A Shadow and a Wolf

by Gracques

Summary

Tyrion Lannister weds Sansa Stark and everything goes as it happened in the show. However, just before Joffrey's wedding, an unexpected event changes everything. The forced husband and wife will have to go beyond their family loyalties in order to survive and hope to win the game of thrones.

Notes
Author's Note: This is the first story I publish but I intend it to be long. I already have about sixty chapters that are planned and it is going to grow. I'll do everything to publish at least one chapter every week and hope to do even more.

In this Game of Thrones FanFiction, one event is going to change the whole story of Westeros and Essos. It follows the events of the TV series, though I will borrow some elements from the books when they don't contradict the series. The first chapters may seem to be a repetition of the TV show, but something different will happen close to Joffrey's wedding. In fact, I tried to imagine what might happen if THIS event happened in the show, how would the story change with it. I'll try to make it as realistic as possible.

The story will first focus on Tyrion and Sansa, but will expand to all the other characters as it moves forward. I hope you enjoy to read it as much as I enjoy to write it.

If you find the first chapters boring because they repeat a lot from the show, you may skip immediately to chapter 23 (Tywin III) where the story starts to diverge from the canon.
Tyrion Lannister straightened up in his chair. It was the end of afternoon and sunset was coming. The end of the day, though it was no end for him. His duties as Master of Coin were tiresome, even more than those he had when he was acting Hand of the King it seemed. In fact, Tyrion worked as hard as in these times, the difference was he couldn’t enjoy it. When he was acting Hand, people would bow before him, pay him respect even if they had none for him. He was also able to neutralize his sweet sister schemes and plots against him. He discovered that he was very good at wielding power and enjoyed it, even if that was to protect his repulsive nephew. But he was also proud of what he did at this time, he felt useful for his family and, even more surprising, for the people. His father had trusted him enough to name him at this position, going as far as calling him “son”. Well, he hadn’t called him that, but for probably the first time he had acknowledged him as his son. Tyrion had wanted to prove himself worthy of House Lannister and he had. He managed to control Joffrey more than Cersei would ever have been able and he saved the city, leading its defenses during the battle. For that he earned his ugly scar… and the less desirable position on the Small council.

The Realm was tens of millions golden dragons in debt towards the Iron Bank of Braavos. It was the priority, but he also had to be sure the crown had enough to pay back its debts towards his father. Then came House Tyrell (their new ally), the Faith of the Seven, several eastern banks and cartels from Tyrosh and a few minor houses. The debts were so high Tyrion had no idea how the crown would be able to pay them back. The repayment to the Iron Bank was the priority or else Braavos would start to fund Stannis, Robb Stark, Balon Greyjoy and who know else against them. He could persuade the Tyroshi to delay the payment as long as the interests would accumulate, perhaps do the same with the minor houses and the Faith (he helped to bring the present High Septon to his position). Lord Mace Tyrell would probably be ready to do anything to please the king, Tyrion could even hope he would forget about the gold Joffrey owned him, but Lady Olenna wouldn’t. As for Tywin Lannister, the Lord of Casterly Rock would never forget the debts towards him, no matter what happened. He would be as ruthless as the Iron Bank on this.

Tyrion couldn’t fail. He would never give the pleasure to his father to show the world his second son was unworthy and unable to carry out his duties. Tyrion needed to find new sources of revenues, but with winter coming he couldn’t raise new taxes on harvests or trade. They needed to fill granaries before it was too late or else hundreds of thousand people would starve to death in the Riverlands, the Westerlands, the Stormlands and the North. So Tyrion had turned to reducing expanses once it was evident little could be done to raise new revenues. The sooner the war would be over the better for that, but he had no control over it, not anymore. At last Lady Olenna Tyrell agreed to cover half the expanses for the royal wedding last week, which was very good considering it was extravagant. “What good is the word extravagant if it can’t be used to describe a royal wedding,” she said. Anyway, extravagant or not, Tyrion saved a great amount of money with this. However, he would have to find new ways to reduce expenses and bring some more revenues to prevent the realm to go bankrupt.

He was looking at the sunset, lost in his thoughts, when his quire entered.

“My lord, you wanted to remind you when it would be time,” Podrick said.

“You’re a good lad Pod. I’ll have you knighted someday,” Tyrion replied. He nearly forgot it with all the work he had to do. Pod could spill wine, but he had a very good memory. He never forgot anything.

With a resigned sigh, Tyrion rose, grabbed one of his ledgers and went to the Tower of the Hand. His father had summoned him to meet him in his solar at this hour and he had charged Podrick with the task of reminding him. He would bring the good news that he saved a tremendous amount of money for the crown a few days ago. His father wouldn’t be pleased, and that was the reason why Tyrion would tell him. You won’t get rid of me so easily father. You won’t get a single opportunity to say I’m useless and incapable. After a short walking in the corridors of the Red Keep and a breathless climb of numberless stairs, he finally reached the top of the Tower and entered the new Small council chambers. His father sat at the end of the table, but someone else was sitting at his left, near the other end.

“You’re late,” stated his father.

“What’s she doing here?” Tyrion asked, hinting at Cersei’s presence.

“Our business concerns her too. Sit.”

Tyrion sat on the other side, face to face with his sister who was looking intently at him. He decided to ignore her.

“You’ll be pleased to learn that after one conversation with Olenna Tyrell, I’ve saved the crown hundreds of thousand on this wedding,” he said, trying to be a disappointment to his father’s hopes as usual.

“Never mind that now. We have something important to discuss,” his father replied.

“I’m Master of Coin. Saving money is important.”

Cersei didn’t stop looking at him with a little smile all this time. It bored him.

“Stop that,” finally returning her gaze. “You’re making me uncomfortable.”

His father chose that moment to speak of the subject he summoned him for. “Your sister has learned that your new friends the Tyrells are plotting to marry Sansa Stark to Ser Loras.”

“Very well,” Tyrion said, a little bit surprised. “She’s a lovely girl. Missing some of Loras’ favorite bits but I’m sure they’ll make do,” he added in a mocking tone. Though Loras will be a far better husband for Sansa than Mad King the Second. Better someone who loves cocks than someone who loves to beat you.

“Your jokes are not appreciated.”

“It wasn’t my best, but I thought—”

“I bring them into the royal fold and this is how they repay me, by trying to steal the key to the North out from under me.”

“Sansa is the key to the North? I seem to remember she has an older brother,” Tyrion pointed.

“The Karstarks have marched home. The young wolf has lost half his army. His days are numbered. Theon Greyjoy murdered both his brothers. That makes Sansa Stark the heir to Winterfell. And I am not about to hand her over to the Tyrells.”
That was news. Tyrion was aware of the murders of his cousins Willem and Martyn by the hand of Rickard Karstark. He had been horrified by this. They were the twin sons of his uncle Kevan, only fourteen-years-old. Squires. Children. Nothing more. The sons of an uncle who always showed him respect. And Lord Karstark had killed them to avenge the death of his own two sons who died fighting. Robb Stark reacted by beheading his lord bannerman. Tyrion would have sent him to the Wall instead, they needed men more than ever now. An honorable decision, but a foolish one nonetheless. The son of Ned Stark should have taken Lord Karstark hostage and forced his men to fight alongside him if they wanted their lord to be released once he would win. And if the young king was defeated, he could give Lors Karstark to Joffrey for better terms of surrender. But the boy made the same mistakes than his father, acting with honor without considering the consequences. There were the consequences. Half his men had deserted him. He would never be able to defeat the Tyrell-Lannister alliance now, no matter what he did. His father would crush him. And of course, if Robb Stark died, Sansa was the Lady of Winterfell. Who controlled Sansa controlled the North and his father would make sure it was the Lannisters.

Tyrion didn’t really like the King in the North. When he came to Winterfell after his visit to the Wall, the young lord had given him a very cold welcome. Now Tyrion knew why. He thought Tyrion and his family had tried to kill his brother, not without good cause. If only Jaime and Cersei had been more discrete. How much blood was shed because of this? However, Tyrion admitted he understood the young man. What would he do himself if the Starks had Jaime beheaded? And Tyrion couldn’t help but feel sad about Bran and Rickon. He remembered the smile the cripple boy had on his face when Tyrion told him he would ride again. He didn’t seem to have smiled much for the last days at this moment. Did he have enough time to try the saddle I gave him the plans for? As for Rickon, how old was he? Six? Seven? It seemed there was nothing good in the Greyjoys. All they were capable of was plundering, murdering, slaughtering, and betraying now. He could still smell the burning sailors in Lannisport, ten years later. He turned his attention back to the conversation.

“The Tyrell army is helping us to win this war. Do you really think it’s wise to refuse them?”

“There’s nothing to refuse. This is a plot. Plots are not public knowledge. And the Tyrells won’t carry this one out until after Joffrey’s wedding. We need to act first and kill this union in its crib.”

“And how do we do that?” Tyrion asked. He already knew the answer.

“We find Sansa Stark a different husband,” his father replied.

“Wonderful.” Of course, that’s what his father would do. Sansa was the king’s ward, the Hand could marry her to whoever he wanted. Who would the girl have the misfortune to wed? Lancel? Cleos? Tion?

“Yes, it is.” For the first time in the meeting, Cersei spoke. She stared at Tyrion, a great smile upon her lips. Tyrion stared back, not understanding first. Then, as he understood, he turned to his father who looked back at him very seriously.

“You can’t mean it,” Tyrion said in a low voice. He can’t really think about it.

“I can and I do,” his father replied, as if he was stating an evidence.

Tyrion couldn’t believe it. “Joffrey has made this poor girl’s life miserable since the day he took her father’s head. Now she’s finally free of him and you give her to me? That’s cruel, even for you.”

“Do you intend on mistreating her?” His father seemed more curious than concerned and his next words proved it. “The girl’s happiness is not my concern, nor should it be yours.”
“She’s a child!” Tyrion shouted.

Cersei chose this moment to stand in the conversation. “She’s flowered, I assure you. She and I have discussed it at length.”

“There, you see? You will wed her, bed her and put a child in her. Surely you are capable of that.” Tywin Lannister spoke without a hint of emotion. He didn’t care about the girl. He saw her as a tool to get his hands on the North, not as a frightened child who had been beaten and nearly raped since her father died before her eyes. He was going to force Tyrion upon her, a girl whose family was in war against his own, who was about twenty years younger than his second son, who hated the Lannisters with very good reasons… and who had Tyrion’s lover as her handmaiden.

Tyrion was angry and disgusted. Sansa was a person, not some child’s workshop. “And if I refuse?”

“You wanted to be rewarded for your valor in battle,” Tywin Lannister told him on a mocking tone. “Sansa Stark is a finer reward than you could ever dare hope for. And it is past time you were wed.”

“I WAS wed,” Tyrion stated firmly. That made his father turn his head. “Or don’t you remember?” He stared directly in the eyes of the man who sired him, daring him to deny it, to deny what he did to Tysha and what he forced Tyrion to do back then.

Tywin stared back, grinding his teeth, and let it out. “Only too well.”

Both of them stared at each other for a few seconds, while Cersei made a nasty comment that it was more than what Tyrion could hope for. Tyrion looked at the table. He couldn’t refuse. If he refused, his father would once again point that he was a burden and a shame to his family. Sansa was far from a bad match. The girl was lovely, young, beautiful, courteous, well educated, a real lady in every sense of the term. She was also intelligent, much more than most of the people would believe. Tyrion was still impressed by the way she had endured the bad treatments she was submitted to when he was acting Hand. She was also the heir to Winterfell, which means Tyrion could rule the North as regent if they had children. But still, she was a child. A flowered child perhaps, but still a child. Her father was killed by his own nephew, her family was in war against his. Sansa’s life would be miserable with him as her husband. She would never see him as something else than her goaler. They would never be happy together, especially more once her brother would be defeated. But Tyrion had no choice. Tywin would wed Sansa to another Lannister if Tyrion didn’t. Her life would be even more miserable with one of his cousins. There was no escaping, nor for him, nor for Sansa. While he was deep into his thoughts, the Hand of the King turned to the Queen Regent.

“Tyrion will do as he’s bid. As will you.”

“What do you mean?” Cersei asked, plainly unaware of their father’s meaning.

“You’ll marry Ser Loras.”

In other circumstances Tyrion would have laughed, but strangely he felt some pity for his sister on this moment. Now you know what it is like, big sister.

“I will not,” Cersei said, looking away. But she would, just like Tyrion would. No one could disobey Tywin Lannister.

“The boy is heir to Highgarden. Tyrion will secure the North, you will secure the Reach.”

“No, I won’t do it,” his sister repeated.

“Yes you will. You’re still fertile. You need to marry again and breed.”
“I am Queen Regent, not some broodmare.” Now Cersei was shouting.

“YOU’RE MY DAUGHTER! You will do as I command and you will marry Loras Tyrell and put an end to the disgusting rumors about you, once and for all.” Tywin spoke in a tone that let no place to discussion. But Cersei tried a last attempt. As usual, when orders wouldn’t work for her, she would plead.

“Father, don’t make me do it again please.”

“Not another word!” Tywin Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Warden of the West, Lord of the Westerlands, Shield of Lannisport and Hand of the King rose on his feet and looked down on his children with contempt. “My children! You’ve disgraced the Lannister name for far too long.”

As his father walked, Tyrion and Cersei stayed behind, deep in their thoughts. If they ever shared something, that was the contempt of their father for them. Except perhaps the love they had for Jaime, though it wasn’t the same sort of love. How am I going to announce it to Shae? She is not going to like it.
Tyrion I

Chapter Notes

First chapter of the story (I don't consider the prologue). Tyrion and Sansa get married.

One little thing, I must warn you English isn't my first language, so don't be too severe if sometimes I don't seem to write properly.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TYRION I

Tyrion stood near the marriage altar, on the top of the stairs, between the statues of the Father and the Mother. Here, in a few minutes, he would marry Sansa Stark. That wasn’t something he looked forward. Three weeks ago, he had gone to the young girl to tell her they were to wed very soon. He preferred to do it himself instead of Cersei. If Cersei had been the one to announce it, she would probably have come with a great smile upon her face, bringing a new gown for Sansa to try it. Once Sansa would have put the gown and it was arranged to fit her perfectly, Cersei would have revealed it was the gown she would wear for her wedding. Probably Sansa would believe it was her wedding with Loras Tyrell that the queen was talking about, unless she remembered Cersei wasn’t supposed to know about it, then she would suspect something was wrong. Then Cersei would tell her the truth, the wedding with her wretched brother with the big scar, the fact she had no choice but to do it since she was a hostage, probably going as far as wondering aloud if her children from him would have her traitor’s nature or his height.

But that wasn’t what happened. Instead Tyrion decided to tell it to Sansa himself. He hoped he could reveal it in a way that wouldn’t throw her in great despair. What a fool I was to believe it. No matter the way it was presented to her, she wouldn’t want it. He had gone to Sansa’s quarters and asked to see her. He couldn’t have chosen a worse moment. Sansa was trying a gown and was unfastening it when he entered. Even more, Shae was there. Tyrion was limiting his contacts with her since his father told him the next whore he would find in his bed would be hung, so he didn’t have an opportunity to tell her about his marriage. Sansa quickly put back the gown on herself, holding it with her hands. That made Tyrion quite uncomfortable. He wondered why. He had seen so many naked women in his life that he wasn’t able to remember a tenth of them, but he was afraid to see a northern girl wearing only a corset? Perhaps because all the women he saw naked before were whores when Sansa wasn’t. At least she didn’t seem annoyed and angry about his presence, she was even smiling. I’m probably the only lion who doesn’t savage wolves.

Then he had tried to send Shae outside, without success. Shae was suspicious ever since he had told her one day that Sansa was a great beauty. Of course she was, who could deny it, but she was a child. Tyrion had never desired her… or at least never wished to desire her. He had tried to warn Shae indirectly that she didn’t want to hear what he had to say right now, but there was nothing to do. So he had to announce to his lover and his bride-to-be the new at the same time. The shock on both their faces was quite obvious when he told them. Shae had recovered more quickly and her eyes had darted upon him. Tyrion quickly told Sansa that it was the decision of the king, that he didn’t choose it either and that the wedding would take place in three weeks. After some poor excuses, he retreated out of the chamber. There was nothing he could do.

Now, three weeks later, he was there, standing next to the High Septon who was talking to him about the chance he had to marry such a lovely and faithful woman, about his duties as husband and the vows he would take. Tyrion didn’t need a lecture. He knew everything about the Faith and its rituals. He was wed, a long time ago, and before that he had wanted to become High Septon. His encounter with Tysha changed his plans, but Tyrion didn’t forget easily. He could still recite entire passages of the Seven-Pointed Star by memory. If he hadn’t met Tysha, perhaps he would be there at the place of this man he helped to reach this position. No, instead he had fallen in love with a whore, only to see her raped and worse. And now here he was, forced to marry another girl, only this time she really was an innocent and mistreated girl. It was no act. And his father would force him on her.

Tyrion looked down at the few people who would attend the wedding. There were the members of the small council (his father, his sister, Varys, Pycelle), Bronn who was now a knight, Lady Tanda Stokeworth with her two daughters Falyse et Lollys (she hoped to convince Tyrion to marry the younger before the riot), the future queen, the Queen of Thorns, a few novices and other western and reach noblemen and noblewomen. They had to be about sixty or seventy. Quite little for the wedding of the heir to Winterfell. Sansa always dreamed of a great ceremony with hundreds, even thousands guests, a beautiful knight, a lord or even a king with strong arms to bring her under his protection. Instead, she would marry the Imp in what looked like a secret wedding. She doesn’t deserve this. She deserves someone better than me.

He saw his sister and Lady Margaery talking together, arms in arms. Or, to be more accurate, the Tyrell girl put her arm under Cersei’s and kept it here, no matter the efforts of Cersei to get away. Margaery was smiling as usual. She was a clever girl. To the opposite of Cersei and his father, Margaery understood it was better to have people do what you wanted because they loved you instead because they fear you. Fear could be useful, but if people feared something else more than they feared you, they wouldn’t follow you no matter how you threatened them. And once they only had their fear for you to lose, then you were done. Cersei never understood that. Fear was everything she inspired. At least his father inspired respect, but Margaery could inspire respect and love. And she had the power of the Reach behind her, so no need for her to hang someone for the people to fear what might happen to them if they tried anything against her. The Rose of Highgarden would make a very good queen. Tyrion only hoped Joffrey wouldn’t eventually break her as he nearly broke Sansa. He looked at the beautiful brown-haired girl, who was still smiling while Cersei talked to her. Perhaps she would manage to get along well with Joffrey. She seemed able to control him so far, something Cersei, Tyrion and even their father had difficulties with. And Joffrey wouldn’t dare so easily to mistreat the sole daughter of the Warden of the South. Sansa had no protection when she was betrothed to him. Her family away and in war against the king, her father dead, no one could protect her or dared to. No one but Tyrion and Shae. And the Hound, which was strange.

Tyrion suddenly saw Cersei pulling her arm away from Margaery’s grip. He listened closely. What he heard frightened him. “If you ever call me sister again I’ll have you strangled in your sleep.” The Queen Regent went away from the future queen, letting the Rose with a look between fright and astonishment. That wasn’t good. But future thoughts were banned as the doors of the Great Sept of Baelor flung open. People on the flooring moved and formed two lines, the Tyrells and the Reachmen on the right, the Lannisters and the other people on the left. Sansa came through the doors, two septas on her sides. In the sunlight and with her golden gown, she looked like an angel. Her face showed some nervousness, but nothing more. No joy, no anger, no sadness. She was hiding behind her armor of courtesies as usual. That was her shield, her only protection here in King’s Landing. Tyrion didn’t fault her, she did what she must to survive. But she should have smiled, laughed, be happy at her wedding. Again, Tyrion reflected she didn’t get what she deserved. Why must the innocents always suffer from the powerful?

And here he was, his nephew the king. Sansa’s father was dead, so it was the king who would deliver her to her husband. Joffrey escorted Sansa to the altar, a snooty grin on his lips. Bronn slightly bowed his head when she passed before him. Near the steps, she made what looked like a little smile when her eyes went towards Margaery. The two girls were friends. It was good, since Sansa had no friends in King’s Landing except Shae before the Battle of Blackwater. Tyrion and Shae had done everything they could to protect her from Joffrey in these times. Tyrion turned his eyes aside as his soon-to-wife approached. He protected her before, he would continue to protect her now, from Joffrey, Cersei, his father, the Tyrells, everyone. That was the least he could do. She had allowed herself a little smile when Tyrion had come to bring her to the ceremony sooner, after he promised her he would never hurt her. Tyrion meant it, and even more. He would not allow someone to hurt her again. Not even himself.

Sansa and Joffrey reached Tyrion’s level and then, Joffrey took the stool and brought him with him down the steps. Tyrion couldn’t do anything. What was his nephew hoping to gain from that? Another humiliation for a member of his family?

The High Septon began to speak. “You may now cloak the bride and bring her under your protection.”

Hesitantly, Tyrion unrolled the red cloak under his arm. It was huge, heavy, crimson velvet with lions and gold on it. A very beautiful cloak, even though he was sure Sansa wanted nothing of it. He didn’t see how he could put it on Sansa’s shoulders. She was nearly twice his height. What would it be once she is fully grown. Thrice his height? People were laughing in the Sept, Joffrey among all. At least the Tyrells, his father and his sister had the decency to not. His father stared at the little crowd and many stopped laughing at once. For a second he felt grateful for Cersei and their father, until he remembered they were responsible for this wedding. Without them, there would be no ceremony and no one would be here to laugh at him. Finally Tyrion moved forward a little on Sansa’s right, bringing her attention.

“Could you…?”
Dutifully, Sansa knelt on the floor and Tyrion wrapped in the Lannister cloak. “Thank you.”

They stood before the High Septon who then began his prayers. “Your Grace your Grace, my lords, my ladies, we stand here in the sight of gods and men to witness the union of man and wife. One flesh, one heart, one soul, now and forever.”

Many prayers followed, then Sansa and Tyrion hands were tied together with a ribbon to symbolize their union. Sansa’s hand was shaking at this moment. Tyrion tried to give her hand a reassuring squeeze but he didn’t know if it had the desired effect. Then they said their vows, not looking in each other eyes, and came after the hardest part, when he had to kiss Sansa. She knelt so he could do it, obedient as always and closed her eyes. She probably didn’t want to look at his ugly face. Tyrion put a light kiss on her lips, making it last only the necessary time. Sansa raised and they stood together up the steps, facing the guests as they applauded.

For the second time in his life, Tyrion Lannister was married. And this time, he wouldn’t allow anyone to hurt his wife. He had sworn to protect her and was determined to hold this one vow at least.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter is Tywin POV
Tywin Lannister was sitting uncomfortably in the Small Hall. The chair wasn’t the problem, it was his children and grand-children who made him uncomfortable. The Old Lion was a sober and frugal man who didn’t eat much. A cake half-finished was right before him but he didn’t take a second slice. Nor did he take a second cup of wine. The first was nearly finished, but some Arbor wine still laid at the bottom of the cup. He wasn’t thirsty nor hungry. He looked at his grandson taking another cup while his daughter was emptying her fourth. And this dwarf, newly wed, sat on the top of the dais with his wife, barely eating but drinking for ten men, which meant he was drinking for twenty dwarves or even more if we considered a dwarf wasn’t even worth half a man. There is my legacy. A band of drunken fools. A boy who reminded him the first king he served, a queen who thought herself clever when she wasn’t and a vile dwarf who killed his wife.

Tywin did everything for this little creature. Finally, after years he managed to find him a suitable wife. Once he impregnated her, he could claim and rule the North. Their first son could even become the heir to Casterly Rock if Jaime never returned. That was more than Tyron could ever hope, more than he deserved, he who was a perpetual embarrassment for the family. Tywin had tried several times to marry him, each time without success. With Elia Martell not long after his wife died, with Lysa Tully after Jaime donned this stupid white cloak. Yohn Royce and Leyton Hightower also refused when he proposed them, even the family of Delena Florent who Robert Baratheon disgraced in the wedding bed of his brother. Now he was married and, like always, he got himself drunk. The Lady Sansa could well seem uncomfortable her too. He didn’t dare to imagine how his own wife would react if he had behaved this way at their wedding. But that wasn’t what Tywin was concerned about. Drunk as he already was, Tyrion wouldn’t be able to perform his duty. They needed a Lannister child as quickly as possible, especially now that the young wolf’s host was heading towards the Twins.

Half the people were drunk, but Tywin wasn’t. Nor the Tyrells. The Queen of Thorns was detailing to her grandchildren all the family links that were created through the three marriages. Ser Loras finally rose, unable to support it. Tywin knew he wasn’t happy, but not because the Stark girl wouldn’t marry him. He was unhappy because he would marry his daughter. What a foolish boy he was. Tywin was offering him the most beautiful woman in the Seven Kingdom, a mirror of her lovely mother, the mother of the king, and the boy didn’t want her. Bored, Tywin went to talk with Ser Addam Marbrand, one of his bannermen’s son, now Commander of the City Watch. They quickly discussed about the security for the wedding and around the Red Keep, then of the state of the people in the streets. Ser Addam had nothing very important to report. He was drunk, which Tywin believed was a good sign since the Commander wouldn’t get drunk if he believed the streets weren’t safe. Tywin quickly turned around to see his daughter-in-law had left her husband. She was now talking with Varys and Tyrion was looking in their direction. Tywin chose this moment to remind him of his duties. He advanced until he was towering the little shit.

“You seem rather drunk.”

“Rather less than I plan to be,” the dwarf replied with a large smile. “Isn’t it a man’s duty to get drunk at his own wedding?”

Tywin ignored the jape. He had enough of them during his time as Hand of Mad King Aerys, a halfman wouldn’t bring again these days to him. “This isn’t about your wedding. Renly Baratheon had a wedding. Your wife needs a child, a Lannister child, as soon as possible.”

“And?”

He acted as if that wasn’t important. “If you’re going to give her one you need to perform,” stating the evidence. Did he forget what the true objective of the act after visiting so many whorehouses? Tywin wouldn’t be surprised by that. As usual he had to remind his children about their duty because of their stupidity.

“What did you once call me?” Tyrion said after another sip of wine. “A drunken little lust-filled beast.”

“More than once.”

“There you have it. Nothing to worry about. Drinking and lust, no man can match me in these things. I am the god of tits and wine. I shall build a shrine to myself at the next brothel I visit.”

As he brought his cup to his lips once more, Tywin caught it and put it abruptly on the table. That was enough. He didn’t care so much if this dissolute dwarf whored and drank as long as it was in a brothel or a tavern. These were the places for it. But they were at court, during a wedding, with their allies and enemies watching for every weakness to exploit. He made things clear enough.

“You can drink, you can joke, you can engage in juvenile attempts to make your father uncomfortable, but you will do your duty.”

Firm, Tywin shook his hand were some wine had slipped. Tyrion looked at him, holding his stare, even returning it. Easy for a drunken fool to look brave when he isn’t. Though that stare reminded Tywin of someone else’s stare. A stare he last saw twenty years ago. He pushed that thought aside and went back to his place while the Tyrells were looking at them, smiling. How much time must I support the mockery of other people because my family refuses to do what’s necessary for family.

Tywin Lannister devoted his entire life to the family, bringing back the Lannisters to their former glory and even more. He crushed the Tarbecks and the Reynes when they rebelled, became Hand of the King, had his daughter married to the new king when the mad one was gone. And now, he was fighting a war his children started. Tywin tried to teach all of them the importance to do their part for the family for forty years, as he did his own, and yet none of them seemed to understand it. None of them except Cersei perhaps, though she proved to be more than an inefficient ruler. She nearly destroyed their family with her mistakes. She and Jaime. And Tyrion too. Tyrion allowed Catelyn Stark to take him prisoner, which obliged Tywin to declare the war against Rivverun, then Winterfell. Jaime was so foolish in his pride that he attacked Ned Stark in the streets of King’s Landing, crippling him and preventing him to ride against Ser Gregor Clegane when Tywin sent him to ravage the Riverlands. Instead Ned Stark sent Beric Dondarrion, a man who refused to die no matter how many times he was killed. Tywin could have ended this in a few weeks if Jaime hadn’t attacked the Warden of the North, making a show of it. Then Tyrion escaped from his captivity and Robert Baratheon was dead, Ned Stark arrested. Things seemed to go well for them as Jaime
Then, everything fell amiss. The young wolf captured Jaime and lifted the siege of Riverrun. Foolish as he was, Jaime ran head down into the heart of the battle, getting himself captured while Cersei allowed her son to behead Ned Stark, then also lost one of the Stark girls. Renly and Stannis Baratheon took up arms against them, using their uncertain situation at their advantage, concocting a filthy lie that his grandchildren were the product of an incest. And everyone believed it. In these times, Tywin had no other choices. Even Kevan seemed helpless in this situation. But Tyrion wasn’t. He was wounded on the battlefield at the Battle of the Green Fork, but his savages slaughtered by themselves the two thousand men Robb Stark sent against them. Then Tyrion was the only one to point out peace was impossible since Ned Stark was beheaded by Joffrey, destroying his cup of wine to demonstrate it, something Tywin would never have thought possible. This drunken fool, breaking a cup of wine, even emptied. Perhaps he had been half-wrong, as the dwarf suggested him. He even warned him to not underestimate Robb Stark. And it proved to be true. Tyrion had been the only one to who he could turn for sorting the mistakes of the family. Tywin had made mistakes, Tyrion had, Cersei had, Joffrey had, Jaime had. He needed to correct it. And to Tywin’s great surprise, Tyrion succeeded. He managed the town very efficiently, fooled Varys, Baelish and Pycelle, convinced Catelyn Stark to free Jaime, managed to control Joffrey (mostly), made an alliance with Dorne, burned half of Stannis’s fleet with wildfire (only losing a single ship of the royal fleet in the process) and held back Stannis’s army long enough for his army to attack it from the back and scatter it. Grudgingly, Tywin had to admit he had been proud of Tyrion then. But that was before he discovered the other things he had done. Putting his pet sellsword in charge of the City Watch. Threatening his own sister for beating a whore. Sending whores to Joffrey to have them beaten. Drinking with thieves. Coming close to lose the last Stark hostage they had in the riot. Slapping Joffrey in front of his Kingsguards. Calling the king a half-wit in front of the whole court. Allowing Sandor Clegane to desert. Taking off his helmet during the battle, something even Jaime would never have done. Promising Catelyn Stark to free her daughters once Jaime would be back at the capital. All this Tywin learned it from Cersei. And Varys confirmed every fact Cersei gave him. Tyrion’s scar wasn’t a proof of bravery in battle, it was a proof of his foolishness. Tywin couldn’t risk Tyrion to cause any more shame to the family. As soon as he was reinstated in his position as Hand of the King, he stripped of their charges Tyrion’s men, paid the hill tribes so they would go home and moved Tyrion from the Tower of the Hand so he might reflect on his past actions. Tywin decided later to give him the office of Master of Coin on Bealish’s recommendation. There Tyrion would be useful, with reduced possibilities to make mistakes that would shame the family. And if he did, Tyrion would only say that he tried, as a father, to give his son a chance, a chance he failed to take, and that he wouldn’t allow his second son to occupy any important charges in the future to prevent such failures to happen. But so far, Tyrion gave him no reason to remove him from his position. He wasn’t as efficient as Baelish, but made a rather good job considering the circumstances. Making the Tyrells bear half the cost of this extravagant royal wedding was something. He wondered how he managed to convince the Queen of Thorns.

If he proved himself worthy in his task and if Jaime never came back, perhaps Tywin would allow him to act as regent for Casterly Rock and Winterfell until his sons with Sansa came of age. If he put children in the Stark girl of course, which Tywin doubted, seeing how the drunken lust-filled beast drank himself to death.

Suddenly, Tywin’s attention was attracted by clapping hands. Only one pair of hand. His grandson was standing over the dais along with Lady Sansa. “Time for the bedding ceremony,” the king announced. People cheered all over, especially those who were drunk. They began to gather around the dais to carry the groom and the bride to their bed. But not Tywin. Tywin hated that ceremony. He never liked it, but he started to hate it the day of his own wedding.

“There will be no bedding ceremony.” As drunken as he was, Tyrion still managed to speak.

“Where’s your respect for tradition, Uncle?” Joffrey brought Lady Sansa down as he continued to speak. He was clearly drunk. Much less than Tyrion, but when Tyrion was a shame when drunken, Joffrey was a danger and with much less wine. People continued to gather around the dais, but Tywin sat still. He noted Varys and the Tyrells did the same. But what was interesting was that Varys was sitting with the Tyrells. “Come, everyone. Pick her up and carry her to her wedding bed. Get rid of her gown. She won’t be needing it any longer. Ladies, attend to my uncle. He’s not heavy.”

“There will be no bedding ceremony.” Tyrion repeated. He was still drunk, but he seemed serious now.

“There will be if I command it.”

A dagger was planted in the table then. It was in Tyrion’s hand. “Then you’ll fucking your own bride with a wooden cock.” Tywin stood up. That was trouble. Is he trying to get himself killed? Tywin had supported humiliations during his own bedding ceremony forty years ago, so why not Tyrion too? But it was no matter now, he had to neutralize the situation before the king or his uncle did something foolish.

“What did you say?” Joffrey asked, looking around him as if he was searching for some confirmation of what he just heard. The king was there, mouth wide open. It was obvious he couldn’t believe what Tyrion said. “WHAT… DID YOU… SAY?!” The king screamed this time and Tyrion wouldn’t stop looking at him, anger and hatred filling his eyes. People were holding their breath for what would come next. He means to do it, he won’t hesitate, drunken or not. Tywin had seen this look on another face, thirty-three years ago. Two different looks in the same evening, from two different people, but they appeared on the very same face this very evening. Tywin knew from that look that Tyrion wouldn’t hesitate. So he stepped in.

“I believe we can dispense with the bedding, Your Grace. I’m sure Tyrion did not mean to threaten the king.” Tywin hoped Tyrion would catch the bait, or else there would be some kinslaying tonight. Tyrion closed his eyes and turned his head right, seeming to make some effort to think. Then he turned again towards the king, laughing. The dwarf had seen the bait and caught it.

“A bad joke, Your Grace. Made out of envy of your own royal manhood.” He was playing with his dagger as he spoke. “Mine is so small. My poor wife won’t even know I’m here.”

Tywin Lannister allowed a smirk, partly for the show, but also from satisfaction. “Your uncle is clearly quite drunk, Your Grace,” he observed. Tyrion may be a drunkard, but he was no fool as he realised at the Green Fork.

“I am. Guilty. But—” Tyrion stumbled over the dais, taking a last sip of wine. “But it is my wedding night. My tiny drunk cock and I have a job to do. Come, wife.” Lady Sansa followed reluctantly. She hadn’t moved all this time, just like everyone else in the hall. “I vomited on a girl once in the middle of the act. Not proud of it. But I think honesty is important between a man and wife, don’t you agree? Come, I’ll tell you all about it. Put you in the mood” The couple walked outside, no one talking except Tyrion. Tomorrow, Tywin would see if the dwarf did his duty. For now, he needed a good night of sleep. He had enough of this wedding. But before, he went to see his two most loyal and trustworthy guards.
“I want you to stay close to my son and his wife’s chambers for the whole night. Don’t let anyone get near it. Especially the king. And report to me anything you hear behind these doors.” They knew what he meant.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter is under production. It will be Sansa POV.
Sansa I

Chapter Notes

OK everyone, the first chapter from Sansa's POV. Up to now, she seemed quite discreet in the story, very passive, but that's not surprising since this is what Sansa tries to do in the TV show in order to survive. She will occupy a much more important place in the next chapters and it begins right now with her own chapter.

Remember this story is based on the TV show, the way Sansa feels toward Tyrion is different from the way she feels in the books.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

SANSAN I

What did he think he was doing? He could have gotten both of us killed? Though she had to admit she wasn’t frustrated to miss the bedding ceremony. Such were the thoughts of Sansa Stark as her husband led her to his chambers. Their chambers now, they were married. As they left the Small Hall, everything was silent. With his threat to Joffrey, Tyrion put an end to every conversation, every laugh, every whisper, every sound. Even the dead seemed afraid to move as Joffrey reached a level of anger he never achieved before. Well, except for the time he started a riot. In her childhood, Old Nan used to tell her stories about frightening monsters who lived thousands of years ago, like the White Walkers. Sansa hated these stories, but they were the favorite of her brother Bran, so she had to support them from time to time. Even them wouldn’t have dared to move at this moment, she was sure. But Tyrion managed to get out with his head and tongue intact, both of them, Tyrion laughing at his manly parts. A lucky thing he was drunk, or else he could be dead right now. And Sansa too.

“Sorry about that my lady.” Tyrion’s voice took Sansa out of her reflections as they went far from the hall. “This is no pleasant way to leave a wedding, but better than leaving through a bedding ceremony or without a head. I never quite liked my head, but I don’t want to see it removed yet.”

He didn’t seem as drunk as he was a minute ago. Was it possible it was only an act? A way to escape Joffrey’s fury? She couldn’t be sure, but with all the wine her lord husband drank during the feast, Sansa knew he must be drunk. No man could drink so much and say afterwards he was sober.

“There’s no need to apologize my lord. If it pleases my lord to leave the feast this way it doesn’t bother me,” Sansa replied, hiding behind her armor of courtesies as always.

“You’re a good liar, my lady. No wonder you managed to survive here.”

They stayed silent for the rest of the short walk. Sansa didn’t know if it was too short or too long. Each second spent in the corridors enhanced the chance for Joffrey to appear and execute his threat, or worse, but each second also delayed the moment Sansa should do her duty as wife. They finally reached the door and Tyrion opened it, allowing Sansa to enter first. When she entered she noticed several chests and books along with a couch on the right, but as she moved forward her eyes were attracted to the bed on her left. Their wedding bed.

Sansa turned her back to the bed, watching Tyrion close the door. It could be worse. I could be married to Joffrey. Sansa hoped Joffrey wouldn’t dare to come later in the night. He was a coward. After what Tyrion said at the feast, Sansa didn’t expect Joffrey to execute his threat to rape her. He feared his uncle. Joffrey would complain he was the king and could do as he like, but he never dared to do as he liked when someone dared to hold his line against him. And Tyrion would surely never let his nephew rape his wife. She remembered the time he came to her rescue when Joffrey had her beaten before the whole court. He had called him a half-wit then, something Sansa agreed with, though she would never say it loudly. If there was a Lannister she could expect protection from, it was Tyrion. Though Sansa would never trust him. She would never trust a Lannister again, not after what they did to her father. She wondered if Tyrion would be able to stand his ground in his current state.

He seemed to walk in her direction for a moment, but then turned right and walked over the table where a wine decanter stood. He began to fill himself a cup. “Is that wise, my lord?” Sansa asked. Why did he drink so much?

“Tyrion, Sansa. My name is Tyrion.”

“Is that wise Tyrion?” she corrected.

“Nothing was ever wiser.”

He sat on the end of the couch, looking at her with a strange expression. She couldn’t decrypt what it meant. As the silence lingered, Sansa grew more unsettled. She didn’t know what to do. What was going to happen? What would he ask from her? Septa Mordane never gave her much details about the intimate activities between husband and wife, only stating she would have to do her duty and satisfy her husband. She never was to take the lead. She had to wait for the man she would marry to tell her what to do. The only useful information she got from her septa wasn’t quite reassuring. It will hurt the first time, when your maidenhead will break. However it will become easier with time. You’ll come to enjoy your husband’s company, whoever he is. All men are beautiful. But Sansa couldn’t find this beauty in Tyrion. Even with what Margaery told her. The scar didn’t make him uglier, true enough, but he was still a dwarf. And a renowned whoremonger. The uncertainty of what would come caused Sansa to shiver.

“Astoundingly long.” Tyrion said suddenly.

“What?” What did he mean? What was long?

“Neck. You have one.” Sansa had no idea how she should react to this comment. He’s drunk.

“How old are you exactly?” he asked.

“Fourteen.” The answer she gave seemed to have some effect on him. He looked down, as if he was ashamed.

“Well, talk won’t make you any older.”

She realized he was as frightened as she was. That made her feel some pity for him, but didn’t help to stop her shaking. What sort of wedding night would it be with two people afraid to do the deed?

After another silence, Tyrion suddenly stood up. “My lord father has commanded me to consummate the marriage.” Not a single second he looked at her while he said that.

Sansa averted her gaze. Slowly, she went to pour some wine for herself. That would give her some more time as a maid. And perhaps the wine would help to make the act less arduous. She drank deeply. It will be easier if I am drunk as well. She emptied the cup as slowly as she could with a single gulp, then slowly walked to the bed. I must do it. I played my part so far, I must continue until the end. She began to undo her girdle, very slowly. Everything is going to be alright. Everyone must do it a day or another, whether they like or not. She was fumbling. She had ten broken thumbs instead of her fine fingers. He’s a dwarf. He’s a whoremonger. He’s a Lannister. Clumsily, she undid the numerous laces and buttons of her gown. The beautiful gown the queen had prepared for her. For her wedding. It could be worse. I could be married Joffrey. He helped me. He could be good to me. He’s quite experienced according to Margaery. Finally she dropped her gown on the floor. Still slowly, to gain time. Or perhaps only because otherwise she wouldn’t be able to take out her clothes and Tyrion would have to take them out himself, something she didn’t relish to. His family killed my father. His kin is in war against mine. I wasn’t supposed to marry him. I was supposed to marry the Knight of Flowers, to escape this place, to become the Lady of Highgarden one day. I don’t want him. I was supposed to marry a handsome and courageous knight, not a dwarf. All the time she disrobed, Sansa felt Tyrion’s gaze upon her. She heard his footsteps as he moved behind her. Luckily, he only seemed to turn around. He didn’t get closer. Nor farther. Only her under-silk remained on her. No, there would still be her smallclothes after that. Then nothing. He told me he shall never hurt me. Joffrey once told me the same. Can I trust him? Her shaking was threatening to become uncontrollable. No, I can’t trust him. He is a Lannister. She held back the tears that threatened to roll down on her cheeks. She wouldn’t look weak. She was a wolf. She would do what was necessary to survive. She began to lower the strap of her under-silk, letting her right shoulder bare.

“Stop.” For the first time in what seemed like an eternity to Sansa, Tyrion spoke. She turned her head to look at him. “I can’t.” Sansa covered back her shoulder. Tyrion was looking on the floor. What did he mean? He couldn’t?

“I could. I won’t.” Before she could think about asking he corrected himself. That made more sense. Tyrion was known for his whoring. How could a man unable to do his husband’s duties visit so many brothels? Wait. Did he just say he wouldn’t? That made no more sense. They were married. It was their wedding night. It was his right to claim her maidenhead. Why wouldn’t he do it?

Carefully, Sansa began to ask “But your father−”

“If my father wants someone to get fucked I know where he can start.” Tyrion cut her, speaking loudly and in a very crude way of the Lord Hand. “I won’t share your bed. Not until you want me to.”

Sansa didn’t know what to think about it. Was he serious? He wouldn’t bed her as long as she didn’t want? That could be some trick. Joffrey made her promises once, then he killed her father, forced her to watch his head on a spike and had her beaten by his Kingsguards. She still remembered the pain on her cheeks when Ser Meryn Trant slapped her with his iron gauntlet. Or on her back when he hit her with the flat of his sword. She could have died this day if… if Tyrion didn’t save her.

“What if I never want you to?” Almost as she said the words, she regretted them. What an idiot she was. How would he react? She had abandoned her armor of courtesies for half a second and that was the result.

To her astonishment, and relief, Tyrion showed no anger. He only lowered his eyes and looked away, as if he was ashamed. Finally, he raised his cup. “And so my watch begins.” With a smirk and one last gulp, he emptied it. Then he stumbled to the couch and laid on it, falling into sleep instantly.

For a few minutes, Sansa stood here. That wasn’t the wedding night she had pictured herself a long time ago, back at Winterfell. One day a singer had come and told her life was a song. Young and innocent as she was then, Sansa believed him. Later, when the royal party came in the North, she thought her song would begin. Ever since the singer left, Sansa always thought she would marry a young, handsome and beautiful knight or lord. Then King Robert arrived at Winterfell with his son and their fathers arranged a betrothal between them. Sansa had thought she was dreaming. Everything seemed perfect back then. Then, on the road to King’s Landing, the accident with Arya, the butcher boy and Nymeria happened and Lady was killed. Ever since that day, things got from bad to worse. And the foolish child she was still believed then everything would be perfect. She hadn’t wanted to see that Joffrey was a monster, so bound she was to her dreams to become the queen, to rule over millions who would love her and to have beautiful children with her handsome prince.

And now here she was, married to the Imp, still a maid with her husband asleep from his drinking. A shiver went through her skin. She sat at the end of the bed, covering her arms with her hands. She would keep her maidenhead for another night. But after, she could be sure of nothing. And so my watch begins. The words of the Night’s Watch. Did he mean he would go celibate for the rest of his life? Sansa doubted it. A man known for his nocturnal activities who would suddenly stop because he was married? She didn’t think so. Well, at least, she wouldn’t have the troublesome task to fulfill her duties as wife in the bed. She would stay a virgin while he would continue to visit brothels and bed whores. What a marriage it would be. That is, if he remembered his promise on the morning, which was also doubtful considering how drunk he was.

But for now, Sansa decided she needed to sleep. The day let her exhausted with everything that happened. The wedding. The feast. Joffrey’s threats. The scene between her husband and the king. And what just happened. She allowed herself to not worry for tonight. Joffrey wouldn’t take action after Tyrion’s performance. Lord Tywin would stop him and, even if he didn’t, Joffrey would be too afraid of Tyrion. At least she hoped. Hope was everything left to her. Hope for her brother to win the war. Hope for Joffrey to stay under Margaery’s control. Hope that one day she would escape this place and be reunited with her family. She was so tired. She rose and went to the head of the bed. She would sleep alone for this night. She would care for the other nights the following days.

Before she went under the blankets, she glanced one last time at Tyrion. He was sleeping in an awkward position. It didn’t seem comfortable to sleep this way. She walked with caution in his direction. There was a red blanket on one of the chests near the couch. She covered Tyrion with it. She also noticed a dressing gown and a cushion under his head. A handmaiden probably left the gown here for next morning, ignoring there would be a wedding but no bedding. Perhaps she ought to remove it. Instead she rolled it in a ball and, very carefully, she pushed it under Tyrion’s head. She didn’t want to trust him, but that didn’t mean she had to be unkind. He allowed her one last night as a virgin. That was the least she could do for him.

Sansa went to the bed and slipped under the cover. Very soon she fell asleep, dreaming of her family. Her father, her mother, Robb, Arya, Bran and Rickon, even Jon and their uncle Benjen. All their direwolves were here too, Greywind, Nymeria, Summer, Shaggydog, Ghost. Even Lady. They were there, all the people she loved, smiling at her while she stood before the altar between the Mother and the Father, side by side with Ser Loras Tyrell as they said their vows. She was happy. The bard of her childhood was there, playing. She could hear his sweet words. Life is a song. And yours is just about to begin. When she turned her head to face her husband, he wasn’t there anymore. Then a door opened. Dawn and a handmaiden brought her back to the bitter reality.

Chapter End Notes

My little interpretation why Tyrion had a blanket on him the morning after the wedding and why Sansa’s gown was under his head.
Next chapter: Shae. And I will introduce a new character who is not in the show, but is part of the Game of Thrones universe.
Chapter Notes

Shae's chapter now. I enjoyed very much to write this one, I hope I represented Shae's thoughts and feelings the right way. I prefer Shae in the show than in the books.

And my new character is introduced. I was very eager to make her appear.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

SHAE I

On the other side of the castle, in the servant’s wing, a young black-haired woman with dark eyes laid on a simple bed among many others. Shae got the opportunity to go to sleep before the other handmaidens since her mistress had left the wedding before everyone else. But she was there during the whole ceremony until the time for the bedding came. She was there when the king threatened to come and see Sansa to rape her in the night while two Kingsguards would hold her. She had wanted to plant the dagger attached to her leg in the throat of the monster. But it was suicidal and proved useless finally. It wasn’t her who saved the poor girl. It was Tyrion, threatening to geld the king when he insisted for the bedding ceremony. Shae saw everything from over the dais. She feared for Tyrion’s life when the hall went silent, but it was over soon enough. Tyrion escaped by pretending to be drunker than he was. Shae had seen Tyrion drunk more than often. She knew when he reached his limits and how he acted when he was really drunk. All this had been an act. Everything except the gelding threat.

He had protected Sansa as he did before. Shae never cared about that once. Tyrion had placed her as Sansa’s personal handmaiden not long after they arrived in King’s Landing because Shae was bored. But he also charged her to keep an eye on Sansa, to prevent anything bad from happening to her. Shae didn’t complain. She liked the girl. Sansa reminded Shae of herself when she was her age. She had lost everything and everyone she loved. She had become her confident and worked closely with Tyrion to prevent Joffrey from hurting her. Shae felt useful during this period. She was doing something good, something else than fucking a man who paid her.

Then, one day, Tyrion came to see Sansa. He asked to speak to her alone, something Shae couldn’t understand. She voiced her protests loudly and refused to leave, something Sansa granted her. Then Tyrion spoke and she learned the crushing truth: they would marry. Not me and Tyrion. Sansa and Tyrion. It was a good thing Sansa was shocked as well as she was, or else the girl could have discovered there was something between Shae and Tyrion. She couldn’t believe it. Yet it was true, the wedding of this day was proof enough now. That wasn’t supposed to be like this. She and her lion were supposed to be together. Tyrion was hers. And Shae was his. They had said it to each other not long before the Battle of Blackwater. Shae could never forget that night.

She was waiting in the Tower of the Hand. Tyrion lived here at this time, before his father kicked him out when he came back. She had liked to sleep with Tyrion in the Hand’s bed. It gave her the impression to wield some power. And these nights with him… they were wonderful. When she met Tyrion for the first time she wasn’t really sure what to expect from him. She was a camp follower back then, serving some knight in Tywin Lannister’s army. She couldn’t even remember his name. Then one day she heard the son of Lord Tywin (the second one, the one they called the Imp, not the first and handsome one Shae spotted briefly at the beginning of the campaign) had arrived with three thousand hill tribesmen from the Vale of Arryn. Shae didn’t pay much attention to this first. But then, a few days later, as they neared the Green Fork, some sellsword approached her while she was washing the knight’s clothes. They began to chat about all and everything. Shae liked this one. Then he declared she would be very fitting. Shae refused first. He was a sellsword and, even though he seemed quite funny and of good company, she couldn’t accept. He would never offer her more than her knight. But that wasn’t for him he wanted her. It was for the lord he served: Tyrion Lannister. Shae had been dumbfounded then. She had heard a lot of rumors about the Imp, some horrible, some very funny. What would await her with him? Though, it seemed to be a reasonable risk to take. He was the son of Tywin Lannister, the richest men in the Seven Kingdoms. She would be paid at least ten times what she was right now. That could even be her chance to leave whoring after some time. She had dropped the wet clothes and followed Bronn to Tyrion’s tent. And when the knight tried to stop her, Bronn broke his arm.

Shae had awaited in Tyrion’s tent for some time. The tent was comfortable and richly decorated. Many objects were made of gold and furs covered the ground. When Tyrion arrived he wasn’t exactly what Shae expected. Rumors said he was very ugly. Instead she met a dwarf with silver hair and green eyes, about half her height. She guessed he could be considered quite handsome for a dwarf. He seemed in some bad mood, but sober. Quite the opposite of the drunken whoremonger everyone described. Though he began to drink as soon as he entered. It wasn’t difficult to decide whether or not to enter his service. He seemed to like her with her act of the mysterious foreign beauty, not inclined to mistreat her. She had safety for the time she would spend with him and more gold than she could hope to spend during her entire life at the end of this time. A Lannister always pays his debts. Shae didn’t think ill of him then. He didn’t mistreat her, even seemed to care for her. He wasn’t the best man she spent time with and was far from the worse. Though she admitted he was surely the best halfman she even encountered. She managed to learn more about him. That was a way for her to better please her clients. All men had a sad story to justify the fact they would visit whores. And Tyrion had one Shae never expected. She had felt sorry for what happened to him and his wife, and still was now. Though she considered him stupid back then.

However, things evolved during their time in the capital. Shae understood Tyrion quite well. He wanted more than a whore to fuck him at nights. He wanted one who would act as if she loved him, who talked to him, lived with him. Shae didn’t care to act this way, Tyrion was a holy man in comparison to her father. But their mutual feelings changed with time. Not only Tyrion’s feelings toward her. Her own feelings for him began to change. First their nights were different from those she had spent with other men. Tyrion didn’t only want her to please him. He wanted to please her too. That was unusual, but Shae played her part. She acted to look as if she was subdued by him. With time she didn’t have to act anymore since he really brought her to heavens. What a change it was, considering she fucked for years only for money. She rediscovered pleasure. Second, her mission to watch over Sansa gave her a purpose and made her feel like a normal person, something she thanked him for. Third, she came to see Tyrion as a very good man and took interest in him for this reason. She didn’t try to understand him anymore for gold. She simply wanted to know him better. But she banished any idea of romance between them. Despite all of this, Shae knew she was only a whore and that Tyrion would let her go as soon as he would be bored of her. Until that night.

He rushed into the room, shouting her name. He had taken more time to come than previous nights. To spend time Shae began to read one his books. It was one of his many books on dragons, a fragment of an Unnatural History from some Septon Barth. She had learned to read a long time ago, during her time in Dorne. Men there took paramours openly and they lived with their wife and their children, so one man took her as his paramour for a time. Since Shae was lowborn and illiterate, the Dornishman allowed one his daughter to teach her to read and write. Shae had liked the little girl, almost as much as she liked Sansa, though she was much younger than the Stark girl at the time.
After a few months however, the man grew bored of her and sent her away. Shae only had enough time to let a little message in the girl’s room to say her goodbye and thank her. She never saw her again.

Tyrion had seemed panicked, as if he was afraid something bad happened to her. He had talked to her in a way he never did before. But what disconcerted Shae the most was his eyes. There was no lust in them, no desire. Shae hadn’t understood. No man had ever looked at her this way. Was it love? She couldn’t know for sure. Shae never knew what love was. Her parents denied it to her as soon as she came into the world. As always she played her act and, when he asked her, she said the words. I’m yours, and you are mine. This night Tyrion didn’t leave her like most of the others. Most of the time after they fucked, he would don his clothes and sit to read reports or books for most of the night while Shae returned to the servant’s quarters. This night they only slept together, his head wrapped into her arms. And this night, Shae thought she could be able to stay a while longer with him. Nothing more.

Then came the Battle of Blackwater. Shae feared for Tyrion during the battle, but no too much. He always managed to get himself out of trouble. And she had no time to worry about him since she had to worry about Sansa. She didn’t join the prayers, wanting all her senses alert so she may react quickly if anything happened. After the battle, she learned Tyrion was badly injured and probably close to death. It changed something in her. She worried about him as she never worried about anyone else in her life. When Sansa went to pray in the Sept, she would accompany her as always, but this time she didn’t fake her prayers. She prayed for real. For Tyrion to survive. Not to the Father and the Mother (her own gave her nothing good, why would these ones do?), but to the Warrior and the Crone. Finally Varys came to her a few days after the battle to tell her Tyrion would survive. How relieved she felt then. It still took a few days before she could finally see him. There was a big bandage that concealed half his face and when she removed it, his face looked as if it had been sliced in two pieces, then the two pieces had been put back together. He spoke to her as if she was a whore, something that never bothered her before since it was who she was. But this time it bothered her. She wasn’t here for his gold. She didn’t really know why she was there in fact. But she realized it through the discussion. She wanted to leave and start a new life somewhere. With him. But Tyrion refused to go. His only talent was to use his wits against bad people. Shae wouldn’t go without him. She belonged to him, and he belonged to her. So she said the words again. I am yours, and you are mine. This time, she meant them. And for the first time, she saw Tyrion cry. As his arms wrapped around her, for the first time, she thought she understood what love was. And felt it.

All this happened only a few months ago. And now here she was, brooding about how foolish she had been. Right now Tyrion was fucking the poor child, doing what he was only supposed to do with Shae. Shae felt so sorry for Sansa. A bit jealous too to be true, but mostly sorry. The poor girl already suffered enough, now she had to go through this. But more than everything anger was filling her. Right now her eyes were darker from anger. They both said the words to each other. And yet Tyrion said the words with another woman before dozens of people. A great beauty, as Tyrion told her once. Shae should be the one to marry him. They could avoid it. Escape to Pentos or another of the Free Cities and start anew. But no, Tyrion had to stay because of his stupid family name. Probably he also wished to fuck Sansa. He visited so many whores in his life, surely he couldn’t be satisfied only by Shae. He would come back to her, for sure, but he would also bed his wife and have children with her, while Shae would stay the whore he would fuck when he grew bored of Sansa from time to time. What a horrible and despicable little creature he was, full of lust and perversions. How Shae could be blind enough to believe he truly loved her? And fool enough to fall in love with him? She spent the night thinking about this, her thoughts turning darker and darker every hour as dawn approached. Soon, she would have to bring their breakfast to the newly weds and collect the bloodstained sheets that would prove the consummation of their marriage. Once the sheets brought to the washing room, she would go back to empty their chamber pots, then dress her mistress, brush her hair, clip her nails and do everything so that she may be the most beautiful woman for her husband. Shae wouldn’t weep. She would be stone, act as if nothing was, show no emotion. If Tyrion wanted her to cry because he chose another woman, a child in this case, over her, he would be deceived.

Finally daylight came. Shae rose from her bed without having slept a single hour through the whole night, but she wasn’t tired at all. She went to the kitchen and took a rack of food with bread and many fruits, bringing it to Tyrion’s chamber. Tyrion and Sansa’s chamber now. Sadness began to fill her heart as she went ahead. What would she find there? The two of them wrapped in eachother’s arms. No, that was stupid. Sansa would never sleep this way, especially not with her arms around Tyrion. Unless she decided to like him. After all, he saved her and helped her more than once. She even prayed for him during the Battle of Blackwater. Sansa confessed it to Shae not long ago. She had spent all her anger during the night and now came the time for despair. But it wasn’t time. The door was only twenty feet ahead. She gained her composure again, walking straight like stone. If she had to weep or whimper, that would be later. For now, she had to show nothing could move her. She would act, as she did all her life.

When she entered, Tyrion was laying on the couch, a red blanket over him, two cushions and Sansa’s dressing gown under his head as pillow. Probably he went to sleep there after he satisfied his urges on Sansa. The girl was sleeping in the bed on the other side of the room. She awoke and raised when Shae entered the room, while Tyrion barely stirred and grunted. “You really ought to knock.” He was still drunk from yesterday’s wine.

“I brought your breakfeast,” Shae said dully while she unceremoniously pulled away the gown, letting Tyrion’s head fall abruptly on the head of the couch. Surely it would help him to wake up. As she helped Sansa to slip on the dressing gown, she shot a glance at Tyrion. Now he was sitting, looking back at her. Resolved to show him nothing of her true feelings, she turned her back to him and went to collect the sheets. The damn bloody sheets. Though when she pulled the upper ones, the only color she saw was white. Something was wrong. Sansa was a virgin. She should have bled. Unless…

Shae looked back at Tyrion with a questioning gaze. With an imperceptible movement of his head, he told her what she wanted to know. Shae collected the sheets, then walked out of the room to the washroom. Before leaving, she sent a little smile in Tyrion’s direction. Suddenly, she felt lighter.

Things went smoothly afterwards. She brought the clean sheets to the servants responsible of cleaning them, where the other handmaidens asked her how were the new husband and wife. All wanted details about how they were after their wedding night. Shae paid no mind to this gossiping. “Ask the sheets, they are the best placed to answer you,” she told them. Shae never got very close to the other handmaidens. She kept Sansa’s secrets as if they were her own. Then she went back to her chambers.

Tyrion wasn’t there. Sansa sat alone at the table, breaking her fast silently. Shae was a bit distraught. “Where’s Tyrion?” she asked, more to herself than to anyone. Sansa heard her however and thought the question was directed to her.

“He left soon after you came to pick up the sheets. My lord husband said he had important duties to attend as Master of Coin.”

Shae felt a sudden rage growing in her when she heard Sansa call Tyrion her “lord husband”. He’s not your husband. He’s my lover. But she restrained herself just in time, remembering Sansa only spoke like this because she had to and knowing the consequences if Sansa got to know the special relationship between Tyrion and her handmaiden. She went to empty the chamber pots by the window. She wondered if someone ever received a great splash of it through the numerous times she emptied it this way. Surely once at least. Perhaps the Queen Regent herself was right under the window at this very moment.

Once she was over with this, Sansa had ended her breakfast. She didn’t eat much. The rack was almost full with untouched food. She helped Sansa to put on her purple gown, one of her favourites. Then she began to brush her hair as she sat before the boudoir. For a time, when she thought she would be marrying Loras Tyrell, Sansa ordered Shae to braid her hair in the Reach style. Shae had found Sansa so silly. She was probably the only one in the Red Keep who ignored the special tastes of Ser Loras. Nevertheless, Shae had been happy for Sansa. It was the first time since they met that Sansa had seemed really happy. At least, she would be able to leave King’s Landing. In her stead, Shae would be more than happy to trade Tyrion’s monstrous nephew for a man only interested by other men. There was much worse on the two sides of the Narrow Sea. And the Knight of Flowers was also far better than Lord Baelish. Of course all this was before she was betrothed to Tyrion. Now she had gone back to simpler braids, fashionable in the capital. Today she chose to let her hair free, hanging on the two sides of her face before her shoulders. It didn’t take long, but allowed enough time to Shae to make a little chat with her mistress.

“Is my Lady alright?”

“Yes, I’m fine. Thank you, Shae,” Sansa answered. Shae never asked personal questions to Sansa, only trivial ones. If Sansa wanted to talk about something more important, then Shae would oblige, but she never was to start it. That wasn’t her place to do that. Even Sansa could get suspicious if she allowed herself too much with her.

“I thought your husband would break his fast with you,” Shae added. That was a disguised question, to know why Tyrion was gone so quickly in the morning.

“He said he wasn’t hungry. And that in his state the food would probably leave the wrong way.”

“Did he really say it would leave the wrong way?” Shae was skeptical.

“No, he said he would vomit until the chamber pot seemed cleaner than the floor.”

Shae allowed herself a light laugh. That was the difference between Tyrion and Sansa. Tyrion would always bluntly say things as they were, while Sansa, acting like a true lady, would always find a way to state the events in some proper form. As the laugh escaped from Shae’s throat, she glimpsed in the myrish glass what could have been a timid smile on Sansa’s lips for half a second. For a moment Shae felt to tell Sansa her handmaiden was the only one who could laugh at Tyrion’s jape. But she reminded herself again and said nothing. How stupid Shae was. That wasn’t as if Sansa was about to fall in love with Tyrion only because she found one joke from him a little funny. Wasn’t it? And she couldn’t even be sure it really was a smile. It was so quick. Perhaps she imagined it. And the glass didn’t give a perfect reflection.

When she was done with her hair, Sansa went to do some needlework, as she did every day, while Shae would clean the table, then bring the food back to the kitchen. What a waste. There were still so many hungry people in the streets and the Red Keep found new ways each day to waste more. No wonder there was a riot only a few months ago. As Shae was done cleaning the table, a knock came from the door. She went to answer.

On the other side of the door stood a young woman clad in Highgarden clothes. There were more and more of them in the capital as the royal wedding approached. Soon the Reach would flood King’s Landing with their people and their food. But there was something about this one that unsettled Shae. She was about the same height than her, a few years younger (no more than eighteen namedays surely), was very slender with green eyes and black hair braided in the same way than the other Tyrells, along with a pale skin that allowed some pale red on her cheeks. But what really troubled Shae was the way she spoke.

“Please excuse me. I am Lady Margaery Tyrell’s handmaiden. I have a message for the Lady Sansa.” She spoke with an accent and in a way Shae never heard before. Shae had travelled through all the Free Cities and visited more than a half of the Seven Kingdoms through her life. Only the Vale and the North she never went to, but even so she met people from all the Kingdoms and could tell their origins only by the way they would speak, dress or behave. But with this one she couldn’t make it out. That frustrated her. She couldn’t trust this one. She felt something wasn’t normal about her.

“Very well, give it to me. I’ll give the message to my mistress.” Shae wasn’t paranoid, but she didn’t want to take any chance with this one.

“I’m sorry, but I was told by Lady Margaery to give the message to Lady Sansa personally.” She spoke in a monotonous tone, without a hint of emotion. That reminded Shae of someone. Someone she knew too well. Sansa! She spoke the same way Sansa spoke when she donned her armor of courtesies. Why?

“Alright. If it comes from the future queen, then I have no choice.” She opened the door wide and allowed the puzzling girl to enter, watching her the whole time. Sansa rose when the handmaiden bowed before her.

“My Lady. Perhaps you remember me. I am one of Lady Margaery’s handmaidens.”

Sansa looked at her, obviously trying to remember. “Yes, I think I saw you talking with her a few days ago.”

“My name is Mira, my Lady. Mira Forrester.”

There was a shock on Sansa’s face all of a sudden. “Forrester?” she asked on an unbelieving tone.

The name sounded familiar to Shae too. She heard it somewhere, but she couldn’t recall where. She tensed, ready for everything. Why was Sansa so shocked at the name?

“My family are sworn bannermen to the Glovers of Deepwood Motte. My father and my eldest brother are riding alongside your brother.”

In a fraction of a second, Shae understood. She was a Northerner. That was why she couldn’t decide where this girl came from. The way she spoke was a mix of Reach and Northern accents, and she was wearing Reach clothing when she had the physical attributes of the North. Surely she spent a few years in Highgarden and had adopted their way of speaking, without completely erasing her northern way. Shae relaxed. No arm would come from this one. Her family was sworn to Sansa’s and honor was very powerful in the North as far as she knew. She also understood why she seemed to speak the same way Sansa did. She too had to hide under an armor of courtesies here. Though Shae wondered how a Northerner ended up in Margaery’s service.

“I remember,” Sansa said. “My father went to visit Ironrath one day. He said it was nearly as impressive as Winterfell.”

“I’m glad to hear it. I was very young back then, but I remember your father very well. He seemed to be a good man at this moment. Many in my family were very sad when they learned he was dead.”

Sansa didn’t reply immediately. “My father was a traitor.” She dressed again in her armor.
“Of course.” Shae didn’t see Mira’s facial expression since she was behind her, but there seemed to be some sadness and regrets in her voice. “I’m sorry, my Lady. I shouldn’t reminisce about the past or bring back dark memories. Lady Margaery would like to know if you wish to sew with her in the gardens. She would be very happy to spend time with you. She’s alone right now.”

“Yes, that would please me a lot. Let me only take my needlework. Wait for me outside.”

“Very well my Lady.” Mira Forrester left the room while Sansa grabbed what she needed.

“Close the door Shae,” Sansa commanded her. Shae obliged, not sure why she should close the door since her mistress would leave in a minute.

“I’m probably going to spend most of the day with Margaery, so take time for yourself once your work is done.” Sansa walked to the door, then stopped as she reached for the doorknob. She turned back to Shae. “You may eat the food Shae.”

The two girls exchanged smiles as Sansa left the room. That was Shae’s favourite part of her work as handmaiden. When Sansa wouldn’t be hungry, sometimes she would allow her to eat the good food destined for her, as long as other handmaidens weren’t around. As Shae began to fill her stomach with good bread and delicious fruits, she told herself this day was going to be beautiful finally. The only thing that missed to make it perfect would be a private moment with Tyrion.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Margaery POV. The first chapter with entire original content.
Margaery I

Chapter Notes

My longest chapter up to now.
And the first one that is entirely original. No content from the show.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

MARGAERY I

Margaery Tyrell was sitting in a comfortable chair in a corner of the Red Keep gardens. She was wearing one of her lightweight gown that displayed all her back and half her shoulders. King’s Landing may be colder than Highgarden, but winter wasn’t yet here and climate was still warm. And Margaery liked to say Tyrell blood runs warm. She looked at Blackwater Bay, where shipwrecks from the battle could still be seen. The work from Sansa’s husband. She had sent Mira to fetch the new Lady Lannister. They would be there in a very short time. Margaery had a lot of questions for the Stark girl.

While she waited, Margaery’s thoughts went to her handmaiden. She couldn’t express how lucky she was to have Mira into her service. Margaery didn’t really know what to think of her when she arrived in Highgarden three years ago. Her clothes, her accent, her behaviour, everything put her aside from the others. But Margaery had welcomed her with open arms as she did with everyone. Mira was all alone, she knew no one in Highgarden, so Margaery decided to take her at her personal service. She taught her everything about the Reach usages and, very soon, Mira made herself a very good place in her family household. She even passed the test to stand an entire supper with Margaery’s grandmother without losing her composure a single time. The Lady Olenna had told her granddaughter then she should never let this one leave her service. She said she would be very useful. And she was.

Mira adapted very quickly to the world of the Reach. She adopted their clothes, their lifestyle, even their accent (mostly). She became a very good friend of Margaery’s favourite handmaiden, Sera. She shared the same pleasures than the other girls, though in a less extreme way. She would drink wine, but never get drunk. Eat at feasts, but never more than she could. Talk with very charming boys and men, without withdrawing a single time with one of them. Laugh with the others, but always lower. She dressed beautifully, but simply. Margaery’s cousins and other handmaidens tried more than once to bring to do some dirty things, but never succeeded. And no one could laugh of Mira without getting a reply that would bring the others to laugh at him even more. And her replies were always diplomatic and well placed. A true example of righteousness in Highgarden.

But that wasn’t why Mira became in time Margaery’s favourite handmaiden and friend. Mira was sociable, yet discrete, so Margaery began to confide her some of her thoughts and secrets. Mira proved to be very attentive to her, but also a very great help. She was intelligent, cunning, and resourceful, though not many people could see it. But what surprised Margaery was her entire loyalty toward her new mistress as soon as she entered her service. Mira would never do or say anything against her. She would prefer to shame herself instead of betraying Margaery, even for the most insignificant things. Mira called it “honor”, something Margery didn’t entirely understood. But no matter, Mira had been someone who Margaery could always count on. That was very strange for a person as intelligent as Mira. She would prefer to put her cunning and her skills at Margaery’s service instead of her own service. Mira didn’t even seem to have personal ambition. She could be so much more than what she was, but didn’t seem to bother about it. She looked happy to be Margaery’s handmaiden and did her duty better than anyone else. The young woman could entrust her northern servant with everything. And right now she would bring her Sansa.

As she thought the latter, Margaery saw the two northern girls walking in her direction. Mira was carrying Sansa’s needlework materials while they quietly spoke. Mira never asked to be presented to Sansa, since she never asked anything. But Margaery thought her friend would be happy to have the opportunity to speak with the sister of her liege lord and it seemed she was right. Both of them were smiling timidly. As both reached Margaery’s corner, Mira made an imperceptible bow with her head and put Sansa’s work next to an empty chair.

“You may leave us Mira. I’m sure you have more interesting things to do than listening to two ladies gossiping.” Mira gave a thin smile. She didn’t enjoy very much woman’s talk, though she participated to it from time to time.

“Very well, my Lady. I’ll go back to my chambers. Lady Sansa. Lady Margaery.” She turned her heels and walked in the direction of the Red Keep, probably going to read some book. Or writing a letter to her family. She wrote a lot of them these days. No wonder, considering Robb Stark was losing the war and her father and eldest brother were fighting alongside the young wolf. She had many reasons to be worried about them. Margaery hoped the fate of Sansa’s family didn’t await Mira’s one.

Margaery turned her attention to Sansa. “Would you take a seat Sansa?” The girl seemed confused.

“Yes, Your Grace,” she replied. She still called Margaery by her future title. She sat and took her needlework.

“How many times must I recall you to call me Margaery. I’m not yet the queen, and when I’ll be we’ll be part of the same family.”

“Sorry, Margaery, I forgot.”

Sansa didn’t look happy, yet she didn’t look sad either. Margaery guessed that was a good sign. Sansa felt so desperate after she learned she was betrothed to Lord Tyrion. Perhaps now she saw some good side to her new situation. Margaery had to admit if she had the choice, she would rather wed Lord Tyrion than Joffrey if the two possibilities allowed her the same amount of power. She was to marry Joffrey in order to be queen, nothing else. She wondered what it would be to make love to a dwarf. She had to ask questions to Sansa.

“How do you feel, Sansa?” she asked.

“I’m alright.” She said no more. Margaery would have to be patient in order to get some details. Sansa visibly didn’t want to talk very much.

“Thank you for coming. I needed some company here.”

“Where are all the other ladies of Highgarden?”

“Mostly preparing the royal wedding. I had need of a rest from it. How difficult it is to prepare such a ceremony. My grandmother finds a way every day to make it even more complicated. I begin to envy your own wedding.”

Sansa didn’t answer. She turned her attention to her needlework. That would be more difficult than Margaery believed. What could have happened? Was she so traumatized about her wedding night.
The soft way wouldn’t do. Margaery decided to take the direct approach.

“Come on, Sansa. Tell me about your wedding night.” Margaery asked kindly but firmly.

Sansa stopped her work, but kept her eyes down. “I don’t want to talk about it Margaery.”

“Why? Did something wrong happen? If it is because it hurt, you don’t have to worry, it’s always like that the first time. With time it gets quite pleasant and—”

“I know that very well! I had a septa to teach me these things,” Sansa said, exasperated. She finally looked back to Margaery.

The Tyrell girl made a little pause before asking again. “Did he hurt you?”

“No, he didn’t. He was kind with me.” Sansa’s voice softened.

“Very well. There is no problem in this case. So, tell me how it went. What did he do?”

“I don’t want to talk about it.”

Margaery remembered the time Mira told her that sexual relationships wasn’t a subject lightly addressed in her family. Could it be the same in Sansa’s family? Sansa never looked comfortable when Margaery got into this kind of discussion.

“Is there something wrong to talk about these things?” Margaery asked.

Sansa seemed to struggle to find a convenient answer. “Well, we never talked about it very much at Winterfell. And when we did, it was always seriously, not in public, and… we always talked about it….” Sansa didn’t seem able to finish her sentence.

“Properly?” Margaery suggested. Sansa nodded to confirm. “I’m sorry Sansa. In Highgarden I talk about it without any problem with my family and my friends. There’s nothing incongruous about it. And you’ll have to talk about it to someone one day or another. Why not me? We are friends, remember.”

“Just like the rest of your family were my friends when I was betrothed to your brother? Their friendship proved to be quite frail after I was betrothed to Lord Tyrion.”

Sansa talked on a reproachful tone. That was Margaery’s turn to lower her eyes. She knew all too well what Sansa was talking about. When her grandmother decided to design a plot to marry her brother to Sansa, Margaery had been very happy. She always wanted to have a sister but never got one. She had her cousins, Sera and Mira, but even though they were good and close friends, they were still only friends. If Sansa married her brother, it would make of her a sister for Margaery. She liked Sansa, even though she was about four years younger than Margaery. And Sansa had suffered enough in Joffrey’s hand, Margaery wanted to help her. They were women in a world dominated by men, so they had to stand together. Margaery was very happy about the excitement in Sansa’s eyes when she announced her she would arrange a marriage between her and Loras once she would be queen, though it had a bitter taste since Sansa didn’t know about Loras preferences. She would never find love with him, yet she anticipated a perfect life with Margaery’s brother. At least she would leave the capital and escape Joffrey forever. And Margaery would have a sister.

But then, the Lannisters discovered the truth and disrupted their plans, betrothing and marrying Sansa to Lord Tyrion and betrothing Loras to the Queen Regent. The second arrangement required a threat to name Loras in the Kingsguard, which would have deprived her parents from their sole male heir. They had no choice. Afterwards, the Tyrells stopped to spend time with Sansa. She was no more one of them. Her lessons on the harp with Leonette, the gossiping with Janna, the stories with Merry, the needlework with Elinor, Alla and Megga, the discussion over lemon cakes, the singing in the sept… Everything ended. Everything but Margaery’s friendship. Margaery couldn’t really blame her cousins. They had seen Sansa as a future Tyrell and Tyrells stood together, that was why they had welcomed her. Margaery was very sad when she learned she and Sansa wouldn’t be sisters. That was so cruel. Especially for Sansa. But she wouldn’t abandon her. The girl was alone. Margaery couldn’t bring herself to leave her without defense in the lion’s den. So she tried to make see the good of her situation to Sansa, to make her understand it was an opportunity for her, that Tyrion was far from the worse Lannister and had many qualities. She remained Sansa’s friend despite her family’s disinterest toward her. That was important for her. Especially since Sansa was an even more important piece in the game of thrones with her marriage.

“I’m sorry about the way my kin reacted to your betrothal Sansa, sincerely.” Margaery was more than sincere in this moment. “I’m not like the rest of my family. I’m still your friend. Else I wouldn’t have invited you to sew with me on this morning. I wouldn’t have left my kinsfolk when I enjoy so much my time with them to spend time alone with you. And I wouldn’t have been with you after the news of your betrothal came, trying to explain you it was far from the worse that could happen in your situation and that you might even enjoy your marriage. Even more than a marriage with my brother.”

Margaery believed everything she said. And she knew Sansa would know it. She had spoken with a firm but kind voice. Sansa suddenly looked ashamed. “I’m sorry, Margaery. You’re not the one I should complain to. You’re right. You are one of the only true friends I have here.” Sansa looked at Margaery directly in the eyes, her own beautiful blue eyes full of sadness. Margaery felt a lot of pity for the girl in that moment. “It’s just that everyone only seems to look after my friendship when they have something to gain from it. And once they have it or realize they cannot have it, they abandon me and act as if I never existed.”

“I am your friend, Sansa. And I will always be your friend, whatever happens.” Always. Sansa’s eyes were filled with tears. Margaery perched on the extremity of her chair and gave a big hug to her friend.

“Thank you,” Sansa said weakly. They stayed in this position a few minutes for Sansa to gain back her composure.

“So,” began Margaery as they broke their embrace, “what happened last night? If you say he was kind with you, that he didn’t mistreat you, why are you so reluctant to tell how it went between you two? There’s nothing shameful about speaking of these things with another person. This is part of a normal life.” Margaery used the moment to bring Sansa to speak about her time with Tyrion.

“You don’t understand, Margaery.” Sansa stopped, still hesitant. “It’s not that I fear speaking of it. The problem is… I have nothing to say.” Nothing to say? What does she mean? There are always a lot of things to tell about a wedding night. “We did nothing. There was no bedding. He didn’t bed me.” Sansa said the last two sentences very quickly, as if she was afraid to say it too slowly.

That made quite a shock to Lady Margaery. She stayed unmoving for a very long time, trying to assimilate what she just heard. “He didn’t… bed you?” she asked, unbelieving. How was that possible? “Was he so much drunk?” Margaery could hardly believe it. She saw many drunken men through her life and knew their behaviour when they were in such a state. Lord Tyrion had acted drunk during the whole feast, drinking more than anyone could believe a man of his size could. Calling himself the god of tits and wine in front of his own father. That memory from yesterday nearly brought a smile to Lady Margaery. But the way he behaved when he threatened Joffrey, that was no drunken action. Drunken men would search the battle without really wishing for it, boast about their greatest talents in a way that would make everyone doubt them, say incomprehensible things that only themselves seemed to understand, laugh at things they were the only ones to find funny,… but they would never threaten someone the way Lord Tyrion did. Margaery had seen the anger on his face, he was really serious. She suspected his laughs and rude language that followed were only a way to look drunker than he really was, a way to get out with his head still attached to his body. Afterwards Margaery had thought that could even be some chivalrous attempt to dispense the humiliation of a bedding ceremony to his wife. A very risky attempt, but a chivalrous one nonetheless. With what Sansa told her now, that made no sense. Could a dwarf act differently from the other people when he was drunk?

“No,” Sansa answered. “Well, I mean yes, he was drunk, but that wasn’t the reason. I began to disrobe and then, he stopped me. He… he told me… he wouldn’t share my bed as long as I didn’t want him to.”

If Sansa’s revelation about her non consummated marriage surprised Margaery, this one made her wondered if it was possible for her father to be the most intelligent man in the Seven Kingdoms after all. A man, widely known as one of the greatest whoremonger of the Realm, refused to bed Sansa Stark without her approval? What was going on in this stinking city? The impossible seemed to be only unlikely here.

“You can’t be serious,” Margaery gabbled. It was probably the first time in years since she had done so.

“I assure you, it’s the truth.” Sansa never looked as serious as now. “He went to sleep on a couch and left me alone for the whole night.”

Margaery still had a great deal in finding back her composure. What could that mean? Why did Lord Tyrion act this way? “How did he look when he told you this?” She needed every detail she could gather. She had to understand that. She had to understand why a man would refuse to bed his lovely wife when he had every right to do it in every possible way.

“Well, I would say he looked… sad… and ashamed. He wouldn’t even look at me, as if he was afraid to see me. He looked even more uneasy than me sometimes. And…” Sansa let her last sentence unfinished.

“And?” Margaery needed to know.

Suddenly Sansa giggled. Alright, things are really weird today. Weirder than anyone could imagine. “What’s so funny Sansa?”

It took a few seconds for Sansa to stop laughing. When she did, she still had some difficulties to articulate her sentences. “It’s just… something he told me… last night. He told me his father ordered him to consummate the marriage. When he stopped me from disrobing, he said…” Sansa cleared her throat. “He said that if his father wanted someone to get fucked, he knew where he could start.” Sansa started laughing again. It took a few seconds for Margaery in her state to understand what Sansa just told her, but when she did she burst into laughers just like her. Margaery suddenly wished she had been there to hear it. The son of the proud Tywin Lannister saying his father could go and get himself fucked. And to hear Sansa using such a language, even only to repeat someone else’s words, it was enough to make her month. They needed some time to gain their composure again. When they did Margaery had a theory why Lord Tyrion didn’t consummate the marriage.

“Perhaps that’s why he let you the choice.”

“What do you mean?” Sansa replied, her face still red from the laughs.
“Perhaps he simply wanted to disobey his father. I don’t know much about the dynamics between the Lannisters, but I know Lord Tywin doesn’t have very good relationships with his children, especially his youngest son. The proof is he gave him no recognition for his decisive role in the Battle of Blackwater. He even stripped him from all his powers and named him at the less desirable office on the small council. Perhaps Lord Tyrion was simply tired of receiving orders from his father. That plus the fact he respects you.”

“Respect me?” Sansa didn’t look quite sure of what Margaery was implying.

“Look, you told me he never mistreated you. I also heard a certain story about the Hand of the King calling the King a half-wit for beating an innocent girl before the whole court. And how he helped her to get back on her feet after that.” Sansa looked away. Perhaps Margaery shouldn’t have mentioned this. These were bad memories for her friend. She continued nonetheless. “Perhaps he’s fond of you and doesn’t want to cause more suffering than what his family already inflicted on you.”

“You think he’s fond of me?” Sansa still didn’t seem quite convinced.

“That wouldn’t surprise me.”

For a moment Margaery was close to being jealous of Sansa’s situation. She would like to have such a husband. Up to now, she had been married to a man who wasn’t interested in women, and now she was betrothed to a monster. She would be able to control him, sure, but she would never love him. And Joffrey would never love her. A chance. As long as she would distract him, act with him as if he was a king, she would control him. Margaery abandoned any wish for love very soon in her life. Her grandmother made her understand that love was beautiful, yes, but it could also be dangerous and cloud her judgement. If she was to find her place in the world, Margaery would have to ban such thoughts from her life. Anyway, marriages in nobility seldom were out of love, and the few ones who were didn’t prove any better than those made from interest. So Margaery forgot about it. She accepted she would never love a man in a way that would consume her and make her forget who she was. Instead, she had to use the love, or at least the attraction, men could feel for her to prevent them from crushing her. She would manage to be someone this way.

However, Margaery had found it very drastic to eradicate any form of love from her life. She kept the love for her family, as her grandmother did. But that wasn’t enough. She needed more. So she made good friends. People she could love in a non passionate way and whose death or misery wouldn’t break her. But she also decided to get close to the people, the smallfolk. She decided to help them. They would be the ones she would love unconditionally. She would care for them, walk among them, be a lady that would know them instead of staying hidden behind the four walls of a castle, singing and sewing and eating while her own people would live in misery. Her cousins didn’t entirely share her interest for the common people, but supported her and followed her, good friends as they were. Mira was among the few who shared Margaery’s concern for the smallfolk with all their heart and worked tirelessly to ease their sufferings. That was how Margaery became who she was. An ambitious woman whose final objective was to be queen (she held that from her grandmother), the most powerful woman in the Seven Kingdoms, but a queen that would win her title and keep it with sweet words, soft manipulation, friendship and love for the people (that last part came from her mother, the Lady Alerie). A queen everyone wanted. Highborn, intelligent, lovely, appreciated by the noblemen, loved by the smallfolk, good to everyone. A queen that would rule with love, that wouldn’t need fear for people to follow her, because they would want to follow her. And if rebellions threatened to appear, she would have the power of her family to protect her and bring back the peace everyone prayed for.

All this however left a bitter taste for Margaery. She had sacrificed the most beautiful feeling humans were capable of in order to reach her ambitions. She would love people (her father, her mother, her brother, Mira, Sera, her numerous cousins, Sansa, perhaps Tommen, Joffrey’s brother, who was so kind), but she would never truly love someone. That thought made her sad. Though she didn’t regret her choice. Sansa didn’t make that choice in time, and she suffered from that. Perhaps if she had been engaged with Lord Tyrion before, she would have been able to find true happiness. Instead, she was betrothed to Joffrey, and now half her family were dead, and the other half would follow them very soon. Margaery wanted Sansa to be happy. Her husband seemed to be a good man, even more from what Margaery just learned. Sansa had a chance so few women had in the world: to find true love. Margaery felt obligated to help, for all the suffering the Stark girl had endured, and for herself. She wanted someone to have the life she refused to live a long time ago. And though Sansa was no longer betrothed to Loras, she still was a valuable piece in the politics of Westeros. She didn’t realize it, but she had the opportunity to become even more powerful than Margaery in time. Through her rights over the North once her brother would be dead, and through her husband. Sansa could have power and love at the same time, something many women would kill for. And that was why Margaery wanted to, and needed to have Sansa as a friend and an ally. But first, for that, she had to help Sansa realize the role she could play. It was time to make their meeting fruitful.

Margaery allowed a few moments to pass. Sansa was deep in her thoughts. “Perhaps you should also start to consider the opportunities this marriage may open for you.”

“What opportunities? I am a prisoner just as I was before. My husband himself told me before the wedding that to be his wife was some kind of prison.”

“Yes, it is,” Margaery conceded. “I will be some sort of a prisoner as well as soon as I’ll be married to Joffrey. Marriage is for life, so every marriage is some kind of prison. But we can manage to gain the trust and love of our gaoler so he may let us walk as freely as if he didn’t exist. And in your case, you seem to have fallen upon one that leaves the door of your cell along with most of the other doors of your prison open, if not all doors.”

“Not all doors. The exit of the prison is still sealed, and will always be,” Sansa said mournfully.

“Yes, you’re right. But still, you have more freedom than most of the women here in the Red Keep. Along with the possibility to hold much influence.”

“How can I hold any influence?” Sansa didn’t believe Margaery. She would have to explain it very carefully.

“How many children does Lord Tywin Lannister have?” The question seemed to surprise Sansa. It probably looked like a sudden change of topic in her eyes.

“He has three children. The Kingslayer, the Queen Regent, and my husband.” She said it as if it was obvious, which was.

“And who is Lord Tywin’s eldest son?”

“It’s Ser Jaime.” Sansa looked annoyed by Margaery’s questions. She didn’t realize where Margaery was leading her.

“Quite right. And Ser Jaime is either dead or lost somewhere in the Riverlands. And even if he succeeds in returning to the capital, he is the Commander of the Kingsguard. He vowed to take no lands and no wife, to hold no castle, and to father no children.” The last vow he may not have respected it though. “As for the Cersei, she is a woman. And Lord Tywin Lannister is the Lord of Casterly Rock and the Warden of the West. So when Tywin Lannister will die…”

Margaery let Sansa finished her sentence. “Tyrion will be Lord of Casterly Rock.”
“And you are his wife.” Margaery concluded her explanation with five little words.

Margaery was aware Sansa knew the rules of succession. She may have come to that conclusion on her own, but she had been so desperate when she learned she was going to marry the Imp that she probably never considered this. Sansa seemed to be lost in her thoughts. Margaery had hit the right point.

“I don’t want this.” Sansa’s answer left Margaery puzzled. “His family is in war against my own. They killed my father after promising him he would be allowed to take the black if he confessed his crimes. I can’t be the Lady of House Lannister.”

“This could be your best chance Sansa,” Margaery tried to explain. “You could rule the Westerlands with your husband and prevent another war like this one to happen. Don’t turn your back right now to this.” And you could ensure your son to be the Lord of Winterfell once he comes of age. But Margaery kept the last argument for her. She didn’t want to tell Sansa something that would let her believe her brother was done. It would break her.

Sansa remained silent for a very long time. She was obviously thinking about what the southern girl just told her. Finally she spoke. “That’s not something I can consider. Not when my family is in such a situation.”

That wasn’t the answer Margaery was hoping for. This one is stubborn. I’ll have to try again later, more subtly. “Very well. This is your decision. But don’t forget what I told you. You might want to consider it one day.”

“I won’t forget.” That was a small victory at least. The future queen would need it later. Sansa’s friendship could prove vital when the time would come, but even more if she decided to be more than a submissive wolf among lions.

“Let’s talk about something else now. Something not boring. You met my friend Mira. Did you get along with her?”

They spent the rest of the morning and most of the afternoon talking about everything and everyone while sewing. Colors returned to Sansa’s face and a smile found his way back to her lips. They spoke about Margaery’s cousins and handmaidens, the gossips of the Red Keep’s society, the weather, their needlework, the upcoming royal wedding (though Margaery didn’t talk about it very long, she was tired to hear about it all the time), the state of the city, the food that filled the markets again, and a rumour about some squire who managed to leave a brothel without paying for his time with three girls.

Chapter End Notes

I hope I depicted Margaery well enough.

Please review

Next chapter, Tyrion is back.
Chapter Notes

Tyrion is back, and he has a lot of thoughts in his big head.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

TYRION II

The numbers scrambled into the head of Tyrion Lannister, and that was a lot to say since his head was bigger than most. Did Littlefinger really find his way into his ledgers? They were written in such a way it was difficult to find the origin of an income and the reason of an expenditure. And the fact Baelish always wanted money to work instead of being buried in some chest made the task even more difficult for Tyrion since it made the writings even more complex.

Tyrion was no idiot in matters of money to be true. He told his father when he named him at the post that a whole life of outrageous wealth didn’t teach him much about managing money. It was true Tyrion could spend as he wanted since his father always gave him all the money he wanted. Tywin Lannister lacked generosity towards his children for everything but money. However, Tyrion was probably the only one among his father’s children who could hold the office of Master of Coin. Cersei would probably bring the realm to bankruptcy in a week after her nomination at such a post, if not worse, and Jaime would never do the work, books bored him to death. Tyrion, on the other hand, got a solid formation in finances from Maester Creylen at Casterly Rock in his youth. Since the Lannisters were so rich, they needed to be more than simple lords who ruled their subjects. They had to be bankers, investors, businessmen, even merchants from time to time. More important, they had to make sure gold keep its value, or else their wealth would melt away. The contents of their secret vaults deep into the foundations of the Rock wouldn’t have so much worth then. If they extracted too much gold, its value would decrease until people wouldn’t buy any more with a golden dragon than with a silver stag or a copper coin. That was what the maesters called a devaluation. Gold only has the value people believe it has, just like power resides where men believe it resides. That wasn’t much strange wealth and power were so close in the end as they looked so much alike.

Tyrion noted more names on a sheet on his right. They were names of merchants who borrowed money from the crown and failed to repay. Not a surprise since they were dead, executed by Joffrey before the Battle of Blackwater. Many of them had been part of a conspiracy to help Stannis enter the city during the battle, but others Joffrey killed them during his first days as king when he received petitioners and decided to have anyone who claimed King Robert owed them some money declared to be lying to the king and beheaded right away. Ned Stark’s sword was never used so unjustly than this day. Though for the conspiracy, Tyrion had some responsibility in the executions. They were so close of Stannis’s attack on King’s Landing and evidences were so indisputable that he had to sign their death sentence to prevent any possible betrayal when Stannis would land.

Tyrion never liked to order an execution. Even for some butcher dog like Janos Slynt. He preferred to exile them to the Wall or help them remind their place with a little visit to the black cells. Since his visit to the Wall and the news about a dead man trying to kill Jeor Mormont reached King’s Landing, Tyrion had tried to send them more recruits. He would empty the black cells as often as possible, make announcements about the Night’s Watch recruiting in the city, and offer a royal pardon for all debts and passed crimes to everyone who wished to go to the Wall. That wasn’t much, but that was the best he could do since they had no men to spare back then. Now they could send men, but his father wouldn’t. The pleas for help from the Night’s Watch fell into the deaf ears of Tywin Lannister who didn’t give a damn if the wildlings crossed the Wall and ravaged the North. That would mean only one more enemy for Robb Stark and Balon Greyjoy. As for the White Walkers, Lord Tywin didn’t know about them and even if he was told, he would never believe it, rational as he was. Tyron was rational and believed what he saw. But he saw it. He saw it in the eyes full of wisdom of Maester Aemon (Aemon Targaryen to be true, Tyrion knew who the man was) and in the fear of the Lord Commander’s voice. Both men were rational too, gave their life to the Night’s Watch, knew more about the things beyond the Wall than everyone else, and had common sense. If Mormont said a dead man tried to kill him in his sleep, Tyrion believed him. Mormont was as honorable as Ned Stark and he wouldn’t lie about it. But his father would never believe it and Tyrion knew best than to warn his father about White Walkers, snarks and grumkins. He would do nothing and hope for the men of the Night’s Watch to do their duty and fight for a realm that didn’t care about them. Tyron wondered if what he was doing right now had any use if the dead marched on the Wall. The real fight could be there and here he sat, serving loyally his family in order to keep an ugly and uncomfortable iron chair. His friend Jon Snow could be dead right now, or fighting against the evils of the North while Tyrion sat there peacefully, counting coppers. Tyron wondered what the lad would think about his marriage with his sister.

When Tyron was done with listing the failing debtors, he looked back at the book where he recorded all the expenses for the royal wedding. They were filling ten pages up to now and Tyrion needed to add more every day. Lady Olenna seemed to use the fact she paid half the expenses as an excuse for spending thrice more. If it continued Tyron would have to sell the Red Keep in order to pay the royal wedding. He decided to take a pause and went to fill a cup of wine. Tyrion emptied his cup, his thoughts wandered to his wedding night. He had tried his best for the whole day to not think about it, but he needed to relax from his work for a moment, so couldn’t use it to occupy his thoughts. It had been quite different from his first wedding night, if that could be called so. His first wedding night had preceded his first marriage, but had been wonderful. And the two weeks that followed had been even better. Until his father put an end to it. Though still, Tyron had been the happiest man in the world for a fortnight thanks to his brother. He didn’t hold Jaime responsible for what happened later. It was their father who gave the order. Last night had been different. He was ready to do the deed. Or at least he thought so. He knew what his father was capable of, so it would be better for Sansa if they did it before Tywin Lannister forced them to with every mean necessary. They would only have to do it once, then Tyron would wait for Sansa to be ready to do it again. There would be no way for his father afterwards to tell if they performed their duties or not. A maidenhead only broke one time. Tyron drank during the feast, hoping it may help him forget what he would have done on the morning. But Tyron would have needed a lot of wine for that. He was so accustomed that he nearly was immune to its effects. He refused the bedding ceremony, wishing at least to make the act private. That would be better for both him and Sansa. When they retreated to their chambers however, his resolve faded. First when he was remembered the age of his wife, next when she began to disrobe. She was beautiful, but that wasn’t what he saw then. Another image took the place of Sansa. Something he had done so long ago came back to his mind. Something he told nobody about, not even his brother. Only him, his father and a few guards knew about this. He couldn’t do this. She was only a child. He stopped her and promised to not share her bed as long as she didn’t want, even if that meant forever, which was very possible. Tyron would rather go celibate for the rest of his life than rape an innocent girl on his father’s orders. He still didn’t know what to make of her reaction. She was obviously very surprised. How many men refuse to bed their wife on their wedding night without their approval? But was there something else on her face then? Tyron wondered if that was relief, happiness, incomprehension, or even disappointment. Surely not the last one, no woman would want to take him into her bed unless she was a whore he paid. Well, except Shae. She refused to be paid since the Battle of Blackwater, so practically she was a whore no longer.

As Tyrion thought about that the door opened, and Shae entered. “My lion,” she said sweetly after she closed the door.

“Shae.” She was beautiful, as always. Whatever the way Shae would dress (if she dressed at all), she was stunning. Tyrion felt his member stretch in his breeches.

“You look lonely.” She walked in his direction, reached the place where he sat, leaned to give him a long and deep kiss. Oh, her mouth. Her beautiful lips. And her tongue. How long since he had her for the last time? Probably weeks. Shae had been so distant after his betrothal to Sansa. And there was so little time they could spend together since his father came back to King’s Landing. Most of the time they would meet in the dungeons where the dragon skulls were. It was a secret place where no one ever went. No one except Tyrion because of his passion of dragons. Shae also came a few times to his rooms, though he forbade her to do so several times. She never listened. Tyrion wanted her so badly. He brought his hands to her back, where her clothes let her skin bare. The beautiful foreign girl began to unlace his breeches as she had done so many times. Tyrion remembered something then.

“Stop!” He broke their embrace and brought her hands away. “We can’t do this, not now and not here.” If someone found them…

“You don’t have to worry. Podrick is standing guard before the door, he won’t let anyone enter.” She resumed her kissing. Tyrion wanted nothing than to lose himself in her, but there was too much risk.

“Podrick won’t be able to hold my father or my sister if they come.” He broke their embrace again. “And even if he could, they would hear something and have you killed the instant they know who you are. My father never makes idle threats.”

Shae didn’t look happy. Her smile and the pleasure in her face disappeared as quickly as she had appeared in the doorstep a moment ago. She kissed Tyrion lightly and stood straight before him, crossing her arms on her breasts.

“Alright. When then?” a look of defiance on her face. It was the same way she had looked and acted toward him when he tried to explain her he had no choice to marry Sansa. “We’re going to meet in the dungeons again in the middle of the night? Dragon skulls and the floor are very hard. It’s not very pleasant to fuck on this kind of surface repeatedly.”

Her eyes were dark, as always. But for anger more than because it was their natural color right now. Tyrion hated it when she looked at him this way. He didn’t hate her for that, but he hated the fact she looked at him as if he was some pile of shit. Couldn’t she understand the difficult situation he was in and that he was trying to protect her?

“I’m not sure if that will be possible any longer,” he answered. “I think my wife is going to wonder why I leave in the middle of the night if she notices it.”

“Oh, so you’re afraid that she discovers you’re fucking her handmaiden.” I should never have mentioned Sansa. “You fear she will think ill of you if she learns you’re cheating on her.” Shae’s tone was accusing. She still believed he was interested by Sansa. Tyrion had hoped the sheets would be proof enough of the opposite.
“I’m not afraid of Sansa’s reaction if she knew about us.” Well, to be honest, he was afraid, but not for the reasons Shae believed. “Anyway she already knows all the vile rumors about me, truths and lies all alike.” She had to, everyone knew it. From the Wall to Dorne, Tyrion had acquired quite a reputation. “But if she learns, what tells us she won’t let something slip about it while she talks to Lady Margaery or another of her handmaidens? We can’t take that risk.”

“Very well. I had some time for you, but since you’re tired of fucking me, I’ll find something more interesting to do.” She left without another word, leaving Tyrion where she found him. Podrick came inside.

“Do you need anything my lord?” Always the perfect squire (well, perfect in intentions and when it came to save Tyrion’s life, in the other matters it was questionable).

“No Podrick, leave me alone.”

“Yes, my lord.” Podrick left again to stand guard before the door as Tyrion had ordered him at the beginning of the day. He gave Bronn leave for the day since he wasn’t in the mood for the bawdy comments of the sellsword about his wedding night. Tyrion went back to his ledgers. What a break it had been. He worked until sunset, then left his solar to go back to his rooms. His rooms and his wife’s now.

As he walked his thoughts wandered to Shae again. He knew why she was angry at him. Tyrion told her once she was his and he was hers, and made her say the same words. Tyrion believed these words at this moment and still believed them. Though he had to admit his marriage was posing a serious problem. He put the cloak on Sansa’s shoulders, promising to protect her. But he also said the words to Sansa, before the High Septon and dozens of people. Tyrion didn’t believe in gods since what happened to his first wife, but his vows with Sansa still meant much more than the ones he made with Shae months ago. And to be honest, Tyrion didn’t want to shame Sansa. She was already considered the daughter of a traitor (which was very doubtful) only because her father tried to do what was right in his eyes, Joffrey had her beaten and humiliated on several occasions, she was nearly raped because of his nephew’s stupidity and cruelty during the riot, and now she was married with the Imp of Casterly Rock. How would she feel if she discovered her husband was disgracing her with her personal handmaiden? Perhaps she wouldn’t care, that was not as if she loved him, cared for him or even gave him any consideration. But still, he didn’t want to take the risk. She had suffered enough. And he had to ensure Shae’s safety. That wouldn’t be easy. How would he be able to hold his vows towards his wife and the same ones towards his lover? He still loved Shae. He began to understand how Jaime had been torn apart when he had to choose between the lives of hundreds of thousand innocent people he was sworn to protect, and the life of the king he was also sworn to protect. Tyrion would have to find a solution to this problem, but right now he had none.

He finally reached his apartments and pushed the door open. Sansa was already there, watching over the balcony. She turned to face him as he entered. “My lord,” she simply greeted him.

“My lady,” Tyrion answered, trying to smile. His wife averted her eyes from him. She was still scared of him. What a perfect marriage it’s going to be. Tyrion walked to the table and poured himself a cup of wine. “Do you want some my lady?”

“No thank you my lord, I’m not thirsty.” She was still averting his gaze. Tyrion sat and started to drink. Sansa turned her back again to watch at the outside. They stayed this way for a few minutes until Shae and another servant came with the supper. It was about time. Tyrion was hungry. Wine didn’t fill stomachs quite well. Sansa left the balcony and sat as far as she could from Tyrion at the table, but not to the farthest one. The farthest one was right before Tyrion and she would have to look at him each time she would lift her eyes from her plate, so she chose a position between the opposite side of the table and Tyrion’s left. Sunset was hitting the back of her red hair, making it shine. While she served them Shae shot angry looks at Tyrion more than once. A lover who hates me and a wife who’s afraid of me. Thank you father. The handmaidens left and they ate the main course silently, Sansa keeping her eyes down all the time. When they were done and waited for the dessert, Tyrion tried to do some talk.

“How was your day Sansa?” he asked, trying to sound casual. Probably he failed, because she looked surprised that he talked.

“Very well, my lord. I spent most of the day talking with Lady Margaery.” She barely looked at him for a second.

“It seems the Rose still has some free time. I thought she would have none with the preparations for her marriage.”

“Lady Margaery always has time for her friends.” Her tone and her refusal to look at him clearly demonstrated she didn’t wish to pursue the conversation. Tyrion didn’t insist.

Luckily, they didn’t stay in an awkward silence for long since the servants chose this time to come back with desserts. Shae wasn’t with them this time, probably attending other duties. Sansa had an exclamation of joy when she saw the lemon cakes.

“It’s been so long since I hate some.” Tyrion had sent orders to the kitchen sooner in the day to bring some for supper. Sansa’s love for lemon cakes was well known through all the Red Keep. Tyrion had noticed there were none at their wedding, which was strange, so he hoped that might cheer her a little. The effect was there, but Tyrion decided not to tell her it was his idea. She would probably lose what little enthusiasm she had if she learned it. Tyrion preferred to see her happy because of something else than him than to see her miserable because of him. The moment was short however and Sansa soon finished the three cakes she had taken. The silence lingered again as Tyrion emptied his second glass of wine and filled a third one.

“Excuse me my lord, would you allow me to leave, I would like to visit the godswood?”

She was probably afraid he would get drunk, though for today she had nothing to fear about that. “No need to ask, you may leave.” She wasn’t a prisoner, but it was useless to tell her since she wouldn’t believe it. As she reached the door, Tyrion called her. “And Sansa, my name is Tyrion. You should get used to call me this way. We’re married, whether we like it or not.” He talked gently, trying to make her understand once more he hadn’t wanted this either.

“Forgive me, my l… Tyrion.” She corrected herself just in time.

“By the way,” he continued, “I will probably not be there when you come back. I still have work to do. I’ll only come back late in the night.” This way she would be able to fall asleep without his presence.

Sansa was looking at him intently now. Tyrion couldn’t decipher her expression. Finally she left with a faint my lord. She had already forgotten.

Tyrion went to the library to continue his work for a couple hours. At the end, he found some revenues of the crown that had no explanation at all at first sight, even less than the other ones. He would have to verify it, to see if these incomes were not another Baelish’s invention, as he had found some before. But he wouldn’t do it tonight, he needed to sleep.

He walked back to his chambers and entered silently, taking off his boots before he passed the doorstep. That wouldn’t do to wake his wife. He closed the door silently and listened to her constant breathing. She seemed to be sleeping well. Tyrion undressed himself to put on his night clothes. No need for any decency, his wife was asleep. He then extinguished the few remaining lit candles and laid down on the couch, wrapping the red blanket over himself. As he did it he realized he didn’t put it on him last night. Could it be…? No, surely he had woken up during the night to take it and didn’t remember in the drunken state he had been. Though some part of him hoped it was the other explanation that was the real one. With these thoughts Tyrion Lannister fell into a short sleep.

Chapter End Notes

For those who would like Tyrion and Sansa to fall in love immediately (especially for the HOT consummation someone is hoping so much for), I’m sorry. It is only the first day of their marriage. They need some time.

Please review

Next Chapter : Tywin POV
Chapter Notes

Another Tywin POV chapter. I like to imagine what might be going on in his head and the conflicting thoughts he must have toward Tyrion.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TYWIN II

The council meeting was long and tedious. The discussion turned essentially around the movement of most of the Stark host to the North. His daughter laughed, calling the young wolf a coward, to which Pycelle agreed fervently.

“Your Grace couldn’t have said better. Robb Stark is flying away, he knows he cannot defeat us.”

“I wouldn’t call a young man who managed to defeat the best sword in the Seven Kingdoms with an army half his size, lost no single battle and managed to get two kingdoms to proclaim him their king a coward. If Robb Stark is heading north, it’s because he has a plan to take back the advantage in the war.” Again, the dwarf pointed the stupidity of the Queen Regent’s words. Tywin would have said the same thing. Of course, the young wolf wasn’t fleeing away. And yes, he was preparing something.

“I have to agree with the words of our Master of Coins. My little birds tell me that Robb Stark is heading to the Twins to gain the support of Walder Frey by marrying his uncle, Lord Edmure Tully, to Roslin Frey.” What Varys said wasn’t news for Tywin, but for the other members of the small council it was. Now they knew.

“No need to care about it, the Freys won’t make any difference in this conflict. If they wish to join the rebels, very well, we’ll crush them as easily as we crushed Stannis. A broken bridge would be more fitting for their sigil afterwards.” Again his daughter spoke of things she knew nothing about. She thought herself ten times more clever than she was.

“Oh, really, and how do you suggest we do it?” the dwarf asked loudly, faking curiosity.

“We only have to send all our forces against him. Robb Stark will never win against our numbers.”

“It’s obvious you never followed an army in march, dear sister. An army as big as this one would be too difficult to maintain together with the supply problems. And it couldn’t live on the country since we already ravaged and plundered everything of value in the Riverlands. Robb Stark will soon have an army of some 20,000 men under his orders. Men who followed him into battle, with experience of the war, who believe in him since he won every battle he fought up to now. If we march from the south, he will stop us at Harrenhal. If we march from the west, he will stop us at Riverrun. His men are more accustomed to the weather of the Riverlands than us and they know the country better. And he lost no battle up to now, I’m quite sure he could continue this way for quite a time. Numbers didn’t seem to matter when our brother was defeated at the Whispering Woods.”

Cersei seemed taken aback by her brother’s words, but she regained her confidence in seconds.

“Then we send two armies against him from south and west. He cannot defeat both at the same time.
And even if he did, we will send other armies until he is defeated.” Tywin sighed internally. His daughter was now trying to win the argument with anything, even the stupidest notions.

“Then Robb Stark can slow down one of the army while he marches against the other and defeat it. Then he would turn against the remaining one that advanced too much into his territory. And the survivors would be hunted down by the Brotherhood without Banner. But how could you know that? While we were fighting you hid inside the Red Keep, pretending Robb Stark was no danger since he was only a child and losing two valuable hostages. And now that the last one we had is my wife, thanks to you, we have no way to make peace with Robb Stark eventually. And if Joffrey’s armies continue to lose against the rebel, I don’t think the Tyrells will stand on our side for long. Who would want to support a king unable to win a single battle?”

A huge silence fell into the room. No one had anything to reply to this. Cersei was fuming in her corner of the table, Pycelle was silent as stone, Varys was nodding silently as the Master of Coin spoke and Tywin wanted to smirk, though he didn’t. Tyrion had put Cersei back to her place, sparing Tywin the task to do it. Tyrion’s analysis of the situation was quite right, only he didn’t know what Tywin was preparing. No one knew here, not even Varys perhaps. But Tywin had to admit the halfman was very clever when it came to discuss about strategy and politics, as Tywin learned to his displeasure at the Green Fork. If Robb could win the Freys to his cause, he would be a danger again. He could even threaten Lannisport and Casterly Rock eventually, though that would be the last threat he would make. But he would never. Tywin saw to that. Some battles are won with swords and spears, others with quills and ravens.

“How long before the Stark host reaches the Twins?” he asked Varys, centering the discussion again on matters of importance.

“Two or three weeks depending on the weather. Autumn’s rains have begun, the army’s movements are slowed.”

“Very well. We’ll deal with the Freys and Robb Stark in time.” No one said anything against his word, as usual, though Tyrion looked about to say something for a time. But he didn’t. The other matters at hand included the fighting in the Riverlands where Randyll Tarly recently took Duskendale and Gregor Clegane was chasing the remnants of the northern forces from this battle. Then came financial matters. Tywin had ordered Tyrion to supervise the repairs on the docks and the Mud Gate, damaged by the attack of Stannis Baratheon. Tyrion hadn’t been able to repel the usurper when he attacked, so it was normal that Tywin put him in charge of the repairs from this battle.

“The works on the Mud Gate are nearly finished now,” the dwarf began, “but the repairs on the docks will take more time than planned. We still have squatters who come to sleep in the ruins every night and we discovered some structures in such a poor state that we had to destroy and rebuild them all over again. It seems Robert Baratheon didn’t make sure the docks were well maintained when he was in power.”

“Never mind that, Robert is dead, his son is king now,” stated Tywin. “How long before the docks are fully operational again?”

“Three months should be enough, unless we discover more surprises, which is very likely to happen. With all that the repairs have already cost twice what we expected first.”

“Then I guess it will be your duty to find the money to pay for that,” said Cersei on a patronizing tone.

“Very well, sweet sister. I plead your help in this case to use your great influence on our king to reduce the expenses of the royal wedding.”
The subject came again. Tyrion had been complaining about the cost of the wedding for weeks. Each time they faced some unforeseen situation that required money he would bring it back on the table. Cersei took part to the preparations so she was always the target in this case. Tywin was tired too from the extravagance of this wedding. They needed it to be splendid in order to show the power of House Lannister and House Tyrell, but it became so extravagant that soon they could empty half the vaults of Casterly Rock with the cost. But it was useless to come back on the subject every time.

“You should try instead to create new revenues for the crown, as Baelish did when he was Master of Coin,” he told the little man. “We will need more incomes when winter comes.”

“Alright father, I am open to suggestions. We cannot tax farms or trade with winter that is coming, to raise a poll tax on people will cause new riots, not to mention people of King’s Landing have no money to pay for it, and workshops are too few for their imposition to make any big difference.”

Tywin sighed inwardly at the stupidity of his son. There was a type of workshop he didn’t consider to tax of course, since he was the best client of these. “In this case it seems you will have to make some levy on brothels. Surely asking their customers to pay a copper every time they go to satisfy their urges won’t be too much.”

“Brothels? That’s possible. Strange there were no taxes on them before. Perhaps because our previous Master of Coin was the biggest brothel keeper of Westeros. But people will start saying the king is taxing pleasure now.” Tyrion was talking on a mocking tone. Tywin was annoyed of this. It reminded him someone else.

“Then do it, the matter is settled. And once the docks will be fully repaired, remember that you will have to see to the reconstruction of the royal fleet. Stannis stole most of it when he fled two years ago. Everyone leaves, the meeting is over.” People began to scatter around the table. “Not you,” he said to Tyrion as he grabbed his ledger. Tyrion placed it back on the table. “Sit.” Tyrion obeyed the order, not showing any emotion except disinterest. Another thing that annoyed Tywin with him. What he was about to tell him was of great importance. The two men he sent to guard and watch Tyrion and his bride on their wedding night had done their work well. They only heard a single thing through the doors during that night, probably when Tyrion spoke louder than usual. They didn’t hear a single sound, only a sole sentence. And Tywin wasn’t pleased when the men reported him they heard his son say “If my father wants someone to get fucked I know where he can start.” He was going to remind him of his duties. A whole week had passed since the wedding.

“So, beloved father, what is the reason for this little private chat we are about to have?” Tyrion spoke in a mocking tone, something Tywin hated. Every time he did it, it brought back bad memories. He was more than galled to see these expressions on Tyrion’s face.

“I received reports that the sheets collected on yours and your wife’s bed during the last week were unusually clean and white.” Surely the halfman facing him would understand what he implied with a head big as his.

“Well, that’s not surprising. My wife is very hygienic. It’s not because she comes from the North that Sansa doesn’t know how to remain presentable.”

That was more than annoying now. “You know very well what I am talking about. It’s been days since you were married to the Lady Sansa and up to now the two of you haven’t fulfilled your duties as husband and wife. I gave you the girl so that you may serve your family and offered you an opportunity to rule the North in the name of your son in the future. And you are wasting it.”

“Excuse me, beloved father, but I never asked for the North, I never asked for Sansa, and I never asked to be advised about the way I should deal with her.”
“I’m not advising about the way you should deal with the girl. I’m ordering you to do your duty to your family. The other aspects of your married life don’t concern me. You will do your duty to your family.”

“And if I refuse?” There was defiance in Tyrion’s eyes. If only he defied people for family, but instead his defiance was against House Lannister.

“There are ways to bring you to do the deed. And if not I can very well order an annulment for your marriage.” Tywin said it in his own casual way to make people understand he wouldn’t hesitate.

“Oh, Sansa would be so happy if you did it. Sadly our High Septon doesn’t really have his head on this kind of things right now. Perhaps if he did we could send her back to her family and make peace with Robb Stark before we lose another army.”

“Robb Stark will be dealt with very soon. As I told you before the days of the young wolf are numbered.”

“And may I ask how you plan to defeat a man who crushed and captured your eldest son and fooled you at the Green Fork? He may fool you again as far as I know.”

Tyrion’s insolence was unnerving. Tywin discarded the subject. He had no reason to share his plans with his Master of Coin. “Robb Stark will be dealt with. Some battles are won with swords and spears, others with quills and ravens. As for your marriage, since there will be no annulment you would do well to perform before I choose the other option.” Tyrion looked back at him with anger in his eyes. Again Tywin saw it. Two faces from two dead people on this dwarf face. He hated it.

“Now go. And you would do well to act before I decide to wait no more.” He dismissed Tyrion this way. Tyrion’s face didn’t change as he rose from his seat and left the table. After a few steps however, he stopped and turned back to face the man who raised him.

“I’m wondering father, did you treat your wife the same way that you want me to treat mine? As a brood mare?”

How dare you? You killed her and you dare to speak of her in my presence? You who murdered her to humiliate me and my House? Tywin was close to explosion, even though he didn’t show it. It didn’t happen very often, but Tyrion seemed to relish to make him uncomfortable and more. He was tired of this face, of his expressions that brought back so much memory each time he saw them.

“Go.” Tywin said it on a tone that let no place to discussion. He wouldn’t give an answer to this walking embarrassment to House Lannister. Tyrion left. Tywin went back to his study. He had work to do.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Bronn POV
Welcome into Bronn's mind.

This chapter is quite short in comparison to the others, but I didn't have so much to write about Bronn. His character isn't as profound as many others. All the same, I think it's quite interesting to see things from his perspective.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The sellsword sat in front of the desk, clipping his nails as the friend who paid him so well worked on ledgers as usual. He had become very boring since he entered his new functions, complaining about debts and wedding expenses from the beginning to the end of every day. The realm really was close to bankruptcy if his words were true, though he didn’t lack money to pay Bronn. The sellsword could be reassured on that, as long as Tyrion would live, he would be handsomely paid. That, plus the fact the dwarf was very funny, was very convincing for protecting his life, which these last times wasn’t a very hard task.

Though in fact the little man was quite less funny since he learned he was to get married, something Bronn couldn’t understand. Especially when the name of the wife was Sansa Stark. Bronn would jump on the opportunity if he was offered such a match, though he knew perfectly that would never happen. His friend, on the other hand, didn’t enjoy it a single second. What a waste.

“Perhaps you could take a break,” Bronn suggested. “It’s been hours now since your eyes left these books for the last time.”

“I’m afraid for now I can’t. I must find more money for the royal wedding and I discovered a few days ago the tax on whoring isn’t to bring as much income as we thought.”

“Ah yeah, the dwarf’s penny. I was very surprised when I discovered I had to pay it two days ago. The cost of my visits to brothels will increase thanks to you.”

“It was my father’s idea, but of course I’m the one to take the blame since I introduced it under his orders. Anyway it’s only a few pennies for each pass and considering how much I pay you now, you have nothing to complain about.”

“I’m not complaining about how much you pay me. I’m complaining about how much you make me pay.”

“Very well, if I pay these few pennies for you, will you shut up?”

“On this matter? Yes. Why isn’t it bringing as much money as you thought?”

“Because it so happens that Baelish decided to invest the money of the Crown in his beginnings as Master of Coin, when chests were not yet emptied by Robert. You’ll never guess where he invested it.”
“Oh, I see. The brothels are making less money.”

“And so the Crown as a consequence,” Tyrion confirmed. Bronn wondered if it changed things to know that he could be paying for the royal wedding by visiting a brothel. Well, since he would attend the wedding as a knight, it meant he was paying for some of the food he would eat this day. “Time for a break. And a cup of wine.” Tyrion rose from his seat and came to the table where Bronn sat, pouring himself a cup of wine.

“I thought you had no time for a break,” the sellsword pointed out.

“Now I have.” The dwarf took a good swallow. “Much better.”

“Perhaps you should accompany me tonight. I paid for two girls in advance for the whole night. If I’m in a good mood, I could let you have Marei or Dancy, the one of your choice.”

“I’m a married man now. Brothels are over for me. And anyway Shae wouldn’t like it.” He said gloomily.

“Come on. Don’t tell me you’re giving up the little joys of life for her. She’s a whore. She will understand. As for your wife, you’re not bedding her, the whole city knows it now, so you shouldn’t bother about it.” A servant told Bronn the other night about it, though he already knew.

“You can keep Marei and Dancy, I’m not in the mood for them. They wouldn’t like my company.”

“They don’t need to like it, as long as they are paid. Alright, I’ll fuck them both twice, the second time for you.” They both fell into silence for some time. Finally Bronn said what he thought. “You should send for Shae tonight. Meet her in a discrete place, no need to be the dungeons. How much has it been since you had a woman for the last time?”

Tyrion seemed to consider his cup for some time, thinking. “Two months probably.” He took another gulp.

“Then you’re in need.” Bronn said it with a smirk.

“Shae is not well disposed towards me right now. I would have more chance to end up with her dagger in me than with my cock in her if I asked her.”

Bonn knew it. The girl took the news of Tyrion’s marriage very bad. She should have known it would happen one day. Bronn enjoyed Tyrion’s company, but he knew he didn’t belong to the same world than him. Shae didn’t seem to realize it. One day or another, Tyrion would have to set her aside. “She loves you too much. You should get rid of her.”

“What do you mean?” Tyrion was incredulous.

“You should send her away. Before your father or your sister finds her. And in order to bed your wife finally.”

Tyrion dropped his eyes at his cup. “Shae will never accept to leave. Every time I talk about a ship or anything that is related to leaving she accuses me of wishing she would be gone. It would be easier if she decided to leave by herself, but that’s not something I would like.”

“You don’t want to bed your wife, and Shae refuses to fuck you because you married the girl she serves. The solution to this problem is quite obvious.” Bronn liked Shae. He wouldn’t like it if she died, so Tyrion should make her leave before it was too late. Or perhaps even marry her to Bronn, the sellsword wouldn’t complain about that. But he wouldn’t. That’s what happened when you fell in love. Bronn remembered himself to never fall in love.

“I don’t even refuse to bed my wife because of this. Well, not only because of this. Anyway, the problem isn’t Shae who refuses to fuck me. The problem is I’m not the one to seek her.”

Brons stood quite confused for a moment. Then he thought he understood. “Wait. Are you telling me she came to you and you refused her?” Tyrion made a face that indicated a positive answer. “Okay, now I really don’t understand. She came to you. Why refuse? Don’t tell me it’s because you’re married?”

This time Tyrion looked at him very seriously. Bronn couldn’t believe it. “So, you refuse to bed your wife because of Shae, and you refuse to bed Shae because of your wife.” Bronn still couldn’t believe he was saying that of Tyrion Lannister. But the way Tyrion looked at his goblet didn’t allow any doubt. “You are really the strangest halfman I have ever met.”

“Only the strangest halfman? I thought you were going to say the strangest man.”

Brons grinned. “No, you’re not, I saw too many strange men in my life. Surely one was weirdest than you. I hope you’re not really serious.” The green eyes were as serious as they ever were. Bronn sighed, discouraged. “You’re in deep shit. We have a tool between our legs and it’s not made to remain idle. It will get rusty if not used.”

“Then I’ll use my hand. And I survived a few months without using it after my father ended my first wedding, so I shall survive for now.” The Imp emptied his cup, seemingly exasperated. “Now if you’ll excuse me, I’ll try to find more money for this wedding before my father revokes me and names a Master of Coin to who he’ll give all the money he wants.”

“I’m glad my father died a long time ago.” Bronn raised just like the little man and looked at one of the books on his desk. It was no ledger for the finances, but some work from an Archmaester Adam. An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. Only by the title the book seemed boring.

“Go to Marei and Dancy, Pod can protect me for the rest of the day,” Tyrion said suddenly. He stopped a moment before he added something. “And fuck Dancy for me.”

“I thought you were married.”

“The vows don’t forbid me from dreaming of fucking another woman. And even less to ask a friend to fuck her in my stead.”

“Oh yeah, I forgot we were friends. Very well, you’ll pay for Dancy.”

“Forget what I said. I already increased your wages a few minutes ago.”

“Then I’ll fuck them for myself.”

With a grin, Bronn left Tyrion’s solar. He was going to enjoy a very good night. Two of the best whores in King’s Landing for him and him alone. Too bad the little man didn’t follow. If he plans to go celibate for the rest of his life, he should have stayed at the Wall when he visited it. As Bronn walked outside the Red Keep, he reflected once again how lucky he was to have never fallen in love.

However, he also wondered why the little man refused to bed the Stark girl. The girl was quite a beauty, she competed with Shae and even outshined her. Tyrion admitted it was partially because of Shae, but not only that. Bronn remembered their discussion before his marriage. She is a child, the dwarf had said. That couldn’t be the reason. Tyrion was sixteen when he wed for the first time, so there were good chances the whore had been younger. Especially since Tyrion revealed to Bronn later that the girl's maidenhead was intact when he entered her. She was probably sixteen or fifteen, considering Tyrion said he never had a girl as young as his actual wife. No, the age couldn’t be the reason. There was something else. Something Bronn couldn’t understand. Well, if his little friend refused to bed her, that wasn’t the sellsword’s problem. He was paid to kill people who bothered Tyrion, not to worry about his personal life. He reached the brothel and nothing during the whole night could remind him of his duties as sellsword.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Shae POV
Shae II

Chapter Notes

Shae returns. We see the evolution of the relationship between Tyrion and Sansa from her eyes.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Shae II

The spread of food was copious, as always. And so many people were still starving outside the walls of the Red Keep. If the future queen really wanted to do so much for the poor of the city, she should order the kitchens to put less in the plates of the noble men and women who resided here. She should also abandon the idea of seventy-seven courses for her wedding. As always, Shae was in bad mood as she took the tray of food for Tyrion’s and Sansa’s supper.

It was two weeks now since they were married and Shae hated it no less to serve their meals. At least there was only one per day. There were only two times where Shae would see them together: the morning when they awoke (though most of the time Tyrion was gone to work before Sansa left her bed) and the evening for supper. This last moment, they always were together. Tyrion told her last week he had to keep an impression of common life between him and Sansa. It didn’t do much good since everyone knew now they didn’t consummate their marriage. Each morning Shae feared the moment to remove the sheets from Sansa’s bed. For now, they were white as snow. And the scarce times Shae had seen Tyrion and Sansa awake at the same time, her lover always laid on the couch. From what she glimpsed, the suppers were no moment either for Tyrion and Sansa to look a functional match. They barely spoke when Shae was present. Of course, Shae was never there for the whole meal, only when it was time bring courses and take empty dishes.

She should be happy about it. The marriage wasn’t functioning obviously. Good thing for Tyrion, in time he would surely come back to her. And yet, she always wondered what happened when she wasn’t there. Shae was a whore, so she was well aware there were ways for men to satisfy their needs with their wife without entering her. Tyrion had performed them sometimes with her. She knew it would be very unlikely, Sansa’s behavior would have shown it, but she couldn’t get this idea out of her head. The thought of Sansa and Tyrion together made her sick, angry and desperate at the same time. She couldn’t lose Tyrion. As much as she resented him for marrying the poor girl, she still loved him.

It was more difficult now to be Sansa’s handmaiden. Shae loved the girl, would give her life for her, but to serve her was hard since her marriage to the man she loved. The hardest moments was when she had her irrational thoughts that Sansa might begin to have some liking for Tyrion. That was stupid, Shae knew Sansa would never like Tyrion, even less love him, but still there were times… Sansa always talked unemotionally of her husband, calling him her husband only because she had to, but a few times Shae caught what looked like a smile or the beginning of some laughing while she talked of something funny about him. She also believed Sansa was more cautious about her appearance for dinners. These little details unnerved her and she had to remember herself each time it occurred that it wasn’t real, that Sansa only did it because she had to. The most difficult moment had been last week, when they were near the docks, playing the game of imagining what a ship was carrying and where it was going. Suddenly Sansa started to talk about her family. Shae was the only one to who she dared to speak about them. She was worried about her brother and her mother, but also hopeful since they were close to the Twins where her uncle would marry Lord Walder Frey’s daughter. Perhaps her brother still had a chance to win the war. She seemed to believe it, or at least she wished to believe it. Shae was happy for her, of course. If her family could win, Sansa would leave King’s Landing and Tyrion. But Shae’s happiness turned sour when Sansa told her Tyrion believed her brother still had a chance to win the war.

Sansa also seemed to have accepted her situation. She still wasn’t happy about her marriage, but Shae had the impression she didn’t feel as uncomfortable with it anymore. Perhaps it was natural. Shae had come to accept her condition as a whore, so why Sansa wouldn’t get used to her marriage, especially in its actual shape. It wasn’t as if Tyrion was asking a lot from her. They only spent time together for the evening meal, and didn’t share the same bed. But that also made Shae angry. She felt that Tyrion cared about Sansa. But Shae knew Sansa would never love Tyrion, nor appreciate him. Never.

Shae was very close to their chambers now. She cleared her mind. Tyrion could feel what he wanted for Sansa (he was a man after all), but Sansa would never return these feelings in any positive way. He would come back to Shae once he would realize it, perhaps even run away with her. Shae entered the room.

Sansa was alone, practicing her needlework as she did most of the day these times. When Shae entered, she rose and greeted her warmly. “Shae! I’m glad to see you.”

“Thank you, my lady. I brought your supper.”

“Good.” Sansa sat, but didn’t touch her food. “Do you know where Tyrion is?”

As always a wave of anger spread through Shae. She didn’t know if she preferred Sansa to call Tyrion by his name or more formally. “I don’t know. I didn’t see your lord husband.” Shae didn’t like to call Tyrion this way when talking to Sansa, but she didn’t have much choice. She couldn’t call him with the pretty nickname she gave him in Sansa’s presence.

“I will wait.” Sansa was dutiful as always. She never ate before Tyrion arrived. Shae would have preferred that she started to eat right now, perhaps quick enough to be done with supper when Tyrion would arrive, but it was a hollow wish. Sansa would never do that. Her courtesies were her only defense here.

Shae stayed with Sansa as they waited for Tyrion. The waiting lasted for half an hour when finally her lion showed up.

“What took you so long?” Shae exclaimed before she could hold her words.

“Shae!” Sansa reprimanded her, as always when she spoke when she shouldn’t. “I’m sorry my lord, it’s just we’ve been waiting for a long time.”

“No offense taken.” He looked at his lover with an expression she couldn’t decipher. Was it anger? Rebuke? Forgiveness? “I’m sorry to be late, urgent business of Master of Coin. I get the impression that I’m working even more than when I was Hand of the King.” He sat at the opposite side of the table where Sansa was and felt the chicken with a finger. “You should have started without me. It’s cold now.”

“I am to wait for you, my lord,” Sansa answered. Shae was used to this type of answers now, Sansa had to do it in order to survive, but she hated to hear her speak this way to Tyrion. She would like Sansa to shout at Tyrion instead.
“First, it’s Tyrion. Second, you don’t need my permission to eat. Next time I’m late, begin without me.”

“If it pleases my lord.” Shae saw that Tyrion was exasperated by the hollow answers Sansa gave him. Good thing. Sansa turned her attention towards her. “Shae, prepare my things for the evening. It’s a little cold out there, I’ll need a warm cloak.”

Shae began to prepare Sansa’s clothes for her visit to the godswood. She took all her time. She wanted to know what really happened during supper. Both of them were first focused on their plates, not daring to talk. To Shae’s surprise, it was Sansa who finally broke the silence.

“Do you have any more news about my brother’s movements?” The question was addressed to Tyrion.

“Not really. He’s not very far from the Twins now I guess. A week or more and he will reach it. And then your uncle will get married.”

“I don’t understand why it takes them so much time. We covered this distance in two weeks when I came to King’s Landing.”

“It was still summer. Winter is coming now, your family’s words have never been so right. Autumn rains have begun and they must leave the Kingsroad after some time, so the march is slowed. They must get through a lot of mud.”

“Arya would like it.” Shae looked up at Sansa. The girl was looking at the wall on her left, remembering her time at Winterfell. A time she regretted so much, Shae knew it. “Everytime it would rain she would run outside and come back all dirty. Sometimes it was me who had to help her getting clean again. I hated it.”

A silence lingered for a few seconds, until Tyrion broke it. “I talked to your sister when we came at Winterfell.” Shae saw Sansa turn her face in Tyrion’s direction. “She asked me if I really was an imp.” Tyrion made a little smile while Sansa allowed a little giggle to escape her mouth. But she turned back serious very quickly.

“I’m sorry, my lord. My sister never learned to behave like a lady.”

“To be honest it was refreshing. Most of the people call me “Imp” because they hate me or look down at me. Your sister was only curious. There was no ill thoughts with her.”

“If I may, my lord, what did you answer her?”

“You’re allowed to ask it, Sansa. I told her I was an imp for sure, that I walked on rainbows to bring back gold sacks from the sky and that was why the Lannisters were so rich.” Another giggle went from Sansa. “Sadly, she didn’t believe me and called me a liar.”

Shae was beginning to feel excluded, and exasperated as well from hearing Tyrion and Sansa exchange japes. It was with her Tyrion should be laughing. But her thoughts were interrupted by Sansa’s voice.

“It doesn’t matter anyway. Arya is dead.” Sansa’s mood had turned dark so quickly, Shae was shocked. Sansa’s voice showed no sign of emotion. She hid again behind her armor of courtesies.

“I wouldn’t say that so quickly.”

“What do you mean?” Now Sansa seemed puzzled. That wasn’t the answer she was waiting from Tyrion probably. Shae’s lion straightened himself.

“Well, I only talked with your sister a few minutes, but from what I saw of her while I was at Winterfell, the things your brother Jon told me when I visited the Wall and the things I learned from the people of the Red Keep, if there’s someone in your family who looked like a wolf, physically and psychologically, it was your sister. I heard that she disappeared often when she was here in King’s Landing and that people would find her dressed and messy in such a way they would mistake her for a boy from Flea Bottom. If someone could survive anywhere amongst your kin, I would bet on her. And I wouldn’t bet right now that she is dead.”

From where Shae stood, Sansa seemed to listen very closely to what Tyrion was saying. “Do you think she’s alive?” There was hope and uncertainty in her voice.

“I think she could be.” Shae didn’t like it. Her lion was looking at his wife with the same sincere eyes he had for her so often.

One of the other handmaidens entered suddenly the room with the dessert plates. After a moment, Sansa turned to Shae, a reproachful look on her face. “Shae, you should help.” The lorathi woman muttered a quick apology and went to take the empty plates from the table. Without realizing it, Shae had stood still, not finishing the task Sansa gave her. She had been immersed by Tyrion and Sansa’s conversation. She brought back the dirty dishes with the other servant who needed help. After she closed the door behind her, she heard Sansa and Tyrion talking again, though she couldn’t understand what they were saying. She went to the kitchens hands full, then came back empty handed with the other servant. When they entered, Tyrion and Sansa were done with the sweet. The other handmaiden took charge alone to bring back the dishes.

“You know,” Tyrion was saying as she entered the room, “I could write to Castleblack and ask for some news from your brother.”

Sansa hesitated, but gave an answer nonetheless. “Jon? I don’t think it would be appropriate. The members of my family are traitors.”

Tyrion sighed loudly. “The Night’s Watch takes no part in the realm’s quarrels. And anyway, your brother is not even a Stark officially, he’s a Snow.”

“I thank you, but no. I was never very close to him anyway.” Shae could perceive regrets in Sansa’s voice.

“All right. But if you ever want, you only have to ask.” Tyrion raised from his seat and went to the couch where he sat, taking one of his books at the same time.

“Are you going to work lately again?”

“No, if I cast my eyes again on these ledgers tonight my head might explode. And with its side that would make a huge explosion.” Shae perceived again a little laugh that Sansa let escape. She hated it. “I’m probably going to read the whole night to relax. And perhaps my books will teach me something that might help me to pay for the royal wedding.”

“What are you reading?” Now was irritated that Sansa faked interest in Tyrion’s reading.

“The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money by Archmaester Maynard. I don’t think you would like it, there are no knights or ladies in distress or charming princes in this.”

“I don’t believe in it anymore.” Again Sansa’s voice as bitter. “Shae, bring my cloak. I would like you to accompany me tonight.” After she was covered, Sansa went to the door. But before she left, she said “Good night Tyrion.” As she left with her mistress, Shae saw a stunned look on Tyrion’s face. That was probably the first time Sansa called him by his name when he didn’t ask her to. That made Shae furious.

They kept silent as they wandered through the corridors of the Red Keep until they finally reached the godswood. There Sansa suddenly asked a question. “What do you think of him? Tyrion I mean.”

Shae had a hard time to not answer too roughly. “I don’t know my lady. He’s a dwarf.” It felt good to call him this way.

“Yes I know, but still, that’s not really what bothers me the most. He’s a Lannister but… I don’t know. He looks different from the rest of his family.”

Shae knew what Sansa was talking about. The other Lannisters Shae met were horrible. The times Tyrion talked about his family, the only good words he had were for his brother, who Shae didn’t know, and his two dead uncles. His father was a ruthless and cruel man who would hang her if he discovered she was Tyrion’s lover, his sister a lying bitch and a whore in all but name, his cousin Lancel an arrogant ass-kisser, his remaining uncle a man whose ideas were always the same than his brother. Tyrion also had several other cousins and an aunt whom he didn’t talk a lot about. Shae knew he appreciated a lot the bastard daughter of his uncle Gerion. He once told Shae she would love her. But Shae doubted she would ever meet the girl.

“Don’t trust anybody. Life is safer that way.” That was what she told Sansa after the riot. It seemed so long ago now. So much had happened since.

“Tyrion refused to leave with her and married the girl who Shae emptied the chamber pot. Gods were cruel if they existed, and so Shae had no intention to pray to them. And yet, if they were cruel, perhaps they would grant her something. Shae had nothing to lose. So in her head she said a prayer to the old gods, as unbelieving as she was.

Make the marriage between Tyrion and Sansa a disaster. They don’t belong together. I don’t care if you make him come back to me afterwards. I will take care of that myself. Destroy anything that could exist between them and make sure Sansa hates him. She must not love him.

With everything that happened this evening, Shae feared Sansa may begin to appreciate Tyrion, then like him, and finally fall in love with him. As Shae did before. She wouldn’t let that happen. Tyrion was hers. And she was his.
Please review

Next chapter: Sansa POV (she is back)
Sansa II

Chapter Notes

So, Sansa is back. I enjoyed very much to write this one.

And Varys is in it, playing a role that was undertook by a character in the books who doesn't appear in the show. Too bad, I liked this guy.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

SANSA II

It was a beautiful day. Sansa had put on a simple but gorgeous gown, one that was grey, the color of her family. Shae was brushing her hair, braiding it in the northern way so that it may all fall behind her shoulders. Sansa was looking at her reflection in the glass, hoping it would show nothing inappropriate. She didn’t want to look bad in any way for today.

As Shae took care of her hair, Sansa’s mind wandered to the last month. Her first month of marriage. If it could be called a marriage. She guessed it was, even though it lacked a lot of things she believed a marriage should be made of. She remembered how desperate she was when Tyrion announced they were going to marry. Tyrion’s attempts to explain to her he didn’t wish it either didn’t help, and Margaery’s words barely allowed her to see things from a better view. Sansa didn’t want to be married to a Lannister, even less to have children with him. I don’t want to have children with Tyrion.

The first week had been laborious. Tyrion’s attempts at supper to speak with her were pointless. What did he want her to tell him? He never mistreated her, of course, he was much less horrible than most of his family, but he still was a Lannister. The family who killed her father, who fought her brother. Afraid of what she should say, she hid behind her courtesies as always. She remained a little bird, always singing the same song. That irritated her husband who always abandoned after two or three questions. But what was the most distressing were the nights. Tyrion swore he wouldn’t share her bed as long as she didn’t want, but she didn’t want to believe him. Many people once made promises to her and most of the time they didn’t respect them. So the first night she waited, unable to sleep. She didn’t want to sleep. She would rather be awaken when he would come to claim his rights on her. She didn’t believe he would refuse to bed her forever and go celibate. That seemed so unlikely from a man with nocturnal activities such as his.

She remained awaken this very night, but acted as if she was sleeping, opening her eyes only enough to see him through the dim light of the moon and the remaining candles. She nearly jumped when the door opened silently, but she stayed calm, controlling her breath so she would look asleep. Tyrion had walked to the couch and then had started to disrobe. Sansa never saw a naked man before. That was so improper. The rhythm of her heart accelerated in a second. It was pounding. He’s going to do it. All his promises, they are only words. He will force me to do it. Such had been her thoughts then.

But to her great surprise he did nothing. He only put on other clothes for the night and laid on the couch, just like on their wedding night.

It was the same thing each night. Tyrion came lately, Sansa thought he would do the deed and he didn’t. And each time she would think he would consummate the marriage the next night. On the fourth night, Sansa was tired of looking away when he took off his clothes. One day or another he would ask her to perform her duties as his wife, so it was better to know how he looked under his garments before. So she looked at him and got for the first time a sight of a naked man. Well, not entirely naked, he never pulled off his breeches. But still, that was something new for Sansa. She couldn’t see much details in the dim light, but it was still enough for her to see something. He wasn’t slender like all the Lannisters seemed to be, nor big, but he seemed to have a few muscles. Sansa found it strange for a man who spent his days reading and writing. Perhaps it was only his small frame that gave Sansa this impression. He always turned his back to her. Sansa found he wasn’t as ugly as he seemed to be this way in the dark. Good. I only have to ask him to stay back to me and in the dark as we do it. That was what Sansa thought at this moment.

After a week of waiting for him each night and seeing him undress, Sansa decided he would keep his word for now. She needed more sleep. So she calmed and allowed herself to have peaceful nights. Up to now, it didn’t prove to be a mistake. Tyrion never touched her, she was still a maiden and she slept well most of the nights. Sometimes she would wake up after a bad dream and find Tyrion already left for his duties as Master of Coin or reading. He didn’t seem to sleep much. There was a dream that particularly haunted her. The same dream she did on her wedding night, where her family was present and she was marrying Ser Loras Tyrell. And the bard who always told her the same thing. Life is a song. And yours is just about to begin. She hated it. The dream reminded her of things she couldn’t have anymore. But it kept coming, always the same, so often that she could now remind every detail of it. It came every night during the first week, every two or three days now.

However, despite Sansa’s unhappiness for her marriage, she had come to find some balance in it. Her only real contacts with Tyrion were for the evening meal. She would spend the rest of the day praying in the godswood, at the sept, doing needlework or reading. Sometimes she would go to spend time with Margaery, but her friend was more and more occupied with the preparations for her wedding, so she had much less time to offer to Sansa. She would have liked to spend more time with Lady Mira, she was a Northerner after all, to know her better, but as Margaery’s handmaiden she was as occupied as her mistress and it wouldn’t do for Sansa either to forge a close friendship with another lady’s servant. There was Shae, but she had to carry out her duties first. And strangely Shae was more distant with her lately. Sansa didn’t know why.

What made the situation much more bearable was that she didn’t despise or fear her time with Tyrion anymore. After she accepted he wouldn’t bed her in the near future, Sansa decided she could be more opened with him. What facilitated her task was that he began to bring her news of her family during the second week. Tyrion told her that he was only informing her about the progress of the war anyway, that she didn’t have to ask him anything about her family so it wouldn’t look as if she worried about them. She had to admit she felt grateful for that. This way she was informed of any event Joffrey or Cersei could use to disturb her eventually. Tyrion also started to tell her how he thought the war was going and which side was at an advantage. He sincerely seemed to believe his brother wasn’t yet defeated and could still hold a long time against his father, perhaps even take back the advantage in the war if he won another battle. Sansa wanted to believe it, though she didn’t say it. Strangely, she thought Tyrion really believed what he told her. After Lancel Lannister lied before the court that her brother slaughtered an entire army with dark magic and wolves, Tyrion had come to tell her what really happened during the Battle of Oxcross. He also had told her then that her marriage with Joffrey would never take place with everything that happened between their families and that he would send her away as soon as her brother would bend the knee. She hadn’t believed him at this moment, but now she thought he had been telling her the truth. His behaviour didn’t show in any way that it had been his will to marry her.

To be honest, Sansa enjoyed her rare time with her husband now. She was alone for such a long time during the day that their discussion during supper were now the most interesting moments of the day.
Between the news he brought her, his jokes on his family and his complaints about the realm’s finances and the cost of the royal wedding, it nearly became a pleasant moment. Sansa didn’t laugh at his jokes on Cersei, Joffrey and his father, nor on any of the other members of the government, but sometimes she allowed herself to smile at them and to laugh internally. She couldn’t mock the Lannister family openly, but no one could blame her when her husband did it. Sometimes she would say Tyrion wasn’t to mock the king or the queen, but then he would make another jape on it. He knew Sansa didn’t mean what she said. It was some sort of a game. Tyrion laughing at everyone while Sansa, still wearing her armor, would falsely defend them, when most of the time she agreed with Tyrion’s comments. It was refreshing to hear someone mock and point out every flaw of the people who caused so much pain to her family. And when Tyrion would mock himself (and he did it a lot), Sansa couldn’t help but laugh, even if she only did it a little. After a few times, she had understood there was nothing to fear to laugh from someone’s joke on himself.

Sansa had come to appreciate Tyrion’s company. Sometimes he really seemed to care about her and to wish to help her. It was very possible he was sincere, he had helped her more than once before. But she didn’t want to become too much close to him. It could turn bad. She kept her distance. She still couldn’t trust him, but it didn’t forbid her to enjoy the time spent with him. She needed someone to talk to, even if it was only about trivial things. There were worse choices than her husband for that.

But today was a special day. She and Tyrion would take a walk together in the gardens. Perhaps she shouldn’t feel as if it was so special, but her days had become so dull that she relished the idea to simply walk and talk with someone. Tyrion told her it was only to show the other people their marriage wasn’t inert. And they needed to show it since everyone knew they slept in separate beds. Well, not really separate beds since Tyrion was sleeping on a couch. Sansa wondered if it was comfortable. One time she thought perhaps she should allow him to sleep in the same bed than her, but she didn’t feel comfortable about the idea of him in her bed, even if it was only for sleeping and they wore nightclothes. She didn’t trust him about it. Not yet.

She decided however to prepare herself the best she could. She had to show she tried to be the most beautiful woman for her husband. People had to believe it. And it didn’t bother her so much to do it for her husband anyway, it wasn’t as if he didn’t deserve it in some way. Sansa’s state was much better since she was married. Joffrey hadn’t dared to bother her a single time since the wedding feast. Perhaps the gelding threat had some dissuasive effect finally. Even Cersei stayed a little farther from Sansa. And Tywin Lannister had never bothered her before and didn’t change his habits. Perhaps her husband was for something in that. She had to be grateful for that at least.

Shae finally put down the brush on the table before Sansa. She was done with her hair. Sansa then raised for Shae to adjust her gown the best way possible. Shae tightened the laces so much the first time that Sansa grunted. “Shae, let me some place to breath.”

“Sorry my lady.” Shae didn’t look very sincere in her apology. Sansa wondered what she had done for her handmaiden to become so cold with her in the last days.

Shae readjusted the gown more properly and Sansa felt comfortable this way. As she finished, the door opened and Podrick went inside the room. Sansa liked Podrick. He was so shy. He always flushed when she looked at him and always was very kind. She found it hard to believe he was of the same family than Ser Ilyn Payne. People in Tyrion’s service weren’t bad. Even his sellsword’s personal guard, Bronn, was funny most of the time… if we could appreciate his humor, which wasn’t always the case. Still, he was better than Meryn Trant or Boros Blount.

“My lady,” said the boy as he looked at his feet. “Lord Tyrion is waiting for you at the gardens.”
“Thank you Podrick.” She granted him a smile, which turned the squire’s head red as a tomato.

As Sansa went to leave the room, Shae called her. “Do you want me to come, my lady?”

Sansa didn’t need Shae, but agreed all the same. “Yes, you may.” Her handmaiden followed her. With the dark mood Shae had towards her recently, Sansa thought it was better to do something for her. She didn’t want to lose one of the few friends she had here.

When they reached the entrance of the gardens Tyrion was there, talking with Lord Varys. They turned in Sansa’s direction as she arrived with Shae. “My lady, you’re beautiful today,” Tyrion greeted her.

“Thank you, my lord.” She turned towards the Master of Whispererers. “Lord Varys,” she said, courteous as always. Courtesies are a lady’s armor.

“Lady Sansa.” The eunuch bowed his head, speaking with his soft voice. “It is a pleasure to see you again. But I don’t want to disturb you and your husband. I wish you a good day.” He bowed deeply again and walked away.

Sansa didn’t know what to make of the man. She was wary of him. He seemed so mysterious. Strangely some of his ways reminded her of Lord Baelish. He never did anything against her, but never helped her either. She only remembered that he said perhaps there was wisdom with her words when she pleaded for her father’s life before Joffrey. But he never lifted a finger when her father was arrested or beheaded, nor when she was beaten by Joffrey’s Kingsguards. There was however one thing that troubled her most of all. It was the discussion she had with him at her wedding.

When Sansa had left the dais where she stood with Tyrion during the feast, vexed by his drunken behaviour, Lord Varys had intercepted her. He complimented and congratulated her for her marriage, saying he was sure she would be happy and have many children with her husband. Sansa had hidden behind her courtesies, saying she hoped she wouldn’t disappoint or shame Lord Tyrion, considering she came from a family of traitors. It was easy for her to sing this song now, she had done it for such a long time. However, the next words of the bald man surprised her. She still recalled the entire conversation.

“I know this isn’t the marriage you wanted, my lady.” His expression had turned apologetic, sad. “You don’t have to deny it nor to confirm it, I know this is the truth. I am not the Master of Whisperers for nothing. We cannot be happy when we marry someone whose family is in war against our own. And I know you wanted to marry Ser Loras. But I think you deserve the truth.” He had made a small pause before continuing. “You wouldn’t have been happy with Ser Loras, I’m afraid. We must not always judge people by their appearances or even the way they act publicly. Lord Tyrion may not seem to be quite a good match, especially right now.” He had given a mixed look in Tyrion’s direction at this time. Sansa didn’t have to turn her head, she knew what the man meant. “But, in your situation, I think it may probably be the best thing that could happen to you. Lord Tyrion is never going to hurt you, nor to let anyone hurt you, and he will do everything into his power to make you happy, however difficult it may be. He is a bigger man than he seems. A very small man can cast a very large shadow.”

Sansa hadn’t known how to answer it. She had only thanked Lord Varys and taken leave of him, climbing the stairs. She had been deep into her thoughts about what he said as she walked away, but then Joffrey appeared from nowhere, threatening to rape her on her wedding night, and she forgot everything. Now however, she wondered if Lord Varys had been sincere when he told her Tyrion would be a good husband. She thought about everything that happened since they were married. Perhaps Lord Varys wasn’t entirely wrong. Tyrion didn’t prove to be a bad husband up to now.
“So, my lady, are you ready?” Tyrion’s words got her out of her reflections.

“Yes, my lord.”

“Time to make a show of us in front of the whole nobility of Westeros,” Tyrion said as they started to walk into the gardens. Sansa had to laugh about it. It was true they were quite an odd pair. She was probably two feet taller than Tyrion. And her husband wasn’t good looking as her. Though when she thought about it again, she had to admit perhaps she had found Tyrion ugly more because he was a Lannister and a dwarf. She had to admit Margaery was right about one thing: his scar made him more handsome.

They walked silently through the gardens, not talking very much. They enjoyed the fresh air of the afternoon. Sansa caught a few people staring at them with disapproval or smirks. She didn’t care about it anymore. She had time to get used to it ever since the war began, and she would rather face people laughing at her in her back than Joffrey’s wrath for whatever petty reason he could find. At one moment however, there were two men who passed beside them. She heard them laughing when they were behind. From their clothes, they seemed to be from the Westerlands. Sansa acted as if they didn’t exist, but Tyrion started to mutter something.

“Ser Eldrick Sarsfield and Lord Desmond Crakehall. Ser Eldrick Sarsfield and Lord Desmond Crakehall.” It was the names of the two men.

“What are you doing?” she asked.

“I have a list.”

For a moment Sansa was afraid. “A list of people you mean to kill?” Was she married to a man who would murder people for so few?

“For laughing at me? Do I look like Joffrey to you?” Tyrion looked half insulted and half amused. Sansa relaxed. “No, death seems a bit extreme. Fear of death, on the other hand…”

“You should learn to ignore them.” It was useless to remember everyone who laughed at you when you couldn’t get a revenge on them. That was a vain hope. The worse ones always lived.

“My lady, people have been laughing at me far longer than they’ve been laughing at you. I’m the Halfman, the Demon Monkey, the Imp.”

“You’re a Lannister. I am the disgraced daughter of the traitor Ned Stark.”

“The disgraced daughter and the Demon Monkey. We’re perfect for each other.”

Sansa had to chuckle. It was true. What a joke their marriage was, and yet it seemed gods conspired to bring two people mocked by everyone together. It was better to laugh at it than to pity it. Though she also reflected what Tyrion said was true. He was no traitor, he held an important position in the government, but people were mocking him all the same. They would never do it openly in Lord Tywin’s presence, the Hand of the King didn’t seem to be one that would allow one of his children, as much as he hated him, to be mocked publicly in front of him. Otherwise he wouldn’t have started a war for a son he despised. People laughed at Sansa since her family were branded traitors, but before she was respected by everyone as the eldest daughter of the Warden of the North. Tyrion was mocked ever since he was born. And he wasn’t even mocked because of his actions or his family’s doings, but because of what he looked like. Something he never chose. Sansa felt a pang in her heart for Tyrion at this moment. Perhaps she should make a list too, only to subtly mock the people who laughed at her when the moment was appropriate. That could be funny.
“So, how should we punish them?” she asked to her husband on a fake serious tone.

“Who? Whom?”

“Ser Eldrick Sarsfield and Lord Desmond Crakehall.”

“Ah. I could speak to Lord Varys and learn their perversions. Anyone named Desmond Crakehall must be a pervert.” He didn’t look much more serious than her.

“I hear that you’re a pervert.”

“I am the Imp. I have certain standards to maintain.” Sansa chuckled again. As always, he was laughing at himself. But she had a better idea to punish the two men. Something she experienced in Winterfell thanks to Arya. She went to a bench, sat to be at Tyrion’s level and began to speak on a conspiratorial tone.

“Or we could sheep shift Lord Desmond’s bed.” Tyrion looked perplexed. Good, he won’t know what I’m about to suggest. “You cut a little hole in his mattress and you stuff sheep dung inside. Then you sew up the hole and make his bed again. His room will stink, but he won’t know where it’s coming from.” That was very unladylike, just like Sansa’s sister. Sansa knew she would never do that, but it was funny to imagine she would do it.

“Lady Sansa!” her husband exclaimed with a false indignant voice. After a month, she knew when Tyrion was being serious and when he wasn’t.

“My sister used to do that when she was angry with me. And she was always angry with me.” She didn’t see anything evil about telling this to Tyrion. That’s not as if she was giving any sensitive information about her family to a Lannister. She still didn’t trust him, but it didn’t mean she couldn’t enjoy his company or laugh with him about unimportant things. It was tiring to be always reserved and silent.

“Why sheepshift?” He didn’t seem to understand what she meant.

Leaning forward to speak very lowly, she said “That’s the vulgar word for dung.” She found it odd that Tyrion wouldn’t know what it meant. He had such a crude language, Sansa had to get used to it since their wedding.

Tyrion seemed uncomfortable suddenly. He even seemed to glance at Shae for an instant, which meant a lot. Tyrion wasn’t in very good terms with Sansa’s handmaiden and could never remember her name. “My lady…” He was hesitant, but also smiling, as if something was amiss in all that. For a man who didn’t care about using vulgar words…

“Well, you asked me.”

Tyrion’s squire appeared on their left at this moment, running.

“My lord, my lady. Your father has called a meeting of the small council.” Sansa wouldn’t have thought a month ago that she would regret not spend more time with Tyrion, but right now she did.

“Oh, this means bad news probably.” Tyrion turned to her. “I’m sorry my lady, the Hand is calling me.” He really looked sorry. As was Sansa. “Sheila?” Sansa had to sigh again. No matter how many times he would hear it, Tyrion never remembered Shae’s name.

“Shae.” Her handmaiden responded in an even darker mood than usual when Tyrion made that “Could you accompany back Lady Sansa to her chambers. You too Pod, I think I can find my way the Tower of the Hand alone.” He turned to Sansa once again. “I’ll come back for supper. It shouldn’t be too long.” Sansa hoped so too. She smiled at her husband and raised from the bench. She left in one direction with Shae and Podrick while Tyrion took the other one. At least, there will still be the supper. Perhaps I can make it last longer than usual. It was a beautiful day and she didn’t want Tywin Lannister to ruin it with politics or finances.

When they got back to her chambers Sansa sent Shae and Podrick away. Both surely had duties somewhere else anyway. She wanted to be alone until Tyrion came back. She went to his desk and looked at the books on it. A week ago Sansa had started to read some books of her husband. There were so much that she had the impression she had more choice than when she was at Winterfell. Sansa liked to read. In fact, among her brothers and sister, she was the one would could read and write the better. She remembered all the hours she spent reading stories about knights and beautiful ladies. Then she would wait for her friend Jeyne Poole to finish her own book. Jeyne always read slower than her. Sometimes Sansa would find some passage of a story so marvellous that she talked about it immediately to her friend. Jeyne was always angry about that because she wasn’t yet there and Sansa had stolen her the joy of reading it. The thought made Sansa sad. She hadn’t seen her friend for so long. Her father was killed along with the rest of her father’s household when he was arrested. Jeyne was probably dead now, killed with everyone else when Winterfell was burnt by the ironborn. And to think Jeyne once had eyes for Theon… Sansa chased the memory. She didn’t want to be sad, not today.

She looked at the book Tyrion had read two weeks ago. It was a book on economics written by Archmaester Maynard. At the first page the author claimed to be born Jon Keynes. Sansa had never heard of a House Keynes before. A few days ago she had only read a page she randomly chose and decided she wouldn’t like the reading. It talked of things she couldn’t understand, something called a “liquidity trap.” Sansa always was the best in their studies with master Luwin, but when it came to numbers and ledgers she couldn’t manage it. Perhaps because she thought it to be useless and boring. Writing could help her for love letters, reading for reading the same letters, singing to please other people, needlework to show other people how she could make beautiful things, but how would she impress anyone with numbers? Arya always was better than her with them. There was no art in numbers. Now she thought perhaps she had been wrong. Singing, needlework, dancing, dressing, writing and reading seemed rather useless here in King’s Landing. She should have been taught politics, to be prepared to the real world like Margaery. And seeing how the finances of the realm were exhausting Tyrion, numbers didn’t seem as useless as before. She only learned to be a perfect lady. How stupid she had been, to imagine life was a song. How useful what I have learned has been.

Tyrion didn’t read much fairy tales, his books were all about serious subjects, but to be honest Sansa was no more in the mood for her ancient passions. Instead she chose a book she had started yesterday. Dragons, Wyrms, and Wyverns: Their Unnatural History. It was quite fascinating to learn about fantastic things that disappeared long ago. She sat on the bed and began to read. She hadn’t read for more than five minutes when the door opened and Margaery erupted into the room.

“Margaery!” Sansa was so glad to see her again. It had been more than a week since the last time they spoke.

“Sansa.” There was something strange in the way her friend looked at her. She walked quickly toward Sansa and strongly hugged her. “Sansa, I’m so sorry.”

Sansa broke her embrace. “Sorry about what?” She didn’t understand.
Margaery looked at her with big eyes. “You don’t know?” Her friend deeply sighed. “I thought Tyrion would have told you.”

“Tell me about what?” There was no sense to what Margaery was saying. She acted as if something terrible had happened.

“Please sit Sansa. I must tell you something.” Sansa sat on the bed again, feeling uneasy. What could have happened for Margaery to be so troubled? Margaery sat on her left. Her face was full of sadness. She took some time before she began to speak. “Sansa, you knew your uncle Edmure was supposed to marry the daughter of Lord Frey?”

“Yes, Tyrion told me weeks ago. Did something happen? Was the marriage aborted?” If it was the case, that was very bad news. This marriage was the last chance for her brother if he wanted to win the war.

“No, the marriage took place.” Sansa felt relieved for a time. But then, what had Margaery in such a state? “But it was a trap.”

In a few sentences Margaery told her what happened. And Sansa’s world collapsed.

Chapter End Notes

So, I guess everyone knows what Margaery told Sansa. Sorry for those who hoped Robb and Catelyn Stark would survive. As I wrote at the beginning of my fic, my story follows the show until an event near Joffrey's wedding changes the whole story.

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Chapter Notes

This chapter may seem not very imaginative, but it was very important for my fic to have it. It is very important for Tyrion's psychological development. And it is one of my favorite scenes in Game of Thrones.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

TYRION III

To say that Tyrion was in a bad mood when he entered the small council chamber would be an euphemism. He had a good time with Sansa finally, and his father chose this moment to summon him for gods know why. He hoped that wouldn’t be too long. As he reached his seat, he noticed Joffrey was present. That was quite strange since Joffrey shared perfectly the disdain of his so-called father for the small council business.

Joffrey seemed excited as Tyrion ever saw before. “Killed a few puppies today?” he asked Mad King the Second.

“Show him. Come on, show him,” Joffrey ordered to Grand Maester Pycelle, jumping from one foot to another.

Pycelle took a rolled parchment in front of him and handed it with a shaking hand to Tyrion, but let it drop on the floor. “Oh, apologies, my lord. Old fingers.” I should have let you rot in the black cells.

Tyrion was in no state to be patient with the mockery of the old dying man. He only wanted to go back to his chambers and spend the rest of the day with his wife, since his time with her was pleasant now. He grabbed impatiently the scroll and read the content aloud.

“Roslin caught a fine fat trout. Her brothers gave her a pair of wolf pelts for her wedding. Signed Walder Frey.” Was it why his father summoned him? To read bad jokes from the Lord of the Crossing? “Is that bad poetry or is it supposed to mean something.”

“Robb Stark is dead. And his bitch mother.” Joffrey sneered as he said it. Tyrion on his side was numb all of a sudden. Robb and Catelyn Stark, dead? How was it possible? And then he understood. A pair of wolf pelts. Damn Freys! His father was looking at him very seriously. In an instant Tyrion knew what had happened.

“Write back to Lord Frey. Thank him for his service and command him to send Robb Stark’s head. I’m going to serve it to Sansa at my wedding feast.”

“Your Grace, Lady Sansa is your aunt by marriage,” Varys quickly pointed out before Tyrion could say anything. Anger was rising in him.

“A joke. Joffrey did not mean it.” Tyrion didn’t believe the sweet words of his sister a single moment. Her little monster meant it more than he ever meant anything in his life. And his nephew’s next words only confirmed it.
“Yes, I did. I’m going to have it served to Sansa at my wedding feast.”

“No.” It was more than Tyrion could support. The stupid king whose ass he once saved turned his head in his direction when Tyrion interjected. “She is no longer yours to torment.”

“Everyone is mine to torment.” Joffrey walked in his direction and stood before him, towering his uncle. If he was trying to intimidate Tyrion it didn’t work. Joffrey had nothing in common with his grandfather. “You’d do well to remember that, you little monster.”

You should look at yourself. If there’s a monster in this room you are the perfect candidate. “Oh, I’m a monster. Perhaps you should speak to me more softly, then. Monsters are dangerous and just now kings are dying like flies.” Tyrion said it while staring at Joffrey directly in his eyes. Perhaps he shouldn’t have said it, but for now he couldn’t care less. He was more than happy to tell Joffrey who he really was. And to show him he had no fear of him.

Joffrey was taken aback by his words. Last time Tyrion saw him in this state was when he threatened to geld him at his own wedding. He should have done it back then. Joffrey stared stupidly at him, then in his grandfather’s direction, than again at him, as if he couldn’t believe what he just heard. Of course he couldn’t believe it. Tyrion’s sister had filled Joffrey’s head with foolish ideas, such as he could do everything he wanted since he was the king and no one could question him. Tyrion was the only one who managed and had the courage (or the stupidity, they were probably the same here) to confuse Joffrey this way.

“I could have your tongue out for saying that.” Joffrey pointed his index at Tyrion on a menacing tone. But Tyrion didn’t care. If Joffrey wanted his tongue, he could try. If he took it, Tyrion would take much more from him, and that would be for the good of the realm. Anyway Joffrey would never dare to try anything against his uncle. He had no guts for this. His sister was looking with fear at her son, unable to control him as usual. Pycelle looked as shocked as the king, his father stared impassively at him and Varys looked afraid of what might happen next. Perhaps he really was afraid for Tyrion now, if their friendship was real.

“Let him make his threats. Hmm? He’s a bitter little man.” His sister was failing to subdue her son, as always. And as if it was necessary, the lickspitter on Tyrion’s left chose that moment to make Joffrey even worse.

“Lord Tyrion should apologize immediately. Unacceptable, disrespectful, and in very bad taste.”

“I am the king!” As if no one knew it already. “I will punish you.” Joffrey could look ominous, but Tyrion knew that he was no more than a dog barking into a cage.

“Any man who must say “I am the king” is no true king.” His father finally spoke. On that Tyrion couldn’t more agree with him. “I’ll make sure you understand that when I’ve won your war for you.”

“My father won the real war. He killed Prince Rhaegar. He took the crown while you hid under Casterly Rock!” Joffrey was screaming now, making great moves with his arms. And he couldn’t have said something worse for him. You never talked this way to Tywin Lannister.

Joffrey seemed to realize it at the moment the words came out. Cersei stared at her son, her face between disapproval and fear. Pycelle looked as unbelieving from what was happening as when Tyrion threatened the king. Varys was looking at the king as if he was the most stupid person in the world. And Tyrion looked at his father, quite interested to see how he would react.

Lord Tywin stared icily at his grandson, anger boiling behind his eyes. Joffrey tried to gain back his composure. “The king is tired. See him to his chambers.”
Cersei didn’t have to be asked a second time. She immediately rose to bring her little monster to bed. “Come along.”

“I’m not tired.” Joffrey was speaking in a low voice. He wanted to look powerful, but before the Hand he was nothing more than a screaming boy.

“We have so much to celebrate. A wedding to plan. You must rest.” Cersei took the king by the hand to lead him away.

“Grand Maester, perhaps some essence of nightshade to help him sleep.” Yes, and with some luck he will accidentally give him too much and the realm will get rid of another king. And this time from the one he should. His father was the one to give the orders in this room, it was obvious to everyone. Everyone but Joffrey.

“I’m not tired!” Mad King the Second tried a last attempt to use an authority he didn’t have. Tyrion’s father was nearly smiling at the boy’s stupidity and powerlessness now. Joffrey reluctantly accepted to follow his mother. That had been funny finally. Tyrion appreciated to see his repulsive nephew being put back into place by someone else than him. He knew however it wasn’t the end. Tyrion knew the look in his father’s face when Joffrey called him a coward. Tywin Lannister would give a lesson to his grandson for that later, when he would have thought about something appropriate to remember him who he was.

Pycelle left shortly after, taking his scrolls with him. Then Varys followed. As Tyrion left quietly his seat, his father called him. “Not you.” He didn’t know what he would hate the most: stay for a conversation with his father on a topic he guessed quite easily, or go back to his rooms and face Sansa.

“You just sent the most powerful man in Westeros to bed without his supper.” He feigned indignation while he said it.

“You’re a fool if you believe he’s the most powerful man in Westeros,” his father answered on a more than serious tone.

“A treasonous statement. Joffrey is king.”

“You really think a crown gives you power?” You should say it to Cersei. She believes it.

“No.” Tyrion sat. He was going to get confirmation of what he was already sure. “I think armies give you power. Robb Stark had one, never lost a battle, and you defeated him all the same.” His father was confirming what Tyrion said with soft sound from his voice. “Oh, I know. Walder Frey gets all the credit. Or the blame, I suppose, depending on your allegiance. Walder Frey is many things, but a brave man? No. He never would have risked such an action if he didn’t have certain assurances.”

“Which he got from me. Do you disapprove?” His father was smiling more than ever, which wasn’t much, as Tyrion slowly outlined his role in the slaughtering. His father confirmed his thoughts as casually as if they were talking about weather.

“I’m all for cheating. This is war. But to slaughter them at a wedding…”

“Explain to me why it is more noble to kill ten thousand men in battle than a dozen at dinner?”

“So that’s why you did it? To save lives?” His father didn’t care about the victims of a war, unless he thought it would be bad for House Lannister.

“To end the war. To protect the family. Do you want to write a song for the dead Starks? Go ahead, write one.” Perhaps that’s not such a bad idea. A song to remember the butchery my father was responsible of. It would do well to play it along with the Rains of Castamere. “I’m in this world a little while longer to defend the Lannisters, to defend my blood.”

“The northerners will never forget.” Tyrion was more than serious as he warned his father.

“Good. Let them remember what happens when they march on the south.”

His father began to gather the documents before him. Tyrion couldn’t believe his father was so naïve. To think the northerners would never raise again because they would be afraid? He didn’t know the people of the North. Tyrion did. He had visited the North when the royal party had come to Winterfell. He had seen how were the northerners. Proud, fierce, honorable, loyal, hard people who knew the rigor of winter. And attached to the Starks. There must always be a Stark in Winterfell. Since the legendary time of Brandon the Builder, more than eight thousand years ago, the Starks had ruled the North as Kings in the North, then as Wardens of the North after the Targaryen conquest. The family was respected, even loved by all the northerners. They would never forgive what the Lannisters had done at the Twins. One day or another, the south would be weak, and then they would revolt again. And if they were defeated, they would wait until another occasion presented itself. It was going to be an unending succession of uprisings and civil wars. His father had destroyed any hope for a lasting peace in the Seven Kingdoms for the next centuries. And he didn’t realize it. He had slaughtered the last surviving members of an eight thousand years-old house. Well, there was one who was still alive, but she was no longer a Stark. She was a Lannister.

“All the Stark men are dead,” began his father. “Winterfell is a ruin. Roose Bolton will be named Warden of the North until your son by Sansa comes of age.” As he rose, Tywin Lannister added a last sentence for his son. “I believe you still have some work to do on that score.”

“Do you think she’ll open her legs for me after I tell her how we murdered her mother and brother?” Tyrion was standing before his father now, full of anger. The last surviving members of his wife’s family, his mother-in-law and brother-in-law had just been slained, and the man behind it was telling him to put a son into his wife.

“One way or another, you will get that girl pregnant.”

“I will not rape her.” Tyrion made it clear, staring directly in his father’s eyes. The Lord of Casterly Rock wouldn’t force him to rape his wife. Not again. His father seemed to understand what he meant.

“Shall I explain to you in one easy lesson how the world works?”

“Use small words. I’m not as bright as you.” His father ignored the jape.

“The house that puts family first will always defeat the one that puts the whims and wishes of its sons and daughters first.” Tyrion looked to the ceiling, to look as if he was considering his father’s words. He had heard this type of lesson from him more than once. “A good man does everything in his power to better his family’s position regardless of his own selfish desires.”

Tyrion nearly laughed at the last words. Regardless of his own selfish desires. If Tyrion really followed his selfish desires, Sansa wouldn’t be a maiden anymore, she would probably already have a son in her womb, and Stannis Baratheon would be sitting on the Iron Throne since Tyrion would never have come to King’s Landing on his father’s orders. Tyrion desired Sansa, but that was no reason to cause her more suffering than she already endured. And if Tyrion bed her without her consent, then he would be a monster as Joffrey called him a few minutes ago. A whore was willing to take you into her bed as long as you paid her. Sansa wasn’t. She was his wife. He had sworn to protect her when he put the cloak on her shoulders. Even from himself.

“Does that amuse you?” his father asked him when he saw Tyrion’s sniggering.

“No, it’s a very good lesson. Only it’s easy for you to preach utter devotion to family when you’re making all the decisions.”

“Easy for me, is it?”

“When have you ever done something that wasn’t in your interest but solely for the benefit of the family?” His father’s dedication to House Lannister was the one thing no one ever questioned. Tell me a single time you acted against your interest for House Lannister? You probably don’t know what it is.

“The day that you were born.” The answer let Tyrion bewildered. “I wanted to carry you into the sea and let the waves wash you away. Instead, I let you live. And I brought you up as my son.” Tyrion had never seen his father so emotive. Never so close to shed tears if he could. “Because you’re a Lannister.” And he left his son there, frozen.

Through the years Tyrion had developed defenses against the attacks of the others against him, including from the other members of his family. But right now, they were useless. He had never been so hurt by his father. Tyrion had lost what little love he had for him after what happened to his first wife. Despite this, he had always wished to impress his father, to prove him he was worthy of the name of the Lannisters, worthy to be his heir and to lead their house after his death. Tyrion had craved for his approval. Now he knew he had been stupid all along. His father never loved nor wanted him. And he would never. He might use Tyrion as long as he needed him, like a tool, but he would never have for him the same affection he had for Jaime or Cersei, faint as it was.

Tyrion stood there a long time, lost in his thoughts, reliving every moment of his life where he had tried to make his father proud of him, each time without success. Now he knew he didn’t have to wish anything good from his father in the future. After some time, he realized his father’s words had made him forgotten something much more important. Sansa. I have to tell her. That wasn’t something he looked forward to, but he had no choice. She was his wife. He owed her this. And it would be better if he told her before Cersei or Joffrey could. The task wasn’t more pleasant for all that. Slowly he walked out of the room and went down the long stairs of the Tower of the Hand. As he walked, he thought how Sansa had looked happy during the day. After a month he finally had succeeded to break her shell, not entirely but still. She was smiling, laughing, enjoying life once again it seemed. She had even hoped her brother could win the war and free her. Tyrion wouldn’t have been unhappy for her if it had happened. He would have regretted it, since she would leave him and he began to enjoy the time he spent with her. And he was a Lannister. He would have to fight her family, maybe personally. Now he had to crush all her hopes because of the butchery his father organized… for the good of House Lannister. And Sansa was a Lannister.

He had no choice. He couldn’t hide the truth from her. He wished he could delay the revelation, to allow her a complete day of happiness at least. But he couldn’t. His family had slaughtered hers. What kind of husband would he be if he enjoyed his time with her when he didn’t deserve it.

He finally reached the door of their chambers. He knew she was on the other side, perhaps waiting for him. Tyrion collected all the courage he had in his small body and pushed the door. Sansa was sitting on the edge of the window, looking at the outside, the sunshine making her hair more red than ever. He couldn’t see her face. She was more beautiful than ever this way.

With a lump in the throat, Tyrion called after her. “Sansa.” She turned her head towards him. Her eyes were red as her hair and tears were rolling on her cheeks. She knew. There was only hatred in her eyes for him. Tyrion never thought such a look from someone could be so painful. At this moment, his wife looked very much like her mother. It was as if Catelyn Stark was looking down on him. Sansa averted her eyes from him after a moment.

There was nothing Tyrion could do. He turned around and left the room. As he left the room, Tyrion remembered how he had always been proud to be a Lannister. But right now he wasn’t.

What have we done?

Chapter End Notes

If you disagree with my way to see Tyrion's thoughts during this scene, feel free to insult me in your comments.

Please review

Next chapter: Shae
Shae III

Chapter Notes

A short chapter with Shae and her reaction after the Red Wedding.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SHAE III

Shae left the chambers of her mistress very quietly. She had come back from the kitchens after bringing the plates still full. Three days had passed since the news of what people called the “Red Wedding” had reached the capital. And for three days Sansa barely ate something. Dishes came out and in the kitchen the same. More wasted food. But she could barely blame Sansa for that.

Shae never had a real family, so she couldn’t really know what Sansa was feeling right now. But she remembered how she felt when she thought Tyrion’s life was in danger. What Sansa felt had to be worse than her own distress in these times. Shae tried to be there for Sansa, but she wasn’t of very much help in this situation. She didn’t know what to tell her. Now Sansa had sent her away, wishing to be alone, as she had wanted so often for three days.

Shae decided to pay a visit to Tyrion. It was time of the midday meal. Perhaps Shae could make people believe she was only helping Tyrion’s squire on Sansa’s orders. As if Sansa would do something for her husband now. Shae loathed the thought of their marriage as always, but strangely she didn’t enjoy the fact Tyrion and Sansa didn’t get along well anymore. Wasn’t it what Shae desired? What she even asked to the old gods in her false prayer? Probably, but not this way. She was more sure than ever now that if gods existed, they were not benevolent.

Shae entered Tyrion’s solar without a knock. He was sitting at his study, bent over ledgers as always, eating at the same time. “Not yet, I’m not done with the food.” Anger boiled into Shae. He didn’t even look at her.

“Do you think I came here for the dishes?”

Tyrion raised his eyes upon her. “What are you doing here? I told you you can’t.” Shae stared at him with a reprimanding look, arms crossed on her chest. “Sorry, I thought it was Pod.” She relaxed a little bit, but not much.

“Your wife asked me to help your squire since she doesn’t require my services.”

“I doubt she would ask that from you right now. But that’s a good excuse for coming. Wine?” Shae nodded and her lion filled a cup for her. She took it and drank. She didn’t know this vintage, but it was good. Wine was wine.

“How are you, my lion?” She was concerned about Tyrion. He didn’t really seem in a better mood than Sansa. She hated that Tyrion was sad because of his wife’s sadness, but she couldn’t help but worry about him.

“Well, my family slaughtered people at a wedding, breaking the guest rights, I discovered my father wanted to kill me the day I was born, my wife hates me because my family murdered hers, and my lover hates me because I wed someone else.”

Shae nearly laughed about it. She would have liked to fuck her lion for they would forget everything for a few moments, but in fact she didn’t really want to do it. And she knew Tyrion wouldn’t want. He never wanted now. They stayed silent for a good time.

“How is she?” Tyrion finally broke the silence.

“Her whole family was butchered. How do you think she is?”

“Not well, of course. I’m not stupid.” Tyrion didn’t seem outraged by her answer. His voice was low and full of regrets. It didn’t help Shae to feel any better towards him.

“Then you shouldn’t ask if you already know the answer.” Shae’s cup was empty now. She put back the cup on his desk. “Do you want me to leave?”

Tyrion wasn’t even looking at her. “People could ask questions.”

Shae knew what it meant. She went to the door and, without a gaze for her lover, left as she said “Have a good day, my lion.”

Shae walked away and went to the gardens. She had nothing to do for now. No one wanted her presence. She found a quite isolated spot where only a few people came and looked at the Blackwater Bay. Ships were sailing. There weren’t many, but more than before the Tyrells made their alliance with the Lannisters. She knew Tyrion was supervising repairs on the docks and that there should be much more ships if they were in good state.

Shae wondered what she did for being in her situation. The man she loved was married to a girl ten years younger than her. And even now the girl in question hated him, he seemed less attracted to Shae than ever. She knew Tyrion enough to understand why in some way. First he was lustful, and Shae always doubted she would be enough forever. But even more, her lion had a soft spot in his heart for dwarfs, bastards, cripples and broken things. Sansa was a broken thing while Shae was none of these. Everything Shae didn’t have, Sansa had it. And everything Shae had, Sansa had it better. Name, youth, innocence, beauty, high birth, tenderness, manners, even a maidenhead. Shae had lost her own a long time ago. How painful it had been and in such a horrible way. Would she have suffered so much to lose it to her lion? She would never know the answer.

“When did you come to this strange country?” Varys’s voice startled her.

He always came to you when you expected him the less. But Shae wasn’t upset of the man’s presence. She considered him a friend and he considered her a friend too. Both came from the East and were lowborn. Varys understood Shae in a way Tyrion would never understand her because he went through the same difficulties than her to get where he was. With him Shae could say everything she thought or felt. Things she would never share with her lion. And she had spied on Tyrion at her arrival in King’s Landing for the man, or rather observed him. After some time, it was no spying at all. Varys and Shae both were Tyrion’s friends. Shae only brought him information on her lover because she believed Varys was trying to help the two of them. It was thanks to him if she hadn’t been discovered yet and that she had some private time with Tyrion before his marriage. Varys was protecting her lion, though in the way he spoke sometimes, there wasn’t much difference between spying on him and protecting him.

“When I was thirteen,” she answered.

“You were only a child.”
“I stopped being a child when I was nine. My mother made sure of that.” She looked again at the bay, memories of her parents coming back. What a family they had been for her. She thought she had found a true family after she realized her love for Tyrion, but now it seemed to be slipping under her fingers.

“You’ve been a good influence on our mutual friend, you know. He used to drink from sundown to sunup, visit three brothels a night, gamble away his father’s money. Now it’s just the drinking.”

Shae had to smile to the eunuch’s observation. Perhaps it was true, in some way. “And now I’m his wife’s servant. I brush her hair and clip her nails and empty her chamber pot.”

“She is a sweet young thing. None of this is her fault.”

Shae turned to face Varys. Did he really think she was unaware of that? “I love that girl. I would kill for her. Do you think that makes it easier for me?”

“No, I expect not.” He couldn’t be more right.

Shae turned again to gaze at the sea, expressing her frustration aloud. “She’s young and she’s beautiful and highborn.”

“We break bread with them, but that doesn’t make us family. We’ve learned their language, but we’ll never be their countrymen.” Shae wished she didn’t believe what Varys was telling her, but in her heart she knew it was true. “If you let yourself believe that a foreign girl with no name could spend her life with the son of Tywin Lannister…”

“I have a name.” Shae faced the bald man once again. He dared to say she was nobody.

“You have one name. As do I. Here only the family name matters.” He looked really regretful. Shae had the impression he was trying to tell her something. She liked the man, but couldn’t he speak more clearly?

“What do you want from me, Lord Varys?”

The eunuch looked around him. Shae knew they were alone. He approached her and put a pouch in her hand. “Diamonds. I’d tell you to beware carrying so much wealth, but you know how to protect yourself. Get on one of those ships. Sail for Pentos or Lys or Myr. You can buy a house with these diamonds, a very large house. Hire servants. Start a new life, a good life, far from here.” Shae had to smile to what he was telling her. That was the kind of offer she would have accepted right away not long ago. Varys was waving his hands at her. “The mysterious foreign beauty. You’ll have suitors lining up.”

Does he take me for a whore? I am no whore. Not anymore. “Why do you want me to leave?”

Varys’s voice and behaviour were solemn, as if he was making an official speech. “Tyrion Lannister is one of the few people alive who could make this country a better place. He has the mind for it, he has the will, he has the right last name. And you… you are a complication.” His face then turned serious. Serious and sad. “I know you love him. And I know it’s true love not bought by gold and silver. I’m not asking you to leave him for money. I’m asking you to leave because your presence in the capital endangers him. This will be your home, my lady. Find a true home somewhere far from here… while there’s still time.” Varys started to walk away.

“Lord Varys.” As the eunuch turned back to face, she threw the pouch at his feet. Anger was rising in her. “If he wants me to leave, he can tell me himself.” She was the one to walk away this time, not looking at the bald man a single more time. Shae had thought he was a friend. And yet he had come to her, trying to persuade her to leave with soft words and diamonds, as if she was a whore. She was no whore. She was the lover of Tyrion Lannister. Her lion could try to use the Spider to have her leave the city by her own will, but she wouldn’t. She would never leave. It was her home, the place where the man she loved was. No matter what would happen she would stay, as much as it could mean a danger for her and him. They had said the words. Maybe for everyone else Sansa was Tyrion’s wife, but Shae knew the truth. She was his real wife.

I’m his, and he is mine.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Chapter Notes

The Red Wedding aftermath continues.

And what do you think Tyrion is doing when he feels bad?

He drinks.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

TYRION IV

It was almost night. Tyrion was sitting with his squire, Pod, initiating him to drinking. He had initiated him to whoring not long ago, it was time for another sin now. Tyrion drank deeply and quickly. Sansa was off with Shae to the godswood for hours, so they had all their time. Perhaps she was praying for his death. The boy barely managed to follow, but he did. He always did what Tyrion ordered him. If he ordered his squire to jump from the battlements of the Red Keep into the bay, he would probably do it. Not that Tyrion would order him to do so. He liked the boy. And he didn’t see how useful such an order could be.

Tyrion reflected on the last three days as he got drunk. It had been some time since he was drunk for good. The last time was during his wedding. He had drunk in hope to forget the events of his wedding night next day, but finally it had proved useless. Except for keeping his head when he threatened his nephew. The so-called king who rejoiced so much at the idea of his mother-in-law and brother-in-law’s deaths. Tyrion felt bad for them. He didn’t know why. The boy was insulting when he received him at Winterfell, a sword before him to show Tyrion there was no hospitality for him. And Lady Stark arrested him on the word of a brothel keeper and it started a war that led to the death of all her family but her eldest daughter. Tyrion couldn’t believe how stupid the Starks were in the name of honor. Ned Stark supporting against all odds Stannis Baratheon, a man despised by most of the people and loved by none? And his refusal of Renly’s help? Or warning his sister that he knew about her children? What a fool he was. If Ned Stark had accepted to be Regent of the realm, he could have kept Joffrey in check. The war between the Lannisters and the Tullys would only have been an accident for the beginning of a new reign.

And what about Catelyn Stark? She started the war with his arrest. And what was her idea to bring him to her half-mad sister and her sickly nephew who had less brain than Joffrey? And Robb Stark, who lost his war in the bedchamber. And by beheading one of his most important bannerman. Pride and honor. Sometimes you had to accept to bend the knee to people you hated if you wanted to survive. Sansa had understood this. She had learned to hold her tongue and to do what was asked for her. And she lived. Tyrion was admiring her for that ever since her beating before the court. He could never have done it in her stead.

Tyrion knew he was being unfair to blame the Starks for their own deaths. Joffrey and Cersei were far more responsible for this war than Ned Stark who only tried to do something he believed was right. The man wasn’t interested in power, which was more than rare in the Seven Kingdoms. He would have made a good regent if the City Watch and this butcher Janos Slynt hadn’t betrayed him. Not to mention Baelish’s role in this. And it was his father who organized the Red Wedding. What a hypocrite he was to blame the Starks because he had petty problems with Sansa. And to say he had made a deal with Catelyn Stark to send her Sansa and Arya if she gave him back his brother. A Lannister always pays his debts, but it was difficult to pay debts to dead people. The best thing he could do now was to protect Sansa. Here is how I fulfill our deal Lady Stark. I marry your daughter in order to protect her against the people who had your husband, your son and you killed.

They emptied cup after cup, a handmaiden bringing them more wine and taking back the empty jugs. Podrick was struggling more and more to follow Tyrion, but he wouldn’t give him a second of rest. He had to remember his first drinking time. With some luck people would talk about his drinking performance as well as the other one very soon. All that thanks to Tyrion Lannister.

As he swallowed the rest of his goblet, Pod wasn’t able to finish his own. “Keep up.” It was an order. He didn’t wait for the boy to empty the rest of it and filled both their cups again.

“I don’t think I can, my lord.” Obviously he believed he couldn’t take anymore. So Tyrion had every reason in the world to encourage him even more. The more drunk you got the first time the better.

“It’s not easy being drunk all the time. Everyone would do it if it were easy.” Pod looked droopy. He should wait to see how he would feel next morning.

“Leave.” His dear sister appeared from the balcony, as always clad in the red of House Lannister. As Pod left, Tyrion wondered if the boy was relieved. His sister had ruined the first drinking night of his squire as she always ruined everything. “So, enjoying married life?” With a smile, she served herself a cup of Tyrion’s wine. “An unhappy wife is a wine merchant’s best friend.”

“She doesn’t deserve this.” And he thought drinking would help him to forget his problems for a time. He should have known Cersei would prevent it. To make him suffer, one way or another, was something she enjoyed.

“Deserve? Be careful with that. Start trying to work out who deserves what and before long you’ll spend the rest of your days weeping for each and every person in the world.”

“There’s nothing worse than a late-blooming philosopher.” Light chuckles escaped from his sister’s lips. He didn’t like it. That meant she had something behind her head. “Will you be facing your marriage to Ser Loras with the same philosophical spirit?”

“I won’t be marrying Ser Loras.”

“I seem to remember saying something similar about my own marriage.”

“You’re not me.” Cersei would marry Ser Loras whatever she did. Tyrion knew it. They could fight between brother and sister, but against their father they were powerless. “You want to make things better for Sansa? Give her a child.”

Tyrion almost laughed at the stupidity of the suggestion. Cersei was never good at this game, but now she reached a peak. She didn’t care at all for Sansa. Did she really think he didn’t know the true reason of her suggestion? “So you can tell father it was you who finally talked me into it?”

“So she can have some happiness in her life.”

“You have children. How happy would you say you are?”

“Not very.” His sister took a great inspiration before she pronounced these two little words. Tyrion rarely saw this reaction with her, but he knew that when it happened it meant Cersei didn’t play anymore. And her answer demonstrated it very well since it was undermining the suggestion she did right away. “But if it weren’t for my children, I’d have thrown myself from the highest window in the Red Keep. They’re the reason I’m alive.”

“Even Joffrey?”

“Even Joffrey.” She turned on her right, looking outside. Tyrion knew now that for a rare moment his sister was being honest. Talking about her children were the only moments where she was vulnerable and sincere. The only moments Tyrion saw her drop her mask of pride and smugness. The only moment Tyrion felt she was his sister. “He was all I had once. Before Myrcella was born. I used to spend hours looking at him. His wisps of hair. His tiny little hands and feet. He was such a jolly little fellow.” Tyrion could hear the emotion and the happiness of his sister as she talked of her son. The proof of her one redeeming quality: her love for her children.

Tyrion could understand. He loved Tommen and Myrcella dearly. As for Joffrey, despite all his hatred for his eldest nephew, he couldn’t really believe that one day he would cause him permanent harm. He was still family, and family was more important than anything for a Lannister. All the three children of Tywin Lannister understood that at least. He remembered how he felt when he sent Myrcella to Dorne. It hurt him to see his niece and Tommen cry for being separated. But he had to do it, for their own safety and for the family. Tyrion wondered how Myrcella was now in Dorne. Did she like it? Was she happy? Doran Martell was a good man as far as he knew and he never heard anything bad about his son Trystane. He hoped she could blossom, far away from the bad influence of her mother and her eldest brother. Seeing the way Cersei’s education turned Joffrey into a new Mad King, he probably did the right thing for his niece. But still, he had felt like shit to take a daughter from her mother. As he had taken Sansa forever from her own when he married her.

“You always hear the terrible ones were terrible babies. “We should have known. Even then we should have known.” It’s nonsense. Whenever he was with me, he was happy.” Tyrion half listened to her, lost in his own thoughts just like his sister. “And no one can take that away from me, not even Joffrey… how it feels to have someone. Someone of your own.”

It was one of the rare moments Tyrion had some sympathy for his sister. However horrible she was, she was still a mother. Tyrion’s life had been a hell ever since he came into the world, but Cersei had her hardships too. The Mad King refused to marry her to Rhaegar Targaryen, the last of the dragons, a man every girl in the Seven Kingdoms wanted to marry. And Cersei seemed to have loved him from what little Tyrion heard afterwards. She had stayed shut in her rooms for days apparently when she had discovered there would be no marriage. And she married a man who loved a dead woman over her and humiliated her with his excessive whoring. Tyrion wondered how Sansa would feel if he had continued to whore after their wedding. Probably no better than Cersei had felt. He realized how easy it was to be Robert Baratheon in these circumstances, to not care about the ones you were bound. But he couldn’t act like Robert. He couldn’t resolve himself to make Sansa even worse than she was now. Even if it destroyed his relationship with Shae he couldn’t. He couldn’t.

His sister was now sitting next to him and they both observed a deep silence, lost in their own thoughts. That was what happened when they were truly a brother and a sister. Tyrion broke it as he often did in these situations. “How long does it go on?” How long did they all have to suffer and make people suffer?

“Until we’ve dealt with all our enemies.” The answer of his sister didn’t make him feel better.

“Every time we deal with an enemy, we create two more.”

“Then I suppose it will go on for quite a long time.” Tyrion knew she was right. He also realized the sister he cared for was gone and the Queen Regent was there again. “Give Sansa a child. If you really care for her, that’s the best thing you can do.” And she left on this.
Tyrion started to drink again after his sister departed. But he drank slowly. He didn’t have the heart to get drunk again. He was thinking about what Cersei had told him. He didn’t know if it was his sister or the Queen Regent who was talking when she told him to give Sansa a child. Perhaps the Queen Regent influenced by his sister, which was quite surprising since most of the time it would be the sister who acted following the command of the Queen. Would children make Sansa’s miserable life better? How could he know? He never had children. Once he had hoped, the first time he was married, but the hope seemed foolish now. Sansa would never accept him after the way her family died.

As he thought so the doors opened. He tried to not look as his wife and Shae entered. The two women who despised him the most in the world. Sansa didn’t look at him a single second. Who could blame her? Him? Shae went to his side, looking down at him, half angry half sad. Tyron knew what it meant.

He left their chambers. It wouldn’t do for him to be present while Sansa dressed in her clothes for the night. He went to the library and tried to lose his mind in books he never read before. It proved to be as ineffective as the wine. And he couldn’t go to brothels or ask Shae anymore, so he had no choice but to brood. He remembered the walk. How far away it seemed to be now. As if it had taken place in another world. Finally, after a few hours, Tyrion decided he could try to sleep a little.

When Tyrion went back into his chambers, his boots out of his feet as usual to make the less noise he could, he heard the same sound he had heard these last three nights. His wife was sobbing, her back turned on him. Each night Tyrion wanted to comfort her, to tell her he was there for her, that he had nothing to do with this and was only here to protect her. But he couldn’t. She would probably slapped him. Or, more probably, she would run away from him, never looking at him even a moment. The man who destroyed her life.

He changed his clothes as he always did, his back in her direction, and stretched on the couch. She wasn’t looking toward him so why try to hide? He looked one last time at his wife who continued to weep. Cersei was wrong. Lannister children would never make things better for Sansa. As always, there was nothing he could do. He slept maybe two hours before he got up and spent another day working, as far as he could be from his wife.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you liked my exploration on the brother-sister relationship between Tyrion and Cersei, however ambivalent it is.

Please review

Next chapter: a new character POV (It's a surprise.)
Chapter Notes

For the first time in my story, we leave King's Landing and take a long walk by the Kingsroad to meet my second favorite character in Game of Thrones.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The pain in his back and his right leg were blinding. Jon passed out many times during the week that followed his return to Castleblack. He had been frozen to death, barely able to articulate words. His physical condition was now improving, but his mental condition was not. It was only getting worse on this side. Two days after his return, Ser Alliser Thorne, acting Commander in the absence and now the death of Lord Commander Mormont, had paid him a visit to tell him he would question him as soon as he was able to walk again and probably hang him over the Wall for treason. In his state, Jon had been unable to tell anything about the wildling army marching on Castleblack to anybody. No one knew and he couldn’t tell for a while as weak as he was. And now that he was barely strong enough to talk about it, he didn’t know if he wanted. Ser Alliser had announced him during his visit that his two little brothers were dead, burnt by Theon Greyjoy, that Winterfell had been sacked and burnt by the ironborn and that Robb and Lady Stark had been killed at something called the Red Wedding.

Right now there was nothing else Jon could think about. His family. Bran and Rickon, little boys, were savagely assassinated by Theon Greyjoy. Jon had never liked him, but he had been their father’s ward. And his brother Robb, who he grew with, playing, learning, fighting, riding, laughing with him. He even was sad for Lady Catelyn. She never considered him as a son, looked at him with disapproval each time he would do something better than Robb. She always refused to be a mother to him, but she was still the mother of his brothers and sisters, and the wife of his father. Now they were all dead. That was the only thing he could think about.

Well, not the only thing. He thought about Ygritte. Her red hair, kissed by fire, her blue eyes, her beautiful body as they made love in the cave. He had betrayed her. He was thrice a turncloak. He betrayed the Night’s Watch by walking with the wildlings, he betrayed Mance Rayder, a good man who trusted him, and he betrayed the woman he loved. He said he would never betray her. And yet he did. The pain in his back and his legs remembered him of that all time. He had loved her and still loved her. And now he was going to fight against her. What would he do if they met on the battlefield? He could never kill her.

Ygritte reminded him so much of his sister Arya, the only one among his sisters and brothers who had the Stark’s looks like him. He remembered how he would ruffle her hair. And Needle, the little sword he gave her before he left Winterfell. Where was she? Still a hostage in King’s Landing? He had no idea. No more than for Sansa. Ser Alliser and Maester Aemon told him nothing about them. He would have to know very soon. They could be his only surviving kin. So much had happened while he was absent. How was it possible? Jon’s family had lost. They were dead now, or prisoners. And him, what would he do? His duty, as his father always did. He would respect his vows, be the watcher on the wall, the shield that guards the realm of men. The War of the Five Kings may be over, he didn’t know yet, but their war against the wildlings was only beginning. And after that they would fight against the White Walkers and the dead men. They weren’t ready. They didn’t have enough men or enough supplies. Would any of the kings send them help? Jon doubted that.

His thoughts lingered over this for a week. But one day, as he felt a little better, Sam came to bring him his meal for midday.

“Sam.” His voice was tired. He still hadn’t much force.

“Jon.” Sam was smiling. It was good to see his friend again. “How do you feel?”

“As a man who got three arrows in his back. Except one was in the leg.”

Sam chuckled. “Maester Aemon said you would recover entirely within two weeks.”

That made two more weeks before Ser Alliser would hang him. But now he had other things to be concerned with.

“Sam, Ser Alliser told me Robb was killed. And his mother too. How?” He didn’t know the details of this Red Wedding, but from the name it couldn’t be a wedding that ended well.

Sam’s face dropped. “Perhaps you should rest. You’re still very weak. You barely manage to speak.”

It was true it was an ordeal for Jon to speak, but he had to know. He wouldn’t let Sam go until he knew everything. “I’m strong enough to talk. Tell me. What happened?”

Sam looked at him with sorry eyes. He told him everything. How the war had gone while they were north of the Wall. The first victories of his brother. His bannermen proclaiming him King in the North. Robb’s wedding. The struggles between the Baratheon pretenders. Renly’s death. The Battle of Blackwater. The alliance between the Lannisters and the Tyrells. The rebellion of the Iron Islands and their raids on the north. Winterfell taken by Theon Greyjoy who was afterwards betrayed by his own men. The beheading of Rickard Karstark by Robb and the loss of half his forces. And finally the Red Wedding. His brother was betrayed by his own lieutenant, stabbed by Roose Bolton in the heart. His wife, pregnant, murdered before his own eyes, stabbed in her tummy a dozen times. Lady Stark, her throat cut to the bone after killing Walder Frey’s wife. His brother’s host slaughtered by Freys and Boltons. Now Roose Bolton was Warden of the North. Jon couldn’t believe it. But he would weep later.

“What about Bran and Rickon? How did they die? Ser Alliser only said Theon burnt them.” Sam seemed hesitant now. He looked away. “Sam?”

“I told no one. It happened at the Nightfort. Me and Gilly we passed by it to come back.”

“You and Gilly?” Jon didn’t understand. And then he remembered. The girl from Craster’s Keep. “Craster’s wife? You brought her with you?”

“I had no choice, Jon. When Karl and the others mutinied, I had to save her. So we traveled to the Wall with her baby. For now she works here. I killed a White Walker.”

Jon was startled by this. “What? How?”

“With dragonglass. The dagger I had on me. It was coming for her baby.”
Jon remembered what he saw Craster do in the forest last year. Dragonglass could kill White Walkers? Then they would need a lot of it. “That’s what happened at the Nightfort? The White Walker passed through the Wall?” If the dead crossed the Wall, everything was over.

“No.” Sam straightened and then a smile appeared on his face. “We met Bran there. He was with his direwolf and Hodor. Two other children were with them, they said they were Jojen and Meera Reed.” Bran? How was it possible? “I didn’t know that he was believed to be dead, but it was him, I’m sure of that. How many cripple boys travel with a direwolf and a giant who can only say one word?”

Jon’s heart was beating quickly. Bran was alive. Then Rickon could well be alive too. They were burnt. Of course, Theon surely burnt two boys and made people believe they were Bran and Rickon. Both of them were surely alive, one for sure. He was with Jojen and Meera Reed? They were probably the children of Howland Reed, his father’s friend. Wait! What were they doing at the Nightfort?

“Sam, where is Bran now?”

Again the face of his friend dropped. “I’m sorry, I tried to convince them to come to Castleblack, but they refused. They said they had to go north of the Wall in order to find a three-eyed raven. It doesn’t make much sense but I couldn’t force them to follow me and Gilly. I left them some dragonglass before they crossed.”

Jon’s sudden happiness went down. Bran went north of the Wall to find a three-eyed raven? That was nonsense. But Sam wouldn’t lie to him. And if he did, he would have invented some better lie, one that Jon would believe. “What about Rickon? Was he with them? Did they tell you anything about him?”

“No, sorry. They said nothing. As I told you, I didn’t know they were believed dead at this moment. I didn’t think about asking them about that.”

Jon knew nothing of Rickon’s fate. Yet, he knew Bran was still alive not long ago, even if now he was heading north. Where would he go? The Antler River? The Frostfangs? The Haunted Forest? There was no way to know. And there was hope for Rickon too. He relaxed. It was still good news. A few minutes ago he thought all his brothers were dead, now he knew one and maybe two were alive. Now he had to know about his sisters.

“Do you know what happened to my sisters? Sansa and Arya? They were in King’s Landing when my father was executed.” He hoped they were still alive and well. Surely they were. King’s Landing didn’t fall to Stannis Baratheon, so they couldn’t have died in a battle. Though he could be sure of nothing. The Lannisters beheaded his father. Why wouldn’t they do the same with one of his sisters? Or both?

“Well, your sister Arya… no one knows where she is.”

Jon was confused. “What do you mean? Tell me.”

Sam looked sad again. “We didn’t receive a lot of news from the capital, they barely sent us anything recently. Only a few officers of the City Watch who were exiled and a few criminals as always. But… there is no news of your sister. She disappeared not long after your father’s death. No one knows where she is or even if she is alive. It seems the Lannisters tried to hide it for some time, but people learned the truth after some time. We don’t know for sure she is dead. She could still be alive.” Arya was nowhere to be found? Where could she be? His friend probably added the last sentences with the hope of not getting Jon too desperate. But Jon wasn’t. He remembered his time at Winterfell. Arya could find places to hide very easily and they would need hours to find her. She could still be alive somewhere, hiding. Jon wondered if she still had Needle.

“It’s all right. We don’t know what happened to her yet. What about Sansa?”

Now Sam’s face looked very weird. It was as if he didn’t know how to behave. “Well, I don’t know what you will think of it. She’s still alive and in King’s Landing, but…” Sam hesitated. He hesitated for a very long time. Jon grew impatient. Sansa was alive but what?

“Sam, by the old gods tell me.”

“She’s married.”

For a moment stared at Sam unbelieving. Married? Sansa? Gods, no, she had married Joffrey. “I thought King Joffrey would annul their betrothal with the war against my family.”

“Joffrey?” Sam seemed surprised. “No, Joffrey set her aside, he’s going to marry a Tyrell. No, she was wed to a Lannister. I talked with the other brothers here, and they told me you knew him. That he came to visit the Wall when you arrived. Some even said he was your friend.”

Now Jon was really staring at Sam unbelieving. There was only one Lannister that he considered a friend and only one who ever came to the Wall. But that couldn’t be. “The Imp? Tyrion?” Sam nodded his head.

For a moment Jon stared at the wall before him blankly. Sansa and Tyrion? Married? He didn’t know if he should laugh or cry. That sounded so unreal. His sister Sansa, who dreamed of marrying a handsome and courageous knight like in the stories she loved so much, married Tyrion Lannister, a dwarf? Jon still didn’t know how to react.

“I should leave now.” Sam interrupted his thoughts. “Maester Aemon needs me for other tasks. I’ll come back later.” Sam smiled at him as he left.

Jon had days to think about what he just learned. Robb and Lady Catelyn had been slaughtered at the Twins. His two youngest brothers were believed dead, but one was alive for sure and the other may be too. Arya disappeared and there was no way to know if she was alive or dead. And Sansa had married his friend, Tyrion. But now he began to understand more the meaning of this. His sister had been forced to enter the Lannister family. Everyone believed she was the last Stark alive, so she was officially the heir to Winterfell, or what was left of it. They only used her to get Winterfell. How did she feel right now? She was married in the family that slaughtered theirs. Of all his relatives, Sansa always was the one who liked Jon the less. Jon didn’t think she hated him, she never was evil with him. But she had been very close to her mother. She had looked up at Jon and called him bastard as soon as she learned the word. She wasn’t like her mother, she had no resentment towards him, but she never considered him the same way she considered Robb, Bran, Rickon or even Arya. In her eyes Jon was probably her brother, but a bastard brother still. He wasn’t the son of her mother.

He wondered how she felt with Tyrion. He had considered the little man his friend. Without him, Jon would have died the first day he spent at the Wall. It was strange how he had humbled Jon and helped him the same way. He made him understood he would have to accept to be treated as something inferior because of his birth, but that he could also use it. He also made Jon realize how lucky he had been despite his lower birth. He had been marginalized at Winterfell, but still he had a better life than most of the people. That was strange to receive such lessons from a man who looked so arrogant at first sight. In time he had come to like the Lannister. He still remembered when he came to the top of the Wall and pissed on the other side. Jon had missed him a few times. He even talked about him to Ygritte once. Both were favored outcasts of this world. He wondered how he treated Sansa. He hoped he hadn’t misjudged the little man he had considered as a friend. He was a Lannister after all and his family was in war with Jon’s kin. Who knew what Sansa could suffer right now? Especially from a man twice her age, half her height, renowned as a whoremonger and whose family destroyed hers.

He needed a rest. That was too much to think about now. But suddenly Jon burst into laughs. And he immediately regretted it. His back made him suffer again. It was already difficult to talk and to eat, so to laugh? But still, he couldn’t resist it. His sister Sansa was married to Tyrion the dwarf. That was so… weird. Unbelievable. He knew he shouldn’t laugh. Who knew what Sansa could be passing through right now? All the same, when he imagined his little friend standing in a sept with his tall sister, saying their vows, he couldn’t help it. While he laughed and felt pain from that, he hoped Tyrion was the good man he thought he was when he stayed at the Wall.

Chapter End Notes

It wasn't an essential chapter, but I wanted to imagine Jon's reaction when he would learn the marriage between Tyrion and Sansa. I hope you like it. Furthermore, there will be place for Jon later in the story. He will have a role to play. This is a prelude to the part he will take.

Please review

Next chapter: Margaery.
And we enter season 4. The change is approaching.
Margaery II

Chapter Notes

We go back into Margaery’s mind, and we begin to follow closely another character.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

MARGAERY II

Two weeks! Margaery couldn’t believe it. Two weeks had passed since her last conversation with Sansa, a very short conversation when she told Sansa about her family's death. The preparations for the royal wedding began to exhaust her beyond measure. She was very eager to celebrate her fantastic wedding and to become the queen, but did it have to take so much time of her days? She should have tried to be there for Sansa. She needed a friend more than ever. She also needed Margaery’s advice more than ever. Margaery remembered the way she reacted to her mother’s and brother’s deaths. That was still heartbreaking for the Tyrell girl two weeks later.

