"We don't need him. Since my brother refuses to be Lord of Casterly Rock, this means I am my father's heir. Send a raven to the Rock and tell that I am their lady now. From this day on, men and women will be equal in succession. The first child will be the heir, no matter if it's a boy or a girl." This way she would even stand before Jaime as Lord Tywin's heir. Successions already worked that way in Dorne, and she never understood why it didn't work the same in the rest of the Seven Kingdoms. But now, she was the queen, and if she wanted to be Lady of Casterly Rock at the same time, she bloody well could be. No one could stop her.

"What about Lord Tyrion? He will oppose this."

"Put a reward on his head. Make it a hundred thousand golden dragons for whoever brings me his head. And send a raven to Winterfell. Warn his officers and soldiers of the reward and that I strip him of all his titles. Strip also his wife and their daughter. Offer fifty thousand for Sansa and their child." When Tyrion's men... her men, would learn how much she offered for his death, they would turn against him immediately and fight for their real lady. And if they didn't, then she had nothing to lose.

"Since we are on the matters of money, your Grace, we should concern ourselves with that. There isn't enough left even for the reward you placed on your brother, his wife and their daughter. We don't even have enough to pay the gold cloaks."

"Casterly Rock is full of gold. It will provide everything we need."

"Maybe, but in the meantime, we barely have anything. To bring gold from Casterly Rock will take time."

"Don't worry, Qyburn. I know where to find gold. Any news from Casterly Rock?" She sent a raven there after she was crowned to have all the men the Westerlands could provide to come here in King's Landing.

"No reply yet, your Grace. It takes some time for a raven to go and come back."

"I know." Then she would wait. "In the meantime, keep the gates of the Red Keep closed. No one is to enter or leave the castle without my permission."
"As you wish, your Grace." She stood up, making it clear that their meeting was over, but Qyburn had something else to tell her. "Your Grace, it may be too soon for that kind of measures, but if we lack any fund in the near future, a possible temporary solution could be to persuade some of the few wealthy merchants and lords in King's Landing to change their will in your favor just before they die. We could begin with a few ones, to not bring too much attention, then proceed at a larger scale later."

Cersei waved her hand in the air. "Do as you like. You may dispose of these men as you like afterwards, for your experiments." That's not as if anyone in King's Landing could love her anyway, or could hate her more than they already did. Cersei knew she would always be despised. Let them hate me as long as they fear me. She would make them fear her, always, and they would respect her and fear her more than they ever feared or respected her lord father.

She went to her chambers, accompanied by Ser Boros Blount. He may be the worst swordsman in the Queensguard, but at least he was loyal. The same couldn't be said of most of his former colleagues. Cersei had removed Alyn Stackspear, Arys Oakheart and Balon Swann. Cersei had named three men from Jaime's troops, Cedric Lantell, Arwyn Myatt and Aeron Foote, to replace them. Jaime had complained that she couldn't remove the kingsguards as she pleased like that. Of course, she could. Jaime should consider she was merciful to these men, all traitors or incompetents, when she decided to keep them alive as hostages instead of giving them to Qyburn for his experiments. She may use them to make their houses think twice before rebelling against her. If they rebelled all the same, then she would show them that a Lannister always pays her debts.

"Bring me the prisoner," she told the queensguard, and he went to do as he was told immediately.

Cersei poured herself a cup of Arbor Gold and walked to the balcony. Down below, she could see the whole city, or more precisely the part of the city that was left. Qyburn had done a very good job with Varys's former little birds. Everything around the main street was blown up by the explosions, and a great part of the city was gone as well in the fire that spread. Rain wasn't strong enough to extinguish wildfire. Flea Bottom was gone, and good riddance. It was a good thing as well that the Great Sept was entirely destroyed. It would make everyone understand that gods couldn't force the crown to kneel, and that the crown didn't need the gods. However, there were more serious losses. The Guildhall of the Alchemists had been destroyed. Why did those fools place themselves so close to the Great Sept? They couldn't produce wildfire anymore. Qyburn said they still had several caches, but it wouldn't last forever. There were also the walls. Large sections were gone, including all the gates. They wouldn't be able to defend the city from the battlements. Cersei already kept most of her men inside the Red Keep and only opened its gates to let patrols in and out. The Red Keep should be well defended enough with the men she had. Her enemies couldn't hope to besiege her so easily among all these ruins.

Cersei would rebuild this city, larger and more beautiful than before, and this time she wouldn't allow the usual scum to build their homes like they wanted. Only those she authorized would come to live here, and the city would consist of mansions and palaces with paved streets, not of hovels and muddy alleys. The gold of Casterly Rock would allow her to shape it the way she wanted.

That wasn't her main concern for now, however. She had to deal with her enemies first. The Tyrells, the Martells, the Starks, they would all pay for their treachery. Once the Greyjoys would plunder the Reach and Dorne and that she would have Casterly Rock, she would have everything she needed to get her revenge.

Ser Boros came back at this moment, the shackles clicking as his prisoner moved. He was all dirty like the late High Sparrow now, and looked much humbler than the last time. Pride and smirk had left his face and he looked thinner than before, which said a lot since he was already very slim at the beginning. Still, he seemed to have enough pride left to look at her straight in the eyes.

"Ser Boros, make him show the respect a queen deserves," she ordered.

Without any hesitation, Ser Boros Blount kicked the thin man's leg and he collapsed on the floor, then the knight punched him in the face with his iron gauntlet. Blood came out of the mouth.

"Leave us, ser." The queensguard had done everything he was needed for. Cersei was now alone with the former Master of Coin. "You've looked better in the past, Lord Baelish."

Lysa Arryn's widower looked at her, blood still running on his lips. "If you want me dead, you might as well kill me now. I'm in no state to resist."

Cersei laughed. "Kill you now? Certainly not. If I wanted you dead, I would leave you in Qyburn's hands. He needs a lot of people for his experiments. You would make a fine addition to his subjects." Right now, Qyburn was experiencing with all the members of Margaery's household who weren't highborn enough or who were of House Tyrell.

"I have no doubt about it. I could hear the previous subjects scream from my cell," he said, humourless.

"No doubt, indeed." However, she may still find some utility to Littlefinger. "But you've been a great help to my family in the past. Perhaps you can still be useful."

She saw the glimmer of hope in his eyes. "How might I be useful?"

"First, by telling me how you happened to bring Arya Stark to Roose Bolton."

He didn't show any sign of surprise. "I never brought her there."

"That's not what Sansa Stark is saying." She read the letter that arrived with Baelish to King's Landing. She knew the accusations against him.

"Sansa Stark believes what she wants to believe, your Grace. I'm afraid your brother told her about my… participation to Lord Stark's demise, and as a consequence she started to imagine all types of crime against me. When we met at White Harbor, she had gone completely mad. She looked very much like her aunt."

So that was who Sansa became. Good. "My brother might have made her believe that you were the cause of all her ordeals. Considering the lies you told Catelyn Stark, who couldn't understand his motives?"

"A regretful accident, his arrest," he said. Cersei regretted less the arrest than the fact Tyrion escaped alive from the Eyrie.

"Was the dagger used against Bran Stark really his?"

"To my knowledge, yes. He gave the dagger to an assassin without telling anyone else."

She smiled. That was what she needed. "Good. As for Ser Dontos Hollard, do you believe he could have been working for the Tyrells when he tried to abduct Sansa Stark?"

"It's a clear possibility. If you allowed me to investigate the matter, I could bring you the necessary elements to prove their involvement."

"Very well. Sansa Stark is mad and blames you for everything that happened to her and her family, my brother Tyrion tried to murder a child of ten in his bed, and the Tyrells tried to kidnap a prisoner of the Crown to marry her to Ser Loras and gain a claim on the North this way."

"It is well summarized, your Grace." His smirk had come back.

"At least, that's the truth we will tell if you keep devoting yourself to your queen."

"Of course, your Grace."

"Then in this case, you must know that the Crown is in dire need of money. You will give everything you have, every golden dragon, every silver stag, to the last copper coin, to the Crown."

She saw an hesitation on his face. "I would, if I could, but if I am to serve the Crown the best I can, I will need some money to maintain my network of informers and spies and give you what you want."

"And what is it that I want?" she asked him, as if he knew what she wanted.

"Your brother's head. The death of Tyrion Lannister." Her smile left her face. He knew her better than she thought. She didn't like to be seen through, but on the other side…

"How?" she asked.

"I still have friends, allies, contacts, men among the lords of the Vale and their households. I can use them, but I will need some means in order to achieve our goals. Without gold, it will be impossible to obtain your brother’s death."

Cersei thought about it for a moment. Littlefinger had been able to deliver Ned Stark to her, and he brought the Tyrells to their side at Blackwater. He was ambitious, cunning, and thought highly of himself. He was also prickly. With the right promises, he would do as she told.

"My little brother once promised you Harrenhal, which we granted to you, but he also promised you the Riverlands as well, didn't he?"

"He did. I'm afraid not all Lannisters always pay their debts."

"I do. I will give you the Riverlands, You'll have Harrenhal and Riverrun. We will forget about your past actions against the Crown's interests… if you bring me my brother's head, his wife's head, and the small body of their dead daughter. Am I clear?"

"Of course. I live to serve."

"Good. Then you will bring all your riches here to be disposed by the Crown at its will."

She caught him by surprise. "But I thought…"

"You thought wrong. You will give everything you have to your queen. In exchange, I will give you back your position as Master of Coin and let you use the Crown's money to fulfill the objectives I gave you. I will even grant you the reward I placed on Tyrion and Sansa's heads when you bring them to me. If you refuse, you'll be given to Qyburn as a specimen, for treason. You have ten seconds to decide."

He used the ten seconds, but at the end, he complied. "Yes, your Grace."

"Good. I was sure we could find an agreement."

"May I beg for these chains to be removed?" He raised his arms to emphasize his meaning, his shackles still rattling.

"Ser Boros!" she called. The knight opened the door. "Remove his chains to Petyr Baelish, Master of Coin, and bring him to his apartments. Position four guards before his doors and make sure they follow him everywhere."

"Yes, your Grace," he said. He took a key from his pocket and began to remove Littlefinger's shackles.

"Lord Baelish, remember that you said you were loyal to the Crown," she warned him. "If I ever find out that you lied, you will meet an end worse than everything you can imagine."

"Your Grace." He bowed and left, roughly escorted by Ser Boros.

Cersei was alone. This day exhausted her. There were so many problems. She wished she didn't have to expect traitors at every corner, but that was power. She wouldn't give it away. That was all she had now.

She filled a new cup of wine for herself, and swigged it. Then she filled her cup again and repeated the process. She had discovered these past weeks why Tyrion and Robert drank so much. It helped to forget, up to a point. She needed to drink whenever she thought of her children. This way she wouldn't think about them for too long. She emptied cup after cup, allowing her mind to be washed from every thought she could have of Joffrey, Tommen or Myrcella. She couldn't think about them. It would only make her weak. Yet, she couldn't help but think about them. Joffrey, strong, courageous, poisoned by cowards the day of his marriage. Myrcella, beautiful, good from the very moment she came into the world, murdered by Dornish scum. Tommen, sweet, innocent, frail. She couldn't forget them. They were her children. Still, she had to try. She couldn't rule as a mother. She had to rule as a queen. She had to rule like her father would have ruled. No, she had to rule better than her father ever did.

She was in the Throne Room, kneeling before the dead bodies of her children. Huge tears kept rolling from her eyes. Shadows were dancing around her. She knew who these shadows were. One was her friend Melara, another was Margaery, one was her brother, and the shadows of the High Sparrow, the two High Septons who came before him, Harys Swyft, Selwyn Tarth turned around her. There were many other shadows, but she didn't recognize them. She tried to ignore them, but they kept coming closer. She called for her Queensguard, for Jaime, for her father, for her mother to save her, but no one came. A great shadow came. The great shadow of the valonqar loomed over her. Someone took her from behind, almost gently, and wrapped his arms around her neck. Then life choked from her.

She woke up, panting and sweating like every night. She made the same dream all the time now. The valonqar shall wrap his hands about your pale white throat and choke the life from you. A man stood before her with a candle. Cersei was about to take anything at hand to kill him before he strangled her, but he spoke before.

"Forgive me, your Grace." It wasn't the valonqar. He was much too tall, and it wasn't his voice. The valonqar was far away, in the North.

"What is it, Qyburn?" she asked angrily. She was in her bed. She didn't remember climbing into it.

"We just received a raven, your Grace."

"Couldn't it wait the morning?"
"Maybe, but I thought you would want to know. It was from Casterly Rock. The Ironborn attacked Lannisport. Your family's fleet has been destroyed, and the city was plundered. It's been destroyed."

Chapter End Notes

For Cersei's government, I got a lot of inspiration from the Roman emperor Nero, known for his madness. He forced rich people all around the empire to commit suicide, but not before forcing them to make a will by which they gave everything they owned to the emperor. After a fire that destroyed more than half the city of Rome, he built for himself a huge palace that almost caused the ruin of the Empire, so much that he was suspected to have started the fire to give him the necessary space to build his palace. The words "Let them hate me as long as they fear me" come from another Roman Emperor known for his madness, Caligula. I think the comparison between Cersei and these historical characters is quite appropriate, considering her latest actions.

TYRION XXVIII

Tyrion gasped, breathing the air around the crack of his wife's neck. Sansa didn't put any perfume since she arrived in Winterfell, but it didn't matter. Truth be told he preferred her natural scent. She was panting as well from the effort they just made. They needed to do some catch-up after all the time they spent away from each other. Gods, he missed her.

"I see being a father didn't make you less of a pervert," Sansa told him between two quick breaths. "Neither motherhood did for you," he replied. He was rewarded by the sight of his wife blushing. He loved to see her cheeks turn red. He leaned forward to kiss her. Gods, she was sweet. Their kiss lingered. He didn't want to break it, not when he had his wife for him all alone. Still, they had to break it at a given moment.

"We should get up," Sansa said in a hushed voice. He didn't have the impression that she wanted to. He kissed her one more long time. In these moments, he could forget all the problems they had. Sansa didn't break it, and they just enjoyed the joining of their lips for a very long time. He was the one to end their kiss this time, and all the troubles came back to his mind immediately.

"I'm afraid you're right." He kissed her one last time, lightly, then got up, wishing he could spend more time with his wife.

"And I thought it would all be over when we would take Winterfell," Sansa complained. She got up too and began to prepare for the day, telling the guards to ask for her handmaiden at the door. "When will that war end?"

"Once we've taken care of Cersei," Tyrion replied, "and of the Greyjoys, of course," he added on an even darker tone.

To learn that Tommen had died was already hard, as well as the uncertainty surrounding Jaime's situation, but the recent news that Lannisport was destroyed didn't make things better for Tyrion. He hoped no one in his family died in the attack. Genna's raven gave no detail about it, only that the whole city was sacked by the Iron Fleet and the new self-proclaimed king of the Iron Islands, Euron Greyjoy, and that their fleet was all gone but a few useless ships that needed so much repairs that it would be cheaper to rebuild them from scratch.

Tyrion wondered if the city would have resisted better if he didn't leave for the North. He let the city in the shadow of the Rock burn, just like his father did. The history was repeating itself, but worse this time. Fifteen years ago, he saw the Greyjoy fleet attack Lannisport, but they only had time to burn the Lannister fleet. The city itself wasn't quite touched. He could still remember the smell of the burning sailors and ships. This time, however, the Ironmen plundered Lannisport. The destruction wasn't limited to the docks. They should have taken care of the Iron Islands long ago, but it seemed the invasion was delayed by the war against Dorne and some of his sister's foolish decisions. With Tommen and Margaery's deaths, the alliance between his house and the Tyrells was dead. Tyrion lost his fleet and he couldn't rely on the Redwynes anymore to do anything against the Iron Islands.

"I'm sorry for Lannisport," Sansa said, as if reading his mind. "Do you think it was a mistake to kill Theon? We could have used him to bargain with his people."

"We couldn't know," Tyrion reassured her. "The Redwynes were supposed to take the Iron Islands with the help of our fleet, but they didn't. We couldn't foresee that, and after everything Theon Greyjoy did, and what Ramsay did to him, I don't think the Ironborn would have given him much value. If Cersei hadn't decided to mess everything, none of this would have happened."

The information they had about the events that took place in King's Landing were still unclear, but it seemed the Great Sept of Baelor went in flames. It blew up. Tyrion knew only one thing that could make the Great Sept go in such a way. Wildfire. Cersei was among the few who knew of the stocks of wildfire there were in the capital. Tyrion already knew the fanatics had arrested Lady Margaery, her brother and Cersei. It couldn't be a coincidence that Cersei was the only one to survive the explosion. The Sparrows were fanatics who believed in the Seven. Fanatics wouldn't destroy the holy places of their gods. Cersei was behind this. She was the one to have Margaery and Loras Tyrell die. Tommen may have been killed by the Sparrows like she pretended, but there was no way to verify it, and Tyrion knew better than to believe a single word of his sister. If Tommen was killed by the Sparrows, Tyrion wouldn't be surprised if theydid it in reprisals to the destruction of the Great Sept of Baelor. Somehow, Tyrion could feel it, Cersei had played a role in Tommen's death. He didn't believe a single moment Cersei was the one to kill Tommen, or that she ordered his death, and that she wanted it. For all her flaws, his sister loved her children. However, he thought it was very likely that Cersei's actions led to the death of his last nephew. Tyrion was trying to know about Jaime's situation, but so far he got no answer. News travelled slowly.

"We have to get rid of her," Sansa said. "We won't be safe as long as she lives. This time, she must die."

"I agree." Cersei may be of his blood, but she had gone too far. No one would want her to live now, anyway.

"She killed Margaery." His wife's voice was filled with sadness and hatred at the same time.

"I'm sorry. I know you were friends." He took her hand to comfort her.

Tyrion didn't know the queen very well, but she was kind with Sansa and with almost everyone. He even owed his life to her in part, for her testimony in his favor at his trial. She would have made a wonderful queen, much better than Cersei ever was. It was a good thing that Joffrey died before he could consummate their marriage. She could have gone through the horrors that were once destined to Sansa. Now she was dead.

"What do you think will happen to the people in her retinue?" Sansa asked.

Tyrion sighed. "Considering how Cersei dealt with your father's household, I don't give them much chance or much time to live."

Sansa closed her eyes. "Many of her cousins attended her, and some were only children. Mira had friends among them."
Tyrion knew that only too well. He surprised Lady Mira Hightower the day after they told everyone at Winterfell that Margaery Tyrell was dead. She was going to the godswood, her eyes all red. He never saw her like that in King's Landing, not even after her father died at the Red Wedding. He had offered her his sympathies when he saw her, but she barely acknowledged his presence. She was probably very close to Margaery Tyrell. Tyrion knew from his sources in the capital that the deceased queen was very close to her handmaidens, and that she considered them as her friends more than servants. Tyrion also suspected that Lady Hightower mourned someone else. Sansa once mentioned a dear friend she had in Lady Margaery's retinue. It may be the other handmaiden he surprised with her drinking wine long ago. He wished the northern lady was still at Winterfell. She and Sansa could have helped each other through this, but all the Forresters left a few days after Jon Snow was declared King in the North, when news arrived that their brother had freed Ironrath. He was now marching on Highpoint, and probably besieging it. Tyrion didn't give much time to live to any Whitehill who could still stand on his feet.

"We should have executed Cersei after we revealed she murdered the king," Tyrion voiced aloud. "Even before that. A lot of pain would have been avoided, and the Seven Kingdoms would have been a far better place."

"Well, she doesn't have long to live. Who will fight for her? Margaery's family will want their revenge on her, and we have the North, the Vale, the Riverlands and the Westerlands on our side," Sansa said.

"Cersei won't remain in power for long. Everyone will find out very soon what she did to get the throne. She has no claim on it, and no powerful ally. Everyone in the Seven Kingdoms wants her head. She will not keep the Iron Throne for long, especially not with the army we sent south."

Tyrion had sent to the Riverlands half his forces with Daven to command them, since he was Lord of Darry. As much as they needed men here in the North to fight the White Walkers and conquer the last strongholds that resisted, they needed to deal with Cersei as quickly as possible. They would be joined by a few forces raised by the Tullys. Tyrion had wanted to send more men in the south, but Jon Snow brought so many with him at the Wall, including all the troops of the Vale, that Tyrion needed to maintain a strong army in the North under his orders. He couldn't send more men from the Westerlands against Cersei either, since they were under the constant threat of the raiders of the Iron Islands. Every man left in the Westerlands was needed to defend the shores.

"Do you think all the other kingdoms will join us?" his wife asked. "Dorne fought against our two families during Robert's Rebellion, and the storm lords… I have no idea which side they will take. Even the Tyrells… Without Margaery, I'm not sure they will want to fight with us."

"The Tyrells are not the ones to worry me the most," Tyrion confessed. "It's the Vale." He exchanged a knowing look with Sansa. They didn't need to say anything. If Littlefinger was still alive, they couldn't be sure of the loyalty of the Vale to Jon Snow. "I think the Tyrells will side with us. So far, we have officially four of the Seven Kingdoms on our side. The Tyrells will never side with someone who might lose, and who else would they side with? Euron Greyjoy, who is most likely to plunder their lands very soon? The Martells, who they fought wars against for centuries? The Stormlands, who have no lord paramount and were spent in the last war? They will want revenge against Cersei. They will make a taciturn alliance with us at least. I'm more worried about their position once Cersei is defeated."

"You think they wouldn't accept Jon as king?"

Tyrion shook his head, more to show he wasn't sure than to show he didn't think it would be the case. "They have no reason to oppose him, but not many reasons to support him either. They would get rid of Cersei this way, but they could decide to push forward someone else once Cersei is gone, though I don't see who. The only other person who has a strong claim on the Iron Throne is on the other side of the Narrow Sea. The Martells could claim the Iron Throne through their Targaryen ancestors, but the Tyrells will never accept them. Your brother… I mean, your cousin, would be the most logical choice for them, but as soon as a better choice would be before them, the Tyrells would choose it immediately. In the long term, I think it's better to give them a reason to stay at Jon Snow's side. And the best way to forge such an alliance is marriage."

"I still believe we should marry Jon to a northern lady. The loyalty of the North is still not sure," Sansa argued.

"He didn't help his cause when he chose you and Arya to rule from Winterfell together while he was out fighting. And the decision to give you the Dreadfort made things worse," he commented dryly.

"You were the one to insist that I got the Dreadfort," Sansa pointed out. "I didn't want it."

"I brought my men in the North, with winter close, with the idea that they were fighting to give Winterfell to their lady," Tyrion explained softly. "I had to get something for you, or else they would believe they fought for nothing, and I may end up with a mutiny. That's not what we need right now."

"We could have waited for the Dreadfort to be taken before announcing it."

"I needed to show my men that they fought for something immediately."

Tyrion knew it hadn't been an ideal solution, but to keep his men on his side, he had no choice but to demand the Dreadfort to Jon Snow. Before the King in the North left for the Wall, he held a reunion of all the lords present at Winterfell and officially granted the Dreadfort to Sansa. He and Tyrion had discussed the details through and through before the announcement. In order to cause fewer discontent among the Northerners, the Dreadfort was specifically and only granted to Sansa, not to her and Tyrion. It wouldn't make much difference in the end, since their children would get the castle and its lands all the same in the end, and they would still be Lannisters, but it gave a slightly better impression. Sansa was still more from the North than Tyrion. This way they would create a new minor branch of House Lannister in the North, one that would be sworn to House Stark of Winterfell.

Tyrion had tried to make things look in the best way possible to the Northerners. Sansa had publicly given up any claim she had on Winterfell, acknowledging Jon as the only true Lord of Winterfell. Their second son would become Lord of the Dreadfort when he came of age. Right now, the castle was besieged by combined forces from the Westerlands and the Riverlands led by Ser Brynden Tully. When it would be taken, the Lord of Winterfell would name a man he trusted to rule the castle until its lord was born and old enough to rule it himself. Jon Snow omitted to mention that although he would name himself the man who would rule the lands dependant of the Dreadfort and that he would be a Northerner, the garrison would be mostly composed of Lannister men. The northern lords didn't need to know it. Another concession to the North would be that at the age of six, the future Lord of the Dreadfort would be fostered at Winterfell. Finally, if he and Sansa never had a second son, one of their daughters would be Lady of the Dreadfort and her husband would be chosen by the Lord of Winterfell. Despite these concessions and compromises, the northern lords were still angry to see one of the main castles in the North being given to Lannisters, especially those who considered they had a claim on the former seat of House Bolton or who hoped Jon Snow may give it to them at the end of the war. Still, they would have been angrier if the fortress and its lands were given to Tyrion and Sansa without any condition.

"We should have gotten Jon betrothed to someone from the North," Sansa insisted. "It would have made things more acceptable for his bannermen. Lady Karstark was open to the possibility. It would have put an end to the feud between House Stark and House Karstark. Even better, we could have betrothed Jon with one of Lord Manderly's granddaughter. It would have ensured their loyalty to us. They are the most powerful house in the North, and we'll need them against the White Walkers."

"It's true, Sansa, we can't be sure of the loyalty of some houses, but most of them believe Jon Snow when he speaks of the White Walkers. This threat should be enough to keep them in line, and their forces are inferior to those we have with the river lords. A marriage with Alys Karstark or Wynafryd Manderly would make his rule more secure in the short run, but if we manage to keep the dead out of the Seven Kingdoms, there will come a day when your… cousin will have to take the Iron Throne." Tyrion still had difficulty to call Jon Snow Sansa's cousin instead of her brother. "When the time comes, a bride from the south will be necessary. Some southern kingdoms will hardly accept a king from the North already married to a northern lady."

"Margaery is dead. Mace Tyrell has no other daughter, and his wife is past the time when she can have other children. Even if, like you think, Lord Tyrell agrees to marry one of his cousins to Jon, it will be a distant cousin. She will be part of the minor branches of House Tyrell."

"I know this alliance will be weaker, Sansa, but the Tyrells are our best hope all the same. The Stormlands are without lord paramount since all the Baratheons are dead. Even Stannis's daughter is gone. And the Martells will never bind their family to a son that Rhaegar Targaryen had with another woman than Elia Martell. The Reach is still our best chance."

They made sure to send letters everywhere through the Seven Kingdoms to make Jon Snow's claim clear to everybody, revealing his true parentage. The letters also accused Cersei of murdering not only Margaery and Loras Tyrell, but also Tommen. Tyrion also wrote to the Lord of Highgarden, telling him that they were ready to fight together to avenge his children's death and promised to bring them Cersei's head for her crimes, but he also subtly pointed out that the family who would swear fealty to Jon Snow the sooner would be considered first for a royal match. By offering him the revenge for his son and his daughter, Tyrion already gave Mace Tyrell enough reason to side with Jon Snow, but the prospect to see a Tyrell, even it she wasn't his daughter, be one day the queen, could destroy the few doubts he would have.

"Furthermore," Tyrion continued, "there's another reason why a marriage between your cousin and a Tyrell would be preferable. It would maintain the stability of the Reach."

"Why?" Sansa frowned.

"The Tyrell's hold on the Reach is not as powerful as the one the Lannisters have on the Westerlands."

"Yes, I remember. There are houses that still see them as up-jumped stewards."

"Quite right. The Oakhearts, the Tarlys, the Florents, the Hightowers, they will all be interested in claiming Highgarden for themselves. House Tyrell lost its heir and its queen in one swift blow and they are completely isolated. Their position is weakened. And now that the Greyjoys have taken everything they could from Lannisport, they will threaten the Reach. The whole kingdom could fall into chaos. That's not something we can allow. We need a stable realm."

"If the Tyrells are in a weak position… perhaps we should arrange a marriage for Jon with another house from the Reach," Sansa said hesitantly. "Mira has contacts at the Hightower, and she says Elys Hightower is of an age with Jon. She is the only daughter of the future lord of the house. She could arrange something for us."
"Eventually, it could be useful, Sansa, but I would rather keep the Reach united, or else your brother might find the Seven Kingdoms impossible to rule by the time he goes to King's Landing. Marrying him to a Hightower will weaken the Tyrells further and bring even more instability. For now, let's wait to see what the Tyrells will do. If they refuse to side with us, we'll look what the other houses in the Reach have to offer."

Sansa nodded. They had discussed about it quite often recently, especially before Jon Snow left. Almost everyone wanted him to marry as quickly as possible. Tyrion suspected the northern lords wanted a new heir to Winterfell, to eliminate Sansa's claim once and for all. The bastard hadn't wanted to marry however. He finally followed Tyrion's proposition, to keep his hand free for a future marriage once the time to take the Iron Throne would come. He even allowed Tyrion to send ravens to Highgarden, making them hope a future betrothal without making any promise. Tyrion didn't have any illusion. Jon Snow agreed with his plan because it allowed him to take no engagement yet, but it followed Tyrion's plans all the same. He would convince Jon Snow of the necessity of getting married later.

In the meantime, other weddings were arranged and other privileges were given by the new king before he left. Highpoint was officially given to Gwyn Whitehill, the wife of Asher Forrester, and Lord Ludd Whitehill was branded a traitor to the North for his collaboration with Ramsay Bolton and his role in the murder of Ethan Forrester. Other bannermen of House Bolton lost lands for taking part in Ramsay's horrible crimes. Jon Snow still allowed them the choice to take the black instead of dying if they surrendered. A marriage was arranged between a grandson of Lord Ryswell and a daughter of Lord Clement Piper. Talia Forrester was officially betrothed to Gawen Glover. Jon Snow gave the fortress of Moat Cailin to House Reed, a symbolic gesture to thank them for fighting the Boltons early in the war. House Mormont was awarded a few territories on the Umber lands.

Now Tyrion was here, at Winterfell while the younger or taller fellows were off to war against the remaining Umber and Bolton forces, or against his sister. Officially, the Stark sisters, Sansa and Arya, were supposed to rule Winterfell together while their cousin and king was out. They sat together in the Great Hall to receive petitioners, but in reality, it was Tyrion and Sansa who truly ruled Winterfell. Tyrion remained in the shadows, but he took a look at the ledgers and advised Sansa on the decisions to take. As for Arya Stark, she was mostly frustrated that she wasn't allowed to follow her brother to the Wall, and she had no interest in ruling. She wasn't interested by that.

Tyrion was left behind to deal with any problem coming from the south, since he had more experience than anyone else to handle the politics of the Realm. So here he was, at Winterfell, waiting for news to come from every part of the Seven Kingdoms and helping Sansa to rule the North while her cousin fought for it. He was proud of Sansa. She managed Winterfell very well. She had nothing to see with the shy girl he saw when he came to Winterfell for the first time.

Sansa's handmaiden came in. "I'll leave you. We see each other later," Tyrion told his wife.

"Good day, Tyrion."

He left her and went to the other room where Podrick helped him to dress for the day, donning clothes that were appropriate for the northern weather in winter. He also paid a visit to his daughter. He always went to see her at the beginning of the day, and at the end of it. Today, she was sleeping, and he didn't want to wake her, so he only looked into her cradle to verify she was well. When Sansa was ready, they went to break their fast in the Great Hall with everyone else, then Tyrion went to see his men, Podrick on his trails.

On his way out, he saw Arya Stark practicing on a dummy in the main courtyard. She was skilled with a sword, he had to admit it, whether it was with the slim blade that Jon Snow gave her or a blunted sword that was like those the men used in battle. Right now she used the latter. Tyrion approached her from behind.

"Is he dead yet?"

She turned swiftly to face him, her sword brandished toward him. Tyrion was glad he kept some distance with his sister-in-law. Some said she was sleeping with her sword, ready to react whenever someone would try to attack her.

"Oh, it's you." She lowered her sword.

"So, is he dead?"

"It's a dummy. It can't die," she replied on a boring tone.

"Well, do you think he would be dead if he was alive?"

She looked at him for a moment, then turned her back on him to start again to hit her false opponent. Arya Stark had stopped hating him, or at least Tyrion hoped that she stopped, but she still despised him. He feared that in her eyes, he would always be a Lannister who took part in her family's destruction, even if he helped to bring the three living Starks left in this world together. Still, he once believed Sansa would always see him as a Lannister and would never come to love him. Now she loved him, and she thought she was more a Lannister than a Stark.

"I never had the chance to learn how to wield a sword," he continued, trying to make some small talk, but Arya Stark kept her back turned on him and kept practicing. "I saw my brother fighting with the other knights in the courtyard, and my cousins do the same, but I couldn't join them." He thought he saw Arya Stark hesitate a little between two strikes, but she resumed as if he said nothing. "At the Battle of Blackwater, I wielded an axe for the first time. At the beginning of the battle, Bronn asked me if I ever used one, and I replied that I chopped wood once. Then I realized that I only watched my brother chopping wood." He thought he heard a little snigger. "I heard you used to put sheep shift into Sansa's bed."

She turned with a large frown. "Sheep shift?"

"She says that's the vulgar word for dung." They looked at each other for a moment, then they both burst into laughs.

"Sansa was always insufferable," her sister said after she regained her seriousness. "I couldn't suffer her. She was boring."

"Well, I know she thought the same about you, except for the boring part, maybe."

"She was always telling me how I should behave, and showing she could dance, and sing, and sew better than me."

"Well, my brother was better at fighting and shooting and riding than me. But I was better whenever it came to use my mind. My brother's weapon was his sword, just like yours, and mine was the mind."

"And Sansa? What is her weapon?" Arya Stark asked in a mocking way.
"Her mind is quite sharp now. And of course she has her beauty."

She scoffed. "Her beauty."

He said something he shouldn't have. How to diffuse the situation without talking to her in an awkward way? Sansa was more beautiful than her sister, for sure. No one could say the opposite. Arya Stark was looking at the pommel of her sword. Finally, Tyrion spoke, choosing his words carefully.

"I think Sansa would have given up her beauty any time when she was Joffrey's prisoner. It got her into more trouble than anything else."

"Aye, I'm sure." Her sister didn't seem convinced at all. "That doesn't seem to bother her, now."

"She is no longer Joffrey's prisoner." His sister-in-law didn't look at him with hostility, but there was no kindness in her eyes either. He saw her back when she killed Ramsay Bolton. "Look, I know you've been through the Seven Hells, but Sansa had her share of them too. What matters now is that you are both safe, and you still have a brother, or a cousin, whatever you like. I only wish you stopped quarreling with each other and started working together instead. My lord father, despite all his flaws, told me one day that Lannisters must stand together, united against their foes, if they are to survive in this world. On that he wasn't wrong. My family is weakened by our quarrels among ourselves, thanks to my sister's repeated attempts to have me killed."

Arya looked at him queerly. "My father told me something like that one day. He told me we had to stick together, that in winter, the lone wolf died, but the pack survived. That we couldn't allow to have a war among ourselves."

Tyrion found it funny. "I wonder what your father would have thought of this, that he agreed with Tywin Lannister on something." The young Stark looked thoughtful. After a moment, Tyrion decided it was time to leave. "Don't try to kill your sister again," he said with a smirk, and he walked away.

He went to the barracks to visit his men. The Lannister army at Winterfell was much smaller than before. Half his men had gone south, where they would be joined by new levies from the Riverlands and the Vale. Most of the others, led by Ser Prester, were gone to the Dreadfort, to claim it for Sansa, along with most of the forces of the Riverlands led by the Blackfish. The men of the Vale, the North and the wildlings were gone with Jon Snow, with the task to make the Last Hearth surrender, then to make it to the Wall, where they would prepare its defenses against the White Walkers. They would have enough to reopen all the castles, hopefully. Only two hundred men stayed behind as a garrison, plus a few from the North and the Vale. They had enough space to house them all. Bronn commanded the garrison.

He found his friend in a corner, drinking, without surprise. "Hello, Bronn."

"Oh, hi."

"How are our men doing?"

"Quite well," he said with a shrug. "It's quiet and warm here, and there aren't as many brawls as when the wildlings were here. Not much action, but it is welcomed after the tensed months we had. Let's hope it will last. If all the armies come back, we'll be back to the start."

"Then let's hope they will stay far away for some time, or that we'll head back south soon." An empty wish.
"That's what the men want. Go back south. Winter is here, and the North is already cold in summer. They spent months here, including a few stuck in the swamps of the Neck. The word that the Greyjoys attacked has spread. Some had family in Lannisport. They want to go back and defend their homes. Or they want to fight Cersei, like you said you wanted, not some imagined white devils."

Tyrion knew that was problematic. The Northerners may believe the White Walkers were back for real for the most, but the men south of the Neck didn't believe it for the most. They saw Jon Snow's march on the Wall as futile. Many, including Daven, Prester and the lords of the Vale, were of an opinion to march south to take back the Iron Throne immediately and place Jon Snow on it. The soldiers thought the same, and they wanted to go home, especially those from the Westerlands and the Riverlands, who spent the last years in war. Everyone was tired of war. What they didn't understand was that, if the Wall fell and the dead invaded Westeros, it wouldn't matter who sat on the Iron Throne. They had to reinforce the Wall first, station enough men to make sure the wights wouldn't get through, then they may eventually all go south.

He spent some time talking with Bronn about the security of Winterfell. Tyrion didn't trust the garrisons of Northerners and Vale men that occupied Winterfell along with his own men. He then went to help the maester verify the granaries and ledgers. It wasn't a job he hated, and it would be crucial with winter there now. It would take time before they were able to get food from the other kingdoms, with the new war coming.

He knew Sansa was holding court right now, but he decided, despite Sansa's objections, that it would be better if he didn't attend the court sessions. Northerners would grind their teeth less, this way, and it may somehow weaken the beliefs that he was using Sansa to rule the North. He was becoming the invisible Lord of Casterly Rock.

The day went on without great incident or event worthy of notice. After the dinner, Sansa went to pray in the godswood. Tyrion began to read in their room, but after a moment he decided to go and see his daughter earlier than usual. He slowly pushed the door that gave way to the chamber where Joanna was sleeping.

"You may go," he told the midwife.

She left with a bow and without a word. Sansa preferred to breastfeed their daughter herself, but with the many responsibilities she had, she sometimes didn't have the time for this, hence the reason they had a midwife. Tyrion knew Sansa wished they had more time to spend together and with Joanna, but they were at war, a war they couldn't lose. They couldn't give all the time they wanted to their child. He used the stool near the cradle to look at his little daughter. Her eyes were wide open. She smiled and agitated her arms towards him when she noticed his presence.

Slowly, still feeling awkward and even stupid whenever he did this, Tyrion took her into his arms. He was always afraid he could drop her by accident whenever he held her. Sansa was much better at this than him. He walked her around the room for a time. She was squealing all the time. She really was beautiful, and he was afraid he could hurt her. If he held her too tightly in the fear to let her fall, he could hurt her all the same. He was never prepared to have children. Finally, he sat on the chair next to the cradle and let her rest on his thighs, her head leaning in the lap of his arm. She kept agitating her hands and Tyrion offered her his fingers to grab, which she did, switching from one to another frantically.

"You're beautiful, you know," he told her. She looked at him, still smiling. "You have the features of my family. I wonder if Cersei looked like you when she was born."
Imagining Cersei as a baby was difficult for him, but she certainly had been one a long time ago. Most of the people were babies at the beginning of their life, at the beginning of their life. He had difficulty to imagine that the person who once was a little girl with blond hair and green eyes had become a cruel and vain bitch.

"My father surely held her in his arms, like I do for you. I'm sure he never held me, the monster who killed his wife. Surely he held your uncle and your aunt. They were his golden children, what he wanted to build his dynasty. He never wanted me. I killed my mother, and you are named after her." He took a pause. Joanna was still grabbing his fingers, though with less excitement than before. "I won't lie to you. You've come into a dangerous world. If you only knew…" Her parents' families had been at war, killing each other for two years. Her grandfather had her grandmother and one of her uncles murdered at a wedding, and one of her cousins beat her mother. "We have dead people who want to kill us all so we would join them. We have your grandmother who wants you dead as well. I can't promise you will have a wonderful life. It would be lying. But I'll do everything to protect you. I won't let anyone hurt you, and if they manage… they will pay. I won't abandon you like my father abandoned me. I will love you until the day I die."

Joanna had strangely grown quieter as Tyrion talked. Perhaps it was the expression on his face. He tried to smile to her again once he was done with his dark thinking aloud, and she smiled immediately, taking his thumb with her small wrist. She was growing, he could see it. She had gained some weight since she arrived. He wished he had been there for her birth. He would be there the next time.

Without realizing it, Tyrion started to sing The Seasons of My Love. After a minute or two, his little daughter was sleeping. Sansa was right. You only needed to sing to get Joanna to sleep. She was a calm child, a very calm one. Tyrion wondered how she would look like when she would grow up. He hoped she would look like Sansa. She didn't have her hair or her eyes, but could she have her face? Her neck? Her cheeks? If she inherited her height from Sansa, which was very likely, she would quickly be taller than him. How would it feel, to have your own children look down on you? There were so many questions running through his mind, questions he never asked himself before, because he never thought he would have children.

He kept whistling, his daughter on his lap, until the door opened and his wife came in. She stopped when she saw him holding Joanna and smiled. "That's not something I see every day. Is she sleeping?" she asked.

"Yes, sorry." Tyrion lowered his voice immediately. He spoke too loudly. "I sang without thinking about it." Sansa laughed sweetly. Tyrion stood up and brought Joanna to her. "I think it's your turn. I held her long enough."

Sansa took Joanna into her arms and admired her. Tyrion was a little envious. He was happy to be a father, especially of such a beautiful little girl, but the disadvantage was that Sansa's attention was no longer only over him. He didn't blame her, and in fact it didn't cause him much problem. The servants took care of Joanna most of the time, and she was so quiet that Sansa seldom had to wake up in the night to see how Joanna was. They still had most of their nights for them alone. Still, there were moments he was almost jealous of his daughter and the attention she received from her mother. He would have to learn to live with the fact that he was no longer the only object of attention of his wife.

Sansa kept her daughter into her arms, walking slowly all around the room, managing to not wake her up. Tyrion only stood there, watching them. He loved to look at Sansa, and to look at his daughter too, so to look at both of them was even better. Sometimes Sansa shot him a smile, sweet and wicked at the same time, but her focus quickly returned to Joanna every time.
There was a knock on the door. "My lord, Maester Wolkan needs a word. He said he received an urgent message. From the Wall." Podrick kept his voice down from the other side of the door. His squire never forgot to be careful around Joanna.

Tyrion stood up and, with one last smile at Sansa that she returned, he walked without a noise to the door, silently opened and closed it. Podrick was there with Wolkan. They allowed him to remain Maester of Winterfell, after determining he only served Ramsay because he was forced to and even tried to prevent him from committing certain atrocities.

"My lord, please forgive me," the old maester said. "We received a raven from Castle Black, addressed to the king." The ravens addressed to the king were directed to Sansa since he wasn't there.

"I'll take it."

The maester gave it to Tyrion without reluctance. He was one of the few in the North to not show any disdain towards the Lannisters. Perhaps he thought there couldn't be anything worse after the Boltons. Wolkan walked away and Tyrion unrolled the small paper.

Podrick yawned. "Are you tired, Podrik? You can go to sleep. We already have four guards at our doors." Tyrion began to read.

"Very well, my lord. Is there anything you need me to do for tomorrow? My lord?"

Podrik asked the latter because Tyrion hadn't answered him. The Starks had a gift to make him speechless. He burst into the room, slamming the door.

"Be careful, you're going to wake her up!" Sansa protested immediately.

Tyrion ignored her protest. "Sansa, they found him. They found your brother. Bran."

Chapter End Notes

I must warn you that sadly, we won't get to see Tyrion and Sansa for a while. The reason is simple, there are too many events happening in multiple storylines. Several characters took different paths once more (Jon is going back to the Wall, Mira to Ironrath, Asher is at Highpoint, Cersei and Jaime are in King's Landing, Daenerys/Trystane/Kinvara are coming to Westeros but landing in different places, and there's the survivor of the Great Sept as well). The next few chapters are mostly setup chapters for all the storylines, before the real action begins. To be honest, I'm eager to be done with these chapters so I can write and publish the events to which the whole story is leading. Battles are coming, and they're coming everywhere. Tyrion and Sansa will return as more proeminent POV after the setup is done.

Daenerys comes back home.

DAENERYS IV

A blow of wind struck her hard in the face, but she didn't flinch. It was nothing compared to how it hit her when she rode Drogon, and she managed to stay on his back in two battles. Daenerys Targaryen could claim her first victory in Westeros a few hours ago when they met the fleet of Dragonstone. It was a small fleet, just like hers, but she had dragons. Just like in Meereen, that was all she needed. She flew against the enemy with her three children and burned three ships at the front of their little armada, then three more at the rear. The battle didn't last long. Of the thirty ships their enemies had, she captured ten, sunk more and only a few escaped. She didn't lose a single ship.

Now she was waiting on the deck on her command ship, looking at the small boat slowly approaching. She sent the captain of the ship to the island two hours ago to ask whoever commanded the garrison of Dragonstone to come for a parley on her ship. She wouldn’t go on an enemy territory. She didn’t trust them to hold their promises. Now the boat that left with the captain was coming back.

“When I left, Dragonstone was being held by Ser Atos Myatt, a knight in service of House Lannister. Initially, he was to hold it until the time Prince Trystane and Princess Myrcella were to claim it. He may still be the one leading its garrison,” Lord Varys explained.

Myrcella Baratheon would never hold Dragonstone now that she was dead. “No matter who’s leading now, he will have to bend the knee.”

“Indeed, it would be in his interest.”

She always gave a chance to surrender to her enemies. However, if they refused to surrender, they were to face her wrath, like the masters in Essos. She knew nothing of House Myatt, except that they were bannermen to the Lannisters. After some reflection, Daenerys had come to the decision that she would give a chance to the Lannisters, to the Starks, to the Baratheons and to whoever had fought against her father to surrender to her rule and proclaim her queen. If they refused, she would burn their castles and place people she trusted to rule their territories, but only if they refused to acknowledge her as their queen. After all, the leaders of the rebellion who destroyed her family were all dead. Robert Baratheon, Tywin Lannister, Eddard Stark, Jon Arryn, they were all gone. It was their children now who held their castles and their lands, and if Daenerys couldn’t hold children responsible for their parents’ crimes back in Meereen, she couldn’t do it either. She would never forget the wrongs committed against her family, but she wouldn’t make innocents pay for that. Still, there were some she would have no choice to execute. Varys believed there would be no way to keep Cersei Lannister alive. There was also her brother, the Kingslayer, who murdered her father. As for the other brother, the actual Lord of Casterly Rock, she would see. She would probably have to fight against him if she killed his brother and sister. Varys seemed uncertain when it came to the usurper, Tommen Baratheon, but didn’t believe he would be allowed to surrender by his advisors.

The boat was close now. Daenerys could distinguish its occupants. The captain, a Dornishman in the thirties, was accompanied by the oarsmen and another man in red armor. If the colors were any indication, Daenerys assumed he was serving the Lannisters. She thought she remembered seeing a few men wearing a similar outfit during the battle.

“Is that him?” she asked.

“Possibly, your Grace. He’s wearing a Lannister armor, after all,” Varys answered.

“Are all Lannisters wearing the same armor?”

“Similar ones, yes. The lords and the knights at least, and their commanders, of course. Most of their infantrymen as well, though not the archers. They are more lightly armored. And of course the sellswords following their armies are dressed differently.”

The boat came close to the hull of the ship and a ladder was thrown to allow the men inside to climb on board. Daenerys had her closest advisors with her for these negotiations, the first she would make with Westerosi. She negotiated with Essosi quite often, but never with men from her country. She tried to maintain a self-assured appearance, but in truth she was nervous. Dragonstone was carved with magic, her brother once told her, and she wasn’t sure that dragon flame could tame it. If the garrison refused to surrender, they might lose precious time besieging the island, time that could allow the usurper to send reinforcements. The troubles in the Stormlands could keep him occupied for a time, but between a threat in the neighborhood of the capital and another one far away, Daenerys had no difficulty to imagine what his choice might be.

As the man in red armor climbed the ladder into her ship, Daenerys looked at her advisors. Lord Varys was in retreat, behind her. Kinvara seemed calm as well. Grey Worm wasn’t present, nor was Prince Trystane or Ser Jorah Mormont. They were leading the operations in the Stormlands. Hopefully, they would take the castle of the Baratheons before she joined them. When they neared Westeros, they divided their forces in two, the biggest part heading for the Stormlands while a smaller force headed for Dragonstone where she would claim back her family’s possession. The island belonged to her family. Her mother named her Princess of Dragonstone at her birth, after her father died, and the castle was shaped by the first Targaryens who came from Valyria.

The Dornish captain came, followed by the red knight, and bowed before her. “Your Grace, this is Ser Atos Myatt, commander of the garrison of Dragonstone.”

It seemed Varys’s information was still actual. Daenerys eyed the knight closely. He didn’t bow to her. He simply lowered his head for a moment, his helmet under his arm. He looked back straight at her, but she could see he was nervous. Over her head, Drogon screamed.

“You stand before Daenerys Stormborn of the House Targaryen, the First of Her Name, the Unburnt, Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, Lady of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm, Queen of Meereen, Khaleesi of the Great Grass Sea, Breaker of Chains and Mother of Dragons,” a man she chose as her herald announced. She missed Missandei.

“Your Grace.” The knight acknowledged her title by lowering his head again. “I come here in peace at your demand and I am ready to listen to whatever you have to say. However, if you would allow me, I have some things to say first.”

“As you wish. Say what you want,” Daenerys replied. She would let him speak first, let him reveal his intentions before she revealed hers.
“I have no wish to see any of my men die. More than enough of them have died in the wars that just ended and they’re all tired of fighting. But I have orders to hold Dragonstone for the king. I ask you to turn around and go back to Essos. I will speak for you to the king and to my liege lord and do everything I can to convince them to leave you alone. I can’t promise you I will succeed, but I believe they will be ready to consider your incursion on our shores as a simple raid that could be settled by a treaty. This is my offer, but I’m ready to negotiate if that is your wish.”

Daenerys wasn’t that surprised by the offer. Just like the Wise Masters of Yunkai, this man was trying to send her away so they wouldn’t have to fight her. They should know better. “I’m afraid I must decline your proposition. The Iron Throne belongs to me, as it belonged to my father before, and his father before him. I was born to rule the Seven Kingdoms, and I will rule the Seven Kingdoms. You can either bend the knee immediately and swear fealty to me, or you can die fighting for an usurper who would never fight or die for you.”

She could see the fear in the knight’s eyes, although he tried to dissimulate it. “Your Grace, this is not something I can accept. My house has served House Lannister loyally for centuries. Until Lord Lannister bends the knee to you, I cannot turn against the king he serves.”

“This king is already dead. If the Lannisters keep fighting for him, they will be doomed, and so will be any house who will follow them, including yours.”

“Maybe, but no one knows what the future holds for us, your Grace, and I received orders from the lord I swore to serve. And he ordered me to keep this island for the king.”

“Tommen Baratheon doesn’t have a long reign ahead, good ser,” Lord Varys intervened. “His uncle is far in the North with most of his forces and he is losing what support he has in the south. Our little armada here is but a small portion of our forces. With the dragons at our side, fighting for the usurper is foolish. You stand before your rightful queen. Kneel, and she will let you live.”

Ser Myatt looked at eunuch for a moment. “It seems you are unaware of the recent events. Tommen Baratheon is dead.”

The surprise Daenerys felt was soon replaced with joy. Things were going even better than she thought. “Then it seems you have no usurper to fight for,” Daenerys said.

“I serve another king, your Grace.”

“May we know who this king is?” the Spider asked.

“I serve Jon Snow, the King in the North, and the King of Westeros.”

Daenerys had never heard of him. That name was entirely unknown to her. She looked at Varys who answered indirectly. “I find it strange that Lord Tyrion Lannister decided to follow the bastard son of Eddard Stark, and even more that he proclaimed him king for all Westeros.”

“Jon Snow is not the son of Eddard Stark. He is the rightful heir to the Iron Throne.” He took a piece of paper in his pants. “This is the declaration of my lord for the king.”

After a moment of hesitation, Daenerys made a sign to a servant to bring her the paper. Tyrion Lannister, the Lord of Casterly Rock, announced that he declared Jon Snow, the son of Rhaegar Targaryen and Lyanna Stark, born at the Tower of Joy at the end of the usurper’s war, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms. He also gave the order to the garrison of Dragonstone to hold the island and its attendant territories for their new king against any other person who would fight for someone else.

Daenerys handed the message to Varys, keeping her eyes on the knight. “This is an outright lie,” she declared.

“It is not my place to say if my lord is lying or telling the truth. I am loyal to House Lannister.”

“Your loyalty goes first to my house as the rightful rulers of the Seven Kingdoms, and the Lannisters betrayed my house. They rebelled against the Crown, broke their oaths. You serve oathbreakers and kingslayers.”

“With all your respect, your Grace, my family served the Lannisters before your family came to Westeros. We served them when they were King of the Rock, we kept serving them under your house’s rule, we continued to serve them after you were gone and we will continue to serve them no matter who proclaims himself, or herself, king or queen.”

Wasn’t he afraid? She could see he was, but he didn’t flinch. He didn’t give any sign that he would bend the knee before her. “I give you a chance to live to you and your men. You said you didn’t want them to die. I give you a choice between life and death. What do you choose?”

A silence followed. Daenerys looked at the man. Why did he want so badly to die for a house who murdered children when she offered him the chance to live? Even the slave masters weren’t that determined. When they saw everything was lost, they begged her to let them live and accepted whatever condition she imposed on them. Would that man change his mind when the castle of Dragonstone would burn?

“Your Grace, maybe we could discuss this in private, away from prying ears,” Kinvara suggested.

“I agree. Stay here, ser. We will decide what to do of you.”

She walked away, followed by her two advisors. When the door of the cabin closed, she went to sit, gathering her thoughts.

“This man is stupid,” the High Priestess stated, as if she was giving a sentence. “He thinks that by remaining loyal to a house his family served for years, this makes him worthy or honorable.”

“Some men value themselves through loyalty,” the eunuch said.

“That doesn’t make them less stupid. Being loyal to a man only because your father was loyal to him or his father before him is as foolish as to keep following gods because your forebears followed them.”

“It helps to maintain stability in the country.”

“Is it true?” Daenerys cut their argument. Varys and Kinvara didn’t like each other, and right now she didn’t need any of their quarrelling. “What this man says about Jon Snow, being my… nephew?”

The eunuch cleared his throat. “I had no access to any information going in that sense, your Grace, and I can tell you I know most of what is going on in Westeros. I didn’t know Tommen Baratheon was dead because we spent the last months at sea and my little birds in the West take more time to bring me news when I’m in the East.”

“Most certainly. Eddard Stark proclaimed the boy his before the entire world. I don’t see any reason why he would lie about this. I never saw Jon Snow, but from what my little birds are telling me, he is the very image of his father. I highly doubt he has any link with your family.”

“This is quite a great lie all the same,” Kinvara remarked.

“Indeed, but we must admit the lie was pretty well used. Tyrion Lannister must be behind the idea. I don’t believe he would turn against his nephew. He always seemed fond of Tommen. However, if he’s dead, then Cersei Lannister most likely took control of King’s Landing, and she and Lord Tyrion hate each other. Tyrion Lannister is a good man, but he’s not afraid of lying when necessary. During the war, he had the High Septon tell everyone in King’s Landing that Stannis Baratheon would burn the Great Sept of Baelor if he took the city. Perhaps he wasn’t wrong about it, but we had nothing to lead us to think that Stannis was actually planning this. Still, this is a well concocted lie. It is true that Ned Stark’s bastard son was born at the end of Robert’s Rebellion, and we don’t know who his mother is. What I find strange, however, is that Tyrion Lannister chose the Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch as king. There is no precedent of a brother of the Night’s Watch forsaking his vows without being executed.”

The eunuch said the two last sentences with a different tone. He looked lost in his thoughts. “My brother never had any child with Lyanna Stark. She died during the war. This is only a lie, and I will defeat Jon Snow when the time comes. For now, we must focus on taking King’s Landing, and to take King’s Landing I need Dragonstone,” Daenerys said.

“I agree. Dragonstone must fall, but Ser Atos Myatt will not surrender it, not if it means bending the knee to a queen the Lannisters oppose.”

“Can the dragons take it? I never saw that kind of stone before, and it was made by the Valyrians. Can we take it without heavy losses?”

The Spider pursed his lips. “I wouldn’t place a bet on it. It is possible that the beasts could frighten the men inside, but we can’t be sure. And Dragonstone has scorpions on its battlements. One projectile well placed and one of the dragons could die, which is the last thing we need right now, right when our invasion is beginning.”

It was true. Daenerys couldn’t allow to lose one of her children. The effects would be devastating on the morale of her troops. Anyway, she couldn’t let someone hurt them. They were her children, the only children she would ever have.

“We must force him to surrender,” she declared.

“He said he wouldn’t bend the knee, that he would remain loyal to House Lannister,” Kinvara pointed out. “If we want Dragonstone so much without a fight, we must make him surrender without forcing him to serve you, your Grace.”

Daenerys thought about that. “How many men are there inside the castle?” she asked.

“The garrison must be about two hundred men, three hundred at most,” Varys informed her.

Three hundred men. Her dragons would kill them easily in an open field battle. Only, this would not be a battle in an open field. It would be a siege, a siege she couldn’t afford. She needed Dragonstone, and she needed it now.

“Would he accept to surrender the castle if we allowed him to leave with his men?” she asked.

“Maybe. Though they would go to the rest of the Lannister army and reinforce it,” Varys replied.
“The Lannisters already have tens of thousand men in their ranks. A few hundred more won’t make any difference when they will face my dragons. We will allow him to leave with two ships, two that are in good state. I want the word of my return to spread.”

Wherever they would go, these men would tell what they saw. Her dragons, the ships that burned, they would speak about that. When they returned to Ser Myatt with their offer, he accepted. He was given two hours to leave the castle with his men. Daenerys watched their two ships leave the harbor of Dragonstone. Her own fleet let them pass. Once they were gone, she sent one of her own ships into the harbor to dock. She watched from afar as the banner of House Lannister was dropped from the battlements and replaced by the red dragon with three heads on a black field. Her command ship sailed forward to enter the harbor and docked. The crew of her ship was mostly Dornish, like the captain, and well trained at sea, so they had no difficulty to berth.

Daenerys let two Unsullied walk down the ramp when it was lowered before she followed. One moment before she stepped on the dock, she stopped. Then she made the step forward, and for the first time in almost twenty years, she set foot on the ground of her country. She looked ahead of her to see the black castle, shapes of dragons everywhere, threatening, imposing. Her ancestors built it, and this was the place where she was born.

The great doors that led to the castle were open. Unsullied were already taking the walkway up to the fortress, to make sure the Lannisters left no surprise behind them. After a long moment of unbearable waiting, she walked forward with her advisors and began to climb to her castle. The way was long, but the closer she got to the fortress, the more it was impressive. Inside, the walls, floors and ceilings were all made of the black stone of the island. Daenerys put her hand on the walls to feel the heat coming from it. Some places seemed familiar, perhaps fragments of a long lost childhood she couldn’t remember with precision. She was only a baby when they left the island, she and Viserys.

They arrived in the Great Hall. Immediately, her eyes caught sight of something displeasing, very displeasing. A huge banner of a black stag on a field of gold was displayed behind the throne. The sigil of the usurper, the man who took her family’s throne and forced her to live as an exile for all her life. Now he was gone, and his children and his brothers too, and here she stood, still alive. Daenerys noticed a few other banners, all lined up on the two sides of the Hall, alternating between the golden lion and the black stag, the two families who destroyed hers.

She felt anger rising in her chest as she looked at the banners of her enemies displayed in her home, the very place where she came into the world, where her mother gave her life so she could live. Burn them all. That’s what she wanted for these huge pieces of fabric.

As if the gods heard her prayers, the nearest banner with a golden lion caught fire. She saw with fascination the flames eating away the beast. A lion might have claws, but against fire, he could do nothing. He was defenseless. She knew the words of House Lannister were Hear me Roar. Well, they could roar all they wanted as the fire devoured them. Her family had her own words.

“Fire and Blood.” Kinvara said the words as she thought about it. Daenerys looked at the High Priestess, who smirked and gazed on her left. Daenerys saw a second red banner catch fire. She returned the smirk of the woman and began to walk towards her throne. It wasn’t the Iron Throne, but it would do for the time being, until she took back everything that was hers. As she progressed towards the dais, she felt and heard other banners burning as she passed before them. When she reached the throne and turned to look at the Great Hall, all the stags and all the lions were burning. She sat and contemplated the scene, as her advisors knelt before her, surrounded by the fire. Fire and Blood.
This chapter is in some way divided in two sections. The first one is the negotiations with Atos Myatt, where Daenery faces for the first time the politics of Westeros and where it is brought to her knowledge that she has a nephew, a claim she considers to be a lie immediately. The second section is more symbolic, with Daenerys taking her "rightful place" and looking at her enemies burning, which may be a forecast for the future events.

Next chapter: Kinvara
Here's a chapter that I was very eager to publish. This is in some way the Arrival to Dragonstone part II. The Daenerys chapter was more centered over the symbolic aspect of the arrival in Westeros. This one is about the actual decisions and implications of this arrival, and we continue to dig into Kinvara's character as well.

Some of you might be surprised by the names of a few characters in this chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The room was far from empty, and richly furnished as it was expected for a highborn lady of Westeros. They left the furniture behind them. However, the shelves were empty. She brought all her potions and mixtures with her.

Kinvara was exploring the room where Melisandre of Asshai lived while she resided at Dragonstone. She knew everything the priestess from Asshai did from the moment she came to Westeros. She burned the statues of other gods, burned people alive, used spells that involved the torture of people in the hope to make the man she claimed to be the Lord’s Chosen one win an useless war. How many people died because of her?

Melisandre wasn’t under Kinvara’s authority. She came from Asshai, not from Volantis. Even the Red Priests of Volantis knew little of Asshai, except that the people coming from there seemed to have great powers. But these powers had a tendency to devour them from the inside, to turn them into something lifeless. Kinvara doubted that they really followed the Lord of Light. Maybe some believed they did, but they were wrong in their beliefs.

Kinvara was tired of this. Too often she saw members of her order fall into fanaticism, being ready to sacrifice people massively for the sake of pleasing R’hlloir. Many priests destroyed the work of R’hlloir, ruining the chance of their Lord to triumph with their crimes, their blindness and their stupidity. Melisandre was among those people. The Lord of Light taught them forgiveness, selflessness, love, to help those in need and to act for the greater good. Priests like Melisandre ruined this faith with their beliefs of killing everyone who refused to follow the Lord of Light. Moqorro did the same with his determination to kill whoever stood in the way of their order. And others like Thoros of Myr, who were supposed to give an example and to show how to live to their followers, did even worse than them.

The men and women who pretended to serve R’hlloir had destroyed everything good inside the order of the Red Priests and turned the faith in the Lord of Light into sadistic beliefs that killing and burning infidels were the greatest deeds to prove your faith into R’hlloir. Kinvara opposed this behavior within her order before and after she was named High Priestess, and she knew it would be a fight she would lead until the end of her days.

Staying in this room, thinking of that mad woman who burned innocent people alive made her sick. Kinvara turned her back on it and closed the door behind. She looked at her guards.
“I want a man positioned before this door at every hour, day and night. No one is to ever enter this room again.”

She walked away, leaving a curse on the room where Melisandre of Asshai slept, bathed, ate and practiced her dark magic for years. She calmed herself as she walked to the Chamber of the Painted Table, where Daenerys Stormborn would hold her first council in Westeros. On her way, she was joined by another Red Priest who would assist to the council at her side. Kinvara had brought twenty priests and a hundred members of the Fiery Hand with her from Essos to help her and the queen. Of all these priests, Revan was the most mysterious, even more than her. He had been in service to the Red Temple of Volantis before she began her apprenticeship, and no one knew who he was exactly, or where he came from. It wasn’t unusual for the Red Priests to know little on their fellows. When they joined the order, they forsook their name, their past, their family, and everything that came before they pledged their life to R’hllor. However, the High Priest and his closest advisors often knew much about the origins of every of their priests. With Revan, it was different. No one knew where he was born, or how old he was, or even how he looked like. His face was always hidden behind a mask, and no one ever saw him remove it. During the war for freedom in Volantis, he led the early strikes that took the masters by surprise, and he also led the assault on the port. If Moqorro was the political leader of the rebels, Revan was the military mind behind the victory at Volantis. Ruthless when necessary, he disapproved the burning of people most of the time, believing it was only useful in some very specific occasions and only from the perspective of the effect it could have on the morale of troops. He was a leader, someone people were ready to follow to their death, not because he threatened them, but because he convinced them and made them ready to die for a noble cause. He would be useful here in Westeros, for his skills as a warrior, as a military commander and as a missionary.

“What will be our first move?” he asked her.

“It will be to the queen to decide,” she replied.

“What if the queen is wrong?”

The sword at his belt dangled a little as they moved forward. They arrived before the Chamber. An Unsullied soldier let them in. No one was here yet, so they waited. Revan closely observed the whole table that displayed a detailed map of the Seven Kingdoms. Kinvara’s gaze was fixed on one particular point in the south, a place consumed by fire. Her eyes were locked on it, thinking about all the people who died there, only because kings and queens decided they should die.

The queen and Varys came in. Daenerys Targaryen took place in the raised seat that was placed at the precise location of Dragonstone for the map. The queen looked at the painted table for some time, then she looked at all of them. “Shall we begin?”

“I questioned Maester Pylos and my little birds who work here,” the eunuch began. “It seems Ser Atos was honest. Jon Snow was proclaimed King in the North, and he is being supported by the North, the Riverlands, the Vale and the Westerlands. He has half the Seven Kingdoms on his side now.”

“What are his forces? How many men does he have in his army?” Daenerys asked.

“The North and the Riverlands were quite spent by the War of the Five Kings, but they can still align about ten thousand men each. The Westerlands can muster more, and the Vale of Arryn is intact. I would say that Jon Snow could align seventy thousand men on the battlefield, but most of them are in the North right now. We have some time before they arrive in the Crownlands, but we must act quickly.”

“What can you tell me about this Jon Snow?”

“Not much. I never met him. He is the natural born son of Lord Eddard Stark, and from what my little birds in the North say, he looks a lot like his father. He joined the Night’s Watch when his father became Hand of the King and survived the war against the wildlings. He was made Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch while Stannis Baratheon was at the Wall, then assembled an army made of wildlings and a few northern lords when House Bolton was declared traitor to the Crown and marched on Winterfell. He joined his forces to the Lannister forces who invaded the North and they took Winterfell. He seems to be a decent swordsman and a good leader overall, though if he is as honorable as his father was, I don’t give him much time to live. But Jon Snow is not the one we should worry about, I think.”

The queen frowned. “What do you mean?”

“The man we should worry about is the man behind his proclamation as king. Tyrion Lannister. He is the Lord of Casterly Rock and certainly the true power behind Jon Snow.”

“How could a Lannister end up working with a Stark? The two families were at war not long ago.”

“Most of the people who started this war are dead now,” the Spider explained. “Tywin Lannister, Joffrey Baratheon, Eddard Stark and Robb Stark are gone and were the ones to ignite this conflict. Lord Tyrion became Warden of the West at his father’s death, and he is married to Jon Snow’s sister, the Lady Sansa. Tyrion and Cersei Lannister always hated each other. While he served as Hand of the King under Joffrey, they were always fighting for the power. She tried to have him killed a few times. I suppose he thought Jon Snow would make a better king than his sister. I know they met when the little lord visited the North before the war. Tyrion Lannister will never support his sister, that we can be sure of.”

“That is no surprise,” Kinvara commented. “Among the Lannisters, family doesn’t seem to mean much. This will make things easier for us.”

“I agree,” the queen said. “Cersei Lannister cannot rely on the support of Casterly Rock. What is her position?”

“Not very well,” Varys answered. “She destroyed the Great Sept of Baelor, by which she got rid of her opponents in King’s Landing, but she lost all the allies she had. She killed Mace Tyrell’s children in the process, which means the Reach will no longer help her. Her authority doesn’t go beyond the Crownlands, and even then, I doubt the lords there will fight for her when they see a great army marching against them with three dragons.”

“Then we must use this opportunity. King’s Landing is without defense. It is time to take it.”

The Master of Whisperers was silent. Revan spoke. “How many men Cersei Lannister can muster? What are the defenses of King’s Landing?” He pointed the region where the capital of the Seven Kingdoms should be, though it didn’t appear. King’s Landing wasn’t yet built when the Painted Table was carved.

“Strong walls, though they were probably damaged by the wildfire,” Varys replied. “As for the number of men, a few thousands, probably, but their loyalty will be wavering. The moment our queen’s men breach a gate, they will flee. The men we have with us at Dragonstone should be enough. I could arrange for a few of my little birds to open the gates for us.”

Another silence followed. “How many people live in King’s Landing?”

“Can the Crownlands feed them?” Kinvara knew that Revan was looking at Varys as he asked the question.

“No. The city depends on the Reach and the Riverlands for its supplies. During the last war, Joffrey faced riots in the capital because the Tyrells closed the Rose Road.”

“So, if we take King’s Landing right now, we will be taking a starving city?”

“Yes, we will, and we might face riots just like Joffrey did during the war,” Varys recognized.

“That’s not something I can allow,” Daenerys Stormborn said. “The people living in King’s Landing are my people. I am their queen. They didn’t choose Cersei. I cannot let them starve. We will have to conquer the Reach and the Riverlands.”

“The Riverlands will not be of much help, your Grace. The countryside was entirely spoiled by the last war, both by the Lannisters and the northern armies. The Reach is what we need. The country was spared by the war so far.”

The queen nodded. “Then we will wait for Mace Tyrell to reply to our raven. If he refuses to bend the knee, we will have no choice but to conquer Highgarden.”

“Your Grace.” Kinvara intervened. “If I may, winter has come upon Westeros. Harvests are over. We need supplies right now for the capital if we don’t want thousands of innocent people to die. We must make sure the Tyrells accept to prevent that from happening.”

Kinvara knew what hunger was. A long time ago, before she became Kinvara, her parents used to work as much as slaves. The girl she once was hadn’t been lucky enough to have a hot meal every day. She wouldn’t let the people starve because the lords decided their wars were more important.

“I agree with the High Priestess,” Varys said, to her surprise. He seldom approved something she said. “To have the Tyrells by our side is vital. We need them. When Jon Snow comes south, we will need this kingdom with us, not against us. I’m afraid Tyrion Lannister may already have proceeded to include them in the alliance supporting Jon Snow. Cersei Lannister killed Ser Loras and Lady Margaery Tyrell. Lord Mace will do everything to get his revenge for the death of his children, and as long as Lord Tyrion promises him Cersei’s head, I’m afraid he could declare himself for Jon Snow.”

“I can promise him Cersei’s head without problem as well,” Daenerys said.

“Maybe, but Jon Snow has something you don’t, your Grace. A free hand, for marriage.”

Daenerys’s face dropped a little. “My hand is free as well.”

“Officially, yes,” Varys bowed his head. “However, Doran Martell still expects you to marry his son, and making an arrangement of that type with House Tyrell could endanger our alliance with Dorne.”

“Mace Tyrell’s children are all dead,” Kinvara observed. “He has no one to offer in marriage.”

“No children, indeed, but several cousins, nephews and nieces. If Tyrion Lannister offers Mace Tyrell to marry one of them to Jon Snow, he might be very tempted to fight for him.”

Kinvara wasn’t surprised. When you were a noble man, your children could be killed, but it wouldn’t stop you from declaring yourself for the person who would offer you the most. These people were only interested by power.

“Very well,” Daenerys said. “Does any of you have a way to gain the Tyrell’s support without engaging myself?”

A long silence followed. Kinvara knew they had to offer the Tyrells something. However, she knew the politics of the Free Cities much better than those of Westeros and wasn’t sure what could equal a crown in the eyes of a Tyrell.

“Wasn’t the city of Lannisport attacked by the Ironborn recently?” Revan asked suddenly.

“Yes,” the eunuch replied. “From what we can tell, the city is in ruins.”

“And the harbor? The fleet?”

The priest kept looking at the map. “The Ironborn will attack the Reach sooner or later. Euron Greyjoy will threaten their shores very soon, and we already have Yara Greyjoy sailing for the Iron Islands. If we help the Tyrells to defeat the Ironborn, we will be offering them something the Imp can’t offer. He cannot help them against the Iron Islands. We can defeat Euron Greyjoy with Yara’s ships joined by the fleets of the Arbor and Oldtown on the sea while our troops conquer the Stormlands, then bring our forces towards King’s Landing with the Tyrells. The city will be surrounded on two sides and we will be able to launch an assault from the south with the bulk of our forces and from the north with our forces here at Dragonstone. If we do this quickly, we might take the city before Jon Snow’s forces cross the Riverlands.”

Varys seemed thoughtful for a moment. “It could work. Help against Euron Greyjoy should be enough to gain the Tyrell’s alliance.”

Kinvara knew she had been right to bring Revan with her. As a strategist, few could equal him.

“Very well,” Daenerys declared. “I will fly to Highgarden and negotiate with Mace Tyrell myself.”

“Your Grace, I don’t believe this is a good idea to endanger yourself.”

“When the Tyrells see Drogon, Rhaegal and Viserion, they won’t dare to cause me any harm. This will be one more reason for them to support my claim, and we need to act quickly if we are to get the Tyrells before Jon Snow does.”

“Your Grace, I don’t believe…” Varys tried again.

“Lord Varys, I thank you for your concerns, but if I’m not ready to risk my life for my people, then I’m not worthy of being a queen. Why would the people of the Seven Kingdoms risk their lives for me if I can’t risk mine for them?”

The eunuch had nothing to oppose to this, but it was obvious that he disapproved. Revan kept staring at the painted table all the while.

“Good, the matter is closed,” the queen resumed. “Do we have any news from the Stormlands?”

“No much, your Grace,” Varys answered. “Prince Trystane and Ser Jorah didn’t send any report since they don’t know yet that we have taken Dragonstone, but from the ravens Pylos received recently, it seems a few castles already fell. The island of Tarth is under our control, as are Haystack Hall and Bronzegate. Our armies might already be at Storm’s End as we speak. We could send a raven to one of the fallen castles and ask a report from your commanders.”

“I agree. I will stop by Storm’s End on my way to Highgarden. My dragons could persuade whoever is holding the castle to surrender. Any other news of interest?”

“No, your Grace.”

“Very well. I would like you to show me to Maester Pylos, Lord Varys, then. I want ravens sent through all the Seven Kingdoms announcing my return and demanding every lord to bend the knee.”

“Of course, your Grace. If you want to follow me.”

“You are dismissed,” Daenerys told to Kinvara and Revan.

“Your Grace,” Kinvara said at the moment. “May I have a moment with you, alone?”

Daenerys looked at her, and Kinvara made her understand with her eyes that it was important. She had better chance to convince the queen if she was all alone with her. The queen trusted her, in general.

“As you wish. Please go out, both.” Varys and Raven left, bowing before the queen before exiting through the door, Revan making one more bow before Kinvara. “You didn’t talk a lot,” the queen observed when they were gone.

“The politics of the Seven Kingdoms and wars are not what I’m best at,” Kinvara recognized.

Daenerys nodded. “What do you want?”

“The eunuch wasn’t the only one to look at the messages Dragonstone received recently. I took a look myself, and there’s a message from the Wall that I found that was… disturbing.” Kinvara took the scroll she hid in her sleeves and gave it to the queen. As Daenerys Stormborn read it, she continued. “It was recently sent by Eddison Tollett, the new Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. All the messages coming from Castle Black for the last two years asked for men, and the three Lord Commanders who wrote all said the same: the dead are coming.”

Daenerys Stormborn frowned and looked at her. “What does that mean?”

“Among your people, there is a legend about creatures called the White Walkers, ice demons who appeared eight thousand years ago during the Long Night and who almost killed every human. They can turn the dead into wights who obey them and kill more people so they can add them to their army. In my order, we call them the Others. They are the servants of the Great Other. They disappeared for thousands of years, and now they are back.”

The queen looked at her with an incredulous expression. “You want me to believe that there are demons who are coming to turn all of us into some sort of… walking dead?”

“I want you to believe the truth, your Grace. For now, the Others only gathered men north of the Wall, but the day is coming where they will try to breach the Wall, and when they do and they invade the Seven Kingdoms, it will be a matter of months before all the livings are gone. And when it happens, it won’t matter who sits on the Iron Throne.”

She could see that the queen didn’t believe her. “Let’s suppose that what you say is true, so far these… dead demons stayed north of the Wall. Can they breach the Wall? And when will they try?”

“I don’t know. There is magic in the Wall that could stop them, but they will try to get through it, and very soon. The great war is coming, and when it’s there, you’ll need to be in the North to fight the Others.”

Daenerys Targaryen looked at her, not looking sure of what to believe. She laid the scroll on the painted table. “For now, the Others didn’t show themselves, and the North is occupied by my enemies. Let’s hope that when they come, Jon Snow bent the knee before me. Now, I have ravens to send.”

Kinvara stayed in the Chamber of the Painted Table for some time afterwards after Daenerys Targaryen left. The queen didn’t believe her. Who would? She would need time to convince her, but did they have enough time before them? The messages from Castle Black were alarming. The most recent ravens were begging for men rather than asking for them. Daenerys Stormborn had to reach the North with her dragons before all was lost. She was Azor Ahai reborn. Who else could be? Right now, the only way to get her in the North as quickly as possible was to make sure all the Seven Kingdoms bowed before her.

Kinvara looked at the Painted Table. Their armies were conquering the Stormlands right now. There were fights between the Tyrells and the Martells on their frontiers. The Iron Islands were raiding the coasts of the Westerlands, and soon the Reach. In the North, a pretender was supported by half of Westeros, claiming to be the queen’s nephew. They were all fighting each other when they should all side together to face the real threat. Instead, the highborn people were burning and plundering cities. She looked at Lannisport, then at the place where King’s Landing should be. What would be the next place to burn?

The High Priestess kept staring at the table for a very long time. How many people lived there, with rulers who didn’t care if they were to die tomorrow? She looked at Casterly Rock, the Hightower, the Eyrie. Everywhere, the men and women from the nobility loved to live high above the smallfolk. The only place where lowborn people could stand higher was at the Wall, and there they froze themselves to death, not sitting on cushioned benches with servants pouring their wine and warm blankets covering their feet.

Later, Kinvara was in her rooms. She had taken simples rooms. There was a bed, a featherbed. A girl once hopped into a similar bed when she saw one for the first time. She used to sleep in a bed of straws with four other people. There was a table, with two chairs. A girl once sat with her whole family around a larger table, though roughly made, where they would pray before they ate what little they had. There was a chamber pot in the corner, made of lead. A girl once had no such thing. There was a wooden bucket in the room she sept, which she shared with half a dozen people. Sometimes, the girl had to go outside, in the streets, to relieve herself. There was a tray with food on the table. A girl would have jumped on the food and devoured it, afraid she wouldn’t be able to eat again before a few days. Kinvara had no use for food. The Lord of Light gave her everything she needed. She didn’t even need a bed to sleep.

There was an hearth. It was burning, fed by more than enough logs. The girl knew what it was to have an hearth. She loved to sit by it while her mother told her stories to her and her siblings. Later, someone would always forget to keep it lit, but she wouldn’t care, since she was warm enough. A serving girl came into the room and stopped before the untouched tray.

“You didn’t eat, my lady?” she asked.

“I’m no lady,” Kinvara replied harshly, her back turned on the servant.
“Sorry, my…”

“Bring the food to someone who needs it.”

She heard the girl grab the tray behind, but then she dropped it on the table. She saw the servant approach the fire and taking a log of wood.

“What are you doing?” Kinvara asked her.

“I’m feeding the fire, my lady.”

“I’m not a lady, and I will feed the fire myself.”

“Sorry.” The girl let the log fall on the floor.

It was at this moment that Kinvara realized how dirty the girl was, how her hair was unkempt, how her ragged clothes hung to her scrawny body. As she walked back to the table, Kinvara felt guilt for speaking so harshly to her. Before, she could have been this girl.

“I changed my mind.” She heard the girl freeze behind her. “Eat the food yourself. You need it.”

After a moment, the girl answered. “Thank you, my lady.”

Kinvara didn’t bother to correct her this time. There were far worse things in the world than to call her my lady. She wasn’t a lady, and she would never be a lady. She looked at the fire as the serving girl ate everything on the tray, not looking at her a single time. She could have been that girl once, but that was in the past. She was no longer that girl.

When the servant was gone, Kinvara went to take three logs and threw them into the hearth. She always made her own fires, one way or another, and she wouldn’t let anyone made them for her. She sat comfortably in her chair and watched the flames dancing around her. She closed her eyes and prayed, then she opened them and watched the fire for some time. She closed her eyes again and said another prayer before looking in the fire once more. She repeated the process again and again for a very long time. Each time, the shadows and forms she could see in the flames turned more distinct.

The visions she received were not very clear all the same. Swords. Arrows. Battles. Dragons. Storms. Darkness. Fire. Snow. Fire. Snow. Fire. Ice. Eyes. Blue eyes. They were watching her. In these eyes, she saw ice cracking, and the dead following, and the servants of the Great Other leading them. They were many. Too many.

The vision stopped. Kinvara was panting. They’re coming. They’re coming soon. Very soon. Too soon. They didn’t have much time left. She summoned one of her own servants she brought with her from Meereen and told him to gather all the priests.

They met in the Chamber of the Painted Table. Despite the fact they were in the middle of the night, the Unsullied who guarded the room let them meet there. The Red Priests were serving the queen, so the Unsullied had no reason to stop them from meeting at night. When Kinvara came in, they were all there, the twenty Red Priests, men and women who crossed the Narrow Sea with Daenerys Stormborn to advise her and help her in the Seven Kingdoms, and also to spread the word of R’hllor in Westeros. They all turned silent when she entered. All were sworn to the Red Temple of Volantis.

“For the night is dark and full of terrors,” they all replied as one. They stood in a circle around the painted table.
“I summoned you tonight because the Lord granted me a vision. The Others are coming. It’s not a matter of years before they come. Now it’s a matter of months, maybe weeks or days.”

“Then it is a blessing that Daenerys Stormborn came to Westeros now. It is yet one more proof that she is the Lord’s Chosen One,” a Red Priestess said.

“Maybe, but Daenerys Stormborn will need help in order to defeat the servants of the Great Other. The great war is not still to come. It already started. For now, the Others are kept behind the structure they call the Wall, but it won’t last. Westeros must be united behind the Mother of Dragons when they come south.”

“We must have faith in our Lord,” a man declared. “He sent us Daenerys Stormborn. He won’t fail us.”

“Our Lord will not fail us, true, but he doesn’t expect us to do nothing and only wait for him to save us. We must work for our own salvation, and our salvation will not only come through prayers or faith. The people of Westeros must all stand with the queen, lowborn and highborn alike. That’s why I’m sending you all on the continent. You are to convince the people and their lords that they must unite behind Daenerys Targaryen or else they are doomed.”

They all nodded in agreement, but she wasn’t done. “Let me be clear. Our work is to convince the people to serve the queen Daenerys. She is Azor Ahai reborn. Our primary objective is to convince the people to follow her, not the Lord of Light.” She let her words sink in the room.

“But how the people will follow Daenerys Stormborn if they don’t believe in the Lord of Light?” the youngest priest asked.

“Many people already serve her and fight for her, and they do not believe in our Lord. Right now, our objective is to defeat the Others, not to convert Westeros. There will be no one left to believe in our Lord if everyone dies at the hands of his enemy’s servants. Our goal right now is not to convince that R’hhlor is the only true god, but to make everyone follow the savior, no matter the reason. The conversion of Westeros will come by itself, after we’ve defeated the great enemy. You are not to provoke the other religions or to start hostilities over theological matters. Do you understand?”

All the priests agreed, though some did so reluctantly. Kinvara would have to keep an eye on them. Although she only brought people who truly believed in the Lord of Light and in Daenerys Stormborn, she couldn’t be totally sure of the means they would use to serve the Lord and the queen.

“All of you are to leave as soon as you can,” she resumed. “Remus, Nymphadora, I’m sending you to Dorne. Albus, Sirius, Minerva, you’re going to the Reach. I want one of you in Oldtown and another one near Highgarden at all times. Riyah, Darren, Alexander, I want you in the Stormlands. Priscilla and Eleanor, you leave for the Westerlands. Yennefer, you will stay in King’s Landing with Vesemir. Triss and Cirilla, you take care of the Riverlands. Geralt, you’re going to follow me. Jolee and Juhani, you get the Vale. Bastilla and Meetra, you must leave for the North as quickly as possible. Try to see if this Jon Snow would be receptive to an alliance with Daenerys Stormborn. As for you, Revan, you will stay by the side of the queen. Your experience in war strategy and politics will be more than valuable to her. Has any of you questions, or anything to share?” No one replied.

“Then may the Lord of Light watch over you.”

“For the night is dark and full of terrors,” they all replied again.

They disbanded, everyone knowing his mission. Soon, Kinvara was alone with the map painted on the table. Well, not entirely alone. Revan stayed behind. She couldn’t see his eyes, but she didn’t think she was mistaking when she thought he was examining the table and every detail it displayed.
Kinvara had her eyes fixed on one point in particular of the table again, the same than before, and she forced herself to look away.

“Do you think Daenerys Stormborn can conquer all Westeros before the Others come?” she asked her fellow priest.

“She might succeed, if everything goes as planned, but in war, things never go as planned. Let’s hope the servants of the Great Other don’t cross the Wall immediately. If they do, everything is lost.”

“But do you think we have a chance?” Kinvara had faith in her Lord, but her faith in humans wasn’t as strong as she wished it was.

“We have. The best way would be to defeat our enemies with minimal losses, or even to turn them into allies without battle. We will have more men to fight our enemies,” Revan stated.

“Cersei Lannister will never bend the knee to Daenerys Targaryen. As for the Ironborn, they will never surrender until we bring them on their knees by force.”

“Then let’s hope the Tyrells accept our alliance and that Jon Snow is reasonable enough to do just like Torrhen Stark did three centuries ago.”

“And let’s hope the people of the Seven Kingdoms will not ignore everything we say only because we bring a foreign faith.”

“Who we are is not important. Our message is.”

With that, Revan left, and Kinvara really found herself alone with the Painted Table. Again, her eyes were drawn to a single point on the map. She stayed there for an hour, only looking at one specific place. Then she left and went to sleep what little she needed. In her sleep, she could hear the cries of a baby, abandoned by her mother.

Chapter End Notes

Many of you probably realized it, but the Red Priests in this chapter all bear names of characters with some sort of magical power from books, movies or video games. Remus, Nymphadora, Albus, Sirius and Minerva are from Harry Potter of J. K. Rowling (most of you probably noticed these ones, especially). Riyah, Darren, Alexander, Priscilla and Eleanor are from the Black Mage series of Rachel Carter, four books that I devored not long ago. Yennefer, Vesemir, Triss, Cirilla and Geralt are from the Witcher games. Jolee, Juhani, Bastila, Meetra and Revan are from the video games Star Wars : Knights of the Old Republic.

I inserted these names for fun and they are only there as cameos at best, except for Revan who is very similar to the character in the video game and who will play a secondary role in the story. He’s my favorite video game character. :)

Chapter Notes

We come back for a Cersei chapter, the last one before a good time since a lot of the following chapters will turn around the events in the North and the people around Daenerys.

Good news, my master's thesis is done. Writing this fic will be easier from now on.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

CERSEI VIII

To all the noblemen and noblewomen of Westeros,

From this day on, I, Daenerys Stormborn, Of the House Targaryen, the First of Her Name, the Unburnt, Queen of Meereen, Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, Khaleesi of the Great Grass Sea, the Breaker of Chains, the Mother of Dragons, will be the one true queen of Westeros.

I grant a pardon to everyone who served the Usurper, Robert Baratheon, and his children. Those who swear fealty and bend the knee to me and to my house will keep their lands and titles. However, whoever refuses to swear fealty to me and House Targaryen will be branded traitors and treated as such. I offer the hand of peace and the gift of life to everyone in Westeros. Those who shall reject this gift will be shown no mercy and will know the wrath of the dragon.

Qyburn ended the reading of the raven they received a few days ago from Dragonstone. They were alone in her rooms, Cersei didn’t give much attention to the raven the first time it was brought to her attention, but then a ship from Dragonstone arrived in the harbor and the men on it told stories that they were attacked by a fleet displaying the banner of House Targaryen. Dragonstone had fallen, and most of the houses sworn to it as well, according to Qyburn. If you added to it the words they received from several castles in the Stormlands of a barbarian invasion, it was obvious they were facing a real threat. The Targaryen girl in Essos, the last grandchild of the Mad King, came back.

“How many castles did we lose in the Stormlands?” Cersei asked.

“It is impossible to know with certainty, but we received ravens from about twenty lords asking for help against barbarians riding horses who raided their lands and plundered their fields. The description fits the Dothrakis who live across the Narrow Sea. Is it true that Daenerys Stormborn was wed to a Dothraki warlord before the War of the five Kings?” Qyburn asked.

“Maybe. I’m not sure. It was a long time ago and we had more important matters to attend at the time.” They were at war against four other kings back then. A girl at the other side of the world was the least of their concerns. “So we don’t know how many castles we lost?”

“Not with certainty, your Grace, though some of the lords who wrote also spoke of banners of House Martell and said they were under siege. Lord Rogers of Amberly is the only one who wrote to tell us he was to surrender his castle to protect his people from the ravages of the invaders. Since Amberly is deep into the rainwood, we have to assume that half the Stormlands may have already

“Any word from Storm’s End?”

“None, but I’m afraid it is only a matter of time before the castle falls.”

“Storm’s End has never fallen. It will not fall now either.”

“Maybe, your Grace, but the commander of the garrison may not be willing to resist long when he sees his lands spoiled by the Dothrakis. And we mustn’t forget the dragons.”

The dragons. The men who came from Dragonstone didn’t stop talking about them. They said they saw three of them, giant flying creatures with scales, spitting fire that burned ships like dried wood in a hearth. When she realized how such rumors could spread panic in the capital, Cersei had four men who talked about it more than the others hung and ordered the others to never speak about it again.

The dragons had been gone for over a century. They couldn’t be back. Varys told them Daenerys Targaryen had dragons with her in Meereen, but Varys betrayed them. He was a traitor. What told them he didn’t lie? However, now, it seemed he didn’t lie about it. This Targaryen girl was back with three grown dragons, a powerful fleet, an army of Dothraki raiders, and she was supported by Sunspear if they could rely on the reports of the banners with a sun that could be seen in the Stormlands. Cersei had sent all the troops of the Crownlands to the Blackwater Rush and ordered to sink all the bridges on the river to stop the Martells and the Tyrells to cross the river. This way, they would be kept out of the Crownlands and far away from King’s Landing. They were not to pass.

“Is there a way to get rid of the dragons? To kill them?” Surely a dragon could be killed. It was not easy, for sure, but it had to be possible.

Qyburn took some time to answer. “There are ways that are known. Queen Rhaenys’s dragon was killed by a scorpion’s bolt during the First Dornish War, when it pierced its eyes. However, the odds of this happening are not very strong.”

“Is there any other way?”

“Some dragons were killed with swords, or even clubs, but most were very young, only children. An adult dragon would be far more difficult to kill this way.”

Cersei settled a little more comfortably in her chair and inhaled deeply. “Very well. I want scorpions built on the battlements of the Red Keep everywhere. Everywhere.” She insisted on the word. With enough scorpions, the odds of hitting one dragon in the right place should increase enough to give them a good chance. One bolt could miss its target, but it would be bad luck if there wasn’t a single one on an hundred or a thousand that didn’t succeed.

“How many men do we have to guard the Blackwater?” she asked Qyburn.

“Five thousand, your Grace, from our accounts.”

“Is that really all?”

“I’m afraid so, your Grace. The lords of he Crownlands don’t seem able to make any more levies after the last war.”

“Nonsense. They can raise more, but they don’t want to.” If she was her father, they wouldn’t hesitate to give her all the men she asked. “We can’t rely on the Crownlands alone. We need more men. And I know precisely where to find some.” She took a sip of wine. This wine came from Rosby. She refused to drink anything from Dorne or the Reach now. Everything they sent her was always trouble. “Fetch my brother.”

“As you wish, your Grace.”

Qyburn left and Cersei found herself alone, drinking down her cup. She wasn’t stupid. She knew her position was precarious. Everyone had turned against her, and everyone in the city wanted her dead. She didn’t care about what the people thought of her, but she knew that if one of these filthy rags found himself alone with her, he would kill her without second thoughts.

She had taken her precautions so that it would never happen. She reinforced the guard around the Red Keep, and never left it. She didn’t even leave it for the burial of Tommen’s ashes. She stood up and walked to the balcony. She seldom left her rooms nowadays. She let Qyburn make sure everyone did his job, and when she needed to see someone, she had him come to her.

She looked at the ruins of the Great Sept of Baelor, where her children were all buried. Gold will be their crowns. Gold their shrouds. They were gone, and so was her father and her mother. Jaime and I are the last Lannisters, the last ones who count. We have enemies to the east, enemies to the west, enemies to the south, enemies to the north. I will defeat them all.

She was looking at the west right now. Far away was Casterly Rock. Genna had refused to send them men. Cersei could still hear Qyburn’s quiet words as he read her answer. Convince your brother to support your claim despite all the enemies you’ve made, and then we will talk about sending you men. Or else, if there’s any sense left in you, abandon your crown, come back home and let Tyrion find a way to save your head. For the sake of your father who was my brother, give up the Iron Throne before it’s too late.

Cersei gripped the cup in her hand tightly. She was the queen. She would never abandon her crown. It was hers, only hers. You’ll be queen. For a time. Then comes another, younger, more beautiful, to cast you down and take all you hold dear. That would not happen. Her children were all dead. There was nothing dear left to her. That part of the prophecy couldn’t happen.

Jaime came inside at this moment. Qyburn said he made a good job overall, bringing back order in the streets of the city. People were trying to rebuild their houses. They could try, for all the good it would do. When winter would come, they would all die. Cersei wouldn’t.

“You asked for me, your Grace?” her brother asked. She noticed the mocking tone he used.

“You’re leaving,” she said, still staring at the horizon, not caring to face him.

“Leaving? Where?”

“The west. You will ride for the Westerlands before the sun sets. There, you will go to every castle, every village, even to Casterly Rock. You are to recruit every man and boy strong enough to hold a sword and to bring them all here to defend their queen. You will tell our aunt Genna that I am the queen now and that she has the choice to serve me or to die. If she still refuses to obey, you will kill her.”

Her brother snorted after a long time. “And you believe anyone will obey you?”

“If they don’t, you’ll only have to cut their heads for disobeying their queen.”

A moment of silence followed. “Are you sure you’re not the one who lost her head?”

“Refusing to obey your queen is treason, and you know better than anyone what’s the sentence for “Treason.” She took another sip of wine.

“I think you don’t understand, Cersei. You are no queen. You have no kingdom. You barely have a hold on the Crownlands, and these lords will abandon you the moment a bigger army stands before them.”

“Tell me why? Why should I be careful? You will order me to be put to death? It’s not enough for you to kill one brother, you want to kill both of them? Just like you killed your daughter-in-law?”

“The Sparrows murdered Margaery.”

“Not as much as you murdered Tommen.”

This time, she turned to face him, and she looked straight into his eyes. “I gave you an order. Do what I say. That’s the only thing you’re good at, doing what other people tell you to do. Follow the orders. I’m your queen. You are bound to obey me.”

“You’re wrong, sister. I never followed your orders because you’re the queen. I never did anything you asked because you were queen. I followed your orders, I did what you told me to do all these years, for two reasons: you were my sister, and I loved you. The latter is no longer true. The only reason why I stay here is the hope that I could convince you to abandon your foolish impression to be queen before it gets you killed. The Ironborn are raiding the coasts of the Westerlands, the Martells and the Tyrells want us dead, there’s a Targaryen who’s about to burn our asses with her dragons, and another one who controls half of the Seven Kingdoms and is supported by our brother. If you had any common sense, you would abandon your crown before it gets you killed.”

She looked at her twin, at the man she used to love. How could she love such an idiot? “You have your orders. You leave before sunset.”

She turned her back on him and dedicated her attention to her cup once again. If Jaime couldn’t bring any man to the capital, at least she would get rid of him. His presence had become more than annoying. He always mocked her, questioned her, rejected any decision she made as stupid. He was her own brother, her own flesh and blood, they shared a womb before they came into this world, and yet instead of helping her, he incited her to give up, to abandon, after everything she went through, everything she suffered. She had enough of him. He could die for all she cared.

“I tried. Farewell, sister. I love you.”

She heard footsteps, a door that closed, and he was gone. Somewhere, Cersei felt a knot, but she ignored it. She wouldn’t let any feeling for that fool surface. She was Cersei Lannister, the First of Her Name, Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, Protector of the Seven Kingdoms, Lady of Casterly Rock and Lady of the Westerlands, the Lioness, daughter and heir to Tywin Lannister. The Iron Throne was hers, and it would be hers until the day she died.

Cersei asked one of her guards to bring someone else to her chambers. She went back to the balcony and looked again at the ruins where her children were buried. It was in the Great Sept of Baelor that she was wed to Robert Baratheon and that her years of torture began. If it hadn’t been for her children, she would have killed herself long ago. She lived thanks to Tommen, thanks to Myrcella, and thanks to Joffrey. Tyrion once asked her if Joffrey really was the reason why she was still alive. It wasn’t long after the Red Wedding, after Sansa’s family died. She advised Tyrion to give Sansa a child. It seemed he followed her advice in the end. Cersei wondered how the child looked like. She had cared for Sansa, in some way, despite her family’s treason. Cersei had loved Robert once, as much as the girl loved Joffrey once. Cersei may have been able to love her in time, not like her own daughter, but like her son’s wife, if it hadn’t been for Margaery’s influence. She turned Sansa, changed her, made her into the Imp’s wife, created another enemy to Cersei. She would have to kill Sansa. There was no other choice. Wasn’t there? There was no hope for Sansa to be the little dove she once was again. Once you took this path, there was no way back. Cersei knew what she was talking about. She took the same path long ago, and she suffered for it. It was sad that it had to end this way, but the world was made this way. In our life, we must choose either to be the hunter of the prey. If we choose to be the hunter, then we must play the game of thrones. And when we play the game of thrones, we win or we die. There is no middle ground. Cersei would win, and Sansa would die. It had to be this way.

The door opened and her Queensguard announced Lord Petyr Baelish. He bowed when he entered, smirking as always. She hated that smirk. She understood why Sansa Stark wanted him to die.
Maybe she should grant the request she made to Margaery.

“Your Grace, I have the pleasure to tell you that my men found a hidden cache where the High Septon hid many valuables. Selling them will add large amount of gold to the coffers of the Crown that could allow us to recruit sellswords…”

“Your time here may be coming to an end, Lord Baelish,” Cersei cut him, then she let a silence linger.

“To an end?” he asked.

“Yes, to an end. It is possible that your usefulness may be coming to an end, and once you are no longer useful to me, what’s stopping me from giving you to Qyburn for his experiments?”

“I’m still useful, your Grace. I can get you your brother’s head…”

“You didn’t give it to me yet. How is it going, by the way? Any progress?”

“It takes time to execute such a plan, your Grace. Tyrion Lannister and Sansa Stark are far away in the North, and I learned recently that most of the troops of the Vale there were scattered all over the North…”

“I don’t care about your excuses.” She turned to face him, putting as much disdain and threat in her voice and on her face as she could. “You will bring me my brother’s head before the next moon is over, or else I will find another Master of Coin.”

“As you wish, your Grace. I shall return to my duties then.”

“Not yet.” She stopped him before he could turn. “You told me you still had contacts and allies in the Vale.”

“I did, your Grace, and I still do.”

“I have enemies who are coming, and some of them will come from the North. I want the largest army the Vale ever assembled to come here, to King’s Landing, to defend the capital, their queen, and by the same way their Master of Coin.”

Littlefinger hesitated. “It will be difficult. The Knights of the Vale are proud people, and they will find it strange to fight for you while another part is in the North, supposed to fight for Jon Snow.”

“I’m sure you will find a way. You are very resourceful. Of course, if you can manage to kill Sansa and Tyrion, then the Vale will have no reason to fight for their puppet. I suggest you take care of them quickly. If the Knights of the Vale fail to serve their true queen, one way or another, then the acting Lord Protector of the Vale and the future Lord Paramount of the Trident will meet the end waiting for the traitors and incompetents.”

“Very well, your Grace. I live to serve. I will make sure that an army of twenty thousand men are at the doors of King’s Landing within the next two months.”

“Good. You are dismissed. And Lord Baelish.” She stopped him again before he could leave. “Don’t ever think about betraying me, or else the Knights of the Vale will have to mourn their lady’s widow.”

“I would mourn him as well,” he quipped. “Don’t worry, your Grace. I had my lesson concerning the betrayal of the queen.”

The rest of the day was quiet, without accident. Cersei remained in her rooms, shut to the rest of the world. She looked at Jaime who rode away with four men through the Lion’s Gate in the end of the afternoon. Her other half was gone, though Cersei didn’t feel like she lost him. His departure was no loss, since the loss occurred a long time ago. Perhaps she should have felt something all the same, but she didn’t. She felt what she had to feel before, and she wouldn’t feel it again. This night, for the first time in centuries, Cersei slept well. No nightmare came to haunt her, and Maggy the Frog didn’t whisper into her ear.

The next day, on the morning, she was listening to Qyburn about their stocks of grain.

“We have enough food in the Red Keep to sustain a siege that could last years, but many granaries burned during the unfortunate destruction of the Great Sept. With the Rose Road closed, we won’t be able to import more grain for the people. We will barely have enough to get through two years of winter. If winter lasts any longer, then the smallfolk will die by the thousands.”

“Let them die, then,” Cersei said dismissively. “A smaller smallfolk should be easier and quite convenient to rule. Let’s drop the matter of food stocks and focus on the defenses of the Red Keep.”

“As you wish your Grace.” Cersei drank some wine as Qyburn began to expose the progress of the construction of the scorpions on the Red Keep. “Several good positions have already been designated to install scorpions, ballistas, trebuchets and catapults. The men are a little reticent at the idea of facing dragons, but for now they remain in line. We managed to maintain the idea that the stories about the dragons are only stories. Though I’m not sure for how long we will be able to keep the belief that all those stories the men of Dragonstone brought with them are only stories and nothing more. Perhaps it would be a good thing to spread another story, different, that would reassure the men, or turn their attention towards something else.”

Before the failed master could answer, they heard a great shriek. They looked at each other, then another shriek followed. Qyburn looked at the balcony and walked to it. Cersei followed a moment later. The shriek that followed was even more piercing, so much that it looked like it came from above their heads.

Then they saw it. From above their heads, a huge creature, black, with great wings maybe thirty feet long, appeared in the sky, flying away southwest. Two other creatures appeared at his side, smaller. One was green, the other one orange or something similar. Cersei looked at them, unable to say anything. It only lasted a moment. Soon, the three winged creatures shrunk, then disappeared on the horizon.
For a long time afterwards, Cersei remained there, unmoving. Silence surrounded her. It was as if everything, even the city below, had been paralyzed, and that everything that lived had stopped moving, like in a trance. In this very moment, Cersei Lannister realized that her true enemy wasn’t the people, or the Martells, or the Tyrells, or the Imp, or Sansa, or any other lord. Her true enemy was the young woman with blond hair who rode the black dragon she just saw.

Chapter Notes

It might not look to be the case when you start reading this chapter, but I think many people have been waiting for it a very long time. You'll understand why.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

TRYSTANE V

It was said that Storm’s End was built after King Durran declared war against the gods, and that it was the seventh castle he built and the only one to resist the storms. It was also said that Storm’s End was never taken by force. Stannis Baratheon had resisted to a long siege during his brother’s rebellion, and during the War of the Five Kings, the castle surrendered without enduring a siege after King Renly’s mysterious death. Apparently, Renly Baratheon had assumed that Trystane’s father would side with him when he would wage war to his enemies, but Prince Doran Martell had taken a very different path. Instead of supporting Renly, he accepted a defensive alliance with Joffrey, an alliance that led to the betrothal of Trystane with Myrcella.

Renly was dead now, and so was Stannis… and Myrcella. Trystane cast a look at his side, where Obara Sand stood on a horse just like him. He hated her. She could be his cousin, but she was also one of the women who murdered Myrcella. He wished his uncle had never met that whore in Oldtown. Obara had come with reinforcements from Dorne who joined Trystane’s forces a few days ago. She said they would have taken less time to arrive if it hadn’t been for the army the Tyrells sent and who blocked the Prince’s Pass. The Tyrells finally retreated one day, and later they learned that Randyll Tarly had died in King’s Landing. His son, Dickon, had gone back to Horn Hill, and the Dornish troops were able to progress into the Stormlands, catching the lords by surprise as much as Trystane did with the Dothrakis and the Unsullied. Over half of the Stormlands had fallen to them now, and if Storm’s End fell today, it would be a matter of days before every lord in this kingdom fell on their knees. The Storm King was the first king to be defeated by Aegon Targaryen when he invaded Westeros, and his kingdom would be the first to fall into the hands of his descendant.

Trystane had to admit that he was impressed by the castle. He never left Dorne before sailing to Meereen, and he had to say the castle of the former Storm Kings was impressive. The walls, made of pale grey stone, were about one hundred feet high, impossible to climb. Trystane didn’t see how an assault on it could end without heavy casualties for the attackers. A lone tower was to be seen, emerging from the interior of the castle, well protected by the deep walls. Any enemy movement could be seen miles around by someone who would stand at the top of this tower, and Trystane suspected the tower was in itself a castle inside the castle. Any attempt to take it would kill thousands of people.

Doran Martell taught to his son to only fight when he had to, when he had good odds of winning, and also when the cost of the victory wasn’t so heavy that it would make the victory useless. Trystane could see now what his father meant. The cost of seizing Storm’s End would be far too great if they had to storm the castle. Trystane wasn’t eager to unleash a storm of men upon the castle when its name was Storm’s End. It would be better if they took the castle without a fight.

That was what he hoped for as he watched the delegation approach. He discussed with Ser Adar Kellington, the commander of Storm’s End garrison, yesterday. The man was calm enough to have a civilized discussion and negotiate with Trystane. The first thing he said when he and Trystane met was I’m glad that this army is not being led by a barbarian. None of the storm lords were pleased to see their lands ravaged by the Dothrakis, and Trystane couldn’t blame them. They were unruly and plundered and raped everything they saw. Trystane’s attempts to forbid rape had been useless, and Ser Jorah quietly discouraged him to make strong attempts to stop the Dothrakis in their behavior. Looking at how the Dothrakis defied anyone in duel as soon as they felt insulted and how they fought, Trystane had no illusion about his chances to defeat a Dothraki in single combat. Still, he was furious that he could do nothing against the atrocities they committed. That was exactly what his father told him that war brought. He would need to talk to Daenerys Targaryen the next time they would meet. She may have enough influence on the Dothrakis to force them to change their ways.

The Dothrakis could pose a real problem in the future. They were very good to cause terror, but the problem was often to force them to stop their raids after a lord surrendered. So far, they could distract them by turning them against lords who had not yet surrendered, but it wouldn’t last. One day, there wouldn’t be enough lords still fighting to satisfy the needs of the Dothrakis for rape and plunder, and when that day would come, no one would want to surrender when they realized that it didn’t mean a halt to the ravages on their lands. To have a dragon with them would be quite useful right now, but the three were with their queen.

Ser Kellington was close now, riding with two other men. During their first discussion, Trystane promised him that no harm would come to his men if he surrendered peacefully, but that if he resisted, he wasn’t to expect any mercy from the queen. He hoped the threat of the dragons was strong enough to motivate the knight. He doubted Storm’s End could resist three dragons when Harrenhal couldn’t resist one.

To be honest, Trystane wouldn’t understand if Ser Kellington was to resist. He had every reason to surrender Storm’s End. Tommen Baratheon was dead. They learned about the death of Myrcella’s brother not long after they landed, when they took their first castle. Trystane didn’t know what to think of this. On one hand, it would make the conquest of the Seven Kingdoms easier, but Tommen was Myrcella’s brother. She always spoke fondly of her little brother. What would she think of him right now, fighting against her family? Her mother proclaimed herself queen, and Margaery and Loras Tyrell died when she seized the power, after her son committed suicide. That was why the Tyrells had abandoned their plans of invading Dorne. They suspected Cersei Lannister to have intentionally killed Mace Tyrell’s children. Remembering what Myrcella told him about her mother and that she murdered her own husband, Trystane had no difficulty to imagine it.

Adar Kellington had no reason to fight for the woman who murdered the previous Lord of Storm’s End. All the Baratheons were dead, so he had no one to fight for. Furthermore, the Targaryens killed no Baratheon during Robert’s Rebellion. He could understand the Starks and their bannermen if they refused to surrender. After all, his uncle Oberyn had wanted to keep the war going on after his aunt and her children were murdered. He couldn’t blame the Starks for refusing to follow Daenerys Targaryen after what her father did to two of them, three if Lyanna Stark’s death was to be included. However, the commander of the garrison of Storm’s End had absolutely no reason to resist, no grudge to hold against House Targaryen. Any fight would be vain. Trystane hoped the knight understood that well. He seemed reasonable, or so he hoped.

Ser Kellington arrived before them. Along with Trystane and Obara were Ser Jorah Mormont, Grey Worm, two Dothraki commanders whose names he had difficulty to pronounce, Lord Anders Yronwood and Malcolm Branfield. Trystane would lead the parley and receive the surrender, if there was one.

“My prince,” Ser Adar said as an introduction.
“Ser Adar. Have you taken a decision? If you surrender, I can make sure nothing happens to your men. If you don’t, however, I won’t be able to protect you or them when we storm the castle.”

The knight took some time before he replied. “I took my decision. I am ready to accept your terms.” Trystane sighed inwardly in relief. “At one condition. I don’t want these barbarians inside my castle.”

He cast a look at the Dothrakis in Trystane’s delegation. The two riders eyed the knight suspiciously. They didn’t speak the common tongue, so they couldn’t understand what Ser Adar just said, but at the same time they couldn’t miss the repulsion that his face showed.

“No Dothraki will be settled inside Storm’s End, on that you have my word. However, you must expect a few of them to attend official events, especially when the queen comes.”

Trystane waited for the knight to answer. “I accept.”

“Very well.” He looked at Branfield who rocked their banner, giving the signal to the Unsullied. “I trust your men will cause no problem and surrender their weapons without question.”

“Your have my word, Prince Trystane. I ask to return with your men to the castle, to make sure nothing goes wrong.”

“Granted.”

The column of five hundred Unsullied marched towards them as they spoke. When they reached their position, Malcolm Branfield took their lead and Trystane allowed Ser Adar to follow with his two men. Grey Worm and the Dothraki commanders went back to their camp to take care of their own men, and Trystane remained where he was with Obara Sand and Lord Yronwood.

“You must be glad,” his cousin declared.

“You said?” Trystane asked.

“You must be very proud of yourself. You just took a big castle without a fight.”

“Strangely, yes, I’m very proud of it.”

“There is no pride in taking a castle without fighting,” Lord Yronwood said.

“Well, if we stormed the castle, we would lose countless people. You may be right, Lord Yronwood, I shouldn’t be proud, but I rather prefer to see thousands of men live than to feel pride for taking a castle at the cost of their lives.”

“Would you have the same thoughts if you handed Dorne to the Lannisters in order to save lives?” Obara wondered with hostility.

“That’s different. If the Lannisters tried to take Dorne, we would have to fight to defend it. We wouldn’t have a choice. We weren’t forced to fight to take Storm’s End. There’s no point in sacrificing men when we can achieve our goal without having them killed.”

“True, you’re right cousin. The Lannisters don’t need to send an army to take Dorne. They only need to send a blond-haired girl who opens her legs for you.”

Trystane wanted nothing less than to take his sword and slit Obara’s throat right away. Why wasn’t she in King’s Landing with Tyene when the Sept of Baelor collapsed over her head? He would be rid of two Sand Snakes instead of one. Trystane felt it was only justice that Tyene died after she murdered Myrcella, and it would only be justice that Obara died as well for helping her. She had been insufferable ever since she arrived, mocking him at every turn, provoking him. Trystane knew he shouldn’t take the bait she gave him, not when so many lords of Dorne were close. She provoked him on purpose in the presence of Lord Yronwood right now, and he wouldn’t shame his house when one of their most powerful bannermen was present. He took the calmest voice he could find given the circumstances.

“I’m sure you know a lot about open legs, cousin.”

Lord Yronwood sniggered, though it was obvious he tried to hide it. Obara’s eyes were throwing daggers. “Be careful, cousin.”

“Be careful, yourself. In Dorne, insulting a princess is a serious crime, grave enough to be executed.”

“Not insulting a bastard.”

Trystane didn’t look at her. “Lord Yronwood, come with me. I think it’s safe enough for us to go in.” The yellow banner with a black stag on the battlements had been dropped, replaced by the red sun pierced by a spear on an orange field and the red three-headed dragon on a black field. “Obara Sand, you stay outside. Since you have such a poor opinion of bastards, I wouldn’t want to bring one into an important castle like this one.”

“Do you really think you can give me orders?”

Rage was boiling inside Trystane. “Lord Yronwood, ride forward. I’ll join you.” The Lord of Yronwood did as he was told and left Trystane alone with Obara. “I warn you, shut your mouth,” he told her as soon as they were alone.

“Why? Or else you’re going to kill me?” She mocked him again. Trystane had no envy to play this game.

“Whether you shut your mouth, or I give free leave to the Dothrakis to rape you and your sisters as much as they like. I wonder how many you will manage to kill before they get to you. Maybe you’ll kill a few, but they will get you in the end.”

She kept smiling smugly. “You wouldn’t do that. Your father would never approve.”

“I don’t need his approval, and I don’t need the bastard daughter of a slut. Everyone finds you unbearable and insufferable. You humiliate House Martell with your behavior. The lords of Dorne will be relieved to see you die.”

He shook the reins of his horse and moved forward, leaving the bastard behind. Obara was a real bastard, a murderer. She could say what she wanted, between the Sand Snakes and Myrcella, his uncle’s daughters would always be the bastards and Myrcella the princess. Lord Yronwood was waiting for him and adjusted his pace to Trystane’s mount.

“You should send her away, my prince. An army is no place for a woman, especially not one like this,” he advised him.

“She should really leave,” the lord insisted. “Her way to address you is inappropriate. She makes fools of Dorne in the presence of everyone.”
“I agree, but I’m afraid we will have to suffer her presence a little while longer. But for now, I’ll banish her from the councils.”

“Good decision, my prince.”

Lord Yronwood was a good friend of Doran Martell. Despite the rumors of Oberyn poisoning his grandfather during a duel, Lord Anders had maintained good relations with his father, even more after Quentyn was fostered to Yronwood. Trystane’s brother had even been knighted by Lord Yronwood himself. His father maintained peace in Dorne this way. Trystane wondered if he would be able to do the same.

They went through the gates of Storm’s End and found themselves into the main yard. The Unsullied were escorting unarmed men with the arms of House Baratheon. Everything was in order. Trystane asked an Unsullied officer where Malcolm Branfield was. He found him in the main hall, where the throne of the former Storm Kings and Lords Paramount of the Stormlands was. To Trystane, the appearance of this hall was entirely foreign, nothing to see with Sunspear or Meereen. Dorne seemed to have more in common with Essos than with the rest of the Seven Kingdoms when it came to architecture. He supposed this wasn’t strange since his ancestors came from Essos, and they came to Dorne much later than the First Men or the Andals.

“Storm’s End is ours,” the man from the Crownlands declared when he saw Trystane walk in. “No resistance. I have to say, the conquest of the Stormlands proves to be easy, so far. I find it almost too easy.”

“We’ll have to expect resistance, sooner or later,” Trystane recognized. “With Tommen dead, the storm lords are in disarray. They have no one to lead them. It will be different by the time we get to the Reach and the Crownlands. And I didn’t talk about the king in the North who claims to be Rhaegar’s last living son.”

“I agree. We will meet resistance at some point. People will fight against us even if they see everything is lost and that they gain nothing from it. My own family kept fighting for Daenerys’s father until the end, and we paid it dearly. I lost my father and my brothers in this.”

“Hopefully, the lords in the Crownlands won’t be as loyal to Cersei Lannister as your father was to our queen’s father. At least, once the war is over, you’ll get your family’s lands back. I’m sure the queen will give them to you.”

“Maybe.” Strangely, he didn’t seem very eager about this. “I was wondering. I have a niece at Oldtown. I could send her a raven, just to let her know that I am well.”

“It could be dangerous, Malcolm. You could give the impression to the Hightowers that your niece is working for the Targaryens.”

Malcolm Branfield grumbled, obviously unhappy. “You’re right. I just wish she knew I was alive. Everyone else in our family is dead, Ironrath is destroyed. She probably believes everyone she knows is dead. I’d like her to know that she still has an uncle somewhere.”

“I’ll let you communicate with her as soon as the Hightowers bend the knee.”

The man nodded. “We will have to split our forces to invade both the Reach and the Crownlands. Do you think I could participate to the invasion of the Reach?”

“I’m afraid not. You know the Crownlands better. You were born there. Daenerys Targaryen will want you with the invasion force that will march on the capital. Furthermore, we hope the Tyrells
Malcolm sighed. “I’ll have to wait before I can see Mira, it seems. Well, I’ll go back to look at our men.”

They were at the beginning of the day when Storm’s End surrendered. Trystane used the rest of the day to make sure everything was in order in the castle. He sent a raven to Dragonstone to inform Daenerys that they had taken the main castle of the Stormlands, and he also sent ravens to every castle in the Stormlands to tell them of the events that took place at Storm’s End. Trystane was quite sure that many lords would surrender immediately when they learned that the seat of the Baratheons had fallen. They would be able to invade the Reach and the Crownlands very soon. Trystane hoped that invading the other kingdoms would be as easy as it was with the Stormlands, but he knew better than to expect his hopes would come true. There would be a battle soon, a real battle. Hopefully, they would have Daenerys Targaryen’s dragons when it came.

He then had a war council with the other commanders of the army. Obara wasn’t there, so it made the reunion much easier for him. He decided to stay at Storm’s End for some time, to organize the kingdom before the queen arrived. Ser Jorah and Grey Worm would complete the surrendering of the lords who still resisted. He thought for a moment to give a day of rest to the men, but Ser Jorah strongly advised against it, saying they wouldn’t be able to keep the Dothrakis under control if they were to stay too long in one place. So Trystane remained at Storm’s End with three hundred men, all Dornish soldiers.

They left at dawn on the next morning. Obara went with the army, so Trystane got rid of her at the same occasion. He hoped she would die during the campaign. In the middle of the day, some lords had already replied to their ravens. Lord Robert Cafferan of Fawnton was the first lord to swear fealty to Daenerys Targaryen after the fall of Storm’s End.

Trystane had never thought that he would help a queen to conquer the Seven Kingdoms. His father had taught him to prioritize peace over war, diplomacy over swords, crops and wells over armies, ruling over sword fighting. If his father had told him that one day he would end up helping a woman with three dragons to take the Iron Throne… There were many things his father should have told him. He kept everything secret and only told him the truth very late, when he needed Trystane to hear it. He didn’t tell him of his plans to overthrow the Lannisters and the Baratheons. Trystane could have understood, after what they did to his aunt and her children, but his father hid him the truth and made him believe that he would marry Myrcella. He felt like his father used him. He even hid him that Myrcella was… It didn’t matter. His father had these information from the Spider, and Trystane knew better than to trust this man. He knew better than anyone who were the real bastards.

His squire came inside at this moment. “My prince, Tyene Sand is asking for you.”

Trystane froze. He was writing a raven for his father, to tell him about their progress. He looked at his squire, who had to be only two years younger than him. “What are you saying?”

“Tyene Sand is here. She asks for an audience with you.”

Trystane slowly laid the pen on the table. “Tyene is dead. She was in King’s Landing when everything was destroyed.”

“Well, she’s here, my prince. I swear, this is her, or else this woman looks very much like your cousin.” How could Tyene have survived? “Where do you want to meet her?”

“Uh, well, in the main hall. Bring her there.”
Trystane lingered for a long time behind after his squire had left. Tyene was still alive. He had thought she was dead, that somehow Myrcella had been avenged. Now, he just learnt that Tyene was still alive. She had been the one to hurt Myrcella, to make the cut that poisoned her and killed her. And now she was here. What was he going to do? He had a few ideas about how to bring justice to his cousins for their crimes. His uncle Oberyn would probably not disapprove if he was still alive. Oberyn Martell always said the murdering of children was criminal. He wouldn’t approve that his daughters assassinated an innocent young woman. Trystane was seeking the same thing than his uncle, revenge and justice.

Trystane walked decisively into the main hall and waited on the dais. After a moment, the doors opened and his cousin came inside. She wore usual robes for a septa, but they were ruined. She was also all dirty, as if she travelled for a very long time.

“Hi, cousin. Glad to see you,” she said.

Her behaviour had not changed. She smiled mischievously at him, the same way she did before she murdered Myrcella. Trystane took a look around. There were twenty men with him in this room, and Tyene was alone. He only had to give the order and the guards could kill her. However, he realized the moment he thought about it how it could turn problematic. The guards were all from Dorne, and they all knew that Tyene was one of the many daughters of Oberyn Martell. They wouldn’t execute such an order without hesitation. And Trystane had to think about his house. What would everyone believe if he was to order the murder, without any reason, of one of his cousins? Officially, Myrcella wasn’t murdered by Tyene, and even if the people knew about it, many in Dorne hated the Lannisters and the Baratheons so much that they would thank the Sand Snakes for what they did. No, he couldn’t order Tyene’s death. He would have to find another way to avenge Myrcella.

Trystane looked at his cousin, who kept smiling. She knew he hated her, and she kept taunting him, just like Obara did. He didn’t smile to her, he didn’t welcome her, but he tried his best to remain civil when he spoke.

“What do you want?”

“Nothing. I just wanted to see my uncle’s son. I heard you took Storm’s End.” It was the voice she used when she tried to seduce a man. Was she trying to do the same with him? She should know it wouldn’t work.

“I thought you would follow Obara and the army. You probably crossed their path on your way here.”

She shrugged. “Maybe, but I thought you could use some company. I heard you were all alone in a huge castle.” Trystane’s right fist formed a ball. For the second time in two days, he wanted nothing more than to kill a Sand Snake.

“Why are you really here?”

She kept smiling smugly. “I brought you a gift. A very useful gift, and I thought Storm’s End was a good place to keep it safe.”

Tyene turned to her right. It was at this moment that Trystane realized that she didn’t come alone. He had been so focused on Tyene that he didn’t notice the person standing a few feet behind her. There was a Silent Sister with her, her robes in quite a sorry state as well, her face obviously covered by dirt despite the fact most of it was hidden.

“Come on, remove your hood. My brother is very kind with girls from enemy houses,” Tyene said on a patronizing tone to the Sister.

Slowly, hesitantly, her hand shaking, the woman removed her hood and her veil. The part of her face that was previously covered didn’t prove to be much better than the rest of it, all blackened by dust and mud. Despite this, there was something oddly familiar about her.

“Who are you?” he asked her.

She looked at him, and seemed to hesitate before she spoke. “Prince Trystane, I beg for your help.” Her eyes were begging as much as her voice. “My name is Margaery Tyrell.”

Chapter End Notes

Now, we all know who escaped the Great Sept of Baelor. Not that it was a great secret, but I preferred to keep some doubts. I was very criticized for initially killing Margaery in the explosion, and I admit that killing her after I developed her character so much, and in the same way than in the show, was mean. Now we can continue to watch her play the game of thrones. This also means the rose will meet the dragon very soon.

Next chapter : Mira
The portcullis was torn as if a giant had opened it with his hands. The wooden archway over the entrance gate had been destroyed, as were the other wooden fortifications over the bailey. The stone walls were all blackened. Over it flew the banner of her house. Mira Forrester was back home.

As they progressed through the entrance, Mira saw more of the buildings inside. Half of the huge double doors that led to the Great Hall was missing. The Great Hall itself had been burned, and whole sections were missing. When they entered the courtyard, Mira could take in a scene of desolation. All the smaller buildings had been burned, and there was almost nothing left of them. People were working to erect new habitations. Mira judged they had to be twenty, at most, plus the guards, which had to make about forty people in Ironrath. That was before she and Talia arrived. If they added the twenty other men they brought with them, there were now sixty living souls in Ironrath.

A man with a hammer very close to the gate looked up from his work and saw them. He let his tool fall on the ground.

“Lady Talia.” He stopped before Mira, looking at her for a moment, then his eyes widened. “Lady Mira. It’s good to see you again.”

“Ralten. It’s good to see you too,” Mira replied. Ralten was the blacksmith of Ironrath when Mira left years ago. Back then, he didn’t have strays of grey in his hair and he didn’t look weary like he did now.

He looked tired, very tired. Despite the cold weather, sweat covered his forehead and his wet hair was stuck to his red face. Mira looked around. Some people stopped what they were doing as they realized she and Talia had arrived, but they were all working on building back the structures that the Whitehills destroyed. Judging from the state of the whole place, they would need to work very hard and very fast if they wanted to be ready for winter.

“My ladies,” one of the guards who welcomed them before the gates said. “If you would, I will escort you to the Great Hall.”

“We’ll help with your horses,” Ralten said.

Mira dismounted and so did her sister and all their company. Mira looked around and saw no stables.

“Where will you put the horses?” Mira asked Ralten.

“We’ll attach them to a pole. We didn’t have time to finish the stables yet. We only began the foundations.”

That wasn’t good. Without stables, the horses would die, out in the cold. “We’ll need to talk about it later.”
She followed the guards to the Great Hall. Ironwood didn’t burn easily. There was a special method to make it burn, a method known to the Forresters and only to the Forresters. However, every material burned if it was exposed to fire long enough, no matter how resistant it was to fire. Harrenhal burned even if it was made of stone, and although most of the ships of Stannis Baratheon’s fleet were made of ironwood, wildfire consumed them all the same. Mira didn’t witness the ships burn since she wasn’t in King’s Landing for the battle, but she saw the wreckage of the fleet in Blackwater Bay later, when she came to the capital, just like she could see the damage fire made to her home.

Wood and stone were blackened all alike, on the walls, on the ceilings, on the roofs. Torches were missing on the walls, and as they progressed through the corridors, she noticed cold ashes in the corners the servants hadn’t cleaned yet. When they arrived to the room where the Lord of Ironrath received guests and gave feasts, a flood of memories came back to Mira’s mind. When the ruined doors gave way, she saw her father and her mother, Lord Gregor Forrester, the Good, and Lady Elissa Branfield, sitting side by side as they all ate together at the high table. On her father’s right was Rodrik, already looking like a man. Talia and Ethan sat side by side, and Asher was exchanging jokes with his older brother. Ser Royland and Ser Duncan were with them too. At last, sitting beside the maester, Mira saw a younger girl, no more than thirteen. She was speaking with Maester Ortengryn, like she always did, listening attentively to all his answers. She looked back at Mira, who just stared at her for a long time. They had the same eyes, the same color of hair, but the resemblance stopped there. The girl who was known to everybody as Mira Forrester, who sat next to the maester bound to Ironrath, who wore robes made of wool to remain warm in the cold weather, who arranged her hair in the common northern style, who played to hide-and-seek with her siblings in the grove behind their home, looked upon her older self, the Lady Mira Hightower, a married woman, with a costly ring of gold and diamond at her hand, her hair arranged in the southern fashion, wearing furs that only ladies from the south would wear, the handmaiden of a dead queen.

The thought of Margaery brought a pang to her heart and it brought back the memory of Sera as well, which only tightened the knot in her chest further. The people at the table disappeared one by one, until only the girl with black hair remained, all alone. She kept looking at Mira, a tear running on her cheek, then she faded as well.

“The Whitehills had a small garrison here,” one of the men who welcomed her explained. “When they learned what happened at Winterfell and that Torrhen Whitehill was killed, they left. They burned the whole place again, as if the first one hadn’t been enough. They had started to rebuild Ironrath, but all their work went into smoke. They murdered everyone inside the castle. When Lord Asher arrived, there were only ashes and burned bodies everywhere. Some were hanging from the battlements. He went back on the road immediately for Highpoint with most of his men.”

“Gwyn and Ryon didn’t stay behind?” Talia asked.

“No, they went with the army. Lady Forrester wanted to accompany Lord Forrester, and so did your young brother. They only left us behind, thirty-five men, to guard Ironrath and rebuild it.”

“And the other people here?”

“Some are farmers or hunters from the surroundings, others are former members of the household who miraculously survived the Whitehills. They helped us to somehow rebuild this place, though there’s still a lot to do.”

Indeed, there was still a lot of work to do. Mira noticed with sadness but without surprise that the tapestry was gone. It couldn’t survive to fire.

“We cleared your old rooms, my ladies, and we keep working on clearing the other rooms, but it will take months before the Great Hall can be a proper living place again,” the guard continued.

“What about the granaries and the larders? What about our provisions for winter?” Mira asked.

“None left. The Whitehills took or burned everything there was. The larders are being rebuilt, but we still need to wait for the granaries.”

“Wait a minute.” Mira interrupted him. “You didn’t start to rebuild the granaries?”

The soldier looked at her. “We don’t have much workforce, my lady. There have been several other matters to retain our attention.”

“What other matters? You’ve been here for a month, almost, and yet none of the essential buildings have been repaired. The granaries, the stables, the larders. I didn’t even see a smithy when I arrived. What did you work on all this time?”

The guard crossed his arms. “We worked mostly on the Great Hall, at the demand of your husband, my lady.”

Mira was taken aback by this. “I beg your pardon?”

“Ser Gerold Hightower gave us the order to make sure that the Great Hall would be a suitable place to live in when you would arrive. He was the one to give us that order. Since Lord Forrester didn’t give us a single instruction about rebuilding Ironrath, we obeyed to Ser Gerold.”

Mira couldn’t believe it. What did her husband think about? “How many men are working on the Great Hall right now?”

“On the forty who are working, half of them.”

“Well, from now on, I only want five people working on the Great Hall. All the others are to rebuild the essential buildings, including the stables and the granaries, and also their homes. The Great Hall is in a good enough shape, and we’ll be able to work on it from the inside when the storm comes. And I want the servants to work as well on the reconstruction.”

The man looked shocked. “My lady, if you do that, there won’t be anyone left to wait after you and your sister.”

“I was a lady-in-waiting for a queen, and Talia and I both spent the last months in army camps. I think we can take care of ourselves. We don’t need servants to make our fire or our bed.”

He looked at Talia, who only shrugged. He bowed and left, saying he would do as Mira told him. Mira also told the other people to leave her and her sister alone.

“Well, you’re good at giving orders,” Talia said once they were all gone.

“What was Gerold thinking about? Making the rebuilding of the Great Hall a priority? Without place to stock our reserves, we won’t last a single year through winter.”

“I agree, though we have nothing to stock right now. You heard Byron. The Whitehills burned everything.”

Byron. Now, Mira remembered his name. “I’ll send a raven to Sansa. She’ll send us something. She won’t abandon us.”

Talia looked embarrassed. “There’s a problem, Mira. We have no raven left. We killed them all after we made Gryff Whitehill prisoner. We didn’t want the traitor to send information to his father.”

Mira pursed her lips together. “Well, we have no choice but to send a rider. It’s too important. Without food in reserve for winter, we are doomed. In the meantime, we should try to increase the activity of the hunters. It would probably be good to open the woods to everyone for hunting. With all the ravages of the war, this is no time to reserve the woods for highborn people. The smallfolk will need food as much as us.”

Talia nodded. “We must find a new master-at-arms, a new steward, a new maester too. We… we must start all over again.”

“I’ll tell the man we’ll send to Winterfell to ask for a new master to the Citadel as well. I am a Hightower, so maybe the archmaesters will hurry.”

Talia grinned. “It seems to be a blessing that my sister was wed in the south.”

