. “So I’m for bed. Night, Ada.”

“Sleep well, lioness,” Thran smiled, patting her arm. “Come, Legolas. It is time we were all in bed.”

None of the children protested too much on the way upstairs. The hardest part was to coax Tilda to brush her teeth. Once she managed that, she was happy to curl around Mr. Bun again and shut her eyes with a murmured goodnight. The rest of the children were almost as quick to settle, so after rounds of goodnights, Bard padded back to the kitchen. He put Tilda’s cheese back in its waxed paper wrappings and then in its plastic bag to tuck into the fridge. Despite Bain’s protestations, little popcorn remained, so he collected what remained into one of the children’s small bowls. Thran appeared behind him, smiling pensively.

“Your soup’s probably cold by now,” Bard pointed out. “Want me to nuke it a bit? Because you are going to eat all of it, yes?”

“Yes,” Thran gave him a mischievous grin as he picked up the half-full bowl. “I will nuke it. Perhaps thirty seconds, yes?”

“That’ll do it,” Bard nodded, carrying the empty popcorn bowls to the sink to wash. “I’ll clean up this lot, then come sit with you.”

He suited action to words, and sat beside Thran to munch on the remaining popcorn while Thran finished his soup.

“Exciting stuff today,” Bard observed with a smile.
“I left out the part about how uncomfortable the harness can be at times, but for the most part, yes, it was fun,” Thran shrugged. His grin widened as he buttered the second half of his roll. “Luka is very funny. He reminded me of Bain a little. It was most fun to watch him enjoy himself, though he acquitted himself well to work so hard.”

“Charisse was okay?”

Thran nodded as he swallowed his mouthful of roll. “She was her usual beautiful and spritely self. She looked like a small bird.”

“I’m glad it all went so well.”

“So am I. And I am glad that Ori helped me to divert Irmo. I had anticipated much more of a fuss.”

“Maybe he’s figured out that he can’t bully you, after all.”

“He has figured that out, yes. That does not always stop him from the attempt.”

Bard snickered as he got up to put his popcorn bowl in the sink.

Thran followed him with his bowl and bread plate. “So tell me about your day. Did you get to cast?”

“I did!” Now it was Bard’s turn to describe how he had assembled Hal’s tree.

“You welded!” Thran exhaled in mock annoyance, flicking the dishtowel at Bard’s thigh. “Suka blyad, I missed it again. Will I ever see what I have waited so long to see?”

“What, all of six months?” Bard teased gently, handing Thran the rinsed popcorn bowl to put in the dishwasher. “Don’t worry, angel. You’ll have plenty of chances to see the barn troll in fifteen layers of clothing crank up the torch.”

“I will know what is under the fifteen layers of clothing,” Thran tsked gently, giving Bard a crooked grin as he leaned over the dishwasher rack.

“Maybe not. With that many layers, it might just be a troll and not me under there, and you’d never know.”

“I will know. I know how you move, how you study whatever you work on.”

“I’d better tell the troll to make sure he copies my moves, then,” Bard chuckled, handing Thran the rinsed bowl and plate to load. He went on to describe how the painting had progressed, and all the other news that concerned Clan Ffyrnig. “I assume you’ll be with the ballet tomorrow?”

Thran nodded as he dried the sterling spoon and knife to put in the drawer. He tossed the dishtowel to Bard to dry his hands. “We will not have the stage to work on next Saturday, because that is the evening of Sigrid’s dance, and the school rightly wants to ensure that they know who goes and comes in the building that night. So if you are amenable, we will work here, because Saturday is the day that UVB holds classes all day in the studio.”

“Of course.” Bard mopped up a splash of water from the granite countertop. “With any luck, Darla and her two will be done everything but the interior doors and the window trim, and maybe all of the windows will be in by then –”

“The windows will be in?” Thran repeated in surprise.

“The company called yesterday. The windows start to go in next Wednesday. The renovation’s in the home stretch.”

“Then we will enjoy a beautiful house restored as it was meant to be,” Thran mused, smiling.

“An empty house, for the most part.”

“Not empty of our family – only of things, and that will change as we search for things we like. If you see something, Bard, do not wait for me. Buy what strikes you that we can use. A mantel to go with the new sofa, for instance.”

“I want us to choose things together, angel,” Bard protested.

“As thoughtful as you are, I hardly think you can fill a house before I can hunt with you, lyubov moya. So if you see something you like for us, get it. Such as that blue inlaid table that has ended up in the sitting room. That is a nice piece, and the blue contrasts nicely with the pecan wood and the red rug.”

“I’ll see,” Bard conceded. “Maybe you’ll have a few hours free on Sunday now and again, and we can look together.”

“I hope so,” Thran agreed. He stretched up until his joints cracked, and sighed. “The soup was very good. And I like those rolls. Thank you.”

“That was the last of the soup. I thought tomorrow I’d make Chinese hot and sour, if you like that? Or bean?”

“I like both,” Thran nodded. “I also like the Asian chicken soup with the ginger and the star anise. Tcha, I am not helpful. I have liked all your soups so far. As long as you do not put eggplant in soup, I am likely to be happy. Or lentils. I do not like lentils at all.”

“You know eggplants have no place in our house,” Bard teased. “Nobody likes them. And we can skip the lentils, too.”

“Eggplants look like something I should like. Such a nice color, a nice shape, but the taste?” He grimaced. “It bears no contemplation.”

“Agreed,” Bard winced in commiseration. “Rounds and then upstairs?”

“Yes,” Thran agreed, and so they made their usual circle through the house, set the security system, and then walked upstairs together. It felt good to have a thorough scrub, then to settle in bed with his husband’s long body beside him. They relaxed in their usual tangle of limbs, and within minutes Thran breathed deeply in sleep. His flying lesson, combined with the rest of the day’s physical exertions, had worn him out. The endurance required of a dancer was considerable.

As if in sympathy, Bard’s eyelids grew impossibly heavy. Welders needed just as much sleep as dancers, it seemed. That gave him something to smile about as he drifted off.

* * *

Saturday flew into a whirl early. Sigrid hurried through porridge and set off on her bicycle for the Blue Mountain Bistro. Legolas wolfed down the next batch of porridge, then a sleepy Thran took him to fencing. The painters appeared to finish the porch and start on the carriage house. Thran returned to share omelet and tea with Bard before he headed off to the school. Bain and Tilda slept in, so Bard left them a note in the kitchen telling them he was in the barn, then strode out to begin the day’s work.

He opened the bay door wide to enjoy the warming sun and light breeze. Then came the pull-ups that had become his habit. With each repetition, he thought of the strength that returned to his body, strength he used to shelter his children, and cradle his husband. As if that were not incentive enough, he thought of Thran’s hungry eyes on him as he heaved himself up and down, up and down, up and down. When he caught his breath after the last one, he grinned. There was nothing wrong with teasing himself before he settled to the rigors of his art.

Today’s plan was to clean Hal’s tree after its casting and welding, and give it its patina. The branches of the tree were long and attenuated, so he needed a fine detail drill and a delicate hand to refine and polish each limb and branch until the welding joints were no longer visible and all extraneous bits of metal were removed. He began patiently, and let the sounds of the world outside the barn drift in – the occasional call of Darla and her fellows, liquid notes from a couple of birds, the chatter of cars passing down the lane. Before long, Tilda appeared, so he came inside to make her breakfast. When she was done, it was almost time to get Legolas from his fencing. Bain was still asleep, so Bard stuck his head in the boy’s room to get him up. The youth decided to stay home and make his breakfast, so Bard and Tilda ran a few errands before they picked up Legolas. Once they retrieved Legolas, they came home to sort out lunch. The boys made plans to walk into the village to meet Killian and Derry for a film, so they headed out after lunch. Bard was eager to get into the barn again, so Tilda kept him company as he continued his polishing.

“Ooh, it looks like a real tree,” Tilda commented, when Bard wiped the last of the residue from the tree trunk. “Are you going to sand blast it the way you explained to Ada?”

“I don’t think so, little doll,” Bard shook his head. “Tree bark isn’t a smooth surface, so I don’t want this to look too slick. I’ve cleaned up the rough bits that I didn’t like, so I’ll degrease it, and it’ll be ready for the patina.”

“What’s a patina?” Tilda cocked her head curiously.

“That’s a fancy name for finish,” Bard smiled. “It means I heat the metal, then spray lot of chemicals on it, then heat it and polish it some more, and then spray more chemicals, and more heat, and on and on until it’s done.”

Tilda giggled. “How do you know when you’re done?”

Bard’s shoulders lifted in a shrug. “When it looks right. It’ll take a little while, so do you need anything before I start? Once I start, I have to finish.”

“Can I watch?” she looked at Bard with a hopeful look.

“I’ll move my stand outside so there’s lots of ventilation, but you have to stay where I can see you, and far enough away not to get burned or breathe any of the chemicals. It’s very important that you stay safe.”

She nodded. “I will, Da.”

“Okay,” Bard agreed. “I’ll get everything set up, so if you want a snack, go get one, and I’ll be ready to start in a few minutes.”
Tilda jumped up quickly. “Okay, Da!”

The little girl ran towards the kitchen, waving to Darla and her helpers as they worked on the carriage house. While she was gone, Bard checked the sky; the sun was steady, and there was no wind. He dragged out his metal stand – it looked like nothing more than an old gas grille grate on a post that let Bard turn it this way and that – and set it outside the barn. The acetylene torch and tank came next, and then some firebricks. He degreased and rinsed the tree, putting on medical gloves to carry it outside to the stand, where he propped it up on the firebricks so that it was supported upright while he worked on the patina. Finally, he fetched the chemical solutions he’d chosen to get the greenish grey finish he wanted for the trunk, and a big bucket of water.

“I brought you some cheese, Da,” Tilda called, skipping away from the house with a small plastic storage bin in her hands. “And those funny crackers you like.”

“Thanks, Tilda,” Bard smiled at his youngest child. “Let me wash off my hands first. That’s just the perfect thing I need before I light the torch.”

“I’m excited to see what you’re going to do,” Tilda said, following Bard into the barn to the wash sink. “I’ve never seen anybody make anything but a drawing before – except those clay pinch pots. I hope I get to do something better than that this summer in my pottery camp.”

“I’ll bet you do,” Bard agreed, taking some of the cheese and a cracker. “Maybe tiles, or animal figures. That’s what the course description said.”

“Do you think they’ll do the wheel thing?”

Tilda nodded. “I know. I want to try it, but the animal figures sounded neat, too.”

They chatted for a few moments until their snacks were done, then Tilda ran inside to return the plastic bin to the kitchen while Bard made one last check. He got a box where he arrayed all the bottles, brushes, and bronze wool he’d need, then tied his heavy apron on. He tugged a fireproof glove onto his right hand that held the torch, and a surgical glove on his left hand that wielded the spray bottles and brushes to add the chemicals to the surface of the tree. When Tilda returned, she stopped some feet away.

“Where should I stand, Da?”

“Back up another three feet, right in front of me. Yes, that’s good. Are you ready?”

She nodded.

“Okay. This might take a while, so if you get tired of watching, that’s okay. You can go play in the house, or in the yard, but not the barn.”

“Okay, Da.”

“Okay, here I go.”

Bard started the torch, and methodically began to heat the metal tree. The metal was in no danger of melting; he just had to get it hot enough for the various chemicals to do their work. As thin as the tree was, this didn’t take long, so he was quickly ready to start his layers of patina. He’d decided to add a base layer that would produce a greenish cast, then follow that with a layer that would darken the crevices of the piece for depth. Additional layers would add browns and greys. The lightning-scarred section of the trunk would have a much lighter color than the rest.

He began slowly, building up the darker colors in the angles and cracks in the bark, then burnishing it off on the highlights to allow more of the green to come through. He used a small brush on the trunk so that he kept the darker colors away from the lightning scar, and small spray bottles on the limbs and roots for more even coverage. If Bard had to describe how he decided which colors to add, or how much of each, he wouldn’t have been able to say beforehand. But as the bronze changed with each spray of chemical, each swipe of the bronze wool, he got closer to the colors he’d envisioned when he first conceived the piece.

As small as the tree was, it didn’t take long for Bard to complete his patina. He left the smallest twigs a bit paler, a bit greener, than the trunk, which showed the green mostly in the trunk highlights. The lightning scar was lighter, as if a piece of the trunk had fallen away. When he was pleased with the color, he neutralized the chemicals so they didn’t change the color further, then brushed a fine wax over the hot metal to finish it.

When he looked up, Tilda still stood in front of him. He turned off the torch, and beckoned her forward.

“It’s still hot, so don’t touch it, but you can come closer now.”

She came closer to inspect the little tree. “It’s not just sort of brown any more. It’s got green in it, and black, and grey, and even a little yellow. And the scarred part looks like it was bad, but now it’s started to grow over.”

“Just what I want it to look like,” Bard nodded. “I hope it’s what Mr. Hal wanted it to look like, too.”

“Oh, I hope so, too,” Tilda agreed, frowning at the tree critically. “It looks like a real one, so I hope he didn’t want a fake tree.”

Bard chuckled. “I don’t think he did, no. We’ll find out in a few days, when I’ve got it on the rock and the leaf on.”

“It’s almost done, then,” Tilda smiled up at him. “Will you take a picture of it?”

“I sure will,” Bard agreed. “Just like all artists do when they finish a piece. You want a nice picture for your portfolio, to show people what kinds of things you do, so they ask you to do something for them.”

“Do you have a portfolio of all your things?”

“I still have mine, yes. Now I’ve got more things to put in it. And Mr. Frodo has made me a nice website, so I’ll have to tell his uncle about the tree so Mr. Frodo can add pictures of the tree to it.”

“So when I become an artist, I’ll need a portfolio and a web site, too.”

“A good agent, too. Mr. Bilbo and Mr. Frodo are good, so you’re set there.”

“Well, that’s one thing done,” Tilda said with utter seriousness. She was regarding the tree thoughtfully and didn’t see Bard’s surprised look, or hear his silent laughter.

Tilda might be the youngest child in the family, but she was growing up just as fast as the rest of them were. Before long, she wouldn’t be content to stand and watch Bard work on his pieces – she’d be making her own.
He couldn’t wait to see the art his daughter would create to carry on this part of the family business.
Chapter 136

Chapter Summary

Time passes, the angel labors, the saint soars... and a cherub leaves for the dance.

Chapter Notes

Hal and Ari appear courtesy of johnysmitten. Thank you, my dear! ❤️

I don't own any rights to "The Little Mermaid" film, or the forks used therein.

"Grasshopper" is a reference back to the "Kung Fu" television series of long ago, and I don't own any rights to that, either.

As Thran drove home from the Imladris Academy, his thoughts were aswirl. So tangled, so loud, so tense, so confused, so...

Suka blyad, such a mess. Such a fucking mess.

After the week he’d had, was it any wonder his thoughts were in such turmoil? Why had he ever agreed to take a position with such an underfunded, understaffed, undermanned company? There were no understudies for the three major roles because the company was so small, and no money to pay for them, anyway, even if they could find someone to dance Thran’s role. There was no studio space to work on the choreography, and so the company labored on a high school stage with so many student volunteers who were children and not professional, and the people who were professional had restrictions on this and that because of labor unions and time spans and work rules...

Then there were the rampant colds racing through the company, because while the school had finally recovered from the pervasive childhood illnesses, the dancers had little immunity from the remaining germs, and they had begun to sneeze and cough and run fevers and chug gallons of cold remedies, so tempers were short and people ached and wheezed so much that they fell out of position...

... which led to pulled muscles and sore knees, and the UVB’s physiotherapist had moved into the school auditorium to work on dancer’s aching bodies...

... which led to Irmo’s temper fraying and venting at dancers not quite at their best, and Thran having to speak at increasingly frequent intervals about maintaining professional demeanors...

... which led to Irmo railing at him in private...

... which cut into the time Lettie or Ori needed him to deal with company matters...

... which fought for attention with media duties, costume tweaks, pointe practice, flying lessons, and so many other things...

... all of which meant he was not with his family until very late each night, which added guilt to the mix. He hadn’t seen Tilda since last weekend.

Thran sighed. At least tomorrow, the company would be in the ballroom. The shape of the ballroom wasn’t always what they needed to refine pieces of the choreography, but focus was much easier to maintain. He would make a point to send everyone home at four, not six, and there would be no work on Sunday, despite Irmo’s protestations. Everyone needed a break, a day to see to whatever gentle barre they deemed fit, and then enjoy rare free time for the rest of the day. Thran needed this as much as anyone in the company. If all he managed were to sleep late, walk gently around the yard with Bard, enjoy regular meals rather than bolted bites here and there, and remember his children, those would provide desperately needed relief. For those twenty-four hours, he would not have anything to do with the fucking insanity called Immortal.

Thank all of the gods that Bard had everything so well in hand. The children were happy and well cared for, the construction work on the house was all but complete, and Bard was thoroughly happy at work on his commissions, finally the artist he should always have been. Though Thran was criminally distracted with ballet matters, he had forced himself to tell Bard that he noticed when the house painting was done, even on the porch, carriage house, and barn, and the replacement windows had descended upon the house in a flurry of industry over three days, today being the last day. He had managed to notice the missing doors throughout the house as the painters stripped their battered paint, refinished most in something that left the beautiful wood gleaming, painted the few that were too battered to remain so naked, and then put them back into place. He remembered Bard telling him that the painters would take another day or so to touch up all the window trim before they took their leave, but what mostly registered with a distracted ballet dancer was that hammer blows and sanders no longer echoed through the house, and the smell of new paint was mostly gone. Now the house echoed only with the laughter of children, and filled only with the aromas of good food.

Bard worked hard to make sure that Thran didn’t feel guilty about his long hours away – supportive words, endless delicious meals tailored to fit his schedule and tastes, encouraging smiles, and so, so many back rubs. He still felt guilty, but he intended to remain that way; as long as he felt guilty, he had not descended into the single-minded oblivion that had claimed him once before. He forced himself to put aside his worries to listen to Bard tell him about what the children had done, and who’d done well on tests, and who needed to do a little more study. No matter UVB’s pressing urgencies, these small things about term papers and art projects and English tests were important, and he would pay them the attention they deserved.

If he forced himself to be objective, despite all the logistical tangles, Immortal itself progressed well. Irmo no longer railed about not having the wherewithal to fly Death over the audience and onto the battlefield; once Círdan and his crew built the appropriate platform at Stage Right where Death would stand, the lighting team had designed a wonderfully evocative bit of backlighting that turned Death’s perch into a looming aerie. In a nice bit of symmetry, another platform went up at Stage Left, where the Maid and her Soldier would stand when they became stars in the sky. Thran quite liked opening the ballet with a descent from one side, and closing it with an ascent to the other.

The lights and sound and visuals had progressed, as well. The blank walls that framed the empty third of the set were painted a matte black, and a barrage of images projected on those black walls combined with stark flashes of light to turn the bare stage into a chaotic battlefield on which the dancers seethed and surged. The glow sticks in the costumes worked well, and the dancers had learned how to exchange the red ones that identified mortal life with the eerie green ones that identified the dead. When the battle staggered to a shuddering halt, Death descended in otherworldly streaks of blue and silver to begin his grim collection. Thran couldn’t wait to practice that not just in his flying lessons but onstage, but a few weeks remained before Robbie and his riggers would arrive at the school. At least Fly By Nighthawks had confirmed that everything needed for safe flight was in place.
The troll market was built, but its set dressing continued to evolve. The students on the construction, light, and sound crews had taken a real interest in the set, and items continued to appear to further enhance the appearance of the uncounted different cultures that occupied the Underworld, like flotsam washing up on the beach after a shipwreck. Someone had snuck an ancient surfboard onto the set, which wasn’t in line with the overall impression Irmo wanted to make, so the school had rung with laughter when repeated pleas for the removal of the surfboard had echoed over the PA system.

Had that been Killian of the dark, curly hair and bouncy step who’d escorted the surfboard offstage? Finances didn’t look quite so dire now, though they were still not flush enough for him to completely relax. While Irmo had howled when Lettie had brought in a film crew to tape a short segment about the ballet, the result was well worth the cost and the lost rehearsal time of Immortal’s three principals. As soon as the segment began to air, donations picked up, and so did inquiries for tickets. Thran was confident that all three shows during the arts festival would sell out, which gave him hope that perhaps their next step would be to stage the show in the city. Thran had too much to think about to consider that yet, trusting Ori and Lettie to do that for now. All this work would be for naught if he couldn’t dance Death as well as everyone expected.

As if to reinforce the physical demands, Thran’s lower back twinged. An old injury from long ago had resurfaced – a touchy right erector spinae. Not only was that painful, it also meant he had another demand on his time and thoughts, to take proper care so that he did no further damage to the muscle. He stubbornly refused to wonder how much longer he could push a thirty-four-year-old body as hard as he had a twenty-year-old one. Maybe Sigrid still snarked at him now and again for being too thin, but at least his leanness was easier on his feet and ankles, not to mention the rest of him.

There were a few other bright spots in this whirlwind of worries – Luka had finally embraced the proper work ethic to imbue his Soldier’s first act with all the lightness and naïve enthusiasm Irmo could ask for. When the ballet grew darker in the last two acts, Luka had soaked up everything anyone had told him about how to convey a desperation that he’d never personally experienced. When he and Charisse danced their despairing pas de deux, the raw emotion generated between them was all but visible. The young man would have a world of opportunities before him, if they could just get to Immortal’s premiere. Eventually, that would register with Luka, but for now, what made him work harder than future hopes was the occasional emphatic nod that Charisse directed his way. That gesture appeared only when someone met her high standards.

Charisse continued to be the brightest of bright spots. She and Thran worked so well together, and she only cemented her place in Thran’s affections as one of his favorite partners. Vileria might always remain his favorite, because she had matched Thran’s temperament, style, and body type so well. But dancing with the effervescent Charisse never failed to make Thran feel lighter and quicker. She was such a joyful, brilliant dancer! Thank the gods for that – the amount he’d had to pay to buy Charisse’s contract for the duration of Immortal’s development, rehearsal, and performance was scandalous. So much of what he’d paid for everything was scandalous, if not ruinous – yet.

Now that his thoughts had circled back to money, Thran fought back with the same tired refrain, that cost and stress and worry and tension would all pay off when the curtain finally rose to reveal this ballet in all its splendor. Immortal would be worth every sacrifice.

His touchy erector spinae twinged as he shifted in his seat. Ice, as soon as he got home. Bard’s bag of frozen peas... no, one of the children’s lunch ice packs, that would work better... he hoped.

Gods, was there nothing that could distract him from the mess in his head?
Ah, yes – tomorrow was the Imladris Academy’s junior prom, and he would be in the house to see Sigrid depart with her prince to the ball. No matter how Irmo yelled, Thran would step away from his dance to rejoice when Sigrid left for hers. This was not something he would miss, no matter how Irmo protested.

That finally gave him something to smile about as he turned off the lane and into the driveway. He put his SUV in the carriage house, eased from his seat gingerly to keep his back from twinging, and headed into the house.

Bard was in the kitchen as Thran came in from the mudroom. He looked up to meet Thran’s eyes, the teakettle poised over his mug.

“Angel!” Bard smiled in welcome, putting the teakettle down to offer Thran a kiss. “You’re home early.”

Thran’s lips turned up in a rueful smile. “Oh, so it is before midnight, then.”

“Only nine-thirty. What can I get you to eat?”

“Ice first, please. One of the lunch ice packs –”

“Uh-oh,” Bard’s smile fell into concern before he pulled open the freezer drawer. “What happened?”

“An old injury. Little to speak of. The physiologist worked on it, so now is the time to ice it.”

“Papa!” Legolas bounded into the kitchen. “You’re home!”

“Be careful of your Papa, Legs,” Bard said quickly, handing the boy the ice pack. “He’s pulled something somewhere.”

Legolas’s gaze raked Thran from top to bottom, and his lips turned down. “The erector spinae again.”

Thran nodded. “You know me too well, synok. It is not terrible. I have caught it in time, I think.”

Legolas took the long elastic wrap that Bard passed him and slipped the ice pack into the pocket. Thran pulled up his sweater and knitted top to let his son wrap the pack around his waist. Bard watched with interest.

“So, lower back, just by the spine?”

Thran nodded. “The ice will help it. Thank you, Legolas.”

“So... maybe you want to give the ice a few minutes to work? I’ll put something on for you for supper. Lasagna, turkey vegetable soup, sandwich things, salad, ice cream...”

Thran tsked at the mention of ice cream. “Tcha, no brownies? I thought a brownie sundae would be the perfect supper.”

“Did someone say brownie sundaes?” Bain was instantly in the room.

“Someone did, but I don’t think he meant it,” Bard gave Thran a smile.

“I’ll eat it, if no one else wants it,” Bain pleaded.

“Maybe tomorrow, boyo. Right now, this close to bedtime, you know the routine.”
“Drat,” Bain muttered. “Do we have any of those almonds left?”

“Mmm, almonds,” Legolas murmured, and followed Bain into the pantry. Thran shared a commiserating look with Bard.

“Really, what would you like?”

“What I want is lasagna,” Thran sighed. “What I will eat is turkey soup.”

Bard nodded without hesitation. “Coming right up.”

Thran let Bard pull out the plastic bin of soup before he could no longer suppress another sigh. Bard’s eyebrows went up in inquiry.

“Only a small piece of lasagna,” he conceded. “It has been a long day.”

Bard put the bin of soup away and pulled out the pan of lasagna. “It’s got lots of veg in it, and turkey rather than beef, so it’s not terrible for you.”

“And it has cheese,” Thran gave Bard an apologetic look. “How can I resist cheese?”

“Cheese? Who’s got cheese?” Tilda bounced into the kitchen. “Can I have some?”

“I don’t know,” Bard teased. “Can you?”

“May I please have some cheese?” Tilda rephrased with a pleading look.

“Have at. You know where it is. I’m warming Ada’s supper.”

“Hi, Ada!” Tilda beamed, then frowned when she spotted the end of the elastic wrap that dangled by his side. “Ooh, did you hurt yourself?”

“Just a small twinge, Kukla,” Thran said to reassure himself as much as Tilda. “The ice is a precaution to make sure it does not do more than twinge.”

“Yuck,” Tilda said in sympathy. “You can have some of my cheese to help it feel better.”

“You must have learned that from your Da,” Thran smiled. “He warms a very nice piece of cheesy lasagna for my supper.”

“It’s very cheesy,” she nodded, smiling. “I had a piece almost as big as Bain did.”

“No, you didn’t,” Bain came out of the pantry, his mouth full of almonds. Legolas came after him, his mouth just as full.

“I did, too,” Tilda riposted stubbornly.

“Doesn’t matter, anyway. I ate two pieces to your one.”

“How do you know?” Tilda demanded. “You don’t taste your food – you inhale it, so how do you even know what you’ve eaten?”

“You don’t need to answer that, Bain,” Bard gave his son a look. “And it’s not polite to talk about how much someone eats, Tilda.”

“But Da, s/he –” both children protested.
“Enough,” Bard gave both children another pointed look. “Thran’s tired, and he needs his supper, not so much snarking. Tilda, you can start the shower cycle now, before it gets too late.”

“Yes, Da,” Tilda replied, but she sent an affronted look at her brother before she disappeared upstairs. The boys glanced at each other, decided that it was time for an expedient exit, and disappeared into the sitting room to see what was on TV.

“This is just about done,” Bard told Thran, as he eyed the covered plate in the microwave. “Sit down, and I’ll bring it to you. Do you want a salad to go with it?”

“I ate all the vegetables I took with me today, so I have had plenty of those. Perhaps some fruit.”

“Raspberries and blueberries are in the fridge. Pears are in the bowl. And of course we have bananas.”

“I have had two bananas already today, so raspberries, I think. I will get them.”

Thran perused the contents of the refrigerator, bending carefully to extract the box of raspberries from the fruit bin. He poured a serving into the small bowl that had magically appeared beside him on the kitchen island, returned the rest to the fruit drawer, and carried the bowl to the table. He sat gingerly, careful not to slump into the back of his chair. A plate of steaming lasagna appeared in front of him with a fork, then a bottle of ibuprofen and a glass of water. Bard returned to the kitchen counter to refill the teakettle, so Thran fished out a large dose of the pills and washed them down before Bard came to sit beside him with his mug of tea.

“I’ve got more water on for tea.”

“Thank you.” Thran eyed the lasagna, which was more than the small portion he’d asked for. He gave Bard a look, who gazed back without apology. He would eat only part of it, then, only as much as he thought would keep him from losing any more weight, and if Bard protested, he’d get the boys to help him finish it. He put a small forkful in his mouth...

“Oh, gods,” Thran sighed, when he’d swallowed. “You are the devil incarnate, and so is this.”

Bard’s smile was quiet, but triumphant. “I had to find some way to get you to eat it all, didn’t I?”

Thran hummed through another bite. “You succeeded. If anyone tries to take even the smallest bite of this, I will kill them with my fork.”

Bard snickered. “Good.”

“It has vegetables and turkey, not cheese and beef?”

“Oh, it’s got cheese – three kinds. But yes, ground turkey instead of ground beef, and carrots, tomatoes, zucchini, onions, and spinach, then the tomato sauce.”

“Soooood good,” Thran mumbled, chewing another mouthful. He gave Bard a look. “No parsley?”

Another snicker. “It’s got parsley. And oregano, chives, and basil, too.”

“You are a delight, lyubov moya. And so is this.”

“I’m glad you like it, but the lads won’t be. You don’t want to know how much they ate. Tilda’s not far wrong that both of them inhaled mass quantities.”

“We did not!” came a chorus from the sitting room.
“No?” Bard drawled. “Then I suppose the first pan disappeared all on its own?”

“It was Martians!” Legolas chortled.

“Oh, it was? I guess I’d better not make so much next time, if you didn’t like it well enough to defend it from Martians.”

“Da!” Bain protested. “No!”

“No, Bard!” Legolas agreed. “Papa, tell Bard he can’t make just one pan next time!”

“I agree with the boys,” Thran speared another forkful of noodles, vegetables, and cheese. “You cannot make only one pan of this ever again.”

“Yeah!” the boys laughed.

“What’s going on down here?” Sigrid came into the kitchen with her wet hair coiled up in a towel. “Oh, hi, Ada! You’re home early!”

“For once,” Thran nodded. “The boys try to tell me that they did not like this lasagna, that Martians ate it.”

“What!” Sigrid snorted. “They both all but waded into the pan to devour it. Even Tilda ate a massive amount.”

“And of course you showed more decorum?” Thran teased.

“Oh, gods, no,” Sigrid grinned. “I was right there with them. The stuff’s divine.”

“It is,” Thran nodded. “You are ready for tomorrow’s dance?”

“I’m ready for tomorrow’s turn as a barista,” Sigrid waved her hands. “I’ll worry about the dance when I get off at three.”

“I will be here to see you,” Thran announced with pride. “The company will work here tomorrow morning, and I will dismiss them all early because they have worked so hard and deserve a break. Then I will be here to see you off to the Cinderella ball with your Prince Charming.”

“Prince Doofus!” the boys chorused.

Sigrid sent a calculating look towards the sitting room door. “Gloriana Ecthelion and Angelica Crofton,” she said in a warning tone.

“Ugh. She fights dirty,” came Bain’s plaintive mutter.

“She does. How did you manage it, being the only boy in the house?” Legolas returned.

“It wasn’t easy,” Bain muttered back.

Thran couldn’t suppress a laugh, and hastily pressed a napkin over his mouth before he spewed bits of lasagna over his plate. Gods, maybe to others this was nothing but snarky children’s nonsense, but he felt privileged to be in the house to hear it.

Sigrid crossed her arms over her chest and gave him a superior smile. “Game, set, and match.”

“Without question,” Thran nodded. “And I will still be here to see you off to the ball.”
Sigrid’s smug smile faded into a happy one. “I can’t wait. I came down to say thanks for mending the hole in the back of my dress, Da. I thought we’d forgotten about it.”

“I remembered,” Bard nodded. “Even though your hair might cover it, I thought better safe than sorry.”

“I might wear my hair up. I haven’t decided yet,” Sigrid said thoughtfully, then gave Bard a sweet smile and a peck on the cheek. “So thank you for giving me the chance.”

“Welcome,” Bard reddened, and gazed after his daughter as she headed back upstairs. Belatedly, he looked back at Thran, then at his plate. “Wow. I think Martians ate your lasagna, too.”

“Oh, I ate every bit of it myself,” Thran declared, grinning. “No Martians dared defy my fork.”

Bard laughed. “Good. Can I tempt you with a little more?”

“You can, but I must resist,” Thran held up his hands.

“That’s why I filled your plate from the start,” Bard sat back with the same smug look that his children had mimicked earlier.

Thran hummed in concession as he started on his raspberries. “So how was Clan Ffyrnig today?”

Bard’s smile warmed Thran as he savored his fruit. The children had had a successful day at school, and Legolas was excited about his fencing lesson tomorrow. Tilda had been invited to the Gamgees to go to a film with Elanor in the morning, then lunch afterwards. Bain and Derry planned to play a little soccer and video games while they waited for Kíllian and Legolas to finish their fencing lesson, then the foursome would go to see a film.

“No Finn or Tara, but Kíllian,” Thran mused. “Finn will prepare for the dance, yes? But if there is no Tara, but there is Kíllian, have they broken up?”

Bard grinned. “They’re not old enough for the dance, technically. Even so, I don’t think Kíllian’s quite of the mindset yet to ask Tara to the dance. Neither do I think Tara would be all that enthused about going to the kind of film that thirteen- and fourteen-year old boys tend to like.”

“That is true,” Thran grinned. “She is likely too refined to want to chortle over fart jokes, or more stuff blows up.”

“Gods, I’d hope so,” Bard leaned over his elbows and chuckled.

“And how did a certain hunky welder fare today?”

Bard’s face waxed with a broad grin, both for the compliment as well as in anticipation of what he had to say. “Frodo was over this morning. I gave him another set of sketches for Celebrían’s gallery, but that’s not the main reason he stopped by. He wanted to take a few pictures of Hal’s tree for my website and portfolio before Hal comes by tomorrow to take delivery.”

“It is finished?” Thran sat up straight – ouch, his back twinged at the sudden movement.

“It’s finished,” Bard nodded.

“Where is it? I want to see it!”

“It’s in the dining room,” Bard nodded towards the doorway. “I thought the green walls would make a good backdrop for Frodo’s pictures, so it’s sitting in the middle of the table. And it’ll look good there when Hal comes to get it.”

Thran got up carefully, so as not to pull his back, and hurried into the dining room to see the small tree. Bard had put a small cloth underneath the rock that formed the statue’s base to keep it from scratching the table, but it still looked elegant against the wood tabletop and grey-green walls.

“So much movement, yet stillness; so much quiet, yet promise,” Thran murmured, slipping his arm around Bard’s waist. “The lightning scar tells of a traumatic past, but the leaf tells of a hopeful future. You have made a wonderful piece, my sweet saint.”

“Thank you,” Bard leaned into Thran’s body and pressed a kiss on his shoulder. “I’m more than pleased with it.”

“You should be,” Thran nodded as he gazed at the small tree atop its quartz perch. “Your first piece in so many years, but so masterful that no one would believe you have been away.”

“I didn’t feel like I’d been away when I worked on it, either,” Bard admitted. “It felt right from start to finish. I half hope Hal doesn’t like it.”

“What? Why would you want that?” Thran turned to look at him with a shocked expression. “This is wonderful! How could you hope Hal would reject it?”

“Because it’s got a rhythm that just draws me,” Bard admitted. “But that’s a good sign, I hope. Pieces I like a lot tend to be ones that find good homes.”

“I am sure this one will,” Thran said firmly. “I hope that Hal’s friend loves it as much as you do. But if he does not, I will buy it from Hal myself.”

“No need,” Bard smiled without concern. “If Hal doesn’t like it, it’ll sell quickly anyway. I’m on a roll. Frodo said that Bilbo sold Alexander’s Downfall yesterday, and wanted to know if I had anything else lurking in the barn I wanted to put up for sale.”

“I am happy for you, lyubov moya,” Thran said simply. “You are yourself again.”

“No.” Bard found Thran’s hand and drew it up to kiss his wedding ring. “I’m better. You and Legolas are here, and life is beyond wonderful.”

Thran smiled, and refused to think about sore backs, aching feet, and ballets that required blood sacrifice before they came to life.

* * *

Saturday was no day of rest for Clan Ffyrnig. Bard was up early with Sigrid to make sure she had a good breakfast before she headed off to work. Perhaps her eyes sparkled a little more than usual in anticipation of tonight’s dance, and her farewell wave to Bard was excited as he saw her onto her bicycle and down the lane. Legolas was up next, wolfing down pancakes before Bard took him to his fencing lesson. Once Legolas bounded out of the truck with his bag over his shoulder, Bard headed to the market to restock the fridge and pantry, then stopped at the florist’s shop as soon as it opened to claim Sigrid’s boutonniere for Finn.

When he got home, Tilda and Thran were up, sharing porridge as Bard came in with the first couple of grocery bags and Finn’s boutonniere. Tilda oohed over the small white rosebud with its frill of fern before he stashed it in a corner of the fridge, then headed out for more bags. His husband and daughter unpacked the bags as Bard ferried them in from the truck, then he joined them to distribute his purchases to pantry, fridge, and cupboards. Tilda hurried to finish her porridge, then scampered upstairs to get ready for her visit with the Gamgees. Bard walked her over, and chatted a few minutes with Rosie before heading home.

When he returned, Thran had cleaned up the kitchen, and disappeared to put on his dancewear. Bard got out the ingredients for the muffins he’d bake for the dancers, and set to with a will. Given his successful week as an artist, he planned to do house things today – scrape and paint more garden benches, tidy up the scattered mess in the house that installing new windows had left, and clean up the yard. Sam would be by with his crew in a few days to plant new bushes and lay out the Japanese garden he and Thran had chosen for the back terrace.

Muffins were in the oven and dancers had started to arrive when Bain surfaced. He inhaled two huge fried egg sandwiches on toast and two containers of yogurt before grabbing his soccer ball and dashing outside to meet Derry. Bard returned the kitchen to order, and carted the vacuum from room to room to suck up the crumbs of debris around the windows. Down to take out the muffins and deliver a basketful to the ballroom with butter and jelly – he stashed a few for Hal when he arrived – then back upstairs to finish the vacuuming. Gods, tomorrow everyone needed to do a more thorough cleanup, and they needed to do laundry. But for now, Bard was free to putter with his house stuff until Hal appeared.

He saw to the plants in the solarium – they needed a good watering and a quick grooming here and there – then ambled out to the gazebo where two flaking garden benches and a table perched. The day was warm and sunny, so he laid down a tarp and plunked the garden pieces atop it to give them a good scraping. Once the old iron furniture was clean, on went the magical Majorelle blue he liked so much, imbuing the elaborately curlicued pieces with a bit of modern edge. He went around the yard and into the carriage house to collect the remaining pieces that needed refinishing, and set them out to scrape and paint. By the time he was done, it was time to prep Thran’s lunch, so he left the collection of chairs and tables out on the lawn by the gazebo to dry.

Inside he went to put a sweet potato in the microwave to cook, then assemble Thran’s salad from fresh greens, thin slices of carrot and red pepper, shreds of chicken, and blueberries, topped with a sprinkle of sunflower seeds. He put it in the fridge to await Thran’s convenience, then checked the sweet potato. It was done, so he chopped it up in a bowl with a little cinnamon and butter. The potato smelled so good that he put cooked another one for himself, and sat at the table to eat it. He was about halfway through when Thran passed through the kitchen on his way to the half bath.

“That smells delicious, lyubov moyya,” he said, slowing to take an appreciative sniff.

“Yours is in the microwave,” Bard said through a mouthful. “Heat it for one minute and it’ll be ready. Your salad’s in the fridge.”

“Thank you, my saint.” Thran replied, as he continued on. Bard finished his potato, got up to scrounge through the fridge, munching on a carrot as he chose a few grapes and took out the jar of peanut butter. A side trip to the pantry found the crackers, and he grazed through his selections as he contemplated what to make for supper. Maybe a nice slab of salmon with farro and roasted veg...

He tidied up the remains of his lunch, enjoyed a mug of tea, and cleared out of the kitchen before the dancers broke for lunch. He headed back outside to putter with a rake, stuffing his gleanings into the compost heap. He had the front cleaned up quickly, and stood by the carriage house to admire the freshly painted house. The white paint shone in the sunshine, and the newly repaired and painted shutters for the two round windows were like the bow tie that enhanced a formal tuxedo. The red door glowed with welcome, and the carved balusters looked like lace on a dress. All in all, the old girl looked like a young ingénue again...

A car pulled into the driveway – Hal’s blingy R8. The path was already crowded with several of the dancers’ cars, so Bard motioned Hall to pull forward in front of the carriage house. He left his rake inside the open bay door before he greeted the flamboyant financial planner. Hal’s boyfriend, Ari, got out of the passenger side of the car to hold up a hand in welcome and offer a friendly smile.

“Bard!” Hal heralded, bounding forward with an excited grin to throw both arms around Bard. “How are you? Oh, my god, the house looks fab! Absolutely beautiful!”

“Hello, Hal,” Bard greeted warmly as he returned Hal’s hug, then nodded at Ari. “Ari, it’s nice to see you again, too.”

“Hi, Bard,” Ari smiled affectionately at his excitable boyfriend. “Hal really didn’t want to drive out here, as I’m sure you can tell.”

“Oh, hush,” Hal rolled his eyes at Ari. “I absolutely refuse to apologize about getting excited to see my tree, Ari. Really, Bard, do you blame me? Why shouldn’t I be excited? I just know it’s going to be amazing.”

“No criticism here,” Bard shook his head, laughing. “It’s my work you’re excited about, and that’s a gift. Do you want to see it first, or can I tempt you with a muffin and some tea first?”

“Oh, you are a cruel one,” Hal pretended to look torn. “Your muffins, your sculpture... I’m just a big old pig about everything, so I’ll ask for both at the same time.”

“How about if I give you a muffin on the way to see the tree, then you can have something to nibble while I make a fresh pot of tea?”

“Perfect,” Hal nodded. “Well, come on! I can’t contain this much excitement for so long, can I?”

“You never can, Hal,” Ari said with an indulgent smile.

“Of course I can’t,” Hal sniffed, as Bard led them to the mudroom door and into the kitchen. A few dancers sat around the table with Thran as they ate, and Hal hailed Thran like a long lost brother. Bard left them to chat a bit while he retrieved his stashed muffins from the fridge, and ran them through the oven while he made tea. By the time Ari and Hal had finished their chat with Thran, Bard had the muffins warm and the tea brewing.

“Help yourself,” Bard invited. Once Hal and Ari had their treats, he led them into the dining room. Despite his satisfaction with the tree, he tensed as Hal had his first look at it, and tried to look at it as if he hadn’t been the one who’d created it. The angular white quartz base, so solid and substantial, contrasted sharply with the grey-green roots that wound around it, then rose into a scarred and bent trunk that supported a full canopy of bare branches. The pale, stark scar was softened as new growth filled in its edges, and the branches thrust up in defiance of that damage. But what spoke loudest of the tree’s return to life was the solitary small leaf of the brightest spring green that dared to sprout from one of the topmost branches. Bard had labored long to reproduce that exact shade of green, variegated just enough to look real rather than the watercolor on thin paper it was. Yes, it was a piece that Bard was proud of. But would Hal feel the same way?

“Oh...” Hal hemmed. His hand fluttered to his chest, then his mouth, then back to his chest again, and he swallowed once, then again. “Oh, Bard...”
Bard didn’t dare twitch, but waited out Hal’s flustered reaction. Both hands flew up to Hal’s lips, then clutched each other, then fluttered in the air until they finally landed at Hal’s sides.

The financial planner put his arms around Bard and hugged him hard. “Thank you. You don’t know. But thank you. Thank you so much.”

“You’re more than welcome, Hal. I’m glad I made something that speaks to you so well.”

“Well, that’s putting it mildly,” Hal huffed, releasing Bard as he finally regained his composure. “Honestly, Bard, you just reduce me to a big old puddle. I’m awestruck. Just... beyond words.”

“I’m honored,” Bard smiled. “I don’t imagine that too many people can say they’ve struck Hal Galadhrim dumb.”

“Oh, no,” Ari shook his head emphatically, grinning at Hal. “In fact, until today, I would have said that no one has ever struck Hal dumb.”

“Oh, both of you,” Hal waved a hand, but his smile was just the slightest bit sheepish. “Honestly, what did you expect? You’d have to have a heart of stone not to be struck dumb, so there.”

“It does!” Hal agreed. “And the scar... it’s there, but healing. It’s perfect. It’s exactly everything I wanted it to be. Bard, I’m absolutely delighted.”

“I appreciate that, Hal,” Bard nodded his thanks. “I hope you’ll enjoy it very much.”

“I will,” Hal gave Ari a knowing look. “I’ve got plans for this little beauty. I hope it’ll do much more good than you imagine, but that’s a story for another day. Ari, love, would you carry it out to the car? And hold it on your lap on the way home?”

“You’ll have to drive home at less that your usual breakneck pace, for once,” Ari replied.

“I suppose I will.” Hal tapped his upper lip with a finger, then struck a pose. “I wonder if I can?”

“You’d better, Hal,” Ari urged with a smile. “Or you’ll impale me on your delicate tree.”

“Oh, pfft,” Hal waved a hand. “That would be a waste of a perfect sculpture, and a perfect body.”

Bard smothered a smile. “I’ve got some bubble paper and a box to help you avoid impaling anything.”

“I appreciate that,” Ari grinned.

The tree was soon carefully swathed and ensconced in Ari’s lap in Hal’s blingy Audi, and after another exuberant hug and a profusion of praise, Hal waved goodbye, leaving Bard to enjoy an appreciative chuckle. Hal was a good soul, and a delight.

It the tree ended up as a gift to Hal’s troubled friend, Bard hoped its message of hope resonated as deeply as Hal’s generous friendship.

“Da! Hi, Da!” Tilda came skipping around from the back yard, with Rosie in tow, as well as her four children. Bard was delighted to see all of them race around the yard in a game of tag while Rosie and Bard had a chat. Of course, they had to grab the curious Merry-Merry before he poked his fingers all over the newly painted garden benches, but the paint was dry enough to the touch that his fingers and clothes stayed clean. The small boy ended up over Bard’s shoulder, giggling and trying to tickle Bard while he caught up with Rosie about the plans for the summer arts festival. He tended to forget that the entire village was preparing for the festival, not just UVB. Perhaps he should kick his own backside in gear and prepare a few pieces of sculpture as well as his sketches for Celebrían’s gallery?

Bard gave himself a mental poke. He still wasn’t the world’s best marketer, but at least this time something important sank in early enough for him to do something about it.

The Gamgee children and Tilda still raced around the yard when Sigrid pedaled up the drive. She offered a breathless greeting before she disappeared inside to start her preparation for the dance. After a few minutes of reminiscing about dances in their pasts, Rosie headed for home, a parade of small children following more or less behind her. Bard had to recapture Merry-Merry before he headed back to poke the painted benches, but quickly diverted him by pretending to be a bear who loved to find little boys to tickle. He let the laughing toddler run just out of his reach after his mother, who snared his hand firmly to lead him home.

Bard went back to his groundskeeper duties, raking up the last of the winter’s detritus from the yard’s nooks and crannies. Tilda helped him load his gleanings into the compost heap. After she went inside to read, Bard pulled out the old mower to trim the new spring growth, and in an hour the lawn was in as good a shape as he could make it. It’d be fun to see Sam and his team come in with new plants to complement the house’s transformation. As he pushed the mower towards the carriage house, dancers began to stream out of the ballroom, waving a farewell to him as they sorted out the tangle of cars parked in the driveway and down the lane. Bard put away the mower and the trimmer, closed the carriage house, and ducked inside the mudroom.

“Bard? Is that you?” Thran called from the kitchen.

“It’s me, angel,” Bard called back, bending down to unlace his boots.

“Do we have a plastic bucket?”

“Sure.” Bard relaced his boot and came into the kitchen with a quizzical look for his husband. “How big of one?”

“Big enough for me to put my feet in it.”

Bard’s eyes immediately went down to Thran’s feet, but he still had on his dancing slippers. Nothing seemed untoward, but Thran’s expression was guarded.

“It’s in the carriage house. I’ll get it.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya.”

Bard retraced his steps outside, fetched the bucket, and washed it out thoroughly to remove the bits of dirt that had settled in it. When it was clean, he carried it inside the house. Thran sat in his chair at the table in the kitchen, looking uncomfortable. An ice pack was already wrapped around his ribs, and the bottle of ibuprofen was on the table next to an empty water glass.

“Bucket,” he said, holding up said article. “Now what?”

“May I ask you to put as much ice as you can in it, then water? Leave room for me to get my feet in it.”
Uh-oh. That sounded dire. But Bard merely found an old towel he used for washing the truck, and put it on the floor at Thran’s feet. He carried the bucket to the fridge, where he hauled out a ten-pound bag of ice and dumped a good quarter of it into the bucket before plunking the bucket atop the towel. The watering can from the solarium ferried water from the sink to the bucket.

“A little more water, please,” Thran asked, so Bard obliged. When Bard made no move to tend to anything else, Thran gave him a resigned look.

“This is nothing unusual, Bard. Many dancers ice their feet after a long day.”

Bard nodded. “Good to know.”

Thran eyed him again, and Bard did his best not to give in to a smile. “Do we eat early today to give Sigrid more time to prepare for her dance?”

“No especially,” Bard shrugged. “Finn doesn’t pick her up until seven-thirty, so if we eat at five-thirty, she’ll have lots of time.”

“What do we have tonight?”

“Salmon, veg, farro, some sort of fruit.”

“Ah. You have already decided.”

“I thought about it while I raked the lawn. Go on and stick your feet in the bucket, Thran.”

Thran’s look was disgruntled.

Taking pity on him, Bard squatted by his feet, and reached out to take one in his hands. When Thran tsked and tried to pull his foot away, Bard held on gently until Thran stopped pulling.

“No secrets, angel. That’s what we promised each other. I know what dancers’ feet look like, so it won’t kill me to see yours. Let me help.”

Thran tsked again, but didn’t resist when Bard eased off his canvas dancing slipper. As he expected, he found scrapes, small blisters, bruises, and a lot of red skin. He eased it into the bucket, then repeated the same actions with Thran’s other foot, which was in no better condition. When he looked up, Thran grimaced as the icy water hit his feet.

“The first minute is the worst,” Thran confessed. “Painful until the cold numbs my feet.”

Bard stuck his hand in the bucket, wincing. “Intense, no doubt about it. How long do you need to soak?”

“At least fifteen minutes,” Thran sucked in his breath. “The longest fifteen minutes of the day.”

“You’ve got ice on your back, too. How bad is that?”

“An annoyance, to be sure. But not severe enough to keep me from the dance.”

“I’m glad you have tomorrow off,” Bard said, giving Thran a frank gaze. “Because you do have tomorrow off, don’t you?”

“I do,” Thran confirmed. “And I am even gladder about that than you are. This has been a long, hard week.”
It was hard to watch his husband struggle not to show how uncomfortable he was, so much so that Bard’s throat clenched. He patted Thran’s thigh in sympathy.

“You don’t have to be such a stoic, cariad. Look, I’ll go make you a cup of tea over there so you can grimace all you want to over here.”

“Go, go,” Thran gave him a sheepish, if pained, smile. “I have only so much stoicism in me.”

Bard went, but kept a surreptitious eye on Thran as he filled the kettle and gathered cups. Thran bent over his legs, his braid drooping nearly to the floor; he laced his fingers behind his neck, and stayed hunched over his legs. Bard poured hot water into the teapot, then collected a pair of mugs to bring to the table. At the sound of his footsteps, Thran straightened. His face was twisted in pain, and his breathing was measured as he struggled to master his discomfort.

“I will be all right,” Thran tried to reassure him. “You know I do not like to be cold, and I find this excruciating. A cure far worse than what it treats, by far.”

“What does it treat?”

Thran took another measured breath. “A dancer’s feet swell. The ice reduces the inflammation. It does work. But I hate it, no matter how well it works.”

“I’ll get you a towel to dry off with. Socks?”

“Yes, please.”

“Okay, angel. Just ten more minutes to go.”

“Ten more lifetimes,” Thran winced. “Suka blyad!”

Bard ran upstairs for a clean towel from the linen closet, and a cushy pair of socks from Thran’s dresser, then ran back down to the kitchen. Thran looked so unhappy that Bard sat with him to count down the minutes, trying to distract him with a synopsis of his conversation with Hal, then the details of the art festival he’d gleaned from Rosie. He talked about all the benches and tables he’d scraped and painted, and his plans to repair and repaint the gazebo. At last the ten minutes passed, and Thran pulled his feet out of the bucket with a gasp of relief. Where they’d been red and swollen before, now they were white, almost as pale as the marble atop the kitchen island. Bard blotted gently, not rubbing or squeezing too hard, until they were dry.

“Will you need the ice again today?”

Thran shook his head. “I am thankful to say no.”

“Then I’ll dump it out in the laundry sink. Sit tight.”

Bard upended the bucket and left it to drain in the mudroom, then came back to give Thran a critical look. Yes, his expression had eased, and he flexed his toes and rolled his ankles to speed their warming. He slipped on his socks with a sigh of relief, then met Bard’s eyes.

“So much better,” he exhaled. His body visibly loosened, and his smile was chagrined. “No pain tolerance.”

“Bullshit,” Bard snorted. “How much pain did you endure to get yourself to the point that you needed to ice your feet and your back? Different kinds of pain affect people in different ways.”

Thran hummed a concession.

“Where do you want to settle? I can carry you into the sitting room.”

Thran looked up at him in reproach. “Tcha, I can still walk for myself, silly saint.”

“Of course you can. But Merry-Merry Gamgee thought it was great fun for me to give him a ride around the back yard, so I’m in good form if you’d like to try it yourself.”

Thran’s lips slid into a reluctant grin. “You are shameless, lyubov moya, and I still have enough self respect to totter from here to there under my own power. You may bring the tea.”

Thran got up gingerly, more because of his back than his feet, and padded into the sitting room with Bard on his heels. He took his time to settle on the sofa, eventually ending up with his head in Bard’s lap and his legs stretched over the length of the sofa. They enjoyed a companionable silence, exchanging a word here and there, content to take their ease together. Before long, Bard got up to start supper, leaving Thran to nap.

Bain and Legolas came bouncing in shortly thereafter. They and their mates had made a day of it, replete with video games, soccer, a silly movie, a few more rounds of video games, then home. Both smelled of the outdoors and sweat, and their tees were quite aromatic. Bard sent them upstairs to change before they returned to help Bard with supper.

“Muster the troops, lads,” Bard directed, when everything was ready. Legolas dashed upstairs to get the girls, and Bain stuck his head in the sitting room to call Thran. Sigrid came down in her sleep tee and pants, but her hair was piled on her head in an artfully messy knot, with a pair of black lacquer hair sticks to hold the confection in place.

“Ada loaned me these,” she said with a smile at Thran when Bard complimented her hair. “I think they look cool.”

"You look like you have chopsticks stuck in your hair, Sig," Bain snickered.

"Very funny," Sigrid snarked. "Not."

"Remember in The Little Mermaid, Sigrid?" Tilda asked, smiling. "When Ariel put the fork in her hair? I liked that part. I think Ada's stick things look much nicer than a fork."

"Why, thank you, Til," Sigrid gave her sister's pigtail a playful tug. "Now I know who my real friends are in this family."

That got laughs out of everyone but Bain, who made a loud raspberry instead.

"Of course our Sigrid looks much nicer than a mermaid with a fork in her hair, Kukla," Thran grinned when the laughter had calmed. "Much more elegant, I think. And our lioness will be well prepared tonight if she gets hungry at a restaurant that has run out of utensils."

“Oh, Ada,” Sigrid grinned. “That’s something Da would say. He’s definitely rubbing off on you.”

“The corny Dad jokes,” Thran nodded sagely, winking at Bard. “Yes, your Da is a master of those. I can only hope to reach his level of corniness.”

“Practice, Grasshopper,” Bard intoned with a grin. “You must study long and hard if you hope to attain the heights of Dad joke-ness.”

“I will, I will,” Thran pretended to salaam over his plate.

Bard waved a hand at Thran, and looked around the table at the smiling children. “See that you do. Now, who wants dessert? Just ice cream tonight.”

“Vanilla with sprinkles!” Tilda called.

“Ew, Til, that’s boring!” Bain groaned. “Any of that chocolate whatever left?”

Sigrid excused herself to go upstairs, but the rest of the children scurried to array bowls, toppings, and ice cream on the table. Bard was glad to see Thran indulge in a small dish of the vanilla topped with his favorite raspberries and a dash of chocolate sauce. He was more concerned when Thran got up to help with the supper cleanup. Wasn’t that bad for his feet? But a single quiet but quelling look from Thran convinced Bard to smother his protest. He presided at the sink, rinsing the dishes for Thran to load in the dishwasher while the children ferried everything from table to kitchen island. Legolas wiped the table, put away the condiments, and scraped the few leftovers into bins; Tilda dried the silverware and put it away; and Bain dried the knives, pots, and pans. Once Thran switched on the dishwasher, everyone settled in the sitting room with tea. Legolas got Harry Potter from its shelf and offered to read, so the book made its rounds so each person could read a few pages.

At seven-fifteen, the doorbell rang.

“I’ll get it,” Bain jumped up.

“No, you won’t,” Bard got up, and pointed Bain back to the sofa. “This is Sigrid’s night, and we’ll all play nice for it. No pranks, and no teasing.”

“Yes, Da,” Bain subsided at his father’s level gaze. Legolas made a sympathetic face, so Bard suspected one or both of them had hoped to inflict some sort of brotherly hazing on the hapless Finn.

“Can I get the flower, Da?” Tilda asked eagerly.

“That’d be nice, little doll.”

As Tilda scampered into the kitchen, Bard padded down the hall to the front door. When he opened it, there stood Finn, looking very handsome in a dark blue suit with a pale blue shirt and blue and green clan plaid tie. His long blond hair was neatly brushed, and he had a corsage of white orchids in a plastic box. He held up a hand in greeting.

“Hi, Mr. Bowman. I’m here to take Sigrid to the dance.”

“Come on in, Finn. You look great. Of course, you know she’s not ready.”

“Oh, Mom warned me about that,” Finn made a face. “She won’t be hours, will she?”

“I wouldn’t think so,” Bard grinned, as Thran appeared in the hall. “I’ll tell her you’re here.”

“Okay,” Finn nodded. “Hi, Mr. Oropherson. How’re you?”

“I am well,” Thran replied, freeing Bard to head upstairs. He knocked on Sigrid’s door.

“Da? Come on in.”

Bard stuck his head inside the room. “Finn’s here.”
“Almost done.” Sigrid sat her desk, putting the last touches on her makeup. She turned a hopeful face on Bard. “Not too much?”

“Perfect, sweetness.”

Sigrid snorted, but softly. “You’d say that if I wore a bag and smeared that football stuff around my eyes.”

“You’re not wearing a bag, or that football stuff, and you look beautiful,” Bard said with a fond smile.

“Hook the back, please?”

“Course.” Bard stooped to see the tiny hook and loop at the top of the back of Sigrid’s dress, and got them properly fastened. Sigrid put on a pair of plain silver hoop earrings and an old-fashioned blue rhinestone necklace, then gave herself one more critical look in the mirror, nodding when she was satisfied with what she saw. She stood up to fluff out her dress, draped a shawl over her arm, and collected a small clutch bag – both Daphne’s, as was the retro necklace.

“It’s nice that you have a chance to wear your Mam’s things at last,” Bard observed. “She’d approve.”

Sigrid swallowed. “Mam would approve of a lot of things around here. She’d be really proud of you.”

“Of you, too.”

“I want to look at her picture before I go downstairs.”

“She’d like that. So I’ll go down and prepare the troops for your grand entrance. Finn looks nice.”

“He’d better,” Sigrid rolled her eyes. “Sometimes he’s such a doofus.”

“Not tonight. He’s done you proud. See you downstairs.”

“Okay.”

“Prepare for the flashing of photograph bulbs, or whatever’s inside mobile cameras these days.”

With a snicker, Sigrid waved Bard downstairs. He came down to find Thran chatting with Finn, but the boys lurked nearby, and Tilda was on the other side of the stair, holding the boutonniere in its box and looking up at the stairs expectantly.

“The belle of the ball will make her entrance momentarily, I have been directed to say,” Bard intoned. “All cameras at the ready.”

He fished his mobile out of his jeans, and had just started the camera when Sigrid’s step fell on the top stair. She looked very happy, calm, and self possessed as she came down to the landing, and saw her family and boyfriend waiting below. Everyone but Finn, even Bain and Legolas, had a mobile out to snap her picture as she came downstairs. It was just as well that Finn didn’t have to concern himself with a camera, because he was too busy gaping at Sigrid. He wasn’t the only one – Legolas and Bain looked almost as surprised, and several seconds passed before either remembered to snap any pictures.

“Wow,” Finn finally stammered. “You’re the prettiest girl I’ve ever seen, Sigrid.”
“Thank you,” Sigrid accepted with great dignity, then she smiled. “I don’t expect to see anyone tonight who looks nearly as handsome as you do, either.”

“Thanks. Um, I’ve got your corsage here.”

“I’ve got your button thing,” Tilda piped up, holding up the box as everyone laughed.

“Boutonniere,” Bard corrected with a chuckle.

“Yeah, that,” Tilda said, handing the box to Sigrid.

“Thanks, Tilda,” Finn replied with a grin, and there was the usual fanfare of picture-taking as the corsage was pinned to Sigrid’s dress and the boutonniere affixed to Finn’s lapel. They posed smiling for several more pictures, including some at the base of Hope the Lope, before going outside.

“Would you do a big favor for my mom and dad?” Finn asked as everyone filed onto the porch. “Would you send me some of your pictures tomorrow? Sigrid knows my email address, and I’d like my mom and dad to see them.”

“We’ll be sure to,” Bard agreed, and Thran nodded agreement. “I know they’ll enjoy them.”

“Thanks, Mr. Bowman,” Finn said as Sigrid draped her shawl over her shoulders. “The dance is over at midnight, so I’ll have Sigrid home about twelve-thirty.”

“That’s fine, Finn. Thanks. Sigrid, I’ll wait up for you. I hope you both have a great time.”

“Thanks, Da.” Sigrid kissed his cheek, which Thran was quick to photograph. When she bestowed a similar kiss on Thran’s cheek as well, Bard snapped that. “And you, too, Ada.”

“Have a wonderful night, lioness,” Thran smiled as he bowed over her hand and brushed the back of it with a kiss.

“The best night,” Bard agreed, kissing her hair.

“Have a good time, Sigrid,” Tilda waved. “You look so pretty!”

“Thanks, Tilda!” Sigrid waved back, as she took the arm Finn offered her. “I’ll tell you all about it tomorrow, okay?”

“Okay! Bye!”

“Bye!” The rest of the family waved as they came out onto the porch to watch Finn help Sigrid into his car, then get behind the wheel. With a few more smiles and waves, the couple disappeared down the lane.

Bain, Legolas, and Tilda were quick to return inside, but Bard stood looking down the lane thoughtfully. Thran edged close enough to thread his arm around Bard’s waist, and he pressed a kiss on Bard’s hair.

“So the world changes,” Thran said softly.

“So it does,” Bard nodded. “But it’s a good change.”

“It is.”

They stood in quiet companionship for a little longer before they followed Tilda, Legolas, and Bain back inside.
Chapter 137

Chapter Summary

A weary angel does his best to stay awake until a cherub returns from the ball, then Clan Ffyrnig takes a deep breath before a new week begins.

Chapter Notes

Bain's history teacher, Mr. DeFilippo, is named in honor of my son's teacher who nurtured a love of history in so many of his students through his own love and enthusiasm for his subject. Would that all teachers were so in love with their subjects, and delighted to share that love with everyone they meet. Thank you, sir!

The fantastic gingerbread version of St. Basil's Cathedral that Thran refers to was a real one. In 2009, Pastry Chef Troman Felizmenio, who worked at the Ritz Carlton hotel near the Kremlin and Red Square, made one that was 6.5 feet (2 meters) tall. He put it in the hotel lobby to greet guests as they arrived. It was an exact exterior replica of the 16th century cathedral, with a big tower in the center, and eight smaller, onion-domed towers around it, all covered in lots and lots of royal icing decorations. If you Google "gingerbread St. Basil's," you can see a picture of it. It was amazing! I loved being able to link the Russian half of Clan Ffyrnig to a real moment and place in our world, just to make them even more real.

Thran settled gingerly on the sitting room sofa, glad to prop his achy feet on the coffee table, and shut his eyes. He suppressed a shiver – the room was slightly too cold, as if it were late March. How could it be almost June? It was, however, and he was the one out of sync, not the temperature – such a chill spoke more of how tired he was, rather than how unseasonable the weather was.

Bless all of the gods, tomorrow he did not have to dance. He was tempted not to do his barre or his yoga, either.

Automatically, he rejected such an absurdity – of course he would do his barre and his yoga. It would not help him to stage Immortal if he neglected the basics so close to the ballet’s premiere.

But he was so tired...

He would see how he felt in the morning, after he had slept as late as he possibly could. Or in the afternoon, if he slept the clock around.

_I will not feel guilty. I will not feel one single iota of guilt, even if I sleep until six in the evening._

If he slept that late, he would miss the day with lyubov yego and the children, and he did not want to do that. He was already with them so little.

“‘The children are through their showers and in bed, angel. You can go soak in the tub if you want,” Bard’s soft voice insinuated itself into Thran’s reverie.

“I might melt into the water, and when you came to find me, there would be nothing left but a few strands of white hair,” Thran admitted, keeping his eyes closed. “I would not like to be reduced to nothing but a drain clog.”

“A warm shower, then. Then you can collapse in bed with a clear conscience and a noble cause.”

“I want to stay with you and wait for Sigrid, unless you would rather I did not,” Thran protested. “I have so little time with you, and I do not want to waste this evening.”

“Of course I don’t mind if you do, but you need to rest. You look exhausted.”

“I am exhausted,” Thran admitted. “So forgive me if I drowse on the sofa while I wait with you.”

“Get your shower, then. I’ll have a drop of nalivka waiting for you.”

“Come with me, so that I do not dissolve down the drain. Then we will both have a drop of nalivka.”

“Deal.”

They helped each other upstairs and through the shower, said a last goodnight to the children, then came back downstairs in tees and sleep pants for their treat. Thran took the bottle of liqueur out of the wine refrigerator, and fetched two small glasses from the butler’s pantry. When he came out with the glasses, Bard was at the counter, arranging a few shortbread cookies on a plate.

“Cookies, my saint? What is your term? You live large tonight?”

Bard grinned. “There’s no reason why we can’t have a party while we’re waiting for a third party to come home from her party.”

Thran snorted in laughter. “Tcha, you put so many parties in a single sentence!”

“The children will tell you that there is never too much party in anything.”

“Without doubt.”

He took the two small glasses to follow Bard bearing the cookie plate into the sitting room. His husband propped a pillow against the arm of the sofa so that he could comfortably lean against it, and Thran settled between Bard’s legs. He handed Bard his small glass, and Bard plopped the cookie plate on Thran’s lap. They munched and sipped in silence for some minutes.

“Feeling more human again?” Bard murmured.

“I felt all too human earlier. I am glad to feel less human now,” Thran sighed.

“Good point,” Bard allowed. “I can turn on the TV or some music if you want.”

“You would have to move to do either, and then I would have to move. It is much sweeter not to move at all.”

Bard waved the universal remote in front of Thran’s nose. “No one has to move.”

“Something quiet, then.”

Bard clicked on the television, and eventually found a travel documentary about the Trans-Siberian Railway. They watched in companionable silence as the narrator imparted that the longest railway in the world crossed eight time zones.

“That would be a fun adventure to take one day,” Bard murmured. “Cross the Atlantic, get on a train in France, ride all the way to Moscow, go up to Ulan Bator and then down again, then go on to Beijing. Fly to Vancouver, take the Trans Canadian Railway east to Toronto, then some other train home to New York. Or the reverse.”

“It sounds quite romantic,” Thran smiled sleepily. “The reality would likely not be but so comfortable, because you and I are so tall. Train berths are not meant for giants.”

“You’re right,” Bard conceded, rubbing Thran’s arm. “But I’ve never been anywhere but Wales and Canada, and it’d be fun to sketch the steppes of Central Asia, or the Forbidden City. Maybe when Tilda goes to college we can journey somewhere on a train. I can wait to fulfill a certain fantasy that long.”

Thran opened one eye. “What is this certain fantasy, lyubov moya?”

“I want to make love on a train. But if the berths are as short as you say, maybe it’d be an exercise in contortion rather than passion.”

Thran laughed softly. “Perhaps we would find passion in the contortion. Ah, I know – the Buddha pose that you enticed us with in the solarium! That is not contortion, and the motion of the train would do most of the work for us, yes?”

It was Bard’s turn to laugh. “It’s never work to make love with you, angel. But I grant you, the train would give a healthy carnal context to the term ‘rock and roll.’”

“We have started a bucket list, then. To make love on a train,” teased Thran sleepily.

“Why not? We’ve christened most of the house, unless you count the mudroom, the center hall, and the half bath.”

“We will do those before long, I am sure,” Thran waved a hand. “If only to say that we have. The cellar does not count. Do we have an attic?”

“We have an attic. It’ll need a good cleaning before long. There’s still some stuff up there we can use around the house, then it’ll get a good sweeping so it’s fit to store all the Christmas decorations we don’t have.”

“We will buy tinsel and garlands and bells and nutcrackers and decorations galore,” Thran waved his hands. A yawn threatened to consume him, so he put both hands over his mouth to smother it. “And perhaps a small train to run around the tree we put in the ballroom.”

Barn wrapped his arms around Thran’s shoulders. “Candle lights for all of the windows.”

“Holly on the mantel.”

Thran hummed in anticipation, but another yawn swallowed the sound.

“It’s almost midnight, cariad. Sigrid will be home soon. You can go to bed if you want to; I won’t be insulted.”
“It is hard to stay awake, yes, but I will manage if only to sleep all the better very soon. So help me to stay awake, lyubov moya – tell me what you remember about past Christmases, and I will tell you what I remember.”

“My mother loved Christmas, so she went all out, or as best she could. A tree with tinsel and ornaments, most handmade... a pudding on Christmas Eve... carols at the church at midnight... a orange in the toe of my stocking, if not much else... turkey or ham and all the trimmings.”

Bard fell silent, but his pause was not a melancholy one, so perhaps he remembered happy times. Thran shut his eyes as he thought of years past.

“Surprisingly, Christmas in Russia is mostly a religious holiday, and it is on a different day than Christmas here. Russian Christmas Eve is January sixth, and there is a big meal, of course. There are lots of decorated trees, though they are called New Year trees there. Russia does not have Saint Nicholas, but Grandfather Frost, to bring our gifts. But there are many similarities – the lights, the decorations. Of course there are many nutcrackers, both the actual object and many ballets, because the great Tchaikovsky is Russian, yes? Of course, holiday music is everywhere, and candlelight, and usually snow. Even in dancing school, we were allowed to go out and play in the snow from time to time, and I took Legolas sledding when I could. He loved it.”

“Do Russians make gingerbread houses?” Bard asked. “They originated in Germany, I know, but we had them in Wales, and of course they’re common here, too.”

“There are gingerbread houses – a welcome tradition from Germany, as they are in Wales and this country. One was very special to me. Just before I came here, while Legolas still recovered from Vileria’s death, I took him to Moscow to see a very large gingerbread fantasy that a famous chef made for his hotel lobby to delight tourists. He created a six-foot high model of Saint Basil’s cathedral, entirely out of gingerbread and icing. One of the onion domes had red and white frosting, like a peppermint. It even had gold foil on some of the smaller domes. Legolas was enchanted when he saw it, and he began to talk more after that, so that is a happy memory. So perhaps we can have a small gingerbread house here next Christmas in honor of that.”

“Tilda would love to make one,” Bard stroked Thran’s arm. “Though when should we celebrate Christmas? You’ll have a riot on your hands if you expect Tilda and Bain to wait until January sixth.”

“Legolas, too,” Thran grinned. “He was most delighted when we arrived here to find out that Christmas comes almost two weeks earlier than it does in Russia.”

“December twenty-fifth it is,” Bard made a gusty exhale. “Whew, crisis averted.”

“I hope we will avert a crisis tonight,” Thran groaned as he struggled to keep his eyes open. “If Sigrid does not come home soon, you and she will have to carry me upstairs.”

“Only ten more minutes to wait, angel.”

“I hope they do not delay to kiss and kiss and kiss on the porch.”

“I don’t think they will. I turned on the porch light when it got dark.”

“Then she will go to the mudroom door.”

“I turned on that light, too. In fact, I turned on all the lights. If that doesn’t deter them, I’ll open one door or another and stand there.”
Thran snickered. “She will think you are a bad dad.”

“All good dads are bad dads.”

“Ugh,” Thran groaned, smiling. “I am much too sleepy to make sense of that.”

“You won’t have to make sense much longer. I think I hear steps on the porch.”

Sure enough, a key clicked in the front door lock, and the door came open. Thran rubbed his eyes hastily before Sigrid came into the sitting room, smiling.

“Welcome home, sweetness,” Bard smiled up at her. “How was the dance?”

“It was nice. The gymnasium was amazing. It looked almost like the dining hall in Harry Potter.” Her smile broadened as she took in her parents ensconced on the sofa. “Ada, your eyes are open, but you’re asleep, aren’t you?”

“I am,” he yawned. “But you did not expect me to leave your Da here alone to wait for you, did you? I wanted to know that Cinderella returned from the ball and that she had a good time.”

“I had a great time. Lots of dancing – Finn actually likes to dance, unlike most guys on the planet, present company excepted, so I don’t think we sat down all night. There were lots of snacks and different things to drink, and the deejay played requests, so it was great. Finn had some good news, too.”

“Oh?” Bard’s tone was mild, drawing Thran to smother a smile. Would father as well as daughter deem a teenaged boy’s news good?

“Yeah,” Sigrid’s smile broadened again. “His father finally gave in, and said Finn could try to get into the Imladris Academy. So he’s going to make his case starting tomorrow. I hope he can do it.”

“It’d be a great opportunity for him,” Bard allowed. “I’m happy for him. I’m happy you had such a good time, too.”

“I did. I had the best dress there, just so you know. So thanks for finding it.”

“All in a Da’s work,” Bard quipped, drawing Sigrid’s groan. “And now I’d better take my sleepy husband upstairs and put him to bed. It’s past his bedtime.”

“Yours, too,” Sigrid riposted. “Don’t get up to make my breakfast in the morning, Da. I can get it just fine before I go to work. Night, Da. Night, Ada.”

“Good night, lioness,” Thran waved.

Sigrid headed upstairs, so Bard got up to key the security system, then offered a hand to help Thran to his feet. He paced slowly upstairs, no longer bothering to smother his cavernous yawns. He blundered through the necessities in the bathroom, brushed his teeth, and braided his hair loosely. How wonderful it was to fumble out of his clothes and into bed! His silent moan was nothing but utter relief. He barely registered when Bard came out of the bathroom and slipped between the sheets to join him.

“If you try to get up before noon, I’ll tie you to the bed,” Bard teased, settling Thran against his chest.

Grinning, Thran let his breath out in a long exhale. “Not even such a delicious temptation will rouse me before noon, lyubov moya.”

“Good. Please, angel, promise me you’ll sleep in as long as you can. You need it.”

Thran found Bard’s right hand and drew it close to kiss its wedding ring. “I promise,” he whispered, and was asleep two breaths later.

* * *

Bard vaguely registered the time on the clock radio by the bed – seven-thirty. Time to get up to make Sigrid’s breakfast... no, wait... didn’t she say something last night about her getting breakfast herself? Didn’t she? It wasn’t just wishful thinking, was it?

_Don’t get up to make my breakfast in the morning, Da. I can get it just fine before I go to work._

Sigrid had definitely said that, thank the gods.

Bard got up to duck into the bathroom, then snared Thran’s mobile to set the security system to daytime operation. The last thing the morning needed was for Sigrid to set off the alarm when she went out any of the doors. That done, he put the mobile on his nightside table, and snuck back into bed as stealthily as possible. Thran lay solidly asleep beside him, and Bard wanted to make sure he stayed that way.

As if to reinforce Bard’s intent, Thran snuggled closer in his sleep. Bard draped an arm around Thran’s ribs to snug him against his chest, and shut his eyes to drift away.

The mudroom door slammed hard enough to rattle the entire house. Thran jerked awake, drawing Bard’s silent curse. “It’s okay, Thran. It was just Sig making a grand exit. I’ll talk to her about that.”

“Do, but do not complain. She woke me the day you had flu. If she had not, I would not have been there to catch you when you passed out.”

“I would’ve made it to the sofa.”

“Nyet.” The tall dancer stirred slowly, and made to rise, but Bard kept him snuggled against his chest.

“You promised me you’d sleep in.”

“I intend to. But I must tend to necessities first.”

Bard let go, Thran was soon back beside him, and they rearranged themselves in a comfortable tangle. Bard drifted off, glad to enjoy the rare chance to sleep in. Thran was no more energetic, and uncounted minutes flowed by without notice. When Bard had slept enough that he couldn’t sleep any more, he still enjoyed the chance to lie beside Thran, stroking lightly and slowly until his husband all but purred. He didn’t venture into more erotic touches, because Thran needed the endorphins to ease his achy body more than he needed to indulge his libido. The truth of that was clear in the way that Thran sighed in relief rather than arousal.

“Oh, lyubov moya,” Thran murmured. “You take good care of me.”

“This is such tough duty,” Bard grinned, still stroking. “If you’re tired of it, I can offer a massage, or breakfast. Other things, too, of course, but you seem to want to tend aches and pains this morning."

“I do,” Thran sighed, leaning into Bard’s fingers. “Forgive me, my saint.”

“There’s nothing to forgive, angel. You’ve pounded yourself this past week. You don’t have to do anything today that you don’t want to do.”

“I am ashamed at how wonderful that sounds,” Thran admitted.

“Don’t be. Just think about what you do want to do today, and if you want to spend it in bed all day, that’s perfect. I’ll make sure you’re left in peace.”

“I am well rested, and well soothed. Now I would like breakfast with my husband in the sun, and then a gentle walk around the yard. When the children get up, I want to help make them breakfast, and while they do their homework, I will help you plan what to make for supper. I will do a gentle barre to make sure that I am properly flexible and ready for tomorrow, and then we will have lunch. By then, I am sure I will think of ways to spend the afternoon.”

“We need to do laundry and tidy up a bit, too,” Bard advised.

“We do. I have little left to dance in tomorrow.”

“We have a plan, then,” Bard rumbled. “All you have left to do is to decide what you want for breakfast.”

“Eggs, please. The protein helps my body to heal.”

They got up to dress. Bard kept an eye on Thran, but other than how slowly and carefully he moved, there was no other sign of his husband’s aches and pains. As they made their eggs – soft boiled for Bard, a little harder boiled for Thran – Thran put the kettle on and Bard got out the last couple of muffins from yesterday. He’d gotten into the habit of baking them in the small, bite-sized pans rather than the full sized ones, because tiny ones were more convenient for the dancers, and the children liked to sample however many flavors Bard had made rather than limiting themselves to just one. As he split four into halves and ran them under the broiler for the butter to melt, Thran set out bowls and plates, utensils, and salt and pepper. He looked up as the oven timer beeped.

“That’s for my eggs,” Bard said. “Yours need to stay in another six minutes.”

Thran reset the oven timer accordingly. “Start on your eggs, then. I will watch the muffins.”

Bard fished out his two eggs from the saucepan, peeled them into the bowl Thran had set out for him, and carried them to the table. Tea and cups awaited him, and he was quick to pour himself a cupful after he sat down. Thran brought the pan of muffins to the table, then returned with his eggs. Bard poured his teacup full.

“Thank you, my saint. It is a relief to have a civilized breakfast for once,” Thran sighed, choosing a muffin half. “Warm eggs, nicely done, and delicious homemade muffins with butter, and hot tea. Perfection.”

“Mmm,” Bard agreed, his mouth full of eggs. As they ate, they talked of inconsequentials, planned supper, and decided to contact Mrs. Mathom to see if she could tell them where to look for a mantel for the main room. When they were done, they cleaned up the kitchen, loaded the crockpot with four kinds of beans and seasonings to cook all afternoon, and went upstairs to fetch the laundry to sort. As Bard followed Thran upstairs, he noticed how carefully Thran stepped on each step up the stairs.
“Um, angel?”

Thran looked back at him when they reached the bedroom. “My saint?”

“I was just thinking... you’re always barefooted in the house now that the weather’s warmer. That’s likely hard on your feet given that you dance more or less barefooted, so... maybe your feet would feel better if you wore some comfortable shoes that had good arch support and padding in the sole.”

Thran considered that thoughtfully, then stooped to take a pair of clean socks out of his dresser drawer. “That is a good point, Bard. It is true that as we age, we lose the natural padding on the soles of our feet, so you make a reasonable suggestion. My trainers are comfortable. I will put them on when I take the hamper from our closet downstairs.”

They collected the laundry, got it sorted and the first load into the washer, then had their walk around the house, talking of the landscaping that would begin in a few days.

“That is something we could do today,” Thran stopped to give Bard a bright look. “We can go to the garden center to buy dirt and plants, fill all the pots in the carriage house, and put them around the porch and the terrace.”

“We certainly could,” Bard agreed at once. “Once the children are up and have had breakfast, we’ll take a trip out there. We just have to make sure the children have time to get their homework done.”

“Agreed. I know Tilda and Legolas will be excited to go to the garden center. Will Bain?”

Bard offered a perverse grin. “Maybe, maybe not. If I ask him to jockey the washer and dryer while we’re gone, he’ll be very excited to go to the garden center.”

Thran’s chuckle mirrored the sentiment of Bard’s grin. “Ah. He is a hard one to figure, I admit. He was a good lieutenant when everyone was so sick with the flu, and generous to help me as I needed. And I enjoyed the chance to play his zombie apocalypse with him. But it is hard to know what else interests him.”

“That makes two of us,” Bard admitted. “He’s a good lad, with a good heart, but other than soccer and zombie apocalypse, he hasn’t found a burning passion yet. He’s good in most of his classes, but none of them seem to draw him the way art does Tilda, or writing and math draw Sigrid. In the city, I tried to expose him to as many different things as I could find, but I had to opt for free stuff at the museums and such for the most part. Since we’ve been out here, I focused so much on getting the house livable that I haven’t done a lot of looking for things. During the summer, I hope we can do some day trips with the children. Maybe he’ll suggest something he’s interested in.”

“We will make sure all the children help us decide what trips to take,” Thran agreed.

They came inside to find Tilda and Legolas looking through the fridge together, contemplating the choices for breakfast.

“... but no more muffins, Kukla.”

“Any biscuits?”

“No, none of those, either.”

A heavy sigh. “Toast, then.”

“Morning, children,” Bard greeted.
“Hi, Bard. Hi, Papa,” Legolas smiled at them both.

“Ada! Da!” Tilda's expression was hopeful. “Are you going to make muffins this morning?”

“That depends,” Bard replied. “I can make muffins, or I can make you eggs and toast so we can go to the garden center to get plants for the porch and terrace.”

“Ooh! The garden center!” Tilda beamed. “Legs, don’t you want to go to the garden center?”

“I would like that, yes,” the boy nodded, “so eggs and toast are fine. We still have blackberry jam, too.”

“Eggs and toast it is, then. Any sign from Bain?”

“Not yet,” Legolas shook his head. “Should I go get him?”

“Please,” Bard agreed. “Fried or scrambled?”

“Fried for me, please,” Legolas said. “Back in a sec!”

“I want scrambled, please,” Tilda asked, so Bard made those for her while Thran saw to toast and tea. When Legolas tumbled back downstairs, Bard fried eggs while the boy collected the ingredients for fried egg sandwiches, which incorporated toasted bagels, sliced ham, mustard, and cheese. Tilda watched this in silence, finally asking Legolas for a slice of cheese that she ate once her eggs were done. In addition to his sandwiches, Legolas toasted more bread for his blackberry jam, and sat down with a loaded plate.

Bain shuffled in. “Morning, he murmured, rubbing his eyes. His hair stuck out in all directions.

“Hmm, the furry yeti has descended,” Thran grinned, drawing Bain’s broad grin.

“Maybe time for a haircut, boyo,” Bard commented.

“No, Da,” Bain grimaced. “I’ve got the shortest hair in the house, and I’m feeling kind of naked.”

“Ew,” Tilda made a face.

“Stop it, Til,” Bain snarked back, but his expression changed when he took in Legolas’s breakfast plate. “Legs, what are those? They look amazing.”

“They are amazing. Fried egg, ham, Swiss cheese, and spicy mustard on a rye bagel. I’m thinking of calling it the Legolas Special.”

That brought a round of snickers and chuckles.

“I’m making one, too,” Bain moved with purpose to the stove. “I wonder if it’d be good with onions?”

“Don’t take long, boyo,” Bard asked. “We’re going to the garden center. Tilda and Legs are in; what about you?”

“Can I stay here?”

“If you jockey the washer and dryer and work on your homework.”

“Ugh. I’ll just go to the garden center, then.”
“Homework this afternoon, though, for all of you.”

“Still ugh,” Bain moped as dropped his bagel halves into the toaster. “I can’t wait to be an adult so I won’t have any homework.”

“I have homework,” Thran pointed out. “I will still do my barre and yoga today even though it is Sunday.”

“And I have accounting to do,” Bard added. “So you won’t be alone, Bain.”

“Oh, well,” Bain grumped.

“At least we have just two more weeks of school,” Legolas consoled. “One more week of review, then exams, then done!”

“I hope the next two weeks don’t kill me,” Bain groaned.

“That’s no good,” Legolas countered. “Then you’ll miss summer vacation and soccer camp and so many other things. If school’s going to kill you, at least put it off until the end of the summer!”

That got a laugh from everyone, even Bain. He collected his bagel halves and cheese and ham for his sandwiches, humming in anticipation when Bard slid his two fried eggs onto the bagel halves, ran them through the broiler to melt the cheese until it bubbled, then sat beside Legolas to wolf down his creations. He’d downed them both before Tilda was through her toast.

“Those were excellent,” Bain sighed, patting his belly as he trooped upstairs with the other children to brush his teeth.

“I bet they’d be good with gouda cheese,” Legolas suggested, making Bard laugh at his enthusiasm.

In a few minutes, they were in Bard’s truck and on the way to the garden center. Sam greeted them with a big smile as the children fanned out down the aisles of blooming flowers. Thran wandered after them while Bard put in his order for bags of potting soil. He got those loaded into the back of the truck before he followed his family to see what appealed to him. It took very little time before flats of marigolds, impatiens, begonias, geraniums, and a host of other varieties topped the bags of potting soil. They set up production outside the carriage house.

“It’s an hour, hour and a half before lunch,” Bard said. “It’ll take longer than that to get everything potted, so let’s go inside and tackle the homework, have lunch, then we can play with the plants afterwards?”

“No, Da!” Tilda moaned. “Plants now!”

“Yeah, Da – that’s a bait and switch, getting us all excited about the garden center and then making us do homework!” Bain groused.

“I would rather play with the plants, too,” Thran ventured, which drew a big cheer, until he held up his hands. “But I will do my homework first, so that I do not have to dread it any longer. Let us be done with it, all of us.”

Even Legolas grumbled, but not very much, so they headed inside to dispense with their chores. Thran took himself to the ballroom, the children settled at the kitchen table, and Bard wrangled laundry and tended to his crockpot of beans. As the first load came out of the dryer, he made a detour with the laundry basket into the ballroom to make sure Thran wasn’t working too hard. He was gratified to see that his husband was stretching carefully and slowly, and he still had on his trainers to ease his feet. He remembered to record his two sculpture sales in his accounting book, then tidied the lower floor of the house as the laundry cycled.

By the time lunch came, Thran was done his yoga, Tilda was through her geography map and arithmetic, and Legolas had composed his French essay. He delayed lunch a bit for Legolas and Bain to sort through their pre-algebra, then ferried all the eclectic bits and bites of leftovers out of the fridge and onto the kitchen island for a Trash Lunch. Typically, some of the combinations of things that ended up on their plates were unusual, but no one went hungry. He pulled a package of pork chops out of the freezer for supper, sorted out one more load of laundry, then everyone was glad to begin on the flowers.

The boys brought a garden bench around for Thran, so he had a place to sit by the bin of potting soil to fill the pots that someone handed him. Bard had the children carry the pots from the shelves in the carriage house out into the driveway, until they had a massive array fit for a pottery works. He showed the children and Thran how to put a potshard over the hole in the bottom of each pot to keep the dirt from falling out, then how deeply to set each plant in its pot, then the potting fest began. By the time Sigrid pedaled home, the family had dozens of pots filled and ready to find a perch on the back terrace or on the porch.

“Wow, look at you all!” Sigrid exclaimed. “Da, all of the big ones look amazing!”

“Thran and I did these two,” Bard grinned, pointing to two old-fashioned black iron urns filed with tall plumes of grass, trailing vines, red geraniums, white petunias, and yellow and orange marigolds. “We thought they’d look great on either side of the porch steps.”

“And I do this one for the back terrace,” Thran announced proudly, waving at another one of the urns half full of more plumes, bright green sweet potato vines, purple petunias, and purple heliotrope. “I will do three more like this, and Kukla has bright yellow marigolds to go around each one.”

“Tilda, you must have two dozen pots ready to go!” Sigrid stopped by her sister to touch one of the yellow flowers.

“I’m doing the ones to go with Thran’s pots, and Legs and Bain are doing the porch ones.”

“Lots of wild combinations,” Legolas grinned. “Every color we can put out there.”

“Except black,” Bain laughed. “But they had black violas, so this fall, I say we go back for black violas and orange pansies for Halloween.”

“That’d be perfect,” Sigrid agreed with a cheerful nod. “I’ll go change, then I can do a few pots, too.”

“As long as you get your homework done, sweetness,” Bard cautioned. “Between work and your dance, you haven’t had much time to get that done.”

“A few of the teachers were kind and didn’t give us any, or very much. So I don’t have too much left from Friday to do. But it’ll get done, I promise.”

She ran into the house and was soon back to help pot the last few plants. They had a good time arranging the pots around the porch and terrace, though it took both the boys or Thran and Bard to cart the large urns and set them in place. Tilda ran here and there to tuck her smaller pots of marigolds, purple pansies, and white impatiens around the urns. She also helped arrange the boys’ collection of brightly colored flowers over the porch.

“We have begun our bright gardens,” Thran smiled as they cleaned up the last of the spilled potting soil, and brushed off the tools before they put them away. The boys dumped the last two bags of potting soil in the big plastic trash can they kept in the carriage house for it, and Bain jumped into the back of Bard’s truck to sweep out the last bit of dirt. Bard backed his truck into the carriage house, Tilda and Sigrid put the few empty pots away, and they were done.

“When does Mr. Sam come to work on the bushes?” Sigrid asked, as they went back inside the house together.

“This coming week,” Bard answered. “Then the ancestral home of Clan Ffyrnig is officially no longer a renovation site.”

“The main room’s not done,” Bain pointed out as he washed his hands in the mudroom sink. Apt, that; his hands were so dirty that when the water hit them, mud resulted.

“Not yet, but it’s far enough along that I can work on the weekends to finish it. Just paint and a mantel.”

“Then it’s on to the junk shops!” Tilda clapped her hands. “I love looking in those.”

“I do, too, Kukla,” Legolas agreed. “It’s sort of like going through a museum, except you get to touch everything, and if you like something and you have the money for it, you can take it home.”

Bain gave his brother a startled look. “I never thought of it that way, Legs, but you’re right. All that old stuff is small history, where the stuff in the museums is big history. I never thought of it that way before. It’s cool.”