At least she managed to have some time with her today. She would break her fast with Sansa. She had sent her a word about it yesterday. That was the best moment she could find with her overloaded schedule. Mira was braiding her hair. Margaery had dismissed Sera and the others, wishing to be alone with her friend. Mira hid her emotions very well, but Margaery could feel her distress. Her brother Rodrik and her father were at the Twins when the Red Wedding happened and didn’t survive. The rest of her family was still alive at Ironrath, for now. However, Mira told her there could be problems with another house, the Whitehills, sworn bannermen of the Boltons and inveterate enemies of her family. Margaery hoped nothing would happen to Mira’s family. She would pray for her this morning. There wasn’t much more she could do.

When Mira was done with her hair, Margaery was ready to visit Sansa. Mira stood close to the window, silent and discreet more than she usually was. She mourned her losses without sharing her burden with anyone else.

“You can take the day for yourself if you want, Mira.” Margaery could at least grant her this.

“Thank you, my lady. But I don’t think it would help me in any way. It would be better if I stayed occupied.” Mira knew obviously her mistress wanted to be kind to her, but she would do her duty nonetheless. She was a true northerner. No wonder her family had followed the Starks for so long.

“Very well. Clean the room and then go find Sera and the others to help them.” Mira nodded and quietly started her tasks. Margaery left her and walked in the direction where Sansa’s quarters were. She left the Maidenvault where her family and their retinue resided. As she approached her friend’s apartments and turned a corner, she bumped into a very short person. It was Lord Tyrion.

“Sorry, Lady Margaery. I didn’t see you coming. My wife is waiting for you. Try to give her some good time. I don’t seem to be the one for that recently.” He walked away, holding a very large book under his arm. Margaery knew her grandmother was giving him a few headaches with her marriage to Joffrey. To be Master of Coin seemed to be involving a lot of work and very few recognition.
Margaery looked at the little man as he walked away, trying to assess him. She didn’t know much about Lord Tyrion. And these last times she didn’t really have the time to get more information on him. She knew he was a renowned whoremonger and drunkard. People called him the Imp. She heard he would always bet large sums of money when his brother jousted. Rumors were telling he was the ugliest man in the Seven Kingdoms, even a monster. Some even pretended he was missing a nose.

When she looked at him, she couldn’t really see a monster. If there was a monster she saw ever since she came into King’s Landing, it was her betrothed. But it was a monster she could control, so she wasn’t really afraid. He wasn’t ugly either. Of course, his size didn’t work out in his favor very well, but if he had been taller, no one would really find him repulsive. As for the missing nose, it was only a scar that spread from a corner of his head to another. Her brother Loras had told her that he saw him during the Battle of Blackwater, laying on the ground, his head covered by blood. That proved he had courage at least. And if the stories of what he said to the king publicly were true, he also seemed to have a sharp tongue and some sort of bravery. And from what Sansa told her up to now, he never mistreated her. All things considered, he seemed to be quite a good man. If he was the king, it wouldn’t bother Margaery very much to marry him. Especially if he was as experienced as it was said.

She finally turned her heels and went to Sansa’s chambers. Her friend was already sitting at the table with a large spread of food before her. From the look of it she hadn’t eaten anything.

“Sansa.”

“Margaery.” The Stark girl smiled, but it was obviously a forced smile, and a very little one.

“May we begin?” Margaery asked as she sat next to her. The red haired girl nodded in approval.

Margaery began to serve herself. Sansa picked some food too but didn’t eat much. All the while a handmaiden with tanned skin and black hair was emptying Sansa’s chamber pot and putting clean sheets on her bed. Margaery felt the gaze of this woman on her while she ate. Margaery didn’t like it. She could be a spy. For who? There was no way to know for now, but it would be better to take no chance.

“I would have liked to enjoy a moment alone with you, Sansa.”

Her friend took some time to understand what she meant. “Shae, please leave us.”

Margaery had the very strange impression that the handmaiden was giving her a gloomy look as she left the room. If she was a spy, she didn’t know how to go unnoticed. The two girls were now alone.

“How are you?” Margaery was really concerned about her friend. After two weeks, she barely ate. The future queen had the impression Sansa was thinner than she had ever been, which wasn’t good considering Sansa was already very slender when Margaery had met her the first time.

“I’m fine, thank you.” That wasn’t convincing. Her voice was low, barely more than a whisper.

“I’m sorry I didn’t visit you for so long. I have so much things to care about these last days, I nearly have no time for myself.”

“Then you should take it for yourself.” She wanted no company.

“Sansa, I know how it must be difficult for you right now…”

“No, you don’t.” Sansa interrupted her abruptly, raising her voice. “You have lost no one. Has your father been beheaded before you by your betrothed after he promised you mercy? Have you two little brothers who were burnt alive by a man you knew all your life? Was your brother Loras stabbed in the heart? Was his head chopped off his body and replaced by an animal’s one? Was the throat of your mother cut to the bone? Are you married to a man whose family murdered yours?” Her voice got stronger and louder as she enumerated the tragedies that had befallen on her family. But in the end it broke and tears began to flow on her cheeks. When Sansa was done she burst into sobs.

Margaery put an affectionate hand on her shoulder. That was so much different from Mira, but Sansa had lost much more than Margaery’s handmaiden. “You’re right. I don’t know how I would feel if I suddenly lost Loras, my parents and my grandparents.” She had lost Renly in fact, but hadn’t loved him. She only married him in the hope she would become queen. Margaery had lost no one she really cared about. But she knew that if it happened she couldn’t allow herself to stay in Sansa’s actual state. “Listen. I’m your friend, you remember? It’s more than difficult, I can see it, but you cannot weep like this for your family forever.”

“Why? I have nothing left to do. Nothing left to hope.”

“Yes, you have.” Margaery knew that what she would say now was sensitive and that Sansa could react very badly to her words, but she had to try for her friend’s future. For the sake of both of them. Margaery would need Sansa as an ally eventually, and Sansa could be no ally if she didn’t see the world as it was. “We are women, Sansa. The only way for us to survive in this world and to have a good life is to rely on our male relatives. And you still have one.”

Sansa sneered. It was much less than the worst Margaery expected. “His family murdered mine. I will never rely on him.”

“You know what I think, Sansa.” She spoke on a more commanding tone. “I think he has nothing to do with it. He looks ashamed by what his family has done, he has bad relationships with his father and his sister, he obviously hates Joffrey, and he never caused you any harm. You may hate him because of what his family has done, but he may be your only chance now. Your only chance to have a happy life, to live, and to make sure your family’s home doesn’t fall in the hands of the men who murdered them.” Margaery wasn’t entirely sure if what she said was true. After all, Lord Tyrion could have known about his father’s plans, but right now Sansa needed to hear that.

“I will NEVER EVER give him anything. He is a Lannister. I don’t care about my home, it is only ruins now. I will not allow the Lannisters or him to use me to get their dirty golden hands on the North. I will never forgive them. I will never forgive him.” Margaery lowered her head, discouraged and sad. Sansa couldn’t see the possibilities she had to avenge her family and even to restore it when it would be time. She wished she could do more, but for now Sansa was as stubborn as her grandmother’s tongue was sharp. She would hear nothing of what Margaery had to say.

Margaery rose from her seat. “I have duties to attend to. I’m sorry to leave.” She looked at the tray of food, almost untouched. “You should eat. Have a good day.” There were so much people hungry in the city. Sansa couldn’t let herself starve to death. Margaery rubbed the shoulder of the Stark girl a last time as a sign of support and left. She hoped she could convince Sansa later. She should have spent more time with her after her marriage with Tyrion. Her influence on her would have been far greater.

Later in the morning, Margaery attended the service in the Royal Sept. After the ceremony, she was accosted by the Queen Regent. Soon, Margaery would be queen in her stead.

“Hi Margaery. How is my future daughter-in-law and sister?”
Margaery had to careful with the way she would answer. She knew it ever since Sansa’s wedding. If you ever call me sister again I’ll have you strangled in your sleep. “I’m fine, Your Grace. I really appreciate your concern for me.”

“Yes, I’m a lot concerned for you. As a queen I have so many enemies, in this city and outside it. I fear you may have some too.”

“Again I thank you. But you don’t have to worry. I can take care of myself. And your son is very provident towards me.”

“We can never be too provident. Even in our closest circle of friends, there can be traitors, people who would be ready to do anything against us for money, honors, titles, ascent… or family.”

Margaery didn’t like the way this conversation turned. She could feel Cersei bringing her somewhere she wouldn’t like, as she did with the Rains of Castamere. “If there is anything that may pose a threat to me or your son Your Grace, I promise you I will tell you.” She hoped it would end the discussion. She was wrong.

“I’m afraid I can’t only rely on that. Sometimes friendship, or even love, can blind us. That’s why we need the others to look after us. And who is better to look after us than our family. We are family now, aren’t we?”

Margaery knew there was only one possible answer. With her usual smile she gave it. “Of course, Your Grace. I am not yet married to Joffrey, but we are so close that we can already consider ourselves as a family before the wedding.”

“I was sure you were thinking the same. Then it is my duty to warn you against a member of your own retinue. She may not seem a danger at first sight, I heard you considered her as one your closest friend. And yet, until very recently, the family of this northern girl was fighting for an usurper.”

Now Margaery knew what Cersei was talking about. “She is the most loyal of my servants and has been away from the North for many years. There is no doubt about her loyalty to my beloved Joffrey or to the Crown.”

“I know you think so. And that’s what I’m afraid of. I would like to speak with her this afternoon. Bring her to me in a few hours so we may speak together in the Throne Room. That will be an excellent opportunity for her to swear publicly her fealty to my son. And to apologize too.”

“Of course, your Grace.” Margaery had no other choice. This audience could put her and her friend into trouble, but there was no way escaping it. Though she wondered what Mira should apologize for. It wasn’t as if she fought against Joffrey. After Cersei was gone, she called for Sera. “Find Mira and tell her to wait for me in her chambers at the end of the afternoon. Tell her nothing else. I’ll explain everything to her myself.”

“Yes, my lady.” Sera went away to perform her task. After Mira, Sera was her handmaiden Margaery liked the most. She was a bastard, but her mother had been Margaery’s grandmother handmaiden for a very long time. They had given her the family name Durwell, an unimportant house whose main branch disappeared two centuries ago, a perfect fraud. She was loyal, but could act stupid and talked too much sometimes. Margaery couldn’t confide in her as she could with Mira.

Hours later, after spending more time preparing the wedding (now was the time to select bards and artists that would sing, a very long task since they had to listen to hundreds of them) and a quick meal, Margaery went to the rooms of her favourite handmaiden with Sera and opened the door without a knock. She didn’t need to do it for seeing Mira, her handmaiden received her no matter the time. She was sitting on a bench. She rose up as soon as Margaery entered.

“Lady Margaery. You’re early.”

“I was hoping there would be time for us to talk. Come, there’s something we must discuss.” Mira followed her without a question, as always. As they walked in the corridors, Margaery started to speak. “From the day you arrived in Highgarden, I’ve thought of you more as a friend than as my handmaiden. A dear friend, in fact.”

“Thank you, my lady.” Mira really seemed to appreciate what she was telling her. It relieved Margaery after her difficult breakfast with Sansa.

“And you know how I feel about what’s happened to your family. I feel your pain as if it were my own. What you’ve suffered is beyond imagining. And your poor family as well.”

“You’re very kind, my lady.”

“Of course, Mira. But you must not despair. We will get through this together.” She took Mira’s hands into her own. The difficult part was coming. “You must understand, there are limits to what I can say. Especially here in King’s Landing, now that I am to be queen. To have a handmaiden from the North whose family fought for Robb Stark... It raises questions at a time I can least afford. Cersei herself cornered me this morning outside the Royal Sept. She mentioned ‘the northern girl’ in my service, and she painted you a traitor. She was very pleased with herself. Her face was full of mirth as she said it.” Margaery had stopped now to look at Mira in her eyes.

“I’m not a traitor.” She could see Mira was insulted by the accusation. She could understand. Her family was very similar to Sansa’s. Honor was more important than everything to her and she would defend it and the one of her family whatever happened. That made Mira her best handmaiden, but it could also cause her problems in the actual circumstances.

“Of course not. It’s only an excuse to torment you, and by extension, me.” They started to walk again. “She demands an audience. She wants an apology of some sort. For what, I don’t know, but… She’s waiting for us now and I promised I would bring you to her. I wouldn’t ask it of you if it were not important.” Margaery could order Mira to come, but she preferred to ask. Anyway she knew Mira would do it. It was better to ask when you knew the person would accept.

“I’ll do as you ask, my lady.”

“I knew I could trust you. Humor her. Tell her what she wants to hear.”

They finally arrived before the doors of the Throne Room. Two guards were guarding it and they were close.

“See if the Queen Regent is ready to receive us,” she ordered Sera. The brown haired girl slipped through the door and went inside, leaving Margaery and Mira alone with the two guards.

Margaery reflected about Sera. She had seemed less happy than usual these last times. She was quite excited about the royal wedding, but ever since the Red Wedding she had turned less joyful. She and Mira were friends of course, but Margaery could feel it wasn’t the only reason. She had sent Sera and her other handmaids away many times recently to spend time alone with Mira, and Margery spared Mira of many demanding duties after the tragedy. At least she had tried, Mira refused most of the time. She worked even more dutifully than before if it was possible. Even so, Sera probably felt excluded and thought Margaery favoured Mira over her.

That wasn’t quite untrue. After Mira had arrived in Highgarden, she quickly replaced Sera as her favourite handmaiden. Margaery was already closer to her than Sera before the Red Wedding, but it seemed even more obvious now. Margaery regretted it. Sera was her friend and she really wanted to help her. She would find her a good husband to marry one day. She would never be haunted by her bastard origin anymore after that and would take the name of her husband. Margaery would probably arrange for that after her own wedding with Joffrey. She wondered if Mira would want to wed soon.
She was of an age for that, very beautiful, a perfect mix of the Reach and the North, and the eldest daughter of a rich and respected family. However, recent events may make a marriage with a Forrester less attractive for many. Anyway, her mother would have something to say about that.
Margaery could probably first take care of Sera. And if things went bad for Mira’s family, her influence as queen should be enough to find her a suitable man who would guarantee her safety.

Margaery realized the guards were looking at them, so she grabbed Mira’s arm and drew her backwards. “You’ll be fine. I know you will. You may feel one thing, but you must say another.”
That was very important. Mira was used to the games of Highgarden, but not of King’s Landing, and these ones were much more dangerous. Hopefully her friend would adapt to it as quickly as she adapted to the Reach.

Sera came back at this moment. “Good luck.” On this encouragement, Mira and Margaery looked at one another and entered. There was some apprehension in the eyes of her handmaiden. As they advanced, Margaery turned towards her one last time.

“You can do this.” That would be verified very soon. Cersei was waiting for them near the Iron Throne, along with Lord Tyrion.

Chapter End Notes

Mira's story will take more place in the following chapters.

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Tyrion was tired. He had another very long day behind him. Between the royal wedding (as always), the repairs on the docks and the preparations he had to make for the construction of the new royal fleet, he didn’t have an instant to rest. And now his sister had called him to attend court with her this afternoon. Joffrey had been quickly bored by petitioners at the very beginning of his reign, so it had fallen on Cersei, then on him when he was acting Hand of the King, and finally to his father when he returned. But his father seemed to have better things to do than holding court today and he allowed Cersei to take it on her. And his beloved sister had asked him to assist her. There weren’t many petitioners since people had learned the hard way how asking something from Joffrey could end their life prematurely. Soon it was over but his sister insisted for him to stay. She said it would be very interesting and that it concerned him.

As they waited, she asked him about the royal fleet. Tyrion was only considering the way to acquire materials for now since docks were still on repair. “For now, the biggest problem is the wood. We need to find a supplier who can give it to us in high quantity and quality. Sadly, that’s not very easy. Ironwood would be the best solution, but since the people who produce it were fighting with the Starks, I don’t think they will give us very much quite soon. Though strangely, I’ve received a letter from two merchants who claim to have a shipment of ironwood to sell. Where they got it, I’m not sure, but I’ll meet them to see what they have to offer.” He explained it to Cersei with an indifferent voice, knowing very well his sister didn’t care about any detail like these. She would make a very bad Master of Coin. But it helped to spend time to explain these things, along with drinking, which he did as well in this moment.

“I think I have a solution for you to this problem. It will be here at any moment.”

“Then I hope this solution arrives very quickly. Time is money, especially when you are Master of Coin.”

It was at this moment that a young woman presented herself before them. She was brown of eyes and hair and wore clothes of the people of the Reach. Her features were round and she was quite pretty. Her behavior showed that she wasn’t a great lady, but not of low birth either. “Lord Tyrion. Your Grace. Lady Margaery is there and would like a moment of your time.”

“Did she bring what I required from her?” According to the way Cersei was asking, it seemed what Tyrion was there for would finally happen.

“Yes, your Grace. She is with Lady Margaery.”

“Very well. Let them come.”
The girl walked away. Tyrion now knew she was one of the numerous handmaidens Margaery Tyrell had brought with her from the Reach.

“So, could you tell me what this is all about before I see the surprise you prepared for me?” he asked his sister.

“That wouldn’t be a surprise if I told you now. Anyway, here they are. Let’s sit.”

Tyrion went back to his chair and looked at the two women walking in their direction. On the left was Lady Margaery, beautiful as ever. Nos as much as Sansa or Shae, but still. Following her two feet behind was another young woman. She was wearing clothes of the Reach, but her face was more rectangular than round to the opposite of Margaery and the handmaiden that had come before. Her hair was black and her skin very white. She didn’t lack beauty neither. She walked with insurance, but seemed to observe an attitude of obedience. Tyrion could detect some uncertainty in her face as she approached, but she stood straight. There was pride in this one, Tyrion realized.

“Ah, Lady Margaery. Aren’t you looking lovely this evening?” Tyrion hoped her breakfast with Sansa had gone well.

“Lord Tyrion. Your Grace… With your permission, allow me to introduce Lady Mira of House Forrester.”

So that was it. She was the northern servant in service of Lady Margaery Tyrion heard about. And a member of the family who bested everyone at the manufacturing of ironwood items. Now he understood why Cersei brought her here. Well, at least he knew a part of the reason. The Forresters had fought for Robb Stark. She probably wanted to humiliate Margaery. And Tyrion perhaps too. That was a way to show the Northerners weren’t recommendable and to target him and Sansa the same way. And to laugh at him for his problems finding ironwood.

The girl approached and knelt before the throne. “Your Grace.”

Perhaps Tyrion ought to help the girl. He had met Lord Forrester many years ago. It was a good man and he had died at the Twins. This girl was surely his daughter. She was another victim of his family’s crimes.

“The girl knows her courtesies. Impressive. You may rise.” Cersei was pleased with that. She liked when someone was obedient and easy to manipulate.

“House Forrester is a northern house loyal to the king,” Margaery declared solemnly.

“Are they?”

“I beg your pardon, your Grace…?”

“I wasn’t talking to you. I want to hear from the girl. Is your family loyal to the king?”

“Perhaps you should ask the new lord Forrester.” Tyrion intervened. It was useless to ask such questions to this girl. She didn’t take decisions for her family, just like Sansa. Cersei seemed to not understand this, like her son. That was one of her little and boring games again. Tyrion wondered what age the new lord of Ironrath was. He had heard he was only a child.

“He’s not here, is he? She is. The girl can speak for her house.” Good. And afterwards what? Will you arrest her for being loyal to her family? As if she posed a threat.

“Yes, your Grace. To the one true king.” Cersei was clearly displeased by the answer Lady Mira gave her. That wasn’t the one she was expecting.

Tyrion on the other side started to find the discussion interesting. He even believed he glimpsed an invisible smile on the girl’s lips. “The one true king. Yet she didn’t say which. The girl is clever.”

“She only meant…” began Lady Margaery, but Cersei cut her immediately.

“I don’t care what she meant. I care what she said. I won’t stand for impertinence from a girl of the North.”

“If you would give her the chance to explain…” but the Rose of Highgarden was interrupted again by the Queen Regent.

“Perhaps she can explain why the Forresters have been loyal bannermen to House Stark for centuries? A house of traitors.”

“They were the Wardens of the North. We all served at the pleasure of the king.” This handmaiden clearly didn’t need her mistress to speak in her stead. Tyrion liked her way to give answers that irritated Cersei while not giving her a reason to reprimand her.

“Clever girl,” he pointed out again.

“Perhaps too clever for her own good.” Tyrion could feel Cersei’s growing impatience in her voice. She didn’t think a simple handmaiden could play with her questions this way. “And she would have us believe she didn’t know which king she served. Is your house willing to swear fealty to your new liege lord, Roose Bolton?”

“He is the Warden of the North, your Grace.” And again, the Queen Regent is put into check by a little girl.

“He is. And I the Queen Regent and Tyrion the Master of Coin.” A pinch of anger began to appear in his sister’s voice.

“The girl has a remarkable talent for answering questions while in fact saying nothing at all,” Tyrion commented. Lady Mira turned lightly her head towards him and Tyrion glimpsed the invisible smile again.

“Old allegiances are not easily abandoned,” Cersei continued, “but now that the war is over we must look to rebuild and forge new alliances. There are ships and shields to be built and Joffrey will need a steady supply of ironwood for his armies. I’m told there are others who would happily serve that purpose, but I trust we can rely on House Forrester?”

“Forrester ironwood does seem rather… unique.” Tyrion conceded it. Cersei was now standing tall. Probably she was trying to gain back the advantage by seeming taller than everyone else on the steps.

“To our mutual benefit, your Grace,” said the girl. She wasn’t going to give away what belonged to her family, Tyrion could feel it.

“And at the pleasure of your king. It would be a shame to see it fall into the hands of another house. I imagine you’d do almost anything to prevent that from happening, wouldn’t you. Ask any Lannister and they’d do whatever was necessary to save Casterly Rock. It would be unfortunate to see another house lay claim to what’s yours.” Cersei did her little speech as she turned towards the Iron Throne. She was trying to get somewhere. Tyrion hoped she would get there very quickly.
“There are limits, your Grace.”

“Perhaps. But not if your house faces potential ruin.” Cersei turned around to face their guests.

Tyrion grew impatient now. Couldn’t his sister get to her point now? He spoke. “What would you have the girl do, Cersei? It’s not as if she fought beside the Starks. Wielding a battle axe for the northern army.”

“It raises an interesting question, I suppose. Can we truly blame those who end up on the wrong side of the war? Our dear Margaery here was betrothed to Renly Baratheon on the false assumption that he would one day rule the Seven Kingdoms. Can we fault her for her mistake? Should she be held accountable?” Now that was where Cersei wanted to go. She only wanted to humiliate the future queen through an easy target. Though for now the northern girl didn’t prove to be an easy target. Her next answer proved it.

“I won’t judge her, your Grace. I wasn’t there. I didn’t face her decisions.”

“Aren’t you a delightful girl? If only one could flit through life without ever holding an opinion of their own.” Cersei didn’t like the girl. It was obvious now. She despised her, probably considering she wasn’t courageous enough to answer her directly and fall into her traps. She was making the same mistake with that Northerner than with Sansa.

“It there’s a point to this, I hope you find it quickly,” Tyrion said. He appreciated the answers of the girl, but not the petty games without end of his sister.

“Loyalty can be such a hard thing to define.” Cersei started again with another long speech. “This city alone is filled with all sorts of ambitious opportunists looking to reinvent themselves, pretending to be something they’re not. Who knows what lurks within their hearts? You are a girl from the North, here in service to Lady Margaery. One can only assume her interests are yours. Yet loyalty to a king… that must be absolute. Beyond question. And if your loyalties were to become conflicted between your king and the very person whom you serve, what would you do then?”

Now that would be interesting. What would the girl answer? Would she manage to return Cersei’s question against herself again?

“I’m sure she would…” started Lady Margaery.

“Let the girl answer the question. Go on.” Cersei interrupted Margaery again. She wouldn’t let her future daughter-in-law intervene, it was quite obvious.

“My loyalties would never conflict, your Grace.” Lady Mira didn’t give the answer Cersei was looking for again.

This time Cersei let her rage go out. “That’s a coward’s answer. I will not have my time wasted by a northern girl who thinks she can play games. Who do you choose?” She was now only two feet away from Lady Mira, on the same floor. She was still taller than the handmaiden, but less than if she had been on the steps. She was looking directly into the eyes of the girl. From where Tyrion sat, Lady Mira’s gaze showed no emotion. But she took her time before answering the question. And the answer couldn’t have displeased Cersei more.

Mira Forrester took a great inspiration. “Your Grace, Lady Margaery is betrothed to the king. Her interests and those of the king are the same. Through my loyalty to her, I am loyal to the king.” She made a pause. “I am loyal to Lady Margaery.” The last sentence was pronounced firmly as the first ones had been said on a nearly innocent tone. The handmaiden also looked straight at Cersei’s face.
as she gave her answer. With her last words her eyes showed clearly she was speaking very seriously.

Cersei was fuming now. A handmaiden had deprived her of a little amusement towards Lady Margaery. The other people present were murmuring. “Clearly your handmaiden does not have her priorities straight.” Cersei managed to keep some of her composure. But Tyrion knew she wouldn’t forget the humiliation Mira Forrester inflicted her.

“She is a threat to the Crown, isn’t she? The most dangerous handmaiden in all of King’s Landing.” Tyrion said that on a mocking tone. All the better to laugh of his sister’s failure while the injury was still fresh.

“I’m not quite sure what to make of her. Not surprising I suppose for a northern girl. But not very encouraging either. I’d like a word with you, if I may?” Cersei finally asked to Lady Margaery.

“Of course, your Grace.” The Queen Regent and the future queen left together. Tyrion was now alone with the northern girl.

He looked at her and observed her again. Not to know better her physical attributes, but thinking about what he just witnessed. The girl was very clever and brave. She beat Cersei at her own game, and that took both wits and courage. She had defended the honor of Lady Margaery without a single hesitation, but also defended the honor of her house. She was quite the opposite of Sansa, who always said what Joffrey and Cersei wanted to hear from her. She had survived this way, but this one seemed able to survive without speaking against her kin. No wonder she was Lady Margaery’s handmaiden. She knew how to behave at court. And yet, she wasn’t as highborn as her mistress. She could attract attention with that, and her position could make her vulnerable.

Perhaps Tyrion could help her. And she could help him. He needed ironwood. And she may need allies if she was to survive this way in King’s Landing. Her father had been a good man and she seemed to be made of the same stuff than him. And he ought to try to make the consequences of his father’s doing less terrible. He had a very good idea suddenly.

“I’ll walk you out.” He stood up from his seat and went down the steps toward her. “This may come as a surprise, but I met your father once. At the Tourney at Lannisport. Even then he didn’t trust Roose Bolton. We only spoke briefly, but your father struck me as an honourable man. You have my condolences for his loss. These would be trying times for your family even under the best of circumstances.”

“Thank you, Lord Tyrion. That’s very kind of you to say.” She really seemed sad when he talked to her about her father. She loved him, that was certain. At least he could apologize to this girl. Quite the opposite of Sansa. She granted him a visible smile this time.

They started to walk over the door. “You were brave to declare your loyalty to Lady Margaery. No doubt she was pleased, but Cersei… She will not soon forget what you said. It was quite the first impression. I of course found it very entertaining.”

“I did it for Lady Margaery.” She’s loyal this one, for sure. That’s quite impressive. To risk her life merely for her mistress’s honor.

“As you should. And of course she has your best interests at heart. My sister and I have our differences. She takes great pleasures in her little charades, I take mine in thwarting them. We must find our amusements where we can. She threatened to give your ironwood to another house. It is the Master of Coin who decides such matters. The Crown needs boats. Boats needs wood. And I speak for the Crown in this regard. Not her.”
“What are you suggesting?” She wasn’t jumping to conclusions. That meant she was cautious. That was good.

“I suppose the Crown could be persuaded to secure ironwood from House Forrester. Lady Margaery might not look favorably on such an alliance. And it would infuriate Cersei. Although what would be amusing for me might prove rather dangerous for you. And your house. Are you willing to risk that? It may be far too dangerous. In fact, forget I even suggested such a thing.” The girl was in a dangerous situation. She had to know what could happen if she tried to play the game of thrones. Tyrion wouldn’t put her at risk against her will. His family already caused enough harm to the North.

“I’m sorry, Lord Tyrion. But it’s a risk I cannot afford.” She was cautious. Time would tell if she was wise.

“I admire your discretion. Now if you’ll excuse me, I promised Sansa I would join her for dinner tonight. Three beautiful bottles of Dornish wine await my arrival. The mere thought of them makes me thirsty already.” Much more than the thought of eating with Sansa. That will be a very silent supper. No wonder I relish so much for wine.

As Tyrion walked away from her, she dropped one last sentence. “I hope we meet again.”

He turned toward her. “Nothing would make Cersei happier, I’m sure. Until then be careful. This is not the North. King’s Landing can be a nest of vipers to the uninitiated.” Tyrion walked away for good this time.

She was keeping all her options open. Tyrion hoped everything would turn out well for her. But he knew they would meet again. If she didn’t come to him, he would come to her.

As he expected, the supper with Sansa was miserable. She never looked at him. It was even worse than at the beginning of their marriage. She barely touched her food as she did so often now. Tyrion was concerned about her, but he knew she wouldn’t listen to him. Wine helped him, and the only time he talked was when he offered her some of it. She nodded silently and Tyrion poured her a cup. She drank it, showing nothing that could help Tyrion to know if she liked it or not. Perhaps she didn’t even taste it. At the end she left without a word, probably to pray to the godswood again. And as always, Tyrion worked late in the night. When he came back she wasn’t sobbing. But he heard her sobbing later in the night, like all nights. And again, there was nothing Tyrion could do.

Chapter End Notes

So, I changed the answer Mira gave to the last question of Cersei. The choices in Telltale Game are always shorts answers and I wanted something more rich. And I like to have Cersei beaten at her own traps and humiliated in the best way possible.

Please review

Next Chapter: Tyrion again
“You’re famous for fucking half of Westeros. You just arrived at the capital after two weeks of bad roads, where would you go?” Tyrion asked to Bronn.

“I’d probably go to sleep, but I’m getting old.”

Tyrion saddled his horse along with Bronn and Podrick. They had to find the Red Viper before he caused any trouble. The news that Oberyn Martell had come for the royal wedding instead of his brother Doran unsettled Tyrion. They had to find their guest before someone died. And Tyrion knew the kind of place where they would find him. The only problem was, the only thing in King’s Landing that was more common than this type of place was soil. They had to visit many brothels before they could find the good one. By chance, a Dornishman wasn’t hard to notice in the capital. They met people who gave them indications of the man’s whereabouts. Finally they found him in one of the many establishments of Lord Baelish. They had one chance on two for Oberyn Martell to be in one of Littlefinger’s brothel, since Littlefinger owned half the brothels in town.

The brothel was now held by a man named Olyvar in Baelish’s absence. They entered it without problem. Bronn accompanied him inside. He would need him if things went wrong, and they would surely go wrong. The moment they entered they heard someone screaming. It seemed they were too late. The other customers didn’t have much trouble to tell them where the only Dornishman to visit this brothel was.

They went into the room they were directed to. “Prince Oberyn, forgive the intrusion. We heard there might be… trouble.” Tyrion probably didn’t really need to say the last word since a dagger left the hand of a screaming man at the moment he and Bronn entered. Prince Oberyn was holding the dagger and put it back into his scabbard as the man with the perforated fist and another one left the room. A woman, a Dornishwoman quite obviously, was also standing into the room.

“Apologies, my love,” the prince told her. She and the Red Viper kissed passionately, ignoring Tyrion and Bronn.

Uncomfortable with the situation, it took some time for Tyrion before he spoke. Even he and Shae had more restraint when Bronn was there. “I’m here to welcome you to the capital.”

Finally they broke reluctantly their embrace, but both stayed grabbed at each other. “Ellaria Sand, my paramour. The king’s own Uncle Imp. Tyrion, son of Tywin Lannister.”

Tyrion could see there was no love for the Lannisters in this one. It was much more than contempt with this one. “If there’s anything I can do to make your stay at King’s Landing…”

“What are you? His hired killer?”

The question was for Bronn. “It started that way, aye. Now I’m a knight.”

“How did that come to pass?”

“Killed the right people, I suppose.”

The Red Viper began to laugh after a moment. He and Bronn had more in common than with the other westerosi noblemen. “We’ll need a few more girls. Girls, yes?”

Bronn was probably more than eager to accept the offer, but Tyrion wasn’t. He slightly shook his head.

“You don’t partake?” Oberyn Martell seemed more than surprised by his refusal.

“Oh, I partook. Now I’m married.” The words sounded strange as he said it. Tyrion would never have believed he would say this someday. He didn’t know why, or for who, but he said them. The most surprising for him was his words were honest. The Red Viper was looking at him as if he was some kind of animal he had never seen before. “Prince Oberyn, if I may, a word in private?”

The Dornishman wasn’t pleased by Tyrion’s demand, but he let go his paramour nonetheless. He and Tyrion walked outside the brothel as Bronn stayed behind, enjoying the girls the prince ordered for them.

“Seems I visited the Lannister brothel by mistake,” Oberyn said as they went in the streets.

“Oh, they take all kinds.”

“Even Dornishmen.”

Even imps, Tyrion wanted to add. “The king is very grateful that you traveled all this way for his wedding.”

“Let us speak truth here. Joffrey is insulted. I am only the second son after all.”

“Well, speaking as a fellow second son, I have grown rather used to being the family insult.” The prince chuckled, but Tyrion didn’t know if it was honest. “Why did you come to King’s Landing, Prince Oberyn?”

“I was invited to the royal wedding.”

“I thought we were speaking truth.”

“The last time I was in the capital was many years ago. Another wedding. My sister Elia and Rheagar Targaryen, the Last Dragon. My sister loved him. She bore his children. Swaddled them, rocked them, fed them at her own breast. Elia wouldn’t let the wet nurse touch them.” By the way the Dornishman spoke, it was obvious it was a sad memory for him. Tyrion couldn’t pretend to love his sister the same way Oberyn loved his own. “And beautiful, noble Rhaegar Targaryen left her for another woman. That started a war and the war ended right here when your father’s army took the city.”

Tyrion knew what was coming. He knew what his father had done when he took King’s Landing.
Everyone knew. And right now that wasn’t something Tyrion wanted to be reminded of. He already had enough on his consciousness with Sansa’s family. “I wasn’t actually present.”

Prince Oberyn didn’t wait for him to finish before he continued. “They butchered those children. My nephew and niece. Carved them up and wrapped them in Lannister cloaks. And my sister, you know what they did to her?” Tyrion had lowered his head. With his hand Oberyn Martell rose it back. “I’m asking you a question.” Tyrion didn’t like the look on Prince Oberyn’s face. There was no more sadness, only wrath.

“I’ve heard rumors.”

“So have I. The one I keep hearing is that Gregor Clegane the Mountain raped Elia and split her in half with his great sword.”

“I wasn’t there. I don’t know what happened.”

“If the Mountain killed my sister, your father gave the order. Tell your father I’m here. And tell him the Lannisters aren’t the only ones who pay their debts.”

Prince Oberyn Martell walked away back to the brothel with a diabolical smile. The omens from this weren’t good. Tyrion would have to warn his father about this to prevent someone of the family to be killed. He returned to the Red Keep alone, leaving Bronn to his pleasures.

While he walked, Tyrion realized he didn’t really want to speak to his father about all this. To be honest he couldn’t blame Prince Oberyn’s lust for Lannister blood. But he didn’t want Lannister blood to be spilled all the same, though many would see it as good payment for all the other family’s blood the Lannisters spilled over the last decades. His father was respected, but also hated by most of the people in the Seven Kingdoms. Lord Tywin Lannister didn’t care about it, as long as people feared and respected him.

His father always claimed to do everything for family. If that was what it meant to care for his family, Tyrion wasn’t very eager to follow his father’s example. He wondered what family really meant for the Lord of Casterly Rock. He didn’t care very much about his children, who were his family.
Tyrion, Cersei and Jaime were all unhappy about their life. If that was the result for sacrificing everything to the family… Tyrion was malcontent. Oberyn Martell had put even more burdens on his mind when he already had too much. Tyrion had eaten in advance to welcome the dornish guests, but he knew Sansa would be taking her midday meal now.

He had ordered Shae and her other handmaidens to bring her to the gardens at the same time. Sansa barely left their rooms now. Shae told him that she spent all her days in their chambers and left only to pray in the godswood the evening. It was probably because Tyrion was present during their suppers and she wanted to escape him as soon as it was possible once they were done eating. Tyrion was really concerned about her health now. It was a month now since her brother and her mother were killed and she still barely ate anything. He hoped the fresh air might help her and give her back some appetite. He was disabused when he arrived at the place where she was.

Shae and another handmaiden were present. There was a lot of food before her and on a table to her right, but as always it was untouched. Shae was now offering her lemon cakes, and even that Sansa refused. She refused her favourite pastry. Tyrion wondered if there was any solution to this. Sansa couldn’t hold forever like this.

Shae was begging Sansa to eat when Tyrion arrived. “You love lemon cakes. Tell her she needs to eat.” She had noticed Tyrion’s presence and seemed discouraged.

“My lady, you do need to eat.”

“I don’t want to eat.” Sansa’s answer wasn’t encouraging. Her eyes were hollow, without life. All the contrary of the girl he had seen right before the news of the Red Wedding reached them.

“If I could have a moment alone with my wife.” Tyrion addressed his wish to Shae and the other servant. He thought her name was Brella. She left immediately, but Shae stayed behind, reluctant to leave obviously. Tyrion made her understand with a little move of his head that he needed to be alone with Sansa. He hoped she would understand it was only to help Sansa, nothing more.

Shae finally left, remembering him the situation at the same time. “She needs to eat.” As always she was angry after him each time he spent time with his wife. But Tyrion had no choice on this. He couldn’t try to help Sansa with Shae around. He wouldn’t be able to speak freely.

Tyrion sat next to Sansa and laid a hand on hers. She was still starring in front of her, her face without expression. “I can’t let you starve. I swore to protect you.” She pulled her hand from Tyrion’s almost immediately, still looking away. “My lady, I am your husband. Let me help you.”

“How can you help me?” There was only contempt in her voice, but at least she was talking to him.

“I don’t know, but I can try.” He had to try. He couldn’t allow Sansa to starve herself to death.

“I lie awake all night staring at the canopy thinking about how they died.”

“I could get you essence of nightshade to help you sleep.” He knew that wouldn’t solve much problems, but he couldn’t think about anything else to help her right now.

“How do you know what they did to my brother?” Like with Oberyn Martell, he had to lower the eyes. He knew all too well the details of the horrible things the Freys had done to the Starks after the slaughtering. He hadn’t told Sansa in the hope she would never learn about it, but it hadn’t mattered. She probably heard it from someone else, perhaps from Joffrey himself, or only by listening to the discussions in the Red Keep. “How they sowed his direwolf’s head onto his body? And my mother. They say they cut her throat to the bone and threw her body in the river.”

Tyrion couldn’t support it anymore. He couldn’t do as if his family had done nothing wrong. Sansa was his wife, and his father had destroyed all that remained to her in the most horrible way. He finally allowed some of his deepest thoughts to go out. “What happened to your family what a terrible crime. I didn’t know your brother. He seemed like a good man, but I didn’t know him. Your mother, on the other hand, I admired her. She wanted to have me executed, but I admired her.” He grinned a little while saying the latter, but turned back seriously very quickly. “She was a strong woman. And she was fierce when it came to protecting her children.”

He didn’t know if that would help her to feel better, but it couldn’t be worse than hearing the horrible lies spoken against the victims of the Red Wedding at court. “Sansa,” he called after her. For the first time in many weeks, she looked at him. “Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it’s true.” As soon as he said it, she averted her eyes once again and rose up from her seat.

“Will you pardon me, my lord? I’d like to visit the godswood.”

“Of course. Of course. Prayer can be helpful, I hear.”
“I don’t pray anymore.” The affirmation left him mingled. “It’s the only place I can go where people don’t talk to me.” She turned her heels and left.

Tyrion didn’t believe in gods, but Sansa always had. It saddened him to see she had abandoned her faith, the gods of her father even more. Tyrion had tried to help her, but he had failed, as he expected. Right now he would have done anything to support the girl, but again there was nothing he could do. He walked away and while he was walking the names of all the people whose deaths were caused by his family, directly or indirectly, came to his mind.

Only one of them deserved to die.

Chapter End Notes

I found it interesting to imagine what were Tyrion's thoughts and feelings at this moment. Being remembered by Oberyn about the slaughtering of the Targaryen children, then not long after about the horrible things that happened at the Red Wedding because of his father. As the producers of the show said in "Season 4: Inside the Episode #1", Oberyn and Tyrion have a lot in common, including their fellings about the Lannisters.

Please review

Next chapter: Shae
Shae IV

Chapter Notes

OK, that's a very short one, even shorter than Bronn's chapter. There will be more stuff in the following chapters. In fact, I have quite a few long chapters that are coming.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SHAE IV

Shae was waiting in Tyrion’s chambers, her clothes removed. She only wore her light under-silk, which were more smallclothes since there was nothing else under. She laid on the bed, her long legs naked and stretched in a very seductive way. It was always in a way like this one she would welcome Tyrion when he came to her and that it ended with them fucking each other. This time however she used her most enthralling position. It would work for sure. It had been months since she and Tyrion had any time together. They both needed to think about something else and Shae knew no better way for that. When something troubled them, men always looked for something to distract them, and from her experience, Shae knew they always turned toward this solution in these times. And Tyrion was no exception to that.

She wanted him. She missed her lion, the one whom she spent so many beautiful moments before. She missed the man she loved. He spent more time with his crying wife than with his love and Shae was tired of it. Tyrion should stay away from Sansa while Shae tried to comfort her. He should come to her secretly during the night. In the dungeons, the gardens, a corridor, Flea Bottom, outside the city… Shae didn’t care. She wanted to have him again. She wanted everything to be as they were before this stupid wedding. She wanted to escape with him, to sail away to the other side of the world where no one of his family could find them and where they could live happily until they died. She wanted him to look at her as he had before the Battle of Blackwater and when she visited him after he was wounded. She loved him. Sansa did not and would never love him. And yet the poor girl was the one to receive the gazes full of affection that Shae loved so much in Tyrion. How unfair it was. She doesn’t want you and she will never want you. I love you. I am your true wife. I am yours and you are mine. She wanted to scream it so that her lion would hear and understand he had nothing to get from his child wife.

She waited. What could take him so long? As if he could accomplish anything by talking to Sansa. Unless they were doing something else… Anger boiled in Shae as the mere thought of Tyrion and Sansa together crossed her mind. But she went back to reality once more. Sansa would never give herself to Tyrion after the tragedy of her family. Shae relaxed. Sansa was only a child. She wasn’t interested in Tyrion. Surely she hated him now. And she didn’t have Shae’s talents to please men. Shae knew Tyrion needed this kind of things from a woman. Sansa couldn’t give to Tyrion what Shae could. Shae had decided to wait in the bed Tyrion and Sansa were supposed to share for this reason. She could offer to Tyrion his wedding night, here, in the bed where it was supposed to happen. After that, Tyrion would never discard her again. She had some satisfaction in doing it in Sansa’s bed, she had to admit it. She liked the girl, but it wasn’t as if she was taking anything from her. Sansa didn’t want Tyrion and she wanted nothing of this bed. Shae wanted it on the other hand.
Finally Tyrion entered the room. She noticed some gap of time between the moment he opened the door and the moment he advanced in the room, as if he was afraid to come in. He shouldn’t be afraid. She wasn’t going to hurt him. When he arrived close to the table, she caught his attention with a very enticing voice. “My lion.”

Tyrion turned towards her. “What are you doing?”

That wasn’t the answer she wanted. No worry. She continued with the same voice, stretching on her chest to let the curve of her breasts and more visible. “What does it look like I’m doing? Come here.”

“How many times have I told you? You can’t visit me here.” He nearly sounded angry as he walked toward her. But she knew he wasn’t. Deep inside he wanted to spend time with her.

“I know. I know. We have come to a dangerous place. Have you forgotten me? Do you know how long it’s been?”

“Of course I haven’t forgotten.” She knew it.

“I want you. Don’t you want me?” She made her voice even more seductive and tried to kiss him.
But he fell back.

“Things are a bit tense right now.”

“What things?” She tried again to unlace his doublet, but he stopped her hand.

“My nephew the king wants to murder me. My wife hates me because my father murdered her family. Oberyn Martell wants to murder everyone whose last name is Lannister.” He raised his fingers as he enumerated his problems. Shae caught his fist and folded the fingers one by one, until only the thumb remained.

“You need to relax.” She said it very sweetly and sucked his thumb. Then she lifted up the fine silk of her undergarment and brought her lover’s thumb into her cunt, up where her mound was. It felt so good, after so much time. “Don’t you want to relax?” As she asked she approached her lips of her lover’s. He was backing up, so she pressed forward. It was when he abruptly removed his thumb. He was looking beside her.

“What’s wrong?” She grew impatient. Didn’t he want her? He should. How long was it since the last time he fucked her? Was it because he was seeing other women? Or even Sansa? She swelled of anger.

“I told you. It’s not a good time.”

“It’s never a good time. You have your child bride now.” She walked away from him and the bed, grabbing her handmaiden’s dress at the same time. That was poor clothes. Sansa always wore beautiful gowns made of the finest fabrics.

“Shae.” He was calling after her, but now Shae was too angry to listen to him. She hostilely turned her back to him while she pulled back her dress.

“Do you love her?”

“Love her? I barely know her. She’s a child. She despises me.”

“That’s not an answer.”
“Of course I don’t love her.” His tone wasn’t very convincing.

“You tried to ship me away.” It was time for her to confront him about that.

“Ship you away?”

“Give me diamonds and make me disappear.” She turned toward him as she put back her bracelets around her wrists and her ring. She nearly wanted to throw them to his face. Tyrion had offered them to her a long time ago. She wondered if he ever offered any jewel to Sansa. Surely he had, and the girl probably never wore them, but she was sure they were made of better stuff and more valuable than her own.

“What in the world are you talking about?” He dared to act as if he didn’t know. He and Varys were friends.

“If you want me to leave, just say it.” He didn’t answer. “SAY IT!” This time she yelled.

“Shhhh. I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

Shae was more than exasperated by his false denials. He wasn’t honest with her. He lied about his feelings for Sansa. He lied about his feelings for her. He lied about the fact he wanted her to leave. He lied to her about everything when Shae told him the truth about everything. “You want me to stay?”

She had her answer with the look he gave her. It confirmed everything she suspected. She grabbed her sandals and left the room, making as much noise as she could. She didn’t care if someone heard them. He would know how angry she was after him.

How could she have been so stupid to fall in love with him? To believe everything he told her? He was no different from the other men. Once they were bored with her, they set her aside for another woman they found more interesting. And Tyrion had only needed a child for that.

And yet Shae couldn’t help but love him. He was still beautiful in her eyes and she was a whore no more. She wouldn’t go back to this life. She had a life here, with him. She would get him back, no matter the cost.

He’s mine, and I’m his.

With these thoughts she walked to the servant’s rooms, still angry but determined to do anything that would be necessary to get Tyrion back.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa III

Chapter Notes

Sansa is back after an absence of eight chapters. She starts a very interesting evolution from this moment.

For those who may find it long before my fic change from the show, I'm sorry. I have to admit I find it long myself. The change begins next week.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Sansa III

Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it's true.

The words were pounding in her head. They came again and again, no matter how many times she would try to drive them out. It was like that ever since she had entered the godswood. She wanted to be alone.

Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it's true.

She had finally decided to pray. What she told Tyrion wasn’t entirely true. She still prayed in the godswood, but not all the time she spent there as before. And she wasn’t asking anything from the gods anymore. She was questioning them now, to understand why her family was slaughtered while the evil ones lived. Why was there no justice in this world? She tried to understand and she failed. She was alone, abandoned, a lone wolf in a lion’s den.

Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it's true.

She remembered how she had felt when Margaery told her what had happened at the Twins. How she hadn’t believed it first. She thought the wedding of her uncle would allow her brother to take back the advantage in the war. When finally she had realized that Margaery was telling her the truth, she had nearly fallen on the floor. She would have if her friend hadn’t held her. After some time, Sansa had asked Margaery to leave. She wanted to be alone. When her husband had entered their chamber, the hatred she felt for him at this moment couldn’t be described. And she had wanted him to suffer, to know how much she hated him when she looked at him.

Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it's true.

The next weeks had been an ordeal. She had crossed Joffrey once as she walked the corridors and with the way he talked to her, the details he gave her about the death of her mother and Robb, her armor of courtesies nearly cracked. After that she never left her rooms except for her evening visits of the godswood. She did nothing all day, only thinking about everybody she had lost.

Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it's true.

All her relatives were dead. Her half-brother Jon might be still alive at the Wall, but he was at the other side of the world and she didn’t know if she could really consider him family. They didn’t share the same mother. He was a bastard. Her true family was all gone now. Her mother. Her father. Robb. Arya. Bran. Rickon. Lady. All of them.

_Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it’s true._

The dreams didn’t help her. The rare times she managed to fall asleep she would make the same dream that haunted her. She hated to hear the same words from the bard each time. Life is a song. And yours is just about to begin. She hated to see all her family smiling at her. She hated to stand with Ser Loras, saying stupid vows that meant nothing. The part of the dream she hated the less was the end, when she would realize the beautiful knight wasn’t there anymore. At least it was more realistic. That always was the moment she would wake up. And then she would cry for her dead family. Every night it would happen.

_Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it’s true._

She didn’t feel well. She realized Shae had to lace her gowns tighter than before. She was hungry all the time. She was weary because of the lack of sleep. Her body reacted well when she went outside today, but Sansa didn’t want to feel well. All her family was dead. She was the only Stark left alive. No. It was worse than that. There was no Stark left. She was a Lannister and the heir to Winterfell and the North. Her children would bear the name of the people who killed her kin like beasts for amusement. She really was a traitor now. She had betrayed her family. Her home would belong to the Lannisters someday because of her.

_Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it’s true._

She wanted to scream. She didn’t want to hear it. Not from him. She didn’t want his compassion, his friendship, his support, his presence or anything good he could offer her. He was a monster. His father had destroyed everything she held dear. She didn’t want him to be sad for her. She wanted his voice to shut up. She didn’t want to hear it in her head any longer. She wanted to hate him.

_Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it’s true._

She couldn’t. He was everything she had left, the only one here in King’s Landing who really tried to be there for her. The only one who really wanted to comfort her without any second thoughts, without any hidden objectives. She was no idiot as when she had arrived in King’s Landing. She knew Margaery wanted to be her friend, but also that she wanted something else from her. What it was, she didn’t really know. Tyrion had no secret agenda. The proof was he barely spoke to her. He didn’t know what to tell her. He was only concerned about her. She had seen it in his eyes in the gardens. His words couldn’t achieve any secret goal. They were only encouragements for her to live. He didn’t try to convince her of anything else. There was nothing false about him. And she wanted to hate him because of that.

_Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it’s true._

Finally she gave up. Trying to ban his words from her mind was exhausting. She thought about them. She couldn’t stay as she was. Her mother would have sacrificed her life for her. She would have started a war to see her safe. And here Sansa was, wailing all day for the people who had tried to save her, who died for her. She was a wolf. She was the blood of the North and she had to be strong for her family, for the ones who died trying to help her. She was a Stark. The last one but still she was a Stark nonetheless. She needed to be brave. That’s what her family would want. That’s what her mother would want.

_Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it’s true._
The words didn’t bother her so much now. She continued to stay in her praying position, thinking about it. Her thoughts became more clear and she had the impression a great weigh was removed from her shoulders. A big one still lingered on her, but it was less heavy than previously. In comparison to the hell Sansa had lived in for weeks, she nearly felt free for a moment. She would survive. She would survive for her family. It was a duty she had towards the dead. She remembered the motto of her mother’s family. Family, Duty, Honor. Family came first. She had a duty toward her family. And her duty was to act with honor for them. She couldn’t let herself die. And she didn’t want to die in fact. She had thought about it, but she couldn’t bring herself to die. She could only bring herself to live miserably, and that was exactly what her mother wouldn’t want.

Your mother would want you to carry on. You know it’s true.

She accepted it. As much as she hated to admit it, Tyrion’s words were true. She had to live. She reflected about it for a long time and came to accept it. Then she began to speak to the old gods as she had done before, asking for their help in her hardship. She would need it. Perhaps in time she would start again to pray into the sept to ask help from the new gods as well. The gods of both her mother and her father could help her. She succeeded in finding a temporary peace, uneasy as it could be. She would need more time to face everything. She stayed like this a long time, letting her thoughts come and go. For the first time in a month, Sansa Stark felt good. She allowed herself to linger for a very long time here in the godswood, out of the world before she would have to face it again. She focused on the fresh air caressing her face. On the noise the wind made on the leaves. On the sound of the waves in the bay underneath her. It was so calm here. She felt at peace. It was a peace she was afraid to break, because she feared she could be broken again once it would be over.

Suddenly Sansa thought she heard a creak. She looked up at her right where there was a viewpoint, but nobody was here. She probably imagined it. Anyway it was time to leave the godswood. She rose and followed the trail to the exit. As she walked however she kept the impression that someone was watching her. She stopped for a moment and realized there were other footsteps than her own. Her heart began to beat faster. She walked in a hurry. She looked at her back once and saw someone following her. She pressed on, but finally reached a dead-end. She was trapped with an unknown person behind her. What if it was Joffrey? Or Ser Meryn Trant? Or worse? It was at this moment that she felt a hand on her shoulder. She jumped in surprise and turned around to face the intruder.

“It’s all right. It’s all right. It’s all right.” He put a finger near his lips. From the way he talked and staggered Sansa could see he was drunk, even without the distasteful breath she could smell even from this distance. The man was big and his hair were messy.

“You’re drunk.” Sansa stated the obvious.

“Yes. I have good reason to be. Once I was a knight. Now I’m only a fool. Don’t you know me?”

It took some time to Sansa, but slowly she remembered when she saw this face. It was in another very dark moment of her life, not long after her father’s death. “Ser Dontos. The king’s nameday celebration. I’m sorry. I should have remembered.”

She remembered how she saved the life of the knight when Joffrey ordered his kingsguards to force a full barrel of wine in his throat. She only managed to save him by suggesting to Joffrey he could make the man his fool. And Joffrey had agreed. Sadly this memory brought another one to Sansa’s mind. Right after the accident, Tyrion had arrived with a few men in Lannister armor, his sellsword and a great band of savages. He had mocked Joffrey publicly at this moment. It had been the first time Sansa had seen someone laugh at Joffrey in his presence without losing something. But it also had been the only time someone offered her condolences for her father’s death. She chased the thought of her head. She didn’t want to think about it.
“I can’t accept your apology,” Ser Dontos replied. “I may be a fool, but I’m a living fool, thanks to you.”

“Anyone would have done the same.”

“But only you did. I can never repay you. You gave me my life. But this, this is worth more than my life.” He took a necklace from a purse attached to his garments and offered it to Sansa. She took it. It was a simple but beautiful necklace with blue amethysts. “It belonged to my mother and her mother before her. House Hollard was strong once. House on the rise. That’s all that’s left of those days, thanks to a few sad, fat drunks like me.”

It reminded Sansa of her own family. The Hollards and the Starks were both destroyed because of Joffrey. “I can’t take it. It’s very, very kind of you, but I can’t.”

“I don’t have anything else left. That’s all. Take it. Wear it. Let my name have one more moment in the sun before it disappears from the world.” He was looking at her with pleading eyes.

“I’ll wear it with pride, Ser Dontos.” It was obvious the man regretted the downfall of his family. She could at least grant him that. She smiled at him, to show him she was happy to do it.

“Yeah.” He seemed to appreciate. “Excuse me, but my duties as a fool await me.” He left, the unhappy look of a drunken man on his face.

Sansa went back to her chambers, crossing no one on her way. By chance, the royal wedding occupied Joffrey and Cersei very much, so these last times the chances she would meet them in the Red Keep were quite diminished. She put the necklace in the drawer of her boudoir. As she closed the drawer her eyes were brought to something on the furniture. It was a rectangular leather box that laid there for a week now. She hadn’t touched it yet.

She remembered when she had found it. Sansa had reached her fifteenth nameday a week ago. She didn’t celebrate it since she had no mind for it, but on the morning of this day, she had awakened with something unexpected on her personal table. It was it, at the same place it still was now. At the time there had been a note on the box, but she had thrown it in the fire as soon as she read it and recognized Tyrion’s writing. “For your fifteenth nameday. Never forget who you are.” So the box had stayed unopened there for a week.

She didn’t want to open it. Not yet. Tyrion always was kind with her, but right now she still couldn’t accept his kindness. She didn’t know if she could ever accept it again. She decided she would live, but she still didn’t know what to do of her husband. Her mother would want her to carry on, that much was true, but would she want Sansa to be happy with a Lannister? Sansa herself didn’t want it and she was sure all her family would agree with her. She could learn to live with Tyrion and find some way of life with him, but she would never trust him. For her family, she could never trust him. The box stayed untouched.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Chapter Notes

This is the last time we have Tyrion POV before the change. Enjoy it.

By the way, for the people who are interested, I now have a Tumblr account under the pseudonym "Gracquess". I had to put a second "s" to my username because someone else already had it on Tumblr. News about my fanfics will be posted there.

This fanfiction is also available on Wattpad now.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TYRION VII

Tyrion was walking in the gardens. He had decided to take some fresh air. Baelish’s accounts were giving him headaches again. Perhaps that was the real reason why he suggested to his father to give his job to Tyrion before he left. Tyrion didn’t trust this man. Tyrion trusted Varys much more than Baelish and that was a lot to say. Tyrion had no idea what game the previous Master of Coin was playing, but he didn’t like it. His lies to Catelyn Stark that led to Tyrion’s arrest and started the war between the Lannisters and his wife’s family were enough for Tyrion to hate the man. He hadn’t done anything against Littlefinger while he was Hand of the King because he had no other proof than the word of Lady Stark. Tyrion wished it was Littlefinger and not Pycelle who betrayed him and informed Cersei about his plans for Myrcella. Furthermore, Baelish was very useful for the Crown only with the finances. And it was by using him that Tyrion managed to make a deal with Sansa’s mother to exchange his brother against her two daughters. He wished he could have fulfilled the arrangement, but when his brother had finally reached the capital, he was no more Hand of the King, his father was in no hurry to fulfill his son’s agreement, Sansa was married with him, her sister was still nowhere to be found and Catelyn Stark was dead. The only way to send back Sansa to her mother would be to kill her and that wasn’t an option Tyrion was ready to consider. Also, Baelish fulfilled very well the other secret mission Tyrion had entrusted him: to break the alliance between the Tyrells and Renly Baratheon. He needed Renly’s assassination for that, but he succeeded all the same. And he collected all the merit while Tyrion was put aside, as if he did nothing for House Lannister during the whole war. All the same, between his lies to Catelyn Stark and his betrayal of Ned Stark, Tyrion could never trust even a single second such a man.

And now, Tyrion would soon have to negotiate with the two merchants representing House Whitehill who claimed they could sell ironwood for the royal fleet. They were waiting for Tyrion right now in the Throne Room. And they would wait for a little while. Tyrion needed a little rest from these financial matters. At least if things became more and more complicated with his work as Master of Coin, the situation with his wife stabilized. Not that Sansa was anymore happy with him than before. He could still feel her resentment for the death of her mother and her brother and it was obvious she still mourned them. However, since their discussion on the terrace, she began to eat again. Tyrion also had the impression she was sleeping better. She even accepted the essence of nightshade he offered her, though he didn’t know if she really used it. Yesterday she even asked him how his day had been during the supper. That had taken Tyrion aback. She hadn’t spoken for the rest of the meal, but it still was a very great improvement in comparison to the last month. Tyrion didn’t think Sansa would forgive him or his family for the Red Wedding, but it reassured him all the same to see that Sansa was better.

To forget one moment about his troubles with the Master of Coin’s businesses, Tyrion began to reflect about a book he read not long ago. The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money by Archmaester Maynard. Tyrion found the matter of the work quite interesting. This maester had managed to convince his grandfather, Lord Tytos Lannister, to give him money for an experience in a few villages of the Westerlands decades ago. In these villages, the maester noted the proportion of people who didn’t work among all the population, an unemployment rate. He also noted the total production of these villages. Most of these villages had a mine where most of the people worked, or the population mostly farmed lands. The experience consisted in giving a silver stag each month to every person in the village for three years. The consequences of this had been very surprising and, in the eyes of the maester, a blessing. In one village, half the population didn’t work before the experiment. Three years later, only a tenth was without occupation. In another one, it fell from a third to a fifth. The decrease of unemployment had been visible everywhere, as well as an increase in the production. However, in each village, prices also climbed compared to the beginning of the experience. The author also noticed that more the unemployment would be high somewhere, the more it would reduce and the less prices would jump up. Tyrion had found this work very intriguing, though he wasn’t sure if his father gave a golden dragon each month for years to everyone in the Riverlands it would mean people would be better all of a sudden with fields ravaged and winter coming. However, that had been quite entertaining to read about it. Perhaps he should look into more books from this Archmaester Maynard. As Master of Coin, reading about this kind of things may help him eventually.

However, for now, Tyrion had to focus on the matter of the ironwood. His father himself had ordered him to find enough to build shields for Lannister and Tyrell armies, but even more important for the royal fleet. The two merchants he met shortly before didn’t inspire great trust. One of them was big and yelled as often as he breathed. The other one was more diplomatic, but only inspired more mistrust from Tyrion. He reminded him too much of Littlefinger. And to be honest, Tyrion didn’t really want to deal with the Whitehills. From what he knew of ironwood, two houses had fought for generations for its control: House Whitehill and House Forrester, the latter one to which belonged the Lady Mira Forrester that Tyrion met two weeks ago. According to his readings, House Whitehill destroyed the ironwood forests on their territory a long time ago (no wonder their house bore such a name). The Forresters, on the other hand, managed to harvest the forests in a way so that it may last centuries. And actually, the Forresters were the specialists for the crafting of ironwood.
Tyrion didn’t think the Whitehills would be able to supply the Crown with good quality ironwood after decades without working it. The ideal would be to receive ironwood harvested by the Forresters if that was possible. As he was thinking about it, Tyrion suddenly noticed two young women sitting on a bench with a jug of wine. He recognized one of them immediately. It seemed there were gods in this world who heard his wishes. He walked over them.

“Hmm… A conspiracy of handmaidens.” The two girls were obviously startled by his intrusion.
They stood up abruptly.

“My lord.” It was the other one who spoke. For a moment Tyrion didn’t recognize her, but then he remembered she was there when Cersei had tried to bring the Forrester girl to speak against Lady Margaery. She was another handmaiden of the future queen. Tyrion couldn’t remember her name.

It wasn’t difficult to see he had caught them doing something they shouldn’t. The brown haired handmaiden was hiding the jug behind her back. “Ladies. What have we here? If you mean to drink form that flagon…”
“We’re just enjoying the sunshine.” Lady Mira Forrester seemed a bit tense too, though less than the other one.

“Is that what they’re calling wine these days?” The other girl finally gave Tyrion the flagon. It was useless to hide it now. With his great experience, Tyrion recognized the wine immediately by smelling it. “Not the finest Arbor red. But a favorite of my sister’s. Quite expensive for a handmaiden. I’d be curious to know how you got hold of it. Since I’m certain my sister didn’t give it to you. She won’t even share with me.”

“We found it.”

“Found it? Where?”

“In that bush.” It was the rounded face handmaiden who answered this time. Her answer wasn’t very clever. Tyrion wondered if Lady Mira would have said the same thing. He didn’t think so.

“Lord Tyrion.” The northern girl looked at him with a pleading in her eyes. That was interesting. It meant she cared about the other girl. They were probably friends.

“Strange it would find its way into a bush,” Tyrion began. “If Cersei knew you had this wine, she’d drown you in it. Yet you’re worried about an alliance with me? You need to know what risks are worth taking.” Tyrion wouldn’t tell his sister. He didn’t see the necessity to have someone killed for a bottle of wine. However, he had an opportunity he couldn’t miss. “Things have changed. My father has recently taken an interest in ironwood. Most of the royal navy went up in green flames. It must be rebuilt.” He gave back the flagon to the other girl and began to walk before them. “He’s insisted I handle things myself. I’m on my way to meet representatives of Lord Whitehill.”

“Lord Whitehill?” Mira Forrester was obviously surprised and horrified by this. Tyrion had hit the right point.

“He’s hired a pair of merchant lords to broker for his house. It would seem Lord Whitehill wishes to sell the ironwood right out from beneath your family. I don’t know much about the man. But judging by his upjumped sellswords… Negotiating with him won’t be pleasant.”

“I will speak for House Forrester.” Lady Mira’s voice was full of determination. This walk had been a very good idea. He turned back to face the young woman.

“Perhaps you could. Come with me. These men think I have no choice but to deal with them. Imagine their surprise when I bring a Forrester to the table. It might be the first fun I’ve had in months. My lady.”

With a gesture from his arms, Tyrion invited Lady Mira to follow him. She glanced one last time at her friend and followed him. Tyri on was very eager to see how the two merchants, especially the fat yelling one, would react. That would change him from the gloomy moments he shared with Sansa and Shae these last times. As they walked in the direction of the Throne Room, Tyrion warned Lady Mira about the two merchants and how they could react to her presence. He told her at the same time that she should be especially wary of the thin one named Rickard Morgryn. He was the quiet one of the two and the more a man was noisy, the less he was dangerous, while the opposite applied for silent men. He only had to think about Varys and Littlefinger to know it. Lady Mira listened to everything he had to say very attentively, asking questions about the two men at the same time. The girl was intelligent. Not too much for her own good he hoped, as Cersei said once.

They finally reached the doors of the Throne Room and a guard opened it for them. He slightly bowed his head toward Lady Mira with a smile as she passed before him. The two merchants were standing, waiting for him. The fat one was obviously angry, as always.

“We’ve been waiting here for an hour.” Be glad you didn’t wait any longer, big ham. That would have been my pleasure.

“Andros, be courteous.” The other had been trying to control his friend for all the discussion they had before and he would need to do it again it seemed.

“Courtesy in a merchant. Like finding gold in your chamber pot.” Tyrion descended the steps and turned back to Lady Mira so the two men would notice her presence. “Apologies, my lady.”

“Who is this? Some girl you’ve brought for entertainment?” This Lord Andros clearly wasn’t a good diplomat. How could he end here and hope to make any contract with the Crown this way? Perhaps Tyrion should send him to negotiate with Joffrey. He wondered if Joffrey would piss himself before so much rage or if he would use the man as a target practice.

“She’s a lady, Lord Andros.” Well, the other one has eyes at least. Morgryn knew how to behave.

The northern girl chose this moment to intervene. “My name is Mira Forrester.”

She descended the steps and stood before the two men. Tyrion watched carefully. He would learn a lot of things on the two men from their reactions to this presence. And it was very funny to see them so taken aback. They were surprised for sure. The fat one couldn’t find his words anymore. It was the other one who spoke first.

“Mira Forrester?” He didn’t seem quite unbelieving, more evaluating. It was Baelish’s style. Tyrion was sure he was surprised by the presence of the girl, but he only showed it for half a second.

“Why are you here?” asked his friend.

“A fair question,” Morgryn added.

“We were told we’d be speaking to Lord Tyrion alone. This is no place for a Forrester.”

“That’s a private matter, my lords,” claimed very calmly the handmaiden. She wouldn’t tell them the reason of her presence, but they would guess it quite easily all the same.

“Forresters have nothing to offer, my lord. If you want ironwood, you’ll have to deal with the Whitehills.” Tyrion internally laughed at such a stupid declaration from Lord Andros. He talked as if he was the one with the power here. Again his partner had to reason him.

“Andros. I’m sorry, Lady Mira, but we’ve already spoken to Lord Tyrion…”

Tyrion stopped him before he could say anymore. “You spoke. I listened. Lady Mira has since persuaded me to consider her offer first. Now if you’ll excuse us.” He made a sign towards the guard at the doors and he opened them. Even an idiot like this Andros should understand what it meant.

“You’re going to dismiss…”?

“You can’t do this!” interjected the fat man. For the first time, Morgryn seemed taken aback.

“I assure you, I can.” Tyrion said it with his most serious voice.

“This is a mistake, my lord.”

“I don’t think so.” Tyrion had nothing to do with empty threats from a yelling man.
The crier stepped towards Lady Mira with a threatening look. “Lord Whitehill will hear of this! He’s not a man to take such matters lightly. Nor am I.”

“That’s enough, Andros.” Again, Morgryn tried to control his associate. And again, he failed.

“Lord Andros, I am truly sorry if I’ve upset you.” As Mira Forrester said it, Tyrion knew she wasn’t sincere, but she played her part very well.

Andros spoke with his angry voice one last time before leaving. “You have no idea. Lord Tyrion.” He glanced one last time towards Tyrion and walked out of the room. Morgryn approached him then.

“Lord Tyrion. Do let me know when you’ve come to a decision. I’d like the opportunity to change your mind. Lady Mira.” With a little bow he followed his friend. Tyrion would have to watch these two, especially Lord Morgryn. Perhaps he had put the young lady in danger.

“Good day, gentlemen!” he told them as the doors closed. “Well, that was fun. Now. As for your offer. What did you have in mind?” He poured himself some wine, waiting for Lady Mira’s answer.

“My lord?” she asked him.

“The Crown’s ironwood. I assume you have a proposition. You had a reason for coming here. I know it wasn’t just to entertain me.”

Mira Forrester took a serious expression before she spoke. “My family can supply all that the Crown needs.”

Now, that was interesting. “You’re suggesting the Forresters to be our sole supplier of ironwood. Lord Whitehill would be left in the cold. If he wishes to sell to the Crown, he’ll have to do so through your family. You will have him at your mercy. Or… you’ll bring your houses to open war. You do know that’s a possibility, don’t you?” Tyrion was more than disposed to buy ironwood from the Forresters. He didn’t trust the Whitehills on the matter and he would be more than happy to infuriate Cersei with that. However, the girl’s family could be in great danger in this case. He didn’t wish to cause the destruction of another northern house.

“Then that’s a risk I’ll have to take.” Her attitude was much different from the other time. Tyrion had heard the Lord of Ironrath who succeeded to Lord Gregor was assassinated by Ramsay Snow, the bastard son of Roose Bolton. Probably the Forresters had no more choice now if they wanted to survive. Circumstances were different and they needed allies. He would have to consider everything on his own side however before he took a decision.

“I’ll consider the arrangement. Of course, you’d have to do something for me in return. Don’t worry. The terms will be fair.” Tyrion rose from his seat and Lady Mira did the same.

“What is it you want?” The girl was cautious as always, despite the different situation. She was right to be.

“You’ll know soon enough. We have an understanding then.”

“Thank you, my lord.”

As the northern girl walked away, Tyrion warned her one last time. At least, he owed her the truth about the dangers that surrounded her. “This will either be very good for both of us or very bad for you.” She stopped. “For your sake, I hope it’s the former.” Mira Forrester started to walk again and left the room.
Tyrion really hoped it wouldn’t end badly for her. There was no need for more blood spill of the North. And this girl had resources. Perhaps Tyrion had found a new ally in the game of thrones. Future would tell.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: a new POV character
Jaime I

Chapter Notes

Someone wondered in a comment not long ago what would be Jaime's reaction to Tyrion's marriage. I hope his wishes are fulfilled.

JAIME I

It was a few weeks now since Jaime Lannister came back to King’s Landing and he still couldn’t believe how the capital and its people changed during his absence. When he left, Robert Baratheon was his king and stupid and honourable Ned Stark was his Hand. Now, Joffrey, his nephew and seed, was the king and his father was Hand of the King for the first time in twenty years. The Kingsguard changed a lot too. Barristan the Bold was gone, dismissed by Joffrey and now Jaime was the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard. Mandon Moore and Preston Greenfield were dead, Balon Swann and Osmund Kettleblack had taken their places, and Arys Oakheart was gone to Dorne with his niece Myrcella. And Cersei, the woman he loved, his twin sister, the one with who he came into the world… how she changed. She still had the same passion, the same fury he loved so much in her, but she had become so distant with him, blaming him for taking too much time to come back. As for his father, he nearly forced him to abandon his vows as a member of the Kingsguard to become the Lord of Casterly Rock. Jaime had refused. He didn’t want to be the Lord of Casterly Rock. He didn’t want to be a lord at all, truth being said. He wanted to stay in King’s Landing with the woman he loved and to do his duty. After everything he had gone through, he felt that was where he belonged more than ever.

Jaime had changed too. His journey through the Riverlands with Brienne changed him, physically and mentally. He was short a hand now, but more than that he realized how he maundered for a great part of his life. He wanted to act with honor once more, to become who he had wanted to be when he joined the Kingsguard. He wasn’t going to break another vow he made. The result was that his father disavowed him. Jaime didn’t know how to feel about it. He never thought his father would make such a thing because he didn’t want to be the Lord of Casterly Rock. He still had Tyrion after all to succeed him, and Jaime didn’t see how Tyrion could be worse than him as an heir. In fact, from what Jaime saw since he came back, Tyrion was more than ever a better choice than him to lead the Lannisters one day. He had spoken with Ser Balon Swann and his cousin, Lancel. Both told him Tyrion fought valiantly at the Battle of Blackwater and that without him the city would have fallen. Jaime was quite surprised and happy to hear it. His little brother had fought on the battlefield just like him when it was always refused to him. He had been Hand of the King and now he was Master of Coin. Jaime saw nothing to state that Tyrion wouldn’t be a good Lord of House Lannister. Even more surprising now, he was married.

The latter had left Jaime quite dumbfounded. And when he learned that his wife was Sansa Stark… Jaime remembered how Tyrion had loved his first wife, Tysha, until their father decided to end all of this. Why couldn’t they just love the woman they want? Jaime never understood it. For now however, Jaime couldn’t tell if his little brother was happy with his new wife. He knew what happened at the Twins. These events had been quite a shock, especially for Brienne. And she thought they should kidnap Sansa, his sister-in-law, and get her out of the city since she wasn’t safe here. Well, she probably didn’t think about kidnapping her, but why would she come voluntarily with the Kingslayer and a strange woman who claimed to have sworn a vow to Catelyn Stark? Jaime knew very well Sansa Stark wasn’t entirely safe here with Joffrey and his sister, but she was far safer than somewhere lost in the Seven Kingdoms. Where could they send her? The only way to send her to her mother now was to kill her, and that wasn’t a prospect that cheered Jaime. She had no more family left. As for Arya Stark, she was probably dead by now. The daughter of Catelyn Stark couldn’t be safer than here, married to Tyrion. The way Jaime knew his brother, he wouldn’t let someone hurt his wife. Ser Balon Swann had already told him how he came to the defense of the girl when she was still betrothed to Joffrey. Jaime would have to talk with Ser Meryn Trant later about beating little girls. How could the Kingsguard have gone so low?

In the meantime, Jaime had a meal with his little brother and he was walking to his chambers. He wasn’t really hungry, but for now Tyrion was the only member of his family who hadn’t proved to be a pain in his ass ever since he came back. And Tyrion always had a way to lighten the atmosphere. Perhaps Jaime would be in a better mood after some time spent with his brother. He also had to ask him something. Something his honor depended on.

When he entered the room Tyrion was working on his books as usual. It seemed everything that was said about the duty as Master of Coin was true: a lot of work for very little recognition. No wonder their father decided to give the job to Tyrion. As soon as Jaime entered Tyrion looked up. The mocking smile that Jaime missed so much during his captivity welcomed him.

“Big brother. I’m glad to see you. You just rescued me from a tiresome and unending work.” Tyrion left his desk and, without surprise, went to the table to pour some wine for both of them.

“I’m glad to see you too, little brother.” Jaime walked too to the table and dropped himself on a chair.

“Take it. It’s the finest wine of the Arbor. There has never been so much in the city.” His brother placed a cup right before him. Sadly, Jaime tried to take it with his right hand. All the wine spilled on the floor with the goblet. Jaime sighed heavily.

Tyrion took back the cup and filled it again, placing it on Jaime’s left this time. Jaime raised his cup using the good hand this time. “For the two brothers reunited,” said Tyrion as he raised his own cup. They drank, though Jaime had some difficulty to appreciate the taste. “Pod will arrive very soon with the food.”

As Tyrion said it, the boy he called Pod entered with another servant, carrying a large amount of food. His brother still ate so well it seemed. There were sausages, boar, grapes, cheese, cake, pie… So many things to eat and Jaime had taste for none of them. Still, he appreciated to be with his brother again.

As they served the food, Jaime watched his brother attentively. Tyrion had changed since their last meeting. First, there was the scar in his face. It wasn’t as bad as people would have you believe. Some were saying he lost a nose. It didn’t look much more than a scratch from Jaime’s point of view, and it was the proof his brother had fought in battle. How many times Jaime wished he could teach his brother how to fight with a sword when they were young? Moreover, his demeanor was different. Not much, but for someone who knew him all his life, Jaime could tell his little brother too had changed in his absence. He was still making japes, but less than before and he nearly seemed serious when he made them. He seemed tired too. Where was the brother who always mocked everything just for fun? Perhaps he partially disappeared when their father gave him functions. Jaime felt quite dazed about it, though perhaps he shouldn’t. Their father had given a chance to Tyrion, something he never did before, and as far as Jaime knew Tyrion proved he was more than capable.
With some chance his father wouldn’t Trouble Jaime anymore with Casterly Rock and would name Tyrion his heir. Nothing could make Jaime happier actually.

They began to eat, or more exactly Tyrion began to eat, stuffing his plate with everything there was to eat in the room. Jaime didn’t take a lot and ate even less.

“Your new hand, it’s nicer than the old one,” Tyrion declared while he took another sausage. “Wouldn’t you agree, Pod?”

The squire didn’t seem to know what to answer. Jaime wondered how this one ended up in Tyrion’s service. “Is it solid gold?”

“Gilded steel,” corrected Tyrion. “You’re not eating. Why is no one eating? My wife wastes away and my brother starves himself.”

“I’m not hungry,” Jaime stated. Between their father, Cersei and Brienne, Jaime wasn’t really in the mood for a feast.

“You lost a hand, not a stomach. Try the boar. Cersei can’t get enough of it since one killed Robert for her.” In other circumstances, Jaime would have laughed. Instead he raised a hand when the squire tried to put a sausage in his plate.

Tyrion chose this moment to propose a toast and raised his cup “A toast. To the proud Lannister children. The dwarf, the cripple and the mother of madness.” On this one Jaime had to smile. His little brother couldn’t be more right. What a trio of children they made. Three children who disappointed their father in one way or another. Jaime advanced his left hand to take the jug of wine and pour himself more. He would need a lot of wine. Perhaps it would have made him more joyful, but in his movement his right hand toppled his cup once again. Jaime had to sigh once more.

The squire intervened immediately. “I’ll clean it up.”

Jaime stopped him immediately. He didn’t want everyone to do things for him because he was a cripple. “No, I’ll do it. Leave us.” The boy left the room right away. The other servant had left some time ago. Jaime settled in his chair.

“It’s only wine.” Tyrion willingly spilled the content of his own cup on the table with a big smile as he said it. He then rose from his own seat and went to fill another cup for Jaime. The cripple was more than depressed now. He wasn’t even able to drink without two hands.

“I can’t fight anymore,” he told his brother in a low and depressed voice.

“What about your left?”

Jaime shook his head. “I can hold a sword, but all my instincts are wrong. How can I protect the king when I can hardly wipe my own ass?”

“You’re the Lord Commander now. Command. Let others do the fighting. When was the last time Father used a sword?” Tyrion went back to his seat.

“I’m not Father. I’m the Kingslayer. When people find out I can’t slay a pigeon…”

“Train, then.” Tyrion interrupted him. “Learn to fight with your other hand.”

“With whom? You? Men talk. Soon as someone discovers I can’t fight, he’ll tell everyone.”
“Who?” Jaime was intrigued. Which swordsman could be silent enough to not reveal his secret?

“Bronn. As long as you pay him, he will tell no one. Believe me, I entrusted him with many of my secrets and he revealed none of them.”

“You want me to trust a sellsword?” Jaime was quite skeptical about this.

“As I said, as long as you pay him, he won’t talk. And this sellsword saved me by winning my trial by combat at the Eyrie… and put more than half of Stannis’s fleet to the torch with a single flaming arrow.”

Jaime remained silent for a moment, considering the proposition. “All right. I guess I can try.” There was something now that Jaime needed to discuss with his brother. “You know, Catelyn Stark is the one who released me. She set me free against the promise I would send her daughters back to her.”

“Oh. So she accepted my proposition it seems.” Jaime was quite taken aback by this statement.

“Your proposition?”

“Yes. I sent Baelish to Renly’s army to negotiate your liberation against those of Arya and Sansa Stark. I knew Robb Stark would never trade you even for his sisters, but Lady Stark was different. I saw how she was ready to do anything for her children when she arrested me in the Riverlands. I sent her Ned Stark’s bones as a sign of good faith and it seems it worked. And at the same time I told Baelish to try to put mistrust between the Tyrells and Renly if possible.”

Jaime was quite dazed, but also grateful that his brother was at the origin of his escape. “Well, I guess I have to thank you. However, Lady Stark made me and Brienne swear that we would return her daughters to her as soon as we reached the capital.”

“Yes, I see.” Tyrion looked a bit upset. “Sadly our beloved father decided to end prematurely Catelyn Stark’s life. I don’t know where Arya Stark is right now and Sansa is now married with me. I’m afraid we can’t really send them back to their mother anymore, even if she was still alive.”

Jaime had to agree with that. “Did you intend to send them back to Lady Stark? Arya wasn’t in your hands at this time, she had already disappeared, isn’t it?”

“Yes, she had. But it would convince Catelyn Stark much more if we told her we were going to give her back her two daughters instead of a single one. And if I had told her that Arya had disappeared, she might not have believed my word. Perhaps she would have thought that I killed her. So I told her a lie, it’s true, but not a complete lie.” Tyrion’s expression turned sour. “I would have sent her her two daughters back. You didn’t see what Joffrey did to Sansa. If you had come sooner, I would have sent Sansa to her mother, but things changed when Father decided that I would marry her. As for Arya, I would have sent her too if I could. There was still some hope we could find her before you reached the capital. Anyway, I’m afraid it doesn’t matter now. There are no Starks left alive, considering the last one is now my wife, hence a Lannister. In name at least.”

Tyrion seemed quite sad as he said all of this. Jaime guessed his wife hadn’t been very happy about her family’s death. Jaime remembered Tyrion’s state after what happened to his first wife. The worst was he held Jaime no rancor for that. “Look, just make sure nothing happens to the Stark girl,” he asked his brother. “I swore to Catelyn Stark that I would return her safely, but I can’t. Just make sure she’s safe. I’ll have fulfilled a part of the vows then.”

Tyrion was looking at him with a strange expression now. However, when he spoke, he was very serious. “I didn’t allow anyone to hurt her before our father ever thought about marrying us. I am not going to permit it now either. She is my wife, even if we both didn’t want it, and I swore to protect her when I put a cloak on her shoulders. So don’t worry, I’ll keep her safe.”

Jaime was relieved to hear this. His sister-in-law would be safe with Tyrion if she wasn’t happy. He kept his promise to Catelyn Stark. They finished their meal in silence. At the end, Tyrion told him he would arrange a moment and a place for him and Bronn to practice without anyone knowing. Jaime then left his brother to his work. Judging by the pile of books on his desk, it was boring. Probably as boring as to be Lord of Casterly Rock. Jaime hoped more than ever Tyrion would inherit the damn castle and the titles.

As he walked away, Jaime remembered how Tyrion looked serious when he talked about protecting Sansa Stark. Jaime wondered why. Of course, Jaime knew his brother had a lot of compassion for everyone who was mistreated without reason. Perhaps that was why he seemed so determined to defend the girl. However, he felt there was something else. Could it be Tyrion was in love with the girl? Jaime shook his head. He knew Tyrion didn’t bed her, Osmund Kettleblack told him once. She was only a child in his brother’s eyes. How old was the Stark girl? Maybe not older than Tyrion’s first wife when they married.

This brought back bad memories to Jaime. Something that happened so long ago. He wasn’t there when his father dealt with the girl, Tysha. But he had learned afterwards what had happened. He discovered the horrible things his father did to the girl Tyrion loved so much after he left the room. Jaime felt an ocean of guilt overwhelming him as he thought about that. Tyrion had been so happy with her. Jaime never saw him as happy afterwards. And all that was Jaime’s fault. He was responsible for everything. He allowed his brother to marry her. He made his confession when his father ordered him. He wasn’t there when the girl was raped. He should have been there for Tyrion. He should have protected his little brother. But he failed him in the worst way someone could imagine. Even worse, Tyrion didn’t hold him responsible for all this and even thanked him for giving him a fortnight of happiness. Perhaps it wasn’t the same now, but Tyrion was married once more. Now he had to protect his brother as an eldest brother, and he had to protect his wife for the promise he did to her mother. This time, he wouldn’t fail. He wouldn’t break another vow, no matter what his father, his sister or anyone else would say.

Such were the thoughts of Ser Jaime Lannister as he walked to the rooms of the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard. Once he arrived there, he looked at the Book of Brothers, also called the White Book. There were recorded all the great accomplishments of all members of the Kingsguard. Jaime turned the pages one by one, looking at all the names of the great men who served in this elite force. Ser Duncan the Tall. Ser Arthur Dayne, the Sword of the Morning. Prince Aemon Targaryen, the Dragonknight. Ser Barristan Selmy, called Barristan the Bold. And him, Ser Jaime Lannister. The Kingslayer. The Oathbreaker. The man without honor. The page for him was white as snow. He had realized no great deed up to now. He would have to change that.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

The next two chapters will be the last before the change, and they will be more than important for the rest of the fic, so don't miss them. Something really big is coming.
Tywin finished to write the royal decree giving the castle of Riverrun and all its lands to his sister and her husband, Lady Genna and Lord Emmon Frey. At least one good thing would come out from this stupid union his father arranged. His father may have loved all his children, but he was stupid and weak, allowing his bannermen to mock him and rebel against him without lifting a little finger. Tywin made sure a long time ago that it wouldn’t happen again. And now, after so many years, his House was the most respected and most powerful in all the Seven Kingdoms.

The Hand of the King put the decree in a chest on a nearby table and sealed it, to make sure no one would touch it. He would have it signed and stamped by the king in two days, after his wedding. Tywin went to the table in the corner of his office where laid a map of the Seven Kingdoms. Very soon, every kingdom would be under the control or the influence of House Lannister. However, to achieve it, Tywin needed one last thing. His son, Jaime, in who he placed all his hopes for the future of his house, had refused to become who he was meant to be ever since his birth. He preferred to serve as a bodyguard for a boy king instead of serving his family. He was no son of Tywin now. Tywin needed another heir to continue his bloodline. For that, he would need the dwarf to do his duty.

Tywin stared at the map, looking at each kingdom. Each one had to be connected to House Lannister and to the Crown in some way. Problems were solved for most of them, but not entirely. In facts, two kingdoms were no more insured, and the thing that made Tywin so furious was that his own lands, the Westerlands, were among them. It was at this moment that someone entered the room. Tywin looked at the disgrace of his family walking in his direction. He sat at the Small Council’s table, at the other end of the table, always face to face with him.

“You asked for my presence.” Tyrion wasn’t carrying one of his ledgers as usual. Anyway Tywin didn’t summon him here to talk about financial matters. They would be for another time and Tyrion would exasperate him again with his demands to reduce the cost of the royal wedding. The wedding would take place tomorrow anyway and to reduce the costs now was probably impossible. Tywin had ordered Tyrion here for something much more important.

Tywin stood tall next to his chair. “I think I told you a week ago about your obligations for your family.”
“Yes, I remember that very well. I’m short of arms and legs, not of brain and memory. The other way I wouldn’t be able to tell you that I have found a very good supplier to provide us all the ironwood we need. House Forrester will give us ironwood of better quality than the Whitehills will ever be able. I hope you didn’t forget the royal decree I asked last week when we discussed about it.”

Tywin went to his office and took the sealed parchment with the name Forrester on it. His grandson hadn’t been well inclined to give former bannermen of House Stark the role to supply the Crown in ironwood, but Tywin made him understand he didn’t have another choice in his own way. The decree was signed yesterday. He threw it before Tyrion and stayed at the other side of the table.

“Now that this matter is over,” he began, “it is time we discuss something really important.”

“Well, I think the reconstruction of the royal fleet is important.” Tyrion took the decree while he spoke.

“You know very well what I am talking about.” This halfman tested his patience all too much. “I warned you last week that you had until the royal wedding to consummate the marriage with your wife. A week later I learn that the girl is still a maid.”

“Perhaps she didn’t bleed when I took her. Or perhaps I did the deed in another place than our bed. You don’t need a bed to fuck, you can do it in many different places where blood wouldn’t be detected.” Tywin didn’t like this attitude. Again, it reminded him of someone.

“Then I am sure Pycelle could confirm me after a brief examination that your wife hasn’t been deflowered. I know you didn’t do the deed, so don’t try to hide it.”

Tyrion changed his attitude. He had turned serious all of a sudden. “And if I didn’t?”

“I gave you an opportunity far greater than you ever deserved.” Tywin was now releasing all the frustration he had over Tyrion. “The girl is the key to the North. You only need to put a son in her to get it and to rule the largest of the seven kingdoms. And yet, despite all these advantages, you waste it. I gave you a chance to be useful to the family. You have shamed House Lannister long enough. You have this night to do your duty.”

“And if I refuse?”

“I will find ways to make you do it on the following night.”

Tyrion stared at his father, not blinking a single time. Tywin recognized these eyes. The determination, the absence of fear, the resolve… He didn’t want to see it on this face. “You will not force me upon Sansa. She is my wife and I swore to protect her when we were wed.”

“Do you think you have such a duty toward her? Your duty is to your family, to the Lannisters. This is all that matter. Family. And you will do your duty to your family by bringing the North under our control.”

Tyrion didn’t answer immediately. The next thing he talked about would have surprised anyone, but Tywin didn’t show his surprise. “Tell me, Father. Was it duty to family that had you butchered Talisa Stark with a son in her belly? Or Catelyn Stark’s body thrown in a river? Or Elia Martell raped right after her children were savagely slaughtered, then cut in half? Was it duty to your family that made you slaughter innocent children and women?”

Tywin wanted to laugh at the imbecility of the dwarf. “I do what is necessary. I ordered Gregor Clegane to kill Rhaegar’s children to prove our loyalty to Robert. We had to, since we only joined the rebellion at the very end. We gave Robert a great service this way by killing possible opponents to his reign and avoiding him to soil his hands. As for the Starks, I ordered Walder Frey and Roose Bolton to kill Robb Stark and his child. Nothing more, nothing less.”

“Oh, so if I understand well, Catelyn Stark, Elia Martell and Talisa Stark weren’t supposed to die? Is that what you are telling me?”

“I never gave any order concerning them. But since Robb Stark’s child was inside his wife’s belly, the only way to kill him was to kill her. As for Elia Martell, I had more pressing matters back then than to specify to Ser Gregor to not kill her. Her death was a small price to pay for the marriage of your sister with Robert. As for Catelyn Stark, I was considering to have her transferred to Casterly Rock or King’s Landing where I would use her as a hostage to ensure the submission of the riverlords. Sadly accidents happen and she died at the Red Wedding along with many other northern lords, though the Freys and Roose Bolton were wise enough to keep some for ransom and as hostages.”

“And of course, you closed your eyes on all this. For family.” There was venom in Tyrion’s voice when he said the last two words.

“The deaths of a few people have no importance. There are things we cannot control and we must accept them to happen for the good of the family.”

“These actions have made our family the most hated and despised house of all the Seven Kingdoms. Everyone wants to see us dead because of the atrocities you committed in the name of the family. The Dornish, the people of the Reach, those of the Vale, the smallfolk of King’s Landing, the Northerners, the Riverlands people. Even the people of the Westerlands despise us with what you did to the Reynes and the Tarbecks. We are remembered for the Rains of Castamere.”

“And of course, you closed your eyes on all this. For family.” There was venom in Tyrion’s voice when he said the last two words.

“The deaths of a few people have no importance. There are things we cannot control and we must accept them to happen for the good of the family.”

“And what will happen the day they don’t need or fear us anymore? You never thought about it. You never considered a single time that the Lannisters wouldn’t be able to keep the power you gave them after you’d be gone. Jaime, Cersei and Joffrey will be unable to keep the Realm at their feet. And once I’ll be in the North, the first Northerner to cross my path will kill me for what we did at the Twins. Our actual king is as mad as the one you overthrew twenty years ago. He will cause a new rebellion as soon as you’ll be gone. And when our enemies will realize we are weak, they will turn against us and destroy us. When it will happen, all the people of the Seven Kingdoms will cheer up and dance in the streets. That will be your legacy.”

Tyrion stopped to talk and seemed to wait for a reply. Tywin didn’t care to make one. What Tyrion said didn’t matter. House Lannister would be strong after he was gone. He would make sure of that. What Tywin did always was for the family and it would secure a dynasty that would last a thousand years.

Seeing plainly he wouldn’t get a reply, Tyrion continued. “Perhaps you don’t realize it, but you are not protecting the family with what you’re doing. You don’t care about your family. You only care about a family name.”

“As I once told you, the house that puts family first will always defeat those that put the wishes of their children first.”

“Seeing how this worked out with your own children, I don’t think your method gave better results. I don’t care anymore what will happen to House Lannister in the future, you may already have sentenced us to die with what you did in the name of the family. But I won’t cause anymore sorrow or pain to Sansa. You destroyed everything that was left to her and I will not let you hurt her anymore. She is my wife. She is a Lannister now. That makes her family. You may try to force me upon her, but you won’t succeed, no matter what you do. I WILL NOT RAPE HER.”

Tywin stood still in front of the dwarf, holding his gaze. He didn’t know how long it lasted, but it lasted long. Tyrion dared to question everything he had done during his whole life to bring back House Lannister into power, after the follies of his father. Everything he did had been for this, for family. And this monster, this walking embarrassment that he allowed to live, dared to question his motivations and his actions. And he was doing it with the same look Tywin hated so much to see on his face. Tywin would put him back to his place. It seemed the lesson he gave him so long ago wasn’t enough. He would need another one. If what Cersei told him in the morning was true, he would have the opportunity to give Tyrion a very good one. He would do his duty. Tywin would make sure of that.

“You have this night to consummate your marriage. If tomorrow Sansa Stark is still a maiden, I’ll take measures to ensure she isn’t the day after. Measures to make sure YOU will be the one to take her maidenhead and to put a son in her. Now go.” Tyrion remained seated, not moving, still defying him. “Go.” Finally, he raised and walked away without looking at Tywin. Before he left the room, Tywin threw a last warning. A warning he would execute tomorrow. “Remember. The next whore I find in your bed will be hanged.” And much more. However, at the opposite of the last time, the dwarf didn’t stop to listen to him.

Tywin went back to the map. Everything was in place, the last thing he needed was Tyrion to impregnate Sansa Stark. He would. Tyrion’s grandson, Joffrey, was sitting on the Iron Throne. His granddaughter Myrcella would become Princess of Dome when Doran Martell would die. Cersei would soon marry Ser Loras Tyrell and Tyrion’s grandchildren would rule the Reach one day. Tommen would be granted Storm’s End as soon as he came of age. The fortress still held against the siege of the Tyrells, but it wouldn’t hold for long. The Riverlands would soon belong to his sister and his nephews would be the Lords of Riverrun. Only the Arryns had no family link with the Lannisters, but they were alone. Only, Tywin needed to secure the Westerlands and the North. Tyrion’s children with the Stark girl would rule the North one day, but it was even more vital now for Tyrion to have children since Jaime refused to be the Lord of Casterly Rock. Tywin would never allow Tyrion to inherit the Rock, but he could let a grandson from him and Sansa be his heir. For family, Tywin would force Tyrion to consummate his marriage tomorrow if it wasn’t done tonight. The future of House Lannister depended on it.

Tywin wondered why the gods afflicted him with such an aberration. Tyrion was a shame for House Lannister. As capable as he was, he wasn’t worthy to bear the Lannister colors and to become the Lord of the Westerlands after Tywin. He would never allow this dwarf to succeed him. He couldn’t. Not after everything that happened. Not after his wife’s death. This little monster killed the woman who put him into the world. He killed Tywin’s wife. Without realizing it, Tywin remembered the day Tyrion came into the world. He never wanted to remember this and avoided it all the time, but now it came in such a sudden way that everything that happened this day, more than thirty years ago, rushed into his mind.

Tywin had arrived from King’s Landing a few days ago. Maester Creylen’s letters had warned him the state of his wife was deteriorating. When he finally arrived, it was even worse than the maester had told him. His wife was barely able to move a member and her contractions made her scream day and night. The drugs and medicines Maester Creylen gave her didn’t have the desired effect. Tywin stayed at the bedside of his beloved wife for the three days that followed and banned everyone else from her chamber, including their children. Jaime and Cersei were always wondering why their mother was making so much noise. Tywin didn’t care what Jaime and Cersei believed or didn’t believe. Only Joanna mattered.

At the fourth day, his wife finally entered labor and gave birth to a son. No, not a son. A monster. Tywin saw it as soon as his big head went off. Then his little arms, body and legs followed. All this time, his wife bled. She bled so much. The maester did everything he could to stop it, but there was no way. The monster was killing her to come into the world. Tywin had the baby sent to the nursery that had been prepared. He would deal with it later. When it finally became evident his beloved wife wouldn’t survive no matter what they did, Tywin sent the servants, the wetnurse and the maester away. He would be the only one to share the last moments of his wife.

He held her hand in his while he could feel her forces decreasing. He remembered how happy he was the day of their wedding, all the happiness she gave him in his life entirely dedicated to House Lannister. She was the only one who could persuade him to do something he disagreed with. He loved her.

All of a sudden, he felt her hand taking a grip of his own. He looked at her face and saw her eyes faintly opened. The green eyes he loved so much. “Tywin.” Her voice was so weak. It was barely a whisper.

“Joanna.” Tywin never cried, but at this moment he had wanted to cry. His wife, the only person he loved in the world, was dying and there was nothing he could do.

“Where is my son?” The question startled Tywin. She was dying, and that was what she was asking? “I want to see my son.” Tywin couldn’t believe his wife wanted to see the monster who was about to kill her.

“You shouldn’t care about it. He is a dwarf. The maester says he won’t live for long.”

He had wished that would close the matter, but it didn’t. His wife only looked at him with anger. Tywin hated it. He didn’t want her to look at him this way for her last moments. “I want to see my son.” Her voice was still weak, but Tywin could feel the determination, the resolve, the absence of fear and many other things in it. And he could see it on her face. The same look Tyrion would have many years later when he would oppose him.

Reluctantly, Tywin went to the door and asked a servant to bring the monster to his wife. He didn’t ask this way. He called the monster the baby, but it didn’t change who he was. But if that was what his wife was asking from him, Tywin would do it. He always did everything for Joanna. He went back to her side and took back her hand in his. She was pale and breathless. They didn’t speak until the servant came back and put the baby in his wife’s arms.

When Joanna held the baby and looked at his face, Tywin saw a shock on her face, but it turned quickly into a sad and faint smile. She held him before her face, wasting what few forces she still had for the little monster who caused her death. She kissed him on the forehead and held it tightly against her breasts. The little arms were trying to reach her face or her neck, without success.

“He will die soon. Creylen says he won’t survive for long.”

Tywin was trying to make see things clear to his wife before she left. She only gave him a look colder than ice in return. “Why? Because you’re going to kill him?”

Tywin shouldn’t have been surprised. Joanna was always clever. And she knew him better than everyone. “Even if I didn’t, he will die very soon in great sufferings. That will be mercy, which is much more than he deserves.”
“How can you say that? He’s my son. Your son.” When she said it Tywin rose and walked to the window. But before he could reach it, his wife stopped him with a few more words. “He’s a Lannister.” Tywin stopped his walk, but he didn’t turn back to face her. He couldn’t face her eyes. He knew what would be in them.

“He’s killing you. He has no right to live.”

“Really? Is he really the one who’s killing me?” Tywin had no answer to this. “You always said that family was all that mattered, that nothing else mattered. He is part of the family. He is a part of your family. Is that so difficult for you to see it?”

Tywin finally turned to face his beloved wife. “He’s not my son.” Tywin stated it coldly, without a trace of emotion. Or at least he hoped there was no trace of emotion in it. He had one of his very rare moments when it was more than hard for him to contain his emotions.

His wife gave a weak laugh. “Of course. It’s so easy for you to deny it. That’s all you can do. You never found yourself in such a situation before.”

“What are you talking about? What kind of situation?” Tywin didn’t understand. His wife was talking to him as if she was sorry for him, but at the same time she was looking at him the same she always did when she disapproved something he did or was about to do.

“You never faced it up to now.” She really felt sorry for him now. “You always did everything for House Lannister, but you never wished to not do it. Never.” Her face changed and turned angry and accusing. “Tell me a single time you had to do something against your interest in order to serve the family. Tell me a single one.” Tywin had no answer to give her. For probably the only time in his life, he had nothing to answer and was agape. His wife was right. He always did everything for the family, but never had he been reluctant to act for the family. It had never gone against his wishes. Thirty years later someone else would ask him the same question with the same eyes and the same gaze, and Tywin would have an answer. But for now, he had none.

It was at this moment that his wife began to cough violently. Tywin came to her side once more, holding her hands. He managed to hold it in a way so he wouldn’t touch the monster who caused all this. When her cough was over, her breathing was weaker than ever. She looked at Tywin once again. She spoke in such a feeble voice that Tywin had to struggle to understand what she said. But, sadly, he understood all the same. “Don’t…kill him…Tyrion…. Let him live…. Don’t kill….Tyrion….promise…me.”

She exhaled her last breath with these words, naming her son in the process. Lady Joanna of House Lannister, Lady of Casterly and Lady of the Westerlands, was dead. And for one of the very scarce times in his life, and the last to this this day, Tywin cried. And as he cried, Tywin could only say two words. “I promise.”

Tywin held his promise for thirty-three years. He never killed Tyrion. He had a debt toward his wife, and a Lannister always pays his debts. But he didn’t do anything more. He owed nothing to Tyrion. He gave him the education and the life suited to a Lannister, to a son of the Lord of Casterly Rock, but nothing more. He only promised to let him live. Tywin had always wished Tyrion would die one day, but it never happened. He refused to die. He fought to live, from the day he was born to the present time. To Tywin’s despair, he continued to live, shaming the proud House Lannister he brought back from the ashes his father, Lord Tytos, let them in. He shamed the name of the Lannister all his life. His acrobatic figures he performed through the halls and dinner rooms of the Rock (another great idea of his brother Gerion). His marriage with a whore. His visits of brothels. His drinking of wine. His gambles. His jokes. And now his refusal to consummate a fundamental marriage for the future of House Lannister.
All the same, he had to admit he respected and even admired Tyrion’s will to survive. Despite everything Tyrion was, Tywin needed him. He was no fool. Cersei believed she was as clever as her father, even more perhaps, and only that was proof of her foolishness. And Jaime… Tywin never believed his eldest son, his heir, would deceive him so much and turn his back to his family to serve mad men and drunken fools. Tyrion was now everything that was left. As much as he hated to admit it, Tywin needed the family’s embarrassment more than ever. All the future of their house depended on him.

Tywin sat at his desk, took a piece of parchment, ink and quills. Then he began to write.

I, Tywin Lannister, son of Tytos, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands, Warden of the West and Hand of the King, hereby declares my eldest son, Ser Jaime Lannister, heir to all my titles, lands and castles.

If my son Jaime was unable to inherit, all my titles, lands and castles are to belong to my eldest grandson from Lord Tyrion Lannister and the Lady Sansa Lannister of House Stark.

If my heir was to not be of age to rule when my death would occur, I hereby name my brother, Ser Kevan Lannister, Regent of Casterly Rock until my heir comes of age.

Tywin hesitated before he added the following line. He didn’t want to write it down, but he had to. If his brother was to be dead, he needed someone capable to rule the Westerlands until his heir would be old enough. The voice of another woman he loved came back to his head, a woman he didn’t love the same way as he loved his wife once, but a woman he once loved as a sister, until she disappointed him. Jaime is not your son. Tyrion is. Tywin refused to think a single more second about it and started to write again.

If my heir was to not be of age to rule when my death would occur and if Ser Kevan Lannister was not in the conditions to assume the regency, I name my son, Lord Tyrion Lannister, to act as Regent of Casterly Rock until my heir comes of age.

Tywin wrote many other minor disposals, including various bequests he gave to all the members of his family, from his eldest son to the cousins of the family on his wife’s side. When he was done, he sealed it with wax and pressed his seal of Lord of Casterly Rock on it. Then he unlocked the chest, put his will in it and locked it again. He would send it to Casterly Rock tomorrow for his brother Kevan, to keep it until the time comes.

Tywin was tired of his day. He wished suddenly that Joanna was still alive to help him. He pushed the thought aside as quickly as it came to his mind. His wife was dead and nothing would bring her back to him. It was late in the night now. Tywin emptied the cup of wine on his desk that he started hours ago and went to his bed. He fell asleep very quickly.

He was back at the wedding feast. He saw Tyrion making japes and acting improperly as always, embarrassing his family. He recognized the behaviour and he hated it. This dwarf was a walking joke. The dream lasted long. When it ended, Tywin Lannister made no other dreams this night.

Chapter End Notes

Some people may think there’s already a change. I must admit that if it had happened in the TV show, there would have been scenes for that. However, it doesn't contradict the show, so it's a pre-change chapter.
Please review.

The next chapter will be the last one before the change. Coming on Sunday.
Sansa IV

Chapter Notes

OK, I warn everyone, this chapter is very emotional. It's also the longest one I wrote so far.

For those who wanted more moments between Tyrion and Sansa, this is for you.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

SANSA IV

She sat in her bed, her back against the pillows, reading before she would sleep. Sansa discovered a few days ago it could help her to sleep better. She read the Unnatural History she had started so long ago, before the death of her family. She had stopped it after the tragedy, wishing to do nothing that could have any link with her husband. But she decided to live for her family, and she couldn’t spend her days doing nothing and her nights awaken. She took some essence of nightshade for a few days, but she stopped afterwards. She didn’t need it anymore, her sleep was far better than the last weeks. Only the dreams bothered her. She would have nightmares sometimes, about Joffrey, Cersei and Lord Tywin. There was also the same dream that came again and again. She wished she could end it, but it came back, no matter what she did. The bard was still saying the same sweet words. Her family was still there, smiling. Ser Loras would disappear as always. Sansa was exasperated by this. Couldn’t she dream about something else? Though there was something else that bothered her with the dream these last times. She had the impression she was missing some details in it. What could it be? Sansa shook her head, chasing the dream of her memories.

Her state was better than it had been. During the last two weeks, she recovered a few pounds she had lost after the Red Wedding. Shae liked to say that it removed her from some of her work to tighten her dresses. Strangely, Shae didn’t seem to appreciate her own joke. She seemed in a very bad mood again. Sansa wondered what was going on with her. She even asked Shae if there was something wrong, but her handmaiden only told her it was useless to concern herself with the well-being of her servants. Sansa didn’t like it. She wanted to retrieve the friend she had when she was Joffrey’s betrothed. She didn’t want to lose Shae.

Suddenly the door opened and Tyrion entered the room. It couldn’t be that late in the night. Sansa’s husband always came to their room hours after Sansa was supposed to have fallen asleep. The sun set no more than an hour ago. What was he doing here?

“My lord,” she said in a timid voice.

Tyrion turned to face her. Sansa suddenly realized she only wore a thin under-silk. It was the same one she wore on the day of their wedding. Normally she didn’t care about it. It wasn’t the first time Tyrion was in the same room than her and that she dressed so lightly, but except for their wedding night, there always was blankets and sheets to cover her in these cases or she would wake up and put on a dressing gown very quickly. She averted her eyes and covered her arms with her hands. Uncertainty filled her, but her face also flushed.
I’m sorry, I know normally I come much later.” It was as if he could read her mind. Just before the wedding ceremony, Tyrion had come to see her and try to apologize for their wedding. He told her at this moment, in a very clumsy way, that he understood how she felt. She didn’t believe it back then and when she told him he admitted she was right. He had seemed as uncomfortable as when he came to tell her they would have to wed. However, sometimes Sansa really had the impression Tyrion could read her mind as if it was a book. Tyrion walked to his desk and put what seemed like a letter in the chest on it. When it was done he turned to Sansa.

“We need to talk.” Sansa was startled by Tyrion’s words. He walked in her direction but stopped at a respectful distance of the bed. He wasn’t looking at her and was searching his words, just like before their wedding. Finally he seemed to gather enough courage to speak. “My father is not satisfied with the state of our marriage. Last week he summoned me to the Tower of the Hand and told me I had until the royal wedding to consummate it. He just reminded me of it again.”

Sansa froze. Until the royal wedding? But the royal wedding was tomorrow. Tywin Lannister had ordered his son to take her maidenhead. Her heart was pounding on her chest. “And if you don’t… what is going to happen?” Sansa feared the answer, but it was the only thing she could ask right now.

Tyrion took a long time before he answered. “He told me he would take every necessary measures to ensure I would do it during Joffrey’s wedding night.”

Sansa stared at him in shock. He looked upon her for a moment, but lowered his eyes after a moment. Sansa could hear her heart beating even quicker. The last time it beat so quickly was during her wedding night. He’s going to do it. That’s why he came sooner than the other days. He has come to claim me.

“I won’t do it.”

These words got Sansa out of her trance. “You won’t do it? What do you mean?”

“My father can go to the Seven hells! I’m not going to force myself upon you. I’m not a monster who does his dirty work.” Tyrion sounded as angry as he was when he spoke against Joffrey the time she was beaten. However, Sansa didn’t feel grateful for that. Who did he think he was? What did he think he was doing?

“Do you really think it will matter? What are you going to do when your father will send men into our chamber and force you to take me.” She nearly shouted at him.

“I won’t let that happen.” Sansa could feel how resolved he was, but for her it was foolishness. He couldn’t oppose his father. If Lord Tywin was capable to have people murdered during a wedding under the protection of the guest rights, what wouldn’t he be ready to do to force his son upon her?

“How? What will you do when a dozen soldiers will enter our rooms? Kill them.”

“If it comes to that I will. My father is not the only who’s ready to do everything necessary.”

“You won’t succeed. You are a dwarf, not a knight or a warrior. You won’t be able to stand into your father’s way.” Sansa realized it was the longest conversation they had together ever since the walk. “You think I don’t know what he’s capable of? I know very well what he can do to reach his goals.”

“No. You have no idea what he’s capable of.”

“Of course, I do. My whole family…”
“NO, YOU DON’T!” Tyrion shouted this time as he stared at her. Sansa was taken aback by this. He never shouted at her ever since they met. She had seen him angry and shouting at other people on several occasions, but never at her. “You don’t. You have no idea.” He spoke in a soft tone and averted his gaze from her once more.

They stayed where they were, unmoving. Sansa had never seen her husband in such a state before. He started to talk again. “I can’t. I swore to protect you. What kind of husband, and of man, am I if I rape my wife on the orders of my father? I can’t do it.”

For the first time her husband nearly seemed fragile. Sansa was disconcerted by this. “Why didn’t you tell me before? You say your father told you a week ago.”

“I didn’t tell you because I didn’t want to. I’m sorry, but that’s the truth.” He seemed ashamed as he said it.

“I would rather have you make it now instead of having your father bring his guards and forcing us to do it in their presence. Or worse.” It took time and courage for Sansa to tell this. But she knew she couldn’t remain a maid forever. She knew she would have to truly become Tyrion’s wife one day. She didn’t want men to cruelly force them both to do it. Perhaps Tyrion would even accept to not repeat afterwards. Once her maidenhead was broken, Lord Tywin may not look again if they did their duty as husband and wife. It was probably a foolish hope, but she hung on this hope all the same. Without it, she may not be able to do it and it would be even worse when Lord Tywin would force her and Tyrion to do it.

Tyrion looked at her with a very strange expression, as if he didn’t believe what she just said. What did this face mean? She couldn’t decipher the feelings and the emotions on it. Her husband finally shook his head. “No, I won’t do it.”

Sansa grew impatient and angry at him. “Why? You said you wouldn’t share my bed until I wanted you to. What stop you now? I want to.”

“No, you don’t want. You only want to prevent it from happening in a worse way.” He stopped again, then he continued. “I may be a monster, but not this kind of monster. I’m not going to rape you on my father’s orders. You think you know what he is capable of, but you don’t, Sansa. You don’t know. I know. And I’m not going to be a partner in my father’s crimes and atrocities. My family made you suffer more than enough. I won’t add anything more to it.”

When he was done speaking he looked away again. Sansa was still angry at him, but she couldn’t find the courage to pressure him anymore. He wouldn’t do it. She felt that even if she removed all her clothes from herself right now he wouldn’t do it. And there was something strange about the things he said. Why did he say she didn’t know what Tywin Lannister was capable of? What could be worse than slaughtering people at a wedding?

“What is your father really capable of?” She asked it defiantly. “Tell me. You pretend what happened to my family is nothing compared to what he can do, so tell me.”

Tyrion was looking at her while she asked questions and he didn’t leave his eyes from hers after she finished. She held his gaze. She wanted to know why Tyrion was so stubborn about refusing to consummate their marriage.

Finally, Tyrion averted his eyes again. “You’re going to hate me if I tell you.”

“What would it change from our current situation?”
Tyrion looked back at her, then looked away again. Why wasn’t he able to look at her? When he finally spoke Sansa couldn’t have been more surprised by the words that came out of his mouth.

“Did you know I was married before?”

Sansa was in shock from the words. Tyrion? Married? She found it so unbelievable. They needed her, a hostage and a king’s ward, to get him a wife, so how could he be married before her? But also, she never thought he would talk about something like this when she asked what his father was capable of. “Married?” That was all she found to say.

“That was a long time ago. Many people at Casterly Rock know about this, but we never talk about it.” He walked toward the bed and sat at the end, as far as he could from her. He never looked at her a single time as he spoke. His voice was soft, low, sometimes nothing more than a whisper, but Sansa heard everything he said very clearly.

“I was sixteen-years-old when it happened. My brother Jaime and I were riding on a road near Lannisport when we suddenly heard someone screaming. A girl came running in our direction from the woods. She had black hair, was very slender. I guess she was no more than fourteen-years-old.
Her clothes were all torn apart. Two men were running after her. They were obviously trying to rape her. My brother, being the great and perfect knight he is, charged the rapers and took care of them while I brought the girl to an inn on the road. She was so hungry. She probably didn’t eat for days.
We finished together three chickens and a flagon of wine.”

Sansa listened carefully to what Tyrion was saying. She was hypnotized by Tyrion’s story. She wanted to know what happened, but at the same time she had some presumption she wouldn’t like how the story would end. Tyrion continued to talk, looking away all the time. “At this moment, I didn’t drink so much wine. I wasn’t used to it. And in some way I don’t remember, I found myself in her bed. When we were done she sang me a song. I can still remember every word of it. Next morning I was mad enough in love to ask for her hand. We only needed a drunken septon, a little bribe, a few lies and a few pigs as witnesses and we were husband and wife. We ate one of the pigs for our wedding feast afterwards.” Tyrion chuckled inaudibly. “I found ourselves a cottage near the Sunset Sea and I lived for a fortnight with her. And for two weeks I was the happiest man in the world.”

Tyrion paused at this moment. Sansa didn’t know what to say. It seemed so… She didn’t really know what to think about it. The thought that Tyrion was once married was quite unsettling by itself, but the way he was married… It looked like one of the love stories she loved when she was young, only this time she didn’t have the impression it would end in a perfect way. She didn’t believe in it anymore. “What was her name?” she asked shyly.

“Tysha. Her father was a wheelwright who lived in Lannisport. He had died a year ago. No wonder we found her in the woods, she had no home. Perhaps she even lived there.”

He fell back into a deep silence. Sansa felt uncomfortable. Tyrion never talked about his past in such a way. He was always japing when he talked, but now he wasn’t. She had a very bad feeling about it. Perhaps she should stop him, tell him she didn’t want to hear the rest of the story. And yet, she wanted to know. She didn’t know very much about Tyrion and she wanted to know what happened.
Why was he talking to her about it now? Why didn’t he talk about his first wife before? “What happened?” Sansa feared she made a mistake by asking it.

“When the septon sobered, he went to see my father. How many dwarves, especially around Lannisport, have the means to pay in gold? My father hated so much to have a dwarf as a son that every dwarf in the Seven Kingdoms knew they should stay at a great distance from Casterly Rock, and even leave the Westerlands. It wasn’t difficult for the septon to realize who he married. I wonder how my father reacted. The great Tywin Lannister, father-in-law to a wheelwright’s orphan. My father had already tried several times to organize a marriage for me without success, but he wasn’t going to let one of his children marry a commoner. He sent his men to find us and they discovered our hideout quite quickly. After all, a dwarf is so easy to spot. They brought us back to Casterly Rock. And there my father forced my brother to tell me the truth.”

The truth? What truth? Sansa couldn’t understand. What truth could his brother have to tell him?
That made no sense. “What do you mean? What truth?” She knew she wouldn’t like what she was about to hear. But she asked all the same, as shyly as ever.

“Everything was an act. My brother had arranged everything. The road, the woods, the rapers, Tysha. She was a whore.” Sansa’s heart stopped to beat. A whore? She was agape. “Jaime had planned all of this. He thought it was time for me to have a woman. And to make my first experience unforgettable, he arranged it all to make it a beautiful story. He even paid twice the price to have a girl who was still a maiden so I may feel it when I bed her. He probably didn’t expect I would marry the girl. After he was done, my brother left the room and my father brought my wife in.”

Tyrion stopped again. Sansa could feel he didn’t want to continue. She shouldn’t press him. She thought she knew what would happen next, but she didn’t want to admit it to herself. No, that couldn’t be. “He brought her inside?” She didn’t dare to ask for more. A part of her hoped he wouldn’t continue. Unfortunately, he continued.

“He gave her to his guards, and they dragged her to the barracks. And there he forced me to watch.”
Sansa heard a tremble in Tyrion’s voice, something she never heard with him.

“What did they do in the barracks?” She didn’t know why she asked. She wasn’t as stupid as before.
She knew there was only one reason why soldiers would bring a woman with them.

“They took her one after one. Each time one was done he put a silver stag in her hand. My father forced me to watch all the time, to understand what she was. When his men were done, there were so many coins in her hand that silver was rolling all over the floor.”

Sansa had the impression Tyrion was done with it. She didn’t know what to say. That was…
horrible. She remembered her father, a serious lord and a smiling father. Always there for them, to tell them how the world was, what was their duty, telling them what they had to hear when they didn’t want to hear it, but that it was necessary for them to know it. She tried to imagine him treating her, Arya, any of her brothers, Jon, Theon or any other child in Winterfell this way and she couldn’t.
How? Why? She wanted to say something, but she could find nothing. There was nothing to say.
Now she knew how Tyrion probably felt after her family was slaughtered. There was nothing we could say to someone in these situations. You could only stand there and listen. That was all you could do.

After a lingering silence that lasted so long she couldn’t tell if they stood in their place for minutes or hours, she finally managed to croak a few words. “I’m sorry. I didn’t know.” How could she know about it? Who would like to talk about something like that? She always saw Tyrion as a Lannister. A good Lannister, if that was possible, but a Lannister nonetheless. But right now, he was only a victim of the horrors committed by his own family. No wonder he had such a bad relationship with his father.

“Don’t be sorry. You shouldn’t. You don’t know what I did. What he made me do.”

Sansa looked back at Tyrion. She was frozen once again. That wasn’t all? There was something else that happened? What? She wanted to scream, to tell Tyrion to not tell her, that she didn’t want to know. But she couldn’t. Someone could have thrown a sword through her heart right at this moment and she wouldn’t have flinched. There was nothing she could do until Tyrion had finished. She couldn’t even breathe.

“After all his men were done with her, my father wanted to make sure I would remember what she was. So he ordered me to go last. He ordered me to take her one last time. And since I was a Lannister, I had to be generous, so he made me pay her a golden dragon instead of a silver stag. He ordered me to rape my wife. And I did it.” Tyrion’s voice broke as he said the last words.

Sansa couldn’t leave her frozen state after he finished. She still couldn’t move, but now she breathed more heavily than ever. He raped his wife. What was he going to do with her? All the fears she had during the wedding night and when he announced they would marry came back in a single wave. After some time, she thought she had gathered back enough strength and mind to react, but she still didn’t know what to do. What should she do to escape him? Before she could find an answer, Tyrion spoke again. His voice was still broken, but now there was also anger and determination in it.

“I may be a monster, but I will not do it again. No matter what my father tries, I will not allow him to repeat what he did twenty years ago. I am done with committing atrocities for him, and I am done committing atrocities for a family name. I will not do it.” He raised from the bed and walked with heavy steps towards the door. Sansa didn’t know if he was talking to her or to himself when he said these words. She couldn’t refrain herself when he put his hand on the door handle.

“Tyrion.” She didn’t know why she called him, but she did.

He stopped in his movement and looked back at her for the first time since he started to talk about his first wife. Sansa didn’t think she could have been more surprised after everything she just heard, but she was. His green eyes were full of tears. She never saw him cry before.

He averted his eyes from hers again. “I’ll go to the library. Go to sleep. I won’t do it.” And he left the room.

Sansa remained in her bed, in the same position she was when Tyrion entered the room. How much time passed while he told her about his first wife? Sansa couldn’t say. She had lost all notion of time.

Her whole body was shivering. He ordered me to rape my wife. And I did it. The words echoed in her mind without end. He raped his own wife on his father’s orders. What would happen to her now? He promised he wouldn’t share her bed as long as she didn’t want, but now she knew he wouldn’t hold his promise. His father once forced him to do it and he would force him to do it again.
Sansa had no hope this time. She had no one to save her. The Hound came to her help when she tried to push Joffrey from the top of the battlements, when she saved Ser Dontos, and during the riot.
Tyrion came to her rescue when Joffrey had her beaten in court. Shae helped her when she tried to hide her first moonblood. Lord Baelish and Margaery tried to help her to escape King’s Landing when she was a hostage. If only she had accepted Lord Baelish’s offer. Though with the events that happened afterwards, she would be dead if he had returned her to her mother. Perhaps it would have been for the better. But now, she really was a prisoner for good, and there was no one to protect her.
Not even Tyrion would stand against his father, she knew it.

She had no way to escape. Lord Tywin would force Tyrion to consummate their marriage next night.
With the things Tyrion just told her, the worse ideas crossed Sansa’s mind about what would happen.
This night would be her last one as a maiden, unless… There was a way to prevent the horrible things she imagined. Tyrion could do it tonight. That wasn’t an idea she enjoyed, but it would be far less horrible than the alternative. It could be far worse. She could be married to Joffrey right now.
Tyrion always was merciful and kind toward her, so she could hope he would do his best to not hurt her. For a moment she thought she might even enjoy the moment. Tyrion may surprise you. From what I’ve heard, he’s quite experienced. Margaery’s words resonated in her head, but she didn’t find any reassurance in them. No more than in Lord Varys’s words. In your situation, I think it may probably be the best thing that could happen to you. Lord Tyrion is never going to hurt you, nor to let anyone hurt you, and he will do everything into his power to make you happy, however difficult it may be. Sansa knew she would never be happy with him. Not with his father always pressuring them to produce children. Lannister children.

Sansa remembered the first month of their marriage. Except for the first week, it had nearly been a period she enjoyed. Then the news of her family’s slaughtering came and everything went up in smoke. Even then, she was never mistreated. Strangely it was the period when she had the less to fear from the Lannister family. It was strange that a Lannister protected her against the Lannisters. But now, it would be over. Tyrion couldn’t protect her anymore. As difficult it was to admit, Sansa had no other choice. She had decided to live for her family. In order to survive, there was only one possible option: she would have to share her bed with Tyrion tonight. She would have to wait for him to return. She thought she might undress immediately. Perhaps it would attract him more. After all, with the number of whores people said he visited, he couldn’t stay unmoved before a naked woman. The thought sent a shiver on Sansa’s back. She didn’t disrobe. She didn’t have the courage to do it, even when she knew it was her only chance. She was no wolf. She was a coward.

She stayed there, in her under-silk, waiting the dreaded moment when her husband would come and she would have to persuade him to consummate the marriage. As time passed, she grew more stressed. She didn’t know if she wanted Tyrion to come back as lately as possible to delay the inevitable, or if she wanted him to come back immediately and be done with it. Her distress was unbearable. She tried to think about what to say, about how to behave when Tyrion would come back, but she couldn’t work out anything. Her mind wandered.

She remembered something her father once told her. Something she refused to listen when he told her, but now she wished she had. How stupid she was at the time. When you’re old enough, I’ll make you a match with someone who’s worthy of you, someone who’s brave and gentle and strong. When she thought about the answer she gave him back then, she wanted to kill herself. She thought about Tyrion. He gave her his condolences after her father’s death. He saved her from the Hound once, from Joffrey too. He didn’t hesitate to treat the monster of half-wit before many highborn people. He tried to send people to save her during the riot. He fought bravely during the Battle of Blackwater, being rewarded by a scar for that. He threatened Joffrey during their wedding feast to prevent the bedding ceremony. He refused to bed her as long as she wouldn’t want and never mistreated her. Someone who’s brave and gentle and strong. Her father couldn’t have been talking about him. He was a Lannister.

Something else came back to her mind. Something Tyrion said on their wedding night. When he said it she didn’t know what to make of it. Later, when she thought back about it, it made her laugh to think that someone could be talking about Tywin Lannister this way. The only other person she could imagine saying such things about the Lord of Casterly Rock was Lady Olenna Tyrell. If my father wants someone to get fucked I know where he can start. Now however, it seemed to her it took another meaning. She remembered Tyrion’s story, the details he gave about his first marriage. He said she was no more than fourteen. His father forced him to rape her. Could it be…? Of course, Tyrion himself told her. He regretted what he had done and he didn’t want to repeat it. For a moment Sansa felt pity for Tyrion. He was hated by all his family from what she knew. He never had a chance to be loved and to love someone in return. The only chance he had in his life, his father took it from him and he forced him to do the most horrible thing a man could do to a woman. And now his father was ordering him to do it again. For the first time since she knew him, Sansa wished she could help her husband. But she couldn’t. She would never be able to help him against his father, and she could never love him. No matter how kind and gentle he was toward her, she couldn’t.
All this made her even more uncertain. How could she convince him to bed her? Sansa had learned to do what was waited from her, but Tyrion didn’t. He stood tall before his opponents, defying them, doing what no one else would dare, telling people who they really were. He would never do it, no matter what she tried. What would happen tomorrow when Lord Tywin would try to force them to do the deed? Strangely she was worried about herself, but also about her husband. Tyrion had helped her when no one tried. He was a good man. What would his father do when he would refuse to consummate their marriage? She didn’t want him to suffer. She had to try to convince him at least. For both of them, she had to try.

Sansa waited a very long time. Finally, deep within the night, Tyrion finally came back. He had removed his boots as always to make less noise, only this time it was useless. He looked at her and seemed surprised to see her still awaken. “I thought you would be asleep.” He went to the couch and gathered a few clothes for the night. Sansa had to do it. Now.

“I want you to share my bed.” She said it very quickly, afraid she wouldn’t have the courage to end her sentence if she spoke slowly.

Tyrion looked back, exasperation visible on his face, even in the dim light. “I already told you that we didn’t have to do it and that I wouldn’t do it.”

“You told me you wouldn’t share my bed until I wanted you to. I want to.” She repeated what she said hours ago.

Tyrion grinned. “My lady, there is one thing I have known for a very long time about you. There is often a great difference between what you say and what you think. That’s how you survived here, but I can tell when you’re lying. I know you don’t want me to share your bed.”

How could he act so airily? “If you don’t, your father…”

“My father won’t do anything. If my father is ready to do everything for the family, then I’m capable to do the same for my wife.”

He wouldn’t do it. But Sansa had to try. She had to attempt another tactic. If Margaery was able to manipulate Joffrey by adapting her behaviour with him, Sansa could surely do the same with Tyrion. She had to choose the right words, but which ones? Without thinking, she asked, “What happened to her? After… everything?”

She didn’t know why she asked it, but the moment she did ask she regretted it. That would never work if she brought back this subject. Tyrion understood very well who she was talking about. “I don’t know. I never tried to learn what happened to her afterwards. What use could I have from it? She was a whore and I raped her. She was paid. In the best-case scenario she would only have proposed me to pay for her service again. In the worst she would have spit on my face or slapped me, perhaps she would even try to kill me.” He turned sad again. Sansa knew now she made a mistake. She was desperate now.

“I beg you, my lord. I don’t want your father to do something horrible to make us do it. Just do it tonight. I swear I won’t resist, I’ll give you children, I’ll be a good wife for you, I’ll do everything you want. Just do it.” When she was done she started to cry. Sansa was ready to do anything now. She didn’t want to become another victim of Tywin Lannister’s horrible plans. Her whole family was dead, she didn’t want to be destroyed as well. She would never be happy with Tyrion, but she knew he would never mistreat her. That was far more than what she could hope when she was engaged with Joffrey. She sobbed uncontrollably now. She didn’t want to suffer anymore. She wanted to go back to Winterfell, to be with her father, her mother, her brothers, even with Arya and Jon, to speak with Jeyne about knights and stories, to hold Lady in her arms. She wanted to leave this nightmare that began the day Cersei ordered her direwolf to die. She wanted to go back at this moment and tell the truth to King Robert. How things could have been different if she had told the truth. Everything was her fault.

After a moment she realized a hand was on her shoulder. Tyrion had climbed into the bed to join her, but he still wore his clothes. She sobbed even more. Her husband began to speak words that sounded hollow in her ears. “I’m sorry, Sansa. If I could send you away, send you back to your family, put an end to this horrible war, bring them back to life and arrange things so that everything never happened, I would. But you are my wife. I swore to protect you. And I will protect you until I die.” Sansa refused to look at him. She knew what she would see. Sad green eyes, filled with compassion, pity and concern. She didn’t want to see it in a Lannister.

Slowly, Tyrion put his arms around her neck and brought her head on his shoulder. “Come. You can cry. Let it go.” Sansa burst into more tears. She cried for everything that happened to her and the people she loved, everything she had tried to keep inside for so long. After a moment she buried her face into Tyrion’s chest. She let her tears flow on his doublet. He didn’t reject her, didn’t retreat, but he didn’t bring her closer to him. He was only there for her, holding her, protecting her. As she wept, she drifted into sleep, exhausted from her despair and her tears.

This night, strangely, Sansa slept well. It was the best night she had in months. She didn’t do the dream with Ser Loras as she often did. Instead she made another one. It was not long before her father was killed. She was in her father’s solace with him and her sister. Their father told them they would leave King’s Landing. Arya complained about her dancing lessons that would end and asked about bringing her dancing teacher with them. Sansa on her side only spoke about Joffrey, saying she was to marry him, to be his perfect queen while he would be a perfect king, to have his babies.

“Seven hells.” That was what Arya said back then and she said it too in her dream. And just like it happened in real life, her father was next to speak to her.

“When you’re old enough, I’ll make you a match with someone who’s worthy of you, someone who’s brave and gentle and strong.”

Sansa wanted to reply, but she didn’t. She saw a small figure behind her father. A figure she barely noticed when he came to Winterfell since she only had eyes for Joffrey and the queen, but there was no point denying who he was. He had no scar back then. It was Tyrion Lannister. The Imp.

She made no other dreams this night. She woke abruptly when the door slammed.

Chapter End Notes

Please review, I worked a lot on this chapter and it is vital to the rest of the story.

The rape of Tysha by Tyrion isn’t mentionned in the show when he tells the story to Bronn and Shae, but in the books he tells this part to Bronn, but not to Shae (they are told about Tysha seperately). It's possible Tyrion decided not to mention the rape part because Shae was present in the show, but that it happened all the same. After all, who would like to mention that he was forced to rape his wife?

Next chapter: THE CHANGE IS COMING
Cersei I

Chapter Notes

So, finally, the CHANGE has arrived. It is told from Cersei's POV.

I was supposed to release this chapter later, but finally I decided to add it to the story earlier.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

CERSEI I

The Queen Regent was alone in her room. She sat in a chair, wearing a red nightgown as she drank a rich wine from the Arbor. She had sent her servants away a few moments ago after they were done preparing her for the night. While she drank, she remembered one of her handmaidens told her a jug of her favourite wine had disappeared not long ago without explanation. It was only a single jug, but Cersei would learn how it disappeared. If someone stole it, she would have him or her whipped until all his or her back was redder than the wine she was drinking right now. A queen couldn't allow people to steal from her personal reserve without impunity, a lioness even less. She was the daughter of Lord Tywin Lannister. Hear me roar.

As she thought about handmaidens and wine, her thoughts turned immediately to the little monster. She had him. She had found his little whore. Sansa's handmaiden told her about her visiting Tyrion's chambers and shouting at him from behind the doors. It was a little bit too familiar as an attitude. She now remembered the woman from the Battle of Blackwater. She was quite pretty. Black hair, black eyes, tanned skin, slender, generous breasts. No wonder her brother kept her in the service of his wife. He preferred the company of whores as always. Perhaps he even married her. If she questioned the whore well enough, she could get it from her. How pleasant it would be to tell her father about it. Of course she already told him about Tyrion's whore, but her father was very busy and didn't care immediately about this. If Cersei could add to Tyrion’s humiliation, that was only too good. He deserved it and much more.

She emptied her cup and went to her bed, removing her nightgown to sleep. The bed felt quite empty without someone to share it. Jaime should be with her. For a moment she almost regretted she treated him the way she did after he came back, but she didn’t regret it for long. That was all Jaime’s fault. He left the capital, abandoned her with Robert and Ned Stark, forced her to take matters at hand all alone. They came in the world together and belonged to each other, and yet Jaime abandoned her for their poor little brother. How stupid he was. He managed to be caught on a battlefield by a child. He came back after so long, hoping foolishly everything would be as it was before. He took too long. All the same, Cersei missed his presence. Lancel hadn’t been such a bad replacement in his absence, all the same for Osmund Kettleblack, but Jaime was still her other half. She only felt whole when he was inside her. Nothing could replace that. Cersei wondered if Jaime had been foolish enough to fall in love with this ugly woman who looked like a man. Brienne of Tarth, her name was. It would be his style after all, if he could love the little monster who was their brother.

All that was nonsense. However stupid Jaime was, his cock only arose for her, her sister, her lover. He couldn’t be interested by other women. Nevertheless, Cersei would have to do something about this ugly creature. Probably she could ask Ser Osmund to silently take care of her. That wouldn’t be difficult to find a motive to have this woman dead after all, everyone believed she killed Renly Baratheon. Who would weep for her? Maybe the Tyrells, so Cersei would have to take care of them when time would come. She wouldn’t let the little doe-eye whore take her son away from her.

As she fell asleep, she dreamed of Jaime. He slept with her and held her tightly in his arms. He entered her and she screamed and felt more pleasure than she ever did before. She had missed his presence in her for so long. They did it a lot of times. Cersei couldn’t remember how many. But finally, her ardent dreams ended when someone knocked at her door. She woke up, frustrated that such a good night was interrupted. It was barely dawn outside, so she decided to ignore the noise.
She was Queen Regent. No one had the right to awake her before she wanted. However, the pounding on her door didn’t stop and became more and more persistent. Someone was calling her again and again. “Your Grace! Your Grace!”

In her sleepy state, she couldn’t know for sure whose voice it was. Exceeded by the repeating noise, she finally answered in an angry voice. “Enter!” The man who would pass this door better had a good reason for all of this.

A kingsguard entered and she recognized him immediately. Osmund Kettleblack. Cersei had banned all clothes from her for the night, like when Jaime and she would express their passion. She realized at this moment that her blankets and sheets were all wrapped around her and that they were covered with sweat, her sweat. For a moment, Ser Osmund looked at her with a mouth opened. Cersei was quite aware of his fascination for her and she didn’t hesitate to use it to have his obedience and his service. However, right now, she didn’t want him before her. She wanted to go back to sleep before she had to face the royal wedding that was to happen today. What an ordeal it would be to see her beloved Joffrey married with a whore from the Reach. She probably still had an hour of peace before this day and she didn’t want Kettleblack to ruin it.

“If you only came to stare at me, I suggest you go away. My son wouldn’t hesitate to shoot at you with his crossbow if he learned you were trying to bed his mother.”

Ser Osmund took some time to react to her words. How slow of mind he was. Cersei wondered why she attached him to her service. “I’m sorry, your Grace. But I didn’t try to bed you.”

“You bed me with your eyes. That is already way too much.”

“Apologies, your Grace, but the Lord Commander… your brother… he asked me to fetch you. He wants you to come to the Tower of the Hand.”

“Why does he want to see me at the Tower of the Hand?” Cersei was annoyed by Jaime’s attitude.
Why didn’t he come to her chamber himself to make her dream a reality? Why to summon her like a servant?

Osmund Kettleblack took some time to answer. “He said it is your father, your Grace. There is…”

“Alright. Go out. I’ll dress myself without your lustful eyes and come to the Tower of the Hand to meet my father.” If her father wanted to see her so soon in the morning, he would have to wait. She was the Queen Regent. She wasn’t summoned like a whore.

“Your Grace, your brother…”

“Will wait. You can tell him. Now go.” She cut Ser Osmund again. He was really slow of mind.
Finally the brown haired man turned on his heels after a little bow and left the room. Cersei called her handmaidens and took her time to take a bath and put one of her most beautiful gown for the day.
No one would press her. When she was done the sun was beginning to show itself. She left her room and walked with dignity to the Tower of the Hand. She didn’t know why her father asked for her presence, but she would use this moment to speak again about Tyrion’s whore. She climbed the numerous steps that led to the apex of the Tower where her father’s solar and chambers were. She found it guarded by kingsguards and Lannister soldiers in great numbers. How strange it was. They all bowed their head with what seemed to be a sad expression when she passed before them. She entered the small council room where other people were standing, including Ser Osmund. He spoke a little time after he saw her.

“Your Grace, Ser Jaime is waiting for you in your father’s chambers.”

“Why are they waiting in his chambers? If my father wants to tell us something, this is a good place as any.”

Ser Osmund didn’t answer. For the first time, Cersei noticed he seemed uneasy. She walked past him and went to the chambers of her father. He was lying on his bed, with the same stern expression he always had, except for the times he would give her the little smile that was reserved for her, his only daughter. It was strange however, disconcerting. She never saw her father asleep before as she thought about it. Jaime stood tall at the bedside, looking at him while Grand Maester Pycelle was stooped over her father.

“What is this all about?” As soon as she asked the question her brother turned towards her. Pycelle didn’t seem to have noticed her presence.

“Cersei.” He only said her name. Cersei grew impatient with her brother. She was awaken early, being told her father wanted to see them, and he was sleeping while Jaime stood stupidly at his side.

“It’s the heart, I fear. It probably stopped during the night. He didn’t feel anything. Not most men have the chance to leave us so peacefully.”

What nonsense Pycelle was he talking about? Whose heart stopped? “Tell me why you told me to come when our father isn’t yet awaken. Did you want me to look at him while he was still asleep? If that was your idea, I have to tell you there’s nothing interesting in it.”

Jaime looked at her with what looked like a confused look. Cersei was annoyed by his behaviour. When he spoke his words were the stupidest she ever heard. “Cersei, he’s not asleep. He’s dead. Our father is dead.”

Cersei stared at him for some time, then she laughed. “Really Jaime, if you wanted to make me laugh there were other ways for that.”

“Your Grace,” began the Grande Maester, “it is true. Lord Tywin died during the night. His heart failed. I must admit it is quite unexpected, but Lord Tywin was sixty-seven and most of the people don’t live up to this age. It was to happen one day or another.”

Was this slug a partner in Jaime’s jape? Cersei was more than exceeded now. “You’re going to tell me why you awoke me at this hour right now, and you will stop to tell stupid lies to your queen.” She commanded it on a loud and angry tone.

The Grand Maester retreated before this. What a wretched old man he was. However Jaime didn’t back up. When he spoke it was in a way Cersei never heard him talk. He had never seemed so serious. “Cersei, I’m not lying. Our father is dead.”

That unsettled Cersei. She went past her brother and the old and vaulted man and came to her father’s side. He was sleeping, for sure. She put a hand on his left shoulder and shook him. He didn’t react. She shook again, more roughly. Nothing happened. That couldn’t be. He probably took a lot of essence of nightshade and that was why he didn’t awake. To know it for sure, she put her hand on his chest, where the heart was. She would have her confirmation the two men were wrong. But after resting her hand on him for quite a long time, Cersei realized she could feel nothing. There was no beat. She put her hand on his front. It was cold. No heat came from his skin. Her father, the great Tywin Lannister, was dead.

Cersei remained in this position for a very long time. That was impossible! Her father couldn’t be dead. Yesterday he still walked, breathed, spoke and looked at all of them the same way he always did ever since they could remember anything. Her father couldn’t be dead. She wasn’t sad. She never loved him. But he was her father, the man who led them where they were today, who made sure their family was the most powerful in all the Seven Kingdoms. How could he die? Of course, he didn’t die. Cersei knew it was the truth as soon as she thought about it. Her father was assassinated.

“How did he die?”

“During, his sleep, your Grace. His heart stopped. That’s not abnormal, many people die this way if war or disease don’t take them before,” said Pycelle.

What a fool the old man was. It was no natural death. Someone killed him, probably by poisoning. But who? The Tyrells perhaps. They were the ones who could benefit the most from it. They probably believed that without her father as Hand of the King and with Margaery as queen, they would hold all the power. Cersei wasn’t about to let them succeed. Her father was killed. She was Queen Regent. She would give back the Tyrells a hundred times what they did to her. A doubt insinuated in her mind. What if the Tyrells weren’t behind this? Could it be someone else? As soon as she contemplated this possibility, she knew. She knew who killed her father. Anger rose in her. They would hear her roar.

“Grand Maester.” She spoke in a controlled voice, making sure for everyone she was handling the situation. “Send men to the Tyrells to tell them the royal wedding is postponed. Indefinitely.”

“Your grace, it took months to prepare it. The Tyrells may be offended by this. Perhaps we should…”

“Let them be offended. Place guards before all entrances and exits of the Maidenvault. They are not to leave their quarters. No one leaves his rooms without my leave. There will be no wedding as long as the assassin of my father is living.”

“Assassin?” It was Jaime who talked this time. “Cersei, he died during his sleep. No one killed him. He was old and the duties as Hand of the King are very demanding. That’s very likely that he…”

Cersei interrupted her brother by slapping him in the face. “You’re really an idiot! He was murdered! Can’t you see it? I know he was killed, and I know who did it. I will have no rest before he is dead.”

Cersei left the chamber in a quick but dignified pace. When she emerged again in the small council room, she saw that Osmund Kettleblack was still there. “Follow me. Now.” After a moment, the slow man followed her. When she left the room, she summoned two other kingsguards. “Ser Meryn, Ser Boros, follow me. We have work to do.”

The three men followed her. They may be idiots and fools, but she could count on them for what she was about to do. Their loyalty wasn’t to question.

They reached the place where she wanted to go a few minutes later. She stopped before the door. On the other side was the one who killed her father. She warned her father that he wasn’t to be trusted and yet he didn’t listen. She was the only one among his children he could have trusted and he didn’t trust her. She told him once.

“Did it ever occur to you that I might be the one who deserves your confidence and your trust, not your sons? Not Jaime or Tyrion, but me. Years and years of lecture on family and legacy… The same lecture, really, just with tiny, tedious variations… Did it ever occur to you that your daughter might be the only one listening to them? Living by them? That she might have the most to contribute to your legacy that you love so much more than your actual children?”

Her father hadn’t listened. How he responded showed it quite enough. “I don’t distrust you because you’re a woman. I distrust you because you’re not as smart as you think you are. You’ve allowed that boy to ride roughshod over you and everyone else in this city.” It wasn’t her fault if she couldn’t controlled Joffrey. Her father then started to write letters again, as if he didn’t care about her presence. She was his true daughter, his only child who was worthy of him, and still he excluded her as if she was nothing. Now he was dead and she would be the one to avenge him and to carry on his legacy for House Lannister.

“Your Grace?” It was Ser Boros this time who spoke. He was looking at the door as if he didn’t understand why they were here. These men really were stupid. She should carry the sword and them the gown.

“The man behind these doors killed the Hand of the King and the Lord of Casterly Rock. I order you to arrest him and to bring him to the black cells. If he is to offer any resistance, gag him, knock him out if necessary, but make sure he comes quietly.”

Ser Meryn didn’t show any sign of reluctance, but the two others seemed concerned by her order. Ser Boros spoke again. “Your Grace, I’m not sure. Do you think it is really…”

“I am your queen. You are members of the Kingsguard. You swore to obey me and my son, and I speak for my son in this case. So, obey, except if you want me to tell the king you disobeyed an order from him.”

This shook both of them, but Ser Meryn was the first to move. He walked to the door and nearly smashed it the way he opened it so brutally. Cersei followed him with the two other idiots behind her.

“What’s the meaning of this?”

Tyrion should have known she would discover the truth very quickly. However, she stopped all of a sudden when she looked at him. He was laid in the bed, but what surprised Cersei was the position of his wife. Sansa was in such a position close to him that it nearly seemed she was leaning over him. Cersei didn’t understand. She knew from her conversations with her father and the rumors in the castle that her brother didn’t consummate his marriage. Did they do it tonight? That was no time to wonder about it. She would find her answer about this later. She composed herself.

“Ser Meryn, you know what to do.”

As soon as she said it, the knight walked over the bed and grabbed the little monster by the shoulder, dropping him on the floor unceremoniously. He grabbed him again and Tyrion resisted this time. “What are you…?” He didn’t have the time to end his sentence. Cersei instructed Ser Meryn to silence him if that was necessary and Ser Meryn executed her order quite efficiently. With a single punch on the face with his iron gauntlet he knocked out the dwarf. Cersei felt a wave of pleasure and complacency when she saw her brother couldn’t get up again. However, her thoughts were quickly distracted by a scream. It was Sansa.

“What have you done? Why? He did no…”

The girl didn’t have time to finish her sentence. Ser Meryn slapped her on the cheek very hard. Before he could do anything else, Cersei intervened. “It’s alright, Ser Meryn. The Imp is all we came for. Let the girl. I’ll take care of her. Take my brother to the black cells.”

“Yes, your Grace.” At least this one was quick to execute commands. He grabbed the little frame on the floor and swung him on one of his shoulders, taking him out of the room. When he passed next to her, Cersei could see blood running on his face. That wasn’t much compared to everything he did, but for now she would do with it. Very soon she would get rid of him for good. Cersei turned towards the two other guards.

“Search the room. Try to find any clue that proves my brother’s guilt.”

The two men began immediately. It seemed they recovered their common sense. Cersei turned back to face the girl. Sansa had collapsed in her bed after Ser Meryn’s slap. She had a cut on her left cheek, but Cersei didn’t care about it. It was nothing compared to what she endured in Robert’s hands for years. Anyway that was the girl’s fault. She shouldn’t have spoken. For a moment Cersei wondered if she had played a role in her father’s death. Of course she didn’t. It was plain the girl didn’t have enough brain for that kind of things. The way she was in the bed when Cersei entered was proof enough of this. Only an idiot girl could come to be so close of her brother.

“I’m sorry about that, little dove. I fear Ser Meryn wants to serve his king too well. Anyway that’s not as if you didn’t know what it was.” She faked concern for the girl. Sansa was stupid and Cersei could manipulate her with sweet words.

Sansa was looking at her in apparent confusion. She didn’t understand what just happened. As if it was a surprise. “What’s going on? Why did you arrest Tyrion? What did he do?”

Cersei wanted to laugh at her. Instead she only smiled in a comforting way, even if it wasn’t the reason why she was smiling. “Don’t worry about all of this. There’s been an accident and I need to question my brother about it. I’ll explain it all to you later. But I need to ask you something. Did Tyrion leave the room during the night?”

Sansa took some time to answer her. “No, he only came late, as usual.”

Cersei had the answer she needed. Her brother had killed their father during the night, then he came back to his rooms to sleep. Probably he bed Sansa afterwards to celebrate his crime. She came to the bedside and removed the blankets. To her great surprise, there was no blood on the sheets under. How strange it was. Her little brother was always thinking with his cock and he didn’t bed his own wife? Anyway, it didn’t matter.

“I understand it must be a shock for you. To see your own husband being arrested right in front of your eyes. You must worry a lot about him.”

Cersei waited for a reply from the girl. In the meantime she went to the little table with the glass and the hair accessories. “He was kind with me. He never mistreated me.” She gave one of her foolish answers as always. She could be foolish enough to feel something for him. Though, as soon as Cersei thought about it, she realized it was a stupid notion. No one could ever feel something good for this little monster. Except her brother Jaime probably.

As she looked upon the things on the table, Cersei noticed a leather box. She took it. “What is it?”
she asked to Sansa.

“It’s a gift from Tyrion.” The girl answered with the same voice that she ever spoke with.

“How touching from him.” She opened the box. Inside there was a golden necklace with a lion incrusted on it. How convenient this jewel was. She tossed it toward Sansa who was still sitting in her bed. “You should wear it now, while you still can. I’m afraid you’ll be a widow very soon. Tell me if you find anything interesting.” She added the last sentence for the kingsguards and left the room.

Cersei walked back to her own quarters. She felt prouder than she ever was. In a few hours she put under arrest the monster who killed her mother and her father, and she postponed the moment when Margaery would sink her claws into her son for good. Even her father couldn’t have done better. He would be proud of her, she knew it. She was the Queen Regent. She would make it known to everybody quite quickly. The first to know would be her little brother.

Chapter End Notes

A huge change to the story. The fic will now progressively diverge from the canon. As always, everything goes wrong thanks to Cersei.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa V

Chapter Notes

This chapter is mostly the day for Sansa after Tyrion is arrested. There's not a lot of action, it's mostly Sansa's thoughts about what just happened. Imagine her confusion after everything that happened since last night.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SANSA V

Sansa remained motionless as the queen left the room. The two kingsguards were still searching her room, so she didn’t dare to move. It was better to stay as unnoticed as possible. I'm afraid you'll be a widow very soon. The words of the Queen Regent rolled in her head. It could only mean one thing. She was going to kill Tyrion. Sansa panicked at the idea. Tyrion was her husband and the only one in King’s Landing who protected her. And she didn’t want him to die. He had always been kind with her. She looked at the necklace in her hands. She wanted to stop Cersei when she seized and opened the box, but she didn’t dare. She had been the frightened little girl who hid behind courtesies as always. Now she knew what Tyrion offered her for her name day. It was a golden Lannister lion necklace. If Tyrion thought it would gladden her, he had been wrong. She wanted to throw the necklace away, but she didn’t do it with the two men looking everywhere. It would bring their attention to her.

They searched for some time, but didn’t find anything. Finally they went to Tyrion’s strongbox on his desk and tried to open it, without success. “Let’s find the keys. We’ll come back later to open it,” Ser Boros said. He then turned his attention on her. “You don’t leave this room. Everyone is confined as long as the queen says otherwise.”

They left without another look. Sansa was alone once more. However, a few minutes later, Podrick erupted from the door. He didn’t look at Sansa and went directly to the strongbox and opened it.

“Podrick. What’s going on?” She needed explanations. Why was Tyrion arrested by Cersei? What was going to happen to him? Why was everyone confined to his rooms? Today was the royal wedding. They should be preparing for it, but instead it seemed no one could move.

The squire answered her in a very low voice as he took the documents in the chest and locked it again. “I’m sorry, my lady. I cannot stay any longer. I’ll come back as soon as I can.” He left without any other word. Again, Sansa was all alone.

Sansa got up from her bed and slipped on a dressing gown before sitting in a chair at the table where she took her meals in normal time. For now, there was nothing to eat on it, only wine, and Sansa didn’t drink very much. Tyrion was the one who emptied jugs every day and for now he wasn’t there because his sister took him away so roughly from Sansa. She was lying on him when they came into their chamber, awaking her from the best night she had since an eternity.

Wait. Sansa realized something. Tyrion was with her in her bed when they came to take him, and she was laying on him. Did he…? For a moment she panicked. Did he bed her? But then she remembered what happened last night. His confession about his first wife. Her plea for him to consummate their marriage before his father forced them to. The way she burst into tears. The way he wrapped his arms around her shoulders and allowed her to weep on him. There was nothing more. She probably fell asleep afterwards and Tyrion held her during the night. That would explain the position in which she awakened, her head on his chest, his arms around her neck and shoulders. She could still feel the soothing feeling of his arms around her. He shared her bed, but didn’t do the deed. It had been such a peaceful night. She wondered now what would happen. Would his father still force them to do their duty as husband and wife? Or would he forget about it now that Tyrion was in prison? Sansa didn’t feel quite relieved at the idea she would remain a virgin because Tyrion was killed.

She realized she still held the necklace in her hand. A moment ago she wanted to throw it away, but now she didn’t really feel for that. Instead she brought it back into the leather box on her boudoir. Everything was now a mess because of the search by Ser Boros and Ser Osmund. As she put down the box, the door opened. Sansa turned to face the new intruder, fearing who else it could be, only to be relieved to see Shae enter with plates of food.

“Shae!”

“Sansa.” Her friend left the tray on the table and went over her. “Are you alright? All the castle is in turmoil. Most of the people are locked in their rooms. I barely managed to come here.”

“Do you know what’s going on?”

“I have no idea. No one knows.” Sansa sighed. She had hoped Shae could explain her “Where’s Tyrion?”

Sansa explained everything to Shae. How Cersei entered the room with three kingsguards, how they knocked out Tyrion and grabbed him outside to the black cells, accusing him of a crime she had no idea what it was. How they searched the chamber, finding nothing of interest as far as she knew. How they ordered her to stay in her chamber, without any possibility to leave. Sansa thought she saw something in Shae's eyes when she told her Cersei said Tyrion wouldn’t live long. What is only surprise? Or horror? Or even worry? Shae gained back her composure very quickly all the same.

“Alright, we don’t know what happened, so there’s no use to panic. I’ll leave later to see what I can find about it, but for now I’ll stay. I don’t think it would be wise to leave alone right now, and anyway I must dress you and prepare you for the day.”

Her handmaiden was speaking calmly, but Sansa could feel worry and uncertainty in her voice. “What about the royal wedding?” Sansa asked.

“I don’t think the royal wedding will take place today with everything that is going on right now. But it is best for you to be dressed for the day all the same. Come, I’ll brush your hair.”

Sansa complied without a word and let Shae brush her hair, clip her nails, and dress her for the day. She also washed the little cut on her cheek. When she was done she emptied Sansa’s chamber pot by the window and put some order in the mess the kingsguards and Cersei left behind them. Sansa knew every duty Shae had to do. She couldn’t do anything more without leaving the room and she said she wouldn’t. She replaced the sheets and the blankets on her bed. At this moment Sansa had begun to eat.

“Did you eat, Shae?” Sansa didn’t know when her handmaiden’s ate to be true.

“No.”
“You may eat. There’s more than enough for two people.” After all Tyrion wasn’t there. Shae sat and began to eat with Sansa. Sansa liked it better. She considered Shae more as a friend than as her handmaiden for quite a long time now. She was the only one Sansa trusted enough to confide in. They ate silently. None of them had much to say it seemed. When they were done Shae cleaned the table as she could. Then they both had nothing to do.

Sansa took the embroidery she began three days ago and pursued her work. Shae only sat next to her, doing nothing. When Sansa asked her if she wanted some tissue to work on, her friend declined. She said she wasn’t really good at needlework. So Sansa worked alone. She was soon lost in her work, but in the back of her mind she thought about Tyrion. She was concerned about him. She also worried about herself of course. If Tyrion was in danger, she was as well because she was his wife. Finally she decided to ask her opinion to her friend.

“What do you think will happen to Tyrion?”

Shae looked back at her. “I don’t know. With the queen, who knows what could happen to him? But I think he will manage to survive to this. He survived much worse.”

Sansa thought she felt some doubts in Shae’s words. She seemed to worry about Tyrion too. Sansa was glad of it. Shae had seemed quite cold with Tyrion ever since the moment he and Sansa were wed. Perhaps it was only because Shae wanted to protect her, but Sansa guessed the fact Tyrion could never remember her name also played a role in that. After all, it was quite evident now that Tyrion would never hurt her, no matter what happened. She was happy Shae looked concerned about him just like her. She wasn’t the only one to worry about him at least.

“I hope he will not die. He is a Lannister but… he never did anything wrong to me. He even protected me from the rest of his family. I don’t want him to die.”

Shae nodded to show her agreement. After a short hesitation, Sansa decided to speak about last night.

“You know, Lord Tywin wants to force us to consummate our marriage on the next night.”

This revelation nearly caused Shae to jump from her chair from what Sansa could see. The foreign girl stared at her with anger in her eyes. “What?”

“Tyrion told me last night. His father gave him until the royal wedding to bed me, or else he would force us to do it during Joffrey’s wedding night.”

Sansa could see anger boiling in Shae. It wasn’t the first time she saw anger in Shae, but she never saw it at such a level. Her friend rose from her seat. “This man is a monster. How can he dare to do that?”

“He wants a Lannister to rule the North one day. My claim is all that interest him.”

“What did your husband do about it?”

Shae was now looking at her intensely. “He said he wouldn’t do it. Whatever his father tried, he wouldn’t bed me against my will.” Shae looked at her with an expression Sansa couldn’t decipher now, so she continued to talk. “He said he wouldn’t rape me, no matter what Lord Tywin would do. That he may be a monster, but not this kind of monster.”

Sansa wasn’t sure if she should talk about Tyrion’s revelation about his first wife. She trusted Shae with everything, but Tyrion had told it to her and only to her. He obviously didn’t want everyone to know about it and Sansa could only agree with him. That was such a horrible story. She couldn’t tell it to anyone, not even Shae. Instead she talked about the events on the morning. “I still can’t believe what happened. Cersei and the three knights just entered like that in our room and they grabbed Tyrion like this, pulling him out of the bed as if that was nothing. And then they turned the room into shambles, looking for who knows what.”

Sansa stopped to talk and a huge silence lingered in the room for quite a long time. Finally Shae broke it. “They pulled him out of the bed? Didn’t your husband sleep on the couch?”

That wasn’t the type of question Sansa was expecting, but she guessed it was legitimate. After all, Shae always found Tyrion sleeping on the couch every time she saw him sleeping. She probably didn’t understand why Sansa suddenly said Tyrion was taken out of the bed. “I allowed him to sleep in the bed last night. The couch doesn’t seem much comfortable and he swore he would never touch me. We only slept in the same bed, nothing happened.”

That wasn’t the truth, but Sansa wished it was. Right now she regretted she didn’t show more thankfulness toward her husband before. He did everything to make their marriage as painless as possible. There were even times when Sansa could say she was happy before her mother and Robb were killed. She knew Tyrion took no part in that. She remembered his words last night. I’m sorry, Sansa. If I could send you away, send you back to your family, put an end to this horrible war, bring them back to life and arrange things so that everything never happened, I would. But you are my wife. I swore to protect you. And I will protect you until I die. He was honest. He always was. The night she spent with him was proof enough of it. He held her against him for the whole night. He could have taken her. He had every right and every reason to do it with his father’s threats. But he didn’t. He acted with honor. He only comforted her. How could someone from such a family act with so much honor? Sansa had liked this night. She had found solace in his hold. She rued her behavior toward him before that. She needed him to be in danger of dying to realize how unfair she had been.

“Excuse me, my lady. I think I will leave. I’ll try to gather some information about what is going on. I’ll manage to avoid the guards, I know ways for that.”

Shae’s words got her out of her thoughts. However, before she could say anything, her handmaiden had already left the room. She would have liked Shae to stay longer with her. Sansa returned to her needlework. She continued to work on it for most of the day, trying to not think about anything else, but it wasn’t possible. Her thoughts repeatedly wandered to the same worries. What would happen to Tyrion? What would happen to her? Why was Tyrion arrested? Did he really do anything wrong or was it only an invention of his sister, the queen? What would Lord Tywin do? Would he still force them to consummate their marriage? When would she be able to leave this room again? No meal was brought to her for midday. Anyway she didn’t care, she wasn’t hungry.

Finally, when evening came, the door finally opened. Sansa thought Shae came back with some news. However, before she could say anything, her handmaiden had already left the room. She would have liked Shae to stay longer with her. Sansa returned to her needlework. She continued to work on it for most of the day, trying to not think about anything else, but it wasn’t possible. Her thoughts repeatedly wandered to the same worries. What would happen to Tyrion? What would happen to her? Why was Tyrion arrested? Did he really do anything wrong or was it only an invention of his sister, the queen? What would Lord Tywin do? Would he still force them to consummate their marriage? When would she be able to leave this room again? No meal was brought to her for midday. Anyway she didn’t care, she wasn’t hungry.

Shae’s words got her out of her thoughts. However, before she could say anything, her handmaiden had already left the room. She would have liked Shae to stay longer with her. Sansa returned to her needlework. She continued to work on it for most of the day, trying to not think about anything else, but it wasn’t possible. Her thoughts repeatedly wandered to the same worries. What would happen to Tyrion? What would happen to her? Why was Tyrion arrested? Did he really do anything wrong or was it only an invention of his sister, the queen? What would Lord Tywin do? Would he still force them to consummate their marriage? When would she be able to leave this room again? No meal was brought to her for midday. Anyway she didn’t care, she wasn’t hungry.

Finally, when evening came, the door finally opened. Sansa thought Shae came back with some news, but it was someone else who crossed the doorstep. It was the young and shy boy who always flushed when she looked at him. Podrick Payne, Tyrion’s squire. Why was he there? He had a tray of food with him and put it on the table.

After that, he stood before her, not saying a word, but Sansa had the impression he was trying to say something. Finally he spoke. “Excuse me, my lady. I would have come to you sooner, but no one is allowed to wander in the Red Keep except the Kingsguard, Lannister men, and a few people with the authorization of the queen. Ser Jaime gave me the leave to bring you some food.”

Ser Jaime Lannister? Sansa didn’t know what to make of it. The Kingslayer wasn’t a man she would trust quickly. She knew like everyone else Stannis’s claims that he was the queen’s lover and that her children were also his. She also knew now that he attacked her father in the streets and that it was how he got his injury to the leg. He had come back recently to King’s Landing, released by her mother apparently. She wondered why her mother released this man. Moreover, she wasn’t ready to give him much credit after Tyrion’s revelation last night. He allowed the wife of his brother to be raped by his father’s guards. However, she recalled that of all his family members, Jaime Lannister was the only Tyrion never spoke ill of. She found it odd considering the events concerning Tysha.

Despite that, Podrick was Tyrion’s squire. Perhaps she could get some information from him. He seemed to be quite devoted to Tyrion. “Podrick, can you tell me what is going on? Tyrion was arrested this morning by the queen and brought to the black cells. No one is going to tell me.”

“I came to tell you this also, my lady.” Sansa was quite surprised by this. Finally, she would know what was happening for everyone being locked in their apartments. “Lord Tywin is dead.”

The new numbed Sansa for quite a long time. Tywin Lannister? Dead? She felt some joy at the idea the man who organized the slaughtering of her family was dead. The gods showed some justice after all. However, that was quite unforeseen. How could the Hand of the King die so suddenly?

“How?” That was all that Sansa could ask.

“No one really knows. He was found dead in his bed by one of his guard. According to Ser Jaime, his heart failed during his sleep. He told me that’s what the Grand Maester said when he examined the body.” So the Lord of Casterly Rock died peacefully in his bed. Sansa was a bit disappointed. To be honest, she would have liked a more painful way to die for the old man who made her family suffer so much. Podrick continued to speak however. “The queen didn’t believe her father died this way. She is accusing Lord Tyrion of murdering him.”

That made quite a shock to Sansa. Tyrion killed his father? She remembered a few things he told her last night. My father won’t do anything. I’ll make sure of that. If my father is ready to do everything for the family, then I’m capable to do the same for my wife. My father is not the only who’s ready to do everything necessary. Did he kill his father for this reason? To prevent the forced consummation of their marriage? For a moment Sansa wanted to thank Tyrion for that.

She realized quickly however it wasn’t possible. Tyrion couldn’t have killed his father. Tyrion never killed anyone, even when he was Hand of the King. Death seems a bit extreme. Though Sansa couldn’t help but feel a little special, thinking her husband was ready to kill a man like Tywin Lannister for her. But it sounded so unbelieving. Deep inside, Sansa knew Tyrion didn’t kill his father. How could he kill a member of his own family? She wasn’t a good enough reason for that anyway. It wasn’t as if Tyrion loved her. He wouldn’t slaughter his own kin for an innocent and stupid girl like her. Wouldn’t he? No, Tyrion didn’t kill his father, Sansa was sure of that.

“He didn’t do it. Tyrion didn’t kill his father.” Before she could realize it, she said the words. She shouldn’t have. Podrick was a good boy, but she wasn’t entirely sure she could trust him, especially after he said Ser Jaime sent him.

“I know, my lady. I’ve been his squire for more than a year now, and I know Lord Tyrion would never do such a thing. Ser Jaime doesn’t think he did it either.”

Sansa felt reassured she wasn’t the only to believe in Tyrion’s innocence, but the mention of Ser Jaime didn’t make her confident of Podrick’s words. Tyrion may be Ser Jaime’s brother, but the knight was also the queen’s brother… and lover, for sure. She had no difficulty to believe that Joffrey was the result of an incest. Ser Jaime could have sent Podrick to get some words from Sansa that could incriminate Tyrion, or even her. She had to be careful with what she said.

“What is to happen to the royal wedding?”
“Queen Cersei reported it for later. No one knows when it will take place.” So much expenses for a marriage that will never happen. If Tyron was free, he would fume about this.

“Does the queen have any proof of my husband’s guilt?” She said it in a very ladylike voice. She had to wear her armor again to let no emotion transpire.

“For now, none. Ser Jaime says that his father died of natural causes, and that his sister probably just believes that Lord Tyron did it. He believes he will leave the cells very soon.”

Sansa didn’t believe a word of Podrick’s last sentence. She knew Cersei and Tyron hated each other more than everyone else. She would die before she set him free. She had more and more the impression Podrick was sent as a trap. Sansa looked at the boy. He seemed to be genuinely concerned about Tyron. Sansa remembered how shy and kind the boy was. He probably didn’t even know himself that Tyron’s brother was using him against his own master. Sansa couldn’t give him any information.

“Thank you, Podrick. Please leave me now. I would like to eat alone. Could you please send me one of my handmaidens to bring back the dishes and prepare me for the night?” She hoped it would be Shae.

“I’ll do what I can, my lady.” He bowed his head and went to the door. He turned back to her halfway. “My lady, I’m going to visit my lord in his cell tomorrow. Is there anything you would like me to tell him?”

Sansa thought some time about it. She had to be careful about what she would say. Anything could be used against her by Cersei eventually. Perhaps she should say nothing. However, she was concerned for Tyron. She didn’t want him to believe she didn’t give a damn about him. Not after what happened last night. She chose her words very carefully. “Tell him that I hope he is alright. That I hope he will leave the black cells very quickly. And tell him…” She wanted to tell Podrick to thank her husband for what he did for her last night, but she feared Cersei would use it and pretend it was some kind of secret thanks for killing Lord Tywin for her. Sansa couldn’t take that risk. Instead she only said: “Tell him I miss him.” She could have said that she loved him, but that wouldn’t have been the truth.

Podrick left. Perhaps he would never visit Tyron anyway. The boy believed he would, but Sansa couldn’t trust the word of a kingslayer, a man who loved his own sister and had children with her, a man who tried to kill her father, a man who bought a whore to his brother and made him believe the girl loved him, then afterwards… She didn’t want to think about it. Tyron’s revelation still weighed over her.

Sansa ate silently. She thought about the unexpected turn of events that happened in no more than a single day. In less than twenty-four hours, she had learned that she and her husband would have to consummate their marriage, willingly or unwillingly, at the latest during Joffrey’s wedding night. She also discovered her husband had been married and that his father destroyed this marriage. Sansa slept with him without consummation. Then Tyron was arrested the next morning, and now she learned that Tywin Lannister was dead in unknown circumstances.

Sansa was happy about the death of the Lord of Casterly Rock. He was the mind behind the slaughtering at the Twins, Cersei’s father, Joffrey’s grandfather, and the head of House Lannister. He deserved to die. The way he left seemed a mercy compared to the horrible things he had done. Even if Tyron had killed him, and she knew he didn’t, she wasn’t sure she would blame her husband for that, even if that was kinslaying. However, as she thought about it, she didn’t believe this death was such a good new. With Tywin Lannister dead and Tyron in prison, who would be able to oversee Joffrey and stop him from doing everything he wanted? His mother? Sansa didn’t think so.
Queen Regent always seemed to approve what her son would do, even when she didn’t. And Margaery wouldn’t be able to influence Joffrey if she didn’t marry him.

Sansa became quite anxious about her situation. She had no one to protect her anymore. She had to leave King’s Landing, but how? And where would she go? Perhaps she should have accepted Lord Baelish’s offer. She was thinking about it when Shae entered the room. Sansa realized at the same time that night had come. How much time did she remain seated, thinking about the implications of Lord Tywin’s death and Tyrion’s arrest?

“Shae, Lord Tywin is dead.”

“I know. All the servants are talking about it. The Tyrells are confined into the Maidenvault, and much of the inhabitants of the Red Keep cannot leave their rooms. They barely allow a few servants to carry on their duties. They are accompanied by Lannister guards all the time. I was nearly caught when I went back to the servant’s rooms.”

“You know the queen accuses Tyrion of killing his father?”

“A few talked about it.” Shae’s tone changed when she answered the second time. It became indifferent, as if she didn’t care what was going to happen to Tyrion. “They allowed me to prepare you for the night and to bring back the dishes to the kitchen, but they won’t allow us much time. It would be best to start right now.”

Sansa would have liked Shae to stay longer, but she had no choice. So she let Shae change her for the night, clean the table and retrieve the empty tray. Sansa was surprised she ate all the food. Perhaps she needed to eat more than she believed sooner. She only spoke one time to her handmaiden. “Do you think Tyrion will get out of it? He didn’t kill his father, I know it.”

“I guess it will depend of the king and the queen.” Shae’s tone was hard and emotionless. Sansa didn’t like it. Tyrion could die and Shae didn’t seem to care about it. She seemed to do during the morning. Why did she look so indifferent now?

Shae left the room after a few minutes later and Sansa went to the bed. After everything that happened the last two days and her previous short night of sleep, as deep her sleep had been, she was exhausted. Strangely she found the bed quite empty. She managed to fall asleep after a few minutes. She did the same dream with her father promising her a husband who was strong, gentle and brave.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Jaime
“THIS IS MADNESS!”

Such were the words of Jaime Lannister to his sister in the afternoon following the death of their father. Jaime had been destroyed by his father’s death. Not that he would weep for him, but everything changed with his death. Their father always was the one to make sure their family was powerful and safe. Now he was dead. The future was uncertain. But for now, it didn’t matter. Jaime was furious after Cersei.

A few hours after their father was dead, she already occupied his study, as if she was the new Hand of the King. She had locked up everyone in the Red Keep in their chambers and shut all the main gates and other passages between the Red Keep and the exterior. No one could enter and no one could leave. Corridors and halls were empty, save for the few guards, all Lannisters, who patrolled them. Jaime just came back from a very laborious interview with the Queen of Thorns. He had gone to the Tyrells to explain them the situation, that it was only a temporary measure, that everyone was submitted to it, and that they should be granted freedom of movement very soon. It didn’t calm the Tyrells though.

“I don’t think your father would have wanted the royal wedding that insures our alliance to be postponed this way, even for his death. We prepared this wedding for months. Instead we are told to stay calmly in our chambers, not even being able to have our handmaidens to attend our needs.”

Jaime had promised to send them their servants whenever they wished, but it did little to make the Tyrells happy. Furthermore, he had to make sure every servant walking in the Red Keep was escorted by a guard. Another stupid order from Cersei. She seemed so sure that their father was assassinated, even when the Grand Maester said the opposite. However, the security measures weren’t what bothered Jaime the most. It was the arrest of Tyrion. His sister accused him of killing their father in the most stupid way he could imagine. And after she was the one to blame him for pushing a boy from the top of a tower! Now, she wanted Tyrion to stand trial for the murder of their father, but also for attempt of murder against the king. Jaime couldn’t believe what his sister was doing. Furthermore, Cersei’s choice of judges for the trial was unacceptable. She had chosen Joffrey to act as main judge, along with Mace Tyrell and Gyles Rosby. Their mad son, a fat flower who did everything he was told, and a man who could barely speak between two coughs. And all of them had no brain. How could Cersei hope they could do the light and have a good judgment?

“Be careful, Jaime. I may be your sister, but I am also your queen. I’m only doing what father would have done in my stead. He is dead, so it is our duty to make sure the family stays strong and survives. And the first thing to do to ensure it is to kill the man who assassinated our father.”
“Tyrion didn’t kill our father. He died during his sleep. Pyelle himself told us.”

“Pyelle is only a poor old man who can barely walk. I bet he said it because he doesn’t want to take time to examine father’s body more closely. I already ordered him to do so. I’ll have proof soon enough that our father was poisoned.”

“And what if Pyelle finds nothing? What if he concludes that our father died of natural causes?”

“He will find something. I know it. Tyrion killed him and Pyelle will discover how.”

Jaime couldn’t believe the words of his sister. She assumed that Tyrion had killed their father with as much certainty as she said she was Queen Regent. “Tyrion can’t have killed our father. He is our brother.”

Cersei stared at him with fury in her eyes. He loved her fury normally, but not now. “How blind are you. He’s the one who did it. I know it.”

“He didn’t do it, Cersei.” Jaime put as much certainty as he could in his voice. His brother didn’t kill his father, he knew it. Tyrion couldn’t have done it.

His sister only snorted in derision at his statement. “You’ve always pitied him. Our poor little brother. Abused by the world. Despised by his father and sister. He’d kill us all if he could. He decided to start it last night and you stand here, defending him, as you always did while he plotted against all of us. He told me he would kill our father. A day will come when you think you’re safe and happy and your joy will turn to ashes in your mouth. And you will know the debt is paid. That’s what he told me, not long before Blackwater, when I confronted him about his attempt to kill Joffrey and made him fail.”

Jaime didn’t know why Tyrion said these words, but there was to be an explanation. He knew that Tyrion was innocent, but perhaps their father had been assassinated. They should wait for Pyelle to finish his examination of their father’s body, then they would know.

“Perhaps it’s someone else who did it?” He hoped his sister would consider what he said and that she would abandon her certainty of Tyrion’s guilt, but she didn’t.

“Of course, he wasn’t alone. I’m quite sure he had some help. Not from his wife, Sansa is too innocent for that. She’s only a little dove. But I guess our new allies are not unfamiliar with this.”

His sister had really gone mad now. “You believe our brother plotted with the Tyrells to kill our father?”

Cersei looked back at him with very serious eyes and a smile. “Do you find it so surprising?”

“Margaery Tyrell was about to marry Joffrey. They are our allies. Why would they kill our father?
They have nothing to gain from it.”

“You’re really an idiot. They made an alliance with us only to overthrow us. This is only the beginning. Joffrey already nearly belongs to Margaery. Our father was the only one to stand between a complete hold from them on our son. They needed him to die, and they conspired with that vile creature to murder him.”

That was even worse than what Jaime thought. Cersei was always rash and quick to jump to conclusions, but this… That was more than madness. It remembered Jaime of the Mad King and he didn’t like it, especially when his sister was the one reminding him of the king he killed. Jaime took a great inspiration before he talked. “I love you sister, but I have to tell you the truth. You’ve gone Cersei sprinkled him with the content of her cup. Jaime’s armor was covered with wine, along with his hair and his face. “Leave, Lord Commander.” Jaime didn’t have to be told twice. He went back to his rooms of Lord Commander and summoned Ser Balon Swann to bring him Podrick Payne, Tyrion’s squire. The knight came back with him a few minutes later as Jaime finished to write something. It was difficult for him to write with his left hand but he did.

“Leave us alone,” Jaime commanded him. Ser Balon left the room. Jaime didn’t know much about the boy, but he seemed entirely loyal to Tyrion. He could probably trust him. “Podrick, you are my brother’s squire. You know what happened, don’t you?”

“Yes, my lord.”

“Do you think my brother killed his father?” He needed to know the opinion of the boy to be sure he could trust him, but he also hoped there would be someone who would finally tell him his brother was innocent.

“No, my lord. I know Lord Tyrion didn’t do it, he’s a good man.” The squire answered very quickly and as soon as Jaime stopped to talk. That was a sign of loyalty from the squire. Jaime liked that. He could count on him.

“Podrick, I need you to do something for me, and for your master.” He raised from his seat and put the paper he just wrote along with a golden dragon in Podrick’s hands. “Tomorrow, you’ll go to see Tyrion in his cell. Give this paper to the guard, it is an authorization from me to see him. If that’s not enough give him the coin. You’ll tell Tyrion everything about the situation and get the names of everyone he would like to testify for him during his trial.” Jaime explained all the details of the trial, when he thought it would take place, and that he would do everything necessary to make sure Tyrion would get out alive from this. He added something else at the end. “Tell him that a Lannister always pays his debts. You may leave. Don’t talk about it to anyone.”

The squire nodded and Jaime went back to his desk. However, when he sat, he noticed the boy didn’t leave. “Is there something you didn’t understand?” His instructions were clear and simple.

“Forgive me, my lord, but I’m worried about Lady Sansa. She didn’t leave her rooms ever since this morning and her handmaidens are not allowed to attend her. Could I bring her some food?”

Jaime didn’t see anything against it. There was no use to starve Catelyn Stark’s daughter. He wrote another note to make sure Podrick could travel through the Red Keep safely and gave it to him. “Ser Balon!” The knight came back in the room. “I want you to escort Podrick to the kitchen, then to my brother’s chambers.” No one would ask questions to the boy with a kingsguard following him and Jaime’s note.

“Yes, my lord.”

Both left the room, leaving Jaime alone. He thought about his father’s death. Could it be possible someone killed him? There was a possibility. It wasn’t Tyrion, Jaime was sure, but then who? He thought about the Stark girl. Her mother had captured Tyrion in the Riverlands and threatened Jaime with a sword. If she was like her mother, perhaps she had guts enough to assassinate the man who caused the death of all her kin. What wouldn’t a Stark be ready to do for family? Catelyn Stark showed him well enough. However, if she did it, could Tyrion be a partner in crime? No, he couldn’t. If Sansa Stark murdered his father, Tyrion didn’t take any part in it. But perhaps he knew something. Jaime may have to question him about it. Jaime remembered what Tyrion told him not long ago. I didn’t allow anyone to hurt her before our father ever thought about marrying us. I am not going to permit it now either. She is my wife, even if we both didn’t want it, and I swore to protect her when I put a cloak on her shoulders. So don’t worry, I’ll keep her safe. Could Tyrion decide to protect her even if he knew she had killed their father? Jaime hoped he wouldn’t. They were lions, and lions had to trust each other and fight together. However, Jaime also knew Tyrion would do everything to protect his wife. The thought unsettled him. He wrote another message. He wouldn’t abandon his little brother, no matter what happened. A Lannister always pays his debts, and he had a big one toward Tyrion.

When he was done, he brought the message to Grand Maester Pycelle. The day was coming to an end. He asked the Grand Maester to send this message to Casterly Rock.

“I’m sorry, Ser Jaime, but your sister ordered me to send no raven without her permission, to prevent anyone from spreading the news that Lord Tywin was dead. She said we should wait until the murderer was dealt with.”

That was too much for Jaime. His sister was closing the Red Keep to the rest of the world. He drew his sword and pressed the Grand Maester against the wall with his golden hand. His sword was only a few inches from the old man’s throat. Even with his left hand, Pycelle stood no chance against him, frail as he was.

“Listen to me carefully now, Grand Maester. You will send this message. You have the order from the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard to never tell anyone about this message or its content, no matter what happens, not even to the king or the queen. When the answer will arrive, you will give it to me and only to me, and show it or tell it to no one else. If you do not proceed as I told, you are a dead man. Is that clear? Or do I have to bring you so that you may occupy the cell next to my brother’s? I think you already have an experience with it.”

The old man couldn’t move and was sweating with fear. “I’ll do everything you ask from me. I’ve always been loyal to the Lannisters.”

“This time, you will be loyal to me, and only to me on this. You will lose your head, not only your beard this time if you betray me. If you ever do, you’ll wish it was me who was in a cell and my brother who would be threatening you.”

“Of course, of course. I promise, I’ll tell no one about everything. I’ll do as you say.”

He let go the old man and left him there, sobbing on the floor. Jaime grabbed him by the arm and forced him to send the message immediately. He followed Pycelle to the birdcages and made sure the message was sent to Casterly Rock. When it was done, he went back to his rooms and slept. On the morning, he broke his fast on eggs and bacon, then went to guard the king. It was his turn. For eight hours he had to guard the result of his seed who complained all time about not being able to leave his chamber, stating repeatedly he was the king and asking all time why his marriage didn’t take place as planned. Cersei hadn’t even cared to tell him that his grandfather was dead. Not that Joffrey would care, anyway. All the same this turn of duty was wearisome, especially since he had to share it with Osmund Kettleblack. This man was a sellsword before he entered the Kingsguard, but that wasn’t the reason Jaime despised him. There was something Jaime didn’t like about this man.

When his duty was over, Jaime felt he could go back to sleep, but he had other things to do first. He took a quick meal and went to search for Brienne. She was confined in her room, like everyone else. Jaime visited her very briefly yesterday to tell her what was going on, but he couldn’t make her leave her room. That would have seemed too strange, especially in Cersei’s eyes. Her chamber was very small and its furniture simple. Only a hard bed, a table, two chairs and a window. She didn’t complain about it since she was accustomed to harsh life in camps. She was probably one of the few women in the Seven Kingdoms who didn’t dream of a great chamber with a large and comfortable bed (along with a handsome and noble man inside), a glass and all the other commodities women could wish. She was so much different from Cersei.

“Brienne,” he said as he entered. He had removed his armor and wore his usual garment.

“Ser Jaime.” She was staring outside through the window when he entered, but turned to face him as soon as he came. She showed him respect now. That was so much different from the time when she began to escort him. They were both insufferable toward each other back then, until they bathed in the same bathtub.

“We need to talk. About Sansa Stark.”

The name attracted Brienne’s attention. “Very well, let’s sit.”

They sat at the table, facing each other. Jaime didn’t know if her eyes were more beautiful than those of Cersei, but they were one of the few beautiful parts of her. Perhaps that was why he found them so beautiful. “My brother has been arrested by my sister and put into a cell in the dungeons.”

“For your father’s murder. I thought Sansa Stark was supposed to be safe with him. I’m not sure she’s safe with a kinslayer.”

“Tyrion didn’t kill our father. Cersei believes it because she wants to believe it. She has hated Tyrion ever since the day he was born because our mother died this same day. She always wanted him dead. She is only using our father’s death to get what she always wanted.”

Brienne seemed to regret her words. “I’m sorry, Ser Jaime. All the same, Sansa Stark is no longer safe here, if she ever was. Her husband is accused of murder, and if what you say is true, he will be killed very soon by your sister. We have to get her out of the city before it’s too late.”

Jaime had to sigh again. Brienne always said they should get Sansa out of King’s Landing for her safety. Where would they send her? It was true that with Cersei she was in danger. Tyrion could no longer protect his wife, but someone else could. “I’m not going to take her out of the city unless it becomes evident she will die if she stays. We cannot send her in the nature like this, with nowhere to go. All her family is dead.”

“What about her aunt, Lysa Arryn? She is the Lady of the Vale and Sansa is her niece. She could protect her if we brought Sansa to her.”

“Lysa Arryn is married to Petyr Baelish, the man who betrayed Sansa’s father. He is the acting Lord of the Vale now. Do you really think she will be safer in the hands of a brothel keeper?” Brienne had nothing to say to this. There was no sure place for Sansa Stark. Sansa Lannister in fact, now. “I swore to protect Lady Stark’s daughters, just like you, and I intend to protect the last one of them, but not by stupidly trying to play heroes. We must watch over her while she is here in King’s Landing. I will do it just like you, even if she may be the one who killed my father.”

“Lady Sansa didn’t kill Lord Tywin. She could never have done it.”

Jaime was exceeded by Brienne’s incensing of everyone she was sworn to. “Sansa had more reasons to kill my father than everyone else in the Red Keep. Her mother and her eldest brother were murdered on his orders.”

“I spoke with Lady Stark when I was with her. She told me Lady Sansa acted like a lady as soon as she was three-years-old. She loves songs, stories, needlework, and always act with good manners. She is a sweet child. She couldn’t have done such a thing.”
“Come on, Brienne. Lady Stark didn’t see her daughter for two years now. The child who left Winterfell is now a woman grown and she is married, even if she’s still a maiden. Her whole family was killed, her father was beheaded in front of her, and Joffrey had her beaten more than once. Do you really think she’s still the sweet innocent child she was when her mother saw her for the last time? And I’m sure that the time spent with my brother made her even less innocent.”

“Maybe you’re right, but she couldn’t have done it. The Starks don’t poison people, they act with honor.”

_Honor. Of course, they act with honor. And look where it brought them. They’re all dead safe one._

“We can argue about who may have killed my father, or we can concentrate on how to protect the Stark girl best. She’s alone now that Tyrion is in a cell, so she needs our protection. If we want to hold our vow, that’s what we must do.”

Brienne’s eyes softened. They were much less furious than Cersei’s. “I agree. What do you plan to do?”

“First, we must see her. If we are to ensure her safety, we have to talk to her. I think it’s time you meet the daughter you swore to keep safe.”

Brienne silently agreed with him. They left her room and went in the direction of Tyrion’s. Tyrion’s and Sansa’s rooms now, to be true. Jaime still found it hard to believe that Tyrion was married to Sansa Stark. He was literally flabbergasted when he discovered his brother was married once again. And to such a woman. Jaime had seen Sansa Stark a few times since he came back, and many men should be envious of his brother. The girl had grown since the time he saw her before the war. She was quite a beautiful woman now, even if he heard Tyrion complain about the fact his father married him to a child. Jaime thought he knew why Tyrion wasn’t happy. He was forced to marry the girl, and the girl was forced too. Tyrion always wanted to marry a girl who would love him. After the Red Wedding, it wasn’t hard to guess Sansa Stark would never love his brother. Not that it would have been likely even before, but now Sansa Stark had every reason to hate every Lannister in this world. Jaime wondered how she would act toward him. As for Brienne, he could only hope her presence would make things better. If the Stark girl saw a sworn shield to her mother, she may at least listen to what Jaime would tell her.

They arrived before Tyrion’s chamber where Bronn stood. Jaime was surprised to see him there.

“What are you doing here?”

“Doing my job, as long as I’m paid. Your brother’s squire seemed to have some of the dwarf’s money hidden somewhere and he pays me to protect his wife. For now anyway, I have nothing else to do.”

“And the other guards let you stand here, like that?”

“They don’t dare to face me, they know I’m dangerous. Anyway, I don’t walk in the corridors, I just stand here, doing nothing. Perhaps you could send me some girl to entertain me. It’s beginning to be a long time since I had one now.”

“I’ll see what I can do about it.” Jaime said it to shut the sellsword’s mouth more than for any other reason. “Let us enter, we need to speak to my sister-in-law.”

Bonn eyed Brienne skeptically. “She’s the one who brought you back, heh? Why do you bring her with you? Do you need protection even against a fifteen-years-old girl?”

“We must speak to Sansa together.” Jaime started to be annoyed by the sellsword’s attitude. He had more than enough from their time spent to practice. The man liked to humiliate him with a sword and with words. How could Tyrion support him? Perhaps because Tyrion behaved the same way at some point. “Do I have to pay you to let us in?”

“I wouldn’t say no. You may enter, but remember, if you try anything funny, I’m paid to kill you.”

“We have no weapons.” It was true. They were both garbed in civil suits. “And I won’t do anything to my brother’s wife. Let us in.”

“The honor is yours.” The sellsword stepped aside and let the door closed before them. Jaime had to open it. He and Brienne entered the room.

Jaime noticed there was a mess in some places. Perhaps Cersei’s way to deal with imaginative murderers. Lady Sansa Stark, no Lannister, was sitting near the window, looking outside. When they entered, she turned her head to face them. The door closed behind them. She raised from her position.

“Ser Jaime.”

That was her way to welcome him. Proper, but nothing more. She welcomed him like a lady, but there was no trace of warmth in her voice. That was different from the last time he saw her. Jaime never gave too much attention to the girl, but he remembered the way she looked with expectation at Joffrey when they were at Winterfell. He also remembered she smiled during the tourney in the honor of her father where Jaime performed. All that was gone now. No smile, no shine in her eyes, only an emotionless face that looked at him without any interest.

Jaime observed her closely. He thought she was taller than the last time. Jaime wondered how Joffrey would have looked like with a wife taller than him. At this thought, Jaime repressed a chuckle. The girl was probably twice Tyrion’s height. What a sight it had to be when they both stood side by side. But he also saw how beautiful she was. The entire opposite of her little sister. Deep blue eyes, auburn hair, white skin, high cheekbones. Her body had developed a lot since last time. How lucky Tyrion had been to be married with her. That was a shame he never consummated the marriage.

“Lady Sansa. I hope we don’t bother you.”

“It’s difficult to be bothered when we are confined in our rooms all day.” She said it without emotion, but Jaime knew that was a reproach.

“Yes, I’m sorry about that. My sister, the queen, only established it temporarily, the time we can make sure everyone can circulate in the Red Keep safely. After all, the Hand of the King was assassinated.”

“I’m sure the Tyrells are very happy with these measures.” Again, she spoke coldly. She was different from her mother, but she also looked like her. Not because of her appearance, but in her way to behave. Catelyn Stark was always speaking to Jaime with scorn, directly branding him as a kingslayer and a man without honor. Her daughter was acting the same, but she didn’t show her emotions and hit in an indirect way. The result was the same however and both acted like a lady, people would say.

“Lady Sansa, this is Lady Brienne of Tarth.”

Brienne advanced. She hadn’t talked ever since they entered the room, remaining silent. She bowed the head. It looked quite preposterous the way she did it. “My lady, I was a sworn sword to your mother before she died. I gave her my word that I would find you and protect you. I’m here to offer you my services.”

Jaime knew it wouldn’t work the moment Brienne began to talk. She was a woman clad in normal clothes. She wasn’t even wearing an armor, she didn’t even carry a sword. His sister-in-law didn’t seem quite convinced by Brienne’s words. “I don’t recall my mother having a woman to protect her. Why should I believe you? How do I know you’re not lying to me?”

Brienne answered immediately. “She told me you already acted as a lady at three. She often sent your maid away so she could brush your hair herself. The first embroidery you did was a blue winter rose. Your friend Jeyne Poole often called your little sister Arya Horseface.”

Brienne’s words had some effects on Sansa. Jaime could see her mouth open a little and her eyes showing some surprise. “How did you come to know my mother?” It seemed she believed Brienne now, or at least started to believe her.

“I was a kingsguard for Renly Baratheon. Your mother came to his army to negotiate an alliance with him. We both were here when he was killed. Your mother and I were accused of his murder and we escaped together. When we reached the Riverlands, she gave me the task to bring Ser Jaime safe in King’s Landing, then to bring you and your sister back to her afterwards.”

The Stark girl eyed Jaime for a moment. “Why would she order Ser Jaime Lannister to be released? I knew my mother. She would never have set him free.”

Jaime felt it was his time to speak now. “She made a deal. Me against you and Arya Stark. But we were delayed on the road. Bolton soldiers captured us. I lost a hand in this.” He raised his golden hand to emphasize it. “Roose Bolton allowed us to leave if I told my father he had nothing to see with my mutilation. Sadly when we arrived, it was too late. Your mother was dead.”

Jaime spoke in a way to let her know he was sorry about that, which was true. In fact, he didn’t feel quite guilty about Catelyn Stark’s death, but he was sorry he couldn’t keep his word. However, Sansa Stark was looking more suspiciously at them now. She turned her eyes toward Brienne. “I remember you, now. You are the one who killed Renly Baratheon.”

Brienne was quite shocked by this. Jaime knew she hadn’t done it, but most of the people believed so. “I tried to save him. I didn’t kill him.”

“Then who killed him? You said yourself that you were present with my mother when he was assassinated and that you were accused of murdering him. I know my mother didn’t do it. So if it wasn’t her or you, who was it?”

Brienne took some time before she answered. “He was killed by a shadow. A shadow with the face of Stannis Baratheon.”

Now Jaime knew they were lost. She should have invented something instead of telling the truth. Sansa was looking at her with a face that clearly stated she didn’t believe it. “You should have found a better lie.” She turned her heels and made a few steps toward the window.

“If your mother was still alive, she would tell you the same thing.”

Sansa turned again to face them. “My mother is dead. She and my brother may have been traitors, but I know my brother would never have set Ser Jaime Lannister free, even for me and Arya, and my mother would never have disobeyed him. I see no reason to believe you.”

Jaime intervened. Brienne really ruined everything. She was too much honorable. He had to try to rectify the situation. “My lady, your mother made a secret pact to exchange me against her daughters because I was about to be killed by the Northerners. Lady Brienne is honest, she swore to protect you. And I am only here to tell you that I’ll do everything for my brother to be released. We are only here to offer you our help. I swore to your mother to protect you me too.”

“Why would I want the help of a kingslayer?” The words hit Jaime hard. “Why should I believe you will help your brother? Your own sister sent him to the black cells and from what I know you are much closer to your sister than to your brother.” Jaime didn’t know if that was an implying of the love between him and Cersei, or only that he had a better relation with Cersei than with Tyrion. “Anyway, if I must rely on the past, I’m not sure you’re quite good to protect your brother’s wife. Perhaps I should ask Tysha.”

The last sentence left Jaime bewildered. He and Tyrion never talked about it to anyone. The people of Casterly Rock who knew about the affair never spoke of it in fear of his father’s wrath. How could she know about it? Could Tyrion have told her? If that was the case, Jaime probably underestimated their marriage. Tyrion had to trust her greatly to tell her this, especially since she was his wife, or he was quite foolish, but Jaime knew his brother was many things but no fool.

Sansa started to speak again after a moment. “I’m not interested in your help. Leave me please. I would like to be alone.” This time she turned her heels to not look back at them and went back to the window, looking at the outside again.

There was nothing they could do now. “Come Brienne.” The tall woman took some time to react, but she followed Jaime as he opened the door and let her leave first. Just before he left, he said one last thing to his sister-in-law. “Just for your information, my lady, a Lannister always pays his debts, and I have more than one towards my brother, no matter how close I am to my sister. Because he’s the one who made the deal with your mother to free me.”

He didn’t take time to look at the girl’s reaction. She would probably look at him with the same dull and impassive face she had during the whole meeting. She thought about him the same things her mother thought, but she didn’t show her emotions. In some way she was even worse than her mother for this. Jaime could mock Catelyn Stark to make her react, but with her daughter it was impossible. If he had faced her this way before he met Brienne, the girl would probably have managed to make him lose his patience and his assurance. Now that he had met her officially, Jaime had more than ever the impression she could have done it. She seemed cold blooded enough to commit assassination, but there was no proof she did. Jaime would wait the trial to decide if Sansa Stark was guilty.

“Well, it went well,” he said sarcastically as they walked back to his rooms of Lord Commander.

“She refused our services. We both swore to keep her safe and she refused our help.” Brienne looked despondent. Perhaps Jaime would feel that way if the person he swore his sword to was dead, one of her daughters he swore to protect dead as well and the only one still alive refusing his services. When he thought about it, this situation partially applied to him too. Only he didn’t feel any attachment to Catelyn Stark or her daughters like Brienne did, so it was much easier for him. However, to the opposite of Brienne, he wouldn’t give up.

“She refused our help, but that doesn’t mean we can’t watch over her. Follow me, I have something to show you.”

When they arrived, Jaime opened the White Book to his page. Brienne leaned over the table and began to read the left side. The right side was still blank. He still had no great deeds to fill it.

“Ser Jaime Lannister. Knighted and named to the Kingsguard in his 16th year. At the sack of King’s Landing, murdered his king Aerys the Second. Pardoned by Robert Baratheon. Thereafter known as the Kingslayer.”

Jaime had a ball in his stomach as she read it. Jaime felt she said the last sentence with abhorrence, but not the same than in the beginning of their journey. “It’s the duty of the Lord Commander to fill those pages. And there’s still room left on mine.”

Jaime grasped his sword and held it out for Brienne to take it. She took it and put two fingers on the two flat sides of the sword. Her blue eyes enlarged. Jaime had to admit he preferred the look of surprise on her face than the look of hatred in Cersei’s eyes.

“Valyrian steel.” That was all she said.

“Mmm. It’s yours.”

Brienne looked up at him with her big blue eyes. “I can’t accept this.”

“It was reforged from Ned Stark’s sword. You’ll use it to defend Ned Stark’s daughter. You swore an oath to return the Stark girls to their mother. Lady Stark’s dead. Arya’s probably dead, too, but Sansa is still alive. I cannot protect her myself, I have duties as Lord Commander of the Kingsguard, but I can have Cersei to believe that you have a job to keep watch on her so that she may not escape.”

“I’m not going to spy on her.”

“This is only an excuse. I want you to make sure no one harms her. I’ll make the other guards believe that you are working against her, but in fact you’ll be protecting her.” Brienne nodded in agreement. She seemed quite grateful for that. “They say the best swords have names. Any ideas?”

After a moment of reflection, Brienne finally said a single word. “Oathkeeper.”

This time it was Jaime’s turn to feel grateful. Brienne had helped him to find back his honor. He would help her to keep her own. “Now go, and do your duty. Make sure Sansa doesn’t notice you’re watching her. She mustn’t know you’re following her, whether she believes it’s for bad or good reasons.”

“Yes, Ser Jaime.”

She bowed her head and left. Brienne would protect Sansa Stark. As for Jaime, he would protect his little brother. If Cersei believed she could have Tyrion executed so easily, she was making a great mistake. Jaime wasn’t alone to protect his little brother.

Chapter End Notes

As always, Brienne knows how to introduce herself.

Please review

Next chapter: a new character (special demand from one of my reviewers)
Podrick I

Chapter Notes

To answer the demand of one of your reviewers, I decided to make a Podrick chapter. I was planning to make it a Tyrion chapter originally, but I thought it might be quite interesting to visit Podrick’s mind at least one time. Also, since Tyrion is in a cell, we can see more details of what happens in King’s Landing through Tyrion’s squire’s eyes.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

PODRICK I

The squire was going down in the dungeons of the Red Keep. It was the afternoon. Finally, he couldn’t visit Lord Tyrion in the morning and had to wait a later time of the day. Ser Jaime Lannister had given him a note that allowed him to visit his master, Lord Tyrion. Luckily, the gaoler allowed him the access to Lord Tyrion’s cell without Podrick needing to bribe him. He would be able to bring back the golden dragon to Ser Jaime. However, he hadn’t been so lucky with the wine. The guards confiscated it as soon as they saw it. Lord Tyrion needed wine, and a lot. Podrick had failed him on this. They reached Lord Tyrion’s cell after a short descent. There was still light at this level. Perhaps they chose to not bring his lord deeper because he was a Lannister. Podrick was glad of it. Lord Tyrion didn’t deserve the worst cells. In fact, he didn’t even deserve to be in a cell. He was a good man.

The guards opened the door and allowed Podrick to enter. Lord Tyrion was sitting on the floor of straw, his doublet dirty and unbuttoned on the top, with a grim expression on his face. Podrick guessed he might have the same expression on his own face if he had been taken out of his bed, knocked unconscious, and brought to a black cell without a single explanation. Lord Tyrion didn’t deserve this.

“Podrick. Apologies for the stench.” Podrick thought it might be a good welcome considering the circumstances, but they had more pressing matters. He looked back at the door to make sure it was shut.

“I brought you some wine, my lord, but they took it from me.” Podrick was really sorry he failed at this.

“A noble effort.”

“They didn’t find the candles, though. A quill, some parchment, duck sausage, almonds, and some hard cheese.” One by one, Podrick put down the things he smuggled on a nearby bench.

“You’re a good lad.” Podrick smiled at his lord’s comment. Tyrion Lannister may be a drunkard, but he was a good man all the same. He never complained about Podrick’s services, no matter how bad he would perform them. He remembered when he had come to his defense when Lord Janos Slynt told him he could replace him with a proper squire. Myself, I prefer the improper ones. And Lord Tyrion rewarded him when he did his work well. It was difficult to forget his reward for saving his life at the Battle of Blackwater.
“My lord, Ser Jaime sent me to you.”

“Oh, my brother sent you. Good. Can you tell him to get me out of here?”

“I will, but I fear he can’t my lord. Your sister gave orders for you to be detained until your trial.”

“My trial? So it is true. My father is really dead. The guards weren’t mocking me. And of course my sister believes that I’m the one behind his death. I can’t pretend to have loved my father, but to kill him? Never. If one of my father’s children could be foolish enough to kill him one day, it would be my sister. I guess her first decision after having me killed will be to cancel her betrothal to Ser Loras.”

Podrick didn’t really know what to think of it. Perhaps the queen really was behind Lord Tywin’s death, after all Lord Tyrion was quite clever on these matters. He also knew she had tried to have Ser Mandon Moore kill Lord Tyrion. If he hadn’t been there, his lord would already be dead. He should have killed Ser Mandon even before he attacked Lord Tyrion. He should have known. However, Ser Jaime didn’t think Lord Tywin was killed. “Your brother said that according to the Grand Maester, your father died of a heart failure during his sleep.”

Lord Tyrion seemed to think about it some time. “It might be the best explanation. My father was old after all. Though I have to admit that his death is quite unexpected, especially if we consider he was in excellent health. If the Grand Maester said his heart failed, then it means there was no injury on his body. If he was murdered, it was probably by poison. I don’t know who did it, if that’s the case, but I know it’s not me. Do you believe I murdered my father?”

“No, my lord.” Podrick was sure Lord Tyrion didn’t do it, but he asked him all the same to be entirely sure. “You didn’t?”

“No. Gods, no.” Podrick felt reassured by his master’s words. He believed him. “I hated my father, everyone knows it. He hated me as well after all, but I have nothing to do with his death. What are they saying about me out there?”

“Not much. There are still people who don’t know for sure that Lord Tywin is dead. Those who do know don’t even know you were arrested for the majority. You’re going to stand a trial for murdering the Hand of the King, and for attempt of murder against the king.”

Lord Tyrion looked at him with anger now. Podrick hoped he didn’t say anything he shouldn’t have. “That’s Cersei’s doing, for sure. Not only she uses our father’s death to accuse me, she avails the situation to accuse me of supposed attempts to have her son killed. I’m surprised she’s not accusing me of the murder of our mother at the same time. Have they announced the judges yet?”

Podrick sat on the bench. “King Joffrey, Mace Tyrell, and Gyles Rosby.”

“Well, I’m sure to be sentenced to death then. Gyles Rosby is in Cersei’s pocket, Joffrey has wanted me dead for a very long time, and Mace Tyrell will vote exactly as Joffrey and Cersei tell him. What a trial it will be. With Joffrey as main judge, I will probably be sentenced to die even before I am asked if I committed the murder.”

“Your brother asked to get a list of people you would like to testify for you. He said he couldn’t get you out of prison right now, but that he would make sure you would get out of here alive. He asked me to tell you that a Lannister always pays his debts.”

Lord Tyrion looked at him with a curious gaze. “Very well. I hope my brother knows what he’s doing. My wife, Sansa. And Varys, he could vouch for me. You could ask for Jaime to testify also.”
“Very well, my lord.” Podrick stopped for a moment, but before he could talk about something else, his lord brought the subject he was about to address.

“Yes, my lord. She stays in your rooms. Most of the people are confined to their own. She wanted me to tell you that she hopes you’re alright, that she hopes you’ll leave the black cells very soon, and that she misses you.”

To the last sentence his lord seemed quite taken aback, but he smiled all the same. “When you see her next time, tell her I hope me too I’ll leave the black cells very soon, our chamber is much more comfortable than this place. Tell her to stay out of trouble. I know trouble comes to her almost every time, but that’s no reason to start looking for it. And tell her I hope she’s alright as well.” There was a silence for some time. “What about Shae?”

“She’s alright, my lord. She’s still assuming her duties as Lady Sansa’s handmaiden.” Podrick realized Lord Tyrion asked about his wife before he asked about Shae. Podrick knew Lord Tyrion didn’t love his wife, that he loved Shae, but he did care about Lady Sansa very much all the same. However, Podrick had to speak to his lord about something very important.

“My lord, Lord Varys intercepted me this morning. He told me your sister was aware of who Shae was. Another handmaiden of your wife saw her leave your room.”

Now his lord really seemed in distress. Podrick didn’t see him in this state very often. “Gods, no. If Cersei knows about Shae…” He looked directly to Podrick. “Pod, you must go and find Shae. You must force her to leave King’s Landing as quickly as possible by every means necessary.”

“Yes, my lord. Lord Varys already organized a passage for her on a ship to Pentos. She will have a house with servants and money, her own cabin on the ship. I’ll tell her everything about it and bring her to the ship.”

“Ask Bronn to accompany her instead. He will be better to protect her and people won’t find it curious to see him in company of a handmaiden, while they could find it quite unusual if she was with you.” Podrick nodded. He knew Lord Tyron was right about it. However, his master now looked at him more intensively than ever. “Podrick, you must compel Shae to leave. It’s no more time for soft words. Cersei will kill her for sure if she stays, or worse. I told her so many times this place was dangerous that she doesn’t believe it anymore. To tell her that my sister discovered her won’t be enough. Even if she leaves now, she will come back later. You must make sure she never returns. You must make sure she never wants to return.” Podrick didn’t know what his lord meant. “Tell her that our friendship is over. Tell her that Sansa has already been through a lot and that I don’t want her to suffer anymore on my account. That I need to uphold my vows. Tell her she’s only a whore and that I can’t have children with her. That I can’t be in love with a whore. Sansa is fit to bear my children and she is not. Tell her that I enjoyed my time with whores, most of all my time with her, but now that time is over. She has to leave to never come back.”

Lord Tyrion’s voice broke as he said the last words. Podrick knew he had to do it. It was his lord’s orders. Podrick knew that Lord Tyron didn’t believe what he said, but that he would have to convince Shae these words were true. Podrick liked Shae, she was a good woman. She always was kind with him the few times he saw her. He would have to tell her everything his lord told him to save her. It was no time to refuse to do what his master told him to.