Mira returned the smile. She wondered what Gerold was doing right now. She hoped Asher wouldn’t taunt him too much as they besieged Highpoint.

Talia walked to the chair of the Lord of Ironrath. It had survived, almost without a scratch. Mira’s sister stopped several steps before it, and then she didn’t move. Mira joined her after a moment, placing a hand on her shoulder. In a year or two, Talia would be as tall as she was.

“That’s where he killed Ethan.” Her sister’s voice was hoarse. “Ramsay. He plunged a dagger in his throat, and Ethan died. He died right there, in front of me, and there was nothing I could do.”

Mira put her arm around her sister’s shoulders. “Sometimes, there’s nothing we can do.” There was nothing she could do while she was in King’s Landing to help her family. Nothing that she did could have saved them. She had been powerless, as much as Talia was this day.

“It shouldn’t be like this. Ramsay wanted to take me away, and now… I know what he did to the girls he took. We all know it now, after… Ethan saved me from this. He shouldn’t be dead.”

“I know, Talia. He shouldn’t be dead. Many people shouldn’t have died. Many that live deserve death, and some that die deserve life.”

They remained silent for a long time before Talia spoke again. “You were right at Winterfell. The war brought us nothing. We lost so many people, and for what? Joffrey ended up dead at his wedding. We lost Father, Mother, Rodrik, Ethan, Ser Royland, Maester Ortengryn, and who else could we lose in the future? We are at war again. Asher could have died at Winterfell. I thought I would feel better after Ramsay died, after Ethan was avenged, but I don’t. And killing Ludd Whitehill… Asher and Ryon only think about that. They could get themselves killed at Highpoint. Rodrik and Father should never have left. They wouldn’t be dead, and we would all be alive, all together, just like before.”

Things were not as simple as that, but Mira couldn’t tell her sister that she was wrong. Their brother died right in front of her. Mira just held her as Talia wept, tears coming out of her eyes. Mira had cried for all her dead siblings a long time ago, back in King’s Landing, but her sister didn’t have the opportunity to mourn her brother. They had all been in danger here at Ironrath, and the Whitehills were a persistent threat. They never had time like Mira did. Mira met her own challenges in the capital. She was forced to act as if everything was all right, that nothing affected her, but she could still cry in private for the people she cared for who were gone. She had her own time and her own place where to mourn those she loved and that she lost. She also had friends to help her. There was the uncertainty of her family’s fate that was an ordeal as well, but that was nothing when compared to the dangers her siblings met in the North.

In the end, Mira just remained there with Talia for a very long time. They supped together later, in silence. None of them really wanted to talk. Talia retired to her chamber early. Mira could have gone to bed as well, but she didn’t feel like she could sleep. Instead, she wandered through the Great Hall of Ironrath. Mira had never felt lonely here, but today was different. So many people were gone, and so many could leave them any moment as well. Her husband and her brothers were risking their lives at Highpoint. If Ludd Whitehill was anything like the man he was when Mira last saw him, he would never surrender. She remembered his rage when he discovered the secret relationship between Asher and his daughter. She was afraid for Asher. He had a rage to fight. He would be in the thick of the battle when they would assault the fortress of the Whitehills. Would Gerold be able to stop him from doing anything foolish? She made him promise to stop her brother from killing Gwyn’s father, but would he be able to hold his promise?

Without realizing it, Mira ended at the top of the tower, looking over the courtyard. It was almost night, though they were quite early in the afternoon. In the North, in the middle of winter, days were short. She could still see people working on their houses, trying to be ready for the time when winter would strike them hard. If Margaery was there, she would give them money and food to help them. But Margaery wasn’t there, and Mira had no food and no money to give them, her own people. Some of them, like Ralten, had known her ever since she came into the world. She recognized him, still working near the gates. The moon was full and there were no clouds in the sky, so it was easy to see. Were Elys and Garlan looking at the moon as well in Oldtown?

The top of the ironwood trees brushed the moon in the sky. Mira took a closer look at them. Their branches were devoid of leaves, but the light of the moon didn’t show any sign of fire on the trunks. She left the tower and decided to go in the grove.

When she watched them closer, she realized the first trees had been touched by fire, but as she sank deeper into the grove, the leaves reappeared and the few marks of burning that were visible on the trees at the edge left. Ironwood didn’t burn easily, indeed. Mira was surprised the Whitehills didn’t cut down the whole grove. Perhaps they thought it was too good a natural defense for the castle and preferred to destroy the forests.

As she progressed through the grove alone, her path lightened by the torch she held in her right arm, Mira revived moments of her childhood.

“Mira, come with me. Your father and I, we have to talk with you,” her mother called after her.

She was playing with Rodrik, Talia and Ethan. She wanted to stay and looked with envy at them, then at her mother. She was giving her that look meaning that she had to come, that it was her duty.

“I’ll come back later,” she told her brothers and Talia.

She followed her mother to her father’s solar. “Did I do something wrong, mother?” she asked.

“No, Mira. Don’t worry. You did nothing wrong. Your father and I must only talk to you about something very important in private.”

Mira was relieved, though she wondered why her parents needed to speak to her alone. There were only a few reasons why they would do so, but she ignored which one it was. When they entered her father’s solar, he was tapping his desk with his fingers. He smiled when he saw her. People said she looked very much like him and that they shared the same smile, among many other things.

“Mira, please sit.” She took a seat in front of him, just like she was taught, and her mother sat by her side. “You’re probably curious as to why we asked you here.”

“Yes, Father,” she admitted.

“Well, I won’t keep the suspense any longer. It may come as a shock for you, but I think you knew it could happen someday. We arranged for you to have a place in Highgarden as a handmaiden.”

Highgarden? Highgarden was the seat of House Tyrell, the Wardens of the South and the Lords Paramount of the Reach. Her father kept talking.

“Your mother has contacts there, friends from her time in the south, and she was able to get you a place in Lord Tyrell’s household.”

So that was it. Her lady mother had told her years ago that Mira would probably have to leave for the south eventually. She introduced Mira to the southern ways, taught her the courtesies and ways to behave in the south. Mira hadn’t been sure whether she wanted to leave or not. She knew she would have to leave one day, but she loved Ironrath and she was in no eagerness to leave her home and her family.

“When do I leave?” she asked her father.

“Next week. I’ll accompany you to Winterfell, and then you’ll make the rest of the journey with a few of my guards.”

“Yes, Father.”

Her father smiled fondly at her, then he looked at her mother. “Could you leave me with our daughter for a moment, please?”

“Of course.”

Lady Elissa Forrester walked out obediently. Mira found herself alone with her father. Although it was her mother who mostly raised and educated her, her father had always had time for her. He kept smiling fondly at her, but she thought she saw a hint of sadness behind his smile. He stood up, walked around his desk and came to sit in front of her. He remained silent for a moment.

Mira didn’t really know how she felt about it. She knew she would leave one day, but she always saw it as something inevitable, not as something she should either desire or dread. “I will do my duty, Father.”

Her father’s smile stretched for a moment, but not for long. He lowered his head as it happened. Gared said she didn’t only smile just like her father. She also did exactly the same movements than him when she smiled.

“I don’t want you to leave, Mira. You’re a Northerner, a Forrester, and I’ll never feel entirely safe knowing you are so far away from us. But there comes a time when we must let our children go away. You do know why your mother wants you to go south?”

“She wants me to learn the southern ways,” Mira answered.

“Aye, but you know why she wants you to learn these ways. You know why she prepared you all these years for this time in the south.” Mira nodded. “Your mother hopes you will marry someone from the south. You don’t feel uncomfortable about this?”
“No, Father.” It was her duty.

“Good. I wouldn’t want to send you there if it wasn’t the case.” Her father then took her hand into his. “Just remember this, Mira. You are a Forrester. You’ll always be a Forrester. Never forget that.”

Mira arrived in the clearing. Once, she had spotted Asher talking with Gwyn there. There, before the trunk of a tree that was bigger than the others, Talia and Ethan had played music more often than she could remember. Behind another tree, she recognized the place where Rodrik always hid when Elaena Glenmore visited them. She always found him, and Mira suspected now that Rodrik had wanted her to find him, and that it was why he always hid at the same place. Farther, out of the path, Asher used to teach Ethan how to fight with a wooden sword. And that stump… She used to come here to read from time to time.

She remembered a time when it began to rain as she read a book she borrowed from Maester Ortengryn. It was a very precious work of his collection, about the history of ironwood crafting. A few droplets had begun to stain the page she was reading, and within a few seconds it was as if people were emptying buckets of water over her head. She had come back home, clutching the book under her shoulder. Ortengryn had been furious to see his precious book ruined by water, and Mira had been in for a very strong cold along with a very strong scolding.

The day before she left Ironrath, she had been reading there too, late in the evening. Maester Ortengryn said she shouldn’t do that, that it would strain her eyes to read in the dark like this, but Mira wanted to spend as much time as possible in the grove before she had to leave it. She wasn’t stupid. She knew she may not see it again before long, maybe never. She wanted to use every second she had left in the places she loved the most.

She was reading her favourite tale when she heard brushwood creak before her. She looked up from her book and saw her father’s squire standing before her.

“Hi, Gared.”

“Hi, Mira.”

Gared’s uncle, Ser Duncan Tuttle, was her father’s steward. He was a very good man, always kind with everyone, and Gared was just like him. Gared was almost a brother to Mira and her siblings.

“What are you reading?” he asked her.

“Nothing very original. I’m reading it one last time before I leave.”

“Oh, aye. It’s true.” He remained silent for a moment. “Do you know when you’ll come back?”

“I don’t know, Gared. Probably not before a few years. I’ll be a woman by the time.”

Gared nodded. “You… you must be eager to go there. I suppose it will be exciting in Highgarden.”

“Well, that will be something new for me, but I don’t know what I’m going to do. I’m going to be a handmaiden, but I don’t know for who. I might end in the service of some distant relative of Lord Tyrell. It’s not even sure that I will remain in Highgarden for long. They could send me somewhere else”

“But you won’t come back here before years.”

“No. I have no choice, Gared. It’s my duty to go in the south.”
He nodded again, and looked at her, a sad expression on his face. “You’ll write to us?”

“Of course, I will.”

“Well, I wish you a pleasant time in the Reach.” He stood there for some time, and Mira thought he wanted to say something else. “Farewell, Mira.”

Mira could see it as if it happened yesterday. Asher used to tease her about the way Gared looked at her. Did he hope for something more than friendship? Mira didn’t consider this like a possibility at the time. She was too young, and anyway she knew she would marry someone in the south, so why consider there could be something more? Anyway, Gared was dead, lost in an expedition north of the Wall. She thought of her husband. If only Gerold could be here, with her.

She didn’t know for how long she remained sitting on the stump, her torch installed in an opening carved on the side of the stump, making the torch hold straight. Ralten had made it for her years ago, so she could read in the darkness. She seized the torch and came back to the Hall. She replaced the torch on the wall in the corridor and climbed to her chamber.

To her surprise, it was in perfect order. She shook her head. They definitely should have let the men take care of more vital works. Her chamber was in a perfect state, as if it never burned, while most of the people outside still lived in rudimentary habitations. She took the candle waiting on a table nearby the door and brought it with her close to her bed. The clothes she brought with her from Oldtown were placed in a corner. She put on a nightshift and climbed into her bed.

As she was about to blow off the candle, she noticed a book on the small table right next to her bed. The light allowed her to read the title. Frozen. It was the very same exemplary she had before she left for Highgarden and that she was reading the evening before her departure. The fire hadn’t destroyed it. A smile crossed her face. She blew off the candle and laid in her bed.

Mira always had a god sleep, but no matter the position she took, she couldn’t manage to fall asleep tonight. Her mind was filled with memories of her life in Ironrath and worries for the people she loved. Again, she wished Gerold was there. His presence next to her in the bed was soothing. She only truly realized it when he was gone. She didn’t want him to die.

After a few hours, she decided she couldn’t stay in this state any longer. She arose and lit up the candle on her bedside that she brought with her. She climbed the stairs to the apartment where Maester Ortengryn previously lived. When she arrived, she realized at the light of the candle that the room was a complete mess. There had been no cleaning here. Fire had damaged everything and, when she opened the door, a gust of wind welcomed her. There was a hole in the wall. She tightened her nightgown around her and walked in.

There was a desk, half eaten by fire, and she could see pieces of chairs spread all over the floor. The place was in complete ruins, just like in her dreams. She used to spend hours every day with Maester Ortengryn as he taught them sums, figures, writing, reading and history. The maester suggested her a lot of books to read. She wished he was still alive, that she could talk to him again. She could still see him sitting right there, and the girl she saw in the room for feasts was right in front of him, leaning over a piece of parchment. Mira rounded them, and when she was behind Maester Ortengryn’s back, she could see the girl focused as she wrote. She handed her paper to the maester, and when she looked up, her eyes met Mira’s again like they did early in the day. Mira looked for a moment at Ortengryn’s back, then again at the girl, and the girl was crying like before.

Then they both vanished, and Mira was alone in the maester’s room again. She heard ravens caw in the rookery above. Had anyone taken care of the ravens? She was told they were all killed. She climbed the stairs leading to the rookery and found a few ravens waiting. One of them was white.
She knew where he came from. She visited the rookery of the Citadel once, and white ravens only came from there.

Maester Ortengryn had showed her how to take a scroll from a raven and send it back to its home. Gerold had been very surprised of this when she told him as they visited the rookery of the Citadel. She took care of the white raven. Without surprise, it was the same message the Citadel sent to Winterfell that announced that winter was here. She released the raven so he could fly back to the Citadel after feeding him. Since she had taken care of one raven, she didn’t see why she couldn’t deal with the others. She went to another raven and took the message he was carrying. To her great astonishment, the scroll bore a sigil she never thought she would see in her life, at least not used on a raven scroll: the three-headed dragon.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter is mostly an exploration of Mira's mind as she meets her past. She spent the last years in the south, and now she is back home, but her home is much more different than when she left it, and she is different herself from the time when she left it as well. In some way, this chapter is Mira meeting the ghosts of her past. War left marks, and no one was spared.

Margaery IX

Chapter Notes

Margaery is back. This chapter is another introspection into her mind. The recent events in King's Landing will have affected her deeply, and she has a lot of time to think about it. She also meets several people, and faces a difficult choice.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

MARGAERY IX

The water was lukewarm. She should get out of it, but she didn’t want to leave it. As long as she remained there, laying in the tub, she could escape the outside world, do as if it didn’t exist, but once she would climb out, it would be over and the thoughts and memories that plagued her day and night would return. She plunged her head inside the water and remained under it for some time. She kept her breath, as long as she could. Right when she was about to rise up to the surface, hands gripped her under her arms and took her off the bath. The surprise it caused made her breathe before she was in the air and she started coughing and spitting water.

“My lady, are you all right?” she heard someone say. “Breathe slowly, my lady. Don’t panic.”

Margaery spat the last water she had in her lungs. “What in the Seven Hells were you thinking about?! You made me choke!” She coughed a little more.

“But… my lady, I thought you were… that you were… You were under the water and I thought…”

“What?!” Margaery yelled. “That I was trying to drown myself? If I wanted to suicide, I would open my veins with a knife, or strangle myself with my bed’s sheets.”

“What’s going on here?” Trystane Martell appeared at the door, followed by two men. “We heard shouting.”

“That’s nothing.” Margaery sighed and stood up to face the prince. “Just the handmaiden you assigned to me who believed I was trying to kill myself because my head was under the water.”

Trystane Martell looked at Margaery, then at the servant, Erella, who had grabbed her out of the tub.

“Prince Trystane, I swear, I was really fearing...” the girl began to explain. Margaery cut her before she could finish.

“I have no intention to kill myself, at least not now. So would you leave me so I can have some time for myself?”

The prince of Dorne looked stunned by her words. “Of course. Erella, leave Lady Margaery alone. I’ll come back later, my lady.”

The prince bowed and left. He had to call after his two men so they would leave. Margaery almost didn’t realize as she was shouting that she was standing naked on the floor. Well, they weren’t the first men to see her like this, and with some luck, they would probably not be the last. She went back to the tub and almost jumped in it. She winced in pain when she landed on the hard surface under the water. She should be more careful. Her hand found its way to her growing belly.

After a few minutes, the water combined with silence allowed her to find some calm again. She needed this. A bath was one of the few things that could soothe her these times, since she arrived at Storm’s End one week ago.

She remained in the tub as long as she could. She could have stayed in all day, since she didn’t have much else to do and nowhere to go, but she knew she had to leave it. With a sign of resignation, she left the tub and proceeded to dry herself with a towel. Her handmaiden left clothes for her nearby. This included a green gown, thicker than those she was used to. Margaery didn’t know to who these clothes belonged before, but they were obviously made for a lady who lived in the Stormlands, not in the Reach. Well, she was in no place to complain about such details. She may be a prisoner, but her living was much better than when the Sparrows held her in the Great Sept of Baelor. She put on the clothes without a word, then proceeded to brush her hair.

It felt awkward to do it alone, in silence. Margaery was used to being dressed and prepared for the day or any event of importance by her handmaidens. That wasn’t the fact of being attended by other people that she missed the most, but the small talk, the giggles, the laughs and the gossips they would exchange while they prepared her. She had no idea what happened to her friends, but seeing what Cersei did… She couldn’t think about it. She kept brushing her hair, trying to think about nothing, focusing on the sound of her hair being stretched and thinking about what she should do next.

Her family was still powerful. Her father could raise more men than anyone else in Westeros, and the Reach wasn’t much affected by the war when compared to the other kingdoms. If only she could find a way to send a message to Highgarden, to tell them she was still alive. Unless Trystane Martell already told them. After all, if they wanted to keep her as a hostage, they had to make it known that they were holding her prisoner at Storm’s End. It wouldn’t serve their interests to keep her existence secret. And yet, so far, they did everything to keep her away from everyone else in this castle.

Margaery had to remain inside her chambers, the door locked from the outside. She was provided with a comfortable bed, three meals satisfying for a lady, rich furniture, could take a bath whenever she wanted, and she even had a handmaiden assigned to her personal service. They provided her with tissue to sew or books to read if she asked for, and Prince Trystane Martell had come to sup with her every day since she arrived. It was a comfortable golden cage.

Margaery didn’t trust the Martells. She had given some of her trust to Tyene Sand back in King’s Landing, because they had the same enemy in the person of Cersei Lannister, but now she wouldn’t trust a Martell even for a crown. They abandoned Loras.

She shouldn’t think about it. She had to think about a way to contact her father or her grandmother. They certainly thought she was dead. Why wouldn’t they? Perhaps she could contact Sansa as well, but she was probably in the North, too far away, in no position to give her assistance. No, her family was the only help she could hope for. She had to find a way to communicate with them.

She finished to brush her hair and looked at her reflection in the mirror. She had cleaned herself from all the dirt she accumulated in King’s Landing and on the road, and a maester made sure that her infection wouldn’t get worse. Tyene Sand had been able to contain it while on the road, but she didn’t have what was needed to cure the infection properly, or she claimed she didn’t. The maester of Storm’s End, Jurne, solved the problem as soon as she arrived. She looked at the small bandage around her finger.

The door opened at this moment, and Erella came in. “Prince Trystane Martell,” she announced.

The young prince of Dorne walked in. He was handsome, though not the most handsome man Margaery had ever seen. Although he treated her very decently, she didn’t trust him, not after Tyene, and not considering all the history between House Tyrell and House Martell.

“Lady Margaery.”

“Prince Trystane,” she replied politely.

“Of course.”

Erella began to bring the supper. It began with a mushroom soup, one similar to those they had in Highgarden. She noticed the food she received was much alike the one they had in the Reach. When Erella was gone, the son of Doran Martell spoke up.

“I’m sorry for Erella’s behavior. If you wish, I can find you another handmaiden.”

“Thank you, but no.” Erella was beginning to warm up to her, and Margaery wouldn’t send her away when she could become a way for her to communicate with the outside world. “Erella still knows my tastes better than anyone else, and better to have a handmaiden who’s too careful than one who isn’t enough.”

“If you say so. Did you make good use of the linen I sent?”

“Yes. I think it’s beginning to take a shape. It should make a good cloth soon. I plan to put my family’s sigil and its words on it.”

The prince nodded. They kept doing small talk for a moment. When the main plate arrived, which consisted essentially of a boar, Trystane Martell asked her something he never talked about so far.

“You knew Tommen Baratheon, didn’t you?” the prince asked.

“I was married to him. Wouldn’t it be strange if I didn’t know him?”

“True. Sorry. How was he?”

“Did you love him?”

She had to be more careful about what she would answer to this. His face told her that he was curious about it. “I didn’t have time to know him enough for that. I was supposed to marry his brother, and then he died. We were married hurriedly. We were not together long enough for me to know if I loved him or not.”

Margaery’s eyes followed those of the prince to her belly, then focused again on his face. “Women don’t get a say in the husband they marry, and they don’t decide whether they have children or not.”

The prince nodded. “I would have liked to know him.” This surprised Margaery a little. “I was betrothed to his sister not long ago. If she had lived, and in another world, you child may be my nephew, or my niece.”

“Yes, in another world.” That was a conservative answer, engaging her to nothing.
“Myrcella used to tell me that he loved cats. Was it true?”

“Yes. There… was one that he loved very much. Sometimes he even slept with him. Ser Pounce.”

Trystane nodded, a sad smile coming to his lips. “She talked to me about him.”

An uncomfortable silence settled between them. They finished the main service and arrived at the dessert, which consisted of lemon cakes. It was Sansa’s favourite dessert. Where was she now? Still in the North, at Winterfell? On the road back to Casterly Rock?

“I wish I could tell you everything will be all right,” Trystane Martell began. “However, I can’t. It will depend of the queen’s decision.”

She laid back the cake she just took. “Prince Trystane, I know our families had their differences in the past, but they also fought together. We both fought for Daenerys’s father back in the days of the rebellion, and we only surrendered after it was obvious that we had no chance to win and that King Aerys was dead. Nothing is stopping us from doing the same. My brother…” She stopped to gulp.
“My brother was murdered, along with many of my friends, my cousins, by Cersei. I can convince my father to side with you, and if he knows that you picked me up and treated me well, he will have all the more reasons to fight for Daenerys Targaryen. My father is not an idiot. He will never support Cersei now. Let me write to him. I can convince him to fight for you.”

The prince sighed. “I wish it was that simple. In another world, I would agree with you and let you write to your father, but here, I can’t. You know why.”

Of course, she did. She was a threat to whoever claimed to be king or queen of the Seven Kingdoms.
More precisely, the life growing inside of her was a threat.

“Lady Margaery, I can ensure your safety, as long as you stay here, but once the queen arrives, your fate will be in her hands.”

“When will she arrive?” Margaery asked.

“Any day, now. I’ll speak for you to her, I don’t wish to see you die, but the decision belongs to her in the end.”

He stood up, bowed, and proceeded to leave. “Prince Trystane.” He stopped and turned to look at her. “May I know, at least, if my parents are alive and well. My brother is dead.” She gulped again.
“I think I have a right to know if the rest of my family is well.”

“As far as I know, your lord father and your lady mother are all right, and so is your grandmother,” he answered kindly.

“I had friends and cousins, in King’s Landing. They were part of my retinue. Do you have any news concerning them?”

“I’m afraid not. I’m sorry.”

She thought about asking for Sansa or Mira, but their links with families previously at war with the Targaryens wouldn’t make Trystane look at her with a favorable eye. She kept her mouth shut.

“Do you need anything?” He always asked after their daily supper.

“No. Thank you.”
“My lady.”

He bowed and left, this time for good. Margaery forced herself to eat the lemon cake before her, but she didn’t taste it. She always had friends with her during supper. Now they were all gone. All the people she knew in King’s Landing, they were gone. Cersei probably killed them. Only Mira had escaped because she was in the North with her husband, and Sansa for the same reason. But were they really still alive? She had no way to know. How could she be sure of anything? One moment she was queen, and the next a prisoner.

Erella came to take away the empty tray, and then she helped Margaery to dress for the night. Margaery did small talk with her, like always. Her handmaiden talked about her life in Storm’s End while Margaery talked about her own in Highgarden.

“Is it true that you were a friend of Lady Lannister?” Erella asked at some point.

“I knew her, yes.”

“She probably hated you. I mean, she was supposed to marry King Joffrey, and instead it was you who married him, and she got to marry the Imp.”

If only she knew how relieved Sansa was when her betrothal with Joffrey was cancelled. “She didn’t show much animosity towards me.”

“Well, I’m surprised. And the Queen Mother? Cersei Lannister? How was she?”

“Horrible.” On that, Margaery had nothing to hide, since talking against Cersei couldn’t do her any harm here. “You know she murdered her husband?”

“I heard. How could she do this? King Robert was a good man, I heard.”

A good man, maybe, but not a very good husband, and a drunkard. “I didn’t know Robert Baratheon very well.”

“But you knew his brother, Lord Renly? You were married with him.”

“Yes, if we can call it a marriage. You know about Lord Renly, surely?”

“Well…” Erella hesitated. “He was Lord of Storm’s End for a long time. I mean, we knew him for a long time, so… People learned after some time that he was… I mean…”

“We don’t need to talk about this.”

“No, of course, my lady. Still, I find this Cersei Lannister horrible, me too. Hopefully, she won’t stay in power for long. With two Targaryens against her, I don’t give her much time.”

Margaery frowned. “Two Targaryens?”

Erella stopped to prepare her. Margaery could see by her reflection in the glass that the handmaiden realized she said something she shouldn’t have. She served the Martells, not Margaery, and was certainly told to tell her nothing of the events happening in the outside world. “I’m sorry, I… I think you’re ready, my lady. I wish you a good night.”

Margaery followed her in the glass as she walked out of the room. The door locked behind her. Two Targaryens. What did she mean? Well, it didn’t matter much. She didn’t succeed to get to send a message to her family. She was still all alone. If only she had someone to talk to. Her mother, her grandmother, her father, Sansa, Mira, Sera, Loras…

She left her chair, came face to the wall and leaned her forehead against it. Her life had turned to hell ever since she was arrested by the Sparrows. She had a surge of hope when Cersei was arrested and forced to make her walk of shame, but all of it disappeared when Tyene Sand came to extract her from her cell.

According to her, the daughter of Oberyn Martell was warned that Cersei intended to destroy the Great Sept of Baelor. By who, Margaery had no idea. Still, she had come to her cell and pushed her out without explanations, saying they had to leave now. When Margaery said they had to bring her brother with them, the Sand Snake refused flatly, saying he would only slow them down, that he was in a condition much worse than Margaery, and that if she hoped to live, they had to escape immediately. The young woman even promised to Margaery that she would come back later to save her brother, but she didn’t. She lied.

As the two progressed through the underground tunnels of King’s Landing, they had heard a great sound, stronger than the thunder from that day. Then a part of the tunnel collapsed behind them, and Margaery saw a flash of green light behind the debris as they fell. Then she had known, she had wanted to go back, go back to save her brother, but Tyene had stopped her, and she even knocked her out. Margaery had woken up later, in a cave, the storm still raging. The Sand Snake now had a dagger in her hand and threatened to kill her if she attempted to flee, or to signal their position to anybody.

For the weeks that followed, as they travelled to Storm’s End under the disguise of a septa and a Silent Sister, Margaery was a prisoner. Tyene always kept an eye on her. She treated her wounds from her captivity, but warned her that she wouldn’t let her flee. She told Margaery about what happened in King’s Landing, that her brother was killed inside the Great Sept, that Randyll Tarly and his men were dead as well, and that for the rest of the world, she was dead too. Everyone believed she was in the sept when it exploded. She had no choice but to follow Tyene to wherever she would bring them.

They headed for the Stormlands. She was disguised as a Silent Sister, forced to not speak. Sometimes, Tyene poisoned her. She put something in her food, and Margaery would cough, vomit, and feel weak until the Sand Snake gave her the antidote. That was why Margaery could never escape. She could never know when Tyene poisoned her, and if she escaped, she could die without her antidotes. They finally reached the Stormlands and avoided the Dothrakis until they reached Storm’s End, where she was handed to Trystane Martell.

Overall, Margaery had been lucky. She was still alive, and her baby hadn’t died. Considering her constant poisoning, that was a miracle. She had managed to hide her pregnancy to Tyene on their way, her morning sickness being limited by the small amounts of food she got, and confused with the symptoms of her captor’s poison. Trystane Martell proved to be much more human than his cousin. Still, she couldn’t trust him. She couldn’t trust the Martells, and she couldn’t trust the queen they served, Daenerys Targaryen. When she learned that Margaery was carrying Tommen’s child, the Targaryen queen might decide to eliminate her. Margaery and her child were a threat to her rule, after all. That was why she was kept inside a single room. The Martells didn’t want the news that Margaery Tyrell was alive and pregnant to spread. For now, most of the world still believed that she was dead, and if the Targaryen queen wanted, she could decide that Margaery had to be dead for real.

The wall against which she leaned her head was cold. How could they arrive to this? Margaery and her family had wanted her to be queen one day, and they did everything to reach this goal without endangering themselves too much, but now… Loras was dead. Her brother was dead.
A sob escaped her throat. My little brother. A second followed. Sera. Megga. Alla. Elinor. She burst into cries, turned her back to the wall and let herself slip along it to the floor. And there she sobbed. She cried for all those she loved that she lost. Tommen. Tommen, her husband, was dead too. She kept crying. She had a child from him, a child she prayed for, and he was dead. Now her child could die as well. Was did she do to deserve this, to lose so many people she loved?

She remembered the first tourney to which Loras took part, how handsome he had looked in his armor and with his curly hair. She remembered the day Sera entered her service. She remembered Alla and Megga chuckling together in a corner as they were sewing. They were all gone. All gone. She remembered Tommen, speaking to her in the middle of the night, Ser Pounce climbing into their bed and rubbing against them, making Margaery laugh because his fur tickled her.

She cried, and cried, and cried. In her dreams, her brother was in a cell, covered with mud, calling for her, begging to help. Margaery tried to reach him, but as she tried to walk and then to run to him, his cell receded until it was so far that she couldn’t see him. She moved backwards, still trying to go in the opposite direction, the tunnels leading her outside the city. Then she saw the Great Sept explode in a smoke of green flames, and she tried to run to help her little brother again, like when they were children and that he almost drowned in the Mander, but she kept getting farther from him, until she fell behind into complete darkness.

Her handmaiden woke her up on the floor in the morning, worried as always. Margaery tossed her concerns away, reassuring her that she was fine, and after she was dressed for the day, she sent Erella away. She remained at the only window of her room, looking outside. It gave on the sea, and apart from the waves crashing against the shores, there was nothing much to look at. There were never waves like these in the Mander or at Oldtown. What was her family doing right now? Did her mother spend her days at the window like her, looking outside, thinking her only daughter was dead along with her son? If only she could send a raven, only to tell her parents that she was truly alive, that they still had a child in this world.

The door opened. A man in the thirties with a moustache and short brown hair walked in and the door closed behind him. He wore clothes made of leather, without ornament. As soon as he was inside, he bowed to her.

“Lady Margaery. Please forgive me if I disturb you. My name is Malcolm Branfield. Could I have a few words with you?”

She saw no reason to refuse. She had nothing to do of her day anyway, so why not speak with this man. His name sounded familiar, but Margaery couldn’t recall where or when she heard it. She had met so many people in her life. Even though she tried hard, she couldn’t remember all of them. She remembered most of them, since it was very useful to make friends, but she couldn’t prevent her from forgetting a few. They sat face to face.

“My lady, maybe it will come as a surprise, but I had a member of my family that you knew very well.”

“Is that so? Who was he?” Almost everyone told her they knew someone she knew when they introduced themselves for the first time.

“She. She was my niece. She was your handmaiden for some time. Her name is Mira.”

Margaery remembered immediately where she heard the name Branfield. “You are her uncle, aren’t you? Her mother’s brother?”
“Aye, it’s me. I see she talked to you about me.”

“Yes, she did.” She never expected to see this man here. From what she remembered, he was supposed to be in the North, at Ironrath. If he was coming from there, maybe he knew something.

“How is Mira? I had no news from her for some time.”

She had to hear good news, to hear that at least one of the people she cared about was well. And she needed news about the events that took place outside these walls.

“And I was hoping you could tell me how was my niece. I had no news from her in quite a long time. The last I heard, she was wed to a knight of House Hightower.”

He was late in the news, indeed. “You didn’t see her on your way from the North?” If he had come from Ironrath, he should have crossed Mira’s path.

“I didn’t come from the North, my lady. I spent more than a year in Essos, at the service of Daenerys Targaryen. I heard very few about my family while I was there.”

“You serve Daenerys Targaryen?”

“Aye, I do.”

She had to be careful then. “How did you end up serving her? Mira never told me anything about this.”

“She probably didn’t know. Her mother sent me on the other continent to bring back her brother Asher.”

“The one who was exiled?”

“Aye. I found him and we got help from Daenerys to come back home, but she asked me to remain at her service. So I stayed in Meereen and came back to Westeros with her army. And here I am. I was hoping you could tell me a little about my niece’s whereabouts. She is the last kin I have, after all.”

“I’m sorry,” Margaery said. She meant it, but she didn’t only say this because she meant it. “I know what happened at the Battle of Ironrath. Mira was broken after that.”

“I imagine.” His face showed a pained expression. “Poor girl. She was only a child when she left. I didn’t see her for years. How does she look like now?”

He didn’t seem to have asked the question to her. He was looking away, at the floor, but she answered all the same. “She has grown up into a beautiful young woman. When I saw her with her husband, he only had eyes for her. It was me who arranged her marriage.”

“How is he? Who did she marry?”

“Ser Gerold Hightower. He is a grandson of Lord Leyton Hightower. My mother is a Hightower, so she helped me to arrange everything.”

He smiled. “I’m glad to hear it. Elissa always wanted Mira to marry in the south. At least, this wish of hers was granted. I thank you.”

“You have no need to thank me. I never really saw Mira as my handmaiden. She was a friend to me. A real friend.” And I abandoned her when she tried to help her family, when having her close to me became dangerous. And still, she remained loyal to me. “The last time I saw her was a few months ago. She and her husband led a small army in the North to take back Ironrath from the Whitehills and they stopped in King’s Landing on their way. Then they made their way up north and I never saw her again. The last news I got from her was that they managed to take Moat Cailin and that they were heading for Winterfell.”

He looked at her with a queer expression. “So, Mira is in the North?”

“As far as I know, yes. I don’t know what happened after that. Ever since I was made a prisoner by the Sparrows, I heard almost nothing of what happened anywhere in Westeros.”

“Did Mira and her husband join the Lannisters when they went in the North?”

“Yes, they joined a combined force of men from the Westerlands, the Riverlands and the North to take back the North to the Boltons.” She didn’t even know if they succeeded.

“Well, I suppose this is good news, then. The Boltons were defeated. There was a battle at Winterfell and Ramsay Bolton died. Good riddance. He killed my nephew Ethan. I suppose Mira must be safe and that they managed to free Ironrath. Though I wish I could talk to her.”

These were the first news she got from the outside world in months. So Sansa succeeded. Winterfell was hers. “This means the Lannisters hold Winterfell now.”

He looked at her again with a queer expression. “The Lannisters? No, they don’t have Winterfell. Winterfell is being held by Jon Snow as we speak.”

“Jon Snow? Lord Eddard Stark’s bastard son?”

“Yes, my lady. I see you’re not aware of what’s going on out there. He was declared King in the North after your husband, King Tommen, died. The Westerlands, the Riverlands and the Vale support him.”

Sansa’s brother was king of four of the Seven Kingdoms? That wasn’t something Margaery expected. If her memories were right, Sansa’s half-brother was Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. How could he be named King in the North? That made no sense. Margaery had considered many possibilities of what Sansa and her husband could do after Tommen’s death, but naming her bastard brother king wasn’t among them. In fact, she almost expected Tyrion Lannister to proclaim himself king. With Tommen dead, there were no living Baratheon left. The family was extinct. Tyrion Lannister was Lord of Casterly Rock, his wife was Lady of Winterfell, and they just brought back peace into the Riverlands. With these three kingdoms, they could carve their own kingdom, even seize the Iron Throne. Margaery had thought that if she could contact her family, she could gain Tyrion and Sansa’s support eventually for her child, perhaps naming Lord Tyrion Regent of the Realm. With Ser Kevan and Lord Randyll gone, he was the most plausible choice. He had been Hand for Joffrey, then Master of Coin, and Margaery and his wife were friends. To maintain the Tyrell-Lannister alliance, it was the most logical choice, not to mention that Lord Tyrion would make sure that Cersei was neutralized for good. Margaery even thought that she could promise a marriage between her children and Sansa’s children when they would be of age.

However, all these were only plans she made in her mind. She couldn’t execute them without talking to her family. Now, however, if Sansa and her husband chose to support another king, this complicated things a lot.

“Why was Jon Snow named King in the North?” she asked. Why choose a bastard as their king? It made no sense.
Malcolm Branfield was about to answer when they heard something Margaery never heard before. She didn’t remember hearing anything like this. It was living, but nothing to live that she knew. She had her answer a second later when she looked through the window and saw a gigantic creature flying over the sea right in her sight. She came. She’s here.

The door burst open and Erella came in. “My lady, we must hurry. The queen is there. I must prepare you for your meeting with her.”

Margaery didn’t have much choice than to comply. Mira’s uncle excused himself and left Margaery alone with her handmaiden. She had her hair brushed again and her gown smoothed, and then she waited. She wasn’t to be in the main hall when the Dragon Queen would arrive. Again, the fewer people who saw her, the better for the Targaryens. All she could do was to wait. The waiting was without end to her. If they had to end this, better to end it now. But Margaery didn’t want this to end. As much as she wished for her brother to be still alive, she didn’t want to die. There were still people who loved her. She still had her family, and now that Loras was dead, she was the only future of her house. And she had a child who was coming. What would happen to him?

She finally heard footsteps from the other side of the door. It was unlocked, and then it opened. Two men wearing black helmets and black breastplates first came in, holding a spear and a shield of the same color than their armor. Then another person, wearing black as well, but without armor and without weapons, walked in. The door closed behind her.

The woman who stood before Margaery had to be about her age. She wore a black dress that covered everything from her ankles to her neck and her wrists. Her hair was a silvery blond like none Margaery had ever seen. She looked at Margaery with a cold and unflinching gaze that left no place to emotion. Her hands hung at her sides. She said nothing. She only looked at Margaery.

“Your Grace,” Margaery finally said, supposing she had to be the first to talk.

“It is customary to kneel before a queen,” the other young woman replied.

Margaery saw that there was no way around. She knew little about Daenerys Targaryen, but the tales from across the Narrow Sea talked about a few atrocities, including the burning of children or the crucifixion of men. She couldn’t take any risk to infuriate the Mother of Dragons. She curtsied before Daenerys Targaryen, knowing very well what it meant. Better to be a living lady than a dead queen.

“You may rise,” the Targaryen told her. Margaery did so. “Prince Trystane told me that you arrived last week.”

“I did.”

“My informants told me you were dead. How did you survive the events of King’s Landing? I want to know everything.”

This queen wasn’t Cersei. Joffrey’s mother took pleasure in humiliating people and making them feel smaller than she was, and you could see how she felt through her eyes and the expressions of her face. That wasn’t the case with this one. Her eyes were cold, deprived of emotions, and her voice displayed no feelings at all. It didn’t make her in any way less threatening. In fact, Margaery thought she may be even more dangerous than Cersei. She had no reason to hide the events of her escape however, so she told her everything.

“You went through a lot. I’m sorry for your brother.” For a brief moment, Margaery saw a softness within the eyes of this queen, but the cold expression returned almost immediately. “Cersei Lannister will pay for her crimes. On that, you have my word.” Margaery wasn’t surprised. Cersei occupied the Iron Throne. Whoever wanted the throne would have to kill Cersei before she could sit on it. Cersei would never give it away. “However, I don’t really know what to do with you. Should I consider you as an enemy, or a friend, or something different?”

Margaery chose her words very carefully. “I have no wish to be your enemy. The enemy of my enemy is my friend. Cersei killed my brother, and she killed many other people that I loved, people I knew for years, who were my friends since I was a child. I can help you to defeat her, if that’s what you want.”

“Let’s suppose it is true. Should I be concerned about you after we’ve defeated Cersei Lannister?”

“You have no reason to be concerned about me.” She saw the dragon. Margaery wasn’t foolish enough to try to take down a queen who could order a dragon to burn her by moving her finger. Anyway, it didn’t matter much for her to be queen now. Being queen cost her more than she ever thought it would, and she didn’t want to lose more people she loved for a crown she had little chance to get.

“Shouldn’t I? House Tyrell fought for my father during the war of the Usurper. Then you made an alliance with his brother, and when he died you switched your cloak for the son. You were wed to three kings, three usurpers, all Baratheons, and you’re bearing a child from one of them. Tell me why I should trust you? Why shouldn’t I expect you to stab me in the back the first chance you get?”

Margaery sighed and said something she never thought she would say not long ago. “I’m no longer interested in being queen. I lost too many people, and unlike Cersei, I don’t value a crown over my life, or over my family’s life. The Targaryens were gone, so we had to live in the Seven Kingdoms as they were after your father was defeated. My father will want revenge against Cersei for my brother’s death. He will be more than happy to help you to take the Iron Throne if this means Cersei’s death. He won’t care that I am no longer queen. Knowing that I’m alive will be more than enough for him.”

In fact, Margaery was afraid that her father could be greedy enough to try to seize an opportunity later to make her queen, if he believed there was one. He might also complain, though not openly, about the fact that she was no longer queen, but with the help of her grandmother, Margaery believed she could convince her father to listen to reason. Now was no longer the time to look for a way to make her queen. The time had come to think about their family’s survival, and this survival involved the death of Cersei Lannister.

“If that’s what you want, I will kneel before you and give up any claim I might have on the Iron Throne, in front of as many witnesses as you want. I was only a queen consort, anyway. I was the queen because my husband was the king,” Margaery explained. “This is no longer the case. My husband is dead. I am no longer a queen, because I am no longer married to a king.”

Daenerys Targaryen walked to her right and looked away for a time, always maintaining a severe expression and her chin up, then stared back at Margaery. “I need your father’s armies. I’m ready to overlook all your past actions and your former alliances with my enemies, to forgive you and to do as if nothing happened ever since my father died. However, know this. If you ever betray me, or try to rebel against me, I will be without mercy.”

She meant it. It wasn’t hard to see. “I understand.”

“I will allow you to write to your father.” Margaery’s heart bumped into her chest. She succeeded. “You are to tell him that you are alive and well, and to persuade him to swear fealty to me and to follow me into battle. You will remain at Storm’s End for the time being, as a guest. I will give you more freedom inside the castle, but you are not to leave it under any circumstance.”
“Very well.”

“I swear that I will never try to use him against you.”

“Even if you say the truth, words are wind. People made promises to me in the past, and many didn’t honour them. Anyone could try to use your child to challenge my claim.”

There was no way out. Margaery knew it. Tywin Lannister murdered the children of Rhaegar Targaryen twenty years ago, the nephew and the niece of the woman standing before her. She wouldn’t spare the great-grandchild of this man.

“I will be honest with you. I have no wish to kill your child,” Daenerys Targaryen told her, causing relief to flood through Margaery for a brief moment. “I do not consider children responsible for their parents’ crimes. However, I cannot allow him to be an eventual threat to my rule. So here’s what I propose.” Margaery listened. “I will let your child live. You will stay here until he is born, then you will be moved somewhere else. As for your child, I will take him somewhere people will take care of him. No harm will come to him. But you will never see him again.”

“You heard me. You will never see him. You won’t be allowed to know where he is, who he is, his name, or what he does. And you will not be allowed to talk about him to anybody. No one must learn of his existence. If you do inform someone, Varys will tell me, and you will face the consequences.”

“But he’s my child!”

“So you better think about what’s best for him. Life or death. Because that’s the choice you have.”

“I am his mother,” Margaery pleaded.

“I know. I had a son, a long time ago, and he died right when he came into the world. I lost him.” Again, her voice had turned softer. “Your child’s fate will be much better than the one my son had. You are his mother, so think about what’s best for him.”

She couldn’t take her child away from her. No, she couldn’t do this.

“What if I refuse your offer? What if I choose death for him?” she asked. That was a dangerous game she played, but she had to try.

For a moment, she thought she saw doubts in Daenerys Targaryen’s eyes. But then the resolve was back. “Who’s telling you that I gave you a choice?” She approached Margaery. She was far more fearful than Cersei. “Did I forget to mention that when you give up all claim on the Iron Throne, you will also have to recognize before all of Westeros that Tommen Baratheon was the son of Jaime and Cersei Lannister? Even if you managed to keep your child, everyone would know about his origins, and he would be seen as a product of incest. It may be acceptable for my family, but not for yours. Is that really the life you want for your child?”

There was no way out. Margaery could see it. Her child would be taken away from her the moment he was born, and there would be nothing she could do. The people here didn’t serve her family. They served this woman. If she tried to find him back, it would only create problems for her family. She felt her baby pushing very faintly inside of her. She had to think about him. She had to think about her family. After a long time while she considered every option available, she took one of the most difficult decisions of her life, if not the hardest.

“I accept,” the former queen finally said.

“Good. I’ll have someone to bring you what you need to write to your father. Don’t try to warn him about your child. Only write what I told you.”

“How do I know you will keep your word? You could just kill him, and I wouldn’t know it.”

“You’ll have to trust me, Margaery Tyrell. If you want your family to survive, you have to. Believe me, I will not cause any harm to your child. I fought in Slaver’s Bay for years so that no child who was born there would know what it was to be sold or bought. When the Great Masters of Meereen crucified one hundred and sixty-three children on the road from Yunkai to their city in order to taunt me, I crucified one hundred and sixty-three of them. I didn’t come back to Westeros to murder children after I fought for them in Essos.”

She seemed sincere. She was better than Cersei to simulate emotions if that was what she did.

“We’ll talk again later.”

Daenerys Targaryen left on those words and Margaery found herself alone once again. If Daenerys Targaryen kept her promises, she may have saved her family from Cersei’s wrath and from dragons, but she lost her child in the process. She laid a hand on her belly. She didn’t have much time left with him.

Next chapter : Asher
Asher III

They slowly progressed through the tunnel, their legs buried into water up to the thigh. They were thirty men, all of them Northerners, silently advancing in the dark, holding their weapons over their heads to keep them away from the water and to prevent them from getting rusted. They had to be in position before dawn, when the attack would begin. He wished Beskha was with him, but she was watching over Ryon in their camp. Asher had allowed his little brother to accompany them to the siege on his insistence, but he wouldn’t let Ryon join the battle. He wouldn’t risk his life.

The bulk of their forces were positioned in sight of the Whitehill forces, in front of the battlements of Highpoint and its main gate. They would launch a massive assault that would bring most of the Whitehill men to the battlements, allowing Asher and his men to fulfill their mission.

The siege had lasted for a month now. Asher didn’t expect it to last so long, truth be told, but here they were, a few weeks after they arrived, about to end this war. Gwyn gave them the position of a secret tunnel that was no longer used, leading from a ruined section of Highpoint to a near river. She assured them her father wasn’t aware of its existence. The castle was half in ruins and many people living in there never visited the abandoned sections. The tunnel Gwyn told them about was used a long time ago as a mean to escape for the family if the castle was to fall, but there had been a collapse a few decades ago, making it useless. However, Gwyn thought that it might be possible to clear the path. Asher’s men had worked an entire month to make the tunnel usable again. Now it was, and they could put their plan to execution.

Asher’s brother-in-law was waiting outside, leading the army. He would attack at dawn. Asher had come to like him. He was shy whenever it came to Mira, but he loved her, it was obvious for everyone to see. Asher never thought his sister would make a man so besotted. They seemed to fit pretty well together, still. Asher remembered with a smile the moans his sister was making when he found them together before the Battle of Winterfell. Both were reserved people, not trying to attract attention. Gerold was a good lad, but he lacked the behavior to be of good company around a campfire. In a private discussion however, he could prove to be more enjoyable. Asher had more than one drink with him. His sister’s husband seemed eager to know more about Mira from her brother, so Asher told him a few stories about Mira while she was at Ironrath. He remained silent on the most humiliating ones, though there weren’t many, and tried to depict Mira back when she lived at Ironrath the best he could. He had the Hightower knight laugh more than once when he told him about the many times Mira could force anyone to shut up whenever there was someone insufferable or arrogant nearby.

Gerold Hightower genuinely wanted to make his sister happy. That was enough for Asher to like him. As a joke, he always threatened to gut him if he found out that he hurt his sister in any way. None of them took it seriously now, both knowing that would never happen. Another topic they often discussed was Gwyn. Asher was worried about her. When they arrived at Highpoint, they had a parley with her father where she was present. She tried to talk some sense into him, like she had tried for her brother, and again she failed. In fact, that was even worse than with Torrhen Whitehill.

“You’re not my daughter. I don’t know who you are, but you’re not her. All I see is a hole for Forrester cum.”

Such were the words her father used to her face. Asher had wanted to kill him on the spot. His brother-in-law had placed a hand on his arm, preventing him from killing the man who just insulted his wife. The parley had given no result and Ludd Whitehill flatly refused the offer to join the Night’s Watch in order to save his life.

Despite all this, Gwyn had begged Asher to let her father live, to give him another chance to go to the Wall. Asher didn’t understand Gwyn, not after what this man told her, but before her insistence, he promised he would try. He didn’t think Ludd would accept to go to the Wall, even with a dagger on his throat and a sword on his chest, but he would give him one more chance. For Gwyn.

Gerold strongly advised him to not kill Ludd, because he could lose Gwyn if he did it, but Asher didn’t see any other possible outcome. If Ludd Whitehill refused to join the Night’s Watch, Asher would have to execute him for high treason, and he would have to carry out the sentence himself, as the Old Way demanded it. There was no way around it. He would have to kill Ludd. He had to say that the prospect of killing the man delighted him. Gwyn would have to accept that. Her father was a cunt and he didn’t want to live if there were Forresters left in this world.

The secret passage had a slow climbing curve that led to the heart of Highpoint. After long minutes, they reached a point where there was no more water on the ground. They kept going forward, not stopping a single moment. They had to be in place for when the assault would start.

The torches they carried lit the walls, highlighting their irregular surface. Without the torches, they wouldn’t be able to progress in the dark. They followed the only path before them, until they reached the point where they gained access to Highpoint. A massive stone three meters high blocked the entrance to the castle. Asher and six other men moved it very slowly. Then they stepped into an empty corridor. Through a window nearby, Asher could see they were about an hour before dawn. He sent his men in groups of five to take their positions. They were to use the paths Gwyn indicated on a map, to avoid any patrol. Half the castle was abandoned, but there were empty sections everywhere through Highpoint, which meant there were largely unused corridors even a few feet away from Ludd Whitehill’s bedroom.

Asher’s team was soon positioned. They waited in an empty room that looked to have been used as some sort of larder a very long time ago and waited. Then the trumpets sounded and the assault began. They waited one minute before they entered into action. They left their hideout and ran to the post of the trebuchet nearby. There were six men there to man it, and only one of them had a weapon. They did not expect to be attacked here. Asher killed the guard who didn’t have the time to draw his sword, and his men took care of the others. They began to prepare the trebuchet, reorienting it to take another target, one who wouldn’t expect to be a target, at least not by this machine. Asher looked over the post and saw the Hightower men struggling under a rain of projectiles, placing ladders and bringing a battering ram to breach the gate. The defenses of Highpoint were very well organized to sustain an assault from the outside, but they were unprepared to face one from the inside. Asher looked at the other posts the teams were tasked to take. They all had succeeded. Asher prepared the crossbows they had with them. Then, when he received the confirmation from every post that they were ready, he gave the signal.

All of a sudden, the defenders were the ones to receive a rain of projectiles. Two trebuchets, three catapults and one scorpion fired on them simultaneously. Before they could recover from the shock, thirty bolts fired by as many crossbows hit them. The soldiers over the gate were those to pay the higher price. They kept reloading the crossbows and shooting at the defenders, making them unable to fight the attackers from two sides. Before long, a loud crack was heard as the gate was breached and the ram pierced through it.

Asher stopped to look at the flood of men with the grey tower on their tabard coming from the gates and killing everyone in their way. He spotted his brother-in-law among them. For a moment, he saw the same events that happened at Ironrath over a year ago. Now the Whitehills knew what it was, to lose what you held dear the most.

His men were behind him. They followed him for months, waging war against the Whitehills using guerilla tactics, and they were entirely loyal to Asher, ready to die with him. They went into the most used corridors of Highpoint. Asher cut through every man with the Whitehill sigil he came across. All the while he brought every assailant he came upon with him, and soon he had about twenty or thirty men with him. They ran to the very heart of Highpoint, where the apartments of Ludd were, killing everyone in their way. Asher almost cut a man in two with one swift stroke of his father’s sword. They arrived before a room. Asher knew that in this room, a small dining room, there were two sets of stairs along the walls that led to Ludd’s apartments. With some chance, they could get him there. He looked at his men. Some of them had crossbows, other had swords. A few had ironwood shields. He made a nod to Bloodsong, who returned it, and they burst through the door open.

They were welcomed by a volley of bolts. Instinctively, Asher plunged forward under the table. He heard a few muffled cries behind and looked at his people. Some had withdrawn in the corridor, but a few were lying on the floor, one or several bolts in their body. Bloodsong was among them. He looked at Asher while he died, blood spurting out of his mouth. He was dead. He followed Asher to the other side of the world, and he died.

“So, what do you think of it, Forresters?” Asher knew this voice. The voice of the man who ruined his life. Ludd Whitehill. “Not that easy, isn’t it, To take Highpoint? You thought I would let you take my home so easily?” Bloodsong’s face was lifeless. Asher felt anger rising in him. There was a charged crossbow nearby. He grabbed it on the floor and crawled to the other side of the table, still hidden under it. “Come on. Show me how Forresters die. Get out of your hideout and show me how you men die like the scum you are.”

Asher rolled over, his back against the floor, his head and chest emerging from under the table, and took a shot at Ludd Whitehill. The bolt missed its target and he cursed. He rolled back under the safety of the table, and a new volley of bolts lounged themselves into the thick wood. Thankfully, this wood was deep and strong enough to stop the bolts. Asher suspected the table was made of ironwood.

“Show yourself, you coward, under that table!” Ludd shouted.

“Why don’t you come to take a look?” Asher asked loudly.

“Ah. So it’s you. Leave your hiding, Asher. I want to see you when you die.”

“I’m not planning to die today. I have a family who’s counting on me. I have sisters. I have a brother. I have a wife.”

“You’re only a fucking bastard, no better than your father.”
“You’re right, I’m like him.” Malcolm told him before he left Meereen. You are your father’s son, Asher. For all your differences, he would be proud of you. All the while, Asher recharged his crossbow. “And that’s why I’m going to kill you, for all the Forrester lives you took.”

“I took what was owned to me. You Forresters always spit on House Whitehill. Well, it’s over. OVER! The time when we bent the knee before the Forresters is over.”

He was mad. “You’re surrounded, Ludd. You have no chance to escape, no ally who will come to your help. Surrender, now.”

“I will die before I surrender to a Forrester!”

“Just like the son,” Asher muttered. He looked at the door. His men were in position. “NOW!”

They emerged from the corridor and sent their own volley of bolts towards the crossbowmen at the top of the stairs. Asher waited three good seconds before he rolled again from under the table. He targeted one of the Whitehill crossbowmen and shot. The bolt lounged itself into his neck.

For a time that looked like an eternity, everything was only an exchange of bolts between the two sides. The Whitehills were fewer, but they had the advantage of the position. Asher’s men were trying to take cover anywhere, under the table like him, under the stairs, behind columns. They even used chairs and candlesticks as protection. Then a large group of men emerged from the corridor. The Hightowers joined them. They had shields that they used to protect themselves from the coming bolts. They began to climb the stairs. Asher had never been so happy to see them.

“Asher! Asher!” His brother-in-law was calling after him in the commotion. Asher stood up and made his presence known. Gerold saw him. “Asher, are you all right?”

“Ludd is above those stairs.” He said nothing more, and went to follow the Hightower men.

“Asher, wait!”

He picked an ironwood shield on the way and began to climb the stairs just like the men from the Reach. They fought well and were very well organized, he had to give it to them. When he arrived on the next floor, a Whitehill crossbowman targeted him. Asher charged while using the shield as a protection. The bolt was stopped by the shield and Asher rushed the man, crushing his head against the ground, killing him instantly. He stood up and drew his father’s sword. Ludd Whitehill was there, not far away, fighting with the few guards he had left. Asher walked angrily to the man. He killed one of the guards in his way, and the next moment Ludd Whitehill was alone. He was surrounded by about twenty men, some with crossbows.

Asher stood forward. Ludd supported his gaze. “After killing the sons, you want to kill the father. Come here, Forrester. I’m going to kill you.”

Asher stepped forward, but not too much. He stared at Ludd. He wanted him to suffer. “You weren’t there when your sons died, weren’t you? You should have. I was. Did you know they screamed like women as they died? Gryff, as he burned in the fire. And Torrhen, after I cut his hand. It was fitting that your eldest son lost his hand. He had no honor, just like the Kingslayer.”

Ludd Whitehill roared and charged forward. Asher stepped aside and made him stumble with his leg. He then plunged his sword in Ludd’s leg. The Lord of Highpoint screamed, just like his sons screamed. Asher walked slowly around the man lying on the floor and tossed his sword away from his hand. Then he swung his sword and cut his right hand. Ludd’s scream were deafening.

“You got fat, Lord Whitehill.” He stood up in front of the wailing man. “You have a choice, Ludd.
This is your last chance to join the Night’s Watch if you want to live. I’m only doing this because Gwyn asked me to. Because despite everything you’ve done, and everything you’ve told her, she still loves you, and she still sees you as her father. You’re still her father. So you have one last chance to live, for the sake of your daughter!”

“Go… fuck… yourself!!!”

“I suppose it means no.” Asher wasn’t surprised, and to be honest, a great part of him wanted Ludd Whitehill to refuse. A small part wished he would choose to live, if only for Gwyn, but it was only a small part of him. “Ludd Whitehill, I declare you guilty of treason and of crimes against the North. I, Asher Forrester, Lord of Ironrath, in the name of Jon Snow, the Lord of Winterfell and the King in the North, hereby sentence you to death.”

“Wait, Asher!” Gerold was behind him. “We can still send him to the Wall.”

“He refused,” Asher retorted.

“We can force him to go there,” his brother-in-law argued.

“He will try to escape the first chance he gets.”

“Asher, you can’t do this.”

“Who’s this fucking boy?” Ludd asked on the floor.

“I am Ser Gerold Hightower. I am the husband of Lady Mira Forrester.”

Ludd Whitehill looked at Gerold with interest for a moment, then laughed between screams of pain. “So it’s you! It was my son Torrhen who was supposed to marry her. Too bad for her. Torrhen would have been more interesting for her than you. But not for long. He would have killed the slut as soon as she would have given him a son or two for Ironrath and Highpoint. I wonder how we would have killed her. Maybe just like her brother, with a knife in her throat. A fitting end for a whore, I suppose.”

Asher boiled in anger. It was time for him to end this, to kill the man who was responsible for the deaths of his father, of his mother, of Rodrik, Ethan, Bloodsong. He raised his sword and prepared himself to deliver the final blow that would end House Whitehill forever.

Before he could kill Ludd, someone pushed him. Asher turned to see who did this just as Gerold Hightower was screaming and bringing down his own sword, point first, through Ludd Whitehill’s face.

Everything was frozen for a very long time. Asher was shocked by what he just saw. His brother-in-law pushed him aside to kill Gwyn’s father himself. Slowly, his sister’s husband removed his sword from Ludd’s face. The sword fell on the floor. He was breathing heavily. He turned to look at Asher, a horrified expression on his face. When he spoke, his voice was trembling.

Chapter Notes

Jon arrives at Castle Black. And, as I promise a few people, a character from Telltale Game of Thrones is making his first appearance.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Welcome home. These were the words his uncle Benjen told him when he first saw the Wall. It was only a few years ago, but it looked like a lifetime had gone in the meantime. Back then, Jon had been accompanied by his uncle, Tyrion, two men at his service, a recruiter of the Night’s Watch and two other new recruits. Now he was back with an entire army.

The Umbers resisted at the Last Hearth when they arrived. Mors and Hother Umber, the joint castellans of the castle, fought against Jon’s men when they besieged the Last Hearth. They held for some time, but after a short siege, Ned Umber, the second son of Greatjon Umber and Lord of the Last Hearth now that the Smalljon was dead, rode out of his castle alone with two men and knelt before Jon, asking him to take back House Umber as bannerman of House Stark. Ned Umber was a boy, barely older than Bran the last time Jon saw him, and his uncles didn’t agree with his decision. Hother Umber refused to kneel before Jon and decided to join the Night’s Watch. Mors decided to remain at the service of his nephew, though Jon could tell that it didn’t please him. Jon ordered the forces of the Umbers to march with them to Castle Black, in order to garrison the Wall, bringing Mors with him while sending his son and his daughter to Winterfell as wards.

Overall, Jon had brought twenty thousand men with him, and they all stood behind him as his gaze wandered over the Wall. Tyrion Lannister advised him to not bring so many men and was of an opinion to send more men south to fight Cersei Lannister, but Jon thought it was better to position strong garrisons immediately. Tyrion Lannister knew the threat beyond the Wall, but he didn’t see the Night King. Cersei Lannister was far away, unable to send an army in the North. For now, the dead were the real enemy to defeat.

He left the Wall months ago as… He didn’t really know who he was when he left. He was a Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch who was stabbed in the heart by his fellow brothers. Then he was a man brought back from the dead. After that, he became a rebel who fought against the Boltons, and finally he was King in the North, and King of Westeros.

Jon still couldn’t believe that he was the son of Lyanna Stark and Rhaegar Targaryen. All his life, he wanted to be a Stark. Arya could tell him that he was her brother, no matter what happened, he didn’t feel like a Stark anymore. He shouldn’t be king, whether it was for the North or for the Seven Kingdoms. He was supposed to be a brother of the Night’s Watch, and he dreamed he could be a Stark one day. Who was he now?

Jon had no idea of who he was supposed to be. Arya wanted him to be her brother. Tyrion Lannister wanted him to be Lord of the Seven Kingdoms. The lords of the North wanted him to be the King in the North. What did he want? He looked at Ghost who stood next to him. Sometimes, he tried to persuade himself that he was still a Stark by looking at the direwolf. A Targaryen wouldn’t have a wolf. However, this wolf had been found away from the others, all alone. If only he could ask his opinion to his best friend.

Jon didn’t know what he would do once all of this would be over. Right now, he had to fight the Night King, and that was all that mattered. The person who sat on the Iron Throne would be of no consequence if the dead got through the Wall. Jon only wanted to focus on that for the moment. Keeping his mind on fighting the dead would allow him to not think about his origins, or the Iron Throne, or his position of king.

Jon rode forward, and the column behind him followed. He knew what was waiting for him on the other side of the gates of Castle Black, and that was the one thing that made him eager to come back. He wondered how he looked like now. It was so long since they last saw each other. Jon knew Howland Reed was eager as well.

Along with Jon were several powerful lords from the North and the Vale, including Howland Reed, Robett Glover, Yohn Royce and Harrold Arryn. Jon brought the Knights of the Vale to the Wall on his brother-in-law’s suggestion, saying that would be where they could cause fewer problems. The Knights of the Vale didn’t appreciate, of course. The wildlings followed them as well. Tormund was farther in the column, with his men.

“Let’s hope we’re not too late,” Ser Davos said, riding next to him.

“The Wall is still standing. I suppose everything’s not lost yet,” Jon replied.

“No, indeed. But we must hurry. I can’t pretend I know the dead very well. I didn’t see the Night King, and I didn’t kill a White Walker, but I would rather assume that the dead don’t rest. So we better not rest either. We must man all the castles as quickly as possible.”

“We have enough men for that. More than one thousand per castle, but it will take time to make them usable again.” If these castles can be put back to use at all.

At the Fist of the First Men, Jon heard Mormont say that the Night’s Watch once manned seventeen of the nineteen castles along the Wall, but they were abandoned as the number of men in the Watch began to dwindle. As far as Jon knew, never in history had all the castles along the Wall been manned. This winter might see the first time they were all occupied, if they had enough time. Jon didn’t know how long it would take to make all the castles fit to live and to defend. How much time did they have before them? He had no idea. Truth be told, he was surprised that the dead didn’t launch an attack yet. The Night’s Watch was weak, only the shadow of what it once was. At best, they had fifty men alone in Castle Black, barely a tenth of what they were when Jon joined their ranks.

They arrived before the gates, and they didn’t open. Ser Davos announced that the King in the North demanded entry, but no one answered.

Jon found it strange as well. For a moment, he feared the worst, that Castle Black had fallen to the dead and that Edd and everyone else were dead, but he realized very soon that it was impossible. They sent a few men ahead of them the day before, to warn Castle Black about their arrival. One of them had come back, saying everything was all right and that the Night’s Watch would be ready to receive them. If they found an empty castle, they would have told Jon.

“Let’s wait a little,” Jon finally said.

If they had no answer before one minute, Jon would send men to scale the palisade. Tormund and the Thenns had done it without problem. Jon could feel the Lord of the Eyrie getting impatient behind. He had questioned Jon’s decisions at every turn on their way to the Wall. Jon understood very well why Tyrion had his man Bronn break the lord’s noise. As Harrold Arryn was about to say something, they heard a mechanism on the other side of the gates and they began to slowly open. Jon sighed in relief when he saw his friend Edd appear behind the opening gate.

Jon dismounted once inside the courtyard. “Still alive, I can see, Lord Commander” he said to his friend.

“I could say the same for you, your Grace,” Edd replied. They exchanged a laugh and hugged tightly. “Welcome back.”

“You did your job well. It still stands.” Jon looked at the Wall to emphasize his meaning.

Jon turned to the people behind him. “My lords, my ladies, this is Eddison Tollett, 999th Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. Edd, this is Lord Harrold Arryn. Lord Yohn Royce, Lord Robett Glover, Lord Howland Red, Lady Lyanna Mormont and Lord Cley Cerwyn.”

“My lords, my lady.” Edd bowed. “Welcome to Castle Black. The Night’s Watch thank you for your help.”

“Why did it take so long to open the gates for us?” Lord Arryn asked.

“We only have thirty-nine men here, my lord, and we try to patrol the Wall the best we can. It’s difficult for us to spare men for the southern gate. It’s the gates giving on the north that we need to watch the most.”

“We have a lot to talk about, Edd,” Jon interrupted before it went further. “But first, we must settle our men. Are there enough available rooms?”

“Don’t worry, you have all the space you want. I can’t guarantee the state of it, though. The lords and the ladies can stay in the King’s Tower. Your men can take the barracks, but they won’t all fit in there.”

“We’ll manage. I want all the lords and ladies to attend a meeting in the common hall in one hour,” Jon said to the people behind him. He then turned to Edd and added in a lower voice. “Where is he?”

“He’s waiting for you. This way.”

“Lord Reed, you should come,” Jon told the Lord of Greywater Watch. He followed him and Edd as four black brothers attended the other lords. They went to the King’s Tower, without surprise. “How are they?”

“As well as they can be after months beyond the Wall. I still wonder how they managed to survive all this time, but they won’t tell me. He said he would only talk to you. He doesn’t talk very much to anyone, truth be told, except the girl. They’re almost always together. They even spend their nights in the same room.”

This detail troubled Jon. He looked at Lord Reed, fearing his reaction to the revelation. The man seemed puzzled. They climbed the stairs to the tower in silence, not daring to ask any other question. Jon had followed this way more often than he could count back when Stannis resided at Castle Black. It was at the door of the room where he lived back then that Edd knocked.
“Who goes there?” a woman’s voice asked from the other side. Jon felt Howland Reed tense next to him.

“Eddison Tollett, with the King in the North and Lord Howland Reed,” Edd replied.

A silence followed that looked like it would last forever. Then the door burst open to reveal a young woman with curly brown hair, wearing clothes made of skins and furs like the wildlings.

“Father!”

“Meera!” The next second, she was throwing herself in Lord Reed’s arms. Jon stepped aside, not wanting to interfere, then he walked inside the room. Lying in the bed was his brother Bran.

“Jon.” A smile appeared on Bran’s face. He was taller than the last time, now approaching Jon’s age when he left Winterfell. Jon smiled in return and came to hug his little brother. Sam had told him that he had gone north of the Wall, and Jon was afraid he could never see Bran again. Still, here he was, alive and safe.

“How are you?” he asked his little brother, sitting on the bed next to him.

“Do you like Hobb’s stew?”

“Your Grace.” The girl who opened the door had come back with her father. She knelt before Jon.

“Lady Meera, I thank you. For taking care of my brother.”

“What happened to Jojen? Where is he?” Lord Reed asked. His daughter was back on her feet. She lowered her eyes to the floor. Lord Reed’s face took a pained expression.

“Lord Reed,” Bran said, “Jojen died fighting for me. Without him, I would probably be dead right now.”

“Then it wasn’t in vain.”

The Lord of Greywater Watch sat on a chair nearby. His daughter went to his side. “I heard about Rickon,” Bran said. “Edd told me. What about the others?”

“Sansa and Arya are at Winterfell,” Jon answered. “They’re well.”

“Good.” Relief was plain on Bran’s face. “I saw you at Craster’s Keep, you know.”

Jon was struck by this. “You saw me? You were there? When?”

“When you attacked it. When you killed the deserters of the Night’s Watch who rebelled. I saw you. I… I wanted to go to you, to tell you that I was here… but I couldn’t.”

“Why? Why did you go north of the Wall in the first place? You could have come to Castle Black. We would have kept you safe there.”

“I couldn’t. I didn’t decide to go north of the Wall, Jon. I had to go there.”

“But why?”
His brother said nothing for a second. “It’s a long story.”

So Bran began to tell him about dreams of a three-eyed raven that he did in Winterfell, of the visions he started to have, of his aptitude to warg first into his direwolf then into Hodor. He told him of his encounter with Meera and Jojen Reed, of everything they went through as they travelled to the Nightfort and beyond. He told him about the three-eyed raven living in a cave under a weirwood with the last Children of the Forest, of the visions he had, of the attack led by the White Walkers and how they escaped. It was very difficult for Bran when it came to explain how they lost Summer and Hodor. His brother even explained that he was the reason why Hodor, whose real name was Wyllis, ended up only capable of saying Hodor, because he warged into Hodor as he was in a vision of the past. The story took an even weirder turn when Bran told him he and Meera were saved by their uncle Benjen, who survived the White Walkers with the help of the Children of the Forest.

Jon needed time to gather his thoughts after Bran told him the whole story. He thought he saw everything. He saw giants, and his brother told him the Children of the Forest were still alive and that he met them. He saw wargs, and Bran said he was one himself, and that he could even take possession of a human body. He saw the Night King, but Bran told him the Night King actually touched him in a vision. He learned recently that he was the son of Rhaegar Targaryen, and Bran told him he was the three-eyed raven. All this was overwhelming.

“Jon, the Night King isn’t far behind us,” his brother said. “We barely escaped the dead. They killed all the Children of the Forest, or at least I think they killed all of them. It’s only a matter of time before they attack the Wall.”

“I know. I was at Hardhome. I saw him there. He raised his hands and tens of thousand men, women and children’s bodies stood, right before my eyes. I know what we face, Bran.”

“Who is he, then? Tell me.”

“He is a man. Or was a man, once. Eight thousand years ago, when the First Men came from Essos, they fought against the giants and the Children of the Forest, and they killed them. They cut the sacred trees of their gods, the ones we call the Old Gods. They tried to repel the First Men by every mean necessary, but they failed. In the end, when they were pushed to their limits, they placed a shard of dragonglass in a man’s heart. They created the Night King this way, the first White Walker.”

“The Children of the Forest created the White Walkers?” Lord Reed asked, all bewildered.

“Aye, they did. They thought they could stop the First Men. From what I could gather so far, at first, it worked. The First Men lost several battles against the dead. But after a time, the Walkers turned against their creators. They took control of the whole North and threatened the Riverlands. The Children had no choice but to ask for help to the First Men. It took time, but together they defeated the White Walkers. They made the Pact of the Isle of Faces to live together in peace and they built the Wall to protect them against future invasions.”

“So they managed to defeat them,” Jon said lowly. “How?”

“I think you already know, Jon.”

“Aye. The Children’s weapons were made of it. The First Men used them to defeat the Walkers and repel them far in the North, until they were so few that they couldn’t hope to defeat the men.”

Bran shrugged. “I don’t know. Maybe they think they are strong enough now. Maybe they believe Westeros is too weak.”

“They did choose their time well. We’ve been weakened by all these wars in the past years. We’re not enough to fight them.”

“No, but we still have a chance.”

“What chance? Do you have any idea how many men the Night King has in his army?”

“Aye, I do. But I know there’s a way to defeat them.”

“What way?”

“I don’t know. I get visions, I see things, I know they can be defeated, but so far I don’t know how. I think one day I might know.”

Jon sighed. “Bran, we need to know how to defeat the dead now. We need weapons to destroy them, we need men to stop them from crossing the Wall. We cannot wait for a magic sword to appear from nowhere to solve all our problems. We need to man the Wall. For now, it is our best chance. This is the place where we are the most likely to defeat the dead. As long as we keep them north of the Wall, no one in the Seven Kingdoms will die. If they get through it, then we are lost.”

Bran nodded. “I understand, Jon. You must protect the Wall, but I can help you. I have visions of past events. I can see what happened the last time.”

“Well, if you see anything useful, then tell us, but for now, we must focus on defending the Wall. I’m sending you back to Winterfell.”

“What?”

“The Wall is not a good place for you. You’ll be safer in Winterfell.”

“Jon, you need me,” Bran pleaded.

“But Jon…”

“Bran, he’s right,” Meera Reed intervened. “The Wall is not a safe place for you. If the White Walkers ever manage to get through it, you will be the first they kill. We must bring you somewhere safe, Winterfell is at a good distance and it is a strong place. You’ll be safer there. And if you ever discover something, you’ll only have to send a raven to your brother. It won’t be difficult.”

Bran seemed to think about what she said. “Meera is right,” Lord Reed added. “We must bring you somewhere you will be safe, Lord Bran. Castle Black is not this place.”

After a moment, Bran nodded. “All right. I’ll go back to Winterfell.”

“Sansa and Arya will be glad to see you.” A smile came back to Bran’s face when Jon told him that.

“Is it true that Sansa is married? To the Imp?”
“Aye.” Jon chuckled a little. “I know, it’s strange, but considering how Joffrey was, I’m glad she’s married to him today. She had a daughter not long ago.”

“Really?” Bran asked, eyes wide open. “Sansa has a child?”

“Aye. You’ll be able to see her when you go back home.” Bran seemed quite eager to go back to Winterfell now, unlike a few moments ago. However, there was one thing Jon had to discuss with him before he left. It couldn’t be delayed. “Lord Howland, Lady Meera, could you leave me alone with my brother, please? We have something important to talk about, in private.”

“Of course, my lord,” the Lord of Greywater Watch said.

Lord Reed left with his daughter. Jon stood up and took a chair that he brought close to Bran’s bed. “Bran, there’s a matter we must discuss right away. You know that I am King in the North, now, don’t you?”

“Aye, I do. Congratulations. Father would be proud of you.”

He didn’t know. “Bran, I’m not your brother.”

A heavy silence fell on the room. “How do you know? Was it Lord Reed? He told you about the Tower of Joy?”

“Aye, he did.”

Bran had a sorry expression on his face. “I’m sorry, Jon. But… you are my brother, no matter what happens.”

Jon smiled sadly. “Arya told me the same thing at Winterfell when we learned.”

“I… I don’t know what to say. I was hoping I could hide it to you. I didn’t want you to believe that you were not one of us. Father promised to our aunt to keep you safe. She was afraid that Robert Baratheon would kill you if he learned who you were. She died begging my father to protect you.”

Jon looked at the floor for a long moment. He was a bastard, but worse he wasn’t the son of Eddard Stark, the man who taught him everything he knew, the man who brought him up as his son. To respect a promise he made to his mother, like Bran said. Wait, he didn’t say it to Bran yet.

“How do you know that?” Edd could have told Bran that he was the son of Rhaegar Targaryen. They sent ravens everywhere about this, but the ravens said nothing about a promise Eddard Stark made to his sister.

“Aye.” Jon sighed heavily. “Bran, the Lords of the North chose me as king, but they didn’t know you were still alive. Robb made me his heir in his will, but he thought you were dead. You should be king, and the Lord of Winterfell. It’s rightfully yours.”

Bran looked at him for a moment without speaking. “Jon… I can’t be king. To be honest, I don’t think I want. And if the lords chose you… then it should be you.”

“They would have chosen you if they knew you were alive.”

“I’m not sure. I’m a cripple, Jon. And… I think we both have a role to play in the war to come. I don’t know which role exactly, but I think I know what role is not mine to play. And I don’t think it is my duty to be king. I have something else to do. And anyway, I think your friend Edd told me you were Lord of the Seven Kingdoms.”

“Aye. It’s not only the North who sided with me. The Lannisters, the Tullys and the Arryns decided I would be their king as well. They want to overthrow Cersei Lannister and place me on the Iron Throne in King’s Landing. There’s already a Lannister army marching on the capital.”

“Then, anyway, I can’t be king, even if I wanted to.”

“Bran…”

“No, Jon, listen. I know what you’ve been through. You fought the dead. I saw you fighting them at Hardhome. You know how to fight them, and that’s what we need right now. I can’t fight them. I can’t even walk. You’re the king we need. I don’t want to start a quarrel in our family over who should be king or not. The lords chose you, and I think they were right. If someone can lead us against the White Walkers, it’s you, not me.”

Bran paused for a moment before he said one sentence that meant everything. “You are our king, Jon.” And with that, the fate of the North was decided.

Later, Jon was sitting in the common hall in the company of all his advisors and the lords who followed him. Tormund was there as well, representing the Free Folk, along with a few other wildling chiefs. After his discussion with Bran, he had gone to Edd to have a global idea of the state of the Wall and the Night’s Watch before meeting his men, but Edd had also showed him several ravens that arrived for him while he was besieging the Last Hearth. These ravens carried information about everything that had happened in the Seven Kingdoms recently. Jon had received some of this information while he was at the Last Hearth by messengers sent by Sansa and Tyrion, but some of these were new to him as well. He would have to inform the lords as well of these new developments. His brother Bran, Edd and Ser Davos were sitting with him at the high table.

“My lords, my ladies,” Jon said to open the meeting. “Thank you all for coming. First, I have some news. Castle Black received a raven yesterday with very good news. The Dreadfort has fallen.” This revelation was followed by cheers. “The Blackfish took it without heavy losses. The garrison surrendered after a short siege. The North is pacified.” New cheers and sighs of relief followed. “That doesn’t mean the war is over. I won’t lie to you, this is only the beginning. We came here, at Castle Black, for a reason. We don’t know where the army of the dead is, we don’t know precisely how many men they have, and we don’t know what are their plans. All we know is that they will attack us, sooner or later. There are nineteen castles all along the Wall, from Westwatch-by-the-Bridge to Eastwatch-by-the-Sea, and sixteen of them are abandoned. The three that are still used don’t have enough men.” Jon turned to Edd. “The Lord Commander Tollett confirmed that there are only thirty-nine men left at Castle Black, and barely a hundred at the two others. So we will have to man these three castles as well, along with all the others. Every mile on the Wall must be patrolled, and everyone will have to contribute. Castle Black will serve as our headquarters. I know the Night’s Watch swore to take no part in the politics of the Realm and that all the castles belong to the Watch, but the Night’s Watch won’t be able to repel the dead by itself.” Jon looked at Edd as he said the last words.

“You’re welcome, believe me,” his friend replied. “Without you, we are doomed. We don’t have enough men, we don’t have enough food, we don’t have enough weapons. We lack in everything. Use the castles as you wish.”

“A garrison will be established in every castle with a commander,” Jon continued. “Castle Black will have a bigger garrison, as will the Shadow Tower and Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. If another castle finds itself in difficulty, he will have to ask the closest of these three to send help. These castles are already in service, they don’t need to be restored, and they can house more men. The others will need to be restored, their tunnels to be unsealed, their defenses to be rebuilt. I’ve already chosen a commander for every castle. Ser Davos Seaworth will be in charge to oversee the general reconstruction of the castles along the Wall.”

The lords nodded their approval. Ser Davos was respected enough despite his modest origins, and there would be fewer problems if he was the one in charge. A Northerner or a man of the Vale could cause problems with the Free Folk. At least Tormund and the other chiefs respected Davos.

“The Wall also needs supplied. There isn’t enough left in the larders of Castle Black and the other castles for our army. We may last a year with what there is here, but nothing more.”

“I believed the Night’s Watch would be able to prepare for winter better. White Harbor sent them a lot of supplies through the last years,” Ser Waterfell, a knight representing House Manderly, said.

“The Watch had to house Stannis’s army for a time, not to mention she had to feed the Free Folk. And our army is much bigger than the Watch has been for decades if not centuries.” Jon looked all over the assembly, particularly to the northern lords. “I know you all made great sacrifices already, but I must ask you to send whatever you can spare to the Wall.”

The lords of the North looked at each other, and it was Lord Glover who spoke first. “That won’t be easy, your Grace, but we will do it. Since this is what is required.”

“Bear Island doesn’t have much to give, but we will send what we can,” Lady Mormont added.

Soon, all the lords of the North seemed to agree. Jon turned to the Knights of the Vale. “The Vale wasn’t touched by the war. I must demand that you contribute as well,” he told them.

“Wait a minute,” Harrold Arryn interrupted before any of his bannermen could say anything. “Will these supplies be distributed to the wildlings as well?”

“Aye, they will,” Jon answered plainly.

“This is out of question. You’re asking us to feed raiders, rapers and murderers.”

“Be careful, boy,” Tormund warned him.

“I demand you to help your allies. Is that a problem?” Jon intervened.

“Our allies, yes. You are our king, we acknowledged you as much, but these savages didn’t recognize you as their king. They live on our lands…”

“They live on the Gift.” Jon stopped the Lord of the Eyrie before he went further. “The Gift belongs to the Watch, not to us. You said I was your king, and your king gave you an order. Are you going to disobey?”

Harrold Arryn was motionless for a time, and the tension grew in the room. “No. We’ll do as you ask, your Grace.” The last two words were said icily. Jon saw that the other lords of the Vale weren’t happy either. He decided to move to another matter.

“Now, I’ve received some news from the south. It appears that Daenerys Targaryen took the island of Dragonstone. She has come with her own army, and if these news are to be believed, she has three dragons.” There were a lot of reactions, going from uncertainty to fear. “Her armies are invading the Stormlands as we speak, and it seems she is supported by Dorne. She intends to take back the Iron Throne from Cersei Lannister. She also demands that every lord in Westeros bends the knee before her.’”

He let the lords discuss between them about this for a moment. This was quite unexpected. Jon had heard about Maester Aemon’s last relative, but he didn’t think she would come back to Westeros at this moment. Finally, it was Yohn Royce who reacted first.

“Your Grace, we cannot remain idle before this. It was something to let Cersei Lannister alone in the south, but we cannot ignore this new threat.”

“I agree, Lord Royce,” Jon said.

“What are you going to do, your Grace?” Lord Glover asked. “The last time a Targaryen came, the King in the North bent the knee before him.”

Everyone was looking at him. A heavy silence filled the hall. They were all waiting for their king to state his intentions. Jon had never wanted to be king. He never asked for it. He accepted it because others wanted him to be king, and even then, he didn’t feel like one most of the time. He just learned that his aunt was back to Westeros and intended to conquer the Seven Kingdoms. And she had the means for it. The first Targaryens had come only with a handful of men and three dragons. This one had a whole army along with three dragons. Could Jon stand against her? Torrhen Stark knelt three hundred years ago before Aegon. However, he didn’t know who Daenerys Targaryen was. He knew too little about her. How might she react when she learned that he was her nephew? Did she already know? Jon shouldn’t be king. He was never meant to be king or lord. These were supposed to be the destiny of his siblings, but not his. Carefully, Jon made his intentions known.

“I will not bend the knee. I will not bend the knee to Daenerys Targaryen,” he repeated. This was followed by several signs of approval. “You named me your king, and I will remain your king.”

“Then in this case, we must march on King’s Landing right now,” Yohn Royce declared. “Cersei Lannister is holding the city, but she won’t stand against Daenerys Targaryen. We must reach the capital before the Mad King’s daughter does and takes it.”

“Lord Royce, we need every man at the Wall.”

“Please forgive me, your Grace, but we have the Wall standing between us and these dead you’re talking about. We don’t need so many men to garrison it.”

“We do. We don’t know how many men the Night King has, but at Hardhome they were tens of thousand. Mance Rayder had a hundred thousand men in his own army when he attacked the Wall, and the Night King will certainly have more. We need men at the Wall to stop the dead when they attack and to push them back. The moment they get on the other side, we are lost.”

“Your Grace, we can’t ignore the threat that Daenerys Targaryen represents.”

“We are not ignoring it,” Jon reassured the Lord of Runestone. “We have an army marching on King’s Landing as we speak. Their mission is to take the capital, and Tyrion Lannister is negotiating an alliance with House Tyrell as we speak.”

“You really trust the Lannisters? They murdered your brother and your father!” Lord Arryn shouted.

“I won’t hear any more doubts about the loyalty of the Lannisters. They fought with us against the Boltons, they freed the North from Ramsay and his allies, and their lord is married to my sister.”

“She’s not your sister. You’re not a Stark.”
“Show some respect to your king, my boy,” Lord Glover intervened.

“I am the Lord of the Eyrie!”

“Aye, you are, and you proclaimed Jon Snow you king just as we did. So stop bragging like a child and show your king the respect you owe him.” Lady Lyanna was as sharp as ever.

Lord Royce put a strong arm on Harrold Arryn’s shoulder and forced him to sit down. Then he spoke, more quietly than his liege lord. “Your Grace, I think I speak for all the lords of the Vale when I say that we should send more men south to take the capital and face your aunt. We know she will come soon and we can’t rely only on the Lannisters and the Tullys to defeat her, or on an alliance with the Reach. The Knights of the Vale are more used to fights in the south than the Northerners and the Northerners are better to fight in the North. Many of our men aren’t used to this cold weather. I suggest you send us back south to fight the threats you have there, while the lords of the North remain here to stop the dead if they come.”

Jon couldn’t allow that. They needed as many men as they could find to guard the Wall. For now, they had twenty thousand men, more than a thousand for each castle along the Wall. If the lords of the Vale left with their men, this number would be reduced to five hundred. They needed these men at the Wall. It wouldn’t matter if it was him or his aunt or Cersei who sat on the Iron Throne if the dead got through the Wall. Fighting the dead was their priority.

Jon looked straight at Lord Royce. “My lord, your son Waymar was killed by a White Walker on his first ranging north of the Wall. I understand Daenerys is a threat, but the fights in the south won’t matter if the dead get through the Wall. We need your men here, or else there are other sons who will die, and who will be turned into wights. Your son died fighting against the dead, and we can’t let his death be vain.”

His words seemed to have some effect on the Lord of Runestone who looked deep in his thoughts. And then the Lord of the Eyrie used the moment to roar again. “So we just wait here for dead men to walk at our doors while a Targaryen seizes the Iron Throne and attacks us from the back door?”

“We don’t have to.” Ser Davos spoke before Jon could. “The Knights of the Vale brought ten thousand men with them, but the Vale didn’t take part to the War of the Five Kings. Surely it can muster more troops.”

“Yes, we can,” Lord Royce confirmed.

“Then, the Lannisters and the Tullys will be little more than ten thousand when they reach King’s Landing. If the Vale could raise an army of its own and join them, we would have enough forces not only to take back the capital, but also to fight Daenerys. If Lord Tyrion manages with that to secure an alliance with the Tyrells, we may have a chance to defeat Daenerys.”

Jon looked at Harrold Arryn. “How many men can the Vale of Arryn raise?”

The Lord of the Eyrie didn’t seem to know what to answer. It was Lord Royce who gave the answer. “We can raise quickly an army of twenty thousand good men.”

“In this case, I want the Eyrie to raise an army and make a junction with the army Ser Daven Lannister is leading to the capital. Lord Arryn, I charge you to go back to the Vale and join your men in the fights in the south.”

“Me?” Harrold Arryn asked.

“I think your talents will be more useful in the south than in the North.” And we’ll get rid of you once
“Very well.” The young lord looked unsure about how to react. “I will leave at once.”

“Just one thing. Don’t engage Daenerys’s forces immediately. You are allowed to wage war against Cersei and to arrest her for now, but not Daenerys.”

“What?” Everyone was surprised.

“Daenerys holds Dragonstone. Castle Black received a raven from Samwell Tarly not long ago. He is at the Citadel, learning to become a maester, and he is a brother of the Night’s Watch. He discovered that Dragonstone sits on a mountain of dragonglass. We know dragonglass can destroy White Walkers and the wights. Daenerys also has a powerful army, she has dragonfire, and we share the same enemy, Cersei Lannister. I intend to write to her and propose an alliance.”

There was a general uproar in the hall. “Your Grace, with all your respect, a Targaryen cannot be trusted,” Lord Royce opposed.

“Are you saying I can’t be trusted, Lord Royce? Unless you’ve forgotten, I am a Targaryen.”

“Perhaps, but I remember the Mad King all too well. His daughter cannot be trusted.”

“I am his grandson, Lord Royce. I do not consider myself like the Mad King all the same. We know very little about Daenerys Targaryen, but from what I heard, she spent the last years fighting slavery in Slaver’s Bay. And she is my aunt. If family means something for her, we might have a chance to prevent another war. We need the dragonglass, and we need allies. Fire kills wights, and dragons breathe fire.”

“You said you wouldn’t kneel before her, your Grace,” Lady Mormont said.

“And I won’t.” Not yet, at least. Jon didn’t know what he would do once the war was over, but for now, he had to remain King in the North if they were to hope to defeat the White Walkers. And he had to know more about his aunt before he knelt before her. “I will only suggest her an alliance. Nothing more. We don’t have time to squabble like children over the Iron Throne while the dead are coming for all of us. I will write to Daenerys at Dragonstone and propose an alliance. We will fight her, if need be, but only if we have to.”

Jon could see that many were not happy with this decision. They were ready to accept him as their king, a Targaryen bastard possibly born out of rape, but they were opposed to any idea of an alliance with a trueborn daughter of the last Targaryen king.

Lord Harrold Arryn stood up. “Very well. I’m leaving immediately for the Eyrie.” He walked away and left the Hall. Although Jon gave him the order to go to the Vale, it felt as if he turned his back on him. No one spoke for a moment. Jon turned to Yohn Royce.

“Lord Royce, I make you commander of the forces of the Vale here at the Wall.” The Lord of Runestone nodded, a grim expression on his face.

Jon went on distributing the troops along the Wall. He decided that each castle would belong to a different faction, to reduce the tensions, at the exception of Castle Black, the Shadow Tower and Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. The troops garrisoned at these castles would include men from the North, the Vale and the Free Folk, and they would be under the command of the actual commanders there, Denys Mallister at the Shadow Tower and Cotter Pyke at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. Jon would take the command of the garrison at Castle Black. Garrisons were sent to the other castles and each were given to a different lord to command. Westwatch-by-the-Bridge was given to Lady Mormont, Greyguard to Lord Glover, Icemark to Mors Umber, the Nightfort to Lord Reed, Queensgate to Lord Vance, Oakenshield to Tormund, Long Barrow to Lord Royce.

When they were done giving and arguing over command positions and garrisons, Jon discussed the last topic of the day. “My lords, before we go our separate ways, I must announce you a decision my bro… my cousin and I took. You chose me as your king, and I accept that, but Winterfell is not mine. From this day on, Brandon Stark will be Lord of Winterfell.”

Bran spoke then for the first time in the meeting. “I will do everything to be a good lord, but Jon is your king. We need him to face the dead. I recognize him as King in the North, my king, and as Lord of the Seven Kingdoms.”

“But wait, your Grace, what will be your seat if you don’t have Winterfell anymore?” Lord Royce asked.

“Jon will always be welcomed to Winterfell. No matter if he’s my cousin, to me, he will always be my brother.”

“We don’t doubt it, my lord, but the King in the North needs a seat, a castle he can call his own,” Lord Glover said. “What will it be?”

Jon hadn’t thought about this. “Well, I suppose it will be King’s Landing when we take it. In the meantime, I will lead the operations on the Wall from Castle Black, so that won’t be a great problem for now.” The lords seemed content with this and didn’t push the matter further.

The assembly was dissolved not long after. Jon went to write his message to Daenerys Targaryen, proposing an alliance against Cersei and asking her permission to mine dragonglass on Dragonstone. Jon didn’t have high hopes concerning this message. Who would believe the dead had arisen, and would this woman believe that he was her nephew? Still, he had to try. The survival of the Seven Kingdoms depended on it.

Next morning, Bran left for Winterfell, and most of the lords left as well to take command of the castles they received. They kept a strong garrison of three thousand men at Castle Black. Jon spent the day with Edd and Ser Davos, trying to arrange everything to house their many men and distributing duties to every one of them. They had to rebuild many buildings in Castle Black, but also the defenses on the Wall, while some of their men were to assume guard duties along the Wall or to patrol the wilderness. They were never to wander too far from the Wall. Jon wouldn’t sacrifice them to the White Walkers, but there were things men on the top of the Wall couldn’t see and that men on the ground could see.

Around midday, he was taking a meal with Ser Davos, Edd and the new First Builder and First Steward. Edd said they were not traitors like Bowen Marsh or Othell Yarwyck, but didn’t speak very highly of them either. He didn’t name a new First Ranger.

“How much time should it take, to bring back the abandoned castles into shape?” Ser Davos asked the First Builder. Before he was able to answer, a horn blew.

“Do you have any rangers out there?” Jon asked to Edd.

“Nope.”

There was a second blow. They waited, but a third didn’t come. One blow meant rangers returning. Two blows meant wildlings. Three meant White Walkers. Wildlings were approaching. Edd left the table to see what was going on and Jon followed him. It could be possible that a few wildlings survived north of the Wall and that now they were coming to ask for help. They had to be among the last few survivors.

“How many?” Edd asked to one of the men guarding the gates.

“Our men up there counted about twenty of them,” he answered.

“Where are they from?” Edd was asking the question to Jon as much as to anyone who might give him an answer.

“It doesn’t matter, Edd. We must let them through, or else they’ll become meat for the army of the dead,” Jon said.

His friend nodded. He had no love for the Free Folk, but he agreed with Jon about allowing them south of the Wall. He also warmed up a little to them after they helped to overthrow Ser Alliser.

“Open the gates! Take positions, men!”

It was normal to take precautions. They had no idea of what those people would do once they arrived. Edd sent a few men in the tunnels to escort them. When they came back, it was obvious from the furs and skins that these people were of the Free Folk. Most were full grown men and women, but there was a little girl as well, maybe ten or eleven, with silver hair.

“Jon Snow.” One of the wildlings walked to him. He had a huge brown beard and his steps were heavy. “They’re not far away. They chased us along the road and we could barely escape them. The dead are coming.”

Jon didn’t recognize this man. Perhaps they met while he was living among the Free Folk. No, it couldn’t be. He didn’t talk like someone who was born north of the Wall. He talked like a Northerner, a Northerner from the people who lived south of the mountain clans. He looked at him closely, and then he recognized him. The last time Jon saw him, he was a brother of the Night’s Watch, a man sentenced to death for killing another sworn brother. He was one of the rare people to survive the Red Wedding and one of the men who volunteered to attack Craster’s Keep. He escaped Castle Black the night before his execution, and now he was back.

“Gared Tuttle.”

Chapter End Notes

Bran isn’t as detached as he is in Season 7. When I planned these chapters, Season 7 hadn’t begun, and I didn’t imagine Bran like he is in the actual season, hence the difference.

DAENERYS V

She waited on a hill. From there, she could see everything around her. Indeed, the lands of the Reach were beautiful. As far as the eye could see, the ground was covered with farms, orchards and rivers. Viserys had spoken to her about the marvels of the Reach, though she doubted he ever saw them. Still, from where she stood, it seemed he hadn’t been wrong about it. The castle of Highgarden, that stood not far away, was another proof of the beauty of this country. She hadn’t been impressed that much by the Stormlands, but the Reach really looked like a paradise from where she stood. Seeing the crops spreading everywhere, she tried to imagine how many people she could feed with that. If Meereen had been surrounded by such bountiful lands, she wouldn’t have had any difficulty to feed her people back there. She hoped these lands would be enough to feed the people of King’s Landing through winter.

Daenerys looked as the small delegation riding slowly in her direction. She posed as a condition that she would discuss with Lord Tyrell on this hill, and not inside his castle. She wouldn’t go inside a castle whose lord so far didn’t acknowledge her as queen, even if Drogon was there. He was standing behind her on the hill, the Red Priest Revan at her side. He was the only one to accompany her for these negotiations. She had come on Dragon with him to speak with Mace Tyrell in person. They didn’t have time to call a meeting somewhere else or to exchange ravens. She had to speak to him in person. Now he was approaching. The green banners of House Tyrell were growing and Daenerys could notice a golden sign on it. It had to be the rose of their sigil.

Daenerys met Lord Tyrell’s daughter in Storm’s End. She was informed of her presence when she arrived at Storm’s End. They sent a raven to Dragonstone to inform her of this matter, but the raven seemed to arrive after she left the island. She stopped at Storm’s End to make sure it was in their control now, and to use her dragons to take it if it wasn’t already done. She was surprised to discover that Margaery Tyrell was still alive. According to the information they received, she died, but it seemed one of Prince Trystane’s cousin managed to smuggle her out of the city before it was too late. As a result, they had the last surviving child of the Lord of Highgarden in their possession.

This was almost too good to be true, but the bad news was that Margaery Tyrell was pregnant with Tommen Baratheon’s child. Daenerys didn’t want to kill a baby, but she couldn’t let him represent a threat for her. She wouldn’t hurt him, but she couldn’t let his existence be known. Very few would know that Margaery Tyrell had a child with Tommen, and no one would know where he was once he was born.

Daenerys had dined with Lady Margaery before she left Storm’s End. She was two years older than Daenerys. She had been married to three men from the same family, and Daenerys was only married once. She only had one brother and he was dead. Daenerys’ brothers were dead as well, but Ser Loras Tyrell had been kind with his sister, to the opposite of Viserys. Margaery Tyrell had a happy childhood, something Daenerys never had. She envied this woman, though not so much considering what happened to her recently.

“My father has no reason to oppose you,” Margaery told her as they ate together. “He will follow you, I promise. I just hope you keep your promises as well.”

“On that, you have nothing to fear. When I give my word, I don’t do it lightly,” Daenerys had replied.

“So, I really have nothing to fear for my child.”

“Nothing.” The discussion was cold, and Daenerys could see that the other woman resented her for taking her child away. “I’m sorry, but I can’t take the risk of having an insurrection led by the son of Tommen Baratheon one day.”

“Everyone will know that Tommen was born of incest and that he had no right on the Iron Throne very soon. What threat will my son or my daughter be to you when it is known?”

“He might still be a threat. The Blackfyres were bastards, and yet they threatened the rule of my ancestors for decades.”

“But the Blackfyres were legitimized by King Aegon the Fourth.”

Daenerys had laid her cup of wine on the table at this moment. “I will not change my mind.”

Daenerys regretted that she had to take a child away from his mother. She had fought against that sort of things back on the other continent, and here she was, doing exactly what she fought so hard against. “I might give you some news about him after a time, if the situation is good enough.”

That was all she could offer to the woman sitting in front of her. It was still better than nothing.
Daenerys’s son had been taken away from her before she could even lay eyes upon him. She tried to imagine herself in the place of Margaery Tyrell, and she could only sympathize with her. On the other hand, this woman was queen for a time, and she had to be careful with her.

“How was your brother?” she asked then to the Tyrell.

Daenerys saw a flash of pain go through Margaery Tyrell’s eyes when she asked the question.
“Kind. Brave. Courageous. Foolish, at times. Loyal to our family. He was one of the best swordsmen in the Seven Kingdoms. He was also very handsome. Almost all the girls who met him were swooning before his smile. My grandmother used to say he was the most desirable bachelor in Westeros.” Margaery Tyrell seemed lost in her thoughts, looking away. “When we had balls and receptions in Highgarden, every young woman wanted to dance with him. Many thought he would remember them because he gave them a rose during a tourney. Most of the time he didn’t remember them.” She made a faint laugh, nervously. “He was always charming. Arrogant, too. He thought very highly of himself. He thought nothing could defeat him. That nothing could kill him.”

Daenerys had watched as Margaery Tyrell closed her eyes and a single tear roll on her left cheek. “I had a brother me too. Viserys. He was the only family I ever knew. Most of the time, I was afraid of him. He got angry very easily, and I was the target any time he got angry. He always told me then that I woke up the dragon. I didn’t cry when he died. I was pregnant and he threatened to cut out my baby while he was still in my belly. When he died, I didn’t think that my brother had died. I thought that the man who used to be my brother had died. But still, I can remember times when I was afraid at night. I would crawl into his bed, he would reassure me, and he would tell me stories about our About our father, our mother. About Dragonstone. That’s what I remember. For despite all his flaws, he was still my brother once.”

Daenerys’s mind had drifted away, and when she looked back at Margaery Tyrell, who had tears on each cheek, the other woman nodded. Daenerys looked down. “Please excuse me, Lady Margaery, but I leave on the morrow for Highgarden. I need rest.”

“Of course.” Lord Tyrell’s daughter had wiped the tears from her face and stood up, but she asked one last question to Daenerys before she left her private apartments. “You intend to kill Cersei, don’t you?”

“I do.”

“Then let me give you an advice, your Grace. Don’t underestimate her. Kill her the first chance you have. Don’t execute her. Kill her when you have the first opportunity to do it. She’s capable of everything. She would burn all Westeros if that meant she could be queen of the ashes. She would kill millions to save her own life. Don’t make the same mistakes that I did. Don’t give her a moment. Kill her as soon as you can, by any mean necessary.”

This discussion had taken place a few days ago, and now Daenerys was here, waiting to discuss with the father of this woman. She noticed a carriage with the delegation heading in their direction as they arrived at the bottom of the beginning of the hill. Revan was ready for everything, although Daenerys gave him the order to initiate nothing and only react if the Tyrells tried something on her or her dragon. If things went wrong, they could climb on Drogon and escape. However, Revan said he could stay behind and provide her with a diversion as she flew away. According to Kinvara, Revan was a very good fighter as well as a cunning and skilled politician. He always carried a sword with him. Daenerys wondered why he kept a mask on him at all time. Ever since they left Dragonstone, she never saw him remove it for a single moment.

The head of the delegation approached them. They were about twelve men, all armed. Daenerys could feel Drogon ready behind her. The men were all positioned around the carriage. She thought about how Drogo would have laughed at Lord Tyrell, coming to see her in this way. To the eyes of the Dothrakis, a horse was the only place a king should sit. People who got carried were useless, unworthy.

The door of the carriage was opened and instead of Lord Tyrell, an old woman came out of it. She wore a black gown that covered her head and framed her face. As she walked towards Daenerys, she made a gesture to the two men following her, and they stayed behind. She kept walking toward Daenerys at a normal pace, and she stopped a few steps away from her.

“So, you are the Dragon Queen. Daenerys Targaryen. I won’t say all your other titles, or else we’ll still be here tomorrow,” the woman said.

Daenerys didn’t appreciate the remark, but she decided to do as if she heard nothing. “Where is Lord Tyrell?” she asked.

“My son is in this great castle you can see behind me. I’m here to represent him.”

So she was Olenna Tyrell, the mother of the Lord of Highgarden. “I demanded to speak with the Lord of Highgarden, not with his lady mother.”

“Oh, believe me, these talks will go much better with me than with my oaf of a son. And they will much more pleasant. Would you allow me to bring a seat? A woman of my age needs to rest her legs.”
Daenerys wasn’t pleased with that. She asked to speak to Mace Tyrell, and he was sending his mother. Was this a way to mock her? Well, she would have to do with what she had. She mad a short sign with her head to indicate that Olenna Tyrell could bring what she needed. The two guards she previously left behind brought the chair she talked about, then went back to their previous place, leaving Olenna Tyrell with Daenerys, Revan and Drogon. The men behind were fixing Drogon, obviously weary of him. The Tyrell matriarch looked at Daenerys’s dragon, but with something that looked more like interest than fear.

“This is quite a beast you have here. And you’ve got three, I think,” the old woman said.

“They’re not far away. If your men have any thought about harming me, they won’t survive long enough to regret it.”

“Oh, don’t worry, child. No one here thinks seriously about harming you. This is a parley, and we respect the sacred laws in Highgarden. We’re not the Lannisters.”

“I’m not a child. I’m a queen,” Daenerys replied with an icy voice.

Olenna Tyrell shrugged. “Have it your way. Would it please you if I called you your Grace. Or do you want me to tell all your titles, from Queen of the Andals to Mother of Dragons?”

“Your Grace will be enough.” This woman was starting to get on her nerves. “I assume you know why I came.”

“You want the pledge of House Tyrell.”

“I do. House Tyrell served my house loyally for generations. I ask you to renew the oath you made to my ancestor Aegon three hundred years ago. Our two families will be allies, just like they were for centuries. The Seven Kingdoms prospered in that era, and once the war is over, we will bring back peace and prosperity to this country, just like we did together decades ago.”

“What a nice speech.” She noticed the sarcasm in Olenna Tyrell’s voice. “We were at peace as well under Robert Baratheon, you know, and the Reach prospered under his rule as well.”

A silence followed. “Robert Baratheon sent assassins after me when I was still a baby, and he murdered my nephew and my niece when they were only children. He was drunkard, a fool, and he sent assassins after me when he learned that I was pregnant, to kill my child.”

“Yes, Robert hated the Targaryens.” The mother of Mace Tyrell didn’t seem concerned by this. “And your father burned people alive and ripped tongues from the men who dared to disagree with him.”

Daenerys steeled herself to keep her calm. “My father was an evil man. I know what he did, and I know he earned his name. And I thank you for following him despite this during the war against the Usurper. I don’t blame your family for bending the knee before Robert after my father died. I understand you had to do that to survive, but this is no longer the case. Robert is dead, I am back, and I intend to take what is mine. Will you help me, or do I have to consider you as my enemies?”

Olenna Tyrell remained silent for a moment, fixing Daenerys. Then she nodded. “You are a Targaryen, for sure. But since you’re capable of recognizing that your father was an evil man, I suppose you are better than most of your family.”

“Lady Olenna.” Revan stepped into the conversation. “Let us get to the heart of the matter at hand. Tommen Baratheon is dead. House Baratheon is gone, forever, and they won’t come back. Cersei Lannister sits on the Iron Throne and she killed your grandson, the heir to your house, along with many members of your household. Queen Daenerys has come back to Westeros to take back the Iron Throne, which is hers by right, but also to bring an end to injustice, to punish those who deserve it. Cersei Lannister committed crimes over counting, and she will continue to do so as long as she lives. She considers your house as her enemies. You say Robert brought prosperity to the Seven Kingdoms, but from what I gather, this prosperity was due to the longest summer that happened in centuries and at the cost of indebting the Crown over its capacity. And since Robert died, the years that followed saw more wars and more battles than the whole last century. The Baratheon dynasty failed miserably. You made an alliance with them and with House Lannister, and all this brought to your house was the death of your grandson, and now you’re isolated from the rest of the Seven Kingdoms, without friends and without allies. I know the Reach is rich and powerful, but not enough to stand alone against her foes. We know that you are at war with the Ironborn. We know the Shield Islands have fallen and that your coasts are being raided as we speak. Tell me, how much was sent to you by the Baratheons and the Lannisters in the past? Did they ever help you? From what I saw, they asked for your help more than they gave you help. And what did this bring to you? The death of Ser Loras Tyrell, the heir to Highgarden, and the deaths of several of your men, far from their home, fighting for something that wasn’t yours.”

He took a pause, then resumed. “Unlike the Lannisters and the Baratheons, Daenerys Targaryen is not only asking for your help. She is also offering you her help. She has three dragons, the armies of Dorne, a part of the Iron Fleet, hordes of Dothrakis and legions of Unsullied, and unlike the Baratheons and the Lannisters, she doesn’t only demand help to her allies, she also grants help to them. She helped the people of Meereen, Yunkai and Astapor to get their freedom, because she felt it was her duty as their queen. She wants obedience from her subjects and her bannermen, but she also grants them assistance in their hour of need. By taking side with her, not only you will get revenge against Cersei Lannister who murdered your grandson, but you will also get the help of a powerful army in your war against Euron Greyjoy. The Lannisters gave you the choice of being their servants or their enemies. Daenerys Targaryen is offering you the choice to be her allies or her enemies. If I were you, I wouldn’t call that a choice.”

Olenna Tyrell looked at the Red Priest for a long time after he was done talking. “Who are you?”

Olenna Tyrell smirked. “I suppose you are a Red Priest. I came upon one some time ago, clothed in a similar way as yours. Thoros of Myr. He didn’t strike as a great believer of his god, however.”

“Thoros of Myr lost his faith even before he came to King’s Landing. He was a drunkard and a womanizer. I am an advisor for Daenerys Targaryen.”

The old woman leaned forward. “Stannis Baratheon was advised by someone like you. It didn’t end well for him. My son’s armies were among those who defeated him.”

Daenerys decided to put an end to this argument. “Lady Olenna, this is quite simple. My armies are approaching your borders at this very moment. The Stormlands are now firmly into my possession. No one could resist me there, and I didn’t even need my dragons to take them. Do you want my Dothrakis to travel your lands as allies against Cersei Lannister and Euron Greyjoy, or as enemies? You’ll have to fight on two different fronts. Believe me, you don’t want the Reach to experience what the Dothrakis did in the Stormlands. I will help you to defeat Euron Greyjoy and Cersei Lannister if your son bends the knee and swear me the same oath your ancestors made to Aegon three centuries ago. My family gave you Highgarden and the Reach. I would be in the right to take them away from you if you refused to honor the oath you made.”

Olenna Tyrell kept looking at her as she spoke, as if she was unmoved by what she just said, or as if it didn’t matter. Daenerys added one last thing, something she informed the Tyrells about in the second raven she sent them before she came.

“And if you ever want to see your granddaughter again, I would say it is in your interest to bend the knee.”

This seemed to provoke a reaction in the old woman, since she straightened herself in her seat. “Is she really alive?”

“She is at Storm’s End, and she is being well taken care of. For the time being,” she added in the end.

“From what we heard, she died in King’s Landing with Loras when the Great Sept of Baelor exploded.”

“She was taken out of the sept by Tyene Sand, a niece of Prince Doran Martell, who posed as a septa there. One of Lord Varys’s little birds warned her in time that Cersei was going to destroy the sept and she could escape with Lady Margaery. She was brought to Storm’s End, and this is where she is right now.”

“Or so you claim.”

“This is no claim. This is the truth.”

“How do I know you’re telling me the truth?”

Daenerys looked at Revan, who nodded and walked toward Olenna Tyrell, producing a long scroll of parchment from his red robes. He handed it to the matriarch who took it, unsealed it and began to read. Revan walked back to stand next to Daenerys. For a moment, she thought the woman sitting before her would cry. She seemed about to do so. Instead, she only looked up.

“She is. No harm has come to her. She has everything she needs. I spoke with her before I left. She was very sad about her brother’s death.”

“We all are. My daughter-in-law spends her days looking through the window of her chamber, unable to do anything else. She doesn’t know her daughter might still be alive.”

“She is still alive. For now.”

“What should we expect for her?”

“I have no intention of killing your granddaughter.”

“This is what everyone says before they kill someone. Because they feel they have no other choice.”

“If your daughter had crowned herself queen like Cersei did, I would probably have executed her already. However, like she said herself, she was only married to an usurper, or three usurpers, to be more precise. She said her father would accept to lend me his armies. Was she wrong?”

Olenna Tyrell joined her hands. “What will happen to her?”

“If you accept me as your queen, as you should, no harm will come to her. She will remain a guest to House Targaryen until the end of the war, with all the privileges and rights that are associated with her rank. Since she was married to Tommen Baratheon, she will have to wait two years before she marries again. And since she was wed thrice so far and that now the odds are that not many men would want to marry her, I will make sure she gets married to someone I choose.”

“You want to decide who will marry my granddaughter?”

“I don’t want. I will. I assure you I will not marry her to a monster. I was wed myself to a man who raped me and I know what it is. I don’t want to inflict the same fate upon her, upon anyone else. Your armies will follow me into battle and fight side by side with my men against the Ironborn and the Lannisters. And I will make sure that Cersei Lannister dies for what she did to your grandson, and what she tried to do to his sister.”

The Tyrell woman nodded, as if thinking about it. “Are you aware that there is someone in the North who says he has a stronger claim on the Iron Throne than you?”

Daenerys’s voice came out hard. “Jon Snow is not my nephew.”

Lady Olenna tilted her head on the side. “The bastard son of Rhaegar Targaryen and Lyanna Stark,” she said theatrically. “I thought the Imp would imagine something better to justify this boy’s claim. Tyrion Lannister was always a clever man. I thought about marrying Margaery to him once. Too bad he refused. We may not be in all that mess right now. But it seems he was already too much besotted with his young wife. He ordered me to leave King’s Landing immediately after I proposed it, unless I wanted to die, or something like that, I’m not sure.” She sighed. “I may as well tell you. We received a proposition from Lord Tyrion. He seems to be the one behind Jon Snow’s crowning. He said that if we joined him against Cersei, he would strongly consider a royal match between Jon Snow and a Tyrell. Think about it. We could almost marry Margaery to a fourth king. How many women can boast about it? Too bad you have her. He also offered us the head of Cersei Lannister on a plate when we would take King’s Landing. The Seven Kingdoms will bleed as long as Cersei sits on the Iron Throne. Join us. Together we can end her tyranny. That’s what he wrote on the piece of paper he sent by raven.”

“And you’re going to accept his offer?” Drogon straightened behind as Daenerys said this. Olenna Tyrell looked up at him.

“I suppose that if we want to live, the answer should be no.”

“You’re not wrong.”

She smirked. “I used to be betrothed to a Targaryen, a long time ago. But he was a fool. I’m glad I didn’t marry him. But you don’t seem to be a fool like him, and you don’t seem to be mad like your father.” Olenna Tyrell paused for a moment. “Will you really take care of Margaery?”

“You have my word.”

Once again, Olenna Tyrell nodded. “Very well. I can’t bend the knee for my son, but I can convince him to do it. Give me a day, and tomorrow Mace will swear whatever oath you ask him.”

“You have two hours to convince him.”

For once, the matriarch seemed surprised. “Two hours?”

“As I told you, my armies, including the Dothrakis and the Dornish armies, are closing on your borders. If you want me to go back in time to stop them from plundering and ravaging your lands, your son must be here in two hours, bending the knee and pledging House Tyrell to me in perpetuity.”
Olenna Tyrell bowed the head, accepting defeat. “Very well, I’ll talk some sense into him. He’ll be there as you demand.” The woman stood up and her men came to take her seat. “I would still suggest you to investigate about this Jon Snow. There’s probably no truth to his claim, but better have proofs that he’s lying than none.”

On that, the former Lady of Highgarden walked away with her guard. When they were far away, Daenerys turned to her advisor. “Do you think they will accept?”

“They should,” the Red Priest answered. “It is in their interest. You can give them more than Jon Snow will ever be able to give them, and you can take what they have when Jon Snow cannot. But people don’t always think rationally. They might see you as a foreign invader.”

“Westeros is my home. I was born there.”

“True, but you spent the last twenty years on the other continent, and you arrived with Dothrakis and Unsullied in Westeros. For many people you are the foreign invader. They will say you brought barbarians to ravage their lands, destroy their villages, rape their women and murder their children. All the things the Westerosi do between themselves. Still, they feel better knowing that those atrocities are committed by people from their country rather than people from another continent.”

He said the last with a disgusted voice. Daenerys could only agree with him. The Lannister murdered Rhaenys and Aegon, and they sent assassins after her and her brother Viserys when they were only children. When Robert Baratheon learned that she was pregnant, he sent assassins to murder her and her children. The Dothrakis did the same in Essos, but she wouldn’t allow them to do it here. She made it clear with their leaders.

They waited for an hour or so. She could feel Drogon growing impatient. Finally, they saw a new group of riders coming from Highgarden, larger than the one who accompanied Olenna Tyrell.

“If they try anything, your Grace, go to your dragon and flee without me. I’ll hold them,” Revan said as they approached. His hand rested on the pommel of his sword, and Daenerys thought she saw it glow in a red light through the scabbard. A carriage was with the delegation just like the other time, but at the head of it rode a fat man more richly dressed than the others. They stopped at a good distance. Even from there, Daenerys could see the fear in the man’s eyes. His eyes were fixed on Drogon. Olenna Tyrell came out of her carriage and almost dragged the fat man from his horse. They walked together towards Daenerys. Sometimes it looked like Lady Olenna was pushing the man next to her in her direction.

“Are you Mace Tyrell?” Daenerys asked when they were close enough.

“Yes, your Grace. I am.”

He looked up at Drogon, then back uncertainly at Daenerys. She raised an eyebrow, waiting for him to do something. The Lord of Highgarden looked at his mother, who gave him an insistent look. He cleared his throat. “Your Grace, I am here to honor the oath my ancestor, Harlen Tyrell, made to your ancestor, Aegon the First of His Name.” He unsheathed his sword and got on his knee. “House Tyrell is yours, your Grace. The Reach is yours. We will fight along your side. Your enemies will be our enemies. Your allies will be our allies. We will serve in war, in peace, through winter and summer, and serve you for perpetuity.”

Daenerys looked at Olenna Tyrell who raised an eyebrow. Daenerys couldn’t stop herself from smiling for a second. She went back to her stern expression and looked at the lord kneeling before her. “Mace Tyrell, Lord of Highgarden, Defender of the Marshes, High Marshal of the Reach, Lord Paramount of the Mander, rise as Warden of the South.”
He did, and the Reach was hers. She had three kingdoms. Four were left to conquer, along with King’s Landing and the Iron Islands. She still had one queen and two kings to deal with.

Chapter End Notes

You could say that in these talks, Revan was for Daenerys who Davos was for Jon. Both Jon and Daenerys are not the best to negotiate, and it is quite evident from their first meeting at Dragonstone. Neither of them is quite ready to make any compromise, and they didn't prove very good at convincing other people when it came to negotiate with enemies. Just like Jon with the wildlings and Lyanna Mormont, Daenerys needed an intermediate to see these talks come to a satisfying outcome without burning people alive.

Chapter Notes

I was somewhat unsure as I wrote this chapter. I didn't really know how to write it. I hope you like the result.

I know that some of the people who read this fic find Mira's storyline boring, or useless, but you must keep in mind that when I started to write this fanfiction, it was some sort of exercise to guess how Game of Thrones could have turned in the eventuality that Tywin Lannister had died just before the Purple Wedding, and an attempt to complete the stories of the show and the video game. However, if you're not interested in Mira's story, you can skip this chapter. You won't miss anything vital to the story. Just don't skip every Mira chapter, since some are very important to major plots, such as the one where Jon is hailed King in the North.

MIRA XI

Mira looked at the numbers in the ledgers spread before her. The records that Maester Ortengryn kept had been destroyed in the fires that destroyed Ironrath. They received a message from the Citadel a few days ago, at last, saying they had chosen a new maester for Ironrath, but it would take him some time to arrive in the thick of winter. They had their first real storm yesterday, and this was far from the worse they would get through this winter. They had a long summer, and the winter was likely to last longer. Ironrath was in part buried under snow. What would it be after a real storm? Mira had to start all over again, writing new records the best she could. She tried to keep track of their stocks in food, water, wood, medicine, clothes and everything that could matter, but it was a difficult task. She had never done this before. Maester Ortengryn once showed her one of the ledgers he was keeping, and she never saw something so complex until she arrived in the south. The records kept by the maesters at Highgarden and at the Hightower were even more detailed. When she took a look at the list of expenses for the royal wedding, in Lord Tyrion’s room back in King’s Landing, it was even worse.

She did her best, and that didn’t seem enough. Nothing seemed to be enough, now that winter was here. The Starks were always right in the end. Winter had come, and they weren’t ready for it. No one was ready for it. She looked at Ralten who stood before her, covered with sweat and snow, and tired. Everyone was always tired lately.

“We are done clearing the main alley and the portcullis, my lady. With your leave, we would go back to our other occupations,” he told her.

“Of course, Ralten. Go back to rebuilding your homes. Do you think you could be ready in time for the next storm?”

Again, Mira regretted they didn’t have a maester. Ortengryn could foresee a storm with his instruments. She didn’t have the necessary knowledge for that. They had to be ready for one to hit at any time.
“Of course, my lady, if we didn’t have to produce ironwood shields while rebuilding Ironrath…”

“Ralten, we have no choice. The King in the North needs those shields. We both know that our men at the Wall need them more than ever. It’s not a wildling invasion we must fear now, but a war with the dead.”

She said it on a kind but firm tone. She was sorry to burden their men with the extra work of crafting shields while Ironrath was still far from rebuilt, but they had no choice. These were the orders of their king, and to not have a roof over their heads would be the least of their worries if the White Walkers got through the Wall. She had read things about the them since Jon Snow revealed they were back, and it sent chills along her spine whenever she read about the subject.

“I know, my lady, but the men are tired. Half the habitations are not yet ended, and instead of working to survive winter, some get to craft ironwood weapons. The fact you reduced the rations didn’t help for the morale either.”

“I’m fully aware of that, Ralten, but there’s nothing we can do about it. We didn’t get to choose whether the White Walkers would come back or not.” Mira was tired just like everyone, but her weariness was nothing when compared to that of her men. She rubbed her eyes. “We are all in this together, and if we don’t work together, then we’re dead.”

“I know, Lady Mira. I never thought about a rebellion or stopping to work. I was just… venting some frustration.”

She looked at the smith with empathy. “Believe me, there are times I really want to vent it on someone as well.”

They both allowed a short and nervous chuckle to escape their throat. Mira took her head between her hands and sighed, then turned back her attention to Ralten. “I’ll write another message to Lady Sansa, and I’ll ask her for some food from the stores of Winterfell. I can’t promise anything, but I’ll try to find a way to raise your rations.”

“Thank you, my lady. But you should try to not tire yourself too much.”

“Everyone is exhausted, Ralten. I can’t rest while the others work.”

“I know, but still, considering the situation…”

“Ralten, it’s no. Thank you for your concern, but I’m not going to give myself a good time while you and the others exhaust yourselves day and night. Is the smithy ready?”

“All ready, my lady. Though we lack steel. Not that we need it so much right now. We need time and food more than anything. As for wood, we don’t lack any. It was very kind of you and Lady Talia to let us cut trees in the grove.”

“You are more important than the grove.” She and Talia allowed the people of Ironrath to take wood from the grove behind the castle to rebuild their houses. The trees could grow again in time. They couldn’t let the people of Ironrath die. Too many already died.

“Thank you all the same.”

“I’ll bring some steel so you can work it when we’ll need it, Ralten.” She knew the few places in the North where iron was being extracted. If only they could have access to the Iron Islands and their resources, but they were still at war with them. Last they heard, they were even threatening Oldtown. Mira feared for her friends there. She didn’t want the fate of Lannisport to fall upon this city as well.
Mira really felt exhausted. “You should go back to work, Ralten.”

“Yes, my lady. Oh, and Lady Mira, it’s good to have you again at Ironrath.”

The smile he gave her was warm and sincere. “Thank you, Ralten.”

Ralten left Mira alone. She let her head drop on the book right in front of her. Damn it! That wasn’t the time to be tired, but there was nothing she could do about it. It wasn’t the time to reduce the rations either. Her stomach grumbled more often than not, and she could feel the need to eat more often than ever. She felt as if she was starving, but she couldn’t eat as much as she liked while she forced the other people at Ironrath to ration their food. She wished she could just stay here, her head resting on the table, until she fell asleep.

She looked at the fireplace, which was lit. She insisted to keep it cold, to spare wood, but Talia almost forced her to have it lit, to keep her warm. Talia could be stubborn when she wanted, just like Mira, but her sister’s stubbornness had been superior this time. Mira spent too much time away from the North. Her own stubbornness caused many problems to Lady Margaery back in King’s Landing, but it was still nothing compared to the problems Talia would have caused.

Mira had received news a few days ago that Lady Margaery had survived. It was a miracle, literally. She had been sure that she was dead. Everyone believed it. If she survived, then maybe Sera was alive too. There was hope. Despite everything that happened, there was hope. She just wished the raven that brought the news of Lady Margaery’s survival didn’t bring other news with it, news that would make things with her husband much more complicated. She dreaded the time they would have to decide what to do.

She forced herself to straighten up and went back to work, checking numbers and reports, writing letters, then bringing them to the rookery where she sent the ravens with them. She wrapped herself tightly into furs. Talia was right. She had to keep herself warm. She hoped the ravens wouldn’t get caught in the snow if another storm came.

Later, she was in the library of Ironrath, or what was left of it, reading something about the Long Night. The Children of the Forest had fought along the First Men against the White Walkers and the dead, providing them with weapons of dragonglass and magic that could destroy the dead. Then they built the Wall to stop another attack in the future, knowing the dead would come back. They were right. According to the man who wrote it, Brandon the Builder was the one to build the Wall after the dead were defeated, but the writer also talked of another man who defeated the dead with a magical sword, a sword that could destroy the dead forever.

One of the men guarding the Great Hall came to see her. “My lady, our sentinels spotted the Hightower banners on the horizon.”

Mira looked up from the book and stared at the man. Then she stood up and quickly walked to the castle’s gate. She was careful to not walk too quickly. When she arrived at the gate, she thought about climbing on the battlements to see them arrive from afar, but she decided against it. Again, she had to be careful.

Talia arrived not long after. “Are you feeling well?” her sister asked.

“I’m fine, yes.”

“Happy to see your husband again?”
“Yes.” Mira couldn’t stop herself from smiling. Gerold had been away for three months now. It was time that he came back.

“I still wonder why he brings all his men back with him. Shouldn’t they go at the Wall, like Asher?”

“The men of the Reach aren’t used to winter like us. Even Sansa’s men are more used to winter. There are winters in the Westerlands, but there is no snow in the Reach, and the lands of the Hightowers are in the southern part of it. Some of the people we brought with us can barely remember the last winter. They will be better here at Ironrath, and we can put them to work to rebuild it.”

Talia nodded. A few moments later, they began to raise the portcullis. Through it came a group of men in ragged clothes, all of them with a beard, looking even more tired than the people at Ironrath. One of them almost dropped from his horse. Mira couldn’t believe how he changed in such a short span of time. She was used to see her brothers like Rodrik or Asher like this, but that was the first time she saw her husband in such a sorry state. He limped more than he walked to her. Mira took the last steps towards him and he all but fell into her arms. He said nothing, but she thought that she heard him cry.

Two hours later, they were sitting together in her chamber. Ryon had come back with them as well along with Asher’s friend from Essos, and Mira had spent time with him, but now it was the turn of her husband. She made sure he could take a bath and shave himself. He already looked much better. What shocked her the most was when she realized that one of his fingers was missing on his left hand. He drank mulled wine as he told her everything.

“That was hell. We had to travel in the snow from Ironrath to Highpoint, and there we had to lay a siege. We lost many men when we attacked the walls. The Whitehills wouldn’t abandon. They fought to the last man. There were so many who died. And then on our way back… we got caught in the storm. My men… some were lost. We never found them back. Others got frostbite.” He showed his hand to emphasize his words. “Do you know how many men I have left?” She didn’t think she wanted to know, but winter had come, and they had to face the hard truths. She shook her head to show she didn’t. “On the thousand I left with, only six hundred are left. I lost almost half of them.”

“I’m sorry.” She was.

Her husband sighed, exhaustion plain in his voice. “How did it come to that? I lost more men to the cold and the weather than to the fights. Your brother barely lost anyone. How can that be?”

“People born in the North are used to that kind of things. We are better prepared.”

“If I had known that it would turn like this…” He didn’t finish his sentence. Instead, he drank another sip of wine. If Mira was tired, then it was way worse in his case, and she couldn’t blame him for that. She looked at the missing finger. She never thought he would get injured in this way. She thought he might be hurt into battle, but not that the cold of the North would claim a part of his body.

He looked at her. Despite being tired, his eyes were glistening, like they always did. “I missed you.”

She smiled weakly. “I missed you too.”

He kept looking at her for a very long time. Their supper was brought to them not long after. Mira told him what had happened to Ironrath while he was away. He was obviously hungry, so he didn’t say much. He looked at her very much, however. When they were done, she stood up. She had something to tell him. However, as she raised, she felt herself getting unbalanced, dizzy.
“Are you all right, Mira?” her husband asked, concerned.

“Yes, I am. Sorry.” She placed her hand on the table to find back her balance until the black holes before her disappeared. She blinked a few times. She felt as if she could let herself drop into the bed and fall asleep immediately.

“You look as exhausted as I am, even more.”

She sighed. “There was a lot to do while you were away.” She looked straight at him. “There’s something I want to tell you.”

“No. Wait.”

He walked to her and, without warning, he kissed her. His arms came around her hips and his hands joined on her back. His lips tasted the wine, probably because of the one he just drank, and they were hot. Mira let a moan escape her mouth when he broke the kiss and she could breathe. They had been separated for months. She didn’t think she would get attached to her husband like that. She kept her eyes shut as their foreheads touched, feeling the warm air he pushed away when he breathed on her chin.

“I really missed you, my love,” he told her. He was breathing heavily. His hands had come up and were now around her face.

“I really need to tell you something,” Mira said, though she wasn’t sure she had enough energy left even for that.

“We’re both tired. Can’t it wait for tomorrow?”

Mira couldn’t see him come close since her eyes were shut, but she could feel his breathing getting close. She opened her mouth and met his. He kissed her again. Her hands came around his neck. She really missed him too.

“So, can it wait?” He asked again when he broke the kiss another time, his finger playing with her lips.

“Yes, it can.” She would tell him tomorrow.

They kissed again. He tightened the grip around her hips, pressing his body against hers. His mouth trailed on her cheek. Then he did something he never did before. His right arm went lower down her knees and, without an effort, he raised her from the ground, holding her in his arms. She could barely react since he returned to kissing her lips. He brought her to her bed, and there they made love.

Later, Mira didn’t know when exactly, she woke up. She was lying on her belly, her husband’s arm that was missing a finger around her, his face against her rib. The candle had burned out next to them. Since her bed was made for only one person, she was very close to the side of it, her head only an inch or two from the end. The fire was still cracking in the fireplace, though it wouldn’t last long. There was a cold breeze running on her back that Gerold’s arm blocked on the region it covered.

She rested her head against the pillow and closed her eyes. Gerold had never carried her into his arms before. Perhaps it had to do with the fact that he was stronger now, after all these months in campaign. They had made love very slowly. They were too tired to make it like they usually did. She was glad that he was here, though she wished he hadn’t lost a finger. Still, he was alive and well, and that was much more than she could say of many other people she loved. She turned her head to look at him sleeping. Mira had never been a romantic. She always perceived marriage as a duty and that she would learn to live with the man she would marry. Things had gone very well. She even fell in love with her husband. She brought her hand to his face and caressed his cheek.

She remained like that for a long time, until she decided she wanted to stretch her legs. Slowly, she climbed down her bed, removing her husband’s arms from her back and placing it back on the mattress. She covered herself with a sheet and went to the window that she opened. The cold wind entered the room immediately. She looked down on the courtyard, where a few lights could be seen there and there. Everyone was asleep. They would wake up early in the morning to continue to work on the reconstruction, hoping to finish before they were too deep into the winter. Several houses and buildings were still to be rebuilt. There were fewer lights than Mira remembered from her childhood.

She heard a grunt behind her. “Damn, it’s cold.”

She should have thought better before opening the panels. She closed them immediately. “Sorry, Gerold. I just wanted to look outside.”

He was now lying on his back. “I fail to understand how you managed to grow up in this place.”