“It is an interesting way to look at it,” Thran agreed, taking his turn at the sink. “Someone keeps something for a long time, and then takes it to the junk shop when he gets tired of it. Then someone else comes along and takes it home, and it gains even more history.”

Bain continued to mull this new idea with uncharacteristic seriousness, finally nodding. “Yeah. Small history.”

He went into the kitchen, preoccupied with Legolas’s characterization. Bard and Thran exchanged glances. Had Legolas’s observation given Bain a new view on the world?

Later that night, once supper was done, the children had showered, and everyone prepared for bed, Bard came into Bain’s bedroom to find his son on the floor, looking over his prized collection of soccer cards. He looked like a fortuneteller, dealing out the cards in different piles and arrays.

“It’s been a while since you’ve had those out,” Bard observed, sitting on the bed.

Bain’s nod was thoughtful. “You remember what Legs said about the junk shops this afternoon?”

“That they were like museums?”

“Yeah. Then I said that the stuff in them was small history, and the stuff in museums was big history.”

“Sounds like something resonated for you in that.”

“It did.”

“Want to tell me about it?”

“You won’t laugh?”
“Course not. Besides, I don’t think anything you come up with about history will be laughable. You’ve always enjoyed it in school.”

Bain nodded again. “I do like it. Not that a lot of the teachers make it easy to like, though – they just want you to vomit a lot of names, dates, and places, which is some kind of boring. But my history teacher this semester, Mr. DeFilippo, isn’t like that at all. He’s funny, and he makes it exciting. He shows you how it’s a story, and I really like that.”

“It shows. You’ve had As in his class all semester. Despite all those essays you say you don’t like.”

“Well, some essays are easy not to like, but his are mostly interesting. So anyway, the things in the junk shops go along with bits of history, just like my soccer cards go along with what the teams do. I like to know all the whats and whys and hows about the players, and that’s what makes the cards fun. So the stuff in the junk shops is no different.”

“That’s nothing to laugh at, not at all. That’s a very astute thing to figure out.”

Bain grinned. “Thanks. So the next time you go to the junk shops, I want to go, too. I want to think about big history and small history some more.”

“The architectural remnant warehouse would be good for that, too.”

“Hey, yeah! I didn’t think about that,” Bain sat up straighter. “Yeah, that’s brilliant. The stuff in there is the small history of houses. Architecture.”

Bain looked much too animated for a boy about to go to bed, but Bard didn’t have the heart to tell him to calm down. “I guess I’d better plan a trip there soon. I want to look for a mantel for the main room, anyway.”

“Cool. Maybe next Saturday, when Legolas goes to fencing?”

“We have a plan. So hop into bed, boyo. You have a week of school to get through first.”

“It’ll go fast,” Bain said confidently as he picked up his cards. “No new equations, thank the gods. Just review.”

“Then hang tough. Two more weeks and you can take a breather.”

Bain put his cards on his nightside table and got under the covers. “Night, Da. Sleep well.”

“Love you, too.”

Bard let himself out of Bain’s room with a hopeful smile. Maybe his son had found something that intrigued him beyond zombie apocalypse and soccer.
Chapter 138

Chapter Summary

As the days count down to Immortal's premiere, an angel's burden increases sevenfold.

Chapter Notes

Please note that this chapter depicts drug use. I don't condone it, and my characters don't, either, and I don't want anyone who might find the depiction disturbing to stumble upon that part unknowingly. Be safe, all.

Thran’s world narrowed to the ballet stage and little else. He got up each morning, too late to see the children off to school. He wrung every scrap of affection out of Bard’s good morning kiss, and infused his response with all of his love before he ate whatever Bard put in front of him. He packed his dance bag and drove to the Imladris Academy. He dealt with whatever Ori or Lettie or Irmo or Abebe brought to him. Then he rehearsed. He ate scraps of chicken, vegetables, and fruit whenever a spare moment revealed itself. He went down to the Imladris physical training rooms to soak his feet, then returned to the auditorium to put on his shoes and dance again. He danced Death until his dreams at night were nothing but the same thing, if without so much physical exertion. When he was nearly past seeing, he got in his SUV, drove home, ate whatever Bard put in front of him again, let his husband guide him into the shower, and then fell into bed.

Eight hours later, the cycle repeated.

He was dimly aware of some of what happened at home. Sam and his crew of landscapers came to transform the bare dirt in front of the porch into lush banks of shrubs fronted with bright flowers. The back terrace was next, and Bard’s pine tree became the center of beautiful Japanese-influenced plantings. Every Sunday, Bard coaxed him away from Immortal for a handful of hours, hours where he drank in the smiles on the faces of his children, the sound of their voices, and the savor of their stories. He listened to Bard’s tale of how he cast the steampunk orrery, and how the glassblower who had created the glass orbs threaded on their main stair balusters provided the orrery planets. He registered, but didn’t understand, how Bard assembled all the gears so that the orrery planets orbited in the proper proportions. He hugged Bard when he returned from delivering the orrery to his client, but carefully, because his sore erector spinae was still painful, despite the efforts of the UVB physiologist.

Just when he thought that the nasty cold that had decimated the UVB dancers had passed him by, his sinuses filled, his head ached, and his throat hurt. He coughed until he thought his lungs were about to erupt from his chest. But he had no fever, so he drank hot tea and ate uncounted bowls of Bard’s chicken soup to stay on his feet. In a week, the worst of the symptoms were gone, but he was left feeling drained.

He was dimly aware of the children studying hard for their exams, even little Kukla. He registered that everyone passed everything, though he could not have named a single subject any of them had taken. He roused enough to enjoy Bain’s birthday lunch at Kasim’s, the day after school ended. The first few days after the end of school were a blur; Sigrid left early in the morning for her job at the bistro before he got up, and he left for rehearsal usually before the other children got up.

The hours of rehearsal were grueling, but slowly, slowly, the UVB dancers grew from a reasonably talented if unremarkable company into a dynamic force. Irmo’s choreography turned the eccentric collection of dance forms that inhabited the Underworld into a tapestry of disintegrating and merging cultures. The price for this improvement was unconscionable, for Thran, Irmo, and Abebe drove the company as hard as Thran drove himself.

Not all of the company, however, possessed Thran’s sheer stubbornness and devotion to pay Immortal’s high physical and mental toll.

On the first Thursday after the school term had ended, the UVB dancers, their technical crews, and student interns had the school to themselves. Work progressed as it had all week, at a higher intensity now that the distraction of students coming and going was no more. So intense was the company’s focus that when they finally paused for a break, it was direly needed. Thran was no exception, and he was quick to rush off to the restroom with the others. But Kiefer, one of the Lindy hop dancers, didn’t dash ahead of Thran to dart into the closest one – instead, he sprinted down the hall towards the gymnasium facility. One of the student interns from the set crew came out just as Kiefer reached the door; exclaiming in annoyance when the dancer nearly knocked him down in his urgency to go inside. Thran eased into the restroom after Kiefer, who was in such a hurry that he didn’t bother to fasten the stall door behind him.

It wasn’t the urgent need to piss that so consumed Kiefer. Before Thran could do more than gape, the man pulled a tiny plastic bag of white powder and a rolled-up dollar bill from his dance bag on the floor. Thran let him snort the first line off the back of the toilet tank before he came up behind him.

“What do you do?!” Thran snarled, blocking Kiefer from getting out of the stall. “This is a fucking school!”

“I just need it for the energy! That’s all! Just to stay sharp!” Kiefer stammered, his eyes wide and unblinking in the face of Thran’s fury.

“Your contract is severed,” Thran spat. “I intend to call the police. Do not ever set foot in this school or in the UVB studio again. Your run with us is over!”

Kiefer went to sweep the remains of the powder off the back of the toilet tank before he came up behind him.

“GO!” Thran shouted, hurling the dancer towards the exit – right into Ori. The dancer tried to shove his way free of Thran’s assistant, but Ori held tight, his normally open and friendly face twisted into a fierce scowl of determination.

“Get the security guard, Thran!” Ori shouted. “We’re lost if Kiefer sets one foot outside the building! Do it!”

Thran fought to get the restroom door open and erupted into the hall, scanning the hall for anyone. There – a custodian!

“Help! Get the security guard! Hurry!” he shouted as he waved his hands frantically, and the custodian dropped his mop to run down the hall. Thran pushed his way back into the restroom, where Ori still hugged both arms around Kiefer with dogged determination.
“The security guard is on the way,” Thran panted, which tore a gasp from Kiefer and a renewed effort to fight free of Ori’s grasp around his waist.

“I won’t come back! Please! Just let me go, and I promise I won’t come back!”

Kiefer was about to break free of Ori’s tenacious grasp, so Thran added his bulk to the effort, plunking himself solidly down atop Kiefer’s shoulders.

“You fucking bastard, you try to ruin everything with your stupidity!” Thran snarled. “How could you put all of us at such a fucking risk so that you feel energetic?”

He lit out with such a stream of irate Russian profanity that he barely registered the security guard banging on the door because their bulk kept her from pushing the door open. He and Ori dragged Kiefer aside enough for the security woman to get inside. Ori was the collected one, describing in terse words what had happened. The woman responded instantly, putting Kiefer into handcuffs so that Ori and Thran could get up from the floor. Neither of them was allowed to leave the restroom while the officer called for police backup, then blocked off the restroom from the growing crowd. Once a police car was on the way, the custodian hurried to the front entrance so he could direct the officers to the scene when they arrived.

More and more of the company, both dancers and crew, gathered outside the area. Two more officers arrived to take charge, and a forensic technician soon followed to assess the powder on the back of the toilet tank and in Kiefer’s bag. Ori stayed glued to Thran’s side, his mobile at his ear as he called Lettie, and who knew whom else – likely the company’s lawyer, Thran’s lawyer, and Mr. Nori. Thank the gods he did, for so much fury and rage blinded Thran that he was all but incoherent. It was Ori who explained how he’d followed Thran who had followed Kiefer, and who the student intern was whom Kiefer nearly bowled over in his haste. It was Ori who had the forensic technician confirm that neither he nor Thran had any of the white powder on his person, that all of it was in Kiefer’s bag or on the toilet tank. It was Ori who made sure that the police checked and confirmed that none of their fingerprints were on anything in Kiefer’s bag. It was Ori who explained to the white-faced Headmaster L’Éärendil that an incident had required the help of police, but the police didn’t allow him to say more yet.

The worst of the chaos finally calmed when officers escorted the handcuffed Kiefer out of the school for his trip to the police station. Another officer escorted the student intern to the station to make his statement. Before they left, the officers asked Ori and Thran to follow them so that they could make their formal statements as well.

They promised to do so as soon as Lettie arrived to take charge.

The crowd of dancers and crew that had watched Kiefer taken out of the building in handcuffs finally registered, and Thran’s rage surged anew.

“Hang on to yourself, Thran, please,” Ori coached softly. “Wait until Lettie gets here, then we can get through our part at the police station. Don’t say anything that leaves you or the company open to defamation charges if Kiefer decides to claim innocence.”

“I cannot say nothing,” Thran growled, but Ori’s pleading expression forced him to take a deep breath. “But... I will wait until Lettie arrives. It will be a hard job she faces to calm Headmaster L’Éärendil, and I must not make that job any worse for her.”

“Absolutely right,” Ori consoled, patting Thran’s arm. “Oh, thank the gods – there she is.”

Both Thran and Ori rushed to Lettie’s side, and they drew her off to the side to apprise her of the “Oh, gods,” she blanched, darting a look down the hall at the clustered dancers who still lingered. “I’ll do damage control with Elrond, but I think it’s best if we dismiss the company for the afternoon. We’ll meet tomorrow at the studio to regroup. Keep your fingers crossed that we won’t be summarily dismissed from the school entirely. With just four weeks before premiere, our chances of finding another venue are slim and none.”

Thran’s mouth went desert dry. His heart skipped a beat, then thumped hard as it tried to regain its rhythm. “I want to say something to the company.”

“You can’t,” Ori protested. When Thran glared at him in frustration, the slight man held up his hands in placation. “I understand you want to put the fear of all the gods in anyone else who might be just as stupid as Kiefer. But you absolutely cannot say anything specific about what we saw or what you think about it, Thran. If Kiefer decides to plead not guilty, he can come back and sue you and the company for defamation, no matter how factual you are. Please, venting isn’t worth that risk.”

Thran muttered another string of profanity under his breath, but it was only to vent his frustration, and wasn’t directed at the sensible Ori.

“You are right,” he agreed. “Can I at least remind them that the terms of their contract are quite specific about what is required of them, and that if they cannot follow them, then it is best that they leave now?”

Lettie and Ori exchanged glances, but the director deferred to Ori, who heaved a marshaling breath.

“It’d be better if you just say there has been an incident, and that we can’t say more than that until the police have reviewed it. That’ll give us time until tomorrow.”

Thran held up his hands in concession. “I will do as you say. Though I would prefer to tell them that I will personally strangle anyone who puts us at such risk again.”

“So would I,” Lettie said with blunt frankness. “But that amounts to a threat, which we can’t make. Let’s dismiss the company, then I’ll deal with Elrond, and you two can make your statements to the police.”

Thus resolved, the trio returned to the clustered dancers, who gathered around them. All were distracted, upset, and full of speculation.

“What’s going on? What happened? What did Kiefer do?”

Thran held up his hands. “I can say little other than has been an incident. Ori and I go to the police station to make statements, and I am sure that you are as upset as we are. So we are dismissed for today, so that we may sort out what has happened and what we are to do. Tomorrow, we will meet at the studio at ten-thirty. If we know more tomorrow, we will say so, and we will plan what to do. So please, bear with us until we understand what has happened.”

The effort to couch his words in the mealy-mouthed language that he had to use for his own safety as well as that of the company had Thran trembling from head to toe. He managed to keep his voice even and calm rather than the snarl that he wanted it to be, and he tried not to glare at the rest of the company. Still, their tight postures and furtive glances revealed how upset they all were. Nadine, Kiefer’s partner, had her hands pressed tightly against her mouth and met the eyes of no one.

Thran got into his SUV to drive to the police station and tried not to think about anything. He and Ori reached the station at the same time as UVB’s lawyer, as well as Celeborn Lothlori, his personal lawyer. They had just time to let Adam and Kell know what had happened before the police swept them away to make their statements. After what seemed like hours, the questions and clarifications and restated questions and reclarifications dribbled to a halt, and he was allowed to leave.

“What happens now?” he asked Kell as they came out to the station lobby.

“A lot of waiting,” Kell admitted frankly.

“Maybe not,” Adam amended. “Kiefer Standaal pretty much admitted to what you said happened, so this might go quicker than usual.”

Thran’s eyebrows went up. “He admitted everything? Was counsel present? They reminded him of his Miranda rights and so forth?”

“Counsel was present, but the officers played their hand well,” Adam gave him a cynical smile. “Anytime anyone gets caught with coke on his person and in his system – both of which were true, as you know – the officers rightly remind him that intent to distribute to minors on school property isn’t viewed kindly. He was all too ready to plead guilty to the lesser charge.”

Thran and Ori exchanged skeptical looks, which both lawyers mirrored, but Thran tried to take what solace he could in Adam’s words, however little.

“Now we must hope that Kiefer’s idiocy does not get us kicked out of the school completely,” he said lowly, voicing what everyone was thinking.

“We’ll do our best to prevent that,” Adam tried to reassure him. “If Kiefer goes through with his guilty plea, that’ll give us a better chance.”

Little else remained to be said.

As Thran and Ori separated from the lawyers and walked together out to the parking lot, they consoled each other as best he could before they got in their vehicles for the ride home.

Thran sat in his SUV, watching both lawyers and Ori drive away. When they were gone, Thran leaned his forehead against the steering wheel and squeezed his eyes tightly shut.

It was just four weeks before Immortal’s premiere.

What would he do if the Imladris Academy refused to let UVB stage Immortal? They would be within their rights to do so.

Gods, please no.

He swallowed down helpless fury, impotent rage, useless anger.

He drove home.

* * *

Bard cocked an ear when the mudroom door opened. It was just past five, and far too early for Thran to be home yet. But that was his husband’s tread on the floor... if not his usual step. It sounded slow and painful, not his usual pace at all. Oh, gods, had he hurt himself? Thran didn’t need to add another injury to his burden – he already suffered from the dregs of a cold, a painful back muscle, aching feet, and mental and physical exhaustion. He rushed around the kitchen counter to confront Thran as soon as he came in from the mudroom.

One look at Thran’s grey face brought his heart into his throat. “What happened?”

The look that Thran turned on him was unadulterated misery. “Oh, gods, Bard, the worst. Just the worst.”

Bard grabbed the dance bag that still hung on Thran’s shoulder, slipped it off, and let it fall to the side by the table. “Are you physically all right? Did you hurt yourself?”

Thran shook his head. “Where are the children?”

“Tilda’s at the Gamgees, Sigrid’s upstairs, and the boys are up the lane playing soccer with Derry. Why?”

Thran buried his face in his hands. “Because I cannot be brave any longer, Bard. Please forgive me.” Was his husband crying?

Bard didn’t wait to confirm his suspicion. He stepped forward to wrap his arms around Thran. “It’s okay, Thran. I’m here. Whatever it is, I’m here.”

“It is not okay.” Thran snaked his arms around Bard’s waist and burrowed his nose into the crook of Bard’s neck. “But you are here. I am grateful for that.”

“Come into the sitting room. Tell me what happened.”

Bard drew Thran into the sitting room and sat them down on the sofa. Thran fell back against the cushions with a grimace as his back muscle pulled, and he looked limp. After a marshaling breath, he told Bard how he’d caught one of the dancers snorting coke at the school, and the ensuing upheaval as the police were called, Lettie appeared to do damage control, and the company was dismissed. He described the scene at the police station as officers and lawyers had Thran and Ori go through their story over and over and over again. Even if the guilty dancer continued to accept responsibility for his actions, the risk that the company might be banished from the school remained real. Despite the days where Thran had looked exhausted, in pain, frustrated, or merely sick with a cold, never before had he looked so defeated.

Bard gathered Thran into his arms. “I don’t know what will happen, angel. I don’t. But you know that Lettie will fight for UVB. So will Kell and UVB’s lawyer. I’m sure Ori called his brother in the midst of all this, too, and if anyone can pull strings in your favor, it’s Nori. Don’t despair.”

“I try not to. I try very hard not to.” Thran’s voice was thin. “Was this my fault, because I have driven the company too hard? That is what Kiefer said – he did what he did because he needed to boost his energy.”

“Hell, no, angel – you didn’t force him to snort anything up his nose!” Bard said forcefully. “Don’t try to second guess yourself. Right now, you hurt, you’ve been in a fight, you’re suffering from the aftereffects of a fight, and you’ve been grilled for hours. All that has worn you to a thread, and the best thing you can do is rest and take care of yourself. Otherwise you’ll add collapse to everything else. Just let it go until the morning.”

“How could he fuck us over like this?” Thran’s voice went up in his fury. “He ruins himself, and he ruins me and UVB and Immortal along with him!”
“Let’s hope he’s the only one who suffers from being an idiot,” Bard consoled, swallowing.

“So much work! What if it all comes to naught?”

“It won’t come to naught, angel. It won’t. Even if the worst happens, you can’t stage Immortal at the school, you’ll stage it somewhere, sooner or later. You will.”

“I hope so. If I cannot, I will not be able to bear it.”

His husband’s voice was so bereft of hope, of comfort, of strength. Bard rubbed Thran’s back slowly, trying to put all the solace he could in his touches. “The school will think long and hard before they kick UVB out, Thran. They’re getting a cut of the performances, and they want to bring in more such productions into the festival. So this is a big chance for them as well as UVB, too. They’ll see reason.”

“I hope so. Gods, Bard. I very much hope they do. But what if Kiefer was not the only one so foolish? What if he was only the one I caught?”

“Then he’ll be an example to the others of what will happen if they try something so stupid again.”

Thran stayed huddled in Bard’s arms. Bard’s answer had reassured him no more than it had Bard.
Chapter 139

Chapter Summary

Clan Ffyrnig rallies around a beleaguered angel.

The arms around Thran tightened when footsteps ventured towards the sitting room. He opened his eyes, found Sigrid hovering at the door, and shut his eyes again.

“Oh, gods, what happened?” the teenager breathed. “Did Ada get hurt?”

“Nothing so simple,” Bard exhaled, rubbing his husband’s back. “He caught one of the UVB dancers snorting coke in the school bathroom.”

At Sigrid’s sudden inhalation of breath, Thran opened his eyes again. His daughter’s eyes widened, and she started to say something that was likely profane, because she clapped a hand over her mouth before any of the words escaped. “Oh, holy hell, Da! The Imladris Academy’s got a really strict policy about that. Just about zero tolerance.”

“That’s why Thran’s upset, and rightly so. The fool risked a lot more than himself.”

Sigrid sat on the other side of Thran and wrapped her arms around him, too. “Ada, I’m so sorry.”

Thran gave Sigrid a wan smile. “I thank you, lioness. We acted so quickly that perhaps the headmaster will see that we are just as intolerant of such idiocy as the school is, and will not throw the rest of us out after the fool.”

“What did you do?”

“I almost threw the bastard out on his ear,” Thran admitted. “Fortunately, Ori was there to save us from my rash stupidity, and we held the bastard long enough for help to arrive. The police handcuffed him and took him away, and then they examined all of the evidence.”

“So it was pretty obvious, then,” was Sigrid’s surmise.

“Fucking blatant,” Thran spat, which drew Bard’s wince and Sigrid’s smothered grin. “Oy, I am rude. I apologize, Sigrid, and to you, too, Bard. But... tcha, I watched him spoon out the powder, chop it fine, cut a line, and snort it. He was so oblivious to all but his need that he never heard me behind him until I confronted him. So we have my account, we have the drug itself, we have Ori and a student intern to confirm that no one was in the toilet but him, and we have Ori to confirm that he saw the fool with the coke on his face when he crashed into Ori. We also have the fool’s admission that he did all that we said he did. And I severed his contract on the spot. So perhaps we will survive.”

The practical Sigrid hummed. “I hope so. But if Da hasn’t already asked you this, I will – do you think he was the only one?”

Bard grimaced at their daughter’s bluntness, but Thran nodded agreement as he sat up. “I have asked myself that, yes. Ori and I considered it before we left the police station. I want to say something to the company, that the fool is no longer associated with us, and that we will pay even more attention to ensure that we all remain in compliance with our contracts. If someone does not comply, then he or she is gone. But I will take Ori’s advice about what to say, or even if I can say anything at all. He tells me that I must be very careful not to imply anything or the fool can sue UVB for defamation.”

Sigrid’s snort was no less affronted than Bard’s was. “That takes gall.”

“Welcome to the land of lawyers. If you do something rotten, we will get you off, and then we will sue those who complained about what you did,” Thran shook his head.

“Let’s hope that doesn’t happen,” Bard urged. “Listen to Ori, and the fool won’t have anything to complain about. Put your efforts into making the best case you can for UVB.”

Thran appreciated his husband’s efforts to remain positive and hopeful, but he had a hard time feeling so upbeat. When he thought about it, betrayal was what swirled foremost in the stew of his emotions. So much effort – creative, emotional, and physical – might come to nothing because of the foolish, selfish, idiotic actions of a single person.

Gods, may this be just a single person.

If this involved more one – say, three or four or five – the entire production might be ruined because the company didn’t have the resources to replace so many dancers on such short notice. What would UVB do if that were the case?

He couldn’t bring himself to think about that. Nor could he reveal to the younger children just how upset he was. He took himself upstairs to shower and dress before supper, and managed to maintain a reasonably calm demeanor during supper. Afterwards, however, he couldn’t stand the suspense, and called Lettie to see if she had anything to tell him about her damage control efforts with Elrond L’Eärendil.

* * *

Bard was in the sitting room to play Dinky Farm with Tilda when Thran took himself off to the ballroom to call Lettie. His husband might as well be a doomed prisoner who awaited execution, so upset was he. He’d managed to keep what had happened from the children at supper, though Legolas knew something was up, and Bain suspected just because he’d come to know Legolas’s reactions so well. But everyone pretended that the dregs of Thran’s cold were what made him look so miserable. The older children disappeared upstairs after supper, and while Bard didn’t say anything to Sigrid about holding silent about what she knew, he hoped she’d say little or nothing.

He should have realized that holding silence was not Sigrid’s approach to anything.

“Da?” Sigrid’s voice was tentative as she stuck her head into the sitting room. She gave Tilda a quick glance, but the little girl busily tended her beehives with only a quick smile for her sister.

“What’s up, sweetness?”

“There’s something up with my computer. Can you come take a look?”

Bard’s eyebrows went up. He was master of many mechanical things, and tinkerer around many others, but his computer repair skills were nonexistent. Sigrid knew that, so something else gave her reason to couch her question in such terms.
“Sure, Sig. Til, can you hold down Dinky Farm for a few minutes so I can take a look? You can take my turns if you want, just don’t pick the apples too early or chase off my sheep.”

“Da, I wouldn’t do that,” Tilda protested. Her sniff was nothing but injured tones. “Maybe I’ll get you more sheep.”

“That’s fine. Back in a few minutes.”

Tilda gleefully took over both controllers as Bard followed Sigrid upstairs to her room. His eyebrows went up again when she shut the door behind them and flopped down on her bed.

“Am I about to get a top secret security briefing?” he asked mildly as he pulled Sigrid’s desk chair out and sat down.

Sigrid snorted, but her expression was more worried than anything else. “Did Ada tell you why I was so upset about him and the pointe dancing?”

Up went Bard’s eyebrows again. “That came out of left field.”

“It wasn’t really about the pointe dancing, though I still don’t like it, but I accept that he’s doing it, and that he’s not killing himself so far. But that’s not what this is about. When we had that whole dust up, I told him about all the stuff I’d read about him on the Internet, and how nasty some of it was. He told me that of course it was, because nasty sells, because no one wants to read about a dancer with a happy family who does amazing ballets. They want scandal.”

“Yes, he’s told me the same thing,” Bard admitted.

“He told me it would only make me unhappy to read it, that I should just watch our family and see for myself how happy we are, and let the rest go unnoticed.”

Bard leaned his elbows on his knees and gave his daughter a considering look. “I take it you didn’t listen to that sage advice.”

Another snort. “Of course I didn’t. Someone in this family has to keep an eye out for the social media fallout, and since I’m the pragmatic one, I’m the one to keep tabs on it. Most of it’s laughable, and some of it’s nothing but envy, because Clan Ffyrnig is happy and none of us are nutcases. But the past week I’ve had more time to keep tabs on it, and I don’t like one particular line. Someone’s leaking stuff about Immortal, and guess what just popped up on the gossip lines after supper?”

“Something about what happened today?”

“Got it in one. It’s coy enough not to mention names, but it says someone was arrested for drug possession. Worse, it insinuated that this was only the latest scandal in the,” she held up her hands to make air quotes, “‘troubled effort to stage Immortal,’ as they called it. That to me said there were other stories, so I went looking for them, and there are a few previous ones over several months. They read like they’re done by one person, and they’re all insinuation, like how nutso Irmo is, or how much of a demanding divo Ada is, or how there are cost overruns, and on and on and on. None of them come out and state many facts, but there are a few details that make me wonder if someone in the company is behind them. For example, the few griny pictures of the set and of Ada’s costumes were taken inside the school. Mostly, I worried about it affecting people who might otherwise donate to UVB.”

Bard regarded Sigrid with a smile. “Thran didn’t know what he started when he first called you our most excellent co-conspirator. We should introduce you to Ori.”
Despite her concern, Sigrid’s smile was elated. “I already know Ori. He’s the cutest and sweetest guy ever, with his little sweater vests and all. Do you want me to email him? I bet he can figure out who’s behind this.”

“Let’s bring this up to Thran first, okay? If he’s done talking with Lettie, I’ll get him up here. Can you have some of the stuff you mentioned on the computer for him to see?”

“Sure, Da,” Sigrid bounced up to grab her laptop. “Thanks for believing me.”

“You’ve never given me reason not to, sweetness.”

“Weeellll, there was that time when I was six when I claimed that Joey Friedman made me eat a whole bag of salted peanuts.”

“True. But you didn’t try that again, so you get a bye.”

Sigrid made a face. “Hardly. I was so sick, it took three years before I wanted to look at a peanut. So no, I won’t try that again.”

“Good girl. Let me round up Thran.”

Sigrid was tapping away on her computer before Bard was out of her room. He tiptoed into the ballroom, but Thran ended his call just as he entered.

“What did she say, cariad?”

“Lettie said that Headmaster L’Eärendil was reassured at our instant response, as well as guarantees Lettie made that I fully support. There will be drug tests, there will be baggage searches, there will be no tolerance of violations. Thankfully, the UVB contracts with its dancers are quite explicit about the repercussions of drug abuse, so we do not have to rewrite them. We are also quite fortunate that the school is out of session, so very few students were in residence, and no students saw anything, or seem to be involved. So I hope we have dodged a bullet.”

“That’s a relief,” Bard exhaled. “But don’t let down just yet. Our excellent co-conspirator sniffed out something you need to see.”

“Oh, gods,” Thran flinched visibly. “What is it?”

“UVB may have another rat lurking around the fringes. I think it’s important enough that she should show you what she found.”

Thran swallowed, and the mutter under his breath wasn’t Russian that Bard recognized, but its vehemence was unmistakable. He followed Bard upstairs into Sigrid’s room, where she recounted what she’d told Bard. He and Thran sat on either side of Sigrid on her bed to scan the items she’d found. When she displayed the blurry picture of the Immortal set, Thran bit off a curse.

“Suka blyad, you are right,” Thran growled. “If this shit comes from anyone associated with the production, I will end that association.”

“Sigrid thought Ori might be able sort out who’s behind this stuff.”

“Without a doubt.”

Sigrid clicked on her email app and pressed Send. At the surprised looks from her fathers, she shrugged. “I made a list of the links and put them in an email to Ori while I waited for you to come “upstairs.”

“Such initiative,” Bard gave her a wry smile. “Too bad you don’t anticipate your homework so well.”

Bard didn’t rise to Sigrid’s bait. “Maybe, maybe not. Anyway, let Ori take it from here.”

“But Da, I can help —”

“Sigrid...” Bard glanced at Thran, but his husband was still glowering at Sigrid’s computer screen. “Ori is a decent guy. I think highly of him, I like him, and I’m grateful to him for everything he’s done for Thran. But... some of the data mining he does for his brother isn’t... anything I want you involved in. I’m very serious about this. Do not get yourself embroiled in exactly the thing that’s causing Thran so many headaches.”

“Do not,” Thran growled, and turned a hard, quelling stare on the girl. Ah, he hadn’t been as oblivious to Bard’s words as Bard had thought. “Do not. I am grateful that you showed me what you found, but you must let that be the end of it.”

Sigrid’s expression fell into subdued agreement, and her posture was placation itself. “I won’t. But I’ll still watch the net for stuff for Ori to look at.”

“That’s fair. Just tell us when you find something you think is a concern, and that’s all.”

“Yes, Da. Just... um, one more thing?”

“Yes?” Bard and Thran drawled, drawing Sigrid’s snicker.

“Gods, Ada, you sound just like Da. But... you’ve probably already thought of this, but in case you haven’t, there’s this legal thing called a nondisclosure clause? It means you can’t reveal stuff to people outside your workplace – your competitors, the media, that stuff. It’s common in high tech firms, but that’s not the only field by any means. If you don’t already have one in your dancers’ employment contracts, you could add one to keep them from spilling anything about Immortal.”

Thran’s angry glare faded into consideration. “I do not know if the UVB contracts include such a thing or not. That is a very useful suggestion, lioness. I will call Lettie back to ask her.”

Thran got up, offering Sigrid a small smile of thanks, but his expression was intent as he left the room. When Sigrid gave Bard a questioning look, he sighed.

“He’s got a lot on his plate, sweetness. I appreciate you looking out for him about stuff I didn’t consider.”

“You’ve got a lot on your plate, too, Da. Everything’s gone so well for us since we met Thran, and I want it to stay that way. I figured that as the most tech-savvy one of the clan, I could look out for us there.”

“Bain and Legolas might dispute your claim of being the most tech savvy.”

“Proficiency during zombie apocalypses isn’t the only claim to tech-savviness.”

“Granted. I’ll see to the Russian, and let you know how it turns out.”

“Okay, Da.”
Bard leaned forward to give Sigrid’s braid a tug. “Everything going well at the bistro?”

Sigrid nodded. “I like it there. Some mornings are incredibly busy, but Miss Dís stays calm and smiling through all of it, and she’s very motherly to all of us. Oh, she fusses when we mess up, but it never lasts long, and she helps us sort out whatever we did so we don’t do it again.”

“Have you done anything yet to earn her fussing?”

“Not so far, thank goodness. I had trouble with the cash register until she and Dana told me how to sweet-talk it, so I’m good.”

“Was she okay with you having to cut out early for the two weeks of your driving class?”

“She was when I offered to be there on the weekends for longer to make up for it. She seemed to appreciate the initiative, so I’m ready to go in another week. I hope they teach me to shift gears – I have to pass the driving test in your truck.”

“Thran might let you borrow the SUV.”

Shaking her head, Sigrid demurred. “No, I want to learn how to shift. If I learn that, I can drive anything.”

“Very true. If you don’t learn in your class, I think my old truck can stand a few lessons on Sundays in the school parking lot.”

“Along with my classmates in their parents’ cars,” Sigrid chuckled.

“Likely,” Bard agreed, smiling. He got up from his chair. “Keep your fingers crossed for your Ada, sweetness.”

“I will,” Sigrid’s nod was firm before she flashed a gleeful grin. “I hope Tilda’s made you the ovine czar of Dinky Farm.”

Laughing, Bard held up his hands. “I’ll try not to feel sheepish about that.”

Sigrid’s groan followed him halfway down the stairs, drawing his grin. His reputation as King of Bad Dad Jokes was intact.

* * *

Bard acquired another title – King of Sheep – by the time Thran returned from the ballroom. Tilda had done as she’d promised, doubling Bard’s herd until his Dinky Farm hardly had space to hold them all. At the same time, she had become the Bee Queen, so the game became a race to see whether honey or wool would produce the bigger return on investment. It was a virtual dead heat, and father and daughter still laughed about it when the tall dancer joined them. Did he look more reconciled, or was he resigned?

“Lettie is in agreement about the nondisclosure clause. We have something in place now, but it could be more strongly worded, and Adam considers how to update it. And I spoke to Ori, though it was merely for my own comfort, not to urge him on. He took Sigrid’s email very seriously, and is already at work to see what he can learn.”
Bard winced. “I’m sorry we put him to work afterhours.”

“He did not consider it as overtime; merely an interesting, if somewhat trivial, challenge, as you or I might find a children’s crossword puzzle. He seemed to think it was the work of an amateur, in which case he or she has no chance against Ori. He may well have something for us soon.”

“Is something wrong, Ada?” Tilda ventured, looking somber.

Bard winced. They’d forgotten that Tilda hadn’t heard this morning’s tale. But Thran managed a smile for her.

“It is a computer thing, Kukla, which I do not understand very well, but Ori works on it for us. He does not think it is a concern, so I trust that it is so.”

“I like Ori,” Tilda agreed. “And I like Mr. Rada, too. I miss seeing him and Sebastian.”

“I will tell him you asked after him and his small pet,” Thran replied. “That will make him very happy.”

“Good,” Tilda smiled. “I like him a lot. He eats an awful lot of cookies, though. I hope he gets enough vegetables.”

Bard grinned. “Maybe he eats nothing but veg at home, and keeps all the cookies in his coat for work.”

“Maybe so,” Tilda considered, but her expression was dubious. “I’d rather even it out and have both all day long.”

“Cookies all day long?” Bard pretended to look appalled. “Not around here, I’m afraid. I’d be baking and doing nothing else to keep Clan Ffyrnig in cookies. But enough about cookies, little doll – it’s time for you to get a shower. You know Thran and I are going into the city tomorrow to get haircuts, so you and Legolas and Bain will hold down the homestead for us. I’ll talk to the lads while you’re in the shower, then when you’re done we’ll sort the rest out.”

“Okay, Da.” Tilda shut down Dinky Farm, put the controllers away, and headed upstairs. Thran sat perched on the end of the sofa looking distracted.

“Everything all right, angel?”

Thran heaved a sigh. “I forgot about our appointment with Rowan.”

“You want me to reschedule it again?”

Thran waved a hand. “We did that last week, and we were lucky to get another slot so soon. I have my last flying lesson tomorrow before we try it on the school stage next week, so I already will not have a regular day to dance, so it is just as well for us to go. I think I will go to bed now, because tomorrow we must get up early to reach the city in time. As if I will be able to sleep well after today.”

“We’ll settle the boys about what happened today, set the duties for tomorrow, then you can crawl into bed while I get in the shower,” Bard agreed. “So rounds and upstairs.”

They made their usual check of the house, set the security system, and followed Tilda upstairs. Bain was waiting for them. “Uh, Da? Can I talk to you?”
Bard gave Thran a look, so Thran went into bedroom.

“Sure, boyo. What’s up?”

Bain led him into his room, where he found Legolas perched on the bed. For the second time tonight, he faced concerned faces.

“What’s going on with Papa?” Legolas asked lowly, as Bain sat down next to him and turned an expectant face on his father. “What happened today?”

Despite the boys’ serious expressions, Bard grinned. “What, you couldn’t get anything out of Sigrid?”

That struck a chord, for the boys exchanged annoyed grimaces. “We tried, but she wouldn’t tell us. So you have to.”

“We were on our way up here to tell you. Hang on.”

Bard retreated to beckon Thran to join him in Bain’s room. In a calm, serious voice, Bard told the boys bare bones of Kiefer’s idiocy, gratified when both looked disgusted. Thran summarized what the incident might mean for the future of Immortal’s premiere, and what he thought would happen. Both boys took in the information with solemn concern.

“What a dickwad,” Legolas muttered, nearly drawing Bard’s laughter. A little of Bain’s bluntness had rubbed off on the quiet boy. “Didn’t he think that he might ruin Papa’s ballet?”

“I’m sure he didn’t,” Bard agreed. “If he’d thought at all, he might’ve realized that his job was on the line, because that’s what happened – your Papa fired him from the company, and he’s in jail accused of drug possession.”

“Why didn’t you tell us, Papa, since you told Sigrid?” Legolas asked plaintively.

“Only Sigrid was here when I came home, Legolas, and she saw how upset I was. Tilda came home before you, and we did not want to upset our small Kukla to tell you in front of her. So please, do not alarm her.”

Both boys looked appeased, if their exchange of glances were any criteria.

“Okay, thank you for telling us, Papa,” Legolas nodded. “We had hoped that it was only because of Kukla that you didn’t tell us before.”

“Yeah, thanks, Da,” Bain seconded.

“You’re welcome,” Bard nodded. “But realize that your discretion pays a big part in what we tell both of you, yeah? This isn’t something to brag about to your friends. It’s Thran’s business, and he wants us to know so that we understand some of the pressure he’s under, not so we can blabber it around. So keep the family business in the family.”

“Yes, Bard, Okay, Da.”

“One more thing to talk about,” Bard went on. “Thran and I have to go into the city early tomorrow. Sig’s going to work as usual, so you two and Tilda will be here. You know the drill – you can make scrambled eggs, toast, bagels, grilled cheese, porridge, yogurt, or fruit for breakfast in whatever combination. Please stay on the property until we come back, which shouldn’t be long, given when you usually wake up. Make sure Tilda gets breakfast. I’d appreciate it if you don’t launch into zombie apocalypse and leave Tilda with nothing to do, so if you play video games, make it something she can play, too, if she wants. All clear?"

The boys nodded, so Bard looked to Thran. “Did I forget anything?”

Thran managed a smile. “Clean up the kitchen, put away the food, and if the dishwasher is full, please put soap in it and run it.”

Bain snapped a crisp salute. “Aye, Cap’n! Aye, Commander!”

“Carry on, then, Lieutenants,” Bard saluted back, and Thran followed suit. “All right, Ensign Tilda’s through her shower, so once we make sure you all know the drill, you lads wash, too.”

“Okay, Da,” Bain agreed.

Bard and Thran sorted out the children about tomorrow’s routine, and bade goodnight to all of the children. Bard came out of the shower to find Thran tossing and turning as he tried to find a comfortable position in bed.

“Still unsettled,” Bard murmured, as he tossed his dirty clothes in the hamper and laid his sleep pants and tee by his side of the bed.

“I think UVB took no lasting harm today, but yes, I am still so, so angry,” Thran confessed. He fell back against his pillow to stare up at the ceiling.

“You have reason to be,” Bard agreed. He turned out both lights by the bed, and eased in beside Thran. “But you reacted instantly, which Lettie parleyed into a reprieve from the school, the fool is in the clink, Sigrid looked out for us, and Ori looks out for us on top of that.”

Thran hummed. “I should take solace in how many good people look out for us.”

“You do, but it’s hard for you to calm down after a day like today. You need a distraction.”

Shutting his eyes, Bard slid closer to Thran. Even in the dark, his husband’s long, lithe frame was graceful and elegant, and it was a pleasure to stroke and caress it. He kept his touches light and feathery, the better to coax Thran’s body to produce the endorphins that would soothe the grating edges of his upset. But before that happened, Thran took his hands to still them.

“You give too much, lyubov moya,” he whispered. “I am already ashamed that I do not pay you the attention that you deserve. I should be the one to reassure you that today is only a small concern.”

Bard’s chuckle was soft and breathy against Thran’s neck. “I know a onetime welder who used to feel guilty about all the money a certain ballet dancer bestowed on the renovation of an old house. The dancer said not to worry, because he had lots of money to spend on making a home for his family. So let a metal sculptor tell you not to worry because he’s got lots of love and affection to bestow on the love of his life. No guilt or shame need apply.”

After a short silence, some of the tension in Thran’s limbs eased. “You fight dirty, to use my words against me.”

Bard slid his hands from Thran’s grasp. “What’s sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.”

“What is this sauce for poultry, and what does it have to do with anything?”

“It means that if it’s okay for a dancer to be generous, it’s okay for a metal sculptor to be generous, too. So be quiet and enjoy your rub.”

Chuckling, Thran relaxed a little more into Bard’s embrace. “I hear and obey, my saint.”

“If only,” Bard teased, nuzzling Thran’s ear. “Just let everything go, angel. Don’t make me pull rank and remind a pale seer that his king is here.”

Thran sighed, but it was heavy with desire for solace rather than arousal. “I should tell you no. I should be strong and tell you that all will be well, that I will kick the ass of anyone who stands between me and the premiere of this stupid fucking Immortal.”

“Tomorrow.” Bard kissed Thran’s nape softly. “Tell me that tomorrow. Tonight, the king wants to cherish his seer, to show him what a treasure he is. Let go. Give in. You can’t deny me or yourself.”

“No.” Thran’s whisper was barely audible, and his breath caught as Bard pressed another kiss against his nape. “I cannot. Make me yours again, my king.”

Bard needed no more encouragement to put all his love and affection into gentle strokes, soft kisses, and whispered endearments, gradually coaxing Thran to relax. Under Bard’s care, Thran’s tension dribbled away until he hummed in silent pleasure. Thran had rarely been so passive before, mute testimony to how exhausted he was and how eagerly he soaked up Bard’s ministrations, so Bard lavished caress after caress over Thran’s beautiful body. Only when Thran’s back arched, when his hands grabbed at the sheets in desire, when his breath turned rapid and erratic, did Bard venture into more erotic touches, but at the same unhurried pace. Just to feel his husband lean into Bard’s caresses, to hear him moan softly, then to feel his cock rise without ever being touched, was so arousing that when Bard slipped inside Thran, they both shuddered in long-neglected pleasure. So intense was it that Bard rolled on top to thrust in deeper; in response, Thran pulled his legs up, arched his back, and crowded hard against Bard’s thighs with a groan of urgency. Such want banished all thought of slow, leisurely teasing, and Bard pulled his husband back to meet his thrusts forward, faster and faster. Gods, such a needy, mindless partner turned him just as needy and mindless, and he crouched over Thran to grope for his cock. He stroked Thran’s cock in rhythm with his thrusts, driving Thran to widen his knees until he’d fully opened. In seconds, Thran’s head arched back as his arousal reached its peak. Gasping, he clenched hard around Bard’s cock. It was too intense a pleasure to resist, and Bard gave in just as eagerly to wave after wave of ecstasy. They both collapsed flat on the bed in a tangle of limbs.

“Gods, I needed that,” Thran whispered, his voice muffled in his pillow.

Bard smiled as he rolled off Thran to lie on his back beside him. “I don’t want you to feel guilty, so I’ll let you in on a secret.”

Thran snuggled beside Bard to put an arm over his chest. “What is this secret, lyubov moya?”

“You weren’t the only one who needed that, so you don’t have to worry that this was just me being altruistic.”

Thran snickered. “I am glad you told me. Otherwise, I might have thought that the king had suffered mightily to care for his poor seer.”

“The things I do to care for my realm,” Bard teased as he pressed a kiss against Thran’s hair.

Thran got up with him to clean off the remains of their delight, and they soon returned to bed. They cuddled briefly, but it wasn’t long before Thran eased into sleep. Bard eased his fingers from Thran’s hair, and breathed a sigh of relief.
Now, if only Thran stayed asleep...

** * * *

Bard reached out a hand to turn off the clock radio alarm when it went off at seven. Thran was still asleep, so Bard took his turn in the bathroom before he woke his husband with a soft touch.

“Porridge or eggs?” he asked when Thran blinked sleepily at him. “Eight-thirty appointment with Rowan, remember?”

Thran stretched and hummed noncommittally. “Eggs, if you would like them, too.”

“I’ll get them started.”

He went downstairs and had an onion and cheese omelet with toast ready by the time Thran came downstairs. The dancer looked sleepy, but not exhausted as he had last night. Bard offered a kiss with the plate he handed Thran.

“Sleep okay?”

Thran offered Bard a slight smile. “Better than I expected. I blame that on a certain hunky welder.”

“I’ll cop that plea anytime I have the chance,” Bard winked at his husband as he brought his plate to the table.

They ate quickly, dressed, and were soon on the road to the city. Thran didn’t protest when Bard drove, and he didn’t talk much on the way. Despite his release last night, he was still preoccupied with yesterday’s debacle with Kiefer, not that Bard blamed him. Maybe one of Rowan’s cappuccinos and a little of her TLC would help.

Rowan greeted them with her usual bright, teasing banter before she sent them to Marisa. Thran’s mane was slathered with whatever Marisa used to enhance his white hair, carefully rinsed, slathered again – this time in conditioner – then encased in plastic wrap and a hot towel. By the time Bard had his shampoo and conditioner, Thran was asleep in his comfortable chair under the warm dryer, his cappuccino forgotten beside him. Rowan came back to regard him, and cast Bard a sidelong look.

“That is one exhausted dancer.”

Bard nodded. “Would it be too much to ask you to let him sleep, and do me first?”

“Absolutely not. All he needs is a little snip here and a little snip there, unlike a certain artist I could mention.”

“Um, I’m sorry about that,” Bard gave Rowan a chagrined shrug. “Life intruded.”

Rowan nodded wisely. “It has a habit of doing that. Come on, then. Let the tired dancer sleep.”

Rowan wielded her magical scissors, combs, razors, and dryers until Bard’s locks were back to the graceful tousle she’d given him back in January. When he was restored, he went back with Rowan to ease Thran awake.

“Come on, honey, let’s get you detailed and dried,” she urged, as Thran opened his eyes. "Or do you want to look at your hunky husband for a few minutes first? Not that I blame you, not in the least.”

“My saint, you are restored,” Thran said, stretching in his chair. “Tcha, you did not have to let me sleep so long.”

“Oh, yes, I did,” Rowan put her hands on her hips and a look of mock affront on her face. “How else could I get Bard away from you long enough to make him spill all your secrets?”

“I have no secrets from you, krasivaya,” Thran waved a dismissive hand. He gave Bard a considering expression. “But a certain metal sculptor... mmmm. It bears no contemplation.”

“Oh, give, honey!” Rowan begged with exaggerated urgency. “Tell me everything while I snip!”

She led Thran off, leaving Bard to chuckle in the waiting area over his café au lait. He didn’t have long to wait – perhaps half an hour passed before Thran appeared, his hair resplendently white and silky. They bade Rowan a fond and appreciative farewell, then Bard drove them back home. Again, Thran was virtually silent on the return journey.

“I am sorry, Bard,” Thran sighed when they neared their exit on the highway. “I am poor company, I know.”

“You’re worried, and I understand why. Hell, I am, too. But Lettie seemed hopeful last night that Headmaster L’Eärendil wouldn’t pitch UVB out for one rotten apple. So you have reason to be hopeful, too.”

“I try to be,” Thran admitted. “But it is hard, because there are so many constraints on what I can do or say, when there were none on the fool who caused this...”

“There were constraints. He chose to ignore them, so he lost his job.”

“And perhaps he will have other things to face with the police,” conceded Thran. “Though I am sure I will have much to face with the company today.”

“Likely so. But you’ll get through it. Just take it one breath at a time.”

Thran nodded as they drove through the village. “That is the best thing I can do.”

In a few minutes, they were home. The boys and Tilda were eating breakfast, and welcomed their fathers home with food-sprinkled smiles. Thran went upstairs with Bard to change into his dancewear, while Bard put on his working clothes, for he’d continue his experiments with aluminum spheres and epoxy once Thran left for the studio.

“You said you have a flying lesson today, angel?” Bard asked as they worked in the kitchen to assemble Thran’s stash of chicken, vegetables, and nuts. The children clattered by them, running outside to play.

“I do,” Thran brightened. “The last scheduled one, but I would not be surprised if it turns out not to be so.”

“Oh?” Bard looked up from the cutting board where he sliced a red pepper into slivers. “Why is that?”

“Because this is the first time we will fly in costume. Rada has reservations about the cape Irmo wants me to wear when I fly. It is to flare behind me, I suppose like flames or streams of ice, or some such thing. Rada thinks it will tangle in the wire, and I am inclined to agree with him. But Irmo...”
thinks otherwise, so we will see. If all goes well, that is good. If not, then Rada must rework the costume, and then I will need another flying lesson.”

Bard considered that as he packed the pepper strips in Thran’s bento box. “I know you’ll take all due care, angel, but I’ll say it, anyway. Don’t let a few yards of fabric mess up anything. If you think the cape won’t work, then say so. I’m sure Rada will come up with a brilliant alternative without thinking hard.”

Thran flashed him an amused look. “You are right, my saint. It would not surprise me if our Rada has not already considered how best to replace a cumbersome cape with something more elegant.”

“I’d bet on it.” Bard packed the last bit of chicken in Thran’s boxes and snapped it shut. “All right, then. Off you go.”

“I am off, and I leave, too,” Thran smiled as he put his boxes into his dance bag. He leaned over the island to offer Bard a kiss.

Bard met him half way. “Do your best, just like always.”

“I will. Until later, my saint.”

He walked his husband out to the carriage house, calling to the children that Thran was on his way out. Legolas and Tilda sent him on his way with hugs, and Bain with a fist bump and a grin. As Thran’s SUV turned down the lane and disappeared, and the children ran back into the back yard, Bard’s smile faded and his concern about yesterday’s altercation resurfaced. As he heaved the barn’s bay door up, his thoughts were not on the sculpture he was about to work on, but on a beleaguered ballet dancer who carried so much on his slender feet.
Chapter 140

Chapter Summary

The angel does damage control, a gentle soul solves a mystery, and a much-debated cape has its moment in the spotlight.

So soon as Bard’s encouraging face disappeared in his rear view mirror, Thran let his smile fade. How much of an effort had it been to keep his worry and apprehension from revealing itself to his family? No matter that Clan Ffyrnig’s sharp-eyed lioness was not in residence – the boys were far from the oblivious gamers that they seemed so often. Legolas knew his father well, and Bain knew Legolas, and between the two of them, they were the curious ferrets to Sigrid’s bold lioness. Then there was busy Tilda happily shepherding her bees and vegetables. If she weren’t yet wise enough to fathom every upset that plagued those older than she was, she was still sensitive enough to sense general disquiet. The worst of all was his husband with his all-but-telepathic ability to gauge Thran’s mood to a fine point. All of them had rallied to reassure him yesterday. Bard’s thorough ministrations last night had been the ultimate attempt to soothe and reassure him.

Bard’s attentions had clearly reminded Thran of how much love surrounded him, and had sent him easily to sleep. They had not, however, been enough to keep him from waking just before six this morning, his thoughts churning with so much worry, so many things that needed to be done, so much pointless thrashing about what to do if this or that or the other happened. He had only just fallen back asleep when Bard had woken him to get ready for their trip to the city. He had managed to get through breakfast and the trip to the city without showing too much of his upset, mostly because he remained silent. Bard had respected that, rightly thinking he was preoccupied.

Bard was twice the saint Bard thought he was. He gave and gave and gave...

Let a metal sculptor tell you not to worry because he’s got lots of love and affection to bestow on the love of his life...

Thran sighed. He felt no differently about Bard, but still... it was humbling to be so well regarded, and hard not to worry if he were worthy of it. He certainly felt more sympathy and understanding of how Bard had felt when they’d first dared to begin their relationship. That had given Thran one more reason to hold his tongue and school his expression this morning, no matter how hard it had been – was it any surprise that he’d fallen asleep as soon as Marisa put him under the warm dryer? At least he’d woken more refreshed. Rowan’s attentions had further soothed him, and of course it had been nothing but a delight to see Bard’s sexy Musketeer hairdo reappear.

But his mood had fallen again on the way home, because as soon as he’d gotten home, he’d left for the UVB studio, where he would face the fallout from yesterday, and the rest of the company. The afternoon’s flying lesson, where he would leap off a twenty-foot tower in a cumbersome costume cape while suspended on a thin wire, would be a banal undertaking after such a nerve-wracking morning.

He pulled into the UVB parking lot at eleven-thirty, half an hour before UVB’s senior people were due to arrive, and an hour and a half before the rest of the company was scheduled to appear. Despite his early arrival, Thran recognized Irmo’s car, and Abebe’s, and Lettie’s. They were no less anxious than he was, then. Thran ignored them all to search for the unassuming wagon that Ori drove.
It was here, too. Did that bode well, or ill?

Thran strode into the studio as if he were Spartacus defying the Romans. There were no Romans here, only his worries, but if anything needed defying, those did.

“They’re in Lettie’s office,” Simone murmured, as soon as Thran entered. Simone was usually their pianist, but this morning, she’d stationed herself at the lobby desk to watch for him.

“Merci, ma chère,” he murmured, barely remembering to nod acknowledgement as he strode past. As he expected, the ballet master, artistic director, choreographer, and UVB’s all around expediter were gathered around Lettie’s desk. All of them looked up at Thran’s entrance, but the one Thran regarded was Ori. The young man looked well rested, and his welcoming smile had a confident edge to it. Thran dared to relax an edge of his concern.

“Good morning, all,” he raised a hand in welcome.

A host of good morning wishes murmured in reply. “I hope you slept well,” Lettie continued.

Thran shrugged. “I hazard no better than many of you. Where do we stand this morning?”

Lettie leaned forward. “We’re on good footing with our dancers’ contracts. As you know, they already state explicitly that illicit drug use – meaning anything not prescribed by a doctor for a specific reason – is grounds for dismissal and termination of contract. So we can deal with Kiefer’s dismissal without issue. Our contracts also include clauses that restrict speaking to the media or providing information to media outlets without express permission, which cover us about the leaked information. Even so, Adam will draw up an even more strongly worded amendment about nondisclosure. We can squeak by without it, but we all agree that we need more specific protection given the original work we’re doing. That’ll be good going forward, as well, because none of us expect Immortal to be our only original work. That new clause will be in all of our contracts going forward, and we will ask everyone in the company to sign the amendment to cover the rest of this season.”

“That is good news,” Thran agreed.

“Yes, yes,” Irmo chimed in, nodding vigorously. “I am like the rest of you – I do not want another company to steal our innovations because of a sneak thief.”

Today, the often-contentious choreographer’s sentiment met with nothing but agreement.

“I’ve got some good news about that.” Ori interlaced his fingers around one knee and looked thoughtful. “Those articles on the Internet that you sent me, Thran, were not from any of the dancers.”

“Wait,” Abebe frowned, and so did Irmo. “What articles?”

“They are the reason why Lettie mentioned our concern about nondisclosure,” Thran explained, then gave a succinct summary of what Sigrid had discovered yesterday. This was met with universal apprehension.

“So somewhere we have a mole,” Abebe surmised, glowering in anger. “Someone wants us to look bad.”

“That is a rat, not a mole,” Thran agreed. “But I understand – you mean mole as in a spy.”

“Exactly,” Abebe agreed. “And I agree with you, he or she is a rat, too.”
“But you said none of the dancers were behind the articles, Ori?” Lettie drew the group back to the central issue.

“That’s right,” Ori nodded.

Lettie’s smile was cautiously hopeful. “If that’s the case, then that’s a relief.”

“How sure are you?” Abebe questioned.

“Oh, quite sure,” Ori replied thoughtfully, without any smugness or arrogance. He looked as if he considered a math problem, which was likely true. “It didn’t take much to unravel it, so if you’re interested, I’ll explain.”

“Absolutely, we’re interested,” Abebe exclaimed, which drew chuckles of agreement from his colleagues.

“Really? Oh, all right, then,” the quiet Ori looked gratified. “I’ll leave out all the computer jargon, so I’ll just say that I looked at the coding behind what Thran sent me – how it was prepared, how it was posted, where it originated, and so forth. The person behind it wasn’t all that technically adept, in that I was able to identify the host server pretty quickly...” Ori looked at the blank faces around him, and smiled shyly. “Oh, well, I’ll leave out that bit, too. Suffice it to say that I sorted out where the stuff came from without a lot of effort. But the most important clue didn’t take any computer sleuthing at all.”

“It didn’t?” Abebe asked. “What did you do, ask each of the dancers?”

That brought a chuckle, but Ori’s expression was impish. “I didn’t have to. That grainy picture that was in the material you sent, Thran? I did a little photo enhancement on it, and there was the answer, plain as day – every one of the dancers in the company was in the picture.”

Ori tapped on his tablet, and turned it around for everyone to see the picture displayed there. It was the picture Thran had seen on Sigrid’s laptop last night that showed the Underworld portion of the stage, but Ori’s enhancement software had sharpened the image. There was Thran in the middle of the picture with Charisse and Luka before him; around them were arrayed the rest of the company.

“So if all of the dancers were in the picture, then none of them could take the picture?” Thran asked.

Ori nodded. “That’s what I think. There are remote control cameras, but I don’t think that was what was used to take this picture. It’s blurry, so I think our mole took it on the sly with a mobile phone. If the mole had used a digital camera, the quality would likely be better, but someone holding up a camera would have attracted notice. If someone waves a mobile around, we all think it’s just an animated conversation.”

“That makes sense,” Lettie nodded.

“So if the picture shows all of the dancers, who could have taken it?” Abebe raised his hands in puzzlement.

“The picture gave me some hints to that, too, just in where it was taken. It was shot straight on, which meant the mole stood along the centerline of the auditorium. The auditorium has two side aisles, not a center one, so the mole would have had to stand in the middle of a row. But that’s not where the mole was. This picture was taken from the back of the auditorium, not down near the stage, which makes sense if you don’t want someone to see what you’re doing. And it’s not at the level of the seats, but higher.”
“It was taken from the light and sound booth,” Irmo said at once.

Ori nodded vigorously. “That’s exactly what I think, too.”

Lettie’s eyes narrowed. “One of the technicians, then?”

“I thought it likely,” Ori tapped his chin with a finger as he considered the screen. “So I did the most obvious thing first – I searched the Internet for ‘Immortal ballet and Thran Oropherson,’ which nicely presented this very picture. Through one means or another, I traced it to the links Sigrid had found, as well as a blog.” The equanimity that usually graced Ori’s face was lost in mild exasperation as he turned his tablet around to type quickly. When he turned it around again, Thran and the others saw the original blurry picture atop a typed message.

“The entry accompanying the picture reads, ‘This picture just earned me a hundred bucks! That makes five hundred so far!’ I think we have a youthful paparazzo who sold this picture to whoever wrote the blog. And I can say with a high degree of certainty who this youthful paparazzo is. I looked at the list of student interns, and made a list of everyone who works on the light and sound teams. And there I found Greta Wurlitzer.”

“What makes you think it’s her?” Lettie asked, frowning as if she thought she’d missed something, but didn’t know what.

Ori scrolled to the top of the blog. The banner read Greta’s Gossip, and the top graphic displayed a multi-tiered organ console.

“Hardly original,” Abebe sniffed.

“Hardly.” Ori agreed. “But she’s not the end of the story. Did she take the picture? I think so. Did she post the articles Sigrid found? I think not. I think she sold the picture to whomever did post the articles.”

“So who posted the articles?” Irmo asked, holding his hands up impatiently.

“There are ways to identify the exact person,” Ori shrugged noncommittally. Thran read that to mean there were illegal ways to do that, and that Ori had employed however many of them he needed to do exactly that. Given his posture and lack of excitement, he’d determined that the person wasn’t worth pursuing. “But we don’t need to. There are five articles from this same source, all of them vaguely insinuating and catty, but they haven’t revealed anything of importance past a blurry picture. We’ve just four weeks to go before Immortal opens, and we have too much to do to pursue him or her directly for something so trivial. If we dismiss Greta Wurlitzer from the interns, that removes this person’s source of information, and that leaves her with nothing more to post.”

Thran and his colleagues exchanged considering glances. “What if the person who wrote the articles convinces someone else to provide information?”

When Ori grinned, he looked enough like his brother that Thran smothered a smile. “I don’t think that will be an issue. I leave it to you to consider whether a reminder to the interns about nondisclosure would be prudent.”

“So we have dodged a pair of bullets,” Thran said smoothly, before anyone else noticed Ori’s minor slip. “But we have one more to consider.”

All attention snapped to Thran. “What’s that?” Irmo barked.

“We must consider whether Kiefer was the only dancer who resorted to cocaine as a means of
That was a serious enough topic to divert everyone from what Ori had said. “What do you have in mind, Thran, other than we hope no one else did?” Lettie asked.

“I want to tell the company that yes, there was an incident. They all know there was, so we look foolish to deny it. They will make their own inferences when we tell them about the baggage check, as well. But I want to say further that we take this very seriously, and not only because we are in a school. If anyone else relies on means to enhance performance that our contract expressly forbids, or for some other reason wants to end association with UVB, then he or she is free to request a release from contract, no questions asked, without repercussions. But if we discover a problem later, then there will be the fullest repercussions possible under the law.”

“I suggest that you say only that there was an incident, and Kiefer’s no longer with the company, without further details. Anything else is a violation of privacy... yes, despite the fact that he was blatant about what he did,” Ori held up a hand in placation. “Then say that UVB takes its contracts seriously, and if there are any reasons why anyone feels she or she can’t honor the contract in its entirety, then UVB will offer a release, no questions asked, without repercussions. I know you want to say more than that, Thran, but we can’t without opening ourselves to legal issues.”

Thran wasn’t the only one to sigh in frustration. “Welcome to the land of lawyers,” was Abebe’s observation.

“I agree,” Ori gave the ballet master a sympathetic smile. “But because this is the land of lawyers, we have to take what we say as seriously as the litigious folks do. And at least saying that we take all terms of our contracts seriously lets us cover everything, not just one thing.”

“We’ll have to take what comfort we can from that,” Lettie sighed with a less than cheerful expression. “And we should be grateful that Headmaster L’Eärendil didn’t pitch us out on our ears. We can stay in the school, but we’ll be under much closer scrutiny. Given how close we are to the premiere, we managed to avoid all of the dancers having to pass a drug test. But as Thran said, all of our baggage will be searched each morning, and the school may very well call for random drug tests if we give them any reason to suspect anything.”

The group spent the last few minutes before the dancers would start to arrive planning who would say what. Lettie would give the overview; Abebe would describe the need for the baggage search, and the watchful eye that would follow them during rehearsal. Thran would finish with the reminder of what the dancers’ contracts specified, and the chance to dissolve association with the company if anyone desired. That done, the only thing left to do was to wait.

Thran went outside to catch a well needed breath of late spring air. He was not surprised when Ori came out to stand beside him.

“Who is she?”

“Oh, you noticed that,” Ori sighed. He flitted a sheepish look at Thran.

“I did. Your brother has taught me well.”

“He taught me well, too,” Ori’s grin appeared and vanished as quickly as morning mist. “Our article writer is Greta’s older sister, Noëlle. She’s a media studies student at a nearby college, it doesn’t matter which one, with a minor in modern dance. She’s a fair to middling student, more than anything else. The server she posted on is somewhere on campus, so I think the articles were a class assignment – you know, the kind where your grade depends on how many hits your item
“I have not heard of such a thing.” Thran admitted. “This is a phenomenon?”

“It is,” Ori nodded. “There was a famous one some time ago where the class assignment was to put something out on the net and see how many hits it got. Anything receiving a hundred hits or more earned the students an A. One team of students CGI-ed a short video of an eagle swooping down to snatch a baby in a park. It got over a million hits. Needless to say, those students got their A.”

Thran mulled this over. “I feel better, then, in one regard – we suffered no harm that we know of. But on the other... I would have liked it better if the articles had been positive instead of negative. Were these articles widely read?”

Ori shrugged. “Sigrid said it best in the email she sent me – nasty sells. I wish that weren’t so, but it’s true nevertheless. The first one was read a few hundred times, but it didn’t have much content, so the following ones were read less. The last one with the picture picked up a bit, but the comments on all of them were dismissive because they had so little content.”

“So this was not particularly malicious.”

Ori shook his head. “I don’t think so. But I’d still dismiss Greta from the interns. It’s worth sending a message that this isn’t how a professional acts.”

One by one, dancers arrived in the parking lot, and tiptoed past Thran and Ori with subdued greetings. Thran and Ori exchanged looks before they followed a group of dancers back into the studio. Thran retrieved his bag from Lettie’s office and took himself into the studio, scanning the other dancers to see who was here. He was somewhat surprised to see Nadine, Kiefer’s partner, given how upset she’d been yesterday, but he had no reason to suspect that she had fallen prey to the same dependency that had claimed her partner. Besides, Kiefer, the rest of the company was in place – no, Piero, one of the four hip-hop dancers, was missing. As Lettie, Abebe, Irmo, and Ori filed into the studio, Thran refused to think about what that absence meant.

“Good afternoon,” Lettie began, and the dancers arrayed themselves around her and the other leaders of the ballet. “I’m sure all of you are as concerned as I am about what took place at the Imladris Academy yesterday afternoon. All I may legally tell you is that there was an incident, a very serious incident, and that Kiefer Standaal is no longer part of UltraViolet Ballet.”

“While I will not speculate on the particulars of yesterday’s incident, I can tell you that I have looked long and hard at what this company is trying to do. We want to bring a brand new ballet, something unlike anything else, to life. This takes an incredible amount of work and dedication and sacrifice, which all of you have given without complaint. I’m proud of you all for the huge effort you’ve made. This huge effort is very important to all of us who lead our company – me, Irmo, Abebe, and Thran. We understand that this level of sacrifice is hard, and at times it seems to demand more than we can give. We sacrifice our bodies to learn the roles, to rehearse the roles over and over and over again until our bodies dance them without thought. It’s important that you care for yourselves, mentally and physically, to meet these demands.

“The contracts that each of you signed when you joined UltraViolet Ballet are quite specific about all of the things that will be demanded of you, and what things are deal breakers. I hope you take these things very seriously, and that you will continue to do all in your power to abide by them.”

The dancers looked among themselves and murmured as Lettie nodded to Abebe, who stepped forward. “The Imladris Academy, where we’re going to premiere our ballet, has rules and regulations that are just as important for us to follow. Their goal is to provide the best and safest experience for its students. None of us wants to provide the Imladris Academy a reason to think that we present a risk for its students, so it’s important that we follow their rules, as well as ours, to show our good faith. After yesterday, we have agreed that we will allow school security to search all baggage that we bring into the school each day. I don’t have to tell you what they don’t want to find – weapons, alcohol, and drugs. Cameras are out, too - not your cell phones, but separate cameras. As for the cell phone cameras, understand that you cannot post any photos you take of the Immortal set or costumes. You don’t have to worry about things like asthma inhalers, or legal medications. Just make sure you bring the prescription slip that came with the medication that has your name on it, and you’ll be fine. OTC drugs for colds and sinus are okay, too, and so are the usual lunches, snacks, teas, hot water heaters, and so forth. We’ll make sure the school understands why we need scissors and sewing kits for our shoes, and so forth. Just be smart, and this will be business as usual.”

The dancers’ murmurs grew louder as Abebe nodded to Thran, and he stepped forward.

Gods, help me to stay calm!

“Yesterday was a very hard day for me,” he admitted, swallowing. “The effort we make here is very important, and I appreciate your willingness to bring Immortal to life. The contracts and terms we must follow are also very important. Please, I ask you to take these terms as seriously as I do. Do not put yourself and the effort of so many at risk. If any of you has come to the point where you worry that you cannot uphold these terms, then speak to any of us, at any time, and we will offer help. If any of you has gone past that point, and you feel you cannot fulfill your contract any longer, then speak to us, and we will release you from your contract, without risk, without question, without ramifications, without consequences. Stay only if you can meet each and every part of your contract. Please, do not leave yourself and us in a position to discover a problem later, where we will be in no position but to pursue consequences.”

He looked around at the company soberly. “Please, consider all that we have said.”

Abebe and Lettie nodded in agreement, and the artistic director spoke again. “It’s important that each of you have the time and privacy to consider what we have said, and how you want to approach your continuation with UVB. On Monday, we will ask each of you in private what your response is. We will email you information of how this will work before Monday.

“Lastly, I want to call your attention to one particular section of our contracts that covers talking to the media. In the interest of everyone’s privacy, we will not make any statement to the public about anything about Immortal between now and our premiere, other than the already scheduled promotional pieces. We will not grant permission to anyone else other than our PR firm to make statements, either. So respect your colleagues and the effort we all make and maintain privacy. We will cover this with our technical crews as well, and anyone else connected with our effort.

“I appreciate your patience, all of you. We’ve all worked so hard to bring this ballet to the world. All of you are professionals, and you know that the hardest three weeks are yet to come – the last push before our first performance. So please, take care of yourselves, take care of each other, and we’ll get through this. Thank you for hanging tough.”

Abebe waited a few seconds before he clapped his hands. “All right, everyone. Thran, Charisse, Luka and Irmo are off for their in-costume flying lesson, and the rest of us will go through the Underworld scenes. Get into your practice wear, then we’ll do barre.”

Thran was about to flag down Ori for a quick tête-à-tête, but four dancers intercepted him. “Thran?”

“Yes?” Thran replied. Ah, it was Nadine and the three remaining hip-hop dancers.
Nervous looks flitted back and forth. Immediately, Thran gestured towards the studio doors. “Come, we will go into Lettie’s office.”

The four dancers followed silently. Thran let them precede him into the office, and he shut the door behind them. “Now, we can speak in private.”

“We appreciate that,” one of the hip-hop dancers, Umiko, said softly. “We... don’t think Piero’s.... um, coming back, either, because....”

Thran made a quick decision. “I do not need to know, Umiko. I will not put you in the position to say anything. It is answer enough that he is not here today.”

“It’s... we didn’t know, but...”

“And I didn’t know about Kiefer, either,” Nadine blurted.

“And we hope that you won’t dump the rest of us because they’re...” Antonio fumbled.

“Tcha, I do not dump anyone as long as he or she honors the contracts,” Thran replied. “As long as that is so, then all is well.”

“Well...” Umiko looked at her friends. “We thought that because we had that little Montagues-and-Capulets thing we added to the scene, that with two of us down, you’d... but we can work out something with the four of us, so it won’t leave a hole...”

“That is perfect,” Thran nodded, smiling. “That will be a relief, not to have to replace such a creative element. I will speak to Irmo. But you must be patient with him, for he will want to fuss, but please bear with it, and him.”

“Oh, we will,” Donni assured him breathlessly. “This is the best opportunity for us, it really is, and we’ll so whatever we need to do to make the most of it – as per our contracts, of course,” she added hastily.

“Of course,” Thran replied with a small smile. “I thank you very much.”

“We thank you, too,” Umiko swallowed. “This.... it’s been hard for us, too.”

Thran opened the door and let the four dancers precede him on the way back to the studio. Lettie waited in the lunch room, so he ducked in briefly to tell her about Piero, then he hurried to snare Irmo, where he explained in spare words that two of the six dancers in the Montagues-and-Capulets side scene were out, but Irmo was not to make an issue of it, merely work with the remaining four as needed to revise their interactions. For once, Irmo did not vent his agitation.

“Why is Piero gone?” he asked. His tone was irritated, but calm.

“I do not know, and it does not matter. There is no need for any of us to comment on it. Merely address the changes you and the dancers must make. That is your focus.”

Irmo nodded. “It is well that I’ll be with you this afternoon for the flying, then. Abebe will see that the dancers work on their part, and tomorrow they will likely have most of it in place. They worked very quickly to make that scene, so changing it will likely be easy for them.”

Irmo had rarely shown such forbearance, but Thran wasn’t about to question it. “Likely so,” he agreed. “I will speak to Abebe, then I will see you at the flying lesson.”
Irmo lifted a hand in agreement, and headed out of the studio, leaving Thran to advise Abebe of the change. The ballet master took it all in stride, and finally Thran was able to collect his bag and find Ori in the mix. Once again, he summarized the loss of Piero, and the young man nodded without surprise.

“I wondered, when he wasn’t here this morning.” He sighed. “Any reason why?”

“I did not ask, and I will not speculate. I merely took his colleagues at their word. Lettie will call him to confirm.”

“All right. I’ll be here with her to sort things out about Monday, Thran. I hope the costume test on the wire goes well.”

“So do I,” Thran gave a wry smile. “I myself am in the Edna Mode camp of No Capes, but we shall see. Rada will be there to help make sense of it all.”

“That’s good,” Ori nodded at once. “I’ll see you tomorrow, then? At the ballroom?”

“At the ballroom. Au revoir for now, mon cher.”

Ori gave him a bright smile and a wave as he paused by Lettie’s office door and Thran went on towards the lobby. As he waved goodbye to Simone and got into his SUV, he took a deep breath. It hadn’t gone too badly, and the two lost dancers could be worked around. Thank the gods.

It could have been much, much worse.

* * *

Thran was the last of the four UVB people to arrive at the Fly By Nighthawks studio. Rada was also there, with four garment bags and one box in tow. Two of the garment bags were opened, as Luka and Charisse had already gone back to the restrooms to change into pieces of their costumes. Rada handed Thran the tights and boots that he’d wear as Death on the battlefield, so Thran followed Luka into the restroom to put those on. Luka was already in his singlet, leggings, and boots, so once Thran donned his, they joined Charisse, Irmo, Rada, Robbie, Tink, and Half Ton in the studio. Rada and Irmo watched closely as the riggers took their usual pains to get the Luka and Charisse into their flying harnesses. As this was the first time Rada and Irmo had seen the harnesses, they had several questions for the riggers, who patiently explained and demonstrated. Rada had his notebook open, scribbling rapidly as the explanations went on.

Once the harnesses were in place, Rada produced the tunics for Maid and Soldier. Thran was impressed at the care Rada took with fitting Charisse and Luka, making sure that the costumes didn’t bind them, or impede the harness. He took note of exactly how the wire attached to the back of the harnesses, even snapping pictures with his mobile to get the precise details. The riggers had both dancers take a couple of preliminary flights up to the platform for Irmo and Rada to see the effect, then the lot of them worked to refine the flight and the costumes to match Irmo’s vision. Thran stayed on the fringes, paying attention to Irmo and Rada’s adjustments while he warmed up for his turn.

Charisse’s dress dipped low enough in the back that Rada didn’t have to make any changes to allow the wire to attach to her harness; he had only to open the center back seam of Luka’s tunic to accommodate the wire.

Very easy, Thran thought. Would his much more complex costume go so well? Likely not.
Irmo fussed a little more, not about the costumes, but to correct how Luka and Charisse held their arms and legs for their flight. Both dancers were well used to Irmo’s manner by now, and made the adjustments without complaint, despite how contrary they seemed. The result was worth it, for now the pair seemed to float upward solely on the force of their love rather than on wires. Once again Irmo had transcended his supposed ignorance of human emotion to turn the result of a mechanical necessity, the wire, into so much more. Who would see the Soldier and the Maid ascend to the heavens and not understand that their love was what gave the ballet its name?

Thran put aside his reverie as Robbie and Half Ton turned their attentions to him. On went his flying harness atop his thin tee, then the riggers adjusted it carefully. With all the poking and prodding from two riggers, Rada, and Irmo, he felt more like a store mannequin than a dancer, but he took it in good stride. Death’s armored tunic went over both arms and fastened down the back with Velcro, then the billowing cape of beautiful electric blue fastened at the throat and anchored on both shoulders.

“No capes,” Tink muttered, as she helped to drape it. Thran raised his eyebrows at her and offered a pained smile.

“Agreed,” he murmured back. “But I am only the poor dancer.”

“You’re the one flying in the thing,” she replied. “It’s not a good idea, and if it causes the least wrinkle in anything, I’ll say so.”

“So will I,” Thran assured her, as the choreographer and costumier approached.

“Irmo, I do think it’s too bulky,” Rada said gently. “Death’s gravity must come from Thran’s dancing, not a costume that weighs him down.”

“There is no weight!” Irmo scoffed, pulling up an edge of the cape and letting it flutter free. “See how light it is? Barely more than silk! What else is so light that it will flow like clouds behind him as he flies?”

Rada’s usually placid demeanor shifted into pale disagreement. “It’s a distraction, Irmo. Look at the rest of the costume – the ritual characters, the delineation of the ancient armor, how it accentuates Death’s attenuated frame. Those are all things we want the audience to recognize immediately. The cape obscures that.”

“The audience will see those things as soon as Death begins his descent,” Irmo argued. “The cape will flare around him like storm clouds, the appropriate backdrop for all that you mention!”

Tink rolled her eyes, and despite his opinion about the matter, Thran grinned. “Then let us find out. Hook my wire, then up I go.”

Because Thran’s tunic fastened in the back, there was no need for Rada to open any back seam. The cape, however, was another story, so Robbie called for Rada to open the center seam opening before he fastened the wire in place. With Robbie and Half Ton tending his wire, Thran climbed to the top of the tower. Tink climbed up to hand him his headdress; when he had it on, she passed him his gloves with the attenuated fingers.

“All set, Thran?” Robbie called up.

“Ready,” Thran waved. He took two running steps to launch off the tower, spread his arms wide, and off he went –

A sudden jerk set him off balance – the cape had caught on something. As gravity pulled him forward, the Velcro strips that held the cape to his shoulders tore free, leaving the fabric to tighten across his throat like a garrote. He tore at it, finally prying the Velcro apart. There! Yes, the pressure against his neck was gone, so he heaved a grateful breath – but the cape still held him tethered to the tower. At the near end, the thick neck seam of the cape held firm against the wire. At the far end, the hem of the cape remained caught on some part of the tower. He was in no danger now that the cape was not around his neck, because Robbie and Half Ton held him securely.

“We’ve got you, Thran – don’t fight it, or you’ll make it harder for us to get you free!” Robbie called up. “Are you okay?”

“I am okay,” Thran called back down as he kept his arms and legs still. As Robbie and Half Ton inched him lower, Rada ran forward with a pair of scissors for Tink. She swarmed up the tower and cut the cape near the point where it’d caught so that Robbie and Half Ton could lower Thran to the floor.

“Karma has spoken,” Thran said calmly, as Robbie came to unhook him from the wire so he could take off the offending cape. He bundled it in Rada’s arms, then turned a firm gaze on Irmo. “No capes, Irmo. No discussion. No capes.”

If the adamant light in Thran’s eyes wasn’t enough of a deterrent, then the stern expression on Robbie’s face was, so Irmo swallowed any protest. “Then we are left with only half a costume.”

“Oh, I don’t think so,” Rada said in his gentle voice, gathering up his fourth garment bag. “Of course I didn’t want the cape to cause any trouble, but I thought that in case it did, I should have a backup plan, one that would eliminate the cape while still giving you the fanfare you wanted, Irmo. So let me just add these…”

Rada dug into his bag and took out streamers of iridescent blue cloth that he stuck down the length of Thran’s arms, anchoring them at strategic points with dots of the ubiquitous Velcro. Similar strips went down the backs of Thran’s legs, and another trio of strips went down Thran’s back. The strips were all cut in wavy lengths to resemble cold flames. The effect was enhanced when Thran waved his arms experimentally.

“Ah, interesting!” Irmo admitted, struck at the way the strips reflected the light. “Yes, yes, this looks promising, Rada! Thran, see how this works when you fly.”

Thran took off his gloves, but left his headdress on to climb atop the tower again. Tink tossed him his gloves, and when the riggers were ready, he flung himself off the tower again.

This time, Thran soared from the tower across the studio without incident. As gravity pulled him back towards the tower, he leaned into the turn as Robbie had taught him, got himself properly facing back the way he’d come, and did his best to make Rada’s streamers flare out behind him.

“Yes!” Irmo crowed. “Yes, yes! Ah, that is it! Rada, you are brilliant! The streamers are like fire, like icy blue fire, and much lighter than the cape. Yes!”

“How did the streamers feel, Thran?” Rada asked, smiling at Irmo’s reaction. “Any hindrance at all? Any drag atop the platform?”

“None at all,” Thran confirmed. “Robbie, what do you think?”

“They’re all well away from the wire, which is my primary concern,” the rigger rubbed his beard. “My only suggestion is to keep the leg streamers short at the ankle so they don’t catch on something like the cape did. They can be longer on the thighs, lower back, and upper arms if you want, as long as they’re clear of the wire.”
Rada scribbled more notes in his book, humming to himself in concentration. “Variegated colors, I think, purples and blues, but no reds, those are for the mortals...”

“Please, fly again,” Irmo urged. “Let us consider how the arms and legs should move to make the best display of the flames...”

Thran made a half-dozen flights before Irmo zeroed in on the movements he wanted, then made several more to refine them. The riggers and Irmo had a long discussion about how best to unhook Thran from the wire once he alit on the stage, for he couldn’t dance effectively with the wire in place. Irmo was adamant about wanting the unhooking to be out of sight of the audience, so as not to ruin the fantasy. Could one of the seemingly dead soldiers come up stealthily behind Thran to do it? Everyone agreed that that would likely be visible given the soldiers’ pale tunics. Perhaps someone clad in black could slip onto the stage during Thran’s flight down, unhook him from behind, then disappear again.

“We will find a way,” Irmo vowed. “When do we practice flying on our stage, Thran?”

“We start next week, yes?” Thran looked to Robbie.

“That’s right. We want to get the hardware in place, then recheck our equipment to match the stage. We’ve used all the measurements we took out there earlier for this setup, but we recheck everything as a matter of course.”

“I thank you for that,” Charisse inserted. She and Luka had stayed to watch Thran’s progress. “I do not want my first flight to be my last. So, Robbie, you check and recheck as many times as you like!”

“Yes, ma’am,” Robbie offered her a sketchy bow and a raffish grin. “We want it right, too. It’s hard to get paid if our flyers don’t soar the way they expect.”

“I can’t imagine why,” Charisse pretended to tease. “So unreasonable!”

“So we’re good for today,” Robbie said. “Let’s get you out of the harnesses, and we’ll see you all at Imladris next Wednesday.”

Rada and the riggers helped the three dancers out of their costumes, then their flying harnesses. It wasn’t until Thran stepped out of his harness that he realized how tightly he’d been strapped into the contraption. His sore erector spinae twinged, but he kept his face impassive.

At least his feet didn’t hurt. And the damned cape was no more.
Chapter 141

Chapter Summary

The saint savors life, the cherubs play detective, and the angel reaps the rewards of the cherub’s deductions.

Bard almost believed that his life had turned into the classic cliché of heaven on earth. His children, all four of them, were happy and healthy. He was an artist again, with commissions to work on, a wonderful representative, and a gallery that beautifully presented his work to the public. His house was restored to the beauty he’d always hoped it would be, even the garden beds, and it was full of the sights, sounds, and scents of a happy, active family and lots of good food. Around them were friendly neighbors, a picturesque village, and a marvelous school. The bounty was everything he’d hoped to give his family.

The one thing that belied the heavenly surroundings, of course, was Thran.

Yes, Bard’s ethereal angel of a husband was happy to be with Bard and their children, and yes, he was engaged in exciting, original, challenging work. But the strain he was under to drag a young, inexperienced, and underfunded ballet company up to a higher plane of professionalism was not merely financial, but mental as well. To create an exciting new ballet was creatively exhausting. Added to the financial and mental stress was the daunting physical challenge to dance Immortal’s difficult central role with seemingly effortless strength and grace.

Financial, mental, and physical challenges, all demanded of a single man... there was nothing heavenly about that combination.

If Immortal’s premiere hadn’t been just a month away, Bard might have begged Thran to take a break, but even he recognized how impossible that would be. Bard couldn’t dance in place of Thran, and he couldn’t do more than he already had to inch the creative process along. Nor could he help the complex financial arrangements along. Despite his string of successfully completed commissions, he didn’t have the money to support UVB past providing the ballroom and muffins, and he certainly didn’t have the financial smarts to help with the accounting. He urged Thran to delegate as much as he could to Ori, Lettie, Abebe, and Irmo, and refused to worry about the strain Thran’s worthy colleagues already faced. None of them faced the load Thran did, and if Thran faltered, all of them lost.

Other than that, all Bard could do was to see to everything else but Immortal – children, house, logistics – and hope that good food, attentive back rubs, and a sympathetic ear were enough to sustain Thran for the few hours he was at home.

Once school let out, Bard made sure the children were well occupied until their summer camps began in two weeks. Sigrid, of course, was more or less self-sufficient, bicycling to and from the Blue Mountain Bistro on her own. Bain and Legolas joined Derry and Kíllian to rattle around the neighborhood, so Bard made sure he kept plenty of cookies and sandwich makings on hand to satisfy a horde of hungry boys when they clattered through the kitchen. Elanor was a frequent visitor, as well as one or two other little girls from families down the lane as Tilda grew more outgoing. He played a lot of video games, and made a lot of French toast and pancakes.
Being present for the children left Bard with less time in the barn, but he wasn’t concerned; his sketchpad got a enough of a workout that he had a whole stack of sketches for Bilbo to look at for Celebrian’s gallery. He also sorted out how to anchor all those aluminum spheres for the rotating Andromeda galaxy sculpture to an armature, so once the children’s camps began, he’d be ready to put that together. In addition, he managed to make molds for Rahmiel so he could cast him once the children were in camp.

There were always house things to work on. Rosie worked with him on designs for the stained glass to fit in the two round windows in the central hall. He called Mrs. Mathom about a mantelpiece for the main room, and thought about paint for that room – maybe a pale amethyst that matched the sofa pillows, and complemented the grey-green paint in the central hall and dining room? He pried the gazebo’s broken post out, slathered it with construction adhesive, and clamped it to restore it to its original strength, which should cure the sagging roof when he put it back into place. He mowed the lawn, a mundane task that nevertheless seemed like a triumph because nothing more pressing needed doing. Soon, he’d be ready to prowl the junk shops, consignment houses, secondhand emporiums, and thrift stores to see what he could put to good use to fill their echoingly empty house.

He’d have to go on his shopping forays alone until Immortal made its premiere. Maybe after that, Thran wouldn’t have to work so relentlessly to the exclusion of all else, and could go with him. At the very least, once the village arts festival had come and gone, Bard would insist that Thran take a few days off, even if he had to chain Thran to the bed as one or both of them had threatened so often.

No matter how much Thran liked bondage, maybe Bard wouldn’t have to resort to it if he finally got those fragments of Indonesian daybed out of the garret room and pieced them back together. That might be just the thing to encourage Thran to spend a few more blissful moments in bed.

He carted the fragments downstairs and into the barn, where he had room to lay them out and examine them in detail. The wood looked to be weathered teak. A piece of the bottom frame was missing, but it was only a decorative piece – thankfully not one of the carved panels – and not a structural element. The matching piece across the other end was in place. If he could carve something close, he’d put it in place, and make that side the head of the bed where it’d be hidden against the wall. He picked through his tools for a tiny pry bar. If he could get the matching piece out without destroying the whole panel, he could use it as a model for the replacement...

He ended up having to disassemble the entire piece of the frame to free the bit he wanted. After so much effort, he was relieved to find that the piece would fit in the other section without much more than a little shaving on the upper edge. He made a paper template of the piece, and jogged out to the gazebo. The floor of that was made of teak, and a couple of the boards were rotten on one end and needed to be replaced. He pried one up and carried it to the barn, where he traced his pattern over the part that was still solid, and then cut out the shape with his jigsaw. The weathered floorboard didn’t quite match the grey of the bedframe, and it wouldn’t have quite as ornate a design incised into it, but it would do for something that would be probably never be seen. After a little sanding, it was ready to fill the gap in the frame.

He got the two frame pieces reassembled. With those together, he could attach all four to the four corner posts to complete the bottom frame. Now, to measure it, and figure out what size of mattress it needed...

Now that was decidedly odd. The size was exactly square, eighty inches on each side. Wasn’t that close to a king-sized bed? Daybeds were the size of sofas, weren’t they?

He trotted upstairs to the bedroom to measure Thran’s mattress. Seventy-eight by eighty inches.

So... why had the storeowner said this was an odd size that no one wanted?
Whatever this was, it was an antique, but maybe no one had wanted something so old. Maybe no one had wanted to repair it, or didn’t want such a big daybed. Or maybe the owner had merely forgotten it was there until Bard had poked and prodded that day back in November, and had said whatever popped into his head to help him unload a pile of scrap. It didn’t matter. Bard hadn’t paid for much more than a pile of scrap, and he didn’t care whether it had provenance or not. Anything he did with it was better than nothing.

He moved on to see what he could do with the top sections, but he’d only started to sort out the pieces when Sigrid appeared, home from her stint at the bistro. At her herald, he called back from the barn, and she appeared to say hello.

“Wow, Da, is that the bunch of boards that you had piled in the main room for so long?”

Bard chuckled. “It’s been all over the house – in the ballroom, the main room, our bedroom, and the garret. I figured it was about time to make it into something useful, or pitch it out for firewood.”

“Not firewood, Da. The carving’s beautiful,” Sigrid protested, running a hand over one of the carved posts. “What’s the rest of it? Some kind of canopy?”

“I think they’re panels rather than a canopy over the top. It’s a lot of bits and bobs, but the wood all looks the same, so I think it all goes together somehow.”

“Can I help you figure it out?” Sigrid asked. “I’ll change my clothes and be back.”

“All contributions kindly accepted,” Bard smiled, so Sigrid ran into the house to change out of her khaki pants and bistro tee. When she reappeared in shorts and casual tee, Tilda was with her.

“Hi, Da!” the little girl said, following after her sister. “Sigrid said you were doing a puzzle out here.”

“That’s just what it is,” Bard agreed.

“Yeah, Til; it’s a furniture puzzle,” Sigrid pointed to the bits and pieces beside the assembled frame, then the lower section Bard had already assembled. “Somehow, all of this goes on top of that.”

“Ooh, like a hat!” Tilda exclaimed.

“I guess it is like a hat,” Bard agreed, laughing at his daughter’s whimsy. The three of them laid out each piece where they thought it would go, laughing when they had pieces left over here and not enough pieces over there. Legolas and Bain appeared in the midst of the sorting, home from gadding about with Kúllian and Derry all afternoon, and Bard explained all over again about the bits and bobs that had languished in the junk shop for years until Bard asked about them.

“So what does the top look like?” Legolas considered the four collections of pieces.

Bard held up his hands and shrugged. “No idea. Flat panels, I think. But the whole thing’s odd, because the shop owner said it was a daybed, and it’s clearly not. A daybed is the size of the fainting couch in the solarium. This is twice as wide.”

Bain stooped between two of the collections, looking back and forth between them. “Huh. Weird.”