“Yes, my lord.” Podrick gathered some courage before he talked about another subject. Varys wasn’t the only one to approach him this morning. “There’s something else, my lord. A man, I didn’t know his face, he came to ask if I’d testify against you. Said I’d be named Ser Podrick Payne if I told the judges you’d bought a poison called the tears of Lys.”

“Ser Podrick Payne? Has a nice ring to it. What did you tell him?”

“I didn’t tell them anything, my lord.”

“Are you going to accept their offer?”

“My lord.” Podrick would never testify against Lord Tyrion.

“Testifying against me wasn’t a suggestion. If they can’t tempt you with honey, they’ll choose something less sweet.”

“You’ve been good to me, my lord.”

His lord nearly cut him. “Pod, the trial will take place very soon. They’ll want an answer before that.”

“I already gave them an answer, my lord.”

Lord Tyrion rose at this moment. He wasn’t tall, but Podrick always felt short in his presence. Lord Tyrion was a great man, no matter what other people said. Podrick could see his shadow right now, taller than any other man with the sun on the back of his lord. He thought he heard Lord Varys tell one day that a very small man can cast a very large shadow. Podrick always found the expression more than appropriate for Lord Tyrion.

“I will not have you dying on my behalf. Do you hear me? If I have to take that long walk to the executioner’s block, I don’t want to see your head already mounted.”

“My lord.” Podrick was afraid of what would come. Lord Tyrion rarely spoke to him on such a commanding tone.

“Pod, I am giving you an order. Go and find my brother, tell him I need him. And get yourself out of King’s Landing before it’s too late.” Podrick refused to reply to this. He couldn’t follow this order, not this one. Lord Tyrion had always been good to him. He never had a better master to serve. He didn’t want to leave his service, even if it meant dying with him. He was his squire. “Pod! This is farewell. As soon as you’ll be done with Shae, leave the city and never come back.”

He had no other choice. As Lord Tyrion’s squire, he had to obey him. “Farewell, my lord.” He raised from the bench and turned to leave. As the door opened, his lord called him one last time.

“Pod. There has never lived a more loyal squire.”

Podrick wanted to cry. He bowed his head for the last time in his lord’s direction and walked away. If he looked back, he would cry.

As Podrick walked back to the surface, he could only feel how unfair all this was. Lord Tyrion was a good man and he was in prison for a crime he didn’t commit. Now he had to abandon him on his orders. But before, he had one last thing to do. The last thing he would do for his master before he would leave King’s Landing. That wasn’t a task he relished to, but he had to do it. Lord Varys told him which ship would take Shae away to a safe place. But first he had to find Bronn.

Thanks to Ser Jaime’s note, he could travel everywhere he wanted in the Red Keep. He found Ser Bronn before Lord Tyrion’s chambers, guarding the Lady Sansa as always. Podrick paid him with Lord Tyrion’s money for it. He knew his lord would agree with this. When the sellsword saw him coming, he raised a hand.

“Sorry, this is no more the time for visits. The young lady doesn’t want anyone to bother her for the rest of the day. She was bothered earlier and she didn’t like it. So unless you have food to bring her, and it doesn’t seem you have any, I’m afraid I can’t let you pass. Or perhaps I could let you pass if you finally gave me the details how you managed to get out of a brothel without paying.”

That was something Podrick would never tell. He wouldn’t tell even if we offered him all the gold of Casterly Rock. “I’m sorry, Ser Bronn, but I need your help.” He told the sellsword everything: the discovery of Shae by the queen, Lord Varys’s arrangements to save her, Lord Tyrion’s orders about Shae and his departure, the man who tried to bribe him, Lord Tyrion’s belief that Shae would be in better hands if Ser Bronn escorted her to the ship. Ser Bronn listened carefully and as Podrick spoke, his face grew darker and sad.

“Alright.” He took the wineskin he had with him and drank deeply. “Let me do the whole thing. I and the girl come from the same world. You’re a god lad, but you’re highborn. It may have better results if I tell her myself. I’ll bring her to the ship. What did Tyrion want to tell her exactly?” Podrick repeated Lord Tyrion’s exact words. He had a very good memory. The knight sighed. “That’s not a job I’ll relish, but I’ll get it done. Don’t worry, she’ll be on this ship when it leaves and I’ll make sure she never wants to come back.”

Podrick panicked for a moment, but Ser Bronn noticed it and continued very quickly. “Don’t be so afraid. I won’t hurt her. Not physically, at least. In her mind and her heart however, I’ll have to. No choice. Remember this, lad. Never fall in love. That’s what happens when we fall in love.” Podrick nodded, though he didn’t want to believe the sellsword’s words. Ser Bronn suddenly put a hand on his shoulder. “Be careful out there. If you become a sellsword, perhaps we’ll meet again. I hope it won’t be as foes. Ask the Imp’s brother to pay me after you’re gone. I sell my sword, I don’t give it.”

“Ser Bronn, don’t you think you should keep guarding Lady Sansa? Maybe you shouldn’t leave her for Shae. I can take care of her.”

The man chuckled. “She doesn’t need my presence all the time. Anyway, someone else is watching for her. She tries to remain hidden, but she’s not quite good at it. She’ll watch over the young lady while I’m away.”

The sellsword left, leaving Podrick with many questions. Who else was watching for Lady Sansa? She? Was it a woman? Podrick had no time for this anyway. He needed to meet Ser Jaime before he left to report everything Lord Tyrion told him. Everything except for Shae. He would bring this secret in the tomb with him if necessary. Podrick left the corridor and walked in the direction of the rooms that belonged to the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard.

As he walked, Podrick thought about everything that happened these last years. Podrick didn’t have a great destiny that awaited him when he was born. He was highborn and had a family name, but he was the lowest among the highborn, which made him barely over the smallfolk. He came from a lesser branch of House Payne. He wasn’t very happy to be related to the King’s Justice, but there was nothing he could do about it. His father spent his life to squire for cousins who were richer than him. When he died in the Greyjoy Rebellion, Podrick’s mother ran away with a cousin his father had squired for. Podrick could barely remember his mother since he was only four-years-old when she abandoned him. All the same, he wished he had known her. Luckily, a distant relative of his father, Ser Cedric Payne, took care of him. He treated Podrick more like a servant than a member of his family, but Podrick was glad all the same. Ser Cedric wasn’t more cruel with him than with his other servants. Sadly, Ser Cedric Payne died at the beginning of the war in the Riverlands. Podrick attached himself to a hedge knight, Ser Lorimer, since he was alone in the army. Ser Lorimer got drunk one night and borrowed a ham from Lord Tywin’s personal store. Since Ser Lorimer shared the ham with Podrick and was discovered afterwards with the bones of the ham, he was hanged. Podrick would have been hanged too if Lord Tywin hadn’t realized he was a Payne. As a punishment he was sent to King’s Landing in order to squire for Lord Tywin’s son, the Imp.

Podrick hadn’t known what would be waiting for him at King’s Landing while he travelled from Harrenhal to the capital. There were many rumors about Lord Tyrion, all bad. However, when Podrick came into his service, he was quite surprised. Lord Tyrion scared him at the beginning with his japes, but Podrick soon discovered they were only japes and that Lord Tyrion was a good man. He witnessed it when he exiled Lord Janos Slynt for killing babies, and heard several examples of his new master’s goodness. His rescue of Lady Sansa when King Joffrey had her beaten in public was one of the best. Podrick made many mistakes at the beginning of his service, but Lord Tyrion never seemed to bother about it. He never mistreated him and Podrick didn’t have to do much work for him. It was a better life than he ever had. Lord Tyrion even gave him some presents, especially after he saved him at the Battle of Blackwater.

The battle was Podrick’s best memory. He never felt complete and useful as in this moment. He fought against men who tried to destroy the city. Lord Tyrion’s speech spurred him to fight to death as much as all the other men. Podrick saw at this moment that his lord wasn’t only a good man, but a brave man. He was proud to be his squire from this moment and he didn’t hesitate when he saw Ser Mandon Moore trying to kill him. He threw the lance in his hands through the knight’s head. But now Podrick had to abandon Lord Tyrion on his lord’s orders. He knew Lord Tyrion only wanted to protect him, but it didn’t make it any easier to leave him. Podrick never had such a good man to serve. He would have to leave King’s Landing to live on his own. He would never become a knight as he always dreamed of.

He reached the door of Ser Jaime’s chambers. He had to talk to the Lord Commander. After that, he would leave King’s Landing to never return. He would leave his lord and never see him again. With a resigned face, he turned the handle of the door and entered to do his last duties as Lord Tyrion’s squire.

Chapter End Notes

Only a week left before season 6 begins.

Please review

Next chapter: Cersei
Cersei II

Chapter Notes

Once again, we are in Cersei’s head. That's strange how it can be interesting to be in the head of someone we hate so much. (At least for me, perhaps there are people reading this who love Cersei. But I don't.)

Of course, she sprinkles wine on someone. Wear your oldest clothes or the clothes you hate the most when you meet Cersei Lannister and there is wine close.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

CERSEI II

The Queen Regent drank deeply from her cup of wine after another long day. It tasted victory. Two weeks passed since her father’s death and she managed in so little time to solve so many problems that should have been taken care of so long ago. The construction of the royal fleet would begin very soon now, thanks to the large supply of ironwood Lord Rickard Morgryn promised her. She didn’t know why Tyrion wasted so much time trying to have a contract with the Forresters, a family of traitors who would be destroyed very soon. Perhaps it was another soft spot he developed for former Stark’s bannermen because of Sansa. All the same, everything was arranged now. To make sure the Crown would have enough money to build the new fleet, she decided to defer the repayment of the debts toward the Iron Bank of Braavos and the Holy Faith. Both would complain, but it didn’t matter. They would wait.

She also named Lord Gyles Rosby to be the new Master of Coin and respected the decision her father took before his death to name Mace Tyrell Master of Ships. The Tyrells had complained for days for the delay on the wedding ceremony, but they kept calm after she offered this position to Mace Tyrell. That wasn’t as if the oaf was a threat anyway, and she remembered the Tyrells who they were at the same time. Cersei wondered how House Tyrell could keep up with such an imbecile to lead it. She also added two thousand additional gold cloaks in the capital. With the money saved from the Iron Bank and the Faith, Lord Rosby could find enough money for it between two coughs. The only members of the small council she couldn’t support were the eunuch and Pycelle, who always questioned her decisions. Perhaps it was time to replace them. Qyburn would make a good Master of Whisperers. However, she wouldn’t do it now. She would wait after the trial.

The achievement she was the most proud of was the trial that would take place next week. Everything was arranged. Pycelle understood her father was murdered very quickly and finally confessed after the examination of the body that he was poisoned with a very rare substance called the tears of Lys. The Grand Maester also revealed that he had this poison in his personal rooms, but that some of it disappeared when Tyrion arrested him last year. He also said that her brother asked him for some essence of nightshade, supposedly to help his wife to sleep. Only by itself, the Grand Maester’s testimony would be more than enough at the trial to incriminate Tyrion. She also made sure that half the kingsguards and Varys would testify. She would testify too, of course, and the assassin of her father would face judges who knew him for what he really was. She would get rid of this monster who threatened to kill her son. Oh, I'm a monster. Perhaps you should speak to me more softly, then. Monsters are dangerous and just now kings are dying like flies. He said it in front of all the members of the small council. If Cersei had the power then, she would have arrested him right away for threatening her son, the king.

Everything would be alright at the trial, though there were things that still needed to be cleared. Thanks to the Forrester girl, who she sent in Tyrion’s cell with wine (he couldn’t resist it, even less when it was a familiar young girl who brought it to him), she knew Tyrion had no witnesses. However, the man she charged to have his squire testify against him told her the boy refused. Cersei would have to take care of that, though she wasn’t very hurried about it. After all, the boy was barely fifteen, probably even younger than Sansa. As for the sellsword, Cersei made sure he wouldn’t do anything for his former master. A marriage with Lollys Stokeworth and promises of gold were enough to turn him against the little monster. Tyrion’s wife wouldn’t cause any problem, she was harmless, a perfect little dove. No one saw her these days. She hid in her chambers all day, even if Cersei granted the freedom of movement to everyone a week ago. People could walk inside the Red Keep, though she kept a close look on some of them (especially the Tyrells), but they couldn’t leave. All entrances and exits were closed day and night. No one would leave or enter without her permission before the trial was over.

The only one that proved problematic was her brother Jaime. He refused to become the Hand of the King when she proposed him, and he refused to testify against their brother at his trial. He abandoned her again. Probably it was for the better. Jaime would have said good things about Tyrion at his trial, and they had no need for that. And since he refused to be Hand of the King, Cersei decided there would be no Hand. She was the only one Joffrey needed to be rightly advised. She wouldn’t let someone hurt her son, and she would prove it when Tyrion’s head would roll from the executioner’s block. She would plant his head on a spike, finally. He should have died so long ago. He killed her mother. He sent Myrcella away among snakes. He tried to have Joffrey killed. Now he killed her father. She wouldn’t let him kill Joffrey or Tommen or her. The words of Maggy the Frog would never come true. She would make sure of that.

She emptied her cup and refilled it. Osmund Kettleblack entered at this moment. “Your Grace, your brother wishes to see you. He says it is of the utmost importance.”

Cersei didn’t want to see Jaime ever since he refused to help her as he should have, protecting their poor little brother as always. He chose the little monster who murdered their father instead of her and she couldn’t support it. He was her other half and he should follow her. However, Cersei had nothing to do right now and she couldn’t send away the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard without a good excuse when he said he had something important to talk with the queen. Perhaps he finally saw the light and decided to follow her. If that was the case, she may not be alone in her bed tonight.

“Let him in.”

Ser Osmund left the room and Jaime entered soon after, closing the door behind him. He stood tall before her. He was so handsome. Cersei wanted nothing more than to take him to her bed and feel whole again as he entered her. It had been too long since the last time they were together. Furthermore, she needed to celebrate her victory over her enemies. Jaime wouldn’t celebrate with her if she told him about it, but she didn’t have to. She only needed to make him understand that she wanted him and he would come with her. In the end, Jaime was like every man, his cock doing half his thinking, even more sometimes. Cersei experimented it many times up to now and it proved very useful to reach her goals.

“You look so tired Jaime. Perhaps you need some rest. We could take some time together, like in the old times.” She could see confusion on his face. “I’m sorry I was so harsh with you. With our father’s death and the many duties I have now I tend to act without thinking. I hope you forgive me. You know I love you.”

Confusion was still conspicuous on her lover’s face. She rose from her chair behind her desk, previously her father’s desk. “Let’s go to my chambers. Or we can do it here right now if you wish.”

For a moment her brother looked about to jump on her and make love to her after so much time, but his face turned hard as quickly as the desire appeared. “It’s over. Your little games, they’re over.” He put his hand inside tunic and produced a parchment he dropped immediately before her on the desk. It was Cersei’s turn to be confused.

“What does it mean?”

“Read it. It comes from our son.”

Cersei took the parchment. The seal of the king was on it. She broke it, opened the paper and began to read it. As she read, she had to refrain her screams. How could her son do something like this?

I, Joffrey of the House Baratheon, the First of my Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm, hereby proclaim my grand-uncle, Ser Kevan of the House Lannister, Hand of the King.

I also recuse myself as judge in the trial of my uncle, Lord Tyrion Lannister, previously the Master of Coin, and name the Hand of the King to act as main judge in my stead. Ser Kevan Lannister is to organize the trial as soon as he will arrive in King’s Landing.

In the objective to lessen the burden on my mother, Cersei Lannister, the Queen Regent, after the unforeseen death of her father and my grandfather, Lord Tywin Lannister, I remove her from any participation in the organization of the trial against my uncle.

Let it be known that it is my will.

Cersei couldn’t believe what she was reading. Her son, her own son, was turning against her. Why? She looked at her brother, searching for an explanation. Then she saw it, the smirk on his face. All ideas of sleeping with him left her.

“This is your doing?”

“Are you surprised? You’re not the only one who knows how to play games.”

Cersei couldn’t support this little smile on Jaime’s lips. She looked again at the document. Did he really think a piece of paper would be enough to stop her? She fixed him and tore the paper very slowly to emphasize her gesture, until only very small parts remained of it. It was her turn to smile with satisfaction. “You think a piece of paper will be enough to protect Tyrion? The trial will take place tomorrow. That’s all you won with it.”

Strangely, Jaime didn’t seem affected by this. “Some of the other kingsguards told me you had a passion for tearing papers. Tyrion said the same when I visited him a few days ago and he suggested I had two identical decrees written, sealed, and signed by Joffrey. I see now he was right.”

That was too much. He had gone to talk with their brother. She had given orders to the guards to let no one see Tyrion without her authorization. She would make sure the guards would never repeat their mistake or any mistake ever.

“How did you convince Joffrey to sign it?” She had to know how Jaime had done this. He couldn’t have threatened their son. Joffrey was too brave to fear his uncle.

“I only made him understand that a trial would be very annoying with very long procedures and I hinted that a king had more important matters to attend. I also pointed out that his mother was taking all the decisions ever since his grandfather died, including those to confine him to his chambers, to cancel his wedding, and to prevent him from seeing his bride-to-be. It was probably time that he decides again who was to serve him. I inserted the name of Kevan in the conversation and Joffrey chose him immediately. He told me he once thought about entrusting the North in his hands, and since our uncle is already on his way to the capital, Joffrey believed he was the best choice.”

Uncle Kevan? On his way to King’s Landing? That was impossible! “How does it come he’s riding for King’s Landing? I allowed no ravens to be sent in the past two weeks.”

“Do you think Pycelle follows your orders when his life is threatened?” Jaime took another parchment, much smaller than the previous and obviously made for a raven to carry it. He dropped it on the table as well. “Here’s the answer of our uncle to my message.”

Cersei unrolled the small piece of paper and read it.

_The new of Tywin’s death is horrible. I’m riding right now for King’s Landing with an escort. I should be there very soon to pay my respect to my brother. In the meantime, nothing is to happen to Tyrion and he shall be granted accommodations suited to his name. I’ll settle this matter as soon as I’ll arrive._

As she was done reading it, Cersei tore apart the message. “You think you can act against me like this, you and our uncle? The trial will take place tomorrow, no matter what you do.”

“I’m afraid it won’t. Joffrey saw the message before I brought it to you. He decided to wait for our uncle’s return before the trial took place. Everyone in the Red Keep already knows about it now. And Joffrey started again to spend time with Margaery. She entertains him very much.”

Cersei couldn’t believe what she heard. She wanted to smash her lover’s face. How could she wish to take him into her bed a few minutes ago? Everything she did these last days had been destroyed in a single one by Jaime. How was it possible? Jaime never thought, he laughed at everything and everyone. He said whatever came into his head. He could never have worked out such an elaborate plan. It was the Tyrells, she knew it. Margaery, the little doe-eye whore, or her grandmother, the Queen of Thorns. They were behind it, she had her proofs now. They were working with Tyrion against her, and Jaime stupidly conspired with them to help Tyrion. She would burn them all for this.

Jaime suddenly spoke again. “I think you should drink less, Cersei. It’s not good to keep clear ideas, and it makes us quite unaware of what’s going on around us.” Cersei sprinkled the content of her cup on her brother for the first time in two weeks. “I think I should wear worn and old clothes when I visit you from now on.”

“Ser Osmund!” The kingsguard entered the room immediately. For once he was quick. “Bring my brother to the black cells, the one next to my other brother. If he loves him so much, I’m sure he won’t complain about it.”

Ser Osmund didn’t react immediately. In fact, he took even more time than usual to respond. It allowed Jaime to talk. “Ser Osmund, I am your Lord Commander, chosen by the king himself, my nephew. How do you think he will react when he learns you put both his uncles in prison?” The knight didn’t move.
“Your queen orders you to arrest him!” She shouted at the man, but he did nothing.

“Ser Osmund, I think you are tired. You may go to sleep. I’ll call Ser Balon Swann to take over.” At Jaime’s words, the former sellsword left quickly after a bow. He only was a coward. Cersei was surrounded by cowards and traitors, including her own twin. “By the way, Cersei, Joffrey ordered you to be confined to your own quarters for the next month. He says a week of confinement for him is worth two for anyone else, and since you confined both him and his future wife for a week, he considers it is more than fitting for you. I love you, dear sister.”

Jaime left the room on these words and Cersei fell into despair. Her son turned against her. It was Margaery’s work, for sure. She was working with Tyrion. She would have her strangled in her bed for that. When Cersei would get out, it would be too late. Her uncle Kevan would have arrived. He didn’t know what Tyrion did. He would listen to foolish Jaime and release the little monster. However, there was still a chance. She had to get to Joffrey and speak with him. She could still change everything. She walked furiously toward the door, but when she opened it, half a dozen Lannister guards led by captain Vylarr blocked her path.

“Your Grace, I’m sorry but you are not to leave your rooms. Orders from the king.” Vylarr spoke firmly when he said that. He was a traitor as well. Cersei turned her heels. It was useless to try an escape. She would take care of all these traitors as soon as she would be free. She had a month to prepare plans for that and to determine how to make her uncle see the truth about Tyrion.

Cersei went back to her desk and smashed a jug of wine on the wall. When she finally calmed an hour later, she poured herself another cup of wine from another jug. That was an unexpected turn of events, but she would turn it against her enemies. She swore it. If her uncle came and decided to hold a trial for Tyrion all the same, and she would make sure there was a trial, the case she built against him was more than enough to prove to anyone that he killed the Hand of the King and plotted to kill the king. Cersei would have her revenge, sooner or later.

However, she was afraid too. There were some uncertainties. Her brother would tell Kevan that Tyrion was innocent and he may value Jaime’s point of view because he was a man. Also, Tyrion’s squire refused to testify against him, and there was his whore too. She escaped. Varys told her she took a ship not long after Tyrion’s arrest. The eunuch hadn’t been able to discover which ship, but he thought she probably left for the Free Cities and so was out of reach. Cersei wanted to put a bounty for everyone who would bring her back, but the Master of Whisperers pointed out that it would cause too much problem. The girl wasn’t easily recognizable and it would bring whores from all across the world to King’s Landing because of all the opportunists who would bring the first whore they saw with black hair and black eyes in the hope it would be her. Finally Cersei abandoned the idea of the bounty. She didn’t want to see hundreds of whores processing before her. All the same, she wished she put her hand on the girl before she left. The whore could have said so much about the monster during the trial. She should have taken care of her as soon as her father died, but she had better things to do back then than to worry about whores.

She looked at her father’s chest on the desk. She couldn’t find the keys to open it and no one in the Red Keep was able to open it without them. She let her left hand wander under the desk as she continued to drink. However, at one moment, her hand brushed a bulge under the desk’s surface. She gripped it and felt something that looked like a knob. She tried to pull it, but nothing happened. She then tried to turn it. There was a click and a little trapdoor appeared right before her on the desk. There was a single key inside. How clever her father had been. She knew what the key was for. She retrieved it and used it on the chest. It opened.

Inside were some golden coins, but essentially official papers. Cersei didn’t think her father would complain about her opening his letters since he was dead. She was his one true daughter and had the task to continue his work. Most of the documents were royal decrees or letters her father made not long before his death. None of them were quite important. However, there was a paper that brought her attention. It didn’t bear the seal of the Hand of the King or the stag, but the lion sigil. It was the seal of the Lord of Casterly Rock. The words this letter contained surprised her. It was a will. From the date on it, it was written the day preceding her father’s death. It seemed strange to her that her father would write a new will right before he was killed.

The beginning of the will wasn’t surprising in itself. Her father once again made Jaime his heir. However, as she read the rest, fury spread through all her body. Her father only let her gold. It was a lot of gold, but it didn’t matter. She wasn’t mentioned a single time about the inheritance of Casterly Rock. She was his daughter. If Jaime refused Casterly Rock, it should be hers by all rights. Instead, he named Tyrion’s son his heir if Jaime refused to inherit. He made Kevan the Regent of the Rock if the boy was unable to rule and, even worse, made Tyrion Regent if Kevan was dead. Cersei couldn’t swallow it. Casterly Rock was hers. It didn’t belong to this monster. She burnt the will with a candle and watched the last words of her father burn away. No one would ever know about it. That couldn’t be the last words of her father.

Realization came to Cersei then. Of course, it wasn’t her father’s work. She knew from Varys that Tyrion visited their father late the day before he died. That was probably the time when he poisoned him, but he could also have written a false will that would give him Casterly Rock. Tyrion already had Winterfell through his wife, but of course he wouldn’t settle only for the North. He wanted the Westerlands as well, and probably the Iron Throne once she and her children would be dead. She held him now. She had discovered all his secret plans and would use them against him. It didn’t matter that she was confined in her rooms.

Cersei emptied another glass of wine. How much did she take this evening? She didn’t know and didn’t care. She was condemned to stay in these rooms for a long time, so better enjoy it. When she would leave, they would all pay for their treachery. Jaime, Vylarr, Ser Osmund, Margaery, Pycelle, Olenna Tyrell, all the other people of the Reach, and especially Tyrion. He would be the first to pay for what he did. The first to suffer the anger of the lioness.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Chapter Notes

We saw in the previous chapters the consequences of Tywin's unexpected death and how Cersei tried to seize the power in King's Landing before the power vacuum. However, she didn't expect Jaime and Joffrey to turn against her or Kevan to come. Cersei is temporarily neutralized and she burnt the will Tywin wrote not long before his death. During this time, Sansa remained as discreet as possible, but now the situation is different. How will she react to this?

This chapter and the next one are a turning point for Sansa who will have to take a critical decision for her and Tyrion. Enjoy it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Sansa VI

Sansa knelt in the godswood to pray. For the first time in two weeks she dared to leave her rooms. She couldn’t support anymore to stay locked in her chamber, especially since she had no more company. Shae disappeared two days after Tyrion’s arrest. Podrick informed her she returned to Lorath. Apparently she received a message from a sister who needed her help. Sansa didn’t know Shae had a sister. In fact, Sansa didn’t know anything about Shae’s family. Her friend never talked about it. It seemed it was a subject she preferred to avoid. Sansa couldn’t blame her. Her own family wasn’t something she wanted to talk very much. But now, Shae was gone.

Sansa had wept the night after Shae’s departure. Shae was the only close friend she had here in King’s Landing. Margaery was her friend, it was true, but she wasn’t able to speak with Sansa as often as Shae, and her friendship was partially for political reasons. The Tyrells wanted her claim. The only difference was that Margaery probably wanted her friendship as well as her claim, and that was why she continued to see her, though not as often as before. Only the friendship was left. With the confinement, she couldn’t see Margaery anyway. After they were allowed to travel through the Red Keep again, Sansa didn’t dare to leave her rooms in fear of Joffrey, Cersei or anyone else. Her husband was in a cell. What would happen to her? There was Bronn who stood guard before her door, but he was a sellsword. He could abandon her if Podrick stopped to pay him or if someone offered him something better. She had noticed recently that he wasn’t as often before her door as in the first days following Tyrion’s detention.

As for Ser Jaime Lannister and this woman who accompanied him, Brienne of Tarth, Sansa didn’t trust them. The woman claimed she served her mother before she died and that she swore to protect her and Arya. Sansa could hardly imagine her mother having a woman to defend her. Also, this woman was the one who killed Renly Baratheon. What an explanation she gave for his death. A shadow! If she needed to lie, she could at least tell lies that could be believed. However, after some reflections, Sansa wondered if she said the truth. Unless the woman was very stupid, she would have told something more plausible. There was also the details she gave about her, things that only a member of her family or someone who lived at Winterfell could have said. However, the story of the shadow was simply impossible. She was lying, and that meant she was stupid. Sansa didn’t need someone stupid and a liar to protect her. She probably escaped with her mother from Lord Renly’s camp after the assassination and released Jaime Lannister herself, surely hoping to get a pardon or some other reward for that. If she was free to walk around the castle, it was proof enough that she got it. As for Ser Jaime, she wasn’t about to trust Cersei’s lover and Joffrey’s father, a man who forsook all his vows. Sansa wanted to vomit when she thought she found him handsome when he came to Winterfell. The Hound had more honor than him. After the tale Tyrion told her about his first wife, she was less than inclined to accept Ser Jaime’s help. Most likely he was working for Cersei. She made it clear to them when they visited her that she wanted nothing from them.

Sansa began to pray. She prayed for her family who was dead. There wasn’t a clear conception of afterlife in the faith of her father, but she lost nothing in praying for it all the same. She could pray for the Seven, but she didn’t want to go to the sept of the Keep. She could meet undesirable people. Here in the godswood she was alone. After she was done praying for her family, she prayed for Shae. She wanted her to be safe, and she prayed for Shae to never forget her. With some hope, they would meet again someday. It was a desperate hope, but she wanted to cling to it all the same. She also prayed for Ser Dontos, then for Margaery and her family. The Tyrells may have rejected her, but they were still better people than the Lannisters, except one. She also prayed for Podrick, Tyrion’s squire. By habit, she prayed for a short winter, though she could feel the one that was coming would be long. She prayed for Jon, her only relative still alive. Finally, she prayed for her husband.

She was more than worried for Tyrion. She didn’t want him to die, but the conviction that he would only leave the black cells to be beheaded became stronger and stronger in her every day. She had come to trust him after the night they spent together, and Cersei arrested him right after it. She didn’t love Tyrion. She could never love him. In fact, Sansa didn’t think she could ever love someone again. All the same, Tyrion was the closest person she could consider a friend now, and he was in a cell. She prayed the old gods to free him. She even went as far as to promise them she would convert him to her faith if they let him live. That would be hard to do, as unbelieving Tyrion was, but Sansa was ready to do anything to save him now. He was the only protection she had here in King’s Landing. What would happen if Cersei’s words turned out true? I’m afraid you’ll be a widow very soon. She would be forced to marry someone else. She didn’t want to marry again. Tyrion was kind with her. How would be her next husband? She wanted Tyrion to get out alive of this, but she couldn’t see how. She didn’t know what to do.

Suddenly, Sansa heard a creak. She was sure she heard one. She turned her head back and saw him. It was Ser Dontos Hollard, hiding in the shadow of the trees. Sansa was happy it was him. She feared it could be Joffrey for a moment. It took her a lot of courage only to come here.

She rose to greet the disgraced knight. “Ser Dontos.” She forced a smile upon her lips.

“We need to talk. Please follow me.” He spoke with a low voice. It was barely a whisper. He walked away and, after a moment of hesitation, Sansa decided to follow him. She could trust him.

The path wasn’t long. They arrived very quickly to the same place they talked the last time, when he gave her his family’s necklace. Sansa still had it among her things, but she didn’t have an opportunity to wear it up to now. She was planning to have it on her during the royal wedding, but for now no one could tell for sure there would be a royal wedding.

Ser Dontos was obviously drunk as always, but he spoke nonetheless. “My lady, I’m sorry about it, but no one can hear us here. You must repeat this to no one. I can help you.”

Sansa was confused. “Help me? Help me about what?”

“I can help you to get out of King’s Landing.”
The words echoed through Sansa’s mind. Get out of King’s Landing. Get out of King’s Landing. Get out of King’s Landing. “How?”

“There is a ship that belongs to a friend of yours that will be waiting for you in the Blackwater Bay tonight. You only have to come to the godswood at the hour of the wolf. From there I will lead you out of the city.”

Sansa couldn’t believe what she was hearing. It was too wonderful to be true. She could leave King’s Landing. She could get away from Joffrey, from Cersei, from all the Lannisters, escape all the torments she suffered for the last two years. She could go back home. She would leave… Tyrion.

The last thought didn’t really fill her with joy. She realized how silly she was. She couldn’t go back home. Winterfell was burnt, perhaps in the hands of the Boltons now. She had nowhere to go.

“Ser Dontos, that’s very kind of you, but I can’t leave. I have nowhere to go now. All my family is dead, my home has been destroyed. I don’t know where else I can go.”

“Your friend will bring you somewhere safe. He will keep you away from the Lannisters.”

“Who is this friend?”

“A great friend of your family. He didn’t give me his name, but he cares about you. He only wants to see you safe and he has the means to get you to safety.”

What Ser Dontos told her wasn’t very specific. He was asking her to believe him when a man he didn’t even know told him that he wanted to bring her somewhere safe. “Where would he bring me?”

“He didn’t tell me, but he has a lot of resources. He’ll able to keep you safe. He is a friend of your family.”

Ser Dontos was drunk all the time. Sansa didn’t think he knew for sure what he was talking about. He was telling her that he could help her to escape King’s Landing, but couldn’t tell her who he worked with and where this someone would bring her. It seemed to be a plan worthy of a fool. “Ser Dontos, how can you be sure this man is really a friend of my family? You don’t even know who he is, and you don’t know either where I will go. How can I trust someone like him?”

“Do you trust me? Do you think I would suggest it to you if I wasn’t sure? I am a knight no more, but I’m alive thanks to you. I don’t want to see you killed by the queen or the king. I can help you to escape this place forever. For one time in my life, let me be a true knight, not the drunken fool I was even when I wore my armor.”

Sansa couldn’t help but feel pity for the man. He had been a knight and Joffrey stripped him of all his titles. Now he probably only wanted to gain back some of his lost honor by saving her, but his plan didn’t seem well designed. Sansa didn’t know who this friend of hers was. She couldn’t trust him. “Ser Dontos, I don’t think I can leave.”

“You can, if you want. You’ve been here for too long, supporting all bad treatments the Lannisters inflicted on you. I was there when the king ordered his kingsguard to beat you. I wish I would have done something, but I didn’t dare to. It’s no more time to hide. We must accept to take risks, or else we will only be victims all the time. It may be too late for me, but not for you. Your family still has friends and they are ready to help you. You can stop to be a victim and I want to help in this. I beg you, my lady. I don’t want to see you mistreated again, or die, after you saved me. Let me save you in return.”
Sansa didn’t know what to say to that. After a moment, Ser Dontos spoke again. “Just come here at the hour of the wolf and I will make sure you escape. You will be free.” The disgraced knight turned on his heels and walked away on unsteady feet. After a moment, Sansa left too and went back to her chambers. By chance, she didn’t meet Joffrey, the queen, Ser Jaime or any kingsguard on her way. She started to do some needlework again, as she did often these days. She didn’t have much else to do.

She thought again about Ser Dontos’s words. It was true, ever since Lady’s death, Sansa was nothing more than a victim, a pawn in the game of thrones. She never did anything to play a role. She always let the others choose her role for her. She never attempted to do anything on her own. She didn’t even try to help her family here in King’s Landing. Margaery managed to help the Tyrells in her own way, but Sansa never did. Margaery told her that she could have influence and power, but Sansa didn’t listen to her. She was only a little bird who sang the same song all time. She always waited for a tall and handsome knight in shining armor to save her. She never tried to save herself, nor to save her family. She stayed behind while the rest of her family was fighting for her. She had only been a survivor.

Could she escape? She could try, but what if she was caught? The man Ser Dontos met could only have made him believe that he was a friend of her family. If Sansa learned something in King’s Landing, it was to never trust anyone. The risk was very high. On the other hand, she never took risks before, and that led her where she was now. She was married to a Lannister who was imprisoned and her future was uncertain. What would happen once Tyrion would die? At the reflection, to stay here may be even more dangerous than an attempt to escape. Once Tyrion was dead, she would have no one to protect her in King’s Landing. Even Shae was gone. Cersei would probably marry her to someone else. Who? She preferred to not imagine what would it be to marry another man, especially at the moment she finally decided she could trust Tyrion. She didn’t want to marry again.

Sansa decided. She had no other choice. She didn’t know who wanted to get her out of King’s Landing, but this friend was her only chance. It was a risk she had to take. If he had resources as Ser Dontos said, perhaps she could use his help to avenge her family. Her father often told her that his bannermen were men of honor, loyal to the Starks. Maybe she could get their help to retake Winterfell. There were so many plans that emerged in Sansa’s head that she put a stop to her ideas after a moment. What a fool she was to think she could rise the North against the Boltons by herself and on the hope this friend would help her. All the same, she had to leave the capital if she ever was to play a real role in this game. She had to survive, for her family. She would go to the godswood this night.

There were flutters in her stomach at the thought she would leave King’s Landing this night, but she was also uncertain if it would work. She and Ser Dontos could get caught. The poor knight would be executed for sure if they were captured. As for her, who knew what Cersei and Joffrey would decide? Would they kill her? Would she stand trial like Tyrion? At the thought of her husband, Sansa felt guilty. If she left, everyone would look at it with suspicion. They might believe she had a role to play in Lord Tywin’s death. Tyrion could find himself in an even worse situation than before. Sadly, there was nothing Sansa could do for Tyrion. He was already condemned, no matter what would happen or what she would do. She couldn’t save him, but she could save herself. One day, she may even make it known to everybody that her husband had been a good man, a man of honor who never mistreated her, who saved her, and that his devilish nephew and his horrible sister killed him on false accusations. She would make sure his memory wouldn’t be stained by his horrible family. That was the least Sansa could do for him.

When afternoon came to an end, Podrick entered the room with her supper. Podrick was sharing the work with her handmaidens ever since Tyrion’s arrest, especially after Shae left. No additional handmaiden was granted to Sansa after Shae’s departure. Sansa feared he could be a spy in Jaime Lannister’s service, even though she highly doubted the squire knew it. He probably thought Ser Jaime was really trying to help his younger brother. She remained silent, not talking to the young boy. However, when he was done placing the plates, he didn’t leave immediately. He stayed there, looking at his feet.

“Podrick?” Sansa didn’t know why he was standing like a statue, but it was best to make him speak so she could get rid of him as quickly as possible. The squire finally looked up.

“Forgive me, my lady. I just thought you might… There have been some developments about Lord Tyrion.”

Podrick caught her interest with that. “What happened?”

“Nothing bad, my lady. Only, the trial will take place no sooner than in a month. King Joffrey appointed Ser Kevan Lannister, Lord Tyrion’s uncle, as Hand of the King. He decided it would be his Hand who would take care of the trial and that Ser Kevan would stand as judge in his stead.”

These news surprised Sansa. She didn’t think Joffrey would abandon his place to judge Tyrion. On the other hand, if that gave Tyrion some more time, she wouldn’t complain. Podrick continued to talk.

“Lord Tyrion never spoke very much about his uncle, but he said he didn’t have anything against my lord. I think he may have a chance to win the trial.” Suddenly, a smile appeared on the boy’s face. That wasn’t a smile Sansa saw often. “Especially since the queen is confined to her rooms.”

At this new, Sansa was agape. “The queen? Confined in her rooms?”

“Yes, my lady. An order from the king. People say he didn’t like to be locked inside his own rooms by the queen after Lord Tywin’s death.”

Sansa wanted to explode with laughter, but she refrained herself. The Queen Regent, the proud Cersei Lannister, was stuck up in her chamber on Joffrey’s order. Perhaps the gods really had a share of justice for her. However, all this seemed so unbelievable. How could the king have decided by himself to lock up his mother? Also, there was the naming of Ser Kevan Lannister as Hand of the King. The queen was the one with real power. Joffrey never did anything without her initiative. What happened for Joffrey to act this way?

“Podrick, may I know how the king came to take these decisions?”

“It was Ser Jaime. He went to speak with him and called Ser Kevan from Casterly Rock. Lord Tyrion is the one who advised him to do so when he visited him in his cell.”

Again Sansa had to repress laughs. Tyrion, even behind bars, was still playing against his sister. Even more, he turned her own son against her. That looked like one of his jokes he made in Sansa’s presence. However, Sansa quickly returned to the reality. If Tyrion did this, it wasn’t just for the pleasure to have Cersei humiliated. Sansa saw him act when he was Hand of the King, and from her conversations with him, before and after their wedding, she knew Tyrion never did anything without a plan. He was planning something. Joffrey’s decision didn’t only delay the trial. It neutralized Cersei and put someone else in charge of the trial, but what difference would it make? If he asked for his uncle to come, he probably hoped Ser Kevan could help him.

“Podrick, what do you know of Ser Kevan Lannister?” Sansa didn’t know a lot about Lord Tywin’s brother. She knew he was a commander of the Lannister armies, one of the main advisors of the late “Well, from what Lord Tyrion told me he seems to be a good man. Lord Tyrion once told me his uncle always showed him respect and didn’t hate him like his father. I don’t think Ser Kevan has anything against my lord. Ser Jaime said their uncle would listen to what he and Lord Tyrion would have to say about their father’s death. He said he would judge him fairly. I think he’s right. Ser Kevan saved my life once.”

“He saved your life?”

“When I served as a squire for a knight in Lord Tywin’s army and that the knight was arrested for borrowing a ham from the lord’s personal stores, I was sentenced to death with him, but Lord Tywin discovered I was a Payne and it was Ser Kevan who suggested to send me to Lord Tyrion instead as a punishment.”

Sansa remained silent for a moment, thinking. “You may leave, Podrick. Thank you for the news.”

“My lady.” The squire bowed his head and left the room.

As she ate, Sansa thought about the turn of events that just happened. Cersei was no more in charge of Tyrion’s trial and Joffrey wouldn’t be among the judges. If what Podrick told her was true, then Ser Kevan would cleanse Tyrion of all the charges against him if he thought he was innocent. Tyrion was innocent, Sansa knew it. It changed a lot of things. Tyrion had a chance to prevail. Yes, it changed a lot of things. Most of all, it changed her plans to escape. Her escape would look suspicious and lower Tyrion’s chances to survive the trial. Furthermore, if Tyrion won, she would benefit his protection once again. She wouldn’t be in danger anymore in King’s Landing and, as Margaery once told her, she could use her influence on Tyrion and as his wife to finally play her own game. She had a chance.

However, there were risks to stay in King’s Landing all the same. Tyrion could still be sentenced to death if his uncle believed him guilty. If it happened, she would be in great trouble. Even if Tyrion survived the trial, Joffrey would still be a danger for her. On the other side, she didn’t think Tyrion would stay in King’s Landing after the trial. He would probably go back to Casterly Rock. As his wife, Sansa would have to follow him. Ser Jaime was a kingsguard, so Tyrion was the heir to Casterly Rock. Sansa didn’t know what to think about this prospect. Margaery’s words came back to her. You could rule the Westerlands with your husband and prevent another war like this one to happen. Don’t turn your back right now to this. The idea to be the Lady of the house who murdered her family was… confusing.

There were so many uncertainties. An hour ago, Sansa had decided she would leave with Ser Dontos tonight, but with the news Podrick just brought to her, she didn’t know anymore what to choose. Each choice presented a lot of dangers. She could end up dead, or worse, in both scenarios. What should she do?

Conflicting thoughts and feelings fought in Sansa’s head for hours. She chose to escape, then to stay, then again to escape, and on, and on. She had to consider too many things. The opportunity to leave King’s Landing. The possibility to become the Lady of the Westerlands. Her fate if people intercepted her while fleeing. Her fate if Tyrion was declared guilty. Tyrion’s fate if she escaped. The possible husband she would be forced to wed if Tyrion died. The uncertainty about this friend who wanted to help her. She couldn’t get her ideas clear. It was impossible for her to take a decision.

Finally, she grabbed the edge of her boudoir with her hands. Her eyes wandered on the surface and stopped at the leather box. She opened it for the first time in two weeks. The golden Lannister lion necklace was still there, where she left it after Tyrion’s arrest. She took it into her hands.

Sansa appreciated Tyrion in some way. He never mistreated her and did his best to help her, but this!
He gave her a symbol of his own family, the people who murdered her brother and her mother, for her name day. Did he want her to look like a Lannister, to make sure people believed she was his wife? Did he mean by that she was a Lannister now? Never forget what you are. He wanted her to know she was a Lannister now. She took the necklace by its pendant in her right hand and closed it in a fist, tightening the jewel. She wanted to break it. She wasn’t a Lannister, and Tyrion was trying to make her believe she was. She would leave him.

Suddenly, Sansa heard a strange sound, some click. It came from the pendant. Did she break it? She opened her palm. For a moment she thought she really broke it. It looked like the surface of the pendant had been separated from the rest. However, when she looked closer, she realized it wasn’t broken. It was open. There was something inside the pendant. The surface with the Lannister sigil could be rotated to reveal what was hidden inside. When Sansa turned it enough she saw what was inside. Her breath stopped.

Inside was another sigil carved in silver. A direwolf. It was her family sigil. It wasn’t a golden Lannister lion necklace. It was a silver Stark direwolf necklace, concealed as a Lannister necklace.
Sansa felt tears coming to her eyes. That was Tyrion’s gift. Never forget what you are. She sat and silently cried. She had been wrong about him. She looked back at the direwolf. She was a Stark. She was a wolf. She knew what she had to do.

When the hour of the wolf came, Sansa left her rooms.

Chapter End Notes

To be clear about something, the idea of the necklace isn't mine. I borrowed it from another fanfiction writer whose stories I like very much. However, the necklace is not entirely the same than in its original form. If you want to know where I got my idea from, read "Never forget what you are, or the medallion" by Pellaeonthewingedlion.

For the people interested in good fanfictions of Game of Thrones, especially if you are a Sansa/Tyrion fan, you must read the two long fanfics of this author if you didn't read them already, "The lesser evil" and "Things we do for love". Only available on Fanfiction.net. I had a lot of inspiration from these stories.

Please review

Next chapter: a knight
Brienne I

Chapter Notes

OK, the first episode in Season 6 went out tonight. That can't be more appropriate. The most surprising is I wrote this chapter weeks ago.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

BRIENNE I

She was standing alone in the darkness, hidden behind a pillar. Brienne had agreed to stand guard during the night before Lady Sansa’s door while the sellsword, Bronn, would stand guard during the day. All the same, Brienne would double his guard many times. She didn’t trust the sellsword. He would sell his sword to the first person who paid him more than Ser Jaime or Lord Tyrion and abandon the Lady Sansa. Brienne couldn’t and wouldn’t abandon her, no matter what happened. She swore a vow to her mother. I will shield your back and give my life for yours if it comes to that. I swear it by the old gods and the new. Now Catelyn Stark was dead. Brienne had failed her, but she wouldn’t fail her daughter.

Brienne didn’t think it was a good idea to keep Sansa Stark here in the Red Keep, even less after Lord Tyrion’s arrest. She wasn’t safe among the Lannisters. Ser Jaime said that she was probably safer here than everywhere else and that he swore to send her back to Lady Stark, but that it was impossible since Lady Stark was dead. Hardly, Brienne had to admit there was some truth in what Ser Jaime said. He also told her that his brother would never let anything happen to his wife and that it was good protection enough. Brienne didn’t really believe it. How could Lady Sansa be safe when she was married to a Lannister? Considering the Lannister in question was accused of murdering his own father, Brienne didn’t believe at all that Lady Catelyn’s daughter was safe here anymore. However, there was nothing Brienne could do. Sansa Stark refused her services when she visited her, so Brienne had no way to get her out of King’s Landing. She couldn’t make her escape against her will after all. Brienne swore to keep Sansa Stark safe, not to obligate her to be safe. She couldn’t impose her services. However, nothing stopped her from keeping an eye on the girl.

Suddenly, she heard a noise coming from Lady Sansa’s door. It opened, then closed, and Brienne heard footsteps on the floor. She carefully looked in the corridor and saw a human shape with a heavy cloak walking in the other direction. This person could only be Sansa Stark. No one else could leave her rooms. Brienne followed her silently, keeping a firm grip on her sword in the scabbard to make sure it wouldn’t make any noise while she walked. She didn’t wear any armor, so she wouldn’t be heard and could move much more easily. She followed her at good distance to prevent the lady from seeing her, but also close enough to not lose her track.

They left Maegor’s Holdfast and Brienne followed her to the godswood. Brienne found it strange that Lady Sansa would come here to pray in the middle of the night. Lady Stark’s daughter sank deeper and deeper into the woods until she reached a place Brienne knew only too well. It was some sort of observation point where she saw Lady Sansa pray before. It was a dead-end and Brienne couldn’t follow her. If Sansa Stark was to turn around, she would come face to face with her if Brienne followed this path. Instead, she followed a parallel path and found a spot where she could see Lady Sansa through the trees and their branches, at least in part. She could see now there was another shape, bigger, with Lady Sansa. She stood still and listened carefully. The two people were whispering, but she managed to hear them.

“I’m glad you could make it.” Brienne didn’t know to who this voice belonged, but she knew it wasn’t Lady Sansa who was speaking. The voice was that of a man and, the way he spoke, Brienne could tell he was drunk. She lived long enough in military camps to recognize a drunken voice miles away from her. “We don’t have much time. The ship could leave without us if we don’t catch it in time.” A ship? What was this man talking about?

“Wait a minute, Ser Dontos. We must talk.” That voice belonged to Sansa Stark, for sure.

“We don’t have the time, my lady. If you want to escape, we must do it now.” Escape? Sansa Stark was leaving King’s Landing? That was what Brienne thought they should have done, but she didn’t know the man the young lady was talking to. She called him Ser Dontos. Who could it be? The name meant nothing for Brienne. Brienne wasn’t sure Lady Sansa would be safe if she escaped with this man. She couldn’t trust him. She had to intervene.

“I’m sorry, Ser Dontos, but I will not leave King’s Landing. I came here to tell you that I’m going to stay.” The declaration of the young lady stopped Brienne in her movement. She listened closely once again.

“My lady, you must come. If you stay here, you may die. You can’t trust the Lannisters. You’re not safe here.” Brienne couldn’t agree more on this. Well, she agreed mostly. There was a Lannister she could trust.

“Ser Dontos, I thank you for what you’ve done for me, but I can’t take that risk. Cersei and Joffrey will put a bounty on my head as soon as they’ll discover I escaped. I won’t be safe anywhere. No one who may be willing to protect me is alive or able to protect me. I would end up dead outside as well. Here in King’s Landing, I may have a chance.”

“You won’t have any chance here. Not with Joffrey or the queen. After they are done with your husband, you will be the next.”

“The Lannisters will never allow Joffrey to kill me. I am the key to the North, they need me. Anyway, Tyrion may have a chance to get out of this alive. His uncle Kevan is coming to take care of the trial and he doesn’t despise Tyrion like the queen and the king do. If I leave, people will find it suspicious and may believe that I escaped because I helped him to kill his father. I don’t want him to die because of me.” Brienne was locked by Lady Sansa’s last words. I don’t want him to die because of me. Could it be possible she cared about her husband? That was impossible. Lord Tyrion was a dwarf, with a reputation for whoring and drinking, and a Lannister. Even so, Brienne had to admit the last argument didn’t really matter. After all, Ser Jaime was a Lannister as well. All the same, Lady Stark told her her daughter loved stories about knights and maidens, the same Brienne loved once when she was a child, and that she always wanted to marry one of the handsome knights or lords from the songs. Brienne could hardly reconcile it with what she just heard.

“He is a member of the family who slaughtered yours. He probably had a part in it. Even if he is declared not guilty, you will still be his wife and a prisoner. You will also be a prisoner if he is executed. You don’t have to be a prisoner anymore. You don’t owe him anything. Come with me, and you will be free.”

Brienne could only approve the words again. Only, Sansa Stark suddenly talked again. “I will never be free. I am a woman, and I will have to marry someone whatever happens, unless I become a septa, a Silent Sister, or a whore. I am in a prison right now, it’s true, but it is a wide prison. I am not constrained into a single cell. My cell is always opened, I can walk freely everywhere in the prison and talk to everyone I want. There are gaolers who want to hurt me, but there is one who is here to protect me from them. The exit to the prison may be closed, but my life is good inside, and to take the exit would mean to enter another prison, where I will probably not have the same freedom than the one I have now. The only way for me to stay into that prison, it’s for Tyrion to live.” Her voice turned more aggressive. “You are wrong. I owe him a lot of things. You were there when Joffrey had me beaten, you saw him save me. He also tried to save me during the riot. He wasn’t the one to save me, but he tried all the same. He was the only one in the Red Keep to tell me he was sorry for my father after he was killed. He even tried to send me back to my mother when he was Hand of the King.” Brienne knew what Lady Sansa was talking about. It was Lord Tyrion who made the deal with Lady Catelyn to exchange Sansa and Arya Stark for his brother. If only they knew then that Arya Stark had disappeared. “He never wanted to marry me, no more than I wanted to marry him.
He spared me the bedding ceremony at our wedding. He refused to consummate our marriage without my consent. He never touched me. He never mistreated me. He protected me against the rest of his family. Even when his father threatened to force him to rape me, he refused. He may be a Lannister, but he is a good man all the same. He may be a whoremonger and a drunkard, but he is also kind and brave and gentle and strong. He may be a dwarf, but he is a bigger man than he looks.
A very small man can cast a very large shadow.”

When she was done speaking, a huge silence followed. Brienne followed this silence, and not because she didn’t want to be located. She was agape at the words of Lady Sansa Stark. She had spoken so highly of her husband, Brienne had the impression she could have been speaking of her father, her mother or her brother. The way she spoke remembered Brienne so much of Lady Catelyn, but it was her praise of Lord Tyrion that let Brienne so thoughtful. Lord Tyrion Lannister had such a bad reputation, and yet Sansa Stark stood, a few feet from her, defending his honor. Brienne didn’t know all of this about Lord Tyrion. Ser Jaime assured her that his brother would protect Lady Stark’s daughter. Brienne hadn’t believed him when he told her, but now she thought he might have been right. If Lady Sansa was speaking this way of Lord Tyrion, what Ser Jaime told her had to be true.

It reminded Brienne of her opinion on Jaime Lannister before she met him. He was the Kingslayer, an oathbreaker, a man without honor. He killed the king he was sworn to serve, pushed a ten-years-old boy from the top of a tower, slept with his own sister and had children with her. And yet, he was a man of honor in his own way. He was despised by everybody because he forsook a vow, and yet he saved half a million people by forsaking his vows. So many vows. They make you swear and swear. Defend the king, obey the king, obey your father, protect the innocent, defend the weak. But what if your father despises the king? What if the king massacres the innocent? It’s too much. No matter what you do, you’re forsaking one vow or another. Brienne understood what he meant later, in the bathtub at Harrenhal. Tell me, if your precious Renly commanded you to kill your own father and stand by while thousands of men, women, and children burned alive, would you have done it?
Would you have kept your oath then? That was the real story of the Kingslayer. With everything Brienne heard from Lady Sansa, it seemed there was something hidden about the Imp as well.

“You can be free of the Lannisters. I beg you, my lady, this opportunity won’t present itself again.
There is too much risk for you here in the capital. You can escape all this right now. Your friend will help you.” Ser Dontos spoke again. He was pleading now.

“I have friends here,” Lady Sansa replied. “I have one in a cell, and I don’t intend to abandon him. It may be dangerous to stay here, but it will be dangerous outside as well. I’m done with hiding and fleeing. I’m going to fight now, and I will fight here, in King’s Landing.” The resolve in Lady Sansa’s voice reminded Brienne again of her mother. She continued to speak. “I will never forget what you have done for me, Ser Dontos, but I don’t need it. I will not escape, and I will not put your life in danger for mine either. Let’s pretend all of this never happened.”
Lady Sansa had obviously turned her heels. Brienne heard footsteps. She was relieved. She didn’t lose Lady Stark’s daughter. She would still be able to keep her safe. She was about to walk away when she heard muffled cries.

“I’m sorry, my lady, but I was promised a lot of gold for bringing you. I wanted to bring you willingly, but it seems I’ll have no choice. I’m taking you to your friend, no matter what you say.”

Brienne understood immediately. The man was kidnapping Sansa Stark. Brienne drew her sword, ran over the path and went down to the other one where Lady Sansa and her abductor were. When she reached them, they were still at the same place, Lady Sansa struggling of all her forces against the man’s grip.

“Let her go!”, Brienne shouted, her sword raised. The man turned towards her. When Lady Sansa laid her eyes on Brienne, she could see the surprise in her eyes. The Stark girl didn’t think she would be following her, but Brienne had taken a vow and she would respect it.

The man drew a dagger and brought it to the young girl’s throat. “You make a single move in our direction, and she dies. Now drop your weapon.” Brienne wanted to curse. She couldn’t do anything. If she tried to disarm the man, Sansa Stark died. If she did nothing and stepped aside, she would lose her and Lady Stark’s daughter wouldn’t be safe any longer. She had sworn to protect Sansa Stark, and she was about to fail. She would fail Lady Stark again. “Drop your weapon!” His dagger was close to Sansa’s throat. She couldn’t defeat him before he killed her. There was nothing she could do. She couldn’t let Sansa Stark die. As she was still thinking about throwing her sword or not, blood spurted all of a sudden near Lady Sansa’s throat. It couldn’t be!

Both people standing before Brienne fell on the ground together. Brienne ran to them, separating the girl from the knight as soon as she reached them. When she was close enough, she realized there was an arrow in Ser Dontos’s throat. The blood came from it. He was dead. She turned her attention very quickly to Lady Sansa.

“My lady, are you alright?” The young woman tried to crawl away from her, but Brienne caught her two shoulders with her hands. “Lady Sansa, I’m not here to hurt you. I’m here to help you. Are you hurt somewhere?”

Sansa Stark was looking at her with distress. Brienne wasn’t surprised. For people who never saw blood before, or at least whose life hadn’t been in danger directly before, there were more than enough reasons to be in this state. Brienne looked at her neck where the dagger had been. There only was a little cut, nothing serious. Brienne would be able to take care of it easily. As for the blood on her, it was the man’s blood. It was no surprise since the arrow pierced his throat while he was holding Lady Sansa. Suddenly Brienne realized something wasn’t normal. Where this arrow was coming from? They had to get out of here, but before Brienne could do anything she heard someone running behind her. She seized her sword that she let on the ground when she had looked closer to Lady Sansa and turned to face the outsider. She would protect Sansa Stark’s life with the steel from Lord Eddard Stark’s sword.

As black shape appeared before her. It had a quiver on his back and a sword in his hand. Brienne couldn’t see his face. The moon was high in a sky free of clouds, but it was in the back of the shape, so his chest was in the dark.

“Alright my lady, we can both lower our sword. I think we have the same objective right now.” Brienne was startled by the voice. She knew it. It was Ser Bronn of Blackwater, the Imp’s sellsword. He was wearing his black chainmail, as always. No wonder Brienne hadn’t seen him. It was the perfect disguise to be unnoticed at night. But Brienne refused to lower her sword. This man was a sellsword, without loyalty to anybody. Who knew why he was here at this hour?
“Tell me what you are doing here first.”

“So, that’s how you thank someone who just saved the lady you swore to protect? Very well. I was coming back from a brothel when I saw you wandering in a corridor. Since you’re supposed to guard the lady during the night, I thought something might be going on, so I followed you very quietly. I remained on the balcony up there and I watched the conversation between the lady and the fool.”

“You were spying on her?”

“As you were,” Brienne had to admit it was true. She thought what the man did wasn’t honorable when she did exactly the same thing. “I had a few arrows with me. Sometimes we can hunt something interesting in the godswood. When the fool grabbed the lady, I notched an arrow and waited for the right time to loose it in his throat or his head. And you proved to be a welcomed distraction since he stopped to move in order to face you.”

What he said made sense, but Brienne wasn’t ready to trust him all the same. Perhaps she was only angry at him because he saved Lady Sansa when it was her duty, but he could have other motivations too. What if he was there to kidnap Lady Sansa too? The man he just killed said he was promised a lot of gold for her. The sellsword could be tempted to kidnap her himself to get the gold. Only money interested him.

“How should I trust you? You are a sellsword. Who tells me you’re not working for the queen? Who tells me you’re not here to abduct her yourself?” She waited for the sellsword’s answer.

“Well, I have nothing to gain from that. Podrick and Ser Jaime both pay me to protect her. She is the wife of the little man who hired me before, and if he gets out of this adventure alive, I don’t think he will be very happy if I don’t protect her. He may stop to pay me for that. And to be honest, the queen isn’t someone I would relish to work for. She would have to pay very much for me to accept. Anyway, if I wanted to kidnap her, I could have done it a long time ago and on many occasions. Why would I decide to do it now? Furthermore, you don’t have much choice to trust me.”

“Why? You could go to the queen and tell her everything.” Brienne wasn’t ready to collaborate with a sellsword.

“Seven hells. How could Jaime Lannister spend so much time with you without smashing your head? I have no interest to tell her, as I just explained you. And what are you going to do? Kill me? First, I’m not sure you’ll succeed. Second, people will find it strange if they find two bodies here in the morning. They will quickly make the link with you. And you’re not the only one who will be in trouble, but the young lady also. People know she often comes to pray here. So, we can make sure together to bring the lady safely to her chambers, or we can fight like two stupid knights and place her in an even more dangerous situation than she’s already in. For all three of us, I think it would be best we work together. So, do we lower our swords?”

Brienne had nothing to reply to the speech. It was true, to fight this man would put Lady Sansa in danger. She had no choice but to trust him for now. However, she wouldn’t guard down. “You first.” If they were to lower their weapons, she would make sure the mercenary wouldn’t play her some trick.

The dark shape sighed. “Very well, if it takes that for you.” He sheathed his sword. “Are you happy now?” Brienne lowered her sword in return, but didn’t sheath it. “It’s really difficult to gain your trust. The one-handed man was right about you.”

Ser Jaime talked to this man? And he hired him? Perhaps she could allow him some trust finally. She sheathed her sword and turned back to Sansa Stark. She was still on the ground, shivering. Her eyes were fixed on the body that lay at her feet. “My lady, we cannot stay here. Follow me, I will bring you back to your rooms.”

Brienne reached out for her. Lady Sansa stared at her as if she was someone she never saw before. After a moment, she took the hand Brienne extended and got on her feet. She looked at Brienne, then at the sellsword. “Thank you. Both of you.”

“Better go quickly to your chamber before someone notices you’re not there. I’ll take care of the body. I know a place where no one will ever find it. Take care of the lady.” The sellsword went to the body after he talked. Brienne escorted Lady Sansa out of the godswood. She still didn’t entirely trust the man, but she preferred him to erase any trail they might leave instead of bringing Lady Sansa back to safety. Anyway, the man was certainly better than her for this kind of things.

As Brienne accompanied Lady Sansa, she saw that she was regaining some of her calm. She wasn’t shivering anymore, but Brienne could feel she was still afraid. She would protect her, no matter what happened. She swore a vow.

When they arrived to her chamber and entered it, most of the fear left Lady Catelyn’s daughter. Brienne could see it. She had in some way the same courage and the same determination than her mother. Brienne took care of the little cut on her neck. It wasn’t much. It would leave no scar and be gone entirely in a day.

“Thank you, Lady Brienne.” Brienne bowed her head in thanks. She was done taking care of her wound. She guessed she would have some explanations to give now. “How did you come to be here? Were you following me?”

Brienne conceded. “I was, my lady. You refused my services, but Ser Jaime thought it would be better if we divided the guard before your door between Ser Bronn and me.”

“Why? I refused your services. I told you I didn’t want your help, that I didn’t need it.”

“With all my respects, my lady, you needed it. Without me and Ser Bronn, who knows where you would be right now? If one of us hadn’t been there, this man who tried to abduct you may have succeeded. You may even be dead.”

“Of course I know, I’m not stupid. What I mean is why did you do it?”

Brienne took a great inspiration before she talked. “I swore to your mother before she died that I would bring you and your sister back alive and safe to her. Your mother may be dead, but my oath still holds.”

Lady Sansa looked back at her with a strange expression. Brienne had the impression she was studying her. “Is it true, what Ser Jaime said? Did Tyrion and my mother make a secret deal?”

“They did it. Lord Tyrion sent your father’s bones to your mother when she was with Lord Renly’s army. He proposed her to exchange his brother against you and your sister Arya. When Lord Renly was killed, we both went back to your brother’s army. Ser Jaime tried to escape and killed the son of Lord Rickard Karstark. He was about to be killed by your brother’s bannermen. Your mother released him and made him promise to send you and Arya back to her once he would reach King’s Landing. I swore the same, but we arrived too late. Your mother was dead when we finally came here.”

Sansa Stark was still looking at her with the same expression. She didn’t seem indifferent to what she was saying like the last time. “Why did you serve my mother? You were a kingsguard for one of my brother’s enemy. Why?”

“I had nowhere to go, and no way to avenge my king. Your mother was there with me when he was assassinated. She convinced me to escape with her before Renly’s men kill me. Your mother was good to me. She was brave, and strong. Not the bravery or the strength of a knight, but another kind of bravery and strength. I swore to watch her back. I wished I had been at the Twins to protect her. The only thing I have left now is to protect her daughters, but your sister is nowhere to be found. To protect you is all I can do for her now to honor my vows.”

The girl facing her remained silent for a moment, still looking at her closely. “Did Renly Baratheon really die the way you pretended? Was he really killed by a shadow?”

Brienne knew it would seem stupid to anyone who didn’t see it, but it was the truth. “Yes, with the face of Stannis Baratheon. I know you don’t believe me, but I am telling the truth. Your mother convinced me to escape with her because she was there and she saw that I didn’t do it. She saw the shadow just like me and knew no one would believe us if we stayed. That’s why she took me with her.”

A lingering silent followed. “I believe you.” Brienne was surprised, but relieved to hear this from Lady Stark’s daughter. “Lady Brienne, you proved that you were sincere in your will to protect me. There are not many people I can trust here in the capital. I accept your services.”

Brienne unsheathed her sword and laid it at the feet of Lady Sansa Stark, then knelt before her. “I am yours, my lady. I will shield your back and give my life for yours if it comes to that. I swear it by the old gods and the new.”

Sansa Stark took Brienne by her shoulder. “If you ever need help one day, I will do everything in my power to provide it to you. I swear it by the old gods and the new.” Brienne rose up and sheathed her sword. She had someone to serve again. “This is valyrian steel. How did you come to have a sword like that?”

Brienne was startled by the question. She had to be honest, now that she was in Lady Sansa’s service. “This sword was given to me by Ser Jaime. It was forged for him by his father, Lord Tywin Lannister.”

“How is that possible? No valyrian steel sword has ever been forged since the Doom of Valyria.”

“The steel comes from your father’s sword, Ice.” She saw utter surprise on Lady Sansa’s face when she revealed the truth. “I’m sorry, my lady. Lord Tywin melted it down after your mother’s death. Ser Jaime gave it to me because he wanted me to protect you with the steel of your father’s sword.”

Lady Sansa remained silent for a time, but the next question surprised Brienne a lot. “Do you trust Ser Jaime?”

Brienne nodded with her head. “I trust him. He saved my life at Harrenhal.”

“How?”

“While we travelled to King’s Landing, Bolton men caught us. Ser Jaime made them believe that my father was very rich and would pay handsomely for my return. He saved me from raping. Afterwards, when they brought us to Harrenhal, Roose Bolton sent Ser Jaime on his way to King’s Landing while he kept me at Harrenhal for high treason. His men sent me into a pit with a wooden sword against a bear, after he left for the Twins. Ser Jaime forced the guards Roose Bolton charged to bring him to the capital to return to Harrenhal and saved me.” An awkward silence followed. Lady Sansa really seemed to have some difficulties to believe what Brienne just told her. “He wants to hold the vow he made to your mother. He really wants to help you, and he wants to help his brother.”

“Why? I may understand he wants to protect Tyrion, but why does he want to respect his promise so much? He was forced to make this promise if he wanted to live. It was a vow with a sword on his neck. Why does he put so much significance on a promise my mother forced him to make when he broke so many vows he made willingly?”

“He’s not who you believe, my lady. I had the same misconception about him when I met him the first time. You don’t know the circumstances in which he killed the Mad King.”

“What were the circumstances?”

Brienne could tell her, and she had to. For Ser Jaime, and for the vow who linked her to Lady Sansa now. “When Tywin Lannister marched on the capital with his army, Ser Jaime told the king to not open the gates for him. He told him that his father would never pick the losing side. The Mad King opened the gates nonetheless, and the Lannister men sacked the city. Ser Jaime begged the king again to surrender peacefully, but instead he ordered him to kill his father and to bring him his head. Then he ordered pyromancers to burn King’s Landing. He had hidden wildfire all over the city in the previous months. Ser Jaime killed him at this moment. He saved the life of hundreds of thousand people. That’s why he’s called the Kingslayer.”

Sansa Stark was staring at her, unbelieving. However, she was pleased by the words that came out of her mouth. “It seems the Lannisters are not all bad people finally.”

A new silence lingered. “My lady, do you need rest? I can stand guard before your door for the night.”

“Yes, thank you. I need it.”

Brienne went to leave the room, but she stopped before she reached the door. She had questions to ask to Lady Sansa. “My lady, if I may ask, who was this man in the godswood? Why did he offer you to escape?”

Lady Sansa looked up at Brienne. “His name was Ser Dontos Hollard. He was a knight once, but Joffrey made him his fool when he came drunk at the tournament for his seventeenth name day. He wanted to flood him in wine, but I persuaded the king to let him live. I thought he only wanted to help me. It seems that finally he did it for gold. He tried to kidnap me.” The last words were spoken on a hard tone.

“There are not many true knights left today.” Brienne knew what she was talking about. She spent enough time with so called honorable knights to know many of them had no honor. Renly was no knight and no warrior, but he had more honor than these men. “Do you have an idea who could have paid him?”

“I have none. I’ll need to think about it.”

“My lady, I’m sorry, but I heard everything you told him. You don’t mean to leave King’s Landing, do you?”

“No. I won’t leave.”

“What will you do then?”
Lady Sansa Stark looked again at Brienne. She could only see determination and strong will in her eyes. “I will win the trial of my husband.” At this moment, Brienne knew without any doubt that she stood before the daughter of Lady Catelyn Stark.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Tyrion VIII

Chapter Notes

It has been 10 chapters since the last Tyrion's POV. Sorry for that, but there isn't much that happens when you're in prison. Sansa will be the main character of the fic for some time, but here is a Tyrion chapter, to see how things are going for him, including in his head.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TYRION VIII

Tyrion’s new cell was much better than the previous one. He was no more in the black cells, but in the tower cells now. His brother came himself to take him out of the dungeons and told him everything. The plan he and Tyrion devised worked perfectly. In fact, Tyrion was the one to devise the plan. Jaime only asked questions when he doubted it would work, but Tyrion managed to convince him to do it all the same. The results were quite visible. Jaime had already called their uncle Kevan from Casterly Rock. It gave Tyrion an opportunity and an idea. If Kevan was the one to see to the trial, Tyrion would have a million more chances to survive than if Cersei was the one organizing it.

Tyrion had to admit it had been funny. Well, in the beginning he feared Jaime wouldn’t be able to execute the plan, but after he did it, Tyrion jubilated. Their sister was so headstrong and arrogant, as always. She saw enemies everywhere, except some places where her most dangerous enemies actually were, and her most dangerous enemy, if awaken, was her son. She confined everyone after their father’s death, from the king to the gaolers. Joffrey was furious of this of course, but he wouldn’t do anything about it unless someone made him understand he could. And Jaime did it so perfectly. Now, Cersei was sealed in her rooms. The few simple-minded fools who followed her would do nothing to help her. Her son, his future bride, the Tyrells, Jaime, many of the lords and ladies in the Red Keep, the smallfolk… so many people hated her. Those who didn’t hate her had no love for her. The few loyal to her wouldn’t dare to help her in her actual situation. Tyrion appreciated very much being able to outsmart Cersei like he did when he was Hand of the King. The most beautiful in all that was that he had done it from a cell. As always, Cersei only looked in one direction when she acted and never considered the overall consequences of her actions. Tyrion doubted she would learn it very soon.

Tyrion’s situation was now much better than before. His trial would take place in a month at best, the time Kevan needed to arrive in the capital. He was now living in a cell that only had the bars of a cell. He had a comfortable bed, complete furnishings, chairs, a table, food and wine in quality and quantity, a chamber pot and windows that allowed the sun to enter. Podrick could serve him again freely. At first, Tyrion had been furious that he hadn’t left King’s Landing as he ordered him. However, if he could get out of there alive, and it was possible now, Podrick didn’t need to leave.

However, everything wasn’t so good for Tyrion. His uncle was a good man who always respected him, unlike his father, but he would listen to Cersei as much as he would listen to Tyrion and Jaime. His brother had just died. Who knew what Cersei could put in his head? Kevan had no preference for Tyrion over his siblings. If Cersei could build a case strong enough against him and convince his uncle, Kevan would most likely declare him guilty. Tyrion only had Sansa, Varys and Jaime as possible witnesses. Jaime told him that Pycelle said their father died of a heart failure when he examined the body, but Tyrion didn’t think it would matter. He put Pycelle in the black cells when he was Hand of the King. He doubted the Grand Maester would testify for him. It was more plausible that he would testify against him and plot with Cersei to charge Tyrion. He could lie after all. Tyrion didn’t trust a maester who betrayed two Hands of the King, letting both die, one from poisoning, the other from beheading. It so happened moreover that one of these Hands was Tyrion’s father-in-law now thanks to his marriage, and that the other Hand had been the friend of this same father-in-law. There were more than enough morons in King’s Landing and people who hated Tyrion to testify against him for revenge, gold, or Cersei’s favor, whatever sort of favor it was. Lancel Lannister and Osmund Kettleblack knew a very specific sort of favor they could get from her. After that, Cersei was calling the Rose of Highgarden a whore?

At least, Shae was gone. Podrick confirmed it as soon as he saw him again. That was more than a relief for Tyrion. The woman he loved was safe. Of course, she would hate him for the rest of his life for what Bronn told her for him, but Tyrion preferred her to live hating him than to die loving him. If he escaped from this alive, he could probably go to Pentos to explain her why he did this. However, he knew he couldn’t do it. He could never leave the Seven Kingdoms if he was declared innocent, and he could never bring back Shae with him. Sansa was his wife now. He couldn’t take the risk of Shae being found again with Sansa still married to him. He said vows and he had no choice but to honor them, even more now after everything Sansa went through.

Tyrion had gotten drunk the night after Podrick told him the new about Shae. He needed it, with or without the new. He had spent two weeks without drinking. He had to catch up. Now however, he was sober and he read. That was all he could do. He didn’t lack of books. Podrick brought him all those he asked for. Right now, he was reading The History of the Decline and Fall of the Valyrian Freehold, by Lord Eddard Gibbon. It related the last centuries of the Valyrian Empire and its author claimed the end of the great city of Valyria was caused by the rise in power of religious institutions that began to exercise temporal power. Tyrion wasn’t sure if it was true, but he agreed with the lord that things could get very wrong when religious authorities were allowed to have other powers than spiritual ones. Some reports from Varys about the way Stannis Baratheon was burning people on Dragonstone because they refused to believe in his Lord of Light, on the suggestion of this Red Priestess who advised him, seemed to prove it. Tyrion was glad he could stop the man from being King of the Seven Kingdoms.

Podrick entered with the food for the midday meal. “Oh, finally. I’m hungry.” However, the trays of food weren’t the only things he brought. Jaime was with him also, without his armor of Kingsguard. Tyrion was even happier to see his brother. In two weeks he only had three visits in the black cells, if he excluded the day they moved him to his tower cell: Podrick, Jaime, and Lady Mira Forrester. The northern girl was the only one to bring him wine.

“So, my big brother has come back. Considering my new situation, I would say my plan worked out very well.”

Jaime smirked. “Yes, it did. It’s been three days now that Cersei had been confined in her chambers. She already tried to escape thrice, each time without success. Each time she told to the guards they had to obey her since she was Queen Regent.”

“It doesn’t seem to mean so much when the king decides to punish his mother. Normally it should be the mother who punishes her son for his stupidities. Now it seems to be the opposite.”

“You’re right.” Jaime sat. “It doesn’t bother you if I eat with you, I hope?”
“Not at all. I didn’t have much company these last weeks.”

The food was excellent and copious as usual. Tyrion noticed his brother ate much more than before. That was a good thing. “So, tell me, no detail has been fixed concerning my trial yet.”

“No, I have no other message from Kevan. He’s on his way. It will probably take place soon after he arrives.”

“What about the royal wedding?”

“Well, for now, I thought it would be best not to press things. Do you think it is a good idea to have a royal wedding with no one to stop Joffrey from doing anything crazy?”

“I can’t agree more. I hope he won’t decide suddenly to have me killed.” They could never know what Joffrey intended to do.

“The Tyrell girl keeps him busy. I think she knows this is not in her interest to have the wedding so soon. To have Cersei and Joffrey together at the ceremony in the current situation doesn’t seem to entice her very much.”

“Good. Then I’ll live at least until Kevan arrives and decides if I’m guilty or not.”

“Kevan will not sentence you to die. You are innocent.”

Tyrion had to sigh “We both know it Jaime, but Kevan doesn’t. He will listen to Cersei and every witness she will call at the trial. You know how our beloved sister is. She is certain that I killed our father. Even if he was killed and that the killer threw himself before the Iron Throne, confessed to his crimes, and gave irrefutable evidence of his guilt, it wouldn’t matter to Cersei. She won’t rest until my head’s on a spike. She is ready to do everything to achieve her goal. She can bribe, threaten, offer all sorts of favor to people to testify against me. And I don’t even mention the enemies I made while I was Hand of the King. Some might decide that perjury is a small price to pay to see my head off my shoulders.”

“Cersei is locked up in her rooms now, she can’t do anything.”

“She had two weeks to gather people around her. When she comes out they could still be in her pocket. She is still the Queen Regent until Joffrey marries Margaery.”

“We’ll wait for Kevan to be there. You will have your own witnesses. Anyway, what could she say against you. The Grand Maester told us Father died in his sleep when his heart failed.”

“I sent Pycelle to the black cells and had his beard cut. I don’t think he’s going to testify for me.”

“I will. I will tell the people what Pycelle told us.”

“And what if Pycelle and Cersei say the opposite? They could. Pycelle is in Cersei’s hands now that our father is dead.”

“You really sound paranoid now.” Tyrion’s brother seemed quite exasperated. “We will wait for the trial. Kevan doesn’t hate you, he respects all of us. You’ll be cleared of your charges. There is no proof for any of them.”

Jaime seemed to believe naively that now their uncle was coming, everything would be alright. There was no point trying to convince him of the contrary. Nothing would ever be alright. They were playing the game of thrones. Tyrion changed of subject “How is Sansa?”
“She’s alright. In fact, I’ve never seen her so active.” Tyrion was puzzled before his brother’s statement. “I don’t know what happened to her, but as soon as Cersei was behind doors, she began to travel through all the castle. She is very busy preparing your defense.”

His defense. Tyrion was without words before these news. Sansa was preparing his defense. He would never have thought that. He needed to know more about it. “What is she doing?”

“Talking to various people, trying to convince them to testify for you when it could be useful. I had a long discussion with her two days ago. We spoke for hours about what I would say when I would testify for you and about the witnesses and facts Cersei would bring against you. I never thought she could talk so much. The very few times I saw her she seemed mute, or she was praying.”

“With the death of her family, that’s no surprise. Did she manage to get more witnesses?”

“Podrick and Bronn will speak for you apparently. She and I also convinced Ser Balon Swann to testify for you instead to testify for Cersei. That’s not much, he’s only going to speak highly of you, but it’s a witness less for Cersei all the same.”

Ser Balon Swann? Well, perhaps Tyrion had the respect of some people here in King’s Landing finally. He was impressed by this change. To turn Cersei’s witness against her, it took a lot of wit. Tyrion knew Sansa was intelligent and clever. Most of the people only thought of her as an innocent girl who loved songs, stories, and always did what was asked or expected from her. Tyrion knew it wasn’t true. Sansa only never had the chance to use her intelligence for anything else than preserving her own life. He saw it after she was beaten on Joffrey’s orders. She was much more than a scared girl, but people could only see her this way. It was an armor she wore all time. Perhaps she finally decided to leave it. Tyrion wouldn’t complain about that. He would like to see her another way than how she was ever since he saw her for the first time in King’s Landing.

“What about Varys?” Tyrion asked.

Jaime looked down. “Varys has already been called by Cersei to testify. When I talked to him he said he would testify as Cersei’s witness, no matter what happened.”

Of course, Varys would do it. He always protected his back. “Well, that’s too bad. Do you know which judges Kevan intends to choose?”

“As I told you, we still have no message from him.” They didn’t talk about the trial for the rest of the meal. They talked about many other things. As they continued to talk, Tyrion was thinking about his wife. He hoped Sansa knew what she was doing. He was happy that she wasn’t staying in a corner anymore to weep, but what she was doing could end badly for her, especially if he lost the trial. Cersei wouldn’t forget it.

When they were done with the food, Jaime rose to leave. He was the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard after all. He couldn’t stay with Tyrion all day.

“Jaime.” Tyrion had to ask him about it. “Make sure Sansa is safe. She may not know the consequences of what she’s doing. Try to protect her from Cersei’s men. Our sister may be locked up, but there are still people working for her.”

“I will protect her, Tyrion. You have my word.” He looked at the bars and made a move with his hand. The guard standing behind left. Jaime went to the bars and looked outside. Tyrion had the impression he wanted to make sure no one was there. Then he turned back to Tyrion. “I swore a vow to Catelyn Stark to protect her daughter and I will respect it.” That was a change with Tyrion’s brother ever since he came back. He seemed to consider his promises very important to hold now.
There were things that happened while he was Robb Stark’s prisoner and on his way to King’s Landing obviously. Tyrion would have to ask him precise questions about it when he would be free, if he ever was.

Jaime continued to speak. “However, there is something you should know. I didn’t talk about it to anybody, but you should know.” Jaime’s voice was now very low, as if he feared to be heard. “Sansa tried to leave King’s Landing a few days ago.”

This information let Tyrion quite fuzzy. “She tried to leave?”

“Bronn and Brienne told me about it. She went to the godswood in the night and met some man. A certain Ser Dontos Hollard who was now Joffrey’s fool.”

Tyrion recognized the name. “I know who it is. Joffrey made him his fool when he came drunk to his seventeenth name day. Apparently he tried to drown him in wine, but finally he made him his fool. Some say it was on Sansa’s suggestion.”

“All the same, she went to meet him. From what Brienne and Bronn heard, he had offered her to flee the capital. According to what they say she refused, and the fool tried to abduct her. Bronn had to kill him with an arrow.”

Someone had tried to kidnap Sansa. Tyrion wanted to curse. He wasn’t there to protect her. Well, not that he could have done anything against someone maybe twice his size. Perhaps he could, if it was a fool. However, Tyrion was worried about his wife. “What happened to her? Is she alright?”

“Yes, yes, she’s alright. In perfect shape in fact.” Tyrion was relieved. “However, someone tried to get her out of King’s Landing and she seemed to be ready to follow him, at least for a time. I don’t really know why she could have changed her mind, but the fact is, it seems she was planning an escape.” Jaime’s words let Tyrion thoughtful. It couldn’t be a coincidence that someone tried to take Sansa out of the city not long after he was arrested. This man, Ser Dontos, couldn’t have worked all alone. Someone else was behind this. “Do you think she could be the one who killed our father?”

Tyrion couldn’t believe what his brother was suggesting. “Sansa couldn’t have done this.”

“She had more reasons than anyone in the Seven Kingdoms. Do you think it’s a coincidence she nearly left not long after our father’s death?”

“No, but… Sansa’s not a killer. Not yet anyway. I spent enough time with her to know it. She was in our chamber for the whole evening and night before Father’s death. She couldn’t have killed him.”

“Well, I met her a few times ever since your arrest, and she seems cold-blooded enough to do it.”

“Someone tried to get Sansa out of the city. You said yourself she was nearly abducted. Someone might only want to use the situation to his advantage. Sansa is the key to the North, after all. Whoever has her can eventually claim half of Westeros. Too bad the fool is dead, we could have known who he was working for.” Tyrion looked in his brother’s eyes. “I hope you don’t intend to stop protecting her.”

Jaime sighed. “I told you I would protect her. In fact, Brienne and Bronn are doing much of the job now. She always has at least one of them with her. There is also Podrick, and I gave specific orders so she may have the freedom to walk as she pleased through the Red Keep. I swore a vow to her mother, but it won’t stop me from suspecting her.”

Jaime was sincere, Tyrion could tell it. He would protect Sansa, but he really thought she could have killed their father. Tyrion thought his father could have been killed. After all, his death was so sudden and unexpected, but it was still as likely he died of natural causes. They would have to inquire seriously on the matter after the trial, but without Cersei trying to interfere to make people believe what she wanted to believe.

“Just tell her to be careful with what she’s doing. Tell her I would never forgive myself if something bad happened to her.”

Jaime looked at him with a strange expression, but finally he only said, “I’ll tell her. Good day, little brother.” Jaime left and Tyrion was alone again. Podrick came to take back the empty plates and left nimbly, something quite unusual with him.

Tyrion thought about what Jaime told him about Sansa. He didn’t think about Jaime’s doubts about his wife, but he thought about the fact she was preparing his defense. That wasn’t something Tyrion had expected from his wife. He thought she would accept to testify for him, dutiful as she was, but to look for other witnesses and proofs to clear him? Tyrion was happy about that. Perhaps Sansa didn’t hate him so much. Too bad she would only show it when he was in prison. He wished he could have seen it before. He still remembered the night when he held her in his arms. Tyrion never slept so well in years. He only held her, nothing more. He promised he would never hurt her, and he didn’t, but he couldn’t resist the temptation to try to comfort her. She had looked so vulnerable this night. He had feared she may rebuff him, but she didn’t. Finally Tyrion had been able to do something for her. And for that he needed his father to threaten to force him to rape her, just like he did a long time ago with Tysha. The girl was a whore, but it had been a rape nonetheless. Tyrion had decided he would never do it again. His father wouldn’t force him to turn Sansa’s life into a living hell anymore. He didn’t kill his father, but to be honest Tyrion wasn’t sad about it. He only regretted Cersei could use it to imprison him.

Would Tyrion have been ready to kill his own father for Sansa? He was unable to answer this question right now. He would probably have found another way. Some way to convince his father that they consummated the marriage. Or some way to make him believe they would consummate it without fail later. Tyrion didn’t know. It was very difficult for him to imagine that he would kill his own father. Despite everything, how he made his life miserable and how he hated him, he was still his father. At least, Tyrion was glad he wouldn’t have to deflower Sansa immediately.

The day went by and Tyrion continued to read. It would probably be another night he would spend to read, like before. He wished Sansa was there. The night they shared the same bed, he had no trouble sleeping, until Cersei ruined everything. Now Sansa was trying to prove his innocence. Perhaps when he would get out of prison she would accept to… Tyrion sighed. What a foolish idea it was. She was a child. He turned the page of the book he was reading and put that thought aside.

It’s not like she loves me.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: someone with blond hair
Daenerys I

Chapter Notes

So, I said it would be someone with blond hair's POV. Here it is. The Mother of Dragons comes into the story.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

DAENERYS I

She was staring at the city from the balcony of the Great Pyramid of Meereen. Daenerys Targaryen had taken the city a week ago, and now everything seemed calm. When the city was taken, she allowed her sellswords to plunder it. To be true, they hadn’t looted very much. The people of Meereen did most of the work, so they were the ones to plunder the most. In fact, it was more justice than plunder since they took the riches their masters accumulated with their labor. The Seconds Sons didn’t have much left to plunder afterwards, and on her orders, Daario prevented his men from doing too much. As for the Unsullied, they weren’t interested by plunder. Again, Daenerys didn’t conquer a city. She liberated it.

Now, everything looked quiet. Daenerys quickly made sure chaos wouldn’t spread after she entered Meereen. She crucified one hundred and sixty-three leaders of noble families for the one hundred and sixty-three innocent slave children they crucified all along the road from Yunkai to Meereen. She also established the usual sentences for murder, rape and stealing. Now, eight bodies were hanging on the walls, and many hands and cocks had been taken. The streets were calm now. However, she could still discern the cries of the people calling her Mhysa, their mother. Daenerys had succeeded.

Astapor, Yunkai, Meereen, they all fell before her. Slavor’s Bay was free. Daenerys only had to make sure the former slaves would be able to keep their freedom, then she would go back home, to Westeros. She would take back the Iron Throne, her father’s throne, from the usurper who sat on it. The Targaryens would once again rule the Seven Kingdoms.

Daenerys had enough forces now. With her Unsullied and the Seconds Sons, she could take back King’s Landing. The common people of Westeros, the smallfolk as the lords and ladies called them, would flock at her side, as they did in Yunkai and Meereen. However, even if she believed it with all her heart, there was a little voice in Daenerys that told her it may not be enough. She remembered a few words Ser Jorah told her a long time ago, when Viserys was still alive. The common people pray for rain, health and a summer that never ends. They don’t care what games the high lords play.

Would the people of Westeros see her as their savior and their rightful queen when she came home? Or would they see her as another pretender like all the others who fought right now? Would they support her against the Lannisters, the Baratheons and the Starks?

“Your Grace.” Daenerys recognized this voice. She could recognize it everywhere and anytime. The man had advised and protected her for more than two years now.

“Ser Jorah.”

“Your small council is waiting for you. We are all here.”
Daenerys Stormborn, of House Targaryen, the First of Her Name, the Unburnt, Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoyens, Khaleesi of the Great Grass Sea, Breaker of Chains and Mother of Dragons, shot a last look at the peaceful streets of Meereen and went inside to see her counselors. They were all there. Ser Barristan Selmy, who saved her at Astapor and crossed a continent to serve her. He was the only one sitting, at least until Ser Jorah joined him at the table. Missandei, her interpreter she met and freed at Astapor. Grey Worm, the Commander of the Unsullied, who followed her with his eight thousand men after she offered them their freedom. She trusted all of them. Only the other man, his back nonchalantly against the screens, caused some doubts in her. Daario was a sellsword who killed his two leading partners of the Second Sons and entered her tent while she was taking a bath. He was the only one Dany couldn’t trust entirely, but he was useful nonetheless. She wondered how he looked without his clothes.

She started to speak. “You probably all know why I summoned you. I broke the chains of every slave in every city of Slaver’s Bay. My task here is coming to an end. You all served me well, but some of you were born and lived here for all their life. I will go back to Westeros to claim the Iron Throne that belonged to my father and his father before him very soon. I may stay a little while longer to make sure things are stabilized here and to form a new government for Meereen, but I will leave all the same. You are all free to stay here in Essos if you want, but you have to decide it now. I will not allow you to reconsider it afterwards. What do you choose?”

Ser Barristan Selmy was the first to speak. He rose from his seat. “I have served under your father and your grandfather, your Grace. You are the rightful Queen of Westeros. I crossed the Narrow Sea to serve you for the few years that are left to my life. I burned away my years fighting for terrible kings. Before it’s over, I will serve with pride. I will fight for someone I believe in. I will follow you, wherever you go.”

He sat down and Ser Jorah Mormont was the next one to speak as he rose him too. “I’ve followed you ever since the Dothraki Sea. My sword and my advice are yours as long as you want them. And Westeros is my home. I have nothing here in Essos. You can always count on me.”

Daenerys wasn’t surprised, but she was pleased all the same. She knew the two men would follow her to death, even though they didn’t have the same reasons for it. Daenerys looked at her friend, Missandei. The young woman from the island of Naath answered with the same honesty she always had. “You released me from slavery, your Grace. This one is bound to you. She has nowhere else to go. I will follow you to your home.”

Dany turned to her Commander of the Unsullied. “Grey Worm?”

“The Unsullied will do everything you command them, your Grace. We will die for you if you command it.”

She turned to the one she wasn’t sure about. “Daario Naharis?”

With an expression of indifference, the sellsword answered. “As long as you pay them and allow them to plunder after the fights, my men are yours. I’ll make sure they follow you.”

Daenerys smiled at the man. She really wondered how he looked naked. He saw her without clothes, maybe she should order him to do the same for her in return. She spoke to all of them. “Do you have any advice to give me before we sail to Westeros?”

Her bear was the one to speak first. “There are news from across the Narrow Sea, your Grace. Tywin Lannister is dead. Murdered by his own son, the Imp, from what we know.”

Daenerys’s eyes widened. That was quite unexpected, and wonderful. Tywin Lannister betrayed her father. His son, Ser Jaime Lannister, murdered Aerys the Second. She couldn’t hold a smile.

Ser Barristan was next to speak. “And we have taken the Meereenese navy, your Grace.”

“The Second Sons took the Meereenese navy.” Daario corrected Ser Barristan and came to sit as well and took a grape from the plate on the table.

“Who told you to take the navy?” She never ordered anyone to take Meereenese ships.

“No one.” He answered the same way he always spoke, as if nothing was serious. He always looked so indifferent.

“So why did you do it?”

“I heard you like ships.” Dany reflected on that. With enough ships, she could sail to Westeros right now.

“How many ships?”

“Ninety-three, your Grace.” It was Ser Barristan who answered this time.

“How many men can they carry?”

“Ninety-three hundred, not counting sailors.”

“Will that be enough to take King’s Landing?” Daenerys was full of hope all of a sudden. Her chance to take back from the usurper what was hers finally presented itself.

“The Lannisters have more.” Ser Jorah spoke. He seemed pessimistic about it. Barristan Selmy retorted immediately.

“They’ve been fighting Joffrey’s wars for years. They’re tired, dispersed. And now the Hand of the King, the man who really ruled the Seven Kingdoms, is dead. Joffrey is no battle commander and his mother neither. The Kingslayer is a good fighter, but he is also headstrong and arrogant. When he sees us coming, he will charge us without thinking and be defeated easily, as he was at the Whispering Wood. There is no one to win the battles of the usurper right now. They are weaker than they will ever be. Eight thousand Unsullied, two thousand Second Sons sailing into Blackwater Bay and storming the gates without warning.”

Daenerys liked the enthusiasm of Ser Barristan. He looked younger than Ser Jorah right now. She felt this enthusiasm as well. The Iron Throne was within reach, closer to her hand than it ever was. She looked at Ser Jorah with a little smile. What would he say? He always was pessimistic about her chances to take back the Iron Throne.

He finally conceded. “It’s hard to say. It could be enough. But we’re not fighting to make you queen of King’s Landing. Ten thousand men can’t conquer Westeros.”

“The old houses will flock to our queen when she crosses the Narrow Sea.” Ser Barristan really believed, just like her, this was her moment.

“The old houses will flock to whichever side they think will win, as they always have.” Daenerys began to have some doubts then. What Ser Jorah said wasn’t entirely false. Her brother Viserys thought the houses would join him as soon as he would come back to Westeros, but he was a fool. Ser Barristan wasn’t a fool, but his speech reminded her so much of her brother’s. Ser Jorah rose at this moment, very slowly. “There’s other news. From Yunkai. Without the Unsullied to enforce your rule, the Wise Masters have retaken control of the city. They’ve reenslaved the freedmen who stayed behind and sworn to take revenge against you. And in Astapor, the council you installed to rule over the city has been overthrown by a butcher named Cleon who’s declared himself “his Imperial Majesty.”

Dany turned her back to her advisors. All had been for nothing. Slavery wasn’t eradicated from Slaver’s Bay. It was back in Yunkai, and probably as well in Astapor. She released men, women and children from their chains only to let them fall back into them when she left. If she left here too, the same would happen in Meereen. They called her Mhysa, but she was about to abandon them to their fate. What kind of queen was she to do that?

“Please leave me.” She needed to be alone. They all began to depart, but she stopped her bear before he left too. “Not you, Jorah.” She needed to talk with him and only with him. Right now, he was probably the only one whose judgment wasn’t clouded by the hope to finally take the Seven Kingdoms.

When they were alone, she turned to face him. “It appears my liberation of Slaver’s Bay isn’t going quite as planned.”

Jorah’s expression seemed to indicate he agreed. “You could sail for Westeros and leave it all behind. A boy sits on the Iron Throne. A boy many believe to be a bastard with no right to it. The Hand of the King and the Lord of Casterly Rock is dead, and the Lannisters might be fighting among themselves. They’ve never been more vulnerable. Tywin Lannister was who made House Lannister powerful, and he’s gone.”

“You counseled me against rashness once in Qarth. I didn’t listen. That all worked out well.” Jorah chuckled. She knew he loved her, but she could never love him the same way he loved her. All the same, she valued his guidance more than everyone else’s advice. However, this time, even though she thought rashness may give her what she wanted, she didn’t think it was the right thing to do. “How can I rule seven kingdoms if I can’t control Slaver’s Bay? Why should anyone trust me? Why should anyone follow me?”

“You’re a Targaryen. You’re the Mother of Dragons.” Of course she was, but that wasn’t enough. If she didn’t take care about her people here in Essos, how could she be a queen in Westeros? She belonged to her people, and right now, the people who needed her the most, who would never be free without her, were here, in Slaver’s Bay. She looked outside at the sky.

“I need to be more than that.” She faced Jorah again. “I will not let those I have freed slide back into chains. I will not sail to Westeros.”

“What, then?”

“I will do what queens do. I will rule.”

Daenerys walked back to the balcony and looked down again at Meereen. She was Queen of Meereen now, and she would rule the city for the good of her people. After some time, she thought she heard Jorah’s footsteps. He had left the room. Perhaps it was a mistake. She may have lost the Iron Throne, but she couldn’t leave right now. The Meereeneses she freed needed her. A queen didn’t belong to herself, but to her people. She would stay until she was sure no children born into Slaver’s Bay would know what it was to be sold or bought. Her home would wait. When she would come home, she would seize the Iron Throne, take back everything the usurpers took from her, and deal with all the traitors who overthrew her father. She nearly regretted Tywin Lannister was dead. She would have liked to exercise justice on the man who caused the fall of her family. When she would get back to Westeros, whoever were the new Lord of Casterly Rock, the Lord of Winterfell and the Lord of Storm’s End, she would deal with them. She would bring them justice. But it would wait.

Chapter End Notes

 Mostly, they learn Tywin Lannister is dead instead of Joffrey (and Tywin is a much greater loss for House Lannister than Joffrey), but Daenerys chooses to stay in Meereen all the same. The Mother of Dragons will come back. She will have an important role later in the story.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa VII

Chapter Notes

A chapter I really loved to write. There is a character I introduced earlier in the story who begins to play an important part in the fic from now on.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SANSA VII

She walked in the corridors of the Red Keep. Sansa just had a troubling discussion with Lord Varys. She didn’t really know what to make of the man. He had tried to comfort her during the wedding feast, telling her Tyron would be a good husband. She believed what he said now, and yet she couldn’t decide if she could trust him. She hadn’t gone to meet the man. He was the one to come to her. He waited for her in her own chambers and talked about the trial. He was testifying against Tyron, but with his mysterious ways he looked as if he wanted to help him instead. He told her a few things about Cersei, but not much in fact. Mostly, he told her to be careful. She didn’t know if it was a warning out of concern, like the same one she received from Tyron through his brother a few days ago, or a threat. However, what let her the most bewildered were the words he told her when he left her. “You’re not looking at the right place, Lady Sansa. You must search the army of wolves.”

His words didn’t make any sense. Perhaps it was only a way to trouble her, to distract her. Bronn and Podrick told her Lord Varys worked closely with Tyron when he was Hand of the King, but Sansa doubted he was still loyal to her husband. She really didn’t know what to make of this perfumed man. She needed to think about it.

She was heading for the godswood now, Brienne walking not far behind her. Most of the time Brienne was the one to escort and guard her during the day, while Bronn would guard her during the night. He was much more discreet than the woman knight. Lady Brienne now wore a complete set of armor all the time. This way, people knew she could fight if need be. Some were laughing at her on her passage since she was a woman, but Sansa knew they would learn at their expenses she wasn’t someone to mock if it came to a fight. She had seen her sparring on a morning. She defeated most of her opponents, including Ser Loras Tyrell. Ser Loras didn’t seem to like her. In fact, he seemed to hate her, probably because of Lord Renly’s death. He surely thought she was the one to kill him. However, Sansa really thought Brienne was telling the truth now. After what she saw and what she told her, she couldn’t imagine Lady Brienne lying about it. Once, they talked more deeply about Renly and Sansa saw that she loved him. Her explanation was still so unrealistic, but Sansa couldn’t help but believe she was telling the truth.

As for Ser Loras, Sansa had lost some of her admiration for him. First, there were his angry duels with Brienne. Also, when she looked at him duelling now, she had the impression to see someone who was only trying to prove he was better than everyone else. He had the same smile than Ser Jaime Lannister had before when he won a duel. Furthermore, he didn’t look at Sansa anymore. It wasn’t that he ignored her and wasn’t aware of her presence. He looked as if he simply didn’t mind her. There was also a rumor she had heard recently from Ser Balon Swann when she discussed with him. Apparently, Ser Loras and Renly Baratheon had been lovers, and that was why Ser Loras was so affected, even more than Margaery, when Lord Renly died. Sansa found it repulsive. How could a man be in love with another man? She wanted to vomit when she thought about this possibility. On the other side, if a brother and a sister could be in love… It seemed all kind of horrors were possible. All the same, it would explain a few things. Ser Loras didn’t remember her when he escorted her to Lady Margaery the first time, and he didn’t seem to be interested in her in any way when it was planned they would marry. He didn’t even speak to her again after she was betrothed to Tyrion. The dwarf acted more like a knight than the Knight of Flowers. Words from Lady Olenna Tyrell came back to her mind. Loras is young and very good at knocking men off horses with a stick. That does not make him wise. She had been quite indisposed by the old lady’s words, but now she thought she might agree with her. Her fancy on Ser Loras Tyrell now looked for her as stupid as the one she had for Joffrey once. Dwarves and dogs acted with more honor than princes, kings and knights. She still found Ser Loras quite handsome (who could say the opposite?), but she didn’t admire him like before. She was a little girl no more. She was a flowered woman now, and a married one. And she would save the husband who saved her.

It had been a week now since the news of Ser Kevan’s coming reached her. She had worked tirelessly ever since to find witnesses to testify for Tyrion’s innocence, and to gather proofs pointing his innocence. She had quite a number of witnesses now, and the word of some of them would have great value for Ser Kevan. At least she thought so. She had the impression to hit a wall now. There weren’t much people who wanted to testify for her husband. He seemed to have made many enemies during his tenure as Hand of the King. Many things Podrick and Bronn told her worried her. However, she had no choice. She used all her arsenal of courtesies, and even let slipped hints that Tyrion might be quite grateful for someone who would tell the truth to the court. A Lannister always pays his debts. She never really asked directly, but she brought people to consider testifying for Tyrion. It worked in some cases, but it didn’t in most of them. Sansa had to make sure people didn’t believe she was really working for her husband to be exonerated. She had to work in the shadows, to be careful, as Tyrion told her. She managed to build quite a solid defense case for her husband, but she wondered how strong would be Cersei’s case against him. She had to reflect about it peacefully, and that was why she was heading to the godswood now. She needed to pray to the old gods for help, wisdom and courage. She would need a lot of them.

As she turned a corner, Sansa heard noises in the middle of the corridor. Right before her, she saw two Lannister soldiers discussing. There were heavy sounds coming from where they were, as if someone was throwing objects in all directions. She stopped. Suddenly, another soldier came out from a door and showed them a dagger.

“It’s Damien’s! I recognize it. There’s no doubt now, she’s the one who killed him.” Sansa didn’t like what the men were talking about. They seemed to be searching some room.

“Lady Sansa. I think it should be best if we took another path.” Brienne didn’t like it obviously.

“Yes, I agree. Let’s turn around.”

Both women turned their heels. There were other ways to go to the godswood, though they were longer, but Sansa didn’t want to face these men. They didn’t look happy. She had to be careful.

The detour they took brought them quite far away from their original path. As she turned a corner, Sansa bumped into someone coming from the other direction. She began to apologize. “Excuse me, I didn’t see you coming… wait.” Sansa realised who was standing before her. She was slightly smaller than Sansa, with black hair and green eyes, and she wore clothes from the Reach. She saw her a few times with Margaery and she had come to fetch Sansa to her mistress the day after her wedding.

“Lady Mira? Mira Forrester?”
The northern girl seemed quite surprised to see Sansa. “My lady, I apologize, I’m in a great hurry. I’m afraid I can’t talk to you. Sorry to have walked into you.”

Mira tried to pass alongside Sansa, but she stopped her. “Wait. What’s going on, lady Mira?” Sansa saw something in Mira. She was in distress. But why?

“I’m really sorry, lady Sansa, but I have no time to discuss.” This time, the handmaiden managed to pass by Sansa, but Brienne got in her way. She was towering Lady Mira, and it seemed the girl understood she couldn’t ignore the giant woman like she tried to ignore Sansa, especially considering Brienne had her hand on her sword. She was loyal to Sansa to the end.

“Lady Mira, tell me what’s happening. You don’t act normally. Are you in trouble?”

The Forrester turned on herself to face Sansa. “My lady, you must let me go. It could be dangerous for you to be seen in my company right now.”

“What?”

“She’s there!” Sansa heard two voices in her back. She turned to face two Lannister soldiers walking in her direction. Their visors were opened and she could see they were angry. Did they come for her? Had Cersei managed to get out of containment and discovered her attempts to defend Tyrion at the trial? She saw Brienne pass by her and stand between her and the approaching guards, the right hand on her sword, ready to draw it. The two men stopped and brought their hands to their sword as well. Brienne’s voice was threatening when she spoke to them.

“If you dare to approach Lady Sansa one more inch, you are dead men.”

The guard on the right showed dismay while the one on the left looked angry at the statement. He was the one to talk. “You dare to threaten Lannister soldiers? You will pay for it.”

He was about to draw his sword, so Sansa intervened. The last thing they needed right now was a battle against Lannister soldiers. “Don’t do it! Don’t fight! Do you know who she is? This is Lady Brienne of Tarth. She was a kingsguard to Renly Baratheon, and now she’s a friend of Ser Jaime Lannister. She entered Renly’s kingsguard by defeating Ser Loras Tyrell in personal combat, and she defeated Ser Jaime the same way as well. Do you really think you’ll survive a fight against her?”

Sansa’s words caused the two guards to not move. She could see the fear and the uncertainty in their eyes. Everyone heard about Brienne, and there weren’t many women carrying a sword in the Red Keep. They heard what she was capable of and now she was feared as well as mocked. The guard to the right released the pommel of his sword. “Excuse us, lady Sansa. We’re sorry to have caused you fear. We’re not here for you. We’re here for this young lady.” He pointed with his head to Mira, who was standing setback from Sansa.

“What? Why are you after her?”

“It doesn’t concern you, young girl. I would step aside if I was you.” This time it was the guard at the left who spoke. Sansa fixed him in the eyes.

“She’s a friend of mine. We are friends because she’s a better knight than I am. If you try to harm her, you’ll be sorry.”

He was about to draw his sword, so Sansa intervened. The last thing they needed right now was a battle against Lannister soldiers. “Don’t do it! Don’t fight! Do you know who she is? This is Lady Brienne of Tarth. She was a kingsguard to Renly Baratheon, and now she’s a friend of Ser Jaime Lannister. She entered Renly’s kingsguard by defeating Ser Loras Tyrell in personal combat, and she defeated Ser Jaime the same way as well. Do you really think you’ll survive a fight against her?”

Sansa’s words caused the two guards to not move. She could see the fear and the uncertainty in their eyes. Everyone heard about Brienne, and there weren’t many women carrying a sword in the Red Keep. They heard what she was capable of and now she was feared as well as mocked. The guard to the right released the pommel of his sword. “Excuse us, lady Sansa. We’re sorry to have caused you fear. We’re not here for you. We’re here for this young lady.” He pointed with his head to Mira, who was standing setback from Sansa.

“Why? Why are you after her?”

“It doesn’t concern you, young girl. I would step aside if I was you.” This time it was the guard at the left who spoke. Sansa fixed him in the eyes.

“Sers, I don’t think I know your names. It is quite inappropriate for knights to not present themselves to a lady.”

The man to the left didn’t seem to like her comment, but Sansa knew the other one wouldn’t be insensitive to her comment. The words he spoke proved she was right. “Excuse us again, Lady Sansa. I am Ser Rowan of House Kenning, and this is Ser Valar of House Algood. We are terribly sorry, but this woman behind has committed horrible crimes. We have strict orders to arrest her and bring her to our Commander.”

“May I know why? Considering the disagreements you just caused to me, I think I have the right to know why I had to bear them.”

Ser Valar was still looking at Sansa angrily. He was no real knight, for sure. Ser Rowan, on the other hand, seemed better disposed. He hesitated, but finally he spoke. “Of course, my lady, this is your right. We just discovered that this woman was taking Lannister soldiers in her bed and that she killed one of them.”

“These are lies!” Sansa turned to look at Mira. There was still fear in her eyes, but also indignation. “I never slept with any man ever since I came to King’s Landing, even less with Lannister guards. And I have killed no one, I swear. These are filthy lies.”

“These are no lies!” It was Ser Valar who spoke now. “I saw her with one of my friend, Damien, one night in the gardens. He disappeared after this night.”

Sansa was next to speak. “This is no proof that she killed him. You said they met in the gardens, but you just said she brought them in her bed. How can you know she’s the one who murdered him? How could a simple handmaiden murder a trained soldier sworn to House Lannister? She wouldn’t stand a chance against him.”

Again, Sansa had the impression she hit something with Ser Rowan, and even with Ser Valar this time. She saw doubts in his eyes for a moment, but he was again roaring again a moment later. “We found Damien’s dagger in her rooms. This is the proof she killed him.”

Ser Rowan spoke now. “My lady, we received orders from our Commander to bring the girl for an interrogation. Please, stand aside, we must perform our sworn duty as Lannister men.”

Sansa had to find a way to stop them. She understood now what she saw before. These men were searching Mira’s rooms. Mira was a Northerner just like her, and it was obvious she was in trouble. She would surely get killed if they arrested her. She couldn’t let them do that. Furthermore, she was Margaery’s friend. If she was arrested, Margaery may have some problems, and it wasn’t the time for it. Sansa needed Margaery to distract Joffrey right now. Who knew what could happen to her if Joffrey was bored and without anyone to control him?

She had to do something. At least, she could gain time. “May I see the dagger? I know Lady Mira, so perhaps I’ve seen it before. I could help you.”

Valar grew impatient at Sansa, but again it was Rowan who answered positively. “Of course, my lady, if you think you can be of any help, Valar, give her the dirk.”

After a moment, Ser Valar reluctantly gave the dagger to Sansa. She unsheathed it from its scabbard and looked intently at it. It was a very simple dirk. There was no ornament, no symbol, no writings on it. Sansa turned to Brienne. “What can you tell me about this, Lady Brienne?”

The tall woman leaned to look more closely at the weapon. “There is no way for me to tell you to who it belongs, my lady. This a very common dagger. There are tens of thousands of this model through all the Seven Kingdoms. There is no way to tell to who it belongs.”

That was what Sansa needed. She faced the two guards again. “How can you be sure this dagger belonged to this Damien? There is no way to differentiate it from all the other daggers of this type.”

Ser Valar was angrier than ever. “I know this one belonged to Damien. Now step aside, or I’ll arrest you as well for impeding us in our duty.”
Ser Rowan looked at Sansa with pleading eyes. “Please, my lady. We have orders. You are not involved in this, so please don’t involve yourself. Let us accompany Lady Mira Forrester to our Commander.”

Sansa couldn’t hold them any longer. She had to find another way. She had to convince them they couldn’t arrest Mira. But how? Ser Valar was angry because of the death of his friend and determined to get his hands on the Forrester girl. As for Rowan, he was only carrying out his duty. The only thing that could convince them to give up was fear. What could they fear? An idea came to Sansa. She knew what to do.

“Sers, if I were you, I wouldn’t arrest Lady Mira without irrefutable proofs. It could end not very well for you.”

Sansa said it on a soft tone, a sorry one, to make it look that she was afraid for them. The two men were dumbfounded by her statement. Valar was the first to react. “Is this a threat?”

“No, this is a warning. Lady Mira Forrester is the handmaiden of Lady Margaery Tyrell, our future queen. Even more, she is her favourite handmaiden. She told me herself one day that she considered her more like a friend than a servant. If you arrest her without good cause, what do you think will happen? As soon as she learns it, she will talk about it to King Joffrey. And as soon as the king learns this, I fear what he might do for his betrothed. I fear what might happen to the men who arrested the friend of his betrothed.”

Sansa had continued to speak on a concerned tone. The guards weren’t to believe she was threatening them. She didn’t know if Margaery would really use Joffrey to free Mira if she was arrested, but the simple thought of how Joffrey may react if she did could bring the two men to reconsider it. Everyone knew what Joffrey could do when he decided to punish someone. As a matter of fact, the two seemed to think exactly about this. Sansa could see the fear overwhelming them. They looked at each other. It was especially Valar who seemed indecisive about all of this, but Rowan was the first to speak.

“We thank you for your advice, my lady. You are right, our Commander surely didn’t think about this when he decided to arrest Lady Forrester. We will leave you. Come Valar.”

Valar still took some time before he moved, but he moved all the same. The two men left the same way they came from. Sansa was relieved. It had worked. She realized she still held the dagger in her hands. The men forgot to take it back. That was good. They had no more proof against Mira.

“Lady Brienne, keep this on you.” Sansa gave the sheathed dirk again to Brienne who put it at her belt. She then turned to Mira. Her face was full of gratitude, but Sansa knew they weren’t safe for a long time. They needed to get out of here now, before other guards came. “Come with me. We have to talk.”

Brienne and Mira followed Sansa through the Red Keep as they headed back to her rooms. Sansa didn’t know if what she did was wise. To be seen with someone suspected of murder really wasn’t a good idea, but she couldn’t resign to abandon Mira to her fate. Sansa knew Mira was in a situation in some way like her own. She had heard rumors about House Forrester these last times. She knew Mira lost her father and a brother to the Twins, where Sansa lost her own brother and her mother. She also heard about the murder of another Forrester later. She couldn’t abandon the girl. They were both from the North and, even though she didn’t know Mira quite well, Sansa didn’t believe the girl was capable of murder. It was like to imagine Margaery killing someone.

Finally they reached her chamber. Sansa turned to Brienne. “Guard the door. Let no one enter.” Brienne nodded to mean she understood. Sansa entered with Mira on her heels and closed the door behind them. Sansa realized then she was out of breath. Did they run up to here? She couldn’t know for sure. Mira also was panting. Sansa had some questions to ask her.

“Can you tell me what is going on? Why are the guards looking for you? What is this story about you killing Lannister guards?”

“Lady Sansa, I shouldn’t stay here. The guards are going to come back for me here sooner or later. I must leave the Red Keep as quickly as possible.”

“You’re not going anywhere until you answer me. I just saved your life. What is going on?”

Mira hesitated for a moment, but finally she explained. “I don’t know where this is coming from, but there are rumors about me bringing Lannister soldiers in my bed and murdering them. Someone sent a message to the Commander of the guards that I would have killed one of his men. I don’t know what’s happening. I think someone is trying to get rid of me, but I don’t know the reason nor who is behind this.”

Mira’s explanation left Sansa quite puzzled. Why would someone want to get rid of her? Mira was only a handmaiden. Who could have an interest to plot against her? There was something that didn’t hold.

“Are these accusations true?” Sansa didn’t think Mira was guilty of these crimes. She had talked with her on a few occasions, and she didn’t seem the kind of girl to kill people, but Sansa knew no one could really be trusted here in King’s Landing. She had her lesson with Ser Dontos.

“My lady, you must promise me that you will not repeat it to anybody.”

Sansa wasn’t sure what to make of it. Lady Mira was a Northerner just like her. Maybe she thought she could trust her, but Sansa didn’t know if she could trust her as well. All the same, she didn’t think Mira would tell her the truth unless she promised to never speak about it. As to know if she would hold up to her promise, Sansa couldn’t be sure right now. But she had to promise if she was to know the truth.

“I promise.”

Lady Mira told her everything. Her problems with the queen after the Red Wedding. Her meetings with Tyrion about the ironwood business. The conflict between her family and the Withehills, Bolton’s bannermen who wanted to seize control of the ironwood business and destroy the Forresters. The death of her father and her brothers Ethan and Rodrik. An attempt of murder against her by a Lannister soldier and the fact she killed him in self defense. A certain Lord Andros who tried to hire sellswords to fight against her family and whose plans she routed. Her temporary alliance with Cersei and her visit to Tyrion in his cell during his first week of imprisonment. The open war that recently started between her family and the Whitehills. Her dismissal by Margaery a few days ago. Finally, the false rumors about her and the message sent to the Commander of the Lannister guards.

Sansa went through a lot of emotions and feelings as she listened to Mira’s explanations. She didn’t know Tyrion had talked with her. Though when she thought about it, this was no surprise since she and Tyrion barely spoke after her family’s death. The tale was far too complicated and detailed to be an invention. Lady Mira had to go back a few times to make sure Sansa understood everything. When she was done, Sansa believed she told the truth, or else Mira Forrester was very good to feign emotions and to invent stories.
“You have no idea who may be behind the accusations against you?”

Mira Forrester seemed to take some time to think about it, but finally she only said: “No. Lord Andros is in a cell, he cannot be at the origin of all this. He is the only one I can see who may really have done it if he could. The queen hates me, but she doesn’t care enough about me to lose her time spreading rumors. If she had wanted to kill me, she would only send one of her men to take care of me quietly. She wouldn’t cause such a commotion only for a handmaiden. As for Lady Margaery, she would never do such a thing. She removed me from her service, but she would never do something like that to me all the same. Anyway, it doesn’t give her a good image to have a former handmaiden accused of such things. She had no interest in that.”

Sansa could only agree with Mira’s summary. Cersei wasn’t behind it, neither Margaery. As for the lord she was talking about, Cersei may have released him, but why? There was no way to know the truth right here. However, before Sansa could say anything, Mira talked again.

“My lady, I must leave the Red Keep and King’s Landing as soon as possible. I have no one to protect me here anymore. Every guard will try to kill me as soon as they glimpse me. And the longer I stay in your company, the more dangerous it becomes for you. People may believe you are helping me in all this. The longer I stay, the more in danger I am, and the more I may taint your image and the one of Lady Margaery.”

Sansa was quite surprised by Mira’s declaration, especially the part about her former mistress. “Margaery just removed you from her service. Why do you care so much about the impact you may have on her any longer?”

“I don’t blame Lady Margaery for her decision. I know King’s Landing is a dangerous place, and that she can’t allow herself to be involved in any scandal. I regret to be no longer her handmaiden, but perhaps I would have been obliged to take the same decision in her stead. It doesn’t matter now. I must leave, for my sake and the sake of everyone.”

“Where will you go?” Sansa was worried about Mira. The Forrester girl’s situation remembered her of her own not long ago.

“I don’t know. My family is fighting, so I guess I will try to go back to Ironrath, and hope to see them one last time.” Sansa could hear the sadness in Mira’s voice. She was about to lose everything and had not much chance to survive very long. She had already lost her father and two brothers, and the other members of her family may end up dead as well very soon. Sansa had the impression Mira was facing a situation quite similar to her own after her father’s death and the events at the Twins.

Mira talked again. “My family may be doomed, but if that’s the case, I will bring the greatest number of my enemies with me in the grave. But I won’t bring innocent people with me, and I will if I stay here any longer. I must leave, now.”

Sansa looked in Mira’s eyes as the girl turned toward the door. There was sadness, but also determination on her face. The girl wasn’t fleeing. She was only going somewhere else to fight for her family. Her situation was far worse than Sansa’s had ever been. Sansa always had someone who could look over her or help her in the worse situations: her father, the Hound, Tyrion, Margaery, Brienne, Ser Jaime… Mira could only count on herself, but instead of cowering in a corner as Sansa had done so often, she was fighting. She would never abandon. Sansa felt ashamed. Mira was behaving the way Sansa should have so long ago. It had taken Tyrion’s words after the death of her mother and Robb, and the necklace he gave her, for her to decide she would fight. Ever since Lady’s death, she had been a victim, and she had accepted to be a victim. Only recently she decided to be a victim no longer. And there Mira was, still brave despite the tragedy happening to all her family. To the opposite of Sansa, the girl was a true Northerner. She acted more a like a Stark than Sansa ever did in her whole life. That caused Sansa to admire Mira, but also to fear for her. She knew Margaery’s former handmaiden wouldn’t survive very long on her own. As Lady Mira put her hand on the doorknob, Sansa stopped her.

“Mira, you won’t be able to get out of here. You won’t help your family outside.”

Mira Forrester interrupted her movement to open the door and turned to face Sansa again. “My lady, there is nothing more I can do here for my family neither. The guards will find me sooner or later, and then it will be over for me. It is better that I leave now to prevent the others from suffering.”

“You cannot escape King’s Landing. The only way for you to reach the North would be by ship, the Kingsroad is too insecure with the war still going on, and there will be guards in the docks. They will see you. There is no way to escape. Your only choice is to remain here if you want to live.”

“I will die here anyway. The Lannister men won’t stop looking for me. You already have enough problems like that, my lady. I don’t want to cause you anymore. There is nothing you can do for me.”

“You’re wrong.” Mira looked in a puzzled way at Sansa. “Podrick will come very soon for dinner. I will send him to Ser Jaime to arrange that. I will tell him that the guards are trying to kill a friend of Margaery only because of rumors and of a strange note sent to their commander. He will do something against it. He’s not like Cersei, he knows the Lannisters need the Tyrells, and he won’t risk that alliance. Furthermore, if he is to discover that a bribe is behind all of this, the Commander of the guards will have some problems with him, believe me.” Sansa knew from her conversations with Brienne that Ser Jaime didn’t appreciate that knights accept bribes.

Mira seemed to consider what Sansa just said. “Even if it works, my lady, the rumors are still going on. One of the guards may decide to kill me in secret to avenge their fellow. Anyway, I couldn’t help my family here even if I tried. I have no more allies in King’s Landing.”

“You have one now.” Mira looked surprised by Sansa’s words. “Look, you have to survive. I won’t lie to you, your family may all die against the Whitehills. I know it’s not easy to accept, but that’s the truth. I would rather have been prepared to that when I learned about the wedding at the Twins. If your family dies, you are the only Forrester left alive. Your survival is no longer only about you. It is about the survival of House Forrester, just like the survival of House Stark now depends on my survival. If you want the name of House Forrester to live on, then stay.”

Sansa thought she convinced Mira with her speech, but at the moment she believed it, the girl counteracted again. “I thank you, Lady Sansa. I really appreciate it, but I don’t want to cause you any more problems. You already have a lot. To intervene for me will only make it worse for you.”

“Then I accept to make it worse for me. And since you are no longer in the service of Lady Margaery, I take you at my own service.”

Mira Forrester was staring at Sansa with big eyes full of surprise. She seemed to be searching her words for a moment, but she finally managed to do it. “My lady… you would take me… as your handmaiden?”

“Yes, one of my handmaidens left a few weeks ago.” Sansa felt a little pang at the memory of Shae. She missed her friend so much. “I don’t think it would be strange that I take someone from the North to take her place.”

Sansa knew she was taking risks by bringing Mira into her service. However, she had some feeling she was doing the right thing. The girl was obviously loyal. Even after being removed from her service, she continued to defend Margaery. Loyalty was so rare here in King’s Landing that Sansa was ready to take the risk to have someone loyal on her side. Also, she was a Northerner and Sansa felt she had some responsibility to help her. She didn’t want another family to be destroyed because of the Lannister’s doings. She also believed Mira could be useful. She seemed quite clever and determined. Perhaps it wasn’t a coincidence that she had been so close to Margaery during her service. Sansa couldn’t let the opportunity to have someone probably resourceful and loyal at her service. And Tyrion looked like he had been ready to help and work with her. If Tyrion had been ready to work with Mira, Sansa guessed she could trust her.

Mira stood agape for a moment. “My lady, it will be an honor to serve as your handmaiden.”

Mira was smiling and Sansa had to smile in return. “Very well. We’ll wait here for Podrick to come and we will explain him the situation.”

An hour later, Podrick entered the room with the dinner. He seemed surprised to see Mira and he flushed from head to toes as soon as she looked back at him with a timid smile. After he was done serving them, Sansa told Podrick about the situation and commanded him to speak about it to Ser Jaime. She didn’t talk about the fact Mira really killed a Lannister soldier. She only talked about the fact she was Margaery’s friend, that this story could deteriorate the already tense relations between the Lannisters and the Tyrells, that there was no proof of Mira’s guilt, only rumors, and that the Commander of the Lannister guards may have been corrupted. Podrick went to carry out the instructions as soon as Sansa finished.

Sansa shared the spread of food with Mira. There was more than enough for two people anyway. Sansa could never eat it all, even now that she stopped to starve herself. Not long after they were done, Podrick came back to clean everything. He told them he spoke with Ser Jaime and that he would investigate on the matter. After he left, Sansa and Mira spent most of the evening talking about the North. Mira told Sansa everything about Ironrath. The way Mira was talking about it, it was the most beautiful place in the world. Sansa was very interested by what she told her. Mira was feeling the same way about her home that Sansa felt about her own. She never really visited places in the North before she came to King’s Landing. Her father and Robb, along with her mother sometimes, would often visit their bannermen, but she wouldn’t come with them most of the time. She wasn’t going to be the Lady of Winterfell, so it wasn’t so useful for the people of the North to see her, or even useful for her to see so many things of the North. She hadn’t complained about that back then. She preferred to stay at Winterfell and learn to be a proper lady, or read stories from the South about knights, lords and princesses. She should have visited the North with Robb. She would have known better how the world was outside the walls of Winterfell. She thought she remembered that her mother didn’t think it fit for a becoming lady to travel so much. Sansa regretted now that her mother believed she should stay inside a castle until she was a woman.

As they talked, Sansa began to talk about her own family. Mira didn’t insist too much on it, but she asked many questions about Winterfell all the same. She had never seen it. Sansa described it in all its details and Mira really seemed fascinated by what Sansa was telling. It made Sansa sad to talk about her home since Winterfell was in ruins now. She also talked about her family, about Robb, Bran, Rickon, Jon, Arya, her mother, and her father, but not too much. Mira didn’t try to know too much about them, but Sansa tried to talk about them all the same. Mira had talked about her family too, and she talked a lot about them. Sansa thought she might like to meet Mira’s sister, Talia, if she ever could. Mira told her how her sister had a beautiful voice. Sansa sang before as well. She talked a lot about her brother Asher as well, the rebel of the family who was sadly exiled in Essos because he fell in love with the daughter of Lord Whitehill and couldn’t marry her. Sansa thought Arya would have liked this one. They both looked like savage people. She talked less about the members of her family who were dead, but all the same Sansa learned a lot about Mira’s family, so she made an effort to talk about her own. They spoke until very late in the night.
When they realized how late they were, Sansa decided it was time to sleep. With everything that happened today, they needed some rest. She told Mira to stay here. It wouldn’t be safe for her to leave until Ser Jaime Lannister dealt with the guards. Mira decided to sleep on the couch where Tyrion was sleeping before his arrest. She helped Sansa to prepare for the night, despite Sansa’s protest. Sansa discovered there was no way to order Mira to not begin her service yet. She already considered herself as Sansa’s handmaiden. Sansa went to sleep while Mira laid down on the couch, still wearing her clothes from the day. She had none else with her. As she climbed into her bed, Sansa played with her necklace with a lion on the surface and a direwolf inside. She always wore it since Ser Dontos’s failed kidnapping. It helped her to remember who she was and why she had to fight. Sansa slept well this night, and the dream of her marrying Ser Loras came back. However, the dream now seemed stupid to her. The way her family looked smiling at her and the words of the bard seemed so silly. She was nearly happy in her dream when she discovered Ser Loras wasn’t there anymore. The dream bored her, even bothered her, but it didn’t make her sad anymore.

When Sansa awoke, Mira was already up. She was reading, but as soon as Sansa rose from her bed, she put her book aside and helped her to get ready for the day. They didn’t speak very much. Mira didn’t show much emotion, but Sansa knew that deep inside she was probably very nervous. She was still in danger after all. She hid her feelings, just like Sansa did. Sansa cursed King’s Landing for making life so difficult for Northerners.

“That’s a beautiful necklace you have, my lady,” Mira observed.

Sansa looked at the golden necklace around her neck. “Yes. It’s Tyrion who gave me this for my fifteenth name day.”

“He’s very kind. I hope he won’t die.” Sansa could only agree with Mira. “He told me once that he met my father at a tourney at Lannisport. He told me he was a good man from the short time he talked with him.” Sansa didn’t know Tyrion had known Mira’s father. Perhaps it was a reason why he helped her. However, Sansa saw in the glass the pained expression on Mira’s face as she talked of her father.

“I’m sorry for your father.”

Mira sighed behind Sansa. “He’s not the only one who died there. And I’m not the only one who lost very much.”

She didn’t need to tell more. Sansa knew what she was talking about. “We can only count on ourselves now.”

Mira nodded. “Yes. Only on ourselves.” Sansa never thought she would meet someone so alike her in King’s Landing. Perhaps she found a new friend. A real friend this time.

After they were done with Sansa’s hair, they could only wait. Strangely, no one had brought food for the breakfast. Sansa didn’t know what to make of it. Did something wrong happened? Mira went back to reading. Sansa looked at the cover and saw the title written in gold. Comments on the Volantenes Wars, by triarch Gaius Julius Caesar. She only had the time to read it when the door opened and Podrick went inside.

“My lady. My lady.” He bowed to both of them. Mira put down her book on the couch and rose up.

“Podrick,” Sansa greeted him.

“My lady, I just had a word with Ser Jaime. He discovered what the commotion with the guards was all about. Someone sent information to arrest Lady Forrester with a bag of gold to the Commander of the Lannister guards. Ser Jaime questioned him this morning and discovered it came from a certain Lord Morgryn.”

“Lord Morgryn!” Sansa turned to Mira as she heard her shout of surprise. The girl’s mouth was wide open. “Of course, how stupid I was! He was the only one with a good reason to get rid of me.”

“What are you talking about? Who is this Lord Morgryn?” Sansa asked.

“He’s a merchant. He was the partner of Lord Andros. They were both working for Lord Whitehill to make a deal with the Crown about the ironwood, but Andros pushed him aside. Now that Andros is in a cell, he’s probably the representative of House Whitehill again. No wonder he tried to get rid of me. I’m the last obstacle between him and a contract with the Crown. I should have thought about it before.”

Podrick spoke when Mira was done. “I’ve seen this Lord Morgryn a few times, discussing with Lord Tyrion. He told me to not trust this man. That he was probably more dangerous than the other one, Lord Andros.” For Sansa, it seemed Mira had made quite a few enemies here in King’s Landing. If she hadn’t stepped to protect her, Margaery’s friend would probably be dead right now. “Ser Jaime put him under arrest a few minutes ago. He sent two kingsguards to arrest him. It seems the man had many Lannister guards in his pocket. He is in a black cell now.”

Sansa turned to look at Mira. She could see relief on her face. Finally, they had some good news. However, it didn’t last long since Podrick had something else to tell them. “Lady Mira, Ser Jaime wants to see you. He says he has some questions for you.”

Sansa looked with fear at Mira. The other girl was better in hiding it, but it was plain all the same that she was afraid. What would Ser Jaime do if he discovered she killed a Lannister soldier?

“Very well.” Mira’s answer was short and resigned. She looked a second at Sansa, then she followed Podrick to meet her fate. Sansa feared for her. Mira had done nothing wrong. She killed this man in self defense. What would happen to her now? Had Sansa only delayed her death for a day? Perhaps she should have helped her to get out of the city instead. It was a mistake to trust Ser Jaime. Well, perhaps not to trust him for Tyrion’s situation, but with Mira? If Mira was sentenced to death and that people knew Sansa helped her, there would be consequences for her as well.

An hour went by as Sansa waited to learn about Mira’s fate. Right at the moment she thought she found a friend and that she saved her, this new friend may end up at the chopping block. Someone else would die because of her. Sansa was pacing the room anxiously. What would happen to Mira? She finally had her answer when the door opened.

Mira entered and, at Sansa’s great astonishment, she was carrying a great tray of food. Sansa was dumbfounded. “What are you doing?”

“I’ve been formalized as your handmaiden, my lady. I knew you had no breakfast, so I stopped at the kitchens to bring you one.”

As Mira put the plates on the table, Sansa still had some hard time to understand this. “Ser Jaime released you?”

“Yes.” Mira had a great smile upon her lips. “And he will make sure Lord Morgryn doesn’t trouble me anymore. Apparently he’s going to spend a very long time in the black cells.”

Sansa exulted. “How did you do it? How did you convince Ser Jaime?”

“I told him the truth.”
Mira’s simple answer left Sansa puzzled. “The truth? All the truth?”

“Yes. Podrick and Lady Brienne were with us. They told him everything they knew about it. He also left during my questioning. When he came back he told me he had talked with Lord Tyrion, and that he believed me. He said he didn’t need to inquire on the soldier’s death since his body was never found and nothing was found in my chamber.” Nothing was found in her room? But what about the dagger? Mira answered Sansa’s question before she asked it. “Lady Brienne got rid of it. Ser Jaime is also sending most of the bribed guards and the one who saw me that night in the Riverlands for the war. I won’t have any problem for a long time.”

Sansa couldn’t believe it. Perhaps she really needed to review her opinion of Ser Jaime. Mira was safe. “Well, I guess it calls for a celebration. Let’s eat.”

It was good to have someone to eat with again. Sansa had spent so much time alone these last days. Mira wasn’t very talkative, but she was good company all the same. Sansa asked Mira questions about the book she had been reading this morning. Apparently, it was a record from a general who led the armies of Volantis against the other Free Cities after the Doom of Valyria in an attempt to create a new empire. He conquered Lys and Myr, but later attempted to proclaim himself King of Volantis. The other noblemen of Volantis conspired against him, and he was stabbed with daggers twenty-three times, at the moment he was about to launch an invasion against Tyrosh. The Freehold of Volantis didn’t survive him, and was ultimately defeated by an alliance between Tyrosh, Myr and Lys in rebellion, Pentos, Braavos, Dothrakis, Aegon the Conqueror and the King of the Stormlands. Sansa had the impression she needed some history lessons, something else she lacked in her education.

When they were done eating, Mira didn’t clean the table immediately. “My lady, there is something I should tell you. When I left Ser Jaime, Podrick gave me this.” Mira produced a letter. It bore the seals of the Hand of the King, the Master of Coin, and the king. “It is a royal decree. Lord Tyrion made it right before he was arrested. It makes my family the sole supplier of ironwood for the Crown. Podrick saved it from your husband’s chest not long after his arrest.” Sansa remembered Podrick emptying the coffer this very morning, and she remembered Tyrion had put a document in it the precedent evening. Could it be this decree?

Mira was now deeply staring at Sansa. “My lady, I know you’re trying to have your husband cleared of the charges against him. I want to help you. Lord Tyrion helped me, I can’t stay idle while he is falsely accused of murder. And without him, this decree will have no value. I need him to be alive if my family is ever to survive. If there is any way I can help you with this, just tell me. I’ll do what you want.”

Sansa looked at her new friend and saw the sincerity and the determination of her words. Now, she knew she did well by saving her. She already had an idea how Mira could help her to free Tyrion.

Chapter End Notes

I always hated the end for Mira Forrester in Telltale Game, whether we chose to have her killed or married by force to Morgryn. And I love so much her storyline and how we can make the character that I wanted to give her some role in this story. I was also very interested by making her meet Sansa. The two girls have a lot in common.

Please review
Next chapter: the Hand of the King

Exult and rejoice with me. JON SNOW CAME BACK FROM THE DEAD!!!! I love this show!
First chapter from Kevan Lannister's POV. Kevan arrives in King's Landing and begins to rule. He also meets someone who troubles him.

By the way, sorry for the spoiler in the last chapter. Many complained about it since they didn't already know what happened in Season 6 Episode 2. I won't spoil you this way again.

They entered King’s Landing by the Lion Gate, where the Goldroad began and continued to Casterly Rock. Kevan was tired. It was the end of the afternoon. The trip had been wearisome, but soon they would reach the Red Keep. Not that it would mean any rest for him. He received a raven from Deep Den on the road that King Joffrey had named him Hand of the King. He thought the king would wait for his arrival before that, but it seemed the family and the Realm needed him sooner than he thought.

Kevan had left Casterly Rock a month ago with a small escort and his son as soon as he received Jaime’s message. Kevan would never forget the content of the scroll. It was addressed to him and Genna.

Dear Uncle. Dear Aunt. Father is dead. He died peacefully in his sleep from a heart failure, the night before the royal wedding. Things have gone out of hands. Cersei arrested Tyrion and accused him of murdering Father. She delayed the wedding indefinitely. She’s gone mad. I need your help Uncle. Come to King’s Landing as quickly as you can. Tyrion may not live for long.

Jaime

Kevan had been with his wife and their daughter when he received the message. He had been utterly destroyed by the news. His elder brother, his lord, Tywin, was dead. He was near tears when he learned it, so much that he forgot the other news the message brought. Dorna had done her best to support him. She always supported Kevan when it was difficult. However, when Kevan read again the scroll he had crumpled in his fist, he realized something else had happened. Tyrion was under arrest. He was accused of murdering Tywin. Kevan couldn’t understand. He needed to read Jaime’s words three more times to catch up everything. He stopped at his nephew’s words about Cersei. She’s gone mad. Kevan wanted to agree. Tywin died of a heart failure according to Jaime, and Cersei had accused Tyrion of killing him. Kevan had feared a few times before what might happen to House Lannister when Tywin would be gone. Would they survive his brother? He feared at this moment they wouldn’t.

When he told the news to Genna and showed her the scroll, she looked like she was about to cry. But she didn’t. She composed herself very quickly. Of all the children of their father, Lord Tytos, Genna always was the one who was the closest to a true lion, except for Tywin. Kevan knew Genna loved Tywin as much as he loved him himself. She had been their father’s princess before she became Tywin’s princess as well. However, she wasn’t a wailing princess, but a proud one. She had been even more at this moment, strong like Casterly Rock itself in this difficult moment. Kevan always admired her, nearly as much as he admired his late brother. He still remembered word by word what she told him at this moment.

“Cersei must be mad! Arresting Tyrion! I hope she has very good reasons. What would Tywin think of it if he was still alive? You must go to King’s Landing immediately, before she allows someone else to be beheaded or beheads him herself. The last time she did it, it nearly caused the fall of our house.”

Kevan had left the next morning along with two hundred knights. He and Genna had sent messages to Lannister bannermen and other knights and many joined him on the road. They came officially to pay their respect to their liege lord, but they were also loyal men to Kevan who would serve him in King’s Landing. With Tywin dead and Cersei ruling, he preferred to take precautions. With the announcement of his appointment as Hand of the King, many other men were encouraged to join him. Today, they were in King’s Landing, Kevan and two thousand men under his orders.

As they travelled to the Red Keep, Kevan realized things seemed very normal. Whores showed their breasts from the windows of brothels, butchers shouted about how good their sausages were, bakers about their bread, children were running in the streets, thousands of people were walking slowly, stepping aside when Kevan and his men came into their way, and they didn’t receive any condolences for the death of the Hand of the King. No one seemed to mourn his brother or to care about his death. That made Kevan sad, but he couldn’t say he blamed or didn’t understand the inhabitants of the capital. His brother sacked their city about twenty years ago, and Tywin never cared about being loved, nor by the smallfolk, nor by the noble people, whether they were high lords or minor lords, nor by his own family. He never cared about the love of everyone but Joanna. Kevan was one of the few to know it, but Tywin cried the day she died. He never smiled afterwards. Now he was dead, and only a few people would mourn him. Kevan wasn’t even sure Tywin’s children would be sad about his death, especially Tyrion.

When they reached Maegor’s Holdfast, the portcullis opened as soon as one of Kevan’s men announced him. Kevan wanted nothing but to sleep. He wanted to weep for his dead brother, to see his body and stand vigil for him, but he couldn’t. Tywin wouldn’t agree. He was Hand of the King now. He had to serve House Lannister and make sure that what Tywin built for decades wouldn’t turn to ashes. The first thing to do was to restore order in the Red Keep and to get informed of everything that happened since he left Casterly Rock. He ordered one of his men to call a meeting of the small council and went to the chambers assigned to him to wash quickly. As he was done and prepared to go to the small council room, his squire came to announce him that his nephew wanted to talk to him. Kevan told to let him enter. A few seconds and the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard was standing before him, clad in his golden armor and white cloak, a golden hand instead of the bones and the skin that once were there.

“Uncle. I’m glad to see you,” Jaime said.

“I’m glad to see you too, Jaime. I’m sorry for your loss,” Kevan told him.

“I’m sorry for yours.”

Kevan saw pain on Jaime’s face, but he wondered if Jaime was really pained by Tywin’s death, or if it was only because he knew his uncle was pained by it. Even if that was only for the latest reason, Kevan was thankful. “Has the small council gathered?”

“Yes, but I wish we could have a conversation before. It’s about Tyrion.”
“I understand Jaime, but first I must attend my duties as Hand of the King. We will have this discussion right after the small council meeting.” Jaime agreed with a sign from his head. “Please follow me."

They walked together to the small council chamber, the ancient one. Kevan had convened the other members of the small council there instead of the Tower of the Hand where Tywin had decided to hold the meetings of the council when he was alive. Kevan didn’t feel he was worthy to do like Tywin and to pretend he was the real power. Tywin was ruling, but Kevan only served the king. He served all his life and he wanted the others to understand what Tywin’s death meant. However, he would also show everyone that he would continue the work of his brother and that they had no more interest in rebelling than when the Old Lion was still alive. Kevan wasn’t his brother, but he had been his advisor for decades and carried out with efficiency Tywin’s decisions. He didn’t have the presence of his brother, but he was just as dangerous.

They were all there when he entered the room with Jaime on his heels. They all presented their condolences for Tywin’s death, even if most of them weren’t sad at all that he was dead. He knew most of them. Varys, the Spider, already Master of Whisperers under the Mad King, always to mistrust with his soft words and mysterious ways. Grand Maester Pycelle, a standing supporter of House Lannister since the very beginning when Tywin was Hand of King Aerys, but Kevan knew he had to beware of him as well. Lord Mace Tyrell, the Lord of Highgarden, always eager to please and demanding, the most powerful ally of House Lannister and the Crown, but also the most dangerous one if they weren’t careful. He was now Master of Ships. Finally, Lord Gyles Rosby, coughing all the time, who told Kevan he hired a master stonecarver to build a great statue of Tywin Lannister to stand eternal vigil beside the Lion Gate. Kevan and Jaime completed the small council. After the rain of words for the late Lord of Casterly Rock was over, the meeting could begin.

“I want you to tell me what’s happening for the war right now. When I left Casterly Rock we still had two ongoing sieges, at Storm’s End and Riverrun. Is there any progress there?"

Kevan stared at both Jaime and Lord Tyrell for an answer. Jaime was the first one to answer.

“From the recent news we had, Riverrun is still holding. The Blackfish is leading the resistance and he’s an experienced soldier. The fortress is very strong, our forces couldn’t breach the walls up to now. The besieged have enough food to hold a very long siege.”

“We will have to take care of that matter very soon. We cannot allow Riverrun to hold our forces for too long. Autumn has come, and it is only a question of time before winter reaches us. What on the side of Storm’s End?”

Lord Mace Tyrell took some time to answer. “The Tyrell army will deliver this great castle to our king very soon.”

“When?”

“Very soon, my Lord Hand. We have built every siege engines necessary. This is only a matter of time.”

“Just make sure the siege doesn’t last years.” Kevan could see Tywin was right about Mace Tyrell. He wasn’t called the Fat Flower for nothing. He didn’t manage to take Storm’s End during the rebellion against the Mad King when Stannis held it, and it seemed this second siege was going to last long. At least, the Tyrell army would be the one to pay for it, not the Lannisters. All the same, he wished he could speak to Randyll Tarly or Lord Redwyne, they would give him more details about the siege and the time it would take before the castle falls. Kevan knew Tywin wanted to grant it to Tommen as soon as he would be of age. Kevan would have to train the boy himself if he didn’t want Cersei to repeat the mistakes she did with Joffrey.

“Ser Kevan, I have some news of Sandor Clegane.” The Spider was the one talking. “He has been spotted in the Riverlands. My birds tell me the Hound slaughtered five of our soldiers. I believe the phrase fuck the king was uttered.”

“Disgraceful”, the Grand Maester muttered. Lord Mace Tyrell’s face showed disgust as well.

Jaime spoke. “We must take care of Sandor Clegane as soon as possible. He was a member of the Kingsguard and he deserted. We cannot allow him to ramble freely this way, but that won’t be easy to get rid of him. My father didn’t choose him to serve as Joffrey’s sworn shield without reason. He is a skilled and dangerous warrior. It would take a lot only to persuade men to try to arrest him.”

Kevan could only agree with Jaime’s words. They couldn’t let traitors go this way, even less when they were murdering their own men. “What would it take to make the common soldier wishful enough to try to kill the Hound?” His question was directed towards Varys.

“Ten silver stags seems a generous bounty.”

“Make it a hundred then, to make sure people understand what it costs to turn against the king.” Kevan knew Tywin would have done this. He didn’t mention there were even more reasons to kill Sandor Clegane because he was a kingsguard who turned against the king he swore to protect. That wouldn’t do when Jaime was present.

“There are also more whispers from the east, my lord. This is about Daenerys Targaryen. She has taken up residence in Meereen. She has conquered the city and rules as its queen.”

Kevan knew the last survivor of the Targaryen family was in Essos. There were rumors she hatched dragon eggs and now had three dragons with her. These were only rumors, and Kevan doubted she really had dragons, but if she conquered the biggest city of Slavor’s Bay, that meant she could become a threat. “How did she conquer the city? Don’t tell me it was with the supposed dragons she had.” He said it on a serious tone so that everyone would understand he wouldn’t believe easily such things.

“She commands an army of Unsullied, my lord. Some eight thousand strong. She has a company of sellswords, the Second Sons. She has two knights advising her, Jorah Mormont and Barristan Selmy. And she has three dragons. I’m afraid they are real according to my little birds. They may be babies for now, but they grow larger every year.”

“Barristan Selmy is at her service?” Jaime’s question startled Kevan. There was fear in his voice. “The man was the best member of the Kingsguard. Even at his age he is one the most skilled warriors of the Seven Kingdoms.” Kevan’s nephew sighed. “We should never have dismissed him.”

“It would seem he took his dismissal from the Kingsguard a bit harder than anticipated,” Varys added.

Tywin had found the dismissal of Barristan Selmy quite stupid, and Kevan had agreed with him at the time. Now it seemed even more stupid than ever. One of the most respected and skilled knights of Westeros joined a woman with a powerful army and three dragons under her orders. The Hand of the King had to dig into this. “May I know who advised the king to send away the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard? And to replace him with who? The Hound? The man wasn’t even a knight. I don’t think this idea came from Joffrey alone.”

They all stood silent for a moment. Finally, it was Lord Varys who spoke. “The idea to appoint Sandor Clegane to the Kingsguard was from the king. I am afraid however that the idea to dismiss Ser Barristan was first proposed by the queen.”

Kevan sighed. He should have known. Cersei had Jaime named Lord Commander of the Kingsguard this way, and Joffrey accepted since it allowed him to name his pet dog on this renowned institution. How many mistakes did she make ever since she began to rule the city? No wonder Tywin thought she should marry again. Kevan knew another reason to send Cersei away from the capital, but luckily Tywin hadn’t known it. If Tywin had learned the truth, it would have destroyed him.

Pycelle was the next to speak. “Jorah Mormont is spying on her for us.”

The Master of Whisperer deceived the Grand Maester. “No longer. He appears to be fully devoted to her.”

Kevan sighed internally this time. They could have used this Jorah Mormont to get firsthand information about this new threat, but now they couldn’t. However, it also gave them an opportunity. Kevan knew what Tywin would have done, so he knew what he had to do. He spoke to Varys once more.

“Can your little birds find their way into Meereen?”

“Most certainly, my Lord Hand.” That was the answer Kevan wanted. He would take care of that later. For now, they had other matters.

“What is the state of the city? There were a lot of damage during the Battle of Blackwater, and even riots because of the scarcity of food. How are the repairs going on?”

“The repairs are over.” Surprisingly, it was Jaime who spoke. Kevan would have thought it would be Lord Tyrell or Lord Rosby, their positions were far more in link with this. He understood why Jaime intervened with the next words he spoke. “Tyrion saw to the repairs on the Mud Gate and the docks when he was acting as Master of Coin.”

Pycelle coughed before he spoke with disgust. “Uh. A man who murdered his own father.”

Jaime stared at the Grand Maester and retorted. “You said yourself my father died of a heart failure. Furthermore, Tyrion is only accused of murder. His guilt is yet unproved.”

The Grand Maester spluttered. “Lord Commander… I know, I said it, but… but I hadn’t looked close enough. I… I examined Lord Tywin’s body closer later… and I found…”

“That’s enough!” Kevan wouldn’t have such a discussion here. He would speak separately with Jaime and the Grand Maester later. “We have more important matters to attend. I am in personal charge of this trial, this is no business for this council. Furthermore, I forbid everyone to proclaim my nephew’s guilt until the trial is over.” No one dared to reply. “So, what about the state of the finances? Lord Rosby?”

The man coughed all along as he answered. “The Crown is tens of millions in debt. We had to stop the payments on the debts we had towards the Holy Faith and the Iron Bank of Braavos in order to rebuild the royal fleet.”

Kean stared at the man. “Are you the one who made that decision?”

“No, my Lord Hand. We didn’t have enough gold to pay for the construction of the new fleet because of the great number of gold cloaks, so the queen decided to postpone the payments on the Crown’s debts, and the small council agreed.”

“Start back the payments immediately. The construction of the royal fleet will wait. We cannot risk problems with the Faith or the Iron Bank.”

“My lord,” began Lord Tyrell on an outraged tone. “I already began to build the ten new dromonds to add to the few ships we have actually. Without the money, I cannot build them. Also, I would like to point out my daughter is still waiting impatiently for her marriage with the king to join our houses.”

“Lord Tyrell, I am really sorry about this whole situation. The death of my brother surprised us all and created many complications. The royal wedding will take place exactly in two weeks. You have my word as a Lannister on that, and a Lannister always pays his debts. As for the royal fleet, it will wait until the Master of Coin finds new money to build it.”

Lord Rosby coughed again, perhaps in surprise this time, but he said nothing. It meant he agreed. Lord Tyrell seemed about to protest again, but Kevan spoke before he could. “As for the other matters, the trial for my nephew Tyrion will take place in a few days. We must deal with it before the wedding takes place. Also, I will need your assistance in this, Lord Mace. You are to be judge on this trial, so you won’t have the time to prepare the wedding or to build the royal fleet. You will be more needed to serve the justice. I think this will be all for today. I am tired and in need of rest. You may go, except you Jaime.” This calmed the Lord of Highgarden. He received an honor he already received before, but that was enough to keep him quiet for the moment. Kevan was very careful to make no mention of Lord Rosby however. He didn’t think it would be good to have him as a judge. He feared he may be working for Cersei, and considering her recent and older decisions, Kevan didn’t trust his niece’s choices.

The members of the small council all left until only he and Jaime remained. Kevan turned to face his nephew. “Jaime, I need to know. How did he die?”

Jaime answered slowly. “In his sleep. He didn’t suffer. According to the Grand Maester, his heart just failed during the night.”

Kevan lowered his head. “Was there any funeral?”

“No. I thought it would be better to wait for your arrival. I made arrangements with the Silent Sisters and the Grand Maester to preserve the body. Anyway, Cersei was too occupied to organize a trial against Tyrion and to make the Tyrells angry to care about it.”

Kevan studied Jaime’s face. He was angry at his twin sister, obviously. He thought he knew why. “Why did Cersei arrest Tyrion? Was there anything to make believe he killed Tywin?”

“No, absolutely not. Cersei entered his chamber and didn’t believe me when I told her our father was dead. When Pycelle told us he died of natural causes, she just denied it, declared there would no wedding before his assassin was found and left the room. From what I learned later from other kingsguards, she went with three of them right away to arrest Tyrion and sent him to the black cells. She also immediately confined the Tyrells and everyone else in the castle to their rooms.”

Kevan rolled his eyes. Now he understood why Jaime said in his message that Cersei had gone mad. “You did well to summon me here. However, I would have a very important question to ask you Jaime.” Kevan stared directly in his nephew’s eyes and asked the question on the most serious tone. “Do you think Tywin was assassinated?”

Jaime took some time before he answered. “I think that might not be impossible, though I don’t think he was killed. Most likely he died in his sleep because of his heart, but his death is very sudden, so that’s not impossible. But I know Tyrion didn’t do it. I would bet my money on someone else if I had to guess who killed my father.”

“Who do you think might have done this?”

Jaime needed some time to answer his question once again. His words surprised Kevan. “Sansa Stark.”

Kevan was confused for a moment. It wasn’t a name he was expecting. “Why do you think she may have killed Tywin?”

“She had more reasons than everyone else to have him killed. After the Twins and the death of her father, not to mention her forced marriage to Tyrion. I think she may have done it. After all, people don’t say that poison is a woman’s weapon for nothing. There is some truth in that. And the Grand Maester now believes Father was poisoned.” He made a break, then added hesitantly. “Also, she tried to escape not long after his death.”

That brought Kevan’s attention. “She tried to escape? Are you sure about that?”

“There are a few people who are watching over her, and they told me that she met someone in the godswood one night, and that this someone wanted to help her to escape. They told me she refused to leave King’s Landing with the man, but the simple fact she went to see him shows that she might have been inclined to accept the offer before, and that she trusted the man. Sadly, the man is dead. He tried to kidnap her when she refused to follow him, and the people protecting her killed him.”

“Who was this man?”

“Ser Dontos Hollard, a drunken knight Joffrey turned into his fool. I don’t think he was acting alone, he seemed too stupid for that. Apparently he said something about someone who was paying him.”

Kevan sighed. “Too bad he’s dead, we might have known who was behind this. Someone has taken an interest in Sansa Stark and tried to use the situation to get her out of the city. She is the key to the North, so other people might want to use her instead of us. We’ll have to watch her closely.”

“We can trust the people protecting her. Some are paid by me, the others are loyal. Anyway, my new sister-in-law doesn’t seem eager to leave the capital now. She spent the last weeks building a strong defense case for Tyrion.”

This information surprised Kevan. Why was Sansa Stark trying to defend Tyrion at his trial? He would have to talk to this young woman tomorrow. For now, he needed some rest. “Thank you Jaime, I will take into consideration what you told me.”

As Kevan raised, Jaime interrupted him. “Are you really going to put Tyrion on trial? He did nothing. Cersei imagines that he killed our father because she hates him.”

“I don’t believe Tyrion killed Tywin me neither, Jaime. Sadly, Tyrion spent more than a month in a cell now. I cannot just release him like this and say it was a mistake. He was arrested by the Queen Regent. We will have a trial in a few days, and if Tyrion is innocent, he will not be declared guilty. I will not allow him to be executed, exiled, or sentenced to anything if he is found innocent. Now please excuse me, but I have other important things to do.”

Kevan left and went into the Tower of the Hand to update on the reports of the Crown. He also wrote a message he sent to Varys. Afterwards, he quickly visited Cersei in her chambers. She looked quite happy when she saw him, but turned very sour when she learned he wouldn’t free her of her confinement. This confinement was Joffrey’s orders, and Kevan couldn’t go against an order from the king. She tried to argue with him, but Kevan stopped her. He had to lecture her as Tywin would have done, about her mistakes with the Iron Bank and the Faith, her wrong choices of members of the small council, her foolish decisions with the Tyrells and Tyrion right after Tywin’s death. She had shamed House Lannister by arresting Tyrion without any proof, even more since Kevan saw nothing indicating seriously Tyrion as the responsible for Tywin’s death. She then entered a great rage and accused Tyrion of all the horrible things she could imagine, from the death of her mother when he was born to Tywin’s death, accusing him at the same time to try to have her and Joffrey killed. She really looked mad as she threw all her accusations, most of them more stupid than each other. Kevan soon had enough of it and stated firmly the trial would decide if she was right. However, he allowed her to receive all the visitors she would ask before he left.

Kevan slept in the Tower of the Hand, in the bed that belonged to Tywin not long ago. He didn’t feel right in it. He wasn’t supposed to be Hand of the King. He had always been Tywin’s advisor, but was never meant to be the head of House Lannister. Sadly, for now, it seemed he was. He hoped it wouldn’t be for long and that this situation was only a transition. There would a new Lord or Lady of Casterly Rock soon. Who it would be, he had no idea however.

Next morning, Kevan visited Prince Oberyn Martell. Without any surprise, the prince was in a brothel, and Kevan felt quite uncomfortable in such a place. Kevan never visited whores in his whole life, not even before he was married. The memory of his father’s mistress had marked him for life, and now he had a wife and children. He would never shame Dorna for anything in the world. The prince accepted the proposition he made to him very quickly, even though he was quite surprised of it. Kevan had to reinforce the fragile alliance between the Martells and the Crown, so to offer him a seat on the small council and the place of third judge on Tyrion’s trial seemed an appropriate decision. He knew the Red Viper had no love for the Lannisters, but it wouldn’t matter there. Lord Mace Tyrell would vote as Kevan would tell him at the trial, so if Prince Oberyn was decided to vote against Tyrion even if he was innocent, it wouldn’t matter.

Later in the morning, Kevan went to see someone else. As he walked, he thought about Cersei’s accusations against Tyrion. He didn’t know everything that happened while he was fighting in the Riverlands against Robb Stark, so he couldn’t be sure of anything. Could Tyrion have killed Tywin? It seemed so unreal to Kevan. He knew Tywin had no love for Tyrion, and Tyrion probably had no love for his father, but to kill him? It would need something very grave for Tyrion to do such a thing. Lancel told him how Tyrion had fought bravely at the Battle of Blackwater. Kevan couldn’t really bring himself to believe that Tyrion had done such a thing. He couldn’t believe a Lannister killed another Lannister. Jaime didn’t believe Tyrion to be guilty, and Cersei really seemed mad in some way. However, the Grand Maester now seemed to believe Tywin had been poisoned. If Tyrion didn’t do it, who then? His wife? Kevan may have a better opinion of it in a few minutes. He couldn’t visit Tyrion. He was one of his judges after all. To talk with him before the trial could be misinterpreted by the others. He had to keep the respect the other houses had for House Lannister, especially after what Cersei did. However, he would speak with Tyrion’s wife.

When he arrived before the Lady Sansa’s rooms, a woman clad in armor and with a sword at her belt was standing before the door. She was probably the one who brought Jaime back to King’s Landing. “I wish to speak with the Lady Sansa,” he said.

“Ser Kevan.” She gave a little bow with her head. It seemed she already knew who he was. “Please wait a moment. I’ll see if my lady is disposed to receive you.”

She went through the door and came back after a few seconds. “You may enter, ser.” Kevan went into the room.
He didn’t know what he expected from Lady Sansa Stark. His two sons, Martyn and Willem, had died in the hands of a Stark bannerman, so he wasn’t very eager to meet a Stark in person, especially not after Kevan’s family arranged the death of her last remaining siblings and forced her to marry a member of this same family. Kevan had been shocked when he learned about the Red Wedding. These Freys were really animals. Kevan hadn’t been so surprised afterwards when he discovered Tywin was behind this. Tywin always did what was necessary for House Lannister, no matter what it was, but it didn’t stop Kevan from being disgusted by some of his decisions. Still, they were necessary decisions for Tywin, and even if Kevan had some doubts about them, he couldn’t question his brother’s motives. He didn’t blame him. After the follies of his father Tytos, Kevan understood why Tywin took these decisions, as horrible they could be.

When Kevan looked for the first time at the Lady Sansa, he saw a tall young woman with blue eyes and red hair staring at him. She was very beautiful. She could even compete with Cersei. She looked more like a Tully than a Stark. In some way, it was a luck for Tyrion they had her as a hostage. Tywin had failed so many times to find Tyrion a suitable wife. This war at least gave them that opportunity. However, he also remarked something else. Her face was expressionless. She showed no sign of any emotion or feeling when he gazed at her. She stood tall and calm, her hands folded before her. She was looking at Kevan straight into the eyes. With her calm, it was intimidating in some way.

“Ser Kevan.” Her voice didn’t show any emotion either. It was calm, soft, and low. Not an unpleasant voice, but it had no joy nor sadness to it.

“My lady.” Kevan bowed his head lightly. “I hoped I could talk with you.”

“Of course. Do you want to sit?”

“That would be welcomed.”

Kevan sat at the round table before him and Lady Sansa did the same on the opposite side. She continued to fix him with eyes that showed nothing. He couldn’t even see curiosity or interest on her face. He also noticed a golden necklace with a lion on it around her neck. That was quite unsettling. Kevan tried to engage the conversation. “My lady, you surely know I arrived yesterday to perform my duties as Hand of the King. You probably know as well I am to act as main judge for your husband’s trial.”

“Yes, I know. Ser Jaime already informed me of all this. I’m sure you will prove to be an impartial judge.”

Kevan didn’t know if he had to take this as a taunt or as a compliment. The voice and the face of the young lady were so inexpressive that he couldn’t tell. “My lady, I also discussed with my nephew Jaime and he told me you are organizing the defense of your husband.”

“This is my duty as his wife.” No emotion pierced through her voice again. It would be quite difficult for Kevan to build an opinion on this woman. Or was she a girl? She was the young sister of Robb Stark, and the young wolf had been barely eighteen when he died. How old could she be? She probably looked much older than she was in reality, and not only because of her physical appearance. Her demeanour showed a maturity few women had at this age. Kevan remembered Dorna not long after they married. She was more childish back then than this girl was now.

Kevan crossed his fingers on the table. “My lady, I am not your enemy. In fact, I may be your best ally here. My niece, the Queen Regent, wants to see your husband dead and built a strong case against him. The judges she chose weren’t… the best choices for a fair trial. The two judges accompanying me are. I am not here to sentence your husband to die, but to determine if he really murdered his father. If the testimonies cannot prove he is guilty, I won’t declare him guilty.”

“So you’re telling you will be the one to judge my lord husband while the other judges do what you tell them to. I hope you don’t have prejudices against Lord Tyrion.”

Kevan was exasperated by this statement. “I have nothing against Tyrion, my lady. I can’t pretend I have ever been close to him, but he is a member of my family. If you asked me right now if he was guilty, I would say no, but he was accused by the Queen Regent, and we need a trial for that. I will hear both of them and decide with what they give me as proofs, but I will not sentence Tyrion without solid proof of his guilt.”

Lady Sansa continued to stare at him without blinking. Her face was a mask of impassivity. How could she hold this way all the time? Kevan continued. It was time for him to ask her the questions he came for. “My lady, I would like to have your opinion about all of this. You said that you were arranging your husband’s defense because it was your duty. Do you really think he is innocent?”

“I don’t believe he is innocent. I KNOW he is innocent.” This time Kevan thought he perceived a spark of anger in her voice.

“How can you be so sure, my lady?”

“I simply know it.” She stared defiantly at Kevan, and that unsettled him again.

“Do you have any idea who could have done it then, if we admit my brother was assassinated? I have to confess I don’t even know for sure if he died of natural or unnatural causes.” Kevan wanted to see how she would react to the bait he set for her.

“I don’t know. Many people had reasons to kill Lord Tywin. We make a lot of enemies when we are here in King’s Landing, even more when we are Hand of the King. My own father learned it at his expenses, just like my lord husband.”

That wasn’t the answer Kevan expected. He thought she would use his uncertainty to support the hypothesis Tywin died of natural causes, but she didn’t. She was a Stark and honor mattered very much in this family. Perhaps she really said what she thought. He rose from his seat. “I see. I thank you for the time you gave me, my lady, but my duties await me. I would like you to send me the names of the people who will testify for my nephew as soon as possible. Do you allow me to leave?”

“I don’t think you need my permission. I’ll send you the names as soon as possible.” Kevan made a little bow with his head and walked away. However, before he could leave the room, he heard the young lady speak to him. “When Tyrion was arrested I was with him in this room.” Kevan turns to face the woman. “We were sleeping together in the early morning when the queen erupted with three guards. One of them knocked out my husband with a punch at the head. He then slapped me on the cheek and brought Tyrion, bleeding, to the black cells, without a word of explanation. The queen remained with the two other guards in the room and ransacked it. They gave me no more explanation about what was going on. Your niece only told me that I would be a widow very soon, and then left while her two men continued to search everywhere for who knows what. I only learned what happened hours later when my husband’s squire came with my dinner in the evening. Don’t be surprised if I don’t trust every Lannister.”

Kevan stayed still a moment after Lady Sansa was done with her tale. He didn’t know about this. He knew Cersei arrested Tyrion immediately after she discovered Tywin’s death, but he didn’t know about these details. He would have to inquire on this. “I’m sorry, my lady. I am not my niece.” He left without another word.
As Kevan walked to the Tower of the Hand, he thought about his conversation with the Lady Sansa, especially about the things she told him right before he left her rooms. If what she said was true, then Cersei was really to be watched. When she would come out of confinement, he would need his men to keep an eye on her. He couldn’t allow things like this to happen. He also had to discover which guard hit Tyrion and Lady Sansa. However, it was the lady’s behaviour as she talked about it that puzzled Kevan. She had seemed angry, insulted as well, no surprise in that, but as Kevan thought about it something stood out from the few things she told him. She hadn’t been outraged only by the way she was treated, but most of all by the way Tyrion was treated. She was organizing his defense for the trial. She was persuaded he was innocent of this crime. There was a determination in her, a sureness he didn’t see in many women, and it was oriented toward Tyrion. Could it be possible that she cared for him? She said she was sleeping with Tyrion when he was arrested, which was strange considering Kevan already knew, by Tywin’s letters and the information he collected on the road and here since he arrived, that Tyrion’s marriage was unconsummated. Kevan really didn’t know what to think about the young lady. Could it be possible she killed Tywin? Kevan understood now why Jaime suspected her. He rarely saw people who displayed so few emotions. However, there was no proof about her or Tyrion’s guilt. Kevan would make his opinion about it at the trial once he would have all the facts before him. This meant he would get fixed in four days when the trial would begin. He hoped he wouldn’t have to sentence his own nephew to death. He hoped Tyrion didn’t kill Tywin.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: another Hand of the King
Davos I

Chapter Notes

We take a look in Davos's mind now.

I know there may be some people who find this chapter useless (like the one with Daenerys) because they are mainly scenes from the TV show with a few alterations after Tywin’s death, but that don’t change much to their storylines. These chapters are in some way some sort of preludes to introduce these characters later in the story. There will be a point where Daenerys, Davos, Jon, Arya, Bran, Melisandre, Yara, Sam... will join the story.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Davos I

“Your Grace, if you’d like to sit, I’m sure that…”

“We’ve been here since midday.”

His king was perambulating in the great hall. His footsteps were echoing on the marble of the floor and the walls. Davos knew his Grace had every right to be unsatisfied. Davos convinced his king to accompany him to Braavos in order to get a loan from the Iron Bank. They needed the loan, or else Stannis Baratheon would never sit on the Iron Throne. Davos would have travelled all the way to Braavos alone, but they had a better chance to get something from these bankers if the king came himself. They needed the money to buy weapons, ships, to hire pirates and sellswords. However, they had to wait if they were to get it. The Iron Bank of Braavos didn’t comply with orders of the kings of Westeros, whoever they were. Furthermore, since King Stannis’s position wasn’t good, they probably felt no emergency to meet him. So, they had to wait, and the king grew impatient.

He was growing more impatient than ever these last months, and he was also angry at Davos for freeing the boy, Gendry. Davos had no choice. To unite Seven Kingdoms with blood magic was evil, and King Stannis wasn’t an evil man. As King of Westeros, it was the duty of Stannis Baratheon to protect his people. A king who didn’t protect his people was no king, and so if Stannis had sacrificed the bastard boy, he would have been no king at all. Davos did it for Stannis. He always told the truth to his king, even if it was hard. It was better to tell hard truths than pleasant lies. The boy was innocent, and it would have been unfair to kill him. He understood that killing a man for his crimes could be necessary for justice, but there would have been no justice in killing Gendry. That would have been murder. Davos deserved the loss of his phalanxes for his years of smuggling. It had been a small price for his knighthood and a better life for his son and his wife, but the boy had done nothing wrong. Davos did what was necessary. Stannis probably didn’t realize it, but Davos saved him by freeing Gendry against his will. He served his king, and he saved an innocent boy. Now, he served Stannis again and was trying to get him his army.

“You need someone to rebuild your army for you, someone to convince this lord and that lord to fight for you, to bring sellswords and pirates to your side.” These were the words Davos told Stannis when he revealed him the threat against the Wall. Unexpectedly, the red woman convinced Stannis to not execute him, stating Davos had a part to play in the war to come. If there was something Davos hadn’t expected, it was this. He knew Melisandre had real powers, he saw some of them with his own eyes. The woman was so mysterious, the former smuggler still didn’t know what to make of her and mistrusted her, but he had to admit Stannis was right, he had been saved by this red god he mocked. Or at least, he was saved by a woman who believed she was serving this god. He wouldn’t trust Melisandre all the same. She was a danger, and if he promised he wouldn’t do anything against her, Stannis wouldn’t stop Davos from speaking and warning against her.

“Easterners have a different sense of time, I’ve often found. Once I was waiting for Salladhor Saan here in Braavos. Together we were going to run three shiploads of the finest…”

Davos tried to tell one of his smuggler’s stories to spend time, perhaps more for himself than for the king, but the king made it quite obvious with a single stare that he wasn’t interested to hear it. Davos should have known better. Right now he wouldn’t have disdained the company of someone else. The king was good for leading armies, but not for conversations. He wished Salladhor Saan was here, but Davos had the impression the pirate lord was somewhere much more interesting for him than the Iron Bank. A place that King Stannis wouldn’t have approved, and that Davos didn’t approve either, but Salladhor was his friend, and Davos was more amused by this fact about his friend than anything else. More funny even had been the dumbfounded reaction of his friend when Davos revealed to him there was no brothel on Dragonstone. King Stannis was probably the only king to allow no such establishments on his lands. Davos hoped he wouldn’t do the same to all Westeros when he would seize the Seven Kingdoms, or else every sailor in the world would refuse to make any trip to King’s Landing, Oldtown, Lannister, White Harbor, Gulltown or the Iron Islands. That would put an end to the smugglers, but also to legal trade. No sailor wanted to go somewhere there were no whores.

Finally, the massive golden doors behind the massive marble table opened and allowed three men to enter. They sat at the three cushioned chairs behind the table. They wore usual clothes for Braavosi rich men. Davos only recognized one of them, Tycho Nestoris, at the center. He had met him once, a long time ago, when he was still a smuggler, to get a loan for a rich merchant of Braavos. The loan back then had been to give Davos a ship in order to bring special spices from Meereen. A dangerous trip that nearly cost Davos his life, and the life of the merchant, if Davos hadn’t come back with the wares. But he did, the merchant was able to pay the Iron Bank its due, and the merchant made money. If he hadn’t, the Iron Bank would have gotten its due all the same. One way or another, they always get their money back.

This time, however, the stake was much higher. Davos would have to be very careful in the negotiations to come. “Welcome to the Iron Bank. Please, sit.” Nestoris invited them to take the marble seats right before them. Davos waited for his king to sit first. He feared how he may react to this. King Stannis ordered the respect that was owed to him as Lord of the Seven Kingdoms in all circumstances, but here he couldn’t. Before the Iron Bank, he was only someone seeking a loan like any other. Davos had explained it to his king on the way to Braavos so he may not be insulted by the way the bankers would act with him, but Davos knew he was insulted. No wonder, since they waited for two hours in this hall after a long journey through the Narrow Sea. The king took his time to sit and shot a stern look at Davos as he did so. Davos hoped his king would make no mistake. However, he also feared that he may make mistakes himself.

“What can we do for you, Lord Stannis?”

Davos answered to Tycho Nestoris before the king could. “This is Stannis of the House Baratheon, King of the Andals and the First Men, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm.” Nestoris fixed Davos with stern eyes, without a hint of emotion, and moved his arm to invite him to sit as well. Davos complied.
The Iron Throne is currently occupied by Joffrey of the House Baratheon, King of the Andals and the First Men, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm.” Nestoris ended his words with a little smile. King Stannis chose this moment to speak.

“He shares no blood with me. He is a bastard born of incest. As was his brother before him.”

“Yes, we have heard this story.”

“It’s not a story. It’s the truth.” Davos didn’t like the direction the conversation was heading. It wouldn’t help them to discuss about questions of legitimacy. The Iron Bank wasn’t interested by these things.

“The king’s grandfather tells a different story. A story about a jealous uncle whose attempts to usurp the throne from the rightful king cost the Seven Kingdoms dearly in blood and gold.”

“Gold you loaned him,” Davos’s king countered.

“And you feel your blood gives you a claim on our gold?”

“More than any man living.”

That wasn’t good. Davos warned King Stannis about it. We couldn’t claim anything from the Iron Bank. It wasn’t blood right that decided the Iron Bank to lend you money or not, it was your ability to pay them back. Stannis would never convince the bankers to grant him any loan by speaking this way. Davos’s thoughts were confirmed by the next words of Tycho Nestoris.

“Across the Narrow Sea, your books are filled with words like usurper and madman and blood right. Here, our books are filled with numbers. We prefer the stories they tell. More plain. Less open to interpretation.” Tycho Nestoris granted them another one of his little smiles. He then turned to Stannis. “How many fighting men remain loyal to you?”

“Four thousand,” Stannis replied.

“And how many ships do you have? The ones still afloat, Ser Davos, not at the bottom of Blackwater Bay.”

The mention of the battle brought back painful memories to Davos. The burning of hundreds of ships with their crew. Brave men who had wives, children, brothers, sisters, mothers, fathers, cousins, friends, even lovers who would never see them again. A hell of wildfire burning everything. A green fire that nothing could extinguish, not even water. His son, Matthos, who died in front of his own eyes. Davos gulped before he answered.

“Thirty-two.”

“And how much wheat and barley and beef and pork do you produce on Dragonstone to feed your four thousand men on your thirty-two ships?”

After a moment, the king answered with the truth, as he always did. “None.”

“You can see why these numbers seem unlikely to add up to a happy ending from our perspective. I’m afraid we must respectfully decline your request. But we thank you for paying us the honor of your visit.”

Tycho Nestoris was always smiling as he talked. Davos couldn’t blame the Iron Bank. Many of his friends from the time he was a smuggler only cared about money as well. If they didn’t see a profit to something, they wouldn’t contribute. Right now, however, it was the look King Stannis gave to him that made him fear the worse. Davos knew what it meant. He was running out of time as much as Stannis was running out of time if he didn’t want to become a page in the history book of someone else. He had to do something, to convince these bankers with their own arguments, with the only reasons that could convince them. He had to provide them a way to get their money back, to show them Stannis was the best investment for them. Stannis raised from his seat, and Davos did the same, but as his king was heading to the window, Davos directed his attention to the three men sitting in front of him.

“My lord,” he began, addressing Tycho Nestoris.

“I’m not a lord, Ser Davos Seaworth. You would not be either here. In Braavos, thieves are not rewarded with titles.”

Davos sighed internally at Nestoris’s comment. As usual, people saw him as a thief. There was a difference between stealing, and selling what others stole. “Well, strictly speaking, I didn’t do the thieving. That would be the pirates. I just moved what they stole from one place to another.” Davos took off his glove from his right hand and showed it to the bankers. The missing phalanxes seemed to surprise them. For the first time in the meeting, Tycho Nestoris didn’t maintain his patronizing attitude. “This is the payment that was demanded by King Stannis for my crimes. I consider it an honest accounting. He’s an honest man and he’s your best chance to get back the money you’ve sunk into Westeros. Which is a lot, I imagine. Wars are expansive.”

“The war is over,” the banker observed.

“As long as Stannis lives, the war is not over. Who’s the real power in King’s Landing?”

“Ser Davos…” Nestoris began to rise, but Davos stopped him.

“Humor me.”

The bankers remained silent for a moment. Davos knew why, so he explained what he knew the bankers already knew. “You don’t know. No one is in command anymore in King’s Landing. Tywin Lannister was the real power, and Tywin Lannister is dead, killed by his own son, the Imp, his Master of Coin. Who will pay you back now? Who will you back? Joffrey Baratheon, a bastard born of incest, who is as mad as the Mad King was? Cersei Lannister, a queen whose people despise and have no respect for her? Jaime Lannister, a man best known for killing the king he was sworn to protect? Tyrion Lannister, the Imp, who’s rotting into a cell and most likely will be executed before the next moon? Who do you back now?”

“This problem is not of your concern,” answered Nestoris, again with a smirk.

“Begging your pardon, I think this is a problem for all of us. There’s only one reliable leader left in Westeros. Stannis.” Davos pointed to his king who was still looking in another direction. “He’s got the birthright. He’s in his prime. He’s a tried and tested battle commander. And he doesn’t just talk about paying people back, he does it.”

Davos showed again his hand, now covered again with a glove, to emphasize his words. He saw Tycho Nestoris and the other bankers look at Stannis with cold eyes. Davos hoped it was enough to convince them. Davos was honest with these bankers, he believed his words. The Lannisters would never be able to pay back the Iron Bank without Tywin Lannister. Among all of them, there was only the Imp that Davos believed eventually capable of giving the Iron Bank its due. He and Tywin Lannister had defeated Stannis at Blackwater together, and he had held a corrupted and starving city on the brink of insurgence for months. Davos didn’t think Tywin Lannister would have named him Master of Coin if he didn’t have certain capabilities. However, he had killed his father and would be executed very soon. If the Iron Bank wanted its gold back, they needed Stannis as much as Stannis needed them.

Finally, after a moment, one of the two other bankers, who remained silent for the whole meeting up to now, spoke. “You told us the truth, Ser Davos. You are right, Tywin Lannister would have paid us back, but we have no guarantee that his son, his daughter, or his grandson will. In fact, after his death, one of the first decisions of the Queen Regent was to stop the payments the Crown owes us.” Davos couldn’t believe what he heard. So soon? “If King Stannis is really able to pay us back…”

“He will. As soon as he takes the Iron Throne. But King Stannis will not be able to take the Iron Throne without gold. If you don’t lend him money right now, you may never see your gold back.” He cut the banker and put weight to make them understand they needed to support Stannis immediately, or else they could lose everything.

Tycho Nestoris smiled at the comment. “The Iron Bank will have its due, one way or another, but King Stannis, as you call him, may be a good way to get it back. How much do you need?”

Davos and Stannis, but mostly Davos (the king wasn’t good for negotiations), spent the next two hours discussing with the representatives of the Iron Bank. When finally they reached an agreement, King Stannis disposed immediately of five hundred thousand golden dragons, and would be able to obtain the same amount later when he would have seized one of the Seven Kingdoms or King’s Landing. Davos was able to lower the interest rate from 20% to 10%, convincing the Iron Bank that the capacity of Westeros to pay higher rates wasn’t certain with winter coming and the many devastated lands.

When they left the Iron Bank, they had more than enough gold to make their next move. The war was about to start again. Davos went to see Salladhor Saan and without surprise, his friend was in a brothel.

Chapter End Notes

With Tywin dead, the Iron Bank has high doubts about the hability of the Crown to pay its debts. And you can see now how Cersei’s decisions have dire consequences and only confirm their worries.

Please review

Next chapter: the trial begins
Sansa VIII

Chapter Notes

Tyrion’s trial begins. Remember he is not accused of Joffrey's murder, but of attempt of murder against Joffrey AND the murder of Tywin. And if Tywin isn't there to judge him, Joffrey is still alive and we know what kind of justice he gives.

The trial is covering seven chapters and this is the first one. A lot of things are going to happen.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SANSA VIII

Mira was brushing her hair. It was the beginning of the afternoon, so normally Sansa wouldn’t have her hair brushed at this hour, but this day was different. In less than an hour, Tyrion’s trial would begin. Uncertainty and anxiety filled Sansa’s head and body. She was afraid. Afraid for Tyrion, and afraid for her. If Tyrion was sentenced to death, things would turn worse for Sansa than they ever were. If Tyrion was dead, she would be forced to marry another Lannister, and who knew what he might do to her. Tyrion was kind, he never mistreated her, showed her more respect than everyone else ever did since her father died. She didn’t want him to die. He didn’t deserve it. Sansa knew he was innocent of the crimes Cersei accused him. She hoped the judges would believe it, and if they believed it, that they would be prone to exonerate her husband.

Mira put down the brush. “Do you want to wear any jewel, my lady?”

“No. I’ll be alright like this.” Sansa played a little with her necklace. She only took it off when she took a bath now.

Mira stood away from the glass. Sansa looked at her image. She had to make a good impression at the trial, but she knew it counted for little in the outcome. Everything would depend on the testimonies on both sides, and the willingness of the judges to spare or sentence Tyrion. She didn’t know what to expect of the judges. Ser Kevan Lannister had come to visit her when he arrived in King’s Landing a few days ago. The knight didn’t seem as ruthless as Tyrion’s father, he even seemed sincere when he said he would judge Tyrion fairly. Tyrion was the one who had the idea to call him here, so perhaps he really trusted his uncle. However, Sansa couldn’t be sure of anything. Tyrion might have done this in despair and only because Ser Kevan was a little bit better than his sister. It wasn’t difficult to find someone better than the Queen Regent. Furthermore, she knew Ser Kevan had been Lord Tywin’s main advisor for many years, and she wasn’t ready to trust someone who advised the man behind the slaughtering of her family. As for Lord Mace Tyrell and Prince Oberyn Martell, she didn’t think the first would have any favorable prejudice toward Tyrion, and the second would surely want to see him dead for the atrocities the Lannisters committed against the Martells during the last rebellion. She could only hope to convince Ser Kevan and Lord Mace.

Sansa looked at Mira. The Forrester had become Sansa’s closest friend these last weeks, taking Shae’s place as her confident. Mira came from the North and her situation was so much like Sansa’s that she felt a lot of sympathy for the girl. Sansa could also speak of things she had never been able to talk about with Shae or Margaery. With Mira she could talk freely about the North, and she had someone who could really understand her. Mira was also an ally in Sansa’s fight to get Tyrion free. Both of them needed Tyrion alive, Mira for her family, Sansa for herself. She thought she understood better now why Tyrion had tried to help Mira. She hadn’t cared about it after her family’s death, but now she realized Tyrion had been ashamed by what his family did at the Twins. Perhaps it had been an attempt to mend the horrors his family was responsible for. She remembered Margaery’s words. I think he has nothing to do with it. He looks ashamed by what his family has done, he has bad relationships with his father and his sister, he obviously hates Joffrey, and he never caused you any harm. And she remembered as well the words he told her not long after. What happened to your family was a terrible crime. I didn’t know your brother. He seemed like a good man, but I didn’t know him. Your mother, on the other hand, I admired her. She wanted to have me executed, but I admired her. She was a strong woman. And she was fierce when it came to protecting her children.

The memory nearly brought tears to her eyes.

“My lady, we should go now. The trial will start very soon.”

Mira was right. Sansa restrained herself and pushed back her tears inside. She had to be strong today. She couldn’t allow herself to look weak. If she wanted to save Tyrion, she had to stay focused on the trial and find a way to have him cleared of all charges. She rose from her chair.

“Let’s go then.” Mira followed on her heels.

Outside the door, Brienne was waiting for them. They walked in silence to the Great Hall where the trial was to take place. No one had anything to say. They had already talked about this day long enough before, they all knew what they had to do for the trial. Sansa’s heart was pounding in her chest. She wondered if Brienne and Mira could hear it. When they got close enough of the Throne Room, Sansa heard someone whispering on her right.

“Mira.”

Sansa turned to face the person. It was a girl with brown hair and wearing Reach clothes. She had seen her before. She was one of Margaery’s handmaidens. Sansa believed her name was Sera. She was Mira’s friend.

“Sera.” Mira greeted her politely. Her friend told Sansa she had to cut her links with Sera after everything that happened, on Sera’s wishes moreover, but it was strange in this case that Margaery’s handmaiden wanted to speak with Mira.

“My lady.” Sera bowed before Sansa. “Mira, I need to talk to you, it’s very important. Can I, Lady Sansa? It will only take a few minutes.”

Mira looked to Sansa with the question on her face. The other girl looked distressed. Sansa gave her leave. “Very well. Join us on the benches when you’re done.”

Mira went away with Sera and Sansa continued toward the doors. People were entering to assist the trial as if it was a tournament. She heard some making wagers on the verdict. She also heard some whispers on her as she walked. Imp’s wife. Traitor’s daughter. Maiden wife. Sansa ignored them. It was no use to take care of what they said. She took a place with Brienne on the benches, in the middle of the right side of the Iron Throne. There were many conversations around she couldn’t understand, but she felt a few eyes on her. She was the wife of the man who was accused of murdering his own father and attempting to murder the king. The accusations were untrue, but people were mocking her all the same. They didn’t know the truth. She would have to show them the truth.
She saw Ser Kevan standing next to the Iron Throne. She also saw Margaery, Ser Loras, their father and Lady Olenna discussing before the dais. She caught Margaery’s eyes and her friend gave her a smile. She also saw Prince Oberyn, his arm around the waist of a woman dressed even more lightly than Margaery. She was probably his paramour. Cersei sat in her own chair, staring right in front of her. That might be the first time she was allowed out of her rooms for weeks. The thought brought a quick smile upon Sansa’s face. Joffrey was nowhere to be seen. With some luck, he decided to not attend the trial. Sansa also spotted Bronn on the other side of the room. She had agreed with him and Brienne that they would both ensure her safety and Tyrion’s safety during the trial, but they weren’t to be seen together. It could attract too much attention. Mira joined her and Brienne at this moment. Sansa saw that her face was quite gloomy, but before she could ask her anything, a voice she always feared thundered in the Throne Room.

“OK, let’s get over with this.” Joffrey was there. He sat on the Iron Throne, looking bored and impatient to get over with this. Sansa feared the worst for a time. What if he decided to judge Tyrion himself? Tyrion had no chance in this case, and Sansa neither. She made a silent prayer to the Mother. Have mercy on us all.

Ser Kevan spoke at this moment. “My lords, my ladies, take your place. The trial will begin very soon.” People rushed to take a place on the several benches in the room. There were too many people and not enough places. One of the benches toppled. Finally, the City Watch had to escort outside the people there was no place for and closed the doors. It took a few minutes to make sure everything was in order. When everyone was seated, they were tighter than in the streets of King’s Landing.

After some time, the doors opened again. Everyone went silent as Ser Jaime entered. Behind him was Tyrion, flanked by two gold cloaks. He seemed in good health, his clothes were clean and in good state, and he was well shaven. She looked at him, waiting for him to return her gaze. He did it after some time, and gave her a thin smile. Sansa returned one to him. At least, he seemed alright for now. Sansa realized as he approached the box of the accused that he wore shackles around his wrists. Sansa was furious about it. As if Tyrion represented a threat. He was innocent furthermore. Anyway, if they really wanted him to represent no threat, they should have gagged him. His tongue was much more dangerous than his hands. She heard someone shouting “Kinslayer” in the crowd. The gold cloaks attached Tyrion’s chains to the box and each of them went to stand guard before one of the two rows of benches, facing the king. Ser Jaime went to the left of the throne.

After a moment, Joffrey raised from the throne, and everyone followed him. Sansa, Mira and Brienne had to do the same, though Sansa didn’t like to imitate Joffrey. Her former betrothed started to speak. “I, Joffrey of the House Baratheon, First of my Name, King of the Andals, the First Men, and the Rhoylnars, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm, do hereby recuse myself from this trial. Kevan of the House Lannister, Hand of the King, will sit as judge in my stead. And with him Prince Oberyn of the House Martell and Lord Mace of the House Tyrell. Once the accused is found guilty, bring me his head.”

At least he didn’t order to bring him his head immediately. Sansa felt very much relieved when Joffrey left the room with two kingsguards. Ser Kevan sat on the Iron Throne, while Lord Mace Tyrell sat on his left and Prince Oberyn on his right. Everyone sat down as they did. The trial began.

“Tyrion of the House Lannister,” started Ser Kevan. “You stand accused by the Queen Regent of the murder of your father, Tywin Lannister, the Lord of Casterly Rock and the Hand of the King. You are also accused of attempt of murder against the king. How do you plead to these accusations?”

“Not guilty.” Tyrion talked as if he was bored by all this.
“Do you have any idea who might have killed your father then?”

“None. I believe we’re not even sure he was killed.”

Tyrion wasn’t wrong about this. Jaime Lannister didn’t believe Lord Tywin was assassinated. This trial was Cersei’s doing, nothing more. His uncle didn’t seem to disagree with him but he said nothing.

“We will start the trial now. The accusation will call its witnesses first, then the defense will call his own. Both the accusation and the defense will have the right to a final speech once the testimonies will be over. The Crown may call its first witness.”

Sansa was already aware of the way the trial would take place. With the number of testimonies, it would surely take more than a single day to go through all of it. First, they would have to listen to Cersei’s witnesses. Sansa didn’t know who would testify against Tyrion, except two kingsguards, but at least the fact Cersei’s witnesses would go first may allow her to adjust her own testimonies afterwards.

Ser Meryn Trant was the first to testify for the Crown, and his testimony filled Sansa with rage. He began to talk about the day Joffrey caused a riot. Of course, he didn’t say Joffrey caused the riot. “Once we’d got King Joffrey safely away from the mob, the Imp rounded on him. He slapped the king across the face and called him a vicious idiot and a fool.” Sansa didn’t know if Tyrion really did it, but if he did she could only agree with his words. “It wasn’t the first time the Imp threatened Joffrey. Right here in this Throne Room, he marched up those steps and called our king a halfwit. Compared his Grace to the Mad King and suggested he’d meet the same fate. And when I spoke in the king’s defense, he threatened to have me killed.”

“Oh, why don’t you tell them what Joffrey was doing? Pointing a loaded crossbow at the Lady Sansa Stark while you tore at her clothes and beat her.” Tyrion decided to speak at this moment, telling the truth Sansa wished herself to shout in this moment.

“Silence!” Ser Kevan shouted. “You will not speak unless call upon, Tyrion. If you want to present a different version of this you will wait for your own time to speak. You’re dismissed, Ser Meryn.”

There was nothing she and Tyrion could do for now. Ser Meryn wasn’t entirely false, but he used words taken away from their context. Tyrion had never meant those words as a threat for Joffrey, more as a lesson. He had protected her this day, and now his sister was using it against him. Sansa was boiling in anger at Ser Meryn, but his testimony had no value. She could easily destroy it with her own witnesses later.

Ser Boros Blount came next. Sansa hated him even more than Ser Meryn. He was crueler. He told the same tale than his fellow companion, adding that Tyrion didn’t only slap Joffrey, but also kicked him, and that the king was covered with bruises when they brought him back to the Red Keep. Sansa knew that if Joffrey had some bruises, he had much less than the ones she had received at this occasion. She could destroy Ser Blount’s testimony as well.

Next came two men called Osfryd and Osney Kettleblack, Ser Osmund’s brothers. They talked about a supper Tyrion had with Cersei not long before the Battle of Blackwater when he threatened to hurt her one day. Afterwards came Ser Osmund who stated supposed words Joffrey told him on the day he was given his white cloak. “Good Ser Osmund, guard me and my father well, for my uncle loves us not. He means to be king in my place.”

Tyrion scoffed at this testimony, and Sansa would have done the same if she wasn’t so used to hide her true feelings behind courtesies. This testimony was so stupid. Even Joffrey wasn’t so stupid to believe something like that. The whole accusation was a farce.

Grand Maester Pycelle was the next one to speak. He was holding several sheets in his hands and began to enumerate a long list of names Sansa never heard, except for the essence of nightshade. After a moment, Oberyn Martell stopped him.

“I think you have made your point, Grand Maester. You have a lot of poison in your store.”

“Had, Prince Oberyn. My stores were plundered.”

“By whom?” asked Ser Kevan.

“By the accused, Tyrion Lannister, after he had me wrongfully imprisoned. Furthermore, a few weeks before Lord Tywin’s death, he came to me asking for essence of nightshade, saying it was for his wife who had problems to sleep. He took enough to kill a man.”

Sansa knew Tyrion had imprisoned the Grand Maester while he was Hand of the King, but she knew nothing about the stealing of his stores. As for the essence of nightshade, Tyrion really took some to help her sleep, but the little vial was still next to her bed, nearly unused. It was almost completely full. Tyrion couldn’t have used it to poison his father.

“Grand Maester, you examined Lord Tywin’s corpse. Was it without question poison that killed him?” asked Ser Kevan.

“Without question.”

“What poison was used to kill him?” This question came from Prince Oberyn.

The Grand Maester seemed to be looking for his words for a moment. “Tears of Lys.”

Sansa never heard that name before. Strangely, Prince Oberyn asked a very specific question then. “Were his belly and his bowels damaged? Was there an insufferable smell coming from Lord Tywin’s body?” The Grand Maester looked lost for a moment and Sansa too, until Prince Oberyn spoke again. “These are the effects of the tears of Lys. If he was poisoned by this, that’s what you should have observed. Did you observe it?”

The Grand Maester took some time to answer again. “Yes, of course.” He didn’t seem so certain from what Sansa could say. She had some doubts that he wasn’t saying the truth. In fact, she didn’t believe him at all. Cersei’s witnesses obviously all lied or distorted the truth. With his uncertain ways of speaking, she wasn’t about to believe the Grand Maester. Sadly, some may believe him, perhaps Lord Tyrell, or even Ser Kevan. That wasn’t good.

Cersei testified after the Grand Maester. She wore a black gown to show she was mourning her father. She told the tale about a dinner she had with Tyrion. She repeated words Tyrion supposedly told her at this moment. “I will hurt you for this. A day will come when you think you are safe and happy and your joy will turn to ashes in your mouth and you will know the debt is paid.”

“Your own brother said this to you?” It was the first time Lord Tyrell spoke since the beginning of the trial.

“Shortly before the Battle of Blackwater Bay. I confronted him about his plans to put Joffrey on the front lines, and his attempt to assume the function of Hand of the King permanently. He was trying to prevent our father from coming back to the city to save it against Stannis. He intercepted the messages I was trying to send him and imprisoned the Grand Maester when he tried to do his duty. I finally managed to send a rider to my father to inform him about what was going on and he came to save us just in time. When the attack came, Joffrey insisted on remaining at the battlements. He believed his presence would inspire the troops."

Sansa felt anger rising in her again. That was a disgusting lie. Joffrey had left the battlements like a coward as soon as his mother asked him to. When Lancel Lannister tried to convince the queen to send him back, she hit him right where he had been injured by an arrow. It was Tyrion who saved the city, and she was lying about it in front of the whole court, just like she lied about Sansa’s father. That was unfair. Sansa wanted to shout out the whole truth right now, but she refrained herself. She would have her time to speak.

Prince Oberyn asked a question to Cersei at this moment. “Tyrion said, and you will know the debt is paid. What debt?”

Sansa was surprised by Prince Oberyn’s behavior. Among the three judges, he seemed to be the more skeptical one about Cersei’s witnesses. Why? He hated the Lannisters, what did he have to gain from questioning her witnesses? Tyrion’s innocence? This confused Sansa.

“I discovered he’d been keeping whores in the Tower of the Hand. I asked him to confine his salacious acts to the brothel where such behavior belongs. He wasn’t pleased.”

“Thank you, your Grace, for the courage of your testimony.”

Sansa wanted to laugh at Margaery’s father statement. There was no courage in all this. This testimony was a lie just like the others. Sansa didn’t believe what Cersei said. Tyrion wouldn’t do such threats without good reasons. She knew him enough to be sure about that. If he really said that to Cersei, that was because she had done something really horrible. If she didn’t, he would never have said it. In both cases, Cersei was lying, as always. She always lied. What a hypocrite woman she was, crying when Sansa knew she was happy to talk against Tyrion. She remembered how she told her once that tears were among a wife’s best weapons. However, Cersei wasn’t the only one who could use such things to persuade other people.

Cersei went back to her chair on the dais. Lord Varys was the next to testify. Sansa had wondered on which side Varys was, but after his testimony she had a strong impression he was serving Cersei, though she still had some doubts. You’re not looking at the right place, Lady Sansa. You must search the army of wolves. The eunuch’s words came back to her mind. Why did he tell her that?

Varys’s testimony did more damage to Tyrion than all the other ones. He seemed to know everything that was going on in the Red Keep, everywhere, every time. He confirmed many facts of the other testimonies. He confirmed that Tyrion slapped Joffrey after the riot, he confirmed the insults he used against the king, he confirmed his words when he saved Sansa from Ser Meryn (without mentioning her beating of course), he confirmed Tyrion’s words to Cersei during the dinner, even adding that he said at this moment Joffrey’s place wasn’t on the throne. He confirmed that it was Tyrion’s plan to have Joffrey on the battlements during the battle. He confirmed that Tyrion sent no request of help to his father while he was Hand of the King. He mentioned a conversation when Tyrion mentioned he liked to be Hand of the King and wanted to stay at his office. He confirmed the arrest of Grand Maester Pycelle, and confirmed that Tyrion remained in the chambers of the maester for some time after the maester was brought to the black cells by two of his men. He even confirmed that Tyrion had been keeping a whore in his personal service in the Tower of the Hand when he was acting Hand. Sansa didn’t know why, but she didn’t feel right for a moment, picturing Tyrion with another woman. She didn’t like the thought. She banned it from her mind. It was before Tyrion married her anyway. However, the two last facts he mentioned were the ones to catch Sansa’s attention the most.

Varys began to talk about a threat Tyrion made against Joffrey during a meeting of the small council.
“Do you remember the precise nature of this threat?” Lord Tyrell asked him.

“I’m afraid I do, my lord. He said, Perhaps you should speak more softly to me, then. Monsters are dangerous and just now kings are dying like flies.”

“And he said this to you at a meeting of the small council?”

“Yes. After we received word of Robb Stark’s death.” Sansa’s attention was caught by this. “He didn’t seem gladdened by the news. Perhaps his marriage to Sansa Stark had made him more sympathetic to the northern cause.” This brought murmurings in the crowd and Sansa felt eyes on her. She was indirectly accused by this last testimony. It was a theory, nothing more, but it was enough to make her Tyrion’s partner. The Master of Whisperers continued.

“When this meeting was over, Lord Tyrion remained in the room and had a private discussion with his father. My little birds were not able to understand everything that was said, but they heard the voices of Lord Tyrion and Lord Tywin rise. It was obvious they had some disagreement. Among the things Lord Tyrion said at this moment and that my little birds could understand, there was a very interesting sentence. The Northerners will never forget.” Again, Sansa felt eyes upon her. Did Tyrion really say this? She would probably have hugged him in other circumstances, but now it was used against him, and against her as well. Lord Varys didn’t stop. “Lord Tyrion had many altercations with his father from the moment Lord Tywin came back to King’s Landing, each one more violent than the previous. He wasn’t happy to be no longer the Hand of the King. The last altercation happened the evening before Lord Tywin died.”

“You say that Tyrion met his father right before he died?” That was Ser Kevan who asked the question this time.

“Yes, my lord Hand. Very strong words were used on both sides at this moment. Lord Tyrion accused his father of many atrocities, including the murder of innocent children and women. Among the names he mentioned on this occasion were those of Catelyn Stark and Talisa Stark. He said that King Joffrey was as mad as the Mad King himself. He said that his brother, his sister, and his nephew the king weren’t fit to rule once Lord Tywin would be gone and that House Lannister would collapse once he would be dead. He said, I don’t care anymore what will happen to House Lannister in the future.

“Kinslayer!” The shout came from the benches, and immediately a thunder of insults rained on Tyrion, but Sansa also heard a few for her. She understood what was going on now. Cersei was turning Tyrion into a monster sworn to avenge the North, and she made Sansa the cause of this. If Tyrion was sentenced to death, Sansa would probably end up like him.

“SILENCE! NOW!”

Ser Kevan’s voice resonated through the Throne room with a great force and everyone went silent. For a moment, Sansa saw he was Tywin Lannister’s brother. “You’re excused, Lord Varys.”

As the eunuch left the box of the witnesses, Tyrion surprisingly spoke. “Uncle, may I ask the witness one question?”

Ser Kevan was still standing up after he had brought back order. He sat again in the Iron Throne. “You may, but only one.”

The question Tyrion asked wasn’t what Sansa was expecting. She thought he would try to make Varys contradict himself, but the question wasn’t even about the testimony. “You once said that without me, the city would have faced certain defeat. You said the histories would never mention me, but you would not forget. Have you forgotten, Lord Varys?” It was asked on a soft and low tone, a sad one even.

“Sadly, my lord, I never forget a thing.” Sansa thought she heard some regret in the man’s voice as he spoke. He had worked closely with Tyrion when her husband was Hand of the King. Perhaps Tyrion had considered him a friend, and this friend betrayed him. The room was entirely silent now. No more accusations were shouted, no one whispered. Sansa believed that in this moment, everyone realized a friendship was over. When Lord Varys was gone, Ser Kevan decided it was time for a pause in the trial.

“We will adjourn for now. Toll the bells in an hour’s time.”

The three judges stood up and people began to leave. “Clear the court!” a guard shouted. Sansa saw Jaime Lannister leaving in a quick pace. He was angry from the expression of his face. Sansa on her side was desperate. She hadn’t expected this. Varys’s testimony made her at least an indirect partner of Tywin Lannister’s death. She didn’t leave the court, nor did Brienne or Mira. Even Bronn remained here. Strangely, the guards didn’t seem to care about their presence and didn’t prompt them to leave. They remained here, all alone, the three women side by side on the right benches, the sellsword alone with a dark face on the left ones, and Tyrion alone in the box of the accused. He was accused of a murder he didn’t commit, believed guilty only because he dared to defend the Northerners and to condemn slaughters. He was judged guilty because of her. Sansa had never felt so much pity for Tyrion than in this occasion. Even worse, she felt responsible for the situation he was in. How could she pity a Lannister so much?

They stayed together in a heavy silence for a very long time. No one dared to speak, not even Bronn or Tyrion, which was quite unusual since they always had some bawdy or funny comment to make in all circumstances. Sansa’s eyes fixed the floor and Tyrion successively. Not a single time Tyrion looked at her. Finally, Sansa rose from her seat and went to him.

“My lord.”

Tyrion raised his eyes toward her. He looked surprised that she was talking to him. “My lady.” That was good to hear. It was the first time they were talking since Tyrion was arrested more than a month ago. Sansa had missed his voice. “Not going well, is it?”

Sansa could only agree with that. “No, it isn’t. But we can destroy some of the testimonies. You still have witnesses.”

“They are more your witnesses than mine.” Tyrion smiled in her direction and Sansa felt forced to smile in return. She felt her cheeks turn red. “You’re right. You can oppose the testimonies about Joffrey beating you. You may even destroy the Grand Maester’s testimony. He didn’t look quite sure about the poison that killed my father.” Tyrion sighed. “I wouldn’t be surprised that he invented it only because he wants me dead. After all, I threw him into a black cell once. However, I’m afraid there’s nothing we can do about Varys’s testimony. Everything he said was true, even if that wasn’t the entire truth.”

Sansa knew Tyrion was right. There was nothing she could do against the Spider’s words. She took some time before she asked Tyrion. She needed to know. “Was it really all true? I mean, everything about the discussions with your father.”

Tyrion looked at her for a long moment before he answered. “It was all true.”

“Why? Why did you do that?” Sansa didn’t understand why Tyrion defended her family and her people, or even herself, before his father. He was a Lannister. She understood he could hate his Sansa understood what Tyrion meant. Deep inside him, Tyrion was an honorable man like her father. He wanted to do what was right, but at the same time he was loyal to his family. How couldn’t he be? Family, Duty, Honor. Family came first. Sansa and her siblings would have done anything for one another. “This last time, when you talked with your father, was it the time when…”

“It was. He told me then that I only had one night to do it. In some way we can consider it’s a good thing he died this night, or else, who knows what would have happened after the wedding?”

A sudden thought crossed Sansa’s mind when Tyrion said this. She remembered something he told her the last night she saw him. My father won’t do anything. I’ll make sure of that. If my father is ready to do everything for the family, then I’m capable to do the same for my wife. Everything? Could he have done it? A part of Sansa feared it, but she had to admit there was another part of her who wouldn’t be angry at Tyrion if he had done it. “Tyrion, did you…? You didn’t, no? Cersei is lying, isn’t she?”

“Of course, I didn’t kill my father. He was still my father. I hated him, of course, but to kill him? No. I’m not my father. I can’t say I’m sad about his death, but I’m not responsible of it.” Sansa was relieved. The bells rang.

“I’ll go back to my seat.” She began to walk away, but Tyrion stopped her.

“Sansa.” She turned to face him. “Be careful.”

Sansa nodded to tell him she would be. People were coming back, trying to find a place before they were all taken. Sansa saw Ser Jaime talking with Tyrion in low voices. The judges, the queen, Margaery, Ser Loras, everyone who was supposed to take his place on the dais took it. When she thought about it, Sansa wondered why she wasn’t granted a siege on the dais as well. After all, she was the wife of the accused. They could at least have allowed her a reserved seat. Instead, she had to sit with all these people, some of them who now believed she played a part in Lord Tywin’s death.

Everyone was sitting now. Ser Kevan spoke. “The Crown only has one witness left. Considering the hour, we will listen to this last testimony. Tomorrow, we will listen to the testimonies of the defense. The Crown may call its last witness.”

That’s good, Sansa thought. She would be able to prepare the defense in the best way to counter Cersei’s witnesses. They only had to suffer one more lying witness and it would be over. Things would be different tomorrow.

However, all thoughts about the defense left Sansa’s mind when she saw the witness approach. She recognized her immediately. Sansa had spent so much time with her, she could recognize her among thousands of other people. But that was impossible. What was she doing here? She left King’s Landing weeks ago. She was supposed to be back at Lorath with her sister.

When she took her place in the box of the witnesses, Ser Kevan started to question her. “State your name.”

“Shae.” Sansa didn’t understand. What was she doing here? Why was she among Cersei’s witnesses?

“Do you swear by all the gods that your testimony will be true and honest?”

“I swear it.”

“Do you know this man?” Kevan indicated Tyrion with a little movement of his head.

Sansa turned her head to look at Tyrion. Sansa tried to meet her eyes, but Shae didn’t seem to see her. “Yes. Tyrion Lannister.”

“How do you know him?”

“I was handmaiden to his wife Lady Sansa.”

“Was? You are no longer her handmaiden?” Prince Oberyn was the one to ask the question. If Sansa could be sure the Red Viper would declare Tyrion guilty, at least he asked some relevant questions.

“No. My lady removed me from her service a few weeks ago. She said she didn’t need me anymore.”

That wasn’t true. Shae had left. She was the one to leave without informing Sansa, without a single word to say goodbye. Though suddenly, Sansa realized there was something strange in the way Shae left. Why didn’t she even leave a word for her? She could have given it to Podrick at least. Did Podrick lie to her? But then, who could have Shae believe that Sansa didn’t want her as a handmaiden anymore?

Ser Kevan spoke again. “This man stands accused of murdering the Hand of the King, and of attempting to murder the king. What do you know of this?”