“The weather is not very forgiving, but we can manage.” She came back into the bed as she replied and slipped under the furs. As she did so, he caught her at the waist from behind.

“Well, as long as I have you, I like it here.” He kissed her in the neck and she smiled in contentment at the feeling. He moved to kiss her hair after a moment. “I like them.”

“Is there something you don’t like with me?” she asked him, almost playfully.

He stopped kissing her and said nothing for a moment. “No.” He moved to face her. “I love you.” He kissed her deeply, and before long she was again lying on her back.

“Gerold, we already did it twice,” she protested. He didn’t answer, and they made it once more. They fell asleep not long after and didn’t wake up until the morning.

She opened her eyes before her husband, and she could see that the sun rose up. She wished they could still have a few hours of sleep before them, before they had to face the day. She knew it wouldn’t be an easy day, and this night had been beautiful. She had missed him so much. His arms were around her, and she positioned herself to be more comfortable. She didn’t want to let him go.

She stayed like that for maybe fifteen minutes, enjoying some more time alone with the man she loved, but in the end she moved away from him, releasing herself from his grip, which cause him to wake up.

“Morning,” she explained with a single word as she sat down.

“I wish the Citadel could make the night longer,” he grumbled.

Me too. “I’m afraid maesters can only tell us how long it is. They didn’t find a way to change its duration yet.”

She stood up and put on a nightgown. She went to her vanity and started to brush her hair herself. The glass in her chamber hadn’t survived the two destructions of Ironrath, so she had to brush them without a reflection to guide her. In the meantime, Gerold got out of bed and dressed himself for the day as well. She felt his presence right behind her.

“You should let your hair free more often. I like them better this way,” he told her.
“With winter, I’m afraid it wouldn’t be wise. They would fly all over my face and blind me.”

“Too bad we’re in winter then. And in the North.”

He sounded nervous. It would be better to talk about it now. “You’ve read the message I sent you? The one from your home?” she asked.

“Yes, I have.” His voice was heavy. “You read it? I saw that the seal was broken when I received it.”

“I sent it to you because the message was important,” she gave as an answer.

He sighed. “We’ve got to go back home. The Tyrells pledged themselves to Daenerys Targaryen, and my family is sworn to them.”

They had received the raven a few days ago. Lord Hightower ordered Gerold to bring back all his men in the south to fight with Daenerys Targaryen. This meant that the Hightower men were now officially enemies of the North. Mira had sent the message to her husband by rider. As much as she hated this development, she couldn’t hide it from him.

She turned to face him. “Is that wise? We are in the thick of winter. There was just a storm, and more are coming. If you bring back your men right now by the Kingsroad, most will not make it to the Reach.”

“I received an order from my grandfather. I have no choice,” he said, sounding exasperated.

“Your grandfather doesn’t know most of your men will die on the road. Write to him and explain the situation. It would be better if your men could stay until the war is over. You’re not many, anyway, and you helped against the enemies of the King in the North. I think Jon Snow will accept to let you stay as a neutral party until you can return safely to Oldtown by ship.”

“I can’t do that!” he shouted. “I… My family wants me to come back! They order me to come back!”

She was surprised by his outburst. He had been looking away from her as he shouted, and when his gaze fell upon her, his face was angry. She even thought there was… hatred. It didn’t last long. His expression softened, his lips quivering. He looked away once more, then went to sit on her bed, looking on the floor.

Mira looked at him, worried, for a time. He was shaking, just like after the battle at Moat Cailin. She left her chair and came to sit by his side. His shaking was more evident closer to him. His hands were joined on his knees. She slowly placed her own right hand on them and moved it over his, trying to soothe him.

“What’s going on?” she asked him after a long moment.

He exhaled sharply. “I killed him.”

“Who did you kill?”

“Ludd Whitehill.” He breathed thrice before he resumed to speak. “I killed him. I… I put my sword through his head.” He kept breathing heavily. “He… He said horrible things about you. He said that he would… I had to kill him.”

He shuddered again. It didn’t seem to get any better. “It can’t be easy to kill someone,” she said.
“You know… You remember, before we left. When I said I would… kill Altos, if he laid his hand on you again?”

“Yes, I do.” She wouldn’t forget that. If there hadn’t been other men in the training yard to stop him, Gerold might have killed his brother. The news of the Boltons’ disgrace arrived just in time and they left the Hightower before it could go any further.

“I… I don’t think I could, now. I… I just killed…” He couldn’t finish his sentence.

“I’m sorry, Gerold.”

“Stop being sorry!” He said it harshly and pushed her hand aside. He kept staring right in front of him, or at the floor. Mira remained there, silent. She never saw him like this.

“Do you want some time alone?”

“Yes, please.”

“I’ll come back later.” She would talk to him then.

She stood up and left her room after putting on a gown. She went to the rookery, but there was no new message. She looked at the horizon, trying to see if there was another storm coming. The days were getting darker, and not only because nights were longer. The day itself was darker. They didn’t see the sun in days now. Mira thought that she remembered that light storms like the one they just had were often followed by a stronger one. Gerold’s men couldn’t leave. They weren’t used to travel in the North during winter. Furthermore, who could tell if the garrison of Moat Cailin would let them go south? They could be intercepted on the Kingsroad before that, and even if they managed to march through the entire North, they would have the Riverlands then the Crownlands to get through, before they could be in the Reach. If they were lucky enough, Daenerys Targaryen could have taken King’s Landing and perhaps forced the Riverlands to surrender, but that would still make the North and the Neck to walk through.

The Hightower army couldn’t leave. They would have to write to Lord Hightower and explain the situation. It wouldn’t be easy to keep all these men inside Ironrath, especially with the new mouths to feed, but they could manage. They would still have better chances of survival if they stayed here.

From where she stood, Mira saw her sister in the courtyard, discussing with one of the men who were working on the reconstruction. She decided to speak with her and left the rookery. Many men from the Hightower army had been sleeping in the hall for feasts, and they were still there when she passed by. The snow was crunched under her feet as she walked through the yard. Her sister was no longer there. One of the men told her that Talia had gone to the battlements. Mira climbed to them and found her sister looking over the crenellations.

“Nice view,” Mira said to attract her attention.

“Yes.”

If they had the sun, the snow covering the ground all around them would be shining. Instead, it was completely white, without reflection. It was a dull white, without anything special. The mix of green and white should have given a certain beauty to the scenery, but Mira couldn’t find any.

“Are you fine?” Talia asked her.

“Yes, I’m fine, Talia. Don’t worry about me.”
“I would worry much less if we had a maester. Did you tell him?”

“Not yet. I’m afraid he was pretty shaken by the battle at Highpoint. He wasn’t prepared for that.”

“You’ll have to tell him, you know,” Talia insisted.

“I know. Let me take care of this. He’s my husband after all, not yours.”

A quick smile came upon Talia’s lips, but her concerned expression came back instantly. “We won’t have enough supplies for everyone, not with all the men your husband brought.”

Mira looked ahead of her, to the snow covering the landscape. “They wouldn’t survive to a march to the south. I mean, most of them wouldn’t survive.”

“Perhaps they could be sent to the Wall?” Talia suggested.

“Maybe,” Mira conceded. The Wall was closer. However, the weather would be harsher there than in the southern part of the North. Surely there was a way to keep the men from the Reach here. If only Gerold had gone to the Wall with Asher right after Highpoint fell, they wouldn’t face a decision like this.

“You have to tell him,” Talia told her once again.

“I know.” She knew it only too well. She had to tell him. She turned to look at her sister, displaying a wicked smile. “What about Gawen’s letter?”

“He’s being very gallant, but I wish I could spend more time with him. We barely know each other.”

“You’ll spend time with him. And better to marry him than Torrhen Whitehill.”

Talia’s expression showed that the two sisters more than agreed on this. They left the battlements after some time, Talia to see how the crafting of ironwood shields was going, and Mira to speak with her husband. She found her husband into her father’s former solar. The place had been cleaned, but it wasn’t used for now. This room would belong to Asher when he would come back.

He looked at her when she entered. “This is where your father worked?” he asked,

“Yes. He made me come here when he told me that I would go south.”

“I would have liked to know him. He seemed to be a good man from what I heard.”

“He was. Gregor the Good.” She gathered her courage and prepared to tell him, but he spoke before she could.

“We are leaving in the hour.”

She gasped. “What?”

“I already gave the order to my men. We’re leaving for the Reach. I suggest you gather your things very quickly.”

He proceeded to walk out, but Mira stopped him before he crossed the door. “Wait, Gerold, you can’t do that. Your men will die out there.”

“I have no choice, Mira. My grandfather gave me the order to bring back his men.”
“You must explain to him that…”

“There’s nothing to explain!” he shouted. He stepped away from her. “I brought his men so they could free Ironrath and give it to you and me. The first goal was accomplished, but I can’t fulfill the second without fighting your own family. I don’t want that! We’re leaving!”

He was angry, and very angry, but to the opposite of this morning, he didn’t show any sign of calming. “Are you furious because you can’t have Ironrath?” she asked prudently, fearing the reaction as much as the answer.

“Strangely, yes!” He paced, looking away from her. “My family gave me this army because they believed that I could become Lord of Ironrath. That was the only reason. And now… I arrive here, to discover that your family is still alive and that your brother is Lord of Ironrath. You didn’t need me to take back your home. Yes, I’m furious!”

Mira was stunned by his words. This wasn’t how the man she married used to be. He continued to speak. “My family is probably laughing at me as we speak. I brought an entire army in the North, for nothing. All these men dead, for nothing. And now they are serving a queen who’s an enemy of the King in the North. We are at war. I can’t stay here. My grandfather is telling me to bring back his men. They are to fight for Daenerys Targaryen now, not for Jon Snow.”

“Gerold,” Mira started slowly. “This war in the south doesn’t matter. You know where the real war is. It’s not Daenerys Targaryen or Jon Snow or Cersei Lannister or Euron Greyjoy who is an enemy now. The dead are the real enemies.”

He scoffed. “Please forgive me, Mira, but I have a hard time believing in those tales about walking dead. Do you really believe them?”

She hesitated to answer. “I’d like very much to believe that they don’t exist, but a wise man once said that we should never believe something because we want to believe it.”

He looked away again. “I’ll wait to see these dead men before I believe they are real. We’re leaving.”

He walked past her at a furious pace. Before he could leave the room, she raised the voice. “I’m not coming.”

He had his back turned on her, but he stopped the moment she said the words. Then he slowly turned to face her. “What?”

“I can’t come,” she said with a voice that let no place to discussion. “Listen Gerold, I…”

“I brought an entire army here to give you back your home! That’s not enough for you?”

“It has nothing to do with that…”

“You are my wife. You will come.” He seized her arm, but Mira shove his arm away. He was going too far.

“Are you going to attach me to a horse to force me to follow you?” she asked, furious as well now.

She saw doubts in him for a moment. “You are my wife. Your place is at my side.”

Mira felt anger rise in her. He never treated her like this before. “My name is Mira Forrester, and this is my home. My family is here, they are in danger, and I’m not going to risk the life of the people I love. I will not leave.”

He stared at her, a mix of anger and despair on his face. He turned and walked away. “I don’t want to see you again.”

These were his last words she heard before he disappeared. Mira stayed there for a moment. What did just happen? Gerold had accused her of bringing him in the North for nothing. He yelled at her, something he never did. It was as if he blamed her because Asher was Lord of Ironrath and not him. How could he say things like that? Was that really the man she married? Did he only marry her for Ironrath? His family had accepted the marriage with her for this reason, she had no illusion about it, but she didn’t think Gerold only loved her for this.

She stayed there for a moment. Perhaps she should go to him, try to talk to him, but she didn’t want to. Her parents had disagreements, but never of that sort. Her husband could be furious, but now she was furious as well. She was furious after him. She didn’t want to see him either. She wouldn’t see him. She wouldn’t try to hold a man who treated her like this.

She left her father’s solar and went to her chamber. She locked the door behind her and sat on her bed. She remained there for a long time, thinking about everything that had happened. Her breathing began to get jerky, and after some time tears were running on her cheeks. Some ran down and fell on her knees. She looked down. She never got the chance to tell him. He would never know. He was gone. She positioned her hand on her belly. That was what she needed so much to tell him. She hadn’t bled in three months.

Chapter End Notes

Perhaps it is because Game of Thrones is settled in a medieval universe where people live with violence and death as omnipresent, but I find it strange that we saw no one actually fall apart or feel a trauma after battles. Psychological problems that could go as far as suicide are very present among the modern armies when the soldiers go back to their lives as civilians. I tried to make Gerold an example of this, though I don't know about the traumas soldiers can go through in detail. He was just broken up by this war and by the fact he just killed a man out of hatred, no matter how evil the man was, and that's what caused his reactions here. We previously saw after Moat Cailin how war affected him, and this time his reaction is stronger. And of course the trauma had dire consequences on his relationship with Mira, just like it regularly happens in real life. And it happened at one of the worst possible moments.

Next chapter : Jon
"Three patrols didn’t come back. They were supposed to arrive yesterday, and they didn’t. We have no idea of where they might be."

Edd looked at Jon as he gave his report, and Jon knew what his friend thought. They could have been killed by the Walkers. It wasn’t sure, but it was possible, highly possible.

"Perhaps it would be better if we sealed the tunnels," Edd suggested.

Jon had thought about it day and night for the last days. It wasn’t an easy decision to take. They still had men patrolling out there. If they were still alive, then sealing the tunnels meant condemning them to death. On the other hand, it could also prevent the dead from getting through the Wall by using them. But even then, how could they know if the dead needed these tunnels? Maybe they would only climb the Wall. If that was the case, then sealing the tunnels might deprive Jon’s men of their only means to launch counter-attacks against the dead if they ever had this opportunity.

"Let’s wait for another day, see if our men come back." He was reporting the decision for later, he knew that, but he wanted to give a chance to these men outside. He couldn’t abandon them.

"You know we’ll have to do it one day," Edd pointed out.

"We can’t be sure. Maybe it’s not necessary to seal the tunnels."

"You were the one to propose the same solution when the wildlings were closing on us."

"Aye, it’s true, and look at what would have happened if we had done it. Their people would all have died at Hardhome. My brother would have been stuck north of the Wall when he arrived at Castle Black. Mance had sent men to climb the Wall after the first night of the battle. The Wall wouldn’t have stopped the wildlings, even if the gates were impossible to take. I don’t think sealing the tunnels will stop the White Walkers more than it could stop the Free Folk. Ser Alliser was right. It would cut off our legs, pluck out our eyes, leave us to stay hidden behind the Wall, hoping the storm will pass. We can’t hope for this storm to pass."

"Strange to quote a man who shoved his dagger into your heart."

"That doesn’t mean he couldn’t be right about certain things. We won’t seal the tunnels for now. Not until some of our men out there might still be alive."

"As you wish, your Grace," Edd grumbled. "I suppose the trap is useless then."
“We will use it if necessary. Anyway, with that trap, we can seal the tunnels within seconds. So for now, there’s no hurry to bury them.”

Jon left Edd’s solar. In the courtyard, men were practicing. They were waiting for an enemy who hadn’t shown itself yet. The waiting was killing Jon. He was afraid they wouldn’t be ready, but the more they waited for the dead to attack, the more he grew apprehensive of the upcoming attack. He wondered if the men felt the same. He wasn’t sure. Especially among the Knights of the Vale, he had the impression that they didn’t feel how they were all in danger. How could he blame them? They didn’t see the Night King like he did. Except for a few brothers of the Night’s Watch and the people of the Free Folk, no one saw the dead. Still, they had to be ready, so Jon maintained a constant routine of exercises, guard duties on the top of the Wall and reconstruction tasks. Castle Black was beginning to look like a real castle again. Jon had gone to see Oakenshield and Queensgate since they arrived, and the progress was visible there too, though they still had a lot of work to do. According to Ser Davos the last time Jon saw him, the castles on the eastern side of the Wall were all in a far better state now than when they found them.

Jon had almost no one to take advice from now, except Edd. Ser Davos was riding along the Wall, inspecting the progress of the rebuilding, while most of the lords now led one of the castles’ garrisons. He felt loner than ever. It was as if he was back at the time when he was Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, where he had to take all decisions for the Wall and no one to advise him, but this time with more men under his command. Sometimes, he wondered what his former sworn brothers thought of his departure. When he asked Edd, he told him that most were very glad to see him again, especially when they realized he brought an entire army to protect the Wall, but many had called him a traitor and a deserter after he left the Watch. Maybe they weren’t wrong, but Jon was tired of fighting back then. He gave everything he had to the Watch, and the Watch betrayed him and killed him. How could he continue to serve it after that?

He looked at the men fighting in the yard. There were very few brothers of the Watch. Three thousand men lived at Castle Black, and there was only one over a hundred who took vows. Jon saw two familiar figures sparring together. One was wearing a black cloak, the other was not. The latter knocked the one with a black cloak on the ground. As Jon walked in their direction, he heard them discuss.

“You’re getting better, Gared,” Asher Forrester said as he gave him a hand to stand on his feet.

“Thanks, Asher. You didn’t change at all in all these years.”

“Maybe not, but you changed, for sure.” He gave Gared a strong pat on the back. Asher noticed Jon coming in his direction. “Your Grace.”

“Your Grace,” Jon’s former sworn brother said.

“You feel ready?”

“It’s difficult to feel ready when you must be ready to fight dead men,” Gared replied. “But I feel better fighting them here rather than in the North Grove.”

“We can’t be ready for anything today,” Asher said bitterly. He walked to a nearby dummy, paused before it, then slashed it so hard with his blunted sword that the practice dummy was cut in half. “Anything can happen.”

“You should be careful,” Jon said. “We’ll run out of dummies at the rate you keep ruining them.”
“Sorry, but I found nothing better to clear my mind.”

On that, Asher Forrester walked away. “It’s not easy to discover that your father had bastard children and that he hid them from you all his life,” Gared commented gloomily. Jon looked at him. “Sorry, I didn’t mean to insult, your Grace,” he added quickly.

“No need to apologize.” Jon stared at Asher Forrester walking away. “My brothers and sisters knew all their life that I was their half-brother, but to learn that you have one all of a sudden, like that… This is as shocking as to learn that your father was in fact your uncle, and that your mother was raped by your real father.”

A silence followed what Jon said. “You did well to send Josera to Queensgate. He and Asher didn’t get along very well.”

The half-brothers didn’t like each other, indeed. Gared Tuttle had arrived with a small group of wildlings weeks ago, but also with the bastard son of Lord Gregor Forrester, Josera Snow. When Asher Forrester arrived at the Wall later, after he finished submitting Highpoint, he met Josera with great hostility, and his half-brother returned the feeling. Jon didn’t think it was fair from Asher to accuse Josera of lying when he said that he was Lord Gregor’s son, especially since he lost his sister Elsera in the north. She died in unknown circumstances. Gared and Josera refused to talk about it. After her death, they left a place they called the North Grove and came to Castle Black, hoping to find shelter against the White Walkers.

“That’s not all that bothers Asher, isn’t it?” Jon asked to Gared.

“No. There’s his wife, Gwyn. Her father died, so it didn’t make things easier between them. I still can’t believe they got married.” Gared allowed a short chuckle to escape as a short smile appeared on his face. “And there’s Mira of course. That’s more than enough. I can’t believe her husband abandoned her when she was pregnant.”

Jon perceived the anger in Gared’s voice as much as in Asher’s violent actions. The people serving the Forresters who were present at Castle Black were all greatly upset when they learned that Gerold Hightower rode away to the south with his men, leaving his wife behind with a baby. Mira Forrester was Sansa’s friend, and Jon was revolted by her husband’s behaviour as well.

“Your Grace, if I may, do you think I could go back to Ironrath for a time, once all this madness is over?”

“I’m not the one you must ask for this,” Jon answered. “I’m not the Lord Commander. I’m not even a brother of the Night’s Watch. You’re still one, though.”

Gared nodded, dark mood plain on his face. “If Frostfinger had his way, I would have been thrown from the top of the Wall a long time ago.”

“He can’t do that, Gared. The Watch needs every man it can find.”

“And when they won’t need every man they can find anymore, you can be sure the first thing Frostfinger will do is to carry out the sentence I escaped.” Gared said. He looked straight at Jon. “I meant the words I said before the weirwood. I never intended to abandon the Night’s Watch. I’m not a deserter, and I’m not a traitor. The man I killed was trying to murder me, he engaged the fight. I was only defending myself. I escaped because I would have died if I stayed.”

“You don’t need to convince me, Gared. For a time, I thought you were a traitor, and that you betrayed the Watch when you left. But that was before I was stabbed in the heart by my own sworn brothers. I understand what you went through, and I don’t blame you for leaving. But it won’t be for me to decide what will be your future with the Watch.”

“I know. Let’s hope Dolorous Edd and Frostfinger stop seeing me as a traitor when the war is done, or else my family will be remembered not only for betraying the house we served, but for forsaking sacred vows to the Night’s Watch.”

Gared didn’t take it well when he was told that his father betrayed the Forresters and served as a spy for the Whitehills. House Forrester was broken just like House Stark was. No wonder that Gared, Asher and Josera were in sour moods all the time.

“Too bad I didn’t get killed and brought back to life by a witch. I could leave the Watch then,” Gared added. He and Jon laughed at it.

“Gared.” A girl with silver hair, wearing clothes of the Free Folk, was calling him. “Want a practice with a bow? You should try to get better.”

“All right, Sylvi. I’m coming. Your Grace.” Gared bowed and left Jon alone. He had just begun to walk away when the horn blew. It blew three times.

For a second, everyone stood still, and then Jon was giving orders to everyone to get in place. He sent more men to go to the Wall using the stairs. When Edd arrived, Jon ordered him to make sure the trap would be activated if he gave the order. Then Jon went to the winch elevator to supervise the battle from the top of the Wall.

As the elevator brought him up with a dozen other men, the winds got stronger. This time, it wasn’t because they were going higher in altitude, but because the storm had come. After an eternity, they arrived on the top of the Wall. The situation was horrible there. Their vision was limited by the snow they received in their eyes. The wind was so cold that it was as if knives were thrown at their cheeks. Jon noticed that the men of the Vale had much more difficulty to stand than the Free Folk or the Northerners.

He arrived close to the commander of this section of the Wall. “Where are they?”

“We don’t know. One of the men of the Watch blew the horn when he saw a storm arrive,” the man replied.

“Who?”

“I don’t know.”

Jon went to see who blew the horn three times. Judging by the storm, he didn’t think it was a mistake, and when he saw who was at the horn, still blowing, he got his confirmation. It was one of the men who was with him at Hardhome. He saw what the White Walkers did when they attacked and he knew how to recognize the signs of their arrival.

He returned to the archers’ position. They were ready to shoot, though they had great difficulty to keep their bows and arrows still. It was difficult to see farther than a dozen feet ahead of you. Jon could barely distinguish the fires that were used for flaming arrows.

Then Jon saw him. The storm broke around a place in the clearing before the Wall, and he was there. Jon would throw his hand into the fire if it wasn’t the Night King. He seemed to be alone. He was no bigger than an ant from there, but Jon would recognize him anywhere, no matter how far or how close he was. Jon felt his eyes on him.
“Archers! Knock!” He shouted. He wasn’t sure if anyone heard him. He looked around, and some of the people obeyed him. Only some. He turned to the two men who had knocked their arrows next to him. “Go on each side. Tell the people east of us to follow the signs the group on their left is giving, and tell each group of archers to give these signs to the people on their right. Do the opposite for the people west of us. They must follow my words.”

The two men ran to carry out his orders. As they left, the ground shook. Jon saw a man yell as he made a fall of seven hundred feet. He heard a strange cracking sound. What did this? The Wall had shaken without explanation. Could the wind do that? Could the wind shake the Wall? He looked at the Night King. He was kneeling on the ground a moment ago, and slowly he stood up. Jon saw a great crevice that began at his feet and continued to…

Jon remembered something Bran told him, about the battle at the cave. Jon saw that the Night King was kneeling again.

“Get hold of something!” he shouted with all the force of his lungs.

The crevice grew wider, and when the force hit the Wall, it was stronger than the last time. Jon could barely keep his feet with his hold on the spear planted in the ground.

“Your Grace, what is it?” a man asked.

“The Night King is trying to bring down the Wall,” Jon answered, though not loud enough for anyone to hear if he wasn’t standing next to him.

A third wave of shock came, but this time it seemed lighter than the previous ones. The men managed to prepare better for this one and almost no one lost his balance. More important, no one fell from the Wall.

The storm seemed to quiet down after the third attempt. Jon looked at the Night King. Did he doubt?
Could the White Walkers doubt? He remembered the expression of surprise from one of them when his sword stopped his.

“Prepare to shoot! Knock!” Jon shouted.

All around him, the men did as they were told. They were ready to rain fire on whatever would approach the Wall. The Night King was too far for arrows to strike him, but if he got any closer, Jon would do everything to end this once and for all. Longclaw was in his scabbard, ready to be used.

The Night King made a movement. Jon thought he was raising a sword or something similar. They all heard a piercing cry. Hundreds if not thousands of wights emerged from the woods.

“Draw!” The dead kept running to the Wall. Jon waited for them to be close enough. “Loose!”

A large volley of arrows flew and fell on the dead. Jon distinguished many of them falling. He sent another volley.

“Knock! Draw! Loose!” The second volley was identical to the first and had the same results.

“Knock! Draw! Lo…”

Before Jon could give the order, a powerful gust of wind hit him, forcing him to cover his face.
When he looked around, he saw that all men were forced to do the same. The blast of wind stopped them from doing anything for several precious seconds. Cold was biting them like a direwolf. When Jon could finally go back to the border of the Wall, the wights had reached it. They were beginning to climb the Wall. And he told Sam that he hoped the dead couldn’t climb it.

“Position archers with harnesses. We must take them down before they reach the top.”

They had to hold archers to the Wall while they looked down to shoot at the dead men climbing, and the only way for that was to use harnesses. They had to be careful. The men holding these harnesses couldn’t fail, or the archers would fall to a certain death, like it had happened to one of them when Mance attacked the Wall. As men took positions, Jon saw that a figure was detaching itself among the wights who attacked the Wall. Because it wasn’t a wight. It was a White Walker, different from the Night King. He was walking slowly to the gate. Jon saw that there was already a strong contingent of dead men at the gate.

“Is the oil ready?” he asked.

“Yes, your Grace.”

“Drop it at my signal.”

Archers kept shooting at the wights who approached the Wall and at those who climbed it. It was useless to tell the men to knock or to loose now. The White Walker was approaching the gate. He got closer, closer, closer. Jon suddenly thought of Ygritte. If she was here, she could certainly shoot an arrow at him, and she would certainly reach him, even at this distance. She never missed her target. It would only take her one arrow with a head of dragonglass to kill the White Walker. However, Ygritte wasn’t here, and the White Walker was. When he came close enough, Jon gave the order.

“The Oil! Now!”

They dropped four barrels full of oil with an enflamed stem. They fell, and for a few seconds they waited. Just at the moment when the White Walker was right under them, they touched the ground. An explosion followed. Jon saw several wights trying to escape the fire. If the dead couldn’t feel fear anymore, they surely felt the pain. Melisandre would surely like this sight.

The fire cleared in front of the gate, as if someone just blew it off like you blew off a candle. The wights were all dead or about to be dead, if they could die. The White Walker, however, still stood tall, in the same position than when he walked to the gate. He raised his arm and smashed it against the gate. A moment later, pieces of steel flew all over the battlefield. To Jon’s horror, the White Walker walked into the tunnel. Many dead were now converging on it. The gate was gone.

Jon ran to the horn, cursing himself on the way. The gate was made of steel. They knew the weapons of the White Walkers could destroy swords, make them shatter in a thousand pieces of steel. Why didn’t he consider that they could do the same with everything made of steel, including gates? He arrived at the horn.

He nodded and made three fast blows, followed by two that were longer. Jon waited. Seconds later, he fell the ground shake again. This time, however, he was glad to hear it shaking.

“Send them another load of oil barrels. Keep raining fire on them. Don’t stop. Fight!” He kept giving orders. Volleys of flaming arrows kept burning wights under them. The barrels of oil made another carnage before the gate.

Jon continued to command the men. The wights agglutinated at the gate one more time, and after another load of oil burned them all, they didn’t try to get through the gate again. There was no gate now, anyway, and no tunnel. Jon and Edd conceived this plan in case they would have to block the tunnel very quickly. They made a system with ropes enrolled around beams that held the ceiling of the tunnel. Having men pull these ropes broke the beams and caused the ceiling to collapse, burying the tunnel under rock and ice. No one could leave and no one could enter. The White Walker and all the wights who managed to come with him into the tunnel would be stuck there.

Jon thought after some time that fewer wights were sent towards the Wall. The Night King couldn’t have exhausted his army already. Jon knew he had at least as many men as Mance Rayder, certainly more, and he didn’t send much more men yet than Mance when he launched the first attack on the Wall.

A horn blew. Jon looked at their own on the Wall, and saw that it wasn’t this one that was blown. It was the one of Castle Black, down there. The castle was being attacked.

Jon found Asher who was firing like most of the men “Asher. The Wall is yours. If the climbers get too close, drop the scythe on them.”

“Aye, Snow.” Jon chose six men to come with him. As they walked to the cage, he heard the Lord of Ironrath shout. “Come on, boys. Let’s send those fuckers back to Hell.” He heard a volley of arrows go.

As the winch cage brought them down, Jon saw that there was indeed a battle in the main courtyard. However, it wasn’t any common battle. When they were close enough, he distinguished the White Walker that he thought they buried under the Wall. Jon saw that he already killed a dozen men. He drew Longclaw. This was the only sword in this castle that could destroy this man or whatever it was.

When the cage opened, he jumped immediately. To his great horror, the bodies on the ground raised at this moment. One of them was close, maybe no more than ten feet. It looked at Jon with its blue eyes. Jon didn’t hesitate and plunged his sword into the dead man, and he fell immediately, unmov ing. He looked at the courtyard and saw that the other dead men were beginning to attack the living. He turned to the men he brought with him.

“Burn the dead with anything you can find. I take care of the Walker.”

Jon went down the stairs and ran to the White Walker. He turned to face Jon at the last minute and brought his sword down on him. Jon parried it. The White Walker delivered strong blows, but Jon parried or ducked them. Then he saw an opening and brought his sword through the White Walker’s head. The next moment, it was gone, reduced to rubble.

Jon looked around him and saw that there were a few wights still fighting. He ran to one of them and cut through his leg, then his head. When he looked at what was left of him on the ground, he realized he knew this man. He spoke with him no later than this morning. He was a young squire to a knight from the Vale. When Jon looked around again, he saw that only one wight was still on his feet. A man with the sigil of House Cerwyn on his arms shove a torch to his chest, and the wight screamed in pain. He had an armor from the Vale as well.

Jon looked at the head he just cut from a dead man’s body, his blue eyes without life staring at him. He spoke with him only a few hours ago. He couldn’t remember his name, he didn’t even know where he precisely came from, but he spoke with him, and now he just killed him. He heard the horn from the Wall. The enemy was retreating. They won.

“Your Grace.” Edd brought him back to life by calling after him.
“How did this happen? How did he get through?”

“No idea. We brought the Wall down on him, but he managed to get through all the same. We were all surprised. The men tried to stop him, but you know it was useless. You arrived just in time.”

The White Walker managed to make his way through the debris they threw over him. If they could get through it, then no one was safe. “Did any wight come through?”

“None. Only the White Walker.”

Jon sighed in relief. There was this, at least. “Make sure the tunnel is blocked. Keep guards before it at all times. We must write to Winterfell to tell them what happened, and to the other castles. We must tell them to keep their tunnels blocked, and tell Eastwatch and the Shadow Tower to seal their own too.”

Edd nodded and left to carry out the orders Jon just gave. Jon realized that everyone around was looking at him. Free Folk, Northerner, Vale man, they were all staring at him. No one said anything, but they were all looking at him. Jon reminded himself that he had to look sure of what he was doing. He couldn’t let his men doubt him. He was their king now.

“Everyone at your posts. Bring those who are injured to the maesters. Burn the bodies of the dead. Unless you want them to come back.” Because they will come back. And the next time, we might not be as lucky as we were today.

SANSA XXX

"Are you sure you want to eat these now? We may not see them before long," Bran said, looking at the peach in his hand.

"You deserve to have some after the two years you spent north of the Wall. They won’t last much longer, anyway," Sansa assured her brother. “And I don’t believe we will get more from the Reach anytime soon."

Since House Tyrell declared for Daenerys Targaryen, they couldn’t hope to receive food supplies from the Reach in the near future. Sansa had been more than happy to learn that Margaery survived, but the news were quickly darkened by the announcement of House Tyrell to support the Targaryens. Sansa found some solace in the idea that Cersei would die soon. Daenerys Targaryen would never let her live. However, she doubted that the Mad King’s daughter would be more merciful with her and Tyrion. They supported Jon, after all, and Tyrion’s family played a vital role in the downfall of the Targaryen dynasty. The Tyrells fought for the Targaryens in the last war, unlike the Lannisters and the Starks, and Jon was acknowledged by the four kingdoms who rebelled against the Mad King.

She and Tyrion had a long discussion about this new development when they received the news concerning the Tyrells. Daenerys Targaryen had three dragons and the support of both Dorne and the Reach. She already conquered the Stormlands, and everything indicated that after taking King’s Landing, she would direct her armies and her dragons towards Casterly Rock, Riverrun, the Eyrie, and finally Winterfell. Tyrion claimed they had no chance to defeat Daenerys Targaryen. An alliance between the Lannisters and the Gardeners in the times of Aegon’s Conquest was easily defeated by the dragons and a small army. They couldn’t hope to assemble an army large enough to face the Dragon Queen with the threat at the Wall, and even if they did, the odds of winning were very limited.

Tyrion had sent orders to Daven’s army marching on King’s Landing, and also to Genna at Casterly Rock about what to do if the Targaryen’s army marched against them. Tyrion was disappointed to have failed in convincing the Reach to join them, but he confessed that even if they knew that Margaery was alive and proposed Mace Tyrell to marry her to Jon, they would certainly not be able to stand against three dragons and a powerful army of Dothrakis, Unsullied and Dornishmen. A war in the south was to be prevented at all cost if they were to have a chance to defeat the White Walkers.

As a result, they didn’t send more men in the south. Half their forces were at the Wall with Jon, while the other half was kept in reserve in the many castles in the North. Even Ser Brynden Tully remained in the North. Daven Lannister’s army would be joined by another army of the Vale to march on King’s Landing and deal with Cersei Lannister, but they had no other major force south of Moat Cailin. Their armies were kept to fight the White Walkers and the dead.
“Your husband didn’t join us, Sansa?” Arya asked.

“No. He wanted to give us some time between brothers and sisters, in family,” Sansa answered.

“If Jon was here, the whole family would be reunited.”

They were breaking their fast together, Sansa, Arya and Bran, before the day began. They didn’t have much time for themselves. It wasn’t to be said that they spent no time together at all, but most of the time Sansa spent with Arya during the day was about ruling the North, administering Winterfell, or taking decisions about the war. As for Bran, he spent most of his time in the godswood, having visions. Sansa still didn’t completely understand what Bran meant when he said he was the three-eyed raven. Bran said it was complicated and struggled to explain her what it meant, or he didn’t want to tell her what it meant. Sansa wasn’t sure she wanted to know. Bran knew things he wasn’t supposed to know. He often looked lost in his thoughts. Sometimes, he forgot to eat. Without Meera Reed to look after him, Sansa didn’t know what would happen to Bran.

“Did you have news from Jon recently?” Bran asked.

“His last raven said they garrisoned all the castles along the Wall,” Sansa answered. “He said nothing apart from this.” Jon’s ravens were reports more than letters. At best, they knew he was alive with them, but nothing more.

“We should all be with him,” Arya said. “You remember what Father used to tell us? He said we had to stay together, that a lone wolf died in winter, but that the pack survived.”

“Jon told us to stay here for our safety, Arya,” Sansa told her.

“I don’t need to be safe. I spent two years wandering through the Riverlands, and then I spent months among the crannogmen. I don’t need protection.”

“What about Bran? You want him at Castle Black, where he could get killed by a wight?”

“Arya, you can protect yourself,” Bran said, “but I can’t. I had nothing to do at Castle Black. Jon has to fight them, and he can defeat them, but I can’t. When he told me to leave, I refused at first, but he was right to send me back home. I’m more useful here.”

Arya grumbled something that looked like an approval. “Still, I don’t like being stuck here while our brother is risking his life.”

Sansa almost corrected her sister by saying Jon wasn’t their brother, but she kept it for herself. It would only infuriate Arya. She didn’t think less of Jon since she learned he was their cousin. Truth be told, Sansa considered him more like her family than many years ago, before she left Winterfell for King’s Landing, but she tried to call him her cousin all the same. It was still better than bastard, and better than to specify to everyone that Jon was only her half-brother.

“Are you still doing well in the training yard?” Sansa asked her sister, trying to change the subject. “I saw you fight three squires at the same time and knock them all on the ground.”

“Aye.” Arya said with pride. Sansa tried to take an interest in Arya fighting, just like Arya tried to get involved in the ruling of Winterfell. After her time spent with a woman as her sworn shield at her side, Sansa had come to tolerate that Arya didn’t want to be a lady. Despite their differences, they managed to spend time together. Arya was less bitter towards her than before. “Though I wish Brienne was still here. She was good at fighting, and it was amusing too to train with her.”

Brienne had left Winterfell two weeks ago. A message had arrived from Evenfall Hall, informing her that her father died in King’s Landing during the events around the destruction of the Great Sept of Baelor. Sansa never saw Brienne so affected in her whole life. She had no family left. Her father was her last family member who was alive, and now he was gone.

“I’m sorry, Brienne. You have all my sympathy,” Sansa told her in her solar when she saw the tall woman the day after the raven from Tarth arrived.

“Thank you, my lady.” Sansa never saw Brienne in this state before. It was as if she barely managed to stand on her feet. Sansa remembered how she felt when her father died, and when Robb and her mother died. She knew how horrible it was to go through this.

They remained silent for a long time. Sansa decided to break it. “You wanted to see me, Lady Brienne. Why? Is there something I can do for you?”

There was a long pause before Brienne talked. When she did, it was with a croaked voice. “I need you to relieve me from your service, my lady.” Sansa was shocked by this. That wasn’t what she expected. “I must go back to Tarth. I must bury my father’s bones.”

“Oh. Of course, I understand. But surely, you don’t have to leave my service to bury your father.”

Brienne seemed at a loss of words for a time, then she spoke, her voice trembling. “My lady, I swore to your lady mother to bring her daughters to safety. You and your sister are now safer than you’ll ever be. You don’t need my protection anymore.”

There was something strange in the way Brienne talked. She didn’t seem to believe what she was saying, and Sansa doubted that with wights and White Walkers not far from them, they could say that she and Arya were safe. “Lady Brienne, why are you leaving? Is that because now you’re the Lady of Evenfall?” Brienne didn’t seem to understand what she just said. Sansa knew that Brienne should be the new Lady of Tarth Isle if her father died, since she was her only living child. Her brother died drowning at the age of eight, and her two sisters died not long after their birth. However, the tall woman once told Sansa that she wasn’t interested in being Lady of Tarth. “That’s not it. Why are you really leaving?”

Lady Brienne of Tarth gulped, looked down, then faced Sansa again. “My father died in King’s Landing, my lady. The people from Evenfall didn’t tell me how it happened, but I know that my lord father was summoned by Randyll Tarly to be Master of Laws. I refuse to believe that he died in an accident. I want to discover what happened to him, and there’s only one place where I can find it.”

Sansa knew exactly what this meant. “Brienne, I can’t allow you to go there. Cersei controls King’s Landing and the Crownlands. You will never get to her. You’ll be killed before you can see her.”

“I only want to discover what happened to my father.”

“And… what if you find out that he was killed by Cersei, or on her orders?”

“I once vowed I would avenge Renly Baratheon, my lady. I would have killed Stannis if I fell upon him by chance, and I would have killed Walder Frey and his son Walder if you allowed me to for murdering you lady mother, and I would avenge you as well if someone killed you. The same goes for my father.”

“Brienne, Cersei doesn’t have long to live. Daenerys Targaryen is conquering all the southern kingdoms as we speak. Cersei has a few months to live, at most. No one supports her. If Daenerys doesn’t kill her, our own men will take care of that when they attack the capital.”

“I must find out how my father died, my lady,” Brienne insisted.
Sansa looked at her sworn shield for a moment. “You’ll get yourself killed if you go to King’s Landing.”

“I know it’s possible, Lady Sansa, but it is a risk I must take. I have a duty towards you, I didn’t forget it, but I have a duty to my father’s memory as well.”

Sansa didn’t want Brienne to go. After being around her for so long, she had come to appreciate this woman. However, she served her when she had no obligation to do so. Few people would have kept an oath they made to a dead person. Sansa could refuse Brienne’s request, but was it fair to demand her to remain at her service forever when she showed more devotion than any other knight would have? Could she refuse this woman the right to get her revenge for her father’s death? Sansa knew better than anyone how horrible Cersei was, and she couldn’t blame Cersei for wanting her dead. Sansa wanted the woman dead as well. But Brienne was risking her life. On the other hand, Sansa didn’t feel she could refuse her, not after she entered her service of her own freewill, when she had no interest to do so.

“Lady Brienne, I won’t force you to stay, but I suggest you join the army Ser Daven Lannister is leading to King’s Landing. You’ll have better odds of surviving, and they’re going to the capital anyway. You’ll be able to discover how your father died after the city is taken.”

Brienne nodded after a moment. “Yes, my lady.”

“I do not free you from my service, Brienne, but I allow you to go south for an undetermined period to find out how your lord father died and to bury his bones.”

“Thank you, my lady.” She unbuckled the scabbard at her belt and handed it to Sansa. “This sword belongs to your family, my lady. It was made with the steel of your father’s sword, and it might help you against the dead if they ever get through the Wall. Ser Jaime told me to use it to defend you with your father’s steel. I won’t be defending you while I’m in the south.”

Sansa thought about it. She wasn’t sure if she wanted to take it back from Brienne, but if it was forged with the melted steel of her father’s sword, it might one of the few things left from him. Sansa accepted it. “You can take whatever you want in our armory, the best sword you find is yours. We’ll give you everything for your journey to King’s Landing.”

“Thank you, my lady. It was an honor to serve you.” After an hesitation, she added something more. “And to serve your husband. I will come back to you as soon as I can.”

Sansa missed Brienne, and Arya too. They trained together almost every day, and Brienne said she was surprised and impressed by Arya’s skills. Sansa also had to admit that she felt less safe without Brienne around.

“I think it’s time for you to see Maester Wolkan, isn’t it?” Bran asked. They were done with their breakfast.

“I think we could still spend some time with you in the godswood,” Sansa offered.

“Of course.”

“I’ll bring you there,” Arya said. She went behind Bran and began to push his wheelchair. Sansa followed behind.

The sun was high in the sky, for one of the first times since they arrived in the North. Maester Wolkan said it indicated that a storm was coming soon. Still, for the time being, Sansa enjoyed the feeling of the sun on her skin. They made their way through Winterfell, people bowing respectfully before them. They were before the weirwood in no time. For half an hour, they exchanged stories about their childhood.

“Do you remember when you ambushed me with snowballs?” Sansa asked them.

“Aye, your hair was all messy. You complained that you had to brush it for hours after that,” Arya said on a playful tone.

They all laughed together. “It had to be one of the times I hated you the most,” Sansa told her sister, without a hint of seriousness.

“Wasn’t it when you found out that she sheep shifted your bed for the first time?” Bran said with a wicked smile.

New laughter erupted. Sansa found out that it was pleasing to laugh about how stupid she used to be when she was young with her siblings. It also helped her to lessen the guilt over her stupid actions in the past.

“Now, forgive me, but I must go, or else the others will make their training without me,” Arya said all of a sudden. “We’ll see you later, Bran.”

Arya walked away, and Sansa stood up to follow her. “I must go as well.”

“Sansa, wait.” She stopped and turned to look back at her brother. “You spoke about sheep shifting to your husband? In King’s Landing?”

Sansa smiled. “Arya told you?”

“No. I mean, yes, she did, after I asked her about it, but I saw you back then. You were walking together in the gardens. Your handmaiden Shae was following you.” The mention of Shae brought back unpleasant memories to Sansa. She hadn’t thought about her in a very long time. “Ser Edric Sarsfield and Lord Desmond Crakehall laughed when you crossed their path, and you told Tyrion you could sheep shift their bed. You said that while sitting on a bench.”

He couldn’t have gotten all these details from Arya. He saw their discussion in one of his visions. She never really knew how to react when Bran told her things that happened to her in the past. Sometimes his abilities were very helpful. He could confirm that Jon’s mother was Lyanna Stark, and that Baelish betrayed their lord father, but it was unsettling to hear from him events that happened to her in their smaller details.

“It was before you heard about what happened to Mother and Robb,” Bran continued. “You looked happy.”

“Yes, I was,” Sansa recognized. It had been one of the most beautiful moments in the beginning of her marriage. A smile crept to her lips.

“Did you love him back then?”

“I don’t know,” she answered after a moment. “I… I liked him, yes. He was… He was different from the other Lannisters. He was always kind with me, and he really cared about me. He never asked or wanted anything from me. He was the only one who didn’t try to get something from me, or to use me.” Even Margaery, who tried to help her, did it in part for her family’s interest. She thought that Shae was her friend too, but she ended up betraying her. As for Brienne, she hadn’t arrived yet at this moment.
However, Sansa didn’t know if she loved Tyrion then. She enjoyed her time with him, it was true, but did she love him? When he was arrested, she worried more about her than about him. She could only say that she loved him aloud at her sixteenth name day, the night they consummated their marriage. She couldn’t find the force to tell him before that. She had loved him before this day, for sure, but she wasn’t sure when she really fell in love with him.

“You didn’t seem happy at your wedding.” She looked back at her brother, who had a sorry expression on his face. “You were beautiful. You had a golden gown. Mother would have liked to be there.”

Sansa remembered very well her wedding. Sometimes, she wished they could go back in the past and make the wedding again, this time without Joffrey, without Tywin Lannister, without Cersei, only with Tyrion and all the people she loved present. She remembered the dream she made after they became man and wife, where her family was present for her wedding. It had looked so perfect.

“I’m not sure our mother would be happy to see me today,” Sansa replied ruefully. “She wouldn’t have wanted me to marry a Lannister. And she would certainly never approve of me marrying the Imp.” She punctuated her last words with bitterness.

“I saw what Joffrey did to you,” Bran said, catching her attention once again. “I saw what Ser Meryn did when Robb won at Oxcross. It was brave, what Tyrion did for you.”

“And we weren’t even engaged back then.”

“He’s a good man. If mother would disapprove your marriage with him… then she’s stupid.” Her brother’s words surprised her. “Especially after what happened to his first wife.”

“You saw that as well?” Sansa asked, worried.

“I saw everything. All of it. It was… horrible.” Bran’s expression on his face told everything she needed to know.

Sansa shook her head. “Tywin Lannister was a horrible man. He organized the Red Wedding, he had Mother and Robb killed, but… How could he do that to his own son? I can’t understand. Who could do that to his children? Why?”

She had tried to think about all the men and women she knew who had children, and she couldn’t imagine any of them acting in such a way, even the worst ones. From what she knew, even Roose Bolton never mistreated his son Ramsay, and he was a bastard and a monster. Why did Tywin Lannister do this?

“He did it for revenge,” Bran stated.

“Revenge.” Sansa scoffed. “How can someone be held accountable for being a dwarf or for his mother’s death at his birth? How can we take revenge on him for that?”

“It wasn’t on Tyrion that Tywin Lannister wanted to take his revenge.”

Sansa looked at Bran. “What do you mean?”

“He wanted to take his revenge on someone else through Tyrion.”

“But who? Who… Who could he try to punish by mistreating Tyrion?”

Before Bran could answer, Podrick called her from behind. “Lady Sansa. Please excuse me, but Lord Tyrion is asking for your presence. We received important words from Castle Black.”

On their way back to their rooms, Bran asked Sansa if he could see Joanna later. Her brother had gone to see her the first day he arrived. He held her in his arms and told Sansa that she was beautiful. Bran seemed to like her, though he quickly gave her back to Sansa. She should spend time with her mother, he told her.

A few minutes later, they all sat around a table in her father’s solar, she, Tyrion, Arya, and Bran. Ser Bronn was there as well. Tyrion had a very serious expression on his face as he held a raven scroll in his hands.

“The White Walkers launched an assault on Castle Black.” Sansa’s heart raced as Tyrion gave her the scroll and continued to speak. “A dozen of men died, and a White Walker managed to get through the tunnel under the Wall despite the fact it was sealed. This attack was stopped and the White Walker died, but Jon Snow is asking for more men at the Wall. He’s also telling us to be prepared for anything.”

“Is Jon all right?” Arya asked.

“The raven is signed by him, so I suppose he’s still alive.”

“I should have seen them coming,” Bran said.

“Can you see the future, Bran?”

“No, I can’t. Only the past.”

“Then you have nothing to blame you for. No one could have seen it coming.”

“It’s my fault all the same.” Bran was now reading the scroll after Sansa gave it to him. “The Night King tried to bring the Wall down. The White Walker could get through it because of me.”

Tyrion frowned. “What do you mean?”

“During one of my visions in the cave, I came across the Night King. He touched me, and he left a mark on me. That’s how he could get inside the cave. I went through the Wall by the tunnel at Castle Black. That’s why the White Walker could get through. There are sorts and magic that protect the Wall and prevent the dead from getting through, but now… They’re useless. I broke them when I came back.”

A heavy silence fell. “Do you think they can cross the Wall at any place, or only where you crossed, at Castle Black?”

Bran shrugged. “I don’t know.”

Tyrion seemed to think hard about it. “There are no other attacks that were reported. Hopefully, Castle Black is the only place where the Walkers can get through. And at least, the Night King failed at making the Wall fall with his powers.” He didn’t seem entirely sure, however.

“How many men do we have in the North?” Arya asked.

“Forty thousand, if I remember well,” Sansa answered.

Tyrion confirmed it with sign of head. “Half of them are at the Wall. The others are the forces of the Riverlands led by the Blackfish and the Lannister forces who didn’t go south with Daven.”
Sansa had seen her granduncle when he came back to Winterfell after he took the Dreadfort, and then he had gone to establish a strong garrison at the Last Hearth.

“We should send them all to the Wall if the dead are attacking us,” Arya said.

“It would be a terrible mistake. They are stationed at several keeps and castles close to the Wall. We even positioned some of them at Queenscrown, and we must maintain garrisons in those places,” Tyrion opposed.

“Why? We don’t need them there. Unless you want to occupy the North,” Arya accused him.

“Arya!” Sansa said.

“I’m not trying to subjugate the North,” Tyrion protested. “I’m just covering our back. To position all our men on the Wall could be a death sentence.”

“Why? The dead are attacking the Wall, not Winterfell or Karhold. It’s the Wall we must defend,” Arya argued.

“Lady Arya,” Tyrion began. Arya’s eyes threw him daggers. She hated to be called that way. “I suppose your maester gave you lessons of history.”

“Aye. What’s the link?”

“Did he ever talk to you about the Empire of Ghis?” Arya looked puzzled. “The Old Empire of Ghis was the first known empire in Essos. It fell five thousand years ago when the Valyrians destroyed them. Old Ghis fought five great wars against Valyria, and they lost each of them. It was during the fifth that the city was destroyed. However, it’s not Valyria who really destroyed the empire. The Ghiscarics made the mistake of building great fortifications on their borders and stationed all their troops into the fortresses they built. They wanted to stop any foreign invasion before their enemies set foot in their territories. However, in the end of the empire, their enemies attacked them at one precise point. They managed to get through the fortifications, and once it was done, they met no resistance as they marched through the provinces of the empire. That’s what killed the Ghiscari Empire, and that’s exactly what’s going to happen if we send all our men at the Wall. If the White Walkers were to make a breakthrough, they would meet no resistance on their way south because all our forces would be stationed at the Wall. And about a few thousand years later, historians will talk about the great fall of the North thanks to this error… if there are still historians left to write about this.”

“So we just sit here and do nothing?” Arya asked with hostility.

“I never said that. In fact, if you waited before jumping to conclusions, Lady Arya, you would know by now that I intend to go to Castle Black with three thousand men.”

Sansa looked in horror at Tyrion. “You can’t be serious.”

“I am. I will leave for the Wall tomorrow. I’ll gather the men on the road at the other castles. This should be more than enough help for Jon Snow.”

“You can’t go there,” Sansa argued. “We need you here at Winterfell.”

“I must go with my men. I can’t tell them to go to the Wall while I remain behind.” He looked at her softly. He meant that he had no choice but to go with his men.

“I’ll come too, then. I’m tired of doing nothing here,” Arya declared. “If Jon is fighting the dead, then I want to be with him.”

“No, Arya, you can’t go there as well,” Sansa protested.

“I’ll go, whether you like it or not. You’re not Mother.”

Couldn’t they understand? She didn’t want to lose them, not again. She almost lost Tyrion when he was accused of his father’s murder, and for years she thought Arya was dead. She didn’t want to see any of them die.

“We leave tomorrow,” Tyrion said. “Bronn, make sure we don’t forget the gift our friends in King’s Landing gave us.”

“We’ll finally get to use it?” the knight asked.

“Let’s hope it won’t be necessary, but we brought it with us to fight the dead after all.”

“I’m on it.” He left without another word.

“Bran, I know you don’t necessarily control your visions or choose them, but can you try to find out what the Night King is preparing?”

“I’ll try,” Bran said.

“Good. We leave at dawn.”

The meeting was over with this. Arya and Bran left.

“You cannot go,” Sansa said as soon as they were alone.

“I have to.”

“Why?”

“I told you.” He looked at her, a sorry and tired expression on his face. “I forced my men to stay here, in the North, during winter, to fight living dead. Most of them don’t believe they exist. The armies of Euron Greyjoy are plundering our lands and destroying our cities. There are men who have families in Lannisport. They want to go home, and I tell them to stay here to fight dead men. What do you think they will do if I tell them to go to the Wall, while I stay behind with my wife, warm inside the walls of Winterfell?”

His voice wasn’t hard, or reproaching. He was just explaining her why he was doing it. Still, she had to try to keep him here. “You went into battle once, and your head was almost sliced in two.” His scar was only a white line now, no longer deep like it used to be at the beginning of their marriage, but it was still there, a reminder of what could have happened if Ser Mandon Moore swung his sword farther.

“I won’t go into battle until it’s necessary this time. Anyway, a wall is separating us from the army of the dead. I won’t come face to face with one of them.”

“Then you don’t need to go. They don’t need you to fight.”

“I’m sorry, Sansa. I told you why I must go, and I won’t change my mind.” No, he wouldn’t. She could see it. “Furthermore, I have to discuss important matters with your cousin, our king. I must do that in person. It would be impossible to do it by raven. It’s too important.”
“What is it?”

Tyrion sighed. “The Reach decided to side with Daenerys Targaryen. We have to fight the White Walkers on the north and the dragons in the south. We don’t have enough men to fight them both. When the Dragon Queen will have dealt with Cersei and the Greyjoys, she will turn her gaze to the North. Truth be told, I don’t see how we could win against Daenerys Targaryen.”

Yes, they discussed about it very often. “So, you will suggest Jon to bend the knee?” They had discussed about it, but couldn’t take a decision concerning this.

“It might be the only solution, unless we want to see the North burn. He wouldn’t be the first King in the North to surrender before a Targaryen. Torrhen Stark did the same three hundred years ago.”

“Perhaps, but Torrhen Stark’s father didn’t fight Aegon’s father. She is the daughter of the Mad King. What if she decided to kill us all the same?”

“We cannot defeat three dragons, Sansa, not to mention the army she brought. Furthermore, she may be able to help us.”

“Help us?”

“Fire kills wights. Or it stops them, or destroys them. I’m unsure about the nomenclature. What breathes fire?”

“You’re thinking about an alliance with her? Against the White Walkers?” Sansa asked, incredulous.

“Well, these dragons may be our best chance to defeat the White Walkers, especially if they get through the Wall.”

Sansa wasn’t sure at all about the idea of an alliance with a Targaryen. Jon was a Targaryen, true, but he grew up with her, and they knew him. They didn’t know much about Daenerys Targaryen. She remembered a discussion she had one night with Tyrion, about how they would all be in danger if she came to Westeros.

“Don’t you think she will want Jon dead? He’s a danger for her, after all.”

Her husband seemed thoughtful and worried at this. “I regret insisting on revealing his origins now. But we have no choice. We can’t defeat three dragons followed by a powerful army. The Gardeners and the Lannisters couldn’t defeat Aegon together, so how could we? We have fewer men, we’re fighting against White Walkers, and we have no weapons capable of killing dragons. I’m afraid we’ll have to bend the knee. We already instructed Genna to not resist if the Targaryen army came to the Westerlands. Even if the Rock could hold, the rest of the Westerlands would fall quickly. I have no wish to see the next Harrenhal in the Westerlands.” He sighed. “I need to discuss it with Jon. We need to get out of this mess without too many deaths, and only with the dead burning if possible.”

Sansa nodded. “Promise me you won’t place yourself in a dangerous situation. Stay far from the fight, just like when you fought the Boltons.”

“I promise. There were times I hated my life, but I don’t want to end it yet. Especially not when we just had our first child.”

Sansa smiled. “I don’t want her to be the last.”

“She won’t be.” He cupped her cheek and put a slow kiss on her lips. “Now, I think it’s time to hold court. I’ll be in the shadows, like always.”
“Tyrion,” she said as he took her hand to accompany her. “Do you think you could convince Arya to not follow you?”

Tyrion grimaced. “I doubt she will listen to me. And if we ever forbid her from leaving, she’ll find a way to get out all the same.” He gently rubbed the back of her hand. “She knows how to defend herself, Sansa. She’s a survivor, like you.”

“I just… don’t want to lose her again.”

“I’ll try to keep an eye on her.”

With that reassurance, she followed him. They paid a short visit to their daughter before they went to the Great Hall. Sansa still marvelled at how beautiful she was. As for Tyrion, he complained half seriously that she took too much after his family. Her blond hair was getting more visible every day, a shining gold like Cersei and Jaime. Sansa didn’t care about this detail. Joanna was her daughter, no matter how she looked like. As she looked at Tyrion holding their daughter into his arms, the fear that Joanna might lose her father before even knowing him resurfaced. She couldn’t allow Tyrion to die. She would make sure that her husband survived this war, at any cost.

Chapter End Notes

I'm sorry to separate Tyrion and Sansa again, but they will be back together.

Tyrion's speech about the defensive system of the Ghiscari Empire is in fact a criticism that many modern historians make of the military system of the Roman Empire that caused its fall during the Barbarian Invasions. The Hadrian Wall (that inspired the Wall of ASOIAF to GRRM) was part of this defensive system.

Next chapter : The Battle of Oldtown
The tide was good, and the wind was favorable. If Euron arrived now, they would have the better odds to defeat him. They were in the middle of the night, and although Yara would rather face her uncle during the day, she knew better than to expect him to satisfy her wishes. He would launch his assault on Oldtown in the darkness.

Their fleet consisted in about two hundred warships, plus three hundred merchant ships converted for the war. Yara knew that Euron’s fleet consisted in about six hundred ships, not all made for war either. However, the Ironborn were always prepared to fight, and their ships were all made to fight at sea, even the so-called merchant ships.

Yara knew that this was their only chance. The Redwyne fleet had faced Euron’s armada in a first battle before her fleet arrived at the Arbor. They lost half their ships. If they had engaged all their vessels into the battle from the beginning, it would have been worse, but when the commander of the Redwyne fleet saw that they had no chance to win against Euron, he ordered his men to fall back. Some of these ships were not yet repaired. Yara’s fleet had some losses on the way from the Iron Islands to Meereen, then from Meereen back to Westeros, but they were insignificant. Overall, with the lack of maintenance on her own ships and the hasty repairs of the Redwynes, their fleet was quite homogeneous when it came to the state of the ships.

The crews were a different matter. The Arbor lost some of their most experienced sailors in the first battle, and many people on the ships of the Arbor were green boys. Against Euron’s armada, constituted of men of the Iron Islands born to fight, Yara feared they may not be able to stand. Euron’s ships were probably in better shape than hers as well. Some had just been equipped. She wouldn’t refuse a favorable sea to fight her uncle.

Yara didn’t lose hope. They could defeat her uncle. Euron was dangerous, but not invincible. For a start, he was sure to win. Her uncle Rodrik Harlaw, the Reader, said that it was Euron’s greatest weakness. As always, the Lord of Harlaw came to that conclusion from his many readings. Many men of war, who won victory after victory lost one day because they were too confident, and more often than not this one defeat erased everything they gained with their previous victories, no matter how many times they won. One hundred victories could turn to ashes for one defeat.

Yara had always loved her mother’s brother. She always loved the Ten Towers of Harlaw better than the castle of Pyke on her father’s island. She visited her uncle’s home before she sailed for Deepwood Motte, and when she came back from it, and each time she saw Alannys Harlaw. Her mother was only a shadow of the woman she used to be. She had become frail, and spent her time searching for Rodrik, Maron and Theon. Yara didn’t have the time to see her after her father died. Her uncle was the one to tell her the news, but according to him, it didn’t affect her much since her thoughts were no longer coherent.
Yara regretted they didn’t bring her mother with them when they escaped for Meereen. Her uncle assured her that he took every precaution to ensure her mother’s safety. The Reader also said that Euron would surely give no attention to a mad woman at the end of her days anyway, but Yara wasn’t entirely convinced. She could hear the doubts into her uncle’s voice when he said so.

They had no news from the Iron Islands since they left, except for the various assaults Euron launched against the Westerlands and the Reach. Yara’s mother could be dead and she had no way to know it. However, she learned from Lord Paxter Redwyne something about another member of her family. Theon was dead. He was executed at Winterfell by the Starks and the Lannisters. His final words were what is dead may never die.

She lost everyone. When she was a child, Yara watched her two elder brothers die as they fought the Starks who attacked her father’s castle. Then she was forced to watch her father, in chains, kneel before Robert Baratheon, and finally, she lost her third brother, her little brother, who was forced to leave and to become the Stark’s pet.

The years following her father’s failed rebellion had been hard. The Iron Islands were weak, forced to limit their fleet and to pay a heavy tribute to the Iron Throne, but worse had been her father coping with his failure. Balon Greyjoy wasn’t a good king, or a clever one, but he was brave, and fiercely attached to the traditions of his people. After Theon was gone, he considered him lost to him, and he raised Yara to be his heir. Yara became captain of her own ship, and she did well. Her men respected her, and they were ready to follow her to the death. Her father was proud of her too, so much that she was more his son than Theon was when he came back.

Yara was disappointed with who Theon became when she saw him for the first time in ten years. She shared her father’s disdain for Theon’s behaviour, but that didn’t stop her from seeing how he was unfair with Theon. She never told Theon at the time, but he had been right about their father. You gave me away like I was some dog you didn’t want anymore. And now you curse me because I’ve come home. Yara didn’t tell Theon back then that he was right, but despite the fact that her brother was a fool, he was right about their father. She didn’t tell him because it was more important at the time to be united to fight the North and it wasn’t the time to flatter Theon’s ego, but to convince him to fight for their family. Balon Greyjoy didn’t consider Theon as his son anymore. When Yara said she lost two brothers the day Eddard Stark and Robert Baratheon took Pyke, her father said he lost three sons. When she said Theon was his son, her father replied he wasn’t a man anymore. And now they were both dead.

Theon died saying the words every Ironborn said, and he was killed by the people who convinced him he was one of them. Her father was murdered by his own brother. Yara was all that remained of the Greyjoy line, all that was left of her family. Her mother didn’t have long to live. She wouldn’t allow Euron to live, not after everything he did. She would defeat him today, no matter what it took. And when she would have him, when she would take his ship, when she would have him at her mercy, on his knees, she would kill him.

Euron was spreading the fear of the Iron Islands through all Westeros right now. He sacked Lannisport, and now he was about to try the same with Oldtown. Yara wouldn’t allow it. In another time, she might have done the same thing as her uncle, but since Aegon’s Conquest and the death of Harren the Black, the great lords of Westeros paid no mind to the Iron Islands. Every once in a time, the Ironmen would rebel and raid their territories, raping a few women, destroying a few villages, until the greenlanders attacked them, conquered them and humiliated them. And then they went back to ignoring them. Her father was a brave man, but he failed to accept that any rebellion was doomed to fail. Her uncle Rodrik was right. The Ironborn could no longer live like they used to centuries ago. They needed to make peace with the rest of Westeros.
Following her uncle’s advice, Yara decided she would build the greatest fleet the Iron Islands ever saw. This fleet wasn’t meant to be used to conquer or sack the Seven Kingdoms, but as a leverage to negotiate with the other lords. She wanted to offer an alliance to King Tommen, if he accepted to recognize the independence of the Iron Islands and to acknowledge her as their queen. The alliance would include the assistance of the Iron Fleet if the king of Greenlanders found himself in peril and the help of the Iron Islands against the Boltons, then at war with the Lannisters and the Starks. In exchange for that, she would only demand the regions of the Sea Dragon Point and the Stony Shore. These regions were almost uninhabited. They would provide some new lands for her people, who struggled to survive on their islands. War only ever brought pinecones and rocks to her people, at best. They needed lands, not wars.

Yara had planned everything to put an end to this war. She even sent back to Robett Glover his son Gawen as a sign of goodwill, while safely keeping his wife and their daughter at the Ten Towers. She would release them once her proposition of an alliance would be accepted. However, her other uncle, Euron, took the Seastone Chair away from her at the Kingsmoot. Before Yara could explain the purpose of her fleet, Euron recuperated her idea of building the fleet, but to conquer the Seven Kingdoms. So Yara left the Iron Islands with the best chips of the Iron Fleet and her allies, she set sail to Meereen and made a pact with Daenerys Targaryen, before Euron could try to do the same. She also had the wife and the daughter of Lord Glover sent back to him before Euron could seize them. She wouldn’t allow her uncle to have any hostage of value.

So far, the invasion of Westeros went well. Yara’s fleet helped to transport the Dothrakis and the Unsullied to the Stormlands, then they sailed for the Arbor while the Dragon Queen claimed Dragonstone with an easy victory at sea. The eastern men seized the Stormlands and the Reach declared for them. Yara respected Daenerys, and how she managed to become queen despite the fact everything and everyone were against her. Yara faced the same challenges for years, and even now she kept facing them. She knew very well that many lords at the Kingsmoot who hailed Euron as their king, just like her other uncle Aeron, the Damphair, chose him because she was a woman. However, she still believed that Daenerys should have taken the Iron Throne immediately, when she had enough ships and enough men for that. Instead, she listened to her betrothed prince and the eunuch, deciding to gain allies and take the southern part of Westeros before taking King’s Landing.

Yara almost envied Trystane Martell for being betrothed to Daenerys. It might have a role in her disdain for him. Their plans might have gone well on the land, but on the sea, it was another story. The fleet of the Arbor lost against Euron. They should have avoided any fight against him and wait for Yara’s ships to arrive, then they would have faced Euron with a decisive advantage. Instead, they lost hundreds of ships. Now here they were, weakened, waiting for the most powerful armada in Westeros, led by Euron’s ship, the Silence.

Qarl joined her at the prow. “No sign of Euron yet?” he asked her.

“No, but he’s not far,” she replied.

“It might be long before he arrives.” A wicked smile formed on his face.

“Not now, Qarl. Go back to your post.”

“Come on, Yara. We both know we could die. Best have one last stumble before it’s all over.”

She faced him. “We’re not going to lose. You hear me. Defeat is not something we can consider, and I won’t accept it. When Euron comes, I will kill him.”

He shrugged. “All right, but you don’t know what you’re missing.”
She smirked. “I know very well. We may have time later, after the battle.”

Qarl walked away. He and Yara started to sleep together years ago. Yara enjoyed both men and women in her bed, but Qarl was the one she preferred among men. It didn’t stop her from fucking tits on a regular basis, and Qarl never blamed her for that. They both knew she wasn’t the only woman he slept with either. In other circumstances, she might have gone to her cabin with him, bringing a girl with them if there was one near, but for now her mind was all focused on Euron. He would pay for her father’s murder, and once it was done, once Euron, Aeron and all their friends were dead, she would help Daenerys Targaryen to conquer Casterly Rock, Riverrun and Winterfell. She would make the Greenlanders who executed her brother pay for what they did.

“Ships ahead!” the man at the mast shouted.

Yara turned to him and shouted in return, her heart pounding. “How many? How do they look?”

“Hundreds, my queen. There is one at the head, he’s bigger than the others… It’s the Silence.”

It took a second for Yara to steel herself, and then she started shouting orders. “Warn the other ships! Blast the horns! Put the fleet in combat formation! Everyone at your posts! Archers in position! Get ready the scorpions and the spitfires!”

Her crew followed her orders as if they were born to obey her. They were all loyal, and they went through so much together. They would die for her, as much as she would die for them. But that wouldn’t be necessary today, for they wouldn’t die today. Euron shall die, along with all men loyal to him. It would be his end, not hers. And when they won, she would reward all her men for their loyalty all these years.

In the dark, Yara could distinguish the silhouette of the Silence, bigger than any other ship on this sea, coming from the north. Yara knew that Euron’s ship was fast, faster than any other ship of the same size, but he wasn’t as maneuverable as the smallest ships of her fleet. She ordered the convened signal to be sent to the other ships who would join her own. They were ready.

She climbed on the bridge and addressed her men. She discerned Qarl among them. The thought of a night with him was enough to give her a very good reason to kill Euron.

“Men, I sailed with you a thousand times,” she said loud enough for everyone to hear. “I do not intend for this one to be the last. What about you?”

“NO!” They all shouted together as one.

“My uncle Euron is on the other side. He’s leading an army bigger than our own. He has more ships, and all their crew are Ironmen. We have to work with Greenlanders.” She made a pause. “I never wanted this. I wanted to give a future to our people. A future different from the one my father gave us. A future different from the one Euron is offering us. I wanted to be your queen, because I believe in us. I believe in us, people from Orkmont, Blacktyde, Saltcliffe, Harlaw, Old Wyk, Great Wyk and Pyke. We are Ironborn. We’re not servants. We’re not slaves. Euron believes we are his slaves, and he believes we are his servants. He killed my father, his own brother, to become king. Some of you were there, you heard him, and everyone who wasn’t there knows that I’m telling you the truth. I never wanted for our people to fight against each other, but here we are. We do not fight for glory, or for riches, or for honor, or for the Old Way. The Ironborn who took Winterfell fought for glory, and they’re dead. The Ironborn at Deepwood Motte fought for the Old Way, and they’re dead. What did it bring them? Nothing. Euron wants us to fight the Seven Kingdoms, to bleed our people as much as theirs. He’s ready to have every man from the Iron Islands die to realize his dream of sitting on the Iron Throne. He wants us all dead, and we’re going to stop him today. We’re going to kill him, and all the men who chose to follow him, until none of them are left. And when we’re done with him, we will let the Dragon Queen he wanted to seduce order her dragons to feast on his rotten body!”

Her men brandished their swords, and she followed them. “Death to Euron!” a man shouted, and soon it was repeated by everyone on this ship.

“DEATH TO EURON! DEATH TO EURON! DEATH TO EURON! DEATH TO EURON! DEATH TO EURON! DEATH TO EURON!”

They waited for the enemy fleet to get closer. The shadows of the enemy ships were approaching, the Silence’s shape looming closer and closer. Yara had the impression it was bigger than in her memories. As the ship drew closer, mixed feelings of excitement from the effect of her speech and dread from the fear of the Crow’s Eye filled her. She would face her uncle soon, and the one to get out of this alive would rule the Iron Islands.

She waited, and when the time was right, she gave the order. “Now!”

Scorpions and spitfires threw their projectiles at Euron’s fleet. The projectiles, ablaze or not, fell on the ships around the Silence. Yara gave the specific order to not target Euron’s ship. Flaming boulders set afire a ship or two around her uncle’s flagship, and slowed the others. Euron’s ship couldn’t slow down in time. It was heavier than the other ships, and heavier ships needed more time and more distance to stop. Yara ordered the Black Wind, her own ship that she commanded, to sail forward, leaving a row of ten ships behind her, displaying her standard in full view.

As she expected, her uncle couldn’t resist the temptation. The Silence followed them as she made the Black Wind take a northeast direction. Her ship turned the most abruptly it could. Euron’s ship managed to follow, but he got too close from the row of ships Yara left behind. Harlaw was not the largest of the Iron Islands, but it was the richest and most populous. Her ships’ crew were Ironborn just like those of Euron, and they were to be feared, even if a lord like Rodrik Harlaw ruled them. Her uncle’s men released a hell of flaming arrows and boulders on Euron’s ships. The sails caught fire, and the Silence started to lose speed. Yara ordered her crew to make another abrupt turn that brought them side by side with Euron’s ship. In the meantime, she knew that at least two other ships tackled the Silence from the other side, while the others sailed past him to protect them as they seized the enemy’s flagship.

Yara and some of her men threw grappling irons on the Silence. Archers kept firing arrows from both sides. Yara felt an arrow fly an inch from her face as she threw her own grapnel. They placed ladders between the two ships and ran on them to the enemy.

Yara rushed first, leading her men into battle, yelling like she never did before. When she jumped on the floor of the Silence, it was to swing her sword at the same time, separating a head from its owner. What followed after that was pure chaos. Yara discerned the boarding had succeeded on the other side of the ship. Euron’s crew was fighting from two sides. She killed, cut and punched every man she came across. None of them made any sound as they fought. They were all mute, but mute or not, Yara would kill them all.

Someone hit her in the ribs and she hit the board, stopping herself from falling into the river at the last minute. She turned and brought her sword up just in time to block an axe. She attacked her assailant on the right, then on his left, and as he tried to cut her head with one swift move of his axe, she lowered herself, then cut his arm when he attempted another blow at her. She heard him scream. He was defenseless. She struck him in the face, and when he was on the floor, she took him by the air and put her sword on his neck.

“Where is Euron?!” she yelled. She got no answer. Reminding herself this man couldn’t speak, she slit his throat.

“Yara!”

Looking on her right, she saw that Qarl was in difficulty. She ran to him just in time to pierce his opponent, about to cut him in two, right through the heart. The man fell on the ground with a thump, drowned in the sounds of chaos all around them.

“You owe me a second fuck for that,” she told Qarl, and then they were laughing and going back into battle.

Yara fought like a fury. She knew her father would be proud to see her like that. She always wanted him to be proud of her, and here she was, bathing in the blood of dead opponents in the middle of the sea. If only Theon was there. They could have fought together for what was rightfully theirs. She fought on all decks, on the bridge, in the holds. She killed many men. Not all of them were Ironborn. Some had black skin, as dark as the night that surrounded them before the battle began. However, she didn’t find Euron. When she saw that the battle was almost over, she headed for the captain’s cabin, hoping to find Euron there. She only found a woman with very short hair as dark as her own skin, half naked. Just like the rest of the crew, she could tell nothing to Yara. She was no threat, so Yara let her live. She went through all the ship, finding no trace of Euron. When she emerged on the upper deck again, she saw Qarl holding his arm, blood coming out from it.

“Where is Euron? Did you see him?” she asked.

“No. I didn’t see him.”

Paying no kind to Qarl’s injuries, since they didn’t seem very severe, she proceeded to help her men kill the last of the crew still fighting. Whoever she asked, none of them could tell that they saw Euron. This made no sense. Had her uncle escaped? Something told her it wasn’t that, but she feared the alternative. Yara would never be able to abandon the _Black Wind_. Did Euron feel any different about the _Silence_? Looking around her at the sea, she saw the two fleets engaged into a big battle. There was no evident sign of who would come out as the victor. Fire was everywhere. All ships were ablaze. She should go back to her ship and help her men and her allies. A much as she could despise greenlanders, they made an alliance, and she would respect this alliance and fight alongside them.

Looking at Oldtown before she moved back to the _Black Wind_, Yara realized something terrifying. They were fighting at the entry of the Honeywine. They were supposed to destroy Euron’s fleet as much as to defend the city of Oldtown against an attack by sea. Euron’s ships were not supposed to get through the mouth of the Honeywine and to approach the city docks. They had failed. There were ships in the river, Euron’s ships. What other ships could have started fires on both sides of the river? Oldtown was going to burn.

Chapter End Notes

In the books, Rodrik Harlaw is the character I like the most among the Ironborn, and Yara comes second. I hope that I wrote her well enough.

Although I have a fair knowledge of battles and wars in the Antiquity and medieval times, I cannot claim to know much about battles in the sea, so I focused on the engagement between the flagships instead of showing in detail the general movements of the fleets, which could have been too much unrealistic, considering my limited knowledge.

Next chapter : Battle of Oldtown, part 2
The full moon bathed the camp in her white light. Doreah once told her the moon was an egg, and that once there were two moons, but one wandered too close to the sun and opened from the heat. Dragons poured from it and drank the sun’s fire. Irri and Jhiqui had laughed at her, claiming the moon was a goddess, the wife of the sun.

Daenerys had never truly believed in any god. She knew her family worshipped the Seven and Viserys talked to her about them, but she never prayed to them and, considering how very few Viserys actually knew, she couldn’t claim to quite know the religion of her country. She knew a little more about R’hllor, but not much. Daenerys spent her life without faith. The only thing in which she ever believed was herself. After her brother sold her like a horse to Drogo, she could only rely on herself. She was always alone. Every time she got close to someone, it was to lose him, or to discover he betrayed her. The only thing she had and that no one could take away from her were her dragons. They were the only children she would ever have. She hatched their eggs, fed them at her breast from the moment they came into the world, protected them against every danger they could face.

“We shouldn’t be here.” Jorah’s voice behind get her out of her thoughts. She slowly turned away from the moon and faced the inside of her command tent, where Jorah and Revan were arguing over a map of the Reach.

“I disagree, Ser Jorah the Andal.”

“Just because you saw a great city with a tower taller than everything that was ever built by man burn in your fires doesn’t mean it will happen, or that it will happen now.”

“The Lord of Light gave me this vision for a reason. The fire was coming from the sea, and the sea was on fire too.”

“I can’t see the future in the flames,” Jorah said, staring straight at the Red Priest’s masked face, “but I do know this is a mistake to go in the Reach with an army of Dothrakis.”

“The Dothrakis are the only ones who could travel fast enough to reach Oldtown before it was destroyed.”

“You seem to have forgotten the village the Dothrakis burned near Brightwater Keep. And the women they raped on our way down here.”

“There are hundreds of thousand people in Oldtown. The destruction of a village and a few women raped is a small price compared to saving an entire city. Thousands of men are worth more than a hundred.”
“The Dothrakis committed crimes against the inhabitants of the Reach. They angered our allies.”

“As did the Lannisters and the Starks in the Riverlands during the War of the Five Kings, and as did the Ironborn in the North and here in the Reach, but at a much larger scale.”

“Perhaps, but they did this against enemies, not against friends and allies.”

The opposing ideas behind each man’s position were visible, and their confrontation was getting dangerous. Daenerys was beginning to fear they would draw their swords. “Enough! I won’t have you kill each other when I need you both. You are my advisors and you will show each other the respect you deserve.”

They both bowed before her as a way to apologize. Daenerys was quite conscious that the Dothrakis were unruly and difficult to control. Despite her best attempts, they wouldn’t change their ways, not entirely. The ravages they left behind them in the Stormlands were barely contained by Jorah and Trystane Martell. When Daenerys took command of them, just before they entered the territories of the Reach, she made it clear that she wouldn’t tolerate rapes, murders and plunder. Even then, that wasn’t enough. Daenerys remembered only too well the destruction of the Lhazareen cities by Drogo years ago. The Dothrakis were all blood of her blood now, but it couldn’t relent them from following their way of life. At first, they remained quiet. Their ties to her forced them to show restraint as they progressed through the Reach, but when they approached Brightwater Keep, they destroyed and plundered an entire village. Daenerys had gone to see the smoking ruins and was horrified by what she saw there. The small sept was utterly smashed down, the idols of the Seven stolen. There were fresh bodies, some still burning, everywhere in the streets. It wasn’t difficult for her to find out the Dothrakis who did this. They brought back with them the spoils of their plunder, and some had girls into their tents and other people they claimed as slaves. She freed them all and had Drogon burn the Dothrakis responsible for this.

Daenerys knew she was taking a dangerous path. The Dothrakis lived for war, battle, destruction and rape. Revan advised her to only bring Dothrakis with her as they marched on Oldtown, since they travelled quicker than the Unsullied and the Dornish, but she wondered if it had been the best choice. She should have released them on the Crownlands and Cersei’s armies instead. She could stop a rebellion among the Dothrakis by promising them great battles and victories in the near future, but she feared that she was only postponing the inevitable. The Dothrakis were too difficult to keep in check.

“Your Grace, if I may, I think we should leave the Reach behind us and march on King’s Landing. Grey Worm and Prince Trystane are telling us that they can’t get through the Blackwater River. They need our help,” Jorah said.

“We are only a few hours from Oldtown. It would be stupid to retreat when we are so close to our destination,” the Red Priest countered.

“This operation in the Reach is a waste of time.”

“It’s not,” Revan declared with the same assurance he always displayed. You could perceive it in his voice, without the need of seeing the expression on his face.

“The Tyrells have enough men to face the Ironborn on their own, especially with Lady Greyjoy’s ships who joined theirs. Euron Greyjoy is not the real threat. Jon Snow is the real threat. He claims to be Lord of the Seven Kingdoms, even to be a Targaryen, and unlike Cersei Lannister, he has powerful allies and a powerful army behind him. He’s the one we should worry about.”

“Oldtown will not hold without the queen and her dragons. We received the fealty of the Tyrells because they believed not only that Daenerys Stormborn would avenge their son and keep their daughter alive, but also because she promised to help them against the Ironborn. She will break this promise if she stands aside while Euron Greyjoy sacks their city."

“The Tyrells will do what they believe to be in their interest. We don’t need to save them from the Greyjoys. They know they cannot defeat the queen, and we have Lady Margaery in hostage. They won’t dare anything against her.”

Revan leaned over the map to look at Jorah straight into his eyes. “We don’t want the Tyrells to be kneelers who bow before our queen simply because she has dragons and a powerful army. We don’t want them to fear her. We want them to fear her and to love her at the same time. We want them to be willing allies. If we save them from the Ironborn, they will a debt towards us, and we will prove that they have all the reasons to be our allies when they see the queen is protecting them. They will be loyal not only because they could be destroyed if they rebel against the queen, but also because the queen comes to their help when they need it. We will need the Tyrells in the Great War. It is coming, and we cannot run away from it. When the time comes, we will need all of Westeros behind our queen, including the Tyrells.”

“I know nothing about this Great War you’re talking about. What matters is the actual war, and our expedition here is delaying the fall of King’s Landing and giving more time to the Starks and the Lannisters to prepare.”

Daenerys decided this was enough. “Ser Jorah, there are hundreds of thousand of people in Oldtown, and I promised to the Tyrells that I would help them against the Ironborn. I will not sentence all these people in the city to death to get the Iron Throne sooner. I will sit on the Iron Throne and I will have the crown I came for, but not today.”

What kind of queen would she be if she couldn’t defend her own people, or if she didn’t want to?
She would defeat Euron Greyjoy and stop his ravaging over the Seven Kingdoms, then she would turn her armies against Cersei Lannister, and finally against this Jon Snow. She didn’t know if the visions in the fire that Revan, Kinvara and all the Red Priests had were true, but since Euron Greyjoy sacked Lannsport, it was logical that his next target would be Oldtown. He already took the Shield Islands and raided the nearby coasts. He even defeated the Redwyne fleet in battle. She couldn’t allow such a man to kill her people behind her back while she sat on her father’s throne.

“As you wish, your Grace,” Jorah said.

“We live to serve the Mother of Dragons,” Revan added.

“Now, I want you to sleep. Tomorrow, we will arrive at Oldtown.” The Red Priest left on her word, hands crossed behind his back, but Jorah lingered behind. “Is there something else, Ser Jorah?”

“Khaleesi, I don’t believe this is wise to trust the Red Priests,” he said, concerned.

“They helped us in Meereen.”

“Stannis Baratheon had a Red Priestess among his advisors, and look at what happened to him.”

“I am not Stannis Baratheon. I do not believe in visions in the flames, and I do not follow the Red Priests. They are the ones following me.”

“They are dangerous, your Grace. They want to spread their beliefs through all the Seven Kingdoms.
They are not loved by the Faith, nor they are by the followers of the Drowned God, and the people in my countryland will never follow the Lord of Light. The faith in the Old Gods is powerful in the North. You will need the support of the people and the religious authorities on your side if you ever hope to rule the Seven Kingdoms. You won’t have it if you have Red Priests following you everywhere.”

Daenerys stepped forward and looked directly into the knight’s eyes to make what she said clear. “I will not dismiss people who served me loyally because they have different beliefs than the people of this country. Everyone is free to practice the religion of their choice and I will not break this rule with anyone, no matter their faith.”

“Khaleesi, please…”

“Ser Jorah, I thank you for your counsel. You’re dismissed.”

“Your Grace.” He left, a grim expression on his face. He didn’t approve. Daenerys listened to her advisors, but she was the one to decide in the end. It wasn’t to Jorah, to Varys, to Kinvara, to Revan, to Trystane or to anyone else to take the decisions in her stead.

She should have to get some sleep just like she ordered her men, but she chose to visit her children before that. She travelled through the camp, the moon illuminating her and everything around. Four Dothrakis among those who were the most loyal followed her. She hoped she was wrong, but after forbidding them to kill, rape and steal as they wished, she suspected that some Dothraki or another could try to kill her.

When she arrived near the place where Drogon, Rhaegal and Viserion slept, she found Revan sitting before a campfire, his hands over the flames, muttering something.

“I told you to get some sleep,” she told him.

“I don’t need much rest, your Grace. The Lord of Light provides us with much of what we need. Red Priests often spend most of their nights praying.”

“Couldn’t you do that in your own tent?”

“I could, but I would rather pray with the dragons near me. They are fire made flesh, a gift from our Lord. A gift he made to you, his Chosen One.”

Daenerys was glad of the help the Red Priests provided, but she was growing tired to being called the Lord’s Chosen One or Azor Ahai reborn or the Prince That Was Promised.

“I suggest you do not try to convert the Dothrakis to your faith. They don’t hold the Lord of Light in high regard,” she said.

“I won’t. I’m not here to force people to believe in the Lord of Light. I’m here to convince them to follow the one he chose. If they refuse to serve him, the Lord of Light will deal with them himself.”

Before she could reply to this, a rider came. He spoke to her in Dothraki. “A man in iron suit just arrived. He says he came from the stone city and that he wants to see the Khaleesi.”

A messenger from Oldtown? “Show me to him.”

When she entered her command tent, he was there, panting and exhausted. Revan had followed her and the Dothraki captains were there as well. He fell to his knees before her.

“Your Grace, you have to help us. The Ironmen are attacking us.”
“They’re attacking you? Right now?”

“Yes, your Grace. They came in the thousands. More ships than we ever saw. They set fire to the city on both sides of the Honeywine. They attacked our fleet. They landed legions of men on the mainland. When I left they were beginning to scale the walls.” He looked at her with pleading eyes. “We need your help. We won’t stand for long.”

Daenerys looked at Revan. His mask prevented her from seeing the expression of his face. He didn’t move and gave away nothing of his true feelings. He said the Ironmen would launch an attack against Oldtown, and that the city would burn, and he was right. It was happening right now, as they spoke. There were about three hundred thousand people in this city, and her army was only a few miles away from them. They had no time to lose. She gazed at all her commanders.

“Assemble my khalassar. Ride to the stony city as quickly as you can. Kill every man from the wooden horses on the black salt sea and have no pity for them.”

The Dothraki commanders left, obviously eager to fight. She went to see Ser Jorah, but their paths crossed not long after she left her tent.

“Khaleesi, what’s going on?”

“Oldtown is under attack. Yara Greyjoy and the Redwynes may be in difficulty. I’m heading right now to help them. I want you to lead the Dothrakis in their attack against the Ironborn on the mainland.”

“What about the ships, your Grace?”

“I’ll take care of Euron’s fleet myself.”

A flash of understanding passed through his eyes. “Khaleesi, this is too dangerous. One arrow at the right place and you could die.”

“I won’t stand by while my men are fighting. Lead the khalassar against the Ironmen. I’ll make sure Euron’s fleet no longer poses a threat.”

On that, she walked away. The Dothrakis were leaving their tents and climbing on their horses all around. They were always ready for battle. When Daenerys reached her dragons, they were awake and agitated. They felt something was going on. Daenerys lost no time and climbed on Drogon’s back.

“Valahd.”

Her dragon rose from the ground and flew to the horizon. She looked behind and saw Rhaegal and Viserion following. The Dothrakis were leaving their tents and climbing on their horses all around. They were always ready for battle. When Daenerys reached her dragons, they were awake and agitated. They felt something was going on. Daenerys lost no time and climbed on Drogon’s back.

Her dragon rose from the ground and flew to the horizon. She looked behind and saw Rhaegal and Viserion following. The Dothrakis were already moving forward. As soon as she was high enough in the air, Daenerys could distinguish the city of Oldtown, and she immediately saw the red streaks that proved that at least a part of the city was burning. As she neared the city, she saw other streaks of red, this time on the sea. There was a battle of ships going on. The force of the Iron Islands was in its ships. If she could destroy Euron’s armada…

She ordered Drogon to fly forward. There was a large band of ships fighting against each other ahead of her. Many were burning. She couldn’t attack at this place. She risked to destroy friendly ships by throwing fire on the enemy. Things had been easier in Meereen. All the ships in the bay were her enemies. She only had to throw fire over the ones she wanted. She noticed great spans of fire along the Honeywine. The Hightower was on an island in the middle of this river, but on both sides, the fire was spreading. It seemed the fire originated from there. She saw ships on the river throwing flaming projectiles on the city. Houses, taverns, shops and markets were set aflame, all full of innocent people. How many children were there among the districts burning? She hadn’t allowed her children to burn babies in Meereen. She wouldn’t let the Ironborn do it here.

Daenerys forced Drogon to turn left down, diverting from the initial trajectory directed to Euron’s fleet to head against the ships burning Oldtown. The shape of the ships grew, and they were close enough…

“How?”

Drogon released a hell of fire on the ship as he made a pass over it. When she looked behind, she saw its sails, its decks and its people burning. She could discern the movements of the crew as they tried to quench the fire eating their flesh. Rhaegal sent another wave of fire on the ship his brother just attacked, while Viserion targeted another vessel. They made several passes, each time transforming a wooden horse into a burning shell that would soon drown into the river. Daenerys thought there were about twenty ships in this river, the others fighting at the mouth or farther. She burned them all, even those who tried to escape. They had nowhere to go. You couldn’t escape the wrath of the dragon.

Daenerys made her dragons fly higher. The fire had spread deeper into the city. She couldn’t stop it. Her dragons could start a fire, but not extinguish it. She watched over the city, and saw lights outside the battlements. It was the Ironborn attacking the city. There were torches running in the streets below. She ordered Drogon to throw fire in the air, only to illuminate the scene. When he did, she saw that people were fighting. Euron’s men already succeeded in scaling the battlements. There was only one thing to do.

She positioned her three dragons to follow the battlements and went down again. When the time was right, they all unleashed their fire on the battlements of Oldtown. She couldn’t stop the men who already made their way into the city, but she could stop others from going in. Fire burned flesh and wood. The men were cooked alive in their armors, the ladders were ablaze, the rams destroyed. The gates were surrounded by so much fire that they couldn’t be crossed. Fire didn’t burn stone, but it could heat it enough and surround it with enough fire to make it impossible to get through.

As she kept bathing the battlements with dragonfire, Daenerys heard a familiar sound. She heard the same when they captured her after she fled from Meereen, and when Drogo led them into battle. Her khalassar had arrived. At their head, she noticed a man with a flaming sword. She had her dragons turn around and go to the shore. The Ironmen left small boats in number there. That was how they arrived. Daenerys headed in their direction and threw fire over the floating devices. These men had come this way, but they wouldn’t go back, unless they could swim to their ships. Daenerys watched the head of the Dothraki army collide with the Ironmen. They wouldn’t need her help. She turned her attention to the ships.

In Meereen, the sun was high when she launched her counter-attack against the masters’ ships. At night, she couldn’t discern the symbols on the ships. She couldn’t tell which ones were enemies and which were allies. However, she knew for a certainty that Euron’s ships had come from the north. Some were still away from the main battle. She chose them for her targets.

The minutes that followed were a slaughter. Ships burned, men jumped into the sea to save themselves from the fire devouring their vessels. Daenerys felt something similar to how she felt during the battle at Dragonstone, but stronger. She felt as if she was a dragon herself. She burned everything that presented itself before her. Her enemies were dying by the thousands. She was saving a city, just like she did back in Meereen. Sometimes, she looked at the battle on the mainland. In the dark, it was difficult to see who had the upper hand, but she doubted that her Dothrakis would let the Ironmen outmatch them.

She heard a terrible shriek on her right. She looked and saw nothing for a moment, then she noticed a massive form falling from the skies. From his size, it could only be Viserion. Rhaegal was still flying, not far from him. He kept falling, his wings flapping in a desperate attempt to gain attitude again or to stop his fall. No, that couldn’t be.

She ordered Drogon to head down, to save the smallest of her children. Nothing else mattered anymore now. Viserion was about to touch the water. If he fell under it, he could never come up again. Dragons couldn’t survive water, or so she thought. She wasn’t willing to risk the experience to discover it.

Drogon was almost at the level of the water, preparing to receive Viserion on his back to prevent him from drowning, when at the last moment, his brother deployed his wings and managed to stop his fall. He released a powerful scream, not one of pain this time but of hatred, and headed to a ship that he burned from the head to the stern. He was safe. Her dragon was safe. For a moment, Daenerys let relief fill her and forgot the battle going on around her. She was reminded of it by a flock of arrows.

She wasn’t high enough. Drogon’s wings were only a few feet over the water. They were an easy target. She gained back altitude, until she thought she was safe enough. Rhaegal and Viserion joined her at this moment. All her three dragons were flying in a triangular formation. She looked at the battle below her again. She noticed that on the mainland, the fights were getting closer to the shore. The Ironmen were being beaten back into the sea. Many ships were in fire, but some were not. The battle over the sea wasn’t over. On the other side, in the south, all ships were engaged, but some were not on the northern side of the sea. She attacked them.

The crews of these ships tried to shoot her and her dragons down with arrows and scorpions. Daenerys made sure they never got a clear shot at her and always kept Drogon moving. Ships kept burning as arrows and bolts missed Drogon, Rhaegal and Viserion. More were ablaze than intact soon, and after some time, she saw a first attempting to escape. A second one followed, then a third, and soon many of Euron’s ships were trying to sail away. Daenerys didn’t let them that chance. Her dragons burned most of them as well. The Ironborn had to understand what were the consequences of reaving, roving, raiding and raping the Seven Kingdoms.

She saw more of Euron’s ships trying to escape, but she realized that she couldn’t know for sure if they were Euron’s or Yara’s ships chasing them now. She looked at the mainland and judged that the battle in front of the battlements was almost over. She noticed that Viserion’s right wing wasn’t moving as it usually did, and that he had a huge bolt, probably fired from a scorpion, near it in the belly.

Daenerys landed not far away from her men, but far enough from the battle to take a look at Viserion’s injury. When he landed next to Drogon, she saw that the bolt was still deep into his flesh. She pulled it as strongly as she could, earning several screams of pain, but she succeeded. The bolt dislodged from the scales. She couldn’t be sure of how serious the injury was. Right when she was about to look closer, one of her Dothraki captains arrived.

“Great Khaleesi, the men in iron suits are running like wailing women. Jorah the Andal and the man in red have gone inside the stony city with a few of us to kill the rest.”

Dothrakis inside Oldtown. Daenerys wasn’t sure whether this was good or bad news, but she supposed this had to happen. Would Jorah and Revan be able to control them? There was only one way to find out.

“Yes, Khaleesi.”

Daenerys ordered Viserion to stay on the ground to recover from his wounds, then she climbed back on Drogon and flew with him and Rhaegal over the city. She brought Drogon to a lower altitude. His great shape threw a long shadow over the city, even in the dark of the night. She tried to find the enemies, but it was too difficult to discern them from the friends. Something caught her attention however. She saw a flame, an isolated flame, but it wasn’t a torch, or the beginning of a fire. It was a sword. The man who wielded it was fighting on the steps of a huge sept. Daenerys made Drogon land on the roof of the sept. Daenerys didn’t recognize the man he was fighting, but his opponent was large, almost the size of a bull, with a helm in the shape of a kraken, with a gigantic axe between his hands. The flaming sword and the axe danced together, colliding again and again. The man with the axe tried to use his size to bring down his opponent, but the man with the flaming sword was quicker. The Ironborn brought his axe down fiercely. The flaming sword ducked, then with a swift move, cut the head of the bigger man. In my experience, large men do triumph over smaller men far more often than not. Hizdahr zo Loraq was wrong.

Drogon and Rhaegal released a powerful scream at this moment, and all the men fighting on the steps turned to her. They stopped to fight exactly at the same time, Dothraki and Ironman. Revan got on his knees immediately, his flaming sword still shining in his hands. The Dothrakis followed his example. After some hesitation, the Ironmen did the same.

When the morning came, the situation was more or less under control. Euron Greyjoy’s ships were all taken or destroyed, or they escaped to the Iron Islands. The fires in the city were contained, though the City Watch was still fighting them with the help of her men. They had gathered in the solar of Lord Leyton Hightower. Lord Leyton was there along with his son and his grandson, Lord Paxter Redwyne, Yara Greyjoy, her uncle Lord Rodrik Harlaw, two Dothraki commanders, Revan and Daenerys. She asked for Jorah to come at this meeting, but he was late. They began without him.

“Your Grace.” Lord Hightower bowed to her, remaining in his chair. Judging from his cane, Daenerys suspected that standing up could be a struggle for him. “In the name of the people of Oldtown and of my own house, I want to thank you for your help. Oldtown would have been lost without you.”

“Thank you, my lord. You’re welcome,” Daenerys replied.

“We are forever in your debt, your Grace. However, I must admit that we would rather see the Dothrakis and the Ironmen leave our city as quickly as possible. Their presence makes our people feel… unsafe.”

“The Dothrakis and Queen Yara’s men helped to defend your city, and right now they’re helping your men to stop the fires devouring your streets. They will leave when I see fit.”

“Of course, your Grace.” He eyed worriedly, with a hint of hatred, the Ironmen and the Dothraki commanders.

“Now, to the matters at hand. Did you manage to find Euron Greyjoy and his body?”

“No. There’s no trace of him,” Yara Greyjoy answered.

“Our men are leading researches. They will find his body,” Ser Baelor, Lord Leyton’s heir, assured.

“I wouldn’t bet on that. Euron lured us into a trap. He wanted us to attack the Silence while he attacked Oldtown. He planned all this. As long as I don’t see his dead body, he is a living threat.”
“He could have been on any ship in his armada, or on the mainland when his men assaulted the battlements. We can’t know for sure,” Lord Harlaw stated. “Some are saying they saw him on one of his ships, others say that he led the assault on the battlements. There were even some who claimed they killed him.”

“Keep searching him,” Daenerys ordered. “In the meantime, Lord Hightower, your men are to follow me to King’s Landing. Even if Euron Greyjoy is alive, his armies were almost destroyed. They can’t pose a real threat to the Reach anymore. Queen Yara and Lord Redwyne will take care of the enemy’s remnants and free the Shield Islands before they set sail to the Iron Islands and put an end to Euron’s rebellion against the Iron Throne. The armies of the Reach are to gather at Highgarden, and then to join my Unsullied and our Dornish allies on the Blackwater.”

“Your Grace, you want me to help an Ironborn to declare herself Queen of the Iron Islands?” Lord Paxter asked, unbelieving and revolted.

“Queen Yara will respect the integrity of the Seven Kingdoms. By assisting her into taking the Seastone Chair, you are protecting your lands. Yara, how much time do you expect it will take to reconquer all the Iron Islands.”

“Depends. We lost many ships in that battle, and many are heavily damaged,” the Queen of the Iron Islands carefully answered.

“Euron might still have a few tricks for us,” Rodrik Harlaw added. “He had many allies in the Iron Islands, and the Kingsmoot chose him. There will be resistance. I suggest we proceed with caution.”

“Lord Hightower, Lord Redwyne.” Daenerys turned back the conversation towards the lords of the Reach. “Winter has arrived. There are several kingdoms who are unprepared to face it. I’ll need you to send supplies to King’s Landing as soon as it is taken to prevent people from dying of starvation.”

“Which kingdoms are we talking about, your Grace?” Lord Leyton’s grandson asked.

“The Crownlands, the Riverlands, the Westerlands, and the North. These kingdoms suffered through the recent wars. If we don’t want hundreds of thousand people to die, we’ll need to feed them.”

“We would feed our enemies? We would feed people we are fighting against?”

“Altos, be careful!” his father told him.

“You are Ser Altos Hightower, aren’t you?” Daenerys asked the young man.

“First son of Ser Baelor Hightower, your Grace, and second in line in inheritance to the Hightower.”

Daenerys looked straight at him. “The people of these kingdoms didn’t choose who would rule them. They didn’t choose the wars and the fights they had to endure for the last years. They didn’t ask for the Lannisters and the Starks to burn their fields and kill their children. They had to support this war, a war that was the choice of someone else. I will not let them die because a few lords decided to turn their lands into a battlefield and because their lives meant nothing to them. I didn’t come to be like those who preceded me. I came to save my people, and I will save them. If your family refuses, then you are disobeying an order from your queen. I suppose you are familiar with the sentence for treason, Ser Altos?”

His face turned blank. “You can count on our support, your Grace. We will do as you wish,” Lord Hightower quickly said.

“Good. Now, Lord Hightower, how many men can you provide for our assault on King’s Landing?”
Before Lord Leyton could answer, the door opened. She looked at it to see Jorah enter with two men in maester’s robes. One was fat and playing with his fingers, looking afraid as they approached, while the other was black of skin and slender with curly black hair.

“You’re late,” she told him, not without reproach.

“I apologize, your Grace, but I had business in town,” he replied.

“Who are these people?”

“This is Samwell Tarly, your Grace.” He indicated the fat young man between him and the black one. “He is the brother of Dickon Tarly, the Lord of Horn Hill. He is a student at the Citadel and a member of the Night’s Watch.”

She looked at him. “You are Lord Tarly’s brother?” she asked. He nodded. “I met your brother. You don’t look very much like him.”

“If I had, my father may not have sent me to the Wall.” Samwell Tarly spoke with nervosity.

“I know what happened to your father in King’s Landing. I’m sorry for your loss.”

“Ah, thank you.” He almost sounded surprised that she offered him her condolences. “But I’m glad that my brother is still alive.”

“Why are you here?”

He seemed to hesitate. Jorah looked at him. “Tell her,” he told the boy. He really was nothing like his brother.

“I… We saw Euron Greyjoy. Alleras and I. We saw him.”

“Where? When?” Yara asked immediately, her attention drawn to the conversation by this new development.

“At the Citadel. He was with some of his men. They… He stole a horn I brought with me from the Wall, and a book, and he escaped.”

“But not before I shot an arrow in his leg with my bow.” The other novice stepped forward and offered his hand to Daenerys. “It is a pleasure to meet you, your Grace. People call me Alleras, but my real name is Sarella Sand. You may have met some of my sisters. Obara and Nymeria are with my father’s army, and Tyene brought Lady Margaery Tyrell to Storm’s End.”

Daenerys was first surprised and somewhat shocked by his brazen behaviour, but then she realized it was her brazen behaviour. She knew immediately who she was. Trystane told her he had a cousin in Oldtown.

Her smile widened. “Glad to meet you, your Grace.”

Everything was silent for a moment. Daenerys didn’t take the offered hand. After a moment, Ser Baelor reacted. “She’s a woman?”

“You’re very observant,” Yara commented sarcastically.

“Alleras… but… I don’t understand,” Samwell Tarly spluttered. She turned to look at him over her shoulder, a satisfied smile on her lips.

“I got you, didn’t I? The Citadel doesn’t accept women. It was the only way for me to get inside.”

“And the Citadel is refusing women for good reasons,” Lord Hightower declared. “You broke a sacred rule of this institution. You sullied the order of the maesters with what you did. You could be executed for this.”

“She won’t be.” Daenerys faced the Lord of the Hightower. “Lady Sarella Sand is the niece of Doran Martell, the daughter of his brother Oberyn. The Martells are our allies. I will not have you execute a woman only because she did something you consider is only fitting for men. If I followed your thoughts, Lord Hightower, I would never have come to Westeros to claim the Iron Throne and my dragons wouldn’t have been there to save your city, and Euron Greyjoy would be feasting in your halls as we speak.”

That made Lord Leyton shut his mouth, and caused Yara Greyjoy to smile in an accomplice way. Daenerys returned her attention on Sarella. “You said you shot an arrow on Euron Greyjoy. Did he die?”

“He may be dead then,” Yara Greyjoy said.

“I wouldn’t bet on it,” Lord Harlaw said, using his niece’s very words. “Euron may have found a way out. He disappeared for years and all we heard about him were rumors, until he came back to murder his own brother. He may still be alive.”

“Well, at least we know now where he was a few hours ago.” Daenerys then spoke to Sarella. “I thank you, Lady Sarella, for this information. I won’t hold you any longer.”

“Your Grace.” Ser Jorah spoke. “Please, there is something else.” He shot another look at Samwell Tarly, as if he needed to encourage him to speak. The boy did.

“Your Grace, there’s something about the horn Euron Greyjoy stole. This is a horn I found at the Fist of the First Men, north of the Wall, with a bag of dragonglass. The thing is…”

“According to some chronicles in the Citadel, this horn has the power to wake a kraken, if used in the right way,” Sarella Sand completed.

Daenerys looked at her. “A kraken?” Did she hear well?

“Yes, your Grace. And I verified. The book that Euron stole was a work about this very horn. It told how to use it to wake up the kraken.”

“If my uncle is trying this, then he’s really a fool. The kraken is a story to make the children afraid in the Iron Islands. My mother used to tell me those before I went to sleep when I was young,” Yara Greyjoy said.

“Euron is intelligent and cunning, and but he also displayed signs of madness ever since he came back,” Lord Rodrik began. “He cut the tongue of all his crew on the Silence, and many rumors reported he lost his mind during a storm, and that he even claimed afterwards that he was the storm. He may have come to believe that it is possible to wake a kraken. That would explain why he took his time before he attacked Oldtown. He made raids on the shores to attract the armies of the Reach far from the city and to disperse them, and then he attacked the city to steal that horn.”
“Well, he will have a good surprise when he realizes this is only a simple horn and that blowing it doesn’t bring him anything. I hope he’ll realize it before I kill him.”

“Your Grace, there is something more important.” This time, Samwell Tarly spoke without having Ser Jorah to encourage him. “I was sent to the Citadel by Jon Snow, when he was still Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. I was supposed to replace Master Aemon, who had died not long ago. But… there’s something you must know. When I went north of the Wall, when I found that horn, I was with the previous Lord Commander, Jeor Mormont, Ser Jorah’s father. We went at the Fist of the First Men to stop the wildlings who were marching on the Wall. But it wasn’t the wildlings we met out there. It was the dead.”

Daenerys frowned. “The dead?”

“Yes, your Grace. The dead. They almost killed us all. We were only three men to come back alive at Castle Black. And later, Jon Snow went to Hardhome to save the wildlings who gathered there.
The Night King attacked them, and the wights killed most of the men and women there. We could only save a few thousands.” He took a pause. “I saw one of them, your Grace. A White Walker.
Two, even. I even killed one of them.”

The room was in silence for a very long time, until it was ended by the laughing of the youngest Hightower. “White Walkers don’t exist. They are a tale to make children afraid at night, just like this kraken story.”

“You saw them?” Revan stepped forward, getting closer to the fat young man. “You really saw them?”

“Yes, I did,” Samwell Tarly said.

“And you really killed one of them?”

“Yes.”

Revan stared at him from foot to head. “You don’t look like a warrior. How did you do it?”

“With a dagger made of dragonglass.”

“Dragonglass? Obsidian?”

“Yes.” Samwell Tarly looked at her. “Your Grace, I found out that there is a large deposit of dragonglass on Dragonstone. If you could send some of it in the North, it might save Westeros.”

“I think we heard enough about fairy tales of dead men walking on the ice,” Yara interrupted. “We have more pressing matters to attend to.”

“These are not tales,” the young man protested. “I saw them. Jon Snow saw them as well, and the Lord Commander Mormont too…”

“That’s enough.” Daenerys put an end to this. “Escort Maester Samwell and Sarella Sand back to the Citadel.”

Samwell Tarly protested as he was being escorted out of the room. The discussion turned around dispositions to march on the capital. After this was over, Daenerys walked out and was shown to the rooms the Hightowers prepared for her. She just stepped inside when Ser Jorah came in and closed the door behind them.
“Your Grace, may I have a word?”

“You may.”

“I think we should take Samwell Tarly’s word more seriously.”

Daenerys frowned. His expression was deadly serious. He wasn’t joking. “You believe him?”

The knight sighed. “Your Grace, my father died north of the Wall. He was Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, and this man claims that a dead man tried to murder him in his sleep. My father went north of the Wall for this reason, to face this enemy, and he got killed for that. In the North, everyone knows about these stories concerning the White Walkers and when they last came. These are not only stories. The dead haven’t been seen in thousands of years, but what’s telling us that they’re not back?”

Daenerys studied him closely. That was no jest, for sure. Kinvara talked to her about these ice demons, but she was a priestess, following a religion who claimed the Great Other had servants on this earth. Ser Jorah, however, wasn’t a religious man. He didn’t believe things only because they were written in books or said by a priest. He was the one to make her understand that the people of Westeros were not waiting for her return, like Illyrio Mopatis made Viserys believe. Could there be some truth in what he said?

“You truly believe this is a real threat?” she asked him.

“I know one thing. My father wouldn’t have gone so far north of the Wall if the wildlings were the only danger.”

His father died north of the Wall. Daenerys was aware of the shame the knight from Bear Island felt, and how his family resented him. His father was gone, and he would never see him again. He lost him, and he was trying to find a reason to his father’s death.

“I will think about it,” she finally said, making no promise.

“Your Grace.”

After Ser Jorah was gone, Daenerys took a look at the city from the balcony. Half of it was still burning or had already burned. She spared the lives of the Ironmen who knelt before her at the Starry Sept after Revan defeated their commander, but she had no pity for the others. Every Ironborn who was found inside the walls of the city and who fought for Euron would be killed on the spot. Those who were taken on the sea were left to their queen, Yara Greyjoy. As for those found outside the city on the mainland, the lords of the Reach would take care of them. Daenerys would show no mercy to those who sacked and burned Oldtown. They slaughtered innocent people, women and children, unharmed people. Those on the sea fought against soldiers, so she would allow Yara to welcome them back if she wanted, but there would be no mercy for the others.

The Starry Sept was miraculously spared, though the same couldn’t be said about the Citadel. Whole buildings were destroyed. All that only for a book and a horn. If Euron Greyjoy was still alive somewhere, Daenerys would make him pay if she ever found him, and if Yara was the one to find him, then she had no doubt he would die quickly.

Daenerys thought about something one of her advisors told her back in Meereen. I wonder how she is. There was something she could do for him. She left her rooms and looked for the first person whose path she would cross. She quickly fell upon a young woman with brown hair, wearing pearls around her neck.
“Your Grace.” She quickly curtsied before she resumed her path.

“Wait.” Daenerys stopped her before she could go farther. “I was wondering if you could help me.”

“What can I do?”

“I’m looking for a young woman. Her uncle is advising me. His name is Malcolm Branfield. He told me that she was recently married to a member of House Hightower.”

The young woman frowned. “Branfield?”

“Yes. The wedding may have taken place about a year ago, or something like that. I don’t remember her name, but I know she came from the North. Surely you know who I’m talking about.” There weren’t many Northerners here. Ser Jorah didn’t go unnoticed, and Daenerys doubted that a northern lady would go unnoticed in such a place. She and Ser Jorah both married a Hightower.

“Well, that must be Mira. She is my sister.”

“Your sister?”

“By marriage. She is married to my brother. She told me that her mother was from House Branfield.”

It had to be her then. “Could you tell me where I can find her?”

“I’m afraid you would have a long way to make.”

“Why do you say that?”

“Mira left several months ago with my brother. They went in the North when the Lannisters invaded it to depose the Boltons. Last we heard from her, she was back at her home, at Ironrath.”

So, Malcolm’s niece was in the North. She would have to tell him when they saw each other again. She knew he desperately wanted news of his niece. “Thank you, Lady…”

“Elys. Elys Hightower, your Grace. May I ask something from you?”

“Go on.”

“Mira and my brother Gerold left Oldtown when the Lannisters invaded the North. They helped them to fight the Boltons. Mira’s home, Ironrath, had been taken by another family who was loyal to House Bolton. My brother and his wife joined the Lannisters with a small army to take back Ironrath. However, I’m unsure about their situation right now. We sent a raven to Gerold to tell him to come back, but I’m not sure if he will make it, and they are surrounded by lords loyal to Jon Snow.”

She was worried. “I will defend them, if that’s what you want.”

“It may be more complicated than that. Mira was born in the North. It’s possible that she decides to support Jon Snow. Her brother is now Lord of Ironrath and their family was sworn to Winterfell for generations. But my brother loves her. Could you try to make sure she’s not killed? She’s not the Lady of Ironrath, anyway. It wouldn’t be vital for her to bend the knee before you in the name of her family, and anyway she’s a Hightower now.”

Daenerys thought about this for a time. “I didn’t come here to kill everyone. So far, your family was loyal, and I have no intention to kill innocent people. I won’t kill your sister-in-law unless she is threat to me.”
“She won’t be.”

Truth be told, Daenerys had no wish to kill any Forrester. Malcolm Branfield was a loyal servant for her, and Asher Forrester helped her to free the people of Meereen. However, if the Forresters fought against her, she couldn’t guarantee that none of them would die. However, Asher’s sister would certainly not be on the battlefield, so she wouldn’t die there. She would give a chance to every lord in the North to bend the knee, but if they didn’t, she would have no choice but to kill them. Hopefully, it wouldn’t come to that.

Daenerys later went to see the efforts to extinguish the fires. There was still a lot of work to do. She also visited the Citadel, whose remaining buildings were transformed for the most part in improvised infirmaries. Many people suffered from serious burns all over their bodies. Others were missing arms or legs. The Silent Sisters did their best to gather the bodies in the streets. Men formed chains to bring water from the sea and the river to end the many fires. Despite the sorry state of the city, she found some solace in the fact that Dothrakis, Ironmen and Reachmen worked all together to save this city. They passed buckets of water to each other to stop the damages from getting worse.

At nightfall, she was satisfied enough with everything that was being done. The situation was much better in Oldtown than it had been in Meereen. She thought she could get a good night of sleep when she entered in her rooms, but as she closed the door, she realized a light was coming from the bedroom. She quietly walked into it, to find the Red Priest looking into flames made into a bowl, on a support.

“What are you doing here?” she asked him.

He didn’t answer immediately. The shades of light and shadows that danced on his masked face gave him a more threatening look than usual. When he finally spoke, it was in a dark voice, almost a whisper.

“There are those in my order who can see the future into the fire, but fail to interpret it appropriately. There are others who seldom see visions, but are very good to interpret them. Very few are good at both, even after years of practice. Kinvara is one of the few that I ever met who were capable of having visions and to give them the right interpretation at the same time on her own.” He sighed. “I was never good at either of them. When I have visions, they are of the past, my past. A past I tend to forget, since it happened so long ago.”

Daenerys listened to him in silence, an aura of mysticism surrounding the air. “What do you want?” she asked.

“Look into the flames, your Grace. Tell me what you see.”

She didn’t know why, but she felt compelled to do what he said. She stared into the flames, and for a long time she could see nothing. And then, she saw shapes taking form, black shapes. Snow was flying in the air. It reminded her of her visions in the House of the Undying. A great tempest raged. A great crowd was marching towards a castle she never saw. At the head was a man with blue eyes. Blue eyes as cold as winter. He wasn’t a man. Not anymore.

The vision stopped, and all Daenerys could see was fire, the fire burning right in front of her. “What did you see?” Revan asked.

“Snow. A great storm. And a man with blue eyes, and a mass of men walking behind him.”
The Red Priest breathed deeply. “Your Grace, do you know when the order of the Red Priests was created?”

“No.” She knew a few things about the faith in R’hllor, but she didn’t know all the details of the organization.

“My order is ancient, more ancient than all the civilizations you know. The Red Priests existed long before Aegon invaded Westeros, before the Valyrian Freehold dominated Essos, even before the Empire of Ghis. We were created about eight thousand years ago, when the Shivering Sea froze and the servants of the Great Other with their blue eyes and their undead men came for us. That was when Azor Ahai stood to defend the world of Essos, before any true military power could oppose the Long Night. He fought against the servants of the evil and their creatures, and he and his followers destroyed them. He lost everything in that fight, his friends, his family, the woman he loved. When the demons were repelled and the Shivering Sea turned back to water, he created the order of R’hllor. He was the first High Priest, and his followers were the Red Priests. He gave them the mission to protect the world from the servants of evil, and to be there when the Others would come back.”

He looked up to her. “The Wall was erected to protect your continent from those you call the White Walkers, and the Night’s Watch was given the duty to protect it. In Essos, we didn’t need a wall of ice to protect us from those we call the Others. The Shivering Sea is protecting us. But the Red Priests were left behind to remind everyone of this time, and to remind them that one day the enemy would come back. I don’t know how or when, but the servants of the Great Other are going to come for us, sooner or later. Every priest in Essos says the same. They all see it through their visions, and the High Priestess Kinvara sees them more clearly every passing day. And I know one thing: if they get through the Wall, if they take Westeros, then Essos will be next. The Shivering Sea will freeze just like in the ancient times, and every man, woman and child will die on both continents, and there will only be a few islands left, and perhaps Sothoryos, where human life will continue.”

Daenerys gazed at him. She couldn’t see the expression of his face, but she could feel how serious and preoccupied he was. “You believe Samwell Tarly when he says the dead are back?”

There was some hesitation. “We can never be sure of anything, your Grace. But if he’s right, then ignoring the threat could be a death sentence for everyone who lives in this country you want to rule.”

Was it true? Daenerys made dreams who became true. She could remember her visions in Qarth. She saw herself in the throne room in King’s Landing, with snow falling all around and the roof destroyed. She saw the Wall. She also saw Drogo and their child. Was it her future? Was she destined to go north to fight these ice demons with blue eyes? Was that the right thing to do? She came back with the biggest army ever assembled to take back what was hers, and to break the wheel. Could she abandon her dreams, everything she fought for years to achieve, to fight against White Walkers and dead men?

Revan turned his gaze into the fire. “Samwell Tarly said that Dragonstone sits on great amounts of obsidian, and that obsidian can destroy the dead. If that’s the case, then we need to mine it and turn it into weapons.”

“You want me to waste men to mine a stone I didn’t know I had only yesterday, when we have enemies everywhere?”

“You don’t need that many men to mine obsidian. Fire can kill these demons as well. A few hundred men should be able to extract enough obsidian to make a difference when the time to fight comes, and they can extract the mineral and send it to you by ship as soon as it is ready.”

“And what do we do with our enemies? Cersei Lannister? Euron Greyjoy? Jon Snow?” She couldn’t abandon her war against them, against the people who tried to usurp her throne.

“One way or another, all Westeros will have to stand behind you when the time comes. You already have three kingdoms at your side. Euron Greyjoy and Cersei Lannister will never accept you as their queen, nor will they accept to make an alliance with you against the Others, but their power is dwindling. They can be dealt with quite easily. As for Jon Snow, we will need his armies as much as we will need yours. Whether you defeat him and absorb his forces into yours, or you force him to bend the knee and fight with you. In all cases, we need the other kingdoms in order to defeat the servants of our Lord’s enemy.”

She looked into the flames. She saw something that wasn’t quite a man, with blue eyes as cold as ice. If he really was coming on the Wall, if Kinvara, Jorah, Samwell and Revan were right…

“We march on King’s Landing on the morrow.”

She declared that while a few hours ago she decided they would stay two days to rest and to give time to Lord Hightower to regroup his men. She would need to talk to her commanders and to Lord Leyton. And she would need to send ravens. Whatever threat was in the North, she would face it, and she would protect her kingdoms and the people who lived there.

Chapter End Notes

The massive Ironborn who fought Revan is a cameo of Victarion Greyjoy. I wasn't sure whether to include him in this fanfiction. He was never mentionned in the TV show, but his existence was never denied either. However, since he never claimed the throne of the Iron Islands in the TV series, if he was to exist, I would have to make him quite different from who he was in the books. So, to not make him disappear entirely, I introduced a cameo. And it gave me the occasion to show a duel between my favourite character from Star Wars and one of the best warriors among the Ironborn. :)

We got to see several characters together in this chapter : Daenerys, Yara, Rodrik Harlaw, Sam, Sarella, Gerold's brothers and father, Jorah, and I tried to make them act like they would have in this situation. I wanted to include a private discussion about White Walkers between Daenerys and Rodrik Harlaw, to show what an intellectual mind would think of them, but I decided to skip it, since we already had the discussions with Revan and Jorah. Too many discussions about one very subject in the same chapter would have been redundant.

I'm going to take a break. A short one this time, I reassure you. It will only last two weeks. I struggle to keep on with the updates lately. My regular readers may have noticed it. I need some time to reorganize myself after moving into a new city and a new job. I'll come back in two weeks, with better chapters I hope.

Next chapter : Kinvara
I am back. This chapter was written with the objective to know what was happening with the rest of Daenerys's forces while she was fighting the Ironborn in Oldtown, but it also contains several important conversations between Kinvara and other characters. Someone we haven't seen for a very long time makes a return in the story.

On the other side of the river, the forces loyal to the Mad Queen Cersei Lannister made sure no one could cross the river. Several banners that she couldn’t recognize stood tall, for everyone to see. When they tried to cross it with boats, a rain of arrows fell on the men. They destroyed all bridges on the Blackwater, and any attempt to build a new one was doomed from the beginning, and there were posts all along the river to stop them from crossing at any point. Even if a small detachment crossed far away from their camp, the enemy would spot them and send forces to plug the breach. They were stuck south of the river.

The Blackwater was the last real obstacle separating them from King’s Landing. Cersei Lannister convinced a few lords to fight for her by brandishing the fear of foreign invaders, mainly the Unsullied, the Dothrakis and the Red Priests. If only she knew how her assumption concerning the Red Priests was false. Not all of them came from Essos. Still, it was sufficient to convince a few frightened men and their lords to fight for this woman.

Kinvara couldn’t see it from the shore where she stood, but she knew that far away was King’s Landing, capital of the Seven Kingdoms. She never saw it with her own eyes, but she heard many things said about it, and her visions allowed her to see a few parts of the city. The Dragonpit. The Great Sept of Baelor. The Guildhall of the Alchemists. The Red Keep. This building came back very often in her visions. Once, she saw a beggar in the streets, right in front of the gate of the keep. When the lords, the ladies, the princes, the princesses, the kings and the queens went out, they didn’t see him. What mattered for them were their fine clothes, the gold in their chests, the exotic food from the other side of the world that they ate at dinner and the size of their retinue. They didn’t care for the people and their problems. They didn’t think it was their business, or that they were responsible for them. What was important to them was their gold, their silver and their power. When they seemed to care for the people, it was always false, fake. Most knew that the kings were at the service of the lords, the knights and the rich merchants. Starvation, misery and diseases were not important matters. You seldom heard them spoken about behind the gates of castles and palaces.

Kinvara would be in King’s Landing soon, and she would help the only queen who truly cared for the people to sit on the Iron Throne. For once in history, it would be occupied by someone who deserved it. Cersei Lannister could fight them, but she would only delay the inevitable. Soon, she would be dead. And now the rains weep o’er their halls, and not a soul to hear. This song would be sung for Lannisters soon enough. When Daenerys Targaryen would come, this would be the end of Cersei Lannister and whoever followed her in her crimes.

She went back into the camp, among the tents of Dothrakis, Unsullied, Dornishmen and Storm men.
The army was an amalgam of many soldiers from different lands and continents, with different languages and customs, but they all fought for the same cause. Unity would be crucial when the Great War would be there, and Daenerys Targaryen was the only one making this unity possible. For that, she needed to sit on the Iron Throne. She didn’t believe Kinvara for now when she said the servants of the Great Other were coming for all of them, but she would understand when the time comes. She had faith in the Lord of Light, and if Kinvara persisted in her fight against the Others, she knew they could win.

In a clear space, men from Dorne were fighting together, practicing for an upcoming battle. Hopefully, it would come very soon. Kinvara noticed a young woman among them, her arms bare, her hair brought into a bun, handling a spear better than many Unsullied. In Essos, few women fought. Their options were mostly limited to being wives, whores or priestess. Some could also be servants where there was no slavery, but their fate wasn’t that different from a whore most of the time. Kinvara had experienced every role a woman could play in this world. Seeing this girl fight against men, train with them, was something foreign for her. Even among the Red Priests, women seldom fought with swords. She only knew one who did. They could use their powers into battle, but although some Red Priests did learn to fight, women never did. She never learned to fight herself, but she didn’t regret it. She had other ways to deal with her enemies.

“I need some practice,” her fellow priest said next to her.

“Then go with them. I’m not holding you,” she replied.

Geralt joined the people practicing without another word. He seldom talked and preferred swords to words. Kinvara watched them fight. When the girl left the fighting to take a pause, Kinara walked to her. Obara Sand was one of the many cousins of Trystane Martell, and her mother was a whore.

“You fight well,” Kinvara told her, stating it as plainly as if she said the weather was good today.

“Are you going to talk me into believing in that god of yours?” she retorted, drinking some water from a gourd.

Kinvara smiled. “If we were to always do that, we would become boring quite quickly, wouldn’t you agree?”

“Yes, I agree.” She didn’t show any enthusiasm to their conversation.

“Why do you fight?”

“Why would I answer to you?”

“Why wouldn’t you? Most of the women never wield a weapon in their whole life, but you do. You’re quite a special girl.”

The Sand Snake smirked. “When I was a child, my father came to take me to court. I had never seen this man, and yet he called himself my father. My mother wept, said I was too young and a girl. Oberyn tossed his spear at my feet and said, girl or boy, we fight our battles, but the gods let us choose our weapons. My father pointed to the spear and then to my mother’s tears. I made my choice.”

Kinvara nodded. “Tears are quite inefficient as a weapon.” If not, then there wouldn’t have been so many men to use the girl she once was.

“Hear, hear. What is your weapon then?”
“My lord is my weapon.” The young woman scoffed. “I wouldn’t underestimate him if I were you.”

“I don’t need gods. I only need the choices he left me to make.”

“And yet, it is said that those who live by the spear will die by the spear.”

“All men must die. Valar morghulis.”

“Valar Dohaeris. But we’re not men.”

They exchanged wicked smiles. Would the baby who was abandoned have turned into that, had her father taken care of her, or had her mother not left her in a street? “You’re lucky that your father took care of you. Most men don’t care about the children they father on whores.”

“My father didn’t take care of me. He taught me to take care of myself.”

“A wise man. Women who rely on men to survive don’t last long.” Obara Sand smirked again. “But women who kill everyone in their way don’t last either.”

Obara kept smiling. “Not if everyone in their way dies.”

“The spear is a good weapon, but it can be pointed both ways, and it’s not invincible. I hope it never turns against you.”

“It won’t.”

She was very sure of herself. She was about to go back to the training when Kinvara said one last thing. “It is said that Oberyn Martell disapproved the murder of children, and that he didn’t hold children responsible for their father’s actions. I hope you live up to your father’s memory.”

Kinvara walked away before the Sand Snake could reply. She hoped that she would think about what she said, even if she doubted it. Obara was very sure of herself, and she wanted revenge. Kinvara understood her, but if you allowed vengeance to control all your actions, it would eat you away until there was nothing left of you. Duty was the best defense against it. Duty prevented you from doing things you shouldn’t, but the Sand Snakes were not people of duty. They were people who did what they wanted, when they wanted.

There was also the question of which duty to choose. Some duties were as fatal if not more than personal desires. Following your duty blindly could bring you to commit atrocities. She saw several Red Priests in her life, and many other people, doing what they thought to be their duty when committing crimes and atrocities, and this was also the case for people who were dutiful towards their family or their lord or their city. She had discovered that doubt was the only way to prevent people from failing their duties by trying to follow them. Once you didn’t allow doubt in your mind any longer, you were doomed.

Kinvara walked to the command tent and found Trystane Martell inside, slowly drinking some wine while looking at a map.

“High Priestess,” he shortly greeted her when she arrived.

“Prince Trystane.”

“Is there something you need from me?”

“No. For now, all we can do is wait.” The people of her order had waited for a very long time for this to happen. They waited for centuries for Azor Ahai reborn to come, for the slaves to break their chains, for the great that would seal the fate of men.

“There’s no way to cross this river,” the prince said with exasperation. “All our attempts failed. To turn around the river, we would need to march far in the west and to penetrate the Westerlands, territories we don’t control yet. Obara even led one of the groups who tried to cross the river, and even she failed.”

He sighed deeply. “Do you have water?” she asked him.

“No, I’m sorry. Only wine.”

Lords always had wine, but never water, of course. Water wasn’t costly enough. “You wish Obara didn’t come back alive.”

It was a statement, not a question. The prince looked queerly at her, and she looked at him to make him understand that she knew what was going on in his head. He was looking for the same thing than the Sand Snakes when they killed Myrcella Baratheon.

“I wouldn’t have wept on her ashes,” he confessed.

“Obara is hard to kill.”

“Yes, she is,” he said angrily. It was obvious he wished it wasn’t the case.

“Sometimes the people who seem the most unlikely to survive are the hardest to kill.”

“Really?” He didn’t seem to believe her. “I wonder what makes them so difficult to kill.”

“The will to survive. Those who want to live, they live. Those who want to die, they die. What do you want, Prince Trystane?”

“What?”

“Do you want to live or to die? Do you want to live for the person you loved and who is gone now, or do you want to die so you could join her?” He didn’t answer and looked away. “Or do you want other people to die? Do you want to see Obara impaled on her own spear? Nymeria strangled with her own whip? Tyene poisoned with one of the many vials she has with her? Do you want Ellaria Sand to watch as her daughter slowly dies because of her own poison, and then to kill her once it is done?”

“No,” he answered quickly. “But I wouldn’t weep for them. I can’t say they wouldn’t have looked for it.”

She agreed with him on this. “And once they’re dead, what will you do? What will be left, once the woman you loved is avenged? What will this bring to you?”

“At least, she will rest in peace.”

“I think she will rest in peace only when you are happy. We all want the people we love to be happy.” He looked at her, then back to the map. “You may marry Daenerys Targaryen one day, Trystane Martell. Don’t forget that.”

“Yes, I know.” He didn’t display any enthusiasm before the prospect of marrying the queen. He was obviously still in love with his previous betrothed. Would he ever be able to love another woman?
“We must all do our duty, Prince Trystane. Or else, we’re all lost. And your duty may be to be a consort for the queen.”

Kinvara was aware that Daenerys didn’t make any promise to the Martells. She only told them that she would consider seriously their proposition of a marriage when she would sit on the Iron Throne. From what Kinvara knew of Daenerys Targaryen, she was the kind of woman who did what she thought could help the people. She once said that she was responsible for the people under her rule, and she once accepted to marry a man she despised for the good of her people. If she thought that a marriage with a prince of Dorne was necessary, she would do it. For now, it didn’t seem necessary. The Martells kept fighting for her, but there might come a time when she considered that a marriage could maintain their loyalty. It was better to prepare Trystane Martell to that eventuality.