“What’s weird, boyo?” Bard asked.

“It’s... huh. I wonder...” The boy got up to consider the frame that Bard had put together, walking all the way around it. “Yeah, this is the same way. Look, Da. Say this part’s the head of the bed, and that’s the foot, and those are the sides, yeah? The head and the foot are the same. And the two sides are the same. But the head and foot are different from the sides. See how this bit’s got a single groove around the carved part, and the other one’s got a double groove? I think the shop owner sold you the leftover bits of two different daybeds.”

Bard peered closely at the carved pieces that Bain had noticed. “You’re right, Bain. That’s it, of course! It’s just the long pieces of two daybeds.”

“So the guy sold you a lot of scraps of carved lumber,” Bain grimaced. “I don’t think so,” Bard shook his head. “Think about small history, and I bet you can sort out why I think that.”

Bain’s eyebrows went up as he and his siblings gave the bits and bobs another look.

“If it were just bits and bobs of two daybeds, you wouldn’t have gotten the pieces to go together, Da,” Sigrid ventured.

“Bard is very good with tools, though,” Legolas mused, frowning at the frame. “Maybe he pieced the four pieces to go together like that?”

“Did you, Da?” Tilda asked.

“Take a look,” Bard invited. “See if you can figure out if I did or not.”

The children looked at the fittings. “No, all the notches to let the pieces fit together are old, so you didn’t cut them,” Bain said.

“There’s sawdust over here, though,” Tilda added, pointing to the dusting of wood crumbs by the jigsaw. “So you cut something, Da.”

“I had to make a missing piece,” Bard said, pointing to the small curled piece on the head of the frame.

“Oh,” Tilda nodded. “So that’s why there isn’t very much sawdust. So I agree with Bain. You didn’t cut anything other than that little piece.”

“The metal bits that hold the frame together are old, too,” Sigrid agreed. “And the screws holding them in are all old, and haven’t been touched for however long.”

“So... the pieces came like this.” Bain looked at Bard. “So... somebody had two old broken daybeds and made one big bed out of them?”

Grinning, he went around to ruffle each of the children’s hair. “Good eyes, everyone. I agree, it looks like someone made one bed-sized frame out of two daybed frames. They used only the long pieces of the two, and that’s why it’s square. Small history comes through.”

“Yeah!” Bain crowed. “So all we have to do now is sort out which parts of the top go with each part of the bottom, and that’s that.”

“I’m not so sure it’s that simple,” Sigrid said. “It doesn’t seem to be the same on each side.”

“Do we know that the tops even go with the bottoms?” Legolas asked, holding up two pieces.

“I think they do,” Tilda said. “Or some of them do, anyway. See how that part of the bottom has that little leaf in it? That same leaf is in this part of the top.”
The children and Bard took Tilda’s leaves as a fresh start to mull over the collections of pieces. But even then, there didn’t seem to be enough pieces to go around.

“This makes no sense,” Bain frowned at the collection. “There’s this one long bit, and then there are these bits that should match it but don’t, and then there are these other things that should match but don’t.”

“Oh! I think I’ve got it,” Bard said. “That long bit, that’s the fanciest bit, isn’t it? It matches the foot, so let’s say that’s the top to that side. It’s the part you’d see the most, right? So if we take that part and put it aside, we’ve got those two bits that match, and these other two bits that match. Those make up the two sides.”

“That can’t be right, can it?” Tilda said doubtfully. “That would make one side one way, and the other side a different way.”

“If you put one of each kind on each side, you’d have two that matched,” Bard offered.

“But that doesn’t leave anything but this long, plain bit for the header, Da,” Sigrid protested.

Bard nodded. “You’re right, sweetness. So maybe the person who built this figured that since the head would go against a wall, it didn’t need any fancy bits.”

“Yeah, Da, look!” Bain and Legolas had pieced together two of the piles. “See, these two bits match the long fancy bit, so they go on the sides near the foot. The other two bits don’t match the foot, so they go on the sides near the head.”

“So that means the person had the two long pieces of the tops to one day bed, but only one to the other, and just made do,” Legolas guessed.

“There are these leaf parts left over,” Tilda held up two small panels, each carved with graceful tendrils. “Maybe the person put those on the plain board at the head to dress it up a little.”

“The perfect touch,” Sigrid smiled at her sister. “And that means we’ve accounted for all the bits.”

“Aha, I know we’re right!” Bain chortled. “Look, Da – that screw hole lines up with this bit that goes at the head. So that makes one whole side, which means the other one has to go the same way. We figured it out!”

“You did,” Bard complimented his son. “You’re all going to be on that show about history detectives or something.”

“Or the one about the workshop,” Tilda prompted. “The one with the guy who fixes up all the old stuff.”

“That one, too.”

“So can we put it together now that we know where everything goes?” Bain pressed.

“If I have the right size wood screws,” Bard said. “And we’ll have to carry everything upstairs first. It’s no good to put it together out here, when it has to go upstairs in the house.”

“Oh... right,” Bain agreed sheepishly.

“But we can put the side panels together out here first, then carry them upstairs,” Bard amended.

“Okay, good – I know where the cans are,” Bain jumped up. “Come on, Legs – you can help me carry them."

“I can help, too,” Tilda scampered after them.

“You bring the screwdrivers, little doll. You know where those are.”

“Okay, Da!”

Bain and Legolas carted the big cans of miscellaneous screws from the tool bench, and Tilda brought the bucket of screwdrivers. Bard soon had four children busily fitting screws here and there until they found the right sizes, then they assembled the two sides. While the children carted the panels into the house, Bard disassembled the base so that it could be carted upstairs. Then the mattresses had to be hauled off Thran’s bedframe, and the bedframe itself dissembled. Only then could the children reassemble the bits and bobs of the bottom frame with its mended posts. Bard and Legolas held up the top panels while Tilda doled out screws for Sigrid and Bain to fasten the panels into the posts. When the plain board at the top of the head was in place, Tilda tugged on Bard’s tee.

“Let me do the little leaves,” she begged. “I can do the screwdriver for those because they’re small.”

Bard hoisted Tilda up to sit on his shoulders. “Go for it, little doll. Legolas, you hold the leaf bit in the right space.”

“Oh, you know what I mean,” Bain protested. “The one you just took apart.”

“I think so,” Tilda nodded. “Screwdriver, please.”

Sigrid found the right screws, Legolas held the wood so Tilda could fasten it into place, then Bain held the second bit for Tilda to fasten. All of the children helped Bard get the mattresses and bed linens back into place, then stood back to admire their handiwork.

“Wow, it looks amazing,” was Sigrid’s opinion. “Are you going to paint it, Da?”

Bard shook his head. “I’ll rub a little silver gilt over some of it, maybe. But I like the grey wood just like it is.”

“What’re you going to do with the old bedframe?” Bain asked.

Laughing, Bard gave a gentle tug on Bain’s hair before he pointed to the bed. “That is the old bedframe, boyo. By about a hundred years.”

“Okay, Kukla, let me figure out which one goes where...” Legolas turned the two pieces this way and that. “Hmm... this way, I think?”

“I think so,” Tilda nodded. “Screwdriver, please.”

Sigrid found the right screws, Legolas held the wood so Tilda could fasten it into place, then Bain held the second bit for Tilda to fasten. All of the children helped Bard get the mattresses and bed linens back into place, then stood back to admire their handiwork.

“Wow, it looks amazing,” was Sigrid’s opinion. “Are you going to paint it, Da?”

Bard shook his head. “I’ll rub a little silver gilt over some of it, maybe. But I like the grey wood just like it is.”

“Okay, Kukla, let me figure out which one goes where...” Legolas turned the two pieces this way and that. “Hmm... this way, I think?”

“I think so,” Tilda nodded. “Screwdriver, please.”

Sigrid found the right screws, Legolas held the wood so Tilda could fasten it into place, then Bain held the second bit for Tilda to fasten. All of the children helped Bard get the mattresses and bed linens back into place, then stood back to admire their handiwork.

“Wow, it looks amazing,” was Sigrid’s opinion. “Are you going to paint it, Da?”

Bard shook his head. “I’ll rub a little silver gilt over some of it, maybe. But I like the grey wood just like it is.”

“What’re you going to do with the old bedframe?” Bain asked.

Laughing, Bard gave a gentle tug on Bain’s hair before he pointed to the bed. “That is the old bedframe, boyo. By about a hundred years.”

“Oh, you know what I mean,” Bain protested. “The one you just took apart.”

“I’ll put it up in the garret for now,” Bard decided. “Last chore of the day, then we’ll start supper.”

“Can I have it?” Bain persisted.

“It’s too big for your mattress, and besides, it’s Thran’s. He’ll decide what he wants to do with it, once he gets a minute to think about anything.”

“That won’t happen for another month,” Sigrid observed tartly, as the children ferried the pieces of bedframe up to the third level. “Immortal’s all that’s on his plate until July sixteenth. Or really, July twenty-third, because there are three performances – the sixteenth, the twentieth, and the twenty-third.”

Legolas sighed. “I’ll be glad when all of them are over. Papa’s never worked so hard before. He’s so
“He is,” Bard agreed. “And you’re right that he’s never worked so hard before, Legs. This is the first time he’s created a ballet, managed a ballet, and danced a ballet, all at the same time.”

“A hard ballet,” Sigrid shook her head, but before she could say more, Bard gave her a look. Legolas was already concerned about his father, and Sigrid voicing her disapproval of the pointe dancing wouldn’t help.

“A hard ballet,” Bard echoed. “But we’re in the home stretch – just four more weeks. We’ll keep doing everything we’re doing to help make things at home as easy for Thran as possible. Once the premieres are over, he can relax a bit, and he’ll be with us more. So, what sounds good for supper?”

The children helped maneuver Thran’s bedframe up the narrow servants’ staircase and into the garret room while they considered what to make for the evening meal. They settled on hamburgers, beans, and salad; summer was only a handful of days away, so it seemed an appropriate menu to herald the start of the cookout season. The children bustled to get the table set, the salad ready, the ground meat shaped into patties, and the beans properly seasoned and set on the stove to simmer. Tilda proudly sat at the kitchen island to slice the buns in half and arrange them on a cookie sheet to toast under the broiler. Legolas presided at the grill tonight, but he bolted from his station when his father appeared through the mudroom door.

“Papa!” the blond youth exclaimed in surprise. “You’re home early! You’re just in time for supper!”

Amid the children’s welcomes, Bard gave his husband a quick once-over. Good, he didn’t look so tired, and his smile was wide and unforced. He returned Legolas’s hug with equal fervor, returned Bain’s fist bump, pecked at Sigrid’s cheek when she kissed his, and returned Tilda’s salute with the bread knife with a grin and a wave. Once the happy clamor died, Bard was free to give Thran a quick hug and a kiss.

“What a nice treat,” he grinned. “Everything went well with the flying lesson today?”

Thran rolled his eyes. “Oy, I have a story for you all about that. But first, I will change my clothes. I am eager to let the dancer go for a few hours and be part of Clan Ffyrnig again.”

“Go,” Bard urged him towards the hall. “I have chicken if you’d rather –”

“A hamburger is perfect, lyubov moy,” Thran assured him. “I will be quick.”

He disappeared down the hall, but at the end, he turned to give Bard a glad smile. Smiling in return, Bard turned back to the children. “Okay, let’s set a place for Thran, and get another plate and glass out. Make it so, troops.”

“Aye, Cap’n!”

The mood, already happy, grew more so because Clan Ffyrnig would be at full strength for the evening mess. By the time Thran reappeared in shorts and tee, everything was in place, but the tall dancer was not focused on food yet.

“What is this beautiful thing that has appeared in the bedroom, Bard?” Thran said as soon as he crossed into the kitchen. “It is beyond words!”

“It’s a bed!” Tilda shouted with a proud smile. “We all helped Da with it. It was a puzzle, but all of us figured out a little piece here and there until we got it to go together. Bain figured out most of it.”
“Did you? You have a story to tell, too, then,” Thran replied, smiling in surprise. “I am eager to hear it.”

“Everything’s ready,” Bard announced, fishing the cookie sheet of buns from under the broiler. “Queue up, you lot. Let’s fill our plates, then we can tell our stories while we eat.”

The children excitedly lined up to get their buns, then Legolas doled out the patties from the grill. Lots of hands stretched across the kitchen island to spoon up beans and salad, and to dress sandwiches with condiments. Once everyone was seated, the children regaled Thran with how they sorted out the bedframe, which gave Thran time to eat without having to do more than smile and nod.

“You are all the great detectives!” Thran declared. “It was not an easy puzzle, but it was still no match for the four of you. Clan Ffyrnig is very persistent.”

“The part I liked is how we all figured out a piece of the puzzle,” Tilda told Thran. “Even I did – the leaf parts.”

“It was fun,” Legolas smiled at Tilda. “I liked using the tools.”

“Be very careful when you say that,” Thran teased his son, with a wink at Bard. “Our Bard will put you to work.”

“I’d like to learn how to do a few things,” Legolas shrugged. “One day I may need to know.”

“Good lad,” Bard nodded. “Everybody needs to know how to use a hammer and a screwdriver and a saw.”

“The saw I know how to use,” Thran agreed. “And the screwdriver. Not so much the hammer. But it cannot be but so hard, yes? Place the nail, then hit the nail.”

“As long as you hit the metal nail instead of your fingernail, you’re good,” Bard returned, which got a laugh from the children. “Now that you’ve heard our day’s excitement, tell us yours. How was the flying lesson? What happened about the cape?”

“The flying lesson was perfection,” Thran said, spreading his hands wide. Then he let them fall to his side like lead weights. “The cape, though – that was a most dismal failure.”

“Uh-oh,” Bain said.

“What happened, Papa?”

“Are you all right?” Sigrid asked, frowning in worry.

“Oh, no, Ada! What happened with the cape?” Tilda pressed.

“I am fine, but the cape is no more. Wait until you hear what happened to it, Kukla. I put on the cape, I climb atop the tower, I fling myself into the sky as I have been taught, but do I fly? No. Not more than a few feet do I go. The cape catches on some bit of the tower, and there I am caught, because the cape does not give way, and it holds me to the tower. Tink must climb up the tower with scissors to cut the cape free, then Half Ton and Robbie let me down, and then they unhook me from the wire. I take off the cape, I give it back to Rada, and then I tell Irmo that karma has spoken, and there will be no more capes. Edna Mode is right, yes? No capes!”

“Did Irmo buy it, or did he pitch a fit?” Sigrid asked with a cynical smirk.
“Our Rada came well prepared to spare us the fit,” Thran gave her a knowing look. “He does not like capes, I do not like capes, the riggers do not like capes, only Irmo likes such foolish things. But as soon as the cape is gone, Rada produces blue and silver streamers like tongues of cold, icy flames to attach to the arms and legs of Death’s armor, streamers that attach with Velcro, so that if any get caught, they pull free without trouble. It is much easier for Death to dance with the streamers than the cape, and He looks twice as compelling. Irmo forgets about the cape because now he adores the streamers, Rada looks like the genius he is, and the humble dancer is grateful not to lug such a monstrosity around the stage for all of Act I. A win-win-win, yes?”

“That’s a relief,” Bard exhaled. “I’m glad that all worked out in practice, and not during the performance.”

“Yeah, that’d be pretty embarrassing,” Bain snickered. “Death tries to make His big entrance, and instead he gets stuck on His cape.”

“To be sure,” Thran grimaced. “Oh, before I forget, I passed on your good wishes to Rada and little Sebastian, and he was very happy to hear them. He tells me to tell you that Sebastian is very well, and misses so many admirers so quick to offer him snacks.”

The conversation passed on to other things, and once everyone had enough to eat, they chipped in to clean up the kitchen. The children passed around the book for another chapter of Harry Potter – they were through the second book and on to the third now – while they sipped their tea and munched cookies. At length, the children dispersed for showers, video games, and conversations with boyfriends, leaving Thran and Bard alone in the sitting room.

“What’s the rest of the story about the cape, angel?” Bard asked lowly. “Were you hurt?”

“My back was not happy at the sudden jerk when the cape caught,” Thran admitted. “But Robbie and Half Ton caught me quickly, and I was able to free the cape from around my neck immediately because of the Velcro. So then it caught on my wire, not me, and only for a few seconds until Tink cut the cape free. I was in no danger.”

Bard slipped an arm around Thran’s shoulders. “I worried that the reason you were home early was because you got hurt.”

“I... could have been hurt, I think, if Robbie, Half Ton, and Tink had not been so careful, if I had not freed the cape from my neck,” Thran allowed. “But I am all right.”

“Everything went okay this morning?”

Thran filled him in on what he, Lettie, and Abebe had told the company, and about the additional dancer who would no longer be part of the company. While Thran’s words were somber, he sounded pleased that most of the dancers had been positive. The results of Ori’s sleuthing were just as big of a relief.

“Thank the gods for Ori,” was Bard’s heartfelt pronouncement. “He’s earned his keep twice over today.”

“He most certainly has,” Thran agreed. His sigh was deep and profound. “So have you, lyubov moya. Such a confection I find in our bedroom! It is twice as beautiful as I thought it would be. And the children were so smart to figure out so much about how to put it together. I am sure you had nothing to do with that, not at all.”

Bard chuckled as he stroked Thran’s arm slowly. “I wished you could have seen them, angel. Sigrid and Tilda were great to start it off, and when the lads came home, all it took was a side mention about small history, and all four of them were off. They worked together so well. I was quite proud of them. They put most of it together, too.”

“Of course they did. You did not hand them the right screws and the right tools and hold the tall parts for them, I am sure.”

“Maybe a little,” Bard allowed.

Thran hummed. “Yes, maybe a little. I cannot wait to crawl into such an elegant bed tonight.”

“It’ll feel just like your bed. Same mattress and sheets.”

“Tcha,” Thran scoffed, but gently. “I do not speak of mattress and sheets, silly saint. I speak of ambience. My old bedframe was very elegant, but when compared to this one, it was cold and stark. Its replacement is exotic and sensual, and I am sure a magical djinni will appear as soon as I touch the pillows.”

“You have to watch those magical djinnis,” Bard cautioned with a crooked smile. “They’re capricious creatures, as liable to deliver mischief as blessing.”

Long, pale fingers traced a light touch across Bard’s thigh. “I hope so.”

That roused a hum from Bard. Lately, Thran had been so tired when he got home that Bard had constrained himself to backrubs and massages to help Thran get to sleep. Would tonight be different?

As if in answer, Thran’s lips nibbled on a lock of Bard’s hair, drawing Bard to close his eyes to better enjoy the soft touches. He hummed again in enjoyment. “I... think I’d better get a shower.”

“I hope not a cold one,” Thran murmured in reply. “Rounds first?”

“Rounds first,” Bard nodded, swallowing. “Come on.”

They circled the house as they usually did, then drew each other upstairs. They saw the children into bed, then closed themselves into their bedroom. The tall bedframe fit the space well, and the soft grey color of the wood made the piece seem airier than a darker color would have. It contrasted well with the moody blue-grey walls, and the grey silk sheets beckoned to them both.

“It looks wonderful even without bed hangings,” Thran offered, smiling.

“It does. The bed hangings will be better for winter, anyway,” Bard agreed. “For now, it looks fine.”

“Into the shower with us,” Thran urged Bard.

“Right after you,” Bard agreed as he peeled off his tee.

Despite how good it was to wash off the day’s sweat, Bard didn’t linger under the warm water. He finished first, gave his hair a perfunctory drying, and turned the hair dryer over to Thran before he retreated to the bedroom. He didn’t wait for Thran before he climbed into bed, savoring the exotic carved panels and the luxurious sense of being in a secret cocoon. Smiling, he plumped the pillows, and thought about what kind of djinni awaited the arrival of an angel.
Chapter Summary

After an angel and a djinni engage in detente, Clan Ffyrnig goes about its Saturday rounds. Is a celebration in the works?

The angel came out of the bath and into his chamber with great anticipation. Even within these exalted halls of the Heavenly host, the exotic bed that had been bestowed upon him was palace as well as sanctuary, made of beautifully carved of wood that had weathered to a soft grey. It spoke eloquently of the earthly green and growing things the angel loved – vines lush with flowers and leaves wound across the intricately carved panels at the base, up and around the four posts, and across matching panels that crowned the posts. But the lovely carving was not the only delight that awaited him. Within this sanctuary were soft, downy pillows and a thick, plush mattress, all dressed in silk linens of silvery grey that matched the luscious color of the wood. A thousand mortal rajahs could not savor a more sumptuous delight –

What was this? Did the bed already host a rajah?

The dark creature lounging among the pillows was no mortal rajah. He was beautiful, for all he was a creature from the depths of Hell – no surprise, for had not the denizens of Hell once been angels themselves? Dark, tousled hair fell into his brown eyes, but didn’t disguise the small horns at his brow. Equally dark tufts kissed his skin above upper lip, under lower lip, and on the chin. Powerful, muscular body, and an equally muscular and substantial cock at rest against the creature’s thigh – for of course he was naked; such creatures were inured to Hell’s extremes, and had no use for clothing.

He did not have cloven feet, or a long leathery tail tipped with an arrowhead. No devil, then, but something much more desirable.

The angel furled his wings and sat on the side of the bed. “So this magnificent bed is home to a djinni.”

The djinni’s smile was impish. “A bed’s a much better place for a djinni than a lamp, I assure you.”

The angel hummed, as much to agree with the djinni as to admire him. “I well imagine. Much more room to... recline.”

The djinni grinned, not at all abashed at the intent look that the angel bestowed upon him. “Among other things.”

“And who has seen fit to bestow such a beautiful gift upon me?”

The djinni grinned again. “Ah, I grant you, it’s not often an angel from Heaven receives a gift from the Lord of Hell, but every now and again, the cosmos aligns just so. That incident with the dragon last month...”

“Ah, the dragon,” the angel nodded sagely. “She was a very small dragon.”
“Young, last of her kind, really more of a pet than anything else, and it was kind of you not to run her through like that mad Saint George. My Lord appreciated your forbearance.”

“She seemed more frightened than frightening,” the angel shrugged. “Lost, perhaps? An engaging creature, if I am honest. It seemed more merciful to return her alive than dead.”

“An angel of mercy to all creatures. Imagine that.”

Smiling, the angel shrugged modestly. “I hope she is well and out of harm’s way?”

“She is,” the djinni nodded. “So to finish the tale, my people talked to your people, and the powers that be decided that Rahmiel, angel of mercy to all earthly creatures, as well as those above and below the earth, deserved a token of thanks. So here I am.”

“I see,” the angel interlaced his fingers around his knee. “I fear you have the advantage of me. You know my name, but I do not know yours.”

“Oh, you know what they say about a djinni and his name,” the angel’s visitor winked at him. “‘If ye seek dominion o’er the fiercest djinni, dinnae speak his name, for in the speaking, so shall the djinni rule ye.’ I’ll spare you that, so djinni must suffice.”

“Most merciful of you, then,” the angel agreed. “Djinni it is.”

“Now, as to the particulars of the token bestowed upon you, it’s the usual contract – three wishes, et cetera and so forth.”

“I make three wishes, and you grant them to me?”

“The usual caveats that apply to mortals apply to you, too, of course – you can’t ask for world peace, or for large pieces of the earth to fall into the ocean. And we’ve had to add a new exclusion about fictional worlds becoming reality – Star Trek, Hogwarts, and X-Men are right out. And be very careful about how you make each wish. I had one incredibly bratty princess ask me to reduce her weight by fifty pounds, and she was such a pain that I removed her arms and legs and turned her into a very large steamed bun. But I’ll go easy on you, since you did spare the dragon.”

“You are merciful, indeed,” the angel nodded gravely. “I will choose wisely. May I ask a question before I make my three wishes?”

“Of course,” the djinni nodded. “I don’t guarantee I’ll answer it, though. I can’t tell you a thing about my Lord and Master, of course.”

“I would not presume to ask such an impertinent question,” the angel assured the djinni. “I must confess my curiosity about this beautiful bed, though.”

“Why didn’t I get stuck in a lamp?”

Then angel nodded.

The djinni’s smile was sly as he reclined against the pillows. “I would think the answer to that would be obvious. Then again, maybe not. I’m not usually bestowed upon Heavenly angels.”

“I am not always particularly angelic.”

The djinni’s gaze flickered over the angel’s pale body. “Just as I am not always particularly demonic. You know the Taoists’ yin-yang?”
“Both halves have something of the other.”

“Exactly. We’re no different.”

The angel smiled in anticipation. “Then I am ready to make my first wish.”

The djinni held out his hands, beckoning to the angel. “Your wish is my command.”

Then angel eased beside the djinni. With one long, slender hand, he stroked the djinni’s cheek. When the djinni countered with a growl of arousal, the angel smiled most slyly.

“I wish you to kiss me.”

The djinni rose from the pillows to enfold the angel in his arms, and bestow touches both gentle and assured. As lips nibbled and nipped at his, hands stroked over his body, magically knowing exactly how to elicit the deepest pleasure possible with mere fingers. Those fingers insinuated themselves through his hair, over his clavicle and chest, down between his pectorals, across his ribs. Such soft touches coaxed him to return those touches with his own, and so he gave in to his desire to stroke the djinni’s wonderful body. He found sensitive nipples that craved his lips, and a hollow at the base of the djinni’s throat that was the perfect niche for kisses, and uncounted more secret spots that responded eagerly to his touches.

The djinni was more than generous, bestowing not a single kiss but a thousand, each one replete with passion, desire, and want. Sadly, no matter how completely the angel savored each one to its last essence, he could not prolong them to the end of time as he desired. When the djinni drew away, though he looked fondly at the angel, his tender look was not enough to assuage the angel’s loss.

“You are generous, angel. You wish for a kiss, yet you give me a thousand.”

“I would give you a thousand more if I could.”

The djinni stroked the angel’s hair with tender fingers. “I have never been so rewarded.”

“Why would I not match your generosity with my own? You light such a desire in me. Please, I wish you to make love to me.”

“That is your second wish?”

“It is,” the angel nodded.

The djinni eased the angel onto his back carefully, so as not to hurt his wings, and lavished kisses on him until he was all but delirious. As before, he met each kiss with his own; this time, however, he so inflamed his partner that the djinni’s cock plunged inside him without effort. Such a sweet joining it was, delicately done, yet plumbing so deep that the angel cried out at the intense pleasure. He curled his legs around the powerful thighs and glutes of the one who impaled him, keeping him close. It was impossible not to fill his hands with the thick unruly hair that made the djinni’s dark corona, or kiss the soft lips that hovered so close to his. What a delight it was to trace his hands over the djinni’s muscled back, then to massage the glutes that drove the meaty cock so far into him.

“So good, so good,” he moaned, his breath stuttering past his control.

The djinni sat back on his heels, still stroking the angel, but now he engulfed the angel’s aching cock in his hand. Just when the angel thought his pleasure couldn’t rise any higher, the djinni stroked him inside and out in rhythm until the angel was nearly past thought. But no matter how his pleasure soared, all consuming and delirious, how cruel would it be to neglect the one who gave him such pleasure? He groped for the djinni’s delicious torso, found his nipples, and stroked him in rhythm with his pleasure, until they were joined in passion as well as body. When his climax crashed over him, the djinni’s erupted in the same heartbeat. He pulled the djinni’s straining body to his, and cradled it until they both were spent. Even afterwards, he drew the djinni to rest against his chest, stroking and caressing his back.

“You are doubly generous,” the djinni said at last, raising his head to smile at the angel. “I hope I have pleased you as well as you have pleased me.”

“You have, sweet djinni. So much so that I know what my third wish must be.”

“Name it, and I will make it so.”

“I wish you to be free. You may go wherever you wish, but I offer you my home, and myself. Let us spend our existence together. I want to cherish and worship you every night, as well as you have cherished and worshipped me tonight.”

The djinni stilled. “You would free me from my servitude?”

The angel laughed. “Servitude to whoever your Lord bids you please in this bed, yes. The chance to savor more delight with me in this bed, no. Though perhaps it would be servitude for a djinni to abide with an angel.”

Chuckling, the djinni rolled over on his side, and drew the angel to rest his head against the djinni’s shoulder. “No more than it would be for an angel to abide with a djinni. I imagine it might provoke consternation in both our realms, though.”

“All opposites require some small oasis of détente between them, of your yin-yang. Let us be that oasis.”

The djinni kissed the angel, then waved a hand in an arcane gesture. “So let it be written, so let it be done.”

A faint puff of orange smoke tinged the air, and consternation rumbled from Hell to Heaven and back again... still, neither realm saw fit to do more than rumble. Perhaps they embodied more wisdom than was generally thought, even among their own kind. But whether they did or not, the angel lay back in the beautiful bed, nestled in the arms of the djinni.

Both were well pleased.

* * *

Saturday morning – such a flurry of action, even for a bright summer morning! Sigrid bicycled off to the bistro, Legolas and Thran rose early to have breakfast before Legolas’s fencing class, and Bard made muffins for the dancers who would soon descend on the ballroom. When the muffins were done, Bard tinkered in the barn with his aluminum spheres, checking the three kinds of epoxy he’d used to adhere a few of the smallest spheres to an aluminum rod. Yes, the first was definitely too yellow, and the second was stickier than he wanted, so the third was the one he’d use. The mechanism that would power the slow rotation was complete, and a seemingly infinite supply of aluminum spheres in four sizes waited on his workbench in their boxes. He loved the anodized colors reminiscent of nineteen-fifties retro science fiction – cool blues and silvers dominated the palette, punctuated with vibrant yellows and cranberry reds. A few ebony blacks, yellow greens, and forest greens also stood ready to punctuate the vast array of stars that made up any galaxy. Now that he had settled on the glue that would hold the smallest spheres in place, he’d start on the aluminum armature that would make up the center and the radial arms of the piece, and once he had that done, he’d weld the largest spheres in place.

He grinned. Thran and his romanticized image of welding, imagining Bard as a bare- and broad-chested hunky blacksmith, wielding hammer and tongs and acetylene torches without any concern for flying bits of molten metal or sparks... His angel would be so disappointed when he finally saw the truth behind his lustful imaginings.

Bard grinned again. Last night’s enthralling revelry between an angel and a djinni proved that revealing the truth about welding wouldn’t deter their sex lives. Bard’s welding jacket and helmet might not be the sexiest of garments, but Bard would spin a tale about what was underneath, and Thran would fling himself into the fantasy without hesitation. The result would delight them both.

It was almost time for Bard to pick up Legolas from fencing, so he closed the barn bay and returned to the house. Tilda and Bain were up, munching muffins.

“Morning, children,” Bard greeted them. “I’m off to pick up Legolas in a few minutes. Do either of you want to come along? I thought I’d stop at a couple of the junk shops on the way home.”

“Would you stop at the one where you got Sigrid’s bike?” Bain asked. “Legolas and I were talking about maybe we could each get one, and then biking back and forth to see Derry and Kíllian would be faster than walking.”

“I can do that,” Bard agreed. “That’s a good idea. How about you, Til? Would you like a bicycle, too?”

“Ooh, yes, please!” the little girl nodded at once. “Elanor has one, so it’d be fun if we could bike together. She said there’s a bike trail that goes all over the village. There’s even a shop that rents bikes to visitors. It’d be fun to go all the way around the whole village.”

“One of the summer festival events is a bike race that does just that,” Bain mumbled through a mouthful of muffin. “Derry told me about it. He helps his parents run it – it’s a fundraiser for the next year’s festival. It’s just one race, but there are a whole bunch of different classes. Some are by age; there’s a team class that Derry says a lot of families do together, and a best-decorated bike competition. It’s the Friday near the end of the week.”

“The village goes all out for this festival,” Bard commented.

Bain nodded and swallowed his huge mouthful of muffin. “Derry said the bike race always needs helpers, so I thought I’d like to be one.”

“Remember you’ve got summer camp starting in a bit.”

“It’s cool, Da. Camps don’t run during that week because of all the stuff going on in the school for the festival.” He grinned toothily. “Such as a certain ballet you might’ve heard of.”

“I might have,” Bard chuckled, ruffling Bain’s hair. “I’d forgotten about camps not running during the festival. It’s great that you want to help with the bicycle race. Okay, you two, finish your breakfast, and brush your teeth. The bus into town leaves in ten minutes.”

“Okay, Da!” The children grabbed the last of their muffins, downed their milk or juice, and ran upstairs. Bard had just time to duck into the ballroom to tell Thran that he was off to fetch Legolas before the children were ready, then they piled into Bard’s truck and headed down the lane for the Gondors’ fencing studio.

Legolas was all for looking for bicycles with his siblings, so Bard headed to that shop first. No sense in looking for big stuff elsewhere if he had to ferry a truck bed full of used bicycles home. Not that he minded – this was the shop where he’d gotten the beautiful bed that now resided in his house, as well as the family’s flatware, so there was no telling what they’d find.

The children headed directly for the back of the shop where the bicycles were, but Bard didn’t follow them right away. The bins of sterling flatware were still full, so he picked out another two-dozen place settings, and yet another dozen teaspoons. Six people went through knives, forks, and spoons – always spoons – faster than lightning. They needed more glasses, too, so Bard sorted out another dozen glasses – etched crystal, and far too beautiful to be banished to a junk shop. But as he’d learned when he’d tried to sell his mother’s pieces, few people wanted such things now, and the market was so flooded with them that ten dollars bought enough to fill a cabinet.

The owner gave him a couple of liquor boxes still sporting their cardboard dividers, so Bard packed them with glasses and flatware, and carried them to out the back to find the children.

“Any luck?” Bard called when he spotted the three children by the racks of bicycles.

The children waved him over. “There’s a nice one for Tilda,” Bain pointed. “There’s just one thing she doesn’t like about it.”

“It’s pink,” Tilda wrinkled her nose.

“It’s not a very nice pink, either,” Legolas agreed. “Sort of like that stuff you take for earaches.”

“Yeah,” Tilda snorted, sounding very Bainish. “Like I want a bike that looks like nasty bubble gum-flavored medicine.”

The children were right. It had a lot of features that an all-terrain bicycle would have, but Bard couldn’t imagine that any child who liked rigorous terrain would like that color – no, that wasn’t fair. Honestly, he couldn’t imagine that any child, period, would like that color.

“It’s a terrible color,” Bard agreed. “But aside from that, is it a good bicycle?”

“I think so,” Bain said. “The brakes are good, it’s sturdy, it’s not too small, it’ll still fit when Til gets taller... it’s just that gods-awful color.”

When Bard checked over the bicycle, he found that his son had assessed it well. “We can paint it easily enough, little doll. I’ve still got some of that Majorelle blue that I used on the garden benches, or you can choose any color you want.”

“That blue is good,” Tilda nodded. “Or maybe purple!”

“Okay, let’s put that one aside. What about you, lads? Any possibilities?”

“We’d just started to look,” Legolas explained. “We wanted to make sure the one for Kukla was okay first.”

“I thank you,” Bard nodded. “Carry on, then, Lieutenants.”

“Aye, Captain,” Legolas gave him a smile, and he and Bain returned to their perusal of the bicycles. The selection was much greater today than when he’d visited with Sigrid, mute evidence that more than a few village families had cleared out their garages and sheds during the year’s spring cleaning.

Despite the successful solution to the ugly pink bicycle paint, Tilda turned a pouty face towards her father.

“How come they’re Lieutenants now, and I’m still an Ensign?”

“They’re older than you, that’s all.”

“When will I be old enough?” Tilda persisted.

“Oh, I should think that when you’re twelve, you’d be old enough. Maybe a little before, if you’re extra responsible.”

“That’s a whole year.”

“Some things take time,” Bard nodded. “But you’ll get there, and when you do, I have no doubt that you’ll make a good Lieutenant.”

Tilda’s sunny disposition didn’t let her remain downcast for long, so she acquiesced with a smile, and went to help her brothers scan the racks.

At length, both Legolas and Bain found sturdy bicycles, and they soon were out in the parking lot to load their choices into Bard’s truck.

“Did you know that bikes were originally called velocipedes in England, Kukla?” Legolas asked.

“Really?” Tilda looked up at Legolas with interest. “It sounds like velociraptor.”

“They both mean fast, don’t they? When I was in boarding school, I heard a boy from England say it. It was such an interesting word that I asked him about it, and we became good friends. He was the one who taught me about bangers and mash.”

“Mmm, bangers and mash,” Bain hummed. “Can we have that for supper, Da? Or maybe lunch?”

“I don’t know – can you?” Bard teased gently as they got into the truck. Once the children were in, he loaded the boxes of silver and glasses onto the front passenger seat.

“May we?” Bain rephrased hastily, rolling his eyes at Legolas, who grinned.

“Maybe we’ll grill bangers tomorrow,” Bard replied. “Tonight’s Cajun catfish with cornbread, plus the usual veg and fruit.”

“Ooh, cocktail sauce,” Tilda hummed. “I can make that, Da.”

“You can?” Legolas gave Tilda a curious look. “Is it hard?”

She shook her head. “You just mix ketchup and horseradish in a bowl. Just like you mix mayonnaise and pickle relish for tartar sauce.”

“I never knew that,” Legolas admitted. He put his hands to his head and probed carefully. “Uh-oh. I must be growing up. I just learned two new things outside of school, and it didn’t hurt.”

That got a laugh out of everyone in the truck as they headed home.

After lunch, Bard showed Tilda how to sand the ugly pink paint on her bicycle, then he taped off the unpainted bits and let Tilda dab Majorelle blue over the frame. Her hand, while not as steady as Bard’s, was still good enough to keep stray daubs and drips from staining the rest of the bicycle. It would need another coat tomorrow, but Tilda was excited that it would be ready to ride shortly thereafter. Bain and Legolas didn’t have to wait, so they rode off to see their mates with promises to be home in time for supper.

Bard’s mobile chimed. The caller ID brought a smile to his face. “Hello, Rosie! How are you?”

“We’re all fine, Bard! How’re you?”

“There’s always something in play around here,” he grinned. “Dancers galore today. I just got back from the junk shops with some bicycles for Legolas, Bain, and Tilda. Tilda decided to paint hers to match the garden benches, so that’s the latest development. You?”

“Sam’s at the garden center, of course. I’m in the thick of Festival stuff. But I wanted to give you a call. Tomorrow’s Father’s Day, you know.”

“So it is,” Bard recalled. “Oh, do you have something planned for Sam?”

“For you and Thran, too, I hope!” Rosie countered. “I figured both of you had no more idea about it being Father’s Day than the Man in the Moon, so it’s up to me to change that.”

Bard’s chuckle was sheepish. “It’s been a bit busy, yes. What do you have in mind?”

“Nothing complicated. Just a cookout in the afternoon? Maybe a few games? Badminton, horseshoes, lawn darts? Bocce? At two?”

“I’ll have to check with Thran’s schedule, Rosie. This close to the festival, I won’t speak for him.
His company wants everything to be perfect for the premiere.”

“Can you let me know as soon as possible? I know I should have called you earlier, but things got away from me, too. It’s nothing fancy, just good food, good friends, and a good time.”

“That’s sweet of you to think of us, Rosie. I’ll check with Thran right now, and get back to you in a tick.”

“Thanks, Bard. Talk to you soon!”

When Bard disconnected the call, Sigrid had parked her bicycle beside Tilda’s to admire Tilda’s handiwork. “Tilda said that was Miss Rosie, Da?”

“It was,” he confirmed. “She asked us to share a Father’s Day picnic with Clan Gamgee. I’ll check with your Ada to make sure he doesn’t plan to dance tomorrow, so keep your fingers crossed.”

Tilda solemnly set down her paintbrush on the can lid, and crossed both sets of fingers. “I hope he doesn’t. Miss Rosie always makes deviled eggs, and lots of times those cupcakes with the chocolate drops in the middle, so I hope we can go.”

“Looks like you’re through the first coat on your bike, little doll.”

“I am. It already looks so much better!” Tilda gave Sigrid a disgusted look. “It was earache medicine pink, Sigrid. It really was.”

Sigrid gave an elaborate shudder. “Ugh. That sounds ghastly and then some. This looks great, Tilda.
You did a good job on it.”
Tilda gave an emphatic nod. “Anything was a better job than that pink, but thanks, Sigrid.”

“Let’s cap the paint, then and take the brush in to soak in the mineral spirits. Then I’ll see if Thran’s at a point where I can interrupt him.”

In a few minutes, Bard called Rosie back. “We’re set for tomorrow, Rosie. Thran’s looking forward to it as much as I am. So let’s talk food.”

In a few minutes, they decided on a menu, so it wasn’t long before Bard was in the kitchen. A big package of sausages and another of sandwich rolls moved from freezer to fridge to thaw. Tilda was poised to make her favorite fruit, yogurt, and gelatin concoction. While his youngest daughter mixed and stirred, his oldest daughter made fruit skewers for appetizers, and Bard put a pan of chocolate-orange brownies sprinkled with coconut flakes in the oven. When they came out of the oven, Clan Ffyrnig was ready for tomorrow’s gathering.

Once the children were in bed, Bard and Thran retired to their bedroom. Thran finished his shower and got out to dry his hair while Bard scrubbed. The air was finally warm enough that Bard didn’t bother with the hair dryer. After a good toweling, then a shake, his hair was done and he was ready for bed. He gave Thran’s glute a squeeze as he left the bathroom, which earned him a hum and an appreciative smile. Bard savored that smile as he slid into bed to wait for his husband to join him.

Thran soon appeared. Despite the reviving shower, Thran still looked tired and achy. He clambered into bed like a man overboard falling into a lifeboat, flopped back against the pillows, and heaved a long breath.

“Long day,” Bard offered with a sympathetic caress down Thran’s arm.

Thran nodded wordlessly. His eyes were closed and he didn’t move, even though his loose braid lay trapped under his shoulder. Bard eased it free and laid it on the pillow, then smoothed a stray hair from Thran’s cheek. While Thran took his usual three deep breaths to settle himself for sleep, Bard admired the beautiful body that lay beside him, so elegantly long and graceful, muscles clearly sculpted and refined from head to toe –

“Why do you have socks on, cariad?” Bard asked softly, as if he didn’t know. Thran didn’t open his eyes, but he grimaced as if he knew Bard wasn’t as clueless as his question seemed.

Thran heaved his last long, slow, cleansing breath, but remained silent. Bard didn’t press, but propped his head on one hand and traced the other lightly across Thran’s torso.

“So my feet do not bleed onto the sheets,” he finally said. “You do not have to look, Bard. I confess they are both a ruin.”

“What happened?” Bard asked, his voice soft and quiet.

“Too much. The dance in general, the pointe work, the constant repetitions... all of it, too much. I have never worked so hard before. My brain feels as battered as my feet.”

Bard kept up his soft stroking.

Thran grimaced again. “That was a very selfish thing I said. I should not have said it.”

“I’m the one you can say it to, angel. I know how hard you work, how much body and spirit you put into everything you do. There is no part of you that’s selfish. Just a lot of you that’s tired, and sore, and eager for the labor to end.”
Thran heaved another deep breath. “I am eager for this to end. There are only the subtlest, the most miniscule refinements left to make, so let us make them, and then let us dance. No more rehearsal – the performance. Let us bring Immortal into the world, and deal with whatever comes afterward.”

“A deluge of acclaim,” Bard smiled. “Just another few days, and the world will know what an amazing thing your ballet is, just as I know. You’re almost there.”

“I know,” Thran sighed, finally opening his eyes to meet Bard’s gaze. His lips curved in a faint smile. “You take very good care of me.”

Bard snorted. “If I had my way, I’d sentence Irmo to dance an hour’s worth of his own direction, and then see what he thinks about the condition of his feet. Maybe he’d appreciate the effort you put into things, and be a bit easier on you.”

Thran’s smile remained, but where before it had seemed grateful, now it seemed solemn. “He knows what he does to my feet, Bard. What I do to my feet.”

“Oh, maybe so,” Bard conceded. “Please, angel, tomorrow, stay off your feet as much as you can. Enconce yourself in one of the Gamgees’ lawn chairs, and supervise the children when they play badminton.”

“I will give that more serious consideration than you know,” Thran confided. “I confess that I look forward to the cookout. It will be a happy time, with nothing of dance about it.”

“Sausages and burgers,” Bard warned. “Shall I take some chicken breast with us?”

“Whatever we have will not matter,” Thran smiled. “I will enjoy whatever there is, wherever it is, with whomever there is.”

Thran curled around Bard with one last sigh, and Bard snuggled him close. The tired dancer fell asleep quickly, no small blessing, and Bard was grateful to shut his eyes to follow him.

July twenty-third wouldn’t come fast enough.
Chapter Summary

Clan Ffyrnig savors a sweet respite from the rigors of dancing and sculpting. Very soon, they will savor such carefree moments all the more.

When Thran woke on Sunday morning, he was alone in bed. He lay still, savoring the exquisitely fleeting moments where he could pretend that his body was refreshed and healthy. All too soon, reality would dissipate his illusion of health and vigor – back would twinge, feet would ache, broken blisters would sting as the air hit them, lungs would gurgle with congestion, and overextended muscles, tendons, ligaments would feel heavy, stiff, and cold. Each morning, the mirage dissipated faster and faster, so was it any wonder that his face tightened in an anticipatory grimace, waiting for the day’s first stab of mortality?

This morning, much of the pain held off. Of course his feet ached, but his back didn’t hurt so much – it felt only the least bit tight. Of course the skin over his metatarsal knuckles felt raw, but it didn’t burn. And as for heaviness throughout his body... that seemed more memory than reality. His head and throat weren’t clogged with snot, either.

He’d felt better in his life, but lately, he’d felt much worse.

What had happened?

It was best not to look a gift horse in the mouth.

Thran rolled onto his back and opened his eyes, smiling as the upper part of the bed canopy met his eyes. Such a sumptuous nest this was! And such a delightful liaison an angel and a djinni had made in it not two days ago – the stuff of ancient myths. Maybe making a pact with a demon had eased his body in more ways than one.

He drowsed a while longer, thinking of the delight this bed had hosted, but eventually rolled over.

And groaned.

Bard’s clock radio read eleven-thirty-two. He’d slept almost twelve hours.

He hadn’t done that in weeks.

No wonder he felt better.

He’d missed breakfast with his family. He hadn’t done his barre, his yoga, his pointe work. He hadn’t helped Bard make anything for the afternoon’s cookout. He hadn’t spent any time with his children. He hadn’t –

You took care of yourself, angel. You desperately needed to. That’s what’s important right now. You're no good to anyone half dead.

Thran smiled reluctantly. Bard’s powers were such that he didn’t have to be in the room for Thran to hear his reassurance.
He eased carefully out of bed to pad to the bathroom, deal with necessities, splash water over his face, and comb and braid his hair. He thought about shaving, but he was eager to see his family, so he sat on the bed to ease off his socks. His feet were still bruised, scraped, and blistered, but at least the raw bits weren’t bleeding. He bandaged the pressure points, slipped on a clean pair of socks, put on his comfortable trainers. Only when his feet were protected did he pull on underpants, shorts, and tee.

He came downstairs to silence... not entirely. The world outside the house introduced itself through open windows and doors – birds’ twitters, an occasional rustle of breeze, the far-off sound of a lawnmower. Those were sounds he hadn’t noticed before – probably because he’d lived only in dormitories and flats, where such quiet sounds, if they ever were part of his world, were lost in the racket of urban streets. These pastoral sounds weren’t frantic, but peaceful.

The perfume from the flowers on the front porch was much nicer than car exhaust, too. And was that green scent the perfume of a fresh-cut lawn?

The kitchen smelled of someone’s scrambled eggs and toast, and the kettle was still faintly warm. A note on the kitchen island read In the back yard. Than perused the refrigerator for a trio of cold hard-boiled eggs and a seeded wheat roll. He downed the eggs while he waited for the kettle to steam, then took his tea and his roll outside to see what his family was doing.

Bard, the boys, and Kukla were in the gazebo. It was a small octagonal structure, white wood with a black shingled roof, but charming with Victorian trim in the corners between posts and horizontal roof supports, a balustrade that matched the one on the front porch of the house, and lattice panels that covered the space between the ground and the floor supports. Three wide steps and handrails led to the planked floor, which was big enough to host only a very small table and perhaps four tiny chairs, or perhaps two bigger chairs with a small side table between them. Hooks in the horizontal roof supports showed where baskets of ferns or flowers hung in the summer. Right now, tables, chairs, and hanging plants were not in evidence, but a orderly array of tools were. Repairs were in progress, then.

Legolas spotted him, and offered a bright wave. He was seated on the bottom step of the stepladder, and Bard stood on the next to top step, fiddling with something overhead. Bain stood at the back of the ladder with his hands on the sides, and Tilda sat in the grass nearby with a large glass orb in her lap, wiping it carefully with a damp rag. The globe was lobed like a melon, and the glass was creamy orange.

“Hi, Papa!” Legolas called. “We’re fixing the gazebo!”

“Yeah,” Bain grinned. “Legolas and I are the ballast to make sure Da stays steady.”

“An admirable job,” Thran grinned back. “And Tilda, you tend a large pumpkin!”

She looked up, laughing. “No, Ada! It’s not a real pumpkin, but it looks like one. It’s the globe for the light that goes up there. It was dirty, so since I’m too small to be ballast, I get to be the globe washer. Da’s the wire guy.”

“So I see,” Thran nodded. “The light did not work, then?”

“The light never worked,” Bard replied. A small coil of new electrical wire hung on a nail near the center apex of the roof. Bard shook the coil out, leaving about three feet of wire to dangle down from the plastic tube from which it emerged. “Daphne bought the lamp, and I hung it, but we never got the wiring done, so it just looked cool, nothing more. So I had the electricians run the conduit and so forth out here so it met code, and put in a covered outlet so we can have Christmas lights if we want.
I didn’t have them connect the fixture, because it needed work, so that’s what I’m doing. We got the broken post back in place, too. Be careful; I stole a floorboard to fix the bed frame, so there’s a hole on the left side.”

With expert hands, Bard cut about two feet off the wire, then threaded what remained through a small box. He trimmed the sheathing off the ends of the wire, split it into three strands, then climbed down.

“Thanks, lads. Now just have to rewire the lamp. Thran, did you have more breakfast than a roll? I can make you some before I rewire the globe. Lunch won’t be until two, when we go over to the Gamgees.”

Thran shook his head. “I had three eggs, and now tea and my roll – quite sufficient. Why does the lamp need new wires?”

“It’s hung out here for ten years,” Bard explained. “It’s simple to do, so I might as well take the time to bring it up to snuff with the rest of the wiring. Safer that way.”

Everyone gathered round as Bard sat beside Tilda. “You’ve got the pumpkin cleaned out all right, little doll?”

She nodded. “I wiped the inside and the outside. There was a bug on the inside.”

“I’m surprised you found only the one,” Bard grinned, as he picked up the internal workings that had fit into the globe. “Okay, this won’t be too hard. I just have to replace these bits with the pieces from the wire that I just cut off...”

He stripped the remnant of wire down to three pieces of wire, one black, one white, and one green. Thran had no idea of what Bard did, but in some fashion all the old bits came out and the new bits went in, then the combination of bits got attached to the small, plastic box at the center of the gazebo ceiling. Bard twisted the ends of wires together and topped them with brightly colored bits, then tucked them neatly inside the plastic box. It made more sense once Tilda passed an electrical bulb up to Bard for him to screw into the thing. Ah, that was the base of the light, then, and perhaps the globe went over it in some fashion? Yes, Tilda had him pass the globe up to Bard, then a swirling wire thing that fit over the lip of the globe. Ah, the wire thing formed a crown of leaves, vines, and curling tendrils, a fine finishing touch for a pumpkin lamp. Bard held the globe securely against the base and fastened three small screws to hold it in place. Once Bard was sure the globe was well anchored, he climbed down.

“Okay, I’ve got to throw the circuit breaker to restore the power out here.”

“How do you do that?” Legolas asked curiously.

“Come on, I’ll show you the circuit panel.”

Thran trailed along back into the house and down into the cellar. On the wall of the ancient cellar was a modern electrical panel, and Thran paid as close attention as the children did to Bard’s explanation about how each switch in the panel controlled the flow of electricity to a section of the house. Bard pointed to the one labeled Outside Back and pushed the switch from off to on.

“So now that the power’s back on, we can test the gazebo lamp.”

“That’s all there is to it?” Legolas looked bemused. “Just flip a switch?”

“To turn the power on and off, that’s it,” Bard confirmed, pointing to a much heavier wire that entered at the top of the panel. “The electricity comes into the house from the local electrical grid right here. The panel takes the electricity and divides it up into smaller zones – this one runs to the kitchen wires, and that one goes to the mudroom, and those are for our bedrooms. These switches are called circuit breakers. They turn the power on and off to each zone. When you close one, the electricity keeps going from here to all of the wires in that zone. When you open one, it literally breaks the circuit – it stops the electricity so it can’t go any farther. That means you can fix the gazebo lamp, or put in a new chandelier in the dining room, or replace a broken outlet, without electrocuting yourself.”

“Always a plus,” Thran observed, as they trooped back to the gazebo.

“I certainly appreciate it,” Bard gave a wry grin. “All right, troops, prepare to fire phasers.”

Bain slithered to a small, unobtrusive box at the base of one of the posts. “Phasers armed and loaded, Captain!”

Tilda frowned. “You can’t load phasers, Bain. You load photon torpedoes.”

“You can’t?” Legolas looked quizzical.

“Whatever,” Bain rolled his eyes. “Phasers armed and locked on, then.”

“That’s better,” Tilda nodded.

“How do you know so much about Star Trek, Kukla?” Legolas shook his head.

“We have all the original episodes on DVD,” Bain explained. “You want to watch them, Legs? They’re old, but the stories are good.”

“Lieutenant, hit the light switch first, please,” Bard prodded, sharing an amused look with Thran.

“Oh, yeah!” Bain snapped back to the mission at hand. “Firing phasers!”

The pumpkin lamp glowed, and the children cheered. In keeping with the spirit of the scene, Thran put the last bit of his roll in his teeth so he could offer enthusiastic applause. He took the roll out of his mouth to say, “Well done!”

“We have ignition,” Bard nodded, grinning at the children. “Good job all round, troops.”

“What next?” Legolas asked brightly, as Bain switched off the lamp.

“A bit of scraping to take off all the loose paint. Replace those couple of rotten floorboards and the broken lattice. Put on a fresh coat of paint to match the rest of the house. A few plants around the edges, and we’ll be in business. If you three start on the scraping, I’ll put the electrical stuff away. Please stay off the ladder until I get back.”

“Okay, Da; okay Bard!” the children replied, and set too. Thran stuffed the last bit of roll into his mouth and helped his husband collect wire snips, the bits of discarded wire, Tilda’s cleaning cloths, and the small box of brightly colored things. As they headed to the barn, Thran held up the box.

“What are these, lyubov moya?”

“Wire nuts,” Bard replied. “They’re non-conductive, so when you join wires as I did from the gazebo box to the lamp, you screw the bare ends of the wire into a wire nut so nothing fries.”

“Why such bright colors?”
“Green’s for ground, red’s for live, black’s for common,” Bard shrugged. “Those are the usual ones for residential, but there are other colors, too, like white and yellow or orange.”

“I have no idea what any of that meant,” Thran shrugged as he smiled. “But as long as you do, we are in good hands.”

Bard chuckled. “The short answer is that you have to make sure the wires make a straight path all the way around a circuit. If you cross wires, bad stuff happens.”

“That is all I need to know,” Thran agreed as he handed Bard the box of wire nuts to slide it back in the rack of similar boxes.

“I need to know something,” Bard gave Thran’s braid a gentle tug. “May I ask you to stay out of the ballroom today, please? I won’t pitch a fit if you don’t, but you’ve worked yourself to a thread these past weeks. I’d like it very much if you’d please take a break, just for today.”

Thran sighed. Bard’s voice had been matter of fact, as if he’d asked for Thran to get a package of chicken from the freezer, or take a load of laundry out of the dryer. Thran had intended to do at least a minimum barre, nothing rigorous or straining, nothing that would stress his feet, but if he were honest, he still savored the sensation of ease after his long sleep, and he was loath to give it up.

“Immortal has claimed more than enough of me,” he exhaled. “Today, at least the part of it I have not slept away, I want to spend with you and our children.”

“That’s perfect, angel. Thank you.” Bard gave him a glad smile, but his gaze turned calculating. “Um, could I push the envelope and ask you to stay off your feet today, too? And please don’t try to shit me, Thran. Your feet need the rest desperately, and you know it.”

“They do, I admit it,” Thran confessed. “But what does it say if I go to a picnic, only to plant myself in a chair and refuse to move? That seems ungracious.”

“Rosie and Sam will understand, and if they don’t get it on their own, I’ll tell them. Besides, this is a Father’s Day picnic, so the fathers aren’t supposed to work.”

“Do you know how to not work?” Thran gave him a wide-eyed – and patently false – look of surprise. “This I want to see.”

“That’d leave poor Rosie to haul everything, and I won’t let that happen,” Bard grinned. “Besides, it’s cooking. That’s not work.”

“So you say.”

“And maybe a little badminton with the children. That’s not work, either.”

“So you say again. But did you say bocce, too? I enjoy that.”

“Maybe Rosie will pull out the Go board. She’s a fiend.”

“Another game I enjoy. And chess.”

“Sounds like we have the makings for a good winter board games night.”

“Indeed. With soup and a fire, it will be perfect.”

“Hot bread, too.”
Thran hummed. “Delicious. But today, with the sun bright and the warm air and the flowers, we will have a good summer lawn games day.”

“That’s no lie. And wait until you see Sam’s gardens. They’ll be stunning already, and when we get to late August, his place will look like all the gardens in heaven.”

“I look forward to see them. Is there something I can do to help us get ready for the picnic, or have you already seen to it all?”

“We’ve got everything ready. Wasn’t a lot for anyone to do. So relax and enjoy.”

“I will. And beforehand, I will watch Clan Ffyrnig descend upon the gazebo.”

Bard chuckled. “Let’s hope everyone stays interested enough to get it painted tomorrow.”

“They have started, so they must finish, yes? That is the way of things?”

“I think that’ll be the case. With four of us painting, it’ll go quickly.”

“Not five? Oh, tcha, I just realized – Bard, you will think me such a fool,” Thran winced, as they came out of the barn. “Sigrid has been at the bistro every day since school ended, yes? No days off?”

“Normally, she’d have two days off a week, yes,” Bard nodded. “But she wants to make up the time she expects to miss for her driving class. It’s in the afternoon, but she’ll have to leave work two hours early to take it. So over ten days, that’s twenty hours, or about three days, so she offered to work them ahead of time to show she’s reliable. She should have those covered by the end of this coming week, so then she’ll be here a couple of days each week after that.”

“Our lioness is so like her father,” Thran smiled, as they returned to the gazebo where three children busily applied wire brushes and sandpaper.

“She’s a good soul,” was Bard’s proud assessment. “She won’t miss all of the picnic. She’ll be over as soon as she gets home from the village.”

“Excellent,” Thran agreed. “So, the children have scraped much of the gazebo already.”

The children had, even though they hadn’t used the ladder to reach most of the gazebo’s inner roof. Bard climbed up to tackle that, and Thran found gloves and sandpaper and sat on the floor to smooth one side of the old balustrades while Tilda did the other. The boys worked on the floor and the posts, and after an hour or so, everything had been scraped and sanded to Bard’s standards. Brooms and dustpans came out to remove the grit, and the gazebo was ready for Bard to replace the rotten floorboards.

“I’ll call about those tomorrow,” Bard said, as they collected their tools to put them away. “Those are teak, which I can’t get at the homeowners’ meccas. There’s one specialty lumber place I’ll try. Then we can paint.”

“Then flowers!” Tilda announced. “Lots of flowers!”

“Maybe some ferns for the hooks?” Legolas suggested.

“Or big baskets of geraniums or something,” Tilda insisted.

“I’ll take it under advisement,” Bard agreed.

“I hope it’s close to two,” Bain groaned as he put the brooms back on their hooks in the carriage. house. “I’m starving!”

Thran pulled out his mobile. “Very close. We have just time to wash the grit from our hands, and perhaps put on a clean shirt.”

“Awwww, we don’t have to dress up, do we?” Bain moaned. “I thought you said this was a picnic!”

“It is, so no worries, boyo,” Bard assured him. “With all the running around and eating, there’s no point in wearing anything fancy, but wear something without holes. And I don’t have to remind all of you to be considerate of the smaller children, yeah? Make sure you play some of the games with them.”

“Merry-Merry will want to dig in the flowerbeds,” Tilda piped up. “He has a sandbox, but he likes Mr. Sam’s nice, soft dirt better.”

“His father’s own child,” Bard chuckled. “We’ll keep an eye out for him.”

The family went inside to rinse faces and hands, and exchange grubby tees for clean ones. Bard handed round the food they were to bring, and pocketed the house key. From force of habit, Thran keyed the security system as they crossed the yard. A moment later, Rosie waved an enthusiastic greeting, and three small children ran towards them to carol hellos.

“Happy Father’s Day, Bard, Thran!” Rosie called, coming towards them with a big smile on her face. “I’m glad you could come visit on such short notice!”

“Clan Ffyrnig is always up for any gathering that involves food,” Bard grinned, tousling Bain’s hair. “Especially the lads.”

“Oh, don’t I know it?” Rosie laughed. “Well, we’ve got just the thing. Sam’s added a new attraction to the outside – a pizza oven! I’m looking for volunteers to help me feed it this afternoon. Any idea where I might find some?”

“A pizza oven?” Legolas gaped, meeting eyes with Bain. “Oh, that’s brilliant. I can do that!”

“Lead me to it!” Bain chortled. “What do we have to do, Miss Rosie?”

“Right that way!” Rosie pointed to the table on the terrace where Sam presided over a spread of individual pans, dough, sauce, and toppings. As he knuckled dough into a pan, Merry-Merry kneeled on a chair beside his father, trying earnestly to climb over the table to reach the red pepper strips.

“Oh, Merry-Merry, save some of the pepper for everyone else, why don’t you?” Sam admonished, scooping him up and over his shoulder. As Merry-Merry giggled, Sam spotted his visitors.

“Bard! Thran! Welcome! Hi, children! Thank goodness you’re here! Someone’s got to make these pizzas, and it’s not going to be Merry-Merry, unless eating all the red pepper counts.”

“Hi, Mr. Sam!” the children chorused, and scampered to array themselves around the table and fill a pan. Thran was gratified to see Legolas boost little Rose up beside him and help her put toppings on one of the pizzas. Elanor and Tilda put Frodo between them and made sure he got the toppings on the pizza, not the table. Bain helped Sam ferry the pans into the oven, so Bard handed Rosie his bags of sausages and buns and grabbed Merry-Merry from Sam. Thran collected the items the Clan Ffyrnig children had scattered on the table, and turned to Rosie.

“I have Tilda’s fruit gelatin, and Sigrid’s fruit skewers, and Bard’s brownies,” Thran offered. “Where should I put those, Rosie?”
“I’ve got all the food on the table by the grill, Thran,” Rosie pointed. “Once the children finish their pizza making, I’ll clean this off so we can all sit down.”

Thran put his containers as directed. When he turned around, he saw that Legolas and Bain now presided beside the pizza oven, while Sam and Bard laid out sausages on the grill. Bard still had Merry-Merry draped over his shoulder, who seemed quite content to be there. Chuckling, Thran glanced at Rosie.

“I see Merry-Merry is still the sack of potatoes.”

Rosie laughed. “He’s happiest when someone’s carrying him around, yes. I think half the stuff he does is just to get someone to do that, because he doesn’t do anything terrible, just messy or annoying.”

“Tilda says that he likes to dig in the flowers. So perhaps soon he will be a good helper for Sam.”

“I certainly hope so! Right now, he treats the plants more like cushions than anything else. Can I get you a glass of wine or something else to drink?”

“Just water, if you would.”

“How about a little lemon or lime in it?”

“I do like that. Lime would be very nice.”

“Coming up. I’ll bring it out to you. Please find a comfortable place to sit. I’m sure your feet would appreciate the rest, this close to Immortal’s premiere.”

Thran heaved an exaggerated sigh. “Ah. I see Bard has already drawn you into his plan to make sure I survey the festivities from one chair or another.”

“Oh, I’ve heard a few tales about all the dancers who have to soak their feet in ice water down in the Imladris Academy training room,” Rosie grimaced. “Gods, just the thought of that makes me shudder. So sit, and let your feet rest without having to resort to that today. I’d love to hear how the ballet is going, too, so once the children are done making the pizzas, maybe you can fill me in.”

“Oh, I’d like to hear that, too,” Sam called. “Children, make sure you make some pizzas for your parents, too, not just you!”

“I made you a veggie one, Papa!” Legolas called. “With extra onions!”

“And I made you pepperoni and onion with extra cheese!” Tilda called to Bard.

“All right, then!” Sam nodded approvingly. “Rosie, I’ve got your sausage and cheese, and a pepperoni for me, so we’re in good shape. How’re they coming, boys?”

“Almost done!” Legolas said, peering into the oven. “They smell sooooooo good!”

“They do,” Bain agreed, nudging one of the pies with a long spatula. “Who had the red pepper one?”

Thran found a comfortable padded chair by the middle of the table. Most of the pizza toppings were already on crusts, so he collected the last bits and scattered them over the last two crusts, and slid them to Legolas and Bain to ferry into the oven. Rosie swept the empty sauce and topping bowls back to the kitchen, and returned with a tray of glasses and cups. She plunked down Thran’s glass of iced water spiked with a big slice of lime, then arrayed the rest of her load down the table. Bowls of vegetables, snack chips, and dips went down the middle. By then, Legolas and Bain had a stream of small pizzas coming out of the oven, announcing the toppings on each one as it came out. As soon as Bard and Sam put the sausages and buns on platters to fill out the food table, Sam called to the children.

“Grab your plates, and help yourself, everyone! Time to eat!”

Everyone filled a plate from the several dishes on the table – pizza, sausages dressed with sautéed onion and peppers, either on a roll or not, Tilda and Sigrid’s fruit offerings, a big vegetable salad, and the children’s favorite deviled eggs. While Thran passed on the sandwich roll, he helped himself to a little of everything else. As much food as was on his plate, however, the children inhaled theirs in a matter of seconds, and then dispersed to the yard to play, leaving the adults to eat at more leisure. Thran updated Sam and Rosie about UVB’s progress at the school, then gladly listened to all the Gamgees had to say about what else would be part of the arts festival. For the first time, he heard Bard confirm that he’d have more sketches at Celebrían’s gallery, and perhaps a sculpture or two. Rosie planned an exhibit of her glass. A stage would go up in the small community park at the center of the gallery district to accommodate a long list of musical acts, from ethnic Celtic, Ghanan, Latin, and Japanese to traditional bluegrass, rock, and jazz.

“The effort to organize all this must be extreme,” Bard observed, helping himself to another quarter of a pizza.

“Oh, that’s no lie,” Sam shook his head, smiling at his wife. “Every year, Rosie swears this is the last time she’ll take such a big part, but then the next year rolls around, and she’s right back in the fray.”

“Some of it is the biggest pain in the you-know-where that you can imagine,” Rosie admitted, snaring Rose to wipe deviled egg off her face before turning her loose again. “Dealing with a couple of the non-artist residents who complain about the traffic and the annoyance is terribly snarky. But each year, we get more and more people to come, and now we’re getting some recognition outside of New York for the quality of the work you see here. I have high hopes that UVB and Immortal will only add to that. All of us, even the cranky people, end up benefitting from the festival. More artists, more juried shows, and more prestige and recognition for their work turn into more sales, more money for the shops, and more tax revenues for us to keep the roads and the park and so forth in good repair. So yes, I keep doing it.”

“And a good thing you do, too,” Sam nodded firmly. “You’re good at it, and thank heavens some of those flibbity artists have someone to keep them organized.”

That sent a laugh around the table, and talk drifted to other topics. When there was a pause, Thran asked Sam for a tour of his gardens, and the enthusiastic gardener led him and Bard around to show them the sights. Thran was charmed at the small pond where beautiful red and white fish swam under the pads of a small yellow lily, but he didn’t get to ask about it before Sigrid joined the party. She was quick to help herself to the fare, and by the time she had finished, Thran let himself get drawn into a game of bocce with Bard. Legolas and Sam opposed them. Sam was by far the better player, but the other three did their best, more interested in camaraderie than competition.

The younger children took over for badminton, then lawn darts after that, which lasted only until Rosie brought out dessert. In addition to Bard’s tropical brownies, she had the cupcakes that Tilda liked so much, and three kinds of ice cream. Thran was glad to savor his treat from his comfortable chair, but it was funny to watch the children troop back and forth between dessert trays and yard, as if they needed frequent refueling to keep their games going. Even so, Merry-Merry would not be the only child who would have no trouble dropping off to sleep tonight. When it was time for Clan Ffyrnig to go home, the little boy was curled in one of the chairs with half a brownie clutched in his hand, despite being fast asleep.

“So Happy Father’s Day to both of you, Thran and Bard!” Sam declared. “It’s about time that beautiful old house of yours looked as sprightly as she does, and we got you back working in that barn for good, Bard! And that ballroom – Thran, it’s a pleasure to hear music coming out of it. Though what’s this I hear about sword fights, too? Just what kind of ballet dancing goes on in there?”

“Legolas’s ballet dancing,” Thran quipped, smiling at his son as everyone laughed. “But that is only a joke, Sam. Legolas is a fencer, and the ballroom is the perfect stage for that, just as it is for ballet. We have hosted his teammates once or twice, which all seemed to enjoy.”

“Papa fences, too, Mr. Sam,” Legolas called from the yard. “He is a good fencer, too, not just a good dancer.”

“Thank you, synok,” Thran offered his son a laughing salute with his water glass.

“They’re amazing,” Sigrid chipped in, giving Legolas an admiring smile. “And we’ve had a few soccer games in there, too, so you never know what kind of athletes you’ll run into in our ballroom.”

“I should say not,” Sam agreed. “That old house isn’t old anymore, is it? Not with all that excitement going on. She’s young again.”

In a few minutes, as Clan Ffyrnig collected containers and plates to take home, Rosie put her hand on Thran’s arm as they stood by the pizza oven.

“Your beautiful house isn’t the only thing that’s regained her spirit again, you know,” she murmured quietly, smiling at Bard and Sam as they played a few more minutes of badminton with the youngest children. “Bard’s regained his, too, and that is entirely your doing.”

Thran met Rosie’s frank gaze. “So have I, and that is entirely his doing. He is my treasure.”

“He is a treasure,” Rosie nodded. “Daphne was one of my best friends, Thran. When she died, I missed her terribly, but I was more worried about Bard. He was a shadow of himself, and I was afraid he’d never recover. But to see him now... I’m so happy to see him restored, and I can tell you that Daphne would be, too. You’ve been the best thing for Bard, and I’m so glad.”

Thran took Rosie’s hand and brushed a kiss on the back of it. “Thank you for such a warm welcome, Rosie. You and Sam have been Bard’s firm friends, and he has spoken fondly of you both so many times. I am honored to be your friend, too, especially given your closeness to Daphne. Be sure that she is not forgotten, nor is Vileria, my wife and Legolas’s mother, whom we lost seven years ago. They remain part of our lives, especially the children’s. This is very important to all of us.”

“I’m so happy to hear that,” Rosie patted Thran’s hand. “I’ve missed her more than I can tell you. I’m glad she won’t be forgotten.”

“That will never be so,” Thran smiled at the small woman as he touched his heart. “She and Vileria have made us what we are, so they will always be here.”

Rosie smiled bravely, so Thran leaned over to give her a comforting hug. “Bard and Sigrid have a scrapbook that they slowly add their old pictures to. I am sure that when they finish it, they would be happy to show it to you, so you can see just how close Clan Ffyrnig holds Daphne. And perhaps it would let you add your memories to theirs, and keep her in focus a little better.”
“I’d love to see those old pictures, Thran,” Rosie nodded. “That’s the sweetest thing, to offer me a look.”

“I will tell Bard,” Thran assured her. “Thank you for the best Father’s Day I have ever had. To spend it with such friends has been wonderful.”

“You’re welcome, Thran,” Rosie smiled. “I hope we get together again soon.”

“We will,” Thran replied, as he took his leave. He waved to Sam who was trying to get the brownie out of Merry-Merry’s hand, with little success, then to Rose, Elanor, and Frodo, before lengthening his stride to catch up to Bard. The children had run ahead of their fathers, so Bard fell into step beside Thran with a concerned look on his face.

“Rosie seemed awfully intent there at the end. Everything all right with the festival?”

“All is well. She did me a great kindness.”

“Oh?”

“She told me that she and your Daphne were very close, and that she missed Daphne very much. She also said how glad she was that you and I had found each other and were so happy together, and that Daphne would be just as glad for us as she was. I was very touched.”

“Oh, poor Rosie,” Bard hummed. “She and Daphne were close, very true. That was a kind thing for her to do. That’s Rosie in a nutshell.”

“I told her that you and Sigrid worked on a scrapbook of your photographs, and that when you were finished, perhaps she would like to see it. She said that she would.”

“She and Sam are in a bunch of the pictures,” Bard nodded. “I know she’d like to see them again. When we get a breath, we’ll have to get the rest of the photographs in there, and then have an unveiling over soup one evening.”

“A good future plan,” Thran nodded. “And now, lyubov moya, though I was an obedient patient today and sat down most of the time, I am still very tired, and will be glad to bathe and spend the rest of the evening quietly.”

“All that fresh air and good company,” Bard teased, as he unlocked the mudroom door. The children clattered in; the boys bolted upstairs to play zombie apocalypse, Tilda decided to get a shower, and Sigrid was eager to call Finn. Thran gratefully went upstairs to soak off the rigors of serious picnicking in the shower, and settled on the sofa in the sitting room with Bard until the children went to bed. Thran went upstairs to bid them all goodnight, then crawled into bed with a silent groan of pleasure. It felt good to let everything go, and merely lie back against the pillows in silence.

As Bard cycled through the shower, Thran lazed in their beautiful bed, savoring the soft breezes that wafted through the windows. The dim light of Bard’s bedside lamp cast intricate shadows of the bed’s carved panels across the sheets. What if they hung bed curtains of thin, white cotton like mosquito netting from the top of the bed, so they would drift and flow with the breezes? That would be a graceful touch to an already exotic setting. And perhaps panels at the window to match?

Thran smiled. When this ridiculous ballet finally made its premiere, he would give the three performances his all. Once the world recognized Immortal for the wonder that it was, he would take a week off, and make Bard take a week off, too, and they would make all those trips to the junk shops that they’d talked about. And they would buy some curtains, too.
When Sigrid headed downstairs to make her breakfast, Bard registered it, then gladly went back to sleep. He quite enjoyed not having to get up at six to get the children ready for school. In another week, he’d have to be up a little earlier to get everyone ready for camp, but he still had one more week of no morning schedule, and he fully intended to take advantage of it.

He wanted to have a couple of sculptures ready for the festival...

That thought deviled him for a few minutes, until he eased out of bed with a sigh. He already knew what he wanted to make, so he headed downstairs to make himself porridge and tea, wolfing it down so he could get to his clay sooner.

Because the client who’d commissioned the steampunk orrery had opted for hand blown glass globes rather than metal-cast heads of the deities for whom the planets had been named, Bard was free to use his designs for the latter however he chose. He’d mentioned to Thran some weeks before that he liked how carved totems from around the world represented a clan’s history. Some from the native tribes in the Pacific Northwest were his particular favorites. So what if he shaped his portrait globes into pieces he could stack into totems? It would be great to do one big one, but if he made smaller ones, he could take commissions for individualized combinations. He wanted to talk to Bilbo today about it.

He put up his stand in the solarium, and got out his clay. Perhaps fist-sized pieces? No, just a little bit bigger...

He got Mercury, the gods’ messenger, right away – a boyish, laughing face that reminded him of Bain, with his winged helmet. That sparked his ideas about the faces that would follow...

Venus would have long wavy hair swept up atop her head, and a serene expression – that was certainly Sigrid on prom night.

Uranus, god of heaven – that had to be Thran as his angel.

Oh, he couldn’t forget the Sun. That would be Tilda, smiling in her usual sunny way.

So which was Legolas – Neptune, god of the seas, or Ares, god of war? No, he’d be Ares, with bow in hand.

So that left him to be Earth, Neptune, Jupiter, or Saturn. Saturn was agriculture, Jupiter was high lord, Neptune was water, and Earth was... well, earth. Bedrock.

Bard was definitely the bedrock of Clan Ffyrnig, so Earth would look like him.

As for the rest, he’d let his hands figure out how to shape their features.

Thran appeared, looking much refreshed. Thank the gods Bard had persuaded him to take yesterday easy, because he looked better today than he had in weeks. His body looked comfortable, without pain that made him favor one side or the other. His face wasn’t haggard, and he had a faint smile on his face as he came into the solarium. Two days of solid, much-needed sleep, yesterday’s casual picnic, and convivial company had done him good.
“Oh, what is this new wonder you make?” Thran asked, coming to Bard’s side to brush a good-morning kiss on his lips.

“Remember the idea I had for the orrery? To make the globes into the heads of the gods?” He described his idea about totems, and to make the heads resemble their family members.

“Oh, so who am I to be? Let me guess – Pluto, god of the underworld!”

“Try Uranus, god of the heavens, angel.”

Thran looked surprised, then gratified. “You humble me, my saint. You should be Uranus, lord of the heavens. Or Jupiter, the most high.”

“I’ll be good old Earth. But tell you what – you can be Pluto, too, and maybe I’ll double as Saturn, the god of agriculture.”

“Saturn should be Tilda, with her Dinky Farm.”

“She’s the Sun.”

“Most appropriate,” Thran agreed. “So you have done Mercury, that is Bain, clearly. Venus will be Sigrid, then, and you are the Earth. Mars?”

“Legs. The bow.”

“Ah. True. You as Saturn, then me as Uranus and Pluto. Who are Jupiter and Neptune?”

Bard grinned. “No idea yet. I’ll let my fingers sort those out.”

“I like how you have chosen me to be a big gas giant, and a small rock.”

“And Saturn and Earth aren’t a big gas giant and a small rock, too?”

Thran grinned. “Very true.”

“There isn’t any choice but big gas giant and small rock, remember.”

“Also true. There should be something in between.”

“Like what?”

Thran shrugged, chuckling. “I do not know. The children would come up with something whimsical... a planet made of marzipan, perhaps. Or marshmallow.”

“So you’d rather be a sticky-sweet air ball?”

Thran laughed outright. “Put that way, perhaps it is better to be a big gas giant or a small rock.”

Bard snorted. “Maybe so. Have you had breakfast?”

“Not yet. I wait for the kettle to get hot for tea.”

“I’ll keep you company while you eat. And pack you a lunch.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya.”

They worked together in the easy way that Bard had come to love so much, what Thran had dubbed their intimate pas de deux to assemble the lunch of small bites that Thran could nibble on until he came home, and then to make a vegetable omelet and tea for Thran’s breakfast.

“More of the same today at the school, then?” Bard asked as he brought their tea to the table.

Thran nodded. “Let us hope that the weekend has calmed Headmaster L’Eärendil’s worries about Kiefer’s stupidity. And I expect that Lettie and Ori will have things to tell me about whether we must ask the dancers to sign additional clauses about holding to contract, and the searches of dance bags, and so on. I hope these things do not cast a pall on the company. We have only a few days to go, and much still to do.”

Bard offered a commiserating grimace as he reached across the table to squeeze Thran’s hand. “I hope all goes well, too. Call me if you need anything. Not that I can imagine what you’ll need, but I’m here, regardless.”

“Thank you, my saint. Today will be a happier day for you, I hope.”

“The market to restock the fridge, and the lumber yard, I hope. I need a couple of teak boards for the gazebo. Then I’ll roust the troops to paint.”

“Do not neglect your art, Bard. You said yesterday you wanted to have a little sculpture to show for the festival, so you must give yourself time to do it.”

“I’m cutting it close,” Bard agreed. “But if it’s a choice between getting a piece done and neglecting the children, you know what my choice is. I can afford to hold off for them now, and I don’t want to short them again. I already have a big stack of sketches for Celebrían, so I’ll have something on hand.”

“Good,” Thran smiled. “The omelet is gone, and so is my tea, so I must be off, Bard. And I leave, too.”

Bard chuckled. “I’m off, too, and I’m not going anywhere. At least not until the boys and Tilda get up.”

“That may take half the morning,” Thran chuckled as they went upstairs to brush their teeth.

Bard saw Thran off to the school just a short time later. As he came back into the house, he found Legolas yawning widely in the kitchen, his head stuck in the fridge.

“You’re up early, Legs,” Bard greeted.

“I’m so hungry my stomach woke me up,” the blond youth confessed sheepishly. “May I eat the last of the eggs?”

“Sure. I’m heading to the market in a few minutes, anyway. Will you hold down the fort while I’m gone?”

Legolas brightened. “I get to be the officer on the bridge?”

“Sure. You know the usual protocols.”

“Okay, yes! I can do that.”

“Good lad. I’ve got a call to make to the lumber yard, but then I’ll be off.”

Legolas went back to his perusal of the fridge, so Bard called the specialty lumber yard to confirm that yes, they had the four boards he needed for the gazebo floor. He got the shopping list and the stack of grocery bags, and then with a farewell to Legolas, he set out. The lumber yard was on the other side of the village, but they had the boards ready for him when he got there. He also got a few sheets of heavy-duty white vinyl lattice to replace the old, broken bits, so he was soon at the market to stock the stores. An hour and a half after he left, he was back home to unload his purchases.

The children came out to help him carry in the groceries, and the lumber went in the back yard by the gazebo. There was the usual flurry of activity to get everything put away, then the children were eager to get to work on the gazebo. First, Bard made a quick call to Bilbo to float the idea about his stackable totems, which Bilbo liked, with one caveat.

“My only concern is about the quality of your pieces, Bard,” the agent told him. “I’ll be blunt – please don’t risk your reputation with something you do quickly to try to turn a quick dollar. Take your usual pains with it – think Rahmiel, not chia pets! There’s nothing wrong with the mass market, but I don’t think that’s the right place for you.”

“That was just my worry, too, Bilbo, which is why I called. I’ll take my usual pains, never fear. I wanted to see what you thought about the stacking idea, that people could buy one or three or all of them, rather than making only a single piece.”

“I suggest limiting it to only a certain number of pieces,” Bilbo replied. “That will make it a more limited run, which means you’ll sell fewer, but at higher prices, and they won’t be ubiquitous.”

“That sounds perfect, Bilbo. As usual, you’ve come up with a good solution all around.”

“I’m very pleased that you like it, my boy. I can’t wait to see some sketches or pictures as you complete the pieces. The sooner you can get me some of those, the sooner I can get some publicity out about them.”

“Will do, Bilbo,” Bard promised. “I’ll talk to you soon.”

“I look forward to it! Goodbye, Bard!”

Bard ended the call, then ran upstairs to change into his grubby clothes. He shoved his mobile in his back pocket and ran downstairs to join the children in the yard. Out came the saw, the tape measures, the pry bars, the hammers, the nails... Bard set to with a will, gratified to have the children so enthusiastic about their project. The floorboards went down first, then big drop cloths to protect the floor while the children started to paint. Bard did the inside of the roof, but the children did the posts, the gingerbread, and the parts of the frame under the floor. While they painted, Bard pried off the old sections of lattice, then cut replacements from the vinyl lattice sheets he’d bought. Once the paint on the frame dried, it’d be a simple matter to nail up the new panels, which would wear so much better than the painted wood.

“Who’s getting ready for lunch?” Bard asked.

“Oh, yeah!” Bain crowed, and Legolas and Tilda were quick to add their eager voices to their brother’s.

As the children’s exclamations echoed, Bard felt the back pocket of his shorts rumble. His mobile.
He pulled it out.

It was Mr. D.

Bard didn’t know what to think when he put the mobile to his ear.
“Bard? Mr. D here. I’ve got some worsisome news. Ye and yers need to watch yer backs, ye ken?”

“Yes?” Bard managed to ask calmly, but he must not have been all that calm. All three of the children had their eyes glued to him.

“Lance Dunmont ran off from Second Chance yesterday.”
Chapter 144

Chapter Summary

Clan Ffynig hunkers down.

Thran entered the Imladris Academy with a calm, solemn expression. Inside, however, he was neither calm nor solemn. Such a conflagration of feelings surged inside him! Fury, because Kiefer and Piero’s idiocy had endangered Immortal, UVB, and him. Fear, because so much rode on the successful staging of Immortal – a sizeable chunk of his money, his professional reputation, and the opportunity for UVB to be more than the modest company it was. Weariness, because the burden of having to worry about so much more than merely his ability to dance was so great. Loss, because Immortal demanded his total devotion – blood, bones, and soul – and he missed almost all of Clan Ffynig’s life. Dread, because no matter how patient Bard was, no matter how well he understood the sacrifice needed to stage Immortal, surely his patience was not so boundless as to handle children, home, and his burgeoning career with so little help from Thran. Pain, because his body hurt from the rigors of the dance, mental and physical.

Four more weeks. Just four more weeks.

First, though, he had to get through this meeting with Headmaster Elrond L’Eärendil, to assure him of so many things – that UVB had renounced all association with Kiefer Standaal. That UVB did not tolerate drug use among its company, and that any sign of it was grounds for instant termination. That UVB would submit to any and all constraints that the Imladris Academy required, to ensure that no other dancers or principals would be found on school property in possession of illicit materials.

He might as well drop to his knees and beg the headmaster to do whatever he wanted, as long as Immortal would remain in house.

He didn’t know whether to be disgusted at being brought to this point, or at being willing to do whatever was required to keep Immortal’s premiere alive.

It didn’t matter. The operative word was disgust, and humiliation wasn’t far behind. The school hallway was empty, so he allowed himself a grimace.

What if the headmaster ended the student interns’ participation? To hire so many technicians at such short notice would cost so much that Thran’s assurances to Bard about the state of his finances would venture on lies. And what if –

No more what ifs. All you do is torture yourself. Find out what the headmaster has to say, and then cope.

He squared his shoulders and went into the conference room.

Ori, Lettie, and Adam looked up at his entrance. Their visages were no happier than his, and none of them murmured so much as a hello. He didn’t, either. Instead, the quartet traded grim looks, and got down to business.

“I’ve gone over the contracts, Thran, as we discussed on Saturday,” Adam murmured. “The good news is that we won’t have to rewrite any of them. But I thought it prudent to offer more reassurance to the Imladris Academy, especially given how little time we have left before Immortal’s premiere. I’ve drafted a simple statement that the signee agrees to abide not only to the terms of our contracts, but also to the Imladris Academy’s rules of conduct. They’re no more or less stringent than our contract, so no one should have any problems signing it. But it would offer a show of solidarity to the school that we respect their concerns.”

“I will be the first one to sign one,” Thran agreed, sitting beside Ori. “I will sign it in front of all the company, too, to show them that I am committed to this.”

“That would be a nice touch,” Adam nodded, and so did Ori and Lettie. “We also agree to submit to a baggage search each time we enter the school, and there will be a couple more security officers in place. I’ve spoken briefly to Headmaster L’Eärendil about all of this, and he seemed satisfied. Of course, what made the biggest impression was the fast action you and Ori took last Thursday.”

Thran gave Ori a firm pat on the shoulder. “Thank Ori for that. I was too furious to be as sensible as he. I am profoundly grateful that you realized what we should do so quickly, Ori.”

The young man reddened, but his smile was warm. “You’re more than welcome, Thran. And despite Kiefer being so rash, we owe a bit of thanks to him, too. He admitted to everything, so there shouldn’t be any problem about the charges. Thank the gods he had just a hair under the amount of cocaine that the law uses to determine personal use or intent to distribute, so we don’t have to deal with that, only him using it.”

“Thank the gods is right,” Lettie murmured, staring at her lap. “Thran, I talked to Piero, the dancer who didn’t show up Friday. Of course he didn’t say boo about Kiefer, but he asked to be released from his contract, so I did so. None of the other dancers have come forward, so I hope it was just those two.”

“That brings up an item for future consideration, if not today,” Adam mused. “UVB signed temporary contracts with several dancers to provide the non-ballet elements. Going forward, I want to beef up our contracts with temporary artists to protect us further against such things. I’ll get started on that while we have time to consider it, so there’s nothing any of you need to think about today. But I wanted you to be aware that I will work on it.”

“Thank you, Adam,” Lettie agreed. “It’s almost time for us to meet with the headmaster, so let’s review the points we need to make.”

Ori bent over his tablet. “One – apologies, of course. Two – Kiefer’s no longer with us. Three – we reiterate our adamant stand against such things. Four – our contracts already explicitly state that such things are grounds for instant dismissal. Five – we’ll sign statements to further abide by the school’s policies. Six – we’ll submit to the baggage search and the extra security officers.”

Thran exhaled. “Let us hope that will be enough. One concern, though – do you think the headmaster will end the student internships?”

“Oh, gods,” Lettie blanched. “That would be ruinous, Thran. At this late date, to replace them –”

Thran wearily motioned her silent with a wave of his hand. “I am just as aware as you are of how ruinous it would be, so I hope that Headmaster L’Eärendil will not require that. But it is a worry.”

“I... don’t think that will be the case, Thran,” Ori said slowly. “The students have been big supporters from the start, and there have been no complaints that I know of. In fact, the consensus has been good because the interns had to maintain their grades to be on the crews, which several parents complimented. So let’s hope the good we’ve done there, both with stage crew experience and the incentive to be responsible, will work in our favor.”

“I hope so,” Lettie and Thran chorused, bringing a pained smile to all faces.

“It’s almost time for us to meet with the headmaster,” Lettie said as she checked her mobile. “Keep your fingers crossed, everyone.”

Half an hour later, when they walked out of the conference room with the headmaster, Thran was all but limp with relief. The headmaster had been serious and concerned, but he had listened to all the quartet had to say, and pronounced himself satisfied that the company had done all it could to address the matter honestly and speedily. It was clear how seriously UVB considered this breach, and he felt confident that it was an isolated incident.

Headmaster L’Eärendil went on to say that he would not eliminate the student interns who provided such valuable support on the light, sound, and stage crews. In fact, he complimented the company on what good mentors they had been. Thran hardly heard that part, so relieved was he that the interns would remain in place.

Soon after, he had another reason to thank the gods for their kind regard when Lettie and Adam explained the new statements that the company would sign affirming their intent to abide by the school’s policies. Thran was the first one to sign one, but the rest of the company, en masse, was right behind him. They were no less anxious to preserve Immortal than Thran was, and it brought a lump to his throat when each dancer handed him a signed paper without reservation. As Ori took them to make copies for the school, the headmaster offered the dancers a gratified smile and his sincere thanks.

There was likely more concern about the keeping of jobs and preserving of shots at professional recognition than regard for school rules behind the mass signing, but Thran had no complaint. In a way, the company’s quick agreement was a compliment to Immortal, and confirmation that it was just the stunning spectacle Thran thought it was. No one would care if it received its premiere or not if it were a dud.

The security guards did a cursory baggage search, and at last the company was allowed to get back to their work. As Abebe called the dancers to the barre, the weight on Thran’s shoulders lightened the least bit, and the queasy knot in his stomach eased a hair. He took his place beside the other dancers, relieved to lose himself in the familiar routine.

All would be well now.

* * *

“What happened?” Bard managed to say evenly into his mobile.

“The bastard stashed stuff for a week, then disappeared at lights out last night. By the time anyone realized he was nae spewing his guts in the toilet the way he claimed, it was dark and impossible to track him. The camp called the police, so there’s an alert out, and we’re patrolling the roads. From what some of the other students said, he’s well able tae hunker down on his own for a bit, so there will be searches conducted on foot and by air.”

“Sounds like he had help.”
“Hardly. He threatened the couple of lads who figured out what he was up to, enough to keep them quiet for the time he needed. Even they didn’t think he’d make a break that fast. I just got the notice myself, so I wanted you and yours as much notice as I had.”

“How far’s the place from here?”

“A good two hundred miles.”

That wasn’t far. All it would take was one unaware motorist to pick up what looked like a hitchhiking backpacker, and he’d be back in the city in a matter of hours. Or Greenwood Dale on the Lake.