Shae’s words couldn’t have surprised Sansa more. “I know that he’s guilty. He and Sansa planned it together.” Sansa was paralyzed by the words of her friend. She felt the air leaving her lungs. People started to murmur all around the court. She saw many faces looking in her direction, but right now she couldn’t care about it. She was mazed by Shae’s words.

“Silence! Continue.” Ser Kevan allowed Shae to speak again when the noises blew out.

“She wanted revenge for her father, her mother, her brother. She blamed their deaths on Lord Tywin and the king. Tyrion was happy to help. He hated his father. He hated the king. He hated the queen. He stole poison from the Grand Maester’s chamber to poison his father. He and Sansa argued for days about which poison to use against him. She thought it would be better to use the essence of nightshade she had to help her sleep, but Tyrion convinced her the tears of Lys would be better in the end. He poisoned the wine of his father the evening they met for the last time.”
Sansa’s world was crumbling inside her. Shae was her friend. She trusted her. And here she was, lying in front of the whole court. Sansa couldn’t move. In fact, she could barely breathe. She fell into despair. How could Shae do it to her?

“How could you possibly know all this? Why would he reveal such plans to his wife’s maid?” Oberyn Martell’s voice looked distant. It was as if it came from another world for Sansa. It was as if she had become deaf to what happened around her. Shae’s betrayal had erected a wall between her and the rest of the world, and she could barely hear the voices from the other side.

“I wasn’t just her maid. I was his whore.”

The words brought Sansa back from her daydream state. “I beg your pardon? You said you were his…” Sansa could have asked the same question than Mace Tyrell. Surely she didn’t hear well. However, Shae only confirmed what she believed she just heard.

“His whore.”

Sansa was stunned by the statement. Shae was Tyrion’s whore? That was impossible! She knew Tyrion visited brothels, but Shae? His whore? Sansa couldn’t believe it. Tyrion couldn’t even remember Shae’s name, and Shae had always acted with him as if he was a danger for Sansa. She couldn’t be his whore. And so my watch begins. Tyrion had sworn he would go celibate until Sansa wanted him to share her bed, and Sansa could see nothing to doubt his words. If there had been something between Tyrion and Shae, she would have seen it. She spent so much time with Shae and Tyrion, she couldn’t have been so blind. Shae was lying, for sure.

“How did you come to be in his service?” Ser Kevan sounded intrigued by all this.

“He stole me.” Sansa realized Shae answered very quickly. For the other questions she had always seemed to hesitate before she gave an answer. However, this time, she spoke very quickly. “I was with another man, a knight in Lord Tywin’s army. But when Tyrion arrived at the camp, he sent one of his cutthroats into our tent. He broke the knight’s arm and brought me to Lord Tyrion. You belong to me now, he said. I want you to fuck me like it’s my last night in this world.”

People burst into laughs, but Sansa didn’t. That was so… improper. It was disgusting. Ser Kevan had to bring back order once more, but he wasn’t the one to speak next. For the first time, Sansa wasn’t happy the Dornishman asked a question.

“And did you?”

“Did I what?”

“Fuck him like it was his last night in this world.” The prince looked happy about his question, and some people too since there was more laughter.

“I did everything he wanted. Whatever he told me to do to him. Whatever he felt like doing to me. I kissed him where he wanted. I licked him where he wanted. I let him put himself where he wanted. I was his property. I would wait in his chambers for hours so he could use me when he was bored. He ordered me to call him my lion, so I did. I took his face in my hands and said, I am yours and you are mine.”

Sansa was disgusted by Shae’s words, but she didn’t know if it was because of the nature of the words or because she knew they were all lies. She didn’t believe anything Shae said a single second. She couldn’t imagine Tyrion mistreating someone in such a way, even a whore. Tyrion refused to bed her when he could. He barely ever touched her. The only time they slept in the same bed he only held her to comfort her. What Shae said couldn’t be true. They were lies. Anger was rising in Sansa.

“Shae. Please don’t.” It was Tyrion who spoke now. He spoke very lowly, so Sansa barely heard him, but she heard him all the same.

“I am a whore. Remember?” Sansa didn’t really know what it meant. For a moment, she had the impression Tyrion knew Shae, but before she could think furthermore about it, Shae started to speak again. “That was before he married Sansa. After that, all he wanted was her. But she wouldn’t let him into her bed. So he promised to kill his father for her. They were planning to have the king and the queen murdered afterwards so Tyrion could be Hand of the King again for Tommen. A year later they would have Tommen killed as well before he got too old. Then Tyrion would have crowned him and Sansa king and queen to achieve what her father, Lord Eddard Stark, failed to do.”

“THAT’S A LIE!” Sansa shouted before she realized it, louder than she ever did in her life. She could maintain her armor of courtesies in all circumstances, but now it was too much. These were horrible, filthy and stupid lies. Lies against her, against her father, and against Tyrion. She couldn’t allow it. People started to yell as well in the court. They were yelling at her and at Tyrion, but Sansa didn’t care about it. She was staring at Shae, but the woman who had been her friend refused to look in her direction. All the same, she didn’t stop to look at her. Shae betrayed her.

It took some time for Ser Kevan to restore order in the room. When he did, he ordered Sansa to sit down or else he would have to have her escorted out of the trial. Sansa only half-heard him, but she complied all the same. She continued to fix Shae. Right now, she hated her former friend even more than she ever hated Joffrey.

“Do you have anything else to say?” Ser Kevan’s question was directed toward Shae. He seemed exasperated, but Sansa couldn’t decide from what.

“No.”

“Very well, the trial is adjourned for tomorrow. Bring back the prisoner to his cell.”

“My lady, we should go.” Sansa felt Brienne’ hand on her arm. “We must go before they decide to arrest you. Come quickly.”

Sansa followed Brienne, her mind still half in another world. She noticed Mira followed them closely. As they left the Great Hall, she heard her husband screaming. “So you think I am guilty, Uncle? Don’t you? I saved you. I saved this city. And all your worthless lives. I should have let Stannis kill you all.”

Sansa heard the crowd shouting.

Chapter End Notes

With a few changes, this chapter is mostly Tyrion's trial in the show, version "Sansa is present". I tried to imagine what would have been Sansa's reaction if she had been there the best I could.

Please review. I put a lot of work on this part of the story and I would like to know your opinion for this chapter and the six following.
Next chapter: Jaime
Jaime III

Chapter Notes

Jaime is back with some family problems like always. "Ever since I've returned every Lannister I've seen has been a miserable pain in my ass."

See the end of the chapter for more notes

JAIME III

“You’d condemn your own nephew to death?”

“I’ve condemned no one. The trial is not over,” answered his uncle.

“This isn’t a trial. It’s a farce. Cersei has manipulated everything and you know it.”

“So you believe he’s guilty now?”

Jaime and his uncle were in Kevan’s study. He still refused to occupy the Tower of the Hand. At least Jaime didn’t have to climb hundreds of steps to talk with him. His uncle continued to speak.

“I know very well some of the testimonies are lies, or a part of them are lies. Do you really think I believe this whore when she says Tyrion was planning to seize the Iron Throne? Only a fool would believe it, or else Tyrion really changed a lot while he was acting Hand. Nevertheless, I don’t think everything that was said was untrue. Too much was said, I can’t just pretend I didn’t hear them. The accusation is overwhelming.”

“So you believe he’s guilty now?”

His uncle sighed and raised from his seat. He came on the other side of the desk to face Jaime with a pained expression. “I think it might not be impossible. I didn’t sentence him to death yet, and I don’t intend to do so. I will listen to his witnesses tomorrow and judge with that. However, if things tend to prove that he’s guilty, I cannot just clear him of his charges and do as if I heard nothing.”

Jaime didn’t care that his uncle felt sorry about that. He was ready to execute Tyrion. “So, you will execute my brother? You will kill a Lannister? Is that what you’re telling me?”

Kevan looked tired. “I don’t want to kill Tyrion. Even if he killed Tywin, he is still my brother’s son. I know Tywin wouldn’t want to have him killed.”

Jaime scoffed. “Really? Father always hated Tyrion. I’m sure he would have been more than happy to sentence him to die.”

“Be careful, Jaime. You’re talking about a man who just died, and about your father. Tywin seemed to be a hard man to you, but he is no harder than he’s had to be. Our own father was gentle and amiable, but so weak his bannermen mocked him in their cups. Some saw fit to defy him openly. Other lords borrowed our gold and never troubled to repay. At court they japed of toothless lions. Even his mistress stole from him. A woman scarcely one step above a whore, and she helped herself to my mother’s jewels! It fell to your father to restore House Lannister to its proper place. Just as if it fell on him to rule this realm, when he was no more than twenty. He bore that heavy burden for twenty years, and all it earned him was a mad king’s envy. Instead of the honor he deserved, he was made to suffer slights beyond count, yet he gave the Seven Kingdoms peace, plenty, and justice. He was a just man. He was my brother. He was your father.”

Jaime saw tears in his uncle’s eyes, though they never fell. He felt guilty for talking this way about a man who was dead. “I’m sorry, Uncle. But I know one thing, Tyrion is innocent. If you sentence him to die, that’s no justice, that’s murder.”

Kevan took some time before he answered. “I hope he is innocent. I hope that he will have good witnesses to prove he is innocent tomorrow, but if the trial shows he is guilty of any of the two charges, I’ll have no choice but to declare him guilty. And the punishment for kinslaying or attempt of regicide is death. I really hope he is innocent and that he can prove it, but if he can’t…” Jaime believed that his uncle was sincere, but he wished Kevan could see the truth as he did. Cersei had succeeded in planting seeds of doubts in his mind. “I need you, Jaime. I need you to talk to Tyrion.”

“What do you mean?”

“I cannot go to talk with him. I am his judge. You are the only one who can speak with him.”

“What do you want me to tell him?”

Kevan took a great inspiration. “Tell him that if he doesn’t believe he can prove his innocence tomorrow, then he can confess the crime and ask for mercy. I’ll allow him to join the Night’s Watch.”

Jaime couldn’t believe what his uncle was saying. “Forgive me?”

“He will be exiled, but he will be alive. If he cannot prove his innocence, that’s the best I can do. He’s not obliged to confess both crimes, only one. He can even wait for the testimonies in his favour to be done before he confesses. If he only recognizes the attempt of regicide, the trial will end there and he won’t be branded as a kinslayer for the rest of his life. The affair will be over.”

“You are going to exile him for a crime he did not commit? You are no better than Cersei.”

“I don’t hate Tyrion, and I’m not blind like Cersei. I only want to make sure that he may keep his head on his shoulders whatever may happen. If you want your brother to live just like me, I suggest you go and tell him that.”

Jaime registered the information. It was true, he had no choice if he wanted Tyrion to live in the case he would be declared guilty. He had to convince his brother to do it if Sansa Stark couldn’t prove her husband’s innocence.

“There is another matter I need to speak with you, Jaime.” His uncle’s words brought him back to the reality. Kevan went again on the other side of his desk and opened the chest on it. He pulled out from it a thick piece of paper. “Tywin’s will. I and Genna opened it before I left the Rock. Of course, it’s not the original, it is in Casterly Rock. That’s only a copy.”

Jaime read the will. His father left great sums of gold to all his children, his brother and his sister, and lesser amounts to the other members of his family, but it was mostly the succession that received Jaime’s attention. Of course, his father named him his heir. Even dead, he was trying to get him out of the Kingsguard.

“Jaime,” his uncle began, “I know you never wanted to be your father’s heir, but you are his eldest son and these are his last words, his last wishes. You could have a much better life than the one you have actually. You could marry. You could have children. You could be one of the most respected men in the Seven Kingdoms.”

Jaime dropped the will on the desk. “I’m sorry, Uncle. That’s not a life for me. I never wanted it. Anyway, people will never respect me. I am the Kingslayer, an Oathbreaker, a man without honor in everyone’s eyes. I am a kingsguard. The Lord Commander of the Kingsguard. I took vows, and I will respect them. Anyway, Father disavowed me.”

Kevan lowered his eyes. “I know. He told me in one of his letters. I guess I know why.”

“I refused to go back to Casterly Rock and to be his heir. My answer is still the same.”

Jaime’s uncle nodded sadly. “Very well.”

Jaime chose the moment to add something. “This means, that by all the laws of the Seven Kingdoms, Tyrion is the Lord of Casterly Rock.”

“That’s not so easy, Jaime. But if he is cleared of his charges, you are right. He is the Lord of Casterly Rock.”

“Are you going to recognize him? Or are you going to follow my father’s last wishes to never let him have the Rock?”

“I’m not Tywin, Jaime. I loved my brother, but that didn’t stop me from seeing his flaws. I know he despised Tyrion. I never agreed with Tyrion’s behaviour with whores, wine and gambling, but Tywin didn’t even hate him for that. He hated him because he was a dwarf and because Joanna died when he was born. That was stupid. My own mother died not long after your uncle Gerion’s birth, and no one in the family hated him for that. Tyrion proved he was worthy of being the Lord of Casterly Rock if I look outside what was said during the trial. He did a good job when he was Hand of the King and as Master of Coin afterwards. He made an alliance with the Martells possible. He fought bravely at the Battle of Blackwater. Tywin was cruel and unfair with him, even more than many people believe. Don’t think you’re the only one to know the truth about Tyrion’s first wife.”

Jaime looked unbelieving at his uncle. Did everyone know the truth? “How?”

“I was the advisor of your father for a very long time, remember. I know the details.”

They remained silent for a moment. Jaime remembered the horror of this day. The look of despair in his brother’s eyes when he saw him a few hours after the tragedy. Jaime had never anticipated something like that from his father. Finally, he decided to break the silence.

“If Tyrion is sentenced, you know that Cersei will have Casterly Rock.”

“Of course, I know, unless you decide at the last minute to be Tywin’s heir. If you don’t, let us hope Tyrion is absolved at the end of the trial. Now go. I won’t talk about it anymore.”

Kevan’s voice let place to no discussion. Jaime left. He walked to the tower cells to meet his brother. He hoped he would greet Kevan’s proposition in a better way than Jaime had, but the Lord Commander didn’t really believe in it. He would have better luck in hoping for his brother and his sister to love each other.

The guards allowed him to enter as soon as they saw him. His little brother was drinking. It was no surprise after what happened today and Tyrion’s fondness for wine. He took some time before he raised his eyes to Jaime.
“Jaime. You’re paying a visit to a soon-to-be-dead man.”

“The trial is not yet over. You still have people who will testify for you tomorrow. Nothing is lost yet.”

“Of course.” Tyrion didn’t believe what Jaime said. He didn’t like to see his little brother in this state. “You heard what she said. All her lies. And you heard what these people said after my speech.”

Jaime remembered only too well. After Tyrion shouted he should have let Stannis kill them, there wasn’t much left before someone was trying to kill him. He needed ten gold cloaks to bring him back to safety here, and he even ordered them to gag Tyrion to stop him from speaking more nonsense. That was a brilliant speech. People would talk about it for weeks.

“You fell in love with a whore?” Jaime really found Tyrion stupid on this. In his brother’s eyes, it wasn’t the first time it happened.

“Yes, I fell in love with a whore. And I was stupid enough to think that she had fallen in love with me too. I couldn’t. I couldn’t listen to her standing there telling her lies. I couldn’t do it.” Jaime sat next to his brother. Tyrion really was in a bad state. Jaime didn’t think he was drunk, there wasn’t enough wine here to get Tyrion drunk. Perhaps enough to get Jaime drunk, but not Tyrion. “Do you think Sansa will still want to defend me after what she heard today?”

That was something Jaime feared. Sansa Stark had organized Tyrion’s defense. Without her, many of Tyrion’s witnesses wouldn’t testify. Worse, some witnesses may fear that Tyrion was lost after today and refuse to testify tomorrow. Jaime hadn’t visited his sister-in-law after the trial was adjourned, so he had no idea. “No matter if she protects you or not, I will testify all the same, and I’ll make sure Ser Balon testifies as well. She can go to hell.” Jaime would never forgive the Stark girl if she abandoned Tyrion.

“Be careful, Jaime. You’re talking about my wife.” Jaime was startled by Tyrion’s words, but the look in his eyes surprised him even more. “Sansa is much more than I could ever hope for. She is young, clever, kind, beautiful, and she is coming from one of the oldest families of the Seven Kingdoms. She was beaten by Joffrey again and again. She was nearly raped during the riot my nephew started. She saw her own father beheaded in front of her own eyes, and then she was forced to look upon his head on a spike. She was held as a hostage here for more than a year and she was forced to marry someone from the family in war against her own. And despite all of this, I managed to get along with her quite well until our father decided to murder her mother and her brother. And after that the best thing our father had to suggest to me was to rape her. You told me often how Robert shamed Cersei for sixteen years, but this is nothing compared to what Sansa supported here within a single year. Cersei had you and Father to protect her. Sansa had no one. And despite all of this, she didn’t turn into a manipulative bitch and she didn’t try to have me killed as Cersei did with Robert. She remained loyal to her family, and she didn’t become a murderer. She is a true lady and she assumes the consequences of the choices she makes, unlike Cersei who always blames the others for her own mistakes. If she abandons me after what happened today, I won’t be the one to blame her considering everything our family did to her. Perhaps there will even be some justice in this.”

Jaime was unsettled by Tyrion’s speech and by the expression of his face. He was defending his wife when she could be about to let him die. Also, Jaime was quite displeased of the way Tyrion compared Ned Stark’s daughter to Cersei. Tyrion knew about their special relationship and he was saying that his wife, a Stark, was better than Jaime’s lover. However, Jaime had to admit Tyrion was right about many things he said. He highlighted Cersei’s flaws very well, but Jaime wasn’t very pleased to hear his sister and lover being called a manipulative bitch.

“Be careful you too, little brother. You’re talking about our sister.”
Tyrion smirked. “A sister who’s about to have me killed.”

Jaime couldn’t argue with that. It was time to talk about Kevan’s proposition. “Tyrion, Kevan sent me here. He wanted me to tell you something, in case you are found guilty.”

Jaime explained very carefully Kevan’s plan if Tyrion couldn’t prove his innocence. As he expected, his little brother didn’t react very well.

“So, I will spend the rest of my days freezing at the Wall for a crime I didn’t commit. What an alternative for death!”

“It’s still better than death. I know you’re innocent, Kevan wants to believe it too, but… If you are found guilty, it’s still better than ending in the hands of Ser Ilyn Payne.”

“Oh yes, and this way I am finally out of sight. The family’s shame is far away, never to be seen again.”

Jaime was exasperated. “Kevan isn’t doing this for this reason. He’s not our father.”

“Well, he acts like our father. That’s exactly what he would have done to get rid of me. He would have seized the opportunity. Perhaps he even killed himself for that.”

“If he did, then it was useless. Kevan already asked me again to be the Lord of Casterly Rock and I refused.”

Tyrion was looking at him with a strange expression. Jaime thought it was close to indifference. “Very well. Then it means that once I’ll be executed for these imaginary crimes, House Lannister will be ruled by Cersei Lannister, the Lady of Casterly Rock. You can tell Kevan that’s what is going to happen if he declares me guilty, because I won’t go to the Wall, no matter the outcome.”

Jaime couldn’t believe what his brother was saying. “Wait, you can’t be serious. You’re going to let yourself be killed like this?”

“Yes, I will,” said Tyrion on an indifferent tone. “You can tell Kevan that unless he clears me of all charges since I am innocent, then he will have to follow Cersei’s pleasure for the rest of life, starting with ordering Ser Ilyn to cut my head in front of his own eyes. That’s how he will start his tenure as Hand of the King. By sentencing his own nephew to die. You can tell him this.”

“His trying to save you, just like me.”

“To save me? By condemning me to spend the rest of my days to the Wall? Thank you. If that’s what family is, I don’t want any of it. I spent the last year as Hand of the King to make sure our family would survive this war despite Cersei’s foolishness and Joffrey’s cruelty. I did everything I could to bring our family where it is now. And as a reward, my head was nearly sliced in two on my sister’s command, I was moved to a dark cell, forced to marry a child, my brother-in-law and my mother-in-law were savagely slaughtered, and now I am about to be exiled or executed for crimes I didn’t commit. If that’s what family is, then I don’t care about the family. You heard what Varys said. I told Father and I believed it. I don’t care anymore what will happen to House Lannister in the future.”

Did Cersei really order Tyrion’s head to be cut in two? He thought his scar came from the Battle of Blackwater. Jaime didn’t know what to do with the words Tyrion just told him. It was as if he disavowed all his kin. “You know that when you were arrested, I rode to war with Father to save you. I would have been ready to abandon my white cloak at this moment. I left Cersei to save you.”
Tyrion looked back at him with softer eyes. “You’re my brother. I will never forget that. You were among the few to really consider me like family. But I am done with my loyalty to a family that never showed me any. My loyalty is to you now. And to my wife.”

“So, you place your wife before your own blood?” Jaime asked unbelieving, afraid of the answer that would come.

“I swore to protect her when I put that cloak on her shoulders, and she showed more loyalty to me than the average Lannister. You still have a vow to her mother. Protect her. If I really am your brother, then do it, and do what you must to get me out of here alive, or go back to our sister who is about to get what she always wanted: my head.”

Tyrion looked away after he was done, but Jaime had his eyes fixed on his brother. He had never talked to him this way. He remembered all the humiliations Tyrion had to endure during his whole life, from his birth to this afternoon at the trial. He had a debt toward Tyrion, and a Lannister always pays his debts. He rose. “Then I’ll do it. The first things, not the last one,” he specified. Tyrion looked back at him and smiled. Jaime returned it and left. He still didn’t know what he would make of Cersei, but he knew what he would make of Tyrion.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa IX

Chapter Notes

Warning: emotional chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SANSA IX

Sansa was staring at the cup of wine before her. Was it her second or her third? Or her fourth? She didn’t know. She couldn’t remember. She took another sip. She didn’t know if it helped, but she did it all the same. If Tyrion did it, there was surely some use to it. Sadly, it didn’t help her to forget. She couldn’t forget what happened at the trial. It looked like a nightmare.

Shae. Her friend. She betrayed her. Sansa had wanted to kill her at the end of her testimony, but now she wasn’t even sure she had the strength to wish her death. After the anger came despair. Shae had been her only friend during the time she was Joffrey’s future bride. She was the one to always remind her to trust no one. She was the one who tended to her injuries after she was mistreated one way or another. And she betrayed her. Sansa had been betrayed by so many people she once trusted. Joffrey. The queen. Ser Dontos. Now Shae. When would it end? What did she do for this? Why was everyone turning against her?

However, what made Sansa even more despaired were Shae’s lies about Tyrion. I was his whore. He stole me. When Tyrion arrived at the camp, he sent one of his cutthroats into our tent. He broke the knight’s arm and brought me to Lord Tyrion. I did everything he wanted. Whatever he told me to do to him. Whatever he felt like doing to me. I kissed him where he wanted. I licked him where he wanted. I let him put himself where he wanted. I was his property. I would wait in his chambers for hours so he could use me when he was bored. He ordered me to call him my lion, so I did. I took his face in my hands and said, I am yours and you are mine. That was before he married Sansa. After that, all he wanted was her. But she wouldn’t let him into her bed.

These were all lies, Sansa knew it. Filthy lies, just like all the others the witnesses told after swearing by all the gods they would tell the truth. But these lies from Shae were even worse than the others. They were only made for laughing at Tyrion, to humiliate him. It wasn’t enough for the people to accuse him falsely of the worse crimes, they had to mock him. Her father’s memory had been shamed by the lies of House Lannister, but at least people didn’t laugh at him. For Tyrion that was even worse. It was as if Joffrey had her father humiliated because he had a bastard once in his life. No, that was even worse. Tyrion was humiliated because of lies, not even something that was true.

Sansa knew Shae lied on everything. She knew it. And so my watch begins. Tyrion was sincere when he told her this. He wouldn’t cheat on her. He was her husband, the man who protected her ever since he arrived at King’s Landing. What Shae said was horrible. She had made Tyrion a monster who forced poor women to satisfy all his desires. That wasn’t him. That was a lie. These were all lies. Tyrion was kind. He refused to share her bed when he saw she didn’t want to. He would never have behaved with a woman in such ways.

The door opened. Mira entered with the dinner. “My lady,” she said as she placed the multiple plates on the table. Sansa felt the eyes of her friend on her. Would she betray her as well? After a moment, Mira stopped to move. Did she place all the plates on the table? Sansa didn’t know, and to be honest she didn’t care. She wasn’t hungry. “My lady, how many cups did you have?”

Sansa looked at the goblet before her. How many? She didn’t know. And she didn’t care either. She only knew all the wine she drank came from the single jug at the center of the table. “I don’t know. No more than the jug.” The jug was half-emptied.

“My lady, you shouldn’t drink so much. You may believe it could help, but it will not. You won’t feel good.” There was concern in Mira’s voice.

Sansa didn’t care if she felt better or worse, now or later. “Tyrion was able to empty an entire bottle without being drunk.” This memory of Tyrion made her sad. “If he can drink so much with his size, how much do you think I can drink?”

“My lady, you should stop.” Sansa didn’t look back at Mira. She had green eyes, not the same than Tyrion, but the color would be enough to bother her if she looked at her handmaiden.

“I don’t need your service anymore for today, Mira. Take your leave for the evening. Send Podrick to clean everything after I’m done.”

“My lady…”

“Go.”

After a moment, Sansa finally heard Mira leaving. Sansa didn’t eat. She only took a sip of wine from time to time, as she did for two hours now, or so she believed. She didn’t remember for how long she had been sitting there, thinking about Shae and about Tyrion, and drinking.

She knew Shae was lying. Everyone who had testified had lied. Shae had lied all along, about Tyrion’s and Sansa’s plans to kill Tywin, Cersei, Joffrey and Tommen, about the poisoning, about her removal from Sansa’s service, and about being Tyrion’s whore. Especially about this. And so my watch begins. Shae had lied, she knew it. Sansa was holding her necklace firmly in her left hand. She held it so strong that she heard the click. It had opened. She looked at it and saw the silver direwolf. Never forget what you are. She wouldn’t forget who she was. She would never forget who she was. And she would never forget Shae’s horrible lies. However, there were other words and images that went back without interruption in Sansa’s head. She tried to stop them from coming back, but they did all the same, no matter what she tried. They were nothing important, but they kept coming back and they troubled Sansa.

The time Tyrion came to reveal her they would have to marry. How Shae looked upset about Tyrion trying to have a word with Sansa in private. The words Tyrion said at this moment. Sometimes we think we want to hear something and it’s only afterwards when it’s too late that we realize we wished we’d heard it under entirely different circumstances. As they came back in Sansa’s mind, she began to wonder if they were really meant for her at this moment. She remembered little details of the moments when Shae and Tyrion had been in the same place than her. She thought she remembered looks they exchanged, smiles towards one another, from the morning following their wedding night to the last meal Shae served them, including the walk in the gardens. She also remembered how Shae was upset after they learned Sansa would marry Tyrion, and how she turned colder toward her later. She remembered Shae’s reaction when she told her about Tyrion’s arrest, and the way she left quickly after she told her they slept in the same bed. She remembered angry eyes she saw sometimes in the glass when Shae was brushing her hair, often at moments when Sansa had been talking about Tyrion. But more than anything, she remembered the way Tyrion talked to Shae at the trial. Shae. Please don’t. And Shae’s answer. I am a whore. Remember? Tyrion had called her by her name, something he never did before. He always forgot her name. He had spoken in a low voice, as if he was hurt by her words. As if he knew her. As if he loved her.

She lied. She lied. She lied. Everything she said was a lie. Sansa repeated it in her head, knowing it was the truth. And yet, these few words between her husband and her friend came back again and again. And other words Tyrion told her during the pause about Varys. Everything he said was true, even if that wasn’t the entire truth. Among all the things Varys told before the court was the fact that Tyrion had been keeping a whore for his personal service in the Tower of the Hand. Could it be Shae? She was already in the Red Keep at this moment after all. She had entered Sansa’s service not long after Tyrion arrived in King’s Landing. That was before she and Tyrion were married. Was it possible? Was she the whore in question? No, she wasn’t, Sansa was sure of that. She was lying.
And yet, the thought persisted in Sansa’s mind. She couldn’t get it out of her head. And she hated it.
She didn’t know precisely why, but she hated it.

Podrick entered the room. When he arrived at the table, he asked the stupidest question she ever heard. “My lady, you ate nothing?”

“No. Just take it away.”

“Yes, my lady.” The boy started to remove all the untouched food from the table. He had been Tyrion’s squire as far as Sansa could remember and he mostly took care of his clothes and poured his wine. When he was done with cleaning, he started to walk back to the door, but stopped after a few steps. “My lady.” He sounded hesitant. Sansa didn’t lift her head, still fixing her cup. “I’m sorry for today. I was there at the trial, hidden in a corner. That’s horrible what they said about you and Lord Tyrion.”

The squire continued to walk toward the door. “Podrick!” There was something she had to know.
Podrick had always been honest with her. “What Shae said… was it true?” She didn’t know why she had to know it, but she had.

After a long silence, the boy answered. “My lady, I know she lied about the plot to kill Lord Tywin.
I know you and Lord Tyrion have nothing to see with his death.”

Sansa should have been satisfied with this answer, but truthfully she wasn’t. Podrick answered the question, so why did she feel she had to ask something else? Before she could hold back, the question came out. “That’s not what I’m talking about. Was she his whore?”

Why did she bother so much with that? She knew it was a lie. And yet, she wanted an answer. But why? Another silence, longer than the previous one, took place before Podrick could answer very lowly. “Yes, my lady.”

Sansa continued to stare at her cup. She felt empty. The wine was red. Red and dark. It was almost black. She asked another question from nowhere. Shae. Please don’t. “Did he love her?”

Sansa realized her voice was shaking when she spoke. Why was she asking this question? Why did she fear the answer? This time the silence lingered longer than Sansa imagined it could. After a very long time, she averted her eyes from the cup before her. Podrick was still there, standing next to the door with the plates in his arm, looking at his feet. She should let him go, so she opened the mouth.

“Podrick.” Her mouth was dry. She couldn’t say anything more. So Podrick made a little affirmative nod with his head, answering her question. And he left the room.

Sansa remained seated in her position, numb. She didn’t know how much time it took before she could move again, and when she did her whole body was shivering. She took the cup of wine and her hand trembled so much that she nearly spilled its content on the floor. She managed to bring the cup to her lips all the same and swallowed what was left of the wine with a lot of difficulties. She had trouble to gulp. Tears were rolling on her cheeks now. Why was she crying?

Sansa didn’t remember much what happened afterwards, but she felt bursting into sobs at one moment. All her saddest and most horrible memories came back to mind, beginning by the most recent to the oldest one. The humiliation of the trial. Tyrion’s arrest. Tyrion telling her they would be forced to consummate their marriage. Margaery announcing her the death of her brother and mother. Her wedding. Tyrion’s visit to tell her about their wedding. The news that Bran and Rickon were dead. The riot. Her beatings by kingsguards. The head of her father and all the people of Winterfell on spikes. The execution. Lady’s death. After that memories were mostly foolish dramas she experienced in Winterfell, like when she discovered for the first time Arya had hidden dung inside her mattress or when her little sister ruined a new gown she had worked on for weeks by starting a battle of food. If she had known back then how her life would become a living hell later, Sansa would have cherished these moments. She reached the memory of the moment the bard left when she was younger. He was a wandering singer who sang of knights and quests and ladies fair. He had left after staying half a year in Winterfell and Sansa had cried more than she ever did before, begging without success her father to keep him at home. Her last thought was about a song the singer performed one day. It was a very sad song, one she didn’t like. How could she remember the lyrics? And yet she did remember them, along with the melody.

Everywhere I turn I hurt someone

But there's nothing I can say to change the things I've done

Of all the things I hid from you I cannot hide the shame

And I pray someone something will come and take away the pain

There's no way out of this dark place

No hope, no future

I know I can't be free

But I can't see another way

And I can't face another day

Tell me where did I go wrong

Everyone I love, they're all gone

I'd do everything so differently

But I can't turn back the time

There's no shelter from the storm inside of me
There's no way out of this dark place

No hope, no future

I know I can't be free

But I can't see another way

And I can't face another day

The last thoughts she could remember were the words of the song. She also had the impression someone was helping her to stand up from the floor and led her to her bed at one moment.

When Sansa woke up the sun was already risen. She felt numb and her mouth was dry as if she hadn’t drunk anything for days. When she tried to raise her head, she felt a headache so strong she thought her head was about to explode. Then she felt something coming in her mouth and covered it with her hands. Without thinking, she jumped from her bed and went to her chamber pot. And she spewed. She vomited more than she had done in her entire life up to now. She felt so bad.

She felt a hand on her shoulder. Startled, she turned her head very quickly and felt another wave of pain through her head. When she finally looked up, she saw green eyes observing her. For a moment, she instinctively thought about Tyrion, but she realized very quickly those green eyes didn’t belong to him.

“Mira. What are you doing here?” Sansa asked.

“I’m sorry, my lady. Podrick told me you weren’t in a good state, so I came back in the middle of the night. You were lying on the floor, crying. I helped you to go to your bed. You were in a very bad shape. You were saying things that made nonsense. I stayed on the couch for the night in case you would need more help.”

Sansa didn’t remember she had fallen on the floor, though she remembered someone helped her to stand up when she was on the floor. How did this happen? The multiple thoughts in her mind sent new waves of pain through her head. She held her forehead with her hands while she gasped. Her mouth was so dry.

“The jug of wine was empty when I arrived,” Mira resumed. “You must have emptied it. I told you you wouldn’t feel good.” She didn’t say it as a reproach. She mostly seemed sorry. Now Sansa knew what it was to be drunk. How could Tyrion manage to be so often? The thought of her husband brought tears to her eyes.

“You have been drunk before, haven’t you Mira?” Sansa needed something to occupy her thoughts. If Mira knew the effects of drinking, then it was probably because she experienced it once.

“No, my lady.” Sansa heard a thin laugh escaping from Mira’s voice. “But I saw many of my friends drunk here in King’s Landing, back in Highgarden… and at Ironrath too. I know the effects from them.” Mira looked sad when she pronounced her home’s name. She lowered herself to Sansa’s level since she was still leaning on the pot and presented a cup. “It’s only water, my lady. It will help you.”

Sansa nearly ripped out the goblet from Mira’s hands. Her tongue was so dry it could have been used as a parchment. She drank deeply. She didn’t remember water to be so delicious. With two gulps the cup was empty, so Mira brought her another one. It felt good.
“My lady, if you want I can get you some breakfast. Nothing too consisting, that wouldn’t be good in your state. You’ll be able to eat more in the midday when you’ll feel better.”

Sansa nodded in agreement and Mira left her room. After a moment, Sansa felt a little better and managed to get up and sit at the table. She drank more water from a bottle on the table. She didn’t remember there was one last night. She still felt pounding in her head, but her mouth was much less dry than before. Mira came back soon with fruits and some bread. She joined Sansa in her breakfast on her mistress demand. As they ate, Sansa realized what day they were. The trial would continue this afternoon.

“What time of the day is it?” she asked her friend.

“Don’t worry, my lady. The sun only came out two hours ago. There’s still more than enough time before the trial starts again.”

Yes, before the trial. However, Sansa wondered if it was of any use now. She didn’t know if they still had a chance to save Tyrion, and in fact Sansa wasn’t even sure she wanted to save him. And so my watch begins. Words are wind. Sansa now knew he had been sleeping with her handmaiden. That explained the long moments he spent out at night. How blind she had been. Did she really think her husband wouldn’t bed any other woman after their wedding, especially when he was one of the most renowned whoremonger of Westeros? Now she wasn’t only the disgraced daughter of a traitor. She was also the shamed wife of the Imp.

“I’m not sure it matters anymore now. Tyrion will be sentenced to death no matter what happens and no matter what I do.” Sansa felt sad at the idea that Tyrion would die, but she felt she had no more chance to save him.

“No, my lady. Everything isn’t lost. You still have witnesses. With their testimonies you can still prove his innocence.”

Sansa stared at Mira. “You heard what she said yesterday.”

Sansa saw a glow of comprehension in her friend’s eyes. “My lady, the things she said were lies.”

“Not all of them.” Sansa looked away.

“Even if some of the things she said are true, these things are no proof of Lord Tyrion’s guilt. You can still convince Ser Kevan of Lord Tyrion’s innocence, and if you convince him you’ll have his vote and the one of Lord Tyrell. That will be enough.”

“No, there’s no way to win now. You heard how the people laughed and insulted him. They believe the lies, and Ser Kevan will believe them as well. The only truth that matters is the one people want to believe.” Sansa sighed loudly. “You should leave Mira. Once Tyrion is dead, they will force me to marry someone else, or worse they will execute me for participating in Lord Tywin’s murder. I won’t be able to protect you anymore. You were right. You should have left for Ironrath a long time ago.”

There was a heavy silence that followed her words. “I cannot go back to Ironrath, my lady.” Mira broke the silence with a quavering voice. Sansa looked at her and she realized Mira was staring at the floor. “Do you remember when Sera came to talk to me yesterday? She told me the Whitehills attacked Ironrath and burned it to the ground. There is no news of my family. As far as I know, I am the last Forrester alive.”

Mira looked back at Sansa, and for the first time Sansa perceived tears about to break out in the eyes of her friend. Mira had always been so strong, Sansa admired her for that, but now she looked about to lose it. Just like Sansa, she had lost all her kin. They were both alone now.

“I’m sorry, Mira.” Sansa felt she should say something to comfort the Forrester girl, but nothing came to her mind. What could she do? How can you help me? I don’t know, but I can try. Now she understood how Tyrion felt after her family’s slaughter. He wanted to help her, but didn’t know how.

“Let me be honest with you, my lady.” Mira’s voice turned hard suddenly and she fixed Sansa with her eyes. Sansa could still see water in them, but there was again determination in them and her voice. “I don’t care what this woman said at the trial. I don’t care about how many women Lord Tyrion fucked, where, when or how he did it in his whole life. If he is executed, then this is over for me as you told it yourself. You can stay here and drink again, that’s your right, but I won’t remain idle. If I must die, then I prefer to die with some honor, defending a man who tried to help me.”

Mira rose and left the room when she was done with her tirade. Sansa remained benumbed for some time when she was gone. Despite the headaches it gave her, thoughts were crossing her mind in great numbers and quickly. After a moment, she realized Mira was right. Sansa had decided to live for her family. She couldn’t abandon right now. It was true, they still had hope. They could probably convince Ser Kevan of Tyrion’s innocence. She wasn’t doomed yet, but if she did nothing, she was, just like Tyrion and Mira. Why was she bothered so much by Shae’s testimony, only because her allegations about being Tyrion’s whore were true? Tyrion had helped her so much, and was forced to marry her, could she really blame him to seek the company of another woman? Could she blame him especially when he loved this woman? She could destroy her testimony. If someone was to blame, it was Shae, who testified and lied about a man who loved her. Ideas were flooding Sansa’s mind about ways to get Tyrion’s acquittal.

When Mira surprisingly came back an hour later, Sansa already had a good idea of what she might do. She wanted to tell it to Mira immediately, but her handmaiden spoke before her. “I’m sorry about the way I talked to you, my lady. Only, if you don’t want to act, I will.”

Sansa nearly felt exasperation. Mira was apologizing when she should be the one doing so. She went to her friend and took her hands in her own. “No, Mira, you were right. I cannot abandon Tyrion. I will fight.” Mira smiled a little. “I’m really sorry for your family, Mira. I wish I could say more, but… I understand what you feel.”

Mira approved with a nod. “You once told me that if my family disappeared, the survival of the Forresters would be on my shoulders. I must make sure now that their name lives on. And I can only make it sure if I live.”

They remained in their position for a moment, looking at each other, understanding what the other was feeling. Finally, Sansa broke the hold of their hands. “Mira, I need you to bring me Brienne, Ser Jaime, Bronn, and Podrick. Find them all and fetch them here. I also want you to be there. We need to adapt Tyrion’s defense.”

“Yes, my lady.” Mira left right away to fulfill the order. While she was away, Sansa continued to think about ways to enhance Tyrion’s defense. Her headaches turned less painful as time went by and her throat was no longer dry now. She drank enough water to ensure that.

Half an hour later, they were all there. The one-handed man, the lady knight, the squire who looked at his feet, the sellsword with the name of a bay, the Northern girl from the Reach and the traitor’s daughter. They discussed together for two hours, sharing information, plans, ideas, and arguments. Finally, they went separate ways. Ser Jaime left to do his duty as Lord Commander of the Kingsguard. Ser Bronn went to a brothel. Podrick went to look after Sansa’s husband. Mira left to meet a knight after she was done preparing Sansa for the day. As for Brienne, she accompanied Sansa. At the end of this two hours discussion, Sansa had two more witnesses than yesterday. Now, she would try to get a third one.

Chapter End Notes

Some people probably realized it, the song is not from me. I don't claim to match Phil Collins talent for composition. For those who want to hear the song: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-J1ADlO_ijA

Please review

Next chapter: the third witness
Margaery III

Chapter Notes

A short chapter compared to the previous ones, but the upcoming updates are going to be much longer than this. You'll see Margaery being quite surprised by Sansa.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

MARGAERY III

Margaery’s cousins and friends were sewing in the gardens of the Red Keep with her. They were about the midday meal time. The sun was high in the sky and hit them, but not in a hard way. Temperature was dropping and the weather was quite clement for now, so Margaery positioned herself to have the sun caressing her skin. If only she could be as happy as the weather seemed to suggest. Her wedding wouldn’t take place before a week. It should have been celebrated more than a month ago. So much preparations, and they would have to start some all over again. In fact, they already began to reconsider services, singers, songs, decorations and other entertainments. Couldn’t they be done with it so she may finally be queen? She had already waited long enough.

A conversation between Megga and Elinor brought her attention. Megga was talking. “Did you hear what this woman said yesterday about the Imp? Everything she went through? To be honest I was pitying her, despite who she was. No one deserves to be treated like this.”

“I agree with you,” added Elinor. “What a horrible man he is. I’m not surprised to be honest, though. You heard all the rumors about him. The one I pity the most is Sansa. Who knows what he made her do? Everyone says their marriage was un consummated, but I wonder what he may have coerced her to do with the pervert tastes he must have.”

“Poor Sansa. And to think she was supposed to marry King Joffrey. She really had no chance. How she must regret him now. Perhaps that’s why she wanted to kill the queen and Joffrey, because they ruined her marriage and set her aside.”

Margaery had to roll her eyes at Megga’s stupidity. If there was one thing Margaery was sure about, it was that Sansa had been much happier and well with Lord Tyrion than with Joffrey, even with the slaughter of the Twins.

“Megga, Elinor.” She called after her two friends and they looked up from their needlework to her. “We are here to relax. Please keep this kind of discussion for other times.”

Both girls apologized and went back to their needlework in silence. Margaery also went back to her work without a word. She didn’t discuss with anybody. She was alone with her thoughts. She was thinking about the wedding, of course, but also about the trial. It had let a bitter taste in her throat. She couldn’t believe how people like Elinor, Megga and even her father could be so stupid. Anyone with some brain could see easily the accusations were stupid and entirely wrought. Alone the accusation of this whore was proof enough of that. She knew who this woman was. She had seen her accompanying Sansa on a few occasions and spying on her while Margaery was speaking with her friend. She surely was Cersei’s spy since the beginning. Who could believe seriously that Tyrion and Sansa planned to seize the Iron Throne by killing half the Lannister family? It was more than obvious that at least half the testimonies were distorting the reality. How could her father thank the queen for her supposed courageous testimony? Margaery agreed more and more each day with her grandmother. Her father really was an imbecile. That was a chance there were women in Highgarden. If the men of her family wielded the real power, House Tyrell would have crumbled long ago.

Margaery extracted the thread with so much force in her rage that the tissue of her work ripped. Her rose was entirely ruined now. She took a new piece of fabric and started all over again. Margaery was angry against Cersei. She had nearly cancelled her wedding with Joffrey, and now she was spreading horrible lies about Sansa. Margaery knew that Sansa couldn’t have anything to do with Lord Tywin’s death. She was incapable of killing someone, as was Margaery. Margaery’s tactic was always to put people on her side. If that was impossible, she would find ways for them to cause no problem, but not by killing them. There was always another way than killing to deal with a problem.

Sansa was her friend, and Cersei was forcing people to tell stupid lies about her and her husband. To be honest, Margaery didn’t believe in Lord Tyrion’s guilt. The testimonies were so obviously faked, and the dwarf didn’t strike as an assassin. If only her father had some more brain and could realize it. Furthermore, Cersei was destroying all the work Margaery had done with Sansa. She had expected that Sansa would one day rule the North or the Westerlands, perhaps both, and she could have used their friendship to have a powerful ally. However, now that Tywin Lannister was dead, at the moment when Margaery could have gotten what she wanted, the Queen Regent decided to ruin everything and to accuse her brother of parricide in the stupidest way someone could imagine. Margaery wouldn’t be surprised that Cersei was accusing Sansa’s husband only to get Casterly Rock. If Tyrion Lannister died, the Westerlands were hers after all.

Sera entered the square where Margaery was spending time with her entourage. “My lady, please excuse me, but Lady Sansa would like to speak to you.”

That was something Margaery wasn’t expecting. Normally she was the one seeking Sansa. Margaery realized that her friends and cousins were leaving the square by the entrance on her right. Sera had come from the other entrance, the one in front of Margaery. The other girls didn’t want to be seen with Sansa after what happened yesterday. However, Margaery wasn’t going to repel her friend. Anyway, she couldn’t just send her away when she had no excuse. That wasn’t fitting for a future queen.

“Very well, Sera. Let her in.”

Sera left by where she came from and Sansa came in a moment later. She was wearing her purple gown with flowers. Margaery rose to greet her.

“Lady Sansa.”

“Margaery. Please forgive me, but I needed to talk with you about an urgent matter.”

They were alone in the square, but Margaery took no precaution. “Very well, but I fear I don’t have much time to give you, Lady Sansa. The midday meal will be served very soon and I promised my friends to take it with them.”

Sansa stared at her. “So you call me Lady Sansa now. I thought we were friends.”

Margaery sighed. She spoke lowly, close to whispering. “I’m sorry, Sansa, but with everything that’s going on I must be very careful. I am still your friend, but I cannot display this friendship too openly after the events of yesterday.”
“I see.” Sansa was speaking lowly as well. “So that’s what you do when someone becomes undesirable. You still pretend you are his friend, but you act as if you weren’t. Is that what you said to Mira when you dismissed her?”

The mention of Mira brought painful memories to Margaery. Mira had been Margaery’s most trusted friend for years. However, with everything that had happened to her family recently, she had tried to make alliances with people that caused many problems to Margaery. She had tried to give chances to Mira, but her handmaiden only answered by going even farther. The crushing blow happened when she discovered Mira had a scene with a merchant called Lord Andros in public and cooperated with Cersei. It had been too much. With a broken heart, Margaery had dismissed her from her service. She couldn’t allow to be involved in any scandal before she was married to Joffrey. Mira hadn’t lied. When Margaery confronted her about it, Mira confessed everything. She even recognized that Sera helped her, but only because she forced her to. Mira had seemed sad when she revealed it. She regretted it, but it was too late. Margaery had no choice but to expel her from her inner circle. Mira’s last words still resonated in her head weeks later. You would have done the same for your family. Of course Margaery would have done the same, and that was what made her so angry about all of this. She couldn’t blame Mira for what she did. Her family meant so much for her. Margaery still remembered the glow of joy in Mira’s eyes when she talked about her parents, her brothers and her sister. When she learned about the destruction of Ironrath yesterday, she barely managed to hold tears for her former handmaiden. She sent Sera to tell the news to Mira so she may know. However, Margaery still felt betrayed by her. Mira was now serving Sansa. To see her at Sansa’s side during the trial had caused some pain in her heart. Margaery wished she could erase everything and bring back the northern girl she had come to know and trust at Highgarden, but that was impossible. She told Sansa the truth.

“I had no choice. I wish I could have acted otherwise, but I cannot be involved in any scandal or affair before my wedding with Joffrey. Cersei will exploit every weakness she can find.”

Sansa answered in quite an angered voice. “So, what are you going to do? Hide until you become queen? Do you really believe that to be Joffrey’s queen will protect you? Cersei still has half the Kingsguard and many Lannister guards in her pocket. She will never let you hold any influence on Joffrey. You see what she’s doing with Tyrion now that Lord Tywin is dead, and you know it would have been even worse if Ser Kevan hadn’t come. If she can do this, what do you think will stop her from strangling you in your sleep at the first opportunity?” Margaery raised a surprised eyebrow at the mention of that. Cersei threatened her about this once. Sansa seemed to understand what she was thinking. “Tyrion overheard you in the Grand Sept before our wedding.”

Margaery looked down before she answered. She didn’t want to talk about it. “Why did you come to talk with me?”

“I need you to testify for Tyrion,” Sansa stated bluntly. Margaery couldn’t have been more surprised.

“Sansa, I can’t do it.”

“If you don’t, Tyrion may be executed. Ser Jaime already refused to be the Lord of Casterly Rock despite Lord Tywin’s will. If Tyrion dies, Cersei becomes the Lady of the Westerlands. She will have a whole kingdom and half the Red Keep against you.”

“Perhaps, but even if Lord Tyrion gets out of this alive, even if he becomes the head of House Lannister, he will leave with you for the West and Cersei will remain here. She will never forget that I participated in the ruining of her plans to execute your husband. And if her brother is executed all the same, it will be even worse if I testify for him. I may even make more enemies at the court. There are so many people who believe that he’s guilty.”
There was some truth in Sansa’s words, but Margaery couldn’t take that risk. However, Sansa talked again and her words took Margaery aback. “What if I tell you that Cersei won’t be able to do anything against you after the trial is over?”

Margaery raised her eyebrows, skeptical. “How can you promise me this?”

Sansa walked in her direction until not even a feet separated them. “I have a secret card.” Sansa explained her everything with a murmuring voice. No one else would hear it except Margaery. When she was done, Margaery looked at her friend, impressed and bewildered.

“That could work,” the Tyrell girl recognized. “Are you sure about that? It’s quite risky.”

“More risky than ending strangled in your bed one day?”

Sansa wasn’t wrong. An opportunity like this one wouldn’t present itself again before long. “What do you want me to say?”

“Only what we discussed about after my wedding. I want you to tell the court how Tyrion treated me well and refused to share my bed. Also tell them you don’t believe he’s guilty or that he had a whore.”

Margaery wasn’t quite convinced. “I don’t think it will help your husband very much, Sansa.”

“It will destroy Shae’s testimony. All the accusation only holds on the testimonies of Pycelle and Shae. If they fall, Cersei has no proof against Tyrion. I have strong testimonies against Pycelle, and a few against Shae, but your word will have much more value. You are the future queen. People will listen to you. If I can prove that Shae lied for a part of her testimony, I can also prove everything she said is untrue. And remember I have my secret card.”

Margaery was impressed by Sansa’s cleverness. She never saw her use her brain this way before. What happened to the crying girl she met months ago? Perhaps Lord Tyrion’s arrest finally shook her. Margaery smiled. “Very well, I’ll testify. Just make me a sign when it will be my turn to speak. I hope you know what you’re doing.”

“I know. Don’t worry.” Sansa didn’t sound as certain as she probably wanted to seem. “Thank you, Margaery. I won’t forget. And a Lannister always pays her debts.”

Right before Sansa left, Margaery noticed she was wearing a golden necklace. She glimpsed a lion on the medallion. Margaery was quite surprised by this. Perhaps her conversations with Sansa had given some results. The pitying wolf had turned into a lioness. Margaery had quite the impression she would hear Sansa roar before the end of the day.

Chapter End Notes

You know who’s the third witness now. The three next chapters are the rest of the trial. They really are huge and important chapters that I worked a lot on. I can't wait for you to read them.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa (the trial resumes)
Sansa X

Chapter Notes

Because of the many comments and reviews of people telling me they couldn't wait for the next chapter. Because the last chapter was quite short. Because I was excited myself to publish this chapter.

I decided to update sooner than I planned.

Let the trial continue.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

SANSA X

Sansa was walking in the direction of the Great Hall with Brienne and Mira, just like the day before. However, this time, she wasn’t going to listen to lies about her and Tyrion. She was going to tell people the truth. She held tightly the scroll in her hands. After her visit to Margaery, she had gone back to her personal rooms for a quick meal and a last preparation before the trial. She also wrote down the names of all her witnesses for Tyrion’s defense. Ser Kevan had asked for a list when he visited her, so she had to give it to him before the trial continued. Sansa was nervous, but also determined. She wouldn’t abandon Tyrion, and all these people who came to testify against him would pay for their lies, especially Shae. Sansa knew the whole truth about her relationship with Tyrion. Bronn and Podrick told her everything about it this morning. That made her angry to see how Shae betrayed Tyrion after he treated her so well. She was also angry at Shae for her betrayal toward her. Shae would learn the cost to anger a wolf.

While she entered the Throne Room, Sansa felt eyes on her and heard whispers all around her as she passed. They didn’t know, but soon they would. Ser Kevan was sitting on the Iron Throne. Sansa climbed the dais and went to him.

“Ser Kevan.”

“Lady Sansa.” He spoke coldly. He probably thought right now that Tyrion was guilty, and Sansa as well. She would have to convince him of the opposite.

“This is the list of the defense’s witnesses.” She handed him the scroll. Ser Kevan took it and unrolled it.

“You have a lot of witnesses,” he commented after he took a look at the names. “There is an empty line at the end. Why?”

“I have a witness who may not be able to come. If he does, I’ll tell you when the time comes.”

Tyrion’s uncle eyed her suspiciously. Sansa remained unmoved by his stare. She couldn’t reveal the name of her last witness, not right now. Finally, after a moment, the Hand of the King rolled the parchment. “Very well, my lady. You may take your place.”
Ser Kevan pointed with his hand the dais towards his left. Sansa looked at the place. Why was he indicating the chairs where the Tyrell family was sitting? By looking more attentively, Sansa realized there were four chairs instead of the three yesterday. Lord Mace Tyrell was a judge, so they only needed three chairs for Margaery, Ser Loras and their grandmother. She looked back at her uncle-in-law. “What does it mean?”

“Considering what happened yesterday, I don’t think it would be appropriate for you to sit among the assistance. You’ll be safer here on the dais.”

Sansa considered the chair. If everyone took the same place than yesterday, she would be seated next to Margaery. That could be a good thing since the future queen would testify. It would give the impression the Tyrells were on her side, and she preferred to sit with Margaery instead of Cersei. However, if she was on the dais, it might give the first impression that she believed Tyrion was guilty. After what he endured yesterday, what would be his reaction if he saw her on the dais like the judges? Perhaps he would believe she betrayed him. She couldn’t take that risk.

“I thank you, Ser Kevan,” she began. “But I would rather be close to my husband.”

Ser Kevan looked at her with a strange expression. He seemed surprised by her words. “Very well, I’ll have your seat moved on the floor before the right row of benches. You’ll be close to a gold cloak this way.”

“You care a lot about my safety, ser. I thank you.”

“You are the wife of my nephew. This is natural.” He spoke without emotion, with indifference. Sansa understood the meaning. He wasn’t doing it out of kindness, but only because through her marriage with Tyrion she was a Lannister. Sansa went away. Two men were already lifting her chair and bringing it to the place Ser Kevan indicated. Her seat was now behind the box of the witnesses. At least she would be close to Tyrion. He needed to know she was with him. His brother told her this morning about the deal Ser Kevan proposed him to join the Night’s Watch. Tyrion had refused when Ser Jaime told him, but would he still be of the same mind today? Sansa had to make sure Tyrion wouldn’t confess. He was innocent.

Sansa remembered the words Ser Jaime brought back from his conversation with Tyrion. He said his loyalty was to you now. That he didn’t care about House Lannister, just like Varys said. And that you showed more loyalty to him than the average Lannister ever showed him. Sansa had been touched by Tyrion’s words. She didn’t love him, but she could consider him as an ally, even a friend. He helped her very much and had been kind with her. She couldn’t let him die. Sansa touched the necklace around her neck. Inside she was still a Stark, but outside she was a Lannister. Tyrion helped her, and a Lannister always pays her debts.

Kevan invited everyone to sit down. The same chaos than yesterday began. Sansa noticed Bronn and Podrick already at their places among the crowd. There was a young girl next to Bronn. Brienne was at her side, standing with a hand on the hilt of her sword. As for Mira, she was standing on the other side of Sansa.

“Don’t you want to sit, Mira?” Sansa asked her.

“I fear it’s too late, my lady.” Mira glanced towards the benches. She was right, they were all occupied now. “Anyway, I must be close to you in all circumstances. I’m your handmaiden after all.”

Sansa had to smile at this. Mira was perfect as a handmaiden. Sansa still had difficulties to believe Margaery removed her from her service. She was as loyal as Podrick. They made a good pair
After a few minutes, the massive doors of the Hall opened, and just like the last time Ser Jaime entered, followed by Tyrion and two gold cloaks who attached his shackles. When Tyrion entered the box of the accused, he noticed her presence. Sansa smiled a little in his direction to show he had her support. Tyrion looked at her strangely and averted his eyes from her. He looked ashamed. Perhaps he thought she blamed him for his relationship with Shae. To be true, she felt betrayed in some way when she learned it, but Bronn and Podrick explained to her this morning that Tyrion never had anything with Shae after their wedding. Sansa couldn’t blame Tyrion to spend time with a whore before they were married. After all, she knew very well he wasn’t the only one to do so, far from it, and he couldn’t know at this moment they would marry. In fact, Sansa even felt grateful that he stopped whatever there was between him and Shae, at least physically, after they were married. And so my watch begins. He kept his promise. It was difficult to find people like this since she arrived in King’s Landing.

Joffrey didn’t show up today. He was probably certain they would bring him Tyrion’s head before the end of the day. Sansa hoped he was wrong. The trial resumed as soon as Tyrion was restrained and the guards took their places. One of them was near Sansa. She didn’t know if she should be reassured or scared by his presence. The gold cloaks had turned against her father when he was Hand of the King. At least, it wasn’t Janos Slynt who was their commander anymore. Tyrion saw to that a long time ago.

Ser Kevan cleared his throat. “Tyrion of the House Lannister, you stand accused by the Queen Regent of the murder of your father, Tywin Lannister, the Lord of Casterly Rock and the Hand of the King. You are also accused of attempt of murder against the king. After listening to the accusations and the witnesses of the Crown, do you wish to change your pleading?”

There was a moment of silence. Tyrion looked at her, uncertainty plain on his face. Sansa made a negative sign with her head. No, don’t do it. He mustn’t plead guilty. Tyrion turned to his uncle and said the word Sansa wanted to hear. “No.”

“You didn’t kill your father?”

“No.”

“You made no attempt on the life of your king?”

“No attempt.”

Sansa believed she saw Ser Kevan sigh in silence. She was quite sure he tightened his lips. “Very well. We will listen to the witnesses of the defense then. The defense may call its first witness.”

Sansa exchanged a look with Ser Jaime at the other side of the room. The Lord Commander of the Kingsguard walked with a determined pace to the box, his steps echoing through the room. Some people whispered in surprise. Sansa had decided they would start with a witness that would show Tyrion’s defense was serious. This way, the judges would consider everything her witnesses would say from the beginning. Then would come the less important and most questionable people until they reached those that would prove without a doubt that Tyrion was innocent.

“Ser Jaime Lannister,” declared the main judge. “What do you have to say?” Ser Kevan spoke without emotion again. He really sounded like his brother in these moments, though less severe.

“I have to say that my brother is innocent. Anyone who believes he is guilty isn’t wrong, he is stupid.” Ser Jaime’s words brought some mutterings among the crowd.
“That’s a frank declaration, Ser Jaime, but it doesn’t prove anything.”

Ser Jaime sighed and looked down before he rose his head again and declared something else that let people silent. “I’m going to tell you the truth. Tyrion hated our father. Our father hated him too. But my father also hated me. And he hated Cersei as well. And both of us hated him too. But we respected him, all of us. I, Cersei, Tyrion, we all respected him. He was our father. None of us would have ever thought about killing him.” Ser Jaime stopped a moment before he said what was really important. “Anyway, I have the proof that my brother is innocent. I have the proof that he didn’t kill our father.”

“What is this proof, Ser Jaime?” asked Lord Mace Tyrell. “The Grand Maester told us your father was poisoned with the tears of Lys and that Lord Tyrion stole it in his stores.”

“Pycke will tell you something one day and tell the contrary two days later. Do you know what he told me when he examined the body?” A silence welcomed Jaime’s question. He had answered to Lord Tyrell on a defying and exasperated tone. “No, of course you don’t. I’ll tell you. The morning my father was found dead I was heading to my personal quarters after my guard of night. I crossed the way of the Grand Maester who told me my father was dead, so I ran to his chambers and found him lying on his bed. He looked like he slept. There was no injury on his body, no smell, nothing. When the Grand Maester arrived a few minutes later and examined his body, he told us my father died of a heart failure during the night. There wasn’t a single smell coming from his body. He wasn’t poisoned. Tyrion was arrested by my sister because she assumed our father was murdered the moment she realized he was dead. Even Pycke at this moment told her our father died of natural causes.”

“Ser Jaime is right.” Oberyn Martell spoke. “The tears of Lys eat the bowels of its victims. If Lord Tywin really died of this, there should have been a horrible smell in the room.”

Sansa was glad Prince Oberyn highlighted this detail. Was he really against Tyrion? She started to have some doubts about it now. Perhaps his vote wasn’t decided before the trial began. Pycke’s testimony would be quite weakened by this testimony, and it was only the beginning.

“Thank you, Ser Jaime. You’re dismissed.” Ser Jaime left the box with a bow on Ser Kevan’s words and went back to his place where he stood guard. Sansa noticed that Cersei was looking at him with a poisonous look. “The defense may call its second witness.”

As soon as Ser Kevan spoke, someone at Sansa’s side left her place. Mira knew she was the second one to testify. She wouldn’t bring much evidence to exonerate Tyrion, but it was always useful to have people talking for you and coming from all social classes and all the Seven Kingdoms.

“State your name,” said Ser Kevan, looking at Mira intently.

“Mira Forrester. I am a handmaiden in service to Lady Sansa, Lord Tyrion’s wife.” Mira’s voice was neutral. She was quite talented to hide her emotions and stay calm.

“Wait a minute.” That was to be expected. It was Lord Mace Tyrell. “I recognize you. You were at the service of my daughter Margaery. What are you doing at the service of someone else?”

“My lords.” The call came from the dais. It was Margaery. “If you permit, I may explain it.”

Ser Kevan looked on his left to Margaery. After a moment, he conceded. “Very well, Lady Margaery. You may.”

“Mira was my handmaiden, it’s true, but a few weeks ago Sansa told me during a discussion that one of her servants had left and that she was short a member in her household. Since I had more than enough people at my service, I offered her to have Mira as her handmaiden.”

Strangely, Prince Oberyn was the next one to speak. “I don’t recognize your name. I know the names of most of the noble families of the Reach, but I never heard about a House Forrester.”

“I wasn’t born in the Reach, Prince Oberyn,” Mira answered. Perhaps she should have waited, or perhaps she shouldn’t have given more details. “My father was the Lord of Ironrath. My family is sworn to House Glover of Deepwood Motte, who are sworn to the Wardens of the North.”

Mira’s declaration brought some new mumbles. Now they would see her as a traitor. Oberyn Martell was looking at her with some surprise. “You are a Northerner?”

“I am.”

Cersei chose this moment to intervene. “Her family fought for the traitor Robb Stark. Why should we listen to her?”

“Silence!” Ser Kevan’s voice resonated. “Your Grace, you are submitted to the same rules than the accused and everyone else here. You will only speak when asked to.” Sansa saw the anger in the queen’s eyes. She wasn’t used to being rebuked, Sansa could see it. “We are not here to discuss about allegiances. Lady Mira, what do you have to tell us?”

Mira waited a moment before she answered. She also turned her head to look at Tyrion for a moment. “I don’t believe Lord Tyrion is guilty. I can’t say I know him personally, but I met him a few times in the weeks preceding his arrest and he gave me the impression to be a good man. I know that he fought valiantly at the Battle of Blackwater, that he served loyally as Hand of the King and as Master of Coin. I can’t imagine someone so devoted to the Crown and to his family capable of murdering his own father.”

“How did you meet him?” That was Oberyn Martell who talked. “Why would Lord Tyrion spend time with a handmaiden?” There was a smile on Prince Oberyn’s lips. Was he implying there had been something between Mira and Tyrion, just like with Shae? If that was the case, Mira didn’t lose her composure and continued to speak with a neutral voice.

“My family is specialized in the harvesting and crafting of ironwood. Lord Tyrion was looking for a supplier in order to get enough of it to rebuild the royal fleet. Since I was the only person who could represent House Forrester in King’s Landing, he approached me to discuss of it. During our discussions, he always remained centered on his duties as Master of Coin. He even told me that it was on the orders of his father that he was looking for ironwood. As for me, someone so dedicated to his duties towards the Crown couldn’t have killed the Hand of the King, even less his own father.”

Mira was done talking and Sansa heard people arguing among them in the assistance. They weren’t sure if they could believe Mira’s testimony. The following witnesses would prove Mira was right. Ser Kevan allowed her to take back her place. When the next witness was called, it was the other person at Sansa’s side who went forward.

Brienne had told Sansa she could testify for Tyrion. She was one of the three new witnesses Sansa found this morning, along with Margaery. She said that after what she heard during the first day and what Sansa told her about her husband, she didn’t believe anymore he was guilty. Sansa hadn’t been sure if Brienne’s testimony would make anything good, but she finally decided to include her. She was still one more person to speak for Tyrion.

Brienne’s presence surprised many people. They weren’t used to women clad in armor and with a sword at their belt, even if now Brienne was known for that through all the Red Keep. Her name caused even more surprise. People knew she was suspected of killing Renly Baratheon, and Lord Tyrell made a point to remind them of it.

“Weren’t you the one to kill Renly Baratheon?”

“I didn’t kill him.” Brienne answered shortly. Sansa had warned her to not extend about the events of Lord Renly’s death if she was asked about it. That was what she feared the most with Brienne’s testimony. Sansa noticed at the same time the angry gaze Ser Loras was shooting at Brienne.

“We’re not here about Renly Baratheon’s death, but about Tywin Lannister’s death and attempts of murder against our rightful king. You have no need to say anything about things that don’t concern the accusations, Lady Brienne. You may speak.” Kevan’s intervention relieved Sansa. Brienne wouldn’t have to speak about the shadow. She was so honourable that it almost made her stupid sometimes.

“Thank you, Ser Kevan.” Brienne started her testimony. “I don’t believe Lord Tyrion is guilty. I know his brother, Ser Jaime Lannister, and Ser Jaime knows his brother very well. If he believes that Lord Tyrion is innocent, then he is innocent.” That wasn’t quite convincing. It would be what would follow that would make her testimony a success or a disaster. “Furthermore, after Lord Renly died, I served Lady Catelyn Stark, Lady Sansa’s mother. I escorted Ser Jaime to King’s Landing on her orders, but people don’t know why Lady Stark really released Ser Jaime.”

Ser Kevan was the one to ask. “Why did she release him?”

The hard part came. Brienne talked very carefully, saying exactly what Sansa told her. “When he was acting Hand of the King, Lord Tyrion made a secret deal with Catelyn Stark. His brother, Ser Jaime, against her daughters, the Lady Sansa and the Lady Arya.” There were sounds of surprise once more. “The Starks were traitors to the Crown, but everyone knows that despite this, they only trusted people whose honor they were sure of. People they knew would be incapable of killing members of their own family. Lady Stark trusted Lord Tyrion. This means that in her eyes, Lord Tyrion was a man of honor who would never betray his family. He can’t have done this.”

It was the better Brienne could do. Even Mira’s testimony was more convincing, but perhaps it could have some weight in the balance when the other witnesses would have testified. Brienne came back to her place beside Sansa. She was obviously angry to have said that Sansa’s family were traitors, but Sansa ordered her to say it, or else her testimony wouldn’t be considered. The next witness was Ser Balon Swann who Sansa turned against Cersei not long after she was confined by Joffrey in her chambers. Taking a look at the queen, Sansa saw the anger in her eyes. She had to admit she felt proud in this moment to have deprived Cersei of a good witness. Ser Balon never hit Sansa, so she had nothing against him, though he joined the Kingsguard after Joffrey stopped to ask them to beat her.

Ser Balon started his testimony by praising Tyrion. “My Lord Hand, I had the honor to fight alongside Lord Tyrion during the Battle of Blackwater. He is a brave man for all his size. I saw him covered of blood, fighting for the city, fighting for his king. He stayed somewhere between life and death for days I learned later. It is true that he slapped his Grace once, after the riot. But he only slapped him once, he never kicked him or hit him in any other way or at any other time. It was a fit of wroth, no more. A summer storm. The mob near killed us all. His Grace didn’t keep any mark of this. As for the time he said the king was a halfwit, I was there. What my sworn brothers said is true, but they didn’t tell the whole story.” Ser Balon’s voice turned different. He now sounded ashamed of speaking of this, and Sansa knew he was. It had taken a lot from her to convince him to tell the truth about this scene. He had to speak, even only indirectly, against his sworn brothers and his king.
“What Lord Tyrion said yesterday about it was true. It was soon after the Battle of Oxcross. Robb Stark had defeated a great army of the Crown and the king brought the Lady Sansa before the court to answer for the treason of her brother. He was pointing a loaded crossbow at her, saying that killing her would send the young wolf a message. I feared he would do it for a moment, but finally his Grace lowered the weapon. He instructed Ser Meryn to send a message to Robb Stark another way, so Ser Meryn hit the Lady Sansa with his fists and the flat of his sword. He tore her clothes apart. She was half naked before the court and Ser Meryn was about to deliver another strike of his sword when Lord Tyrion intervened. He put a stop to this and reminded the king of the respect he owed to his betrothed and that he couldn’t do as he liked as the Mad King did. That was no threat. It was a warning and an advice from a Hand and an uncle to his king and nephew. I will not believe that Lord Tyrion attempted to kill his Grace or killed his father.”

“This man is telling lies about the king he swore to serve. I want him to be removed immediately from the Kingsguard!” Cersei shouted as soon as Ser Balon was done.

“Silence! If you want to say something, your Grace, you’ll have to ask for it, or else you will not be allowed at this trial any longer.” Ser Kevan had to intervene again before Cersei’s outburst. Tyrion’s outbursts were civilized and proper in comparison.

“I am the queen! You have no right to expel me!”

“You will not be expelled, your Grace. You will be accompanied back to your chambers with all the dignity your rank gives you the right to. The judges cannot allow the king’s justice to be interfered. If you wish to leave, just say a word.” Cersei didn’t say another word. “Ser Balon, if you don’t have anything else to say, you may leave.”

Sansa couldn’t believe she looked with wonderment to this woman once. She looked like a scolded child right now. Shae had better manners than this queen, and that said a lot. Ser Balon left the box. When the next witness advanced on Sansa’s sign, there were nearly shouts of surprise through all the Great Hall. Even Oberyn Martell looked surprised… and amused as well if Sansa judged by his smile. Ser Kevan had a doubtful expression. Lord Mace Tyrell was stammering. Cersei’s face was contorted by anger. Ser Jaime was agape and Sansa felt Brienne’s questioning gaze on her. Ser Loras was looking at his grandmother with a dumbfounded expression and the Queen of Thornes was fixing the new witness, her eyebrows frowned by surprise. As for Tyrion, he looked at Sansa in a way that showed he was impressed. Sansa smiled back at him, feeling pride rising in her chest. Mira, already aware of all this, bowed her head when Lady Margaery passed before her and Sansa saw a thin smile on the future queen’s lips directed toward her former handmaiden. She gave the same one to Sansa before she took place into the box. Her presence caused many reactions. Only her presence as a witness for the defense could switch the crowd’s opinion about Tyrion, and have more than enough impact to convince her father to vote for Tyrion even if Ser Kevan told him not to.

Margaery began her testimony. “I remember something that my brother Loras told me about the Battle of Blackwater a few days after it took place. He told me that during the battle he saw a small shape on the ground, wearing a red armor, covered with blood and mud, a huge red line on his face from the forehead to the chin. I learned later it was Lord Tyrion. My brother saw him injured in the middle of the battle. Lord Tyrion risked his life for the city and for our king this day. He saved the city. He saved our king. It’s true, Lord Tywin arrived with our forces to defeat Stannis, but before it was Lord Tyrion who held the city against the usurper. Without him, my brother and Lord Tywin would have arrived too late. Some people here owe their life to this man. He saved my king, my love, on this day, and I can’t believe that he would try to kill him.” Margaery seemed so sincere in her way to speak, allowing just the right sparks of emotion to make sure her words just had the right impact. “Also, I must reveal that one of the witnesses yesterday lied in front of the whole court, under the eyes of the Seven.”
“Someone lied? Who?” Margaery’s father really was stupid.

“I’m talking about the whore. Shae.” The word caused some rumbles in the crowd, like when it was pronounced yesterday, or so Sansa thought. She had been so shocked by Shae’s words back then that she barely noticed the other people’s reactions. “I saw her a few times when I spent time with Sansa and she always seemed to be spying on her, watching her in every circumstances. I spoke with Sansa after she was married to Lord Tyrion and she only had good words for her husband. He treated her with all the consideration a husband owes to his wife. She told herself that he treated her even better than she deserved to be. And she never refused him in her bed like Shae said. It was Lord Tyrion who decided to wait until his wife was ready to consummate the marriage. He is not the perverted man this woman described, quite the opposite. I don’t believe a word of what she said. She lied about his marriage with Sansa, and she swore by all the gods that everything she said was true. She lied about one thing, so I don’t see how we could believe anything she might have said before the court. Anyway, if Lord Tyrion had wanted to kill my beloved Joffrey, he would have done so during the Battle of Blackwater. I don’t believe a single second the accusations against him.”

Margaery went back to her seat on the dais when she was done speaking. Her speech had quite an effect on everyone. The tide was turning. The next witnesses would have to exploit the breach Margaery created. And Sansa would be the first to work on it. When Ser Kevan called for the following witness, Sansa rose and came to the box. She stood there, her face impassive, waiting for the judges to ask their questions.

After the Hand of the King asked what she had to say, Sansa began. First, she had a physical proof to present. “My lords, I would like first to give you something.” Mira advanced on the dais with the vial that contained the essence of nightshade Tyrion gave to Sansa a few weeks ago. She presented it to Ser Kevan. Sansa explained to the judges the content of the vial. “As you can see, it is almost full. I didn’t use it very much.”

The vial was examined by both the judges. When it came to Prince Oberyn, he looked very closely to it. “I would say approximately five drops were used. We would need ten drops to kill a single man. It couldn’t have been used to kill Lord Tywin.” Sansa internally sighed in relief. The two poisons the Grand Maester mentioned as being the possible cause of Lord Tywin’s death were now excluded. Sansa started her testimony after the judges were done looking at the substance. She made sure her voice was low, hesitant, sad, soft and delicate.

“I remember that the queen used to say how fool, silly and idiot I was. Today I have to admit she was right. I was an idiot to trust Shae, my handmaiden. I would never have trusted her if I had known who she was. I heard many people yesterday testifying against my husband and each time I wanted to cry. I can still remember how Ser Meryn Trant and Ser Boros Blount used to hit me with their iron fists. I remember the many bruises and cuts I could see all over my face each time I was looking at myself in a glass. I can still feel the pain that I felt when Ser Meryn hit me with his sword here in this very room. I still remember how I felt when he stripped me of my clothes in the presence of dozens of people.”

Sansa heard cries behind her in the assistance. She could see Lord Mace was surprised and shocked by her words, and how Ser Kevan and Prince Oberyn were looking closely at her, listening to every words she pronounced. She didn’t stop to talk. “I remember how I felt when I heard Shae relating all her lies yesterday. She lied about the fact I refused my husband. He was the one to refuse to consummate our marriage, just like Lady Margaery told you. Shae lied in front of all of us in the sight of the Seven. I have come to know Lord Tyrion these last months. I already knew him before our marriage, but I learned to know him even better afterwards. Even if Shae really is who she pretends to be, I know that my husband would never mistreat a woman, whoever she is. Anyone who knows him even a little is well aware this is impossible. And anyone who knows him knows very well he would never make such a stupid plan to kill the whole royal family.” She looked directly into the eyes of Ser Kevan. She saw that he was moved by her words. “Shae’s testimony is perjury.”

Sansa heard people whispering in approval as she headed back to her seat. When she passed close to Tyrion, she heard him speak. “Thank you.” It was a whisper so low that only she could hear it. She gave him a timid smile as she sat down in her chair.

After Sansa came Bronn. Sansa had feared for a moment that Bronn may abandon Tyrion. Cersei had offered him a marriage with Lollys Stokeworth and gold if he refused to testify for Tyrion and to be his champion if Tyrion ever asked for a trial by combat. After yesterday’s testimonies, he nearly told her this morning that he would accept Cersei’s offer if she couldn’t guarantee Tyrion would be declared innocent. Sansa and Jaime argued for half an hour to convince him to stay by their side, and Sansa had to promise him a marriage prospect with a highborn lady and a lordship once Tyrion would be free. She wondered how Tyrion would react to this when she would tell him. However, Bronn was there and about to testify.

The sellsword knight began his testimony by rambling about his great deeds. “Ser Bronn of the Blackwater. Sellsword for many years. Fought and worked for many men, as long as they had money to pay me and that I had a chance to live at their service. I’ve been north of the Wall once. Defeated Ser Vardis Egen in a trial by combat and saved the life of Lord Tyrion Lannister this way. Fought at the Battle of the Green Fork. Appointed Commander of the City Watch by the Hand of the King after the baby’s killer was sent to the Wall. Fought at the Battle of Blackwater and put fire to half the ships of Stannis. Anointed knight by the king himself for this, on the order of Lord Tywin.”

“Is that all you have to say about yourself?” The prince of Dorne didn’t look impressed by Bronn’s personal praise.

“I’m good at killing and fucking and singing. I can sing the Dornishman’s wife pretty well if you want. I’m quite known in the brothels.”

The reactions of the people were a mix of indignation, discomfort and laughter. Prince Oberyn was smiling. Ser Kevan decided to put an end to this. “Ser Bronn, what do you have to say about the matter at hand?”

Bormon began by telling them what happened the day Sansa was beaten before the court by Ser Meryn. He described the scene when he and Tyrion entered the Great Hall at this moment, Ser Meryn holding his sword high in the air, about to deliver a great stroke with it while Sansa knelt on the floor, wailing with all her clothes torn apart. Bronn added some nasty details about the kingsguard. “He sheathed his sword as soon as the Lord Imp approached, probably afraid of what he may order. What kind of knight beats a helpless girl, Tyrion asked. Do you know what Ser Meryn answered? The kind who serves his king, Imp. I told him he should be careful to not soil his pretty white cloak with blood. After all, he never really had blood on it since he flew away from the battlements in the middle of the Battle of Blackwater. Anyway, when Tyrion warned his nephew that he could end the same way than the Mad King if he did as he liked, that’s when Ser Trant declared that no one could threaten the king in the presence of the kingsguards. The answer of the Imp was I’m not threatening the king, ser. I am educating my nephew. Bronn, the next time Ser Meryn speaks, kill him.” That brought reactions of surprise again among the assistance. “You should have seen the fear in his eyes then. That was a threat. See the difference? That’s what the dwarf said right after that. I guess the man understood the difference between an advice and a threat. I wished he had spoken again.”

There were some rumbles in the room. Prince Oberyn looked quite amused by Bronn’s tale while Lord Mace seemed to be searching for his words. That didn’t stop Bronn to speak however.

“Another day, I had quite an interesting discussion with Ser Meryn, not long after the Battle of Blackwater. When I told him I was a knight, he said I was an up-jumped cutthroat, and nothing more. I answered. \textit{That’s exactly who I am. And you’re a grub in fancy armor who’s better at beating little girls than fighting men.}”

The last words brought some laughter this time. Sansa hadn’t been sure about what Bronn would say about Ser Meryn. After all, he was a kingsguard. It was a chance Joffrey wasn’t there. However, Sansa didn’t have a choice. Bronn had accepted to testify at the condition he could mock Ser Meryn like he wanted. Sansa needed his testimony to destroy Ser Meryn’s testimony, and for much more. Bronn was essential to destroy another testimony. No, in fact, he was essential to destroy a witness. Even better, two witnesses. Anyway, his mockery of the knight seemed to have turned quite well. He was about to destroy three witnesses in this case. After the laughs were over, he continued on another subject.

“To talk about something else, I’m sorry about that your Grace,” he made a deep mocking bow in Cersei’s direction, “but it appears that most of the things Shae said were false.” Bronn started to say that he knew Shae personally and she didn’t believe in any god, so an oath to tell the truth by all gods didn’t mean a shit for her. Then he recited all the lies in Shae’s testimony. Tyrion and Sansa never planned anything against the royal family or Lord Tywin, or else Bronn would have known since Tyrion told him nearly everything. He knew Tyrion for a long time and he knew he didn’t do it. “He hated his father, of course, but many hated him. And poison’s not his style. Or murder, for that matter. In fact, I never had so few people to kill while working for someone. The only times I killed for him were the trial by combat and the Battle of Blackwater.” He also told the whole story about how Shae came to be in Tyrion’s service. He recognized Shae was his whore and that he kept her in the Tower of the Hand, but he pointed out every details of her testimony that were untrue. How she came willingly in Tyrion’s tent when Bronn told her Lord Tywin’s son wanted her in his service, not long before the Battle of the Green Fork. How Bronn broke the arm of the knight when he refused to let Shae go by her freewill. How she was quite interested by everything of value in Tyrion’s tent and didn’t seem at all bothered to work for him. Bronn explained Tyrion treated her very well and that Shae enjoyed his company very much. He really told her \textit{I want you to fuck me like it’s my last night in this world}, but Shae looked more amused than sad when she talked about it. The nickname was Shae’s idea and she began to use it at the very beginning of their time together. “Anyway, she wasn’t bothered at all to be with him. She loved him.”

Consternation was obvious on everyone’s face in the room and by their breath, from the judges to the crowd, even to the guards. Only Sansa and the other people with her this morning remained impassive since they already knew about it. Ser Kevan broke the awkward silence that had followed Bronn’s declaration. “Wait a minute. This woman… was in love with Lord Tyrion?” He really seemed surprised by this.

“Yes, she was.” Bronn answered so casually. “After the Battle of Blackwater it became quite obvious. She wanted him to escape with her to Pentos, but he refused. That’s why she was so angry with him after he married the Lady Sansa. She wanted him to marry her instead. She told me one day \textit{I am his, and he is mine.”} Many people blew puffs of air when they heard it, a few even laughed. Sansa felt glee to see Shae being mocked as Tyrion was yesterday. No one would ever believe her testimony after that. When Sansa looked at Tyrion, he was sitting, looking away on the floor. Sansa knew now he loved Shae, so that was probably normal he looked so sad in this moment. Sansa felt sorry for him, but she was also angry in some way that Tyrion still cared for a woman who betrayed him so coldly.

Bonn specified as well that Tyrion stopped to see Shae after he was married with Sansa, and that Shae got even more angry because of that. Sansa never knew about the relationship between Tyrion and Shae and Sansa never removed Shae from her service. Shae was the one to leave King’s Landing by her own will after Tyrion was arrested. Then came the last part of Bronn’s testimony when he spoke about the day they arrested the Grand Maester. Bronn was there and told every details about this day, including the fact they found the Grand Maester in his bed with a whore. Pycelle was present today, so he began to protest immediately. “This… these are filthy lies… from a cutthroat. I was wrongfully imprisoned…”

“That’s enough, Grand Maester.” Ser Kevan called Pycelle to order. “You were given time to speak yesterday. Continue, Ser Bronn.”

The sellsword knight went on, saying he brought himself the Grand Maester to the black cells on Tyrion’s orders and that Tyrion took nothing in the Grand Maester’s chambers while Bronn was present. He stole nothing in his stores and only stayed a few seconds after Bronn left with the old man. However, the best moment was when Bronn revealed the Grand Maester confessed he let Jon Arryn die and did nothing to save him. Pycelle tried again to speak, stuttering incomprehensible words. Ser Kevan ordered the gold cloaks to escort him back to his chambers since he couldn’t remain quiet and the Grand Maester left the room between two armed men under the shouts of the crowd. Even after Bronn was back to his place people continued to yell and Ser Kevan had to bring back the order again, even threatening to expel all the assistance from the court.

The next witness was a girl named Daisy. She was the one sitting next to Bronn when the trial started again today. She was the last witness Sansa managed to find this morning. When Bronn told her about Pycelle’s arrest, he revealed that he knew the girl who was present then since he visited Littlefinger’s brothels and that he could persuade her to testify if she was paid enough. That was why he left for a brothel after their meeting this morning, or so Sansa hoped. Perhaps he had used the opportunity to do other things while in the brothel. Sansa wasn’t sure if it was a good idea to bring a whore to testify for Tyrion. She had destroyed Shae so much up to now that people may not believe Daisy’s words, but she was the only one who saw what Tyrion did in the Grand Maester’s chambers after Bronn brought him in the black cells. Daisy’s testimony was quite short in comparison to the one Bronn gave and inspired a lot of pity. She seemed so fragile and afraid to speak. That was no surprise considering the last time she came into the Red Keep, Joffrey had her nearly beaten to death. She gave the same version than Bronn, confessing she was a whore working in one of Lord Baelish’s establishments and that she was with the Grand Maester in his bed the night Lord Tyrion arrested him. She confirmed all the things Bronn said, including about Jon Arryn, and revealed Tyrion stole nothing to the Grand Maester.

“The only thing I saw Lord Tyrion take was some sort of instrument I don’t know the name, but he only played with it a little before he put it back on a table. He took nothing. He stayed behind a few seconds after Ser Bronn and the Grand Maester were gone, but it was only to give me a silver stag and a golden dragon for my trouble. He took nothing in the chamber.”

No one dared to question her. Her voice was so weak and trembling, it was obvious she was afraid and hesitant to speak. All the judges seemed quite compassionate this time. Perhaps some of them even knew she was the whore Joffrey ordered to be beaten until her body was covered with blood.

When Daisy left, Cersei decided it was time for her to interrupt again. “She is whore. Why should we believe anything she said?” Ser Kevan silenced her with a single stare. Sansa could see Ser Kevan’s behavior changed in comparison to the beginning of the trial. He didn’t look at Tyrion or Sansa with hard or suspicious eyes like before. His glances only showed curiosity now. He was listening to Tyrion’s witnesses and considering everything they said.

Finally Podrick came. Like everyone, he said he didn’t believe Lord Tyrion was guilty. In fact, he swore on his personal life that his master was innocent of all the crimes he was accused of. He was a kind and brave man, loyal to his family, and he never mistreated Shae. Podrick denied all Shae’s accusations and words, stating firmly that Tyrion never mistreated her and that she left King’s Landing by her own will after Tyrion’s arrest, not on Sansa’s orders. Then he spoke about the dinner when Tyrion threatened to hurt Cersei.

“The queen accused my lord to have shipped Princess Myrcella off to Dorne, and now to send the king to the battlefield to die. Lord Tyrion said the Kingsguard would protect him and that he had the best armor they could get for him. He said King Joffrey had to be out there fighting, that men would fight more fiercely if their king fought beside them. Then the queen said to Lord Tyrion she found his little whore. She said that every wound King Joffrey would suffer during the battle she would suffer it too. That if the king died, she would die from the most horrible death someone could imagine. Then she ordered Ser Mandon Moore to bring her in. But it wasn’t Shae. I think the name of the girl was Ros. Lord Tyrion had spent some time with her in the North and had given her a golden necklace, so the queen believed she still was in my lord’s service. She had bruises and cuts all over her body. On her arms, on her back, on her face. Blood was running from her lips. It was all black around an eye, someone had punched her right there. Lord Tyrion was angry at the queen because she ordered someone innocent to be beaten for no reason, that’s why he said he would hurt her for this. It wasn’t sincere. It was only anger that spoke in this moment.” Podrick continued on another subject. What he would say now would be vital for the outcome of the trial... and would plant seeds for the next testimony. So much depended on it.

“During the Battle of Blackwater, Lord Tyrion was on the battlements with King Joffrey, Ser Lancel Lannister, Sandor Clegane and some kingsguards. Ser Mandon Moore and Ser Meryn Trant were among them. When Stannis’s fleet attacked, he sent a ship full of wildfire against them. Then he gave the signal to Ser Bronn to loose a flaming arrow on the ship and it exploded. A large part of Stannis’s fleet was destroyed, but he chose to launch an attack on the city all the same. Lord Tyrion ordered Sandor Clegane to fight before the Mud Gate to prevent any Baratheon troops from coming nearby. Then he sent me to the King’s Gate to bring all men guarding it. He never made a single attempt to kill the king all this time. When I came back, Ser Meryn and the king were no longer here and all men were wondering why the king had left the battlements. So Lord Tyrion decided to lead the attack out of the gates. He led the men through a secret passage under the city and attacked the soldiers trying to break through the Mud Gate by behind. He defeated them and had the battering ram rolled and set on fire. The men were shouting HALFMAN! Then we were attacked by other Baratheon’s troops. It was during this engagement that Lord Tyrion was injured.” Podrick stopped for a moment. He looked hesitant to speak now. “What most of the people ignore is that Lord Tyrion wasn’t injured by enemies. It wasn’t one of Stannis’s men who gave him his scar. It was Ser Mandon’s sword.”

There were new shouts of surprise all over the room. Prince Oberyn looked intently at Podrick. He seemed quite intrigued by what Podrick just said. Lord Mace didn’t know what to say. Ser Kevan was first to come over the surprise. “Are you saying that Ser Mandon Moore is the one who injured Lord Tyrion?”

“Yes, my lord,” Podrick answered. “He tried to kill Lord Tyrion during the battle.” Again people puffed in surprise. “I don’t know why, but he suddenly slashed Lord Tyrion across the face with his sword. If Lord Tyrion hadn’t backed up in time, his head would have been cut in half.”

“Who’s this Ser Mandon Moore? I know no knight of the Kingsguard who bears that name.” It was Prince Oberyn who asked this question. Ser Kevan was the one to answer.

“Ser Mandon Moore died at the Battle of Blackwater.”

“Yes, my lord,” Podrick confirmed. “I killed him.”
Podrick’s confession brought a complete silence in the Great Hall. A fly could have been heard. After a moment, Ser Kevan broke it. “You say that you killed Ser Mandon Moore? You killed a kingsguard?”

“Yes, my lord. I had no choice. He was about to deliver a final stroke and to cut Lord Tyrion’s head. I am his squire. It was my duty to protect him. So I threw a spear through his head.”

There was a total silence once again. No one dared to speak. Finally, Cersei sneered. “He just confessed he killed a kingsguard. His head should be mounted on a spike, just like the one of the monster he’s serving.”

“SILENCE! The next time you speak, your Grace, I will have to ask you to leave the court.” Ser Kevan’s voice resonated even more powerful than it ever did before. Cersei turned silent again. “Podrick Payne, are you sure Ser Mandon Moore tried to kill Lord Tyrion?”

“Yes, my lord.” Ser Kevan examined Podrick for a very long time after he answered. Finally, the Hand of the King spoke again.

“If you have nothing else to say, you may retire.”

Podrick didn’t leave. He still had one thing to say. Something necessary to say, but also very dangerous. “My lord, before I leave, I just want to say one last thing. Ser Mandon Moore had no personal reasons to kill Lord Tyrion. If he tried to kill him, then it means he was following an order. And there are only two people in King’s Landing who can give an order to a kingsguard.”

Again, the room was silent like a crypt. Podrick left the box of the witnesses. His words weighed in the air. The atmosphere had gone very thick in a very short time. His words meant a lot. If Ser Mandon Moore received an order to kill Tyrion, only two people could have given the order: Joffrey or Cersei. Everyone understood that. After a long and awkward silence, Ser Kevan finally decided to adjourn the trial for an hour. Just like yesterday, the court was cleared and the judges left. And like yesterday, Sansa didn’t leave. She was eager to talk with Tyrion, but she waited for the Hall to be empty. She noticed Cersei was shooting angry glares in the direction of the Tyrells. Sansa was surprised the Queen Regent didn’t give her more attention. In the meantime, she turned to Mira.

“Go find him. Bring him in an hour.”

“Yes, my lady.” Mira left to carry out her duty. She knew what to do. Brienne and Mira were the only ones to know about this.

Everyone was gone, including Bronn and Daisy. The sellsword had escorted her out the Red Keep as soon as her testimony had been over and he was now escorting Mira to make sure nothing bad would happen to her. No one could know with Cersei and Sansa had Brienne to protect her right now, so she didn’t need Bronn’s presence. Sansa realized she was panting. It was the stress of the trial that had her in this state, she knew it. She rose from her seat and went to Tyrion, but before she could say a single word, they were interrupted.

“I must congratulate you, my lady. My lord.” Lord Varys came from behind Sansa’s back.

“Lord Varys.” Tyrion and Sansa said the words together. They looked at each other in surprise, and allowed a little laugh to escape from their mouths.

“As I once said, we’re perfect for each other.” Even in difficult times like these, Tyrion would always find a way to make a joke. Sansa wished she could do the same.

Lord Varys stepped in. “My apologies to interrupt you, but I think I can help.”
Lord Varys’s proposition took Sansa by surprise. It was the last thing she expected.

Chapter End Notes

This is the longest chapter of this story up to now. I hope it meets expectations.

Please review

Next chapter: Kevan (the trial continues)
Kevan II

Chapter Notes

The trial resumes after a pause. Sansa uses her secret card now.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

KEVAN II

Kevan sat heavily in his chair, the plates before him quite untouched. He didn’t have much appetite. Podrick’s words were looping in his head. There are only two people in King’s Landing who can give an order to a kingsguard. Kevan knew very well what it meant. If Podrick Payne said the truth and if Ser Mandon Moore didn’t act of his own initiative, then Joffrey or Cersei gave him the order to kill Tyrion. Kevan didn’t think Podrick lied. If he lied, he wouldn’t tell that he killed a kingsguard, something that put him in trouble right now. He remembered the kind and loyal boy he met in the Riverlands. The knight he was squiring for had stolen a ham from Tywin’s store. That was a stupid thing to do, but Tywin hanged the knight for this. He couldn’t tolerate such things. Podrick had the misfortune to have shared the ham with him. Kevan knew the boy had done nothing wrong and that the knight was the only responsible for all this. Luckily, he was a Payne and when Kevan found out about it and told Tywin, his brother decided to spare him. Kevan had known Ser Cedric Payne, who Podrick had squired for. It was obvious the boy was innocent, so Kevan counselled Tywin to send him to King’s Landing to squire for Tyrion. It was meant as a punishment, but in fact Kevan thought it might give a chance to a boy who never had one in his life up to now. Squiring for the acting Hand of the King wasn’t a bad thing after all.

Of course, if Podrick didn’t lie, then Ser Mandon Moore did try to kill Tyrion during the Battle of Blackwater. Kevan hoped Podrick was wrong and that Ser Mandon tried to kill him for some personal reason, but he knew it was unlikely. If Joffrey ordered Tyrion to be killed, then he had to be watched more closely than ever. And if Cersei was behind this… Perhaps Jaime was right and she had gone mad. Kevan had high doubts now about the accusations against Tyrion.

He wondered if everything could be a plot, lies orchestrated by Sansa Stark. No, that was impossible. Her witnesses were destroying testimonies that took place yesterday. She couldn’t have built something like that with nothing in a single night. Some of the things Tyrion’s witnesses told this afternoon were true, for sure. He knew Joffrey had the Lady Sansa beaten at the beginning of his reign, and between Tyrion’s outburst yesterday and the testimonies of his niece-in-law, the sellsword and Ser Balon Swann, Kevan thought the version of the defense was much closer to the truth than the one Ser Meryn and Ser Boros gave. Anyway, the two kingsguards gave no proof. Tywin didn’t seem to have been poisoned. Kevan already found Pycelle’s testimony yesterday unconvincing, but now he didn’t believe it at all. As for the whore, Kevan should have known since the beginning she was lying. Even Margaery Tyrell testified against her. They had no real proof against Tyrion. Kevan hadn’t taken his decision about the verdict, but if he had to make it now, he would clear Tyrion of all the charges against him.

He remembered how the whore described her bad treatments in Tyrion’s hands. Kevan had been quite surprised and horrified when he heard her words. It seemed so much unlike Tyrion, unless he changed a lot since the last time Kevan saw him, but he saw no reason to believe it. He couldn’t imagine Tyrion mistreating a woman, even a whore. It was Tywin’s style to do it. He remembered how Tywin dealt with their father’s mistress after he died, forcing her to walk naked in the streets of Lannisport for two weeks, confessing to everyone she was a whore. However, the worst hadn’t been that. This woman had been deprived of all her power and influence, she had been shamed, but not mistreated. Another girl didn’t have the same chance.

That had been one of the rare times Kevan had really wanted to argue with his brother. When Tywin discovered Tyrion had married a commoner, he entered a great rage. He didn’t shout or curse or yell, but Kevan’s brother always had a way to show very calmly how dissatisfied and angry he was, and this time had been one of the worst. Kevan had understood Tywin forced Jaime to tell a lie to Tyrion. There was a great chance the girl was mostly interested in becoming a Lannister. She was lowborn. The memory of their father’s mistress was still bright in their minds after all these years, and Kevan could understand Tywin didn’t want to take a chance with this. Tywin was ruthless, but no more than he needed to be. Without him, House Lannister could have fallen. However, even if the girl was only interested in Lannister gold, he didn’t approve how she was raped by dozens of men, and even less how Tywin forced Tyrion to take her one last time. Was it really so necessary? Kevan had tried to reason back then that they needed Tyrion to never try to look for the girl again, and the girl to never try to look for Tyrion again, but he didn’t manage to convince himself Tywin did the right thing. Especially after he talked to the girl.

Tywin sent her away from Casterly Rock after the treatment he submitted her to. However, before she left, Tywin kept her in a cell for a short time, no more than two hours. While Tywin had a good discussion with Tyrion (probably he made sure Tyrion understood the lesson he just received), Kevan had gone to see the girl. She went to a corner of the cell as soon as Kevan entered. It took a lot before she looked back at him and Kevan got her to speak. She was very young. Kevan didn’t give her more than fourteen name days. She had blue eyes and dark hair. She was flimsy and frail, and afraid too. No wonder after so many men raped her. She didn’t talk a lot, but after a few words Kevan realized how wrong Tywin had been. His brother assumed the girl was only interested in Tyrion because she wanted to be rich, but Kevan quickly understood it wasn’t true. In fact, the girl didn’t seem to know where she was. There was a bag on her head while she was brought to Casterly Rock, and she didn’t even know that Tyrion was a Lannister. That was possible after all, many people of the smallfolk had no idea how their lords looked like since they remained in their castles most of the time. She was an orphan whose father died a year ago, and she loved Tyrion for real. When it dawned on Kevan’s mind, he realized what a huge mistake his brother had done. The girl was only a frightened child who happened to fall in love with the wrong man. Kevan had to admit he had been surprised that the girl fell in love with Tyrion, but after all Tyrion wasn’t an evil young man. He hadn’t started to visit brothels and to drink at this moment. He was even the most intelligent of Tywin’s children as Creylen often said. Tyrion could easily have become a septon or a maester, though Kevan appreciated he didn’t since Jaime was already a kingsguard. Tywin needed an heir. What would have happened if his two sons had gone celibate? All the same, the girl really loved Tyrion. She hadn’t married him for his wealth, his name or his title. Tywin had her raped uselessly. She didn’t deserve this. She had nothing to see with their father’s mistress. She was no different than Kevan’s wife, a gentle soul who loved needlework and flowers. The only difference was that this girl was lowborn. Kevan made sure a man loyal to him accompanied her to the docks of Lannisport after Tywin sent her away. He had her on a ship to Pentos. She wasn’t safe any longer in the Westerlands. It was better for her to start a new life far away, across the Narrow Sea. Kevan hoped she was still alive and alright.

This evening, Kevan had gone to Tywin to discuss about this. He still remembered the discussion they had.

“Tywin, we need to talk. About the girl.”
They were in his brother’s solar. Tywin didn’t leave his eyes from a letter he was writing. Kevan knew very well what it meant. His brother acted as if he didn’t care about what he said. “The matter is over. This marriage never took place, the girl is away, and Tyrion will never try to find her again. And with some hope, he will remember it the next time he wants to marry a whore.”

“She was no whore, Tywin, you know it very well. Jaime lied about this. You forced him to tell this story so Tyrion would believe the girl was a prostitute.”

“The only thing that interested her was our gold, and she received some of it. That makes her a whore. I’m not going to allow my children to wed this kind of women.”

“Tywin, I spoke with the girl before she left. She didn’t even know Tyrion was a Lannister. She barely realized he was highborn. She loved him for real. There was no use to have her raped like you did. I understand it may be dangerous to let Tyrion marry a lowborn woman, but Jaime’s lie would have been more than enough.”

“Anyway, this is over. It is done.” Tywin had firmly stamped the letter and started another. “This girl’s happiness is none of our concern, nor should it be Tyrion’s. He needed a lesson. He will marry a suitable wife when the time comes.”

“When? And how? You’ve tried to marry him several times up to now. Lysa Arryn, Elia Martell, a Hightower, a Royce, you failed each time. How do you think you will succeed in the future? If you want so much Tyrion to be married, then you should have let him with this girl. At least, their marriage would have been happy and they would have had children in time.”

Tywin had stopped to write to fix him with his cold stare. “Don’t ever mention that possibility again, Kevan. I will never let a commoner join House Lannister. Now go. I will not speak of it any further.”

Kevan knew there was nothing he could do. Tywin would never change his mind, but he had to tell him the truth all the same. “Tywin, I advised you for many years, so I have to warn you. A day will come when you’ll have to face the consequences of what you did today. And I know one thing. Joanna would never have approved what you did to this girl.”

Tywin hadn’t talked to him for two weeks afterwards. As for the consequences, they quickly appeared. Tyrion started to drink, to gamble, and to whore, and it only got worse with time. Kevan wondered how Tyrion would have turned without this accident. He was his nephew, and Kevan cared about him. He probably cared more about Tyrion than Tywin ever did. His brother always saw his second son as an embarrassment for House Lannister. Personally, Kevan never saw Tyrion as an embarrassment. And since he had more details about how Tyrion ruled the city while he was acting Hand, Kevan found he had proved to be quite worthy of his name. Kevan didn’t believe he killed Tywin or tried to kill Joffrey, but he had to listen to everyone until the end of the trial before he finally decided.

Kevan forced himself to eat something. He needed to be alert for the rest of the trial. After a few minutes, someone entered the room. It was Tyrion’s new wife, Sansa Stark. Sansa Lannister now, in fact.

“Ser Kevan.” The girl made a little bow.

“Lady Sansa. If you want to speak in Tyrion’s favor, I must warn you we can’t discuss about it. I am judge and I will take my decision once I heard all the witnesses.”

“I’m not here for this reason, ser.” Again, she didn’t show any sign of surprise, frustration or anger after Kevan talked. “I only want to add a witness.”
Kevan took the list of Tyrion’s witnesses the young lady gave him today from a pocket of his doublet. After Podrick Payne, there was only one witness left. “Only your mysterious witness is left.” Kevan wondered why she refused to tell him the name of this witness she wasn’t sure about.

“He will come to testify, but I have someone else to present before him.”

“Who?”

“Lord Varys.”

The name surprised Kevan. “Lord Varys already testified for the Crown.”

“And now he wants to testify for my husband.”

Kevan looked very carefully at Lady Sansa. He really couldn’t see any feeling on her face. There had been feelings in her voice when she testified, but now she was again undecipherable as a stone. Now she looked more like the Lady Forrester who testified at the beginning of the afternoon. “Very well. There is nothing that prohibits someone to testify for both sides, though it is quite unusual. I will let Lord Varys testify for your husband.”

“Thank you, ser.” She smiled a little this time and left.

Sometime later, the bells tolled and Kevan went back to the Iron Throne. When he looked at the Great Hall from his place, he noticed Tyrion was talking with his wife. He thought he saw them laugh. They were smiling for sure. The girl didn’t seem to hate him at all. Kevan was quite surprised that a Stark helped a Lannister she was forced to marry. That was unsettling. However, what was even more unsettling was the way they reminded him of two other people. Two people now dead. Sansa Stark reminded him of someone. Someone he wished she had lived longer. When everyone had taken his place, Kevan called for the next witness. Not to his surprise, Varys came in the box to talk a second time. The other people however were quite taken aback by his presence and plainly showed it. He wondered what the Spider would say this time.

Kevan understood very soon what was going on. Varys was confirming everything Tyrion’s witnesses said up to now. He confirmed the way in which Lady Sansa was beaten by Ser Meryn (something he forgot to mention yesterday). He confirmed Pycelle declared Lord Tywin was dead of a heart failure when he examined the body for the first time. He confirmed many things. Tyrion was the one to choose to not bed his wife. He never mistreated the whore Shae in any way, far from it. Shae really was angry at him for not leaving with her to Pentos and for marrying Sansa Stark. The discussions Varys related between Tyrion and Shae caused many laughs for the whore. Ser Boros and Ser Meryn repeatedly hit Sansa Stark after her father’s death. The whole story about Pycelle’s arrest was true. The details Podrick gave about the dinner were true as well and Ser Mandon really tried to kill Lord Tyrion. He also brought some declarations Cersei did ever since Tyrion had come to King’s Landing to act as Hand of the King.

“When Lord Tyrion arranged a marriage between the Princess Myrcella and Trystane Martell, the queen didn’t react quite well. Here are the words she said. Myrcella is my only daughter. Do you really think I’ll let you sell her like a common whore? I will not let you ship her off to Dorne as I was shipped off to Robert Baratheon. You won’t get away with this. You think the piece of paper Father gave you keeps you safe? Ned Stark had a piece of paper, too. Lord Tyrion tried to explain to the queen that the princess would be much safer in Dorne if King’s Landing fell, but the queen only yelled, broke a jug of wine on the floor and pushed her brother. When the princess left the capital, the queen said these words to Lord Tyrion. One day I pray you love someone. I pray you love her so much, when you close your eyes, you see her face. I want that for you. I want you to know what it’s like to love someone, to truly love someone, before I take her from you.”
There were some loudly reactions among the crowd, just like when they heard some words Tyrion said yesterday. However, Varys didn’t stop. “Right before the Battle of Blackwater, the queen confronted Lord Tyrion about his idea to have King Joffrey fight. She told him this. A Lannister always pays her debts. You stole my only daughter, you plot to have Joffrey killed. Pretty thing, your whore. Lovely body. The bruises will heal in time. This one you like. You like her very much. Could it be love? Don’t worry, she’ll be treated gently enough, unless Joffrey is hurt. And then every wound he suffers she’ll suffer, too. And if he dies, there isn’t a man alive who could devise a more painful death for your little cunt.”

“THESE ARE FILTHY LIES! GET THIS MAN OUT OF HERE IMMEDIATELY!”

Kevan barely managed to not jump from the throne in surprise when he heard Cersei’s outburst. He didn’t remember Lady Sansa’s outburst to be so loud, though she was farther from him than Cersei. “Your Grace, perhaps you should go back to your chambers. You should find back your composure,” Kevan said very calmly. They didn’t need the trial to turn into chaos. He stared at Cersei, waiting for her answer.

“Sorry, Uncle.” Kevan didn’t know if he should be relieved about this answer. The next time Cersei would react this way, he would have no choice but to send her out. “Only, Lord Varys’s lies unsettle me very much.”

“Is it the lies that unsettle you, sister, or the truths you want to keep hidden? I think I know some that many people would find quite interesting.” Tyrion’s words didn’t arrange things.

Kevan didn’t like this. He knew very well what kind of truths Tyrion was talking about. He gave a long look at Cersei to make her understand she should stay calm and sit. They had to put an end to this folly as quickly as possible. Cersei sat. Varys continued his recitation.

“When the queen went to her father’s room after his death, she immediately concluded that he was murdered, even if the Grand Maester and Ser Jaime assured her he died of natural causes. She said to her brother: You’re really an idiot! He was murdered! Can’t you see it? I know he was killed, and I know who did it. I will have no rest before he is dead. When Ser Jaime announced her she was no longer in charge of the trial on the king’s orders and that the trial was delayed, she said: You think a piece of paper will be enough to protect Tyrion? The trial will take place tomorrow. That’s all you won with it. You think you can act against me like this, you and our uncle? The trial will take place tomorrow, no matter what you do. When the queen realized she could finally do nothing against it, she ordered Ser Osmund Kettleblack to arrest Ser Jaime and to bring him to the black cells, which Ser Osmund refused to do.”

What really hurt was when he started to explain how Cersei manipulated all people who testified against Tyrion. The whore agreed to tell everything Cersei would like her to tell about Tyrion with promises of gold and a marriage with a knight. Varys also revealed Shae didn’t want to include Lady Sansa in her testimony, that she even refused to speak against her since Sansa did nothing wrong, but Cersei had threatened to have her hanged if she refused to do it. She told Grand Maester Pycelle to make sure he would find Tywin died of poisoning. Apparently the Grand Maester accepted with joy to testify against Tyrion and said he was sure Tyrion plundered his stores to get his hands on poison. When Cersei asked him if he had any proof of that, the Grand Maester said it didn’t matter and that the court would believe him without proof. Even worse was the way Cersei convinced the three Kettleblack brothers to testify. “The queen told each of them: Would it be enough if I promised you a night with me?”

There were murmurs of indignation and disgust in the crowd. Kevan took a short look at Cersei. She was gripping the arms of her chair so tightly that her hands were turning white. It was obvious she had a very hard time to control herself. Kevan hoped Varys was done. “Lord Varys, if you have nothing else to say, you may retire.”

“I’m sorry, my Lord Hand, but I still have a few details to give concerning Ser Mandon Moore. I’m afraid I know from where he took his orders to kill Lord Tyrion.” A huge silence followed Varys’s statement. “During the Battle of Blackwater, Ser Lancel Lannister went to Maegor’s Holdfast, wounded by an arrow and reported Stannis’s army had landed on the ground. The queen ordered the king to be brought back to his chambers as soon as she heard he was with Lord Tyrion on the battlements. Ser Lancel tried to argue against it, saying the presence of the king was good for the morale of the troops, but the queen refused to hear anything. Ser Lancel went to see his Grace and told him the queen wanted him back to Maegor’s Holdfast. So the king left the battlements, causing the troops to lose any will to fight. In the meantime, Ser Lancel went back to the queen, telling her how soldiers lost all heart seeing the king leaving. When Ser Lancel asked to escort back the king to the battle, the queen told him: Why do I care what you want? Then she punched him right at the place where he was hit by an arrow.” Kevan looked at Cersei, horrified by what he just learned. Lancel never told him. In fact, his son didn’t speak a lot ever since the battle. He was always praying and saying he had sinned. “The absence of the king, ordered by the queen, forced Lord Tyrion to lead a sortie against Stannis’s men and led to Ser Mandon’s attempt against his life. However, the most important proof I have comes from a short conversation the queen had with Ser Mandon Moore two nights before the battle. This is what she told him. Make sure my wretched brother doesn’t come back alive from the battle.”

This time the reactions were unanimously against Cersei. Accusations and insults came from everywhere in the Hall. Kevan had a very hard time to bring back order. It probably took five minutes. In the meantime, he saw Cersei was fuming. She was about to explode, it was obvious. Varys had left. It seemed he had said everything he wanted to say. Only the latter would have been enough. The crowd was angry, and to be honest, Kevan was too. He would need a very good discussion with his niece once everything would be over. She had hurt his son and nearly caused the loss of King’s Landing with her foolish decisions during the Battle of Blackwater. Even worse, if what Varys said was true, she really tried to have Tyrion killed. Finally, calm came back. Kevan wanted to take his head in his hands, but he refrained himself. It wasn’t the time. He would sigh, react and rest in the evening when everything would be over. For now, there was still one last witness. After Varys, who could be worse?

“Lady Sansa.” Kevan made a great effort to not look tired. “You may call your last witness if he is here.”

“He is, ser,” the Lady Sansa answered.

Kevan heard footsteps on his left and looked at the origin of the sound. Nothing could have prepared him for this. Two people were walking toward the witness’s box. One of them was the northern handmaiden who testified earlier. Since she already testified, it had to be the person she was holding by the arm who would speak. And it was the presence of this young man that surprised Kevan the most. He had lost many pounds since the battle, his skin was so pale it was white as milk and his hair, so long before, had been cut. He hadn’t fully recovered from the wounds he had taken, but Kevan knew it was more his soul and his mind that were injured than his body. He had travelled with Kevan from Casterly Rock, and it didn’t help nor harm his recovery. When he arrived with the young lady at the box, she let him go.

“Good luck,” she told him.

“Thank you, Lady Mira,” the young man replied before he climbed the steps in the box and stood weakly before the judges, his eyes cast down.
“Lancel?” Kevan couldn’t stop himself.

“Father.” His son was speaking very faintly. “Lord Tyrell. Prince Oberyn.”

It took some time for Kevan to gain back his composure. What was his son doing here? Why did Lady Sansa hide to him she was planning for Lancel to testify? Kevan took a voice he made strong.

“Ser Lancel Lannister. You are Lord Tyrion’s cousin, aren’t you?”

“I am, Father.” His son still answered in the same faint voice.

“What do you have to say about the accusations against him?”

His son took some time before he answered. “I don’t know, Father. I don’t know if Lord Tyrion killed Lord Tywin. Only the Seven know for sure.” That was an evidence of Lancel’s new faith. “However, there is one thing I have to confess. No. I have several things to confess.”

Lancel began to explain the events of the time Joffrey had Meryn Trant beat Lady Sansa. He reported all the details of what happened on this day. That wasn’t something new. With Ser Meryn, Ser Boros, Ser Balon, Ser Bronn, Lord Varys and Lady Sansa, he was the seventh witness since the beginning of the trial to talk about it. His words confirmed mostly everything that was said up to now, but he added more details. For example, he highlighted all the threats Joffrey made to the young lady and, even more, he criticized not only Ser Meryn’s actions, but also Joffrey’s. However, Lancel was mostly criticizing himself.

“I lied before dozens of people. I said Robb Stark used sorcery to slaughter Stafford Lannister’s men with an army of wolves. I even said the Northerners ate the dead after the battle was over. These were only lies the king ordered me to say to legitimate his actions.”

People grumbled in the crowd. Up to now, no witness talked against Joffrey, at least not directly. But now Kevan’s son was saying the king ordered him to lie in order to justify the bad treatments he inflicted upon his betrothed. What was Lancel doing? What he just said was very dangerous. Some people would call it treason, even if it was true. Lancel even said he hadn’t been worthy of his knighthood. He allowed an innocent girl to be beaten only for the pleasure and the satisfaction of his king. He should have gone in the way, just like Tyrion did. He said his cousin acted more like a knight than everyone else on this day.

Lancel also told the whole story about the events during the Battle of Blackwater. Everything Varys said was confirmed. Lancel even said Tyrion made a great speech to convince the men to fight for their city and not for their king. That’s what gave the men the will to fight again. Tyrion saved the city. Lancel blamed himself again for obeying the queen’s orders. He shouldn’t have said anything to the king. He was in part responsible for the near defeat King’s Landing suffered. However, the central part of his testimony came when he spoke about Ser Mandon Moore.

“How do you know that? You said the queen spoke with Ser Mandon in her chambers a night. She told him to protect the king at all cost and to make sure Lord Tyrion would die during the battle.”

Kevan couldn’t believe what he just heard. Two people said Cersei ordered Tyrion’s death during Blackwater. Kevan again had to silence the assistance. During this time, Cersei obviously managed with great effort to stay calm, but it was quite evident for anyone who knew the queen even a little that she was boiling inside. When peace came back, Oberyn asked a question before Kevan could even sit back into the throne.

“How do you know that? You said the queen talked to Ser Mandon in her chambers during the night? What were you doing in her chambers at this hour?”
The question froze Kevan for a moment. Oberyn Martell made a point. What was Lancel doing there? How could he know about the discussion between Mandon Moore and Cersei? Kevan fixed his son, waiting for an answer. It took a lot of time for Lancel to answer, so much time that Cersei intervened.

“He doesn’t know what he’s talking about, it’s obvious. We should bring him back to his rooms. He is sick.”

Kevan said nothing. No one said anything. Finally, Lancel spoke. “I was spending my nights with the queen.”

There was no sound in the Hall. Kevan finally got out of his trance. “What did you say?”

“I was spending my nights with the queen. I shared her bed from the moment King Robert died until the Battle of Blackwater.”

Again, a complete silence lingered in the court. Cersei broke it, sneering. “This is ridiculous. The poor boy doesn’t know what he’s saying. Ser Meryn, escort my cousin back to his rooms. He needs a good rest.”

The words forced Kevan to react. “Ser Meryn! Stay at your place.” The kingsguard stopped his movement. Kevan stared at Cersei, searching for an explanation. His son shared her bed? Cersei talked in the end and her answer didn’t satisfy Kevan.

“These are lies.”

“Guards! Bring the queen back to her chambers.” Kevan talked in a very firm voice. His men from the Westerlands came at Cersei’s side. After a look at them and another at Kevan, she rose from her chair and left the Hall. Kevan followed her until she was gone, then he looked at his son. “Lancel, can you repeat what you just said?”

Kevan hoped he heard incorrectly the first time or that his son would say he didn’t tell the truth, but deep inside he knew it was the truth. Lancel always said ever since the battle that he had sinned. Now Kevan understood what he was talking about. Lancel’s answer was worse than he could imagine.

“I slept with the queen for months after King Robert died. I was the one to kill him. The queen came to me not long after an accident. She had been hit by the king and there was a big bruise on her cheek. She told me it wasn’t the first time the king hit her. I swore that I was ready to do everything to protect her, so she ordered me to get the king drunk during his hunt. I gave him strongwine to slow his reflexes. I am responsible of his death. After he died, the queen arranged for me to be knighted and I became her lover, spending my nights with her until I was wounded at the Battle of Blackwater. I regret what I have done, Father. I regret all my sins. Really, I do.”

The huge silence followed for some time after his son was done, then a shout came from someone in the crowd. Kingslayer! Then other insults followed. Cousinfucker! Man without honor! Vermin! Traitor!

Kevan ordered quickly his men to escort Lancel out under the shouts. He couldn’t believe what he just heard. His son. His own son. Kevan shot a glance at Tyrion, trying to ask him silently if it was true. Tyrion confirmed with a positive nod. There was nothing else to say for today. Kevan stood up.

“The trial is adjourned. We will listen to the concluding testimonies tomorrow. Clear the court.”

He wasn’t sure if anyone heard him and to be honest he didn’t want to care about it. But since the gold cloaks were removing Tyrion’s shackles as Kevan left, he guessed at least some people heard him. He heard people shouting and yelling for a very long time as he went away from the Great Hall. He entered his rooms and ordered his men to bring him his son. When Lancel arrived, he never dared to look in his father’s eyes. He repeated everything he said before the court. Kevan still couldn’t believe what he just learned, no matter how many times he was told. Lancel told him he wasn’t worthy to be his son any longer. He only wanted to serve the Faith as a penance for all his sins. Kevan finally ordered his men to bring back Lancel to his chambers and to stand guard before his doors to prevent anyone from hurting him. When Lancel asked if he could visit the sept to pray, Kevan allowed it but ordered his men to be always four in the company of his son.

After Lancel left, Kevan was alone. He still didn’t inhabit the Hand’s quarters. His rooms were comfortable, but not spacious as the ones in the Tower of the Hand. What was he about to do now? Lancel confessed before more than a hundred people that he plotted to kill the king. He also confessed that he shared the queen’s bed. Kevan would never be able to hide all this. What would Tywin do in such circumstances? He would do everything necessary for family, even if that meant sacrificing a family member to ensure House Lannister would survive. But Lancel was Kevan’s son. He couldn’t sentence him to die. Kevan already lost two sons in the war. How would Dorna react when she would learn what their eldest son did? How would she react if Kevan ordered Lancel to be executed? No, he couldn’t do it. He couldn’t kill his son. Perhaps he could send him to the Wall, or even have him join some religious order. Lancel would probably be happier with the second solution.

All this brought a pang in Kevan’s heart. Tywin had made plans so that Lancel may become the new Lord of Darry after the Battle of Blackwater. The Lord of Darry, Lyman Darry, had died during the war and had no heir. Tywin even arranged a marriage between Lancel and Amerei Frey. Kevan remembered Dorna’s happiness when he told her about this. She wanted grandchildren so much. But now, everything was over. Lancel would never take possession of Darry and would never marry his betrothed after this. He didn’t want anyway. Dorna’s heart would be broken. She and Kevan already lost two sons. They just lost their third. But Kevan had no choice. All he could do was to exile Lancel to prevent his death, whether he exiled him to the Wall or to some remote place where he would live as a monk for the rest of his life.

Kevan decided to leave his rooms. He would speak about all this to Lancel and arrange everything once the trial would be over tomorrow. He walked in the direction of Cersei’s chambers. It didn’t matter now that the trial wasn’t over. He had to speak to the woman who destroyed his son. He had to speak to the woman who shamed House Lannister today. He had to do what Tywin should have done a long time ago. If only he had known the truth.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Cersei (concluding testimonies and end of the trial)
Cersei III

Chapter Notes

Another chapter from the mother of madness POV.

And, finally some will say, this is the end of the trial.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

CERSEI III

Cersei had come back to her chambers with all the dignity a queen should have. She wasn’t about to show her true feelings while her stupid cousin made his “confessions”. What confessions these were. How could her uncle believe something like that? His stupid son had even less brain than Jaime. She should have made sure he would never speak about it. Her stupid cousin had ruined everything, and her brother’s whore as well. So many people testified against her. She should have come with better lies. She should have sounded more convincing. As for Pycelle, this creeping old man… She should have made sure he would tell something that would make sense. No, instead he allowed a viper to question the results of his examination.

Cersei would kill them all, from the whore to Margaery. The little doe-eye whore was the one behind all of this, she was sure. She manipulated Joffrey so he wouldn’t be present during the trial. Joffrey would have made sure justice would be given. She made a pact with Tyron and all his men against Cersei. Jaime was so foolish that he didn’t realize this, and her uncle was no better. She had to speak to him. The Tyrells plotted to kill her father, and right now they were managing to get Tyrion free. They were enemies. They were stealing her son, taking him away from her. How could Kevan not see this? How could her father have not seen this?

Margaery had arranged all of this, she knew it. She was manipulating Sansa, the little dove. The Stark girl was too stupid and simple to organize the defense of Cersei’s valonqar. The Tyrell whore had Tyrion’s men testify. She convinced a kingsguard to testify for him, turning him against Cersei, probably by seducing him. One of her handmaids spoke as well. She brought a whore she probably met in a brothel. Cersei wouldn’t be surprised that Margaery was frequenting this type of place. Even the ugly woman who assassinated Renly Baratheon, Margaery’s first husband, came to testify. Margaery organized all this. Cersei would break her lovely little neck with her own hands.

Her door opened. Kevan came inside, wearing the brooch of the Hand of the King on his doublet. Cersei jumped from her chair.

“Uncle! You must listen to me. Don’t believe…”

“I think I listened long enough to what you and your witnesses had to say yesterday. Anyway, you can’t talk to me about the trial. It’s your turn to listen to me.” Cersei stood in confusion before Kevan’s words. “Lancel is my son, Cersei. Your own cousin. You should have looked after him, guided him, found him a likely girl of good family. Instead you… you fucked him! You brought him into your bed! How could you do this?”
Cersei saw that her uncle was angry. He had to understand. “I know. I know. I was alone, weak. Please, Uncle, you must understand.” If only he knew the truth about his son. Lancel wanted her more than she ever wanted him. He probably still wanted her. But for Cersei, he was only someone to replace Jaime while he was away.

“Understand? You want me to understand why you disgraced yourself and my son? You want me to understand why you killed your husband, your king? Why did you engage Lancel into this?”

“I had to do it. Robert was listening to Ned Stark. He wanted to overthrow us. I had to do this for family.”

Her uncle didn’t react to her words immediately, but Cersei couldn’t have predicted what he said afterwards, soberly. “Yes, I’m sure Robert was listening to Ned Stark. I guess he read a book where it was written that all the Baratheon children had blue eyes and black hair. All except yours. I guess Ned Stark realized that Jaime was more than a brother to you.” Cersei was agape before her uncle’s words. How could he know? “I’m not an idiot. I saw you and Jaime grow, and I wasn’t away all the time like Tywin.”

“Did Father know?” It was useless to hide the truth now.

“No. When we received Stannis’s letter at Harrenhal, he ordered it to be burnt immediately and to never speak about it again. That’s a luck your father never wanted to consider this eventuality. It would have destroyed him. You and Jaime were his first children, the ones he was the most proud of. I don’t want to imagine what would have happened to him if he had discovered the truth about you. That’s why I never told him.” Cersei looked away. “Can you tell me why? You were married with the king. This is what you always wanted. Why couldn’t you have children with him? Was it so difficult?”

Cersei’s anger rose. “You don’t know what I had to support in Robert’s hands. He was a drunkard, an idiot who shamed me all the time. I was in a living hell.”

“So you decided to have children with your own brother instead? Do you realize there would never have been a war if Joffrey had been Robert’s child? My sons, Willem and Martyn, wouldn’t be dead. We wouldn’t have to fight for Joffrey’s claim.”

Cersei tossed away the idea of any child she might have had with Robert. She had one, and he died. “All this is Ned Stark’s fault.”

“Ned Stark would never have questioned Joffrey’s claim if he had been Robert’s son. The excuse that he tried to seize the Iron Throne is the better excuse you could find, but we would never have needed this if you had children with Robert. You shamed House Lannister with everything you did.”

“Shamed? Tyrion is the one who shamed us all. He killed my father. He tried to kill my son. He beat him. He brought whores in the Tower of the Hand…”

“And you brought your cousin, your brother, a kingsguard and his two brothers into your own bed. You tried to have your own brother killed. You allowed Joffrey to kill Ned Stark and to publicly beat his betrothed. Your son started riots and shot on people asking for bread with a crossbow. Tyrion saved you at the Battle of Blackwater. Without him, you and your two sons would be dead. He kept the city together while he was Hand of the King and managed to get Jaime free. And he did the right thing when he sent Myrcella to Dorne. He sent her as far as it was possible from the bad influence you have on your children.”

Cersei couldn’t believe what she just heard. The bad influence she had on her children? “How can you say such a thing? I protected my children. I raised them. I made them strong. Everything I did was for them, for family.”

“Aye, and from what I saw of Joffrey, you are as unfit a mother as you are a ruler.” If Cersei had a cup of wine in her hands, she would have thrown the content at the face of her uncle. “You filled his head with the same wrong ideas you have yourself about power. You pampered him so much that he became as vicious as the Mad King himself. You are unable to control him. I will not let have any more bad influence on him or Tommen. You’re leaving.”

The last sentence left Cersei bewildered. “Leaving? What do you mean?”

Her uncle looked at her with a very serious face, but strangely he also looked sad. “I’m sending you away. You will leave King’s Landing as soon as possible to never come back.”

Cersei stood frozen for a moment as she realized what her uncle just said. “You can’t do this. I am Queen Regent. My place is here with my sons. I will not let you do that.”

“Yes, you will. With what happened today none of your men wants to help you. And don’t try to speak to Joffrey, he won’t see you. He refuses to see you since Tywin died.”

Cersei understood what was going on. “It’s Margaery, isn’t it? She’s planting her claws in Joffrey. She’s manipulating him, can’t you see that? She’s the one behind all of this. She organized all these lies that were told today. She plotted with Tyrion to have Father killed. The Tyrells are dangerous, they must be neutralized.”

Kevan looked at her with a stupefied expression. “The Tyrells now? You see Tyrion’s and Margaery’s hands everywhere now it seems. Lady Margaery is capable of controlling Joffrey, something you have been unable to do up to now. She will be able to make him a much better king than you ever managed to. And I highly doubt there is a plot between Tyrion and the Tyrells. All I saw today was a litany of witnesses who showed that everything you presented against your brother is a lie, at best a distorted truth. This trial was a complete stupidity from the beginning and you caused many problems to House Lannister through it. I will not let you cause any other problems. You’re leaving.”

“I won’t let you do that. I will not let you ship me off again to another husband.”

“You won’t be shipped to any husband. With everything the people learned about you today, the Tyrells will never want you as their future lady. You will be sent at another place that will be decided once the trial will be over. You will give your final testimony tomorrow and that will be one of the last times you’ll be seen in court.”

Kevan turned on his heels and nimbly walked to the door. Before Cersei could say anything, her uncle threw right before he left. “As for your thoughts that Margaery is behind Tyrion’s defense, you are wrong. You should be more careful with the new Lady Lannister.”

Her uncle left, leaving her alone. She would be sent away from her children. Myrcella was far away in Dorne, among snakes who hated her family, and now she would be taken away from her sons. She couldn’t allow it. Very quickly, Cersei devised another plan. Perhaps Joffrey didn’t want to see her, but nothing stopped her from leaving her rooms. She could see other people. Cersei went outside and saw two guards waiting for her. They were her uncle’s men, but they were only there to follow her, not to keep her inside her rooms. Less than two hours later, Cersei came back to her chambers, satisfied of what she did. Tyrion would be sentenced to death tomorrow. After his death, she would be able to take back the power and she would end the alliance with the Tyrells once and for all. And she would put an end to Kevan’s presence as well. No one would take her children away from her.
She would protect them with everything necessary.

Before she fell asleep, she drank, savoring her upcoming victory on her enemies. As she slipped into her bed tonight, she thought about what Kevan told her as he left. You should be more careful with the new Lady Lannister. The new Lady Lannister? There was no new Lady Lannister. Of course, Sansa was officially a Lannister, for the time being, since she married Tyrion, but the child had nothing of a lioness, and nothing of a wolf either. She was only an inoffensive little dove. She nearly cried before the court when she told everyone about the bad treatments she had to endure. The girl really was an imbecile. She almost looked to love Tyrion. Only an idiot could fall in love with such a malformed creature. Margaery probably told Sansa everything to say, perhaps she even was the one who convinced Sansa to be in love with the dwarf. It made Cersei sick to imagine a girl loving such a horrible creature. She dismissed the idea of being careful with Sansa Stark. Once Tyrion would be dead, she would organize her another marriage with another man who would do everything Cersei told him. Perhaps she should have given her to Lord Baelish as the brothelkeeper offered when Ned Stark was arrested, but he was only a minor lord at this moment. He wasn’t fit for a daughter of the Warden of the North.

As she drifted into sleep, Cersei found herself in a forest. She was walking in dark woods, early in the morning, with her friend, Melara, following her.

“We shouldn’t be out here alone,” the little girl told her.

“Why not?” Cersei asked. Nothing stopped them from being here.

“If your father…”

“He’ll never know we’re gone.” Cersei cut her friend.

“But if he finds out…”

Cersei turned around to face her friend. Melara Hetherspoon was the daughter of one of her father’s bannermen. She had been Cersei’s best friend during her childhood. She was quite pretty and slender, had black hair, brown eyes and freckles. Her house wasn’t important or powerful, but she had been Cersei’s friend all the same, sent to Casterly Rock to spend time with her. Cersei tried to reassure her. “You don’t need to be afraid of my father.”

Cersei let a malicious smile cross her face. Melara understood what she meant and looked at the ground. Cersei kept her left hand in Melara’s right one and drove her through the trail. The path was grim and threatening. Cersei understood why people feared to come here, but she didn’t fear anything. She was the daughter of Tywin Lannister, a lioness of Casterly Rock, and the future queen. Cersei and Melara had heard serving girls talk about the crone who lived in these woods. They said she could curse a man or make him fall in love, summon demons and foretell the future. That was for the latter that Cersei came. She wanted to know her future. She wouldn’t be afraid.

They arrived at the maegi’s tent. It was dark, with a tall peaked roof. It was made of wood, mostly branches. A fire was burning inside and they could see the light from the outside.

“Are you sure?” Melara asked.

“Yes,” Cersei stated firmly.

“We shouldn’t go in.”

“Of course we should,” Cersei countered.
She walked forward, pulling her friend by the hand. They entered the tent, Melara still hesitant on Cersei’s heels. Cersei looked around her. The place was a mess. Many boxes and cages with animals were hung to something she wasn’t sure if she could call it a wall or a ceiling. There was a nasty smell in the air and insects were buzzing all around. Cersei looked carefully all around until she finally found what she was looking for. A woman was sitting in what looked like a chair, her head laid on her right shoulder, obviously asleep, wearing ragged clothes. Cersei approached, confident. Behind her, Melara bumped into a cage containing something that looked like a rat. The noises she and the repulsive animal did woke up the woman.

“Get out. Get out!” The supposed sorceress shouted at them as soon as she was awaken.

Melara came from behind and grabbed Cersei’s arm. “Let’s go.”

“No.” Cersei refused to leave. She wouldn’t be afraid of some witch.

“Listen to your friend,” the woman told her. She was hideous, her hair unwashed and messy, but she had nothing to see with the scary descriptions other people gave of her. Cersei wasn’t impressed.

“They said that you were terrifying with cat’s teeth and three eyes. You’re not terrifying. You’re boring.”

“You don’t know what I am.” The maegi spoke with a smooth voice. She tried to make it frightening. That wouldn’t work, not on Cersei. Not on a lioness, as young as she could be.

“I know you’re a witch and you can see the future. Tell me mine.”

“Everyone wants to know their future until they know their future.”

Cersei wasn’t going to be dismissed so easily. She was a lord’s daughter, a lady. “This is my father’s land. My land. Tell me my future or I’ll have your two boring eyes gouged out of your head.”

The boring woman started to smile as Cersei threatened her, and then chuckled when she was done speaking. Cersei didn’t like to be mocked like this. The Lannisters weren’t mocked this way. The sorceress seized a knife on the table at her right. “Your blood. Give me a taste.”

The woman handed the knife to Cersei, the grip in Cersei’s direction. Was it some kind of trick? A taste of her blood? Cersei had doubts for a moment. However, the blade was pointed in the crone’s direction, so it wasn’t an attempt of assassination. Cersei needed to know her future. The king and his son, Prince Rhaegar, had come to Lannisport for a tourney her father organized in their honor. Cersei was ten and the prince was seventeen, new to knighthood. Two of Cersei’s uncles fell before his lance. At nights, the Last of the Dragons played of his silver harp. His songs were all beautiful and sad. He had been wounded. Cersei would mend his wounds. She needed to know her future.

Cersei slowly took the dagger and did a little cut on the thumb of her left hand. She let a little whimper escape from her mouth as she cut it. The maegi then grabbed Cersei by the wrist and sucked Cersei’s thumb. To feel her saliva on one of her fingers was disgusting. She let go Cersei.

“Three questions you get. You won’t like the answers.” Cersei didn’t like the way the woman was speaking. A little voice inside her head told her to go away. But she didn’t. Instead she asked her first question.

“I’ve been promised to the prince. When will we marry?”

“You will never wed the prince. You will wed the king.” The answer surprised Cersei, but it pleased her as well. She would marry Rhaegar Targaryen when he would already be king. She wouldn’t have to wait for long. But she had to be sure she would be queen.

“But I will be queen?”

“Oh, yes.” Cersei liked it. All her hopes and dreams would come true. “You’ll be queen. For a time. Then comes another, younger, more beautiful, to cast you down and take all you hold dear.”

The crone’s answer didn’t make any sense. Surely she was lying. “Will the king and I have children?” Uncertainty began to gain her mind.

“No. The king will have twenty children and you will have three.”

“That doesn’t make sense.” This old woman was raving. How could Rhaegar and Cersei have children and not have children together at the same time?

“Gold will be their crowns.” Cersei found back her dreams. All her children would be kings and queens. “Gold their shrouds.”

Cersei couldn’t move after the last three words. Her children would die. Her thumb was throbbing where she cut it and her blood was falling on the floor. The crone burst into laughter. It was a maleficent laugh, a terrible one who would make everyone shake, and it made Cersei shake.

“Come on, we have to go.” Melara was pleading for Cersei to leave, but Cersei didn’t move. She had no future. Another queen would overthrow her and any child she would have would die. She barely heard her friend. “We have to go! Cersei!” Cersei wouldn’t allow that to happen. She would make sure it wouldn’t happen.

“You’re lying!” Cersei left on these words, but the words of the meagi followed her outside the tent. The sorceress had one last thing to tell her.

“And when your tears have drowned you, the valonqar shall wrap his hands about your pale white throat and choke the life from you.”

As they ran away from the tent and the sniggering, the dream changed. Cersei was now kneeling on the floor, holding the corpse without life of Tommen. His green eyes were wide open and fixing the ceiling, but they saw nothing. Next to him were lying two other bodies. When she looked at them, she recognized Myrcella and Joffrey, both with blood on their face. Darkness came upon her. She raised her head and saw him, standing before her, a dagger covered of blood in his hand. Her valonqar. Her little brother. Tyrion. His shadow was covering Cersei. It was a very large shadow for a very small man, and it plunged Cersei into darkness. She saw two other figures behind him that she couldn’t recognize. They were in the shadows. She felt hands around her throat. And life choked from her.

Cersei awoke, panting and sweating. She couldn’t remember Melara’s face, even if she just saw her in her dreams. Her friends had drowned in a well not long after the visit to the crone. The valonqar shall wrap his hands about your pale white throat and choke the life from you. Cersei had asked her septa later what the word meant. “Little brother,” she answered. Tyrion would kill her someday, and before that he would kill all her children. Cersei wouldn’t allow that to happen. She would burn King’s Landing and all the Seven Kingdoms to the ground before she let her little brother take everything she held dear from her. You’ll be queen. For a time. Then comes another, younger, more beautiful, to cast you down and take all you hold dear. Margaery wouldn’t take her son away from her. The little doe-eye whore would die. Cersei would make sure Maggy’s prophecy wouldn’t come true. Anyway, Margaery wasn’t more beautiful than Cersei. The prophecy made no sense, and Cersei would prove it. No queen would cast her down. She was Cersei Lannister, the Queen Regent, a lady of the Westerlands, a lady of Casterly Rock, a lioness, the daughter of Tywin Lannister. In centuries, they would only talk of Tywin Lannister as the father of Cersei Lannister, the Great Queen. Her time had come the day her father died, and today would be the beginning of her true reign. Anyone who would dare to question her authority after this day would die, and would only appear in history books among the long list of Cersei’s enemies she defeated.

Cersei spent the morning preparing her concluding testimony. She would show everyone she was the Queen Regent and the true power in King’s Landing and in all Westeros. She drained a cup of Arbor gold before she went to the Great Hall. Cersei arrived from behind the dais. She was the queen. She wouldn’t walk with the common highborn who were gathering on the benches.

“Look. The whore.” She heard someone in the crowd saying these words. She did as if she didn’t hear. She didn’t have to care about the filthy lies these unimportant people were spreading. At the end of the day, no one would ever dare to speak against her again.

Cersei noticed the little dove talking with the doe-eye whore. There was also the ugly woman and the Forrester girl with them, along with the sellsword and the squire. The two men would regret to have rejected her offers. A Lannister always pays her debts. Cersei fixed Margaery’s back with her eyes. She was the enemy. She would pay for trying to turn Joffrey against her mother. However, Cersei noticed that Sansa was the one to talk the most. In fact, everyone seemed to be listening to her. What could she be saying that was so interesting for all of them? Her brother’s sellsword bowed deeply before Sansa and left to the benches. The squire did the same thing, with a more modest bow, not long after. Cersei saw from the corner of her eye that Kevan had come and sit in the Iron Throne. He could sit in the chair for now. Very soon, Cersei would be the one to sit in it. He could enjoy it for the little time he still could.

After some time, Kevan brought order to the court. The doors opened and let Tyrion enter with Jaime and two guards. Her twin didn’t look a single moment at her. Was he angry after her? Of course he was. He was stupid enough to believe Lancel, just like their uncle. That was Jaime’s problem. Cersei didn’t need him. If he chose Tyrion instead of her, then she had nothing else to do with him. Tyrion’s shackles were attached to the box where he stood. Soon, Cersei wouldn’t need cells or shackles to make sure Tyrion wasn’t a threat. Without a head, the valonqar wouldn’t be able to do anything.

Kevan cleared his throat. “Tyrion Lannister. You stand accused of the murder of your father, Tywin Lannister, the Lord of Casterly Rock and the Hand of the King. You are also accused of attempt of murder against the king. You heard all the witnesses these last days. You have the opportunity to change your pleading one last time before the concluding testimonies. Do you want to change it?”

“I cannot change the truth, Uncle.” The little monster spoke on a mocking tone. Mock and joke as you like. We’ll see if you still laugh when your head rolls off your shoulders.

“Mock and joke as you like. We’ll see if you still laugh when your head rolls off your shoulders.”

“The concluding testimonies will take place today, then the judges will give their verdict. The Crown will begin.” Kevan turned toward Cersei. His face showed nothing of his thoughts. Cersei left her chair and walked to the tribune. On her way, she heard many insults shouted lowly at her. She didn’t listen to them. She walked her head straight and high. She was a lioness, and a lioness didn’t concern herself with the opinion of the sheep. Her speech was only a formality, but she gave a good one all the same. She wouldn’t cry this time. She would show she was strong.

“My father is dead. He served as Hand of the King under Aerys the Second for twenty years. He served my husband, our beloved King Robert, loyally for sixteen years as Warden of the West. When our king died and the Northerners tried to seize the Iron Throne, he assumed the functions of Hand of the King for the second time. He saved the city. He defeated the usurpers Stannis Baratheon and Robb Stark. He brought back peace and prosperity to the Realm. And for that, he was murdered. Cowardly murdered by his own son.” Cersei turned her head toward Tyrion to show her disdain for him and emphasize her words. She shot him a poisonous look, but Tyrion reacted by looking indifferently at her. It was the same behaviour he had when they received the news of Robb Stark’s death and he threatened Joffrey. She should have ordered him arrested right at this moment. She turned to face the judges again and continued.

“Tywin Lannister, the Old Lion, the Hand of the King, the Lord of Casterly Rock and the Warden of the West, was assassinated in the most treacherous way there is by an ill-made, spiteful little creature full of envy, lust and low cunning, who wanted to take his place as Hand of the King and Lord of the Westerlands. Our father never wanted him to inherit Casterly Rock because he knew how dangerous and unworthy he was. I wish my father had done something to neutralize him before, but he didn’t because he was his son. That was his huge and final mistake. I warned him to not trust Tyrion and to send him away, and sadly he only chose to not trust him. I wish he had listened to me. He tried to kill our king. He planned regicide. He committed kinslaying. He planned to do it again and again, until there was only him left. He planned to destroy his own house, his own family, to be king of the ashes. He’d kill us all if he could. He began by his own father, the man who sired him, and he won’t stop until he is the only one left. I’m here asking for justice for my dead father since he cannot ask it by himself because of this vile dwarf. I’m here as a queen to prevent the ruin of the Realm. I’m here as a daughter who loved her father and wants to see him rest in peace. I’m here as a mother who wants her children to be kept safe from the schemes and plots of their wretched uncle. I’m here as a sister who asks for her brother to be punished accordingly to his crimes against the Realm and against his family. I’m here asking for justice. I’m here to ask you to not allow this man to pursue his sinister plans. Nothing more.”

Cersei left the box and went back to her place. She didn’t hear anything in the room. Her speech would be more than enough. Kevan started to speak as soon as she gained back her seat.

“Thank you for your testimony, your Grace. Now…”

Her uncle suddenly stopped to speak. Cersei had been staring at Tyrion, a great smile upon her face to let him know she had won. Tyrion only displayed a smug smile in her direction. She didn’t believe he would show the same expression when his head would leave his neck. However, Cersei realized that someone was walking on the dais. She turned her head to her left and saw Margaery leave her seat and step down the dais. She walked toward Tyrion and stopped at his right, facing the judges with the same lovely and stupid smile she displayed in all circumstances.

“Margaery?” Lord Mace didn’t seem to expect that. Of course, he didn’t. He never expected anything.

“Please excuse me, Father. My lords. But I support the accused.”

Margaery’s words brought some whispers in the crowd. She was standing there, next to the little monster, her insufferable smile on her face. That confirmed everything Cersei already knew. Margaery had been behind all of this from the beginning. Cersei had focused too much on Tyrion after her father’s death. She should have neutralized Margaery as well. She wouldn’t do the same mistake again. She would have the Tyrell whore strangled in her sleep.

“Very well, do as you please, Lady Margaery.” Kevan decided to let it pass. That was all too good. Once Tyrion would be declared guilty, Margaery would accompany him in his downfall. “The defense may give its final speech.”

Cersei looked at Margaery and Tyrion with all the anger she had. They wouldn’t escape her wrath. Cersei waited for Margaery to step forward in order to speak for Tyrion. That would be no surprise since she was the one who organized his defense. However, she didn’t move. When Cersei finally decided Margaery may not speak, she realized someone else was in the box. It was Sansa Stark.

Cersei was quite surprised by this. She thought Margaery would testify last, hoping she would cause Cersei’s downfall when in fact it was her own downfall she was preparing. Instead, the little dove came to speak. Cersei wondered what it would give. Would Sansa end up crying and asking for mercy for her beloved husband? Would she confess everything and ask to be spared? Would she remind again everyone how she was mistreated? As if that mattered. She was the daughter of a traitor and the wife of a monster. What she endured during a year was nothing compared to what Cersei supported for sixteen years with Robert. The little dove should be thankful that Cersei didn’t have her head removed from her little body and allowed her to remain betrothed to her handsome son. She should thank Cersei for freeing her from her lecherous dwarf husband and to marry her to a more comely man.

“I remember when I first met the queen at Winterfell. I had never left the surroundings of Winterfell before. I was only thirteen back then. When I saw her for the first time, I couldn’t believe that I had the chance to meet the queen. In my eyes, she was a perfect queen, like the ones in the stories I loved so much to read back then. I told myself, at this moment: I want to be like her, later. I admired her. She looked so much without reproach. I already told you that later, when I was in King’s Landing, she often told me how a stupid and silly little girl I was. And she was right. I was an idiot to take such a woman as a model.” The last sentence took Cersei aback. What did Sansa just say? “What witnesses, what proofs did she bring at this trial? A lying whore? Only her words about my husband trying to seize the Iron Throne for himself by killing all his family prove that her testimony is a tissue of lies. Everyone who knows Lord Tyrion well enough would know that he would never have put in motion such a ridiculous plan. The Grand Maester? He didn’t seem quite sure which poison was used, nor to know what effects had a poison, and we know that he first stated Lord Tywin died of a heart failure. We also know that he lied about my husband plundering his stores. What would you expect from an old Grand Maester who sleeps with whores? All the other evidence from the other witnesses are no proof at all, only words said in very specific circumstances. Anyway, these witnesses include two kingsguards better at beating children than to fight in battle. One of them, Ser Meryn, flew away from the battlements in the middle of the Battle of Blackwater. The third kingsguard is a former sellsword, and he and his two brothers seem to have testified only for spending time in the queen’s bed. Only Lord Varys’s testimony could be trustworthy, and he didn’t bring any proof of Lord Tywin’s murder. As far as we know, Lord Tywin died of natural causes in his bed. As for the queen, I’m wondering if we can really consider her testimony after everything we learned about her yesterday.”

Cersei couldn’t believe what she just heard, and the crowd seemed to be quite surprised as well. Sansa was talking against her, directly. She was staring directly into Cersei’s eyes, not flinching a single time. That wasn’t the little dove Cersei saw during the last two years. She defied Cersei, and the next part of her testimony was even more daring.

“I remember some conversations I had with queen. When I flowered, she told me to never love anyone but my children. I was betrothed to King Joffrey at this moment, so I asked her if I shouldn’t love Joffrey. She answered me: You can try. She told me to not love the king.” Cries of surprise followed. How could she remember such details? “Later, during the Battle of Blackwater, the queen spent her time drinking wine. She quickly got drunk. At one moment, she told me that if the city fell, she might have enough time to yield to Stannis in person. She told me she might have hoped for a private audience if it hadn’t been Stannis Baratheon, but that since it was him, she would have a better chance to seduce his horse. I remember the exact words she used. Tears aren’t a woman’s only weapon. The best one’s between our legs.” New cries of surprise and indignation. How could she remember and say such things Cersei told her privately? She was a stupid child. “She also told me about her husband: I was sold to some stranger like a horse to be ridden whenever he desired.”
“STOP THAT!” Cersei jumped from her seat as she shouted at the girl. “HOW DARE YOU TO SAY SUCH THINGS?”

Sansa couldn’t say these things Cersei told her. She was an innocent little dove. However, it wasn’t the submitted eyes she was familiar with that looked back at her now. Sansa didn’t show any surprise or reaction to Cersei’s outburst. She didn’t flinch and looked back at Cersei with indifference and determination. She never looked at Cersei this way. She replied defiantly.

“Why? Does it bother you for the people to know who you truly are? Do you want me to reveal even more? About you and a certain person who was always present during your childbirths for example?”

Cersei was agape before Sansa’s words. She was threatening her, the queen. What happened to the frightened little girl she saw in Tyrion’s rooms a month ago? Cersei was on the dais, but right now she had the impression Sansa was the one taller than her. How was it possible? She was standing there, so proud. She looked so strong. That was so hard for Cersei to accept that she fell back into her chair without even realizing it. Sansa continued to talk.

“While the queen was drinking and calling back her son from the battlements because of her irrational beliefs that her brother wanted to kill the king, Lord Tyrion was leading. He set ablaze most of Stannis’s fleet with wildfire. He organized and led the defenses on the walls as the usurper’s troops landed on the ground. After our king left the battlements, he mustered the men and led the foray outside the gates, and destroyed the battering ram that was about to break through the Mud Gate. He fought bravely this day and was severely injured. He nearly died. Tywin Lannister saved the city, it’s true, by arriving in time to put Stannis’s forces in disarray. But without Lord Tyrion, King’s Landing would have fallen before Lord Tywin and the Tyrells arrived. Many people here would be dead, and Stannis would be sitting on the Iron Throne instead of Ser Kevan right now. The heads of our king and our queen would be rotting on the city’s gates. Before that, Lord Tyrion fought bravely at the Battle of the Green Fork against the rebels. He brought three thousand men to his father’s army, and these men nearly defeated an entire army by themselves. After that, he went to King’s Landing on Lord Tywin’s orders to serve as Hand of the King in his stead. He ruled the city better than anyone else could have done in these difficult circumstances. He did everything humanly possible to reduce the starvation the people were suffering of. He prepared the city’s defenses. He removed from their position corrupted men who slaughtered babies and innocent children. He made an alliance with House Martell. He made a secret pact with my mother, Catelyn Stark, which resulted in the release of Ser Jaime Lannister. He sent Lord Baelish to negotiate with the Tyrells, which made possible their alliance with the Crown. After the battle, he continued to serve the Crown as Master of Coin on the small council, managing the finances of the realm very well considering the war. He served loyally House Lannister and the Crown. He saved King’s Landing. He saved King Joffrey. He saved the queen, and as a reward, a kingsguard tried to kill him on the orders of his own sister. And while Lord Tyrion was trying to rule the city and to defend it, the queen was drinking, plotting against him, ordering people to have him killed, giving lordship to sons of butchers who killed innocent people, spilling blood on the steps of the Great Sept of Baelor, and beating whores.”

Cersei was rarely paralyzed by words, but this time she was. She never expected that. Not from Sansa. The little dove continued to talk. “This trial is about kinslaying, it’s true. This is about an attempt of murder from someone on a member of his family, but not about the murder of Tywin Lannister by his son. You heard the witnesses. The Lord Commander of the Kingsguard, our future queen, the Master of Whisperers, the son of the Hand of the King, they all brought irrefutable proofs of my husband’s innocence, on all the crimes he’s accused of. The queen has no solid proof to present against this. But she tried to have her brother killed, the first time during the Battle of Blackwater while he was protecting her son, and the second time now, by using the death of her father to obtain her brother’s head for imaginary crimes. You want a kinslayer? She’s there.”
Sansa had spoken in the direction of the judges all this time, but she pointed Cersei by turning her head toward her at the end of her speech. “You have the choice between being accomplices of a murderer, or justice by freeing an innocent man.”

Sansa said the last words to the judges again and left the box. Cersei couldn’t believe what she just heard. The little dove couldn’t have come up with such a speech on her own. And yet… You should be more careful with the new Lady Lannister. Was her uncle right finally? Did she underestimate Sansa? Could she be dangerous? A silly little girl who loved songs, knights, tales, and poetry? No, that was impossible. Cersei would have realized it before. She looked at Margaery who looked back at her with the smile she always had. She was the real one behind this. She probably forced Sansa to repeat these words again and again last night until they were natural like the courtesies the little dove always used.

However, Sansa didn’t go back to her seat near the box of the witness. Instead, she went to Tyrion and stood on his left side, just like Margaery stood on his right side. There was a huge silence in the Great Hall in answer to Sansa’s speech. Even her uncle Kevan looked unable to speak. Before anyone could say something, the ugly woman who accompanied Jaime back to King’s Landing went to Sansa’s left, standing in the same position. But what surprised Cersei the most was when Jaime took the same position at the right of Margaery. Her twin brother was standing with Margaery and Tyrion. Before she could recover from this shock, a kingsguard arrived from the far side of the Hall and stood behind Tyrion. It was Ser Balon Swann, the traitor who turned against her. Even Tyrion was standing in his box now. Cersei noticed his little frame was casting a shadow on the floor. It looked larger than those the others projected. They were six in total, standing tall before the judges, facing them.

Cersei didn’t know what was going on. She had the impression someone threw a spell on the room. A seventh person, Tyrion’s squire, joined the six others, standing next to Ser Balon in an awkward position. Finally, Kevan managed to speak, but Cersei still had the impression there was a spell in the room and that Tyrion would be cleared of the charges. That couldn’t happen. She couldn’t let that happen. All her efforts couldn’t be reduced to nothing.

“We listened to all the witnesses of the Crown and the defense. The accused may be granted the right to say a few last words.”

There was a silence for some time. Everyone seemed to be waiting for someone to speak. Finally, Tyrion did. “I have nothing to say, but this. I didn’t kill my father. I didn’t try to kill Joffrey. The only reason I’m here is because my sister wants me dead ever since the day I was born.”

After another moment of silence, Cersei’s uncle spoke again. “Very well, the judges will retire to deliberate before they give their verdict.”

“I don’t need to discuss. My verdict is already decided.” The Red Viper raised his voice before Kevan could rise from the Iron Throne. Kevan glanced at Oberyn Martell, then looked at the Fat Flower, probably with a questioning look. Mace Tyrell seemed to make a sign in the direction before him.

“Alright,” her uncle said. “We’ll proceed this way. Each judge will give his verdict to each charge in turn. Lord Mace of House Tyrell will begin, followed by Prince Oberyn of House Martell to end with Ser Kevan of House Lannister.”

It was to Mace Tyrell to speak first. Cersei looked intently at him. The Fat Flower looked back at her. Cersei had to be strong. She couldn’t afford to look weak. She gave a look at Lord Tyrell that let place to no questioning. The Lord of Highgarden rose from his seat and gave his verdict.
“For murder of Tywin Lannister, guilty. For attempt of murder against the king, guilty.”

The reactions didn’t wait. There were shouts of stupor all over the Great Hall. Cersei saw the confusion among the Tyrells, the surprise and incomprehension on Margaery’s face as she looked at her father. Lord Tyrell sat. All the people standing at Tyrion’s side were looking at each other, plainly unaware of what was going on. Tyrion himself looked lost. Cersei exulted. She had gone to see Lord Mace in the Maidenvault last evening and explained him that his daughter was being manipulated by Tyrion and that everything that was said on this day were filthy lies like the ones Stannis Baratheon was spreading. She even promised him she would give them Sansa to marry a member of their family, even offering her to marry his son Loras if they thought it could cause too much problems for them to marry him to Cersei, but only if Tyrion was declared guilty since they needed him to be dead for Sansa to marry again. She had also gone to Prince Oberyn, promising him the head of Ser Gregor Clegane against a verdict of culpability for Tyrion. Both had accepted. It was the end for Tyrion. Even if Kevan voted for him, the Red Viper would never overlook a chance to have a Lannister killed. On Tyrion’s death, she and Oberyn agreed at least.

Kevan looked surprised as well. He looked in Cersei’s direction. Cersei smiled to him. You lost, Uncle. You always were a good advisor for my father, but I am his daughter. You should have remembered that before you defied me. Kevan’s anger was obvious, but Cersei didn’t care. He would leave the capital very soon after the trial. And if he didn’t… Cersei would force him to leave, one way or another.

“Silence! Order!” It took some time, but Kevan managed to bring back the calm in the Hall. In the meantime, Prince Oberyn Martell looked at Cersei with a wide smile on his lips. Cersei returned it. Soon, that would be the end for the monster who killed her mother. Maggy’s prophecy would never come true. What future do you see now, witch? The head of the valonqar off his shoulders? The end of this so-called younger queen who would cast me down? Cersei had turned the prophecy into a lie.

Finally, when the order was back, a tense silence lingered on the Great Hall. It was Prince Oberyn’s turn to give his verdict. Cersei couldn’t wait for this. She had wanted this for so long, and finally her monstrous brother would get what he deserved. Mace Tyrell sat again, but Prince Oberyn didn’t rise as he began to speak.

“Before I give my decision, there is something I would like to say. You see, I met the accused, many years ago.”

What was he talking about? They should get rid of this now. Well, after all, Tyrion would be sentenced very soon, so if the Red Viper wanted to take some time to tell a story, Cersei thought she might be able to support it.

“I think I would have remembered that.” Tyrion looked skeptical the way he spoke. Cersei was as well. When could Oberyn Martell have met Tyrion?

The answer of the Red Viper came immediately. “Unlikely. You had just been born. Our father brought me and my sister Elia with him on a visit to Casterly Rock. My first time away from Dorne. I didn’t like anything about the Rock. Not the food, not the weather, not the accents. Nothing. But the biggest disappointment, it was him.”

Cersei wondered what he was talking about and why. She thought she remembered the Martells visited Casterly Rock a long time ago. She didn’t remember well, though, she was very young. Was her mother still alive? If Oberyn said Tyrion was born, then it had to be not long after the monster killed her. But why in the Seven Hells was he talking about this? What was so important for the Dornishman to speak about a visit to Casterly Rock? He continued his tale nonetheless and everyone was listening in complete silence.
“The whole way from Dorne, all anyone talked about was the monster that had been born to Tywin Lannister. A head twice the size of his body, a tail between his legs, claws, one red eye, the privates of both a girl and a boy.”

“That would have made things so much easier.” Tyrion’s comments brought some nervous laughs in the rooms. Cersei didn’t remember these rumors about him, but she wasn’t surprised there had been some. He had been such an ugly and horrible baby, a true monster.

“When we met his sister, she promised she would show him to us. Every day we would ask. Every day she would say: Soon. Then she and her brother took us to the nursery and… she unveiled the freak.” The Prince of Dorne made a movement with his hand and arm to emphasize it. He had made a move with his head, pointing Jaime to make people understand he was with them. “The head was a bit large. The arms and legs were a bit small, but no claw. No red eye. No tail between the legs. Just a tiny pink cock. We didn’t try to hide our disappointment, Elia and I. That’s just a baby. And she said: He killed my mother. And she pinched his little cock so hard, I thought she might pull it off. Until her brother made her stop.” Another head’s move indicated Jaime. “It doesn’t matter, she told us. Everyone says he will die soon. I hope they are right. He should not have lived this long.”

Cersei thought she remembered it now. It was difficult for her to remember it considering the numerous times she pinched Tyrion when he was still a baby. She didn’t care about it. Every pinch he received he deserved, and even more. That was nothing compared to her mother’s death and what she endured while she brought the little monster into the world. He should have died right when he was born. Her mother was the one who should live. But as always, Jaime had stepped in to protect their so poor little brother. Well now, he wouldn’t be able to save him. Strangely, Cersei had a bad feeling. Why had Oberyn told this story? His voice had turned quite sad, she even believed she perceived pity in it. A Martell couldn’t pity a Lannister, especially not Tyrion. She looked at the prince and saw him staring at her. Not with a knowing smile this time, but with hard and disdainful eyes and face. And when he spoke in her direction, there was disgust in his voice.

“I can see nothing changed in thirty years.” With an evil smirk, he rose from his seat, not leaving his eyes from Cersei, until he turned to Tyrion and gave the verdict. “For both accusations, not guilty.”

Cersei’s jaw fell. How could he do that? They had an agreement. How did he dare? Oberyn Martell took his time to sit again. When he did, Kevan got out of the Iron Throne and pronounced the words Cersei feared the most. “For the murder of Tywin Lannister, not guilty. For attempt of murder against the king, not guilty. The gods have made their will known. Tyrion Lannister, you are free.”

That couldn’t be. No, that couldn’t be. Cersei had organized everything. Tyrion was guilty. He killed her mother. He killed her father. He sent her daughter away from her. He tried to kill her son. He would kill her children and kill her at the end. Gold will be their crowns. Gold their shrouds. And when your tears have drowned you, the valonqar shall wrap his hands about your pale white throat and choke the life from you. Maggy’s voice resonated. No, she wouldn’t let that happen. There was still one thing she could do. Cersei passed her right hand on her two breasts. That was the signal. Jaime, her love, was already unlocking the monster’s shackles. He had taken the keys from the gold cloaks in his hurry to free his little brother and was trying the best he could to free him with a single hand. Cersei noticed Margaery was pulling Sansa in an embrace. A kingsguard walked toward the box, coming from beside the dais. At the last moment, he drew a dagger.

“Ser Jaime, behind you.” Ser Balon Swann shouted too late. The kingsguard tossed Jaime away with his left hand. Between the surprise effect and the lack of his right hand, Jaime had no chance. Nothing stood between Tyrion and the kingsguard. The dagger slashed through the air. Tyrion backed away, but not enough. Blood spurted out from his chest. A moment later, another dagger flew through the air and took the kingsguard right in the head. He fell on the floor. All the better. No one would be able to question him now, and he fulfilled his mission.

“Tyron! Tyron!” There was consternation in the Hall for a short moment, but the cries broke it. Cersei was surprised to hear Sansa cry for this monster. She was leaning over him, her hands on his chest. It was over. The Imp was dead. Cersei won. “He’s bleeding!”

“Fetch a maester!” Kevan shouted. “Not this one. Another.” The last words came out when Pycelle started to advance. Jaime was staring in shock at the body of his beloved little brother. Balon Swann’s attitude was no better. It was approximately the same thing for Maegaery, the woman clad in armor and the squire. Kevan advanced toward the box, but he didn’t look at Tyrion’s dead shape. The body of the kingsguard was still laying on the floor, his head facing the floor. Kevan turned it to see his face. There was a dagger in his throat.

“Jaime.” Her uncle called for her brother. Her only true brother. Cersei looked with wonderment and satisfaction at what just happened. The little monster was dead. Sansa could cry all she wanted, she couldn’t bring him back to life. She was a widow. She would appreciate it, just like Cersei appreciated it when Robert died, until Cersei found her a new husband.

“It’s Ser Osmund Kettleblack!” Jaime seemed to have gotten out of his numbed state and was looking down at the kingsguard. He and Kevan looked at each other for a moment, then they both turned their head to look at Cersei. At this moment, Cersei realized many eyes were looking at her. Kevan’s voice resonated in the Hall.

“Guards! Escort the queen to her chambers. Don’t let her leave them under any circumstance.”

Guards in Lannister cloaks approached and took Cersei by the arms, dragging her away. How did they dare? “I am your queen! Release me!” Cersei struggled to get free of their grips as she yelled. “Ser Meryn! Ser Boros! Protect your queen!”

The two kingsguards approached side by side, drawing their swords. “Gold cloaks, guards, Ser Balon, with me!” This time Jaime’s voice thundered. Within a few seconds he was standing in the way of his two sworn brothers, his sword in his left hand. Ser Balon Swann joined him, his sword out as well. The ugly woman was there as well. Cersei recognized her sword as the one her father gave to Jaime when he came back. It was made of Valyrian steel. What was she doing with it? Two guards were holding Cersei as she struggled without success to get free. Gold cloaks and other Lannister men were surrounding Ser Boros and Ser Meryn. The two men froze.

“I am the queen! You cannot do this! I just saved our king! He was a monster! He killed my father! I saved the family! I saved House Lannister! I saved Joffrey!” Cersei looked all around, searching for help, but she found none. Everyone abandoned her. Ser Osmund was dead and his brothers weren’t present. Ser Meryn and Ser Boros were too craven to die for their rightful queen, her uncle and her beloved Jaime were turning on her. Despite all her calls and yelling, no one tried to help her as she was dragged to her rooms and thrown in them without ceremony.

Cersei laid on the floor the guards left her on. Maggy’s words came back to her again. You’ll be queen. For a time. Then comes another, younger, more beautiful, to cast you down and take all you hold dear. Another jug of wine shattered on the door.
Before some people start to hate me, remember Cersei is an unreliable POV character. Wait for the next chapter.

Please review

Next chapter: Tysha makes an appearance

By the way, I started a new fanfic recently. For those who love Star Wars, especially the video game "Star Wars: The Old Republic", I invite you to read "Life as a spy". https://www.fanfiction.net/s/11932305/1/Life-as-a-spy
TYRION IX

I loved a maid as fair as summer with sunlight in her hair.

I loved a maid as red as autumn with sunset in her hair.

I loved a maid as white as winter with moonglow in her hair.

The song came out from the darkness surrounding Tyrion. He didn’t know where he was. He had the impression to drift on clouds. His mind and body were numbed. Despite the darkness around him, he felt well. That was so different from how he usually felt. He had never been so much in peace. And now the voice was filling his ears, sweet, soft, slow, low, loving. It was a voice he heard long ago, but it had come back to him very often for fifteen years. It remembered him one of the few times he was really happy.

The song continued, as sweet as if it was the first time he heard it, always from the same voice. Tyrion kept his eyes shut. He didn’t need them with the darkness. He only needed his ears to hear the song. He felt he could stay here for hours, days, weeks, even months and years, listening to this song. The voice was clearer now. Tyrion had the impression it was closing on him, but he didn’t care. He remained there, listening to the sweet voice that drew near to him. Suddenly, it stopped. The voice didn’t sing anymore. It talked.

“I love you, Tyrion. I love your lips. I love your voice, and the words you say to me, and how you treat me gentle. I love your face.”

Tyrion opened his eyes. There was a torch right before him, but it didn’t blind him. Next to the torch was a face. The fire only allowed him to see her face, nothing more, but she was beautiful. Even more beautiful than in Tyrion’s memories. Her hair, her eyes, her neck, her cheeks, all her face showed a greater beauty than he ever saw in her before. Her skin also looked darker, but perhaps only because of the darkness. She also looked older.

“Tysha.” A single word escaped from his mouth. His voice choked. She was there, right in front of her, after all these years. Even if that wasn’t real, it was enough to have tears coming to his eyes.
“Tyrion. It’s been a long time.” Her voice was sweet, even bewitching. The flames of the fire were dancing on her face, making her far more beautiful than Tyrion could have ever imagined. “You remember. I loved you. I was yours, and you were mine.”

The words brought back Tyrion to the hard reality. “You were a whore. Everything you told me, everything we shared, all of it was a lie.”

“Was it a lie? Was I the liar?”

Tysha looked at him, a sad expression on her face. She looked like she felt sorry for him. Her face started to recede, disappearing slowly. As only a thin point of fire was left far away, Tyrion heard her voice one last time.

“We’ll meet again.”

Then there was nothing. Tyrion was in the darkness again. He closed his eyes again, letting his numb state carry him out of the world once again. He wanted to stay there forever. He didn’t want to go back to the reality full of treachery where everyone looked like they wanted to kill him, where he was hated. Here, there was no one to hate him. What reason could he have to go back to the real world?

Tyrion heard something else. Another song, but this one didn’t seem to come from the darkness. It came from somewhere else, though Tyrion ignored where. The voice was different, but sweet like honey and beautiful all the same. He had a vague impression to know this voice, but he couldn’t remember where he heard it before. He opened his eyes once again, searching for its origin. He looked around him, seeing nothing first. After a moment, he noticed a light far away. It was faint, but it was there. It wasn’t the light of a fire. This light was too white to come from it. The song came from the light. He couldn’t understand the words, but he felt attracted to them. The light was there, far away, and it didn’t move. He would have to walk toward it in order to reach it. It wouldn’t come to him.

Tyrion wasn’t sure if he wanted to go back to the light. He liked it here, in the darkness. Tysha had come to visit him. Perhaps she would come again. He didn’t want to go back to the sufferings, the horrors and the pain. He knew that if he walked to the light, he would have to play the game again. He was tired of playing, even though he had to admit he enjoyed to play. But the joy it brought was nothing compared to the sacrifices it meant. How much did he sacrifice to play the game of thrones? Too much. I lost too much. Tysha. Shae. Who else? Was all of it worth the pleasure of playing? Why go back to a world full of bad people?

But another part of Tyrion’s mind told him he had to go back. I do belong to this world. These bad people are what I’m good at. Outtalking them, outthinking them. It’s what I am. And I like it. I like it more than anything I’ve ever done. He couldn’t stay alone in the darkness. His place wasn’t there. And there were people he cared about, and perhaps who cared about him in the light. Tyrion had been alone most of his life, but he never wanted to be alone. He didn’t want to be alone. On the other side was his big brother, Jaime. His smiling and loyal squire, Pod. His sellsword and friend, Bronn. Even if he was more a sellsword than a friend, he was still a friend. There were also many other people that Tyrion liked on the other side. His uncle Gerion. Perhaps he wasn’t dead. There was also Gerion’s daughter, Joy Hill. Tyrion liked the girl. She had such an appropriate name. She brought joy everywhere she was accepted. Tyrion was walking in the direction of the light now and he was getting closer and closer, the light taking more and more place and filling the darkness as he approached. He regretted to leave the darkness, but he had to. He didn’t belong to the darkness. He belonged to the light. There was someone in the light he wanted to see again. The voice came clear as he approached the light. Tyrion recognized the lyrics of the song. It was a hymn.
Gentle Mother, font of mercy,
Save our sons from war, we pray,
Stay the swords and stay the arrows,
Let them know a better day.

Gentle Mother, strength of women,
Help our daughters through this fray,
Soothe the wrath and tame the fury,
Teach us all a kinder way.

Tyrion didn’t believe in gods. If there were gods, and if they were just and good, why would they make a world so full of injustice and monsters? Once he believed in gods, back when he wanted to become High Septon. But after he met Tysha, he forgot about this. Despite this, the hymn sounded beautiful as he heard it clearly. He came into the full light.

Tyrion was lying on something smooth. He believed it was a mattress. He heard the voice singing very distinctively. He remained still, listening to it for a moment, his eyes closed. There was something on his chest, he didn’t know what. After a moment, he decided to open his eyes to look on his right, where the voice seemed to come from. She was kneeling, her hands joined as she sang just next to him, her head leaning, her eyes closed. Her auburn hair were falling all over her shoulders. Tyrion thought he preferred her hair like this instead of some complicated hairdressing she had her handmaidens do for her in special occasions. He looked at her lips moving as she continued to sing the Mother’s Hymn. She had a beautiful voice. Tyrion knew Sansa could sing very well, but he never heard her sing before, and he never asked her to sing for him. He never really felt as if he could ask anything from her. He knew he could have, and Sansa would have obliged, but he didn’t want her to do something against her will only because he asked her to. He continued to watch her singing. She looked in peace, something she had never looked like ever since Tyrion saw her in King’s Landing. Perhaps it was the reason why she prayed so much. That was the only way for her to find some calm in this city. However, as much as he liked to stay here looking at her, Tyrion thought he should say something. He didn’t even feel well about looking at her without her authorization.

“You have a lovely voice, my lady. I regret I didn’t hear it before.”

Sansa opened her eyes and lifted her eyes to look at him. Tyrion believed he saw relief, even a smile on her face. “Tyrion. Are you alright? How do you feel?” Sansa raised from her kneeling position and sat on the bedside.

“I guess I’m alive. Unless the Maiden decided to welcome me in her paradise, but I don’t think she would.” Tyrion tried to smile. Sansa chuckled a little at the jape.

“Don’t worry, you’re alive. I’m not the Maiden. But you’re lucky to be alive.”
Tyrion looked around. He was in the chamber he and Sansa shared. He wondered how he ended up here, lying in Sansa’s bed. After all, it was her bed considering Tyrion never shared it with her… except one time. His mind was confused. He tried to sit.

“No, don’t do this!” Sansa’s warning proved to be clever. Tyrion felt a sudden pain in his belly as soon as he moved and landed heavily on his back. “You mustn’t move. You were gravely injured. You need to rest.” His wife spoke to him on an imperious tone, but Tyrion strangely perceived worry in her voice as well. She took something on a table near the bed and approached it from Tyrion’s face. It was some sort of cup.

“It’s Milk of the poppy. It will ease the pain.” When Sansa told Tyrion what was in the cup, he ducked. “Don’t you trust me?”

Tyrion looked at Sansa. He could only see worry in her eyes. He also had the impression she was hurt. Tyrion remembered now that Sansa defended him for his trial. She wouldn’t make so much effort to save his life only to kill him afterwards. Tyrion nodded positively and accepted to drink. He could trust his wife. He drifted into sleep once more, the last thing he saw being auburn hair and blue eyes.

Tyrion didn’t know for how long he slept, but when he woke up he had a great surprise. It was dawn. When he opened his eyes he was staring at the ceiling, but he felt something in his left hand and a pressure against his left arm. When he turned his head, he saw Sansa, lying next to him, still asleep, her face facing him. Her left hand was holding his own and her forehead was pressed against his arm. Tyrion thought he was probably dreaming. He closed and opened his eyes a few times, expecting all of it to disappear. After a few failed attempts, he decided this was real. Sansa was really lying next to him. Well, he couldn’t blame her. That was her bed after all. It was he who shouldn’t be there.

Tyrion remembered what happened the last time he woke up. He was exactly at the same place and in the same position. He had felt a strong pain in his belly when he tried to sit. He knew better than to repeat the experience. Instead, he lifted his head to see what caused the pain he endured. He realized he was naked. Well, not entirely since he still wore breeches, but nothing covered his chest, except several layers of bandages. He remembered then.

The last two days of his trial had nearly been an amusement for Tyrion. He saw several people tearing into pieces the testimonies of the witnesses Cersei had brought against him, from Ser Balon Swann to Daisy the whore. Tyrion was really impressed by Sansa. She managed to find enough people not only to prove his innocence, but also to destroy Cersei. The testimonies of Podrick and Varys, but most of all Lancel, entirely annihilated Cersei’s image and power. Sansa revealed to the entire world what a manipulative and paranoid bitch his sister was, that she tried to kill her brother, which was kinslaying as much as killing his own father, and that she slept with her cousin. Even better, Lancel confessed his part in Robert Baratheon’s death, and that could get Cersei accused of regicide. Tyrion jubilated as he looked how Cersei was even more destroyed by each new word the witnesses pronounced in the Great Hall. He never thought such a day would arrive. Tyrion had been amazed by Sansa’s work.

He knew Sansa wasn’t stupid. Many people in King’s Landing saw her like this, a stupid little girl, the daughter of a traitor, who always did what was ordered from her. Tyrion knew it was far from being the truth. Of course, Sansa always did what she was asked to, but she did it in order to survive. She was no different from Varys or Tyrion in some way. She had understood very quickly she would have to hide behind courtesies and to act as a perfect little girl in order to survive in the capital. Many other people wouldn’t have been wise enough to understand that. That was probably why Cersei never saw Sansa as a threat. It had been her last mistake. Sansa used the new situation and revealed who she really was, a young woman full of resources and capable to play the game just like everyone, and to play it better than many people. And she revealed it at the best time ever. Even Tyrion hadn’t expected this. She took everyone by surprise. Her concluding speech was perfect. Tyrion still had some hard time to accept that Sansa had spoken so highly of him. He never thought she would do something like this someday. And yet she did.

However, everything Sansa did could have turned to nothing after Mace Tyrell gave his verdict. Tyrion still didn’t understand why the Fat Flower decided to declare him guilty. The Lord of Highgarden was expected to make the same choice than Kevan, but instead he chose to claim Tyrion was guilty despite all evidences of the opposite. Tyrion thought he remembered an exchange of look between Lord Mace and Cersei. What could her sister have said to persuade him to vote against Tyrion? By luck, Oberyn Martell unexpectedly chose to spare Tyrion. Except for Sansa praising him, a Martell coming to the defense of a Lannister was the last thing Tyrion expected. Sadly, a kingsguard tried to kill him as Jaime was freeing him. Tyrion couldn’t remember which kingsguard, but he expected that Cersei was behind this. She desperately wanted him dead. He remembered the dagger slashing through the air and a sudden pain in his belly, and then nothing else until he woke up with Sansa singing next to him. Tyrion remembered he backed up right before the attack came. Perhaps that saved his life, just like during the Battle of Blackwater. Cersei had tried to kill him twice, and twice he survived. He hoped he wouldn’t have to survive a third attempt.

The door opened and Tyrion saw a young woman with black hair bringing a tray of food on the table. Tyrion’s mind was a bit fuzzy, so he didn’t recognize her immediately, but he was quite surprised when he realized she was a Northerner.

“Lady Mira. What are you doing here?” Mira Forrester turned to face him at his question and smiled.

“Lord Tyrion. It is a pleasure to see you’re better.”

“Thank you, but you didn’t answer my question.” Tyrion noticed Sansa was stirring and awakening next to him.

“I am Lady Sansa’s handmaiden now, my lord. Did you forget?”

Memory came back to Tyrion. His mind was still misty. “Ah yes, I remember. Forgive me, my lady.”

The northern girl made a sign that showed she accepted the apology and walked on the other side of the bed. Sansa was getting out of it. Lady Mira helped Sansa to prepare for the day under Tyrion’s eyes. That was quite disturbing for him since he never saw it before. He was always gone when Sansa’s handmaidens began to dress her for the day. Tyrion looked away most of the time. He didn’t think Sansa would like him to spy on her, especially while she was dressing. When Mira Forrester was done with Sansa’s preparation, she left with a bow and the usual “my lady” and “my lord” for Sansa and Tyrion.

After she was gone, Sansa took some of the plates on the tray and brought it on the bed. She sat by Tyrion’s side.

“I could have come to the table, my lady. You didn’t have to move the breakfast for me, even if I appreciate it,” Tyrion observed.

“The last time you tried to stand you ended up laying again on the bed within a second.”

Sansa wasn’t wrong. Tyrion’s mind was really clouded. It was probably the Milk of the poppy. He didn’t like it. His brain was the only weapon he had. If it was restrained, he couldn’t defend himself. But for now, his mind wouldn’t be so useful. Sansa was no threat. At least not for him. They ate in silence, and then Tyrion read afterwards. There wasn’t much else he could do. Sansa went to another part of the room and read a book as well. Tyrion told her she wasn’t obliged to stay, but Sansa refused to leave. She said she was alright here.

About the end of the morning, Maester Frenken, who Tyrion knew well, came to check his injury. Tyrion told his wife she could leave while the maester examined him, but to his surprise she refused again. The maester cut Tyrion’s bandages on his belly and revealed a huge opening on his chest, above his navel. The injury had been closed with stitches and Tyrion noticed traces of what was probably medicinal plants. Tyrion was never quite interested by medicine, but he read so much in his whole life that he knew a few things about healing. He could see the injury was cicatrizing, but not entirely. The maester confirmed what he thought as he examined Tyrion’s injury.

“There is no infection. Your life is no longer in danger, my lord, but I would suggest you do not move for today. Tomorrow you should be able to move, but carefully. No jerks. There will be no permanent damage left.”

“Except a huge scar. It seems I needed another one. Does every kingsguard want to leave his mark on me?” Tyrion asked.

The maester didn’t answer, but Tyrion thought he heard an inaudible chuckle from Sansa’s direction. The maester covered the injury with healing herbs and new bandages, then left. Before that, he asked Tyrion if he wanted some Milk of the poppy, but Tyrion refused. He felt his thoughts became clearer. The effects of the liquid were disappearing.

“How do you feel?” Sansa asked him when the maester was gone. She was again at his side, sitting on a chair.

“I feel quite well I would say, for someone who just came quite close to die. Even better for a twice scarred imp.” Sansa smiled. Tyrion liked to see her smile. “I guess I owe you some thanks. You just saved me from my demonic mad sister.”

“I am your wife, so it was my duty. And you once saved me from Joffrey, perhaps twice. A Lannister always pays her debts.”

Sansa was a Lannister in name because of their marriage, but the words sounded quite unnatural when they were about her. Tyrion knew Sansa would never be a Lannister, no matter what happened. She would never identify herself to the family who slaughtered hers. It was at this moment that Tyrion’s eyes were attracted by something around Sansa’s neck. Tyrion recognized it. It was the necklace he gave to her for her last name day. He thought she would never look at it.

“I opened it,” Sansa said suddenly. It seemed she noticed where Tyrion’s gaze had wandered. Tyrion looked back at Sansa’s face. She was smiling and her eyes only showed thanking. “Thank you. I like it.”

Tyrion smiled sadly. “I had it made for you before… everything that happened. I guess I still hoped at this moment you could go back to your family one day.” If Tyrion had hoped that, it had been a foolish hope. He should have known as soon as he married Sansa that his father would make sure all her family would die, or else the Lannisters could never use Sansa’s claim on the North.

A heavy silence followed Tyrion’s words. Neither him neither Sansa dared to speak. Finally, Tyrion broke the silence. He had something else to tell to Sansa.

“I have to give you some apologies as well.”
Sansa lifted her head, a doubtful expression on her face. “Apologies? What do you mean? You owe me no apologies. I know you have nothing to see with my family’s death. I was the one to be wrong for being angry at you after that.”

Tyrion would have been happy to hear these words in other circumstances, but sadly Sansa missed the point. “No, Sansa, you had every right to be at least resentful at me. I don’t blame you, far from it. But I wasn’t speaking about your family. I was talking about… well, you heard what Shae said. You know the truth now.”

Tyrion averted his eyes. “If someone should apologize, it’s Shae.” Sansa spoke very hard. Tyrion looked at her again and could see anger in her eyes. She was fixing him intensively. “From what Bronn and Podrick told me, you met her at the Green Fork, you brought her to King’s Landing against your father’s orders, you both fell in love with the other, she was angry at you when you were forced to marry me, and you sent her away when Cersei discovered who she was. You never mistreated her, never forced her to do anything against her will, you even saved her from the queen, and to thank you she came back to tell lies about you and me in order to have you executed. Furthermore, from what I know, you never spent time with her after our wedding, and I cannot blame you for all the women you’ve been with before. Forgive me if I see no reason for you to apologize, except if Bronn and Podrick lied to me.”

Tyrion was a bit stunned by Sansa’s words. That wasn’t the reaction he expected from her when she would learn he had a lover. A lover who happened to be her handmaiden. Sansa wasn’t angry at him. She was angry at Shae. She asked him a question. “Why? Why did you stop to bed Shae after we were married?”

Sansa’s face turned uncertain as she asked her question. Was she really curious about why Tyrion stopped to see Shae after the wedding? Tyrion owed her an answer after everything she did for him despite the discovery of his relationship with Shae.

“Well, first, I already limited my contacts with Shae after the Battle of Blackwater to prevent my father or Cersei to find about her. By the way, Cersei discovered her because we had an argument in this room and another of your handmaidens heard us.”

“That’s not the only reason,” Sansa countered. “You could have met in secret. Why didn’t you?”

She was fixing him, waiting for his answer. Tyrion sighed. “We were forced into this marriage, but it is a marriage all the same, as unusual a type of marriage it can be. I said the words. I took an oath. And as you said, you are the disgraced daughter of the traitor Ned Stark. I didn’t want you to be the cheated wife of the Demon Monkey with that.”

Another silence followed that Sansa broke after a moment. “Well, we’re married by force, our families are in war, and we end up being faithful to each other and saving each other. As you said, we’re perfect for each other.”

Both couldn’t suppress laughs. The situation looked so hilarious. Their marriage was a farce. They had every reason to hate each other. Well, Sansa at least had every reason to hate him, but it looked like she didn’t. They were looking after each other despite all their differences and the feud between the Starks and the Lannisters. That brought Tyrion to ask Sansa a question.

“Why did you do all this to have me spared? You took greats risks. If Oberyn hadn’t decided at the last minute to declare me not guilty, I don’t want to imagine the trouble you’d be in right now. And I don’t think you want so much to keep me as your husband.”

Sansa took some time to answer. “You have been kind with me ever since I arrived. There are not many people I can say the same about. I didn’t want you to die.” Tyrion looked very closely to Sansa and examined her facial expression to see if she was wearing her armor of courtesies again, but she wasn’t. If she was, she would say it was simply her duty as his wife. Instead he only saw concern on her face. She was being sincere. “Anyway, if you die, I would have to marry someone else. That’s not a prospect I really enjoy.”

Tyrion didn’t blame Sansa for that. If he died, his family would keep her. She was the key to the North. They would marry her to another member of House Lannister. Some of his cousins were good men and younger than him, more handsome too, but they were still Lannisters. Tyrion didn’t think one of them would allow Sansa to remain a virgin during the wedding night.

Tyrion chose this moment to say something quite stupid. “We’re stuck together now, it seems. The Stark turned Lannister and the twice scarred Imp. We’re definitely perfect for each other.”

Sansa burst into small laughs after a moment she took to react. Tyrion too, and that brought some pain to his chest. Sansa then informed him of everything that happened ever since the trial. Apparently, the trial only ended yesterday. Tyrion hadn’t slept on drugs for a very long time finally. Ser Osmund Kettleblack was dead, killed by a dagger Bronn threw into his throat as soon as he tried to kill Tyrion. Tyrion felt he would have to double his wages, but Sansa told him he already owed Bronn a marriage and a lordship. This information brought him headaches. Cersei was now again confined into her personal chambers, guarded by Kevan’s men. Sansa had no idea what would happen to her, or to Lancel. Tyrion and Sansa continued to talk as the day progressed, only interrupted by Mira or Pod bringing their meals. Both couldn’t tell them what was happening with Cersei, rumours about her going from exile to trial. Sansa had read some of his books while he was in cell, so they talked about them for a very long time. Tyrion told a lot of things to Sansa about dragons since she read the Unnatural History of Septon Barth. She didn’t leave Tyrion’s side a single moment. That was probably one of the best days Tyrion had since years.

When they went to bed finally (well, in fact, Sansa was the one to go to bed since Tyrion was already in), Sansa laid her forehead against Tyrion’s arm in the same position he found her this morning. Before they fell asleep, Sansa told him: “I’m glad you’re alive.”

Tyrion could only answer one thing. “I’m glad to be alive too.”

Sansa chuckled, then remained silent. For a rare time, Tyrion slept well. Next morning, Sansa helped Tyrion to sit in the bed, and then to get on his feet very slowly. She even helped him to put on his clothes. Tyrion felt like a baby, but he couldn’t make any quick movement. It was Podrick who brought them their breakfast this time, along with a request.

“My lord,” said the squire, “your uncle would like to see you as quickly as possible.”

“Alright. I’ll go as soon as the breakfast will be over.” Podrick left after Tyrion answered. He then turned to his wife. “What are you gonna do today?”

“I’ll visit Margaery”, Sansa answered. “I would like to see her again. And I’ll go with Mira. She would like to spend some time with her friends from Highgarden.”

“Good. It will do you some good after an entire day with your husband.” Tyrion noticed Sansa reddened. “Give her my thanks. After all, her testimony helped a lot to clear me. I still wonder how you convinced her to speak at the trial, and even worse to speak for me.”

“I told her it was an opportunity to destroy Cersei forever and to get rid of her. You should thank Varys as well. He’s the one who suggested me to see your cousin Lancel.”
When they were done eating, Tyrion quietly left the room. Bronn and five Lannister guards were before the door. Two of them and Bronn accompanied Tyrion to his uncle’s solar, the three others staying behind. Apparently they were here to protect Tyrion and Sansa. Tyrion could trust his uncle now, so he didn’t worry. On their way, Bronn reminded him of the promise Sansa made to him. Tyrion told him he would pay his debt as soon as he could. For now, he had to speak with his uncle.

His uncle’s solar was on the first floor of the Red Keep. It seemed Kevan Lannister hadn’t moved in the Tower of the Hand yet. Tyrion knew his uncle had a great respect for his late brother. He had been the advisor of the Lord of Casterly Rock for a very long time, probably ever since the moment Tyrion’s father became lord, but Tywin Lannister rarely needed advice. Kevan mostly agreed with everything his brother thought and said. Ser Kevan Lannister seldom had a thought that Lord Tywin had not had first.

When Tyrion entered in Kevan’s solar, his uncle was writing. He lifted his eyes after a moment, and stopped to write, rising from his seat to meet his nephew. “Tyrion. I’m glad to see you’re better. I feared the worst for a time.” His uncle extended a hand to shake Tyrion’s. That was quite different from his brother. Tywin Lannister would remain seated and continue to work, as if he didn’t care about your presence. Tyrion took the hand his uncle offered him. “How are you? I hope the injury is healing well.”

“Yes, for now, but I must avoid quick movements. Glad to see you again uncle, and not as a judge.”

“Please, sit. We have several matters to discuss.”

Tyrion went to the chair before his uncle’s desk and slowly sit on it. He felt a pain on his chest as he sat. Kevan took place on the other side. He cleared his throat before he talked.

“Tyrion, first I must tell you that I and Genna read Tywin’s will at Casterly Rock when we learned about his death. He left important sums of gold to all his family, including me, Genna, you, Jaime and Cersei, and left many smaller amounts to almost all his cousins. However, the part that was the most important concerned his heir. Tywin’s last wishes were that Jaime becomes the Lord of Casterly Rock when he died.” Tyrion wasn’t surprised to hear it. Jaime had always been the heir his father wanted, no matter Jaime didn’t want it and no matter what Jaime did. He was his golden son. He could lose a hand, kill his king, fuck his own sister, Tyrion’s brother always was the golden son. “However, Jaime refused. Anyway, he is a kingsguard. He cannot inherit lands or titles. By all the laws of the Seven Kingdoms, you are our new lord.”

Tyrion was quite surprised by Kevan’s last statement. He stood bewildered for a moment. Of course he knew that since Jaime was a kingsguard, he was his father’s lawful heir, but his father always refused to acknowledge him as heir to Casterly Rock.

_I would let myself be consumed by maggots before mocking the family name and making you heir to Casterly Rock. You killed your mother to come into the world. You are an ill-made, spiteful little creature full of envy, lust, and low cunning. Men’s laws give you the right to bear my name and display my colors since I cannot prove that you are not mine. And to teach me humility, the gods have condemned me to watch you waddle about wearing that proud lion that was my father’s sigil and his father’s before him. But neither gods nor men will ever compel me to let you turn Casterly Rock into your whorehouse._

His father’s words resonated in his head. But now, he was dead. Jaime refused Casterly Rock, and Tyrion was next in line. It was true. By all laws, he was the new Lord of House Lannister. That seemed so easy. Tyrion had difficulties to believe it was really happening.

“Father left nothing else in his will? Anything like : _Tyrion Lannister is never to be the Lord of_ “Nothing of this sort,” his uncle answered more than seriously. He sighed. “I know Tywin never wanted you as his heir, but Tywin also knew that you were the most intelligent and clever of all his children. He never told me, but I know he believed it, and I know it is true. You proved it at the Green Fork, and that’s why he sent you to King’s Landing. You did an excellent job here as Hand and Master of Coin. Tywin is dead and we need a new lord. Perhaps Tywin would disagree, but I cannot force Jaime to become the lord, and we must think about House Lannister. You are the most well-suited to be the Lord of Casterly Rock.”

Tyrion was quite surprised by his uncle’s words. He could only answer awkwardly. “Well, I don’t have much choice anyway. Thank you, Uncle.”

“You don’t have to thank me. I’m only doing what is right and necessary. You’ll have to leave for Casterly Rock very soon. You’ll have to attend the royal wedding first however. It will take place in five days, but you must leave not long after to make sure your bannermen pledge themselves to you. There will also be a ceremony tomorrow. Joffrey will acknowledge you as Lord of Casterly Rock and confirm you in all yours lands and titles before all noblemen and noblewomen present in King’s Landing. We must make sure everyone knows that you’re alive and the new Lord of the Westerlands after the attempt of murder at the end of the trial. I already sent ravens to all the lords of the Westerlands to let them know you were alive. We must also show the Crown supports you.”

“Good. Within a few days I went from kinslayer to Lord of Casterly Rock. The change will be appreciated. Do you really think Joffrey will recognize me without complaints?”

“I’ll make sure he does. Also, in the meantime, I would like you to resume your functions as Master of Coin. Lord Gyles Rosby didn’t prove to be fit for this position and his health is declining. We have a few problems I would need you to solve before you leave. Cersei took some… questionable decisions during the short time she ruled.”

“What a surprise.” Tyrion wondered what foolishness Cersei did again. “What did they do? Did they order a golden statue fifteen-metres high of Joffrey? Or did they decide to double again the cost of the royal wedding?”

“You’ll have to look into the cost of the wedding. I fear it got higher with the delay. What preoccupies me the most is the capacity of the Crown to pay back its debts. Cersei stopped the payments to the Iron Bank and the Faith in order to have enough money to rebuild the royal fleet. I ordered the payments to start again, but we may have problems all the same. And we don’t have enough money to rebuild the fleet.”

Tyrion saw his sister make many mistakes, but now she had reached new heights. The words were as famous as: A Lannister always pays his debts. You couldn’t avoid to pay back the Iron Bank, or else they would make sure your enemies would defeat you by funding them. As for the Faith, it was a very bad idea to have problems with it. The Crown already had some problems with it after Ned Stark’s execution on the steps of the Great Sept of Baelor and the assassination of the High Septon during the riots. It wasn’t a good time to antagonize it. Tyrion remembered The History of the Decline and Fall of the Valyrian Freehold by Lord Eddard Gibbon. He wasn’t eager to live this theory.

“If I understand well, I must find money for the royal wedding and try to repair the damage my sister caused while she had me put into a cell.” That wasn’t a prospect that excited Tyrion.

“As long as you are here in King’s Landing,” completed his uncle.
“Very well. What about Cersei? I’m not paranoid like her, but it seems unlikely to me that Ser Osmund Kettleblack only tried to kill me for pleasure. He was a sellsword, and sellswords kill people when they are paid to do it. He received orders from someone.”

“I already questioned his two brothers, Osfryd and Osney. They claimed their innocence and said they knew nothing of all this, but I think it’s quite clear Cersei was behind this. Anyway, she tried to have you killed by Ser Mandon Moore before. I’m afraid she can no longer remain in King’s Landing, especially after Lancel’s revelations. I will send her away, out of King’s Landing, and she will never come back again.”

“Very well. Where do you plan to send her?”

“It depends on you. I was planning to send her to Casterly Rock, but you’re the lord now, so the decision is yours.”

Tyrion thought about it. He didn’t want Cersei near him any longer. She would only try to have him killed again. In fact, he wanted her as far from him as it was possible. “Uncle, I’m sorry, but I don’t want Cersei in Casterly Rock, nor in any place close to it. In fact, as long as I live, I will never allow her to set foot in the Westerlands. Send her where you want, but not on my lands.”

Kevan took a little instant to answer. Tyrion wondered if he would disagree. “Very well. This is your choice. I will probably send her to some bannerman castle in the Crownlands as a prolonged guest, along with a consequent guard to ensure her protection.”

Tyrion knew very well what it meant. The guard would be there more to make sure she wouldn’t leave her exile place than to really protect her. “I can’t agree more, Uncle. What about Lancel?”

Kevan’s face turned sour. “He confessed before more than a hundred people that he plotted to kill his king. I can still prevent Cersei from standing trial, but Lancel confessed his crime. I decided to send him to Quiet Isle, a community of brothers. I already talked to him about that, and he seems to approve the idea.”

Kevan remained silent for a moment afterwards. Tyrion never liked Lancel very much, but Kevan, even though he never was very close to Tyrion, always showed him respect. And he just recognized him as his liege lord. “I’m sorry, Uncle.” That was all Tyrion could say.

His uncle took some time before he cleared his throat again. “Tyrion, there is something else I must talk with you. I would have liked to not speak about it right now, but with the ceremony tomorrow I have no choice. I know you didn’t consummate your marriage yet.”

Tyrion has to sigh. Not again. “Uncle, I don’t want to discuss about it. Father tried to convince me to consummate the marriage before he died, and he failed. If you want to know, our arguments were mostly about this.”

“Tyrion.” His uncle looked at him directly in the eyes. “You are the Lord of Casterly Rock, now. The future of House Lannister rests on your shoulders. That also means you need an heir. You need a son to succeed you when you are dead. We’re not talking about getting the North anymore. We are talking about the very survival of our house.”

Tyrion had to admit Kevan was right. If he produced no heir, the name of the Lannisters could fade. On the other hand, he couldn’t just tell Sansa they needed to make a child so House Lannister wouldn’t disappear. And he wouldn’t force himself upon her. He swore to protect her.

“I’m sorry, Uncle. But I will not force Sansa to consummate our marriage as long as she doesn’t want.” Tyrion looked at his uncle with the most serious expression he could have. He wanted to make clear nothing his uncle would say would convince him to change his view on the matter.

“You don’t have to force her. You are married. You both have a duty toward each other as husband and wife. Anyway, from what I’ve seen, I don’t have the impression she would be so reluctant to consummate now. She cried and yelled at you out of despair when Ser Osmund tried to kill you and when you looked dead. She remained at your side all the time the maesters were treating you. When I went to your chambers to see how you were last evening she was praying at your side, and from what I know, she did it almost all the time we weren’t sure you would survive.”

Tyrion was agape at his uncle’s words. He didn’t know about Sansa’s reaction while he was close to death. Though, when he thought about it, he remembered hearing someone crying as he passed out after Ser Osmund’s attack. He also thought he remembered the back of his head bumping into something hard. He probably blacked out because his head hit the wooden bars of the box he was held in. Tyrion cleared his thoughts, coming back to reality.

“We were both forced to marry each other. I will not mistreat her. I think our family already caused her enough misery like that. It was already hard enough for her to marry me.”

“Then in this case you only have to marry someone else.”

“I’m not talking about having a second wife. I’m talking about choosing another one.” Kevan was very serious as he spoke, it was obvious. “If you say you don’t want of this marriage, we can get an annulment. The High Septon is on our side. You brought him yourself where he is. There is nothing preventing this since you didn’t consummate the marriage. You could be free to marry someone else afterwards.”

“Who would want to marry me? I don’t think Father never tried to arrange me a marriage, and from what I’ve seen he failed.” Tyrion was quite skeptical about being able to marry again if his marriage with Sansa was annulled.

“He tried half a dozen times, and you’re right, he failed,” recognized Kevan. “But the situation is different now. You are the Lord of Casterly Rock, one of the greatest lords of the Seven Kingdoms. Only among your bannermen there would be many who would be ready to give you one of their daughters. You could also look for important lords of the Reach or the Vale to strengthen our alliance with them. You can even look in the Riverlands, the Stormlands, or even Dorne or the North as far as I’m concerned, but you would have the choice. Only to have someone of their family as Lady of Casterly Rock, many lords would be ready to consider an offer to marry someone of their own family to you now.”

Tyrion thought about that. He always wanted to marry someone he loved and who loved him. Perhaps he had a chance to choose his wife. However, he highly doubted the women who would want to marry him would want out of love. He was still the Imp, the Halfman, the Demon Monkey. They would marry him for the title of Lady of the Westerlands, nothing more. Sansa, on the other side… Sansa wasn’t in love with him, but they had managed to find some balance before her brother and her mother died. They had managed to get along quite well, and from what Tyrion saw in the last days, she didn’t seem to be bothered so much by their marriage any longer. Furthermore, if Tyrion annulled their marriage, Sansa remained the key to the North. His uncle would marry her to someone else, probably one of Tyrion’s cousins. Tyrion put the cloak on her shoulders during the ceremony. He said the vows. He said them under constraint, but they were vows nonetheless. He couldn’t allow someone else to take her into his bed only in order to get the North. Furthermore, he didn’t want to shame her. If he obtained an annulment, what would people say about her? The disgraced wife of the Imp? And she would be forced to marry a Lannister all the same afterwards. Tyrion didn’t think this Lannister would treat her the way he did. Sansa wouldn’t be given any choice on her wedding night this time. No, Tyrion couldn’t do it. He swore to protect her.

“No,” he voiced aloud. “I will not disown Sansa.”

“We are not talking about disowning anyone. We are talking about annulling a marriage. A marriage neither of you wanted,” Kevan pointed out.

“In the eyes of everyone, it will be a disowning. And I will not allow you to marry Sansa off to someone else for her claim on the North. She already suffered enough because of us.”

Tyrion noticed an internal sigh in his uncle. “What happened to the girl was horrible, I concede it. I myself was horrified when I learned about the Twins, but it is done. If the girl wants to get her home back one day, she needs a child, just like you. And you need another child to ensure your succession.”

“Sansa is fifteen, nothing is urgent. She’s not close to her change like Cersei. And I’m not old like Jon Arryn when he married Lysa Tully. We have many years before us. There is no need for us to have children right now. We will have them when Sansa will feel ready.”

“And if she never feels ready? You will die without heir.” His uncle advanced arguments Tyrion couldn’t defeat. He knew there would be problems if Sansa never wanted children with him, but he couldn’t bring himself to set her aside. Not when things began to improve between them again. Kevan continued to talk. “I understand you may care for the girl, but you need to think about family before anything else.”

Tyrion sniggered. At his uncle’s words. He really rarely had an idea his brother didn’t have before him.

“That amuses you?” Kevan asked. He looked incredulous. Tyrion had the impression to have been in a situation much like this one before, but with his father.

“Yes, that amuses me, because that’s approximately what Father told me one day. The house that puts family first will always defeat the one that puts the whims and wishes of its sons and daughters first. A good man does everything in his power to better his family’s position regardless of his own selfish desires.”

“Your father was right.” Kevan looked quite sincere when he answered.

“Tell me, Uncle. If your brother had ordered you to rape Dorna for the good of House Lannister, would you have done it?”

Tyrion was well rewarded for his question by the look on his uncle’s face. His uncle was entirely frozen and didn’t make a single movement. Not a single muscle of his body was moving. Kevan didn’t expect such a question, and probably didn’t know what to answer. Tyrion knew his uncle loved his aunt Dorna. She was a gentle woman, always kind, who loved her children, needlework and flowers. She prayed even more often than Sansa. Tyrion started again to speak before Kevan’s confused expression.

“That’s what my father ordered me the evening before he died. He told me I had one last night to deflower Sansa, or else he would force me to do it during Joffrey’s wedding night. And the best thing he found to tell me after we learned about Robb and Catelyn Stark’s deaths was to remind me I had to put a child into Sansa, one way or another. I don’t think a man who married his own cousin and refused to marry again after she died was in position to tell me how to treat a wife he forced me to marry. Don’t tell me your brother married his wife for family. If he had married for family, he would have married another great lord’s daughter.”

It took a long time for Kevan to react to Tyrion’s tirade. He probably had a hard time to fully assimilate the question Tyrion asked him. Finally he spoke, very carefully. “I know that Tywin looked ruthless in your eyes, Tyrion, but he only was because he had to.”

“So you would have done it if he ordered you to rape your wife?”

Kevan didn’t answer, but Tyrion had a very good idea what was the answer, even though Kevan would never give it. Tyrion spoke again before the lack of answer.

“Then you understand me. Why did my father and my mother marry? Was it for family he did it?”

“The marriage between Tywin and Joanna had many advantages. It prevented any disagreement inside the family about how to act and reinforced the links between the members of House Lannister. Their marriage made our house more united than ever,” Kevan explained.

“Was it really the only reason?”

“No, not even the main,” finally conceded his uncle, lowering his eyes to look at the floor. “Your father and your mother married because they loved each other. And Tywin refused to marry someone else after she died because he loved her.”

Tyrion already believed it was the case. His uncle Gerion once told him his father never was the same after his mother’s death. “So, I am forced to marry someone I don’t want for family when my father decided to marry and to not marry against the best interests of the family.”

“You don’t have to, Tyrion. You can choose now. You can find yourself the wife you want. You only have to get an annulment and…”

“I already told you I won’t. Sansa is my wife and I will not disavow her. The matter is closed. She will be at my side tomorrow when Joffrey will acknowledge me in my titles, and I want Joffrey to acknowledge her at the same time Lady of Casterly Rock and Lady of the Westerlands, as well as Lady of Winterfell since she is after we killed all her family.”

“Tyrion! We cannot do that! It’s already difficult to get Joffrey to acknowledge you, so to acknowledge Sansa Stark! And her family was in war against ours not long ago. We cannot give her such a public recognition.”

“You will. Joffrey will acknowledge Sansa in all her titles. If you don’t see that he does it by himself, then I will ask him to do it before hundreds of people, and you’ll have to deal with the aftermath as Hand of the King.”

Tyrion knew his uncle had no choice. He couldn’t allow Joffrey to refuse publicly a demand from the Lord of Casterly Rock right after he acknowledged him. That would send a very bad message to all the other houses. They would think there were tensions between the Westerlands and the Crown. Finally, Kevan yielded.

“Very well. You are my lord, so I must obey. I’ll make sure Joffrey does it. You won’t have to ask for this. It could even help in the future when we’ll try to seize the North. And it will remind Roose Bolton he is only Warden of the North for the time being. But you should make sure your wife is dressed like a lady of House Lannister. After all, she is a Lannister now, and our first lady.”
“Very well, I’ll explain it to her. Thank you, Uncle.” Tyrion slowly left his seat to not hurt himself.
He didn’t think Sansa would enjoy to wear Lannister colors, but it was a small price to pay for her to become one of the greatest ladies of the Seven Kingdoms and to be recognized officially as the lady of her home. Before he left the room, his uncle told him one last thing.

“Tyrion. Don’t forget who you are now. House Lannister depends of you. My father loved us and was well intentioned, but he nearly brought our house to its ruin. Don’t make the same mistakes he did.”

Tyrion stopped. He knew very well what Kevan was talking about. He wasn’t a fool. He wasn’t trusting or ignorant like his grandfather.

“I’m not your father, Uncle.” As he started again to walk away, he added loudly. “But I am not my father either.”

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Shae
In this chapter, discover the fate of Shae after the trial.