Kinvara had a duty as well. She had to make sure that Westeros would be ready to face the dead. Revan informed her not long ago that he convinced the queen to have dragonglass mined at Dragonstone for the upcoming Great War that grew closer every day. Revan said that dragonglass could destroy the servants of the Great Other. He said that the queen had begun to consider the real enemy as a threat. It was good, but they still had a lot of work to do.

She looked at Trystane Martell, who was back to studying the map before him, with figurines showing the positions of their allies like their enemies. A river separated camps and outposts, those of the queen on the southern shore, those of the lords still loyal to Cersei Lannister on the northern shore.

“Do you any idea how we could get around their defenses?” the prince asked.

“I am no general. My opinion wouldn’t worth much,” she replied. The Lord of Light granted gifts to everybody, but he never gave all his gifts to one person. Kinvara was never granted a mind for strategy and war.

“You helped me in Meereen. I thought you could do the same here.”

“Not when it comes to armies on the battlefield. It may be better to summon Malcolm Branfield and your other commanders.” She made it to leave the tent, but right before, she told him one last thing. “Perhaps you could wait for the queen to come. Once her dragons are here, our enemies won’t stand a chance. They might even run away at their sight.”

The High Priestess walked back to her own tent where she prayed. The Lord of Light didn’t grant her any vision this time, but he gave her something else that day. When the sun was gone and the darkness settled on the river, someone entered her tent. Someone she didn’t see for a very long time.

The last time they saw each other was in Volantis, back when Kinvara was the Second Servant of the Lord of Light. She made a strong impression on her, and on Benerro as well. Her powers were great, and right now Kinvara could feel them, though they didn’t sound as great as before. Perhaps it was because she tried to mask them now.

“The last time we met, you weren’t High Priestess yet,” her visitor replied.

“No. Benerro died, and I took his place.”

“May the Lord grant him rest.”

Kinvara turned to face the intruder. “Do you say the same in your prayers for your king? For his wife? And for his daughter?”
Melisandre looked down. Kinvara almost frowned at what she was seeing. This Red Priestess from Asshai was never ashamed of what she did, and yet now she seemed to be.

“How did you get in here?” the High Priestess asked.

“I have some gifts, High Priestess. You have the same.”

One of the rare things we have in common. She probably used her abilities in illusion to get past the sentinels and into the camp without being noticed. The darkness outside certainly helped as well.

“Yes.”

She looked at the Priestess from Asshai with hard and unforgiving eyes. She couldn’t forgive what this woman did since she arrived in Westeros.

“I made mistakes,” Melisandre recognized. That was new. She never recognized that she could be wrong before.

“Yes, you made mistakes. You had people believe wrongly that Stannis Baratheon was Azor Ahai reborn, only for them to die burning on a river or freezing in the snow, and the others you burned them yourself, the last one a child of ten.”

The Lord of Light showed to Kinvara what would happen to Shireen Baratheon before it took place. She had wanted to intervene, to stop that from happening, but she couldn’t. A little girl was killed, burned alive for nothing.

She made a step toward Melisandre. “I saw what you did to the sept in Dragonstone, and to the godswood of Storm’s End.”

“I did what the Lord asked from me.”

“Our Lord never asked us to burn people alive, or to destroy the holy places of other religions.”

“There are precedents…” Kinvara cut short to Melisandre’s attempt.

“There is nothing in our holy texts saying that we must do these things. Our holy texts clearly state, on the other end, that following our Lord must be a free decision, taken by every individual without coercion. If you had grown in a different faith, perhaps you would understand that.”

The girl she was before used to fall asleep at the voice of her father reading about their gods. Her mother never learned to read, but her father had learned to and he tried to teach her when she was young. His success was limited, and it was later that Kinvara learned to read not only in the language of Westeros, but also in many dialects of Essos.

“I made mistakes, and I regret them,” Melisandre said.

“I hope you do. Because of you, Red Priests are seen as fanatics who burn people alive. Now we must clear up the mess you left behind.”

“Everyone can be wrong. Even the honest servants of the Lord of Light. I am no exception.”

“It is good you finally realize that.” When they met, Melisandre acted as if she was the Lord of Light himself. “Why are you here?”

Although Melisandre was a Red Priestess and served the Lord of Light like she did, she wasn’t part of her order. Melisandre was a member of another order of Red Priests, based at Asshai, and she didn’t depend of Kinvara’s authority. As a result, Kinvara also had no obligation towards her, and she preferred if their meeting was over as quickly as possible.

“I came to see the queen.”

“Not yet, but she will be very soon. One of us contacted me to tell they were arriving. They defeated the Ironborn at Oldtown.”

She had a good idea of who did this. She would need a serious discussion with Revan when they saw each other. This kind of information was to be relayed to her before anyone else, and certainly not to Melisandre in priority. At least, that meant Oldtown was saved. If only they had been able to save the other city as well.

“You want to advise the queen as you did with Stannis.” Kinvara didn’t ask a question, but she said the truth.

“I have important information for her,” Melisandre insisted. “Are you going to stop me?”

“No. I won’t have to. I will simply tell the truth. I will explain to Daenerys how you burned people alive, especially the little girl.” She stared at the Red Priestess from Asshai. “You advised Stannis Baratheon once. It didn’t end well for him?”

“No,” Melisandre replied shortly.

“And I will not allow you to do the same with the Breaker of Chains. To the opposite of Stannis, she’s not only after a crown. She delayed her return to fight for those who were the property of others, and she wants to make things better for the people in the Seven Kingdoms.”

“From the wildlings, not from the servants of the Great Other.”

“He knew the dead were coming. That’s why he went to the Wall when it was entirely against his interest.”

“And yet he died, trying to take Winterfell. His men were slaughtered like cattle, after you burned his daughter.”

“I know that what I did was horrible, and if I could, I would change it. You don’t need to remind me of this again. I was mistaking to believe that Stannis was the Lord’s Chosen One…”

“Yes, you were mistaking, again. Azor Ahai didn’t defeat his enemies all alone. Stannis fought all alone. How many kingdoms served him at the peak of his power? One? One and a half, at best? Daenerys Stormborn already has half of Westeros at her side. Now that she defeated the Ironborn, the Reach will fight for her unconditionally. She has the most powerful army on this land, and three dragons. She has everything to be Azor Ahai reborn, and she has the means to fight and win the great war.”

“Perhaps, but if we want her to win this war, she must hear what I have to tell her.”

Kinvara observed Melisandre for a moment. The woman from Asshai took the wrong path, but Benerro said that she was sure to serve the Lord of Light when she visited the Red Temple of Volantis. Benerro was seldom wrong, and although this woman committed atrocities, Kinvara felt that she genuinely wanted to serve their Lord. As much as she hated it, her Lord demanded that she gave a chance to this woman.

Kinvara stood by the fire as Melisandre began to speak. “When Stannis Baratheon died, I went back to the Wall, that was being commanded by Jon Snow at the time, before he became King in the North. And Jon Snow died.”

“He died? According to what we know, he’s quite alive.”

“He is, now. But not long ago, he wasn’t.”

“What do you mean?”

“Our Lord brought him back. I made a ritual. I tried to revive him. He was dead one moment, his heart stabbed several times by his sworn brothers because he allowed the Free Folk south of the Wall, and the next time he was breathing, and walking.”

Kinvara approached her. “Are you sure of that?”

“I saw it with my own eyes. I didn’t see it in the flames. I actually witnessed it, and I wasn’t the only one.”

She didn’t seem to be lying. Kinvara walked back to the fire and gazed at it. “Why would our Lord bring this man back to life?”

A moment went on as she looked into the flames, not really trying to see something in them, but more to think about what she just learned. Such an event seldom happened. The people the Lord brought back were normally given a second chance for a specific reason.

“What if he was the Prince That Was Promised?” Melisandre had joined her near the fire.

She looked at the older woman. “It should be Daenerys. Everything points at her.” Most of the elements of the prophecy fitted with Daenerys Stormborn, and not in indirect ways as it was for Stannis.

“Our Lord brought him back for a reason.”

“What reason?”

“Me neither,” Kinvara confessed after a time. “But that doesn’t mean he is Azor Ahai reborn.”

“There was something that I felt in Jon Snow when I first met him,” Melisandre slowly said. “It was a great power. Stannis had a power like this in him, but it was different. With Jon Snow, the power was… greater, but… It was difficult to discern, or to identify. I felt something between him and his direwolf. They shared something. A bond. But there was something else. You heard what they say about him, and his true parentage.”

“Of course. That he would be the son of Rhaegar Targaryen, the nephew of the Unburnt. However, many are skeptical about this.”

“I think it may be true. I couldn’t be sure when I met him, but as I spent more time close to him, I saw more and more similarities between the power I felt in Stannis and the one I felt in Jon Snow. I think I felt their dragon blood, only I couldn’t recognize it in Jon Snow in the first place because it was mixed with other powers.”

Could it be possible? Were they wrong to believe that Daenerys Stormborn was the Lord’s Chosen One? Was the real savior in the North? Then this meant that he was… No, she needed more than this.

“What was Jon Snow doing the last time you saw him?”

“After he took back Winterfell from the Boltons with the help of his sister and her husband, he wanted to prepare the North for the attack of the dead.” Melisandre looked at her with a very serious expression. “He saw the Night King. That’s why he allowed the Free Folk south of the Wall. He did this to protect them, and because he knew they would all be killed if he left them north of the Wall.”

A prince with Targaryen blood, with dragon blood, who fought the dead, who faced the Great Other. He didn’t send any army against Daenerys Targaryen. Could that mean he was keeping his forces in the North, for the Great War? It was close, but Kinvara couldn’t be sure of how close it was. Perhaps it was even closer than she believed.

She inhaled deeply. “We can’t be sure of anything. The important is to defeat the Others.”

“But if Jon Snow is the real savior, then he is the one we must serve, and not the Unburnt.”

“Maybe,” Kinvara conceded. “However, we can’t be sure of anything.” She looked back at Melisandre. “I will allow you to stay, and I will not tell the queen about what you did. Not yet. I will let you tell her what you saw. But she may still be our best chance. Her dragons and her armies will be useful in the Great War.”

“I agree.” Melisandre accompanied this with a nod.

Kinvara looked back to the flames. Everything they did couldn’t be in vain. Daenerys Targaryen freed the slaves and broke their chains. She was the real hope for Westeros. Their Lord led them to her. Melisandre was blinded by her assurance that she couldn’t be wrong when she went to Stannis. But could the Lord of Light bring her to this man so she could meet Jon Snow? Nothing was sure. The will of the Lord was uncertain.

She kept staring into the flames. The image of a vision she had in Meereen came back, that of a battle in the snow, and of a great shadow. They were at war, many battles had been fought, and there would be many more to come. They needed to win them all. Defeat was not acceptable. She was about to ask her Lord for answers concerning Azor Ahai when Melisandre spoke again.

“High Priestess, there is something else we should talk about.”

“What is it?” she asked, still looking at the flames.

“This power I felt in Jon Snow… I felt it in someone else.”

TYRION XXIX

“You said there were two more attacks after the first one?”

“Aye.”

They were alone in the solar of the Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, but it was used by the king now. The dwarf and the bastard were together, talking about the war. Jon Snow was tired, and it was more than visible in his way to answer. He seemed to be struggling to stay on his feet, and his eyelids threatened to close on a regular basis. The joy he might have felt when he saw Arya arrive with them at Castle Black was tempered not only by the fact he didn’t want her to come here, but also by his exhaustion. He looked about to collapse.

He was gripping the side of the table on which lied a map of the Wall and its surroundings, breathing heavily, staring at the castles, certainly in the hope that focusing on them would stop him from falling apart. Tyrion remembered how he used to work day and night when he was Hand of the King. He also worked like a mad man when he was Master of Coin, and his days as Lord of Casterly Rock were long as well. However, he always worked more with his mind than with his body, and Tyrion made his mind the most powerful of his weapon a long time ago. He was used to sleep only a few hours every day. He had done so for over fifteen years, wine and books helping him. It was only after his wedding with Sansa that he started to sleep better, and even then, most days he woke up before her, never forgetting to place a kiss on her brow before leaving her to sleep a little while longer. At night, he came to bed after her. Most of the time, she was waiting for him.

It took them a month to reach Castle Black. The place was in a better state than Tyrion remembered. When thousands of men worked together, it was easy to rebuild a castle falling into ruins. The Watch had lacked men for centuries, and now they had enough men. They needed the return of the dead to remind themselves of the reasons why the Night’s Watch existed. Tyrion took great interest in seeing Castle Black and the other castles along the Wall being rebuilt, but it couldn’t fill the void left by Sansa’s absence. It didn’t take long for him to miss her after he left Winterfell. He left her behind with their daughter. He told himself that he was doing all this for them, for the two women who were his reason to live, but he still felt as if somewhat he abandoned them.

Tyrion was afraid about how his daughter would grow up. His own father had been absent for most of his childhood. Tywin Lannister seldom saw his children. He was Hand of the King, and as such, he spent most of his time in King’s Landing. Tyrion remembered the time when he was only a little boy, asking the servants and the maids where his father was, when he would come back. He wanted to see his father again. That was when he was only four or five. When his father had come back, finally, Tyrion had wanted to see him, to run to him and hug his leg in his arms. But instead, two days before Lord Tywin’s arrival, he was locked into his own chambers. He wasn’t allowed to leave them. His father stayed for two weeks at the Rock, and not a single time did he come to see his son. Then Lord Tywin left, and a few days later Tyrion was free to wander in the castle again.
To refuse to see him was probably the kindest thing his father ever made when he came home, because the following times, he didn’t ignore his son. Instead, it was to disapprove him, to curse him, to insult him, to humiliate him, to give him a lesson. And the lessons were not kind. Tyrion still dreamed at night of the one he gave him when he got married with a wheelwright’s orphan. Even his happiness with Sansa couldn’t erase the memory of Tysha. Shae had disappeared, faded away. Tyrion seldom thought about her, and it had been a long time since he dreamed of her, but Tysha always came back in his dreams. That was the inheritance his father left to him, along with Casterly Rock and the Westerlands. Of the three, only the first was an inheritance that Lord Tywin wanted his youngest son to keep after his death.

Tyrion didn’t want to be like his father. Tywin Lannister had been a hard father, a cruel father, but worse, he had never been there for his children when they truly needed him. That was what Tyrion feared the most. He feared to not be there for his daughter, and even to not be there for his wife. He wanted nothing more than to go back to Sansa and their little girl, and to bring them back to the Rock where they would be safe.

What a childish notion it was. Sansa and Joanna wouldn’t be safe at Casterly Rock. They would be safe nowhere. The dead had come, and if they spread through the Seven Kingdoms, there would be no safe place for his family in this world. He had to fight these things, if he wanted them to live, and if he wanted to live with them. Or else they would all die. Sansa. Joanna. Jaime. Tyrion wondered how was his brother. Was he still serving Cersei? He hoped not. Not if he wanted to stay alive. Cersei had no chance against Daenerys Targaryen.

He looked at Jon Snow. The King in the North had discovered that he was the bastard son of Rhaegar Targaryen, that his father wasn’t his father, that his brothers were not his brothers, and that his sisters were not his sisters. The Night’s Watch had been his family for a time, and they killed him. Arya, Sansa and Bran could say anything, that he was still their brother, that nothing had changed, but it would never change the truth that he wasn’t their brother by blood, and that the family of his father tried to slaughter his mother’s family. The only relative he had from his father’s family actually fought to conquer the kingdoms he was ruling. Jon Snow had no parents, no siblings, no wife, no children, and technically, he had no family. He probably didn’t have friends anymore either. He was alone. Tyrion had a reason to fight. He thought about his wife and his daughter every day and every night. He saw their faces before he fell asleep, but Jon Snow had no one to fight for. All he had was duty. Tyrion couldn’t help but feel sympathy for the King in the North.

“There were two attacks against Eastwatch, three against the Shadow Tower, one at Greyguard, two at Icemark, another at Oakenshield…” Jon Snow recited.

Tyrion frowned. “Yes. Why didn’t they do it?”

“I don’t know.”

“This makes no sense. If the Night King wanted to cross the Wall, and we know he can, at Castle Black if nowhere else, then why didn’t he send his whole army there? Instead the dead are launching small attacks all along the Wall. Why would they do that?”

“I have no idea.”

Tyrion looked at the lad. He was really about to collapse. “You should get some rest, your Grace.”
“Don’t call me like that. And I can’t rest, my friend.” He rubbed his eyes and released a deep sigh. “When Mance Rayder attacked the Wall, he sent a few groups of wildlings at different places, to attract the rangers far from Castle Black, and weaken the position of the Watch here, where he would lead his main strike.”

“You believe the Night King is trying the same thing? To divide our forces and empty Castle Black?”

“Maybe. I don’t know. How does this man… or this thing, whatever it is, think?”

Tyrion had no more clue on that than him. “Well, all the castles are well garrisoned, and I brought three thousand more men with me.”

“It might not be enough.”

“Did a White Walker cross the Wall at any other place than Castle Black?”

“No. Not that we know. After the first attack on Castle Black, I ordered Eastwatch and the Shadow Tower to seal their tunnels immediately. The Shadow Tower was attacked before they could do it, but no White Walker went through the gate.”

“Perhaps Bran only broke the spells protecting the Wall at Castle Black, and they are still strong everywhere else along the Wall.”

“Then this means Castle Black is the only place where the Night King can get south,” Jon said, dull and emotionless as ever.

Tyrion hoped Jon Snow was right. They weren’t sure about the consequences of Bran getting south of the Wall after being touched by the Night King. The boy couldn’t tell himself how it affected their defenses. Tyrion hoped their assumptions were true and that the dead could only cross at Castle Black, or else they would have serious problems. Tyrion thought that they should have gotten used to it, but he didn’t.

“The Night King will come back and attack Castle Black in force, if he thinks like a human,” Jon Snow said. He didn’t sound very convinced by his own words.

“Then the men I brought with me are welcome, I suppose.”

“Aye, but we only have a few months of rations ahead of us, then it’s over. And winter will last much longer than that.”

Tyrion nodded. He knew the situation would be critical on that point, but he had hoped they would have at least one year of provisions. As always, it was useless to hope.

“Are we still receiving supplies from the Vale?” Tyrion asked.

“Aye, I think so. Eastwatch didn’t tell me otherwise.” Jon Snow sighed once more. “It won’t be enough.”

“No, it won’t be.”

It was useless to deny the truth. They had to face it. Of the four kingdoms sworn to Jon Snow, three were spent by the war. Without the Reach, Tyrion knew they had no chance to maintain a strong army at the Wall and to defeat the White Walkers. They needed the Tyrells, or rather their help.
Jon dropped another heavy sigh. “You should rest, Snow. A king dead from exhaustion will not be of any help to us.”

“I know. You’re probably right.”

Jon Snow had a resigned expression on his face. Perhaps he would finally get some rest before he killed himself. However, there was something Tyrion needed to tell him before.

“Snow, before you go to your chambers and fake to sleep, we need to talk about something.”

“Alright, what is it?”

“Without the Reach, we are doomed. We both know it.”

“Most men would rather deny a hard truth than face it.” Tyrion recognized something he told the bastard a long time ago, before all this madness began. “But we’re not like most men, I guess.”

They exchanged a smile. “The Tyrells sided with Daenerys Targaryen.”

“I know.”

Jon Snow looked at him with a sorry expression. “I already sent three ravens to Dragonstone, asking for dragonglass, and my aunt didn’t answer. We only have one raven left for the island. I’m afraid she doesn’t believe us, and she won’t believe us.”

“She’ll have King’s Landing soon enough, so we’ll have more than one raven to send her,” Tyrion quipped. “The fact remains we need allies. Even if our men are enough to repel the invasion of the dead, we won’t get through winter with the provisions we have right now. This is why we needed an alliance with the Reach, and why I didn’t advise a marriage with a northern lady.”

“Well, now I doubt Lord Tyrell will want to make an alliance with us. His only daughter is being kept by Daenerys.”

Jon Snow rolled his eyes. “This is no time to discuss about these things. The dead are attacking us. Winter is no time for weddings.”

“A wedding could save the North, Jon Snow, if it brings us the alliance we need.”

“If you’re thinking about marrying me to Margaery Tyrell, you’d be better to forget about it. My aunt will never allow that.”

“Probably not, but it’s not about Margaery Tyrell that I was thinking. There’s another queen who is not married, and it so happens that she has dragons to burn the dead by the thousands.”

Jon Snow looked at him. Tyrion made an expression to make him understand that this was no jape. Jon Snow’s eyes widened. “You can’t be serious. She’s my aunt!”

“Among the Targaryens, it’s not unusual, or disapproved for that matter.” Jon Snow turned his back to Tyron and walked away from the table. “It might put an end to the war. We cannot fight her and the dead at the same time. You’re her last relative who’s alive. You wouldn’t have to fight over the Iron Throne this way.”
“You want me to marry a woman I don’t know.” He faced Tyrion again, a hostile expression painted on his face. “A woman who might throw me to her dragons, for all we know. I’m a threat for her. She is the daughter of the Mad King.”

“And you are his grandson,” Tyrion countered. The king had nothing to reply to this. “The rumors about her are… uncertain, and even contradicting. She crucified people in Meereen and sacked Astapor, and she has the reputation of burning her enemies alive. At the same time, she didn’t execute Margaery Tyrell even if she was queen of Westeros not long ago, and she let the Tyrells live even if they were allies of my family. She also fought against slavery in Essos. Maybe she is terrible, but she might the right kind of terrible.”

Jon Snow frowned. “How can someone be the right kind of terrible?”

“By being terrible so the people are not worse. Just like your uncle.”

“My fa… Lord Stark wasn’t a terrible man.”

“Wasn’t he? How many people did he kill in his life? How many times did you see him chop someone’s head?”

“He did this because he had no choice. He did his duty.”

“So he did his duty by being terrible, just like my own father when he crushed the Reynes and the Tarbecks.”

“My father never destroyed houses or slaughtered entire families.”

“Too bad. If the Starks destroyed the Boltons before this war, maybe your brothers Robb and Rickon would still be alive.” Jon Snow was fuming, so Tyrion continued to speak before he stormed out. “Your father may have done things that were necessary, but he did horrible things all the same. We all do horrible things. Daenerys Targaryen is not worse than us.”

“I’m not going to commit incest. What would you say if your father had forced you to marry your own sister?”

On that, Tyrion had nothing to oppose. He would rather kill himself than marry Cersei. He wasn’t Jaime. He tolerated his relationship with Cersei because he was his brother, but he never approved it either. Once, to taunt Cersei, he asked why she only opened her legs for one brother. The jape earned him a good slap on the face. It seemed the proposition he came to make to Jon Snow would be refused.

The dwarf and the bastard remained silent together for a long time, and it was the bastard who broke the silence. “I’ve thought about it anyway. I think there is another way. When Daenerys comes North, I will bend the knee before her, and I will join the Night’s Watch. I’ll only have to say my vows again. This way, I will no longer be a threat to her, and no one will suffer. I will demand that she allows you, Sansa, Joanna, Bran and Arya to live in exchange.”

Tyrion could see that he was resigned to this fate. “You would be the first man in history to join the Night’s Watch twice.” The king’s lips barely rolled up. “But I wouldn’t do that right now if I were you. We need a king to lead our armies for the time being, not a brother of the Watch.”

Jon Snow nodded. If Jon Snow was decided to give up any claim on the Iron Throne, Tyrion wished he could bend the knee before the Dragon Queen right away and be done with it, so the Westerlands and Casterly Rock wouldn’t be in danger, but as he just said himself, they couldn’t do that now. Their priority was to defend the Wall, and they needed a king to keep the four armies in the North united against their common enemy.

Hopefully, Daenerys Targaryen wouldn’t destroy Casterly Rock. Aegon allowed Loren Lannister and Torrhen Stark to live after they were defeated. Tyrion had sent specific orders to the Rock, telling Genna to surrender if the Targaryen army marched on the Westerlands. It was a fight they couldn’t win. With some luck, Daenerys would do like her ancestor and allow Tyrion to remain Warden of the West, and he could go back to the Rock with Sansa and Joanna once this was all over. However, Aegon’s father hadn’t been killed by his brother. Tyrion knew he was in a delicate situation. He was playing a dangerous game, but it was a game he had to play, if they wanted to keep the dead at bay and survive a new Targaryen monarch at the same time. He could only hope Daenerys Targaryen was more like Aegon the Conqueror than the Mad King.

Tyrion had to admit that Jon Snow’s plan may probably be the best. Daenerys Targaryen might not want of a nephew to rule with her. She led armies, conquered cities, had three dragons, and she already had an experience at ruling. She wouldn’t agree on being a consort. She would want Jon Snow to be her consort, and not the other way around, if she ever considered the possibility of marrying him. However, if Jon Snow decided to join the Night’s Watch again, he would no longer represent a danger for her. Still, Tyrion felt sorry for the bastard.

“I know, but it was supposed to be like that a long time ago. I learned to live with that.” He was resigned, as always. “You know, one day, I stumbled on Maester Aemon discussing with my friend Sam. I heard him say A Targaryen alone in the world is a terrible thing. I wonder… Did he ever suspect who I really was?”

After a moment thinking about that, Tyrion answered. “I’m not sure, but if he said that, I suppose he didn’t know who you truly were.”

“Probably. I wish he was still alive.”

“I liked him. He knew the dead were real and coming, and I thought he only believed it because he wanted his life at the Wall to mean something. I should have believed him right away.”

“There are many things we should have believed.”

The silence lingered between them, only troubled by the muffled sounds of the men sparring outside and the cracking of the fire in the hearth. Tyrion left the King in the North, advising him to sleep. That was what Tyrion did the best: advise kings. At least, with Jon Snow, he had a real king to advise, not a boy who spent his days shooting animals in cages. Jon Snow was a capable ruler, as honorable as his father, and somehow less stupid after everything he went through. He would regret him as king. Of all the kings Tyrion knew in his life, Jon Snow had been the best.

The little Lord of Casterly Rock crossed the courtyard of Castle Black and went to the tunnels under the Wall. They were not as elaborate as the caverns underneath Casterly Rock, but they were impressive all the same. Tyrion didn’t take enough time to visit them the last time he came here. However, this time he didn’t go in the tunnels out of curiosity. These tunnels could be the key to save the Wall. Well, no, he didn’t plan to use the tunnels to save the Wall, quite the opposite, but they could save the North and all the other kingdoms. Tyrion hoped it wouldn’t come to that.

He found Bronn supervising his men as they worked. The knight of the Blackwater saw him arrive from afar.

“Everything is in place,” he told him.
“Good. No one noticed you?” Tyrion asked.

“No. We made sure to wait a night when all the men in these tunnels would be ours. The others won’t see anything."

“None of your men will speak? Around cups of ale, tongues loosen.”

“I made sure they would never talk about it.” They both looked at the men in red armor working, their breath freezing in the air. “Are you sure it’s a good idea?” Bronn asked.

“Not at all. But if need be, it could save us.”

“Not all of us.” The former sellsword was hesitant. Tyrion couldn’t blame him. He was hesitant as well. He didn’t dare to talk about it to Jon Snow, or to anyone else. Even Sansa ignored all this.

“We will only use it if necessary. Hopefully, we won’t have to.”

“You can hope, my friend. I think I gave up on hoping a long time ago.”

“Ser, my lord.” One of the men that was set to work in this task came to them. “Everything is ready.”

“Well, what are you waiting for? Work is done, time for ale.”

The soldiers walked away, and as Tyrion and Bronn followed them behind, he suggested something else. “What about some wine? It’s better than ale.”

“And you got me used to the finest things,” Bronn replied. That was a way to say yes.

An hour later, they were both drunk in Tyrion’s solar. Tyrion made sure to bring enough wine with him when he left Winterfell, and it was always better to get drunk with a friend than alone. He didn’t have Sansa to watch him at the Wall, so he could give in to his drinking habits more easily.

“Don’t get used to it, Bronn. I’m a married man, now, and a father. I can’t get drunk in front of my daughter.” He didn’t want Joanna to end up like him.

“Oh, come on! Your daughter will have to live. Daisy always drinks with me.”

“You mean that she gets drunk with you?”

“Aye. And she’s good at it. She’s more resistant than I thought.”

“She worked in a brothel, Bronn.”

“I know. But I had to get drunk alone after she got pregnant. Couldn’t support wine anymore.” He took a large sip.

“Speaking of that, she must have given birth by now.”

“Aye, she did.” Bronn emptied his cup and refilled it again. He also refilled Tyrion’s cup. How many times did they fill their cups so far?

“So, boy or girl?”

“You really want to know?”
“Why? Something I shouldn’t know? Is he a dwarf?”

“No. Though you’re not far from it.”

“No, the boy is healthy. Daisy sent me a raven before we left Winterfell. She’s happy.” A wide smile made its way on Bronn’s face as he drank again. Tyrion could understand. He had a child not long ago too.

“Well, I don’t see where’s the problem then.”

“The problem is the name.”

“Why? How did you call him?”

“I didn’t give him a name. It was Daisy who chose. We agreed that she would choose the name if it was a boy, and I would choose the name if it was a girl.”

“How would you have called him if he had been a girl?”

“Chella.”

Tyrion searched his mind for a short moment, before remembering where the name came from. “Chella, daughter of Cheyk? The leader of the Black Ears?”

“Aye.”

“You really wanted to call your daughter after a woman who made a necklace of her enemies’ ears?”

Bronn shrugged. “I thought about calling her Shae, but I think Chella is better.”

Tyrion wasn’t sure how he would feel about Bronn having a daughter named Shae. He wasn’t sure either how Sansa would feel about it, but something told him she wouldn’t like. He emptied his cup and filled it once more.

“So, how did the Lady of Blackwater call him?” he asked.

“You’ll never guess,” Bronn replied.

“Timett? Shagga?”

“I don’t think she remembers their names.”

“Who, then?”

“You know him well. He’s small. Very small.”

Bronn took another sip while still looking at Tyrion, an amused look on his face. “You’ve got to be kidding me.”

Bronn laughed. “No.” He raised his cup. “To Tyrion Blackwater, heir to Blackwater Keep.”

Tyrion shared the toast with his friend. He didn’t expect someone to call his son after him. It was a good thing that his father was dead. Tywin Lannister didn’t suffer the presence of dwarves near Casterly Rock. Tyrion had doubts that he would suffer people with his name.
“When I went north of the Wall, I met wildlings who talked about these White Walkers. I thought they were only stories like those about mermaids and centaurs. It seems they’re not stories as much as I thought,” Bronn said before emptying another cup.

“Northerners were closer to the truth than we thought. I didn’t believe Jeor Mormont and Aemon Targaryen when they told me about the dead. No one believed them. Now we pay the price for our ignorance. All the legends were true.”

“Couldn’t know. Who would believe tales about blue demons?”

“That’s the problem. We didn’t believe them.”

Bonn shrugged. “Thank you for ordering your big aunt to surrender. I don’t want my keep with my wife and my son inside to burn.”

“Don’t thank me yet. We’re talking about the daughter of the Mad King, and your keep once belonged to the man who murdered her nephew and her niece.” Bronn didn’t react to this, other than drinking. “I’m sure they will be all right.”

“You’re shit at reassuring.” Tyrion couldn’t argue with that.

“I know.”

“Perhaps you should send your daughter back there, at Casterly Rock.”

“By the time they arrive, it might already have fallen to Daenerys.”

“What’s worse? Dragons or White Walkers?”

“Well, dragons don’t try to kill us. Not all of us, and not yet.”

Bonn approved with a sign of head. “I think that I drank enough.” The former sellsword. “Wish there were whores nearby, but apparently they all left when the wildlings destroyed Mole Town.”

Tyrion groaned. “You have a wife, a son, and still you only think about fucking whores?”

“Don’t tell me the only woman you want to fuck is your wife. And if I’m going to die tomorrow, I would rather enjoy my time with a woman before I’m gone. Instead I’ll just go to bed. I’m getting old.”

His friend left, and Tyrion went to sleep not long after. In his dreams, he was with Sansa and their little daughter. He was happy. And the next morning, when he woke up, like every morning since he left Winterfell, he regretted that his dreams were only dreams.

Chapter End Notes

Not the most exciting chapter, I agree, especially since in the south Denerys if doing a lot of fight, but I had to insert a chapter where we got to see how things were at the Wall. We must remember that it still stands. While Daenerys is advancing, Tyrion and Jon can only wait and prepare for the coming storm.

Jaime VII

Chapter Notes

After the short interlude of Bronn and Tyrion talking about their families, we get back to the action around the capital. Another battle is closing on us, and many of the next chapters will be centered around the events taking place into the capital. Four very different people will show us the fate of the capital of the Seven Kingdoms.

JAIME VII

His aunt brought the cup to her lips, and when she put it down, she gave her answer.

“No.”

They were dining together in her private apartments at Casterly Rock. It was an eternity since Jaime had come here. This was his home, and it had been years since the last time he walked in its corridors. However, he couldn’t stay there for long, only one night, and he had come for a very precise reason. And after he asked Genna, all he had for an answer was no.

“If we do nothing, Genna, Cersei will die,” Jaime tried.

“And no matter what we do, she will die.” She just took a piece of pork and laid down her fork.

“How many people have we lost since this war began, Jaime? Kevan lost his three sons, the Westerlands were sacked, Lannisport was destroyed, and entire armies were slaughtered. We lost tens of thousand people. Kevan lost his three sons before he died as well. Stafford is dead, and your own father, he’s gone too. Joffrey, Tommen, Myrcella, all your nephews and nieces are dead. Tyrion brought most what we had left of valid men with him when he marched North, and we lost the few he left behind when the Ironmen burned Lannisport. And now you ask me to send men to help Cersei? After everything she did? After Lancel, after Tyrion, after what she did in King’s Landing? After the destruction of the city?”

“Cersei was only trying to survive, and to save her children.” Jaime felt he didn’t believe his own words, and that Cersei didn’t deserve his words.

“If she truly wanted to survive, she would have left this stinking city a long time ago. Instead she destroyed the Great Sept of Baelor, and all the city around it. All her children are dead. Our alliance with the Tyrells is gone. And you want me to give you men only so they can die fighting against dragons, in the middle of winter? For the woman who tried to kill your brother, and who shared her bed with your cousin? For the woman who declared herself not only queen of the Seven Kingdoms, but also Lady of Casterly Rock? Who placed a bounty on our lord, his wife and their child? No, Jaime. I’m not going to sacrifice more men to Cersei’s folly.”

Jaime stared at his own plate. He barely touched the delicious pork accompanied with carrots, beans and potatoes. “She’s a Lannister. We have to help her.” His voice was hollow.

“Did she kill Kevan?” Jaime looked up. Genna was looking straight. “Jaime, did she kill Kevan?” He didn’t answer. He couldn’t answer. The queen sends her regards. Genna seemed to take his silence for an answer. She leaned back into her chair. “I lost Tygett to the pox. I lost Gerion a few years later to a stupid quest for a sword. I lost your father, and then I lost Kevan. All my brothers are gone, Jaime. Dorna is crying day and night. Janei will never get to know her father. All the Lannisters lost their father through this war. The only one who still has a father is your niece Joanna.”

Joanna. Tyrion called her after their lady mother. Jaime was a true uncle for the first time in his life. “Do you know if she looks like Mother?”

“Tyrion says she has golden blond hair, and green eyes, just like him. And for now, she is the future of House Lannister.”

Jaime wondered if he would ever get to see his niece. “Are you sure you can’t spare any man?”

“Jaime, I know you love Cersei, but she dug her own grave, and we can’t bring House Lannister with her in this grave. Anyway, Tyrion declared for the King in the North, and he ordered us to give no help to Cersei and to surrender if the Targaryen army was to march on Casterly Rock.”

“Tyrion did this?”

“Yes. He claims that he is fighting dead men on the Wall, but anyway, even with our full forces, we would be no match for Daenerys Targaryen. Loren the Last surrendered, and he lived. I suppose the best we can do is to hope that this new conqueror will offer us the same thing.”

“Tyrion will not fight?” Jaime was no longer surprised that Tyrion abandoned their sister, but he was surprised that he didn’t put up a fight against the Targaryen girl.

“Who could blame him? Your brother doesn’t want to die. Who would want to die, when their first child was just born? We both know what it is to have children, Jaime. You surely understand how Tyrion feels.”

Jaime was agape in front of her aunt’s declaration. “How do you know?” He didn’t try to hide the truth. It was useless to hide it now.

Genna smiled sadly. “I wasn’t far away when Joanna found you with Cersei in the same bath. And when Stannis began to say that Cersei’s children were yours, I knew immediately that it was true.”

There was no hatred on her face or in her voice, nor sadness. Only disappointment. Jaime said nothing. What was there to say? That he slept with his own sister for years? That together they had three children, and that now all these children were dead? It seemed more people than he thought knew about him and Cersei. Tyrion, Kevan, Genna, and who else? It didn’t really matter now. Jaime was tired of hiding. Hiding had never done him any good. There wasn’t much that ever gave him much good.

“Do you know how heartbroken your mother was when she discovered it, Jaime? Tyrion was already on his way. You have no idea how this affected her. She and Tywin were so happy when you were born. They dreamed Cersei would be a queen, that you would be a great knight, and that no one would ever dare anything against you.” Well, he was a knight, and Cersei was queen. This was similar to what the woman in his dream said when he stood vigil for Myrcella. “But after she found you with Cersei… You have no idea how it broke her heart. She began to pray, but she no longer prayed for you and Cersei.”

“What? What did she pray for?”

“Another son. A son who could be Tywin’s heir.” Genna sighed. “You have no idea how you both hurt her this day. Tywin blamed Tyrion for being the cause of Joanna’s death, but I’m not sure if she would be dead if she hadn’t opened that door.”

His aunt didn’t show any anger towards him. Sadness, sorrow and regret was all he could perceive in her voice.

“That was all Jaime could say.

“I didn’t know.”

“I have known you since you were a baby in the cradle, Jaime. I saw you all grow up and become men and women. You are my nephew, and I always loved you, just like I loved Cersei. But you both never considered the consequences of your actions. And now, the legacy Tywin worked for so hard is gone. His grandchildren will never be kings, or princes, or queens, or princesses, no matter how we call them. The only legacy Tywin has now, it’s Tyrion, his daughter, and the other children he might have one day. They are the ones we must protect. Cersei is lost. After everything she’s done, I won’t help her. I’m afraid the little girl who I saw growing up at Casterly Rock is gone.”

“I wonder if she ever existed.” Jaime thought aloud before he could think about it.

“She existed, Jaime. But now she’s gone. Will you really fight for her?”

“What other choice do I have? I’m doomed as well. I don’t think the Mad King’s daughter will spare me, after what I did to her father.”

Genna looked at him, a sorry expression on her face. “I won’t give you any man, Jaime, but you can try to recruit your own across the Westerlands. Just don’t expect them to follow you blindly. People are weary of the war now. You will be very lucky if you can raise more than two thousand men.”

Considering the hostility he met as he travelled through the Westerlands, Jaime would say that he was very lucky since he was able to recruit one thousand and five hundred men. These were all green boys, no experimented soldier, aside from himself, the one-handed knight. His conversation with Genna had taken place last month, and now he was heading back to King’s Landing. He had tried to make levies in the north of the Crownlands, with more success than in the Westerlands. Cersei’s call for arms wasn’t answered by several lords, and so there were still men to recruit. Of all those he had, he would say that barely five hundred came from the Westerlands. He was following the Kingsroad south to join the capital. He was only a few days away from Cersei. He didn’t enjoy the prospect of being reunited with her for one single moment. He didn’t know himself why he was even coming back to this shit of a city. For days, he tried to decide what he would do once he would be in the capital.

Jaime hadn’t remained for a single night at Casterly Rock. After the dinner with his aunt, he felt that he was no longer welcomed here. Genna could have kicked him out of the Rock if she had wanted to, but Jaime left his home of his own initiative that very night, heading for Kayce. He had been able to recruit thirty men in this city.

Genna’s words remained with him. The knowledge that he might have played a role in his mother’s death made him suffer like she couldn’t imagine. Of course, why didn’t he consider it as a possibility? Cersei always considered that Tyrion was responsible for their mother’s death. Jaime had never wondered why she died. He never blamed anyone for her death. Perhaps he should have. Perhaps he should have searched a reason for the loss of his mother, but he didn’t. He couldn’t even remember how she looked like. And now he had a niece with the name of the woman who brought him into the world. Jaime wished he could ride north alone, only to see her, and to see his brother. He didn’t want to hide anything. He and Tyrion had things to talk about. However, he couldn’t go north. He had to go to King’s Landing first. He had matters to settle there as much as in the North. He was only uncertain about the way to solve them.
Jaime looked to his hands. Black gloves covered them both. If the left one remained still, there was no way for someone to distinguish the golden hand from the hand of flesh. It was with these hands that he held Tommen into his arms. He held the dead body of his son. He knew that Genna was right about Cersei, and more than that. He knew that she killed Tommen. He knew that she wanted Tyrion dead, and his daughter too. He saw so much about Cersei that he refused to see before. No, he saw these things before as well, but he ignored them. He didn’t care, because Cersei was the woman he loved. He was very good at ignoring things. It was what he did since the day he joined the Kingsguard. He ignored the horrors and the crimes that were perpetrated right in front of him. You swore a vow to guard the king, not to judge him. The words of Ser Gerold Hightower were clear in his mind. He didn’t judge Aerys, not before the end. There were many people he never judged, because he believed it was useless to judge them. And now here he was, the one-handed knight. What was left of him? What had become of the young man who wanted to follow the steps of Barristan the Bold, Ser Duncan the Tall, the Dragonknight, the White Bull and the Sword in the Morning? Who was he now? The Kingslayer? Was that all he was?

A white point appeared on his right hand, only to disappear instantaneously. Then a second one appeared, a third one, a fourth one, and on and on, all melting at the very moment they touched his gloves. Jaime looked to the sky and saw the first snows fall on the Crownlands. The Starks are fools, but they are right. Winter always comes. He looked back to his hands. The melting snow disappeared as soon as it touched something, even on the golden hand that emitted no heat. It was melting snow. This was no surprise since they were the first snows of winter.

Jaime watched the encampment from the height where he stood. It was roughly delimited, and the interior was very disorganized. This was no army at all. He only had a dozen knights to supervise over one thousand men. He knew they wouldn’t stand a chance if they fought the Targaryen army. Their army could barely be called an army. What could he do with that once they reached the gates of King’s Landing? Well, in fact, he didn’t have to ask himself this question. There were no gates left to King’s Landing. He wasn’t even sure if this place could be called King’s Landing anymore. When he left, it made him think about the city of Valyria, in the way Tyrion sometimes described its ruins at supper. Five hundred thousand people he saved, only for them to know the same fate years later.

All that seemed so absurd to Jaime. All his life seemed so absurd now. His knighthood, his family name, his love for Cersei, his sword’s hand, his white cloak… Everything seemed so meaningless now. Jaime took one last look at the camp under the melting snow and left his point of observation. As he progressed to his tent, his heavy boots sent mud all around as he plunged his feet in the ground at every step. His tent was in view when Ser Elwood Harte called for him.

Jaime turned around to say that the newcomer could go and fuck himself, but he discovered to his great surprise that it wouldn’t be quite possible for the intruder in question. Brienne of Tarth was standing right before him. She was as ugly as the last time they saw each other, before she left for Casterly Rock, but her eyes were also bright and blue like the last time. He thought with regret that he didn’t ask about her when he came by the Rock. He thought that she was at Winterfell, protecting the daughter of Catelyn Stark turned Lady of the Westerlands, but here she was, standing right in front of him.

“Ser Jaime,” she told him.

“Lady Brienne. I didn’t expect to see you here,” he almost babbled.

“Ser Jaime, we need to talk.”

Something told him that she wasn’t about to talk about a pleasant matter. She looked worn out, although she continued to stand tall like the true knight Jaime would never be, and there was something in her face he never saw before.

“Of course, my lady.”

He showed her the way to his tent. When they arrived, Jaime offered her a seat, but she refused. He thought she could benefit from it, considering her obviously exhausted state, but he didn’t press it. Instead, he remained standing just like her, their heads at the same level.

“So, what brings you here?” he asked. “I thought you would be guarding my sister-in-law. Are you in mission for her, or did you leave her service?”

“I didn’t leave Lady Sansa’s service, Ser Jaime.” The opposite would have surprised him. “But I’m not on mission for her either. And I did ask her to relieve me of her service, but she refused.”

That surprised him. “Well, I never thought you would want to leave her.”

“This is not something I wanted. This is something I had to do. My father is dead. Officially, I’m going back to Tarth to bury his ashes.”

The words hung heavy in the cold air. “I know. I’m sorry.” How couldn’t he think about it? He almost forgot about the death of Brienne’s father. He didn’t have the time to know him.

“Ser Jaime, I heard you were in the capital when my father died.”

“Yes, I was.”

“Can you tell me how he died?” Jaime didn’t answer. “Ser Jaime, I know that my father was killed in the capital. I want to know who did this.”

“I can’t tell you,” Jaime said after a long moment.

Brienne looked at him for a long moment, then she nodded. He believed that she understood. “Very well. I thank you for your hospitality, Ser Jaime, but I must continue my journey.”

“Wait. Where are you going?” Something was telling him that she wouldn’t go to Tarth, and she proved him right.

“Toward King’s Landing. My father’s bones might still be there. And I want to discover what happened to him,” she added. “I wish you well, ser.”

“Cersei killed him.” Brienne stopped as she was about to leave the tent, and turned to look at him. “When the Great Sept was destroyed, and that the city burned, Cersei used the situation to take back the control of the Red Keep. Your father tried to stop her. I was outside the city walls. He was executed in the Great Hall at the very moment I arrived.”

The words spilled out of his mouth. For the first time in his life, he didn’t try to defend Cersei. He remembered the look of satisfaction and delight that she displayed as Lord Tarth’s throat was slit and life was choked out of him. He had Brienne’s eyes, and Cersei killed him.

He expected Brienne to look at him with revulsion, with disdain, just like she used to before Harrenhal, but she didn’t.

“I believe you.” She seemed to pity him. “What is this army for?”

“Cersei ordered me to raise men to help with the defense of King’s Landing. As if they’re going to make any difference."

He would have kept the latter sentence for him before, but he was tired of hiding his thoughts. With Brienne, he felt he could be himself like he never was with anyone, except Tyrion, but his brother was far away while Brienne was here, with him. He thought about asking her about Tyrion, but she spoke before he could.

“I don’t want us to be enemies, Ser Jaime.”

“Me neither.”

“Then I will go.”

“What are you going to do?” He already knew, but he asked all the same.

“My father was killed, Ser Jaime. I’m going to avenge him. I wish you good luck, and I hope our paths never meet again.”

She bowed and left. She didn’t show him any anger or hostility. Jaime remained alone, and he decided he couldn’t let her go.

He found Brienne as she was preparing her horse.

“I have to.”

“You won’t get inside the Red Keep. They will never open the gates for you. And even if they do, you would have the empty streets of the city to get through before. They are filled with bandits, assassins and killers, even more than before. And the men inside will never let you get close to Cersei.”

“I thank you for your concern, Ser Jaime, but I can defend myself.”

“Of course, you can, but you will never get to Cersei before someone kills you.”

She looked at him, dropping the reins of her horse. “If your own father was murdered, wouldn’t you do everything to avenge him?”

Yes, Jaime knew he would make the same thing, and he knew that no matter how people would try to dissuade him, he wouldn’t listen. If their positions were reversed, he would have told Brienne exactly the same thing.

“I don’t believe your father would want his only daughter to die.”

“My father is dead, Ser Jaime.”

She turned to her horse and was about to mount it. “You could follow me.”

She stopped in her movement. “I beg your pardon.”

“You could follow me, with the army.”

“Why would I? You’re bringing this army to defend your sister and her throne.”

“That’s what Cersei ordered me to do.” He looked straight at Brienne, to her blue eyes he always found kinder than Cersei’s. Jaime felt he had never been more certain about anything in his life. “But I don’t have to follow her orders.”

Next chapter : Daenerys
Daenerys finally arrives in King’s Landing.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The column spread from one horizon to the other. Dornishmen, knights of the Reach, Dothrakis, Unsullied, soldiers of the Stormlands, all united in one army, marching on the city of King’s Landing. They needed time to cross the Blackwater, but after Daenerys came back with her dragons, it wasn’t long before the forces still loyal to Cersei Lannister ran away with their tail between their legs. She only made one attack with Drogon over their main encampment, and the whole army disbanded. They needed time to build a bridge just strong enough to allow their armies to cross on the other bank of the river, but they did it, and now they were progressing towards King’s Landing.

The Lannister forces didn’t dare to attack them as they built the bridge. With boats, they brought forces strong enough to hold a position on the northern shore, and her dragons inspired enough fear to make their enemies think twice before attacking them. Now their whole army was in the Crownlands. According to her advisors, they would reach King’s Landing before nightfall.

It hadn’t been easy. There were tensions among everyone in her army. Daenerys spent a lot of time arbitrating discontents among her men. Dome and the Reach had a long history of shared hatred. The storm lords hated the Tyrells after they fought each other in the previous wars. The Dothrakis were despised by everybody. The Unsullied were barely seen as better. The only people to actually respect Grey Worm and his men were the Dothrakis. Essos and Westeros marched together, but not in harmony. And among the Westerosi, harmony was far from being gained either. Daenerys wondered how her father managed to rule all these kingdoms who were so different.

Another group who was despised were the Red Priests. Daenerys welcomed two of them on her war councils. Kinvara had been an unconditional ally ever since Meereen, and Revan was a very capable advisor and military commander. She witnessed his prowess in battle in Oldtown. However, the lords of Westeros didn’t like to see foreign priests advising her. Hostility was plain towards them, and the arrival of another one, Melisandre of Asshai, didn’t make things better. Daenerys didn’t allow her on her council. She once advised Stannis Baratheon, and the consequences of welcoming this woman on her councils would have been disastrous for her relations with her allies. She talked to this woman in private, however. She knew Jon Snow, and Daenerys needed as much information as she could gather on him.

Melisandre told her that she felt a power in Jon Snow, a power similar to the one she felt in Stannis Baratheon, and she said that she felt this power in Daenerys as well. The power was greater with Daenerys than with anyone else, but she claimed that Jon Snow’s was stronger than Stannis’s. She believed that Jon Snow could actually be a Targaryen, and that if he wasn’t, then he had dragon blood somewhere else among his ancestors. Daenerys didn’t know what to think of it. Did she really have a relative still alive in this world? She believed everyone was gone. At the same time, this meant that Jon Snow was an even more dangerous threat to her rule. She spoke about this with Trystane Martell one evening, and she asked him who was the true heir to the Iron Throne in his opinion.

Daenerys had asked him the question as some sort of test. If he answered that she was the only true heir to the Iron Throne, if he denied any evidence that Jon Snow could be a Targaryen and have a real claim, then she would know he was only licking her boots. But it wasn’t what happened. The prince of Dorne gave her a very relative answer. He said that legitimate children always prevailed in the succession, and that even if Jon Snow was the son of Rhaegar Targaryen and Lyanna Stark, he was only a bastard, and thus the throne belonged to Daenerys. However, there had also been a rule among the Targaryens that the heir was the closest male relative. When a king died without sons or grandsons, the crown went to his brothers, or his nephews, or his cousins, but never to his daughters if he had any. Trystane also said that in Dorne, it was always the closest relative, independent of the sex, who inherited. However, he couldn’t tell with certainty who the lords would support if Jon Snow really was who he pretended to be. He only told her that he didn’t believe his father would turn on her.

The prince had always been honest with her, and he did his best ever since he arrived in Meereen, although his decisions might not always be the best. Daenerys trusted him more than the Tyrells or the storm lords or the other lords of the Reach, or even the Dothraki commanders, who began to question her after she forbade them from raping and plundering. Daenerys also had to admit that he was handsome in his own way. He was far from being ugly, and truth be told, she thought he would make a better husband than Hizdahr zo Loraq.

She followed the column on its right. Ser Jorah and Grey Worm were accompanying her. It was the first time Grey Worm rode a horse, but he did it well enough. The Unsullied learned quickly. Daenerys spotted the small troop of men loyal to the Red Priests, the men they called the Fiery Hand. The priest with the mask led them, while Kinvara and Melisandre rode outside the column. In battle, it was obvious who was the real leader among the Red Priests.

Around Daenerys were empty fields. The wheat and corn were reaped a long time ago. Lord Tyrell told her the Reach had collected its last harvest before winter. She was wrapped in heavy dark robes. Ser Jorah told her it would only get colder as they progressed north. Winter is here. He could do nothing but quote the words of House Stark. On their way, her army had crossed the path of several thousands of people, refugees who were fleeing King’s Landing. Some asked for her help, others begged her to let them live. They believed she had come to kill them. Some even insulted her, and a few went as far as to curse her.

Against the opinion of her advisors, Daenerys welcomed them and ordered them to be dressed and fed. Even Ser Jorah opposed her decision, saying they would be a burden. The only one to support her was Kinvara. She would never forget the priestess’ outburst when Mace Tyrell said these people were useless mouths.

“If it were your children who came to us, starving and freezing, would you say they are useless mouths? No, because your children are from the nobility. That’s how you think. Because someone has a title before his name, because he’s a ser or a lord, then he’s worth something, but the other people are nothing to you. Have you ever considered what you would be without the smallfolk, Mace Tyrell? Have you ever wondered what you would eat, what you would wear, where you would live, if there weren’t people working to satisfy your every need, day and night? You won’t die of starvation or from the cold during the winter, but these people will. And yet they’re the ones who fill your granaries, build your castles and mend your roads. They are the ones who make this country what it is. So before you start saying these people are useless, you should lose a few pounds, because if there’s a useless mouth here, it’s yours.”

The Lord of Highgarden had been speechless, and furious, but Daenerys brought them all back to order. She wouldn’t abandon the people who came to her. If Mace Tyrell didn’t agree with her, he was free to ride back to Highgarden, and she would deal with him as soon as she was done with Cersei. She would only have to choose another Warden of the South. She told him so, and it was enough to shut him up.

Daenerys still made a compromise. The people who came to her had to help her. Revan suggested that each family who asked them for protection would have to give one man in age to fight in their ranks. The Red Priest said these people had to contribute to the war effort if they wanted her as their queen. Daenerys adopted Revan’s idea, but when the lords suggested they turn down the family who had no man capable of fighting, she refused. Families would provide one soldier when they could, or they would be left alone, but if they had no man of age to fight, then she would take them under her protection all the same. She wouldn’t ask from her people things that they couldn’t give her.

They had left early at dawn, and before the morning was over, they could see the city slowly appearing at the horizon. When they were close enough, Daenerys rode to a nearby hillock and looked at the city. She didn’t know what she expected. Maybe she expected a shining city, with walls made of gold, the Red Keep blazing in the morning sun, but the vision she discovered was entirely different. It looked like ruins. Entire pans of the walls were gone, and the buildings she could see were all black when they still stood. Even from afar, the scene before her was one of desolation, destruction, and abandon. She couldn’t imagine that someone was living there. The Red Keep stood tall, but it looked more like a prison than a castle. On one of the hills, there was a great structure, also in ruins.

“The Dragonpit?” she asked.

“Did you ever come here before?”

“Aye. A few times.”

“How did it look like, back then?”

“It was better. I never found King’s Landing quite attractive, or beautiful, but now it makes me think of Astapor. It wasn’t in ruins the last time I came.”

It was true. King’s Landing looked like Astapor after Daenerys killed the Good Masters.

“Fire.” Daenerys looked at her left to see Melisandre looking straight ahead, her look petrified and her mouth half-opened as she gazed at the city.

“Fire brings life, but he can also destroy it,” Kinvara said. She was standing next to Melisandre. She didn’t look surprised like the other Red Priestess. Melisandre bowed her head a little.

“That’s Cersei’s doing?” Daenerys asked.

“Yes. She was ready to be queen of the ashes. She wanted a crown at all cost, even if it meant having nothing left to rule.”

Daenerys looked again. There was an army camped before the walls. The camp was quite small. There were also other tents spread everywhere around the city. They were other refugees. Cersei would pay for that.

“How many men are there in front of us, Ser Jorah?” she asked.
“Three thousand, at best. They won’t hold against us. A simple charge should make them disband. The city could be ours within the hour.”

She thought about it. The Iron Throne was there, within easy reach. She only had to place her troops into formation, and to send her dragons after the army before them. The battle would be won within a few minutes. However, the enemy soldiers were not the only people she could see before her. There were other people outside the city, women, children and old men. And there were other people inside the city, surely. People hadn’t all left Astapor after she sacked it. Some remained behind, and certainly it was the same here. They would defeat Cersei’s army easily, but then, after…

A conversation came back to her mind, one that she had with Ser Barristan and Ser Jorah in Astapor. There was something her bear asked to Barristan. Have you ever seen a war where innocents don’t die by the thousands? The other knight had reluctantly answered by the negative. I was in King’s Landing after the sack, khaleesi. You know what I saw? Butchery. Babies, children, old men. More women raped than you can count. There’s a beast in every man and it stirs when you put a sword in his hand. She looked at the northern knight. She would never forget his words. If she gave the order to attack, King’s Landing would know the same fate again. She wanted the Iron Throne, but not at the cost of her people suffering.

“Send an envoy to the Red Keep. Tell Cersei that I want to talk with her. And that I will meet her outside the city walls,” she declared.

“Cersei Lannister will not accept, your Grace,” Jorah said.

“Send the envoy all the same.” She had to try. “Have him tell Cersei that I order her to meet me now, with the most important citizens of the city, and that it will be her only chance to negotiate. And convoke the lords for a war council. Tell the army to stop and to take position for battle.”

Daenerys stayed a few more seconds to look at the city in ruins, and then she rode back to her army. Her pavilion was in place in no time, and all the commanders in her army and her advisors were here as soon as it was ready. For the Reach, Lord Mace Tyrell was there, with Dickon Tarly, the Lord of Horn Hill, and Ser Baelor Hightower. Trystane Martell and Anders Yronwood represented Dorne. There were two lords for the Stormlands, three commanders of her Dothraki hordes, Malcolm Branfield, Grey Worm, Ser Jorah, the High Priestess Kinvara and Revan. Yara Greyjoy and Rodrik Harlaw were not present. They had gone to free the Shield Islands with the Redwynes after the Battle of Oldtown, and now they were probably heading for the Iron Islands. The latest reports said that Euron Greyjoy was on Pyke, gathering his remaining forces. Yara would have to crush them once and for all. She wouldn’t have the crown Daenerys promised her if she couldn’t deal with her uncle.

Daenerys opened the council. “My lords, I gave Cersei Lannister a chance to parley.”

She didn’t have to wait for reactions. “What is to discuss with that woman?” Lord Yronwood asked with scorn.

“She killed my father, your Grace,” Lord Tarly said.

“And my son,” Mace Tyrell added.

“She murdered tens of thousand people, if not more,” Revan summarized. His face turned towards her, though she couldn’t see it. “I don’t believe you’re going to offer her a way to escape, your Grace. Or else, I don’t know you as well as I thought.”

She looked at all her advisors. They were waiting for an answer from her. “I’m not going to spare Cersei, if you want to know. My father was called the Mad King, but I believe that now Cersei Lannister is the Mad Queen. The people of King’s Landing we met call her this way. My father had dozens, maybe hundreds of people burned alive, and he laughed as they died, but Cersei did the same for thousands of people. She destroyed an entire city. And while the city burned, she was playing the harp, drinking wine, and fucking her own brother.” The tales had been brought by the people of King’s Landing they met on their way. “I’m not going to spare her. The only choice I’m going to give her is to have a trial, and the chance for a painless death, but that is all. She’s going to die. You have my word. I never gave you any reason to doubt it before.”

“She will refuse, your Grace,” Dickon Tarly said.

“Probably, and if she does, then we will take the city by force.”

Everyone around her nodded in approval. What they didn’t know was that she wouldn’t only make an offer to Cersei. She expected her to refuse, but the people who had to support her rule may be more cooperative.

“The Unsullied will lead the attack on the city,” she resumed. “A detachment from the Reach, the Stormlands and Dorne will attack them directly while the Unsullied will get around to penetrate the city and take the Red Keep. The Dothraki will remain behind and chase the enemy if they flee.”

“The Unsullied may meet heavy resistance inside the city,” Kinvara warned. “Two priests are inside these walls. They say the streets have been abandoned by Cersei. She gathered all her men into the Red Keep. The alleys and avenues of the capital are controlled by bands of criminals who kill and loot everyone they see. They could pose some problems, and the Unsullied are not at their best when they are fighting in streets.”

“The Unsullied fight well wherever they go,” Grey Worm opposed, placid.

“With all respect, Torgo Nudho, you didn’t fight as well in the streets of Meereen as in the field. The Seconds Sons and the Fiery Hand fought better. They are better trained for this kind of fight.”

“You’re not going to let these foreign priests go first inside the city?” Lord Tyrell asked, clearly opposed to the idea, as were all the people from Westeros in this room.

“Westerosi don’t know how to fight,” one of the Dothraki said. “Let us take these houses of stone for you, Great Khaleesi.” It was a chance that the lords of Westeros didn’t understand Dothraki, but their expressions were nonetheless hostile towards the horselord.

Daenerys wanted the Unsullied to enter the city because she knew that if anyone else did, no matter if they were from Essos or Westeros, the city would know another butchery like when her father fell. Unsullied wouldn’t rape and wouldn’t kill innocents, they wouldn’t set fire to what was left of these ruins if she gave them the order, but the Dothrakis and the armies of Westeros would, no matter what orders she gave.

“This is my decision. The Unsullied will take King’s Landing,” she declared.

“Your Grace.” Revan spoke this time. “If I may, we should send the refugees who came to us in the vanguard.”

“You want to use them as arrow fodder?” Ser Jorah asked.

“These people don’t know how to fight. If we send them in the first lines, they will all die,” Kinvara argued.
“Not necessarily,” the other priest declared. “And anyway, the common soldiers seldom know how to fight in Westeros. They are mostly peasants, or drunkards found in taverns. But these men hate Cersei. She destroyed everything they held dear. Many lost people they loved because of her. They want revenge on her as much as most of the people in this tent. They will fight to the death, like savage beasts, to kill her. And there are people from King’s Landing in the army facing us. They only fight for Cersei because they are afraid of her. If they see their fellow townsman charging against them, they will hesitate to fight. They might even turn against Cersei and her other men. We could win this battle with very limited losses. And they know the streets of the city better than anyone. They will know how to face the criminals in the alleys. Some of them were members of such bands before they came to us. They are the ones with the best odds of taking the Red Keep in one swift attack. They might even kill Cersei for us.”

Daenerys thought about Revan’s plan. It was a bold one, but one that could succeed. Perhaps the citizens of King’s Landing would be so enraged at Cersei that they would only think about killing her and wouldn’t take time to plunder or rape. However, their rage could also lead them to commit atrocities against their own people. A man would never put fire to his own city, or kill the people he lived with for years. That didn’t stop the Sons of the Harpy in Meereen. Before Daenerys could take a decision, a man walked inside.

“Your Grace, Cersei Lannister has sent three emissaries to talk with you.”

She turned her attention to him. “And Cersei? I asked her to come as well.”

“She didn’t, your Grace. She wouldn’t come.”

“That settles the matter,” Lord Tarly stated. “She doesn’t want to parley. She refused your terms, your Grace. We should send the emissaries away and launch our assault on the city immediately.”

“We won’t,” Daenerys decided. “I’m going to listen to what these men have to say first.”

“You grace, this is useless,” Lord Yronwood argued.

“I disagree,” Revan declared. “These men could be useful to us. It’s always possible to turn an emissary who’s in a desperate situation against the person who sent him.”

“I agree with Revan.” Daenerys spoke to the man who brought her the news. “Tell them to wait for me before our army. The discussion will take place right in front of my men.” She then looked at all her advisors. “You follow me. You will all be present.”

She walked away from the tent, followed by a retinue of lords, knights, priests and military commanders. They took their horses and walked between lines of Dornish soldiers. As they emerged from the army, Kinvara quietly touched her arm.

“Stay far from these men, your Grace. Don’t get too close to them,” she said.

She didn’t plan to do so either. During parleys, she always remained at respectable distance from her interlocutors. As the messenger said, three men were waiting for her. They had come with horses as well, and they were still mounting them. One of them wore a red armor, while the two others, who stood in retreat, were dressed in doublets and with silks. They were no soldiers.

“Where is Cersei?” Daenerys asked. “I doubt we didn’t communicate well. I ordered her to meet me, but I don’t see her. Who are you?”

The man who led them stepped forward. “I am Ser Adam Whiterspoon. The men behind me are Tandos and Orac. They are prominent citizens of King’s Landing and their wealthiest merchants.
Queen Cersei sent us to discuss terms with you.”

“Queen Cersei?”

The man in armor was obviously uneasy, and the two behind him as well. None of them answered. So it was Daenerys who spoke.

“Cersei Lannister certainly told you that I am a foreign queen, who brought barbarians to kill your sons and rape your daughters. She certainly told you that I was as mad as my father. But I ask you to look behind you. Look at King’s Landing. My ancestors built this city. Look at what’s left of it. Look at what Cersei did.” She closed her eyes and raised her arm. “Now look over your head.”

After a few seconds, Drogon’s screech was heard. A few more seconds and the ground shook when he landed not far from them. When she opened her eyes, she saw the three men, terrified as they looked at her dragon.

“I have three like this one, and they all obey me. I could have ordered them to burn Storm’s End, Highgarden, Oldtown, and even King’s Landing again. But I didn’t. Look behind me. The lords and the knights of the Stormlands, of the Reach, of Dorne, and their people, the people of your city, they all stand with me. I am not a stranger. I was born on Dragonstone, and forced into exile because Tywin Lannister wanted me dead the very moment I was born. I was wailing in my cradle that he was already conspiring to murder me. I have Westeros behind me. Look at what you have behind you. It was Cersei who destroyed your city. It was Cersei who watched your homes and your people burn, and who started all this. And it’s not only Cersei who did this. Cersei is only a spoke on a wheel. This wheel spins, one spoke getting at the top, and another one replacing it after a time. And while the wheel keeps spinning, it crushes people on the ground, and the only ones who get something out of it are the Cersei Lannister of this world. Do you really want to fight for this woman? What has she ever brought to you? Death? Destruction? Why are you fighting for her?”

She waited for an answer again. The knight finally sighed after a long moment. “I swore an oath to House Lannister a long time ago. I pledged my life to them, promised to follow their orders.” His helmet was removed, and Daenerys saw tears coming to his eyes. “My wife was in Lannisport when the Ironborn attacked it. And instead of being there, the Imp had gone North, because his little wife wanted her home back. And Cersei… she did nothing for us either. I’m tired of serving them. All I ever gained from that is pain and sufferings.” He got off his horse. “I don’t know who you are, but I’m ready to serve you. I have nothing left tying me to the Lannisters.”

He knelt and looked to the ground. Daenerys was a little surprised of the effect her speech had. She didn’t expect that a knight would turn against her enemies so quickly. She looked at the merchants still sitting on their horses nonetheless.

“What do you have to say? I can free you from Cersei, but if you stay with her, you will share her fate.”

The two men looked at each other, and after an initial hesitation, they got off their horses as well, and came to kneel next to the knight. Daenerys decided to come on her feet too, and she was followed by a few other people behind her. She walked toward these men.

“Will you help me to free King’s Landing and to bring justice to Cersei?” she asked.

“Yes.” They all said it.
“Good. In this case, follow us. You’re going to help us to take King’s Landing.”

She turned away and proceeded to walk back to her command tent, but Kinvara raised the voice right at this moment. “Wait. You, remove your armor.” Daenerys turned her head and saw that she was speaking to the knight. “Unless you have something to hide beneath it.”

Her gaze wandered from the High Priestess to Ser Whinterspoon. He was back on his feet, just like the two others, but none of them dared to move. They remained still for a time, and then they moved. Everything was over within seconds. The knight produced a dagger from his armor, and so did the two merchants. They rushed towards her, their knives in the air. Ser Jorah appeared on her left, and Revan from her right, unsheathing his flaming sword. Jorah took care of the knight. In fewer time than was needed to say it, his sword was piercing his heart and coming out from his back. The Red Priest cut clean through one of the merchants, separating his chest from his legs. The other merchant looked at the sword burning with fire in utter fear. He had stopped in his attack, and before he could react, Revan punched him in the face, sending him on the ground, his hand releasing the blade he held. It bounced on the grass until it stopped, laying a few feet away from him.

In no time, Revan seized the man by the clothes and brought him back to her feet, the face ending first in the muddy grass. When the man managed to straighten his head and look up, she saw that he was bleeding from his broken nose. Fire was soon on his throat, and he flinched. Revan spoke to him in a very threatening tone.

“If you don’t want to die very painfully, I suggest that you tell us who sent you and why. Tell us everything, or else you’ll discover that slowly burning is the worst death someone can experience.”

The man was wailing on the ground. “Please, I beg you. Don’t kill me. I had no choice.”

“We always have a choice.” Ser Jorah stepped forward the merchant. “You tried to murder someone at a parley. You came with a banner of peace, and yet you tried to murder a queen you just acknowledged.”

“Please, don’t kill me. Please, don’t kill me. I beg you.”

Daenerys stood right in front of this man, her feet only a few inches from her. She looked at him, his ruined face covered with blood, his eyes begging for her. Daenerys was merciful, but only towards those who deserved it.

“If I remember well the rules of my country, an attempt of murder on your queen is punishable of death, and so is the murder during a parley under the protection of sacred laws.” She looked away from this man and spoke to Revan. “Kill him the way you want.”

The Red Priest nodded and raised his sword, the point directed towards the man’s chest. Daenerys looked at the man at her feet.

“Please, I had no choice,” he shouted. “She had my daughter.”

“Wait.” She raised her voice, ordering Revan to stop. He kept his sword in position, ready to kill the man any time. “Who has your daughter?” she asked the man.

“My Tansy. They have her. The que… Cersei took her prisoner. She said that if we didn’t kill you…” His words were lost as he gulped. “She has a man, Quiburn, he does… horrible things. She showed us what he did to the people who betrayed her. She told me that if we refused to kill you… She would do the same to my Tansy.”
He burst into tears, his face buried into the grass. Daenerys looked at him for a long time. Finally, she looked at Jorah. “Put him in chains. I’ll decide his fate later.”

The knight of Bear Island did as he was told.

“It was a trap,” Mace Tyrell said. He was still on his horse.

“Of course, it was a trap.” She looked at all her advisors. “I gave Cersei a chance to surrender peacefully, and she chose violence. We’re going to give it back to her. Join your men. We begin our attack now. Follow the plan I gave you. Grey Worm, find Cersei and keep her alive. I will have her executed myself.” She looked at the city, and to the Red Keep looming over it. “Before the end of the day, King’s Landing will be ours,” she said loudly.

Men behind her cheered. She turned and saw that the whole army were raising their arms. She walked between their ranks. They were hitting their shields as she walked by them, eager to fight. She didn’t care to take back her horse. Cersei just tried to kill her. She would pay for that. Daenerys reached an elevated position. Cersei’s army was so small. Her few thousands were nothing next to her tens of thousands. Her men would reduce hers to nothing within minutes.

“And now it begins.” Kinvara had joined her.

“No. Now it ends,” Daenerys replied. She wouldn’t use her dragons this time. She wouldn’t take the risk of burning King’s Landing again. She looked at Kinvara who stood next to her. “You knew something like that was coming. You knew they would try to kill me. That’s why you warned me to stay far from them, and that’s why you asked the knight to remove his armor.”

“I only suspected.”

“You had another vision in your fires?” Daenerys asked, expecting the High Priestess to say yes.

“No. Melisandre had a vision, but she made mistakes before when she interpreted them. She said that she saw daggers waiting for you, hidden behind a white clothe. I only took precautions.”

Daenerys returned her attention to the battle that was about to begin in front of her. Her army began to move forward. “I’ll need a discussion with Melisandre once this is all over.”

Her army engaged the enemy. The cavalry of Dorne, the Reach and the Stormlands rode around her main forces and attacked Cersei’s forces from behind. The Unsullied, who remained in reserve before, chose the moment to join the action and ran towards the city. King’s Landing was defenceless, except for the Red Keep. Grey Worm and his men would have to take it. It was at this moment that a scout came to tell her that a new Lannister army just arrived.

Chapter Notes

I’m sorry to have delayed the release of this chapter for so long. I’ve been very busy lately, and I try my best to keep up with two chapters every week. I also just received confirmation that my master in Economics is completed. 😊

So, the last chapter, we saw the beginning of the Battle of King's Landing. It continues here. Daenerys just defeated the army Cersei had assembled, and escaped an attempt of murder, but another army is entering the battlefield.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

BRIENNE III

They were slowly progressing on the Kingsroad. She rode next to Ser Jaime ever since they met a few days ago. And ever since their discussion the day they were reunited, he remained silent. He didn’t say a word to her since that day.

She looked at him. The grim and hollow expression on his face gave him an appearance quite similar to the one he had after Locke cut his right hand. She used to despise him before that. For her, he was the Kingslayer at this moment, and nothing more. Her entire opinion of him was solely based on the fact that he killed the king he swore to serve. But then he saved her life, lied to Locke and his men about the supposed riches of Tarth, and when she saw how their captors mocked him and mutilated him, she could only pity him. That didn’t stop her from despising him. He remained the Kingslayer in her eyes. It was only after he told her the truth about the reasons that led him to murder the Mad King that her opinion completely changed about him. There was so much more about this man than she believed at first.

Ser Jaime had been a broken man after he lost his hand, and right now he looked like that again, a broken man. He was about to betray his own sister. Brienne was aware of the stories that were told about the Kingslayer. She was there when he confessed to Lady Stark that he had never been with another woman than his sister, but she didn’t care about it. No matter what were his feelings for Cersei Lannister, she knew it had to be hard for him to turn against someone of his own blood. He turned against his own king before, but now it was about fighting someone of his own blood. She couldn’t begin to imagine how he was tortured in his mind.

“You don’t have to do this, Ser Jaime, you know. Nothing forces you to help me. She is your sister, no matter the crimes she committed.”

He didn’t look back at her, but he granted her an answer all the same. “It’s all right.”

“I’m just going to have the drawbridge lowered and the portcullis opened for you. After that, you’re on your own.” He spoke with exasperation. “I may be a kingslayer, but I’m not a kinslayer. Or at least not too much. If there’s someone who can claim that she is capable of killing someone of her own blood in my family, it’s Cersei. The queen sends her regards.”
He said the last sentence with venom. She didn’t push the matter further. She understood that he had very good reasons to not want to talk about it. The struggle he faced when he had to decide what to do about the Mad King had been horrible, and the one he faced right now was certainly not easier.

“I just want to tell you, Ser Jaime, that when all this is over, I would understand if you hated me.”

That didn’t mean that she wouldn’t kill Cersei. She ordered the death of her father. Lord Selwyn Tarth had come to King’s Landing to serve the king, Cersei’s own son, on the request of Lord Randyll Tarly, the Hand of the King, and for that he was murdered. She was ready to live with Ser Jaime’s hatred for the rest of her life. It wouldn’t be easy, but she would manage.

“How could I hate someone who would kill my sister, when she already succeeded to make me wish she was dead?” She turned her head towards him, and she met his gaze. “I couldn’t hate you for that, Brienne. I couldn’t hate you, no matter what you do.”

She didn’t really know how to reply to this, so she only nodded in acknowledgement. They continued to ride without talking to each other. The entire army said no word. When Brienne rode with Renly, there were animated discussions at all times, day and night, while they were moving or resting. The knights were riding for a king they loved, and they believed in him and in his victory. When she rode with Lord Tyrion and Lady Sansa to Riverrun and then to Winterfell, the atmosphere hadn’t been merry, but men were mostly in good spirits between themselves. In this army, the silence was complete, heavy, thick. You could cut it with a knife.

The men who marched with Ser Jaime didn’t believe in their cause, or in the queen they were tasked to save. They were freezing, following the path to King’s Landing not because they wanted to, but because they were ordered to. Nor their mind nor their heart were on the task at hand. They wouldn’t stand a chance against the armies of the southern kingdoms. Brienne knew the knights of the Reach well enough from her time with Renly’s army to be conscious that Jaime’s men would stand no chance against them. They would die, and they would die for a queen that they didn’t want to serve, and a queen who didn’t deserve to be served.

It had been difficult for Brienne to leave Lady Sansa. She respected her immensely, and she had come to be proud to serve her, as much if not more than to serve her lady mother. They had the same strength, and she had come to respect Lord Tyrion as well. The fact that he was Ser Jaime’s brother helped her to have a better opinion of the Lord of Casterly Rock. She didn’t want to leave her lady’s service, but she had to. She had been heartbroken at the news of her father’s death. It didn’t take long for her to guess who was the cause of his death. She understood at this moment how Ser Jaime must have been conflicted in the days when he served the Mad King. Her loyalties had never been conflicted before, but now she had to choose between her loyalty to her father’s memory, or her loyalty to Lady Sansa. That’s why she asked her lady to relieve her from her service. She didn’t want her two loyalties to conflict, and she didn’t want the daughter of Lady Catelyn to have a sworn shield who couldn’t completely dedicate herself to her. In the end, Lady Sansa refused to allow her to leave her service, but she allowed Brienne to leave in order to bury her father’s bones. Brienne wished that Lady Sansa just released her from her oath. Instead she had to lie to her lady. She couldn’t tell her the real reason why she was going south. She was leaving to kill the woman who murdered her father, and she couldn’t tell that to Lady Sansa, or she would have denied her request. She had lied to her lady, to the person she swore to protect. If she was to die after she killed Cersei, she wouldn’t oppose it. At least she could see her father again.

“I beg your pardon.” It was the first time that he actually started the conversation since they were reunited.
“How is she? My niece. Tyrion’s daughter, or Sansa’s daughter, whoever you prefer. We’ll be in King’s Landing within hours, so it might be the last chance I’ll have to hear about her.”

She was surprised he didn’t ask about his niece before, and even more surprised that she didn’t think about telling him about the little Lady Joanna. Brienne wished that Lady Stark was alive to see her first grandchild.

“She has blond hair, and green eyes, like you.” She didn’t know what else to say. Brienne had no experience with children. She was too young to remember her two younger sisters when they died in the cradle, her father never had other children after her mother died, and Brienne never married.

Jaime released a very short laugh. “A true Lannister. I hope Catelyn Stark will not want to kill Tyrion more than she already did.” He looked straight ahead of him, and it took him a moment before he spoke again. “Do you think I’ll have other nephews and nieces?”

“I hope so. The Lady Sansa hoped as well.”

“She’s Lady Stark’s daughter, for sure. Too bad I’ll never get to see them.”

Brienne frowned at this. “What do you mean?”

“What do you mean, Ser Jaime? You’re not dying?” For a moment, she feared the worse. Had his injury not been treated well?

“You’re really dumb, sometimes.” She felt insulted at this. “The Mad King’s daughter is conquering all the Seven Kingdoms. It’s only a matter of time before she rules them all. No one can stop her. She has dragons, the Tyrells, the Martells. Even Tyrion’s wits won’t defeat her. And when she gets her hands on me, what fate do you expect for the man who murdered her father?”

“You did the right thing. Aerys wanted to destroy an entire city full of people. If you tell her…”

“Even if I did, she will not believe me. And that is if she allows me to speak, which I doubt. I will probably be fed to dragon flames the moment she learns who I am.”

“You should tell her all the same. Everyone should know why you did what you did.”

“What will it change? I’ll die all the same. Let everyone believe that I am the Kingslayer. It’s simpler.
People like to keep things simple.”

“What if I tell them?”

He looked at her. “Go on, and see if someone believes you. Perhaps you’ll have more luck than with the shadow who killed Renly.”

After that, they resumed their shared silence. There were a lot of things that Brienne wanted to tell him, but she was never good with words. She didn’t know how to tell them, nor what to tell first.
The words remained stuck in her throat. The few miles before them went on, the surroundings looking the same everywhere around them. Finally, they started to distinguish a city far before them.
First, they saw the Red Keep, the tallest structure in the capital. It grew as they kept moving forward, and after some time Brienne couldn’t discern the city walls. She noticed that the Great Sept of Baelor was nowhere to be seen. After a time, she realized there were gaps in the walls. Entire sections were missing. It was as if King’s Landing endured the same fate than Harrenhal. Only it wasn’t a castle this time, but an entire city, with five hundred thousand people living inside. How many of them survived? Brienne was so stunned by the scene before her that she didn’t hear the great roar or Ser Jaime’s voice.

“Brienne! Wake up, you fucking wench!” He got her attention. “Look! There!”

He pointed towards a spot in the sky, and when Brienne followed the index of his left hand, she was paralyzed beyond comparison. A gigantic beast was flying in the air, all black.

“DRAGONS!”

A man behind her shouted what she thought. She saw images of the beasts in the books she had to read at Tarth in her childhood, but to actually see one was a completely different experience.

“Brienne, ride forward! Full speed!” Before she could react, a slap on her horse’s bottom caused it to run like a demon. Ser Jaime appeared next to her not long after, crouched on his mount. “We run straight to the Red Keep. With some luck, we’ll get there before the Targaryens can.”

Another powerful screech thundered over their heads. She looked up to see the black dragon heading toward them.

“Keep riding! Go to the Red Keep!” Ser Jaime shouted to her before he changed his course… which brought him straight towards the dragon who was heading for them.

“Jaime!”

Under shock, before she could turn her horse towards him, a burst of fire emerged from the beast’s mouth and engulfed Jaime and his mount. Brienne forced her own horse to stop and turned to look at the scene of devastation before her. Where Ser Jaime Lannister rode a moment ago, there was only fire. No, that wasn’t possible. He couldn’t be dead. She had to see. She ordered her horse forward, and rounded the fire.

“Jaime! Ser Jaime!” She shouted with all the power of her lungs. When she was about a half-turn, she noticed something crawling on the ground. She recognized the armor. “Jaime!”

He raised his head, his face covered with mud. “Still in one piece. Well, almost.” He raised his right hand. “I’m the most unlucky of all men.”

She approached him and extended her hand. He took it, and with a strong effort, she pulled him onto her horse behind her. It was then that Brienne realized that the dragon had unleashed hell on the army Ser Jaime brought with him. They were running in all directions, trying to evade the rain of fire that fell upon them.

She felt Jaime squeeze her arm. “They’re lost. There’s nothing we can do for them.”

She watched as the dragon, ridden by a woman with blond hair, kept slaughtering the thousand men who reluctantly followed the knight behind her to the capital. She couldn’t escape in this direction, go north, so there was only another to take. She turned south and rode for King’s Landing. Jaime seized her by the hips to steady himself behind her. His arms around her caused a strange yet pleasant feeling into her belly. She rode into the city through one of the breaches and, looking up for a moment, she headed towards the Red Keep.

The silence that reigned into the city after the battle, if it could be called a battle, was unsettling. Brienne had to lower the pace of her mount several times because of the debris on the ground.

“Cersei didn’t care to make some cleaning while I was gone. That doesn’t surprise me,” Ser Jaime said behind her as they had to slow down once again.

Brienne took in view everything around her. She was surprised by the state of the city from the outside, but from the inside, it was a scene of horror. There were no people in the streets, except for a few they came upon who hid their faces and ran away as soon as they saw them. It looked like an abandoned city, all the opposite to what it was the last time she was there.

“You see what Cersei did,” resumed the knight. “That’s what Aerys wanted to do. Finally, it was very useful to kill him. Someone else did his job.” He stayed silent for a moment. “You shouldn’t kill Cersei.”

“You saw what she did, Ser Jaime. Someone must stop her.”

“I agree, but this someone isn’t you. I know what it is, to be an assassin. If you kill Cersei, you’ll never be the same again.”

“If I don’t do it, then who will?”

“You saw that dragon. Cersei is doomed. Daenerys will execute her. Your father will be avenged. Let her do the dirty work. The result will be the same in the end. I don’t want you to be haunted for the rest of your days like I was after I killed Aerys. I don’t want you to be called the Queenslayer.”

His words touched her more than he thought. “What do you suggest we do?”

“We go to the Red Keep. I’ll have a discussion with Cersei, and I’ll do what’s necessary, but stay away from that. I may be able to convince her to surrender. This way a few more men won’t have to die.”

They continued their path. She didn’t have the impression that Cersei Lannister would surrender. She had a bad feeling about all this.

After a long time alternating between quicker and slower paces, they finally arrived before a junction. The pathway leading to the Red Keep was perpendicular to the street they rode in. They were about to turn left and ride to the Red Keep’s gates, when she heard heavy sounds in front of her. Half a dozen men with spears, shields, helmets, armors and pads all in black were coming from the other side of the street. They were at the same distance from the pathway. Brienne rushed forward, and when they reached the path, she climbed down and unsheathed her sword.

The fight was quick but deadly. These men, whoever they were, fought well, but they only had spears, and as soon as Brienne got too close to them, she had the advantage. A few moments later, they were all lying dead on the ground, and she didn’t have a single scar. She had a few scrapes on her armor, but no injury, small or big. She turned to look at Ser Jaime.

“We must head for the Red Keep before more comes,” she told him as she walked to mount her horse once more.

“You will do no such thing.”

The voice behind her back stopped her. She turned to it and saw a man wearing the usual set of armor from Westeros walking in their direction, his sword unsheathed. Brienne walked to block him the way and they stopped several feet from each other. It was then that more men in black plate and with spears came from behind him and stopped in perfect combat formation, their spears pointed at her, their shields protecting their stomach. Brienne raised her sword, ready to fight. There were about twenty of them this time, and more were coming. The only man with a sword, who seemed to be the only one coming from Westeros, looked at Ser Jaime.
“The Kingslayer,” he said.

“A bear sigil,” Ser Jaime replied after a time. Brienne realized it was true. The man had a sigil on his armor, and she knew what sigil it was. She saw the same on Lady Lyanna Mormont’s men. “How are you doing, Ser Jorah? You look older than in my memories.”

Jorah Mormont. He was the cousin of Lady Lyanna, the former Lord of Bear Island, who was sentenced to death by Lord Stark for practicing slavery, and who fled to Essos to escape justice.

“And I heard you lost a hand, Ser Jaime. Now, surrender peacefully. You don’t have to die.”

“Really? Let me doubt it, Mormont. You’re serving the woman we just saw on the dragon, don’t you?”

“Daenerys Targaryen, aye. She’s my queen. And I demand that you surrender to her.”

“And if I don’t?”

“You will die,” Jorah Mormont said very seriously.

“I will die if I surrender as well. She will kill me for murdering her father.”

“And with good reasons, but at least you will get a fair trial. Maybe she will even allow you to take the black.”

Ser Jaime looked straight at the knight of Bear Island. “Did you take the black when Ned Stark sentenced you to death? Do you really think then that I’ll take it, when you didn’t?”

Ser Jorah made one more step. “Get off your horse, Ser Jaime. Drop your sword, kneel, and the queen may let you live. You only have one hand. You cannot defeat me.”

Brienne made her own step forward and pointed her sword towards the northern knight’s face. “You won’t fight him. You’ll fight me,” she said.

Jorah Mormont considered her for a moment. “Who are you?”

“My name is Brienne of Tarth.”

“You are the daughter of Selwyn Tarth? I met your father a few times. He was a good man. I’m sorry for what Cersei did to him. He didn’t deserve to die.”

“Oh, come on, Mormont,” Ser Jaime mocked. “You’re glad that Cersei killed her father. That made the Stormlands much more sympathetic to your cause. Don’t tell me you mourned the fact that they wouldn’t fight for Cersei.”

“No, but you don’t mind selling criminals into slavery to fill your pockets.”

“I also didn’t kill my king.”

“You don’t know the whole story, Ser Jorah,” Brienne intervened. “You don’t know why Ser Jaime killed Aerys. The king wanted…”

“Don’t tell him, Brienne,” Jaime interrupted. “He’s not going to believe you. He would rather believe the story that best fits his interest. He wouldn’t want to believe what his queen’s father truly was. Tell me, Ser Jorah, did you fuck your queen like I did.” The knight of Bear Island didn’t answer, but he was obviously angry. “Oh, fuck, he’s in love with her. I thought that what I saw when he said her name was an illusion.”

“That’s enough,” Ser Jorah cut short. “Lady Brienne, we have nothing against you. Your family didn’t fight us when we arrived. Step aside and let us arrest Ser Jaime. Queen Daenerys will acknowledge you as Lady of Tarth and allow you to go back to your home.”

Tarth. It had been so long since she last saw it. How would it be after all this time. Her father was gone. She would never see him again in the halls and the corridors of Evenfall. It wouldn’t be the same. It wouldn’t feel like home anymore.

“And I suppose I will have to bend the knee before your queen?”

“Of course. Your father once served her father, and it was Cersei who killed him. I don’t understand why you would protect her brother.”

“I can’t bend the knee before Daenerys,” Brienne declared.

“Why not? What’s stopping you? The Baratheons are gone. You have no other lord to obey.”

“I swore an oath, and I cannot serve your queen without breaking it.”

“What oath?”

“I swore to serve and protect Sansa Stark, and as long as Daenerys Targaryen is at war with her brother, I’ll have to fight your queen.” Ser Jorah looked surprised by what she just said. “You are a Mormont, Ser Jorah. Your family was loyal to House Stark for centuries. Your father was Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. I know you broke the laws of Westeros and sullied the honor of your house, that you were forced into exile because of your actions, but you are still a Mormont. You are still a knight, and I know there must be some honor left in you. Your cousin is Lady of Bear Island, and she supports Jon Snow. You know that you will have to fight her, sooner or later. The time will come when you’ll have to face your own kin. Do you really want this?”

The knight had a pained expression. “I wish things were different, but now I have a queen and my family cast me aside, and they won’t accept me back.”

Brienne looked at Jaime. His face was still all covered with sweat and mud. He truly looked very much like the first time they met, in the Riverlands. Back then, she hated him. Now she loved him.

“Jaime,” she began. It was difficult for her to say the words. “Ride to your sister. Do what needs to be done.”

The time seemed to hold still. He looked at her, and said her name. “Brienne.” No one ever said her name like this. She didn’t know for how long they remained like this, just looking at each other, but it wasn’t long enough for her. Too soon, he broke their eye contact and rode towards the Red Keep. She turned to Ser Jorah and his men. They had to be at least fifty now, but none of them moved. The knight of Bear Island was looking at her with a strange expression.

“You know he will die for sure. The queen will not spare him,” he said.
“I know.” Admitting it was very difficult for her. She didn’t want Jaime to die. She saw Renly die. He died in her arms. She couldn’t suffer to see the same fate happen to Jaime.

“You cannot save him.”

“I know.” But I will try all the same. She positioned herself in a waiting stance, her sword risen, waiting for any attack, before the entrance to the pathway leading to the Red Keep.

“I don’t want to kill you, Lady Brienne. Your father was a good man. I don’t want to kill his daughter.”

“I’m not a lady Ser Jorah, and you will not kill me.”

“I’ll have to.”

“You can try to kill me, but you will not succeed.”

He nodded, a sad expression on his face. “I will do my duty.”

He took position and slowly advanced on her. She allowed him to come, letting him believe he had the advantage. Her master-at-arms, Goodwin, always told her to use the fact that men believed she was weak as a weapon against them.

Ser Jorah launched the first attack. After three swings she easily blocked, he went back into position. Then he made a series of four hits, which she all blocked as well. He wasn’t using his full force against her. He wasn’t trying to kill her. She could use that. Brienne was taller than him. At his third series of attacks, she launched a counter-attack, which he barely managed to parry. She managed to push him back, though he didn’t fall on the ground.

After that, it was a series of swings, feints, blocks, and anything they could use. Ser Jorah was struggling to keep up against her. His age was wearing down on him. She was younger, stronger and taller. Finally, she pushed him on the ground with all the force of her body. She remained at good distance and allowed him to stand back.

He rushed towards her, almost taking her unaware. Her stance was unbalanced for a time, and the northern knights took advantage of it. She backed away, but he kept throwing his sword against her, until she felt a wall behind her. He swung his sword with all his force against her, and she just managed to block it. Her own sword approached her face for a short time under the force of the attack. However, she recovered her minds and pushed back her opponent once again.

She saw a few of the men in black running to the pathway. She made a run to intercept them and thrusted her sword into the belly of one of them, then pushed another against a wall. He tried to keep her at bay with his shield, but when she backed away, she turned to swing at another soldier who ended without a head. She turned again to the soldier she just left alone as his spear was coming to her head. She deflected it with her sword and cut his arm.

A great pain got through her leg. She yelled and turned on herself, swinging her sword in the process. When she looked at the result, a part of the man’s head was gone. The sword that pierced her leg laid on the ground. She looked at her left to see the contingent of men in black plates advancing on her in tight formation, their long spears forming a deadly wall before them. Despite the pain in her leg, she prepared herself for the shock. She failed to protect Renly. She wouldn’t fail to protect Jaime.

They shall not pass.
I came up with this idea of Brienne vs Jorah quite lately. I thought it would be interesting to see a verbal face-to-face between him and Jaime as well, since the two men were dishonored by their actions, but they also did everything to atone for what they did. Now Jaime is heading for the Red Keep... alone.

CERSEI IX

“Where is Littlefinger?”

She was sitting on the Iron Throne, her hands digging into the sharp steel, as she looked at Qyburn who stood below her, impassive.

“He’s nowhere to be found, your Grace, I’m afraid,” the maester calmly answered.

“How is that possible. Where is he?” she shouted.

“We may have to consider the possibility that he escaped, your Grace.”

“That’s impossible. He had two guards watching him at every time. They even followed him to the privy.”

“I made a few inquiries, your Grace. It seems that two of your men are missing, and they guarded Lord Baelish together for eight hours yesterday. No one has seen the Master of Coin since that time.”

Cersei began to realize what it meant. “How could he leave the Red Keep? All the gates are closed.”

“There are other ways to leave the keep, your Grace.”

“I thought you controlled these passages.”

“I do, for most of them, your Grace, but despite my best efforts, I’m afraid some of Varys’s little birds escaped my attention. There are some places beneath us that I don’t even know.”

“Who were the men guarding him?”

“Two red cloaks, your Grace.”

“How could he convince two red cloaks loyal to House Lannister to let him go?”

“He may have bribed them, your Grace.”

“The red cloaks are loyal to House Lannister.”

“These two men were recruited recently. I looked at their records and asked questions among the other red cloaks. It seems they were sellswords only two years ago.”

“Littlefinger had no money to give them. We spoiled him of all his riches.”

“He may have hidden a few from us, your Grace. Lord Baelish had so many ventures all over Westeros that it is impossible to be sure of his real fortune. And anyway, as Master of Coin, he had access to all the resources of the Crown, and although our coffers are not full, there is more than enough to bribe two mercenaries.”

“He had no right to use this money. This gold belonged to me.”

“It is yours, your Grace, indeed. But there are thieves everywhere in this world.”

Cersei gripped the steel until she bled from her hands. “The Knight of the Vale? Where are they? WHERE ARE THEY?”

“There is no sign of them, your Grace. An army with the Lannister banner arrived not long ago from the north, but there’s no way to tell if this is Ser Jaime or the remnants of Ser Daven’s army. Anyway, there are barely one thousand men, and I’ve just been told that Daenerys unleashed her dragons on them…”

“Then why tell me at all? This is not a thousand men taken in the sewers of Lannisport that we need. We need the Knights of the Vale.”

“Against dragons, I’m afraid even the Knights of the Vale…”

“SHUT UP!” She stood up. “Only talk when your queen gives you the right to do so.” She wanted nothing more than to cut Qyburn’s head right now, with her own fingers if necessary.

“Of course, your Grace. Forgive me.”

Her anger abated. Qyburn was one of the few who still obeyed her and didn’t look at her like an object of contempt. She could only rely on him. Littlefinger’s latest treason was only another proof that her Hand was the only trustful person in this city.

“How is the battle going?” she asked, sitting back into the throne.

“Not well, I’m afraid. All our forces are disbanding. Daenerys Targaryen has more men, and she has dragons. I don’t believe our men on the battlements will keep their positions when she attacks. Even if the scorpions we placed were all used, killing one dragon wouldn’t be enough.”

Cersei remained silent. What Qyburn said didn’t surprise her. She didn’t expect her men to stay loyal to her. She didn’t trust them. They would run, trying to save their own skin, rather than fight for their queen.

“Young Grace, I could arrange an escape for you. I know tunnels that could lead us far away from the city before the enemy could realize that you’re gone.”

“And where would I go, Qyburn?” She looked at him. For the first time, he said nothing. “My kin turned on me. The doors of Casterly Rock are closed to me, and if I find refuge anywhere, I will be nothing more than a prisoner. Varys will find me, and my captors will surrender me to this eastern whore the moment her dragons are seen. Who would protect me? Jaime? He can’t even defend himself.”

Her twin betrayed her. He should have saved her, fight for her, and he didn’t. He abandoned her. He was probably in the North, looking at the little monster some people called their niece, finding her beautiful. The thought that the Imp gave to his daughter the name of her lady mother enraged Cersei like no one could imagine. And now she couldn’t rely on the Vale. After they defeated the army Tyrion sent south at the Crossroads, she believed she could count on the Knights of the Vale, but she was wrong. They betrayed her, just like everyone else.
“Well, your Grace, if you don’t want to leave, then you have two options. You can surrender, or you can fight, but both options are quite hopeless.”

“I know that I will die, Qyburn, and that there is no way out of this. But if I have the choice to surrender and die, or to fight and die, then I know very well what choice I’ll make.”

She let her words sink into the empty Great Hall. It was deserted safe for her and Qyburn. She might be alone, she may be a queen that no more than a few hundred people acknowledged, but she was the queen nonetheless, and she would remain queen until the moment she died.

“However, I don’t have two choices. I have three.” Qyburn’s face showed that he understood what she meant. He was always quick to understand what she intended to do before she voiced it, sometimes before she even thought about it. “You know what to do, Qyburn.”

“Yes, your Grace.”

He bowed and left. There was no hesitation in his departure, nor any hurry. He obeyed without question. He was the last one to do so, and he would be the last until the end.

She was alone. She had been alone almost all the time lately. She didn’t regret the company of many people, but she regretted Jaime’s company. It was a foolish notion, she knew it, but she couldn’t help but miss him. She didn’t understand how she could love such a man. She believed he was her other half, a part of her, but now she knew that had never been the case. Cersei had always been alone, even when she was with someone else. She could rely on herself and only on herself in every circumstance since her birth. She never formed ties with someone else. Everyone was a tool to reach her objectives. Even her children. She had loved them, but they were tools all the same. She loved them because she had no choice but to love them. How could a mother not love her children? It was possible for her to have doubts about the bond that linked her to Jaime, but it was impossible to ignore that her sons and her daughter were a part of her. When they died, a part of her died as well. She had been slowly dying ever since the day Joffrey died.

It was in this room, in the Great Hall, that Joffrey was crowned king. She stood next to him when Ned Stark tried to take away what was hers, and she was there to witness the slaughtering of the Northerners, and Littlefinger holding a dagger at the fool’s throat.

She was there when Sansa so sweetly pleaded for her father’s life. She did look so sweet back then. Cersei never thought a single moment that the Stark girl could be her downfall one day, or that she could take for herself what rightfully belonged to Cersei. Even now, she was having doubts. Could Sansa really have done all these things? She had tried to advise the girl, to help her to survive in this nest of vipers, and nothing in Sansa ever told her that she could be a problem one day. The problem had always been Tyrion, and then Margaery. They were her downfall. To think that the smiling whore survived the destruction of the Great Sept of Baelor made Cersei wish she could explode of anger just like the sept.

There were so many memories attached to this place, and so few of them were happy. The births of her children ad the time when she took care of them were the only moments she truly enjoyed since she arrived in the capital at the age of nineteen. Even the moments when she crushed her enemies didn’t look like happy when compared to this. Without her children, she would have thrown herself from the highest tower a long time ago. They were her only joy in life. But then they grew up, they got far from her, and they died. She lost them. They were taken away from her, her only true reason to live.

She thought of the daughter Sansa just had. She told her to only love her children and no one else. Strangely, she hoped the girl heeded her advice. If she somehow came to love Tyrion, she would suffer from it. Cersei hoped that Sansa would suffer. At the same time, she thought about the baby who was in a cradle, somewhere. Did she look like Myrcella when she was born? Was Sansa’s labor as painful as the one she had for Joffrey? She hoped it was. Cersei had placed a bounty on Sansa’s daughter. Perhaps the news of her death would need time to spread and someone would kill the Imp’s bastard before he knew there was no one left to give him his reward. The image of a baby in a cradle appeared before her eyes. It wasn’t Joffrey. It wasn’t Myrcella. It wasn’t Tommen. She didn’t know who it was, but she felt that it was her niece. Somehow, she looked entirely normal, sweet, innocent, even pretty. Could Tyrion’s child really look like that? There had to be something hidden under the sheets, something horrible she couldn’t see. And yet the little girl seemed so innocent, so vulnerable. Love no one but your children.

“Forgive me.” She whispered the words without realizing it. The image disappeared, and she realized that she had cried. She kept inside the other tears that threatened to break, and wiped the ones on her cheeks with her sleeve. She would be strong until the end. She was Cersei Lannister, Queen of Westeros, and anyone who wanted to take the throne she was sitting on would have to get through her first.

The great doors opened. From them, a brown man came in. He had mud and soil all over his body. The noise of his boots on the floor revealed he wore an armor. He had a sword in one hand, and something round in the other. As he approached, Cersei realized that blood was dripping from the sword, leaving fresh red droplets that lined as he walked toward her. Cersei was about to shout for help when she realized he looked very much the same when he came back at the end of the war.

“Jaime.” Her brother was back. She thought he abandoned her, but he was back. Had she been wrong? For once, Cersei felt that she could happy that she was wrong. She stood up and descended the steps of the dais. “Jaime, have you brought the men I asked you?”

As she arrived on the floor, her brother threw the rounded thing before her. It rolled at her feet and when it stopped spinning, Cersei saw the face of Qyburn looking in her direction.

“I killed Rossart when he tried to do the same. Did you really think I would let Qyburn do it again?” The voice of Jaime sounded distant as she looked in horror at the head of her Hand. Qyburn was standing before her only a few minutes ago, and now his head was looking without life past her.

She looked at her brother. His gaze showed an anger she never saw in him. She looked at his sword, and then to the head at her feet again. Blood covered the first, and blood was coming out from the other.

“Did you kill him?” she asked, her voice vibrating with rage.

“Why don’t you answer yourself, sister, since you believe you are as clever as our father?”

She felt rage boiling inside of her. “How did you dare to do this?”

“How I dared? And how dared you?”

“You just destroyed my only chance to…”

“To do what? To destroy the city? I think one time is already more than enough.”

“To kill my enemies!”

Qyburn had positioned the stocks of wildfire they had left at key positions. He was to make them explode, destroying the armies of Daenerys Targaryen as they entered the city, just like she did with Randyll Tarly’s men. Now it would be impossible. Qyburn was the only one to know where the pots were. She didn’t know their positions.

“At what cost?” Jaime asked. “By killing the few thousands innocent people who didn’t die the first time?”

“ Innocent people? These people laughed at me, mocked me, threw mud and shit at me…”

“Just like they did with Joffrey. Do you remember how he reacted? He almost got you killed. Tyrion told me.”

“DON’T MENTION HIS NAME! DON’T EVER MENTION HIS NAME, OR I’LL HAVE YOUR TONGUE CUT FROM YOUR MOUTH, KINGSAYER!”

He stood silent. He just looked at her. Cersei couldn’t repress a smile. As always, her brother proved that she was their father’s true daughter. He slowly walked to her until he stood only one feet from her. She kept smiling smugly at him. There was nothing he could do against her.

She didn’t see it coming. A fist hit her hard on the face, and the next moment she laid on the ground. She brought her hand to her face, and realized she was bleeding. The blood was red, so red. She saw many people bleed and die as their body emptied itself from this liquid, but she never saw blood on her face.

“You…” She stared at her brother, at her twin, at the man who came into this world with her, who gave her her three children. He had a nonchalant expression on his face as he looked down on her. He often looked down on her, especially when they made love, but with a completely different expression. “You hit me.”

“You always were quick to grasp a situation, sister.”

“You hit your own sister. Your hit your queen!”

“And so? Did my hand fall from my wrist?” He looked at his left arm. “Oh no, it’s true. It’s already gone. It will be difficult to chop my hand for striking a queen. Anyway, I don’t think there is someone left to do it. Now, I have a few questions for you, sister.”

“A few questions?”

“Yes, while we still have time for that. The Targaryen forces will arrive very soon.”

“You are a fool.” She tried to stand, and received another strike, this time in the form of a slap. Cersei was back on the floor.

“I may be a fool, but I have the upper hand for now. So you’re going to answer. Did you kill Father?”

Cersei barely managed to straighten her head to look at him. “What?”

“Did you kill Father? Did you kill Kevan?”

“What are you talking about?” She truly had no idea why he asked her these things. These were the stupidest questions she ever heard.

“I needed time to consider this, but now that I think about it,” her brother resumed, “of everyone in the capital, you were the person with the best reasons to kill them. As soon as Father died, you accused Tyrion. Our lord father’s body was barely cold that you were already plotting against our brother. Once our father and Tyrion were gone, there was no one standing between you and Casterly Rock, and you could control the small council again. And when Kevan died, we found a message near him. The queen sends her regards. The queen. And as you just said, you are the queen."

A moment passed as she tried to understand Jaime’s words. Then she burst into laughs. “You really are an utter fool.”

“I’ve got to give it to you, you’re not wrong. I was a fool to love you from the beginning.”

She couldn’t stop laughing. “I had no reason to kill Father, or to kill Kevan.”

“You had all the reasons. You lost all your power when Father arrived, and you would have been Lady of the Rock if Tyrion had died like you wanted. And Kevan wanted to send you away. His death delayed your departure.”

“Margaery killed Kevan.”

“She had no reason to do so. Kevan was her ally. They were working together, against you. So I’m going to ask you one last time. Did you kill them?”

She managed to stand on her feet and to stop her laughter. “I didn’t.” She couldn’t stop smiling as she told him.

“I don’t believe you. I don’t trust you anymore.” He walked a few steps away from her before turning to face her again. “You tried to kill our brother.”

“He’s not our brother. He’s not my brother.”

“He is, whether you like it or not. We don’t get to choose who our family is.”

“Too bad.”

“Yes, too bad,” he agreed. “And you killed our children.”

“I didn’t kill them!”

“You killed them! You killed Joffrey! You had him poisoned!”

“I didn’t. It was…”

“We have proof. You may have wanted to kill Margaery instead, but it changes nothing. You had him killed. And you killed Myrcella, and Tommen!”

“I didn’t kill Myrcella. It was Tyrion…”

He slapped her again. She almost saw it coming this time, so she could prepare. She didn’t fall on the floor. “Don’t ever accuse my brother again. You killed Myrcella.”

“It was Tyrion who sent her to Dorne. He was the one to sentence her when he sent her away.”

“And if you managed to stop Joffrey from beheading Ned Stark, Tyrion would never have become Hand, and Myrcella would never have gone to Sunspear.”

“It wasn’t my fault…”

“It was! You never wanted me to play any role in Joffrey’s life, or any of our children’s. You wanted them for you alone. You raised them alone. You turned Joffrey into a monster. Perhaps if I had played a role in his life, he wouldn’t have been the monster he became. And if he wasn’t a monster, he wouldn’t have executed Ned Stark, and Myrcella would be alive.”

“If you had been a father for our children, they would have been killed.”

“Then perhaps we should never have had children. Perhaps you were not meant to have children. Because you killed them. You killed Tommen. You knew he was going to kill himself when you destroyed the Great Sept with his wife inside.”

“I couldn’t…”

“You were supposed to be there with him, to console him, but instead you watched men being butchered and the city burning with a glass of wine in your hand. There are even people who claim that you had a bard playing the Rains of Castamere as you watched the city burn, only you had him change the words for the Fires of King’ Landing.”

“I didn’t kill Tommen!” she said. She didn’t kill him. No, she didn’t kill him.

“You killed him. You killed your son. You killed our son. He died because of you, because of your actions. He died because you weren’t there when he needed you.”

“No. No, I didn’t kill him.” She shook her head. She wasn’t responsible for Tommen’s head.

“You did, and you know it. Just like I know that I killed my cousin. You murdered your own son.”

Jaime stared at her, not leaving her face a single moment. She was shaking now. She didn’t kill him. She didn’t kill him. It was Margaery’s fault, and Tyron’s, and Sansa’s. It was her father’s fault, and Jaime’s. They were not here to protect her. It was the fault of Tarly, of Selwyn Tarth, of Kevan, of Varys. It wasn’t her fault. She didn’t kill him.

She realized that she had difficulty to breathe, and that tears were running on her cheeks. And then she couldn’t hold. She burst into sobs. She had tried to keep them away, but she couldn’t. She tried to remain in the present, to think about he future, to make sure their house would survive, but she couldn’t. Her life was in the past. It was in her children, her children who were now dead. Her legs collapsed and she fell on the floor. The king will have twenty children and you will have three. Gold will be their crowns. Gold their shrouds. She lost them. She lost them all. Her children were all gone, and she was gone as well. She died with them. She was dying ever since the day Joffrey died, another part of her left with Myrcella, and the last part died when Tommen jumped from that tower. All that remained was a shell. She was no longer the woman she used to be. Perhaps that was why no one wanted to follow her. It wasn’t because she was a woman. It was because she wasn’t alive anymore.

She looked at the floor, Qyburn’s head within her sight. He was her last hope. Her last hope of revenge against her enemies. And now even that was gone. She would die alone, without even the satisfaction of bringing her enemies under ground with her.

She felt arms wrapping around her from behind. She was surprised to find that they were Jaime’s. She rested her head against his elbow. Her eyes were closed, and tears kept streaming. For the first time in months, she felt comfort coming from someone else. It was a good sensation. She had almost forgotten how it felt, to have someone there for you. Someone who just wanted you to be happy, or well. She remembered times when she was a little girl, when Genna would take her into her arms as she cried, to console her. Genna wasn’t her mother, but she was all they had, she and Jaime.
They remained there for a very long time. Her body relaxed. She felt the blood still pouring from her nose, and the mud from his face and his clothes sticking to her, but she didn’t care. She felt better than she had been since her last son died, more alive than ever. Jaime was part of her, and he was still alive. That meant she was still alive too. Not everything was lost. There was still someone for her in this world.

“I’m sorry, Jaime.” She didn’t know why she apologized to him, but she did. Somehow, it made her feel better. She hadn’t realized how she craved for it, how she was hungry for this.

“I love you, Cersei.”

The words sounded so beautiful at her ears. He moved his hands up along her arms. It was good to hear someone say that he loved you. A weight was lifted from her shoulders. She breathed deeply and slowly. Jaime’s golden hand ran on her gown. She wished her clothes were gone for a moment. The feeling of his hand on her skin would feel wonderful, she was sure of it, even if it was only the hand made of gold. It was cold, but she could warm it with her own hands. Gold was part of House Lannister, anyway. The gold arrived at her neck.

All air left her throat when something else cold went through it. Blood came to her mouth as she felt another hand, cold as well, join the golden one, surrounding her throat.

Her head spun backward, and she saw her brother, a regretful expression on his face, over her. She looked on her left and saw the dagger that pierced her throat. Blood filled her mouth. She tried to ask why he did this, but she couldn’t.

A thunderous noise broke over them and she saw a part of the Red Keep’s roof collapse. At the same time, another horrible noise, one she heard before, pierced the air. Jaime kept holding her. She forced herself to raise her head a little, despite the effort she needed to do so, and she saw it. The black dragon, the biggest of them all. She watched him fly over the city long ago. He landed on the floor, debris falling all around him. He faced her, a dragon looking down on a lioness, and lowered his head. On his back was a young woman with silver air, her clothes all black, but not as black as those Cersei wore. Even in her state, Cersei saw that she was beautiful. Very beautiful.

You’ll be queen. For a time. Then comes another, younger, more beautiful, to cast you down and take all you hold dear. She knew immediately it was her. Cersei was about to die. It was the last chance for the prophecy to come true. She looked back to her brother, who hadn’t moved and kept looking at her with a sorry expression.

She didn’t understand. And when your tears have drowned you, the valonqar shall wrap his hands about your pale white throat and choke the life from you. She couldn’t die now. Tyrion was her valonqar, her little brother, the one who was supposed to kill her. It was never supposed to be Jaime. He never was her valonqar. They were born together, only a few minutes separating their coming into this world. Genna told her she came first, and that Jaime followed only two minutes later.

Such were the last thoughts of Cersei Lannister before darkness surrounded her.

Chapter End Notes

I think that many people had guessed how things would end for Cersei. I hate Cersei, personally, but like every other character of Game of Thrones, she has some good sides and I tried to highlight them here, going as far as to make her feel regrets. This was the last opportunity to shed some light on Cersei. I tried to give her an end that was as close as to what Maggy the Frog told her, but at the same time that was completely different from the end Cersei expected for herself. Daenerys storming through the roof of the Red Keep may seem "cliché", but we will see in the next chapter that there was a good reason for Daenerys to force her way to the throne room this way.

Next chapter : Daenerys
A part was missing. A section going from the center of the forehead to the left ear was gone. Red blood covered what was left of the face that became so familiar since her wedding. The head was completely ruined, savagely hacked by some monster. The rest of the body was intact, still fresh, quiet as if he was sleeping. The hand he offered her when he helped her to escape the Sons of the Harpy in Daznak’s Pit, the same that threw the spear that saved her life that same day, who held the sword who fought for her for years, was resting on his stomach, clasped with the other hand. Se never gave much attention to his hands before, but now she did. His armor was almost intact, his sword placed over his stomach. His two hands were gripping it, but they would never raise it again. She had been in a similar position back in Meereen, when Ser Barristan died, but she didn’t think that she would have to live the same thing here in King’s Landing, with the other man who served her from the beginning.

Ser Jorah Mormont was dead. He didn’t travel the world to serve her like Ser Barristan. He spied on her, gave information to her enemies, made her believe that he was her loyal servant when in fact he was conspiring with the people who wanted her dead. He lied to her, and betrayed the trust she placed in him. She exiled him. And yet he came back, he saved her, and he died serving her, far from his home. He fought to make her climb the steps leading to the Iron Throne, but he wouldn’t get to see her sitting on it.

“Who killed him?” she asked.

“A woman.”

She slowly turned to look at Grey Worm. He was the last to remain. Mossador was gone. Ser Barristan was gone. Missandei was gone. Hizdahr zo Loraq was gone. She left Daario in Meereen. Now that Ser Jorah left this world too, Grey Worm was the last advisor from her first council in Meereen who was still alive.

“What kind of woman could do something like that?” She indicated the ruin that was left of Ser Jorah’s face with her hand.

“A tall woman. Wearing armor of steel, wielding a sword. The Unsullied said they never saw such a tall and big woman.”

“What became of her?” Daenerys would gladly execute the person who killed her strong bear, man or woman.

“She died. The Unsullied killed her. She managed to kill twenty of them before the Unsullied could end her.”
There was no revenge to take or justice to make. The taking of King’s Landing didn’t go like Daenerys hoped, although her losses were small and the battle didn’t last long. Cersei’s army was defeated easily before the walls. The Unsullied penetrated the city without meeting any resistance. As for the second army that came from the north, the men composing it either burned or flew away before Drogon. She mounted her dragon as soon as she was informed of the position of the second Lannister army. They didn’t manage to recruit many men. Daenerys didn’t estimate this second army to be more than a few hundred. Ser Jaime Lannister’s soldiers disbanded at the mere sight of her dragon.

The Kingslayer was now in the dungeons of the Red Keep. After she made sure that no Lannister forces were left to oppose her outside the city, she returned to the reserves of her army. As soon as she landed, Melisandre came to her, saying that she should call back all her men from the city. She said that she saw green flames, lit by a man without heart who served a woman laughing like a demon. Daenerys hadn’t been sure of what to make of it, until a little boy who presented himself as one of Varys’s little birds told her that Cersei had new stocks of wildfire hidden under the city, and that she was about to blow it all a second time. There were the green flames.

She couldn’t allow this to happen again. King’s Landing was built by her ancestors. There were still people living in there. She couldn’t stand by while Cersei was slaughtering thousands of people. She went back to Drogon and flew to the Red Keep. Danning the work of her ancestors, she broke through the ceiling of the Red Keep and arrived into the Throne Room on Drogon’s back… only to find the Kingslayer with his sister in his arms, a dagger planted in her throat. Daenerys had met Cersei’s eyes before she died. It had been a strange expression that she displayed as they looked at each other. The daughter of Tywin Lannister almost looked as if she recognized Daenerys. They had never met before. It was the first time, and the last time as well, that Daenerys laid her eyes on Cersei Lannister, who received from the people a name very similar to the one they gave to her father.

What surprised Daenerys the most was the fact that Jaime Lannister was the one to kill Cersei. That was the last thing she expected. When she dismounted her dragon, the Kingslayer stood away from his sister after closing her eyes. He laid her lifeless body gently on the floor, then threw his sword and his dagger at Daenerys’s feet and raised his hands.

“I am the man who killed your father,” he said. “If you want to kill me, then do it. I’m ready to die.”

She expected to find Cersei, to put her in chains, and to make her plan of destroying the city fail, but not this. The first Unsullied entered the Throne Room not long later. It was at this moment that she recalled why she was there. She ordered two of them to keep an eye on the Kingslayer, and to kill him without hesitation if he tried anything, and she sent all the other men after anyone Cersei might have sent to destroy the city.

“Qyburn is dead,” Ser Jaime Lannister had said when he heard her orders. “He’s the one who was supposed to light the pots of wildfire. His head is there.” There was effectively the head of a man between two ages on the floor. “He met the same fate than Rossart, your father’s last Hand. It’s fitting. I killed the Mad King and his Hand when they tried to burn the whole city twenty years ago, and today I just killed the Mad Queen and her Hand who tried to do the same. Queenslayer. Do you think it sounds better than Kingslayer?”

She had sent him away, ordering his guards to keep him locked somewhere until she decided of his fate. The research that followed allowed them to find caches of wildfire, but none were lit. They were left untouched. When Varys arrived, he confirmed that Qyburn died before he could execute Cersei’s last order. The city was saved.

The battle cost Daenerys dearly all the same. The casualties were low, she only lost two hundred men, but Jorah died. Also, it wasn’t a city that she took. It was a city in ruins. They said that King’s Landing was inhabited by half a million souls before the war. Now there were fifty-thousand men living inside its walls, at best. She would have to rebuild King’s Landing, almost from scratch.

She reported her attention on Ser Jorah’s body. She couldn’t lament on him for too long. She was the queen, and her duty was to all her people, not only to one single man. As much as she was saddened by her knight’s death, she had too many matters to take care of to allow his death to distract her longer than she could permit.

“I will light a pyre for him tonight. Grey Worm, summon the Red Priests to the Tower of the Hand.”

“Yes, my queen.”

“Grey Worm, what about these people you found in the dungeons?”

Grey Worm’s stoic expression failed for a second. “We are still finding bodies, and gathering them.”

“What about those who were alive?”

Daenerys looked away at the wall. “Thank you, Grey Worm.”

She walked away to the Tower of the Hand. It was the only place where no one was installed inside the Red Keep. She kept it for her own use for the time being, until she found someone to serve as Hand of the Queen. Daenerys wasn’t even sure if she would name a Hand. She never had one before, only a council to assist and advise her, but never someone who could actually replace her if she was ill, or if something happened to her.

As she waited in a room where small councils were assembled when Tywin Lannister was Hand of the King, she thought about he horrors they found under the Red Keep, in the dungeons and the black cells of the castle. The experiences of Cersei’s Hand, a man named Qyburn who studied at the Citadel, were spread everywhere under her feet. They found people alive and dead, but mostly dead. Many dismembered bodies, others that were eaten by worms, or by acid, or by other substances she didn’t know. The people seemed to have died a slow and painful death. Some were still alive, desperately clinging to life. They had found the daughter of Tandos, the emissary who survived, with one arm left. She had died in her father’s arms two hours after she was found, in unspeakable pain. Daenerys had not given her sentence yet, but she wouldn’t condemn this man to death. He acted out of despair, was forced to break sacred laws because of Cersei’s cruelty. It was Cersei who was guilty, and if she were alive, Daenerys would have her executed in the most painful and slow way possible, so she would suffer for all the crimes she committed. Perhaps she would transfer this punishment to her brother, the man who killed her father.

“The burden of power.” A voice behind almost caused her to jump. It was Varys. How did he come in here? She didn’t hear the door open. Perhaps she was too distracted by her thoughts. He continued to speak. “I served many kings through my life, your Grace, and each tried to deal with it in a different manner. I wonder how you will, and I hope you will deal with it better than your predecessors.”

“What do you have to tell me, Lord Varys?” she asked.

“Only that you should be careful with the Red Priests.”

“The Red Priests helped me in Meereen, and they helped me here as well.”
“They do not serve you or the Realm, your Grace. They serve another purpose, and they will turn on you the day they believe you no are no longer of use to them.”

“Just like you will.”

“Your Grace?”

She looked straight at him. “You served my father, didn’t you, Lord Varys?”

“I did.”

“And then you served the man who overthrew him.”

“I had a choice, your Grace, serve Robert Baratheon or face the headman’s axe. Your actual allies from Dorne and the Reach did the same.”

“But the Tyrells remained loyal to Robert. You, on the other hand, didn’t serve him long. You turned against him.”

“As did the Martells, your Grace.”

“We’re not talking about the Martells, but about you. I know why the Martells conspired against Robert, but I wonder why you did the same?”

Varys’s face contorted. “Robert was an improvement on your father, to be sure. There have been few rulers in history as cruel as the Mad King.” As hard as it was to hear the truth, Daenerys knew that what Varys said was true. Jorah helped her to see the truth in Viserys, and Ser Barristan helped her to know the truth about her father. “Robert was neither mad nor cruel. He simply had no interest in being king.”

“So you took it upon yourself to find a better one. Before I came to power, you favored my brother. All your spies, your little birds, did they tell you that Viserys was cruel, stupid and weak? Would those qualities have made for a good king in your learned opinion?”

Lord Varys dropped his head to the floor for a moment when she mentioned Viserys. “Until your marriage to Khal Drogo, your Grace, I knew nothing about you, save your existence and that you were said to be beautiful.”

“So you and your friends traded me like a prized horse to the Dothrakis.” It was because of him that she was sold like a horse to the first man who promised to help her brother to take the Seven Kingdoms.

“Which you turned to your advantage,” the eunuch remarked.

“Who gave the order to kill me?”

A long silence followed before Varys answered. “King Robert.”

“Who hired the assassins? Who sent word to Essos to murder Daenerys Targaryen?”

“Your Grace, I did what had to be done to…” She didn’t let him finish.

“To keep yourself alive. If you dislike one monarch, you conspire to crown the next one. What kind of a servant are you?”

“The kind the Realm needs.” The man’s expression turned serious. “Incompetence should not be rewarded with blind loyalty. As long as I have my eyes, I’ll use them. I wasn’t born into a great house. I came from nothing. I was sold as a slave and carved up as an offering. When I was a child, I lived in alleys, gutters, abandoned houses. You wish to know where my true loyalties lie? Not with any king or queen, but with the people. The people who suffer under despots and prosper under just rule. The people whose hearts you aim to win. If you demand blind allegiance, I respect your wishes. One of your Unsullied can behead me or your dragons can devour me. But if you let me live, I will serve you well. I will dedicate myself to seeing you on the Iron Throne because I choose you. Because I know the people have no better chance than you.”

She looked at the man for a very long time. He seemed deadly serious. She couldn’t trust him entirely, and yet she had the impression that he was sincere right now. “Very well. Swear this to me, Varys. If you ever think I’m failing the people, you won’t conspire behind my back. You’ll look me in the eye as you have done today, and you’ll tell me how I’m failing them.”

“I swear it, my queen.”

She came closer to him. “And I swear this. If you ever betray me, I’ll burn you alive.”

He smiled. “I would expect nothing less from the Mother of Dragons.”

“Then start by telling me the truth. This Jon Snow, this King in the North, is he my nephew?”

This question plagued her every day. “I have found a woman, your Grace. A servant named Wylla. Robert Baratheon believed that she was Jon Snow’s mother. She was a servant for Lady Ashara Dayne at Starfall, the sister of Ser Arthur Dayne. She was also Jon Snow’s wetnurse. She came back with Lord Stark to Winterfell after the war, and with Jon Snow.”

“You believe that she could be the mother?” If that was the case, then Jon Snow was no kin of her.

“She may be. But my discoveries concerning this woman were very interesting. It seems that she was at the Tower of Joy when Lyanna Stark died. I couldn’t get more information about the events that happened there, however. I suggest that I make her come to King’s Landing so you may interrogate her yourself when the time is right.”

“Is that all? That is all you could find?”

“It’s difficult to make such an investigation from far away, your Grace, when you cannot ask questions to the people yourself. I cannot confirm that Jon Snow is your nephew, but I cannot confirm the opposite either. The identity of his mother is still uncertain, though for the good of the Realm, I hope this is not Lyanna Stark. There is one thing I know about Tyrion Lannister. If he concocted this lie, then he probably made sure that there was some truth in this lie. A half-truth is much easier to believe than an outright lie. But I’m afraid there are more important matters to study, your Grace. I explored the rookery, and I found this.” He produced a small piece of paper from his sleeves. “It is from Castle Black.”

Daenerys read it. “The dead attacked the Wall?”

“I have little birds at the Wall, mostly at Castle Black, but also at the Shadow Tower and Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. I haven’t heard from those of the Shadow Tower for a while, but those at Eastwatch and Castle Black all swore that the White Walkers launched several attacks against them. One at Castle Black even claimed that a White Walker managed to get through the Wall, but he was killed by Jon Snow before he could go further.”

“If that’s the case, then we must fear the worst.” A voice coming from behind Varys’s back startled them both. Daenerys looked behind the eunuch to see Kinvara standing there, and Varys discovered the woman’s presence as soon as he turned. She raised an eyebrow before Varys’s expression. “You’re not the only one who can sneak behind people’s back, Varys. Knowledge has made you powerful. But there’s still so much you don’t know.”

“Leave us, Varys.” Daenerys intervened before it went further. She didn’t want to keep these two together for too long. The air was always tensed wherever it happened. Varys bowed and left.

She approached Kinvara and handed her the message from the Wall as soon as Varys was gone. The High Priestess read it. Her expression was grave. “They’re here.”

“It seems so.” Varys’s spies, all these messages from the Wall, the apprentice in Oldtown, the visions in the flames of the Red Priests… Even Ser Jorah believed the threat was real.

The other Red Priests came in approximately at this moment. There were six of them including Kinvara. Revan was there, and the Red Priest with silver hair following the High Priestess everywhere. He looked more like a warrior or a bodyguard than a real priest. The two other priests were a woman with dark hair and violet eyes, and an old man with grey hair who looked more like a warrior as well, but older than Kinvara’s personal guard. Melisandre completed the group. One of her visions saved Daenerys’s life. A scent of lilac and gooseberry came to her nose.

“Let’s begin,” Daenerys said.

She informed them quickly of the recent events at the Wall. She gathered them to speak about this threat north of the Wall, but the message she just came to know made it a matter more important to discuss than ever. The expressions on all their faces were grave, but Melisandre seemed to be affected by it more than everyone else.

“If the servants of the Great Other are here, then we must fight them, and now,” one of the warrior-styled priest declared.

“There are still four kingdoms who refuse to acknowledge me as their queen. I cannot let them behind me, still fighting my armies” Daenerys declared.

“She’s right. These kingdoms could rise in rebellion if we all march north. Bringing all our armies would be suicidal. These kingdoms could try to use the absence of occupation forces to take the Crownlands, or even the Reach,” Revan analyzed.

“The true war lies in the North,” Melisandre almost whispered.

“She is right. This is where the true enemy is,” the other priestess approved.

Daenerys looked at Kinvara, waiting for her opinion. When she voiced it, she looked very tired. “If you go immediately in the North and leave your new subjects behind you without anyone to protect them, they will suffer.”

Daenerys agreed. “Winter is here. There are hundreds of thousand people without shelter around the capital, and maybe more in the Riverlands thanks to the wars that ravaged this country. My country. I will not abandon the people I just freed from Cersei’s tyranny.”

“The servants of the Great Other are here, your Grace. Your destiny is to fight and to destroy them,” the oldest priest said.

“Jon Snow doesn’t have the means to fight the dead. He will need your help in order to stop them,” Melisandre added.
“I don’t even know who this Jon Snow is,” Daenerys almost snapped. She stared at Melisandre. “You are the only one in this room who ever met him. What can you tell me about him?”

The priestess who once served Stannis Baratheon was very pale. “Jon Snow is a man of duty, and of honor according to some. He follows certain rules, and is ready to put at risk his own life, and sometimes the lives of all his people, to keep following them. He is a good man, but he is also conscious of the threat that the Night King represents. He saw him at Hardhome, and he saw his army. It’s no longer a matter of years or months, or even weeks now. It’s a matter of days before the dead get past the Wall.”

“You saw it in the fire?”

“No, but I can feel it. The war is no longer to come. It is here, and your destiny is to make an alliance with Jon Snow to defeat the dead. You both have a role to play in this war.”

“Jon Snow wants the Iron Throne just like me. How could we be allies?”

“I doubt that Jon Snow wants the Iron Throne. He was chosen by his sworn brothers to be Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, when he didn’t ask or wish it. I wouldn’t be surprised if people forced the title of King in the North upon him. But he is also capable of making compromises. He managed to unite the Free Folk who lived north of the Wall with the lords of the North and four kingdoms who were at each other’s throat not long ago. He understands what is coming for us better than most men, and he is ready to face those things. He fights for the people in the North. He took a knife in the heart for them, and gave his life for them.”

All eyes were on her in an instant. “What did you say?” It was Revan who asked the question.

“Jon Snow died. There was a rebellion in the Night’s Watch after he allowed the wildlings south of the Wall. His sworn brothers killed him. He was dead. I saw him, lying cold on a table, scars still fresh left by a dozen knives.”

“How can he still be alive, then?” Daenerys asked, beginning to be suspicious about Melisandre.

“The Lord brought him back?” Revan asked. “You asked the Lord to bring him back?”

Melisandre nodded, then looked at her. “I don’t know why the Lord brought Jon Snow back to life. Perhaps he is the Prince that was promised, perhaps you are, your Grace, perhaps neither of you are. But the Lord brought him back for a reason, and he brought you to Westeros at this precise moment for a reason as well. You share the same blood. I could feel it. No matter if he’s your nephew or not, he has dragon blood, the old blood of Valyria. You both have a role to play in this war, and Jon Snow cannot win on his own. He doesn’t have the men, or the means, or the power for that. But you have.”

Daenerys remained staring at Melisandre for a moment. Jon Snow was dead, and then came back to life? She saw many things, and discovered stranger things recently, but a man coming back from the dead?

“Leave, all of you. Except for your High Priestess.”

They slowly all did like she told them. She noticed that Revan seized Melisandre’s arm on their way out. When Daenerys was all alone with the High Priestess, she asked.

“Is it possible to bring people back from the dead?”

“There are some who claim to have this power. Actually, in Volantis, no living priest ever succeeded. Some tried, but they failed.”

“Do you believe that Melisandre is telling the truth?”

The High Priestess squeezed her hands. “I saw no lies on her face or in her eyes when she told me. It might be possible. There are other orders of Red Priests in this world, and everything is possible to our Lord. Maybe Jon Snow really has a role to play. No matter what this role is, you will have to compose with him, and very soon.”