What if he’d hit the village at the same time Sigrid had biked into the bistro?

What if he’d happened along here when Bard had been at the market, when the rest of the children had been home without him?

What if he’d gone to the school, or the UVB studio, where Thran was?

Get a grip. Panic won’t help. He’s not here now, and it won’t take long to make sure Sigrid and Thran are okay. So just get a fucking grip.

“That’s something,” Bard murmured.

“I’ll call yer local constabulary, let them know,” Mr. D grumbled. “That’ll give this more weight than if ye call them about it. Just watch yer backs, and more likely than not we’ll reel in this sad excuse of a wastrel soon enough.”

It wouldn’t be soon enough. Three seconds ago wouldn’t be soon enough. He managed to hide in New York City for weeks without anyone ever getting a line on him until he showed up at my art show. He knows how to hide, and hide damned well.

Just how long would they have to live under the shadow of an angry teenager’s malice?

“I appreciate the call,” Bard murmured. “Keep me posted, if you would.”

“You know I will, Bard.”

Mr. D disconnected the call, leaving Bard to wonder what he would tell the three children who stared as if their gazes were laser beams fit to riddle him with holes. He didn’t have very long to wonder.

“That was about Lance,” Bain blurted. Tilda’s face was already pale, but at her brother’s words, her eyes darted around the yard as if she expected the boy to jump out from behind the bushes. Her gasp was almost a whimper, enough that Legolas put his arms around her.

“I won’t let him get near you, Kukla,” the boy assured her. Bain bit his lip in chagrin, but he patted his sister’s knee in comfort.

“I won’t, either, Til. We won’t let him bother you.”

Bard shoved his mobile back in his pocket, and gathered all of the children into his arms. “We need to stay calm, children. Come on, we’ll put the tools away, and then we’ll head inside for lunch, and I’ll tell you what I know, all right? Steady as she goes.”

“Okay, Da,” Tilda’s voice wavered, but she obediently helped the boys and Bard clean up the paint, the tools, the leftover bits of lumber. He kept the children in sight as he locked the carriage house and the barn, and shepherded them all inside.

“Put your brushes into the mineral spirits, everyone, then wash your hands,” Bard asked, moving past the children and into the kitchen. Once he was out of their sight, he pulled out his mobile and texted Sigrid.

Everything okay at the bistro?

The seconds crawled as he waited for an answer. Finally, his mobile buzzed.

Yes. What’s up?

Don’t bike home. I’ll pick you up at three

What happened? Is everyone ok?

Everyone is fine. Will explain when I see you

Lance?

Bard sighed. Sometimes, having such smart children meant you had to tell them things you didn’t want to.

He ran off last night. They’re looking for him. I’m picking you up only as a precaution

Sure, Da.

Don’t get snarky with your old Da

If he tries to get near me, I’ll break his other foot

Despite himself, Bard smiled. His daughter was every bit the lioness Thran thought she was.

Don’t get cocky. If you see him, call the cops. Will see you at 3

OK

Bard shoved his mobile back in his pocket, but it buzzed again, so he pulled it out. It was another message from Sigrid.

Love you, Da

Bard swallowed as he typed back. Love you, too, sweetness

“Was that Thran or Sig?” Bain asked soberly.

Bard sighed. Clearly, he could hide even less from his children than he thought. “Sig. I told her I’d pick her up at three.”

“Did you tell her why?” Legolas asked, coming in with Tilda.

“I didn’t have to,” Bard replied with a shake of his head. “She’s just as smart as all of you are.”

“I’m not sure I want to be so smart,” Tilda wavered. She swallowed hard and searched Bard’s face for assurances he couldn’t give her. “Not if it means I have to worry about Lance Dunmont. And I do, don’t I?”
“What happened?” Legolas asked quietly, his hand protectively on Tilda’s shoulder. Bain put his hand on her other shoulder, and squeezed in reassurance.

“Let’s sit down,” Bard invited, and the children led the way into the sitting room. When Bard sat down, the boys flanked him, and Tilda sat in his lap. “I don’t know much. That was Mr. D who called, and he said that Lance ran away from the wilderness camp last night. It’s a long way from the nearest town, and two hundred miles from here. The police are looking for him, and there are alerts on all the roads, so he’s going to have a hard time getting past all of that. Even if he gets to the city, he doesn’t know where we live, so we aren’t in any immediate danger. Mr. D sounded confident that he’d get picked up before he got far, but wanted to let us know so we’d keep an eye out for him.”

“Why did he run away?” Tilda pressed. “Wasn’t it a nice place? Why would he want to run into the woods when he could stay there?”

“I don’t know, little doll,” Bard confessed. “He’s had a tough time of it, and it’s made him mean. It’s just like if someone throw rocks at a dog, it can learn to hate all people, no matter how nice anyone is after that. So Lance is likely angry and not thinking clearly.”

“But running away means even more people will be mad at him, and he’ll just get meaner,” Tilda worried. “And he still wants to hurt Sigrid!”

“We’ll do everything we can to watch out for him, Tilda,” Bard tried to reassure her. “We have our security system, remember, and I’ll pick up Sigrid at work – we’ll all go, so no one’s left alone. And when we get her, we’ll go to the school and make sure your Ada is okay. Remember that a lot of police officers are looking for Lance. They took what he did very seriously, and they won’t just shrug it off and say oh, well, when he shows up, he shows up.”

“I hope not,” Tilda gulped.

“Let’s have some lunch, then, and we’ll all feel better after that. We worked hard today on the gazebo, so half our problem is that we’re hungry. What’s everyone feel like?”

As Bard shepherded Tilda into the kitchen, the boys ducked down the hall. He opened the fridge and asked Tilda to get out the cheese, the bread, the sliced ham, the mustard, the carrots, the apples, the oranges. By the time she assembled all that on the kitchen island, the boys would be back, and she might not realize that they’d locked every door in the house, and armed the security system to boot.

Clearly, Bain’s street smarts had rubbed off on his brother.

* * *

After a hearty lunch, Legolas, Bain, and Tilda seemed calmer. While Bard was no less concerned, he forced himself to move and speak quietly and slowly, so that he didn’t telegraph his worry to the children. He kept everyone busy making sandwiches and tea, and after they ate he distracted them by getting them to bake the week’s cookies. Molasses hermits, vanilla brownies, and lemon bars were simple, one-bowl affairs, and he could easily move back and forth between the children to help each one as needed. Before long, the aromas of their treats wafted through the kitchen, which helped to dissipate their worry. By the time the cookies were out of the oven to cool and the dishes were washed and put away, it was time to fetch Sigrid.

“Okay, shoes on, everyone,” Bard prompted, pulling on his own trainers. “Make sure you tie your laces, please."

So that you can run if you have to, he thought silently, but the boys looked at him as if they heard every word. When he cut his eyes to Tilda, then back to them, they silently nodded and said nothing. He stuffed his wallet in his pocket and took his keys off the rack by the door, and out they went to the carriage house.

Gods, was it better to have the children wait by the mudroom door while he checked the carriage house, or better to take them with him? Neither kept them out of harm’s way if Lance lurked nearby, so Bard didn’t say anything as he led the way to the carriage house. The children fell in beside him, but both the boys looked around them. They went inside the side door, got in the truck, and settled in their seats before Bard opened the bay. He pulled out the truck out and keyed the bay door to shut, all the while checking for any signs of their errant juvenile delinquent. Nothing. He glanced at Legolas sitting beside him, who returned his gaze steadily.

Off they went down the lane.

No one said anything while Bard drove into the heart of the village. The tourist trade was in full swing as people trooped up and down the sidewalks, perusing galleries and shops. Bard found a parking spot on the curb just a few doors up from the bistro, so he pulled into it.

“Tilda, I’ll get Sigrid,” Legolas offered, unfastening his seatbelt. “It’ll be quicker than if we all get out.”

That was true, and Bard had given up trying to figure whether it was safer for them to move quickly or together. He nodded at the blond youth.

“Keep your eyes peeled, Legs. If you see anything, yell. If Sigrid’s not ready yet, wait for her inside, then the two of you come out together.”

“Okay, Bard.” The boy slipped from the truck and dashed across the street through a gap in the traffic, and disappeared inside the Blue Mountain Bistro. In a couple of minutes, he reappeared around the corner with Sigrid beside him as she walked her bicycle across the street. Bard got out to unlock the back of the truck so the two children could hoist Sigrid’s bicycle inside, then shooed them inside the truck while he locked up.

“Legolas told me everything,” Sigrid said without preamble, when he got back behind the wheel. Legolas had moved to the back seat, and she’d taken his place beside Bard. “So now we’re off to the school?”

Bard nodded. “Thran doesn’t know yet, and this isn’t the sort of thing I want to tell him with a text. I thought he’d feel better knowing we’re all okay and calm. So everyone, stay calm, okay? Thran’s got enough to worry about, and he doesn’t need to add us to his list.”

Sigrid clearly wanted to say more, but she held her tongue, likely because she didn’t want to upset her sister. But Tilda heaved a big, exasperated sigh, and slumped between her brothers.

“I know everything, Sigrid, so you don’t have to be quiet. I’m scared, but I’m not that scared.”

Sigrid turned around to give her sister a smile. “That’s a brave thing to say, Tilda.”

In the rear view mirror, Bard watched Tilda perk up a bit at Sigrid’s praise. “I don’t feel very brave, but thank you.”

“My history teacher, Mr. DeFilippo, told me that being brave doesn’t mean you’re not scared,” Bain offered. “It means you do the right thing even though you are scared.”
“I’ve heard that, too,” Legolas added. “So it must be true.”

“Exactly right, lads,” Bard smiled. “So we’ll do the right thing, which is stick together, and look out for each other. That way, we’ll come out all right.”

The children traded smiles, which reassured Bard a little. Still, ten years of bad and worse circumstances hadn’t given him much hope in the murmuring of platitudes. He rarely offered them, because mouthing them felt more like tempting the devil to strike rather than to stay away.

He hoped he hadn’t just given the devil a reason to consider the former.
Despite the shiver of worry that nagged him, Bard kept his demeanor resolute and calm as he drove the children to the school. He pulled into the lot, parked near the auditorium, and scanned the area before he opened the door. Nothing and no one unexpected appeared – as far as anyone could tell, today was just another ordinary summer day in the country. He shepherded the children to the door and let them precede him inside. A security guard spotted them and came up right away.

“The school’s not open today, folks,” the security guard said. “If you want the office, it’s open eight until two, so you can come back tomorrow.”

The quick challenge reassured Bard that it wouldn’t be easy for Lance to worm his way inside, so he met the security guard’s polite words with his own. “Actually, we’re looking for Thran Oropherson with the UltraViolet Ballet Company. They’re rehearsing Immortal in the auditorium. I’m his husband, Bard Bowman, and these are our children.”

The guard’s expression didn’t change. “I need to see some ID, please. And let me call someone inside to come escort you.”

Bard duly pulled out his driver’s license. To his amusement, most of the children did, too – only Tilda didn’t have identification with her. “Ask for Ori Goldman, Thran’s assistant. He knows all of us.”

The guard talked into his walkie-talkie. “Yeah, snag Ori Goldman, would you, Bert? Got some folks here for him.” He scanned Bard’s license, then the children’s student ID cards. “Yeah, a bunch of Bowmans and an Oropherson-Borodin. They say they’re Thran Oropherson’s family.”

“They are Thran’s family,” Ori’s voice could be distinctly heard to say. “I’ll be right there.”

The guard flashed them an apologetic look. “Sorry, folks.”

“Not at all,” Bard assured him, as he and the children put their IDs away. “I appreciate you looking out for the company so well.”
The guard looked surprised, but gratified. “Um, you’re welcome, then.”

The auditorium door opened, and Ori stuck his head out, smiling when he spotted Bard and the children. “Hi, Bard! It’s all right, Ernie – they really are Mr. Oropherson’s family.”

“Thanks, Ori,” Ernie nodded, and gestured for the family to follow the young man. “I’ll remember next time, folks.”

“Thanks, officer,” Bard held up a hand in appreciation as he followed the children after Ori.

“Sorry about that, Bard, children,” Ori grimaced once the door had closed on the security guard, then he smiled. “It’s good to see all of you again.”

“We’re not sorry, Ori, not at all,” Bard said softly. “In fact, we’re relieved. We received some disturbing news this morning. We’re actually here to make sure you and Thran and everyone else is okay.”

“Oh?” Ori’s face spasmed in concern. “What’s happened?”

“Lance Dunmont,” Tilda blurted.

“Oh, for all the –” Ori broke off what he was about to say. “What’s happened?”

“Dwalin Fundin called me this morning. Lance ran away from his wilderness camp last night. The police are looking for him, but so far, no one knows where he is.”

Ori shut his eyes briefly, then his lips thinned to a worried line. “That is not good news.”

“No, it’s not.”

Ori sighed. “Children, would you mind if I steal Bard for a minute?”

The children looked among themselves, but it was Sigrid who replied. “I guess not, but we’d rather know what’s going on.”

“I’m afraid all of you know more than I do about that,” Ori replied frankly. “I won’t keep him long, I promise.”

“Okay,” Sigrid agreed with reluctant nods from her brothers and sister. “We’ll sit back here.”

“Thank you,” Ori offered sincerely. Then he led Bard down the aisle until they were out of earshot of the children. They didn’t have to go far; the intense music that accompanied Death as he reaped his battlefield harvest cranked up again. It made just as fitting a backdrop to Bard’s mood as it did a war zone.

“What’s up?” Bard asked softly.

Ori’s expression was even, but that was likely for appearance’s sake only. “Not that there’s ever a good time to hear that Lance Dunmont is on the loose, but today is bad timing, to be sure.”

“Why?”

Ori grimaced. “Thran’s carrying so much, Bard. You know about what happened last Thursday, I assume.”

Bard nodded.
“We dodged a lot of bullets from that one. We could have gotten kicked out of here, we could have lost our interns, we could have had to deal with a lot more than we did. Thanks to all of the gods without exception, we resolved that this morning.” Ori summarized the outcome of the meeting he, Thran, Lettie, and Adam had had with Headmaster L’Eärendil. “Thran was wound as tightly as a clock spring, and it was a huge relief for him to take that pressure off. But now this...” Ori looked towards the stage where Thran danced through a sea of dead and dying soldiers.

“He’s pulled in so many directions,” Bard murmured. “He’s told me how mentally exhausted he is, and how it worries him that he has to think about so much more than merely dancing. Is there anything we can do to just let him dance, and not worry about the rest?”

“Exactly what I’ve told Lettie and Adam,” the young man agreed. “This close to the premiere, he shouldn’t have to think about anything else but dancing his role. If he can’t focus on that, the whole ballet will not be what it could be, and we’ll all lose out. I’ll talk to Lettie and see if there’s anything else we can do so all he does is dance.”

“Do whatever you can. I’ll take care of him at home.”

“What about Lance?”

“Maybe we’ll get lucky, and the police will pick him up before he gets anywhere near any of us. If not, then we’ll do the same as we did before – no one goes anywhere alone, and we watch our backs. It’ll be easier in a week, when the children are in camps here at the school. Everyone will be in the same place.”

“I think you ought to hire a bodyguard, Bard,” Ori whispered. “At least one, and better two, because there are six of you.”

Bard gave Ori a long look. “He’s a kid on the run, Ori.”

“He’s a kid on the run who’s too stupid to back down, and he’s escalated his attack each time,” Ori came back sharply. “He’s obsessed with Sigrid, and at this point I can’t imagine him confronting any of you just to demand an apology. You’ve got four lovely children, one of the world’s best dancers, and a damned good sculptor to think about, any of which have more decency, common sense, and talent in a fingernail paring than this ‘kid on the run’ has in his entire existence. No matter what horrors turned Lance into what he is, you need to protect yourself from him until he’s caught.”

“He’s a juvenile. He won’t stay loose for long, and when he’s caught, they’ll cycle him through the juvenile justice system and he’ll be out again in a year. We can’t live surrounded by bodyguards for the rest of his life.”

“That camp was his last chance to avoid being tried as an adult and sent to federal prison. One of the terms of his stay was that he stayed at the camp for at least six months, or all previous charges would be reinstated. He’ll be in prison for a long time.”

Bard winced, but not just at the thought of having a couple of enormous bar bouncers lurking around the family to glower at the bushes. Ori’s normally placid and friendly face was fiercely intent – was this what his older brother looked like in the middle of a “negotiation?”

“Please, Bard. See sense,” Ori urged. “I can have two good ones in place in a matter of hours. Just until he’s caught.”

“Okay,” he conceded. “I’ll think about it.”

Ori tsked. “It might help Thran to worry less.”
“Or it might help Thran worry more. I don’t know. Hearing about Lance will be bad enough, as we’re about to see.”

Ori turned to follow Bard’s gaze to the stage, where the dancing had momentarily stopped. Thran had spotted the two of them, and watched them intently. He was such an expert at physical nuance that he knew something was of concern, because he looked wary and didn’t smile. Indeed, he held his hand up to Irmo and made his way to the stairs off the stage, despite the choreographer’s annoyed protests.

“Here we go,” Bard exhaled, and beside him Ori did the same thing. They both walked down the aisle to meet Thran halfway.

* * *

Yet again, Death danced across the battlefield to collect the fallen souls. How many times over uncounted millennia had He crossed a similar field strewn so thickly with bloody fruit? How many flocks of vultures and carrion crows had bowed down to Him, honoring His claim on the wandering souls before stooping to devour their mortal shells? So many... so many. How many souls had risen on a battlefield with shock and terror because their incomprehensible conflicts had ended their lives so abruptly and with such violence? The old, the terminally ill, and the despairing rose from their beds to greet Him with relief, eagerness, even joy, glad to lay down their burdens and follow Him to their new abode. Not so soldiers. They invariably reeked of anger and rage, pain and fear, and took a long time to accept their fates. Some even tried to shake their bodies awake, until the carrion crows drove them away. But Death was patient, and granted such souls the time they needed to accept the inevitable –

“No, no, you with the trailing scarf, I do not want you to break towards Death, but away from him!”

Thran blinked as Death receded and returned his body to him. It was Irmo who had spoken, delivering another one of his admonishments. He was right this time, as he usually was; Gerard had gotten turned around and had not stepped in the correct direction. Thran let Death’s possession fade, flexing his arms and shoulders to keep them loose while Irmo demonstrated to Gerard what he wanted. He looked out over the empty auditorium –

Was that Bard talking to Ori? Perhaps he came to sketch? But no, he might do that next week, when all of the children would be in camp and he was free to work on any of his art he chose. Today, he would not have left the children at home... yes, there were the children at the back of the auditorium. All four of them looked intent on each other... they discussed something serious. Every now and again one of them cast a worried look towards Ori and Bard, whose discussion was no less serious.

Thran crossed to the steps that led down to the auditorium, ignoring Irmo when he fussed at the interruption. He strode up the aisle to meet his husband and assistant, both of whom walked down the aisle to meet him.

“Bard,” Thran called, trying to resist the frown that wrinkled his brow. “What is it? The children?”

“They’re fine,” Bard turned to point to them sitting at the back of the auditorium. “In fact, they’re right there.”

“I saw them,” Thran’s voice dropped half an octave. “Why are they right there?”
Bard’s jaw tightened, but he wasn’t angry at Thran’s growl. “Because I’ve got something hard to tell you, angel. I’m sorry. Mr. D called this afternoon to tell me that Lance ran away from his wilderness camp last night. The police are searching for him, but he wanted to let us know.”

Oh, gods. Oh, gods... The blood drained from Thran’s face so quickly that he felt lightheaded. His stomach clenched hard. His hands knotted into fists. He had to bite the inside of his cheek to keep from shouting, but he couldn’t suppress a mutter. “Oi, suka blyad. Chert, chert, chert!”

“I picked up Sigrid and we headed over here to let you know that we’re all fine. I’ll get us home so you don’t have to worry. I don’t think you or the company is in any danger, but when you leave to come home, don’t let any of the dancers go out alone. Call me when you’re on your way, and I’ll watch for you to make sure you get in okay.”

“I told Bard that you ought to hire a couple of bodyguards,” Ori insisted. “Just for peace of mind, Thran.”

Thran still reeled from the resurgence of an old threat, but he struggled to remain his composure. He rubbed his temples, trying to ease the pain that throbbed there. As he turned to Ori to protest such a heavy-handed tactic, Bard flinched and groped for his front pocket – his mobile – and moved farther down the aisle to answer it.

“It’s the prudent thing to do, Thran,” Ori urged. His lips were downturned with distress, and in a tone most emphatic the small man launched into a litany about escalating attacks and safety of the children and how another layer of protection was needed because Lance had been so elusive to track down before. It was all too much to take in.

“Think of your children, Thran,” Ori pressed. “You want to make your best effort for them as well as for Immortal, don’t you? Then get bodyguards so they’re as protected as they can be.”

Bard rejoined them. “Get them.”

“Get them what?” Thran gaped at Bard, but his husband stared at Ori, not him.

“I want the bodyguards. As soon as you can find them, Ori.”

“What?” Ori’s eyes bugged out and his jaw dropped. “What happened? Who called you?”

“That was Mr. D again.” Bard’s jaw clenched, and his posture was hard and stiff. “I’m sorry, angel; there’s no easy way to say this. A guy driving heading east to the city on the back roads didn’t hear the alert, and picked up a hitchhiker about five this morning. The boy slept for the duration until the guy stopped at a gas station about ten miles from the city, whereupon he jumped the guy as he made his way back to the car and knocked him out. He stole about forty dollars from the guy’s wallet and his phone, but that wasn’t the worst of it – he also stole the guy’s handgun right off his belt. By the time the guy came to and staggered into the gas station snack shop to get the attendant to call the police, the boy was gone. The guy identified Lance from his mug shot.”

“Oh, gods, oh, gods!” Thran gulped. “So now this angry child is armed. He does not even have to confront us now! He can wreak his havoc entirely unseen!”

“Which is why I’m taking Ori up on his suggestion about bodyguards. This is more than we can handle ourselves, angel. I want as much protection for the children as we can get.”

“You are right.” Thran groped for the back of the nearest seat and sat down. He wanted to bury his face in his hands, but in deference to the children, he managed to keep himself from doing so. “Yes, lyubov moya. You are right.”
“I’ll get on it,” Ori said, already pulling out his mobile.

“What do we tell the children now?” Thran whispered, when Bard stooped down beside him.

“I don’t know,” Bard shook his head. “Tilda’s already scared. The rest are apprehensive, but they’re not panicky. I’ve got to say something – Sig said that if the fucker comes near her, she’ll break his other foot for him, and I don’t want her to be quite so cocky.”

Thran looked at Bard, but there was no smile on his husband’s face. “You called him a fucker, or did she? I would not blame her if she did.”

“No, that was me,” Bard cast a surreptitious look back at the children, all of whom looked militant. “They won’t sit back there much longer without asking what the hell’s going on.”

“So I repeat, what do we tell them?” Thran whispered. “I do not know what to do.”

A strong hand grasped his knee. “We’re in a spot, cariad, there’s no denying it. So we’ve got to keep our heads, or that fucker will have us so cowed that none of us will know our ass from a hole in the ground. Ori’s getting us some help. And while I wish we didn’t have to do this, we have to tell the children so they understand why we have to be so careful right now.”

Thran nodded. His face must have looked awful, because Bard squeezed his leg for reassurance.

“I won’t tell you just to worry about Immortal. I know you can’t. But Lance’s luck has to run out sometime, yeah? He’s gotten away with more than anyone so stupid has had a right to. So odds are he won’t continue to be so lucky, especially now that he’s committed assault and robbery. That’ll kick the police into high gear, because he’s not just an errant kid anymore. He’s armed and dangerous.”

“Forgive me if I do not find that particularly reassuring,” Thran growled.

Bard sighed. “I don’t, either.”

Thran glanced at the children. “They are about to descend upon us.”

“I know. Better we go to them.”

“Thran!” Irmo barked from the stage. “We are waiting!”

“You must wait a little longer!” Thran growled, mustering his Prince of Ice glare. It was likely a sickly one, but he did the best he could, then followed Bard to the back of the auditorium where four anxious children waited.

Oh, gods.

* * *

“Da, what’s going on?” Sigrid blurted when Bard and Thran came towards them. “What did Ori tell you? And you got another call? Was it Mr. D?”

“Okay, let’s settle down,” Bard urged. How did he expect the children to do that? He could hardly settle himself. But he grabbed his worry by the throat and stifled it, so that he could look his children in the eye and be strong for them.

“It’s bad, isn’t it?” Tilda’s eyes were the size of saucers and her mouth was downturned at the corners.

“Settle down,” Bard repeated, but quietly. He took a marshaling breath, and gave Thran a look. The tall dancer was still pale, and he looked no less settled than the children. “All right, everyone. We all need to stay strong, because no, it’s not the good news we wanted to hear. I’m sorry. I’ll just say it straight out, and then we’ll talk about what to do.”

The children all had their eyes glued on him. So did Thran. This was one time he had to be at his calmest, no matter how awful the news was.

“Lance hitchhiked into the city this morning. He assaulted the man who drove him in, and stole some money and a handgun before he ran off.”

“Oh, son of a bitch – sukín syn – he’s batshit crazy!” the older children muttered, neither quietly nor calmly. Between the frightening news and her siblings’ curses, Tilda started to cry.

“Steady on, everyone,” Bard said, gathering Tilda into his arms. “This is hard news, yes, but we don’t have to resort to curses to get past it. That just frightens us, which we don’t want. We’re better than that, and we won’t let this get the best of us. Everyone take a deep breath.”

“But he’s going to shoot us!” Tilda wailed. “Why can’t the police stop him? Why?”

“They’re trying, little doll,” Bard rubbed her back. “He’s very good at hiding, I guess, in places that the police don’t think to go. But they’re doing everything they can to find him, and they’ll do everything they can to keep us safe.”

“Which isn’t much,” Bain muttered under his breath, and Legolas whispered agreement.

“I’m sure there’s a search going on right now where he was last seen,” Bard offered, hoping it was true. “They won’t stop just with a search there, either. Because he hurt someone, and because he’s tried to hurt us in the past, the police won’t stop looking for him now. They’ll look until they find him.”

“Ori works to get us some help, too,” Thran mustered a firm voice to add. “We will have someone to watch over us, so that Lance cannot come upon us unaware.”

“What, a bodyguard?” Sigrid asked at once.

“Exactly so, lioness,” Thran nodded. “But that does not mean that we have nothing to do for ourselves, yes? We will stay calm, and listen to each other, and watch out for each other.”

“Thran!” Irmo bellowed. “Parlez à ta famille quand tu rentres chez toi! Maintenant, nous travaillons!”

Thran’s cheeks flushed bright red, and his eyes flared angrily. Bard put a hand on his arm, urging restraint.

“Do what you need to do for Immortal, Thran. We’ll hunker down here until I hear from Ori, then I’ll let you know what’s up.”

“Thank you,” Thran growled. It was a struggle for him to look at the children without glaring, but he tried. “You are all so strong and brave, mes petits. I am very proud of you.”
“Nous allons être bien pendant que tu as tendance le grand bébé, Papa,” Legolas murmured, and if Bard didn’t know exactly what that meant, his children’s expressions told him that it didn’t compliment Irmo.

“Vraiment,” Sigrid muttered back.

Thran was so irate that he didn’t rebuke the children for their irreverence, merely turned on his heel and headed back towards the stage. He was only halfway down the aisle before he lit out with a blistering string of French, none of which Bard understood, though the intent was clear. Legolas half winced, half grinned at his father’s barrage.

“What did he say?” Bain asked.

Legolas shook his head. “You don’t want to know. I think the expression is that Papa cut Irmo four ways until Sunday.”

“Close enough,” Bard said. “Okay, we’ll be your Papa’s audience for a while, until I hear from Ori. Come on, we might as well move closer to get a good view of the action.”

Everyone obediently moved down the aisle until they were just a few rows from the front. Thran and Irmo snarled back and forth a few more times, but once Thran found his worst glare, Irmo subsided. As the dancers began the scene again, the children quieted, and were soon intent on the swirl of the soldiers as they fought and fell. When Death made His entrance – He didn’t fly today, merely took his place where He would land – Bard let himself get drawn into the scene. His husband was such a powerful dancer, commanding the stage, the other dancers, and the audience so completely that no one could look away. He was not Thran Oropherson, but the Lord of the Underworld, inevitable and inexorable possessor of all mortal souls.

Too bad that Death wouldn’t reach out to possess Lance Dunmont’s soul right this instant. If that happened, Bard would be the first to offer the Lord of the Underworld heartfelt applause, untainted with a single drop of regret.

Sadly, that wouldn’t happen, no matter how much Bard wished for it. With all that Thran had to bear right now, it was up to Bard to take the lead to protect their children. In addition, it fell to him to find the words to reassure them until Lance was run to ground.

Maybe the police would have better luck with their searches this time than they had in April.

Maybe.

As if he felt Bard’s frustration, Thran wielded his knife onstage with more fury than was Death’s norm. As he watched his husband channel his fury into his dancing, an echo of the same emotion sparked at Bard’s core.

So what if Lance had a gun? Bard had rage, and it was growing.
Chapter 146

Chapter Summary

Clan Ffyrnig acquires three guardian angels.

Chapter Notes

I decided to endow our three guardian angels with some serious mojo, so:

Charmeine – angel of harmony
Adofo – the special one from God

Michael – angel of loyalty, the warrior angel, and protector of the people
Kusiel – angel of punishment

Gavreel – angel of peace
Agyenim – the great one from God

For those who remember Ori's scene list that included the titles of the music that accompanied each one, please note that the Arnold Schoenberg piece is now replaced with a continuation of the Prokofiev piece, which includes Juliet's theme to accompany Charisse's Maid.

I don't own any rights to any of the Pokémon stuff. But I do get a kick out of all the people wandering around trying to catch them :-)

Just simmer down, bastard.

Thran’s stressed to the max, and the children are scared. You can’t get your anger at an enraged child get the best of you – that’ll make you just as stupid as Lance. You’ve got to be the sensible one, or we’ll all go to hell in a hand basket.

Gods... that was so easy to say, and so hard to do.

Bard clenched his jaw, then forced himself to relax – physically, if not mentally. He did his best to plaster a bland expression on his face. As well as his children knew him, even Legolas, if he looked anything but calm and collected, they’d get even more agitated, and almost anything would spook the lot of them. It was nearly an impossible task, but he did it by keeping his eyes on Tilda – the youngest, the most scared, the one who trembled. He forced himself still and just in time – when she looked over at him, he was able to offer her an encouraging smile. She relaxed enough to return his smile, then she turned back to the stage to watch the company dance.

“All right, good!” Irmo called, waving his hands to signal the end of the scene. “You have it now. So we will try again, but this time with the mist and the film clips and the lights for the battle, yes? It will Thran disappeared Stage Right – that was to Bard’s left. The house lights went down, then so did the stage lights. Slowly, an eerie, faint green light suffused the stage, and mist began to gather over the floor from both sides. High above the mist at Stage Right, a cold blue light grew, illuminating a crouched and brooding figure who regarded the stage below him – Death, Lord of the Underworld. Even without his costume armor, Thran was a forbidding, alien figure, for he wore his practice headdress and gloves. He remained immobile as the first faint strains of the Kyrie from György Ligeti’s Requiem began. Below him, black and white images projected onto the black panels at the back of the stage depicted a stark, flat, grassy plain. In came the soldiers, one at a time at first, then in groups, until the two forces had assembled. As both forces postured at each other, the stark landscape became overcast with roiling clouds. The posturing turned increasingly violent, and suddenly the two forces fell upon each other like tidal waves. The projected images turned chaotic and jagged with a cascade of war scenes, echoing the flash of the soldier’s swords and knives as they fought. The deep mist churned around the soldiers like a living, grasping creature, a harbinger of the death that eagerly engulfed those who fell.

As the music died, the last soldier fell into the mist. In the few seconds of silence that followed, the cold blue light brightened, and Death rose to his feet. Thran held his forbidding regard long enough for the first clashing chord of Prokofiev’s Knight’s March to crash over the stage. Because he wasn’t rigged to fly down onto the battlefield, he disappeared behind the set and reappeared to stand where he would land after his flight. The projected images behind him showed a scattered flight of carrion crows and vultures, swirling when Thran drew out Death’s knife and launched into His solo to collect the souls of the dead. One by one, He cut the souls of the fallen soldiers free of their bodies, and one by one, they rose to follow Him.

Charisse appeared as the Maid with the other civilians, piteously searching for her Soldier, turning the strains of Prokofiev’s theme for Juliet into a lament. At the last second, just as Death stooped to free the soul of her Soldier, his beloved’s cries revived him, and Luka reached out for her. Spotting her, he crawled over the stage, forcing Death to stay His hand. The Maid threw herself beside her Soldier, stroking his face and shaking him awake as Death circled them, looking more curious than threatening. As the Soldier rallied, he embraced the Maid in celebration of his survival, and the Maid helped him towards Stage Left.

Death retreated to shepherd His collection of souls off Stage Right, but at the last second, He turned back to watch the Maid attend her beloved. When the Lord of the Underworld stretched out a hand to her, it was no mere gesture. His head drooped, He took one yearning step after her, and His hand strayed to His heart, as if it ached. The Maid saw none of this, but spent all her regard and affection on the Soldier. Only when she helped her Soldier offstage did Death turn back to His collection of souls to take them down to the Underworld. His steps, though were reluctant.

The house lights came back on. Bard blinked, surprised at how quickly he’d become entranced in what he’d seen, despite the frightening turn of events with Lance. He scanned the children quickly – the scene had been quite dramatic, and might well have exacerbated their apprehension. But even Tilda seemed to have momentarily forgotten her fear as she’d gotten caught up in the story.

“Wow,” Sigrid gulped. “That was intense.”

“It looked like a real battle,” Bain agreed.

“I thought so, too,” Legolas nodded. “The black and white films and the flashing lights made it much more exciting.”

“I liked Mam’quelle Charisse,” Tilda said, after thoughtful deliberation. “She brought Luka back to
“She did,” Bard agreed with a smile. “I bet Luka’s glad.”

“I am,” Luka pirouetted towards them to offer a wave and a big smile. “She’s wonderful!”

Laughing, Charisse waved to the family before she caught Luka’s arm and drew him back into the company.

Bard managed to catch Thran’s eye and offered him an impressed smile and a thumb’s up. His husband smiled in return, put his hand to his heart, and bowed slightly before he turned back to Irmo. He looked easier now that he was back to the dance, which reassured Bard. The children looked less upset, too, another plus.

Was he wrong to be glad that they were calmer? A crazy teenager was intent on mayhem, and he was glad that his family was calmer? They all had reason to be pissed to the gills.

* * *

The last time Thran had endured so much worry about anything was after Vileria had been killed at the train station. Physically, Legolas had not been badly hurt, a few cuts and bruises only. The emergency team at hospital had barely had time to bandage his wounds before Thran had rushed to his side; in fact, he had been the one to wipe the spatter of Vileria’s blood from his son’s cheek. Legolas had been too numb to cry, and had stared in wide-eyed, unblinking silence at Thran as if he didn’t know where he was or what had happened. In desperation, Thran had bundled the boy in his arms and rocked him while he cried for both of them. He had relinquished his son only when he’d had to identify his dead wife, lying on a cold metal table in the hospital morgue. The blast had not touched her face, and he hadn’t had the courage to look past the blood that had soaked her clothing. Just to look at her pale face had been hard enough. It had seemed to be coated with thin, white wax, and without Vileria’s spirit to animate it, it hadn’t seemed to be hers. It could have belonged to a thousand other women. For one impossible moment, Thran had thought that perhaps there had been a mistake, and someone else had died, and Vileria had just been lost in the confusion of the wrecked train station.

But it had been her wedding ring on her right hand, and her favorite pearl earrings in her ears, and her silver swan charm on its braided chain around her neck that he had given her the first time she’d danced Odette after Legolas had been born.

In tears, he’d removed her jewelry gently, then hugged and kissed her for the last time. Then he’d returned to Legolas.

His son had not spoken for several weeks after the accident, and worry for his small, blond son had shoved Thran’s grief for Vileria aside. The knot in his stomach had not diminished, nor had the lump in his throat receded when he had scanned Legolas’s blank face...

That knot, that lump... he felt them now when he looked at his husband and his children. Months had passed before Legolas had finally come out of his silence and cried for his mother. How many... months would pass this time before the threat from an angry child was no more?

Seven years ago, Thran had danced despite his worry for his son. He’d argued and fought and demanded until he and Legolas had been granted the right to emigrate from Russia to this country, no matter how badly he’d wanted only to hold his son in his arms. He had found a place to live, a company to dance for, a babushka to help with Legolas, a maid. He had done all these things no matter the knot in his stomach, or the lump in his throat. He had even more to look forward to now, with his family, his ballet, his company. So fuck the knot and the lump – he would dance.

If he had the good fortune to lay his hands on Lance Dunmont again, this time he would do much more than kick him into a tree.

The company continued its practice, running through the second battle where Luka’s Soldier fell, and his Death left Charisse’s Maid to despair outside the locked gates of the Underworld. He forced himself to notice that the black and white projections on the walls of the set added much more depth than he’d expected. He paid strict attention to Irmo’s direction. He supplicated Death to grace each of his steps with His power...

His concentration vanished when Ori walked down the aisle with three people behind him. Even from this distance, he immediately recognized Ori’s companions as professional bodyguards. The first was a tall, rugged white man with a military crew cut to match his erect, disciplined carriage; the second was a shorter, muscular black man with hair as closely cropped as his male colleague; the third was a tall, wiry black woman with hair trimmed in a two-inch, impeccably-shaped corona. There was nothing cocky or ostentatious about them, but their expertise was so obvious – the balanced carriage, the swift assessment of surroundings, the quiet confidence of expert fighters... and a certain finality in their gaze. All three wore black clothing – innocuous polo shirts, neat black chinos, and black specialty athletic shoes with thin soles – parkour shoes, perhaps. They followed Ori slowly down to where Bard and the children sat watching the rehearsal, and Ori gestured, clearly introducing his three companions to Bard and the children.

As soon as the scene ended, he ignored Irmo to join his family.

“Good,” Ori nodded, when Thran came towards him. He indicated the woman, the black man, then the white man. “Thran, this is Charmeine Adofo, Gavreel Agyenim, and Michael Kushiel. They’re here to look after you and yours for a bit. Charmeine, Gavreel, Mike, this is Thran Oropherson, executive director and principal dancer of the UltraViolet Ballet Company.”

“Mr. Oropherson,” Gavreel murmured in a deep voice as he leaned forward to shake Thran’s hand. He had a firm grip, a calloused hand, and was clearly the man in charge.

“Mr. Agyenim,” Thran responded, shaking the bodyguard’s strong hand firmly.

“Call me Gavreel. Easier to pronounce.”

“Then I am Thran, which is also easier to pronounce.”

“Hello, Thran. Charmeine.”

“Charmeine.”

“Hi, Thran. I’m Mike.”

“Mike.”

“Charmeine, Gavreel, and Mike are very highly skilled and will look after you very well,” Ori said, smiling encouragingly. “I’ve given them the details of what we’re dealing with. They’ll escort you home, take a look at things for you, and offer some advice as well look out for you.”

Irmo chose that moment to bark at Thran. Ori slid his eyes to the choreographer, then back to Thran.

You need to go home with your family, Ori’s look meant.

For the second time in his life, Thran conceded to something other than the dance. He turned to Irmo and walked towards the stage.

“Something calls my attention, Irmo. I will see you here tomorrow.”

He ignored Irmo’s irate protest, and turned back to his family.

“I’ll explain it to him,” Ori said.

“Thank you, Ori,” he patted the young man’s shoulder gratefully. “Please convey my apologies to le maestro.”

He found his bag in where he’d left it in the seats near the stairs, and returned to his family. The three bodyguards murmured briefly, then Charmeine and Mike went up the stairs onto the stage and disappeared behind the scenery, paying no attention to the agitated Irmo as they went. Gavreel beckoned to him and his family, and they followed him up the aisle towards the lobby.

It was far from a grand procession, but it was a weighty one.

* * *

Life turned surreal. A trio of avenging angels walked down the aisle of the children’s school auditorium and took charge of Bard, his husband, and their children with grave courtesy, but also calm expertise. Mike and Gavreel were as big as any bar bouncers that Bard had ever seen, but both of them carried themselves like soldiers of long and probably clandestine experience. Neither would have looked out of place in combat fatigues and bristling with weapons. Charmeine was probably from the same background, but her poise was more deceptive. She was the chameleon of the three, able to put aside the men’s military bearing to appear like any other civilian, albeit a tall, athletic one. Mike and Gavreel might be the ones with the obvious automatic pistols at their backs, but another one hid discreetly under the tail of Charmeine’s untucked polo.

“Wait here, please,” Gavreel murmured in a low, courteous voice when they reached the exit doors, then slipped into the lobby. Seconds later, he stuck his head back into the auditorium and beckoned them after him. When they came into the lobby, Mike and Charmeine were there, looking out into the parking lot.

“Which cars are yours?” Gavreel asked.

“Mine’s the blue pickup in the fourth row,” Bard replied. “Thran’s is the silver SUV in the front.”

Gavreel gave his colleagues a look, and they slipped outside.

“What’re they doing?” Tilda whispered, peering under Legolas’s shoulder.

“Casing the parking lot, I imagine,” Sigrid replied. She looked very calm for a girl who had an angry, vindictive teenager after her. At Tilda’s confused expression, Sigrid relented. “Don’t worry, Til. They’re just making sure that we’ll be safe going to the cars, that’s all.”

“Oh,” Tilda nodded. “Good. I don’t want to see Lance Dunmont for anything.”

Gavreel remained impassive, intent on his colleagues looking over the lot. At length, he glanced at Bard.

“They’ve found nothing of the boy, and nothing seems to have been tampered with. If the young ladies would ride with Thran, and the young gentlemen with Bard, we would appreciate it,” Gavreel asked in the same courteous voice, so the family separated as requested. Gavreel saw the girls into the back of Thran’s SUV, then took the passenger seat beside Thran. Charmeine waited for the boys to climb into the back seat of Bard’s pickup, then hopped in beside Bard. Mike got into a nondescript beige sedan.

“Let Thran and Gavreel go first, please,” Charmeine directed, so Bard waited for Thran to pull out of the lot before he followed him.

“How did you decide how to divide us up?” Bard asked, when he could contain his curiosity no more.

Charmeine kept her eyes on the SUV in front of them. “The back windows of the SUV are tinted, so it is hard to see if anyone is in the back seat. Your daughters are the most vulnerable, so we placed them there to offer them the most protection. Your husband is also the most vulnerable of you two, and Gavreel is the obvious deterrent.”

“So what are we, chump change?” Bain snarked.

“Bain,” Bard warned, glancing back at his son in the rear view mirror.

“Sorry.” Bain gave Legolas a look, who returned it with commiseration.

Charmeine laugh was light and amused as she looked in the side view mirror, watching to see who followed them. “We are innocuous. We do not call attention to ourselves. We hide in plain sight.”

“Um, you don’t look like a bodyguard,” Legolas ventured apologetically.

Charmeine turned around to give Legolas a smile. “Thank you. That’s the nicest compliment I can get on the job.”

“Really?” Legolas stuttered, eyebrows almost to his hairline.

“Sure. While everyone looks at big, obvious Mike and big, obvious Gavreel, they don’t see me. That’s exactly the way I want it. I can take better care of you when people don’t even know I’m here.”

That spoke of layers upon layers of something Bard knew nothing about. Even the boys seemed to realize they were out of their depth, and subsided into silence with an exchange of subdued looks. Charmeine glanced at Bard long enough to wink, then went back to her careful study of everything around them. Despite the seriousness of the situation, Bard smothered a small smile, and drove the rest of the way home in silence.

As they turned down the lane to the house, Charmeine glanced at Bard once again. “When we reach your home, would you please stay in the truck until we take a look around?”
The politely worded question wasn’t really a question, but a direction. Bard nodded in concession.
“Of course. Do you want me to park down from the house, or pull right into the driveway?”

“Into the driveway, please. We haven’t been followed, and if the boy doesn’t know where you live, he won’t be here. If he knows and isn’t here, well and good. But if he knows and he’s here, we’ll find him. Let your truck idle. If any of the three of us tell you to leave, drive to the nearest police station and stay there.”

“Got it,” Bard nodded.

Ahead of him, Thran was likely getting the same instructions. He hoped Tilda wasn’t freaking out past all redemption, but at least Sigrid was there as a steadying influence. He followed Thran into the driveway, waited until Thran had turned his SUV around to point towards the lane, then maneuvered around him so that the truck was oriented similarly. Charmeine slipped out, and flitted around the back of the house on light feet. Ahead of him, Gavreel stayed in the SUV until Charmeine appeared on the roof of the house – how did she get there? – then he got out to check around the carriage house. Mike turned up in the back yard, prowling around the barn. In a few seconds, Gavreel reappeared to speak to Thran. The carriage house bay went up, and Thran backed the SUV into its spot. Bard followed him to park the truck, then he and the boys joined Thran and the girls outside the mudroom door. They went inside with a collective sigh of relief.

“We’ll check the house, then you can relax,” Gavreel said, as Charmeine went past him. She was back in a moment, nodding that all was well.

Bard checked the clock on the oven as the family trooped through the kitchen. It was after five, and as the children scattered, he turned a look on the bodyguards.

“What’s the procedure now? I’d like to feed the children. It’s been a long day for them.”

“Of course,” Gavreel nodded. “Charmeine would like to talk to each of you at some point, but she can do that after you eat.”

“You’re welcome to sit down with us,” Bard offered.

“We appreciate that, but we’ll be about our business for a bit,” Gavreel demurred.

“All right. I generally make extra of everything, so if you want a bite later, please help yourselves.”

“You’re a generous man,” Mike smiled.

“All right, troops,” Bard called. “I need a couple of sous chefs, front and center. Jambalaya tonight!”

“What can I do, Bard?” Thran asked. He looked so tired that Bard gave him a hug.

“You’re beat, so why don’t you go upstairs and shower? You’ve got twenty-five minutes before supper, so take advantage of the break.”

Thran sighed. “I would rather help you and the children, but you are right that I would appreciate the shower.”

“Then go. I’ve got this.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya,” Thran kissed Bard’s temple, and took himself upstairs.

Tilda and Bain sorted themselves out to help, so Bard got out rice, sausage, veg for stir-fry, fruit, and kale, and put them on the counter. As he worked, the bodyguards spoke lowly just out of earshot, then Charmeine slipped into the sitting room to talk to Legolas. Mike and Gavreel disappeared to prowl outside.

He wondered what Charmeine would ask the children. He’d find out soon enough when she approached him.

As he sautéed onions and red peppers for the jambalaya, Tilda and Bain talked softly, comparing notes about their three bodyguards. Tilda was impressed – and somewhat reassured – with how big the men were, and Bain described Charmeine’s comment about not wanting to stand out. Bard let them run as he concentrated on the food, because both seemed reassured that Lance would have a hard time getting past the trio. Thran reappeared looking more refreshed, so he took over the veg while Bard threw biscuits together and put them in the oven. Charmeine disappeared to join her colleagues outside before they sat down to supper, so they had at least the illusion of normalcy, but it was still a subdued affair. It had been a long, trying, frightening day, and Bard wasn’t surprised at the lack of conversation, or how quickly everyone downed the food.

Thran took charge of the cleanup, with Sigrid and Legolas in attendance. Charmeine reappeared to have a quiet word with Bain; when the boy went upstairs to play video games with Legolas, she coaxed Tilda into the sitting room to speak with her. She spent long enough with their youngest child that Bard grew concerned, and stuck his head in to check on her. To his surprise, Tilda was explaining Dinky Farm to the bodyguard, who listened attentively.

“No, it’s the other button to switch from the orchard to the apiary,” Tilda said, leaning forward to show the woman on the controller.

“Oh, I see,” Charmeine smiled. “My son’s a lot better at computer games than I am.”

“You have a son?” Tilda looked interested. “How old is he?”

“Just seven. But he’s already really good at computer games. He likes some of the Pokémon ones. I like this game better, because I don’t have to push the buttons so fast. I have time to think about what I want to do.”

“I like that, too,” Tilda nodded. “I have time to decide whether I want to pick the apples or collect the honey. Usually you have to do the apples first because they’ll spoil if you don’t get them in time. The honey keeps longer in the hive. But sometimes I like to think about whether I should start another orchard or buy sheep, too.”

“Looks like you sucked Charmeine into your favorite game, Tilda,” Bard said, coming into the room. “Be careful, Charmeine. Tilda’s the resident queen of the bees.”

Charmeine’s smile was warm. “So I’ve learned. Very good, indeed, Tilda. Perhaps I can play again sometime? I’d like to speak with your dad now.”

“That’d be nice,” Tilda nodded. Her smile faded, and she looked back at the television screen before she met Charmeine’s gaze again. “But... mostly, I hope you keep Lance away.”

Charmeine’s face remained inscrutable as she handed her controller back to Tilda, but her demeanor was kind. “I promise you that I’ll do my very best at that, Tilda.”

“He has a gun now, Miss Charmeine. If he shoots at you, will you shoot him?”

“I won’t let him harm you,” Charmeine replied.
“Okay. Thank you.”

“You’re welcome. I enjoyed your game.”

“I’m glad. I’ll go upstairs so you can talk to Da.”

Tilda went to put down her game controller, but Bard held up his hand. “That’s okay, little doll. Keep playing your game. Charmeine and I can talk in the main room. Maybe you can get Thran or Sigrid to play with you until we’re done.”

“Okay, Da,” Tilda leaned back on the sofa. “Thank you.”

“You’re welcome.” Bard held his hand out towards the hallway, so Charmeine rose from her seat. She offered Tilda an encouraging smile before she followed Bard.

“Oh, I forgot that there’s no lamp in here,” Bard said as they reached the main room.

“It’s okay; there’s enough light,” Charmeine assured him, so Bard sat down on one end of Thran’s beautiful sofa. The woman perched on the other end to face him.

“The house is a work in progress,” Bard felt compelled to explain. “This is the last room we have left to do. So what can I tell you that the children haven’t already said?”

“I have a clear picture of what happened at the park, but I’d like to hear what you have to say about it,” the bodyguard asked, so Bard gave his side of the story. Charmeine then asked him to recount the events at the April Fool’s Follies, both the rehearsal night and the day of the performance. He did so, but he had nothing to add to the tale of Lance’s appearance at his art show, as he’d seen nothing of it. She had few questions about anything he said, but it seemed as if she weighed something more than merely the tales he told.

“Does this help?” Bard asked, when Charmeine continued to look thoughtful.

She cocked her head to one side. “You’re a close family. You love each other very much. That’s good and bad.”

“Good and bad?” Bard blinked. “How so?”

“You love and support each other so well – it’s obvious, even to me who’s known you for just a few minutes. That’s the good part. The bad part... Lance Dunmont desperately wants to belong to something the way you do. His family is nothing like yours, which is why he turned to the gangs looking for someplace to belong. That’s a violent, dangerous world, and he’s adopted its methods. But the harder and more violently he tries to belong to something, the more elusive it becomes, so he tries harder still. A famous scientist once defined insanity as doing the same thing twice and expecting different results.”

“Albert Einstein,” Bard said.

“That’s right. Lance's efforts haven’t worked so far, and they won’t in the future, either.”

Charmeine fell silent, then leaned forward. “You impress me as a practical, down to earth man, Bard. You seem to be the kind who wants to know what’s what. Am I right?”

Bard nodded. “Right as rain.”

Charmeine smiled briefly. “Then let me give you my assessment about what we’re up against here.”
Bard nodded again. “I guess we’re past the angry boy phase.”

“Unfortunately, that’s my guess, too. This boy is past anger, past reason. Believe it or not, he’s probably not feeling much but black despair and rage, without any hope of that changing. None of the paths open to him give him what he wants, which is regard, respect, standing. He blames your family for that, so he’s out for revenge, no matter what happens to him. He wants to take from you what you took from him. This makes him very dangerous.”

Bard blinked again. “I won’t stop loving my family, even if I could. None of us could.”

Charmeine shook her head. “No.”

“So he can’t take that from us.”

“No.”

Bard looked into those calm, compassionate eyes, and gulped as he put together what she wanted him to see. “So... if he can’t take our love for each other, then... he’ll try to hurt one of us, maybe even try to take one of us.”

Charmeine nodded. “I think so. His main target might be Sigrid, but I don’t think he’ll turn down an opportunity at any of you.”

Bard wrung a hand over his mouth. “They gave you the tough job, didn’t they? To tell me that.”

Charmeine offered a sympathetic smile and a shrug. “Someone’s got to do it.”

“Did you tell Thran this? Because I’d rather you didn’t. He’s already worried about so much, and I’d just as soon take this weight for him.”

Charmeine laced her fingers around her knee. “I haven’t. If you prefer I didn’t, then I won’t. But understand why I told you, Bard. I don’t like scaring people, I really don’t. But I want to be honest, and more than that, I want to make sure your family works with Mike, Gavreel, and me. We’re here to protect you, and there may be a time when we tell you do to something that you don’t understand, and we’ll want you to do it right that second, without hesitation, without question. So I tell you how serious this is so that you’ll do that something, right that second, without hesitation, without question.”

Bard nodded. “Okay. I understand. I’ll make sure the children know to do whatever you ask. Thran, too, though I expect he already knows that. And I’ll follow orders, too.”

“I appreciate that. Your children have had a tough day, so we’ll talk tomorrow morning with you about your schedules, and how we can best cover them. For tonight, here are the things I want you to do to help us out.”

Charmeine said many of the common sense things that Bard expected – stay away from the windows, don’t go outside at night, keep the security system active, keep an eye out for anything strange or unusual, keep an ear primed for odd noises, don’t answer the door without looking to see who was outside first.

Bard nodded at the instructions. “We’ll do all of that. But just for the record, the children come first, all right? If something happens, you take care of them before me. And you take care of Thran before me, too. The children first, then Thran, then me. Please.”

Charmeine smiled. “You’re very predictable, Bard.”
“Maybe so,” Bard took a deep breath. “No apologies.”

“None required.” Charmeine got to her feet. “I’ll leave you and yours in peace now. Please lock the door behind me, and arm your security system. We’ll watch over things from outside.”

“Thank you,” Bard murmured.

Behind him, the front door opened as Charmeine went outside. He stayed where he was, trying to find a sense of normalcy, without success. He sat so long that Thran came to find him, peering into the lightless main room.

“Bard? Lyubov moya?”

“In here,” Bard murmured. Gods, he’d better get himself in hand. He didn’t want to add any more upset to Thran’s state of mind.

The tall dancer sat beside Bard and took his hand to massage it gently. He sighed deeply. “I am no more settled.”

Bard’s hum was deep, barely audible, but he didn’t know what to say that wouldn’t make Thran worry. He looped an around Thran’s shoulders and hugged him close. If he couldn’t think of anything to say, at least he could let his body convey his affection.

“This is all so... unnerving,” Thran confessed at last.

Bard snorted. “That’s an understatement.”

Thran stroked Bard’s thigh and sighed. “I have a terrible confession to make.”

“Oh?” Bard gave Thran a look. “About what?”

“I told Charmeine that if a situation arose, the children were more important than me, and even you. I hope you can forgive me.”

Bard laughed softly. “I volunteered the same thing. So I hope you can forgive me, too.”

“Neither of us have anything to forgive.”

“No.”

They sat together in the twilight. There was nothing more to say.
Chapter 147

Chapter Summary

When a saint works his magic, both an angel and a cherub try to reveal the man behind the curtain. Only one is successful.

Chapter Notes

As usual, I still don’t own any rights to Harry Potter, but I do appreciate how useful his adventures are to calm Clan Ffyrnig’s fears.

Thran and his husband sat silently in the dark, but it didn’t prevent the children from finding them. One by one, they ventured into the main room to settle around their fathers. Tilda was first, of course, burrowing between them to link her arms with both of theirs. The boys were next, Bain settling beside Bard and Legolas beside Thran. Finally Sigrid came in and sat on the floor between her fathers, draping Tilda’s legs over her shoulders and wrapping her arms around them.

“I’m still going to work tomorrow,” Sigrid said into the silence. “One of those bodyguards will just have to sit in the bistro all morning.”

Bard shifted beside Thran. “I should have asked Charmeine about that. When she talked to me, I was too... flustered to think about it.”

Flustered? Bard was never flustered.

Suka blyad, Thran. The angry teenager who threatened our family now has a gun. How could that not fluster him?

When something threatened Bard’s family, he didn’t get flustered. He got angry. Very, very angry.

“They can’t expect us to hide in the house all day,” Sigrid persisted. “What about next week, when all our camps start? What about Ada’s ballet, and your sculpture, Da? We can’t stop living. We’ll kill each other if we have to hide in here for the foreseeable future.”

Bard stirred beside Thran again, but this time, it was to swiftly lay a hand on Bain’s thigh. The boy had likely been about to blurt something ill advised, something that would frighten Tilda, such as Lance will kill us if we go outside, too.

Thran didn’t want to hear that any more than Tilda did. The knot in his stomach was already painful.

“We’ll see what our guardian angels have to say tomorrow morning,” Bard said. “But no matter what they tell us, I want all of you to be on your best behavior with Miss Charmeine, Mister Gavreel, and Mister Mike. They’re here to take care of us, so it’s important that we listen to them, and do exactly what they say, right away. Not just you children, but Thran and me, too. Does everyone understand that?”
A murmur of agreement went around the sofa.

“There are a couple of things they’ve asked us to do tonight to help them. We don’t have curtains, so don’t stand in front of the windows. Please stay in the house, too – tonight is not the time for a midnight stroll around the yard. If you see or hear anything odd, tell Thran or me right away, so we can get our guardian angels on it. I’ve got their numbers programmed into everyone’s mobile, so if you can’t find us, call one of them.”

“Are they going to be outside all night, Da?” Bain asked.

“That’s what they said,” Bard nodded.

“I’m scared,” Tilda said in a very small voice.

“They’ve got guns, Til,” Bain said, thinking that would reassure his sister. “Lance may have one, but I’ll bet he doesn’t know how to use it, but Miss Charmeine, Mister Mike, and Mister Gavreel sure do. And they have better guns, too. So we’ll be okay.”

“I’m still scared. I don’t like guns,” Tilda said.

“It’s okay to be scared,” Bard said quietly, putting a hand on Bain’s shoulder to head off a debate.
“And it’s okay not to like guns. They’re just tools, and people can do good or bad with them just like they can with a lot of other things. I don’t think our three guardian angels are going to run around the house shooting at anything, Tilda. They’d rather catch Lance without any shooting. But the important thing is that we have Charmeine, Gavreel, and Mike to watch out for us, and we have our security system, and we have all of us. Those are all good.”

“I guess so,” Tilda ventured.

“I have an idea,” Bard said. “Who’s already gotten a shower?”

“I have,” Thran volunteered.

No one else had.

“So why don’t we all cycle through, then we’ll pile into our bed and read Harry Potter until we fall asleep?”

“What if we don’t fall asleep?” Legolas asked.

“I bet we do.”

“What, all in the same bed?” Bain seemed dubious.

“Why not?” Bard shrugged. “It’ll be like camping, except indoors. Just the kind of camping you like, Thran.”

Despite his upset stomach, Thran grinned. “It is. This is a good idea, Bard.”

“Can I bring my torch?” Tilda asked.

“Sure. Then it’ll really be like camping,” Bard encouraged. “Come on. Everybody upstairs. I’ll grab the book.”

The novelty of Bard’s suggestion had everyone intrigued, so the children followed Bard upstairs without much urging. As Thran opened the doors of their bedroom wide, Bard got Tilda started on her shower, then ducked inside the master bathroom for his scrub. Thran had just plumped the pillows on their bed against the headboard when Tilda appeared in her sleep shirt.

“Ah, Tilda, there you are!” Thran said lightly. “I need your help. We need many more pillows for all of us. And remember to bring Mr. Bun, if you would like him to hear about Harry.”

“Ooh! Okay! I'll be right back.” Tilda disappeared again. She returned with both of her bed pillows, Mr. Bun, and a small yellow torch. She plunked them in bed and climbed in. “Did you remember the book?”

“Your Da has it right here,” Thran reached over to Bard’s nightside table to retrieve the book. “See, here is the bookmark where we stopped last time.”

“I want to see.”

Tilda took the book from Thran and perused it until Bard came out of the shower dressed in tee and shorts. He rubbed a towel over his head, grinning to see Tilda already beside Thran. Once he hung up his towel, he flopped down at the foot of the bed to kiss Tilda’s hair.

“I think someone forgot to comb her hair,” he gave her a questioning look. “Did Mr. Bun forget to remind you?”

“No, I forgot all on my own,” Tilda sighed.

“Go get your comb and brush, then. I'll do it for you.”

“Maybe Ada would make me one of those fishtail braids?” Tilda asked, glancing at Thran.

“Maybe Ada would,” Thran nodded.

“Goodie!” Tilda ran out again. Before she returned, both of the boys came in, but she called to them from the landing. “No, you need pillows! Lots of pillows! Go get some!”

The boys reappeared with armloads of their bed pillows as well as Sigrid’s, which were duly added to the heap. By the time Sigrid appeared, the Indonesian bed had turned into a fort with a ring of pillows around the edges.

“What happened to my bed pillows?” Sigrid asked, combing her hair. “Oh, I see they’ve been conscripted. Be right there, all.”

Sigrid squeezed into the pile, grinning at the close quarters. Thran had Tilda close beside him to complete her hair braid, and the boys had commandeered the middle. Sigrid and Bard lounged at the foot.

“Oh, forgot something important,” Bard said, as Tilda opened the book again where they’d stopped reading last time. He climbed out of bed, ran downstairs, and returned with tins of cookies.

“The children made these this afternoon, so it seems fitting that we sample them to make sure they’re okay while we read,” Bard said, handing one of the tins to Thran.

“Three kinds of cookies?” Thran questioned, as the children oohed over the treats. He chose one from the nearest tin. “Our house has become a test kitchen for a cookie company, it seems. What are these?”

“Those are molasses hermits,” Legolas told his father. “I made those. Bain made vanilla brownies, and Tilda made lemon bars."

"Wow, the hermits are great, Legs," Sigrid said through a mouthful. "Can I read first?"

Tilda passed the book to Sigrid, and soon everyone settled to hear the latest development in Harry’s adventures. As one after the other read a few pages, the mode turned from nervousness to something calmer. The novelty of indulging in sweets despite the late hour was also roundly embraced, and a lot of crumbs ended up scattered across the sheets. They ended up reading two long chapters rather than their usual one. By the time the second chapter drew to a close, Tilda was asleep.

"I’m off to bed," Sigrid yawned, gathering up her pillows. "I have to get up to go to the bistro tomorrow. And I know Miss Charmeine’s going to take me, Da, because I told her when I talked to her that I wasn’t going to let that dickwad cost me my job."

"We’ll see what the morning brings, sweetness," Bard said in a comfortable voice. "If they think it’s okay, and one of them will stay with you, then I think it’s okay. I’ll get up with you to see how it falls out."

"Okay," Sigrid agreed, leaning over to kiss Bard goodnight. She clambered over Bain to bestow a kiss on Thran’s cheek. ‘Night, Da; night, Ada. I’ll see you in the morning.’

"Night, sweetness; night, lioness,” the men replied, and Sigrid offered them a wave as she headed for her room. “Leave your door open if you want.”

"Okay, Da," she murmured, and vanished into her room.

The boys were next, sleepily munching one last cookie apiece as they debated whether to camp out in Legolas’s room or Bain’s for the night. Thran and his husband sent them on their way, and put the tops on the tins to keep the last few cookies from getting stale.

"So many crumbs," Thran observed, for the sheet was well sprinkled.

Grinning, Bard tried to corral as many crumbs as he could so he could sweep them into the bathroom wastebasket. “This would be a lot easier if there weren’t a sleeping child planted firmly in the middle of the bed.”

Tilda was the child planted firmly in the middle of the bed, with her yellow torch lying beside her.

"We could leave her where she is,” Thran offered, brushing a crumb from her cheek.

"We could. But I think I’ll try to get her into her own bed," Bard replied. “She gets a pass on the toothbrush tonight.”

He eased Tilda into his arms. Thran nestled the yellow torch in Tilda’s lap, and Bard bore her out of their bedroom and into hers. While he was gone, Thran got most of the cookie crumbs into the wastebasket, and set the cookie tins on his dresser. He went into the bathroom to brush his teeth, where Bard soon joined him.

"She didn’t stir, but I’ll leave the doors open anyway, just in case.”

"A wise move,” Thran agreed.

"The boys are in Legolas’s room, booping and beeping away, as Sigrid would say. I asked them to keep it down, and not stay up too late, but between you and me, if they do stay up, it’s okay.”
“True.”

“I’ll just say goodnight to Sig, then I’ll be in.”

“You just want me to be the one to clean up all the crumbs.”

Bard chuckled. “And a good job you’ll make of it, too, funny dancer. Back in a tick.”

Thran waved a hand as he brushed his teeth, so Bard disappeared.

It was too easy to imagine what his husband would say to their oldest child.

* * *

“Sweetness?” Bard stuck his head inside Sigrid’s room. His daughter had laid out her bistro tee and shorts for the morning, and was getting into bed.

“I knew you’d show up sooner or later,” she said.

“So here I am. Thanks for putting on such a brave front for the other children, especially Tilda.”

“You’re welcome. But I know why you’re really here. You want to caution me not to be too cocky about this, and not to go looking for trouble, and no job’s worth leaving myself open to that dickwad.”

“So I am. I’m also here to tell you that I don’t really know what the right thing to do is, other than to listen to Charmeine, Gavreel, and Mike. They’re the experts; we’re not. If they think that going to work tomorrow is too dangerous, then I’ll respect that decision, and I don’t want you to think that I won’t.”

Sigrid’s businesslike expression disappeared, and a combination of resignation, exasperation, and uncertainty replaced it. She crossed her legs under her and held her hands wide. “I don’t know what the right thing to do is, either. Maybe going about our usual stuff is bad. But staying at home might be worse, because we’d all be here, and if Lance finds out where we live and shows up when we’re all here, he’d have a go at all of us, even Tilda. Isn’t it better to spread out the risk? And the police know whom to look for, so he won’t exactly be able to show his face around the village, would he? Wouldn’t it be better for me to be there, and away from the rest of you? It’s me he’s after.”

Bard sat down beside her, and took her hand. “What did Charmeine say to you tonight? Because I bet you said all of this to her.”

“Of course I did. I told her I felt awful for bringing this down on us because of what I did in the park that day. This is my fault.”

“First off, this is not your fault, sweetness. It was Lance’s fault, because of what he did in the park that day. Second off, all of us, even Tilda, would have done just what you did when he, Manny, and Jinks went after Legolas. We wouldn’t have left Legs to get beaten up, would we? In fact, we didn’t. Third off, if Manny hadn’t run off to drag in Angelo and his goon, this would’ve just blown over. Things might’ve been a little edgy for a while, and we might still have moved here when we did. So don’t shoulder the blame. That’s my habit, I know, but you don’t need to take after your old Da in that regard.”
“There are worse things than taking after my old Da,” Sigrid riposted, but her smile was soft. “Okay, this isn’t my fault. But I still don’t know what to do about it.”

“What did Charmeine say?”

“She said I was really smart, but she was sure I knew that. But she also said she was inclined to enjoy a good cup of coffee in the morning, and that if I knew where she could find one, we’d go check it out.”

“What else?”

“She wanted to know everything I knew about Lance, so I gave her the full dossier. Some of it was hearsay around school, and I told her that. But it’s no secret that he’s a bully, and I told her that, too. With examples.”

Sigrid heaved a huffy exhale and tried to look annoyed. But Bard gave her a look, and she grimaced. “Yes, Da, I’m scared. If you tell the boys, I’ll hate you forever.”

Bard smiled. “I won’t tell the boys.”

“And you just can’t tell Tilda. She’ll die. And you can’t tell Ada, either. He’s already too overloaded.”

“I won’t tell them, either.”

“Well...” Sigrid swallowed, and ventured a glance at Bard. “Since you’re the keeper of secrets, I’ll tell you what scares me the most.”

“Okay.”

“Lance is a coward. I’ve been in his face twice now, and made him look bad, so he’ll want to pay me back, just like he said. But what if he does it like the coward he is, and decides to hit me indirectly? What if he goes after Tilda? Or tries to mess up Ada’s ballet?”

Bard exhaled. This was exactly what Charmeine had told him earlier this evening, albeit in different words. “I worry about that, too. Which is why we don’t have one bodyguard to look after you and you alone. We have three to look after all of us.”

Sigrid swallowed, but nodded. “Lance will think two or three times before he tackles any of them.”

“Maybe four. Especially Mike. He’s big enough to break any of us in half just with a look.”

“Gods, yes,” Sigrid snorted, then she relented and put her arms around Bard. “Poor Da. You have to be the strong one for the rest of us wimps.”

“There aren’t any wimps in Clan Ffyrnig, sweetness. Maybe we’re scared, but we’re strong. We’ll get through this.”

“I know. I’m still sorry you have to keep the stiff upper lip for everyone.” She disentangled herself from Bard to hold out her fist. “Here. I can’t take it all the way you do for me, but I can at least commiserate.”

Chuckling, Bard bumped his fist against hers. “A kind offer, gratefully received. So better get to sleep, sweetness, or you’ll be too tired for anything but one of Miss Dís’s quadruple espressos.”

“Oh, gods, I’d bounce off the walls for a week,” Sigrid chortled. “You’d better go to bed, too. Ada’s “stomach is likely in a terrible knot, so go calm him down.”

“Yes, ma’am,” Bard grinned, kissing Sigrid’s cheek. “Does Finn know what a lioness he’s dating?”

“Entirely. Oh, I didn’t call him. Can I?”

“Would you save it for tomorrow, please? Let things settle a bit, and see what’s what before you get your knight in shining armor all upset.”

“Oh.” Sigrid agreed, somewhat to Bard’s surprise. “I’m beat, to be honest, and it’d take me an hour to calm that doofus down.”

“Sounds like he’s not that much of a doofus.”

Sigrid’s expression turned sweet. “I guess he isn’t. He’s moving out to Killian’s this week, he said. He said he’d gotten a job out here, but I don’t know what it is yet. And he will be in school in the fall.”

“That’s great, sweetness. So off to bed, yeah?”

“Okay, Da. I love you.”

“I love you too, Sig. See you in the morning.”

Bard gave Sigrid’s hair a gentle tug, then waved goodnight before he went back to his bedroom. Thran was still picking crumbs off the sheets, drawing Bard’s low chuckle.

“You’ve probably recovered enough crumbs to make at least two cookies.”

“Not quite,” his husband brushed a few more into the wastebasket. “I found a breeding colony under our pillows, and had to start anew.”

“Looks like you’ve got everything. I’ll get out the vacuum tomorrow and give everything a good once over.”

“We will haul the rug down to the porch and shake it.”

“If we got a pet brush, we could pretend the rug is an angora goat or an afghan hound, only flat.”

“Tcha, next you will think it needs a flea collar.”

“If it does, then so do most of us. The amount of hair we shed is alarming.”

Thran’s chuckle was unforced, so perhaps Bard’s gambit with reading and eating cookies in bed had eased him as well as the children. He took the wastebasket Thran handed him and returned it to the bathroom, brushed his teeth, and came to bed to find Thran already stretched out. He’d stripped his tee, but still had on the soft knitted shorts he kept at the side of the bed in case of nighttime guests. Bard followed suit, dropping his tee beside the bed, but leaving his shorts in place. He turned off the nightside table lamp, climbed into bed, and nestled Thran close.

“Lyubov moya?” Thran’s voice whispered into the dark.

“Hmm?” Bard rumbled, stoking Thran’s arm stretched across his chest.

“You said that when you talked to Charmeine, you were too flustered to ask her whether Sigrid should go to the bistro tomorrow. That is not like you.”
Bard winced. Thran had caught his momentary lapse. “I’ve never been in a situation that required bodyguards before.”

“True.” Thran’s fingers traced slow circles over Bard’s chest.

“Have you?”

“A few times. Mostly when I was on tour with Mariinsky. It was more to keep the dancers away from too much conversation with foreigners, than to keep anyone away from us. Our guardians were not nearly so personable as Charmeine, Mike, and Gavreel, either.”

Bard chuckled understanding. “I imagine not.”

A silence followed. Bard shut his eyes, but didn’t expect that the conversation was over. Thran continued to rub his chest slowly, but he didn’t exhale the way he usually did when he was ready to sleep, nor did he snuggle in the last little bit.

“Come on, angel. Out with it,” he said at last.

“No crumbs. Don’t make me wait for the other shoe to drop. What’s on your mind?”

“There are no shoes in our bed for me to drop.”

“You’re not as ignorant of American idioms as you’d like me to believe, you know. Just tell me what’s on your mind.”

Thran sighed. “You are a very suspicious man.”

“I know when my husband has something on his mind he wants to talk about. So spit it out.”

“Tcha, my saint. You are also a very rude man. I do not spit in bed.”

“Thran,” Bard warned.

“All right, all right. I still consider the word... flustered. You are not a man who flusters.”

“So you say.”

“So I know. If you do not want me to be evasive, then you should not be, either.”

“How can I be evasive? I don’t have any idea what you want to talk about, do I?”

“Oh, my saint, you know very well. You are not flustered, I think. So what are you, and why did you tell the children that you were flustered instead?”

Damn it, Thran, don’t ask what you don’t want to know. And don’t ask me enough that I have to tell a lie, either.

“Bard...”

“I was flustered,” Bard replied. “That’s no lie, Thran.”

“If you say so. I say you were something else.”

“Okay, smart ass. Tell me what I was.”
“I would say you were frightened, which would be sensible. I am frightened, too, if not enough to dash madly about like the chicken without its head I hear so much of. But I would also say you were angry about the stupid boy who does not leave well enough alone. That would be something you would not want to tell me or the children.”

Bard kept his eyes shut, and absolutely did not think about just how angry he was – no, how angry he might be. “You’ve seen me angry, angel, to my regret.”

“It was for a good reason. This is for a much better reason.”

“I can see how you’d think that.”

“I can see how you’d think that. Just tell me if I am right or not.”

“I’m not angry right this second. It wouldn’t solve anything. It wouldn’t help anything. Better I keep my head on straight for now. So if you want a word to describe my mood, try watchful. The only thing I can do right now that makes sense is to watch out for us, so that’s what I’ll do. If that changes, you’ll be the first to know.”

Bard kept his breathing slow and deep, and his muscles relaxed. To his utter relief, Thran snuggled in that last little bit, and sighed as he adjusted his head on Bard’s shoulder.

“You are a terrible liar, lyubov moya.”

Bard grinned. “I did not tell you one single lie, cariad.”

“Were you raised Catholic in Wales? If so, you know the difference between a sin of commission, and a sin of omission.”

“Sorry to disappoint you. Mam was Church of Wales, which is Anglican, if you must know, and Da was nothing, and I’m nothing right along after him. So no distinction of sins taught here.”

Thran hummed. “Ah. You keep something from me so that I will not worry. But now that I know that, I will worry anyway.”

Bard grumbled low in his throat. “Fucking hell, Thran. Now you’re making me worry about you worrying, which is more than ridiculous. We’ve got enough on our plates without anyone making up stuff to add. So yes, I was flustered, yes, I am worried, no, I am not angry right this second, but yes, I am exasperated at my husband for being such a pain. If you don’t cut it out, I’ll have to suck your cock or something until you think about something else.”

“You do not have to suck my cock. Sadly, we are both too tired for that, and neither of us is in the mood,” Thran sighed, unperturbed at Bard’s exasperation. “What we both need is closeness, and that we have, if you would let us enjoy it. I do not understand why you have such an urge to talk so much before we sleep.”

Bard snorted but quietly. “Cast it however you want, silly dancer. But I’ll second the therapeutic benefits of a good snuggle any day. So I’ll hush if you will.”

Bard pressed a firm kiss on Thran’s hair and urged him closer. Though Thran didn’t speak, his body conveyed how widely he smiled as he settled into Bard’s arms.

Thank the gods that his mother had never taught Bard about sins, whether commission or omission, so he’d been honest about that to Thran. Still, he knew the difference. If he had to resort to a little evasion about what he was worried about, then so be it. Thran had too much to worry about already, and he didn’t need to share Sigrid and Bard’s worry about how devious Lance might be when he struck at Clan Ffyrnig.

Lance would strike. If not tomorrow, then one day soon. Better Bard worry about that than Thran.

If anger simmered in Bard’s heart along the way, so be it.
Chapter 148

Chapter Summary

A saint has a trying day.

Chapter Notes

I wanted to post today because despite no matter how difficult transitions of power are, they can't keep me from writing. Stay strong, all.

Amazingly, no one got up in the middle of the night. The first inkling Bard had of anything was when piano music whispered faintly from his clock radio. Blindly, he stretched out a hand to switch the music off, then lay still to see if Thran would stir. He didn’t. Once Bard was sure that his husband remained asleep, he eased from the bed to visit the bathroom. Necessities, a little water over the face to wash the sleep out of his eyes, two big glasses of water to start the day off right... He snared his tee from beside the bed and his mobile from the nightside table, and eased out to the landing. He got the pocket doors closed without any indication that Thran had roused, and tiptoed downstairs to the kitchen. He filled the kettle and set it on the stove, then he delved in the pantry for the box of dried porridge and the cinnamon, and the fridge for the almond milk and raisins. The porridge and some water went into a bowl, then that went into the microwave –

His mobile chirped. He pulled it out to find a text message from Charmeine.

Good morning, Bard. How is Sigrid today?

His oldest daughter came into the kitchen with her bistro tee on and a determined look in her eyes. Bard smothered a wry grin and typed back an answer.

We don’t call her the lioness without reason

Then we need to talk. May I join you?

The teakettle awaits your attendance

LOL!

Bard pointed to the cabinet. “Charmeine’s on her way in. Would you get her a cup for tea, please?”

Sigrid grimaced, but she nodded obediently and reached into the cabinet for a mug. “Okay, Da.”

“Thanks, sweetness.” Bard ambled to the mudroom, switched off the security system, and opened the door. There stood Charmeine in a fresh blue polo shirt. “Good morning, Charmeine. Porridge, or eggs?”

A smile suffused the woman’s face. “It’s good of you to offer, Bard, but I’ve had breakfast. I’ll take you up on the tea, though.”
“Right this way. Sig, show Charmeine the tea so she can choose some for herself.”

“Okay, Da. Hi, Miss Charmeine. We’ve got several kinds, so it might take you a while.”

“Goodness, yes,” Charmeine nodded at the several containers of various flavors. “Impressive. But this one looks like a good morning tonic. Thanks.”

Bard poured steaming water into the three mugs, and the trio sat down at the table. Of course, Sigrid was the one to broach the conversation.

“I want to go to work this morning, Miss Charmeine. I don’t want that dickwad to think I’m scared of him.”

“I know you don’t, Sigrid,” Charmeine conceded with a shrug. The shrug alone told Bard how this conversation would go, but he said nothing. Better the professional talked sense to his fierce daughter than him – Sigrid would just dismiss what he said out of a parent’s urge to protect his child.

“Uh-oh,” Sigrid sat back in her chair looking betrayed. “I thought you said you’d go with me, and everything would be okay.”

“I said I’d check it out first, and if it checked out, then maybe we’d go. You see, Sigrid, there’s more at stake here than just you and an angry boy. If he’d just run away from his school, that would be one thing – not a very good thing, but a runaway is not nearly so dangerous as an armed robber who beat his victim unconscious and is now in possession of a firearm. That means he can cut a lot wider swath than just an unarmed runaway.”

Sigrid bit her bottom lip, and her eyes dropped to her lap.

“The chance may be remote that Lance Dunmont knows where you work, Sigrid. The chance may be remote that he’d be foolish enough to come into Greenwood Dale on the Lake during daylight hours when so many people could identify him, too. But he hasn’t behaved so wisely so far, so we have to consider what happens if he comes into the Blue Mountain Bistro with that gun. He could hurt many more than just you – your colleagues, the patrons, the people on the street. And what about your boss, Dís Durin? If she knows someone’s after you – and believe me, she knows, because I talked to her – and someone gets hurt, and then someone decides to take her to court over it, she could lose her business, and that’s a terrible price to pay.”

Sigrid looked so downcast that Bard’s throat tightened in sympathy. But Charmeine was right. He offered the bodyguard a sympathetic look – she really had gotten the short end of this duty, having to deliver so much bad news.

“So we can do this the easy way, which means you won’t go to work because you won’t put so many people in harm’s way. Or we can do this the hard way, which means I tell you that you won’t go to work because I won’t put so many people in harm’s way.”

Sigrid gulped. “This is so unfair.”

Charmeine nodded. “It is. Lance Dunmont has caused so many people so much trouble, and he’s thrown away every chance everyone’s given him. He has been and continues to be supremely unfair.”

Sigrid cast Bard a look, but he wouldn’t discount a word of Charmeine’s explanation. “Charmeine’s absolutely right about how unfair this is, sweetness. It’s not fair that you have to bear the brunt of it. But I know you don’t want to put anyone else at risk.”
“You’re right. I don’t,” Sigrid gave a heavy sigh. “But now I’ve left Miss Dís hanging for today. She doesn’t know I’m not coming in.”

“She knows,” Charmeine admitted. “I talked to her last night. She was upset for you in no uncertain terms, if it’s any consolation.”

“And now she’s shorthanded, too,” Sigrid swallowed hard. “Maybe I can call Finn? He’s my boyfriend, and he said he was looking for a job. If he hasn’t gotten one yet, maybe he could fill in?
He’s kind of a doofus, but a really decent guy...”

Sigrid put her hands over her face. Bard didn’t have to see her ribs spasm in a sudden inhale before he slid over to Tilda’s chair and leaned into her shoulder.

“It’s decent for you to offer, Sig. I’m sure Miss Dís would appreciate the referral.”

“Oh, Da,” the girl whispered, ducking her head into Bard’s chest. “I wanted to make some money for college! I bet I won’t be able to take my driver’s class next week, either! That rat dickwad is ruining everything!”

“I know, sweetness,” Bard put his arms around her. “He’s not making it easy, not at all. Sometimes that’s how life goes. But you know you’ll get your driver’s class eventually, and Miss Dís will have you back as soon as she can. This isn’t forever.”

“It’s close enough,” Sigrid snarked, wiping an angry hand over her eyes. She cut a look over at Charmeine, and gulped down her upset. “I’m sorry. I know this isn’t your fault.”

“You have every reason to be angry,” Charmeine murmured sympathetically. “You’re right that it isn’t fair, and it’s messing up a lot of your plans. I can’t offer anything that changes that. But Mike, Gavreel, and I are in constant touch with the police and other authorities, and as soon as we run Lance Dunmont to ground, you can resume all the things you want to do.”

Other authorities? Hmm... was that Mr. Nori and his “associates?”

“Thank you,” Sigrid murmured. “So... what can I do? Or do I have to stay here at the house until this is over?”

“It might seem that way before all is said and done,” Charmeine shrugged frankly.

With a roll of her eyes, Sigrid sat back in her chair and crossed her arms over her chest. “Gods. It’s like being grounded, then.”

“Maybe not quite so bad,” Bard offered. “We’ll see what’s up with the rest of the clan, and go from there.”

“Okay,” Sigrid said. “I understand this is the thing to do to protect everyone else. But I hate it anyway.”

“You’re allowed,” Charmeine offered her a smile. “If you’d felt differently, I would have thought something was wrong.”

Sigrid nodded. “Okay. Thank you for being kind about it. I’m going to call Finn and see if he got that job he said he did, or if he’s still looking. At least I can try to keep this from affecting Miss Dís any more than it already has.”

“That’s fine, Sigrid,” Bard smiled. “Give him my regards.”
Sigrid went upstairs, leaving Bard and Charmeine at the table. Bard let out a long exhale.

“You really did get the short end of the stick on this job.”

Charmeine belatedly took up her tea to sip. “It’s usually my job to say such things. It’s never easy, especially when the client is a decent person who didn’t ask for any of this. I’m sorry your daughter is the one who has to bear the brunt to avoid so much possible harm.”

Bard hummed agreement. “Let’s talk about the other children. All of them, including Sigrid, start summer programs next week, all of them at the Imladris Academy. Tilda’s signed up for an art class, Bain for soccer camp, Legolas for archery camp, and Sigrid for driver’s education. Are they out of the picture, too?”

Charmeine put her elbows on the table and leaned forward. “Tilda will be inside the building, won’t she?”

Bard nodded.

“The boys will likely be outside for the most part.”

Bard nodded again.

“And your husband will be in rehearsal at the school, correct?”

Bard nodded a third time.

“Your husband and your youngest daughter will be at minimal risk, being inside a building where security will be in place. We understand completely about what’s at stake with Thran’s ballet and the upcoming festival. It may encourage you to know that the village has already put extra security around the school because so many people keep milling around the school hoping to get a glimpse of your husband and the other dancers. Because security is already in place for the festival, the school, and the ballet, my team will be in addition to that, so we can work within that to see to Thran and Tilda. The athletic fields, however, are more vulnerable. If you could switch the boys to something that remains inside the building, then that would work. If not, then they’ll have to keep Sigrid company at home.”

“What if Sigrid were in the school building, too?” Bard asked.

“We could go with that, yes,” Charmeine nodded. “In fact, having all of you in one place makes our job easier.”

“I can make it my business to be in the building, too,” Bard said. “I’ve got a standing invitation to sketch anything about Immortal, or I can volunteer to help with Tilda’s ceramics class. I volunteer once a week during the regular school term, anyway.”

“What about your studio work here?” Charmeine questioned.

Bard gave her a somber look. “In case you don’t know, I work metal – casting, welding, chemical patinas, and so forth. Some of it’s dangerous. All of it calls for concentration to do safely. If you think I can concentrate properly on those things when my mind is on my children and husband, you’re mistaken. Better that I’m with them.”

“Understood,” Charmeine nodded. “What about this week? You said the children’s camps don’t start until next week.”
“You’ll want us all to stay here, right?”
“As much as possible, yes.”
“Thran will still go to the school.”
“Understood. Mike will see to him.”
“I’ll need to go to the market at least once. The children go through a lot of food.”
“We can handle that, too.”
“Can we be outside in the yard?”
Charmeine nodded.
“Okay, I’ve got one sculpture I can work on. The boys like nothing better than to spend hours playing video games, so they’ll be good for a while. The girls could help with the sculpture if they’re inclined. Oh, what if Legolas wants to practice his archery in the yard?”
“We can go with that, sure.” Charmeine raised an eyebrow. “Is he good?”
“Near Olympic quality. We’re not talking kiddie bows and suction cup arrows here.”
“Then absolutely.”
“Can he go to his fencing lessons? He is Olympic quality at that.”
“His lessons are inside?” At Bard’s nod, she nodded back. “We can go with that, too.”
“Okay, we’ll make do, then. But I hope Lance gets picked up sooner rather than later.”
“So do I. He wasn’t very smart when he chose to mug and rob someone of a gun. That puts him in a whole different category of nasty, and a lot more people are on the lookout for him.”
Bard hummed noncommittally. “If there are more people to look, that’s good. But he’s had more luck than anyone has any right to enjoy ever since this started, so I won’t get my hopes up.”
“Unfortunately, that’s the realistic way to look at it,” Charmeine sighed. She got up from the table, rinsed out her mug, and put it in the dishwasher. “Thanks for the tea. I’ll take a look around outside. If you’d give Mike a ring when Thran gets up, I’d appreciate it. He’ll be ready to go with him to the school whenever Thran’s ready.”
“He generally leaves about ten,” Bard informed the bodyguard. “As for when he comes home, that can be anywhere from six to ten. It might be later, the last week before the premiere.”
“We’ll handle it,” Charmeine assured him. “Please tell Sigrid that I sympathize.”
“She knows,” Bard exhaled. “She just doesn’t suffer fools well, and Lance is at the top of her Do Not Suffer list.”
“Right now, he’s at the top of mine, too,” the woman shook her head as she paused by the mudroom door. “Until later, Bard.”
Bard raised a hand in farewell as the woman let herself out. He sat at the table in silence until he remembered his bowl of porridge in the microwave. It was cold, so he zapped it for another minute. to restore it to something he wanted to eat. Once it was warm, he doctored it with raisins, cinnamon, sugar, and almond milk, then returned to the table to eat it. By the time he finished it, Sigrid was back in the kitchen, looking a bit more resigned to her fate.

“I talked to Finn.”

Bard looked surprised. “It’s not even seven-thirty. What teenaged boy is up at this hour during the summer?”

“Finn is. He’s packing the last dribs and drabs so he can move out to Kíllian’s today. I told him about Lance and the bodyguards and not being able to work, and asked if he had a job yet. He had a couple of leads, so I asked him if he wanted to talk to Miss Dís. He did. So I called her first, and told her how sorry I was. I told her that I had a willing replacement if she wanted one, so she and Finn will talk this afternoon. I hope she likes him, and I hope he isn’t a doofus. She said she wanted another person anyway, so maybe if the cops can get Lance off the streets, she’ll keep me and Finn both.”

“I hope things work out all round,” Bard nodded. “But if it does, I don’t have to tell you that work is no place for drama, right?”

“No, you don’t,” Sigrid conceded. “Maybe you should tell the doofus, though.”

Bard put his chin in his hand and regarded his oldest child. “What exactly is a doofus?”

Sigrid looked up from making a bowl of porridge for herself to roll her eyes. “Someone who acts goofy. Finn doesn’t do it all the time, but he makes these terrible jokes, and he knows they’re terrible, so he makes this stupid face where he crosses his eyes and sticks his tongue between his teeth and wobbles his head back and forth. It’s so stupid.”

“Not too bad as things go.”

“I guess not.”

“If he didn’t do it, he wouldn’t be Finn.”

Sigrid snorted. “That’s the truth.”

“Think of it as an endearing trait. Like Ada when he gets excited.”

Sigrid brought her bowl to the table with a snicker. She sat down, then with an impish look on her face, she waved her hands. “What is this endearing trait? I gesticulate in its general direction.”

“I think it’s cute,” Bard chuckled. “He isn’t trying to be funny, but he is.”

“He’s hilarious. My very funny Russian Ada,” Sigrid averred, spooning up her porridge. “It’s not very funny to be stuck at home for the foreseeable future.”

“I’m going to try to finish the Andromeda sculpture this week, before camps start,” Bard offered. “I can put you to work if you want.”

“What’re you going to do after that? The totem thing?”

“I expect I’ll be at the school, if I can get Bain and Legs into something inside the building. Charmeine said you could go, too, if there was something you wanted to do inside the building.”

“Yeah? So I guess the driver thing is out?”
“The classroom stuff isn’t, but the driving practice is. I don’t know if you can delay that part, or if you have to delay the classroom stuff until you can do the driving practice. Why don’t you find out?”

“Sure, I can do that. If I have to delay the whole thing, there was this writing thing. Maybe they still have an opening.”

“I’ll see what they might have for the lads, too. They can’t be outside, either, except in the yard.”

“So it’s not just me.”

Bard shook his head. “No. It’s not just you.”

Sigrid winced. “Gods. I halfway wish I hadn’t done what I did in December. But that would have left Legolas to those maggots, so I had to do what I did.” She mugged pulling her hair with both hands. “Gah! Anything I did would have ended up stinking!”

Bard nodded. “Welcome to the school of hard knocks. Sometimes there are no good choices, just bad and worse. Though I think you made a good choice. You stood up to a bully, and you didn’t toss Legs under the bus.”

“This could still turn out... bad,” Sigrid ventured.

Bard nodded, but it was a reluctant gesture. “We don’t know how it’ll turn out. All we can do is the best that we can, all the way, and hope it all comes out okay.”

“That sucks.”

“It does. But sometimes life does. We’ll hang tough.”

Sigrid finished her porridge. “That’s all we can do, so we will, like it or not. So... when the school office opens, I’ll call about my stuff, and see what I can salvage.”