The stench was poking her nose. It wasn’t entirely dark for now, so she guessed they had to be sometime during the day. All the same, there wasn’t much light. The floor was made of hard stone and covered with straw, and in some places the straw was quite wet. She had a good suspicion why it was wet, and she didn’t think it was because of water. She received two meals each day, essentially made of moldy bread and water. The water didn’t seem quite clean. There were insects everywhere. She had a wooden bucket for her natural needs, but from the traces around it she didn’t think it was entirely waterproof. They hadn’t changed it ever since she was brought here. The bed was mostly a wooden bench with straw on it, the same straw that was on the floor. After more than two days here, her dress was already dirty and tattered in a few places.

Shae had lived in places much less welcoming than this one, but she had to admit it was harder than before after nearly two years in comfort. However, that wasn’t what bothered her the most. What bothered her the most were the crude jokes she had to suffer from her jailors. Shae had heard this kind of things behind her for most of her life and she had learned with time to steel herself against them. She accepted them, knowing it was part of her job. However, now they hurt. They hurt even more than when she had begun. Everyone saw her as a whore again. That was the thing that hurt the most.

He says you’re only a whore. You’re not fit to bear his children. He cannot be in love with a whore. Your friendship is over. He needs to observe his vows to his wife. Everything Bronn told her had come back again and again in her head for more than a month. Every day, every hour, every minute the words came back. Shae hadn’t wanted to believe it at first, but Bronn had assured her they were true. He enjoyed his time with you, but now this time is over. She had slapped him before she let him accompany her on the ship. There, she had her own cabin with food, wine, a featherbed and all necessary furniture. Shae hadn’t left the cabin for the whole journey until they made a stop at Gulltown. There she had gone out of the ship. It would stay here for two days, so she had all the time she wanted. She had gone to an inn and drank ale. She needed it. As she drank and got drunk, a man approached her and made her some advances. In her state, Shae played the game from the bar to the bedchamber. They only did it once and the man gave her some money when she left. She was reminded of who she was. She was a whore. She had gone back to the ship for the night, and had cried, just like she did for most of the journey from King’s Landing.

When she had finally fallen into sleep, Shae didn’t find any rest. She dreamed every time she fell asleep. Mostly, she dreamed of her lion. He was everywhere. Sometimes she would make a beautiful dream where he fucked her just like the way he did when they were together. It was beautiful. So beautiful. Her lion had allowed her to feel real pleasure with a man for the first time in many years. Then she would awake and realize it was all over. And she would cry. Other times, she would dream of him saying she was only a whore, or insulting her. Then she would awake and cry again. Only this night, she made another dream, or a nightmare to be more precise. A dream of Tyrion and Sansa. These dreams were the worst ones. She couldn’t support them. She would dream of their wedding, of the time Tyrion announced it, about the times she surprised them to talk and even to laugh together, of the times Tyrion put his hand on hers. But that night had been horrible. For the first time, she had dreamed of both of them, together in the same bed, and she saw them together right before her. Both had an expression of extreme pleasure as they came together. Shae wanted to scream in despair, but she was mute in this nightmare. She had to watch until the very end. And they made it again, and again, and again, all before her eyes. Everything Tyrion once did to her, he was doing it to Sansa. And everything Shae once did to Tyrion, Sansa was doing it to him, and Shae had never seen him so happy. She had woken up screaming so much like a demon than the captain of the ship had come to see if everything was alright.

When the ship sailed for Pentos, Shae wasn’t on it. She was already on another ship for King’s Landing. Despair had turned into anger. She wanted her revenge. She had allowed herself to fall in love with Tyrion. She had given him everything she had, and he betrayed her, rejected her… for a child. Shae didn’t want to hate Sansa. She knew the girl had nothing to see with that. She was forced to marry Tyrion. She had had no choice. But Tyrion had a choice… and he made it. He was a pervert. He wanted her. This child! Ever since the beginning, he had wanted Sansa. All his words that he had no choice, that he still loved Shae, they were lies. All were lies. Shae would make him pay for that. She would make sure he would feel everything he made her feel.

When she had arrived in King’s Landing, Shae had gone immediately to the queen. She knew Cersei was dangerous, but they had the same objective at this moment: make Tyrion suffer. The queen had accepted Shae’s testimony against Tyrion, but at the condition she would add the plot Tyrion and Sansa prepared. Shae had been reluctant first. She only wanted to tell people what a horrible man Tyrion was, but she never wanted to bring false proofs that he poisoned Tywin Lannister, even less to say that Sansa participated in the plan. But she complied at the end, for a promise she would marry a knight and receive all the gold Tyrion promised her when she began to work for him. Anyway, Shae had the insurance that Sansa wouldn’t be hurt or endangered in any way. What Shae would say about her wouldn’t cause her any problem. That would cause problems to Tyrion, but Shae didn’t care. He would have what he deserved.

Shae had testified against Tyrion during the trial, saying everything she told to Cersei and everything Cersei told her to say. When Tyrion asked her to stop, she reminded him who she was. I am a whore. Remember? She made him suffer as much as he made her suffer. When Sansa shouted at the end of her testimony, Shae didn’t look at her. She wanted to tell her she would be safe soon enough, but she couldn’t, not in front of so much people. She didn’t want anything wrong to happen to Sansa, but at this moment she couldn’t reassure her. She wished she had been able to see Sansa before the trial to explain her everything, but of course Cersei wouldn’t allow her to do so. In fact, Cersei couldn’t allow Shae to do anything after she was confined to her rooms. Shae wasn’t even present during the whole trial. She only came for her testimony. She spent all her time in Qyburn’s chambers, deep inside the Red Keep, unable to leave them. This man was frightening, even for Shae who didn’t fear many things. He made strange experiments in what he called his laboratory, and the few times Shae talked to him, he was looking at her with an interesting look, but not in the way a man would be interested by a woman. He looked at her like he looked at the other strange creatures he had in his rooms.

Shae was brought out of Qyburn’s rooms the day she testified against Tyrion. After the trial, Cersei sent her to some room close to hers. It was small, but comfortable with enough food and a modest featherbed. However, the next day, some Lannister guards came to her room and brought her to this cell. It had been three days ago. Ever since she had stayed there, enduring the bad jokes of the men who guarded her. Shae hadn’t understood what was going on until Lord Varys came to see her in the night. He was disguised as a gaoler, but Shae recognized him after a moment. He brought her some fresh food and water, and bad news.

Apparently, the second day of the trial was horrible. Most of Cersei’s witnesses saw their testimonies torn into pieces by Tyrion’s witnesses, and Shae was the one to suffer the most. Several people demonstrated her testimony was constituted of lies. Margaery Tyrell the future queen, Bronn, a whore named Daisy, Podrick, even Sansa proved Shae lied. The eunuch confessed he highlighted some of her lies himself. Shae couldn’t believe it. Bronn had always been kind with her, even when he accompanied her to the ship. As for Varys, she felt a little bit betrayed by someone who came from the same continent than her and always was pleasant to speak with. But what hurt her the most was that Sansa testified against her. Varys had left after he told her everything about the trial.

The following night, he came again to tell her Tyrion had been cleared of all his charges. Shae was angry Tyrion escaped, but her behavior changed all of a sudden when Varys told her someone tried to kill him. Instantly, Shae forgot everything that happened during the past months. She even forgot how Tyrion rejected her. Varys described the assassination attempt by Osmund Kettleblack. Shae regretted Bronn had killed this son of a whore. She would have liked to kill him herself. He tried to kill her lion. Shae realized quite quickly Cersei was behind this. She would rip out her eyes from her head as soon as she would see her again. Shae was relieved when Varys told her Tyrion would survive. The only consequence of all this would be another scar on his chest. She thought immediately how it would be to caress his new scar once she would see him again.

However, everything that followed crushed all her hopes. Varys told her everything about Sansa’s role during the trial. She convinced several people to testify for Tyrion and organized his whole defense. She gave an impressive concluding speech that let everyone bewildered in the court. Varys himself recognized she surprised him. She had Lancel Lannister confess his whole affair with the queen, humiliating and neutralizing Cersei in the process. It was revealed to everyone that Cersei tried to have Tyrion killed during the Battle of Blackwater. Varys also described Sansa’s reaction when Tyrion was attacked. He told Shae how Sansa remained at Tyrion’s side while the maesters took care of his injuries and how she stayed with him all the time he was unconscious, praying for him as far as Varys knew.

When Varys had left her two days ago, Shae’s mind had been in turmoil. What he said about Tyrion and Sansa made Shae sink into despair once again. All her hatred for her lion disappeared all of a sudden. She realized this night what she had done. She had spoken against the man she loved. She conspired with Cersei to have him killed. She didn’t realize it. Shae had only wanted to take her revenge on Tyrion for sending her away. She never really wanted him to die. She didn’t think about it. She loved him. What had she done? She should have been there to defend him, to protect him, to watch over him as he was accused of false crimes. Instead she testified against him. She helped his bitch sister. Why did she do that? He never loved you. You were always only a whore in his eyes. That’s what you’ll always be. Unless you do what is necessary to not be. The only way for that is to destroy the people who see you that way, beginning by those who lied to you when they said you were no whore. There’s no justice in this world, not unless we make it. Make your own justice. The words she heard at Gulltown came back to her mind. What had she done? She tried to have Tyrion killed when she should have done anything to save him. Instead, Sansa saved him. She did everything Shae should have done. She was standing by Tyrion’s side as he was close to death when Shae should have been by his side, just like she did after the Battle of Blackwater. A truth imposed itself to Shae’s mind.

She loves him. Shae couldn’t believe it. She couldn’t accept it. Sansa had fallen in love with Tyrion. That was impossible. And yet she did. All her behavior, all her actions Varys talked about were proof of that. She had fallen in love with Shae’s lion. Shae had cried all the night. The bad dreams had come again in her sleep. She saw Sansa and Tyrion together in the same bed again, just like this night on the ship. She had cried and screamed so much. She had lost him. She had lost her lion. He was no longer hers. He belonged to Sansa now.

Varys had come again yesterday. As soon as he entered Shae asked him how Tyrion was. Varys assured her he was alright and out of danger. When Shae asked to see him, Varys told her it was impossible.

“You just testified against him. You told lies before the court after you swore by all the gods your testimony would be true and honest. You committed perjury and everyone knows it now. You are no longer safe here in King’s Landing. I must send you to Pentos as we agreed before.”

Shae didn’t want to go to Pentos. “I won’t. I’m not going to leave him alone. My place is here with Tyrion. He needs me.”

“I’m afraid he doesn’t,” answered Lord Varys. He looked regretful. “I’m sorry, my lady, but I told you it would never be your home. A foreign girl with no name cannot spend her life with the son of Tywin Lannister. Tyrion Lannister is now the Lord of Casterly Rock.”

“Then in this case he can do whatever he wants. He can protect me. I can live with him.”

“You just told lies about him and tried to have him killed. Even if he wanted to see you, he wouldn’t. He has a wife. A wife who just saved him and who stays at his side day and night since he’s been injured. He will never see you again, if only to not indispose her. And the Lady of Casterly Rock won’t ever let you be in our mutual friend’s company now that she knows about you. You betrayed her as well. I’m afraid you will never see Lord Tyrion again. You should have gone to Pentos and never come back.”

Shae was utterly destroyed by Varys’s words. She would never see her lion again. She could never apologize. He would end in Sansa’s arms. “He said I was a whore. He forced me to leave. He set me aside for Sansa. She’s only a child.” Anger pierced through her voice as she allowed her frustration to escape.

“Do you really think it was true? Do you really think he believed you were only a whore after everything that happened between you two? If he told you this, it was because the queen had discovered who you were. He didn’t think a single word of what he had Bronn tell you. But he wanted you to believe it so you would leave and never come back. He did it to save you.”

No. That couldn’t be true. “Why didn’t he tell me the truth? Nothing of this would have happened. I would never have come back for revenge.”

“It’s true. You would never have come back. Because you would have refused to leave. You would have stayed here to fight his sister. And you would have died. That’s why he lied. He wanted you to believe he didn’t love you anymore in order to save you, because he loved you. And he still loves you, I’m quite sure of that, but you’ll never be able to be at his side now.”

Shae burst into tears. “No. No. No.”

She repeated the word again and again. Varys left. She remained there, crying for who knows how much time. And here she was now, dirty and smelling after three days here, waiting for her departure. Shae had no more illusions now. She would leave King’s Landing very soon and would spend the rest of her life in Pentos. She wondered what she would do there. There was only one thing Shae knew to do, and she didn’t want to do it anymore. She wanted a normal life. She had always wanted a normal life. She had thought she found this normal life when she realized she loved Tyrion, but then he had to marry someone else and Shae had to watch her lion fall in love with his bride. What would she make of her life now?

Shae heard the key turning in the lock of her door’s cell. She went to a corner and turned her back on the door. She didn’t want to see Varys and his sorry face. She wanted to be alone. The door creaked as it opened and closed behind the intruder. He didn’t speak immediately and Shae didn’t give him the time to speak with his soft voice.

“Leave me alone. Only come back to tell me when it’s time to leave,” Shae gloomily told him. She didn’t grant him a glance.

“It’s time for you to leave, but before I need answers.”

Shae knew this voice. It wasn’t Varys. She turned her head to face her friend. Sansa was standing there, clad in her purple gown. Her hair were braided and fell behind her back. She was clean, in excellent physical condition and health, all dressed and washed. She was everything Shae wasn’t right now.

“Sansa! I’m glad to see you…”

“You will not speak unless I allow you. I want answers, and the truth this time. No lies.”

Sansa cut Shae as she spoke. Her eyes were hard and merciless. She wasn’t looking at Shae as she used to when Shae was at her service. She was staring at her with anger, not flinching a single moment. Shae hadn’t only lost the man she loved. She had lost Sansa, her friend.

“Why?” There was no need for Shae to ask Sansa to specify her question. She was well aware what her ancient mistress wanted to know. The Lorathi woman started her explanations.

“I never wanted to testify against you, I swear,” began Shae. “The queen threatened to kill me if I didn’t. I had no choice.”

“Was it your choice to come back to King’s Landing after you left?” Shae couldn’t answer to this.

“Then it was your choice. What were you expecting of Cersei? And I know you were promised a marriage with a knight and gold to testify, so don’t tell me you only did it out of fear. You betrayed me. And you betrayed Tyrion as well.”

“He sent me away!” Shae yelled.

“For your own safety. Bronn and Podrick told me everything. You had the chance to go to Essos and to have a good life. Instead you came back to spread lies about my husband.” Shae was hurt to hear Sansa call Tyrion “her husband”. Sansa was looking at her with fury and disgust. She never looked at Shae this way before. Sansa continued to talk.

“If I was Cersei you would already be dead. But you’re lucky, I’m not Cersei. You leave in an hour. Lord Varys organized another transport for you to Pentos. I suggest this time you never come back. Because if you ever set foot again in Westeros, I’ll have your head. And you’ll never see Tyrion again. He’s my husband now. We’re both done with you.”

Sansa turned around and knocked on the door. As the guards were unlocking it, Shae decided she had to tell her the truth.

“I told you to not trust him. Men only want one thing from a pretty girl. You really thought he wanted to help you only for your mother. You should ask Tyrion. He told me only an idiot would trust him.”
Sansa turned again to face Shae, a questioning look on her face. “What are you talking about?”

“Who do you think convinced me to come back? That wasn’t my idea. I met him at Gulltown. He told me he was planning to smuggle you out of King’s Landing. That’s why I accepted to talk against you at the trial. I thought you wouldn’t be there to face the consequences. He was going to get you out of here.”

“Who are you talking about? Who tried to get me out of King’s Landing?” Sansa really was stupid right now. Shae had to sigh.

“A man who claims he loved your mother. I think you know who I’m talking about.”

Sansa was looking at her with an unbelieving face. The door was opened behind her. After a moment, Sansa composed herself again. “You leave in an hour. Bronn will come to escort you to your ship. Guards will make sure you won’t come back again.” Sansa left the cell. As the door shut, Shae yelled one last warning for her.

“Don’t trust him! Don’t trust anybody!”

Shae hoped Sansa believed what she told her. It was the truth. She had met him in Gulltown. He convinced her to come back to the capital to take her revenge on Tyrion. Without him, she would have continued her journey to Pentos and nothing of all this would have happened. With some luck, she helped Sansa one last time with her words. If Sansa didn’t believe her, then Shae didn’t know what would happen to her.

An hour later, Bronn arrived to escort her. Shae was brought to a ship that looked much like the one she took the last time. She had her own cabin with the same commodities than the last time. With all the dirt she had on her, she took a quick bath. She felt much better afterwards. Bronn stayed with her until the ship left. She didn’t hate the sellsword’s company. They drank some wine Shae had in the cabin. She recognized it when she tasted it. It was one of Tyrion’s favourites. She put her cup aside.

“So, this time you’re leaving for good,” said Bronn out of nowhere. Shae didn’t look back at him. “Did you really think it was forever? Those people are highborn. We are lowborn in their eyes. They can be good highborn people, but they still see us as lowborn all the same. When they throw us away, we must adapt.” Shae heard Bronn sigh, but she didn’t look at him either. “Things could be worse. We both made a good way since I brought you to his tent in the Riverlands. You’re going to have a good life in Pentos, a very comfortable one, and I am going to marry some lady and have a title. We managed to improve our situation quite well. Perhaps that’s not what we would like in a perfect world, but it’s still better than what we had before. And the world is not perfect. Just remember this: Never fall in love again. It only makes us suffer.”

Shae agreed with Bronn that her situation was still better than before she met Tyrion, but for her it was small solace. Shae had wanted to live with Tyrion ever since she realized she loved him. But she wouldn’t. She couldn’t come back a second time. She had no future with her lion now. His future was with Sansa. However, Bronn’s last words made her curious. She looked at him.

“Have you ever been in love?”

The sellsword took his time to answer. “No. But I saw my eldest brother fall in love and die for it. We lived on a farm. He was many years older than me, a real man. The only one to protect me and my sister from our parents. But one day, he made the mistake to fall in love with the wife of a neighbor. They would meet during the day or in the night, hoping the husband wouldn’t know about it, but after some time, he discovered he was cheated. He called all his family and they came one morning to gut us all. They killed my brother first, then my parents. I wasn’t bothered at all they killed my parents, they were horrible people, but my brother… And then, they raped my sister, and killed her when they were done. I barely managed to escape. The husband’s sister… what a woman she was! She swung an axe at me when I tried to escape. I dodged it and planted a knife in her belly. My first kill. I was only ten. I left the farm and never came back. I became a sellsword. That was my only way to survive.”

Shae remained silent after Bronn was done with his story, but he wasn’t done talking yet. “That’s why I decided to never fall in love. If my brother hadn’t fallen in love with this woman, who knows, life could have been different for me. You know that when Tyrion learned he would have to marry the Stark girl, I told him he could keep you if he wanted you. He only had to wed the Stark girl and to bed you. He would have two women and a kingdom. He only answered he would have two women to despise him and a kingdom to join them. I warned him he was wasting time trying to get people to love him, and that he would end up the most popular dead man in town that way. He didn’t listen, and he nearly ended up dead.”

Shae didn’t want to talk about that. She had nothing to say about it. The matter was over now. Tyrion would live with Sansa and have children with her, not with Shae. Her heart was bleeding at the thought.

“Do you think he loves her?” Shae was quite sure Tyrion was interested in Sansa. Who wouldn’t? Shae wasn’t blind. Sansa was very beautiful, and would only get more beautiful with every year that passed. Shae, on the other hand, had her best years behind her. She was twenty-four. Sansa could give to Tyrion everything Shae couldn’t provide him. As for what Shae could give to her lion, Sansa could offer him the same things, but better. Shae only had her experience to distinguish her from Sansa in Tyrion’s eyes, and she was quite sure this difference would disappear with time once Tyrion and Sansa shared the same bed. But she needed to know if Tyrion loved Sansa.

Bronn shrugged. “Who knows? I hope he doesn’t, for his own sake. The girl is quite pretty, no one can say the contrary. I guess it depends if he still sees her as a child. If you saw her during the trial, you wouldn’t say she’s a child anymore. Tomorrow she and Tyrion will be acknowledged by the king as Lord and Lady of Casterly Rock and as many other things. The boy will even recognize the young girl as Lady of Winterfell. That will be quite a change compared to the beating. But I think the girl is at least about to fall in love with him. You don’t make a defense like that for your husband when his family killed yours, unless you feel something for him.”

They heard shouts outside. They were preparing to sail. Bronn laid his cup on the table and raised. “It’s been a pleasure to know you, my lady. Be happy in your new life.”

“Do you think I should forget him?” Shae didn’t know what to do. Should she forget Tyrion? She asked the question to Bronn. The sellsword looked at her with a sad expression.

“You can try, but I tried to forget my brother and my sister, and I never succeeded. I guess we can never forget the people we love. Another reason to not fall in love. Once we do, there’s no way to get rid of it. We have it for life, and we must learn to live with it.” Bronn patted her shoulder. “Enjoy the life in Pentos.”

After Bronn left, Shae remained alone in her cabin. After a moment, she felt the ship moving, leaving the harbor. She went to the window and looked at King’s Landing one last time as it disappeared on the horizon. Shae had thought for some time it was her home, but it wasn’t. It wasn’t meant to be her home. During all the trip, she felt she was getting farther and farther from her love each hour. They made a stop at Gulltown again, but this time Shae didn’t leave her cabin. She didn’t want to take the risk to meet Baelish again. When they arrived at Pentos, she began her new life. Her new life without her lion.
Chapter End Notes

From now on, I will publish two chapters each week instead of three like before. My chapters are getting longer and I don't have as much time as I used to, but the fic will go on, don't worry.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
She stood alone on the docks in the middle of the afternoon, holding a necklace with blue amethysts in her right hand. I don’t have anything else left. That’s all. Take it. Wear it. Let my name have one more moment in the sun before it disappears from the world. She trusted Ser Dontos, and he betrayed her for gold. Sansa had a very hard time with everything that had happened. So many people she thought she could trust turned on her these last times. Ser Dontos. Shae. Lord Baelish. Now Sansa found herself stupid to have trusted a man who owned half the brothels in King’s Landing. She thought she could trust him only because he once loved her mother. Now she knew the whole truth.

Sansa had gone to see Shae yesterday when the Master of Whisperers told her he would send the young woman to Pentos for good. Sansa wasn’t sure if she could trust Varys, but he led her to Lancel. You’re not looking at the right place, Lady Sansa. You must search the army of wolves. Lancel Lannister accused her brother of slaughtering thousands of men with an army of wolves the day she was beaten by Ser Meryn. It took some time for Sansa to understand what Varys meant, but when Sansa learned that Ser Lancel came to King’s Landing with his father, she thought it might be the meaning of the Spider’s words. She went to discuss with Lancel and convinced him to testify about the day she was beaten. After a few conversations, Lancel came to tell her everything. He wanted so much to atone for his sins that Sansa managed to convince him to tell everything not only about that day, but also about his relationship with Cersei and his role in Robert Baratheon’s death. All the same, Varys was so mysterious that Sansa couldn’t decide to trust him without doubt.

The Master of Whisperers had wanted to know if Sansa wished to have one last discussion with her former handmaiden. Sansa hesitated, but finally she decided to confront Shae about her betrayal. But she didn’t expect what Shae told her. Who do you think convinced me to come back? That wasn’t my idea. I met him at Gulltown. He told he was planning to smuggle you out of King’s Landing. That’s why I accepted to talk against you at the trial. I thought you wouldn’t be there to face the consequences. He was going to get you out of here. A man who claims he loved your mother. I think you know who I’m talking about. Of course Sansa knew who Shae was talking about: Littlefinger.

Sansa had frozen when she realized who Shae had been talking about. Ser Dontos told her when he tried to kidnap her. I’m taking you to your friend, no matter what you say. Lord Baelish told her she could be sure he was her friend. And of course he had the means to pay Ser Dontos handsomely. He was in the Vale of Arryn now. He could get Sansa out by ship. That was how he left King’s Landing. He convinced Shae to come back and testify against Tyrion. It was possible that he met her in Gulltown. After all, the city was part of the Vale of Arryn. However, Sansa hadn’t been sure. Shae told so many lies at the trial. How could Sansa be sure her former friend wasn’t lying again?
She had gone to see Tyrion and reported him Shae’s words. Tyrion looked quite surprised when Sansa revealed him everything Shae told her, but it didn’t last long. He then revealed to Sansa everything Littlefinger did while her father was in King’s Landing. He made her father believe the gold cloaks were on his side when he tried to arrest Joffrey and Cersei, and then turned Janos Slynt and his men against him. All her father’s household members were slaughtered because of him. Even worse, Lord Baelish was at the origin of the war between the Lannisters and the Starks. Her brother Bran was victim of an assassination attempt at Winterfell a few days after she left with Arya and her father. The assassin died, but he had a very expansive dagger on him, too expansive for a common footpad. Littlefinger told her mother the dagger was his, but that he lost it against Tyrion. Tyrion swore he never tried to kill her brother, and that he never saw the dagger before her mother showed it to him. Furthermore, Baelish claimed Tyrion won it by betting on Ser Loras against his brother Jaime during a tournament for Joffrey’s name day, and Tyrion never bet against his brother.

Sansa had feared the worst for a moment. What if Tyrion really tried to kill her brother? But as she thought about it, it didn’t make sense for her. Tyrion himself had nothing against Bran, and Sansa couldn’t imagine Tyrion trying to kill a ten-years-old boy. She couldn’t even remember him ordering someone’s death when he was Hand of the King. He exiled Janos Slynt for murdering babies. Furthermore, Sansa had crossed the path of Ser Jaime this morning and asked him about the gamble’s habits of his brother. Ser Jaime confirmed that Tyrion never bet against him. Sansa was quite persuaded now that Lord Baelish lied about the dagger. The lie led to Tyrion’s arrest by her mother, which started the war between their two families. Sansa still wondered why Lord Baelish lied to her mother. Tyrion suspected Littlefinger wanted a war. The war had been very good for him after all. He was now a great lord and about to marry the Lady of the Vale, Sansa’s aunt Lysa Arryn. That made him the acting Lord of the Vale. As for his attempt to kidnap Sansa, Tyrion thought it could be explained perhaps by her aunt’s will to see Sansa safe, but he doubted it since she did nothing to help Sansa’s family during the war. Or Baelish and the Lady Arryn wanted to get their hands on her because she was the key to the North. Tyrion admitted he didn’t know what game Littlefinger was playing, but he was obviously playing a game for his own benefit.

Sansa had to admit Tyrion’s theories were quite plausible. After all, her aunt Lysa didn’t lift a finger to help her family at any moment in the war. Perhaps she felt remorse and wanted to save Sansa since she was the last child of her sister still alive, but the coincidence with Lord Baelish’s attitude was very strange. Also, why so much mystery? Why didn’t she only have Ser Dontos say that her aunt wanted to bring her to safety? And if her aunt allied herself with Baelish after everything he did… It was very complicated. Sansa didn’t know what to believe for sure. But now she knew she couldn’t trust Petyr Baelish. And if her aunt Lysa was working with him now, whether she knew about his schemes or not, Sansa couldn’t trust her in any occasion. She really had to choose her friends more carefully. She tightened the necklace in her hand, allowing anger to grow in her. They tried to use her. Just like the Tyrells they were only interested in her for her claim, except Margaery. Sansa threw the necklace into the water and watched it flood as it sank deep into the bay. She knew better who to trust now.

Sansa turned on her heels and left the extremity of the docks to join Mira who was waiting for her. Sansa hoped she didn’t make a mistake by trusting her. Who else would betray her? Brienne? Mira? Margaery? Tyrion? The thought that he could betray brought her close to despair for a moment, but Sansa recovered quickly. She didn’t see why Tyrion would betray her. He risked his life for hers more than once when nothing obliged him to do it. He had no interest in saving her from Joffrey or to protect her from him before they were married. He was forced to marry her as much as she was forced to marry him. And he never gave her a single reason to doubt about his loyalty. Tyrion wouldn’t betray her, and he wasn’t using her. If he really acted for personal interests with her, Sansa wouldn’t be a virgin right now. She chased the idea from her head. She reached Mira.

“My lady,” Mira said as she bowed her head.
“Mira, I think you can call me by my name now. You’re more a friend than a handmaiden to me.”

“My lady, I don’t think it would be appropriate. Even less now that you’re the Lady of Casterly Rock.”

Sansa looked straight in Mira’s eyes. “Mira, I order you to call me by my name, at least when we are alone.” Sansa folded her hands before her as she spoke, a serious expression on her face that let no place to discussion. That was a posture she developed recently for when she gave an order and wanted to make it clear it wasn’t to be questioned.

Mira gave an acknowledging sign of head. “As you wish, Sansa.”

Sansa smiled at her friend and took her arm under her own as they walked back to her chambers. Sansa didn’t have to fear any disapproving look now. She and Mira were no longer outcasts in the Red Keep after Cersei’s demise. Ser Kevan had recognized the royal decree Tyrion delivered before his arrest that made the Forresters the only ironwood suppliers of the Crown. The fact both of them testified for Tyrion at the trial only enhanced their public image. And even without all this, Mira was now officially a handmaiden in service of the new Lady of Casterly Rock.

Sansa still had some difficulty to accept this new situation. Only this morning, two ladies of the Westerlands went to her as she walked to the docks to ask her for the privilege to sew with her. One of them was the wife of Lord Desmond Crakehall, who Sansa remembered for laughing at her and Tyrion while they walked in the gardens. That was the entire opposite of the situation Sansa knew not long after her father’s arrest. Back then, people who used to speak with her avoided her at all cost. Now, people who mocked her or Tyrion suddenly tried to get her attention. She had been surprised by the welcome Margaery’s entourage gave her yesterday when she visited her friend. They welcomed her with open arms, just like in the time she thought she would marry Ser Loras. Even more surprising, they treated her with more respect than Sansa ever expected from them. Before her marriage with Tyrion, Margaery’s cousins and friends talked to her as if she was one of them and a friend like another, but now they talked to her as if Sansa was superior to them. Since Sansa was now one of the greatest ladies in the Seven Kingdoms, she guessed it wasn’t unusual, but she still found it very strange that people’s behavior toward her changed so quickly. She would have to be careful with that. Some would try to take advantage of her by trying to gain her trust, pretending to be her friends only to get a favor.

On their way back to her chambers, Sansa and Mira were approached by three other people. Ser Addam Marbrand, the Commander of the City Watch, mainly wished her a good day but also asked subtly if she couldn’t convince her husband to send him back on the battlefields instead of keeping him in King’s Landing. Another lady of a lesser branch of House Lannister asked her if she would allow her daughter to become Sansa’s handmaiden. A squire of some knight asked her if she would grant his master the honor to dance with him during the ceremony in a few hours. Sansa felt overwhelmed when she and Mira finally got into her chambers. She didn’t know what to do with all this unwanted attention. She was also uncomfortable now that everyone called her Lady Lannister. She didn’t know how to feel about the fact she was the first lady of the family who slaughtered hers. She knew that would happen if Tyrion survived the trial, but she never really thought about its implications before now. She focused so much on getting Tyrion not guilty that she couldn’t think about anything else at this moment. Now she didn’t know what to do anymore. She never wanted to be the Lady of Casterly Rock. But now she was. She remembered Margaery told her she had to make the best of her circumstances. Sansa was no longer bothered very much by the fact Tyrion was her husband. She had come to appreciate him very much, even more after she saw him about to die at the end of the trial. She wanted him to live at all cost. But it bothered her to bear the name of the Lannisters and to be their lady. She guessed she would have to live with it. And she preferred to be the Lady Lannister if that meant Tyrion could be the Lord of Casterly Rock instead to have Cersei at the head of this family.

Sansa sat in her chair close to her boudoir. She had to prepare for the ceremony that would take place in two hours. Joffrey would acknowledge her and Tyrion in all their lands and titles, including the title of Lady of Winterfell for her. Sansa still had some difficulty to believe it was true. Of course it was just a title. The Boltons were still holding the North, and she would only get back Winterfell once she would have a son, and the North once this son would come of age… if she ever had a son. Sansa didn’t know if she wanted to give herself to Tyrion. The thought of being intimate with him frightened her. Perhaps that was stupid. They were married. One day or another, Sansa knew they would have to do their duty. Tyrion was always kind with her. He swore to protect her and to never hurt her, and respected his promises. In fact, he respected them in circumstances where anyone else wouldn’t respect them. Even when they slept together, he did nothing. He didn’t even touch her. In fact, Sansa was touching him more than he did. She was laying her head against his arm every night since the end of the trial. She wanted to be sure he was there and that no one would try to take him from her again as Cersei did this cursed morning. She was afraid someone else would try to kill him. She didn’t want him to die. Sansa noticed she slept much better this way.

“Sansa, there is something I would like to talk to you about.” Mira’s voice drew Sansa out of her thoughts. She turned to face her friend.

“Of course. What is it?”

Mira took some time before she answered. “When we visited Lady Margaery and her friends yesterday, she asked me if I wanted to come back into her service. I didn’t give her an answer, I wanted to know your opinion about it.”

“Do you want to be Margaery’s handmaiden again?” Sansa was somewhat afraid of Mira’s answer. She was the closest person she had for a friend here in King’s Landing, except Tyrion perhaps.

“My lady… Sansa, I appreciate very much to be your handmaiden, and to be honest I don’t want to leave your service, but with the royal decree about my family, I am the only one left to serve as intermediate between the Crown and the Whitehills when they will try to sell ironwood. And if I want my family to be reinstated in Ironrath one day, I need to be present in the capital, and I will need Lady Margaery’s support when she will be queen. I cannot go to Casterly Rock. And I still have many friends among Lady Margaery’s retinue.”

Sansa was sad at the idea to see Mira leave her service. The northern girl had become a very close friend during these past weeks. She was one of the few people whose loyalty Sansa was sure of. Mira was loyal to the death. Even after Margaery removed her, she never said a single word against her. Sansa could tell her deepest and most secret thoughts without fearing Mira to divulge them to anybody. She was quite alike Brienne on this aspect, but to the opposite of Sansa’s sworn shield, Mira was clever, intelligent and pragmatic. She helped Sansa a lot in preparing Tyrion’s defense. She was at the same time Sansa’s handmaiden, friend, confident, and advisor. And Mira was a Northerner just like Sansa. She could understand what Sansa felt. Sansa would miss her. But she had to admit Mira was right. It was in her interest to remain here in King’s Landing. In some way, the royal decree forced her to stay here. Sansa wanted to re-establish her family in Winterfell someday. She couldn’t blame Mira for wishing the same for her own. She couldn’t force her friend to follow her at Casterly Rock.

“It’s alright, Mira. I understand. But know that if you ever are in trouble, or if you ever want to leave Margaery’s service, I’ll have a place for you. I would only want you to remain at my side until I leave.”

“Of course, my lady. Thank you,” Mira said with a grateful smile.
“It’s Sansa.” She felt like Margaery telling to call her by her name. “Now, let’s prepare for the ceremony. It will take place soon.”

For the two following hours, Sansa prepared for the upcoming ceremony with Mira’s help. She took a bath, put lemon perfume at several places on her body (behind her ears, under her chin, on the back of her neck), and let Mira adjust her gown. It was a red gown with golden lion symbols at the hem. The gown needed several adjustments before it fitted with Sansa’s body. She suspected it was a gown that previously belonged to Cersei. She hated to wear something the Queen Regent wore before, but she had no choice. Tyrion had explained to her she would have to wear the Lannister colors on this occasion. They probably didn’t have enough time to make a red gown with her measurements. Sansa could do with the color, but she would get rid of this gown as soon as the ceremony was over. Which meant she would have to wait a long time since there would be a feast afterwards. Mira then braided her hair in a very complex way similar to her headdress during her wedding. Finally came the most important part for Sansa, and the most simple. Mira put the necklace around Sansa’s neck. Sansa remembered who she was. She was a Stark hidden under Lannister colors. She was a wolf disguised as a lion.

Sansa looked at her image in the glass. She had to admit she was beautiful, just like for her wedding. But to be honest, to the opposite of her wedding, she was quite happy for this day. Joffrey would acknowledge her as Lady of Winterfell. She had mixed feelings about being the Lady of Casterly Rock, but she jubilated at the idea people would all know she was the true heir to Winterfell. The door opened at this moment and Tyrion entered. He wore red clothes as well and looked taller in them. Sansa thought, to her own surprise, that he looked quite handsome like this.

“Lady Sansa. Lady Mira.” Tyrion said their names with a smile for both of them, but Sansa thought she saw something different in his eyes when he looked at her. They seemed to shine for a moment.

“You’re very handsome, Tyrion.” She told something like that before their wedding, only this time it wasn’t only a courtesy.

“Oh, yes. The lord of your dreams. But you do look glorious, as usual.” Tyrion said it with a grin and Sansa had to chuckle lightly. It looked so much like a repetition of their wedding day. Mira didn’t let escape a sound, but Sansa felt she was smiling. “Lady Mira, would you leave me alone with my wife a moment.”

“Of course, Lord Tyrion. Lady Sansa.” With a bow to both of them, Mira left the room. Tyrion watched her leave and turned to face Sansa again when she was gone.

“Well, here we are.”

“Yes. Here we are.” Sansa could only repeat the words of her husband. They both understood what it meant.

“I guess you didn’t expect to become the Lady of House Lannister a few months later when we were wed.” Sansa nodded her head to show she didn’t. That looked so unbelievable. She had gone from a ward of the king to the Lady of the Westerlands within a few months. She would never have expected that. “Sansa, I would need to speak with you about something before we go to the ceremony. I should have talked to you about it before. Perhaps we could sit.”

Sansa agreed and they sat at the table where they took so many of their meals together. Tyrion took some time before he talked.

“Sansa, tell me, how do you feel about all this?” he asked her.
“About what?”

“About being my wife, and the Lady of House Lannister. I know you must probably not like it to be the first lady of the family who destroyed yours.

Sansa didn’t really know what to answer. Her thoughts about this question were unclear even for herself. “I don’t know.” That was all she could say. “But I know I have no choice. I won’t disappoint you,” she added quickly.

Tyrion chuckled. “I don’t think you could. Especially after the way you rescued me. You were impressive.” Sansa’s face reddened a little. She looked down. “But you are wrong about one thing. You do have a choice.”

Sansa looked up at Tyrion. He continued to speak. “My uncle proposed, or more precisely advised me yesterday to annul our marriage. It’s possible since we didn’t consummate it and the High Septon is on our side.”

That wasn’t something Sansa expected. Their marriage could be annulled. “What did you tell him?”

“ Mostly, to go to hell. I refused. I even ordered him to force Joffrey to acknowledge you as Lady of Casterly Rock and Winterfell today. It wasn’t planned originally. Joffrey was only supposed to recognize my titles.”

Sansa was agape before these news. She ignored Tyrion asked to have her rights recognized by the king. She thought it was something normal to be acknowledged at the same time than her husband. Well, perhaps she should have wondered why the Lannisters confirmed her rights on Winterfell. She was only supposed to produce the future Lord Lannister of Winterfell, not to be the Lady of Winterfell herself, and for now she wasn’t about to give the lord in question to Tyrion. In some way, she was touched by the fact Tyrion insisted on this. How stupid she was to consider him as an enemy for a time.

“I’m sorry about this.” Tyrion’s words startled her. Why was he sorry? “I should have asked you before. Only my uncle told me I should be better to choose another wife and I got angry because of this.” Tyrion stopped a moment and looked away before he focused his eyes on her again. “Sansa, if you don’t want this, I would understand. I can stop it if you want. You don’t have to remain married to me if you don’t want to. I can ask for the annulment if that is your wish.”

Sansa wasn’t sure how to react. Tyrion was offering her to annul their marriage. She didn’t have to be Sansa Lannister any longer. She only had to say the word and she would be free again. Free. Free? Sansa realized how foolish this idea was. She would never be free again. All her family was dead. She was in the hand of the Lannisters.

“If our marriage is annulled, what will happen?” she asked.

“Well, I’ll have to find another wife. Kevan believes I should find a more suitable one.” Tyrion scoffed and Sansa notices he rolled his eyes. “That’s not a prospect I rejoice.”

“I meant… what will happen to me?”

Tyrion looked at her with the same sorry look he had when he came to announce their marriage or when he was talking to her after the death of Robb and her mother. Sansa thought he pressed his lips one against the other. “I won’t lie to you. You will no longer be under my protection. You will be Joffrey’s ward again, and my uncle is most likely to marry you to another Lannister. You are still the key to the North, he won’t allow you to marry someone else.” Sansa turned white when she heard it.
“You don’t have to fear too much, Sansa. Many of my cousins are decent men, and they are much younger and more comely than me. They’re not at all like Lancel or Joffrey. I could make sure you don’t marry a bad one.”

Sansa really saw she wouldn’t be free. Ser Kevan Lannister would never let her go. Tyrion was defending her for now, but once they wouldn’t be married, he wouldn’t be able to do anything. She would be forced to marry another Lannister. She would still be Sansa Lannister. The only difference would be that she wouldn’t be the Lady of Casterly Rock, and Sansa wasn’t sure if that really was a positive argument for the annulment. Despite Tyrion’s comforting words, she didn’t believe she would be any better without him. Her new husband wouldn’t give her the choice to share her bed or not with him. He would want to claim the North through her. She would be a prisoner again, but not well treated as she was right now. She realized Tyrion didn’t look quite keen about it either.

“What do you want?” she asked her husband. “Do you want to annul our marriage?”

Tyrion looked at her very long he answered. “No. I don’t want. To be frank, I don’t want someone else at my side. You’re really someone fantastic Sansa. I couldn’t ask for a better wife. And I don’t want to marry a woman who will only want to give me her hand so she may become the Lady of the Westerlands. But I don’t want to force you to be my wife. I don’t want to force anything upon you anymore.”

Sansa saw the same sincerity she always saw on Tyrion’s face when they talked. He wanted her as his wife, but not against her will. He was giving her a choice, something no one ever gave to her. She wouldn’t have the freedom Tyrion granted her with anyone else. She remembered what Lady Margaery told her about making the best of her circumstances. Her situation could only get worse if she found herself married to another man. But with Tyrion, she had a chance. A chance for a better life, and perhaps even a chance for happiness someday. This marriage was offering her so many more possibilities than any other by allowing her to be the Lady of Casterly Rock. She didn’t like very much the idea to be the Lady Lannister, but compared to all her other options, it was the better choice. She couldn’t reject it, especially not after Tyrion was so kind with her. She took her decision.

“I don’t want me neither. I don’t want to try another marriage. I didn’t get you out of this trial safe to break our marriage.”

Sansa thought she saw relief on Tyrion’s face. He rose from his chair and went to her side. “Come, then. Let us do our duty.”

Tyrion offered his right hand and Sansa took it. They smiled at each other. They would face Joffrey and everyone else together from now on. As they walked to the Great Hall where the ceremony would take place, Sansa told Tyrion about the many people who started to make demands to her. Tyrion acted as if he was annoyed and surprised by this, but his reaction was so exaggerated that Sansa realized immediately he was joking. Tyrion sadly told her that it was only the beginning and would only get worse. Sansa wasn’t prepared to this attention and rain of requests. Tyrion advised her to never accept a demand unless it didn’t engage them to anything. It was better to always say she would consider the request and discuss it with him if need be, then to give an answer later or no answer at all. Sometimes, people forgot about the requests they made previously. They could simply see her and think it was an opportunity to get something from her, so she didn’t have to worry too much about some demands.

Mira was accompanying them, staying a few feet behind. Mira could attract a lot of attention, but she also knew when she had to remain silent and discreet. She never joined a conversation between Tyrion and Sansa until they asked her to. But it didn’t really matter since both involved Mira in their conversations quite often. Tyrion knew her before she was Sansa’s handmaiden and he seemed to appreciate Mira. Sansa and Tyrion were also flanked by ten Lannister soldiers. As they approached the Great Hall, Sansa understood why they needed so many guards. Many people weren’t inside the Throne Room, probably because there wasn’t enough space for all the highborn people in King’s Landing. Those who didn’t manage to find a place had to wait outside. The Lannister men secured a path through the little crowd and kept the people out of their way.

When they finally arrived before the huge doors of the Great Hall, they stood there, waiting for Joffrey to order the doors to open. A gold cloak left when they arrived, probably to tell the king and his Hand they were here. Sansa played with her fingers as they waited. She was excited to be true. She would be recognized as Lady of two of the greatest castles of the Seven Kingdoms, including the one where she grew up. She would no longer be a pawn in this game. She started to play when she went to Ser Dontos to tell him she wouldn’t leave. That worked out quite well. Cersei was shamed, Sansa had an informal alliance with Margaery who would be the queen very soon, and she was about to become one of the most powerful ladies of Westeros. She was also happy Tyrion was there to be recognized too, and his presence reassured her. She wasn’t sure if she would be able to stand her ground before Joffrey if her previous betrothed did something wrong. With Tyrion at her side, she felt more confident. She knew she could count on him to help her. And he could count on her to help him. They heard a loud voice behind the doors and the noises they heard coming from the other side before, probably conversations between the people attending the ceremony, died out. The doors opened slowly. Sansa exchanged one last look with Tyrion. He smiled reassuringly at her and she gave him back a smile to tell him she was alright. And they walked through the doors.

An alley led to the Iron Throne, bordered on each side by crowded people. Sansa recognized some of them. On the right side stood mostly knights, lords and ladies of the Crownlands and the Westerlands. On the left side were the knights, the lords and the ladies of the Reach. They were all looking at her and Tyrion. Sansa maintained a neutral expression. She made sure her pace was adjusted to Tyrion’s. His injury hadn’t entirely healed, so he had to walk slower than before and his short legs didn’t help either. Sansa noticed Bronn among the people on the right. Also there were Lady Stokeworth and her two daughters, Falyse and Lollys. Closer to the throne were Varys, Prince Oberyn and his paramour, Ser Jaime, Brienne and Pycelle. Sansa wondered what the latter was doing here now that everyone knew how he lied at the trial. On the left were the Tyrells and their bannermen. Margaery was smiling widely at her. She allowed a little smile on her lips in her direction. She and Tyrion reached the first steps of the dais and stopped a few feet before, looking up at Joffrey and Ser Kevan.

It was quite obvious Joffrey wasn’t happy. How could he be happy? He was forced to acknowledge Sansa as Lady of Winterfell and Casterly Rock. Not long ago, he was still ordering his kingsguards to beat her while he pointed a loaded crossbow in her direction. He did this from the same place he sat now. Ser Kevan was standing tall next to Joffrey. Cersei wasn’t there. It was obvious the Hand was the one to make sure Joffrey would act as a king. Joffrey looked up at Kevan who nodded.

Joffrey sighed. “Uncle, step forward."

Tyrion advanced to the first steps and slowly bent the knee before Joffrey to not hurt himself. “Your Grace.”

“Tyrion of the House Lannister, considering the unfortunate death of Lord Tywin Lannister, I, Joffrey of the House Baratheon, the First of my Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm, hereby acknowledge you in all your titles and lands as Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands and Warden of the West.”

Tyrion raised. “You honor me, your Grace. I renew my pledge to serve you, respect your laws, and Tyrion stepped back to his place next to Sansa. She felt Joffrey’s gaze on her for a very long time. He was obviously even more displeased by the part to come than the one where he recognized Tyrion as a great lord, and the first part had already been difficult for him. There was only hatred and contempt for her in his eyes. Sansa wouldn’t avert her eyes from him. She was no longer his toy. She was his aunt by marriage now. She held his gaze with the same neutral expression she had ever since she entered the Great Hall, showing him he couldn’t scare her like he did before. She maintained her posture for quite some time, looking back at him directly in the eyes, not flinching by an inch. He couldn’t hurt her anymore. Joffrey began to look quite uncomfortable in the throne. He wasn’t used to a silent defiance like the one she opposed him. How could she once believe he would be a great king? As soon as someone stood up before him, he cowered like a little boy behind the skirts of his mother. Only Cersei wasn’t here to help him now. Sansa saw to that a few days ago. There was only Kevan Lannister and when Joffrey looked at him, probably for some help, he only made a slight move of his head in Sansa’s direction.

“Lady Sansa, step forward.” His voice was uncertain. Sansa advanced and curtsied before him, but she looked at him directly in the eyes.

“Your Grace.”

“Lady Sansa,” began Joffrey with some trembling in his voice, “as Lord Tyrion’s wife, I acknowledge you as Lady of Casterly Rock and Lady of the Westerlands.” Joffrey made a pause and looked back at Kevan once again who had to encourage him once more. Joffrey turned again to Sansa and continued. “Considering the death of your brother, the traitor Robb Stark, I also acknowledge you as Lady of Winterfell.”

Sansa rose. “Thank you, your Grace. I pledge to serve you, respect your laws, and come to your help when asked.” She went back to her place beside Tyrion. Both stood tall before Joffrey. Ser Kevan advanced on the dais before Joffrey. He declared:

“Here stand before us Tyrion of the House Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands and Warden of the West, and his wife, Lady Sansa of Houses Lannister and Stark, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands and Lady of Winterfell.”

The people in the Great Hall exploded in claps. That wasn’t something Sansa expected, but she liked it. For so long she was mocked as the daughter of a traitor, but now she was respected. It felt good. It was some sort of revenge in her eyes. Cersei was down, Joffrey had to recognize her, and finally she had powerful allies she could rely on. At this moment, she felt powerful. She and Tyrion walked hand in hand as they left the Great Hall and went to the Small Hall for the feast.

Chapter End Notes

Joffrey didn’t prove to be very difficult for himself, but there’s still the feast that follows.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa XII

Chapter Notes

Originally, this chapter was supposed to make a single chapter with the previous one, but before its length, I decided to split it in two parts. Now comes the rest of the ceremony where Sansa is recognized three times as a Lady.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

SANSA XII

In some ways, the feast reminded Sansa of her wedding. However, this time, she made sure Tyrion didn’t drink too much wine. She didn’t want another scene like the one during their wedding. Ever since he woke up, she made sure there was no wine in their chambers. Apparently, wine and Milk of the poppy didn’t make a good mix. Tyrion had stopped to drink Milk of the Poppy, but she preferred to not let him drink all the same. The drug was a good excuse, though she couldn’t control his drinking when he was in his solar working as Master of Coin. Tyrion complained about it, but his complaints looked like half jokes. Only half.

She and Tyrion had to receive the thanks of many people who came to their table. After some time, the music began and people started to dance. Sansa joined the dance not long after it began. Tyrion stayed behind. His stature would make it stupid if he tried to dance with her. Ser Kevan Lannister was the first one to dance with her. He told her she was beautiful. She danced with many other people, including Ser Addam Marbrand, Lord Redwyne, Lord Crakehall, Ser Eldrick Sarsfield and Lord Merryweather. She also danced with Lord Rosby who went close to cough blood on her. It was a chance she wore red. There were Loras Tyrell and his father, Lord Mace, with who she danced as well. The father tried clumsily to apologize for declaring Tyrion guilty while Ser Loras told her the same courtesies he once told her. It was obvious he wasn’t very excited to dance with her.

The most pleasant dance she had was with Tommen, Joffrey’s younger brother. Tommen was about sixteen-years-old, but he looked much younger than he was. He loved cats and was the exact opposite of Joffrey. He wasn’t called “Sweet Tommen” for nothing. Sansa wouldn’t have bothered to marry him instead of Joffrey long ago. For Tommen, their dance was more a game than anything else. He told her he wanted to be married as well and that he was taller than his uncle. Sansa could only agree and chuckle at the same time. After a moment, she wanted to go back to Tyrion she saw discussing with Bronn, but she was intercepted by the last person she wanted to see right now.

“Sansa.” Joffrey stood in her way.

“Your Grace.” Sansa held his gaze, but he was obviously drunk. He didn’t seem to care about her defiance now. He didn’t even care to call her by her title, as if she was still his betrothed.

“Where are you going?”

“I’m going back to my husband, your Grace, where I must be.”
Joffrey sneered. “Where you must be? I am the king. It is unfitting for a lady to refuse a dance with her king when he just gave her so many privileges she didn’t deserve.”

Sansa did as if she didn’t hear the last remark. “I’m sorry, your Grace, but I must go back to my husband.” She tried to get around Joffrey, but he moved again to stop her.

“You may be Lady of something or another, but before me you are nothing. I am the king, and the king orders you to dance with him.” He had the horrible mad eyes he always had when he decided to supposedly act as king. Sansa would rather dance for hours alone with Tyrion before thousands of people laughing at them instead of dancing ten seconds with Joffrey, but she had no choice. She couldn’t refuse an order like this from the king. With some hope, the moment would pass quickly. She put back her armor of courtesies.

“As you wish, your Grace.”

They began to dance. Joffrey danced quite well, but for Sansa it didn’t matter. He was a monster, and in this moment it was plain. His sadistic smile remained on his lips for all the dance. How could a monster dance so beautifully? She only wanted the dance to end, but Joffrey held her very tightly. He began to speak with a low and terrible voice after a few seconds.

“I heard you’re still a maiden. Are you?”

“We hear many things, your Grace. Many rumors are running all over the Red Keep. Most of them are nonsense.”

For a moment, Joffrey didn’t seem to know how to answer. “I know you’re still a maiden. You shouldn’t be. You’re a flowered woman now. If my uncle doesn’t want you, I’ll take you myself.”

Sansa’s heart was pounding in her chest. “You’re to marry Margaery.”

“A king can have other women. Whores. My father did. My uncle will bring you to my bed whenever I command it.”

“He won’t.” How did he dare to treat her like a whore? She was Tyrion’s wife. He would never allow anyone to touch her. He didn’t even allow himself to touch her. Sansa said the words firmly because she knew they were true. She wouldn’t let this monster who killed her father put fear in her heart. She was no longer a frightened little girl. She was a married woman, a lady who sent his mad mother away. She held his gaze, but it seemed the wine put Joffrey in a state where he really believed he was powerful.

“He will, or I’ll have his head.” Then you’ll be fucking you own bride with a wooden cock, as he told you before. Sansa kept this thought for her. How much she would have liked to tell him before everyone. But she knew better. “A King Aegon, he had any woman he wanted, whether they were married or no. I’ll have you too, this very night. And if my uncle dares to object as he did the last time, he will die, and I’ll make you my personal whore. And I’ll force you to look at his head on a spike each day for hours.”

Joffrey’s grip on her had tightened, but Sansa broke their dance all of a sudden. She wouldn’t let him do it. “You killed my father. You should remember a Lannister always pays her debts, your Grace. If you dare to threaten me or my husband again in any way, I’ll kill you. Your dogs may kill me afterwards, but they won’t be able to bring you back to life. You touch me again, and you die, your Grace. I’ll show you the same mercy you showed to my father.”

Sansa put as much venom in her words to let him know what she thought of him. At this time, she was ready to kill him, just like on the bridge when he showed her father’s head. He couldn’t frighten her or force her to be a singing little bird who did as she was told. Joffrey looked stunned before her words. He probably never expected Sansa would talk back to him this way. Sansa saw that no one realized something was going on. Everyone was dancing or too drunk to notice them, and she and Joffrey had spoken too low for everyone else to hear. However, Tyrion was looking strangely at her. He probably realized something was going on. She saw him talking to Bronn in whispers.

“What did you say?” Joffrey showed the same incredulous expression he had when Tyrion threatened to castrate him. He was stupid, but that also made him dangerous. Did Sansa make a mistake? She should have ignored him instead and take precautions against him after the feast.

“Your Grace. My lady.” Ser Kevan appeared on Sansa’s right. Joffrey’s mad eyes turned immediately to him. “Please excuse me, your Grace, but I would like to have a private discussion with Lady Lannister. Lady Margaery is waiting. She would like to dance with you.”

Joffrey looked at Ser Kevan with an open mouth, apparently confused. “Margaery? Ah… yes. I should go and talk to her.” He turned his eyes back to Sansa before he left. “I will make you pay for this.” And he left. Sansa should have felt scared by his words, but she didn’t. His hand was shaking as he said it. His words looked more like empty threats than anything else.

“My lady, please follow me. There are things that I would like to talk to you about.” Sansa followed Ser Kevan on his proposition. She had no intention to stay on the dance floor. They made their way to the balcony over the dais where she and Tyrion had their places. Sansa noticed that except Tyrion and Bronn, no one seemed to have noticed the incident. She prevented another scene at least. She sent a look to Tyrion, hoping he would understand she was alright.

When they finally reached the top, they were alone, except for two guards. Ser Kevan sent them away. He then turned to Sansa. Was he going to lecture her about her attitude with the king? She hoped not. She was in no mood for this now. Joffrey threatened to rape her and kill her husband. She was in every right to be angry at him.

“I guess I arrived at the right moment. I know what Joffrey is capable of. I expected he would try something after I forced him to do this ceremony. I’m sorry if he acted improperly toward you, my lady.”

Sansa didn’t expect such words. She only found a hollow answer like the ones she made in all circumstances like these ones when she wasn’t sure what she should say. “The king was kind. He only insisted very much to dance with me for a long time, so I acted a little abruptly with him to go back to my husband. It’s my own fault.”

Ser Kevan didn’t seem to believe her after a moment of reflection. “As I told you before, my lady, I’m not your enemy. I want to control this king as much as the others to prevent him from doing follies. I know very well the threats he made to you in the past. Tell me what he told you. I am the Hand of the King. I’m the best placed to control him.”

Sansa wasn’t sure if she could trust Kevan Lannister. He looked like Lord Tywin under many aspects, but he also looked kinder and less ruthless. Tyrion had no bad comments to do about his uncle, except he always did what Lord Tywin said. Except that, he didn’t look like a horrible man like Tywin Lannister. He declared Tyrion not guilty and was about to send Cersei away. And didn’t he just save her from Joffrey’s wrath? Sansa decided to tell him everything about the threats Joffrey just made. She also told him about the threats during her wedding.

“I see. I’ll double my guards before your door for this night, and I’ll also warn Jaime about this so the Kingsguard keeps an eye on Joffrey. Don’t be afraid about it. Joffrey may forget it for a long time if he doesn’t see you often. I would suggest you stay away from him as much as you can.” I already do, Sansa thought. “There’s also something else I would like to talk to you about, my lady. You hate the Lannisters, don’t you?”

The question surprised Sansa even more than the comments about Joffrey. “I don’t.” She wore her armor of courtesies once again.

“If I were you, I don’t think I would love a family who killed my father, my mother and my eldest brother.” Ser Kevan spoke very seriously. He wasn’t leaving his eyes from her. Again Sansa had the impression to see some of Tywin Lannister in him, but he didn’t have the frightening and cold glare of the late Lord of Casterly Rock. He was serious, but not intimidating.

“They were traitors. I guess they got what they deserved.” She refused to abandon her armor in this moment. She still had too much uncertainty about this man.

“Some may agree with you,” the knight admitted. “On the other hand, Joffrey promised your father he could take the black if he confessed his treason. Your father confessed and Joffrey ordered him executed. You would have the right to be angry at least about this. A king should keep his word. As for your brother and your mother, I think everyone in the Seven Kingdoms despises the Freys for breaking the guest rights. No one deserves to die this way.”

Sansa felt a sudden anger rising in her. He was speaking calmly about the death of her family, as if it meant nothing. “Joffrey forced me to watch the head of my father, but also the one of the septa who raised and trained me, and of all the other people of my father’s household who I knew ever since I was born, planted on spikes. My brother was stabbed in the heart by one of his own men, then his head was cut and his body paraded with his direwolf’s head on it. His wife was murdered in front of his own eyes, stabbed multiple times in the belly while she was pregnant. My mother’s throat was cut to the bone, and then her body was thrown in the river. So forgive me if I don’t love your family very much.”

Kevan Lannister looked down for a moment. “I understand. You must know that I never wanted this to happen, my lady. My brother didn’t want it either. But we were in war, and in war people die.”

“Really? You didn’t want it? Lord Tywin didn’t want it? Strange for someone who organized the Red Wedding.”

“It’s true. But I would like to ask you a question. If your brother Robb Stark had taken King’s Landing, would he have spared Joffrey? Or Cersei? Or Jaime? Tywin? Tommen? Myrcella? Or even your husband?”

“My brother would never have killed Tommen or Myrcella, they are children. And he would never have killed Tyrion, he was kind to me.”

“Then your brother was a fool.” Sansa’s anger rose again. “What do you think Tommen and Myrcella would have done a few years later when fully grown? Do you think they would have forgotten who killed their mother, their brother, their uncle and their grandfather? Do you think they would have accepted that your brother murdered most of their family without retaliating one day? As for Tyrion, I’m not quite convinced by your words. Should I remind you that your mother arrested him under false accusations and wanted him executed for a crime he was innocent?”

“She received false information. She wasn’t responsible for that.”

“Tyrion told me about Baelish’s lies. And yet she’s the one who trusted Baelish. She’s the one who arrested Tyrion, even if she knew perfectly it would start a war between her family and mine. She chose war.” Sansa wanted to protest, but Ser Kevan continued before she could. “My brother Tywin was ruthless and cruel, it’s true, but only when he thought it was necessary. He wasn’t cruel because he enjoyed it. He went to war because your mother imprisoned Tyrion. If she hadn’t done it, there wouldn’t have been any war. My brother didn’t even want a full-scale war. He sent Gregor Clegane to ravage the Riverlands to force your father to chase him personally, then to capture him and trade him for Tyrion. He never wanted a war that would spread through all the Seven Kingdoms. He never wanted your father to die, far from it. Everyone at the Green Fork, even Tywin, considered Joffrey’s decision was foolish because we couldn’t exchange your father to make peace. Your brother refused to make peace, even when it became obvious he couldn’t win the war. He refused the exchange of you and your sister against Jaime. He offered us peace conditions we couldn’t accept, and I’m quite sure he knew it. It was obvious that this conflict would end by the near destruction of one of our houses. A good lord knows when he cannot fight, and your brother refused to admit he was lost after Blackwater. He should have known his only chance to survive would have been to bend the knee. Instead he continued a lost fight to avenge his father. Your family is responsible in some way of its own destruction. You started this conflict.”

Sansa wanted to retort, but she found nothing to say. Lord Tywin’s brother still had something to say.

“As for the Red Wedding, Tywin was the mind behind it, it’s true, but he wasn’t the one to swing the sword. Nothing obliged the Boltons or the Freys to do these horrible things. They accepted Tywin’s proposition when they could refuse. They are the ones who betrayed your brother and broke the guest rights. And the horrible things they did to your kin’s dead bodies weren’t ordered by my brother, not even the death of your mother. You can blame us all you want, but the Lannisters could blame you for many atrocities your own family committed.”

“Atrocities? My brother never committed any atrocity. He didn’t slaughter people at a wedding.” Sansa wouldn’t let him soil her family’s honor.

“The brother of my sister-in-law, Ser Stafford Lannister, died at the Battle of Oxcross. The Westerlands were plundered by your brother’s armies up to Lannisport. My nephew, Lyonel Frey, the son of my sister Genna, died at the Whispering Wood. My two sons, Martyn and Willem, were butchered in their cell when they were prisoners by one of your brother’s bannermen. They were fifteen, only children.”

Sansa was shocked by everything Ser Kevan said. She needed some time to gather her thoughts. “My brother wasn’t responsible for the death of your sons. He executed Lord Karstark afterwards for what he did to them.”

“Did it bring my children back to life?” Sansa had nothing to answer again. “He allowed Lord Karstark to kill them. They were under his protection. Does hating you and your family will bring them back to me? No. Will hating us bring back your family to you?” She didn’t have an answer to that either. “Then you should try to not hate the Lannisters. We are no worse than many other families in Westeros. And all the members of House Lannister are not responsible for every horrible act made against your family, just like you’re not responsible for the death of my children. And if you ever wish to get back Winterfell one day, we are your best hope. As I told you, I’m not your enemy. We don’t have to be enemies.”

Kevan Lannister spoke quietly during all this time, but he used a firm voice all the same. She didn’t know what to make of everything he just told her. Sansa had to admit the Lannisters weren’t entirely responsible of all this war. Littlefinger started all of this with his lies. Her mother arrested Tyrion as well, and she tried to have him executed, persuaded he tried to kill Bran. Sansa had to admit her family had been quite unfair with Tyrion. Her mother put him on trial and arrested him when he was innocent. She wanted him to die even after he saved her on the Eastern Road. Bronn told her one day how Tyrion killed a man who tried to kill her mother with a shield. Sansa hadn’t been better. She trusted Littlefinger as well, and didn’t trust Tyrion even after he saved her from Joffrey. Perhaps her brother did a mistake as well by not treating with Tywin Lannister after the Battle of Blackwater. Perhaps he would be still alive if he had done so. And she couldn’t blame Ser Kevan if he hated her family. His two sons were murdered when they were under Robb’s protection. From what Sansa could see, he seemed to genuinely wish they didn’t have to hate each other.

“I’ll need time, Ser Kevan.” That was all she could offer for now. She could trust Tyrion, perhaps Ser Jaime to a certain point, but she would need time for the other Lannisters.

“I understand.” He made what she thought was a comprehensive nod. His face softened. “There is something else I need to tell you, my lady. About Tyrion.”

“I’m listening.” She wondered what Kevan Lannister had to say about his nephew. Why did he want to talk to her about Tyrion?

“Tyrion cares about you. It’s quite obvious. And from what I’ve seen up to now, you don’t hate him.”

“No, I don’t.” Sansa didn’t hate Tyrion, quite the opposite in fact. She considered Tyrion as a friend. Even a very close friend.

“I would like you to take care of him.”

“This is my duty as his wife.”

“No, you don’t understand. He needs you. Not only as a wife to stand beside him during official events or to have children. He needs you in his life. He needs someone to share his life with. Someone who will look after him. Someone who cares about him, who wants him to be happy. Someone who will make him happy. You understand what I mean?”

Sansa took some time to answer. “Yes, I think I do.”

“Good. Now if you’ll excuse me, my lady, I’ll go and watch the king.”

Ser Kevan went away, leaving Sansa alone on the balcony. She remained here for some time, wondering what he meant exactly by taking care of Tyrion. She wouldn’t abandon him, for sure, but she didn’t know precisely what Tyrion’s uncle had wanted to say. She finally left as well and went back to her table. Tyrion was there, drinking. He found a jug of wine somewhere it seemed. Sansa took the jug from him as soon as she arrived and put it far away enough from him. It wasn’t the time to get drunk with the altercation she had with Joffrey a few minutes ago. Tyrion didn’t seem to care about the loss of his wine. He looked essentially relieved to see her again. When he asked her what happened with Joffrey, she told him they would discuss it once back in their chambers. The rest of the feast went swiftly and without incident. Sansa and Tyrion talked a lot, and some other people came to engage a conversation with them, including Ser Jaime, Margaery and Mira. They both finally retired and went back to theirs rooms. Mira followed them as befits a handmaiden. She helped Sansa to change and prepare herself for the night as Tyrion prepared himself in another corner of the room, out of her sight. When Mira was gone, Tyrion approached Sansa.

“So, perhaps you could tell me what was the problem with Joffrey this time,” he asked. Sansa explained the threats Joffrey made, today and during their wedding. Tyrion’s face turned to the same expression he had when Joffrey was beating her.
“Why didn’t you tell me before?” he asked angrily.

“That was our wedding night. And I didn’t know if I could trust you at this moment,” Sansa argued.

Tyrion’s softened. “I’m sorry. I shouldn’t be angry at you. But if he ever presumes I will allow him to touch you, he’s wrong. The next time he makes threats like that I’ll geld him for real.”

Sansa stared in horror at Tyrion. “You can’t do that! They will take your head as soon as you do it! I don’t want you to die!” Sansa wouldn’t bother if Joffrey ended an eunuch, but she didn’t save Tyrion from his sister only to see him die by Joffrey’s hand. She wouldn’t allow that to happen.

Tyrion had a dumbfounded expression on his face after she told this. He chuckled. “Don’t worry, with some luck that won’t be necessary, though it could make some good to Joffrey to realize he cannot do as he pleases. He’s really mad. Threatening to rape the Lady of Casterly Rock! I don’t want to imagine what my father would have done to the Mad King if he tried to rape my mother.”

“Anyway your uncle already doubled the guard before our door and warned your brother about it. Joffrey won’t do anything for tonight.”

“Good thing for him!” declared Tyrion in a theatrical voice. “Because if he does try something on you, his own wedding night might be quite difficult. Perhaps Lady Margaery wouldn’t complain about it.”

Sansa couldn’t help but laugh at it, just like Tyrion. But the laugh had a bitter taste. She wondered what would be this marriage for Margaery. For now the betrothal was alright, she could control Joffrey, but considering what happened to the girls Tyrion once sent to Joffrey, Sansa was afraid what may happen to her during her wedding night. Sansa was also afraid about herself. She was the Lady of Casterly Rock and Winterfell, Joffrey himself acknowledged her, but he still saw her as a toy he could play with whenever he wanted. Would she ever be safe? She averted her gaze from Tyrion’s face. She didn’t want him to see her sudden distress.

For all the good it did. “Sansa, are you alright?” Tyron noticed her change of behavior.

Sansa let it go. “What if Joffrey does what he told me he would do?” Her voice was trembling.

“He won’t.” Tyrion placed his right hand on hers. She still sat in her chair and he was standing next to her. “I promised to protect you when we were wed. I won’t let him do it.”

Sansa looked into Tyrion’s eyes. Green eyes, full of sincerity, care and concern for her. Not long ago she didn’t want to look at these eyes, but now they reassured her. They calmed her.

“Now, it should be time to sleep,” he said all of a sudden. “I think I will go back to the couch now. I don’t have enough pain left as an excuse to share your bed.”

“No!” Perhaps Sansa said the word a little bit too quickly and loudly for her taste as Tyrion went in the direction of the couch. He turned to face her, obviously surprised. She recovered quickly and took a more neutral face. “I mean, you’re not fully healed, and I know it’s uncomfortable on the couch. Anyway it doesn’t bother me to have you at my side in the same bed. I trust you.” And I feel safer and better when you’re with me. She didn’t dare to express her thoughts aloud.

“Very well. I won’t complain about it. You’re right, the bed is much more comfortable than the couch.”

Tyrion blew out the candles as she laid under the covers. Her husband joined her not long after. After a few minutes she had the impression he was asleep. Sansa was shaking. Despite Tyrion’s reassurances, she feared Joffrey might appear from nowhere and execute his threat. She was afraid, afraid for her and afraid for Tyrion. Carefully, she moved to him and laid her head on his shoulder. She remembered the night before his arrest. It seemed to be so long ago, from another age, and yet it happened barely two months ago. He held her in his arms this night and calmed her. It had been the best night of sleep she had for a very long time. After he went out of prison, she decided she had to keep a physical contact with him when they were asleep. She didn’t want him to be taken away from her as Cersei did this morning. But this night, she needed to feel closer to him.

“What are you doing?” It seemed Tyrion wasn’t sleeping if she relied on his question.

“I just feel better this way.” I want to feel safer in your arms. As if he read her thoughts, Tyrion passed an arm around her shoulders. Her shaking lessened. There was a time when she would shake at the simple idea of Tyrion touching her, but now it was different.

“I won’t do anything. I promise,” he assured her.

“I know,” she simply said. She listened to her heartbeat and felt calm overrunning her. After a moment, she realized it was Tyrion’s heartbeat she was listening to, but she was already drifting into sleep.

In her sleep, Sansa dreamed again of her father, telling her he would find someone worthy of her once she would be old enough. Tyrion was there again behind him. Afterwards, she heard in her dreams the same song she heard the night after the first day of the trial. It had been the day she learned Shae and Tyrion were lovers, and this discovery nearly annihilated her. However, it wasn’t the first part of the song she heard this time like a few days ago. It was the second part.

_Can't believe the words I hear_

_It's like an answer to a prayer_

_And when I look around I see,_

_This place, this time, this friend of mine_

_I know it's hard but found somehow_

_To look into your heart and to forgive me now_

_You've given me the strength to see just where my journey ends_

_You've given me the strength to carry on_

_I see the path from this dark place_

_I see my future_

_And your forgiveness has set me free_

_Oh, and I can see another way_
I can face another day

I can see the path

I see my future

I see the path from this dark place

I see my future

I see the path from this dark place

Chapter End Notes

For the song at the end: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-J1AD1O_ijA

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Tyrion woke up from a dreamless and short sleep before the sun came out. He hadn’t slept very long, but he slept well. His sleep was much better for a week since the trial was over. For one, the bed was much more comfortable than the couch. He never told Sansa, but to sleep on the couch sometimes left him with aches in the back. However, Tyrion slept in featherbeds long before his marriage and always had the same problems. He would often spend whole nights reading because he couldn’t sleep. He could function with only a few hours of rest each night, even none occasionally. But now, he was able to sleep much better. His sleep was less troubled by nightmares than before. He had a suspicion the reason for his enhanced sleep was the person laying at his side. Sansa was on his left, still sleeping. Tyrion remembered she leaned her forehead against his left arm last night when they fell asleep. Tyrion noticed she also had a hand on his chest now. That wasn’t the first time it happened. Another morning Tyrion had woken up in this situation as well. Sansa probably put her hand in this position unconsciously in her sleep each time, because Tyrion didn’t remember she did it while he was awaken, and Sansa fell asleep quicker than him. Carefully, Tyrion moved away from his wife and held her hand in the air before he slowly laid it down on the mattress. He didn’t want to awake her. She deserved to sleep, and she looked so much at peace in this moment. It was as if nothing could trouble her, and Tyrion didn’t want to trouble her for one of the rare moments that belonged to her, and only to her.

Tyrion got dressed without a noise and left their chamber as silently as he could. Sansa didn’t move. She still had this thin smile she always had when she was asleep, or at least she had since Tyrion left the cells. Tyrion closed the door very carefully and walked to his solar. Sansa needed rest. Tyrion remained awaken until very late yesterday. He had so many problems to solve and so little time for that. He spent the last days working tirelessly. Lord Gyles Rosby left the finances of the Realm in a sorry state for the short month he was Master of Coin. Even with Cersei’s decision to stop the payments to the Iron Bank and the Faith, the Crown didn’t have enough money to rebuild the royal fleet. Lord Rosby himself lent to the Crown to pay for the new ships Cersei ordered Lord Tyrell to build. He even borrowed from other minor houses of the Crownlands like the Stokeworths. As a result, the Crown’s debts increased again while Tyrion was absent. And now he had to repair the damage caused by the payment’s interruption. A representative of the Iron Bank had come yesterday to ask for the payments to start again. Kevan had ordered them to start again as soon as he arrived, but the first payment hadn’t reached Braavos yet, or at least hadn’t yet arrived when the emissary left Braavos. Tyrion spent hours discussing with the man, giving all the guarantees he could that the Crown would pay its debts on time. Tyrion described the temporary cessation as an accident due to the sudden death of the Hand of the King. Tyrion managed to calm the representative by telling him the Crown was supported by the Reach and the Westerlands, and that House Tyrell and House Lannister were more than capable to make sure it would give its due to the Iron Bank. Tyrion thought he probably did the best he could in these circumstances, especially since he gave the representative a large amount of gold to compensate the delay. With some hope, the Iron Bank wouldn’t start to fund their enemies.

As for the Faith, Tyrion managed to solve the problem without too much difficulties. His return at the office of Master of Coin, along with his new title as Lord of Casterly Rock and his good relation with the High Septon allowed the Crown to start again the payments to the Faith without penalties. He also succeeded in convincing Mace Tyrell to lend more money to the Crown in order to repay the other creditors in time. The Fat Flower accepted a lower interest rate (5% instead of 15%) and also confirmed his engagement to pay for half the cost of the royal wedding, even the extra cost caused by the delay Cersei imposed. It seemed the Fat Flower didn’t want to upset Tyrion now that he was Lord of the Westerlands, especially after he declared Tyrion guilty at the trial. The Lord of Highgarden was right to not anger him. He knew Tyrion was innocent, and he sentenced him to die all the same. Tyrion wondered what Cersei promised him for his vote. The Tyrells should be better to not cause any other problem to Tyrion, or else they would see how he paid his debts.

The delay of the wedding had increased its cost by nearly a fifth. A lot of food were wasted because of it. Tyrion wanted to curse Cersei. He worked like a demon to keep the Crown away from bankruptcy, and Cersei destroyed months of work in a single one with her foolish decisions. Tyrion was infuriated to always clean the mess she caused. He decided to lend more money to the Crown and to not ask for the repayment in time of the previous debts it amassed towards Casterly Rock when his father was still alive, but he raised the interest rate from 15% to 20% (as high as the Iron Bank), not only on the new borrowings, but also on the previous ones. He was tired to pay the price for Cersei’s errors. Joffrey would have to pay for it. In two years, when the Crown should start to pay him back, Tyrion would make sure Joffrey would pay.

In the meantime, to keep enough money to the Crown, Tyrion had to double the tax on whoring. He also decided to levy a temporary tax on the wine imported to King’s Landing for the royal wedding. The Redwynes and some Dornishmen wouldn’t be happy, since the winesellers were the ones to pay it, but he was short of ideas. Anyway, it was only temporary in order to replenish the coffers of the Crown enough to have some money to spend from time to time. Tyrion planned the tax to be abandoned in a month. His successor would have to deal with the long-term problems more carefully when he would leave for Casterly Rock.

Tyrion reached his solar and started to work. He may have an hour or two before he had to go back in his chambers and bring Sansa with him to the breakfast. The royal wedding was taking place today. Tyrion was eager for it to be over. He was eager to leave for Casterly Rock. He thought Sansa was eager to leave as well. She didn’t want to spend any more time near Joffrey. Two days ago an altercation occurred in the courtyard. Joffrey intercepted Sansa with his two dogs, Meryn Trant and Boros Blount, as she was walking. Luckily, the courtyard was full of Lannister soldiers and Bronn wasn’t far either. Joffrey probably realized all of a sudden he couldn’t use the Lady of the Westerlands like he wanted. However, it was obvious Sansa wanted to leave this place and Tyrion agreed with her. He hoped she would like Casterly Rock.

Tyrion had become quite close to Sansa during the days following his release and his near death, and not only because now they slept close in the same bed and maintained a physical contact while asleep. He didn’t do much for that closeness. In fact, Sansa was the one to do most of the work. She never went to sleep before Tyrion was back from his solar late in the night. Tyrion told her to sleep before his arrival, but Sansa refused. In some way Tyrion was happy to see Sansa was awaken when he came back. They could exchange a few words before they went to bed, but Tyrion feared Sansa wouldn’t sleep long enough this way. That’s why he always made sure to not awake her when he left their bed soon in the morning. She always waited for him for dinner as well. For Tyrion, dinners had become moments of grace. They were the only times he wasn’t working. He wished they could last longer, but there was too much work to do. All the same, he always had good conversations with Sansa at these moments. There were even some ideas to solve problems that came to his mind while talking to her. She lifted his spirit when no one else could. It was also in these times that Sansa told him how she was pursued by an army of people now.

Tyrion understood what Sansa meant. He had similar problems, but not at the same level. As Master of Coin, he could easily send away flatterers who only came to ask him a favor or another by pretending he was too busy, which was the case most of the time anyway. However, he couldn’t refuse to see everyone. There were important lords and ladies of the Westerlands in King’s Landing for the royal wedding and he couldn’t turn down every demand of meeting by these noble people. He had to maintain good relations with his bannermen and to show them respect. By luck, his huge duties provided him with an excuse so the minor lords couldn’t blame him. Tyrion only had to receive people like Ser Addam Marbrand or Lord Desmond Crakehall who belonged to powerful families.

Sansa, on the other hand, just discovered what it meant to be a new great lady. She just became the Lady of House Lannister. Technically, she was the richest woman in the Seven Kingdoms, and one of the most powerful. The way she neutralized Cersei at the trial also proved to everyone she was someone to take seriously. She annihilated the power of the Queen Regent within a few days, which was no small task. People saw her as someone very powerful and with a lot of influence, and tried to gain her trust or her friendship as she just reached her position. They saw an opportunity since she reached the power so quickly and suddenly. Sansa had to be careful, and she was. Her experiences with Joffrey, Cersei, Littlefinger and Ser Dontos taught her to be careful in choosing her friends and her allies. She was careful even with Margery. Tyrion could only approve her. The future queen was a smiling and very generous young woman, but she could be dangerous as well. But Tyrion preferred to have Margery as queen instead of his sister. Sansa was mostly tired of all the people sticking around her. Tyrion knew it would last for some time. If Sansa showed to the others she couldn’t be controlled or manipulated, most of the parasites following her would stop. But there would always be some to try. Tyrion explained it to Sansa during one of their dinners and she looked able to handle the situation. She was simply exceeded by all this unwanted attention.

Tyrion managed to find other people who had unpaid debts towards the Crown during the short time he spent working. He hoped this time they weren’t people Joffrey executed. It was already difficult to chase the children whose fathers owed money to the king. Not only was it difficult to find them, many times they had no way to pay back their debts. Of the few they found, Tyrion convinced most of them to take the black instead of facing the king’s justice. Joffrey’s justice ended most of the time with some part of the body missing on the poor debtors. There were other times they were lucky enough to find some relative who paid the debts to save them. Tyrion was quite relieved that it could still happen. Not long after dawn came, he went back to his chambers.

He crossed the path of Mira Forrester on his way back. He had to see her more often these last times. As Master of Coin, he was in charge of the reconstruction of the royal fleet along with the Master of Ships. Lord Mace Tyrell wasn’t quite competent for the duty to be true. Lord Redwyne would have been a better choice. Sadly, they couldn’t remove the Lord of Highgarden from his position on the small council without insulting him. The result was Tyrion was the one really making sure the reconstruction would be done well. In fact, there was no construction at all for now. The sorry state of the Crown’s finances forced Tyrion to maintain his uncle’s decision to suspend the rebuilding of the royal fleet indefinitely. For now, they were only buying materials for the future construction. The Whitehills already sent a first shipment of ironwood from White Harbor a few days ago and it would arrive in King’s Landing very soon. Tyrion had to discuss with Lady Mira about the price of the wares, and they both agreed about one thing: keeping it as low as possible. Mira Forrester had the complete control over the price and the quantity of ironwood the Whitehills could sell to the Crown, and she wasn’t about to negotiate for a higher price when it would benefit the people who murdered her family. Anyway, she wasn’t expecting ironwood of good quality and it was for her and Tyrion quite a good excuse to maintain the price on ironwood at a minimum. This way Tyrion could lower the expenses of the Crown, and Mira Forrester could make the Whitehills pay in some way for their crimes. Both gained from it.

“Lady Mira,” he greeted her.

“Lord Tyrion.” Always polite and courteous like a true lady. I understand why she and Sansa became friends so quickly.

“Eager for the wedding?”

“As much as I can be. I’m mostly happy for Lady Margaery.” Tyrion didn’t hear much joy in her voice. He never really saw her happy in fact. Tyrion couldn’t blame her. She lost her whole family within a few months, and yet she managed to face it with more serenity than Sansa, though Tyrion could imagine what happened inside this head under the black hair.

“Sansa told me you’ll soon be in the queen’s service again.” They continued to talk as they walked towards Tyrion and Sansa’s apartments.

“Yes, when you will leave for Casterly Rock. Lady Margaery would like to have me back at her service, and anyway I must stay for the ironwood business.”

“Indeed. Since we speak of it, the first shipment should arrive very soon, perhaps tomorrow. I can count on you to make sure the merchandise is of good quality.”

“The Whitehills are the ones who can make sure it’s of good quality, but since they only know how to destroy ironwood forests, I fear the shipment will not contain the best ironwood there is.” Tyrion sensed it was an understatement.

They arrived at the chambers and entered. Sansa was already stirring into the bed. Tyrion let Lady Mira prepare his wife for the day, but first Sansa had to take a bath. It was a special day after all. They had a bathtub room next to their bedroom and Tyrion read one of his books as he waited for Sansa to be done. It was better for her to take her bath first since her own preparation that would follow took more time than Tyrion’s. After Sansa left the bathroom, Tyrion abandoned his book, The Price of Inequality by Archmaester Stiglitz, and took a bath as well. With Podrick’s help, he was ready for the breakfast before Sansa.

When finally Sansa was ready, they left. They both wore simple clothes for the breakfast. Their finest garbs would be for the wedding ceremony and the feast with seventy-seven courses. Anyway, Sansa was beautiful whatever she wore. He spoke of many things with her as they walked to the gardens where the breakfast would take place, and they involved Lady Mira and Podrick in the conversation as well. Podrick was walking side by side with the northern girl, carrying a huge book. It was Tyrion’s and Sansa’s gift they would give to Joffrey during the breakfast. Following the Reach traditions, Margaery would break her fast with the other Tyrell women while the Tyrell men and the Lannisters would break it with the king. For the occasion, they had to give a present to Joffrey, and Tyrion thought a book wouldn’t be a bad idea. Perhaps that would help Joffrey to be somewhat a better king if miracles were possible. He hoped Joffrey would give a better treatment to the book than to the last gift Tyrion gave him. He still remembered the horrible state Daisy was when Ros brought her back to the Tower of the Hand, and Tyrion knew what happened to Ros later when Joffrey used her as a target practice. He tried to banish these dark memories from his mind as they sat to the large table for the breakfast.
The breakfast would have been very pleasant if it wasn’t for Joffrey’s and Cersei’s presences. Tyrion hadn’t wanted her to be present at the wedding at all, but Kevan said it was for the better. Cersei was supposed to leave tomorrow for Rosby. That would be her last appearance in court, as Margaery would become queen during the day, and it would have a good effect on the appearance of House Lannister if Cersei looked respectable for one last time before she left, as if she regretted what she had done. Anyway she was watched by several Lannister guards, Kevan made sure she would cause no trouble and she sat far away from the king, at the same table but far away. She wouldn’t even be able to talk to him. Tommen was beside her.

“Nothing like a hearty breakfast to whet one’s appetite for the seventy-seven course feast to follow,” Tyrion told Sansa at a moment. Tyrion mainly spoke with her as they ate. They both sat at Joffrey’s right, and sadly there was only Kevan to separate him from his repulsive nephew. Kevan was mostly speaking with Joffrey, and by luck this kept the attention of the boy away from Tyrion and Sansa. Sansa didn’t have much more luck since only Tommen separated her from Cersei. She engaged the conversation with Tommen a few times, and each time Cersei threw her daggers with her eyes. Tommen didn’t seem to notice it, but Sansa did and mostly talked with Tyrion afterwards. Among the people on Joffrey’s left were his soon-to-be father-in-law Mace Tyrell and Pycelle.

The moment to give Joffrey his wedding presents arrived. But first, Cersei solemnly presented him the wife’s cloak he would drape over Margaery’s shoulders. “I donned this cloak when Robert took me for his queen. It is the same cloak my mother Lady Joanna, a true Lady of Casterly Rock, wore when she wed my lord father.” Tyrion noticed the mention of a true Lady of Casterly Rock. It wasn’t difficult to guess what Cersei meant. He put his hand on Sansa’s to show her she had his support.

Presents began to flow before Joffrey. Jalabhar Xho gave a great bow of golden wood and a quiver of long arrows fletched with green and scarlet feathers. Lady Tanda Stokeworth offered a pair of supple riding boots. Oberyn Martell presented him a red gold brooch wrought in the shape of a scorpion, but Tyrion thought Oberyn would have liked instead to offer a real scorpion who would kill Joffrey at this very moment. Tyrion remembered the discussion he had with Prince Oberyn two days ago. He asked something to Tyrion, but he had to decline the demand. That was too dangerous. He hoped the Red Viper wouldn’t do something even more dangerous after this refusal. Ser Addam Marbrand offered silver spurs. Paxter Redwyne, Lord of the Arbor, presented a wooden model of a war galley of two hundred oars being built even now on the Arbor.

“If it pleases your Grace,” said the lord, “she will be called King Joffrey’s Valor.”

Joffrey showed how he was pleased by his next words. “I will make it my flagship when I sail to Dragonstone to kill my traitor uncle Stannis.” Tyrion doubted Joffrey would ever embark a ship to Dragonstone before Stannis was dead. He had statues of him built to show his victory over Robb Stark through the Red Keep, even though he did nothing. And Tyrion didn’t see how killing people at a wedding deserved praise.

Lord Mace Tyrell was the next to present his gift: a huge golden chalice with two ornate curved handles and the seven sigils of the seven great houses, including the direwolf of the Starks. Probably the Tyrells had it made before the Red Wedding.

“From House Tyrell and the people of the Reach, your Grace, it is my honor to present you with this wedding cup. May you and my daughter Margaery drink deep and live long.”

“A handsome goblet, my lord,” complimented Joffrey. “Or shall I call you Father?”

“I shall be honored, your Grace.” Lord Tyrell bowed with a great smile. Tyrion hoped Joffrey wouldn’t give the Lord of Highgarden reasons to hate him afterwards, especially after the wedding night.
Tyrion’s and Sansa’s gift was brought by Podrick after Lord Tyrell’s cup. Tyrion rose from his chair and came before Joffrey to present it.

“A book?” Joffrey asked. Of course, it’s a book. It’s probably the first time you look at one.

_The Lives of Four Kings._ Grand Maester Kaeth’s history of the reigns of Daeron the Young Dragon, Baelor the Blessed, Aegon the Unworthy, and Daeron the Good. A book every king should read.

It wasn’t difficult for anyone who knew Joffrey even a little to see he wasn’t pleased. “Your uncle is right, your Grace. In all of Westeros there are only four copies of that book illuminated in Kaeth’s own hand. This is one of them.” Tyrion appreciated Kevan’s help, but he didn’t know if it would be enough. He started to withdraw when Joffrey finally spoke.

“Now that the war is won, we should all find time for wisdom. Thank you, Uncle.”

Tyrion wasn’t sure what to make of Joffrey’s reaction. That wasn’t really what he expected and he doubted the sincerity of his nephew’s words. He went back to his seat and interrogated Sansa with a questioning expression on his face. By her own expression, Sansa told him she didn’t know what to think of it either.

Ser Balon Swann arrived at this moment, carrying a sword. Tyrion knew what it was. As Kevan rose, he regretted he didn’t send Ice back to Sansa’s brother along with Ned Stark’s bones. “One of only two Valyrian steel swords in the capital, your Grace, freshly forged in your honor,” Kevan said.

Joffrey looked as if he received a new toy and left his seat to take it out of its scabbard. He started to move it in all directions and to slash through the air as people were puffing in surprise and admiration. He looked like he wanted to kill someone with that right away.

“Careful, your Grace. Nothing cuts like Valyrian steel.” For one time, Pycelle was speaking some reason. Tyrion hoped Joffrey would accidentally kill himself with it. The world would be much safer without him.

“So they say.”

Joffrey was too much focused on his sword to look listening to the old man’s words. Suddenly, he decided to test the sharpness of his new toy and cut the book Tyrion just offered him in two, then in three, four, five. Sheets flew in the air as the book was turned into pieces. Tyrion should have expected that. He shouldn’t have searched so long for Grandmaester Kaeth’s work only to see it destroyed. Joffrey looked arrogantly at Tyrion. He looked down, but inside he was burning in rage. This boy really needed a lesson. If there’s someone Tyrion’s father should have put back to his place before he died, it was Joffrey.

“Such a great sword should have a name. What shall I call her?”

People started to shout names after Joffrey’s question. _Stormbringer. Terminus. Widow’s Wail. Wolfsbane._

“Widow’s Wail, I like that. Every time I use it, it’ll be like cutting off Ned Stark’s head all over again.” Tyrion felt Sansa’s hand clapping more tightly around his. He tried to comfort her with a movement of his thumb over hers as Joffrey went back to his place. Everyone was silent and looking away, many trying to look as if they were only interested by the content of their plates. No one seemed to enjoy what just happened, except Joffrey and Cersei. The last one was smiling cruelly at Tyrion and Sansa. Joffrey seemed to believe that wasn’t enough.
“Sharp! I told you, I am no stranger to Valyrian steel.” Tyrion’s mind started to work when he heard these words. He remembered three discussions. One he had with Catelyn Stark a long time ago, another with his brother Jaime not long after he came back to King’s Landing. He also remembered a third one he surprised between Joffrey and the Hound at Winterfell. “My father had no time for books. If you read less, Uncle Imp, perhaps Lady Sansa would have a baby in her belly by now. Don’t be so sad, Sansa, once I’ve gotten Queen Margaery with child I’ll visit your bedchamber and show my little uncle how it’s done. You and my uncle owe me a better present anyway. This one is all chopped to pieces.”

Tyrion could barely contain his fury now, but he chose another path than the one he took at his own wedding. He wasn’t drunk enough. His mind was his best weapon, and it just gave him a perfect sword to silence Joffrey for a while. He forced a smile upon his face. “Perhaps I could give you a knife, your Grace. To match your sword. A dagger of the same fine Valyrian steel… with a dragonbone hilt. What do you think of it? Along with a bag of silver maybe.”

Joffrey looked dumbfounded at him for a moment, then finally stammered. “You… yes, a dagger to match my sword… Good. A… a gold hilt with rubies in it. Dragonbone is too plain.”

“As you wish, your Grace.” Tyrion put a wide smile to make him understand. Joffrey didn’t dare to talk for the rest of the breakfast, except for thanking shortly the people who offered him the last presents. During this time, Tyrion remained in his thoughts. He had the answer he wanted. He knew who tried to have Brandon Stark killed. And this person knew that he knew it.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
This chapter is the longest one I wrote up to now. A lot happens in it, and I really liked to write it.

Discover how the royal wedding is different from what it was in the show. Remember that now Tyrion and Sansa are Lord and Lady of Casterly Rock, Cersei doesn't really wield any real power and the necklace with the poison disappeared in Blackwater Bay. Things may happen differently.

Reviews for this chapter will be more than appreciated.

They walked to their rooms in Maegor’s Holdfast. The breakfast could have gone worse, but considering Joffrey was present, Sansa didn’t hope it would be without clash. And sadly, she had been right. Between the destruction of the book and Joffrey’s misplaced comments, Sansa feared Tyrion may say or do something stupid like during their wedding feast, but luckily he suggested to offer Joffrey another present that seemed to please him. Joffrey didn’t dare to speak after that. He looked entirely surprised by Tyrion’s idea.

When she thought about it, Sansa found Joffrey’s reaction quite strange. Why didn’t he say anything after Tyrion proposed him another gift? Was he so dumbfounded by Tyrion’s offer that he didn’t know what to say afterwards? For sure, Sansa supposed a dagger made of Valyrian steel and with a dragonbone hilt was no small gift, but still. There was something strange in the way Joffrey behaved. Perhaps he couldn’t find anything to say after Tyrion proposed such a present in replacement.

Tyrion’s behaviour was strange as well. He didn’t say a word. It was as if she didn’t exist in this moment. He looked lost in his thoughts. Perhaps he was only in a bad mood after Joffrey just hack to pieces such a precious book. Sansa only had to look at Tyrion’s desk in their bedroom to see how he loved to read. There were nights he spent entirely on reading. He probably spent more time to read than she spent herself to pray.

“I’m sorry for the book.” She really was.

Tyrion suddenly seemed to realize she was here. “Oh, it was Joffrey’s book. He had the right to do what he liked with it. Now there are only three copies of Grandmaester Kaeth’s work left in the world. Too bad he chose to use it that way. He might have learned a thing or two if he’d read it. I should have known better. I should have seen… a good many things.”

Tyrion’s mind seemed far away. “Perhaps he will be more pleased by the dagger. He seemed to like the idea,” she suggested.

“Perhaps. Though I have doubts.” Tyrion really acted strangely, but turned to look at her. “Joffrey quarreled with your brother Robb at Winterfell. Was there any ill feeling between Bran and Joffrey as well?"

Sansa was quite confused by the question. "Bran? No, not that I remember. Bran was a sweet boy. Everyone loved him. He and Tommen fought with wooden swords, but just for play. He liked all these things, riding, fighting, climbing… Until he fell from the tower. We always feared he would fall someday. And finally it happened. And then Theon Greyjoy killed him, but it was later."

Sansa felt tears threatening to flood her eyes, but she maintained them inside. It was still difficult to think about her dead brothers. She felt Tyrion’s thumb rubbing the back of her hand. It was comforting. She looked back at him and saw the same sorry eyes he had so often in her presence.

“I’m sorry for your brothers. You loved your brothers, much as I love Jaime.”

There would have been a time when Sansa would have denied it and stated her family were traitors, just like when Tyrion arrived at King’s Landing and she really talked to him for the first time. But she knew him better now. She nodded to show it was the case. “And now they’re dead,” she added mournfully.

“Not all of them. You still have one who’s alive.” Sansa realized Tyrion was right. Jon was at the Wall, protected from the Crown thanks to his belonging to the Night’s Watch. “You should write to him.”

That wasn’t the first time Tyrion suggested Sansa asked news about Jon. She wasn’t sure about it. “I was never close to Jon. Arya spent much more time with him. I always considered him as a bastard more than a brother.” Sansa regretted she treated Jon differently from Robb, Bran and Rickon now, but she couldn’t change the past. Perhaps Jon wouldn’t even want to speak to her.

“Yes, he’s a bastard, but he’s your brother all the same. And he is the last member of your family who’s still alive, and you are his last sister. You should write to him. Nothing stops you any longer. The Night’s Watch may even be happy to know the Lady of Casterly Rock is exchanging letters with her brother at the Wall. They always like to have links with the powerful families so they may get help when need be.”

Sansa remained thoughtful for a moment. She didn’t know what to do about it. Finally, she couldn’t make a choice. “I’ll think about it.”

They reached their rooms and entered. It wouldn’t be too long before they had to go to the Great Sept of Baelor to attend the royal wedding. Sansa wasn’t in any hurry or eagerness to assist it. She didn’t want to be close to Joffrey for another second, even less after his threats during the breakfast. She had reddened and wanted to push him from the top of a tower at this moment. She wasn’t his pawn anymore. She was Tyrion’s wife, the Lady of the Westerlands, and he had no right to treat her this way like he used to do. She never wanted so much to apply the maxim A Lannister always pays her debts. Sadly, because of her new status as Lady of House Lannister, she had no choice but to be present at the wedding. She couldn’t pretend an illness to the stomach or something similar like she could before.

“You never asked me why your mother arrested me before the war. I mean, you never asked me before I told you the whole truth about it.” Sansa noticed Tyrion was looking away from her as he asked the question.

“Well, she accused you of trying to murder Bran because of Littlefinger’s lies. I know it wasn’t true. She made a mistake. Why?”
“In fact, once we arrived at the Eyrie your aunt accused me as well to have murdered your uncle, Jon Arryn.”

Tyrion was acting very strangely, as if he was ashamed of something. He had the same behaviour than when he told her about his first wife. He refused to look directly into her eyes and remained at a respectful distance from her. Why was he acting this way?

“Sansa, I never tried to harm your brother Brann in any way.”

“Of course, I know.” For Sansa, Tyrion trying to harm a child was simply impossible.

“And I mean no harm to you.”

“I know.” Sansa didn’t understand. Why did he tell her all these things? She already knew them after so much time. “Why are you telling me this?”

Tyrion tightened his lips before he answered. “There is something I must tell you, but not right now, with the wedding and everything. I’ll tell you tomorrow.” He approached and took her hand and his own. “I just want you to know one thing. I won’t ever hurt you.”

Sansa smiled. He didn’t have to tell her. “Tyrion, it’s been a very long time now that I’ve known that.”

They remained in this position for quite a long time, just looking in the eyes of the other. Finally, Tyrion broke the moment and released her hand from his. “I need to speak with my brother. Don’t worry, I’ll be back in time to accompany you to the ceremony. That won’t take long.”

Tyrion just left her like this. She wished they had remained in this position for more time. His eyes were beautiful. She never really realized how beautiful they were until now. Sansa had been sitting during the whole conversation, so they had been of the same height at this moment, just like when they walked in the gardens. Sansa had felt attracted to him. She felt she could have stayed this way, lost into his eyes, for hours. He was kind. He was brave. He was gentle. He was strong. He was everything her father once promised her, and even more. How blind she had been. She wished Tyrion was still there. Why did he leave to see his brother? There were so many things she wanted to tell him right now. And yet, if he was there, right before her, she didn’t know what she would tell him.

Sansa remained lost in her thoughts for a very long time. She remembered the day she and Tyrion were wed. She had been more than nervous at this moment. She had feared the moment they would have to retire to their wedding bed and come as husband and wife. By luck, Tyrion’s drunkenness spared them the bedding ceremony, and he was merciful enough to not force her to consummate their marriage. But right now, she thought about the time they shared a kiss during the wedding ceremony. Sansa couldn’t really remember how it was. She thought she felt nothing when he kissed her. She didn’t remember feeling anything. Perhaps in her tense state she shielded herself against any feeling. She wished she could remember how this kiss had been. She wondered how it would be to kiss her husband, how it would be to feel his lips on hers. Tyrion may surprise you. From what I’ve heard, he’s quite experienced. She was beginning to wonder what type of experience he had.

The door opened and Mira came in. She looked around before she talked to her mistress. Sansa knew it was because she wanted to make sure no one else was present when she would call her by her name. “Sansa.”

“Mira, I’m glad to see you again. Did you like the breakfast?” Mira was among the handmaidens who served the food during the breakfast with the king. She remained discreet as always in these moments.

“As much as I could like it, Sansa.” Sansa knew by her facial expression and the look in her eyes what she meant. Joffrey’s behaviour had been unpleasant for everyone. Sansa noticed Mira was holding something in her hands. It looked like a gown.

“What is it, Mira?”

“It’s your gown for the wedding.” Sansa looked surprised at her. The gown Mira was holding was red. Cersei already sent her a brown gown with golden sides and sleeves. Mira seemed to notice her questioning look, “Lord Tyrion ordered a new one to be made for you as soon as he could. He thought you deserved something better for the occasion.”

Tyrion never told her about it. Mira went to the bed and unfolded the gown on it for Sansa to see it entirely. Sansa couldn’t believe what she saw. She remembered the golden gown she had for her own wedding. It had been gorgeous, but Sansa didn’t like it because of the situation and the lion motives on it. This one was even more amazing. It was a deep red gown made of silk, with thin lines of gold and silver running all over its surface and joining where Sansa’s heart would be when she would wear the gown. The neckline was golden, the hem was silver. Mira turned it to show her the interior of the gown. All the fabric inside was silver colored. Red outside, silver inside. Lannister outside, Stark inside. Sansa never thought she could like a Lannister gown so much.

Mira was smiling at her. “You knew,” Sansa told her on an accusing tone.

“Forgive me, my lady.” Mira apologized, without losing her smile. “Lord Tyrion wanted it to be a surprise, but he asked me about your preferences. He turned half the dressmakers of King’s Landing mad with it. They worked day and night on this gown.” Sansa could barely hold a cry of joy. She stared at the gown in wonder. “I think it will be much more beautiful on you, Sansa.”

Sansa came back to life and positioned herself so Mira may help her to don the gown. Mira took care of her hair after. She braided Sansa’s hair in a very complicated way with many braids. She added a gorgeous golden hair net on it to hold it all, with two bigger braids falling before her shoulders. Finally she put Sansa’s necklace around her neck. That was the most important thing. Sansa would never go to Margaery’s wedding without the necklace Tyrion gave her. When Sansa looked at her reflection in the glass, she realized how beautiful it looked. The dressmakers really outdid themselves. She would have to reward them. Sansa realized it was time to leave for the wedding. Where was Tyrion? She wondered what he would think of her.

Tyron arrived two minutes later. He wore a handsome black doublet with several symbols that made him look taller than usual. Sansa rose to welcome him, and also to allow him to see how she really looked in her new gown. After he shut the door behind him, he stayed here, his mouth half-open. Sansa was smiling at him. He’s impressed. He seemed to recover after a moment.

“My lady. Lady Mira, may you leave me alone with my wife a moment. Wait for us outside, it won’t take very long.”

“Of course. My lord. My lady.” Mira left and Sansa was alone with Tyrion. He stood there, not moving, only looking at her. It lasted quite a long time. Sansa wondered what he thought. Why was he saying nothing?

“Is there something wrong?”

Tyron seemed to wake up a second time. “Sorry, Sansa. It’s just… I didn’t think you could be more beautiful than you already are.” Sansa flushed from head to toe. “I guess I must stop to compliment you, or else you’ll turn redder than the gown.”

They both chuckled. “Thank you, Tyrion. I like it.”

“I hope you’ll like the other surprise as well.”

Another surprise? Tyrion took something inside his doublet. It was a leather box that looked like the one he gave to Sansa for her fifteenth name day, but this one looked bigger. He closed the distance between them and opened the box under her eyes. It contained a medallion constituted of a huge red ruby with a little golden lion above it. The chain was entirely made of gold. Sansa knelt to observe it more closely. It was very beautiful.

“The Ladies of Casterly wore this for five centuries. My mother was the last one to wear it.”

Sansa looked at Tyrion. He seemed to expect a reply from her. “Thank you. It’s really beautiful. Do you really think I should wear it?” Sansa wasn’t sure if she should wear a medallion that belonged to Tyrion’s mother before.

“Of course.” Tyrion looked as if he never heard something more stupid. “It’s yours now.”

“Thank you.” That was all Sansa could say. It really was gorgeous, no matter it was red.

“Can I…?” He made gestures with his hands. He wanted to put it around her neck.

“Yes, of course.” Sansa turned her back to allow her husband to pass the necklace around her neck. He dismissed her two braids behind her temporarily and passed the golden link around her neck, attaching its two extremities behind her. Then he put back her braids into place before her shoulders. She felt his hands brushing her skin around her neck and shuddered at the feeling. Tyrion went back before her and she rose. He observed her a moment and declared: “You’re perfect. Far too much perfect for me.”

“No, you’re very handsome as well.” Before their wedding, she told him he was handsome, but didn’t believe it. Now she did.

Tyrion chuckled. “Yes. The husband of your dreams.” He didn’t believe her. He continued before Sansa could deny it. “I think it’s time to go. We cannot miss the wedding of my nephew.” He offered a hand and Sansa took it.

They walked through the Red Keep without incident and went to their litter. Mira was following behind them and walked beside their litter, just like Bronn and Podrick. Tyrion closed the shutters, saying the people of King’s Landing would probably throw dung at them if they saw him, and he didn’t want them to ruin her gown. Sansa wasn’t sure if it was true, but she complied all the same. She knew people weren’t always loved as they should. Tyrion did more than anyone else in the government for the people of King’s Landing, and despite this he told her one day he was the most despised member of the small council in all the city. People blamed him for the ills of the city during the time he was acting Hand of the King. And things hadn’t gone better after he became Master of Coin. Sansa knew it was possible. She had been hated by the people as well because she was betrothed to Joffrey during a period of starvation and because her family were seen as traitors.

“I’m afraid we’re going to have a problem at the wedding,” Tyrion suddenly said.

“What do you mean?”

“People won’t be able to choose who to look at: the bride, or you.”
Sansa flushed again. “They will all be looking at Margaery. She’s the one who’s getting married.”

“If I wasn’t your husband, I would look at you instead to look at her.”

“And because you’re my husband, you’ll be looking at Margaery instead of me?” Sansa asked it on a playful tone.

“Yes, because it is my duty to look at the groom and the bride, and because I won’t be seeing you for the first time when you’ll enter the Great Sept. The other way I wouldn’t be able to look away from you more than a few seconds.”

Sansa wanted him to stop complimenting her. She would really end redder than the gown. It seemed he understood that, so they talked about that thing and another until they reached the Great Sept of Baelor. When they entered, Sansa thought she saw some people turn their head to look at her. It seemed Tyrion wasn’t entirely wrong. As Lord and Lady of Casterly Rock, she and Tyrion had to speak to several of their bannermen who were present for the occasion. Sansa had tried to memorize all their names over the past few days, but she still had issues with some of them, especially those she never met up to now, or those she only saw a single time. There were so many people who talked to her during the last week. She couldn’t remember them all. Tyrion on the other hand knew all of them, though he said he regretted Podrick wasn’t there to help her. The squire knew all the sigils of the families of the Westerlands, but he had to wait outside the Great Sept. They talked with many highborn people, Sansa mostly with the ladies, Tyrion with the lords, until Ser Kevan walked in their direction.

“My lord. My lady.” It was strange for Sansa to hear Ser Kevan Lannister calling Tyrion his lord, but she guessed it shouldn’t be surprising since Tyrion was Ser Kevan’s lord now. “I would need to speak to you in private, Tyrion. It’s an urgent matter.”

Tyrion looked at his uncle for a moment, then turned to Sansa. “That won’t be long. I’m sure you can handle the other lords without me for a few minutes.” Sansa nodded. She spent the last week dealing with people crawling before or behind her, so a few minutes alone was no challenge for her.

Tyrion left with his uncle. They were only gone for a few seconds when she heard someone in her back. “Lady Lannister. You really grow more beautiful every day.”

Sansa turned to face Ser Loras Tyrell. Some time ago, she might have flushed and her heart may have threatened to explode in her chest, but now her heart didn’t react to his presence. It only reacted to the presence of one man and only one. “Ser Loras. It’s really kind of you. I’m sure you’re very eager to be the brother-in-law of our king.”

“Loras is as eager about this as he was eager to marry Cersei.” Lady Olenna Tyrell appeared right next to her grandson. “I think we owe you some thanks. Without you, the heir of Highgarden may have ended up married to a woman unable to give him children.”

The Queen of Thorns was the only one who could say such things so naturally. Well, Tyrion could as well, but he was more careful about where, when and to who he told these things. Margaery’s grandmother didn’t hold back in any case. That brought Sansa to make a bold statement as well.

“I’m sure your son thought about this during the trial.”

“Oh, Mace was always an idiot. He’s only an oaf. I’m very sorry about the fears he caused to you. I warned him it was dangerous to try to ride a lion, but as always he didn’t listen. A good thing the Red Viper was here to correct his mistakes, or who knows the situation we would be in. Anyway, we have a great debt towards you, Sansa.”
Sansa wished she could speak so freely all the time. Perhaps she would be able to do so once she would be at Casterly Rock. Ser Loras chose this moment to take his leave. “If you will pardon me, my ladies. I wish you a good day.”

He wasn’t interested by the conversation, it was quite obvious. Sansa was left with the Queen of Thorns, something she didn’t hate at all. She was much less boring than anyone else. Only Tyrion could compete with her about making lively conversations. Sansa noticed the mother of Lord Tyrell was looking down at her neck with a strange expression. It didn’t last long, but she thought she saw something like surprise and incomprehension on her face for a moment.

“This is a beautiful necklace you have here. May I have a closer look at it?”

“Of course, Lady Olenna.” The Queen of Thorns took the ruby into her right hand and examined it closely. Her expression was indecipherable. “It belonged to my husband’s mother. He gave it to me today.”

Lady Olenna let go the necklace. “What a kind and generous husband you have.” The Tyrell matriarch took a step back and looked at Sansa from head to toe. “You look exquisite. The wind has been at you, though.” She took a somber expression. “I haven’t had the opportunity to tell you how sorry I was to hear about your brother. War is war, but killing a man at a wedding, horrid. What sort of monster would do such a thing? As if men need more reasons to fear marriage. Now that peace has come and all is right with the world, I hope your husband will be able to bring you to Highgarden for a visit. It would do you good to see some of the world.”

“I thank you, Lady Olenna. But my husband and I must first go to Casterly Rock. I have to see the castle whose lady I am now. I must learn and perform my duties first, but I would be very happy to visit Highgarden as soon as I can.”

“You are very wise, Sansa. Try to stay like you are and to influence your husband. I would like to say it is a sad thing that you didn’t marry my grandson, but I’m afraid it is only sad for us and all too good for you.”

Sansa could only agree inside with the old woman. “I’m sure you’ll find another suitable wife for your son.”

“Oh, no doubt about it. He’s still the most desirable bachelor in all the Seven Kingdoms. Young women who love knights will all flock towards him in the hope he may ask for their hand.” Just as I once hoped. “Now, if you’ll excuse me, I’ll join these other ladies of the Reach who are only here in the hope to get some favor from their lord’s mother.” The Lady Olenna left towards some women clad in Reach clothes. Sansa recognized a few of them for spending time with them along with Margaery during the last days.

Before Sansa could move again, someone else addressed her from her left. “Sansa.” She turned and came face to face with Tommen. “Oh, forgive me… Lady Lannister.”

Sansa had to smile. The young boy looked so shy before her. “Hi, Tommen. I’m glad to see you. You are very handsome today.”

The boy flushed. He remembered Sansa of Podrick for a second. “Thank you, Sansa. Sorry, my lady.”

“You can call me Sansa, Tommen. There’s no problem. We’re of the same age and of the same family now. No need for formalities.”
“Thank you, Sansa.” He looked happy and relieved. He was the total opposite of Joffrey. How could two brothers be so different? Sansa thought a moment about herself and Arya, but it didn’t count. Even she and Arya were more alike than Joffrey and Tommen. Tommen continued to speak. “I don’t know how to call you anymore. I always called you by your name before, but now you’re my aunt and the Lady of Casterly Rock. I don’t know any longer by which name to call you.”

“Sansa will be enough, Tommen.” He really was a sweet boy, even more for his age.

“Tommen!” Sansa knew this voice only too well. The Queen Regent was before her and Tommen within a few seconds. She wore a black gown to show she mourned her father. Sansa thought she probably mourned much more her failed attempts to have Tyrion killed. “I told you to stay close to me.”

“Sorry, mother. I was only talking to Sansa.” Tommen looked down at his feet. Cersei seemed to notice Sansa’s presence for the first time.

“Ah, hello little dove.” The queen pronounced the two last word with venom.

“Your Grace.” For the short time you can still be called that way, Sansa reflected, “I’m afraid it is inappropriate to call a lady by such a nickname, especially when she is the lady of your house.” Perhaps Sansa should have talked more carefully to Cersei, but it seemed her discussion with the Queen of Thorns made her tongue looser. Anyway, she was in no mood to spare any torment to Cersei after she tried to kill Tyrion.

“Oh, forgive me. I forgot you were married now. After all, you’re not far from an unwed young girl. Something is still missing to your marriage.”

It wasn’t difficult to figure out what the woman meant. Sansa didn’t let herself being taken aback by her remark. “You are all forgiven, your Grace. I’m sure you know much more than me on this matter. After all, you have three children coming from a complete and successful marriage with the king. It’s a good thing everyone knows Lord Renly and Lord Stannis are liars.”

Cersei’s face lost her satisfied smile. “Of course, everyone knows they were liars. Just like your father and your brother.” A smile spread again on the queen’s face, but Sansa didn’t blink. She remained impassive, holding the queen’s gaze. Cersei couldn’t hurt her using her family anymore. The queen kept her smile for a certain time, but she realized quite quickly her words didn’t have the desired effect on Sansa. Cersei could talk, but it was all she could do. She had no power. Her words were wind.

“What is this?” Following the queen’s glare, Sansa guessed she was looking at her neck.

“It’s a necklace, your Grace.” Cersei herself was wearing a huge necklace exhibiting three big golden circles with images of lions. The two necklaces Sansa wore were more than simple in comparison.

“How dare you! This necklace belonged to my mother. Take it off right now!”

“No, she won’t.” Tyrion appeared from behind Sansa. “I offered it to her. The Lady of Casterly Rock is the only one who may wear this necklace.”

“She is no lady of Casterly Rock. Her whole family is a bunch of traitors.”

“I must contradict you, your Grace.” Sansa spoke calmly. She wouldn’t stoop to Cersei’s level. “Your son, our king, recognized me as Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands, and Lady of Winterfell. I’m sure you wouldn’t make the mistake to speak against your son’s decisions.” Cersei was agape before her words, it was quite obvious. “Anyway, my family are no traitors. I am a Lannister now. Would you say your own family are traitors?”

Cersei couldn’t find an answer to that. She could only say in a low voice. “You will never be a Lannister. You may wear our colors, but you will never be one of us. Come, Tommen.”

Cersei left with a confused and sad Tommen. The boy surely didn’t like what he just saw. Sansa was again alone with Tyrion.

“Are you alright?” he asked.

“Yes, I am. Thank you.”

“You got yourself out of this quite well. We should take place, the bride is about to arrive.”

People were effectively taking their places as they spoke. Tyrion and Sansa found themselves on the right side of the alley Margaery would cross with her father, at the first rank with Ser Kevan Lannister and Tommen. Cersei was left behind Tommen and beside Ser Jaime. Sansa felt the queen’s eyes upon her. The Tyrells were on the left side of the sept.

Margaery entered, standing tall with the sun behind her. She wore a light white gown with leaves and branches drawn on it. Her gown left her arms and chest bare. Her brown hair were forming some sort of peak over her head with many curls. She walked graciously through the alley at the arm of her father. When they reached the level where Joffrey stood, Lord Mace released Margaery from his arm and let Joffrey take it, bowing deeply before him. Margaery was smiling at Joffrey.

Sansa knew Margaery wasn’t happy to marry Joffrey. She was happy to marry the king, nothing more. When Sansa thought about it, that was probably the case for her too before. She had been happy to marry Joffrey because he was the prince. She thought she was marrying a charming prince, like one in the stories. It had been approximately the same when she thought she would marry Ser Loras. She thought she was marrying the handsome knight like those in the stories. She was in love with the prince and the Knight of Flowers. She wasn’t in love with Joffrey or Loras. She thought about the man standing on her left. With Tyrion, it was different. She liked him for who he was, not for who she thought he was. His titles didn’t attract her. It was so different. She was happy with him. Not happy like when she was happy about marrying the prince or the knight. It had been a child’s happiness. She had thought everything would be perfect like in the stories. Life wasn’t a story, now she knew it. Her marriage with Tyrion wasn’t a perfect one, far from it, but it was a marriage where she could trust her husband, share good moments with him despite the horrible things that happened to both of them.

The ceremony went without incident. Joffrey was of the same height than Margaery, so she didn’t have to kneel so he could wrap her into the Lannister cloak. Sansa wondered why he put a Lannister cloak on her shoulders. Shouldn’t it be a Baratheon cloak? The High Septon said the usual words, then tied Joffrey’s and Margaery’s hand with a white ribbon, proclaiming their union after the groom and the bride said their vows. The High Septon said Joffrey was from Houses Lannister and Baratheon, naming House Lannister first. Then finally Joffrey pledged his supposed love with a kiss as people applauded. Tyrion and she joined the applause, not with much enthusiasm. Joffrey and Margaery turned to face the crowd, hand in hand.

“We have a new queen,” said Sansa in a low voice to her husband, rolling her eyes.

“Better her than you.” Sansa could only agree with Tyrion.

Margaery and Joffrey led the long parade from the Great Sept to the gardens of the Red Keep where the seventy-seven courses feast would take place. Sansa found herself sitting on the dais on the married pair’s left. Tyrion was on her right, Tommen on her left. Only Tommen separated her from Cersei, and only Ser Kevan separated Tyrion from Joffrey. Singers, musicians, jugglers, fools and other artists filled the spaces between the many tables. The feast began after a prayer by the High Septon and a toast from Joffrey for Margaery.

The first service was a creamy soup of mushrooms and buttered snails, served in gilded bowls. Tyrion finished very quickly, and to Sansa’s despair, he filled entirely a cup of wine. Sansa didn’t like to see Tyrion drink. She never saw someone drink so much. She made sure during the breakfast he wouldn’t have more than a cup, and she would make sure of the same for this feast. Sansa seized the jug next to him and put it far away, close to Tommen. She knew Joffrey’s brother wouldn’t drink wine.

“What are you doing?” Tyrion complained.

“You’re not going to spend the feast drinking.” She said it on a firm tone, the same that showed it was no use to argue.

“I don’t drink Milk of the Poppy anymore.”

“No, but you still drink too much.”

“With all the food we’re going to eat, I’m going to need a lot of wine.”

“I’ll give you back the jug at the tenth service.”

“The tenth? My lady, you’re really cruel.”

“For your own good. That’s what a good wife must do.”

They argued with amused and mocking voices. That wasn’t entirely serious. Sansa knew Tyrion drank in his solar while working, but she didn’t want to see him drunk again. Tyrion wasn’t angry at her for that. He only played the hurt husband who just lost his wine. But Sansa knew he would empty the jug quite quickly if she let it before him.

“Sansa, you’re going to make me the most sober man in the Seven Kingdoms.” They both burst into laughs, which brought some looks from Ser Kevan and even Joffrey and Margaery. Sansa noticed Ser Kevan was looking at her with a little smile. He seemed to enjoy the situation as well. Sansa never saw his brother smile, and Tyrion told her once Lord Tywin never smiled.

The second course was a pastry coffin filled with pork, pine nuts, and eggs. Tyrion was done with it before Sansa was at the half. How could he eat so quickly? “Two done. Seventy-five to come,” he commented.

A first singer came to perform before Joffrey and Margaery. He called himself Hamish the Harper and performed a new song he just invented, Lord Renly’s Ride. The song told the sad story about Renly repenting his attempt to usurp Joffrey’s Crown after his death and how he defied the Lord of Death to come back to life in order to protect the Realm against Lord Stannis. Sansa saw Margaery’s about to cry as the song ended and Renly flew to Highgarden to steal one last look at his true love’s face. Sansa had to admit the song was beautiful. If she heard it a few years ago, she would have wept.

“Renly Baratheon never repented of anything in his life, but if I was a judge in a contest, he would win a gilded lute,” Tyrion said.
“I agree. The song may not be true, but it’s beautiful all the same.” That reminded Sansa of the bard at Winterfell.

Many other songs were played. There were songs from the Westerlands, ballads from the Reach, some Dornish songs. A Rose of Gold. Maiden, Mother, and Crone. My Lady Wife. Sansa worshiped the last one when she still lived in Winterfell. She remembered the bard who came one day sang it. There were many singers and jugglers who performed for them. Sansa had to listen to many versions of The Rains of Castamere. She knew this song was made to honor Tywin Lannister, but seven times seemed a little too much. After the first version, she spent the following ones talking with Tyrion. She asked him questions about Casterly Rock. She wanted to know how it looked before they went there. Tyrion didn’t seem to complain about talking during the songs. He didn’t seem to appreciate so many versions of The Rains of Castamere either.

There were a few songs that surprised Sansa and she liked to listen. A young woman named Karliene performed My Featherbed, Mother’s Hymn and The Song of the Seven… and, she had to admit it, a very beautiful and sad version of The Rains of Castamere. She had a wonderful voice and a very good bard to accompany her. Sansa thought she would like to hear more songs from her. There was also a man with a black beard who came with many musicians, including drummers, pipers and fiddlers. They played a beautiful song, describing it like a miracle of sound. The song was very pleasant, though Sansa wasn’t sure about its signification at the beginning.

When winter comes

When life is frozen

When the moors they hide away under the snow

Fingers of doom

Will clutch the chosen

All beasts will shiver, from the lion to the crow

When winter comes

When times are starkest

When the wailing of the wolves fades with the sun

The wilds are numb

The days are darkest

The fates of many cease to rest on only one

Walls will not hold the winter

Over and under crawl

Walls will not hold the winter
The song brought back to Sansa memories about the stories Old Nan used to tell them. This song strangely remembered her of the ones about the White Walkers. Joffrey didn’t really seemed to care about this song, but Sansa did. In the end she decided she liked it.

During an umpteenth version of The Rains of Castamere, Joffrey showed he was bored by this song him too. “Very good. Very good. Off you go.” He threw a few pieces to the musicians, sending them away. The three poor men picked up as many pieces as they could on the floor before they quickly left. A few people laughed among the guests, but everyone on the dais wasn’t. Sansa noticed Margaery whispering something to Joffrey. The king rose and tapped his goblet with a spoon.

“Everyone. The queen would like to say a few words.” People applauded as the new queen rose. She was the one people really loved in the royal couple.

“We are so fortunate to enjoy this marvelous food and drink. Not all among us are so lucky. To thank the gods for bringing the recent war to a just end, King Joffrey has decreed that the leftovers from our feast be given to the poorest in his city.”

People applauded and Sansa joined them, though not with as much enthusiasm as she wished. She didn’t agree with the fact the war came to a just end. This war was a mistake and a nonsense ever since the beginning. All this was caused by a few lies from a brothelkeeper. However, Sansa appreciated Margaery and she knew she was sincere when she decided to help the others. Of course, she knew Margaery used it as a way to be popular as well, but all the same, Sansa guessed it was better than to have the leftovers thrown into Blackwater Bay or left for dogs.

“Good thing. With the number of children still starving in the city and the many people who would kill for a radish, that may help to reduce the starvation a little.” Tyrion looked bitter as he spoke. Sansa knew how he found the royal wedding extravagant. Also, it was unfair in some way. Tyrion made a lot of effort whilst he was Hand of the King to make sure the population of King’s Landing could eat... after the Tyrells closed the Roseroad. He didn’t receive the recognition he deserved.

Sansa leaned towards him and whispered in his ear. “You did more for these people than everyone else. I know it.” She kissed him on the cheek. He looked surprised for a moment, but then smiled at her. He seemed happy.

Sansa saw Brienne come before Joffrey and Margaery and bow before them. “My king. My queen.” She wore a very simple blue gown. There were no ornaments or symbols on it, except the sigil of her house. She was probably the person dressed in the simplest way here, and yet Sansa could only think it didn’t suit her at all. Brienne really was in her element when wearing the complete set of a knight, along with a sword and a dagger at her belt, but she couldn’t wear it at the royal wedding. It was so strange and... unnatural to see her dressed this way.

Margaery rose to welcome her and took her hand. “Lady Brienne. So good of you to come.”

“I’m no lady, your Grace.”

“Did you just bow?” This comment came from Cersei. She was laughing at Brienne.

“Apologies, your Grace. I never did master the curtsey.”

“You’re the one who put a sword through Renly Baratheon.” It was Joffrey this time who spoke, but Margaery came to Brienne’s help immediately.

“That’s not true, my love. Brienne had nothing to do with it.” It was a good thing Margaery quickly corrected Joffrey. Brienne wouldn’t tell the story about the shadow.

“A shame. I’d knight the man that put an end to that deviant’s life.” As if you didn’t have a more deviant life.

Brienne managed to keep her composure despite Joffrey’s impertinence. “I just wanted to congratulate you both and wish you good fortune. The country has been at war too long. I hope your reign is long and peaceful.”

“Yes, yes.” Joffrey was bored, as always. Let’s hope his reign is peaceful and short as possible.

“Thank you. I hope we see more of you.” Sansa doubted Margaery’s words would come true. Brienne was going to accompany her and Tyrion to Casterly Rock when they would leave in a few days. And for now, Sansa wasn’t about to come back to King’s Landing any sooner once she would leave it. Brienne left, but Sansa saw Cersei intercepting her before she was too far away. She didn’t hear their conversation, but from Brienne’s expression, she thought Cersei told her something that scared her. When Cersei came back to her place beside Tommen, Sansa noticed an assassin look on her face. She would have to talk about it to Brienne later.

In the meantime, Tyrion was talking with his uncle. Sansa thought she heard the name of Alysanne Lefford. The name of Lefford wasn’t unfamiliar to her. Moon Boy started to juggle with balls, not very well. Joffrey decided to make his show more entertaining.

“A gold dragon to whoever knocks my fool’s hat off.”

The fool was immediately receiving oranges, peaches, apples, and any other food that could be thrown from everywhere. Sansa wished it was Ser Dontos who had been present to receive the food. Which service were they at now? They were eating crabs boiled in fiery eastern spices, trenchers filled with chunks of chopped mutton stewed in almond milk with carrots, raisins, and onions, and fish tarts fresh from the ovens. The latter was so hot it burned the fingers. Sansa didn’t recognize some of the food they served since she never saw it before, so Tyrion had to explain her what it was. She guessed she could allow Tyrion to have another cup of wine. She poured wine for both of them. She needed wine as well.

“Oh, thank you,” Tyrion said as she filled his cup. “A toast. To the new Lady of Casterly Rock, and of Winterfell.” They collided their cups and drink. Sansa had to smile. She hoped this wedding feast wouldn’t last too long. Joffrey turned more insufferable and improper each time he opened the mouth. She wanted to be alone with Tyrion.

Suddenly, other clanks from spoon’s knocks on a goblet brought the silence. Ser Kevan stood up. “My lords, my ladies. We are here today to celebrate a new century. Three hundred years ago, Aegon the Conqueror landed in this very place and built his very first fortress of wood and earth. Within two years, he united seven kingdoms previously separated, constantly at war with each other. Aegon wasn’t called the Conqueror for nothing, but despite the wars he led, he was a man of peace. By the unity he brought to the Seven Kingdoms, he gave peace and prosperity to millions of people. Through the centuries that followed, many men contributed to maintain the work Aegon did. One of them left us not long ago. Tywin Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands, and Warden of the West, was Hand of the King for twenty years under Aerys the Second, then again recently for his grandson, King Joffrey. Some people disapproved, even despised him, but despite all of this, he brought peace and prosperity to the Seven Kingdoms and worked harder than most Hands of the King all over history. He left us recently, dying peacefully. I would ask everyone to observe a minute of silence in the memory of this man who dedicated his life to the Realm.”

People remained silent for what looked like a minute. Sansa saw Joffrey struggling to say nothing, barely contained by Margaery’s hand on his arm and her smiles. Sansa wondered if he was drunk. He probably was. What would happen next? The minute passed.

“Now, let’s drink to the peace he brought. Let’s drink to the king he served and his new queen, and let’s drink to the new Lord and the new Lady of Casterly Rock, Lord Tyrion and Lady Sansa of House Lannister.”

People cheered all around as they raised their cup. Sansa felt Ser Kevan looking at her and Tyrion while he drank, a smile on his face. He really was different from his brother.

“Thank you, Uncle,” Tyrion told him in a low voice.

Sansa saw Prince Oberyn and his paramour approaching them. “Lord Tyrion. Lady Sansa.”

“Prince Oberyn. Lady Ellaria.” Tyrion was the one to greet them. So that was the name of this woman. Ellaria.

“I’m no lady, my lord,” the woman pointed out. “But I appreciate the intention.”
“How should I call you then?”

“Ellaria will be quite enough,” the prince intervened. “I don’t believe you have met her, Lady Sansa. I present you my paramour, Ellaria Sand.”

No, indeed. Sansa never spoke to her. She only saw her from afar a few times. Sansa was surprised Prince Oberyn brought her here. She knew by her name she was a bastard of Dorne, but it wasn’t the time to talk about it. She extended her hand to the woman. “It is a pleasure to meet you, Ellaria.”

“The pleasure is all mine, my lady. My lord.” She made little curtsies, but it was obvious she didn’t really know how to make one. Sansa ignored it. Her gown left her chest and half her belly bare, much like Prince Oberyn’s clothes.

“I hope you both enjoy the feast with what it cost. I heard it emptied the coffers of the Crown.” Sansa knew what the prince meant. Tyrion answered diplomatically.

“That’s not a problem. Even if the chests of the Crown were empty the war is over. We have all the time we need to fill them again.”

“Unless there is another war. There would be very good reasons for many people in my country to start a new war against a lord who protects assassins.” Prince Oberyn’s voice was threatening. Sansa didn’t like it. “In some places the highborn frown upon those of low birth. In other places the rape and murder of women and children is considered distasteful. What a fortunate thing for you, Lord Lannister, that you sent your niece Myrcella to live in the latter sort of place.”

Sansa looked at Tyrion. He was staring directly at the prince. What did it mean? Was Oberyn Martell threatening Tyrion to have Myrcella killed? Why would Dornishmen kill her? She was to marry the heir to Sunspear. After a moment, Tyrion put a smile on his face. “We both don’t have to worry, Prince Oberyn. I think we both know my lifestyle is not so far from the Dornish way of life, at least until recently. And it so happens that I agree with you. I can assure you that no one can murder or rape with impunity as long as I am Lord of the Westerlands.”

Prince Oberyn seemed to consider what Tyrion just said, then smiled as well. “I see. Then we have an agreement.”

“We’ll talk about it later. Come to see me tomorrow in my solar.”

Oberyn Martell and Ellaria Sand left. Sansa didn’t really know what she just witnessed. She was about to ask the question to Tyrion when there were new taps on a goblet. It was Joffrey again. What stupidity would he make this time?

“Everyone, silence. Clear the floor. There’s been too much amusement here today. A royal wedding is not an amusement. A royal wedding is history. The time has come for all of us to contemplate our history. My lords, my ladies…” As Joffrey spoke, a servant opened the mouth of a giant lion’s head. Then Joffrey theatrically shouted. “I give you King Joffrey, Renly, Stannis, Robb Stark, Balon Greyjoy. The War of the Five Kings.”

Five dwarves emerged from the lion’s mouth. Each of them represented one of the five kings. The one representing Joffrey rode a fake lion, Renly rode a man with blond hair (probably Ser Loras), Stannis a woman with red hair and huge breasts, Robb a normal horse, and Balon Greyjoy a kraken. Sansa’s brother was presented with a wolf’s head. Sansa looked at Tyrion. He didn’t seem pleased by the show, and neither she was.

The dwarf personifying Joffrey declared: “Let the war begin.” Stannis started by beating Renly while Robb was defeating Balon Greyjoy and proclaiming himself King in the North. Then Joffrey sent an arrow on Stannis and his uncle exploded with wildfire. Then Stannis fled and only Robb and Joffrey were left. Sansa heard Tyrion say something to Podrick who was right behind them.

“Pay each of them twenty gold when this is done. We’ll have to find another way to thank the king.”

When the dwarves appeared, most of the people were laughing and applauding. However, as the performance went on, the laughter diminished. Ser Loras left the dais. Margaery had a hand on her mouth and was obviously displeased. All the Tyrells were, and most of the Lannisters. Tommen laughed at the beginning, but now he didn’t. Only Cersei and Joffrey seemed to enjoy it. Robb and Joffrey were now face to face. They charged three times one against the other. Sansa felt Tyrion’s hand wrapping hers. At the third charge, the wolf’s head fell from her brother’s body.

Sansa wasn’t at the wedding anymore. Well, she wasn’t at this wedding anymore. She was at another one, and she saw her brother stabbed in the heart, laying on the floor, multiple arrows piercing his body, the trace of a stabbing where his heart was. Another body, the one of a woman with black hair and tanned skin, her belly all bloody and heavy with child, was lying next to her brother’s corpse. She heard a scream, a scream she never heard before, but she knew to who it belonged. Her mother was there, standing with a hollow look. Then a man came from behind and cut her throat. And she saw someone removing her brother’s head with a sword while his body was brought outside. A man was sitting at the high table, drinking deeply with a wide smile. He was old, very old. She knew who it was. Walder Frey. And she looked at the other man who cut her mother’s throat. She never saw him before, no more than his great-grandfather, but she knew it was him. Black Walder. And another man was standing aside, holding the dagger he threw through her brother’s heart, a flawed man on his clothes. Roose Bolton.

Sansa felt a pressure on her shoulder. She came back to reality. She wasn’t at the Twins. She was in the Red Keep in King’s Landing. And she didn’t assist to the marriage of her uncle, but to the marriage of her nephew. A nephew she never wanted. A nephew who was mocking her brother’s death with jousting dwarves. Sansa looked at her left shoulder and realized Mira’s hand was on it. Her friend looked at her with a sorry look, then retreated behind Sansa. The Lady of Casterly Rock also realized her husband’s hand was still on hers. He was still watching the show, but it had come to an end. Most of the people were silent and seemed to wish they were somewhere else. There were a few applauses when the jousters bowed before Joffrey and Margaery. The king was laughing so hard he spit wine. Margaery never looked so unhappy to be married to Joffrey.

“Well fought. Well fought.” Joffrey was rising from his seat, a red purse in his hand. “Here you are. Champion’s purse. Though, you’re not the champion yet, are you? A true champion defeats all the challengers. Surely there are others out there who still dare to challenge my reign. Uncle. How about you? I’m sure they have a spare costume.”

This show wasn’t only meant for Joffrey to mock his opponents. He wanted to humiliate Tyrion of course. Sansa was boiling in fury. She had to bite her tongue to not yell at this monster. He was cruel, stupid, ill-bred, nasty, arrogant, smug, and ugly. He may look handsome from the outside to some people, but inside he was uglier than the Hound was outside. Sansa wanted to kill him right now for everything he forced her to endure since she left Winterfell, but also for everything he did to Tyrion and everyone else as well. But she couldn’t. She couldn’t kill the king. She refrained herself with great difficulty. She could feel Tyrion was tightening his grip on her hand. She tried to give a squeeze to his hand with her own before he did something foolish, but he was already putting his hand away from hers and rising from his seat, which didn’t change very much his height. Sansa saw Tyrion make the smile he always did when he was about to give a good reply to someone. And she wasn’t deceived.
“One taste of combat was enough for me, your Grace. I would like to keep what remains of my face. I think you should fight him. This was but a poor imitation of your own bravery on the field of battle. I speak as a firsthand witness. Climb down from the high table with your new Valyrian sword and show everyone how a true king wins his throne. Be careful, though. This one is clearly mad with lust. It would be tragedy for the king to lose his virtue hours before his wedding night.”

There were light laughter that followed Tyrion’s speech as he sat again. Everyone was looking intently at Joffrey, fearing or expecting what he would do next. Tyrion just humiliated him before everyone at his own wedding. Sansa didn’t blame Tyrion very much. Perhaps if Joffrey asked her the same she wouldn’t have been able to control herself, but she feared what might happen next. He shouldn’t have said this.

Joffrey grabbed his cup of wine and slowly walked on the dais until he was right behind Tyrion. Then he slowly shed the content of his cup on Tyrion’s head. Sansa noticed Cersei was the only person smiling at the situation. She really was Joffrey’s mother. Tyrion probably had a hard time to not throw his own cup at Joffrey. It seems he managed to control himself. Sansa did well by preventing him to drink.

“A fine vintage. Shame that it spilled.” Tyrion tasted the wine flowing on his face to emphasize what he said.

“It did not spill.” Joffrey refused to get out of the situation through the bait Tyrion was offering.

“My love, come back to me. It’s time for my father’s toast.” Sansa was very grateful towards Margaery in this instant. Sadly, Joffrey didn’t look like he wanted to let it go.

“Well, how does he expect me to toast without wine? Uncle, you can be my cupbearer seeing as you’re too cowardly to fight.”

Too cowardly to fight? You flew away from the battlements when your uncle was fighting to save your life. “Your Grace does me a great honor,” Tyrion commented.

“It’s not meant as an honor.” Joffrey really wouldn’t let Tyrion go with this.

Tyrion smiled again. “But I’m afraid I must refuse the appointment. I’m no fit for the task.”

“This is no appointment. This is an order. I am the king, and I make of you my cupbearer. So you’re going to serve me my wine.”

Tyrion waited for some more time, then replied again. “I’m going to do even better, your Grace. I will offer you my own wine.” Tyrion pushed his own goblet still half full before him. “It may not be an honor to be your cupbearer, but it is a great honor for someone to be offered the wine of a lord.”

Joffrey stared at Tyrion in fury and approached their place. He was right before them now, standing tall. “I said you would be my cupbearer. And I have nothing to receive from you. I am the king, and I decided you would be my cupbearer, Imp.”

Tyrion withstood Joffrey’s gaze for a long time, obviously angry at his nephew. Sansa was furious as well, but they both had to keep their calm. Finally, Tyrion left his seat and travelled all the way around the high table to Joffrey. The king was smiling cruelly at him. Sansa hoped it wouldn’t last long. Joffrey was handing his goblet to Tyrion when something even Sansa didn’t expect happened when Tyrion reached the king.

A hand slapped Joffrey on his right cheek. The goblet fell on the floor. Joffrey was staring in shock at Tyrion. Sansa’s husband just hit the king before everyone. Some cries followed the act.
“One word, and I hit you again.” Tyrion was pointing a finger towards Joffrey’s head. The king didn’t yet recover from his surprise.

“How dare you…” Another slap on his other cheek welcomed his attempt to speak.

“You’ll listen to me, nephew. You may be king. You have many rights, but you also have duties. Your father thought he could do as he liked and neglected his duties. You should ask your mother what happened to him if you don’t want to end the same way.”

Joffrey was furious. “You’re talking…” Another slap stopped Joffrey from speaking.

“I’m not over yet. You probably want to hide behind your mother’s skirts like you always did. But now it’s time for you to act like a king. You will go to your bride, kneel before her and apologize for your improper behaviour that ruined her wedding. Then you will sit back at your place beside her and behave like a king should for the rest of the feast. Do you understand?”

Joffrey looked terrified now. He wasn’t used to people talking to him without fearing his wrath. “You can’t…”

Tyrion slapped him another time. “Do you understand?”

Joffrey was shaking of all his body. There was no more anger in his eyes. He was afraid. He looked like the day Nymeria bit him and Arya threatened him with his own sword. He was a coward, nothing more. Even with his fine clothes and his crown, and even if he was taller than Tyrion, right in this moment he was nothing, and everyone could see it. After a moment, Joffrey finally obeyed and went to Margaery to apologize. Tyrion then excused himself, saying he needed a change of clothes. Sansa followed him, giving as an excuse she was tired. Mira and Podrick followed on her heels. There was a huge silence in the gardens and no one dared to speak.

When back to their chambers, Tyrion went to wash himself and change his wet clothes. That was such a nice doublet. Mira proposed to Sansa to change her clothes as well, but she refused. She didn’t want to get changed. When Tyrion came back, he was clad in more daily clothes.

“I’m sorry you had to be witness to this, Sansa.”

“You shouldn’t have done this.” Sansa let her feelings go out. “Joffrey could order to have you arrested anytime. We were going to leave for Casterly Rock in a few days. Why did you have to ruin everything?”

“I ruined nothing, Sansa. Joffrey is scared of me, you saw him. Kevan will make sure he stays in line. Perhaps what I just did put something good within his empty head.”

“Joffrey will come back for you before you leave. As soon as he finds back his certainty, he will order his guards to kill you.”

“If he ever does, the guards will know better than to obey him. My uncle is Hand of the King, I am the Lord of Casterly Rock, and my brother is the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard. Only the kingsguards are under Joffrey’s direct command now, and most of them know better than to obey his foolish orders. Only Meryn Trant and Boros Blount are stupid enough for that, and with Brienne, Bronn, the other kingsguards and all the Lannister guards inside the Red Keep, they won’t have many chances to carry out any order from Joffrey against me.”

“But they could try all the same. They only need a single moment when you’re alone or when Bronn and the other guards are distracted and they can kill you. I don’t want you to die. I forbid you to die.”
Sansa nearly yelled her last words. She wouldn’t accept it if Tyrion died, not when they were so close to leave this hell of a city. Tyrion patted her hands gently, then held them between his own. “I’m not going to die, Sansa. We’re safe. We’ll be far from here in a few days, and all this will only be a bad dream then.” He broke his hold on her hands and walked away from her, looking at the wall. “I had to do it. I’m tired of Joffrey’s cruelty. Someone has to teach him he can’t do everything he wants. If he understood that, I would never have been arrested by your mother for Joffrey’s crime.”

Arrested by my mother for Joffrey’s crime? “What do you mean?” What was Tyrion talking about? Her mother arrested him for Bran’s attempt of murder. Then it dawned on her. “Tyrion?”

“Joffrey paid the man who tried to kill your brother Bran.” He turned to face her. “I discovered it at the breakfast this morning. Do you remember the dagger I proposed to offer him? You saw his reaction. I described the same dagger that was used against Bran and that your mother showed me.”

Tyrion explained her everything. He surprised a discussion at Winterfell between Joffrey and the Hound. Send a dog to kill a wolf, his nephew had said. Tyrion talked with his brother after the breakfast and Ser Jaime told him the dagger effectively belonged to Littlefinger and that he lost it in a bet, but not to Tyrion. He lost it to King Robert. The king said while they were at Winterfell one day that people were too weak to give mercy to a crippled child like they did to a horse with a broken leg. Only Cersei and her children were present when he said that. Joffrey was hungry for a pat on the head from his father and probably thought, vicious as he was, that he was doing something Robert approved by sending a footpad to murder Bran. The dagger was probably among the weapons that followed the king to Winterfell in his wheelhouse.

When Tyrion had told everything, Sansa couldn’t understand. “All this war… for that! Because of Joffrey?” Sansa took her head between her hands. After a moment, she began to cry. Her father. Her mother. Robb. Bran. Rickon. Arya. All of them died because of this. Because of Joffrey’s cruelty. All this was his fault. He was a monster. He always was a monster. And Sansa had loved him. How could she be so stupid? She should have known. She saw who Joffrey was the day Nymeria attacked him. Why didn’t she realize who he was at this moment? Arya knew it right at this moment, and she was two years younger than Sansa. How couldn’t Sansa see what was so plain for her little sister? I’m stupid. A stupid little girl with stupid dreams who never learns.

She felt Tyrion’s hand on his shoulder. “I’m sorry, Sansa.”

Sansa turned to look at him. He was looking at her, a sorry look in his eyes. “Sorry? It’s Joffrey who should be. You should have killed him at the feast.” Anger substituted to despair. “Without him, nothing of all this would ever have happened. I would still have a family. He killed all of them. I want him dead.”

Tyrion hushed her and took her shoulders with his hands. She was shouting loudly as she could. “Don’t say it too loud. Sansa, to be honest, right now, I would like to see Joffrey dead. I was nearly pushed for a few hundred feet fall because of him, and anyway he tried to kill an innocent boy, and for the most stupid reason there is. I nearly regret now I never tried to have him killed. The world would be a much better place without him. But we can’t kill him. He’s the king, whether we like it or not.”

Sansa knew Tyrion’s words were true, but it didn’t help her to feel any better. All the same, she couldn’t let her anger dominate her. She calmed herself. “You’re right.” She still had tears on her cheeks. Tyrion took a handkerchief from inside his doublet and passed it on her cheeks. His eyes were full of compassion, like always. These were the times she loved the most to have him by her side. He was the only one who really showed her compassion ever since the beginning.
“We should stay here for the rest of the day. It wouldn’t do any good to go back to the feast, and with some hope, Joffrey will have forgotten everything tomorrow. Let’s hope Margaery can distract him well enough like she always does.”

Tyrion’s words caused Sansa to worry about Margaery. “Do you think she will be alright?” She didn’t want to see Margaery mistreated the way she was. What would Joffrey do to her during their wedding night?

“Well, she’s among the few people who can control Joffrey. On the other side, we just saw that her control over him wasn’t infallible. I guess all we can do is pray.” After a moment of silence he added: “Try to not think too much about it, Sansa. It’s no use to worry all the time. There’s nothing we can do for her anyway.”

Sansa wasn’t entirely reassured by Tyrion’s words, but he wasn’t wrong. There was nothing she could do for Margaery. They were at the end of the afternoon when they left the feast. They spent the hours left before night to discuss. They were in no good mood, but to talk helped them to spend time. Tyrion was the one to speak the most, describing Casterly Rock in all its details. Sansa thought she was beginning to have a good idea what the castle looked like, inside and outside. She talked about Winterfell as well, and Tyrion looked quite interested to learn more about it. They also took a small dinner late in the evening, and Sansa had to stop Tyrion from drinking again. When the time came to sleep, Sansa had Mira help her to slip on her nightgown. Tyrion didn’t try to sleep on the couch like he tried a few days ago.

As soon as they were both into bed, Sansa rested her head on his chest. She wanted to feel him close to her tonight. He passed an arm around her shoulders like after the ceremony when she was recognized Lady of Casterly Rock. She felt good in his arms. She listened to his heartbeat. It was steady. Sansa felt at peace, but she couldn’t manage to fall asleep. In fact she didn’t want to sleep. She felt too good this way, and there was a disturbing thought that refused to leave her mind. The bedding ceremony probably took place at this hour. Right now, Margaery was probably doing what Sansa should have done if things had been different. The simple thought of this sent shivers through her spine.

“You’re shaking.” Tyrion seemed to have realized it.

“It’s just… I could be in Margaery’s place, right now.” She shivered more violently for a short moment. “That could be me.”

“You don’t have to fear Joffrey anymore. He cannot hurt you now. He may think he still can, but he can’t.” Tyrion kissed the top of her head. She felt his breath through her hair. It was warm, comforting. His hand also began to wander on her back. Sansa shuddered, but not out of fear this time. She knew Tyrion would never hurt her. The sensation of his hand moving made her feel good. She closed her eyes and allowed the feeling to fill her. She felt she could stay in that position forever.

“Thank you,” she whispered after a moment.

“You don’t have to thank me for anything, Sansa. I have duties towards you as much as you have some towards me. And everything I could do wouldn’t erase the sufferings my family inflicted to you.”

“I don’t care. You had nothing to do with it. You’re different.”

Tyrion sighed. His hand left her back. “I wish I was. I’m a monster, just like the others. Only I won’t savage you.”
Sansa raised her head to look into his eyes. “I forbid you to call yourself a monster.”

Without thinking, Sansa leaned over Tyrion and kissed him on the lips. His mouth tasted wine. After a moment, she felt his own lips returning her kiss. Sansa kissed him more deeply, and Tyrion deepened the kiss as well. It felt so good. She didn’t want to stop.

There was a sudden hammering on the door outside. “My lord. My lord.” The broke their kiss and looked at each other. Tyrion seemed confused, and Sansa was confused as well. The knocks on the door and the calls continued.

“Excuse me, my lady.” Tyrion left the bed and walked to the door. What have I just done? Did I really do it? Did I kiss him? What took me to do it? Tyrion opened the door. From where she was, Sansa couldn’t see who he was talking to.

“What is it?”

“My lord. The king is dead.”

Chapter End Notes

By the way, the song I wrote here really exists. This is a song performed by Gavin Dunne, alias Miracle of Sound, who wrote this song specially about Game of Thrones. It is called "When winter comes". You can find it here on Youtube with an excellent videoclip: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ZDt3jeXGfDU

Also, the young woman named Karliene who performs four songs from the books during the feast really exists and she really did a version of each of these songs. Here are the links.
- The Rains of Castamere: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2l7wzOaODYQ
- Mother's Hymn: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=CKvOQXPrMA
- The Song of the Seven: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=h_alO42jYmo
- My featherbed: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SogjdgwYy9c

I just couldn't resist to include them in my fic. These songs are really wonderful.

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Tyrion XI

Chapter Notes

Here, Joffrey's body is found, and Tyrion reflects on what happened at the end of the last chapter.

After the precedent chapter, this one is very short and may look pitiful when compared to the royal wedding. The next chapter will have more content.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

TYRION XI

“My lord. The king is dead.”

The words the Lannister guard told him resonated in Tyrion’s head. The king is dead. Tyrion didn’t think he could be more stunned this evening. Not after what his wife just did. Tyrion regained his senses quickly.

“I’m coming. Just let me a minute.”

Tyrion went to the couch where he left his clothes for the day and put them over his night clothes. He turned to Sansa, still on the bed, before he left the room.

“Please stay here. I’ll come back as soon as I can.” And he left.

There were about ten guards before their door. Tyrion brought half of them with him and ordered the others to protect their lady at all cost. Thoughts were flooding Tyrion’s mind. Joffrey was dead. Did gods show some justice after all? Did they decide to punish Joffrey for all his crimes? Did they punish Tyrion’s father as well for his own crimes? Tyrion stopped to believe in gods not long after… He didn’t want to think about it. There were no gods. His father died of a heart attack in his sleep. As for Joffrey, he would know very soon. There was something else on Tyrion’s mind, but he couldn’t allow himself to think about it right now. The king just died, that was all he could think about. That and Sansa’s protection.

They arrived at Joffrey’s chambers. There were two kingsguards, Ser Boros Blount and Ser Balon Swann, and other Lannister soldiers. They let Tyrion enter as soon as they saw him. Kevan was already there, looking at a body on the floor. Joffrey’s body. Tyrion approached to have a better look at it. His nephew never seemed so ugly. His face was all purple and there was blood streaming from his nose, his mouth and his eyes. These eyes were hollow, looking at the roof without seeing anything. Blood covered the extremity of his hands as well. A cup of wine was on the floor, reversed. The puddle of a red liquid stretched close to Joffrey as well. Tyrion saw enough wine in his life to know the puddle was one of wine. Tyrion realized someone was whining. Margaery Tyrell was on the bed, still with the same clothes she wore at the wedding. She was curling up as far as she could, her eyes fixed on Joffrey’s body.

“My son! Let me see my son!” Tyrion was startled by the voice. He heard her scream far too often to not recognize her immediately. Cersei irrupted in the room, wearing a dressing gown. Tyrion noticed she had nothing else under it. She froze before the scene, looking mouth wide open at her son’s body. She ran to him, knelt and took his head between her hands and on her knees. She was crying, and for real this time. The tears weren’t false as they were during the trial.

“My son. No. No.”

She buried her head into his neck. Tyrion had some pity for his sister in this moment. He always hated Joffrey, but he couldn’t blame Cersei for loving her son, no matter how cruel he was. He was still her son. Right now she was only a mother holding her dead son in her arms. Tyrion realized that Jaime had entered the room as well, a hollow gaze on his face as he stared at the scene before him. His son just died for him too. Tyrion wondered what was going on in Jaime’s head at this moment.

“What happened?” Tyrion asked to one in particular. He hoped Jaime, Kevan, or even Margaery may explain everything that happened. The king just died and Tyrion had no idea how it happened. But it wasn’t his brother or his uncle who spoke next, but his sister. She raised her head, looking at him with hatred.

“You did this. You poisoned my son.” She turned her head to the bed, looking at Margaery still staying away. “You conspired with her. Take them. Take them! Take them! TAKE THEM!”

No one reacted to Cersei’s order. She looked all around her. “I ordered you to arrest them! What are you waiting for?”

“Cersei, that’s enough! Guards!” Kevan’s voice thundered in the piece. Many men in red and the two kingsguards came in. “Vylarr, bring my niece back to her chambers. Ser Balon, Ser Boros, accompany Lady Margaery back to her old rooms in the Maidenvault. Keep two guards at her door in all circumstances.”

Margaery followed the kingsguards without complaints, but the same couldn’t be said about Cersei as Lannister men brought her outside.

“I told you! He’s going to kill us all. He killed our father, now my son! Can’t you see it? He’s a monster. He will be our downfall to us all.”

Finally her yelling faint as she was brought far from them. “She just lost her son. She doesn’t know what she’s saying.”

Tyrion was quite skeptical about his brother’s words. “Perhaps she doesn’t know wat she’s saying, but she believes it all the same.”

“It’s no time for this.” Kevan brought them back to the reality. “Our king just died. I didn’t ask you here to complain about Cersei’s madness.” Their uncle sighed. “Tywin, and now Joffrey. What’s going on here?”

Tyrion approached Joffrey’s body again and looked more closely at his face. “I’m no maester, but I don’t think this is a natural death. To me it seems he was poisoned.”

“Of course he was poisoned. I questioned Lady Margaery before you arrived. She was in a state of shock, but from what she told us, Joffrey choked not long after they came to their bridal chamber. They were drinking wine when suddenly Joffrey began to choke. At first he was only coughing, but it got worse. Within a few seconds he was convulsing on the floor, unable to breathe.”

Tyrion looked at the cup of wine on the floor and took it. There was nothing left in it. “We won’t be able to search for what was in it.” He put the cup on the table. There was a jug of wine on it, barely started, and another empty cup next to it. “Did Joffrey eat anything before he choked? Anything that may have obstructed his respiratory tracts?”

“There was no food in the room, and Margaery Tyrell didn’t say a thing about eating. She only mentioned wine.”

Tyrion was looking at the jug on the table. From the appearance, he would say its content was Arbor gold. “We should have this wine examined.”

“I agree. I’ll have Pycelle examine it as soon as possible.”

“May I suggest we have it examined by another maester as well, perhaps two? I don’t really trust Pycelle’s judgment these times for myself.” The Red Viper knew more about poison than the Grand Maester. The thought unsettled Tyrion. Could Oberyn have done it?

“I was already planning to have two other maesters examining the content separately.” It was relief for Tyrion. Kevan turned to Jaime. “I would like you to stand guard for Tommen tonight. He is our king now. I’ll go and tell him everything tomorrow on the morning. Let him sleep for now.”

“Yes, Uncle.” Jaime left the room with one last look at his son. He looked somewhere else. Kevan and Tyrion were left all alone.

“Tyrion, it’s a catastrophe. Our alliance with the Tyrells is what allows us to maintain our power on all the Seven Kingdoms. Without their armies and their resources, we cannot keep Tommen on the Iron Throne. The Martells won’t fight with us, nor the Vale of Arryn.”

Tyrion nodded. “You’re right, Uncle. We need the Tyrells at all cost.”

“And yet, if Margaery poisoned Joffrey, we won’t be able to keep this alliance, no matter what we do.”

Tyrion looked at his uncle. “You believe Margaery Tyrell did this? You really believe she’s the one who killed Joffrey?”

“If the poison was put into Joffrey’s cup, then it’s the only possibility. They were alone in this room. No one else could have poisoned Joffrey’s wine.”

Tyrion thought about this for a moment. “You’re right. If the poison was added to the wine after it was poured into Joffrey’s cup, or if the poison was in the cup before the wine was poured, then only Joffrey or Margaery could poison it. And Joffrey was too selfish and not stupid enough to poison his own wine. And yet, Margaery had no reason to wish Joffrey’s death. She married him to become queen, just like when she married Renly before. That was the only reason why she married Joffrey. With Joffrey dead, she is no longer the queen. That wouldn’t make sense for her to murder her husband.”

“You’re not wrong. Though there could be another explanation. We both know Joffrey can be dangerous with women. Your wife learned it at her expenses.” Tyrion couldn’t deny it. “Perhaps Margaery thought she was in danger.”

Tyrion shook his head. “Her clothes and her hair were in a perfect state, and she had no injury or any bruise on her. Joffrey didn’t mistreat her.”

“It’s still possible he threatened her.” Kevan’s suggestion could be true, but Tyrion found it unlikely.

“Then it means she had a poison on her for this very situation. Do you really think a woman who wants to defend herself against a possible abusive husband would carry poison with her? I would hide a knife inside my gown in her stead.”

“You’re right, it seems quite unlikely. And yet, if the poison was in the cup, that’s the only plausible explanation.”

“Unless the poison wasn’t in the cup, but in the jug. Then there are many people who could have poisoned it before it was brought in this room.”

“For that, we must wait for the analysis by the maesters.”

Tyrion and Kevan remained silent for a moment. Tyrion looked at the other cup on the table, the one he didn’t pick on the floor. He seized it and passed a finger inside. It was clean. Nothing was poured in it.

“Did Lady Margaery say that both of them, she and Joffrey, were drinking?” He put back the goblet to his place.

Kevan looked thoughtful for a moment. “No. She only said Joffrey started to cough after he drank. She didn’t specify if she drank or not.”

“In this case, the poison could well be in the jug, and Joffrey was the only one to be poisoned because he was the only one to take wine from it. Many other people could have put poison into the jug.”

“We won’t know it for sure until the maesters examine it. For now, everyone will remain in the Red Keep. No one will be allowed to leave before we have a better idea who did this. I’m sorry Tyrion, but you won’t be able to leave for the Westerlands as soon as we planned.”

Tyrion tightened his lips. Sansa wouldn’t like that. He looked at his uncle in the eyes. “I hope you don’t believe that I’m involved in this.”

“No, Tyrion, I don’t believe it’s you. Though some people may believe it after the scene at the feast. You shouldn’t have done it.”

“Joffrey needed a lesson. He behaved like a child during the whole feast. You saw what he did.”

“Of course, he needed a lesson, I’m quite aware of that. But you should have waited for another opportunity, a more private one.” Kevan looked away. “I know how it must be difficult. Tywin had to support this kind of humiliation when he was serving as Hand for the Mad King. And a Lannister always pays his debts. He showed it at the end of the rebellion.”

There was a huge silence that followed before Kevan spoke again. “I would like you to maintain a low profile, you and your wife, until we have a better idea of who killed Joffrey.”

“Well, with my size, that won’t be difficult,” Tyrion mocked. “I’ll tell Sansa to be discreet, but she’s used to it. That won’t be a problem for her.”

Kevan looked worried at him. “Tyrion, reassure me. You really have nothing to do with this?”

“Of course, I don’t. The world is a better place without Joffrey, no one will deny it, but I have nothing to do with his death. After I left the feast I remained with Sansa in our chambers until a guard knocked at our door and told us the king was dead.”

Kevan nodded to show he understood. “I will need you to be present at the small council tomorrow in the morning. We’ll have to shed light on all this and to question anyone who may know something about the murder.”

Tyrion nodded in approval. “Understood, Uncle. Now excuse me, I’ll go back to Sansa. She must wonder what’s going on.”

“You.” His uncle called for him as he walked to the door. “Do you think she could be linked to this?”

Tyrion stared back at his uncle with an incomprehensible gaze. “You believe she did this?”

“If what you say is true and that she remained in your chambers for all the time after the feast, then she didn’t poison Joffrey for sure, but that could be a conspiracy. And a conspiracy may involve her. She’s among the many people who had very good reasons to wish Joffrey’s death.”

“Half the people of Westeros hated Joffrey, and the other half didn’t care about him. If we are to suspect every one of them, we’ll never find the culprit.”

“I cannot exclude this eventuality, Tyrion. I hope she had nothing to do with this, just like I hope the Tyrells have nothing to do with it, but our hopes don’t matter here. All that matters for now is to find Joffrey’s assassin. You have to understand this.”

Tyrion fixed Kevan deeply. “I will help you to find who killed Joffrey, Uncle. But Sansa has nothing to do with his death. Of that I’m sure.”

Tyrion walked away from the room, escorted by his men. His mind was in turmoil. So many things happened during the last hour. In fact, so many things happened during the last two months. His father’s death, his arrest, the trial, Ser Osmund’s attempt of murder against him, his rise as Lord of the Westerlands, the royal wedding, the accidents with Joffrey, the discovery of more of Littlefinger’s treacheries… and Shae’s departure.

Thinking of Shae caused him to feel sad. He didn’t have the chance to see her before she left. Tyrion could have seen her. Varys told him not long before she left. But Tyrion decided to not visit her one last time. If he had gone to her, or anywhere else, he didn’t know what he would have done. He didn’t know if he would have fucked her, hit her or killed her. He didn’t want to do any of these things to her. What Shae told at the trial utterly destroyed him. He never felt so much betrayed in his life. He loved Shae, and she just turned on him. And he knew from Varys now that she did it for gold and a good marriage. Despite this, Tyrion couldn’t help but still feel he loved her. She was manipulated by Baelish. Tyrion wanted nothing more than to chop the head off the body of this brothelkeeper. The war, his imprisonment at the Eyrie, the destruction of Sansa’s family, Shae’s betrayal… Tyrion wished he could have him killed right now, but he couldn’t. The man was in the Vale, and they couldn’t risk to turn another kingdom against them.

Tyrion still felt it wasn’t entirely Shae’s fault. She was manipulated by this man, and Tyrion had Bronn tell her so horrible things. He didn’t believe them. Shae was no whore in his eyes. She was the woman he loved. The first woman he loved ever since Tysha. He only said all these things to save her. Tyrion wished he saw her one last time, but another part of him told him it was better this way. Tyrion didn’t lie entirely when he sent Podrick to Shae. He knew somewhere inside him that a time like this would come, but he didn’t want it to happen. He was happy with Shae, but he had to admit he couldn’t spend his life with her, even after his father died. He was a Lannister of Casterly Rock. And I’m Shae the funny whore. He remembered what she told him so often.

Anyway, Tyrion didn’t want to hurt Sansa anymore. What he said about the fact he had to uphold his vows and that he didn’t want Sansa to suffer because of him was true in some way. He knew that one day or another, he would have to do his duty by her. Shae would have to leave them sooner or later, and Tyrion waited for the last moment to make her leave. He didn’t want to shame Sansa any longer. It was already a miracle she didn’t hate him after she learned he was fucking her handmaiden. He couldn’t let her suffer anymore.

Tyrion had to admit he didn’t think about Shae very much these last days. The upcoming wedding, his new responsibilities as Master of Coin and Lord of Casterly Rock, all of this barely left him time to think about her. And there was Sansa as well. She had been so present after the trial was over. Each moment Tyrion didn’t spend to work, Sansa had been with him. Tyrion enjoyed his time with her, and he enjoyed it more each time. She saved him from Cersei. People now saw her for who she really was. Tyrion couldn’t believe he was married with such an impressive young woman, and a woman who didn’t seem to hate him. She even seemed to like him, and that was quite baffling for Tyrion considering everything his family did to hers, even more after he discovered Joffrey was the one behind the assassination’s attempt on her brother. He didn’t expect she would kiss him after he revealed it to her.

Tyrion was beginning to wonder if all of this was only a dream. His father was dead and he was now the Lord of Casterly Rock. Cersei had no more power. He had a lovely wife who seemed to love him sometimes. Surely he was imagining it. The kiss was probably only a dream, something out of his imagination. It wouldn’t be the first time his pervert thoughts played tricks on him. When he was in his cell, he dreamed of Sansa one night... He preferred to not think again about this dream. Even for him, it was too perverted. He dreamed of Shae more than often, and it never bothered him... at least before his marriage. After he was married to Sansa, his dreams of Shae slowly faded until they totally disappeared. By luck he didn’t do any other dream of this sort afterwards. He didn’t want to use Sansa as a phantasm. She was still only a child. Surely he simply dreamed about the kiss.

And yet, Tyrion couldn’t believe it was a dream or his imagination in any sort of way. The kiss was sweet, but hesitant, inexperienced. It wasn’t like when he imagined a woman kissing him. Sansa’s kiss was so... innocent. She didn’t kiss like whores who were expert at this. That came from a girl who never did it in her life, or who didn’t do it very often up to now. There was only a single other woman who ever kissed Tyrion this way in his whole life. Tyrion didn’t want to think about it. He didn’t know what to make of all this. It was very hard for him to believe Sansa kissed him willingly. He would have to think about it all over again, and to speak with Sansa.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: a new POV.
Mira I

Chapter Notes

So, here is the new POV character I promised: Mira Forrester.

This is a chapter I was very excited to post. When I started to write this fic, I didn't plan to have Mira as a POV character, but I loved her storyline so much in Telltale Game that I decided to involve her more deeply in the story.

The fate of House Forrester will be explored more and more as the story advances. Jon, Davos, Daenerys and Arya storylines will also become more important as the changes in the events in King's Landing affect their stories. I may also include the POV of another Forrester.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

MIRA I

The Great Sept of Baelor was overcrowded with people. Two days ago, Mira knew the same people all stood here, though she wasn’t present at the time. But she knew there were smiles and cheers at the moment. Now, all faces were mournful. Faces were sad, but Mira knew the true feelings were probably different for many people, to begin with the Lord and the Lady of Casterly Rock.

The body of the king was laid at the center of the Sept, on a huge rectangular stone, a sword between his hands, stones with his eyes painted on it covering his real eyes. The real eyes would never open again. Mira knew Sansa was happy in some way about this. Joffrey made her life a living hell, and Lord Tyrion was probably no sadder than her after the way his nephew treated him during the wedding feast. Mira wouldn’t shed a tear for Joffrey’s death either. Such a monster didn’t deserve to live. She looked at his brother, Tommen, standing before Joffrey’s body and accepting the condolences he and Cersei Lannister received from everyone else. Ser Kevan Lannister, the Hand of the King, completed the trio standing tall before Joffrey’s body as the others formed lines to pay their last respects to their king. Most of these people probably never respected Joffrey.

Sansa and her husband arrived before Tommen, his mother and the Hand. The former Queen Regent refused to lift her eyes from her son’s body, but Tommen accepted their condolences pretty well. Sansa hugged him, and Lord Tyrion patted his arm since he wasn’t tall enough to pat his shoulder. Everyone wore black. All this was mostly appearance and nothing more. Mira didn’t want to think what would happen if everyone here saw who the others really were under their false behaviours. King’s Landing was so different from the North. Honor didn’t seem to matter at all in this place. Sometimes she wondered what her family would think of her. Her father. Her mother. Rodrik. Asher. Talia. Ethan. Ryon. She hoped some of them were still alive, but she didn’t want to hold on futile hopes if they were dead. It was better for her to do as if they were all gone and to mourn them. It wasn’t for Joffrey she wore black clothes today, but for all her family. Even Gared, Duncan Tuttle’s son, disappeared at the Wall. She mourned him as well. And she mourned Ironrath too, her home. Mira wouldn’t cry. She would be strong for her family. Iron from Ice.
She saw Lady Margaery approach the body as well, along with Lady Olenna, Lord Mace, Ser Loras and all her entourage who followed her everywhere. Mira knew all of them. Leonette. Janna. Merry. Elinor. Alla. Megga. Sera. To see all of them brought a smile on Mira’s lips. She succeeded to re-establish her good relations with all of them after Margaery welcomed her again. Mira was glad Margaery forgave her what she did. Mira regretted she caused problems to her, but she had no choice. Everything she did had been for her family. Margaery understood and Mira was welcomed again among the girls of the Reach. She saw Sansa and Lord Tyrion coming back in her direction since she stood before the huge doors of the sept, waiting for them. They weren’t going to spend more time than necessary here, and she didn’t blame them. But she couldn’t leave right now. She had to do something first. Sansa and her husband arrived at her level.

“My lord. My lady. If it doesn’t bother you, I will stay a while longer. I would like to pay my respects to our new king and his mother.”

Both looked quite surprised by her demand, but Sansa allowed her to stay if she wished to. Mira walked to Joffrey’s body as her mistress and her lord left the sept. The line was long, so the Tyrells were done giving their condolences before she was any close to the body. Their path crossed hers as they walked outside the sept. Lady Margaery’s eyes met her own. She stopped before her.

“Mira.”

“My lady.” Mira noticed the two Lannister men following Lady Margaery. They were supposedly here for her protection after Joffrey’s murder, but she knew the real reason of their presence. “All my condolences for your loss. I can’t imagine how horrible it must be to lose a husband twice.”

Mira was sincere in the feelings she expressed, but her words weren’t true. She had to say what she had to say here, and she couldn’t say Lady Margaery didn’t love Lord Renly and Joffrey at all. Margaery knew that. They had a way to communicate between them using appropriate words depending of the situation. Lady Margaery hugged her, a great smile upon her face. Lady Olenna kissed her on the cheek, Lord Mace and Ser Loras made a little bow before her, and Margaery’s other friends greeted her on their way. Only Sera hugged her as well.

“That’s horrible,” she said.

“Everything is going to be alright,” Mira reassured her friend.

“I wish I had your faith in this.”

Mira knew what Sera meant as her friend walked away. Margaery was suspected. Sansa was as well by Ser Kevan, but much less. The poison was put in a jug of wine Sera brought to Joffrey and Margaery’s chamber not long after the bedding ceremony. That meant Sera was in trouble again. Mira couldn’t allow Lady Margaery or Sera to be accused of the murder. They were innocent. She had to do something.

She finally reached the center of the sept after a very long waiting. “Your Grace.” She curtsied before Tommen. The boy was looking at her with a curious look. Then his eyes widened.

“I recognize you. You’re Sansa’s friend. Mira, that’s your name.”

“Yes, that’s it.” She had to smile. He looked like a good boy. He remembered her of Ethan when she left Ironrath. “And I’m Lady Sansa’s handmaiden in fact, though I’m also her friend. My lord Hand.”

She bowed her head in Ser Kevan’s direction. “My lady,” he said with respect. Mira had spent some time with the man for the ironwood business. Less time than with Lord Tyrion, but some time all the same. He was a good man, trying sincerely to do what he thought was best for the Realm and his family. He offered his condolences for her family’s death the first time they met.

Mira turned again to Tommen. “I’m sorry for your loss, your Grace. Really I am. I know what it is to lose a brother.”

Mira wasn’t sorry for Joffrey’s death, but Tommen was a very kind boy and she knew he was surely deeply affected by his brother’s death. She was sorry he had to feel it, and sorry he would have to be king now.

“Thank you, Lady Mira. I heard what happened to your brothers, and to the rest of your family. That’s horrible. They didn’t deserve to die. No more than Joffrey.”

\textit{Joffrey deserved to die much more than them.} She kept the thought for her. Tommen was sincere. She felt touched by his words.

“Her brothers were traitors.” Cersei’s voice was sad and angry at the same time. She didn’t move her eyes away from her eldest son. “All her family were traitors. And she is a traitor. She should be the one dead right now, and Joffrey should live. He was the king, your brother, and he was killed.”

Ser Jaime Lannister approached at this moment and put his left hand on his sister’s shoulders, whispering a few words in her ear. She seemed to calm down a little. Mira turned back her attention to Tommen again.

“I wish you well, your Grace. I know it’s not easy to be king.”

“I’ll be a good king. I want to be. Good. Just. Pious. Strong. Wise. I want to be all of this.”

Mira smiled again. For the first time in decades, they would have a king who wanted to be a good king. She hoped he would be. “I’m sure you will. Even more than your brother, your father, and all the other kings who preceded them.” She kept smiling at Tommen until he returned her smile shyly.

He looked so much like Ethan right now. “Your Grace.” She made one last curtsy and left.

However, she didn’t leave the Sept. There were still many people, so she could manage to not be seen. She hid behind the altar of the Maid, hiding in its shadow so no one would see her. She had to hear what Ser Kevan and Cersei would talk about when everyone would leave. They could talk about Lady Margaery or Sera. The floor was cleared an hour later. Were only left, except for the High Septon, brothers and sisters, the new king, his Hand, his mother and the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard. Ser Kevan left with Tommen, instructing him about the duties he had as king. At least Tommen would have someone decent to teach him how to be king, not like Joffrey according to what she heard from Lord Tyrion. Ser Jaime ordered the High Septon to give Cersei a moment alone with her son and everyone left the Sept. The great door was closed. Mira was stuck inside with Cersei and Jaime Lannister. No one saw her. She was hidden in the shadows, her black gown and hair providing an excellent cover. Only her pale skin may pose a problem, but it didn’t. They didn’t see her hidden behind the altar, but she couldn’t see them either. She listened carefully. Perhaps they would talk about the murder. If they believed Margaery or Sera was guilty, then Mira could warn her friends.

“It was Tyrion.” Cersei was speaking. “He killed him. He told me he would. \textit{A day will come when you think you are safe and happy and your joy will turn to ashes in your mouth.} That’s what he said to me. You saw it. You saw Joffrey dead right before you. You saw this little whore from Highgarden defending this monster. They plotted it together.”

“I don’t know what I saw.” Ser Jaime’s voice was very low, just like the one of the queen, but the sept was so silent Mira could understand everything they said.

“Avenge him. Avenge our son. Kill Tyrion.” Mira held her breath. Our son? Cersei was talking to her brother. Could it be true?

“Tyrion’s my brother. Our brother. There’ll be an investigation. We’ll get to the truth of what happened.”

“I don’t want an investigation. He’ll squirm his way out of it like he always does. I want him dead. Please, Jaime. You have to. He was our son. Our baby boy.”

Cersei was crying. Mira was sure now she didn’t mishear the first time. Cersei Lannister really confirmed Ser Jaime Lannister was Joffrey’s father. If Joffrey was his son, then there were high chances Tommen and Myrcella were as well. Stannis Baratheon told the truth. She heard gasps and strange sounds, something that looked like sucking.

“You’re a hateful woman. Why have the gods made me love a hateful woman?”

“Jaime, not here, please. Please. Stop it.”

Mira heard a sound of fabric being torn apart. She moved to see what was going on without leaving the shadows. She couldn’t have a better confirmation of Stannis Baratheon’s accusations. The twin brothers were joined as husband and wife, making love right here, next to their son’s body. Mira went back behind the statue where she couldn’t see them. Should she have seen this? They mustn’t find me. Mira finally heard screams and grunts of pleasure. That wasn’t the first time Mira surprised two people making love. By accident, she had twice in Highgarden, though at least these people had the decency to stop when they realized she just surprised them in the act. Only, the two people here were brother and sister, and they didn’t stop. She could only find for their defense they didn’t know she was here. It was so… disgusting.

“This was folly. With Kevan and everyone else in the castle… Jaime, we must be careful.” It seemed Cersei Lannister got back what little senses she had.

“I am sick of being careful. The Targaryens wed brother to sister, why shouldn’t we do the same? Marry me, Cersei. Run away with me. Let’s go somewhere across the Narrow Sea and make another son in place of Joffrey. Let’s live happy together for the rest of our lives. We don’t have to care about the others, the Realm, the politics, or anything else. It’s only you and me.”

“That’s not funny.”

“Do you hear me chuckle?”

“You’re really an idiot!” Cersei was shouting now. “You come back after all this time with no apologies and one hand and expect everything to be the same? You left me alone. You weren’t here when you should have been. You let our only daughter being shipped off to Dorne. You let this monster put the life of our son in danger. You let him kill him, and right now he’s walking freely, plotting to kill our last son, and you refuse to protect us. Joffrey is dead. Myrcella’s been sold like livestock. And now our uncle wants to send me off to Rosby and steal our boy. Our last boy. Margaery will dig her claws in, Kevan will dig his claws in, Tyrion will too and they will fight over him like beasts until he’s ripped apart. I will burn our house to the ground before I let that happen. I will protect my son!”

There was a huge silence that followed. “You’re really mad! Every day I was a prisoner, I plotted my escape. Every day. I murdered people so I could be here with you. And when I arrive, you say I took too long, you arrest my brother after our father just died, you make a show of a trial to have him executed, and you order a kingsguard to assassinate him. And then you accuse him of killing our son without a single proof and ask me to murder him, to kill my own brother. And I discover as well that you’ve been fucking our cousin and sellswords while I was away. And you’re the one to ask me for apologies?"

“You’re even more idiot that I thought. Did you think I would wait for you all this time? You never cared about the way Tyrion had whores. Why would you care about how I may have a few?”

“I have never known any other woman than you up to this day. And now I realize that all this time I’ve been in love with a whore.”

Another heavy silence lingered. “What did you say?”

“That’s how the people call you in the streets. The Lannister whore. The Whore Queen.”

Mira heard a slap, then another, and another, until she heard another sound that seemed to come from the impact of something harder than a hand. She took a risk to look at the scene. Cersei was on her knees, her head bent towards the floor. Ser Jaime stood tall before her, his golden hand raised.

“You can stay here if you want. He’s your son, not mine. Joffrey is my seed, nothing more.”

Ser Jaime turned to walk away. Mira went back entirely in the shadows just in time. Cersei was crying on the floor. The knight knocked at the huge doors and they opened to let him leave. The High Septon and servants came inside. When they saw the former queen weeping on the floor, they all ran at her side. Mira took advantage of the situation to escape. No one noticed her as she left since they only had eyes for the Queen Mother.

Mira went back to Sansa’s rooms. She was alone, still clad in black. Lord Tyrion probably went back to work. Not only did he have to serve as Master of Coin, he was also involved in the inquiry on King Joffrey’s death. It seemed they both took a quick meal before Mira arrived. Another handmaiden had brought the food, but she didn’t care about bringing back the dishes afterwards. Mira did the work by herself. Sansa changed entirely her staff not long after the trial was over. The discovery that some of her handmaidens were Cersei’s spies led her to remove all of them. The new ones didn’t always make a good work. When she came back to Sansa’s rooms and asked her if there was anything she could do for her, she was very surprised by her lady’s demand.

“Mira, I need to know, have you ever been in love?”

The question startled Mira. She wasn’t expecting this. “To be true, Sansa, no.” Mira sat at the table after Sansa made the sign to allow her. “I had some interest for a man or two at a moment, but nothing more.”

Mira never was in love really. She knew that one day or another, she would have to marry and to have children. Her mother taught her when she was a child that would be her duty, and she would have to accept and love her husband, and to bear his children. Mira didn’t allow herself to fall in love with a man because of this. It could make things more difficult the day she would wed. It was better to prevent any pain that would come with it. Her time spent with Lady Margaery only reinforced her beliefs. Mira wasn’t ambitious like her friend. She only refused to fall in love before she was married because she had to do her duty. Her parents weren’t in love when they were wed. They barely knew each other the day of their wedding. They built their love with years, and through this love they had Mira, her sister and her four brothers. Their marriage was happy. Mira didn’t want to risk an unhappy marriage with dreams of young and romantic love. As a highborn lady, as a Forrester, she had duties. And she saw many people in Highgarden and here in King’s Landing whose love affairs ended poorly. Sansa’s husband himself experienced it with the woman called Shae.

“Did you ever kiss someone?”

The new question was quite dumbfounding as well. “No, Sansa. Some men tried in Highgarden, but they never succeeded. Most of the time they were young men my friends sent to me, hoping I would show I wasn’t virtuous as I looked.”

Two of Margaery’s cousins also asked her one day to join them in their kissing games. These were only games, nothing serious, but Mira refused all the same. The girls didn’t think ill, but Mira didn’t want to join them.

“Why are you asking me this?” Mira asked to her lady. Sansa looked away and took some time before she answered.

“I kissed Tyrion.” Sansa was red on all her face. Mira wondered why.

“Well, it was time.”

Sansa looked at her with a face that showed she didn’t understand. “It was time?”

“You’re married. Have you consummated the marriage?” Sansa reacted as if Mira just punched her in the belly. “I’m sorry, Sansa. I shouldn’t have asked so directly. But did you?”

Sansa shook her head in denial. “No. I just kissed him the night after the royal wedding. We were together in bed and… I don’t know why, but I just kissed him like that. And then a guard came to tell us Joffrey was dead. Tyrion left and that was all over. It happened so quickly. I don’t understand why I did this.”

Sansa looked ashamed of what she did. Mira knew Sansa’s education taught her to do everything her husband would ask of her and to remain obedient to him. Mira’s education taught her the same, but Mira knew it wasn’t necessarily the best course of action. Men didn’t always want a simple woman who would do exactly as she was told and nothing more. Wives weren’t only there to have children, sew, sing, smile, and approve everything the man they married did or said. Mira saw it in Highgarden. A wife had to advise her husband and to stop him from doing mistakes when he was about to make some. And sometimes the woman had to take the lead in the marriage when it was for the better, when she was more capable to take the right decisions. There was nothing wrong in the fact Sansa took the initiative, quite the opposite. Lord Tyrion was the one to give her total freedom about their intimate life, so Sansa had to be the one to start somewhere.

Sansa resumed to speak. “What does he think of me now? He barely speaks to me. He must think I’m no better than the whores he used to spend time with.”

Mira wanted to laugh, but she refrained herself. She couldn’t laugh at Sansa. She was her friend, but also her mistress. “Sansa, I don’t think he thinks ill of you. Quite the opposite, I think what you did is excellent.”

“Excellent? That’s not how a wife should behave!”

“I saw my father and my mother kiss each other several times. And I’m quite sure they kissed much more in their bedchamber, or else I don’t think I would be there.” Sansa was staring at her in shock. Mira did as if she saw nothing. “Is he really the one to not speak to you?”

Sansa looked dumbfounded at her. “What do you mean?”
“You’re the one who hesitates to speak to him. For the last two days, each time Lord Tyrion came for dinner, you only spoke when he asked you a question and you did nothing more than answer them. Before the royal wedding, you were the one to start the conversation each time he came back here. I think the problem is coming from you, Sansa.”

Mira knew what she was talking about. She was there most of the time Lord Tyrion and Sansa took their meals together, and Sansa was always talking first to her husband when he came back exhausted from the day. She continued with her explanation.

“What are you expecting from him? You’re the one who kissed him, not the opposite. He told you he wouldn’t do anything unless you wanted it, so it’s not a surprise if he’s the one waiting for you to talk about it. And instead you say nothing.” Sansa looked at the floor under her feet. “Do you love him?”

Her mistress took a lot of time before she answered. “He’s very kind, and I have come to enjoy his presence very much. I like him, really. And there are times when I think I want us to be… to be more than we are already. But… I just… I can’t… I’m not sure.” Sansa looked at the wall before her.

“That’s not supposed to be like this. He should be the one reaching for me.”

Mira smiled internally. “Like in the stories? The reason why stories are so pleasant is because they’re not real. They don’t happen in real life. He’s not going to reach for you, Sansa, not from what you told me. He swore to never touch you before you wanted, and you don’t seem ready for that. Perhaps you should just tell him you’re not ready.”

“I don’t want to hurt him. He must be expecting something from me, but I… I don’t feel like I can give it to him right now.”

“Then you must tell him before he starts asking himself too many questions. The more you wait, the worse it will be for both of you.”

After a moment, Sansa gave a resigned look. “You must be right. But I shouldn’t have kissed him. Not so soon. I don’t feel ready.”

“Then just tell him. He will understand. I never saw someone so patient with his wife.” Mira rose.

“No, you can leave.” Mira was about to get out of the room when Sansa stopped her one last time.

“Mira, are you sure you’ve never been in love?”

Mira left the room. She had someone else to visit now. Her steps brought her to another part of the castle, in the Maidenvault. Without surprise, the door was guarded by two Lannister guards.

“Sers, I would like to speak to Lady Margaery.”

“Who are you?” asked one of them.

“Lady Mira Forrester.” The other guard said her name before she could. Mira knew this voice. The man removed his helmet.

“Ser Rowan Kenning.” She granted him a smile and he made a light bow before her.

“My lady. It’s a pleasure to see you again. Please accept all my apologies for the accident a few weeks ago. None of us knew our commander was bribed.”
“Your apologies are accepted, ser.” He was the guard who accompanied Ser Valar Algood when he tried to arrest her, and the one who convinced his companion to retreat when Sansa stood up for her. “I just want to pay a visit to Lady Margaery. I was her handmaiden once, I thought she might like to have some company.”

“Of course, Lady Mira. Please wait a moment.”

Ser Rowan went inside. Mira was left with the other knight. “Ser,” she made a little bow.

“My lady.” He bowed as well. He didn’t seem ill disposed towards her. Ser Rowan came back.

“Lady Margaery is ready to receive you.”

Mira entered. Margaery was waiting for her, still wearing her mourning clothes. A great smile was upon her face when Mira came in and the door closed behind her. “I’m glad to see you, Mira. I don’t have a lot of people to spend time with. Even my grandmother seems to distance from me.”

“I’m glad to see you again, my lady. How are you?”

“Fine, I guess, considering I just watched my husband die in front of me during our wedding night. He was clawing at his own throat, looking everywhere for help. It was horrible. One of my husbands preferred the company of men and was stabbed through the heart. Another was happiest torturing animals and was poisoned during our wedding. I must be cursed. And now, I have two soldiers following me everywhere for my protection.”

Mira noticed Margaery was sarcastic. “Can’t you send them away?”

“Ser Kevan believes it is better for my protection, and I am no queen since Joffrey died before we consummated. I am only Lady Margaery Tyrell again. I wish I could walk freely as I did once. Well, I can, but only with two men following me very closely.” Margaery’s voice was bitter.

“Perhaps I can convince them to leave you for a short time.”

“Mira?” she asked with a doubtful look.

“Follow me. You’ll see.”

Mira went to the door. After a moment Margaery followed her. The two guards stood at each side. Mira went to Ser Rowan. “Ser, Lady Margaery wishes to take a walk in the gardens alone with me.”

“Lady Mira, we have orders to not leave Lady Margaery’s side for her safety.”

“I think she is safe enough with me. We don’t need you to follow.”

“Lady Mira, we received orders from the Hand of the King. It’s for her safety.”

Mira took a step closer and whispered so only the knight could hear her. “Ser Rowan, we’re no idiots. We know why you really received your orders. She won’t escape while I’m with her. Watch us from a balcony if you want, but give her some time alone with a friend. You won’t have the choice anyway.” Mira stepped back and spoke normally. “Lady Sansa Lannister allowed me to speak privately to Lady Margaery for a short time. I hope you don’t want to disobey the Lady of Casterly Rock.”

That was risky, but not very much. And she had to speak with Lady Margaery far from other ears. It was an urgent matter. Ser Rowan stood there for a moment, unmoving. When he finally spoke, his words relieved Mira.

“We’ll keep an eye on you from the top of a balcony, my ladies. We will accompany you to the gardens.”

“Thank you, Ser Rowan.”

Mira walked arm in arm with Margaery to the gardens and the guards left them at the entrance, watching them from afar.

“You are resourceful like always, Mira. But it could become dangerous for you.” Margaery was smiling at her. But while her previous smiles today had some sadness in it, this one was tender, even laughing.

“Don’t worry, my lady. Nothing will happen. I know it. The risk is small this time. And this is the least I owe you after the troubles I caused.”

Lady Margaery’s smile turned sad again. They didn’t need to talk about it any further. They both knew why Margaery had to remove Mira from her service. Mira didn’t blame her former mistress. She knew Margaery had been heartbroken “I thank you anyway. It is good to get rid of those guards for a moment. How is Sansa doing?”

“She’s alright. She’s mostly bothered by the fact she has to stay in King’s Landing longer. She wants to leave for Casterly Rock.”

“And you? Are you eager to see her leave?”

“No, I’ll miss her. But I’ll be happy to come back at your side, my lady.”

“Thank you, Mira. I’ll be glad to have you back as my handmaiden.” Lady Margaery looked around them. Mira knew there was no one. They were alone. “Though I wonder if it will happen. I know very well why these soldiers follow me everywhere. The Lannisters suspect me of killing the king. I was alone with him when he died.”

“I know you didn’t do it, my lady.”

“Thank you, Mira, but I don’t think Ser Kevan thinks the same.”

Mira didn’t admit it loudly, but Lady Margaery was right. The Hand of the King really considered her as the possible assassin. Through the conversations she heard between Lord Tyrion and Sansa, and her own discussions with Sansa, Mira knew three maesters concluded the wine Joffrey drank was the cause of his death. They found a poison called the Strangler in it. As a consequence, Lady Margaery was suspected. She was the one to order the jug of wine in the chamber she shared with Joffrey for their wedding night. Mira learned from her discussions with her friends from the Reach during the days before the wedding that Margaery would have the king taste the best wine of the Arbor there was on their wedding night. All of this seemed planned in advance, so Ser Kevan suspected her. Mira was even more worried about Sera. She was the one to bring the wine to the chamber. If Margaery had the protection of House Tyrell, Sera was completely vulnerable. But Mira knew Margaery and Sera were not responsible for the poisoning.

Mira tried to reassure Lady Margaery. “Lord Tyrion and Lady Sansa don’t believe you’re guilty either. And you have the support of all your family.”

“Yes, of course, and they are right. I didn’t want Joffrey to die. Now that he’s dead I am no queen at all.”
They could speak more freely here. Mira looked around to make sure no one was around. They were alone in the gardens. Mira lowered the voice all the same when she spoke. It was time to tell Margaery the real reason of her visit.

“My lady, continue to walk no matter what I tell you and don’t show any emotion. The guards can’t hear us but they can see us.”

Margaery understood immediately what it meant. She knew Mira had come to see her for a very good reason. She kept her voice low as well. “What is it Mira?”

“Don’t show any reaction. I know who killed Joffrey.”

Margaery looked at her with questioning eyes. “Are you sure?”

“I saw the wine being poisoned. And I saw the person who did it.”

Mira told Lady Margaery everything. On the wedding night, she was walking back to her chambers when she crossed Sera’s path. Sera told her she was bringing a bottle of Arbor gold for Lady Margaery and the king. It was the finest wine the Tyrells brought to King’s Landing with them. Mira only talked shortly to Sera since her friend had to hurry to the bedchamber, so she continued her path. However, as she turned a corner, she heard the voice of someone else stopping Sera. It was Lady Olenna Tyrell’s voice. Mira found it strange that she was there and not still at the feast. She decided to watch discreetly the conversation. At a moment, Lady Olenna kissed Sera on the cheek and Mira saw her dropping something that looked like a little pearl or some other round precious stone in the jug. Sera didn’t see it, and then she went to Margaery’s and Joffrey’s room. None of the two women realized Mira was looking.

Margaery said nothing until they reached a bench. “Let’s sit here.”

Mira complied. They sat side by side on a marble bench, their back turned on the guards. They remained silent for a moment.

“Are you sure about that?” Margaery asked.

“I know what I saw, my lady. I don’t know why she did this, but she did it.”

Another silence followed. Margaery was staring at nothing right before her. “Why? I was about to marry Joffrey and to become queen. Why would she do that?”

“I don’t know.”

Margaery really looked stunned by what she just learned. Mira guessed to discover your husband was killed by a member of your very family was quite unsettling. Lord Mace’s daughter looked again at Mira. “Did you tell anyone?”

“Only you.” Margaery was still shocked. “Lady Margaery, people believe you did this, and perhaps that Sera had a hand in this. You’re both in danger.”

“I know.” Margaery looked desperate and it didn’t happen often. “But I can’t tell the truth. I cannot reveal that my grandmother assassinated Joffrey.”

Mira knew it. Margaery couldn’t do that. She wouldn’t denounce a member of House Tyrell, especially not Lady Olenna. She was her grandmother. If she revealed Lady Olenna Tyrell was the poisoner, then Lord Mace’s mother would be the one to die. And if the Tyrells refused to give her up, then it would start a war against House Lannister. But Mira had to tell the truth to Lady Margaery. She believed Margaery didn’t know about it, and it just proved to be the case.

“I’ll need to talk about it with her,” Margaery finally said. “I have no other choice. Please, talk about it to no one.”

“Yes, my lady.”

They left the bench after some time, then got out of the gardens. Mira and Margaery went separate ways.

“Thank you, Mira,” Lady Margaery said as she left her. Mira bowed lightly in acknowledgement. For the guards Margaery was thanking her for the walk, but she knew it was for the revelation in truth.

Mira wasn’t entirely certain of what she did as she walked through the corridors of the Red Keep. She hoped the information she brought to Lady Margaery may help her to be exonerated in some way, and would save Sera too, but she was going to talk about it to Lady Olenna. Mira wasn’t certain about Margaery’s grandmother. She didn’t know why she killed Joffrey. Perhaps to protect Margaery from this monster, but she couldn’t be sure about what the Queen of Thorns would do about her if she learned Mira was the only witness of her crime. Mira had no choice if she didn’t want this to turn against her, or against Sera. Her friend, who was just betrothed to a good man, could end facing Ser Ilyn Payne’s sword. She had to betray the trust Lady Margaery had towards her again. She went to tell the truth to someone else.

Chapter End Notes

A special message for SerGoldenhand: I'm sorry it wasn't the POV you hoped for. But I promise you Oberyn Martell will continue to appear in this fic.

Please review

Next chapter: Margaery
Margaery IV

Chapter Notes

So, mainly everyone is in trouble after Joffrey was assassinated. Let's see who is the more into trouble, who may keep his head, and who may lose it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

MARGAERY IV

“I don’t think this is necessary, grandmother. She is no threat.” Margaery was nearly pleading.

“We cannot take risks. She knows. We must only make sure she doesn’t reveal it to anybody. This is a precaution. We must think about our family.”

It was three days after Mira revealed her the truth. Margaery still had a very hard time to believe her grandmother killed Joffrey. You don’t think I’d let you marry that beast, do you? Her words still shocked a few days later. She had gone to speak with her the evening after Mira told her everything. Her grandmother didn’t deny it. She confessed everything, saying it was for her own good she did this. Margaery wasn’t sure about what to do with this. She never expected her grandmother was capable of murdering someone. Joffrey was dangerous, it was true enough, but Margaery managed to control him quite well. Now she was no queen, suspected of killing her husband and followed everywhere she went by two red cloaks. They always stood guard before her door, and every time she left her rooms, they were on her heels. Only when Mira visited her she managed to have some time without them close, and even then they had watched her from afar. Even worse now, Sera was under arrest. She was arrested yesterday. From what little Margaery knew, her friend was in a black cell. Now, even if Sera was freed, she feared Lord Tarwick may not want to marry her. It was a catastrophe.

The situation had gotten out of hands. Margaery couldn’t defend Sera. She was the one to order the wine to her chambers for Joffrey. You don’t think I’d let you marry that beast, do you? Her words still shocked a few weeks before their wedding, and she even specified the day before the ceremony Margaery was to let the king taste it before she even touched it. This way Margaery had no chance of drinking the poisoned wine before Joffrey was dead. She had no idea she was giving poisoned wine to her husband. What would Sera say now? To escape, she may tell lies, perhaps even say Margaery ordered her to poison the wine under threats. Sera was her friend, but she didn’t share Mira’s force, cunning or determination. Before the possibility of death, who knew what Sera might do? Her grandmother said they should abandon Sera to her fate and let her take the blame. She was only a handmaiden after all. Margaery faced a horrible choice. Whether she condemned Sera to death, or she protected her and she may end up herself dead, and her grandmother as well. Margaery didn’t want to abandon Sera. She did stupid things sometimes, like stealing Cersei’s wine, but she wasn’t dangerous or evil. But she had to choose between Sera or her own family. That was even worse for her than when she removed Mira from her service after the affair with Lord Andros.

And now, she was waiting with her grandmother for Mira to come. Margaery sent Mira an invitation to break her fast with her today. She would be here very soon. Margaery didn’t mention in her invitation that her grandmother would be with her. Her grandmother thought they had to make sure Mira would never tell the truth about Joffrey’s murder. The idea of her grandmother wasn’t to threaten Mira. It was mostly to make sure she wouldn’t speak by giving her favors. Her grandmother knew Mira. She suggested a long time ago that Margaery should never let this girl leave her service. She knew Mira was a Northerner with strong principles, but she also said they couldn’t be sure if Mira’s loyalty was entirely to Margaery, or also to Sansa now. They had to give her additional reasons to never divulge what she knew. And if it wasn’t enough, then Olenna Tyrell thought they would have to be more persuasive. That wasn’t a prospect Margaery relished, but the situation was desperate. She wished so much she could do something for Sera, but she saw no way out of here. However, she had high doubts Mira would accept bribes in any form.

“I know this seems cruel and unfair.” Her grandmother started to speak again. “I don’t hate the girl. I quite like her to be honest. It is always a pleasure to say everything I want when she’s present only to test her. But the survival of our family is at stake. She seems quite reasonable and intelligent. She will quickly understand it is in her best interest to work with us.”

She was talking about Mira, but there was someone else on Margaery’s mind. “What about Sera? Is there really nothing we can do for her?”

“I’m afraid it is the case.” Margaery’s mentor had a sorry look. “Sera is a kind and innocent girl. I’m really sorry she got involved in all this, especially when things just started to get better for her. Her mother was my handmaiden, and I promised to help her, but now we must choose between her and House Tyrell. I’m afraid that’s not really a choice.”

Margaery was angry at her grandmother. She didn’t like to be angry at a member of her family, but right now she was. Sera was in a black cell because of her and all the suspicions surrounding Margaery were caused by the poisoning. Margaery knew her grandmother did what she thought was right, but all the same, the Rose of Highgarden thought she could have succeeded in controlling Joffrey. That was a risk to take in order to become queen. She would need some time to forgive her grandmother. And she would mourn Sera. Her friend. She hoped that she wouldn’t have to mourn another friend too.

The door opened and one of the Lannister guards entered. “My ladies, Lady Lannister and Lady Forrester are here to see you.”

Margaery looked at her grandmother whose face showed great surprise. Lady Lannister? There was only one Lady Lannister here in King’s Landing. It seemed Mira decided to not come alone. Margaery tried to hide she was caught off guard as she allowed Sansa and Mira to walk in.

Margaery greeted them. “Mira. Sansa. We didn’t expect you both.”

“And we didn’t expect you to be with someone else,” Sansa retorted. “But it’s probably for the better.”

Mira then spoke. “I’m sorry, Lady Margaery. She knows. I told her everything after our discussion in the gardens.”

Margaery didn’t expect this. Mira said she would tell no one. It seemed her grandmother was right to have doubts. Mira wasn’t only loyal to her now. She was also loyal to Sansa. After all she was the handmaiden of the Lady of Casterly Rock for the moment.

“I thought Northerners were honorable people who kept their word. Perhaps I was wrong. And it seems my granddaughter was wrong as well about you.” Lady Olenna Tyrell was sharp as always.
"I’m sorry, Lady Olenna, but you have nothing to lecture me about.” Mira’s voice was hard. Margaery rarely saw her talk this way. Mira was always very quiet, which helped her a lot in King’s Landing. “You assassinated the husband of your granddaughter during their wedding night, causing the Lannisters to suspect her. You killed your king in cold blood. And right now I have a friend in prison accused of this murder, and I wouldn’t be surprised if you were to use her as a scapegoat. And since you’re here, I’m sure it’s for pressuring me to not tell the truth. All things considered, I think I did well to speak about it to Lady Sansa.”

Mira’s words had some effect on Margaery’s grandmother, and also on herself. She was right. Her grandmother planned to use Sera to get out of here. Sansa intervened.

“May we sit? It would be better if we are to discuss about it.” Sansa had a point. Margaery nodded in approval and Sansa sat. Mira stood up.

Margaery’s grandmother cleared her throat. “So, you know everything. You know that I poisoned Joffrey, you know how I did it, and you know I’m not about to confess it to the rest of the world.”

“So you’re ready to let Sera Durwell be killed for a crime she didn’t commit?” Sansa asked.

“I am. I regret this, but it is necessary. If it was to be known that I poisoned the king, then the alliance between our family and yours, Lady Lannister, would crumble, and there would be war. I think this is not a prospect we enjoy. Don’t tell me you disapprove what I did. You told us yourself that Joffrey was a monster. I couldn’t let him marry Margaery.”

“I cannot say that I’m sad about his death, but you put the guilt on the shoulders of an innocent girl of a minor house, one of the handmaidens of your granddaughter furthermore, and one she likes. Is that really what you want?”

Sansa addressed the last question to Maegaery. She didn’t know what to say. She didn’t want to sacrifice Sera, but what other choice did she have? Reveal the truth and have her grandmother executed, and a war probably afterwards? There was no way out of this. Margaery remained silent. Her grandmother answered in her stead.

“That’s regrettable, but this is a sacrifice we have to do. House Tyrell is more important than the life of a handmaiden. No matter how we can hate that, it’s the truth.”

Mira made a step forward at this moment. Margaery never saw her so furious. “I will not let you use Sera to get out of this alive, Lady Olenna. She is my friend, and she is innocent. I won’t let her die.” Mira then looked at Margaery. “I never resented you for sending me away. I understand why you did this. But Sera is about to be executed for a murder your family is responsible of. And I don’t believe a single moment you agree with the Queen of Thorns on this, my lady. I know you don’t.”

Margaery took a deep breath before she answered and looked at Mira straight in the eyes. “I don’t want Sera to die, but I don’t want my family to be destroyed either. I don’t do it because I want to do it, or because I believe it is the right path or the least worst. I do it because I have no other choice, Mira. I am as sad as you about this.”

Mira was looking at her with hard eyes. Margaery never saw her northern friend look at her so harshly. In fact, Mira never looked at her harshly before. “Sad or not, I won’t let you sacrifice Sera for your grandmother. If she stands trial for Joffrey’s murder, I will tell the whole truth. I will reveal everything.”

“And I will deny it,” retorted the Queen of Thorns. “People won’t believe the words of a handmaiden against mine. I am the mother of the Lord of Highgarden.”
“They will believe her.” Sansa entered the conversation again. “I will vouch for her, and Tyrion as well. And Ser Kevan knows Mira, he will not reject her testimony on the basis she is only a handmaiden. Add to this Sera Durwell will be able to confirm you spoke with her before she went to Margaery’s rooms, and you won’t be able to get out of it by swearing by the old gods and the new.”

Margaery realized they were stuck. She only had to look at her grandmother to see she thought the same. Margaery couldn’t really blame Mira. She and Sera, despite all their differences, were very close friends. Mira even defended her when Margaery suspected she helped Mira against Lord Andros, denying any involvement of Sera. Margaery knew Mira wasn’t lying. She would bring House Tyrell down if they abandoned Sera to her fate.

“If you do this, then the alliance between our two families will be destroyed. Tommen cannot remain king without our help.” Olenna Tyrell was addressing the Lady of Casterly Rock on this. Sansa’s face remained impassive before her words.

“In this case we must find a solution that allows us to free Sera Durwell without revealing the truth. And it just happens I and Mira have one.”

Margaery was quite surprised by the last statement of Sansa. Her grandmother had to be as well. Margaery looked at Mira and Sansa in turn. Finally her former handmaiden spoke. “I talked to Sera two days ago and asked her for every detail she remembered of this night when she brought the wine. For all people know, the poison could have been put in the jug at any time between the moment Sera went to the cellar to fill the jug and the moment she put it on the table in your chamber. It so happens Sera spoke for a few minutes with a boy while she was in the cellar, and there was someone else in there. Someone nobody here would miss. We only have to switch the blame on him.”

Margaery exchanged a look with her grandmother. “How do you suggest we do it?” the Queen of Thorns asked.

Mira explained all her plan. Sansa had a friend who could make sure the other man in the cellar at this time would be accused and sentenced. Sera could even serve as a witness against him, just like the boy of the cellar. Margaery was impressed. The plan seemed perfect. Sansa looked at her with a satisfied smile.

“A Lannister always pays her debts.”

Now Margaery understood. She turned to Mira. “You knew she would help us.”

Mira timidly smiled. “I wanted to help you, Lady Margaery. The best way to help is not always to do as you say. And if I trusted you, I wasn’t entirely certain about Lady Olenna. I was considering the possibility she might try to silence me. I guess my presumption wasn’t entirely false since she’s here this morning.”

Margaery wanted to laugh. She doubted Mira for a moment, and finally it turned up everything she did was to get her out of this mess. Why did I send her away? How stupid I was. Margaery was more eager than ever to get her back into her service.

“I hope it will work, or else I may end up without a head and my family at war.” Margaery’s grandmother didn’t seem entirely convinced. She was probably annoyed by Mira’s words too.

“Don’t worry, Lady Olenna,” Sansa reassured her. “Anyway, you don’t have much choice. If you remain with your original choice to use Sera as a scapegoat, you end up dead. And if you try to reveal our conversation and to use it against me or Mira, you’re dead as well since you’ll have to reveal your role in Joffrey’s death at the same time. I don’t believe you have much choice.”

Sansa’s voice was calm, but also threatening. Margaery’s grandmother sighed. “No, we don’t. Very well. Put your plan in execution. We will be waiting for the results.”

“There is only one thing, Lady Olenna. I doubt you acted entirely alone in that. You needed someone else to provide you with the poison at least. I would like to know who gave it to you.”

The Lady Olenna of House Tyrell supported Sansa’s eyes who showed no emotion. Finally she made a half revelation. “I won’t give a name. You only need to know I have good friends.”

Sansa kept fixing Margaery’s grandmother for a long time, as if she was trying to see something else in her words. Finally she and Mira left. Margaery gave them a warm smile as they left. Sera wouldn’t die thanks to them, and her family wouldn’t be in danger. It seemed she did a very good choice when she made her alliance with Sansa. She felt she wouldn’t regret it either in the future.

Margaery broke her fast with her grandmother after that. Sansa and Mira hadn’t eaten while they were here, and neither did they. As Margaery was eating a peach, the Lady Olenna decided to start the conversation with a sharp comment as she always did.