Daenerys nodded. It was true, she couldn’t ignore Jon Snow. She may not be able to wait for the results of Varys’s investigations. She had four kingdoms left to conquer. The Westerlands and the Riverlands were almost empty, devoid of troops. An army from the Vale of Arryn recently destroyed the Lannisters who marched south at the Crossroads, which meant that there were dissensions among Jon Snow’s bannermen. She could take the Westerlands with a small army. She would have to cross the Riverlands to reach the North with the bulk of her army. She would submit Riverrun on the way. Then she would head north, and probably send another army to take care of the Vale while she dealt with these White Walkers if necessary, and with Jon Snow as well. Varys warned her about Petyr Baelish, the widower of the late Lady of the Vale, and to not trust him. Kinvara was of an opinion to not trust him either. He cooperated with Cersei Lannister, but managed to escape not long before Daenerys took King’s Landing. She wasn’t sure about this man. She never met him. However, considering that he changed his allegiance several times, and considering the accusations that Lord Varys made against him about his role in the beginning of many wars, Daenerys would be careful with that man, whoever he was. She wouldn’t stay in King’s Landing for long. Someone would have to rule it in her absence, and she knew precisely who would make it.

“If it wouldn’t bother you, Queen Daenerys, I would like to see something in this tower,” Kinvara told her.

“Of course.”

The High Priestess made a light bow with her head and headed towards another section. They were in the Hand’s personal rooms. Daenerys decided to follow her. She didn’t explore much of the Red Keep in the two days she spent in. She followed Kinvara to a place that looked like the personal chamber of the Hand of the King, judging by the large bed in the middle of it. It was this bed that Kinvara looked at.

“For three hundred years, men who ruled the Seven Kingdoms slept here,” the High Priestess said. “People could be starving or freezing or dying outside, but they remained here, warm and safe, high over everyone else.”

Daenerys listened to her. Kinvara turned around the bed, never touching it except for her heavy red robe that sometimes brushed it. Her eyes never left the bed, however.

“I wonder how many women slept in this bed. None were Hands. They were wives, mistresses, whores. Mostly whores,” the eastern woman said.

“Indeed.” Daenerys had noticed Kinvara’s hatred for slavery, but also for brothels and the men keeping them. As for herself, Daenerys had sympathy for the women who were forced to work into brothels. Just like her, they were sold to men like cattle, like trophies.

On these two words, the High Priestess Kinvara walked away and left the chamber. Daenerys lingered behind for some time. She hadn’t thought much about who would be her Hand. If Ser Barristan was alive, she would probably have chosen him. Perhaps she could have chosen Ser Jorah, though she doubted he would have liked the position, or been fit for it. She knew that there were certainly several men among the lords who followed her for now who hoped that they would be her first Hand, but to be honest none of them satisfied her for the position. She didn’t know them enough. She would probably report the choice until she was sure to name a person she could entirely trust and who would make a good job. Anyway, many lords would already be happy with the nominations she foresaw for her small council. Lord Mace Tyrell would be Master of Coin, Lord Paxter Redwyne would be Master of Ships, and Lord Yronwood would be Master of Laws. Her most powerful allies in Westeros would then all have places on the small council. The Reach would have one more seat than Dorne, but she doubted that Dorne would complain for long after they would learn of the great honor she was about to grant them. Varys would be Master of Whisperers, of course. She contemplated the idea of naming Kinvara to the office, but she would rather not turn Varys into an enemy, and both Trystane and Malcom advised her against this choice. They judged that giving seats on the small council to priests of a foreign religion was too dangerous for the relations with their allies. A new Grand Maester would have to be chosen by the Citadel.

The small council would have a lot of work to do, if only to rebuild the city. They would be short on time to house everyone, and to build the essential buildings like granaries to feed the people through winter. And this was without considering the Riverlands, all ravaged by the previous wars, that Daenerys would have to take care of after she conquered them. She would leave King’s Landing to the hands of someone she trusted. Someone who wouldn’t be Hand of the Queen, but who would rule the city in her absence, while she completed the unification of Westeros and defeated whatever enemy she found in the North.

Daenerys left the Tower of the Hand and went to see the prince Trystane Martell of Dorne. She had important matters to discuss with him. Like she expected, his astonishment was complete by the end of their discussion.

Jaime meets someone.

JAIME VIII

Cersei is dead. I killed her. Is Brienne still alive? Did I kill her too?

The questions were tormenting Jaime. He had more than enough torments for the rest of his life, and longer. He didn’t know what tormented him the most, the fact that he murdered his own sister, the woman he loved, or that he left a woman who trusted him, who sacrificed herself for him, a knight unworthy of her help.

He saved the city, twice. And this is where it got him. If the gods were real, and if they were just, why was the world so full of injustice? Because of men like you? The voice of Catelyn Stark echoed in his head. There were no men like him. Only him. No man had done what he did, whether the people knew it or not. He would become a legend, the dishonorable knight who stabbed his king in the back, shared the bed of his sister and queen, and ended up murdering the said sister with a knife in her throat. History would remember him, for sure. He would leave a memory that would last a thousand of years. He fulfilled his father’s wishes. The name of Ser Jaime Lannister, son of Tywin Lannister, would live on.

Jaime hadn’t wanted to admit it on his way to King’s Landing. He hadn’t wanted to consider the possibility. It brushed his mind from time to time, but he refused to truly think about this eventuality. The thought of killing Cersei couldn’t come to his mind and make its nest. Only the idea of abandoning Cersei settled after an ordeal. When he met Brienne, he made another step. He accepted that Cersei wouldn’t survive. His aunt had tried to make him understand that, but he refused to admit it. He finally conceded the truth when he spoke with Brienne, who reminded him of the man with her eyes, his throat sliced while Cersei looked at him with glee. And then he made another step. He decided to let go a person who would try to kill Cersei. He didn’t try to stop her. And then he made a third step. He decided to help Brienne in killing Cersei.

It had been so easy with Brienne around. Within less than an hour, he went from knowing that Cersei was doomed but resigned to die helping her, to conspiring to murder her. Brienne triggered something in him. Perhaps it was his long lost honor resurfacing, or perhaps it was something else. Still, Brienne’s presence forced him to accept his fate. He would play a vital role in Cersei’s demise.

On their way to King’s Landing, he believed that it was likely that Brienne would get caught before she could kill Cersei, and very likely that if she did kill Cersei, then she would die not long after. Strangely, the thought of it saddened Jaime on the road, much more than the thought that Cersei didn’t have long to live. He decided that he would protect Brienne, no matter what happened, and no matter what the Maid of Tarth thought about it. However, he didn’t expect that Brienne would be the one to protect him in the end.

As he crossed the corridors of the Red Keep, Jaime’s mind had been in a greater turmoil than ever before. It was even worse than in the days of the Mad King, worse than the day when he became the man they would call the Kingslayer. What would he do when he would face Cersei? Try to convince her to surrender? Certainly, that’s what he would have done, like the fool he was, but that was before he crossed Qyburn’s path. The man was disguised, and Jaime knew immediately what he intended to do. Qyburn was dead a moment later, and when Jaime walked into the Great Hall, carrying the dead man’s head, there was no place left for the love he once felt for his sister.

Now that it was done, he wasn’t sure if he felt anything about it. He felt that he lost Cersei a long time ago. She was no longer the woman he used to love. Like his aunt told him, she was gone. Jaime wondered what would happen to Genna now? And Brienne? She was capable of defending herself, but Jaime knew her. And since he knew who Brienne was, he was almost certain of the fate that fell upon the Lady of Tarth. She reminded him of Tyrion during the time they travelled through the Riverlands, after Catelyn Stark released him, but to the opposite of Tyrion, Brienne wasn’t clever. She wasn’t good to get herself out of impossible situations. Perhaps Jaime had more in common with her than he thought. Perhaps he had more in common with Brienne than with Cersei.

What would happen to Tyrion now? Jaime worried about him. He worried about his little brother all the time. It was the third thing that tormented his mind all day long. Tyrion never did anything against the Targaryens. He took no part in the fall of the Mad King, and never took any decision against Viserys and Daenerys while they were in exile. He was only a boy when his big brother killed the Mad King. Would he be killed by their new queen all the same? Jaime didn’t know her. She didn’t execute him on the spot when she found him, but she probably only kept him alive so she could execute him publicly, or make him process through the streets as a war trophy for the people to admire. Maybe they would throw stones at him, the Kingslayer. I saved them. I saved this city. I saved them twice.

Jaime thought about Tyrion’s child. He almost didn’t have time to truly think about her at all. He was always too focused on something else. Now that he had all the time in the world, he could think about the little girl who bore his mother’s name. Had it been Tyrion’s idea? Did he choose himself to call his first daughter after their lady mother? It had to be. Jaime was sure that Sansa would have liked to call her after her own mother, or someone else in her family. Jaime was surprised that Tyrion didn’t grant her this wish. Maybe his brother was capable of refusing something to the woman he loved. In that case, he was stronger than Jaime ever was. He called his first child after their mother, after the mother that Jaime killed.

Motherslayer. That was a title he had forgotten. He could call himself parricide too, but motherslayer sounded better. It fitted well with all his other titles. What title could he earn for killing his cousin? There was no name for the killing of cousins. He supposed that he would have to settle for kinslayer. That wasn’t much, but that was something.

Jaime wished he could see his niece, the last niece he had. Perhaps she looked like his lady mother. Perhaps by seeing her, he could recall how the first Joanna Lannister looked like. Perhaps the memory of the woman who brought him into this shit world would resurface. He could put a face on her name again.

He saw a light through the bars of his cell’s door. He remained into darkness most of the time. It didn’t bother him. He knew worse when he was Robb Stark’s prisoner. At least he had a roof over his head. No rain to wet him, and no sun to burn him. No snow to freeze him either now. Just as Jaime was asking himself if he was in the same cell than Eddard Stark before his execution, the door opened and a woman walked in, a torch at the hand. The door closed behind her and she approached Jaime, until she was only a few steps away from him.

“Ser Jaime Lannister.”

Her voice was sweet, melodious. Shadows danced on her face because of the fire near it. Her gown was a deep red, of a good tissue from what Jaime could judge, but without any jewel or ornament of any sort. Her hair was wavy, of a dark color.

“Who do I have the pleasure to speak to?” he asked.

She smiled. It wasn’t one of these cruel and wicked smiles Cersei had, but it wasn’t one of joy or comfort either. “There is so much you don’t know, Ser Jaime.”

_I know better than before, at least. “What do you want from me?”_

She made two more steps, now towering him. The smile was gone. “And what do you want?” He blinked. The light of the torch blinded him. “Escape? Live? Drink? Eat? Die? Do you want all this to stop?”

Jaime sighed. “I think I know who you are. You’re one of those foreign priests who follow the dragon queen. I spent some time with Thoros of Myr. You’re much prettier.”

Her expression turned to stone, and a cold anger appeared. Jaime surprised himself by being afraid. “That’s what you see when you look at me, don’t you? A whore. A woman whose only worth is her physical beauty and the pleasure she can give to men. I suppose that’s how you see all women, Kingslayer.”

She reminded him of Cersei this way. “You have no idea what I think of you.”

“I believe that I know enough about you. Your crimes are without end.”

Jaime scoffed. “Yes. I killed my king, I killed my sister and my queen. I killed her Hand. I killed another Hand before. I killed so many people.”

“And more. Varys says you murdered your own cousin while he was a prisoner with you. You also murdered people here, in King’s Landing, without provocation. And this is only the smaller part of all your crimes. Have you ever wondered how many people suffered because of you?”

“At least, these people are alive.”

“Truly? They are alive? Is that what you’re telling yourself at night, to make you feel better? That you are a man of honor because you make people suffer, rob them, beat them, rape them, but you let them live as long as they do everything you want.”

“I saved them.”

“You never saved anybody.” This statement triggered something in him.

“I DID! I saved them! Cersei wanted to burn the city. She sent her man, Qyburn, to light pots of wildfire and destroy King’s Landing. And in case you didn’t know, your queen’s father wanted to do the same. I was there. I heard him talk about it, plan it for weeks. When the rebels marched on the capital, he wanted to burn it all. I saved this city twice. I killed the man who was supposed to burn it, and I killed the person who gave the order, each time. If here’s still something left of this city today for Daenerys Targaryen to rule, and if she still has the Red Keep, it’s thanks to me.”
She looked at him with a placid expression. Unlike Brienne, she showed no reaction to his words. “Do you think yourself an honorable man because of this? Because twice in your life, you murdered monsters who wanted to kill thousands of innocent people?”

Jaime dropped his head on his chest. “That’s the two best things I’ve done in my life.”

“You’re right, and these two decisions you took only prove further who you are,” the Red Priestess said.

“And who am I?” He straightened his head to look into her eyes. They were green, and the flames were reflected in them. “A kingslayer? A kinslayer? A murderer? An oathbreaker? A man without honor?”

“A monster, and a traitor.”

That wasn’t something Jaime was expecting. No one ever told him that he was a monster, despite all the things he’s done, and he never saw himself as a traitor either. “I’m a monster, maybe, but I don’t see how I could be a traitor,” he said.

“I hear the knights swear a vow to protect the weak and defend the innocents. You took the same vow, I suppose.”

“Of course,” he almost spat. He was tired of hearing about the many vows he took.

“Then that makes you a traitor to the people. You said you saved them, but how long did it take for you to kill Aerys and Cersei? You waited for the last minute, when you had no other choice. If you had killed them sooner, thousands of men, women and children might still be alive. You served mass murderers when it was safe to serve them, and killed them when it was dangerous to serve them.”

He didn’t deny it, but that gave her no right to judge him. “I don’t have to justify myself to people who burn people alive.”

A quick smile appeared on her face. “You believe everything you hear about the red priests and our queen. You’re full of prejudice.”

“And you think you’re not?”

“Much less than you.”

Jaime turned his head, and a silence settled in the cell, only disturbed by the soft sound of fire. Would he die this way? Burning? Roasted alive by a dragon?

“We heard that your brother is still alive in the North.”

The mention of Tyrion caught his attention and he looked at the red woman again. “He’s still alive?”

“As far as we know, yes. According to our spies, he is at Castle Black, fighting the servants of the Great Other.”

“I suppose… your queen wants him dead.”

She said nothing for a time. “It depends. If he bends the knee, she might let him live. Queen Daenerys doesn’t consider children responsible for the crimes of their parents, or their brothers, or their sisters. And unlike you, he played no role in the destruction of House Targaryen.”

Tyrion couldn’t die. He was all that Jaime had left, all the family that was left to him. “He doesn’t “You’re probably right.” The woman sat on a nearby bench. “I looked at what he did while he ruled King’s Landing. The city was starving and he was the only one to care about the suffering of the people. Your sister was ordering defenses to be built upon the battlements and organizing feasts, while your son shot on people begging for bread and ordered his men to murder people starving in the streets. Your brother was the only one who tried to feed them. And unlike your sister, he used wildfire to defend this city, to protect it, instead of destroying it. Your father was named Savior of the City, but if someone deserved this title it was certainly your brother.” Jaime agreed with that, but he didn’t voice it. “And right now he’s fighting the real threat. Our queen might want him among her advisors, though not immediately. She won’t forget all the crimes that the Lannisters committed any time soon.”

Jaime looked straight at her. “You should tell your queen that if she kills me, then Tyrion will be the greatest enemy she will ever have. He will never forgive her if she kills me.”

“Then that’s too bad for him. He will die if he fights her. No one can defeat her armies, and her dragons.” Jaime hoped it wasn’t be true. He didn’t want his last sibling to die. “I wonder why he is so loyal to you. You conspired with your own sister, a woman who tried to have him killed several times.”

“I never conspired with Cersei.” He never did anything to harm Tyrion killed.

“And yet you kept serving and obeying her, even while she sent men to murder your brother and put a bounty on his head. She went as far as to offer a great sum for his daughter. A baby.”

Jaime perceived the anger in her voice as she talked. “Cersei is dead now. No one will try to kill them for the reward. There’s no one left to pay them.”

“It makes me feel better to know that my brother, his wife and their child are going to live, yes,” he spat. “Now, get out! Leave me alone!”

“Or what? You’ll kill me? Order me to kneel before you because I am lowborn while you are highborn? Because I am bound to obey you? You are nothing, Jaime Lannister. You have nothing, and you are nothing. When the war is over, you will stand for trial to answer all your crimes. These crimes include an attempt of murder on a boy of ten, back in the North, in a place called Winterfell. Everyone will see you for who you really are.”

How did she know about the Stark boy? “You don’t know who I am. You know nothing about me.”

“I know more than enough. I know you are a coward, a traitor, a man who believes himself over the others because he is born with a name, and a hypocrite. You claim something, but your actions say all the opposite. You hide behind vows and codes of honor to give you a good appearance, but inside, you are a monster, just like your sister.”

“You have no idea, what it is to be told to obey the king, to obey our father and to protect the people all at the same time. One way or another, we break a sacred vow.”

“Then you should have chosen better what vows to respect.” She stood up. “You won’t live for long, coward.”

Jaime straightened himself the best he could. He would have strangled her right now if he could. “I may be an oathbreaker, but I am no coward. I may not be an honorable knight, but you are no better.
You pretend that you are defending the people, but you are fooling them, lying to them, so you can have power. I know the people of your kind. You are impostors. I made more for the people of this city with my two murders than you with all your prayers and pretty words.”

She didn’t flinch a single moment. Instead, she replied very calmly. “Like always, you show that you know nothing, Ser Jaime. You believe what you want to believe. You try to place yourself on a pedestal by lowering the others. I made mistakes in my life, just like you, and I made horrible things, things that I will regret until the moment I die. But to the opposite of you, I don’t try to justify myself. Instead, I try to make the good around me, to help those in the need, unlike you who try to justify a life of killing by attaching yourself to a few times when you saved people.”

“So, that’s your way to atone for your sins? Make amends?” he mocked her. “Is that what you’re telling yourself at night, to make you feel better?” He repeated her own words. She didn’t seem moved by them.

“No. I’m not looking for redemption. I only try to do what is right. Because this is what the Lord asks from us.”

Jaime laughed. “You’re lying to yourself. Your god doesn’t exist, nor does any god. Gods are only there to give some hope in this life to those who have none.”

She remained silent for quite some time. Her facial expression didn’t change. She was like a stone that nothing could move. “You don’t believe in gods.”

“If the gods were real, they wouldn’t let our world be full of injustice.”

“There is no justice without injustice,” she replied. “Have you ever read the Seven-Pointed Star, Jaime?”

“My nursemaid used to read it to me, but I don’t really care about books, and neither about the gods, so books about the gods? I’m not sure it interests me. You should ask my brother.”

“There is a passage in one of these holy texts that says: For there is nothing hidden that will not be disclosed, and nothing concealed that will not be known or brought out into the open. You are blind. You believe what you want to believe.”

“Isn’t that the case for you too?” Jaime was really getting unnerved by this conversation, but he didn’t see how he could get rid of this fanatic, or how he could spend time differently.

“It was, some time ago. But now I see. Perhaps it is time for you to see the truth as well.”

Slowly, she brought her hand to her neck. There was a red necklace with an hexagonal ruby or something like that. He had missed this jewel before, but now he realized that it was glowing. She unclasped it and removed it, and the glow slowly died. Jaime stared at the red stone. He had never seen anything like it before. No gem could shine like this. It was unnatural. When he looked back at the face of the woman, he saw someone totally different. Another woman was standing right in front of him, wearing exactly the same clothes, but her appearance was totally different. The hair, the face, even the eyes were different.

“Sooner or later, the truth comes out,” she said. She stared back at him, and at the same time, she hugged her gown around her tightly, as if she felt cold.

Jaime’s eyes widened, and his mouth opened in terror. He couldn’t believe what he was seeing. She smiled at him in a very cruel way.
“Now you see the truth, Jaime Lannister.”

Chapter End Notes

Perhaps this chapter seems odd to some people. Many probably hoped or expected for a first face-to-face between Jaime and Daenerys, but instead it was Kinvara who he met. I didn't choose her by throwing dice. This discussion will greatly influence Jaime's future choices from now on.

Yara II

Chapter Notes

Yara is back, to fight her uncle once again.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

YARA II

The small boats were already charged. Ladders, rams, crossbows, arrows, bows, swords, axes filled them. They had enough to seize by themselves the thirty-one islands that House Greyjoy ruled for three hundred years. The whole power of Yara’s fleet was there. They were ready to take Pyke back.

Euron’s power was dwindling. He had lost a large part of his fleet at Oldtown. Yara had met his remaining forces at the Shield Islands and crushed them, sinking some and seizing the others. After the victory at Oldtown, Yara sailed for the Shield Islands with the Redwynes. She hated it, but Lord Redwyne put as a condition of helping her to take back the Iron Islands that she had to help them free the Shield Islands. And Daenerys ordered her to help to free the Reach of all the Ironmen who occupied its territory. Yara had sent a part of her fleet to take Great Wyk by the west, while the rest headed for the islands of the Reach.

Euron’s men gave them a lot of difficulty. While Rodrik Harlaw took the islands of her people one by one, Euron had fortified the Shield Islands like impregnable fortresses, and positioned almost all his remaining ships to defend them. They needed three battles against his fleet to destroy it, and even then, their losses were high. Yara lost more ships and men in the battles of the Shield Islands than Euron did. The Redwynes and their allies lost many men too. They won only because they had more men and more ships than Euron. She didn’t expect that her uncle would have left most of his ships at the Shield Islands. They occupied a strategic position, the door giving on the Reach, but Yara wouldn’t have left all her fleet there when it was clear that her enemies would attack the Iron Islands. Her uncle Rodrik said that Euron lost so many men in his war and because of the desertions to Yara’s cause, and that he used so many resources from the Iron Islands, that he would never be able to build enough ships to reconstitute his great armada. Euron couldn’t hope to slow them down at the Shield Islands in order to have time to rebuild his fleet. He didn’t have the men or the wood to rebuild it.

Still, the men he left behind at the Shield Islands gave them one hell of a fight. They held their positions like desperate men, as if their lives depended on it. Yara offered them generous terms for their surrender, but they refused. And so Ironborn fought Ironborn.

Once the fight was over, Yara could only realize the magnitude of her uncle’s crimes on the territories he conquered. Almost all the families who ruled the Shield Islands had been savagely killed. At Oakenshield, they found the bodies of Lord Hewlett, his wife, his daughters and his granddaughters in the cave of their castle. They were all killed with knives by the men of Nute the Barber, to who Euron gave Oakenshield when he took the island. Most servants had died before they freed the castle, killed by Ironborn too, but the survivors told them Lord Hewletts’s wife and daughters were repeatedly raped before they were murdered. Yara would have executed Nute if he didn’t die in the fight.

Bodies were hanging in all villages, mass graves were dug on every island. The only survivors of the great families who once ruled these places were those who managed to escape before the Ironmen attacked, or who had the luck to be outside the islands when the invasion took place. Several cottages and villages were completely burned by her countrymen. Yara had led her men into battle several times, killed many people, but the actions of Euron’s men in the Reach were not reaving. They were butchery, slaughter. The soldiers of the Reach who helped them in their fight were close to turning on her more than once, at the sight of her uncle’s horrors.

It had been difficult for Yara, and for all the men following her. They fought against their own countrymen. Some once drank with men who fought in Euron’s army before the war. She also knew that some of her men grumbled against her when they were among themselves. The Ironborn didn’t sow, they took what was theirs. Yara grew up with these words, same as everyone else in the Iron Islands. However, Daenerys didn’t hear it that way. Yara had to admit that she agreed with her uncle. Her people needed a future different from what they lived for the past centuries. The kings of the Iron Islands once ruled large territories all over Westeros, threatening places as far as the Stormlands. They were feared everywhere. That was no longer the case. The dragons had changed things. They couldn’t terrorize the greenlanders like they used to. They stood no chance against dragons. Rebellions were useless. Their way of life was doomed to disappear. Either they changed their ways and lived, or they kept disillusioning themselves and continued to reave, and they disappeared along with their ways. Yara knew what her choice was. She wasn’t her father. The Iron Islands and their people were more important than their ways of life. They had an alliance with the new queen now, which would give them more opportunities than they ever had since the death of Harren the Black.

Still, Yara knew that her leadership was being questioned. Her people were attached to their ways. Stopping that would be hard. There was also the question of thralldom. Daenerys forbade the practice and made it a primary condition for their alliance. Yara had tried to convince the other queen that it wasn’t wise to banish thralldom from the Iron Islands, since the institution was well established and forbidding it would cause troubles that may be impossible to deal with. Daenerys had replied that slavery was unacceptable and that she wouldn’t tolerate it anywhere in Westeros. Yara explained to her that thralldom was not slavery. A thrall could only be obtained by paying the iron price. Once they were captured, they belonged to the person who caught them for the rest of their lives. Thralls couldn’t be sold or bought, and if their children were drowned to the Drowned God, then they were free. With the help of her uncle Rodrik, Yara managed to relent Daenerys in her determination of banishing thralldom. She didn’t declare all thralls to be free. However, she forbid Yara to reduce any more people into thralls, and declared that all people taken as thralls since the War of the Five Kings began would be set free and be given the right to return to their homes. For the other thralls, Daenerys reluctantly agreed to let them remain in their condition, but decreed that their children would be free men, no matter if they were drowned or not. These were harsh conditions, but better than the initial idea to completely ban thralldom. In two or three generations, there would be no thralls left in the Iron Islands.

Her men weren’t happy either to be forbidden from sacking and plundering the territories of the Reach. Qarl told her that some said she was selling the Iron Islands to the greenlanders. And although Ironmen were always eager to fight, they preferred to fight against strangers. Now they were fighting alongside strangers against their own countrymen, the very people they fought side by side against the Northerners not long ago. There were no talks of open rebellion yet, but Yara knew she would have to be careful. Her uncle was giving precious advice as to how to make sure that the transition would go smoothly and without too much complaint among their people and the captains.

“We’re ready, your Grace.” Qarl had come to her side.

“Call me Yara, Qarl.” For him, it would always be Yara.
“Very well, Yara. We’re ready.”

“I know.” She sighed.

“Euron has no chance. He is surrounded. This might be our last battle.”

“Orkmont and Blacktyde still escape us,” Yara pointed. She hoped as well that this would be their last battle, but she didn’t keep her hopes too high.

“They won’t keep fighting us once Euron is dead.”

“Euron was named at a Kingsmoot. According to our traditions, he is the rightful king. There will always be men to fight for him. And there will always be men to think that a woman’s place is not on the Seastone Chair.”

She thought about her uncle Aeron, the Damphair. She would have to deal with him once Pyke had fallen. He would certainly accuse her of betraying her own kind on religious grounds because of her alliance with Daenerys. After all, it was now widely known that the other queen was being advised by foreign priests. Qarl put an arm around her shoulders. She didn’t lean against him, but she didn’t push him back either.

“Don’t listen to them. You’re our queen. All those who chose Euron against you are fools.”

She took some comfort in that. “What do you think of freeing thralls? Daenerys Targaryen still wants that, I know it. Do you think I should do what she says?”

He looked at her, his expression indecipherable. “I don’t know. My grandfather was a thrall, but I don’t regret it. I wouldn’t have met you if he wasn’t captured, and from what my father told me, his owner wasn’t evil. He didn’t mistreat him. I don’t see the point in banning it.”

“The Targaryen queen will not see it that way. If she orders thralldom to be banished, she will expect me to accept.” Or obey. I may be queen, but to Daenerys, even the other queens were to obey her.

“But you are our queen, Yara. It’s your decision. She doesn’t have to give you orders.”

“Say that when you have her three dragons looking at you, ready to roast you alive.”

He removed his arm from her shoulders. “I suppose it’s a compelling argument.” He laughed nervously, and Yara barely echoed him.

She looked at the castle of Pyke, her home, not far away. They arrived in the thick of the night to avoid being spotted, but she could recognize the outline of her home even in this darkness. There was no moon in the sky. It was the perfect cover for their attack. No one would see them coming.

“Let’s hope this will be the last battle,” she said. “I’m tired of fighting. Fighting against our own people and friends, fighting against the Northerners, fighting against whoever else lives in Westeros. We’ve been fighting for years, and what did it get us? Rocks, pebbles, pinecones, and turnips? Was it worth losing our brothers, our sons? My brother? My father? What did we get from this? Nothing. We took fortresses, and we lost them, and we lost good men with them. And we lost more men in a fratricide war. What’s left to fight for? We have our kingdom. This is more than what my father and his ancestors ever got with their failed rebellions.”

“What about the Starks, Yara? You said you wanted to avenge Theon.”

“Hopefully, this dragon queen will take care of them. No need to kill them ourselves when she can do it for us.”

Yara wasn’t even sure if she wanted to avenge Theon. Theon had been lost to her long before. She saw that her brother was gone when she tried to rescue him. She now knew the tales of what Ramsay had done to him. He was the one who destroyed Theon. The Starks and the Lannisters only executed a shell, or at least she tried to tell herself that. She knew that an attempt to avenge Theon was doomed to fail. One evening, she talked about it with Rodrik, and with rational and logical arguments, he showed her that it was an impossible enterprise. They didn’t have the men to take the North or the Westerlands, and even if they limited themselves to killing the Starks and the Lannisters who played a role in Theon’s execution, then went back home, their family members would swear revenge against them forever, and they had more than enough resources to make the Iron Islands kneel. Killing the Lannisters and the Starks who were left was an almost impossible task, and the war that would follow may be one that Yara’s people may never be able to recover from.

One of her men arrived to her. “We’re ready.”

Yara nodded, and with Qarl, she climbed down from the Black Wind and went into one of the many boats. A man at the helm raised a torch and moved it in a very specific way, so the other ships would recognize the signal. Then they detached from her ship and rowed.

The progress was slow. They had torches with them, but they didn’t light them. They weren’t to be seen coming into the harbor of Lordsport, at least not before it was too late for the defenders. The lights of the harbor would betray them when they would close on the docks, but they wouldn’t be seen before they were close enough. The oarsmen rowed quietly and silently, making sure to not draw any attention.

The sound of oars slowly cutting across the water of the sea and the breathing of the men pulling and drawing were the only sounds around her. Yara remained at the prow of her boat, watching the buildings of Lordsport getting closer and closer. Within a few minutes, she would be home again. She hadn’t come there since she left for the Kingsmoot.

Yara used a Myrish glass she managed to get during her journey to Meereen and used it to look closely at what was going on in the docks. There weren’t many ships. Most were lost at Oldtown or the Shield Islands. Euron hadn’t only built all the ships he could. He also converted all the merchant ships he could find into warships. As a result, Yara could only distinguish half a dozen ships in the docks, when they could welcome dozens.

Sharp as a swordthrust, the sound of a horn split the air. AaaaaaaaRRREEEEEEeeeee. Yara shouted in pain and covered her ears as soon as the sound came. The terrible sound pierced them. It stopped, and she was about to release her ears when a second blow resonated over the sea, as strong as the first, and she protected her ears again. AaaaaaaaRRREEEEEEeeeee. She had the impression that her head was about to explode. She braced for another blow, and it came, this time worse than the two previous sounds. AAAAAAAAARRREEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEE! The boat was shaking, but all she could do was roll over herself as the third blow lasted, lasted, lasted, and lasted. How could someone blow a horn for so long.

Finally, all stopped. Yara slowly got back on her feet and looked around her. All the oarsmen in her boat had fallen. She watched the other boats and found that the people in them weren’t much better. She heard splashes of water. Men had fallen to the sea and were calling for help. A strident sound lingered in Yara’s ears that made it hard to focus on anything. She looked at the harbor ahead of them. Were there so many lanterns the last time she looked? She perceived yelling coming from the ships anchored nearby.

Yara knew what she had to do, and she didn’t hesitate. She unsheathed her sword. “Row forward!
Now! Everyone, row forward!”

Her own crew hurried to take back their positions. She shouted the same order to the nearby boats, and soon all the men were shouting at each other to press the movement. The time for secrecy was gone. The battle had begun.

To Yara’s taste, they needed too much time to reach the closest dock, and yet their boat was the first to berth. As soon as they were close enough, she jumped from the boat and helped all her men to get out of it. Two remained behind to attach the boat, according to the orders she gave prior to the battle, while the others followed her as she charged into the city.

The first enemy she met had to be one of the men who guarded the harbor, and she killed him easily. The advance through the city was quick and deadly. Many people died around her, friends and enemies all alike. The defence of the city didn’t seem very well organized.

Men began to discharge the ladders and rams they brought with them as soon as Lordsport had fallen. Yara gave up on fighting to supervise the discharging of all the material, hurrying the men to bring the siege engines forward as quickly as they could. They requisitioned every horse and cart they could find and progressed along the path leading to the castle of Pyke. Yara seized a shield as they approached the castle, something she seldom did. She would need it.

She sent detachments to take control of the path leading to Pyke ahead of them, and she was glad to see that they succeeded when she neared the castle’s gates. She raised her shield just in time to block an arrow that would have gotten through her head. The defenders shot arrows and threw rocks at them from the battlements, and the attackers shot arrows back to them, using shields as protection. The first ladders arrived and men began to climb them as soon as they were in position, giving another distraction to the enemy. Yara wanted to join her men assaulting the battlements, but she had to stay behind to supervise them and to lead the assault through the gate.

The ram reached their position not long after the ladders. Yara joined the men bringing it, and they began to shove the ram to the gate, protected by lines of shields over theirs heads. Her muscles burned from the effort, sweat covered her forehead. Her forces were multiplied, just like every time when she was in the heat of battle. She threw with all her forces the ram against the gate. Once. Twice. Thrice. Again, and again, and again. Splinters of wood flew away from the gate. Loud cracks were heard each time the ram crushed against the gate. The man right in front of her received an arrow through the throat, and fell over Yara, covering her with his blood, but she threw his body aside and kept hammering against the gate.

The gate gave way. It opened. Yara had never been denied entrance into her father’s castle, and this night proved that no one could stop her from entering whenever she wanted. Not even Euron. She rushed into the opening, releasing a cry of rage.

The fights inside the castle of Pyke were savage. Euron’s men fought fiercely, and so did Yara’s men. Some enemies she fought were mutes, others were not. Every time she killed one, she ran forward, searching for the one man she wanted to kill at all cost.

She reached the heavy doors of the Great Hall with a dozen men, and killed the two guards before them without problem. Then they burst into the Hall. All was dark, the only source of light being the torches her men were carrying. Yara seized one and walked to the Seastone Chair, where her father Balon sat for as far as she could remember. It was empty. Euron wasn’t there. She raised the torch and looked all around herself.

No answer. She looked back at the Chair, then between the columns, and she saw nothing.

They all rushed on them at the same time. Yara and her men were surrounded in no time by a huge wave of men who attacked them with swords, spears and axes without a word. She swung her sword at the first enemy who charged her and blocked the axe that was coming for her head. Her opponent didn’t last long since her sword was inside his chest a second later, but she didn’t have time to breathe. Another one came on her, this time with a long sword. He didn’t last much longer, nor did the third. The fourth however, gave her a real challenge. She needed to hit his leg with her sword first before she thrust her sword through his face. She heard cries all around her.

When Yara looked behind her, she realized that more of her men had arrived in reinforcements. From being outnumbered, they now outnumbered the enemy. She spotted Qarl fighting against a man wielding a long lance. Yara took an axe on the floor and threw it with all her force at Qarl’s opponent, who ended lying on his chest with steel planted into his heart. All of Euron’s men were lying on the floor, injured or dead, a few seconds later. Yara tried to get answers from those still alive, but they were all mute. She ordered them all to be killed on the spot.

On these words, she sped through the rooms and the corridors nearby, finding nothing. Her men had already cleaned some of the places she went through. And then she knew where Euron was. She went to the place where her father was murdered.

And there she found him. He stood in the middle of the bridge of ropes, between the two towers. His back was turned on her. Yara had her sword already unsheathed. If she was careful enough, she could kill him from behind without him noticing her. Some may say this was a cowardly way to kill someone, but Euron murdered her father. The way he would die didn’t matter. Only the fact he would die did matter.

She put a first foot on the bridge, and instantly the wood under it creaked. Euron laughed. “You really thought you could kill me this way, Yara?” She should have known. It was impossible to arrive in silence behind someone on a bridge like this one. Euron turned to face her, a devilish grin on his face. “That doesn’t look like you, Yara. Stabbing someone in the back.”

“Would you prefer it if I stabbed you in the belly?” she asked.

Euron burst into laughs. “You may try, but no matter how you try to kill me, you will fail. You cannot kill the kraken.”

“No, but you can kill the kinslayer.” No one is more cursed than the kinslayer.

He opened his arms, as if to accept her into a hug. “I am not a kinslayer, Yara. A kingslayer, maybe, but a kinslayer, no. It wasn’t my brother that I killed on that bridge. It was a king, a king that no one wanted. Everyone wanted to get rid of him. I just did what no one dared to do. Don’t pretend that you loved Balon. The man who had two of your brothers die in a useless war, and who abandoned the third.”

She ignored what he just said. “It’s over, Euron. I got your ship. Your crew is dead. All your men will be dead or in chains by the end of the night. Pyke is mine. You lost.”

“Oh. I lost?” He grinned. “Do you truly believe that I’m done, Yara? I can build myself another ship, you know. I can get more men to crew it. And I have something you will never have.” He showed her something he held in his right hand. It was a black horn with golden symbols on it. “This horn can awake the kraken. And I just blew it three times. Why did you think I attacked Oldtown? I admit you surprised me there, but my main objective wasn’t to take the city. It was to find this. The man who blows this horn can control the kraken. And now that I blew it, the kraken has woken up, and when he comes, he will put your fleet into pieces. I don’t need a fleet. With that kraken obeying me, I will need nothing.”

Yara looked at the horn, unimpressed. “I always thought you were mad, but now you go far off the limits. It’s over, Euron. You’re going to die.”

He laughed. “All right. If you insist, I’m going to kill you now, for treason.” He unsheathed his sword and pointed it towards her. “And also because I will enjoy it. Come, Yara. Come and embrace you nuncle one last time.”

Yara slowly approached. If she ran to him, it would cause the bridge to sway. One step at a time, she got closer to Euron, watching him closely to find any weakness in his positioning. When she wasn’t far from him, Euron grabbed one of the ropes and gave a quick draw on it.

The bridge shook, and Yara almost lost her stance. Euron used the opportunity to run on her. She ducked his attack, stepping aside from his charge, and tried to hit him on the side, but he stopped her attack. They exchanged blows, Euron roaring wildly while Yara did the same with more restraint. Euron looked like a beast attacking its prey. His blows were powerful, and Yara realized that Euron was way stronger than her. She tried to compensate with her agility, but Euron was just as agile as she was, if not more. The swaying bridge didn’t help either. Euron didn’t seem to bother with it, charging and launching attacks without holding back, but Yara tried all the time to maintain her own balance and often had to grip a rope.

Euron finally struck her hard, then pushed her on the wood of the bridge. Yara’s head was spinning. Her shoulder was grabbed, and the next moment she had a dagger on her throat. She lost her sword in the fight. She felt her uncle’s hot breath on her face.

“Let her go!”

The dagger was digging into her flesh when the shout came from behind her.

“Well, if it’s not my niece’s bedmate?” Euron turned her around, and she saw Qarl standing not far away, sword in hand, a look of horror on his face. Her uncle was still holding her from behind. “You’ll have the pleasure to see the woman you love to fuck die right in front of you.”

The air was filled with Euron’s laughter, and Qarl seemed about to try to save her when her uncle’s laugh was cut short. She heard a gargle and immediately the pression of the dagger on her throat reduced. She got free of her uncle’s hold, and the moment after he was falling. She staggered to prevent him from falling over her.

“Yara, are you all right?” Qarl was kneeling next to her immediately, his sword still in hand.

“Aye, I’m fine.” She massaged her neck and looked at Euron. He lied on the wooden bridge, a bolt in the back of his head. Yara looked up and saw a man with a crossbow in his hands.

“I only shot him in the leg in Oldtown. This time, I thought it would be better if I shot him in the head,” he said.

Yara realized this wasn’t a man. He had black skin. “Wait a minute. I saw you in Oldtown.”

“Yes, you did.”
“How are you here?”

“I would have expected some thanks. I just saved your life, after all.”

“You could have killed her,” Qarl opposed.

Sarella Sand shrugged. “I didn’t.” She looked again at Yara. “So, about some thanks?”

“Thank you,” Yara reluctantly said after a moment. “But what are you doing here?”

“I failed to kill your uncle the last time. He was only wounded. I thought it was my chance to complete the work.”

“And how did you get here?”

“On one of your ships,” she replied.

“Impossible. None of my men would accept a Dornish woman in their crew. Let alone someone with black skin.”

“I hid in the hold. It wasn’t easy, the food wasn’t very good, but it was amusing. And I joined on one of the boats in the attack. It wasn’t difficult. All cats are black in the night.” She approached Euron’s body and took the horn that fell not far from him. “I’ll bring it back to Sam. He found it when he was in the North. He’ll want it back.”

And she walked away. Sarella Sand left without another word. Yara looked at her disappearing in the opposite tower. She stood alone with Qarl on the bridge. She stared at her uncle’s body. She didn’t kill him, but he was dead, and that was all that mattered. The war may not be over yet, but the two remaining islands wouldn’t resist for long now that Euron was gone. She looked in disdain at the dead. He was near the border of the bridge. She knelt and pushed it into the long fall. She watched as Euron Greyjoy fell into the sea, probably in a very similar way to how her father died. She watched his body hit the rocks from the distance, before it disappeared into the salted water. May the Drowned God drown him for good.

Yara stood up. It was over. It was finally over. Euron was dead, she was Queen of the Iron Islands, and the war amongst her people was almost done. When she looked at the horizon, she saw the first glimpse of dawn. The night was coming to an end, and the battle was over. Still, despite this, she had a strange feeling in her stomach that this was far from being over. She didn’t know where this feeling was coming from, or why it was there at all, but she felt it. The war wasn’t over.

Chapter End Notes

I admit that having someone come from nowhere like that to solve the problem seems a little too easy, but we’re talking about Sarella Sand, and hiding in plain sight of someone is in her style, and she is the daughter of Oberyn, so killing with style is probably in her nature as well.

Euron also appears quite desillusional and mad. In the show and the books, he was described as a mad man, but an intelligent man as well. But someone once said that there was a thin limit between folly and genius. Euron would be quite capable of believing that he has won when he's about to be defeated, because he probably can’t consider the possibility that he's not invincible. And in a situation like this one, he could go as far as to imagine that he can bring back a kraken that would allow him to kill all his enemies. The quicker is the ascension to power, the harder is the downfall.

Keep in mind Yara's last words.

ASHER IV

“You can’t do that.”

“My decision is final. I will not reconsider it.”

The King in the North showed very clearly that he wouldn’t change his mind. Jon Snow, Asher Forrester and Tyrion Lannister were together in the office of the king, and Asher tried, just like every northern lord these past few days, to convince their king to not bend the knee before Daenerys Targaryen.

News arrived two weeks ago about the fall of King’s Landing. Cersei Lannister was dead, and Ser Jaime Lannister, the Kingslayer, was made prisoner. The new queen ordered every lord in the Westerlands, the Riverlands, the Vale and the North to pledge themselves to her. She promised that all those who would acknowledge her as their queen would keep their lands and titles, and that no one in their families would be taken as hostage or die.

Asher wasn’t entirely sure himself of what he should do. Daenerys had helped them to free Ironrath, allowed him to go back to Westeros with an army. There was also the fact that his uncle Malcolm was advising her now. Before he left Meereen, he and his uncle had a discussion, and Malcolm told him that if Daenerys succeeded in conquering the Seven Kingdoms, House Forrester would need no other ally. However, that was when the North was being held by the Boltons. Asher didn’t have any problem with the idea of eventually swearing fealty to Daenerys Targaryen if she could remove the Boltons from the North, but now that the Starks were back and that Jon Snow was hailed King in the North, Asher was divided between two sides. He didn’t want to fight against Malcolm, but he didn’t want to give up on Jon Snow either. If Ironrath was no longer in the hands of the Whitehills, it was in large part thanks to the Starks and the Lannisters, as strange as the latter may seem.

Jon Snow announced almost immediately after they received the news that he wouldn’t remain king. Daenerys Targaryen announced in her letter that she would be heading north to receive the fealty of every lord, and also to help them in the war against the dead. This surprised Asher. Did Daenerys believe in the White Walkers? She swore that she would protect the North against the invaders from beyond the Wall. To Jon Snow, it seemed to be enough. He declared that he would continue to fight against the dead, and remain king as long as necessary to defend the Wall, but once Daenerys would come into the North, he would bend the knee and acknowledge her as the only true queen in Westeros. He also said that he would take the black again once the war was over, to prevent any attempt to start a civil war between Targaryens.

Asher didn’t approve the idea. Jon Snow deserved to be king. He gave up everything for the North. He even died for it. He fought against the real threat, helped Asher and his family to get back their home, and more than everything, he didn’t choose himself to be king. The lords of the North chose him, and if Asher had been there when he was declared king, he would probably have approved the choice and raised his sword as well.

Asher looked at Lord Tyrion. He didn’t hate the dwarf, he even appreciated him in some way, but the Lannisters were still behind his father’s death at the Twins. The North remembered, and Asher would never forget who killed his father. Mira could consider the Lord of Casterly Rock and his wife as friends, Asher would never go that far.

“Was this your idea?” Asher asked to the dwarf.

“No, it’s mine,” Jon said. “Lord Tyrion’s idea was to marry me with Daenerys Targaryen.”

Asher looked at the small man in complete surprise. Tyrion Lannister shrugged. “I didn’t see a better way to unite the North and the south. Daenerys has dragons. It’s not as if we could resist her. Sadly, she seems to have chosen another man to sit by her side. Her hand is no longer available.”

The message from King’s Landing also said that Daenerys Targaryen was now betrothed with Trystane Martell, son and heir to Doran Martell, the Prince of Dorne and the Lord of Sunspear. Asher wished the guy good luck.

“You should reconsider all this, your Grace,” Asher told Jon Snow. “I have an uncle who serves as an advisor for Daenerys Targaryen, and I met her in Meereen. I could ask him to intercede in your favor before her.”

“No. I took my decision. Daenerys will never accept another king in Westeros,” the King in the North replied.

“She accepted a queen in the Iron Islands.”

Tyrion Lannister intervened. “That’s different. The Iron Islands are a small group of unruly islands, without much to offer. The North is half the territory of Westeros. A Targaryen will never let someone be king of half the Seven Kingdoms. And even for the Iron Islands, my spies tell me that Daenerys put severe conditions for their independence. The new Queen of the Iron Islands must ban piracy and thralldom, and she must also grant freedom of religion in the islands. Since Daenerys has Red Priests among her advisors, I expect Yara Greyjoy to face several rebellions during her reign. It will be difficult for her to maintain her authority over the Iron Islands.”

“We could try, at least. Attempt to make a compromise,” Asher insisted.

“No. There will be no compromise,” Jon stated. “I will take the black again, and Daenerys will be queen. Her armies and her dragons will be able to defeat the army of the dead, something we can’t do by ourselves. I will bend the knee. I will not sacrifice the North to the dead because I’m too proud to kneel before another queen.”

Asher was about to retort to this when the Lord of Casterly Rock spoke up. “Listen, you are both Northerners and are among the most stubborn lads I’ve ever met. None of you will succeed in convincing the other to change his mind. So instead of wasting precious time to argue about things you cannot change, I suggest we go back to the important matters at hand, that is, making sure that the Wall is well defended against the dead and that we can feed and warm the men defending it. And since a part of the Knights of the Vale deserted, I believe it is more than ever of the utmost importance.”

Asher looked at the dwarf, then at the king. Jon Snow wouldn’t relent, it was true. Asher had some of his men keeping the watch on the top of the Wall as they spoke. He should be with them.

“Your Grace.” He bowed before Jon Snow and walked out.
“I’m coming with you,” the Lannister said.

The two of them walked to the winch cage, getting through the men and women drilling in the courtyard. The two women who were the most visible were Sylvi, the wildling girl that Gared brought with him from the North, and Arya Stark, Jon Snow’s sister. They were putting back into place their weapons, probably being done with practice for today. Asher had taken a liking to the two girls. Sylvi was almost a new sister for Gared. Asher was glad for his friend. Gared needed someone he could take care of, worry about, after his father and his sister were butchered by Ludd’s men, and even more after he learned of his uncle’s betrayal.

“I hope your wife is doing well,” Lord Tyrion told him as the cage began to ascend.

“She is at Highpoint, trying to rebuild it,” he replied shortly. He didn’t really want to talk about it. Since her father died, Gwyn had to struggle with many conflicting feelings. She kept writing to him, but Asher sometimes had the impression that she was slipping away from him. “You really suggested Jon Snow to marry Daenerys?” he asked the dwarf.

“I wish he didn’t talk about it, but yes. Anyway, he would have none of it. He refused to marry his own aunt.”

“What a surprise,” Asher commented with sarcasm.

“Among the Targaryens, this is acceptable.”

“Jon Snow is a Stark, not a Targaryen. I met Daenerys in Essos, and believe me, she and Jon Snow have nothing in common.”

“What can you tell me of her? Should we worry about her?”

“It depends. I advise you to never provoke or hurt her, or her dragons. If you want something from her, then give her something first, and then she will help you. You keep her promises to her, and she will her promises to you as well. She is a good friend to have, and an even worse enemy to have.”

“And what about someone who killed her father?”

Asher looked at the dwarf. He seemed worried. “I don’t give much time to live to your brother.”

“I feared so.” The small man looked far away.

“Jon Snow should remain king. He deserves it.”

“My sister once told me that if we ever began to sort out what everyone deserved, we would end weeping for each and every person in the world.”

“My condolences for your sister.”

“It’s more Jaime who occupies my thoughts for now. I don’t really care about Cersei’s death. She tried to kill me more often than I can remember. We’re talking about a woman who placed a price on my head, on the head of my wife, and even on my daughter.”

“I’m glad your sister is dead,” Asher said in all honesty.

“Me too,” replied the Lord of Casterly Rock. After a moment, he asked something to Asher. “Is there no one in your family that you hate, or that you have some trouble with?”

“No. I always got along with all of them. I loved my parents and all my brothers and sisters, but perhaps I was closer to Mira than to all the others.” There was his half-brother, but Asher didn’t truly consider him as part of the family. The thought that his father might have had children with another woman was… perturbing.

“A clever girl. I like her. I’ll always remember the day when Cersei engaged a duel of wits with her. She tried to get your sister to declare her loyalty to Joffrey, or to trap her in one way or another. And she failed. You should have seen Cersei’s face. Now she’s dead, and your sister is alive, and married.”

Asher smiled at this anecdote. The last message from Mira had come with the last load of ironwood. She said that Ironrath would be ready for winter. She didn’t talk of her husband, or her pregnancy. Asher regretted he didn’t write to her, Talia and Ryon as often as she did.

“I’m sorry for your brother,” Asher told the man standing next to him.

“Are you?” Tyrion Lannister seemed skeptical.

“I don’t like him, but I lost two brothers in this war, so I know how you must feel.” Asher shook his head. “Rodrik was supposed to be Lord of Ironrath, not me. I was never supposed to succeed my father.”

“And neither was I. At least, your father was a good man, and he loved you like his son. But here we are, two second sons, both leaders of their house, and fighting against the common enemy.”

Asher nodded. The cage was arriving to its destination. “Thank you for helping my sister in King’s Landing.”

“That was a pleasure. Sometimes, she makes me think about Sansa.”

The cage stopped. They opened the door and walked out, taking different directions. Asher went to the east, the Lord of Casterly Rock to the west. Their men were positioned in different places. They used to have more Lannister men at Castle Black before, but after Jon Snow made his intention to surrender to Daenerys known, some lords from the Vale left and rode south. As a result, Lannister soldiers were sent in the castles where the desertions took place. Asher never felt right with too many Lannisters around him, so he didn’t complain too much.

Asher spoke with each of his men. They were all exhausted, with all the attacks they faced, the lack of food and the cold. There was also the solitude. Many missed their wife and their children, and those who had none simply missed the time when they could spend the night with a woman, whoever she was. Asher’s father taught him that it was important to stay close to your men, while reminding them that you were their commander at the same time. Asher had seen how this was important in Essos too, when he served as a sellsword, though there he also had to be careful to not get stabbed in the back. The risks of treason were fewer in the North. It was a wave of clean air for him, after all these years spent in the east.

Asher spotted a man he knew only too well. Gared Tuttle. Duncan’s son stayed with a spear in his hand near a fire, and stared at the land that laid before him very carefully. He and Asher had never been very close back at Ironrath. Gared was his father’s squire, and since Rodrik was the one destined to succeed as Lord of Ironrath, he had more interaction with Gared than Asher did. Asher was also older than Gared. He wielded the sword like a soldier when Gared just began to learn how to use it. Talia was the one who was the closest to Gared, and their lady mother as well, who almost treated him as if he was her own son. There was also another one of Asher’s siblings that Gared would have wanted to be very close to, but this was also the reason why the said sibling kept some distance from Gared. However, since Gared spent years north of the Wall just like Asher spent years in Essos, their common status of exiles got them closer since he came back.

“Nothing to notice?” Asher asked him.

“Nothing, but they’re out there, somewhere. I know it,” Gared replied.

“What was it, to fight them in the North Grove?”

“It was hell every day. That’s why we abandoned the North Grove. We couldn’t continue to defend it. Elsera didn’t make it.”

Asher grumbled and nodded before looking at the horizon. The sky was relatively clear today, which meant the White Walkers were probably not about to attack. Still, the sun seldom showed up. That didn’t make for a happy atmosphere.

“Was there any news from Ironrath, lately?” Gared asked.

“Mira only says that the reconstruction is going well.”

“And her baby?”

“She didn’t talk about him,” Asher replied. He noticed that Gared tightened his fist. “Don’t worry. Mira is capable of looking after herself. She’ll be fine. My mother was pregnant six times, and nothing ever went wrong.”

“Or is it that she is married?”

Gared looked back at him and answered too quickly. “Not at all.” Asher had put him on the defensive. He grinned.

“Gared, almost everyone at Ironrath knew about it, even before I left. I saw how you looked at her. I look at Gwyn the same way.” Gared’s expression melted instantly. He seemed unsure about what he should say. Asher laughed shortly. “Don’t worry, I know nothing happened between you.”

That would be unlike Mira to engage into a relationship outside the bounds of marriage. She had disapproved of Asher’s meetings with Gwyn as soon as she discovered it, though she also felt sorry for them both and empathized with him. Still, she disapproved. Mira’s shy nature was the reason why Asher was so surprised when he surprised her with his husband. If he had known that the guy would abandon her later, he would have broken his nose on the spot. However, Asher didn’t feel like he could hate his brother-in-law, not after all the time they spent together during the siege of Highpoint. Nothing could tell him back then that Gerold would leave Mira.

“You know, Asher, I went to see her the day before she left. And… I wanted to tell her. But I couldn’t find the courage.”

Asher nodded in understanding. “It was probably better that way, Gared.”

“Would you think the same if I told you that about Gwyn.”

“With Gwyn and me, it was different.”

“How was it different?”

“We are highborn, both of us, but more than that, we loved each other.” Again, Gared’s expression collapsed. Asher apologized immediately. “I’m sorry, Gared. But no matter what feelings you had for my sister, she didn’t share them.”

Gared looked again at the fields covered by snow hundreds of feet under them. “I just… I find it unfair, what this guy, the one she married, what he did. By the Old Gods, he abandoned her when she was pregnant!”

“I don’t really understand what happened, Gared. I spent time with Mira’s husband, and Gerold seemed decent. Very decent. I can tell you that he was madly in love with her.”

“Perhaps you misjudged him then.”

“Gared, we’re talking about a man who did almost everything my sister told him. She made him promise to stop me from killing Ludd during the siege of Highpoint. She didn’t want me to ruin my marriage with Gwyn. Gerold killed Ludd himself so that I couldn’t do it. I’m telling you that he loves her.”

“Then why leave her?”

“I don’t know, but if we ever meet again, he’ll have to answer a lot of questions to me, that you can be sure of.”

“I’m worried about her.”

“She’ll be fine. Worry about the guy who’s married to her. If he cannot give me a very good reason for his actions, there won’t be much left when I’m done with him.”

“Do you think I could come back to Ironrath once this is all over? I’m a brother of the Night’s Watch, but I wish I could see it one last time.”

Asher placed a hand on his shoulder. “Gared, you will always be welcomed at Ironrath. And this way, you’ll get to see Mira again,” he added with a grin. Asher gave one last pat on his back and resumed his inspection of the Wall. He remained several hours with his men at the top. There was a turnover in the middle, but he stayed with the men taking their posts in order to give them courage.

As he watched the landscape, Asher thought about his time in Essos. He was far away from his family, from all the people he loved. He had to live day by day, taking the work he could find. He didn’t tell everything to his brothers and sisters, or to Gwyn, about all the things he did in Essos. He wasn’t proud of some. He served as a sellsword and fought in several companies, but he also performed private works for masters, even criminals. Some involved torture and murder. What would his parents have thought of their son, if they had known of all the things he did? Only Beskha truly knew him. She was the only one to know about the man he was before he left Ironrath, and who knew who he was in Essos. She had been his only true friend during his exile. Before Malcolm found him, he had no one else to care about, to trust or to confide in. One day, he should tell everyone, Gwyn if not anyone else. He would give her some time to mourn her father first, and when the time would be right, he would reveal her everything. She deserved to know.

AaaaaaaaRRRREEEEEeeeee.

A deafening sound burst into the air. The world seemed to shake all around Asher. He tried to get a hold on the ice wall. The sound stopped, and he breathed.

AaaaaaaaRRRREEEEEeeeee.

It came back, and this time the ground under him shook so violently that he fell on his knees. Asher could barely move. The sound was so powerful that it prevented him from breathing. When it stopped again, Asher took a deep breathe, and he began to stand up. Before he could get on his two feet, a third blow came.

_AaaaaaaaRRREEEEEeeeee_.

Asher fell on his hands again. The ice under him shook more violently than before. The loud sound continued for a very long time, and when Asher managed to look up, he saw splinters and shards of ice coming up. He felt the snow giving way under his feet.

Then Asher felt himself falling. All he could hear was the loud sound of a horn. He yelled for help, but his voice was drowned by the deafening sounds of the world collapsing. He barely noticed the ground getting closer to him by the second. The last thing he thought about was his wife, Gwyn, before he hit the surface.

ARYA VI

Arya managed to grab Needle and to leave her personal room soon enough to watch everything. She woke up fully alert and ready to defend her life, and despite the horrible sound made by a horn unlike any she ever heard, she was outside in no time. She still wore her armor and leather. She slept with them, ready to fight at any opportunity. Because of that, she was already out when the third blow came, and she saw the greatest structure she ever saw in her life come down. A large section of the Wall crumbled, destroying a part of the buildings of Castle Black with him, burying who knew how many men under the snow. She watched in stupor and terror as the ice fell into long tears, huge blocks and white dust. She covered her face just in time. Small shards flew towards her with a strong gust of wind, followed by snow.

When it was over, Arya removed her arm from her face. Ice had dug into the leather, and half her body was white now. She looked at the large crevice in the Wall. She saw many things since she left Winterfell, but nothing like that. The opening had to be about twenty or thirty yards. It wasn’t that large, but enough to let a column of men walk through it. Arya realized that she wasn’t the only one to look at the breach now. Everyone stood in stupor at the sight of it.

“What happened?”

Arya turned to see her brother looking at where stood the tunnel under the Wall only a few moments ago. It was now a pile of snow and ice, maybe twenty feet high, thirty at most.

“There was a blast, and then… Everything fell,” she said. “There were people on the Wall, no?” she asked her brother, worried

Jon kept looking at the Wall. Arya spent the last months with him at Castle Black, and what she just witnessed was entirely unreal. The Wall had seemed unbreakable when she cast her eyes on it for the first time, but now a part of it was only rubble, and Jon was just as astonished as she was.

Jon walked past her and went to the men close to the opening. He ordered them to start digging into the ice to find the people who were buried under it. Arya was on her way to help them when a strong arm stopped her. She turned to see the Imp’s man, Bronn, holding her.

“Where are you going like this, young lady?” he asked.

“I’m not a lady!”

“Sorry. I forgot.” He always forgot. “Still, where are you going?”

“I’m going to help.”

“And you think you will help? Your brother who’s not your true brother will have more than enough men to clear the bodies. These men are already dead. If they somehow survived the fall, snow will have filled their mouth and nose, and they’ll already be dead from asphyxia.”

“We can’t let them there!”

“They’re already dead. There’s nothing we can do about them.”

“We should bury them, at least.”

“Burn them, you mean.”

“Yes, burn them, whatever. I’m going to help.” She tried to get free of his hold. “Release me.”

“I don’t think so.”

“Why?”

“Because of this.”

He pointed to the horizon. Arya looked at the place his finger indicated. It was on the other side of the Wall, through the breach. She squinted and saw nothing first, but then she noticed that something was whirling far away.

“I’m not sure how all this ice and snow came down, but I know someone who’s going to try to take advantage of it,” the sellsword said.

“Bronn!” The Imp came. “What the hell happened!”

“Don’t ask me. I don’t know. No one knows. But I have a good idea of what is coming.”

Tyrion Lannister looked through the breach, and the next moment he was ordering two of his officers nearby to prepare for battle. One was sent to the Lannister camp outside Castle Black, and another was to bring all available men in the castle’s compound to form a double line, swords in the first line and archers in the second. He then turned to Bronn.

“Bronn, a wise man once said that under certain circumstances, extreme measures were warranted.”

He gave a very serious look at his man. “It’s time for extreme measures. Prepare the final solution.”

Arya saw Bronn with a worried look on his face. “Final solution on the way.”

He ran away. The Lannister turned towards her. “Come with me. We must get out of here.”

“What? There’re coming. We have to stop them,” she protested.

“And we will. But if we stay here, we will all die.”

“You want to abandon Jon?” Her brother was preparing a defense near the breach with what men he could gather. The dwarf looked at her sharply.

“Listen. I promised to Sansa to keep an eye on you before we left Winterfell. She will never forgive me if you die, and your brother neither. Jon Snow will never forgive himself if you die, and the risks are too high.”

She held his gaze for a time. Then she walked away and headed for the men that were assembled by her brother to form lines of defense. She wouldn’t give up on Jon. She had failed to save Rickon. She wouldn’t let Jon die as well, and she wouldn’t stay behind while everyone else was fighting.
Perhaps this was what the Imp and Sansa did, but she wasn’t a Lannister. She was a Stark, and the Starks faced their enemies.

A disorderly mob was gathering near the place where the tunnel under the Wall stood before. That was where a White Walker walked through. Arya wasn’t at Castle Black back when it happened. She rode with Sansa’s husband as soon as they learned about it. She had never been on the Wall for any attack either. She never saw a wight, let alone a White Walker. All she had to picture them were the tales of the men stationed here, but most of them only saw the dead from afar. Arya had the feeling that this time, she would see their enemy for real.

Torches were distributed and lit among the men, and archers were preparing flaming arrows to be fired on the enemy as soon as he crossed the Wall. Arya had grown and was much taller than when she left Winterfell. She was now fifteen, a flowered woman, but she was still slim and smaller than most men, like a needle. She remembered Syrio’s pleased expression and chuckle when she told him that she was holding a needle. She remained a smaller target, not as small as before, but still small. As a result, Jon didn’t see her as he organized the men. She was only one person in a crowd. The storm was coming.

“Archers ready! Stop everything that gets through the Wall. Make sure to burn the wights. If a White Walker comes through, then just hold him off until I get a chance to finish him.” Jon kept shooting instructions, but soon it was impossible to hear him. The wind covered his voice. Arya tried to find where Sylviawas, the wildling girl, was, but she couldn’t see her through the crowd of men. Soon they were all inside the storm.

It wasn’t the first time it happened. Castle Black was attacked five times since Arya arrived, and each time a strong storm came with it. Sometimes it made it difficult to determine if they truly were under attack. It was winter, and there were snow storms during all the season. Whenever the weather got hard, they believed they were under attack, but sometimes it was only a simple storm, and nothing more. This time, she knew for sure that this was no normal storm. The dead were coming for them.

She stood with the other men, mostly Northerners, for long minutes, ready for anything to come through the breach, but it had become difficult to see through it, or even to make out the breach through the snows. The Northerners held position, waiting for an enemy that most of them would fight face to face for the first time, their helmets, chainmails and armors taking a white shade. They gripped their weapons tightly. Arya kept her grip loose. She had Needle at her belt, and a longer sword into her hand. Most of the people around her held their weapons with their two hands.

Then she saw. Something emerged through the snow. Dark pads and armor, pale figure, free long white hair, no helmet, blue eyes, a long sword in his hand. He stood on the pile of rubble in the breach, as if he was looking at them. Fear cuts deeper than swords. Arya reminded herself these words. She couldn’t let fear get a hold on her, now less than ever.

Flaming arrows flew at the blue man, and others followed. Arya saw the archers not far from her release their arrows when they saw the others do it. The arrows bounced on the White Walker. They didn’t leave a single scratch or scorch on him. He raised his sword and sent an inhuman scream. Fear cuts deeper than swords. Arya repeated the words in her head just when a wave of people ran past the White Walker and headed straight to them. She saw a volley of flaming arrows coming far from her left, and a few others followed there and there. This was no organized defense. There was no general volley of arrows to slow down significantly the swarming army. The wights were on them in no time.

Arya wasn’t in the first line, so she didn’t suffer from the first wave, but as soon as she saw a dead man, she attacked him. Most of his skin was gone, and he held a club in his hands. He tried to crush Arya with it, but swift as a deer, she avoided him and thrust her sword into his chest, using the methods Syrio taught her. The wight didn’t show any pain, and he didn’t slow down. He brought his hand to her face and clawed at it. Arya could barely avoid it. She felt a scratch on her cheek and could barely remove the sword from his chest as she retreated. The sword was a part of her arm. She couldn’t leave her arm in this. She blocked several assaults and managed to hit her opponent several times, but no matter how often she reached him, it had no effect. For a very short moment, she had forgotten that it was already dead, and that only fire or dragonglass could kill it again. He kept coming at her… until another soldier threw a torch to his head. The wight immediately started to scream, and in no time he was rolling on the ground, unable to do anything. Arya went to another enemy.

She soon realized that the technics of the water dance of Braavos were useless against these things. They had no blood. You couldn’t pierce them and let them leak until they died. She had to hack them, to make sure they could move as little as they could, until someone could finish them by burning them. She found a torch on the ground and used it to kill her enemies for good. It was far easier that way. She fought dead men, but also dead animals. There was a wolf that she managed to burn at the last moment before his claws bit her face, and a bear too, who slaughtered men by dozens before she could make him catch fire. Even then, he struggled for minutes as the flames devoured him, killing more men in the process. She saw Ghost tear a wight to pieces far away. She just neutralized another wight with a black cloak and felt another approach her by behind. She turned and swung her sword heavily at him, and her weapon met his.

For a second time within minutes, her arm was barely enough to stop the shards from getting to her face and into her eyes. Only this time, they weren’t shards of ice, but shards of steel. Her sword shattered. The White Walker stood right before her. He brought his sword up, then down. He struck thin air. Arya had made a roulade to escape his blow. Her other sword being into pieces, she took Needle and struck through the White Walker’s leg. Her sword was stopped by the man’s skin. It looked as hard as the steel he just destroyed. He turned towards her and tried to stab her, but she ducked him once again, and hit him once more. Needle struck right on target a dozen times, but each time with no effect. The White Walker, on the other side, couldn’t find a way to hurt her. He was taller and stronger than her, but she was quicker and more agile. To the opposite of the other men, Arya had listened to her brother. She knew that there were two things that could destroy White Walkers, just like for wights. However, if both could be destroyed by dragonglass, fire had no effect on a White Walker. It was something else that could kill it.

Just like her sword previously, the man with blue eyes exploded in pieces, and right behind where he stood a moment ago, Jon was there, Longclaw right where the heart of the White Walker would have been. They may have no dragonglass at Castle Black, but they had Valyrian steel.

“We have to go!” Her brother took her arm and grabbed her with him.

“But they’re attacking us!” she protested.

“We cannot repel them.”

Indeed, Arya looked behind her, and she realized that they were overwhelmed by the dead. More were always coming through the breach, and several people were being slaughtered all around them. There were men in red armour, Lannister soldiers, who died alongside Jon’s men. Some were under a pile of dead bodies that looked as if they devoured them. The skeletons and bodies with hanging flesh were swarming everywhere. Like in King’s Landing, at the Twins, and at Moat Cailin, Arya couldn’t fight. She only had one option: run.

So she ran. She and Jon put as much distance between them and the Wall as they could, overhearing screams of men, dead or dying, among the whistles of the wind and the snowflakes whipping their faces.

A strong burst of wind threw her ahead. She felt a burst of heat hit her back at the same time, and she landed in the snow, face first. She looked at her right and saw Jon in a similar position. She looked behind her, and had to cover her eyes before the powerful light. She didn’t feel snow falling over her anymore.

When the intensity of the light lowered, she could have a better look. Men running everywhere, flames on their backs, screaming. An oppressive heat had replaced the cold of winter. However, it was the green flames that struck her the most. A large region around the former tunnel was engulfed in a great fire that didn’t seem about to end. Some of the buildings of Castle Black were afire as well. Then another powerful sound of something crashing loudly was heard. New segments of the Wall collapsed, in part over the breach itself.

“What was that?”

Jon had managed to get up. There were other men who were slowly recovering as well, and all looked at the sight of fire right in front of them. They had never seen such a fire, Arya was sure of that. In comparison, the fire in the Stark camp at the Twins looked like a fireplace, or a candle. They all stood there, watching the green flames consuming everything. Fire could kill wights. Jon had told her so many times. He had done his job very well today. Arya was sure that no wight would escape from this. She wondered how many living men had perished with them.

Chapter End Notes

So, the Wall has fallen. There will be explanations concerning how the Wall fell in a future chapter, but to give you a temporary and partial explanation, the horn that was heard at the Wall was the horn that Euron blew during the Battle of Pyke in Yara’s last chapter. Asher’s and Arya’s chapters were taking place at the same time as Yara’s. People who read the books certainly have a better idea of what this horn might be. In the show, the horn was seen during Season 2 at the Fist of the First Men, when Sam and Dolorous Edd unburied a bag full of dragonglass. There was a black horn with the dragonglass, and this is the horn that Euron stole in Oldtown, like Sarella previously said.

Chapter Notes

Hi everyone, I'm back.

For those who were worried, or who simply wondered why I strangely disappeared for more than a month from the fanfiction world, I am fine. I simply had a blank of inspiration and a lack of motivation to keep writing this story for some time, but now I'm back on track. I want to reassure everyone who's following this fanfiction, I WILL NOT GIVE UP ON IT. I'm going to finish it. I just went through a period when it was harder for me to write it, and the pace is hard to keep when I want to upload two new chapters every week while continuing with "A Rose and a Lion".

Anyway, I'm back now, and I offer you this new chapter right before Christmas. Consider it a present. Here, Sansa receives some news, and she has a good discussion with her brother.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SANSA XXXI

“Are you sure it came from Casterly Rock?”

She looked at Wolkan, who looked miserable. “It came from there, my lady.”

She stared at Creylen’s writing and Genna’s signature at the bottom. The seal of the castellan of the Rock was broken, but very clear. It didn’t surprise Sansa that Genna would use the seal to send her missives. Damion Lannister was only castellan in name.

Still, she had hoped for better news. Genna went straight to the point in her message, and she didn’t need to explain herself, but the news of the surrender froze Sansa’s blood into her veins. She really was no longer used to the climate of the North, a child of summer. Winter wasn’t for her.

“Thank you, Wolkan. You may dispose.”

The maester bowed and left Sansa alone with Genna’s message. Casterly Rock wouldn’t fight Daenerys Targaryen. King’s Landing had fallen. Cersei was dead. Ser Jaime was a prisoner of House Targaryen just like he used to be a prisoner of House Stark. The Lannisters of Casterly Rock did what Tyrion instructed them to do. They surrendered to Daenerys. The Westerlands were out of the war. When Genna learned of the fall of the capital she wrote immediately to Daenerys and told her that Casterly Rock would bend the knee to her rule.

Sansa didn’t see how they could resist. There was nothing left between them and Daenerys. Her uncle Edmure wouldn’t stand a chance with the few troops he had at Riverrun. Either he would surrender, or he would face the same fate as Harren the Black. Sansa shivered at the idea of her mother’s home meeting the same fate than Harrenhal. They had no news from Ser Daven. The missive they received from King’s Landing that announced Daenerys’s victory said that she defeated a Lannister army during the battle. Tyrion’s cousin was most probably lying dead in the fields of the capital, or rotting in a cell.
Sansa thought about her brother-in-law and her sister-in-law. She had no regrets about Cersei’s passing. She had it coming. This woman got what she deserved. However, she couldn’t help but feel sad for Tyrion’s brother. She knew now that he pushed Bran from the broken tower years ago. Her brother became a cripple because of him, but at the same time, he helped her to save Tyrion when Cersei accused him of murdering Lord Tywin. She also thought about the things Brienne told her about Ser Jaime, about the reasons why he killed the Mad King. Maybe he wasn’t totally an evil man, deep down. Tyrion loved his brother. Sansa was afraid for him because she knew how deeply affected Tyrion had to be right now, and how it would destroy him if his brother ever died.

Now, however, they had dead men assaulting them from the north and dragons coming from the south. They couldn’t stop their enemies on both sides. There were some lords from the Vale who defected recently. Their alliance was falling apart. Harrold Arryn had gone back to the Vale. Who was telling that he wouldn’t turn on them? He was brought to power by Littlefinger, and even if he was dead, Sansa was afraid that his machinations would continue to have their toll on them for quite a long time. The Westerlands on their knees, the Riverlands defenseless, the Vale about to turn on us, and the North fighting dead men. What can we do?

Nothing. There was nothing they could do. Tyrion once told her that, sometimes, nothing was the hardest thing to do. He had never been righter about it than now. They could only wait. Sansa thought about her little girl who slept in the adjacent room. House Lannister destroyed House Targaryen during Robert’s Rebellion. What fate was waiting for her and her daughter? This new queen could pretend that she would allow everyone who bent the knee before her to keep their titles and lands, and that no one would die, Sansa wasn’t reassured.

She threw the piece of paper on her desk and walked to the room next to hers. She turned the handle very carefully, slowly opened the door, and cautiously closed it behind her. She made a sign to the wetnurse to leave her alone with her daughter. She left as silently as a shadow.

Joanna had grown up. She gained weigh since her birth and was sleeping in a larger crib. She could now crawl on the floor, and sometimes she tried to hold on her feet by gripping a chair or anything that could serve as a support. Soon she would be able to walk. Sansa hadn’t been present when her child managed to stand for the first time, and she was afraid that she would miss her first steps as well. She was occupied all day by ruling Winterfell and the North. She wondered how her mother found time to bring them up herself, but then, her husband wasn’t far away. Her parents could see their children grow under their eyes. Sansa was beginning to worry that she and Tyrion wouldn’t have this chance. She feared that the next time Tyrion would see their daughter, she may already be a little lady of three or four.

But for now, Joanna was sleeping. Sansa gracially sat next to her daughter and watched her. She always marvelled at her beauty. When Sansa learned that she was promised to Joffrey, she immediately dreamed of giving him beautiful princes and princesses with blond hair. She was stupid, but it seemed the gods granted her wish to have children with blond hair. Joanna’s hair was shining, even in the darkness. Tyrion could regret that she didn’t look more like Sansa, she for herself had no regret about it. Her daughter was beautiful, an angel, and healthy. Wolkan said she would grow up into a beautiful young lady one day. Sansa would make sure that she did. She wouldn’t let someone harm her.

She stayed there for a long time, more than she should have, but not enough to compensate for all the time she didn’t spend with her daughter previously. She hoped that her next child would come into the world in better circumstances. And she hoped that her husband would be there to see him come and grow into the world.

She missed Tyrion. His letters reassured her that he was still alive and well, but a raven’s scroll was far too short for him to say anything long or deep. Yet he always ended his messages to her by the same words. I love you. She wished so much he was there, with her. How did his mother feel to be away from her husband almost all the time? She spent most of her time at Casterly Rock while Tywin Lannister was in King’s Landing. They said that Lord Tywin had loved his wife. Why did he keep her away from him then?

Sansa sighed heavily. She realized that she was crying. She wiped the tears from her face and kissed her little daughter. She slept so well, unlike her father. Sansa hoped that Tyrion didn’t drink too much at the Wall, and that he continued to sleep like he did with her. She cast one last loving gaze at Joanna and left.

The garrison of Winterfell was large and could barely be contained inside its walls. Men were drilling all day in the yards. Women were training too. The only place where you could find some peace now was the godswood, and even then, it wasn’t always possible. Sansa went to see her brother Bran there. His stays into the godswood were longer every day. Lord Reed’s daughter, Meera, was always accompanying him. She seemed to understand Bran in a way Sansa couldn’t.
She couldn’t recognize the boy she left when she rode south for the capital.

Sansa wished that Bran spent less time in the godswood. He said that his visions were better near the weirwood, but Sansa couldn’t understand how his powers were functioning. Bran himself couldn’t explain it. Since Bran spent so much time away, she had to assume almost all his duties as Lord of Winterfell. It was a chance that Tyrion made her participate to the decisions at Casterly Rock. She was prepared for ruling. Still, she wished that Bran could give her a hand. Her duties were stealing the rare times she could spend with her daughter. One day, Sansa would wake up, realize that her daughter was a married woman and that she never took time for her. Bran was Lord of Winterfell, but he didn’t act like one. However, when she asked him to dine with her alone, he didn’t protest. He stopped his discussion with Meera. He was saying that a dragon had three heads. They often spoke of subjects Sansa had difficulty to understand. Meera wheeled him to Sansa’s apartments and she left them alone.

“How are things going?” he asked.

“Not well,” she replied gloomily. “Half the castles don’t have enough stocks for winter, and the other half barely have enough. Petitioners are lining up every day, most of them ask for bread, but we have none to spare. Sometimes they ask for men to remove snow from the roads, or to rebuild a house or stables. That I can grant them. This gives the garrison something else to do than wait.” She looked up from the stew before her to stare at her brother. “You should be there, Bran. You’re the Lord of Winterfell. It’s up to you to receive your people and listen to their requests.”

Bran looked down. “I’m sorry, Sansa.”

She tried to be kinder in her choice of words, though her patience with Bran was beginning to run short. “I know you’ve been through a lot, Bran, but so do I. I know you were not supposed to be Lord of Winterfell, but Father was never meant to be lord either. And he did his duty all the same.
We must do just like him. We both must do the same.”

Her brother didn’t look at her. “Don’t you have the impression, sometimes, that you are powerless?
That there’s nothing you can do to change things?”

Yes, she did, but what else could they do? She couldn’t stand there, doing nothing, while her husband, her sister and her cousin were risking their lives, fighting an enemy more dangerous than everything they ever faced. “If we start thinking like that, Bran, then we’re truly lost. We must keep going.”
“I won’t make a difference as Lord of Winterfell, Sansa. Seeing petitioners, organizing feasts, look after the men and the castles, seeing our granaries are full, anyone can do that. But I’m the only one who can see what I see. You remember that horn blow, and what I saw at the same moment?”

Yes, of course she remembered. Everyone was still talking about it all around Winterfell. The sound had been deafening. Sansa was with Joanna when it happened. Her daughter had cried like she never did. They still didn’t know what was the source of this noise, but apparently they also heard it at Castle Cerwyn. The commander of the garrison at the Deadfort, who held the castle for Tyrion and Sansa, reported in his last message a similar event. How could the sound of a horn be heard in three different places, almost at the same time? Not long after, Bran said that he saw a part of the Wall fall, though he couldn’t tell where it happened. Sansa had immediately written to Tyrion and Jon at Castle Black, but after two weeks, they still had no answer. Sansa behaved as if nothing was amiss, but truth be told, she worried about all those she loved who were at the Wall. The lack of answer was troubling. She hoped that Bran’s vision was only a mistake. He said he couldn’t clearly see what happened, hence the reason why he couldn’t situate the breach that appeared in the Wall. Perhaps he only saw an avalanche on a mountain.

“I think that I’m more useful as I keep looking into the past, Sansa. This can truly help us,” he continued.

She took a sip of lemon water. “Bran, I’m not sure about what you can see or not, but what I know for sure is that you can’t spend all your days in the godswood. Our people expect you to rule. You’re the Lord of Winterfell.”

She said it in a way that left no place for discussion, but Bran didn’t seem to care. “I can’t be Lord of Winterfell, Sansa. I shouldn’t be.”

“No, Sansa, you don’t understand,” he cut her sharply. “I saw Maester Wolkan a few days ago. I wanted to talk with him about something. I wasn’t sure before, but now…”

He didn’t continue. “What? What did Wolkan tell you?”

“Maester Luwin… he wasn’t sure back then. I was only a boy, and he thought it might only be temporary, but…” Again, he stopped in the middle of what he wanted to say.

“What is it, Bran? Do you have a problem? Is there something wrong about you?” She was beginning to be worried about her brother.

“Yes.” He looked at her. “Sansa, you know… You had a daughter, so you know what happens when… you try to make a child?”

“Of course, I do,” she said, scandalized. She knew very well how to do it. She was married with Tyrion Lannister, after all.

“Well, I can’t.”

She frowned. “What do you mean? You can’t?” She shook his head. “That’s stupid, Bran. You only lost your legs. That doesn’t mean…”

“When I fell, a part of my spine was crushed. And… there was something inside… it controls… I tried anything to make it work, but there’s no reaction. So I asked Wolkan, and he says it’s gone. For good.”
Sansa stared at him. “Bran, are you telling me that you can’t ejaculate?”

In other circumstances, Sansa would have laughed at Bran’s face. He would never have heard her use that word before, but she was no longer the little girl from Winterfell who wanted to play the perfect lady. She was a married woman now, a mother, the lady of a huge castle and a great kingdom, and the wife of Tyrion Lannister. However, Sansa didn’t laugh. Bran couldn’t mean what she suspected.

Bran seemed to recover after a time, and he shook his head. “I can’t. If I was to marry, I couldn’t… perform. And if I can’t perform, I can’t have children.”

Sansa’s suspicions were true. She wished she had been wrong, but Bran just confirmed them. “How long have you known?”

“Three days. I had suspicions before, I started to think that something was wrong about two weeks before, but Wolkan confirmed it to me three days ago.”

Sansa shook her head in disbelief. “That can’t be. You would have noticed it before, Bran. That can’t be true. Wolkan must have made a mistake.”

“This is no mistake, Sansa. I… I came to realize it weeks ago when… Meera and I were together in my room.”

“Meera Reed?”

“Yes.” He looked down, ashamed. Sansa had considered that there could be something between Bran and Howland Reed’s daughter. They were always together, and Meera was a young woman, and Bran a young man.

“And… it didn’t work?” she asked.

“No. We tried everything, both of us, but nothing would happen. I needed time to ask Wolkan. He examined my spine, and told me I could never have children.”

Sansa looked at her brother. He had started to spend more time in the godswood about two weeks ago, and with Meera. Sansa hadn’t given much attention to the girl, but now she thought that she remembered her looking more sullen than usual.

“Bran, I’m so sorry.”

He was staring at her. “Sansa, I shouldn’t be Lord of Winterfell. I can’t be. I cannot lead men into battle, I cannot father a child, I can’t move around the castle without someone else’s help. I’m a cripple.”

“You’re still our father’s last living son.”

“For how long? When I’m dead, Winterfell will go to you and your children. You’re already ruling the North and managing Winterfell. I think it would be better if I stepped aside now and acknowledged you as Lady of Winterfell.”

“Bran, you can’t do that!”

“Why not? I know you rule well. I saw you. You already have a daughter, and Winterfell will go to you in the end, so why not let you have it now?”
“Tyrion and I already have Casterly Rock, and the Dreadfort. We have no need of Winterfell.”

“Give the Dreadfort to someone you trust, then. You’re already Lady of Winterfell in fact if not in name. It will only be a confirmation. That won’t be a great change for anybody.”

“I can’t have Winterfell, Bran.”

“Of course, you can. You are a Stark.”

“No, I’m not.” He looked at her strangely, as if he never saw her before. Sansa stood up and began to pace. “Bran, I am the Lady of Casterly Rock. My father-in-law murdered Robb and his wife, and our mother. My sister-in-law and my nephew killed our father. When people in the North look at me, they don’t see the daughter of Eddard Stark. They see a Lannister. They see Sansa Lannister, not Sansa Stark. They look at a woman who spent the last years in the south, who hasn’t been in the North for an eternity, who married into the very family who slaughtered the Starks. At best, they see in me a little girl who was forced outside of her family. At worst, they see me like Tyrion’s whore. Half the North preferred the Boltons to me, and the other half was ready to betray me during the Battle of Winterfell. My daughter looks more like Cersei than me. The Northerners and the men of the Riverlands accept that I rule for now, because we have an army of the dead closing on us, and because there are Lannister troops who obey me, but also because I’m ruling in your name, Bran. Because you allowed me to rule in your stead. The moment you step aside and declare me Lady of Winterfell, it’s over. They will never accept me, or Tyrion. They will never accept Lannisters to rule the North. The North remembers. It’s not only words. It’s the truth. People in the North remember, and they will never forgive the Lannisters for everything they did during the war. And I am a Lannister. They will never accept me as their lady.”

She held the back of her seat tightly with her hands at the end of her speech. Bran seemed in shock before her reaction. Did he have any idea how difficult it was for her every day? Expecting the worse news for her, for Tyrion, for their daughter, for Jon, for Arya, for him? Living in uncertainty, and yet working every day to keep the castle running and prepared to face the rest of winter, while he remained hidden in the godswood, lost in visions he couldn’t explain himself.

“I can’t be Lord of Winterfell,” he only stated.

Sansa sighed. She had a great envy to shatter the chair she was gripping. “You have no choice.”

“I can’t, Sansa. I cannot be the three-eyed raven and the Lord of Winterfell at the same time.”

“Very well. Then don’t be the Lord of Winterfell. Keep watching those visions you have. I’ll keep this castle running in the meantime. Just tell no one about it. Officially, you’re still the Lord of Winterfell, and every decision I take is with your consent. Unless you want us to face an uprising, I suggest you do as I say.”

She moved to leave, but Bran spoke before. “Sansa.” She turned to look at him, and he had a sorry expression on his face. “I’m sorry.”

“I’m sorry, me too.” She was.

“Sansa, there’s something I must tell you. About your husband.”

Her heart began to pound quicker than before. “What? Did you see him?”

“No. I mean, yes, in several visions, but that’s not it. Sansa, I think you should be careful with him.”

She frowned. “What do you mean? Why should I be careful with Tyrion?”
“I know that he’s a good man, and that he loves you, but… We mustn’t forget who his father was, and what he did. His father, what he did, was so… horrible. We mustn’t forget that he’s the son of this man. You don’t know what he could be capable of.”

Sansa looked at her brother as if she saw him for the first time, just like he did a few moments ago. How could he say something like that? “Bran, we’re not talking about Cersei and Jaime. They pushed you from the top of a tower to protect their secret. Tyrion is different. His brother and his sister tried to kill you, but he’s not at all like them. He’s the one who gave you a saddle so you could ride again. He’s a good man.”

“I know. I don’t forget that. I’m just telling you to be careful around him. I don’t want you to get hurt.”

“Tyrion would never hurt me.”

“You don’t know that for sure, Sansa. You don’t know him as well as you think.”

“You’re wrong about that. I know Tyrion better than anyone. And I know he would never hurt me, or let someone hurt me.” She stopped for a moment before she added something else. “Unlike you.”

“What do you mean?”

“When I was in King’s Landing, you didn’t try to save me. All that Robb wanted was to kill Joffrey and to carve his own kingdom in the North and the Riverlands. Our mother helped him and supported him. You and Rickon remained hidden here at Winterfell, Arya disguised as a boy in the Riverlands, and Jon hid at the Wall. You never helped me. I was your sister, and you abandoned me to Joffrey. None of you was there to protect me when he had me beaten in public. Tyrion was the only one to stand up for me at this moment, and he didn’t do it because I was his family. He did it because it was unfair, because no one deserves to go through everything I went through. Robb was covering himself with glory in the Westerlands, saying he fought for justice, while I suffered for every man he killed, every farm he burned, every village he sacked. And he did nothing to save me. He was given chances to save me, and he didn’t take them. Instead, he fought for his own kingdom, and when he heard that I was married, he gave up on me for good, considered me as dead. You all gave up on me, and you all judged my husband without knowing who he truly was. You didn’t even try to see beyond the fact that he was a Lannister. So don’t come and tell me that I don’t know who Tyrion is. I know who he is, and I know that he was there to protect me when my family abandoned me and left me for dead.”

And on that, she stormed out of her own apartments.

Several minutes later, she was sitting on the cold floor of the broken tower. She had a heavy cloak around her shoulders to keep her warm, yet she felt the coldness of the walls against her. She shouldn’t have snapped at Bran. He just discovered that he could never have children. She was unfair with him, and she knew that. Bran was only a boy when she was a prisoner. He could barely understand what was going on, let alone do anything to help her, even less after Theon took Winterfell. Truth be told, Sansa was only angry after her mother and after Robb. After her mother for arresting Tyrion on Littlefinger’s accusations, after Robb for privileging a war over the lives of his very family, and after both of them for considering her dead after they learned that she was wed to Tyrion. But she couldn’t blame Bran or Rickon for that, or Arya. She was exhausted, and she had decided to release all the tension she accumulated on her little brother. She would apologize to him, and she would assure him that he had no reason to fear Tyrion. He would never do anything to her. He wasn’t his father.

“My lady.” Maester Wolkan was in the embrasure of the door. He had a raven scroll in his hand. The Sansa stood up. She felt some pain in her legs. She must have remained on the floor longer than she thought. She realized more than ever of how cold she felt. She took the parchment the maester offered her and put it in her pocket.

“You should read it now, my lady,” he said.

“I’ll read it when I’m inside.” She spoke a little too harshly, but she was cold, and angry at herself for getting angry with Bran.

She walked past Wolkan and left the broken tower, returning to her apartments. Bran was no longer there. He probably returned to the godswood. She wished he was still there, so she could apologize to him now. She thought about going to see him right away, but she needed to warm herself first. She approached the fireplace and placed her hands over it. The warmth of the fire felt good on her palms. When she felt warm enough, she took the message from Queensgate. She remembered the castle was next to Castle Black, west to it.

She noticed immediately that something was wrong. The message was bearing the seal of Casterly Rock. It was Tyrion’s seal. Queensgate was held by the Knights of the Vale, not by the Lannisters. Perhaps he was only inspecting the castle and sent a raven to her while stopping there, but she wasn’t sure about it. All his other ravens had come from Castle Black.

Sansa opened the message and read the fine writing of her husband. What little warmth the fire brought to her disappeared instantaneously. The Wall was breached. She had to prepare the North for an invasion, not from the south, but from the north.

Chapter End Notes

Sansa’s outburst may sound harsh on Bran, but we must remember that Bran is not very clear on what being the Three-Eyed Raven is. Add to this that Sansa must rule Winterfell, when normally it should Bran’s duty and he doesn’t assume it, that Sansa is worried sick about her husband, and afraid about the well-being of her daughter as well with White Walkers threatening the North, and finally that Sansa has come to see herself more as a Lannister than a Stark through this story, and we can get a pretty good idea of why Sansa is acting this way with Bran.

Next chapter : Jon
Reminder: At chapter 164, Arya VI, a breach appeared in the Wall when a part of it fell at Castle Black. A short battle followed between the garrison led by Jon and the wights. Jon Snow’s troops were being defeated and retreating when a great explosion set fire to a large part of Castle Black and its inner yards.

The aftermath of the Fall of the Wall. We get an explanation on some of the events in Arya’s last chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

“Do you know how many people died because of you?” Jon asked.

“Fewer than if our enemies had managed to get through the Wall. If it wasn’t for my little trick, the North would be overwhelmed with dead men and demons with blue eyes, including those very men who died.”

Tyrion Lannister was holding his gaze without flinching. He showed no doubt about what he did or said.

“Two thousand.” Jon said the number very slowly. “This is the number of men who died because of the trap you set.”

“Most of them were buried under the snows. They were already dead, or they would have died anyway. From the cold, from lack of air, or from the White Walkers, and they would have joined the Night King’s army. They were condemned the very moment the breach appeared.”

“Aye, and without your trick, the breach wouldn’t be as large as it is now. You almost tripled it.”

“There would be no breach to defend if I hadn’t taken that call.”

“It wasn’t your call! Men died!”

“And more will die if we’re not ready to do what’s necessary, Jon Snow. You know it very well. You sent five men to their death during the battle against Mance Rayder. You sent them in the tunnels, knowing they wouldn’t come back.”

“That was different. They knew they wouldn’t come back. They were warned about it. They made a choice.”

“Really? Would you say you gave a choice to Grenn when you sent him into this tunnel? What would you have done if he disobeyed at this moment?”

Jon sighed angrily. “Grenn was a brother of the Night’s Watch, just like me. We knew what we had to do. We knew where our duties lied. We both knew that people had to sacrifice themselves to protect the Wall.”
“That was necessary then, just like what I did.”

“No more than your friends who died fighting the wildlings. How many people do you know who actually want to be here? How many of your former sworn brothers actually wanted to join the Night’s Watch?”

“They chose to join the Watch,” Jon replied weakly.

“They chose? You call that a choice? Your friend, Grenn, abandoned at the age of three by his own father? Pyp, being given the choice between losing a hand or going to the Wall, all that because he stole cheese? And this friend you told me about, Samwell Tarly? Would you say that being left to die or joining the Night’s Watch is a choice? Would you say that his father gave him a choice? Do you think that Lady Stark would have given you a choice eventually?” Jon realized, not without consternation, that Tyrion was looking at him like the boy he used to be when he arrived at the Wall. “People don’t get to choose if they go to the Wall or not. They are forced to go there. We hide it with oaths to make it look better, but these oaths are being forced on them, because if they don’t take them, then they die. It’s an oath taken with a sworn on your neck. This is no true oath. Only a few people like you and your uncle Benjen truly chose to go to the Wall. I may have sentenced two thousand people to die, it’s true, but you did the same with your friends while you defended the Wall. And you did it to fight wildlings who only tried to get south to escape the dead. I would say that these two thousand men who died in the fire had a death with more meaning than your sworn brothers who were killed in battles against living beings when they should have been fighting the dead.”

Jon sighed and walked away a little before he turned to stare at the small lord again. “You hid wildfire under the Wall. You should have told me about this.”

“I wasn’t sure you would accept, and your reaction shows me that I was right. You wouldn’t have approved.”

“Of course, I wouldn’t have approved! You hid… You blew up that substance in tunnels under the Wall and under our feet. Hundreds of men were sure to die. When your men started the fire, I was still fighting near the Wall. It wasn’t only my men who were with me. It was also your own men. And Arya was there too. You started the explosion knowing that we were there, that we would die.”

Tyrion looked down. “I knew you could die. I was hoping you would retreat before the explosion. Bronn had brought wildfire from King’s Landing on my order as soon as we left Casterly Rock. Only I, him and very few people who carried the jars knew about it. He and a few of his men lit a rope connected to a barrel of wildfire. The barrel was linked to the other barrels through similar ropes. There were a few minutes between the moment the rope was set afire and the moment it would reach the first barrel, and then I knew the massive explosion would take place. All the dead who were close would be burned and gone instantly. I knew you wouldn’t hold long enough against the dead and that you would order the retreat as soon as you saw this was a lost battle.”

“You knew, or you hoped?” Jon asked.

“I hoped that I knew. And it seems I was right. You and Arya got out of there safe. You’re both still alive and got out of there with only a few scorches.”

“What if it hadn’t been the case? What if we had fought longer? We would be dead by now.”

“I’m glad it didn’t happen.” Perhaps his small friend was trying to look like he was glad that Jon survived, and probably he felt that way, but Jon couldn’t forgive him all the same.

“You should have told me,” he said in a low voice.

“You said that you wouldn’t have approved.”

“No, I wouldn’t have.”

“Then I did the right choice. Without my trick with the wildfire, the dead would be swarming through all the North as we speak.”

“The breach would also not be as large as it is now if it wasn’t for your trick.”

“We would have no breach to defend without my trick.” Tyrion sighed. They were repeating the same arguments. He looked directly at Jon. “It was a measure to be used only in last resort, if the White Walkers were to get through the Wall and there was no other way to stop them, or slow them down a little. You think I loved to do it? You think I liked to give the order to Bronn, knowing that hundreds of people would die? I knew the destructive power of wildfire. I used it against Stannis at the Battle of Blackwater. The moment the fire destroyed his fleet, when I saw the green flames on the bay, the green mushroom rising over the bay, when I heard the men screaming as they burned alive, do you think I was proud of myself? I don’t enjoy killing people by the thousands or see them burn. I’m not like my father, no more than you are like your grandfather. But if I hadn’t used the wildfire at the Blackwater, Stannis would have sacked a city of a million people, and if I hadn’t used it last week, the dead would be killing everyone in the North as we speak. I had a choice to make, and I made it. I decided that the lives of two thousand men had less value than the lives of the millions of other people living in Westeros.”

A long silence settled between the two. Jon could feel that none of them were proud, one of what he did, the other one of what he didn’t dare to admit, but that he knew was true. So instead of continuing on this subject, he turned to another one, a matter of immediate concern.

“Do you think we can hold our position at Castle Black?”

“With some luck, yes,” he replied.

“When has luck ever been on our side?”

He didn’t reply. They both knew that Tyrion’s trick with wildfire bought them time. The fires that ravaged the entrance to the Wall destroyed a great part of the wights that attacked Castle Black when the breach took form, and the others flew away. They were certainly afraid of fire. Jon had killed the White Walker leading them, and there was nothing indicating that there had been another one nearby. Still, wildfire wouldn’t save them forever. The dead would come back.

They reinforced the breach, positioned strong contingents of men on both sides on the top of the Wall, with catapults, trebuchets, scorpions, and of course barrels of oil and flaming arrows. They had erected an improvised barricade in the breach itself and placed a strong body of men with traps before the barricade to protect the most vulnerable point on the Wall. They did their best, but Jon had the clear impression that it wouldn’t be enough. They spent so much time and energy on organizing the new defenses and warning the other castles along the Wall that they only had time to discuss about Tyrion’s doings a week after the Wall fell.

“I’m sending you back to Winterfell,” Jon finally declared.

Tyrion frowned. “I beg your pardon.”
“You heard me. I’m sending you back to Winterfell.”

“Is that a way to punish me for my actions?”

“You organized the defenses of the North for the case the White Walkers would get past the Wall. You know them better than anyone. I’m more familiar with the defenses of the Wall. If the dead ever get south, you’ll have to stop them.”

“What about you?”

“I’m staying here. I’ll lead the defenses of Castle Black. Ser Davos is back, so it should help.”

Tyrion Lannister leaned over the table as much as he could, considering his height. “You do realize that if you die here, Jon Snow, our alliance might shatter. Lords from four kingdoms acknowledged you as their king. If the dead get through Castle Black and that you die, our hopes to defend the North will be quite reduced.”

“I cannot ride away. How can I expect my men to fight for me if I’m not ready to fight for them? Besides, we both know I will not remain king for long. Let Daenerys arrives in time to save the North.”

“And let’s hope she is merciful with us,” his friend added darkly. His shoulders sank. “I’ll leave most of my men with you. I’ll only bring back a hundred with me to Winterfell. You’ll need them more than I will… for now.”

Jon nodded. “Make sure that nothing happens to Sansa and Bran.”

“You have my word. What about your other sister, Arya?”

Jon sighed. “I already tried to talk her into returning to Winterfell, and she refused.”

Tyron smiled. “She makes me think of Cersei, sometimes. She’s stubborn, and nothing can stop her. But to the opposite of Cersei, she loves all her brothers.” He took a more serious expression. “When do you want me to leave, your Grace?”

“Before the day is over. I want you back at Winterfell as soon as possible.” Jon also wanted him to leave.

“As you wish, your Grace.”

“Tyrion, before you leave, I must ask you a question, and this time I want the truth. Is there any wildfire left at Castle Black, or anywhere else along the Wall?”

The son of Tywin Lannister looked straight at him once more. “There’s nothing left. All that Bronn brought from King’s Landing was under Castle Black. It all burned when we activated the trap. It’s all gone.”

Jon believed him. “Why did you bring wildfire in the first place? Did you really believe you would fight dead men when you left Casterly Rock?”

Tyrion shrugged. “I thought that it could be useful against Ramsay. Finally, we didn’t have to use it against him. I don’t regret bringing it with me. I regret that men died because of it, but I don’t regret using it.”

They stared at each other for some time, then Jon ordered him to leave, and the Lord of Casterly Rock did as he was told. He left two hours later with a hundred men, like he said, among which there was Ser Bronn of Blackwater, the man who prepared the trap of wildfire and activated it. His squire Podrick, who sometimes reminded Jon of Sam, was riding next to him as well. Lannister men were still garrisoned at Castle Black, and they formed the bulk of their forces now, but there was no one with the Lannister name at Castle Black anymore.

Jon went to see Ser Davos in the afternoon. He had come back a few days ago with reinforcements from several castles east to Castle Black. They had five thousand men to defend the breach now. They had to take many among the garrisons of the nearby castles to replace those who died when the Wall was breached, but many others came from the Lannister camps outside Castle Black, that weren’t touched by the explosion. About two hundred of the victims were on the Wall and fell to their deaths when the horn was blown. Asher Forrester was among them. It had been difficult to Jon to write the letter announcing his death to his family. He sent Gared Tuttle to Queensgate with the message so they could sent it to Ironrath. He had to explain to a boy who wasn’t even ten-years-old that he was Lord of Ironrath. Were all men in northern families condemned to die? However, these victims were nothing compared to those who were buried under the snow or roasted alive by the wildfire. Jon could only hope they could hold their positions, and that no other breach would be created by some mysterious sound. He still couldn’t understand how it was possible that it was heard everywhere along the Wall.

Ser Davos was standing before the barricade. They were working on building towers for archers now. Strangely, the White Walkers didn’t attack since the day the breach appeared. Jon didn’t understand their behaviour. They only had to send their strongest forces, and his men would be overwhelmed in no time. They couldn’t hold the breach. It was about seventy yards, and the fifty feet of unstable rubble on which their new improvised defenses were built wouldn’t be enough to stop the White Walkers or the wights from climbing it. The rubble had a slow curve that any man could climb. The wights would have no difficulty to climb it. They tried to make the curve steeper, to no avail. All they managed by burning wood on the curve was to cause a sinking of the pile of rubble. It ruined their first efforts to build new defenses. They only fortified the fifty feet tall pile since then, trying to make it impenetrable, without much success.

“How are the works advancing?” Jon asked him.

“Slowly. I hoped that they would go better than this, but truth be told I didn’t expect my hopes to come true.” The knight looked back at him. “I heard that Lord Tyrion left.”

“Aye. A part of me is relieved. The other part wonders if I took the right decision.”

Ser Davos pursed his lips. “Although his goals may have been noble, the means to achieve them were unacceptable. You can’t burn thousands of people alive for the sake of saving the North. No more than you can justify burning a child if it can save ten thousand men.”

Jon remembered only too well Melisandre’s exile. Tyrion had advised him to not send her away because they could have need of her. Jon knew that Melisandre may have been helpful against the army of the dead, but he couldn’t allow someone who burned a child alive to go unpunished, no more than he could approve Tyrion’s actions. He could understand them and the reasons that led his friend to act this way, but he couldn’t agree with him. Everything he believed in, everything the man he called “Father” taught him, were against what Melisandre and Tyrion did. Though with Tyrion, you could always argue that these were soldiers who died. His brother had sent two thousand men to their death as well during the last war. Two thousand Northerners were slaughtered at the Battle of the Green Fork, sent as arrow fodder to serve as a distraction for Robb’s real move that consisted to free Riverrun. Robb knew that these men wouldn’t come back alive, that they had no chance against the army of Tywin Lannister. And Robb had done it fighting other men. Tyrion had done it fighting the dead. Placed in perspective, Tyrion’s actions were less condemnable than his brother’s. However, there was still one thing that Jon didn’t like about it.

Tyrion didn’t tell him about his plan. He decided that people would burn alive to slow down or stop the White Walkers without talking to him. How could Jon trust him after that? He couldn’t keep Tyrion close anymore. He couldn’t allow him to stay as if nothing happened. But he couldn’t get rid of Tyrion either. He didn’t want to execute him, and he couldn’t. He knew very well what Sansa would think if he executed her husband, and anyway, if Jon had had to pass the sentence, he didn’t think he could bring down the sword on Tyrion’s neck like he did with Janos Slynt. He wouldn’t be able to look into his eyes and say without doubt that Tyrion Lannister was guilty. Furthermore, they needed the Lannisters to fight the dead, and killing Tyrion would destroy their alliance for good. Tyrion supported him, and although he didn’t tell Jon everything, Jon knew for a certainty that Tyrion was loyal to him. The same couldn’t be said about the Knights of the Vale, especially after some of them abandoned their positions on the Wall, or some other lords from the Riverlands. The only option was to send Tyrion somewhere else, somewhere he would be useful, but far away from Jon, to make him understand that there were consequences to disobeying the king.

“I was there at the Battle of Blackwater,” Davos continued. “I saw what wildfire could do. And when I came back to Dragonstone, all that Melisandre could tell me was that death by fire is the purest death. And Stannis was listening. I’m glad you’re not listening to her, or to the Imp.”

Jon didn’t reply. Although Tyrion’s actions a week ago and Melisandre’s actions while Stannis marched on Winterfell had similarities, they were also very different. The little man was no fanatic.

“Lord Tyrion only did what he believed to be necessary to protect the Seven Kingdoms. Just like Stannis did.”

Davos grumbled an incomprehensible answer. He looked around him at the buildings in ruined. They had restored Castle Black only to see it in ruins again, buried under the snows or burned by the flames. “Most of our men must sleep in tents now. And those on the Wall must walk from Queensgate or Oakenshield, and carry material for battle all the way from there. The winch cage and the stairs were destroyed when that horn was blown.”

“You’re sure it was a horn?”

“I don’t see what else it could be. I don’t know where it came from, but whoever blew it didn’t like us. I wonder how I could hear it at Deep Lake.”

“All the other castles that contacted us said they heard the horn as well. No one knows where it came from.”

“I’m tired of magic. Smuggling was simpler, easier. We knew what to expect, even if we didn’t know when. Now we don’t even know what the Night King has in store for us.”

“Nothing worse than what we’ve already seen, I hope.”

“Yes, let’s hope.” Davos’s voice showed anything but conviction. He looked at the courtyard. “The Imp made holes and trenches everywhere with his explosion. If he hoped this could stop the White Walkers, it also makes the job of fighting them much more difficult.”

It was true. The ground inside Castle Black was a real sieve. They tried to fill the holes in the ground the best they could with snow and rock, but the men had to be careful of where they put their feet. Several of them had already been injured when they fell into a rift. They also lost granaries under the Wall in the explosion, and since those of Castle Black had more stocks than all the other castles, Jon didn’t see how they could get through winter now.

“I think the trap was mostly meant to slow down the dead, not to stop them,” Jon said.

“Then it worked better than he thought. His trick only slowed Stannis down at King’s Landing. But Stannis is more stubborn than the Night King, that I can bet on it.”

For the first time today, Jon laughed, very shortly, and it was a short chuckle, but he laughed. Ser Davos did the same. “Do you miss serving Stannis?”

The knight sighed. “I almost gave my life for him, and it got me nothing. I lost my son, Shireen, and I saw thousands of good men die for nothing. Stannis was a good man, but he took the wrong decisions, and he listened to the wrong people.”

“I hope I won’t make the same mistakes.”

“So far, you’re doing quite well, Jon Snow. Most of the men here know it, even the Lannisters.”

Yes, so far, they had succeeded in repelling the enemy, but for how long? How long would the Night King wait before he sent the full force of his army against them? They were vulnerable. The Wall had fallen at Castle Black, and Jon knew for a certainty that the Night King still had tens of thousand people in his army. People who didn’t need to eat, or to rest. People who were never tired, who obeyed without question, who didn’t need encouragements or threats to do what they were told. One great army, blindly following one leader. This was something they couldn’t copy. No matter who led the fight against the dead, there would be dissensions, opposition, questions, hesitations, reserves, and even betrayals. Jon had been betrayed once, and he didn’t have any illusion left. People had betrayed him in the past, and they could betray him again. He didn’t think often about it, for he had little time to think about it. All his mind was focused on protecting the Wall, and nothing else. He didn’t spare much time thinking of how to maintain his position as king. Even when he thought about it, it was to find how this could help in organizing better defenses for the Wall.

Jon knew that he didn’t have what was needed to defend the Wall. There was only one person who had an army powerful enough to face the dead, and who had the weapons that could destroy them massively. And this person was somewhere in the south, playing at a game like the other lords did before, like children. Jon hoped and feared that his aunt would arrive in the North and quickly, for when she would see the true enemy, she would have no choice but to face it, and destroy it. The Wall was breached. Jon couldn’t defeat the dead. But Daenerys Targaryen could defeat them.

Next chapter : Kinvara
In this chapter, we get to see someone we haven't seen for a while, and Daenerys discovers something horrible. The dragons are closing on the North.

The older brother patted the shoulder of the younger one. They were sitting on logs near a campfire, with a cup of ale in hand. Although they were very different, you could see the strong bond between them, the one that united a small boy to his big brother. A girl had brothers before. One of them had a beard like the elder there, though he wasn’t as built. The brother of the girl was more similar to the young one, who was smaller and slimmer. Even weeks after he joined Daenerys Targaryen’s army, although he was washed and shaved, Gerold Hightower looked as miserable as when she saw him for the first time.

He arrived with two hundred men who survived his adventures in the North. He had left Oldtown with one thousand to take back the family seat of his wife, a northern lady from a noble house, the niece of Malcolm Branfield. He managed to take the castle, but left the North after he heard that his family swore allegiance to Daenerys Targaryen. From what they heard, he lost more men on his trip to return south than during the battles and during his journey to the North combined.

Now he sat before a fire with his brother, Garlan, and looked with a hollow gaze at his cup.

“She hates ale. She got used to wine when she arrived in the Reach, she told me, but she didn’t drink much. Half the times I would propose some to her, she would refuse. She refused the last time we ate together.”

Kinvara could hear his voice very distinctly, and she could perceive the sadness in it. “You shouldn’t have left her,” his brother told him. Ser Gerold Hightower didn’t answer. He didn’t look like a proud knight in this very moment. He looked more like a broken man. Somehow, it reminded her of Ser Jaime Lannister when she visited him in his cell in King’s Landing.

“Our grandfather didn’t know that winter made it almost impossible to come back. Many of your men would have survived if you had stayed in the North.” The younger sibling stared at the eldest, but he said nothing. “That was a folly to travel all this way in the snow, Gerold. Do you realize how many died because of your decision?”

Gerold Hightower didn’t move for quite a long time, and then he looked at the ground, gripping the goblet he had in his hand. “I didn’t know what to do.”

His brother sighed. When he spoke, it was without any blame in his voice. “They should have sent me with you.”

“Garlan… I was sent there to take back Ironrath. And when we arrived, I found out that some of her family was alive.”

“Did your wife know about it?”

“She claims she thought them dead.”

“And you think she was lying?”

“No,” he replied very quickly.

“Well, you couldn’t expect her to wage war against her brother.”

“Do you think… do you think she could have used me, Garlan?”

Garlan Hightower looked at his little brother. “Do you think she did?” Gerold didn’t reply. “You know Mira better than I do, but I know one thing. She cared about you, and you cared about her. And I know you still care.”

“I do,” he confessed. His voice was down to a whisper.

“You’ll have a few things to talk about when you see her again.” Ser Gerold nodded. “In the meantime, I suggest you speak to her uncle. Malcolm Branfield deserves to know what happened to his family.”

They both drank. “Garlan, do you think she will be fine?”

“Even if the White Walkers are real, she’s not at the Wall. She should be safe. And the queen has no reason to kill her. Her uncle is her advisor, and Mira is your wife. She won’t kill a Hightower.”

“What do you believe Mira would think of me, if we killed some of her family, if they refused to surrender to Daenerys Targaryen?”

Garlan patted his brother’s shoulder. “I hope it won’t come to that. But no matter what happens, you have apologies to present to your wife, Gerold. You don’t want to lose her.”

Ser Garlan Hightower stood up and walked away. Kinvara stayed to watch his brother a little, then she walked away as well. She was in one of the three camps that were erected around the fortress. Dothrakis, soldiers from the Reach and the Stormlands were sharing the siege of the castle surrounded by water. Coexistence was difficult once more, and she was very conscious of the growing hostility from the Westerosi commanders towards her. They could hate her as much as they liked, she despised them as well. They fought like children for insignificant reasons and only followed the queen because they were afraid of her, or because they hoped to gain some advantage from her once the war would be over.

Kinvara tried to stay away from the soldiers. She knew that many of them had camp followers in their tents. A few days after they left King’s Landing, she had heard a woman scream while a man beat her. The two members of the Fiery Hand that accompanied her when she surprised the scene had taken care of the Tarly lieutenant swiftly and quickly. Dickon Tarly had protested, but when it was found out that the man was beating an innocent girl, he couldn’t say much, except that it should have been left to him to punish his own men. Kinvara had to promise on the queen’s insistence to refer the case to her if a similar situation was to happen again.

Each night, Kinvara lit a great fire to worship the Lord of Light. Followers from the three camps came to the ceremony. There were a few Westerosi among them, but most were Dothrakis. People from Westeros looked at her and the other Red Priests like foreign invaders, and the fact that most of her followers they saw were Dothrakis scared them as well. Didn’t they know that she came here to save them? Of course not. All they saw was the stranger. She had to admit that Melisandre’s actions while in the service of Stannis Baratheon didn’t help. Kinvara had clearly forbidden all the priests who followed her to cause any strife with the other religions of Westeros. She herself had gone into a sept while they stopped near a village. She had entered it alone, and the place was empty, so she could contemplate the statues in wood of the Father, the Mother, the Smith, the Maid, the Warrior, the Crone and the Stranger. The septon of the place didn’t take long to appear and to order her to leave, saying that only those who believed in the Seven were allowed. She went as far as to say prayers and words of the Faith to make him understand that she had no desire for quarrel and that she respected his faith. How could she not? She knew what it was to believe in a different god. She had not been a servant of the Lord of Light for all her life. He still ordered her to leave, threatening to call the villagers to kill her, treating her like a witch. Kinvara wished them good luck if they attempted to kill her. The time for her to die hadn’t come yet. She finally left, deciding it would be better to avoid any problem. Westeros would need time to accept the Lord of Light.

She arrived on the top of a hill. Daenerys Targaryen was there, and her three dragons as well. Kinvara joined her, but the daughter of Aerys Targaryen didn’t show any sign that she acknowledged her presence. Her dragons seemed restless, but they remained where they were, causing no problem. Daenerys could control them. The Lord of Light was with her.

Kinvara looked where the new queen was staring. Surrounded by the waters of two rivers, the triangular castle deserved his name. Riverrun was almost impregnable. Even Revan said that he saw no way to take the castle other than through a long siege… if someone didn’t have a dragon. Daenerys had sent a message to Edmure Tully, the Lord Paramount of the Riverlands, demanding the same thing she demanded from every noble man and woman in Westeros: to bend the knee and recognize her as the only true queen of this country.

Kinvara saw the black ruins of Harrenhal on their way to the Trident. It was a testimony of what happened to people who dared to defy fire made flesh. Kinvara knew there were innocent people living inside Riverrun, next to Lord Tully, his family and his knights. These servants didn’t deserve to die, and she hoped they wouldn’t. On their way through the Riverlands, two minor lords refused to bend the knee to Daenerys. Their keeps were stormed easily. Daenerys used her dragons with moderation, mostly scaring the defenders away from the battlements or causing minor damages to a part of the keep. It had been enough for her troops to take these castles without heavy losses. However, Kinvara knew that things would be different if Riverrun resisted. She relied on Revan for military advice, and most of the commanders agreed that an assault on Riverrun would cause thousands of deaths. The only way to take the castle by force without sacrificing too many of their own men would be to set the castle aflame. Riverrun would become a second Harrenhal. As much as Kinvara hated the castles for what they represented, Riverrun was more modest than many others she saw up to now, and she didn’t wish for the innocents inside to die. Fire was brought to Westeros to fight the dead, not the living.

“No sign of answer, your Grace?” Kinvara asked to the queen.

“No. If they haven’t given me an answer before tonight, I’ll have to execute my threat.”

Kinvara thought she perceived in the queen’s words that she hoped the Tullys would surrender. People from the nobility who truly cared about their people were rare. Kinvara had met more than enough of these people to know it very well by now. The Lord of Light truly sent them a savior in the person of Daenerys Targaryen.

“You know, Kinvara, we have the Red Fork right under our eyes. Apparently, it goes into the Trident. The Trident is the place where my brother Rhaegar died.” The Battle of the Trident.
Everyone had heard about it. “Robert Baratheon slew my brother on that day. I never had the chance to know him. He was the first Targaryen to die in this war, and he wasn’t the last. The Baratheons, the Starks, the Tullys, the Lannisters, they did everything to destroy my family, to the last child.”

“And they failed.”

“Yes, they failed,” the queen agreed. “And now the Baratheons are gone, and if I wanted, I could make sure that the three other families disappear as well.”

“Yes, you could. Will you?”

The Mother of Dragons kept looking at the castle. “Ser Barristan told me back in Meereen who my father truly was. I know the Mad King earned his name. I know he burned people with wildfire and laughed as they died screaming.” She turned her gaze to Kinvara. “Do you think that Jaime Lannister told the truth, when he said that my father wanted to burn King’s Landing?”

Kinvara answered honestly. “I think he told the truth.” The queen looked again at the seat of the Tullys. “But you’re not your father, your Grace. We are not defined by our parents.”

There had been a time when she thought so, but the Lord of Light showed her the truth. Today, she still felt the shame of her former beliefs, of what she assumed to be the truth for a very long time. There was only one other thing she regretted more. The cries of a baby resounded in her mind and in her memory.

“No, I’m not my father. Ser Barristan told me the same. He should be here, by my side. And so Ser Jorah should.” They remained silent for a moment, and then Daenerys Targaryen asked her a question. “Do you think I made the right choice, concerning Trystane Martell?”

The prince of Dorne was left in King’s Landing to rule the city while Daenerys Stormborn fought the great war. “He is loyal to you. He did his best in Meereen, and I’m quite sure he will do the same in King’s Landing. The Martells showed loyalty to you sooner than anyone else in Westeros. He should be able to rule the capital well enough in your absence.”

Kinvara dropped her head to express an apology. “I believe he will make a decent husband.”

“The Tyrells are not happy.”

“The Tyrells are never happy. And you have Lady Margaery. This should keep them in line.”

“He didn’t show much enthusiasm when I told him I accepted his father’s offer. I think he even seemed relieved when I told him the wedding wouldn’t take place immediately and we would wait for the end of the war.”

“And how do you feel about it, your Grace?”

The Lord’s Chosen One sighed. “I need to marry, to forge alliances that will last.” She didn’t display much enthusiasm either.

“He still loves his betrothed who was assassinated, Myrcella Baratheon,” Kinvara declared.

“Myrcella Lannister, you mean,” the queen corrected.

Kinvara shrugged. “Names don’t mean much.”
The queen looked about to tell her something, but her lips remained closed. She said no more. They stayed there, side by side, two women from very different worlds, and yet two women who weren’t so different. Two exiles. Two women without family. The girl she was before had a family, but Kinvara gave up on it when she entered the order of the Red Priests a long time ago. She forsook everything from her past. The Red Priests were called to focus on the present and the future, not to dwell on the past.

A Dothraki rider came to them. He spoke to the queen in his rough language, and Kinvara understood that a delegation with a white flag was approaching her camp. It was time to leave the hill and to receive the surrender of Riverrun. Another one of the Seven Kingdoms was about to acknowledge the Mother of Dragons as their queen.

It didn’t prove to be as easy as they thought, however. On one side stood Lord Edmure Tully with his advisors on horse. There were Lannisters among them. Facing them alongside Kinvara and Daenerys Stormborn were three Dothrakis commanders, Dickon Tarly, Malcolm Branfield, Revan, Garlan Hightower and two other lords respectively from the Stormlands and the Crownlands. There were no representatives of Dorne, whose forces were left behind to occupy King’s Landing and the fortresses of the Crownlands and the Stormlands.

“Edmure Tully,” the Breaker of Chains began, “I suppose you came here to bend the knee. Unless you want to meet a similar fate to two of your bannermen.”

The man who called himself Lord of Riverrun seemed uncertain. The dragons were flying not far away from them, and he often gazed worriedly in the skies to look at them.

“Theres something we want to know first,” he said. “We want proof that Casterly Rock yielded to you.”

Daenerys Targaryen looked at one of her assistants who brought a small piece of paper carried by a raven from the Rock to King’s Landing before they left the capital and gave it to Edmure Tully. The Lord of Riverrun read the words on it, then stared at one of the Lannister commanders.

“It seems quite authentic to me, Ser Daven,” he said, handling the small scroll to him. Ser Daven Lannister, cousin of the actual Lord Casterly Rock, nephew of his mother Joanna Lannister, looked at the scroll as well.

“It is signed by Ser Damion Lannister,” the knight replied. He looked at the queen. “Did you receive any word from Lord Tyrion? Did he approve this decision?”

“We had no word from Tyrion Lannister,” Daenerys Stormborn replied.

Ser Daven spoke to Lord Edmure. “My lord cousin is still fighting at the Wall, Lord Edmure. Damion’s decision doesn’t represent his opinion or his will.”

“Casterly Rock surrendered. It’s written right there in your hands. The Westerlands gave themselves up.” Edmure Tully pointed the piece of paper.

“The Lord of Casterly Rock didn’t surrender. A decision like this cannot be taken by a mere castellan.”

“Well, he took it.”

“That’s not his decision. Lord Tyrion didn’t acknowledge Daenerys Targaryen as his queen.” He stared at the queen. “Jon Snow is our king, not you. And we will not bend the knee. My orders are to accept an alliance with you if necessary, but I am not to declare you my queen.”
“These are your orders, not mine, Ser Daven,” Lord Edmure Tully said. He turned his attention to the queen. “Your Grace, I am willing to surrender and bend the knee before you, but there are a few guarantees I want in return.”

“The terms you were offered said that an unconditional surrender was necessary. You are in no place to negotiate,” Dickon Tarly opposed.

“First, none of the people in Riverrun are to be mistreated in any way,” Lord Edmure began.

“That wasn’t in my intentions. They have nothing to fear as long as they don’t plot against me.”

“Second, my uncle, Ser Brynden Tully, is not be harmed or killed when you go in the North.”

“Agreed. Something else?”

“My nephew Brandon Stark and my nieces, Arya and Sansa, are not be harmed either.”

Kinvara chose this moment to speak. “If I recall, Brandon Stark is the Lord of Winterfell, and Sansa Lannister is the Lady of Casterly Rock. They are sworn allies of Jon Snow.”

“If they accept to bend the knee, I won’t hurt them,” Daenerys said flatly.

“Lord Edmure, don’t do this,” Ser Daven warned. “She is a Targaryen. We cannot trust her.”

“Do you think you are more worthy of trust?” Revan asked. “You organized the slaughter of people during a wedding. You broke the most sacred laws of your country. You sacked the entire Riverlands during the previous wars, and thousands of innocent people, civilians, are dying of cold and starvation because of you. I wonder why the Tullys are fighting with you? House Tully wouldn’t rule the Riverlands if it wasn’t for Aegon, and the Targaryens never burned their fields like you did.”

“At least, we don’t burn people alive to offer sacrifices to our gods.”

Kinvara intervened. “I’m afraid you have a misconception of our faith, Ser Daven. There are two Red Priests right in front of you, and we disapprove of these sacrifices that are only practiced by a minority. A minority whose many members were exiled by me these last years.”

“Then perhaps you might explain why Stannis Baratheon burned people alive.”

“The woman who did this came from Asshai, not from the cities that the High Priestess represents,” Revan said.

“That makes no difference. A Red Priest is a Red Priest.”

“Then I suppose you consider that all septons are like the last High Septon you had recently, who forced people to walk naked in the streets to atone for their sins?” Kinvara asked.

“We’re not here to discuss about religion,” Dickon Tarly said. “Lord Edmure, will you bend the knee or not?”

“Don’t do it, my lord. Remember what happened to the first betrothed of your sister,” Daven Lannister said.

Kinvara decided it was time to put an end to this squabbling. “What if I told you that Lord Tyrion Lannister gave the order to Casterly Rock to surrender before Queen Daenerys?”

That caught the Lannister knight’s attention. “You’re lying.”

“I am not. Lady Genna Frey surrendered the castle on his specific orders.”

Ser Daven looked troubled all of a sudden. “And how could you know such a thing, if it was true?”

“The queen has an advisor with little birds everywhere.” She smiled sweetly. In fact, the visions that the Lord of Light granted her were more useful. “Your lord cousin decided to bend the knee because he knew he had no chance against Daenerys Stormborn.”

“You knew this? Is it true?” Lord Edmure asked Ser Daven. He obviously didn’t know about all this.

The knight tried to reason him. “Lord Edmure, she’s trying to turn you against us.”

“We all pledged ourselves to Jon Snow, and you betrayed him at the first opportunity!”

“We did no such thing. We are still fighting with him at the Wall, doing everything we can. We don’t run away before the battle, unlike some people do.”

“Well, I begin to understand why the Knights of the Vale turned on you at the Crossroads. I begin to think they were right. We cannot trust a Lannister.”

They watched the argument, as two allies were throwing accusations and insults at each other. The parley seemed to be between the Lannisters and the Tullys now. In the end, Edmure Tully turned to the Breaker of Chains.

“Your Grace, I accept your terms. Riverrun and the Riverlands are yours.”

Ser Daven Lannister was obviously unhappy as the head of House Tully bent the knee before his new queen. He lost many of his men at the Battle of the Crossroads, where an army from the Vale attacked the Lannisters by surprise and made a great carnage among their ranks. The knight had retreated to Riverrun, and with the Westerlands submitted to Daenerys and now the Riverlands, he had nowhere to go. The queen reported her attention to him once Edmure Tully was done swearing to serve the queen.

“What about you, Ser Daven? What do you decide?”

Ser Daven was furious, and you could hear it when he spoke. “I would be willing to accept an alliance with you to fight our common enemy, but nothing more. If my lord wants to bend the knee before you, then I will as well, but not before he does.”

“This is unacceptable. You must bend the knee, now. Or is your pride so important in your eyes that you can’t yield to save what men you have left?”

“This isn’t a question of pride. It’s a question of survival. The Wall has fallen.”

The silence that followed was so heavy that you would have heard flies if there were any. “I beg your pardon?” It was Revan who broke the spell. Kinvara couldn’t talk. The Wall has fallen.

“We received word from Queensgate, one of the castles there. There’s been... a great sound. Something like a horn. We heard it there, at Riverrun, but it seems it was heard at the Wall as well. A section fell at Castle Black. There is a large opening. Thousands of men died. We had no word from Castle Black ever since. They said they would reorganize their defenses to hold the enemies, but…”

He didn’t finish his sentence. Daenerys looked at Kinvara. She wished she had an answer to provide to the queen, but she had none. The Lord of Light warned her and many others that the great war was very close, but she had no idea that such a thing would happen. She never heard of a horn that could bring down the Wall. They heard a horn several days ago, but had no idea of where the sound came from.

“Revan, what does it mean?” Kinvara asked.

“The Horn of Winter is an ancient magic artifact that was built thousands of years ago. It was built not long after the Wall was built. Men who were allied with the Others wanted to use it to bring down the Wall when the time would be right. However, the Night’s Watch stole the horn and hid it before the servants of the Great Other could use it. The horn we heard must be this one. Someone must have found it and used it.”

The Wall was down. If the Wall was down…

A few hours later, on the insistence of both Kinvara and Revan, Daenerys Stormborn accepted to delay the submission of Ser Daven Lannister. He would still follow her and obey her orders, but without bending the knee. The queen decided to head north with the bulk of her forces to fight the servants of the Great Other. Edmure Tully would give them what troops he could spare. The Unsullied would be left in the Vale to deal with the lords there, who still resisted. Daenerys also gave the order to bring the shipment of dragonglass that arrived in Saltpans to the Neck as quickly as possible, so they could bring it with them in the North.

“Are you really sure that this horn caused the fall of the Wall?”

They were in the command tent of Daenerys Stormborn when she asked this question some time later. Only the people who had come from Meereen with her were present. Mostly, they consisted of Malcolm Branfield and the Red Priests who were present, Kinvara, Melisandre, Revan, Geralt, Triss and Cirilla. The Dothraki commanders were not present since they weren’t considered useful for this discussion.

“Without any doubt,” Revan replied. “I was hoping the Children of the Forest and the First Men had destroyed the Horn of Winter, but it seems they didn’t. Perhaps they found no way to destroy it, or perhaps it cannot be destroyed.”

“How could a simple horn bring down a wall of ice and rock of seven hundred feet tall?”

“The horn was made with ancient magic, just like the Wall. These are things we cannot totally understand today.”

“How could that horn appear out of nowhere? It disappeared thousands of years ago according to you, and it reappears now? That makes no sense.”

“Samwell Tarly.” Raven said that name. “The fat novice of the Citadel. When we met him, he said Euron Greyjoy stole a horn that he thought could awake a kraken. He said he found the horn at the Fist of the First Men, and that they were attacked by the Others and the dead. Euron must have thought wrongly that this horn was to awake a kraken, and he used it.”

“You think the Others might have attacked them for the horn?” the queen asked, referring to the battle that took place there between the Night’s Watch and the Others years ago.

“Possibly. They might have been trying to take it back.”

“What matters now is that the Wall has fallen,” Branfield said. “If the dead are leading assaults on it, Jon Snow might not hold them for long, and if the dead get through the Wall…”

“Jon Snow and his allies will not last long,” Melisandre said. “Without your help, your Grace, the North is doomed, and so will the other kingdoms as well.”

“I’m quite aware of that,” Daenerys Targaryen said. “We’re heading there now. Anyway, only the Vale remains to resist, and the Unsullied will take care of it. All the other men will follow us in the North. Dothraki, Reach, Stormlands, Crownlands, Riverlands, Westerlands, it doesn’t matter now. We bring them all with us. And I need the Fiery Hand as well.”

“They are at your disposal,” Kinvara declared. “I will also call back some priests from the other kingdoms to help us.”

“Very well. We leave tomorrow at dawn.”

They were dismissed on that note. Kinvara made a sign to Melisandre to follow her to her tent. They travelled through the camp. Officers from House Tully and House Lannister were now seen discussing with the commanders of the Unburnt. The common soldiers might be more hesitant to fraternize with their former enemies for the time being, so they wouldn’t see her many of them before the march tomorrow.

When they arrived at their destination, Kinvara faced Melisandre. “Did you have any vision announcing this?” she asked her straight away.

“No. Nothing that seemed to point to this event. The Lord didn’t warn us that the Wall would fall.” He didn’t warn them, indeed. No priest that Kinvara contacted in Westeros had any vision about this event.

“The ways of our Lord are difficult to penetrate. Even the wisest among us cannot claim to truly know what he wants us to do.”

“No.”

Kinvara looked at the woman standing before her. Melisandre had changed since she stopped at Volantis, and it seemed she changed for the best, but Kinvara wasn’t ready to trust her entirely yet. She had too much blood on her hands, and sullied the faith in the Lord of Light for too long. However, Melisandre proved that the Lord was talking to her and acting through her. She had a role to play in this war.

“The great war is here. We must be ready for everything, and to do everything to defeat the servants of evil,” Kinvara said to Melisandre. “But we must choose our methods carefully.”

Melisandre seemed to understand the meaning of her message. “I agree, High Priestess, but we mustn’t forget what is the most important.”

“And what is it?”

“We will need the three heads of the dragon. We will need ice and fire to fight alongside, and we will need something to bind them. Without the third head, everything is lost.”

Trystane VI

Chapter Notes

A character many people love comes back.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

TRYSTANE VI

He sat in the Iron Throne. Trystane never thought he would be sitting there one day. He always saw his future as the Prince of Dorne, but certainly not as the king, even a consort king. And yet here he was. Most people would have been thrilled by the perspective of ruling the Seven Kingdoms, but truth be told Trystane didn’t feel like it. His father taught him to not hope for more than what life granted him. The last time House Martell got close to the crown, his father lost a sister, a nephew, and a niece. Not to mention an uncle. Trystane was too young to remember anything of Ser Lewyn Martell, but his father always spoke fondly of his late uncle.