“That’s the best thing you can do, so go for it.”

Sigrid gave him a look that was half smile, half annoyance, but he took the former as his due, and left the rest for Lance. The girl tidied up her dishes, then disappeared down the hall to go upstairs. She passed Thran along the way, because her greeting came back into the kitchen. There was a brief conversation before she continued upstairs; Thran drew near the kitchen.

Bard smothered a rueful smile. First patient of the day dealt with; the second approached.

“Good morning, lyubov moya,” Thran murmured. He wore a tee and his sleep shorts; his hair was already combed and braided, and he looked reasonably alert. “Sigrid tells me that she is grounded.”

“Until Lance is run to ground, more or less,” Bard agreed. “She handled it pretty well for being so disappointed.”

Thran’s hum was pure commiseration. “I half expect that I will be grounded along with her. When does our Judge Charmeine appear to tell me so?”

“She doesn’t. Mike will appear to accompany you to the school when you’re ready.”

“Oh.” Thran looked a hair more reconciled. “How did I escape Sigrid’s fate?”

Bard gave his husband a rundown on all that Charmeine had said this morning, and how he planned to call the school about camps for the boys.
“At this late date, though, I don’t know what we’ll be able to arrange. I may have to find something for the entire crew to do for a while. Maybe paint the main room.”

“We shall see,” Thran conceded. “So I must call my attendant, I assume?”

“You’ve got time to enjoy your breakfast beforehand. What can I get you?”

“I will get it, my saint. Call the school, if you would like. That is more important.”

Bard pulled out his mobile, and went into the sitting room to make his call. He got someone in the office right away, and inquired about the possibility of changing the boys’ camps. As the young man looked for openings in other sessions, both of the boys in question tumbled down the stairs and into the kitchen. As Thran made them breakfast, he explained about the problem of their outdoor camps, which the boys met with less protest than he expected. The young man returned to Bard’s call, saying that there weren’t many openings left in the sports camps, but he had several slots available in a general weight training session.

“Hold on, I’ll check.” Bard covered the mobile speaker to call to the boys. “Lads? Would you come in here, please?”

“What’s up, Bard?” Legolas asked. Bain trailed behind with his mouth too full of something to speak. Bard explained about the weight training session, just as Sigrid came in.

“Yeah, I guess,” Bain shrugged after he swallowed his huge bite. “That’s better than nothing, and it’ll help for conditioning.”

“Do they have three spots?” Sigrid asked quickly.

“I’ll ask.” Bard relayed the question to the young man, who answered affirmatively. At Bard’s nod, the three children looked at each other, and shrugged agreement. “Yes, I’d like all three, please. Yes, here is the information...”

Bard got the three children’s camp session reordered, then hung up. “Okay, you lot. All of you start weight training next Monday.”

“Good,” Sigrid said, crossing her arms over her chest. “That’s just what I need to work out how pissed I am at Lance Dunmont.”

“I take it the driver’s class wouldn’t let you put off the driving practice, then?” Bard asked.

Sigrid shook her head. “It makes sense, but still... There weren’t any spots in the writing thing, either. At least the weight training will help my running in the fall.”

Tilda appeared, rubbing her eyes. “Morning,” she said, rubbing her eyes.

“Morning, Kukla, little doll, Tilda,” the family greeted.

“What’s for breakfast?”

“I made the boys fried eggs for sandwiches,” Thran stuck his head in the sitting room.

“Eggs!” Bain yelped, bolting up to dash into the kitchen with Legolas on his heels. “Dibs on the last rye bagels!”

“There are two, one for each of you,” Thran demurred. “If you want another sandwich, you can use the plain or the everything ones.”
“Everything bagels,” Bain hummed.

Tilda wandered into the kitchen, where Thran put on an egg for her to boil. The morning settled into something close to normalcy, and Bard said nothing to dispel it so that he could savor it as long as possible. It wasn’t until Mike arrived to accompany Thran to the school that the children fell silent. A lump grew in Bard’s throat as he watched their faces as Thran drove away with Mike beside him in the SUV. The lump didn’t dissipate as the children filed back into the house in silence. It didn’t dissipate when the boys met his invitation to play zombie apocalypse without a murmur, or when Tilda refused to leave the house, even just to venture to the barn with Bard.

Bard eased a little when the boys came out to the barn, intend on building Legolas an archery target. Sigrid was the next to join the family to help Bard with his sculpture; on her heels came Tilda. Gavreel was a discreet presence during the activity as he made his rounds, and kept an eye on things as Legolas and Bain set up their target in the back yard. With the bodyguard to watch over the boys, Bard worked on his aluminum armature for the Andromeda galaxy model, which went quickly. When he cranked up his torch to weld the arms to the central post, both the boys came to watch. From there, he cut the largest aluminum sphere into half, notched out pieces of each half to fit around the central post with its radiating arms, and welded the halves into place. Finally, he spot-welded the next largest spheres around the center and on the arms closest to the center.

After lunch, he began to painstakingly glue three sizes of small spheres on the arms while Legolas, Sigrid, and Bain tried out the archery target. Tilda remembered that her bicycle needed one more coat of paint, so Bard got her set up to do that in the front of the barn where she felt more secure. Everyone seemed relaxed as the afternoon progressed.

It took steady hands to place the aluminum spheres. After over an hour, Bard was glad to take a break to see how Tilda had fared. She looked up with the most relaxed smile she’d shown all day, so Bard was quick to praise her careful paint job. She was easy enough to walk outside with Bard to see what the other children were up to. They found Legolas acting the instructor for Bain and Sigrid.

“Don’t jerk when you draw the bow, Bain,” Legolas cautioned, as the younger boy drew the bow back. “Pull it back smoothly, then take a breath in, then out. Spot the target, then let the arrow go without moving anything but your fingers.”

“It’s a lot harder than it looks,” Bain said when his arrow had flown off to the outside corner of the target.

“It is,” Legolas agreed. “Okay, Sigrid. You try.”

Sigrid took a breath, pulled her bow back, then exhaled, holding very still. She sighted at the target, and let the arrow fly. It went into the target at the second ring.

“That’s good,” Legolas encouraged. “Very good for your first time.”

“Bain’s right at how hard it is,” Sigrid agreed. “You have to be so quiet.”

“Your mind as well as your body,” Legolas explained. “You have to let everything else go, and just concentrate on the target.”

The youth pulled his bow, smoothly sighted along the arrow, and stilled. When the arrow flew, it hit the very center of the target, drawing impressed murmurs from both of his siblings.

“You make it look easy,” Bard shook his head.

Legolas gave Bard a smile. “Just as you make welding look easy, when I know it’s not. Practice makes the difference with everything.”

“It’s great of you to show Sig and Bain how to shoot, Legs.”

“Would you like to try, Bard?” Legolas invited.

“Sure, I’ll give it a go,” Bard shrugged, pleased that Legolas had offered.

“Okay, then. Here, Sigrid, you give your Da your bow. That one fits a taller person better.” When Sigrid passed over the bow, Legolas described how to hold it. Then he explained how to nock the arrow, draw it back, and let it go. Bard listened intently, drew the bow a time or two to see how much force it took, then took the arrow that Legolas handed him. He did all that Legolas had told Sigrid and Bain – take a breath, let it out, and sight the target.

What if Lance stood right there in front of the target, right now?

Focus narrowed to zero as he let the arrow go.

“Wow, Da!” Tilda jumped up and down. “Look, right in the middle!”

Bard didn’t know how to feel when he looked at the arrow protruding from the middle of the target. Swallowing, he handed the bow back to Legolas.

“That was excellent!” Legolas grinned widely. “You’re a natural!”

“Thanks, Legs,” Bard gave the boy a smile that reflected none of his internal ambivalence. “You’re a good teacher.”

“Do it again, Da!” Tilda begged, jumping up and down.

Bard shook his head. “Better to quit when I’m ahead, little doll. It’s time for me to start supper, anyway.”

Bard went back to the barn to tidy up the aluminum spheres, put Tilda’s paintbrush in the mineral spirits, and lock the barn. Then he went inside to start supper. He didn’t ask for sous chefs.

Supper came and went. It was a more animated affair compared to last night’s, even though Thran wasn’t there to share the grilled spareribs, coleslaw, and baked beans with them. Bard couldn’t help but laugh at how enthusiastic the children were about eating the meaty treats with their fingers, which helped keep the mood light. Afterwards, while the boys went upstairs to continue their zombie apocalypse, Bard, Sigrid, and Tilda played a long game of Dinky Farm. It was a relief to think about nothing other than computerized beehives and orchards.

At eight, Bard’s mobile chimed. Thran was on his way home.

Despite himself, Bard swallowed down a surge of relief. The effort to remain calm and cheerful all day had taken more energy than he’d realized. How good would it be to let down with another adult?

“Thran’s on his way home!” he called upstairs to let Legolas know, then he dashed to the mudroom to disarm the security system. The kitchen was next, to get out the beginnings of Thran’s supper. In a few minutes, the mudroom door opened, and Thran’s steps came into earshot.

“Welcome home, Thran!” Bard sang out, sticking his head around to the mudroom. “How’s the dancer?”
“Tired,” Thran murmured, coming into the kitchen. His weary face revealed the truth behind his single word, and he looked no more able to deal with anything than Bard. Thank the gods that Legolas trotted into the kitchen to give his father a hug, because Bard had time to school his face to reflect the same reassuring calm it had all day.

All he could think about was aiming that arrow at Legolas’s target, and why it had flown so straight.

It wasn’t a story he could tell anyone tonight.
Chapter 149

Chapter Summary

The angel and the saint labor to endure an endless round of waiting. Will it soon be over?

Thran got behind the wheel of his SUV and waited for Mike to climb in beside him. The bodyguard was not any taller than Bard, but he likely outweighed Thran and his husband by at least forty pounds. It was all muscle, which meant that Mike could be the perfect nimble linebacker for any professional American football team. He could just as easily have been the perfect Russian military security escort, too. Thran had seen enough of those during his career. Mike had a distinct advantage over his soviet counterparts – he met Thran’s eyes with a direct gaze, and dispensed with the silent intimidation that Thran had endured so often, whether because of profession or personal inclination. Thran decided to reward that honest regard with his own honesty.

“So now that we are on our way, I will tell you what will meet us when we arrive at the school.”

Mike nodded. “Gavreel tells me you’re no stranger to having a bodyguard.”

Thran shook his head as he started the SUV and pulled out of the carriage house. He closed the bay behind him, waved goodbye to his solemn family without revealing how much their worry bothered him, and started down the lane.

“I am not. I danced in Russia for many years and often was so attended.”

“As much to keep you in line as anything else, I imagine.”

“Exactly so. To deal with the fame, also. The latter is what you will see today. There will likely be a few aficionados of the ballet at the school. They are usually young girls who want only to say hello or ask for an autograph. I do not begrudge them this, so there is no need to make them keep their distance. They are not allowed in the school, so will confine their attentions to the parking lot. There is also a security guard who patrols outside to make sure that none of the vehicles are tampered with. So all you need look for in the parking lot is Lance Dunmont.”

Mike smiled. “You have done this before.”

Thran shrugged. “I do not seek to tell you how to do your job, by any means. Only to prepare you for what you will see.”

“I appreciate that.”

“Once we go inside, the auditorium is to the right. We have use of the corridor and some of the rooms directly to the left of the auditorium, but for the most part, the dancers are in the auditorium. The set crews may range farther than that.

“There are four dressing rooms behind the stage. I share one with the other principal male dancer, Luka. Our principal ballerina, Charisse, has one to herself. The last two are for the corps, one for the ladies and the other for the gentlemen.”
“The important people from UltraViolet Ballet are Abebe, the ballet master; Irmo, the choreographer; and Ori, my assistant. Círdan is the set designer, and Rada is the costumier. I will introduce you to them as soon as we arrive. Abebe has charge of all of the dancers. Irmo designs how the ballet is to be danced. He is quite volatile, so do not be surprised at his antics. Ori sees that everything runs smoothly. If you need anything, Ori is the man to ask. Círdan oversees the student interns who make up the stage crews, and Rada takes charge of the costumes. Rada is not always in residence when we rehearse, but the rest are.”

Mike asked several questions about the layout of the school, which Thran duly answered. He finished with a description of what a typical day was like so that Mike would understand what he would see. Thran would have added a description of the trouble with Kiefer, but Mike was already familiar with that. Thran was glad of that; he didn’t have to rehash the depressing details. He was glad to turn into the school parking lot.

“Do you want me to drive around the school so that you have a better idea of its layout?” Thran offered.

“I appreciate the offer, but I scoped it out yesterday once Gavreel, Char, and I divided up how we wanted to see to you and your family.” Mike grinned. “You got stuck with me.”

“I got the biggest one,” Thran teased, smirking.

“You sure did. You’re the most obvious target, so you get the biggest deterrent.”

“I appreciate the honor, by all means. But isn’t Sigrid the one Lance wants most?”

Mike nodded without embarrassment. “She is. But she’s a lot harder to find right now. You’re not. Everyone in your village knows where you are for the next three weeks, so it makes sense that that’s where our little nuisance might decide to prowl first. So here I am.”

“Ah.” Thran pulled into a parking space and turned off the SUV. As he expected, a flurry of half a dozen young girls waited on the sidewalk. He pointed at them for Mike’s benefit. “So it begins. Showtime.”

“For both of us,” Mike agreed. “If you would, let me get out first and have a look. Then I’ll come around and open your door.”

“Oh course,” Thran nodded. “At your convenience, then.”

Mike got out and shut his door. He scanned everything thoroughly without appearing to do so as he ambled around the back of the SUV and forward to Thran’s door. Thran reached for his bag on the seat behind him so that he was ready to get out when Mike opened his door. Thran got out, put his bag on his shoulder, and strode purposefully for the entrance. He put on his public face for adoring teenaged girls, smiling serenely at the cluster who went into giddy flutters of delight.

“Bonjour, mes petites,” Thran greeted them. “You are all well this morning, then? Sarah, you have honored me with another visit, I see.”

“May I have your autograph again, Mr. Oropherson, please?” the pleading Sarah begged, a cry that the rest of the girls echoed at once.

“Bien sûr,” Thran agreed, taking the first of several pens thrust at him. “You are all so kind to ask.”

“Will you practice all day today again, Mr. Oropherson?”
“Of course, ma chère. That is how one becomes good at anything, yes? Practice, practice, practice.”

“But you’re so amazing already!” one of the girls gushed. “Not like any of us!”

“But how do you think I became so amazing, as you say?” Thran grinned. “I was once a beginner, too. So always the practice - just as your teachers tell you, so mine told me. That is the only way to become accomplished. Dream, yes. Never give up the dream. But practice is the only way to make the dream come true.”

“It’s so amazing that you’re putting on this new ballet right here in our school! That is so cool!”

“I am glad you are so excited for Immortal. That makes me very happy.”

“Are you really going to dance on pointe? That’s so amazing!”

“Do you think so? I think I am already quite tall enough, don’t you?”

“But I saw your picture with the Weird Sisters in their shop, and they’re the best fitters of pointe shoes in New York City!”

“I have heard that of both of them. They were very kind to me when I visited.”

“So you must be dancing on pointe, then, right? Because you bought shoes!”

“They carry my favorite shoes there. And I enjoy Elle and Jessa very much.”

“So you did buy shoes there? Oh, then you are going to dance on pointe in Immortal!”

“Ah, you are the great detective,” Thran grinned, signing away. “You have constructed a good hypothesis.”

“Oh, can’t you tell us? I think it’d be so amazing if you did it!”

“Thank you, ma chère. We must wait and see what Immortal brings. Au revoir, mes petites!”

Thran smiled for one last photograph, then made his way towards the school. He sensed rather than saw Mike fall in behind him, and he let them into the school, leaving the excited girls behind.

“Good morning, Ernie,” Thran greeted the security guard who presided before the auditorium. May I introduce Mike Kushiel? Mike, this is Ernie Laneer, one of the most excellent security guards who keeps such good watch over us.”

The two men shook hands. From their considered regard of one another, both recognized a fellow professional, but Thran chose to make the recognition explicit.

“Mike is here to bolster our forces, Ernie. Please give him every consideration, as I am sure you will grant Ernie, as well, Mike.”

“Sure thing, Thran,” Ernie nodded. “Another set of eyes is always good.”

“I appreciate that,” Mike nodded. “We’ll talk, I’m sure.”

“I’ll be here,” Ernie nodded.

“Thank you, Ernie,” Thran said, then led Mike through the auditorium doors and down the leftmost aisle. “I do not know what information is the most helpful to you, but ask and I will tell you what I
“If you introduce me to your principals, that’d be a great start, Thran,” Mike replied, scanning the auditorium with a practiced eye. “Then I’ll take a look around to see what’s what. You just be about your business, and I’ll be about mine.”

“A good plan,” Thran agreed.

As he promised, Thran introduced Mike to Abebe, Irmo, Ori, and Círdan. There was no discussion about why Mike was here; only the guarded looks from all of the principals revealed that everyone knew exactly why Mike was here. While Thran was relieved that he didn’t have to explain, his dismay at Lance’s escalation was more than enough to lower his mood. He acknowledged it in silence, and took his place onstage to limber up before the company’s barre began. As was their habit, Ori came to sit beside him so they could go over the day’s plans and any unforeseen concerns.

“How are Bard and the children?” Ori asked quietly, when they’d discussed the usual items.

“Sigrid is upset because she cannot go to work, because it would be too dangerous for her employer and her customers if Lance were to strike her there. The boys are upset because they cannot start their soccer and archery camps on Monday, because the athletic fields are too hard to police, so they must be inside the school to lift weights. Sigrid will be with them, since she cannot take her driver’s class because it, too, is too hard to police. And while Tilda will still attend her art class, she is still very afraid. I do not blame any of them, of course. How one stupid boy causes so much angst is beyond credence.”

“And Bard?”

Thran sighed. “He carries on, Ori, as he always does. But his gaze is sharper, and his jaw is set, and his patience has an edge to it. Do you remember the day that he threw Irmo out of the house?”

Ori grimaced. “He was calm, yes, and he was civil, yes. But... no one dared gainsay him that day, not at all.”

“He does not suffer any threat to our family kindly.”

“I wouldn’t expect him to react otherwise. I hope we can get a line on Lance soon.”

“Nothing from your brother?”

Ori shook his head. “Nothing, but it’s not for lack of trying. Nori’s put out the word and even offered a nice reward. But he hasn’t had a nibble.”

“That does not encourage me,” Thran murmured. “Unless it means that Lance has gained enough wisdom to go to his grandmother in Florida at last, but I cannot believe that.”

“Nor can I,” Ori nibbled his stylus thoughtfully. “The local police haven’t seen or heard anything, either.”

“Suka blyad,” Thran muttered as he stretched forward to wrap his arms around his shins, coaxing his hamstrings out of their morning repose. “Where does this boy hide that no one and nothing can find him?”

“I don’t know,” Ori sighed with equal dismay. “I do not know. If it’s any consolation, the police are upping their patrol around the school until the festival. If they can’t find his hiding spot, we’ll have to wait until he tries to find us. It’s not as if the school building’s going anywhere, so if he shows up...”
here, someone will spot him.”

Thran wondered if he should offer to stand in front of the school with a target on his back. Lance might want Sigrid, but maybe he’d be dumb enough to try for a ballet dancer instead.

As Ori got up to start his rounds, Thran continued with his warmup. Gradually, the company assembled around him, and Abebe stepped forward to begin the morning barre. Thran gave himself to the familiar routine, trying not to think about angry teenagers, bodyguards, his family under siege, and how much depended on Immortal’s success. How telling was it that he had to resort to thinking about his sore feet and back and his aching stomach to keep the other problems at bay?

The barre proceeded. Thran paid it strict attention, but it didn’t have its usual calming effect; his mood seemed to sink with every moment that passed. It was not unexpected; he usually suffered from a lowered mood about two to three weeks before any new performance. On the one hand, the premiere was near enough that rehearsals were nothing but exhausting grinds. On the other, the premiere was too far off for him to tap into the excitement of an impending performance. This time, however, he had much more to drag down his mood. He shut his eyes and forced his concentration on feet, ankles, hamstrings, hips, glutes, spine, lats, delts, biceps, neck, hands, fingers...

Once barre was done, Irmo set the company to work on the grand entrance to the Underworld, where Death introduced the souls of the dead soldiers to their new abode in all its variety. While this scene wasn’t technically difficult for Thran to dance, it did call for him to completely occupy his role. It was up to him to set the mood, showing how completely Death directed His affairs. Here He called various factions to order, and there He issued a decree. Over here He ordered denizens to dance for the amusement of the new souls, and over there He punished a miscreant. Thran mustered his concentration as the dancers spun and leaped in time to the rapidly shifting music, which was a collection of world music snippets to show the diversity and vast breadth of Death’s realm. Irish step flowed into dub step, and that to Klezmer to didgeridoo to plainchant to jazz to Japanese drums –

“Thran!” Irmo barked. Dancers came to a stop, then the music followed suit. Thran turned towards the agitated choreographer, who stood at the front of the stage with his hands in the air. “Come, come! The barre is over, and now is the scene! You dance as if you are asleep!”

Thran swallowed; the choreographer might be abrasive with his assessment, but he spoke nothing but the truth. “My apologies, Irmo. I do. Begin again, and I will attend as I should.”

A ripple went through the company at Thran’s meek acceptance of Irmo’s chastisement, but they resumed their places for the beginning of the scene. As the music restarted, Thran forced himself to the scene, where he must convince all on the stage and in the audience that Death was the ultimate master of all He surveyed.

If only they danced Death’s declaration of love for the Maid, where Death was not in control, and was helpless to control His fate. Thran would have danced that with all the desperation Irmo could have asked for.

* * *

Thran was thoroughly wrung out by the time the company dispersed for the night. His body was well exhausted, but not as exhausted as his thoughts. To hold his worry for his family at bay so completely that he danced to the peak of his ability was no easy task, no matter that a huge bodyguard prowled the school on his behalf, no matter that two more surely kept an equally attentive watch on his family at home, no matter that Mike’s mobile, Ori’s mobile, Thran’s mobile, and all the security communications remained silent. Silence meant no trouble, but it also meant that the waiting went on without respite. He was glad to pack his bag, bid his colleagues a good night, and follow Mike silently out to the SUV. The bodyguard was scrupulous to scan the parking lot for anything untoward, and he hovered as Thran dealt with the trio of young dance enthusiasts, posing for a photograph and signing autographs. He was his usual courteous self, but he didn’t linger, and he climbed into the SUV with a silent groan of relief. Mike climbed in beside him and waited silently for Thran to send Bard a text message that he was on his way home.

“Do you go through this every day?” Mike asked as they pulled out of the parking lot. He kept his eyes on the side mirror, and even turned around in his seat to check for pursuit out of the rear window.

“I do,” Thran agreed. “Every dancer does.”

“You’ve got what... three more weeks of rehearsals?” Thran nodded. “They’ll be this intense?”

“The few days before the premiere will be more so. There are the light, sound, and technical rehearsals, where all is identical to the performances but for the costumes. These are where we coordinate the music, the films, the set changes so that all goes smoothly. After those are the dress rehearsals, where the dancers are in their costumes. Normally we would have but technical and one dress, but given how many student interns work for us, we will have two of each so that they are fully comfortable and ready. And tomorrow will be the first practice on stage with the riggers – the team who will make me fly from the highest part of the set down to the floor. Charisse and Luka also fly at the end of the ballet, but where I fly down, they fly up. So yes, we have intense days ahead of us. The performances will be a relief, to be honest.”

“You guys could give the Army Rangers a run for their money.”

Thran chuckled. “We are strong, yes. But we seek to refine and perfect a very precisely choreographed impression. Your Rangers are warriors – masters of improvisation, able to handle anything that comes at them.”

Mike grinned at the distinction. “That’s a good way to look at it. I guess Swan Lake is the same every time, eh?”

“The steps vary from one choreographer to another, but for a single run, yes, the steps are the same each time. But two dancers will dance those same steps and leave very different impressions, or a dancer will make different impressions on two different days. The differences are nuances only, variations on a single theme.”

Mike nodded. “I see the distinction.”

“Before we reach home, I want to speak to you about might be a variation on a single theme.”

“Shoot,” Mike agreed.

“This boy with the vendetta, Lance... his theme so far has been to attack at public venues. First the school, then the school again, then the gallery where my husband held his art show. These were all events that were well publicized, and required no sleuthing on Lance’s part to discover. So I wonder if he will continue that tack, and will not attack us at our home.”

“That’s a scenario we think is very likely,” Mike nodded. “It’s no secret that you’re in rehearsal at the school, and it’s no secret when the festival is, and it’s no secret what days you’ll present your ballet. So my money’s on Lance lying low until one of those public performances, when it’s most likely that your family will be with you.”

“That is what I think, too. So I think for the major rehearsals and the performances, my family should not be with me until Lance is caught.”

“If you hadn’t suggested that, one of us would have,” Mike agreed.

“My children and husband will be most disappointed, and I will be sorry that they will not be there. But their safety is more important to me than their attendance at a premiere. With all the security at the premieres, it would be hard for Lance to escape notice, and you, the school security, or the police will have a good chance to catch him. Once he is safely caught, my family will see the ballet.”

“You’re setting yourself up as bait, you know.”

Thran shrugged. “You said yourself that I am the most obvious target. To postpone Immortal would devastate many people who count on it to raise money for the village festival, or to enhance their careers, or to bring something new and exciting to life. It would devastate me because I have put my soul into Immortal. So I will not let an angry child ruin the hopes of so many.”

Mike shrugged. “If you did cancel, that’d only delay the situation, because Lance would only wait until the next time, assuming he managed to stay loose.”

Thran agreed. “And I do not want that, not at all. I do not want this to drag on so long that my children come to fear every unexpected sound, and must hide in our house or in the school. I do not want my husband to give up all thought of his art because he worries about his children, or me. So I do not like to be bait, but if that is how we bring this to an earlier end, then so be it. But you will please not speak to my family about bait, please. It is enough that I know. They do not need to.”

Mike’s nod and expression were casual, but Thran didn’t doubt that the bodyguard took him seriously. “You got it.”

Conversation lapsed as Thran drove the rest of the way home. He was no more the target of an angry child than he had been before he and Mike had spoken, but to acknowledge that he was the most obvious target in the family was sobering. His stomach tightened in sympathy, but he said nothing as he pulled into the driveway.

When Mike got out to scan the area, Gavreel came from around the side of the house to join his colleague. They conferred briefly, then nodded for Thran to open the carriage house bay and back his SUV inside. Mike saw him to the mudroom door, where Thran thanked him for his protection throughout the day.

“You’re welcome,” the big man replied. “I’ll see you again tomorrow morning about ten, then?”

“That will be perfect, Mike,” Thran nodded. “Have a good evening.”

“You do the same, Thran. See you tomorrow.”

Thran let himself into the house, shut the door behind him, and leaned against it. All the tension and apprehension of the day came to roost on his shoulders, and he shut his eyes as the lump in his throat grew large, and the knot in his stomach tightened.

Fuck the lump and the knot, just fuck them both...
Rapid footsteps sounded in the kitchen. Bard, of course, probably working to make Thran’s supper. His husband was too much the saint. Thran couldn’t bear to burden him with the travails of his day, so he schooled his face out of its gallows gloom, and into what he hoped was only weariness.

“Welcome home, Thran!” Bard called, sticking his head around to the mudroom. “How’s the dancer?”

“Tired,” Thran murmured, coming into the kitchen. Legolas bounded into the kitchen from upstairs to give his father a glad hug, which Thran returned with more than casual pleasure. “Hello, synok! You have had a good day, then?”

As his son chattered eagerly about archery targets and weight training and zombie apocalypse, Thran let the rush of words cascade over him, easing his somber mood.

So what if I am bait? Better me than my son, or any of the children. Or my saint.

His resolution encouraged him to smile, and now he could meet Bard’s eyes with confidence.

Did a similar façade obscure Bard’s face? His husband smiled, but there was a studied nonchalance in the way he moved, rather than his usual unconscious ease.

Perhaps his saint sought to keep a secret of his own, just as Thran did.

As the rest of the children came into the kitchen to welcome him home, he found varying degrees of apprehension on their faces, so he said nothing that would worry them. He told them that tomorrow he would learn to fly on the stage and not in class, and that Luka and Charisse sent them their warm wishes. The boys went back to their video game, and Sigrid decided to call Finn to see how his move had gone today. Tilda, however, still sat in the sitting room with her drawing books, within earshot of the kitchen, so when Bard sat with Thran as he ate his supper, he spoke only of what UVB had practiced today. He did not mention Mike. Bard sat with him to tell him about the children’s day; he made it sound quite wholesome and happy. He did not mention either Charmeine or Gavreel.

They both lied, then. The only question was how much.

In deference to the children, Thran continued his sin of omission until he and Bard could retreat to the shower and then to bed. When they settled against the pillows, Thran let his breath escape in a long, slow exhale. Would Bard speak first, or would he?

Bard drew Thran near, settling his head against Bard’s shoulder and his arm across Bard’s chest. One hand stroked Thran’s hair slowly, and the other traced light trails down Thran’s arm. He sighed once, but didn’t speak.

His husband chose to remain the saint, then – always comforting, never asking to be comforted.

They were both tired. They had not spent time together all day. Perhaps now was not the time to bring up anything other than how glad he was to be home. They could talk about more serious things in the morning...

... which would likely cast a pall over the rest of the day.

Thran sighed again. What had Bard said once to him, about situations that provided no good choices, only those that were bad or worse?

Bard shifted onto his side, so Thran moved with him until his back was pressed against Bard’s chest.
Bard’s arm went around his ribs, and his lips pressed a kiss against Thran’s spine, but he didn’t speak. Thran didn’t, either; how could he speak of why he wanted Bard and the children to stay away from his rehearsals and performances until Lance was caught?

It was Bard’s nature to hold silence. He was empathetic enough to figure out all that burdened Thran, and generous enough to take on everything else so that Thran didn’t worry more.

They were both under so much pressure. A fight at this point was too devastating to contemplate.

A fight had happened because they had not talked to each other. Never again – no matter how late, how tired, how unpleasant it might be to speak, better to talk now than to let the pressure build.

“We are both liars,” Thran blurted.

Bard’s hand stilled. “What?”

“I said that we are both liars.”

“What?”

“Most of the time, it is for a good cause – we do not want to worry our children about the vindictive Lance. But here we are in bed, and both of us promised that we would be honest with each other, and neither of us wants to. Even if we did, neither of us knows what to say that does not worry the other. Neither of us wants to say that we are worried and scared and tense. Worst of all, both of us think that such lies between us might well be the best tack to take.”

Bard’s hand tightened over Thran’s ribs, and his cheek pressed against Thran’s back. After long seconds, Bard wrapped his arm around Thran’s shoulder. “I don’t know what to do, either. The children... no, to them, I won’t say any more than I do. But you... you’ve already got too much on your plate without me saying a word, angel. I love you. I can’t bear to make your path through this worse.”

“The children, agreed. But me... I cannot bear for you to make your path through this worse because you hold silence. Since I think I know what you hold silence about, I will speak it so that you do not agonize and try to keep it from me. I know Sigrid may be Lance’s ultimate target, but I also know that I am the most obvious one. He will likely strike at me because it is so easy to know where I will be until the festival. I have already spoken to the bodyguards of this, and they agree with me. So yes, an angry boy with a gun is after all of us, but I am at the front of the line.”

Bard stopped breathing for a long second. He urged Thran to turn over so that he could enfold him in his arms and hug him hard. “When I talked to Charmeine, she said she thought you would be at minimal risk because of all the layers of security around the school. It’d be a lot harder for Lance to sneak in there. But... you’re right that everyone knows exactly where you are, and you’re right that I worry about that.”

Hearing Charmeine’s assessment calmed Thran a little, and so did Bard’s close embrace. “Ori says the police will patrol more, and the school has security, and I have Mike with me. Those will deter Lance.”

“Maybe you should take Gavreel or Charmeine with you, too.”

“No, Bard. That would leave you and the children with only one of them.”

“Only until next Monday. After that, the children will be in camp, and I’m coming to the school, too, so all three of the bodyguards will be at the school to look out for all six of us.”
“That will be fine until the children’s camps end in the afternoon. Then I want you to take them home with Charmeine and Gavreel. More importantly, I do not want any of you to come to the final rehearsals, or the premiere. Those are when Lance may think to strike, because I am absolutely guaranteed to be at the school. You must keep Sigrid and the other children away then.”

Of course Thran expected Bard to argue, and so he did. Thran shut his eyes and let the protests flow over him without response, refusing to argue.

“Mab i ast, Thran!” Bard finally muttered in frustration. “You are the most stubborn, bull-headed bastard on the planet!”

“You are the Taurus, not I. I am the Libra, who tries very hard right now to stay balanced.”

“Balanced between the devil and the deep blue sea,” Bard growled back.

“Between concern for my children and husband and self preservation, perhaps. But I will not be alone, Bard. The police, the school security, our bodyguards will be between me and Lance. Honestly, do I like this? Hell, no. But better I stand as the public target, not the children. And better you stand between the children and anything else here. That is what parents do.”

Bard fell silent. “I can’t argue with that, you bastard.”

“Nor can I.”

“All right. We’ll stay away from the rehearsals and the premiere.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya.”

“Cariad,” Bard whispered, stroking Thran’s hip. “Just... please... be as careful as you can. Please.”

“I will. The only hero I want to be is onstage – merely a role I dance.”

“You are my hero every day, and you will be for the rest of my life.”

“As you are and will be mine.”

Conversation lapsed, and Thran almost let matters lie. But... there had been that tension in Bard’s body when he’d welcomed Thran home...

“Lyubov moya,” Thran whispered.

“Hmm?”

“I have been honest. So I hope that you will be, too.”

“About what?”

If the conversation hadn’t been so serious, Thran might have grinned at the casual evasion in Bard’s question. “When I came into the house this evening, I had to work very hard to put a casual expression on my face, so that when you saw me you did not worry. When I saw you, I think you had to do the same thing.”

Bard sighed. “Son of a bitch, Thran. I can’t keep a single secret around you.”

Thran gave into his grin. “You cannot. So why do you try? Just tell me.”
“I couldn’t then, not with the children near. And you looked so tired... I wasn’t about to say a word about anything other than I was glad you were home, and what could I get you for supper.”

“Ah, there was something, then. Tell me. The children were not so well behaved today? You cursed at your Andromeda sculpture?”

“The children were a lot better behaved than anyone had any right to ask of them. They were great. Sig and Til helped me with all the little spheres after I welded the armature –”

“Suka blyad, I missed the welding again,” Thran snorted. “You do this just to tease me, I am convinced. You know I want to see it, and so you do it when I am not here.”

“I had to hurry up and do it because I want to get the whole thing done before Monday, angel. The client gave me permission to show it at Celebrían’s gallery during the festival if I finish it, and since I won’t have much else to show other than sketches, I want to. I won’t have time to work on it once camps start, because I’ll be at the school.”

“What will you do at the school?”

“Sketch your ballet, if you’re okay with that.”

“Of course I am.”

“I appreciate it.”

“I still want you to do a book of your sketches about Immortal. You must sketch if you want to make the book.”

“True.”

“So this is what you worked to hide from me? That you will finish your sculpture and then be at the school? Tcha, I do not think so.”

Bard fell silent. When he exhaled, it was long and measured. “Legolas was kind enough to show Bain and Sigrid how to pull a bow and sight the target. He asked me if I’d like to try, so I agreed. He’s a good teacher, by the way – very kind and supportive as well as clear. You would have been proud to see him.”

“I would have been, yes. But this is not what you wanted to hide from me.”

Bard shook his head. “No. It’s not. I did everything Legs told me and the children...”

Thran waited. After some seconds, Bard swallowed and continued.

“In that last second, just before I let the arrow go, I thought, what if Lance stood right in front of me? Everything disappeared except for that. So when I let the arrow go, it hit pretty close to the dead middle of the target, as if Legs had shot it instead of me.”

Bard fell silent again. When he remained silent, Thran said, “Ah. It upset you to think that you could shoot Lance.”

Another swallow. “Not at all. I’d shoot him in a heartbeat, without hesitation, without remorse. That was what upset me. That I could get that angry.”

Thran pressed a kiss on Bard’s chest. “It does not upset or surprise me at all. You are the most patient and gentlest of men, Bard, until you are pushed past all bearing. Lance has done that. So do not feel guilty or remorseful about it, my saint. You are justified because you want to protect your family, which is your most precious treasure. If you cannot get angry about a threat to your treasure, then what is there to get angry about?"

“You’re right,” Bard conceded. “Still...”

“Whatever efforts either of us must make for our children and each other, we will do so. If I have to pound Lance into pulp with my hands, then I will. I know you will do the same. I will not feel regret or guilt about any efforts either of us make to protect ourselves.”

“I won’t, either.”

“Good.”

Bard’s body relaxed beside him; feeling that, Thran relaxed, too. How much better it was to lie with his husband at peace again?

“So we’re good?” Bard murmured.

Thran sat up enough to kiss Bard’s lips. “I am if you are.”

“I’m good.”

“Then all is well again.”

“In here it is. But that’s all we ever have control of, anyway.”

“True.”

More seconds passed while Bard stroked Thran’s hip in that soft way that felt so soothing.

“You were right to make us talk, angel. It’s hard for me, even when all I want to do is to help.”

“I know, my saint. Be at peace. We are in accord.”

“Thank the gods.”

Nothing more needed to be said after that.

* * *

The next several days passed, enough that living under the watchful eyes of bodyguards lost its novelty. The children stayed in the house or the barn while Bard finished his Andromeda sculpture. They went with him to the market when they needed groceries, with two bodyguards trailing them in the nondescript beige car. They insisted on painting the second coat on the gazebo. Legolas went to fencing on Saturday with one bodyguard in tow; Thran went to the school as he had all week. Sunday was the perfect hot summer day for prowling around the junk shops, but the family really couldn’t do that in good conscience, so everyone stayed home and did the same things they had all week, except Thran, who didn’t do much at all, thank the gods. Bard had worried about him, because he seemed a little thinner, and he was certainly wearier. What had Legolas said about how thin Thran had gotten after Vileria’s death? He’d make a perfectly emaciated Death before long.
On Monday, the children’s camps started. Bard stayed at home to move his Andromeda sculpture and his pine tree to Celebrían’s gallery for display. When he delivered a stack of sketches to Bilbo and Frodo for consideration, he apologized for not getting further along on his totem piece. When he explained why, Bilbo understood, but was visibly disappointed. Bard felt no differently; to have another new original piece in combination with Andromeda would have been a strong sign of the health of his career. The lost opportunity was one more cost the family paid because of Lance’s vendetta. Bard didn’t like it, but he liked leaving his family more vulnerable even less. If he stayed at home to work, then one of the bodyguards stayed with him. If he went to the school, all three bodyguards were in place to care for the children.

Once his sculptures went in the Ilithien Gallery, Bard joined the rest of the family at the school. He was elated to see the story he and Thran had sketched out months ago over lunch become such a vivid, colorful, stunning performance. The Underworld portion of the set was amazing – a series of boxes could be reconfigured in seconds to change the single set to give the impression of the vastness of Death’s realm, from throne room to one enclave or another. The bare portion of the set was just as amazing as the perfect foil for the black and white images that created a stark prairie, then a chaotic battlefield. The flying was incredible, even if it didn’t send Thran sailing over the audience. Just his flight over the stage from left to right and then back again was so dramatic that Bard got goosebumps the first time he saw it.

He had so many scenes to draw, from the ones that were part of the ballet itself to all the behind-the-scenes events, that choosing not to work on his totem sculptures didn’t seem so rancorous. How much fun was it to draw the wrestling team as they slid the stage back and forth, then draw the petite Charisse flying in a grand jeté like some gossamer butterfly? The lifts that she and Luka performed to perfectly convey the undying tenderness between Maid and Soldier were almost too beautiful to render in anything other than stardust and moon glow, but Bard did his best with his mundane pencil. Of course it was glorious to watch Thran dance. None of the wear and tear on Thran’s body showed when he danced. Irmo might be the world’s most difficult choreographer, but he was also a brilliant one, creating steps that made the most of Thran’s height, expressiveness, and considerable technical expertise. No matter how hard the steps – and they were hard – Thran conjured them into magic. Even the pointe work that had upset the family so badly was beyond reproach. Thran floated on his toes as if he weighed nothing, matching Charisse step for step. At the days flowed by, sketch after sketch poured from Bard’s pencil as if he were as possessed as Thran was. Before he knew it, he’d filled half a dozen sketchbooks, nearly three weeks had passed, and the ballet was less than a week away.

Not once in those three weeks had anyone – police, security, bodyguards, Mr. Nori’s organization, villager, or Clan Flyrnig – caught a single glimpse of Lance Dunmont.
Chapter 150

Chapter Summary

Clan Ffyrnig receives some welcome news. But does a new woe now stalk the stage of Immortal?

Chapter Notes

I don't own any rights to the timelessly-cute Tinker Bell.

A welcome diversion greeted Bard when he brought the children home from their camps Monday afternoon. He was in Thran’s SUV, given that he had four children, two bodyguards, and himself to haul. These days, it was Thran who drove Bard’s truck, because he had only himself and Mike to transport to and from the school. Once Charmeine and Gavreel got out and checked the yard, he backed the SUV into its spot in the carriage house, and the children piled out. He got the children into the house, then Gavreel accompanied him to the edge of the lane so he could collect the family mail from its box. He found the usual market circulars, a flyer from a window and door replacement company, a coupon for an oil change, a couple of bills...

And a slim, business-sized envelope.

He didn’t wait to get back to the house before he opened it and scanned the contents. At his wide, delighted grin, Gavreel quirked an eyebrow.

“Good news, then?”

Bard’s grin widened, if that were possible, and he clenched a fist in exultation. “The best news, short of someone picking up Lance Dunmont. Just the best. I want to keep it a surprise until Thran gets home.”

“Understood,” Gavreel nodded. “I’m glad you have something good to keep your perspective.”

Bard hummed. “It hasn’t been easy. The children are used to being outside a lot more than they have for the past month, and you know how they’ve chafed under the restrictions.”

Gavreel’s laugh was deep and rich, and his body shook when he tried to contain his amusement. “Oh, if I had a nickel for every time they’ve run around the house, I could retire to a big estate on Maui.”

Bard chuckled, too, but his sigh wasn’t amused. “To be honest, I thought Lance would’ve made a mistake and gotten picked up by now. I don’t know where he’s hiding, but he must have stealth technology to stay under the radar for so long.”

Gavreel scanned the lane again, scrupulously keeping to his duties. “It’s not that hard, sad to say.”

“What do you think he’s done, then?”
Gavreel gave Bard a resigned look. “All he had to do was to steal a car, drive off someplace nowhere near here where no one’s looking for him, and lie low.”

Bard’s brow wrinkled. “He could’ve stolen the car of the man he robbed, but he didn’t. He fled on foot.”

“He was smart not to steal that one. If he had, the police could’ve put out an alert right away, because he was armed and dangerous, he was an escapee, and they knew exactly what car to look for. But he didn’t. I think he ran off once he got the gun, then stole a different car, something innocuous like a base-model sedan, that no one would associate with him. He drove off somewhere, maybe dumped it and stole another, and then took himself far off where there’s little risk of anyone looking for him.”

“You make it sound easy.”

Gavreel’s smile was wry. “Did you know that people steal about three hundred cars a day in New York City alone? That’s about one every five minutes. You don’t think the police have the wherewithal to find them as fast as they’re stolen, do you? And if you don’t know which of the three hundred to concentrate on, you’ve lost the game before you started.”

Bard shook his head. “I guess so. So rob a guy, do a quick flit away, steal a boring car from a place where lots of others get stolen, and you’re home free?”

Gavreel nodded. “Shameful, indeed. Life in the big city’s got a lot of benefits, but it’s got problems, too, and finding a stolen car is one of them.”

“I guess it’s too much to hope that he took that boring sedan and drove to Florida.”

Gavreel shook his head. “Possible, but not likely, I’d say.”

Despite Bard’s elation about the contents of today’s mail, his smile faded. “Just five more days before the premiere.”

“It’s getting close,” Gavreel agreed. “This is the hardest part, Bard. No one’s seen or heard anything in weeks, and that’s just what Lance wants. It’s hard for children to understand that, but please, urge yours to hunker down just a few more days. The last thing we need is for any of them to dash out on some joyride, only to run into Lance hoping for just that opportunity.”

“I don’t think any of them are prone to that, but I take your advice seriously,” Bard assured them. “I was thinking it might be a good plan on the day of the premiere to take the children to a film? None of them wants to miss the ballet, and I don’t either, so a film might help them get their minds off what they’re missing?”

Gavreel nodded as they got to the mudroom door. “That’s a good plan. We can post Charmeine in the theatre with you and the children, and I’ll keep watch in the lobby. Plus there’s usually a security guard on duty at night, so Charmeine and I can speak to him or her.”

“That’s great,” Bard nodded. “It’ll be good for all of us to get out. Maybe we won’t be where we want to be, but we’ll be out, anyway.”

“And hard to find.” Gavreel offered Bard one of his deep nods. “All right, Bard. I’ll be about my usual, so ring if you need anything. Enjoy your supper.”

“Thank you,” Bard replied.
Gavreel took himself off with his usual deliberate stride, eyes already scanning everything around him. Despite his suspicion that Lance had not retreated to Florida, Bard relaxed a little of his worry. Gavreel and Charmeine were both so competent that if the boy were foolish enough to come here, it wouldn’t matter whether he were armed or not before the Clan Ffyrnig’s bodyguards ran him down.

He came through the mudroom with the mail. All of the junk stuff went right into the paper recycle bin; the bills and the exciting bit came with him into the kitchen. The children were already around the table, munching their usual snack of cheese and crackers and fruit, so he ducked into the pantry to drop the bills into the wire basket they’d designated as the mail collector. The other envelope went behind the boxes of pasta to keep it a surprise until Thran came home. When he came out of the pantry, he brought the bins of flour and sugar with him – tonight’s news needed pie to make it a proper celebration.

“Ooh, what’re you going to make, Da?” Tilda asked, when Bard rummaged in the cabinets for his deep pie pan.

“Pie. Maybe blueberry,” Bard replied. “I haven’t made that in a long time, and since we just went to the market yesterday, I’ve got enough berries.”

The children might be knee deep in Double Gloucester and Gouda, but neither was a deterrent to them expressing enthusiastic approval of Bard’s plan. As Bard put together his piecrust, the children finished their snack and Legolas suggested they go outside to kick Bain’s soccer ball around. Sigrid and Bain were eager supporters, but Tilda held back.

“Can’t we play in the ballroom?” she asked.

“We’ve been inside all day,” Sigrid coaxed. “It’ll be good to be outside for a little while, Til.”

“I don’t want to go outside,” Tilda grimaced.

Bard looked up to find the same look of worry on the older children’s faces.

“Mr. Gavreel and Miss Charmeine are outside, Kukla,” Legolas reminded her. “And we’ll be out there, too. No one will bother us. We’ll make sure.”

“I know, but...” Tilda darted a look at Bard. “I just don’t want to go out there.”

“It’s okay,” Bard told her. “You can help me with the blueberries if you want. The rest of you go outside. Just make sure you tell Gavreel and Charmeine that you’re outside, and please...”

“Don’t go out of the yard,” the three older children chorused.

“We know, Da,” Bain snorted. “Believe me, we really know.”

“I know you do, and I’m sorry we still have to watch out. Gavreel just told me that it’s very important that we stay careful. Things have been quiet for a while, but we want to go a little bit longer before we get things back to normal. So tell Gavreel and Charmeine, and keep your eyes open a little longer.”

The older children murmured acceptance, and trailead towards the mudroom door. Both Sigrid and Legolas looked back before they went outside.

“You can play on my side, Kukla, if you come out,” Legolas offered.

But Tilda shook her head with finality. “Thank you, Legs. But I’ll stay in here and make blueberry “It’ll be a good one, then,” Legolas conceded, and followed Sigrid outside.

Tilda watched the other children file outside with a wistful look on her face. Bard resisted the urge to tell her everything would be all right if she went outside, but he couldn’t honestly say that, and he wouldn’t lie to her. Sometimes it was hard for a ten-year-old to hold a lot of faith in arcane ideas such as reduced risk and statistical advantage.

The anger in the depths of Bard’s heart stirred again. How often did it rear its head of late? Several times a day, such as when he caught one of the children complaining about being cooped up, or when Tilda adamantly refused to trust all manner of precautions. Her wistfulness revealed that she wanted to go outside, but she couldn’t bring herself to do so.

If I ever get my hands on Lance Dunmont, I’ll –

Not useful. Impotent anger didn’t help. Better to think about how to help Tilda. Maybe Bard should talk to Dr. Firenze – a counselor, maybe?

Maybe nothing would help until Lance was caught. After that, maybe Tilda would ease. If not, then he’d talk to Dr. Firenze right off.

Bard thrust his concern yet again into the back of his mind, and turned his attention to Tilda and blueberry pie. He turned on the oven, and got the recipe card from Daphne’s well-worn box. While he made the crust, Tilda mixed berries, sugar, lemon juice, and a dash of cinnamon in a big bowl to macerate. He rolled out the bottom crust and formed it into the bottom of the pie pan, then let Tilda fill it with her berry mixture while he rolled out the top crust. They decided a lattice top would look festive, so Tilda carefully cut the top crust into long, thin strips with pinked edges, then together they wove the pieces across the top of the pie. Bard found the cookie sheet to keep the pie from dripping over the side and into the oven, and Tilda rummaged among the kitchen tools for the silicone strips that kept the edges of the crust from burning. A sprinkle of turbinado sugar went over the top, then into the oven went the pie, and into the sink went the dishes to rinse for the dishwasher.

“How much longer do you think it’ll be before... you know?” Tilda asked, as she put the spatula into the dishwasher.

Bard didn’t have to ask what Tilda meant. It was the same question she’d asked him over and over since the day the bodyguards had arrived – how long would it be before someone picked up Lance? He shook his head with regret. “I don’t know, little doll. I wish it had happened yesterday.”

“I’m tired of staying inside all the time.”

“You’re as safe as we can make it with Charmeine and Gavreel to watch out for you. And your brothers and sister watch out, too.”

Tilda shook her head. “I know. But I’m just too scared. I wish I wasn’t.”

Bard handed Tilda the berry bowl, dried his hands, and then kneeled so he could look up at his daughter. “I’m sorry, Tilda. You know I want Lance caught just as much as you do.”

Tilda gulped and looked down at Bard with a mixture of sadness and defiance. “I wish he were dead. I know it’s bad for me to wish that, but I do – I wish he were dead. Because then he couldn’t hurt Sigrid, and I’d never see him again.”

Gods, I wish the same thing, Bard thought, but he couldn’t admit that to anyone, not his daughter, and not even himself. “I understand, Tilda. You don’t want anyone to hurt your sister, which is a good thing. Try to think about that instead. Lance isn’t worth thinking about.”

“Okay,” Tilda murmured. Bard hugged her to his chest, shutting his eyes as she wrapped her arms around him. How many times had he said the same thing to her? The only new wrinkle was that this was the first time Tilda had dared to say she wished their tormenter were dead. That was understandable, but still worrisome.

As soon as the festival was over, Bard would call Dr. Firenze.

As soon as the festival was over...

All life seemed to be on hold, waiting for the village festival to arrive and Immortal’s premiere with it, as if that would bring resolution to their woes. Maybe it would. If he were honest, Bard expected two things to happen – Thran’s grueling schedule would ease, and Lance would make his appearance. If there were any justice in the universe, a third thing would happen – Lance would be cought and summarily disappear into the depths of the criminal justice system, never to bother anyone again.

Bard shivered. Never was an unlucky word. Saying it all but begged for a challenge.

That spun him back around to the same old problem – Lance was loose, and there was nothing he could do to change that.

He felt no better about it than Tilda did.

He shifted to press a kiss on Tilda’s cheek, and she stayed in his arms for a few more seconds before easing away. She went into the sitting room to get her art workbook, sketchpad, and pencils, turned to a fresh page, and soon was engrossed in a new drawing.

Swallowing his frustration, Bard stayed in the kitchen. Maybe he’d think about what to make for supper. Yes, that would be more productive.

He settled on grilled chicken, a big pot of farro, green beans with onion and speck, carrots with ginger, and caprese, the tomato, basil, and mozzarella salad his family liked so much in the summer.
He piled chicken pieces in a huge bowl with seasonings and oil to marinate until he was ready to grill, set the bowl in the fridge, prepped the veg for the pots, and measured out the farro. The caprese was a dish he made just before serving, so he’d done as much as he could ahead of actually cooking.

He was still unsettled about Tilda, so he passed through the sitting room and went into the solarium to look for a new distraction. Despite the new windows, it was noticeably warmer in here than in the rest of the house. Maybe he should think about window shades to reduce the heat during the hottest part of the day. Maybe some of those matchstick bamboo ones, or linen Roman shades... hmm, neither of those seemed in keeping with the Moroccan fantasy of the room, so he’d borrow Thran’s computer and look at what houses in Morocco used.

He switched on the fountain, which added a cooling sound to the room, if it didn’t actually affect the temperature. Some of the plants looked like they could use a good drink, so he toted the watering can to the mudroom to fill it. As soon as Tilda saw him with the watering can, she came into the solarium to help. They shared a companionable few minutes watering the plants, trimming off dead flowers or leaves, and sniffing the blooms appreciatively. Through the windows, they watched the older children and Charmeine pass the soccer ball between them while Gavreel watched from the sidelines.

“I want to go out for a few minutes, little doll,” Bard said. “Do my chin-ups, check the barn, maybe play a little soccer with the other children. Do you want to come with me?"

After some internal debate, Tilda agreed to venture out with Bard. She stuck close as they went outside, but waved to her siblings as she followed Bard to the barn. She counted his chin-ups for him – twenty-five today – and helped him peruse his workbench for errant materials – not that there were any, as Bard hadn’t worked in the barn since the children started their camps, but it was something to do. Then he coaxed Tilda with him into the back yard, where she relaxed enough to exchange a few kicks with the others. But she stayed near the house, and frequently looked around herself. Bard’s jaw tightened to see her caution, but at least he’d gotten her out of the house for a few minutes. When he went back in to take the pie out of the oven, Tilda went with him.

Once the pie was done, it was time to start supper, so Bard got everything underway. Sigrid came in to help Tilda with the sous chef duties, and the boys came in just before the food was ready.

They hadn’t made much of a dent in their hearty supper before Thran arrived home. Of course he looked tired and pale, but his smile was wide, and he was quick to change into comfortable clothing and make a plate for himself. He sat down with his family with a big sigh of relief.

“Everything went well at the school today?” Bard asked from the other end of the table. “I’m glad to have you home, but when you come home early, I hope everything’s fine with Immortal.”

“All is very well,” Thran nodded. “Our final rehearsals are at hand – the two technical ones are tomorrow and Wednesday, then our dress rehearsals are Thursday and Friday. And Saturday is the big day at last. So today we broke early to prepare for the big push that starts tomorrow.”

“I still wish we could go to the premiere,” Sigrid grimaced, leaning back against her chair and staring at her plate. “And yes, I know why we can’t, and yes, I can live with it because we have to, and yes, I wish we didn’t have to.”

“It’s not as good as the premiere,” Bard agreed, “but it’ll be good for us to get out and see a film.”

“Nothing scary,” Tilda said, eating her carrots.

“Nothing scary,” Bard nodded. “We’ll find something that we all want to see. But before that, I have something exciting to tell everyone.”

“I knew there was a reason for that blueberry pie!” Bain chortled, pumping his fist and sharing a gleeful grin with Legolas. “What is it, Da?”

“I’ll save it to go with the pie,” Bard grinned. “So eat up, everyone.”

No one in the family ever had to be encouraged to eat, but with the added incentive of a surprise in store, the food disappeared even faster. Eager hands helped to clear the table of plates and condiments, and soon Bard handed slices of pie on to Bain beside him, who added scoops of vanilla ice cream. When everyone, even Thran, had a slice of pie at his or her place, five expectant faces turned towards Bard.

“So what’s the surprise?” Sigrid asked. “Come on, Da – you look like you’re about to burst!”

“Yeah, Da! You do, Bard! Just tell us, Da!” the other children clamored, drawing Thran’s chuckle.

“It must be a good one, lyubov moya,” the elegant dancer added his voice to the fray.

“It is,” Bard beamed. “Wait right here.”
Everyone exchanged mystified glances as Bard ducked into the pantry to retrieve his envelope.

Legolas’s curiosity was more than he could contain in silence. “What is that?”

“This,” Bard held up the envelope as he sat down at the end of the table, “is our copy of the adoption papers. No stepfathers or stepchildren anymore. The four of you officially have two Das, and Thran and I officially have four children. Clan Ffyrnig is solid past anyone ever breaking us apart.”

The light in Thran’s eyes was the brightest Bard had seen in weeks. Bard hadn’t gotten a lump in his throat thinking about this moment until now, but the indescribable delight on his husband’s face conjured one effortlessly. If Bard had ever wondered just how deep Thran’s love for their blended family was, this moment confirmed that it had no limit.

“Hmph,” Sigrid snorted with mock exasperation. “I guess that means we have to stop being nice to each other now.”

“No, Sigrid!” Tilda protested. “It’s nice! It’s good! It means Legolas is our real brother now, and he has to stay here forever.”

Legolas laughed in surprise. “Forever? That’s a long time, Kukla!”

“So? You’re my brother forever now, and you have to call me Kukla forever.”

Legolas nodded, and the smile he turned on his youngest sister was affectionate. “I can live with that very well.”

“You better,” Tilda folded her arms over her chest and tried to frown, but a happy smile ruined her effort and took any sting out of her words. “And you have to show me how to play zombie apocalypse, too.”

Bain rolled his eyes. “Oh, I knew that was coming. We won’t get a minute’s peace, Legs.”

“Maybe we’ll wait a while on that, Til,” Bard amended. “This doesn’t really change anything as far as we care. But it means that the powers that be have to treat us like the family we are, and that makes me very happy.”

“It makes me very happy, too,” Thran said simply, and held up a forkful of his pie. “I make a toast to Clan Ffyrnig, the fiercest of clans.”

“To Clan Ffyrnig!” everyone chorused, and eagerly dug into blueberry pie. It was an unconventional toast, but most delicious, and far sweeter than any sip of champagne.

* * *

“Do you feel any different?” Thran murmured to Bard that night when they lay beside each other in the dark.

“Why, because the adoption came through?” Bard murmured back.

“Yes.”

As Bard considered, he absentely caressed Thran’s hip in slow, delicious circles. As Thran’s endorphins rose, his busy thoughts quieted, which was a blessing all on its own in addition to the soothing touches. Thran shut his eyes to better savor both sensations.

“I guess I feel relieved, because it means our children will stay with us regardless of what happens. Why? Do you feel different?”

“I do,” Thran’s mumble was drowsy. “Yes, I feel the relief that you do, but I also feel great pride as well as humility because your children agreed to let me be their father. It is a great honor. It may be the greatest honor I have ever received, second only to when you agreed that we belonged together.”

Bard squeezed Thran’s glute, and graced the top of his head with a kiss. “Gods, angel. You put me to shame.”

“I do not. You have known for years what things are most important to you, and you have fought with every gram of your being to protect those things. I have sacrificed, too, but not the way you have. You do not feel different now that you are legally Legolas’s father, because you have been his father since we married.”

“Maybe so. But you’re right that it’s an honor. Our oldest son is a wonder and a half, and I love him very much, and I can’t imagine my life without him.”

“I feel no different about our fierce lioness, our jester Bain, and our sweet Kukla. We have a great bounty in all our children.”

“That’s no lie, cariad. Gods, that is no lie.”

Bard held Thran a little closer, and if his breath hitched just the slightest bit, Thran chose not to comment on it.

* * *

Thran woke at three a.m. His thoughts were aswirl, a roiling stew of elation over the completed adoption, excitement about Immortal’s impending premiere, and worry about Lance and finances and UVB and uncounted other things. But his thoughts were not what had woken him. His stomach was just the faintest hair off...

His stomach had felt full of knives and daggers for weeks. That was nothing new. In five days, it would calm when he danced Immortal for the first time outside of rehearsal. Lance would make his appearance or not, the practice and worry and struggle to create and present a new ballet would be over, the financial drain would lessen, and the mental and physical pounding he’d endured would ease.

After so many weeks of intense rehearsals, small nibbles snatched between ballet scenes, rather than complete meals, were all his stomach could manage. He should not have eaten such a large supper. To indulge in blueberry pie and ice cream afterwards had not been wise, either, no matter how much he’d wanted to celebrate with his family. He should have resisted. Only a few days more, and he could relax the strict discipline he’d held himself to.

He went back to sleep.
The alarm hadn’t gone off when Thran woke again, but the sun was up. He lay quietly, waiting to see which ache and pain registered first, so he knew which one to favor when he got out of bed with ginger care. Mostly, he felt tired, but his back and his feet had recovered enough overnight that they didn’t scream for attention. He shut his eyes, and tried to lull himself back to sleep. Every scrap of rest he could glean over the next several days were vital so that he mustered the strength to get through the last four rehearsals before Immortal’s premiere.

He didn’t fall back asleep, but he did drowse until Bard’s clock radio alarm went off. Bard roused and padded into the bathroom, returned to dress in tee and shorts, and sat on the edge of the bed to offer Thran a light caress, telling him it was time to get up. Thran snaked out a long hand to stroke his husband’s thigh.

“Eggs or porridge?” Bard murmured.

The thought of sugary porridge didn’t appeal. “Eggs. Hard boiled, please?”

“I’ll put them on.”

Bard slipped out of their bedroom, leaving Thran to stretch fingers and toes, arms and legs, back and shoulders, hips and thighs. When everything was reasonably limber, he sat up to brush the stray hair out of his eyes. He paced to the bathroom, dealt with the usual ablutions, then returned to the bedroom to grab the clean shorts he’d put beside the bed last night. He pulled on the shorts, bent to get a tee from his dresser, then straightened to arm his way into the tee. For a second, he felt dizzy, but it passed so quickly that he didn’t think more about it. He padded downstairs, where the children were already gathering around the table for breakfast. Tilda was deep in a bowl of porridge with apples and cinnamon, and Bain and Legolas busily assembled their latest variation of fried egg sandwiches. Sigrid had an oatmeal bagel in the toaster, and Bard tended his pot of simmering eggs.

Why did the smell of fried and boiling eggs seem unpleasant?

Thran’s stomach twinged as if to answer that question. Of course, after the past month it was no wonder that everything irritated it. He offered Bard a good morning kiss, Legolas a hug, Bain a fist bump, then got teacups from the cabinet for him and Bard. He added slices of ginger and lemon to the teapot, then filled it with hot water from the teakettle to make a soothing tea that would settle his stomach. As he carried the pot to the table, he gave a quick fluff to Tilda’s hair, then Sigrid’s, and sat down. Bard followed behind to set a bowl containing two eggs and a plate for the shells in front of him. The family ate quietly, if one ignored the boys’ noisy chewing.

“Slow down, lads,” Bard said with a look at Bain and Legolas as he brought his bowl of eggs to the table. “Egg sandwiches are not the things to inhale down your windpipe.”

That got a snicker from the girls, but the boys duly slowed down.

“I expect to come home with all of you this afternoon,” Thran offered as he shelled his eggs. “Today is the technical rehearsal, so the morning will be barre and a few last refinements, then the afternoon we will go through Immortal as if it were the premiere, to make sure all the rigging, the lights, the sound, the films, the music, and the set changes go smoothly. If anyone must stay late, today and tomorrow it will not be the dancers.”

“That’s great,” Bard smiled from his end of the table. “It’s happening at last, angel.”
“I am glad,” Thran said frankly. “After so many months of so many hours, we are all glad that this week we will dance a lighter schedule. That will give us a little more energy for our premiere.”

“I still wish we could go,” Sigrid blurted.

The tension ratcheted up as everyone at the table gazed at the girl. Wincing, she bit her lip in regret. “I’m sorry. I’m not helping. I’m sorry.”

She got up and carried her empty plate to the sink, rinsed it, put it in the dishwasher, and went upstairs. The other children exchanged glances, but no one said anything more, and Thran was left to sip his tea and nibble his eggs as his stomach twinged in sympathy to the tension everyone felt.

After breakfast, Thran packed his bag while the older children changed into their shorts and tees for their weight training class, and Tilda put on her oldest shorts and tee that could stand the splatters of clay and water typical of ceramics classes. Bard packed lunches for everyone, then amassed his stack of sketchbooks and pencils. Today, however, he added something different to his collection of materials.

“Ooh, you’re going to do colored pencils today?” Tilda asked, peering around Bard’s arm to see what he put in his carryall.

“Maybe so,” Bard gave her a smile. “I thought I’d limber them up a bit so that when your Ada puts on his costumes Thursday, I’ll be ready to do them justice.”

“That’d be cool,” Sigrid enthused. “I want to sneak in there on Thursday to get a firsthand look at them.”

“And to see Mr. Rada, too,” Tilda added. “Maybe he’ll have Sebastian with him.”

“I am sorry, children,” Thran said. “The technical rehearsals today and tomorrow will be when you have your camps. But Thursday and Friday, the dress rehearsals will be in the evening, just as the performances will be. Yes, we will make sure all is well with the costumes, but we will also make everything as close to what the real performance will be for the production interns. This is their debut, too, so we will help them be old hands by the time Saturday arrives.”

That met with many groans. Bard didn’t groan, but he looked disappointed, because he’d stay with the children during all of the rehearsals and the performance to guard them against anything Lance might try. His gaze was understanding, though, telling Thran that while Bard regretted his family having to miss the rehearsals, he didn’t blame Thran for it.

Lance, Lance... such a high cost a single angry boy extracted from so many people...

Everyone piled into Thran’s SUV for the ride to school with Charmeine, Gavreel, and Mike trailing them in the undistinguished beige car. The day promised to be hot and humid, which Thran met without enthusiasm. He disliked temperature extremes, but he endured cold better than heat – extra sweaters and wraps were easy to add when he was too cold, but there was only so much he could strip off when he was too hot. Too much heat made him feel sick, as if he ran a fever, a distinctly unpleasant sensation. He was quick to turn on the SUV air conditioning, even though the trip to school was short. When they arrived and their chaperones motioned them forward, he got out with the rest of the family and walked briskly into the school. Ernie was there to greet them, so Thran bade farewell to Gavreel and the older children as they grabbed their lunches and headed for the gym. Charmeine and Tilda were next, off to the art studio. That left Mike, Bard, and Thran to let Ernie poke through their bags before passing them into the auditorium. Mike set off on his usual prowl around the auditorium to scan dressing rooms and backstage to make sure all was well.

“Dance well, angel,” Bard gave Thran’s braid a gentle tug. “I’ll be in and out as things go, so yell when you see me if you need something. Maybe I’ll see you for lunch.”

Thran’s stomach twinged again. Gods, Saturday could not get here fast enough – how tired he was of enduring his complaining gut!

“We will see how the morning goes. I suspect that we will do barre, then go right into the technical rehearsal without break, as we will be well warmed and ready. But if we cannot share lunch, we will go home together, in any case.”

“Good enough,” Bard nodded. “Hang tough, cariad. We’re almost there.”

Bard drifted off to a seat in one of the front rows to unpack his drawing things, offering one last smile before Thran went up the stairs and onto the stage. Thran smiled back, then let the day’s business settle over him. He waved to the crewmembers who scurried around the stage as they prepared for their upcoming efforts, heading backstage to his dressing room. Several members of the corps flitted up and down the hall, murmuring good mornings and hellos as he threaded through them. As he did each time he navigated down the hall, he smiled at the signs someone had stuck to the dressing room doors. A drawing of an old-fashioned telephone booth crammed with bodies and bristling with protruding arms, legs, and torsos identified the male corps’ dressing room. The sign for the women’s corps’ room had a very small clown car with a flurry of dancers in tutus dancing around it. Charisse’s door had a picture of Peter Pan’s Tinker Bell with her name written beneath it in curly letters. The door to Thran and Luka’s room showed a tall, white, shaggy yeti beside a short, black, shaggy puppy. The drawing made Thran smile, because the names written underneath the caricatures were completely unnecessary. Anyone who spent even a few minutes watching the rehearsal knew which of the pair was Thran, and which was Luka.

He went into the dressing room to change out of his shorts and tee and into his dancewear. While he had several new pairs of his usual dancing slippers, he was down to his last two pairs of pointe shoes – one worn, the other new. He would dance on pointe for only seven minutes during each performance, so the worn ones would do for the week’s rehearsals, then he would wear the new ones for the premiere and subsequent performances. Thran liked to wear a new pair of shoes for opening night, just because putting them on when they were in pristine condition reinforced the excitement of opening night.

His worn pointe shoes were not pristine. They would stand him in good stead for the week’s rehearsals, but their appearance reflected how he felt – well able to dance, but ragged around the edges. He laid them on the top of his bag, ready for when he would return here after Act II. His pointe scene was the first one of Act III, so he would have time to make sure he put them on snugly, tying the ribbons properly without hurrying. He put on his dance belt and tights, then sat down in the room’s solitary chair to put on his regular shoes for barre. When he stood up, he felt that momentary flash of dizziness, but it cleared as quickly as it had earlier this morning. Thran sighed; one more thing to ignore today.

Luka came in as Thran took a thin tee out of his bag. The auditorium was warm, and the stage lights would be broiling, so he’d wear as little as possible so he stayed as cool as possible.

“Morning, Thran,” Luka raised a hand. He was subdued, but still offered a smile with his wave.

“Morning, Luka. You are well?”

“As well as any of us, I guess,” The young man smiled apologetically. “I’m not a fan of hot weather.
It’s draining, even this early in the morning.”

“I am of the same mind.”

Luka plunked down his bag, kicked off his flip flops, and unbuttoned his shirt to toss it onto his bag. It was a bright tropical print, all wild green ferns and yellow-beaked toucans. He stripped off the rest of his clothes, pulled on his dance belt and tights, and dug for his shoes. “I can’t believe we’re got less than a week to do before we do this before an audience for the first time. We’ve worked on it for so long that it almost seemed as if we’d be in rehearsal forever. One endless loop.”

“Another thing we agree on. It has been a very long effort. Thank you for so much hard work. You have been a pleasure to dance with.”

Luka’s grin was self-deprecating, without embarrassment. “Not at first I wasn’t, but at least I’ve come far enough along to know that now. I appreciate your patience with me, and everything you taught me. I’m a much better dancer now.”

“You are,” Thran shrugged, grinning as Luka realized he was being teased. “But you must thank Charisse, too. She has been a great teacher.”

“She’s wonderful,” Luka sighed, staring at the ceiling with a blissful expression. “She’s just the most wonderful person, not just a wonderful dancer, and I am the luckiest man alive to be the one to dance with her. She’s just wonderful.”

Luka’s ecstatic praise brought a chuckle to Thran’s lips. “Then dance to be just as wonderful, so that everyone who watches the two of you believes that the Maid’s love for her Soldier is justified.”

“I will,” Luka avowed, looking determined. Thran smothered laughter at the young dancer’s enthusiasm, because it was charming and sweet, and the dance world would turn such innocence into something more worldly soon enough. For now, Thran was happy to appreciate it.

Luka held the door for Thran to pass through first, tacit acceptance of Thran’s status as the senior dancer. So he was the one to come onstage first, and he was the one to notice the nauseating stench first. Someone had just gotten very, very sick.

“Oh, my gods,” Luka recoiled, clapping a hand over his mouth. “Someone’s spewed breakfast...”

Thran’s stomach clenched hard, whether because of the horrific smell or in sympathy didn’t matter. Sure enough, in the wings of Stage Right, one of the corps dancers – Llandro – was bent over a bucket, his ribs still heaving. Such things were far from unusual. Between the bad eating – and purging – habits of many dancers, and the unspoken rule to dance no matter how ill one was, buckets were a regular sight on both sides of every ballet stage. Thran had availed himself of one or two over the years, but only when he had had to dance while sick, or when the pain of one injury or another had gotten the better of him. As far as he knew, Llandro hadn’t suffered an injury, and he wasn’t a purger. So...

Llandro was sick.

Thran made a beeline for the edge of the stage. Thank the gods, Bard was where Thran had left him, comfortably slumped in his seat as he worked on his sketch. When Thran called to him, his husband came forward right away.

“Gods, what happened, Thran? You’re white.”

“Please, find Ori. Tell him to go out and buy several large bottles of hand sanitizer and several more of that horrible pink stomach remedy. Tell him to do this before he does anything else this morning.”

“What happened?” Bard demanded, but before he’d completed the words, the awful smell of vomit reached him, and his face blanched. “Oh, gods. Did someone flip breakfast, or get food poisoning, or did a nasty stomach virus come to call?”

“I expect the latter, but I will find out. Please, find Ori.”

“I’ll find him, and if I can’t, I’ll go out myself. And don’t tell me no. I’ll take care of it.”

“Okay,” Thran gulped, as Bard turned and strode up the aisle to look for Thran’s assistant.

He hoped Llandro had food poisoning. But the roil of his stomach told him not to put any faith into that.

Stomach viruses traveled from one person to another like wildfire, and antibiotics didn’t affect them. Lots of hand washing and hand sanitizer might help it from spreading to everyone, and doses of the nasty pink solution might ease a few of the stomach cramps that would soon follow. But neither cleanliness nor palliative doses would keep any virus from cutting a swath through the company.

How many of the company would succumb, and what would become of Immortal’s premiere when they did?
Chapter 151

Chapter Summary

The angel endures, the saint nurtures, and a ballet draws near.

Chapter Notes

I don't own any rights to Flushed Away, or The Incredibles.

Bard didn’t bother to pack up his drawing supplies, but he did snatch his car keys before he went to look for Ori. Gods, as if poor Thran didn’t have enough to worry about, now a stomach bug plagued the company. He’d thought Thran had looked a peaked this morning when he’d nibbled his breakfast eggs in tiny bites washed down with an entire pot of lemon ginger tea, so he probably had a touch of it already. Would this ballet ever get off the ground? Either the gods didn’t like the idea of a ballet about one of their own, or they demanded blood sacrifice before they’d bestow their blessings.

Bard sent them all a harried protest – and he might as well admit to a thorough tongue-lashing, too – as he searched for Ori.

“Ori!” Bard hastened to the slight man’s side when he found him in the auditorium lobby, just coming in from the parking lot. Ernie had checked Ori’s bag, and both of them turned at Bard’s call. Ori bid Ernie a hasty farewell and rushed to Bard’s side.

“What’s happened? Lance?” Ori asked breathlessly.

“If only,” Bard replied, dragging a hand through his hair. “Someone’s got a stomach virus and just spewed onstage.”

“Oh, damnation,” Ori squeezed his eyes shut in distress. “We just can’t seem to catch a single break, not a single one.”

“I think Thran’s got a touch of it, too, so there may be others. Regardless, he sent me out here to ask you to head to the drugstore for hand sanitizer and stomach meds, but I’ve got a better idea. Find out from Thran, Lettie, or Abebe if there are any non-OTC anti-nausea drugs that might help, and then get a doctor to call in a prescription for them. I’ll get the hand sanitizer and the OTC stuff, and probably some tissues and so forth while you do that.”

“What about Lance?” Ori demanded, grabbing Bard’s arm as Bard turned for the exterior doors. “You’re supposed to lie low, Bard! Take one of the bodyguards with you!”

“That fucker’s not after me,” Bard growled. “He’s after Sigrid and Thran, so the bodyguards stay here with them. Trust me – if I run across Lance Dunmont on the way to the drugstore, he’ll be the one who needs the bodyguard, not me.”

“Okay, Bard,” Ori gulped. “I’ll work this end of it.”
“Call me if you want me to pick up anything else, meds or not,” Bard asked. “I’ll be back as soon as I can.”

Ori lifted a hand as he hurried into the auditorium. Bard strode out to the parking lot, remembering to rake his gaze over anything that moved before he got to the SUV. Nothing. He got in and drove to the big box shopping center, descended upon the pharmacy section of the general department store, and filled a cart with the things Thran had requested, plus a family bundle of antiseptic wipes and another of antiseptic soap dispensers to supplement the school bathrooms. The pharmacist counter wasn’t busy at this early hour, so he approached the student pharmacy intern with a tidy beard, natty bow tie, and white coat festooned with professional credentials, a name tag, and several pins and badges for one association or another. Unfortunately, the young man explained what Bard already knew – that what people called stomach flu wasn’t the same as influenza at all - the former was really gastroenteritis, which attacked the gut, and the latter, the real influenza, attacked the respiratory system. Viruses caused both, which antibiotics couldn’t combat. The best thing to do for gastroenteritis was to drink lots of liquids to stave off dehydration, rest, and wait it out. As most of the prescribed remedies to reduce nausea caused sleepiness as a side effect, Bard didn’t expect Ori to call him with a request to pick up any of those. The nasty pink stuff, as Thran dubbed the best-known OTC remedy, was the best option when coupled with rest and fluids.

The company likely couldn’t indulge in rest until later this afternoon, but fluids were something Bard could offer. After thanking the intern for the information, Bard headed to the kitchen staples aisle, where he got a case of sports beverages, two of water, and several boxes of saltines.

At the last minute, he went back to the cleaning supplies aisle and got two plastic buckets, a gallon of bleach cleaner, a package of sponges, and a box of disposable medical gloves. All might come in handy if the virus made serious inroads.

He loaded everything into the SUV and headed back to the school, where he found the dancers in the midst of their barre. Mike and Ori came out to help him unload his supplies, and they carted everything backstage while Bard told them what he’d learned at the pharmacy.

Ori’s disappointment was palpable. “I heard the same thing from Lettie, Abebe, and Thran, too. So hope that all of this stuff keeps the virus this from infecting too many of the corps. We’ll tell the corps when they go home this afternoon not to do anything but rest and treat whatever symptoms they get as best they can. Unfortunately, dancers accept that performing when they’re sick is part of the job, so unless someone’s on the verge of dying, they’ll all be back here tomorrow.”

Mike shook his head. “I told Thran that dancers could give Army Rangers a run for the title of toughest profession, but I never expected this.”

Ori gave Mike a grimace. “They can’t do anything else, really, Mike. If they don’t dance, they’re replaced. Positions are hard to come by, so they dance through everything, or they don’t dance at all.”

Mike shook his head again. “Tough customers, the lot of ‘em.”

Ori gathered up several bottles of hand sanitizer, soap, and a few packages of wipes. “I’ll put these in strategic places, and get Abebe and Thran to put the fear of the gods into everyone about using them. The ones who aren’t sick will understand, because they don’t want to get sick. But the sick ones have to use this stuff, too, to keep from spreading it.”

“I’ll help,” Bard said, and grabbed the bleach and sponges. While Ori put bottles of hand sanitizer and wipes around, Bard wiped down backstage doorknobs, light switches, and portable barre rails, then started on the bathroom door handles, stall door locks, toilet levers, faucets, and light switches.
By the time he’d wiped down everything he could think of, the dancers had cycled through the restrooms in anticipation of starting their technical rehearsal, so he started all over again with his sponge. The smell of bleach grew pervasive, but at least it was better than the stench of vomit.

By the time the technical rehearsal was over, a second dancer was heaving into one of the buckets Ori had put in the wings. Thran looked very pale, and he grimaced now and again, but so far, he held his own.

Bard hoped it stayed that way.

“Ew, Da, you reek of bleach!” Sigrid when Bard came to collect the children once camps were dismissed.

“There’s a good reason for that,” he replied, and soon she, her brothers, and Gavreel had heard about the latest trouble to beset UVB and Immortal. “I think Thran’s got a hint of it, so all of you, wash your hands like there’s no tomorrow from here until this passes, because we’ve got enough to worry about without a stomach virus on top of it. If you need to use the bathroom, do it now, because I’ll lay about with the bleach when I get home just to make sure your bathroom and the kitchen is disinfected before anybody touches anything.”

“I’ll help,” Legolas said, his eyes dark with worry. “I don’t want Papa to be sick, but if he is, I don’t want to share it.”

“I appreciate that, Legs. Let’s collect Tilda, then we’ll get your Papa and go home.”

The children and Gavreel followed Bard to the art studio, where Tilda remained behind the other students, happily concentrating on the lump of clay before her on a simple potter’s wheel. Charmeine sat unobtrusively in a corner, content to keep a quiet eye on things. As they came in, Tilda flattened the lump of clay and then drew the edges of it up into the sides of a vessel. She flattened the clay again and redid the sides before looking up to see her family.

“Look! I finally got it! I got the sides to come up like they’re supposed to!” she said proudly.

“Wow, look at you!” Sigrid gave the pot an impressed look. “You did it just like a pro!”

“What is it, Kukla?” Legolas asked. “A vase? A cup?”

“It’s just practice on how to make the sides,” Tilda shook her head. “Tomorrow I’ll decide what to make. It took a long time to figure out how to make it smooth.”

“It looks cool, Til,” Bain said, touching a finger to the clay. “Wow, that’s stiffer than I expected.”

“It takes a knack to learn to use a wheel,” Bard commented. “You picked it up pretty quickly, Tilda. That’s great.”

“Thanks, Da.” Tilda’s nose wrinkled as Charmeine joined them. “Ugh. Somebody smells like too much laundry bleach.”

“That’s me,” Bard nodded, and explained about the stomach virus.

Tilda looked worried. “Uh-oh. One of the girls got sick this morning and had to go home. It smelled awful.”

“Uh-oh, indeed,” Bard grimaced. He pointed to Tilda’s clay-covered hands. “At least you’ve got to clean up before you go home. Make sure you use lots of soap and water after you wash off the clay, and use a paper towel to turn off the faucets, okay?”

“Oh, Da,” Tilda nodded. She gathered up her clay and returned it to the big class bin, and cleaned up the wheel and area before she went to the sink to clean off her hands. She washed three times with lots of soap and water before she was satisfied with her efforts. She waved goodbye to her instructor, then joined her family and their two bodyguards to retrace their steps back to the auditorium. Thran and Mike waited for them in the auditorium lobby. Thran looked drained and uncomfortable, but he was still on his feet. He blanched, though, when Bard got close enough for the smell of bleach to register.

“What happened to you?” Thran swallowed, as if the smell was enough to upset his stomach.

Once more, Bard explained how he had spent the day. “Consequently, I left all my drawing stuff down in the auditorium. I’ll go get it, then I’ll be right back.”

He ducked into the auditorium for his things, slung his bag over his shoulder, and detoured to the stage long enough to flag Ori down. The young man conferred with several members of the stage crew, but he excused himself and came over to Bard.

“What’s the prognosis, Ori?”

“Two of the dancers have it. If you want my opinion, I think Thran will have a full-fledged case before the night’s over,” Ori said worriedly. “If he does, don’t let him come here tomorrow. It’s just the technical rehearsal, and we’ll work around it if he’s not here. Better he stays home and gets it out of his system so he can dance in the dress rehearsals, and more importantly, the premiere on Saturday. So don’t let him out of bed if he gets sick, Bard. Please.”

“If he’s that sick, he won’t be able to drive, and neither I nor Mike will do it for him. As you said, better we sacrifice a technical rehearsal than the premiere. He was okay for the rehearsal today?”

“His dancing was its usual perfection, but I know he’s uncomfortable. The crews have a couple of things to smooth out, but nothing major. They could run through tomorrow without a single dancer if they had to. Thursday and Friday are more important for the dancers, so we’ve got a little leeway.”

“Do you need more soap or bleach or stuff for tomorrow? I’ll drop off some more.”

“We’re good for tomorrow. Thank you so much for all the scrubbing you did. That probably did more for everyone’s general well being than anything else. I’ll pick up some more water and crackers – both settled a lot of nervous stomachs as well as the ailing ones.”

“Good. Okay, Ori, I’ll wrangle the principal dancer. If he goes down for the count, I’ll call you in the morning.”

“Okay, Bard.” Ori looked forlornly around the stage. “I’m sure he’s sick, Bard. He didn’t eat all day, and he’s been really good about keeping himself fueled until now. He kept things in control through sheer act of will, but when he gets home, make him go straight to bed and keep him there. You have to. If he can’t dance on Saturday, we don’t have a replacement, we don’t have Immortal, we don’t have a company.”

“I know it, Ori. I’ll take good care of him. I promise.”

Ori nodded. “Good enough. Good luck, Bard.”

Bard offered a wave. “Stay well, Ori. UVB needs Thran to dance, and Thran needs you to run things.”
Ori flashed an appreciative smile, then turned back to the stage to return to his discussion with the stage crew. Bard retraced his steps up the auditorium aisle and out to the lobby to rejoin his family. The bodyguards fanned out to do their parking lot check before allowing the family to come out and pile into the SUV. Bard expected Thran to make a point about driving home, but he headed right to the passenger seat without a word. They drove home in near silence, waited for the bodyguards to clear the yard, then parked the SUV in the carriage house and went inside the house.

“All right, troops,” Bard said, as the children and Thran came into the mudroom behind him. “Commander, you’re upstairs in the shower, then in bed. Ensigns and Lieutenants, everyone grab a bleach wipe and set to. Sig, you’ve got the half bath. Wipe down the faucets, the toilet handle, the light switch, and the doorknobs. Don’t get the bleach on the marble, please. Bain and Legolas, you’ve got the children’s bath, same thing – handles, faucets, and light switches. Tilda, you’ve got the mudroom faucets, light switches, and doorknobs, especially the inside and outside knobs on the doorknobs. I’ve got the kitchen. Any questions?”

“No, Captain,” the children chorused, as Tilda took the package of wipes that Bard handed her.

“Make it so, then,” Bard nodded, so the children grabbed their wipes and scattered.

Thran gave Bard a pale smile. “You have us well trained, Captain.”

“I hope so,” Bard turned a pointed eye on his husband. “Because if you try to bullshit me about you’re not sick and you can help, I’ll spank you. So go wash or whatever you have the energy to do, then get in bed. You’re confined there until this shit passes.”

“I think it will be when this vomit passes, but that is too much information,” Thran swallowed with distaste. “I will not even make a single joke about those who enjoy spanking. You already know that is not one of my kinks.”

“Right now, I want to know that you’re on your way upstairs while you’re still under your own power. Go.”

Thran handed Bard his dance bag, and went without further comment. Bard snared one of the bleach wipes to cleanse every handle in the kitchen – faucets, dishwasher, stove, and especially the fridge. Doorknobs to the pantry, butler’s pantry, and mudroom. The faucet itself. Light switches in the pantries and throughout the kitchen. A marble-friendly wipe took care of the kitchen island and counters.

He grabbed another bleach wipe, and headed upstairs to do swab the doorknobs and light switches in all of the children’s rooms. When the smell of bleach was pervasive throughout the house, he hoped that a few million viruses had lost their lives in the assault.

“All done, Captain!” the boys appeared from their bathroom.

“Us, too!” Sigrid and Tilda called from the first floor.

“Good job, one and all,” Bard replied. “I don’t have to tell you to wash your hands a hundred times over. And if anyone feels queasy for any reason other than the smell of bleach, sing out right away. Thran’s in isolation until he’s over this nasty stuff, so wish him well only from a distance.”

“How long will Papa be sick?” Legolas asked, his brow wrinkling in worry as he looked towards Bard and Thran’s bedroom.

“These things usually cut a swath for about twenty-four hours, so let’s hope that’s true this time.”
“Can we have a snack now?” Bain asked.

“Sure,” Bard agreed. “Food smells likely make Thran feel even sicker, so stick to the usual cheese and crackers and fruit for now. I’ll figure out what to make for supper that doesn’t smell much so he stays as comfortable as possible.”

“Okay, Da.” Bain and Legolas headed downstairs, and soon they joined their sisters to rummage in the fridge and pantry.

Bard stuck his head into his bedroom to check on how Thran was doing. The tall dancer lay in bed curled around a pillow with his eyes shut.

“Would a hot water bottle help, angel?” Bard asked.

“Maybe,” Thran murmured. “Gods, it hurts even to talk.”

“Then don’t. Just lift a finger once for yes, and twice for no. Are you queasy?”

A finger went up once.

“Did you manage to get a shower?”

A finger went up once again.

“A little ginger or mint tea might help settle your stomach.”

“The idea of anything in my stomach is unbearable.”

“Even a dose of the dreaded pink stuff?”

Thran cringed. “I will try, but I cannot promise to keep it down. I hate the way it tastes at the best of times.”

“Okay. I’ll bring you a hot water bottle and so forth.”

Thran lifted a finger and shut his eyes. Bard dug the hot water bottle out of the linen closet, filled it, snugged it in its flannel cover, and brought it to Thran with the bottle of dreaded pink stuff. The ailing dancer managed to down a dose with many a choke and a shudder, then curled around the water bottle. Bard kept an eye on him as he plied another bleach over the bedroom doorknobs and light switches, then repeated the process in the bathroom. He cleaned the toilet for good measure, too.

“Gods, that reeks,” Thran moaned.

“I’m sorry, angel.” Bard went around the bedroom and bathroom to open all the windows so the outside air could help the pungent fumes dissipate. “It’ll clear out in a minute.”

“I will survive. Go, you should not be near me. You must see to the children.”

“I will, once I’ve got you settled. I need to get you a bell or something so you can call for help when you need it.”

Despite how uncomfortable he felt, Thran smiled. “When Legolas was small, Vileria and I had a baby monitor to hear him at night if he cried. Perhaps you need one for me.”

Bard grinned. “Good idea. I’ll think about it the next time we visit the baby superstore. Until then, we’ll make do with mobiles. Put yours under your pillow. I’m on your speed dial, so call me if you need something.”

Thran stretched out a long arm, snared his mobile lying on his nightside table, and slid it under his pillow without ever opening his eyes. Bard resisted the urge to stroke Thran’s hair or kiss his forehead; the former would likely make Thran’s nausea worse, and the latter would expose Bard to just the germs he wanted to avoid. Instead, he made sure Thran’s path to the bathroom was clear, the door was wide open and the toilet seat was up.

“I’ll see to the children, cariad,” Bard said softly. “Your job is to get through the nasty.”

“You will get me up and to the school tomorrow morning, no matter what,” Thran whispered. “Promise me.”

“I promise to get you to the school in time for your performance on Saturday night,” Bard amended. “Anything before that depends on the bug.”

“I have to be at the rehearsals.”

“Or already filled me in - you have to be at one of the dress rehearsals, that’s all. So stop worrying because it’ll make your stomach hurt even more. Just be until the bugs clear out.”

“Bastard.”

“I am, but I’m your bastard. Now rest. I’ll be around if you need me.”

Bard left Thran to his misery before his husband could make another rejoinder. He headed downstairs to find the children in the kitchen, talking quietly over their snacks. They were understandably worried about Thran, asking about what would happen to the ballet if Thran were too sick to dance.

Bard had already asked himself the same questions, so all he could do was offer his hope that this stomach virus would roar through in twenty-four hours, which would give Thran time to rally in time to perform. All of them had suffered from similar ailments at least once, and recognized the truth in Bard’s words. They put the best face on it that they could, and decided to sacrifice Thran’s stash of cold cooked chicken breasts to make sandwiches so that they avoided any cooking odors that might further upset Thran’s unhappy stomach. A big platter of veg with hummus supplemented their sandwiches, and ice cream and cookies capped their supper with a little sweetness.

After supper, the family dragged out the old familiar Flushed Away, then The Incredibles. The children cycled through showers and headed to bed with concerned words for Thran, which Bard promised to relay. When they were all settled in bed, Bard made the rounds alone to see that the house was secure, then headed upstairs. Thran seemed to be asleep, so Bard grabbed his nightclothes and towel, and showered in the children’s bathroom.

Once he dried off, he debated where to sleep tonight. If he slept beside Thran, the same virus that had laid Thran low might strike him. If, however, he slept downstairs on the sofa or upstairs on his old bed in the garret, he might not hear Thran if he needed help.

Germs be damned. He’d sleep beside his husband.