“It seems the Northerners changed a lot since the last time I looked. Before they were so honorable they were no better than fools, and now they play the game better than us. We are at their mercy.”

“Theyr mercy? Grandmother, we’re not at their mercy. Mira is loyal to me to the end. You just witnessed it. And Sansa is on our side as well.”

“Oh, for your handmaiden I can’t argue about it, though her cunning and her involvement in politics might pose a problem to you one day, as it did recently. It’s good to have intelligent and loyal handmaidens at your side, but it becomes dangerous when they start to play a role in the politics. As for the Lady Lannister, I don’t believe we can consider her on our side.

“What are you talking about? Sansa just helped us.”

“Yes, and as she said, a Lannister always pays her debts. However, she paid her debt. Now there is nothing left. This girl is no longer the frightened child we met months ago. She has become a beautiful young woman and is married to the richest man in the Seven Kingdoms. She’s started to play the game, and she plays it very well. She could become a threat with time.”

Margaery didn’t think so. “I have a very good friendship with Sansa. We helped each other in order to put Cersei aside. She is the best ally we can hope for. And she’s not the style to betray someone.”

“Yes, yes, the best ally, but also the worst enemy we could have. We must be careful to keep her on our side. If she ever was to turn against us, I’m afraid this would get quite nasty for us. She has the power of Casterly Rock behind her, and eventually the North one day. And she has her husband. Lord Tyrion listens to her and cares about her, and he’s far from being an idiot. For the moment, until you’re wed to Tommen, she is the most powerful woman in the Seven Kingdoms. And she knows our secret. She may be able to destroy us when time comes.”

She wasn’t wrong. Sansa was very powerful now. It seemed she assimilated very well the advices Margaery once gave her. Margaery noticed how Sansa got along quite well with Lord Tyrion. Margaery was nearly jealous of her friend when she thought about her marriage with Joffrey. And yes, because of Margaery’s current position, her friend was the most powerful woman in Westeros, and the richest too. But Margaery wasn’t concerned very much with this.

“For now I and Sansa are very good friends. I don’t think she would turn against me without very good reasons, and for now there are none. And if she is to become an enemy someday, then at this moment I will be queen. I will be able to face her.”

Her grandmother nodded in approval. “You’re right. With this plan, you will be cleansed of all the accusations against you. Our alliance with the Lannisters remains every bit as necessary to them as it is unpleasant for us. You did wonderful work on Joffrey. The next one should be easier. I expect Ser Kevan to offer us to marry you to Tommen once it is proved you had nothing to do with Joffrey’s death.”

Margaery smiled at the prospect. “Then I will be queen.” Finally.

“Oh, you could be. But I’m not sure this would be the best thing for you.”

Margaery was taken aback by her grandmother’s statement. “What do you mean? How couldn’t it be the best thing for me? I would be queen.”

“Tommen is a sweet and very kind boy who loves cats and other sweet animals. He wants to do his best, but he lacks determination, strong will and force. His granduncle will be the one to rule in his stead for many years. You may end with the most influence on him, especially after Ser Kevan dies, but I’m afraid he might not be much better than your father and your grandfather.”

“Grandmother!” Margaery liked her, but she didn’t know if she should laugh or disapprove her grandmother’s words. Olenna Tyrell didn’t let herself be interrupted.

“They brought me your grandfather’s body when he died, you know? Made me look at it. They took me to the Great Hall and there he was. The man I’d married and suffered to father my children. A great doughy lump I’d sat next to at endless dinners and tedious gatherings. There he was… lying on a table.”

The face of her grandmother turned quite sad as she spoke about it. She always said her husband and her son were fat oafs, but Margaery knew she had to love them all the same. Margaery’s father was her grandmother’s son after all, and she spent all her life with her grandfather and had three children with him. Margaery herself thought some of her friends were stupid at times, but they were her friends all the same. Sometimes their stupidity was among the things Margaery liked in them. Her grandmother resumed.

“I wasn’t originally meant to marry your grandfather Luthor. He was engaged to my sister, your great-aunt Viola. I was to be given to some Targaryen or other. Marrying a Targaryen was all the rage back then. But the moment I saw my intended, with his twitchy little ferret’s face and ludicrous silver hair, I knew he wouldn’t do. So the evening before Luthor was to propose to my sister, I got lost on my way back from my embroidery lesson and happened upon his chamber. How absentminded of me. The following morning, Luthor never made it down the stairs to propose to my sister, because he couldn’t bloody walk. And once he could, the only thing he wanted was what I’d given him the night before.” Margaery had to laugh at her grandmother’s story. “I was good. I was very, very good. You are even better. But we need to act quickly. As soon as we’re all cleared, I’ll arrange for you the best marriage you could hope, and not with Sweet Tommen.”

Margaery didn’t understand. “But marrying him would be the best thing for me. I would be queen. That’s what we wanted.”

“That’s what your father wants,” her grandmother corrected. “And that’s what you want. But do you really want to spend the rest of your days holding the hand to a man who is five years younger than you and telling him exactly what he must do everytime he must take a decision? Your grandfather was kind, but our marriage was insufferable all the same. You deserve better than this.”
“But we need to maintain our alliance with the Lannisters. If I don’t marry Tommen, then I won’t be queen, and our alliance won’t last.”

The Lady Olenna waved her hand in the air. “We need a marriage to cement our alliance. That doesn’t mean it must be a marriage with Tommen. And since the marriage between Cersei and Loras is forgotten, then the Lannisters need a marriage with one of us no matter the cost. And a crown doesn’t mean so much. Look at the current situation. Your friend Sansa is much more powerful than you and she’s not the queen. And she may remain the most powerful woman in Westeros for a very long time since you will need time to really have a powerful influence on Tommen, have him rule the country by himself and have children with him so you may teach them. There is another way to make you the greatest lady of the Seven Kingdoms, and much faster.”

Margaery didn’t understand what her grandmother was getting at. “What do you mean exactly?”

Her grandmother smiled at her. “I will propose another match to the Lannisters that will make our alliance much stronger than if you married Tommen, and that will have much more benefits for you and our house. A match they won’t be able to refuse.”

Margaery wondered what match her grandmother was thinking of.

Chapter End Notes

A lot happens very quickly in this chapter, but surely you find many things mysterious. Light will be cast in the next chapter.

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
The list of activities the Crown was engaged in was without end. Tyrion went through the ledgers during the last days to find all the income’s sources the Crown had. At least now, they were Tommen’s incomes, not Joffrey’s. The revenues came from many various taxes through all the Seven Kingdoms and from participations in many economic activities. Tyrion came to the conclusion yesterday, after a very careful inspection, that half the brothels of King’s Landing were owned by Littlefinger, while the other half were owned, partially or entirely, by the Crown. Littlefinger really controlled all the brothels in the capital, and probably most of those outside the city as well. No wonder he had such a wide spy network. It didn’t encourage Tyrion to resume his visits in brothels.

Tyrion wanted to leave this stinking city as soon as possible. He couldn’t bear it anymore. Sansa was eager to leave as well, even if life was much better since Joffrey was dead and Cersei on her way to Stokeworth. His sister left silently yesterday, accompanied by a hundred guards. She wouldn’t leave Lady Tanda’s castle anytime soon. Tyrion and Kevan finally decided to send Cersei there instead of Rosby since Lord Rosby had been her ally here in King’s Landing. Furthermore, Gyles Rosby was old and could die any day with his cough, and it would be unwise to send Cersei to a castle without heir. Castle Stokeworth would be a better place. Cersei would be close to King’s Landing, but she would never come back to the capital.

A few days ago, Jaime made a very interesting discovery that put an end to their search for Joffrey’s assassin. The small council listed the names of the people who had been close to the jug of wine that killed Joffrey very soon after the wedding. They searched the rooms of all these people and Jaime found a vial of the Strangler in the apartment of a fellow kingsguard. The vial was half empty. It didn’t take long for them to establish the guiltiness of the man. Varys also revealed a conversation Cersei had with this kingsguard not long before the royal wedding. After they asked questions to Lady Sera Durwell, the handmaiden who brought the wine to Joffrey and his bride, they had a confirmation the knight was with her in the cellar when she came to fill the jug.

Tyrion remembered very well the meeting of the small council when they confronted the kingslayer with the facts. They were all there. Kevan, Tyrion, Jaime, Mace Tyrell, Varys, Oberyn and Pycelle. Tyrion hoped the latter would die very soon. Then finally the grub came inside the room and stood before them.

“Ser Meryn Trant,” began Kevan. “You’re well aware your king died and how, are you?”

“I am, my lord,” the knight answered immediately. “It will be my pleasure to cut the head of the monster who killed our king once he’ll be found.” He had shot a murderous glare to Tyrion at this moment. Tyrion knew the knight hated him because he was humiliated at the trial by Tyrion’s witnesses, and probably because of the threat when he beat Sansa. Tyrion had used the opportunity to crush Ser Meryn’s dreams.

“In this case, Ser Meryn, you can cut your own head right now.” The knight had looked at him, incomprehension plain on his face. Then Jaime had put the vial on the table and spoke.

“Perhaps you could explain us, Ser Meryn, how this vial ended up in your rooms? It contains the Strangler, the very poison that killed the king you swore to protect.”

Ser Meryn’s face had showed complete confusion at this moment. He stammered. “I don’t know what you’re talking about, ser. I never had this in my rooms.”

“We found it there, Ser Meryn,” Kevan said bluntly. “And we have two people who saw you in the cellar when Lady Margaery’s handmaiden came to bring wine to King Joffrey. She talked with the cellar’s boy for several minutes. You had all the time you needed to poison the wine.”

The kingsguard panicked at this moment. “This is a lie! I swore to protect the king! I would never do such a thing. It’s this whore of Highgarden! She’s the one who poisoned him.”

“Quite strange, indeed,” Varys bolstered. “Not as strange as the discussion Ser Meryn had with the queen a few days ago when he promised her he would do anything to protect our king from his bride. Do you deny the words you had with the former Queen Regent, ser?”

Meryn had looked more lost than ever. “I never… I never… These are all lies! LIES!”

“You tried to kill Lady Margaery,” Tyrion had pointed out. “Too bad you missed your target. Instead you killed your own king.”

“You tried to poison my daughter!!!” Tyrion never saw Lord Mace Tyrell angry before. Kevan had risen from his seat at this moment.

“Ser Meryn Trant, you are accused of the murder of your king, Joffrey Baratheon the First of his Name. You’re also accused of attempt of murder against your queen, Lady Margaery of House Tyrell. Bring him.”

Ser Meryn had struggled to get free from the half dozen red cloaks who brought him to the black cells. In the end, they had to knock him out. Tyrion’s head was filled with satisfaction when he saw one of the soldiers hit Meryn Trant and send him into an involuntary sleep. Another debt was paid.

Tyrion was quite happy of the outcome of Joffrey’s murder. He wasn’t about to mourn his nephew. He still remembered how he mistreated Sansa and shot with a crossbow on people asking for bread. Tommen would be a much better king and Kevan would be here to advise him and teach him how to rule. Joffrey and Cersei were gone, a pompous child beater would end up his head on a spike, and Tyrion would leave the capital very soon with Sansa. They only had to attend Tommen’s coronation before they left.

However, Tyrion had to admit he found it quite strange Ser Meryn Trant tried to kill Margaery Tyrell this way. It was his style to obey whatever vicious order Cersei or Joffrey gave him, but to poison the queen? Unless Cersei gave him specific orders about it, but even Cersei didn’t seem a likely suspect for the murder. His sister could act blindly and viciously, but she wasn’t stupid enough to murder Margaery in such an obvious way. She would have tried something more subtle. Cersei denied she ordered Ser Meryn to kill Margaery, but she confessed she ordered him to protect Joffrey at all cost.
She even asked for Ser Meryn to be executed immediately for killing her son. Ser Meryn trying to kill Margaery this way seemed quite unlikely in Tyrion’s eyes, but they had strong evidence against him and Tyrion wasn’t about to defend the kingsguard who used to beat his wife. That would be a good riddance, whether Ser Meryn was guilty or not of this crime. Anyway, Tyrion told his doubts to Kevan who promised to keep an eye open for other possibilities.

Sansa wasn’t dissatisfied when Tyrion told her Ser Meryn would end dead because of Joffrey’s murder. She hated Ser Meryn at least as much as Tyrion did. Lady Mira Forrester also looked happier than the previous days. That was no surprise since Sera Durwell was her friend and she was released after Ser Meryn was accused. As for Sansa, her behavior towards him had gone back to normal. There had been a few days after the royal wedding during which Sansa nearly turned back to the way she acted in the first weeks of their marriage. Tyrion hadn’t understood. For a time he wondered if he did something wrong to her. He began to think she might have started to think ill of him for some reason or another. It started after the royal wedding. In fact, she started to act strangely with him right after they kissed that night. Tyrion had come to accept he didn’t dream. Sansa really kissed him. But after this, she had been uncommunicative with him.

Finally, a few days ago, perhaps the day before they discovered Ser Meryn’s involvement, Sansa had talked to him. Tyrion had been very close to laugh at her after she explained him everything. She was afraid Tyrion might have a bad opinion about her after she kissed him so suddenly. There was absolutely nothing in Sansa’s behavior that was to blame. Sansa simply felt uncomfortable because she thought she didn’t act properly and she didn’t think she was ready to bring their marriage to another step. Tyrion didn’t have anything to reproach her about this. Sansa had been forced to marry him and he didn’t want to put any pressure on her. He would only share her bed (as a husband) once she would want and feel ready for it. As for not acting properly, Tyrion thought he had an idea why Sansa thought so. Her mother was a very pious and dutiful woman and she transmitted it to her daughter. Also, Sansa loved songs and stories. In these, knights and princes were always the ones to go to the lady, not the opposite. Tyrion had no prejudice about the way love relationships should start or work. As long as his wife loved him, he didn’t care. He wondered if Sansa loved him. There was no way to know for sure now. She didn’t hate him at least. Tyrion hoped she would love him one day, but he would give her all the time she needed. She felt quite reassured after their discussion and their life came back to normal. It was nearly as if the kiss never happened, though Tyrion wasn’t about to forget it.

The door of his solar opened and Podrick came in, followed immediately by Oberyn Martell. The Dornishman pushed Podrick aside unceremoniously. He went directly to Tyrion’s desk and sat without permission in a chair before it, a look between seriousness and anger. The Red Viper without a single doubt.

“It’s alright, Podrick. You can leave us. Prince Oberyn and I had to meet anyway.”

Podrick seemed hesitant to leave, but Tyrion gave him a look to make him understand he had to. To be true, Tyrion didn’t like to be alone with the Red Viper, but Bronn wasn’t present and Podrick wouldn’t be able to do anything against Prince Oberyn, especially without any weapon, so his presence would only make the Dornishman believe Tyrion didn’t trust him. It was better to be alone with him. Podrick left and closed the door.

Tyrion turned his attention to his uninvited guest. “What can I do for you, Prince Oberyn?” Tyrion had good suspicions of what it could be.

“Justice. For my sister.” Tyrion’s suspicions were confirmed. “You told me no one could rape or murder without being punished as long as you were Lord. I want to see it in practice.”
Tyrion pressed his lips together. It was a dangerous ground. “Prince Oberyn, this is not as easy as you may think.”

“I saved your life at this trial. I could have taken the offer of your sister to condemn you for Gregor Clegane’s head. I thought you would have enough gratitude to grant me the same thing.”

“I won’t forget what you did for me, Prince Oberyn. A Lannister always pays his debts. But you must understand I cannot only order the death of one of my bannermen like this, nor assassinate him. My father kept him at his service for many years. I promise you will have the head of Gregor Clegane, but not right now.”

“When will that be?”

Tyrion couldn’t answer this. As Lord of the Westerlands, he had to give justice to his people, so it wouldn’t be difficult to find enough charges to sentence Gregor Clegane to die, but he couldn’t give a specific time to the prince of Dorne.

“Soon.” Tyrion simply answered.

The Red Viper wasn’t happy about it. It was quite obvious. “If you don’t kill Gregor Clegane now, then I will do it myself.” A silence followed. “Will you stop me?”

“I don’t want the alliance between Dorne and the Crown to suffer. I wouldn’t mind if you killed Gregor Clegane. No one will mourn him in the Westerlands or anywhere, perhaps only his men, and I can take care of them very easily once he’s dead. However, if you die fighting him, and this is a likely outcome to a fight between you two, then I fear your brother may not be very happy. I cannot put at risk our alliance. I think you know just like me how fragile it is already.”

Prince Oberyn peered at him. “You promise to give me Gregor Clegane’s head soon?”

“I promise. You will have the head of the man who killed your nephew, your niece and your sister. And if you don’t have it, then you have the right to kill me.”

Prince Oberyn’s serious glare turned into a laughing expression. “You know I won’t kill you. I may be the Red Viper and a mad man according to many people, but I know my brother wouldn’t approve if I killed the Lord of Casterly Rock. No. If you don’t have Ser Gregor killed soon, I’ll kill him myself. And if your men try to stop me, then I’ll kill them too.”

The Red Viper left with a wide grin upon his face. That wasn’t good. It was the third time since the trial ended that Prince Oberyn and Tyrion had a discussion about this issue. Cersei promised him Ser Gregor’s head if he condemned Tyrion, but Oberyn Martell finally decided to spare him. Tyrion still didn’t know why, but since the trial was over the prince always demanded the head of the man who killed his sister and her two children. Tyrion had revealed during their first discussion after the trial that the Mountain killed Elia’s children on his father’s order, but also had to confess there had been no order to kill Elia Martell. Gregor Clegane did it with his own freewill. Tyrion didn’t blame Oberyn for his lust of revenge against the Mountain, but he couldn’t take the risk to have him killed by the mad dog. Tyrion decided to have Gregor Clegane executed for the crimes he committed on his own lands. He had done so many horrible things that it would be very easy to find him guilty for even a single crime worth death, nor would it be difficult to link his men with those crimes. However, Tyrion would bring evidence before he executed Gregor Clegane. That would be a message at the same time, to show Tyrion wouldn’t tolerate mad dogs in his army or among his bannermen. He already had a good idea who he might give Clegane’s lands to.

However, Prince Oberyn had come back to ask him Ser Gregor’s head a second time. Tyrion didn’t give his word to kill Gregor Clegane during their first meeting. He planned to kill him, but he didn’t want to tell Prince Oberyn. He only said accidents could happen, even to mountains. However, he told the Red Viper during the royal wedding that rape and murder wouldn’t stay unpunished under his rule. That’s what brought the prince a second time. Tyrion had to promise him he would have Ser Gregor Clegane dead and would send his head to Dorne once it would be done. But it seemed the Red Viper wanted the Mountain dead right now, and to kill him himself. Tyrion forbade it during their second meeting, and he just did the same for their third. He wondered if Prince Oberyn would put his threat to execution and try to kill Clegane by himself. Tyrion hoped he wouldn’t. He feared the Red Viper wouldn’t survive the encounter. If Oberyn Martell died, Tyrion didn’t want to imagine what might happen to Myrcella. Perhaps he should consider having the Mountain killed secretly, though Tyrion didn’t appreciate assassination.

He went back to work. He had the impression only ten minutes had passed when Podrick came back to remind him of the small council meeting. It was near the end of the afternoon. When Tyrion arrived, only Kevan, Tommen and Varys were already there. Kevan decided to have their new king assist all the meetings of the small council. This one would be his first. He wouldn’t take any decision for now, but this way he would learn what it was to rule. Tyrion decided to give Tommen his first example of financial matters.

“Uncle, before we begin, I would like to say this would be a good idea to ask the Vale of Arryn to start again paying its taxes and to give us its arrears. Ever since the war began, we received nothing. If Baelish is really our ally, then it would be time he proves it. Our chests would need to be refilled.”

“I agree with you, Tyrion, but it will be better to wait for the siege of Riverrun to end before we order it. For now, the king should only ask.”

Kevan turned his eyes to Tommen after he answered. The king simply confirmed. “We will wait for the siege of Riverrun to end before we order the Vale to pay its taxes.”

He was far better than Joffrey. A few minutes later, they were all here. Tommen was presiding at the head of the table. Kevan, Tyrion, Jaime and Oberyn sat at his right, Varys, Pycelle and Lord Tyrell at his left. On a sign of head from Kevan, Tommen opened his first small council meeting.

“My lords, I thank you all for your presence. I will let Ser Kevan preside this small council meeting.”

“As you wish, your Grace,” Kevan answered. “The sieges at Riverrun and Storm’s End are still going on. There is no change for now. Raventree is also besieged by the Brackens and nothing new has come from there either. But it is only a question of time before the three castles surrender. They don’t have enough garrisons to defeat their besiegers, and they will starve at a moment. But peace won’t be established as long as one castle will resist. There is also the question of the attack against Dragonstone. Lord Tyrell, how much time before the Redwyne fleet arrives?”

“They will be here in approximately two months,” Lord Tyrell stated.

“Very well. Once Dragonstone is taken and Stannis captured or killed, the fleet will have to turn west and attack the Iron Islands. What is the situation of the fights in the North, Lord Varys?”

Varys answered in his sweet voice as always. “For now, the siege of Moat Cailin continues and Roose Bolton’s army is still mostly held south of the Neck by the Ironmen holding the fortress. His son, Ramsay, gathered a host he’s leading to the north of Moat Cailin. The Ironmen are still resisting, for now, but when the two armies will meet, I’m afraid the besieged men won’t be able to hold very long. They are already considerably weakened by diseases, starvation, lack of water, even if we didn’t consider the harassment they have to face from the crannogmen.”
“What are crannogmen?” Mace Tyrell asked. Tyrion wasn’t surprised the Fat Flower didn’t know about them. Varys explained indifferently.

“Men living in the Neck among the swamps. Sworn to the Warden of the North, though they didn’t fight in the war. As far as we know, they didn’t concern themselves with the War of the Five Kings and are no threat. They only fought the men of the Iron Islands so far.”

“Varys is right,” Tyrion added. “The crannogmen are no threat. They will fight against whoever takes Moat Cailin from the Warden of the North, nothing more.”

Tyrion knew more about the crannogmen than he admitted, but he knew better than to talk about it. House Reed ruled the Neck from Greywater Watch, a castle built upon a crannog that moved from place to place. It made it difficult to find for enemies. All fools who would try to attack the crannogmen would get lost in the swamps, and killed by the reptiles, snakes and insects before they could find their castle. Howland Reed was the current head of this house as far as Tyrion knew. He was a great friend of Lord Eddard Stark, Sansa’s father, and fought side by side with him during Robert’s Rebellion. He and Ned Stark were the only ones to survive the fight at the Tower of the Joy. A useless fight considering Lyanna Stark was found dead after the fight. So much blood for nothing. Well, perhaps not completely nothing.

“What are the fortresses Balon Greyjoy still holds in the North?” Kevan asked.

“Moat Cailin, Torrhen’s Square, and Deepwood Motte. Once the Neck is secured by Roose Bolton and Moat Cailin has fallen, the two other strongholds won’t remain in Ironborn hands for long.” Varys couldn’t have summarized the situation better. Balon Greyjoy wouldn’t keep what few lands he conquered during the War of the Five Kings for long. His rebellion would most likely end by the Iron Islands crushed again. Kevan’s next words only reinforced Tyrion’s beliefs.

“As soon as Dragonstone will have fallen, the Redwyne fleet will come back to the Sunset Sea and attack the Iron Islands with the fleet based in Lannisport. We will put an end once and for all to the rebellions of the Iron Islands.”

Tyrion hoped it would be the case. He smelled the men burning in Lannisport. His uncle should have sent the Redwyne fleet against them right now. They were a much greater threat than Stannis stuck alone on his rocky island with less than five thousand men.

The Lord of Highgarden decided to make demands as he always did. “My Lord Hand, I know King Joffrey just died, but our alliance stipulated that my daughter, Margaery, would marry the king. I was hoping our new king would agree to marry my daughter.”

Mace Tyrell didn’t choose his time to make such demands. “For now, we must focus on the king’s coronation, Lord Tyrell. It will take place in a week. I’m sure the king will consider the marriage proposal with great interest after that. I promise you our alliance will be maintained. Your daughter will be married very soon.”

Kevan’s words seemed enough for the Fat Flower. Tyrion’s uncle looked at Tommen and the boy finally said the good words. “It will be a pleasure for me to consider the hand of your daughter, my lord.”

“Furthermore,” Kevan added, “I would like you to be judge again for Ser Meryn Trant’s trial in a fortnight, Lord Tyrell. It would please the king as well if Prince Oberyn accepted to act as judge too.”

The two men accepted, Mace Tyrell with great enthusiasm, Oberyn with indifference. The prince of Dorne was obviously bored by all this. The discussion went to the construction of the royal fleet. Tyrion objected they still didn’t have enough money and that it would only get worse with winter coming. He told them they would have to dismiss some gold cloaks. There were four thousand and five hundred of them right now, and they would only be able to afford the new fleet if they reduced their numbers. Kevan decided they would progressively reduce the number of gold cloaks to two thousand men and would begin the construction of the fleet. Finally, Cersei never wanted to reduce their numbers and they were of no use after the Battle of Blackwater. Tyrion’s successor would have an easier job.

Varys brought them some news from Slavor’s Bay as well. For now, Daenerys Targaryen was still holding Meereen, though the Wise Masters of Yunkai took back their city and reintroduced slavery. Slavery was also reintroduced in Astapor by a butcher named Cleon, only the slaves were now the former Good Masters. It seemed for now the Dragon Queen wouldn’t sail to Westeros. Tyrion wished he could see one of her three dragons. The meeting ended with this. Tyrion was about to leave with his ledger when his uncle called him.

“Tyrion, please stay. We have to talk. Jaime, accompany his Grace to his chambers.”

Tyrion was left with his uncle who turned on his seat to face him. Kevan cleared his throat.

“Tyrion, you’re going to leave for Casterly Rock soon after Tommen’s coronation.”

“This time I hope it will be for real. I was supposed to leave a few days after Joffrey’s wedding,” Tyrion said sarcastically.

“Joffrey’s death changed the situation. We couldn’t foresee that. This time you’ll leave for real. You’re not needed here for Ser Meryn’s trial.”

“Then let’s hope we won’t have another murder on our hands. You don’t want us here for Tommen’s wedding?”

“Your presence won’t be necessary for it either. Anyway, it is quite possible Tommen won’t marry before a few years.”

His uncle’s words surprised Tyrion. “What do you mean, Uncle? I know we couldn’t engage Tommen and Margaery so soon after Joffrey’s death, but we need the Tyrell army and their resources to win this war. And the Tyrells will follow us only if Margaery is queen. They won’t wait a few years.”

Kevan joined his hands on his knees. “Mace Tyrell doesn’t seem to be aware of that already, but I had a discussion with Olenna Tyrell yesterday. She proposed me another way to unite our two houses. After thinking about it, I believe this would be a better option for House Lannister.”

Tyrion knew Olenna Tyrell was the real power in the Tyrell family, much more than her son. That was the reason he discussed with her to reduce the cost of the royal wedding and not with the Fat Flower. He wondered how painful a discussion with her had been for Kevan.

“I didn’t think the Tyrells would give up their chance to have Margaery as queen. I agree we must secure the Reach on our side, but a union between Tommen and Margaery seems to be necessary for that,” Tyrion argued.

“It doesn’t seem to be the opinion of Lady Olenna. She proposed us to wed her granddaughter to someone else. That would allow Tommen to remain available for some alliance that would present more advantages. And her proposition would link House Tyrell and House Lannister in a much stronger way than a marriage between Tommen and Margaery.”

“Very well, what was her proposition? I don’t see what match could be of more benefits to the Tyrells for they would be ready to give up their chance to have a Tyrell queen. Especially for the Queen of Thorns to believe it would be better for House Tyrell.”

“She proposed me to marry Lady Margaery to my nephew.”

Tyrion had to chuckle on this. The Queen of Thorns didn’t know what she was asking. “Jaime is a kingsguard. He will never forsake his oath, Uncle. Father tried not long after he came back to make him leave and he refused. He refused to be the heir of Casterly Rock several times, and I don’t believe he will accept it anymore now.”

Kevan was looking at him straight in the eyes. “It’s not Jaime she was talking about.”

Tyrion felt his smile fall as he slowly understood what Kevan meant. His uncle was looking at him with a very serious expression. He wasn’t joking. In fact, Kevan Lannister barely laughed more than Tywin Lannister, though at least he smiled more.

“You can’t mean it,” Tyrion said.

“I can, and I do.” Tyrion had the impression to be brought many months ago to a conversation he had with his father. Only this time, he had it with his uncle, and not about the same woman.

“I am already married.”

“You are, and your marriage is still unconsummated,” Kevan pointed out.

“I already told you. I will not disown Sansa. She is my wife.”

“Tyrion.” His uncle looked at him a different expression, something between understanding and sadness. “I understand this may seem inappropriate, especially after we just recognized the girl Lady of Casterly Rock. But you must think about House Lannister as well. A marriage between Lady Margaery and Tommen would make the Tyrells the main pillar of Tommen’s reign. Tommen is a soft and kind boy, but Margaery will have a great influence on him, just like she had with Joffrey. With time, the Tyrells will be the ones to hold the Iron Throne in practice. Margaery’s children will get the Iron Throne and the Stormlands. The Tyrells will be too powerful and we won’t be able to keep our hands on Tommen. The Tyrells will replace us as the most powerful family of all the Seven Kingdoms.”

“You forget we still have the Westerlands, and the North through Sansa. And once Riverrun will surrender, Genna and Emmon Frey will have the Riverlands. We will have three kingdoms just like them.”

“The Riverlands are the poorest region of the Seven Kingdoms, and the North doesn’t offer many resources, except very strong warriors, and it is very far. And these two kingdoms will require years if not more to secure, even with Sansa Stark. The Tyrells will have kingdoms who have been touched by war much less than ours and with much more resources. They will have the upper hand, no matter what we do. By marrying you to Margaery Tyrell, we secure a very strong alliance with the Tyrells and the Reach, and stop them from getting their hands on Tommen and the Stormlands.”

Kevan stopped for a moment. Tyrion sent him gazes to show he wouldn’t flinch. “Think about it, Tyrion. You need an heir. Margaery Tyrell is very beautiful. She is older than Lady Sansa, but still very young. And Olenna Tyrell assured me her granddaughter wasn’t opposed to the marriage and would do her duty as wife without complaints. You wouldn’t have to wait as you have to with your Tyrion reflected about Kevan’s words. Margaery Tyrell, the Rose of Highgarden. That wasn’t a bad match at all, his uncle was right. It was in fact the best match someone could imagine for him. The girl was considered by many as the most beautiful woman in all the Seven Kingdoms, and Tyrion himself had to concede it wasn’t far from the truth. She would be quite welcomed in the Westerlands, just like she was here in King’s Landing. No one would complain about her being the Lady of Casterly Rock and she was very good to bring everyone on her side. She was intelligent too and knew how to maneuver among court intrigues. She could be of great help for Tyrion. She was still quite young, perfectly able to bear children, but also an experienced woman. Tyrion spent enough time with women to know it. The Tyrell girl was no maiden at all, even if nothing had happened with Renly or Joffrey. Tyrion had nothing against it. Many men would take offense if their wife had been deflowered before their wedding, but Tyrion didn’t share this opinion. There was no risk he would hurt her and he didn’t expect their private life would be boring.

As Tyrion was beginning to find the offer quite attractive, he remembered his time with Sansa. Images and words flowed through his mind. Their wedding. The moment he wrapped the red cloak around her shoulders. Their walk in the gardens. Their discussions during dinners. Her testimonies and the defense she organized for him during the trial. Her looks of worries when he was injured or in the box of the accused. Her lovely voice when she sang the Mother’s Hymn. How beautiful she was for the royal wedding. Her red hair. Her deep blue eyes. Her pale and soft skin. Her delicate hands. Her lips. Her smiles. Her kiss. He remembered the kiss they shared this night, before Joffrey’s death interrupted it. She kissed him willingly, and she had seemed to like it. They were sleeping in the same bed ever since he got out of prison, always maintaining a physical contact. Sometimes they were just holding hands, other times Sansa laid her head on his chest. When she did, he would put his arm around her shoulders, sometimes moving his hand on her back, on her neck, or in her hair. She never flinched from him. Quite the opposite, Tyrion had the impression it made her calmer. When he would look at her face as she had fallen asleep, he would find her at peace, smiling faintly. There were only a few days after Joffrey’s death when Sansa distanced herself from him that she would sleep far away from him, but after their conversation everything came back to normal. She only needed time. Tyrion hoped that one day he and Sansa would be closer and really be husband and wife, and right now it seemed very likely. He only had to wait for Sansa to be ready.

I swore to protect her. I said vows before dozens of people. I put the cloak on her shoulders. She saved me at the trial. Tyrion couldn’t reject Sansa. A long time ago, he abandoned a woman he loved. He wouldn’t do it again. Sansa was his wife. He looked straight into his uncle’s eyes.

“Uncle, you asked me a few weeks ago to set aside Sansa for the sake of House Lannister. I’m sure you remember what I answered back then.”

“I remember very well. But now we’re talking about a marriage and an alliance with…”

“Can you remind me why my father refused to marry someone else after my mother died? Even if it would have been for the benefit of the family?” Tyrion cut his uncle. After a moment, the Hand of the King repeated the same answer he gave weeks ago.

“Because he loved her.”

“Then you know why I refuse to disavow my wife. Sansa is the Lady of Casterly Rock, and she will remain the Lady of Casterly Rock until she dies. You can tell the Queen of Thorns she should have proposed this match before your brother decided to arrange a marriage between me and Sansa.”
Kevan sighed. “I know to recognize a lost cause when I face one. Very well, Tyrion. I cannot force you to marry Lady Margaery Tyrell anyway. But this is a great opportunity we miss.”

“I don’t care. Don’t forget to give my message to Lady Olenna.” Tyrion left his chair and walked to the door, but was stopped by his uncle’s voice.

“You once told me you weren’t your father, Tyrion. It’s true, you’re not Tywin. But now I realize that of all his children, you’re the one who looks the most like him.”

Tyrion resumed his walk and left the small council room. He was deep into his thoughts after what Kevan told him, but his mind was also entirely focused on Sansa. He nearly felt ashamed that he considered even a moment putting her aside for someone else. He was close to lust for the Rose of Highgarden at this time. He hoped this thought wouldn’t haunt his sleep, especially when Sansa would be only a few inches from him.

When he entered their rooms, Sansa was standing on the balcony, looking outside as the sun set on the horizon. Even with her back turned on him, Tyrion could admire the beauty the sunlight created when it hit her auburn hair. She was breathtaking as always. He felt stupid to have desired Margaery Tyrell, even for a single minute.

“My lady,” he greeted her. Sansa didn’t turn to face him. Tyrion found it strange. “Sansa, do you hear me?”

“Yes, I hear you.” There was something dark in her voice. Tyrion didn’t like it.

“Is there something wrong?”

Sansa took some time before she answered. “Margaery came to visit me two hours ago. She told me her grandmother proposed to marry her to someone else than Tommen, and that you uncle was quite favorable to the idea.”

Tyrion closed his eyes. He didn’t expect he would have to tell Sansa. After all it was only a proposal and he refused it anyway. There was no need to tell her. “It seems you learned it before me. My uncle just told me now about it, at the end of the small council meeting.”

“So, do I have to leave?” Tyrion was taken aback by Sansa’s question. He expected even less that she would ask it with such a voice. She looked about to cry.

“To leave?”

“Yes, I guess I have nothing to do here if I’m not your wife any longer.”

Tyrion could barely believe what he heard. Sansa thought he was going to abandon her? “Wait a minute, Sansa. I just told Kevan to go to hell with the Tyrell’s proposal.”

Sansa then turned to face him. Her face showed total surprise. “What? But I thought… I thought you would…”

“That I would do what? Put an end to our marriage and marry Margaery Tyrell instead of you? I refused to annul our marriage the last time. Do you really think I would accept now? Unless you want me to annul it now…”

“No, I don’t want it. I mean, I don’t want you to get an annulment, but I thought that… after I… I mean after I refused to… well you know, what happened a few days ago.”
Tyrion had to smile at this. Sansa still couldn’t talk about a simple kiss without searching her words or blushing. “Sansa, I told you I would wait. It doesn’t bother me, not really. I don’t want to marry someone else.”

Sansa was staring at him in confusion, but she gained back her composure with time. “I’m sorry. I thought you would prefer to marry Margaery. She told me once you were good-looking. Especially with your scar.”

Tyrion was quite dumbfounded by this revelation. “The Rose of Highgarden has very strange tastes.” They both chuckled. Tyrion approached of Sansa and looked up in her eyes. “Sansa, as long as you want to remain with me, I will be your husband, no matter what happens.”

“Thank you, Tyrion,” she finally said after some hesitation. They smiled at each other.

The dinner arrived not long later and they had a pleasant conversation as always. Sansa had started to learn the names of all the families of the Westerlands and their seats for when they would leave for Casterly Rock, but she had a few questions to ask Tyrion about some of them. She also mentioned to Tyrion the requests some lady or another made to her during the day, but they weren’t very important. One of the most important was from Lady Elena Broom who asked Sansa if she could come back to Casterly Rock with them so she could visit her nephew, Ser Benedict Broom, the master-at-arms at the seat of House Lannister. Tyrion decided he could rest for this evening and spent his time with Sansa, essentially talking and sharing jokes with her until time came to sleep.

When they got into bed, Sansa laid her head on his chest. It was the first time she did it since the kiss. She had never gone farther than laying her forehead against his arm since this night. Tyrion allowed himself to bury his face into her hair, smelling the sweet natural fragrance escaping from this auburn net. Sansa didn’t seem to be bothered by it. He caressed her neck and her arms where her nightgown let her skin bare. She didn’t show any sign of revulsion as he did so. She was soon asleep, and Tyrion fell asleep not long after her, the woman he loved curled over him.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa XIV

Chapter Notes

Many things happened to Sansa in the last chapters, but we didn't really see her thoughts since Joffrey's death. Now we will. And another concern will appear now.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SANSA XIV

Mira adjusted the girdle around her hips so it would not be too tight. Her handmaiden was helping Sansa to pull on her purple gown displaying flower symbols. Sansa didn’t want to wear black for Joffrey’s death. She was quite glad he was dead and had no intention of mourning him or even for people to believe she mourned him. He received what he deserved. She thought about her father, and about Bran and Rickon, and about Robb and her mother. Joffrey wasn’t the one to have her elder brother and her mother killed, but he had been so happy when he learned their deaths that for Sansa it didn’t matter. He was a monster and he received the punishment he deserved. However, Sansa couldn’t wear the red gown Tyrion offered her the day of the royal wedding. She would have liked to wear it for Tommen’s coronation, but most of the people would wear regular clothing, and a few would be clad in mourning attire. Sansa chose regular clothing, just like Tyrion did.

Everything had come back to normal since the last week. There had been a few days after the wedding when Sansa was afraid Tyrion might think ill of her, but finally her fears proved to be unfounded. Tyrion didn’t find anything bad about the fact she kissed him suddenly while they were in bed, and he didn’t worry if she needed more time before she felt ready for their marriage to be consummated. He was very patient with her, more patient than anyone else had ever been with her. She nearly found him too much patient sometimes. Sansa still had difficulties to understand how a son of Tywin Lannister could be so… honorable. If only Tywin Lannister had died before the war began. Jaime Lannister would have refused to leave the kingsguard and Tyrion would have been the Lord of Casterly when all this madness started. Perhaps there would have been no war. At least, Tyrion wouldn’t have slaughtered her family. Would she be married with him if it had been the case? Sansa doubted it. Tyrion would have found a wife not long after he became Lord of the Westerlands, and she wouldn’t be this wife. The thought saddened her. Her family had to die so she could meet Tyrion.

She pushed these thoughts aside. It was useless to think about it. She couldn’t change what already happened, but she could try to make the future better. And with Tyrion, she could make it better. She doubted about their marriage for some time. She thought she may not be the wife Tyrion wanted. She knew Tyrion wanted someone who would love him. That was the thing he wanted the most. He wanted to be loved. Sansa wished she could give him what he wanted, but right now she couldn’t. She liked Tyrion. She liked to spend time with him, to share jokes, to speak, even to sleep with him… but she didn’t feel she loved him, not yet. She felt guilty about that, but there was still so much uncertainty in her heart. She just couldn’t give herself to him without any doubt yet. She feared sometimes he may be brought to cast her aside for this reason, but also for other motivations. After all, Sansa was still officially the daughter of a traitor. Tyrion was already a dwarf and mocked for this, so to be married to the daughter of the traitor Ned Stark? We’re perfect for each other. To remind his jape brought a smile upon her face. But her mind returned to darker thoughts almost immediately. Sansa was only fifteen and she had nothing to offer Tyrion, except her links with traitors. Margaery on the other side…

Sansa had been in such anger when Margaery came to tell her about Olenna Tyrell’s scheme. The Queen of Thorns wanted to convince Ser Kevan to marry Margaery to Tyrion instead of Tommen. Olenna Tyrell thought that her granddaughter would have a much better position as Lady of the Westerlands than as queen. Sansa had to admit it could make sense. After all, the Lannisters were the richest people in Westeros, and Sansa saw while she was kept as hostage that a crown or a name didn’t give you much power. The Tyrells probably came to the conclusion it would more to their benefit to have Margaery’s children as future Lords of the Westerlands than as future kings. Sansa thought they may even hope that if Tyrion set her aside, they could marry her to Loras Tyrell. The thought made her sick.

Margaery had come to tell her about this last week. She wanted Sansa to know she wasn’t the one at the origin of this. Margaery genuinely wanted to be queen and she hoped Kevan Lannister would refuse her grandmother’s proposal, but she came to see Sansa so she may know about it if things didn’t go as she hoped. For a few hours, Sansa’s doubts caused her to panic. She feared Tyrion would prefer Margaery to her. The daughter of Mace Tyrell was more suitable as wife of a great lord than her. She was publicly tainted by her father’s treason. Margaery was not linked to any treason, except for her short marriage with Renly Baratheon that didn’t really matter for most of the world. Renly didn’t have the time to fight Joffrey like her father and her brother did. But finally, her fears proved to be futile since Tyrion refused to hear anything about annulling their marriage. Sansa was relieved when he told her. She didn’t want to try another marriage. She had found safety and comfort in this one, and she didn’t want to risk losing it.

Sansa should have known Tyrion wouldn’t reject her because she acted improperly or because of her family’s actions. After all, Tyrion’s first wife had been the daughter of a wheelwright, or at least he thought so when he married her. He didn’t have any prejudice against a woman because of the way people looked at her. He didn’t cast aside Shae, who was a whore, when they married, no more than he disavowed her when his uncle suggested he could marry someone else. Thinking about Shae brought anger and sadness at the same time to her mind. Sadness for losing someone she thought to be a friend, and anger for her betrayal against her and Tyrion. However, she was also sad because of something else. While they were married, Tyrion secretly loved another woman. She knew nothing happened between him and Shae after the wedding, but still, it hurt her that the man she married loved someone else than her. She wondered if her mother felt that way when her father came back from the war with Jon, discovering he loved another woman and had a child with her. How would she react if Tyrion came to her one day with a bastard child of his own blood? The idea of Tyrion with someone else, or only loving someone else, filled her with some sort of despair. She wanted to be his wife. She didn’t want him to look at another woman the way he looked at her with a mix of compassion and admiration.

Sansa tried to banish her thoughts about Shae from her head. Tyrion was no longer with Shae. She was far away from him, and he would never see her again. He refused to reject her for another woman at least twice. It meant she did have value in his eyes. She was a person for him, someone he cared about. Sansa was touched by it. However, she also feared he may only refuse to disavow her out of pity. She was afraid he still saw her only as a child. It wasn’t what she wanted. Perhaps he still loved Shae and that was why he accepted that she took all her time before going further in their relationship. The thought scared her. She didn’t want him to stay with her only out of pity. She wanted him to want her as his wife. But at the same time, she couldn’t yet resign to surrender her maidenhead to him. She wondered why she was so hesitant about it. All her childhood she was prepared for the moment she would have to carry out her duty as a wife, and yet now she couldn’t do this duty with a man she trusted above everyone else. Why? Joffrey’s threats came back to her mind, and the riot too. Her body shook violently for half a second.

“Sansa, are you alright?” Mira’s voice took her out of her thoughts. She realized her breathing was quicker than it should be.

“Yes, Mira. I’m alright. Just carry on.”

Sansa relaxed. Tyrion wouldn’t set her aside. She was safe now and in good hands. She was married with a kind man, the sort of man her father wanted her to marry, even though he never realized Tyrion was this sort of man. The dream of her father where Tyrion stood behind him continued to follow her in her nights, reminding her of this. The dream about her wedding with Ser Loras still haunted her too, but there was something Sansa felt she missed. She couldn’t find out what it was. She had time before her, and Shae was far away. There was no woman in Tyrion’s life except her, and only her. And so my watch begins. That memory brought a smile upon her face. However, in the back of her mind, doubts lingered. What if Tyrion really had someone else in his life?

“How is your friend Sera?” Sansa asked to Mira, trying to completely set aside her dark thoughts.

“Far better than before, though she still has a hard time to deal with Lord Tarwick’s denial.”

Sansa could feel the regrets in Mira’s voice. After Ser Meryn Trant was accused of Joffrey’s murder, her friend Sera Durwell was released from the black cells. Sadly, the damage was done. The simple fact Sera Durwell was suspected for a moment to have participated in the king’s death was enough for her betrothed, Lord Garibald Tarwick, to undo all the arrangements concerning their upcoming marriage. Mira told her how Sera had been utterly destroyed when Lord Tarwick abandoned her. Sansa didn’t want to imagine how she would feel if Tyrion abandoned her. Sansa sighed internally. Her attempt to think about something else had failed.

“Don’t you think Margaery could do something about it?” Sansa suggested.

“I don’t think so. She may try to convince him, but she doesn’t have the same influence she had before. It’s not even certain yet she will marry Tommen.”

Sansa knew it only too well. They tried to marry her to Tyrion instead. She would have to talk to Margaery about it again. Mira completed the adjustments of her gown, then brushed her hair in a way they fell behind her head in waves. Tyrion arrived not long after and they went to the ceremony for Tommen’s coronation. Mira left them when they entered the Great Hall, finding a place in the back of the room. Tyrion and Sansa were on the first rank.

Tommen walked along a red carpet from the huge doors of the Hall to the Iron Throne. He wore a red cloak that enfolded his whole body from the neck to his ankles. Everyone followed him with their eyes in silence. Sansa could see uncertainty, but also excitement on his face. If only he had been the firstborn instead of Joffrey. Her father would still be alive, and her whole family as well. The sweet boy climbed the dais and knelt on a red cushioned footstool as the High Septon held the crown above his head, pronouncing the blessings from the Seven.

“In the light of the Seven, I now proclaim Tommen of the House Baratheon, First of His Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, and Lord of the Seven Kingdoms.” The High Septon placed the crown on Tommen’s head. “Long may he reign!”

“Long may he reign!” shouted all the highborn people who were present. Tyrion and Sansa joined them and cheered with everyone as Tommen rose from the footstool. With Cersei gone, there was no one to regret Joffrey. Tommen tried to keep a serious face, as it was suitable for a king, but he allowed a smile to appear from time to time. Afterwards everyone lined to congratulate Tommen.
She and Tyrion were among the first and she exchanged a few words with the new king before leaving. He really looked happy. Tyrion remained behind, saying he needed a few words with his uncle. Ser Kevan stood right next to Tommen on the dais. He was the Protector of the Realm until Tommen was old enough.

Sansa left the dais and had to speak with many ladies and lords of the Westerlands again. There was a time she would have enjoyed all the attention she got and thought these people really loved her, but now she knew they mostly tried to gain her favor for this thing or another. Most of them liked her title more than anything else. She really started to be annoyed by all this. She used her courtesies as always to get rid of them and went to Margaery who stood in the gallery aside the Great Hall, clad in black. She was among the few obliged to wear this color as if they mourned Joffrey.

“Margaery,” Sansa greeted her.

“Lady Lannister,” Margaery replied with a smile.

Sansa stood beside her, watching the court before them. “Before it was you who told me to call you by your name. Do I have to do the same?”

Both chuckled. “Since I am no queen and that you are a great lady, I must call you by your title, unless you allow me not to.”

“Permission granted. Call me Sansa.”

Margaery smiled at her in thanks. They both looked at Tommen receiving respects from everyone. Sansa could see Tyrion engaged in a discussion with his uncle while Tommen played to be the king. He played it much better than Joffrey and it suited him much better.

“He sits the throne like he was born to it,” said Margaery.

“Yes,” Sansa approved. “Even if he wasn’t born for it. Long may he reign.”

“Long may he reign,” her friend repeated.

Sansa knew Tommen wasn’t supposed to be king. By the laws of the Seven Kingdoms, Stannis Baratheon should be sitting on this ugly iron chair. Sansa was still under quite a shock after the revelation Mira told her more than a week ago. Her handmaiden saw Ser Jaime and his sister fornicating before the dead body of Joffrey. She heard them talking of their sons and their daughter. Sansa wasn’t surprised that Joffrey was a bastard born of incest, but it had quite an effect on her to learn Myrcella and Tommen were Jaime Lannister’s children as well. She remembered Myrcella, a kind and good girl. And Tommen, who was so sweet and unable to hurt anyone. How could this be possible they were the result of an incest? She could believe it for Joffrey, but for his brother and his sister? Sansa looked at Tommen, trying to see a boy born of incest before her, and she couldn’t. And yet he was. Mira wouldn’t lie about this. She didn’t tell Tyrion. Anyway, what good would it make for her to reveal it? Another war? Or perhaps she would be executed for high treason if she began to speak against the king. Whatever great lady she was, she was still submitted to the king. Looking at Tommen, she couldn’t see any of the madness or cruelty that characterized Joffrey. She wouldn’t speak about it. Tommen and Myrcella were good children anyway. She didn’t want them to die, and she wouldn’t try to bring Stannis Baratheon on the Iron Throne knowing that he burnt people refusing his new religion.

Her eyes moved to look at Jaime Lannister standing on the dais, protecting the king. Protecting his son. Sansa felt some disgust for the man, knowing he laid down with his own sister. He helped her to save Tyrion, and according to what Brienne told her, the knight wasn’t without honor as she once thought. But still, bedding his own sister! She wondered why Tywin Lannister hated so much Tyrion for spending time with whores while his two older children were laying down together. She didn’t tell Tyrion either about the fact Cersei asked her brother to kill him. Anyway, Cersei was far away now and Jaime Lannister refused to carry out her request, so she had nothing to fear from the Kingslayer.

“Has your family asked about marrying you to Tommen?” Sansa asked her friend.

“My father asked, I think, but for now we have no answer. The Hand of the King believes Tommen needs time to mourn Joffrey.”

Sansa looked at Ser Kevan. He wasn’t speaking with her husband anymore. Tyrion was no longer on the dais. “He needs time, yes. Perhaps he’s really sad about Joffrey’s death.”

Margaery nodded slightly at her side. “As I must be.”

They both knew Margaery was only sad Joffrey died before she could be queen. Sansa saw Mira with an arm around Sera’s shoulders in the crowd. “I guess your handmaiden will have a lot of time before she’s wed too.”

Margaery didn’t answer before long, sighing when she finally did. “I did everything I could. I tried everything to convince Lord Tarwick to maintain the engagement, but he didn’t want to listen. If I was the queen, he might have accepted, but if I was the queen Sera would never have ended in a cell and nothing of all this would have happened.”

Sansa saw pain and regret on Margaery’s face. She had more compassion than her grandmother. “It seems your grandmother is good at destroying marriages. She destroyed two, including yours, and attempted to ruin a third within two weeks.” Sansa’s voice wasn’t without accusation. She still didn’t forgive the Tyrells to have tried to tear into pieces her marriage with Tyrion.

“I’m sorry about this, Sansa. That wasn’t my idea.”

“But it wouldn’t have bothered you. You’re the one who told me Tyrion wouldn’t be a bad husband one day.”

“It was mostly to reassure you.” Margaery smiled in her direction, but Sansa could only return half of it. “But I thought what I told you. He’s probably the best Lannister there is. Without his small height, he would be very handsome. You’re right, he wouldn’t have made a bad husband. He would have been far better than Joffrey.” No one could argue with this. “But I think I prefer to be queen. This way I have an ally at Winterfell and Casterly Rock. And anyway, my grandmother left not long after your husband came to see her and told her himself what he thought of her marriage proposal with very crude words. I wished I had been there to see this conversation.”

Margaery smiled again in her direction and Sansa could return most of it. Perhaps a duel of words between the Imp and the Queen of Thorns would have been entertaining. Her friend didn’t stop to talk. “That’s strange when we think about it. When you were betrothed to him, I was the one to speak highly of him, but now you’re the one to speak highly of him to everyone. And no one dares to contradict you. I wish however you could give me details about how experienced he is.”

Sansa couldn’t stop herself from flushing this time. Margaery laughed at her expression, but lowly to not attract attention. Sansa tried to recompose herself. “Even when we’ll do it, I doubt I’ll give you details.”

“Sansa, you wound me. I thought we could trust each other. That we were friends.” Margaery said it with a false indignant voice.

“We are, of course. Though I think it will be difficult for me to consider your grandmother a friend after what she did.”

Margaery smiled sadly at her. “I know. But I would have a friendly advice to give you Sansa, before you leave for the Westerlands. If I were you, I would consummate my marriage as quickly as possible. I’m surely not the first person to tell you that, but I’m telling you this because I think it would be the best for you. You must give children to Tyrion soon, or else people will start to whisper against you. And with everything that happened with your family, it would be for the better if you silenced any other possible accusations that may be thrown against you.”

Margaery’s eyes only showed sincerity, and Sansa knew she wasn’t playing. “I’ll think about it.”

“And once your marriage is consummated, then there will be no way for another old lady to propose another young woman to your husband.”

Both chuckled at this. Sansa left Margaery and went to see Tyrion. She spotted him discussing with Oberyn Martell and Ellaria Sand. Sansa caught a frightened sight on the woman’s face. The Dornish prince left, his paramour glancing at Tyrion with a face between plea for help and threat. Sansa came at Tyrion’s side.

“Is there something wrong?” she asked.

Tyrion seemed surprised by her presence. “Oh, sorry, I didn’t see you coming. No, everything is alright.”

She could tell he was lying. “Do you really think I believe you?”

“I’ll tell you everything after the coronation feast,” he finally said. Sansa didn’t press the matter.

The rest of the ceremony included a feast in the gardens. Sansa spoke with many people, including Sera Durwell, offering her some comforting words for her broken betrothal. The girl of the Reach looked in a better mood than when Sansa saw her in the Great Hall. There were also the knights, lords and ladies who came to talk with her, many trying to bring her attention on some problems they had and some help they would need. Some Tyrell and Baratheon bannermen were among these people. Sansa found it strange they asked something from the Lady of the Westerlands. However, no one from Dorne asked anything from her.

She and Tyrion left at the end of the ceremony, excusing themselves to Tommen. As they came back to their chambers, Sansa noticed Tyrion was really preoccupied by something, and she didn’t think it was financial matters. There was something on his mind. She sat with him and put her hand on his.

“What troubles you?”

After a moment, he decided to speak. “It’s Oberyn Martell. You surprised the end of our conversation. He told me he would kill Gregor Clegane tomorrow, no matter what I did to stop him. If my men are to intervene, he will kill them before he kills the Mountain.”

Sansa was agape before this new. “But why? Why does he want so much to kill this man?”

Sansa knew Ser Gregor Clegane was a monster. She still remembered the discussion she had with Littlefinger about how he disfigured the Hound when they were still children. And she heard many rumors about the atrocities he committed during the war.
“Gregor Clegane is the man who murdered Rhaenys and Aegon Targaryen, the children of Rhaegar Targaryen and Elia Martell, at the end of Robert’s Rebellion. The oldest of the children hadn’t reached her third name day. Elia Martell was the sister of Oberyn. Clegane killed her as well,” Tyrion explained.

Sansa was horrified. She knew about the death of the Targaryen children at the end of the last rebellion, but she didn’t know it was the work of a single man. She thought they were killed in the chaos that followed the Sack of King’s Landing. She knew the Mountain was in the capital right now. Cersei had called him back from Harrenhal to be her champion if Tyrion demanded a trial by combat. It was a chance it never happened.

“And now he wants to get his revenge,” Tyrion continued. “He didn’t come here for Joffrey’s wedding. He came to kill the man who raped his sister and killed her with her children. I tried to convince him to not try this, but he wants to kill him now. And knowing the Mountain, I’m afraid it may end up quite bad for the Red Viper.”

Sansa saw what Tyrion meant. She knew the relations between the Lannisters and the Martells were very bad. Their alliance was quite weak, and anything could destroy it forever. If Oberyn Martell was killed by some Lannister bannerman, then this could start a war between the Lannisters and the Martells. Sansa thought about Myrcella in Dorne. What would happen to her? She remembered how she smiled at Tyrion when he arrived in King’s Landing and how Tyrion seemed to like her. She understood he worried about this.

“Is there some way to prevent it? To send Gregor Clegane away, or to force the prince to leave the capital?” she asked.

“We cannot force Prince Oberyn to leave. He is a member of the small council. As for Gregor Clegane, I don’t really like the idea of sending him away in the nature. Everywhere he goes he only spreads destruction, and I think he already caused enough sufferings to the Seven Kingdoms. I was planning to have him put on trial once I would be back to Casterly Rock. There are rumors about him disfiguring his brother, but also killing his father, his sister and his two wives. There are people who disappear mysteriously in his lands to never be seen again, and I know he raped and killed innocent people for no reason even in times of peace. That wouldn’t have been difficult to sentence him to die. I promised Prince Oberyn that I would have him executed, but he’s too impatient. He’s going to try to kill him tomorrow, no matter what I say.”

Sansa thought about the half-burned face of the Hound. She thought about how the Mountain tried to kill Ser Loras at the tournament, and how he killed Ser Hugh of the Vale. She thought about everything Tyrion just told her about this monster. She understood quite well why the Hound hated knights, especially if the rumors about his brother killing his father and sister were true.

“Perhaps you should have him killed.” Sansa never thought she would say something like that one day, but she did. She had no desire to see Gregor Clegane live, and she wouldn’t feel any remorse by ordering someone to kill him. Tyrion stared at her in surprise.

“I suppose I could. Though it wouldn’t look very good if I ordered one of my bannermen’s assassination, monstrous he may be. But I can’t allow Oberyn Martell to die all the same. And I cannot stop him either. He told me nothing would stop him, and I’m afraid it’s true.”

“What will happen if Prince Oberyn succeeds in killing Gregor Clegane?” Sansa asked hesitantly.

“Well, I wouldn’t blame him too much. I would get rid of a mad dog, and it would improve our relations with Dorne I think. The problem is we can’t be sure he will manage to kill him. Clegane is mad, but he knows how to fight all the same. And he fights pretty well and moves quite quickly despite his huge size. If only I could be sure Gregor Clegane would be killed…”

Tyrion’s face slowly changed, as if he realized something. He rose from his chair.

“I need to speak to a few people.”

He left the room without any other explanation. Sansa wondered what idea Tyrion had. Perhaps they could make sure Gregor Clegane would be killed by Oberyn Martell, but Sansa didn’t really know how to do it. But Tyrion seemed to know. She wondered how.

Chapter End Notes

A duel seems imminent. What would be the outcome?

Please review

Next chapter: Bronn
Bronn II

Chapter Notes

The Mountain against the Viper.

I decided to write this chapter from Bronn's perspective since he plays a major role during the events surrounding the duel. Also, I felt guilty to not have written a longer chapter for him at the beginning of the fic, so I decided to give him more space.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

BRONN II

Bronn gave his last instructions to his men. Some of them were Lannister guards, but others were gold cloaks he knew from his time as Commander of the City Watch. These gold cloaks were chosen among the most loyal men he had in this time. He chose them very carefully. The task they were about to perform required boldness, courage and obedience. They were a collection of people with more or less honor who would get the job done. Bronn couldn’t allow himself to fail. His future was at stake. He gave enough reasons to his men to execute the plan without mistake.

Soon they were gone after receiving their final instructions. Bronn walked out from his personal room and paid a visit to the filthy old stoat. He entered in his chamber without knocking, and not for the first time. And like the first time, he had company. Like the first time, the old crawling man tried to cower away, but there was no way to leave the room. The girl went as far away as she could from Bronn.

“What… What are you doing here?” Pycelle asked.

“Stay calm, old man. Only here to make sure you did as I told you. You remember? What I told you yesterday? Or do you begin to forget about everything? Perhaps your brain begins to limp too.”

“I… I did exactly as you told me. You won’t have to complain”

“You’d better be sure. There is much at stake for me, and so for you. If this fails, I won’t have a single hesitation to make another cut on you, and this time it won’t be the beard. And you won’t end in a place so friendly as the black cells.”

Bronn emphasized his words by putting a knife on his throat while grinning. “I am your loyal servant,” the Grand Maester whimpered.

Bronn noticed a strange smell. He looked at the sheets under the old man and saw a puddle of urine he just made. Bronn pushed him away in disgust and went to the young girl in the corner, tossing a silver stag in her direction. He then turned to the Grand Maester again.

“Don’t forget to pay her. And pay her well.” He then grinned towards the girl. “I’ll come to see you tonight. That will be much more pleasant for you than with this old slug.”

Bronn left without another word and went to the battlements. He followed them until he reached the place where it was. All his men were already in position. Good. He hoped the men to who he gave other tasks were doing their work right now. In the end of the day, he would be a sellsword no more. He overlooked the yard. For now, there was no one in the square space under him, but he knew people would come very soon. Normally, men sentenced to death would be executed in this area early in the morning. Today, with some hope, only one man would die, and his death would mean lands and a castle for Bronn. He didn’t spit on this work to do, but that wouldn’t be easy. He was very careful. A single stumble and they could fail. The error wasn’t something he could allow this time.

Finally he came. He only wore breeches and boots, nothing else. His chest was displayed to the world, his enormous muscles contracting and inflating at every movement he made. Bronn really never saw a man bigger than this, but he also never saw a man crazier than this beast. He was alone, an eight-foot tall man only accompanied by his short squire. He was drinking from a huge flask the boy held for him. Bronn knew what it contained. The mad dog drank large quantities of milk of the poppy all the time because of extreme headaches he suffered constantly. However, this milk of the poppy was different. The old man made sure of that. At least he should have.

He drank deeply, then tossed it back to his squire, and went to the middle of the yard and looked around. He seemed lost. He expected poor men to slaughter for fun, and instead he found nothing. The mad dog looked all around many times, as if he was trying to understand something. Bronn doubted he could understand anything. The huge man turned to his squire.

“Where are they? Where are they? Are you going to tell me where they are, or do I have to get the answer out of your guts?”

The squire seemed lost as well. “I don’t understand, ser. They are always here each morning…”

“And today they are not.” Gregor Clegane drew his six-foot greatsword with a single hand and cut his squire in two. The two parts fell on the ground, each one with one arm, one leg and half a head, blood spurting from everywhere. The enormous man took the flask and emptied the rest of it. When it was empty, he threw it violently against the wall of stone, breaking it.

“WHERE ARE THEY?” The mad monster growled loudly. He was more mad than ever and unable to control himself. “WHERE ARE THEY? GIVE ME SOMEONE TO KILL BEFORE I KILL EVERYONE.”

It was at this moment that Bronn gave his signal and whistled. All his men, red cloaks and gold cloaks, went out of their hideouts. Some pointed spears, other pointed swords in the Mountain’s direction, but most carried loaded crossbows, especially those on the battlements. Bronn had them place other loaded crossbows at their feet just in case. It would take a lot to kill the Mountain.

Before the huge man could react to this, Tyrion and Oberyn Martell entered the courtyard with an escort of red cloaks and Dornish soldiers. The paramour of the prince was with them as well. Oberyn Martell was lightly armored, but he was still more armored than Gregor Clegane who wore nothing more than breeches. But he still had his sword. Tyrion stopped at good distance from the Mountain, a very cautious decision, with guards all around him and the prince of Dorne at his side. The mad dog looked at him, turning his back on Bronn who stood on the battlements with most of his men. The huge creature was surrounded.

“Ser Gregor,” started the Halfman. “I’m glad my sister ordered you to come. I have a question to ask you. Remember I am your liege lord and you owe me the truth. Did you kill the princess Elia Martell during the Sacking of King’s Landing twenty years ago? I’m sure you must remember. After all, my father ordered you to kill her children.”
“What are you talking about?” The mad dog seemed lost. The extra dose of milk of the poppy was effective.

“I’m going to ask you one last time. Did you kill Elia Martell twenty years ago here in this very city?” the Imp repeated.

The giant growled. “Yes, I killed her. Does it matter?”

Bronn saw the prince of Dorne with a deadly glare on his face, but it was Tyrion who spoke next. “Ser Gregor Clegane, you murdered a highborn lady without receiving an order from your liege lord. I, Tyrion, son Tywin, of House Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands and Warden of the West, hereby declare you guilty of murder. I strip you of all your titles, lands and castles, and sentence you to die.” Tyrion turned to the Red Viper. “He’s yours.”

The dwarf retreated just like everyone else, except Oberyn Martell and his woman. They kissed passionately and Bronn saw them exchanging a few words in low voices, though he couldn’t understand them. The Red Viper seized a spear that a squire handed him and approached the dog, the tip of his spear pointed towards the sky. Gregor Clegane didn’t really seem to care about what just happened. He was still holding his sword in his hand, ready to kill.

“Have they told you who I am?” asked the Red Viper.

“Some dead man,” roared the other, taking a step before and slashing his sword in Oberyn’s direction. He missed, the Dornishman ducking.

“I am the brother of Elia Martell. Do you know why I have come all the way to this stinking shit-pile of a city? For you.”

Oberyn Martell attacked. Clegane stopped the first stroke, but he couldn’t stop the second one. A scratch appeared on his chest. The giant screamed. Both fighters backed away. The Mountain passed a hand on the cut he received, then roared and charged the prince who simply ducked away, making another cut on the thighs in the process. Breeches were no protection and the big man screamed in pain again.

The prince used the respite it gave him. “I’m going to hear you confess before you die. You raped my sister. You murdered her. You killed her children. Say it now and we can make this quick.”

“Did you come to talk or to fight?” the Mountain shouted. He made a ponderous charge.

The sword and the spear danced, hitting each other. Clegane’s attack were quick and heavy, despite his size and the two injuries he already received, but the Red Viper was quicker and managed to avert each strike or to block it. Furthermore, the spear was longer than the six-foot greatsword. It was difficult for the Mountain to reach the Dornishman. Oberyn Martell managed to get behind the Mountain and to hit him with the blunt point of his spear on the head. The Mountain tried to hack the prince in two while turning on his heels, but he missed again.

The dance continued for a long time. Clegane received new cuts, but it didn’t seem to slow him down. He looked angrier each time in fact. Bronn began to wonder if Pycelle added enough milk of the poppy. Twice the Mountain managed to touch the prince and hit him, but each time the viper escaped by jumping in the air and with acrobatics. He was always on his feet again. His spear was broken in two once, but again Clegane couldn’t use his advantage and the prince escaped with jumps and wheels. The Mountain was unable to really reach the prince and he received a second spear instantly from his squire.
Each time, the Mountain charged with more ferocity, yelling and roaring like a beast, and each time he missed. However, each time, Bronn could see the Mountain attacked with even less thinking than the time before. He turned crazier each time the spear hit him and made another slight wound. Bronn could see he was beginning to pant. The Red Viper was exhausting him by forcing him to move around like a demon. Oberyn Martell didn’t seem to be frightened by the huge monster.

Bronn would have thought the Red Viper was a bloody fool to not fear the Mountain. Clegane was freakish big and freakish strong, and quicker than you’d expect for a man of that size. And yet the Red Viper seemed able to handle and dominate him, dancing around him, tiring him. He may get so tired that he would drop his sword. Bronn would do the same than the Dornishman if he had been in his place, but a single misstep and he was dead. For the moment however, the Dornish prince had the advantage. Bronn even had the impression the Mountain moved slowly than before after some time. The fight was also one of words.

“Say it. You raped her! You murdered her! You killed her children!” Oberyn kept saying these words again and again, each time louder and with more rage. The Mountain too was shouting, but not the same words at all.

“Be quiet! Shut your bloody mouth! Enough! Shut up!”

After a few minutes of fight, Clegane’s body was covered with little cuts everywhere, but he fought with more rage all the same, charging the prince, trying to hack him, roaring all the time. Bronn was glad to not be the one fighting him. The prince enjoyed it, but Bronn saw that both rage and joy filled him as the fight went on. He wondered which one of the two combatants was the craziest.

Other people started to arrive on the battlements and watched. They were fascinated by the fight taking place, and Bronn had to admit he was too. Who would win? The Red Viper or the Mountain? He heard people starting to gamble about the outcome. Gregor Clegane was bleeding from everywhere on his body, but kept fighting. Then, as the Red Viper managed to get behind the giant again, he cut deeply through his right knee, forcing him to kneel. Oberyn Martell went to a good distance of Clegane, then charged while screaming: “YOU KILLED HER CHILDREN!” The spear sank deeply into the tummy. The Mountain was on the ground in a cross position, his great sword abandoned a few inches from his right hand, the spear planted into his belly.

“What’s going on here?” Bronn turned to his left to see Kevan Lannister coming with two guards in his direction while looking at the courtyard. “What’s the meaning of all this?” He seemed to ask this question to Bronn.

B orn shrugged. “You should ask your nephew. He’s the one who organized this. I only follow his orders.”

The Imp’s uncle was staring in utter surprise at the scene right before him. Bronn turned back his attention to it. The Red Viper was now circling around the Mountain, looking intently at the huge body on the ground.

“Wait. Are you dying? No, no, no. You can’t die yet. You haven’t confessed.” With a quick move, the prince removed the spear from the body. “Say it. Say her name. Elia Martell. You raped her. You killed her children. Elia Martell. Who gave you the order? STAND ASIDE!” Tyrion had given the order to the men in the courtyard to finish the Mountain, but the prince didn’t look to be done with it. Gold and red cloaks stopped in their movement. Bronn didn’t like it. “WHO GAVE YOU THE ORDER? SAY HER NAME! YOU RAPED HER! YOU MURDERED HER! YOU KILLED HER CHILDREN! SAY IT. SAY HER NAME. SAY IT!”

Oberyn Martell tumbled. The Mountain wasn’t dead yet. With a single move of the arm, he made the viper fall, then grabbed him and lifted him in the air with a single arm as if he was nothing more than a doll. A stroke at the face sent teeth and blood all over the ground as the Mountain brought his opponent under him. Bronn knew it was time to act. He seized his own crossbow and shot at the Mountain. The bolt penetrated his back and the giant seemed about to fall over the floor, but he didn’t.

“Elia Martell,” Gregor Clegane growled loudly. “I killed her children. Then I raped her. Then I smashed her head in like this.” Blood, brain and flesh flew all around the Mountain. A woman screamed. Men, both red cloaks and gold cloaks, were running towards the Mountain with drawn swords. They pierced him, hacked him, cut him into pieces. Tyrion had given the order to separate the two men, but too late. Some soldiers didn’t react quickly enough, and the few who acted immediately were there too late anyway. When they removed the huge body of Gregor Clegane, Bronn wanted to give back his breakfast, and it didn’t often happen to him. The head was half destroyed. Only the Mountain could do something so horrible.

Everyone in the courtyard and on the battlements was silent, staring in shock at the gruesome scene before them. Bronn saw many horrible things during his life, but that could be the worst he ever saw up to now. The Mountain really was a mad dog. And here he was, next to the bloody mess he made only with his hands. Tyrion had approached the body of the Red Viper and stared with a grim expression at the remnants of this man. Bronn saw Kevan Lannister enter the yard and look at the two bodies, visibly disgusted by the sight of it, but probably still the one who stayed alert the most. He made a sign to a Lannister guard with his arm. Bronn didn’t understand what he told him. He repeated the movement a second time, showing some impatience, and the red cloak went to Ser Gregor’s body and cut his head from the rest of it. Bronn guessed the Mountain was dead for good this time. He doubted the mad dog could survive without a head, even if he didn’t use much of it. The Hand of the King went to speak to Tyrion, then left. The Imp was still staring in shock at the smashed head of Oberyn Martell.

Bonn finally came down in the courtyard and walked to Tyron. “Didn’t go as planned.”

“No, not at all,” answered the dwarf. “We’re going to have some problems with Dorne.”

“Aye.” Bronn was quite disgusted by the sight before him. It was even worse to look at the shattered head with blood and brain parts coming out of it when you were close of it. The viper’s paramour was crying hysterically behind.

“Make sure every man of the Mountain is dead by the end of the day. None of them must survive or escape. And make sure no one else dies. There’s already too many victims.” The Imp left him with that and a grim face. “Bring the Silent Sisters. They must take care of Oberyn’s body. Do what you want with Clegane’s,” he shouted at the other guards.

Bonn spent the rest of the day making sure all the Mountain’s men were dead. The men Bronn charged of eliminating them mostly succeeded. Many of the Mountain’s men were murdered in their bed, not yet awaken at this hour. Others were found in brothels, brought out of these places and had the throat slit. Some were in inns too, and easily dealt with as well. Three managed to escape and Bronn chased them in Flea Bottom until the end of the day. He found two of them with the help of the gold cloaks and a few Lannister men. The third couldn’t be found. When Bronn came back to the Red Keep in the evening, he was exhausted. He wanted nothing more than to fall into his bed and sleep. He wasn’t even strong enough to visit the brothel for the girl he talked to in the morning. But first, he had to make his report to his lord.

The dwarf was in his solar, writing letters. There were many ledgers all around him as usual. He raised his head when Bronn entered. “So, the job is done?” he asked, obviously in bad mood.
“Aye, mostly. All his men are dead, except one we couldn’t find. I gave his description and his last known movements to the City Watch. He’ll probably end up as another assassin in Flea Bottom the gold cloaks will never be able to find.”

“Was there any casualty?”

“Apart from the prince this morning, two gold cloaks died in the operation. No loss among your own men. Considering we killed nearly all Clegane’s men, our overall losses are quite acceptable.”

“Yes, if we exclude Prince Oberyn. That wasn’t an acceptable loss.”

Bronn sat in a chair, tired of the day. “Look, there was nothing I could do. It’s not my fault if the Red Viper wanted so much the Mountain to confess his crimes. He should have been satisfied with the answers you gave him, but instead he tried to get whole confessions from a mad dog.”

“I know, I know, my friend,” Tyrion reassured him. “No need to tell me. You followed my orders and did your best. We couldn’t save Prince Oberyn from himself. Even if you had given the order to all your men on the battlements to shoot with their crossbows on the Mountain, that might not have been enough, and most probably a bolt would have hit Oberyn. There was nothing we could do. You did your part well. I’m rid of Gregor Clegane and the vermin that followed him. We shouldn’t concern ourselves with the lone man who escaped. He won’t be able to cause much trouble.”

“I fulfilled my part of the bargain. I think I should get my payment.”

Tyrion sighed heavily. “Have you ever known me for not paying my debts?” The dwarf took a piece of parchment somewhere on his desk and handed it to Bronn. It was a document with the seal of the Lord of Casterly Rock. Bronn unrolled it.

I, Tyrion of the House Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands and Warden of the West, hereby strip Ser Gregor Clegane of his lands, titles and castles for his many crimes against the Realm. I attain him and all his kin of any right on their previous possessions.

I hereby grant all the lands, castles and holdings Gregor Clegane once had to Ser Bronn of the Blackwater. All these possessions are to be held by Ser Bronn, his sons and grandsons from this day until the end of time, under the authority of House Lannister of Casterly Rock.

“You should be happy, my friend,” Tyrion said. “You’re a landed knight now.”

“I think you owe me a lordship as well,” Bronn pointed out.

“We already agreed you would have Clegane’s lands instead of the lordship. Perhaps you don’t want to remember, but I do remember. These lands will be much more useful for you than some fancy title, especially when you already have one.”

Bronn couldn’t deny any of it. I tried. “What about my wife? You promised me one as well.”

“I didn’t forget. I’ll find you one as soon as I’ll get back to the Westerlands. She will be a highborn lady, don’t worry.”

“And beautiful, too,” Bronn insisted.

“She will be beautiful. You can also pick a woman on your new lands if you want. She would be less demanding than a highborn lady. Just try to take one who actually wants to marry you, or at least who’s not bothered by that.”
“I’ll think about that.” Bronn adjusted his position in his seat. That was over. He had lands now, and sooon he would have a wife. His life as a sellsword was over. “When do I leave?”

“As soon as you can. No one knows about Clegane’s death yet outside the city. I suggest you ride quickly for his keep and take it. I’ll give you one hundred of my men. Put to the sword any of his men who might pose a problem, and try to make sure no people disappear as it happened under the Mountain.”

“Alright. I’ll ride on the morrow.” He would need a good night of sleep first however. He was exhausted. “And you, what problems will you have to deal with once I’ll be gone?”

Tyrion sighed. “First, I’ll have to deal with Dorne. I doubt Doran Martell will be happy to learn his brother is dead. Kevan isn’t either. I just had a pretty unpleasant discussion with him.”

“I guess he wants you out of the city.”

“Worse. He wants me to act as judge for Ser Meryn’s trial since one of the three previous judges died. That means I won’t leave for Casterly Rock immediately.” He wasn’t happy, it was obvious. Bronn knew Tyrion wanted to get out of this stinking place as soon as possible. The Stark girl, his wife, wanted too. And Bronn wanted too.

“What about the prince’s woman? Remind me her name. She’s a Sand.”

“Ellaria Sand,” the dwarf answered gloomily. “She’s utterly destroyed. I would be too if I saw the person I love being butchered in such a horrible way. I tried to see her to offer my condolences, perhaps give her some form of consolation, but she refused to see me. Sansa tried as well without success.”

“The Dornish will come after you, I fear. I start to regret working for you for so long.”

“You have nothing to regret. You are a landed knight now, so you won’t be close to me as often as before. And Doran Martell wouldn’t be interested in you if he looked for revenge.” The Imp’s voice turned a little less bitter. “At least, I took my precautions. When I went to visit Prince Oberyn yesterday to arrange everything, I had him write a letter to his brother where he explained he was going to kill the Mountain in individual combat. That was a protection I demanded for allowing him to kill the Mountain himself. The Red Viper explains everything in the letter. With some hope, the letter, the Mountain’s head and the return of Prince Oberyn’s bones to Dorne will be enough to placate his brother. Prince Doran is a cautious man. I think Myrcella will be safe.”

Bronn could hear some doubts in his friend’s voice. “Don’t you think you should ask at the same time to return your niece to the capital?” the former sellsword suggested.

Tyrion seemed to think about it for a moment. “No,” he finally declared. “It’s better to make sure we maintain good relations with Dorne, and we need to keep Myrcella’s betrothal intact if we want it to last. Anyway she has Ser Arys Oakheart with her, and he’s a good kingsguard, like Balon Swann. She will be safe. The Martells don’t kill innocent children. Prince Oberyn was wild, but I think he told me the truth about this.”

Concerns were obvious in the dwarf’s voice all the same. He was afraid for his niece. Bronn remembered Princess Myrcella. A good and kind little girl, unlike Bronn’s dead sister. He hoped nothing would happen to her. “How does your wife feel about this? Leaving later than you planned?”

A sigh welcomed Bronn’s question. “She’s beginning to wonder if we will ever leave this place.
And I share her doubts. If it goes on, we will spend our lives in King’s Landing. She badly wants to leave, and me too.”

Bronn nodded. He wouldn’t blame the girl after seeing her being beaten by Ser Meryn. “At least, she’ll have the chance to see Trant beheaded.”

“I don’t think Sansa enjoys beheadings very much.”

He got a point. Bronn was surprised how things changed. A few months ago, he would have been discussing with his friend about Shae and how to protect her. And another few months before that, they would have discussed about how good were the girls they tried. However, not long before the Battle of Blackwater, the little man stopped talking about his time with Shae. That was when Bronn realized he had fallen in love with the foreign girl. Even worse, Shae had fallen in love with him too. If only they hadn’t. They would have avoided many problems. Tyrion might still be bedding Shae while wed to Sansa Stark. He would have two women and two kingdoms of his own. Instead, he had one kingdom, only one woman he refused to bed, and another kingdom he would only get the day he finally decided to fuck his wife. Bronn didn’t understand why he still refused to bed her. After all, it was quite obvious the girl liked him. He had no longer any reason to hesitate. Bronn would have thanked the gods to have never fallen in love if he believed in them.

“Well,” Bronn finally said after a moment. “You’ll give your wife my regards. I’ll go somewhere else for the night. Care to accompany me? One last ride before we go separate ways?”

The Imp looked at him with an exasperated gaze. “I’m a married man. I don’t partake anymore if you’re going where I think you go.”

Bronn sighed. “You really became the most boring man in the world after you married this girl.”

“You too you’ll be married soon. Perhaps your behavior will change then.”

Bronn scoffed and grinned. “Never in the world. I’ll go and celebrate alone. There’s a girl waiting for me.”

Bronn left. He was tired, but that would be his last night in the capital, so best enjoy it. He just became a knight with lands and a keep. The Imp’s decree was with him. Who would he be if he didn’t celebrate this? He left the Red Keep, walking down Aegon’s Hill and went to Littlefinger’s brothel on Visenya’s Hill. The young girl he saw with the old man this morning was happy to oblige. Bronn knew he was surely a welcome change in comparison to the torture she had to suffer with Pycelle. Or at least, she acted as if he was a welcome change. Bronn hadn’t seen her before. She was probably new here. The poor. It seems every new girl here has to go through a night with Pycelle first. She lacked experience, but she wasn’t bad. Sometimes Bronn welcomed it when he found himself with a girl who just arrived. She gave a different experience than those who had experience.

When they were done, Bronn paid her twice the price he paid normally. He just got lands, so he felt he could be generous. Bronn then left her. As he walked through the corridors of the brothel, among customers and women, Bronn felt wistful in some way. That would be the last time he would see this place before a very long time.

“Ser Bronn.” He turned in the direction the voice came from. A smile formed on his face.

“Oh, if that’s not the little Daisy.” The little brown haired and eyed girl was walking towards him, all smiling. She wore clothes, which was unusual here at this hour. “You seem a little bit too much dressed.”
“You want to remove them? It wouldn’t bother me.” She was chuckling as she spoke. She was quite innocent for a whore, even more when Bronn considered the way she was beaten on Joffrey’s order. At least she was still alive. The redhead wasn’t so lucky.

Bonn had to nod negatively. “I’m sorry, girl. I already received my service for tonight. I’m going back to the Red Keep.”

“Are you sure you couldn’t have any use of a second course?” She was quite pretty, and sounded so naïve and seductive at the same time. Bronn had to grin.

“I’m afraid I’m not in the mood for a second course. After all, if you fuck too much, you’ll lose any taste for it. We must dose it, and I received my dose for this night. I’m really sorry beauty.”

She looked sad like a child. Bonn even had the impression it affected him. She was good at it. Or was she really playing? He had some doubts on her. He knew at least that her fear when he brought her to testify had been real. To return to the place where you were nearly beaten to death was terrifying, no matter who you were.

“You’ll return tomorrow?” She was playing the hopeful one now.

“Sorry, girl. I won’t. I was just granted some keep with lands and I leave tomorrow to seize it. I won’t come back before long.”

She was agape before him. “You’re leaving?”

“Aye.” She really seemed sad before his answer. He put his hand on her shoulder. “Hey, don’t be sad. There are a lot of other clients here, you won’t miss any.”

She looked at him with big sad eyes. He wasn’t sure if she was faking or not. “I… I just thought I owed you some thanks. After all, you promised me nothing would happen to me after the trial, and nothing happened just like you said.”

Bonn remembered how frightened she had been this day when he came to bring her at the trial. It had been dangerous for her, but they needed her testimony. And she proved to be quite useful. Bonn didn’t only have to pay her very much, but also to promise her his protection. He lied when he told her he would protect her against Joffrey and Cersei, but finally Varys ensured her safety after the trial. Bonn found the eunuch had quite a strange soft spot for whores considering his physical condition. Bonn wasn’t without pity for these women. Bonn sold his sword, they sold their bodies, but they were all bought like Bonn in some way. In some way it was more him who owed this girl something. He couldn’t be sure, but if she really wanted to thank him… And even if she didn’t, well… Bonn peered her from head to feet.

“I have an idea. Come with me at the Red Keep.”

She looked at him in utter confusion. “The Red Keep?”

“Aye. You’ll spend the night with me. For now I don’t feel like having fun, but it might come when I’m back into my bed. You’ll have the opportunity to thank me then.”

“I’m not sure.” She was obviously afraid. “Girls like me aren’t allowed in this place. The last time…”

Bonn took her chin gently. “Hey, look at me. It’s no longer dangerous there. The boy is dead, Tywin Lannister is dead, and the Queen Regent is gone. There’s no one left who has girls like you whipped. And you’ll be with me. I’ll protect you if anything happens.”
He could see uncertainty in her eyes. That wasn’t faked for sure. “I don’t know if I can. I’m not supposed to leave while I work this night.”

“Oh, you’ll be working. I’ll pay the one in charge for that. And I’ll pay you handsomely as well. Didn’t you want to thank me? Here’s your chance.”

She seemed uncertain for some time, but finally she smiled and positively nodded her head. “Alright. I follow you.”

“Aye. Follow me.”

She looked excited as they left the brothel, but turned a little bit afraid again when they came close to the Red Keep. Finally, she regained her excitement once they were inside his room. They had no problem to reach it. No one stopped them or even looked at them. Daisy was dressed like most handmaidens in the castle, and there were so many who came and left that everyone possibly thought her to be one of them. She started to disrobe as soon as he closed the door.

“Hey, hey, no.” He stopped her. “I said only if I was in the mood. For now I’m not. I need to relax.”

He dropped himself heavily in a chair and poured some wine. He looked at the girl. She had put back her clothes on her little body. “Want some?”

“What?”

“Some wine?”

Her face showed confusion again. “I’m not sure…”

“I’m offering it to you. Are you going to refuse? It’s free.” Bronn filled a second cup and pointed it to the girl. “Take it. You’ll see. It’s good.”

She approached slowly and drank slowly as well. Bronn drank as well. “That’s good. Very good.”

Bonn smiled. “Aye. Arbor gold. The Imp likes it a lot. He got me used to it. I’ll miss this good stuff once I’ll be in my lands.”

“Where are you going?”

“The Westerlands. The Imp gave me some lands with a keep there.”

She approached at sat in another chair. “Is it true he had a whore in his service? Shae. That was her name, wasn’t it? Is it true he loved her and she loved him too?”

Bonn nodded. “Aye. Sadly for both of them. Sometimes I wonder how it happened. Well, I wouldn’t say it was so surprising he fell in love with her, after all she was quite enticing. Dark hair, dark eyes, quite tall, tanned skin, an exotic accent. And quite experienced too. That she fell in love with him is strange however. There aren’t many women who fall in love with a dwarf.” Though when he thought about it, Bronn didn’t expect to have some sort of friendship with Tyrion Lannister when he met him in the Vale, and strangely they had become some kind of friends.

“Ros used to tell me he was very good. That I would be surprised with him. She said he was good with his tongue and his fingers, and with his cock as well, that he was very experienced. Do you think you could suggest me to him?”

Bonn grinned to the floor. She arrived too late. “I’m afraid his wife wouldn’t like it. He’s done with brothels and girls like you. I’m afraid Lady Sansa Lannister is the only one who will see what’s under his breeches from now on.” If he ever decides to fuck her one day.

Daisy looked sad about it. “Are you sure he couldn’t make an exception? He gave a golden necklace to Ros for the time he spent with her.” That didn’t make much good to her. “She said he always treated his women very kindly.” In the case of his wife, he’s so kind that he refuses to touch her. “Is there really nothing you could do?”

Barron sighed. He had to get this idea out of her head and quickly. “I could suggest you to him, but he will refuse, and probably tell me to go and fuck myself.” Barron emptied his cup. “Forget about the Imp. He’s no longer available. Now, time to sleep. I need to rest. And you keep your clothes for now. I’ll tell you when I want them to leave you.”

Barron, on the other side, didn’t hold back and took out his chain mail, his boots and everything on his chest. He only kept his breeches. Daisy came to sit behind him once he was bare chest on it. “You look exhausted. Do you want me to rub your shoulders?”

“Aye, do it. But first bring me another cup of wine.” The girl went to the table and poured a cup she gave him, then went behind him again to rub his shoulders and his back. “Nothing better than a woman to get aches and tiredness out of your body.”

Her hands felt good on his skin. His body relaxed. Daisy continued to rub his back from his hips to his armpits, then his shoulders, then his back again. Comfort flooded his body, feelings of well-being invading him. He puffed heavily in relief. She was arousing. Barron’s cock stirred in his breeches.

“All right. I’m in the mood now.” He laid down on the mattress and looked at Daisy removing her clothes. He had already seen her naked body in the past, as her customer or as another woman’s customer, but it was always pleasant to see a naked woman, no matter how often you saw her this way. She untied his breeches and made love to him atop of him. Barron had fucked her before, but she seemed better than the previous times. She probably had more experience than before. She cried in pleasure as Barron grunted in pleasure as well. It wasn’t the only time they did it. Barron had her for the night, his last night in King’s Landing, and he wanted to enjoy it as much as he could before he would spend weeks on bad roads. He fell asleep, then awoke to fuck her again a few times, and each time he liked it. She really got better compared to the last time he saw her, though he wasn’t sure when was the last time he used her services. When morning came, Barron did it one last time. She was under him, panting and smiling. She had smiled during the whole night, from the moment she undressed.

“How did you like my thanks?” she asked him in a low and seductive voice in his ear.

“Very much. I wish I received such thanks more often.” She laughed. Barron rolled over her, putting an end to their joining. He began to put on his clothes. “You’re good. Even better than the last time I had you.”

“I have people to teach me.”

“Then your teachers are excellent. Thank them for me.”

Her face turned sour. “I won’t ever see you again.”

Barron sighed. “Not before a long time. I don’t know when I’ll come back to King’s Landing.” Daisy looked at the mattress under her. She really looked sad about his departure. Truth or act? There was no way for him to find out, but he had to admit the girl was far from evil. Just like his dwarf friend, Barron didn’t like to see whores being mistreated, except when they were bitches. This girl wasn’t. In the end, they were all people who had nothing and were reduced to work for highborn people and clean their boots in order to survive. You could clean the boots while insulting them, like Bronn did, but you were still cleaning them all the same. Bronn looked at the girl more closely as she averted her eyes from him. She had a lovely body, all forms a woman could have, beautiful long hair. And she fucked very well.

“I’ll miss you. You’re a good man.” Bronn hoped the girl didn’t really think what she said. He was no better than the other people. Only, they had to pay him very handsomely if they wanted him to commit monstrous things. An idea came to him.

“You don’t have to miss me. Not if you’re with me.”

She looked back at him, confusion plain of her face again. “What do you mean?”

“If you’re with me, then you won’t miss me, though you may come to miss the times I wasn’t with you. But you could come with me.”

Surprise stuck to her face. “Come with you?”

“Aye. I would like to have a bedwarmer with me on the road.” Bronn continued to put on his clothes as he explained. “That will be a few weeks before we reach the keep, so I’ll need someone to keep me company. You’ll only have to warm me and my bed at nights, and you’ll spend the rest of the day washing clothes, carrying wood, and riding with us. And once we’ve arrived to my castle, you can share my bed. I hate to be alone in it every night. You would have a much better life in the Westerlands than here where you must pleasure old and ugly men.”

She stared at him with wonderment. “I can really come with you?”

“Aye, but I must warn you. I’m going to marry at some moment. I don’t think it will happen very soon, but it will happen. When it does, I’ll have to send you away. But I’ll make sure you can go wherever you want and start a new life. One of my friends had a girl like you in his service. He was forced to send her away when he got married, but now she lives in a luxurious house in Pentos. She has gold, jewels, servants, everything she wants. I can’t promise you the same things, but you’ll be a lot better than you are actually. So, what do you say?”

She looked stunned for a time, but then she rose from the bed with a huge smile. “I’m coming.”

“Alright. Now dress up. We leave very soon.”

An hour later, Ser Bronn of the Blackwater rode off King’s Landing for his new lands with a bedwarmer and a hundred men bearing the colors of the Lannisters.

Chapter End Notes

I don’t know how this will end for Bronn in the show, but I hope he will see Tyrion again in Season 7, and that he’ll go back working for him. Tyrion has a tendancy to really pay ALL his debts, while Cersei only pays those she wants to pay. I would switch sides as soon as possible if I were Bronn. Their discussions were gold in the four first seasons.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa XV

Chapter Notes

Before you read this chapter, I apologize to everyone for killing Oberyn in the last update. I liked this character and I didn't want him to die, but this is Game of Thrones and people die. And to make this fic realistic is one of my main objectives. A story where only the bad guys die wouldn't be likely. Furthermore, considering Oberyn's behavior, we can't be surprised he was eventually killed.

This chapter closes the King's Landing arc of the story. It is a short chapter, but this is the end of the first part of the fic.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SANSA XV

Sansa was lying on the cushioned bench, her head resting on a pillow. The carriage bumped and shook repetitively, so she wasn’t able to sleep. Anyway, she didn’t really want to sleep. They were still in the morning and she wanted to rest after the eventful weeks she endured. She deserved some respite after everything she went through. Tyrion’s arrest. The abduction’s attempt. The trial. The attempt of murder against Tyrion. Her recognition as Lady of Casterly Rock and Winterfell. The royal wedding. Joffrey’s murder. The affair with Olenna Tyrell. Tommen’s coronation. Prince Oberyn’s death. Ser Meryn’s trial. So many things happened. She needed to do nothing, even only for a single morning.

She and Tyrion were supposed to leave two weeks ago. However, after Oberyn Martell died in Gregor Clegane’s hands, Ser Kevan decided to make of Tyrion the third judge in Meryn Trant’s trial. Tyrion said it was probably his uncle’s way to punish him for the prince’s death, though Sansa knew he said it on a half-sarcastic tone. Finally the trial only lasted a day. With Joffrey dead, Cersei out of the city, and Ser Boros Blount too afraid to testify for his fellow kingsguard, Ser Meryn had no one to speak for him. In fact, Ser Balon Swann, Sera Durwell, the cellar’s boy, Sansa and Margaery all testified against Ser Meryn. The kingsguard had no witness for his defense. The three judges unanimously declared him guilty. Ser Meryn finally chose to take the black to avoid Ser Ilyn Payne’s sword. He received the mercy he refused to her father when he forced him to kneel to be executed. The knight deserved no mercy.

The trial took place a few days ago. However, what had bothered Tyrion the most these last days had been Oberyn Martell’s death. Sansa heard how horrible the death of the prince was in the hands of Gregor Clegane. The duel between the Red Viper and the Mountain competed for many days with Joffrey’s murder as the main topic of discussion in the Red Keep. Different versions were quickly spread through the castle about how Gregor Clegane butchered the Prince of Dorne, but Sansa had the right version from Tyrion after she insisted to know it. The fight had been ugly. At least Gregor Clegane was dead. Another evil man was gone.

However, Tyrion was worried about Myrcella. Sansa was too. She didn’t want Tommen’s sister to die. She had always been kind with Sansa. Tyrion said that with the Mountain’s head, Oberyn’s bones and the letter he wrote before the fight, nothing would happen to Myrcella when Doran Martell would receive all of this, but Sansa could see he feared for his niece. Their niece in fact now. Sansa also thought Tyrion felt guilty for the way Oberyn Martell died. From what he told her, the prince mostly wanted to avenge his sister who was raped and killed by the Hound’s brother after he killed her two children. Sansa could understand how a man could wish the death of someone after he did this. She remembered the look of hatred Sandor Clegane had when he fought his brother at her father’s tourney. The monster probably killed his father and his sister as the rumors said. Apparently Sandor Clegane was sent away from the Westerlands so he and Gregor Clegane may not kill each other. Sansa still couldn’t believe the Lannisters could breed and protect such monsters. Joffrey. Cersei. The Mountain. She even thought Tyrion was a monster for a time, though she knew now he wasn’t. Oberyn Martell’s death was another consequence of the atrocities Tyrion’s family committed in the past, and Sansa could see he wasn’t proud of it. He really wasn’t born in the right family. Only his uncle Kevan seemed to be a decent man, and Ser Jaime if they forgot his incestuous relationship with his twin sister.

Sansa tried to forget about all this. She wanted a few hours of peace. Tyrion was on the bench facing hers, reading. Sansa could feel his gaze on her from time to time, but he looked shortly and always returned to his reading. They remained silent and Sansa liked it. The last hours before their departure had been very busy and Sansa had to say goodbye to many people. Leaving Margaery and Mira had been the most difficult part of the farewells. Both were her closest friends aside Tyrion. It made her heart sink to be separated from them, but she had to do it. Her place was now at Casterly Rock. They both hugged her before she left. Sansa also said farewells to Tommen who looked sad to see her leave. Ser Kevan was reverent in his farewells, wishing her good luck at Casterly Rock. Finally they left with two thousand men of the Lannister forces. Brienne accompanied them as well. She swore to serve and protect Sansa, so she would follow her to Casterly Rock.

Sansa remembered a strange scene she surprised not long before they left. She saw Ser Jaime and Brienne together in a corridor, talking in low voices. They were quite close to each other, Sansa even believed they were close enough to kiss. When they went separate ways, Sansa noticed a strange expression on Brienne’s face, as if she was repressing tears. As for Ser Jaime, there was longing on his face. Brienne didn’t leave Sansa’s side afterwards. Right now Sansa knew she was riding next to their carriage even if she couldn’t see the lady of Tarth.

Sansa’s mind went to more positive thoughts. Finally she had left King’s Landing. She had feared she would never leave this damn place. And she left it as Tyrion’s wife, the Lady of Casterly Rock and the Lady of Winterfell. After so much time, her life started to get better. She was a little bit afraid of what was waiting for her in Casterly Rock. She would be surrounded by people she never met before. Tyrion had talked to her a lot about his family, but he seemed to like to speak essentially about his dead uncles Gerion and Tygett. They were always very kind with him. He didn’t seem to know very well the rest of his family, though Sansa believed she understood why he didn’t. House Lannister really was a huge family with many branches. The Starks were limited to her father, her mother and their children, along with her uncle Benjen who had no children. She had another uncle, Brandon, who died during the rebellion. Tyrion on the other side had three uncles and an aunt on his father’s side who each had at least one child. These children of uncles and aunts had children as well for some of them, and there were other cousins from the branch of House Lannister Tyrion’s mother came from. There was a lesser branch who ruled Lannisport, the city in the shadow of Casterly Rock. There were also cadet branches like the Lannetts and the Lannys. Sansa would have to learn more about House Lannister before they reached Casterly Rock, and also more about the Westerlands. But she was confident. With Tyrion’s help, she didn’t doubt she could succeed. Her hand went to the necklace. She smiled with her eyes closed.

In the days that followed, Sansa didn’t lack anything to fill her days. Tyrion spent a lot of time during the day telling her about House Lannister, Casterly Rock and the Westerlands. She had to learn the names of every noble family sworn to House Lannister with the name of their seat, their approximate location, their sigil and their moto. Tyrion also wanted her to know a few things about the history of these families. He also suggested her a few books he had brought with him. There were carts behind them only loaded with books. They were about politics, history, economics, military strategy, geography, but also about science, medicine, myths, and of course dragons. Tyrion pointed specific sections of some of them Sansa should read and she slowly came to know the Westerlands better and better. A subject Sansa didn’t manage to understand was the one of finances and economics. She was never good at it. Arya was always better than her with sums, figures and numbers. But she learned all the same. Tyrion was putting some pressure on her, not too much, but he pressed her all the same. She had to know enough about the West once she would be at Casterly Rock. Tyrion said she might not be entirely well received by everyone considering her northern origins. He didn’t tell her that on an accusing tone. He was mostly sorry for that, but it was the reality. Sansa would have to prove to everyone she was worthy of being the Lady of the Westerlands. At least, she had a chance to prove she was worthy, not like in King’s Landing where she was always considered the daughter, then the sister of traitors.

Sometimes Tyrion would ride with his men and the other lords. As for Sansa, she spent some time each day with the ladies accompanying them. Many western noblemen and noblewomen were accompanying them on their trip to Casterly Rock. She had to maintain good relations with the ladies like Tyrion did with the lords and the knights. It was also important for their soldiers to see them regularly, even if that was only for a moment each day. Sansa would invite a lady or another to sew with her in the carriage while Tyrion was talking or riding with his men, or would take a glass of wine with one or a few of them during a halt. She had no trouble with this. She mastered courtesies better than anyone else now. In that at least, she had nothing to learn. She and Tyrion had time together as well. In fact, they had a lot of time together. At least one meal each day was only the two of them without anyone else present, and they still spent most of the time together in the carriage. Tyrion was helping her a lot in learning about the Westerlands. And they also slept in the same bed each night when their convoy would stop. Tyrion also received various messages from his bannermen while they were on the road and talked to her about them, initiating her to the actual politics of the Westerlands. A month after they left King’s Landing, they received news from Gregor Clegane’s keep that Bronn had taken it without resistance and hanged the Mountain’s men still there. Tyrion’s friend was now in firm control of these lands.

One week after they left King’s Landing, Sansa was leaning on a map with Tyrion at her side. She was trying again to remember the seats in the Westerlands, the family that held them, their sigil, their words, the actual lord or lady and an element of their history. Sansa felt like a student with Tyrion pointing some castle or another. At least his japes made it somewhat funny.

“The Golden Tooth,” she said as Tyrion pointed the entrance of the Westerlands from the east. “House Lefford. A golden pyramid on a blue sky with a yellow sun. Wealthy and standing strong is their words. Alysanne Lefford is the actual Lady of the Golden Tooth after the death of Lord Leo Lefford at the Battle of Stone Mill. Remained loyal to the Targaryens during the First Blackfyre Rebellion. Lord Lefford died fighting during that rebellion.”

Tyrion smiled. “You won’t have any problem if you meet Lady Alysanne. This one now.”

The castle he pointed was one Sansa could not remember. It was in the north of the Westerlands, close to the Crag, seat of House Westerling, but Sansa couldn’t remember it. Contrarily to the Golden Tooth, the name of the castle wasn’t indicated on the map. Sansa struggled to remember, but she couldn’t. She gave up after a moment.

“I don’t know.”

Tyrion grinned. “I admit this is not an easy one. Let me give you a clue. It’s the name of a song.”
Now Sansa remembered. “Castamere.” But she couldn’t remember anything else about the family to who belonged the castle, not even their name. Tyrion seemed to know and began to tell her.

“House Spicer. Three pepperpots on a saffron bend across a field of green and silver stripes. No words for now. Rolph Spicer is the lord. He is the brother of Lady Sybell Spicer, the Lady of the Crag. The Spicers received Castamere and its lands recently from my father.”

Now Sansa remembered. When Robb invaded the Westerlands, House Westerling was the only family to join him. She remembered the Westerlings were an impoverished house with only fifty men and barely fifteen knights. The actual Lady of House Westerling, Sybell Spicer, was the granddaughter of a spice trader, hence their name, and of a woman from Essos. Perhaps they thought they could use the war to their benefit. They spied on Robb from the inside of his troops and received Castamere as a reward after the Red Wedding. Sansa hoped she would never have to face these people.

“Can’t you remove them?” she asked before she could stop herself.

Tyrion grinned. “That wouldn’t bother me. I don’t really like to have turncloaks as bannermen. They don’t make very loyal vassals. But my father just gave them the lands. That wouldn’t be appropriate for me to strip them from it so early. And anyway, I’m not about to invite them at the Rock and Rolph Spicer will need a lot of time before he can get any gold or silver out of the mines.”

“Why?”

“The castle has been abandoned for nearly forty years after my father put it to the torch, and the mines are sealed. So between the time Spicer will need to open them, then the resources he will need to rebuild the castle, it will be some time before he can really claim to be a worthy lord. And I have my own plan to make sure the Spicers remain in line.”

“Why was it burnt? What happened for that?”

“Well, you know the song The Rains of Castamere.”

“Yes, of course. They played it all the time in King’s Landing.” But now the rains weep o’er his hall, with no one there to hear. Sansa could recite the words of the song by heart. “But what is so special with that? I only know it’s about the fall of a house, nothing more.”

Tyrion sighed. “It’s a very long story. House Reyne once was one of the richest houses in the Westerlands, not much behind the Lannisters. Some say they were richer than the Tyrells. The seat of Castamere had several mines of gold and silver.”

“House Reyne?”

“Yes. Rains of Castamere. A good play on words.” Tyrion smiled thinly. “House Reyne was very rich. It is said the Lady of Castamere wore gowns and jewels more expansive than the Lady of Casterly Rock. Some people of this family married into House Lannister. One of them was Ellyn Reyne. She was married to Tion Lannister, at this time the heir of Casterly Rock and the son of my great grandfather, Gerold Lannister. However, Tion died before he could become the Lord of Casterly Rock or have any child with Ellyn, so my grandfather Tytos became the new heir. There was a great rivalry that started between Ellyn Reyne and my grandmother, Jeyne Marbrand. Before Tion Lannister died, my great grandfather had already lost his wife, so Ellyn had acted as Lady of Casterly Rock and brought many Reynes in the castle, supporting her house in the process. Finally, Jeyne Marbrand convinced my great grandfather to send Ellyn Reyne away and married her to Lord Walderan Tarbeck. There’s a maester of Casterly Rock who wrote about the rivalry between the two women. He called it the War of the Wombs.”

Tyrion chuckled a little. Sansa let him continue. “Most of the Reynes left Casterly Rock afterwards. However, when my grandfather Tytos finally became Lord of the Westerlands, the new Lady Ellyn Tarbeck started to borrow money from him and restored Tarbeck Hall. My grandfather apparently was a kind man, and very generous. People called him the Laughing Lion. I would have liked to know him.” There was some regret in Tyrion’s voice for a moment. “Sadly, he was also very trustful. Far too much trustful. He lent money to his bannermen and to merchants without caring to get it back. People started to laugh at him and never repaid their debts, including the Lady of House Tarbeck. When my father was old enough, he started to involve himself in the affairs of the Westerlands and tried to restore the fear and the power of House Lannister. He ordered all people who borrowed money to my grandfather to repay it immediately or to send hostages to Casterly Rock. Lord Tarbeck apparently laughed at this order and my father had him imprisoned. However, Ellyn Tarbeck seized three Lannisters and my grandfather decided to finally free Lord Tarbeck and to forget the debts the Tarbecks had towards House Lannister. But my father wasn’t about to let it go.”

“What did he do?” Sansa asked.

“Less than a year later, he sent messages to the Tarbecks and the Reynes. Because of Ellyn’s marriage, the two houses were allies. He ordered them to come to Casterly Rock and answer for their crimes. And they had the same reaction than when Cersei sent a similar raven to your brother.”

Sansa remembered this time. She was the one who wrote the letter to her brother. “They rebelled?”

“They rebelled,” Tyrion confirmed. “My father didn’t let them time to act however. He took the initiative immediately. He expected this reaction. He wanted to deal with these two houses for good. So he rode against Tarbeck Hall. Lord Tarbeck was defeated with his army and captured. My father had him executed immediately with two of his sons and all his men. Ellyn Tarbeck called for help from her own house and hid inside Tarbeck Hall, but my father had siege engines built very quickly and made the castle collapsing on her and her remaining children. Then he defeated the Reyne army that came to rescue. The Reynes hid in the mines under their castle. They probably thought they would be safe here, but my father decided otherwise. He blocked all entrances to the mines with stone, earth and soil, and then he diverted a nearby stream and had the mines flooded. Three hundred men, women and children died trapped into the mines.”

Tyrion had turned gloomier as he told her about the events. “Tarbeck Hall and Castamere were put to the torch, and their ruins left as reminders of what happens to those who rebelled against House Lannister. Until my father decided right before he died to give Castamere to turncloaks.” Tyrion sighed. “Your family wasn’t the only one to suffer from my father’s ruthlessness.”

Sansa could only agree with that. She shivered internally at the recital she just heard. People butchered. Castles burnt to the ground. Entire families slaughtered and destroyed. It looked so much like the fate of her own family. Tyrion had left the table where he sat with her and was looking outside the carriage. Sansa could feel he was ashamed to be a Lannister right now. Sansa didn’t feel ashamed to be a Lannister on her side, perhaps because she didn’t feel like a Lannister. In her mind, she was Tyrion’s wife, not really the wife of a Lannister. She was a Lannister outside, but a Stark inside. She had something around her neck all the time to remember that. She wanted to comfort Tyrion, but she didn’t really know how to do it. She didn’t know what to say. It was impossible to sever family links. Sansa could tell him again and again he wasn’t like the rest of his family, but Tyrion would always feel like a Lannister, just like she would always feel like a Stark. They stood in silence for a long moment.
It was nearly the end of the day. They stopped by the side of the road and took their dinner in silence. Tyrion didn’t seem like he wanted to speak, and Sansa decided to not disturb him. They went to bed afterwards. There were two compartments in their carriage. The biggest one included benches and a table, the smaller one mainly contained the bed. They changed for their night clothes in different compartments, then went to sleep. After a time, Sansa thought Tyrion was sleeping. She remembered something Ser Kevan told her one day. He needs you. Not only as a wife to stand beside him during official events or to have children. He needs you in his life. He needs someone to share his life with. Someone who will look after him. Someone who cares about him, who wants him to be happy. She looked at Tyrion beside her. She couldn’t make him forget the atrocities his family committed, no more than she could forget what happened to her own family, but they could help each other to bear their burdens. Sansa knew Tyrion didn’t sleep well, but she knew there was one thing she could do to help him sleep better, and it just happened it helped her to sleep better as well. She moved her head and rest it on his chest. As she fell asleep too, she felt an arm wrapping around her shoulders and smiled as she drifted away.

Chapter End Notes

After 56 chapters, two trials and many deaths, Tyrion and Sansa finally leave King's Landing for Casterly Rock.

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion (the arc of Casterly Rock begins)
Tyrion XIII

Chapter Notes

The arc of Casterly Rock begins here. A new important character makes her first real appearance.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

TYRION XIII

They had taken two months to travel the distance between King’s Landing and Casterly Rock. Their large retinue constituted of many lords and ladies, the huge carriage in which they moved and the bad weather of autumn slowed down their movements. Tyrion was eager to get to the Rock. It had been so long since he last saw it, the place where he was born, where he grew up. His home. He wanted Sansa to see it. She would be happier there than in the capital. He would make sure of that. Tyrion wouldn’t allow anyone to make Sansa feel she wasn’t welcomed at the seat of House Lannister. Everyone would have to accept her as their lady, no matter what they thought of her. They could be unhappy about the fact the new Lady of Casterly Rock was a Stark. They could fear she would know nothing of the ways of the south. They could see her as the daughter of a traitor, as the sister of the man who looted the Westerlands. They could think she was unworthy of the place she occupied now. They could see her as an up-jumped ward who happened to be married to the right person at the right moment. But they would give her the respect she deserved. She was worthy of her titles, more than anyone else, and no one would be able to say the opposite.

As their trip through the Westerlands went on, more and more nobles left them to go back to their lands. Tyrion wasn’t unhappy about this. He needed to spend less time with his men and therefore spent more time with his wife. He made sure she was prepared for the time they would arrive at Casterly Rock. And this time had come. One of his men had come to him at the end of the morning to announce they would reach the castle before nightfall. A delegation of knights led by his cousin Lucion came to meet them and escort them to Casterly Rock. Lucion was the son of Damion Lannister who was castellan of Casterly Rock until Tyrion came back. Damion wasn’t the worst choice as castellan, but not the better either. However, there hadn’t been many choices when the time had come to choose a castellan. Kevan was in King’s Landing, Stafford Lannister was dead, Daven led the Lannister army at the siege of Riverrun, and Tyrion would never grant the office of castellan to his uncle Emmon Frey. The husband of his aunt Genna was an incapable man, and even worse he was a Frey. Tyrion wouldn’t let a Frey have any position in Casterly Rock before long, if he ever allowed it. Anyway, Tyrion knew very well the true castellan was his aunt Genna. He was eager and afraid at the same time to see her again.

Lucion bent the knee before him without hesitation, but when it came to pay his respects to Sansa, he hesitated. He only hesitated for the fraction of a second, but he hesitated all the same. He finally behaved courteous enough and kissed Sansa’s hand as it was expected from him, but didn’t speak with Sansa more than it was required from him. It would take some time for his family to really acknowledge Sansa as their lady. For most of his kin, she was still the sister of Robb Stark. Sansa didn’t show any reaction to his cousin’s reluctance. Perhaps she didn’t notice it, but Tyrion doubted it. Sansa was very observant. They quickly resumed to move after the short interruption caused by Lucion’s coming.

They were at the end of the afternoon now and Tyrion could see the sun was about to set at the horizon. With some luck, he could show to Sansa how a sunset was beautiful on the Sunset Sea if they arrived to Casterly Rock soon enough. In the meantime, he kept looking at Sansa while she was doing another needlework. Her hair was shining in the falling sunlight of the day, making it redder than ever. After a moment, Sansa seemed to notice his gaze upon her and lifted her eyes from her work, looking at him with a smile on the corners of her lips. She looked at him with false exasperation.

“Are you going to look at me this way until we arrive?” she asked playfully.

“If it bothers you, I can still look at something else, but it won’t be beautiful like you.”

He was rewarded for his answer with blood flowing to his wife’s cheeks. She averted her eyes from his. Tyrion liked it when he got reactions like this one from her. It made her even lovelier than she usually was. She turned back her attention to her work, but Tyrion could see she was flushing more and more. That wasn’t the first time he spent a long time looking at her, occasionally intensively, but the previous times he had done it while she was asleep or unaware of him looking at her. She had surprised him staring at her like this a few times, but Tyrion had always looked away when she had. Only this time he decided to not look away. He wanted to see her in this position as long as he could, just like he did last night.

Sansa had fallen asleep on her tummy last night, her face turned to face his, a thin smile upon her lips and her left arm resting on his chest. Tyrion had become quite fascinated by the position she slept each night, her body always maintaining a physical contact with his own, sometimes coming closer to him in her sleep. Tyrion never slept very much, and not because he had a bad sleep. At least not in the beginning. Tyrion was stripped from the right to wield a sword or a bow since the moment he was born. He could learn to ride at least, but only with a special saddle and mostly with horses trained specially to ride with him. As a result, Tyrion used his time to learn. He sharpened his mind instead of sharpening his sword, making his mind his greatest weapon. He started to spend whole nights reading, finding it much more enjoyable and useful than sleeping. However, somewhere in his sixteenth year, he started to have a troubled sleep as well and read all nights to escape nightmares. However, even for him, to always read could become boring. So he started to search for other enjoyments. He started drinking. Wine helped him to stay awake. And a few months later, he started to visit brothels. Women, wine and books helped him to forget temporarily about his miserable and useless life. Then he met Shae who became his reason to live after the Battle of Blackwater, before Sansa became his new purpose.

He slept much better since he shared the same bed than Sansa. He could spend entire nights sleeping peacefully with her at his side. However, he always woke up before her. There were times when he would stay for minutes, even hours looking at her while she slept, even more since they left the capital. Back there, he was overloaded by his duties, but now he had more time. He would get out of their bed, making sure to not awake her, and sit in the armchair next to their bed. He would start to read, but often glanced at her, observing her sleeping peacefully. Last night, he hadn’t been able to read at all. He just sat there, looking at her in the moonlight. Even after all this time, Tyrion still couldn’t believe she was his wife. She was so perfect in every aspect. He couldn’t have asked for a better woman to spend his life with.

What struck Tyrion so he couldn’t get his eyes out of her was the realization of how she had changed. He remembered how she was when he came to Winterfell more than two years ago. She was only a little girl, a child who probably counted only twelve name days. She was already tall at this time and very beautiful, though beautiful as a child, not as a woman. Always smiling to everyone, performing all the courtesies expected from a lady, already behaving like a noblewoman at her age. A lovely little girl. Tyrion had noticed her at Winterfell, but nothing more. If anything he had felt pity for her. She seemed so sweet, so innocent, and she would marry Joffrey who already showed signs of madness. Tyrion didn’t expect a happy future for her even then, but there was nothing he could do. He didn’t even speak to her while in Winterfell, having most of his interactions with her half-brother Jon and her little sister. He also spoke shortly to her brother Bran who turned cripple not long after. His brother’s doing. Tyrion didn’t think he would ever have the courage to tell her the truth about the cause of her brother’s crippling.

The first time he spoke to her was when he arrived in King’s Landing to act as Hand. He was struck by her change. Gone was the sweet smiling girl he glimpsed in the North, happy to become queen and to marry a prince. The only things he saw on her face and in her eyes were sadness and despair. Tyrion had tried to be kind with her. Her father had just died, she was far away from her family, and a hostage more than anything else now. The answer she gave had startled him. My father was a traitor. My mother and brother are traitors, too. I am loyal to my beloved Joffrey. Her mouth said something, but her eyes said otherwise, and Tyrion noticed how afraid she was of Joffrey, and how she had seemed to not know what to do with the condolences he offered her. He didn’t know at this moment how mistreated and terrified she was by Joffrey. It was later that he learned how Joffrey promised her to spare her father, then had him executed right in front of her, and that he ordered the kingsguards to beat her whenever she did or said something that displeased Joffrey. Tyrion had kept an eye on her ever since, putting Shae at her service. And when Joffrey had her stripped of her clothes and beaten in front of the whole court, that had been too much for Tyrion. Joffrey could have died this day if he hadn’t been Tyrion’s nephew. After this, Joffrey didn’t dare to mistreat Sansa again, at least physically. He still tortured her mentally, and for that there was nothing Tyrion was able to do. He made a deal with her mother, hoping he could send her away from Joffrey and save Jaime at the same time. In the end, her betrothal with Joffrey was called off and Tyrion’s father forced him to marry her instead.

And now here she was, his wife, sleeping in front of him. Tyrion marvelled at how she evolved since these days she left Winterfell, or even since he saw her for first time in the capital. She looked so peaceful and happy. She smiled, but not with the smile of someone excited. It wasn’t the smile of a little girl, but the smile of a woman who just felt good. She had become a woman during the time she spent away from Winterfell. She showed assurance, maturity, cleverness, awareness and empathy that many women older than her never displayed. She was more mature than Cersei at the same age, and even more than Cersei right now. King’s Landing took her childhood away, and she accepted to leave it behind her the best way someone could abandon it. However, it wasn’t only mentally she had grown. Her body matured as well. In the moonlight, Tyrion was able to see how she was taller than before, how her beauty had gone from childish to womanly, how her forms had developed. Normally, when Tyrion looked at a woman this way, his cock would start to stir in his breeches. Sometimes it had happened when he was in Sansa’s presence, but not this time. He just marvelled how beautiful and perfect she had become. He never thought a single moment when he visited the North that one day he would marry her. How would he have reacted if his father had told him at this moment that he would marry her? She’s a child, probably. What would Jon Snow, Arya or Bran would have said? Or her father? Her brother Robb? And the greatest question of all, what would her mother have done? Perhaps he would really be dead. Catelyn Stark would never have let her daughter marry the Imp, and Tyrion wouldn’t blame her. He wondered if she learned he married her first daughter before she died. What had been her reaction?

Tyron just couldn’t explain or express how lucky and happy he was to have found himself married to Sansa. She had everything he ever looked for in a woman. And there was more than this. There were times Tyrion thought she loved him, just like he loved her. Tyrion had come to accept it. He loved Sansa. She was about twenty years younger than him, she was beautiful while he was a malformed dwarf, his family destroyed hers, but he loved her, even if he was probably the last man who should love her or who deserved her love. He didn’t know when he came to love her, but it happened. He didn’t want to love her when they were wed. He only wanted to protect her back then. Shae was the woman he loved at this moment. But now Shae was receding in his mind and his heart, his feelings for her turning more and more into a simple memory each day as Sansa took all the places the mysterious foreign beauty once occupied. He loved her. He didn’t even care if she loved him or not.
Well, yes he cared about that. He wanted her to love him, but he would love her no matter if she loved him or not. She was his wife, the woman he would protect at all cost and spend the rest of his life with.

Tyrion was brought back to reality by a knock on the carriage door. Sansa looked up from her work.
Tyrion realized they had stopped. He rose from the cushioned bench and opened. Podrick stood before him.

“My lord, we are in sight,” he simply said.

It took a moment for Tyrion to realize what his quire meant, but then he remembered. “Good.” He looked towards the Sunset Sea. The sun was much close to disappear. He would have to wait for another day to show a sunset to Sansa. He turned back on the inside. “Sansa, there’s something I want to show you. Come.” He extended his hand for her, and after a moment she took it and went outside with him. The entire convoy had stopped. Tyrion had given the order to stop it at a precise place on the Goldroad. He led Sansa to the top of a hill. When they reached it, he looked at her to see her reaction. She stood open-mouthed, her jaw dropping. That was the first time Tyrion saw her in this state, but she probably never saw something like this before.

“Wellcome home,” Tyrion simply told her as he turned his head to look at Casterly Rock.

The home of his ancestors stood tall before them, looking like a lion resting in the sunset, about 2,000 feet high at its peak, more than a mile of length, carved into a great stone hill next to the Sunset Sea. It was about three times higher than the Wall itself. Gates, walls, watchtowers and forts along with its natural defenses made the Rock impregnable. Casterly Rock looked impressive and huge from the outside, but it was nothing compared to the inside. Hundreds, perhaps thousands of mineshafts, some still exploited, most of them emptied through millennia, filled the inside of the Rock. The emptied mineshafts were now tunnels, dungeons, storerooms, vaults, barracks, halls, stables, stairways, courtyards, balconies, and gardens. There were watery caverns in its depths, as well as cells and cages where they once held lions. Casterly Rock also had its own port with docks, wharves and shipyards. Tyrion looked back at Sansa. She didn’t move, still staring agape before her.
She never saw something so huge. She had grown up in Winterfell, the greatest castle of the North, and the Red Keep was smaller than Winterfell. Casterly Rock was much bigger than Winterfell.
Tyrion wondered if she would faint once she would learn how the exterior gave no idea about the size of the interior.

Sansa seemed to regain her senses. “You… you didn’t tell me how… how huge it was.”

Tyrion shrugged. “I kept an element of surprise. Look at the south of it.” Tyrion pointed the place.
“Lannisport. The greatest city of the Westerlands. It’s smaller than King’s Landing, but much better organized. It doesn’t stink.”

Sansa looked for a short time at the city in the shadow of the Rock, then turned her eyes back to the Rock again. She didn’t seem to believe what she saw. Tyrion allowed her to look at it for a long time, but finally he had to bring her back to the carriage. He preferred to reach Casterly Rock before nightfall.

Their escort moved forward on the Goldroad until they reached the Lion’s Mouth. The Goldroad started at the Lion Gate in King’s Landing and ended here at the main entry of the castle of House Lannister. It was his castle now. Tyrion stayed with Sansa inside the carriage. She maintained her composure, but Tyrion could see she was nervous. He tried to comfort her and put his hand on her shoulder.

“Don’t worry. My family is not only constituted of monsters like my father and my sister. Most of them are good people. They’re not going to savage you. Just let me do the talk and come forward when I’ll tell you. You have nothing to fear.”

He smiled to his wife in a reassuring way and he saw gratitude in her blue eyes. He thought he also saw something else he once saw in the eyes of another girl, a long time ago. Tyrion chased this idea from his mind. They went through the Lion’s Mouth. Tyrion had to admit he wasn’t sure like he wanted Sansa to believe he was. He knew very well that even if he was now the Lord of Casterly Rock by all laws and all rights, he was still a dwarf and a second son. Jaime was always supposed to inherit Casterly Rock. Tyrion received it only because Jaime didn’t want it. He came back after his father died mysteriously. He had banished his own sister, the Queen Regent, from the Westerlands. But the worst could be the wife he brought with him. No matter how Tyrion thought highly of Sansa, she was the daughter of Eddard Stark, the former Hand of the King who tried to overthrow the king, the grandson of Tywin Lannister. She was also the sister of a rebel who ransacked the Westerlands during the war and killed, directly or indirectly, many Lannisters. Even worse, she was the one who humiliated Cersei publicly and revealed to everyone her private relations with another Lannister. Though she didn’t reveal the worst private relationship, then things would have been much worse. And here he was, married to this young woman whose family had been an enemy they fought and he was about to present her to everyone as the new Lady of House Lannister. How would his family welcome him? And even more uncertain, how would they welcome Sansa? He would have to play the diplomat in this situation if someone let slipped a misplaced comment or anything unfitting. He had no fear concerning Sansa, she knew how to behave in the worst of the situations. But he feared the reaction of some of his kin. He wondered if the fact Sansa didn’t wear the colours of House Lannister was a good or a bad thing. The only Lannister sign on her was the necklace he gave her for her name day. If his family knew what the necklace really was… He didn’t have time to have the dressmakers of King’s Landing make her any gown displaying her new title. All the same, he would let no one insult Sansa.

The carriage stopped. Tyrion waited a short moment to allow enough time for Podrick to place the stool before the door. He then turned one last time to Sansa with a reassuring smile that she returned nervously. She hid well her nervousness, but Tyrion spent enough time with her to see through her armor of courtesies. She wore it again now. He hated this armor, but for the time being she could need it. Tyrion pushed the door and went out to face his family. All his family who lived at the Rock right now was present, along with the most important members of his household (the whole household of Casterly Rock was so huge that they couldn’t all stand in the courtyard together at the same time). Once he was out, Tyrion gave a hand to Sansa still in the carriage, inviting her to come out too. She took his hand and followed him, going down the stool with all the dignity a lady could have. She hid her uncertainty quite well.

All the people in the courtyard knelt, their eyes cast down before their liege lord. Only the people of the Westerlands needed to kneel before Tyrion. Everyone else in the Seven Kingdoms only needed to bow the head. Tyrion walked to the first rank of people where his cousin Damion, acting castellan, and his closest family members stood. Sansa remained behind, waiting near the carriage. He stopped before the castellan.

“Ser Damion?” He asked as if he wasn’t sure who his cousin was, and as if he expected his cousin to tell him something. Damion didn’t have to lift his head very much because of Tyrion’s size.
“My lord. Welcome to Casterly Rock,” he said on a deferential tone, rising on his knees. It was funny for Tyrion to see people who talked to him so casually before now showed him great respect because he became their lord overnight.

“I hope you took good care of the Rock during my absence.”

“Don’t worry, Tyrion. The Rock was taken care of, but not by him.” Tyrion would recognize this voice anywhere. If there was someone who wouldn’t treat him any differently than when he was simply the dwarf son of the Old Lion, it was the sister of his father. Lady Genna Frey had stopped to kneel and looked up on him. She didn’t look at him like his father did with contemptuous stares. Genna quite liked all her nephews and nieces, but she was also the only one who emitted an authority that looked close to Tywin’s.

Tyrion smiled at his aunt. “Glad to see you, Genna.” His aunt gave a slight bow and looked at him intently, as if she tried to pierce him with her eyes. Tyrion tried to do as if he didn’t notice it. “Alright everyone. No need to keep your head down and your knees in the mud like that forever. Your necks and legs must begin to hurt.”

People raised their head in usual positions. That was strange how people thought very important such little details in the way to behave in their lord’s presence. Tyrion went to welcome each member of House Lannister who was present. Most of them simply bowed while saying my lord in respect. Some gave their condolences for his father’s death, some also swore fealty to him (like Ser Emmon Frey). There were also some he was really glad to see again. Joy, his uncle Gerion’s bastard daughter, was overjoyed to see him again. She was a twelve-years-old child, sweet but lonely. She spent some time with Tyrion whenever he was in Casterly Rock, and since they were both outcasts, she was probably the one among his cousins that Tyrion loved the most. There was also Maester Creylen who proved quite enthusiastic about his rising as Lord of Casterly Rock, and Tyrion knew he was probably sincere.

Once he was done with all of them came the most difficult part. Tyrion turned to Sansa, inviting her to move forward. “My dear family, my dear friends, I present you my wife, Lady Sansa, the Lady of Casterly Rock.”

Sansa came to his side as his relatives and everyone else bowed before Sansa, some without haste. Sansa spoke a few words. “I’m glad to meet you all. I know I am a stranger for you right now, but I hope I’ll get to know all of you better and that you’ll come to trust me.”

“Trust her? Why not try to trust a direwolf while we’re at it?” The comment came from Tyrion’s cousin, Myrielle Lannister, Stafford’s daughter. She tried to whisper it to her sister Cerenna, but not low enough. Tyrion heard her very well. Sansa didn’t show any sign that she heard this. She wore her armor. Tyrion decided he couldn’t let that go.

“Myrielle, I’ll do as if I heard nothing, and I’m sure the others will do just like me, but I suggest you never make such comments again.” Tyrion’s cousin turned white, and no else dared to say a word. “Damion, the journey has been wearisome. Could you show our rooms to my lady?”

“Yes, of course my lord. My lady, please follow me.” Damion proved quite eager to follow the order.

“I’ll join you soon,” he whispered to Sansa before he turned to his squire. “Podrick, Brienne, please escort Lady Sansa with Ser Damion.” He then spoke to the whole courtyard. “You can disband everyone. The greetings are over.”

People started to move all around, going back to their duties whatever they were, if they had duties.
Tyrion knew with who he would have a discussion now. His aunt sent her husband, her sons and her grandsons away, then walked in Tyrion’s direction, everyone stepping aside before her. It was obvious who really ruled Casterly Rock while he was in King’s Landing, and everyone knew it.

Lady Genna Frey was one of the biggest woman Tyrion had ever seen. She was married to Ser Emmon Frey, one of the many sons of Walder Frey, and had four sons with him and two grandsons. She was only three years younger than Tyrion’s father, which made her sixty-four. Her Frey husband looked like a toothpick next to her. She looked at Tyrion intently, studying him.

“So, that’s all. Have you nothing for your aunt? Not even a hug or a kiss after so much time?”

“Well, excuse me dear aunt, but I would need you to kneel for that. I’m not Jaime,” Tyrion offered as an excuse.

“No you’re not, and that’s all too good.” Genna bent her knees and strongly hugged her nephew with her large arms. Tyrion was barely able to return it. “We need to talk,” she said as she rose again.

“I just arrived,” Tyrion complained.

“We need to talk.” Her aunt didn’t let him any choice. Her voice was full of authority like his father’s. Tyrion followed inside and they walked together through the corridors of Casterly Rock, among curtains, statues, shields and ornaments all made with gold, silver and the finest existing silks. He might be the lord now, but for Genna he would always be her nephew.

“So, it’s true. Tywin is dead?” she asked when they were far away from prying eyes.

“Yes, he is,” Tyrion confirmed.

“I’m sorry for your loss.” Her aunt’s voice had some sadness, strong as it was.

“Considering I loved my father as much as he loved me, I think you need condolences much more than me.”

“Indeed.” Genna didn’t scold him. “How did he die? In the last raven he sent, Kevan said he died in his sleep.”

“According to Cersei, I poisoned him, but she proved to be wrong. My father died of a heart attack in his bed.”

“Just like his own father before him. Tywin must rage in the afterlife if there is any. He wanted to be as different from our father he could be, and yet he died the same way than Lord Tytos. At least he died peacefully. So many people don’t have this chance.”

He died peacefully. Tyrion had to retain a scoff. Tywin Lannister didn’t die in peace. He died planning on forcing his son upon a fourteen-years-old girl. And this girl is now your lady, dear Genna. He kept his thoughts for himself.

“I’m sorry for your loss, Genna.” After a moment, Tyrion asked a question that bothered his mind. “Did you love him?”

Genna Lannister (she was a Lannister to the end, no matter who she married) looked at him strangely. “I was seven when Walder Frey persuaded my lord father to give my hand to Emm. His second son, not even his heir. Father was himself a thirdborn, and younger children crave the approval of their elders. Frey sensed that weakness in him, and Father agreed for no better reason than to please him. My betrothal was announced at a feast with half the west in attendance. Ellyn Tarbeck laughed and the Red Lion went angry from the hall. The rest sat on their tongues. Only Tywin dared speak against the match. A boy of ten. Father turned as white as mare’s milk, and Walder Frey was quivering. How could I not love him, after that? Every little girl needs a big brother to protect her.”

Tyrion nodded in understanding. His father had been a cold and cruel man, but there had been reasons to his coldness and cruelty, even if they didn’t justify everything he did. Tyrion thought about his first wife, and how Sansa looked at him after she learned about the Red Wedding. All the same, the man had been his father, the man who thought him many things and let him live. I brought you up as my son. Because you’re a Lannister.

“What about the rest of our kin in King’s Landing,” his aunt asked, making them both leave their thoughts.

“Well,” Tyrion summarized, “Joffrey was poisoned by one of his kingsguards during his wedding night, Myrcella is surrounded by snakes in Dorne, Cersei was exiled from the Westerlands and King’s Landing after she tried twice to have me killed, Lancel was banished among a community of brothers on Quiet Isle after everyone discovered he fucked my sister, and Jaime is now Lord Commander of the Kingsguard with a missing hand. The only good news are that Tommen is now king, Kevan is his Hand, and I am married now.”

“Many things happened as I can see. You should have been here weeks ago.”

“You should complain to Joffrey and Oberyn Martell. They’re the ones who decided to die without warning.”

“I wasn’t complaining, Tyrion. Only stating a fact. You should have come here long before. The lords of the Westerlands must feel your presence so they may come to respect and fear you, just like they respected and feared your father. By the way, I hope you didn’t forget his bones.”

“Never. Father would be capable of coming back to life if I forgot them.” Tyrion nearly believed it when he said that. He pursued on a softer tone. “His bones are in one of the carriages that came with us. They will rest in peace in the Hall of Heroes. I’ll see to that.”

Tyrion doubted his father would ever rest in peace, now that House Lannister was led by his dwarf son and a northern woman. Tyrion didn’t assist to his funerals in King’s Landing. They took place not long after Kevan arrived, and Tyrion was in a cell at this moment. He wondered how his father looked dead. He would never see him again. The last time Tyrion spoke to his father, they clashed about his unconsummated marriage. What a last conversation between father and son it was, though Tyrion’s discussions with his father were never warm. At least he stood before his father before he died, instead of crawling and obeying him.

Tyrion tried to turn the conversation into another direction. “There’s been no problems in the Westerlands after Father died?”

“None that were caused by his death. We have the usual problems that come after a foreign army invaded our lands, but nothing serious. What I fear are the possible consequences of the great blows we took recently. If our position was catastrophic after your brother was captured and his army defeated, imagine now. Tywin and Joffrey dead within two months. Cersei shamed and exiled. The same for Lancel. You must reinforce your position as Lord of the Westerlands and quickly. You must make sure your bannermen stay loyal and respect you before they think they can do as they like with you in power.”

“Don’t worry. I know how to keep people in line. I have some experience with that now.”
His aunt said nothing for a moment. “I heard you ruled quite well in King’s Landing. I told Tywin one day that he underestimated you, but he didn’t listen. He only listened to Kevan. Perhaps because he always said what your father already thought. Anyway, I’m relieved you’re the lord now that Tywin is dead. Jaime and Cersei wouldn’t have been able to maintain what Tywin built.”

Tyrion didn’t expect such words from his aunt. “I suppose I can take it as a compliment.”

“You can. Take it like you want. However, there is another matter that requires attention from you. Your marriage is not going to make things easier for you.”

Tyrion sighed. “Kevan told you everything?”

“He did.”

Tyrion wasn’t in the mood to talk about it. “I already talked about it with Kevan and I don’t want to discuss about it anymore, Genna. So I’ll make things clear.” Tyrion stopped to look directly in his aunt’s eyes. “Sansa is my wife. She is the Lady of Casterly Rock, and the Lady of the Westerlands, as much as the Lady of Winterfell. I don’t care her family members were traitors, that her brother fought our armies or that she comes from the North. I won’t tolerate any disrespect against her. I’m not going to put her aside for another bride, and I won’t force her to consummate our marriage. And I forbid everyone to make her life more difficult than it is already, and those who try will regret that my father is dead more than they can believe.”

His aunt Genna had stopped as well and listened to his speech without showing a single emotion. She looked at him for a moment, studying him again. Finally she smiled at him and Tyrion thought he perceived a very slight laughter out of her lips.

“Don’t worry. I have nothing against your wife, and I know better than to do anything against her. I don’t hold any grudge against her because my son died in battle. She’s not the one who fought or started this war. Only you need an heir to strengthen your position. You can’t remain without sons, especially now that your brother is a kingsguard and that all your male cousins on your father’s side with the name of the Lannisters are exiled or dead.”

“I won’t talk about it either,” Tyrion stated firmly.

“Alright. Alright.” She gave a sigh. “I just want what is good for House Lannister, Tyrion. This girl is the Lady of Casterly Rock. All I want is her to fulfill her duties and serve our house. I would need to speak with her.”

“We just arrived.” Tyrion was weary. Couldn’t he and Sansa just rest for the evening?

“I wasn’t talking about meeting her right now. Send her to my chambers tomorrow in the morning. We’ll break our fast between Lannister ladies. All I want is to help her for the good of our family. She should also take the midday meal with all your female cousins. She has to meet them as quickly as possible. She will have a lot of work to do to gain everyone’s trust.”

Tyrion couldn’t deny it. It would take some time for Sansa to be fully accepted only in Casterly Rock, and even more in all the Westerlands. The misdemeanor of Myrielle just a moment ago didn’t show at all the extent of what awaited her. It would be better for her to start right away. Tyrion regretted he couldn’t let her have some time for herself. “Very well. I’ll tell her to meet you on the morning.”

“Good. Now I’ll leave you before you think I’m insufferable.”

Genna followed another gallery to her own quarters. Tyron followed the richly decorated gallery that led to the suites of the Lord and the Lady of Casterly Rock. His personal rooms stood at the end of a corridor behind heavy doors made of gold, displaying the lion sigil of his house. Two guards stood at each side and opened the doors for him as soon as he reached them. The rooms he and Sansa would share now were wide and included an antechamber, a bathroom, a library (a small one when compared to the huge one elsewhere in the Rock), a solar (though the Lord of Casterly Rock had another one at the top of the Rock), a dressing room and a living room. But the biggest room was the bedroom with a large window overlooking the Sunset Sea, a balcony and a bed large enough for six people to sleep more than comfortably in. The wealth of House Lannister was displayed in every room and every corridor of Casterly Rock, and these ones didn’t make any exception. Gold and silver could be seen everywhere in each room, from the doors to the bedhead, from the curtains of the window to the glass and the tables. Tyrion entered the bedroom and sat in a chair, exhausted by the day and the journey from King’s Landing. He wondered where Sansa was. She should be here.

Tyrion heard sounds coming from the bathroom. The bedchamber had a direct connection with it and Tyrion noticed the door was ajar. Tyrion went to it and looked through the opening. Sansa was in the bathtub, resting her head against the edge. Her back was turned on Tyrion, but he could see very well her ivory skin with water dripping on it. He looked at her for a moment, then thought better and went away. He didn’t want to take away her time of rest by looking at her in such a situation. He already looked at her long enough since last night. They spent two months on dusty and muddy roads, so it was no surprise Sansa had wanted to get rid of all her dirt. To give her the more privacy she could have, he went to the little library. To access it, he had to pass through a door that led to the solar, then to take another door to the shelves. It was the farthest he could go without leaving their common rooms. He started to read a book he never read before. The Optimum Quantity of Money and Other Essays by Maester Freedman, a former maester of Casterly Rock in service during the Targaryen Conquest. Tyrion would have to administer very large amounts of gold now that he was at Casterly Rock. The Master of Coin was playing with coppers when compared to the Lord of the Westerlands, so Tyrion would be better to familiarize again with Lannister wealth and quickly. He was to manage money instead of spending it. His father was never generous with his children, except when it came to money.

After some time, he left the library and went back to the bedroom. Sansa had left the bath and was sleeping, a blue silken nightgown hugging perfectly her body. Tyrion smiled at the sight. He hadn’t been able to have new gowns prepared for Sansa in King’s Landing, but he had sent her measurements to the dressmakers of Casterly Rock by raven so they may begin to fashion gowns for her. This was one of them. She was beautiful in it.

Tyrion looked away and went to the bathroom to wash himself too. He didn’t take long and tried to make the less noise he could, trying to not awake Sansa. He put on his nightclothes and went to the bed. He needed to sleep after the tiresome trip. As soon as he settled down under the sheets, Sansa came from the other side of the bed to rest her head on him.

“Sorry, my lady. I didn’t want to wake you up.”

“You didn’t awake me. I wasn’t sleeping.”

Her voice was low and dreamy. She looked half-asleep. Tyrion wrapped an arm around her neck and shoulders as he often did lately. He moved his hand along her back, the silk of her gown soft under his palm, but not as soft as her skin.

“I’m glad to be here,” she said after a long moment.

“I’m glad you’re here me too,” Tyrion answered. He thought he heard Sansa smile, if it was possible to hear someone smile. They said nothing afterwards and soon Tyrion fell asleep. He had no difficulty to sleep for the whole night.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter and the two that are coming right after are the chapters of introduction to Casterly Rock. I liked a lot to write them and to imagine how was Casterly Rock and the rest of Tyrion's family. Characters who are barely mentionned up to now in the books will become recurring characters if not major characters.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa lazily opened her eyes. The night had been beautiful and sweet after two months of travel. She felt something on her head. She slowly lifted her eyes to see Tyrion’s head resting on the top of her own, just like her head rested on his chest. She remained in this position, her eyes closed, enjoying the moment. Light was coming from the large window next to their bed. It was morning, but Sansa didn’t want to get up. It was very comfortable. She had the impression to live in a dream in this very moment.

When she saw Casterly Rock for the first time yesterday, standing tall beside the Sunset Sea, Sansa hadn’t been able to believe it. She never saw something so high and huge. It looked like one of these fantastic castles she used to read about in the stories she read at Winterfell. And the inside… Sansa never saw so much wealth in one place. Gold, precious stones, silver, costly silk and tissues, everything looked as if it was made only for the pleasure to spend money. When she thought she had been eager to leave Winterfell to see King’s Landing she felt stupid. The little girl she was should have dreamed of seeing Casterly Rock instead of the stinking city. And the rooms she shared with Tyrion… Sansa never imagined two people could have so much place. She didn’t realize until now that the Lannisters really were the richest people in the Seven Kingdoms.

Sansa was impressed and bewildered by the splendor of Casterly Rock, but she still remembered where she was. She was in the lion’s den, surrounded by Lannisters. For now she didn’t know what to make of them, but judging by the comment one of Tyrion’s cousin made yesterday, everyone wasn’t glad to see her. That was no surprise. But for the time being, she just wanted to stay here in her husband’s arms. She felt good in these moments. Safe. Loved. She buried her face into his shift, wanting to forget about everything else. After a moment, she felt his hand slipping on her back. Her face emerged and looked at him. Green eyes met her blue eyes. They smiled at each other.

“You slept well?” he asked her.

“Yes. You too, I guess. Or else you would be away reading or working as always when I wake up.” They both giggled and Sansa rested her head again against him. “Don’t leave me,” she whispered.

“Never.”

He kissed her brow. The kiss was long, like the one they shared in King’s Landing, only this time he was the one to kiss her, though not on her lips. Sansa remembered how it had felt so good. This one felt good as well, though not in the same way. After he broke the contact of his lips on her face, his face moved to her hair. She felt his hot breath through her locks. Both his hands ran all over her, caressing her back, her hips, her belly, her hands, her arms, her shoulders, her neck, her throat, her cheeks, her chin. Sometimes his fingers would run through her hair, and other times he would move hair to allow his hand to run on a part of her body it was covering. A few times his hand went to her collarbone, then lower, but never too far. Sansa didn’t know if she was glad or dissatisfied that he didn’t go farther. His touch was enticing. When a hand passed on the silk of her new gown, she could nearly feel his flesh against hers through the fabric. It was even better when there was nothing between his hand and her body. Her breathing was quickening. She felt an urge to make little sounds with her mouth. A swirling sensation developed in her body, heat spreading through all of it. She wanted more of it. Each movement of his hands left her with the desire to get more. Without really realizing it, Sansa found herself with a hand in the hair of her husband, the other beginning to wander on his chest. Her whole body was shivering. There was also a strange warmth that started between her legs, something she never felt before. She noticed something hard against her belly.

However, Tyrion began to slow down the movements with his hands and to take his face out of her hair. The feeling that filled her body began to recede, but slowly, progressively. Tyrion touched her skin less and less to only touch the places where silk separated his fingers from her body. In the end, he was simply running a hand through her hair, not touching her anymore. Sansa relaxed, her breathing steadying and going slower. But she continued to feel well. Everything seemed so perfect in this instant. She didn’t know how much time they stayed that way. But no matter how long they stayed, for Sansa it wasn’t long enough.

Tyrion finally moved out of bed, and Sansa let herself fall on the mattress. Probably for the first time in her life, she grunted in displeasure before she could stop herself. She saw Tyrion looking at her with a grin.

“We cannot stay in bed all day, Sansa.” He leaned and gave her a kiss on her forehead again. For a moment, Sansa wished he had given it below. “Though I have to admit I wouldn’t hate it,” he added as he backed away.

Sansa felt red rising to her cheeks. She couldn’t help but smile at the comment. Tyrion had spent nearly all the last day of their journey observing her sewing. She had felt his gaze upon her, and she had liked it. He didn’t look at her with an arrogant smile or an evil grin like Joffrey or Littlefinger. He simply looked at her. There was no lust, no arrogance, no cruelty, nothing false in it. She felt more admired than anything else in fact when Tyrion looked at her. He didn’t look as if he wanted something from her. He just looked. Just like he did right now, but it didn’t last long. Very soon, he was in one of the many other rooms, probably dressing for the day. Sansa didn’t know why, but she regretted it. When they lived in King’s Landing, Tyrion would change his clothes in the dark when he came back lately to their chambers. He didn’t know that, but Sansa watched him do it several times. She remembered the outlines of his body from his back. She didn’t know how he looked on the front. Now she wouldn’t see it again. They had enough rooms to pull on and out each part of their clothing in a different room without seeing each other.

She remained in her bed for some time, laying there, not wanting to leave it. After a moment, she finally decided to get up and walked to the balcony. She looked at the Sunset Sea right before her. It was an impressive view from where she was. She could see ships leaving from Lannisport on her left. Too bad she couldn’t see the sun, hidden by the massive form of Casterly Rock. Her view was on the west, not the east. Sansa breathed deeply. The air was salty because of the sea. It was fresh, not like the natural scent of Winterfell, but fresh all the same, not at all stinking like King’s Landing. The breeze of the morning quietly caressed the zones of her body her new gown let bare. One of her new handmaidens had suggested her this gown to sleep, and Sansa didn’t regret it. The fabric was softer than anything she ever felt on her skin. It was so lightweight that Sansa had the impression she wore nothing when she slipped in it, despite the fact it covered almost all of her shoulders, all her back, her chest, her belly and her legs to the ankles. She closed her eyes and listened to the sound of the waves crashing against something far below her. It really was a beautiful place. Sansa kept her eyes closed, listening to the sounds around her. It was such a peaceful place. How could the Lannisters make war when they lived here? Who would like to leave this place for the battlefields? She heard Tyrion approaching behind her and stopping at her side. She let him come, keeping her eyes closed.

“A beautiful view, isn’t it?”

Sansa opened her eyes to her husband’s interrogation. “Yes, it is,” she said while looking at the sea. The water was shining in the morning light.

“It’s even more beautiful at the end of the day, when the sun set. I’ll show you this evening.” A moment passed, and when Tyrion spoke next, his voice was more serious. “Sansa, I didn’t tell you yesterday because you were asleep, but my aunt, Lady Genna Frey, would like to break her fast with you.”

Sansa looked back at Tyrion. Genna Frey? Frey? Tyrion seemed to understand while she looked distressed. “She’s not a real Frey. She’s the sister of my father. She was born a Lannister, but married a son of Walder Frey. Believe me, she is more a Lannister than anyone else here.”

Sansa wasn’t sure if she could be reassured by this. She remembered the few times Tyrion talked to her about his aunt. A big woman with a grave voice for a woman. Sansa had seen her yesterday when she arrived. Tyrion had discussed with her after she left with Ser Damion and Podrick. There was something about her that unsettled Sansa. She had the features of the Lannisters, blond hair and green eyes, but that wasn’t what troubled Sansa. Her gaze remembered her of Tywin Lannister, even more than Ser Kevan’s face.

“Are you sure it’s a good idea?”

Tyrion put a reassuring smile. “You don’t have to worry with her. Genna is intimidating at first sight, but she’s not dangerous. Unless someone threatens the family.” He tried to make it a joke and laughed lightly, but this time Sansa didn’t really find it funny. Tyrion straightened himself. “She has nothing against you, Sansa. One of her sons, Lyonel, died at the Whispering Wood, but she holds no grudge against you for that, no more than Kevan hated you for what happened to Martyn and Willem. She told me that herself yesterday. She only wants what is good for House Lannister. All she wants is to know you better. She has a lot of influence here in Casterly Rock. In fact, she ruled it more than Damion did in my absence. And she has no bad feelings against you. She’s the better person to start with if you want people to accept you. She mostly wants to know who you are, nothing more.”

Sansa calmed down a little. She knew she had to make sure she was accepted by the people of Casterly Rock. If what Tyrion said was true, then she needed to be accepted by this woman if she hoped to be recognized by everyone else here.

“Am I late?” She feared they spent too much time to sleep.

Tyrion tossed the question away. “Don’t worry. I’ll send someone to tell her we both needed some good rest after our long journey. She might make a few comments about it, but nothing more. In the end, she won’t care. As I told you, she’s intimidating but not dangerous.”

“What should I wear?” She felt like a child not knowing what to do. She was completely in the unknown, despite Tyrion’s efforts on the road to make her understand the life in the Westerlands.

“Put what you want, as long as it befits a lady. She won’t care whether you wear red or any other colour. Genna doesn’t really worry about people’s appearance. It’s who they are she cares about. Try to be true with her. Your armor of courtesies won’t be of any use with her. If you hide behind them, she won’t think anything great of you. She doesn’t want a Lady of Casterly Rock who’s afraid.”

In fact, Sansa was a little afraid. Tyrion could try to be reassuring, and she knew he meant well, but she was nervous all the same. She went to the dressing room and put on her purple gown with flowers. The servants had brought all the clothes she and Tyrion brought with them from King’s Landing, but there were also many other gowns, robes, doublets and other garments for all weather, occasions and tastes. Tyrion told her on the road he informed the dressmakers of Casterly Rock about her measurements, so they had already made new clothes for her, but Sansa could see there was still a lot of place left for yet unmade garments. She had her hair brushed by one of her new handmaidens.

Tyrion accompanied her to his aunt’s chambers. Sansa feared she would get lost in this labyrinth of galleries without him. She would need time before she could find her own way in this giant castle.
Tyrion continued to advise her on how to deal with his aunt, Sansa trying to choose the best strategy.
He also told her about her schedule for the day. Sansa wouldn’t have a lot of respite for her first day in Casterly Rock. After her breakfast with Genna Frey, she would have to meet the chief dressmaker of Casterly Rock so he may adjust her new wardrobe. Tyrion told her she could order everything she wanted without problems. Money was no object. She could also familiarized herself with her new handmaidens. Then she would have to attend a midday meal with all the other ladies of House Lannister, from Genna to Janei, the three-years-old daughter of Ser Kevan. Finally Tyrion had arranged a meeting between her and Creylen, the maester of Casterly Rock. According to Tyrion, she needed lessons with him. Sansa wanted to protest but Tyrion pointed out she needed to understand financial matters better than she did actually. He highlighted some of her failures during their journey to understand some very basic principles with sums and figures. Sansa knew she was never good at it, but she didn’t want to follow lessons from a maester again like a little girl. She was a woman now, and a great lady. Finally she had to give up before Tyrion’s refusal to reconsider. At least she would have nothing to do for the evening. Tyrion promised her he would make her visit Casterly Rock tomorrow, though they would need more than a single day for Sansa to see everything.

They stopped close to an emblazoned door with a golden lion on it, guarded by two men. “It’s here. I have to leave you. I have other duties to attend. I’ll see you for dinner.”

Tyrion started to walk away. “What do you have to do?” she asked.

“Many things.” Tyrion had an enigmatic smile. “Don’t worry. My aunt may roar, but she won’t bite.” He left for good.

Sansa stood there for a moment, gathering her courage. She composed herself, then walked to the door and told the guards to let her enter. One of the guards opened the door and announced her.

“The Lady Sansa.” The man then left and Sansa was alone with Tyrion’s aunt.

Lady Genna Frey was the biggest woman Sansa had ever met. She had seen her yesterday when they arrived, but she was among so many other people that Sansa didn’t have time to observe her closely. Now she had to admit she was surprised by the woman before her. She was by far the biggest person Sansa ever saw in her life, except the Mountain. But while Gregor Clegane was brute force and muscles, the woman standing before her was mainly flesh and fat. It troubled Sansa. All members of House Lannister she met up to now were tall and slender, images of handsomeness and beauty for their age. All of them except Tyrion, but he was a dwarf and Sansa’s mind had come to not really associate him with the Lannisters. Lord Tywin’s sister was all the opposite, but she had the green eyes and the golden hair of her family. She looked at her with curious eyes, examining Sansa.
Sansa decided to start with the usual courtesies.

“Lady Genna.”

“You can call me Genna, my child. We’re of the same family after all. Please sit. We’re already late for breakfast and I hate to be late for any meal.”

Genna Frey was direct with her. Sansa went to the table where Lady Genna just sat and took a place right before her. There were bread, various fruits, lemon water and many cheeses on the plates before them. Lady Genna filled her own plate with a lot of food from everything on the table while Sansa proved to be more modest.

“I’m sorry to be late,” Sansa said, trying to start the conversation.

“No need to be sorry. I would be exhausted me too after two months of travel and two years in a stinking city surrounded by enemies.” Sansa was surprised by her frankness. It reminded her of Lady Olenna Tyrell in some way. “How has been the road by the way? You didn’t meet any problem?”

“None,” Sansa shortly replied.

“Very well. Let me be direct, Sansa. Most of the people are not happy about your presence here, and even less happy to see you as Lady of Casterly Rock.”

“And how do you feel about my presence?” Sansa looked straight into the green eyes before her.

Genna Frey just swallowed a strawberry. She wiped her mouth and her hands with a big napkin. “For now, I think my nephew could have made a better choice of Lady of Casterly Rock, but it’s quite obvious he’ll die before he sets you aside, and I know better than to argue with him about this. My brother Kevan tried, and he was rebuffed according to his messages.”

“Indeed, he was. Twice.”

“Indeed,” repeated the big woman. “Don’t get me wrong, dear. I have nothing against you. How old are you?”

“I’m fifteen.”

“How old were you when you were betrothed to Joffrey?”

“Thirteen.”

“Do you know how old I was when I was betrothed to my husband Emmon?” Before Sansa’s absence of answer, Genna told her. “I was seven. And my husband was twice my age. Do you think I’m happy to be associated with a family who broke the guest rights and are despised through all Westeros?”

Genna Frey stared at her with an inquisitive look. Try to be true with her. Your armor of courtesies won’t be of any use with her. Sansa felt bold enough to give an answer that was true, though not bold enough to answer directly. “I can’t speak for you, but I wouldn’t if I were at your place.”

Tyrion’s aunt smiled for an instant before sighing. “When my betrothal to Emmon Frey was announced, there was only one person who spoke against it. Do you know who?” Sansa had no idea. “My brother Tywin. He was ten at this moment. Imagine a boy of ten telling his lord father that the marriage he arranged for his little princess wasn’t a good match.” Genna chuckled, but Sansa didn’t share it. Not that she didn’t find it funny, but she couldn’t really imagine Tyrion’s father as a child. “But that doesn’t mean I approve everything my big brother did, or much enjoyed the company of the man he became. I’m really sorry for what happened at the Twins. I didn’t know your family, but no one should die this way.”

Sansa didn’t really know what to answer to that. She didn’t see anything in this woman to believe she lied. She had to admit Genna Frey didn’t look like a Frey at all. She spoke of them with disdain and didn’t look at all happy to be part of this house. Sansa found it strange this lady still lived in Casterly Rock. Normally, a noblewoman would leave her home when she wed to live with her new husband in his home. That hadn’t been the case for Genna Lannister. Finally, she could only give a few words.

“I thank you.”

Sansa drank some lemon water. Lady Genna was taking some bread and spreading butter on it. “Tell me, Sansa,” after she took a first bite in the bread, “what are your feelings about my nephew?”

It was a chance Sansa had swallowed all the water, or else she could have choked on it. That wasn’t the type of question she was expecting. She straightened herself. “I trust him.”

Genna Frey looked a bit surprised. “That’s all. You trust him, nothing more.”

Sansa didn’t wish to discuss her feelings for Tyrion with someone she didn’t know. It would have been difficult already to talk about it with someone of her family, so with a Lannister? “He’s my husband. Shouldn’t I trust him?”

Sansa looked defiantly at the other woman, only to see her smile sadly and shake her head. “You don’t trust me. I understand. I come from two families, one by birth and the other by marriage, and each one played an important role in the destruction of your own family.”

Sansa felt anger rising in her, but an old reflex she developed long ago brought her to not show it. “They were traitors.” She remembered too late Tyrion’s advice. Your armor of courtesies won’t be of any use with her. Genna’s mouth twisted.

“I’m not here to play this game, little girl. It’s not by distrusting us that you’ll be accepted here. I lost a son against your brother at the Whispering Wood, two nephews and a brother-in-law later. So we can distrust each other, or help each other for our mutual interests.”

“What interest do you have in helping me, or getting my help?”

“To have an appropriate Lady of Casterly Rock for the first time in thirty-five years for the first, and for my nephew’s sake for the second.”

Sansa was puzzled before the second statement. Her nephew’s sake? What did she mean? Before she could ask what she meant, Genna Frey rose from her chair. “Come with me. There is something I want to show you.” She walked to the door. Sansa didn’t dare to move. She didn’t understand. “Are you waiting for someone to carry you?”

Sansa finally got up. She followed Tyrion’s aunt outside her chambers, leaving behind their breakfast barely started. Genna Frey led her alone through multiple galleries. No one followed them. The guards remained before the door at Genna’s command. Sansa could see the woman had a lot of influence here at Casterly Rock. The servants they met on their path all bowed before her, much more than before Sansa. It was obvious who was the true Lady of Casterly Rock for the moment. Sansa was nothing more than an outsider for everyone here, an upstart who was luckily married to the man who became Lord of the Westerlands after the Old Lion died. She was never meant to be Lady of House Lannister.

She and Genna sank deeper into the depths of Casterly Rock, taking stairs and galleries that led them lower and lower in the mountain. As they went down, windows were fewer and light diminished. The torches were less and less alight. Lord Tywin’s sister seized a lighted torch on a wall at one moment. They had reached parts of the castle that seemed abandoned. Everything was dark here. They continued to go lower until they entered a large room. Genna stopped there. Sansa couldn’t say what it was in the darkness. Before she could ask, Genna Frey raised the torch to a place on the wall.

Progressively, a chain of torches lighted all around the room, revealing its details. It was a hall, a very large hall. The Great Hall of King’s Landing was the bedchamber of a handmaiden when compared to this one. There were two thrones at the extremity, entirely made of gold. The one on the left was bigger than the other one. Galleries under archways ran all around the hall. Everything was carved into the rock except the thrones.

“It was the Great Hall of the Kings and Queens of the Rock, hundreds of years before the Targaryen invasion,” Genna explained her. “It is built exactly at the center of Casterly Rock, in its very heart. Some say it was built there so the petitioners and the ambassadors would be intimidated by the fact they were so deep in the heart of the Rock, without any way to escape. This Hall is no longer used now. Another one was built to benefit the light of the day.”

Sansa stared at the place, impressed. Was everything so huge at the seat of House Lannister? “Why did you bring me here?”

“After the new Great Hall was built and this one abandoned, he kept only one purpose.” Genna walked through the gallery on their right. Sansa followed her. She realized there were tapestries all along the walls. “House Lannister of Casterly Rock through the centuries. The tapestries of all the kings and lords with their wife and children are here.”

They walked for a moment, following the gallery until they reached a dead-end. Genna turned towards one of the many tapestries. Sansa could see a man in the thirties standing, a smile on his lips, but leaning towards a young woman with long brown hair sitting in a golden chair, holding a little baby in her arms, her head resting on the back of the chair, a weak smile on her lips as she looked at her baby. The man had his right arm around the shoulders of a little girl. There were also three other boys on the woman’s left, the eldest younger than Robb but older than Bran. Sansa didn’t know what family she was looking at until she noticed the icy stare. There was only one man who could gaze this way.

“Tywin Lannister,” she whispered as her eyes were fixed on the eldest son.

“This tapestry was made not long before my lady mother died.”

Sansa heard Genna speak, but her mind was focused on the people the tapestry displayed. Now she knew how Tywin Lannister looked when he was young. She could already see in this young boy the man who would order the slaughter of her family fifty years later. His stare was so intense that she had the impression he was looking at her disapprovingly. You have no right to be here. You shouldn’t be here, he seemed to tell her. To his left were probably his two brothers, Kevan and Tygett. The baby had to be Gerion, Tyrion’s favorite uncle. He told her one day that his grandmother died not long after her last son was born. The girl gripping the man’s clothes had to be Genna. Sansa could already see roundness on this girl no older than Arya. And Lord Tytos Lannister was the man looking upon his wife, Lady Jeyne Marbrand, who was about to die. That was probably why she sat in a cushioned chair.

“My lord father often laughed,” Genna started to speak again. “He wasn’t called the Laughing Lion for nothing. But he never laughed or smiled after my mother died. A month after Gerion was born, she was dead. He never was the same afterwards. But he loved all of us, even Gerion. I was my father’s precious princess. When my mother died, my father took the daughter of a candlemaker in his bed and she acted as Lady of Casterly Rock. In the meantime, he was lending money to everyone without caring to get it back, trusting all kinds of people and letting his mistress lead him. People were mocking the Lannisters, talking about lions without teeth. Tywin saw all of it and came to distrust laughter in every form. Then came the rebellion of House Tarbeck and House Reyne. You know what happened?”

“Yes, Tyrion told me. And about the rivalry between Lady Tarbeck and your mother.”

Genna nodded. ‘Tywin obliterated the two houses by annihilating the whole families. No one survived the rebellion. After that, no one ever dared to challenge our house. Aerys Targaryen heard about Tywin’s prowess in neutralizing the rebellion. When he became the king, he made Tywin his Hand, only a year after the rebellion was crushed. My brother was only twenty. A year later he married his cousin, Joanna, in King’s Landing. And three years after the wedding, she gave birth to Jaime and Cersei. It was next year that my father died and Tywin became the Lord of Casterly Rock. He was at the peak of his power then.”

Genna looked at Sansa. “I know you probably hate my brother, and I don’t blame you. I didn’t really like the man he became afterwards, but there’s a reason why he turned so cold hearted and ruthless. He saw our house on the brink of destruction, and he did everything to prevent that from happening again.”

She turned back to the tapestry and continued to talk. “We have all lived in Tywin’s shadow for our whole life. It was hard for all my brothers. That shadow Tywin cast was long and black, and each of them had to struggle to find a little sun.” She pointed the second oldest. “Kevan saw how things stood early on, so he made himself a place by Tywin’s side. He only consulted with Kevan after his wife died.” She turned her head to the other boy. “Tygett tried to be his own man, but he could never match Tywin, and that just made him angrier as the years went by. He died of the pox a few years ago.” She looked at the baby. “Gerion made japes. Better to mock the game than to play and lose. Finally he got this idea in his head to find Brightroar, the ancient Valyrian steel greatsword of our family that disappeared when Tommen the Second sailed to Valyria and never returned. Gerion disappeared as well while searching it.” Genna then look at her younger image. “As for me, I was Tywin’s princess after my father died, until I disappointed my big brother. Tywin never learned to like the taste of disappointment.”

Genna walked away, but not for long. She stopped before another tapestry. Sansa took a last look at the tapestry of Lord Tytos with his children and his wife, then went to Genna’s side. The new tapestry only had four people, a man, a woman, and two children, a boy and a girl. All of them were green of eyes and gold of hair. Sansa recognized immediately Tywin Lannister in his thirties with the same icy stare. The woman at his side was younger than him, in the twenties, very beautiful, slender, with a peaceful and smiling face. The two children had to be Jaime and Cersei Lannister. She could see now they were twins. They looked so alike on this, at no more than five name days. For a moment, Sansa wondered where Tyrion was, but she remembered Tyrion’s mother died when he was born. Tyrion hadn’t come into the world when this tapestry was made. Joanna Lannister was still alive.

Sansa couldn’t detach her eyes from the figure of Lady Joanna Lannister. She saw some of Cersei in her, a few physical traits, some of the beauty, but it wasn’t what kept her attention the most. Her smile. The way she tenderly held the hand of her husband. Her eyes. She had seen these features in someone else. Her own husband. Tyrion. He took after his mother. She made the same empathic face than him. Cersei had some of the beauty of her mother, but it was a cruel and cold beauty when Lady Joanna’s looked kind and caring. She tried to see Tyrion in his father, but she couldn’t. The only child of Tywin Lannister who seemed to retain some of him was Cersei. She had the same cold stare than him sometimes. Ser Jaime didn’t seem to have inherited anything from his parents except the eye’s color and the golden hair every Lannister had.

“My brother used to say that love was useless, that we couldn’t do anything with it. He never smiled nor laughed after people laughed at our father. But he smiled when he wed Joanna. And he smiled too at Jaime’s and Cersei’s birth. I saw that with mine own eyes. You haven’t met my brother in his best years. He was different when his wife was still alive.”

Sansa turned towards Genna. “Different?”

Tyrion’s aunt tilted her head with a sad smile. “Tywin always said he did everything for House Lannister, but there were a few circumstances when he derogated to this rule. His wedding to Joanna was one of these.”

They remained silent for a moment. “He loved her?” Sansa asked.

Genna nodded. “And she loved him. Very much. People used to say that Tywin Lannister ruled the Seven Kingdoms when he was Hand of the King, but he was ruled by his wife at home. Joanna was the only one capable of changing his mind on any matter. He never recovered after she was dead, and never married again. My brother Gerion used to say the best part of Tywin died with her, and on that he was right.”

Sansa looked more closely to the tapestry. She noticed something we couldn’t see without looking very attentively. The way Lord Tywin and his wife were holding hands. While Tywin Lannister maintained an icy and stern stare, she had the impression his hand was behaving differently than the rest of his body. His palm and his wife’s were sliding one within the other in a very tender gesture. His arm seemed relaxed when the rest of his body was tense. That was quite unsettling. Sansa never saw Tywin Lannister in another way than a cruel man. Was it possible there had been a soft spot somewhere in the man? A spot that died with his wife?

“I don’t really understand why you’re telling me all of this.” Sansa didn’t get the reason why Lady Genna brought her here during the breakfast.

“I told you. I want an appropriate Lady of Casterly Rock. I saw all of them grow up. Jaime, Cersei, Tyrion. All of them suffered from Tywin’s behavior, just like my brothers. And I know all of them very well, and I can see how they take after other Lannisters. Jaime smiles like my brother Gerion and fights like my brother Tyg. He has also some of Kevan in him, else he wouldn’t wear a white cloak and serve. But of his parents, he received nothing. Cersei has some of Joanna’s beauty, and she’s even more beautiful than her mother. She also has the lust for power, the ambition, and sadly the ruthlessness and cruelty of Tywin. But of all of them, Tyrion is the only real child of Tywin. He has his mind, his instincts for politics, his intelligence, his cunning and his patience. He also has some of his ruthlessness, but thankfully Tyrion also inherited the compassion and kindness of his mother, and it tempers this trait. I said so once to Tywin’s face, and he would not speak to me for half a year. Men are such thundering great fools, even the sort who come along once in a thousand years.”

Genna sighed deeply. “I’m glad Tyrion is the Lord of the Westerlands now. Jaime would have been terrible as a lord, and he wouldn’t have liked it. He was born to serve, not to rule, and he knows it. Cersei thought she was born to rule, but she was wrong. Tyrion was born to be Tywin’s heir, but my brother was blinded by his hatred for Tyrion. A consequence of Joanna’s death at Tyrion’s birth, of his dwarfism, and perhaps of the fact Tywin could see too much of both himself and Joanna in Tyrion.” Genna averted her head from the tapestry to look at Sansa straight in the eyes. “Tywin brought back House Lannister on its feet after my father’s follies. He made our family rich, powerful, respected, and feared, but he also made us hated. Everything he gave us is good, but it’s better if our family is loved. Tyrion may be able to achieve that goal, but he will need your help. He may be a bigger man than he seems, but every man needs a woman at his side, especially a woman he loves.”

Sansa was taken aback by Genna’s sudden statement. A woman he loves. Genna nearly laughed. “Don’t make this face. I only had one discussion with my nephew since he came back and he already speaks of you the same way Tywin spoke of Joanna. At least the way he spoke of her when she was still alive. After she died, Tywin had any image, picture, painting or tapestry of his wife removed from everywhere in Casterly Rock. He didn’t want to be reminded of her in any way. He forbade everyone to talk about her, even to mention her. This tapestry is the last portrayal left of her, and she remained here because Tywin forgot about it.” Genna made a pause. “We’d be best to go back to my rooms. We both need a breakfast to get through this day and it’s quite cold down here.”

Lady Genna Frey walked away to the exit of the Hall, but Sansa didn’t follow her this time. She stared at the tapestry, her eyes fixed on the last image of Lady Joanna Lannister. She looked at it for a long time, seeing more and more of Tyrion in his mother. Sansa now wished she had known her. However, when she looked at Tyrion Lannister, she couldn’t find any resemblance between him and his son, except the blond hair and green eyes all Lannisters shared. But even the eyes and the hair Tyrion had seemed to come more from his mother than from his father. She finally left, joining Genna who was waiting for her. They walked back to the higher levels. On their way, Genna told something else to Sansa.

“I told you Tyrion has a lot of Tywin in him, but also his mother’s compassion. Up to now this compassion has kept Tywin’s ruthlessness away, but I fear one day it might not be enough. When this day comes, Tyrion will need you. It will be your duty to stop him from doing something he may regret for the rest of his life.”

Sansa reflected about everything she just learned. She thought she understood Tywin Lannister better now, but nonetheless she wouldn’t forgive the man for the destruction of her family, or for everything else he did. Her father executed people, but only when they committed crimes. It was his duty and he never liked it. She could understand you had to execute rebels and criminals, but children or innocent people killed only in order to be feared… that she couldn’t accept. The Riverlands and the North followed her brother because they respected and loved him, not because they feared him. And for that he ended up killed during a wedding. Tyrion ruled King’s Landing without assassination or slaughter. And in the end he was abandoned by his allies, stripped of all his powers, and nearly killed on his sister’s order. But Sansa managed to free him and now they were at the head of the Westerlands and House Lannister, and she didn’t have to shed blood for this. No. She wouldn’t believe violence and killing were the only ways to rule and survive. There were other ways. She wouldn’t turn like Cersei. I’ll make people love me. And I’ll make them love Tyrion as well.

Sansa wondered what Genna meant when she said she would have to make sure Tyrion wouldn’t do something he would regret forever afterwards. She said Tyrion was ruthless like Tywin, but Sansa couldn’t see anything of this sort in her husband. Tyrion had made things that caused the death of thousands of people, but he did it because he had no choice. The destruction of Stannis’s fleet killed many people, but he did it to save a city of half a million people. He had the Mountain and his men killed, perhaps even murdered from a certain point of view, but they were monsters who deserved their end. It wasn’t much different from the people her father executed, except perhaps Tyrion wasn’t the one to swing the sword, but the principle remained the same. Anyway, Sansa doubted Tyrion would be able to swing the sword with his small size. He even tried to avoid executions as much as he could, preferring to send people to the Wall for their crimes, even a man who killed babies like Janos Slynt. Sansa couldn’t imagine Tyrion ordering the slaughtering of an entire family, the murder of children, or ordering someone to rape a woman. Tyrion was intelligent, perhaps like his father, Sansa could admit it, but not ruthless or cruel in any way. Sansa didn’t believe it a single moment. He didn’t use his mind like Lord Tywin did. But if Tyrion needed her help in any way, she would help him, no matter the cost. She was his wife, and she wouldn’t give up on him. She would be at his side forever. Ser Kevan’s words came back to her mind. He needs you. Not only as a wife to stand beside him during official events or to have children. He needs you in his life. He needs someone to share his life with. Someone who will look after him. Someone who cares about him, who wants him to be happy.

They came back to Genna’s apartments to finish their breakfast barely initiated. Genna spent the rest of it asking questions about her and to tell her about her duties as the Lady of Casterly Rock, from managing the castle to her role in politics and the management of House Lannister. They also talked about her skills in handling all these tasks, and Sansa discovered Genna already knew a lot about her.

“I heard you have problems when it comes to sums and figures.” Sansa looked in dismay at the lady. Genna Frey smiled cunningly. “There are many people who owe me something or another, and a few were with you in King’s Landing or during your travel on the Goldroad. I asked them a few questions about what they knew about you.”

Sansa could see Genna Lannister, since she was more a Lannister than a Frey, wasn’t someone to take lightly. However, Sansa didn’t feel the woman was dangerous, at least not to her. It was like Tyrion told her. She seemed to care essentially about House Lannister and was trying to advise Sansa so she may succeed as Lady of Casterly Rock. Sansa was careful about her all the same, but she didn’t feel this Lannister was a threat like Cersei had been for so long. They arrived at the end of the breakfast.

“I’m sorry about what Myrielle said yesterday. Her father was Stafford Lannister, Joanna’s brother, and he died during the war when your brother attacked his army. It happens all the time, but Myrielle was quite close to her father and she hates the Starks ever since.” Sansa didn’t feel any false apologies in Genna’s voice. She looked sincere. “I won’t lie to you. That won’t be very easy for you at the beginning here. The injuries inflicted by the war are still fresh and will take time to heal. Many still have grudges against the Starks. But your name can be your strength just like it can be your weakness. It still commands respect if you use it well. And since you managed to defeat Cersei in a trial and to neutralize her, I guess you’re not without ways to defend yourself. But I’ll help you all the same. I don’t want the new Lady of House Lannister overwhelmed with so many problems she cannot handle on her own when she just arrived.”

“I thank you, Genna.”

Tyrion’s aunt smiled at her. “I think you can go now. I kept you in my company far too long. You must have other things to do before midday. Did Tyrion tell you had to attend a dinner?”

“Yes, he did this morning. All the ladies of House Lannister would be there from what he told me.”

“They will. Don’t be late. Jeyne!” A handmaiden who was about twenty-years-old came from behind Genna. Sansa hadn’t noticed her presence until now. “Please accompany Lady Lannister back to her chambers. Remember what I told you. It will be of great help for you. And welcome to Casterly Rock.” The three last sentences were for Sansa.

It was a good thing Genna asked a handmaiden to lead her back to her chambers. Sansa wouldn’t have been able to find her way back alone. As she returned to her chambers with the servant, Sansa thought she may not be in such a difficult situation as she thought. She believed Genna was probably sincere when she said she would help her. The woman would be a precious ally for her beginnings in this new castle. Sansa didn’t care if she did it essentially for House Lannister. She would be an ally all the same. Sansa felt more confident in her future. Only, thoughts lingered in her mind.
Something Genna told her.

Every man needs a woman at his side, especially a woman he loves. Did Tyrion really love her? Her heart started to pound in her chest and she felt red rising to her cheeks. She remembered the way he looked at her yesterday in the carriage. Or what happened this morning. But another thought, somber this one, lingered. Up to now this compassion has kept Tywin’s ruthlessness away, but I fear one day it might not be enough. When this day comes, Tyrion will need you. It will be your duty to stop him from doing something he may regret for the rest of his life.

Chapter End Notes

I hope I depicted Genna well enough. I regret she doesn't appear in the show. She is only seen briefly at Riverrun in AFFC and her discussion with Jaime was very interesting. I thought she might be the best to give to Sansa a first insight of the Lannister family, an insight that didn't come from Tyrion.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa (again)
Sansa XVII

Chapter Notes

Normally, this was meant to be part of the previous chapter, but it would have made a very long chapter (longer than the chapter of the royal wedding). So I decided to split it into two chapters. There were so many things that would have happened within a single chapter if I hadn't made a separation. It was best to divide it.

Sansa keeps being introduced to the life and the people of Casterly Rock. And she writes a letter. To who? Read if you want to discover it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sansa XVII

Sansa spent the rest of the morning with the chief dressmaker of Casterly Rock, a thin man with a sweet voice and precious manners. He started to show her the new gowns that were made for her during the last three months. Half of them were red, but there were also of other colors: blue, yellow, white, purple, green, rose… Each of them had gold, silver, or precious stones on it. Sometimes it had the three. The fabrics they were made of were costly and soft, sometimes coming from the Free Cities of Essos. The dressmaker took again her measurements to be able to make more gowns with more precision, then proposed her a multitude of designs for future gowns. Sansa was surprised by the wide range of choices she had, and even more by the cost of the clothes. It seemed money was effectively no object at Casterly Rock.

Sansa didn’t really know what to make of all this. She had wanted to be a great lady or a queen all her childhood, but she lost all her illusions during the last two years. She liked beautiful gowns and fine silk, but she wasn’t sure she wanted such luxury. It remembered her too much of the pageantry and arrogance of King’s Landing. Also, her mother always told her she should remain humble and simple. Sansa couldn’t really make a choice, so the chief dressmaker left her the designs so she may look at them longer before she made a choice. Sansa then called all her handmaidens. They all came from noble families of the Westerlands and showed great respect to Sansa. She didn’t really expect something different. After all, despite the fact all her family were considered traitors, she was still the Lady of Casterly Rock now, and the highborn people of minor houses couldn’t really show disrespect right in front of her. She asked them all their names, and luckily Sansa was able to remember a detail about the family of each one. All the girls seemed happy that Sansa knew a few things about their house. She gave them instructions about how she wanted them to serve her, and soon she could send them away.

Sansa spent an hour afterwards looking at the patterns of the gowns that were suggested. She tried to choose some that weren’t too lavish, but beautiful at the same time. Unfortunately, it was difficult to choose some that weren’t too lavish. They were all. If only Mira was here, she would have asked her opinion, but her friend was about a thousand miles away. She couldn’t even ask Margaery. Finally she put aside this task for later. Two of her handmaidens came to prepare her for the midday meal with the Lannisters. Sansa wasn’t sure what gown to choose. Some people there wouldn’t see her as a Lannister, so she feared she may offense them by wearing the color of their family. Anyway her mother didn’t wear clothes proper for Northerners and she was accepted in the North all the same. Sansa chose a blue gown with silver at the hem. She was glad at least that all gowns properly covered her body. She remembered the plunging necklines of some Cersei’s gowns, or the light dresses Margaery wore and that revealed most of her back. She wouldn’t feel comfortable in that kind of clothes. These were just fine. The only jewel Sansa wore was her golden necklace. Anyway, she always had it on her. She then left for the gardens where the meeting would take place.

On the way, Sansa discussed with the handmaiden accompanying her and showing her the way to the gardens. Her name was Willia Marbrand, a niece to Ser Addam. They talked about him for a part of their way to the gardens. Sansa had met Ser Addam in King’s Landing where he was still acting as Lord Commander of the City Watch. Sansa had the time to ask the girl where was the Stone Garden. It was the godswood of Casterly Rock. Sadly, the girl couldn’t tell her precisely where it was. She never visited it. Sansa felt she may be the first person who would use this godswood to pray in decades.

Genna welcomed her at the entrance of the gardens and sent Sansa’s maid away. “You’re in time. Come.” The greeting from Tyrion’s aunt was short and she brought Sansa with her through the gardens. Sansa quickly realized they were wider than those in King’s Landing and contained more specimens of plants and flowers. It was strange to think the king lived in a place smaller, poorer and less welcoming than the Lannisters. Genna started to talk to her about what was about to come.

“As I told you, some aren’t very pleased with your presence, but I warned them to have no misplaced comments or gestures towards you, or else I would deal with them if you didn’t deal with them before. They must know their place. Whether they like it or not, you are their lady now.”

No one could argue against this, except if they knew about her unconsummated marriage. Sansa wondered if someone else knew in Casterly Rock except her and Tyrion. Genna probably already knew. They came to a square of golden roses where a little girl was playing with a woman with brown hair and thin arms. Sansa would say the woman was approximately the age of her own mother, Lady Catelyn Stark. She saw them arrive and took the little girl in her arms, coming to meet them.

“Sansa,” began Genna, “I present you my sister-in-law, Lady Dorna Lannister.”

“My lady,” Dorna bowed with a thin smile. Even with the time she spent in King’s Landing as Lady of the Rock, she was still unaccustomed to the fact people much older than her had to bow before her while she didn’t have to reciprocate.

“Lady Dorna. I met your husband in King’s Landing. He’s a good man,” Sansa said. She was Ser Kevan’s wife. Sansa realized she wasn’t the only girl among the Lannisters married to a man who could be twenty years older than herself or more. Dorna had to be in the mid-thirties when Ser Kevan was in his sixties.

“Yes, he is. He talked to me about you in his letters. You also met my son Lancel I think. How was he? My lord husband didn’t tell me much about him, only that he was joining a community of brothers on some island. When Lancel left Casterly Rock with Kevan, he looked healthy enough to travel, but he barely spoke, even to me. I never saw him so silent.”

Sansa didn’t really know what to answer. Lady Dorna didn’t seem aware of what really happened to her son. “I met him. He was alright, but I didn’t speak a lot with him. He left the capital not long before the royal wedding.”

Dorna sighed and averted her eyes on the ground. “We all lose our sons. I lost Martyn and Willem. They were sweet boys. Genna lost Lyonel, and now Cersei loses Joffrey. I won’t have grandchildren any soon.”

Dorna Lannister knew nothing. She had no idea what happened to her eldest son, or what he did. Sansa didn’t think it to be a good idea to tell her. There were surely good reasons why Ser Kevan didn’t tell her. “I’m sorry for the death of your sons, Lady Dorna.”

Dorna smiled sadly at her and put a hand on her arm. “You don’t have to be sorry. We all lost people we loved.” Sansa felt a wave of sympathy for this woman. They were not in King’s Landing, surely she could assume people were more honest here. She didn’t know much about Dorna Lannister, but she looked essentially like a mother who loved her children above all. She didn’t look much different from Sansa’s mother.

Dorna turned to her little girl she held in her arms. “This is our daughter to me and my lord husband, Janei. Janei.” She tried to catch the attention of the child. “This is our new lady, Sansa. She is the wife of your cousin Tyrion. Bow your head and say my lady.”

Sansa saw Dorna put a little pressure on the back of her daughter’s head as the little girl squealed lowly. “My lady.” She looked scared. Sansa put her largest smile upon her face.

“I’m glad to meet you, Lady Janei.”

After a moment, the little girl smiled back. “Do you want to hold her?” Dorna’s question startled Sansa.

“Are you sure?”

“Of course. I’m sure she will like you.”

“Very well,” Sansa answered nervously. She had never taken a child in her arms before. She was only seven when Rickon was born, not old enough to hold him yet, and already too much occupied by her lessons. But she took Janei in her arms all the same when Dorna gave her daughter to her.

She was heavier than Sansa thought. She feared she may drop her by accident, but she also feared she might hold Janei too tightly. After a moment, the little child with golden hair and green eyes smiled widely and started to play with her hair.

“She likes you,” Dorna said with a large smile. “I think she never saw red hair before.” Sansa had to chuckle a little. It was unnerving to have a little girl playing with her hair using little hands. After a moment she gave her child back to Dorna. Janei was still waving her arms in her direction. “She really likes you a lot. Do you think you’ll have children soon?”

Sansa froze at the question, but she recovered her composure very quickly. “Well, I’m not pregnant yet. I don’t know when I’ll have some.”

“I wish you many children in the future. I always found it sad that my nephew Tyrion wasn’t married. I can understand for Jaime, he is a kingsguard, but Tyrion had no reasons to not get married. He should have been married so long ago. I hope you’ll have children very soon.”

_Tyrion was married before, only Lord Tywin decided the girl wasn’t worthy and had her raped by dozens of men._ Sansa kept her thoughts for herself and tried to not look ashamed. For now there was no chance she would get with child. Should she ask Tyrion to do it? She would have to one day, but she didn’t know when. She noticed a movement in a bush of roses behind Dorna. “What was it?”

Genna went to the bush, and pulled from it a girl who was approximately of Arya’s age. She had green eyes and blond hair. A Lannister for sure. She looked shy and afraid to move out of her hiding Genna made the presentations. “Sansa, I present you Joy, the daughter of my brother Gerion. Joy, this is Sansa, the wife of your cousin Tyrion.”

Joy moved toward Sansa in a slow pace, encouraged by a little push from Genna. She looked afraid as if Sansa would bite her. She looked to the ground for a long moment, but when she arrived before Sansa, she slowly lifted her eyes towards her and didn’t divert them from her afterwards. She couldn’t be more different than Arya. Sansa’s sister would rush to other people and couldn’t keep quiet for a minute. She looked at Sansa for a long moment before she talked.

“You’re Sansa, Uncle Tyrion’s wife?”

Sansa was puzzled. “Uncle Tyrion? He’s not your cousin?”

“He is, but I call him Uncle Tyrion. Just like Uncle Jaime. They’re very kind with me. He didn’t talk to you about me?”

“Of course, he did. He speaks a lot about you, and about your father too.”

A huge smile appeared on Joy’s face. Tyrion spoke mostly of his uncle in fact, but he also talked about the only daughter Gerion Lannister ever had, a bastard called Joy Hill. Tyrion told her the girl was quite lonely and discreet since her father died. Sansa could see it with her own eyes now, but Joy seemed very kind and sweet all the same.

“Alright. Alright. Time to eat now. Let’s join the others.” Genna nearly forced them to leave the place and walk to another corner of the gardens. Lady Dorna took the lead with Janei and Joy while Genna stayed behind with Sansa. “The three seem to like you. Try to do the same with the others.”

They arrived to a vast open space where half a dozen women of various ages were waiting for them. Sansa recognized the faces of a few of them, without being able to put a name on them. Without surprise, most of them had green eyes and blond hair. Genna first introduced Myrielle and Cerenna, Ser Stafford’s daughters. Sansa remembered Myrielle as the one who passed a comment when she arrived. She didn’t seem pleased by Sansa’s presence anymore in this moment. She curtsied properly, but couldn’t force a smile on her face. Cerenna, who looked a little older than her sister, greeted Sansa more warmly. There was also Shiera Crakehall, Ser Damion’s wife, one of the few without blond hair. She wasn’t a Lannister by blood and lost no one in the war, so Sansa hoped she wouldn’t be hostile to her. She greeted Sansa without showing any sign of ill thinking. Her daughter Lanna stood next to her and greeted Sansa the same way than her mother, though Sansa thought she saw a shadow in her eyes. There was also Lady Darlessa Marbrand, Ser Tygett’s widow. She showed no more hostility than Lady Shiera. Finally came Lady Margot Lannister, another cousin of Tyrion, who was around the end of her twenties from what Sansa could tell. This one welcomed Sansa nearly cheerfully. She was married to Lord Titus Peake, a lord from the Reach.

They all sat at a grand table. Being the Lady of Casterly Rock, Sansa sat at the head of it with Genna at her left and Dorna at her right. Sadly, it also meant she was the center of all the attention. Sansa had to be careful about what she would say, but she mastered courtesies and the art of talking better than everyone now. Not wanting to address any subject that could lead to an argument or any unease, Sansa started to ask questions about the Reach and her husband to Lady Margot. She proved to be quite eloquent about it, and Sansa could talk to her about Margaery and her family. The young woman listened very intently to everything she said. She only met Margaery once when she and her husband visited Highgarden. Sansa didn’t think she would have any problem with this one. Lady Shiera joined the conversation very quickly, telling many tales about her family and their home castle, Crakehall. Sansa remembered a few things she learned about House Crakehall and Ser Damion’s wife proved to be quite surprised by this. Her daughter Lanna proved to be much more reserved, only saying a few words. Cerenna also participated to the conversation, but Sansa noticed she spent a lot of time looking at her sister who didn’t lift her eyes from her plate. Darlessa contributed as well.

At one moment, Janei escaped Dorna’s arms and went to Sansa, tugging her gown. Dorna had a smile on her face as she looked at it. “I think Janei really took a liking on you. We should give her some time with you.”

Dorna took her daughter and placed her on Sansa’s knees. The little girl immediately started to play with her hair again. Most of the women started to laugh at the scene as Sansa tried to keep her head away from the little hands playing with her locks.

“All right, Dorna,” Lady Genna said after a moment. “I think you should get Janei back before she snatches some hair from our lady.”

Janei was back on Dorna’s knees a few seconds later, not without complaining, her hands still moving in the empty air as if she hoped she could still get to Sansa’s hair from this far. Dorna didn’t need to apologize, but she did. “I’m sorry. She mostly sees blond hair around here, so she finds yours very interesting.”

Sansa chuckled lowly, looking at how the little girl still tried to get free of her mother’s grasp. She acted even more childish than Rickon who used to crush nuts with a stone all time. Neither their mother neither Sansa ever managed to stop him from doing so, and Arya never tried.

“I was surprised when I saw you yesterday, Lady Sansa,” Lady Cerenna suddenly said. “I heard all the Starks had brown hair. I wondered if there was a mistake.”

“All my brothers and my sister have brown hair, but I hold from my mother, Catelyn Tully. She had auburn hair too.”

“Is it true there is snow even during summer in the North?” The question came from Joy. She didn’t talk since the beginning of the meal and they were at the end of the main course now.

“Yes, there is. We call it summer snow. Most of the time it falls during the night and then it melts during the day, but there are times there is more than others.” A memory came back to Sansa’s mind. “One day my sister Arya started a battle of snowballs with me in a courtyard. She was approximately your age the last time I saw her. My other brothers joined us quickly and we all ended up with a good cold.”

Joy was looking at her with obvious joy, looking very interested by that, but it was replaced very quickly by a sulky air. “I never saw snow here at Casterly Rock.”

“Yes, you did my dear,” Dorna corrected. “Only you don’t remember. You had just been born when the last winter ended. You’ll see snow very soon though. This long summer is ended and we’re in autumn. That won’t be long before snow comes.”

“Winter is coming,” Sansa added. She noticed a silence around the table. She just said the words of her family, and it made quite an impression. Joy didn’t seem to notice it however.

“How does snow look like?”

“Well,” Sansa tried to explain. “It’s white, and cold, but it melts into water when you take it into your hands. It can give the impression the ground is all covered by a white carpet when it falls in little quantity, but it can fall in greater quantities and go as tall as our thighs in the greatest tempests. I think I remember a huge fall like that when I was very young. We could barely leave the inside of Winterfell because doors were blocked by all the snow.”

Joy’s eyes were full of wonder as Sansa told her this. “Do you think you could take me to the North one day?”

Sansa didn’t really know how to answer to this. How to explain it to Joy? “I can’t go in the North right now.”

Joy seemed puzzled. “Why?”

Sansa finally chose an explanation that wasn’t false, but not the entire truth either. “Winterfell has been destroyed by the Ironmen about a year ago, and there are still many of them in the North.”

“Ironmen.” Cerenna Lannister said the words with revulsion. “I was visiting Lannisport ten years ago when they attacked us. I barely managed to make it to the Rock safely. These men are monsters and brutes. We should have burned their islands to the ground when we could.”

“I agree,” Sansa said after a moment. If there was at least one thing she wouldn’t have to argue with the Lannisters, it was their shared hatred of the Ironmen. To think that Theon, her father’s ward, burnt alive Bran and Rickon filled her with rage. They always treated Theon very well, and he rewarded them with treachery and murdering.

There was a gloomy silence for a moment. It was Joy who broke it again. “You… You have a sister of my age, Sansa?”

Sansa gulped before she answered. “She disappeared two years ago. No one knows where she is.”

Joy looked ashamed and sad now. “My father too disappeared a few years ago. He went to find a sword, and he never came back.”

Tyrion told Sansa about the disappearance of his uncle Gerion in his search for Brightroar, the lost Valyrian steel sword of House Lannister. It left Joy without father, without mother, and without any brother or sister. That was the reason of her loneliness.

“I’m sorry, Joy. I know what it is to lose a father.”

Perhaps Sansa shouldn’t have said this, but she wanted to comfort Joy a little. Sansa reflected about the girl sitting at Dorna’s right. In some way, she was no different from Jon. She was set aside because she was a bastard, even if she was allowed to live at Casterly Rock like Jon was allowed to live at Winterfell. What would happen to her once she would be older? Would she be forced to become a septa, or even a Silent Sister?

“I lost all my brothers and my sister during the war,” Sansa continued, talking to Joy. “All but one. He is in the Night’s Watch now, at the Wall. His name is Jon Snow.”

Myrielle snorted. “A bastard.”

Sansa turned to face Myrielle who still looked at her plate, but this time with a cruel smile. Sansa looked back at Joy whose eyes were cast down. Anger rose in Sansa. Without thinking, she spoke with an icy voice.

“Lady Myrielle, if you want to hate me for what my brother Robb did at Oxcross, you can, but I forbid you from ever talking against my other brothers. One was a cripple of ten-years-old, the other a child of eight, and Jon is in the Night’s Watch and took no part in this conflict. And I forbid you as well to use the word bastard this way when your cousin Joy is present.”

Myrielle Lannister looked at her with fury, and Sansa returned it with a face to make the lady understand she had no choice but to obey. Sansa was the Lady of Casterly Rock and of House Lannister, so whoever who was part of House Lannister had to obey her, even more here in her own castle. Tension was palpable around the table. Finally, Myrielle’s sister rose from her seat.

“I think I’ll go and take a walk before the sweet arrives. I think you should come with me Myrielle. We both need to stretch our legs.”

Cerenna couldn’t have chosen a better moment. The main course was over now, and it would take some time for the dessert to arrive. Myrielle reluctantly followed her sister out of the table. After a long silence, Margot started to talk about a brother of her husband who joined the Night’s Watch a few years ago. Sansa saw Joy still with her eyes dropped on the ground. Genna put a hand on Sansa’s, a sad smile on her lips. Myrielle and Cerenna came back not long before the sweet arrived. Cerenna took back her place, but Myrielle came to Sansa’s side.

“My lady, I beg your pardon for my inappropriate behavior a moment ago. I promise it won’t happen again.” Sansa could hear in Myrielle’s voice she wasn’t sincere and that she made her apologies with reluctance, but it was still better than nothing.

“I accept your apologies, Lady Myrielle. But there is someone else you should apologize to.”

Sansa turned her head to Joy, then to Myrielle so she may understand what she meant. After a moment during which Myrielle showed plainly she didn’t want to comply, she finally yielded.

“I’m sorry, Joy.”

She went back to her chair. After a moment, the conversations resumed around pastries, including lemon cakes. Myrielle asked Sansa about her brother Jon Snow, but Sansa noticed she received glares and nudges from her sister. It was obvious Cerenna was the one to force her to speak. Joy quickly asked more questions about Jon and Sansa found herself talking about her half-brother much more than she ever did. She didn’t even realize she knew so much about him.

When they were done with the dessert, Sansa excused herself. She had her meeting with Creylen, the maester of Casterly Rock. Cerenna proposed to accompany her to the maester’s rooms and Sansa accepted. After all, Cerenna didn’t seem to hate her like Myrielle and Sansa still needed someone to find her way through the maze of galleries. She didn’t even know where the maester’s rooms were. She left the ladies, Joy with a wide smile towards her, Genna with an encouraging smile accompanied by an approving nod, and most of the others smiling at her too, though Myrielle only showed indifference and Lanna didn’t look at her.

When they were far enough, Cerenna began to talk. “Please forgive my sister’s behavior, my lady. She’s angry at everything and everyone close to a Stark or a Northerner since our father died at the Battle of Oxcross.”

“And you’re not?”

Cerenna shrugged with a sad look on her face. “My father was old, and he died during a battle. When he left I knew it was possible he wouldn’t come back. He was my father, so of course I’m sad he’s dead, but he would have died soon anyway. I would have cried much more if my brother Daven had died. Anyway, it was Lord Rickard Karstark who killed him, and your brother executed him. I don’t see why I should keep any grudge against you. That’s not as if you killed him yourself. But Myrielle was closer to our father. She was his baby girl, so she’s more deeply affected by it.”
“It’s alright. I used to hate everyone related to the Lannisters until recently. And I lost a father me too.”

Perhaps Sansa was bolder than she should be, but Cerenna didn’t look as if she disapproved Sansa’s remark. She only nodded. “I’m sorry for your father. And for your brothers and your mother as well. I really believed it when I said the Ironmen are monsters. And the Freys are no better.” Cerenna sighed. “And now my brother is to marry one of them?”

Sansa was surprised by this revelation. “Your brother?”

Cerenna looked as if she was about to be sick. “Yes. Daven is to marry a Frey girl. It’s a marriage Lord Tywin arranged not long after what happened at the Twins.” Cerenna sighed. “Before he died, my father was discussing a marriage between Daven and Desmera Redwyne, the daughter of Lord Redwyne. And now instead of marrying a niece of Lord Tyrell, my brother will have to marry a stoat.”

Disgust was plain on Cerenna’s face. Sansa could only share it. If she had been forced to marry a Frey… She preferred to not think about it. “At least your brother won’t marry a dwarf.”

Sansa tried to lighten the atmosphere. Cerenna looked at her with a curious look, but after she realized Sansa was essentially japing, laughs escaped from her mouth. “At least you’re the Lady of Casterly Rock. You got quite a title and a position with your marriage. Daven will only get a wife and nothing more.” She remained silent for a moment. “You know, when we received the news Lord Tyrion was our new lord and that he was married to a Northerner, I was nearly expecting he would arrive before us with some sort of savage woman. Imagine my surprise when I saw you emerging from the carriage. For a moment I thought you weren’t his wife and the true Lady Sansa was somewhere else in the convoy.”

Sansa felt a little insulted, but Cerenna only seemed to find it funny that Tyrion’s wife wasn’t how she expected. “Who did you think I was then? Why did you think I was travelling with Tyrion?”

Cerenna looked a little hesitant to answer. “Well, you surely know… with the rumors about your husband… It’s not that I thought… but well, for a very short time I wondered if… if he didn’t bring… another woman with him.”

The Lannister girl turned her eyes in another direction. Sansa knew what she meant. Tyrion was still known as a whoremonger. It would take time before his reputation disappeared. People would probably whisper against him because of that, and Shae’s revelations, true or not, cast a shadow on him, and on Sansa too consequently. They walked silently for a while, going back into the galleries of the castle. After a moment, Cerenna told cautiously something Sansa didn’t expect.

“You know, my brother is not the only one who must marry a Frey. Joy must marry a son of Walder Frey too.”

Sansa stopped and looked at Cerenna, hoping she was joking. The girl’s face was serious. “What?” Sansa asked, unbelieving.

“And worse.” Cerenna sighed. She looked disgusted and angry at the same time. “She will marry one of his bastard sons. Not even a legitimate one.”

Sansa couldn’t believe what she heard. Joy Hill, married to a bastard of House Frey? “How strange?” Cerenna said on a mocking tone. “The Freys slaughter people at a wedding, they break the guest rights, imprison their liege lord, and not long after Lord Tywin grants Riverrun to the second son of Walder Frey, and my brother, my cousin Lancel and Joy all end up with betrothals to Freys.
And all that arranged by Lord Tywin. I find it strange to reward assassins and turncloaks.”

Sansa could see what Cerenna was trying to say. Of course, Lord Tywin never said to anyone in his family about his secret arrangements with Walder Frey and Roose Bolton, but it was easy to see through the marriages he arranged that he made a deal with the Lord of the Crossing. But it was dangerous ground. It probably wasn’t safe to talk directly against Tywin Lannister so little time after his death here in Casterly Rock. But Sansa wasn’t aware of all these arrangements the previous Lord of Casterly Rock made. He had betrothed two nephews and a niece to Freys, without even asking them first. Sansa shouldn’t be surprised. He didn’t tell Tyrion he organized her family’s slaughtering before it happened, nor did he give him a choice when they were married. Why would he bother about the wishes of nephews and nieces when he didn’t care about those of his own children? The two girls resumed their path.

“Lord Tywin is the one who arranged all these betrothals?” Sansa asked.

“Yes, that’s him. Soon I’ll be the sister-in-law of a stoat.”

The prospect didn’t ravish Cerenna Lannister at all. “Perhaps I could change that.”

Cerenna turned her head towards Sansa. “You think you could?”

“Perhaps,” Sansa repeated. “For now, they are only betrothals, we can break them. My own betrothal to the king was broken after the Battle of Blackwater. Lord Tyrion may be able to do something about that.”

“Daven would like that a lot,” Cerenna said with a huge smile. “Thank you.”

Sansa really thought they should do something about it. Joy seemed to be such an innocent girl. Sansa didn’t want her to end up married to a bastard son of Walder Frey. She didn’t know Daven Lannister, but she wasn’t eager all the same to have House Lannister linked with House Frey after what they did. She was the Lady of House Lannister now, and she had no wish to add connections between the house she was leading and the people who killed her mother and Robb.

As they walked something came up in Sansa’s mind. “Your father was the brother of Lady Joanna, Lord Tywin’s wife, wasn’t he?”

Cerenna looked surprised by the question. “Oh, yes. She was my aunt, but I never knew her. She died before I was born.”

“Your father never talked about her?” Sansa wanted to know more about Tyrion’s mother.

“Not very often. He was afraid to speak of her.”

Genna’s words came back to Sansa’s mind. After she died, Tywin had any image, picture, painting or tapestry of his wife removed from everywhere in Casterly Rock. He didn’t want to be reminded of her in any way. He forbade everyone to talk about her, even to mention her. She could imagine people fearing to disobey Tywin Lannister very easily, but surely they talked about her sometimes. You couldn’t control everything people were saying.

“You surely know a few things about her all the same.”

Cerenna looked at the roof, searching in her memories. “From the few times my father talked about her, she was very beautiful, very compassionate too, with very good manners. He also told us she was the main advisor of Lord Tywin and that they loved each other very deeply. He told us one day that Lord Tywin would have been ready to do anything for her, even start a war. But Tywin Lannister didn’t spend a lot of time with her apparently.”

“What do you mean?” Sansa found it strange.

“Lord Tywin was Hand of the King for most of their marriage. They even married in the Great Sept of Baelor in King’s Landing instead of here at Casterly Rock. But she was expelled from the capital not long after their wedding. She spent most of her time here in Casterly Rock while Lord Tywin spent most of his time in King’s Landing. He only visited her from time to time.”

“Why was she expelled? Who did this? The Mad King?” Sansa found it strange.

Cerenna hesitated. “It’s only rumors. We don’t know for sure.”

“There must be a reason,” Sansa insisted.

After another hesitation, Cerenna finally spoke. “Lady Joanna was a lady-in-waiting of Queen Rhaella for a very long time, long before she was married and even before Rhaella Targaryen became queen. Apparently, there were rumors in King’s Landing that… there had been something between her and Aerys. The Mad King.” Sansa couldn’t have been more surprised. Her facial expression surely showed it since Cerenna quickly resumed. “These were only rumors. My father didn’t believe them, and he didn’t think Lord Tywin would have married a woman with some… inappropriate relationship with someone else. Lord Tywin would never have married a disgraced woman. But my father said he was present at the wedding ceremony of my aunt. The Mad King said something about the fact it was a pity a king couldn’t bed any wife he wanted on her wedding night any longer and that he did some things to Lady Joanna during the bedding ceremony. And a few years later, she came back to King’s Landing for a tournament and there was another incident. The Mad King said something very improper about her. Lord Tywin even tried to resign as Hand of the King at this moment. She came back to Casterly Rock and died not long after. But my father told us the Mad King was known for desiring many women, including many of the queen’s ladies. Lord Tywin’s wife wasn’t the only one to be sent away from King’s Landing because of that. It was Queen Rhaella who sent her away.”

Sansa thought of Joffrey. That sounded like him. He really was a second Mad King. Who knew what he could have done to her if he had survived? Sansa was glad he was dead. Again she wished Tyrion’s mother had lived. Perhaps the Red Wedding would never have happened then. And perhaps she would have had someone who could have understood what she went through with Joffrey. The bad treatments Sansa endured in Joffrey’s hands weren’t so far from those Joanna Lannister seemed to have gone through.

They walked a long time along galleries and climbed many stairs, much more than Sansa had to climb to reach the rooms she shared with Tyrion. Finally they reached a simple wooden door at the top of spiral stairs. Sansa was gasping. The Tower of the Hand was easy to climb in comparison.

“You only have to enter,” Cerenna told her. “No need to knock. Creylen receives everyone anytime, though not many people come to see him I think. Have a good day, my lady.”

Cerenna bowed her head and went away, but before she was too far, Sansa called her. “Cerenna. Thank you.”

The Lannister girl turned to face her and smiled as she made another bow. Then Sansa was alone before the door. She wasn’t sure about the fact she should enter without being announced, but there were no servants on this side of the door. She entered without knocking like Cerenna told her. After all, she was the lady of the castle now, so she could see the maester and anywhere whenever she wanted. She wasn’t sure who she would meet. Tyrion seldom talked about the maester, only mentioning him. When Sansa came in, there was no one. A huge desk with a lone and big cushioned chair on one side occupied the center of the room, and many other chairs were on the opposite side of the desk where Sansa found herself. Shelves filled with books, vials and bottles covered the walls, and Sansa could hear the sound of ravens from above. Stairs at the back of the room seemed to lead to the rockery where they were kept. Sansa looked all around the room to see if there was someone, but no sign of life came out.

“Maester Creylen.” She said it loudly. Perhaps he was in the rockery.

“Excuse me.” A man emerged from an alcove Sansa didn’t notice on the left wall. He bowed deeply before her. “Lady Sansa. Welcome to Casterly Rock. Forgive me if I didn’t greet you immediately. I didn’t hear you enter. I beg you, take a seat.”

The maester indicated the chairs with his right arm. He went to sit on the huge one behind his desk. Sansa observed the maester as they both took place on opposite sides. He was old, but far less than Pycelle and probably less than maester Luwin, but only a few years younger. His hair wasn’t entirely grey yet, and he still moved quite nimbly. Sansa wondered why he had such a big chair when he was quite thin. Perhaps only for a question of comfort.