Dorne was once again close to the Iron Throne. Trystane was officially betrothed to the queen, Daenerys Targaryen. She came to visit him before she left King’s Landing, saying that after much consideration, and as a reward for his family’s service to her cause, she accepted the marriage proposal. She made him understand very clearly that he would be a consort, and that final decisions would always go to her. She also left him with several instructions to rule the city while she would be absent.

Trystane knew he should feel grateful, or honored in the least, but truth be told, he didn’t know what to feel about all this. The queen didn’t show much enthusiasm about this marriage either, and she didn’t display any hurry to come back soon when she told him they would marry as soon as all the Seven Kingdoms bent the knee. This was no marriage of love. Trystane knew it was the rule in the nobility, but after his betrothal with Myrcella, it was hard to go back to the idea of an arranged marriage.

Trystane would do his duty. His family was engaged with Daenerys’s cause since she arrived in Westeros, and they couldn’t turn on her. His aunt Elia Martell left for King’s Landing a long time ago, to marry a man she barely knew, the heir to the Iron Throne. Only her bones came back to Sunspear. Trystane hoped things would be different this time.

For now, he sat on the throne of House Targaryen and held court in the name of Queen Daenerys, the First of Her Name. Lord Varys and Lord Yronwood were sitting with him on the dais. The Master of Ships and the Master of Coin were absent, the former because he was on his way to the city, the second because he rode with his army to secure the Westerlands. He was supposed to join Daenerys afterwards on her march on Winterfell. Now that Riverrun had fallen, only the North and the Vale resisted. Several messages came lately from the Wall and from Winterfell, claiming that White Walkers breached the Wall and threatened all Westeros now. They were sent by men and women serving the Houses Lannister, Stark, Tully and Arryn. Varys said it was unusual for such houses who were rivals for so long to state the same thing, and to keep their armies in the North when Daenerys Targaryen was invading their lands. Were the Red Priests right after all?

A merchant stepped forward. “My prince, my lords, I am here in the name of the guild of merchants of King’s Landing. We wish to know when the works on the harbor will be over.”
It wasn’t the first time Trystane received the visit of someone representing this association. “I’m afraid I cannot give you a date for now. Our workers are doing their best,” he gave as an answer.

“But my prince, we need the docks. Trade has ended. We’re receiving almost nothing from the sea, and we can’t send anything. King’s Landing is losing his position as the main harbor in Westeros.”

“It is very regrettable, but the queen left very specific instructions before she left us. The priority is to build shelters for the people, and to rebuild the granaries where the food will be stocked for winter.”

“But trade is a great source of income for the Crown, my prince. Without trade, you will never have the necessary funds to rebuild the city. And while our guild is waiting for the rebuilding of the harbor, we keep paying taxes, with limited income to pay them.”

“I will give you a temporary dispensation, if taxes are a problem for you. I understand you must struggle with the actual situation, but everyone is struggling. People are starving and freezing in the streets, vulnerable to the cold and the criminals, and for now the priority of the Crown is to help the people. The docks will be rebuilt when they will be rebuilt.”

He would talk no more about. He made a gesture to one of the Dornish soldiers in the hall, and he accompanied the merchant outside. The next matter to be brought forward was that of a woman whose husband was executed. She asked the permission to get his bones in order to bury him. When Trystane asked her why her husband was executed, she reluctantly admitted that he was sentenced to death for murder. Trystane allowed her to leave with the bones.

Then there was a man with his daughter. He yelled, accusing Trystane that a Dornishman, a soldier, raped his daughter. Trystane listened to the girl telling her story. She said she couldn’t remember how the man looked like, that he attacked her by surprise. Trystane offered his apologies and said he would inquire to discover the culprit, though he doubted he could find him. The accusations against the men of Dorne were as common as rats in this city, and he was sure that about half the accusations of rape and murder, if not more, were false. The people of King’s Landing didn’t like Dornishmen.

Trystane listened to petitioners until late in the afternoon. It was an exhausting work, but it had to be done. His father told him to care about he well-being of his people. He was responsible for them. And Daenerys left the city in his care for the time she would be away. Perhaps this was a test to see if he was up to the task of ruling. She wasn’t very impressed by his time in Meereen.

As Trystane walked out of the Great Hall, he heard Varys’s soft footsteps following him. “It was a good day, overall, my prince. Though I fear the tensions between the people of the city and your countrymen are growing.”

“Truly? I didn’t notice,” he said in faked surprise.

“I’m only trying to help you, my prince.”

“And I thank you for that, but right now I don’t need you to tell me evidences.” He was tired of his day. “So unless you have some important news for me, or some suggestion that could help us rebuilding the city, reducing the accidents involving my men, or repaying our debts to the Iron Bank, then I suggest you go back into the shadows.”

“I’m afraid I have no miracle solution to our actual problems right now, but I do have some news. She is here.”

Trystane stopped in his movements. “When did she arrive?”

“While you were holding court. About two hours ago. I had everything settled for her in the Maidenvault.”

“Did anyone see her arriving?”

“No. I made sure she came here in secret. No one saw her.”

Trystane knew she would be there soon, but he wasn’t sure if it would be today. She could have arrived tomorrow or a few days later.

“Well, I’m going to see her,” he declared. Varys bowed. He and Trystane took different directions.

The Maidenvault was guarded by soldiers from Dorne, just like most of the Red Keep and the city. The Dornish forces remained in King’s Landing to maintain the order while the other allies of the queen helped her to take the remaining kingdoms. Dorne’s forces were there to ensure peace as much as to keep the queen’s conquests.

The Maidenvault was almost empty safe for the guards and a few servants. A large part of the Red Keep was deserted. Trystane approached his destination. He crossed the path of a handmaiden who carried a chamber pot. He told the guard standing before the door to announce him, and once it was done, he walked into the room. She was standing on the balcony, looking away as the light of the sun lowered. She wore a dress that made him think of those the women of the Reach use to wear, though it was slightly different, thicker. With winter that had arrived, he supposed this was no surprise. The air was cooler in King’s Landing than in Highgarden or Sunspear. He would have to change his clothes soon as well.

“Lady Margaery, I’m glad to see you.”

She turned her head slightly to look at him. “Prince Trystane.” She devoted her attention to the outside once again.

“I hope your journey was without trouble.”

“It was. The sea was quiet. It was uneventful.”

A long silence lingered between them. She kept looking away. Her voice wasn’t angry, but it wasn’t pleasant either.

“How do you feel?” he asked.

“Well, I lost three husbands, my brother is dead, and my son was taken away from me before I could see his face. You will forgive me if I’m not quite cheerful.”

“Oh course. There’s nothing to forgive.” Another moment passed before he spoke. “I just wanted to be sure you were all right. I would understand if you wanted to stay alone.”

“Yes, I do.”

“I’ll leave you then. Just so that you know, I’m going to the ruins of the Great Sept of Baelor tomorrow. I know that Tommen’s ashes are buried there. If you wish to accompany me…”

He waited for an answer. It came. “Yes. I’d like to.”

“I wish you a good night, my lady.”

Back in his chamber, Trystane reviewed the accounts of the Crown and looked at the various reports he received. Everything was going too slow. The city would never be ready for winter, even with the Tyrells who brought provisions like it was never seen before to the city. His new betrothed sent word that she was now walking on the North to fight the White Walkers while Grey Worm would take care of the Vale of Arryn. He went to bed with the impression he didn’t do much today, and needed quite some time to fall asleep.

The next day in the morning, he went to see Lady Margaery. She was ready to visit the sept, wrapping herself in warm clothes. She also wore a hood. No one outside the Red Keep was to know she was here. She arrived the day before on a ship that didn’t display any sign of her family’s sigil, and most of its crew ignored that she was onboard. He didn’t know how Varys brought her inside the Red Keep, but she didn’t go through the streets, so it had to be one of those secret passages under the city. There could be problems with the people if they learned that a former queen lived in the Red Keep, even if the closest Tyrell soldiers were weeks away. For now, only a few people would know about her presence in the capital.

They were brought to the Great Sept in a veiled litter to hide its occupants. Only ruins remained of what once was the greatest sept in Westeros. The new City Watch, mostly consisting of Dornishmen for the time being, stopped the people from wandering among the ruins. It had been decided that a new sept would be built to replace the former when the time would be appropriate.

They climbed the steps, avoiding the rubble. At a certain level, there were more debris and it was more difficult to not walk on them. For Trystane, it was easy. He followed this way often enough to know it by heart. He helped Margaery to get through this mess until they arrived at a certain area that was cleared of any obstacle.

“I don’t know where Myrcella was buried, but I often come here, and I imagine she is right under my feet,” he explained to Margaery. She removed her hood. It was useless here, far from any prying eyes. She looked all around her.

“I was married thrice. I was wed to two of my husbands here, and then, I was sent into a cell under the very place where I professed my love for these men. I never thought that I would marry, pray, and be imprisoned in the one same place. And now it’s gone.” She moved a few rocks on the ground with her feet. “I was lucky to escape. Many people didn’t have this chance. And Tommen, he survived this, and he threw himself from the top of a tower because he believed I was dead.” He could hear the regret in her voice. She shook her head. “Or maybe Cersei pushed him. What do you think?”

The thought of a mother killing her son was unsettling. “I don’t know. I suppose you knew Cersei better than I did.”

“It seems I didn’t know her enough. I didn’t expect all of this from her. I didn’t think she could truly plot to have me and Loras killed. We didn’t believe the Lannisters would do something against us. They needed us, but Cersei did it all the same, and she ended in a cell similar to my own. Before she blew up everything.” She exhaled. “I’m glad she’s dead. Maybe Loras will find some sort of peace now.”

She looked down. She was grieving her brother and her husband. Trystane understood what she felt. He remembered the pain he felt when Quentyn died. His brother was supposed to rule Sunspear one day. It was never supposed to be him. He and Margaery were both heirs who were not supposed to be. And of course, he also grieved for the woman he loved.

“I’m sorry for your brother,” he told her.

“Thank you.” A gust of wind made her mantle fly a little. “You loved Myrcella, didn’t you? I can see it the way you talk about her, and you wouldn’t come here again and again if you felt nothing for Trystane sighed. There was no need for hiding. Most of the people already knew or suspected his true feelings. Daenerys herself was aware of them. “I miss her. I wish she wasn’t dead.”

The lady standing not far from him nodded. “From what Tommen told, and what I know about her, she didn’t deserve to die.”

“No, she didn’t.” He saw her again, in Sunspear’s gardens, smiling at him, all joy, sweetness, beauty and kindness. “She shouldn’t have died.”

“Many people should never have died.” She looked straight at him. “I suppose congratulations would be in order, but do you want them?”

Trystane ignored the question. He knew very well what the congratulations were intended for, and truth be told he didn’t have much envy to hear them, not here where Myrcella was buried.

“You know, Trystane,” Margaery started, “all I wanted was to be queen. I wonder now if it was wise from me. My whole family suffered from our ambition, my brother more than anyone else. I suppose you’re aware of his affair with Renly.” Trystane nodded. Everyone knew. “When Renly died… Loras… I never saw him so… utterly destroyed. Renly didn’t deserve to die either. Of the three Baratheon brothers, I think he would have made the best king. Tommen shouldn’t have died either. Joffrey was the only one who deserved his death.” She made an attempt to smile, but when she spoke, it was seriously. “I hope my next husband will not die within the first year of our marriage, if I ever marry again.”

“I’m sure the queen will find you a suitable match. And you are the heir to Highgarden now.”

“I wish I wasn’t.”

They were lost in their thoughts. “Do you wish to make a prayer, my lady?”

“Of course.”

They did. They recited a long prayer for the dead and the loved ones, their voices joining to form a chorus. Trystane thought of Myrcella, but he also prayed for her brother. She would have liked it. He even made a prayer for her uncle, Ser Jaime Lannister, who rotted in the cells of the Red Keep. He hadn’t gone to see him yet, though the thought came to his mind more than once. He felt that he wouldn’t like what the knight might tell him, knowing he murdered not only his king, but also his own sister and lover. He had come to accept that Jaime and Cersei Lannister were lovers. However, he refused to believe that Myrcella could be the daughter of the Kingslayer. That simply looked impossible for him.

“Well, look at it.” Trystane recognized the voice immediately. His mind was filled with rage on the instant. The three of them were in King’s Landing. He opened the eyes and saw one of them, the woman who murdered his betrothed standing right in front of him. “Found yourself another pretty girl? And me who thought you would never get over the bastard.”

“Lady Tyene,” Margaery Tyrell welcomed her. “It’s a pleasure to see you again.”

“Really?”

“I owe you my life. If you didn’t get me out of this place before it blew up, I would be dead.”

Tyene made a muffled sound with her mouth that was the only sign of acknowledgement. Lady Margaery’s thanks seemed forced.

Tyene looked at him. “So, here crying over your Lannister love?”

“What I’m doing here doesn’t concern you,” he shot her.

“Why not? If Daenerys Targaryen was to learn that you still mourn a false princess, or that you had a Tyrell brought to King’s Landing to run after her, what would be her reaction? I’m not sure she would be so keen to marry you, knowing your cock is growing whenever a false queen stands before you.”

He was boiling from the inside. “Our queen told me to bring Lady Margaery to King’s Landing, Tyene. Unlike you, the queen is talking to me.” It was the truth. It was some way to thank the Tyrells for their help so far, and also to keep the heir to Highgarden closer. It was also to increase the distance with her son.

“Only talking?”

She smirked mockingly. Trystane held her stare. “Leave me alone. Your father wouldn’t want me to have anything with people who murder innocent girls.”

“Innocent girls.” She spat on the ground. “That’s where she belongs. That’s where all the Lannisters belong. I can’t wait for the day the rest of them will die.”

She turned on her heels and walked away.

“I’m not the only one with issues about your cousins,” Margaery Tyrell said behind him.

He tried to calm himself and looked at her. “I’m sorry for how she treated you on your way to Storm’s End.” She acknowledged his apologies. “And I’m sorry about your son. It wasn’t my decision.”

She looked away. “I will never see him again.”

“I wouldn’t say that if I were you.” She looked back at him. “No one knows what the future holds for us.”

No one knew what could happen to them in the next days, the next weeks, the next months, or the next years. Not Trystane, not Margaery, not even someone like Varys. And certainly not Tyene or any of her sisters. Even his father, as wise as he was, couldn’t predict with certainty what would happen in the near or far future. He looked down, where his beloved was buried, and repeated in his mind the promise he made a long time ago. I will avenge you, Myrcella. I swear it. Those who killed you will pay.

Next chapter : Bran
Sorry for the delay. This chapter should have been published two days ago.

First chapter from Bran. The style is a little different from the usual one I use when I write a first chapter from someone's perspective. I hope you'll like it.

BRAN I

He was floating beneath the sky, flying through the wind with ease. It gave him a feeling of freedom he could only experience when he wasn’t trapped into his wheelchair. The snow and the wind didn’t bother him. He flew straight, looking on the ground all the time, focusing on every single detail. The great mountain of ice that stood straight wasn’t far on his right. The men built structures on the other side, and also over it. For now, they were alone on the mountain of ice, but certainly not for a long time. Strange things hid in the woods. He was looking for these things. They were not animals, and they were not humans either. They were a danger for everything that lived. For now, they were nowhere to be seen. The mind that was within him had seen these things through other eyes. He even met the eyes of the one. He flapped his wings more quickly, fighting the wind that pushed him back towards the mountain on the right.

He brought back his attention on the woods, but there was truly nothing to be seen, and yet his instincts told him that someone, or something, was watching him. He slowed down, losing altitude, and approached the top of the trees. The woods were thick there. It was very hard to see through the coverage of firs. All of a sudden, he had the impression the air was colder. He focused his attention even more on the trees, but there was still nothing to be seen. He followed his path, and after a certain distance, he felt warmer. He turned around and went back on his steps, and felt the same cold. They had to be there, but he couldn’t see anything.

“Bran.”

He opened his eyes and found himself into the godswood of Winterfell, at home. Sansa was standing right in front of him, a gloved hand on his shoulder.

“Bran, finally,” she said, looking relieved. “You’ve been here for hours like that. Everyone was worried.”

“Hours?”

“Yes,” she replied on a reproachful tone.

Bran closed his eyes and opened them again. “I’m sorry. I don’t see the time going on.”

“You should be more careful. Sometimes, I’m worried you might go into on of these visions you have and never get out.”

“I know. Meera told me the same thing.”
“Well, I’m telling it to you as well.”

She looked at the weirwood. His sister had become a woman since she left Winterfell. He was asleep back then, so he didn’t see her leaving, but he saw it later, when he decided he wanted to see her departure. She had looked so happy, but then her life had turned into a nightmare. Bran had seen her during Father’s execution. He witnessed her humiliations, every insult and mistreatment she went through. He also saw her receiving help, from Sandor Clegane, from Margaery Tyrell, and of course from the man who would become her husband. He saw her defy her captors. She looked like their mother.

Bran missed his parents. He missed Robb, and Rickon. He was afraid for Jon and Arya. He knew they could all survive to terrible things. They defied death more than once, beating the odds of survival but still, he was afraid.

“Did you see Tyrion?” Sansa asked.

“No,” he replied. “Not today. I was watching the other side of the Wall.”

“He should be here soon. I can’t wait for him to be there.”

Bran perceived the longing in her voice. Despite everything his gift allowed him to see, it was still strange for him to see his sister deeply in love with Tyrion Lannister. The sister he knew before he fell would never have loved a man like him. She changed. They all changed. They were all so happy once, just like their father, their aunt and their uncles before. This happiness wasn’t made to last. Sansa once told him that their parents shouldn’t have tried to hide the ugliness of the exterior to them. He had come to agree with her.

“How are things going with the lords of the Vale?”

“They’re not leaving yet. But they’re not staying to fight either.” His sister blew some air. “They still believe this isn’t their fight. The think they can hide behind their mountains like they did during the War of the Five Kings. Or perhaps they’re only afraid. Some saw the White Walkers. I think they just want to run away, and hope the dead won’t follow them. But we need their help. We need everyone’s help.”

“Maybe Tyrion can help you when he comes back,” Bran suggested.

“Yes, but he will probably wonder who these lords are the most likely to listen: a woman, or a dwarf.” She had thin smile. Bran returned it. “It will be good to see him again all the same. Joanna grew up so much while he was away. Soon she will be taller than him.”

“Could I see her?”

Sansa seemed surprised. “I thought your visions took all the time you had.” She said it half-accusingly.

“I think I can find a few minutes for my niece.”

His sister smiled. “Well, come then.”

She pushed his wheelchair out of the godswood. She got help from a few men to bring him to her chambers. On their way, Bran noticed the vast number of men with sigils from the Vale. They were the men who followed the lords who deserted the Wall and that Sansa desperately tried to keep in the North. They had been at Winterfell for two weeks now. His sister outdid herself to make them stay to negotiate.
In the nursery, Sansa took her daughter and brought her to Bran. “Here. Be careful. You must place her head in your arm’s fold. Like this. Yes.”

He looked at his niece who was sleeping. “Her hair is shining.”

“Yes, it is.”

Bran saw how Sansa looked at her daughter. It reminded him of the way their lady mother looked at him. It had to be love. He thought with regret that he would never have children. Bran missed his parents. He had time to mourn his lord father, but he never truly mourned his mother. She had died believing he was dead.

Screams filled the room, bolts and arrows flew everywhere. Throats were slit, hearts were carved. Daggers and blades took lives by the dozens. There was a woman lying on the floor next to Bran. She was pretty, with brown hair, and Bran recognized her. Talisa Maegyr. He saw her in some of his visions before. She was Robb’s wife. When he saw her, she looked so happy with his brother, but now, her eyes were half-shut, and she was bleeding from the belly. Her blood was spread all around her. But what stroke Bran the most was the small curb her belly showed despite the mess. She was pregnant. He approached her and looked closer. She was dead.

“The King in the North arises.”

Bran turned his head just in time to see his brother struggling to crawl to his wife. Bran stepped out, allowing Robb all the space he needed. He placed his hand over his wife’s belly and took her under the neck, slowly rising her. Bran had never seen his brother so heartbroken. She was gone. His wife and their baby were gone.

He heard some noise from his left. A woman grabbed a girl who hid under a table and put a knife on her neck. “Lord Walder! Lord Walder, enough! Let it end!”

Bran stared in shock. He moved so he could better see their faces. He confirmed that it was his mother who held the knife. The girl looked terrified. He had never seen his mother like that. That couldn’t be her. She couldn’t be holding a knife at the throat of an innocent girl. However, her next words were very different.

“She believes I’m dead. She believes Rickon is dead. She thinks Arya and Sansa are lost. Robb is all that’s left to her. I swore by all the gods your son would marry my daughter!”

“He is my son. My first son. Let him go and I swear that we will forget this. I swear it by the old gods and the new. We will take no vengeance.”

“You already swore me one oath right here in my castle.” Bran turned to see Walder Frey, the man who organized the slaughter. “You swore by all the gods your son would marry my daughter!”

“Take me for a hostage, but let Robb go,” she begged. She turned to his brother. “Robb, get up. Get up and walk out. Please! Please!” his mother shouted.

Robb didn’t seem to hear her. He kept looking at his wife. His mother was desperate. “And why would I let him do that?”

His mother straightened, tightening the grip of the dagger on the girl’s throat, and stared at Walder Frey. “On my honor as a Tully, on my honor as a Stark, let him go or I will cut your wife’s throat.”
No. No, she couldn’t do that. Bran could see the girl was innocent. She had nothing to do with that. Her mother had to know it would change nothing. Robb was going to die, and she couldn’t change it. It was bound to happen. She was only going to take an innocent life.

“I’ll find another.” Lord Frey’s sentence fell like an axe on a man’s throat.

“Mother.” His brother had talked. Robb looked at him. He had several bolts piercing his body. It was a miracle he could still stand. He wouldn’t survive. Bran knew it, and despair gained him as well. He wished there was something he could do. He couldn’t stand there and let this happen.

A man came to stand between Robb and him. “The Lannisters send their regards.”

Roose Bolton shoved a knife into Robb’s heart. He stood away as Robb fell on his knees, then his body collapsed on the floor. He was dead.

“NO!”

Bran joined his mother’s cries. He rushed to his brother, but before he could do anything, he heard a strange sound behind him, followed by the noise of a knife clattering on the floor. He turned and saw the girl his mother threatened a moment ago lying on the floor in her blood. The knife that took her life wasn’t far away. His eyes fell upon his mother’s right hand, covered with blood. She did it.

He looked, unbelieving, to the scene before him. His mother wasn’t moving anymore. Her eyes looked at nothing. Bran could only watch his mother. She said she would kill the girl, and she did it. Bran was powerless as he saw a man in chainmail seize his mother from behind and slit her throat.

He woke up in his bed, breathing heavily.

“My lord.” Wolkan was standing over him. “Finally. I was beginning to worry.”

“Bran! Are you alright?” Sansa came into his view, worried like his mother was whenever he was sick.

“Yes, I think. What happened?”

“You were with me. We were talking, and then, your eyes turned white, and you began to shake. I was afraid… What happened?”

Bran shook his head. “I don’t know. It’s just… I had a vision.”

“You had a vision?” Meera appeared behind them. “You started one?”

“No. It just… started. I didn’t want to. I… I saw the Red Wedding. I saw Mother, and Robb, die.”

The three people before him were silent.

“Bran,” Merra began. “That makes no sense. You told me you controlled your power. That you chose what you wanted to see.”

“Yes, and it’s true. It’s just… This time, it was different. The vision came like this. I never tried to access it.”

Another silence followed. “Wolkan, Lady Meera, please leave us alone.”

The maester left on the spot on Sansa’s order. Meera seemed about to protest, but one look from Sansa convinced her it would be better to not argue. When Bran was alone with his sister, her eyes shot daggers at him.

“I don’t recognize you anymore, Bran.”

“I’m sorry, Sansa. I’ll work on it…”

“No. I don’t want you to try to have any other vision. It’s over.”

“Sansa, I can’t. We need them. They can help us…”

“You’re spending most of your time alone, lost in your dreams. You barely talk, you barely eat, and Meera told me you’re losing the notion of time. Sometimes you don’t even remember if it is day or night. I’m worried about you, Bran. We’re losing you.”

“You’re not losing me, Sansa.”

“Yes, I am. Don’t say the opposite.”

“My visions can help us to locate the White Walkers, to know their weaknesses, to know where to strike them…”

“You haven’t been able to see a single wight in weeks now. And I know that you’re spending most of your time looking at past events, and not scouting the North.” She stared at him. “This is becoming dangerous for you, and for the others.”

“I can’t hurt the others with that, Sansa.”

“Really?” For a moment, he thought she was going to throw Hodor’s name to his face. “What about Joanna? You were holding my daughter when your crisis started.”

By the Old God, he had forgotten this. “Is she alright?”

“You dropped her. We’re lucky she’s not injured.” Sansa was furious. “No more visions. I forbid you.”

She strode away. He heard her speak on the other side of the door. “Lady Meera, I want you to keep an eye on Bran for the night. Don’t let him go into his dream-visions, or whatever it is. Wolkan, examine him to see if there’s anything you can do. Don’t bother with his protests. You are sworn to Winterfell, and I am the Lady of Winterfell. He’s not our lord.”

He heard her walking away in the corridors. Bran was pretty shaken with her outburst, conjugated to the recent experience to watch his mother and brother die. He didn’t dare, or care, to oppose when Maester Wolkan examined him in detail. He answered to his questions in vague terms. The maester was trying to know how he got his powers, but Bran himself wasn’t sure of the way he gained them. He didn’t think he had any better idea of the effects of his powers than the maester did.

Later in the evening, he was dining alone with Meera. “Do you think Sansa is right, Meera?” he asked her while he cut some salted pork.

“Well, it is true that… Lately, I thought you were getting lost in your visions. Perhaps she is right and you should stop for some time.”

“I cannot stop. I’m the Three-Eyed Raven. We need me to see what’s going on if we hope to defeat the Night King.”

“Even at the price of your life?”
Bran shrugged. “The former Three-Eyed Raven gave his life for us. Maybe I’ll have to do the same.”

“Bran, how can you say something like that?”

“It’s the truth. The Children of the Forest have been waiting for me for thousands of years. They needed me.”

“For what? I know that seeing the enemy’s movements and understanding where the White Walkers came from can help us, but I don’t see how this can be so vital for victory, and enough for the Children to wait for so long.”

“I don’t know. I think I have another role to play. I’m not sure, but I know it’s important, and it could make the difference between victory and death.”

“Jojen is gone. I don’t want you to die as well.”

“I may have to. After all, Meera, what’s one life compared to those of everyone in Westeros?”

“Your life is everything to me.” She was looking at him with tears in her eyes. “And think about it. The Three-Eyed Raven himself told you could get lost in your visions if you stayed too long. If we lose you, what good will your visions be, if you can’t tell us about them?”

Bran could only reply this. “I must continue to look.”

“I won’t let you, Bran.”

The sound of men sparring in the courtyard could be heard, even late in the evening. Bran had to keep visiting the past, to see through the eyes of ravens. They needed that to defeat the Night King.

“You won’t be able to stop me, Meera.”

He didn’t see it coming. The palm of her hand met his cheek hard. He rubbed it in the hope to ease the pain, but it did little to help.

“I will stop you, Bran, by every mean necessary. I already lost my brother. I’m not going to lose you too.”

Before Bran could reply, the door burst open. One of the household guards of House Stark walked in. “My lord, we must go, now.”

“What?” he asked.

“There’s no time to discuss,” he said. Another man came into the room with him and they began to get Bran out of his bed. “The castle is under attack. Lady Sansa told us to evacuate you.”

“Wait. Who is attacking us?”

“The Knights of the Vale.”

“What?” The Vale was their ally.

“We don’t have time to explain you, my lord. We must go.”

Bran realized that the sounds of swords clashing outside were mixed with cries of pain and screams. This was no training. Fights started within the walls of Winterfell.
“Wait. Where are the fights taking place?” he asked.

“In the courtyards, over the walls, in the Great Hall, everywhere, my lord. We must leave the castle.”

“Bran will never make it to the gates. He can’t walk,” Meera protested.

“We have no choice, my lady. We’ve got to leave.”

“No,” Bran declared. “Meera is right. We cannot leave. Even if we get past the walls, the Vale has encampments outside. We won’t get far. We must hide.”

“In the crypts. That’s where Rickon and I hid to escape Theon the last time. Meera, you see this torch on the wall?” Meera looked at it and nodded. “Make it turn to the right. Do it.”

Meera did as she was told. Slowly, an opening appeared in the wall, enough to allow a grown man through it.

“How did you know about it?” Meera asked. Bran raised an eyebrow. She understood what it meant. He knew things no living souls were aware of.

“This passage leads to the crypts. No one knows about it. But we need someone to seal it behind us. We cannot close it from the inside,” Bran explained.

“My lord, we were given orders to escort you to safety,” one of the guards protested.

“We won’t make it to safety through the courtyards. The crypts are our best chance.”

The other guard stepped before. “I will close the passage behind you, my lord.” He turned to his comrade. “Go with them. Protect our lord. I’ll make sure no one follows you.”

The other guard hesitated, but finally gave in and helped Meera to carry Bran to the passage. Once the three of them were inside, the guard that remained in the room moved back the torch to its initial position, and the passage closed behind them. The guard carried Bran on his back. He was stronger than Meera. She seized a torch and used it to light the way ahead of them. They followed steep stairs that went downwards. Water could be seen dripping along the walls. They probably came from the heating system of the castle, which brought hot water from the underground to the surface, keeping Winterfell warm even in winter.

As they continued to walk forward, deeper into the depths of the castle, Bran decided to see what was going on. He concentrated, and projected his spirit to reach the present events.

He was flying over the Wall. There were fires lit under him, on the ground and in higher positions. The air was cold, colder than usual. There was a presence that didn’t want to see these things. He turned his head to the right and saw a storm coming.

He was flying over marshes. Bugs, swarms, water and trees were everywhere under him. There was a long line following a narrow path through the swamps. They were a strange collection of colors that contrasted with the green area all around them. He heard screams he never heard before, not far behind him.

He was flying over another column of men. This time, they proceeded through snow, slower than the others. They were easy to spot, with their red furs of steel. They were also fewer. They were far from any place where men lived and heading south.
He was flying south over fields of snow. He saw a beast with scales and large wings, cream colored, flying in the opposite direction. Their eyes met. His were two pools of molten gold. He opened his mouth and fire swallowed him at the same time than the throat.

He was in a familiar vast and rich room. He couldn’t fly, but he could walk. He was no raven here. He wasn’t in the present, but in the past. A man with silver hair going grey, violet eyes, and wrinkles digging his traits sat on a chair made of steel. A thousand swords made the chair. Bran saw the man sitting in the same chair before. Burn them all. He saw him die, killed by his own kingsguard.

He looked younger now. He wasn’t at the end of his life yet. He wasn’t of the first youth, but he wasn’t old either. He also held himself differently. Bran didn’t see the Mad King at this very moment. What he saw was a man who looked pleased with himself. He seemed happy.

The great doors opened to let a man with a rich doublet and short golden hair walk inside. Bran noticed the lion shaped pins on him. It wasn’t the first time he saw Tywin Lannister when he was young. He had the badge of Hand on him. The Lord of Casterly Rock walked to the throne and stopped where the steps were beginning. Aerys Targaryen stared at him, a smile on his lips.

“What can I do for you, my friend?” he asked.

“Friend?” The word resonated in the Great Hall. Tywin Lannister took off his badge and climbed the steps to the Iron Throne. He handed the badge to the man who sat before him. “I resign. I’m leaving today.”

Aerys looked at his Hand and the badge he offered with incredulity. “You resign?”

“You, Your Grace’s ear is very good.”

The Mad King obviously caught the veiled insult. “Your resignation is refused.”

“You would like a man who gave his resignation to serve you?” he asked on an impassive tone.

“No, I want YOU to serve me.” Aerys stared at Tywin. “I don’t get it. You finally got what you wanted, and you’re not smiling. I’ll never understand you, my friend.” The king smirked as he stopped talking.

“I didn’t get what I wanted.”

“You know damn well you did. Your daughter is too young. She’s only four. I can’t make the announcement yet.”

“I wonder when it will be made, if it is ever made,” Tywin replied on an icy tone.

“One day. I’d say the promise to see your daughter queen is far more for you than what you gave me in return. Though I appreciated every instant of the last night. It was worth it.”

Tywin Lannister was obviously furious, though the edge in his voice could barely be perceived. “I never gave my consent to this.”

“Really? Did you say something when I called her to my rooms? Did you try to stop her? Did you try to stop me? No more than six years ago. I may have been drunk, but I recall every detail. If you didn’t know what I intended to do, then it is your fault, because that means you are a fool.” Aerys Targaryen smirked like a mad man. “Tell, how did you feel when you found out that another man claimed her before you?”
Tywin’s eyes were as cold as frozen steel. “Your Grace makes a foul of himself every day.”

“Be careful, my friend. You’re talking to your king.”

“And I’m stating a fact by saying the king is making a fool of himself every day he lives. Especially yesterday.”

“What? That? It was a joke. You should learn to laugh.”

“My father laughed. Look where it brought him. You should take lessons from his example.”

“Well, he died into his bed. I see worse ways of dying. And we are both happier than you.”

“Your rule will be in danger if you keep acting this way.”

“And who will endanger it? You? I think not. Because you’re going to stay and to serve me as Hand of the King as long as I want. And if you want your daughter that the court just saw for the first time to be queen one day, I suggest you do as you are told.”

Slowly, reluctantly, Tywin Lannister closed the hand on the badge and put it back into his pocket. The Mad King was smiling widely.

“See? It’s possible to tame a lion. But you can’t tame a dragon,” the king declared.

“Even a tamed lion can be dangerous, your Grace.”

“Is that a threat?”

Tywin bowed. “I will return to my duties.”

He began to walk away when Aerys called after him. “We were friends once, or so I thought. But I wonder, today, were we truly friends, or is it just something I imagined? Did you ever consider me as a friend, Tywin?”

The young Lord of Casterly Rock turned on his heels to face the king. He was now below the dais. “You are no longer the man you were back then.”

“Really? Is it that I changed, or is it that I didn’t give you what you wanted?”

“I don’t remember asking you for anything.”

“No, but you wanted something, and you wanted a lot. You wanted my throne, even then.”

“I never tried to sit on the Iron Throne. It is yours.”

“Yes, and by marrying your daughter Cersei to Rhaegar, you hope to get your hands on it through your children and grandchildren.”

“You’re the one saying it, your Grace.”

“Think yourself lucky that I am actually considering a marriage between my son and your daughter. You are the Hand of the King. I AM the king. You’re not.”

“Any man who must say I am the king is no true king.” Tywin Lannister bowed and proceeded to walk away. Before he left the room, the Mad King shouted.
“Thank Joanna for me. And give her my apologies for leaving her early this morning, though I’m sure she must be used to it with you.”

The Lord of Casterly Rock barely slowed down, but Bran noticed how his fists formed balls as he left the Great Hall. Aerys Targaryen burst into laughs as soon as his Hand was gone. This was uncontrollable laughter. He was bent into two in his throne. He was the Mad King for sure.

“This Tywin. Never able to take a jape. I wonder how Joanna can suffer him. Bring me some wine. It makes me feel better.”

TYRION XXX

“Winter is coming.” Tyrion heard and said the words so often that he thought he might end up adopting them as his family’s new words before the end of this winter. And since this one was bound to be very long, he had a lot of time ahead of him to adopt them. But since they were the words of House Stark, Tyrion thought it might be better if he changed for something else, something closer to how Lannisters felt during winter. Hear me feeze, for example. His lord father would certainly love it.

“Well, winter is already here, and tempest is more accurate to describe it than winter.”

“Tempest? Accurate? You spent far too much time with fancy folk.”

Bronn smirked and they toasted. They were together in Tyrion’s personal tent. Winterfell was only one day ahead of them, and they had stopped for the night. Tyrion had already spent every night since they left Castle Black thinking about the best way to prepare the North for the upcoming invasion. He thought it was time to relax with one of his friends. It was a long time since he simply spent the night drinking, without worrying about his lordly duties.

Bronn grimaced. “Wine in the North is not very famous.”

“For someone who traveled north of the Wall, you have high standards.”

“You got me used to fine things. That’s your fault.”

“I’m sorry that you’re complaining about your current situation. You became a landed knight thanks to me, remember. And you have a wife, and a son.”

“Aye. To Tyrion of Blackwater.”

They toasted again. Bronn was right. There were better wine. “So, did you receive any news from Daisy?”

“At the Wall? No. But she wrote to me a few times at Winterfell. There might be a few ravens waiting for me there.” His friend drank again. “What is it, tell me, to be a father? Do you feel any different?”

Tyrion thought about it for some time. “Well, it is… special. I don’t know how to explain this, but… I mean, I knew I would need to have children with Sansa, but I never… truly thought about what it meant. So, when I saw Joanna for the first time… when I held her in my arms the first time… It’s hard to explain. I’m not good at it.” His explanations were very clumsy.

“No, you’re not.” Bronn took another gulp. “I guess I’ll discover what you’re trying to say when I see Daisy again.”

“It was for her that I did this,” Tyrion confessed.

“Heh?”

“Not for Daisy, I meant for Joanna. And for Sansa, too. When I decided to set this trap with the wildfire at Castle Black, I was thinking about them. I thought that if the White Walkers got through the Wall, if they spread through the North, then what were the odds they could survive? I was ready to do everything to ensure their safety. Even if it meant killing thousands of people. Do you think we made the right choice?”

Bronn shrugged. “I can’t say I appreciated the sight but, it’s not that different from King’s Landing. Without the wildfire, Stannis would have taken the city, you would be dead, I would be dead, our pretty wives would be dead, your family would be dead, or most of them, and we might add to this that an entire city would have been set afire. It’s the same here. You did what had to be done.”

“In King’s Landing, they were enemies. It was Stannis’s men that I burned to death. But here, I sacrificed our own men.”

“Most were not from the Westerlands, so technically they were not your men. And none of my men died in this battle.”

“You know very well what I’m talking about, Bronn.”

“No, I don’t. You stopped these fuckers from swarming through the North and transforming everything that lives into some kind of fucking zombie. What is more to say? That was the right call. When you start setting rules about what is right and what is wrong, and that you try to follow these rules, then you’re fucked. All those who try to live this way end up the most popular dead men in town.”

“Just like people who try to get other people to love them.”

“Exactly.”

“You didn’t try to make Daisy love you?”

“No. She wanted to leave that brothel, I wanted a wife who wasn’t too complicated, both of us are happy and alive.” Bronn sighed. “Look, most of the people at Castle Black who knew about the wildfire hated you for that, but they’re all alive thanks to that, and we’re alive thanks to that as well. I’m not happy that we killed two thousand men for that, but I would rather see them die than die with them. If you had tried to make what the guys at Castle Black wanted you to do, they might have loved you, but not for long since we would all be dead.” He made a movement with his hand to mimic a slit throat.

As always, Bronn had a unique perspective on things. Still, that didn’t make Tyrion feel any better. He killed those men. He hated his father, despised him for events like the Red Wedding, but was he that different from him? Was he truly better?

“And if that’s not enough for you, then I don’t think Sansa would have liked it if you died,” he added.
“I wonder what she will think of me when I tell her what I’ve done.”

“You’re planning to tell her?”

“Better if she hears it from me than from someone else, if she’s not already aware of the explosion.”

“Aye, true. She’ll understand,” he shrugged off.

“I’m not as confident as you are, my friend. Are you going to tell Daisy about the role you played in that?”

“Why would I? Perhaps I’ll mention it if she wants to hear stories of war, but I’ll only keep the finest details.” Tyrion looked at him with reprobation. “What? What good could come out from her knowing the full story? That’s not as if many could tell her. And anyway, I was following orders, so that’s not my fault. My sword belongs to me, but I’m not choosing who it kills. You do.”

He raised his cup to Tyrion and drank. As Bronn talked about the fact that his wife would certainly be too much occupied with showing him the baby when he would see her again, Tyrion mused over what Sansa, and Joanna when she would be old enough, would think of him. Would Castle Black join Castamere, Tarbeck Hall and the Red Wedding among the words that made House Lannister both famous and infamous?

Tyrion was eager to see his wife and his daughter again, but at the same time, he eared Sansa’s reaction when she would discover the truth about what he did. He thought for a long time that Sansa would never love him, and he didn’t want to lose her now that he had what he always wanted. He didn’t feel like he could return to his previous life, made of wine, brothels and gambles, not after all the happiness he had with Sansa.

Podrick came in at this moment, carrying something heavy in his arms. “My lord, I brought you some more wine,” he explained, placing a full barrel inside the tent.

“Thank you, Pod.”

“Thank you, lad. Come and drink with us,” Bronn said.

“Well, I’m not sure if…”

“Come on, Pod. We might be good at drinking, but we cannot be sure if we’ll succeed to get through the entire barrel. You brought it, you deserve your share. Join us. Enjoy yourself,” Tyrion said. Seeing Podrick was still hesitating, he added, “I give you the order to join us.”

“As you wish, my lord.”

He sat on the furs covering the ground just like they did. It reminded Tyrion of the night before the Battle of the Green Fork. It seemed an eternity since that night, though it was only four years ago. That had been his first night with Shae. Podrick had been somewhere in the camp back then, but he wasn’t at Tyrion’s service yet. Now Shae was gone, far away. Tyrion realized he didn’t feel much when he thought of Shae. He didn’t miss her at all. It was Sansa he missed.

“A toast,” Tyrion declared, “to the nobodies who became somebodies. The Imp turned lord, the sellsword turned landed knight, and the discarded squire soon to be turned knight.”

“My lord?” Podrick looked at him in utter surprise.

“Don’t make this face, Pod. You saved my life, you served me very well, you fought very well, and I heard you know how to fight very well now. When this mess is all over and the war is at an end, I’ll have you knighted.”

Podrick’s eyes were shining. He was agape. “Thank you, my lord. I don’t know what to say.”

Tyrion raised his cup. “Toast.”

“Toast,” Bronn repeated.

“Toast,” Podrick added after an hesitation.

“Remember that game we played, Bronn? At the Green Fork?” Tyrion asked his friend.

“The one that involved burning skin?”

“No, the one where we must guess the truth.”

“Ah, yeah. What a game. Your lady love at the time didn’t like it, though we got some confessions with that.”

The memory of his confession about Tysha came back. He hadn’t told the whole story back then. Jaime and Sansa were among the few to truly know what happened to his wife. He didn’t mention to Bronn and Shae that he raped her after his father’s men were done with her. Bad memories made for a bad evening. Tyrion drank, hoping the wine would help.

“What about we make another round?” he suggested against all common sense.

“Well, why not? Maybe we’ll learn some other dark secret about the Lord of Casterly Rock.”

“What dark secret?” Podrick asked.

“Nothing interesting, Pod,” Tyrion quickly said. “The game is simple. You guess something about a person. If you’re right about it, he drinks. If you’re wrong, you drink. Let me give you an example.”

Tyrion looked at Bronn.

“You would never give your father’s name to one of your sons.”

“You’ve got to be mad.” Bronn drank. “I would rather die.”

“See, Podrick. Easy and simple.” His squire had a dubious expression. “Next one. You would rather burn alive than be turned into a wight.”

“That’s an easy one,” Bronn said as he drank again.

“You have slept with three women, at the same time.”

“No.” Tyrion was surprised. Bronn made a movement with his head, telling him to drink. Frowning, staring at his friend, Tyrion drank. “Four, yes, but three, never.”

Bronn laughed as he saw Tyrion’s agape expression. He rolled his eyes and made his last guess.

“You love Daisy.”

Bronn looked at him with a strange expression. Tyrion wasn’t exactly sure what would be the answer. Perhaps he foolishly hoped for the better. After a long wait, Bronn emptied his cup.
“Are you serious?” he asked the knight.

“That’s how the game works. You cannot lie,” Bronn offered as an explanation.

Tyrion had to admit he was very surprised, especially since his friend never hesitated to go to a brothel when he had an occasion, even now that he was married. The knight of the Blackwater turned to his squire.

“So, lad. What about you? Want to try?” Podrick didn’t look sure at all. Bronn patted him on the back. “Come on, lad. Try on our little lord. Try to penetrate the enigma that he is.”

“Yes, go on, Pod. Give it a try,” Tyrion encouraged. He didn’t think his squire could say something that could place him in a delicate situation anyhow. Podrick wasn’t Shae.

“All right,” the squire finally said, still unsure. “You fought at the Blackwater.”

Bronn rolled his eyes. Tyrion snickered. “Pod, you must say something you don’t know about me, or something you’re not sure about.”

“Sorry, my lord.” He needed a long time before he came up with something else. “Your favourite wine grows on the lands of Brightwater Keep.”

Tyrion shook his head. “Drink, Podrick. It’s cultivated in Old Oak. I thought you would know my wines better, after pouring so much.”

“Sorry, my lord, but you drink so much wine and like so many that I wasn’t sure which one you like the most.”

“Well now, you’ll know it. You still have three guesses. Don’t forget to drink, before.”

“Yes, my lord.” Pod hurriedly emptied his cup. Bronn filled it again. “Um, you never wielded a sword, my lord?”

Tyrion raised his cup and drank. “Good job, Pod.”

“Not even a wooden sword?” Bronn asked. “I thought all the noblemen’s sons had one at six if not early.”

“Oh, indeed, but since I was a dwarf, the master-at-arms never thought it was useful for me to receive one, and neither did my father. So I was reduced to read and listen to the tales of Ser Duncan the Tall and Ser Arthur Dayne while my brother could imagine he was them when he sparred.”

Tyrion remembered something. “When my uncle Gerion left for the Free Cities, he promised me that I would be the first one to hold Brightroar when he came back. But he never did.” He forced himself out of his memories and back into the present. The last time he went into the past in a similar situation only brought back dark memories to his mind, and he doubted it would be different this time. “Go on, Pod, two left.”

“Are you going to name your first son Gerion, my lord?” he asked.

“Um, I mean… You’re going to call him Gerion, my lord, won’t you? You’re going to do this?”

It was half a question and half a statement. Tyrion thought about it. Sansa had agreed that their first son should have a name from the Westerlands. He indeed thought about naming his first son after his late uncle, the one who had been the kindest with him, when Sansa was pregnant, though the name was in competition with Jaime. After a moment of uncertainty, Tyrion decided to drink.

“A very good guess, Podrick. Now, to the last.”

“The Lady Sansa is the only woman you love, my lord.”

“Oh, come on, lad,” Bronn said. “Try to be more imaginative than that. It would take someone stupid, blind and deaf to not see it. He even stopped visiting brothels for her. It’s a miracle that he didn’t stop drinking as well.”

“Drink.”

Bronn and Pod slowly turned their heads to look at their lord, a puzzled expression on their faces. They didn’t seem certain that the word truly came from Tyrion. And yet, it did.

“Drink, Pod,” he repeated, “and we won’t talk about this.”

Pod needed some time to empty his cup for the second time. When he looked down, he looked surprised to see that he was actually holding something.

“I think we need some good rest. We’ll reach Winterfell tomorrow,” Tyrion said.

He stood up, hoping it would make it clear for the others that they were dismissed. His squire mumbled a my lord and left. Bronn lingered behind.

“Shae?” he asked.

He shouldn’t answer to that. That was a matter of private life, of personal feelings. He was the Lord of Casterly Rock. He didn’t have to justify himself to one of his knights. It didn’t concern Bronn. And yet, Tyrion replied.

“No. I barely thought of Shae for quite a while. She’s only a distant memory.” She had left his mind and his heart as quickly as she had come into it. Her image was already fading. Tyrion wasn’t sure he would remember how she looked like in a few years. Sansa occupied all the place the foreign beauty once used everywhere in his being.

“Oh.” Bronn slowly nodded. “Her?” He didn’t need to tell her name. Tyrion had his back turned on him and was pouring himself another cup of the wine that Podrick thought was his favourite. He distractedly nodded. “Still love her?”

Yes, he did. No matter how hard he could try, she always came back to his mind. He could never forget her, or what he did to her. He heard someone say one day that you could never get over your first love. He wasn’t sure whether it was because he could never get over her, or over what he did to her, but he didn’t think he could ever forget her.

“Well.” Bronn patted his shoulder. Tyrion turned to look at him. The sellsword looked about to say something, but nothing came out, except a few words. “Have a good night, my friend.”

He walked out, leaving Tyrion alone in his tent. After musing about everything that happened this evening, he decided that he should stop playing at this game he invented. Everything he did came back to bite him sooner or later.

Tyrion sighed and shook his head, trying to chase the feelings and the thoughts out of his mind. Sansa was the only woman who mattered now. She was alive, she was his wife according to all the laws of gods and men, they had a child and they would certainly have others in the coming years. And she loved him, which was more than he could tell about the first woman he married. He went to bed with these thoughts in mind, trying to think about the future rather than the past.

In the morning, Tyrion noticed that Pod was more silent than usual when he brought him his breakfast. Pod usually talked little, but this time was worse than ever. He didn’t even care to say my lord, only nodding when Tyrion thanked him. Did he have a low opinion of him now that he knew his lord was in love with another woman than his wife? Tyrion wasn’t sure how Podrick could think poorly of him because of that. His squire never had a bad opinion of him when Tyrion was married with Sansa and kept Shae close to him at the same time. Did his squire’s view change with time?

As Pod helped him to saddle up, Tyrion had the impression that he was more careful than usual, if it could be possible. He found the young man’s actions quite strange.

“Is there something wrong today, Pod?” he directly asked him.

“No, my lord. Nothing, my lord,” he quickly replied.

“If you say so, Pod.”

His squire began to prepare his own horse, and Tyrion waited, sitting on the saddle that was designed for him a long time ago. He carried it with him wherever he went. If he used a normal one, he would suffer from serious pains in the back and in his legs. Podrick was adjusting his own saddle when he stopped all his movements.

“My lord, I’m sorry for last night.”

“Sorry about what, Pod?”

“Well… I… I mean, I’m sorry for what I asked you. I… I didn’t know about your first marriage. I didn’t know about Tysha.”

Tyrion looked intensively at his squire. “How do you know that? What do you know?”

His squire looked ashamed, but Tyrion barely noticed it. He was fuming against the former sellsword.

“I’m sorry, my lord. I didn’t know. I shouldn’t have asked.”

“Don’t feel sorry, Pod. As you said, you didn’t know.”

“How… How did she look like?”

Tyrion sighed. “To be honest, Pod, I can barely remember her. Anyway, she was only a lie, a whore that my brother hired for me.”

“Why do you still love her, then?”

“I don’t know, Pod. I guess we don’t choose who we love. My brother and my sister know something about it. Get yourself ready now, Podrick. I want to be at Winterfell before the day ends.”

He was more eager than ever to see Sansa and Joanna, and to leave behind any thought he could have about Tysha. Podrick resumed his preparations. He was getting much better now. He had fought well against the dead at the Wall, even though they opposed a weak resistance after the explosion of wildfire. Podrick didn’t have the chance to truly prove his valor before, and Tyrion regretted he had to do it against an army of dead. Pod deserved better than this. He promised himself again to not forget to knight him after the war.

The storm hadn’t calmed down during the night. Tyrion had been too troubled with his thoughts to worry about it, but now he couldn’t ignore the wind and snow that constantly slapped his face. All men were tightly wrapped into what heavy cloaks they could find. Winter was definitely no time for campaign. You could easily lose more men to weather than to any actual fighting.

They slowly progressed through the snow, their vision limited to about a hundred feet ahead of them. Tyrion looked at his left and saw Bronn.

“How much time before we reach Winterfell?” he asked him.

“With this snow? I’d say between an hour and two, probably closer to two. We would already be there without it,” the knight answered.

Tyrion cursed. “I hate it when the Starks are right.” Bronn laughed. Tyrion shot him a glance. “I don’t remember giving you the permission to tell everyone about my failed marriage.”

Brron’s face turned more serious. “The lad deserved to know. He’s your squire. And he’ll never talk about it to anybody. You can be sure of that.”

“It seems I cannot be sure about you like I can be with him.”

“Relax, halfman. I told no one else.”

“I wish I could be sure. The word of a sellsword is not worth much,” Tyrion shot back.

Somehow, Bronn seemed wounded. Tyrion absurdly felt guilty about what he just said. “Right, a sellsword’s word is not worth much. But I know that if something like that happened to me, I wouldn’t want someone else to know.”

“What is that? Empathy coming from a sellsword?”

“Former sellsword. And yeah, you can call it empathy, or sympathy, depending on what you fancy.” Bronn looked at him with a sincerity Tyrion seldom witnessed. “Look, I only thought the lad deserved to know it. He served you well enough for years, and considering the kind of master you are, that’s a feat. I told him all the details, but he was the only one I ever told about it.”

“You really kept it a secret?”

“Aye.”

“Why?”

“Because we’re friends.” Somehow, Tyrion felt touched, in an awkward sort of way. “And because you would have made me lost much more than anything someone might have given me in return if I ever talked about it. Especially after your father died.” That was more like the friend he knew.

“You were an evil bastard with no conscience and no heart, you know Bronn,” Tyrion quipped.

“Sorry about that,” the knight of Blackwater replied with a smirk that wasn’t so innocent.

“That’s what I liked about you in the first place, but perhaps it’s no longer the case.”
“You don’t like it anymore?”

“No. Only, I’m no longer sure if you’re really this evil bastard with no conscience and no heart.”

A troubled silence followed.

“Perhaps that’s what happens when you get mar…”

Bronn never finished his sentence because an arrow got through his head. Before Tyrion could wonder what was going on, his horse reared up. He couldn’t hold the reins tight enough and heavily fell in the snow, face first. When he looked up, he saw the chaos around him. Many horses were out of control, and he saw more than one man with arrows thrusted into their body. A second volley came upon them, and Tyrion yelled in pain when he felt something dig deep into his right leg.

When he tried to look at his leg, his eyes fell upon the man he met in the Riverlands so long ago, who gave him his room for a golden dragon. The smirk was gone, and the arrow pierced his head from the left temple to the right cheek. His face and eyes seemed frozen in surprise.

“My lord, my lord.”

He heard someone shout his name. This someone made him roll on his back. Tyrion roared in pain immediately. “My lord.” He saw Podrick’s face looming over him, worried, his hands shaking. His hands moved to his chest and Tyrion felt another stab of intense pain when his squire tried to pull something. It was then that Tyrion realized that not only he received an arrow in the leg, but also in the chest. There was a third one in the arm. As he became conscious of them, he also became conscious of the pain their presence caused.

“My lord, hold on. We’ll bring you somewhere…”

Podrick stopped in the middle of his sentence. Despite the agonizing pain, Tyrion found the force to turn on himself and look in the same direction than his squire. He saw what caused him to stop speaking.

A large line of men on horses rode towards them, swords and spears drawn, ready for battle. One had a banner. It was blue, but Tyrion couldn’t make it in more details. Before he could understand it, the knights were upon them.

Everything became a bloody chaos. By chance, whoever attacked them was stopped by the line of defense that Tyrion’s men organized. He tried to stand up, to help his men. He couldn’t let them fight alone. They would be more eager to fight if their lord stood at their side. His thoughts of joining the fray were cut short when a new wave of pain filled his entire body as soon as he tried to put a knee on the ground. He miserably fell back.

Through the pain and the noise of the battle, he couldn’t make out much of what was going on around him. He even thought he saw a man in red armor stab another wearing the same colors. He got another glimpse of the blue banner, and saw something that looked like a bird on it.

Someone lifted him up by the arms. Tyrion screamed through the horrible pain again. He was placed on a horse. He felt a shock behind him, and the horse rushed forward. He struggled to grip the saddle and remain on the animal.

He managed to look behind him. “NO!”

The mere scream he released hurt like hell, but not as much as what he saw. A spear was thrust into his heart the moment Tyrion looked back, and he felt the spear was impaling him as well. Podrick
Payne fell on his knees, grabbing the lance that pierced his chest from behind. He looked up, and their eyes met for a brief moment before the most loyal lad he had ever known fell on the ground to never stand again.

Tyrion faintly noticed the fights taking place all around him as his mount kept riding, blue against red, but also red against red. What was going on? The fighting finally disappeared, and all he could see around him was snow again, like it had been all day. He felt the pain in his chest with more accuracy. He coughed repeatedly. When he tried to look at his injury, he slipped from his mount and fell head first into the snow for the second time within a few minutes.

He turned his head a little, to see anything that could be on his left. The right side of his face remained buried. He continued to cough. Carefully, he tried to touch the place where the arrow touched him in the chest. The shaft was broken, and he thought he buried the heads of every of the three arrows deeper into his flesh when he fell. He couldn’t look at his belly, but from the information his fingers provided, it didn’t seem to have touched the heart. However, he thought it might be close to a lung.

He tried to crawl, but the first attempt ended with another cry of pain. He tried a second time, then a third, then a fourth, barely managing to advance a few inches. He felt half of his face slowly freezing, and the pain kept growing. He stopped for a moment, and the pain didn’t subsidize in any way. If anything, it seemed worse than ever. It was a constant, lingering pain, to the opposite of the sudden stabs he had before, but he didn’t feel like he could endure another stab that caused a pain thrice the one he had right now, even if it helped to ease the lingering one for a few precious seconds.

_Sansa._ No, he couldn’t die. There was someone waiting for him. Someone he loved. He did horrible things for her. He couldn’t die now, not this way, not far away from her. He needed to get back to her, and to their daughter. _Joanna._ He didn’t have time to know his daughter. He didn’t have the time to know what it was to be a father. He had to go back to them. The thousands of people he killed at Castle Black, the reason why he fought the dead instead of running away to Casterly Rock, or sailing away to another continent or a deserted island, it was for them.

He tasted something strange in his mouth. Something thick. There had only been one other time when he felt this. It was at the Battle of Blackwater, when Ser Mandon Moore nearly cut his head in half. It was coming again.

No, he couldn’t die, not here. He made another attempt to crawl, and ended lying on his back instead, looking at the white sky. Blood was coming in quantity in his mouth. He struggled to breathe. He began to feel the pain receding. He knew what that meant. His vision began to darken. He couldn’t see the outline anymore. He had more and more difficulty to breathe. Tears ran down his cheeks as he struggled to say one word. A word that meant everything for him.

He couldn’t feel his hands, or his legs. He didn’t feel cold anymore, or warm for that matter. He felt less and less, and seconds swept away. The image of a beautiful woman with red hair and blue eyes who changed his life appeared before him, along with that of a pretty little baby who had his eyes and the hair of his family. Tears streamed on his face as he realized he would never see them again. He was close. So close. Only a few miles away. He only wanted to see them again. That was all he wanted.

His vision suddenly turned much darker. A large shadow covered him and he felt a great force tenderly gripping his body. Although he couldn’t see anything now, he felt himself being lifted in the air. He could hear and feel the wind all around. That was the last thing he felt. The wind all around him, as he was carried away from the ground and up into the sky. His last thought was about a kiss. The first kiss he gave to the woman he loved. The kiss he gave her when he stood before the altar and said his vows. I am hers, and she is mine. From this day until the end of my days. That was the last thing that came to his mind.

Chapter End Notes

I can already see the bad comments coming into my direction, but before you smash me like many people did when I initially killed Margaery, I invite you to read the three next chapters I am uploading with this one. Don't judge me before you've read all of them.

Next chapter : Arya
As she sharpened her sword with a whetstone, Arya looked through the flap of her tent and saw that the storm that raged for weeks wasn’t about to calm down. Before the Fall happened, like everyone had come to call the destruction of a section of the Wall, she had lived in one of the buildings of Castle Black, but now that most of its construction was destroyed, she had to live in one of the tents in the camps nearby.

Jon positioned camps so they could make a semicircle around what once was Castle Black and repel the White Walkers if they managed to get through the first line of defense. The said first line was made of fortifications hastily made along the section of the Wall that fell last month, and of other fortifications and defensive positions installed over the Wall near the opening.

The first line was a rigid defense, focusing many resources on a single point and that couldn’t allow a breach. If the line was breached, the whole defense system would crumble. The second line was more flexible, made for the defenders to move from one point to another. The fortifications of this second line were not made to repel the attackers as much as to allow time for the men behind the lines to gather where the fight was the thickest. So far, the first line always held and they didn’t have to use the second line, but Jon did everything so that all men were ready whenever the situation would require. No less than ten thousand men were now positioned near Castle Black, an army similar in numbers to that of Stannis Baratheon when he came to the Wall, according to Jon. Her brother said that it was this army that destroyed Mance Rayder and his troops, but although he tried to sound optimistic, Arya could perceive he wasn’t sure this would be enough to repel an attack from the White Walkers.

The atmosphere in the camp was gloomy, to say the least. Men were depressed, some were desperate after so much time in campaign far from their home. The lack of activity caused by the storm that raged made things worse. Arya could suffer all the ordeals, from hunger to cold to thirst, but inactivity was killing her. Men didn’t want to train in this storm, and the officers didn’t want to force them to. The situation was particularly painful for men from the Vale, the Riverlands and the Westerlands. The Northerners fared little better, and even the wildlings said it was a real challenge to live in these conditions. Sylvie, who Arya befriended, said that there was no chance for her to shoot a rabbit, even if they dared to get out of their lairs. Without the possibility to hunt, she spent most of her days with Gared Tuttle, the black brother who brought her back with him from the North. Gared’s mood, that was already dark and gloomy most of the time, had gone even worse since Asher Forrester died. Sylvie did her best to console him, but this seemed to be a very hard task. Arya would rather hunt for her survival than console an inconsolable friend or brother as well.

She stopped to whet her sword and looked at the blade. There wasn’t a single scratch, a single trace of blood to be seen. With all the time they were stuck in their tents, she had everything she needed to perfect the art of making her sword shine like silver. She sheathed it, satisfied with her work and quite certain she couldn’t make her sword sharper than it actually was. Not that it would make much difference, since the sword she used couldn’t kill a wight, let alone a White Walker. Jon’s sword, Longclaw, could, and there were about five swords in their entire army that could destroy a White Walker because they were in Valyrian steel, but that was all. The men had to rely on fire to kill wights, and if a White Walker came to them, they could only try to hold him off the time that Jon Arya sighed. She was bored to death. Men were also complaining that they might die of boredom if the White Walkers didn’t kill them first. They had attacked every day for the week they just went through, and the first line was able to stop them. The men had thought this would make things more exciting all of a sudden, but only those on the first line had to fight. The second line was only to be ready for everything, and for an entire week, men had to stay ready, in arms, in case the enemy would break through the first defenses. They didn’t, and men were bored and restless again at the fourth day. The moral of the army was very low. Arya had told Jon more than once, and he worried about this, but he said there was little he could do. Arya had argued there was certainly something they could do, but she had to admit that she didn’t have any solution in mind.

She stood up and walked out in the storm. She didn’t need to put anything. She was always fully clothed, with gloves, boots, mantles and everything. She also carried her weapons everywhere. Everyone had to be fully armed in every occasion. Men almost slept with their weapons on Jon’s order. Not all of them obeyed the order, though those who happened to be on the first line during the last week took the order more seriously. Arya left huge footprints in the snow as she made her way to Jon’s command tent. It was at the center of the second line of defense. She found her brother alone, sitting at his desk, wearing the furs Sansa prepared for him before he left Winterfell, after she accepted him as King in the North. He looked very much like their father with this. She struggled to believe that he was the son of Rhaegar Targaryen. Her brother was the living image of Lord Eddard Stark. Bran himself told her that Jon looked very much like their father at the same age.

Jon made a tired smile when she came in. She took some comfort in the fire nearby, but didn’t remove any of her clothes. It wouldn’t be wise, since they could be called somewhere at any moment. After the Fall, she knew that White Walkers were not to be taken lightly.

“How are you, Jon?” she asked.

“I’m fine.” He was lying, but she decided to not point it out. It was useless to tell him that she knew he was lying.

“Something new?”

“Not much. Preparing for the next assault of the Night King, I suppose.”

Arya caught his eye wandering to a certain point on his desk. There was a scroll at this place, and she noticed a half of the broken seal on it. A tail and large wings were visible. She suspected the other half would show three heads.

“You received a message from Daenerys Targaryen?”

Jon looked down, and sighed when he answered. “Aye. It came last night.”

“What does she say?”

“She’s coming. She’s bringing with her most of her forces. She says she intends to defeat the White Walkers and to protect the Seven Kingdoms from them.”

“And?” Arya knew her brother well. He wasn’t telling her everything.

“She also says that she expects me to bend the knee when we meet.”

“And you’re going to do it?”

“I don’t think you should.”

“I have no other choice, Arya. We don’t have the men to fight her. In her message, she specifies that the Westerlands and the Riverlands already surrendered, and this is only a matter of time before the Vale swears fealty to her as well. She has more men, she has dragons, and we have an army of dead men closing on us. We don’t have the means to fight her.”

“What if she’s like the Mad King?”

“I don’t know. I hope she’s not. So far, it seems she was merciful with the Tullys and with the Lannisters as well. And once I’ve taken the black, I will be no threat to her. Look, I know you disapprove,” he said before she could say anything, “but my decision is taken, and I won’t come back on it. It’s over. Westeros will be ruled by the dragons once again, and there’s nothing we can do about it. I must do like Torrhen Stark. He didn’t kneel before Aegon because he wanted to do it, or because he liked to do it. He did it because he had to.”

“What if you didn’t have to?” she asked.

He smiled sadly. “I have to. There’s no reason to imagine how things could be. We must make with our lot in life and acknowledge hard truths. A friend of mine told it to me one day.”

A squire walked in at this moment and laid a plate before Jon. Some stew and bread and ale, nothing more. Her brother ate the same thing than his men, to the opposite of many lords, including Sansa’s husband.

“Bring something for my sister as well,” he said.

“Yes, your Grace.”

He didn’t start to eat immediately. He waited. “Are you sure we need Daenerys to kill the Night King?” she asked.

“I think we do.”

“The last assaults were small. The Night King seems to remain quiet. What if we destroyed most of his armies?”

“I highly doubt it, Arya. I saw how many men he turned at Hardhome. And with all the others he turned, his army is certainly far over a hundred thousand men.”

“Then why doesn’t he attack us with his full strength now?”

“I don’t know.” Jon opened his hands to emphasize his meaning.

“What if the Night King is not such a serious threat and that we can defeat him ourselves, without help?”

“And what if we can’t?”

“What if we can?” Arya insisted.

Jon sighed. “Even then, we wouldn’t have enough men to fight Daenerys. The other kingdoms are giving up on us, Arya, and we lost too many men in the last war. Our wars against Joffrey, against Balon Greyjoy, against Ramsay, they weakened us. The Night’s Watch itself is on the verge of disappearing. Even if I marched south with all our men right now, we couldn’t hope to defeat Daenerys, unless someone arrives with a miracle weapon that can kill dragons.”

Arya sighed. “Perhaps if Uncle Edmure and Lord Tyrion didn’t abandon us, we would still have a chance.”

“It’s difficult to keep fighting when the outcome of the battle is to be burned by dragonfire. Not all men are that courageous, Arya. They’re not ready to die for a cause that is bound to fail.”

“They proclaimed you their king,” she protested.

“Aye, but I won’t be their king for long now. All the noble houses are aware of my plans now. I wrote to every house in the North to tell them that I would take the black once the war was over. There’s nothing more to say.”

The squire came back with a plate of food similar to the one Jon had. They began to eat in silence. Arya didn’t need much time to end her own plate. She was used to eat quickly after years of wandering, and they had fewer time than ever to waste.

“I thought the Imp would support you against Daenerys. I began to like him, truth be told, and he wasn’t as boring or galling as those knights Sansa swooned after.”

“Certainly not.” Jon allowed a smile to crept on his face. Arya saw him smile less and less every day. “In truth, he suggested that I could marry Daenerys.”

Arya’s eyes grew out of the surprise. “Marry her!”

“Aye. Because among the Targaryens, it is deemed acceptable that an aunt marries her nephew.” Arya found it disgusting, and Jon as well. “Well, my aunt has already found herself a husband, anyway.”

Indeed, Trystane Martell, the son of Doran Martell, the Prince of Dorne and Lord of Sunspear, was betrothed to Daenerys Targaryen now. Despite the winter, news could travel fast, especially when they concerned a queen’s marriage.

“I think Tyrion thought he did for the best when he told his family to surrender. The Lannisters and the Gardeners were defeated by the Targaryens three hundred years ago, and they had a much larger army than Aegon. Tyrion’s choices can be questionable, but I think he’s really trying to do the right thing,” Jon said. “He wouldn’t have brought his army this far in the middle of winter if he didn’t, or risk so much to save you and free Winterfell from the Boltons. And he truly loves Sansa. I can see it in his eyes.”

Arya nodded. She wasn’t very good with feelings, but she knew her sister, and she had to admit that Sansa seemed to be sincerely in love with her husband just like he loved her. At least, he was funny. However, with the explosion of wildfire he caused, she didn’t know any longer what to think of him.

“Do you think he did the right thing with the wildfire, Jon?” she asked.

Jon sighed. “He thought that it was the lesser evil, between killing two thousand men or allowing the White Walkers to get past the Wall, but… Still, two thousand men, buried under the snow, burned alive.”

“His men tried to save those who were still alive afterwards,” she pointed out, but not with all the conviction in the world.
She saw the Imp after the explosion, ordering his men to search the debris and take out any man who was still alive. They managed to pull out more than two hundred who miraculously survived the blast. And there was also something she recalled, two days after the catastrophe. He was looking at the charred remains of Castle Black, all alone. He didn’t notice her presence, and she heard him whisper. What have I done?

Arya was ready to do everything necessary to protect her family and to avenge them, but she didn’t believe in killing innocents on the way. The men who died at Castle Black were all fighting with them. Many were Northerners. At the same time, she was there when the White Walkers overwhelmed them. She surprised an argument between Tyrion Lannister and a northern lord one day, who accused him of massively murdering his men. The Imp replied, if it wasn’t for what I did, you would be dead, the people living on your lands would be dead, and your king would be dead.

It was true. When Tyrion Lannister blew up Castle Black, he probably saved her and Jon. He said that he promised Sansa to keep an eye on her. Arya couldn’t really imagine someone of her family going so far to protect her or Jon, but the objective and the results were the same. Her father, her mother and Robb died trying to do the things honorably, by taking stupid decisions that led to their death. On that, she agreed with Sansa. Sometimes, you had to do what was necessary to reach your objectives. Still, seeing how many people died…

“I know that Tyrion is not his father,” Jon said. “He’s not Tywin Lannister. He protected Sansa in King’s Landing, he helped us to get rid of the Boltons, he keeps helping us against the White Walkers as we speak, even after Casterly Rock surrendered to Daenerys, but I can’t approve what he did. Though…”

“Aye?” Jon was holding back something.

“Arya, during the war, Robb sent two thousand men at the Green Fork to fight Lord Tywin’s army. He knew they were going to be butchered, but he did it all the same. He chose to sacrifice two thousand men, because he thought that would allow him to save you, to save Father, and to save Sansa. If what Robb did was right… Then, how can I say that Tyrion’s choice was a crime?”

Arya didn’t know what to answer to that. However, there was one thing she was certain of. “We’ll need to be ready to do anything necessary to defeat the dead, Jon. We both saw them. We know what they’re capable of.”

“Aye.” Her brother didn’t seem that convinced.

He wasn’t done eating to the opposite of her. He read scrolls and looked at maps while he picked a piece of bread, took a sip of ale or a spoon of stew from time to time. Arya was no strategist, but she could recognize the lines of the camps and the defenses. There was also a larger map on the table nearby, with chips indicating how many men they had in every castle in the North. Winterfell was the one with the fewer men, most having left with Lord Tyrion when he came to the Wall. One small piece with a lion was showing a small detachment approaching Winterfell by the Kingsroad. Arya wasn’t sure if it was a good thing to leave their home with so few defenders.

She told Jon a few stories about what was going on in the camp. He knew a few of them since he tried to spend time with his men, but he couldn’t spend as much time as she could. Soldiers had come to accept her after she fought side by side with them, and after they saw how dangerous she was with a sword. The wildlings had no trouble with her since women fought among them. A few Northerners accepted her quicker as well. The last were the southerners. She knew everything that happened in the camp, and so she informed Jon while trying to cheer him up a little by telling him the few funny things that happened. There weren’t many lately.
A man bearing the sigil of House Lefford entered in hurry. “Your Grace, another attack.”

Immediately, Jon grabbed what he needed and followed the soldier. Arya followed suit, without them asking her and without her asking their permission. They were at what was left of Castle Black in no time. The ruins weren’t much better than last month. Jon originally planned to have the fortress rebuilt, but the storm and the recent attacks from the wights put a stop to his project. Castle Black’s ruins now mostly served as a source of salvage materials, mostly wood to be burned and to warm up men day and night.

The defenses on the breach were much better than before. They even managed to build towers for archers, though the strong winds sometimes threatened to bring them down, if not to tear them apart. A large troop was ready to stop the wights if they managed to get through the barricade they erected to block the large entrance that horn created weeks ago. They had torches that were lit for every two men, and other sources of fire everywhere around. Three lines of archers were ready to rain fire on the enemy behind the barricade, and there were two more lines on the barricade itself, along with a line of swordsmen. They also freed and organized spaces in the ancients buildings so that archers could fire from the windows if the enemy was to get through the Wall. That didn’t consider the armada of catapults, trebuchets, scorpions, ballistas, onagers, and archers on the top of the Wall. Their defensive position couldn’t be stronger. Well, it could be if the Wall was still entirely standing up, but the horn ruined everything.

Jon went to the barricade. All men were ready, the swordsmen with their swords in hand, the archers with their bow out and an arrow ready to be shot at anytime, directed towards the north. However, none shot. There was no action, no sign of battle yet. Arya found it odd. She kept following Jon.

“Your Grace.” Lord Ryman Sarwyck commanded the defenses today. He bowed before Jon when he arrived.

“Lord Sarwyck. What’s going on? I was told there was an assault.”

“We thought so as well, your Grace, but I don’t know what this means. We have one of these creatures that can’t be destroyed. It’s standing right there, away from our range, and it keeps observing us.”

Jon looked at the north, and Arya peeked to see what was before them this time. Indeed, there was a sole White Walker. It stood there, unmoving, but Arya had the distinct certitude that he was watching them. Perhaps he was only gathering information. Arrows, even afire, couldn’t destroy a White Walker. Maybe boulders or heavier projectiles could have an effect on him if they were afire, but they never tried. Arya wasn’t sure if their siege engines on the top could reach this target.

“The Night King.” Jon’s voice sounded afraid. “I saw him at Hardhome. He raised his hands as we were floating back to the ships. And they all stood up at once. Tens of thousands of them. The biggest army in the world.”

Arya looked again at the thing Jon called the Night King. She couldn’t distinguish much about him from this distance. He looked like the other White Walkers from there. Why was he there, all alone? Perhaps his whole army was destroyed. Perhaps they managed to destroy all the wights. After all, with all the times they pushed them back and the many wights that burned when Tyrion Lannister set his trap, there may not be many men left to this Night King.

All of a sudden, he did something strange. It seemed as if he was… kneeling. Was she dreaming? Did the Night King come to surrender? Did he come to bend the knee? Something told her it wasn’t the case.
From over the crenellations, Arya caught glimpse of something on the ground. She saw the snow moving in a strange way. It wasn’t the wind that made it move like that. And then she almost lost her balance. Some of the men around her didn’t manage to stay on their feet. The next moment, a part of the barricade collapsed.

“Retreat! Leave the barricade now!” Jon shouted.

She felt him grabbing her hand. The people around them took some time to react to Jon’s directive. He and Arya had almost left the barricade when they began to move.

“Keep running!”

Jon released her hand and turned north. Arya stopped running. “What’s going on?”

Before Jon could reply, a thunderous crack was heard. Arya remembered a similar noise. Without thinking, she grabbed her brother’s arm like he did a few seconds ago and forced him to run toward the south. They ran as quickly as they could and only stopped when the crashing sound was gone. When they looked behind them, toward the north, they saw something they already saw not long ago.

Two pans of the Wall had fallen. The sides of the breach had collapsed, burying the barricade, its many defenses and many of its defenders under snow, ice and rock. Another wave made the ground shake, and Arya witnessed for the first time with her own eyes a part of the Wall crumbling. New pans fell, increasing the length of the breach. Arya witnessed a trebuchet falling. She noticed no less than a dozen men following it to their graves. A few buildings they managed to free from the Fall disappeared for the second time.

She felt two strong arms seizing her shoulders. Jon’s grey eyes looked into hers. “Arya, you must leave. Go back to Winterfell.”

Her eyes grew. “What?”

“You heard me. Go back to Winterfell.”

“I’m not leaving you!”

Another wave of shaking hit them. Jon stood up and shouted to his men. “Retreat! To the second line. Come!”

The last word was for her. They ran away from the Wall. They probably felt three or four more earthquakes on their way back to the many camps that surrounded Castle Black from the south. Once they were safe in one of the camps, if they could call it safe, Jon gave orders to his men. He ordered some to prepare to fight, others to pack everything necessary and to ride south, some to the Last Hearth, others to Karhold, Queenscrown, the Dreadfort, Winterfell and many other strongholds. Last, he turned to her.

“You have to go back to Winterfell.”

She refused. “I won’t. I’m staying here to fight with you.”

“You don’t understand, Arya. The Wall is down. It’s really down this time.” Arya saw from the corner of her eyes that the storm was getting stronger. She heard a voice shout Wights! “You’re faster than anyone I know. You must go to Winterfell and warn them. Find Tyrion and Sansa and Bran. Tell them what happened. Tell them to prepare for a siege. Tell them to do whatever is necessary to survive.” Jon looked behind him. Arya saw a large group of wights coming on them from over the delimitations of the camp. There were many. Too many. And they didn’t have wildfire to save them this time.

“Go!”

Jon pushed her away and drew his sword, preparing himself for battle. Arya wanted to follow him, to fight the enemy, but she felt it wasn’t the right thing to do. The Hound knocked her out at the Twins, for she would have died if she went inside the castle. Jon told her to warn Sansa and Bran, their brother and their sister. She recalled her father telling her that they had to look after one another. She recalled him telling her that Sansa was her sister, and that she had to protect her. She also had to protect Bran. Jon could protect himself. She looked at him leading men into battle, sword in hand. Neither Bran or Sansa could do the same. She was the only one aside from Jon who could fight with a sword. If she died with Jon today, they would have no one to protect them.

She shot a last look at her brother. He would get out of it. He survived too many things, he even came back from the dead. He would live. She ran away to her horse, saddled it, and rode south as quickly as she could. She shot a glance behind her to watch the armies of four kingdoms fighting the dead. From this distance, she couldn’t see her brother anymore. She kept riding south until the camps and the Wall were no longer visible.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter was intended to focus more on Arya's thoughts, but I finally opted for a chapter centered around the main event that happened in it.

Daenerys IX

Daenerys in the Neck. Let's see how she fares when compared to Tyrion and Sansa.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

DAENERYS IX

Viserys used to tell her that Targaryens couldn't get sick. As far as she could remember, Daenerys was never sick, so despite her brother's stupidity, she considered that he could be right. After all, she could resist to fire, so why not disease? However, she was sure of one thing, she wasn't immunized to hunger, or to cold. Hunger wasn't a problem for the time being. As the queen, Daenerys got the best food that was served in the army, and she had plenty of it. If it came to the time when they would need to ration, she didn't expect much problem since she was used to starve when she was a child. Cold, on the other hand, was something she wasn't used to. Climate in Essos was much warmer, winter was little felt there, and she was seven when the long summer began, so she could barely remember anything from the last winter.

She wouldn't forget the cold of a Westerosi winter anytime soon. She arrived in the Stormlands at the very beginning of winter, then moved south to Oldtown. The weather was very clement down there, but after that she moved south through the Crownlands, the Riverlands, and now the North. Snowflakes fell there and there. She experienced her first snowfall not long after they left Riverrun. In the Neck, the temperature was a little higher, but her guides told her that past Moat Cailin, the weather would get harsher and colder very quickly. The Dothrakis were strong warriors, and some had gone so far north in Essos through the centuries that their people knew about the existence of snow, but very few of those who followed her actually faced it in their life. The members of the Fiery Hand didn't fare better than the soldiers from the southern kingdoms. The few men that Edmure Tully provided before her departure and those from the Westerlands supported the weather better. She made the right choice by leaving the men of Dorne back in King’s Landing and a part of the Reach’s troops to secure the southern kingdoms.

The army she was leading along the Kingsroad through the swamps of the Neck was a patchwork of people coming from various places, as it was the very moment she set foot on the soil of Westeros. The greatest part of her army was made of Dothrakis, about forty thousand men ready to fight at her signal. The Reach was the second largest part, with thirty thousand men. The Crownlands gave her five thousand men, many whom fought at the Battle of King’s Landing. The Riverlands provided the same number, and Ser Daven Lannister had about two thousand men who survived the Ambush at the Crossroad against the Vale of Arryn. Finally, there was the Fiery Hand, about five hundred people. Eighty thousand men marching north to fight the greatest threat in their existence.

She could reach Winterfell within days if she wanted with Drogon, but she couldn’t bring her whole army with her. Her military advisors told her that Moat Cailin was impossible to take from the south. Ser Gerold Hightower, who took part to the siege led by the Lannisters months ago, described all the hardships and difficulties he faced while they besieged the castle, their failed assaults, and how they needed a double attack from both the north and the south to take the fortress. Of course, the Lannisters and their allies didn’t have dragons like Daenerys, but her dragons had to be present at Moat Cailin to take it, or else her army wouldn’t get past the Neck. They already had several casualties due to the northern climate and the winter.

They slowly progressed along the road. The Dothrakis traveled lightly and quickly thanks to their limited luggage and their lifelong experience on horseback. They wore extra clothes due to the rough climate, something they weren’t used to. They were eager to fight, and growing tense. The battles they had so far weren’t enough to satisfy their lust for war and blood, especially with the way Daenerys restrained them. They had been able to plunder the Stormlands, though not as much as they would have liked. They also had a real fight with the Ironborn at Oldtown, but no true battle ever since. They were forbidden to plunder the Reach, the Crownlands after Cersei died, and the Riverlands as well for the most part. The faster they reached the army of the dead, the easier it would be to keep them calm. Daenerys didn’t want to see the Dothrakis turn on all the Westerosi because they felt they needed a battle.

“You seem concerned, your Grace,” Kinvara said. The High Priestess was riding with her.

“I am. Who wouldn’t be? We are riding to fight an army of dead people.”

“True. Only fools wouldn’t be afraid.”

“And yet some of your men are not afraid, Kinvara,” Daenerys observed.

“There are fools even among the servants of the Lord of Light,” she replied with a regretful voice. “We cannot expect someone to not be afraid when he is about to fight the servants of the Great Other, the enemy of our Lord. Fear is a normal thing in such cases.”

“I thought you said to your followers to never be afraid.”

“Telling or asking them to not be afraid is something. Ordering or expecting is different.” The High Priestess turned her head to face her. “I must warn you, your Grace. Your advisors are not pleased with my presence, or that of my fellow priests.”

“I know.”

That was another tension in her army that preoccupied her every day. A few brawls were started over religious beliefs. A few men from Westeros in her army began to worship the Lord of Light. The Seven, the Lord of Light and the Great Stallion were in competition. Leading such an army proved to be very difficult. She missed the discipline of the Unsullied and Grey Worm’s presence. The Unsullied didn’t quarrel, and usually they helped to solve the quarrels, but right now they were taking care of the Vale. She couldn’t rely on them in the North. She could only rely on herself.

“You had to expect such resistance by coming,” Daenerys said.

“I didn’t expect the people of this country to welcome us with open arms,” the priestess conceded. “The New Gods and the Old Gods are well established on this land. That doesn’t mean they are better or closer to the truth than the Lord of Light.”

“I already told you, High Priestess. I will not give favors to your faith over the others.”

“And I’m not asking for it. All that matters for now is to stop the enemy.”

Daenerys could agree on that. Once the war would be over, she could give more time to religious matters and allow the followers of the Lord of Light to do their rituals and ceremonies, just like the followers of the Seven, the Old Gods or the Drowned God, but her priority was to ensure her rule and to save her country from demons with blue eyes. The vision in the flames that Revan showed her still haunted her dreams, and the visions of the future that the Red Priests reported were everything but reassuring. Melisandre didn’t stop saying that the dragons would be vital to this. Daenerys looked up to see Drogon and Rhaegal flying over the army. Viserion was nowhere to be seen. She didn’t see him in days now. She was beginning to worry. He was gone far longer than usual.

At nightfall, their column stopped. She noticed the days were growing shorter. Daenerys didn’t like the fact that their flanks were exposed. The commanders of the Riverlands, the Westerlands and Ser Gerold warned her about the threat the crannogmen could represent. So far, they met no resistance, though according to the Hightower knight, they would have to deal with a strong garrison at Moat Cailin. Two days and they would reach it.

Not long before her supper was brought to her, when they just settled for the night, Daenerys received the visit of Lord Dickon Tarly. Despite his young age, he was more or less the leading commander for the army of the Reach in her army.

“Your Grace.” He bowed and went straight to the point, like he always did. “Your Grace, with your permission, I must bring again to your attention the discomfort of many of my men and my officers about the rituals those red men and women make every night.”

It wasn’t the first time she had this conversation with one of the commanders of the many troops marching with her. “I understand your concerns, Lord Tarly. However, I cannot forbid these rituals.”

“Your Grace, most of my men worship the Seven. They are not comfortable at all with these foreign ways. And if you permit me, I am not either.”

“Your men are free to worship their own gods, Lord Dickon. Everyone in this army is free to worship the gods he wants.”

“Yes, but this is different. My men are used to the Old Gods, even to the Drowned God. They know these gods exist, they are used to it, but this Lord of Light is foreign to them.”

“The fact it is a foreign god changes nothing. Some people in my army choose to follow this god, I will not stop them from doing so. This is their choice, and I respect it. I hope the same from you and your men, unless you’re telling me they are sacrificing people, which is not the case. I made sure and clear that I wouldn’t tolerate that kind of sacrifices.”

The Lord of Horn Hill sighed. “Your Grace, we are on a difficult march to the North, in the thick of winter, against an enemy… Forgive me, but an enemy I still struggle to believe in. We accepted you as our queen, and we will go where you demand, but an army divided by origins and languages is already bad enough. We cannot add to it religious divisions. I do not ask your Grace to forbid the people from worshipping the Lord of Light, or this horse god that the Dothrakis say they revere. I only ask you to refrain these… fanatics. Stop them from conducting these ceremonies around huge fires they make every night.”

“Please forgive me, your Grace, but half of what they say is nonsense or absurdity. They keep talking about a great war, about heroes with names I can hardly utter…”

“Lord Tarly, when I was in Essos, I don’t remember the Most Devout or the septons to have helped me, or the Old Gods or the Drowned God for that matter. The Red Priests did help me. They helped me fight slavery, while the High Septon was crowning kings with no right upon the Iron Throne, or forcing people to walk naked in the streets to atone for their sins. Did you see any septon fight Cersei, or Euron, or any enemy that threatened the Reach?”
“No, your Grace, but…”

“There were Red Priests who fought at Oldtown and at King’s Landing. They fought to make a better world, and so did their soldiers of the Fiery Hand. They risked their lives. No septon risked his life in this war. And before that, the Red Priests helped to fight the slavers in Meereen. I will not forbid them from conducting their rituals because you and your men don’t feel well because of a fire. Or else I may as well forbid you from following your own ceremonies because your prayers and your incenses bother them. If you are to follow your own gods, you’ll have to accept they are following their own.”

“I am only concerned with the unity of the army, your Grace,” Lord Tarly said.

“Your concerns are noted, and I will make sure that everyone can follow their faith freely, without any trouble from the others. This is valid for the people who follow the Seven as much as for those who follow the Lord of Light. Unity will not be achieved by imposing religious beliefs or by stopping people from practicing their faith. This is my decision.”

“As you wish, your Grace.” Lord Tarly obviously didn’t agree, but he didn’t insist further. He left with a bow and Daenerys was alone in her tent.

The place the Red Priests occupied as her advisors didn’t escape anyone’s notice, and everyone who was Westerosi disapproved the fact that Daenerys was listening to their advice as much as theirs, but Daenerys had found the advices of Kinvara and Revan very useful. Some military men even acknowledged Revan’s skills as a strategist and a tactician. They had much more reserves towards Kinvara.

Truth be told, Daenerys appreciated Kinvara’s advice very much. They shared the same will to make things better for the people. The High Priestess didn’t come from the nobility, from what Daenerys could judge, but that didn’t make her an incompetent. When she had to discuss about matters concerning the people, and not the war or the ruling of the Seven Kingdoms, Kinvara was the best to talk with. She had an obvious disdain for lords and knights, though she showed respect to some of them, including Trystane Martell.

For the time being, things seemed to go well in King’s Landing with the prince ruling the city and the Dornish troops to maintain the peace in its streets. Kinvara may claim that he did his best and that the attack from the masters of Volantis, Yunkai and Astapor was inevitable, Daenerys wasn’t very impressed by the Prince of Dorne so far. He wasn’t incompetent or stupid, she had to give him that. He did manage to conquer the Stormlands rather well, and his advice concerning Jon Snow was sound. At the same time, she wasn’t eager to marry him, no more than she had been to marry Hizdahr zo Loraq. She missed Daario’s presence at her side at night. She didn’t miss his presence in the day, but at night she remembered him, when she was alone in her bed. She wondered how Trystane would be when the time came to consummate their marriage. When she thought about it, she never asked anyone if he had any experience. Surely he had some, if what they said about the customs in Dorne were true.

Right after Daenerys ate her frugal supper, she received the visit of the Red Priestess whose company she enjoyed the less.

“My queen.” Melisandre of Asshai slightly bowed.

“What do you want?” Daenerys asked, a little abrupt.

“I only wonder what are your Grace’s plans concerning Jon Snow.”
“My decision did not change. Jon Snow must bend the knee.”

“What if he doesn’t?” The Red Priestess looked worried.

“Then he will die.”

Melisandre’s eyes were cast down. “I think your destiny and that of Jon Snow are more tied than you would like to admit, your Grace.”

“I have no proof that Jon Snow is my nephew. You claim that you felt in him a power similar to mine, but that is not enough. From what I’ve heard, Jon Snow could be the son of a servant.” Or he may not.

“I don’t think he is.”

“What you think is irrelevant. If Jon Snow lied about his origins, then he must die. I won’t have people running around, claiming that they are of my house.” However, if what people say was true, if she still had a nephew alive, even a bastard, then she hoped that Jon Snow would surrender. She lost her brother long ago. She didn’t want to kill the last member of her family who was still alive.

“Your Grace, the same vision is haunting me all the time. I see ice and fire meeting at Winterfell. Good against evil, life against death, the Night King against Azor Ahai. You will face your greatest challenge in the North, and you will need Jon Snow to face it. I can feel it.”

She wasn’t the only one to feel it. Daenerys had the distinct impression that her conquest of Westeros had been far too easy. She expected something to bite her back, like it did in the Bay of Dragons. Taking Astapor, Yunkai and Meereen had been too easy back then. Ruling these cities had been completely different and far more difficult. Daenerys expected the same here in Westeros. She was a stranger after all. She didn’t see herself as a stranger in this country. It was her homeland. However, many people didn’t think that way. She was a foreign queen, with a foreign army, a foreign religion and foreign advisors.

Still, Daenerys expected her real challenge to be against these White Walkers. She only saw one in the fire, but it was real enough for her to take this threat very seriously, especially with all the messages they received from the North. However, she wasn’t convinced that Jon Snow was essential to this fight.

“I will fight the White Walkers, Melisandre, and I do hope that Jon Snow will help me to fight them, but it will be up to him to decide whether or not bend the knee before his rightful queen. Now leave me. I need some rest.”

The Red Priestess reluctantly bowed and retreated. Daenerys remained alone with her thoughts. At some point, a few hours later, she heard people chanting. She knew who were doing this. The way through the Neck was long and wearisome, yet boring. Nothing happened, and it was always the same landscape of bogs and swarms, no matter where they looked. To change her ideas, Daenerys decided to see the ritual.

A huge fire was lit in the middle of the large camp. Their army was spread all along the Kingsroad and Kinvara, like every night, was conducting a ceremony where her followers prayed to the Lord of Light. From where she stood on a height, Daenerys estimated they were over a thousand, of all cultures. All the Red Priests who followed her army were by the side of their High Priestess. Geralt, the muscled priest with white hair and yellow cat-like eyes, who acted as Kinvara’s bodyguard and followed her everywhere, stood straight next to her. Daenerys knew he hid two swords under his robes. He was as silent as he always was. Daenerys often had the impression when they stood next to each other that Kinvara was the voice of the Lord of Light, while Geralt was his muscles.

Among the other priests standing there, Melisandre stood in retreat. She stared at the fire, the flames reflecting on her red hair. Standing next to her, in retreat as well, Revan stood out from the others with his mask, but also the way he carried himself. His calm and cold attitude, with his two hands clasped behind his back, made everyone weary of him, even military men like Dickon Tarly. Two young priests, both wearing ragged robes that saw better days, one with long black curly hair, the second with brown hair falling on his eyes, were the less noticeable of the group. Daenerys would barely have realized they were here if she didn’t stop to look at every priest. Another, far older, not far from them, attracted more attention thanks to the long white beard that almost reached his waist. A group of three young priests also caught her attention. The one in the middle was a young man with dark hair and eyes that were just as dark. Daenerys even thought that his robes were of a red that was darker than the others. Two women who approximately had the same age stood by him. The one at his left was wearing robes in the same dark shade, and she had black raven hair. The one on his right wore a red which was way brighter than his, which accompanied well her short red hair. Another priest who was as built as Geralt, though older, stood behind him. Finally, two young women, one with short red hair and the other with blond hair that competed with Daenerys’s, completed the college of Red Priests.

Lord of Light, show us the way.

Cast your light upon us.

Protect us from the darkness.

Burn away our sins.

Yours are the stars that guide us.

Kinvara’s voice was carried through, melodious, with a hint of power, though only just enough. Daenerys felt Drogon and Rhaegal land behind her. This prayer made people feel safe, at peace. Daenerys had never truly believed in any god, but listening to Kinvara right now, she could understand why some people took comfort in them, if praying for them could bring such a peaceful state, even if it was only temporary. Kinvara’s words were so sweet that they managed to calm down Daenerys herself.

You are the light that shows us the way in the darkness.

You are the heat that keeps us warm in the cold.

You are the fire that keeps us alive among the dead.

You are the joy we receive among distress.

You are the beauty we see through the ugliness.

You are the passion that drives us when everything is lost.

You are the…

Kinvara stopped herself. Everything turned silent. Only the crackling of the wood devoured by fire could be heard. Daenerys saw nothing that could cause this interruption. She didn’t see it, but she felt it. A few of the Red Priests turned their gaze north, just like Kinvara did. Drogon and Viserion straightened behind her, and she felt his presence long before his screech tore the air.
Viserion, his cream scales reflecting the light of the fire, appeared out of nowhere. People rushed around to stay out of his way and he quietly landed right next to the great fire. The flames barely swayed under the flap of his wings so much it was slow. He came on the ground as if he was afraid that the ground might give way under his feet.

Daenerys was relieved that her third child was back. Viserion was always the kindest and the easiest to approach of her dragons. He had never been gone for so long before. She saw people marvelling at his sight, and she saw a few others standing away in fear. Marvel and fear, two feelings her dragons caused among the people who set eyes on them.

Viserion raised one of his claws and dropped something on the ground, near the fire. It was probably something he brought back from his hunt. Kinvara approached the leftovers Viserion brought and stopped close to it. Melisandre approached as well. She knelt on the ground and moved this thing. Daenerys realized at this moment that this was no ordinary thing. The Red Priestess just turned it over. She stood up immediately after she turned it.

Just as Daenerys proceeded to make her way down the height and through the crowd, she heard a scream shattering the silence. No, not another baby. It couldn’t happen again, not now. People could start blaming her dragons and wanting them dead again, and she didn’t want another father crying over his daughter’s dead body because of her.

She got to the clearing space where Viserion still stood nearby. She felt his gaze on her, but all her attention was on the body lying right before her. It was a small body, that of a child. Her heart was about to sink at the idea of what Viserion did, when she noticed the face. It wasn’t a child’s face. He had a scar running from his forehead to his jaw, and she quickly realized this was no injury made by a dragon.

Chapter Notes

My first Melisandre chapter. I already wrote a few chapters from Kinvara's POV, but unlike the High Priestess, Melisandre cannot be called an original character, and GRRM already did an amazing chapter about her in ADWD. I don't pretend to do as well, even less better than him, but I hope you'll like the first chapter told from a character that is much more complex than what we thought when we first met her in Season 2.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

MELISANDRE I

“You see there, Ser Daven? This is where the arrow that caused the death penetrated.” The maester pointed one of the wounds, the one on the chest. “The head went through the flesh directly, without anything to block it. No chainmail, no armor. It offered no resistance. It pierced the left lung and caused an internal hemorrhage, but more importantly, it filled his lungs and all his respiratory system with blood. He didn’t last more than a few minutes. There are two more arrows that struck him. One was in the left leg.” He indicated the said leg, where another wound was visible. “The third was in the right arm. Again, they went through the flesh without resistance. There was nothing to stop the arrowheads in these places either. From the traces of blood near the wounds, I would say the arrows hit their target approximately at the same time. The scar on the face was probably caused…”

“By the sword of a kingsguard, who is now dead. Thanks, maester, we know where this came from.”

Ser Daven Lannister’s voice was filled with both anger and grief. He was wearing full armor from head to toes, his sword in its scabbard. He couldn’t leave his eyes from the lifeless body laying on the table before him.

“There are a few traces of marks on the back, where the clothes were slightly ripped, probably left by claws. However, they are not deep enough and no trail of blood is visible around it. If there’s no blood, then whether the marks were made before this man died and his body had time to heal and conceal any deep wound, or the marks were left by the dragon after this man was dead, which explains the absence of blood around these areas. In all cases, the dragon can in no way be the cause of the death. I think the most likely explanation is that the victim was killed by arrows, and probably attacked when he didn’t expect it, which explains the lack of armor or any kind of protection. From my observations, it is my opinion that Lord Tyrion Lannister was killed a few days ago in an ambush, or while he was in the midst of a battle he didn’t expect to be a part of.”

The maester was done with his explanations. He had spent two hours examining the body, and he just gave the results to everyone who was present. The queen ordered him to make one after Ser Daven Lannister accused her of having his lord murdered. Daenerys Targaryen and her main advisors, the High Priestess Kinvara, Revan, Malcolm Branfield, Dickon Tarly, Garlan Tyrell, and two Dothraki commanders, Jakho and Morokho, were present. There was also Daven Lannister, cousin to the now deceased lord, and Gerold Hightower, who spent some time with the Lord of Casterly Rock when he traveled north. Finally, there was her, the woman they all called Melisandre, standing in retreat, staring at the lifeless body right in front of her.
The last time she saw him was at Winterfell. Of the three men who stood in the Great Hall, he was the only one to advise against sending her away. He certainly didn’t know it back then, but she knew what he told Jon Snow. In the end, she was exiled all the same. Melisandre wouldn’t have run away from the death if Jon Snow had sentenced her, but he decided to send her away because she saved his life. So she joined the other Red Priests who gathered alongside the Mother of Dragons. The High Priestess didn’t reveal the truth to the queen. Daenerys Targaryen wasn’t aware of how Shireen Baratheon died. From what Melisandre witnessed, she would be dead by now if the truth wasn’t kept a secret. The fact she was still alive gave her a chance to unite ice and fire against the dead, though for now Daenerys Targaryen saw Jon Snow more as a contender than an ally. She was hoping that someone could bring these two together, create an alliance that would destroy the dead, but now that hope was gone. He was laying there, dead.

Melisandre felt that the dwarf had an important role to play in the great war. He had gone in the North to help Jon Snow, made it possible to defeat the Boltons. Without him, her visions about the banners of House Bolton burning on the battlements of Winterfell would never have come true. And while she was travelling back south to meet the Breaker of Chains, she had become more certain than ever that the Imp would play a vital role. Wasn’t he the one who defeated Stannis at the Blackwater, who used fire to defeat the king she once served? She should have considered it a long time ago. And yet, it seemed she was wrong. Tyrion Lannister was dead. Whatever role she believed to foresee for this man, she had been wrong, again. Just like she was wrong for Stannis, wrong for Jon Snow… until the Lord brought him back from the dead.

“Ser Daven,” Malcolm Branfield began, “Lord Tyrion was not killed by the queen. She issued no order, and it is plain that her dragon wasn’t the one to kill him. He was killed by men.”

“I don’t know,” the Mother of Dragons replied in sincerity. “But you have my word that I will do everything I can to discover who did this?”

Daven Lannister looked at her, anger obvious on his face. “Why was your dragon carrying his body?”

“I don’t know.” She didn’t answer immediately. Daenerys Targaryen had the same resolve and will than Stannis, but like her nephew, she showed signs of hesitations and doubts when she had some, however hard she tried to hide them.

The knight stared at her accusingly. “My cousin and lord is dead. Your dragon brought his body to you. If I find out that you had a hand in his death…”

The Dothrakis brought their hand to their arakh at their belt, eager to fight. Dickon Tarly also tensed and put his hand on the pommel of his sword.

“I have nothing to see with Lord Tyrion’s death, Ser Daven,” the queen explained. “As I told you before, I was ready to let him rule the Westerlands for me and to keep Casterly Rock if he bent the knee. I did the same with every lord, lady and knight in the Seven Kingdoms. Why would I treat your cousin differently?”

“Perhaps for the role we played in your father’s downfall, and to satisfy Dorn’e’s desire for revenge. I am no fool, your Grace. Trystane Martell is your betrothed. We know how the Martells despise us.”

“Considering what your family did to the Princess Elia and her children, this is no surprise.”

“Tyrion had nothing to see with that. He was barely a lad when it happened.”
The Breaker of Chains stepped forward to stand right in front of Ser Daven, a few inches from him. The knight was smaller than him, but she didn’t allow herself to be intimidated by this.

“Let me be clear, Ser Daven. I had no love for your cousin. I didn’t know him. He sided with another king, but so did you and the Tullys, and I didn’t have you killed. I’m not saddened by his death, but it makes things much more complicated for me. From what I gather, the Lannisters have most of the troops in the North, and without a lord to command them, they will be disorganized and unable to face the army of the dead. And now that he’s dead, I cannot have his allegiance for all House Lannister.”

The queen and the knight kept staring at each other until Dickon Tarly broke the silence. “Since Tyrion Lannister is dead, who is leading House Lannister now?”

Ser Daven broke his stance and walked away to the other side of the tent, string at the hanging. “My cousin had a daughter not long ago. Her name is Joanna. By all the laws of the Seven Kingdoms, she is now the Lady of Casterly Rock.”

“The girl in question is only a baby, your Grace. She’s not even one-year-old,” the High Priestess informed them.

Melisandre had heard about this girl. She never saw her. Lord Tyrion’s wife, Jon Snow’s cousin, had given birth to a small girl at White Harbor not long before the Boltons were defeated. A girl. Tyrion Lannister had a daughter. Melisandre thought about it. She didn’t consider this fact.

“I don’t hold children responsible for their parents’ crimes. I will acknowledge her as Wardeness of the West if House Lannister bends the knee,” the queen declared. She looked at the Lannister knight. “Your family’s destiny lies in your hands, Ser Daven. What do you decide?”

Daven Lannister stared back at her. “This is not my decision to take.”

“Then whose decision is it?” There was an edge on Daenerys’s voice. “Your lord is dead, his daughter happens to be a baby. She cannot take the decision. She probably can’t speak yet. The decision to bend the knee to me depends on you.”

“It’s not my decision to take!” the knight snapped. “My lord trusted me to lead armies and for military advice, but I wasn’t the one to take decisions in his stead if he was to die. If you want a Lannister to tell you if he bends the knee or not for the whole family, then you didn’t pick the right one.”

“Very well,” the queen conceded rudely. “Tell me who in your family can bend the knee for you all.”

The knight sighed. “I don’t know.” He looked down at the lifeless body of his cousin and lord. “We shouldn’t be talking about it here. Not while his body is here.”

“We don’t have time for this, Ser Daven. You refuse to bend the knee, so be it, but you better give me the name of someone who can, if you don’t want House Lannister to burn to ashes. I won’t hesitate to destroy your home if need be. My ancestors burned Harrenhal, and I will feel no remorse doing the same to Casterly Rock if you show the same behavior than Harren the Black.”

The knight seemed to realize that she was serious, for after a few moments he sighed heavily and reluctantly gave her names. “If you want an oath of fealty, then ask Lady Genna or Lady Sansa. The first was Tyrion’s aunt and he let her in charge of Casterly Rock when he left. As for Sansa, she was his wife and she is the mother of his only child.”
“Genna Frey already surrendered Casterly Rock and the Westerlands. I suppose the Lady Sansa is at Winterfell.”

“Yes, with her daughter, unless your dragon burned the castle before picking up my lord’s body.”

“He didn’t.” She turned toward all the people who stood in the tent. “We will discover who killed Tyrion Lannister, and he or they will be punished accordingly. However, our priority for now remains to reach the North and to defeat the enemy we can’t ignore. We leave at first light in the morning, and if anyone at Moat Cailin resists, we will destroy the fortress. Nothing will stand in our way.”

The people who were present left one by one, but Ser Daven stayed behind. Melisandre was one of the last to leave, casting one last look at the man they called the Imp. Just when the queen was about to leave, Ser Daven asked her something.

“Your Grace, I would like to send my cousin’s body back to Casterly Rock. He deserves to be buried along with his ancestors.”

Daenerys didn’t answer immediately. “Bury your cousin, Ser Daven.” She left.

Melisandre went to the personal tent of the High Priestess. They needed to talk. However, the High Priestess was at the war council of Queen Daenerys, so Melisandre had to wait for the Volantenesi priestess. They were in the thick of the night. It had been three hours at most since the dragon happened with the body as they all prayed to the Lord. Melisandre felt it coming, just like Kinvara did. That was why she stopped her chants.

Melisandre wasn’t sure if she could lead people to the Lord of Light anymore. She had failed with Stannis, misinterpreted the signs that her Lord sent her, misled thousands of people. Perhaps the Lord had wanted it for her, but it didn’t change the fact she failed. How could she preach the faith in the Lord when she wasn’t sure of her faith herself, or when she led people on the wrong path. After so much time, she thought she had the answers, but she was wrong. She needed to discover the real role the Lord prepared for her before she could convert people again. So instead of leading ceremonies around the fire, she only watched them and prayed in silence, leaving the lead to the High Priestess. She did it very well anyway. She could inspire fervor among the followers just like Melisandre used to.

“I thought you would be here.” The High Priestess arrived. “It seems that you were wrong.” The word again was left unsaid, but Melisandre knew that Kinvara meant it.

“Maybe.” Melisandre stared in the flames that burned at the center of the tent. A priest always needed a fire nearby. “I thought I was wrong before as well, when Stannis died. I thought I was wrong about everything. I even lost faith in our Lord. But then, Jon Snow came back to life, and he made the things the Lord showed me become real.” She looked back at the High Priestess. “The Lord brought him back.”

Kinvara looked at her evenly. “No.”

“This might be our only chance,” Melisandre argued.

“No,” the High Priestess repeated. “He is dead. Our Lord tells us to fight for the living so they might find peace in death. Let the dead bury the dead, Melisandre.”

The High Priestess walked past her and poured herself some water. “I thought that Jon Snow was gone, but I was wrong. He wasn’t gone. Our Lord brought him back. What if he could do the same thing with this man?"

“He could. To our Lord, everything is possible. But what’s telling you that he will bring him back? Why would he want to bring a dwarf back to life?”

“And what will we do next? Are we going to beg R’hllo to bring back from the dead every man, woman and child? Every time someone dies, we will ask him to resuscitate him. We will make the reasoning that if we don’t try, these people have no chance to live, but if we do then they will have a chance. That’s not something I will allow, Melisandre. I will not have people begging our Lord to bring back from the dead every people they want. Every man must die. Valar Morghulis. Bringing someone back will only delay the inevitable. The people will start to believe that death is possible to escape, but it is not. We must learn to live with the idea that life is not endless, and this is why we must accept that when somebody is dead, then it is for good.”

“He has a vital role to play in this war.”

“How can you know it?”

She was asking without saying if Melisandre had visions. “I just know it.”

The High Priestess looked into the flames. “I saw him die.” Melisandre didn’t say anything. She wasn’t expecting this. “I had a vision of this, in Meereen, but I didn’t understand its meaning. Now I do. This man was destined to die.”

Melisandre looked down. “That can’t be.”

“It is. That was his fate, and we must accept it.” She felt a hand on her shoulder. Kinvara approached without her noticing it. “That doesn’t mean you were wrong about everything, but we must let it go. We must accept our mistakes.”

The blue eyes of the High Priestess were kinder than she expected. Kinvara despised her when they met, but Melisandre noticed that her behaviour turned softer as time went on. She bowed her head to thank her, and she left. She may have another chance. Tyrion Lannister might not have one.

She reflected that the Neck was a place as particular as the Wall as she proceeded to walk back to her tent. She could feel magic in this place. These marshes didn’t appear naturally. This meant that her powers were stronger in this place, and so were those of all the other priests. It was in these places that they had the best odds to defeat the great enemy.

There was a time when there were no enemies. It was the time before people called her Melisandre. Melony, lot seven. The words haunted her, and especially at night. It was one thing she was very grateful to her Lord. The ability he gave her to not sleep for days, even for weeks, and to remain stronger than any man who had his share of rest allowed her to escape most of her nightmares. Still, the words kept haunting her, but less during the day than in the night.

She chose her path a long time ago, so long ago that no living man could have been there when she made her choice. No living man but one. It all began when he entered the brothel. She never saw him before. He hid his face and didn’t show it to anybody. Later, much later, he would show her his face, but at the time, he said nothing. He just unsheathed his flaming sword and declared all the people here were free. The people who ran the house and their guards were easily defeated. The man was glowing with an energy she never felt in anyone. She already had a certain power at this time. She had the power to feel the power within the others, but she had never felt something like that in any man or woman she came across. This one was different. He was a Red Priest, and he gave her back her freedom.

She thought that he knew, or at least suspected that she was special, for she was among the three girls he brought to the Red Temple. He left her there and disappeared. She didn’t see him for years. First was her training, then her trials, then her ordination. She changed her name, cast aside everything that linked her to her past, and devoted her entire life to the Lord of Light. The only thing that remained from her past were the nightmares. Melony, lot seven.

She could have been High Priestess if she wanted, become the most respected Red Priestess of all time if she wanted, but she turned her full attention to magic and sorts instead. She learned to manipulate, to bring people to do what the Lord wanted, what she thought the Lord wanted. The years of her previous life were useful, as both men and women were vulnerable to her charms. She became feared. She could have been powerful, take revenge upon all those who wronged her. Melony, lot seven. But she didn’t. The Lord called her. He showed her what was coming. So instead, she waited. She isolated herself, hid her face from the rest of the world, buried herself in her studies and her visions. And she waited. She prepared herself for the time when she would need to come back into the world to save it. Only then would she be freed of her nightmares. Melony, lot seven.

When she saw the war that would devastate Westeros, right when the great winter began, she knew the time had come. The Lord didn’t tell her everything or in the most clear way, so she had to discover what he wanted her to do. When she learned that Selyse Baratheon had embraced the faith in her Lord, she thought of it as a sign. Her husband Stannis Baratheon was of the blood of the dragon, born amidst smoke and salt. She thought it was him, but she was wrong. She couldn’t be sure of anything now. Was Jon Snow the Prince that was promised, or was it Daenerys Targaryen? She didn’t know. What she knew was that they had a great role to play in this war. And so she thought about the man that fire made flesh brought to her, dead.

Back to her tent, she found the fire lit like it usually was. She stared at it for a very long time, wishing for answers, asking her Lord to provide some. Time didn’t matter anymore as she focused to discern the truth in the flames. She saw several shapes that were difficult to distinguish. She focused on the matter that troubled her the most: the Great Other. She saw him, at the head of his great army. She didn’t look at him for long. She knew he could see her. She tried to find something related to him.

She saw bodies, a lot of bodies everywhere, some moving, some not. She also saw the living, working, preparing, crying, despairing, fighting. She saw a great storm, and then the great battle. She could never see the outcome, only that there would be one. She saw ice, and blue eyes, and dead men walking, slaughtering the living, destroying the realms of men. And then she saw fire meeting ice, fighting it. Fire and ice were everywhere, on the ground, in the air and even underground. Swords of ice clashed against swords of fire. Fire made flesh met flesh turned to ice.

She asked the Lord where Lightbringer was. He answered her. The answer wasn’t at all what she expected. She wasn’t shown a sword, but something else that brought light. And she saw who were to yield it. She saw them side by side, and she saw the one who could make sure the other two would never turn on each other. Lightbringer had to be united and complete so it could defeat the Great Other. Every part was necessary to make it complete, but there was one part that was needed even more since only her could make sure it would be united.

She saw the battle in the snow. She saw the battle in the midst of a storm. She saw it with more clarity than ever before, and the battlefield was covered by three large shadows. She saw where the shadows came from.

The fire came back to its normal shape. The vision was over, but it was more than enough. She knew exactly what she had to do.

A few minutes later, she was at the tent where the body was kept. Dawn was beginning to appear. She reached the entrance of the tent and was surprised to see that there were no guards. Even more surprising were the chants she heard coming from the inside.

She entered and found the High Priestess. Her hands were placed on the lifeless form. She was reciting a long prayer in High Valyrian.

R'hllor, Lord of Light, Heart of Fire, God of Flame and Shadow

The only true god, who was, who is, and who will ever be

Source of life, origin of joy, goodness itself

I am your servant, my life is yours, as is all life

This man’s journey is not over yet

Revive his mind and body

So he may be ready

When the time comes for him

Make his heart who is silent pound again

Make his lungs who are empty be filled with air

Make his blood who is congealed run again

Make his brain who is still vibrate again.

R'hllor, Lord of Light, Heart of Fire, God of Flame and Shadow

The only true god, who was, who is, and who will ever be

Source of life, origin of joy, goodness itself

I am your servant, my life is yours, as is all life

There was a little hesitation before she said the last sentence of the prayer. Grant this man his life again, if that is your wish, for all your wishes are always right and just. The High Priestess remained in this position, her hands on the chest of the body, her eyes closed, breathing steadily. She breathed in and breathed out regularly, deeply. For minutes, she was like that, saying nothing, doing nothing. Melisandre knew there were many possible ways to bring back someone from the dead. Thoros of Myr did it with simple words. She did it with a ritual that required almost an hour and involved burning hair and washing the body of the dead. Kinvara did it with long and complex prayers, asking to the Lord in mind and spirit.

She removed her hands and crossed her fingers, keeping her eyes on the man lying dead before her. “I suspected you would come. The Lord doesn’t grant his visions to only one person,” the High Priestess said, keeping her eyes on the body.

“What did you see?”

“It doesn’t matter. It seems I was wrong, just like you were.” She bent over his face and granted him the last kiss. A flicker of flame was seen escaping her mouth. The last kiss, also called the kiss of life, was usually kept for followers of the Lord of Light when they died, though Melisandre recalled seeing Kinvara give it to non-believers before she became High Priestess, back in Volantis. She walked to the exit and stopped next to Melisandre.

“I’m sorry, but he’s gone. I hope you were wrong and that his role wasn’t that essential.”

There was a real note of sadness in her voice. She began to walk out for good as the sun cast its first light when Melisandre caught her arm and stopped her in her track. She felt it. She looked, expecting the impossible to happen under her eyes.

And it happened.

Chapter End Notes

So, I hope that some are guessing why I uploaded four chapters at the same time, and why I ended with this chapter.

Please review

Next chapter : I let you guess :)

Since I uploaded four chapters in a row, the next chapter will be uploaded in two weeks. See you soon.
Chapter Notes

To confirm what many people already guessed, Tyrion is back, alive and well. To quote a certain actress, Tyrion was "deader than dead", but not anymore.

So, we have a lot in store for our favourite dwarf here, he's got a very long chapter, and a lot happened while he was dead. He sees faces he hadn't seen for a while, meets others for the first time, and he already has difficult choices to make. Not to mention what happens at the end of the chapter. A huge chapter for a huge return for Tyrion Lannister.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TYRION XXXI

Air rushed within his lungs. His body reacted instantly by taking in as much as he could, and it released the air as quickly as it came in, then took some more. He opened his eyes instinctively. He distinguished nothing in particular.

He continued to take air in and to blow it off as if he was running for his life. He raised his right hand to his face and looked at it. He turned it both side to see if anything was amiss, but it looked perfectly normal. He noticed the hole in his arm. That was where the arrow struck. It was gone, but the wound was clearly visible. He straightened up and looked at his chest. He saw the wound he felt before he died, right where his lungs were.

Still, his lungs were functioning normally. He breathed as if he had never died. He shot a glance at his left leg, where he saw another place where an arrow pierced. He remembered dying, his mouth filled with blood, his vision darkening, his body being lifted in the air. He was dead. And yet, he wasn’t, not anymore. He looked ahead of him. A woman who had to be in the late thirties, with red hair, a heart-shaped face and red robes was standing in front of him, not far from a line by which some light came in. When she approached him, he recognized her.

“What are you doing here?”

The Red Priestess Melisandre, who Jon Snow exiled from the North, was staring at him, her mouth wide open, her eyes showing shock. She slightly shook her head. “I thought… I thought it might be possible, but… I didn’t really believe it.”

Tyrion looked back at his chest, where the arrow went through. “Why am I here? I… I died.”

“The Lord of Light brought you back.” A melodious voice came from behind him. He slowly turned to face its owner, and caught sight of another woman. She was wearing similar robes to Melisandre, with a similar diamond-shaped necklace, but instead of the intense red, her hair was black as raven’s wings and her eyes a deep green. The eyes were scrutinizing him.

Tyrion blinked, trying to have a better view of this woman. She looked younger than Melisandre, but displayed an assurance that the other woman didn’t have. While Melisandre looked at Tyrion in shock, this one looked at him with interest. He thought he perceived a trickle of wonder in her eyes as well.
“Who are you?” he asked.

“My name is Kinvara. I am the High Priestess of the Red Temple of Volantis, and the First Servant of the Lord of Light.”

Something triggered in Tyrion’s mind, something he read a long time ago. “The Red Temple of Volantis. Positioned near the Black Wall on the eastern side of the Rhoyn. Built upon a great plaza. Date of construction unknown to maesters. Similar height to Aegon’s High Hill. Three times the size of the Great Sept of Baelor. Protected by the Fiery Hand, made of one thousand slave soldiers, never more, never less.”

Information he found in several books, like Remnants of the Dragonlords, came back in a rush to his mind and it was all he could do but recite them.

“You know a lot for someone who never visited the Free Cities,” the woman who called herself Kinvara said.

“That’s what happens when you spend most of your life reading,” Tyrion replied. A small smile quickly appeared on the priestess mouth, but disappeared immediately. She took a chair and sat next to him.

“You must be confused. I understand that. Very few people make it from the other side. Do you remember anything?”

Memories cascaded through his mind. He placed a hand on his forehead at the headache that took him. He saw men dying all around him. Bronn with an arrow through the face. Podrick impaled on a spear. Horses and their riders everywhere, spears and swords drawn. He remembered a sigil. A sigil he saw on a banner. The banner that their attackers bore.

“The Knights of the Vale.” He whispered. The blue falcon flying over a white moon, against a blue field, took shape before him. The men who attacked them bore the sigil of House Arryn. “We were on our way to Winterfell. We were attacked. We were taken by surprise. Everyone died. The Knights of the Vale… They were the ones behind that.”

He looked up to meet the green eyes of the High Priestess. She was listening closely. Tyrion looked down again, closing his eyes, trying to remember anything else. “There were…” He remembered red cloaks turning against other red cloaks. “Some of my men fought with them, I think. I’m not sure. I managed to escape. Pod put me on a horse. He died to save me.” He saw the spear piercing his squire’s heart again. “I was injured. I didn’t make it far. I tried to get up. I couldn’t.” He remembered the taste of blood in his mouth, his struggle to breathe. “I… I died.”

He straightened up again, but didn’t look at anyone in particular. “It’s the Knight of the Vale. They betrayed us.”

Some of the Vale lords had deserted from the Wall before Tyrion left Castle Black. They were heading south. They couldn’t stop them from leaving. Not all of them left. Many, under the command of Lord Royce, were still at the Wall. If they were to betray them as well, then Jon Snow was in danger. But it wasn’t at the Wall that these men attacked him. They attacked while Tyrion and his men were approaching Winterfell, and some of his own men helped them.

“Sansa.” He tried to stand up from his bed, and ended up lying face down on the floor. His legs were weak. He couldn’t stand on them.

“You shouldn’t move too much. You will probably feel weak for a while,” Melisandre warned him, but he gave no mind to her advice.

“You don’t understand!” he shouted as he sat on the ground. “The Knights of the Vale betrayed me, and some of my men were probably with them. We were closing on Winterfell when we were attacked. My wife and my daughter are there. They’re in danger.”

Melisandre somehow looked alarmed. She looked somewhere over him, probably at this High Priestess.

“Stay with him. The queen must be informed of all this.”

The woman left, her dark wavy hair the only things decipherable apart from her robes when you looked at her back, leaving Tyrion alone with the woman who burned the daughter of her king.

“You should put something on yourself. You will get cold.”

Tyrion realized at this moment that he wore nothing. He saw a thin piece of cloth on the floor. He thought it covered his private parts when he lied on the bed, but nothing more. It had fallen away when he tried to stand up. Melisandre brought him a blanket, probably from the bed he just left, and he wrapped himself in it. It was cold, indeed. He didn’t care about it, but now he realized that he was shivering like he never did. He felt colder than he ever did. Melisandre knelt before him. He was still on the ground.

“You’ve been on the other side. What have you seen?” she asked after some time.

What was she talking about? “I have to warn Sansa, and Jon Snow as well. Is there a rookery around here? Is there a raven I can send somewhere? Where are we first?”

Melisandre didn’t answer immediately. “Where are we?” he pressed.

“We are on the Kingsroad, in a place you call the Neck.”

“The Neck? How… How did I arrive here? Last time I died, if my memories are correct, I was miles away in the North.”

He blinked once, then twice. “A dragon brought me here?” He detached the words very carefully. Melisandre of Asshai nodded. Wait, didn’t the other priestess talk about a queen?

Right when he reflected about it, the flap of the tent opened. The woman who said she was a High Priestess was back with another woman, younger, with dark clothes displaying a red dragon with three heads on the arms and the legs. She had silvery blond hair and purple eyes, and she was looking at him as if she saw a ghost. As far as Tyrion could tell, unless Jon Snow got married while he was dead, there were only two queens right now in Westeros, and she could only be one of them.

“Judging from your hair and your eyes, and unless there are other people of this family alive that I’m not aware of, I suppose you are Daenerys Targaryen. Please forgive me if I don’t stand up. I didn’t plan to die and to come back afterwards.”

She just kept looking at him in astonishment, showing no reaction to his words despite his usual sharp tongue. Her eyes trailed all over him. “You were dead. I saw it.” That was all she said.

“It seems someone decided to play the necromancer with me,” he mocked.
She looked at Melisandre who had stood up as soon as she entered. “What happened? Did you do this?” A hint of anger was perceptible on the Targaryen’s face.

“No. I did.” It was the other priestess, the High Priestess, who answered. Daenerys Targaryen, Tyrion was quite sure it was her even though she didn’t confirm it, looked at the other woman.

“Why did you do this?”

“I only asked the Lord to bring him back if it was his wish, and here we are.” She indicated Tyrion with her arm.

“Wait, you’re the one who brought me back?” Tyrion asked the priestess with green eyes. She looked back at him with indifference.

“We’ll have to talk about it later.” Daenerys Targaryen had an edge in her voice. Tyrion supposed she wasn’t happy to see an enemy brought back to life. She turned to look at him, her eyes bright as steel. Somehow, it remembered him Cersei, though it didn’t cause a chill to run on his back like his sister was able to do. “Your return is… unexpected, to say the least, Tyrion Lannister.” She said the last word in disgust.

“Sorry to disappoint you, though I’m not the first one to who it happens. Your nephew went through the same process thanks to this woman.” Tyrion pointed Melisandre with his chin. “And there’s a certain Thoros of Myr who claims he brought back a knight from the dead half a dozen times.”

Her face turned even harder. She stepped forward and towered him. Tyrion had seen taller people in his life, but she was definitely taller than him. Most people were. “Is Jon Snow truly my nephew?”

He saw no reason to hide her the truth. He had the impression he shouldn’t play with fire with this young woman, especially considering the family she came from. “He is. He is the child that your brother Rhaegar had with Lyanna Stark during the war. A bastard son, but a son nonetheless.”

“And how can you be sure of that?” She defied him to prove that what he said was true.

“Because we have an eye-witnes, a man who was at the Tower of Joy when Lyanna Stark died and who saw her baby, and who saw Eddard Stark bring him back to Winterfell where he raised him along his own children.”

She remained silent for a moment. Tyrion could see she had an internal debate. “How can I know that you’re telling me the truth? You are a Lannister. Your family slaughtered mine.”

Tyrion rolled his eyes. He knew this was going to happen. “Yes, and you slaughtered mine. You already killed my brother and my sister, and you’re probably planning to kill more of us. Am I on your list? If that’s the case, I’d be happy to know it now. If I am to die a second time, I would rather know it in advance.”

He was definitely playing with fire, but he just came back from the dead, and there was a Targaryen girl who asked him all sorts of question when he should be doing everything to save Sansa and Joanna.

“Your brother is not dead. He’s in the black cells of the Red Keep right now. I didn’t kill him yet.”

Tyrion was speechless for some time. He thought there was a possibility that Jaime could have died, though he hoped that his brother escaped and even believed it. After all, he managed to escape the Starks. A Targaryen was certainly possible to escape for his big brother.
Jaime is alive?” he asked.

“For now.” Jaime was alive. He was truly alive. Relief flooded Tyrion. For now. Jaime was alive for now.

“What are you going to do with him?” He already suspected what the answer would be, but he needed to know all the same.

“He will stand trial for his many crimes, including the murder of my father, and the murder of his sister.”

That shocked Tyrion a lot. “Jaime… killed… Cersei?” he slowly asked.

“He did. Does that surprise you?”

“Yes.”

He thought that it might have come to the point when he or Cersei would kill the other, but he never thought that Jaime could do this. Jaime and Cersei were in love since their birth, and Cersei always managed to control their brother with her cunt. How could Jaime have come to kill her? Tyrion wondered how his brother felt right now. He killed the woman he loved, after all. He remembered how broken he felt after he raped Tysha, and he still felt guilty about it, despite knowing that she was a whore.

“As for you, I wasn’t planning to kill you,” the Targaryen woman continued. “I was going to offer you the same choice I gave to every lord in Westeros. Bend the knee and swear fealty to me, or die.”

So, the time had come. He didn’t expect to do it in such circumstances, but he knew that sooner or later, he would have to stand before Daenerys Targaryen and to make that choice. He had only hoped that she wouldn’t be like her father. So far, he couldn’t tell which type of queen she was from their short discussion.

“What will happen to Jaime?”

“Just as I told you. He will be judged for his crimes.”

She said nothing more. Maybe she offered him a little hope that his brother could be spared, but he knew better than that. He shakily stood up, trying to enhance his position face. “I will bend the knee to you, on three conditions.”

She didn’t reply for a moment, but finally she said, “Say them.”

“You hold my brother captive. He killed your father, I do not deny it, but the rest of my family has nothing to do with it. My father who betrayed your father is dead, and so is my uncle Kevan who was his main advisor at the time. Gregor Clegane who killed your brother’s children and his wife is dead as well. My sister who sat on the Iron Throne is dead and so are her husband and her children. Everyone else of House Lannister has nothing to see with the horrors committed against people of your blood. Many were only children during the rebellion, or were not yet into the world. I ask that no charges be held against them and that no harm comes to them.”

She hesitated. “Done. What else?”

“Men from the Vale of Arryn tried to kill me.” He told her everything that happened near Winterfell, and his suspicions of the Vale’s treason. “I want the men responsible to be executed, and if any of them harmed my wife or my daughter, I want them dead as well.”
“Agreed.” She hesitated for a shorter time. “What is your third condition?”

“My brother. I want a fair trial for him. I want him to have the right speak and to expose his own version of the story. I want the right for him to call witnesses and to question the witnesses you’ll bring against him. I want this trial to be public and open for everyone. And I want three judges. I want the three to agree if he is to be sentenced to death.”

A long silence lingered after he was done. “That’s unacceptable.”

“You can be one of the judges and choose the others. All I ask is for him to have a chance to defend himself. And if a judge disagrees on the death sentence, you’ll only have to send him to the Wall.” I’m quite sure he will be considered guilty well before the trial. Even if he wasn’t, Jaime did kill the Mad King and everyone knew it. What many people ignored were the reasons why Jaime killed Aerys Targaryen.

“I refuse. I will allow this trial to be public, and Ser Jaime will be allowed to speak, but if the judge or the judges decide he is guilty and that he deserves death, he will be executed. That is not negotiable.”

Tyrion was fuming. She specified judge or judges, which meant she may be the only person to judge Jaime. His brother had no chance. Still, she said the trial would be public and that Jaime could speak. He asked for a lot on purpose, hoping he could get something for his brother, a chance to escape somehow, but this queen wasn’t easy to play like Cersei.

“All right,” he said under his breath. He knelt and swore an oath to Daenerys Targaryen the First of Her Name. He did his duty to save House Lannister, but probably sacrificed his brother at the same time.

“Good,” she said once he was done with his oath. He went back to sit on his bed, his legs still weak. “I expect your men to join mine when we arrive in the North.”

“Wait, your Grace.” Tyrion had to ask her one question before she left. “What will happen to Jon Snow?”

“I will offer him the same choice that I gave you. However, if I find out that he lied about his Targaryen origins, he will be executed.”

Jon Snow didn’t lie, but Tyrion supposed it was useless to tell her. Her eyes were throwing daggers. Howland Reed better be alive to explain her everything. Unless of course she decided to get rid of Jon Snow because he could be a threat to her. A bastard son of the previous heir to the Iron Throne remained a threat, no matter what was said.

“Jon Snow will not pose you any problem, your Grace. Anyway, you must know that he is planning to take the black again as soon as this war is over.”

Daenerys Targaryen frowned. “What do you mean?”

“He sent you a raven that explained all of it, and was asking for your help against the White Walkers at the same time. It’s been some time now that it was sent.” When he looked at her, he saw a real confusion in her eyes. “You didn’t know it?”

“I received no such raven.”

Damn it! “Maybe it was lost in the snows and the storms.”
“Maybe.” She took her queen’s expression again. “I hope what you say is true, and I hope to hear it from Jon Snow when we meet.”

“I’m sure he’ll be happy to meet you,” Tyrion said as she left. He didn’t know if she heard him, but the two other women in the tent definitely heard.

“You like to play with fire,” the youngest of the two said.

“What do you want? I have a sharp tongue,” he replied.

She left, and Tyrion thought he saw her lips twisting before she disappeared. Tyrion turned to Melisandre. “Since I’ve been dead for a while, I’d like to know everything I need to know, from what happened in the south while I was alive that I’m not aware of to what happened in the North while I was dead.”

Melisandre filled him about the war in the south. The Vale of Arryn and the North were the only kingdoms who didn’t bend the knee before Daenerys Targaryen. She believed the White Walkers were a real threat and prepared weapons made of dragonglass for the coming battles. Tyrion didn’t know if Melisandre was a reliable source, but if this dragon queen considered the dead like a serious threat and was ready to go north to fight and stop them, then it was probably for the better. They wouldn’t be able to hold them off by themselves, and Tyrion had to admit he would rather die burning alive than cold and be revived as a wight. He would need to verify if there was no part of him that took a blue coloration.