He tiptoed into the bedroom. Thran had curled himself into a knot on Bard’s side of the bed, nearest to the bathroom, so Bard slipped in on Thran’s side, and tried to make himself comfortable without disturbing his husband. Thran didn’t stir, so Bard dared to relax.
The next thing he registered was the sound of heaving. Bard scrambled into the bathroom blinking against the bright light, but managed to wrap an arm around Thran’s trembling body as his husband tried to keep himself upright over the toilet. He hadn’t eaten since breakfast, so he managed little more than dry heaves. Bard grabbed Thran’s braid to keep it out of the way until his husband’s spasms eased.

“Here, rinse your mouth out,” Bard urged, grabbing the bathroom cup to fill it with water. He guided Thran to the sink so Thran could spit out the foul taste in his mouth, then supported him back to bed. He turned on the nightside light, then returned the bathroom to wring a washcloth out in cool water. Sitting on the side of the bed, he wiped Thran’s face carefully –

The skin around Thran’s eyes looked as bruised as if he’d been in a fight.

“My eyes?” Thran whispered, looking at him in resignation.

“Bloody hell, angel. You look like you’ve been punched.”

“I do not throw up easily. I cannot relax and just let it happen. So the small capillaries around my eyes break. My pale skin makes it look far worse than it is.”

Thran didn’t quite look like a raccoon, but Bard didn’t speak to how close the resemblance was. Instead, he gently swabbed his husband’s face, and arranged his braid out of his way on the pillow, and retrieved the hot water bottle to refill it and return it to Thran.

“You need to guard yourself against dehydration, angel. If you don’t think you can keep anything down, I’ll bring you a cup of ice chips. And you should try another dose of the pink stuff.”

Thran suppressed a shudder. “No pink stuff. The very idea nauseates me.”

“Okay, no pink stuff. I’ll bring you some ice chips.”

Thran didn’t say anything, so Bard padded downstairs to slather his hands with soap and water and then hand sanitizer before he touched anything. He got a plastic cup and filled it with chips from the freezer, and brought it and a spoon upstairs to Thran. He fed Thran a small chip to see how his husband would fare, then did a quick wipe of the bathroom. He washed his hands again to get rid of the bleach smell before returning to Thran. Then he sat on the side of the bed to feed Thran a few small ice chips.

“I am very thirsty, but I don’t think I can put anything in my stomach,” Thran whispered.

“Just stick with the ice chips, then. We’ve got lots.”

“I can manage the ice myself. Go to sleep.”

“You’ll feel better if you rested, and didn’t fuss.”

“You are still a bastard.”

“I’m still your bastard, and I’m a smart one, too. Just let everything go, so all your body has to do is heal. Don’t talk, don’t argue, don’t worry.”

Thran sighed, but either he lacked the energy to argue, or he recognized the sense in Bard’s words. He took the ice chips as Bard fed them to him, and in a few minutes his eyes closed in sleep. Bard lay down on the unfamiliar side of the bed, but wondered how long it would take him to fall asleep...
Thran was up three more times before the sun rose. By the time the clock read six-thirty, it was clear that Thran was in no shape to go anywhere. Bard snatched another hour of sleep, then got up to wash and get ready for the day. If the children were well, there was no reason they couldn’t go to their camps. Once they all appeared for breakfast, none the worse for wear, Bard called Charmeine and Gavreel to discuss options. He agreed to let the two bodyguards get the children to and from camp, while he stayed home to tend to Thran. Mike would be on hand to watch over the property, so while he didn’t like being apart from the children, he thought they were just as safe at school as at home. He made the children’s lunches and saw them off in Thran’s SUV.

At nine, he called Ori to tell him that Thran was still very sick, and could barely hold himself over the toilet to throw up, much less walk or dance. Ori reported that three other dancers had come down with the virus, but Llandro, the dancer who’d showed symptoms first, was feeling slightly better.

“I made Lettie put her foot down that if someone starts to throw up, they’re out until they stop. I’ve got everyone slathering enough soap and water and sanitizer and bleach wipes around to make the entire auditorium a sterile clean room.”

“Good, Ori. I’ll keep you posted on Thran. He’s asleep for the moment, which is the best thing for him.”

“Thanks, Bard. I hope this passes soon, and that he’s more himself by the end of the day.”

“Me, too. Hope all goes well today at the technical rehearsal.”

Bard ended his call. The house was uncharacteristically quiet without Thran and the children bustling about. The doors and windows were closed because of the hot and humid temperatures outside, too, so not even the distant sounds of lawnmowers or street traffic disrupted the silence. On the good side, he didn’t hear Thran throwing up again, which was a relief.

To stay occupied, but near to hand in case Thran needed him, Bard lugged his clay and stand up to the children’s study, where he could work on his often-interrupted totem heads while Thran slept. He made good progress on Mars before the scramble of unsteady feet alerted him to Thran’s latest foray into the bathroom. He scampered after his husband, there to steady him as his stomach turned itself inside out. Not much came out, but it wasn’t for lack of trying. How hard was it to watch nausea wrack a body usually under such exquisite control?

If watching Thran so wracked was hard once, it was just as hard the next eight times. All morning and afternoon, Bard did what he could to steady Thran when nausea would not be denied, carry him back to bed, and wipe his face. Around he went with the antiseptic wipes to keep everything as clean as possible. He coaxed cup after cup of ice chips down Thran’s throat, trying to keep him hydrated. Finally, late in the afternoon after the children came home, Thran fell into a deep sleep, and his stomach calmed. Bard risked cooking rice and chicken for the children’s supper in the hopes that the aromas wouldn’t affect his sleeping husband. His mobile didn’t chime throughout their meal, so that was a promising sign. After everyone had finished, Bard left the children to clean up while he went upstairs to see if Thran were still asleep.

“Bard?” Thran’s voice came weakly when Bard came into the room.

“Right here.” Bard had found out early this morning that sitting on the bed jostled Thran, which was enough to send his stomach into spasms, so instead he kneeled beside the bed. “Do you have to get up?”

“No. I think my stomach is better. It does not hurt the way it did.”
“That’s great, angel. I’ll bring you some ice chips.”

“I am so thirsty. Would you bring me something to drink? Maybe a few sips would stay down.”

“Absolutely. I’ll bring you something right now. Be back in a tick.”

Bard trotted downstairs, grabbed a bottle of sports beverage from the pantry and a glass from the cabinet, and ran back upstairs. Thran had turned over onto his back, and struggled weakly to stick a pillow under his head. Once Bard set his things down, he arranged the pillows against the headboard and helped Thran to sit up against them. His husband sank back against the pillows with a sigh and a wince.

“I’ll turn on the light, so watch your eyes,” Bard warned, and Thran shut his eyes accordingly. The added illumination revealed a pale, emaciated face with dark eye sockets, but that face was more at peace.

“You look more comfortable,” Bard offered, reaching for the bottle and glass he’d brought upstairs. “How do you feel?”

“So tired,” Thran murmured, licking dry lips. “Very thirsty. My ribs and abs feel as if I have been in a fight. But my stomach does not feel like it is about to erupt out of my throat.”

“That’s great.” Bard poured the glass half full and handed it to Thran. “Here, angel. Just a few sips to see how they settle in your stomach.”

Thran held the glass to his lips as if he weren’t sure he’d end up with a mouthful of poison or ambrosia. He let a few drops slide down his throat, and licked his lips to moisten them. “Ugh. This tastes very artificial. What is it?”

“The most innocuous flavor of sports beverage I could find,” Bard replied. “I didn’t think anything that was purple, blue, red, or neon yellow would help. This is the plain one. You haven’t eaten or drunk anything for two days, so you need all the electrolytes and such. It probably tastes better with ice, but I didn’t know how something cold would feel after so much heaving.”

Thran hummed. “You take good care of me.”

“A certain dancer took good care of me, too, when I had the flu a few weeks ago.”

Thran offered him a thin smile. “I had a much harder time to keep you in bed.”

“Stomach viruses pack a much harder punch than the flu does. How does the liquid feel going down?”

“So far, so good.” Thran took another sip. “It feels good on my throat. I am parched.”

“You are. As soon as you can handle it, I’ve got enough tea and so forth to float a battleship. You’re so dehydrated that you look like that beef jerky Kíllian loves so much.”

“How picturesque,” Thran leaned back into the pillows with a rueful smile. “How did the ballet rehearsal go today?”

“I’ve no idea. I was more interested in whether you survived your devoted service to the porcelain goddess,” Bard quipped. “Now that you have, I’m more interested in getting you ready to resume your devoted service to Terpsichore.”
Thran rolled his eyes. It was mostly bravado, but it was the most animated expression Thran had shown in two days, and it drew Bard’s relieved grin. He reached under the pillow to retrieve Thran’s mobile.

“Ah, good. The dancer is more irritable than his stomach at last. I’m calling Ori to tell him you’ve turned the corner. If you’re good, I’ll let you talk to him, but only for two minutes. You’ve been through the wringer, and you need to let your body recover. Lots of Russian gesticulations when you talk to Ori are not on the agenda.”

“You are a tyrant,” Thran grumbled, as Bard opened Thran’s mobile and placed the call.

“So sue me,” Bard replied without apology. “If you don’t want to do that, drink your juice.”

Thran glowered, but he did as he was told, as Bard put the mobile up to his ear.

“Hello?” Ori answered breathlessly. “Thran?”

“Hi, Ori. It’s Bard. I thought you’d like to know that Thran’s stomach calmed down about four this afternoon, and he slept solidly after that. He’s just woken up now, and I think he’s on the mend. He’s having some liquids, and if they stay down, I’ll get him rehydrated again. I’ll let you know in the morning how he is.”

“Oh, that’s great news, Bard, just stellar. I’m so relieved,” Ori breathed. “Tell him I’m glad he feels better.”

“You can tell him yourself if you want. But I’ve told him he can’t gesticulate or get agitated, and he can’t talk to you for more than two minutes, because he looks like he’ll blow away in a stiff breeze. If you have anything to say that needs more time, I’ll get back on.”

“No, that’s perfect. Everything went well today. We had five dancers out, including Thran, but we still got the technical rehearsal off without a hitch.”

“That’s great news. All right, here’s the sick one. I’ll talk to you in the morning, Ori. Hang in there.”

“Thanks, Bard. This is the best news I could get, really. Put him on.”

“Okay, here he is. And I’m counting.”

A laugh whispered from the mobile. “I’ll count, too.”

Bard held the mobile out to Thran. “All yours.”

Thran took the mobile eagerly. “Ori? Yes, I am better. Weak, yes, but the nausea has passed. Bard has taken good care of me. How did the rehearsal go today?”

Thran listened intently as Ori filled him in on the day’s progress. The news must have been good, because Thran had little to say while he listened. At length, he said, “Ah. That is a relief. Yes, thank goodness all went so well. I will rest tonight, and hope that I will see you tomorrow, if my jailor allows it.”

Bard stuck his tongue out at Thran, who stuck his out in reply. “Yes, I gesticulate in Bard’s general direction. Yes, I will rest. Thank you, Ori, to see to everything so well. Yes, I will be the good patient. All right. Yes, here is Bard again.”

Thran handed his mobile back to Bard, who put the device to his ear. “He’ll pay for that jailor comment. I’ll tell him he can’t go anywhere until he’s drunk two dozen bottles of sports drink.”

“You do that. I’ll let Lettie know that Thran’s on the mend, and we’ll hope for the best tomorrow. You know the dress rehearsal’s not until seven in the evening, I hope? So he’ll have that much more time to recover.”

“I’m counting on that,” Bard replied. “So let me get on with dosing the dancer, and I’ll talk to you tomorrow morning.”

“Thanks, Bard. I’ll talk to you then.”

Ori disconnected the call, so Bard handed Thran’s mobile back to him. “You’ll excuse me while I scrub down, Thran. I have no intention of letting your germs get the better of me.”

Bard ducked into the bathroom, washed his hands thoroughly, and rubbed hand sanitizer over his hands as well as his cheek and ear. Overkill, maybe, but watching Thran spew his guts for twelve hours was as close to doing it himself as he wanted to get. By the time he reappeared in the bedroom, Thran had finished his half glass of sports drink, and was pouring himself another glass.

“This is nasty, but I admit it tastes far better than the nasty pink stuff,” Thran said.

“It wouldn’t take much to taste better than that,” Bard agreed. “You rest. I’ll let the children know that you feel better and start them on their showers.”

“I miss them, but do not let them come in here,” Thran urged. “So many germs still. They do not need to host any of them.”

“I’ll let them know.” Bard risked a quick pull of Thran’s braid. “I’m glad you’re better, angel. I’ll come back and help you clean up a little, as soon as you feel up to it. Keep sipping your stuff. I made plain rice and plain chicken tonight, so anytime you feel hungry, I’ve got broth and stuff that’ll be easy on your stomach.”

“First, the electrolyte nectar,” Thran eyed his glass dubiously. “At least I will not be thirsty much longer.”

“Good,” Bard waved, as he headed downstairs to see the children. They all looked up at him when he came into the sitting room.

“How is Papa?” Legolas asked anxiously. “Is he still getting sick?”

“He’s awake, and his stomach is calm, and he’s able to drink some of the sports drink. So I think he’s on the mend at last.”

“Most excellent!” Bain pumped his fist, as Tilda clapped her hands and Sigrid heaved a big sigh of relief. “Stellar!”

“He’s awake, but he doesn’t want any of you to get too near him yet. You can stand by the door and say hello. I’m going to get him through the shower if he can manage it in a bit, and I want all of you to start the cycle, too. You’ve got camp tomorrow, and then if Thran goes to his rehearsal, the rest of us will go see a film.”

“You go see Ada first, Legs,” Sigrid urged. “Then you can shower to get rid of the germs, and the rest of us will go after.”
“That’s a good idea, sweetness,” Bard patted her shoulder, as Legolas jumped up and ran upstairs to look in on his father. The relieved smile on the youth’s face buoyed Bard’s spirits – finally, things were looking up.

Over the course of the next hour, the children went upstairs to see Thran, then take their showers. After hers, Sigrid retreated to her room to talk to Finn, who had taken her place at the Blue Mountain Bistro as she had hoped. The youth had fit in well at the bistro, and Sigrid was impatient to return, because all indications were that Miss Dís intended to keep Finn on after Sigrid returned. That would be a wonderful end to the months where she’d seen her boyfriend only sporadically. Tilda was ready for bed after her shower, and the boys gladly retreated to a last couple of video car races before they followed their sister to bed. Once Bard bid them all goodnight, he helped Thran through the shower – he didn’t dally, because Thran was weak after his bout with the virus. Once he got Thran back into bed, he got his shower, and felt much the better for it.

The next job was to warm up a little plain rice and a bit of chicken, which Thran carefully nibbled over the course of half an hour. Both of them were elated when the bland food settled without upset. A large pot of tea followed the rice and chicken, until close to midnight Thran finally stopped feeling so thirsty. Bard left his husband to drink the last of the pot while he cleaned up the dishes and checked over the house. He came back upstairs to find Thran all but asleep, still on Bard’s side of the bed.

“No, don’t try to move over, angel; where you are is fine,” Bard assured him as he got in on Thran’s usual side of the bed. “You’re closer to the bathroom over there, just in case you need it, and I’m fine over here. The important thing is that you rest.”

“I feel like I could sleep for a month,” Thran mumbled. “I drink my tea, I eat my rice and chicken, I have a shower, and I am exhausted.”

“Throwing up is hard work. So sleep. You don’t have to get up tomorrow. Sleep until noon. Or later.”

“I might,” Thran admitted. “Forgive me that I do not snuggle with you. I think only to keep my germs to myself.”

“I’ll wash the sheets tomorrow,” Bard murmured back. “That’ll kill a few more of the bastards.” Thran hummed in response. A long, elegant hand snaked out to stroke Bard’s thigh. “A pox on them.”

“Indeed. Sleep well, angel. Sing out if you need anything.”

A soft chuckle accompanied another caress along Bard’s thigh. “I have all I need, lyubov noya. Thank you.”

Bard kissed his index finger, then traced it over Thran’s arm. “You’re welcome. Love you.”

“Love you, too.”

In seconds, Thran was asleep. As his breath settled, Bard sent a silent apology to the gods for his earlier diatribe, thanks for an end to Thran’s misery, and a plea for the night’s rest to restore Thran as much as possible. Unless Thran couldn’t stand up tomorrow morning, he’d demand to go to the school to dance his dress rehearsal. The more energy he recovered during the night, the easier it would be for him to get through that dress rehearsal, and he more energy he’d have for Friday’s rehearsal and Saturday’s premiere.
So much rode on that premiere. If Bard had a way to drain some of his strength and pass it to Thran, he’d do it. But short of that, he’d support Thran every other way he could.

He fell asleep thinking of how best he could do that.

* * *

Thursday morning dawned. Bard got up, fed the children, and sent them off to their camps with Gavreel and Charmeine in Thran’s SUV. Then he worked on his clay in the children’s study until Thran finally roused at just after noon. When the bathroom door closed, Bard got up from his stool and padded into the bedroom, listening for signs of nausea, but to his relief he heard only the normal morning noises. The door opened, and Thran appeared. He was still pale, but he was steady on his feet, and his face showed no discomfort.

“You look so much better,” Bard greeted, coming forward to hug his husband gently. “I hope you feel better.”

“I do. Still light and ungrounded, but I am hungry, and thirsty, and that is good enough for now.”

“I’ll make you some breakfast. What sounds good?”

Thran opened his dresser to find underwear, tee, shorts. “Perhaps more rice. Something very bland and light.”

“Just the tick.”

Bard washed the clay off his hands while Thran dressed, and ducked into the children’s study long enough to throw a cover over his clay. Coming behind him, Thran put a hand on his shoulder.

“Your totem pieces? I thought you worked on those in the solarium.”

Bard flipped up the cloth to show Thran how far he’d gotten on a pair of the heads. “I couldn’t hear you when I was down there. I moved up here so I could lend a hand when you needed it.”

Sighing, Thran gave Bard a reluctant smile. “What am I to do with you, my saint? You become the angel of mercy in all but name.”

“Complain, complain, complain,” Bard teased as he covered the clay. “You won’t think so well of me when I make you drink a gallon of tea with your rice.”

“I will do so gladly. And after I do so, I will call Ori and tell him that I will be at rehearsal tonight.”

Bard shot Thran a concerned look as they came into the kitchen. “Would you wait until you see how breakfast settles, please? Yes, I know the premiere’s in two days, and yes, I know dress rehearsal is very important, but please, see how you feel in an hour before you call Ori.”

“If it will reassure you, then yes, I will do so. But I already know that I am well enough to dance a rehearsal. I will not make everyone associated with Immortal worry about whether I am fit to dance or not. I will not be as strong as I want to be, but I will be strong enough.”

Bard held up his hands. “Tell me that after breakfast, and I won’t say another word.”
After a bowl of rice, two plain scrambled eggs, and an entire pot of tea, Thran did just that. Bard had not expected otherwise, but it reassured him to see Thran’s face ease from its terminal pallor and deathly weariness. He was still pale, but his eye sockets weren’t so dark, he moved without discomfort, and he was more animated than he had been in days. So Bard listened without complaint while his husband called Ori.

“Hello, Ori! Yes, it is me this time, not Bard. Yes, I am much recovered. Yes, I have slept well, my stomach does not ache, and I have eaten a good breakfast. I will be at tonight’s rehearsal without fail. We plan to meet at five for barre, yes? Then the rehearsal. Yes, I look forward to it. Yes, I am even more relieved that you are that this nasty bug has passed. How are the other dancers? Four will be in place tonight? Good – tell the other two that they will be welcome tomorrow, but do not come tonight. We cannot afford for anyone else to get sick. Yes, I will. So until tonight, mon cher. See you at five – a bientôt.”

As Thran disconnected the call, he eyed Bard warily. Perversely, Bard offered his husband a grin.

“No, I won’t tell you no, or tell you to see reason, angel. You know what you can and can’t do to prepare for this ballet better than I do.”

“What will you tell me?”

“Only one thing. When you go tonight, I go with you.”

“You have to be with the children.”

“Tomorrow night, I will be. Tonight, I’m with you. You’ll be exhausted when the rehearsal is done, so better I’m along to help you so Mike can concentrate on his job.”

“But the children.”

“The children will be in a film theatre two towns over. No one will know where they are but us, and there will be two professional bodyguards with them.”

Thran gave Bard a long look.

“I’ve thought about this all day, angel. You won’t talk me out of it.”

Thran continued to stare at Bard, but Bard stared back without a blink. At length, Thran sighed, and lifted a hand in concession. “It is clear that I will not. As you will, lyubov moya.”

“Thank you.”

Thran lifted his hand again.

During the rest of the afternoon, Thran rested on the sofa of the sitting room, sipping his tea or sports drink to keep his hydration up. At three, he had some plain chicken, plain yogurt, plain rice, and more tea. By the time the children came home, he felt much restored, and greeted them with a wide smile and many thanks for their concern. Bard told them about the change in plans for tonight, which none of the children liked; all of them but Tilda wanted to accompany Bard when he took Thran to the school. But Bard insisted. He sweetened the deal a bit by saying the bodyguards could take them out for pizza before the film, which quieted most of the protest. The children quickly bathed and dressed for their evening out, and Thran went upstairs to collect the things he’d need tonight for his rehearsal. They saw the children, Gavreel, and Charmeine off in Thran’s SUV, then Bard, Thran, and Mike set off in Bard’s truck for the school.
The last part of Immortal’s preparation was at hand.
Chapter 152

Chapter Summary

The angel rallies to dance, but a feral child adds a murderous epilogue.

Yes, it’s time for Lance to reappear.

Thran sat in the back seat of the truck as Bard, Mike, and he set out for the school. His dance bag lay beside him. So he was no better than baggage, was he, relegated to the back seat? After the previous twenty-four hours of lying flat in bed, the unwilling prisoner of his stomach, he was little better than baggage. His abs and ribs still hurt from all the heaving, and he was tired. His arms and legs trembled so much that he hoped he could muster the strength to lift Charisse the few times he had to do so. And as for dancing on pointe... the thought bore no consideration. He could have easily spent the next two days in bed asleep.

But tonight was dress rehearsal, and so many people depended on him. Just to appear at the school would reassure everyone that Saturday’s premiere would not be a disaster. But he would do more than merely appear. He would dance, just as he would Saturday night, and everyone would relax. All would be well.

In honesty, the hard part would not be to dance. He had danced when sick before, and this time would not be so bad. He was past the worst of the virus, and had only to marshal his strength. Once the music started, the dance would transport him past everything but his performance. The hard part would come after, when he would be exhausted. He’d be lucky to get to the truck under his own power.

So be it.

As Bard drove the short distance to the school, Thran shut his eyes and focused on the evening’s efforts. He would make his barre as gentle as possible – no grand jetés, and only gentle hops and jumps. Mostly stretches, and quiet, focused breathing to energize the body. If he were well limbered, he would dance well during rehearsal without the jetés at the barre, and the breathing would help his strength.

“I will not sign autographs before we go in today,” he murmured. “I must focus.”

“Understood,” Mike replied.

Bard flicked him a glance in the rear view mirror, but he didn’t say anything. He probably saw past Thran’s claim that he needed to focus. There was nothing wrong with his focus that a few giggly girls would interrupt, but better to say that than to admit that he needed to save every scrap of energy for the stage. Bard was already concerned enough.

“I’ll let you and Mike off at the door,” Bard said, as they turned into the school parking lot. “If you’re quick, you’ll get past most of the girls and so forth with just a wave.”

“Looks like we’ve got more to deal with tonight, Thran,” Mike observed. “Looks like photographers and reporters, too.”
Thran silently cursed the lot of them. Likely the story of the stomach virus scourge had gotten out, and vultures had alit hoping for a juicy meal. He mustered a calm unruffled expression as Bard maneuvered the truck as close to the school doors as possible. Mike bolted out at once to pull open Thran’s door. Thran already had his bag over his shoulder, and stepped out smoothly. Mike slammed the doors shut, and Bard pulled away. Mike positioned himself between Thran and the descending crowd, and they moved quickly towards the door. Thank the gods, a security guard stood there, waiting to open the door for them.

“Thran! Over here! How are you feeling today? Did illness keep you away yesterday? Mr. Oropherson! Is it true that half the company has stomach flu? Does this mean you intend to cancel Immortal’s premiere? Thran!”

“I am very well, thank you!” Thran called, smiling and holding his arms wide. “The company is well, and of course we are most excited to premiere Immortal on Saturday! It is the most wonderful ballet, and I cannot wait to dance it! I hope you will be with us then!”

He and Mike managed to get to the school door ahead of most of the throng, and Mike and the security guard kept everyone back for Thran to slip inside. Mike followed, then pulled the door firmly shut after them.

“Glad to see you, Thran,” Ernie hailed from his station in front of the auditorium. “There’s a pack of them out there tonight for sure.”

“Excitement abounds,” Thran shook his head, smiling ruefully, as he opened his bag for Ernie’s inspection. “I like it better when the excitement surrounds someone else.”

“Comes with the territory, I guess,” Ernie shrugged as he gave Thran’s bag a cursory poke. He’d learned that Thran never carried anything but dancewear, a water bottle, and his lunch. Too boring by far.

“I suppose. But better it follows Immortal then the poor dancer who presents it, yes?”

“I can see that, yeah. Okay, Thran, you’re spotless as usual.”

Thran rezipped his bag and put it over his shoulder. “Thank you, Ernie. May all be quiet for you this evening.”

“I’d love that, yeah. Break a leg tonight!” the security guard wished him.

Thran offered Ernie a wave as Mike opened the auditorium door. As he came into the vast space, welcome calm fell over him. He was where he needed to be, and soon he would dance.

Mike set about his usual scan, so Thran proceeded leisurely down the right aisle towards the stage. Members of the set crew already bustled back and forth, and when he looked back at the light and sound booth above the seats, figures moved there, as well. He lifted a hand in greeting, smiling when several hands waved back. A few of the corps dancers wandered on the stage in their practice wear, hailing him in relief when they spotted him. He came onstage to meet them, assuring them that he was much better, and ready to dance. One of the men looked just as peaked as Thran did, but he smiled gamely, proof enough that he was ready to do his best. Thran’s pride in UVB’s courage swelled, bolstering his determination to dance well tonight. For the first time, Immortal would appear complete with costumes, sets, music, lights, and a band of dancers who had sacrificed much, and he would do all of it equal justice.

Mike came onstage to tell him his dressing room was clear. Before he went back to change, he looked back over the auditorium, looking for Bard. Yes, there he was – he came down the aisle with Charisse and Luka, and several of the corps trailed behind.

“Man, what a mess!” Luka heralded, grinning. “A whole bunch of people seem to think we’re putting on a show in here!”

“Oh, mon Dieu,” Charisse shook her head. “All of them are vultures, oui? So sure we are all sick, all dying, too ill to put on anything but the last act of Hamlet! Snap-snap-snap with the cameras, and not one of them looking with their eyes.”

“They are pretty thick out there,” Bard admitted. “There are two more security guards to help the dancers through the flow.”

“It is too bad we told the very sick dancers to stay home,” Thran gave an evil smile. “They could have offered their bounty to the pushy ones. But that would put the children and the devotees through such suffering, which none of us wants, so I suppose it is better that the sick stayed home.”

“Oy vey, I feel like I’ve run through a gantlet!” Ori came up looking frazzled. “What a horde!”

“Maybe they’ll go away once we all get inside,” Luka offered. “There won’t be anything more to see after that.”

“One should live so long,” Charisse sighed. “Eh bien, time to dress, and calm down.”

“Exactement, ma chère,” Thran agreed, so all of the new arrivals headed for the dressing rooms. Bard came after Thran and Luka to the dressing room, but he had a perverse smile on his face.

“That is a most interesting smile, lyubov moya,” Thran observed, as Bard squeezed into the corner so Thran and Luka could change.

Luka snickered as he sorted out his practice wear. “Your hubby’s a funny man, Thran.”

“Of course he is. Ah, did some of the reporters just discover this?”

Bard turned red, but his smile didn’t diminish. “All I did was walk into the school with you and Charisse. The reporters were interested in our Tinker Bell, not me.”

“They weren’t after they asked you what part you danced,” Luka grinned. “You said you played the extinguished role of Otis. T. Driftwood, whoever that is.”

Bard snickered. “It’s Otis B. Driftwood. He’s the opera impresario that Groucho Marx played in A Night at the Opera. He makes a shambles of everything.”

Thran laughed. “You are a clown indeed, Bard.”

Bard looked quite pleased with himself. “Every now and then. For the next few hours, though, I’m the artist who has the pleasure and privilege to draw both of you and the rest of the company as you dance the most amazing ballet. It’ll be beyond spectacular.”

Thran sent him a small smile. “Thank you, my saint. We will do our best.”

“Our very best,” Luka said firmly. “And then on Saturday, we’ll do even better.”

“You will,” Bard nodded.

Bard’s simple, firm assurance was more eloquent than a thousand more flowery words.
Bard slipped out to talk to Ori, leaving Thran and Luka to finish dressing. They wound their way through the crowded hall to the corridor beside the auditorium, and went into the large room where they would do their barre. This was yet another reason why the dress rehearsals were in the evening – camps were not in session, so the room was available to the dancers, so that they did not have to appear on the stage before their performance when the audience would be filtering in to find their seats. The set crew also didn’t have to haul the portable barres on and off the stage, either, so could concentrate on getting everything ready for the performance.

Bard eased in just after the dancers had assembled, and Abebe began to call the figures. The piano from the music room tinkled softly, and Thran gave himself to the movements without concern for what went on around him. He noticed once that Bard plied his colored pencils tonight, with one stuck behind his ear, another caught between his teeth, and another six at the ready in his right hand while his left hand sketched over the paper. Ah, it felt good to stretch, even if his ribs were sore. He so rarely missed his daily meditation at the barre that to resume it after yesterday’s agony felt good. He still chose to omit the grand jetés, but that was the only concession he made for yesterday’s illness.

When he was well warmed, he headed back to his dressing room with the other dancers. Now the excitement began to build, because his costumes and makeup awaited him. Someone had found another chair for the dressing room, so he and Luka both had a perch before the mirror to create the faces of their characters.

Thran’s headdress would provide the fringe of hair around his face, so he brushed the sides of his hair up and away from his face, pinning it at the back of his head so that the strands streamed down his back. Beside him, Luka rubbed something in his hair that made it curl smoothly rather than frizz. As they began on their make up, Bard slipped in, leaning against the wall behind them to sketch them as they dabbed and brushed. Thank the gods for makeup – Thran’s dark eye sockets and gaunt cheeks would vanish behind layers of grey, blue, black, and white, and become Death’s angular, ageless, inexorable face. Sharp angles hinted at the skull beneath the pale face. In contrast, Luka’s cheeks and lips were rosy as befitted the living.

Luka finished his makeup first, so he got into his costume first. His tights were ivory to the calves, then dark grey to define the Soldier’s boots; his dancing slippers were a matching grey. His military tunic was a matching ivory with white and silver braid across the chest and on the collar. Rada had chosen to make the tunics sleeveless to save fabric, and therefore reduce the cost, but the dancers liked them because they were cooler and less confining, and Irmo liked them because they didn’t hide the beautiful bodies beneath them, and made the contrast between the mortals and Death even starker. Once Luka eased his tunic on over his head, he left the dressing room to find the costume intern who would give him the green and red glow sticks for the front of his costume.

Makeup done, Thran stripped off his practice wear, and got into his dance belt and body stocking. Because the body stocking Thran wore in Act III of the ballet had created such a sensation, Rada had decided to make a similar garment the starting point for all of Death’s costumes. In Act I, Thran’s body stocking was painted like armor on the arms and legs, with shimmering iridescent blue and purple streamers that fluttered as he flew down to the stage to reap the fallen soldiers’ souls. Thran took pains to adjust the body stocking until it was comfortable, because his flying harness went over top, and any fold or tightness could be excruciating when he flew.

Once Thran got his body stocking to his liking, Bard stuck his head out of the dressing room to alert Robbie and Tink, who came in with Thran’s flying harness. Robbie was clad as a denizen of the Underworld, but Tink was clad in head to toe black, even down to her hands and face. The riggers methodically got Thran into his harness, adjusting this and that to make sure he was ready to fly safely. Only then was Thran ready to maneuver into his tunic, so Tink stuck her head outside the dressing room to call for the costume team. Two techs appeared immediately with his tunic, headdress, and gloves.

The sleeveless tunic that went atop Thran’s body stocking and flying rig was replete with arcane symbols and slight padding across the chest to give Death a stylized, armored breastplate. More streamers accentuated the back and shoulders. Reflective as well as luminescent paint added to the costume’s glow, and channels up and down the tunic held lengths of children’s glow necklaces, already glowing a deep ultraviolet blue.

Next was the headdress that slightly elongated his skull. It was covered with silky strands of white hair to supplement Thran’s own, and the techs pinned it in place with an army of bobby pins. Atop the headdress went a jeweled crown, and nestled behind the crown went an armored helmet with curled horns at the sides.

Once everything was in place, Thran admired the effect in the mirror. This was the first time he’d seen the costume fully illuminated, and he and Bard shared an appreciative grin. Tink and Robbie made sure the hook for Thran’s line was clear, then excused themselves to alert Mike that Thran was ready to go onstage, and to check their rigging one last time.

Thran made a theatrical gesture into the mirror for Bard’s benefit. “Rada has created a wonderful costume. It is vivid enough to dance itself.”

“As long as it helps you dance well, angel.” Bard eased away from the wall behind Thran, and tapped the front of Thran’s costume. “Once Mike gets here to escort you to the stage, I’ll find a good seat to watch the show. But know I’m in here, too.”

Smiling, Thran took Bard’s right hand and mimed a kiss on his wedding ring – only to remember that he still wore his. “I should have taken my ring off and put it our box before we left home, lyubov moya. And normally, I would take it off now and have you hold it. But this once, because I have the gloves, I will wear it when I dance. It will add your strength to mine.”

They shared one last look, then Mike came in to escort Thran to the stage. Thran put on his dancing slippers, gave himself one last critical look in the mirror, and pulled on his costume gloves with their elongated fingers, completing the transformation. Bard led the way to Stage Right where Thran would climb up to his perch, then took his leave. Mike waited until Half Ton – dressed as an Underworld inhabitant – Robbie, and Tink surrounded him to attach his wire, then he faded backstage. With Tink beside him, Thran climbed up to Death’s perch overseeing the battlefield, and settled into his brooding crouch. Tink checked his wire once more, and the comforting upward pull of the wire assured him that Robbie and Half Ton were ready. Tink stooped beside him.

“You’re ready to go, Thran. Break a leg.”

Thran held up his gloved hand for Tink to tap with her fist. Then she was gone, leaving Thran alone on his perch. He shut his eyes, and willed Death, Lord of the Underworld, to manifest within him.

As if in response, the lights at his feet came up to bathe him in more blue light.

So much hard work. So many months. So many obstacles. But at last, here he was, ready to sacrifice himself in a story of immortal power greater than anything Death wielded.

As the house lights went down, as the curtain went up, as Ligeti’s Kyrie began its low rumble, Thran forgot himself, his husband, his children, his life.

For the next ninety minutes, he was Death.

* * *

Below Thran, the darkened stage began to glow with a cold, faintly greenish light that revealed only the empty floor and the featureless black matte walls at the back of the stage. As the first film projected onto the walls, the nothingness slowly transformed into a stark prairie where leaden grey clouds loomed over only slightly lighter grey stubbled grass. A light breeze fluttered the sparse grasses. Soldiers clad in white tunics crept onto the prairie from Stage Left, while others clad in dark grey tunics crept from Stage Right. All had bright red glows at their hearts, symbolizing their mortal lives. Slowly they mustered their fury, and turned it into a swirling, chaotic dance where carnage and death ebbed and flowed with the eerie music. As each fell, the red glow abruptly vanished, to be replaced with a ghostly green one.

When the last soldier fell, a moment of silence and stillness fell as the lights on Thran’s platform waxed in intensity. He rose to his feet, felt the wire that would suspend him tighten in response, and let the massive dissonant chord of Prokofiev’s music fill his body with Death’s implacable force. The black walls now showed swarms of vultures and carrion crows swooping over the prairie. Thran launched himself from the platform, reveling in the rush of air over him as he swept down over the killing field, turned, and flew over it once again to land in the midst of the slain. He struck his pose as Tink came behind him to unhook his wire, then fell back to vanish offstage when he was free. He launched into the dance that had begun this ballet so many months ago – Death Collecting Souls on the Battlefield. He drew Death’s knife to free the mortal souls from their dead bodies, leaving them to trail weakly behind him as he continued his harvest.

He paused in the act of reaping when the first civilians appeared at the Stage Left, searching the bodies and lamenting when they found a fallen loved one. Out of the group ran Charisse, the Maid who searched so desperately for her Soldier, the very one who lay under Death’s hand. At her cries, the Soldier rallied, forcing Death to stay His hand as the Maid beseeched him with such frantic insistence. Around the pair Death danced, his harvest forgotten as he found Himself dazzled by the Maid’s beauty and vibrant nature. As she embraced Luka’s Soldier with glad relief, Death stretched out a yearning hand to her, but was powerless to touch either her or her Soldier. He gathered the souls He collected and retreated with them, leaving the lovers to savor their reunion, but stretched out a longing hand towards them before He left the stage.

From the wings, Thran watched Luka and Charisse dance their pas de deux that beautifully defined the depth of their devotion to one another. Before it was over, however, the riggers tethered him to his line again, and saw him up to Death’s high perch again to oversee the second battle. Again he soared down, backed by the projected film of swarming vultures and carrion crows, and again Death reaped His harvest of souls. This time, the Maid could not recall Luka’s Soldier, and he rose to follow Death despite all the Maid’s tears. At the end of the scene, the ornate wire gates to the Underworld slid across the stage to block the Maid from following Death’s procession. The curtain fell, and the house lights went up.

Backstage, Thran dashed into his dressing room with a pair of dressers to help him out of his gloves, armored helmet, flying harness, and body stocking. Gods, what a relief it was to be done with the stiff harness! It was so much more freeing not to have it squeezing his torso. On went a new body stocking, the one that he would wear for both Acts II and III. This one was painted to reveal Death’s attenuated body and musculature. Atop it went his armored tunic again. He retouched his makeup, replaced his armored helmet, and waited for the signal that the next act was about to begin before he pulled on his gloves. He joined the group of soldiers at Stage Right. The thrum of music started again, and up went the curtain.

Death led His string of souls onto the stage, and as they proceeded, the stage began its rotation, thanks to the Imladris Academy wrestling team. Slowly the gates of the Underworld appeared. At Death’s gesture, the gates slid to either side of the stage to reveal Death’s realm in all its dizzying blur of color and diversity. Unlike the mortal world that Death saw in only black and white and greys, the Underworld was rich with colors. Over the millennia, the various cultures had softened, faded, and blended with each enclave taking on aspects of others, while retaining its core essence. Every inhabitant featured the same ghostly green glow at the heart.

Death led His newly collected souls into His realm. Two denizens of His kingdom appeared to take His armored tunic, replacing it with an elaborate, flowing, floor-length court robe rich with jewels and elaborate trim, all in the same electric blue and silver pallet. Two more carefully removed the horned helmet from His headdress, leaving the jeweled crown in place atop His long white hair. Revealed in His splendor, Death took His new subjects through His kingdom. As they went, already some of the new souls found themselves taking on aspects of one enclave or another, acquiring a necklace here, or a hat there, as the kingdom assimilated them.

At the back of the group wandered Luka’s Soldier, distraught over his separation from the Maid – Charisse danced in the front of the stage, away from the rest, to show how completely she occupied her Soldier’s thoughts, no matter how exotic the disparate cultures of the vast Underworld were. Slowly, the stage rotated again, revealing Charisse as she danced her despair and loss to the Lachrimosa from Mozart’s Requiem. Halfway through, Luka appeared behind Charisse to dance his despair that mirrored hers, synchronizing his steps to hers to make a poignant pas de deux where the partners never touched.

At length, the Maid’s grief grew too terrible to bear, and she resolved to journey to the Underworld. Luka disappeared, and the stage rotated to show the gates of the Underworld. Her lament was so terrible that Death agreed to hear her petition, and the gates slid back to allow her into Death’s throne room. Rachmaninov’s The Isle of the Dead backed the Maid’s plea to replace her Soldier in Death’s kingdom. Despite the Soldier’s protests, Death was so entranced by the Maid that He accepted her offer, and once more the gates of the Underworld closed, this time to leave the Soldier outside in a swoon. The curtain fell.

Again Thran raced back to his dressing room. The next scene, when Death did His best to woo the Maid, was the most difficult of the ballet. He had more than the pointe work to master – his costume was so formfitting that he had no wherewithal to hide any misstep. Every step, turn, gesture, and nuance had to be perfect, or the audience would see the mistakes. He stripped off crown and robe, shimmied into the small kilted loincloth that went over his body stocking, and began the most important part of all of the ballet’s costume changes – off went his dancing slippers, and on, oh, so carefully, went his pointe shoes. Carefully, carefully, he settled his feet into the shoes, arranged the elastics, and then wound and tied his ribbons, making sure to tuck the ends out of sight. He had time for a few quick stretches so that he stayed warm and limber, and back he was in the wings, waiting for the curtain to rise.

The first notes of Vieuxtemps’ Elegy for Viola and Piano, Opus 30, began, Charisse paced in distraught despair, clad only in tights and leotard, both white, a bright red glow at her breast to show that she still lived. The interweaving notes of piano and sonorous viola were the perfect accompaniment to her pas de deux with Death as He helped her into a sumptuous gown of shimmering blue, then showered her with jewels, a lovely crown, silken linens for her bower. But though she wore Death’s gown, she cast His crown aside, and didn’t see the other rich gifts He offered her, because thoughts of her lost Soldier overwhelmed everything else. Luka, dressed in white tights and a white singlet that bore his red heart, came to dance just out of reach to symbolize how strongly he was in her thoughts. In desperation, Death rose on His toes to show the depth of His regard for the living Maid, but found Himself cast out of the pas de deux as the memory of her Soldier strengthened so much that the pair touched. The Maid slipped out of the richly jeweled blue gown to dance an impassioned, tender pas de deux with her Soldier before they whirled offstage. Despairing, Death fell to His knees in the midst of His rich gifts, and the lights died.

Thran raced to his dressing room to trade his pointe shoes for his regular dancing shoes, and his loincloth for his court robes and crown. As he changed, he imagined Luka dancing as the Soldier returned to mortal life on the earth, dreaming and despairing for the Maid who had taken his place in the Underworld. Tchaikovsky’s Valse Sentimentale was the accompaniment to the Soldier’s despair. Mirroring the scene of the Maid’s despair, Charisse appeared as the ghost in the Soldier’s thoughts, matching her steps to Luka’s. As the Maid disappeared, the Soldier resolved to offer his petition to Death, and dashed offstage.

As the stage rotated for the last time, Robbie, Half Ton, and Tink raced to get Charisse and Luka into their flying harnesses, and their tunics over top. As the Dies Irae from Verdi’s Requiem began, Luka appeared outside the gates that blocked mortals from the Underworld, angrily banging on the gates. Charisse appeared on the other side, reaching a hand out to him. So agitated were both of them that Death bade the gates slide open. In deference to the Maid’s pleas, Death allowed the Soldier to beseech Him for the life of the Maid. The Soldier exacted Death’s promise to return the Maid to the mortal world upon the Soldier’s death, then dramatically took one of the dead souls’ knife to plunge it into his breast, falling dead at the Maid’s feet. In fury, Death ordered His subjects to cast the Maid from His Kingdom. Reluctantly, several denizens of the Underworld came forward to force the Maid outside the closing gates, but at the last second, she eluded them, snatched the knife still protruding from her Soldier’s breast, and plunged it into her own to fall dead beside him.

The Underworld froze for several seconds of silence before Tchaikovsky’s Hymn of the Cherubim began its mournful chant. Even Death’s fury cooled in the face of the devotion and sacrifice of the couple, and stood by in sorrow as His subjects, Robbie, and Half Ton among them, reverently carried the Maid and the Soldier to lie side by side before their Lord’s throne. Hidden from the audience, Robbie and Half Ton attached Charisse and Luka’s lines to their harnesses; when they signaled that the lines were secure, they faded backstage, and the dancers moved back to offer their sorrow on bended knee. Death stepped forward to free the souls of the two, and they rose to reveal the green glow at their hearts, symbolizing their deaths. Despite their sorrow, both consoled each other with a brief pas de deux that despite their deaths, now nothing would keep them apart. Even Death’s final attempt to persuade the Maid to accept His regard was sad, for once again, the Maid had eyes only for her Soldier. In homage to their devotion, Death bowed a concession, and cast a handful of glitter upon them both. The green glow of their hearts changed to pure white, and Death raised His hands to raise them from His kingdom up to the heavens, where they would eternally shine together. Charisse and Luka made one last turn about the stage, and leapt into the air to rise to their heavenly station at Stage Left. As they embraced on the platform, the Soldier fell to his knees before his love, and the gates to the Underworld slowly closed almost completely shut. Death remained outside, looking up at the devoted lovers, even stretching a hand up to beseech them one last time. But the lovers had eyes only for each other, and Death conceded defeat before He returned behind his gates. The gates closed behind Him, and the lights dimmed until only the Maid and the Soldier remained illuminated. As the Hymn of the Cherubim reached its end, the dancers on the stage flitted into the wings, the spotlight faded, and the stage went dark. On the last note, the curtain fell.

When the house lights went up, such a wave of exhaustion fell over Thran that he sank to his knees in the wings. Around him, the chorus went out to practice their bow, then Luka, then Charisse. He got to his feet to go out for his own, and managed to stay on his feet to line up with the other dancers to take a collective bow. When the bowing finally stopped, he sank to his knees again.

“I am fine, merely tired,” he assured everyone. When Mike came from the wings to lend him a hand, he forced himself up, pulled off his gloves, and heaved an exaggerated breath with a bright grin. “Look, we have finally gotten Immortal on its feet, and it is so wonderful that I am completely overwhelmed.”

“I’ll help you back to your dressing room, Thran,” Mike offered, as the other dancers milled among themselves in excitement. “Come on.”

Thran was too weary to speak his agreement, but gladly followed Mike backstage to the row of dressing rooms. Gods, all he wanted to do was sink into the nearest chair, so he crowded hard on Mike’s heels as the big bodyguard pushed open the dressing room door.

A deafening bang shocked Thran nearly out of his skin. In front of him, Mike doubled over and sprawled onto the floor. As blood began to pool underneath the fallen man, Thran was too shocked to move. As movement returned, he backpedaled hastily, but a hand reached out and jerked him into the dressing room and slammed him against the far wall. As the barrel of a pistol was jammed into his ribs, a face swam into view.

Lance Dunmont had finally surfaced.
Chapter 153

Chapter Summary

Will the saint slay the dragon who plagues Clan Ffrnig?

Chapter Notes

Please be advised that this chapter has some disturbing, distressing, potentially triggering parts. Lance is a sadistic, psychotic piece of work, so read cautiously. I love you guys, and I don't want to cause any pain.

Bard sat back as the house lights came up. What a performance the UltraViolet Ballet Company had put on! The stark beginnings in the mortal world, then the complex, nuanced Underworld with its uncounted enclaves; the innocence and hope of the Maid and her Soldier, then the irrevocable finality of Death. To upend everything with the simplicity and strength of love... it had been magnificent.

The most magnificent part of all, of course, had been Thran. No matter how sick and exhausted Thran was, no matter how much love colored his eyes, Bard had expected wonder, technical wizardry, and dazzling technique. As many times as he’d seen Thran dance in the ballroom, in the studio, even rehearse on this stage, he knew that his husband was a dancer of rare skills. But all of that knowledge had not prepared Bard for Thran during performance. No matter that he’d watched Thran put on his costume and a flying rig, seen the dozens of bobby pins that kept his wig on, smelled the paint that covered his face, it wasn’t the same as seeing Thran under the lights, dancing to the music, living his role. Words seemed trivial and shallow when faced with Death’s implacable glare.

As for Death’s impossible love of a mortal Maid... no words described His heartbreaking loss with the same depth of feeling as Thran’s performance on pointe. He was light, as if Death were beyond gravity. He was alien, as if Death shared as much kinship with other peoples across the universe as He did with humans. He worshipped, yearned, begged, and despaired, all while floating above the ground. Even the petite Charisse didn’t rival him for control or expressiveness. No wonder Thran had slaved so much to do something so impossible for a man his size. The effect was worth every blister, every callus, every ache and pain.

When Thran appeared onstage to take his bow, Bard was too overwhelmed to do anything to stand and applaud. His eyes stung, and the lump in his throat was so large that he couldn’t cheer outright the way he wanted. He scraped the back of his hand across his eyes, so he didn’t realize that Thran had sunk to his knees until he looked up again. Mike was already helping his husband backstage, so Bard got up to hasten after them.

The crack of a gunshot shattered everything.

Bard froze as fast as everyone else, but he jerked into motion again a half second before everyone else. He tore up the stairs, across the stage, and down the hall to the last dressing room. The door was open, and he skittered to a stop.

Mike lay sprawled on the floor, blood pooling under him. Bard was only vaguely aware of Ori bursting in after him, but the small man was beside him as they went to help Mike.

“Lance has Thran,” Mike gasped. Blood flecked his lips, and the front of his red polo shirt was soaked with blood. “Wanted Sigrid. Thran said... not here. Lance said then we’ll go home and wait for her. Grabbed Thran’s bag, forced him out the emergency door. Kid’s got a cheap thirty-eight caliber snub-nosed revolver, five shot.”

Mike’s eyes rolled up into his head when he forced out the last word.

Ori had his mobile in his hand, already dialing 911. He dug into his pocket and forced his car keys into Bard’s hand. “Take my car. I’ll see to Mike. Hello? There’s been a shooting at the Imladris Academy. I need an ambulance STAT. Also, there’s a kidnapping in progress...”

Bard didn’t wait to hear more. He took Ori’s keys and bolted through the same emergency exit that Lance must have used when he grabbed Thran. As he raced for the parking lot, he caught a quick glimpse of his truck turning out of the parking lot. He found Ori’s car, threw himself into it, and raced after the fleeing truck.

His heart wasn’t in his throat. It was in his truck, a quarter mile ahead.

* * *

Lance slammed Thran into the wall hard enough to knock the breath out of him. He gasped, trying to suck air back into his lungs.

“Where’s Sigrid?” the boy snarled, putting his face an inch from Thran’s. He was filthy, and the reek of sweat and an unwashed body sent Thran’s long-suffering stomach into spasms. Bile rose into his mouth, but he swallowed it down with a convulsive shudder. It was harder to keep his trembling legs from collapsing beneath him, but as he sank, Lance rammed the barrel of his gun into his abdomen and jerked him upright again, forcing a cry from him. “Not so high and mighty now, are you, freak? Get Sigrid Bowman! I want her!”

“Not here,” Thran gasped, swallowing more bile. “She is not here!”

“Where is she? Get her!”

“I don’t know where she is. Nowhere near here, because of you.”

“I bet she’s scared, isn’t she? Scared of me? She ought to be. Come on, faggot – we’ll just go home and wait for her.”

Lance grabbed Thran’s dance bag and threw it at him. When he struggled to catch the bag, Lance grabbed him by the hair at the base of his neck and dragged him out of the dressing room, through the emergency exit at the end of the hall, and outside. Under Lance’s prodding, Thran had all he could do to lurch towards the parking lot – his dancing slippers slid on the grass.

“Move! Or I’ll shoot you right here!”
Thran did his best.

“Find your car. Find it now.”

Lance had Thran’s car keys in his hand, so Thran stumbled towards Bard’s truck. Lance unlocked the doors, looked inside the cab, and shoved Thran towards the driver’s seat. When Thran climbed in, Lance slammed the door and got in behind Thran. A dirty, scraped hand thrust the keys at him.

“Drive home. And don’t think I don’t know where you live.”

Thran put the keys in the ignition, pressed in the clutch, and started the truck. Bard always left the truck in first gear, so he released the emergency brake, let out the clutch, and drove slowly out of the parking lot. He flicked a glance in the rear view and side view mirrors; people had run out of the auditorium, but they were too far away to do anything to help him. He turned out onto the street just as slowly, but Lance smacked the side of his head with the butt of his gun.

“Faster!”

“There is a speed limit.”

“It ain’t ten miles an hour. Move it.”

Thran duly sped up to twenty-five. His heart pounded so hard it was hard to hear over it. His stomach knotted almost as badly as it had in the depths of the virus. Think, think! This vengeful child had just shot a man, perhaps had killed him. In another heartbeat he might be the next one fighting to breathe with a bullet in his lung. What could he do to help himself?

Lance grabbed Thran’s bag from the front passenger seat and rummaged through it. With a murmur of triumph, he pulled out Thran’s mobile.

“Where’s Sigrid?”

“I told you I don’t know where she is. It takes no genius to think that you would come to find her where everyone knew where I was, does it? So her father sent her away and did not tell me where. So I cannot tell you.”

“You fucking faggots think you’re so smart, but you’re not. Call her and tell her to go home.”

“She will not go home.”

“Why not? Too scared?”

“If you choose to think so, fine.”

Lance smacked Thran with the butt of his gun again, drawing Thran’s hiss. “Don’t sass me, faggot. I’ve had enough of that for a lifetime, and I’m not taking it from trash like you.”

“I cannot drive the truck if you hit me silly, and then where will you be?”

“Right now, I’m right where I want to be. Yeah, I thought so. You’ve got Sigrid’s number on your mobile. Maybe she won’t listen to you, but I bet she’ll listen to me.”

“What is the point to call her? She cannot give you anything you want. Do you even know what you want?”

“I know exactly what I want from her. She made a big mistake last Christmas Day, calling me out like that in front of my set. Made me look like shit, didn’t she? Then she and the rest of your fucking family crossed Angelo, and made him look like shit, and somehow you got him offed in the slammer. Then his gang turned on me, tried to take me out, and then when all was said and done, all of the gangs decided to blame me for the whole fucking mess. Told me I was not even worth killing, that they’d let me live just to show how little I meant to anything. Same shit I heard at home every fucking day. All of them, calling me nothing.’”

“There are counselors at school, or at the wilderness camp. They could help you –”

Another clout on the head. “Fuck them! Fuck every bastard one of them! Telling me I was wrong. Nothing about me was ever right. Them and their shit about getting along and earning respect and working together, which was just another way of saying they thought I was scum and needed to remember my place at the back of every line. It was all bullshit. Total fucking bullshit. Not one bit of me in any of it, was there? Way too much of why I had to be just like them. Yes, ma’am, no, ma’am, fucking please and thank you! Fucking suck my cock and like it!”

Thran slid a glance at the driver side mirror. It was hard to tell in the dark, but that might be Ori’s car a few vehicles behind him. Someone was near to help him. If he kept Lance talking, maybe he would make a mistake.

“You are very angry,” Thran ventured.

“Damned right I am,” The boy snarled. “Not one damned soul in this world gives a shit about me, do they? Kick me, that’s what’s on my back. I had to choke down a lot of shit to get anything from anybody, didn’t I? Then I finally get my toe in the door with Angelo, and I was doing good, until your sad lot came along. You wanted to make me look bad just like everyone else! Sent me to jail where they kicked me around, then that wussy wilderness camp where they kicked me around for the week I was there. Living wild was better than that – no one but me, myself, and I to please.”

“That must have been hard. How did you eat? Where did you stay?”

“You’d like to know, wouldn’t you? There are lots of places to hide, aren’t there? There’s niches in a lot of highway overpasses, but you’ll have to figure out the rest on your own.”

“I thought perhaps you stole a car and lived there.”

“Maybe I did, and maybe I didn’t.”

“Maybe you had to steal food?”

“Shit, that was the easy part. Check out any dumpster behind any restaurant. They throw tons of stuff away. Anything you want.”

“Still, it must not have been easy.”

“Better than to scrape along with the shit pickings you left me after Christmas fucking Day. Thanks for nothing.”

“If you had let the children have their soccer ball, or just kept it and sent them on, none of what happened after Christmas Day would have happened.”

“Yeah, nothing but I looked like a wuss in front of Manny and Jinks, didn’t I? You can’t put this one on me, faggot. If Sigrid had just kept her fucking mouth shut like any other ho, none of what happened next would have happened.”
A glance in the rear-view mirror showed Lance with his head down. Yes, he had Thran’s mobile, for he held it to his ear. “Hi, Sigrid Bowman. Surprise, surprise! Guess who this is.”

Thran bit his lip, trying not to moan as he thought of how terrified Tilda would be if she were anywhere near her sister. “Yeah, this is Lance. Know why I’m calling you on the faggot dancer’s mobile? Because I’ve got a gun pointed at him, that’s why. If you don’t want me to do more than point a gun at him, then you’d better haul your fucking ass up to your house in twenty minutes. What, you can’t get here in twenty minutes? Too bad, bitch! Guess your faggot dancer’s gonna suffer. I shot his bodyguard, did I forget to tell you that? So I can shoot him too, just as easy. In the ankles. That’ll keep him from dancing again, for damned sure. Oh, really? You’re half an hour away? Better hurry then. Sure, call the cops if you want. I don’t care. The more the merrier. Didn’t I say you were gonna pay? Now’s the time.”

Lance punched the mobile to disconnect the call. Even his brave lioness had to have quailed to hear such an evil speech, and his throat tightened to think of it. He was no less terrified at the prospect of Lance deliberately maiming him past ever dancing again. Even worse, what punishment might Lance decide to extract from Sigrid when she arrived at home as Lance had ordered? Rape? Death? Both? Maybe Charmeine and Gavreel and the police wouldn’t allow her to expose herself that way. As terrified as Thran was, he didn’t want his daughter to endure whatever sadistic punishment Lance chose to mete out.

There was nothing he could do right now to remove the danger to himself or his child. He’d have to choke down his terror and let matters proceed until a chance, however slim, arose.

* * *

Bard kept several cars between him and his truck, in case Lance were smart enough to watch for pursuit. Once he was sure the truck was on the way home, he ducked down a street two blocks away and wound through the side lanes until he was a block away from the house. He parked. Before he got out of Ori’s car, he pillaged the glove box, looking for anything he might use as a weapon. He found a ring of Allen wrenches – they didn’t seem promising. A kit of computer tools – small screwdrivers, mostly – no more promising. Oho! A multitool that had two kinds of screwdrivers, a wire nipper, tiny scissors, a magnifying class – yes, a knife blade! It was small, but good quality, so Bard folded it up and stuffed it in his pocket. He got out of Ori’s car, and sprinted towards home.

* * *

Thran’s throat closed when the car he thought belonged to Ori turned off a quarter mile from home. Gods, he was alone now, alone with a psychotic, gun-bearing boy bent on maiming and destroying Thran’s family. Never had he been so sure that he was about to die.

He looked at the wedding ring gleaming on his left hand, and swallowed his terror down. Bard would tell him not to give up, not to stop fighting, as long as he still breathed.

He pulled into the driveway, stopping halfway between the house and the carriage house. The outside landscaping and security lights around the house were on; within, the dining room windows revealed only a bit of the light that originated from the stove hood in the kitchen. It was clear that no one was at home. Thran pushed in the clutch and stepped on the brake, not sure what to do.

“Turn it off. Leave the lights on.”

Thran switched off the key, and palmed the ring in his hand. But Lance smacked him with the gun again, and thrust his other hand forward.

“Uh-uh. Give me the keys.”

Thran let Lance grab the keys from him.

The door behind Thran’s opened, and Lance edged out of the seat, brandishing the gun. He backed up a step, then yanked open Thran’s door.

“Get out. Hurry up.”

Thran took a surreptitious breath, marshaling his strength in case the next few moments gave him any opening at all. He couldn’t leave Sigrid to whatever this angry, feral boy had planned for her.

“Give me a moment. I have had the stomach virus for two days, and I am exhausted.”

“Tough shit. Get out. Now!”

Thran didn’t have to act weak; his limbs felt like rubber bands that had been stretched to their breaking point. He got his feet on the ground, holding onto the open door for support. He expected Lance to back up, keeping his distance from a man so much taller than he. But he didn’t. Did he intend to shoot him here, and leave his body slumped in the driveway?

For the merest fraction of a second, Lance lowered the gun just the least bit...

Without hesitation, Thran launched himself at the boy, punching and elbowing and kicking, both hands grabbing for the gun to hold it high. As his knee found a soft target in Lance’s stomach, sending the boy’s breath gusting out in an audible whoosh, Thran forced his fingers between Lance’s and the barrel of the gun. Another hard, well-placed knee, and the gun was in his hand! Lance went berserk, clawing and biting and snarling like any feral mongrel in a dogfight. Thran stumbled as he shoved Lance away from him, but the boy was back on him in a fraction of a second, clawing for the gun. Again he shoved the boy away, but his stomach knotted past his ignoring it, doubling him over. As Lance came at him again, Thran heaved the gun as hard as he could, high into the sky and straight towards the lane. It disappeared in the dark, arcing over the lane to land somewhere in the field on the other side. Thran didn’t hear it land – he was bent over his knees, retching.

With a howl of outrage, Lance seized a handful of Thran’s hair, and hurled him into the side of Bard’s truck. He hit with excruciating force, dazzled when pain shot through his hip, shoulder, and head. He couldn’t keep his feet, nor could he get his hands up to block Lance’s furious backhand whipping towards him. It landed on his temple with such brutal force that bright lights flashed before his eyes, and the enraged face of his attacker faded into the night.

* * *

Bard flitted through the four back yards that lay between him and his property. He crossed the Gamgees’ yard, then Will Whitfoot’s, pausing at the property line. He didn’t want to trigger the motion sensor that would switch on the lights to illuminate the back terrace. So he skirted along the edge of the property, rounded the ballroom, and peeked out to see the side of the house. Nothing. He risked crawling along the side edge of the house, then the porch, to see around the corner across the front lawn. There was his truck – was Thran driving? Because it was in motion, turning so that its headlights shone out towards the lane. The truck stopped, then shuddered to a standstill because someone didn’t know to push the clutch in when he applied the breaks. Thran knew how to drive a manual transmission, so Lance was at the wheel.

Where was Thran?

Lance got out of the truck and darted across the lane. Bard still couldn’t see Thran, but maybe he could sneak closer – no, before he’d fully formed the thought, Lance was back, cursing and swearing. He circled around the truck to the opposite side, still swearing, staying there several seconds. What was he doing? Should Bard try to get closer? Given that he couldn’t see what Lance was doing, and he didn’t know where Thran was – still in the truck, maybe? – Bard retraced his steps, again steering clear of the motion sensors in the back. By the time he made his way around and drew closer on the other side of Will’s line of yew bushes, Lance had had time to finish what had occupied him so.

He’d dragged what looked to be an unconscious Thran in front of the truck. He’d propped his husband, still in his ballet costume, to sit in front of it with his legs outstretched before him. Then he’d bound his wrists and neck to the front grille.

Lance got behind the wheel of the truck, and slammed the door shut.

He started the engine.

* * *

When Thran’s vision cleared, his wrists and neck hurt. It was hard to breathe. Engine noise deafened him. Other pains manifested – stomach, cheekbone, temple, hip, shoulder – gods, too many to count. He raised his head, and found it a little easier to breathe. Where on earth was he? There were his feet before him, so he was sitting down. Past his feet was the driveway, and past that was the lane. To the left was the carriage house; to the right was the barn. He saw all of them on the periphery of the lights that blazed on either side of him. If he could just rub his eyes...

Something held his wrists. When he tried to look, something held him by the throat, too –

Oh, gods, Lance had tied him to the front of Bard’s truck – ohgodsohgodsohgods –

He was about to die.

* * *

“Ori, he’s tied Thran to the front of my truck! He’s going to drag him down the lane and kill him –”
“Bard, Bard, listen to me! We’ve got a few minutes, so listen to me!” Ori begged. “Lance called Sigrid and told her he’s got Thran. He told her to meet them at the house. Gavreel, Charmeine, and the police all know this. They’re bringing Sigrid to the house – the other children are safe, they won’t be there – and a hostage negotiator, so Lance won’t do anything until they get there. A sniper team’s on the way, too. So hang on.”

Lance wouldn’t want to negotiate anything. He’d want to inflict as much damage as he could, to take away as much of the family’s joy as he could. All that was certain was that maybe the boy would be content to wait until Sigrid appeared. That gave him a little time.

“My truck’s a stick-shift, manual transmission, Ori. Lance doesn’t know how to drive it. If the snipers shoot him, the truck’s in gear, and it’ll drag Thran for however long it takes to get Lance out of the truck. Make sure the snipers damned well know that.”

“I’ll tell them.”

Bard hung up, and shoved his mobile back in his pocket. He wormed his way back as close to the right side of his truck as he could, staying behind the yew bushes and out of Lance’s line of sight. That was no good. He crawled around to the very end of the row of bushes, wondering whether he could crawl to the side of the truck without Lance seeing him...

Out past the end of driveway, a flurry of cars parked at the side of the lane. Car doors slammed.

Bard didn’t dally. He stayed low as he ran from the bushes to the back of his truck and dropped to his hands and knees. There was no indication that Lance had seen him, so he took a deep breath and patted his front jeans pocket to make sure Ori’s multitool was still there.

“Lance Dunmont?”

Bard peered under the truck, but he couldn’t see more than a pair of feet. Male feet. At least they didn’t belong to Sigrid.

The truck jolted a lick forward, then stopped. The boy had learned how to use the clutch, because the truck didn’t stall this time. But gods, what had that done to Thran?

“I want Sigrid Bowman. Anyone else, and the faggot dancer enjoys the ride.”

“I’m here, asshole.” Sigrid’s voice snarled.

Oh, gods. Now there were three members of Clan Ffyrnig in this.

The truck jolted forward another six inches.

“Gods, Lance! Stop it! I’m here!” Sigrid’s voice rose to a near shriek. “You’re going to break his arms! Please, Lance! Leave Thran alone!”

“Then let Thran go. I did what you wanted.”

The truck jolted forward again. Bard didn’t wait to hear more. He rolled under the truck onto his back with his head pointed towards Thran, made sure he stayed in the exact middle between the tires, and prayed that Lance didn’t get the idea to turn the truck in either direction. Then he shoved himself forward one painful inch at a time, until he was almost behind Thran. He reached a hand above his head to touch Thran’s back, and inched himself forward to the right of Thran’s body, until he could peek past the bumper.

Thran couldn’t look down because of the wire wrapped around his neck, but his eyes found his. His husband was terrified, but he hadn’t cried out or given Lance any reason to suspect what was going on. Bard inched forward until he could reach his arms up to the wire that bound Thran’s right wrist to the grille of the truck.

“You haven’t done half of what I want you to do,” Lance crowed. “You want to save your daddy’s fucktoy? Is he yours, too? I want to see you on your knees, right in front of me. Do it.”

Bard craned his neck around. Sigrid’s face was white, but she didn’t waver. She sank down to her knees on the driveway, her eyes fixed on his, but her expression gave no indication of what she saw. Bard turned back to Thran, groped for Ori’s multitool, and used the nippers to snip the wire around Thran’s wrist. Another snip, and the wire around his neck was cut, too. Thran fumbled to slip his wrist from the twisted ends, then to bend the wire ends away from his neck.

The truck jolted again, for no other reason than to get a shriek out of Sigrid. It succeeded, and it nearly got one out of Bard, too. Thran gasped, because he was still tethered to the truck by his left hand. He scrambled to slide forward before the motion broke his arm.

“For all the gods, Lance!” Sigrid pleaded. “Come on! Please, please, don’t hurt Thran!

“That’s one of the things I wanted from you,” Lance taunted. “I love to hear you beg. You deserve it. You fucking ruined my life, Sigrid Bowman, and now I’m going to fucking ruin yours.”

Bard slid back far enough to go behind Thran and roll to his other side. He slid up again, and clipped the final wire. Thran slithered flat, and he and Bard hurried to crawl back under the truck, keeping as evenly between the wheels as possible.

“I’m going to break every bone in your faggot dancer’s body until he looks like leftover road kill...”

Bard drove himself straight back under the truck without regard to how much skin he scraped off his back and elbows. Thran was almost as fast despite how badly he shook. When they were both crouched behind the truck, Thran clutched at Bard’s shoulders. His eyes were wide and unblinking.

“He is unarmed,” Thran rasped. “I got the gun from him and threw it across the lane. That is why he had to tie me to the front of the truck.”

Bard’s rage flared. This time, he didn’t squelch it.

He stood up, and strode down the driver’s side of his truck. Lance was too busy taunting Sigrid through the open window to see him coming until the last second, but it made no difference. Bard reached through the open window, grabbed a handful of greasy hair, and smashed Lance face first into the steering wheel. While the boy recoiled, Bard reached past him to turn off the key in the ignition, which kept the truck from rolling into Sigrid as she scrambled to her feet. Then he yanked open the door, grabbed the boy by his shirtfront, and threw him out of the truck and across the driveway towards the carriage house. The boy was still rolling when Bard dragged him up by his shirtfront and punched him, sending him into the grass. Then he stamped his foot onto Lance’s chest hard. The boy’s face was a bloody ruin.

“Get up,” he snarled, as uniformed policemen ran up the driveway. “Please, get up. Do it, and I’ll make you wish you’d never heard of my family. Just do it.”

Two policemen urged Bard away, but it took a second before Bard mastered his rage enough to comply. He backed away as the two policemen got the groggy boy to his feet. A third pulled out a set of handcuffs –

Lance lunged at the policeman in front of him, grabbing for his service revolver, actually pulling it from the officer’s belt –

_Ohfuckohfuckohfuck, how many chances did one enraged child get to inflict such mindless carnage?_

“Sigrid!” Bard howled, as Lance and the policemen struggled. The boy went berserk, seemingly impossible to hold, restrain, subdue, stop. “Sigrid! Thran! Run! Oh, gods –!”

The deadly tangle with a gun at the center of it spilled onto the grass, ending only when a single shot split the summer night.

When the policemen sorted themselves out, Lance lay still at last.
Chapter 154

Chapter Summary

The angel, the saint, and the eldest cherub deal with the aftermath.

Chapter Notes

Please proceed with caution. There may be bits that are distressing, but not like in the previous chapter. Be safe, all.

When Bard stormed around the end of the truck and went for Lance, Thran crawled to the bottom of the front porch steps and huddled there. Not a single atom of strength remained in his body, and he was helpless to move farther. He turned in time to see Bard reach inside the window, grab Lance, and smash him into the steering wheel with an audible crack. The truck engine died. The door flew violently open, and Bard dragged the stunned boy out from behind the wheel and hurled him across the driveway with so much rage that Thran cowered. After Lance sprawled across the driveway, Bard stalked after him, hauled him up, and punched him so viciously that the blow landed with a sickening crunch. The boy fell to the grass, moving only feebly.

“Get up.” Bard’s voice was a feral snarl that sent a shiver up Thran’s spine. “Please, get up. Do it, and I’ll make you wish you’d never heard of my family. Just do it.”

Gods, make Lance look into Bard’s eyes, hear his words, and know what real terror was! Even the police who converged on the pair hesitated at his husband’s savage voice. If Bard had fallen to his knees to kill the boy, Thran would not have been surprised, and he might not have tried to stop him if he’d had the physical resources to do so. But his husband forced himself calm, and stepped back to let the police take the boy into custody –

At Bard’s agonized howl of warning, Thran instinctively rolled into a ball. He could not have moved from his huddle even if Lance had run at him with gun in hand, but he got his head up to see what evil loomed. It was beyond him even to muster a vestige of his Prince of Ice glare, but he would face his attacker, even if he were to die for the affront –

No one came towards him. A tangle of bodies – Lance and the police – tumbled over the grass. Sigrid was not in sight, but Bard barred the way between Thran and the thrashing, struggling group –

A single gunshot echoed. Thran clapped hands over his ears and his body mustered enough energy to convulse. Who had shot? The police? Had the shot hit anyone? Had Lance somehow managed to snatch another weapon to inflict still more mayhem on his family or the police?

Were Bard and Sigrid all right?

When Thran uncurled and opened his eyes, Bard stood motionless beside an equally motionless knot of policemen. At their feet lay a crumpled, unmoving knot of filthy jeans, grey stained tee, and battered trainers that had been Lance Dunmont.
It was over.

Thran slumped against the bottom stair, overwhelmed with relief as the last rush of adrenaline waned. He went cold, and his body shook beyond his ability to still it. When two of the police stooped beside Lance to feel for a pulse, Bard rushed to Sigrid, who flung herself into his arms. How tightly did Sigrid cling to her father, one arm around his neck and the other hand clutching a handful of his hair, her face buried in the crook of Bard’s neck? The elemental rage that had enflamed her father was gone, and once again he was the nurturing parent that Sigrid needed to reassure her. They both seemed to be physically unhurt, for which Thran was supremely grateful.

They were all right. They were.

He laid his head on the stair, no longer able to hold it up. He had never felt so tired in his life. Even the weight of his ballet headdress seemed heavier than lead. He shut his eyes, and let everything go... until steps came towards him. Before he opened his eyes, arms went around him – Bard’s on one side, and Sigrid’s on the other. They propped him up to sit between them on the bottom stair, and both put their arms around his waist for support and comfort.

“An ambulance is coming,” Bard said, as Thran leaned his head on his husband’s shoulder, and wrapped an arm around both his husband and his daughter.

“I do not need an ambulance. I am exhausted.”

“You’re bleeding, Thran. You need an ambulance.”

“Where is there blood?”

“Nowhere important, you crazy dancer. Just your head.”

“Tcha, I will not go to hospital dressed like this. I will be a laughing stock.”

Sigrid’s laugh tried to be snarky, but it was too weepy to pull it off. “I don’t believe you. You’ve been kidnapped and beaten up and tied to the front of a truck, and you’re worried about what you look like to go to hospital?”

Thran mustered a smile. “That should tell you I am not hurt. My vanity is intact.”

He reached up to extricate the bobby pins that held his headdress in place. When Sigrid and Bard saw what he was about, they helped him pull out all the pins until he was able to get the headdress off.

“So much better,” he breathed.

“The ambulance will be here in just a few minutes, angel. Please tell me that you won’t argue about that.”

Thran sighed. “I am too tired to argue about anything. But please, let me go inside long enough to put on something other than this ridiculous costume, and to wash my face. Please.”

Bard fished out his keys. “Are you okay to stay with him, sweetness?”

Sigrid scraped the heel of her hand across her face and she gulped down tears. “You couldn’t tear me away, Da.”

“Okay. I’ll be quick.”
Bard trotted up the porch steps and disappeared into the house. Sigrid wrapped her arms around Thran, and the two of them clung to each other for several seconds. Sigrid’s tears started again, and Thran held her close. He felt just as emotional, but tried to keep the tears from falling. He didn’t want to alarm his daughter.

“I was so scared, Ada. So scared.”

“You were very brave, lioness. Thank you.”

“I saw Da under the truck. I knew what he wanted to do. I knew Lance wanted me to beg and crawl and cry and scream, too. So I did it so he kept looking at me, and Da had time to get you loose.”

“You were both very brave, and you both saved my life. I love you both so much.”

“I love you, too, Ada.”

“Are Kukla, Bain, and Legolas all right?”

Sigrid gave a big sniff as she nodded. “Gavreel’s with them. Charmeine came here with me. She’s back there.” She pointed to the police cars in the lane, then gulped. “I heard the police officer say Lance was dead, Ada. Da wouldn’t let me look, but he did. The police said... he... got sh-shot through the heart. They couldn’t do CPR.”

Thran sighed. “Gods forgive me, but I am relieved.”

“So am I.”

Bard clattered out of the house and down the porch steps. He and Sigrid got the top of Thran’s body stocking off, and a long tee on that gave Thran some semblance of modesty for him to peel off his dancing slippers, the rest of his body stocking, and his dance belt. On went underwear and shorts, and Sigrid took one of the baby wipes from the box Bard had grabbed from the mudroom to dab gently at his face. Before she was finished, two ambulances pulled into the driveway. Two EMTs erupted from the second ambulance with a gurney and rushed to Lance. They loaded the boy onto the gurney, then into the ambulance, and roared away, lights and siren at full intensity.

The two EMTs from the first ambulance were less frantic; they unloaded cases of supplies, and headed for Thran.

“I am fine,” Thran said as both EMTs set their cases down and squatted beside him, before either EMT could say anything.

“No, he’s not,” Sigrid and Bard both chorused, drawing Thran to exhale in exasperation.

“He had a stomach virus yesterday, he was exhausted before that, and he danced the lead role in a ninety-minute ballet tonight,” Bard said.

“Then he got kidnapped at gunpoint, and beaten up, and almost run over by a truck,” Sigrid continued. “My Ada is the only person I know who’d try to claim he was all right after all of that, unless he was my Da.”

The first EMT grinned. He was short, no taller than Luka, but much slighter, with short, straight, sandy brown hair, a clean-shaven face, and frank eyes. “You do seem to have an interesting definition of ‘all right.’ Will you let us check you out just to make sure? Just for your family’s peace of mind, of course.”
“Better you see to the remains of my attacker.”

“Crew Seven’s seeing to that,” the EMT assured him. “In the meantime, we’d like to see to you. Can you lie down for me on the walk?”

Thran didn’t have much bravado left, so he waved a hand in concession. The two EMTs helped him to lie down, which was almost his downfall; it felt so good to be horizontal that he could have easily stayed there for a week, no matter the bumpy flagstones. Hands roved over his body from skull to feet to check for broken bones – they found none, but plenty of bruises. A gentle hand drew each of his eyelids up and a bright light shone in his eyes, destroying his night vision. Fingers probed his wrist for a pulse, and a stethoscope slipped under his tee to check his heart rate.

“What’s all this bruising on your face?”

“Some of it might be theatrical makeup.” Bard offered the box of baby wipes. “We hadn’t gotten it all off before you got here.”

The second EMT, a petite woman with two long braids of reddish brown hair, took one of the wipes. “Thanks. I’ll get this side, Kev. Okay... yeah, it looks like everything on this side is greasepaint.”

Kev cleaned the other side of Thran’s face with another wipe. “Hmm. Laurie, I’ve got three parallel but superficial cuts, open but no longer bleeding, each about a half inch long, surrounding contusion on the temple, but normal dilation of the pupils. Huh. Odd marks. Do you know what caused them?”

“I still had on my costume headdress. Bard, show them the pins that held it on. They were likely what left the marks when Lance pushed me into the side of the truck.”

“Ah, good old bobby pins,” Laurie nodded at the handful that Bard showed her. “They’d do it. You said he pushed you into the side of a truck?”

Thran pointed at Bard’s truck sitting in the driveway. “That one. Mostly I hit my hip and shoulder, but I was very tired, and did not get my hands up in time to soften the blow. So I hit my head a little.”

“Did you lose consciousness?” Kev asked as he carefully swabbed the small cuts at Thran’s temple.

“Everything was blurry for a few seconds.”

“Do you have a headache now?”

“I don’t think so. I have very many bruises, though, and they certainly hurt.”

“Okay, we’re going to play Twenty Questions while we check the rest of you out,” the female EMT said. “My name’s Laurie, and he’s Kev. Can you tell me your name?”

“Thran Lesavich Oropherson.”

“Can you tell me where we are, Thran?”

“On the stone walk in front of my house.”

“Do you know what happened to you?”

“The dead boy shot my bodyguard at the Imladris Academy and made me drive him here. When he ordered me out of the truck, I took his gun away from him, and threw it into the field across the lane, which he did not like, so he slam – pushed me into the side of the truck. I did not like that, but I have had a stomach virus for two days and was too weak to fight back. Please, tell the police where I threw the gun, so they find it before someone else does.”

“You’re doing great,” Laurie encouraged. “We’ll tell the officers about the gun just as soon as we’ve seen to you, Thran. Can you recite the months of the year backwards for me?”

“In English, Russian, or French?”

“Well, my goodness!” Laurie gave Thran an exaggerated look of surprise. Sigrid gave a hiccup of laughter before she exchanged a longsuffering look with her father.

“Sorry, Laurie,” Bard inserted. “My husband’s being a bit of a smart ass tonight.”

“So I see,” Laurie grinned. “You’d better do it in English, Thran. I wouldn’t know if you were right or not in either of the other two.”

Thran dutifully recited the months backwards in English.

“Excellent.” Laurie held up a finger about two feet in front of Thran’s face. “Okay, I want you to try to touch my finger with your left index finger, then touch your nose as fast as you can.”

Thran did so without problem.

“Do the same thing again, but with your right index finger.”

Thran did that with equal ease.

“Great,” Kev nodded. “Your hearing, vision, reflexes, and coordination are in good shape. We’re going to test your sense of touch now. When you feel a touch on your body, tell us where you feel it, okay?”

“Okay.” Thran did so as the EMTs tapped his arms, legs, hands, feet, sides, chest, and head.

“Excellent again. Now comes the hard part, Thran. I know you’re really tired, but we’ve got to check your balance when you’re on your feet. If you get the least bit dizzy or think you’re about to fall, we’ll catch you. Ready for a hand up?”

“I am ready.”

The EMTs helped Thran to his feet. To his relief, he was able to stand under his own power. He was even able to stand on first one foot, then the other, and walk a straight line. The EMTs did a little more probing of his back, shoulder, and hips before they let him sit back down on the steps.

“Okay, Thran,” Kev squatted down beside him. “Believe it or not, you’re actually in pretty good shape for what you’ve been through. You have no symptoms of concussion, so we won’t require you to go to hospital.”

“Wait,” Bard leaned in. “What about a CT scan to make sure he hasn’t got a concussion?”

“Most of the time, a CT scan can’t pick up signs of a concussion,” Laurie explained. “An MRI can’t, either. They can pick up fractures, or evidence of blood pooling internally. Thran’s passed all of the cognitive and sensory tests with flying colors, so it’s not likely he’s got a concussion. He is, however, dehydrated, and suffering from exhaustion. Now, I’ll let you in on a little secret – a hospital is no place for dehydrated, exhausted people. We’ll tell you how to make sure he gets more rest and fluids here at home, but I want you to watch out for a few things, too. I don’t think he’ll have these problems, but you still need to check. If he falls asleep, wake him up in about three hours. If you can’t wake him up, then he needs to go to hospital. If he starts to slur his speech, or has trouble thinking, he needs to go to hospital. If he complains of a really bad headache, or he starts to vomit, than he needs to go to hospital. Is that clear?"

Both Sigrid and Bard nodded.

“Good. Lots of fluids, then, but nothing with caffeine. Not just water, but a mix of non-caffeinated electrolyte sports drink, herbal tea, juice, or broth. No soda, alcohol, coffee, caffeinated tea, or chocolate. Light, non-spicy foods such as rice, noodles, salted crackers. The salt will help him retain a little more liquid. Go easy on the sugar. No TV, reading, or computer until tomorrow – you want to let his brain completely rest, and those can hinder recovery if it turns out he does have a concussion.
Any questions?"

“I want to take a shower,” Thran ventured.

“Hold off until the morning, only because you’re so tired,” Kev replied. “The shower’s not the place where you want to collapse due to exhaustion, because then you really might give yourself a concussion.”

After spending hours dancing to the utmost of his physical limits, then the fight with Lance, Thran felt grimy enough to hum in disappointment. At least the EMTs had agreed that he didn’t have to spend the night in hospital.

“Any other questions for us?” Laurie asked, looking at Thran, then Bard and Sigrid.

“We’re good,” Bard nodded. “Thanks for checking Thran out so carefully.”

“Welcome,” Kev replied, closing his case of supplies.

“Our pleasure,” agreed Laurie.

“Please remember to tell the police about the gun,” Thran reminded the pair.

“I’ll take care of that right now,” Kev assured him. “Laur, you’ll do the form?”

“Got it right here.” The woman held up a clipboard. “I need someone’s signature for the insurance claim, please?"

“I’ve got it,” Bard reached out a hand for the clipboard. “Where do I sign?"

Laurie drew Bard off to the side to explain the forms, and Kev packed up the medical cases and took them back to the ambulance. Sigrid sat down next to Thran again, crowding close despite the warmth of the summer night.

“I’m glad you’re okay, Ada. So glad.”

“Me, too,” Thran admitted. “I did not want to spend the night in hospital. I wanted to be here, with my family.”

“So do I,” Sigrid whispered.

“Promise me something, lioness.”

“What?”
“Do not tell the boys and Kukla what happened. Kukla is already terrified, and both of the boys will worry too much, though Legolas will show it and Bain will try not to. Let it remain between the three excellent co-conspirators.”

Sigrid swallowed hard. “I don’t think I could talk about it, anyway, Ada. Not for a while. So you’ve got a promise.”

Thran found her hand and squeezed it. “Thank you.”

“What are you two conspiring about?” Bard came to sit beside them as the EMTs went to talk to the police.

“Not to tell the boys and Kukla about tonight. They do not need to know the details, only that we are all right.”

“Amen to that,” Bard said, swallowing hard. “Amen.”

* * *

Bard sat with his husband and daughter on the bottom porch step for a long time. The lights of his truck were off at last, but past the driveway a pair of police cars parked at the side of the lane still had their emergency lights at full rotation, sending a barrage of red and blue light careening into the sky. At least both were out of sight behind the small rise at the end of the yard, so the trio didn’t have to endure the blinding lights themselves, only the wavering reflections. The squawks of the police communication units were loud, but clipped and cryptic, and Bard couldn’t make out what anyone said.

He didn’t want to make out what anyone said. It was enough to sit in silence with Thran and Sigrid, and try not to think about what had happened. He needed distance and daylight before he thought about how much danger half of Clan Ffyrnig had braved tonight.

Six police officers still clustered beside his truck as Kev and Laurie joined them. A moment later, a pair of officers with torches headed across the lane, presumably to act on Thran’s information about Lance’s gun. All that lay across the lane was a drainage ditch, an ancient wire fence, and an empty field. Thank the gods for that field – if it had been anything more manicured, Lance might’ve found the gun where Thran heaved it, and then there was no telling what tragedy would have followed. Just thinking about that made a tremor run through his body.

Thank the gods that Lance’s body no longer lay in the grass. Bard had made himself watch when the police officers had turned the boy over on his back, and pulled up his tee. The hole in the boy’s chest had been deceptively small, but its placement had told Bard all that mattered. He didn’t need to see the policemen call the ambulance without ever attempting to resuscitate. CPR was pointless when the heart had been so precisely struck.

For once, Bard appreciated bureaucracy – only a medical examiner or coroner could pronounce death at the scene, not a police officer or EMT. So that meant the first team of EMTs had treated Lance as gravely wounded and whisked him off, no matter how clear it was that he was past recovery. Declaring him dead at the scene could have meant that his body would remain in place for hours while someone tried to contact next of kin, and determine whether the body should go to a funeral home or the morgue. Bard hadn’t wanted the younger children to see that stir, or the body, so when he’d run inside to get clothes for Thran, he’d called Gavreel to tell him that the crisis was over, and everyone was well, but not to being the children home yet. He promised to call as soon as the body was removed, which Gavreel wholeheartedly supported.

Bard hadn’t wanted Sigrid or Thran to see the body, either. He’d kept Sigrid from looking when she’d bolted into his arms, and he wouldn’t let Thran look, either. It was enough that he’d seen it. No one else needed the gut punch of looking at a bloody corpse in the front yard.

At length, Bard left Sigrid and Thran on the step and found the officer in charge of the scene. He wanted to know if he could call Gavreel to bring the three younger children home, and if he could take Sigrid and Thran into the house.

“We’ll be a while yet, and at some point we’ll need a statement from you, your husband, and your daughter. We’ll be out here tomorrow, as well, because police officers were involved in an incident where a police firearm was discharged.”

Bard winced. “Gods. The boy grabbed the officer’s gun. What was he supposed to do, let the boy take it?”

“It needs investigation,” the officer shrugged, professionally neutral.

Bard held up his hands. He understood the point, but Lance’s reign of terror had gone on long enough that dragging it out any longer was painful. “May I have the rest of my children come home now? And take my husband and daughter inside?”

“That’s fine,” the officer nodded. “If you, your husband, and your daughter would please come down to the station tomorrow to make your statements, though, I’d appreciate it. I’m sure you’d like to get this wrapped up as soon as possible, and so would we.”

“We’ll do so. My husband’s got to rehearse tomorrow evening, so in the morning?”

“That’s fine,” the officer nodded.

“Thanks,” Bard replied, and pulled out his mobile to call Gavreel’s number.

He picked up right away, his voice smoothly neutral. “Hello?”

“Hi, Gavreel. It’s over. There are still a lot of police here, but the worst is over. It’d be better to park in the Gamgee’s driveway two doors down and walk over through the back yards. That’ll keep the children away from the worst of it. I’ll call the Gamgees to let them know you’re coming.”

“Will do, Bard. I’m glad everything’s well. See you in a few.”

Bard disconnected the call, and quickly gave Rosie a call. Of course she had seen the lights and heard the noise, but all Bard could bring himself to say was that something had happened but was now over, and that the children would be home in a few minutes, and could they please park Thran’s SUV in their driveway until the morning? Of course Rosie agreed at once, so Bard thanked her gratefully. He stuffed his mobile back in his pocket, and went back to Thran and Sigrid.

“The other children will be home in a few minutes. Gavreel will put the SUV in Sam and Rosie’s driveway and walk them over, so they’ll miss the flurry in the front yard. I’m going to unlock the house, and have them come in through the solarium. And we’re free to go inside. We three will need to go to the police station tomorrow sometime to make statements, but for tonight, we’re done.”

Thran was too tired for much reaction. He had enough reserves to get himself up the porch stairs and into the house, and Sigrid followed along with equal quiet. Bard shut the door on all of the flashing lights and squawking police monitors, got them both settled in the sitting room, and put the kettle on for tea. Then he went into the solarium to wait for Legolas, Bain, and Tilda to arrive.

He didn’t have long to wait. When Sigrid got up to make tea, he caught the first glimpse of figures coming across the back of the yard. He went outside to call to them, and soon Bain, Legolas, Tilda, Charmeine, Gavreel, and Ori came inside.

“Is Sigrid here? What happened? Where is she?” Bain and Tilda clamored.

“Where is Papa?” Legolas pressed, looking scared. “Is Papa all right, too?”

“Sigrid’s fine and so is your Papa, Legs,” Bard assured them. “They’re both in the sitting room.”

The three children ran through the solarium to burst into the sitting room. Bard lingered with the three adults.

“How’s Mike? Have you heard?”

“He’s already in surgery,” Charmeine said. “The bullet went through his lung, but Ori knew how to keep pressure on the wound to keep his lung from collapsing, and he had the ambulance there in record time. Barring complications, Mike’s odds are good.”

“That’s great,” Bard exhaled. “He was shot at such close range... Ori, you’re a champion.”

The slight young man swallowed. “Is Thran all right?”

“He got knocked around, and scared nearly to death, but the EMTs checked him out, and he’s in decent shape. He likely doesn’t have a concussion.”

“And the boy?”

Bard lowered his voice, and both bodyguards and Ori leaned close. “He didn’t make it.”

While all three exchanged glances, none of them looked sorry, matching Bard’s opinion of the outcome. He dug into his pocket and handed Ori his car keys as well as his multitool.

“Thank you for the car loan, and for this, too,” he said, indicating the multitool. “It saved the day. I’ll tell you the story tomorrow, but right now, I’m knackered, plain and simple.”

“I’m sure,” Ori said. “I’d like to see Thran before I go, but I won’t stay long, and I’ll see that Charmeine and Gavreel get home.”

“Righto.” Bard told Ori where he’d left his car, then the small man and the two bodyguards came in to see that Thran was indeed all right. It was clear that the dancer was on his last dregs of strength, so the trio didn’t linger. Bard saw them to the solarium door, and gave both bodyguards bear hugs.

“Thank you for protecting the children, both of you,” he wished them. “This was bad, but it could have been much, much worse. Charmeine, thank you for sticking to Sigrid until the last bit. Gavreel, the rest might’ve run you ragged, but thank you for sticking with them. And Ori, you saved Thran’s life tonight, as well as Mike’s. Without a doubt. I don’t have words for how much both of those mean.”