“I hope you enjoy your stay here up to now, my lady.”

“Yes, very much.” Sansa smiled to the old man. He didn’t seem to have any bad thought about her. “My husband surely told you why I’m here.”

“Oh yes, Tyrion told me.” He seized a few sheets of paper on a corner of his desk and put them before Sansa with ink and pen. “These are a few problems I would like you to solve. I’ll be able to know what kind of financial matters and notions I must teach you this way.”

Sansa felt like a little girl in maester Luwin’s study again, but she complied all the same. Tyrion was the one to organize this for her anyway. But she felt in some way humiliated all the same, sitting here and doing what a maester was telling her to do as if she was still a child. There were problems Sansa just couldn’t understand. She abandoned all the parts about the changing value of currencies after a moment. Tyrion had tried to explain her this concept during their travel, but without success. When she handed the completed exercises to Maester Creylen, it only took a few minutes to the old man to go through it.

“I’ve seen better,” he finally said. “But I’ve also seen far worse. You’ll need a few lessons with me during the next months, I’m afraid. But you’re far from being a desperate case like Jaime and Cersei.”

Sansa was quite puzzled by the mention of this. “What do you mean? Ser Jaime and Cersei weren’t good?”

Maester sighed and smiled sadly. “Not at all. Learning didn’t interest them. Jaime always wanted to be in the courtyards sparring with the master-at-arms and knights. He saw the moments he spent to learn with me as waste of time, even more since he had a problem to read. His mind was transposing the letters he read. It was Lord Tywin who managed to get him to learn reading by sitting with him four hours per day practicing. As for Cersei, she found my lessons boring and useless as well. She only dreamed to marry Rhaegar Targaryen and to become the queen, and nothing more. She didn’t find it useful. Tyrion was the only one of Lord Tywin’s children to ever be interested in the things I taught him.”

The old man looked like he was reminiscing. Sansa listened attentively. She didn’t know all these details about Tyrion, Ser Jaime and the former Queen Regent. “Tyrion could spend entire days with me. He couldn’t train in the yards, and Lord Tywin didn’t allow him to leave the castle, so he had no other choice than studying and reading. At six he was already more advanced than his brother and his sister who were ten at the same time. I started to teach him things we only taught to the maesters at the Citadel. And he learnt quickly, believe me. Sometimes he knew things even before I talked about them to him. He read a lot, and even began to write. I sent some of his works to the Citadel and I asked Lord Tywin to send him there to become a maester. I guess you know what answer I received.”

“He refused?”

“Yes, and several times. The last time I proposed this, Lord Tywin told the next time I suggested this eventuality, I would be the one he would send to the Citadel, and for good.” The old man chuckled bitterly. “Tyrion could have gone very far at the Citadel. He could have become Archmaester, even Grand Maester in time. My colleagues there with who I communicated were ready to welcome him with open arms. His size wouldn’t have mattered there, only his mind. But Lord Tywin refused. After a time Tyrion even considered becoming High Septon.”

Sansa had some difficulties to contain her surprise. “High Septon?” To imagine Tyrion as High Septon was very difficult for her. Tyrion didn’t believe in gods, and anyway he spent so much time with whores… That brought again painful memories and ideas to Sansa.

“Yes. He nearly learned the Seven-Pointed Star by heart. But he abandoned the idea after…” The maester seemed to hesitate, as if he just realized Sansa was present. He straightened into his chair. “Forgive me, my lady. The memories of an aging man. I would say you meet me each three days in the morning. I’ll prepare lessons and you’ll understand the financial principles in time. For the time being, I’ll show you again some basic notions.”

Creylen spent the rest of the afternoon teaching Sansa most of the things she learnt with Luwin during her last year at Winterfell. She realized she didn’t remember half of what the old and kind maester taught her in sums and figures during this time. Tyrion and Creylen were right. She needed an update on these matters. Why couldn’t she be good like Arya at this?

Sansa came back to her rooms, not without asking her way to a dozen of people. Would she need a map to find her way here? She finally got back to her chambers. She was exhausted. She wished she could have stayed in bed for the whole day. She called her handmaids and ordered them to prepare a bath. She felt like she needed one again. While the servants prepared everything, Sansa started to write a message. She took her time, trying to choose well her words. There was so much she wanted to say, and not enough place if she wanted the parchment to be carried by a raven. After half an hour and many crumpled scrolls, she thought she came with a passable result. The bath was now ready. Sansa got rid of her gown, her girdle and her smallclothes. The water was hot as she entered the bath. She commanded her handmaids to leave her alone and they brought her clothes to wash them. Just like yesterday, Sansa let herself drift away and closed her eyes. Warmth surrounded her body from toe to collarbone. She took deep breaths, calming herself after this day. She immersed her head more than once into the water, wetting her hair.

After some time, she decided to leave the bathtub and put on a dressing gown. When she left the bathroom and entered their bedchamber, she noticed Tyrion was sitting there, reading. She froze. Did he see her? Was he looking at her? He didn’t seem to notice her presence.

“Tyrion?” she croaked.

Her husband lifted his eyes from his book. “Sansa. I think it’s the first time I see you dressed this way,” he said with a smile.
Sansa looked at her body. “Don’t worry. I only meant that I never saw you with this kind of clothes, not that it displays your body more than usual. And before you wonder about it, I wasn’t looking at you. Well, except for the moment I entered here and found you in the bath with the door wide open, but I went to read afterwards. From where I am, I cannot see much of the bathtub and anyway your back was turned on me. I couldn’t see much more than what I see at night.”

Sansa had to recognize Tyrion was telling the truth. Her dressing gown covered all her body, perhaps more than the gowns she wore daily, and much more than her nightgowns. When she looked at the bathtub from Tyrion’s angle, she saw he said the truth too. Only a little corner of the bath could be seen from his position. At best he could see her left shoulder, which wasn’t much.

“What are you doing here? I didn’t hear you coming in.” How couldn’t she notice he was there?

Tyrion shrugged. “You looked half asleep. Perhaps that’s why you didn’t hear me. I didn’t want to bother you.” Sansa remembered she brought her head completely under water at some moments. Perhaps Tyrion entered at one of these times. “I didn’t look at you Sansa, I swear.”

Sansa turned towards him. He looked concerned about what she might think of him. “No, I know you didn’t. I’m sorry. I’m still acting like a little girl.” She wasn’t supposed to be afraid about her husband seeing her. It shouldn’t even bother her.

Tyrion scoffed. “I don’t think a little girl could manage to neutralize the Queen Regent and all her allies in a single trial, and to become the lady of two of the greatest castles in the Seven Kingdoms, all that within a few days.”

Sansa flushed. “I’ll go and take a change of clothes.”

She walked to the dressing room and called for her handmaidens. As she put on a gown she brought with her from King’s Landing, she couldn’t help but feel a little sad about the fact Tyrion didn’t look at her. She was glad he didn’t, because she didn’t feel ready for consummating their marriage, and it was proper for a husband to allow his wife some privacy, but at the same time she wished he would look at her with the same admiration he had during the trip. She remembered how his hands wandered on her this morning, and how it felt good. From what I’ve heard, he’s quite experienced. Margaery’s words came back to her mind. Was that what she meant? Sansa felt blood rising to her cheeks again. That was surely not that. Bedding was much more than that. Sansa shook suddenly for a very short moment at the thought of what it might be. She clearly wasn’t ready for that. And yet she wondered what it would feel like.

“My lady, are you alright?”

The voice of one of her handmaidens brought her back to life. This one was brushing her hair. Sansa probably shook too violently and the girl noticed it. “Yes, I am,” she answered shortly, and perhaps a bit too harsh. The girls didn’t dare to speak again.

Sansa went back to their bedchamber where Tyrion was waiting for her as the dinner was brought. She sat with him.

“How was your first day as Lady of the Rock?” he immediately asked.

“It was good. You were right, your aunt doesn’t bite, but she can be intimidating.”

Tyrion smiled at the remark. “What about the other ladies and Creylen? Everything went right with them.”

“Yes. Creylen was very… enthusiastic. And your cousins and your aunts were all very kind, except a few.”

“No, Cerenna was very kind. She even accompanied me to maester Creylen’s rooms afterwards. But yes, Myrielle made evil comments. Cerenna and I brought her back to order. Lanna was quite silent. I don’t know why.”

“Well, good thing for Myrielle and Cerenna. Lanna probably didn’t feel very well. She’s married to Lord Antario Jast. He was injured and captured by your brother’s men at Oxcross, then kept hostage at Pinkmaiden Castle by Lord Piper, one of your uncle’s bannermen. He was released not long after the Red Wedding, but he’s in a very bad state. Only a shadow of who he was before the war. He came back with us and barely spoke during the entire journey. Don’t be surprised if his wife is quite gloomy.”

Sansa thought she remembered Antario Jast. The sigil of House Jast was three golden lions on three black fields separated by yellow lines. A man in their convoy wore an armor with this sigil and Sansa remembered his eyes were hollow. It was probably Lord Jast. Sansa could understand Lady Lanna was reserved the whole time. Her husband didn’t die, but he came back broken from the war.

“I can talk to my cousin Myrielle about all this if you want,” Tyrion offered.

“No, that’s alright. I can handle her myself.” They continued to eat their main course essentially constituted of peas, carrots and chicken. “Tyrion, is it true there are marriages planned between Lannisters and Freys.”

Tyrion looked up at her from his plate. He nodded sadly. “I’m afraid it’s true. My father promised a lot of things to the Freys for their treachery. Emmon Frey, the husband of my aunt Genna, was granted Riverrun.”

“But it belongs to my uncle, Lord Edmure Tully!”

“Your uncle is kept prisoner by the Freys and a decree from Joffrey before my father died stripped him and House Tully from all their rights over Riverrun and the Riverlands. And they are still considered rebels since your granduncle Brynden holds Riverrun against the Crown. There is nothing I can do about it. Kevan is Hand of the King and he won’t annul previous decrees.” A silence lingered for some time between them. “My father also arranged a betrothal for Lancel. He was supposed to marry Amerei Frey and to rule the lands of Darry, but you made it quite impossible a few months ago. My cousin Daven must also marry a Frey, and Joy must marry a bastard son of Walder Frey.”

It was obvious Tyrion didn’t relish this prospect. Sansa neither. It was just like Cerenna told her. “You’re not going to allow this?”

Tyrion showed a pained expression. “That’s not easy. I hate and despise the Freys. Don’t think I like to be related to the Lord of the Crossing. We already have one of his sons here and even his wife hates him. I don’t really appreciate this uncle.” Sansa already knew it. Genna told her how she disliked to be married to Ser Emmon Frey. “But I can’t cancel betrothals made by my father without a good reason, or else there will be consequences. You remember what happened when your brother set aside Walder Frey’s daughter.”

Sansa didn’t need to reply. They both knew the answer. “Is there nothing we can do?”

“Now that Lancel was exiled to Quiet Isle, I can probably arrange Daven to marry Amerei Frey instead. That won’t break the agreement my father did, and there are worse women to marry among Walder Frey’s brood. That will make him Lord of Darry. I don’t want the castle and his lands to fall into the hands of someone else. As for Joy, she’s still very young. I can postpone the wedding for many years and find a way in the meantime to have her betrothal called off. And since she is a bastard supposed to marry a bastard, Walder Frey may not complain too much. This is not a marriage of utmost importance, even for him.”

Sansa was relieved. At least Joy wouldn’t marry a Frey. Tyrion changed of subject.

“You wrote to your brother.”

Sansa looked back at Tyrion, in surprise first, then angrily. “You read my message!” she said on an accusing tone.

Tyrion smiled mischievously. “I only read the name on it. It was on the desk. I was wondering to who you destined it. I was wondering when you would decide.”

Sansa averted her eyes. “We talked about him during the meal with all the Lannister ladies. I miss him. I hope he will answer.” Meeting Joy reminded of how unfair she had been with her half-brother. It was time she tried to mend her past mistakes, especially now he was her last kin alive.

“I’m sure he will.” Sansa could only see the same sincerity she always saw in his green eyes.

Chapter End Notes

Many new characters that I enjoyed to shape. I hope you liked it. Tell me what you think of my Lannisters (well, they’re not mine in fact, they all belong to George R. R. Martin, but you know what I mean).

Please review.

Next chapter: Tyrion
Tyrion XIV

Chapter Notes

A few weeks after Tyrion and Sansa settled at Casterly Rock. Life goes on, and the game of thrones goes on too.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TYRION XIV

- Tyrion was walking along the docks of Lannisport, looking at the warships under construction. The shipyards of Casterly Rock and Lannisport started to expand the Lannister fleet not long after he became Lord of Casterly Rock. The Redwyne fleet was still on its way to King’s Landing in order to launch a decisive strike against Dragonstone. Or perhaps they already arrived and started the siege of the island. Dragonstone was heavily defended, still held by five thousand men under the command of one of the best battle commanders in Westeros. The Redwyne fleet would need some time before they could claim the fortress for Tommen. Everywhere it was the same thing. The Blackfish held Riverrun against the combined forces of Freys, Lannisters and Riverlands lords who sided with the Crown after the Red Wedding. Storm’s End held against the Tyrell army. And now Dragonstone would hold against the Redwyne fleet. All Tommen’s opponents were defeated or too weak to hope for any victory against him, but they still resisted.

Tyrion had no problem to let the Tyrells exhaust themselves at Storm’s End after Mace Tyrell proclaimed him guilty at his trial. However, the siege of Riverrun was draining forces from both the Riverlands and the Westerlands at the very moment the weather was getting worse. Winter was coming. It was no time to fight, especially not in the Riverlands, ravaged by the war, where people should prepare for winter the best they could at this very moment. But the Blackfish was too obstinate and refused to surrender the castle. Not that Tyrion would blame him after what happened at the Twins. The Freys and the Lannisters murdered his niece. As for the forces besieging the castle, there were quarrels between the Freys and the river lords all the time, and a few between the Lannisters and the river lords too. Tyrion’s cousin, Daven, who led the Lannister forces there, asked for reinforcements to take the castle, but Tyrion refused. He wouldn’t send more Westermen to die uselessly in this stupid war. He wrote back to his cousin to tell the Freys they were welcome to storm the castle on their own if they wished. Perhaps their own people who died would be some compensation for their betrayal.

What bothered Tyrion the most was the time needed to seize Dragonstone. Without the Redwyne fleet, they were vulnerable to the attacks from the Iron Islands. They could launch an offensive against Lannisport as they often did in the past. The Lannister fleet wasn’t strong enough to hold the Ironborn, and even less to defeat them on its own. That’s why Tyrion decided to double the size of the fleet. Soon, Lannisport and Casterly Rock would dispose of fifty warships together, but Tyrion knew it wouldn’t be enough to stop a massive Ironborn attack. The Iron Fleet alone consisted of a hundred ships, and it didn’t consider the smaller fleets the major lords of each island could muster. If the Iron Islands decided to attack in full strength, they would outnumber the Lannister fleet ten to one. However, Tyrion preferred to be prepared to all scenarios. The increased fleet could repel minor attacks and give them time before the Redwyne fleet arrived, and they could even launch a successful quick strike on the Iron Islands if need be. The Ironmen may be surprised then and unable to react before it was too late.

Tyrion wondered why Balon Greyjoy didn’t attack Lannisport before. Instead he only launched limited invasions on the North, a territory without much to steal. Of course, this way he had no problem with the stronger kingdoms, but still. He didn’t get much for his people. The King of the Iron Islands seemed to have more courage than brain. By proclaiming himself king, he rebelled against the Iron Throne and surely knew that, sooner or later, he would be crushed by the Seven Kingdoms. Though Tyrion had to admit the fact his islands were still untouched proved his strategy wasn’t completely unwise. He attacked Robb Stark, leading the southern kingdoms to let him quiet since he made life more difficult for the Young Wolf. And now, they were so focused on Stannis and the Riverlands that they didn’t worry about the Ironmen. The Greyjoys could reave all they wanted without being bothered for now. However, once Dragonstone was taken, then the combined naval forces of the Arbor and the Westerlands would attack the Iron Islands and most likely defeat Balon Greyjoy again. What would they do this time to make him understand he shouldn’t rebel? With Theon Greyjoy who died at Winterfell, his three sons were dead, but he still had a daughter, Yara Greyjoy. Perhaps they could marry her to a son of some lord of the Reach or the Westerlands. Tyrion thought Lord Farman of Faircastle had two sons. He may marry her to one of these and the Iron Islands would end in the hands of one of his bannermen.

Hundreds of men were working on these new ships. The work was advancing, but slower than Tyrion hoped. The supervisor of the dockyard told him they had difficulties to find enough materials and enough men with the number who left for the war. The construction would be totally over in two months. That wouldn’t be too soon. Tyrion went back to his litter and ordered the servants to bring him back to Casterly Rock.

Tyrion faced many problems since he came back to the Rock. First, he discovered during the first week following their arrival that House Lannister wasn’t rich as he thought it was. The mining slowed down during the last years and House Lannister mined half the gold it once mined. Their position as richest house in the Seven Kingdoms wasn’t threatened for now. They had more than ten million golden dragons in store in their vaults under the Rock, plus a few millions lent to the Crown and that would bring interests once they would get it back… if they ever got it back. The finances of the Crown were in such a sorry state when Tyrion left that he feared Tommen may not be able to return the gold House Lannister lent to his father and his brother before him. What worried Tyrion was that many mines were now dried. From what Tyrion could conclude from his research, it was a consequence of his grandfather’s actions for some part. Lord Tytos neglected to search for new veins to exploit during his reign, and it took a few years to his father after he became the Lord of Casterly Rock to resume the searching. The destruction of Castamere and its mines didn’t help either. He was probably too busy ruling the Seven Kingdoms for a mad king. Tyrion already increased the research for new veins to exploit, but it would take time to find them. In the meantime, House Lannister had lower revenues and Tyrion would have to watch out the expenses of his house more carefully. He also had a plan to find other income sources in short term.

He looked through the curtains of his litter at the Rock. It was his home, where he grew up, and sometimes he was still impressed by its greatness. House Lannister had become the most powerful house of Westeros under his father’s rule, and Tyrion didn’t want it to change. Casterly Rock had to be an image of the real power of their house. And Tyrion didn’t want the Tyrells to be the leading family in Westeros.

Tyrion’s thoughts turned to the North. Last week, he started to send delegates everywhere in this kingdom. At Barrowtown, at Cerwyn, at Widow’s Watch, at Deepwood Motte, at Karhold, at White Harbor, in Bear Island, at the Last Hearth, and even at the Dreadfort and Winterfell. The news of the victory of House Bolton over the Ironmen holding Moat Cailin had reached Casterly Rock last week, and Tyrion decided immediately to send men there. They would represent the interest of House Stark, Sansa being the last Stark alive. But Tyrion also sent spies to learn what they could about House Bolton and their position. It would be useful when the time would come to give the North back to Sansa. Tyrion didn’t expect the Boltons to willingly abandon their rule over the widest of the Seven Kingdoms. They needed to gather information, to know the military strength of House Bolton, its allies, its enemies, its weaknesses, its leaders. Tyrion needed to know what kind of men Roose Bolton and his lieutenants were.

Sansa was aware of that. Tyrion told his agents to direct all their messages to both of them. Sansa was the Lady of Winterfell after all, the true heir to the North. Roose Bolton was Warden of the North only until Sansa had a child at age. Or at least in theory. Tyrion hoped he would be able to send their son to Winterfell and to name people loyal to House Stark to rule the North in its name. First however, he would need a son with Sansa, even two since the first would be heir to Casterly Rock. The second would receive Winterfell. And for now, Tyrion wasn’t about to have a son with his wife. Three weeks after they arrived at Casterly Rock, and many months after their wedding, their marriage still remained unconsummated.

Sansa managed to find herself a good place in Casterly Rock. Most of Tyrion’s kin accepted her now, though sometimes with some reserve, and Sansa was obeyed without discussion by their household and everyone else at the Rock. Tyrion visited Lannisport with her a few days ago and everything went quite well. The common people didn’t trust her entirely since she was a Stark and her brother plundered the Westerlands, but it was also the first time in more than thirty years they had a Lady of the Westerlands. People were excited about this and most of them welcomed Sansa quite warmly. Anyway, with her red hair, her blue eyes and the lavish gowns she wore, it was difficult for people to see in her the sister of the Young Wolf. People liked to have a lady, and a beautiful one moreover, to love. Sansa already had some plans about what she could do for the people in Lannisport, getting her inspiration from the way Margaery put the people of King’s Landing on her side. Tyrion had nothing against it, far from it.

Sansa was however quite anxious since she sent her message to the Wall. She waited impatiently for her brother Jon to answer. She already wondered why she didn’t get an answer yet. For Tyrion, there was no surprise in this. A raven took some time to fly from the Rock to the Wall, and Jon Snow wasn’t necessarily at Castleblack where the raven was sent. Tyrion didn’t know what happened to Ned Stark’s bastard after he visited the Wall. The boy could be at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea or at the Shadow Tower. If he became a ranger, which was more than possible, he could be on an expedition north of the Wall. There was also another possibility of course, but Tyrion hoped it wasn’t the case. The last brother of Sansa could be dead. They received messages before and after the Battle of Blackwater that Mance Rayder, the King-Beyond-the-Wall, was marching on the Wall… followed by other things. Tyrion wished he could send reinforcements to the Wall, but they were blocked by the sieges of Riverrun and Dragonstone, and by the threat of the Iron Islands. And he didn’t think Kevan would believe him if he started to talk about wights and White Walkers. Tyrion himself still hardly believed it. And Tyrion didn’t want to talk about it to Sansa. She was already afraid enough before the possibility that her brother could be dead. It was no time to talk to her about Others. Tyrion was better to reassure her that her brother was surely still alive and needed time to answer for a reason or another.

Thinking of Sansa brought back a memory from the other night. Tyrion had woken up in the middle of the night. That wasn’t unusual and he went to read as he did most of the time when it happened, making sure he didn’t wake up his wife as he lifted her arm resting on his belly. However, as he read, he noticed Sansa rolled in the bed during her sleep and said his name. “Tyrion.” Tyrion thought he just imagined it the first time, but she repeated it a few times afterwards. He didn’t think all these times were an effect of his imagination. His relationship with Sansa didn’t really get much farther since they arrived at Casterly Rock, but he could feel his wife trusted him. The proof was she always let the door opened when she took a bath. Tyrion told her once she could close it and that was the reason there was a door, but Sansa replied she wasn’t bothered by it at all. As a result, it happened a few times that Tyrion entered their rooms while Sansa washed herself and he had to make a very strong effort to not look at her. At least, her back was always turned on him, so all he could see were her arms, the back of her head, her shoulders and the very upper part of her back. He couldn’t see anything else. All the same, it troubled him to see her with water running on her ivory skin, knowing she was naked right in the next room. He only had to enter the bathroom and get around it to see her naked body. Tyrion wondered how she looked like. But he didn’t dare to do it. He didn’t want to upset Sansa, and he swore he would never do anything she wouldn’t want him to do.

They reached the Lion’s Mouth and entered the main courtyard. Tyrion left his litter and walked toward his rooms, followed by Podrick. Tyrion thought more than once to have the boy knighted. Only for saving his life at Blackwater, Podrick deserved it, but Tyrion didn’t want to get separated from such a loyal squire. Podrick was still very young. Tyrion thought about keeping him a year or two, then to knight him, along with a huge bag of gold to thank him for years of more than loyal service. Podrick went to fetch his clothes for the afternoon. Today would be the ceremony where all his bannermen would pledge themselves to him, like they pledged their banners to his father when he became Lord of Casterly Rock. All the lords and the ladies of the Westerlands would bend the knee before him and Sansa. They were already recognized by the Crown in a lavish ceremony, now they would be recognized by another lavish ceremony here in the Westerlands, with all their bannermen present. Genna prepared most of it, knowing more than Sansa how to make an appropriate ceremony for the Westerlands, but Sansa had a word to say in everything all the same. Tyrion secretly added a few elements Sansa wasn’t aware of.

When Tyrion pushed the heavy doors, he heard giggles coming from another room. “No, I don’t think that will do.”

“Are you sure? It’s probably the most costly gown I’ve ever seen.”

“Believe me, Sansa, I saw more costly gowns in my wife. Though not many. And I’m afraid you’re not yet used to this. You will collapse with so many jewels on you.”

Tyrion followed the voices. They were coming from the dressing room whose door was ajar. He opened it. Sansa was with his cousin Cerenna Lannister, looking at many gowns spread out on chairs and tables. “Am I interrupting something?” he asked before their gazes upon him as he came in.

Cerenna curtsied. “My lord.”

“Cerenna was just helping to choose a gown for today’s ceremony,” Sansa explained.

“Then I’ll leave you to your choosing. Perhaps I should have specified the dressmakers to not make so many gowns so quickly when I sent your measurements. The choice would be less complicated,” he said with a smirk and left.

“He may be right,” he heard Sansa say to Cerenna. “I receive a new gown every day or more. How will I ever be able to wear all of them one day?” His wife sounded discouraged.

Tyrion went to the bathroom where Podrick arrived a few minutes later with fresh and clean garments along with many servants who filled the bathtub with hot water. Tyrion took a quick bath, the door closed. To the opposite of Sansa, he didn’t let it open. Anyway, that wasn’t as if there would be anything interesting or beautiful for Sansa to look at. Soon he was ready for the ceremony, much in advance. Tyrion went to the solar to work on his house’s accounts until Sansa was ready. About an hour and a half later, Sansa came in, wearing a red gown with a silver waistband. The red was deep and close to purple, with golden stripes at the bottom part of the gown. The gown only allowed her throat and her collarbone to be displayed under her chin. Tyrion knew Sansa preferred gowns that didn’t reveal too much of her body, so he gave special instructions to the dressmakers to make sure her gowns would respect this constraint. She also had her lion-direwolf necklace and the red medallion that belonged to the Lady of Casterly Rock around her neck. Her red hair was braided in a very complicated way and held thanks to a golden hairnet. She was smiling at him.

“How do you find me?”

Tyrion did as if he reflected about the question for a moment. “I think my cousin has very good tastes. And you’re breathtaking, as always.” Tyrion rose from his seat and extended his hand. “Shall we?”

Sansa took his hand in hers and they walked together out. The ceremony was to take place in the Great Hall where all the noble people would bend the knee to them. Brienne accompanied them, Sansa’s sworn shield as always, clad in full armor. She was still Sansa’s protector here, though Sansa didn’t need much protection inside Casterly Rock. Tyrion and Sansa entered the Great Hall from a backside door only them could use and walked toward the two thrones on the dais. The Kings and Queens of the Rock used to sit in them before the Targaryen Conquest, but now it was the Lord and the Lady of Casterly Rock who did. The thrones were as huge as the Iron Throne, but made of gold with a lion’s head at the top of their backrest and armchairs that looked like lion paws. Tyrion sat in the throne intended for the Lord of Casterly Rock and Sansa did the same for the one intended for the Lady on his left. Tyrion showed her the room and its thrones a week ago as workers prepared it for this day. Tyrion regretted Sansa’s throne was smaller than his own (which was quite absurd since she was the tall one), but he couldn’t enlarge the seat of the Lady of Casterly Rock or replace it.
Brienne stood aside the dais like a kingsguard guarding her king. She would make a better kingsguard than most of the actual ones.

There were three people supposed to stand still on the dais behind Tyrion and Sansa for this ceremony. These people were supposed to represent House Lannister and most of the time they were important figures here at Casterly Rock. Tyrion’s aunt, Lady Genna Frey, would stand behind them in the space between the two thrones. Everyone knew the power she held here despite the fact she was a woman. Kevan and Jaime would have taken place on the dais as well if they were present.
Since they weren’t, his cousin Damion, castellan of Casterly Rock, stood on his right, and Lady Darlessa Marbrand, the widow of his uncle Tygett, stood at Sansa’s left. She didn’t have much power or influence in the Rock, but Tyrion had wanted her there. His uncle Tygett was always kind with him, and he felt he owed some kindness to his aunt after she lost both her husband to the pox and more recently her only son, Tyrek, in the riot of King’s Landing. Anyway, Dorna wasn’t interested in being on the dais, which made Lady Darlessa the closest relative to Tywin Lannister present at Casterly Rock except Genna and Tyrion.

Tyrion looked at Sansa. She sat graciously in her throne, her back straight and her hands folded on her thighs, as if the throne was made for her. She maintained a perfect posture. She caught Tyrion’s eyes and smiled thinly at him. Genna, Damion and Darlessa all arrived during the next few minutes.
And the doors opened.

Lords, Ladies and knights had come from all the Westerlands to acknowledge Tyrion and Sansa as their lord and lady and pledge themselves and their family to their new liege lord and lady. Most of the people wore costly garments and gowns and competed in displayed wealth. Tyrion knew some of them were drowning into debts, even more than usually because of the war, but they would spend fortunes in buying new costly clothes all the same for events like this one to not look humble. The herald hit the floor heavily with a massive stick made of gold, displaying a lion’s head on the extremity that didn’t touch the floor. There were three knocks before the man presented them with a very strong and grave voice.
“Here stand before us Lord Tyrion, son of Tywin, of House Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands and Warden of the West. And his wife, Lady Sansa Lannister of House Stark, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands and Lady of Winterfell.”

Every man knelt and every woman curtsied. From the corner of his eye, Tyrion observed Sansa. She remained impassive, her face expressionless. She was very good at it. A true lady, like always.

“My lords, my ladies, you may stand,” Tyrion said, giving the leave to everyone to stand up, which they did.

The herald took a great scroll from his belt and unrolled it, beginning to read loudly. “Lord Desmond Crakehall of Crakehall.”

The man who mocked him so long ago in the gardens of King’s Landing now knelt before him and Sansa and pledged himself to them. Tyrion recognized many of the people who knelt, though some of his bannermen didn’t have the same lord anymore after the war. Many died during the battles in the Riverlands, in the Westerlands and at King’s Landing. The names went on and on. Lords, ladies and landed knights passed before him and his wife, all saying approximately the same thing. Tyrion and Sansa accepted their pledge. Sometimes, Tyrion let Sansa accept the pledge herself, to show to all these lords she participated in the ruling of the Westerlands and wasn’t to be mocked. She always granted them a smile after they accepted their pledge.

Tyrion’s friend proved to be quite humorous when he bent the knee. He feigned to refuse to kneel (or he really didn’t want to kneel) and Tyrion had to remind him he owed his keep, previously Clegane’s Keep, to him. Finally he bent the knee with a wide grin. The other noble people weren’t happy to see Bronn among them. In their eyes, he was an up-jumped sellsword, but Tyrion didn’t care about it. Bronn served him well and he would prove a much better landed knight than the Mountain. Lady Alysanne Lefford of the Golden Tooth was the last one to pledge her house to Tyrion and Sansa. When they were done with the endless list of noble men and women, the herald proclaimed their titles again and their bannermen bent the knee just like the first time. Tyrion and Sansa rose from their thrones and walked to the great doors through an alley guards made sure to be free of people. Genna, Damion and Darlessa followed them, then all the lords, ladies and knights who were present. They went to the Golden Gallery where a feast took place.

Tyrion’s family was far richer than the Crown, and yet the feast was far less costly and extravagant than the royal wedding. With five courses, it was a humble meal compared to those they took in King’s Landing. Tyrion had his aunt Genna on his right while Sansa had Damion on her left. Most of his family members sat on the dais with them. Many toasts were made, essentially to him and Sansa, but also to the end of the war, to the reconstruction of the Westerlands, to the king, and to his dead father. When they got through all the courses, time to dance came.

Sansa went to dance as he stayed behind, just like when they were recognized by Joffrey. Tyrion mostly found himself alone and without much wine. Sansa gave orders so the servants wouldn’t bring him more than she thought was acceptable. However, Tyrion wasn’t really alone. While lords and knights fought to dance with their new lady, lords, knights and ladies all found a moment to talk to him. All his relatives came to congratulate him and Sansa, from Dorna to Joy. Tyrion and Sansa forced Genna to let Gerion’s daughter participate to the feast. Tyrion had a very long discussion with Joy. She seemed to like Sansa very much. Lady Lefford was very courteous and offered him her deepest condolences for his father’s death. Tyrion offered in return his own condolences for the death of her father, Leo Lefford. Ryman Sarwyck proved to be quite a good man to discuss with. He lost all his cousins because of Cersei’s ruthlessness and became Lord of Riverspring because of that. He never wanted to be a lord. This man was the same kind than Ser Addam Marbrand. Lord Damon discussed with Tyrion about his son still in King’s Landing. Lord Westerling came to present his apologies for siding with Robb Stark during the war. Finally, Bronn came with a young woman looking all around her in wonderment.

“Hi, my friend. Lacking some wine?” He put a jug right before Tyrion who immediately filled his cup.

“My wife won’t be happy,” Tyrion commented as he took a sip. It was good.

As he drank his cup, Bronn leaned against the table while the girl accompanying him went to sit right next to Tyrion. The former sellsword could wear noble clothes, but that didn’t change his behaviour. Tyrion didn’t recognize the girl Bronn came with immediately, but after a moment he saw under the rich garments who she was.

“Daisy!” The young woman smiled widely at him. Tyrion looked at Bronn. “How does it come she’s with you.”

Bonn shrugged. “You’re not the only one who needs a woman. I brought her with me to Clegane’s Keep when I left the capital. I enjoy her company very much. And she likes the new Blackwater Keep very much.”

“It is a pleasure to see you again, my lord.”

Daisy looked quite enthusiastic about being here. She had to be. It wasn’t all days that a girl went from whore to public companion of a landed knight. Bronn could allow himself this kind of things. Shae never had the same chance than Daisy. The thought of his former lover brought a pang in Tyrion’s heart. He realized Bronn’s companion sat in Sansa’s seat.

“You shouldn’t sit there, my lady. This is the seat of my wife.”

Daisy seemed excited by hearing her being called a lady. She didn’t seem to have understood. “Daisy,” Bronn said before Tyrion could, “this is the chair of the Lady of this rock, not yours. You must leave it.”

With a disappointed look, Daisy left Sansa’s seat and went to sit to Tyrion’s right instead.

“So,” Bronn resumed, “how is it going for our Lord Imp?”

“Many problems, but much less than in King’s Landing. I feel free here. What about you in Clegane’s Keep? You sent me no news after you seized it.”

“It’s Blackwater Keep now,” Bronn corrected. “And I didn’t need to send you any raven since there was no problem. The peasants and the household welcomed us with open arms after Clegane’s cruelty. I’m making many changes to the place right now. It should become a good place to live in a few weeks.”

“Yes, Bronn,” Daisy intervened. “I’m very eager about our new bedchamber.”
Bronn grinned at the comment. Tyrion looked closely at the girl. She had her eyes locked on Bronn as if he was the most fantastic man in the world. It was as if she had fallen in love with him. Tyrion hoped it wouldn’t end badly for her. Tyrion only met one whore in his life who fell in love, and he lost her. Would Bronn take care of her? Tyrion wasn’t sure.

“Well, here are two people I never met before.” Genna appeared right before them with her powerful voice. Tyrion quickly made the presentations.

“Ser Bronn, Daisy, I present you my aunt, Lady Genna Frey, Lady of Riverrun and sister of my father, Lord Tywin. Genna, this is Ser Bronn, knight of Blackwater and now the knight ruling Ser Gregor’s previous lands.”

“Ah, yes. I know who you are. You’re the sellsword who burnt half of Stannis’s fleet with an arrow and got us rid of the Mountain.”

“Not really,” Bronn specified. “I got rid of the Mountain’s men, not the Mountain. Prince Oberyn did much of the job before he died. My men only had to finish him.”

Genna eyed him suspiciously. After a moment, she spoke again. “Well, I guess if my nephew gave you these lands, he had good reasons. He knows how to surround himself with useful people. And you don’t seem mad like Ser Gregor. It will make some good to have one less mad dog in the Westerlands. But you didn’t present me your friend.”

Genna looked at Daisy who didn’t seem to know what to say. She rose from her chair and curtsied awkwardly before Genna. Bronn tried to come to her rescue. “This girl’s name is Daisy. She is my paramour.”

Genna looked at Daisy, then to Bronn. “Your paramour?” She peered the girl disapprovingly. Genna knew who she was. Daisy had her eyes cast down.

“There’s nothing unnatural in that,” Bronn said. “How many of you nobles sleep at least once in your life with someone you’re not married to?” Genna looked at him hostilily. Bronn seemed to regret what he just said. He couldn’t talk to Genna like he talked to Tyrion. “In Dorne they live openly with their paramours and no one talks against it.”

“We are not in Dorne,” Genna said icily.

“Too bad,” Bronn said with regret. He turned to the young woman at Tyrion’s right. “Come on beauty. Let’s dance.”

Daisy and Bronn left, leaving Tyrion alone with his aunt. He didn’t expect to like the conversation that would follow.

“This is the kind of men you work with?” she asked with reproach in her voice.

Tyrion put his emptied cup on the table. “You would rather have talked to the Mountain instead?”

“The Mountain didn’t talk,” his aunt replied. “You should find people with more manners.”

“He’s useful. He saved Sansa’s life and mine many times, and he’s loyal to me. If you would rather have Clegane, just tell me.”

“Clegane was useful.”

“Just like Bronn. Only Bronn isn’t a mad dog.”
Genna had nothing to reply to this. She allowed a thin smile on her lips. “I guess I can trust you on this then. Only he shouldn’t bring this whore with him.”

“This whore has a name,” counted Tyrion, “and I can’t just expel Daisy when she accompanies one of my landed knights. I don’t think it causes any damage to our house anyway.”

Genna came to sit on his right, where Daisy sat a moment ago. “You must be careful, Tyrion. My father made a candlemaker’s daughter a Lady of Casterly Rock in all but name and people laughed at us for this reason.”

“Sansa is no candlemaker’s daughter. She comes from the most ancient noble family of Westeros,” Tyrion stated firmly. “I stopped visiting whores after I was wed to Sansa. As for my wife, she is the virtue personified. And if Clegane didn’t make us look like monsters, then I don’t think Bronn will make us look like weak people or whoremongers.”

Genna nodded, conceding. “There is something I must talk with you Tyrion. You’ve been acknowledged by the king, by the other lords paramount and now by your own bannermen as Lord of Casterly Rock and of the Westerlands. Your position is secured for the time being. But without an heir, your authority may be questioned with time and the succession may pose a problem.”

Tyrion sighed and filled his cup of wine again. “I don’t want to discuss about it, Genna. I won’t force myself upon my wife.”

“You wouldn’t force yourself upon her. I spent enough time with her during the last weeks to see that she appreciates and likes you. You only have to ask her to perform her duty as your wife and she’ll do it without opposition. I would be surprised if she didn’t want to.”

Tyrion took a good sip from his cup. “You know perfectly well that all the ladies in the Seven Kingdoms are taught to obey their husband without question. If I ask her, it’s the same thing than if I ordered her. I would force myself upon her. I won’t do it as long as she doesn’t want me to. That will be her decision, not mine.”

Genna seemed to understand there was no way to convince him to hasten the consummation of his marriage. Tyrion would never force himself again on a woman, and even less on the woman he loved. Genna left and went to dance with some knight Tyrion didn’t know. Not long after, Sansa emerged from the dance floor and came to sit beside him, out of breath.

“You liked the dance?” Tyrion asked.

“Yes, but I’m done for this evening.” She looked at the jug of wine before him. “I see Bronn helped you,” she said on a reproachful tone.

“I didn’t ask for this, but I don’t complain.”

“Did you ask for Daisy?” Tyrion looked back at her, seeing anger in her eyes.

“What do you mean?”

“I recognized her. She’s the whore who testified at the trial. What is she doing here? And what was she doing sitting next to you?”

It dawned on Tyrion. She thought he asked Bronn to bring her here. Tyrion smiled. “Bronn brought her with him to Clegane’s Keep. She’s only accompanying him. I have nothing to see with her presence. I didn’t even know she was with him until a few minutes ago.”
“She was sitting next to you,” Sansa repeated on an accusing tone. “Is she the only one?”

Tyrion looked at her in utter surprise and incomprehension. “Sansa, I haven’t visited a whore, nor been with any woman since we were married. I told you. I swear this is the truth.”

Sansa looked at him with a strange expression, as if she didn’t know if she should believe him or not. Before she could speak again, a man with a broken nose and a grey, close-shaven beard came before them. Tyrion recognized the sigil immediately. House Spicer of Castamere.

“My lord, my lady,” Rolph Spicer said while bowing to each of them. “I wanted to congratulate you personally for being the new Lord of the Westerlands, and you too my lady.”

Sansa had directed her attention to the man. Her face showed no emotion, but her eyes were another matter. They were throwing lightings in the direction of the man for whoever could read them. He was the brother of Lady Sybell Westerling. Both were traitors who joined Sansa’s brothers only to spy on him and turn against him at the last moment. They played an important role in the preparation of the Red Wedding.

“We thank you, Lord Spicer,” Sansa answered with a measured voice. Her eyes were still throwing daggers however. Rolph Spicer turned to Tyrion.

“My lord, your lord father, the late Lord Tywin, granted me the siege of Castamere with all its incomes and lands, but I have several problems in reopening the mines and the castle. There aren’t many people who live on these lands right now, so I have very few workers, and the other lords refuse to lend me money to pay the actual workers. I was wondering if House Lannister would be disposed to lend us the necessary amounts and we would pay back when the mines worked again.”

It was no surprise Lord Spicer couldn’t get loans from other lords. Tyrion sent them instructions to refuse any help to the Lord of Castamere, remembering them what happened to the last people who helped a Lord of Castamere. Tyrion wasn’t about to let the Spicers, these turncloaks, become rich thanks to the silver and the gold of Castamere. Not after what they did to Sansa’s family.

“I’m ready to help you, Lord Spicer,” Tyrion began. “I will lend you enough money. Even better, I won’t charge you any interest.”

Rolph Spicer seemed quite surprised and happy with this new. “I thank you, my lord,” he said with a zealous voice. “House Spicer will never forget the help you provided us in these times of need.”

“I’m sure you won’t,” Tyrion said with a wicked smile. “There will be no interest, but you will give three quarters of all the gold and silver you extract from these mines to Casterly Rock, from this day to the end of all time.”

Lord was agape before him. “But… My lord. That’s impossible. Lord Tywin promised us…”

“He promised you Castamere and all its lands and incomes, nothing more. But if you can’t get incomes from these lands on your own and you need the help of someone else, I don’t see why I should just give you more than you were promised without being compensated.”

“This is outrageous! I will not accept that deal. Never!”

“Then you will live in a castle in ruins. I don’t think the family of your dear sister has the means to finance the reconstruction of Castamere and its mines. And even if you found enough money, I think a golden dragon to each of your workers would be more than enough to convince them to abandon the work. So whether you accept my offer, or else you end even worse than your sister’s husband. Consider I let you a quarter of what you extract. That could be far worse.”
The new lord was agape before Tyrion’s words. And angry. Very angry. “You can’t do this. We served House Lannister. We helped you. You have no right...”

“I have every right,” Tyrion corrected. “And remember you participated in the assassination of people very close to my wife. You helped to murder the brother and the mother of the Lady of the Westerlands. I would feel lucky in your stead that we forget the debt we owe you for this.” Tyrion turned to Sansa who still looked at Rolph Spicer in obvious hatred. Tyrion realized the music was over and people had stopped to dance. The floor was being cleared. He clapped his hands. “A song for Lord Rolph Spicer of Castamere.”

Immediately they came. The young woman who sang at Joffrey’s wedding and who Sansa liked very much came with her bard. Tyrion invited them for this ceremony. Sansa looked at him in utter surprise. The song began. Rolph Spicer turned white at the very moment he heard the first words.

And who are you, the proud lord said

That I must bow so low?

Only a cat of a different coat

That’s all the truth I know

In a coat of gold or a coat of red

A lion still has claws

And mine are long and sharp, my lord

As long and sharp as yours

And so he spoke, and so he spoke

That lord of Castamere,

But now the rains weep o'er his hall

With no one there to hear

Yes, now the rains weep o'er his hall

And not a soul to hear

And so he spoke, and so he spoke

That lord of Castamere

But now the rains weep o'er his hall

With no one there to hear

Yes, now the rains weep o'er his hall
At the end of the song, there was a huge silence, but someone finally started to applaud and everyone followed and cheered the singer and her bard. Rolph Spicer went back to his seat white as snow. The young woman then sang many other songs, most of them much more cheerful. Sansa couldn’t detach her attention from her, except between two songs when she looked at Tyrion with glittering eyes. Tyrion didn’t know how much time they remained here listening, but finally the singer withdrew. Tyrion left the Golden Gallery with Sansa not long after. They were both exhausted from the feast and needed rest.

“You didn’t tell me about the singer,” Sansa told him as they walked to their rooms.

Tyrion smiled to himself. Sansa had told him back in the capital how she had liked the different versions of the songs the young woman performed at Joffrey’s wedding. In fact, Tyrion had planned everything for Rolph Spicer. He wouldn’t execute him or strip him of anything. His father promised him Castamere and its lands, and a Lannister always pays his debts. However, no promise was made about helping the Spicers to exploit Castamere mines. If they needed help from Casterly Rock, Tyrion could make sure the Spicers would be deprived of a great share of their riches. A Lannister always pays his debts, but nothing more. And to take a great part of their future wealth to the Spicers was a good way to make them understand what they got from betraying their liege lord, then their king. At the same time, Tyrion improved the financial situation of Casterly Rock for the future. The mines of Castamere were still full of gold and silver, and they would raise new incomes for House Lannister. Rolph Spicer would think twice before doing anything foolish after he heard The Rains of Castamere. It was a chance the floor was cleared right at the moment the new lord came to speak with them. Tyrion would have sent someone to fetch the lord, and called the singer at the same time, but finally he didn’t need it. Sansa was aware of his plans for the Spicers and the song, but she didn’t know the singer who would perform it. That was Tyrion’s surprise.

“You told me you liked her,” Tyrion said. “I thought you would appreciate to hear her again.”

“Thank you.” Sansa smiled at him, but her smile faded not long after. “I’m sorry for my outburst. I thought that… Well, because of what she is… The girl Bronn came with.”

Tyrion knew what she meant. “If it really bothers you, I can tell Bronn to not bring her again to formal events.”

“No, that’s alright. It’s just, for a moment, I thought… She sat next to you.”

Tyrion shook his head while chuckling a little. “She doesn’t know what is appropriate or not among noble people. Her two short times in the Red Keep didn’t really help her to become familiar with it. I told her to change of place when I noticed it. Sorry for all this. She wasn’t here for me.”

Tyrion shouldn’t be surprised Sansa thought he might visit whores again. After all, they spent most of their days in different places and Tyrion often woke up before her, though it happened much less than before. Nights were the longest moments he spent with his wife and he was sad in some way each time they had to go separate ways in the morning. All the same, Sansa probably wondered if he went sometimes to see whores, even if Tyrion really stopped to see other women after their wedding.

“I think it’s time to sleep,” Tyrion finally said, exhausted. Sansa nodded in agreement and went to change her clothes in the dressing room. Tyrion changed his own in their bedchamber and slipped under the blankets, falling into sleep immediately. The wine had good effects on him.
Chapter End Notes

For the version of "The Rains of Castamere" performed at the ceremony: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2l7wzOaODYQ

Please review

Next chapter: a new POV (the story starts to expand)
The story starts to expand for real here. The effects of Tywin's death begin to be felt beyond King's Landing. The arc of Casterly Rock will include many chapters that happen outside the Rock. This is the first one.

This was a long chapter to write for me. Arya's storyline is not the one I like the most, but I can't simply put her aside. She has a role to play in this fic. Let's discover what Tywin's death will change for her.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

They weren’t far away. They travelled through the ravaged Riverlands, then through the mountains of the Vale for months. Finally they were close to the Bloody Gate. It took them a very long time to reach it, slowed by the Hound’s injury and their lack of horse. They had to go through all the way on feet, meeting devastated lands and burned farms all along their journey. They were lucky they didn’t meet the hill tribes while they followed the Eastern Road. Perhaps the burned face of the Hound scared even them. And now they walked into the tight ravine that led to the passage point separating the Eastern Road from the Eyrie. Soon, Arya would meet her aunt.

She didn’t know what to expect from this woman. She never met aunt Lysa. She didn’t know her. Arya wanted her mother, Robb, Bran, Rickon, Jon. She should go to the Wall. Her last brother was there. He would ruffle her hair just like he used to do at Winterfell. She would hug him tightly just like when they went separate ways. And she wanted Sansa as well. She missed her. Her sister was stupid, but she was still her sister. She was her pack. Her aunt was her pack no more than her granduncle, Brynden Tully, was. She felt no bond to them. She had more bond with the Hound than with her aunt.

She hated the Hound. He was brutal, rough, a thief, and he liked to kill for pleasure. Arya liked to kill some people too, but only if they deserved it and if they did something evil. The man who passes the sentence should swing the sword. Her father’s words echoed through her mind. Her father never told it to her, but Jon told her their father’s words one day. Killing was for justice, not for pleasure. Arya felt pleasure because she could give people justice, because she gave them what they deserved, just like when she killed Polliver at the inn. It already happened several months ago. The Hound liked to kill people only because he liked to kill, nothing more. There was no other reason why he liked it. He was the worst shit in the Seven Kingdoms.

And now here she was, walking with the Hound at her side towards the Bloody Gate. They crossed the path of other people who came from the opposite way. All were peasants, most of them carrying empty bundles. The Hound was walking heavily beside her in his full armor. The armor and his injury slowed them a lot. Arya couldn’t understand why she couldn’t manage to escape this man. She was quicker than him after all, even if she had wore full armor and him nothing. Perhaps because she had no reason to escape him. He was bringing her to a member of her family after all, even if Arya didn’t know this person. She had no reason to escape him. It would only make it more difficult for her to reach the Eyrie. The Hound helped and protected her, even if she didn’t want and didn’t need protection to survive. But she could reach the Eyrie quicker with him, and she realized after a few weeks that she didn’t hate the Hound’s company as much as she thought. Anyway, once her aunt paid him, she would get rid of him forever. What would happen next to him didn’t concern her. As for what would happen next to her, she had no idea. Perhaps she could ask her aunt to send her to the Wall to her brother. There was a harbor in Gulltown where she could take a ship to Eastwatch-by-the-Sea, then ride west to Castleblack where Jon surely was.

“How does it make you feel to know that the man you once served as cupbearer died?” the Hound’s suddenly asked out of nowhere.

They learned a few weeks ago at an inn that Tywin Lannister was dead. Some said he was murdered, others that he died of a disease, or because he was too old. Some said Joffrey killed him, others that it was Cersei, or the Imp. But they also discovered at the same time that Joffrey died at his own wedding. He was poisoned. Arya found it so ironic. Her mother and her brother were slaughtered at a wedding, and Joffrey got himself killed at his own wedding later.

“I wished I had killed him myself,” Arya replied.

“You? Killing Tywin Lannister? I would have liked to see that. How would you have done this?”

Arya tried to imagine how to kill Tywin Lannister. She was his cupbearer for many months. She could have stabbed him in the back many times with a knife, but she didn’t. She should have. But then she would probably be dead. And Hot Pie and Gendry too. All the same, she wondered how she would have killed him. Strangely, she couldn’t find out.

“I would have found a way,” she finally said.

“Aye, I’m sure you would,” the Hound gloomily said. “What about Joffrey?”

“I would have found a way to kill him too.” Arya spoke angrily.

“How do you feel about this? About their deaths?”

The Hound sometimes asked her questions, unlike at the beginning when he always told her to shut her mouth. Arya asked him questions too, more to spend time than anything else. He talked to her for the same reasons.

“I don’t know. Tywin Lannister was Robb’s enemy, but he was kind with me in his own way. He seemed to like me as his cupbearer.”

“Yes, as his cupbearer,” the Hound scoffed. “These noble people are like this. They like us people under them as long as we remember we are inferior to them and as long as we obey. But when dogs stop to obey, they kill them. I disobeyed, so now they want me dead. My brother always obeyed. And I’m the one with a bag of silver on my head.”

Arya knew how the Hound hated his brother. Arya hated him too. They found common ground on this. “He liked me more than your brother. And more than his own men. He treated me better than them, and he didn’t sell me out, even when he knew I was highborn.”

“But if he had discovered who you truly were, he would have sent you back to King’s Landing, or worse. Perhaps he would have ordered my brother to rape you, then to kill you to make your brother understand what happens to those who fight against him. He would still have your sister as a hostage anyway. No need for two.”
“I don’t think so.”

Arya didn’t think Tywin Lannister would have ordered her to be killed. She had too much value alive. The Hound and the Brotherhood without Banner kept her for the same reason. She was of no use dead. However, the moment Tywin Lannister would have discovered her identity, she would have fled, or killed him. She would have been ready to do so. Tywin Lannister may have been kind with her, but he was still her brother’s enemy, and so he was her enemy too. As for Joffrey, she would have killed him the moment he would stand before her. And now he was dead. She would never have the possibility to kill him. Her list decreased of two names. And she didn’t feel happy about it.

“I don’t know how to feel about Joffrey. About his death. I thought it’d make me happy, but it doesn’t. Not really.”

“Nothing makes you happy,” the Hound grumbled.

“Lots of things make me happy.”

“Like what?”

“So you’re sad because you didn’t get to kill Joffrey yourself. Is that it?”

He hit the right point. “At least I could have been there to watch. I wanted to see the look in his eyes when he knew it was over.”

“Aye, nothing in the world beats that look.” He seemed uninterested.

“You protected him for most of his life. You think you could have saved him?” She wished the Hound could have saved Joffrey so she could have killed him later.

“I wasn’t the damn wine taster.” He chose this moment to drink wine from his flask. “Little shit deserved to die, but poison… poison’s a woman’s weapon. Men kill with steel.”

“That’s your stupid pride talking,” Arya said, exasperated. “It’s why you’ll never be a great killer. I’d have killed Joffrey with a chicken bone if I had to.”

The Hound laughed at this. “I’d pay good money to see that.” He scratched the place on his neck where he was bitten and groaned.

“You should have left me burn it.”

“It’s a fleabite.”

“That fleabite’s got you walking a lot slower than you used to.”

“Well, we won’t have to walk too much further.”

The Bloody Gate was right before them. It was made of two long parapets built in the stone of the Mountains of the Moon, a great portcullis made of steel bars, with two watchtowers above that were joined by a covered bridge. There were guards and knights with arrows, bows, spears and swords, standing before the portcullis, atop the cliffs and on the parapets. Some of them aimed their bow and pointed an arrow in their direction as they approached. All wore an eagle on a blue field, the sigil of House Arryn. Arya remembered her father once told her Jon Arryn was a good man, a man of honor, and he had been her aunt’s husband until he died a few years ago. With some hope, Arya would be welcomed here, but she had her doubts.

“You really think my aunt will pay for me?”

“Aye, she’ll pay,” the Hound assured.

“I’ve never even met her.”

“Doesn’t matter. You’re her blood. Family, honor, all that horseshit. It’s all you lords and ladies ever talk about.”

“I’m not a lady,” Arya specified. She was no lady, and she would never be. Sansa was a lady, but Arya wasn’t her sister, and she was happy to not be like her. Though she would like very much to see her again. Was she still in King’s Landing right now? Or somewhere else? Arya didn’t know. Perhaps her aunt would have answers to her questions.

“Who would pass the Bloody Gate?” a man shouted.

“The bloody Hound, Sandor Clegane,” spat the one speaking. “And his… traveling companion Arya Stark, niece of your lady Lysa Arryn.”

At least he didn’t call me Lady Arya Stark of Winterfell. Arya guessed she should be thankful to the Hound at least for this. She didn’t call him ser, and he didn’t call her my lady. The man who spoke looked at them with curiosity. He approached, a hand on his sheathed sword. He stopped a few feet before them and eyed the Hound.

“You have the face of the Hound, I’ll give you that. But your companion looks like a boy.”

“I’m a girl,” Arya shouted. She was fed up that everyone mistook her for a boy, even with her clothes and her haircut.

The knight eyed her suspiciously. “Anyone could arrive and claim to have found Arya Stark. Why would I believe you?” He turned to the Hound. “You broke your vows as a kingsguard. You abandoned your king. There’s a bounty on your head. You have no honor. Why should I believe you?”

“You can piss on your honor and on mine,” roared the Hound. “This is Arya Stark of Winterfell, daughter of Eddard Stark and Catelyn Stark, the sister of your lady. I can swear it on my shit of honor that it’s her if that means anything for you. But do you really think I would bring her here and present myself as the Hound if I was lying? With a bounty on my head? All I want is being paid for bringing her back to her family. Let your pretty lady take a look at her. Her mother’s dead. Her father’s dead. Her brother’s dead. Winterfell is a pile of rubble. If there is a little chance she is Arya Stark, then you would be better to let your lady see her niece, if you have any shit of honor in you, bloody knight.”

After a moment when the knight looked as if he would draw his sword, he finally seemed to relax. “I will let you see Lady Lysa, but I hope for you this is really the Lady Arya Stark.”

“I’m not a lady,” Arya shouted. The knight stopped for a moment, then resumed.

“I hope for you both that she is who you claim she is. Follow us.”

They went through the portcullis and after a long climb that took many hours, they reached the Eyrie. The knight didn’t follow them, but they were flanked by at least twenty men when they reached the peak of the Mountains of the Moon. Both the Hound and Arya refused to surrender their sword. She wouldn’t give up Needle. Not again. The guards reluctantly allowed them to keep them before the angry face of Sandor Clegane. They arrived before two great doors and waited before them. One of the men following them went inside and they waited a very long time. Finally, he came back and they entered. It was the High Hall of the Eyrie. Arya saw pictures of it in books at Winterfell. The throne of the Lord of the Eyrie stood at the top of long stairs and was made of weirwood. On it were sitting two people. One was a woman wearing a blue gown and with auburn hair. Arya saw some resemblance with her mother. It had to be her aunt. She was holding, or rather hugging, a little boy in her arms who looked at them as if he was afraid. Probably because of the Hound. The doors closed behind them, but Arya noticed the men who accompanied them all came in and stood between them and the closed doors. There were other soldiers, all bearing the Arryn’s colors, standing next to the weirwood throne, along the stairs, and right before her and the Hound. Arya didn’t like it.

“Lady Arryn. I guess this is Lord Robin Arryn. My lord.” The Hound didn’t bow for her aunt, but he did for the little boy. He looked everything but a lord.

“What do you want from my son? What are you doing here?” Her aunt asked her question with an icy voice, looking at the Hound and only at the Hound. She didn’t even seem to notice Arya.

“I brought your niece to you. Arya Stark.” He turned his eyes towards her. For the first time since they entered, her aunt dared to look at her, but only for a second.

“Are you taking me and my son for fools? You really think I’ll believe this boy is my niece?”

“I’m a girl,” Arya shouted. “My name is Arya Stark. My father is Lord Eddard Stark and my mother is Catelyn Stark. I grew up in Winterfell until I left with my father when he became Hand of the King. I have a sister, Sansa, probably still in the capital. I escaped King’s Landing not long after my father was arrested. I saw Ser Ilyn Payne take out his head on the steps of the Great Sept of Baelor. I left the capital and wandered through the Riverlands during the last two years. I saw my brother being killed at the Twins before I could reach him. The Freys butchered him, my mother, and his direwolf. They cut his head from his body and put on the one of Grey Wind instead…”

“Silence!” Lysa Arryn rose from the throne, yelling. “I defend you to talk about such things in the presence of my son.”

“What happened next?” The boy looked quite interested by everything Arya just said, but her aunt put a hand on his shoulder.

“Shhh, my Sweetrobin. Everything is alright. Your mother is there.”

She sat back and took the head of her son in her arms. And she did something Arya would never have thought possible. She unlaced her gown and freed one of her breast. Then Arya’s cousin began to suckle it. That was so disgusting. Arya looked at the Hound whose face showed outright disgust as well.

“You won’t frighten my son this way. I won’t allow it.” Lysa Arryn was shouting. “Get them out of my sight. Send them away. Never come back here, or I’ll send you through the Moon Door for scaring my son.”

Arya wanted to laugh at this. The Hound brought her here to give her to her aunt in exchange for gold, and instead he was turned down. She never saw a mother and a son so strange and stupid. It reminded her of Cersei and Joffrey. At least, she wouldn’t live with them. How could this woman be her mother’s sister?
“Wait a minute, my lady.” Arya heard a voice on her left and turned to see where it came from. She heard it before, she was sure. “I’m afraid the Hound is telling the truth. This is your niece, Arya.”

He appeared between two guards, but remained behind them. He had blue eyes and brown hair, and a thin beard running around his mouth, a mischievous smile on his lips. Arya remembered him from the tourney for her father. He was the one who told to her and Sansa back then how the Hound got his face half burnt. She also saw him at Harrenhal later, when she was the cupbearer of Tywin Lannister, but he didn’t recognize her. At least she thought so.

“But Petyr, my love, this is impossible. She cannot be.” Her aunt looked bewildered.

“I know it must look strange, my lady.” Littlefinger turned to Arya and bowed deeply before her. “My lady. It is a pleasure to see you alive. Your sister will be very happy to hear such news.”

Her sister? “Sansa? She’s alright?” Arya didn’t have any news from her sister for what looked like years now.

Before she could answer, the Hound stepped before her, clouding her vision of the man. “You order all your men to stand down and let us go. If you do it, no one will die.”

Arya knew this voice. The Hound was angry. His hand was on his sword, ready to draw it. From his position, she could see he was going to draw it against Littlefinger. The other men around them put their hand on the handle of their sword as well.

“Sandor Clegane,” shortly replied Petyr Baelish. Arya changed her position to see what was going on. The thin man was still smiling. Arya didn’t like this smile, and the look in the man’s eyes that came with it. There was something cruel in them. Syrio taught her to read other people’s expression to know what would be their next move. Littlefinger was preparing something. “What a surprise to see you here, especially with the bounty on your head.”

“You fucking cunt! You think I’ll let you seize this bitch so you can deliver her to the Lannisters, just like you did with her sister and her father. I’ll kill you before you do that.”

The Hound’s words caught Arya’s attention. “What do you mean?”

“He betrayed your father,” the Hound answered loudly, not leaving his gaze from Littlefinger. “I was there when Cersei and Joffrey arrested him. Lord fucking Baelish turned this butcher’s son Janos Slynt and his fucking gold cloaks against your father. They slaughtered his men. He put a dagger on your father’s throat. I’m not going to leave you to Cersei’s creature. I didn’t bring you here for this.”

Arya looked at the thin man. He was standing there, still smiling. He didn’t refute the Hound’s words. It wasn’t difficult for Arya to know the truth. This man betrayed her family. He betrayed her father. Everything that happened to her pack, he was responsible of it. Arya drew Needle from her belt and pointed it towards Baelish.

“You let us go, or there will be dead, beginning by you.” People didn’t react to her words before a moment. Her aunt was the one to finally respond.

“Kill them. They threatened my husband. Kill them! Kill them!”

“Make them fly,” added the boy, yelling.

The Hound drew his sword at the same time than the other men. Arya jumped in Baelish’s direction, but two guards stood before her. Swift as a cat, she ducked their arms directed toward her and hit both of them on their legs. She took one in an open space between his pad and his armor, but she didn’t have the same luck with the other one and hit the pad. She managed to avoid him all the same, but she wasn’t fast enough. Littlefinger was running away, more guards standing on her way to him. Arya avoided two, but finally she received a kick in her ribs that sent her on the floor, out of breath. Before she could react, Needle was taken out of her hands and two men seized her by her arms. She kicked at them, trying to get free of their grasp. She thought she heard one blowing some air when she hit him, but then she received a punch in her stomach and a third man seized her by her feet. She continued to struggle, without success, earning other punches and kicks from time to time.

Arya saw the Hound fighting a huge bunch of men, slashing his sword wildly all around him. A few men were already on the ground and all the others backed before his fury. Then a bolt lodged in his right arm. The knights rushed on him all together after a moment of surprise. The Hound continued to fight savagely, but in the end he couldn’t withstand all of them. The men pierced him with their swords. Arya met his eyes. He asked for her help as he fell on the floor. She wanted to help him, but she couldn’t. Finally, a sword came through his throat. When Arya could see his half burned face again, life had left his eyes.

Arya shouted, screamed, kicked and tried to free herself from the men holding her, but she couldn’t. The Hound was dead. He was dead. Just like her father, her mother, Robb, Bran and Rickon. She heard cries, and other voices, but didn’t really understand what they were saying. They talked about throwing someone through a door, about a head, about proof of loyalty, and about a niece. Finally, Arya received a hard blow on the side of her head and lost consciousness.

When she woke up, she was in a room with only three stone walls. Her head was smashing and she felt a great pain from her right temple. Where should have been the fourth wall, there was only sky and distant mountains and rocks. When she approached the edge of the little room she was in, she couldn’t see the ground below. She was at least a few hundred feet above any ground. She tried to look around the entrance for a way to escape, but there was nothing she could grab. She couldn’t hope to leave this room using this way without falling to certain death. The only door of the piece, a heavy steel door, wouldn’t open. When Arya knocked on it as hard as she could again and again, someone unlocked it and went inside. It was a big man with a scar over his right eye, chainmail and a stick in his right hand. He also had golden teeth.

“Little girl making noise.”

“Where am I?” Arya asked.

“Little girl still making noise.”

“Tell me where I am.”

Arya tried to seize Needle at her belt, but it wasn’t there. The stick struck on her forehead very hard. If she had been in a better state, she would have ducked it, but her head was still making her suffer. Arya lost consciousness again. When she awoke it was night and there was blood running from her forehead to the tip of her nose. She was also at the edge of the fall, and quickly got away from it. Arya rubbed the blood out of her face with her hand. The cut on her forehead had enough time to cicatrize during her forced sleep. She remembered where she was, probably still at the Eyrie, the prisoner of an aunt who looked mad and of a man who betrayed her father and delivered him to Joffrey and Cersei. She had no way to escape, and the Hound was dead, killed while trying to protect her. He only wanted to hand her to somebody for gold, but in the end he fought to protect her. Another name left her list. But it was gone from it before he died. Arya didn’t cry, but she could feel she was sad for the Hound, despite what he did to Mycah.

She was unconscious for too long to sleep now. She didn’t have the force to try to find a way to escape, so instead she sat her back against the wall facing the exit to a certain death. She noticed a slight slope of the floor to the open wall. She should be careful to not roll to her fall next time she slept, like she probably just did. Needle wasn’t at her belt, so she couldn’t get any reassurance from her friend’s presence. But she felt the coin Jaqen H’ghar gave her when she left Harrenhal in her pocket. They didn’t take it from her. She began to toss it in the air, catching it before it fell on the floor of stone. It didn’t slip from her hand a single time. Then she began to recite the names. It had changed a lot during the last months.

“Cersei. Walder Frey. Meryn Trant. The Red Woman. Beric Dondarrion. Thoros of Myr. Ilyn Payne. The Mountain. Littlefinger. Lysa Arryn.” Hate’s as good a thing as any to keep a person going. The Hound told her this once. Joffrey, Tywin Lannister and the Hound left her list, and she replaced them with her aunt and Petyr Baelish. She repeated the names over and over for the whole night. Day finally came. The gaoler brought her hard bread and water in the middle of the day, but Littlefinger came with him as well.

“Leave us alone, Mord. I have my own man.”

Arya’s gaoler left. A knight entered in her cell and stood at the right, on the open wall side. Littlefinger stood on the left, where there was a stone wall. Arya wouldn’t be able to push him to the fall. And even if she did, then the knight would surely kill her. She had no weapon. The heavy door of her cell shut and she heard a clank from the other side. It was locked.

“I’m sorry for the disagreements. My sweet Lysa can be very touchy when it comes to her son’s safety. I’ll probably manage to have you moved to proper rooms in a few days.”

He made a sorry smile, but Arya could see he wasn’t sincere. She stared at him with all the hatred and the disgust she could gather. After a moment, the man who betrayed her father resumed.

“Is there anything I can do to make your stay more comfortable, Lady Arya?”

“I’m not a lady,” Arya shouted. “And I want you out! OUT!” She threw her cup of water to him. The cup hit him and some of the water splashed on him and his fine clothes, but he wasn’t hurt. The cup fell on the floor, rolling in circle for a moment. The knight brought his hand to his sword, but Baelish stopped him.

“I think I’ll come back when you’ll be better disposed.”

The traitor left the cell with the knight. When they were gone, Arya ate the hard bread they brought to her. It would be useless to starve herself. She regretted she threw the cup of water. She had nothing to drink. Her gaoler, Mord, brought her back hard bread and water later in the day. Then she fell asleep with her back on the wall to not roll after she recited her list loudly. “Cersei. Walder Frey. Meryn Trant. The Red Woman. Beric Dondarrion. Thoros of Myr. Ilyn Payne. The Mountain. Littlefinger. Lysa Arryn.”

Days went on and on like this. Littlefinger came back to visit her during the first days, always when she was brought her first meal, but she didn’t want to talk to him. He betrayed her father, and he had the Hound killed. He told her he was trying to get her out of the sky cells as quickly as possible. That was the name of the cells like this one. How convenient for a name. He also continued to ask her if she wanted something, but Arya would always throw her cup of water to him, but only after emptying it now. She needed to drink. After four failed attempts to talk with her, he stopped his daily visits.

Arya tried to remember as many details as she could about how Mord brought her food. It was always the same thing. Twice each day, always at the same hours, she received a hard black bread and a cup of water. From the third day however, she received white bread. And at after a week, she was served a lemon cake as well with each meal. She tried to remember as many details as she could so she may attempt an escape one day. She may try to hide on the side where the door opened, then jump on Mord as he looked for her, but then she would have to travel through all the Eyrie, a place she didn’t know where she could lose herself very easily, with at least dozens of soldiers. She wouldn’t be able to evade all of them, and had no means to kill them without Needle. All she could do was waiting for an opportunity. There would come a time when her aunt would make her leave this cell, even temporarily. Wouldn’t she?

On her sixteenth day in the sky cell, her door opened sooner in the morning than usually. A knight of the Vale entered. It was the same man who accompanied Littlefinger when he visited her before, but without Littlefinger this time.

“Lady Arya, follow us.” He spoke roughly.

“I’m not a lady,” Arya complained, throwing an angry glare at him, but she followed all the same.

She had no choice, and to be honest she was bored by this cell. Spending her days to recite her list and look at every little detail of the cell, in the hope it might be useful, only disturbed by her two daily meals… That made her days very long. There were four guards encircling her as they walked to an unknown location in the Eyrie. Arya tried to remember every turn, every corner, every door she saw on her way, and how many guards she met. She counted forty-four men without the four escorting her, but there were probably more. Escape would be very difficult.

To her surprise, they brought her to a comfortable chamber with a featherbed and a bathtub full of hot water. Four old women were waiting for her. She thought they would bring her to the High Hall to see her aunt and her cousin. Instead she was there in one of these chambers her sister would like so much. All commodities and furniture a lady could hope for were there, but Arya was no lady.

The guards left her in the room and closed the door behind them. She heard the clank of a lock turning. Of course, she was in a cell. A comfortable cell now, but a cell nonetheless. The four old women nearly forced her to get out of her rags and to come into the bathtub. They scrubbed her and rubbed her so hard with their brushes that Arya thought she would be bleeding at the end of the bath. When they were done with her torture, they dried her with towels and helped her to put on a gown. Or to be more precise, they forced her to put on a gown when Arya only wanted to get back her ragged clothes. It had been so long since she took a bath and wear a dress. She felt naked in clothes not tightened around her body like the ones she wore for the past two years and without the dust and mud she was used to on her skin. The four old maids left with her clothes. Arya wondered if she would ever see them again. She realized too late she had lost the coin Jaqen gave her at the same time.

About two hours later, the lock of her door was unlocked and two people entered, Littlefinger and the same knight than ever. He was making his ugly false smile as always and the knight didn’t leave Arya with his eyes.

“I’m sorry it took so much time to get you out of the sky cells. My wife can be very difficult to convince when she’s fixed on something.” He said it with an apologetic smile.

Wait. His wife? “What do you meant, your wife?”

The knight at Littlefinger’s side advanced towards her with a menacing look. “You stand before Lord Petyr Baelish, Lord of Harrenhal and husband to our lady Lysa Arryn, thus acting Lord of the Vale. You better show him some respect.”

Arya agape before this. Her aunt married this man? The man who betrayed her father? “I have nothing to do of his titles. He’s a traitor. He betrayed my father!” she spat.

“Be careful about what you say.” The knight started to unsheathe his sword.

“Ser Lyn.” Littlefinger stopped him with a hand on his arm. “Please leave us. I have to talk with the Lady Arya in private.”

The knight looked at her with an angry glare that Arya returned, but he finally left the room, locking it behind him. Arya had a chance.

“You probably think right now you could kill me and reduce the list of people you repeat every night, my lady,” Littlefinger said before she could do anything. “But if you want to cross all these names before you die, I suggest you postpone your revenge on me. If you kill me right now, I don’t think Lysa will spare you a second time.”

Arya froze. “I can tell her what you did.”

“And what have I done?” Littlefinger asked. “Betray the husband of her sister. She already knows it from what the Hound told in her presence. Do you think she believed him? Do you think she’ll believe you? And even if she believed it, she doesn’t really care about her brother-in-law.”

“I’m her niece.”

“And I am her husband. The husband she chose over many pretenders who were much more noble born than me. And you just threatened her Sweetrobin.”

“I didn’t threaten him. That’s a lie,” Arya spat again.

“A lie she believes. A lie she created herself. She’ll listen to me, not to you. And you should be grateful that she listened to me. You probably didn’t realize it while you struggled to get free, but your aunt wanted to throw you through the Moon Door, and Lord Robin was happy to support her. I’m the one who convinced her to not kill you since you were her blood. Without my intervention, your body would be broken in multiple parts as we speak after a fall of hundreds feet.”

Arya hesitated for a moment. She had something else to reproach him. “You threw me into the sky cells!”

“You threw me into the sky cells,” he corrected. “I told her to do it, it’s true, but she wouldn’t have listened if I suggested these rooms instead. I worked for the last fortnight to get you out of these cells and have you brought here. I would expect some gratitude for the better treatment I got for you.”

Arya looked at the man standing before her. What was he doing? Was he lying? She couldn’t be sure. But if he told the truth, why would he do this? “I don’t believe you. Why would you help me?”

Littlefinger looked at her with a sad smile. “Because I loved your mother. I loved her very much. It grieved me when I learned that she died at the Twins. You said you were there when in the High Hall. How was it?”

Strangely, Arya had the impression he was really sad. Could it be true? She remembered him telling he was a very very old friend of her mother at her father’s tourney. Arya didn’t see what she could lose from telling him what she knew.

“It was butchery. The Freys slaughtered everyone. All the Northerners. They played the Rains of Castamere while they did it. They paraded my brother’s body on a horse with his direwolf’s head while all the camp of the Northerners was set ablaze.”

“What about Cat?”

Arya never heard someone call her mother this way, not even her father. She tried to see any false concern in Littlefinger, but strangely she could see nothing false in this instant. “I didn’t see what happened to her.” She couldn’t tell him about her dreams when she was a wolf and got her mother’s body out of the river. “But I know they slit her throat, then threw her body into the river.”

Littlefinger dropped his eyes to the floor, before rising them again a moment later. “May I sit?” Arya nodded in a positive way. Petyr Baelish seized a chair and sat on it. “I loved your mother. A long time ago, I even hoped to marry her one day. Sadly I never married her. She married someone else. Your father. I’m sorry she died. I feel at least as much pain as you do. And I’m sorry about your father as well.”

Arya turned angry again. “You’re lying. You betrayed my father. You gave him to Cersei and Joffrey. And you did nothing to save my mother.”

“I wish I could have. Your father was an honorable man, but he was stubborn. He wanted to support Stannis against all odds despite the fact Stannis had no chance to win the Iron Throne. And by the way, the Red Woman you mention every night with all the other names, do you know who she really is?” Arya froze again. He knew her list. “You repeat the same names all nights since you were in the sky cells. Cersei. Walder Frey. Meryn Trant. The Red Woman. Beric Dondarrion. Thoros of Myr. Ilyn Payne. The Mountain. Me. Your aunt. I guess these are people you want to see dead. And I think I know who this Red Woman is. But you don’t seem to know.”

Arya didn’t understand where he was going with this. “What do you know of her?”

“I think she is a Red Priestess. Melisandre of Asshai. She is the main advisor of Stannis Baratheon, the man your father wanted to put on the Iron Throne. He supported a man who’s advised by this red woman. A woman who convinced Stannis to burn septs and godswoods wherever he went.”

“You’re lying,” Arya said immediately. “My father would never have done this.” Her father would never support this woman.

“I’m not lying, my lady.”

“I’m not a lady!” she shouted.

“Very well,” he said in an appeasing tone. “How do you want me to call you? Arya?” Arya didn’t answer. He resumed after a moment. “I’m not lying to you, Arya. I’ll tell you the truth. I betrayed your father, indeed. But I tried to save him, just like I saved you when I didn’t tell Tywin Lannister who was his cupbearer. I recognized you, but I told him nothing because you were Cat’s daughter. Your father wanted to overthrow Joffrey, and I advised him to not do so. Instead he decided to fight for Stannis, a fight lost from the beginning. He could have made peace with the Lannisters, and act as Regent for Joffrey. Instead he chose honor, and this led to a war that shattered your family and killed your brothers and your parents. That’s what honor brought to your family.”

“You betrayed him!”

“And I would be dead right now if I didn’t. And you would be too, as a consequence.”

Arya didn’t know what to reply to this. She didn’t know what her father did that led to his arrest, but she felt nothing but disdain for honor. It was only a way for people to believe they were better than they really were. But she didn’t think she could trust Littlefinger. She believed what the Hound said.
She knew the Hound didn’t lie to her, but she had no trust in the man sitting before her.

“I don’t believe you,” she calmly said, but perhaps not with the strong certainty she wanted to have.

Littlefinger smiled. “Then let me help you so you can believe me when I tell you I’m an ally.”

“Help me? How can you help me?”

“By crossing a few names on your famous list. I could help you to get rid of some of these people.”

“I don’t need your help.”

“I’m afraid you do. First, I can give you some information. There are two people you should add to your list. I have many spies and informants through the Seven Kingdoms, and I know who killed your mother and your brother at the Twins. I’m sure you want to know them, so you can avenge your family, so you can give justice to these people.”

That interested Arya. “Who?”

“Your brother was stabbed into the heart by one of his own bannermen. Roose Bolton, Lord of the Dreadfort, and now Warden of the North. Tywin Lannister rewarded him with this for his part in your brother’s death. As for your mother, it was Black Walder, a great-grandson of Walder Frey, who killed her.” Arya would have two more names to speak before she fell asleep tonight.

“Where are they?”

“Black Walder is with his ancestor at the Twins, like most of the Freys who took part in the slaughtering. As for Roose Bolton, my last information seemed to show he was heading for Winterfell where he would rule the North.” Arya boiled inside to learn that the man who killed and betrayed her brother would take Winterfell, her home. “Perhaps you also want information about the other names?”

“I do.”

Littlefinger smiled. “Cersei Lannister is now confined at Castle Stokeworth in the Crownlands. She was sent away from the capital not long after Joffrey died. Walder Frey is still at the Twins, refusing to die. Meryn Trant has taken the black and is probably going to the Wall as we speak.”

“What?” Arya didn’t expect Meryn Trant to join the Night’s Watch.

“It seems the kingsguard you hate incidentally poisoned Joffrey’s wine while trying to poison someone else. He had the choice between the Wall or Ilyn Payne.”

Arya wished Meryn Trant chose Ilyn Payne’s sword, but it seems he was a coward. She wasn’t surprised by this. “So Ser Ilyn Payne is still alive?”

“And still acting as the King’s justice,” Littlefinger confirmed. “The Red Woman is still at Stannis’s side on Dragonstone from what I know. Beric Dondarrion is dead or alive depending on who you ask, and Thoros of Myr still lives from what I know. I’m alive, just like your aunt, but I’m afraid someone took care of the Mountain before you.”

“It is. The new Lord of Casterly Rock had him and his men all killed and stripped the Cleganes of their keep and their lands. He gave it to some pet sellsword he had in his service. With the Hound who just died, it seems the Cleganes are extinct.”

Arya wished she had killed Gregor Clegane herself, but at least someone got what he deserved. The Hound, however… “What have you done of the Hound’s body?”

“His head was sent to King’s Landing after the confrontation. I convinced your aunt it would be a proof of loyalty to the Crown. His body was thrown through the Moon Door without the head.”

Arya wanted to spit at the man who sat there, speaking so quietly of all this, but there was no use to it, no more than it was any use to insult the Hound. With the information she just received, Arya could cross a name from her list, but she had two others to replace it now.

Littlefinger rose. “I’ll leave you alone. Think about the proposition I made. You’ll need help to kill all these people, and I’m the only one here who could help you.”

“You would help me to kill yourself?”

The man chuckled lightly. “You won’t kill me until you can, and for now you can’t, and I won’t make it possible for you to kill me. But I will give you opportunities to kill the other people you want to see dead. I wouldn’t let such an opportunity pass if I were you. We can both see the people who hurt your mother suffer.”

He started to walk away, but Arya stopped him before he reached the door. She needed to know something else. “Do you have any news of my brother Jon? Or Sansa?”

He turned to face her and took a grim expression. “I know nothing about your half-brother. He’s at the Wall, isn’t he?” Arya confirmed it with nod. “The last news we received from the Wall were that a great army of wildlings was marching on it. Your brother Jon may be occupied for the moment fighting them.”

Arya remembered the stories Old Nan told her about the things beyond the Wall. Not only wildlings, but White Walkers, giants, wargs and many other creatures. Arya wished she could be with Jon right now, fighting the wildlings.

“As for your sister, she seems to be well and happy at Casterly Rock.”

Arya jumped at this information. “Casterly Rock? What is she doing there? I thought she was in King’s Landing. Cersei and Joffrey kept her as a hostage.”

“She is a hostage no longer. In fact, your sister is now Sansa Lannister, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands and Lady of Winterfell.”

Arya didn’t understand. “That’s impossible.”

“It is possible. Tywin Lannister is dead, and the Kingslayer is a kingsguard, forbidden from inheritance and marriage. Tyrion Lannister is now the Lord of House Lannister, just like your sister is their lady. Since she is Imp’s wife.”

Arya couldn’t believe what she just learnt. Sansa was a Lannister. She was married to the Imp. “But Sansa was supposed to marry Joffrey.”

“Yes, she was. But the Lannisters broke their betrothal to marry Joffrey with the daughter of Mace Tyrell, the Lord of Highgarden. Now that Joffrey is dead, Tommen sits on the Iron Throne and is expected to marry the Tyrell girl instead of his dead brother. So the Lannisters organized another marriage for your sister and gave her to the Imp.”
Arya now realized what happened. “They forced her to marry him.”

Littlefinger’s face turned bitter. “I’m afraid your sister wanted to marry him in fact.”

It took a moment for Arya to assimilate this information. “Sansa would never want to marry a Lannister. Even less a dwarf.”

“She wanted to marry Joffrey once should I recall you. I offered your sister to make her leave King’s Landing in secret, but she refused. She preferred to stay there and to marry the Imp. Later, I sent a man to offer her to escape the capital again, and she turned him down. My place is with my lord husband, she said. When Tywin Lannister died, the Imp was accused of murdering him. Your sister gave a wonderful testimony that convinced the judges to spare her husband, and she was later acknowledged by Joffrey himself as Lady of Casterly Rock and Lady of Winterfell. And I was present at Joffrey’s wedding. I saw your sister with her husband. She wore a lavish gown with jewels and gold from her hair to her feet. She was laughing with the Imp, holding his hand. She smiled at him during the whole wedding. I even saw them kiss at one moment. Believe me, she was happy. Very happy. The other Lannisters made toasts for her. And now she lives at Casterly Rock with her husband, and my agents there are telling me she enjoys her new life very much.”

Arya didn’t react. Her sister, Sansa, a Lannister? No, even worse, she was the Lady Lannister, just like their mother was the Lady Stark. After a moment of silence, Littlefinger left after one last sentence. “I’m sorry, my lady.” Disappointment was obvious on his face.

When the man had left, Arya was so lost in her thoughts that she forgot to tell him she was no lady. Her sister was married to a Lannister. She was married to Tyrion Lannister, the Imp. Arya remembered the Imp from the time he visited Winterfell with the royal party. He looked very different from Cersei and his brother. They were tall and handsome, he was small. Arya was taller than him. However, he had the same blond hair and green eyes than all the Lannisters. Arya was intrigued by him when she saw him for the first time. She never saw such a little man, but he wasn’t at all what she expected. She thought she would see an imp. Instead, he only looked like a small man with a big head. When she talked with him, he told her his head was big to compensate for the small size of his arms and legs. Arya found his answers quite strange. He didn’t seem to take anything seriously, and he mocked himself. She found him much more interesting than the queen, to the opposite of Sansa. Arya never saw him after she left Winterfell however. He left for the Wall with Jon when she journeyed to King’s Landing with Father and Sansa.

Arya found it unbelievable that Sansa would be happy to marry the Imp. He was the complete opposite of the husband Sansa dreamed of. She could still remember the stupid things she said the last time they spoke with their father. I’m supposed to marry Prince Joffrey. I love him and I’m meant to be his queen and have his babies. I don’t want someone brave and gentle and strong. I want him! He’ll be the greatest king that ever was, a golden lion, and I’ll give him sons with beautiful blond hair. Arya had laughed at her sister’s stupidity, and their father hardly suppressed his laughs. Surely she was no longer in love with Joffrey after he killed their father. Sansa was stupid, but not so much. But to fall in love with a dwarf? Arya didn’t believe it. Littlefinger probably lied.

However, there was something that led Arya to believe this story could be true. Sansa always wanted to marry a great southern lord and live like a great lady if not like a queen. She was the Lady of House Lannister now, and the Lannisters were the richest family in all the Seven Kingdoms. Was it possible she was happy to be married to a Lannister for this reason? Sansa was always stupid and boring. Did she end up happy to get rid of Joffrey and threw herself in the arms of the Imp? Arya had difficulties to imagine Sansa in the arms of the little man. No, there had to be something else.

Arya didn’t think she could believe a man like Littlefinger who betrayed her father. He gave reasons for his actions, but he betrayed her father nonetheless. He may have lied to her. What stopped him from doing so? He had the Hound killed, and he worked for the Lannisters. She didn’t like this man with his wicked smiles. She wouldn’t trust him, no more than she should have trusted Beric Dondarrion and Thoros of Myr when they said they would bring her to Robb.

However, there was a thing he said that was true. He saw her at Harrenhal, and he didn’t reveal her identity to Tywin Lannister. He recognized her, and did nothing. Why? Because he loved her mother once? Arya found it quite strange. He confessed he betrayed her father, just like the Hound didn’t care to tell her what he thought of her and her family. Littlefinger seemed to do it, though in a different way. He did bad things, but he also did things that saved her life, especially if he convinced her aunt to not kill her. Was the one behind the better food she got during her last days in the sky cell? If he told the truth about Sansa…

Arya felt anger filling her. If Sansa had become the Lady Lannister because she wanted it, then she had betrayed their father, their mother, Robb, Bran, Rickon, Jon, and Arya. She had betrayed the North. Did she abandon their family for a lavish life at Casterly Rock? Arya was angry at her sister. She was so stupid, only wanting to live like a great lady and marry a handsome prince or a handsome lord. Their whole family was killed, and she lived with the Lannisters, enjoying it. What did she have in her head?

Sansa was her sister. Arya didn’t understand. Surely there was some lies in what she just heard. Sansa couldn’t turn on her family so easily. Someone manipulated her. Someone turned her against her own kin if Littlefinger told the truth. Arya had to help her. She was her sister. She was the only family she had with Jon now. Arya paced wildly in her rooms for hours, thinking about ways to save her sister from the Lannisters. She couldn’t abandon her. And she would get her revenge on the Lannisters for everything they did against her family. Arya Stark’s list had changed before she fell asleep this night.

Chapter End Notes

OK everyone. I'm really sorry that I killed the Hound. When I wrote this chapter, the episode of Season 6 where we discovered he survived his duel with Brienne hadn't been released. And this is Game of Thrones. There are good people who die, and this is very possible that Lysa Arryn would have him executed if he came to the Eyrie.

Also, I would like everyone to remember that Littlefinger is very good at manipulating people, and he lies very often. Don't take everything he told Arya for the truth. You may have seen there were at least a few lies in what he said.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa XVIII

Chapter Notes

It's not my best chapter so far, but the five next updates will take place outside Casterly Rock. The story is expanding and there is action not only in the Westerlands, but also in Dorne, in the Vale, in King's Landing and in the North. Enjoy this chapter because there will be a few ones without Tyrion and Sansa afterwards. See how Sansa fares at Casterly Rock.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

SANSA XVIII

Sansa’s fingers twanged the wrong string. They had begun so well this time. She thought they could finally get through the music without her doing a single mistake. She released her hands from the golden harp before her, and sat back deep in her seat.

“Don’t worry, Sansa. It will come back with time. Everyone does wrong notes from time to time.” Cerenna was trying to make her believe none of this mattered as always, but Sansa wished she could get back the talent she had before she left Winterfell.

“I was better at playing the high harp than everyone else in the North three years ago. Now I can’t play two minutes without making at least three false notes.”

“That was last month. Now you can play for five minutes without making a single false note.”

“And I always make one at the fifth minute,” Sansa replied.

Cerenna smiled with some exasperated appearance at her. “Let’s stop for a moment. We’ve been playing for more than an hour now.”

Sansa wouldn’t argue against this. She needed to rest her fingers. More than a month ago, while they walked together in the godswood, Sansa and Cerenna had discovered they both loved music, so they started to play the high harp together. Sansa had learned to play the harp and the bells when she was at Winterfell. Septa Mordane taught her. However, she stopped after her father died, first because she no longer had a harp to practice afterwards, second because she had no taste for music anymore. But now, she felt free to start again. However, more than two years without practicing weren’t without consequence on the quality of her play. She would need time before she could get back to the level she reached at Winterfell.

The harp before her was all made of gold except for the strings. Everything was made of gold here it seemed. Even the clothes had gold on them. That was strange but Sansa had the impression to reconnect with her childhood dreams. Casterly Rock was so much the sort of place she dreamed to live in when she was a little girl. The girl she had been would have thought the king should have lived here instead of King’s Landing. The place was beautiful, a splendor for everyone who looked at it, an embodiment of the wealth and power of House Lannister. The castle was so huge that Sansa didn’t have the time yet to visit it all, two months after she arrived. But Sansa knew better than to fall back into her dreams of little girl. Her dreams blinded her about Joffrey and King’s Landing, then about Loras Tyrell. She wasn’t about to do the same mistake with Casterly Rock and Tyrion.

All the same, Sansa loved her new home, and she loved or at least appreciated the other people living at the Rock. Sansa managed to be accepted by almost everyone here. All the household accepted her as their lady after some initial reluctance from some people. Sansa had to admit she owed a lot to Genna for that. It became very obvious to Sansa that Genna was the real womanly power in Casterly Rock before she arrived. Everyone obeyed her and no one dared to question her authority. Tyrion’s aunt was introducing Sansa to all her duties as Lady of Casterly Rock. Some of her tasks were the same Sansa saw her mother perform as Lady of Winterfell. She had to greet guests, organize special events like feasts and celebrations, and run the castle and its household. The running of Casterly Rock proved to be quite a challenge. The castle was much larger than Winterfell and, in fact, Sansa was never really interested in the management of a castle. As a little girl, she assumed everything would be perfect and she would live without any trouble to face once she would be queen or a lady. The reality was far from it. The management of Casterly Rock implicated hundreds of servants, stewards, cooks, handmaidens, guards, squires, stableboys, singers, dressmakers, and many other workers who maintained the castle. She also had to act as some sort of superior lady for all the other ladies of House Lannister who would ask for her advice on many little details. All matters concerning family affairs were to be brought to her.

Sansa regretted more than ever she didn’t take care better to learn sums and figures in her childhood. Luckily, her lessons with Creylen proved to be very helpful to manage the household. As Lady of the Westerlands, she also took part in the politics. Tyrion was asking for her advice on many matters and kept her informed on everything that happened. She already held court a few times with him in the Great Hall. Her responsibilities increased every week. She realized after a time that Genna was switching duties she assumed herself to Sansa progressively. Genna was demanding with her, but Sansa came to see she learned more quickly this way. Tyrion’s aunt was really a great help. She was making sure Sansa would learn to run Casterly Rock and to handle the family matters, and Sansa succeeded quite well up to now.

Things had improved very much for her relationships with the other Lannisters. Cerenna quickly became a close friend. She was only a year older than Sansa. They would often sew, sing and play music during Sansa’s leisure time. The daughter of Stafford Lannister didn’t seem to have any resentment toward her. Perhaps Cerenna felt a little guilty about Myrielle’s behavior toward Sansa. Still after two months, the youngest daughter of Ser Stafford still did everything to avoid her and showed her hate toward her each time they saw each other, though silently now. All the same, Sansa and Cerenna had many tastes in common and Sansa liked it to have a friend here. However, she didn’t start to make confidence to her yet, a remnant of her mistrust towards the Lannisters. Tyrion was still the only Lannister Sansa could confide in about serious matters.

The other Lannister Sansa was very close to was Joy. After Sansa defended her before Myrielle, the little girl wanted to spend time with her. Sansa would invite her sometimes when she would spend time with Cerenna, or she would be with her and Tyrion for dinner. Tyrion seemed to like the daughter of his favorite uncle more than any other of his cousins, and Joy liked Tyrion too. Apparently, when Tyrion was staying at Casterly Rock, she would sometimes sit beside him while he read and she would try to read another book. Next time they would read at the same time, she would be reading the book she saw Tyrion read previously. She was a lone child, and she seemed happy to only spend time with other people, even if she remained silent doing nothing many times. She even started to follow Sansa when she would pray in the Stone Garden, and after a few times Sansa initiated her to the faith in the Old Gods. There were now two people praying together in the godswood each day.

Sansa would also pray in the sept of Casterly Rock sometimes. The sept was more richly decorated.
than the Great Sept of Baelor, though smaller. That would be the times when Sansa would meet Dorna the most. Ser Kevan’s wife was very kind with her, always wondering if everything was alright with Sansa and if she felt at home here in the Rock. Sansa noticed Dorna prayed very often. Tyrion once told her his aunt would pray seven times each day. Janei was with her most of the time, and sadly it made the prayers much more difficult to perform when Sansa was around. Janei was still very interested by Sansa’s hair, and would seize every occasion to play with them. Sansa took the habit to come with Cerenna to pray in order to have someone else separating her from Janei’s little hands.

Sansa had managed to get along with almost every Lannister. The men showed her the respect they owed to their lady, including the Frey sons of Genna. They were the only ones born from a Lannister who didn’t have the green eyes and the blond hair of the family. Despite their appropriate behavior, Sansa wasn’t very prone to reach the Freys because of the Red Wedding, and they didn’t look very prone to look for her. One of Genna’s sons died fighting against Robb after all. For the ladies however, Sansa only had problems with Myrielle now. All the others seemed to appreciate her. Darlessa and Shiera came from other families and proved to be quite interested in Sansa’s family, just like Sansa was interested in their own. She enjoyed talking of the Reach with Margot, though the young woman left the castle two weeks ago and went back to Starpike with her husband. As for Lanna, Sansa seemed to prove concerned and sorry enough about her husband’s sorry state. Lady Jast really appreciated her now.

Sansa had developed ways to gain the trust and even the friendship of many of the other ladies. She started to invite them in turn to eat with her at the middle of the day. At the beginning, she mostly invited Cerenna or Joy, sometimes both. However, Cerenna came with Myrielle one day. They had a proper discussion as they ate, though not a very joyful one because of Myrielle’s bitterness towards Sansa, but Cerenna managed to make the bridge between them two. After that, Sansa had the idea to always eat with at least one other lady. Her father used to always have someone different sitting beside him each dinner and to talk with this person while they ate. Now she could see through her own experience why he did this. It helped him to keep the trust and respect the people of Winterfell had for him, and also to stay aware of everything going on and to know his people better. Sansa got all these advantages through her meals. She also used to pray in the sept with other people than Dorna, Janei and Cerenna, inviting the other ladies to pray with her. It enhanced her relationships with the other Lannister ladies very much.

She never invited everyone for dinner however. This time of the day was for her and Tyrion alone. Sometimes they would have Joy with them, and Sansa took some pleasure in seeing sparks of jealousy in the other women’s eyes when they saw how she and Tyrion gave Joy some preferential treatment over other highborn ladies. The only one allowed to share their dinner was a bastard girl. For Sansa, it was some way to amend for the wrong way she treated her own half-brother Jon. Two months after she sent the raven to Castleblack, they were still without news. Sansa feared her last brother could be dead. That was unfair, just at the moment she tried to renew contact with him.

Joy was the only one who sometimes shared Sansa’s dinner with Tyrion. All the other times, they were alone at this moment and would talk about various things. Conversations could go from jokes to politics. Often, serious matters were treated in half-serious half-laughing ways. Sometimes Tyrion would leave shortly after dinner for other duties, and sometimes Sansa used these moments to pray in the Stone Garden, or she would simply read some book Tyrion recommended to her, or go to sleep immediately if she was very tired. But Tyrion would always join her in their bed at some moment, and they would always keep a physical contact during the night, even if it was only their hands brushing each other. Sometimes she wished they would do more…

The thought sent chills through her spine. Last week, she had awoken with her head resting on Tyrion, and he had done the same things he did the morning following their arrival at Casterly Rock.
He had kissed her on her temple and lower on her forehead, nearly on her nose. The same feelings Sansa had had her first morning in the castle returned, but they felt better because she expected them. She had wished in this moment that Tyrion continued. She was close to slide her hand under his nightshirt, but Tyrion had relented just like the first time. Sansa didn’t know now if she wanted their marriage to go further. She didn’t even know for sure why she always let the door open when she took a bath. Did she do it only for Tyrion to understand she trusted him? Or did she want something else?

Her marriage with Tyrion confused her a lot. That wasn’t at all the kind of union she was expecting. The whole time she was in Winterfell and received lessons from her septa and her mother, she was always told to remain humble, devoted, and obedient towards her husband. She never questioned it. Her father and her mother were happy together this way, and the stories told exactly the same things. But her marriage with Tyrion was entirely different. He wasn’t asking much from her. The only thing he really obliged her to do was her lessons with Creylen. She ran Casterly Rock and its household, but anyway Sansa was expected to do so and Tyrion never really gave her an order about this. He asked for her advice on political matters when they held court together or sometimes during their daily dinner, but he didn’t really force her to do much.

In fact, Tyrion seemed to expect her to act as Lady of Casterly Rock more than to act as his wife. She had total freedom outside her duties as first Lady of House Lannister. Tyrion didn’t ask her anything as his wife. Perhaps that was what troubled Sansa the most. Her marriage was totally different from what she imagined as a little girl, or even the conception of a marriage she received from her parents. It was as if Tyrion was waiting for her to take decisions about them when he should be the one taking these decisions. Sansa didn’t feel like she should take decisions for them both. It wasn’t supposed to be like that. Everything was alright between her and her husband. Their relationship was very healthy and good, but she had the impression there could be so much more between them, yet she couldn’t resolve herself to take the first step. That would be so easy if Tyrion only asked her. She wouldn’t complain if he asked her something, no matter what it was. She knew he would never hurt her. But he didn’t ask anything from her as his wife. He only asked things from her as Lady of the Westerlands.

Cerenna and Sansa resumed their play for another half-hour, then they left the gardens. They played in the gardens when the weather allowed it, and when not they would play in a room specially designed for playing music. It wasn’t called a music room for nothing. They went separate ways, Cerenna heading to the quarters of her family to dine with her sister and their mother, Myranda Lefford, while Sansa headed to the godswood. She wanted to pray in the Stone Garden before she went to dine with Tyrion. The weirwood tree was a twisted one, but Sansa could still feel the presence of the Old Gods all the same when she prayed there. She found Joy before the tree, praying. Joy prayed often since Sansa taught her how to worship the Old Gods. The faith in the Old Gods allowed a more personal relationship with gods in comparison to the Seven. There were no rituals. You only had to speak to the gods in your heart and they would listen to you. Joy was alone most of the time, so Sansa guessed she found more comfort in this faith than in the Seven. She could speak to the Old Gods as if they were people she knew, and without the presence of anyone else since she was about the only one in Casterly Rock, except Sansa, to follow them.

Sansa silently knelt before the false weirwood tree and started her prayer. She prayed for her dead family. She prayed for her friends Margaery and Mira in King’s Landing. She prayed for the people she had come to know here in Casterly Rock, including Genna, Dorna, Janei, Joy, Lanna, her husband Lord Jast, Cerenna, her brother Daven, Darlessa, and even Myrielle. She also prayed for Ser Kevan still in the capital. He had been kind with her in general, and she had to be grateful to him considering the loss of his three sons. She prayed for the surviving members of her family who were possibly still alive. Her granduncle Brynden at Riverrun. Her sister Arya who Tyrion thought might still be alive. Her brother Jon at the Wall. She prayed a very long time for him, hoping he was still alive. She didn’t pray for her aunt Lysa. She didn’t prove to be family, and was now married to Littlefinger. Tyrion was more family to Sansa than Lady Arryn. She prayed for him lastly. She also prayed for a short winter, an end to the war, and for the gods to give her the force to fulfill her duties here at Casterly Rock and to give Winterfell back to her family one day.

Sansa opened the eyes when she was done. Joy was still praying next to her. Sansa wondered if the little girl noticed her presence. She was so quiet. Sansa stayed there, looking at Joy who continued to pray for a very long time. Sansa never saw someone pray so fervently the Old Gods. When Joy finally opened her eyes, evening was about to replace afternoon. Joy looked surprised to see her, but her stunned look was quickly replaced by a large smile.

“Sansa! I’m glad to see you!” Joy rose quickly to hug her. It was in these moments that her name took all its sense. She was always happy to see Tyrion or Sansa. Despite the fact Sansa was only three years older than Joy, she had come to see Sansa as some sort of motherly figure. Perhaps it was because Joy saw Tyrion as some sort of uncle since he was twenty years older than her, and Sansa was Tyrion’s wife. Joy never knew her mother. She never had one.

“I’m glad to see you too, Joy. What were you praying for today?” Sansa pulled herself out of Joy’s embrace.

“Well, I prayed for snow to come quickly.” Joy wanted so much to see snow since Sansa described it to her. “I prayed for everyone here. I prayed for my cousin Daven, for you and for Uncle Tyrion.”

Sansa smiled at this. “Thank you, Joy. I appreciate it a lot.”

Joy looked a bit sad at this moment. “I also prayed for my father. And your sister Arya. And your brother Jon. I hope they’re all alive somewhere.”

That nearly brought tears to Sansa. Joy was sweet like Sansa used to be before she came to King’s Landing. She was probably the only one among the Lannisters who really worried about Sansa’s family except Tyrion. Sansa didn’t blame them, after all they didn’t share any close link with Arya and Jon, and until recently they were still at war with the Starks. However, Joy seemed to have taken a real interest in Sansa’s brothers and sister. Sansa had confided a little bit about Arya and Jon, and even about Bran and Rickon to Joy. Joy was very interested in meeting Jon (he was a bastard just like her), Arya (she was approximately the same age than Sansa’s little sister) and to visit the North and Winterfell one day. Without revealing too much or talking against the injustice the Lannisters committed towards her family, Sansa talked to Joy about her entire family except her father and Robb. And now Joy was praying for people she never met. The fact Joy was a Hill instead of a Lannister made things easier for Sansa to tell her how she missed her own family, just like Joy confided how much she missed her father.

Sansa lightly shivered. A little cold breeze blew. “We should get back inside before we catch a cold.”

Joy followed her. “Sansa, can I dine with you and Uncle Tyrion tonight?”

Sansa sighed and smiled at Joy in regret. “I’m sorry, Joy. We have some important matters to discuss this evening. I’ll bring you with me tomorrow. I promise.”

Joy seemed saddened at the news, but she resigned and didn’t complain. Sansa rarely heard her complain about anything. She brought the girl to her chamber, then went to her own rooms she shared with Tyrion. The dinner was already spread on the table and included boar, many vegetables and wine from the Arbor. Sansa looked at the size of the jug. The servants obeyed her orders and made sure there wasn’t enough wine in it to get drunk.
“That’s a change.” The voice came from the solar. Tyrion walked out of it and came to her. “Normally you’re the one to wait for me when dinner comes.”

Tyrion said it playfully and with a small grin on his face. He wasn’t serious. Sansa decided to play. “I thought it was only fair that you wait for one time instead.”

They both chuckled as they took place and started to eat. Tyrion talked to her about the progression in the construction of the fleet to fight the Iron Islands. Just like Tyrion, Sansa hoped the Iron Throne would defeat Stannis Baratheon quickly so they could deal with the Ironmen. They destroyed Winterfell and burnt her two little brothers. Sansa wanted them to pay for that. She wished she could use the same methods she used against Cersei. Sadly, only swords, arrows and ships would force the Iron Islands on their knees, not words. Sansa could only hope like Tyrion that the Redwyne fleet would come back quickly from Dragonstone to attack the Iron Islands with Tyrion’s ships.

Strange news had arrived from King’s Landing last week. Dragonstone was under siege, but strangely the Redwynes didn’t meet great resistance. The five thousand men Stannis was still supposed to command with their ships had mostly vanished and only a little garrison was left to defend the island and its fortress. According to some inhabitants they questioned, Stannis’s fleet left a few days before the Redwynes arrived, sailing north. Sansa wondered why Stannis Baratheon abandoned Dragonstone to head north. Tyrion hypothesized Stannis might try to take White Harbor, or even convince the Manderlys to side with him and to start a war against the Boltons. He could try to bring the North against the people who killed their king and use their will of revenge, but Tyrion doubted many northern houses would follow Stannis. Most of them still had a family member held in hostage by the Freys or the Boltons, and Stannis didn’t and couldn’t offer them very much for their support. Tyrion didn’t expect Stannis to last more than a few days if the Manderlys shut their harbor before his fleet, and no more than a few months if they opened it against all odds.

“Did we receive any raven today?” Sansa asked as they started with the dessert. She asked hopefully, though she knew what would be the answer. Tyrion’s face quickly gave away the answer.

“No, Sansa. We still have no news from the Wall.” Sansa closed her eyes, desperate. “We’ll know the moment we receive the raven. I told Creylen to warn me immediately when a raven would arrive from Castleblack.” Tyrion tried to reassure her.

“It’s been two months now. He should have answered.”

“Your brother may be on an expedition beyond the Wall right now. These can last several months. It could explain the time he needs to answer your message.”

“Do you really think it’s good news if he’s north of the Wall with a wildling army marching against it?”

Tyrion needed some time before he answered. Sansa had asked that defiantly. “I would be very surprised if your brother was dead. He was a better swordsman than your brother Robb, and your uncle Benjen was First Ranger. Rangers know how to survive in very difficult conditions. Even if the Wall falls, I’m quite sure he survived. And anyway I don’t think the Wall fell, we would have received some news about it. Perhaps the Night’s Watch simply decided to answer no longer to ravens from the south since we never answered their pleas for help for the last years.”

Tyrion meant the last proposition more as a joke and that brought a little smile on her lips, though she still worried about Jon. She was grateful that Tyrion tried to reassure her, but she would only be reassured when her half-brother would answer and she would know he still lived for sure.

“Tyrion, when you went to the Wall with Jon, did he ever talk about me?” Sansa wondered if Jon... was thinking about her right now, but since she had no way to know it, she could only try to know if he thought about her while on his way north.

Tyrion took a sip of wine before he answered, his mouth twisting. “Not much, I must admit. But we didn’t talk a lot on our way. Your brother was quite unfriendly towards me at first. I called him bastard and told him the truth about the Wall, trying to prepare him for what was waiting for him there. He started to call me dwarf after some time.” Tyrion smiled shortly. “I think he was thankful afterwards when he saw what the Wall really was. Imagine how he felt when he discovered the Night’s Watch was a bunch of thieves, rapists and killers and the only one who warned him about this was a dwarf, and even worse a Lannister. He became more opened after that, especially after he received the news your brother Bran had woken up. He talked a little about you and all his brothers and sisters.”

Sansa nodded. “I never really treated him like my brother. I was such an ass to him. I saw him only as a bastard, just like my mother did.” Sansa felt remorseful, thinking of how she never considered Jon like her brother. They had the same father, and yet because her mother saw him like someone who should never have existed, Sansa acted towards Jon as if he was inferior to her. “I would like to go back in the past and change everything.”

Tyrion nodded in approval. “Yes, I know what you mean. There are many things that I’ve done I would like to change me too.” They remained silent for a moment, lost in their thoughts. “If you could change something you did, what would you change first?”

Sansa thought about it a moment. There were so many things she would like to change in the past. She knew what she would change. “I would tell the truth about how Joffrey attacked Arya on the Kingsroad.” Lady would still be alive if she had told the truth back then, instead of believing blindly Joffrey was perfect and lying to protect him. “What would you change?”

Tyrion’s gaze fell to the ground. “I wouldn’t rape my wife.”

Sansa regretted she asked this. She remembered how Tyrion was when he told her the story of Tysha. It was the only time she saw him crying. “I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have asked.”

“Don’t be sorry. I’m the one who did it.” Tyrion’s voice was full of grief and he didn’t look at her.

“You’re not responsible. Your father forced you to do it.”

Tyrion scoffed. “Not responsible? My father gave the order, but I’m the one who did it all the same. Gregor Clegane is not innocent of the murder of the Targaryen children because my father ordered him to kill them. This is the same for my first wife. I had the choice to disobey, and I didn’t.” He paused for a moment. “You remember when my father ordered me to rape you? Would you say I wasn’t responsible if I did obey his command?”

Sansa had no answer for this. Tyrion looked at her with a painful expression, then averted his eyes on the floor. None of them said anything after that. Sansa wished she could say something to comfort her husband, but nothing came to her mind. When the servants came to take back the empty plates, Tyrion left for the solar, closing the door behind him. He hadn’t looked at her a single time during the rest of the dinner.

Sansa changed for a red nightgown and went to sleep. As she slid under the blankets, she felt Tyrion’s absence. Most of the time, they both went to bed approximately at the same time, but she felt Tyrion would only join her much later, if he ever joined her this night. Tyrion was always able to make her feel better, to give her hope or a reason to live when she was desperate or felt everything collapsed around her. He was always there for her. But Sansa couldn’t tell the same of her. She had never been able to comfort him in any way in these situations. What a wife she was! She wasn’t even able to say if she loved him or not. Sansa needed a long time before she fell asleep, and when she slept, she had nightmares. She fell asleep without Tyrion, and she woke up next morning without him.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Arya
Arya opened her eyes, awakened by the snores of the old woman lying next to her. Arya hated it. She was forced to sleep with this old boring handmaiden all nights for more than a month now. She would gladly start again to sleep in the same bed than Sansa, but right now Sansa was in Casterly Rock sharing her bed with… Arya preferred to not think about it.

Arya got up from her featherbed. She hated this bed too. She was used to sleep on the ground among rocks, earth, dust, exposed to wind and rain, only a thin blanket separating her from the hard ground when she had one. She didn’t like to sleep in a featherbed again with a nightgown. And to sleep with this old dried maid didn’t make things any better. This old woman was officially her handmaiden, but Arya knew she was there to watch her. She was more spy than servant.

After she was taken out of the sky cells, her aunt gave her an audience in her bedchamber. Lady Lysa Arryn looked at Arya as if she was an enemy, barely acknowledging her as her niece. She told Arya she kept her alive out of mercy because she was her blood according to Littlefinger and it was only because he convinced her to spare Arya that she was still at the Eyrie. Her aunt wouldn’t tolerate any other threat against her son and Arya had to behave like a lady if she didn’t want to be handed to the Lannisters. Her aunt wouldn’t accept any mistake from her.

It became very apparent through the days that Littlefinger was the one ruling the Eyrie. Her aunt always called him Petyr, and the few times Arya saw them together, she always looked at him the same way Sansa used to look at Joffrey, but worse. This disgusted Arya. This man betrayed her father, and her aunt loved him and followed all his advices. The guards in the Eyrie were all in Littlefinger’s pocket, just like most of the servants. Her cousin Robert Arryn always jumped to hug him whenever he saw his step-father. Littlefinger and her aunt made sure Arya was watched day and night. Most of the time, she travelled through the Eyrie with her old maid, and there was always at least one guard to watch her from afar. The one Arya hated the most was Ser Lyn Corbray. He reminded her so much of Meryn Trant that Arya was about to add him on her list. She saw him beating a young servant once.

The Eyrie was a boring place where Arya couldn’t do much. Furthermore, Littlefinger made people believe she was his niece, Alayne Baelish. Except the guards in the High Hall when she arrived and the guards at the Bloody Gate, no one knew who she really was except her aunt, her cousin and Littlefinger. All these people were sworn to keep the secret of her true identity. That wasn’t the first time Arya had to take another identity, but she hated to be seen as Littlefinger’s niece. However, she had no choice for now. The Lannisters couldn’t know she was there. She was a prisoner, but if she had to choose between being prisoner of the Lannisters or Littlefinger, she didn’t think one would be better than the other. Anyway, she couldn’t escape this place. She tried to think about a way to get out for several weeks and couldn’t find any. She would have to wait for an opportunity when they would leave the Eyrie. In the meantime, she had to play her role as Alayne Baelish, a role she hated.

Arya had grown impatient. She couldn’t do anything here in the Eyrie. Littlefinger promised her he would help her to kill the people on her list, but so far he did nothing. She was stuck in this mountain, condemned to spend days doing nothing. Her cousin Robin Arryn was a little boy pampered by his mother she rarely saw, and she had no interest in doing anything with this frail boy who was called Lord of the Vale. She was disgusted by his habit to feed from his mother’s breast at his age. Arya’s cousin was older than Rickon, but looked younger than him so frail he was. Arya had to spend most of her days doing needlework, something she hated to do, even more with the old maid. Instead she spent a lot of time reciting her list in her head. Cersei. Walder Frey. Roose Bolton.
Littlefinger. Lysa Arryn. The Imp. She would escape as soon as an opportunity presented itself.

Looking outside through the window, Arya realized snow was falling. It had been so long since she saw snow. She put a cloak on her shoulders and went to the godswood. It wasn’t a real godswood since there was no weirwood tree in it. The soil was too thin and too stony for weirwood to take root here. Snow was covering it all now. Winter is coming. But right now, snowflakes were falling and flying all around innocently. It remembered Arya of Winterfell. She had tried to make snowballs the day they left, but it kept breaking apart all the time. Arya tried to make some now and succeeded.
She remembered a day when she and Bran ambushed Sansa and threw snowballs at her as she was coming out in the courtyard. Sansa was covered by snow very quickly and ran after her through all the castle until she slid on ice. Arya had come to see if Sansa was injured, but when she discovered her sister was alright, she threw another snowball right in her face. Only Sansa got her revenge by grabbing her leg and pulling her down, then by rubbing snow all over Arya’s hair. Arya wished she could go back to this time and start again her funny quarrels with her sister.

Arya looked for targets where she could throw snowballs. She started to aim for firs, benches, then to specific bars of grids and to stones on the walls. After a moment, she couldn’t miss a single target, but after an hour of throwing snowballs, she grew bored of this. She noticed a branch on the ground that looked quite straight. She could imagine it was Needle. She couldn’t get back her sword.
Littlefinger said her aunt would never allow her to carry a sword all around, but she suspected the man didn’t want to have her with a sword either. He was probably afraid she would kill him. Arya started to practice her water dancing. She was only holding a branch, so the guard watching her wouldn’t have anything to say against it. Arya quickly got lost in her movements, repeating everything Syrio taught her in King’s Landing. She made swift and fluid moves, imagining she was fighting some opponent or another. She wished she had Needle and could kill Meryn Trant or Ilyn Payne right now, or even the Imp. He wouldn’t be hard to kill. She couldn’t imagine this little man being able to defend himself.

Arya didn’t know how much time she practiced the Water Dance. It was the first time in an eternity she could practice it, even only with a branch, when she was interrupted by footsteps behind her. All her instincts alert, she turned to face the intruder. It was her cousin, Robin Arryn, swaddled in many furs and cloaks that made him look twice bigger than he was in reality, though he was still far too much skinny with all this on his shoulders. Arya had put aside her cloak long ago. The gown she was obliged to wear didn’t make sword practicing easy, but the cloak made it even worse, and she moved enough for the heat her body released to replace the warmth of her cloak.

“What are you doing?” the boy asked with an odd face, as if he couldn’t understand why she moved this way.

“I’m training,” Arya replied before she dedicated her mind again to her practice. She could feel the presence of her cousin close to her, but paid no mind to him. She could make her moves for a few minutes before he interrupted her.

“Why are you swinging a branch all around like this?”

Arya didn’t stop to move. “I imagine it’s a sword.”

“But this is no sword.”

“Not, it isn’t,” Arya confirmed with an exasperated voice. “That’s why I only imagine this is a sword.”

“But why are you swinging a branch imagining this is a sword?”

Arya stopped and looked directly in the eyes of her cousin. “To practice. To make sure that the next time someone tries to kill me, I can defend myself.”

“Why, there’s no reason to be afraid here. We’re safe and no one wants to hurt us.”

Arya nearly laughed at the stupidity of her cousin. “We’re never safe anywhere. There are always people who want to kill us, and if we’re not ready to fight in order to survive, then when they strike, they will kill us.”

The boy looked thoughtful for a moment. “The knights of the Vale will not let anybody kill me. They will protect me. I’m their lord. No one can hurt me.”

Arya sighed. “You’re really stupid. You think because you’re their lord they will protect you? My father was Hand of the King, and he was killed. My brother was King in the North, and he was killed by one of his own men who betrayed him. Joffrey was King, and he was poisoned inside his own castle while surrounded by his kingsguards. Do you really think you’re safer than them? You can’t rely on anyone, only yourself. When someone strikes at you, in the end, you’re the only one who can protect yourself. And that’s why I train, so when someone tries to kill me, instead I’m the one who kills him. And so one day I can kill the people who murdered my family.”

Arya’s cousin stood right before her, his jaw falling. She really found him stupid. He knew nothing of the real world. He remained hidden here while people were fighting and dying outside. He was a coward, just like his mother and his knights who did nothing to help her brother when he needed them the most. Arya resumed her practice, but after a few minutes she was stopped again.

“Do you think you could show me how you do it? My mother says I shouldn’t worry about learning how to fight, but she says I am strong. If I am strong, I should be able to defend myself. I shouldn’t have to rely on the knights of the Vale.”

Arya looked carefully at her cousin. There was a determination in his eyes, but it was essentially pride who talked in him. He believed he was strong. Well, Arya didn’t have much to do anyway, so she had nothing to lose by trying to teach him a few things. With some miracle, perhaps he would be less childish one day. Arya took another branch on the ground, gave it to the Lord of the Vale and started to teach him the rudiments of the Water Dancing. However, it proved to be quite a challenge. He held the branch like a toy and was unable to make the simplest movements Arya tried to teach him. She quickly lost her patience with him, and Robin Arryn lost it even more quickly. He finally dropped his imaginary sword in fury on the ground.

“This is useless. I can’t use it. It’s not even a real sword, and my mother says I shouldn’t use any or else I could hurt myself,” he nearly cried.

“Of course, you’ll get hurt by using a sword, but because of the others you’re fighting, not because of yourself. And if you held the branch properly, you would learn the moves well enough. You don’t focus enough.”

“I’m the Lord of the Vale!” the boy screamed. “I don’t need to fight! It’s boring and dangerous according to my mother. She says my men will always be here to protect me.”

Arya stroked him suddenly with her own branch on the cheek, then on is arm, then his legs. The boy screamed in pain. Arya was angry at him. “If it had been a real sword, you would be dead right now. Did your knights protect you? You stayed at the top of a mountain all the time. You know nothing how the world really works. You’ll end up dead, killed by someone in your sleep, or poisoned while you eat, just like Joffrey. You’re stupid, and you’re a coward.”

“I’m not a coward,” he cried. Arya was disgusted by this boy. He was no better than Joffrey.

“Then prove it.” She took the branch he dropped on the ground and threw it at him. “Fight me. Prove you can defend yourself.”

Robin Arryn hadn’t caught the sword when Arya threw it in his direction, and he made no effort to take it. “I don’t need to fight. I’m the Lord of the Vale.”

Arya boiled in anger. She hit him with her branch, using the techniques Syrio taught her. She hit him everywhere. He only raised his arms to protect his face, letting Arya hit him wherever she wanted. After a moment, the boy was on the ground and Arya continued to hit him, trying to bring him to fight back, but he didn’t. At the end, she abandoned when she saw him with a few bruises and cuts, his clothes tattered by her several attacks.

“You’re a coward!” she shouted at him.

“No. No. Please don’t.” Her cousin looked back at her. All of a sudden, she wasn’t at the Eyrie anymore, but on the Kingsroad between Winterfell and King’s Landing, and instead of Robin Arryn it was Joffrey who laid on the ground, begging her to stop and to not kill him while a second before he played the proud prince who could do as he liked. The two boys had exactly the same expression. Arya threw her branch away, revolted before the cowardice of her cousin.

“What have you done?” A maester ran in their direction with two servants and came to look at the craven lord lying on the ground. Arya’s arm was seized from behind by an iron gauntlet. Arya turned to face its owner and found herself face to face with Ser Lyn Corbray.

“I think you’ll have a few things to explain to Lady Arryn.” Arya was about to try getting free of his grip, but before both could do anything, another voice interrupted them.

“Please stop, Ser Lyn.” Littlefinger came down from the stairs of the garden and went to them. “Let me handle this matter. She is my niece after all. I’ll make sure she is dealt with accordingly. Escort maester Colemon with the servants to a place where they can take care of Lord Robin.”

Lyn Corbray released her and left with the three other people carrying Robin in their arms. He shot a last hateful glance at Arya. She would have another name on her list tonight. When they were alone, Littlefinger laughed.

“That was quite entertaining. His mother should have done this a long time ago. I guess we can consider it a step in the right direction. With some hope he will remember what you taught him today.”

Arya looked at the man before her, putting as much hatred on her face and in her voice as she addressed him. “He’s a coward. He’s weak. And he thinks himself to be strong. He remained hidden here while my family was being slaughtered. And you’re no better. You’re just like him. A coward.”

Littlefinger’s little smile didn’t leave his face. “So fierce. You remember me of your uncle Brandon. You’re right, the knights of the Vale remained out of this conflict when they should have done something, but essentially because your aunt gave them the order. Most of them wanted to go to war alongside your brother, and perhaps the outcome of the war would have been different if they did, but the person who’s responsible of all this is your aunt Lysa. Without her, the Vale would have sided with your brother without hesitation. You saw the results of her inaction at the Twins, and again now. Her son’s cowardice and childish ways are the result of the pampering she surrounded him with for all his life. She’s the one you should really hate right now. You can consider me as a friend, or an ally at least, but I don’t think you can consider your aunt this way.”

“I want to kill you as much as I want to kill her,” Arya replied hostilily.

“Of course, but for now you have every interest to keep me alive, or else Lysa will kill you. And I am the only person who could help in getting other names out of the list you recite every night.”

“How? I’ve been stuck here for weeks without anything to do. You’re not helping me. You’re holding me against my will.”

“Soon, you’ll have your chance to remove someone from your list. I promise.”

“I don’t believe you. You betrayed my father. Why wouldn’t you betray me too?”

“Because I have no interest to betray you. You are the last child of Cat who isn’t dead nor held by the Lannisters. And there are people on your list we both want to see dead. I suggest you go back to your room. I’ll have Ser Lyn watch your door.”

“I hate him. And he hates me. I don’t want him close to me.”

“Ser Lyn obeys my orders. He won’t do anything against you unless I give him the order. So don’t give me a reason to give him the order.”

Littlefinger went away with the same wicked smile he always had. Arya hated this man, but for now she had no choice but to remain with him, just like she had no choice but to remain with Yoren, Tywin Lannister, Beric Dondarrion and the Hound before him. Arya went back to her room. Again, she was stuck with the old maid. She tried again to think about a way to escape, but it was useless. The trail leading from the Eyrie to the Bloody Gate was dangerous and she would have four castles to go through before she reached the Bloody Gate where she would have to escape from the knights and guards keeping it. Then she would have to go through the Eastern Road with the hill tribes who could attack her everywhere at any time. And once in the Riverlands, what would she do? The fact she had no weapon didn’t make the escape easier. She couldn’t get away for now. She had to stay here and play the role of Alayne Baelish.

Arya went to her bed and rested her head on the pillow while the old woman sat to make needlework like she always did. She resumed the enumeration of the names in her head. Cersei. Walder Frey. Roose Bolton. Black Walder. Meryn Trant. The Red Woman. Beric Dondarrion. Thoros of Myr. Ilyn Payne. Littlefinger. Lysa Arryn. The Imp. Lyn Corbray. That was the only thing she could do. She already knew every detail of her room and wouldn’t gain anything from examining all of them again. She repeated the names again, again, and again, until someone unlocked her door. They were about the middle of the day. This person entered without asking and Arya was both angry and afraid to see Lyn Corbray stand on the threshold.

“Come.” He said nothing else.
“Where?”

“This is none of your concern.”

Arya had no choice but to follow, but not without shoving the knight while getting through the door. He couldn’t do anything to her because of the orders he received. Arya took pleasure in shoving him when they crossed paths. She remained on guard. She didn’t want Corbray to do anything against her. All her senses were wide-awake. They started to walk and very soon Arya had a good idea where they were heading. She explored the Eyrie during the last few weeks and managed to know the castle very well. It was smaller than Winterfell, so it wasn’t very difficult to know all the places on her fingertips. She could wander in its corridor in her own mind, and sadly it didn’t help her to find a way to escape. They arrived to the High Hall, the great doors wide opened. Arya noticed only her aunt was present. There were no guards. Only her, and now Arya and Lyn Corbray. Two people on her list were standing alone with her in the same room. Her aunt was looking at something on the floor, in the center of the room, and Arya noticed wind was making waves on her gown. There was an opening inside the circle of marble and Arya thought she saw something white. She realized what it was. The Moon Door. She heard about it once at Winterfell, and a few times here. People sentenced to death were thrown through it and made a fall of hundreds feet, making sure they would die once they hit the ground.

“Thank you, Ser Lyn. You may leave.” The knight left and closed the doors behind him. Arya was now alone with her aunt. “Come here, Arya.”

Arya approached carefully, still expecting anything. She didn’t trust her aunt. She told Arya she would send her to the Lannisters if she threatened her son again. Arya just gave him a few bruises. Who knew how her aunt would react? She remained a step behind Lysa Arryn.

“Do you know how far the fall is?” she asked Arya.

“No,” Arya simply answered. She didn’t know the exact height of the fall, though she knew it was several hundreds of feet.

“Neither do I, precisely. Hundreds of feet.” That was nothing new for Arya. “It’s fascinating what happens to bodies when they hit the rocks from such a height. The impact breaks them right apart. Like eggs dropped on the floor. Sometimes pieces remain intact. You’ll find the head sitting on its own. Every hair in place. Grey eyes staring at nothing.” Her aunt turned to face her, hatred plain on her face. “I know what you did.”

Arya returned her gaze. “Robin wanted me to teach him how to fight. I just showed him.”

“Liar! My Sweetrobin would never ask this. You beat him. I forbade him to fight.”

“You allow him to be a coward, you mean,” countered Arya defiantly.

“I forbid you to call him a coward.”

“He’s a coward! He’s a weak boy without brain! And you’re a coward without brain just like him!”

“I defend you to talk to your aunt like this.”

“You’re not my aunt,” Arya said calmly, but filling her voice with as much hatred and disdain she could for this woman who claimed to be her aunt. “A real aunt would never order her niece to be executed. She wouldn’t abandon her sister. You’re no better than Littlefinger, or Cersei who plotted to arrest my father. Robin Arryn is no better than Joffrey who beheaded my father. He’s a weak and little monster.”
Arya saw the slap coming and ducked right before her aunt could hit her. She hit her aunt in the tummy with her right foot. Lysa Arryn stumbled behind and fell through the Moon Door. In the last moment, she could grab the edge with a single hand. Arya approached to look at her. Terror was obvious on her face, her free arm waving through the air, trying to grip something with it.

“Help me! Help me!” she screamed. She looked at Arya. “Arya! My niece! Save me! I’m your aunt!”

Arya looked at Lysa Arryn, Lady of the Vale, without a single hint of pity. “Did you help my family when they asked for your help? You wanted to throw me through it. Why should I help you? You’re on my list, you did nothing for me or my family. You betrayed my father, you betrayed my mother, you betrayed my brother, and you have nothing to give me.”

Arya crushed Lysa’s fingers with her foot and what had been her mother’s sister fell, screaming. Arya looked at her falling from hundreds of feet of altitude until she lost sight of her. She remained there for a long moment, staring through the opening. She then looked around. No one was here. No one except Lyn Corbray on the other side of the door. He may have heard something. Arya went to the doors and knocked on it. She hid behind a wall out of sight for anyone who entered. The doors opened and she heard footsteps.

“Lady Arryn? You asked for me?” No doubt about the voice, it was Lyn Corbray. The knight passed before Arya, his eyes in the other direction, and right at this moment Arya jumped on him and stabbed him on his right side where his armor didn’t protect him. She had taken his knife when she shoved him before and hidden it in her gown. Then she stabbed him again on the left side while he exhaled a cry of pain, then in his neck. The knight fell on the floor, blood spurting from his throat. He was dead. Two names were erased from her list.

“Seize her! Lock her in her room.” Men flooded through the doors and took her by the arms and the legs. Arya lost the knife she had in her hands. As she was brought outside, she saw Littlefinger with a cruel smile on his lips. She struggled to free herself, without success. She wanted to kill him. However, she wasn’t knocked out like when the Hound was killed and they only brought her back to her room, not to the sky cells. No one came to see her after they dropped her in her room and locked it. She was left alone for the rest of the day.

This night, Arya recited her list again. Cersei. Walder Frey. Roose Bolton. Black Walder. Meryn Trant. The Red Woman. Beric Dondarrion. Thoros of Myr. Ilyn Payne. Littlefinger. The Imp. She just killed her aunt. Well, in fact she wasn’t her aunt. She married a man who betrayed Arya’s family. She abandoned her mother and her brothers. She was a traitor as much as Baelish was. Arya didn’t feel any remorse about it. As for Lyn Corbray, he deserved his death without any doubt him too. She felt he would have done something against her one day, no matter Littlefinger’s orders. When Arya fell asleep, she dreamed she was a huge wolf running with her pack behind her, chasing stags, lions, eagles, birds and men.

On the morning, the old maid brought her breakfast. Arya tried to ask her what would happen to her, but the old woman looked deaf to her words. Arya had no more success when she came back to take the untouched plates. Arya wouldn’t eat what was given to her. It could be poisoned. She wasn’t stupid like Joffrey. The midday meal and the dinner brought exactly the same things with her failed attempts to know what would happen and the food she refused to eat. She could live very long time without much food. Her time in the Riverlands made her used to food scarcity.

On the second morning, the old maid brought food again, but this time she took a mouthful of each plate and drank some of the water destined to Arya. She decided she could eat it finally, but she still had no answer to her questions. This went on for this day and the following one. Then, on the fourth day of her incarceration, Littlefinger came not long after the breakfast.

“This time you weren’t thrown in the sky cells,” he said as he entered. He looked as if it was meant to be funny, but if that was the case he failed miserably.

“What do you want?” Arya asked. She had no intention to play riddles to discover what this man wanted.

“I want to thank you first.” Nothing could have surprised Arya more.

“What?”

“You helped me a lot. You got rid of Lysa for me, which makes me the Regent of the Vale until your cousin comes of age. You also killed a man devoted to me in the process, but this is a small price to pay for what Lysa’s death brings to me.” Arya couldn’t believe what she just heard. The man was smiling at her, with joy but not in thankfulness. “I told you there were people on your list we both wanted to see dead.”

Arya understood. “You used me! You wanted me to kill aunt Lysa.”

“I did. And I gave you the chance to kill two people you wanted to see dead at the same time. I wasn’t sure you would kill Ser Lyn, but I sent him first inside and alone just in case. He started to be quite hard to please. He cost me a lot in gold and boys. I got rid of an ally who was becoming quite bothersome.”

Arya stared at the man. “And now?”

She saw concern on his face suddenly. “I had to send the news about Lysa’s death to all the Lords of the Vale.”

“And you blamed me, of course,” Arya retorted.

Littlefinger looked falsely offended. “Do you really think I would blame my niece? No. You are Cat’s daughter. I told them Ser Lyn pushed Lysa through the Moon Door and that we arrived too late. We tried to arrest him and he resisted, so we had no choice but to kill him. The guards who witnessed it are with me. I pay them very well. Some Lords of the Vale may have doubts about this story, for sure, but I’ll handle them. Once I have them in my hand, we’ll leave the Eyrie. And you’ll be able to cross off other names. In the meantime, you’ll stay here. I don’t want other accidents to happen before we leave.”

Littlefinger left. Arya couldn’t be sure of anything. She killed people she wanted dead, but she was used by the man who betrayed her father. He wanted her to kill Lysa Arryn. That made Arya angry. She couldn’t trust this man. He was even worse than the Brotherhood and the Hound. At least with them she knew what they wanted, but she had no idea what Littlefinger wanted. She had to get away from him as soon as possible. For now, she could only hope they would leave this damn castle very soon.

Days went on and Arya received no visit. She thought she might die of boredom if it continued that way. If only she was Sansa, she could sew to spend time, but she wasn’t Sansa and she couldn’t remain confined in the same room for days without leaving. She was only disturbed by the maid bringing her meals, emptying her chamberpot and bringing her clean clothes each day. She gave up to learn anything from her very quickly. Arya had been a prisoner several times before, but she always had something to do and at least she could spend a part of her days outside, while now she was confined between the same four walls all time.
Arya’s thoughts turned to her brother Jon. He was at the Wall. If she could escape, she might be able to catch a ship at Gulltown that would bring her to Eastwatch-by-the-Sea, and from there she could go to Castleblack. She wanted to see Jon again. He was her last brother. Surely he thought she was dead now. How happy he would be when he would see her again. And Arya would be happy too. There was surely a smithy at Castleblack. Jon could have a new sword made for her, one like Needle. She could fight alongside him against the wildlings. They could practice together. She could show him how good she became with a sword and with a bow. But for now, these were only dreams. She had to escape first, and before she escaped, they had to leave the Eyrie, no matter the way.

Arya was never good to dream of a perfect life. She didn’t feel it was like her. Her sister was always the one for that. The thought of Sansa at Casterly Rock filled her with rage again. Rage against Joffrey, against Cersei, against the Imp, and against Baelish. Without his betrayal, Sansa wouldn’t be the Lady of House Lannister right now. Arya had come to the conclusion that Sansa may have decided to stay with the Lannisters and to enjoy being with them because she believed all her family was dead. Arya was believed dead by almost everyone. Sansa probably believed only Jon was alive, and Sansa barely saw Jon as a brother, so she gave herself to the Lannisters. She had no pack left, just like Arya, so she was trying to make the Lannisters her new pack, just like Arya had tried to make her a new pack too. She had to get her sister out of this castle. If Sansa knew she was still alive, she might realize her mistake and Arya could bring her back with her to Jon. Only, Casterly Rock was far away, and Arya didn’t see how she could enter Casterly Rock, then escape with her sister and travel all the way to the Wall without being noticed. Sansa wasn’t used to hard life like her, and she would be recognized everywhere. The best course of action was surely to go to the Wall first, then to see with Jon what they could do to help their sister. But Arya wouldn’t abandon Sansa. She was a stupid sister, but her sister nonetheless.

Two weeks after Littlefinger’s visit, two men entered in her room early in the morning. They didn’t bear the eagle of House Arryn as a sigil. Theirs was black points on a bronze field, bordered by runes. They also bore another sigil on their breastplate. Arya thought she saw this sigil once, but she couldn’t remember where. One of them addressed her.

”My lady, I am Ser Alex Coldwater of Coldwater Burn and this is Ser Oris Tollett of Grey Glen. The Lords of the Vale would like to ask you a few questions. Would you please follow us?”

The Lords of the Vale? What was going on? “The Lords of the Vale are here? Why?”

The two knights exchanged a look, then Coldwater looked back at her. “The Lords of the Vale have come to discover the truth about Lady Arryn’s death. They have come to the knowledge that you were there when she died. They would like to know what happened, Lady Baelish.”

Arya had to remember herself who she was in everyone’s eyes before she could shout she was no lady and not a niece of Petyr Baelish. If the lords discovered the truth, they would surely kill her. She killed their lady. They would kill her just like the Lannisters would have killed her if she had assassinated Tywin Lannister. Arya followed them. She had no choice. What did Littlefinger tell them? The truth, for sure.

They travelled through the Eyrie. Arya noticed there were many more guards than usually, and many didn’t have the sigil of House Arryn. It also meant that now most of the guards weren’t under the orders of Littlefinger. They reached a small antechamber with two guards bearing the sigil of a broken black wheel on a green field. One of the guards opened the door. On the other side, three people sat their back turned on her, Littlefinger facing them in a similar position. Arya walked into the room and the door closed behind her. The three people had to be the Lords of the Vale. She walked to the center of the room. She noticed Littlefinger was looking afraid. He didn’t look at her.
Arya found his behavior quite strange. She shot him a look of hatred all the same.

“Come closer, child. You have nothing to fear from us, or him.” Arya turned to look at the three people before her. The woman who talked to her sat between two men. She was very old with short and frizzy grey hair. She reminded Arya of Old Nan. She had the impression to have seen the man sitting next to her on the same bench somewhere, or at least his looks were familiar. But she recognized immediately the man on the woman’s right, alone on another bench. The woman continued to address her.

“You were probably told why we asked for your presence. I am Lady Anya Waynwood of Ironoaks. This is Ser Vance Corbray of Heart’s Home.” She turned to the man on her left. Now Arya knew why this man was familiar. He had the same features than Lyn Corbray. “And this is…”

“You are Yohn Royce.” Arya told the name of the burly man on the left bench. She remembered him very well. She saw her father talk with him. They were friends. “I saw you at Winterfell three years ago. You were escorting your son Waymar to the Wall.”

Lord Royce looked stunned by her words. He looked at her very closely. “Do I know you? I have the impression I saw you somewhere.”

“When you were at Winterfell, your son sparred against my two brothers. He defeated Robb but then Jon beat him. He was angry because he said a bastard defeated him. You fought you too in the courtyard. You defeated Ser Rodrik, and my father.” Yohn Royce looked even more surprised now. But he didn’t seem to recognize her. “I am not Lord Baelish’s niece. And my name is not Alayne. It’s Arya. Arya Stark.”

The eyes of the Lord of Runestone widened in shock. “Arya Stark? You tell lies right to my face, you little worm?” From the way he looked somewhere behind her, she guessed he was talking to Littlefinger and not to her.

“That’s impossible,” Vance Corbray intervened right at this moment. “Arya Stark is dead. This girl cannot be the daughter of Eddard Stark.”

“I am!” Arya shouted to them.

The three all seemed taken aback by her outburst. “She is,” Lady Waynwood said calmly after a moment. “I can see it. I met your aunt, Lyanna Stark, many years ago. You look very much like her. And you behave like her too.” Lady Waynwood let a smile appear on her face. Arya’s father never talked to her about his sister. She only knew she was kidnapped by Rhaegar Targaryen and died at the end of Robert’s Rebellion.

Lord Corbray looked thoughtful for a moment. “In this case… Your secret is safe with us, my lady.”

“I’m not a lady.” Arya was tired of always repeating it.

“Lyanna Stark again. She is Eddard Stark’s daughter for sure,” Lady Waynwood said with another smile.

“Your father grew up right here in these halls. We hunted together many times. He was a fine man.” Lord Royce infuriated her.

“Then why didn’t you help him?” The three people before her looked taken aback again by her words. That made Arya even angrier to see them unable to answer. “I was there when he was arrested. I was there when Joffrey ordered him to be executed. I saw Ilyn Payne cut his head. I was forced to leave the capital with people bound to the Wall to survive. We were captured by Lannister soldiers and I spent months as a prisoner at Harrenhal. I finally escaped and wandered for more than a year through the Riverlands to go back to my brother and my mother. I finally reached them at the Twins, but the Freys slaughtered them. Where were you when my father was killed? Where were when he needed your help? Where were you when his head was chopped off his head? Where were you when my brother and mother were butchered? I saw what the Freys did to them. I saw the body of my brother, mounted on a horse, his head replaced by his direwolf’s head, paraded by Freys through their camps. I saw the body of my mother, her throat wide opened, thrown in the river. My two younger brothers were burned alive in Winterfell. Where were you?”

The three lords needed some time before one of them answered. “My lady,” began Ser Corbray, “you must understand…”

“I’m not a lady!” That put an end to what the man was trying to say.

“You’re right, child,” Lady Waynwood conceded. “We should have been there when your father died. We should have gone to war immediately.”

“I agree,” Lord Royce added. “You don’t know how much the people of the Vale wanted to go to war for your father. But Lady Arryn prevented us from doing so. She ordered all the lords and knights of the Vale to stay out of the conflict. I lost a son who fought with Renly Baratheon because he refused to obey Lady Arryn’s orders. We did everything to convince her to call the banners and join your brother.”

“You should have disobeyed her.” Arya didn’t see it as an excuse. The lord, the lady and the knight didn’t answer to this. Instead, the woman asked her a question.

“Arya, we were told you were there when Lady Arryn died. Could you tell us what happened? How did she die?”

Arya looked at all of them. Vance Corbray was of the same family than the man who would have been ready to kill her. Lord Yohn Royce was supposed to be a good friend of her father, but he abandoned him. As for Lady Waynwood, even though Arya appreciated she didn’t put the word Lady before her name, Arya could see she did nothing for her father and her family.

“I killed her.” Her revelation let the three people with huge titles before her all stunned, staring at her blindly. “She wanted to throw me through the Moon Door because I had a dispute with her stupid son. She was cruel. She sent me in the sky cells for weeks after I arrived. She wanted to kill me. And she abandoned her family. Don’t tell me you liked to have her as your lady. If that’s the case, then you’re stupid traitors just like her. And by the way, Ser Vance, I killed Ser Lyn too. He wanted to kill me as well, and he was beating servants who did nothing wrong. I pushed Lady Lysa through the Moon Door and I planted a dagger in Ser Lyn’s throat.”

Ser Vance got up from his bench. “You killed my brother, you little bitch? You’re going to pay for it.”

The knight drew a sword out of his robe and tried to slice Arya in two, but she ducked it and gave a kick in his balls. Immediately, the knight dropped his sword and wailed on the floor. Arya tried to get away through the door, but strong and powerful arms grabbed her and lifted her from the floor. She couldn’t get free of the grip. It seemed every time she tried to escape in the Eyrie someone stopped her before she could make more than a few paces. She realized it was Lord Royce who held her alone with his arms. Arya screamed and tried everything to escape from him, but it was without hope. Finally, six guards brought her back to her room and locked her again. Arya was now in her cell room again, shut in, and everyone knew she had killed the Lady of the Vale. She needed a way to escape this place. And quickly.
Chapter End Notes

Well, things went a little different from the show. As a septa would say: Change, change, change.

Please review

Next chapter: a new POV (clue: it happens in Dorne)
The first chapter in Dorne, and not the last one. It's in some way an introduction to the Dorne plot in my fic, a little like the first chapter from Daenerys' POV introduced Meereen's plot.

Doran Martell is a character I love, both in the show and in the books. In my eyes, he is the most worthy of all the Lords paramount of the Seven Kingdoms at the beginning of Season 1. I hated it when they killed him in the show, even more since that looked entirely absurd. He will have a few chapters in this fic, though not as much as I would like. After all, he remains in the Water Gardens and Sunspear almost all the time because of the gout he suffers from while most of the action happens elsewhere.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Doran felt the pain through his legs. The gout was getting worse. Even sitting, he could feel it. Not that it was so bad for him. He spent most of his life sitting and ruling, drinking milk of the poppy to reduce the pain, trying to make sure his people were happy, in peace, and well fed. He devoted his entire life to the well-being and the happiness for the people of Dorne, and yet for that he only received hatred, grief, mourning and pain. He lost so much since he became the Prince of Dorne and Lord of Sunspear, and he lost a lot before too. He sacrificed everything for his people, and he could feel they hated him for that.

Everything started with Robert Baratheon’s Rebellion. Thousands of men from Dorne died at the Battle of the Trident, including Doran’s uncle, Lewyn. But it was nothing compared to what came next. His sister, his sweet little sister, Elia, was savagely murdered by a monster. Doran’s nephew and niece, Rhaenys and Aegon, were also slaughtered. Jon Arryn, the Hand of the new king, brought the bones of Elia and her two children next year and Doran could bury them, but it did little to ease the pain he felt in his heart.

Oberyn had wanted to go to war against Robert Baratheon and Tywin Lannister, to avenge their sister and her children. Doran had wanted nothing more than to kill these people who savagely butchered his family, just like his little brother, but to the opposite of Oberyn, he knew they couldn’t go to war. Revenge wouldn’t bring Elia back to them, and Dorne wasn’t powerful enough to defeat the new Baratheon dynasty and its allies on its own. And there were so many people in Dorne who had lost someone in the war… Doran didn’t want to subject his people to more sufferings. And he had a son at this moment. Quentyn had just been born. He had to protect the family he still had. So he had accepted Jon Arryn’s apologies, and prevented his brother from starting a new rebellion.

Later, he sent his eldest son, Quentyn, to be fostered at Yronwood. Quentyn was his first child with his beloved wife Mellario of Norvos. Doran sent his son to Yronwood to mend the old feud between the Martells and the Yronwoods Oberyn started very young by killing Lord Edgar Yronwood in a duel. However, Mellario didn’t accept it. In Norvos, sons and daughters of noble people weren’t fostered to other families. They were raised by their mother and their father. He could still remember the argument he had with his wife on this day.

“I refuse to let you send my son away. I won’t allow it,” she said with tears in her eyes.

“I need to repair the damage Oberyn caused years ago. This is the best way to do it,” he had tried to explain.

“He’s your son! What sort of father uses his own flesh and blood to pay his debts? How can you send him away? How can you let someone else raise him, as if he was a burden?”

“Quentyn is not a burden. I love him as much as I love Trystane, and my brother, and you. But I must maintain good relationships with my bannermen.”

“By sending our son away?”

“Only for a time. He will come back. I promise.”

“In a few years, yes. He is only ten, Doran. He is only a child. Our child. You won’t see him grow.”

“I know, but this is the way of things here. I have no choice,” he had said with a remorseful voice.

Mellario had stormed out of his solar. She wept for days after Quentyn left. Doran did everything he could to make her understand. He was sad at the idea to send his son to someone else, but he expected things to be this way as soon as they would have children. He was the Prince of Dorne, and he had to make sure his people were safe. He had to make sure Dorne remained at peace, and it would do some good to his son to see other parts of Dorne and to create friendship with other noble people. Sadly, he couldn’t keep his promise to his wife.

Five years after Quentyn had left them, a raven came from Yronwood with dire news. Quentyn was dead, killed accidentally during a hunting trip when his horse fell on him. Mellario had been heartbroken and Doran had been too. It was then that Doran abandoned the idea of sending their second son, Trystane, to Lemonwood to be fostered by Ser Deziel Dalt. But it wasn’t enough and Doran’s wife left him and returned to Norvos a year later, leaving Areo Hotah behind her with Doran and their last son. Doran never saw his wife again.

And now, Oberyn was dead, killed by Ser Gregor Clegane, the monster who killed their sister, their nephew and their niece. Doran had lost two brothers when they were only infants, and now he lost the only one who grew up to a man. It had been two months now since his bones were brought back from King’s Landing by Ellaria, along with Ser Gregor’s head and a letter Oberyn wrote not long before he died.

Dear Doran,

The Imp Lord of Casterly Rock insisted for me to write this before I avenged our sister in case I wouldn’t get out of it alive, but I doubt you’ll ever need to read it. Tywin Lannister is dead as you already know, and his son confirmed the rumors we heard. Gregor Clegane is the one who butchered Elia’s children, then raped her with their blood still on his hands before he killed her too. The Imp claims his father didn’t give the order to kill Elia, but he recognized that Lord Tywin did order his dog to kill Rhaenys and Aegon.

The Imp promised he would execute Gregor Clegane and send us his head in time, but I’m tired of waiting for justice. Tywin Lannister may be dead, but his dog still lives and I want to kill him myself. I want to hear him confess his crimes before I throw my spear through his heart. I’m going to kill him.
Tyrion Lannister wants me to tell you he is not responsible for my death if the Mountain kills me, but he won’t succeed. Soon, I will bring you the head of the monster who killed our sister and her children. She will rest in peace, at last.

Your brother, Oberyn

His brother brought him the head of Gregor Clegane, only he didn’t come back alive. Ser Balon Swann accompanied Ellaria to Dorne in order to present Ser Gregor’s head to Doran and his condolences for Oberyn’s death. Ellaria confirmed this was Ser Gregor’s head. The kingsguard also gave Doran a letter written personally by the Lord of Casterly Rock for him.

To Doran Martell, Prince of Dorne and Lord of Sunspear,

I have the regret to tell you your brother, Prince Oberyn Martell, is dead. He died trying to kill Ser Gregor Clegane. He already told you this in his own letter, but the rumors you heard were true. Gregor Clegane did kill Elia Martell, Rhaenys Targaryen and Aegon Targaryen during the Sack of King’s Landing. He murdered the last two on the orders of my father, Tywin Lannister, and murdered your sister without any order to do so. I learnt it myself only a few weeks ago, during the last discussion I had with my father before he died.

I can only offer you my condolences and my apologies for the sufferings House Lannister inflicted to your family under my father’s rule. This isn’t much, but this is all I can give you along with Gregor Clegane’s head. I was planning to have him judged for his crimes and executed once I would go back to the Westerlands, but your brother insisted on killing him with his own hands. I couldn’t stop him. I’m afraid the precautions I took to make sure he would win the fight against the Mountain weren’t enough. I had no wish to see your brother die, especially after he cleared me at my trial. I owe him my life. My own wife lost members of her family in a horrible way recently and I can understand the hatred you and your brother had and still have for my house. I regret his death more than you probably believe.

I assume the entire responsibility of your brother’s death for my lack of precautions against Gregor Clegane. He was one of my bannermen and I failed to control him. The king has nothing to see with this affair. But I can guarantee you the two people who were responsible for the death of Princess Elia and her children are now dead, and I will never allow someone to kill any of your subjects like Lord Tywin allowed.

I hope my niece is happy in Dorne and that everything is fine between her and your son. They are only children and have nothing to do with the past horrors between our two houses. With some hope, they may be able to repair the feud between House Martell and House Lannister in time. I look forward for her wedding that will cement the union between the Crown and Dorne.

Yours faithfully,

Tyrion Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands, Warden of the West

Doran sent an appropriate reply about how regretful Oberyn’s death was and that he didn’t hold Lord Tyrion responsible for this. He also sent a message to King Tommen that he gave to Ser Balon before he went back to King’s Landing. The alliance with the Crown had to be maintained. Tyrion Lannister was right on this. Doran couldn’t allow Oberyn’s death to start a war his people couldn’t win, not with the power of Casterly Rock and Highgarden on King Tommen’s side. Dorne would be easily defeated against such military force.

Doran wondered if the words of the new Lord of Casterly Rock were honest, or only lies to get out of it without infuriating Dorne. Examining the question, Doran had come to the conclusion that if Oberyn died, it wasn’t what Tyrion Lannister intended. The letter from his brother proved that Oberyn cooperated with him to kill Gregor Clegane, and the discussions Ellaria reported between Oberyn and the Imp seemed to show the Imp tried to stop Oberyn from killing the Mountain himself. And the head was really the one of the man who killed their sister. Doran negotiated through ravens with the Imp when he was Hand of the King to arrange the betrothal between Princess Myrcella and his son Trystane, and from what he heard of the Battle of Blackwater, the dwarf didn’t seem to be an idiot. He had no reason to wish Oberyn’s death. The Lannisters had nothing to gain from it. The Imp wouldn’t have arranged Oberyn’s death. He knew like his father the alliance between Dorne and the Westerlands was vital for both the families. As much as Doran hated to admit, Oberyn was unwise in his obsession to kill the Mountain himself, and he was mostly responsible of his own death. He always feared it would happen to his brother one day. He feared Oberyn’s lack of caution would lead to his death one day. And finally it happened. Doran could only mourn his brother now, and he had no reason or interest to blame the Lannisters and take a revenge on them for Oberyn’s death.

Tywin Lannister was dead, and it was very good news for Doran. Not only the man who had his sister, his nephew and his niece killed was dead, though he died too softly in his bed for what he did, but House Lannister was deprived of his head. However, the Imp was to be taken carefully. Doran knew the rumors about the drunken whoremonger of Casterly Rock, but it seemed the Imp wasn’t stupid as people would like to think. He ruled King’s Landing in very difficult times and held the capital against Stannis Baratheon, and remained on the small council as Master of Coin afterwards. His writing style let see an intelligent and cunning man who chose his moves and words carefully. Perhaps he wasn’t ruthless like his father, but he seemed to have some of his intelligence. And now he was married with the heir to the kingdom of the North. The Imp had a lot of power within his hands. His presence wouldn’t make Doran’s future plans easier to execute. He would have to be careful with the new Lord of Casterly Rock.

Doran looked down on the Water Gardens. It really was a beautiful place and he enjoyed the view of the fountains, the plants, the bushes, and the people walking freely without concern or worry about what was going on outside. Among them were his son and his betrothed. The princess Myrcella had grown into a beautiful young women during the time she spent here. When she arrived, she looked wary about the people here, though she was also amazed by the beauty of the palace. Very quickly, she lost her doubts about Trystane, then about everyone else here, and came to love her new life. She embraced the culture and usages of Dorne and came to love Trystane. And Trystane came to love her very deeply too. Doran had spoken with the princess many times, and he discovered her childhood hadn’t been very happy. She talked very fondly about her two uncles and her younger brother, but Doran could see she was uncomfortable when it came to her mother, her father or her older brother, the late King Joffrey. She matured and bloomed here. Trystane helped her a lot, and now she was happy.

Doran only made this betrothal for political reasons. He couldn’t let Dorne remain neutral in this war entirely, but he didn’t want to risk his people by engaging them too much into a conflict. He couldn’t declare for one of the pretenders without getting anything. The people of Dorne would never forgive him if he supported a Baratheon pretender, the family who butchered a Martell, without getting anything in return. Of the three, only Joffrey, through his Hand Lord Tyrion, made him a proposal. Lord Tyrion only asked him to position troops on the Dornish Marches to slow down Stannis and Renly Baratheon. Doran couldn’t have asked for better. He wouldn’t engage his people in an open war, except if he was aggressed directly. He wouldn’t side with Renly or Stannis who would ask him to fight for them and enter the conflict directly. He made sure his people didn’t engage in the war with his movements and got a hostage through the betrothal of Princess Myrcella with his son. The Iron Throne wouldn’t dare to do anything against Dorne now, in fear to put the life of the princess in danger and to destroy the alliance between the Lannisters and the Martells. Only, he didn’t expect his son and the princess to fall in love.

Doran looked again at his son and his betrothed. They looked so happy. They didn’t know how dangerous their love could be for both of them. A Lannister and a Martell. He had to protect them. Especially now that Oberyn was dead.

“The prince does not wish to be disturbed.”

Doran heard the voice of Hotah, using the same words he always used when someone would approach his prince. Hotah was one of the last things Doran still had left of Mellario. Hotah’s loyalty to him was infallible, and he was ready to kill anyone who would attempt anything against Doran or his family.

“Remove yourself from my path or I’ll take that long axe and I’ll shove it…”

“Captain. Let her pass.” Doran ordered Hotah to stand by before one of them did something they would regret. Doran didn’t need to look at her to know who wanted to see him. He recognized her voice, and the scorn in it. He heard it far too much ever since she brought back Oberyn’s bones here.

Hotah let Ellaria Sand pass and she came directly to him. “Your brother was murdered and you sit here in the Water Gardens staring at the sky and doing nothing.”

“Oberyn was slain while attempting to kill another man everyone, including you, told him to not try. His death was horrible, but his own doing all the same.” Doran replied without looking at her, keeping his eyes on the gardens.

“You don’t have to remind me.” He looked back at his brother’s lover this time. “He was my brother long before he was anything to you.”

Doran could still remember the first time he saw his brother. He was already ten-years-old when Oberyn was born and he saw him grow from a baby to the man full of life he was during forty years. No one had to tell him he was his brother. He knew it better than anyone else.

“What will you do about his death?” she asked.

“I will bury him. I will mourn for him.”

“And then?”

“You would have me go to war?”

“The whole country would have you go to war.”

“Then we are lucky the whole country does not decide.” Doran stared right before him, averting his gaze from Ellaria. He would hear nothing about going into war. It was a war they couldn’t win. Many in Dorne might want war, but Doran had seen war. He saw the bodies piled on the battlefields. He saw the orphans starving in the cities. He saw widows wandering alone in the streets without a home. Doran wouldn’t lead his people into that hell.

“The Sand Snakes are with me,” resumed Ellaria, disdain plain in her voice. “They have the love of their people. They will avenge their father while you sit here in your chair doing nothing.” Doran didn’t give her an answer. He had nothing else to tell her. She may believe he was doing nothing, but that wasn’t the case. Far from it. “Oberyn is dead and this Lannister girl skips about the Water Gardens eating our food, breathing our air. How many of your brothers and sisters do they have to kill? Let me have her. Let me send her to her family one finger at a time.”

Doran looked back at the woman standing before her. Anger filled him now. “I loved my brother. And you made him very happy. For that, you will always have a place in my heart. But we do not mutilate little girls for vengeance. Not here. Not while I rule.”

“And how long will that be?”

Ellaria left the balcony where Doran was sitting. He looked at her going out. Hotah lowered his axe until the blade was in his hand. Should I kill her? The question he asked mutely was quite obvious. Doran shook his head. He wouldn’t kill Oberyn’s paramour and the mother to four of his nieces. Too many people already died.

Doran looked at the gardens again, seeing Trystane and Myrcella still walking and talking together, smiles on their lips, happiness plain on their faces. Doran felt guilt filling his mind. Guilt for his son, and guilt for this girl. But no matter what happened, he wouldn’t allow anyone to hurt Myrcella. Even Oberyn would never have dropped so low to mutilate innocent people. He would never have approved it. He would have fought against it. Doran knew it, but it seemed Ellaria, and perhaps some of Oberyn’s daughters, had forgotten it. They would soil Oberyn’s memory if they hurt the girl in the name of revenge. Doran wouldn’t let them stain Oberyn with their actions. Before he went to sleep, maester Caleotte informed him Ellaria had left the Water Gardens. Doran had a good idea who she was going to see.

Ellaria and Oberyn’s daughters only thought about avenging his brother now, no matter the cost. Deep inside, Doran wanted to avenge Oberyn too, but the price would be too heavy for Dorne. Men would die, children would lose their father, parents would lose their sons, wives would lose their husbands, and all this for what reason? To avenge the death of a single man? Doran would sentence thousands of people to death, and probably even lead Dorne to destruction in a war they couldn’t win. He was the prince of his people, and he had to watch over them and stop them from doing mistakes that would lead to their end. Doran wouldn’t engage Dorne in a war. Not now. Not if they had no chance to win this war.

Chapter End Notes

I know that Quentyn Martell didn't die years ago in the books, and that Doran also had a girl, Arianne, but since Trystane is the only son Doran has in the show and that my fic is based on the show, I decided Doran had two sons and the eldest one died before the story of the show started.

Please review

Next chapter: Jon

Announcement: When the next chapter of "A shadow and a Wolf" will be uploaded, I will start at the same time a new fanfiction about Game of Thrones. Keep looking at my profile for this new fic, "A Rose and a Lion".
Jon II

Chapter Notes

Jon comes back after an absence of almost 50 chapters.

Réponse à Sanrion (Guest): Merci beaucoup pour ton commentaire sur fanfiction.net. J'ai vraiment tenté de faire une histoire réaliste où les personnages réagissent comme ils réagiraient dans la série si un seul élément ou un seul événement avait été modifié. Dans Game of Thrones, changer une seule chose peut modifier toute l'histoire et c'est ce que j'essaie d'explorer dans cette fanfiction. Je crois que si Tyrion et Sansa avaient eu plus de temps à passer ensemble, leur relation aurait pu devenir plus sérieuse. Il y avait déjà une certaine amitié basée sur la confiance et la compassion mutuelle qui s'était installée entre eux avant qu'ils ne soient séparés et je crois vraiment que ça aurait pu aller plus loin s'ils en avaient eu la chance. J'ai adoré développer les personnages à Castral Roc qui n'apparaissent ni dans les livres ni dans la série. Ça me permet de montrer un visage différent de la famille Lannister et de les humaniser davantage, en plus de donner la chance à Sansa de voir qu'il y a du bon et du mauvais dans chaque famille. Je peux t'assurer que la suite de l'histoire réserve bien des surprises. Je n'ai jamais vu de fanfiction Tyrion/Sansa en français moi non plus malheureusement. Je ne vais probablement pas en écrire en français puisque plus de personnes peuvent lire les fanfictions quand elles sont en anglais. Je regrette ça un peu moi aussi, mais je peux faire profiter plus de personnes de mes fictions en les écrivant en anglais et je peux en discuter avec plus de gens. Je t'envoie mes salutations du côté ouest de l'Atlantique. Si tu veux laisser d'autres commentaires à l'avenir, ce serait peut-être plus pratique de les laisser ici sur AO3, comme ça je pourrais y répondre plus facilement.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

JON II

To say the king was obviously not pleased would be an understatement. “I ordered Mance Rayder burned at the stake. You prevented that order from being carried out. You showed mercy to Mance Rayder. A king’s word is law. Perhaps you should ask Ser Davos how much mercy I show to lawbreakers.”

Jon looked at the Onion Knight standing next to Stannis’s desk. His missing fingers were the proof that despite rewarding the man with titles and lands for saving him at the siege of Storm’s End, Stannis also punished the knight for his years of smuggling. They were in the solar Ser Alliser Thorne granted to Stannis in the King’s Tower after he rescued the Night’s Watch from the wildlings. All the brothers of the Night’s Watch were praising Stannis for coming to the help of the Wall while the other lords and kings remained deaf to their call for assistance. However, the ritual sacrifices the Red Woman made cooled the enthusiasm of many of them. Even those who hated the wildlings were distraught and shocked by the way the King-Beyond-the-Wall was executed and by his screams of agony. For Jon, it had been too much. Mance Rayder may have been an enemy of the Seven Kingdoms that the Night’s Watch swore to protect, he may have been a turncloak and a traitor by deserting the Night’s Watch, but he only tried to save his people from the White Walkers. Just like all the wildlings, he was born on the wrong side of the Wall and didn’t deserve to die this way. Seeing him screaming in agony as fire consumed him had been too much for Jon and he shot an arrow in his heart, ending the man’s agony and giving him a painless death. And now Jon stood here, in Stannis’s solar, berated for disobeying an order from the Lord of the Seven Kingdoms. While the king was more than angry with him, his Hand looked somewhat sympathetic to Jon.

“Show too much kindness, people won’t fear you,” resumed Stannis. “If they don’t fear you, they don’t follow you.”

“With respect, your Grace, the Free Folk will never follow you no matter what you do. You’re the man who burned their king alive.”

Jon had tried to explain to Stannis it would be impossible to enlist the wildlings in his army, but the king sitting before him didn’t understand the people from beyond the Wall. The moment it was certain Mance wouldn’t bend the knee to Stannis, he had no chance to convince his people to fight for him. And Jon’s arrow didn’t convince Tormund or any other wildling to fight for Stannis or to not fight for him. Their decision was made long before.

“Who, then? You?” Stannis asked.

“No. Only one of their own.” The wildlings would never follow someone from the south of the Wall. They would never bend the knee to anyone. Not to Stannis after he killed their king. Not to any king. Not to Jon who betrayed them, who betrayed Ygritte.

The self-proclaimed king took a short parchment on his desk and handed it to Jon. “Do you know this wretched girl, Lyanna Mormont?”

“The Lord Commander’s niece.” Jon heard of her. Mormont mentioned her once, and Jon knew she was named after his aunt Lyanna.

“Lady of Bear Island and a child of ten,” Stannis confirmed on a grim tone, but his tone was always grim and hard. “I asked her to commit her house to my cause. That’s her response.”

Jon read the answer aloud. “Bear Island knows no king but the King in the North, whose name is Stark.” Jon couldn’t repress a smile while reading it. The Northerners would remain loyal to his family to the end, even when they were girls of ten-years-old.

“That amuses you?”

“I apologize, your Grace. Northerners can be a bit like the free folk. Loyal to their own.” Both descended from the First Men and fought against the White Walkers eight thousand years ago.

“I know. My brother Robert went on often and loudly about how difficult it was to control them. Even with your father’s help.” Jon thought he saw the beginning of a smile on Stannis’s face, but only the beginning and it lasted less than a second. Ser Davos was the one to speak next.

“Tonight, the Night’s Watch elects a new Lord Commander. Ser Alliser Thorne is going to win.”

“Most likely,” Jon replied.

“Unpleasant man. He thinks you’re a traitor. What’s your life going to be like here at the Wall with Thorne in command?”

“Unpleasant, I expect.” Ser Alliser would make sure his life was a living hell if he didn’t execute him.
“Your bravery made him look weak,” Stannis commented. “He’ll punish you for it. I don’t punish men for bravery. I reward them.”

“I don’t doubt it, your Grace,” Jon said. “But I’m a brother of the Night’s Watch. I pledged them my life, my honor, my sword. I don’t know what I have left to give you.”

“You can give me the North.”

Jon nearly wanted to laugh at this. “I can’t. Even if I wanted to, I’m a bastard, a Snow.”

“Kneel before me. Lay your sword at my feet. Pledge me your service and you’ll rise again as Jon Stark, Lord of Winterfell.”

For a moment, Jon could see his home, the castle in which he grew up, as if he was there. He could see its massive walls. He walked in the yards where he practiced sword fighting and archery with Robb, where they thought Bran to shoot arrows. He wandered in his room inside the Great Keep. He was praying in the godswood. He looked at the statues of the ancient Kings and Wardens of the North in its crypt. He followed his lessons with Maester Luwin in his tower. He sat on the raised platform with his brothers and sisters while they dined with their parents. Only the parents of his brothers and sisters. Lady Stark wasn’t his mother, and never was.

Jon’s vision disappeared as quickly as it appeared. “Do I have some time to think about it?”

“You may,” replied Stannis, “but tomorrow Thorne will be your Lord Commander. I suggest you think about it very quickly.”

“Your Grace.” Jon bowed and left the solar.

As he went down the stairs, he thought about the offer Stannis just made. That was what he always wanted. Jon wanted to be a Stark all his life, and now he could be. He only had to accept the offer, ride to Winterfell with Stannis, assemble the northern lords to take back his home from Roosse Bolton, and avenge his family. But for that, he would have to forsake his vows.

Night gathers, and now my watch begins.

It shall not end until my death.

I shall take no wife, hold no lands, father no children.

I shall wear no crowns and win no glory.

I shall live and die at my post.

I am the sword in the darkness.

I am the watcher on the walls.

I am the shield that guards the realms of men.

I pledge my life and honor to the Night's Watch, for this night and all the nights to come

Lady Stark wanted him out of Winterfell. Mormont wanted him to be Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. Qhorin Halfhand wanted him to be a spy. Ygritte wanted him to be a wildling. Alliser Thorne wanted him to be a dead body. Stannis wanted him to be Lord of Winterfell. But what do I want? Jon knew what he wanted. He wanted to be a Stark. He wanted to get back the home of his brothers and sisters. But that would mean leaving the Night’s Watch, forsaking all the vows he took. Was that what he wanted? If Ygritte had been alive, the choice would have been much easier. Roose Bolton ruled in Winterfell now. The traitor who plunged a dagger in Robb Stark’s heart. Don’t you want to avenge him? He wanted to avenge him of course. I want a great many things. But I’m a sworn brother of the Night’s Watch. Now, with the possibility of taking back Winterfell, he wasn’t sure anymore. But if he took Winterfell, then what? His father was dead. The mother of his brothers and sisters was dead. Robb was dead. Bran was north of the Wall, Rickon was nowhere to be found, and Arya neither. The three could be dead. He only had one sister left he could be sure she was alive.

Jon pushed the door at the end of the stairs and entered the courtyard. Melisandre was praying the Lord of Light with the Queen’s men, reciting prayers in a language Jon didn’t understand, all of them surrounding a great fire. He stopped to look at the ceremony. After a moment, the prayers were said in the common tongue. All the believers started to chant together with the voice of the priestess coming out louder than any other.

“Lord of Light, show us the way. Cast your light upon us. Protect us from the darkness. Burn away our sins. Yours are the stars that guide us.”

In the end, only Melisandre spoke with a vibrant and powerful voice. “Lord of Light, protect us, for the night is dark and full of terrors.”

There was something horrific about the prayers, especially when they came from this woman. Perhaps because Mance died, burned by the hand of the woman leading the prayers. Melisandre let Jon quite puzzled and uncertain with the way she looked at him. When Ygritte was kissed by fire, Melisandre was fire. Jon stood there, looking at the men disbanding once the prayer was over. He noticed Stannis’s wife, Selyse Baratheon, with her daughter Shireen. The little girl didn’t seem very happy. Jon noticed suddenly the Red Woman was staring at him. He went away to the Flint Barracks where the dormitories were.

Jon entered, threw his black cloak on his bed and sat on it. He took a parchment inside his doublet. It had been there ever since he received it approximately two months ago. He had read it each day up to now.

Jon, I hope you’re alright. I am at Casterly Rock and married to Tyrion Lannister. He treats me very well and I am safe. I am now the Lady of House Lannister. I should have written to you before. I was never very kind with you and I regret it now. Please forgive me. You are my last brother still alive. Write to me, I beg you.

Your sister, Sansa Lannister of House Stark, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands, Lady of Winterfell

Jon had found it strange when Sam came to him during one of their watch at the top of the Wall with a scroll that a raven brought from Casterly Rock. It bore the seal of House Lannister. But it was nothing compared to his surprise when he recognized the handwriting of his sister, and even less when he understood that his sister was now the Lady of House Lannister. It took him a while to assimilate the news. Jon had learned recently that Tywin Lannister was dead when he received the letter. He didn’t give much consideration to the new, except he thought the man probably received what he deserved after having Jon’s family slaughtered by the war. But he didn’t realize that Tyrion Lannister would become the Lord of Casterly Rock in his stead, which meant Sansa was now Lady of Casterly Rock.

He had read the scroll again and again. His sister’s neat writing couldn’t be mistaken, but the words were squeezed to make them hold on such a little piece of parchment. Sansa had probably wanted to tell more, but she couldn’t because of the size of the piece of paper a raven could carry. I am at Casterly Rock and married to Tyrion Lannister. He treats me very well and I am safe. Was she really safe? Jon couldn’t be sure. Sansa may have written it under constraint. She didn’t look in distress from her message, but it was a very short message sent by raven. Jon couldn’t decipher his sister’s feelings through it. She could have been forced to write it.

However, there was one thing Jon knew. If he accepted the offer of Stannis, he would have to fight against Sansa. Since everyone believed Bran and Rickon were dead, and they could be dead, Winterfell belonged to Sansa. If Jon fought for Stannis and was proclaimed Lord of Winterfell and Warden of the North, he could find himself in war with his own sister, contesting her rights. Could Jon do this? He didn’t want to see the Lannisters, not even Tyrion Lannister, take Winterfell, but he knew that his father would never have wanted him to fight against his own family. And that would legitimize the hatred Lady Stark had for him. He would have stolen the rights of her children.

Anyway, helping Stannis to take Winterfell would mean burning the godsdowood for the Lord of Light Stannis’s men worshipped. Melisandre would make sure there would be nothing left of the godsdowood of Winterfell, nor anywhere in the North. Jon wouldn’t make himself responsible for the destruction of the Old Gods his father and his father before him worshipped. To become Jon Stark would mean to betray the Old Gods, to break his vows and to turn against his own blood. He couldn’t do it. I’m a sworn brother of the Night’s Watch, for this night and all the nights to come.

An hour later, Jon entered the common hall. Nightfall was upon them and all the brothers were gathering to choose their new Lord Commander. The common hall was full of people as a consequence. Jon went to Sam. His friend greeted him with an excited smile.

“Jon. I have good news for you. Edd is going to propose you as Lord Commander.”

It seemed Jon wasn’t done with surprises today. “What do you mean? I can’t be Lord Commander.”

“Of course you can. Anyone who said his vows can be nominated.”

“I can’t be Lord Commander Sam,” Jon repeated. “Half the men believe me to be a traitor.”

“The other half love you,” Sam argued. “I and Edd have been discussing with them during the last days. Most of the men respect you. They’re not all like Janos Slynt or Ser Alliser. You led the defenses of Castleblack against the wildlings. There are many men who want to vote for Ser Alliser who would be ready to vote for you if you were among the candidates. He made too many enemies among the recruits here. And most of Ser Mallister supporters would vote for you too.”

Jon only answered after a moment. “Sam, I can’t. I’m not old enough.”

“You want Ser Alliser to be Lord Commander? The youngest Lord Commander of history was ten-years-old when he was elected. And he was a Stark.”

Jon shook his head slowly. “No, Sam. I cannot be Lord Commander with half the Night’s Watch hating me.”

Sam looked disappointed. He looked on his left and shook slightly his head. Jon turned to see to who he made the sign. It was Edd. He didn’t seem pleased either and turned his back on them. Olly was sitting next to him.
“Things won’t be good with Ser Alliser. Gilly is afraid of him. He could send her north of the Wall again with little Sam.” Jon didn’t reply to Sam’s arguments. He refused the offer of Stannis to become Lord of Winterfell. He wouldn’t accept to be placed among the candidates for being Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. “People have seen you coming out of the King’s Tower. Did you speak with the king?”

Jon supposed he could reveal it to Sam. He wouldn’t tell anyone, but anyway, if people came to know he refused Stannis’s offer, it may enhance his image for the other brothers. “He wanted me to join his army. He wanted my service to overthrow Roose Bolton. He proposed to legitimate me as a Stark and to become the Warden of the North.”

Sam’s eyes widened. “He’ll make you a Stark with the stroke of a pen?”

“It’s the first thing I ever remember wanting,” Jon admitted. “I’d daydream that my father would ask the king and just like that, I would never be the bastard of Winterfell again.”

“You deserve this. You do. I couldn’t be happier for you.” Sam was smiling widely, but Jon had to crush his hopes just like he crushed them for being Lord Commander.

“I’m going to refuse him.”

Sam’s smile faded. “But you’d be Lord of Winterfell.”

“I swore a vow to the Night’s Watch, and I have a sister to who Winterfell belongs. What sort of Lord of Winterfell would I be if I don’t take my word seriously and take her home away from my sister?”

Jon sat and took a cup of ale to calm himself. He was a brother of the Night’s Watch. That was who he was. No one would be able to change it, no matter how many men in the Night’s Watch hated him. That was when Alliser Thorne came into the hall and took place among his followers, including Janos Slynt, the man who betrayed Jon’s father in King’s Landing.

“Crowded. You’d think we were serving venison stew,” the acting Commander joked. His supporters laughed, but still more than half the room was silent, including Jon. Ser Alliser had no humor, except when he could mock the others. Maester Aemon rose slowly from his seat on the platform and spoke with his frail voice. The voting was about to begin.

“Does anyone wish to speak for candidates before we cast our tokens for the nine-hundredth-and-ninety-eighth Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch?”

Without surprise, Janos Slynt was the first one to speak, and the one for who he spoke was no surprise either. “Ser Alliser Thorne is not just a knight, he’s a man of true nobility. He was acting Commander when the Wall came under attack and led us to victory against the wildlings.” Some of the men approved with gruff voices. “He’s a veteran of a hundred battles and has been a defender of the Watch and the Wall almost all of his life. He’s the only true choice.”

Men cheered and pounded on the tables until another brother rose. “Ser Denys Mallister joined the Watch as a boy and has served loyally longer than any other ranger. Through ten winters he served. As commander of the Shadow Tower, he kept the wildlings away. We could do no better.”

Men cheered for Ser Denys and Jon joined them by pounding his cup on the table. He would vote for this man. He was more open-minded than Ser Alliser and much less hateful towards him, and a very capable commander. He defeated the wildlings when they attacked the Shadow Tower at the Bridge of Skulls. However, Jon knew very well what would be the result. Too many men supported Ser Alliser. The cheers and pounding for Ser Denys were much less than those for Ser Alliser.

Maester Aemon started to speak. “If there is no one else, we will begin the voting. The triangular tokens count for Ser Alliser Thorne. The square tokens for Ser Denys Mallister. Each brother will…”

“Maester Aemon.”

Jon recognized Sam’s voice and turned his head towards him just like everyone else in the room. Jon shook his head. Don’t do it, Sam. If Sam did this, Jon’s friend was dead with him.

“Samwell Tarly. Go on.” Maester Aemon gave to Sam the right to speak, but Jon’s friend seemed to hesitate. Jon hoped he would hesitate enough to never speak.

“Sam the Slayer.” Janos Slynt’s comment brought laughter in the room. “Another wildling lover just like his friend Jon Snow. How’s your lady love, Slayer?”

“Her name is Gilly. Brother Slynt knows her quite well. They cowered together in the larder during the battle for the Wall.” Men laughed at Sam’s revelation. What are you doing Sam?

“Lies!” Slynt’s shout didn’t stop Sam.

“A wildling girl, a baby, and Lord Janos. I found him there after the battle was over in a puddle of his own making.” In other circumstances, Jon would have laughed with his sworn brothers, but now Sam was digging his own tomb. “Whilst Lord Janos was hiding with the women and children, Jon Snow was leading. Ser Alliser fought bravely, it is true. And when he was wounded, it was Jon who saved us. He took charge of the Wall’s defense. He killed the Magnar of the Thenns. He went north to deal with Mance Rayder knowing it almost certainly meant his own death. Before that, he led the mission to avenge Lord Commander Mormont. Mormont himself chose Jon to be his steward. He saw something in Jon and now we’ve all seen it, too. He may be young, but he’s the commander we turned to when the night was darkest.”

Cheers and poundings followed Sam’s speech. Now Jon was candidate for being the nine-hundred-and-ninety-eighth Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, and there was nothing he could do against it. He couldn’t withdraw. Judging by the noise, Jon noticed he received approximately the same number of supports than Ser Alliser. Could he have a chance to be elected Lord Commander?

Ser Alliser rose from his seat to speak too. “I can’t argue with any of that. But who does Jon Snow want to command? Night’s Watch or the widlings? Everyone knows he loved a wildling girl and spoke with Mance Rayder many times. What would have happened in that tent between those two old friends if Stannis’s army hadn’t come along? We all saw him put the King-Beyond-the-Wall out of his misery. Do you want to choose a man who has fought the wildlings all his life or a man who makes love to them?”

Jon looked up to see Ser Alliser staring at him with obvious hatred. He questioned Jon’s honor and loyalty to the Night’s Watch. Jon fought as valiantly and without rest for the Night’s Watch than Ser Alliser, and yet this man stood there, insulting him, insulting his father, insulting his family and everything he did. If Jon hadn’t killed Qhorin Halfhand, he wouldn’t have been able to gain Mance’s trust and to bring back valuable information that allowed them to hold against the wildlings. He broke his vows with Ygritte, and he regretted it, but almost all the brothers in this room broke it. If Ser Alliser was elected, Jon would be hanged from the top of the Wall. He had no choice. Whether he became the new Lord Commander, or he died, and Sam too. Jon raised.

“Brothers. Do you remember the Fist of the First Men? Some of you were there, and those who weren’t there know what happened. Three hundred brothers were killed that day, and they weren’t killed by wildlings. They were killed by the dead. By White Walkers. The wildling attack we just managed to hold was nothing compared to what’s coming. We cannot defend the Wall on our own against them. We need men, supplies, and weapons. Where Ser Alliser plans to get these men, these supplies and these weapons?” Jon paused for a moment, looking at Ser Alliser defiantly. “The kings and the lords of Westeros have refused to answer our calls for help, except one, and Stannis is about to leave Castleblack to try to seize the North, and he has no men to spare for us. The others don’t believe in White Walkers. They’re laughing at us. All except one.”

Jon pulled from his cloak the parchment he always kept on him. “This message comes from my sister. Sansa Lannister, the Lady of Casterly Rock. Her husband, Tyrion Lannister, the Lord of the Westerlands and the Warden of the West, visited the Wall three years ago. He spoke with Maester Aemon and the Lord Commander Mormont. He is the only one among the great lords of the Seven Kingdoms who may believe us. He is the only one who may send us what we need. Men, supplies, weapons, and even gold if necessary. But we won’t get it if Ser Alliser is Lord Commander. He and Lord Tyrion hated each other when he visited the Wall. Ser Alliser is so proud that he will never ask for anything from the Lord of Casterly Rock. And even if he did, I doubt Tyrion Lannister would send us anything if we made the mistake to choose this man. Choose a man who can convince the Lord of the Westerlands to send us what we need. Choose this man,” he pointed Ser Alliser, “and the Wall will fall when the dead will come. The Night’s Watch will be destroyed, and not by the wildlings.”

Jon held Alliser Thorne’s gaze. He could see the man hated him more than ever right now. Jon may have reduced considerably the chances of the knight to become Lord Commander. The men would think more seriously about voting for Ser Denys… or for Jon. As long as Ser Alliser wasn’t chosen, it was alright for Jon. He could write to Tyrion Lannister in Ser Denys’s name if he became the Lord Commander. Ser Denys wouldn’t be against this idea. He wasn’t proud and stubborn like Ser Alliser, and he didn’t hate Jon. Ser Alliser would never ask for Jon’s help, especially not after what he just said. The important thing was to prevent Alliser Thorne from being Lord Commander. It didn’t matter if Jon or Denys Mallister was chosen as long as Alliser Thorne was put aside.

Maester Aemon rose slowly from his seat like always. “It is time.”

All the brothers made a line and started to put their token in the jar. Circle tokens were added for those who would vote for Jon. He picked a square token. It took a while for everyone to drop his token in the jar. Once they all had voted, Othell Yarwick broke the jar and started to pile the tokens on three different stalks. Everyone looked closely how the number of each type of tokens evolved. After a moment, one of the stakes started to get obviously higher than the two others. When all the tokens were piled, Ser Denys and Ser Alliser were equal. Jon’s stake was about twice higher than the other two.

The common hall resonated with cheers, applauses and poundings. Jon needed a moment to realize what just happened. He wouldn’t be hanged. He was the new Lord Commander of Night’s Watch. People were shouting his name. “Jon Snow! Jon Snow! Jon Snow! Jon Snow! Jon Snow!” For the first time in a very long time, Jon allowed himself to smile. He could see the happiness and smiles on the faces of his friends. Sam. Olly. Maester Aemon. Even Edd. Ser Denys made a sign with his hand meaning he conceded him the victory, while Alliser Thorne, Janos Slynt and their followers gave him sour looks. Othell Yarwyck stood on the platform, his face impassive. Jon had to talk with many people before he could leave the hall. Ser Denys came to offer him more formal congratulations. Othell Yarwyck and Bowen Marsh came to offer him their services as First Builder and First Steward, which meant they wanted to keep the places they occupied under Mormont and Thorne. Finally he managed to get out with Sam, Edd and Olly.
“Damn you, Sam,” cursed Edd. “You did it! You stole me the right to nominate him. But I have to admit you gave a better speech than I could ever have done.”

Sam smiled with pride. “What are you going to do now, Lord Commander?”

That was strange for Jon to be called Lord Commander by his friends. “I’m going to rest. Olly.” The boy looked at him. “I would like you to be my steward. Move my things in the former rooms of Donal Noye, behind the armory.”

“Yes, Lord Commander.” Olly immediately went to carry on his duties.

“Why don’t you move in the King’s Tower?”

“Because Stannis resides there, and I burned the Lord Commander’s Tower when I saved Mormont from a dead man,” Jon answered to Sam’s question.

“You are the Lord Commander. Just tell him to move out.”

“I don’t think it would be wise,” Jon replied to Edd’s suggestion. “He saved us from the wildlings, and he’s a king. Kings tend to be touchy.” And I don’t want to add an outrage to the one I’m about to make to him.

Later in the night, Jon could sleep in Noye’s bed. He thought about what he said in the common room. It was true. Tyrion Lannister may be the only one who could be listening to their claims that White Walkers were about to attack the Wall, and he was his brother-in-law now. Through Sansa he may be able to convince him. I am at Casterly Rock and married to Tyrion Lannister. He treats me very well and I am safe. I am now the Lady of House Lannister. Though Jon doubted Sansa would believe him if he told her about the dead. She never saw the Wall, and being her half-brother wouldn’t be enough to make her believe tales about White Walkers. But would Tyrion Lannister believe it? He saw the Wall. He spoke not only with Maester Aemon and Mormort, but also with his uncle Benjen. With some luck, Jon may be able to convince him. He would have many sensitive matters to attend tomorrow on the morning.

Jon proved to be right in his expectations. Very soon in the morning, Stannis came to visit him with his Hand. Olly just finished to organize his solar. His words of introduction were as simple as always. “Lord Commander.”

“Your Grace,” as Jon rose from his seat behind his desk.

“I’d like to speak alone.”

“Olly is my steward now as I was Lord Commander’s Mormont. I want him to attend my meetings to learn from men with experience. One day he might command.”

“Very well.” Stannis begrudgingly accepted to let Olly stay after he looked at him closing the door of Jon’s solar. “Have you considered my offer?”

Jon had to be careful now. Stannis was a just man, just but hard. And he didn’t like to be refused or contested in any way. Jon sat as Stannis did the same. “I have. And I thank you for it. You do me great honor. All my life I wanted to be Jon Stark.”

“Say the word and you will be.”

“But I have to refuse you. I’m Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. My place is here.”
Stannis seemed to give a sidelong glance to Ser Davos. “I’m giving you the chance to avenge your family, to take back the castle where you grew up. To rule the North.”

“The North is not mine, your Grace. It belongs to my sister, Sansa.”

“Sansa Lannister. You want the Imp to rule the North?”

“No. But I can’t fight against my own sister. I know my father would never have wanted this.” Jon thought he saw something in the eyes of Stannis. Perhaps something like regret. Jon didn’t know for sure what his father would have told him to do if he was there, but he wouldn’t fight against his last sister still alive for their home. “I wish I could fight beside you. Believe me, I do. But I swore a sacred vow at the godswood. I pledged my life to the Night’s Watch.”

“You’re as stubborn as your father. And as honorable.”

“I can imagine no higher praise.”

“I didn’t mean it as praise. Honor got your father killed. But if your mind’s made up, I won’t try and dissuade you.”

Stannis rose, but Jon asked him a question before he could leave. Not as Jon Snow, but as Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. “May I ask, your Grace, how long you plan to stay at Castleblack?”

“Are you bored of us already?” Stannis’s voice was quite irritated. That was to be expected. Jon just turned down his offer, and now he was encouraging him to leave.

“You saved us from Mance Rayder’s army. We will never forget that. But it’s a question of survival. The Night’s Watch can’t continue to feed your men and the wildling prisoners indefinitely. Winter is coming.”

Stannis pursed his lips. “I know it. We march on Winterfell within the fortnight, before the snows trap us here.”

“And the wildlings?”

“If they’d rather burn than fight for me, so be it. I leave their fate to you. You could execute them. That’s the safest option.” Stannis added something else after a moment, probably noticing Jon’s reluctant face. “Or you could see if this Tormund fellow is more willing to compromise than Mance ever was. I assume the brothers of the Night’s Watch would rather see the wildlings dead.”

“Most of the brothers, yes. There’s little love for the free folk here.”

“You’re the Lord Commander. Your decision.” Stannis started to walk to the door Olly opened for him, but turned to face Jon again as he reached it. “You have many enemies in Castleblack. Have you considered sending Alliser Thorne elsewhere? Give him command of Eastwatch-by-the-Sea.”

“I heard it was best to keep your enemies close.”

“Whoever said that didn’t have many enemies.”

Stannis left the room on these words, without a glance behind. It was over. Davos Seaworth lingered behind, as if he hesitated to leave the room. Jon didn’t know the man very much, but it was obvious he was entirely loyal to Stannis. No wonder the king kept the Onion Knight close to him despite his years of smuggling, but not without depriving him of a few fingers.
“He sees something in you. Might not be apparent from his tone, but it’s the truth. He believes in you.”

“I’m sorry I disappointed him,” Jon told Stannis’s Hand as an excuse.

Ser Davos sat on a bench before Jon. “The king is a complicated man, but he wants to do what’s right for the Seven Kingdoms.”

“As long as he’s ruling them.” Jon’s reply wasn’t without sarcasm.

“He’s the one true king.” Northerners don’t think so, nor the free folk. “He has a blood right to that throne.”

“I’ve sworn to stay clear of the politics of the Seven Kingdoms.”

“Have you now?” Ser Davos looked above his shoulder at Olly. “How does the Night’s Watch vow go again? I’ll bet you’ve got it memorized since you got here.”

Olly looked at Jon, and Jon nodded to tell the boy he could recite it. “Night gathers and now my watch begins.”

“No, not that bit. The bit at the end.”

“I am the sword in the darkness, the watchman on the walls, the shield that guards the realms of men. I pledge my life…”

“Right, that’s enough.” Davos looked again at Jon. “The shield that guards the realms of men. That’s what you swore to be. Now, I’m not a learned man, but the best way to help the most people might not be sitting in a frozen castle at the edge of the world. It just might mean wading in the muck, getting your boots dirty and doing what needs to be done.”

“And what need to be done?” Jon was a little exasperated that someone was teaching him the sense of the words he said three years ago, and even more that this someone spent time at the Wall no longer than two months.

“As long as the Boltons rule the North, the North will suffer. Just one man’s opinion.”

Ser Davos Seaworth rose and left the room. Jon sat and sighed heavily. He knew the North would suffer under the Boltons, but his place was here at the Wall, even more now that his brothers chose him to lead them. The dead were coming. He was needed here at Castleblack.

“Do you need me for anything else, my lord?” Olly’s question got him out of his thoughts.

“Yes, Olly. Just wait a minute.”

Jon now had to attend two other sensitive matters. He wrote a first message as Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, then attacked the second message. He thought a long time about what he could write. His sister surely faced the same problem than him when she wrote her message. He couldn’t write much on a single piece of paper a raven could carry. After a few minutes thinking about it, he settled for the following.

Dear Sansa, I’m glad to receive of your news. No need to regret anything except leaving our home. Everyone else is dead. I was afraid you might be dead as well. We both made a good way since we last saw each other. I just became Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. I’m alright. We defeated the wildlings who attacked us. Send me more ravens.
Your brother Jon.

Jon sealed the two parchments with the seal of Castleblack and gave them to Olly. “Bring them to Maester Aemon and tell him to send them at Casterly Rock immediately. I want every message coming from there given to me the moment they arrive.”

Jon wished he could tell Sansa that Bran and Rickon may still be alive, but he didn’t know if he could trust her husband, and he didn’t think he could trust the people at Casterly Rock with this information. For now, he couldn’t reveal Bran’s and Rickon’s fates. Once Olly was gone, Jon thought about the words Ser Davos told him. The shield that guards the realms of men. Their vows talked about the realms, not the Realm. You could see if this Tormund fellow is more willing to compromise than Mance ever was. Stannis’s words joined those from Davos.

Chapter End Notes

The change starts to affect the Wall, though not too much yet. Jon is now the brother-in-law of the Lady of Casterly Rock, so his political weight is increasing in the Night's Watch.

Please review

Next chapter: Mira

For everyone interested, the first chapter of my second fanfic about Game of Thrones, "A Rose and a Lion", has been published.
Mira II

Chapter Notes

I always forget to do it, but I thank all of you who read this fic, left kudos or commented up to now. Special thanks to my recurrent commenters: Tativi, Adira+Das+Roy, AzraelGFG, CLH, iluqaqt, aeb, Veldari, wildhoneyfitri, ThamasD and many others. Your comments really help me and I enjoy discussing with you.

This fic took a size bigger than what I planned at the beginning. It's still a long way before it's over and I hope you'll enjoy it for a long time.

We go back to King's Landing. With this chapter I start a new subplot turning around Mira Forrester. I hope you'll like the storyline I'm creating for the only surviving member of House Forrester (well, only surviving member officially). It will involve original characters and a new house that will join the game.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

MIRA II

She was in the grove at Ironrath. Mira was playing with her sister and her brothers in it, hiding behind trees and trying to find them all. Rodrik. Asher. Talia. Ethan. Ryon. She looked everywhere in the grove, behind every tree, but she couldn’t find them. She went to look at each place a second time, then a third, but there was still nothing. She didn’t understand. She was normally very good at finding them all. In fact, she was always the better at this game. Perhaps they were playing her a trick and left the grove to let her search for them for the rest of the day. They were probably in the castle right now, laughing at her. Mira left the grove. She had to find them. She would find them.

When she arrived at the keep, she realized it was in ruins, entirely burned. There were still a few fires here and there. A few bodies laid on the ground, blood covering their faces, their bellies, their legs, their arms. Some wore the sigil of her family, others wore the sigil of House Whitehill. There were also people wearing all kinds of armor she only saw in books about Essos. And there were people without any protection. They were peasants. Some were old men. There were women and children among them. Some had been killed by a sword, others had arrows planted in their bodies. The portcullis was open and Mira could see there were bodies hanged before it from the battlements. She looked away. She couldn’t look at it. She had to find her family. Her parents, her sister, her brothers and her uncle. They had to be somewhere here. Surely one of them was still here.

Mira went inside the keep to see if she could find anyone. The Great Hall was in ruins, ironwood blackened by the fire, tables and chairs turned down. She took ashes from the floor in her hands and let it fall between her fingers. That was everything that was left from her home. The wall where the tapestry representing her family was hooked had been all destroyed, but after she searched the debris, she managed to find them all. The faces of all the members of her family. Once they were all joined together on the tapestry, but now it was in tatters and their faces were all separated. No one could see Mira reading with her mother, or Ethan playing music as Talia sang. They were all scattered now. Nothing linked them together anymore. Mira went to visit the rooms of all her kin, but they were all desert and in ruins too. Even her own had been ransacked and there wasn’t much left. The book of her favourite northern tale, Frozen, was all gone because of the fire and only a part of the cover and the binding remained. Mira could still remember entire passages of the tale. If she wanted, she could have recited them without changing a single word.

Mira left the keep to search the courtyard. There was nothing alive to find here either. Only bodies and burned buildings. Mira saw again the feet of bodies hanging from the battlements before the portcullis. She didn’t want to go through the gate and look at them. She feared who they might be. She didn’t want to see them. Iron from Ice. The words of her family resonated in her head, but she didn’t believe in them in this moment. Ice wasn’t strong like iron. You could break it in several pieces very easily, just like they did with Mira’s family. Ice could also melt. She looked all around the courtyard, finding nothing. Finally she gave up and went under the gate and outside the enclosure of her family’s castle. She looked on the ground, averting her eyes from the bodies hanging above her. But once outside, she knew she had to look at them. She turned around, eyes still on the ground, then took a large inspiration and looked up.

She knew they would be there. But to know they were there and to see them there were two different things. Their faces were all rotten, their eyes eaten by the crows, mud and blood covering their bodies and their torn clothes. Her father and Rodrick were still clad in full armor. Her mother was only recognizable by the hair hanging from her head. Ethan still wore his daily clothes and Mira noticed a huge wound in his neck. That was probably where he was stabbed by the bastard of the Dreadfort. And she could recognize Ser Royland Degore, their master-at-arms, from his armor. Beside him was Maester Ortengryn, only distinctive thanks to his chain. Mira remained still for a moment, looking at the bodies with a noose around their necks. After a moment, she couldn’t hold it. She fell on her knees and cried. Iron from Ice. These words meant nothing. Iron couldn’t come out from ice. Ice wasn’t strong enough. Her family was dead. All dead. They had been murdered. She screamed and felt someone shaking her.

“Mira! Stop that! Wake up! Wake up!”

Mira opened her eyes. She wasn’t kneeling before the gate of Ironrath, but laying in her bed in King’s Landing. And the only person present was her friend Sera, shaking her by the shoulder. Mira’s breathing was fast, her cheeks and eyes wet by tears, her whole body shivering and sweating. Mira closed her eyes again and sobbed. She couldn’t be iron all the time. Right now, she simply couldn’t be strong.

“Mira. What’s going on? What do you have?”

Mira turned on her to face the side where her friend wasn’t, turning her back on Sera. How could she know? Sera had no family. She didn’t know what it was to lose everyone you loved and to be forced to continue as if everything was alright. During days, Mira maintained her armor, her mask of northern handmaiden that nothing could disrupt, thinking the less possible about her dead family. But when night came, she couldn’t escape them. Each time she fell asleep, she would dream about her home, about her parents, about her brothers, about her sister, about the people she knew at Ironrath. Only this time it had been too hard, to see people she loved in the state they were killed, hanged like criminals only because they did what was right and tried to defend their kin. Sera couldn’t understand how Mira felt, how she had to fight every day to not succumb to despair and hatred.

“Mira, tell me what you have.” She felt the mattress sinking where Sera sat. “You helped me in the past. I beg you, let me help you.”

“It’s only nightmares,” Mira said dismissively.

“I heard you cry and scream from the corridor. Please, Mira. Tell me what’s going on. I’m your friend, remember.”
Mira’s heartbeat steadied after some time. She didn’t turn to face Sera, tears still running on her cheeks. “I dreamed of my family.”

A silence followed. “Do you often dream of them?”

“Each night I see Ironrath, or someone I knew there. Only… this time I saw them, hanging before the gates. Their bodies all eaten by crows. They were butchered like animals.”

Mira closed her eyes again to let tears come out of her eyes. She could feel Sera’s presence next to her. Her friend put a hand on her shoulder. “I’m so sorry, Mira. I know it must be more than hard for you.”

Both remained in their respective positions for a while. Sera didn’t leave, and Mira slowly managed to dry her tears and stop her shaking. She finally sat in her bed, still panting a little. Sera was at her side, a hand still on her shoulder.

“It was just a dream,” Mira finally said.

“You never look like this during the day.”

“I wear an armor of courtesies like the Lady Sansa I guess.” Mira smiled weakly to her friend. “I stay occupied and I do my best to not think too much about this. But when night comes, I can’t help but think about them. It’s better this way. I can carry out my duties during the day, and I keep my feelings for the night when I’m not needed.”

“If you want, I can tell her Grace you don’t feel well. I’m sure she’ll allow you a day of rest.”

Mira shook her head, refusing Sera’s proposition. “No, I’m alright. I just need a few minutes. You can go, Sera. I’m fine.”

Sera rose from her place and went to the door. “I’ll see you in the afternoon.” Mira found herself alone in her chamber when Sera close the door. She got up from her bed, dressed for the day, and braided her hair in the Reach fashion. Despite the preparation her mother gave her at Ironrath, the change had been difficult for Mira when she had arrived at Highgarden. She was only thirteen when she arrived there, and everything made her different from everyone in the Reach. But Mira adapted. She embraced most of the culture of the Reach and earned a good place at Margaery’s side. Mira hadn’t forgotten the North, and she would never forget it, but it didn’t prevent her from adopting some usages of the south. After all, her mother sent her to Highgarden to learn the southern ways.

Mira thought about her dream of this night. Not all her family was hanged before the gate. Talia, Asher and Ryon weren’t there, no more than Duncan and his son Gared or her uncle Malcolm. Mira had received more news from the North since Lord Tyrion’s trial, and she knew more about the Battle of Ironrath, or at least the rumors about it. It was said that her mother died trying to stab Lord Whitehill with a dagger, and that Ludd Whitehill’s fourth son, Gryff, died from poison too. At least it was the official version the Whitehills gave, and Mira doubted greatly it was the true version. The Whitehill men she spoke with for the ironwood business seemed to say that her brother Asher killed many Whitehill men and fought like a savage beast. However, from the conversations she eavesdropped between the same men when they thought she wasn’t listening, Lord Whitehill’s daughter, Gwyn, disappeared not long after the battle, and Asher’s body was never found. Some said Lord Whitehill was cursing all day, yelling that his daughter betrayed him. If Asher was alive… if her dream was true… Talia and Ryon may have survived as well. And Duncan and Gared and Malcolm too perhaps.

Mira pushed these thoughts aside. Ironrath was entirely destroyed in the battle. Even if one or more of her kin managed to escape, what was their chance to be still alive? She was clinging to the hope that she may not be the last Forrester alive, but she was alone now. She had to accept it. She was the only Forrester still alive. If the bodies of her brothers and her sister weren’t found, they were probably under rubble or unrecognizable, and they weren’t found for this reason. Mira banished thoughts about her family from her mind and went to perform her duties as the queen’s handmaiden.

On her way to the royal apartments, Mira crossed the path of a page she knew to be in service of the Hand of the King. “Lady Mira, Ser Kevan would like you to eat with him at noon in the Tower of the Hand.”

Mira was quite surprised by the request. She never took any meal with Ser Kevan Lannister. She had to meet him from time to time for the ironwood business and the rebuilding of the royal fleet, but their meetings were always quite short and rare, since Mira mostly dealt with Lord Tyrell, the Master of Ships, and Ser Harys Swyft, the new Master of Coin. But no matter the reason of this request, Mira had to comply. A request from the Hand of the King was an order, especially when the Hand was the man who really ruled the Seven Kingdoms.

“Tell Ser Kevan I’ll be there in time. It will be a pleasure for me.”

The page left to bring her answer to the knight. Mira resumed her way to the royal chambers her mistress and King Tommen now shared. When she entered, the young king was there playing with a cat on his knees. Tommen immediately rose from the floor where he sat in crossed legs position before the intruder.

“Lady Mira.” The boy smiled at her. Tommen was always happy to see one of Margaery’s handmaidens like he was happy to see Margaery. Mira curtsied.

“Your Grace.”

She then went to clean the royal rooms. Tommen was still present, but now he sat on the bed, still with his cat on his knees, cuddling him. The king loved cats. He was probably the first man who sat on the Iron Throne in centuries to love cats, and the first one in decades with good intentions. Mira hoped Queen Margaery would help him to become a good king. They were wed two weeks ago and Tommen looked happier than he had ever been. Mira assisted to the ceremony from the back of the Great Sept of Baelor and then attended her mistress the new queen during the feast that followed. It had been a much more pleasant wedding ceremony than the previous one. Tommen wasn’t mad or spoiled like his brother and acted like a true king for the whole time. There was no incident from the wedding in the sept to the end of the ceremony, including the bedding, except a short moment when Tommen had difficulty to swallow a piece of meat and people feared there could be another poisoning, but Ser Boros Blount was assigned to taste everything the king would eat and drink before him. Anyway, Mira didn’t think someone in the capital had an interest in poisoning Tommen. He wasn’t a monster like Joffrey, so the Tyrells had all interests to keep him alive, and he was their best chance to have a prominent role in the government of the Seven Kingdoms.

Margaery seemed to enjoy her marriage so far. Not that she loved Tommen, Mira knew her mistress better, but she didn’t hate him and saw him as a kind young man. Margaery mostly enjoyed being queen more than she enjoyed being Tommen’s wife. She loved her new situation and often joked with her friends about how enthusiastic Tommen was in bed. She said that very soon, Lady Olenna Tyrell would be a great-grandmother. All in all, this was a much happier marriage than the one Mira’s mistress would have if Joffrey was still alive.

As she was cleaning, the king asked her something. “Lady Mira, may I ask you a question?”

Mira smiled at this and stopped her work. “Your Grace, you are the king. Of course you can. In fact, I’m the one who can’t refuse to answer your questions, whatever they are.”

Tommen chuckled nervously. “Sorry. I still find it hard to believe I am the king. I’m not used to all this. Margaery says I’ll get used to it with time.” Mira remained still, waiting for the question to come, but it took some time to Tommen to ask it. He seemed to realize something after a while. “Oh, the question. Yes. What does Margaery really like? What does she like above all? I’ve been trying to think about something very great I could do for her these last days, but I want to give her something she would really love more than anything else. What would you suggest to me?”

Mira thought about it for a moment. “Well, your Grace, Queen Margaery loves flowers. There are many beautiful gardens in Highgarden, but there are many specimens of flowers that are missing there. Perhaps you could create a garden here in King’s Landing with all the flowers we can find all over the Seven Kingdoms. I’m sure the queen would like it very much. She would spend a lot of good time with her friends in them.”

Tommen smiled after a moment when he seemed to be thinking about the idea. “Yes, that’s a good idea. That’s what I’m going to do.”

“You could also ask the queen to bring you for a visit at Highgarden. I’m sure she would be more than pleased to show you the place where she was born.”

“Yes, I’d like to visit Highgarden, but Ser Kevan believes first I must learn to be king and stay for some time.”

“He may not be wrong. Ser Kevan is a cautious and good man. He’s wise.”

“I want to be wise too. I don’t want to end up like Joffrey.”

Mira didn’t know if he meant he didn’t want to end cruel like his brother was, or if he meant he didn’t want to end up poisoned. “I’m sure you won’t, your Grace.” Mira smiled fondly at the king as she said that. She went back to her work but Tommen kept asking questions as she carried on her duties.

“Lady Mira, do you think Ser Pounce would like Highgarden?”

“I guess he would. There are a few cats in Highgarden. The queen and her friends loved to play with them.”

“I think he would like it more than King’s Landing. Joffrey didn’t like him. He once told me he would skin Ser Pounce alive, then mix his innards with my food so I wouldn’t know I was eating him.” Tommen stopped to speak for a moment. “I shouldn’t be happy about Joffrey’s death, and I don’t think I am, not really. But I don’t regret his death. And Margaery doesn’t regret it either. My brother scared me. And I think he scared her too. He wasn’t a good king, and he wasn’t a good brother either.”

Mira stopped her work. Tommen didn’t know how dangerous it was to say these things. She turned to face him. “You know, your Grace, my father exiled one of my brothers one day.”

The king looked at her in utter surprise. “Really?”

“Yes. He killed people. My father chose to exile him instead of facing a war with another house. But despite what he did, he was still my brother.” The story Mira told wasn’t the entire truth, but there was enough truth in it for Tommen to understand what she meant.