The army he was in the midst of was enormous, about eighty thousand men. Half of them were Dothrakis. Tyrion had never seen them fighting, though the tales about them had reached him. He would be more enthusiastic about seeing them fight if he could be sure they wouldn’t kill him as a weakling, or turn their weapons against his countrymen. Savage warriors who were not afraid of death might be very useful against dead men, but Tyrion didn’t want to see them burning the whole country either. He also wondered how these horsemen would fare in the northern climate.

Before long, they broke camp. Tyrion had to follow far behind, mostly hidden from the rest of the army and kept away under the guard of knights from the Reach. Still, he received the visit of a few people while on the march. Daven was very happy to see him back, though he was struggling to believe it. Tyrion was glad to see his cousin. They were never close, but Daven was always kind and lively. He informed him of the state of their forces and confirmed him that the Knights of the Vale ambushed them at the Crossroad. Melisandre had already told him. The Vale had truly betrayed them. Daven thought that Tyrion was aware and told him they sent a raven to warn him. It seemed that many ravens got lost lately. Tyrion understood very quickly that they had no choice but to follow Daenerys. Their army would never be strong enough against hers. They barely had more than a thousand men riding alongside tens of thousand Dothrakis, Reach men, Crownlands men, Riverlands men, and Stormlands men.

Not long after their departure, Tyrion saw a great shadow flying over them. When he looked up, he saw a giant beast with black scales, gigantic wings of the same color and a very long tail. He stared at the creature from far away, hearing his screams very well, until it almost disappeared on the horizon, heading north. Tyrion stared in its direction long after it was gone and only a point in the sky was left of him. For the first time in his life, he just saw a living dragon. It was bigger and more impressive than he imagined them, and he imagined them as very great and impressive animals. As they progressed through the swamps and bogs of the Neck like he did almost a year ago, he couldn’t help but carefully listen and look repetitively in the sky, in the hope to catch another look of the dragons. He only saw one. He wondered how the two others looked like.

They stopped in the middle of the afternoon. Thoughts of dragons and any excitement he felt upon seeing one vanished, replaced by the memory of Bronn’s and Podrick’s deaths, and worry for his wife and daughter. Darkness was already falling on them and the last shades of the sun were slowly disappearing. The column stopped. Tyrion was kept away from his men, certainly on purpose. They had allowed Daven to pay him a short visit while they rode, but they wouldn’t allow him to be anywhere close the thousand men loyal to House Lannister. Still, according to his guards, he was provided with his own tent and even a servant. He was an honored guest, to speak gently, but he was a prisoner and a hostage to speak truthfully.

Before they could begin to settle, a young man with the arms of House Hightower rode to him. “Lord Lannister, the queen requires your presence.”

For a moment, Tyrion wasn’t sure, but he recognized him. “I guess I have no choice, Ser Gerold. Lead the way.”

Lady Mira’s husband did as he said, though it wasn’t really an order. They talked on their way to the queen. “I’m glad that you’re alive, my lord.”

“I’m not sure everyone shares your belief, ser.”

“Mira has a high esteem of you, and of your wife.”

“If that’s the case, then why did you leave the North?” Tyrion retorted.

The knight didn’t look at him when he answered. “I had to. My family is sworn to House Tyrell. I did my duty by my family.”

“I’m sure that your wife admired your loyalty,” Tyrion mocked.

Gerold’s voice was shaking now. “I did everything I could for her. I wanted her to come with me, but she didn’t want to. She was my wife.”

“Was?”

“She still is,” he corrected. “She should have come with me. I would have protected her.”

Tyrion snorted. He knew the whole story. Asher Forrester and Jon Snow told him all about it. “And when she refused to follow you, you left her all alone in the North, with an army of dead men threatening the place where she lives, in the thick of winter, cold, within a house in ruins.”

“I wanted to bring her to safety, and she refused,” Gerold Hightower retorted harshly.

Tyrion sighed. “Tell me, how many of your men survived the trip back south?” When Lady Mira’s husband didn’t reply, he had his answer. “I don’t believe it would have been very wise for a pregnant woman to travel miles in the snow and among storms.”

The knight slowly looked at Tyrion, his eyes big like balls. “What?”

“Lord Tyrion.” He realized that a man with a mask and wearing robes similar to those of Melisandre and Kinvara was waiting for him, on foot. “The queen is waiting for you.”

They had arrived near a small hill that allowed them to see Moat Cailin very well. Tyrion dismounted and followed the masked man.

Gerold Hightower shouted after him. “Wait, my lord! What did you mean by pregnant?”

Fed up, Tyrion turned to look at the knight before he went to see the queen. “have many flaws, Ser Gerold Hightower, but abandoning a woman alone with a child when he’s yours is probably one of the things I despise the most. I hope you will never meet a Forrester again, because they all want to skin you alive right now.”

Tyrion resumed his walk toward the queen who waited for him and gave no other thought to the knight of the Reach. He had visited many brothels in his life, been with many women, but if he had had a child with one of them, he wouldn’t have left the woman and the baby with nothing. The child would have been his own blood, and the woman his mother, and abandoning a girl and the child she bore you was despicable in his eyes. He had known Mira Forrester, and she didn’t deserve this.

Daenerys Targaryen was waiting for him near the cliff, looking at the fortress beneath her. The black dragon Tyrion saw earlier was standing next to her. The creature eyed him suspiciously as he approached the queen of five of the Seven Kingdoms. The said queen didn’t turn to welcome him, didn’t even look at him. Someone might have tried to stab her in the back, but Tyrion reflected that any man who would try such a move right now would be a fool considering the dragon watching over her.

Tyrion walked carefully under the dragon’s gaze, trying to not make any abrupt movement that might cause him to react, until he stood next to the last living child of the Mad King. A long drop was only a few feet ahead. No one would survive such a fall. Tyrion observed this queen. She was beautiful, no one could deny it, with the striking features of the Valyrian civilization that only the Targaryens inherited in Westeros. Tyrion had seen Rhaegar Targaryen a few times when he was a lad, but always from afar. They never properly met, and he had few memories of the man his sister might have married. As for the Mad King, he had even fewer memories of him. He had no basis to compare her to other Targaryens, except for Jon Snow, but the boy obviously inherited his physical appearance from the Stark side. However, compared to the Westerosi standards, the young woman was quite attractive, though not as much as Sansa.

She turned her head, caught him spying on her. “I heard you took this place before.”

Tyrion looked at the fortress in ruins far away. “Yes.”

“How?”

He looked back at her. She didn’t leave her eyes away from him. Her gaze had an expression of challenge. Was she gauging him?

“We attacked Moat Cailin from both sides. Our allies in the North and a small group of men we sent through the swamps assaulted the northern side while the bulk of our forces led the attack from the south. The Boltons couldn’t hold us on both sides, their defenses were overwhelmed, and we took the fortress.”

She seemed to consider his words for a time. “How did you send men north of Moat Cailin?”

“We got the help from the crannogmen. They live in the Neck, and many people call them frog-eaters. Before you think about doing the same thing, I must warn you, these people are fiercely loyal to the King in the North. They will not help you to take Moat Cailin, and your dragons won’t convince them. They will hide in the bogs and the swamps, and you won’t be able to set this forest afire to kill them all. The only way to bring the crannogmen to kneel is to have Jon Snow bend the knee before you, and it won’t be done before you meet him at the Wall. Howland Reed is leading the crannogmen and he is at the Wall too.”

“Is an attack from the south likely to succeed?”
“No. Moat Cailin cannot be taken from the south. No one ever succeeded to take the castle without forces north of it.”

“Did any of them had dragons?”

“No,” Tyrion reluctantly said after a moment. The silence that followed was heavy.

“How many men are there in garrison here?”

“About two hundred. It’s enough to hold the place.”

“We have no time to lose. What you’re telling is mostly what Gerold Hightower told me. Your siege lasted months. We cannot afford it. I’m aware of the threat from beyond the Wall.” Tyrion noticed she was serious. There was no trace of jape or mockery on her face or in her voice when she talked. “Did you see them?”

Tyrion nodded. He saw wights during one of their assaults on Castle Black. “Do you know a man from the name of Aemon Targaryen, your Grace?” He decided he should begin to call her this way. After all, he bent the knee.

“I heard about him. He was maester in the Night’s Watch, and a brother to my grandfather Aegon.”

“I met him a few years ago when I visited the Wall. He told me that winter was coming, and that dark things would come with it. I didn’t believe him back then, but I should have.”

The young woman looked thoughtful for a moment. She looked back at the ruins that stopped her army. “I must continue on my path right away. The White Walkers threaten all the Seven Kingdoms, and I must stop them. I would rather not kill anyone on my way, but if these men are stopping me, then I might have no choice but to destroy Moat Cailin. Are the men inside this castle yours?”

“Half of them,” Tyrion replied. “The other half is made of Northerners, mostly sworn to House Manderly.”

“Can you convince them to let us pass?”

“My men will obey my orders, but the Northerners may not accept.” For the men of the North, Jon Snow was their king, and Northerners weren’t likely to turn their cloak for a southern or foreign queen.

“If they don’t let my army through, I will have no choice but to destroy this place.”

The dragon hissed. She didn’t need to tell him how she would destroy Moat Cailin. Tyrion highly doubted that the place could withstand dragonfire. “If you destroy Moat Cailin and kill the men defending it, no one will welcome you as a savior in the North, no matter what you do,” he warned her.

“In this case, I suppose you are these men’s only hope.”

As she stared at him, Tyrion understood what she expected of him. She wanted him to bring her Moat Cailin. It was a test to prove his loyalty, and to force him to truly side with her. He had no choice. He was in no position to refuse, and she was right, either the garrison surrendered, or all the men inside Moat Cailin died. He was the only chance for two hundred men to live.

Several minutes later, he was riding towards the southern gate of Moat Cailin, carrying a white banner to indicate a truce for negotiations. Two people followed him. Daenerys Targaryen wouldn’t let him go in there alone, though he didn’t see how she could think he would escape. If Moat Cailin didn’t surrender at dawn, Daenerys Targaryen said she would unleash her dragons and take it by force. The three of them were flying south of his position now. Tyrion never saw a dragon in action, but he read more than enough history books to know what kind of damage they could do.

However, his two guards weren’t the ones he usually had. One of them was the High Priestess Kinvara, the woman who supposedly brought him back from the dead, though she claimed it was her god who did it. Tyrion wasn’t sure what to think about it yet. He knew he was dead. He didn’t dream of it. He was alive again. He would need to think about it later.

The other guard was another Red Priest. When Tyrion saw the two of them saddle up to follow him, he tried to know why they accompanied him. The woman only said she was coming, as if it was enough of an explanation. As for the man, he said nothing, but from his impressive shoulders and the two swords he carried, he understood why the High Priestess chose him as her personal guard. She said he followed her everywhere she went. When Tyrion asked if he was a Targaryen after noticing his silvery hair, he got a harsh look from the priest, and he quickly realized the man might have the Targaryen hair, but he definitely didn’t have their eyes. As a result, he was being followed by two foreign priests to negotiate a surrender on which depended two hundred lives. He didn’t feel right about it.

“Who goes there?” came the shout from over the gate. Tyrion squinted his eyes to better see who yelled. The man had a red armor.

“The Imp,” he loudly replied. “And you better open that fucking gate before I hang you for not recognizing the lord you serve.”

It didn’t take long for the gate to open. Once inside, Tyrion immediately saw that the men could have been in better shape. Time in the Neck never proved to be easy, though they fared better than the Bolton soldiers after the battle. The two captains of the garrison were waiting for him. One of them was named Damion, like one of his cousins. He led the Lannister forces at Moat Cailin. Tyrion chose himself. The other one was Duncan, commander of the Manderly garrison. Tyrion had to ask his name since he didn’t remember it.

“We didn’t expect you here, my lord. And not really coming from this side,” Damion said.

“I understand. That’s a long story, Damion. We need to talk, and now.”

“Who are they?” Duncan asked, pointing the two people behind Tyrion.

“My name is Kinvara,” the High Priestess answered. “I am an advisor for the queen Daenerys Targaryen, and this is Geralt.”

“You are Red Priests?”

“We are.”

Of course, that made everyone around suspicious. “We have no time for this,” Tyrion cut. “We have important matters to talk about. You have a full army before you, with three dragons, and they will attack you before the next day begins.”

A few moments later, they were sitting around a table, Tyrion, the two Red Priests and the two commanders. Tyrion explained the situation to the commanders and how he happened to be here. He didn’t tell them he died. He only told them he was gravely injured and somehow managed to survive long enough while a dragon brought him here. As for the fate of Moat Cailin, he hid nothing.
“Can we defeat a dragon?” Damion asked.

“Three dragons, and no, you can’t defeat them, not all of them.”

“Dragons never took Moat Cailin,” Duncan said.

“They never tried,” Tyrion specified, “and I’m not eager to test it.” He let a moment go. “I bent the knee.” He didn’t tell them yet.

“You swore an oath to our king.” Duncan was outraged.

“Our king intends to take the black and bent the knee the moment he meets Daenerys Targaryen. We need her dragons to defeat the White Walkers. She brought dragonglass with her. She made vast quantities of weapons with it. She is probably our only chance to stop the Night King from devastating the entire North.”

“You want us to welcome a Targaryen, a woman who grew up in Essos, not even on this continent, into the North?” Duncan asked, bewildered.

“She will get into the North whether you like it or not, Duncan. A few ruins with a few crossbowmen will not stop her. If you fight her, you will die.”

“So that’s why you betrayed us? She threatened to kill you, didn’t she? You bowed before her like a coward.”

Tyrion pursed his lips to contain his anger. “I want my house to survive this winter. I’m quite sure you want your family to survive it as well. If you do, then I suggest you do just like me.”

“The dead are coming for you,” Kinvara added. “If you refuse the queen’s help, if you fight her instead of fighting the White Walkers with her, you will die, whether it is by her hand or the hand of the true enemy. You must put aside your past enmities if you are to survive this long night.”

“Damion.” Tyrion looked at the man he chose to command his men here. After a moment, he bowed his head.

“I will follow you, my lord. You are my lord.”

“You’re a fucking traitor!” Duncan yelled.

“I’m being pragmatic!” Tyrion retorted. “We are facing the greatest threat in history, and stubbornness and pride will not save us from them. Even your king knows it.”

“I don’t believe what you say. You are a Lannister. You switch your cloak whenever it suits you. But House Manderly swore an oath to House Stark long ago. Honor still means something for us.”

“Like it meant something for Robb Stark. Look where he is now.” That wasn’t the right thing to say. Can’t I learn to shut up when I must?

The commander looked at him straight in the eyes. “Tell your queen that she can go and fuck herself. We are not going to serve a Targaryen.”

“You already serve one. Or is it that you prefer Jon Snow because he doesn’t have silver hair and looks like Eddard Stark. He may look like the last Warden of the North, but that doesn’t make him his son or a Stark.”

Another silence followed. “Tell your Targaryen that she is welcomed to attack us tomorrow. We will welcome her with arrows. She’ll see that we can rain fire just like her.”

Duncan walked toward the door, but before he could do more than a few steps, strong arms seized him by behind, a hand with a knife was raised and his throat was cut clean. In an instant, he was one floor, emptying himself from his blood.

They all stared in shock at what just happened. The only who didn’t show any surprise was the killer. Geralt, that was how the priest was called, wiped the blood off his dagger and put it back at his belt. The door burst open and two men bearing the colors of House Lannister entered. They were as shocked as everyone else was.

Before they could react, Tyrion stopped them. “Close the door.” One managed to carry out the order. Tyrion looked at the rough man. “What have you done?”

“You want these men here to die?” the Red Priest asked in a rough voice. “That wouldn’t have been possible with this moron in command.”

“We will never be able to bring the Northerners to surrender now that you killed their commander,” Tyrion angrily observed. These were supposed to be negotiations. Parleys were as sacred as guest rights. What laws were left that couldn’t be broken in Westeros now?

“When the Northerners find about this…” Damion’s voice trailed off.

“They mustn’t find.” Tyrion’s mind raced quicker than ever. “We must surrender the castle before they realize their commander is missing.”

“But, my lord…”

“Do as I say. Hide the body. Make sure no one finds it. Send your most loyal man to Daenerys. Put a white flag over the castle. Send men to the armory to take control of it. I want all weapons to be in our control. Distribute it to our men and place them at strategic points. Confine the Northerners to their rooms. If they ask questions, tell them Duncan tried to kill me. Only use force if they resist. Do everything with discretion.”

“My lord, many Northerners are in the courtyard. They’re training. It won’t be possible to do it discreetly.”

“Then start by the men outside the courtyard. Confine them. Then place your men with crossbows and swords around the courtyard and surround the Northerners.”

Damion obeyed, though it was obvious he didn’t like how things turned.

“I’ll go to the courtyard. Your men might have need of another sword,” the rough priest said before he left. Tyrion had no doubt this one was ready for battle.

He turned to the High Priestess to who he owed his life. “Daenerys would be better to save us from the dead.” He shot one last look at Duncan in his own blood, and walked out of the room. “The Northerners have a choice to make,” he whispered, fearing what decision they would take.

Tyrion went to a balcony overlooking the courtyard. Many men were practicing there. Tyrion counted about thirty Northerners. For now, everything seemed normal. As minutes went on, things started to change. New men appeared on the battlements, crossbowmen and bowmen took position all around the courtyard, and Tyrion noticed other on the ground level with real swords at their belt.

“This isn’t how you wanted it to happen. I’m sorry.”
The priestess had joined him and watched the events unfolding before them. “I suppose parleys have no value where you come from,” he retorted under his breathe, loud enough for her to hear.

“Geralt’s methods are crude and sometimes cruel, but sometimes cruelty is necessary. I didn’t choose him to protect me for nothing.”

Some Northerners were beginning to notice that something was strange. “There was surely another way.”

“Sometimes we have to do things we would rather never do.”

“I know it only too well.” What he was doing right now was a perfect example of this. The die was cast.

Damion walked in the yard with a small escort. He and all his men were fully armed. No Lannister man was left training. The Northerners still there only had blunted sword for close combat.

“Men, we must ask you to go back to your rooms,” Damion loudly declared, while remaining at good distance. The crossbows were all in position. Tyrion noticed Geralt on the ground, closing on the practice area while remaining at respectable distance.

“Where is Duncan?” one of the men asked.

“Please go back to your rooms. We will explain you everything in time.”

“Look! A white banner!” The Northerners all looked up to see the flag that announced their surrender on the top of the tallest tower of Moat Cailin.

“Traitors!” another shouted.

“Wait, let me explain to you,” Duncan tried, but Tyrion knew it was too late. He knew Northerners too well.

“Men, loose!”

The order came out easily. He gave it without hesitating. Bolts and arrows flew from everywhere towards the half-expecting Northerners. Strangely, they didn’t move to take cover. All they did to protect themselves was to raise their arms and hands, as if it could block an arrow as well as it could stop the light of the sun. The next moment, Lannisters rushed on the Northerners. Their allies stood no chance. They didn’t have any real weapon for close combat, and it was too late for them to use the bows and crossbows they had for training. Furthermore, they were in an open place, vulnerable to archers when Tyrion’s men were not. The Red Priest joined the fight and cleanly killed three or four men. It was all over within seconds.

Tyrion climbed down the stairs to look at the carnage more closely. Men with the sigil of House Manderly and their vassal houses on their arms lied everywhere, killed by arrows, swords and knives, but mostly by arrows, the arrows Tyrion ordered to be released on them. He didn’t want it to happen this way, but after Duncan was killed… He shot a dark look at the man who killed him and started all this madness, and Tyrion made a note in his mind that a Lannister always paid his debts.

“Bring the bodies away and clean this place. We must prepare for the queen’s arrival.”

The orders sounded hollow in his mouth. His men executed them, but without more enthusiasm than he had himself. He later ordered that the bones be kept and sent to the families of the victims as soon as possible. That was all he could do.
At dawn, Daenerys Targaryen rode through the gates with the most powerful lords of the Reach and the Stormlands. Tyrion was there to inform her that Moat Cailin was hers. She granted him a smile and said, “Well done.”

They didn’t stay long at Moat Cailin. His new queen wanted to continue her way as quickly as possible. She didn’t joke when she said they had no time. Tyrion had to give it to her, she didn’t underestimate the enemy they faced. One hour after she entered Moat Cailin, she was heading north again with the bulk of her forces.

Tyrion found himself following this army again. Forty-five. It was the number of people who died at Moat Cailin that night. Forty-five men. Forty-three Northerners, and two soldiers at the service of House Lannister. It wasn’t as much as two hundred, but it was forty-five too many men who lost their lives. Tyrion found it strange that he was more affected by the death of forty-five men than by the two thousand he killed at the Wall with his wildfire trap. The principles were the same. Sacrificing men to save many more. However, this time, it was different. Men died all day at war. The casualties at the Wall could be considered as an inevitable loss in such a war, but the deaths at Moat Cailin came from… treason. He had turned against allies, against men his own had fought alongside with. He had worked hard to build the Lannister-Tully-Arryn-Stark coalition, and he just ordered his men to slaughter, no butcher other men they called allies and friends just a few hours ago. He had betrayed Jon Snow. A voice in his mind kept saying that he saved one hundred and fifty-five men, he couldn’t shake out the idea that he betrayed the North. And if he betrayed the North, then not only he betrayed Jon Snow, a man who considered him as a friend and that Tyrion had come to consider a friend as well, but he also betrayed Sansa.

He felt more miserable than ever. He tried to atone, to heal what wounds his family’s crimes left behind, and now he created new ones. He could say he wasn’t responsible, that it was this Red Priest who broke the sacred laws of parleys, but it didn’t ease the weigh he felt on his mind.

In the evening, when they stopped for the night, Tyrion was called to dine with the queen. He didn’t look forward to it and would rather stay alone with his thoughts, but he knew better than to refuse a queen, especially one who had all the reasons in the world to hate him and his family.

The queen was courteous enough, though she didn’t seem very happy to see him either. He supposed she was trying to better know who he was, and in that she was clever. A king, or a queen in this case, should always know who her bannermen are. He supposed the fact he was a dwarf might intrigue her a little too. Dwarves who happened to be lords were rare.

Servants brought them some chicken with carrots and lettuce. It wasn’t the high gastronomy Tyrion was used to, but it was a respectable service all the same. Maybe this queen was used to frugal meals. She spent her life in exile after all, and not always in the best living conditions.

“Kinvara told me about what happened at Moat Cailin,” the Targaryen queen said after a while. Tyrion was pouring his second cup of wine.

“I don’t know how the Red Priests ended at your service after supporting Stannis, but they don’t seem aware that there are certain laws to respect in Westeros, like not killing people during a parley.”

“I already berated Geralt for that. Though I heard the Lannisters have a tendency to not respect sacred laws either.”

He should have known this would come. “The Freys broke the guest rights. There were no Lannisters at the Red Wedding.”

“So you deny any involvement of your family in this Red Wedding?”
Tyrion laid down his cup. “I had nothing to see with that, if that’s what you want to know. Whoever was behind it wouldn’t have told me anyway. I’m married with a Stark, should I remind you. My mother-in-law and my brother-in-law died at the Twins, and I made the Freys pay for that later. Anyway, I was only the Master of Coin back then. My job was to count stags and dragons, not heads.”

“Edmure Tully told me about your family’s involvement. I know Tywin Lannister was behind this.” She didn’t look at him accusingly. Her eyes were hard, but not accusing. “It doesn’t matter to me. Starks, Freys, Lannisters, you all fought against my father. I don’t care that you killed each other afterwards. However, this Red Wedding only proves how the Lannisters treat their enemies. Like when you butchered my brother’s family.”

Tyrion took a great inspiration. “What my father ordered was a horrible crime, and one of my first actions when I became Lord of Casterly Rock was to make sure that Gregor Clegane, the man who savagely killed Elia Martell and her children, was killed. If I was in King’s Landing back then and that my father asked my opinion, I would have talked against it, but my father never asked my opinion and I was only a lad back then, kept away from the rest of the world because my father didn’t want people to know too much that he had a dwarf for a son.”

A short time went on before the queen replied. “I thank you for the death of Ser Gregor Clegane, but that doesn’t erase what your family has done.”

“Killing me will not bring your family back to life either. Nor will Jaime’s death bring your father back.”

“What do you know of my father?”

“Not much. I seldom saw him, and from afar. My brother and my father knew him better, but what I know about him mostly comes from rumors and things every noble in Westeros knows.”

She took her own cup. “I know what my father was. What he did. I know the Mad King earned his name.” She took a sip.

“And what do you think of it?” Tyrion asked, out of curiosity and fear for the answer.

“I think I want to be a better ruler than he was.”

That shouldn’t be difficult. It might be more difficult to be a good ruler. “Then I suggest you start by not killing any Stark. Your father and my nephew made the mistake of executing a few of them. Look where they are now.”

She seemed to take into consideration what he said, but she asked a question without relation to the topic. “I was told of what happened at Moat Cailin. Tell me, why did you order your men to kill the Northerners?”

Tyrion sighed. “Because they left us no choice. You told me to give you the fortress before dawn, or else you would burn it to the ground. When they decided to resist, that was the only decision left to take. Of course, if your Red Priest didn’t kill their commander, it might have been possible to end this without bloodshed.”

“He’s not my Red Priest. Still, you swore allegiance to Jon Snow, and yet you didn’t hesitate to kill his men.”

“I just swore allegiance to you.”
“So you switch your allegiance whenever it suits you?”

Tyrion tried to stay calm. “Do you truly believe the other lords wouldn’t switch their allegiance if they saw an interest in that? Dorne sided with you because they hate the Lannisters, the Stormlands surrendered to you because you ravaged their lands, the Tyrells chose you because Cersei killed their heir and tried to kill their daughter, and I’m quite sure Edmure Tully chose to side with you because you would have destroyed Riverrun if he didn’t. The lords of Westeros side with whoever they feel is the best choice for them, or else Dorne and the Reach wouldn’t have abandoned your family after your father died.” He took a pause, but continued. “This is the first time I switch my cloak, your Grace. I was loyal to my family for years through the War of the Five Kings. When my nephew Tommen died, my sister seized the power for herself, after destroying the Great Sept of Baelor and almost killing the previous queen, and she had no claim on the Iron Throne. So when I had proofs that Jon Snow had Targaryen origins, I decided it was more appropriate to declare for him. He makes a better king than Cersei, and he has more claim than her. I didn’t turn on Cersei. She never was my queen. Now we have an enemy we cannot defeat without your help, and if our allegiance is the price for your help and a chance to survive for everyone in Westeros, then I gladly make it, especially since the king I swore an oath to before doesn’t intend to remain king for long. Are you satisfied with my answer?”

She didn’t move a single inch of her body before she spoke. “I’m trying to figure out who you are.”

“So, what are your conclusions?”

“That you might be useful, and more honest than most people have been with me over the past twenty years.” She took another sip. Their supper was finished. “One more question. How did my dragon end up bringing you here?”

“I don’t know,” Tyrion answered in all sincerity. He still wondered about it and couldn’t find a satisfying answer to that. There were many questions he was asking himself that he couldn’t find an answer to. Still, he regretted he wasn’t awaken during the flight.

“Thank you. You may leave.” Tyrion stood up. Things had gone better than he thought they would, and considering his sharp tongue, it seemed this woman wasn’t as mad as her father was. “I hope you prove to be loyal to me as much as you did yesterday,” she added as he left.

Tyrion only made a few steps out before a tall figure appeared before him.

“I guess thanks are in order, since you brought me back from the dead,” he said after it seemed that the woman wouldn’t say anything.

“It isn’t me you should thank. It’s the Lord of Light,” the High Priestess Kinvara said.

Tyrion sighed. “Look, I don’t believe in gods, and despite the fact that I am clueless as to how I was resurrected, the fact we do not understand something doesn’t mean the explanation is a god or some greater power.”

In the darkness, he thought she was smiling sadly at him. “Were you always a cynic?”

No, not always. “You’re losing your time if you’re trying to recruit another follower for your Lord of Light. I lost any faith I could have in gods a long time ago.”

She nodded. “You misunderstand me. I’m not trying to convert you. You don’t need me. But there are other people who need us.”

“Could you stop talking in riddles?”
“There’s a reason for everything that happens in this world, good things and bad things all alike.”

“Let me doubt about it.”

“Really? What’s the worse thing that ever happened to you? What do you regret the most?”

He knew very well what he regretted the most, and he didn’t need this woman to remind him.

“That’s none of your business.”

“I understand.” She didn’t press the matter further. “If this thing hadn’t happened, do you think you would be the same man today, or that you would have the same life?”

“No,” he replied shortly.

“And you’re right. All the horrors we go through, all the mistakes we make, they are what defines us. I made mistakes as well, Tyrion Lannister, and I regret them. But they are in the past, and we can’t change the past. We can affect the present and change the future, on the other hand.” She knelt and looked straight into his eyes. “Do you want to make this world a better place?”

Tyrion looked back into her eyes, green like emeralds. “I’d like to not make it worse than it already is.”

“It’s a start.” She had a condescending smile as she stood up. “You may not believe in our Lord, Tyrion Lannister, but he is real, and your beliefs won’t change it.”

“Your beliefs won’t change mine either.”

She ignored his latest comment. “Melisandre believes you have an important role to play in the war against the dead. She was wrong on several occasions in the past, but I think she may be right on this. There is a great battle coming, and R’hllor showed me that you would be part of it. That’s why I asked him to bring you back. However, there’s one thing I must be sure of.”

She walked to the opposite direction Tyrion was heading to and stopped after a dozen feet, signaling him to follow her. Uncertain about what to do, disobey one of the queen’s closest advisors or take the risk to follow a fanatic, Tyrion finally opted for the second option. They walked through tents and fires. They were no longer in the Neck and properly in the North. Tyrion felt the air was already colder and drier.

“I heard you have a daughter,” the High Priestess said all of a sudden.

“Yes, I do.” He didn’t see what he could gain from hiding it. Everyone certainly knew it by now, or would know it soon enough.

“I had a daughter once.”

Tyrion frowned. “I didn’t know the Red Priests could have children.”

“I wasn’t always in the orders.”

“What happened to her?”

“She’s dead.”

“I’m sorry.” He meant it.

“It’s in the past, and it happened a long time ago.” They maintained a silence for some time, but she broke it again. “She didn’t look like me. Not at all.”

“The same thing happened to my wife. Our child inherited my family’s traits. Shining blond hair and green eyes. It’s a chance she didn’t inherit my size.”

They said nothing after that and walked without a word, until they arrived to a clearing. At the center of it stood a dragon. He was smaller than the black one Tyron saw with the queen. This one was cream-colored, though Tyron noticed his bones, horns and spinal crest were golden. He also seemed quieter than the black one and didn’t move when they entered the clearing. He only looked at him, and did nothing else.

Tyron observed him for a quite some time, and after a while, he realized the beast kept staring at him as well. His eyes were two pools of molten gold. Tyron kept looking into them. Before he could realize what he was doing, his legs brought him closer to the creature, and when he finally realized it, he was midway between the dragon and the younger Red Woman. He kept looking at him. The beast didn’t fly away, or roared, or showed any sign of hostility or fear.

According to some maesters and other people who studied them, dragons were intelligent creatures, maybe more than men. Looking at this one, Tyron was tempted to agree with them. He kept approaching him, as if Tyron was drawn to him, until only a few meters separated them. The dragon’s eyes didn’t leave him, though Tyron looked at other parts of the dragon, like his wings, his claws and, of course, his mouth lined with fangs. He started to be afraid as he got closer, but also excited. The dragon lowered his head to be at the same level than him. He closed the distance, eliminating most of the distance left between them in the process.

Instinctively, Tyron raised a hand and slowly approached it to the muzzle. The air was hot, burning around the animal. Right when he was about to lay his hand on the scales, the dragon closed his eyes and lowered his head. For a short moment, Tyron thought it was kneeling before him, but he quickly realized this was a stupid notion. Dragons didn’t kneel, and the legs of the beast were not bent anyway. The position was certainly only meant to allow him to better touch the dragon. He lowered his hand and touched the scales. As he caressed them, Tyron realized that one of his oldest dreams had come true: to see a dragon and to touch it. If it had been possible for him to have a dragon, he would have liked it to be this one. He wondered what was his name.

A voice from behind gave him the answer. “Viserion!”

Chapter End Notes

This chapter is very special, for three reasons. The first is that Tyron is resurrected. The second is that this story reached the line of 200 bookmarks. The third is that now, "A Shadow and a Wolf" accounts for over 900,000 words. It makes this story the longest fanfiction of Game of Thrones and A Song of Ice and Fire ever written to that day on Archive of Our Own. I think it is quite remarkable that the chapter making it is the one where Tyron comes back to life.

I want to thank everyone who read this story, kudoed it, left comments, or added it to their bookmarks. I started writing it almost two years ago, and I can't believe the way it did ever since. Thank you, dear readers. The journey is coming to an end, but there are still plenty of chapters left, about 30-40, and I can't wait to share them with you. Keep following this story. You'll find out at the very end why it is called "A Shadow and a
A fourth reason why this chapter is very important is probably that this is the first meeting of Tyrion and Daenerys. And a fifth reason would be a "confirmation" of a dragon theory concerning Tyrion. Shortly, there are plenty of reasons why this chapter is so important.

MIRA XII

She felt a shock coming from her stomach. It moved a lot now. The swelling of her belly had become apparent now. Talia firmly commanded her to move as little as she could and to not exhaust herself, but if Mira could be commanded easily by the lady she served or by her parents, her sister was another story, considering she was the eldest. Mira tried to spare herself all the same.

The Iron Grove was empty. The place, once filled with the sounds of feet crunching the leaves and taping the ground, and with children playing hide and seek, was now dead. Rodrik, Asher and Ethan were dead. Talia and Mira were busy rebuilding their home and preparing their people for winter the best they could. Ryon spent his days learning how to fight. Winter had come for House Forrester. If the snows had only covered the ironwood at night, then the sigil of House Forrester would take all its sense.

She gazed at the trunk where she read the evening before her departure. Asher was the only one who hadn’t been there when she left. He was already exiled. Just when she thought she found him again, they lost him. Was House Forrester destined to lose all his men? Ryon was furious when they received the news of Asher’s death. He only trained harder than ever with Beskha. They couldn’t even burn his body in the Grove. Instead he was burned with all the others at Castle Black. No ceremony, no words from their family. Her baby moved again. Mira rested a hand on her belly. Perhaps he felt her grief. She thought it was over, that she was done grieving when she discovered a part of her family survived, and when Highpoint fell, but she was wrong. She lost Asher a first time when he was exiled, then a second time when she heard Ironrath was burned to the ground, and now she lost him for the third time.

“Mira!” Her sister found her.

“Talia.” She didn’t move as she joined her from behind. Mira heard her footsteps as she approached.

“You shouldn’t stay here for long,” Talia warned her.

“I needed some fresh air, Talia. I’m suffocating inside these walls.”

Talia didn’t reply. She just stayed with her.

“Is Ryon still training?”

“Yes. I tried to order him inside, but he wouldn’t listen. Ethan held from Rodrik. I suppose Ryon holds from Asher,” her sister said, fed up. “He’s worse than you.”

“We all have our ways to grieve.”

“Sometimes I envy Ryon, truth be told. While he fights, at least he doesn’t get to think about it. I cannot stop thinking about it. I can’t believe that Asher is gone. And Gwyn… What will happen to her?”

“I don’t know.” She remained silent for a moment. “What do you think is the worst? Losing your husband in the war, or being abandoned by him and knowing you might never see him again?”
“I don’t know,” Talia replied. “The next time I see him…”

“I doubt we’ll ever see him again. He doesn’t even know for the child. I lost him.” Mira shivered. “You’re probably right. I should get back inside.”

“I’m coming with you.”

The sisters headed back together to the castle. They only had each other now. Mira had never been closer to Talia. With Sera, Lady Margaery and Lady Sansa far away, her husband gone, and Ryon training all day, barely noticing his remaining siblings, her sister was all that was left to her. On their way, they saw their little brother, now the new Lord of Ironrath, sparring in the courtyard. Many people were working on removing the snow from the previous days again. They walked past them and entered the Great Hall. Talia followed her into her rooms. She wanted to make sure that Mira would remain there, and Mira knew it. The fire was better kept there, and her sister always asked if she was missing anything. When Talia was satisfied with Mira staying in her chamber, she left.

Still, Mira asked for the ledgers to be brought to her. She looked in despair at the numbers before her. Their stocks of food would never last through winter. She had been sure of that for a whole week now, and like every time she opened the ledgers during this week, she found herself coming to the conclusion that they only had two possibilities. Whether they reduced rations, or they asked for help from Mira’s new house, the Hightowers.

Mira remembered a discussion she once had with Maester Ortengryn a long time ago. She just finished reading her favourite northern tale for the first time, and she was asking him questions about it. She had to be only seven or eight.

“Maester Ortengryn.” She was done with her sums, while Asher and Rodrik still worked on them. Rodrik would probably finish before Asher. “When a man and a woman get married, do they know each other?”

“Of course, Mira,” the maester answered. “The families try to introduce them both before the wedding.”

“So, my parents knew each other before they were married?”

“They were introduced to each other a week before the ceremony.”

Somehow, it seemed rather short for Mira. “Is a week enough to know someone?”

“It depends. Why are you asking all these questions, my lady?”

“I just finished reading the tale of the kingdom of Arendelle. There’s a prince in that tale. He was ready to kill the woman he was about to marry, and her sister as well. He mocked the girl he was supposed to marry, saying she was ready to marry him without knowing him. All he wanted by marrying her was to become king. He didn’t love her.”

Maester Ortengryn had kindly smiled at her. “This is only a tale, Mira. Tales and reality are two very different things.”

“Will my husband try to kill me and Talia, and everyone else to get Ironrath?” she bluntly asked.

Everyone seemed surprised by her question. They shouldn’t be. She was worried for all of them. Their maester had a strange expression on his face. “Mira, no one will ever try to kill you. What kind of man would want to kill you?”
“A charming prince who seduces women so he can get his hands on their home.”

He laughed. “Perhaps, but you will not marry such a man. Your lady mother will never allow it, and neither will Lord Forrester.”

“So, my lady mother is like the Queen Elsa?” she asked.

“Yes, in some way,” he replied with a smile. “Your parents will never marry you to someone you won’t be happy with, Mira. Don’t worry, you’ll marry someone good.”

About ten years later, Mira was still wondering if she should ask help to the Hightowers. They still had no ravens, and a messenger would take some time to arrive to the nearest castle with some. There might not even be ravens for the Hightower there. There would be some for the Citadel, and the Citadel could relay the message to Lord Hightower, but after the way her husband left, she wasn’t sure she wanted to ask help from him and his kin.

“Did I really use you, Gerold, or did you just walk away because you couldn’t get Ironrath? Were you the Hans who only wanted to get his hands on Arendelle?”

She asked the question aloud, not truly expecting an answer. Despite the way they parted ways, Mira still felt something for the man she wed. She felt a pang in her heart whenever she thought about him, but at the same time, she couldn’t forget his last words. I don’t want to see you again. She felt betrayed, abandoned, shattered, and angry, all at the same time. She had a child coming, and his father left her, like she was his paramour or his whore, and not his wife.

Mira started to be afraid for the future. Not only did they have to face an army of undead, but now Asher was dead. Ryon was too young to rule, too wild, too unpredictable. He spent his entire days training and buried his grief in fighting and anger. Mira had prayed in the godswood with her sister for Asher, and they tried to mourn him the best they could, though they had a lot of work and little time for grieving. However, unlike Talia, Mira couldn’t bury herself in work to escape the thoughts of her dead brother, and with her worries concerning her child, she didn’t have much time to rest. She would feel safer if Gerold was still with her and if the Hightowers could help them in these difficult times, but her husband was gone.

As a consequence, because of Ryon’s wild behaviour and of her own physical condition, it was Talia who ruled Ironrath. She often asked Mira for advice, but Talia was the one to rule their house for the time being, while Mira spent most of her days trying to remain warm and enjoying the doubtful pleasures of a pregnancy. She felt another kick coming from the inside. For the thousandth time, she wondered how she would raise her son without his father. The future of House Forrester was in peril with Asher dead. Their alliance with the Whitehills through his marriage with Gwyn was weakened, and Ryon wouldn’t be able to marry and produce an heir before many years. And now, thanks to Gerold, they lost the support of the Hightowers. Winter had come for House Forrester.

Mira sat still, debating whether she should ask or not help to the Hightowers. She didn’t want to beg the people who abandoned her and her family when they needed them the most. On the other hand, she couldn’t let the people of Ironrath starve, but everyone around here talked against the Hightowers since Gerold and his men left. To her kinsfolk, this was treason, and dishonorable.

The door of her chamber opened. The servant remained on the threshold. “Lady Mira.”

“What is it?” she asked.

“Lady Talia summons everyone in the castle to the audience chamber. She has an important Mira frowned. It was strange. “Very well, I’m coming.”

She wondered why Talia didn’t come to talk to her about this. If the matter was so important that you assembled everyone, she should have talked to her about it before. Unless the matter was so important that her sister didn’t have time to warn her. Mira hurried to the audience chamber.

The place was already half-filled when she arrived. Because of her station and the fact that she was pregnant, people stepped aside to leave her space as soon as they saw her, though Mira went to the dais from the sides of the room, like she always used to. Her parents always taught her to remain modest and to not attract attention on her. She did so as she grew up here, and she continued to do so in Highgarden and King’s Landing, safe for the official ceremonies where she accompanied her family or Lady Margaery and when decorum demanded it. Crossing the room in the middle would be a violation of their teachings.

Once she arrived at the dais, she saw Ryon who struggled in their father’s big chair. He didn’t stop to move, and Mira knew that sitting, talking and listening were the last things he wanted to do. Beskha stood near. She was the only person who could make him stay still. She had become a sisterly figure, to the detriment of his real sisters. Mira couldn’t help but be jealous of Asher’s friend. Ryon didn’t remember her well. He was almost a baby when she left Ironrath for Highgarden. It was even harder for Talia, who saw him grow, but now had to look at a foreigner take her place as the oldest sister.

Talia was ahead of Ryon, and she spoke with a man who wore the colors and furs of the Night’s Watch. His back was turned on her. Talia saw her and made a sign with her head to the man she was speaking with. She turned immediately to look at Mira. At first, she didn’t recognize him, but then she remembered the night before her departure, when she was reading in the Iron Grove, and that he came to see her. He asked her when she would come back, and she said she didn’t know when.

“Gared!”

Asher wrote to tell them that Duncan’s son was still alive and had safely arrived at Castle Black, but it was one thing to hear he was alive and to actually see him alive. He was taller than in her memories, bigger, and he had a growing beard all around his chin and on his cheeks. He also looked more serious, harder, but the moment she said his name, his expression mellowed.

“Mira.”

He stayed there, looking at her. Mira smiled, and she closed the distance to give him a large hug, like they used to do before. Gared returned the embrace. Seeing him alive were the only good news they had for a long time.

“I’m glad to see you,” she told him after she broke their embrace.

“Me too, Mira.”

“You’re a man now,” she said, almost in wonder.

“And you’re a wed woman, and soon a mother.”

Mira looked at her belly, the source of many joys and torments during the last days. She turned back her attention to her old friend. His expression had gone darker. “Why are you here?”

Gared looked at Talia, who nodded while turning her gaze to the crowd. The room was completely filled now. Mira stood proud, the face neutral, like she was taught. Talia spoke.
“My friends, we gathered you because we have important tidings to bring to you.” She looked at Gared. “This is Gared Tuttle. He was the squire for Lord Gregor Forrester during the war, and fought valiantly for our family. He is now a sworn member of the Night’s Watch, and he has important news to share.”

Gared stepped forward while Talia backed off. He didn’t do any introduction and went straight to the point. “The Wall has fallen.” There was an absolute silence in the hall. Mira felt her heart stop.

“Our defenses at Castle Black were brought down. The dead are coming for us, and there is nothing to stop them,” Gared continued. People were chattering among themselves, afraid and panicked. “Jon Snow, our king, ordered every man and woman in the North to take refuge in one of the great castles. Ironrath is not well defended enough. You must leave. Jon Snow decided that you would take refuge in Winterfell.”

Debate irrupted immediately under the form of shouting. “We can’t abandon Ironrath!”

“How many of us will die on the way to Winterfell?”

“Our walls are not strong enough. They will kill us all!”

“I already abandoned this place to the Whitehills before. I won’t leave it to the White Walkers as well.”

“Please!” Talia said loudly. “Our king gave us an order. We are to assemble at Winterfell to organize a strong defense and have a chance to live. We won’t stand a chance here at Ironrath.”

“And if they kill us before we reach Winterfell?” a man asked.

“This is a risk we must take,” Gared replied. “I know this is not an easy choice. We are asking you to abandon your homes and everything you hold dear, but if you don’t do that, you will die.”

“I will not go.” Ralten, the blacksmith, spoke up. Among the smallfolk of Ironrath, his voice carried weight. “I already abandoned Ironrath once. I will not do it twice. This is where I live, and this is where I will die.”

Many in the room approved him. Mira couldn’t let this happen. “Ralten, the last time, when the Whitehills took Ironrath, you fled, didn’t you?” she asked him.

“Yes, my lady. I did, and I regret it.”

“I don’t.” He looked shocked by her reply. “If you hadn’t fled, you wouldn’t have come back to rebuild Ironrath today. If everyone fought to the death against Ludd Whitehill, none of us would be alive today, and Ironrath would still be a ruin. Ironrath can be rebuilt. By leaving, we are not abandoning our home. We are giving it a second chance. If we stay and we all die, there will be no one to rebuild the castle once the war is over. Worse, after our death, what’s left of us will join the army of the Night King and help him to kill every living Northerner. Ironrath is my home, and it your home to every one of you here, but if we want it to be our home, we must live. We have to abandon it so we can come back later. If we all die, Ironrath will only be a ruin without anyone living in. And without its people, Ironrath is nothing.”

Silence settled among the assembled people. No one dared to contradict her. Mira didn’t want to abandon her home when she just came back, but if the dead had crossed the Wall and were closing on them, they had to leave, and now, or else they would die.

“We leave in an hour,” Talia declared. “Bring everything necessary with you. Byron, charge all the carts we have with all the food we can bring. Only take what is necessary.”

People scattered to prepare the departure. Some lingered behind, but at the end they followed the others. Mira went to her chambers where she took a few personal belongings, things she didn’t want to leave behind. The broach Lady Margaery gave her. Ethan’s carving. Asher’s Yunkish coin. The last book Rodrik offered her. And, after some hesitation, a golden shawl that her husband offered her a few days after their wedding.

Just when she was about to leave, Gared came to see her. “We’re arranging a place for you in one of the carts with the provisions. It would be dangerous for you to ride,” he told her.

“Thank you.”

She placed heavy furs on her shoulders and left her chambers. She cast one last look behind, reflecting that it might be the last time she would see the place where she grew up, and left, Gared on her heels. “Are you alright?”

“Yes,” she said. It wasn’t entirely true. She was tired. Bearing a child truly was a battle.

“I’m sorry for what happened, with your husband,” Gared said.

She chased the thought of it from her mind. “We have more important concerns right now, Gared.”

“Yes, I agree.”

They arrived in the courtyard, where carts and horses were being assembled. A thin snow was falling, but Mira was afraid that it would get worse. Gared helped her to climb into one of the carts. They positioned sacks of grains so they were like cushions, and she had a cover for her as well. Despite this, Mira shivered when she sat in the cart. Her father’s former squire stood for a while next to her.

“Gared, why did you disappear for so long beyond the Wall?” she asked him.

“It’s a long story,” he said. “I’ll tell you everything on the way if we have time, or when we arrive at Winterfell.” He looked around him, as if to verify that no one was spying on them, then produced something hidden under his furs. It was a small sack he could hold in the palm of his hand.

“Mira, take this, and hide it. Don’t let anyone know that you have it.”

“What is it?” she asked.

“I’ll tell you on the way, but know that the future of House Forrester may depend of what’s inside this.”

After a moment, Mira decided to take it. Gared walked away and saddled a horse near Talia. Mira weighed the sack and touched it to guess what could be inside. As the order was given to go forward, she felt the small rounds inside. She looked at her home slowly reducing, then disappearing as they rode south toward Winterfell, fleeing away from the dead, and as the last trees came out of sight, by the shapes of the things that were inside the sack, she knew what Gared gave her. She never thought she would touch and see real ones, for it was said that the original seeds disappeared thousands of years ago.

Next chapter: Trystane
Where Trystane must inquire on a murder. As you will be able to see, it is another normal day in the capital of the Seven Kingdoms.

to them. They won’t believe a single word of what I say, but they will believe you. I need your help to prevent all this to end into an open war between Dorne and the Reach.”

“What happened?” she asked.

“We’re not sure, but according to the first testimonies I collected, it seems a quarrel was started in a tavern where Lord Ashford was, and it ended up in a huge fight between my countrymen and yours. Lord Ashford died of his injuries not long later. Two Dornishmen lost a hand. If we are not careful, this could all come to a war. Is that really what you want?”

Her gaze wandered away before her eyes came back to him. “I’ll talk to Lord Ashford’s men, but he is one of my father’s most loyal bannermen. Even if I convince everyone to stay calm, they will ask for some retribution. A lord was killed.”

“I’m making my own investigation on all this. We will discover the truth.”

“You’ll have to give something to my father’s men. The promise of an investigation will never be enough. They will demand that someone pays for Lord Ashford’s death.”

Trystane shook his head in disbelief. “Just convince them to do nothing rash. We must maintain the peace.”

“I might succeed, but sooner or later, they will take action. Don’t expect them to remain idle when my father arrives with his army. Your ten thousand Dornishmen won’t convince him to stay quiet when he sees the body of his ambassador.”

“I thank you, my lady.”

Trystane proceeded to walk to the door, already dreading the task ahead of him, when Margaery called him. “Trystane, keeping the peace is wonderful, but when you face someone who doesn’t want peace, it’s a lost cause. My family made this error with Cersei. Don’t make the same mistake with your countrymen.”

Trystane left and went to the Grand Maester’s chamber. The Citadel finally chose one. His name was Perwyn, and he came from Old Oak. This meant that he would likely be favorable to the Tyrells. Trystane would have to be careful with this man considering the situation. He couldn’t be considered impartial. He was still observing Lord Ashford’s body when Trystane came in, writing notes on a piece of paper nearby while using a Myrish glass to better see the injuries.

“My lord.” He straightened himself to salute Trystane. He decided to not point out that he was a prince and not a lord.

“Grand Maester. How are your examinations going?”

“Well, for now, I cannot find the cause of the death, my lord.”

“What do you mean?”

“He has several bruises, certainly the results of some punches and kicks in the brawl. In fact, these are the only injuries that are visible on eyesight, safe for a cut on the right arm, but it is superficial. I thought Lord Ashford died of some broken rib or another broken bone that might have pierced a vital organ, especially considering the blood on his face, but that doesn’t seem to be the case. Every bone seems to be in perfect position. And he has no other injury.”

Trystane looked at the body. It was one of a man of middle-age, about forty-years-old, with blond hair beginning to turn grey and a fair face. “Is it possible that he had a heart attack?”

“Maybe. I’m considering the possibility, but I would rather be sure. In fact, I am wondering if my lord would allow me to open the body.”

Trystane stared right in his eyes. “Out of the question. We can’t.”

“This might be the only way to know for sure how Lord Ashford died.”

“I said no. I’m sorry, Perwyn, but you’ll have to find your answers another way.”

“As you wish, my lord,” the Grand Maester said, defeated. Trystane knew they might get better answers, but the Tyrells wouldn’t appreciate that they treated the body of their dead lord this way. He didn’t want to give any more reasons for a general fighting between Martells and Tyrells.

“I’m going to question Lord Ashford’s men, and then I’ll interrogate the people who assisted to the fight in this tavern. Perhaps we’ll have a better idea of how he died then. In the meantime, keep examining him.”

Perwyn nodded. Trystane left him to his work and went to the Great Hall where the knights who accompanied Lord Ashford to the tavern and who were with him when he died were waiting for him. Trystane sat on the rough edges of the Iron Throne and looked at the seven men who stood before him.

“Sers, first, accept my regrets and those of our queen for what happened to Lord Ashford. This is a tragedy. The Grand Maester is conducting a thorough examination as we speak to determine the cause of his death, and I assure you we will do everything we can to find out who did this, but first, I wish to hear how this all started.”

Ser Andrew Courtney spoke. “Lord Asford went to this tavern with a few of us to drink. Not long after we took our drinks, a group of Dornishmen walked inside as well. They took place not far from us, and they began to insult us. We exchanged a few words with them, to defend our honor, and then, one of them hit Ser Wallys. We came to his defense, and the other Dornishmen joined as well, and the fight began. We mostly exchanged punches. No sword and no spear were drawn. Another group of Dornishmen, a patrol, came inside and separated us. They blamed us, my prince. They said we started the fight, and ordered us to leave the place. We almost had to carry our lord all the way to the Red Keep. He was hurt. Not long after we arrived, he began to cough, and to spit blood. He died a few minutes later.”

“So he didn’t die in the tavern? He died in he Red Keep.”

“Yes, but these Dornishmen had injured him. We demand justice, my prince. Lord Ashford died because of them. They killed him.”

“Did Lord Ashford have any health problem?”

“No, not that we know of.”

Trystane thought about it. The death seemed strange. “Did he show any sign of weakness, of injury on your way back to the Red Keep? Was something unusual?”

“Hell, we almost had to carry him to the Red Keep. We demand justice for our lord.”

Trystane heard the testimony of each one of them. They almost all said the same thing, with a few variances. They all accused the Dornishmen to have started the fight. Trystane had to be careful to not show his skepticism. Dorne and the Reach had a very long history of war and blood, and he suspected the knights of Lord Ashford to not tell the entire truth. After he heard them, he sent them out and called the officers of the City Watch on patrol who interrupted the fight. These came from Dorne.

According to his countrymen, the fight was well started when they arrived, and they had to struggle to stop all this. They said the knights of the Reach were more difficult to comply. They said they sent the Ashfords away because they could only cause more trouble. Trystane had to admit that with the much larger amount of Dornishmen in the capital, it was better for any man from the Reach to remain inside the Red Keep and away from places where his people used to go.

According to the words of the Dornish who took part to this fight, it all began because a drunken knight from the Reach grabbed a girl who was with a Dornish, and the fight began after that. Each group went to defend the man from their homeland.

Trystane had two different versions of the story. He thought that the best way to get the truth was to ask other witnesses, the other patrons who were in the tavern back then, and perhaps the owner and the employees. Trystane took his horse and brought ten men of his personal guard with him. Criminals were many in the streets of the city right now, and precautions were required.

The owner of the tavern welcomed him with a profusion of compliments and bows, and offered him freely his best ale, but Trystane kindly refused.

“I have a few questions for you. There’s a fight that happened here yesterday. I’d like to know what happened exactly.” He placed a silver stag on the table to encourage the man. He was big, with an unkept beard, and he had a booming voice. This man was certainly used to shout. The owner took the coin without hesitation.

“I remember that day very well. We struggled to survive right now, with the winter, the damage the Mad Queen caused, not to mention robbers and killers that walk all around in the streets. It’s a miracle that I can still hold this place. Well, we had some chance, or so I thought yesterday, when a few knights from the Reach came in. These people always have a lot of money to spend. One of them was a lord, some lord Asher, or Ashor, I’m not sure. They asked for my best ale and my best food. I made good money with them. I hadn’t seen a silver coin for centuries. They kept drinking, and the money kept coming, so I encouraged them to keep drinking, until they asked for some of my girls. That allows to make good money as well. It was at this moment that the others came in. These guys from the south, your country. Without insulting you, they don’t pay as well as those from the Reach, and they were obviously not as rich. I didn’t want any trouble, so I tried to place them in a corner of the room, but they refused. The guy who was at their head decided to take place right next to the knights. They began to insult each other. A few of my girls went to the Dornish, to amuse them, and the knights said they were wasting their time on Dornishmen. The two groups kept talking against each other. And then, one of the Dornish stood up and grabbed one of my girls who sat on the legs of a knight. The knight pushed the Dornish, or perhaps it was the other way around, I’m not sure. Then the other spat at his face. I’m quite sure it was the Dornish who spat. Then they started to fight, and their friends joined them. It was a chance the City Watch wasn’t far. These idiots would have destroyed my place. I was lucky that it survived the flames and the battle with the dragons. I don’t want to lose it to some bastards who don’t like how the others smell.”

Now Trystane had a third version. The owner’s story wasn’t clear or clean cut like the two others, but he suspected she was probably closer to the reality. His father often noticed when he rendered justice that the most truthful testimonies were those where the witness wasn’t entirely sure of what happened.
“May I ask questions to your employees?” Trystane asked.

“Of course. But please, don’t bother them for too long. I have work to do.”

Trystane first asked questions to the two men who worked there. The first wasn’t inside when the fight started, but he saw the two groups insulting each other before it came to fists. The second witnessed the whole scene. He said that it was a knight in red armor, the color of House Ashford, who tried to grab a girl away from a Dornishmen. He also claimed that the Dornishman was mistreating the girl, and that the knight was only trying to help her.

Then Trystane turned his inquiry to the girls. He knew well enough that this establishment had to be a tavern as much as a brothel. The only difference was that, unlike the specialized establishments made for the rich merchants of the capital, the knights and the lords, only customers who bought drinks could ask for the services of these girls, if they were ready to pay for them as well. Most of the girls who worked here were in the room when the brawl began. Some received fists in the altercation. They complained about it, but although Trystane showed concern and apologized for what they had to endure, he was mostly interested in what they had to tell him about the whole incident.

Sadly, many only realized there was a fight when it started. They didn’t see the events that led to it, occupied as they were with other customers. Still, one saw the whole action. Her friend was sitting on the knees of a knight with red colors. “Then one of these other men from Dorne grabbed her by the arm, bringing her close to him. The red knight was angry. He pushed the other man, and the other man, the one who grabbed my friend, he spat at his face. They began to fight. And then the fight broke. I was dropped on the floor by another man. They began to break everything.”

Trystane shook his head when she was done with her version. It seemed all this had been nothing but a stupid brawl between men from the Reach and from Dorne over whores. The last girl he interrogated was the one who found herself at the center of the commotion.

“I did nothing, I swear,” she said.

“No one is accusing you,” Trystane told her. “Just tell me what happened.”

“Well, I was just doing my job, amusing one of the knights, and then there was this Dornish who grabbed me by the arm. Then the knight tried to get me back, and the fight started. I barely managed to escape. I’m lucky I didn’t get any bruise in that.”

“So, that’s all?”

“Yes, though I wish the gold cloaks didn’t send the red knights away. I mean, without offense ser, but Dornishmen are really too strange sometimes. I can’t believe some of you have no balls.”

Trystane frowned. “No balls?”

“Yeah. There was this man among them. He seemed younger than the others, and smaller too. When I approached him and tried to grab his balls… there was nothing. I heard all sorts of rumors on Dornish, but I never thought this one could be true. I didn’t like this one. I even thought he was about to kill me at one moment.”

“Really?”

“Yeah, I saw him holding a dagger in his hand. He hid it under his cloak right after I saw it.”
That caught Trystane’s attention. “Can you describe him? How did he look like?”

“It’s like I told you, ser. He was smaller than his companions. Perhaps paler too. I’m not sure. I didn’t see his face, but I’m sure of one thing, he didn’t have any balls. It’s really disgusting. They could tell us when it’s the case. It would be the least of courtesies. I know that I’m a tavern girl, but still.”

“Thank you.” Trystane hastily left her. He asked questions to the other people there. The owner, the male employees and the girls, none could confirm that they saw one of the Dornish with a knife during the fight, though a few admitted or complained that they couldn’t see many details in the general confusion.

Finally, Trystane had to content himself with what he had. He left the tavern and came back to the Red Keep. On his way, he saw the difficult efforts that were made to rebuild. Most people would spend the first year of winter in rudimentary shelters. The surviving buildings from Cersei’s madness were occupied for the most by the Dornish soldiers. They were a great source of income for those who didn’t lose everything, and a way to protect what they had left. Soldiers provided both money and protection to those who welcomed them as residents in their homes or shops. For those who didn’t have the chance to have a home, the situation was much more difficult, with criminality, sickness and cold to torture them at every hour of the day.

Trystane arrived to the Red Keep and went immediately to ask other questions to the knights who were present when Lord Ashford died. When he arrived, they were discussing one of the last decisions that Tommen Baratheon had taken before he died, which was to outlaw the trials by combat. Varys told Trystane that Myrcella’s brother did this in the hope that the Sparrows would release his mother and his wife in exchange. He asked the knights a few more questions on how the lord died, and when he had the answers he was seeking, he went to see the Grand Maester. He was still examining the body.

“Perwyn, something new?” Trystane asked.

“Perhaps, my lord.” He joined his hand and deeply exhaled. “I know the gravity of what I’m about to say, my lord, but I believe it might be possible that Lord Ashford was poisoned.”

“It is not only possible, Perwyn. This is what happened.”

“My lord?”

“I questioned the men who were present when he died. They said he began to bleed by the nose and to have difficulty to breathe about a few hours after the fight in the tavern. It wasn’t the fight that killed Lord Ashford. Someone poisoned him. You told me there was a cut on his body?”

“Yes, my lord, on the upper part of his right arm. There.” The Grand Maester indicated the little cut right under the elbow. “I am no expert in poison, my lord, but I know it is possible to inject some in the bloodstream by using a blade drenched into the said poison. However, when it happens, we should see an infection where the blade cut, which is not the case here. The cut is clean, without any sign of corruption.”

“Tell me, did the cut start to heal before he died?”

The Grand Maester leaned forward the look at the cut more closely. “I think… We’ve got something here, my lord. This injury should have started to cicatrize. If it was made during the brawl, there should be early signs of healing, but here, it seems like the cut was made only right before he died.”
“It wasn’t. It was made at the tavern, I’m quite sure of that.”

“If you say so, my lord,” Perwyn uncertainly said. “Halt to the cicatrisation process. Blood dripping from the nose. Struggle to breathe. And the effects start hours after the poison enters the bloodstream. I don’t know. I should write to my colleagues at the Citadel. They should be able to provide me with an answer.”

“Write to the Citadel, Perwyn, but I think I know what poison did this.”

“You know, my lord?”

“Yes.” And I know of only one person in the capital who uses it.

A few minutes later, Trystane gave the order to Lord Yronwood to gather his best men for an important mission.

“What mission is that, my prince?” he asked.

“You must arrest Tyene Sand, and bring her to the black cells, for the murder of Lord Edrik Ashford.”

At last, his cousin would face the consequences of her actions.

JON XIII

The gates opened and Jon rode into Winterfell. After weeks of traveling south, organizing the defenses in the castles along the way, and fighting back the dead who pursued them, he was home. The vanguard had already arrived, so the castle was filled with soldiers who were waiting for them. Jon had given responsibility of the main body of their army to Ser Davos, with their baggage train, while Jon commanded the rearguard who had to slow down the dead behind, giving time to the carts of weapons and provisions to reach Winterfell safely.

The first half of the journey had been horrible. They were being attacked every day, and they barely managed to keep the enemy away, and every time at high cost. Jon had placed three thousand men in the rearguard when they left Castle Black. Only five hundred were left, and Jon was sure that most of those who died were turned into wights. Of the large army they had at Castle Black, barely half were still alive. Five thousand men dead, and all that Jon managed to do was to delay the progress of the White Walkers. Tyrion had done the same, but he only lost two thousand men.

Ser Davos and Arya were waiting for him when he unhorsed. “Your Grace, we’re glad to see you made it. Are the wights close?” his main advisor asked.

“We haven’t seen them for a week.”

“That means you put some distance between you.”

“I don’t think I have much to earn from it. The Night King is probably increasing his numbers. There are hundreds of thousands of bodies all across the North, buried under the ground, and preserved by the cold. The White Walkers are probably awakening them as we speak, and the more they awake, the more they gain in strength.”

Davos’s eyes widened in fear. “Gods, I didn’t think about it.”

Jon steeled himself to give an order he gave to all the people he left in charge of a stronghold. “Ser Davos, we must burn the dead. All of them.”

The Onion Knight nodded, though it was obvious he relinquished the job. “That means we must burn Father’s body, and Rickon’s too?” Arya asked.

“We have no choice, Arya. If Father was alive, I think he would tell us to burn his body after he’s dead.”

Arya nodded. She understood. This wasn’t a pleasing notion to Jon either, to profane the tombs of his ancestors, but the situation required it. “Where are Tyrion and Sansa? Is everything ready for a siege?” He had to speak with them, and Jon had apologies to present to his friend.

Ser Davos and Arya seemed bothered by what he said. “Your Grace, you better follow us,” the knight said.

Jon did what he said, and they all went to the part of the castle where the rooms of the Lord of Winterfell were positioned. On their way, Jon saw Gared Tuttle discussing with Talia Forrester.
They found Bran in his old chambers. Meera Reed was with him. Ser Davos closed the door behind them.

“Bran, I’m glad to see you.”

“Me too, Jon.” His brother made a forced smile.

“Lady Meera.”

“Young Grace, is my father with you?”

Jon inhaled deeply before he answered. “My lady, your father was with me in the rearguard. I’m sorry to tell you this, but Howland Reed died in the surroundings of the Last Hearth. He gave his life so others could live.”

Her face broke down. “Meera,” Bran said in a low voice. She gripped his hand.

“I’m sorry, Meera. I know what it is to lose your father,” Arya said.

The Reed girl acknowledged Arya’s words. Jon placed a hand on the shoulder of the sister he always loved the most. He knew how hard it had been for her when she saw their father being executed in King’s Landing.

“I’m afraid Lord Reed’s death is not the only dire news we have,” Ser Davos said. “The Last Hearth and Karhold fell. The maesters there sent ravens not long before they were overwhelmed by the wights. The lands south of the Gift are falling.”

“Ned Umber,” Jon whispered. The boy had gone back to the Last Hearth. He and his uncle Mors had to be dead now. “What about the Dreadfort. Any news from Ser Brynden?”

“He answered our raven a few days ago. He’s preparing the defenses there. For now, they haven’t seen a single wight, but I’m afraid it won’t take long.”

Jon sighed. “How is Lady Karstark?” He hoped she wasn’t too affected by the loss of her home. It was a chance that she was at Winterfell when it happened, still.

“Young Grace, Alys Karstark is dead,” Ser Davos declared.

“Dead? How did this happen?”

Davos looked at Arya. Jon’s little sister started long explanations. “Jon, when I arrived in Winterfell two weeks ago, the castle was empty.”

“Empty?”

“Everyone was dead. There were bodies everywhere. The sentinels, the guards, the servants, Maester Wolkan, the knights, the lords, the women, the children, they were all dead.”

“Tyrion? Sansa?”

“We haven’t found their bodies,” Ser Davos said, “and we found no trace of their daughter either. But when me and my men approached Winterfell, we came across a spot on the Kingsroad. There were bodies everywhere. Most were wearing Lannister helmets, but there were a few of the Vale as well. We didn’t find Lord Tyrion’s body, but we found his squire, Podrick Payne. He had been dead for weeks.”
Sansa and Tyrion, gone? Dead? That was impossible. “What happened?”

Ser Davos pursed his lips. “When I looked through the reports and correspondence of the Lady Sansa, I found out that a group of Knights of the Vale stayed at Winterfell for quite some time. They were those who deserted the Wall last month, led by Ser Vance Corbray, the commander of Queensgate who defected. And according to your sister’s note, they were about two thousand men. We found a few bodies of men with sigils from the Vale on them, but not that much. More interesting, there were men with such sigils among the bodies we found on the Kingsroad. And finally, there are remnants of a recent camp outside, with no bodies to be seen. It is most likely the camp Lord Vance’s men raised when they stayed here.”

“The Knights of the Vale turned against us,” Bran declared. “They attacked us, taking us unaware. They slaughtered everyone. Meera and I escaped because one of our men hid us in the crypts. We stayed there for days before Arya arrived and found us.”

“The Vale betrayed us?” Jon asked.

“Not all of them,” Davos said. “I already questioned their men who are here, those who didn’t desert. They claim they knew nothing about it, though Lord Rolland Longthorpe said something strange. He remained at Queensgate when Ser Vance Corbray deserted. His son was Lord Vance’s squire, and he eavesdropped a discussion Ser Corbray had with one of his men not long before he left. He said he would only give his support to someone if he got his revenge for his brother’s death.”

“Ser Lyn.” Jon looked at Arya. She killed Ser Lyn Corbray back at the Eyrie. “Who was he supposed to support?”

“We don’t know, but whoever it was, it seems that Ser Vance wanted revenge for his brother’s death. Perhaps he saw killing the Lady Sansa and her daughter as revenge enough for the death of his brother. A sister for a brother.”

Jon looked away. Tyron. Sansa. Their daughter. The last time he saw the little man, they quarrelled about the wildfire that killed thousands of men. Now that the White Walkers were invading the North, Jon had come to accept the fact that Tyron’s actions had been necessary. Terrible, deadly, maybe cruel, but necessary. How many people were turned into wights as they spoke? How many of the men they left in castles along the Wall wouldn’t make it alive, now that the dead could strike them by behind?

“As we said, we found no body of the Lady Sansa and her daughter. Maybe they were taken as prisoners. The Lady of Casterly Rock and her only daughter can make valuable hostages. As for Lord Tyrion, I don’t give him much chance to survive. The snows covered most of the bodies on the road. His is probably buried somewhere. We couldn’t dig out most of the dead.”

Jon had wanted to reconcile with Tyrion when they met again, but they wouldn’t. He would never see his friend again, the one who saved his life once at Castle Black, who came to his help against the dead when no one would, and who took care of his sister when she was a prisoner in the south. Jon had never entirely liked the dwarf’s bitter sense of humor, but now he regretted it more than ever. And Sansa and Joanna, they were gone as well.

“Do you have any idea where my sister could be?” he asked.

“I already sent ravens everywhere in the North, warning them about the betrayal of Ser Vance and demanding that they give any information they might have on the Lady Sansa, to tell us if they saw any sign of her or her baby. I ordered Moat Cailin and White Harbor to search every person who would pass by. If they want to leave the North, they can only do it by the harbor or by the Neck. For a group as large as theirs, these are their only options.”

Jon gripped his sword. “Do everything you can. And Ser Davos, I want you to find Tyrion’s body.”

“Your Grace, I understand, but I don’t believe it is wise. The White Walkers…”

“I will not leave him dead in the snows to be turned into a wight like everyone else!”

“Jon is right. We shouldn’t abandon him. What if it was your son, Ser Davos? Or your wife? You would want them to come back like this?” Arya asked.

His advisor was silent for a moment, but it was Bran who interrupted them. “Jon, Arya, I understand. I regret Tyrion’s death as well, but I don’t believe he would like us to risk our lives only to be sure he wouldn’t come back as an undead man. And we won’t make it better for Sansa or anyone if one of us, or anybody dies only to burn Tyrion’s body.”

“I agree with Lord Bran, your Grace. We must focus our attention on enhancing the defenses of Winterfell,” Ser Davos argued. “If this castle falls, then we are doomed.”

Jon looked straight into the knight’s eyes. “Ser Davos, do we truly have a chance to survive? We couldn’t hold them at the Wall, and it was where we were better positioned to fight them. They were over a hundred thousand after Hardhome. Now there might be even more. What are the odds for us? Have the odds ever been in our favor in this war? Tyrion is dead, and Sansa… she might be dead as well for what we know. Maybe they killed her outside Winterfell. Do you really think we can beat them?”

Ser Davos’s lips quivered. “We cannot, not alone. You are right. But we have to try, if only to delay the inevitable. We have to give these fuckers a fight, even if it’s useless. Even if we are doomed to all die in the end, at least we can bring as many of them in the grave with us.”

“I agree with Ser Davos, Jon. We cannot abandon, not now. Not after everything we’ve done. Not after so many people died for us,” Arya said.

“Even if the White Walkers defeat us, we may have provided enough time for the other kingdoms to prepare for their coming. Every wight, every White Walker we kill, it won’t be in vain,” Bran said.

Jon looked at all of them. They were determined to fight. He remembered a time when he wanted to abandon everything, when he came back from the dead. He needed the news of Rickon’s captivity to force him back into the fray. His only relatives still alive were all in this room, safe for Sansa, but she may be dead for all he knew. No, not all of them. He had another one somewhere, an aunt.

“Any news from Daenerys?”

“None,” Davos replied.

Jon sighed. “Well, like Ser Davos said, better to give these fuckers a fight. Send ravens everywhere. Tell every lord in the North to fight to the death, and warn the other kingdoms of the coming of the dead. King’s Landing, Casterly Rock, Highgarden, Horn Hill, Runestone, Duskendale, Harrenhal, everywhere. Even if it takes all the ravens we have. Did you announce Tyrion’s death to Casterly Rock?”

“Not yet.”

“Tell them. They have the right to know.”
“Yes, your Grace.”

Ser Davos nodded and left the room. Jon looked at his brother. “Bran, can you tell us where the army of the dead is right now?”

Bran looked ashamed. “Jon, I’m not sure this is possible any longer. My powers… I can’t control them. Not like before. I want to see something, and I see something else. There are times a vision starts all of a sudden, without warning, and others where I can’t manage to have one. And… I’m afraid that each time I start one, I may never come back. The Three-Eyed Raven warned me that if I remained too long, I could drown. I didn’t understand what he meant back then, but perhaps he was warning me about this.”

“He can’t warg like he could before,” Meera Reed added. “Every time he starts a vision or he wargs into a raven, he may never come back. He might end stuck into the vision, or into the mind of the raven.”

“I could try…”

“Out of the question!” The girl snapped immediately.

“Meera, we must know where the White Walkers are.”

“Have you forgotten the last time? You spent an entire day in some sort of trance back in the crypts, and after we managed to get you out, you could barely move or speak.”

“That won’t happen again.”

“We know very well this is a promise you can’t hold.”

Bran looked at him. “Jon.” He begged him to intervene.

Jon didn’t know what to do. He didn’t want to lose Bran, not when he just lost Sansa and Tyrion. On the other hand, Bran was one of their main assets against the White Walkers.

“We know the dead are coming,” Arya intervened. “They will be here one day or another. Whether it’s today, tomorrow or the next week, we know they will be here. We don’t need visions to know that. I say we leave Bran alone and prepare for their assault. Three-Eyed Raven or not, they will come anyway.”

“I have to try anyway,” Bran insisted. “We know the dead are coming, but knowing when, how and how many might help us.”

“Bran, do you really think that you could help us, and that you can come back from these dreams you have?” Jon asked.

“I can.”

A heavy silence settled into the room. “I will not forbid you to go back into your visions,” Jon said, resigned.

“Jon!” Arya shouted.

“I just hope you know what you’re doing.”

“You once died for people who were your enemies not long ago, Jon,” Bran said. He looked at him, then at Arya, then at Meera. “Tell me you’re not ready to die for the people you love, and I give up on being the Three-Eyed Raven, I give up on the visions, I give up on warging, and I go back to being the crippled boy everyone pities.”

“Bran, you’re not a cripple,” Arya said.

“Then Tyrion wasn’t a dwarf, and you’re not a girl.”

“Bran, don’t do it because you want to prove that you’re not useless,” Jon told him.

“This isn’t why I’m doing it. I’m doing because I must. We all have different destinies, Jon. Each one of us. When I was a boy, I thought I would be a knight later, but I was wrong. I will never be a knight. I will never wield a sword, I will never mount a horse, or bend a bow. I will never save people the way you and Arya do with your sword, or the way Meera does it with her spear, but I can save many more with my powers. That’s my duty, and you know that if Father was in my place, he would do the same.”

Jon looked at his brother. He visited him before he left Winterfell. He talked to him, despite the fact Bran couldn’t hear him. He was always full of life when he was a boy. Now, he was a broken man, stuck to a wheelchair. He couldn’t do anything without help.

“I suppose the time when we climbed walls and played with wooden swords is over,” Jon said with regret.

Bran nodded with a sad expression. “Yes, it is over.”

“Just promise us to be careful.”

“I will be.”

“Meera, can you keep an eye on him?”

“All right,” she said after a moment, bitterness plain in her tone.

Bran shot a last glance at her, then let his head fall and closed his eyes. When they opened again, they were white like the sky.

Jon and Arya both exchanged a look with Meera, who assured them with her eyes that she wouldn’t leave their brother, and they left. They didn’t say a word for quite some time. They arrived on the battlements, where men were busy organizing the castle’s defenses.

“Jon,” Arya said.

“Aye.”

“If I die, promise me you’ll burn my body.” She was looking straight into his eyes. “I don’t want to come back like one of these things.”

“At one condition. You burn my body if I’m the one to die.”

She nodded. “I’ll make sure your ashes are next to Father’s and aunt Lyanna’s.”

Jon looked towards the crypts. “I’m sorry we have to do this.”

“Do you think Sansa is still alive?”
“I know she still lives,” Arya replied after a moment of hesitation.

“How can you be sure?”

“Sansa survived King’s Landing, Joffrey, Cersei, Tywin. She’s not… she’s not like me, but she’s a survivor, just like me. Just like us. Even death couldn’t kill you.”

Jon smiled. “Right. I hope she’s alive. I was never close to her, but… When I was at the Wall, when I thought that all my family was dead, she wrote to me. And then I knew I wasn’t alone anymore. And then we found you, and Bran.”

“Well, I found Sansa, much more than she found me.”

“Aye, but the next time you find one of us, please try not to kill him.”

They laughed very shortly. “Ser Davos seems to believe that Tyrion is dead, but if his body was never found… Do you think he could still be out there, somewhere?”

Arya shrugged. “He survived the sky cells of aunt Lysa, two trials, the mountains of the Vale and its hill tribes, months in the Neck, and me. He’s not easy to kill. And he also survived a marriage with Sansa. I don’t know how he did.”

He couldn’t stop laughing either. He wanted to hang on the hope that his friend and his other sister were still alive, even though the odds were slim.

“All right, we’re all hard to kill, I agree.” That didn’t make them immortal. “Did you and Ser Davos take care of everything while I was out there, fighting the dead?”

“Everything is ready. We have fires everywhere on the battlements, so we can shoot as many flaming arrows as we want. We have barrels of oil to spill on the outer walls and the grounds outside. We thought about placing scorpions, but they wouldn’t do much damage, so instead we placed catapults with flaming boulders in the courtyard. I regret we don’t have some wildfire to throw at them. The castle is full, so everyone is stuck against each other, but they’re all sleeping under a roof. We have enough provisions to last a year of siege. As for water, with all this snow, that won’t be a problem.”

“What about the Knights of the Vale? They could turn on us again.”

“Well, they’re not many compared to the others, but Ser Davos had some of their lords and knights put into the cells. He promised their men that nothing would come to them if they fought against the dead and never betrayed us.”

Jon nodded. “I will go and talk with them later.”

“However, I must say it’s not the men of the Vale who worry me. It’s the Lannisters. Now that Tyrion and Sansa are gone… I don’t know what they might do.”

“I’ll talk to their commanders later. They must fight with us, they have no other choice. How many men do we have overall to defend Winterfell?”

“About seven thousand. We called some from minor strongholds. Ser Davos believes they wouldn’t hold on their own anyway, and they brought all the provisions they had with them.”

“Good. Let’ hope that will be enough.”
“Jon, I want you to know that, whatever happens, you’ll always be my brother. I mean it.”

Jon smiled and ruffled her hair, like he used to do before. “I know. And you’ll always be my little sister.”

They continued to inspect the battlements. A thick snow was falling, which greatly reduced the visibility, but Jon knew that they would never miss the coming of the White Walkers. Many times at the Wall, a thick snowfall like this one was going on when a huge storm arrived, and each time it was right when the dead attacked them. They might not see them coming, but they would know it.

Jon was inspecting the trebuchets in the courtyard when Ser Davos came in his direction. “Your Grace, we just received it. We might have a chance after all.”

The Onion Knight was holding a small piece of paper, like the ones they used for ravens, in his hand. Jon opened it and read the content.

Daenerys Targaryen is at Barrowton. She has an army of forty thousand men with her, and three dragons. There are also a few people with special powers with her, powers that could help us against the dead, and her army has weapons made of dragonglass. I saw them. We are riding for Winterfell as quickly as we can.

I told her about Jon Snow’s plan to join the Night’s Watch, and I think she will let him live. She only asks him to bend the knee, but it was already in our plans.

No matter what happens, make sure that Winterfell doesn’t fall. There seem to be problems with ravens because of the weather, so we may only be a few days away from you when you receive this message. We’re coming.

Tyrion Lannister

Jon couldn’t believe it. The seal was that of the Lord of Casterly Rock, and it was Tyrion’s writing. Jon looked up at Ser Davos.

“Only a few days?” he asked.

“Possibly. If that’s the case…”

A horn was blown. The first bow was followed by a second, then a third. Jon, Arya and Ser Davos froze for a second, and looked at each other. For one little second, it was as if the world had stopped. Then everything turned into a blur of activities. Jon shouted orders, and so did Ser Davos. Arya followed him to the battlements, where archers took position and lit their arrows with fire. Jon looked, and far away, at the horizon, a huge storm was coming. Even with the limited visibility, they could see it coming from afar. Jon unsheathed his sword, and Arya did the same next to him.

Ser Davos appeared close to him. “Only a few days, he said.”

“Aye,” Jon replied. “Only a few days.”

They only had to hold them off a few days, and then, his aunt would come with her dragons, and they could survive. They actually could survive. So many things could happen. They might not be able to hold the Night King at distance before the reinforcements arrived. They might all die before the dragons arrived. But there was a chance. No matter how small it was, they had a chance. They thought Tyrion was dead only a few hours ago, and now he was alive. Everything was possible.

As the storm approached them, Jon prepared himself for the battle of his life, the battle that would decide the fate of the entire North. The Third Battle of Winterfell was about to begin, and for better or worse, he felt this would be the last one.

And so the battle begins.

Next chapter : Sansa
We finally get to know what happened to Sansa, and where she is.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The ship rocked back and forth. The wood planks creaked against each other. Sansa felt something coming in her mouth, up from her stomach. She rushed to the bucket and spit out what was left of her breakfast. The sea definitely didn’t suit her. How she would have complained if her father managed to get her on that boat before Cersei arrested her.

One month on rough paths across the North, then two weeks aboard a ship heading for an unknown destination, being watched at every turn, forbidden to speak. Away from her daughter.

She didn’t see Joanna since she climbed into that boat on the eastern shore of the North. After the Knights of the Vale, led by Ser Vance Corbray, took them by surprise and killed almost everybody in Winterfell, Sansa was forced into riding east with his men, always east. She could have escaped through one the secret passages or hid in the crypts like she ordered Bran to, but that would have meant abandoning one of the people who mattered more in her life than everything. She was in the courtyard when it all began. Ser Vance had welcomed knights and lords who were forced to sleep outside the walls, in the camp the men of the Vale erected. Sansa had noticed that they were more than usual. She should have guessed something was amiss at this moment. Ser Corbray shouted, and the next moment any man who came from the Vale started to kill everyone who wasn’t from his kingdom inside the walls. The guards Tyrion left behind helped her leave the courtyard, using the confusion all around to escape notice. The Knights of the Vale didn’t know she would be there when they started it.

Her guards knew of the secret passages that led into the crypts, and of those that led outside the castle. She had sent two of them to bring Bran to safety, while she decided she would take her chance with leaving Winterfell. However, there was one thing she had to do before she left. She had to bring Joanna with her. She couldn’t leave without her. That was her doom. They came across a dozen of Ser Vance’s men in the corridor where her nursery was. Her own guards were no match. They were all killed, and Sansa was captured as she put her hand on the handle of the door. She watched, powerless, as the men forced the wetnurse to come out with her baby in her arms. They were prisoners now.

On their way east, Sansa was separated from her daughter. One group escorted her, while another brought Joanna and her wetnurse somewhere else. Sansa had cried, screamed, begged, but nothing would move her captors, men with sigils from the Vale, but although some were knights, she knew they had nothing to do with the knights she admired in her childhood. They reminded her of Ser Meryn Trant and Ser Boros Blount. Each question she asked was answered by a cold gaze at best, a slap in the face at worst. She learned again to shut her mouth, like she did before. She turned back to her former self, the little bird who did as she was told. Well, not exactly. She didn’t care to say empty courtesies. These would be useless with such men, and they didn’t care for them like Joffrey did. In that sense, they were better than her first betrothed. They left her quiet as long as she said nothing.
She didn’t have to say anything.

At night, she would cry in silence. She would cry for the loss of her daughter, and pray to all gods to bring Joanna back to her. She prayed that Tyrion would save her. Only he could help her. That didn’t last. A fortnight after they left Winterfell, two men joined their group, and they showed them a head. Sansa had screamed when she realized that the head with an arrow going through was that of Ser Bronn of the Blackwater, the former sellsword, Tyrion’s friend. She feared the worst, and a few minutes after the head arrived, men started to taunt her about the fact that her imp of a husband was dead.

She couldn’t believe it. Tyrion couldn’t be dead. He was still alive, somewhere, she knew it. Now at night, she would clamp the tissue of her cloak near her neck, where her golden necklace would normally be. She had lost it in the struggle at Winterfell. She felt its absence keenly. When Tyrion was away, she would touch it, and it was as if her husband wasn’t that far away from her. She had the impression that Tyrion was slipping away from her, and yet she felt that he was still alive. No, these men couldn’t be right. They told horrible stories day and night about how Tyrion supposedly died, all more horrible than the other. One said that they cut his body to pieces, another said they impaled him on a spear, and others said they buried him alive in the snow and left him to suffocate. There was one who said he escaped, but that he had no chance to survive alone in the wilderness, until another pretended they found his body cold in the snow, after the battle was over.

Sansa looked up to see the man who was watching her. He kept a close eye on her, and his eyes seldom wandered elsewhere. Being watched was something but seeing someone watch her constantly was worse. She always had someone watching her closely since they left Winterfell, day and night, whether she slept or was awaken, and even when she made water. Sansa could feel their gaze on her at every hour of the day. There were so many questions she asked herself, but she knew she wouldn’t get any answer from her captors. They kept telling her to be silent, and if she didn’t comply with their orders, then it meant bruises. She was back at the time when she was Joffrey’s toy. Sansa was afraid for Joanna, for Jon, for Arya, for Bran, for Tyrion. Is he still alive? She tried to chase that question from her mind, but it didn’t work. She was haunted by her worries about the people she loved.

She took back her seat and looked through the window of her cabin. There was only the sea to be seen. It was always only the sea. Since that day when they forced her into a boat and brought her on this ship that was anchored near the eastern shores of the North, all she could see was the sea. She looked away, but there was nothing interesting to look at in the cabin, and if she couldn’t find something to focus on, then her thoughts would go to the people whose fate she didn’t know. She looked back to the sea. The waves were all alike, limitless lines that moved in order one after another. They had no beginning and no end. The sky was grey, and Sansa wouldn’t be surprised if the snows started to fall again. They spent more than half the journey under snowfall, and there wasn’t a single day without a single snowflake. She could hear the waves crashing on the hull of the ship, though she couldn’t see them. The angle of the window didn’t allow her this view. Instead, everything she saw was uniform. The world seemed so simple like this. Only a few birds came to disturb this perfection from time to time. Looking to the sky, Sansa saw a dozen of them. When she set her eyes again on the sea, she saw the hull of another ship. Her heart started pounding. Perhaps she had a chance. Perhaps these people… Her hopes vanished as quickly as they appeared. She couldn’t expect another ship to save her. They had no one loyal to them on this side of Westeros. The seas were either controlled by Harrold Arryn, who betrayed them, or by Daenerys Targaryen. Their coalition had no ship in this area since the Vale betrayed them.

A few minutes later, Sansa saw another ship appearing from her point of view. Then a third came into sight. They bore no sigil on their mast, so that was no armada. They were trade vessels. That could only mean one thing. They were approaching a major harbor. Soon, Sansa heard someone shout orders on the deck to the sailors, and about half a dozen ships were visible from her window. Sansa knew of only two places where there could be such an amount of traffic.

The ship rocked, this time not back and forth, by side to side. They touched something on the starboard side. Sansa’s window gave on the port side. She heard a great sound of something plunging into water. The guard stood up and stirred himself. A moment later, four other men entered her cabin. One of them, their leader most likely, spoke to her.

“You come with us. Cover your face with your hood. Let no one see your face. Don’t talk to anybody.”

Reluctantly, not hastily, but without hesitation either, Sansa obeyed the orders. She had been used to it long ago, and long habits died hard. One man grabbed her by the arm and forced her out. That was unnecessary since she would have come without protest anyway. They walked through the main deck, and used a catwalk to leave the ship. The docks were busy with men loading and unloading ships. Sansa didn’t recognize the place. It was not King’s Landing, for sure. She would recognize its harbor any time. After all, it was there that she assisted to the departure of Princess Myrcella for Dorne, right before she was almost raped by the angry mob. Sandor Clegane saved her on that day.

She followed obediently. She didn’t know where her captors were leading her, but she supposed she would know soon enough. There was no point in asking them. She knew better than to try her luck. They led her through the docks and into narrow alleys, where only few people were to be seen. Sansa noticed the mountains around them. They had to be in Gulltown, the fourth harbor in importance of Westeros.

They stopped before a place that looked like a tavern. The men guarding her led her inside without a word. A placard said it was close. Once they were in, she could only note that there was no one inside. Three of the men who accompanied her here remained in the room where patrons should have been drinking and eating, and their leader led her up by stairs. The corridor up had about six doors, and she was led to the one completely at the end of the said corridor.

“Go in,” the man roughly said.

“What’s waiting for me on the other side?” she asked.

“You’ll see.” Again, she had asked a question in vain. She took a deep breathe, seized the handle, turned it, and opened the door.

From the doorstep, all she could see was a table with two chairs, two glasses, and a flagon of wine. Nothing else to see. She stepped in, and the door closed behind her. She looked at it, then back to the table, and approached it. When she was only a few feet away from it, a voice she never thought to hear again came from behind.

“It is a relief to finally see you again, my lady.”

She turned swiftly on her to see Littlefinger staring at her, a smirk on his lips like always, his hands clasped. “You?”

“Me,” he confirmed.

“You should be dead.”

“I should be, after you sent me to King’s Landing, but your friend Margaery was no longer in any position to execute me when I arrived, and Cersei saw me more useful alive than dead.”

Cersei. That bitch let this man live. “If she trusted you, then that proves without any doubt she was an utter fool.”

His smile didn’t fade. “I regret what happened between us. I’m afraid there was a misunderstanding at White Harbor, the last time we saw each other. You were angry, I understand.”

“Yes, angry because you killed my family,” she shot back.

Still smirking, Littlefinger walked past her, not without brushing her arm on his way. Sansa was glad that her arms were fully covered. He sat at the table and poured himself some wine. Then he filled the other glass and made a sign to invite her to sit. Sansa answered by casting an icy glare, but his smile only grew wider. His eyes didn’t leave her as he took a sip. Her eyes didn’t leave him either, but for very different reasons.

“I had no part in your family’s death, Sansa. Joffrey tried to murder your brother Bran when he visited Winterfell. Cersei arrested your father and charged him with treason, and she put you under arrest as well, turning you into Joffrey’s toy. Tywin arranged the slaughter of your family at the Twins. He gave your mother’s home to the Freys after they murdered her, and he gave Winterfell to Roose Bolton, and it was his son who murdered Rickon. I did no harm to your family. Every Stark who died during this war, it was because of the Lannisters.”

“You’re lying. You started all this with your lies. You convinced my aunt to poison Jon Arryn, then you lied to my mother when you told her Tyrion tried to kill Bran.”

“And you think Tyrion Lannister wouldn’t have killed Brandon Stark, had the boy remembered who pushed him out of the window?”

“Tyrion would never do that.”

“Are you sure? Do you really think you know your husband as much as I do?”

“I know him better than anyone, and he has been more a friend to me before we even met than you ever were.”

“I observed him while he lived in King’s Landing. I could study him for years, my lady, and let me tell you that your husband is not the man you believe. I can understand that you came to appreciate him, even that you convinced yourself to be in love with him, after everything that befell you. His presence was reassuring for you, but that doesn’t make him your friend, or even your ally. If he was given the choice between your family and his, make no mistake, he would choose the Lannisters without hesitation.”

Sansa scoffed. “That proves you don’t know him at all.”

He laid down his cup. “You will come to understand that everything I did was for your own good. You are safe now. Tyrion Lannister is dead.”

“You’re lying.”

“Am I?”

“You lie so often that I wouldn’t be surprised if you lied to yourself as well.”

“Say what you want, and believe what you want, my lady, but on this point, I’m telling you no lie.
The Imp is dead, and nothing can change that. It was my plan to get rid of him sooner, but the events didn’t unfold as I predicted. If Lord Tywin hadn’t died the night before the wedding, Tyrion Lannister would be dead long before, but that doesn’t matter now. He’s gone, and that means you can marry again.”

“I will never marry someone else,” she almost spat.

“Oh, you will. Lord Arryn is very eager. He’s been waiting for this moment a very long time.”

“So that’s it? You conspired with him to bring me back here.”

“No. Harrold is a knight, and he is too proud to stoop himself to dirty tricks like these. He doesn’t want to sully his hands. I organized everything. Ser Vance wanted revenge for his dead brother that your sister sent to another world, and I promised him what he wanted.”

“I defend you to touch Arya.”

“Don’t worry. I think she will get herself killed without my intervention,” he explained without much caring. “What matters is that you are here. You will marry Harrold Arryn and become the Lady of the Vale.”

“I will not.”

The time when she was forced to marry men she despised, men who had no respect for her, was over. And even Petyr Baelish couldn’t force her to do it, no matter what tools he had for it.

“You will,” he calmly replied. “If you know what’s good for a certain baby, you will.”

She felt blood leaving her face. “Where is she? Where did you send her?” He only kept smiling, giving no answer. She seized the corners of the table and leaned forward. “WHERE IS MY DAUGHTER?”

“Don’t worry. She is safe. She is a valuable piece in my plan.”

“What plan?”

“I want everything,” he cryptically answered. “You have claims, directly or indirectly, on four kingdoms, my lady. Since the Imp died, his daughter is the Lady of Casterly Rock, and in time I will marry her to someone that is fit. As for you, when you marry Lord Harrold, this will place the North, the Riverlands and the Vale in the same ship. Daenerys Targaryen and Jon Snow will waste their forces in the North, fighting each other or whatever it is that attacked the Wall. Whoever wins will not have enough strength to oppose you. The Stormlands are spent, and Dorne and the Reach will be at each other throat before long. I told you, Sansa. I can help you to rule all Westeros.”

“You only want Westeros for yourself.”

He leaned towards her, approaching her face. “I want it for us both.”

She withdrew. “You will never have it. I will never help you. I’m not my mother who was foolish enough to trust you, and I’m not Cersei who thought she could use you. You won’t get anything from me.”

“I’m doing all this for your own good, my lady. It saddens me that you don’t understand that yet, but you will understand one day, I’m sure. The wedding will take place in a few days, as soon as we arrive in Runestone.”
“There will be no wedding. You’ll have to shackle me to the altar to make me say the vows.”

“Perhaps we will. It wouldn’t be the first time it happens.”

“It won’t work. Perhaps you think you have the upper hand, but you don’t. You said it yourself. Harrold Arryn doesn’t want to sully his hands. I wonder how much he knows about your devious plans. If I tell him even one of the horrible things you did, he will kill you. I may be forced to marry him all the same, but you will be dead. And being forced into a marriage I didn’t want is almost a reasonable price to see you die the way my father did.”

His smirk was gone. He stood up and slowly walked to stand right before her, and he stared right into her eyes. “I see you learned well, my lady. I can see it. You’re no longer the sweet girl I met at the Hand’s Tourney. I regret it. Though at the same time…” He wandered a finger on her cheek. His smile returned. “You may be willing to die instead of marrying Lord Arryn. Your father was ready to die for Stannis, after all. You are more like him that I thought. But you know why Lord Stark accepted to acknowledge Joffrey as the true king and to proclaim that he betrayed him? It was for his daughter.”

A long moment went in a heavy silence. The man she hated the most in the world approached his lips from her ear, and they caressed it as they moved. “This little monster you had with the Imp is only valuable to me if you marry Harrold Arryn. Without this marriage, my plan will never bear fruits. And if it doesn’t bear fruit, then this girl is of no use to me. If you don’t wed Lord Arryn, the little Joanna is dead.”

The next moment, Petyr Baelish was tackled to the floor, and two hands were gripping his throat, trying to choke the life out of it. Sansa released a bestial scream as she used all her forces to kill the man who made her family suffer so much.

“YOU WILL NOT KILL HER!”

She pressed his throat as hard as she could, and she saw his face turning red, his eyes panicking like they never did before. I will kill him. Nothing else mattered. She would kill him, no matter what it cost.

The door slammed open behind her and she felt arms grabbing her. She struggled to keep her hold on Littlefinger’s throat, but the strong arms that seized her by the waist and then her arms were too strong. The throat slipped away from her fingers.

She struggled like a fury, clawing, punching, kicking, doing everything she could imagine to hurt the people around her, the people who destroyed her life. Until she was thrown against a hard surface and lost consciousness. The last thing she saw was Littlefinger massaging his throat.

Chapter End Notes

Originally, I was planning for one more Sansa chapter before this one, to show with more details how she left Winterfell and was separated from her daughter, but after thinking about it, I decided it wouldn't add much to the story and mostly delay the most interesting parts. We don't need an entire chapter only to describe the conditions of the roads between Winterfell and the shore, and depicting the scene where Sansa is separated from Joanna wouldn't be very necessary since we've got her own very emotional reaction in this chapter, along with her discussion with Baelish, which is far more interesting, I think. I also believe you are eager to see the battle(s) against the White Walkers.

So, Sansa is back to her former situation. She is again a pawn in the game of thrones, and Baelish holds a master card in his hand to control her. Manipulators in Game of Thrones are very good at using the love mothers have for their children to force them into actions they wouldn't undertake under normal circumstances. Not only Baelish, but also Varys while in Meereen, use this tactic, and noble houses use it as well through fostering and wards. We can also cite Daenerys when she takes Margaery's son away from her.

Next chapter : Trystane
Okay, a big chapter for Trystane. You'll see that things are far from being dull in King's Landing.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

“So, that’s all?” he asked.

“Yes, my prince. Be careful,” the woman standing before him said.

“Very well. I will be careful. You may leave.”

The priestess left. She was the only one to remain in King’s Landing, the second having left to join Daenerys’s army a long time ago. She told him his life would be in danger today, before he got what he wanted, and that getting this wish would cost him a lot. Trystane emptied his cup, swallowing the last drop of wine at the bottom of it. This was no longer the time to step back. He could only go forward.

He left his chambers and walked to the Great Hall. Two guards followed him. As he approached his destination, he heard the rumbling of voices. The Red Keep had not been so full of people since he arrived, and from what Varys and Margaery told him, the place had been quite empty for a long time before. This was no longer the case. When Trystane entered the Hall, the floor and the galleries were full of people from four kingdoms. Only the dais and a section near it allowed some free space.

The two other judges had already arrived. Lord Anders Yronwood and Lord Mace Tyrell sat on each side of the Iron Throne, while a line of gold cloaks were positioned at the feet of the dais. Trystane sat in the throne, feeling as uncomfortable in it as he always felt. Trystane knew that Lord Anders’s gaze was wandering over the crowd, searching for any slight detail that wasn’t fitting. He was observing everybody. Lord Tyrell, on the other side, seemed nervous. He had arrived only two days ago and was rushed into this after learning that his ambassador was murdered. He was shocked when he heard of this, and his shock quickly turned to anger. He asked for immediate retribution against those who murdered his bannerman. And the thousands of soldiers he brought with him were of no different mind.

Margaery was right. It would take a lot to calm the Tyrells. For now, they were kept at bay, but the tension was rising into the city, and Trystane had to admit that it would take only a spark to set fire on the whole thing. People were already calling the situation an armed peace. No one fought, but everyone was ready to draw the sword at the first signal. It wouldn’t last, and strangely, Trystane wasn’t afraid of it. He had the impression it would be a release, to finally face his enemies, instead of faking agreement and friendship with them. He noticed the presence of two in the crowd.

The doors were opened and another enemy walked in. She was shackled, and her links clinked as she walked. Trystane could hear them despite the roars and the shouts of the crowd all around. Some insulted and cursed her, others praised and encouraged her. The gold cloaks, Dornishmen that Trystane carefully chose for the occasion and men native from the Crownlands, made a way through the sea of people to the box standing right below the dais. They formed a semicircle around the box, keeping the crowd away, which was no small task, while two men attached the enemy’s shackles to the box. All this time, the enemy didn’t stop watching him, smiling wickedly, as if nothing was amiss. Trystane would remove the smile from her face. Justice would be made, the real justice his father and uncle lived and fought for. The two other Sand Snakes weren’t far behind, among the crowd, separated from their sister by the semicircle.

It took a long time to quiet down the crowd, and when it did, people were still whispering among themselves. It was a good thing that he forbade weapons to those who wanted to attend the trial.
Trystane decided it was time for it to begin. Let it end.

“Tyene Sand, you stand accused by the crown of the murder of Lord Edrik Ashford. Did you kill him?”

“What if I did?” she replied with an evil smile, mocking him. The whispers increased. The herald hit the floor twice with his stick, and relative silence came back.

“Answer the question. Did you kill Edrik Ashford?”

“If that can please you, then no.”

Trystane leaned back into the throne, without touching its back. “Call the first witness.”

Ser Andrew Courtney, one of the knights who was with Lord Edrik Ashford during the incident and who was present when he died was the first to testify. Mostly, he repeated what he already told Trystane days ago. However, the most important elements he had to bring were the details about Lord Edrik’s death.

“We had just returned to the Red Keep. My lord was resting after everything that happened, when he began to cough. I had my back turned on him at this moment, but he called me. When I looked, he had blood on his hand. I realized that blood was beginning to drip from his nose. I’m not sure if he realized it as well, but he began to breathe more quickly. I called for help, and we laid him on his bed, but a few seconds later, he was dead. There was nothing we could do. He died, right there in front of us. He was murdered.”

He shot an assassin glare at Tyene, who didn’t look bothered by it. Two more witnesses, another knight and Lord Ashford’s personal squire came to testify on the circumstances of his death. They weren’t present when he began to bleed, but they could attest the suddenness of the death. The squire said he wasn’t even sure if Lord Ashford was still alive when he came in his room. What he remembered the most was the stream of blood on the part of his face down his nose.

The Grand Maester Perwyn came next to give the results of his autopsy. “There was no internal damage. No artery, no vein, no organ was damaged, at least not by any physical force. The only plausible explanation to Lord Edrik’s death is that he was poisoned.”

“How can you be so sure of that?” Lord Yronwood asked.

“I couldn’t find traces of poison in his blood, but I wrote to my colleagues in Oldtown. I described the symptoms and they were able to identify it. It is called the Long Farewell. It is a very rare poison, originating from Asshai. A single drop making contact with the skin, and the victim dies. It takes time for its effects to manifest. Depending on the constitution of the person who is infected, she may die within hours or within days, but she will die. The death is sudden, without side effects to be seen before it comes. In the minute before the person dies, she will feel nauseous, his vision will get blurred, and she will bleed by the nose and have difficulty to breathe.”
“Do the symptoms include coughing?”

“For some individuals, yes. The two symptoms that come in every case are the bleeding from the nose and the difficulty to breathe. The other symptoms vary depending on the people who are infected.”

“So you say that Lord Edrik Ashford was poisoned with something from across the Narrow Sea?” Lord Tyrell asked.

“To me, it seems to be the only likely explanation. The poison doesn’t leave traces on the organs or in the blood, so it was impossible for me to detect it, but Lord Ashford had a small cut on his right arm, probably the result of a knife or a dagger. What is strange is that the injury didn’t cicatrize at all. Normally, it should have started to heal a few minutes after it was made, so if the cut happened a few hours before his death, then that means something stopped the cicatrisation. And it happens to be another property of the Long Farewell, according to my colleagues.”

“You say that a cut starts to heal a few minutes after it is made. Is it possible that the injury was actually made a few minutes before Lord Ashford’s death?” Lord Anders Yronwood asked.

“It is very unlikely, my lord, for if it was the case, then we would see traces of blood dripping from the cut, and such wasn’t the case. The injury was made at least half an hour before the death occurred, whoever made it.”

“Grand Maester, do you think there could be another possible explanation to Lord Ashford’s death? Do you think he could have died of another cause, whatever it may be?” Trystane asked.

“No, my prince.” He called him in the appropriate way for the first time. “Lord Ashford was poisoned. It is a murder.”

People in the room mumbled louder. Someone shouted good riddance, probably a Dornish, and order had to be brought again. Trystane felt it wouldn’t be the last time. They called Frenken, the maester of House Stokeworth, who happened to have a greater expertise in poisons.

His conclusions were the same than Perwyn. He wasn’t the best expert in poisons, and never witnessed the effects of the Long Farewell, but he agreed with everything his colleagues from Oldtown wrote. He examined the body as well, and verified every element of Perwyn’s conclusions. When asked if he thought that Lord Ashford could have died of something else, he answered, “Whether Lord Ashford was poisoned, or he died by sorcery, and this I cannot explain how it could kill him, nor why.”

“One last thing, Frenken,” Trystane asked before he left. “Since you studied poisons further than the Grand Maester, do you have any knowledge of how these poisons can be made, and who can?”

The maester seemed troubled. “Well, when I verified about this poison in my books, it seems the ingredients that are necessary to make it cannot be found in this country. Maester Snape’s works, who are the authority about foreign poisons, even claim that some ingredients cannot be found in the known world. So it can only be brought from outside Westeros. This is no common poison at all. It must be bought, or the ingredients necessary to make it must be bought. There are certainly some apothecaries who can sell it, but they are very few. And I suspect that this poison must be very costly.”

“So, it cannot be bought by anybody?”

“No. I would say, though I cannot be entirely sure, that only people with generous means could get their hands on the poison. So it can only be someone rich.”

Next came the witnesses of the brawl that took place in the tavern a few hours before the lord’s death. They had the people who accompanied Lord Ashford testify first. Andrew Courtney, another knight and Lord Ashford’s squire had already given their version of the story, and the other men of the Reach gave a similar story, blaming the Dornish by the way. Next came the men of the City Watch, who gave a slightly different version. They were Dornish, but not completely sold to their countrymen, so they gave a more impartial version. And then there was the owner of the tavern and his employees, including the girls. Since the knights of the Reach paid better, the owner’s point of view favored them. The girls did the same, though they seemed somewhat hesitant, and more restrained in their accusations against the Dornishmen. Trystane suspected their employer to force them to talk ill of the Dornish.

Tyene showed no interest to what was going on the whole time. She yawned, tapped the bar of her box with her fingers, sighed to show her boredom. However, what annoyed Trystane the most were her constant smirks in his direction. He struggled to keep his calm under her constant glares. Sometimes, he gripped the arms of the thrones so tight that he could feel his hands about to bleed.

The determining testimony was the one from the girl over which the brawl was started. She told them what she already told Trystane before, though strangely the first time she seemed to have forgotten the detail that the Dornish who grabbed her also slapped her in the face, right after he kicked Lord Ashford’s knight in the guts. The owner of the tavern clearly ordered the girls to distort the truth. The details about the knife this man hid made the Great Hall silent, but it was the question that Trystane asked her at the end that was the most important.

“Now, I would ask you to look at the accused. Can you say if Tyene Sand looks like the man who grabbed you on that day?”

The girl looked at Tyene for a moment. “She doesn’t look like him. She is exactly like him. It was her, I’m sure of that.”

Shouts erupted in the Great Hall. Liar, some called her, certainly Dornishmen. Murderer, others called Tyene, probably people from the Reach.

“Silence. I will tolerate no interruption from the public, or the hall will be evacuated,” Trystane loudly stated.

“Order!” Lord Yronwood shouted, to support him.

“Calm down, my countrymen. This is a trial,” Lord Tyrell added.

When the calm had returned, Tyene spoke for the first time. “May I ask the witness one question, my prince?” she sweetly asked.

“One,” Trystane replied, granting this to her, which was more than she deserved.

“Tell me, sweetheart, did you feel any excitement when you found out I was a woman?”

There were some laughs in the hall, but before the shocked expression of the girl, Trystane stopped this comedy. “You’re not forced to answer. You may leave. We will adjourn for now. Toll the bells in an hour’s time.”

Trystane thought it was a good moment to relieve the tension. He left the Great Hall as everyone did the same, safe for Tyene who remained in her box over heavy guard. Trystane walked out of the room, his heart pounding in his chest. He was excited and tired at the same time. Tyene tired him, and he was excited to see her dead. All the elements they collected were against her. Trystane knew she did it. She would die for the murder of Lord Edrik Ashford. He only regretted she wouldn’t die for Myrcella’s murder.

It was while he walked down a corridor that he heard the soft voice behind him. “I know what you’re thinking about.”

Trystane turned to look at the Spider. “Then tell me, since you seem to know me so well.”

Lord Varys had a sad expression on his face. “I know you want Tyene’s head, and I know why, my prince. People say that love is a beautiful feeling, but I saw it driving men and women to madness more often than happiness.”

“I’m not after happiness,” Trystane rudely replied.

“My prince, I want you to think about the consequences of your actions. Tyene Sand is the daughter of your uncle. You share the same blood. If you kill her, that will make you a kinslayer.”

“Is it kinslaying to execute someone for murder? My father says this is justice.”

“Perhaps it is both justice and kinslaying,” the Spider suggested.

“The Reach is at our throat. Tyene killed the Lord of Ashford. If I am to maintain peace with the Reach, then I need to give them justice.”

“And what if this justice breaks the peace you have with Dorne? The Sand Snakes are well loved among your people. Killing one of them will alienate you all the Sand Snakes, and more than one Dornishman.”

“I have the support of the Yronwoods.”

“Lord Anders is not all Dorne.”

“No, but he’s more powerful than the Sand Snakes.”

“My prince…”

“Lord Varys, this is a trial. If Tyene is found guilty, then she will be punished accordingly.”

“She will be found guilty.”

“Then we will punish her accordingly.”

On that last sentence, Trystane walked away from Varys. The eunuch advised him to be cautious, but Trystane had no use of his councils. Varys didn’t understand what was at stake. Trystane continued his way to the only person he wanted to talk with right now.

Margaery Tyrell was reading when he entered her rooms. “Interesting?” he asked to start the conversation.

“It keeps me occupied.” She set the book aside while Trystane sat before her. “So, is it done?”

“I adjourned the trial for an hour. You don’t want to assist it?”

“I think it would be better that everyone sees me the least.”
“You’re probably right. Everyone is on the edge down there.”

“What are the prospects?”

“Tyene is guilty. I know it. Soon, everyone will know as well.”

“They may not want to believe it, or they may not care about it,” she said. Her face was hollow, devoid of any emotion.

“It doesn’t matter. Tyene murdered Lord Ashford. She is a cold-blooded killer. Even my father couldn’t close his eyes on it.”

“You want her dead, don’t deny it.”

“No, I won’t deny it. I won’t shed a tear when she dies.”

“Is that really what you want?”

“This is only justice.”

“And once you’ll have it, what next? You’ll kill her sisters as well?”

He didn’t reply. To be honest, he only cared about Tyene right now. He wished Obara and Nymeria would die as well, but would he actually start looking for a way to kill them? He didn’t look for a way to kill Tyene. He was only rendering justice for the murder of Edrik Ashford.

“Trystane,” Margaery began, “I understand what you’re going through. If Cersei was alive, I would do everything to have her head. I would have no rest until she was dead.”

“I’m not after revenge. I’m only doing justice.”

“Revenge, justice. I’m not sure if there’s a difference any longer, or if we can make the difference. Listen, Trystane. We must consider the consequences of our actions before doing something rash. Robb Stark thought he was making justice when he beheaded Rickard Karstark, but all he got from that was to be killed with his mother, his wife and their child, and he lost the war. I think even Cersei thought it was justice when she set the city on fire. It wouldn’t surprise me. Before you give justice, consider the price that will come with it.”

Trystane nodded. “Thank you, my lady. I must go.”

He left and thought about what the heir to Highgarden just told him on his way back to the Great Hall. There would be consequences to what he would do, for sure. His father didn’t go to war against Robert and the Lannisters because he knew this would only make his people suffer. His father taught him that the well-being of the people of Dorne was more important than personal grudges, or even justice in some cases. However, Trystane also knew that being merciful with Tyene would bring its own lot of consequences. The Tyrells were asking for blood, implicitly if not explicitly. He knew what he had to do, for the sake of justice and for the sake of the alliance between Dorne and the Reach.

The crowd had gathered again in the Great Hall. The Red Priestess was standing in retreat behind the dais. Tyene hadn’t moved, and nor did the guards. Trystane sat back in the Iron Throne. Tyene stared at him with her playing devilish smirk. Trystane held her stare and sent her a message as well with his own eyes. You won’t get away this time.

Lord Yronwood came back, then Lord Tyrell. Trystane asked for silence, and when he almost had it, he spoke. “The crown calls a last witness.”

The last witness of the accusation was no one but one of the Dornish who fought Lord Ashford’s men in the tavern. The Red Priestess had found him and convinced him to testify. He said his name and told everything he knew.

“Tyene Sand was with us when we entered that tavern. She was present during the fight.”

The crowd reacted, and they had to calm it down again. “Do you know if Tyene had a dagger on her?” Trystane asked him.

“She always has one on her, my prince.”

“Do you know if the dagger was poisoned?”

“No, my lord. Though she often speaks of her knowledge of poisons. She said her father taught him.”

“Did you see her use her dagger during the brawl in the tavern?”

“No, my prince, but… I saw her hiding it again in her clothes at the end of the brawl. And I think there was a thin line of blood on it.”

The room roared so much that Trystane thought for a moment it would explode. Some accused him of lying and betraying Dorne, while others accused Tyene of murder like they did during the whole trial.

“This was the last witness of the crown,” Trystane stated. “Tyene Sand, do you have any witness to call?”

“No.” That was all she said. She didn’t seem to realize that her situation was very dire. Trystane was more than exasperated by her defying attitude.

“Very well. What do you have to say in your defense?”

She laughed. “My defense? I know you want me dead, cousin. You are pathetic. Hiding behind justice because you don’t want to sully your hands. You are weak, just like your father, and weak men are not made to rule Dorne. I should have killed you along with your princess.”

Trystane hardened himself to not counter her words. “Is that all you have to say?”

She seemed to think about it for a time. “You’re a coward too.”

Trystane feigned to ignore what she just said. “Lord Anders Yronwood, what is your verdict?”

“Guilty.” Shouts followed, mostly from Dornish, though this time it was obvious not all of them were on Tyene’s side. Dorne was divided in this room.

“Lord Tyrell?” Trystane continued, as if nothing was happening.

“Guilty,” the Lord of Highgarden declared.

“Guilty,” Trystane declared. He stood up. “The three judges declare Tyene Sand guilty of the murder of Lord Edrik Ashford. Tyene Sand, in the name of Daenerys Targaryen the First of Her Name, Queen of the Andals the First Men and the Rhoynar, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm, I hereby sentence you to death.”
The uproar only grew, and chaos was about to truly break into the hall when Tyene shouted. “I demand a trial by combat.”

The silence that followed was complete. No one spoke. Tyene looked at him, her smirk wider than ever. Trystane looked straight in her eyes. “Your demand is denied. The trials by combat are illegal.”

She scoffed. “You’re really pitiful. What would your uncle think of you?”

“Better than he would think of you, cousin. When Daenerys Targaryen freed King’s Landing, she decided that every decree made by the Baratheon kings, that is, Robert, Joffrey and Tommen, would be considered as laws unless she told otherwise. Not long before he died, the king Tommen outlawed trials by combat, and our queen never made any decision denying this decree. That means that for now, trials by combat are forbidden through all Westeros.”

He stared at her, and for once her expression wasn’t playful. Instead, it was anger, hatred that he saw in her eyes. “I will not give you the opportunity to murder someone else,” he continued. “My father gave you a second chance. You should have seized it. Only fools believe in third chances. You will be executed tomorrow, at dawn. Bring her back to her cell.”

Trystane turned his back on her and went to sit back, relieved that it was done, relieved that soon Myrcella would be avenged, when he heard multiple screams behind him. He looked back at Tyene, but it didn’t come from her. It came from the crowd. He saw a black shape moving on the floor, and before he could think of anything, it climbed on someone. This someone was Obara Sand. Trystane noticed she had a knife in her hand. One moment she was standing among the crowd, the next the black shape was covering her, and the next she was falling on the ground. A large pool of blood appeared very quickly.

The black shape was gone as quickly as it appeared. Everything was silent after the many screams, and everyone was looking at the mess that once was Obara Sand. It only lasted a moment, for the next everyone in the crowd started screaming and accusing each other.

“What was that?”

“Obara Sand is dead.”

“Who killed her?”

“She pulled a dagger from her robe.”

“You murdered her!”

“Traitors!”

“Damn Dornishmen!”

Before the gold cloaks and the other guards could do anything, because of how quickly it happened and the shock that followed Obara’s unexpected death, everyone was at each other’s throat. It was Dornish against Reach men, but also Dornish against Dornish.

“Separate them!” Trystane shouted to his men.

They obeyed his orders, but the people in the crowd stroke back. These people were lords and knights, and they fought each other with fists and foot, while the gold cloaks tried to not use their spears and swords. As a result, some were pulled by the crowd and brought down.
Trystane could only look at the chaos that unfurled before him. The great doors of the hall opened, allowing for more guards to pour inside, along with more lords and knights, and some joined the fray, adding more chaos to the one that already existed than helping to bring back order.

In this chaos, Trystane looked at Tyene, still alone, shackled to her box. And then he saw the other Sand Snake, Nymeria, coming to her help. Trystane knew what she going to do. He couldn’t let Tyene escape. Not again.

There was a spear, abandoned by a gold cloak nearby, right down the steps of the dais. Trystane rushed to it, seized, aimed, and threw. He wasn’t the best spearmen in history, but he was taught well, and had Oberyn Martell for an uncle. The spear went precisely where he directed it. It pierced the heart, and Nymeria Sand fell on the floor, her eyes empty of all life.

Trystane looked at her lifeless body. A second pool of blood formed under her belly, smaller than Obara’s pool, but it was a pool of blood nonetheless, and this time it was Trystane who made it. He looked at Tyene, and for the first time she stared at him in horror and utter shock. Trystane immediately knew what was going on through her mind. She never thought he would actually do it, and neither did he. She was right. He could sentence a family member to death, but he never thought of actually killing him or her himself. But he did it. They were both wrong.

Slowly, Trystane walked to Nymeria’s body. There was only him, the spear, Nymeria’s body, a faint conscience of Obara’s body being not far away, and Tyene. Trystane looked at his cousin’s body for a moment, then he pulled out the spear. The point was covered with blood. A long time ago, he asked his uncle Oberyn how it felt when you killed someone. He told him that it depended. The first kill was always harder, but after that you got used to it, and you didn’t feel anything when you killed afterwards. His uncle told him that he enjoyed killing, but mostly when he felt the person deserved it. Otherwise, there was little joy in killing, no pride to feel from it, and you only felt empty when you took someone else’s life.

Trystane had kill on the battlefield before, but this time was different. It was as if this was his first real kill. He looked at Tyene. And then he saw her, Myrcella, and he remembered all the good times he had with her, all these moments of joy that would never return and that could have lasted forever. And it was the woman who stood before him who stole it from him, who took the woman he loved away. She was the one who killed her. He didn’t hesitate.

With a roar, he plunged the spear right through Tyene’s heart, and for the first and last time, Trystane Martell saw fear on the face of his cousin. She collapsed in the box, and the spear remained in her heart this time. Trystane was surprised that she had one. A third pool of blood was made, and at last, justice was made and Myrcella was avenged. Strangely, Trystane didn’t feel any better.

Chapter End Notes

Every character of Game of Thrones has a dark side. In this chapter, we just saw Trystane’s dark side.

Concerning the black shape, remember the Red Priestess at the beginning of the chapter.

Next chapter : Tyrion
While Winterfell is being attacked by dead men, Sansa kept prisoner by a sociopath and Trystane murdering half his family (nothing unusual for GOT universe), Tyrion spends time in the midst of an army composed of lords that have been alternatively allies and foes for the last few years, of men who spend their lives on horses and of people with red robes who chant before a fire every night. Not to mention with a queen who has three very big children. (I'm making an attempt at humor. Please don't hold a grudge against me if it's failed.)

“These nights are getting darker and colder every day.”

Daven warmed his hands over the fire before he took the cup of spiced wine Tyrion kindly offered him. He and his cousin had never been very close. Not that Daven despised him or thought little of him, but they never had the opportunity to truly spend time together. Daven was a knight from the day he was born, just like Jaime, while Tyrion would have been fitted to be a maester. While Daven sparred in the courtyard with Ser Benedict, Tyrion read or wrote. They almost had nothing in common. It was Jaime that Daven was closer to. Still, Tyrion never had any ill thought against his cousin. He was always kind with him. Now that everyone around him was gone, and since they were both in the midst of an army they were more or less forced to join, Daven had become Tyrion’s closest advisor, confident, and even friend. It was strange that they needed Jaime to be in prison, Bronn and Podrick to be dead, and to be separated from everyone they loved to finally get to know each other.

“If we rely on what happened in the past months, I doubt it will get any better,” Tyrion replied.

“You’re not good at lightening things up, coz.”

“It’s your specialty, not mine.” Tyrion took some wine as well. He immediately felt better. Everything is always better with some wine in the belly.

“Do you always drink this early in the morning?”

“When it’s cold like this out there, yes.” Truth be told, it was spiced wine that he drank. Daenerys Targaryen had brought a lot of it to warm her troops on their way north. It helped Tyrion to go through the day, for it wasn’t only the cold he tried to escape with the wine. Thinking of anything that could happen to Sansa and Joanna was unbearable for him.

“Well, I welcome every way to fight the cold right now, let it be furs, wine, hair, beard, or camp follower.”

“Don’t tell me you call one at night,” Tyrion said.

“I only did it a few times. Don’t start giving me lessons, coz. You were not an example to follow in Tyrion knew how difficult it was to be far away from the woman you loved. Daven was married, but unlike Tyrion, his marriage couldn’t be described as a fulfilling bliss. Amerei Frey was known for her adventures, and Daven was quite certain that, although he might be the only man to share her bed, he wasn’t the only man to fuck her. Tyrion missed Sansa dearly, but although he felt the need for a woman from time to time, he never gave in. He was married now, and he would never shame the wife he loved. He said vows before the altar, and they meant something. He couldn’t imagine himself betraying his wife.

Anyway, that had been before he died. Since he came back, the thought of bedding a woman never came to his mind. His mind was entirely occupied by his worries for Sansa and Joanna. They had no news from them. His escort was attacked very close to Winterfell. What if something happened to them? He thought about it day and night, and for the first time since his first marriage, Tyrion genuinely prayed. Perhaps it was useless, but if there were gods, as unlikely as it seemed, then there was a small chance that they may be listening. If gods didn’t exist, then he lost nothing by trying. If there was a little chance that it might save his wife and daughter, then he was ready to put aside some of his skepticism towards superior powers, even though he knew there was nothing after death. Perhaps he should start to pray to the Old Gods and the Lord of Light as well, though he wondered how the gods, if they existed, would feel if he worshipped their competitors. Kings and queens didn’t like it when people swore oaths to them and another one at the same time, and Tyrion doubted the gods were any different. One and only realm. One and only god. One and only king. Strange that they had seven gods to represent a sole one. The word transubstantiation came to his mind. Did he really need his wife and daughter to be in danger for stupid debates of the past to find their way into his head?

“Please coz, don’t tell my wife,” Daven asked. “Though I doubt it would really bother her if she heard.”

“Don’t be so certain, Daven. Most of the time, people feel more betrayed by the infidelities of the other than guilty about their own.” He thought of Cersei, Robert, and most of the people he came across through his life. “Did you see her since your wedding?”

“No. I wrote to her a few times, but she never returned my messages. I wonder if she will remember me when I come back to Darry.”

“Do you think she’s pregnant?”

“If she is, I have no way to be sure the child is mine.” Daven shrugged. “Well, from this day, until the end of my days. I’m wondering if the gods wanted to punish us when they decided that marriage was for life. Marriage with a woman you can’t suffer must be way worse than being burned alive by a dragon.”

“I don’t know.” Tyrion couldn’t tell. Daenerys Targaryen didn’t order her dragons to burn him yet, and he was never married to someone he hated.

“Well, we must do with what life granted us,” Daven concluded, trying to maintain his light mood. “So, how is she? You spent more time with her than most people here already. What’s your opinion of our new queen?”

Tyrion mused about it for a moment. He spent quite a lot of time with Daenerys Targaryen since his return, indeed. He had no illusion, one of the reasons why she often asked for him was that she needed him. He knew more about the North than anyone else in her army, safe for Malcolm Branfield, but if it ever came to negotiations, like it happened in Moat Cailin Barrowton and Castle Cerwyn, his voice had more weigh than anyone else. Most of the strongholds still had some of his men inside their walls. Tyrion had become the closest advisor of Daenerys Targaryen, something he and the queen both didn’t expect.

“I would say she is dangerous to have as an enemy, demanding towards the people who serve her but generous with them as well, she remains loyal to her bannermen if they remain loyal to her, expects people to obey her and rules for the people, she’s probably a better queen than all the fools we had for the last fifty years, and if we ever try to overthrow her, we better be sure that we will succeed.”

Daven laughed. “For sure. I wouldn’t want to end as cooked meat for her dragons. They say she calls them her children.”

“Drogon, named after her first husband, Rhaegal, named after Prince Rhaegar, and Viserion, named after her dead brother Viserys.”

“You know their names?”

“She told me.”

“She’s telling you a lot.”

“Recently, I started to tell her something if she promised to tell me something in return. As a result, I probably know more about her dragons and her time in Essos than anyone else here.”

“What can you tell her so that she is willing to confide in you?”

“She wants me to tell her more about dragonlore, and about her nephew.”

“You think she will kill Jon Snow?”

Tyrion hesitated. “I’m not sure. So far, she always respected her promises, and she promised that as long as Jon Snow bends the knee, she won’t kill him. I suppose we can hope, or at least I can say it is not certain that she will kill him.”

“Do we have the same guarantees for Jaime?”

Tyrion sighed. “I don’t know.” He feared to openly admit it, but Jaime’s chances to live were very limited. No matter the reason, kingslaying was kingslaying, and if Tyrion had to advise this queen about a similar case, someone who wasn’t his brother, he wasn’t sure he would advise her to spare him.

“Seeing how she respects the sacred laws around parleys… I don’t give much longer to live to your brother, coz. I’m sorry.”

“Before you accuse her of violating sacred laws, remember the Red Wedding, Daven.”

“The Freys did this,” he protested, but without raising the voice. He said it on a very calm tone, almost regretful.

“And everyone knows who told the Freys to do this, and who gave them money, lands and guarantees of protection for it. If I pay an assassin to kill a boy of ten in his bed, does that make me less a murderer?” He found it strange that he took the defense of a queen who could order his brother’s death at any time. “Anyway, she exiled the priest who did this.”

“Good riddance. He sent chills upon my spine, this one. And it’s probably better that the other one, the High Priestess left as well. If only Melisandre was gone too. These people annoy me. There’s only one that I have come to appreciate a little, and he always wears a mask. I would be surprised if he removed it to sleep.”

“Well, we cannot send away all the Red Priests. They support the queen, and she allows every religion to have a place in her army. Anyway, with Kinvara gone, only Revan is at the war councils, and truth be told, I think even my father would love him.”

Daven snorted. “I never thought I would say that of a religious man, but I think you’re right. Lord Tywin would like him. Revan speaks of military matters, supplies, roads to travel, the organization of the army, of weapons, of strategy. It gives us a change from the great war yet to come that all the others talk about. I have the impression to listen to a general when he speaks, not a priest. Perhaps we should train our septons to fight as well. They could defend themselves against angry soldiers when they want to plunder their septs.”

“Considering what happened when Cersei gave weapons to the Faith, I must disagree.”

“Well, let’s hope these red robes will be of some help when we face the White Walkers.” Daven drank some more wine. He then looked at Tyrion with a softened expression. “We’ll find Sansa and Joanna, coz. You have my word. No man, living or dead, will touch them.”

“Thank you, Daven. You’re a better cousin than I thought. Though you were already better than most.”

Daven laughed good-hearted. A young man came through the flap of their tent as he did so. “The queen is summoning you for her war council, my lords.”

Without a word, Tyrion and Daven obeyed. As they walked to their destination, Daven asked him, “So, still getting used to obey a Targaryen?”

“Don’t forget that our previous king was a Targaryen too.”

Daven conceded with a nod. “Yes, true. Can you believe that within a few years, we’ve served half a dozen different kings and queens? I’m not sure anymore who we fight for. And our actual queen, I don’t know what to make of her.”

“Well, since the last Targaryen monarch, we had a drunken incompetent who spent his days fucking every girl he came across, then an vicious idiot, a sweet and good-intentioned boy who was easily manipulated by everyone, and finally the Mad Queen. And I don’t mention the other contenders, who included a soldier burning everyone who dared to oppose him, a man who thought that nice clothes and good manners were enough to make a good king, and another who believed that being king meant you could plunder every land and every castle in the world you desired. It’s strange, but the two Targaryens we have now seem better.”

“You seem to forget that the father of the woman we actually serve was known as the Mad King, coz.”

“Just as he was Jon Snow’s grandfather. You remember your father, Daven?”

“Yes, I do,” his cousin replied, a certain sadness in his voice.

“People used to say that he was given command of an army only because his sister was married to the great Tywin Lannister.”

“I know that.”

“Were they wrong?” Tyrion inquired.

“No,” Daven replied shortly.

“That didn’t stop you from being one of the most competent commanders the Lannisters had during this war.”

“No, coz. Thank you.”

“We are not defined by our fathers. Neither you, neither me, and neither is Daenerys Targaryen or Jon Snow or anyone in this land. Perhaps we should give her a chance. She gave us one, after all.”

Daven nodded, though he didn’t look quite convinced. Tyrion didn’t blame him. He wasn’t sure of what he was saying either. He knew better than anyone how who he was depended on who his father was. He thought of Moat Cailin. You surely are proud of me, Father.

The tent where the war council took place was already filled with military leaders from both sides of the Narrow Sea when they arrived. Tyrion never thought he would see such different people fight together in the same war, and he certainly never expected to be at the same table than Dothrakis. The queen, an image of beauty among all the hard men who were present, presided, though she displayed an authority that no one could deny.

“Now that everyone’s here, we must talk about a serious situation.” She took a pause. “During the last two days, we sent no less than ten scouting parties ahead of us. None have returned.” She looked at Tyrion. “Do you have an explanation for that?”

“Well, something, or someone, prevented them from coming back,” he began.

“That’s quite obvious,” Dickon Tarly sharply commented. Tyrion ignored him.

“I don’t think this is the weather, despite the snow that is falling outside. Furthermore, the last groups all had at least one Northerner with them. It’s not as if we sent Dornishmen who never saw a snowflake of their life. The weather couldn’t have lost them all. They cannot have been taken captives either and not all of them were sent to Winterfell. So, there’s only one possibility left.”

“White Walkers.” The only Red Priest who was present resumed what Tyrion was trying to say.

“So, the dead would be here. Is that likely?” Daenerys asked.

“I don’t know at what speed they progress,” Tyrion explained, “but I doubt they need to rest, to eat, or to shit. And the cold certainly doesn’t slow them down. The Wall has fallen for over a month ago, and Lord Cerwyn confirmed that the Last Hearth and Karhold have fallen. They’re certainly close to Winterfell, if they haven’t reached it already.”

“We are only a few hours away from the castle,” Malcolm Branfield said.