Ori accepted his hug with an equally heartfelt one in return. “I’m glad I helped, Bard. And I’m even more glad that the siege is over.”
“Me, too.”

“I kept those Saturday premiere tickets for you and the children. And for both of you, too, Charmeine, Gavreel. If Thran dances Saturday, you’ll see it.”

“I’ll take you up on that,” Bard smiled.

“Take care of Thran tonight,” Ori urged. “I’ll call you in the morning, but not early.”

“Okay. Thank all of you again.”

The three faded into the dark to retrace their steps across the back yard, then down the two blocks to where Bard had left Ori’s car. Bard locked the solarium door, and went back to the sitting room to rejoin his family.

Everyone looked up at him. Legolas sat beside his father with his arm around his shoulders. Bain and Tilda were on either side of Sigrid, each one holding one of her hands, and Tilda was practically in her sister’s lap. She and the boys looked worried, and Sigrid looked drawn and numb. Thran looked exhausted. Bard sat beside Thran, and rubbed his thigh slowly.

“Is it over?” Tilda asked into the silence.

“It’s over,” Bard nodded.

“Was it Lance?”

Bard swallowed, but he forced his voice to be soft and gentle. “It was Lance.”

“Is he dead?”

Bard nodded. “He won’t bother anyone again.”

“Good,” Tilda said without heat, but also without apology.

Bard thought about what might have turned a fifteen-year-old boy so terribly, terribly dark. Likely his life had been no less terrifying than he’d made it for Bard and his family – or anyone else he’d touched.

Still, he didn’t rebuke Tilda for her relief.
Chapter 155

Chapter Summary

Clan Ffyrnig deals with the aftermath, and looks ahead to Immortal's premiere.

Chapter Notes

I don't rights to "The Princess Bride," but I sure enjoyed Mandy Patinkin's most famous line ever :-)

The crisis had passed, and Bard was back in the reassuring quiet of the sitting room with his family around him. How good was it to sit back against the sofa and let every muscle go? Gradually, the sting of scraped skin on his elbows and back registered, and so did the ache in his left knuckles. Thank the gods he’d had jeans on, or his legs would be no less scraped. He felt drained – a pale shadow of what Thran must feel. But Thran sat next to him, and all of his children were here and unharmed, and he didn’t have to move –

Thran’s thigh trembled under his hand.

Bard cast him a look. His husband was as white as his hair, and slumped against the sofa like a rag. If the children hadn’t been there, he would have carried him upstairs to bed for a long, long rest... but rest wasn’t what Thran needed first. “You need calories, and liquid, cariad. Something bland. Noodles? Potato? Oatmeal?”

Thran hummed. “Gods, a potato with butter and salt and pepper and chives would be divine.”

“Popcorn,” Bain said, but without his usual exuberance. “What about you, Sig? Popcorn? I’ll make it for you.”

“That’d be great, Bain,” Sigrid nodded. She still looked pale and drawn, but her smile for her brother was warm and appreciative. “Just great.”

“May I have bread and butter?” Tilda asked in a small voice. That was one of her favorite comfort foods – a plain roll or slice of bread spread with soft butter.

“I’ll make you some,” Legolas offered. “Papa, perhaps some tomato soup, too?”

“That would be perfect, too, synok,” Thran agreed. “After the potato, please?”

“Looks like we’d better limber up the microwave,” Bard said, patting Thran’s thigh. “Food’s on its way.”

Bard got into the kitchen before the children, so none of them saw him wash Lance’s blood off his knuckles. That was something nobody needed to think about. As he scrubbed a big potato for Thran, Legolas helped Tilda with her rolls and butter, and Bain cycled a bag of popcorn through the microwave. As it popped, Bain rummaged in the pantry for spices and seasonings, and put them on a tray. When the corn was done, he dumped it into a bowl, and swept the collection off to the sitting room. Bard started Thran’s potato, and got out the salt, pepper, chives, and butter that Thran liked. Beside him, Legolas mixed water into a can of condensed tomato soup. Bard chopped Thran’s potato into a bowl and loaded it with condiments. He carried the bowl, a spoon, and a big glass of water into the sitting room to find the coffee table loaded with snacks, from cheese and peanut butter to cookies and popcorn. Bard decided that one of Tilda’s rolls with peanut butter was a good choice; Tilda crawled into his lap to eat hers with him. Thran ate his potato as if every bite were the best thing he’d ever tasted. As soon as he finished it, Legolas brought him his soup in a big mug. The soup and the water disappeared after the potato without delay.

“I do not care what the EMT said about the shower,” Thran said into the silence.

“What EMT?” Legolas looked up from the cheese cracker he was making for Sigrid in alarm. “What about the shower?”

“He said I should not get a shower because I am exhausted. So I will not. But he said nothing about the tub, and now that I have eaten, I will not be so filthy any longer. I will sit in the tub and wash. No one will argue with me about this.”

“Sounds good,” Bard said mildly. “Nothing wrong with saving a little wear and tear on the sheets, to be sure.”

Thran swallowed, and gave him a tremulous smile. Uh-oh, the night’s terror was about to discharge. Bard eased Tilda out of his lap, stood up, and offered his husband his hand. “Come on. I’ll give you a hand up the stairs. Crew, would you please put all the leftovers away?”

“Aye, Captain,” the children murmured, as Thran pushed himself to his feet and let Bard support him up the stairs. By the time they reached the bedroom, Thran was shaking again, and his breath caught. Bard eased him onto the bed, quickly shut the pocket doors, and returned to Thran’s side to put his arms around him.

“It’s okay, angel,” Bard whispered. “You’ve been through hell, and you’ve been brave for the children, so you can let go now.”

Thran wrapped his arms around Bard’s waist. “Oh, gods, Bard! I thought I would die. So many times, I thought I would die, and that he would hurt our lioness...”

In a spate of choked, whispered words, Thran told Bard everything that had happened from the time Lance had shot Mike to when he had taken Lance’s gun, and Lance had tied him to the front of Bard’s truck. In sympathy, Bard’s throat knotted, and he stroked Thran’s back in reassurance.

“I thought I was about to lose you, angel. I couldn’t bear the thought of being without you. That’s why I did something as insane as crawl under a moving truck. Because I wasn’t going to lose you. I wasn’t.”

“When I felt your hand on my back, I knew it was you. I knew. You saved my life.”

“It wasn’t just me, angel,” Bard rubbed his shoulder. “You took his gun. Sigrid kept him distracted, and I cut you loose. It took all three of us.”

Thran’s ribs heaved, and he couldn’t say anything for a long while. Bard shut his eyes and didn’t speak as he held his husband tightly in his arms, uncaring of how gritty Thran was. It was Thran’s scent in Bard’s nostrils, his touch on Bard’s body, his voice in Bard’s ears, his ravaged face in Bard’s sight. What did Bard care about grit, the smell of sweat and fear, or the ravages of exhaustion? All of them were sweeter than the cold, antiseptic reek of a body on a morgue slab.

At length, Bard got Thran into the bathroom, handed him his toothbrush, and got out the jar of cold cream that Thran used to clean theatrical makeup off his face. They brushed their teeth in silence, then Thran carefully wiped the vestiges of his makeup from his face, and unfastened the clip he’d used to pin his hair back. As the pale locks fell around his face, he looked so haggard – would even sitting in the tub be beyond him?

When Bard turned on the shower faucets, Thran gave him a look, but Bard shrugged.

“The EMT didn’t want you to stand in the shower. He didn’t say anything about sitting in it. There’s more room in there for me to help you wash than in the tub, and the sprayer means you can wash your hair if you want. I’ll put a bath mat in there, too, so you don’t have to sit on the bare tile."

“You are a saint in truth,” Thran said with heartfelt thanks, so Bard handed him a clean cotton mat from the linen closet. As the warm water cascaded down, the dancer put the mat on the floor of the tub, and eased down into a cross-legged position with a groan. Bard kept a close eye on him as he shed his clothes. He wouldn’t put it past Thran to fall asleep before he washed anything. Bard slipped into the shower cabinet, got the handheld sprayer, and knelt beside his husband.

“I’ll do your hair, so keep your eyes closed,” Bard asked. His husband merely shut his eyes, and let Bard soap and rinse as he would. He smoothed conditioner onto the long white strands and let it soak in while he carefully washed Thran from head to foot. He had a couple of minor scrapes on his back from pushing himself from under the truck, and the small cuts at his temple looked just as minor now that the blood had washed away. His neck, thank the gods, showed only a slight red mark where the wire had crossed it. Both of his wrists were bruised, but not badly.

Most of Thran’s wounds were internal, then.

His were, too.

“Your back and elbows are scraped,” Thran murmured as Bard rubbed his washcloth over himself, then played the sprayer over both of them to rinse off the suds.

“Nothing to worry about,” Bard shook his head. “They barely stung when I first got them wet.”

Thran sighed and wiped water out of his eyes. “I think I must get out while I still can. I am very tired.”

Bard helped Thran out of the shower. The exhausted dancer managed to dry most of his body off, but he didn’t argue when Bard pulled out the stool, sat him down, and directed the dryer over his hair. He let Bard comb his hair through once, then padded to bed and crawled into it.

“Just five minutes, and I will help you see to the children,” Thran mumbled.

“The children will understand, angel,” Bard reassured him as he pulled the sheet within Thran’s reach. “They know as well as I do that you need to sleep. I’ll see to them.”

Thran’s eyes had closed before Bard had finished speaking. Good. That was the best thing for him. Bard found a clean tee and shorts to put on, then went downstairs to see what stir the children had gotten into while he’d seen to Thran. Had they badgered Sigrid?

Gods, let them have been more humane than that.
He needn’t have worried. The children had put all of the food away but the cookies, and the open tin sat in Tilda’s lap. The little girl sat in Sigrid’s lap, and their brothers sat on either side of Sigrid. No one said anything, but at the sound of Bard’s footstep, Bain looked around anxiously.

“I got the cookies out, Da, not Sigrid,” he hastened to explain. “I thought they’d help –”

“It was a good idea, boyo,” Bard reassured his son. “In fact, it was a great idea.”

He helped himself to one of the molasses hermits, then sat on the sofa opposite the children to chew it. The clock on the TV showed that it was close to midnight. Gods, it seemed to be much later than that.

“Is Papa all right?” Legolas asked, his blue eyes full of worry.

“He’ll be okay, Legolas. Mostly he’s exhausted because he was sick yesterday, and he danced the whole ballet tonight. He’s clean and dry now, and he went right to sleep. When you go upstairs to bed, you can look in on him if you want. What he needs most of all is to sleep.”

Legolas’s face cleared as Bard’s words reassured him. “Okay, I will. Is it okay if I go up now?”

“Sure. I’m sure you’ll be quiet, but I don’t think he’ll hear you.”

“I’ll go up, too, Da,” Bain inserted. “It’s kinda late.”

Bard raised an eyebrow. He couldn’t remember the last time Bain had willingly gone to bed, no matter the hour. Maybe he never had. Likely he and Legolas would end up in the same room.

“Before you head upstairs, lads, let’s talk about tomorrow. It’s your last day of camp, so we’ll be up at seven-thirty again to get there on time.”

“Oh, yeah,” Bain looked surprised. “I forgot about camp.”

“Just the last day. Next term, after the festival, you’ll go back to the things you and Legs originally signed up for – archery, fencing, soccer.”

“I get to stay in ceramics,” Tilda sighed, laying her head on Sigrid’s shoulder. “I like that.”

“I’m calling Miss Dís tomorrow,” Sigrid murmured softly. “Finn took my place, but he told me she still wants me back. The festival will be really busy as long as the weather’s good, so she needs me.”

“That’s great, sweetness,” Bard smiled, relieved to see a little color come back into her cheeks. “I’ve got some good news, too. Thran’s probably going to be sore tomorrow, but in all likelihood, he’ll dance the premiere on Saturday just like he planned. If he does, then we’ll all be there to see it.”

Tilda’s bright smile as she sat up and clapped her hands was the most normal expression Bard had seen tonight. “Oh, goodie! I can wear my bee dress after all!”

“You can, indeed, little doll,” Bard chuckled. “Lads, both of you and I need to see about suits, too. But we’ve got to get through camp first, so let’s get everyone in bed so Friday gets here sooner.”

“Okay!” Tilda exclaimed, drawing everyone’s chuckles at how fast she got up.

“Make sure you brush your teeth, all,” Bard reminded everyone as they went upstairs.

Legolas ducked into the bedroom to assure himself that his father was well and truly asleep, but after that the regular routine of tooth brushing and hair combing and changing into sleep tees and shorts... seemed to help everyone relax. All of the children got into bed far easier than he expected. Only Tilda made any reference to the day’s traumatic events.

“So tomorrow I can go outside?” she asked sleepily, as Bard put Mr. Bun on the pillow beside her head.

“As much as you want, little doll.”

“Good.” Tilda shut her eyes and sighed as she snuggled into her pillow. “But I’m sorry I won’t get to see Miss Charmeine anymore. Or Mr. Gavreel or Mr. Mike. They were nice.”

Tilda didn’t know that Mike was in hospital, and now wasn’t the time to tell her. “They were all very nice,” Bard replied as he smoothed Tilda’s hair off her cheek. He gave her a soft kiss. “And they took good care of us. Sleep well, little doll.”

Tilda nodded, all but asleep. “Night, Da. I love you.”

“I love you, too, Tilda.”

Bard made sure Tilda’s night light was on, and the one in the children’s bathroom. He looked in on Thran, who was still soundly asleep even though Bard’s bedside lamp was on. Despite the late hour, he wasn’t ready for bed yet, so he left the light on and returned to the sitting room. The open tin of cookies was still on the coffee table, so Bard replaced the lid and put it back in the pantry. He scrounged in Thran’s wine fridge, but nothing was open, so he got the open bottle of red wine from the butler’s pantry and poured himself a good glassful. Then he went into the sitting room and found a televised soccer match that provided inconsequential, reassuring background noise. As he settled on the sofa, he took a long, slow breath.

He’d seen to Thran, and the children. Could he finally let down at last?

He took a sip of his wine – no, he took a good, long swallow of it – and shut his eyes. The low drone of the soccer match put a mundane façade of normalcy on the moment, but Bard’s thoughts were anything but mundane or normal. Now that he didn’t have Thran or the children to tend, nothing distracted him from thinking of all that had happened in the driveway not three hours ago.

The glare of truck headlights that stabbed down the driveway and into the lane... the unnatural angle of Thran’s neck bound against the truck grille... Sigrid on her knees, locking eyes with him... the bite of gravel through his shirt as he wormed his way under his truck, then reached up with Ori’s multitool to cut Thran loose... Thran’s terrified, unblinking, wide-eyed stare that begged him for rescue... Thran’s gasp as Lance jounced the truck forward while his arm was still bound to the grille, and his grimace of pain as he scrambled to slide forward before his arm bent past breaking... Thran’s fingers digging into his arms by the back of the truck to tell him that Lance was unarmed... his fury lending power to his blows as he dragged Lance out of the truck and onto the lawn... the deafening shock of gunfire... the limp tangle of unmoving limbs that had once been a human being...

Gods, how would he ever get to sleep tonight with such a barrage of images flashing through his mind, over and over and over again?

A step at the door of the sitting room told him he wasn’t the only one who couldn’t sleep. Sure enough, Sigrid looked in on him with haunted eyes. He patted the sofa beside him.

“I wondered how long it’d take you to join me.”

Sigrid came slowly into the room, and sat down beside him. Bard looped his arm around Sigrid’s shoulders, and drew her close.
“I can’t stop seeing it all.”

Bard sighed. “I can’t, either.”

“How am I supposed to sleep with all this noise in my head?”

“I don’t know, sweetness. I guess it’s like echoes. Eventually they stop bouncing off the walls, and that’s when you go to sleep.”

“I don’t think that’s going to happen anytime soon.”

“It might not.” Bard gave her shoulders a squeeze. “You get a pass on camp tomorrow if you want.”

“What about the boys and Tilda?”

“Let them get back to normal. That’s the best thing for them. You’re in a different situation, so if you want to sleep in the morning, that’s the best thing for you.”

Sigrid’s swallow was more of a gulp than anything else. She rubbed the heel of her hand under her eyes and swallowed again. “Is this what it’s like to be an adult?”

“How so?”

“When you go through something that you can’t tell Tilda and Bain and Legolas about because it’d scare the shit out of them, and you don’t want to do that, so you just hold it all inside?”

Bard leaned Sigrid’s head onto his shoulder. “That’s it, sweetness.”

“Well, it sucks.”

Despite himself, Bard chuckled. He rubbed Sigrid’s shoulder in commiseration. “Sometimes it does.”

“Yeah,” Sigrid whuffed, half defiant and half miserable.

“You know you can talk to me or Thran. We were there, too, and we know what it was like. You were so self-possessed, you stayed so calm... I was so proud of you.”

“You were the brave one, Da. Gods, you crawled under your truck! You could have gotten run over with Thran! You saved his life.”

“Not just me. I told Thran, and now I’ll tell you – it took three of us to save Clan Ffyrnig’s Russian angel. Thran took Lance’s gun. You kept Lance distracted. I cut Thran loose. No one of us was enough.”

Sigrid hummed. “I guess you’re right.”

“I know I am. And it’s a fit end to the crisis.”

“How do you figure that?”

“What’s the one thing Lance wanted, the one thing he never got?”

“I don’t know.” Sigrid thought for a moment. “Respect is what he said.”

“What he wanted was to belong to something. In other words, he wanted a family. But he didn’t have one, and nothing he did gained him one. Clan Ffyrnig is a family, and that’s what saved us. We worked together and we came out all right.”

“That makes Lance a sad story,” Sigrid murmured. Her face twisted in anger. “But I don’t want to feel sorry for him! He hurt so many people, Da. So, so many. He scared Tilda to death, too, and I’ll never forgive him for that. What did Tilda do to him? Nothing. He was a mean, hateful, spiteful rat!”

“Think about what he might’ve gone through to end up that way.”

“Okay, it was probably horrible, but that’s no excuse for what he did.”

“No, it’s not,” Bard agreed.

“What did he expect, all the times he did such horrible stuff? He had to know he would get slammed for it.”

Bard sighed. “Maybe he felt justified because he thought the world had slammed him first. All that’s sure is that nobody found him in time to help him before he got slammed.”

Sigrid swallowed. “I just want my brain to stop thinking about Ada hanging on the front of your truck like a broken doll.”

“It’ll take a while. I hope it’ll be easier in the morning, when the sun shines.”

“Me, too. Tilda doesn’t want to know what happened, so that’s okay. But I don’t know how I can look at Bain and Legolas without everything showing on my face.”

“Did they pester you about what happened when I took Thran upstairs?”

Sigrid shook her head. “I thought they would. I dreaded all the questions I was sure they’d ask. But neither of them said a word, and they were both really sweet to me. It was weird.”

Bard quirked a wry grin. “I expect they’ll end up in one room or another, if they aren’t there already, poring over a computer to find out what happened.”

“I hope they don’t ask me anything. I wouldn’t be able to look Legolas in the eye and tell him that I thought Ada was about to die.”

Bard swallowed. He didn’t want to admit to anyone that he’d thought his husband and his daughter might die, and maybe him along with them.

“It’s a tall order, but the best thing we can do is go on with our lives,” he said at last. “Lance was a shadow over all of us – he scared us, he hurt us, but he paid the ultimate price for that. As much as we can, let’s try not to let a shadow continue to scare and hurt us from beyond the grave.”

“A shadow,” Sigrid mulled. She took a deep breath. “I like that. A shadow blocks the sun for a moment, gives you a bit of a chill, and then it’s gone. It doesn’t last.”

“That’s right,” Bard comforted. “It might be hard to remember that for a while, until a little time passes and we get back to other things. But after that... a shadow is a good way to look at what happened. Lance was a shadow that didn’t last.”

Sigrid sighed, and watched the soccer game without seeing it. After a while she stirred, and patted Bard’s arm. “I think I’ll go upstairs now. Will I have to go to the police station tomorrow to make a statement or something?”

“Thran and I have to go, too. If you don’t go to camp, you can go with us. If you do, I’ll take you there in the afternoon."

“Okay,” Sigrid replied. “Maybe I won’t go to camp, then. Mostly I went to that weight training class to vent, and I don’t have to do that now, so...”

“If you still have to vent, that’s okay,” Bard assured her. “If you need to talk to someone other than me or Thran, that’s okay, too.”

“What, like a therapist or something?” Sigrid gave him a speculative look.

Bard shrugged. “Sure. When you need a doctor, then you see one. It doesn’t matter whether your ankle hurts, or your thoughts do.”

Sigrid looked thoughtful. “Okay. That’s good to know. I’ll see how things go for a few days.”

“Good enough.”

Sigrid pressed a kiss on Bard’s cheek. “I love you, Da.”

Bard returned the caress with a smile. “I love you, too, sweetness.”

Sigrid gave him a smile that was more reconciled than the one she’d worn when she’d come in, and headed upstairs. Bard stayed on the sofa to watch the soccer match until his wine was gone. The talk with his daughter had done him good, too, and the images flitting through his brain like ninja warriors had calmed a little. He really didn’t want to turn off the television, or the lights, so he left them on as he washed his wineglass, and made one more round around the house to check the security system, the windows, the doors. At the last second, he turned off the game, then the lights, and went upstairs. The light he’d left on in the bedroom was a welcome beacon to keep him from having to confront the dark. He did a quick listen at the children’s doors, but didn’t hear anyone stirring. He suspected that both of the boys were in Legolas’s room, but that didn’t concern him, so he left them alone.

After a quick brush of his teeth again, he shed his clothes and slid into bed beside his husband. Thran was so solidly asleep that Bard didn’t want to wake him up, but the EMT had emphasized how important it was to check Thran for a concussion. Reluctantly Bard put a hand on Thran’s shoulder and shook him gently.

“Angel, I hate to wake you, but I’ve got to check you for the concussion,” Bard said, shaking gently.

Thran barely moved, but his eyes fluttered, registered Bard, and shut again. “Go away.”

That was encouraging, and made Bard smile. “I will, angel, I promise, just as soon as I make sure you’re all right. The EMT said I had to check you –”

“Décembre, Novembre, Octobre, Septembre, Août, Juillet, Juin, Mai, Avril, Mars, Fevrier, Janvier,” Thran graved, trying to curl around his pillow. “Six times seven is forty-two. Hello, my name is Inago Montoya. You killed my father. Prepare to die.”

Bard snickered. “That’s pretty good. I guess you don’t have a concussion.”

“Then turn out the light, lie down, and be quiet.”

Smiling, Bard did all three. As he settled into bed, Thran snaked out a long arm, pulled him close, and curled around him with a sigh. In a heartbeat, the exhausted dancer was asleep again, leaving Bard to lie in the dark and the silence alone.
He wasn’t alone. The soft breath on his back reminded him that his husband was still with him. Maybe there was noise in his head, but it couldn’t drown out the faint whisper of that soft breath. All was not well quite yet, but it would be. That promise was in every one of those soft breaths.

Bard closed his eyes, and slept.

* * *

It was after nine before Bard woke the next morning. He registered the time with an internal groan; after all of last night’s conflagration, he’d forgotten to set the alarm to get up for the children’s last day of camp. He edged out from under Thran’s outflung arm to slip into the bathroom, then pulled on his shorts and tee to see if anyone else were up. He heard nothing downstairs, so he stuck his head in the children’s rooms. Tilda and Sigrid were both asleep in their beds; Bain and Legolas were sprawled on Legolas’s bed in his room. There was no reason to get them up and hurry them to camp, not after last night, so Bard left them asleep and padded downstairs to make tea. As he waited for the water to boil, he took a look through the dining room windows out the front to see if there were still police officers in the front yard. To his surprise, there were. Had they been here all night?

Bard made his tea, put on his shoes, turned the security system to daytime mode, and ambled out the mudroom door to see what went on in his front yard.

The grey-haired officer in charge told him that they were almost finished their investigation. Of course he wouldn’t tell Bard anything that had come out of it, but he did ask Bard if he had a garden hose hooked up to a faucet.

“Sure, I can get that for you. Do you need a bucket or anything else, too?”

“No, sir, the hose will be just fine. I understand you have children, so we’ll go ahead and clean up the site for you.”

Lance’s blood, he meant.

Bard grimaced. “I appreciate that. I’ve got a ten-year old daughter. She doesn’t need to see that.”

“I’ve got a granddaughter about the same age,” the officer offered. “They’re not ready to deal with anything like that at their age.”

“Is anyone ever ready to deal with anything like that?” Bard asked, shaking his head. “I don’t think so.”

“You’re probably right,” the officer allowed. “At any rate, I’ll see that it’s cleared out. You’ll be able to put your vehicle away, too. That’ll give them less to be interested in.”

“Who?” Bard frowned in confusion.

The officer pointed towards the end of the driveway. In the field across the lane, several reporters with cameras still hunkered down. The thought of so many people snapping pictures of him in his canvas shorts and plain blue tee didn’t please him.

“Oh, for the love of the gods,” Bard said in exasperation. “They really are vultures.”
“They really are,” the officer nodded. “A word to the wise, Mr. Bowman. Keep your children away from the front of the house for a day or so. They don’t need to be in the stir. It just upsets them, and I’d expect they’re already upset enough.”

“You could say that,” Bard agreed with an ironic glance at the officer. “We’ve got to go out later to make our statements at your station, but we’ll keep the children close.”

“Good. I’ll see about wrapping things up, and if you can put the hose out, I thank you.”

“It’ll be right at the edge of the carriage house,” Bard promised. He went into the carriage house to suit actions to words, made sure the faucet was on, and then went back inside the house. He didn’t venture near where Lance had fallen last night. He didn’t want to see that spot in the daylight until the police had flushed the stains off the grass and into the soil.

Inside, he retreated to the kitchen. Mixing up a batch of muffins – blueberry lemon today – gave him something productive and familiar to do. It was just as well that he started on them as soon as he got inside; no sooner had he put them in the oven to bake than his mobile chimed. He didn’t field one call before he was on to the next. Bilbo, of course, had seen the morning news and was worried about him and the family. Lettie and Ori and even Irmo were next. Gods, what if they’d called Thran first and hadn’t been able to wake him? He ignored the calls long enough to check that Thran was still sound asleep. His mobile wasn’t on his bedside table, and it wasn’t in the sitting room – maybe it was still in Bard’s truck. He traipsed outside again to ask the police officer if he could retrieve Thran’s things from the truck, and brought everything inside when the officer assented. Yes, everyone had tried to call Thran on his mobile, and when they hadn’t reached him, they’d called Bard. At least he was able to reassure everyone and Thran could stay asleep, as he so desperately needed.

Along the way, he was relieved to hear that Mike had come through his surgery well, and now recovered in the ICU. The bullet had lodged in his lung, but the surgeons had been able to remove it, and after several infusions of blood, he was out of danger.

Thran, or Sigrid, could so easily have been in Mike’s place. Or worse.

Bard suppressed a shiver. This aspect of the shadow that had plagued Clan Ffyrnig would take the longest to put behind him, but Bard was determined to do so.

He made himself two soft-boiled eggs, and sat down at the kitchen table to wring every sensation of comfort and satisfaction from them. The warm, runny yolk, perfect to dip the edge of his muffin into, the salt and pepper to spice the just set white, the sweet blueberries and rich butter...

Legolas and Bain tiptoed into the kitchen. They looked surprised to see Bard; maybe they thought they were the first ones up.

“Morning, lads,” Bard held up a hand in greeting as he got up from the table. “Blueberry muffins are still hot if you want some. Eggs, or porridge?”

Legolas came right to him and engulfed him in a big hug.

Surprised, Bard belatedly put his arms around the tall youth. “Hmm. I didn’t realize you liked blueberry muffins so much. I’ll have to make them more often.”

“All the media websites are full of what happened last night,” Bain said somberly as he snared a muffin to chew. He looked out of the kitchen window, not at Bard. “The police took video of the whole thing.”
Bard winced. “And you watched the whole thing.”

“Course we did,” Bain snorted, but without his usual emphatic scorn. “I can’t believe you crawled under the truck, Da.”

“I’m glad you did,” Legolas hugged Bard a little harder. “You saved Papa’s life. Thank you. That’s the most awesome thing anyone’s ever done in the world.”

“You’re welcome, Legs,” Bard patted the boy’s back. “But don’t give me all the credit, by any means. Your Papa was very brave, and he took the gun away from Lance. Then your sister kept Lance focused on her so I could get under the truck to free your Papa. So it was all three of us, not just me.”

“I’ll give her a big hug, too,” Legolas promised. “She was amazing. So were you.”

“It all came out well,” Bard shrugged. “Please, don’t either of you regale Tilda with what you saw. She doesn’t want to know, and she doesn’t need to know.”

“We won’t,” Bain promised.

“Thanks. So, breakfast...”

“Bain and I can do fried eggs and bagels for sandwiches.”

“Help yourself,” Bard nodded, and went back to his chair at the kitchen table to watch the boys putter through the making of sandwiches. It was just as well that he hadn’t gotten the children up for camp; not only had they all needed the extra sleep, but seeing all the reporters in the field reminded him that another contingent had probably camped out the school, waiting to see Thran. The children didn’t need to endure such badgering. It was also likely that a lot of their fellow campers had seen or heard of what had happened last night, and they might have decided to quiz the children about it. Tilda, especially, didn’t need that. By the time camps resumed in a week after the festival, enough of the noise should have died down, because people would be more interested in some new event rather than last week’s news.

Sigrid was down next. She looked subdued, but much better than she had last night. Legolas immediately got up to engulf her in another big hug, and to thank her, which touched her so much that she returned the boy’s hug with equal fervor.

“Course I helped,” Sigrid snorted, to shore up her bravado. “We’re Clan Ffyrnig, Legs. You know that.”

“I do now,” the boy agreed. “I thought I knew before, but now I really know.”

Tilda arrived in a few minutes, so talk of the night’s events was put aside. Egg bagel sandwiches aside, the blueberry muffins hadn’t lasted long under the boys’ barrage, so Bard mixed up another batch. Just as the aroma of the new batch rose, Thran came into the kitchen. He moved stiffly, but after last night, it was a wonder he could move at all. His wrists were purple, and the small wounds on his temple looked red, but all in all, he passed muster. The tall dancer offered a smile and a wave to the children, but he didn’t reach the table before Legolas had graced him with his patented bear hug. Thran looked a question at Bard, who waited until Tilda went to peek into the oven to mouth, “The boys know.”

Thran’s eyes flickered in response, and he gladly enjoyed his son’s enthusiasm. Legolas lapsed into whispered Russian, which Thran answered softly, clearly assuring the boy that he was fine.
Fine. This time, Bard was the one to snort. Thran had no idea what fine meant. But this morning, even Thran’s definition of fine was a blessing.

After everyone had devoured the second batch of muffins, Thran excused himself to the main room to return all his calls. He kept it brief, explaining that he was due at the police station to make his statement, so Bard urged the children upstairs to put on clothes so they would be ready to go out when Thran was done. When everyone assembled in the kitchen to go outside, Thran held up a hand.

“Before we go out, I want to tell you that we will likely acquire several reporters to dog our trail. Bard and I will see that they do not bother you. You do not have to talk to them, and in fact it is better that you do not – to talk to them is to encourage them, and that we do not want. If you want to say anything, speak French among yourselves.”

“That might be fun,” Bain said with a snarky grin.

“Don’t get too carried away,” Bard warned. “Discretion is the better part of valor.”

“What does that mean, anyway?” Bain shrugged.

“It means that it’s better to remain silent and be thought a fool, than to open your mouth and remove all doubt,” Sigrid intoned.

“Gods, you sound just like Da,” Bain snarked. “Okay, I’ll be good.”

The family made a beeline for their SUV in the Gamgees’ driveway, and were away before anyone followed them. The first stop was the police station, which ended up being two hours of not-much-fun for the younger children. Bard went first so that he could take the children outside to peruse the shops in the center of the village. Sigrid was eager to duck into the Blue Mountain Bistro, but not just to tell Miss Dís that she was anxious to get back to work. Finn stood behind the counter, making an espresso for a customer, but his face lit up to see Sigrid. As soon as he could step away, he had enveloped her in an exuberant hug – it seemed to be the day for such displays – and they went off for a few moments to chat. Dís gave them a fond look, and then narrowed a more considering one on Bard.

“I saw the news. I’m sorry you had to go through all of that, and glad that it’s finally over.”

“Thank you,” Bard exhaled. “Me, too. The worse hour of my life.”

“I don’t doubt it. I’m happy for all of you. And, to be honest, I’m happy for me, too. I needed Sigrid back a week ago.”

“What, Finn’s not up to snuff?”

“Oh, he’s fine,” Dís gave the boy a motherly expression. “But your Sigrid is stellar. Fast, quick learner, and a hard worker. Keep your fingers crossed for good weather for the next week, Bard. I’ll put even Sigrid to the test during lunch then.”

Bard held up his hands with all of his fingers crossed. “I’ve got a few reasons of my own to hope everything goes well, Dís. The ballet goes live tomorrow.”

“How’s Thran? I hope he’s well enough to dance.”

“Nothing will keep him from dancing that premiere. Tonight’s the last dress rehearsal, then tomorrow is the real thing. The whole company is so excited.”
“Have you seen it? How does it look?"

“It’s the most amazing thing I’ve ever seen. It’ll be wonderful.”

“Good!” Dís tapped her knuckles on the counter emphatically. “I can’t wait to see it. I’ve got tickets for Wednesday. We’ve got lots of art exhibits and music performances scheduled, but this is the festival’s first dance piece. We need this to take the whole village a bit farther.”

“Thran will give it his all. All right, let me break up the excited teenagers, and I’ll let you get back to business.”

“Thanks. Sigrid, first thing tomorrow morning, seven-thirty sharp, all right?”

“Absolutely!” Sigrid beamed. “I’m so happy to be back! I’ll show this guy how it’s done, won’t I?”

“I won’t mind if you do,” Finn gave Sigrid such an affectionate smile that the girl reddened, and tried to roll her eyes as if she didn’t care.

Laughing, Dís shooed her towards the door. “Go, go! Or this guy won’t remember beans about how to make a latte for the next hour!”

“I’ll call you, Sig!” Finn waved, as they exited the shop.

Bard’s mobile rang to say that Thran was finished, and it was Sigrid’s turn, so they headed back to the police station, and saw Sigrid into the interviewer’s room for her statement. Thran offered to wait for her, so Bard shepherded the three younger children to the cheese shop, then the Ilithien Gallery to check on his pieces. Celebrían greeted him gladly, and showed him his Andromeda Galaxy piece hanging from the ceiling and turning slowly as he’d envisioned it. His bronze pine tree was in another room, but looked handsome near a collection of ceramic birds. Celebrían had already sold several of his sketches, so she expected visitors during the coming week to account for many more. That was a relief. Bard hadn’t liked missing the chance to present more of his sculpture for sale during the festival, but at least he could anticipate sales of his sketches to salvage the week.

Sigrid was finally done her statement, so Thran drove them to the shopping mall to see what chance they had to rent suits for Bard, Legolas, and Bain for tomorrow’s premiere.

“You’re okay to dance, then, angel?” Bard asked Thran as they ventured into the mall.

“There is nothing that will keep me from dancing the final rehearsal tonight, or the premiere tomorrow,” Thran said firmly, unconsciously echoing what Bard had said to Dís earlier. “Too many people, me among them, have worked very hard for this premiere. It will go on as we planned.”

The confidence and eagerness in his voice made the awkward chore of getting fit for a tuxedo less of one. It was more fun to watch Legolas explain all the ins and outs of the various suits to Bain than it was to look at his reflection in the mirror. But the most fun was to watch Thran turn into an impresario, asking the clerk for this or that or the other. His experience at gala events had made him most persnickety, but the results were well worth it. On such short notice, there were no gimmicky colors or styles, only the most classic of black tuxedos, even for the boys, but that was just the look Thran wanted.

Bard didn’t think he looked like James Bond, but when he caught Thran looking at him in the mirror with a most intent expression and a slight smile, he decided that he looked quite good enough to Suits in tow, the family hastened through the mall towards the parking lot. Thran’s long, white hair attracted enough attention that passersby stopped to stare and comment among themselves. Even Tilda noticed, so the family hurried along at a good clip to reach their SUV. When they got home, the police were gone, and all signs of last night’s events were gone, other than Bard’s truck parked in the middle of the driveway. They put both vehicles into the carriage house and came into the house. The children had a snack, but Bard planned to make something a little more substantial for Thran before he went to rehearsal.

“Can we go tonight, too?” Sigrid asked.

Thran shrugged. “I do not mind if you come, not at all. But we have tickets for you to go tomorrow to the premiere, so do you want to see the same thing two days in a row?”

“I do,” Sigrid said at once. “I’ve worried and hoped and feared about Immortal, too, so yes, I want to see it both times. Tonight will be like a private performance. We deserve that.”

“I’d like to go, too, Papa,” Legolas said.

“If Legs goes, then I do, too,” Bain nodded. “He’s worried about it a lot, too.”

“What about you, Til?” Bard asked.

“I still want to wear my bee dress tomorrow,” the little girl said. “But a private performance – that sounds special.”

“I’m up for it, too,” Bard agreed. “We need an early supper, then. We didn’t have lunch because we ate breakfast so late, so let’s see what I can scare up that’s fast.”

“Ravioli!” Tilda crowed. “The cheese ones!”

Everyone chipped in to get a substantial lunch/dinner on the table. Thran ate sparingly of his usual roasted chicken, rice, and sautéed veg, but the hungry children ate mounds of ravioli in tomato sauce and cheese, as well as the veg. Lots of fresh fruit and cookies filled in the last corners. Thran collected his dance things, the children tidied their clothes and collected books and games to occupy themselves while the ballet company warmed at the barre, and they were off again.

The expectant expressions on the children’s faces calmed a little more of Bard’s anxiety from last night. They were happy and excited about getting their private view of Thran’s ballet, as carefree as if nothing untoward had happened last night.

Thank the gods. The shadow had already begun to lift.
Chapter 156

Chapter Summary

The final rehearsal for Immortal is at hand. Will the shadow of yesterday's crisis affect it?

As the children piled into the back of the SUV, Thran tried not to think about the last time he’d been behind the wheel of a vehicle.

Last night, when he’d driven Bard’s truck.

Las night, when Lance had been in the back seat with a gun, goading him on.

Last night, when he thought he might die.

Better to think of today.

Today, he would drive his SUV. Today, Tilda would be in the back seat behind him with Sigrid beside her, and behind them would be Legolas and Bain. Today, Bard would be beside him. Best of all, today no one would be frightened, but happy and excited.

Would he ever look at Bard’s truck the same way again?

Of course he wouldn’t. Every time he looked at that truck, he’d know how much Bard loved him – enough to risk his life to save Thran’s.

He would not ask Bard to drive them to the school for his rehearsal. He would not let a dead boy frighten him with memories of the evil he had tried to inflict. Thran would drive his family himself, because doing so reclaimed more of his life.

When the children had buckled themselves into their seats, and Bard sat beside him, he drove the SUV out of the carriage house. He paused a moment to regard their house – the fresh white paint that shone brightly in the hot summer sun, the red door that beckoned a welcome, the myriad pots and planters with their riot of blossoms that cascaded down each side of the porch steps and over the top of the balustrade, the lush shrubs and flowers that nestled around the house to ground it. He admired the beauty before him, and how well it reflected the happy family that lived inside. This was the enduring memory that he’d hold onto.

This.

Now it was time to think of the night to come – the last dress rehearsal before tomorrow night’s premiere. How wonderful it was to savor the excitement that coiled in his belly, untainted by worry and fear! At long last, Immortal was ready to greet the world!

That brought to mind another bit of reality. Thran turned off the SUV engine, and turned around to meet five sets of curious eyes.

“Before we go, there is something I must tell you, children,” Thran said, pitching his voice to reach the boys in the back seat. “When we get to the school, there will likely be many people waiting for us. There will be people who want my autograph or to take a picture. There will also likely be many reporters there.”

“Reporters?” Tilda had been looking out of her window at the pot of yellow and orange marigolds by the corner of the carriage house, but now she looked at Thran and her father with a mystified frown. “What for?”

“Because of last night, Til,” Bain said from the back.

“Because of the ballet premiere tomorrow, Bain,” Bard said quickly, with a warning glance at his son.

“Last night?” Tilda looked frightened. “What about it? Wait, no – I don’t want to know.”

“All you need to know, Tilda,” Bain said with a fierce look on his face, “is that last night Thran, Sigrid, and Da kicked ass.”

Bard turned around to skewer his son with a steady gaze. “Enough, Bain.”

“Yes, Da,” Bain murmured, glancing at Legolas.

The blond youth glanced back, and swallowed. “But they did, Tilda. Especially your Da. He saved Papa’s life. And so did Sigrid.”

“Lads, that’s enough,” Bard said. His voice had lowered several tones, and brooked no discussion. Both of the boys looked militant. Tilda looked apprehensive enough that Thran said, “Have respect for your sister, both of you. You make her uncomfortable. Please apologize.”

“Sorry, Tilda. Sorry, Kukla.”

“Okay,” Tilda murmured, but she looked a thoughtful question at Sigrid, who didn’t quite meet her sister’s eyes. Before the older girl could say anything, though, the little girl sighed. “I guess you’d better tell me. Everybody knows but me. But I don’t want to hear any squishy parts.”

“It was amazing, Til!” Bain leaned over the back of his sisters’ seat and met Tilda’s gaze with an excited expression. “There was this video online, and it –”

“Video?” Sigrid screeched, turning sideways to glare at Bain, as if he were personally responsible. Thran felt no less shocked than she did, and his expression surely mirrored hers of rampant teenaged outrage. So half the planet was going to see him hung up on a truck grille? He flicked Bard a glance –

What was this? Bard knew about the video?

“Someone made a video?” Sigrid said in the same shriek. “That took nerve, and not the good kind!”

“Yeah, and it showed the whole thing –”

“Did you know about this?” Thran demanded of Bard. “You did! And you did not tell me? Why did you not tell me?”

“Stop, stop, stop!” Bard held up his hands in a plea for silence. He gave the boys a harried glare. “This is out of hand, and that doesn’t help anyone. So yes, someone made a video, but I don’t think it’s a police one, because the police would never release something like that –”
“You have seen this video?” Thran demanded.

“I haven’t,” Bard admitted. “The lads told me about it this morning.”

“It showed the whole thing, Papa,” Legolas said apologetically. “At least the part once Sigrid arrived. I was glad I saw it, because it proved that Sigrid and Bard saved your life.”

“Sigrid and Da saved Ada’s life?” Tilda said with a little gasp. “Ooooh, now I know you’d better tell me what happened!”

Silence fell over the clan as Thran locked eyes with Bard.

“We’ve got to tell her something, Da,” Bain protested. “Everyone’s going to know about it, and that means everyone’s going to talk about it. Better Til hears it from us than everyone else.”

Bard looked militant, but Thran bowed to the inevitable. He put a placating hand on Bard’s knee.

“Bain makes a good point, lyubov moyu. The reporters at the school will surely say something about last night. We should respect our Kukla enough to tell her about it, so that she is prepared for what she might hear from them.”

Bard swallowed, but as Thran knew he would, he nodded. He met Tilda’s eyes. “Bain and Thran are right, little doll. And I don’t want you to worry about anything you hear outside of Clan Ffyrnig. So here goes.”

“No squishy parts, please.”

“No squishy parts. But some parts are scary. Just remember that everything turned out all right.”

Tilda nodded. “Okay.”

“So last night, Lance went to the school to look for Sigrid. He couldn’t find her, because she was with you and the lads at the films, yes? So he got mad, and he... hurt Mr. Mike.”

“He hurt Mr. Mike?” Tilda’s eyes widened in distress. “Is Mr. Mike all right now?”

“He had to go to hospital, but he’ll be okay.”

“Hospital? What happened to him? Did Lance hit him?”

“Um, it was a little worse than that. Lance, um, had the gun remember? And... he shot Mr. Mike. But Mr. Mike will be okay. He’ll be okay.”

Tilda gulped, but her gaze didn’t waver. “Okay, that’s good. I’m glad he’ll be okay.”

“So... Lance still had the gun, and he made Ada go with him to the house because he was still mad at Sigrid, and he wanted to talk to her. But when they got to the house, Ada got the gun away from him and threw it away so Lance couldn’t find it.”

“Good for Ada!”

“Very good. But Ada’s been very sick, so he couldn’t keep Lance from hitting him, and...”

Tilda considered Bard. “Is this the squishy part?”

“No, this is the scary part.”
Tilda considered some more. “Ada is okay, so... I can stand the scary part.”

“Okay. It’s scary, but it didn’t last long, so...”

“Just tell her, Da,” Bain said in an exasperated tone, rolling his eyes. “This is the part where Da and Sigrid were heroes, Til, so don’t let him welsh out of it.”

“They were?” Tilda turned a wide-eyed look on Bain, then looked back at Bard. “Okay, tell me the hero part, Da.”

“Well, Lance knocked Ada down. He didn’t have his gun anymore, so he... he tied Ada to the front of my truck and threatened to run him over unless Sigrid talked to him. But it was okay, Tilda, because Sigrid did talk to him. She was very brave, and kept him talking for a long time. He was so busy talking to her that he didn’t see me crawl under the truck to untie Ada. Then Ada and I crawled to the back of the truck, and then we were safe.”

“Except for Lance,” Sigrid growled. “That’s when Da dragged him out of the truck and punched his lights out.”

“So everyone was okay, Kukla. Sigrid and Bard saved Papa,” Legolas finished the tale.

The frown on Tilda’s face revealed that she didn’t think the story was over.

“But... you said Lance is dead? Did he fall and hit his head? Or did you...”

“No, no, Kukla,” Thran hastened to say. “Your Da only got Lance out of the truck. The police officers came right away to take him into custody, and your Da moved away to take care of Sigrid and me. But Lance did not want to go with the police, so he fought them. None of us had any part in that. We do not know exactly what happened, other than the boy tried to grab one of the officers’ guns. It went off, and the bullet struck him, and he died.”

Tilda mulled all that she’d heard, then scanned her brothers and sister. Sigrid nodded, then so did the boys. She looked back at Bard and Thran and sighed. “Okay. Thank you for telling me. It’s not easy to know, but at least I do now. And everyone is okay. And I don’t have to be afraid of Lance anymore.”

“No,” Bard said, offering her an encouraging smile. “No one has to be afraid anymore.”

Everyone lapsed into silence, so Thran restarted the SUV and headed down the lane. The trip took only a few minutes, and the children were silent for the most part, though the boys murmured among themselves in the back. He glanced at Bard, who looked more or less reconciled to what had been said. Upon consideration, Thran decided that despite the unpleasant surprise of a video record of his being held hostage, at least they’d talked about what had happened as a family, and there were no more secrets. He felt lighter because of it. Better to let it out into the air than let it fester unsaid.

They reached the school. Thran turned into the parking lot and found a space some distance away from the horde of people standing outside the doors to the auditorium. He turned off the SUV, and turned to look at the children. “There is a technique that will help us get into the school, children. Move briskly, and all the while we smile and nod. You do not have to say anything. Bard and I will say anything if we need to.”

“We can talk more about things once we get inside, if anyone wants to,” Bard said, scanning the children. “We’ll have time for that while Thran and the other dancers warm up. Then we’ll enjoy our private performance of Thran’s wonderful ballet.”
“Yeah, Til?” Bain said from the back. “You stick with Legs and me. He knows all about how to ignore reporters, so he and I will make sure you’re okay.”

“You will?” Tilda gave her brothers a surprised look, but when they nodded, her expression changed to a gratified smile. “Thank you, Legolas and Bain. That’s very kind of you.”

Thran smothered a chuckle at Tilda’s dignified answer. “Then I will make sure that our lioness and your Da are equally okay. Shall we go?”

“Let’s do it,” Sigrid replied, giving Tilda a smile as everyone got out of the SUV.

“Do not stop, mes chers,” he said as everyone clustered around him. “The great buffoon dancer must get to work, and so on and so forth. Follow Bard, who will see you into the school if I have to stop.”

“Yes, Papa; okay, Ada; right, Thran,” the children said. Everyone shouldered his or her bag, and walked purposefully towards the school. The boys closed ranks around Tilda, who looked around with more interest than apprehension, Thran was relieved to note. He and Bard flanked Sigrid, and as the reporters recognized him, Thran looked to his family.

“So it begins,” he said with what he hoped was a reassuring wink. He marshaled the professional smile that he reserved for reporters, and braced for the barrage. He didn’t have long to wait.

“Thran! Thran! Over here! How are you this morning? Did you suffer any injuries last night? How does it feel to have survived your ordeal? Are you fit to dance?”

“Good afternoon, everyone,” Thran smiled. “I am well, thank you; I hope you are the same. Hello, Anna, Mark; nice to see you again. Yes, I am quite fit, and delighted to dance our last dress rehearsal tonight. I hope you will all be here tomorrow for the premiere of our new ballet, Immortal. I am excited to bring it to the world after so much hard work.”

The clamor degenerated into the spate of breathless questions that was more akin to a feeding frenzy of sharks than a polite exchange of questions and answers.

“Is this your husband? Bard, what went through your mind when you learned your husband had been kidnapped? How is the bodyguard who was shot during your kidnapping, Thran? Young lady, young lady, over here, please – it must have been a terrifying moment when you saw Thran tied to the front of that truck; can you tell us about that moment? Mr. Bowman, were you frightened when you had to crawl under the truck? Thran, is it true that the boy who attacked you was bent on revenge?”

Thran slid to one side, guiding Sigrid and Bard ahead of him towards the school door where security guards already came forward to help them out of the fray. Legolas and Bain grabbed Tilda’s hands to pull her after her father and sister. Turning, Thran stopped to draw the reporters towards him rather than after his family.

“My family and I are well, and suffered no lasting harm last night. We have put it behind us. Tonight, I rehearse Immortal, and tomorrow night, our premiere performance opens the Greenwood Dale on the Lake Arts Festival. That is a proud honor for the UltraViolet Ballet Company, and we intend to do it justice. Thank you for your concern and your good wishes!”

Thran gave one last wave and turned to follow his family. The questions continued to bombard them as the security guards held open the doors for them. At the last second, Tilda wriggled from between her brothers to call to the reporters.

“My Da is a hero! And so is my sister!”
She gave an emphatic nod, and disappeared into the building. As surprised laughter swept through the reporters, Thran gave them a shrug.

“She is right. Goodbye!”

“Oh, Tilda, now you’ve done it!” Bain groaned as the security guards pulled the door shut after Thran. “You’ll be an Internet meme before the night’s out.”

“Is that bad?” she looked at Bain doubtfully. “I told them the truth.”

Bain rolled his eyes, and Legolas tried to smother a chuckle, both of which drew Thran’s grin. Sigrid wrapped an arm around Tilda’s shoulders to hug her. The resilience of children was just the thing to put life into correct perspective.

Ernie waited for them at his usual station, and welcomed him with a relieved expression. “Evening, Thran! Man, it’s a relief to see you tonight! You look great considering what happened. I’m glad you’re doing well. How’s Mike?”

Thran put his bag on Ernie’s table for the usual search. “Good evening, Ernie, thank you for your good wishes. I am well, a few bumps and bruises only. I talked to Ori earlier, who said that Mike rests comfortably in hospital. He is expected to make a full recovery, which is good news for all of us.”

“That’s the best news. Mike’s a great guy,” Ernie nodded emphatically as he gave Thran’s bag a cursory look. As the children and Bard opened their bags for the guard, Ernie gave them all a quick look. “Go on in, kids. None of you have anything I have to worry about. Have a good evening, all of you. Thran, best of luck tonight.”

“Thank you,” Thran replied, and the children murmured the same. Everyone followed Thran into the auditorium. He spent a few minutes with Bard and the children until they settled with their books, music players, and sketchpads.

“We’ll be fine, Thran,” Bard assured him, stroking his back. “All you have to think about for the rest of the night is Immortal. We’ll be here when you’re done.”

“Thank you, lyubov moya.” Thran offered Bard a touch in return, then collected his bag and walked up the stairs to the stage.

As usual, Thran was early; very few people, even of the stage crew, were in house yet. He liked the time alone with his thoughts before the rigors of a dancer’s world descended upon him. Today, however, he had more reason to arrive before most of his colleagues. He hadn’t been sure how quickly he would be able to escape the reporters, so he was gratified that they hadn’t delayed him as long as he’d feared. That gave him more time to address the real reason he’d come early.

He ached all over.

At least he felt better now than he had when he’d gotten out of bed this morning, but still... he had much work to do to limber sore muscles, bruised wrists and hip and shoulder, stiff neck, creaky sacrum.

He went backstage and passed the dressing rooms to the one he and Luka shared –

Suka blyad.
Had anyone mopped up all the traces of Mike’s blood? He hesitated before he touched the doorknob, not sure of what he’d see when he opened the door.

“Angel?” Bard came up behind him. His face must have revealed his apprehension, because Bard put a hand on his shoulder. “I thought you might want company.”

Thran didn’t pretend to misunderstand. “I do. I don’t want to see...”

“I’ll look, okay?” Bard didn’t wait for Thran’s acquiescence before he grasped the knob and stuck his head inside. “It’s okay. Not a trace.”

“Thank the gods,” Thran breathed. “It is one thing to say I will think about the ballet no matter what, and another to do so when confronted with...”

“Understood,” Bard said, pulling the door open. “I’ll give it a good once over while you change. The children asked if they could see your dressing room, so if it would help distract you, I could bring them back here.”

“That would help, yes,” Thran nodded. “They do not know that Mike...?”

“I didn’t tell them, so I don’t think so.”

“All right. As long as there are no signs, let them come back.”

Bard gave the small room a thorough inspection while Thran got into his practice clothes. When he was dressed, Bard disappeared to fetch the children, leaving the dressing room door wide open. Thran concentrated on his breathing, and did a few ginger stretches to coax the aches from his body while he waited for the children arrive. Their snickers about the cartoons on the dressing room doors were welcome sounds as they came down the hall.

“It’s so small in here!” Tilda commented.

“It is not bad for just Luka and me,” Thran explained. “And of course Charisse has the next room all to herself. But the corps must fit into the next two, and when they are all in there, it looks like the telephone booth and the small car cartoons in truth! That is why a nearby room holds the costumes, as well as extra mirrors and tables. It is very hard for all of the company to get ready at once in such small rooms.”

“Hello!” Luka appeared at the door. “Thran! Gods, I’m glad you’re okay! Hello, Bard! And Sigrid, Tilda, Legolas, and Bain! It’s so nice to see all of you again! How are you? Have you come to see us dance tonight?”

“Hi, Luka!” the children greeted the dancer.

“Yes, Ada said we could come to see you tonight,” Tilda beamed. “It’s our private performance!”

“Then we’ll dance extra well tonight, won’t we?” the young man grinned. “Just for you!”

“Come on, children,” Bard slipped out of the dressing room. “Let Luka change his clothes, and maybe Thran will show us the costumes before he has to warm up.”

“Of course,” Thran nodded, and the children filed out. “Say goodbye to Luka, but do not wish him good luck – that is bad luck!”

“I know what to say, Papa,” Legolas gave a mischievous grin. “Merde, Luka!”
“Oh, Legolas,” Thran winced, as the children dissolved into laughter and Bard gave him a jaundiced eye. “Do not glare at me, Bard. It is the tradition.”

“Vraiment,” Luka snickered. “That really is the tradition, Bard, so don’t blame Legolas or Thran.”

“Of course it is,” Bard shook his head as the rest of the children repeated the epithet gleefully. “Ethereal dancers, my foot.”

Luka lifted a hand in laughing acceptance of their good wishes. “Beaucoup de merde! Thank you! See you soon!”

As Luka ducked into the dressing room, Thran led the way to the big room at the side of the auditorium where the dancers warmed up. Rada was already there with the costume mistress, shaking out a new body stocking for Thran to wear during Acts II and III.

“Well, look!” the costumier beamed at the children. “You are all a happy sight. Sebastian has missed you!”

“Is he with you tonight, Mr. Rada?” Legolas asked.

“Sadly, no,” the costumier looked disappointed. “He’s very active in the summer, of course, and much too busy to be happy in my coat pocket, much less this tiny little shirt pocket. So he is at home, busily snuffling away in his habitat. He’ll be most upset to have missed you.”

“We’re sorry to miss him, too,” Sigrid assured him, then pointed to Thran’s armored tunic for Act I. “But we’re glad to see your costumes close up. This blue is amazing!”

“Thank you, my dear,” Rada beamed, and gave the children a quick look at each of the costumes hanging on their labeled hangers. Bard took the chance to edge up to Thran and rub a hand over his back.

“Okay, angel?”

Thran nodded. “Thank you for the distraction. I will warm up slowly and carefully, and then I will be restored.”

“Then merde, and nothing else.” Bard drew Thran’s hand up to press a surreptitious kiss on his wedding ring. “Do you want me to hold this for you?”

Thran shook his head. “It helped me to stay brave last night. So I will keep it with me tonight. My magic talisman.”

Bard’s eyes warmed. “You won’t need a magic talisman tonight, angel. Immortal’s wonderful, and so are you.”

Thran held Bard’s hand long enough to kiss his ring, then let it go. “My saint.”

Bard’s smile widened into a loving expression for Thran alone. He cocked his head back towards the children. “All right, troops. Time to let Thran get ready.”

With a wave to Rada and the costume mistress, then another for Thran, Bard shepherded the children back to the auditorium.

Thran moved one of the portable barres into place, and gave himself to his warmup. Despite all the aches and twinges, they seemed to ease when he remembered Bard’s private smile.
After Bard and the children left Thran’s dressing room, they tiptoed carefully onto the stage to return to their seats. The Underworld portion of the set was turned towards the audience, so they got a close view of everything as they passed. So many relics, trinkets, and keepsakes from uncounted cultures filled the set that it was hard to fathom how long it had taken to amass them. They lingered, trying to guess which artifact was from what culture. The only ones that Bard recognized with any authority were a small plaster bust of Plato, and a sketchy semblance of a Japanese Torii gate at the back of the set. Even after they resumed their seats, the children continued to point out one thing or another. Bain and Legolas both had their mobiles out, researching one thing or another, while Tilda turned to a new page in her sketchbook to draw her version of the miniature Sphinx perched in one nook of the set. Bard sat beside her to begin his own sketch, but his showed Bard and Legolas in animated discussion about Roman aqueducts. After a while, Sigrid and Tilda wanted to visit the restroom, so Bard put his drawing things aside to escort them.

There wasn’t any reason for Bard to worry about the girls now... but he felt better going with them, anyway.

When they returned, Legolas and Bain had begun a game. The girls borrowed Legolas’ music player, their heads close together so they could each plug in one of the ear buds while Tilda drew and Sigrid read. Bard got up to draw a picture of the children sitting together. When he finished that, he moved back far enough to get a good view of the stage, and plied his colored pencils. This was the first time he’d had an uninterrupted view of the Underworld set, so he took advantage of it. Even as more of the set crew arrived to prowl over the stage, he continued to sketch unperturbed. He got far enough along to capture this view of the set before the crew swung into action, rearranging it for the first Underworld scene. He had just time to block out this arrangement before the wrestling team arrived in their matching tees to turn the blank part of the set towards the audience. Bain was full of questions about how the set turned, but all of the children listened as Bard described the handholds that the wrestlers used.

Sigrid’s mobile buzzed; she pulled the earbud out of her ear to listen to the call. “Hello? Hi! Yes, I’m in the auditorium. What? Yes! I’ll be right out!”

Sigrid jumped from her seat even before she’d clicked off her mobile. “Finn’s out with Ernie, Da! I’m going to get him – be right back!”

She bounded up the aisle. Bard let her go; it was a relief to see her usual confidence and enthusiasm return. In a few minutes, she was back with the stocky blond boy beside her.

“Hi, Mr. Bowman!” Finn waved. “Hey, Bain, Legs! And Til, hey!”

The children and Bard returned Finn’s warm greetings, chatting briefly before the boy and Sigrid drew off to seats out of earshot. Bard left them alone; there was no reason why Sigrid couldn’t unburden herself to her sympathetic boyfriend. More than likely, the conversation would bring Sigrid some relief after holding back in front of Tilda and the boys.

More of the dancers came down the aisles, waving to Bard and the children as they walked by. Ori appeared with his usual smile to hand Bard the family’s tickets for tomorrow night’s premiere, and stayed to chat until Irmo came. The set grew quiet again as the dancers hurried to begin their warmup in the room where they’d left Thran. The boys were immersed in their game, so Bard and Tilda took turns challenging each other to draw various animals. To even the odds, Tilda could draw in the normal way, but Bard had to keep the point of his pencil on the paper. They had a zoo full of animals – a monkey, a giraffe, a pride of lions, a hippopotamus, two elephants, and an okapi – by the time the house lights dimmed.

“It’s starting!” Tilda whispered, sitting up straight.

“It is. Here, put your pencils in your box, and put your sketchpad away so you can enjoy the show.”

“Okay!” Tilda dove for her bag and quickly stowed her drawing things. Bard followed suit, then settled into his seat. No matter that he’d seen the show last night – he couldn’t wait to see it again. The boys moved to seats farther forward, and Sigrid and Finn were to his left, so he had a good view of the children as the set dimmed.

As the battlefield music began, Tilda leaned over to whisper. “Look, Da! There’s Ada up at the top! This is when he’ll fly?”

“That’s right,” Bard whispered back. “It’s amazing.”

Tilda was so excited about Thran’s upcoming flight that the battle scene didn’t alarm her. She had seen the scene before, but with the full effect of lights, costume, and video, it was much more exciting. At Thran’s flight, she oohed and clapped her hands. The boys were no less enthusiastic. If tomorrow’s audience were as excited about what they saw, Immortal would be the talk of the festival. May the ballet world take equal notice!

At the first intermission, Tilda had lots to comment about. But once the second act began, she was enthralled by the myriad of different dancers, dance styles, the amazing set, and costumes. The entire act seemed to fly by, and so did the second intermission because Tilda and the boys had so many things to say about what they’d seen.

“Thran hasn’t danced in his pointe shoes yet,” Tilda commented. “Did he decide not to do it, Da?”

“You’ll have to wait and see, little doll,” Bard grinned. “We’ve got another act to go.”

“And here it comes!” Tilda clapped her hands as the lights dimmed again. Out came Charisse as the Maid, and there was Thran in his minimal costume and pointe shoes. Gods, how did Thran look so light, as if all he had to do to drift skyward was raise his arms? And how alien was he – so tall, as slender as an eyelash, as pale as funeral ashes compared to Charisse’s rosy Maid and Luka’s vigorous Soldier. When he threw himself into a split jump, head and arms thrown back, Tilda gasped, but the Maid and the Soldier never saw him. Was it hard for Charisse and Luka to be so close to that beautiful jump and not register the least notice of it?

When the Maid fled, leaving the Lord of the Underworld to collapse in despair, Tilda moaned sadly. The ballet raced to its conclusion, and all too soon Charisse and Luka flew up to take their places in the heavens. The Maid and the Soldier embraced before he dropped to one knee to offer his devotion to her, and below the Lord of the Underworld held out one attenuated hand in longing and loss before disappearing behind the gates to His kingdom. The lights fell, then the curtain, then both went back up for the company to take their bows. Tilda clapped enthusiastically as she jumped up and down. The boys added their applause to the company, and to the left, Sigrid wiped her cheek before she, too, stood up to applaud.

When Thran came forward to take his bow, Bard punctuated his applause to yell, “Bravo!”

Thran laughed when the children took up the call, but it was a laugh of triumph as well as amusement.

Tomorrow night, the children wouldn’t be the only ones to yell bravo, and Bard would be there to hear them.

The house lights came up, and the dancers dropped out of their roles, back to mortal dancers who had put in a hard night’s work. Despite their weariness, they were smiling and elated, some just as exuberant as the jumping Tilda.

“That was incredible!” Sigrid exclaimed as she and Finn rejoined Bard and Tilda. “Just incredible!”

“Even better than incredible!” Tilda jumped up and down. “Fantabulous!”

“Ginormously amazing!” Bain called to her, grinning.

“Magnifique!” Legolas added. “Papa, c’est magnifique!”

“Merci, mon fils!” Thran called back, laughing. “We go to cool down, and then I will come down to you!”

Bard waved in acknowledgement as Thran and the other dancers made their way backstage.

“I have to admit that Ada dancing on pointe was the most amazing thing I’ve ever seen in my life,” Sigrid said, as the set crew came on stage to snug everything down for the night.

“It was,” Bard nodded. “He was right about what a stunner it’d be. It’ll bring the place down tomorrow night.”

“I hope it does,” Tilda agreed. “I want everyone to love it!”

“They’d better,” Sigrid’s murmur was fierce. “He’s put so much blood and sweat into it, and we’ve all helped. Especially you, Da. How many gallons of paint did you put on our ballroom in record time?”

“A lot,” Bard admitted. “What’d you think, Finn?”

The boy chuckled shamefacedly and glanced at Sigrid. “I figured it’d be a lot of jumping up and down, and that’s it. Boy, was I wrong. Those battles were amazing! And Thran flying down over the battlefield – that was something. I’m glad I came.”

A certain teenaged girl was, too, if Sigrid’s smile was any gauge, but Bard merely smiled back and held silence about the obvious.

Ori came over to chat for a few minutes as they waited for the dancers to reappear after they’d changed out of their costumes and cooled from their exertions. It wasn’t long before they appeared in ones and twos, waving at the children as they headed home.

“You were great!” Tilda told them as they went by, drawing their happy laughter.

“Yeah!” Luka crowed as he went by, pumping his fist. “We were! Only one little mistake, but that’s good luck, you know. A perfect final rehearsal’s not a good omen.”

“I didn’t see a single mistake, Luka!” Tilda insisted. “It was all great!”

“You are our cheerleader, Tilda!” Charisse came up behind Luka. “But yes, there was one tiny little mistake. Luka and I were supposed to fly up slightly apart, so that the audience sees us better. But we went together. It is a small thing, but good to keep the superstition without causing much consternation.”

“It all looked wonderful,” Sigrid assured her. “I can’t wait to see what the audience thinks tomorrow.”

“They’ll think it’s the best thing since sliced bread,” Luka chortled, rubbing his hands together.

“Yes, they will,” Bard avowed, amused at the stale metaphor that was typical of Luka’s jokes. “So get a good night’s sleep, because tomorrow life changes.”

Luka and Charisse wished the family and Ori goodnight, and made their way up to the entrance to the auditorium. Ori looked after them thoughtfully, then looked back at Bard.

“You’re right, you know.”

“About what?” Bard asked.

“Tomorrow, life will change. For all of us. The world will finally see Immortal, and it’ll be something else. A sensation isn’t overstating it.”

“I don’t think so, either, Ori.”

“So enjoy your last night of anonymity. Tomorrow night, everyone will know who Thran is, and Irmo, and Charisse and Luka and Rada. But they’ll know you, too, because you helped write the story, and once your pictures hit, they’ll know you for that, too.”

“Yeah, Da!” Bain and Legolas had come up to join them. “You’ll be famous!”

“I’ll leave that to Thran,” Bard held up his hands. “You’ll be famous, too, Ori, as the magician who kept Irmo focused, and made everything come together when it needed to.”

“Oh, I hope not,” Ori blinked, and gave Bard a wink. “My brother wouldn’t like that at all. See you tomorrow!”

“Bye, Ori!” the children waved.

Several more minutes passed before Thran appeared, but he was beaming. “Here I am, children! I hope it was not too terrible to wait so long. Of course Irmo had four things to tell me, but I did not listen, because Immortal is already perfect, and it is too late to change anything. It will make its premiere tomorrow just as you saw it, and what do you think about that?”

“I think someone is giddy,” Bard grinned. “Not that you any reason to be, not at all.”

“I am, I admit it!” Thran gave an expansive shrug. “I am very giddy, and very happy.”

“I liked it a lot,” Tilda assured him.

“I loved it,” Sigrid leaned in to pat Thran’s arm. “I’m sorry I gave you such a hard time about the pointe dancing, Ada. It was perfect. Just perfect.”

“Thank you so much, lioness,” Thran put an arm around her to hug her, and brushed a kiss on her hair before releasing her. “I am grateful.”

“It is a very wonderful ballet, Papa,” Legolas added his opinion.
“I liked it, too, Thran,” Bain’s expression was mischievous. “It even had ‘more stuff blows up’ in it!”

Laughing, Bard collected his bag of drawing supplies. “Get your things, children. It’s time to take the conquering hero home.”

Clan Ffyrnig bid Finn a farewell in the parking lot, amid Sigrid’s assurances that she’d see him tomorrow at the bistro. Their drive home was animated as the children discussed the parts they liked, and voted for what they thought was the best part. The boys like the battles, Tilda liked the Underworld dances, and Bard and Sigrid liked the pointe dance. But all agreed that the most dramatic moment was when Thran flew across the battlefield.

Thran listened to all of the discussion in silence, but his face never lost its smile. He still smiled as the children showered and got into bed, even when he and Bard retreated to their bedroom for the night.

“I bet you wake up with that same smile on your face tomorrow morning,” Bard teased, when Thran came out of the bathroom to join him in bed.

“I might.” Thran reached out a hand to stroke through Bard’s messy curls. “It feels good to be so happy.”

“Oh, I’ll second that in a heartbeat,” Bard picked up the end of Thran’s braid to dust it over Thran’s nose. All that did was encourage Thran to chuckle. “You were amazing tonight. I’ve seen you dance in the ballroom, in class, in the studio, so many times, and I thought that was the sum of it. But none of them are as stunning as to see you perform. You become the role – you don’t dance it, not at all. You live it. That took my breath away.”

Thran stilled, and his smile of delight changed to one of love and affection. “That is how I felt at your art show. Your sketches are so full of life, too. I hope you captured good sketches of the rehearsal tonight. To combine your art and mine... that would be a delight.”

“I did get some good ones.”

“I am still too excited to sleep. Perhaps you would show me?”

“Sure. I left my sketchbook downstairs, but I’ll fetch it. Back in a tick.”

Bard grabbed his shorts at the side of the bed, but didn’t bother to put them on before he went downstairs, grabbed his sketchbook, and returned to the bedroom. He dropped the shorts by the bedside and got back into bed. Thran had plumped the pillows against the headboard, and crowded close when Bard pulled up his knees and rested his sketchbook against them. He would have flipped past the animal drawings, but Thran stayed his hand.

“What are these? Something for Tilda, I think?”

“We had a contest. To make it fair, I had to draw all of mine without lifting my pencil.”

“Who won?”

Bard shook his head. “She had fun coming up with unusual animals, like the okapi, and I had fun watching her draw, so we both won. She gets better every day. Theodred challenges her in just the right ways, and she tries things on her own. That’s exciting to watch.”

“I hope she will show me her animals. I am sure they are wonderful.”

“She did some cute ones. I bet she’d be happy to show them to you.”
“I will be sure to ask. So show me what you came up with after the animals – oh, you did the Underworld! In color! I like this one very much! So much detail!”

“It’s a good match to the one I did earlier of the flip side of the stage.” Bard turned back to near the beginning of the book to show his sketch of the stark black and white set. “I’d like to go back to this one and add a little green to show the light on the bottom part, and a little blue on your perch. That would be a great sketch to make, too – the empty set with you perched on the top, waiting.”

Thran hummed in agreement. “That one would be very dramatic, yes. I hope you do it. So what is next, after the Underworld?”

Bard showed him the other views he’d done of the Underworld set, including one where the stage hands worked to maneuver the pieces into another configuration. The first sketches in the lot showed the children intent on their activities as they waited for the rehearsal to start.

“I like them all,” Thran sighed, as Bard shut the sketchbook and laid it on the floor by the bed. “The colored pencils are wonderful. I have not seen you use them before.”

“The troll market inspired me. That’s such an amazing set – it includes all the colors that aren’t in the mortal world. Mere black and white wouldn’t do it justice. I want to use them to draw scenes from the ballet, too. So much motion and life! I want to see if I can do them justice.”

“You will,” Thran said with quiet confidence. “Your sketches will make a wonderful book. After tomorrow, when everyone sees how wonderful Immortal is, they will clamor to see your version of it.”

“That’ll be funny.” Bard glanced at Thran with a teasing grin. “You’ll make me a famous sketch artist before I make me a famous metal sculptor.”

“Tcha,” Thran waved an airy hand. “You will be a famous artist on your own merits, regardless of the medium. Rahmiel alone will be a sensation when you cast him. That reminds me – I thought of a companion piece that will complement Rahmiel perfectly.”

Bard’s eyebrows went up in interest. “Tell me.”

Thran sat up to turn off his bedside table lamp, so Bard did the same. They arranged themselves in their usual tangle of limbs, with Thran’s head on Bard’s shoulder and his arm across Bard’s chest.

“Your Rahmiel descends from heaven and alights on the earth to offer succor to a beleaguered saint,” Thran murmured softly, long fingers tracing light circles across Bard’s chest. “That is how you saw me that day in our apartment building, when I leaped down the stairs to meet you. So you must also show how the angel sees his saint, when he breaks his wings and falls to earth, no longer able to fly. That is when the saint rises from the earth to offer succor to the beleaguered angel.”

A lump suddenly appeared in Bard’s throat, but he swallowed it down to press a kiss on Thran’s hair. Was that how Thran saw him? It was such an unrealistic, idealized image. “I love you, too, angel.”

Thran raised his head to regard Bard. “I am serious. Promise me you will do this piece.”

“I’ll see what I come up with.”

“Promise me.”

Bard swallowed again. How could he deny that soft, loving voice anything? “It won’t be dramatic, like Rahmiel.”

“It will be the truth, which has its own drama, if a quieter one. Please.”

Bard conceded with a long exhale. “I promise.”

Thran kissed Bard’s lips, and laid his head back on Bard’s shoulder with a sigh. “Then I am happy. Thank you.”

Bard couldn’t think of a single word to answer Thran. So he gathered his angel close, grateful once again that he still could.
Chapter 157

Chapter Summary

Put on your glad rags. We've got front row seats with Clan Ffyrnig to the world premiere of Immortal.

Chapter Notes

Hal and Ari appear courtesy of johnnysmitten. Thank you, my dear ❤️!

"The euphemism" is a nod to "Halloween is Grinch Night," where the young protagonist who needs to use "the euphemism" gets caught in the Sour Sweet wind. That term made it into my vocabulary and has stayed there ever since. And no, I don't own any rights to the Grinch or his specials :-).

Translation Notes:

ya lyublyu tebya = I love you (Russian)
Printsessa Ognya = Princess of Fire (Russian)
Sledi za mnoi = watch over me (Russian)

Saturday hadn’t yet dawned when Thran woke. All the liquids Bard had urged him to drink after his rehearsal had cycled through, so he slipped out of bed and went into the bathroom to relieve himself. He didn’t turn on the light, and he didn’t drag matters out – he wanted to get back into bed before he completely woke up so he’d fall back asleep quickly. Sure enough, he drifted off in a few minutes without trouble.

When next he roused, the sun was up. From the brightness of the room and the angle of the light, dawn had arrived some hours ago. Bard wasn’t in bed, but the bathroom door was closed. Thran reached into the drawer of his nightside table to snare the tube of lubricant. He cached the tube under his pillow, and closed his eyes while he waited for Bard to finish in the bathroom. Would he come back to bed, or would he duck into the closet to dress?

The door opened. How disappointing – Bard was already dressed. It must be later than he thought. Perhaps he could distract Bard from whatever he’d been about to do.

"Lyubov moyya," he murmured, looking at Bard through his lowered lashes. He reached a hand across the sheets, beckoning.

“Morning, angel,” Bard sat on the side of the bed to stroke Thran’s hair. “I’m glad you slept so long. You’re still catching up from the virus and everything else that’s happened this week.”

“Is it late?”

“After nine. I’m glad I didn’t wake you up when I got up to get Sigrid and Legolas’s breakfasts.”
“Sigrid went to work again,” Thran remembered. “Oh! Legolas’s fencing lesson!”

“Taken care of. I was about to drive him, but he asked if he could bicycle to the studio. He, Killian, and Tara are going to meet up with Bain and a few others after fencing and do something, so I said that was okay. I hope you’re all right with that. He left about an hour ago, and just texted me that he got there safely.”

“I appreciate that you saw to him. I am relieved that he was not afraid to go out on his own, too.”

“Me, too.”

Thran hummed. “Where is Kukla?”

“Still asleep. Last night wore her out.”

Thran smiled in anticipation. “Good. Then you must help me fulfill an old ritual.”

Bard gave him a long look, but the corners of his lips quirked. “Does it require me to get into bed with you?”

Thran snaked out a long arm to pull at Bard’s shoulder. “It requires you to be naked first. Then you must get into bed with me.”

“You feel better.”

Thran’s grin was coy. “The longer it takes you to strip, the longer it takes before we both feel better.”

Bard pretended to think about that, then eased his tee over his head one slow inch at a time.

“You are the slowest bastard,” Thran growled, reaching up to yank Bard’s tee out of his hands and throw it on the floor.

“Yeah? You’re the greediest,” Bard snickered, poking Thran in the ribs. Flinching, Thran erupted from his pillows to grab the poking fingers and wrestle Bard flat onto his back. He straddled Bard with an evil chortle, forced Bard’s wrists over his head, and dove in for a deep kiss. It didn’t take long for Bard to abandon his mock resistance and kiss him back with equal intensity. Thran let his husband’s wrists go as he found better things to do with his hands, stroking through Bard’s hair and caressing his shoulders, then lower. In response, Bard’s nipples hardened, his body tensed, and his voice trembled in a breathy moan.

“You wish that you were naked now, yes?” Thran teased, shifting so that he could cup a hand over Bard’s cock and rub it through his shorts. Despite the intervening fabric, it hardened fast, drawing Thran’s grin. “Think how much better this would feel if you were.”

“Then strip me bare, you fucker. You know you want to.”

“Yes, I do.” Thran rolled aside just enough that he could yank Bard’s shorts off his hips. “Prove that you want me to just as badly.”

Bard shimmied the rest of the way out of his shorts and underwear, and kicked them off the bed.

“What are you going to do now, randy dancer, now that you’ve got me the way you want me?”

“I do not have you the way I want.” Thran rolled back atop him to grind his hips against Bard’s cock, drawing Bard’s moan. He groped for the tube of lubricant, squeezed out a handful, and slicked it over his cock with savage strokes, reveling at Bard’s startled surprise when he smeared his husband’s opening with greedy fingers. Before Bard could do more than curse him, he’d pushed Bard’s knees wide, positioned himself, and pressed in that first inch. “Mmm. Now I have you the way I want. Yes, such a morsel for a summer morning.”

“Son of a bitch, you fucker! Give your fucktoy a chance!” Bard writhed under him. “I’m not open!”

Thran wrapped himself around Bard, not venturing any farther inside until his husband had a chance to relax. “You will be. Just lie still.”

“Gods. Pinned to the bed by a dark angel in record time.”

“I wanted to make sure your lust did not get the better of you before mine did.” Thran shut his eyes and reveled in Bard’s warmth and tightness. “Oh, gods, you are impossible to resist.”

“Just what ritual am I taking part in?” Bard’s breath hitched as Thran pressed a fraction of an inch farther in. “The one where you deflower the virgin, like you told me about a million years ago?”

Thran grinned as he pressed a kiss at the corner of Bard’s jaw. “You are as tight as one. Do not worry, my handsome one. I will be gentle.”

Bard bit at Thran’s lips. “You’re a right bastard. But if you want to fuck a virgin you can actually get into, you’d better tell him a story to help him relax.”

“Oh, of course. In Russia, dancers used to be told that sex just before a performance is not good. It dissipates energy that one should save for the stage. But all of us were young and vigorous, so it became a challenge, yes? Even Vileria and I, though we were not compatible, would make a point to engage on the morning of a premiere, or even the first performance of an old chestnut... if not always with each other. We would laugh that a good performance on one stage led to the same on another.”

Bard had relaxed underneath him, so Thran ventured a little father in. His husband’s silent moan made him smile, and so did the quick flutter of his eyelashes. “Mmm, angel...”

“Mmm, my saint... such a look in your eyes, so much want... you make me love this ritual all the more.”

“Give me a couple of minutes, and you’ll have a wolf on your hands, not a virgin.”

“I must take my advantage while it remains to me, then,” Thran breathed, rocking gently to deepen his penetration. “You are so hard to resist...”

Thran insinuated a hand between their bodies, found Bard’s cock, and caressed it gently. The escalation drew a moan from Bard; his head went back, and his back arched. Thran sat on his heels to admire what happened to his hunky welder husband when Thran ruthlessly stroked him within and without.

“Gods, angel, I won’t last long like this. You have no mercy, you take no prisoners – mmm, gods... I can’t resist...”

“Do not resist. Take all I give you, and revel in it. There is nothing more erotic than you when you are consumed.”

Bard took him at his word, and abandoned himself to the carnal delight that Thran aroused in him. Unresisting, he lay back and moaned softly as Thran worked him, his fingers tightening on Thran’s thighs.
“Oh, gods, Thran, you have me, I can’t stop –”

“Come for me, my saint,” Thran crooned as he sped up his stroking. “Gods, you are so sweet, so tight, you will take me with you when you come...”

In seconds, Bard erupted beneath him with a gasp. As his orgasm engulfed him, his back arched off the mattress, his eyes closed, his hands clawed red streaks down Thran’s thighs, and he clenched so hard around Thran’s cock that Thran gasped. Before he could stop himself, Thran whipped his hips forward, thrusting deeply into that spasming tightness, and drove himself to climax hard after Bard. Hands spread across his glutes like talons, forcing him in deeper, possessing him as completely as he had Bard mere seconds ago. He fell forward as he spasmed, unable to escape when Bard wound arms and legs around him – as if he wanted to escape such a complete release. His husband held him close until his last shudder had calmed, then pressed a kiss on the crown of his head. Thran raised his head to meet Bard’s laughing eyes.

“Feel better now?”

Thran eased out of his husband with a satisfied exhale. “Oh, lyubov moya, you are a sweet delight. You indulge me so well.”

“It’s not like I had a choice,” Bard teased, taking up the loose braid of pale hair that cascaded over his chest and twitching the end of it over Thran’s nose. “You see how much I hated it, too.”

Thran chuckled as he reclined to one side of Bard, pillowing his head on his elbow and tracing his fingers in slow circles over Bard’s chest. “As much as I.”

Bard turned on his side to face Thran, and shifted his legs to intertwine with Thran’s. “So did we complete your ritual to your satisfaction?”

“It is not yet complete,” Thran snuggled beside Bard. “The end is a nap.”

“Ah. The most important part,” Bard replied with mock seriousness, drawing Thran’s snicker. “The blissed-out nap.”

They lay quietly for some minutes, fingers soothing over skin until both of them blurred into a drowsy reverie. Eventually, Bard stirred.

“Stay in bed if you want, angel. Tonight is a big one, so rest while you can. I’ll see what Tilda and Bain are up to, and do my usual Saturday morning putter.”

“I will be down soon,” Thran replied with a sleepy yawn. “Too much time in bed is not good for the body.”

Bard gave him an amused smile as he bent for his shorts and tee. “I should sketch you the way you look right now, angel. You’d never convince anyone that you ever wanted to get out of my bed. You’re the seer who belongs to my king.”

Thran stretched like a lithe feline, then rolled onto his belly. He drew his knees up under him and gazed up at Bard with a submissive expression. “To serve my king is my fate and my duty. But it is also my pleasure. I await his next command to serve on my knees, as I should, unless it is his pleasure that I serve on my back instead.”

Bard grinned. “So says the man who just ravished me on my back to within an inch of my life. You’re such a bastard.”
Thran stretched full length across the bed with an unrepentant smile on his lips. “I am. But I am your bastard.”

“And I’m a lucky man. See you when you get downstairs.”

Bard ducked into the bathroom to wash off, reappeared in his shorts and tee to stroke Thran’s hair, and slipped out of the bedroom.

Thran savored his languid ease for little longer before he got up to wash and find clothes for the morning. He came downstairs to find Bard making cheese, onion, and chive omelet for two. A peek through the oven door revealed a pan of biscuits baking. Thran snared his husband with an arm around his shoulder and kissed his temple.

“You treat me so well.”

“You need a good breakfast every day, but today especially. What time do you need to be at the school this afternoon?”

“I want to be there at four. The performance is not until seven, but we will warm up slowly and carefully, and I will go early to try to avoid as much of the press as possible. That will not be easy.”

“Harder than you think.” Bard slid the omelet onto a plate, cut it in half, and slid one piece onto a second plate. He handed Thran the plates to put on the table while he fished the biscuits out of the oven. “I checked the Internet this morning. There is one hellacious media storm out there about what happened Thursday night. What few tickets to any of Immortal’s performances that hadn’t sold are gone, and people are clamoring for more. I expect there will be an army of reporters outside the school all day.”

Thran snorted as he put the plates down, then came back for forks and knives. “They want to see if I will fall on my face, or if I am covered in bruises, or some such other ghoulish thing. That is always true when a dancer is rumored to be unsound.”

Bard brought the biscuits, the butter crock, and the honey bottle to the table and sat down. He hummed in acknowledgment of Thran’s cynicism, then smiled to himself.

“What does that mean, your smile?” Thran questioned as he pulled his chair closer to the table.

“It means I can’t wait to see their jaws drop when Death flies across the battlefield in all of His implacable majesty. You will be the sensation of the year.”

Thran smiled in appreciation. “I intend to be. I am well, I am strong, and I have loved well. Nothing will stop me.”

Bard laughed. “Nothing will. So what’s on the agenda between now and three-thirty?”

Thran took a bite of his omelet. “I will have this delicious breakfast, I will do my barre. I will rest. I will have lunch. Then I will be off. You do not have to be at the school until six-fifteen or six-thirty.”

“I’ll get you to the school, so we don’t have to drive two vehicles home. Besides, the girls would appreciate the ride in your nice SUV rather than my well-loved truck.”

“That makes good sense. Thank you, my saint. I cannot wait to see all of you in your finery. You will be a handsome family in your elegant suits and dresses.”

“We’ll put on our best show to celebrate your best show,” Bard quipped. “Tilda might steal the show in her bee dress, though Sigrid intends to give her a run for the money in the blue dress she wore to the dance.”

“They will both be adorable. So will you in your tuxedo, and the boys. I will be the clown in my wig and costume.”

“No, you won’t. You’ll bring down the house. But you won’t if you don’t eat your breakfast. I won’t push the biscuits, but I will the eggs and cheese. Protein.”

“Yes, the protein. Forgive me if I do not eat a biscuit. I promise to eat one tomorrow.”

“Only if you want to. Fruit instead?”

“I will get it. I thought I saw a grapefruit in the refrigerator.”

“There’s one left.”

“Would you like half?”

“Only if you want only half,” Bard shrugged. “You know what you need to fuel the night’s performance.”

Thran sliced the grapefruit in half and brought the pieces to the table. Tilda and Bain came into the kitchen, the former still rubbing her eyes. Bard got up to scramble an egg for Tilda, then Bain took over to make fried eggs for the breakfast bagel sandwiches he and Legolas liked so much. The children joined their fathers at the table to eat. Tilda was excited that she would finally get to wear her bee dress. In contrast, Bain bemoaned having to wear so many clothes on such a hot day.

“You’ll survive, boyo,” Bard replied. “The house AC is on, the SUV AC will be on, and the school AC will be on.”

“It’ll still be hot.” Bain took an enormous mouthful of his sandwich.

“You’ll get hotter kicking the soccer ball around with Legs, Killian, Derry, and who knows else. Be home at three, please. A lot of people have to get through the shower before we leave for the school at six.”

“Kay, Da,” Bain mumbled as he continued to wolf down his sandwich.

Tilda nibbled her biscuit, but wrinkled her nose at the carnage that ensued on her brother’s plate. “That’s gross, Bain. Really gross.”

Bain favored her with an egg-smeared smile. “You just don’t know what’s good, Til.”

“She knows a bit more than you do about manners, boyo,” Bard said, before Tilda could reply. “I taught you better than that – chew with your mouth closed, talk only when your mouth is empty, put in your mouth only things that are smaller than your head.”

“This is not bigger than my head, Da!” Bain protested, hefting his sandwich. Thran had to cover his mouth to smother his amusement at the boy’s outrage.

“You’re talking with your mouth full and chewing with your mouth open, though. So clean it up.”

Bain swallowed his mouthful in a huge gulp. “Yes, Da.”

Tilda wrinkled her nose again and made a disapproving noise, but Bard’s glance at her kept her from saying anything else.

Thran smiled to himself. It was a gift for life to get back to normal.

After breakfast, Thran went off to the ballroom to do his barre. The familiar routine helped him set aside his excitement about tonight’s impending performance. He was not in the habit of dwelling on what would happen before he danced a role in performance for the first time; that generated too much nervous excitement too early in the day, and that could dull his responses when he went onstage. An hour before the curtain went up, the excitement would boost him in a way he could use. Nine hours beforehand, better he thought of something else and saved energy.

Even so...

Tonight’s performance was so much more than merely an opening night. It was a new ballet for a new company. Neither company nor ballet was traditional, but incorporated modern, popular, and urban dance elements. It also signaled a new role for him, not just as principle dancer, but also as ballet director. Tonight’s performance would determine much of his future.

It was hard not to think of that.

When Thran finished his barre and yoga, he joined Tilda and Bard in the sitting room. Bard had cleared the clutter off the fruit crate coffee table, and spread old towels over it. While Thran lounged on one of the sofas with one of Bard’s art books, Bard worked on his totem pieces that he’d set aside to be with the children during the past three weeks. Tilda sat nearby with some of the clay to practice what she’d learned in her pottery camp. They passed a companionable time until lunch, when Bard made chicken salad for sandwiches. Thran passed on the bread, but a bit of the chicken atop a vegetable salad with an accompanying sweet potato made a good lunch. Thran napped briefly while Tilda read and Bard continued on his sculpture.

At two-thirty, Thran shaved, showered, and tended to his hair. He twisted the silky strands into a loose braid to keep it under control until he danced.

At three, he made sure his makeup box and dancewear were ready for the night. When he put his only remaining pair of unworn pointe shoes into his bag, the tingle of anticipation returned to warm his belly and would not calm. How often had he and Vileria laughed about who would feel the excitement of an opening night first? Despite her claims otherwise, she always had. She had been higher strung than he, so much that she had been dubbed the Princess of Fire, apt consort for the Prince of Ice, and their teasing banter back and forth had been a great diffuser of her nervousness. It was another ritual he had missed since her death.

This was not the first premiere where Vileria would not be beside him in the wings, but it was an especially notable one. This was a premiere of a ballet he had labored long to bring into being, with a role that was his alone. He went into the children’s study, and there on the children’s memory shelf was Vileria’s photograph. There were her dark eyes that still smiled at him with such warm mischief. A few bright yellow marigolds and a red geranium blossom glowed from the glass vase beside her picture; Daphne’s photograph was on the other side. He sniffed the flowers, and nodded to Daphne’s image. Then he kissed his index finger and touched it to Vileria’s cheek.

“Ya lyublyu tebya, Printsessa Ognya,” he murmured. “Sledi za mnoi.”

He put on the light khaki linen trousers and plain white cotton shirt that he would wear to the school, rolling the sleeves up in anticipation of the hot afternoon. He collected his bag, a pair of socks, and his lightweight white trainers, and came downstairs to the kitchen to fill his water bottle and stow a few light snacks in his bag. Bain and Legolas bounded in from outside, red-faced and sweating from the torrid temperature. Legolas had braided his long, blond hair to keep it out of his face, but strands straggled from the twist and stuck in lank, wet strings against his neck. Bain’s shorter, darker, curlier hair was so wet that it looked like it’d been dunked it in a bucket and left to plaster itself flat to Bain’s head. Their shirts were soaked, and they looked too filthy to sit on anything other than one of the garden benches.

“You both look like beets,” Thran teased, as they pulled glasses from the cabinets and filled them at the kitchen faucet. “Thirsty beets.”