The king nodded. “Yes, you’re right. Joffrey was my brother too, even with everything he did. It was horrible for him to die this way.” The way my family was slaughtered was horrible as well.

“How were your brothers? Were they kind with you?”

Memories that were at the same time beautiful and painful came back to Mira’s mind. “Rodrik was my eldest brother. He used to suggest me books to read and to advise me too when I was at Highgarden in his messages. He grew a little distant during the last years I spent in Ironrath because he started to train to be Lord of Ironrath. But he was always kind with me and all his brothers and sisters. My brother Asher was more the big brother who always wanted to defend us all. Whenever he saw one of us mistreated, he came to fight for us, no matter the consequences. Ethan was always a very good boy, playing and singing with my sister Talia. We all loved listening to them. As for Ryon, he was only a baby when I left my home, but I know he was a very sweet boy. They were all very good people.”

They both remained silent for a moment. “I wish Joffrey had been like one of your brothers. Instead he only mocked me, and laughed at me, and threatened me. He wasn’t kind.”

Mira went back to cleaning the room. When she was done, she felt something soft rubbing against her legs. She looked at the bottom of her gown and saw Tommen’s cat turning around her.

“That means he likes you. He likes Margaery too. Perhaps there’s a link.” Mira smiled and took the cat into her arms, bringing him to the king.

“He should be with your Grace.” She released the cat on the bed and he went on Tommen’s knees. “Do you have need of me, your Grace?”

“No, it’s alright. You may leave.” Mira went away, but Tommen told her one last thing before she left the royal apartments. “Lady Mira, and Margaery, we’ll do everything to give you back Ironrath. Your family didn’t deserve what happened to them. It should never have happened.”

“Thank you, your Grace.”

Mira curtsied one last time and left. Thoughts about her family filled her head as she went to the queen’s solar. Her discussion with Tommen revived her memories about them. She spent the rest of the morning helping her mistress writing letters to various people through all the Seven Kingdoms. Queen Margaery already had a lot of writing to do before she was queen, and now she had even more. When time for the midday meal came, Mira excused herself and went to the Tower of the Hand where Ser Kevan was waiting for her.

“Lady Mira.”

“Ser Kevan.”

“Please sit. The servants will bring us food very soon.” They took place at a table in Ser Kevan’s solar. Mira knew the Hand of the King only moved in the Hand’s apartments recently, many months after he assumed the office. “I do hope you appreciate your stay in the capital, Lady Mira.”

“It’s been more than a year that I’ve been here. I have enjoyed it so far, except when Lannister guards were bribed to arrest and execute me.”

Ser Kevan nodded. “A regrettable accident. What about the queen? I hope my granddaughter-in-law is pleased with her marriage.”

“Of course, she is. She loves the king very much.”

“I have no doubt about it.”
The servants came in with the plates at this moment. Ser Kevan had spoken with a casual voice, not showing much emotion. He wasn’t an emotional man who would pity situations, but he wasn’t cold either. Overall, he was a pragmatic man with a logic mind who tried to rule the Realm the best he could, which was no small feat. They started to eat. They made a few comments on the food and a short discussion followed about the rebuilding of the royal fleet and the ironwood the Whitehills sent. Ser Kevan said Ser Harys was very pleased with the low price of the materials, but that Mace Tyrell was very displeased with the bad quality of it. Mira had to repeat to him, like always, that the Whitehills were the ones to cut ironwood with inappropriate and obsolete methods. Before they were done with the main course, Mira decided to step forward.

“Ser Kevan, please excuse me if I am so straight, but why did you want to speak to me?”

The Hand of the King took a sip of wine. “Lady Mira, the rebuilding of the royal fleet revealed that the Whitehills are unable to provide us with ironwood of good quality. Only your family had the secret of how to work this material, and the Whitehills seem more eager to destroy the ironwood forests than to give us what we need. Hence, we need to find a solution to this problem, and this solution can only be reached through you since you are the last Forrester.”

“What are you suggesting?” Mira hoped it was what she believed.

“I think it’s time for a Forrester to be in Ironrath once more. Would you be able to provide us with enough ironwood of good quality if you were reinstated at the head of your family’s lands?”

That was much more than Mira hoped. “You would give me Ironrath?”

“If this can help you to re-establish the appropriate harvesting of ironwood, then yes.”

Mira answered very carefully. “That would be possible. Many craftsmen and woodsmen in my family’s service are probably still alive, but the Whitehills don’t use their skills like they should. I could manage to have them harvest ironwood in a durable way, but for that I would need to be granted the lands that belonged to my family before the war as well, or else the Whitehills will destroy these forests.”

“According to my information, my lady, your family still has half its territory from before the war. This a decision of the Warden of the North.”

“This decision is not respected, my Lord Hand. The Whitehills are destroying the forests everywhere. Whether the Boltons granted them these territories or not isn’t relevant. They cut all the territory that once belonged to House Forrester. They won’t respect a decree from the king, and not even from Lord Bolton. They will raze the forests. Unless you send someone with enough men to prevent them from doing so.”

Kevan Lannister looked at her very long. “In fact, Lady Mira, I was planning something else. I want you back at Ironrath to make sure ironwood still exists in ten years, but not to rule it on your own.” Mira frowned. What did he mean? “House Whitehill and House Forrester have been in war for centuries. It is time to put an end to this.”

“What are you suggesting?” Mira’s heart was beating quickly.

“Before Ironrath was burned to the ground, Lord Whitehill had accepted to unite his house to yours through a marriage between his daughter and Lord Asher Forrester, your brother. The wedding ceremony didn’t go as planned and this ended with the destruction of your home. Who was responsible for this butchery is irrelevant for now. It is still possible to unite your two houses.”
Mira needed some time before she could croak a reaction to this. “Ser Kevan. You don’t mean…”

“Lord Whitehill had five children. Among them he had four sons. The elder died of greyscale many years ago and the second is a maester. The fourth died at the Battle of Ironrath, but he still has one last son, Torrhen Whitehill, who is his heir. I have proposed Lord Whitehill a marriage between you and this young man. Ludd Whitehill would remain Lord of Highpoint, while you and his son would rebuild Ironrath. He would rebuild your home, and you would force the Whitehills in return to work ironwood in proper ways.”

“Ser Kevan, I cannot marry a Whitehill.” Mira’s voice wasn’t without disgust.

“You’re not married, Lady Mira. Nothing prevents you from marrying this man.”

“The Whitehills slaughtered my family and burned Ironrath. It would be the same as to force a Stark to marry a Bolton, or a Lannister to marry a Tarbeck.”

“We’re not talking about the Starks or the Lannisters, Lady Mira. And from what I heard, it is your mother who tried to kill Lord Whitehill with a knife during the wedding that ended in slaughter. To mend the injuries between your two families and re-establish the business of ironwood, this is the best course of action.”

Ser Kevan spoke on a firm tone without emotion. Mira couldn’t believe he didn’t realize what he was doing. “The Whitehills hate the Forresters, ser. As soon as they will have enough children from me to have Whitehills both at Ironrath and Highpoint, they will probably kill me. Anyway, Lord Whitehill is a spiteful man. His fourth son Gryff died at Ironrath. He will never forget that. He will probably refuse to organize such a marriage. He will want to destroy my house to the roots and will never accept a Forrester in his family.”

Ser Kevan pursed his lips. “You use the word probably quite often, Lady Mira. I already sent the proposition to Lord Ludd Whitehill. We’ll see what he thinks about that. I merely wanted to inform you about this so you may not be surprised if the answer was positive when it arrived, and it is because I am thankful you helped us with the royal fleet. I know you are loyal to your family, but you also stated many times you were loyal to the Crown. This is the time to prove it by bringing peace between two houses who never stopped to fight for decades and by making sure ironwood will still be available in the future. And you could go back to your home and see Ironrath restored. I would see it as an opportunity if I were you.”

The rest of the meal was mostly spent in silence, only a few words being exchanged. Mira finally took her leave once it was over and went back to Margaery’s solar. The queen was preparing other charity works for orphanages, septs and houses for cripples and sick people. Mira did the work the queen asked from her, but she was absentminded at the same time, thinking about the wedding Kevan Lannister talked about. She didn’t want to marry a Whitehill. She wouldn’t let them put their hands on Ironrath. The simple thought to share her bed with a Whitehill filled her heart with disgust and revulsion.

Near the end of the afternoon, Margaery decided to take a walk in the gardens and asked Mira to accompany her. The handmaiden complied, but without much enthusiasm. She followed her mistress to the gardens where they walked arm under arm. Mira had absolutely no problems with the other people in King’s Landing now. She had been a witness in a trial that cleared the current Lord of the Westerlands, and acted as handmaiden in service of the Lady of Casterly Rock and Winterfell before she came back into the service of the future queen, then the queen. For now everyone respected her, at least in appearance. Mira knew she had to be careful about appearances here in King’s Landing. Things were never what they looked like. But now she had the trust, the support and the friendship of the queen, so her situation was quite good. She was safe here for the time being, but she wouldn’t be safe any longer once she would leave the capital to marry Torrhen Whitehill.

The queen and her handmaiden walked among parquets of flowers in the waning of the sun. Margaery greeted everyone they met on their way. Mira had admired Margaery very soon for her ability to put people on her side with courtesies, smiles, words and good manners. She didn’t necessarily command the respect, but she instigated love and friendship to the other people, which was a much better way than threats to remain in power.

“You look strange today, Mira. I never saw you talk so little and in a dark mood like this since the Red Wedding. And you were distracted just now.”

“Sorry, your Grace. I had nightmares last night. I apologize if I’m not of good company today.”

“No need to apologize. Sera told me about your dreams.” Mira looked at the queen to meet compassion. “Do you want to talk about it?”

“No. Thank you, your Grace.” They resumed their silent walk for a time. “I think the king is preparing a surprise for you.”

“Really?” Margaery smiled at this. “I wonder what it will be this time. He already covers me with gifts every day.” The queen stopped to pick a rose among the many there were on their left. She handed it to Mira. “You used to like this place before, just like you loved Highgarden.”

Mira took the rose Margaery gave her. “I still love it, your Grace. Believe me. Only it’s hard for me to appreciate the things I love like I did before.”

Margaery nodded. “I understand.” They arrived at a corner with pillars, benches and many bushes of rare flowers. Margaery sat on a bench and Mira joined her. The queen inhaled and exhaled deeply. “I miss Highgarden. I wish we could go back there. I think we all miss our home.”

Margaery was looking at her with a sorry look. Mira knew Margaery’s expression didn’t always show her true feelings, but she knew her mistress was sincere when she talked about how sorry she was for her family. Mira could only nod to approve. “I do. And I do miss Highgarden as well.”

Margaery nodded sadly. “We’ll go back there one day. And I’m sure we’ll find a way to give you back your home too. Not now, but someday that will be possible, I’m sure.”

It would be better for Mira to tell her. “In fact, your Grace, your husband already told me this morning you would both do everything to give me back Ironrath.”

“Really?” Margaery asked it with an amused curiosity.

“And I suggested he could accompany you to Highgarden.”

Margaery chuckled. “The king has taken a liking on you. He talks to you more than to any other servant.”

“He’s always the one to start conversations. I didn’t ask him anything, your Grace.”

“You do well. If you need something, just ask me, Mira. I’m the better one placed to influence Tommen. But by the way, you talked to him this morning?”

“Like I just told you, your Grace.”

“Then what is the surprise he’s preparing for me?” Margaery looked at Mira with a mischievous smile.

“He only asked me what you like.”

“What did you answer?”

Mira allowed herself to smile the same way Margaery did. “I cannot betray the king’s secrets.”

“And I thought you once said you were loyal to me, and in front of Cersei furthermore.”

“And I said your interests and those of the king were the same. If the king’s interests are to hide you a surprise, then it is in your interest to not know about the surprise.”

Both of them laughed at this. The queen put a hand on Mira’s. “That’s the handmaiden and the friend I like. Lord Tyrion was right when he said you were the most dangerous handmaiden in all of King’s Landing. Let’s go back to my solar.”

The queen rose and started to leave the circle of pillars. Suddenly, an idea crossed Mira’s mind. If you need something, just ask me, Mira. She rose from the bench as well but remained behind Margaery. “Your Grace. I would have a request to ask you.”

The queen slowly turned on herself to face Mira again. “You have something to ask from me?”

“Yes, your Grace.”

Margaery approached her with a dubious and hesitating face. “The last time you asked something from me, it didn’t end quite well.”

Mira averted her eyes and nodded sadly. “I know. And I think we both regret it.”

“Indeed. What is it?”

The queen and the king were the only ones who could help Mira in this matter. She had no choice. “This is not something you’d expect from me, you Grace. And myself, I didn’t think I would ask it from you anytime soon.”

When Mira stated her request, Margaery displayed a complete surprise that Mira never saw on her face. Mira had been right. Margaery would never have expected such a request.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Arya (a new character appears)
The carriage bumped all the time as it moved forward on the road. Arya was tired by this trip. She had to stay in this stupid little house on four wheels that moved all the time. She didn’t have the right to go out, except to make water. Arya was bored like hell about all this. And the worst in all that, she had to share a part of her days in this carriage with the man she hated the most in the world right now.

“Where are we going?”

“Somewhere there is someone you want to kill,” he answered.

No need to go anywhere to have someone I want to kill near me. You are close to me all day. She had asked the same question to Littlefinger every day since they left the Eyrie, and every day she received the same answer. She knew it was useless to ask the question, but better that than to remain silent all day doing nothing. And yet, she spent most of her days sitting in that damn carriage doing nothing, seldom speaking to her gaoler.

About a week after her meeting with the Lords of the Vale, Littlefinger had entered her chamber cell. Apparently, the Lords of the Vale argued and discussed for days about what to do with her. Some of them were pleading for her execution since she killed the Lady of the Vale and Ser Lyn Corbray. His brother, Ser Vance, was probably among them. Some also suggested they should deliver her to the Lannisters to prove their loyalty and let them deal with her. However, for all the lords and knights who proposed these solutions, an equal number thought they had to protect her, if only in memory of her father who had been like a son for their late Lord Jon Arryn. Some also supported Lysa Arryn’s death was probably an accident or that Arya was defending herself when she pushed her through the Moon Door. After much arguing and discussion, they finally reached a compromise. Arya wouldn’t stay in the Eyrie, and would have to be the farthest possible from Lord Robin Arryn, but she would stay in the Vale. She wouldn’t be handed to the Lannisters or any of their allies, and the Lords of the Vale would keep the secret of her existence and her presence in the Vale of Arryn. She would be kept at the Fingers, in the keep of House Baelish, an isolated place where no one would think to look for her. Lord Petyr Baelish would ensure her safety like he did in the Eyrie.

That was a few weeks ago. They had left not long after. Arya finally managed to leave the Eyrie. Only, she was a prisoner again from the same man. She couldn’t leave this carriage, in day or in night. She had no weapon and no way to escape. And since she wore a dress ever since she arrived at the Eyrie, she wasn’t clad in clothes that would help her to get far away from this horrible smirk. Days were even more insufferable than in the Eyrie. Arya couldn’t find a way to break out. She found no weakness in the watch of the guards around the carriage. They were even standing next to her when she would make water, only a few feet from her.

When she spoke to Littlefinger because she was bored, she tried to grab some information about him and where they were going. He was very cryptic. Once she asked him what he wanted and he answered with a single word. Everything. She couldn’t decipher his true intentions, but she knew she couldn’t trust this man at all and that he only wanted to use her, just like he used her father. He would betray her at the first occasion. She needed to escape. She tried to have information about his keep so she may try an escape once they would be there, but he didn’t give her much to think about.

Arya didn’t see much of the roads they travelled, but she realized very soon they weren’t in the Vale anymore. They were crossing territories of the Riverlands. She recognized a watercourse that looked like the Trident, and another like the Green Fork, and many other places she explored with Mycah while they travelled south to King’s Landing. Soon she realized they were following the Kingsroad, and they were going north, not south. That was strange. If Littlefinger wanted to deliver her to the Lannisters, which would be very logical, they would head south. Once she tried to know why they were going north, nearly bursting to the man, but again he only gave her cryptic answers.

The carriage stopped suddenly. The thin man smiled wickedly. “I guess we arrived. There is something I want to show you.”

He opened the door of the carriage and invited her to come out. Arya didn’t need to be asked. She spent so much time confined between the walls of this wheeling house that she would give her soul for breathing fresh air only for a few minutes without the excuse of making water.

Arya was escorted by four guards who surrounded her to the top of a hill. The air was damp and moist. She knew this smell. She smelled it during the last days. They were in the Neck, following carefully the Kingsroad to the north. Looking far before her, she could see the ruins of Moat Cailin. She stayed there with her father, Sansa, Jory and many others along with the king, Cersei, Joffrey and their retinue on their way south. Arya turned to Littlefinger who now stood next to her, but with a guard between them.

“Why did you bring me here? Why are we going in the North? Where are we going?”

She was tired of cryptic answers. For once, the man who betrayed her father accepted to be sincere. “I’m bringing you back to your home. At Winterfell.”

Arya sneered. “Winterfell was destroyed.”

“It was, but not anymore. Roose Bolton took residence in it and started to rebuild it. Your home will soon return to its former glory.”

Arya was furious the Boltons were now living in her family’s home. Roose Bolton killed Robb and now he occupied Winterfell. She wanted to rip his heart apart. “This is not his. Winterfell belongs to my family. To the Starks.”

“I agree. And this is why Lord Bolton accepted my marriage proposal.”

He smiled wickedly at her again. “What do you mean?”

“Roose Bolton needs a Stark in Winterfell to strengthen his hold on the North. And for that, there is no better way than marrying a Stark to a Bolton.”

Arya realized what he meant. “I’ll never marry him. He killed my brother. He betrayed my family.”

“You’re not going to marry Roose Bolton,” he said calmly. “You’re going to marry his son, Ramsay.
You want to kill Roose Bolton. And I want him dead too. However, this time you’ll need to be more subtle. You’ll have to gain the trust of the Boltons, and especially of your future husband, and when the Lord of the Dreadfort won’t be expecting it, you’ll stab him in the back.”

“They will kill me immediately. I won’t have any chance to escape.”

“Yes, you will. Stannis Baratheon has an army at Castleblack where your half-brother is. He means to take the North. He has larger forces than Roose Bolton and is a seasoned battle commander. He will defeat the Boltons. You will have the opportunity then to avenge your brother. And Stannis will name you Wardeness of the North at the same time. You’ll get your home back.”

“I won’t marry a Bolton. Never!” Arya shouted. She wouldn’t marry a traitor, or a traitor’s son, or anyone. She wasn’t a lady. She wasn’t Sansa.

“Stop to cry like a child. You want to avenge your brother. Avenge him. And seize the power that belongs to you and your family. There is no justice in this world. Not unless we make it. Make your justice.”

They stayed there, eyeing each other for a long time. “I hate you!” Arya walked away in a furious pace, going back into the carriage. She wouldn’t be able to escape, so there was no use trying to. She got back to her place in her wheeling prison. After a moment, they resumed their path. They entered Moat Cailin about fifteen minutes later and Arya was led to a chamber where one of Littlefinger’s men stood guard before her door. They were all knights and sellswords he paid handsomely.

Arya was brought her dinner in her chamber, with only a spoon and her fingers to eat it and a towel to dry her hands once she was done. They didn’t even dare to give her a fork or a knife in fear she might use it. And they were right. She would use it against them. Arya recited her list again before she went to bed this night. Cersei. Walder Frey. Roose Bolton. Black Walder. Meryn Trant. The Red Woman. Beric Dondarrion. Thoros of Myr. Ilyn Payne. Littlefinger. The Imp.

Arya went to sleep in the ragged covers and blankets on her wooden bed. Everything was in bad state here at Moat Cailin, but it was no worse to what she was used to. She didn’t fall asleep, but she controlled her breathing so the guard may think she was sleeping. He would be less on his guard if he thought she was sleeping. She had to escape now, and for real. She couldn’t continue her road north. Littlefinger was using her, lying to her, just like he lied to her father. She couldn’t stay with him or his men, and she couldn’t go to Winterfell. She would never marry Roose Bolton’s son. She would get justice and revenge for her family, but not by following Littlefinger’s schemes. She would kill him one day. But not this night. This night she would escape. And she had an idea where she would go once she would be outside Moat Cailin. They were in the Neck after all.

She was no longer confined in the carriage. That meant she could find a way to escape. She would have to get rid of the guard on the other side of her door first. But how to do it without a weapon? She missed Needle more than ever. Arya silently sat in her bed and started to look around for something that could be used as a weapon. There wasn’t much except a table, a chair and the bed she sat in. Everything was in wood.

By observing attentively the headboard of her bed, Arya noticed a piece of wood that separated from it. She started to pull it, very slowly to make no noise. After a few minutes, the piece detached from the bed. It was sharp. She had her weapon.

Arya began by cutting the bottom of her dress until it reached only the bottom of her thighs. She would be able to move more swiftly this way. She wished she wore breeches. In the water, the absence of clothes around her legs would make it colder. It took her some time with only a sharp piece of wood to cut it. Once she was done with it, she went silently to the door and knocked on it very quietly, as if she just woke up.

“Go back to your bed, girl,” the guard grumbled to her with a sleeping voice. That was good. His reflexes would be slower. Arya held tightly the piece of wood in her left hand.

“I need to make water.”

“You’ll make it tomorrow.”

“Then I’ll tell Lord Baelish you slept while guarding me.”

The man grunted. “Alright.” He opened the door very lazily. Arya waited out of sight. All the candles were extinguished. He wouldn’t see anything. “You could have asked befo…”

Arya didn’t let him finish his sentence. The sharp point of the wood pierced the man’s throat without problem as Arya managed to push the knight to the wall so he may not fall loudly on the floor, but rather slowly slip along the wall. The knight tried to make a sound, but only a strange gargle went out of his mouth that was already filled with blood. To be sure he wouldn’t alert the others, Arya put a firm hand on his mouth, and soon, the man was dead. Arya had blood on her hands and her clothes but it didn’t matter, as long as she wasn’t captured.

Arya went to look outside in the corridor. There was no one. She knew there were exactly fourteen men, both knights and sellswords, who protected and guarded her on the road. She managed to identify and count them through the times she made water outside the carriage. One was dead, but thirteen others were left, and she had to add Littlefinger, though she doubted he was any warrior. Anyway, she wouldn’t be able to kill all of them discreetly, and Littlefinger was probably guarded by more than one man right now. She couldn’t kill him. She would have to wait for that. Her priority and sole objective for now was to escape Moat Cailin. She took the dagger from the dean man’s body. That would make a much better weapon, but she kept the piece of wood. Better to have two weapons than only one. She left her chamber and closed it silently with the dead man still inside. They would need some time to discover his death.

Arya travelled through the corridors, quiet as a shadow. She crossed no one’s path. Most of the men were probably sleeping by now. All the same, she took all necessary precautions for no one to notice her, walking quickly but without a sound, making sure she took another path than the one they used to bring her to her chambers. She had explored Moat Cailin the first time she stayed there, and she knew the place better than anyone else here. She finally reached the courtyard. There were three guards there, two before the main entrance, the only exit, and one before the corridor from which they led her to her chamber. That would be a problem. Arya couldn’t kill all these men only with a dagger and a piece of wood. She could take one, perhaps two, but she wouldn’t be able to kill the three of them. And one would sound the alarm before she could deal with him even if she managed to get rid of all of them.

Arya was stuck. She couldn’t go back to her chamber, not with the body she left behind. She had to escape, and now. She remained in the shadows, unseen by the three men. She needed to get at least one of them away, preferably the one guarding the corridor. Then she could take care of the two others with her two weapons. But Arya couldn’t find a way to distract the third man. And anyway, she couldn’t be sure she would be able to deal with the two men who would be left.

She thought about the battlements. She could climb on it. There were two men on them, separated from each other by a long distance. The battlements weren’t too high. She could jump from it and survive. Though she would probably break some part of her body. Unless she rolled on her back. The battlements weren’t entirely straight. There was a slight slope. That was her best chance. But she knew what she would have to do once on the ground. Run. And run very fast. In fact, she had to run fast right now.

Arya prepared herself, took a great deep breath, then jumped like a cat to the stairs leading up to the battlements, not taking time to look at the reaction of the guards. She had reached the top of the battlements when the first guard shouted after her. One of the two men guarding the battlements was in her way as she crossed them. She planted the dagger in a joint of his armor between his shoulder and his arm. He screamed. Now everyone would know she escaped. Arya abandoned her two weapons, climbed the fortifications and rolled on the palisade.

The slope was very thin. Arya landed on her back as if she fell. However, she fell on soft grass and swamps. It hurt, but she had nothing broken. She ran very quickly in the direction she believed to be south. She had to get far away from this place immediately. She ran on the Kingsroad, but after some time, she heard sounds of horses getting closer and closer on her, and men yelling. Arya turned right, abandoned the Kingsroad and sank into the swamps, advancing much slower than before in the cold water.

She did right by cutting her dress, or else she wouldn’t have been able to run and would probably fall face first into the water. She heard the men behind her dismounting and recognized the voice of Littlefinger.

“Get her! Take her back!”

“We can’t go. There are lizard-lions and snakes in these waters.”

“I'll give ten times what I'm already paying you to the man who brings her back alive?”

Arya heard splashes in the water behind her as men jumped into the swamps. She heard their growls and curses as they advanced with a lot of trouble, slowed by their armors and weapons. They couldn’t bring their horses in the swamps. They were too afraid. The water got higher and higher around Arya and she had to be more careful. Her advance started to lower as she looked behind her more frequently. At some point she was nearly swimming. It was a chance they had hot pools in Winterfell where she had learned to swim.

She didn’t know how much time they chased her, but she was getting tired, and so they were from what she could see behind her. She approached a clod of earth and climbed on it. All of a sudden, she found herself held by two pairs of arms. She struggled to get free, managing to release her feet before she released her hands by punching and kicking blindly. She jumped into the water and swam away. She thought she heard bows bending and arrows released. When she looked behind her again, she saw no one was following her. Where were Littlefinger’s men? And the men on the clod who tried to seize her?

“Who are you?”

She had swam again for some time when someone called for her. She looked on her right where the voice came from and saw a little boat with four men inside. Arya tried to get away, but she didn’t succeed. Again arms grabbed her out of the water into the boat. She struggled again for some time, but finally she realized it was futile.

“Who are you?” the same man repeated again. “Why were these men chasing you? And what did you do in the swamps? There are very dangerous animals in these waters. We must never swim there. You could have died.”

These men were smaller than all those Arya ever saw, but they were men fully grown, not children. Their beards gave away their age. She realized who they were.
“You’re crannogmen.”

“We are. And who are you?” the man who seemed the leader of the group asked again.

“I need to speak with Lord Howland Reed.”

The four men looked at each other in confusion. “Why would you want to speak with him?”

“My father was a good friend of him. They fought in wars together. I need his help.”

Arya couldn’t reveal her identity right now. Howland Reed was a great friend of her father. He once told Arya and her brothers and sister that he saved his life during the war. That was her plan as soon as she decided to escape Littlefinger. If there was someone who would be ready to help her, that would be Howland Reed, and no one would be able to find her at Greywater Watch. But first she had to go to this moving castle, and she wouldn’t reveal who she was until she was before her father’s friend. Some crannogman could decide to sell her out. She would only trust Howland Reed, and no one else.

“Who are you?” the leader of the group asked her again.

“I’ll only tell my name before Howland Reed,” Arya replied.

“We cannot just bring a girl to Lord Reed because she claims her father knew him,” another man argued.

“Aye, it’s true,” another added. “How can we trust her? And anyway, Lord Reed would laugh at our face if we simply brought a girl from nowhere before him.”

The leader of the group was older than his three companions. He looked at Arya with piercing eyes. He didn’t seem to notice the argument between his fellows.

“I’ll bring her,” the older man finally said. “I had to go to Greywater Watch very soon anyway.”

“But, Aran…”

“It will be alright, Rickard. Lord Reed will decide what to do of this girl if she really is who she pretends to be. He’s the best to judge about it.”

They rowed for about fifteen minutes afterwards before they reached what looked like a small village. On the way, she learned Littlefinger’s men following her were killed with arrows by the crannogmen when they tried to attack them. Arya realized as they approached that the village was floating. It was built upon a crannog, one of the floating islands the people of the Neck lived on. It was difficult to see, but it seemed it was made of some drift of wood, leaves and plants. Arya recognized a few of these plants she observed with Mycah as they traveled through the Neck the first time. When landed on the crannog, Arya noticed there was earth on it as well. She followed the chief of the men, the one called Aran, to a simple wooden house. It was no different from the other half-dozen habitations there were in this place.

Aran led her to a place where she could sleep, saying they would leave for Greywater Watch early in the morning. Arya could sleep a few hours before she was awaken by a shaking of her shoulders.

“Come, we leave for Greywater Watch.”

Arya complied and followed the man to the boats. But as they walked, he told her something he never expected.
“I’m surprised to find a Stark in the Neck.” Arya looked back at him, surprised her too. “Don’t worry, I’m the only one who noticed it. The brown hair and the grey eyes, they don’t lie. I fought alongside Lord Reed during Robert’s Rebellion. I’ll bring you to him. You don’t have to worry.”

Arya nodded. He knew she was a Stark, but not which one. Perhaps he thought she was Sansa, because everyone believed Arya was dead. They embarked a boat similar to the one they arrived in and left at daybreak.

They needed more than a week to get to Greywater Watch. Apparently, the castle was built upon a crannog like all other habitations in the Neck, and it always moved, so they had to ask to other people hunting aboard small boats and to stop in villages they encountered in order to know where the castle was right now. Aran did most of the talking. He had three other men with him, different from those he was with when he found Arya. They were all small, not exceeding Arya’s height. They spent most of their days rowing. It was tiresome, but Arya was happy to finally have something to do, and to be in the open air. She also wore better clothes now. Aran gave her some clothes crannogmen wore daily so people wouldn’t realize she wasn’t from the Neck. They were better to move than the gowns and dresses she had to wear since the day she arrived at the Eyrie. She realized from their meetings with hunters and villagers that women were hunting as much as men and wore approximately the same outfits. Arya liked that. Here she didn’t have to behave like a lady.

When they reached Greywater Watch, she saw a huge castle made of wood moving on a crannog like every house and building they encountered up to now in the swamps. This building was higher however, though far less than all the other castles Arya ever saw. And it was entirely made of wood from what she could tell. There were battlements, but weakly manned. Arya only counted about three men on them. They landed on rudimentary wharves and disembarked.

The narrow path leading to the gates of the castle forced the five of them to walk one behind the other. Two people couldn’t walk side by side with such a thin causeway. Two men stood guards before the entrance gate with spears.

“Lord Fenn. Welcome to Greywater Watch,” one of the guards saluted them. Arya needed some time to understand. Aran was at the head of their group. The guard bowed before him. This man was a lord. Arya didn’t expect a lord to live in a small village. Perhaps things were really different among crannogmen. Lords lived among their people, not in castles. Except Howland Reed perhaps.

“Thank you,” Lord Aran Fenn replied. “I have business with Lord Reed.”

“Of course. He was expecting you soon. You may enter.”

The doors opened and they got in without problem. No one asked about Arya or seemed to notice her. They travelled through short corridors where wood got along with moss. They barely needed two minutes to reach what looked like a hall. It was much smaller than the Great Hall of Winterfell and the one in King’s Landing. In fact, when five hundred people could sit in the Great Hall of Winterfell, Arya estimated this one could probably hold at most a hundred people if they were squeezed enough and if they had enough benches and tables.

There was a man sitting in a simple throne made of oak with moss and flowers on it. He was small, like all the crannogmen, with a beard and brown hair. He wasn’t old, but not young either. He was probably about the same age than Arya’s father. Aran led their group before the man who was probably Howland Reed. He bent his knee and the others did the same. Arya followed them.

“Lord Reed,” Aran said as he knelt.

“Lord Fenn. You may rise, Aran, and all your friends too. The hospitality of Greywater Watch is Howland Reed had a pleasant and grave voice. It was sad, but not threatening. Just like his face. She didn’t see any happiness in it, but there was no anger or threat either.

“Lord Reed,” Aran advanced. “During our patrol near Moat Cailin, we ran into a young girl who was being chased by a few men in armor. They had blue sigils with an eagle on them.”

Howland Reed’s gaze turned perplexed. “House Arryn? What were men of the Vale doing in the Neck?”

“We don’t know, my lord. We dealt with the men when they threatened to kill us, but the girl refused to tell anything but to you. She said her father was a friend of you.”

Aran stepped aside and turned his eyes to Arya. She advanced. “Lord Reed. My name is Arya Stark. My father told me you were friends.”

Howland Reed showed a lot of surprise at the revelation of her name. He was obviously agape. She heard gasps of surprise behind her as well from the three men accompanying Aran who didn’t know she was a Stark. Howland Reed got up from his throne and descended the low platform where he stood. He was about the same height than Arya and looked at her without blinking.

“Aran, take your men and leave us alone.”

Aran left with his three men on the lord’s command and Arya found herself alone with her father’s friend. There was no one else in the hall. He continued to study her for a long moment. Arya started to get uncomfortable about it.

“You were my father’s friend?” Arya asked. Howland seemed to find back some of his mind.

“Yes. I heard what happened to him. That was horrible. I’m sorry for your loss, my child.” He really looked sad about it, much more than Yohn Royce. “I fought with your father during Robert’s Rebellion. I considered him like one of my best friends, even a brother. I wish I had been in King’s Landing to save him.” He looked to be far away in his thoughts as he talked and Arya thought she saw water in his eyes. He centered his attention on her again. “You are welcomed here, Lady Arya. My house swore allegiance to the Starks for thousands of years. And you’re my friend’s daughter. You are under the protection of House Reed as long as you wish to stay here.”

“Thank you. But I’m not a lady.”

He looked at her with some consternation. “Of course. Please excuse me, Arya. It doesn’t bother you if I call you by your name?” Arya shook her head. “You must be hungry.”

Arya was. Howland Reed clapped his hands. A servant clad in clothes very like his lord’s came and received orders to bring something to eat. Howland Reed invited Arya to sit at one of the nearby tables. Arya took place on a bench and Howland sat in face of her.

“Even here in the Neck, we heard you were dead,” he began to say when they sat. “Though I’m happy to see it wasn’t true. Most of Ned’s children are dead. I’m glad one is still alive.”

“Aye,” Arya confirmed. “Robb and my mother died at the Twins. Bran and Rickon died when the Greyjoys took Winterfell. Only I, Jon and Sansa are left.”

Lord Reed nodded with a sad expression. They stayed silent for a moment until the food arrived. The meal was simple and scant, but Arya was used to it and the food was good enough. The water was fresh, just like the fish and the cooked roots.

“How did you manage to survive?” Reed asked after a moment. He didn’t eat much of the food before him. “From what I heard, you disappeared about the time Ned was executed. Where have you been all this time?”

Arya started her story from the assassination of Syrio Forel to her running into Aran Fenn, giving him all the details. The boy she killed with her sword in King’s Landing. The execution of her father before the Great Sept of Baelor. Yoren’s and Lommy’s deaths. Harrenhal and her time as cupbearer of Tywin Lannister. The Brotherhood Without Banners. Gendry’s sale to the Red Woman. Her time with the Hound. The events she witnessed at the Twins when she was close to get back to her family. Their way to the Eyrie. Sandor Clegane’s death. Her imprisonments in this place. Her aunt’s death. Littlefinger’s plots. Her meeting with the Lords of the Vale. Finally her escape from Moat Cailin and how she ran into Aran Fenn and his men.

Howland Reed’s reactions changed a lot while she told her story. He seemed close to tears when she described her father’s execution. He looked horrified when she told him about the way the prisoners were treated by the Lannisters at Harrenhal, but very surprised to learn she served as Tywin Lannister’s cupbearer for months without him realizing who she was. He seemed sorry whenever she told him about the death and the disappearance of someone she considered a friend. But his strongest reactions were about the events at the Eyrie and the revelations about Littlefinger and his attempt to marry her to Ramsay Bolton. He looked furious enough at this moment to go into war against Roose Bolton and Petyr Baelish immediately.

When Arya was finally done with her tale, Lord Reed sighed. “You’ve been through a lot. No child should have to go through such hardships. I promise you you’re safe here. No enemy of House Stark will ever reach you here. Greywater Watch has never been taken since it was built.”

“Just like Winterfell,” Arya said on a grim tone.

Howland looked down. “I’m sorry for your home. I went to Winterfell once. It was a beautiful place. I did everything to make the Ironmen pay for what they did there by waging war against their garrison at Moat Cailin, though I wish I hadn’t helped Roose Bolton to go north this way. He killed our king, Ned’s son and heir. I’ll never forgive him.”

“Neither will I,” Arya added with a determined voice.

“You don’t have to worry about here. Greywater Watch will never fall as long as I lead my people. Many lords tried to seize it through history and failed because they couldn’t find it. Their men bogged and sank in their armors each time, or were killed by my people when snakes and lizard-lions hadn’t already killed them. No one will find you here. And if this Bolton traitor, or his son, or this Littlefinger traitor, or the Lannisters ever come, we’ll show them how we deal with traitors, turncoats and assassins. They will regret the Red Wedding at this moment.”

Arya saw the determination on the face of the Lord of Greywater Watch. “Lord Reed. I still have members of my family who are alive. Jon is at the Wall, he’s alright. But Sansa is held at Casterly Rock. She’s been forced to marry…”

“Yes, I know.” Howland Reed didn’t let her finish. “You can’t imagine how disgusted I was when I learned about this. Ned’s daughter married to a Lannister.” Venom in his voice was quite obvious. “I wish we could do something, but there’s nothing I can do for her.”

“But we can’t let Sansa in their hands. They are Lannisters. They murdered my father.”
Howland Reed looked down again. “I really want to help your sister, believe me. But we cannot enter Casterly Rock and get your sister out of there without being noticed. My people won’t be able to do it. We’ll get captured, and probably killed. We won’t help your sister by dying. There’s nothing I can do for her right now.”

Arya knew he was right. Sansa was married to the Imp. She would be watched by guards all the time, and Arya couldn’t help Sansa to escape the same way she escaped herself from King’s Landing. They would be lost in the Westerlands afterwards, with everyone looking for them. Sansa would never accept to cut her hair and wear breeches like Arya did to not be noticed. That would never work. And Arya would end between Lannister hands too.

“But we need to do something for her. We have to save her,” she argued.

“If we ever have an opportunity to save your sister, we’ll take it. But right now, the best thing we can do is to keep you here and safe, with no one aware that you’re still alive or in this place. My people still have honor. Those who know you’re here won’t tell anyone, I’ll make them swear. I’ll make the other people believe you’re a niece of me.”

“And if I want to leave and try to save Sansa on my own? You’ll abandon me? You’ll abandon the daughters of your friend? Or will you try to hold me here?” She asked it on a defying tone.

Howland Reed looked at her for a moment with astonishment, then smiled. “No, I won’t. I don’t think I would be able to hold you anyway if I tried. You already escaped from more heavily guarded places. But I won’t be able to help as soon as you’ll leave the Neck. I cannot endanger my people by sending them in the Westerlands.”

Arya knew it was futile. She wouldn’t be able to free Sansa on her own if she was behind closed gates at Casterly Rock. Even less without he crannogmen’s help. She would have to remain here for the time being. But she wouldn’t abandon Sansa. She finished her food.

“You know,” Howland Reed said all of a sudden, “when I noticed your presence right away, I thought someone dead for a long time had come back to haunt me.”

Arya looked at him, intrigued. “What do you mean?”

“You look very much like your aunt, Arya. Lyanna. Your father probably talked to you about her.”

That was something. He was the second person to tell him she looked like her aunt. In fact, her father rarely spoke about her. Arya mainly knew what everyone said about how she died during Robert’s Rebellion and was the cause of this war. “No. He didn’t talk very often of her. But there’s a statue of her in the crypt. I saw it a few times. But she didn’t look much like me when I looked at it.”

“No statue could represent her accurately enough. She was strong willed, headstrong, determined, adventurous, courageous, and she wanted to use swords, and bows and arrows, and ride on a horse. She hated everything the women liked to do in the southern kingdoms. She defended me one day against three other men.”

“Really?”

“Aye. Have you ever heard about the tourney at Harrenhal?”

“Aye. That’s when my aunt was crowned queen of love and beauty by Rhaegar Targaryen. Maester Luwin told me one day that’s what led to the war later.” Arya didn’t understand how putting a crown on a woman’s head could start a war though. For her, the war started because her grandfather and her uncle Brandon were killed by the Mad King.
“Before Rheagar crowned her, she saved me. I came to the tourney. I never saw something like this before. There were so many tents and great lords from every part of the Seven Kingdoms. The Mad King, Robert Baratheon and Mace Tyrell were among the people present for this tourney. Three squires beat me bloody, and your aunt appeared from nowhere to defend me. I still remember her words about twenty years later. That’s my father’s man you’re kicking. She managed to send them away with a tourney sword. That was quite unusual for a woman to fight with a sword. She brought me to the tent she shared with her brothers, and this was the time I met your father and your two uncles. I was their father’s bannerman, so they welcomed me like one of them. That evening, there was a feast in the castle, and your aunt convinced me to eat with all her family.”

Arya listened attentively to Howland Reed’s tale. Her father never talked so much about her aunt. Arya never knew her. And she was curious to learn more about this tourney. The Lord of Greywater Watch continued his story.

“During the feast, I noticed the three squires who had attacked me before. Lyanna saw them as well. Your uncle Benjen offered me to ride in the tourney and to give me an armor so I could get my revenge on them, but I refused. We crannogmen are not very good on a horse. Better on boats. But your aunt was good enough to ride in the tourney however.”

Arya was stunned by this revelation as the man before her chuckled. “She participated to the tourney?”

“Aye, she did. But no one knew it was her, except her brothers and me later. She took a grave voice and hid behind a helmet. She was called the Knight of the Laughing Tree later. She fought the three knights of the squires who beat me and defeated them all. Then she ordered the knights to teach their squires honor to get back their horses and armors. And the Knight of the Laughing Tree disappeared to never be seen again that night. They only managed to find her shield hanging in a tree later.”

Howland Reed’s face lighted up as he told her the story. It fascinated Arya. Why did her father never tell her and her siblings about this? She wondered how Sansa would have reacted to that story. She would have disapproved their aunt’s behavior because she rode in a tourney, but she wouldn’t have dared to say anything in their father’s presence against the actions of his sister. As for Arya, she found it wonderful. Her aunt did exactly what she would have done in her stead. She took part in a tourney. Arya had wanted so much to ride against other knights before. Her aunt had the chance to ride against three at least.

“Two years later, your aunt was kidnapped by Rhaegar Targaryen.” Howland Reed’s voice turned bitter. “I rode in war alongside your father to save her. And we failed her. I failed her. When we finally reached her in the Red Mountains of Dorne, she was already dying. I couldn’t save her like she saved me.” He looked down again for a long moment, then looked up in her eyes once more. “But I won’t fail you as I failed your aunt. I didn’t manage to save Ned’s sister. I won’t let his daughter die.”

For the first time in a very long time, Arya felt she could trust someone. She felt she could really rely on this man. He was one of her father’s oldest friend. She saw nothing untrue in him.

“If we have a chance to save my sister one day, will you help me?” she asked him.

He looked back at her with determination. “On my honor as a Reed, and on my friendship with your father, I promise you. As soon as we will have an opportunity to free Sansa Stark, we’ll take it.”

Arya was satisfied with this answer. Later in the day, Howland Reed accompanied her to her chamber. “My daughter Meera lived here before. She and my son Jojen left for an expedition not long before Winterfell was destroyed. You can occupy her room while she’s away. If you need anything, don’t hesitate to ask.”

Arya went to sleep on a bed made of leather and straw and fell asleep very quickly. She was in a place where she thought she belonged, among friends of her family. She had seen how crannogmen lived in the last few days, and she was excited to hunt and fight like they did. Women weren’t confined in castles here. They made the same activities than men, without difference. She thought she would like to live here. Before she drifted away into deep sleep, her list came back to her mind.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion (we go back to Casterly Rock after a long absence)
Finally, we go back to Casterly Rock. Sorry for the long time without Tyrion and Sansa. They're here again and I hope you'll like this chapter.

We get to see how Tyrion and Sansa rule and the problems they face, though this is nothing compared to how it was in King's Landing.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

"The mining should begin next month, my lord. The time we reach the vein. Of course, if you send us more men and authorize us to make these people work longer, we could be ready a week before."

The supervisor was talking to him among the sounds of pickaxes and spades against rocks, sand, earth and metal. They were in one of the new tunnels recently dug under Casterly Rock. This one was where the digging was the most advanced. Very soon, they would be able to get gold out of the rock and revenues of House Lannister would increase once again.

Tyrion had decided to come into the tunnels for the first time to see how the digging really advanced. Yroan was the best administrator of mines in the Westerlands. He could dig gold, silver, or any other metal out of any mine quicker than anyone else. But now that Tyrion was inside a mine, with dust all around, a temperature so high you ended up sweating the very moment you entered the tunnel, and seeing how the people here worked miserably about fourteen hours each day, he wondered at what cost came Yroan’s efficiency. However, the other mines he visited today hadn’t been really better. Many of the men working here were criminals, sentenced to work in mines to pay their debts, but some were also free men who were paid for their work. All the same, their working conditions were so horrible that Tyrion couldn’t help but feel pity even for those who were criminals. Anyway, their only crime had been to borrow money they couldn’t give back. That wasn’t as if they murdered or raped someone. They could barely be considered thieves. Tyrion looked around him at this sorry lot. Yroan was asking him to make them work two more hours each day.

“That’s alright, Yroan. I don’t want them to die of exhaustion and to lack workers. Maintain their actual amount of work like it is right now. My family is not going to be ruined for a week delay. We’re not in King's Landing.”

“As you wish, my lord. But I’ll try to see if there is any way to rearrange the schedules to make the work more productive.”

“Of course. Of course. Just don’t make these men work more than they already do.”

Tyrion left the tunnel. He didn’t like this place. His place was in a solar, a library or a hall, verifying accounts, reading reports, holding court and taking decisions. He was never made for manual work. He left the depths of Casterly Rock to go back to his rooms. He had spent the entire morning visiting the mines of Casterly Rock to see how the mining was progressing. He didn’t have to complain, but
He hoped he wouldn’t have to go back in those tunnels before a very long time. He pushed heavily the doors of his apartments after he returned shortly the greeting of Lady Brienne. He was exhausted from his visit and the walk from the base of Casterly Rock.

“Uncle Tyrion! What happened to you?”

Tyrion realized Joy was sitting in the living room he just entered and staring at him. Sansa was with her and also looked at him. Tyrion realized she was holding a laugh. He looked at himself and realized he was covered of dust and soot from head to toe. He needed a bath.

“It seems I experienced firsthand what happens when we actually dig gold. It seems we must soil ourselves to be rich, no matter the way.” Sansa giggled in front of Joy. “Please excuse me, my lady. I’ll go and clean myself before I indispose you anymore.”

Tyrion gave an order to the handmaiden present in the room to bring hot water for a bath, went to the bathroom and closed the door. He thought the girl was Darla Moreland, a daughter of Lord Robin Moreland. Tyrion stripped himself from his doublet and his breeches to only keep a shirt that covered his body from his neck to his thighs. Once the handmaidens were back with the hot water and the bathtub was full, Tyrion got rid of it as well and went to clean himself of all the dirt and filth he caught in the mines.

He should have known Sansa would be there. If Lady Brienne was guarding their rooms, it was because Sansa was there, and probably with another lady like every time in the middle of the day. When the lady knight wasn’t keeping an eye on Sansa, she was polishing her armor, sharpening her sword, or practicing in one of the courtyards against other knights, guards, and soldiers of House Lannister. First, the men of Casterly Rock saw Brienne as some sort of freak, but after she defeated a few of the less talented swords of the castle, the best started to defy her to show a woman couldn’t defeat them, and Brienne of Tarth proved them they were wrong. Now, when people wanted to fight the best warrior in Casterly Rock, they always went to contest against the daughter of Lord Selwyn Tarth. Some of the other knights respected her just like Tyrion’s brother now. In the end, she proved she was worthy to fight with a sword, and a Valyrian steel sword even more.

While in the bathtub, Tyrion thought about the people working in the mines. He had seen misery before. In King’s Landing, in the North, in the Riverlands at the beginning of the war, and even here when he was younger, essentially when he was in charge of the sewers of Casterly Rock. He knew these people worked in horrible conditions. However, the people working in the drains and sewers seemed to have a better life than the miners. Tyrion had known working in a mine didn’t have to be easy since the wages for a miner was about four times those for an agricultural worker. They needed to get their wages up to attract enough workers because the work in mines was very dangerous. Now Tyrion had seen directly why they had to pay them so much. Perhaps he ought to do something to make their lives better. If Jaime had been lowborn, he may have ended in one of these mines. Tyrion and Jaime owed their position to the fact they were born Lannisters of Casterly Rock, and nothing more. Considering how well Tyrion lived, he should do something to make the lives of these men less worse.

Tyrion went out of the bathtub after some time and put on fresh clothes. When he left the bathroom he saw Sansa waiting in a chair in the living room, before a table with some food. Joy was no longer here. She wore a purple gown with lions drawn on the bottom and wolves on the arms. She lifted her eyes to meet his when he entered the living room.

“How was the visit of the mines?”

“You did well to not come,” Tyrion replied. “They’re not pleasant places. No wonder many people among the workers are there because they couldn’t repay debts.”
“Will the mining start soon?”

“The first mine will be operational in a month.” Tyrion sat right before her and took some food for his meal. “Very soon incomes will increase.”

Sansa nodded to show she understood. Thanks to her lessons with Creylen, Sansa understood more and more about financial matters every day, though she still had way to go.

“We have to hold court today, I think.”

“Yes, we have,” Tyrion confirmed. “I’m afraid this may be quite painful. Lord Spicer has come to petition before us.”

Tyrion wanted to spit on the floor while saying the name, and Sansa didn’t seem to like it anymore. Tyrion wondered why Rolph Spicer was there. To complain about the fact he would only have a quarter of the revenues he would get from the mines of Castamere? That was very likely from him. Though he could try something more subtle. The Westerlings and the Spicers fooled Robb Stark, so perhaps Lady Westerling’s brother would try to fool his liege lord as well. Only Tyrion wasn’t Robb Stark, and Sansa wasn’t her brother either.

“Is there no way to send him away? Couldn’t we close the Lion’s Mouth before him and let him freeze outside Casterly Rock?” Sansa was half-serious as she said it, a smile playing on her lips.

“Don’t worry. I’ll let him come in, but I’ll make sure he understands once he’s inside he can’t stay for even a single night. He won’t come back before a long time.”

They exchanged wicked smiles. However, Sansa rose from her seat. “I’m afraid I must leave you, dear husband. I have requests I must answer before we hold court.”

Sansa left their rooms to go to her solar. It left Tyrion alone to finish his meal. That didn’t matter so much. They would be together in the Great Hall while they would hold court, and then there would be dinner, and finally the night. Nights were always the time when they spent the most time together.

When he was done with his frugal meal, Tyrion went to see his aunt Genna. She was in her personal rooms with the other aunts of Tyrion, Dorna and Darlessa. They were engaged in what seemed to be a very lively discussion, one that was dominated by Genna of course. The guard at the door announced Tyrion and the three women rose from their chairs to greet Tyrion, though Genna obviously only did so because the decorum demanded it when she wasn’t alone with him. Dorna and Darlessa always greeted him as their lord however. Even a few months after he came back from Casterly Rock, Tyrion still felt strange that his aunts changed their behaviour around him only because now he had titles.

“My dear aunts. I hope I interrupt nothing.”

“Nothing important,” Genna answered immediately. “I’m sure I’m the one you want to talk to. Ladies, leave me with our lord and nephew.” Dorna and Darlessa executed themselves immediately. Genna’s authority in Casterly Rock hadn’t diminished since Tyrion came back. “So, what do you want from your big aunt?” Genna asked as soon as the others were gone.

“How are going the preparations?”

“It’s still in more than a month.” Her voice wasn’t without reproach, but she answered all the same. “I was just discussing it with Dorna and Darlessa when you came in. Is that so necessary to organize such a big reception for a name day?”
“This is the name day of the Lady of Casterly Rock.” Tyrion took care to specify it. Sansa’s sixteenth name day was coming close, and Tyrion wanted celebrations his wife deserved after everything she supported these last years.

“I think you’re doing too much, Tyrion.” Genna sat back. “Many people still see her as a Stark. And you organize one of the greatest ceremonies ever organized in the Westerlands in the last decade for her name day. I think you should be more careful. You shouldn’t give the impression to your bannermen that you’re ready to do everything for her.”

“Well, my bannermen will have to accept that their lady comes from House Stark, and they’ll have to learn to put their grudges aside and to not see Northerners as foes. After all a Lannister killed Ned Stark, and that’s what started the war.”

“You should only make them angry at you for worthy reasons. When it is of use for House Lannister.”

“I think to have the noble people of the Westerlands respect Sansa as Lady of Casterly Rock is more than useful for House Lannister.”

Genna looked at him with a disapproving face, but she didn’t go further. “The preparations are going well. All invitations will be sent during the week, most of the artists are selected, and the services are nearly all decided. Cerenna is more than pleased to help us in that. After you, she’s the one who knows Sansa the best here.”

“Good. Just make sure with Dorna and Darlessa that everything is ready in time. And that Sansa is unaware of the details.”

“Yes, yes, I know. Everything for the Lady of Casterly Rock. I hope she will enjoy it.”

Tyrion left the rooms of his biggest aunt and told his two other aunts they could get back inside as he left. He then started to climb the stairs to the top of Casterly Rock where Creylen’s study was. Tyrion had asked his aunt to organize Sansa’s name day two weeks ago. She would be sixteen at this moment and it would be her first name day as Lady of House Lannister. Tyrion wanted it to be special. He still barely managed to believe the little girl he saw at Winterfell so long ago had become a woman. And that she was his wife.

Tyrion was exhausted when he finally reached Creylen’s rooms. They were completely at the top of the Rock. His short legs made the climbing a trial every time. As if he needed other trials. He had his fill of trials for the rest of his life. He had been on trial for being a dwarf his entire life. Entering the rooms where Creylen lived and made his studies brought memories back to Tyrion. He had spent most of his childhood in Casterly Rock, his father confining him inside the castle, not wishing to show the family’s embarrassment to the rest of the world. And Tyrion had spent most of his time inside Casterly Rock in Creylen’s rooms or in the library. Learning was all he could do because of his size. He also worked with his mind during this time, writing for the maester who asked him works on many subjects, from dragons to politics. That helped him later when he had to assume power. He regretted this time in some way, but most of all, he regretted how this time ended.

Tyrion was snatched from his books and parchments when he was sixteen. When he reached that age, he asked his father to let him make a tour of the nine Free Cities of Essos, just like his uncles Gerion and Tygett did at the same age. But Lord Tywin Lannister had refused, threatening to not support him anymore if he brought shame upon House Lannister even in Essos. Instead, Tyrion travelled through the Westerlands with his brother Jaime.

Tyrion had liked to visit all the Westerlands. It had been the first time he really left Casterly Rock.
They visited all the castles, all the cities, and probably all the inns as well. Later, when Tyrion had more freedom to travel and when he entered an inn in the Westerlands, he always recognized it. On their way back, he and Jaime met a girl supposedly chased by two rapists. Jaime never thought Tyrion would fall in love with Tysha. He only wanted to give an exciting first time with a woman to his little brother. If Tyrion had known… He should never had married her. So much wouldn’t have happened.

After the tragedy of his first wife, Tywin Lannister decided to give him an appropriate gift for his sixteenth name day. Tyrion was given responsibility over the sewers, drains and cisterns of Casterly Rock. They were never better maintained than during this time. Tyrion had gone to see their state not long after he came back a few months ago. His successors didn’t keep up with the good work he made.

Creylen’s study brought him back to that time when he had managed to find some happiness in books and studies. After that, they only became an occupation to forget about Tysha, just like whores and wine. Tyrion looked at the books on the shelves. He recognized some he read a long time ago, but also others Creylen probably commanded since the last time he was in Casterly Rock. Perhaps he should see if they were of any interest.

“Tyrion.” The dwarf reacted to his name being pronounced. Creylen just came from the rockery where he kept the ravens and advanced before him. Tyrion liked the maester. He had always been kind with him, and they had very interesting and enthusiastic discussions together around various subjects through all his childhood.

“Glad to see you, Creylen. I hope I don’t bother you.”

“No, Tyrion. Not at all. It’s always a pleasure to see you.” The maester would always call him by his name, without any title. He and Tyrion had been close enough for this.

“Are the lessons of my wife going well?”

“Oh, yes. The Lady Sansa is learning quite well. Before long, she’ll know everything she needs to know about finances and figures. She doesn’t learn as quickly as you, but she learns. She’s starting to understand why we must limit the extraction of gold to not lower its value.”

“Good. Did you receive any ravens recently?”

“Yes. In fact, a raven just brought us a message. But I have three messages to give you.”

“Three? Where are they coming from?”

“The first one comes from King’s Landing and has the seal of the Hand of the King.” Probably Kevan’s reply to the last raven I sent. “There are also two other ravens from the same place, one for you and one for Lady Sansa.”

Tyrion frowned. “A raven for me, and another for Sansa? Both from the same place?” Why not write a single message for the two of them?

“Yes, my lord.” A smile appeared on Creylen’s face. “From Castleblack.”

Tyrion looked at the three scrolls Creylen handed him. After a moment, he seized the three. “Thank you, Creylen.” The maester bowed, still with a smile on his face. He knew Tyrion and Sansa had been waiting for this for a very long time.

Tyrion went to his solar, the one that wasn’t part of the rooms he shared with Sansa. He unrolled the scroll coming from Kevan first.

Siege of Dragonstone still going on. Heavy resistance from the small garrison. The Redwyne fleet will need time before it comes home. Prepare for the invasion of the Iron Islands all the same.

Ser Kevan Lannister, Hand of the King

Without surprise, Tyrion would have to wait a long time before he could launch an attack against the Ironmen. What the hell was going on? No one could end a siege quickly, whether at Storm’s End, at Riverrun or at Dragonstone. Most of Stannis’s forces were at the Wall now, and still the Redwynes couldn’t take the island without a long and tiresome siege. The enhanced fleet was entirely built now and it waited in the docks of Lannisport and Casterly Rock for the Redwynes to come west. Tyrion didn’t like it. The war was lingering for far too long. These sieges should end now, before winter settled. Tyrion sighed in resignation and unrolled the second parchment addressed to him. He wondered why the Night’s Watch also sent a raven to him. Perhaps the raven for Sansa was from Jon Snow, and the one for him came from The Lord Commander (if they chose one after Jeor Mormont’s death) or from Maester Aemon. To his surprise, Tyrion discovered the message for him came at the same time from Jon Snow and the new Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch.

To Tyrion Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock and Warden of the West

I congratulate you on becoming Lord of the Westerlands. We need your help. You visited the Wall, and you know why it was built, and you know what lies beyond. It’s coming for us. I saw one of them. Hundreds of brothers died at the Fist of the First Men fighting them. Dead are marching on the Wall. Send us everything you can. Men, supplies, weapons, even gold. Winter is coming.

Take care of my sister. I considered you a friend at the Wall. I hope I wasn’t wrong.

Jon Snow, Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch

Tyrion smiled at the last sentence before the lad’s signature. That was a hidden threat that if he mistreated Sansa, he would have to deal with her brother. Tyrion didn’t enjoy the prospect to face Jon Snow’s sword someday, so he would make sure he treated Sansa like a princess, just like he already did. He was also surprised and quite pleased to see Jon Snow now led the Night’s Watch. It seemed Westeros’s outcasts were taking power. A dwarf ruled the Westerlands and a bastard ruled the Wall. He would make a good substitute to Jeor Mormont, though Tyrion hoped Sansa’s brother smiled more than the last time he saw him.

However, Tyrion’s attention lingered a long time on the first part of the message, and the largest one. You visited the Wall, and you know why it was built, and you know what lies beyond. Tyrion knew it only too well. The pleas for help from the Night’s Watch started when he was Hand of the King, and ever since he had been the only one to take these requests seriously. No one else believed White Walkers could really exist. Tyrion himself wasn’t really sure he believed in their existence, but he didn’t think Jeor Mormont, Aemon Targaryen or Jon Snow would lie when they said dead men tried to kill them or that they saw the demons with blue eyes. As strange as it may seem, it had to be true. Jon Snow couldn’t have gone crazy at the Wall. Something was really coming. Winter is coming.

Tyrion sat still for a very long time, looking at the words the bastard of Winterfell wrote to him, thinking about what he should do. He finally left his solar and went to the Great Hall where he and Sansa would hold court this afternoon. He knew Sansa would join him very soon, but he used the time he had alone before they opened the doors to think about Jon Snow’s message. He had written to Tyrion in the performance of his duties as Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, but he also addressed more personal matters at the same time when he told Tyrion to take care of Sansa. Tyrion always took care of his wife and he wouldn’t stop anytime soon. In fact, Jon Snow’s message only encouraged him to be even more careful for Sansa. He didn’t want the lad to think ill of him, and it may prove difficult after Tyrion’s family slaughtered his own. Tyrion remembered how much it took for Sansa to finally trust him.

Sansa came into the hall with Lady Brienne. She wore a different gown from the one she had two hours ago. This one was red and trimmed with gold, sapphires incrusted in the fine fabric. She had the medallion with the red ruby and the golden necklace with the direwolf hidden under a lion around her neck. As always, she was a true vision of beauty. Tyrion rose from his throne when Sansa entered.

“Sansa.”

“Tyrion.” She returned his greeting. He liked to hear her say his name. Tyrion regained his seat as Sansa took place in her own. “So, except Lord Spicer, who do we have today?”

“The usual share of merchants and commoners who come each time we hold court. But except Lord Spicer, I think there’s only Serion Lannister who will come to petition today.”

“Are there any problems in Lannisport?” Sansa asked.

“I don’t know. All I know is he said he would speak to us today before the court. We’ll discover what he wants very soon.”

Ser Serion Lannister was the eldest son and heir of Lord Reginald, the Lord of House Lannister of Lannisport. They were the cadet branch of House Lannister who ruled the city. They were far less wealthy than Tyrion’s family, but they still ruled the third largest city in the Seven Kingdoms. Most of the time, the administration of Casterly Rock and Lannisport were so close because of family links and the proximity of the city to the Rock that Tyrion spoke directly to Lord Reginald in his solar, or went to Lannisport to deal with matters. Why was Lord Reginald’s son coming to petition before the court? He could have asked for a private audience in Tyrion’s solar, but instead he chose to speak to Tyrion and Sansa before the whole court.

Brienne stood guard before the platform with a few other guards in red when the doors of the Great Hall opened and people poured inside. After a time, the herald hit the floor with his golden stick.

“Here stand before us Lord Tyrion, son of Tywin, of House Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands and Warden of the West. And his wife, Lady Sansa Lannister of House Stark, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands and Lady of Winterfell.”

People bowed their heads in submission. The herald called for the first petitioner. Ser Serion advanced and bowed deeply before Tyrion and Sansa.

“My lord, my lady.”

“Ser Serion,” Sansa greeted him with a smile. “It is a pleasure to see you again.”

“Thank you, my lady. The pleasure and the honor are all mine.” Sansa had met the Lannisters of Lannisport during the first visit she made in Lannisport with Tyrion. The heir of this cadet branch of House Lannister had been very courteous with her. “I come before my lord and my lady today to ask for their intervention in a family matter.”

Tyrion was intrigued by this. “Normally, Ser Serion, I try to not interfere in the family affairs of my bannermen unless it is in the interest of the Westerlands.”

“I come here because of a possible threat for the Westerlands, my lord.”
Why did he come to court to talk about this? He could have simply ask for a private audience with Tyrion. But now Tyrion had no choice but to listen to him. “Very well, Ser Serion. What is this threat?”

Serion Lannister cleared his throat. “I don’t enjoy being forced to do this, my lord and my lady. But I must reveal before the entire court that my lord father, Lord Reginald Lannister, intends to break a marriage that was celebrated before the eyes of gods and men.”

People were obviously surprised by this. Tyrion was as well. “I would need specifics, Ser Serion.”

“Of course, my lord. My younger brother, Ser Lyle Lannister, married last week the Lady Sanna of House Falwell. The ceremony was a discreet one, but it was celebrated by a septon before witnesses. The marriage is entirely legal, and was even approved by Lord Falwell, Lady Sanna’s father, but my father Lord Reginald wants to annul the marriage despite the fact it was consummated. He even bribed the septon who celebrated the marriage to have him tell there was no consummation.” There were shouts of surprise in the Great Hall. “I ask my lord and my lady to acknowledge the marriage between Ser Lyle Lannister and Lady Sanna Falwell and to order my father to welcome my sister-in-law in our family.”

Everyone was muttering in the hall now. Ser Serion Lannister just revealed a great scandal in front of many people from Lannisport and Casterly Rock, not to mention a few noble lords and ladies from all over the Westerlands who were present. But what caused Tyrion to feel there was something awkward was that this scandal was about the family of the man who just revealed it.

Tyrion used the time people were speaking with each other to consult Sansa who sat next to him. Their thrones were very close, so only by leaning their heads on the side, they could converse in whispers without anyone hearing them.

“He’s not telling us the whole truth,” Tyrion told his wife.

“Are you sure?” she asked.

“Would you reveal a scandal about your own family when all the Westerlands are present?”

“No,” Sansa conceded. “Why didn’t he speak with you in private? The Lannisters of Lannisport are close enough of the Casterly Rock for this if I remember.”

“Yes, you do remember well. There’s a reason why he talked about this before the court. We have to discover it.”

Tyrion made a sign to the herald. He hit the floor with his stick again and silence fell in the hall. “Ser Serion, we thank you for bringing this matter to our attention. I will discuss with Lord Reginald as soon as possible to settle this matter.”

“My lord, with all the respect I owe you, we need you to act quickly,” Ser Serion pleaded. “My father intends to send Lady Falwell out of Lannisport this very night and to prohibit her the entry to Lannisport forever. I fear how the gods and the Faith may react to my father’s behaviour. It would shame my house and the Westerlands forever. For the sake of my house, I ask you to order my father to accept Sanna Falwell as his daughter-in-law right now.”

Tyrion now really believed there was something amiss in this story. Ser Serion wanted at all cost Tyrion to acknowledge a marriage his father didn’t want of. And he did it when they were holding court. Tyrion had to discover what was really going on, and he couldn’t know everything only with the things Ser Serion just told.
“Ser Alfos!” Tyrion called. A knight in red armor stood before Tyrion and Sansa. “Go to Lannisport and order Lord Reginald Lannister to come to Casterly Rock for this evening to discuss about pressing matters. Tell him this is an order from his liege lord.”

“Yes, my lord.” The knight left to carry out the order Tyrion just gave him.

At the same time, Tyrion observed very closely Serion Lannister’s reaction. Tyrion could see disappointment, but more than all fear on his face. Tyrion would have to get everything clear from the Lord Lannister of Lannisport. The herald called the next petitioner to speak. Rolph Spicer advanced.

“Rolph Spicer, Lord of Castamere.”

Rolph Spicer spoke with a hesitant voice. “My lord, my lady, I come here in the name of my house to ask for your help. The mines of Castamere have proved to be much more difficult to clear of all the debris. I’m asking you, as your most loyal bannerman, to help us financially to reopen the mines of our castle so we may serve you faithfully like we always did.”

“Lord Spicer,” Tyrion replied with a smug smile. “I think you should be careful to not pretend to be the most loyal among my bannermen. I think there are many great families in the Westerlands who can say they never joined an army who invaded our lands.”

People laughed in the Great Hall, and others looked hatefully at Spicer. House Spicer wasn’t loved in the Westerlands because they were seen as up-jumped merchants by older houses and because they defected to Robb Stark during the war. Lord Rolph’s face turned red on the effect of anger and humiliation.

“Everything we did, we did it for House Lannister, with all our heart,” he yelled. That wouldn’t help his cause.

“Yes, I’m sure you participated to the breaking of the guest rights with all your heart.” People snorted in the hall when hearing about the Red Wedding. The Starks were still hated because they plundered the Westerlands, but now that Sansa was Lady of the Westerlands, lords and ladies weren’t about to speak highly of this event. And anyway, everyone in the Seven Kingdoms saw the breaking of the guest rights the Freys did as horrible, and knew the Spicers played a role in that treachery. “To answer your request, Lord Spicer, I’m afraid we’re already helping you a lot with the loan we granted you, especially since we charge no interest on it. I’m sure you have more than enough to reopen the mines with what we already gave you.”

“But, my lord,” stuttered Rolph Spicer, “I told you the clearing is much more difficult that it was expected. We need your help.”

“We lent you more than enough money without interest and granted you the castle of Castamere and its lands. This is already a lot of help, Lord Spicer. As former castellan of the Crag, I’m sure you have the required competence to clear the mines.”

Tyrion had said the last sentence so it would be obvious he wouldn’t hear anymore about it, but Sansa decided to step in the discussion. “Lord Spicer. May I suggest you ask help from your sister, the Lady of the Crag? After all, she helped you in the past. I’m sure House Westerling will be very happy to give you all the gold you need to reopen the mines. That’s what members of the same family do for each other. And House Westerling being one of the most ancient houses of the Westerlands, they’ll surely prove to be loyal to their kin and have the ways to help you financially.”

Sansa said it on an innocent tone, hiding behind her lady’s behaviour. But what she just said brought some muffled laughter in the Great Hall. The Westerlings were far too poor to give any help to Rolph Spicer. And he wouldn’t recognize the poverty of his sister’s house before the court. Lord Spicer left without being granted a single gold dragon. Tyrion wondered if he would ever be able to reopen the mines. If he didn’t, Tyrion would seize Castamere as a repayment for the debts Rolph Spicer contracted towards him, and probably grant it to another bannerman who served him well or to one of his cousins. In the meantime, it was funny to make Lord Spicer pay by subtly humiliating him. But Tyrion wondered how he couldn’t reopen the mines. He had borrowed enough gold from Casterly Rock to make them operational. Tyrion would have to investigate all this, and to send ravens to the other houses again to remember them they weren’t to lend any money to House Spicer or House Westerling.

Tyrion and Sansa held the court until sundown. After Serion Lannister and Rolph Spicer, merchants and smallfolk went to present many requests, asking for justice in a dispute with other people, complaining about a tax, asking for help against outlaws. The Guild of the merchants of Lannisport asked for immediate action against the Iron Islands whose ships disturbed their trading activities. Sansa acted like a true lady all this time, smiling at people, showing compassion for everyone who lost something, letting people know she cared for them. If Joffrey hadn’t been a monster, she would have made a great queen. Finally the sun set and Tyrion left the Great Hall with Sansa. On their way, Podrick came to tell him Reginald Lannister had arrived. Tyrion had to excuse himself to meet the Lord of the Lannisters of Lannisport in his solar.

Mostly, Lord Reginald Lannister told Tyrion there had been no marriage between Lyle Lannister and Sanna Falwell. This was only a story his eldest son invented to soil his image and to bring a Falwell inside House Lannister of Lannisport. Serion Lannister was trying to seize the control over his family by discrediting his father, accusing him to destroy a supposed marriage celebrated in the sight of the Seven, and he tried to win House Falwell to his side by marrying a daughter of Lord Falwell to his younger brother. Tyrion listened to everything Lord Reginald said. Considering the reactions and the behaviour of Serion Lannister, Tyrion had to admit all this was quite possible. He knew Ser Serion was a very ambitious man. He could have brought this before Tyrion in the hope he may acknowledge a marriage that never existed. With Tyrion’s support, Lord Reginald could never have stopped this marriage not yet celebrated. Tyrion thanked Lord Reginald for his coming and decided he would investigate more deeply to discover the whole truth. To make sure nothing would make the situation worse than it was, he sent one of his men to bring Sanna Falwell to Casterly Rock where she would stay as a guest until the affair was resolved. He wouldn’t take any chance. If Serion Lannister told the truth, then he couldn’t let Lord Reginald send his daughter-in-law away. However, if Reginald Lannister was the one to tell the truth, then Tyrion wouldn’t take the risk to allow Serion Lannister the opportunity to really marry secretly his brother to the Falwell lady.

Tyrion went to his rooms where Sansa was waiting for him. She seemed to have used her time to read one of his books. When he finally entered the living room where they took their meals, she got up, looking exasperated.

“You took your time,” she said on a reproachful tone.

“I’m sorry. Lord Reginald had very long explanations. You could have started to eat without me.” The dinner was already on the table, waiting for them.

“I’m not going to not wait because it pleases you.” She said it with a playful voice. She used to always say If it pleases my lord in the first times of their marriage, before they learned to trust each other. Sansa put the book aside on a little table nearby and went to the dinner. Tyrion looked at the book she was reading. On the Principles of Political Economy and Taxation by former Master of Coin David Ricardo.
“It seems Creylen’s lessons have very good results,” he commented.

“I still don’t understand half of what this man is saying. I must read a passage at least five times before I think I begin to understand it.” Sansa sighed.

Tyrion knew what she meant. Ricardo left only a few works, but they were very difficult to read. Tyrion himself had a hard time when he read it for the first time. He remembered something then. He approached Sansa who now sat at the table and put a little scroll before her, smiling. “I think you’ll enjoy this reading much more. It comes from Castleblack.”

Sansa looked at him, eyes wide open and mouth agape. She didn’t move for a moment, but then she seized the scroll and unrolled it with shaking hands. Her mouth was wide open while she read the message. A smile finally appeared on her face.

“He’s alive,” she said lowly. “He’s alive. Jon is alive.” She looked at Tyrion with a wild smile. Tyrion could see tears of joy in her eyes. In a moment she was on her knees and pulling him into an embrace. Tyrion was surprised at first, but then he brought his arms around her shoulders. She was crying and laughing at the same time, her chin on his shoulder. “He’s alive. My brother is alive.”

They remained this way for a good moment, Sansa laughing and crying hysterically, Tyrion wandering his hand in her hair and on her shoulder. But finally she broke their embrace and stood up. “We should eat. Before the food gets too cold.” Tyrion thought she was trying to gain back her composure, but her joy was far too great for this.

“I agree.” Tyrion was hungry. He went to the table and serve himself with pork sausages, chicken legs, mushrooms, peas and potatoes. Sansa took food as well, but she continued to look at the short message her brother sent to her, eating quite slowly. Tyrion was happy for her. Finally some good news about her family reached her. He used the moment to pour himself a generous cup of wine. Better to use the moment to drink more than Sansa let him do usually. The wine was good. It wasn’t Arbor gold, but it was a sweet red from Oldtown and of very high quality all the same. Sansa couldn’t get her eyes out of the parchment, so Tyrion emptied his cup quickly to take another one. An opportunity like this one wouldn’t occur before long.

“He’s Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch now. I can’t believe it,” Sansa said after a long time, a wide smile still spreading on her face.

“We can’t blame the brothers of the Night’s Watch for their choice. Your brother is far from being an idiot. Why wait for him to be older?”

Sansa looked up from the parchment finally. “It took him so long to answer. I feared he may be dead. Why did he need months to answer?”

“Well, they were under the threats of wildlings. Perhaps he just didn’t have the time. And now Stannis Baratheon’s army is at the Wall. He wouldn’t have seen it of a good eye if he had discovered your brother was sending messages to the Lady of Casterly Rock. But now Jon is the Lord Commander. He probably has more freedom. He wrote to me as well.”

“Really?”

“Yes. He told me in a very subtle way that if I didn’t take care of you well enough, then he would ride from the Wall to split me in two himself.”

Sansa seemed to realize after a moment Tyrion was joking. She burst into laughter. “I don’t think Jon would threaten you this way. That’s not his way.”
“No. But he did ask me to take care of you. Do you think I’m making a good job up to now?”

Sansa seemed to consider the question for a moment. “Perhaps I should ask him to come and see by himself. I’ll let him decide if he should split you in half.”

Tyrion chuckled at it. Sansa was smiling sweetly. He liked to hear her telling jokes. “In this case, I should double my efforts.”

They ate in silence for a moment. Sansa turned back her attention again to her brother’s scroll. She reached for the jug of wine, but as she took it, she frowned while still looking at the parchment and looked at the wine for the first time. She then looked at Tyrion with a reproving look.

“You drank wine.”

“Just like at every meal,” Tyrion answered innocently.

“When did you receive the raven?”

“At the beginning of the afternoon.”

“So, you wait to give the message during the dinner so you may get drunk while I don’t notice it.”

“Get drunk? There’s not enough in it for me to get drunk.” That was the truth. The full jug wouldn’t be enough for him to get drunk.

“No more wine for tonight.” She kept the jug out of Tyrion’s reach after she poured some for herself. Anyway, Tyrion had his own store of wine in his solar outside their common rooms. “You were supposed to tell me the moment we got an answer.”

“In fact, I told Creylen to give me the messages from the Wall at the moment they would arrive, nothing more,” he said with a little smile. However, Sansa seemed to really reproach him that. He took a more serious expression. “Sorry. I just thought the evening would be a better time for you to learn it than right before we held court. Judging from the reaction you had, I guess I was right in some way.”

Sansa nodded lightly. She seemed to understand, but Tyrion knew she wished she had known about Jon Snow’s reply sooner. He couldn’t blame her. She waited so long for words from her last brother. All the same, she looked happier than ever. A member of her family was still alive. Since they were talking about Jon Snow, Tyrion decided to introduce a related topic.

“Sansa, I’ve spent time with your brother at the Wall, but all the same you knew him better than me. Do you think your brother could lie?”

Sansa seemed taken aback by this. “Lie? What do you mean?”

Tyrion took the message the Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch sent to him and put on the table. “That’s the raven I received from him.”

Sansa took the message and read it. “You visited the Wall, and you know why it was built, and you know what lies beyond. It’s coming for us. I saw one of them. Dead are marching on the Wall.” She kept her eyes on it for a moment, probably reading it more than once. She finally looked back at Tyrion. “What is he talking about?”

Tyrion put down his fork and his knife and crossed his fingers on the table. “Sansa, have you ever heard stories about White Walkers?”
“Yes, of course. Old Nan used to tell us stories about them at Winterfell. Bran loved these stories because they scared him. I guess I didn’t like them for the same reason. Why?”

Tyrion repeated Jon Snow’s words. “Dead are marching on the Wall, and your brother claims he saw one of them.”

Sansa looked back at the scroll. She finally chuckled a little. “White Walkers and wights are only myths. They are stories to frighten children. Nothing more.”

“That’s what I thought too, before I visited the Wall. But when I was there, I had discussions with your uncle Benjen, Maester Aemon and the Lord Commander at the time, Jeor Mormont. Your uncle seemed to believe there was something beyond the Wall. Something more dangerous than wildlings. When I spoke with Maester Aemon and Mormont, they told me they had captured more wildlings fleeing south these last times. These wildlings claimed they saw White Walkers.”

Sansa was looking at him strangely. “Wait, don’t tell me you believe it. White Walkers don’t exist. Surely these wildlings imagined it, or they lied.”

“That’s what I thought at the moment. There are many fishermen in Lannisport who claim they saw mermaids after all. But apparently a deserter of the Night’s Watch that your father executed swore White Walkers killed his two companions during a ranging north of the Wall, right at the moment he lost his head. And I don’t know, but there was something I felt while I was at the Wall. Something strange. Unusual. And terrible. I don’t know what it was, but it was as if… something was coming. Something north of the Wall.”

Sansa shook her head with a little smile. “The deserter was about to be killed. Surely he was raving.”

“When I was Hand of the King, we received a raven from Jeor Mormont, saying a dead man tried to kill him in his sleep. A former ranger they found dead north of the Wall. And we received words from the Night’s Watch about a year ago that Mormont was killed during an expedition north of the Wall, at a place called the Fist of the First Men, along with three hundred men. The survivors said they were attacked by wights and White Walkers. And now we have this message from your brother. Do you think he would lie about something like this?”

Sansa looked back at the message Jon Snow sent to Tyrion, probably considering what her brother wrote. “Jon was always the one to look the most like our father. He wouldn’t lie, but… I mean, White Walkers cannot exist.”

“I don’t know. According to history, the Wall is eight thousand years old and was built not long after the attack of the White Walkers. We only have myths and legends about them. But on the other side, if dragons exist, why not dead men?” Tyrion shook his head. “There are many strange things that are happening. White Walkers reappearing north of the Wall, dragons in the east… If this continues I’ll believe people who say they saw mermaids in the Sunset Sea.”

“Or Brienne when she says Renly was killed by a shadow.”

Tyrion looked perplexed at Sansa. “What do you mean?”

Sansa waited a moment before she spoke. “You remember the strange circumstances of Renly Baratheon’s death?”

“Yes, of course. We never really knew who killed him. Some say it was Lady Brienne, others that it was your mother, or Stannis, or even that he was killed with dark magic.”

“Brienne told me Lord Renly was killed by a shadow with the face of Stannis Baratheon,” Sansa said lowly. “I didn’t believe her the first time she told me, but I’ve been thinking about it afterwards, and if she had lied about Renly’s death, she would have given some believable lie, not this. But it seems unlikely just like White Walkers.”

A discussion Tyrion had with Varys came back to his mind. “Varys informed me Stannis had a Red Priestess from Asshai as an advisor and that she practices sorcery. Perhaps that’s her doing. I have to admit your mother doesn’t strike me as an assassin, and I doubt she would have accepted one at her service. When she arrested me, she wanted me to be executed, not murdered. Though with your cousin Robin Arryn execution wasn’t far from assassination for pleasure.”

Sansa looked again at her brother’s message. “We should send him help,” she said suddenly, determination in her voice. “He says he needs us. If he believes there are dead men marching on the Wall, there must at least be some great threat. We have to send him what we can.”

Tyrion sighed. “I wish I could.”

“What do you mean? You said yourself you believed there was something dangerous beyond the Wall, that you received many reports stating White Walkers were back. We cannot abandon Jon.”

“Of course, I know.” Tyrion looked at Sansa in her eyes. “But what do you want me to do? Send men to the Wall, telling them they have to fight dead men? Stannis’s forces occupy most of the Wall. If I send men there he will fight them. His fleet is anchored at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea, so we cannot send any ship there. And Kevan will never agree to send supplies or weapons to the Wall while Stannis is there. And he won’t believe stories about White Walkers either. The war is not over yet. We have three great sieges going on at Riverrun, Storm’s End and Dragonstone, and still the Greyjoys to deal with afterwards. For now, I’m afraid there’s nothing we can do.”

It was sad to say, but it was the truth. As long as Stannis stayed at the Wall, Tyrion couldn’t send help under any form to the Night’s Watch. Stannis had to leave the Wall. And even if he left, the Northerners wouldn’t easily suffer Lannister troops marching through their territory and people wouldn’t go willingly to fight against dead men in the middle of winter. Sansa seemed to understand him.

“Is there really nothing we can do?”

Tyrion swung his arms in powerlessness. “If Stannis left the Wall and his fleet was no longer blocking Eastwatch-by-the-Sea, I could probably send supplies and weapons through the Goldroad and King’s Landing, and perhaps prisoners as well to fill their ranks, but I’m afraid we’ll need a very good reason to send an army to the Wall. My bannermen will not follow me into a war against the dead during winter after they suffered so many casualties during the War of the Five Kings, unless they feel the dead are a real threat. I hope they’ll realize it before it’s too late.” Tyrion sighed again. “We should eat the rest of the dinner before it gets too cold.” Tyrion picked a sausage with his fork and bit in it. “It got cold.”

He tried to lighten the mood, but it was obvious it didn’t work. They finished to eat in silence, both lost in their thoughts. Tyrion wondered if the wildlings’ attack on the Wall was a consequence of the reappearance of White Walkers. The threat of the dead may have convinced them to unite and get south of the Wall. When they were done, Sansa went to her desk and started to write something.

“Already answering to your brother?” he asked.

“Yes. I’ll tell him we can’t send any help for now.”

“You can let me take care of that. After all, he wrote about this to me.”
“He may believe it more if it comes from me. And he’ll know I trust you.”

Tyrion had to concede it was true. “Very well. Tell him we could send supplies as soon as Stannis leaves the Wall. For now, we can’t.”

“I’ll tell him,” nodding with her head as she continued to write. Tyrion went to his solar to change his clothes for the night. They had dined late because of his meeting with Reginald Lannister. He went to bed as Sansa was changing for her own nightclothes in the dressing room. She joined him not long after, wearing a white nightgown made of Myrish silk. She laid her head against his arm and placed her hand in his own. After a long time, Sansa was still not sleeping.

“You cannot sleep?” he asked her.

“No. You neither, it seems.”

“No. Perhaps I’ll go reading.” He started to raise, but Sansa stopped him, leaning closer on him. After deciding how much he could drink, she decided if he could leave their bed or not. Anyway, Sansa was a better mean for Tyrion to fall asleep than books, so he couldn’t really complain to her. He rubbed her back with one of his hand and felt better this way. He felt Sansa relaxing as well, her head resting under his chin.

“Tyrion, what you said about the dragons in the east, is that true? Or are they only rumors?”

Tyrion waited a moment before he answered. “I’m afraid it’s more than rumors. You know there were two children of the Mad King who escaped Robert Baratheon when he took the Iron Throne?”

“Yes. Joffrey told me at his name day that Viserys Targaryen was dead.”

Tyrion remembered this name day. It had been the first time he spoke with Sansa. “Viserys is dead, but his sister, Daenerys, is still alive. She was married to some warlord of the Dothraki not long before the war started. Dothraki are a people who spend most of their lives on horses and travel through an area called the Dothraki Sea in Essos. They mainly plunder cities and lands from what I know. But she ended up in Qarth later and that’s where her dragons were seen for the first time. Ever since, they’ve been growing up and she conquered the three cities of Slavor’s Bay, Astapor, Yunkai and Meereen, abolishing slavery everywhere she went. Now she rules in Meereen as queen and tries to keep her hold on Slavor’s Bay. Her three dragons have reached the size of carriages according to the last reports Varys gave to the small council and she has about ten thousand soldiers under her orders, former slaves and sellswords. She’s real, and her dragons as well.”

They remained silent for a moment. “Do you think she may come to Westeros one day?”

“Perhaps. Unless she stays in Meereen. She had more than one chance to come to Westeros. Meereen has a fleet strong enough to carry all her army across the Narrow Sea, and she could have found allies. Many people would think twice before fighting dragons. Last time a Targaryen came to Westeros with three dragons, an alliance between the Westerlands and the Reach was defeated by the dragons. House Gardener was destroyed and the last King of the Rock surrendered to Aegon the day after the battle.”

“And Torrhen Stark knelt without a fight,” Sansa completed. Another silence followed. “If she comes, we won’t stand a chance.”

Tyrion knew that only too well. No one had been able to stop the dragons, except the Martells in Dorne, and with great losses. They needed a marriage between Princess Daenerys Targaryen, the sister of King Daeron II, and Prince Maron Martell to bring Dorne inside the Seven Kingdoms. If dragons came again, the Lannister-Tyrell alliance wouldn’t stand a chance against the second Daenerys Targaryen. Dragons in the east, White Walkers in the north, shadows assassinating kings… The world was getting crazier than it ever was and threats who were unimaginable a few years ago emerged from everywhere.

Tyrion resumed the rubbing of his wife’s back. “Try to sleep. Let’s enjoy some peace while we have it. With some hope, dead men, dragons and shadows will never reach us.”

They didn’t speak afterwards. Tyrion didn’t know if Sansa fell asleep afterwards, but he did. He was walking slowly in a dark room, holding a torch, trying to be as silent as possible. He could hear grumbles before him. He heard chains rattling on the stone floor and saw two huge forms moving in the dark before him. First he only saw their eyes, but as he approached he could glimpse their muzzles, then their teeth, their throats, their tummies, and finally their whole bodies. Two dragons stood before him, one green with bronze eyes, the other, smaller, was white with golden eyes. One of them opened his mouth and Tyrion saw flames coming out of his throat.

Tyrion awoke in darkness without a torch. The moon was high in the skies. There were no clouds. And he wasn’t standing before two dragons, but lying in a bed in Casterly Rock with his wife resting her head on him, sleeping peacefully. He still had his hand on her back. Tyrion buried his face into his wife’s red hair, and fell asleep again, this time without any dream troubling his rest.

Chapter End Notes

There isn't much action in this chapter, I concede it. Mostly, it introduces elements that will be vital to what will happen later in the fic.

Also, I'm very sorry, but Tyrion and Sansa will have another extended absence. The next four chapters will be out of Casterly Rock. The story is expending more and more. But afterwards, they come back on a very regular basis and will have many interesting chapters.

Please review

Next chapter: Kevan
The place was stinking and crowded. Dozens of people were stuck in a very small space behind a deplorable alley. The smell was horrible, almost as much as the one on a battlefield after a great battle. Kevan had Ser Alyn Stackspear, one of the two new members of the Kingsguard replacing Ser Osmund and Ser Meryn, to protect him. And before Kevan here he stood, the man people called the High Sparrow.

The man was old, with a half bald head and many wrinkles. He wore worn clothes that were completely grey and had no shoes at his feet. What few hair he had left were grey. They would probably have been white if properly washed, but his old body was entirely covered with dust and mud. He was stinking just like everyone else here. The man was serving soup and bread to the people coming before him, all skinny people who could barely eat. If he was honest with himself, Kevan didn’t really expect that from the High Sparrow, but considering these people were fanatics he should have been prepared for this possibility.

“The name High Sparrow sounds ridiculous, doesn’t it?” the old man said as he continued to give food to the people forming a line before him and his cooking pot. He was smiling and laughing as he said that. “Like Lord Duckling or King Turtle. Still, it’s meant to. We’re often stuck with the names our enemies give to us. The notion that we’re all equal in the eyes of the Seven doesn’t sit well with some, so they belittle me. It’s only a name. Quite an easy burden to bear. Far easier than theirs.”

The High Sparrow looked around him to show the bunch of people all over the place. Kevan decided to ignore the remark. “Why did you come to King’s Landing?”

“To remind everyone who we really are. Who we all are. It’s already a hard job reminding myself. I tell them no one’s special and they think I’m special for telling them so. But enough talking about it. I assume you’re here to arrest me for that incident with the High Septon.”

The High Sparrow didn’t show any fear. He talked about serious matters as if they were talking about weather. But he didn’t know what the High Septon had asked to the small council this morning. The High Septon had come after being beaten and forced to walk naked through the streets of King’s Landing by the Sparrows, religious fanatics who arrived in the capital not long after Tywin’s death. They would never have dared to enter the city when Tywin was still alive, but now they were spreading everywhere. A small group had left the High Septon bleeding without clothes on the cobblestones. The fact the High Septon was found in a brothel didn’t matter in this. Kevan couldn’t allow the High Septon to be humiliated and beaten this way by people without reacting. Though he may have to take measures if the High Septon visited brothels without hiding it. At least Pycelle didn’t show to the entire world he paid for time with whores.

“This is quite an unacceptable way to treat the chosen representative of the gods in this world,” Kevan said.

“Hyprocrisy is a boil. Lancing a boil is never pleasant. Although they could have been more careful with the blade.” The High Sparrow said it while he broke a loaf of bread in several pieces. Kevan started to be impatient with the way this man answered as if nothing happened.

“The High Septon came to the small council today. And he didn’t ask us to arrest you. He wanted us to execute you. And considering the way he was treated by your men, this is no surprise.”

“They aren’t my men. We are all brothers, and no one gives orders to the other. I wouldn’t presume to know your thoughts about this matter though. Are you going to kill me? If that’s the case, just say it and get over with it. I won’t oppose any resistance. No one needs to die except me if that is your wish.”

“The king doesn’t believe it would be appropriate to kill you,” Kevan explained. “You’re not the one who beat the High Septon, but some of your brothers did beat him and forced him to walk naked in the streets. The Crown has sworn to protect the Faith, and an attack against the High Septon is an attack on the Faith. The king cannot remain idle before this. Can you tell me who mistreated the High Septon?”

The High Sparrow opened his arms in powerlessness, still smiling. “If only I knew who they were. We are so many. I don’t remember all their names. And anyway I don’t know which ones did this.”

“And if you knew?”

The old man shrugged. “Perhaps I would tell you. But that wouldn’t help you very much. We are a lot of people, and our numbers increase every day. Kill one of us, and two of us will rise again.”

Kevan remained impassive. “I have nothing against you and your followers, and the king neither. Peace has just returned, and the king doesn’t want to shed blood when the war has just ended. Keep feeding the poor and helping those who have nothing. We have nothing against it. But we won’t stay still while you have people being beaten and walking into the streets without clothes. If another incident like this one happens, we’ll have no choice but to expel you from the city to guarantee the king’s peace. And we may have no choice but to grant the High Septon his request as well.” Kevan turned on his heels to leave this place, his threat in the air.

“A lifetime of wealth and power has left you blind in one eye, Ser Kevan Lannister. You are the few. We are the many.”

Kevan stopped and turned to the other people who were present. They didn’t seem to notice the discussion Kevan had had with the High Sparrow. They hadn’t talked loudly and this sorry lot were occupied to eat. “People. Know that tomorrow Queen Margaery organizes distributions of bread and soup near the Iron Gate. Everyone who wants a hot meal is welcome.”
Kevan left as someone shouted. “Queen Margaery!” and others started to shout their queen’s name as well.

Kevan went back to the Red Keep on a horse with his own guards and Ser Alyn Stackspear. The Sparrows could prove to be a danger eventually, but they couldn’t send the army or the City Watch against them. That would cause too many deaths. Maintaining peace was a priority when they just got out of war. And luckily, they had a queen who cared about the needy. They could have the people on their side with her and Tommen, and without a certain support from the people, the Sparrows couldn’t hope to represent any real threat to the Crown. However, they were religious fanatics who didn’t listen to reason. Kevan feared Lancel may have ended with these men if he hadn’t sent him to Quiet Isle. But perhaps the High Sparrow would understand they couldn’t threaten people of the government or the Faith without facing dire consequences, and that would be enough to stop them from doing anything wrong. The last thing they needed was a war with religious fanatics inside the walls of King’s Landing.

Kevan arrived to his solar in the Tower of the Hand where Jaime was waiting for him, wearing his armor and white cloak. He had asked his nephew to meet him. He had something very important to tell him.

“You asked for my presence, Kevan?”

“I did,” Kevan confirmed. “We received something from Dorne.” Kevan took the necklace from his pocket and handed it to Jaime. It was a silver necklace representing the head of a lion with its mane. Jaime looked at it for a moment.

“This is Cersei’s medallion.”

“No. Cersei’s medallion is with her at Stokeworth. This one is the second one. The original. It belonged to your mother, and Cersei gave it to Myrcella when she was five.”

Jaime looked back at his uncle in astonishment. “How does it come to be here?”

“As I just told you, we received it from Dorne. In a box, wrapped around the mouth of a dead viper.”

Jaime seemed to realize what it meant. “It’s a threat.”

“Yes. It’s a threat. Oberyn Martell is dead, killed by one of our bannermen, the same man who killed Elia Martell and her children. No wonder they hold us responsible for this.”

“She’s in danger,” Jaime said weakly.

“Maybe.”

“Maybe?” Jaime didn’t seem to understand what Kevan just told him. “My niece, your grandniece, is in Dorne, surrounded by people who hate our family. People who threaten us. People who threaten to kill her. And you say she may be in danger?”

“Yes. Your niece may be in danger.” Kevan emphasized the word niece. “That’s why I’m telling you.” Jaime remained silent, his eyes hollow. “Doran Martell is a cautious man. Princess Myrcella is betrothed to his son Trystane, and he knows he cannot face the united mights of Casterly Rock and Highgarden alone. There was no message with the box. It may come from someone else than him. I’m planning to send him a raven to warn him that anything that would happen to the princess would put in great danger our alliance with Dorne.”

Jaime looked at the medallion he still held in his hands. “We should get her out of here.”
“No. Myrcella is what guarantees our alliance with House Martell.”

“You can’t let her there.” Kevan’s nephew was angry now. “She risks to be killed. We must get her back.”

“What do you want me to do? To ask Prince Doran to send her back? That could jeopardize our alliance with Dorne if Myrcella is no longer there. To kidnap her? That could start a war if we take Prince Trystane’s betrothed away.”

“The Martells are threatening to kill Myrcella and you talk about maintaining an alliance with them.” Jaime said it with astonishment.

“What would you have me do? Start a war against Dorne when we’re just about to end the actual one? Our forces still have to take Dragonstone, Storm’s End and Riverrun. Another war would be a catastrophe, even more so in the middle of winter.”

“Cersei would never abandon her daughter. She would do everything to free her and get her back to safety.”

“Yes. And we both know Cersei’s decisions tend to have very dire consequences for our family. I told you this out of respect for you, because she’s your niece.” Again he emphasized on the last word. “Myrcella will remain in Dorne, Prince Doran will be informed he has all good reasons to protect her, and Dorne will remain into the fold. Now go and do your duty as Lord Commander of the Kingsguard.”

Kevan opened his hand to make Jaime understand he wanted Myrcella’s necklace back. Jaime put it abruptly in his hand and left, obviously disapproving Kevan’s decision. Kevan knew there were risks to let Myrcella in Dorne, but the alliance with Prince Doran was too important to be cancelled because of a threat they couldn’t be sure from who it came. The box could come from everywhere in Dorne. Honestly, Kevan didn’t think the threat was from Doran Martell. The man was too cautious. It probably came from someone else who wanted to avenge Oberyn Martell. Or if it came from the Lord of Sunspear, then it was an empty threat. The right message along with the medallion of Princess Myrcella would be enough to make sure the Prince of Dorne wouldn’t do anything against Kevan’s grandniece and would ensure no one else did anything against her. That’s what Tywin would have done. He would never risk a war against Dorne at this moment.

Kevan used the afternoon to write messages, including the one to Prince Doran, and to read various reports. Sieges were going on everywhere. Tyrion had written to him more than once to press the siege of Dragonstone to end. Kevan was just as tired as his nephew and lord about this. The Iron Islands were a real danger, much more than Dragonstone now that Stannis Baratheon was at the Wall. Now House Bolton would have to deal with the usurper if he ever invaded the North, and Kevan expected Stannis to do it. He couldn’t try to take back King’s Landing again, nor any other region of the Seven Kingdoms with the few troops he had left. Once the siege of Dragonstone was over, the Redwyne fleet would have to set sail immediately for the Iron Islands and join the Lannister fleet at Lannisport. Then they would crush the Ironmen forever. This time, Balon Greyjoy wouldn’t be spared. He rebelled twice. There would be no possibility for him to escape execution.

However, Kevan was deceived that Tyrion didn’t send more troops to end the siege of Riverrun immediately. When Kevan asked him to do so, Tyrion replied the Freys could die besieging Riverrun as far as he was concerned. It was a chance the Freys didn’t read this. Kevan couldn’t say he had any love for the Freys, but they were allies all the same, and they had to seize Riverrun for Genna and her sons. Kevan suspected Tyrion’s marriage with Sansa Stark was the main reason of his refusal to help the Freys. Did Lady Sansa convince him to not help them, or did Tyrion take the decision himself? Kevan had no way to find an answer to this question, but the result was the same. The siege of Riverrun was lingering, the Blackfish still holding it with the last Tully forces. And the Tyrell forces took all their time to take the Baratheon’s fortress in the Stormlands, just like during Robert’s Rebellion.

The last report from Dragonstone wasn’t encouraging either. The last attempt by the Redwyne forces to storm the castle ended up with two hundred men dead, none of them were Stannis’s. Kevan may be forced to send some of his own forces who remained behind at King’s Landing. With the possible threat of the Sparrows, that wasn’t something he looked forward. Varys’s report about Slavor’s Bay was more encouraging. Daenerys Targaryen had locked two of her dragons in a cave, and the third one was nowhere to be found. She also had problems with the Sons of the Harpy, assassins wearing masks who murdered her soldiers and allies all over Meereen and who weakened her rule. Her hold on Astapor and Yunkai wasn’t certain anymore, and she banished Ser Jorah Mormont. She received a copy of the royal pardon Robert Baratheon once wrote to him and that Kevan sent months ago. Apparently the population of Slavor’s Bay was no longer totally with her after she executed a free man for assassinating a Son of the Harpy. This young queen made several mistakes, and didn’t seem about to come to Westeros. Perhaps Kevan should support the resistance against her rule, though they didn’t have enough money left in the Crown’s chests to finance the Sons of the Harpy or the slavers. For now it seemed all he could do was watch and see. He had no way to weaken Daenerys Targaryen even more. No way to make her doubt Barristan Selmy and exile him as well. For now, she was no immediate threat and Kevan hoped it would stay that way. He had no wish to face dragons in battle. The last King of the Rock, Loren the Last, surrendered to Aegon the Conqueror after his dragons alone defeated his army at the Field of Fire. Dragons wouldn’t reach Westeros. He couldn’t allow it.

Lord Tyrell’s report complained again about the bad quality of ironwood the Whitehills sent, but also stated the new fleet would be ready very soon. Probably as soon as the siege of Storm’s End would be over. Kevan had the idea to keep Mace Tyrell only as an advisor while naming Lord Paxter Redwyne Master of Ships. Lord Tyrell would have no way to complain since he kept his seat on the small council and was being replaced by one of his own bannermen. But for that, Kevan would wait for the siege of Dragonstone to be over.

Finally Kevan went to the Grand Maester’s rooms and gave him the messages to send. The one for Prince Doran was sent along with Princess Myrcella’s medallion wrapped around one of the raven’s legs. He also sent a raven to Tyrion, ordering him on the king’s order to send reinforcements to Riverrun. Then Kevan went to the king’s apartments. He needed Tommen to sign some official documents. The king liked to stamp them.

When Kevan came into the king’s rooms, he found him speaking and laughing with the queen. Kevan bowed before each of them. “Your Grace. Your Grace.”

“Ser Kevan. What a pleasure to see you.” Queen Margaery got up from her chair to welcome him. “You look tired. May I offer you some wine?”

“No, thank you, your Grace. I’m afraid my day of work is not over yet.” Kevan turned to the son of his niece… and of his nephew too. “Your Grace, I have a few decrees to make you sign.”

“Of course, Uncle.”

Tommen left the table where he had been eating some fruits in his wife’s company to sit at his desk. The boy didn’t complain about working, which was good. He would need this compliance and disposition to work hard as the years would go by. Tommen signed the documents one by one, taking great pleasure in stamping them at the end. It seemed to be the part of his work as king he loved the most. The queen stood away, caressing one of Tommen’s cat absentely while she looked outside the window. While the king was stamping the last decree, Kevan noticed a letter with the royal seal and the name of Lord Leyton Hightower on it.

“What is this?” Kevan asked. The king lifted his eyes from the decree he just stamped and looked at Kevan. After a moment, he saw what Kevan was looking at on the desk.

“Oh, I almost forgot. Thank you, Uncle.” He took the letter and went to his wife. “Margaery, it’s done. This is the decree you asked me for.”

Margaery Tyrell smiled sweetly at her king and took the piece of paper he was handing to her. “Thank you, my love. You’re so gallant.”

Even if Tommen’s back was turned on him, Kevan could see the king was reddening. He really took a liking for his wife, just like Tyrion took one for his own. At least, unlike Jaime, they fell in love with the woman they wed. However, Kevan was intrigued by this decree. It was the queen who asked Tommen for this. The Hightowers were among the most important bannermen of House Tyrell. What did she ask for them?

“My love,” the queen said before the king could answer. “Could we go and take a walk in the gardens? Just you and me?”

Tommen seemed to consider for a moment, then agreed with a nod. But before he and the queen could go through the doors, Kevan stopped them. “Your Grace, House Hightower is among the most powerful houses in the Seven Kingdoms. As Hand of the King, it is my duty to ensure we keep good relationships with the other houses, especially the powerful ones. And for that, I must know everything I can about your decisions concerning them.”

Tommen stopped in his walk to the doors. The queen seemed impatient to go, and Kevan thought he knew why. “Come, my love. Politics can wait a little.”

Tommen hesitated a moment, his gaze switching from Kevan to Margaery Tyrell. Finally, he settled his eyes on his wife. “Excuse me, Margaery. But Ser Kevan is right. My duties come before pleasures.”

Margaery looked disappointed, perhaps even frustrated for a spark of time, but she smiled sweetly to Tommen in the end. “Of course, you’re right. Tell him. Then we can go for our walk.”

Tommen smiled at his wife, happy. He then turned to Kevan who finally got an answer. “I should have told you before, ser, you’re right. But it’s nothing very important or of concern. I just gave my consent to a marriage between a friend of the queen and Ser Gerold Hightower.”

That caused quite a surprise to Kevan. “Ser Gerold Hightower died twenty years ago during your father’s war, your Grace.”
“Oh no, this is not the same Gerold Hightower. He is the third son of Ser Baelor Hightower, Lord Leyton’s heir. He was named after Lord Leyton’s uncle,” the queen explained. That made more sense.

“Well, in this case, I’m very happy for your friend, my queen. Who’s this blessed lady?”

It was Tommen who answered. “It’s Mira. I mean, Lady Mira Forrester. Margaery thought it was time for her to marry.”

Kevan looked at the queen. She shrugged her shoulders. “Mira will make a very good wife for Lord Leyton’s grandson.” She hid very well her discomfort, but Kevan could catch a glimpse of it. She didn’t want him to discover it. Kevan smiled lightly at his grandnephew and his wife.

“You’ll give my congratulations to your handmaiden from me, your Grace. I wish you a good evening.” Kevan took the decrees Tommen just signed. “Your Grace. Your Grace.” He left after a final bow for each of them.

Kevan brought back the decrees to the Tower of the Hand, then went to visit Pycelle. When he entered the rooms of the Grand Maester, he found a young woman taking out her clothes. She quickly put them back on her when she realized Kevan was behind her.

“Leave.” The girl obeyed the order immediately. Kevan stared at the Grand Maester who wore a tunic for the night. It seemed he didn’t expect the Hand of the King at this hour. The sun was lowering at the horizon and night was about to fall. Tommen and his queen would take a nocturnal walk if they ever took one.

“My lord Hand… I’m very sorry. Usually, you don’t come that late.”

“After what happened to the High Septon earlier today, I thought you would be wise enough to keep a low profile on this kind of things for some time. Especially after you were revealed to frequent this type of girls during my nephew’s trial.”

“This…This…This was a horrible lie…”

“I won’t hear anything else about this, Pycelle. I know what was revealed about you was true. I want you to explain how it comes you didn’t inform me about the ravens the queen sent to Oldtown.”

“I… The queen sent no raven to Oldtown.”

Kevan got closer to the Grand Maester. “My nephew sent you to the black cells because you betrayed him, Pycelle. My brother would have been much less merciful in his stead, and he let you keep your charge as Grand Maester because you were loyal to him. And I let you at your office for the same reason. So whether you tell me the truth, or I ask the Citadel to choose another Grand Maester because you disappeared in unknown circumstances.”

Fear was obvious in the old man. Kevan had no time to lose with him. “I really don’t know, my lord Hand. She… The queen probably gave the message to the other maester who assists me now, Vallis. He’s from the Reach. Sometimes he takes care of ravens in my stead.”

“And you saw nothing of an answer from Lord Hightower to the queen? Not at all?”

“No, I swear. I must admit… I let Vallis take care of the ravens most of the time to focus on other more important duties.”

“Like receiving common whores? Let me be clear with you, Pycelle. I want you to tell me about the contents of ravens the queen is sending and receiving, and I want you to perform your duties as Grand Maester. If you don’t, I’ll have you replaced and use the excuse you failed to uphold your vows of celibacy and to serve the Crown. Is that clear?"

“Yes… Yes. I swear I’ll serve you faithfully,” the old man stammered.

“Then start now, and try to not get caught by these Sparrows. Send this girl away.”

Kevan left the room and went back to the Tower of the Hand. Things weren’t going well. The queen married the key to Ironrath to a son of the heir to Hightower. That would cause problems. A marriage between Mira Forrester and Torrhen Whitehill would have put an end to the conflict between the Whitehills and the Forresters forever, but now, this marriage of Lady Mira to a Hightower could start a war later. The Hightowers were a powerful and rich house with strong military forces who could claim Ironrath in the name of Mira Forrester. And that’s what they would do. They wouldn’t give up a chance to control the ironwood, and to give an important castle to a third born son.

Kevan shouldn’t have warned Lady Mira about this. It had been obvious when he told her about a marriage prospect with Lord Whitehill’s son that she didn’t want it. He told her out of respect for her, but it seemed it was a mistake. The young woman surely went to the queen and asked her to organize another wedding for her. Kevan made a mistake. A mistake Tywin would never have done. House Lannister needed him more than ever, and he wasn’t here. Kevan couldn’t rely on his brother like he did in the past. He was alone.

Kevan thought how House Lannister seemed to crumble despite Tywin’s efforts to make them powerful. Kevan lost Lancel to the Faith, and Martyn and Willem to the war. Genna lost a son as well, and Tygett’s only son, Tyrek, still couldn’t be found and was most likely dead. Cersei was shamed before all King’s Landing, her eldest son poisoned, and Jaime never became the heir Tywin wanted. Worse, the two twins Tywin had, the two children he was so proud of when they were born, committed incest. And now Tommen was going under the Tyrells’ influence. When Kevan would die, the Tyrells would rule the Seven Kingdoms through Margaery’s influence on the king. Almost all Tywin’s legacy for now was a lie and failing. Everything he built seemed to be destroyed.

The only part of Tywin’s heritage that wasn’t destroyed yet was his second son. How strange it was. Tywin never wanted Tyron to have any part in House Lannister, and yet Tyron proved to be the only one of Tywin’s children worthy to be his child and heir. From what he knew, Tyron was ruling the Westerlands very well and his wife, the Lady Sansa, was quite well accepted in the west. However, Kevan feared Tyron might be falling under the influence of his wife just like Tommen. It was obvious Tyron loved her. Kevan feared she had an influence on his nephew and lord that might bring Tyron to make things following his wife’s interests instead of House Lannister’s interests. And for now, they still had no child. Genna told him in a recent message that their marriage was still unconsummated. If Tyron remained without children, then House Lannister could disappear, and they would never get any hold on the North.

Kevan wished Tyron had accepted the offer of Lady Olenna Tyrell to marry Lady Margaery. It had happened not long after Ser Meryn Trant was arrested. Kevan had invited Lady Olenna in his solar to apologize for the troubles that followed Joffrey’s death. But quickly, the Queen of Thorns had engaged them in the matters why they met.

“No need to apologize, ser. The king died, and it was quite normal for you to suspect my granddaughter since she was the only one present when he died. But enough of courtesies. They’re useless. So, I guess you want to offer us a marriage between Margaery and the new king.”

The woman was straight like always. “We’ll need a period of mourning, but I think a few months should be enough before we unite your granddaughter and my grandnephew.”

“I agree. But perhaps we don’t have to wait so long to marry our rose.”

Kevan had been puzzled by this. “Could you explain yourself, my lady?”

Lady Olenna had put aside her cup of wine. “I didn’t trust your brother, Ser Kevan. I didn’t particularly like him. But I respected him. He was no fool. He understood that sometimes we must work with our rivals rather than destroy them. We are rivals, Ser Kevan. You are no fool, just like your brother, so don’t try to deny it. But right now we have every reason to work together. And we have every reason to maintain our alliance. But I think this alliance could take a shape of much more interest for us.”

Kevan had peered at the Queen of Thorns, trying to decipher her intentions. “What do you suggest, Lady Olenna?”

“I suggest we join our houses in another way than through Margaery and Tommen. A crown doesn’t give much power. It probably doesn’t give any power at all. So, I suggest another arrangement to make our alliance last.”

“You’re known for being straight, Lady Olenna. I didn’t expect you to turn around like this.”

The Queen of Thorns had smiled at this. “You’re right. I’m forgetting myself. Very well, I propose that our rose marry Lord Tyrion and becomes the Lady of Casterly Rock.” Kevan had barely managed to contain his surprise. It was the last thing he expected. “His marriage with Sansa Stark, we all know she is a Stark and not a Lannister, is still un consummated. Everyone knows it. You only need to ask the High Septon to grant an annulment and to wed your nephew to my granddaughter soon after. The wedding can take place in the capital, or in Casterly Rock, or even in Higharden if you want, though I doubt that is your wish. House Lannister and House Tyrell will be linked through a very strong marriage that will prevent any conflict between us, and we’ll be able to control the Seven Kingdoms together. Margaery will give children named Lannister to your lord. She won’t refuse to do her duty as wife like the Stark girl. And if Loras was to never have children, the Imp’s children will have a claim on Highgarden.”

Kevan was quite skeptical about all this. “Why would you give up the chance to have Lady Margaery as Queen of Westeros?”

“Because Margaery will wield much more power with the Lord of Casterly Rock that with Tommen. The king is only a boy when Lord Tyrion is a man. I think Margaery would like much more a man of experience in her bed.”

Kevan had pursed his lips, trying to decide what to do. He finally gave a safe answer. “We’ll think about it. I’ll talk with my lord about this proposal.”

“Good. I’m sure he will prefer a rose to a wolf to share his bed.”

Lady Olenna had left the solar and Kevan had remained in his thoughts for a very long time after she left. This proposal was very strange. The Tyrells were ready to give up a Tyrell queen for a Tyrell Lady of the Rock. Why? Because Lady Margaery would have more power with a marriage to Tyrion? Or for something else? Were they hoping to get Sansa Stark as a bride for their heir, Ser Loras? In this case, they couldn’t hope for this. She was the key to the North. Kevan could organize her marriage with a member of House Lannister or a Lannister bannerman, like Ser Addam Marbrand. She would be the king’s ward, so the Tyrells wouldn’t be able to ask for her hand if her marriage with Tyrion was annulled. Still, the proposition was very intriguing.
But Kevan had thought it was a good offer all the same. They didn’t know what game the Tyrells were playing with that, but Margaery Tyrell would make a much better match for Tyrion than Sansa Stark. Their alliance with House Tyrell would be much stronger this way, and their rivals would lose their influence on Tommen. Kevan wished Tyrion had accepted the offer. But his nephew refused, for the same reason Tywin would have refused to cast aside Joanna, or Kevan would have refused to set aside Dorna.

Kevan had to admit he wasn’t unhappy of Tyrion’s decision. Not entirely. Lady Sansa proved to be quite capable as Lady of Casterly Rock, and she made Tyrion happy. Though Kevan thought Tyrion would have been more careful with the Rose of Highgarden than with the sister of the Young Wolf. Tyrion loved his wife, while he would have been able to keep more rational thoughts with Lady Margaery. He would have known she couldn’t be entirely trusted, which wasn’t the case with Lady Sansa.

To see Tyrion and his wife together always brought back to Kevan the memory of his brother and his wife. Tywin had loved Joanna more than anything. He had been heartbroken when she had died. But through the marriage Tyrion had with the Lady Sansa, Kevan saw this love again. Tyrion respected and loved his wife the same way Tywin loved Joanna. And Sansa Stark wasn’t without common points with Kevan’s sister-in-law. This could be dangerous. Kevan had tried to make understand to Lady Sansa that they had everything to gain from working together as allies, but Kevan doubted she would really consider the Lannisters as full allies. After all, they murdered her family. That wasn’t something you could erase with apologies and words. Kevan was afraid the young lady may try to bring down House Lannister one day. He still thought that for family, Tyrion would have been better to disavow Lady Sansa and marry Lady Margaery. But Kevan knew very well that as soon that a Lannister loved a woman, there was nothing to do. He would do anything for the woman he loved, no matter the consequences, even if it could bring his family down forever. It had been true for Kevan’s father, for his three brothers, and now sadly it was true for Tyrion as well, and even more sadly for Jaime too.

Anyway, there was nothing Kevan could do for Tyrion now. He was his lord, and it was Kevan’s duty to serve him, just like he served Tywin before. Lady Sansa seemed to appreciate Tyrion, and to appreciate him a lot, when they left King’s Landing for Casterly Rock. Their marriage would probably be consummated very soon, and Tyrion would have children to hold both the Westerlands and the North. As for Mira Forrester, there was nothing Kevan could do about it. Tommen signed a decree to arrange this marriage, and Kevan couldn’t risk to change Tommen’s mind on the matter. To cancel the betrothal after it was just concluded would have terrible consequences for the relations between the Crown and House Hightower. Anyway, Kevan couldn’t oppose any marriage prospect against this. He had received Lord Whitehill’s answer not long ago, and Lady Mira’s words had proved to be true. He will probably refuse to organize such a marriage. He will want to destroy my house to the roots and will never accept a Forrester in his family. Lord Whitehill responded to the offer to marry his son to Lady Mira as if it was an insult. After a Forrester tried to kill him, that wasn’t such a surprise after all. Ludd Whitehill seemed to be a man who followed his hatred more than his reason. He really wanted to destroy House Forrester forever, and to let no trace of it behind. In this sense, the marriage between Mira Forrester and Gerold Hightower could allow a real Forrester to eventually take back Ironrath and resume ironwood’s harvesting of good quality. Only Kevan wished he had married the young woman to a Lannister bannerman instead of a Tyrell one.

Kevan took a quick supper this evening. He wasn’t very hungry. He went back to his work as Hand of the King and got to bed only very late in the night, just like every other night.

Chapter End Notes
To resume, the Sparrows have come, the Lannisters and the Tyrells fight for influence over Tommen, Myrcella is in danger, and Kevan tries to do what he believes Tywin would do if he was alive. And Mira is betrothed to a Hightower. With Cersei away, it can't be worse than in the show.

Please review

Next chapter: new POV (at Winterfell)

Also, "A Rose and a Lion" will be updated in a few days, at the same time than "A Shadow and a Wolf". Prepare to discover who is the rose.
Okay, that may surprise as a choice for a POV. Roose Bolton is not the first person we think of when time comes to choose whose mind we will enter. But I needed to show what was happening at Winterfell, and since Roose Bolton is the one ruling it, it seemed like the best choice to have an overall view of the situation in the North. Theon could have been chosen, but he won't have a very great role to play in this story and he doesn't see enough how the political affairs of the North are faring. And his thoughts would have been very dark and desperate. And it was out of a question that I would write from Ramsay or Myranda point of view. I don't want to imagine what's going on in their heads.

Roose Bolton is somewhat a northern version of Tywin Lannister. I think his coldness and his rational thinking make it more bearable to read from his perspective.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

“Bear Island knows only one Warden of the North and Lord of Winterfell, and his name is Stark.”

The message was written by the exercised hand of a maester, but it was dictated by a girl of ten. Lyanna Mormont, Lady of Bear Island. Such were the kind of answers the new Warden of the North received most of the time when he asked the other houses of the North to pledge their fealty to him as their new liege lord. There were answers bitter than the one from Bear Island.

“Boltons are turncloaks and traitors. True Northerners will never kneel before you scum.”

Jon Humber, called the Greatjon, Lord of the Last Hearth, had been the staunchest supporter of Robb Stark when he was alive, and still supported him after his death. His reply was quite clear about it. Lord Bolton couldn’t do much about it. He knew very well the difficulties ahead of him once Tywin Lannister named him Warden of the North. The Lord of Casterly Rock gave him the North, but the Lord of the Dreadfort had to keep it on his own. The Lannisters wouldn’t send him any help.

They arrived at Winterfell about two months ago. Things hadn’t been easy from the start. The castle was in ruins thanks to Ramsay. He should have taken it and kept it in good state instead of burning it, and now Roose Bolton had to rebuild it. The works advanced well, but it was work they could have avoided, especially with the hostility of the other lords. The only houses who really supported House Bolton as Wardens of the North were the Dustins, the Ryswells and the Karstarks. The other houses opposed them, or refused to obey and to pay their taxes. That’s why he had sent Ramsay to Castle Cerwyn three weeks ago to collect taxes they refused to pay. They occupied a strategic position on the Kingsroad and House Bolton couldn’t afford to let them rebel.

Maester Wolkan entered at this moment. Of all people here at Winterfell, he was the only one who could enter Roose Bolton’s solar or rooms without asking. Even Ramsay, especially Ramsay, couldn’t enter his rooms without asking first. “Lord Bolton.”

“What do you have to say?” Roose continued to write as he asked the question. That was a very important letter for House Glover that his army was helping freeing Deepwood Motte from the Ironmen.

“Your son is back.”

Roose Bolton continued to write, not leaving his eyes from the sheet a single second. “Thank you. You’re dismissed, Wolkan.”

“Yes, my lord.”

The maester left with no other word. It was useless to say anything more. The Warden of the North finished the letter, then left his solar and went into the courtyard. Reparations were going at the expected they expected. Soon Winterfell would be fully fit to live in again and fit to defend. Ramsay was dismounting, a wide and sadistic smile across his face like always. His father knew what it meant. There was a cart with three skinned bodies in it. Soon they would be hung before the portcullis to show what House Bolton did to those who opposed them. Perhaps that would do some good, though Roose Bolton doubted the usefulness of doing it repeatedly.

Ramsay walked in his direction, still a mad smile on his face. “Father.”

Roose didn’t show any emotion before his son’s return. Wherever he went, his madness often unleashed useless terror. “You must be weary after such a long travel. Come in the Great Hall. We need to talk.”

“Thank you, Father. Reek!” What had been Theon Greyjoy arrived before them within a few seconds. “Kill a chicken, and bring it to me. Quickly.”

“Yes, my lord.” Reek left, his stench persisting in the air where he was a moment ago.

Roose went to the Great Hall while his son went to get rid of his travel clothing, and probably to see if his dogs were well fed in his absence. His creature would probably lose another part if he found out he didn’t take care well enough of his beasts. Ramsay entered the Hall a few minutes later, as Reek was bringing plates of food, including the chicken he just killed. Roose sat at the head of the grand table, eating nothing of what was before him, while Ramsay started to devour the plates before him.

“Who were the bodies inside that cart?”

“Lord Cerwyn, his wife and his brother,” his son answered.

“I hope you have a good explanation for this. We don’t kill lords and ladies without good reasons. We can’t hold the North with terror alone.”

“You can’t hold the North if you let these lesser lords insult us.”

“I sent you there to collect taxes, not bodies.” Roose Bolton waited for an explanation. Ramsay kept eating while he talked.

“Lord Cerwyn refused to pay. Said the Warden of the North would always be a Stark and he’d be damned if he kiss a traitor’s boot.”

Rose took a gulp of wine. “He left you no choice.” It was a statement, not a question.
“I flayed him living along with his wife and brother. Made his son watch.”

“And?”

“The new Lord Cerwyn paid his taxes.”

At least something would come out of it. Ramsay skinned people for pleasure, but this time it would have some use. Though not enough use. Roose Bolton looked at his son, eating as if nothing was amiss. That wasn’t the son he needed, but it was the only one he had. He lost all the others in the cradle or to Ramsay. House Bolton would probably not survive Ramsay if he was allowed to act freely. For now, all they had were taxes and not enough to keep their hold on the North.

“I’ve something important to tell you.” Ramsay didn’t lift his attention from the food before him. “Stop eating and listen.”

Roose kept a calm voice, but put enough threat and firmness in it. His son looked at him and slowly put his fork and knife on the table, folding his hands before him just like Roose did. Perhaps there was indeed some of him in this son. Sometimes he doubted it.

“We don’t have enough men to hold the North if the other houses rise up against us. Do you understand that?”

“Our pact with the Lannisters protects…”

Roose didn’t allow his son to finish. “I had a pact with Tywin Lannister. And Tywin Lannister is dead. The remaining Lannisters are a thousand miles away dealing with that fact. They’ve never once in the history of the Seven Kingdoms sent their army this far north. If you think they will for us, you’re a fool. If they ever are to send their army in the North, it will be to take back Winterfell from us and to claim the North for themselves.”

“Then the North will fight alongside us. The other houses will never allow the Lannisters to take the North.” His son said it with a pout.

“If you believe so, then you’re a fool as well. The Imp rules Casterly Rock and he’s married to the last known surviving daughter of Eddard Stark. As soon as he gets a son from Sansa Stark, he can march on the North and claim the entire kingdom for his son. Who do you think the northern houses will fight for? The people who murdered their king, or the grandson of Eddard Stark?”

Roose’s son looked at him, still uninterested. “Let’s show them what happens when they fight against us. I can repeat what I did at Cerwyn everywhere.”

Roose would have sighed at his son’s stupidity. Ramsay only understood cruelty, but he saw it as a way to play, not to maintain the other houses in line. “Do you know how many men we have?”

“No.”

“Five thousand. With the allies we’re sure of, that’s the number of soldiers we can deploy in battle. The Lannisters can muster much more men. And if the Imp was to promise the other lords our heads all the while threatening them, the other houses will fight for them. Tywin Lannister may have been the mind behind the Red Wedding, but he wasn’t the one to stab Robb Stark in the heart. I was.”

“You fear a noseless dwarf, father?”

“Yes, I fear him.” Roose let no sign of fear piercing his voice, but he feared the Lannisters for real. “Fear is what keeps a man alive in this world of treachery and deceit. If the Imp decided to take the North right now, we would be doomed. What would you do if Tyrion Lannister was to march on the North tomorrow?"

“I would be waiting for him with our men and my dogs, and I would let them feast on him after I flawed him. And then I would hunt his wife.”

“Do you think your dogs will be able to defeat an army of ten thousand men? He will most likely kill them, then chop our heads from our bodies and let them rot on spikes at the top of the Dreadfort’s gates for years.” Ramsay was about to reply to this, but Roose didn’t let him. His son only understood cruelty because he took joy from it, and only from it. Cruelty could be useful, but came a time when it was useless. “We need to inspire loyalty among the northern houses and to reinforce our own house. We’ve become a great house by entering into alliances with other houses and parlaying those alliances into greater power. The best way to forge a lasting alliance isn’t by peeling a man’s skin off. The best way is marriage.” The Warden of the North rose from his seat. “Now that you’re a Bolton by royal decree, it’s high time you married a suitable bride. And as it happens, I’ve found the perfect girl to solidify our hold on the North.”

Ramsay had his mouth wide open when his father looked back at him. “Which girl?”

“Arya Stark. Daughter of Eddard Stark.”

Ramsay frowned, something that happened quite rarely. “Arya Stark is dead.”

“It seems she’s not. Officially she’s still dead, and for now she must remain dead for the people outside the North, but in truth it appears she still lives. She’s riding for Winterfell at this very moment and will arrive in a few weeks. You will wed her, you will share her bed, and put a son in her. More than one son, hopefully. This way, you’ll have an heir whose grandfather will be Eddard Stark, the last Warden of the North of House Stark. Our hold on the North will be quite strengthened by this.”

Ramsay was looking at him stupidly, Roose had no difficulty to see it. “In this case, I only have to fuck her and that will be enough.”

“It must be a marriage,” Roose corrected on a calm firm tone. “Or else her children will be bastards, just like you were before. You will marry Arya Stark not long after she arrives and have legitimate children with her, and ensure House Bolton remains powerful much more than by skinning lesser lords.” Roose looked at the plates before his son. “I think you had your share. Now go.”

Ramsay stood up. “Come, Reek.”

“This creature stays with me.” Roose took back his place.

“Stay with you? Why? He’s mine. You cannot have him.”

Roose nearly smiled at this. Only nearly. “All you have I gave you, even your name. You would do well to remember that, bastard. As for this… Reek… if you have not ruined him beyond redemption, he may yet be of some use to us.”

After a long time when his son looked at him like a mad child, something he was, Ramsay left. “Take him. He’s not even a man. The way he smells disgusts me.”

_You’re not far to disgust me you too, bastard._ Roose turned his attention to what once was Theon Greyjoy. Ramsay’s pet was staring at the floor, his back bent, shaking.

“Look at me,” Roose ordered him with a sweet and calm voice. The creature didn’t react. “I don’t like my orders to be disobeyed, or ignored. You already went through terrible sufferings by my son’s hand. So look at me if you don’t want it to get worse.”

Slowly, hesitantly, his son’s pet looked at him, afraid. Roose waved his hand to the chair Ramsay just left. “Sit.” The eyes wandered to the seat. The head shook violently.

“I prefer to stand.”

“I just told you I don’t like to be disobeyed. Sit.”

Reluctantly, Reek walked in a very odd way to the chair and sat. He seemed unable to find a good posture when he sat. Ramsay played his game with the heir of the Iron Islands, and the result sat at Roose’s left now.

“Eat.” What may have been a man once shook his head compulsively again. The food before him was the one Ramsay left. “I commanded you to eat. I didn’t offer. Eat.”

With clumsy hands, the creature took a fork and started to pick some food with it. He didn’t touch the knife. Roose thought he had an idea why. Reek ate very slowly, looking repeatedly at the doors of the Hall, surely fearing Ramsay may enter any time and punish him for eating from his plates.

“Your stench is quite appalling.” The remark made Reek stop to eat.

“Yes, my lord. I beg your pardon, my lord.”

“Why? The way you smell is my son’s doing, not your own. I am well aware of that. I knew the first Reek. He stank, though not for want of washing. I have never known a cleaner creature, truth be told. He bathed thrice a day and wore flowers in his hair as if he were a maiden. Once, when my second wife was still alive, he was caught stealing scent from her bedchamber. I had him whipped for that, a dozen lashes. Even his blood smelled wrong. When Ramsay’s mother, the miller’s wife, came before my gate with a baby, pretending he was mine, I sent her away and wanted to throw the baby into the river. But then I looked at him, and saw he was my son. A few years later I gave her Reek so Ramsay could have a servant. It was meant to be amusing, but he and Ramsay became inseparable. I do wonder though… Was it Ramsay who corrupted Reek, or Reek Ramsay?”

The new Reek didn’t answer. Not that Roose really expected him to answer. That was a question he would probably never get an answer for, and an answer wouldn’t really make any difference.

“Ramsay has very particular tastes. There are times he makes me wonder if he is truly my seed. My forebears were many things, but never fools. Ramsay’s amusements are his own. I won’t chide him on that count, but he must be more discreet. A peaceful land, a quiet people, that has always been my rule.”

“A fine rule, my lord.” Finally the creature said something. Perhaps Ramsay left something human in him.

“Do you really think Ramsay can rule the North?” Roose asked after a moment. What was left of the man took time to answer, stopping again to eat.

“He fights for you, my lord. He’s strong.”

“Bulls and bears are strong. I have seen my bastard fight. He is not entirely to blame. The first Reek was his tutor, and Reek was never trained at arms. Ramsay is ferocious, I will grant you, but he swings that sword like a butcher hacking meat.”

“He’s not afraid of anyone, my lord.”
“He should be. Fear of death is what can keep us alive in this world, like I just told him. Even here at Winterfell, the smallfolk want us dead. He should fear them as well.” A moment passed before Roose Bolton asked another question to the second Reek. “You were at Winterfell when the royal party visited it, weren’t you?” His interlocutor nodded. “You saw the Imp. Tyrion Lannister. What can you tell me of him?”

The more information Roose would have on Tyrion Lannister the better. Theon Greyjoy may have known some things about him from his stay at Winterfell, and with some luck Reek would remember what Theon Greyjoy knew.

“He spent most of his time with whores in the winter town, or drinking wine, or reading.”

“That’s all?”

The creature gulped heavily, and many seconds passed before everything went out. “Theon Greyjoy spoke with him when he came from the Wall, right before he left Winterfell for the last time. He gave a special saddle to Bran Stark, the cripple boy, so he may ride again. Even if he wasn’t pleased by the cold welcome Robb Stark gave him. Robb Stark believed the Lannisters had tried to get his brother killed by an assassin. Theon Greyjoy spoke to the Imp before he left for the brothel in the winter town. He went to spend time with Ros. She was a girl with red hair Theon Greyjoy appreciated very much. The Imp mocked Theon for being the servant of the Starks because his father rebelled against them. He said his loyalty to his captors was touching. He mocked the attempt of the Ironmen to rebel against the Crown, saying it was a stupid rebellion. He said…”

“He said he was himself a constant disappointment for his own father and had learned to live with it. I think… I think he tried to be kind with Theon. That perhaps he understood the way he was torn between his loyalty to the Starks and to his family.”

Roose remained silent for a moment, peering the young man his son destroyed who sat near to him, a hollow look on his face. He could still remember who he had been, though he didn’t want to be that man again, for fear of what Ramsay may do to him. But what he told about the Imp was interesting. The Imp had fought at King’s Landing against Stannis Baratheon, and even though Tywin Lannister was credited for the victory, the Imp may have had a role to play in that victory. He was intelligent enough to know the Greyjoy rebellion had been foolish, just like the actual one was, and to realize how Theon Greyjoy had been torn apart between two loyalties. And the Imp read a lot. That was indeed quite interesting. Someone who read very much couldn’t be taken for a fool. Roose would have to be careful with the new Lord of Casterly Rock. The love for books brought back to Roose some memories.

“I had another son once. Perhaps Ramsay mentioned him to you. Did he?”

Shaking after everything he said, the creature nodded. “Domeric.”

“Domeric. A quiet boy, but most accomplished. He served four years as Lady Dustin’s page, and three in the Vale as a squire to Lord Redfort. He played the high harp, read histories, and rode like the wind. The boy was mad for horses, Lady Dustin would tell you. Not even Lord Rickard’s daughter could outrace him, and that one was half a horse herself. Redfort said he showed great promise in the list. A great jouster must be a great horseman first. He would have made a perfect Lord of the Dreafort one day. He would have followed my rule. But Ramsay killed him. A sickness in the bowels, Maester Wolkan says, but I say poison. In the Vale, Domeric had enjoyed the company of Redfort’s sons. He wanted a brother by his side, so he began to spend time with Ramsay. I forbade it, but Domeric was a man grown and thought that he knew better than his father.
Now his bones lie beneath the Dreadfort with the bones of his brothers, who died still in the cradle, and I am left with Ramsay. Tell me… If the kinslayer is accursed, what is a father to do when one son slays another?"

The second Reek didn’t seem able to answer. Roose himself had no answer to this. It was probably time now to find if there was really some of Theon Greyjoy left in it.

“That must have been difficult for you to live most of your life with the Starks. I remember you when you were still a boy. I saw you when your father was forced to hand you to Eddard Stark. The Imp was right saying your rebellion was stupid. Both your rebellions were and are stupid. You cannot hope to win against the Seven Kingdoms united. We must adapt to our situation if we want to survive, something your people don’t seem to understand. That’s what I did when I stabbed Robb Stark in the heart. I was never really ambitious enough to wish to become the Warden of the North, but when it became obvious that the war was lost for us against the Lannisters, I decided to make sure my house would survive, and the best way for that was to do Tywin Lannister’s will. I regret the Young Wolf didn’t listen to my advice. We wouldn’t be there then. The most I hoped not long ago was to marry my son to the Lady Sansa. First I hoped Domeric would marry her, then Ramsay once Domeric was gone. But now it’s impossible. And here we are, in a difficult position, with enemies everywhere, something Ramsay ignores or doesn’t care about. In both cases this is dangerous. But I have no choice. I did it. If Robb Stark had listened to my advices, perhaps we wouldn’t be there.”

What had been Theon Greyjoy didn’t react to his words and continued to stare blankly before him. Roose continued. “It must have been difficult for you. To choose between Robb Stark and your true family. You were loyal to him, I saw it. Did you choose to turn against him in order to survive? Or did you do it for your family?”

After a moment, an answer came, very low. “For my pride. I wanted to show my father and my sister I was a true Ironborn. I wanted to prove I could make great things. I wanted to prove I was a Greyjoy, and to hold Winterfell.”

“Then you were a fool,” Roose stated. For the first time, the man turned his head abruptly toward him. “You had no hope to hold Winterfell. You took unnecessary and foolish risks. You could have just pillaged the coasts, but you tried to be more than you could be. And you betrayed a man you grew up with. A man you considered like your brother. How do you feel about it?”

Roose thought he saw some anger for a very short moment in the man’s eyes, but then there was only regret. He was shaking again. “I deserve what happened to me. I betrayed Robb. I killed Ser Rodrik. I burned those boys. I took Winterfell. I deserve everything that happened to me.”

Roose nodded slowly. “There is still some of Theon Greyjoy left in you.”

“My name is Reek. I am Reek, it rhymes with freak.”

“Yes, that’s what Ramsay wants you to say, and you do well in saying it, or else he would cut from you more than what he already cut. But that doesn’t change the truth. There is still some part of you that is Theon Greyjoy, and that’s what we need. Arya Stark is coming here to marry Ramsay. Her brothers are either dead or will be dead soon, except Jon Snow who’s a member of the Night’s Watch, and I don’t want him here when his sister will wed my son. He would probably try to kill me, or Ramsay. You’re the closest thing to a man she has for a family. You will give her to my son during the wedding ceremony, and act as Theon Greyjoy during this time, just like you did at Moat Cailin. You can do that?”

Another long moment passed. “Yes, my lord.”
“Good. Now leave. Go and do what you can, or what my bastard wants.”

What was in part Theon Greyjoy and in part Reek left the room immediately, obviously afraid. Roose finished his frugal meal without really tasting the food. Then he left it there for the servants to take care of the left-overs his son and his creature left behind them. He went to one of the courtyards where he saw a line of carts with men bearing the sigil of a white hill and star over a blue field. The carts Ludd Whitehill’s men brought were filled with ironwood shields. Finally they brought what they were supposed to bring weeks ago. The Warden of the North walked in their direction. When Roose went to the men, they bowed their heads before him. Their captain stepped forward to meet him.

“Lord Bolton. The ironwood Lord Whitehill promised you.”

“Ironwood that should have arrived two months ago.”

The captain was scared, and he ought to be. “My lord, we had problems with the Forresters. It took us more time…”

“I don’t care about the problems you had. Show me the merchandise.”

The captain made a sign to his men who started to unload the content of the carts. Roose picked a shield. It was all cracked and roughly made, not at all like the ironwood weapons Robb Stark had for his army. Roose ordered a Whitehill man to hold the shield before him. He unsheathed his dagger and hit the shield with its point as hard as he could. The shield split in two and the dagger sank into the soldier’s heart. The man fell on the ground, still holding a half of the shield in each hand. Roose took back his dagger, washed it and put it back at his belt.

“I asked for ironwood weapons, not for useless ironwood. Bring back that scrap to Lord Whitehill and tell him to send me good work the next time, or else I’ll find someone else to work ironwood and to possess it.”

The other Whitehill men were staring at him in shock, but knew better than to argue. “Yes, my lord.” They all said it together while they took their companion’s body away.

Roose Bolton walked away to a room in the Great Keep. The room was locked and a guard was standing before it all the time. He unlocked the door and opened it when he saw his lord arriving. He closed the door behind him when Lord Bolton was inside with his guest.

The man before him wore many furs and was warming his hands over the fire in the hearth. This man had arrived two months ago clad in rich clothes. He had brown hair and green eyes, was thin of skin and of average height. He wasn’t used to cold. Where he had lived before in Lannisport, it was always much warmer than in the North. He was only the son of a rich merchant. Such was the man Tyrion Lannister sent here to represent his interests and the interests of his wife. Roose knew he wasn’t the only one. There were representatives of House Lannister in each great house, city and castle of the North now. They were watched everywhere.

“I guess you like these accommodations better than the previous ones,” Roose said after the door closed.

The young man left his chair near the hearth to face Roose Bolton. He was barely twenty. “You left me rot into a cell for a month.”

“I did. And you’re lucky I didn’t let Ramsay play with you.” The man shivered in fear. He knew what Ramsay was capable of. He had seen the skinned bodies. “These rooms have been yours for a few weeks now. They will be yours as long as you stay in Winterfell, which means for a very long time. Just like when you were in your cell, you’ll write reports to Lord Tyrion that I approve, and only write what I tell you to write. I will allow you to visit some parts of the castle at certain periods of the day. You’ll be a prisoner, but you’ll be well taken care of. I swear. In your interest, I would make sure to give me every reason to not make you suffer in case you would try to cause any trouble in any way.” The young man nodded in approval. “Now, I want you to write your monthly report to Lord Tyrion about what’s happening in Winterfell. Tell him the rebuilding is going well, that everything is quiet, and that you saw sometimes peeled bodies hanging from the gates. Bodies of people who refused to obey House Bolton. Tell him you don’t know their identity, that some people say they are noble people, others say they are just peasants, or Bolton soldiers. Nothing more, nothing less.”

The young man complied to the order and wrote the report. Roose read it once it was over.
Everything was fine. Lord Tyrion would hear rumors about skinned people through his other representatives, but this would cast doubts in his mind about who flawed people and which people were flawed. Roose left the room.

Since this representative arrived, they made sure he wouldn’t tell anything that could bring the Iron Throne to take the title of Wardens of the North from House Bolton. They already lost the title of Lord of Winterfell to the Lady of Casterly Rock. If House Bolton was to survive, they needed to remain the Wardens of the North. And for that, no one was to know Arya Stark would come to Winterfell, except the closest allies of House Bolton like the Ryswells and the Dustins. They would only reveal it to the rest of the North when time would be appropriate. Perhaps never.

Roose Bolton entered his solar and asked his squire, Elmar, to fetch a man he needed to speak with.
Elmar once was betrothed to Arya Stark, but it didn’t matter now. Walder Frey annulled the betrothal when Robb Stark broke his word by marrying a foreign woman. He should have kept her as a mistress and marry a Frey girl instead, but he chose to marry the foreigner, signing his defeat.

Torrhen Whitehill entered in the solar a few minutes later. He was a man at the end of the thirties, with blond hair and a weak beard along his chin. He had a threatening look usually, but in the presence of his liege lord, his face was more respectable.

“Lord Bolton.”

“Lord Torrhen. Please sit.” The heir of Highpoint sat before the Warden of the North. For now, he was serving his liege lord at Winterfell, but Roose had an idea to send him somewhere he could be more useful. “Your family doesn’t send me what I’m asking. I need ironwood weapons, not birch quality ironwood.”

“My house will give you what you need, my lord,” the man assured him.

“You should have given it to me a long time ago.”

“We had an important deal to honor with the Crown and House Forrester to deal with,” Torrhen Whitehill offered as an excuse.

“My son dealt with House Forrester when I sent him to Ironrath. You allowed the Forresters to rebel against you. You pushed them to rebel. We gave you half the ironwood forests, and you decided to seize all the forests instead. Your father sent a troublesome son who burned houses for pleasure to occupy Ironrath. That brought war between your family and the Forresters.”

“Your own son skins people alive, my lord.”
“This son is my heir. Your brother wasn’t.” Anger rose in the heir of Highpoint. Roose could see that. But the heir maintained his calm all the same.

“We lost all the craftsmen of the Forresters in the Battle of Ironrath, and our own workers in the forests are constantly attacked by outlaws.”

“Then it means your family fails not only to work and exploit ironwood, but also to maintain the peace in the North. In this case, Ironrath and its forests may be in better hands with another family.”

This was an indirect threat to strip the Whitehills form the ironwood they lusted for so long. If they couldn’t work it, then Roose Bolton would have no choice but to call someone else to do it.

“My lord,” Torrhen Whitehill said, “another family won’t be able to exploit ironwood any better. The Forresters were the ones who could work it, and no one else could.”

“Then perhaps your father should have kept some of them alive, instead of killing them all during the battle.”

“Not all of them. I can give you ironwood of good quality, my lord, but for that I’ll need your help. Otherwise you won’t ever get what you want. This no threat, my lord. Only a fact.”

Torrhen Whitehill was brave to speak this way to Roose. He knew what it meant. There was something Torrhen Whitehill could personally get from this. “Explain yourself.”

“Lord Gregor Forrester and his wife, Elissa Branfield, had six children together. Lord Gregor died at the Twins, and one of his sons died when… when Lord Ramsay visited Ironrath.”

“I’m well aware of that, just like your father who was present when it happened. No need to give me details.”

“His three other sons died during the short war between my family and House Forrester,” Torrhen Whitehill resumed. “Lady Elissa died as well during the battle, and their youngest daughter too. But there was a Forrester who wasn’t at Ironrath when my father’s army took it. The firstborn daughter of Lord Gregor. Lady Mira Forrester. She’s in King’s Landing right now, serving as a handmaiden for the queen. If you could persuade the king and his Hand to arrange a marriage between me and her, then we could bring back peace in the Forrester lands and start to craft ironwood of good quality.”

Roose thought about it for a moment. “You want me to ask the queen to give the hand of her handmaiden to you?”

“Aye, my lord. My father wouldn’t approve. He hates all Forresters, and wants them all dead, to the last child. But this marriage could give us all what we want.”

Roose Bolton nodded slightly after a moment. “Very well. I’ll send a raven to Kevan Lannister about this. Make sure the next provision of ironwood will be of better quality. You’re dismissed.”

They didn’t need to say anything else. Torrhen Whitehill left Lord Bolton’s solar. Kevan Lannister had been his brother’s advisor for a very long time. He would understand the advantage to marry this handmaiden to the heir of Highpoint. Lord Bolton called Elmar and told him to prepare the leeches. Thirty minutes later, after a few messages written and a visit to Maester Wolkan in the maester’s turret, the Warden of the North was lying in his chair with leeches all over his naked body.
Please review

Next chapter: Mira

The new chapter of "A Rose and a Lion" is released. Discover who the rose is.
I've been trying to go deeper into Mira's mind in this chapter. Mira and Sansa have many things in common the way I made this fic. Both think all their family is dead, their only relative they know to be probably still alive is at the Wall (we can consider Gared Tuttle is some sort of family for Mira and she doesn't know he disappeared north of the Wall), both are married/about to be married to someone from another family because of their claim on their family's seat, they come from the North and spent the last years in the south away from those they love. All this had an effect on their ways of thinking, and this is something I'm going to explore in the next chapters for both of them.

I hope you enjoy this chapter.
Sera sat on the bed, her eyes staring at the floor. “He was a good man. He wanted to marry me. It was my chance. My chance to be someone. To have a real life.” Mira sat at her friend’s side, laying her hand on hers. “I want to be happy for you Mira. Really, I want. But it’s just… I just find it so unfair. You’re getting married to a knight, the son of a great lord, and I’m stuck with a bastard name.”

Mira patted Sera’s hand. “You’ll find someone else. I’m sure.”

Sera shook her head. “No, I won’t. Not after I was suspected to poison the king. I have no great name, no castle, nothing to give to anyone. I don’t have any right on any land or place like you. I am a bastard. A Flowers. That’s what I’m going to be all my life.”

Sera started to sob. Mira guided the face of her friend to her own shoulder, wrapping her head with her arms. They remained in this position for some time. Mira knew she was more than sad. She had been overjoyed about her marriage with Garibald Tarwick. It had been an opportunity for her to not be Sera Flowers anymore, and it was taken from her by Joffrey’s death. Mira wanted to strangle Margaery’s grandmother for that. She was responsible for all this. She understood why she killed Joffrey, but still, she could have devised a plan that wouldn’t have involved Sera to be suspected. Like always, lower people where the ones to suffer from the game of thrones. Mira visited enough orphanages, hospices and shelters with her mistress to know the more lowborn you were, the more you suffered from the wars.

Sera’s sobs only stopped after a long moment and she stared at the floor again. Mira pressed a hand on her arm. “We should continue to prepare. We leave tomorrow in the morning. We must be ready.”

Sera nodded and they resumed their work. They were at the end of the afternoon. Sera’s bags were all ready in her chamber. Mira had a few things to arrange with Ser Kevan concerning the ironwood business before she left and it took most of the day. So now she prepared everything for tomorrow. She would leave King’s Landing and travel on the Roseroad to Oldtown. The queen allowed Sera to follow her and stay at Oldtown for a few months since Mira knew no one there. Mira was glad her friend would accompany her. She wished the queen could come as well, but she had to stay with the king in the capital. All her clothes were soon in the box. Only personal effects were left on the table. Sera looked at them and took a broach.

“The Rose of Highgarden,” she remarked. “I miss this place now.”

“Me too.” Mira remembered the happy time she spent walking, or sewing, or reading a book in the gardens of Highgarden so long ago. Everything looked so peaceful back then. “Queen Margaery wants me to wear it at Oldtown. It once belonged to Lady Olenna.” Sera looked back at her, perhaps with a hint of jealousy again, but she looked to regret it immediately. She put down the broach. Mira tried to explain. “I didn’t want this, Sera. I asked Margaery to arrange me a marriage only to escape another. I couldn’t marry a Whitehill. They murdered my family.” Mira took a golden coin near the broach and showed it to her friend. “Do you know what it is?”

Sera looked closely at it. “That’s not a golden dragon?”

“No. It’s a golden coin from Yunkai. My brother Asher sent it to me from Essos so I wouldn’t forget him. He came back to fight for my family when the Whitehills declared war upon us. And he died trying to protect our home.”

Mira looked directly in her friend’s eyes to make her understand why she really did this. She had no choice. Sera looked away at the table again. She touched something and Mira followed her hand.

“It’s ironwood?” Sera asked.

“Yes. My brother Ethan made it for me before I left Ironrath. He was only a boy back then. And he was killed by Ramsay Snow, a dagger piercing his throat.”

Mira knew Ramsay Snow had been legitimized and was now a Bolton, but she refused to call him a Bolton. He didn’t deserve a name. If someone deserved to be shamed by a bastard name, it was this man. She took all the things left on the table and put them in the huge box. The last thing she put was a leather package that contained the last letters her family sent to her. Their last words to me. Mira closed the box. They were done.

Mira went back to her bed and sat on it again. Sera didn’t leave. Mira looked at her, but as soon as she did, Sera averted her eyes again. Mira looked at the wall. She decided there was more to say. “You really think I’m eager to get married? I am to marry a man the queen assured me who was a good man, but I know nothing of him all the same. He may be marrying me only for my claim on Ironrath as far as I know. And once I’ll be married, I will become Mira Hightower. I won’t be a Forrester any longer. My family name will disappear forever. My family will become a page in history books, nothing more.”

Mira continued to stare at the wall right before her, waiting for her friend to react. Finally she spoke. “I’m sorry, Mira. I don’t know what it is to lose a family. They all seemed to be good people the way you speak of them. I wish I could do something.”

They stayed in an awkward silence for a very long time. None of them moved or looked at the other. “I’ll see you tomorrow.” Sera left on these words and silently closed the door behind her. Mira was alone in her nearly empty chamber. It wouldn’t be her chamber for very long. Tonight would her last night in King’s Landing before a very long time, if not forever.

Mira remembered when she asked the queen to organize her a wedding. She asked Margaery to find her a suitable husband to escape a marriage with Torrhen Whitehill, one from a family who could have the means to take back Ironrath someday. The queen had been very surprised by her request. But Mira explained to her what would happen if Ser Kevan managed to arrange the marriage he wanted and Mira convinced her mistress it was an opportunity to make the Reach stronger. After all, there were many second or third sons in great families who could be interested to own Ironrath through her one day, and the Tyrells could fortify their links with one of their bannermen as well as reinforce the power of a house of the Reach. So Margaery wrote to the Hightowers and managed to get a marriage for Mira with a grandson of Lord Leyton. Mira would leave tomorrow for Oldtown where she would meet and wed her betrothed. She preferred to give Ironrath to the Hightowers than to hand it to the Whitehills.

Mira looked through the window. The sun was setting at the horizon. It was time. The queen invited her to dine with her and the king this evening. Mira arranged her hair and smoothed her dress before she left her room. The corridors of Maegor’s Holdfast were very quiet at this hour. They were a lot quieter than a few months ago, before the royal weddings. But now that Margaery and Tommen were married, the city had emptied from most of the lords and ladies of the Reach, the Stormlands, Dorne and the Westerlands. Only a few noble people were left, Mira wasn’t upset about the new situation, far from it. She liked silence and peace, and there hadn’t been much peace to find ever since they left Highgarden. The gardens were much less crowded than before. She could spend time among bushes and flowers with far less noises around her.

Mira arrived before the doors of the royal apartments. Ser Orys Leygood was standing guard before them. He was a new member of the Kingsguard and came from a minor house of the Reach. He knew Mira since she was the queen’s handmaiden and let her enter. The queen was waiting for her at a table. She smiled immediately when she noticed Mira had entered.

“So, finally you’re here. You’re late.”

“Sorry, your Grace.” Mira curtsied. Margaery rose from her chair and went before her.

“No need to be sorry, Mira. I know you’re very busy today. I suppose the small council took a lot of your time.”

“Yes. Especially the Master of Coin.”

Margaery chuckled a little. “Just like my grandmother says, he’s an oaf. But he’s my father all the same. Come.” She led Mira to the table with a hand on her back. Mira waited for the queen to sit before she did it as well. You only sat once the queen was already sit.

Mira realized something wasn’t right. “The king isn’t with us?”

“No. He’s sparring in the courtyard with my brother.”

“At this hour?” Mira found it strange to train with sword in the dark.

The queen shrugged. “I convinced him he had to get used to fight during the night just like in the light of day. And Loras was kind enough to give me that favor. Normally he wouldn’t be with Tommen right now, but with someone else.” Margaery didn’t need to tell her with who Ser Loras Tyrell would be in normal times at this hour. Mira was fully aware of the knight’s preferences. “I thought we could have a private dinner between women before you leave.”

“Thank you, your Grace.”

“You may call me Margaery. We’re alone, and I always considered you more like a friend than a handmaiden.”

“It wouldn’t be appropriate to call you by your name now that you’re queen.”

Margaery smiled at her. “No. But for this evening, I give you the order to call me by my name. No titles. After all, you saved my family with finding about Ser Meryn.”

Mira smiled faintly. “I didn’t do it alone.” Mira had come with the idea to blame Meryn Trant for Joffrey’s death, but it was Sansa who made it possible with Lord Varys’s help who put a vial of the strangler in Ser Meryn’s room.

“It’s true,” the queen conceded. “All the same, without you, I may not be sitting here as queen.”

Servants entered to bring dinner. It was a very fine dinner and Mira doubted she would be able to eat everything. Even less considering she ate less than the other people in Margaery’s entourage. All the same, the food was good, though it was strange for Mira to be served. She was the one serving usually, and now roles were reversed. She would have to get used to it. She didn’t expect she would have to serve meals once she would be at Hightower. She wondered what Sera would do there. She realized Sera hadn’t been among the girls who brought the food.

“Sera didn’t come?”

“No,” the queen confirmed. “I gave her her leave for tonight. You both have a long journey to Oldtown. And I don’t think she would have appreciated to serve your food.” Margaery said it sadly.
She knew Sera was bitter in some way after Mira for getting married to a knight of a great house while she remained a simple handmaiden.

“No. She wouldn’t have.” Mira gulped some wine. She thought it was Arbor gold. “Do you really think you can’t arrange her another marriage?”

The queen pursed his lips, her eyes showing regrets. “I wish I could. She has been rejected by Lord Tarwick, and suspected of killing Joffrey. I’ll have to wait before I find her a new match. I just hope I won’t have to wait too long, or else almost all men will consider her too old to marry.” Mira nodded to show she understood. If a woman reached an age too great, then men wouldn’t consider her as a suitable match, except if marrying them would bring them armies, gold, a castle or lands. Sera had none of these. If they had to wait a few years, it might be too late for Sera. There was really nothing they could both do for her on this matter. “Try to make her time pleasant in Oldtown. She needs to change her ideas and to see something else than King’s Landing. And convince her to not be angry at you anymore.”

“She’s not angry at me. I think she understands why I asked for a marriage. You know why I did it.”

“Of course.” Margaery’s face showed very clearly she knew. “My grandmother killed a beast to protect me, so how could I blame you to run away from a marriage in the family who slaughtered yours? Especially after you helped me. And your marriage with Gerold Hightower will really be good for the relations between the Crown, House Tyrell and House Hightower. Lord Leyton is very happy about it. He gets a fine wife for one of his grandchildren, and the young man will have a castle and lands when time will come to take Ironrath from the Whitehills. Lord Tyron and Sansa will not allow the Boltons to hold the North forever. And as soon as the Boltons will be put aside, then the Whitehills will be sent out of Ironrath and your family’s lands. If they refuse to leave, then they’ll have to face a Hightower army supported by the Crown, Highgarden and Casterly Rock.”

“Let’s just hope there will be ironwood left. Or else Ser Kevan won’t be happy.”

“He’s already not happy with what I did. I outraced him.” Margaery looked around her and lowered her voice, though not much. “He received a raven two days ago from Lord Bolton.”

Mira lifted her eyes from a chicken wing she was cutting. “Roose Bolton? What did it say?”

Margaery sighed. “The Warden of the North asked Ser Kevan to give your hand to Torrhen Whitehill.”

Mira let her fork fall in the plate. “But Lord Whitehill refused the arrangement when Ser Kevan proposed him!”

“Yes. That’s what Vallis told me when he received the answer from Highpoint. But it seems Lord Bolton didn’t approve Ludd Whitehill’s decision and asked Ser Kevan for the same marriage. But you don’t have to worry. Tommen won’t revoke his decree. You’ll soon be far from the capital and about to marry a handsome and gentle knight of the Reach.”

Mira was uncertain. “Are you really sure? I don’t know him.”

Margaery gave an empathic smile and laid her hand on Mira’s. “Do you really think I would marry you to a monster?” Mira didn’t answer. Not intentionally, but who knows how my betrothed is? “I met Gerold Hightower some time ago. He’s a very comely and kind young man with good manners. You won’t be marrying anybody.”

“When did you see him for the last time, your Grace?”
“Margaery,” the queen corrected. “About five years ago. He was about fifteen at this time, so now he should be about twenty.”

Mira was still unsure. Many things could change in five years. Mira herself changed a lot during the last five years. She sighed again. “I have no choice anyway.”

“No, you don’t,” Margaery confirmed with another compassionate smile. “No more than me. I’m married with the king until death set us apart. Even an annulment is impossible between us, which is not the case for Sansa.”

All the girls of Highgarden knew very well, and in details, that the marriage between Tommen and Margaery was consummated. But Mira was intrigued by the comment about Sansa’s marriage. “You mean her marriage is still unconsummated?”

“Oh, she didn’t tell me they didn’t consummate yet, but she didn’t say the opposite either in her letters. I fear she’s still a virgin. In her stead, I would consummate and quickly before someone tries to annul her marriage with Lord Tyrion.” Just like Lady Olenna tried? Mira didn’t think Lord Tyrion would ever set Sansa aside. But she agreed with Margaery they should consummate their marriage as soon as possible. “Don’t make the same mistake than her, Mira. Don’t remain a maid during your wedding night.”

“I don’t expect my future husband to give me the choice. And I know better than to ask him.”

Margaery smiled again at her, more wickedly this time. “You learn quickly.”

Soon they were done with the main course. They spoke about Highgarden, Oldtown, the Citadel, the ironwood business, the problems in the North and the Reach and in King’s Landing too. Religious fanatics who called themselves Sparrows appeared recently, preaching the cleansing of the city from all its sins. Mira never saw such people who lived with nearly nothing on a voluntary will. Well, in fact there were brothers and sisters who lived with simple means in the Faith of the Seven, and Mira met some since she left the North, but the Sparrows didn’t live in simplicity. They lived in misery. Mira crossed the path of some of them when she accompanied Margaery in the streets and some looked really mad. She didn’t like it. There had already been a few altercations between some Sparrows and the gold cloaks, though they never came to violence up to now. Mira gave the most information she could to Margaery about ironwood so she may try to handle negotiations with the Whitehills. Servants brought sweets and pastries.

“I will miss you Mira. I won’t know who to rely on for advice when you’ll be gone.”

“I’m sure you’ll be able to rule without my help.” Mira didn’t think herself essential to the queen.

“Probably. But still, you were the only one I could really confide in when it came to political matters after my grandmother left. I’ll have no one when you’ll be at Hightower. My brother doesn’t care for politics, and my father can be too easily manipulated by Ser Kevan. And he’s an oaf, like my grandmother says. As for Tommen, he’s kind and well intentioned, but he needs more to receive advice than to give it. I’ll really be alone when you’ll leave. Just like you’ll be alone in Oldtown.”

Margaery really looked sad as she said it. Mira was sad as well to leave. They had finished their dessert. “I’m sorry to leave, Margaery.” She remembered she was to not call the queen by her title. “I really regret it.”

“You do what you must. Just like me. Women in our position must make the best of our circumstances. You’ll succeed in that, I have no doubt.” Margaery left her seat and went before Mira, putting a hand on her shoulder. “I want you to know that I don’t hold any grudge against you, Mira.
You put me into trouble for some time, but you always remained loyal to me. I’ll never forget that. I know I would have done what you did if I had been at your place. You’ve been a great friend ever since the moment you arrived at Highgarden, and you’ll remain my friend forever. Go to Hightower, get married, and take back your home from the thieves who stole it. Make the Whitehills pay for what they did to your family. And the Boltons as well. I’ll help you to do that.”

Nothing could have touched Mira more than this. She rose from her seat as well. “I’ll never forget your support to me, Margaery.” They hugged each other. Mira thought she would cry, but she held her tears. She was good at it now. They separated after a while. “I guess this is farewell.”

“No.” Margaery shook her head with a smile. “We’ll see each other again. I know that. Safe travel Mira.”

Mira curtsied before she left. She met no one on her way back to her chamber. She fell asleep not long after she lied down in her bed, the moon already high in the sky. Her discussion with Lady Margaery had lasted a very long time. She looked at the moon for a very long time. She wondered if they could see it at Ironrath right now. No, they couldn’t. Her family was no longer at Ironrath if any of them were still alive. Mira closed her eyes and let the silence of the Red Keep bring her into sleep.

On the morning, guards and servants helped her and Sera to carry their belongings. Queen Margaery had organized a carriage for them. The road would be long and they would have an escort with them. As they approached, Mira heard a familiar voice behind her.

“Lady Mira.”

She turned to find the Hand of the King walking in her direction. “Ser Kevan.”

“May I have a moment with you. Alone.” Mira had an idea why. She turned to Sera and the others.

“Continue to prepare. It won’t be long.”

She followed Ser Kevan in a nearby corridor where they stopped. “I wanted to wish you well at Oldtown, Lady Mira.”

“It’s very kind of you, ser.”

“After the help you gave us with the royal fleet, it was the least I could do.” His face was serious.
There was no smile on it. Mira knew why he was upset. “I’m sure you’ll be happy at Hightower.
Though I believed you would be happier at Ironrath. At home.”

“Not if I was married to a Whitehill,” Mira retorted.

Ser Kevan pursed his lips. “I arranged something for you to get back your home, to re-establish peace in your family’s lands, and to revive the ironwood business. To save it, properly speaking.”

Mira made a step in Ser Kevan’s direction. “Ser Kevan, we both know Ironrath wouldn’t have been mine if I was married to a Whitehill. And I think we both know now that Ludd Whitehill wasn’t well disposed to marry me to his heir.”

The Hand of the King looked at her for a moment. “You were right. Lord Whitehill refused my proposition. However, Roose Bolton and Torrhen Whitehill found it much more acceptable.”

Another silence lingered between them, each of them not leaving the eyes of the other. “I told you about the proposition because I respected you, Lady Mira. Not to have you sabotage it by having the queen arrange another marriage for you.”
“Did you really expect me to accept a marriage within the family who murdered my family?”

“This marriage would have brought peace to the lands the Whitehills occupy.”

Mira looked at the floor, then back at the knight. “Ser Kevan, we both know that even if it was true, the North wouldn’t have been at peace for long. The Boltons are despised by most of the northern houses, and they are the Wardens of the North only until Lady Sansa and Lord Tyrion have a son. When they will have a son, do you expect the Boltons to give up the North so easily? There will be war. The Boltons and their bannermen will fight to keep the North. When this time comes, I think Lord Tyrion and you will appreciate to have the Hightowers fighting to take Ironrath from Bolton’s bannermen, instead to have strong Whitehills to oppose you.”

Ser Kevan didn’t react very much to her words. Perhaps he already knew they were true before she said them. “I could have arranged another marriage for you, with a house of the Westerlands.”

“You might have won Baelish to arrange such a marriage, but Bolton’s bannermen would not have had this. I could have arranged another marriage for you, with a house of the Westerlands.”

“Then the Whitehills would have complained you stole the heir to Ironrath from them eventually. Or at least Lord Bolton would have done so. He could have said the Lannisters turned against him. Instead you only have to tell him the queen arranged another marriage for her handmaiden and they have nothing to blame House Lannister for. And you get one of the greatest houses of the Reach to fight alongside your nephew’s army when he’ll try to take the North. That could help to enhance the relations between the Westerlands and the Reach.”

“Perhaps,” the knight conceded. “All the same, I hope you know what you’re doing. I hope for you the Whitehills won’t have destroyed all the ironwood forests when you’ll come with a Hightower army.”

“Then we have a common interest, and a common enemy. If the Whitehills remain at Ironrath, ironwood will disappear. We both have an interest to see them removed from my family’s land.”

“Indeed,” Ser Kevan agreed. “Good luck, Lady Mira. I wish you good fortune in your marriage, and hope it will serve the Crown’s interests.” Ser Kevan bowed lightly and left. The last sentence wasn’t entirely without threat. Mira went to the carriage. All luggage was placed now. Sera was saying goodbye to Margaery who was present along with her husband. Mira went in their direction and curtsied before Tommen.

“Your Grace.”

“Lady Mira. I’m sad to see you leave. Margaery too.”

“I know. I thank you, your Grace. But sooner or later, we must take different paths. Princess Myrcella had to leave one day too.”

The king nodded. “Yes, I know. I cried when she left. I miss her. I’ll miss you too. And the queen will miss you. You have all our good wishes for your marriage.”

“Thank you, your Grace.”

Sera was done saying her farewells to her Grace, so Mira took a step forward. Margaery pulled her into an embrace. “Take care of yourself, my friend.”

“Yes, your Grace.”

She released Mira from her arms. “Take care of each other, both of you.”

The order was addressed to Mira and Sera. They both curtsied one last time for the king and the queen and walked into the carriage. They followed the River Row, escorted by about twenty gold cloaks. Mira noticed people of every sort on their way, including Sparrows. They stayed quiet. They went through the King’s Gate where the gold cloaks left them. Only about ten guards of the Reach followed them from there.

Once they were out of King’s Landing, Sera, who sat at the opposite side of the carriage, said something. “Mira, I want you to know, I’m happy for your marriage. Really I am. I just… It’s difficult for me to not feel a little angry. I wanted to get married, you didn’t want, and you’re the one who ends up married. It’s unfair, for both of us. I think you’ll have a good husband, a husband you deserve. Margaery told me Ser Gerold Hightower was a good man. I’m happy for what’s happening to you. I just wish that could happen to me too.”

Mira smiled empathically at her friend. “I’m sure it will happen to you too, Sera. People have a short memory, and there are not many people who loved Joffrey. Soon they’ll forget you were involved in his death, or they won’t care. Margaery will be able to arrange you a marriage. I’m sure of that. It will take some time, but it will come.”

Sera smiled at her in return, grateful. They remained like this for a minute, silent. Suddenly, Mira realized Sera was breathing deeply. “Mira, smell the air. Can you feel the difference?” Mira breathed deeply as well, and she understood what her friend meant. “It doesn’t stink. We’re far from King’s Landing.”

Sera was right. Looking through the curtains, Mira saw the huge city getting smaller and smaller behind them. She and Sera had remained more than a year and a half in the capital. And now they left it. In a few weeks, they would reach Oldtown, and Mira would start her new life as a wife.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Davos (after, we go back to Casterly Rock with Tyrion and Sansa)

In the meantime, since Mira left for Oldtown and you'll have to wait a few chapters before seeing her again, here's the beginning of her next chapter:

“You’ll be more beautiful than you’ve ever been. I can’t wait to see how Ser Gerold will react when he’ll see you walking in his direction.”

Sera didn’t stop to talk ever since she started to help Mira getting prepared. Mira on her side stood silent as Sera helped her to put on her gown and arranged her hair. Mira wore a white gown with black regions where was the girdle, on her shoulders and on the sides of her tummy and her chest. The gown was quite lightweight and remembered her of the one Queen Margaery wore at her own wedding, though this one was less richly decorated and displayed much less her body. Her back was entirely covered, but she had a generous triangular neckline that plunged deeply. Mira was used to gowns lighter than the ones she wore in the North after her years in the south, but she didn’t feel quite comfortable with this neckline. She had the impression to be naked from time to time. There were silver lines that followed the neckline and the hem. She also wore a silver necklace that her betrothed gave her this morning through his sister during the breakfast.
The gown outlined her thin figure very well. As for her hair, flowers held a few braids that would fall on her shoulders and her sides in normal times to only let a trail of smooth black hair fall on her back. Sera was completing the arrangement of her hair as Mira stood still.
Second chapter from Davos's perspective. Davos will have an important role to play when the time comes. I like to write his character. Entirely loyal to Stannis, and the only to stop him from doing atrocities.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

DAVOS II

- He cut a chunk from the piece of wood he worked on. He started it about fifteen minutes ago and it was very slowly taking shape. It would take some time before someone could distinguish the stag Davos was carving. It was destined to Princess Shireen, a small thanking for teaching him how to read. She succeeded where his son Matthos failed for years. Davos was so stubborn that he never listened to his son about this. It was a chance the princess brought him to read, or else he would never have been able to convince Stannis to save the Wall against the wildlings. The wooden stag would be his gift for the princess. It wasn’t much, but it would be a gift nonetheless.

Davos hoped he could finish it before they left Castleblack. There were more hospitable places in the Seven Kingdoms than the castle, but it was far more hospitable than most of the places where Davos spent his life. But he knew the king would soon leave the castle. He wanted to march on Winterfell and take the North from Roose Bolton. With Tywin Lannister and Joffrey Baratheon dead, they had a chance to succeed. But Davos was afraid. No northern lord had declared for Stannis. A girl of ten answered to his call saying they knew only the King in the North, and his name was Stark. If only Jon Snow accepted the offer of the king, many Northerners would have joined Stannis’s cause. The boy was Eddard Stark’s son. Northerners would prefer to have a legitimized son of the last Warden of the North instead of the Boltons who stabbed their king in the heart. Instead, Jon Snow chose to stay in the Night’s Watch and became their Lord Commander.

Davos had to give it to Jon Snow, he was honorable. Stannis himself acknowledged it, and the boy wasn’t stupid. He decided to rescue the wildlings at Hardhome and bring them south of the Wall, in the lands of the Gift. As Jon Snow said to his brothers, it was better to live with the wildlings than to give them to the army of the dead. If only the other members of the Night’s Watch agreed with him. The fat boy, Randyll Tarly’s son, was among the few who seemed to really agree with Jon Snow, and probably because he loved a wildling. Davos had seen the girl. Gilly was her name. Shireen was teaching her to read. Jon Snow took the right decision, but he alienated his sworn brothers against him at the same time. Most of them hated him, though it wasn’t a great change compared to before. At least, if he succeeded, Stannis could integrate the thousands of wildlings who would pass south to his army. If Jon Snow succeeded.

Davos regretted the lad refused to join Stannis. On the other hand, if he hadn’t been elected Lord Commander, there would be no chance of survival for the wildlings at Hardhome. Perhaps there was some blessing in Jon Snow’s refusal. No other Lord Commander would choose to rescue the wildlings, even if it was obviously the right thing to do. And as long as Jon Snow ruled at Castleblack, Stannis had an ally at the Wall. Both men respected each other. Davos suspected the king might regret Jon Snow wasn’t his son instead of Eddard Stark’s bastard. Jon Snow was skilled in battle, a natural leader people were ready to follow, honorable, firm, brave, intelligent, fair and ready to do what was necessary. He was worthier than most of Stannis’s generals. What was a gain for the Night’s Watch was a loss for Stannis.

Davos was so focused on his work and lost in his thoughts at the same time that he didn’t realize the king had entered the common hall. He realized it had gotten colder because of the door that just opened.

“It’s time,” the king said, gritting his teeth as always. Davos knew what it meant. He wanted to leave Castleblack now.

“Uh, your Grace,” Davos began as he rose from his seat. “Wouldn’t it be better to wait? When Jon Snow returns with the wildlings, we could have thousands more men.”

“If Jon Snow returns with the wildlings. We can’t wait that long. We have the advantage. More men, more horses, all fed and rested. But every day we wait, the odds shift in Bolton’s favor. This could turn to winter at any moment. We have to act now. Give the order. We march at sunrise.”

Davos didn’t agree with his king. They needed allies if they hoped to take Winterfell and then to hold it. Even if they took Winterfell, there were high chances only a few northern houses would support Stannis afterwards, and the wildlings would be of great help then. But Stannis was his king and he had to obey. He would give the order.

“I’ll choose a dozen men to stay and guard the queen and the princess.”

Stannis was going out of the hall when Davos said this and stopped in his movement. “No need.
They’re coming with us.”

Davos couldn’t stop his fears to come out. “It’s a tough road ahead, your Grace. Won’t they be safer…”

“Here?” the king cut Davos’s words. “Half these watchmen are killers and rapists. No, they march with us.”

Again, Davos knew there was nothing he could do. With a dozen men, the queen and Shireen would be safe enough here, but he knew it was futile to try to convince the king once his mind was settled.
The king walked out of the hall and Davos followed him outside. “As you wish, your Grace.”

At the other side of the courtyard, Davos spotted the Red Woman staring at them. The wind was howling around them, and it was cold. Very cold. As always, the Starks were right. Davos decided to follow the king. He didn’t like what was going on. He followed Stannis to his solar in the King’s Tower. Stannis made his way without glancing back and Davos entered at the same time than him in the solar. Stannis walked to his desk and stood beside it, turning to face Davos.

“I gave you your orders, Ser Davos. Do you have anything else to tell me?”

Davos gathered his courage. It would be better to tell him the truth now than when it would be too late. “I have, your Grace. I think the march on Winterfell in our current situation is a great mistake.”

“I already told you why we must do it.”

Davos insisted. “Your Grace, all the northern lords refused to rally you. When we’ll walk on Winterfell, it will be just like King’s Landing. When we march on the castle, they’ll see strangers coming to take the castle of their liege lord and their king.”
“I am the only king. Robb Stark was an usurper.”

“Not in the eyes of the Northerners. We offer them nothing except the destruction of the Boltons, and that’s not enough. We don’t even have a Stark to offer them a new Warden of the North.”

“You should tell that to Jon Snow. If you convinced him, we wouldn’t have this problem.” The king was growing impatient. Davos said everything.

“Your Grace, I don’t think we’ll be able to take Winterfell. We have a greater army, but the Boltons have the advantage of the defensive position. Winterfell was never taken when fully garrisoned. And we have no allies. And we’ll get none if we take the castle. Northerners will only see us as southern invaders taking the place of turncloaks. This may even lead the Lannisters to march on the North, and Northerners will join Sansa Lannister quicker than us. She is the last trueborn child of their Warden of the North. Many good men will die during the siege. I really think we ought to wait for the wildlings to have allies we could rely on, or else we’ll have no one to support us.”

“Allies we could rely on?” The king’s voice was full of scorn. “We’re talking about wildlings. Do you really think we can trust them? We cannot stay here a single more day. If we wait too long, we will spend winter here, and when it will be over, my claim will be long forgotten. We march at sunrise. You’re dismissed.”

Davos was defeated. He couldn’t convince Stannis. But at least he spoke truthfully to his king. He bowed and left the King’s Tower. He travelled the courtyard, snow creaking under his boots and flakes falling on his head and hair. It was cold outside, and it would only get colder. How many men would die of the cold on their walk to Winterfell. He went to see each general and relayed the king’s order to prepare for tomorrow. When it was done, he walked to the armory.

Davos entered the armory and went to the room behind it. He knocked on the door. No one answered. He knocked again. Still no answer. Finally he pushed the door and it opened. There was no one inside. The Lord Commander’s quarters were smaller and more humble than those Stannis had in the King’s Tower. That was a lot to say when people knew Stannis was the starkest man there was, even starkest than the Starks. Davos heard the former Lord Commander’s rooms in the Lord Commander’s Tower were burned with the entire tower when a dead man tried to kill the former Lord Commander. Apparently it was Jon Snow who saved him and burned his hand in the process. He saved his Lord Commander and lost his comfortable future rooms at the same time.

Jon Snow wasn’t there. Davos had to talk with him before they left. But for now, neither Jon Snow nor his steward was there. Davos looked around. There were scrolls, ink, parchments, seals, pens, shelves, chairs, candles, but nothing that wasn’t necessary. Not even a jug of wine. No wonder Stannis liked the Lord Commander, and that made Jon Snow’s refusal even worse and more painful for the king. Davos waited for the Lord Commander to come. He couldn’t search for him through all Castleblack. He needed to talk to Jon Snow in private.

While he turned around the room, Davos’s eyes caught a glint of red on the desk. He noticed an unsealed scroll with a red lion on it. A message from House Lannister. Davos knew he shouldn’t spy on people while he was their guest, but he was the Hand of the one true king. It was his duty to know what the king’s enemies might be preparing. He looked at the door and listened very carefully. There were no sounds and no sign that anyone was coming. If Jon Snow didn’t know he looked at it, then nothing wrong would come out of it. He took the scroll and unrolled it carefully, reading very slowly the message.

Everything is alright at Casterly Rock, Jon. Lannisters are not all monsters, far from it. I get along very well with Joy Hill, a cousin of Tyrion. No need to cut my husband in two, he treats me better than you could imagine.
We still can’t send you anything. The war is not over, and sending something while Stannis is at the Wall is impossible. Tyrion knows White Walkers are a threat. We’re looking for a solution.

Sansa

Davos was intrigued by this message. It came from Sansa Lannister, the Lady of Casterly Rock and the half-sister of Jon Snow. Davos knew now they were exchanging messages. This scroll seemed to prove Jon Snow asked for help from his sister and her husband, but they answered they couldn’t give him any help as long as Stannis remained at Castleblack. Could it be why the Lord Commander wanted them to leave? He wanted Stannis and his men to go so he could receive men from Casterly Rock? Davos heard during these last weeks men of the Watch talking about how they would soon receive help from their Lord Commander’s sister. They seemed eager to receive it. Could the men have chosen Jon Snow because they hoped for help from the Westerlands? It was true that Ser Alliser Thorne didn’t offer much in comparison. The choice of the brothers of the Night’s Watch was very logical when we thought about it.

But there was something that Davos feared. If Jon Snow exchanged ravens with his sister, then maybe the Lannisters were informed of Stannis’s movements. Everything Jon Snow would tell his sister would be known by her husband. That was a real danger. Davos fought the Imp at Blackwater, and his fleet was mostly destroyed by his trick with wildfire. Tyrion Lannister wasn’t someone to underestimate. He knew at least that Stannis was at Castleblack. Though it didn’t really matter. All the Seven Kingdoms surely knew it by now. But what other information did he get from Jon Snow?

Could Jon Snow be informing the Lord of Casterly Rock? Could he be spying on Stannis? After thinking about it for a moment, Davos pushed the thought aside. Jon Snow was far too honorable for this kind of things. From his discussions with his sworn brothers, Davos knew he was far too honorable to betray Stannis. Even those who said he was a traitor to the Watch because of his affection for the wildlings recognized his sometimes foolish honor. However, his correspondence with Sansa Lannister may have sent critical information to Casterly Rock even if that wasn’t his intention. He was asking for help. He would inform the Lannisters of Stannis’s departure as soon as it happened, even if he didn’t say what Stannis would do. If the Imp planned to take the North for himself and his wife, then this could put Davos’s king in great trouble.

Davos started to search the other documents on the desk and anywhere else in the solar to find any proof of the information the Lord Commander might have sent, not only to Casterly Rock but to the rest of Westeros. He didn’t find anything. There were reports and messages from the Shadow Tower and Eastwatch-by-the-Sea, a few negative answers from houses who were asked for help to man the Wall, reports about stocks and supplies at Castleblack and the other two castles, scrolls about White Walkers and wights probably coming from the library of the castle, but nothing to show Jon Snow revealed sensitive information about Stannis. Though that was no proof he didn’t.

Davos took care to put back into place every scroll, document, parchment and object he moved. Jon Snow couldn’t know he searched his solar. Finally the Lord Commander arrived. He seemed a little startled to find Davos in his room. Perhaps Davos should have waited for him before the door. Jon Snow could find it suspicious he waited for him inside.

Davos tried to hide his uneasiness. “Forgive me, Lord Commander. I needed to speak with you about the ships you need for your journey to Hardhome.”

Jon Snow relaxed almost immediately. He went to his desk. “Yes. How many ships do you have? Stannis told me about sixty.”

“Fifty-eight, to be accurate. Including our own ships and those of Salladhor Saan. They can carry about a hundred men each of them plus their crew.”
“There may be tens of thousands wildlings at Hardhome.”

Davos tipped the side of his head and pursed his lips. “You could squeeze them a little or reduce the crew, but the more you’ll do it and the more dangerous the journey will be. Especially with this weather. You’ll have to make more than one trip.”

Jon Snow nodded to show he understood, though he wasn’t pleased by this. Davos knew he needed more ships, but that was all he could give him. He was less furious or exasperated than Stannis when he couldn’t get what he wanted. Davos took two letters from his doublet. He handed them to Jon Snow.

“Give these to the commander of Stannis’s fleet and to Salladhor Saan. They will obey your orders.”

“Thank you, Ser Davos.” Jon Snow took the letters, sat and went to the scrolls on his desk. Davos didn’t leave and remained there. After a moment, Jon Snow raised his eyes again. “Is there something else, ser?”

“Aye. I would like you to reconsider the king’s offer.”

Jon Snow crossed his fingers on the desk. “I already gave him my answer. I won’t come back on it. You can tell Stannis I won’t join him. I’m the Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch now. I won’t break my vows.”

“The king didn’t send me to make you reconsider. I come here from my own will because I think you should accept his offer.”

“Because it would serve the interests of the king you serve?”

“Because it would serve the interests of the Seven Kingdoms. The boy who sits on the Iron Throne is a bastard born of incest. The Iron Islands have rebelled. The Boltons occupy Winterfell and rule the North, skinning people alive. Your father was executed because he fought against an usurper, your brother and his mother were butchered at a wedding, your two other brothers were burned by the Ironborn, one of your sister is dead and the other one was forced to marry a Lannister, to marry someone of the very family who murdered yours. The Lannisters, the Boltons, the Freys, the Greyjoys, they took everything you had and stole the North from those to who it belonged by right, your family, your own blood. Your father died because he warned Stannis about his rightful claim. He wanted Stannis to sit on the Iron Throne. He is the only true king. He offers you to avenge your family, to take back your home, and still you refuse.” Davos’s voice was accusing in some way.

“I swore a vow to the Night’s Watch.”

Davos sighed. He was really stubborn. “Do you think your father would have wanted you to stay at the Wall, doing nothing while your kin was slaughtered?”

Jon Snow rose from his seat, angry now. “You didn’t know my father, Ser Davos. He would have wanted me to do what was just and fair. You told me the other day that I swore to be the shield that guards the realms of men. The realms of men, not the Realm. You were right. For eight thousand years, the Night’s Watch fought against the wildlings. For eight thousand years, we didn’t fulfill our vows. This is what I’ll change. I’m going to Hardhome to save the people who are there before the White Walkers take them for their army. And I think that if my father was alive, he would agree with what I do.”

“You forget that your father fought to put Stannis on the throne. He wanted him on the throne. Because it was the right thing to do.”
“I know that very well, and I hope he will succeed. But that is not what matters now. The dead are coming for all of us. For them it doesn’t matter if we are with Stannis, the Lannisters, the Greyjoys or the Boltons. We are all meat for their army. Tell me honestly, Ser Davos. I’ve seen you, you’re a good man. Do you think Stannis’s war is more important than the one against the dead?”

Davos answered after some hesitation. “No.”

“When dead men and worse come hunting for us in the night, do you think it matters who sits on the Iron Throne?” To that Davos couldn’t answer. Before his refusal to answer, Jon Snow resumed. “The Lord Commander Mormont asked me these questions after I tried to ride away from Castleblack to join my brother, not long after my father was killed. I chose to stay, and to fight for what was the most important. I saw a White Walker north of the Wall. They are real. I decided to be the shield that guards the realms of men. I haven’t changed my mind. My answer to these two questions is still no, because it’s the right thing to do. And I know this is not the right thing to do to fight my own sister, because that’s what I would have to do if I ever was to accept Stannis’s offer.”

Davos tried his last possibility. “Without you, I fear Stannis won’t be able to take Winterfell, and that even if he succeeded then the northern lords wouldn’t help him. They wouldn’t accept him as their king. And without their help, the Wall cannot be defended. You know that.”

Jon Snow looked back at him with a sorry look. “I hope Stannis will succeed. That’s all I have to say. I know you’re riding for Winterfell tomorrow. Good luck.”

The lad extended his hand. Davos shook it after a moment. “Good luck at Hardhome.”

Davos left. He failed. He didn’t believe their chances to take Winterfell were very high. They would need the wildlings, or Jon Snow, or both. But they wouldn’t get any of them. Stannis wouldn’t delay his march, and Jon Snow wouldn’t join them. Both Stannis and Jon Snow were stubborn and wouldn’t reconsider. He feared they were all doomed. Davos went to see the men were ready for tomorrow then went to sleep.

They woke up early in the morning. Davos made sure the men were ready with their bags and armors. After he was sure the most important preparations were done, he went to Shireen. He hadn’t finished the wooden stag yet. He would have to do it on the road. She was already mounted on her horse and saw him coming from afar.

“Onion Knight.” She smiled at him.

“Princess.” He smiled at her as well.

“Mother told me we were riding for Winterfell.”

“Your mother was right.”

“Do you think Father will let me go down into the crypt?”

“Beg your pardon?”

“At Winterfell. All the Kings in the North are buried there. Bran the Builder and King Dorren and…”

“First things first,” Davos interrupted her kindly. He didn’t know there was such a great crypt under Winterfell, but he couldn’t let the hopes of the princess get too high. “It’s a long march ahead. And then we have to take the castle.”
“Is there going to be a battle?” Shireen was smiling at the prospect, but Davos wasn’t.

“Aye, princess, but you won’t be anywhere near…”

“That’s enough talk of battle, Ser Davos. You’ll scare the child.” The queen’s presence was never appreciated, and it wasn’t more appreciated now than before. At least you could call the princess by her name, your Grace. She’s your daughter. But Davos chose to not let his true feelings show up.

“Yes, my queen,” Davos answered shortly. He noticed Shireen’s gloom before the way her mother acted with her. Immediately after Queen Selyse went away, Shireen was back to smiling.

“I’m not scared.”

“Well, I am,” Davos replied. “When the battle comes, promise you’ll protect me.”

“I promise.”

They were both smiling as Davos left Shireen to climb on his own horse. He saw the girl Gilly made a sign of farewell to Shireen. Then Davos realized Stannis and Jon Snow were talking together. They were too far from him so he couldn’t understand what they were saying. For a moment, Davos foolishly hoped Jon Snow would change his mind at the last minute and accompany them, but finally Stannis went to mount his own horse and the Lord Commander stayed behind. Stannis took place at the head of the column with Melisandre at his side. And they moved forward.

Before long, Castleblack was barely visible behind them. It took more time before the Wall disappeared. They were marching on Winterfell, and even if Davos didn’t believe their chances to take the castle were very high, he had faith in Stannis Baratheon, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm. He would follow his king to the end, no matter the odds. He was his king. His god.

Chapter End Notes

It's a lot like in the TV show, I know. Not very exciting. This chapter is mostly an intrusion in Davos's mind to better understand him and the decisions he will take later, and also to see how Stannis's situation is desperate.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa's name day
OK, I don't know how I ended up with a chapter of 20,000 words, but I did. IT IS THE LONGEST CHAPTER I HAVE EVER WRITTEN. There are many things happening in this chapter. New plots, new characters, many songs, emotional developments... It is nearly without end. I really worked a lot on this chapter and I really hope you'll enjoy it. Please review at the end.

Reminder: Sansa often dreamed about a wedding with Loras Tyrell at the beginning of her marriage. To refresh your mind about it, you can go to the end of Sansa I.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sansa XIX

The stars, forever unchanging,
they guide us on paths unseen
and you were written in my story, destined to collide with me

They say you stole me in moonlight, but Love, I was already yours, for we were written in the starlight,
as the wolf belongs to the moon

Like the rain meets the river, like the trees meet the sky,
we were born to be together,
you and I

Like the fish need he water, like the birds need the sky,
we were made to need each other,

you and I

The stars, forever unchanging, hey sent your love to me but cruel, how late in my story,

you came to collide with me

Like the rain loves the thunder, like the waves kiss the sky,

we were born to love each other,

you and I

Like the fire consumes the timber, like the flames kiss the sky, were made to be together,

you and I

The stars, forever unchanging,

they guide us on paths unseen

and you were written in my story,

destined to collide with me

destined to collide with me

Sansa woke up from her sleep with the song in her mind. Her head rested on Tyrion’s chest like she always did now. Ever since the trial ended, they always slept in the same bed. There had been times in the beginning when she would curl on Tyrion this way, but for the last month she did it every night. No nightmare troubled her sleep during this period, and Tyrion didn’t seem to be bothered by nightmares either. The sun just began to rise. Sansa closed her eyes and let peace flood her. Tyrion had a hand on her back and the other in her hair. The song continued to play in her head. It was a song her personal singer, a young woman who performed at Joffrey’s wedding, sang to her and her friends a few days ago. Sansa had hired her permanently after she sang the Rains of Castamere for Lord Spicer at the ceremony she and Tyrion were acknowledged Lord and Lady of the Westerlands.
by their bannermen.

Sansa felt good, at peace. There were mornings she just didn’t want to get out of bed. But in the end, she always did. When she didn’t want to leave it, her husband always did sooner or later, and she lost the main reason why she didn’t want to get up. She took the habit to grunt each time he left their bed, to show how unhappy she was about it. That caused Tyrion to mock her because a perfect lady wouldn’t grunt. There was nothing evil in the mockery. Tyrion was never evil with her. Only he was right to say it was very unusual for her to grumble. That became some sort of a daily joke between them each morning.

After some time, Sansa felt Tyrion’s hand running through her hair. She smiled. She liked it. She thought sometimes he did it while he believed she was asleep. She didn’t try to deceive him and remained still, enjoying the situation. Surely he enjoyed it as well. His fingers were stroking her locks one after one, and when he was probably done with every lock, he repeated it once more. She liked it much more than the way Janei was always trying to pull her hair between her little hands.

After a time that looked too short, Tyrion stopped the movement. “Perhaps you should stop pretending you’re asleep, my lady.”

Sansa let a light giggle escape her throat. “Does it bother you?” she said with a very sweet voice.

“It may bother me to have a lazy wife who can’t get out of bed,” he answered on a playing tone.

Sansa took a false offended voice. “Lazy? You’re the one who’s lazy. I know sometimes you go into your solar in the evening only to drink when you pretend to work.”

“I’m afraid you’re half-wrong. I do work at these times. But you’re also half-right because I do drink at the same time. It’s the only way for me to drink since you prevent me from doing so at dinner. Perhaps if you allowed me to drink like I want I wouldn’t leave so often late in the day.”

Sansa smiled more at the suggestion. She turned her head to face him. “Good try. You won’t get drunk again so easily.”

Tyrion gave an exaggerated sigh. “Then I’m afraid I’ll continue to spend time in the solar during the evening.”

Sansa took a menacing voice and face while she raised a little to look down at her husband. “Each minute you spend there every evening, I force you to spend it in this bed on the next morning.”

She let her head fall heavily on Tyrion’s chest. Her husband expelled air at the force of the impact. Sansa smiled wickedly for herself. If Tyrion wanted to drink, she would find a way to turn it to her advantage. She would gain something whatever choice Tyrion made.

Tyrion needed a few seconds to recover his breath. “You are cruel and unfair, Sansa. Cruelly unfair.”

“I don’t care.”

“What a terrible wife I have.”

He said it very softly and started to caress her left arm with his right hand. Sansa sighed in relief. She hoped he would do it. Her mind grew numb again as his hand made its way to her shoulder and her cheek. Perhaps she didn’t want Tyrion to stop drinking in supposed secret finally. This moment lasted some time, but still not long enough for Sansa. Tyrion stopped and tried to get out of the bed, but Sansa pushed him on his back again before he rose enough.
Tyrion chuckled. “Sansa, if the celebrations are to take place, we both have to get up.”

Tyrion tried again to rise and this time Sansa didn’t stop him. He was right. Today was her sixteenth name day and the Lannisters organized a tourney and other celebrations for the occasion. They were supposed to be a secret for Sansa, but it was difficult to keep a tourney secret and preparations couldn’t really remain discreet in the last days. Furthermore, Sansa managed since she arrived at Casterly Rock to gain the trust of many people in the household and among Tyrion’s family. There were servants who revealed details to her through the last weeks, voluntarily or involuntarily. And Joy told Sansa everything she knew about the coming celebrations during their times in the godswood, to Cerenna’s great despair. Sansa mostly knew what was planned for the day now, though there were some details she still ignored.

Sansa did like she always did when Tyrion left their bed, but he only smiled and went to take a bath. Sansa stayed in the bed among blankets and sheets. She had the right to rest for today after all. She was supposed to break her fast with Cerenna this morning. Sansa knew it was meant as a way to distract her during the final preparations, but she would like to spend some time alone with her friend before she had to sit through a whole tourney. Tyrion would leave early to make sure everything was ready and to take care of some matters his duties of lord commanded him to fulfill for the day. Sansa rested her head on the pillows, enjoying the calm.

She took the necklace on the little table next to the bed and looked at it in the palm of her hand with her head still on the pillows. She looked at the symbol on it. The lion of House Lannister was carved very well in gold. She knew there was a direwolf carved in silver under it, but she didn’t open the medallion to look at it. Instead, she kept her eyes fixed on the lion. Lady Sansa Lannister of House Stark, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands and Lady of Winterfell. Sansa Lannister. Even when she wrote to her brother Jon the first time, she used her whole title as a signature. In the messages that followed, she only wrote her first name, but still. She had written this because she believed her brother might understand better this way that she was alright and Tyrion treated her very well. But was there more to it? Was she a Lannister now?

Never forget what you are. These were Tyrion’s words for her. She was a Stark. Wasn’t she? Sansa had some doubts about it. She was the Lady of Casterly Rock, the seat of House Lannister. She was the Lady of this family. She lived among Lannisters, ate with Lannisters, spent her time with Lannisters. She prayed to the Old Gods with a Lannister bastard. Her best friend, Cerenna, was a Lannister. The people she asked for advice were Lannisters. And more than anything else, she was married to a Lannister, a man she had come to rely on and to appreciate more than anyone else in this world. A man who was taking his bath behind a closed door right now when a part of her wanted him to let it open. A man who had become everything for her through the last months.

What was left of Stark in her? It was about three years now she didn’t see Winterfell, or the North. She had grown attached to Casterly Rock since she arrived. It was the biggest and most luxurious castle she ever saw, and it was her castle now. It was the sort of castle she dreamed of when she was a child. Most of the people were kind with her, and really kind. After initial difficulties, most of them appreciated her for real. Sansa Lannister of House Stark. That only meant she came from House Stark, not that she belonged to it. Sansa had the impression she was getting away from her origins, losing her northern roots. And the worse was she wasn’t really bothered by this. She was happy at Casterly Rock with Tyrion and his family. They weren’t bad people. They were not responsible for the misfortunes her family suffered, and they liked her. It was as if they replaced her family. Her only close relative still alive was thousands of miles away at the Wall and she only received news from him from time to time. Sansa stared at the golden lion. It didn’t disgust her like before. She had learned to accept it. It was a gift Tyrion gave her a year ago. She closed her hand around it and brought it to her heart. She didn’t tighten her grip around it. The medallion didn’t open.
Tyrion went out of the bathroom with fresh clothes for the day, all washed and clean. He looked at her, still laying in the bed. He said nothing for a time, but seemed to regain his senses in the end.

“You should get up, Sansa. Unless you want to spend your name day in the bed. I ordered so many people to work day and night for this day that I fear they may kill me if you don’t come.”

They both laughed and Sansa finally decided to leave the comfort of the mattress. “Alright. I didn’t save you to have you murdered for such a stupid reason.”

“I’ll see you at the tourney.” Tyrion left.

Sansa took a bath, then after putting trivial clothes, she went to the living room where Cerenna was waiting for her.

“You took your time,” she said, not without rebuke.

“This will give you more time to prepare the so-called surprise festivities,” Sansa replied with feigned indifference.

Cerenna reddened in anger. “I’m going to kill Joy.” She took some bread and bit furiously in it. “We worked on it for weeks, and Joy had to spoil everything.”

“She’s not the only responsible one. Servants can be very talkative. And by the way, Cerenna, a lady doesn’t speak with food in her mouth.” Sansa took a gulp of lemon water. Cerenna sighed in despair. Sansa loved to remember her good manners sometimes. Cerenna knew the good behavior of a lady, but sometimes she didn’t follow it. “Anyway, did you really think you could hide a tourney?”

Cerenna shook her head. “I don’t know how I thought we could, but we should have tried to hide it better. Next time, I won’t tell anything to Joy.”

Joy had become the scapegoat for everyone who participated to the organization of the name day’s festivities. Sansa knew everything thanks to her to hear many people talk. Joy didn’t help, it was true, but most of what Sansa knew she got it from the household’s staff. Sansa remembered she had to speak with Joy before she went to the tourney. It was a conversation she wasn’t eager to have.

“Let’s talk about something else,” Cerenna said on a tired tone. “Many people will come for this tourney. Knights and lords from all the Westerlands.”

“Yes, I know. This means we’ll see again all those people who came months ago to kneel before me and Tyrion.” There were some Sansa wasn’t very pleased to meet again.

“And more. This time knights and lords will compete for the prizes. We should see many interesting people. They’ll be fighting for you.” Sansa’s friend said the last words with a mischievous smile.

“Good for you, Cerenna. But I’m done with swooning before handsome knights and lords. I used to. Now I’m married.”

Cerenna laughed inaudibly. “Yes, you’re married. Too bad. I’ll keep the handsome knights for myself then.”

Just like everyone else in Casterly Rock, Cerenna knew her marriage with Tyrion was still unconsummated. It was never mentioned before her or Tyrion, but people talked about it all the same. A few times, Sansa surprised people, whether they were Tyrion’s cousins or servants, talking about it. Why were they so interested in that? What happened between her and her husband in the bedroom was their private affairs. For a moment, Sansa thought about how Tyrion sometimes ran his fingers and his hands on her body and how she liked it. She wondered how it would feel if he passed his hands under her clothes.

“You know Sansa, there’s something strange I heard yesterday,” Cerenna declared. “Apparently, a young knight of the Vale arrived to participate to the tournament a few days ago.”

That information surprised Sansa. “I thought only the Westermen were invited to the tourney.”

“You’re right, Sansa. All the noblemen of the Westerlands were invited, but no other invitation was sent to anyone outside. However, anyone can participate to the tourney as long they have the armor and the lance for that.” Cerenna shrugged. “Perhaps he was in the Westerlands for some other matter and heard about the tourney. After all, the prizes are quite high for the winners.”

Sansa was a little afraid by this. A knight of the Vale in the Westerlands? What good could come out of it? Her aunt Lysa died a few months ago. Apparently she committed suicide and jumped through the Moon Door of the Eyrie. Sansa never saw it, but Tyrion told her about it and how her aunt madly accused him of murdering her husband Jon Arryn. Her cousin wanted to make Tyrion fly. Sansa didn’t really feel anything when she learnt her aunt died. She married Petyr Baelish and remained hidden in the Vale while her family fought. She didn’t come to the help of her own blood and let them die. With the things Tyrion told her about her aunt and her son Lord Robin Arryn, Sansa didn’t feel any interest for them.

When Sansa thought about it, they still didn’t know who killed Jon Arryn. Tyrion told her once that her father’s friend died in strange circumstances and quite suddenly. In fact, when Tyrion arrived in King’s Landing to serve as Hand of the King, he tried to discover who killed Jon Arryn. He confronted Cersei about it, but she claimed she had nothing to do with it. Thanks to Tyrion’s trial, they knew that the Grand Maester made sure Jon Arryn wouldn’t survive to the poisoning he was a victim of, but they still didn’t know who actually poisoned him. Who did this? Why? Cersei seemed an excellent candidate. Sansa had no difficulty to imagine her poisoning people, but Tyrion didn’t think she did it. The mystery was complete.

Between Jon Arryn’s death, and the fact that now Petyr Baelish ruled the Vale as Regent until Robin Arryn came of age, Sansa didn’t like the presence of this knight. He might cause trouble. What if Baelish was the one to send him? Was he a spy? Or did he come for something else? Sansa remembered the failed attempt of Ser Dontos to kidnap her. She didn’t want to experience it a second time. She wouldn’t take any chance.

“Apparently, this knight is very handsome,” Cerenna resumed as if nothing was amiss. “I’m eager to see him. No one knows who he is, but that would be wonderful if he was some landed knight or even the heir of some great lord of the Vale.”

“Handsomeness doesn’t decide if you’ll win a tourney. Or if you’re a decent man.” Sansa answered on a bitter voice. She thought about Joffrey, or Ser Loras. Physical appearance and titles didn’t have much value for her now. Her husband was a dwarf, her sworn shield was a woman, her husband’s squire was a timid boy, and the Lannister she got along with the better after Cerenna was a bastard. They were all worth much more than many knights in shining armor and charming princes.

“No,” Cerenna conceded. “But that doesn’t mean the man cannot be interesting.” She drank some water. “Have you received any news from your friend? What was her name? Mira?”

Sansa shook her head. “Not for some time now. She’s probably still on her way to Oldtown as far as I know.” Margaery wrote to Sansa last month to tell her Mira Forrester left King’s Landing to marry Ser Gerold Hightower, the third son of Ser Baelor Hightower. Ser Baelor was the heir to Hightower. Sansa had been surprised by this. She didn’t expect Mira to marry anytime soon. From what the queen told her, Mira asked her for a marriage to escape another one. Sansa wondered what marriage pushed Mira to ask Margaery to arrange her another wedding. She would have to write to her friend in Oldtown.

“I hope she’s alright. But at Hightower, I doubt she’ll be able to complain about her new situation.” Sansa didn’t know if Mira would really be better at Oldtown, but she hoped she would. She didn’t know the Hightowers.

Cerenna left when their breakfast was over and Sansa put on clothes for the day. Her hair were arranged for cascading behind her shoulders, with little braids among them. She put on a green gown with sapphires on the collar. Of course she kept the necklace on. She also had two rings at each hand, plus her wedding ring at her left hand. It was made of gold with a lion on it. Sansa smiled at the ring and the lion on it. It was the proof she was Tyrion’s wife. The other rings didn’t mean very much for her. She only wore so many jewels for public appearances. The rest of the time, her clothes and fineries were less refined.

Sansa went to Joy’s rooms after she gave orders to prepare her carriage and to warn the other ladies who would accompany her. However, she discovered the girl had gone to the Stone Garden again. It seemed the godswood of Casterly Rock was Joy’s home as much as her personal quarters now. Sansa went to the garden and found the girl of twelve on her knees, praying like she so often did. She prayed more than Sansa prayed herself when she was held in King’s Landing. They still had some time before they were to leave for the tourney, so Sansa decided to kneel as well to pray with her.

She prayed for Jon at the Wall. For Tyrion, her husband. For Joy, right beside her. For Cerenna. For Dorna. For Genna. For all the Lannisters she knew here. For Margaery in King’s Landing. For Mira in Oldtown. For her uncle Edmure, and her granduncle Brynden, both at Riverrun. She also prayed for Ser Kevan. She also asked the Old Gods in the end who she was. Was she a Lannister? A Stark? Both of them? Or someone else?

When Sansa opened her eyes, Joy was still praying. Sansa rose and placed a hand on Joy’s shoulder. The girl opened her eyes and smiled widely at her.

“Sansa.”

“I’m glad to see you Joy. The tourney will begin soon. You should prepare.”

The dress Joy wore wasn’t really fit for such an event. Being a bastard, Joy never had the same privileges than the other members of House Lannister. She lived at Casterly Rock, had her own handmaiden and was with the rest of the family in private events, but in public events she was always set aside. As a consequence, she wasn’t given as much as the other Lannisters. Tyrion and Sansa had changed that not long after they arrived. Joy began to sit with all the other Lannisters in public events. She also took some dinners with them. Sansa prayed with her in the Stone Garden. Joy now had two handmaidens in her service like the other cousins of Tyrion, and her wardrobe expanded considerably. Sansa herself saw to that.

Sansa followed Joy to her personal chamber. It was a comfortable chamber, better provided than her own chamber at Winterfell, but far less than the rooms she shared with Tyrion. Her two handmaidens took care to make her wear a lavish red gown with golden strings and a necklace with amethysts. When they were done Sansa looked at the result. Joy was very lovely this way. No one who would see her for the first time would suspect she was a bastard. That wouldn’t be the first question to come to their mind.

“Please, leave us,” Sansa ordered to the two servants. They left.
Sansa and Joy were alone now. Joy was looking at her gown in wonderment. She never wore something so expansive or beautiful. It was made two months ago, but she never had an opportunity to wear it up to now.

“You’re very beautiful, Joy.”

The little girl smiled at her. “Thank you, Sansa.” That was the kind of little sister she had wanted when she lived at Winterfell. She always wished Arya was sweet and lovely like her, though now she would give anything for her little sister to put sheep’s shit inside the mattress of her bed. She knew it was shit and not shift now. Joy ran to hug her a moment. Sansa returned the hug.

“Sit, Joy. I need to tell you something.” Sansa sat in a chair and Joy did the same before her. “Joy, there will be a boy at the tourney. His name is Rollam. Rollam Westerling. He’s the son of Lord Westerling. I would like you to spend some time with him today.”

Joy didn’t seem to understand. “Why?”

Sansa smiled sadly at Joy. She couldn’t tell her the truth. Tyrion was very clear about it. “His brother died during the Red Wedding. The Westerlings fought for the Starks during the last war, and his brother died at the Twins, just like my brother and my mother. His sisters couldn’t come with him and he’ll be alone. I thought you could give him some company. Does it bother you?”

Joy’s face turned a little sad when Sansa had told everything. She nodded. “No. I’ll spend time with him.”

Sansa smiled kindly at the little girl. “Thank you, Joy. Come now. I can’t be late for my own name day.”

Joy’s face turned happy again. She followed Sansa to the Lion’s Mouth where the carriage was waiting for them. Sansa chose three other women to accompany her in the carriage a few days ago. The three women in question were Joy, already with her, Cerenna and Myrielle. Cerenna’s sister changed her behavior towards Sansa in the months following her arrival. She didn’t seem to hate Sansa anymore, though she still remained more distant to her than the others. Sansa chose her because she was Cerenna’s sister, but also in the hope it would show Myrielle she had absolutely nothing against her.