“Oh, that’s no lie,” Bain panted, when he came up for air. “It’s roasting out there!”

“How was fencing today, Legolas?”

“Very hot,” Legolas shook his head. “Aragorn had us work on endurance today, so a lot of running, lunges, pushups…”

“Yeah, a regular boot camp,” Bain grimaced. “Course, that’ll be me in another week, out on the soccer pitch. So ugh all around.”

“Ugh, indeed,” Thran waved a hand as the savory aroma of sweaty teenaged boys reached his nose. “You are both ripe beyond contemplation.”

“Ah, the smell of summer,” Bard grinned as he came into the kitchen. “Maybe I should take the two of you outside and wash you down with the hose before you venture inside.”

“That’d feel good,” Legolas grinned. “I’m still too hot to shower yet. I’d just steam up all over again.”

“Put some ice in your water for a bit,” Bard suggested. “I’m about to take Thran to the school, but when I get back it’ll be time to clean up for tonight. Supper’s at five today so we get to the school in time. Remember that Sigrid will be home in about half an hour.”

“Okay, Da; okay, Bard,” the boys acknowledged.

“I’m ready any time you are, Thran,” Bard said.

Thran pulled out a kitchen chair and sat down. He held up his shoes and socks. “A moment only.”

Legolas chugged down another glass of water while Thran pulled on his socks and laced up his shoes. As he rose, Legolas came to his side.

“Under the circumstances,” Legolas grinned, holding out his arms in celebration of his sweaty, aromatic condition, “I won’t hug you, Papa. I want to wish you beaucoup de merde without making you smell like you’ve wallowed in it.”

He held out his fist for Thran to tap with his own. Bain came up beside his brother to offer his fist in turn. “Yeah, Thran. Lots and lots of merde.”

“Hey, wait for me!” Tilda ran into the kitchen from the sitting room. “I want to wish you merde, too!”

Laughing, Thran tapped the small fist that Tilda thrust at him. “Never has one dancer had so much merde wished upon him!”

“Then here’s mine, too,” Bard grinned, tapping his fist against Thran’s. “Lots of merde. From Sigrid,
“I thank you all,” Thran offered a little bow to his family. “So let us be off, Bard, and get the show on the road, as they say. Mes enfants, I will see you after the ballet.”

“It’ll be great!” Tilda assured him. “Wait and see!”

“I will do my best to make it so,” Thran agreed. “See you soon.”

Thran offered a final wave to the children, then followed Bard through the mudroom. He retrieved his sunglasses from the basket under the key rack before he went outside. The heat hit them like a stifling physical presence as they got into the SUV and pulled out of the carriage house. Thank the gods that Bard cranked the air conditioning up full blast as they headed down the lane. Bard let Thran consider in silence as they drove, but when they pulled into the school’s parking lot, his husband took one look at the gathering of reporters and star spotters milling before the entrance and snorted.

“Gods, it’s a horde. I’m not letting you out in that alone. I’ll play bodyguard for a few minutes to make sure you get inside the school in one piece.”

“I appreciate that,” Thran admitted. Bard parked a row away from the front of the school to give them a chance to get out of the SUV before the throng descended on them. “I have my bag. I am ready.”

“Okay, let’s go.”

They hurried out of the SUV and strode towards the entrance, Thran following Bard closely. Two security guards hurried forward to urge the crowd back. In seconds, they were surrounded.

“Thran! Thran! How are you today? Are you ready to dance? Is it true you plan to dance on pointe tonight? Have you learned anything more about the boy who attacked you? How is your bodyguard? Is he still in hospital?”

“Come on, everyone, please let Mr. Oropherson through. Come on...” Bard kept moving and talking calmly. The two security guards flanked Thran, letting Bard forge their path forward.

“I am well, thank you, and excited to dance Immortal in performance for the first time tonight,” Thran smiled and waved. He held onto Bard’s belt as they plowed through the sea of faces. “Yes, I suffered no lasting injuries, yes, I am well, thank you. Thank you for your good wishes.”

Bard had reached the school doors. He pulled one open and urged Thran in ahead of him, then ducked in after him and pulled the door closed as the security guards remained outside by the door. Both Thran and his husband heaved a long breath, glad to be through the gantlet. It was also a relief to be out of the hot sun and inside the cool building. As Thran took off his sunglasses, he found that Ernie wasn’t in his usual spot in front of the auditorium – in fact, the usual table where Thran put his bag for Ernie’s check was gone – so Bard walked with Thran right into the auditorium, down the aisle, and across the stage. As they passed the dressing rooms, they found that Abebe and a few of the dancers had already arrived, and greetings filled the air. Thran offered his smiling replies, and then ducked into his dressing room with Bard close behind.

“Okay, you’re where you need to be, angel,” Bard said with a light caress on Thran’s back. “Kiss me before I make the return trip, yeah?”

Thran took Bard into his arms to add a hug to his kiss. “It is always a pleasure to kiss you, my saint.”
“This is an important kiss. It’s the last one I’ll get from my husband the dreamer. The next time I kiss you, you’ll be my husband the genius behind Immortal, my husband the star who danced the role no one else can.”

“The best part is that I am your husband both times.”

“It is for me, too. But no false modesty, Thran. Immortal is wonderful. It’ll be everything you want it to be, and more. I can’t be prouder of you for all the blood, sweat, and toil you’ve lavished on it. It’s all worth it.”

Thran smiled. “Thank you, lyubov moya. But remember that you have made Immortal what it is, too. The story, the costumes, the artwork... the Lord of the Underworld would be far different and not as wonderful without your touch.”

“I appreciate the thought.” Bard eased out of Thran’s arms. “Now forget all the hard work, the angst, the trials and tribulations. They’re all done. Just think about dancing. You’re the best there is at that. So leave it all on the stage, and I’ll see you on the other side.”

Bard put out his fist to bump Thran’s, but Thran took up the proffered hand to kiss Bard’s wedding ring. “I love you.”

“I love you, too.” Bard kissed Thran’s ring in return, and offered a loving smile as he walked to the door. He turned back at the door with arched eyebrow. “Merde, angel. Lots and lots of merde.”

Thran laughed. “Good luck with the gantlet, lyubov moya.”

Laughing, Bard offered a wave, and was gone.

Still smiling, Thran put his bag on the counter under the mirror and took out his bag of nuts. Eating a few now would ensure that he had a good stock of energy three hours from now when he had to dance. He made himself comfortable on one of the chairs, and propped his calves and feet up on the counter by his bag, taking advantage to relax while he could. Soon the other dancers would arrive for their warmups, and the excitement of the night would take hold of them all.

Immortal’s birth was imminent.

* * *

Bard would have liked to exit the school from a different door, which might have let him avoid the crowd outside the auditorium, but in the interest of security, the door he and Thran had used to enter was the only one open. Bard was all for making the school as secure as possible, but he took a deep breath before he ventured outside. The crowd was back at the edge of the parking lot, so he managed to skirt most of them before any of them noticed him. They latched on him at once, but he held up his hands and mustered his best Jersey accent.

“Hey, youse guys, I’m just the hired help, y’know? I don’t know nothin’.”

That threw enough of them off that he got into the SUV and drove off before any of them thought too hard about his attempt, which gave him something to chuckle about.

Time to head to the florist shop to pick up the flowers he’d ordered for Thran. Bard had read that male dancers traditionally didn’t get flowers onstage, even if they were the stars of a production, and even if the ballerinas did. The only exception was if a male dancer danced a female role, such as the ugly stepsisters in Cinderella; then they could receive flowers onstage. The traditions were slowly changing in this country, if not Europe, and he’d checked with Lettie to see what she thought about the idea. She’d explained that many men did get flowers, but they were always collected backstage rather than presented onstage. Ballerinas often shared their bouquets with their male partners, as well. Because this was part of a festival, and not quite the usual circumstances of a ballet presented in the city, Lettie thought Bard’s desire to get something for Thran wasn’t out of place.

“I don’t care if they’re not presented to him onstage,” Bard had told her. “I just want him to get something from me and the children.”

“Hold onto them when you go into the auditorium for the performance,” Lettie had advised him. “It’s bad luck to send them before the performance. And Thran is Russian, so make sure you specify an odd number of flowers. Even numbers are sent only to funerals, so don’t do that.”

“Odd number it is,” Bard had acknowledged. “And I don’t want roses. Any suggestions about something else?”

Lettie had given him several, so after due consideration, he’d decided to get five Stargazer lilies, five pink carnations, five green carnations, and eight sprays of Viscaria. The lilies symbolized the realization of Thran’s hopes for Immortal. The pink carnations symbolized the toughness Thran had needed to see Immortal come to life; the green ones were a tongue-in-cheek reference to the Victorian age, when they were a surreptitious symbol of gay pride. Viscaria, also known as the Rose Angel, had been known in Victorian times as a playful invitation to flirt – literally, an invitation to dance with the one who sent the flowers. It was a popular flower to offer dancers, so Thran would likely recognize the symbolism.

Bard dashed into the florist shop, collected his bouquet, and dashed out again to hurry home. He had a lot of children to get ready.

Sigrid was home by the time he returned, and oohed at the bouquet he stashed in the fridge to stay fresh until they left. Legolas was already in the shower. When the boy was out of the bathroom, Bard sent Bain into his bathroom – with strict orders not to see how much water the handheld spray could put on the ceiling – and Tilda into the children’s bathroom. Bain and Tilda exited; Sigrid and Bard took their place. He shaved and showered, and borrowed a little of Thran’s fancy hair oil when he dried his hair. Everyone assembled at the kitchen table for a quick supper of hamburgers and salad.

“I got the hair chalk at the drugstore,” Sigrid said as everyone ate. “Sixteen colors.”

“I want green to go with my dress,” Tilda said.

“Wait, what’s this?” Bard’s eyebrows quirked up.

“I asked her for it,” Legolas explained quickly. “I wanted to do my braids blue for Papa’s ballet. It doesn’t make a mess to put in like the dye does, and it washes right out, Bard. So I can help Kukla if you say it’s okay.”

Sigrid got up from the table to fetch the hair chalk and handed the box to Bard to examine. “It’s really easy, Da, and festive. I’d like to do a blue streak, too, to go with my dress.”

“I want one, too, Da,” Bain said. “It’s just a little bit of fun.”

“Fine by me, as long as everyone’s clothes stay clean.”
“Hooray!” Tilda clapped her hands, as the boys tapped knuckles.

“I got you something, too, Til.” Sigrid rooted around in the bag and brought out a packet of six small, fuzzy bumblebees. “They were in the clearance rack by the cash register. I think they’re leftover spring decorations, so they were maybe all of a quarter. I thought they’d look cute in your hair.”

“Really? Ooh, let me see!” Tilda took the packet. “They’re cute! Da, if Sigrid puts my hair up like she did hers for her dance, I can stick the bees in the pouf part.”

“Sounds like a great idea,” Bard winked at Sigrid. “That was sweet of you, Sig.”

“Welcome.”

“Okay, troops, let’s get through supper and clean up,” Bard urged. “We’ve got a lot of dressing up to do. Is it better to do the hair chalk before or after we dress?”

“Before. We’ll need a big towel,” Legolas warned.

“Okay. Everyone do your hair, then we’ll see about the color. Then dress.”

“Aye, Captain,” the children chorused, trading pleased grins. The prospect of hair chalk made everyone zip through the remains of supper in record time. With five people helping, cleanup went quickly, then everyone trooped upstairs to get dressed.

As Bard got his suit out of the closet, he cocked an ear to eavesdrop on the girls’ discussion of hairstyles. Gods, even Tilda knew about French twists and chignons; she wouldn’t be a little girl much longer. He hoped she and Sigrid didn’t get too fancy with her updo, but he needn’t have worried. Sigrid drew Tilda’s hair into a tail at her nape, braided it, and wrapped it around her head to make a coronet, which looked sweet rather than too grown up. At their call, Legolas came out in shorts and nothing else to help with the chalk; a similarly attired Bain came along to supervise. They covered the children’s bathroom floor with a towel, then wrapped another around Tilda’s shoulders. She held a mirror while Legolas painted green and yellow chalk along the strands of Tilda’s braid, then sprayed it with Sigrid’s hairspray to keep the chalk from powdering off. As a final touch, Sigrid put the small bees in place around the braid. A delighted Tilda scampered off with Sigrid to maneuver into her slip and dress without touching her hair. When the youngest child was dressed, Sigrid disappeared to recreate the tousled pile of curls anchored with Thran’s hair sticks that she’d done for the school dance. Bain and Legolas stayed in the bathroom to do Legolas’s braids in three different shades of blue, and Bain got several stripes of different blues.

“What about you, Da?” Bain asked. “Just a couple?”

“You’d better let me do those,” Sigrid called, coming into the bathroom. She had on a ratty tee, but her hair was done. “The guys will leave you with nothing but blue hair.”

“That’d look cool, Da,” Bain urged, and Legolas nodded in agreement. “Do the whole thing in blue!”

“I’ll pass on that,” Bard held up his hands. “What about you, sweetness?”

“You’ve got steady hands. I want just the ends on the top in blue and green.”

Bard put the mirror in Sigrid’s hands, and between the two of them, he got the job done to Sigrid’s satisfaction. On went the hairspray, and she was ready to put on her dress.
“Are you sure you don’t want just a little streak?” Sigrid coaxed.

“Oh, what the hell,” Bard gave Sigrid a mischievous grin. “Just one, and don’t make it obvious. Dark blue, not your electric blue.”

“Okay. Classy blue, not punk blue.”

“Is there such a thing?” Bard shrugged, chuckling. He watched in the mirror as Sigrid gave him one dark blue streak at the top of his head that wasn’t too outrageous, then set it with hairspray.

“Oh, you’re done,” Sigrid said. “I’ll put the towels away. Go put on your suit.”

“Yes, madam,” Bard feigned a dignified butler’s bow and went into the bedroom. He traded his shorts for tuxedo shirt and pants before Tilda came to the door.

“Are you ready, Da?” Tilda called from outside the bedroom.

“Almost.” Bard opened the bedroom doors, smiling when she twirled to make her dress flare out. “You look great, little doll.”

“You were smart,” Tilda declared. “You told me to get something cool so I wouldn’t get so hot, and you were right. It’s still hot, but this isn’t so bad.”

“Guess I know a few things, yeah?” Bard grinned. “You need to get your shoes.”

“I’ll put them on just before we leave. I like being barefooted.”

“How’re you doing, lads?” Bard called to Legolas and Bain. “All right?”

“Legolas sorted me out,” Bain called. “These studs are a pain!”

“It’s just a different kind of button, Bain,” Legolas explained.

“Maybe, but it’d be easier if they sewed the buttons on the shirt, wouldn’t it!” Bain snorted, drawing Bard’s laughter.

“Sigrid? You’re okay?”

“I’ll need you to hook my dress when I get it on,” came Sigrid’s voice from her room.

“Okay. Come in when you’re ready.”

Bard retreated to the bedroom again to finish the rest of his studs and cufflinks. On with the vest, the tie, the socks, the shoes. A quick shake of his hair – the blue looked nice – and a check on his earrings. His wedding ring was where it belonged. Ugh, it was already hot before he got his jacket on, so he’d leave that for last. Maybe he wouldn’t put it on until they got to the school. Wallet in one back pants pocket, mobile in the other, tickets in the inside breast jacket pocket. He was ready.

“I’m good to go!” Sigrid called, sticking her head into the bedroom. “Wow, Da, you look fantastic!”

“Thanks.” Bard hooked Sigrid’s frothy blue dress for her. She had on the same necklace and earrings that she’d worn for the dance, and she had the same small bag. “You look amazing, too. And look at the two of you, lads! Both of you are stellar!”

“You do look great,” Sigrid put her arms akimbo, a funny posture for such an ethereal dress, and circled the boys on the landing. Both boys struck a pose that was more rock star than James Bond, drawing Bard’s laughter. “Clan Ffyrnig looks in the money tonight.”

“I look great, too,” Tilda twirled around in her dress. “I’m the bee girl! Queen of the bees!”

“If you twirl any faster, all the bees will come out of your hair, Kukla!” Legolas joked.

“I’m going to carry my jacket until we get to the school,” Bard told the boys. “Even with the AC, it’s hot.”

Bain immediately shrugged out of his jacket. “Even just the shirt and vest is hot.”

“But we’ll look stellar,” Sigrid consoled.

“Easy for you to say when you have a dress with no sleeves in it,” Bain said.

“You won’t die, Bain,” Bard said. “This is Thran’s big night, and we’re going to go all out for him. He’s worked harder than humanly possible, so it’s not such a big deal that we dress up for four hours. Everybody ready?”

“Ready,” the children chorused.

Bard pulled out his mobile. “We’re a hair early, but that’s okay. We want to get a parking space so we don’t have to walk too far in the heat.”

“Absolutely,” Bain nodded, miming a wipe across his brow. “Let’s go!”

Bard got Thran’s flowers out of the fridge and his keys from the rack in the mudroom, then shepherded the children ahead of him as they left the house. Everyone piled into the SUV, Bard put the flowers on the seat beside him, and cranked the AC to its maximum. Despite Bain’s snarking about his suit, the heat, and the pain of dressing up, he was just as excited as Tilda for the upcoming premiere. That same excitement had Bard just as eager to get to the school as it did the children, so it was with relief that they turned into the parking lot. People had already started to arrive, but the lot was still only half full given the early hour. The crowd of reporters had swelled, but they were distracted for the moment with someone who’d just arrived. The family got out of the SUV, the boys and Bard donned their jackets, and Sigrid took charge of the flowers. They were able to steer clear of most of the crowd by quick maneuvering, and made it into the lobby of the auditorium before any of the reporters could chase the family down.

“Oh, that’s better,” Legolas breathed as the cool air of the lobby registered. “That’s so much better.”

“Absolutely,” Bain agreed, fanning himself.

The auditorium was already open for seating, so Bard got out their tickets and led the children towards the ticket collectors. They got their programs, and passed into the auditorium. Ori had saved them very nice seats on the aisle of the center section, five rows from the front of the stage. That gave them a close view without having to crane their necks for the entire performance. Once they found their seats, Sigrid stashed the bouquet in hers so that Thran wouldn’t see it if he stuck his head out from behind the curtain.

“Wow, Da. Look at the program,” Sigrid said. “That’s your artwork, isn’t it?”

Bard took a belated look at the program. It was a nice, glossy paper stock, typical of what made up any theatre program in the city, and it was a small booklet, filled with the usual ads from sponsors, small blurbs about the principals, and so forth. But the cover – gods, it was his artwork, indeed. It seemed like years had passed since he’d drawn that first sketch of Charisse and Luka dancing their love for each other, while behind them Death stretched His hands wide. UVB’s promotional team had made a beautiful cover of it, stark and elegant.

“Da?”

“Um, yes, sweetness. It’s my artwork. It looks wonderful.”

“Look at what it says inside,” his daughter persisted. “Look, Bain, Legs, Tilda – it says right there on the inside that Da wrote the story, and designed the costumes with Rada, and did the art.”

“It does,” Bain read, then looked at Bard. “Wow, Da.”

“Thran and I did the story together, not just me,” Bard amended. “And Rada did most of the costumes. I mostly made suggestions when he asked me.”

“I bet you didn’t,” Sigrid gave him a hard look as she pointed to her program. “And this proves it. You had a big part in making this thing so amazing, and you can’t tell me otherwise.”

Bard pretended to cringe under his daughter’s withering words. “I wouldn’t dream to.”

“Good. Don’t.” Sigrid flashed a smug grin and dusted off her hands. “My work here is done.”

Bain snorted. “Geez. I feel really bad for Finn.”

Legolas gave a sympathetic hum, but Sigrid ignored both of them to savor her victory.

“How long before it starts, Da?” Tilda asked.

“About forty-five minutes,” Bard replied.

“That’s not so long,” Tilda shrugged. “Oh! Look, Da – there’s Ori! And who’s that with him?”

The small man came down the aisle, looking quite different from his usual unassuming persona. He was in a black tuxedo with a jaunty red plaid bow tie and matching cummerbund, but his smile was the same warm, open, friendly one that he always wore.

“Hi, Bard, children! It’s the big night at last!”

“It certainly is, Ori,” Bard grinned. “You look sharp.”

“Thanks. You do, too, and so do all of you,” Ori smiled at the children. He stepped to one side to indicate the small, ginger-haired and -bearded man with sharp green eyes behind him. He was dressed in an impeccable blue suit, with a French-cuffed white shirt and cufflinks made from old gold coins – Roman, perhaps? Wouldn’t it be apt if the coins were stamped with Caesar’s image? A dark green plaid tie, solid dark green pocket square, and black Italian leather shoes completed his ensemble. “This is my brother, Nori.”

Bard offered his hand. “I’m pleased to meet you in person, sir. You’ve been a good friend to Thran, to me, and to my children. Thank you.”

Nori’s expression didn’t shift much from the closed expression he probably wore as a matter of course, but his posture softened a bit as he shook Bard’s hand, and the tiniest of smiles touched his lips. “I appreciate that. I’m pleased to see that you and yours are well. My congratulations on a job well done.”

He meant Bard’s efforts on Thursday night. Bard hadn’t thought about that much, and he wouldn’t spoil tonight by starting now. He gestured towards the children. “I had great motivation.”

Nori’s eyes warmed. “The best kind.”

“I think so. I hope your brother Dori is well. Please give him our regards. He’s a kind soul.”

“He’ll be pleased that you think so,” Nori nodded. “It was good to meet you.”

“And you. Enjoy the show.”

Nori nodded once, and turned to make his way back up the aisle. Bard gave Ori a wide-eyed look of surprise. The young man chuckled.

“I know. I was surprised he asked to meet you. He usually prefers to keep most things at a distance. I appreciate what you said to him.”

“I meant it. Thran’s quite fond of him. And whether your brother admits it or not, he’s been an ally, and I do appreciate it.”

“You’re welcome. Keep your fingers crossed for tonight. It’s been a long time coming.”

“It has. Thanks for your part in all of it, Ori. It wouldn’t have done so well without you.”

Ori’s smile was pleased. “Thanks, Bard. Enjoy.”

He followed his brother up the aisle. Bard wasn’t surprised to see that the pair had seats in the last row, and a couple of large men sat to either side of them. Such was the life of an... expeditor.

Bard turned back to the children, sure that he’d face a barrage of curious questions about Ori’s brother. But instead, Bain was focused on someone coming down the aisle.

“Da, isn’t that the man who makes the cupcakes?”

Indeed, Hal Galadhrim was striding down the aisle, resplendent in a black tuxedo with a bright fuchsia cummerbund and pocket square. His blond hair was smoothly combed back and a small bit was braided down the center of his hair, leaving the rest to flow smoothly over his back and shoulders. Behind him, in a black tuxedo embellished with a deep emerald green cummerbund and pocket square, was his boyfriend, Ari. In contrast to Hal’s sleek hair, Ari’s was a riot of luxurious brown curls that framed his face and cascaded over his shoulders. He leaned over to murmur in Hal’s ear, pointing out the family to his friend. Hal’s eyes widened, and Bard could all but hear him reply to Ari with his patented, “Oh, my god!” exclamation.

“Bard! You look fab!” Hal hurried forward with arms outstretched to hug him. “And look at all of you! Tilda, Sigrid, you two are the belles of the ball! I love your hair! And the bees – adorable! Legolas, aren’t you and Bain the debonair pair? Oh, my god, you all look marvelous!”

“Hi, Mr. Hal,” Legolas waved. “I’m glad you came to see Papa’s ballet.”

“Oh, you know I wouldn’t miss it for the world, would I?” Hal beamed. “Ari and I – oh, I’m just a rude old pig, but it’s because I’m just that excited about Thran’s ballet! I am so sorry – this is my friend, Ari. Ari, you know Bard, of course. These are his and Thran’s children, Legolas, Bain, Sigrid, and Tilda.”

Ari reached forward to shake everyone’s hand. “Hello, one and all. You all look wonderful. I bet you’re very excited to see Thran’s ballet, aren’t you?”
“We saw the dress rehearsal last night,” Tilda revealed. “But I’m glad to see it again because I get to wear my bee dress tonight!”

“Ah, a lady of discerning style,” Hal nodded seriously. “It’s a very nice dress.”

“Thank you,” Tilda nodded gravely.

“So you’ve seen the ballet already, then?” Hal gave the family an eager look. “How is it?”

“It’s amazing, Mr. Hal,” Legolas said. “Really amazing.”

“Yeah, especially the part where he –”

“Don’t tell, Bain!” Sigrid interrupted with an exasperated look for her brother. “You’ll spoil it. Don’t be like those people who rat out the end of the film before you get to see it!”

“Oh, I almost had it!” Hal clutched his hands to his heart and pretended to cry. “Almost!”

“You’ll just have to wait like the rest of us, Hal,” Ari shrugged, a fond smile on his lips.

“Oh, you,” Hal rolled his eyes. “Bard, I was sorry I couldn’t make your gallery show, so I made sure Ari and I got tickets for this, because despite what this big lunk pretends, he was just as excited to see Immortal as I was. If you can believe that. Actually, I don’t think anyone can get as excited as I can about anything.”

“Truer words have never been spoken,” Ari leaned in to say conspiratorially, as Bard chuckled. “But then, if you know Hal, you know that, too.”

“I’m learning,” Bard nodded. “I hope you enjoy it. Thran’s put so much work into it – the whole troupe has. And I’m not giving anything away to say that it’s a stunner. It’s just as amazing as Legolas says.”

“He would know,” Hal nodded vigorously. “You’ve seen a lot of ballet whether you wanted to or not, haven’t you?”

“I like to watch Papa dance, Mr. Hal. He’s very good. And tonight, he’ll dance with one of his favorite partners. And the other male principal is good, too. So I hope you like it.”

“I know I will,” Hall smiled. “Is the first ballet the rest of you have seen?”

The children nodded.

“Other than the impromptu ones a certain White Russian is prone to do around the house,” Bard quipped.

“The White Russian? Oh, that’s hilarious! That’s also the name of one of my favorite drinks, but that’s another story,” Hal waved his hands. “You’ve certainly picked the absolute best ballet to start with, haven’t you? It’s so good to see all of you! Enjoy! Caio, children!”

“Bye,” Ari offered an indulgent smile, as he followed Hal to find their seats.

“Mr. Hal is a hoot,” Bain said in an aside to Legolas.

“He certainly is,” Legolas shook his head. “And he makes the best cupcakes.”

“The best ones ever,” Tilda nodded in complete agreement, drawing Sigrid’s laugh.
“Hey, before we sit down, we should take a couple of pictures,” Sigrid suggested, digging in her bag for her mobile.

“Good idea, sweetness,” Bard seconded. “Who knows when we’ll all get so dressed up again?”

The family’s seats were close enough to the edge of the stage that Bard could line the children up in front of it to take a few pictures. As soon as Hal saw what they were doing, he rushed over and insisted that Bard stand with the children for pictures. The flamboyant blond made sure to take several pictures with everyone’s mobiles, so they’d all have a few. Ari took some of Hal with the family, then they took some of Hal and Ari.

By the time the stir over photographs was over, the theatre had filled considerably. The attendees ran the gamut of people dressed as elegantly as Clan Ffyrnig, to people in shorts and tees. Bard didn’t care what any of them wore; the important thing was that they’d come to see Thran dance. How wonderful was that? Bard had to force himself not to grin ear to ear.

“Okay, children, now’s the time to visit the euphemism if you need to,” Bard urged. “It’s almost time for the ballet to start.”

The family trooped out to the restrooms, reconvened outside the auditorium, and went back inside together.

“Wow, the place is packed.” Bain surveyed the auditorium as he followed Legolas down the aisle. “I’ve never seen it this crowded during school.”

“We don’t have enough students to fill the place, not like this,” Sigrid replied, following her brother. “There isn’t a single seat anywhere that’s empty.”

“Papa will be so happy.” Legolas smiled. “A big crowd always helps him dance even better.”

“Then he ought to dance his most amazing ever,” Tilda said firmly. “Right, Legs?”

“Absolutely,” the blond boy grinned at his sister.

They took their places – Bain, Legolas, Bard, Tilda, and Sigrid. The rest of the row had filled in, so Sigrid stowed their bouquet under her feet, and sat back to wait for the ballet to start.

In two minutes, the house lights dimmed, and a spotlight illuminated the leftmost edge of the curtain. The general swirl of conversation paused, and an excited silence grew as the audience turned their attention forward.

Lettie appeared from the wings, walking across the stage. She looked beautiful in a bright red flowing gown that sparkled with golden highlights in the spotlight. A smattering of applause broke out, and she smiled and waved at the notice.

“Good evening, everyone. I’m Lettie Johnson, artistic director of the UltraViolet Ballet Company. It is our proud honor to open the Seventh Annual Greenwood Dale on the Lake Arts Festival with the performance of a new ballet. It’s taken a lot of hard work to bring this ballet to you, and you should know that a large part of that effort came from the students here at the Imladris Academy. They made up an invaluable part of our set crew, our lighting crew, our sound crew, and our design crew. The school’s wonderful art department designed and produced the beautiful programs you received when you arrived. I hope we have many parents in the audience tonight, because you have so many reasons to be proud of your children’s efforts. Please join me in a big round of applause for the students.”
The applause was loud and excited, bringing a big smile to Lettie’s face.

“Of course, UVB would also like to thank Headmaster Elrond L’Eärendil for his strong support of our efforts to bring our ballet to you. The school staff has been most supportive as well, and so have all of you associated with the festival. This year promises to be the biggest and best one yet.”

More applause rang through the auditorium.

“Thank you so much. And now, without further ado, UltraViolet Ballet gives you Immortal.”

“Oh, gods, I’m going to die from the excitement!” Sigrid whispered to Tilda as Lettie exited the stage.

“Me, too!” Tilda whispered back, as the spotlight disappeared and the house lights dimmed completely.

_I might, too._ Bard thought, as the curtain went up. It remained dark for several seconds, then the cold, ultramarine blue light on Death’s perch slowly rose, revealing the Lord of the Underworld on His perch. A rippling whisper rose from the audience as they realized who crouched above the stage. Below, wan, green light grew across the misty floor of the stage, and the blank stage walls reflected the bleak, windswept prairie.

As the first low rumble of György Ligeti’s _Kyrie_ began, Bard forced himself to take a deep breath. This might be the last one he took until the first act was over. Slowly, the opposing soldiers crept across the stage, their hearts glowing red as they screwed up their courage and erupted into battle. The stage erupted into chaotic stew of rising music, projected images, flashing lights, swirling mist, and the contorted struggles of the soldiers. Death, however, watched impassively from above, never moving from His crouch. One by one, the soldiers fell, the red glow at their hearts snuffed out and replaced by sickly green. The last chord of the Kyrie faded away, and the battlefield fell still.

The audience waited, unbreathing. When Death rose from His crouch, however, a collective inhalation of anticipation replaced the silence. The first terrible, dissonant chord of Prokofiev’s music clashed, and projections covered the stage walls with swarms of carrion crows and vultures.

When Death flew down to the battlefield in a swirl of glowing blue flames, the audience’s inhalation turned to a gasp. As the second chord sounded, Death stalked soundlessly to the edge of the stage to stare out into the audience. He drew His reaping knife, and turned back to the fallen soldiers to begin His harvest.

Gods, Bard had seen this ballet twice in as many days, and he still got a chill down his spine when Death had towered above him at the edge of the stage. What had that done to those who hadn’t seen it before?

Ever the implacable lord, Death gathered His souls with a remorseless and patient hand. He was far from remorseless and patient, however, when the Maid made her appearance. How frantic was she, searching the field of the fallen for her Soldier? With her long hair flying about her, the Maid threw herself on one dead solder after the other. Death paused as He waited by a soldier not yet dead, only to retreat a step when the Maid threw herself on the breast of the man. Yes, this was her love, her heart, and through her ministrations he slowly came back from the brink of death. How Death studied the Maid as she tenderly saw to her Soldier, restoring him until he could rise. As she called to the other battlefield attendants to help her bear her Soldier away, Death paused, considering. She and her attendants disappeared, and only then did Death recall His harvest. He reached out a tentative hand after the Maid, but collected His souls and retreated.
The Maid and the Soldier took the stage for their joyful pas de deux. The restored Soldier and his loving Maid spun a giddy, happy reunion that had the audience murmuring in admiration for the skill of the dancing as well as the emotion. Their happy reverie didn’t last, though, as the soldiers mustered for the next battle. Death appeared again on His perch to oversee the carnage. When the Soldier fell this time past the Maid’s ability to restore him, when the glow at his heart changed from red to green, her grief and despair found their echoes in the moans from the audience. Death added the fallen Soldier’s soul to His harvest, and led him with the rest of the dead down to the Underworld. The Maid followed, as the stage rotated to reveal the massive gates of the Underworld. The rest of the stage was dark, not yet revealing Death’s realm. At Death’s gesture, the gates opened, and He led the souls of the newly dead inside. Behind them came the Maid, but the gates closed despite her pleas, separating her from her lost Soldier. She was left outside, accompanied only by her grief.

The curtain fell.

Bard held his breath. Oh, gods, please, please...

The applause was immediate, a wave of sound that echoed off the ceiling and crashed over him like a sudden storm, but the best kind of storm.

Oh, thank you, gods.

Immortal was on its way.

“Oh, ye gods and little fishhooks,” Sigrid breathed beside Tilda, as the house lights went up. “That was even better than last night. Did you see how he looked over the audience like he was about to come down and take us after the soldiers?”

“That was amazing!” Bain agreed, grinning. “Gave me a chill, that’s for sure. It was great!”

“It was creepy,” Tilda said, as they all stood up to stretch their legs. When she looked up at Bard, however, her smile looked just like her brother’s admiring expression. “But it was a good creepy. Ada’s supposed to be creepy then. Don’t you think he looked creepy, Legs?”

“Eerie, too,” Legolas nodded. “I forgot how hot I was in this jacket, he was so creepy.”

“Oh, great,” Bain rolled his eyes. “You had to say something about how hot it was, didn’t you? I’d forgotten about it until you mentioned it.”

Legolas snickered. “Take off your jacket, then. No one will care if you take it off, as long as you put it on at the end. That’s when everyone will take pictures.”

“Who’s going to take pictures?” Sigrid leaned forward to look at Legolas.

“A lot of people,” Legolas shrugged. “They always do after Papa dances. Sometimes I would be in them, sometimes not. It’s exciting the first couple of times, but after that, it’s just a lot of bright lights. Anyway, have your jacket on at the end, Bain and Bard, just to make sure.”

“Advice from an expert,” Bard nodded appreciatively. “I’m glad one of us knows what we’re doing.”

“That’s the truth,” Sigrid snorted, laughing. “Even so, I think people like it so far, don’t you?”

“I think they love it,” Legolas smiled proudly. “You can hear it in how the audience sounds. If they didn’t like it, they’d sound restless or they’d mutter grumpy things. But tonight everyone’s gasping, and oohing and aahing, and clapping. They’re excited.”

The theatre lights blinked, signaling the end of the intermission. The family kept standing until the people in their row had filtered back to their seats, then settled themselves for the second act.

Bard didn’t need to keep Legolas’s words in mind about the sound of the audience for long. As the house lights dimmed and the curtain went up, the stage revealed Death as he led His latest harvest of souls into the Underworld. Spontaneous applause broke out as the lights revealed the fantastic set in all its complexity. After the stark one-dimensional feeling of the mortal world, the swirl of bright colors, layers of detail, and detailed mishmash of cultures and costumes was breathtaking. Attendants came to remove Death’s armored tunic and helmet, and array Him in His regal robes. Then He led his new subjects through His realm, observing here, dictating there, clearly the master of all. The various enclaves put on their shows, expressed in the different dance forms, sometimes squabbling among themselves, sometimes joining forces to dance together. The kaleidoscope cast by the older inhabitants soon drew many of the new souls this way and that, and they found themselves dancing with one group or another, or festooned with hats or belts or other articles of clothing that blurred their plain military tunics.

The Maid’s Soldier, however, was not so drawn. He lagged after the others, almost dancing as if he tried to escape straight into the audience, only to be forced back as if a wall held him in place. Eventually he wandered away from the rest, and the stage rotated again for him to dance his longing for the Maid he’d left behind. After a few steps, he disappeared to reveal the Maid in her grief. She danced a pas de deux with the ghostly memory of her love, and resolved to plead with Death Himself to return her love. Down she went to the Underworld, made her plea, and was ushered into Death’s presence. As the terms of her bargain were made, the audience was rapt. Soon it was the restored Soldier who despaired outside the closed gates to the Underworld, and the curtain fell again.

The applause was even louder this time.

Bard couldn’t stop smiling. The second intermission flew by, and he was too distracted to notice much that anyone said to him. Tilda and the boys clustered in the aisle to share their excitement, but Sigrid stayed beside Bard.

“I can’t stand it,” she murmured to him, looking around in distraction. “The next scene is the scene, and I just can’t stand the suspense.”

“I’m right there with you, sweetness,” Bard admitted. “I’m wound as tightly as a clock spring.”

“Nobody has clocks with springs in them anymore, Da,” she said with authority, but her swallow revealed the real reason behind her snarky tone.

“You know what I mean well enough, though,” he riposted with the same tone, drawing her chuckle.

“Yes, I do. Gods, I don’t know whether to wish this were over or not.”

The house lights blinked again, signaling the imminent start to the third act.

“In eight minutes, it will be over. And Thran will be king of the world.”

Sigrid’s smile was wide. “Yes, he will. I can’t wait to see it happen.”

The children filed back into their seats, and Bard forced himself to breathe deeply again. The pointe scene was next.
The house lights darkened. The curtain rose on the blank part of the set, where the Maid danced in agitation, worry, and grief back and forth like a caged animal desperate for the release that was not to be found. Death entered, stripped of all His finery to make His appeal to the Maid. He was so tall, so spidery and thin, so alien with His mane of stark white hair, His grey face seemingly chiseled from old marble. How tenderly did He array the Maid in the beautiful gown He gave her? How many other priceless gifts did He bestow? To His dismay, though she wore His gown, the Maid was blind to everything else. Even when He rose to his utmost height, she did not see Him – but the audience did. No matter how hot the auditorium was, the thrill of shock, amazement, and incredulity that rose when Thran danced on pointe sent all of Bard’s skin into gooseflesh. Thran all but levitated on the tips of his pointe shoes, and when he arched back into arabesque on pointe, the audience broke into awed murmurs. The Maid was oblivious to the tour de force that went on beside her; all she saw was the memory of her Soldier. When at last her loss overwhelmed her and she ran from Death’s presence, He fell to his knees in anguish at her rejection, and the lights went dark.

The audience erupted with a spate of applause and cheers that didn’t die until the lights came up to reveal the Soldier. Mirroring the earlier scene of the Maid’s despair, the Soldier told the tale of his with equal poignancy. The ghostly appearance of the Maid made him firm his resolve to petition Death to let him resume his place among the dead, thus returning the Maid to the mortal world. The stage revolved, and the Soldier made his petition before the assembled denizens of the Underworld. But Death, desperate to keep the Maid in the hopes of eventually winning her regard, refused all of the Soldier’s pleas. The best that the Soldier could do was to remind Death that if he should die, Death must return the Maid to the mortal world. Reluctantly, Death acknowledged that part of their bargain. Satisfied, the Soldier stole a blade from one of the dead, and stabbed himself, expiring before the horrified Maid.

The captivated audience rang with gasps and cries. Infuriated, Death turned on the Maid, ordering His subjects to hold her before she could embrace the body of her fallen Soldier. Reluctantly, the dead forced her outside the gates, which slowly started to close. At the last moment, the Maid tore herself from the dead, fell to her knees beside her Solder, and thrust his dagger into her breast.

As the Maid fell beside the Soldier, as everyone else on stage, even Death Himself, froze, the audience cried out again. The emotion that swirled around Bard was all but palpable as Verdi’s Dies Irae ended.

Quietly, Tchaikovsky’s Hymn of the Cherubim began.

Death’s fury cooled to sorrow and grief as the dead brought the bodies of the Maid and the Soldier to lie in state before their Lord’s throne, then drew back to kneel in sorrow around the pair. With a sad gesture, Death relented, freeing the souls of the devoted lovers. The Maid and Soldier rose to reveal the green glow of the dead at their hearts. They smiled at one another, and danced a loving pas de deux because nothing had the power to separate them again, not even Death’s final declaration of His regard. Death bowed, conceding the depth of their devotion, and raised His hands over them to wield His ultimate power. The audience sighed when the green glow of their hearts changed to pure white. Death raised His hands once more, ready to free them from His kingdom to fly up to the heavens, where they would eternally shine together. The couple danced one last turn together around the stage, then with Death’s gesture they flew into the air. After they embraced on high, the Soldier fell to his knee before his love, and the gates to the Underworld began to close. Death remained outside, gazing at the devoted lovers in longing, reaching up with a pleading gesture one last time. But the Maid and the Soldier saw only each other, and Death bowed His head in concession. He returned behind His gates, which drew closed after Him.

Gradually, all of the stage lights dimmed, until only a single spotlight illuminated the Maid and the Soldier. As the Hymn of the Cherubim drew to a close, that last spotlight faded, leaving the stage empty and dark.

On the last note of the Hymn, the curtain fell.

A heartbeat later, the auditorium exploded into thunderous applause and cheers. The noise was so loud that Bard didn’t immediately register how many people rose to their feet and yelled, or how many others wiped tears from their cheeks before they stood to applaud. Bard rose with them to pound his hands together in as much relief as awe.

So many people had put so much into making Immortal what it was. Story, sets, costumes, choreography, light, sound, music. But all those efforts paled beside what the UVB dancers had done with them. They had created a world that had let no one in the audience think of anything else for ninety minutes. Head and shoulders above all those dancers had been Thran. He had not just made Death, Lord of the Underworld, live.

He had made Immortal immortal.

The curtain rose to reveal the empty portion of the stage. One by one, the corps dancers who had danced the various enclaves of the dead appeared to take their bows. When Luka appeared to take his bows as the Soldier, the applause grew, and a few people ran forward to toss flowers at him – good, Bard wouldn’t be the only one to break with the tradition against offering flowers to the male principals. The young dancer gathered them up with a gratified wave and many bows of appreciation. The clamor grew when Charisse appeared for her bows as the winsome Maid, and several more people ran forward to lay bouquets on the stage for her. She picked up several, and bestowed half of them on her Soldier, who took them with a bow on bended knee to his partner. It was several seconds before the bouquets stopped coming to them both, and the applause continued unabated throughout. But at last, both dancers turned towards the wings and beckoned to the one dancer who wasn’t yet onstage.

When Thran appeared with a grand jeté, the place went mad.

Bard was overwhelmed to hear it, see it, feel it. No matter that Europeans thought it gauche to bestow flowers upon male dancers – uncounted numbers of American blossoms flew onto the stage as Thran took bow after bow. Sigrid grabbed their bundle of flowers and thrust it at Bard.

“Give it to him!” she urged. “Go on!”

Bard took the flowers, edged past the girls, and strode down the aisle. He didn’t toss his bouquet at Thran’s feet, but held it out to him. Thran came right to him, stooping to take the flowers with a wide grin of triumph, love, relief, exhaustion – more emotions than Bard could count. The roar from the audience was too loud for Thran to speak over, so instead he kissed the knuckles of his gloves and held them out to Bard. Bard kissed his and touched them to Thran’s for a second before backing away. Before Thran rose to his feet, he gathered an armful of the other flowers, bowed over and over to the audience, then went down the line of the corps to give each of the dancers one of the bouquets. The only one he kept in his arms was Bard’s.

How long did the applause go on? Five minutes? Ten minutes? A lifetime? However long it continued, it was long enough for the corps to take several bows, and for Luka and Charisse to be loudly hailed and showered with bouquets time and time again. It was long enough for Thran to bring Irmo from the wings to take a bow – for the first time, a look of utter humility and gratitude suffused the impetuous choreographer’s face. It was long enough for Thran to take bow after bow after bow, each one to deafening acclaim. Even after the curtain came down, the applause continued until Luka, Charisse, and Thran had to make repeated appearances from the sides of the stage.

The weight of the world vanished from Bard’s shoulders. It was over, it was done, and it was a triumph. Tonight, no one stood taller in the ballet world than Thran.

All six feet and five inches of him.

On pointe.
Chapter 158

Chapter Summary

Welcome to the premiere party! It's time for UltraViolet Ballet and Clan Ffyrnig’s well-deserved celebration.

“Oh, mon Dieu, listen to it!” Charisse put one hand to her mouth and grabbed at Luka with the other. As soon as Tink got the line unhooked from Charisse’s flying harness, the ballerina threw both arms around Luka. “C’est incroyable! Luka, we have done it! Thran! Where are you, Thran! Thran, notre rêve s’est réalisé!”

Thran pulled off Death’s regal robe and thrust it into the arms of the nearest costume assistant, then dodged through the rest of the company to join Luka and Charisse. He enveloped both of them in a hug that was as much relief as it was celebration.

Immortal was real. No longer relegated to the practice stage as an idea that had yet to meet the world, it was fully realized, staged, performed...

Acclaimed.

The corps scrambled to take their bows, but Thran was too overcome to see them go. He sank to his knees, lightheaded, remembering at the last second to loose his arms around Luka and Charisse so that he didn’t drag them down with him. Now that Immortal had premiered, he had no words for what he felt, either praise or curse. After so many struggles, after not performing for eight months, after upending so much of his life, from new company to new family to new home to new ballet, the world spun around him like a kaleidoscope.

“Oh, gods – Thran!” Luka fell to his knees beside him to shake his shoulders. “Are you faint? Thran!”

“I am fine,” he said, gripping Luka’s arms. “Go, go! Take your bows. You deserve them. Savor, mon cher. Yes, go, go!”

Luka swallowed, but Thran pushed him, and off he ran. The applause and the cheers grew as Luka appeared, which pleased him greatly. When he didn’t get to his feet, Charisse regarded him with a frown, so he mustered a smile for her. “Vraiment, ma chère, I am fine. So much hard work, so many trials, but we overcame them all. It quite overwhelms me.”

Charisse gave him a wide smile. “Do not miss a single bow of your own, mon cher. Not after all that hard work, all those trials.”

Thran climbed to his feet. “Go, so that you do not miss any of yours, either. You were wonderful.”

“We all were. Oh, Thran, listen to it! We are stars!”

He saw Charisse out onto the stage to take her bows, laughing in delight when so many flowers came onto the stage for her. How adorable she and her Luka were, giving their reverences and waving to the crowd, remaining in character just enough to convey the sweet, youthful affection between the Soldier and the Maid. He gave them a long interlude to let them bask in the acclaim they were due. But soon they turned to him waiting in the wings, and beckoned him to join him.

He ran out of the wings, hurling himself into a grand jeté that carried him to the center of the stage. If his excitement had magically transformed into the energy that powered his jump, he might not have landed on the stage, but flown out of the building and up to the very edge of the atmosphere. If the wall of emotion that washed over him when he appeared had been transformed similarly, he could have flown around the moon and back. Perhaps some of his performances before tonight had been met with such a clamor, but this one was special. He hadn’t merely danced a role to perfection – he’d created that role first.

Then he’d owned it.

Flowers flew onto the stage. He’d never had the ballerina’s honor to receive them before. His teachers at the Mariinsky would have been appalled – how gauche, they would have said.

It wasn’t gauche. It was appreciation. It was honor. It was love.

As if he’d heard Thran’s thoughts, Bard appeared at the edge of the stage, smiling ear to ear, holding a bouquet out to him. Gods, how handsome was his husband in his tuxedo, his carved silver earrings giving him a rakish glamour – and was that a streak of blue in his hair? He scanned for the children, and found them smiling, applauding, waving, Kukla jumping up and down as if she were a pogo stick – all of them had colors in their hair. Laughing, Thran went right to the edge of the stage to take his husband’s offering. Oh, Bard had done his research – Stargazer lilies to celebrate the realization of a dream, and pink carnations to recognize so much hard work done with grace. What was this? A sly nod to his preferences with the green carnations? And gods, the coup de grace, the Viscaria that was an invitation to dance!

A lifetime would not be long enough to spend in the cradle of Bard’s arms, whether they danced or did anything else.

The tumult of the audience was too deafening for Thran to speak. It was just as well – words were beyond him. He kissed his knuckles and held them out to Bard, who mirrored the gesture. The unselfish love and pride in Bard’s eyes were a gift beyond any flowers.

Bard backed away, graciously leaving Thran to accept the tribute he was due. But he had not been the only one to garner that tribute, so he gathered up as many of the bouquets that he could gracefully carry, and bowed over them with heartfelt appreciation. Then he went down the line of the corps, giving each of them at least one of the bouquets, male and female alike. The only one he kept for himself was Bard’s. That one would go home with him.

He went backstage and returned with Irmo for him to take a bow. The man might be infuriating at times, but he also possessed the genius to give Immortal’s story life with his choreography, and it was only right that he was recognized for it. How surprising was it to see the man so firmly ensconced in his private world look out over the audience and humbly realize that the greater world appreciated his efforts, his gifts?

The applause seemed never to stop. Even after the curtain fell, the clamor drew Luka, Charisse, and Thran out time and again. The number of bouquets that were laid at their feet would fill their ballroom. They would need buckets to hold them all.

It was a lovely problem to have.

Thran had no idea how much time passed before the applause finally died, and the house lights went up. He left the stage to the Theatre Ninjas, who offered to collect the piles of flowers and bring them to his dressing room. He asked them to stack them on one of the tables in the costume and warmup room instead, and told them they were welcome to take some for themselves if they liked. He had the bouquet that meant the most.

Backstage was a frantic, jubilant place as the dancers milled back and forth, all hugging and chattering excitedly. The scent of flowers was rich, as almost every dancer had two or three bundles in their hands, and Charisse and Luka had their arms full. No one had made any move to change out of costumes or remove makeup – they were still too excited to want the evening to end. It was still early, barely past nine he heard someone say, so it was no wonder everyone was still wound so tightly. Lettie came into the stir, laughing and embracing everyone she met. When she got to Thran, her hug was exuberant.

“You were incredible,” she said simply. “Just incredible. I can’t even find words to describe how incredible you were. I’m just overwhelmed.”

Thran’s smile was elated. “That will be the word of the night, Lettie. Overwhelmed. I cannot believe that we have done it. Immortal is out in the world.”

“The djinni’s out of the bottle to be sure, never to be put back in. I can’t wait to hear what the critics have to say about it. There’s not one of them who wasn’t here tonight, and there’s not one of them who can’t say it was brilliant.”

“There is likely one gremlin somewhere who might try, but let us hope he was not here tonight,” Thran grinned. “Gods, I am giddy.”

“You have every right to be, Thran,” Lettie avowed. “Oh, I want to announce this before anyone gets away – excuse me.”

Lettie turned to call down the hall. “Hey, everyone, before anyone flits away, remember the premiere party’s in the village at the Green Dragon. The school’s anxious for us to clear out so they can lock up for the night, so I move we adjourn for a well-deserved celebration as soon as possible.”

A cheer went up, and the stir calmed as dancers got out of their costumes and cleaned off their makeup. The costume handlers ferried everything back on the proper racks – they’d be back early tomorrow morning to see that everything was cleaned and ready for Wednesday’s performance.

When Thran and Luka retreated to their dressing room to change, the young dancer was so excited that he spilled his armload of flowers all over his bag, the counter, and the floor. He couldn’t stop babbling his excitement, which drew Thran’s chuckle. He set Bard’s flowers aside; shed his gloves, loincloth, body stocking, dancing slippers, and dancer’s belt, and put on his underwear, trousers, socks, and shoes before he tackled all the pins that anchored his headdress. Without that on his head, he felt much cooler; the body heat from so many dancers had turned the dressing rooms into saunas. It helped to prop the door open once he and Luka were decently attired so that they could catch whatever breeze came down the hall. Luka had far less makeup to remove, so when he was done he bundled up his flowers and ran out to catch Charisse so they could ride together to the premiere party.

Thran remained behind, working methodically to remove Death’s face from his, and combing the rigors of Death’s trials from his hair. When it was smooth, he took pains to arrange it into an elegant fishtail braid. This might be a celebration for UVB, but likely the press would follow them there, and of course there would be pictures taken. He wanted to look elegant, whether the pictures were for friends or the press.

First, however, it was his pleasure to return to his family. They deserved to attend the celebration,
He put on his shirt, gathered his bag and Bard's flowers, and eased across the stage to sneak a look out from behind the curtain. Yes, Bard and the children were still in the auditorium. Most of the audience was gone, but Hal and Ari stood talking with his family. Thran stepped from behind the curtain and came down the stairs to join them.

“Thran! Oh, my god!” Hal heralded, throwing up both of his hands as Thran approached, then rushing forward to give him a bear hug. He held Thran at arm’s length to gaze at him in awe. “That was the most amazing ballet I’ve ever seen! Oh, my god, I cried like a baby at the end, didn’t I, Ari? That was just so, so incredible. And damn, my friend, I can’t believe I saw you actually poised on the tips of your shoes like you were about to fly off into space! I’m just beyond words. Completely and totally beyond words!”

“For Hal, he’s beyond words,” Ari put his hands on Hal’s shoulders to peek around his boyfriend, smiling. “Not like anyone else is beyond words, but then Hal isn’t ever like anyone else, is he?”

“No, he is not,” Thran agreed, laughing. “Thank you, my friend. It is a delight to see you so excited.”

“Oh, both of you,” Hal waved dismissively, but the wink he gave Thran was well aware of the impression he made. “I refuse to apologize one bit for any of it. It was the most amazing thing I’ve seen in ages, and that’s that.”

“You do me a great honor,” Thran gave him a little bow. “Thank you.”

“It was great, Thran,” Ari agreed. “Congratulations on an amazing performance.”

“Thank you, Ari.”

“And oh, my god, what a treat it is to see your family all dressed up for the occasion,” Hal put his hand to his heart and leaned in confidentially. “The children are adorable, but honestly, Thran, that husband of yours... what a vision!”

“He is my treasure,” Thran agreed, chuckling.

“Well, let us be off, my dear,” Hal gave Thran another hug. “You’ve given the world something to talk about, without doubt. I hope this makes you millions. I’ll have several ideas about what you might want to do with them once you have them.”

“Thank you, Hal. Ari, it was good of you to come.”

“I wouldn’t have missed, it, Thran,” Ari reached forward to shake Thran’s hand. “Even if Hal hadn’t threatened me with death by lack of cupcakes, I still would have come.”

“That is a most horrible fate!” Thran laughed. “Goodbye!”

The two men took their leave, waving and exchanging goodbyes with Bard and the children before they went up the aisle. Thran turned to his family in their finery, shaking his head at how wonderful they looked.

“Look at you! Such debonair men, such lovely young ladies – are these the same children who tear up and down the stairs and bounce on the beds and play uncounted games of car race and zombie apocalypse?”
“Yes!” Tilda jumped up and down. “It’s still us!”

Legolas gave his father a big hug. “It was wonderful, Papa. Even better than last night.”

“You were so eerie when you stalked to the edge of the stage and looked out at the audience,” Sigrid agreed. “That gave me goosebumps.”

“Super weird, Thran,” Bain assured him.

“Ah, good!” Thran beamed. “Just as I meant! I will do that each time, then.”

“Let’s get Thran in the SUV, then, children,” Bard urged. “I’m sure he’s tired of standing.”

“Oh, but I need your help,” Thran hastened to say. “I have so many flowers to take home that I need you all to help me carry them.”

“Ooh, all those flowers?” Tilda jumped up and down again. “We get to take them home?”

“All of them,” Thran nodded. “I gave away as many as I could, so the rest are for us.”

Thran led them back to the costume room, where a table full of flowers still remained. The girls oohed and aahed over the collection, and the boys marveled at how many there were. As the children sorted through them, Bard nudged Thran with his elbow.

“May I give the genius behind Immortal a kiss now?”

Thran turned soft eyes on Bard. “Only if I may give the other genius behind Immortal a kiss, too.”

“You, foolish man!” Thran gave Bard a mock glower. “The one in the most elegant tuxedo, with the most bewitching earrings, and the most exciting blue streak in his hair. Was that your idea?”

Bard chuckled. “I had to show solidarity with the children.”

“You did not. You did it because it was hot.”

“It certainly is. Next time you have a premiere, could you make it December? July is way too hot for a tuxedo. I can’t wait to get out of this jacket.”

Thran tsked. “Tcha, you exasperate! You know very well I referred to you, not the weather.”

Bard leaned in for a quick kiss. “Too much talking. Not enough kissing.”

Thran kissed back with a smile. “Ah. Something we agree on.”

“At last.” Bard dipped in for another quick peck, then regarded the children piling flowers in their arms. “Looks like they need a little help, cariad.”

“By all means,” Thran agreed. He set Bard’s bouquet to the side, then he and Bard scooped up the remaining flowers. He carefully set Bard’s bouquet on top of his armload, drawing Bard’s appreciative smile.

“What course I am careful of this one, lyubov moya. The others are all very fine, of course. But this one is the one I most care about.”
“Make sure you count all the flowers. I made sure there were only an odd number.”

“Listen to you! You are a refined sender of flowers. You send me congratulations for the achievement of my dreams, appreciation for grace under pressure, a nod to my life, and an invitation to the dance. And you consider how superstitious Russians are with their bouquets.”

“Superstitious? You?” Bain paused to look around at Thran. “Superstitious how?”

“Let us talk as we carry the bounty to the SUV,” Thran suggested.

Bard and Thran got the last of the flowers into their arms, and the family led the way to the lobby. As they exited the auditorium, the two security guards warned them that a host of reporters and well-wishers lingered outside. Thran tsked.

“I should have thought,” he looked at Bard apologetically. “I do not want to put the children through this.”

“Can I dash out and drive the SUV around to the emergency exit by the dressing rooms?” Bard asked the guards, but when they vetoed that, Sigrid snuck a peek through the outside door.

“Let’s just go, Da. They want to talk to Ada, not us, and Luka and Mlle. Charisse are out there. Ada will be okay with them. We can wait in the SUV.”

The family shrugged, so they forged out of the building. The heat was still uncomfortable, so everyone was eager to get to the air-conditioned SUV. Of course, the reporters dove after Thran, so he sent his family ahead of him as he joined Luka and Charisse to answer questions. It was some minutes before he was able to break away gracefully. On the one hand, it was good that so many were interested in the three dancers and their ballet, and their publications would help spread the word of Immortal’s success, which was all to their good. On the other, the dancers were tired, and wanted to get to their party before they were too exhausted to enjoy it. After some minutes of scribbling autographs, answering questions, and smiling for photographs, Luka and Thran escorted Charisse to her car, then Thran saw Luka to his. Bard had kept careful watch, and he drove up as soon as Luka got into his car. Thran dove into the front seat, smiling and waving one more time as Bard drove them out of the parking lot.

“They like the ballet, Papa,” Legolas called from the back. “That’s good.”

“Very good,” Thran smiled as he leaned back in his seat. “I am very happy.”

“Do you want to go right to your party?” Bard asked, keeping his eyes on the road.

“Let us go home first, and put all the flowers in water, and then you and the children can change into something cooler. For of course you are all invited to the party, too.”

That got a big hooray from the children, so they drove home. Thran had been right about needing buckets to hold all the flowers; he put Bard’s bouquet into a vase for the kitchen table, but they filled three big buckets from the carriage house with the rest.

“They will last overnight this way,” Thran said as he unwrapped cellophane from some of the bundles, snipped off the stem ends, and put the flowers in the buckets. “We can arrange them better in the morning. No, I can do it while you change. Please, no holes, trousers for the boys and perhaps a summer dress for the girls?”

“I don’t have a summer dress,” Sigrid shrugged. “But I can wear my work pants and a nice top.”
Thran nodded assent, so the family went upstairs to change. In a few minutes, Legolas and Sigrid came down to help, both dressed in khaki pants and colorful shirts. Tilda appeared in her same bee dress, and Bain had on his soccer jersey. Bard wore a pair of dark blue trousers and one of his nice shirts with the sleeves rolled up. As they piled back into the SUV, the mood was festive.

It was time to party.

* * *

Lettie had reserved the party room in the Green Dragon for UVB’s celebration. The Indonesian-inspired restaurant specialized in grilled skewers, especially seafood, and was popular with villagers as well as tourists. Their light, protein-rich fare was a good choice to feed a crowd of dancers at any time, but especially late at night after a performance, and the dancers relished the chance to sample the treat. When Bard and his family arrived, the party was already busy, and Thran was greeted like the star he was. Bard gave Thran a little push towards the other dancers, sending him off with a smile.

“Da, look! Scallop skewers!” Bain breathed, pointing to the buffet table.

“Chicken satay, too,” Legolas pointed.

“What are those round white things?” Tilda asked.

“Scallops,” Legolas said. “Like those we had at Kasim's, remember?”

“Oh, the round things in my casserole!” Tilda exclaimed in recognition. “I liked those.”

“I like them, too,” Legolas agreed, smiling.

“They have a juice bar,” Sigrid continued. “And champagne. You have to get some champagne, Da.”

“Can we have some, Da?” Bain asked breathlessly.

“Skewers and juice, yes; champagne, no. Take only a couple things at a time, and be polite. Leave most of them for the dancers, please. This is their supper, and they’ve worked hard tonight.”

“Okay, Da!”

He shepherded the children to the buffet table, chose a couple of skewers and a glass of beer for himself, and scanned for someplace out of the way for them to sit. Rada and Ori, ensconced in a corner, waved to him, so he pointed the children towards them.

“Hi, Mr. Rada!” Tilda heralded. “Is Sebastian with you tonight?”

“Sadly, no, Tilda. But he appreciates you asking after him. He misses seeing all of you.”

Bard took the seat next to Ori. The children chatted with Rada; Ori and Brad watched the dancers laugh and talk together as they nibbled their snacks. It was a relief to see everyone so jubilant at how well Immortal had been received. Charisse and the Irish step dancer giggled over a joke from the belly dancer, and Thran listened as some of the corps dancers told him about someone they’d seen in the audience – a ballet critic they all knew of, apparently.
“It’s good to see everyone laugh,” Bard observed.

Ori nodded. “And no one’s leaning over a bucket to throw up. That’s even better. Thran really impressed my brother, by the way.”

“I hope he impressed everyone who saw him tonight.”

Ori’s expression was grimly amused. “Most people who saw him tonight were impressed because he danced like an angel. Nori was impressed because he didn’t let Thursday night keep him from dancing like an angel.”

Bard regarded Thran and Legolas as they conferred over the buffet table, debating the merits of the chicken satay over the scallop skewers. They laughed at something Bain said, seemingly carefree.

“After the effort everyone’s made, especially Thran, nothing short of a double leg amputation would have kept him from dancing tonight.”

“I know it.” Ori took up his glass of beer and held it out to Bard. “Here’s to stubborn Russians.”

Bard touched his glass to Ori’s with a clink. “Amen.”

The two men drained their glasses in solemn salute.

The party went on under Bard and Ori’s benevolent watch, blessedly free of most of the speeches that might have punctuated such a gathering in the city. Lettie and Abebe both had a few words to say, and so did Thran; all of them spoke their appreciation for the hard work everyone had put in to make Immortal a success. When the champagne went around to toast that success, Bard indulged in a single glass, smiling as he recalled the last time he’d had some – the night Clan Ffyrnig had moved into their house. That night had celebrated the start of his and Thran’s life together. Tonight, they celebrated the start of UltraViolet Ballet’s life as an innovative, creative force, with Thran at the heart of it.

The first celebration had been more personal, while this one was more public. But both were milestones, just as Bard’s first gallery show had been. Bard took another sip of his champagne, savored the laughter of his children, his husband, and his friends, and was content.

Just before midnight, the dancers bade each other elated farewells. Tomorrow was Sunday, their rest day, but Monday promised to be a jubilant reunion. Despite the late hour, it was hard to corral the children to go home; they’d discovered the ice cream bar at the end of the buffet table, and it was clear that all of them had indulged heavily in the treat. But eventually Bard got Bain and Tilda away from the ice cream, and Thran coaxed Legolas from the tray of scallop skewers. Bard finally found Sigrid with Charisse among the ballerinas; because she could rightfully claim to have danced as Thran’s partner, she had become an honorary member of the dance community for the evening. She revealed her usual pragmatic streak as they left the Green Dragon and headed for the SUV.

“They were all nice, and it was so sweet of them to invite me into the fold, but no, I don’t think I’ll become a dancer anytime soon,” she told Bard. “I don’t mind the hard work, but I do like to eat more than they do. Two tiny little shrimp skewers and no ice cream is not for me.”

“There was ice cream?” Thran blinked in feigned surprise.

“You know there was ice cream, Ada,” Sigrid grinned. “I saw Legolas and Tilda bring you some.”

“It was a welcome treat,” Thran admitted, as they piled into the car. “And no vegetables. After so many weeks of unending rehearsals, we are all sick of unending vegetables – salads, carrot sticks,

\[\text{\ldots}\]
celery spears, snow peas. Tonight, we are triumphant, so we celebrate with delicious seafood for the body, and decadent ice cream for the spirit. Perfection."

The family laughed as they headed home.

In an hour, the children were in bed, Bard and Thran had made their rounds, and Bard had rinsed off the evening’s sweat. He turned the shower over to Thran, who needed a more thorough scrub. Bard was still too wound up from the evening to get into bed yet, so he pulled on his shorts to wander downstairs. He ducked into the solarium, where he could just see the gibbous moon sinking in the west; it would set in perhaps an hour or so. A few clouds obscured the stars right overhead; perhaps it would rain overnight, but the bright moon in the west revealed that the morning would be clear, and likely as hot as it had been today. It would be a fine day to enjoy the lush gardens, the shifting sunlight that illuminated each room of the house so beautifully, the stir of the children as they came and went.

Something drew him from the solarium through the sitting room, down the hall, through the still unfinished main room, and into Thran’s sanctum, the ballroom. It was mostly in darkness and shadow; the setting moon was too low to add its illumination to the room, but the wide expanses of pale cream paint and white woodwork were bright enough to reflect what little light there was. He looked out of the bay window at his Ring Thing sculpture nestled in deep beds of flowers and small shrubs. A small spotlight at the base of the sculpture revealed the slowly undulating rings as the slight breeze stirred them. In the dark, the colors of the anodized rings disappeared into ribbons of black and white, but the motion was still soothing.

“You are pensive, my saint.” Thran’s whisper was as soft as the hands that came to rest on Bard’s shoulders. Bard shifted until they stood side by side, their arms looped around each other’s waists.

“Do you know that next Saturday, the day you dance the last performance of Immortal for the festival, is the eight-month anniversary of the day we met?”

Thran sighed deeply. “You are right. So much has happened since. We are together, we are here, you sculpt again, I dance again.”

“The children are happy.”

“I am very happy, too, and so are you.”

Smiling, Bard said, “Very much so.”

“Would you dance with me?”

Bard gave Thran a quick glance in the dark. “You’ve danced your feet off today, cariad. How can you want to dance even one step more?”

“Because I want to dance with you, if only once around the ballroom. You did invite me with the flowers, yes? What better way to end a day like today?”

Bard grinned. “Is this another ritual?”

Thran chuckled. “Only if you believe in old songs, lyubov moya. A plea to save the last dance for me.”

Bard took Thran in his arms as his husband had taught him. “First dance, middle dance, last dance, any dance... they’re all yours.”
They began a slow waltz. They made two full circuits of the ballroom before Bard eased them to a halt before the window where they’d started.

There was no reason for either of them to speak.
Chapter 159

Chapter Summary

It's the day after Immortal's world premiere. What better day to say goodbye to Clan Ffyrnig?

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

The first day of Clan Ffyrnig’s new life began Sunday morning. It began quietly, privately, with delicious, drowsy touches and lazy stretches in bed with Bard, intermingled with soft sighs and low murmurs of nothing so serious as what to have for breakfast. It continued with a slow amble about the house to regard the gardens from the ballroom window, then the solarium, then out for a brief moment on the terrace. It was already hot under the summer morning sun, and Bard’s pine tree was in Celebrían’s gallery for the festival week, but that didn’t keep Thran or his husband from enjoying the enormous bright green elephant ear leaves, the lush shrubs, and the big urns overflowing with purple, yellow, and white flowers. The urns reminded them of the buckets of flowers waiting for them in the mudroom, so they scrounged the few vases from Bard’s mother that he’d stowed in the butler’s pantry, but they still had two buckets full waiting for suitable vessels. They made a few small arrangements with drinking glasses to compliment Bard’s bouquet on the kitchen table before hunger got the better of them. Thran put on the teakettle and arranged cups and dishes while Bard made a cheese and chive Egg Puff to go with the leftover biscuits he’d made yesterday. Soon they sat down amid the flowers to eat.

Life continued with deceptive quiet as they cleaned up their breakfast and adjourned to the sitting room with their tea. Thran’s computer sat on one of the sofas. Atop it was a sticky note. Ada! Read your email! Love, Sigrid, it read.

Thran traded looks with Bard, but duly opened his computer and clicked on his email app to find a message from Sigrid. When he opened it, it read, Ada! Look at these! Several Internet addresses appeared below Sigrid’s words.

His husband shrugged and offered a crooked smile. “She wouldn’t have sent you the email unless it contained good news. Go on. Take a look at what the future holds.”

Ah, so Bard considered today to be a cusp, a turning point, too. Was the quiet, private, early morning beginning to Clan Ffyrnig’s new life about to give way to a lively, public midmorning?

“True enough,” Thran conceded. “So let us see.”

The first several linked to online reviews of Immortal’s premiere of last night; the last one linked to a video broadcast from one of the city news stations. All of them offered glowing praise for the ballet. The video showed several stills and two short video clips that UVB’s PR team had produced to advertise Immortal, but the reviewer had been in attendance last night and had nothing but high praise for the endeavor.

Thank the gods. The risks had paid off, and Immortal had debuted with all the acclaim Thran could have hoped for.

Bard gave Thran a sideways glance. “What was he on about? A ‘troubled production?’ Did I miss something?”

Thran grinned. “I do not think so, my saint. There was Kiefer, there was the tight budget, there was the clamorous appeal to donors, there were so many things to do and not enough time to do them. You knew of all of these things. Perhaps the only thing you did not account for was the media’s penchant for drama... a penchant our PR person might have fed to some small extent.”

“Drama sells better than smooth sailing, you mean.”

“Exactly so, my saint.”

Thran’s mobile rang. They exchanged glances again, as Thran dug into his shorts pocket for the device.

“Hello, Thran? Ori here.”

“Good morning, Ori! You are well today, I hope?”

“I’m over the moon, Thran, and I hope you are, too. Have you seen any of the reviews?”

“Our Sigrid left me a note before she went to work. Bard and I have just seen several. I am delighted.”

“The clamor’s already started, and I expect today to be frantic. We could schedule a performance for every night of the festival and still not meet demand, so that may lead to some questions about moving to another venue after the festival. I’ll keep an eye on that for us. But I wanted to ask you about something... what if we record the next two performances of Immortal, and then offer a nice DVD for sale? We could give a portion of the receipts to the school if you’d like, but more importantly, it’d provide a good source of funds for UVB.”

“Which would be most appreciated,” Thran agreed at once. “I like that idea very much, Ori.”

“Great! Lettie’s already on board with the idea, so I’ll let her know that you are, too, and I’ll set it up for Wednesday and Saturday.”

“That is wonderful! Thank you for looking out for us.”

“For me, too. I told Nori I’d taken the job you offered me.”

“Suka blyad,” Thran gave an exaggerated wince. “Should I expect retribution?”

Ori’s chuckle was without irony. “He’d already resigned himself to my defection. He wished me well, and UVB, too. I did tell him I’d still look into a few of his knottier data things on occasion, so he was satisfied. So you’re in the clear.”

“That is even more wonderful news. I could not be more delighted. I would be lost without you, and so would Irmo and Lettie.”

“I appreciate the kind words, Thran. Anyway, we’re a success, so take today and celebrate.”

“I will. Oh! Before you go, have you heard how Mike is? Can we visit him yet?”

“He’s still in the ICU, but if all goes well he’ll move to a regular room tomorrow or Tuesday. Then we’ll be able to visit.”

“Let me know when we can. I want to see him. I owe him many, many thanks.”

“I will.”

“Thank you, Ori. Now, do not let Immortal take all of your day today. Make sure you celebrate, too.”

“Thanks! I’ll call you if anything important comes up, but more than likely I’ll see you tomorrow at the school.”

“I will see you then, mon cher. I thank you for the good news.”

Thran clicked off his mobile and relayed the gist of the discussion to Bard, who chuckled at Nori’s reaction to Ori’s permanent status at UVB.

“That’s stellar. UVB got half again as far as it did because that young man can cut a deal like no one but Nori himself. And he’s not nearly so intimidating to his friends. That’s just stellar.”

“Agreed. So how should we celebrate?”

“I have take the tuxes back to the mall once the lads get up, but other than that, the day’s yours. What would you like to do?”

Thran sighed. “So many possibilities... You will think me most perverse, lyubov moya, but... after we return the suits, would you consider a trip to the secondhand shops? I have not gotten to do that since... hmmm, since we bought the children’s bookcase desks, I think? I would like to do something for us today, not the dance.”

“That’d be great,” Bard agreed. “The perfect thing for a summer day.”

They perused more of the links that Sigrid provided while they waited for the children to wake up. With each one he read, his worry receded a little more. He refused to think of what would come after this triumph – he wanted to savor it to its fullest first. Cusp or not, it was a moment that he wanted to linger.

* * *

Eventually Bain, Legolas, and Tilda appeared for breakfast. When they’d exclaimed over the flowers and eaten their breakfasts, everyone dressed for their foray to the mall. As Thran came out of the closet looking elegant in sand-colored cotton trousers, long-sleeved Philippine shirt of the lightest white embroidered cotton, and a wide brimmed Panama hat, Bard looked him up and down and gave a low whistle.

“Except for the braid, you look like a nineteen-forties film star. Very elegant.”

Thran gave him a mischievous smile. “Thank my pale skin. It is very easy for me to get a sunburn, so I must cover up.”

“Good point. But you’re still very elegant. I’ll have to step up my game.”
“Thank you, lyubov moya. We will make time to take you shopping.”

“We’d better. I want to look respectable next to you. Today, though, you’ll just have to slum with a welder in shorts and a tee.”

“Wear that tropical shirt I have seen on your side of the closet. Then you will look artistic. Or would you prefer to borrow my Wolverine tee that Legolas gave me for Christmas?”

Bard laughed. “I’d forgotten about that Hawaiian thing. I wonder if it still fits?”

It did, but just barely; Bard’s daily chin-ups had broadened his shoulders to the point that he could hardly button the shirt across his chest.

“I think I’d better wear a tee.”

“I like it,” Thran purred, flicking a finger at the offending button to pop it open. “Much better.”

Bard snorted. “I’m definitely wearing a tee. I don’t need to prove to the rest of the world that my husband can undress me that easily.”

“Mmm, the idea,” Thran purred again, smiling. “Perhaps you will wear it later so I can see just how fast I can get you out of it.”

“Bastard.” Bard threw the shirt at him and dug in to his dresser for a clean blue tee. “Let’s roust the troops before you decide you don’t want us to leave the bedroom today.”

“Such a temptation,” Thran eyed Bard up and down as he pulled the tee over his head. “I will resist for now. Later tonight, perhaps not.”

“Neither will I, so you’ll be in just as much trouble as I will.”

“What a delightful prospect.”

“You trill like a cheetah,” Bard snorted as he stuffed his wallet in his back pocket and prodded Thran towards the door. “Come on, kitty, kitty. Return the suits, then secondhand shops.”

They collected the boys and Tilda, and made their run to the mall. Returning the suits took only a few minutes, but the trip out of the mall took longer. Tilda saw a cute sundress that she asked to try on, then the boys saw tees, then Thran saw a shirt for Bard in the import shop. When they finally emerged from the mall, all of them but Thran had a bag. Most of the bags held old clothes, because after Tilda insisted on wearing her airy blue sundress, the boys had followed suit. They forged out of the mall, then headed for the nearest secondhand shop.

They passed the late morning and early afternoon in leisurely fashion, browsing in one shop after the other. Despite the heat, it was a welcome respite from the weeks of Thran’s grueling rehearsals and Bard’s labors on the house. Was this a sign of things to come? He’d hadn’t been aware of the sensation in the mall, but here in the secondhand shops, the change in his life was obvious. What a relief it was not to consider every penny when Tilda and Bain found a couple of books, or Legolas found a used videogame. When Bard saw a quartet of crystal vases for the flowers, a folding Moroccan side table for the solarium, and a round, fringed Chinese rug for the bedroom landing, he didn’t hesitate. They were things they needed, discarded things that needed a new home, and Bard was grateful that he had the wherewithal to buy them.

Oh, there was another sign of how life had changed – Thran wasn’t able to browse as much as he wanted, as several people approached him to offer compliments on last night’s premiere. Likely his husband had expected this, given the care he’d taken with his appearance. He was used to being something of a public figure, but this was the first time Bard had seen Thran deal with so many admirers. How gracious his husband was, despite the frequent interruptions. Bard filed that away – from now on, Thran would attract more attention, and in time, maybe Bard would, too. He’d take pains to do Thran justice when they were out together, both in bearing and appearance.

Yet another reason to appreciate his change in finances – he certainly had some thinking to do when he looked for new summer clothes. Just exactly how did a saint dress to complement an angel? He was still smiling about that when Thran escaped the attentions of the most recent admirer.

“Your adoring public.” Bard gave him a commiserating smile.

Thran sent a chagrined look skyward before he met Bard’s eyes again. “I expected some, but not so many. Who knew that so many people who frequent junk shops also like the ballet?”

“We’re here, aren’t we?” Bard chuckled. “I’m sorry you haven’t gotten to look as much as you wanted to.”

“We will be back again. Besides, I have seen very little I want today, other than the rug you bought. I like that very much. The sage green background will complement the landing paint exactly, and the rose, green, and purple medallion and border are beautiful. Though I did see a silver gilt table that might suit the main room, but I was intercepted before I got to look closer.”

“Where is it? Let’s look now while we have the chance.”

“In that far room, I think. I caught only a glimpse. Perhaps it has a Greek Key motif around the edge? That is one of my favorite patterns...”

They ventured into the far room, both of them signaling the children where they were headed. The children trailed along behind.

“That one in front of the sofa?” Bard questioned, as he homed in on the table. But Thran hesitated, and veered off to the left. “Wait – that’s not it? Oh!”

Thran had found a dusty piano – no, two of them. One was a pale brown upright, but it was the ebony baby grand that had drawn Thran. He opened the keyboard cover to stroke the keys.

“A piano?” Tilda questioned, coming up beside them. “This is a great big one.”

“It is not a grand piano, only a baby grand.” Thran stroked the keys with a light finger. As the boys came to see what was so interesting, he pressed one key, getting a soft note in response.

“Do you know how to play it?” Bain asked.

Thran nodded. “Though I have not for some years.”

“Give it a go,” Bard urged.

“Yes, play something, Papa,” Legolas asked.

“Yes, do!” Tilda clapped in anticipation.

Bain and Legolas grabbed the bench in front of the upright and slid it in front of the larger instrument. Thran sat down to play a few slow bars of a Viennese waltz. But then he gave a mischievous wink to Bard, and launched into his favorite Maple Leaf Rag. The piano was out of tune, so the results were not as on key as they might have been, but it was still a jaunty rendition, and good enough to merit applause from his family when he was done.

“I have not had the pleasure to play for too long,” Thran said ruefully, stroking the keys. “This is a good piano, though clearly it is out of tune.”

“Will you buy it, Ada?” Tilda asked.

“I do not think so, Kukla. It needs work, and it is likely expensive.”

The children murmured understanding, but when Thran got up from the bench, he cast a look back at it, which tugged at Bard.

You’ve been thinking of the future all morning. There’s no reason to stop now.

“Why not, angel?” Bard nudged him as they walked away. “If it’s in good shape, isn’t a terrible price for a baby grand, and you’d play it, why not? Besides, if you ever decide to teach master classes in the ballroom, or have UVB in to dance regularly, you’ll need a piano, won’t you?”

Thran gave him a long look, then looked back at the piano.

“Go on, look it over,” Bard urged. “If you don’t look, you’ll always wonder whether it was junk, or the one that got away.”

It took a few seconds for Thran’s smile to appear, and when it did, it was half accusation, half anticipation. “You are a child of the devil.”

“And you’re the angel who freed the djinni from his servitude to spend your life with him. Go look at the piano.”

After much probing and study, another round of Scott Joplin ensued, which drew the proprietor to appear. Bard left the haggling to Thran, so he ambled over to look at the table that had been the original reason why they’d ventured into this room. It needed a glass top, but the wooden frame was sturdy and the gilt wasn’t tarnished or spotty, and the openwork edge did feature the Greek Key design that Thran liked. It’d match his cushy sofa very well. He ambled back to Thran and the proprietor to see if that would provide any leverage or incentive.

“... meet in the middle?” Thran was saying. He saw Bard’s quirked eyebrow. “Yes, lyubov moya?”

Bard leaned in to whisper in Thran’s ear. “Table’s good. Seventy-five.”

Thran straightened without reacting, so Bard ambled away again.

“I agree to that price if you also throw in that oval silver gilt table over there.”

The deal was struck. The piano and the table would be delivered sometime next week.

Clan Ffyrnig celebrated the deal with a late lunch at the Blue Mountain Bistro, which Sigrid laughingly prepared and delivered.

“Did you look at your email?” she asked, sitting down beside Legolas after she’d arranged their plates.

“We did,” Thran smiled. “I am very happy indeed. So here we are to celebrate so many wonderful reviews.”
“We’re celebrating the piano, too,” Tilda piped up.

“The piano?” Sigrid’s brow wrinkled. “What piano?”

“The one Papa just bought,” Legolas grinned.

“It was your Da’s fault,” Thran winked at Bard. “So in a few days, the ballroom will be properly fitted with a piano.”

“That’s awesome,” Sigrid exclaimed. “And let’s see... Til’s got a new dress, and I’ve never seen either of those tees before. You all have been on a tear.”

“Da got a shirt. And we got a rug and a table and four vases and two books, too, Sigrid,” Tilda said excitedly.

“And a video game,” Legolas amended with a grin.

“Oh, a junk shop run,” Sigrid nodded. “I’m sorry I missed it.”

“We’ll be back before long,” Bard assured her. “The house is still half empty.”

“Not for long,” Sigrid said with a confident shake of her head, as she got up to fetch the clan’s gelato. “With Clan Ffyrnig on the hunt, the junk shops don’t stand a chance.”

* * *

Shortly before midnight, the children had gotten their showers and were in bed, restoring themselves for camp tomorrow. Bard, however, wasn’t quite ready for bed yet, and descended from the bathroom to settle in the solarium. The blue lanterns shone dimly, and the lotus lamp on the marble-topped table glowed gold at its heart. The fountain bubbled softly, and the air smelled fresh and green. Clad only in a pair of sleep shorts, Bard settled onto the fainting couch, and idly swirled the contents of his glass while he waited for Thran to appear. He had only a few minutes to wait before Thran padded into the solarium; the elegant dancer hadn’t bothered to belt his blue cotton kimono, which more than hinted at the beautiful body underneath. Bard hummed in appreciation as he looked him up and down.

“You look comfortable, lyubov moya,” Thran murmured, smiling.

“You look delicious.”

“What do you drink?”

Bard handed Thran his glass for a sip. “Just some very cold water with a wedge of lime. Cool for the summer.”

“Very refreshing.” Thran handed Bard’s glass back and sat on the end of fainting couch to gaze around the solarium. “This is such a beautiful room.”

“A beautiful room for a beautiful dancer.”

“As well as a beautiful artist.”
“A striking couple.” Bard saluted Thran with his glass. “Has it sunk in yet that Immortal’s a big success?”

Thran crossed one knee over the other, interlaced his fingers around his knee thoughtfully, and after some seconds shook his head. “Not entirely. A little, after all the compliments paid to me during our travels today. I try not to think about it so much.”

“You never impressed me as someone who was uncomfortable with the fame aspects. You are so graceful in public.”

“Thank you,” Thran nodded. “I am not uncomfortable, but I do not like the ego of those who think they are superior when they are the media’s darlings. Ego does not make me a better dancer – in fact, it can make me a worse one, if I think I no longer have to work to be the dancer I want to be. Tomorrow I will be back in the studio, at the barre, just as any other dancer is who labors to coax perfection from his body.”

“You’ve already done a good job of that.” Bard sat up, picked up the end of Thran’s braid, and dusted it down Thran’s sternum. “I’ve got the sketches to prove it, too.”

Thran leaned forward to brush a kiss on Bard’s lips. Bard kissed back, taking his time, savoring each nuzzle and nip.

“I told Ori last night, and he agreed with me, that life will change now that Immortal’s live. The festival performances will be just the start of it. Someone will want to put on more performances somewhere, so lots of new opportunities will open up. Whatever you choose to do with them, I’ll support.”

“I will not be the only one with new opportunities,” Thran observed. “You already attract notice with your sketches and sculpture. So life will change for both of us.”

Bard nodded. “Not the important things, though. Our children, our home, each other.”

“Those stay constant,” Thran agreed. “Out in the world, you may be the eminent artist, and I the eminent dancer, but here is our reality.”

“I’d hoped you’d say that,” Bard breathed, nipping at Thran’s lips.

“You did not,” Thran nuzzled back. “You knew that is what I would say, just as you would.”

“True. So let’s see if we agree about this next bit.” Bard set his water glass aside. “What should two such eminent people do in private to celebrate the successful culmination of so much hard work?”

Thran’s eyebrows went up at Bard’s sly expression, then he grinned gleefully. “We go upstairs and fuck like rabbits?”

Bard nipped at the hollow at the base of Thran’s throat. “I was thinking we go out to the gazebo and fuck like stealthy teenagers.”

Mosquitos, heat, the potential for discovery... “You truly are the devil’s child.”

“Where’s your sense of adventure, angel? Here’s our chance to court scandal, or at least outrage the neighbors.”

“You are not the devil’s child. You are the devil himself.”
“I’ll take that as a yes.” Bard grabbed Thran’s hand and pulled him out of the solarium door and across the darkened back yard to the gazebo. Thran went without resistance, smothering laughter until they reached the garden folly. Before his husband could protest, Bard backed him up to the balustrade at the back of the gazebo, went to his knees, and nuzzled Thran’s robe aside enough to engulf Thran’s cock in his mouth. He was rewarded with a soft, sudden gasp of breath, then a sudden tension in Thran’s body, then the sudden hardening of Thran’s cock. It was so easy to enhance Thran’s pleasure – he kneaded firm glutes with practiced fingers, with each pass teasing closer and closer to Thran’s opening. When Thran’s cock grew too large for Bard to take all of it in his mouth, he wrapped one hand around it to stroke in time to his licking and sucking. He hummed softly, letting the vibrations further entice Thran towards release. When he finally ran fingers over Thran’s opening, even teasing inside, Thran could not resist, and spasmed hard. His moans grew so loud that he pressed both hands over his mouth, leaving Bard to work him through his climax.

Bard swallowed everything that Thran gave him, and held him until he was steady on his feet again. He pressed a kiss just above Thran’s spent cock, then sprinkled more up Thran’s abdomen and chest as he rose. He briefly suckled both nipples before he straightened. Just for effect, he dragged his forearm across his mouth and pressed his last kiss on Thran’s lips.

“Ty grebanyy huiesos,” Thran whispered, before returning Bard’s kiss with another full of tongue. “You suck me off far better than that stealthy teenager you tell me of. You could make a fine living at it.”

“I specialize in services provided exclusively to a certain elite dancer I could mention. That was tonight’s special. An even hundred, thank you very much, and a steal at twice the price,” Bard shot back with a grin.

“That much?”

“I don’t work cheap.”

“Suka blyad, I do not have a single centime in my pocket.” Thran slipped his hand inside Bard’s shorts and cupped a hand over his cock to rub slowly. “You will have to take it out in trade.”

Gods, those long, slender fingers wrapped around his cock and possessed it like they never intended to give it back. When soft lips and fingers descended to tease his nipples, Bard could think of nothing else but the delight that flowed throughout his body. How he ended up pressed back against the balustrade where Thran had been so transfixed, he didn’t know, or care. He leaned back as an ethereal shadow in the dark fell to his knees to return the blessing Bard had offered. His pleasure spiked so high that he had little time to savor the warm, wet caresses on his cock before he shot right to orgasm. Now it was he who clutched at the shoulders of the one who consumed him, and he who had to stifle his cries of release.

“Oh, gods,” Bard breathed, as Thran rose to envelop him in his arms. “That was a rush.”

Soft chuckles whispered in his ear. “I take it that my bill is paid in full, yes?”

“An understatement.” Bard exhaled, savoring the lassitude that followed his release. “Gods, I’ve spent all day thinking about how our lives are about to change. But here’s one thing that won’t – we know how to enjoy ourselves.”

“Flagrantly.” Teeth nipped at the lobe of Bard’s ear, then tugged gently on the earring that pierced it. “That is because we are in love. No matter what comes, I want that never to change.”

Bard grinned. “Imagine if it gets better with age.”
“We will explode,” Thran snorted. “I prefer to leave the explosions to the boys.”

Thran slapped his forearm. “I think they descend now.”

“Time to go. Hmm, I seem to be hot and sweaty again.”

“Imagine that.”

“I’ll need another shower before I get into bed.”

“A quick one,” Thran said, wrapping his robe around him as they padded back to the house. “Otherwise, we will have to wait until morning to fuck like rabbits.”

“A horrible prospect,” Bard agreed, laughing.

They turned off the lights and fountain in the solarium, rinsed off their exertions, and helped each other to bed.

The future beckoned brightly.

Chapter End Notes

Dear Readers (and you are dear to me),

I began what I thought was a "short" holiday tale 14 months ago, and, look what happened! The "short" tale turned into a saga of almost a million words. That is mind-boggling - what WAS I thinking?

I have made so many friends during the telling of Clan Ffyrnig’s amazing eight-month journey from dire need to bountiful bliss. Thank you for reading along with me through thick and thin. Your encouragement, enthusiasm, all the comments, and so much help have been the best gifts I could have asked for.

I particularly thank johnnysmitten for letting her Hal and Ari come over to play. I also thank RhosgobelRabbit and Wenderful52 for proofreading. Hail to MaleficentGirl for all the recipes and just plain attitude, MirkyKing and Leemitage for general gleeful enthusiasm, MirkyKing and plotbunniesincolour for their wonderful artwork, Morkovna and Fen_Assan for Russian help, emilyclad for French help, revoluutions for Welsh help, and judge_fudge for ballet help. You all went above and beyond!

The rest of you were no slackers, either. So many of you offered your perspective, advice, and general enthusiasm without stint. One reason this tale is so long is because so many of you had so many interesting and intriguing observations about the characters and story that I just galloped along after. Thank you so, so much!

I am off now to finish the tale I interrupted to write this one, "Rites of Passage," about young Fili and Kili. I hope you all will take a peek at that one if you're interested. In the meantime, please check out "Summer Heat," the short tale that follows this one in "The Angel and The Saint" series. It's a new one that ties up a few loose ends from this long saga, and gives us a glimpse of what follows for Clan Ffyrnig.
After "Rites of Passage" is done, let's all hope the muse decides to revisit Clan Ffyrnig. I will miss funny Kukla, sassy Bain, gentle Legolas, spirited Sigrid, and of course, the ethereal angel Thran and his hunky saint Bard. They have been wonderful companions, and I will miss them.

Namaste,

the Eldritch Mage
Hi, all,

I wanted to share the good news that came in the post today - I received the certificate of registration for my ballet treatment for "Immortal!" In other words, "Immortal" is my copyrighted work, which is amazing. My treatment includes the story, stage setup, costume designs, and so forth.

I'll probably grin like a fool for a week, but I don't care.

Thanks to so many of you who supported me as I wrote "Season of Light and Shadow," cheered me on with comments and kudos, and loved Clan Ffyrnig as much as I did. You are all awesome!

Kind Regards,

Eldritch Mage

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!