“Your Grace, Winterfell mustn’t fall,” Revan said. “If it falls, the entire North will follow, and the rest of Westeros with it too.”

“I know that Winterfell is important,” Tarly said, “but I fail to see how vital it can be in this situation. No matter how strong the castle is, it is still only a castle. If our scout units didn’t come back because of these dead men, then we will come across them soon enough. Lord Lannister told us that they slaughtered tens of thousand men in one single battle north of the Wall, and that they easily breached the Wall, and were able to get through it. And if we can only kill them with dragonglass, Valyrian steel and fire, and we don’t have enough to destroy an army of a hundred thousand, it might not be a good idea to fight them in open field. The best choice might be to entrench our forces into a strong position and wait for the enemy. Marching against them like that with blind eyes is unwise. We should head back the way we came.”

“We are talking about Winterfell, Lord Tarly,” Tyrion objected.

“True, but a castle is still only a castle. I’m not willing to endanger my men for a pile of stones that we may have already lost.”

“I don’t like to say it, but Lord Tarly may be right. We are in no condition to fight in this snow,” Ser Garlan Hightower said.

“Your Grace, I know more about these creatures than everyone else in this room,” Revan said. “If you can’t defeat them at Winterfell, you won’t be able to defeat them anywhere.”

The queen pondered what she heard, then she spoke. “We continue on our way north. We will reach Winterfell very soon. It is only a matter of hours. In the meantime, I will scout our path myself.”

Before the looks of shock of all her advisors, she kept explaining without showing any sign of surprise. “I will fly Drogon over the area surrounding Winterfell.”

“Your Grace, you cannot take such a risk. You’re too valuable to put your life into danger in a scouting mission,” Branfield opposed.

“I thank you for your concern, but we must know what’s ahead of us, and it seems no one can do it on the ground. I will do it from the sky.”

“Your Grace, it only takes one arrow or one spear at the right place, and you will be dead.”

“Do the White Walkers have arrows?” That question was for Tyrion.

“I never saw them use any. The wights don’t seem to have the capacity to bend a bow. As for the White Walkers themselves… as I told you, I never saw one of them using a bow and an arrow.”

“Then that settles it. We break camp and ride for Winterfell immediately. I don’t want to waste any more time. We’re heading at forced march. Lord Tyrion, Revan, I’d like a word with you.”

All the others left, and Tyrion found himself alone with a Red Priest and a Targaryen queen. She addressed Revan. “Why did you say that if I didn’t defeat the White Walkers here, then I couldn’t defeat them anywhere else?”

Revan sighed. “Because there is something inside Winterfell, something that mustn’t fall to the enemy’s hands.”

“What is it?”

“It has several names, but most know him as the Three-Eyed Raven.”

That rang a bell in Tyrion’s mind. “Brandon Stark said he was the Three-Eyed Raven.”

Revan looked at him. “What can he do?”
“Well, he can see events that happened many years ago, before he was even born. He can also enter the minds of animals and control them, or so he claims. Apparently, he could also enter a human’s mind, though I never saw him do it. But I think he is honest in his claim, considering that he was able to tell me things he could never have known otherwise.”

Although they couldn’t see his face, Revan looked very concerned. “The Three-Eyed Raven has all the knowledge and the powers of the Children of the Forest in him, and the Children of the Forest created the White Walkers. If the Others get their hands on him, then all is lost. And there’s also something else inside Winterfell.”

“What else?” the queen asked.

“Let’s just say that if they seize the castle, this winter will never end, no matter what we do afterwards.”

“Well, it is time to stop the White Walkers anyway. Do you have any idea where Jon Snow is?” she asked Tyrion.

“I don’t know, your Grace. He might be dead for what we know, but if he’s still alive, I would bet he retreated to Winterfell. It is the best defended castle in the North, and where he has the best chance to hold against the dead.”

Daenerys nodded. “I need Jon Snow to bend the knee, and he is my nephew, my last family in this world. I’m not going to abandon someone of my own blood. You may leave, Revan.”

The Red Priest left. When he was gone, the queen turned again her gaze toward him. “Walk with me.”

They headed out of the tent. Everyone was preparing to march and make the last few miles to Winterfell. The snow seemed thicker than when Tyrion entered the war command tent. Snow fell more heavily than before.

“What do you suggest I do when I meet Jon Snow?” she asked him.

In the previous weeks, Tyrion advised Daenerys Targaryen on how to deal with Northerners. She trusted him enough to listen to his advice after Moat Cailin. The first situation where she followed his opinion was in the matter of the priest who killed the northern commander Duncan at Moat Cailin. Her first intent was to execute the man for violating a sacred law of Westeros, but the High Priestess Kinvara argued to exile the priest who acted as her personal guard instead. Tyrion was present during this discussion, and the queen asked him his opinion on the matter. Tyrion knew that killing the Red Priest would only strengthen the strife between the followers of different religions in this army, and make the incident during the discussions more public, so he supported the High Priestess’ decision. She and the priest they called Geralt left the next day.

After that, Tyrion tried to give her advice about how to make sure the Lords of the North they came across would let them pass at least, or even better swear fealty to her immediately. He managed to have her authorization to discuss with Lady Dustin at Barrowton, and he convinced the lady to bend the knee, not without using her long grudge against Ned Stark for her husband’s death during Robert’s Rebellion. He suspected that she hoped Daenerys would kill all the Starks. After the success in Barrowton, where he wrote to Winterfell to warn them of their coming, Daenerys often asked for his council. He gained even more her trust after he convinced Lord Cerwyn, a staunch supporter of Jon Snow, to bend the knee as well. The fact a strong garrison of Lannister soldiers was inside his walls helped.
“I suggest you don’t come high and mighty and demand immediately that he bends the knee. Even though he might accept, his bannermen may not. The Northerners are not that different from the Dornish. When Torrhen Stark surrendered before Aegon, there are some who say that his sons plotted to overthrow him and resist the new king. I think the best way is to show the Northerners that you are worthy to be their queen,” Tyrion told her.

“And how would I do that?”

“Robb Stark was hailed King in the North after the Whispering Wood, and Jon Snow after the Second Battle of Winterfell.”

“So I must win a battle?”

“I think you will need more. Robb Stark and Jon Snow were from the North, or believed to be from the North for the second. You have no ties with the North, your Grace. I think you’ll need to win a war for the North if you want them to declare you their queen on their own initiative.”

“I would rather not wait the end of this war.”

“I understand, but Jon Snow wants to bend the knee. He’s a man of honor, just like Ned Stark, and Ned Stark was the only one to talk against your murder when Robert sent assassins after you. It would be better to wait for the oath of the North than to push it and risk rebellions that will weaken us against the dead.”

“Very well. I shall go now. Follow the rest of the army.”

“Your Grace.” She stopped and looked at him. “I know that I advised you to be merciful, but you also promised against my fealty that whoever it was who tried to kill me would answer for his crimes.”

She smiled. “Don’t worry. I don’t intend to keep traitors among my bannermen.”

She resumed her way to her dragons. Tyrion was forbidden from approaching them since the day he caressed Viserion’s nose. Some maesters said that dragons were so intelligent that they could detect whether someone was their friend or their foe. Tyrion supposed this was why the dragon allowed him to come so close. He wished no ill to the dragon and was quite intrigued by him. He wished he had been able to spend more time with him. Tyrion could feel an affinity, something that felt like a bond, between him and the dragon. He didn’t know how to describe it. He supposed it was only his fascination for dragons and the fact they were misunderstood beasts just like him, but words that Melisandre told him a few days ago came to his mind from time to time. You have a bigger role than you think, Tyrion Lannister. A very small man can cast a very large shadow, and the shadow comes with fire.

A short time later, Tyrion was riding with the long column to Winterfell, and he saw the huge black dragon, alone, with a young blond-haired woman on his back, flying north ahead of them. He only had one guard assigned by the queen now to watch him, and he rode with the rest of the Lannister troops.

“Branfield,” he replied. “It must be strange for you, to come back in the North after all this time, serving another queen.”

“It seems we have a lot in common, my lord.” A quick smile, a smile without much joy, crossed his lips under the moustache. “When I left, my brother-in-law just died, and I travelled through half of the world to find my nephew. Now I come back to find out that he’s dead along with his mother and two of his brothers, that a sweet boy of six has been forced into the lordship of Ironrath after being a hostage to the Whitehills, and that my niece was abandoned with a child by her husband.”

“I’m sorry. For what it’s worth, your nephew Asher died bravely.” Falling from the Wall when the Night King brought it down. “And he died fighting for something worth fighting for.”

“I’m not surprised. Asher was never afraid of anything. He would have died for anyone of his family.”

“And he did.”

They fell into a deep silence. For some time, they just throttled ahead. Tyrion felt his back aching.
The saddle wasn’t designed for him. Then a man from the fiery Hand, the private army of the Red Priests, came and told him he was needed immediately. Tyrion followed him and found all the main commanders of the army, the leaders of the Stormlands, the Reach, the Riverlands, the Westerlands, the Crownlands, the Dothrakis, the Northerners and the Fiery Hand, together. Dickon Tarly, Malcolm Branfield, Clement Piper, Dickon Cole, Cley Cerwyn, Revan, Daven, and many more. It looked like a war summit, but this time without anything over their heads, and without the queen.

“Tell them what you saw,” Revan said. He was addressing a young man who served in the Fiery Hand. This one had to be in the twenties, had a tattoo of slave from Volantis on his face, and he was shaking uncontrollably. Tyron saw the fear in his eyes before he spoke, and he guessed what the poor fellow saw before he talked.

“We were on scouting patrol. We managed to reach Winterfell, and then… They were everywhere. I saw one of them. An Other. His skin was like ice, and his eyes were blue like I never saw before.
There were dead men everywhere. His servants. Thousands of them. They were everywhere. We saw flaming arrows being shot from the castle. We tried to run away, but the others… I was the only one to escape.”

Tyrion’s heart was beating fast. Sansa. Joanna. “Winterfell is under attack,” he whispered. “We are too late.”

“Not yet,” Revan said. “There’s only a short distance left. We could be there in less than half an hour if we keep forcing our march. Order your men to ride for Winterfell at full speed.”

“Wait, why should we listen to you?” Lord Piper asked.

“Because the queen made him commander of the whole army before she left.” Tyrion talked before he could think about it. “I was present. She said that she entrusted him with every decision concerning the army in her absence.” It was a lie, but they needed to rescue Winterfell immediately, and if he needed to lie for this, then so be it, he would tell all the lies that were necessary. His wife and his daughter were in danger.

“And we should believe you, Imp?” Lord Cole said.

“The queen left for Winterfell. If the White Walkers are there, then she is in danger. You want to abandon her?” Tyrion asked him.

“We will be putting all our men in danger,” Dickon Tarly said.

“There’s no time for discussion,” Revan stated. He talked in a language Tyrion didn’t understand, but he suspected it was Dothraki, since their commanders eagerly rode back to their troops, shouting war cries. “The Dothrakis are riding into battle, and the Fiery Hand is too. Whether you follow us or not is up to you but be sure the queen won’t forget it when she hears you stayed away from the fight when she needed you the most. Prepare the Fiery Hand,” he ordered one of his men in Valyrian, and he rode away.

Only the Westerosi remained. Tyrion decided it would take too long to convince them all, and the Dothrakis were already a large part of the army. He was about to ride away when Garlan Hightower spoke.

“I’m sending my men into the fray. If the dead are attacking Winterfell as we speak, then we have a chance to surprise them. That’s an opportunity we cannot miss.”

“Daven, tell our men to ride for battle,” Tyrion said.

“Yes, my lord.”

Tyrion rode away, and he thought he saw a few more commanders joining their men. However, Tyrion didn’t join his own men. He didn’t take the same direction than Daven.

Chapter End Notes

I want to apologize for not uploading this chapter on Wednesday like I usually do, but the reason is that the next four chapters are about the Third Battle of Winterfell. So I delayed this chapter, and the next four chapters will be published next Friday together. Expect a huge battle.

Please review

Next chapter : The battle will start from Arya's perspective.

Spoiler : We will welcome a new POV during the battle.
Arya VIII

Chapter Notes

Here come the four chapters of the Third Battle of Winterfell, beginning with Arya. I hope you'll enjoy it.

There are a lot of songs at the beginning, maybe too many, you'll tell me. It is before the battle begins and they're here to show the state of mind the soldiers might be in. If you want to listen to them, these songs can be found, in their order of appearance, at the following addresses on Youtube:
- "Riversong" by Brunuhville, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nKJqMnuZhFU
- "The Road to Freedom" by Chris de Burgh, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=lzWLI4aUuo0
- "Hands of Gold", version by Peter Hollens, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Bdmh9eRUz8g

ARYA VIII

Far above, into the sky
The Gods' tears,
Fall from their eyes
The Angels fall
Demons crawl

For in the night we fight for you
And in our hearts we follow the truth
As the battle rages on and on
Our warcries echo far and strong

The old war calls a somber song,
With shield and sword you must go on Ravens soar
Dragons roar

For in the night we fight for you
And in our hearts we follow the truth
As the battle rages on and on
Our war cries echo far and strong

A song is enough
To change the world
And make it alright in the end

I'll sing it for you
To mend your lost soul
And make it alright in the end

She had to listen to the bard singing something that was supposed to encourage them to fight for the Old and the New Gods, but Arya didn’t find it very successful. The song was slow and more appropriate to mourning than to motivation. And the end, how could someone say that a song was enough to change the world. Truth be told, Arya didn’t think a cheering song would succeed to lift their spirits up either. They should tell the people to stop singing and to eat in silence. It would be better for the moral.

Arya hurried to finish the stew in her bowl and left the Great Hall of Winterfell before another song began. She went outside and had the bad luck to fall upon a soldier from the Westerlands who sang for his comrades as they warmed their hands around a fire.

I feel the wind blowing through my doorway,

It's telling me that the summer's gone,

And the winter waits in shadow, waiting with the storm;

I am old and my bones are weary,

And my son he is all I have,

But he has gone to fight for freedom,

Leaving with my heart;

All my life I have loved this land, worked it with my hands,

But can this freedom send the rain, when seed is in the ground,

Can this freedom heal the pain and bring my boy back to me again?

Oh oh oh

I watched them sail from the rocks below me,

't was like the sea in its endless rage,

Many fall on the road to freedom,

Dying on the stones;
All my life I have loved this land, worked it with my hands,

But can your freedom send the rain, when seed is in the ground,

Can your freedom heal the pain and bring my boy back to me again?

Oh oh oh

Late last night, as the world was sleeping,

I dreamed my boy, he was calling out,

'cause he was lost in some dark forest,

And snow was falling down, falling on the ground,

Oh oh oh

Another sad song. What would she hear next? Hands of gold? As if the gods wanted to torture her furthermore, she heard a few other Lannister soldiers singing it into another corner of the courtyard. The soldiers looked very much like each other. Men were bored and had nothing to do, cramped as they were in the castle, so they spent their time singing, as if a song would change anything. Arya sighed and hastened her pace. She decided to go into the crypts. She supposed there would be no song there at least.

She was right. The crypts were dead and silent as a… crypt. Couldn’t she find a more appropriate word? Well, she was no poet. It was Sansa who loved songs and wrote poetry, not her. Arya used to resent Sansa for this, but now she would give everything to see her back and safe. She took something in her pocket that she always carried with her since she came back from Castle Black. When she arrived and found the castle empty, she searched for any sign of Bran and Sansa. When she went to the nursery where her niece should have been, she found nothing like everywhere else, but her boots hit something on the floor. She saw something shining and took it. Ever since, it never left her.

The candles in the crypts produced a light that illuminated the golden necklace Arya was holding in her hand. She knew there was a direwolf under the lion. Sansa always had it around her neck. When she found it, she immediately knew that something horrible had happened. She was relieved when she found Bran with Meera inside the crypts, but she wished that Sansa had been with them.

They would find Sansa, and Arya would make sure the necklace was given back to her. For now, however, they couldn’t do much to save her. It frustrated Arya. The wights launched six assaults on Winterfell in the last three days. Jon had to maintain a heavy guard on the battlements at all time, and everyone was tired. They managed to hold back every assault, but Arya found something strange. They never saw any White Walker. The only ones who attacked were the wights. It looked like at Castle Black. They didn’t send their full forces on them. Did they try to wear them off before the final attack? Arya had talked about this with Jon and Davos, but they all had to agree there wasn’t much they could do except prepare for the next assault. They couldn’t leave Winterfell, or else they would all die for sure. All they could do was hold them off in the hope that Daenerys Targaryen and Tyrion Lannister arrived in time.
Arya wished her brother-in-law was with them. After thinking about this over and over again, she had come to acknowledge that his actions at the Wall with the wildfire trap were justified. Seeing how the White Walkers went through the Wall like through butter and the damage they made to the North, and all that within weeks if not days, she now agreed such solutions were to be considered. Tyrion was good at defending places. They could have good use of him there. She hoped Sansa was with him, and that their daughter was well too.

Arya stopped before the statue of her lord father. They burned his bones three days ago, after the first assault. It had been difficult for Arya and for Jon, but necessary. They had to do what was necessary now, if they were to survive. Arya was back in the Riverlands where she had to do everything to survive.

“I can think of better places where to spend your time, Arya.” Davos Seaworth had joined her. Arya was glad he stopped to call her my lady, just like she stopped to call him ser. He didn’t mind, and said he missed the time when he was a simple smuggler sailing across the Narrow Sea. Arya thought it would have been interesting to grow on a ship with this man. She believed her father would have liked him.

“It is true that, with the thousands of men we have inside these walls, it’s hard to be alone.” He came to stand next to her. “I met Ned Stark a few times. First after he lifted the siege of Storm’s End, and also at the Battle of Pyke. I regret I didn’t know him better. He seemed to be a good man.”

“He was. Honor got him killed.”

“Stannis said the same to Jon Snow. I’m sorry we had to burn his bones.”

“It was necessary.”

“Aye, necessary. That doesn’t mean it was the right thing to do.”

“What do you mean?”

The Onion Knight looked troubled and very sad. “Stannis had his own daughter burned alive because he thought it was necessary to take Winterfell. He may have thought it was necessary, but it wasn’t the right thing to do, no more than it was to sacrifice your friend Gendry.”

Gendry. She hadn’t thought about him for a while now. “Do you think he’s still alive?”

He sighed. “There’s no way to know.” He looked back at her father’s figure. “My father was a crabber. He was born in Flea Bottom, and he died in Flea Bottom. I wasn’t there when he left this world. I was smuggling goods for Salladhor Saan in Braavos. I had left the family home as soon as I could, and I never came back. He never got to know Marya or Matthos, and my son died without meeting his grandfather.”

“I never knew my grandfather either.”

“What the Mad King did to him was a horrible crime.”

“And he paid for it, just like Joffrey did. I just wish I could kill him myself.”

“I would have killed him with a needle if need be.”
Davos chuckled. “I would have liked to see that.” The knight shook. “It’s very cold down there. I think I’ll head back.”

“Wait. I’m coming. Just leave me a minute.” Arya just took the time to light candles for her father, her aunt Lyanna and Rickon, and lit other candles for her mother and Robb even though they were never here. Nonetheless, statues were sculpted for them. None of them were there anymore. They were all gone, their bones reduced to ashes or nowhere to be found.

Arya walked out of the crypts with Davos. She didn’t know why, but she didn’t want to be alone anymore. She changed her mind soon enough when they emerged in the courtyard, for after a few paces they heard a northern soldier singing.

Snow is falling, snow is falling on the ground,

In the forest, in the forest there’s no sound,

A shallow grave is where we lie,

The boys and men who died,

And snow is falling on the ground,

And we are calling to be found;

And the seasons, and the seasons come and go,

In the springtime birds will sing and flowers grow,

At summer's end, the autumn breeze,

Will whisper through the trees,

And leaves are falling on the ground,

And we are calling to be found;

And in our homes, so many tears,

They don't know where we have gone,

And snow is falling on the ground,

And we are calling to be found,

We are calling to be found

“Couldn’t they do something else than singing?” she asked, exasperated. It seemed the prospect of imminent death had turned everyone into a bard.
“It’s better than to fight,” Ser Davos said. Not far away, a group of wildlings were playing dices with Northerners. Arya saw Jon farther, inspecting the trebuchets and the catapults on the battlements.

Then they heard a sound that had become all too familiar. The three distinct blows of a horn warned them about the seventh assault. Arya was almost relieved to have something to do and she ran to the battlements. On her way, she seized a bow and a pile of arrows. She learned to shoot as she grew up, perfected her shooting skills when she was with the Brotherhood without Banners, and she kept training after that when Winterfell was freed from the Boltons. She could fight the enemy in long range and close combat all alike.

The archers all took place, while other men prepared their siege engines. They were from everywhere north of King’s Landing. Lannisters, Tullys, Arryns, Northerners, wildlings, even a few black brothers and Lord Beric and his men. They all prepared for the coming battle. The storm engulfed them very quickly. Still, they knocked and got ready to rain fire on the enemy.

There was nothing to see for a long time, safe for the snow that kept smashing against their faces. Arya searched all the area ahead of her, ready for anything. Or so she thought, for she wasn’t ready for what actually came on them.

The battlements quaked when the first boulder smashed against the walls. Arya knew the foundations of Winterfell were strong. Luwin once told them that catapults and trebuchets were incapable of making a breach into its walls. And yet, someone was trying. Large pieces of rocks flew in their directions. Arya watched one fall directly on the battlements, killing about twenty men with it. She looked behind her and saw that boulders were flying on them from every direction. Some had landed in the courtyard, and a catapult was destroyed. She saw one fall into the godswood.

“Hold your positions!” she heard a man shout. She already knew that was what they had to do.

These huge rocks could only be the beginning of something bigger. Looking over the battlements against, the events gave her reason. Tens of thousand of wights were walking towards them. Arya had never seen so many of them. She knocked and prepared, trying to ignore the projectiles that fell all around her.

“Loose!”

When the order came, her arrow flew through the air. She saw dead men falling into the snow, though she couldn’t hear their cries. There were torches all along the battlements. She took another arrow and placed the pointy end into the fire, readying for another volley. Two more volleys went out before the archers were given leave to fire at will. A sea of undead men were coming on them. They advanced slowly, uncaring for the flaming arrows that fell over them, indifferent to the cries of their companions who fell. Arya kept shooting.

A large block fell not far from her, and she was thrown on her right. The man just on her left had been killed. Arya took his arrows and resumed to shoot. She only had the time to send two more arrows. The wights were at the bottom of the walls, and more were coming. They didn’t shoot back. They had no arrows. A man not far from her threw a torch on the ground. A large line of fire appeared all around the castle, devouring all the wights who dared to come too close, and there were many. They burned.

It was at this time that Arya saw one of them. A White Walker walked through the enemy lines, a long sword of ice in hand. Arya targeted him, and her arrow flew right to his head. It bounced on him. He continued to walk as if nothing could reach him. Arya shot another arrow at him, and again he didn’t feel a thing. He reached the gate at the moment Arya was about to shoot him a third time.
She shot it at the precise moment when the White Walker smashed the sword against the gate.

The effects of the two attacks couldn’t be more different. The gate was entirely destroyed and reduced to pieces. Her arrow didn’t even leave a scratch. The wights rushed within along with the White Walker. Winterfell had double walls, and as a matter of consequence, the gates were doubled too. Arya watched powerless as the second gate was reduced to rubble as well.

Jon had positioned men at each gate to stop any breach by the enemy, and the wights were welcomed by arrows and swords. However, Arya realized these events were not isolated. She was near the South Gate, and from her position she could see that the Hunter’s Gate had been breached too. She couldn’t see the North Gate or the East Gate, but seeing the situation at two other gates, she wasn’t very optimistic. She looked at the army in front of their walls. There were still many archers who kept shooting, but what enemies they killed were immediately replaced. The wights couldn’t climb the walls. Arya saw some trying to do so and failing in previous battles. Their only access were the gates. She dropped her bow and arrows, unsheathed her sword, took a nearby torch and went down the stairs. There was the battle that mattered. If we lose the gates, we lose Winterfell.

Arya burned the first wight she came across, then a second one. Jon had organized his men so that there would be at least one carrying a torch for another fighting with a sword. Being in the last lines, Arya mostly used the torch. She used her sword any time a wight managed to get through the lines. She saw Jon engaged in a duel with a White Walker, and he destroyed it. Several wights around them fell to pieces the moment the White Walker was reduced to shards of ice.

Jon was at the South Gate. His small victory allowed a respite to his men and the wights were driven back a little. Arya turned her attention to the Hunter’s Gate, where the situation was worse. She ran into the battle, seeing archers rain fire on the wights from the towers. They had progressed much more at this place. They were about to take the gate. If the Hunter’s Gate fell, they were lost.

The ground trembled. Arya heard a great noise coming from the north. It sounded like when the Wall fell. She thought she saw dust rising in the air, but she couldn’t see what caused this. However, she had a pretty good idea of what it might be. She saw the Night King use his powers to bring down the Wall. What were the walls of in comparison?

Arya came across a wight with a sigil of the Golden Tooth who tried to kill her, only to end with fire in his guts. When he fell on the ground, Arya saw that a giant was coming in through the Hunter’s Gate. This giant had blue eyes. He released a powerful roar, took a man on the ground and broke him in two, and another roar was released.

“Retreat to the Great Keep!” she heard someone shout.
DAENERYS X

The cold winds of the North struck her face hard as Drogon flew. Vast lands spread below, but she couldn’t see most of them due to the thick snow that kept falling. She had a bad feeling about all this. Despite his strength, Drogon struggled against the strong wind at this altitude. She could feel him giving more effort to keep going ahead.

The weather had gotten worse very soon after she took off, and it seemed to keep getting worse as she continued to fly. She lost sight of the Kingsroad after two minutes. If someone asked her where she was, she couldn’t have given an answer. She decided to make Drogon fly in semicircles, hoping it would prevent her from missing anything. Sometimes she could discern a forest, or the outline of it, but nothing more. The air grew colder. This, conjugated with her lack of vision, prompted her to lower her altitude. Drogon released a powerful scream. He didn’t like the weather either. He grew up in warm lands and never faced something similar.

She caught sight of something far away. It was something yellow, like a fire. A very small fire. She saw another one, then the small points multiplied. Daenerys made Drogon go down a little further, and she saw everything.

There was a huge castle which fitted the description she had from Gerold Hightower, Malcolm Branfield and Tyrion Lannister. It could only be Winterfell. Fires were visible everywhere inside the castle, and trails of fire could also be seen leaving its walls and disappearing in the fields around it. The fields themselves, however, could barely be seen, for they were occupied by the largest army Daenerys had ever seen. Her breathing was cut short by the multitude pressing around Winterfell. They had to be at least one hundred thousand men, and there were figures more massive than men among them, great beasts of different shapes, some of human form. Winterfell was surrounded. Now she knew why her scouts never returned.

Her army was coming, but it would need some time to reach the castle. Maybe an hour. She had to warn them to press on. Before she could turn around, she saw a great explosion on one of the walls of Winterfell. A large section was left open, a large breach was made by which the enemies entered by the hundreds. At the same time, as Drogon kept closing on the castle, Daenerys realized that men who had to be at least twice the size of normal human beings were throwing huge blocks on the castle. There were other large creatures with long horns ramming against the walls as well. She saw one of the giants going through a gate and entering Winterfell.

Her army would never be there in time. If you can’t defeat them at Winterfell, you won’t be able to defeat them anywhere. Revan’s voice resonated in her mind. She had no time to warn her men. They would never be there in time. The decision was easy to take. With one single word, she ordered Drogon to fly down.

Her dragon plunged, releasing a powerful screech, deploying his large black wings. He went down, down, down, and down again. Until they were at the right altitude, right over a large courtyard.

“Dracarys!”

His black and red fire was unleashed upon the giant inside the castle. His head took fire. Daenerys heard with satisfaction its screams of pain mingled to those of the victorious Drogon, but the battle was far from being over.
She took altitude again and flew to the side of the castle that collapsed. There Drogon made another carnage, burning dozens of men within one second. As he went up, Daenerys noticed the huge creatures that kept ramming the walls. She had Drogon turn and attack one of them. Its furs were carbonized in an instant, along with twenty men or so in the fields.

Something flew very close to Daenerys. Drogon’s path was disturbed, and when Daenerys looked back, she saw a huge rock falling upon the castle’s walls. It missed them by an inch. Daenerys spotted the huge men who were throwing these rocks in the swarm of things that covered the fields.
These were not people, but things. Daenerys saw them, and they were nothing like humans. If she still doubted the existence of wights and White Walkers before, all her doubts were now gone.

She had Drogon flying to the bigger targets and spat fire on them. They were vulnerable to fire, indeed. He is the prince that was promised, and his is the song of ice and fire. She heard these words from one of the Red Priests one day, but she hadn’t known its meaning. Now she thought she knew.
The words were said in High Valyrian and the way they were spoken could mean she is the princess that was promised, and hers is the song of ice and fire.

This army looked without end. Daenerys continued to rain fire on them, but there were always more of them. As she kept burning them all, Daenerys recalled that Winterfell was vulnerable. She flew to it and saw that the people defending the castle were still fighting inside, and that the enemies were assaulting the walls again. She spotted five of these beasts with horns heading towards the section that was previously crushed, with a man before them.

Daenerys positioned Drogon, and when she was above the beasts, she unleashed fire upon them.
The flames engulfed them for a very long time, since Drogon didn’t stop spitting fire. A large area before the crumbled walls was turned into a field of fire. When Drogon stopped spitting fire, the beasts were all gone. However, the man before them wasn’t.

Daenerys watched in complete stupor a man with blue eyes and a black armor standing among the flames, looking at her. There was something on his head that had the shape of a crown.

“Dracarys!” She ordered Drogon to unleash his fire again, and he did. The man still stood there, without a single scratch, unbothered by fire. It didn’t work on him.

A great tempest raged around them. A great crowd was marching on Winterfell. Wights came in numbers behind the man with blue eyes, led by other men like him. These eyes were as cold as winter. He wasn’t a man. Not anymore. The vision Revan showed her had become true. Daenerys was standing face to face with the Night King.

He reached something behind his back, and something that looked like a long spear came from it. It seemed to be made of ice. He looked at her, then targeted her with his spear, and was about to throw it.

A thunderous scream came from her right at this moment. Daenerys looked at its origin and saw a large flame of pale gold with red and orange coming for the Night King. Then Viserion slammed into the leader of the White Walkers before continuing his path. When Daenerys looked at the Night King lying on the ground, she saw the handle of his spear next to him, but the ice was gone. It had melted. Green, orange and yellow flames were shot behind him and the wights that were following the Night King burned. Rhaegal was there too.

Before Daenerys could ask herself what her two other dragons were doing here, the Night King was getting back on his knees. Daenerys ordered Drogon to fly away, putting distance between her and the Night King. She didn’t know what this spear would have done without the intervention of Viserion, but she didn’t want to take the risk to see Drogon hurt or killed for the sake of knowing it.
In the meantime, Rhaegal was dropping his fire on the wights all over the battlefield. Viserion, on his side, led an attack on the enemies who were near the walls of Winterfell, just like Daenerys did. She joined him, weakening the dead all around the castle, giving a chance to those who fought inside its walls to survive. Fire surrounded Winterfell. A few days ago, someone told her that Winterfell could have been another Harrenhal, had the Starks decided to not bend the knee to her ancestors three centuries ago. It was ironic to think that the dragons could have destroyed this castle, and that now they were saving it.

As Daenerys thought that the battle was turning into a dance of dragons, her three children spitting their fire on the dead, she heard horns. A great blow of air stroke her from behind. The air was hot, not cold. Looking from where it came, she saw very clearly who did this. Her view was much better. The storm had quieted down. Fires were visible at the distance, but these didn’t come from her dragons. And her army was coming, led by fire.
Gerold I

GEROLD I

A long time ago, in what seemed to be another life, he was sparring with his brother. Not the brother who rode by his side right now, the family’s sword at his belt. He never stood a chance against Garlan. He was the one born to fight in the family. Altos, on the other side, he always knew he could beat him, and Gerold hoped he would succeed.

She was among the people watching them. She was the person who made him believe that something good could actually happen to him in this life. She was the one who persuaded him that a third son could actually get something else than the leftovers his elder brothers allowed him to grab.

The duel had started well enough. He held his ground and managed to place his father’s heir into fragile situations. However, in the end, it didn’t work. He lost. He lost because deep inside, he doubted he could ever be better than Altos. He wanted to be. He didn’t care for the fact that Garlan was better, but Altos… He only wished he could bring him on his knees one time and prove that being the firstborn didn’t make him better, but Gerold wasn’t sure he could do it. He was still the small boy Altos mocked at every turn, and that was his doom. Altos defeated him, humiliated him once again. He had never been able to fight back against him. When he was on the ground, he couldn’t stand up, not before his brother. He could never get back on his feet. Except this time.

When she came to stop Altos, and when his brother slapped the woman he loved, all his uncertainties, all his doubts vanished in one moment and were replaced by the purest rage. He could suffer the others making a joke out of him, or even mistreating him to some extent. He was used to that, especially coming from Altos. But never, never, he would allow someone to raise a hand on the woman he loved. And so he fought, he fought like a savage beast. He could have killed Altos, he knew that, but in this moment, he didn’t care. All he cared about was Mira.

He thought about her every day. Even as they rode, trying to reach Winterfell before it was too late, his wife occupied a part of his mind, like she always did. No matter what he did, she was always there. Sometimes he tried to forget her, even for a few moments, when it was unbearable. He even visited brothels, but in every girl he went to, he saw a detail reminding him of his wife, and felt even worse after spending time with them because he could also see that they were not Mira. The thought of her made him miserable, and he had wanted to turn back his heels and go back to her more often than he could count, but words that his father told him before he left the Hightower were stuck in his head. You are a Hightower, my son. Don’t ever forget that. If you’re going north, it’s for your family above everything else.

He hadn’t minded at this moment. Mira was a Hightower, or so he thought. My name is Mira Forrester, and this is my home. My family is here, they are in danger, and I’m not going to risk the life of the people I love. He felt betrayed, more than she could ever know. However, that was before he learned the truth. I don’t believe it would have been very wise for a pregnant woman to travel miles in the snow and among storms. And that was nothing compared to what he said afterwards. I have many flaws, Ser Gerold Hightower, but abandoning a woman alone with a child when he’s yours is probably one of the things I despise the most. I hope you will never meet a Forrester again, because they all want to skin you alive right now.

And Mira was a Forrester. He never thought he would reach a further bottom end until yesterday, when everyone began to worry that no scout units returned. He was afraid of Lord Tyrion, to be honest. Everyone said he was dead, and yet he lived, and the queen had accepted him on her council.
She took dinners with him, and only with him. And there was also the fact that this little man despised him. Gerold could hear it in his voice. Whenever he saw the Lord of Casterly Rock, he didn’t see the dwarf, but a man casting a very large shadow, a shadow he was afraid that could devour him and leave him into darkness. The worst was that Gerold felt he deserved this hatred. Everything told him that the Imp was right to despise him. When he finally gathered the courage to address him, to ask him if he thought Ironrath would survive, the Lord of Casterly Rock’s answer almost destroyed him.

He answered in a tired voice, and unlike the last time they spoke at Moat Cailin, there was no hatred in his voice. “You know, with all these missing scouts, I wouldn’t be surprised if the dead reached Winterfell. And if they reached Winterfell, then it’s almost certain that Ironrath and everyone who remained inside is dead.” A stone had fallen into his stomach. The little lord had looked at Gerold. “You know what’s worse than death? Staying alive and losing all the people you love. I know what I’m talking about.”

Such were the things he thought about as he looked ahead of him. The Red Priests had led the way as they rode to reach Winterfell before it was too late. Strangely, the storm was smaller. Fired preceded them as they progressed forward. Gerold saw one of the priests light a huge fire only by gazing at a pile of wood. It seemed these people had many tricks up their sleeves. The air was warmer, snow almost turned to rain on their army. Everyone was ready for battle.

Ahead of him, Gerold saw the castle of Winterfell. He had been there almost a year ago, and he didn’t take part to the battle. He was in the reserves. This time would be different. The most disorganized army he ever saw was besieging Winterfell. Well, besieging wasn’t the appropriate term. It was something between attacking and surrounding, and there were more people in the fields than he could count. He never saw an army big like that, and yet he saw two only in the last year. It looked like a disorganized mob rushing against walls. The only problem was that the walls were breached. The enemies were running into the castle through the gate he could see. And there were mammoths, and giants. And dragons too. Three dragons flew over the battlefield and breathed fire on the enemies. Gerold thought they were trying to keep the dead at distance from Winterfell, but from what he could see, it wasn’t entirely successful. The enemy’s army seemed without limit in numbers.

Gerold felt a hand on his shoulder. He was riding in a huge army as well, next to savages who spoke a language he couldn’t understand, and fellow knights from the Reach, the Stormlands, the Crownlands, the Riverlands, the Westerlands and the North, not to mention the man at the head of the army who wielded a flaming sword. The whole might of Westeros was gathered here. However, it didn’t give him trust. The only one who gave him trust right now was the man riding next to him, the one who reassured him with a pression on his shoulder, his brother Garlan. Gerold looked at him.

“Ready?” He looked down. He didn’t dare to answer. It was then that his big brother told him something he needed to hear. “Gerold, if Mira is still alive, she’s in there. And there’s only one way for you to ever see her again.”

He looked up to meet his brother’s eyes, who were serious and encouraging at the same time. They told you know what you have to do. Gerold looked back at Winterfell. Could she be there? Was there a chance…

“CHARGE!”

The great shout came and everyone ordered their horses to run forward. With only an instant of hesitation, Gerold did the same, and they charged the dead enemies in front of them. He heard other people shout and roar all around him. The battle had begun. This time, he would be a part of it. He unsheathed his sword from its scabbard and threw a side glance to his brother. Garlan was staring straight ahead of him, ready for the impact. Gerold decided to be ready as well. That was his chance. Winterfell was growing in his sight. If Mira is still alive, she’s in there. That was his chance for everything. You should learn to surrender quickly. That’s all you’re good for. He would prove to Altos that he was wrong. He would find her. He focused on the battlefield ahead of him, and saw the enemy lines, if you could call that lines, getting closer. He readied himself, and when the contact was made, he was prepared.

The first wight who happened to be close to his horse found himself impaled on the said sword. The steel passed through the flesh and cut the body in two. Gerold roared and swung his sword at every side, cutting and hacking every enemy he came upon. There were Dothrakis near him and he perceived from the side how they used their two arched sword to reduce wights to rubble. Gerold didn’t care for their blue eyes or their visible bones or their deadly appearance. He was ready to kill them all, if killing them was possible. He wouldn’t stop. He would never stop. And yet he did.

At one moment, his horse rode through a wight, and the next moment he was falling onto the ground. Gerold rolled on his back and managed to get up on his feet quickly enough. He was met immediately by a man with a red armor, but this one wasn’t alive like Lord Tyrion’s men. He had no flesh on the face and ran at him with his sword brandished as if he wanted to chop him like a tree. Gerold blocked the blow and sent him one of his own. The head was gone. However, the fight didn’t stop there.

To Gerold’s horror, this thing kept fighting without a head. He cut an arm, but it kept holding the sword with the other arm, albeit very clumsily. He slashed the dead soldier from balls to head, then finally hit him with his sword at the leg, which was gone immediately. Holding on only one leg and with a lone arm, without a head on his shoulders, the wight was without defense. Gerold finished the work and cut through the wight in the middle, separating him in two. The parts kept moving, but he decided they were no more danger.

He saw a Dothraki with a wight on his back, the dead man tearing the flesh off his back as the savage did everything to get rid of it. Gerold saw a torch still lit lying near his feet and seized it. Half the soldiers were carrying one. He shoved it into the wight, who began to scream like a wild beast, and the savage could get rid of the nuisance and go back to fight. Gerold imitated him.

With a torch, things were much easier. The fire only needed to touch the wight so that it would be inoffensive. The moment fire touched it, the fight was over. Gerold saw several other men doing the same all around him. Knights and Dothrakis kept hacking the dead from their horses, with sword or whatever it was that could cut, weakening if not killing them, while torch bearers dealt with the dead for good. There were also some men who had weapons made of dragonglass, a material mined in Dragonstone that could destroy White Walkers and wights all alike. At the same time, many men fell around him.

He kept fighting, and fighting, seeing dragons fly over his head and fires about everywhere across the battlefield. Gerold was sweating under his armor. And then he saw him.

He had blue eyes, like the wights, but his skin was a very pale blue, looking more like ice than dead flesh, and he had a strange sword with a long handle in his hands. He hacked the people around him, no matter where they came from, with easiness. Gerold saw a knight approaching him with his horse, and the animal was impaled. The knight followed. His spear tumbled towards Gerold, and he saw that it was made of dragonglass. He seized it and advanced toward the enemy. The cold blue eyes met his. He threw the spear toward the White Walker when he thought he was close enough. The weapon broke when it met the armor and miserably fell on the ground. Gerold swore he saw a smile on this thing’s face, a smile that reminded him of Altos’s mocking smile.
Gerold unsheathed his sword and prepared to meet his opponent. When the White Walker swung his sword, Gerold ducked and struck a hit on his leg. Nothing happened. He received a back hand on his face and stumbled behind. When he brought back his sword on his opponent, the blades met and his own shattered. It was only an inch and his belly would have been opened. He stumbled again, and this time fell on his back. The White Walker walked towards him, with the obvious intention to deliver the fatal blow.

Then a point of steel appeared through the White Walker’s heart, or at least where the heart should have been. It didn’t scream like a wight, for it vanished immediately, reduced to pieces of ice. Where the White Walker previously was Garlan now stood. His brother released a sigh.

“It’s a chance Father gave me the family’s sword before I left,” he said. Yes, it was a chance. There weren’t many houses in Westeros who had a Valyrian steel sword, and the Hightowers were among the few with this privilege.

His brother offered him a hand and Gerold seized it to stand up. “Come on, little brother, the battle is not over.”

No indeed, it wasn’t. Gerold and Garlan went back into the melee. They fought as hard as they could, watching over each other at the same time. From afar, Gerold saw the Red Priest with a mask, still on his horse, swinging his flaming sword through a White Walker that exploded. Another knight from the Reach rode by his side, and together they headed south, to Winterfell.
Jon watched the giant who came through the Hunter’s Gate seize two men who were running away and crush them on the ground. He didn’t know who screamed to retreat, but that was a big mistake. The men were running everywhere, trying to escape a death they were condemned to if they didn’t fight. If they lost the gates, they lost Winterfell.

The impossible arrived at this moment. A great gust of fire came from nowhere and devoured the giant’s head. It fell, crushing many wights with him. Jon looked up to see a giant black beast with huge wings flying over their heads. He looked in awe to the beast flying away. He realized most men who began to retreat had stopped.

“Fight!”

The shout brought some back into the battle, and the screams they unleashed as they returned to their positions and fought the wights again forced the others to do the same. It returned to a real chaos of fight. Jon pierced, hacked, cut, hit, punched. He did everything to take as many dead men with him before he died. He knew he could die, and that his chances to live were slim, but at least he would give these fuckers a fight. Longclaw danced all around with its master, ending the Night King’s work. From time to time, Jon witnessed the black dragon spitting fire on the other side of the walls. He thought that fewer dead men came in through the gates.

Let’s give these fuckers a true hell of a fight. And let’s win this battle.

A Lannister always paid his debts, and it seemed that Tyrion Lannister lived by these words. They arrived just in time. The balance of the battle was beginning to turn. However, it only turned in the sense they could hold the dead at bay. The gates were still being fought for. They slowed down, sometimes even pushed back the enemy’s advance, but he kept coming at them, and while his men were tiring, the dead didn’t seem to exhaust or tire in any way.

He changed of position, alternating between the South Gate and the Hunter’s Gate, encouraging his men at both positions, while he kept killing every wight who happened before him. He found himself fighting three at the same time, using every parade he had to keep the trio of swords away from him. He destroyed one, only to have one wight on his right and another on his left. Suddenly, the one on the left burned, and Jon turned all his attention to his right. A swing of sword at the neck and the third wight was gone. When he looked back at where the second wight burned, he saw Arya fighting another dead. He spotted another enemy rushing onto her from her back. Jon rushed on him and smashed him to pieces before he could do any harm to his sister.

They found themselves fighting back to back, Arya with her long sword and a torch, Jon with Longclaw, the white wolf head reminding him of his Stark origins and upbringing. His arms ached from the effort he gave to repel the enemies.

“Your Grace!”

Jon looked where the voice came from, and saw Ser Davos running towards him. “You’re supposed to guard the North Gate,” Jon shouted as he destroyed another wight.
“The North Gate is gone. And the walls too. There’s a large breach. Wights are coming in numbers. We cannot hold them.”

The walls were breached at the North Gate. Holding an army of dead men trying to get through a gate was already very difficult, but a breach was impossible to hold. He remembered how they failed to hold the Wall after the First Fall.

“Did you send the reserves?” Jon asked. They kept large numbers of men in reserve in case the enemy would manage to break through their defenses.

“We sent all of them, but we won’t hold for long.”

Jon gathered five hundred men to follow him to the North Gate. It may be hopeless, but they had to defend the north side of Winterfell. If they lost the walls at one position, their defenses would be worth nothing. Worse, if the dead managed to take possession of the northern section of the castle, they could take the Great Keep. Bran was there, still lost in his visions.

When Jon arrived near the North Gate, he realized how dire the situation was. Men fought everywhere in a complete chaos. The breach was long for about a hundred feet, and the dead were rushing inside. Jon joined the fight with the men he brought, bringing what relief they could to the people already fighting. There were many bodies on the ground. This sight reminded him of the Second Battle of Winterfell. He prayed to the Old Gods to keep the dead at bay in the southern part of the castle, or else they would be surrounded on all sides, like when Ramsay sent his phalanx.

While he fought, Jon saw a miracle happen. A dragon, smaller than the black one, passed by the breach and threw fire on it. The debris were on fire, creating a wall of fire instead of a wall of stone. He saw wights trying to get through the breach burning right away.

He doubled his efforts to pull back the enemy. He saw Tormund fighting in a corner with other wildlings, cutting through the dead, roaring like a wild beast. The wildlings were used to fight the dead. Despite their absence of discipline, they were the best to fight the wights in hand to hand. They knew their weaknesses.

Jon joined his friend, destroying two wights on his way. “That’s a hell of a fight, Lord Snow,” he said, grinning and laughing. He cut a wight in two from head to toe. Whether you were dead or alive, Tormund Giantsbane was a dangerous enemy to have.

“Once this is over, you’ll show me how to make this drink you have north of the Wall, because I’ll need a lot of it,” Jon said. “And that’s an order from your king.”

“Stay alive and I’ll tell you, but not because you’re a king.” Tormund roared back as he attacked another wight. This one couldn’t resist the leader of the Free Folk more than any other.

They were beginning to get back the advantage, thanks to the wall of fire that kept wights at bay, when the said wall disappeared. Five White Walkers walked through it, unbothered by fire or by anything around them. At the center of them stood the Night King. The fire being extinguished, wights rushed from behind them into the yard.

The battle got more intense than ever. They were losing ground. Jon tried to make himself a way to the White Walkers. He was the only one here with a sword made of Valyrian steel. The White Walkers were cutting through his men, invulnerable to their weapons. They remained together, side by side. None got far from the others.
As Jon was trying to make his way to them, his eyes met those of the Night King. They already met at Hardhome a long time ago, and again at the Wall when it fell for the second time. They had looked at each other as he raised his arms and an army of tens of thousand rose to follow him. Now he was being surrounded by the four White Walkers who accompanied him, and they prevented anyone from getting close to him. He raised his arms.

Jon knew exactly what he was doing, but it was too late. Someone gripped his knee, and he immediately slashed the body on the ground. He looked around and saw more of them rising. He had to stop him, now. He was the only one who could do it. Just as he was about to run forward to the enemy, he heard a terrible roar next to him. Tormund had been surrounded by five or six wights. Jon saw him being stabbed by as many swords as there were enemies on him.

Jon screamed and charged in the hope that his friend could still be saved. He hacked to pieces all the wights. Tormund fell on his knees. He seized Jon’s hand. “Don’t let me come back.”

He fell on his side. These were his last words. Jon would have expected him to ask that he made sure the White Walkers didn’t make it out, but instead Tormund begged him to not be turned into one of these things. In some way, that was the same. The only way to stop Tormund from returning as a wight was to kill the Night King.

Jon stood to face the leader of the White Walkers. Bran said he once was a man, and some legends said he had been a commander of the Night’s Watch. Jon slowly walked to him. The rest of the battlefield didn’t matter anymore. Two of the White Walkers accompanying their king prepared to engage him. Five against one. He already killed more than one White Walker, three overall. However, it was always in singular combat. The odds were against him, but there was nothing else to do. If he couldn’t destroy the Night King, then who would?

Coming out of the dust behind the five Walkers, a dark figure emerged on a dark horse, wielding a flaming sword. He swung it at one of the guards behind the Night King and the White Walker in question was destroyed. Another rider came upon the second Walker behind, but his sword was met by the enemy’s and blocked.

Jon didn’t hesitate. He launched forward at the two enemies standing before him. They had looked surprised by the irruption of these two horsemen and Jon couldn’t let an opportunity like that pass by. However, the White Walker he attacked blocked him easily, and Jon found himself dealing with two enemies at the same time. He was forced on the defensive and parried the attacks the best he could. He was the best swordsman in Winterfell before he went to the Wall, but these two were not to be taken lightly. He saw one of the riders fighting the other White Walker behind. The Night King did nothing. He stared in Jon’s direction.

Jon spotted a red glow by his right and realized the man with a burning sword engaged one of the White Walkers he was fighting. It was a three-to-three fight. The Night King didn’t join the fray. He kept looking into Jon’s direction. Jon swung at the White Walker’s legs, but the enemy stopped his blow and stepped back. He tried to chop Jon’s head from his shoulders, but Longclaw met the ice sword. It was Jon who then tried an attack on its arm and again it was stopped. They exchanged blows without stopping, and each blocked the other. Finally, Jon saw an opening and seized it. He swung the sword from down to up. The White Walker could deflect the blow, but his sword was no longer in position to protect him. Jon swung it one last time and finished his enemy. The White Walker was gone.

He looked at the Night King, who still remained in retreat and gazed in his direction, looking… confused? Was that what Jon saw? Confusion on the face of the leader of the White Walkers? He noticed Jon advancing towards him, surely, for he raised his sword and brought it down. Jon blocked it, but the blow was powerful, and it was difficult for him to not place a knee on the ground. He ducked and attacked the Night King on the side, only to be blocked. Who could think that men who seemed made of ice were so agile and quick. The White Walkers he fought before were nothing compared to those he faced today.

The Night King brought his sword forward, point first at his heart, and Jon moved to his left to avoid it. He tried to smash the king’s head, but he parried with a single hand. He didn’t need to hold his sword with two hands it seemed. That meant his second hand was free.

Jon stepped back just in time. If he hadn’t, the ice dagger would have gotten right into his heart. So the Night King fought with a sword and a dagger, his blows with one hand as powerful if not more than Jon’s own attacks with two hands. He blocked the attacks and stayed away from the dagger, until the Night threw it at him. It struck his right arm, leaving a superficial injury on it, but Jon felt the pain very strongly. The Night King advanced and brought his sword down on him. Jon blocked it with Longclaw, but the Night King now wielded his sword with two hands and forced it down. Jon fought with all his forces. The pain in his arm became unbearable. And then, he felt a wave of warmth run through his veins, and a new energy emerging. He pushed back the sword of ice and struck, then he struck again, again, and again. At each blow, the Night King gave ground, and at last a blow took his sword out of his hands. Jon didn’t miss it. He plunged Longclaw straight into where the Night King’s heart should have been.

A deafening scream was heard immediately, and Jon saw that it came from the Night King. Where Longclaw got through him, a blue light appeared all around. The Night King looked straight in front of him, over Jon’s shoulder, and he exploded into a million shards of ice. Jon raised an arm to protect his face.

When Jon removed his arm, he saw a red figure he knew only too well standing several feet from him. She brought him back from the dead, and he exiled her. Melisandre of Asshai was right there in front of him.

A long moment of silence went on, and no sound could be heard. And then, an explosion of cries came from behind. Jon looked there and, behind the masked man with a flaming sword who showed no reaction, he saw all his men raising their sword in the air. The cries were of joy. There wasn’t a single wight left.

“What happened?” The knight who arrived just in time to help Jon was next to him, asking this question. A pile of ice shards not far away revealed he destroyed the White Walker he was fighting.

“When the king of the dead dies, then nothing dead can survive near him,” the masked man answered. Jon realized he wore red robes, similar to some of Melisandre’s.

“Who are you?” Jon asked him.

“Who I am is not important, my message is. This battle is not over.”

He walked by Jon and went towards the breach. He also walked by Melisandre, as if she didn’t exist.
Job walked until he was close to her.

“Why are you here?” he asked her.

“Doing my duty to my Lord, Jon Snow,” she answered.

“You’re Jon Snow?” the knight asked him.

He turned to face him. “Aye.” The knight looked at his sword’s pommel.
“My name is Dickon Tarly.”

Jon’s eyes widened in utter surprise. “You’re Sam’s brother.”

“He talked to me about you. And he sent me back Heartsbane before I travelled in the North. It’s a chance that he did. I saw what these things did to normal swords. The next time he talks about surreal creatures, I’ll believe him.” He shook his head. “Revan is right though. This battle is probably not over.”

He walked back to the breach. Jon looked at Melisandre, who held his gaze, though there was none of the pride she displayed before Stannis died. Jon just walked past her and emerged on the battlefield after climbing the debris of the walls. There he found Revan and Sam’s brother watching the fields around Winterfell. Jon saw many men on horses everywhere, hacking dead men. And the dead were retreating, running away. Three huge dragons kept raining fire on them.

“It seems the battle is over,” Dickon Tarly said. “I’m going to check on my men.”

He left. Jon remained there, looking at the whole battlefield. The dead were running away, the Night King was dead. They won.

“It’s never over, Jon Snow.” Jon looked to his right, where the masked man stood. “Don’t forget this. It is never over.”

He walked away, and progressively disappeared from Jon’s eyesight. Jon realized the air was warmer, and that snow almost turned to rain when it touched the ground. The temperature was far less cold, and his sweat didn’t only come from the heat of battle anymore.

“I see you’ve just met another member of my order.” Melisandre’s voice came from behind him. “I hope you will trust him more than you trusted me.”

“What are you doing here?” he asked again.

“I serve my Lord,” she repeated.

“The last time we spoke, you said your Lord ordered to burn children,” Jon countered, angrily.

She looked down. “I was wrong. I came back in the hope I could be useful.”

“I told you that if you ever came back, I would hang you for murder.”

“And I am back. If you want to execute me, Jon Snow, then do it. Maybe my part to play in this war was to help you defeat the Night King, and I did it. If that’s the case, then there is no reason left for me to live.”

She stared straight at him again. She didn’t defy him, and she didn’t ask for forgiveness, but there was something else in her eyes. It was as if she asked him if he really wanted to kill her. If that was the case, then in all honesty, Jon didn’t want to.

They heard a long screech and Jon saw one of the dragons coming their way. He stepped back when he landed at a respectful distance from them. There was someone on his back. He climbed down the beast and walked toward them.

“It seems we arrived just in time,” he said. Tyrion Lannister was standing right in front of him.
Jon let himself drop on the ground and brought his friend into an embrace. “I’m glad you’re alive.”

“Well, me too,” the small man replied, obviously uncomfortable about the whole situation. Jon stood back.

“We thought you were dead.”

Tyrion scoffed. “You can’t imagine how right you were.” Jon frowned. “Let’s just say we made a similar journey, Jon Snow.”

The dwarf directed his eyes in Melisandre’s direction. Jon looked at her. She nodded. There were men who assembled behind and looked at the dragon Tyrion Lannister just arrived with. Jon looked back at his friend, who shrugged. Jon’s eyes wandered to the beast he rode to come here, then back to his friend.

“You were riding a dragon?”

“Yes, that’s long story,” Tyrion replied. He looked in the skies. “But I think it will have to wait.” Jon followed his gaze and saw a large black dragon, larger than the one Tyrion arrived on, coming their way. “I suppose it’s time for you to meet the queen, Jon Snow.”

Jon thought he perceived a certain concern in his friend’s voice, and when the black beast landed next to his smaller brother, Jon understood why. The pale dragon was very quiet when compared to his big brother, who opened his mouth wide and screamed at them. When he dropped his head, he revealed a young woman with blond hair on his back. She climbed down and walked to Tyrion, who knelt before her.

“Your Grace.”

“I thought I ordered you to not approach my dragons,” she said. Her voice was imperious. She spoke and behaved like someone who was used to give orders and to see them followed.

“I agree, but if I didn’t, you have to admit that you might be dead right now.”

A silence followed. “Rise. We’ll talk about it later.” Jon wondered who Tyrion was worried about. He and Daenerys Targaryen walked together to him. She looked at the woman standing close to Jon. “Lady Melisandre.”

“Your Grace.” She bowed.

“Where is Jon Snow? I need to talk with him.”

Everyone seemed a little surprised and shocked. It was Tyrion who spoke first. “He is right in front of you, your Grace.”

She looked at him. Her eyes were purple. She was the one to look surprise this time. “You are Jon Snow?” She didn’t seem to believe it was possible.

Jon inhaled deeply. He still had his word in hand. She was defenseless, standing there without any weapon, without anything to protect her. He had thought about it a long time ago, and he knew what he had to do. Slowly, he took Longclaw’s handle with his two hands.

“Your Grace.”

He pointed it towards the ground and bent the knee. Behind him, Jon heard everyone else slowly kneeling before the only queen of Westeros. The history was repeating itself.

Chapter End Notes

Again, I hope you enjoyed my version of a Third Battle of Winterfell. You may have noted a few similarities between this battle and the Battle of Pelennor Fields in "Lord of the Rings: The Return of the King".

The battle began with the defense almost without hope of Winterfell. Arya trying to shot down a White Walker before he breaks the gates (White Walkers can shatter steel, so they can destroy a portcullis, like in the fanfic "Ned Stark Lives!" by cbstevp) is inspired by the scene of the Battle of Helm' Deep in the "Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers". Despite the defenders' efforts, they can't hope to repel the invaders without reinforcements from the outside.

Then Daenerys arrives and balances the fight, without being able to completely turn the tide. She faces the Night King, only to discover that even dragonfire cannot destroy it (only wights can be destroyed by fire, not the White Walkers). She is only saved thanks to Tyrion's intervention, who came with Viserion against her orders, and who destroys the weapon that was destined to kill Drogon.

The balance of the fight truly turns for the living when Daenerys's army arrives. Helped by the powers of the Red Priests, the army is capable of fighting the dead within a lessened storm. A part of the army has weapons made of dragonglass, and they have fire as well. That's where we get our first POV chapter from Gerold Hightower, Mira's husband.

In the meantime, Jon is able to rally his men inside the walls of Winterfell, where they manage to hold their ground long enough to let Daenerys's army deal with the enemy outside. This battle inside the walls is not without casualties and ends with a final duel between the Night King and five other White Walkers on one side, and Jon Snow, Revan and Dickon Tarly on the other side, three of the few warriors with Valyrian steel sword on the battlefield. The death of the Night King causes many wights to fall and the remaining to retreat, chased by the dragons. The battle ends with Jon reuniting with Tyrion and meeting Daenerys for the first time.

Each chapter somehow plays the role to show us the battle from a different perspective. Arya sets the context and shows us the condition of the defenders of the castle along with their struggle to hold it against an army much stronger than theirs. Daenerys gives us a view of the battle from the skies, Gerold a view from the field outside the castle, while Jon shows us how the battle is going inside the walls once the tide has begun to turn.

Now, Winterfell has been saved, but the war is not over yet and the presence of Daenerys in the North might bring complications. Not all Northerners may accept her as their queen after all.

I ask you to leave a review about this battle. Tell me what you think of it, good and bad.

Next chapter is next week: Tyrion
P.-S.: I want to apologize for only uploading the battle today. It was supposed to be published on Saturday, but a certain government I'm working for wanted me to write a budget instead of fanfictions :)

For a third time, I hope you liked these four chapters.
TYRION XXXIII

The room was empty, and cold. The crib was still there, near the window, but it didn’t make him feel like there was something in this room. This had been the residence of Joanna and her wetnurse, and almost of Sansa as well since she spent as much time as she could with their daughter. Now they were gone. A thin layer of dust covered the floor and the crib itself. Tyrion climbed the small stool near the crib. It was placed to allow him to take Joanna in his arms when he wanted. He wandered his finger over the edge of the crib and looked at the dust that accumulated on it. He rubbed his fingers, sending the dust into the air. No one entered this room for a very long time.

Tyrion had hoped that Sansa and Joanna were safe inside Winterfell while he rode with Daenerys. The betrayal of the Vale didn’t mean they were able to seize Winterfell. The castle was very strong, even with a small garrison, and he thought Sansa would have enough sense to leave most of the troops Ser Vance Corbray brought with him outside the castle. His wife and daughter had to be safe inside these walls. He was wrong.

His greatest worry when he arrived was what Daenerys Targaryen would do with Jon Snow. First, she didn’t recognize him. Tyrion told her that Jon Snow didn’t look like a Targaryen, but it didn’t seem to be enough. She didn’t consider the possibility that the man standing in front of her was her nephew, and even after Tyrion told her, she seemed very skeptical. Still, the fact Jon Snow bent the knee before her, and was followed, although reluctantly, by his fellow countrymen and the other people who were with him, relieved the tension. The Mad King’s daughter was welcomed inside Winterfell and accepted Jon Snow’s pledge, though without giving much detail for the time being.

Once Daenerys walked inside Winterfell, the first thing Tyrion did was to ask Jon Snow about Sansa and Joanna. Jon Snow had been surprised. He thought they could have escaped with Tyrion. He had to tell Jon Snow everything that happened, about the attack near Winterfell, the death of Bronn and Podrick, how he was carried by a dragon to the army of Daenerys, his resurrection, and their journey to Winterfell. He also told him that a part of the garrison of Moat Cailin died, but he limited his explanations to a battle between those who agreed to surrender and those who refused. He would explain everything in detail later, when they would be alone. For now, they had more important concerns.

Tyrion was worried more than anything about Sansa and Joanna. Their bodies hadn’t been found, to the opposite of that of many other people. Jon suspected they were taken as hostages by the lords of the Vale. Tyrion felt his blood boiling inside of him. If they dared anything against them, he would make the Rains of Castamere or the Red Wedding look like mercy. Whoever kidnapped his family would pay the price.

“There was nothing when we arrived. Nothing at all.” The voice behind him tried to be reassuring. “I’m sure they are well. The wife and the daughter of the Lord of Casterly Rock are too valuable hostages to be killed.”
“It didn’t stop Joffrey from killing Eddard Stark, or to beat Sansa in public. It didn’t stop Lord Karstark from killing Martyn and Willem against Robb Stark’s will. And that didn’t stop the Sand Snakes from murdering Myrcella,” Tyrion replied. He turned to look at Ser Davos Seaworth, who was at a loss of words.

“I… They must be alive.”

“If they are, then I hope that whoever did this treat them well. For his own sake.” And for the sake of Sansa and Joanna. Sansa was kidnapped because she is my wife, and Joanna was taken away because she is my daughter. I swore to protect them, to protect them both, and I failed.

“We better go, my lord. The… queen will want to speak with all us.”

“Yes, true.” Let’s hope she doesn’t burn me alive for riding one of her children and convincing the other to follow.

Tyrion and Ser Davos went to a large room that was used for what could be a small council for the Lord of Winterfell or the King in the North. Bran and Arya Stark, along with Meera Reed and Jon Snow were already present. They had to wait some time before Daenerys Targaryen arrived with two advisors, the Red Priest Revan and Malcolm Branfield. This was meant as a private reunion, and anything said here wouldn’t be public. The queen didn’t deign invite men to represent the different kingdoms of Westeros. The discussion they were about to have wasn’t for them to hear.

“Shall we begin?” she asked to no one in particular. She considered their silence meant they approved. “First, Jon Snow, I want you to know that Lord Tyrion told me about your intentions once this war would be over. He says you sent a raven explaining them, but we never received it. So far, you showed that you were true to your word, and I hope I’ll have no reason to doubt it in the future.”

“You won’t have to. However, I also asked as a condition to my surrender that you let my brothers and sisters live,” Jon Snow said.

“You don’t have to worry about that. If House Stark accepts me as their queen, I will allow them to remain the Wardens of the North and Lords of Winterfell. Your siblings don’t have anything to fear as long they bend the knee too.”

She looked at Arya and Bran. “We will,” Bran said. Arya hesitated, but after an encouraging look from Jon, she agreed with a simple aye.

“Good, so.” She turned her head towards Bran. “Since Jon Snow will join the Night’s Watch again, I suppose you are the Lord of Winterfell now.”

“No, I’m not. I cannot rule the North,” Bran said.

The queen frowned. “Why not? What’s wrong with you?”

“I am the Three-Eyed Raven.” Daenerys didn’t seem convinced. “It’s complicated.”

“It is,” the masked man said. “Let’s just say, your Grace, that Brandon Stark would be unfit to rule in his current state.”

“It’s not about the fact I cannot walk,” Bran said. “It’s just that… I have other things to do.”

“And what are these things?” Daenerys asked, still looking skeptical.

“It seems a lot of things are complicated.”

Tyrion intervened. “I think that if Brandon Stark doesn’t want to be Lord of Winterfell, then we shouldn’t force him.”

“Very well, though I don’t understand why you refuse.”

Jon Snow spoke. “By all the laws of the Seven Kingdoms, Sansa comes after Bran if he is not Lord of Winterfell. However, she disappeared.” He looked at Tyrion, showing sympathy.

“She was probably kidnapped by some rogue men from the Vale. They must have brought her somewhere they can hide her,” Ser Davos said.

“Then we’ll find her, and her daughter as well.” She shot a look at Tyrion, meaning she would honor her promise, or so he thought. “There is something else I do not understand, though.” She looked at Jon. “Why are you going back to the Wall? You were given a chance for a new life, outside the Night’s Watch, and yet you’re ready to bind yourself to the same oath for the second time. Why?”

“I don’t want any fight between us,” Jon replied. “The dead are ravaging our lands, turning our people into monsters. The War of the Five Kings devastated all the country, and winter has come. It is no more time for fighting between us. If the price to defeating the White Walkers is to chain myself to the Wall again, then so be it, I do it gladly.”

“So you’re giving up everything? Any claim you might have on the Iron Throne, or the North or any other kingdom, and the possibility to marry and have children? Please forgive me, Jon Snow. Lord Tyrion told me the Starks are always true to their word, but I find it hard to believe that you would be ready to sacrifice everything, especially when you could have so much. I found out that most people only give up on the possibility to have these things when it is clear they will never have them, and even then, sometimes they don’t. Why should I believe you?”

Tyrion saw that Jon was getting unnerved. “Look, I didn’t ask to be king. The lords chose me. I was the bastard of Winterfell for more than fifteen years. I don’t claim that I never envied my brothers and sisters, but I accepted the fact that I wouldn’t have much. I joined the Night’s Watch of my own free will, and I chose to remain in it when I had the opportunity to leave. I did things my heart and my mind opposed to respect the vows I swore. When my brother marched on the south, I wanted to join him. I was brought back to Castle Black by my sworn brothers, and I had a good discussion with the Lord Commander the next morning. He asked me if my brother’s war was more important than our war, the war against the dead. He asked me if it mattered who sat on the damn Iron Throne when the Night King and his army came for us. He asked me if I was a brother of the Night’s Watch, or a bastard who wanted to play at war. I don’t care about the Iron Throne. I dedicated my life to the fight against the dead, so as long as you allow the people I love to live, then I have nothing against you being the queen. Unless you’re like your father.”

The tension was so thick that you could have cut through it with a knife. Jon Snow and Daenerys Targaryen were staring at each other with intensity. “My father was an evil man. I know what he did to the Starks, and it was criminal.” She looked around to Bran and Arya. “On behalf of House Targaryen, I ask your forgiveness for the crimes he committed against your family. I ask you to not judge me on my father’s actions. I’m not like him.” She looked again at Jon. “Since you bent the knee, I’m willing to trust you if you trust me. You can ask every lord south and north of the Neck that I met. Those who resist me are treated like rebels, but those who bend the knee keep their lands. I did so with the people in the Reach who abandoned my family when the war was over, and with those of the kingdoms who rebelled against my father. I know you raised the sword with good reasons against him, and I don’t blame you for that. The only thing I blame the rebels for are their subsequent actions. They swore an oath to House Targaryen. My father may have burned people alive, but Rhaegar, Aegon, Rhaenys, Viserys and I never did such a thing. Our only crimes were to be Targaryens. After dethroning my father, the rebels should have allowed my house to remain in power. Instead, they installed an usurper on my family’s throne. I was forced to flee and to hide for most of my life. Assassins were sent after me, and if it wasn’t for a disgraced knight who was condemned by one of the leaders of this rebellion, I would have died of poison many years ago. But I don’t hold children responsible for their father’s crimes. I expect the same from you all.”

There was a silence that seemed to show that everyone agreed. Jon Snow broke it. “I don’t intend to judge you on your father’s crimes, but this is not the time for all this. We need to unite our forces. The Night King is gone, but there are still many wights out there, and certainly other White Walkers. They still occupy half of the North and we need to destroy them.”

“There is one more matter I want to discuss. There are some who say that you are my nephew, Jon Snow.”

Jon Snow looked down before he gazed at her again. “It seems I am.”

Daenerys nodded. “I heard there was a man, a certain Howland Reed, who was there when you were born. I’d like to talk with him.”

Jon Snow seemed very hesitant all of a sudden. “Lord Reed is dead, fighting against the dead.”

Fuck. That wasn’t good, and the queen’s next words proved it. “That’s a shame. The only man who could prove that you are indeed a Targaryen is dead.”

Tyrion decided to intervene. “Howland Reed testified before half the Seven Kingdoms that Jon Snow was born from Lyanna Stark and your brother Rhaegar at the Tower of Joy, at the end of Robert’s rebellion.”

“Yet I would have liked to hear it from his own mouth.” She looked straight to Jon Snow. “I want to believe that you are my nephew. The only family member I ever knew was my brother Viserys, and he died the day he threatened to open my belly and cut my baby out of it with his sword. From this day, he wasn’t my brother anymore. I would be glad to know that another Targaryen survived, but I will not believe a stranger I never met when he says that he is my brother’s son. Not without proof. Especially when the stranger in question doesn’t look at all like a Targaryen.”

Jon Snow’s face took a softer expression. “I have no proof to give you, but I am no threat to you. My uncle found my mother dying when she gave birth to me, and he promised her to keep me safe. You said it yourself. Robert Baratheon was hunting the surviving Targaryens. He killed your nephew and your niece when they were still in the cradle. And you told us how you lived during your exile, always running from one place to another. That’s why my uncle protected me, why he lied to everyone and told them I was his son. Even his own wife didn’t know about it. So I have no proof, but I think you understand why Lord Stark took that decision.”

The queen’s gaze was no longer hard, but Tyrion doubted she would accept the explanation like that.

“I have proof.”

Everyone turned to Bran Stark. “You do?” she asked.

“Aye. I can prove that Jon is the son of your brother Rhaegar.”

“Very well. Tell me how.”

Bran extended his hand. “Take my hand. I can show you.”
“Bran, it’s too dangerous,” Meera Reed said.

“Don’t worry, Meera. I’m in full control again. I think my recent difficulties were caused by the Night King, but now he’s gone. It’s without danger.”

“You were almost stuck in your visions during the whole battle,” the crannogwoman argued.

“And I got out of there when Jon destroyed the Night King.” The Stark turned back his attention to Daenerys. “I can show you.”

Daenerys questioned Tyrion, Jon and Revan with her eyes. Tyrion made her a sign telling she could trust him. He didn’t fully understand the boy’s powers, and he didn’t think he would ever understand them, but they were real. Jon Snow nodded.

“You can trust him, your Grace,” the Red Priest said.

The Targaryen queen slowly walked towards Bran and took his hand into her own. She raised her head, and for some time it was as if she was looking at something on the wall, though there was nothing to see there. It lasted some time, maybe a minute, and then Bran released her hand and she came back to reality. Slowly, she turned on herself and looked at Jon Snow.

“Your real name is Aegon Targaryen,” she said.

“His name is Jon,” Arya opposed.

“It’s the name Father gave him,” Bran explained. “He couldn’t call him by his true name. Everyone would have known the truth.” He looked at Jon. “I showed her your birth.”

“Your mother gave you that name before she died,” Daenerys said. She took a few steps in Jon’s direction and looked straight into his eyes. “So you’re really my nephew.”

“I suppose so,” he said.

She remained still, looking at his face for a long time. Then she straightened and put back a more official face. “I’m sorry to have doubted you. I apologize.” She turned towards a map laying on the table. “You told me the wights still occupy half of the North. Where are they?”

Tyrion noticed that her hand was shaking. That was great news for her, but she didn’t want to show it. “All the lands north of Winterfell. And we received a raven from the Dreadfort two days ago. They are under attack as well. We didn’t have any news from them since,” Jon said.

“The Dreadfort mustn’t fall.” It was the Red Priest who spoke with a strong voice. “Its fall could be as catastrophic as the fall of Winterfell. We must send them reinforcements right away.”

“I know the Dreadfort is a powerful and important fortress,” Tyrion began, “but Ser Brynden Tully is leading the defenses there with a strong garrison, and seeing how many White Walkers were here when Winterfell was attacked and now that the Night King was destroyed, I think they should be able to hold their positions.”

“Do not underestimate the White Walkers. They lost their leader, the first White Walker, but they’re not gone. The disappearance of the Night King only neutralized the wights who were inside the walls of Winterfell when it happened. There are still tens of thousand out there, led by the remaining Others. They will fight to the end. They’ve waited this moment for eight thousand years, and they’re not going to let it slip away.” He turned to Daenerys. “Queen Daenerys, with your permission, I would ride to the Dreadfort immediately with the Fiery Hand. We cannot let the fortress fall.”
Tyrion found him a little too much enthusiastic or set on defending the Dreadfort. What was there in this castle that was so important for this priest? He had the same reaction when he heard that Winterfell was in danger.

“I will give you five thousand men to save the Dreadfort,” Daenerys told him, “and I will join you as soon as Drogon is rested. I suggest we take the day to rest and heal our men, then the army will ride north to free the territories that are under the control of the White Walkers. Jon Snow, I expect you and your men to join us and to help us in this fight.”

“We will have to divide our forces, your Grace,” Jon Snow said. “There are several castles to be freed, and we lost contact with others, like Bear Island. We have to clean the territory up to the Wall. There might be some men still alive there. The North is wide. It won’t be easy.”

“We’ll find a way. I will not abandon my people. I suggest we go back to prepare our respective men for the march tomorrow. Lord Tyrion, I would like to speak with you at the end of the day. Join me after dinner. We’ll have important matters to discuss.”

The queen left, and so did Branfield and Revan. Malcolm was silent for the whole reunion. He didn’t seem to have a lot to say. Tyrion heard the queen asking him questions about his niece.

“She trusts you?” Jon asked him once she was gone.

“I wouldn’t say trust, not yet. You cannot erase decades of enmity with one battle,” Tyrion said.

“She seems to trust you enough to let you ride one of her dragons,” Arya said.

“The truth is she didn’t allow me to. I did so without her permission. It may be why she wants to talk with me later.”

“How did you manage to ride one of her dragons?” Jon asked.

Tyrion shrugged. “I don’t know. The dragon just accepted me to climb on his back, it seems. He trusted me.”

“I thought only Targaryens could ride dragons,” Arya said. “Jon, maybe you could ride one of hers.”

“I would suggest not to ask her immediately. They are her children. Anyway, we don’t need to be Targaryens to ride a dragon. There were several dragon riders through history who were not Targaryens. All you need is dragonblood in your veins.”

“And you have some?” Jon asked, obviously unconvinced.

Tyrion shrugged again. “I suppose I have some ancestor I’m not aware of with dragonblood. Probably a Valyrian. Some came to Westeros. It only takes one, and that can be enough. Anyway, I don’t think she will allow me near one of her dragons again any time soon.”

Jon and Arya kept looking at him with quizzical looks. Tyrion was annoyed by this. He was intrigued by his ability to ride one of the queen’s dragons, but the important remained that he could do it in order to save Winterfell. If he didn’t, Daenerys may be dead, killed by that spear the Night King was pointing towards her. If Tyrion hadn’t rushed with Viserion on the Night King, spitting fire that melted his icy spear and ramming him aside, Daenerys Targaryen would probably be dead by now and Winterfell may have fallen. He would never forget the feeling he had when he rode the dragon. That was a childhood dream become true, but he wasn’t sure it would happen again. The next time he disobeyed a queen he might not have the chance to save her life.
“Let’s go. We have a lot of work to do,” Jon Snow said. His sister, or rather cousin, followed him. Tyrion was following suit when he was called form behind.

“Lord Tyrion, we need to talk. Meera, could you leave us alone a few minutes?”

The girl hesitated, then she acquiesced and left. This one was in love with Bran. He watched her leave. She might be a frog-eater, like so many people called crannogmen, but she wasn’t ugly, and Tyrion was sure that she was quite pretty by her people’s standards. He looked at Brandon Stark while the door closed.

“What is it, Bran?”

“I didn’t want to tell you while everyone was here. I think you deserve to know.”

“To know what?”

“The truth.”

“The truth about what?”

“About yourself.” Bran extended his hand, like he did for Daenerys.

“Thanks Bran, but… I’m not very fond of visions.”

“Have you ever seen your mother?”

“No.” That stung, especially now that Sansa and Joanna were gone and he had no way to know where they were, or even if they were alive. They had to be alive. “She died giving birth to me.” Yet his daughter was called after her.

“I can show her to you.”

Tyrion considered the hand that was offered to him. He had tried to not ask himself too many questions about his lady mother. She died the day he was born. She gave her life to bring him into the world, or he took her life to come into it the way his lord father put it, and sometimes Tyrion thought that Tywin Lannister wasn’t wrong.

“What are you going to show of her, exactly?” he said as he approached Bran.

“The reason why Lord Tywin hated you so much.”

Without warning, Bran seized his arm and Tyrion was brought into a storm that lasted one second, before he arrived on solid ground. The air was warmer here, and you could smell the sea nearby. There were large windows giving on the said sea. Tyrion immediately knew where he was. Casterly Rock. It seems like a lifetime since I’ve been here.

He heard someone screaming on his left and turned to see two women. One was lying on a bed, wearing nightclothes, and she was the one screaming. Her belly was swelling. Tyrion couldn’t see her face. She was hidden by another woman, stouter, with blond hair. He moved until she was no longer hidden by his aunt Genna. Tywin Lannister’s sister was younger, but already showed a generous fatness at all levels. It wasn’t her that Tyrion looked at. For the first time in his life, he saw the woman who gave him life. She had blond shining hair, and looked a lot like Cersei, though he could also see the differences. Her cheekbones were not as high as his sister. Cersei had some of their father’s traits on her face, while his mother displayed none. She had her hair free, loosened, falling on each side of her face, with some sticking on her forehead with sweat. When she was done screaming, she opened her eyes. They were green, and bright. Tyrion took in every detail he could see. He had heard that she was beautiful, like his sister, but now he could see it by himself, and to be honest, he found her more beautiful than Cersei, and by far.

She looked at Genna, panting. His aunt was holding one of her hand in hers. “It’s harder than with Jaime and Cersei.”

Those were the first words he ever heard his lady mother say. She had a fair and beautiful voice as well. It hurt him a little that these words were about him making his mother suffer, a suffering that would lead to her death eventually. Maybe he was seeing her last moments. Maybe she would die within a few days. Why was Bran showing him this? Why didn’t he show him a pleasant memory, one where she would be laughing, smiling, her face shining with happiness instead of sweat?

“I am in pain, Genna.”

“You’ll get through it, my dear. You got through it the first time. I see no reason for it to be any different,” his aunt said, trying to reassure her. It didn’t seem to work. His mother was right to be afraid. She was dying.

“Rhaella didn’t get through most of her pregnancies,” his mother replied.

“You are not Rhaella, and Tywin is not Aerys.” Tyrion thought he dreamed, for he swore that he saw her mother scoff.

“You have no idea of who Tywin is, or what he became.”

“I know it’s difficult, Joanna. I can barely imagine what you went through. But Tywin loves you. I know it and you know it too.”

“I’m no longer sure he loves me. I’m not even sure if he ever loved me.” That surprised him. He heard his father loved his wife and wasn’t the same man after she died.

“He would never wish for anything to happen to you, Joanna. You remember? He smiled the day you were wed, and he smiled the day Jaime and Cersei were born. I saw it, and you saw it too.”

“It happened a long time ago. You weren’t there Genna, that night. When I was called by the king, he did nothing. He said nothing, he didn’t stand up, or lifted a finger, or moved the slightest. He didn’t even dare to look at me. And he knew. Don’t try to justify him. HE KNEW!”

Her mother burst into uncontrollable sobs. “He used me,” she said, still crying. “He used me to get what he always wanted. All that in the hope that he could put our daughter into a prince’s bed and so he could boast that his grandchildren were kings and queens.”

“Joanna, calm down,” Genna begged her. “I don’t know what to say. I never thought Tywin would do that, but… He always cared for you.”

“Not as much as he cares for his ambitions or his dynasty.”

Tyrion watched the whole scene, petrified. His mother was there, sobbing, dying, and there was nothing he could do.

“You shouldn’t have taken Moon Tea,” Genna said all of a sudden. Tyrion’s eyes widened. His mother didn’t want to get pregnant. She wanted to stop it, to kill him.

“I didn’t know what to do. We know the truth, Genna, and Tywin knows it too, or he suspects.” His mother looked at Genna, tears running all over her face. “He’s going to kill him.” Genna said nothing, but from the face she made, Tyrion could tell that she agreed with his mother. “Genna, he’s my son. I don’t care who his father is. I don’t want him to die.” She gripped his aunt’s hand more tightly. “Tywin is going to kill him. Don’t let him do it.” His mother begged. “He’s my child.”

Genna had a face that showed utter destruction. “I’ll do my best. We’ll protect him, together.”

“Tywin must be sure that he is his son. I don’t care about the truth. He must live.”

“I know, and he will live. Tywin will never kill a Lannister.”

“I’m no longer sure of anything.”

“Joanna.” His aunt put a hand on her shoulder. “The child will live. I promise. And Aerys will pay for what he did. Sooner or later, he will pay. A Lannister always pays his debts.”

“Yes, a Lannister always pays his debts.” By the way she said it, he knew his mother didn’t believe it. “Make sure that Tywin pays his too. Make sure my child lives. He doesn’t deserve to pay for his father’s crimes. I’m already paying the price.”

They were back to Winterfell. Tyrion breathed heavily. His eyes crossed those of Bran. The boy had a sorry expression on his face. Tyrion’s heart was beating more quickly that it ever did.

That can’t be. That can’t be. That was all he could think of. He didn’t know what happened afterwards, but he remembered finding himself in the sept of Winterfell, kneeling before the Father’s altar. He didn’t know why he came here. He didn’t believe in gods and mocked them at every turn.

He lost all faith he could have the day Tysha left his life. He told her he dreamed of becoming High Septon, saying he would look taller with a crown. She had laughed. She didn’t laugh because she mocked him, or perhaps she did, but if it was the case, she convinced him of the opposite.

There’s just a problem, Tyrion. Septons cannot marry. And thus he had forgotten about becoming a septon, or even a maester, since they were forced to celibacy as well. Still, it hadn’t taken religion out of his life. He remembered Tysha insisted that they prayed every evening before they went to bed.

Tyrion had accepted, since she wanted it so much. He wanted her to be happy and would have done anything for her. They prayed, and Tyrion found himself believing into gods more than ever during those two weeks. They would pray, then make love. He stopped to pray after Tysha disappeared, but he kept fucking women, though he could never feel happy like he was with Tysha. Not before he met Sansa.

Various words and moments came back to his mind. Men’s laws give you the right to bear my name and display my colors since I cannot prove that you are not mine. That’s what his father told him after he asked for Casterly Rock, his right. I wanted to carry you into the sea and let the waves wash you away. Instead, I let you live. And I brought you up as my son. Because you’re a Lannister.

Because he was a Lannister, and not because he was his son. He said that he brought him up as his son, not that he was his son. There was only one time when his father told him he was his son, and it was after the disaster of the Whispering Wood. That was when he needed him. He never called him son afterwards.

How should he feel about it? Tywin Lannister never truly was a father to him. Now he supposed he knew why. No, he did know why. How should he feel, knowing about his true origins? The only comfort he took from this was that his mother loved him, despite how he was conceived, despite what he was. But she died, and he never got to know her. Would have things be different, had she lived? Would she be proud of him? Would she truly have loved him, considering what his father did to her?
It explained so many things. It explained why Viserion was so easy to approach, why he accepted him, why he felt a bond with the small dragon. Could it even have something to see with the way he managed to get along with Daenerys so easily?

“I thought you never prayed.”

He turned very quickly to see Arya Stark standing behind him. They were alone in the sept, which Tyrion considered strange with the way Winterfell was packed. It wasn’t normal. He and Arya Stark shouldn’t be all alone here.

“Sansa told me you never prayed,” she continued, as an explanation.

Tyrion turned back his gaze to the Father. “I wonder how she could fall in love with a man who doesn’t believe in gods,” he said. That was all that could come to his mind right now.

“I asked myself the same question many times. Not how she could love someone who didn’t believe in gods. I’m quite sure Joffrey couldn’t, but… I wondered again and again how she fell in love with you.”

“I don’t know.”

Indeed, how could Sansa fall in love with him? And how did he fall in love with her? They were so different, when he thought about that, and he failed to protect her. How could she love someone like him? How could anyone love someone like him? Had Cersei and Jaime known all this time? Was Jaime aware of this and loved him like a brother all the same? Tyrion doubted it. He doubted Jaime would ever have loved him if he knew the truth.

“Well, look. I… I wanted to give you this.” Tyrion didn’t turn the head. However, she placed something in front of him, on the floor. It was a small necklace. He recognized it after a moment. He gave it to Sansa a long time ago. The lion necklace, with a wolf hidden beneath it.

“I found it near her chambers,” her sister explained. “I thought you should have it.”

He took it in his hand and stared at the necklace he made for the woman he loved. The woman he lost.

“Look, I haven’t always been nice with you, but… I believe you care about Sansa, and I know she loves you. So, you can always count on me to save her. We’ll find her. And I’ll make sure whoever kidnapped her will pay. The North remembers.”

Tyrion kept staring at the necklace. When he looked behind, his sister-in-law was gone. He looked again at the necklace and closed his hand on it. He would find Sansa and Joanna. They were all he had left.

When Tyrion left the sept, he realized it was already late. When he went into the Great Hall, he saw that the dinner had already been served. He remembered that Daenerys Targaryen asked to talk with him. My half-sister.

Tyrion slowly walked to her room. On his way, he wondered what he should do. Should he tell her? He saw how she doubted about Jon Snow, and he didn’t think that she would react positively if he pretended to be of her family as well, without anything to prove it. However, he also remembered how often she asked him questions about her nephew, even while she wasn’t sure he really was of her family. But she had time to muse about Jon Snow’s supposed parenthood for months, while he… Well, she knew nothing of him. She didn’t have time to consider this possibility.
He hit at her door and she allowed him inside. She invited him to take a seat before her, and he did. While he poured wine for both of them, he caught himself thinking about the fact that he was pouring wine for his sister. He drank with Cersei before, though their conversations were never pleasant. When he thought about it, he enjoyed his time with Daenerys much more.

“You weren’t there for dinner,” she said.

“I was busy, and not really hungry,” he lied.

None of them said anything for a while.

“When you met Jon Snow, you said you suspected he was Rhaegar’s son. Did you really believe it?” she asked.

“It was more of a mad theory I made.” And yet, it was true.

“But you said you knew the truth the moment you asked him about his dreams of dragons.”

“Well, someone can dream of dragons without being a Targaryen. That doesn’t mean you are one of them.” Not that he could tell. He made dreams of dragons, was fascinated by fire, going so far as to staring into fires for hours, imagining his sister and his father, or the man he thought to be his father, burning into them.

“I dreamed of dragons very often when I was young. And now I have three, and they are real. I thought the dragons were all gone, but after Drogo died, I relied upon a dream to hatch the stone eggs Illyrio Mopatis gave me. It was only a dream, and yet it came true.”

“There is magic in dragonblood. The children of Valyria all have dragonblood in their veins, and you probably have more than anyone else alive. Perhaps it gives you a power to see the future, or perhaps it’s telling you what you must do. I don’t know. There is much about dragonlore we ignore. We barely scratched the surface.”

“How is it you can ride Viserion?” She looked at him intently.

“I don’t know.”

“He went as far as to bring your dead body to me. He never saw you before. He allowed you to approach him without showing any sign of hostility, and he even allowed you to climb on his back.”

She was waiting for an answer. Tyrion had no choice. “Your Grace, the maesters, the septons, and all the other people who studied dragons agree on nothing but this: dragons are magical creatures. They are intelligent. Some say they are even more intelligent than men, but in a different way. They don’t think like us, with logics and rational thoughts. But they can feel a danger, or if someone is to be trusted or to be considered as an enemy. I meant no harm to your dragon. I was only curious, and he must have felt it. That’s why he allowed me to approach him. He knew I was no threat. And maybe he allowed me to ride him to Winterfell because he felt you would be in danger.”

Tyrion knew it couldn’t be a full explanation. Why would Viserion need a rider to save his mother? And why would he bring his body to Daenerys Targaryen?

“Still, I find it strange that he chose you, considering you have no dragonblood. Unless you have some.”

“There has never been any marriage between a Lannister and a Targaryen. My lord father tried to marry my sister Cersei to your brother Rhaegar, but your father chose Elia Martell instead. Maybe there is a Valyrian somewhere among my ancestors. Some have come to Westeros.”

Tyrion knew very well that if he had a Valyrian ancestor, which was very unlikely, he must have lived a thousand years ago. When he was a child and mad for dragons, he searched for any evidence of ties between his family and the old civilization of Valyria. Anything that concerned dragons was an obsession for him back then. He found nothing. However, he didn’t tell the queen.

“I gave you the order to not approach my dragons,” she suddenly said. “And you disobeyed me.”

“Yes. I’m sorry about…”

“You did the right thing.” Tyrion was caught off guard. “If you hadn’t come with Viserion and Rhaegal, I would probably be dead. For that, you have my eternal gratitude. I will not forget this.”

Tyrion was truly surprised, not to mention that her expression of thankfulness truly seemed genuine. Cersei never looked at him like that. All she ever showed him was scorn, disdain and hatred. “Well, I only tried to do the right thing.” That sounded strange coming from him.

“You served me well, Lord Tyrion. Since you came to me, you helped me to take Moat Cailin and convinced several lords of the North to bend the knee. You did everything I asked from you and played a decisive role in the Battle of Winterfell. You even ordered the Westerlands to surrender without resistance.”

“I knew we had no chance against you, especially with the threat in the North.”

“That shows you are clever and wise. You accepted to sacrifice your homeland to save all Westeros, and you spared the lives of countless innocents.” It was strange for him, after being questioned and accused by Jon Snow at every turn for killing thousands of people. “You were also among the few to consider the White Walkers to be a serious threat, when most of my advisors were sure they were only stories for children. Do you know Lord Varys?”

“The Spider? Yes, I know him. Or at least, I think I know him. It is difficult to know such a man. He is very good at keeping secrets.”

“He speaks highly of you.” A very small man can cast a very large shadow.

“Should I feel flattered, when it comes from an eunuch?”

She laid down her cup. “Lord Tyrion Lannister, I want you to be Hand of the Queen.”

Tyrion almost choked on his wine. “Forgive me?”

“You heard me. I want you to be my Hand. I need someone capable and loyal for the task, and for now, I haven’t seen anyone better than you for the position.”

Tyrion would lie if he didn’t feel flattered, but truth be told, he wasn’t sure if he should feel like that about it. “I’m not sure if your allies would like it, your Grace.”

“For now, I am betrothed to a Dornish prince, and I have another Dornish and two lords from the Reach on my small council. Lord Varys and Lady Kinvara are completing it. But I also need someone the other kingdoms will accept and respect as my Hand. You already served as Hand before. You arranged the betrothal between your niece Myrcella and Prince Doran’s son and made an alliance with the Martells. They were very pleased when you sent them the head of the assassin who killed the Princess Elia. You managed to create an alliance between four kingdoms. And I heard the Tyrells even proposed a marriage between you and their daughter.”
Yes, Tyrion remembered. That was when Olenna Tyrell tried to sabotage his marriage with Sansa. And the worst was that Tyrion contemplated the idea for a short moment.

“I’m not sure, your Grace.”

“Do you have a better suggestion in mind?” she asked. Tyrion quickly realized he had none, and it seemed the queen understood it very quickly. “So?”

“I suppose I cannot refuse.”

“It would be in your interest to accept.” For a short time, Tyrion thought she was teasing him, but he chased the idea from his head.

“Very well. I accept.”

“Good. I have a first mission for you as my Hand. I need you to take the Vale of Arryn.”

“The Vale of Arryn?”

“This is the last kingdom that didn’t bend the knee. I sent my Unsullied in the Vale with a few more men. They are only ten thousand. I had no news from them for a while now, but they are likely struggling to take this kingdom. I cannot send them the necessary reinforcements since I need all my resources in the North to fight the White Walkers. I want you to go there and force Harrold Arryn and every other lord to surrender and swear fealty to me.”

“Well, if your Unsullied cannot take the Vale by themselves, I don’t think I will be able to change much to that. I’m pretty good at talking, but I don’t think I can convince the lords of the Vale to surrender so easily. And most of their strongholds are almost impossible to take. I’m afraid a single dwarf won’t make any difference.”

“You will, with Viserion.” Tyrion wasn’t sure of what he just heard. She probably noticed it for she explained further. “You will fly to the Vale with Viserion. Find Grey Worm. He is the commander of the Unsullied. Give him this. He will know he has to obey you.” She handled him a parchment. “Make sure the Vale surrenders by every mean necessary. In the meantime, I will deal with the White Walkers.”

That was certainly not something Tyrion expected. Daenerys Targaryen couldn’t give a task like this one to someone she didn’t trust. Unless it was a test. Tyrion could have believed in the second possibility if she didn’t grant him one of her dragons for this mission. That was definitely not something he expected.

“Very well. I will leave for the Vale tomorrow,” he said.

“One more thing. We believe that Sansa Stark is in the Vale.” That truly caught Tyrion’s attention. “My advisors and Jon Snow’s advisors don’t believe she could be hidden in the North. If she is alive, this is where she is, and your daughter as well. You’ll be able to find them.” Sansa. Joanna. He had a chance to find them. “And if you find those who kidnapped them, you have the authorization to deal with them. I only ask that you grant them a trial if it’s possible.”

She raised her glass of wine. After a moment, Tyrion raised it as well, and they drank together. As they did so, he thought that Daenerys Targaryen undoubtedly was a better sister than Cersei.
So, this chapter reveals a secret that wasn't really a secret anymore. Most of you certainly figured it out some chapters ago, or highly suspected it. Here is the official confirmation: in this fanfiction, yes, Tyrion is a Targaryen. In fact, if you go back a very long time ago, two years ago when I uploaded the three Tywin chapters at the beginning of this story, Tywin thought that he could see two people in Tyrion. The two people in question were Joanna and Aerys, although he refused to admit it.

I tried to bring Tyrion and Arya closer in this chapter, using Sansa's disappearance and their mutual desire for revenge against those who did it as a way for them to connect. As for Daenerys, I think we all saw in the show that she and Tyrion quickly bonded despite their different origins that should have made them enemies in normal time. Tyrion very quickly developed a better relationship with Daenerys than with most of the Lannisters.

MIRA XIII

She woke up with a start, her heart pounding in her chest. She needed some time to quiet down and breathe normally. She didn’t remember the nightmare she made, but it was horrible for sure.

She closed her eyes for the time she needed to calm down. When she opened them, she saw that she was in her chamber in Winterfell. It was a simple room and considering how many people had to live inside the castle, it was a miracle she was given a room for her and her alone. Well, not her alone. For three days now, she shared it with someone.

She wasn’t lying down in her bed. They told her to rest, but she struggled to sleep, so she spent her nights sitting in the chair near the fireplace, reading until slumber claimed her. That was what happened the last evening. The book she read was lying on the floor at her feet. She was buried into furs to protect her from the cold.

It had been hard and long. Two days. Two insufferable days. They could be prepared. Their mothers and the maesters could describe the best they could what was ahead of them, but words were never good enough to explain the ordeal they would face. At least she had her family with her. Since her mother sent her south, Mira didn’t think she would have any member of her family with her when the day would come. The distance between Ironrath and any castle in the Reach was far too great for even her lady mother to travel all the way, despite the special event it would be. She pictured her husband and his family being there, not the other way around. Preparing herself, she threw aside one of the furs covering her and stood up. Immediately, she felt the cold seizing her. She rubbed her arms to warm herself as she looked down at the crib.

Rodrik hadn’t been easy to bring into the world. For this reason, she first thought to call him Asher, but Rodrik was the eldest, the man who was supposed to follow Father as Lord of Ironrath. It only seemed fair that she called her son after her eldest late brother. She knew Asher would understand, just like Ethan would, and her father. The four deserved to have a boy named after them. But she only had one son, and she didn’t expect to have others.

That should have been a day of joy, but she gave birth to Rodrik while battle raged around Winterfell. Talia said it was a glimmer of hope in these tumultuous times. To be honest, Mira was too exhausted to feel anything. She was alone to raise a child, and it took away most of the joy she should have felt. She pitied the small boy who slept right in front of her, ignoring that he would grow without a father. He would never know him.

Rodrik was born three days ago, and two days after his birth, the White Walkers sent a huge assault against Winterfell. Mira remained in the Great Keep, confined in her chambers with her son and Talia. Ryon was too impatient to stay quiet here, so he had been pacing during all the battle in the Great Hall. That’s what happened when a boy was eager to fight and you forbade him to participate to the battle.
Mira didn’t see the battle, but she heard it. She heard the huge rocks falling upon Winterfell, smashing against its walls, the iron of the gates shattering, the roars of giants and dragons. She heard the walls on the northern side crumbling under the magic of the Night King. And then, everything was quiet. Talia had gone out. When she came back, she wasn’t alone. Mira saw him for the first time in years. Her uncle Malcolm had hugged her warmly. He was exactly like she reminded him. He couldn’t say the same about her.

“Look at you. You’ve grown up so much. You were still a little girl the last time I saw you, and now, you’re a woman.”

Asher told her that their uncle was serving Daenerys Targaryen, but it was still very unexpected to see him there. Mira had cried while she was in his arms. Later, he took Rodrik into his arms, saying her was holding the next generations of Branfields and Forresters in his arms with a large smile. He only regretted that his sister couldn’t be here to see it. Mira regretted it too.

The joy she felt at seeing her uncle alive and learning they defeated the White Walkers was cooled down by the following news. Her husband was there.

It was Talia who told her that he was present, riding in the queen’s army. Part of her wanted to run to him and jump into his arms, another part wanted to run at him as well, but to slap him across the face, and another part just didn’t want to see him.

Talia said they wouldn’t allow him to approach, and Mira didn’t argue against it. If they asked her whether she wanted to see him or not, she didn’t know what her answer would have been. She supposed that Gerold wouldn’t want to see her anyway. Wasn’t it what he said the last time they met? I don’t want to see you again. It saddened and infuriated her at the same time.

Looking at her baby, a small smile crept to her face. She had him, if she didn’t have her husband. She didn’t want to disturb him so she began to walk around the room, being careful to not make any noise. She was weak since she came out of labor, so she couldn’t move too much. A single turn around her chamber and she fell back into her chair. She took back the book she let on the floor last night and tried to resume her reading where she stopped it. It was A History of House Stark by Maester Binns. It was the right book to read if you wanted to sleep. The writing style was monotonous, and the same sentences were often to be found again and again. It was difficult to read. The maester used ten words whenever he could say the same with one. Still, there were many details as well. She had reached the moment when Torrhen Stark bent the knee to Aegon Targaryen. How fitting it was, considering Jon Snow bent the knee before another Targaryen only yesterday.

Someone knocked. Mira put aside her book and slowly walked to the door. She opened it carefully, to not wake up Rodrik. Her uncle was on the other side. She let him in.

“I wanted to see how you fared,” he whispered.

“I’m fine, thank you.” She closed the door.

“How do you feel?”

“Tired. Exhausted.” Only standing right there made her short of breath.

“Come.” He gently grabbed her by the shoulder and led her to her bed where he sat next to her. “I recall when your mother gave birth to Ethan and Talia. It was her third pregnancy, but delivering twins is much harder than bringing up a single child. She stayed in bed for an entire week afterwards. You fare better than her.”
She nodded. “Anyway, that’s not as if I could do much. So, how are things with our new queen?”

“Quite well. She seems to trust Jon Snow, and now that she knows that he is truly her nephew, I think it will be easier between them. I just regret that Tyrion Lannister is leaving.”

“Where is he going?”

“To the Vale, with one of the queen’s dragons. We believe that the Lady Sansa and her child may be there, and Harrold Arryn still resists the Unsullied.”

“I hope they find them.” Sansa was her friend, and now that Mira had a son, she understood better than ever what it could be to lose your own flesh and blood. Lord Tyrion also helped her in King’s Landing. The North remembers, and she would never forget what he and his lady wife did for her.

“And you, what are you going to do?”

“We’re leaving very soon. Two hours, three at most.”

“So you’re leaving you too.”

“Yes. I’m sorry I couldn’t stay longer, my dear niece.” He placed a comforting hand on her shoulder.

“But before we leave, there’s someone who would like to speak with you. A certain brother-in-law of yours. Garlan Hightower.”

She didn’t know he was here. “He wants to talk with me?”

“Yes. We don’t have much time, so if you want to speak with him, it would be best if it was now.”

She thought about it for a few seconds. Garlan had always been kind with her, almost another brother when she was at the Hightower, as much as Elys was another sister. She nodded.

“Good. I’ll fetch him. Take care of you while I’m away, Mira.”

He kissed her on the forehead and walked away. Mira prayed that he wouldn’t die like all the others. Barely had he crossed the threshold that her brother-in-law walked in, already prepared for war, wearing full armor.

“Lady Mira.” He bowed before her.

“Ser Garlan.” She forced herself to smile. Gerold’s brother was always gentle, and he wasn’t the one who wrote to obey her husband to leave Ironrath at the worst possible moment. She didn’t want to hate him, no more than she wanted to hate Gerold.

“I heard you were here. To be honest, I was hoping you would come and see us, but since you didn’t, I decided to come to you myself,” she explained.

“Maester Aaron told me to remain inside.” That was no lie. The maester of Deepwood Motte, who escaped with the Glovers when the White Walkers closed on their castle, told her to not exhaust herself after her days of labor. She needed time to rest.

“Yes, I understand, and I wouldn’t blame you even if you were not pregnant.” She nodded to acknowledge what he said. He looked towards the crib. “Is it a boy?”

“Yes. Do you want to see him?”

“If it doesn’t bother you.”
She shook her head. It didn’t bother her, not really. She placed a finger on her lips to remind him they were not to make any noise. Her brother-in-law approached the crib and looked at his nephew. A smile appeared on his face.

“Did the delivery go well?” he asked.

“Well enough. It was difficult. I’ll have to rest for a while, but he is alright.”

“What’s his name?”

“Rodrik.”

“Like your brother.” He nodded. “He would like it.” He walked away from the crib and sat in a chair. Mira imitated him by sitting on her bed. “I wouldn’t blame you if you hated me, my lady.”

“I don’t.”

“You must resent me, at the very least.”

“Not you. House Hightower, Lord Hightower, yes.” And Gerold, too. How can I not resent him?

“But not you.”

“My lord grandfather made a mistake when he called Gerold back. And my brother was wrong to leave Ironrath. Only two hundred men survived our expedition in the North. Many more would still be alive if he stayed with you. The only excuses I can find to him is that it’s difficult to disobey your lord and grandfather. And I know he would never have abandoned you if he knew you were pregnant.”

A silence followed. None of them dared to speak. Had Mira told her husband about her condition the moment he arrived, would things have been different?

“Did you know, back then?” he asked her.

“Aye.”

“You should have told him.” There was hint of reproach in his voice, but he sounded sorry as well. Nonetheless, he may be right. If only she told him right away.

“I tried,” she replied weakly.

No sound came out of his mouth, until he released a long sigh and pulled his hand in his hair. “Damn it. Forgive me.”

“What’s going to happen now?”

“We’re leaving soon. We are riding north, to cleanse the land from these things. I never thought I would fight dead men.” He stood up and sighed again before he spoke to her. “Gerold will follow me on the way north, so you won’t see him for a while.”

She nodded. She didn’t know how she felt about it, or how she should feel.

“Look, Mira. I know it’s not easy. When Gerold joined us, he was… different. I never saw him like this before. Believe me, he had been miserable before, but this time… He was worse than ever. I think there’s something that broke him up there, in the North, and it’s not the argument you had.”

She knew immediately what it was. “He killed someone. For me.”
He nodded. He understood. “I know one thing. He still loves you. And I never saw someone blaming himself so much for what he did. When we come back, you’ll have to sort this out between you two. Once this war is over.”

He told her to take care of herself and was about to leave, but Mira had a question to ask him. “Garlan, do you think I used your family?”

He had a sad expression when he answered, and he took some time to give a reply. “I think that in most marriages, we use the other and his family for our own ends.” That was quite true. Marriages were always made in the interest of the family. “Did you know that someone in your family was still alive?”

“No.”

“Well, you used us to get your home back, and we used you to get your home for ourselves. My family is not really in any position to judge yours. If I had been in your place, I don’t think I would have acted any better.”

He left Mira with these words. Should they make her feel better? Marriages were made to cement alliances, and these alliances were never made out of kindness. Once they were made, honor demanded that they respected the alliance and that they came to the help of their allies and families, but without marriage, they would never help each other. The Glovers would never help the Forresters if they weren’t their bannermen, and neither would the Forresters assist the Glovers or the Starks if they were not sworn to them. And yet, what made a Glover, a Stark or a Forrester so different from a Tyrell or a Lannister? Long before they had any reason to hate each other, never would a Forrester have risked his life for a Lannister or a Hightower. If the Mad King had murdered the Lord of Highgarden, would the North have taken up arms against Aerys Targaryen? Rickard Stark would probably have fought for his king, even though what he would have done was criminal. They may maintain alliances that already existed without considering their personal interests, but when it came to forge alliances, Northerners were not more honorable than any southern family. Robb Stark made an alliance with House Frey, despite them being one of the most despicable families in Westeros. He wanted to make an alliance with Renly Baratheon, even though he wasn’t the rightful king. Northerners were better to honor alliances, but to make them, they were no better than anyone else. Didn’t Mira herself marry into House Hightower to escape a marriage with a Whitehill? She acted for her own interest and didn’t think a single moment about the man she would marry. Garlan had the truth of it.

Someone knocked on the door, and she heard a voice she both dreaded and wanted to hear. “Mira.” A moment went on. “Mira.”

She had to answer. “You may come in,” she said, her voice hoarse. She wasn’t sure he heard her. “You may come in,” she repeated louder.

Another moment went on during which nothing happened, and then the handle of he door turned. It turned very slowly, until it couldn’t be turned further. She thought the door would never open. She was wrong. It was ajar. He didn’t open it further. From where she was, she couldn’t see through the crack that was open.

“Mira, I…” His voice was shaking. She heard a gulp, and a sound that looked like a sniff. “I… I wanted to… I needed… I…”

He struggled to speak, while she didn’t know what to say. What was she supposed to say, after everything that happened between them?
“I’m sorry. I’m so sorry,” he said, his voice still trembling. “If… Please forgive me. I had to tell you this. I don’t know if we’ll see each other again. I just want you to know… I love you. I have always loved you, from the moment I saw you. You’re the best thing that happened in my life. I love you.”

She listened to everything he said. Her eyes stung. She heard him releasing the handle, then footsteps on the floor. He walked away, and as the sound of his boots faded, she closed her eyes and let tears fall from her eyes. There was a voice in her that told her to go to him, but another said she shouldn’t, that it wouldn’t make anything better. The tears kept running down her cheeks, and she wondered if she would ever see him again.

Margaery X

Chapter Notes

While the North fights White Walkers, King's Landing must deal with a completely different sort of problems, and Margaery is a witness.

MARGAERY X

“There have been thirteen casualties today, my lady, and that was only on our side, without accounting for those who were injured. The city has been turned into a battlefield. Men are fighting for every street. Houses have been turned into fortresses where men can regroup to hold a defense position or send a counter-attack, or they are being used as command posts. Alleys and dark corners are hidings for traps and ambushes. My little birds are telling me that for every soldier who dies, two civilians perish. The Dornish and your countrymen use them as shields or enlist them as soldiers, and they are being used as arrow fodder. Many are only children, children you used to visit in their orphanages not long ago.”

Not long ago? Whatever Lord Varys might say, for her it seemed like it happened in another age. “It is regrettable, Lord Varys,” she said, looking through the window, away from him. From the balcony, she could see the smoke emanating from fires there and there in the city.

“Regrettable? Lady Margaery, I know that you didn’t go in these orphanages only so that people could see you helping those in need. I know you cared about the people of this city. I know you still care.”

It was true. Visiting and helping the poor were not only a part of her plans to gain the people’s support. And she did care about the people, or she thought. Maybe when she was among them, she cared, and when she wrote letters to orphanages and poorhouses and septs, she cared as well. You and the children are ever in our thoughts. Mira wrote this before the royal wedding, the second, the one with Joffrey. She was the only one in Margaery’s retinue from that time who was still alive. Cersei and the Sparrows killed all the others. She wished her friend was still there, with her.

She may have cared for those in need and the people when she was among them, but the moment she was back in the Red Keep, preparing the wedding and thinking about what gown she would wear today, she only thought about herself. Margaery wasn’t a monster, she knew it. No one in her family was a monster. That didn’t stop Loras and so many other people she loved from dying.

“Do you really want to see them all die?” Varys asked.

“Of course not!” she snapped. She stared at him. “I already saw too many people die. Do you think I want this to go on?”

“No, I think not. But if you don’t, then help me.”

“How?”

“By bringing the peace back to this city.”
Margaery laughed. “I am a prisoner here, Lord Varys.” An honored guest. “I don’t see how a prisoner could help to bring back the peace.”

“You have the prince’s ear. He listens to you.”

“No, he doesn’t.” He didn’t before, and he wouldn’t listen to her now or in the future. “He listens to nobody. You saw what he did. He murdered someone of his own blood. I warned him about the Sand Snakes. I warned him about the dangers of what he was doing and look at what he did! You warned him too, and he didn’t listen either. All he did was to run after revenge. He only thought about avenging the woman he loved, and he convinced himself that it was all for justice.” She stopped to breathe. “He won’t listen to me. I am useless.”

The Spider had a concerned expression. “You changed, my lady. I remember when I first saw you in the throne room. It was after the Battle of Blackwater. You were… radiant. A true rose, appearing just after so many people died, promising a better future. That’s how everyone saw you, highborn and lowborn alike. You gave them hope that this war would come to an end.”

“Well, that hope was a lie.” They both knew it was the case. Things hadn’t gone better, but worse.

“But it was hope all the same, and people need hope to go forward. You are the heir to Highgarden, the only daughter of its actual lord. You were the queen not long ago.”

“But I’m not the queen, not anymore.”

“No, indeed, and I wouldn’t suggest you to try and become it again.” Those words relieved her. The eunuch wouldn’t attempt to convince her to take a crown. “Still, everyone remembers the time when you were the queen, a time of peace and bliss, however short it was.”

“Yes, it was short. I was put into a cell beneath the Great Sept, my brother was killed, and the city was burned to the ground while I was queen.”

“While you were under arrest, and during that time, the people prayed for you. They wanted you back. They remained in front of the Great Sept of Baelor for hours, begging for your return. It was under Cersei’s rule that King’s Landing was destroyed. Everyone knows it. They only keep good memories of your time by Tommen’s side. You were the best queen we had since the Good Queen Alysanne.”

“And what good it did?” She snapped once more. “I almost died. The city was entirely burnt and thousands of people died. I lost my brother and many of my dearest friends. I lost my husband. I… I lost… my son.”

She burst into sobs and sat back into her chair. She tried to stay strong, but she couldn’t. She could barely have a glimpse at him before he was taken away from her, and she would never see him again.

“I can only imagine what a pain it must be for you. To lose a child… it must be terrible.” She wanted him to go. She didn’t need empty words of comfort from an eunuch. “But your son is still alive, my lady. And he has a good life, you have to believe me.” How could she believe him? For what she knew, her son could be dead, drowned into the Narrow Sea or buried in a field somewhere in the Stormlands, or maybe burned on a pyre. The Spider continued. “But if we cannot put an end to this bloodshed in the streets, the war will expand outside of it. Dorne and the Reach, Sunspear and Highgarden will fight each other, and it will be another war where thousands of people will die. Your son might be among them.”
Was that a threat? She looked at the eunuch, trying to decipher any sign compromising him, but all he showed was concern and sadness. He was probably a very good actor.

“Lady Margaery, you have more power than you realize. You have the power to prevent wars instead of starting them. Few people know you are here, but the moment you show yourself, if you do it at the right moment, you can put an end to all this. Even the Dornish respect you, and the lords of the Reach and the people of the city love you, even revere you. You can act as a mediator between the factions. You are the best chance we have.”

She scoffed. “You overestimate my influence, Lord Varys.”

“I think you underestimate it. You never used all the power and the influence you had. There was a young lady of the North who made you realize it during a trial, don’t you recall?”

Of course, she remembered. Sansa gave her a chance to get rid of Cersei for good. Only, she came back later, and Tommen was too weak to make her leave. That was her doom.

“You can use the power you have much better than many who preceded you, and yet you do nothing,” Lord Varys declared. Margaery thought he tried to hide a certain disgust in his voice.

“We are at war, Lord Varys. In times of war, a woman’s voice account for little. There is nothing I can do to put an end to it.”

“Yes, there is. We talked about it.”

“Yes, we talked, and you know I will do nothing.”

Varys sighed. “I hope you will change your mind. Your family will be in danger as long as this war goes on. Think about what kind of realm you want your son to grow in. A realm of peace and plenty, a haven for the people, or a realm of chaos and war, a gaping pit that will swallow him, you, and everyone you love.”

The sound of the door closing echoed on the walls of Margaery’s chamber after Varys left. It had to be one of the very few places in the capital that was quiet now. The section of the Red Keep where she lived was deserted. They kept hiding her from everyone, even though rumors of her presence began to spread among the noble men and women who resided in the city. The common people, however, had no idea that she could be here, of that she was sure. Anyway, they were too busy fighting somebody else’s war.

Everything began when the trial for murder of Tyene Sand came to an end. Trystane Martell, her lord father Mace Tyrell and Lord Anders Yronwood unanimously condemned the prince’s cousin to death. She didn’t know all the details, but among the many things she heard, it seemed that Tyene Sand demanded a trial by combat. It was refused to her because of a decree Tommen made not long before he died. Lord Varys said her husband took that decision because the High Sparrow put it as a condition to free her.

When the trial by combat was refused, something happened, though no one could exactly say what it was. Some said that Dornish and Reach men started to fight in the crowd immediately. Others said that another Sand Snake was murdered, and this started the battle. There were others who pretended that it was a Sand Snake who killed someone in the assistance and that this was the act that started it all. One of the stories said that a shadow killed the Sand Snake. It reminded Margaery of Lady Brienne’s tale of Renly’s death.

What was certain is that the Dornish and Reach men who assisted to the trial started to fight, and in the confusion, Trystane Martell killed two of his cousins. After that, the Yronwoods, who supported the prince up to now, turned against him. Margaery suspected that Lord Anders Yronwood waited for an opportunity to turn against Trystane, to avenge his grandfather’s death, who was supposedly killed by Oberyn Martell with a poisoned dagger. Only a few Dornish remained loyal to Trystane. He allied with her father and his men, and the war inside King’s Landing started.

She didn’t have much detail on this war, but many people died every day. The two sides seemed to be on equal grounds. Her father called reinforcements from Highgarden to help them, and ordered his seneschal, her granduncle Garth, to raise men to defend the Reach’s borders and stop any army from travelling from Dorne to King’s Landing. It was unclear, for now, what Doran Martell would do. His bannermen, some among his most powerful, were at war with the Tyrells, but they were also fighting his son. Margaery expected troubles inside Dorne very soon.

She didn’t know how to feel about the Sand Snakes’ deaths. She didn’t know them very well, except for Tyene. Despite treating her as a prisoner after they escaped the Great Sept and abandoning her brother to the wildfire, Margaery still owed her life to Tyene Sand. She had been her only contact with the exterior world for weeks when she was imprisoned. They rejoiced together when Cersei was put into a cell by the Sparrows. Even though her motivations were selfish, Tyene Sand saved her. And Trystane… How could he actually kill with his bare hands members of his own family? She knew he was blinded by his desire of revenge, but she believed he would execute his cousins, not kill them himself. It seemed she didn’t know him at all.

Margaery wandered through her apartments for most of the day. She had nothing to do. The Red Keep felt empty and absurdly big without people to share it with. She only had two handmaidens, and although they spoke a little more with her than when she first arrived, they maintained the discussion to a minimum, ordered as they were to not get too close to Margaery. They were nothing like Mira and Sera, or Megga or Alla.

As the day went on, the light of the sun lowered, and soon it was totally dark, though from the lights in the city, fights were still going on. How many would die today? With resignation, Margaery decided she should sleep. Better to sleep than to do nothing, after all. She had changed and was about to go to bed when her lord father came. He looked exhausted but forced himself to smile at her. That brought a genuine smile to her face as well and she ran into his arms.

“I’m sorry to visit you so late, my dear, but I wanted to spend some time with you,” he told her with his tired voice. He was coming back from the battle in the streets, obviously, though he took time to take a bath before he came to her.

“Don’t worry, Father. I was going to bed because I didn’t know what else to do.”

They sat at a table. “I could tell your grandmother to come and to keep you company, if you wish,” he offered.

“With the situation out there?”

“No, it’s true. It would be dangerous for her. I suppose I just want to see you happy again, like before. Before all this.”

“That was before,” she said. She knew they were both thinking about Loras.

“There was a time you were always all smile. I can still remember you swimming into the Mander with your cousins and your friends. Your mother and I used to look at you. We marvelled at how happy you were.”
Margaery nodded sadly. That was a long time ago, and those times would never come again.

“I would like to see you smile again,” her father said.

He nodded. He knew why. Her brother’s death deeply affected all of them. “You know, Margaery, I know this may not be the appropriate time but, I have been considering options for a marriage.”

Margaery rolled her eyes. “Father, I highly doubt anyone would want to marry me.”

“Nonsense. Who wouldn’t want to marry you?”

“I had three husbands. The first preferred the company of men and was assassinated in his own tent. The second was poisoned at our wedding feast. The third committed suicide. I don’t see any man wanting me as his wife now.”

“It wasn’t your fault. You are not to blame for their deaths.”

“As I am not to blame for Loras’s death too, I suppose.” She felt another wave of tears coming, and she kept them the best she could. “If I hadn’t been so set on becoming queen, maybe he would still be alive.” Her voice was trembling as she spoke.

Her father’s gaze dropped. “You know, when I decided to organize your marriage with Lord Renly, your grandmother told me it was a foolish idea, and I didn’t listen to her.”

“No one listened to her. She once told me that she had known a great many clever men, and that the reason why she outlived them all was that she ignored them. Seeing how our decisions ended, I suppose she was right. Loras, Mother, you and me, we all wanted this alliance with Renly. We all wanted me to be the queen.”

“The odds were on our side, Margaery. We had everything. And an opportunity like that wouldn’t come back before long. It was our chance. How could I foresee that… Loras… would die?” He was close to tears too.

“Maybe we were too ambitious. Maybe House Tyrell is not fit to sit on the Iron Throne,” she whispered.

“We have as much right on it as anyone else.”

Margaery scoffed. “You remember who we used to be, Father? Stewards. We were stewards for the Gardeners, a family that ruled over the Reach for thousands of years. The only reason why we have Highgarden today is because the Gardeners all died and we opened our gates to Aegon three hundred years ago. We did nothing to gain our position. We only bent the knee. The Starks, the Lannisters, the Arryns, the Martells, the Targaryens, the Baratheons, they all earned their power and their titles. We never fought for them. They were given to us by the Targaryens. And Cersei’s death? Did we get it by ourselves? She killed Randyll Tarly, our best general. We could do nothing against the invasion of the Ironborn. Without Daenerys Targaryen, we would be nothing today. We have never earned anything by ourselves. And here we come, imagining we can sit on the Iron Throne, that our time has come. If we had been more patient, Loras would still be alive, and many more people as well.”

“Maybe,” her father conceded in a whisper. “I wish he was still alive.”

They remained in silence for quite some time. “Father, tell me, did you… do you love Mother?”
That was a question she had been asking herself for some time now. She had all the time in the world for questions. He seemed very surprised, but he answered all the same. “Well, of course, I love her.”

“Did you love her the moment you were wed?”

He hesitated. “Your mother and I… Well, our betrothal was decided two years before the wedding took place. We got to see each other a few times before we were wed, but… I cannot tell you that I loved her back then. I knew it was my duty to marry her, and I did. She did it too. I must admit the first years were difficult.”

“Why?”

“Your mother is a beautiful and gentle woman, but we didn’t have much in common. She grew up at the Hightower, in Oldtown, so she was used to live in a big city. Highgarden wasn’t a place she hated, but she didn’t love it either. And in feasts, she seemed out of place. She wasn’t very talkative. We were so different that, sometimes, an entire day could pass and we wouldn’t see each other.”

She didn’t know about it. Her mother and father were always very kind with each other and showed discreet signs of affection on a daily basis. Margaery grew up witnessing it. They were happy together, and none of them ever denied it.

“What changed?”

“You.” A large smile took shape on his lips. “Two years after our wedding, your lady mother came to me one morning, and she told me she was pregnant. I thought this was the best day of my life. I went to see her every day after that. We talked about the baby, what name he should have. We both wanted children very much. That brought us closer. And then a few months later, your mother began her labour. I was in the room next to hers all the time, and when the child came out, I was there to see her.” He looked at her, tears of joy in his eyes. “And the moment I saw you was the most beautiful moment in my life. It was Alerie’s too.” He seldom called her mother by her first name when he talked about her, even to his children. “You were a miracle. After that, I loved her, and I loved you too, and Loras, like you could never imagine.”

She thought she knew what he meant, even though she couldn’t tell him. She couldn’t tell her own father that he was a grandfather. Doing so would endanger her child’s life. “You were lucky. Renly didn’t enjoy the company of women at all, Joffrey spent his days shooting on dead animals, and Tommen…”

She said nothing of the father of her son. She didn’t know him long enough to know if she loved him, though he was the only one of her three husbands to love her.

“I’m sorry I didn’t arrange you a better marriage.”

“It’s not your fault, Father. I agreed with all these marriages. I wanted them. I’m as much to blame as anyone else in this story.”

Her lord father shook his head. “I could have married you to anybody. I had requests of marriage from everyone. I could have found you so much better than the Lannisters. Your mother had reservations about Joffrey and Tommen. I should have listened to her this time. Renly was something, but Joffrey…I made mistakes.” He took a more serious expression now, as if he realized something. “You know, Lord Randyll Tarly once proposed that I could marry you to his son. Now that Lord Dickon is Lord of Horn Hill, he might be a possible match.”

She sighed. “Before you make any plans, Father, remember that it is Daenerys Targaryen who will choose who I marry, and we are in no position to oppose her.”

“I can still make her suggestions.”

“Be careful all the same. She is not a rose like me. She is a dragon.”

She nodded, understanding the situation. “All the same, I wish I chose you a different husband. I mean, no one would refuse you.”

“Someone did,” she reminded him, a smile creeping to her face.

“I will never understand why he refused.”

“He was already married, Father,” she reminded him.

“I know, but still.”

“Did you agree with Grandmother’s idea?” she asked out of curiosity.

“No, I wanted you to marry the new king, Tommen, back then. I didn’t agree with her, but she went on with the idea all the same.”

She nodded. “I didn’t agree with her, me neither.”

“I must say he surprised me. The moment we made our offer, he ordered that your grandmother left the city immediately.”

Margaery smiled at the thought. “It seemed she had found someone as sharp as she was.”

“Well, he missed something.”

She didn’t know if her father was being honest, or just wanted to cheer her up, but she appreciated it no matter the intent. “In another life, another world, another story maybe, he might have accepted. But the moment a redhead girl came into his life, there was no way to split them apart.”

She blinked, then yawned. “I will leave. You must be tired.”

“So are you,” she commented. He acknowledged it with a nod. Standing up, he approached and kissed her on the forehead.

“Have a good night, my little rose.”

Margaery may have been right about her father’s exhaustion, but she knew for a certainty that he was right about hers too. The moment she slipped under her covers, she fell asleep.

In her sleep, she was swimming in a large pool of water, inside a very dark place, but lit with torches. She plunged into the water of the pool and went very deep until she found the bottom. Its surface was smooth and reminded her of a particular texture. It wasn’t rock. She began to swim up, trying to reach again the water’s surface as she lost the air she had kept in her lungs. She managed to reach the top, but her lungs and her throat were on fire. She found herself in the sand, coughing.

_Why did you do that? Why?_

The voice came from somewhere, but she didn’t know what somewhere it was. However, she knew why she did it, why she risked her life.
“Loras.” That was the only word she could pronounce between two coughs. Her brother was dead, and she would never see him again. She was naked in the dark, all alone.

Chapter End Notes

I'm sorry that I was late to upload this chapter. I've been sick lately and I was late in writing the story as a consequence.

I'm going to stop uploading chapters for some time, to give me some time to write. The next chapter will be uploaded on April 1st, and it will be from Sansa's perspective.

Please review
Okay, it's been almost a month and a half since I last updated. I'm sorry for those who waited and wondered where the hell I was. First, let me reassure you, I'm still alive, and more important than that, I'm not about to leave "A Shadow and a Wolf" unfinished. Only, as I'm approaching the end of this story, I find harder than before to write the last chapters. So, to make sure I keep updating on a regular basis, here's what I'm going to do:

- There will be at least one update per week, on Saturday (standard hour in Montreal)
- I may publish two new chapters in some weeks, but there is no guarantee to it. When it happens, the second chapter will uploaded on Wednesday.

I just found myself unable to keep the pace I previously had, so I hope you will forgive me. We really are in the end of this fanfiction, and I'll do everything to give you a fantastic ending.

Now, let's go back to the story. Most of our characters are in the North, and they just stopped the Night King from taking Winterfell. However, the dead are not gone yet, many White Walkers are still alive, and the war is far from being over. In King's Landing, Trystane and Margaery must deal with a civil war. As for Sansa, she must face a very difficult situation as well.

There are songs in this chapter. If you want to listen to them as they come, see the links below (in their order of appearance):
- Hands of Gold (https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Bdmh9eRUz8g)
- Sansa's Hymn (https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=CKvOQXPfrMA)

SANSAXXXXIII

She remained still, her legs bent and stuck together, brought to her chest, her arms encircling her knees, her head pressed against her thighs. A full bucket of hot water was spilled over her head, spilling her already wet hair over her arms and shoulders. Despite the warmth of the water, she shivered. She knew what was coming, and nothing could reassure her.

Today was the day when she would get married, again. She was already married, to a good man, the kind of man her father had wanted her to marry. He hadn’t lived to organize the match he wished for her, but Sansa took comfort in the idea that her father certainly knew that she would spend her life with a good person. Nothing was sure anymore. Tyrion might be dead. Littlefinger was the greatest liar in all the Seven Kingdoms, and Sansa clung to it, trying to persuade herself that her husband was still alive, somewhere, and that he was looking for her.

However, it was difficult to remain convinced that the man she loved was alive and that the opposite was impossible. Sansa had no contact with the exterior over the last weeks. The only news she received were those that Littlefinger carefully chose to let her know, she was sure of that. He showed her a raven that was supposedly sent from the North, with the seal of House Umber on it. It claimed the wights got through the Wall.

She knew why he told her this information. He wanted her to believe that, whether Tyrion was dead or alive, it made no difference, for the dead would soon claim him. She knew Baelish hid her things, but she didn’t know which ones he was hiding. This only made her more uncertain than ever.

Back in King’s Landing, Sansa had managed to adjust to the condition of hostage quite quickly, all things considered. She was taught to obey, and that’s what she did when she was prisoner of Joffrey’s claws. Now, however, after knowing what power was like, what it was to wield it and to use it, she didn’t know if she could go back to being the little bird she was in the capital.

She arrived at Runestone two days ago, and everything was almost ready for the wedding at her arrival. She was welcomed by Harrold Arryn and the Lords of the Vale who were not in the North. She recognized none of them. They were all in Baelish’s pocket, or they didn’t care for her at all. They welcomed her like a well trained prey for a hunt. Lord Arryn was his usual self, a model of courtesy masking his arrogance and hypocrisy.

“I hope your journey was without problem, my lady,” he told her.

“It depends what you mean by problems. There are some who see the others’ problems as opportunities,” she retorted.

They gave her an appropriate welcome for a prisoner, she gave them the gratitude they had to expect from a prisoner. The following day, yesterday, she supped with Harrold Arryn. Littlefinger had done his work very well, as usual. Harrold Arryn was persuaded that she truly believed to be in love with Tyrion because she lost all her family. He assured her that she would be much better in the Vale, that he was the best husband she could dream of, that he would protect her against all dangers, and that her daughter would be safe. All lies. She wanted to send the roasted pork in her plate to his face. She was beginning to wonder how she suffered this treatment for so long in the capital. Perhaps because there she had friends. Sandor Clegane, who saved her from the angry mob. Shae, who was her confident. Tyrion, who was there to protect her from Joffrey and Tywin. Here, she had no one. She was alone, a prey for Littlefinger’s schemes. She hoped that Daenerys Targaryen would feed him to her dragons once she dealt with the dead.

Littlefinger had told her about his plans. He spent a lot of time with her. She knew that look he had when he stared at her, and it disgusted her. There was only one man in the world who could look at her this way, and he did it with kindness and humor, not cold cruelty and desire like Baelish did. As he stared at her, imagining who knew what, he explained to her his intentions in detail. He revelled in exposing his plans to her. He was counting on the war in the North to kill most of his enemies. The Lords of the Vale who opposed him were all there. Jon, Tyrion, Arya, the northern lords, Daenerys and her army were there. Even if Daenerys defeated the dead, her army, already divided, would be crippled, reduced by the losses to battles, sickness and cold. Her Dothraki hordes were undisciplined and despised by all the people in Westeros. As soon as the main enemy would be defeated, the different factions in her army would turn on each other. In the meantime, her absence would trigger a conflict between the two powerful houses who supported her, the Martells and the Tyrells. The Vale would remain outside the conflict, protected by its mighty mountains and the Gates of the Moon. When the time would come, they would assault the whole Westeros with their forces. Through Sansa and her daughter, Harrold Arryn could claim the Riverlands and Casterly Rock, and eventually the North. An alliance with either the Tyrells or the Martells would be made possible by their suicidal war. Daenerys would pick one side. She would have no choice to do it. The other side would make an alliance with the Vale when they saw they had no other choice, and once Daenerys was defeated, Harrold Arryn could claim the Iron Throne for him and Sansa, with Baelish in the shadows to rule the Seven Kingdoms.

There were several flaws to Littlefinger’s plans, and Sansa outlined them to him. He was forgetting the queen’s dragons, the mistrust everyone had towards him, and the fact that if the White Walkers won, there would be no Iron Throne left to sit upon, no kingdoms to rule, no living soul to call him king. Littlefinger had waved away her objections as if they didn’t matter. Dragons could be killed, very few outside of the Vale actually knew he was the man pulling the strings for Lord Arryn, and if the White Walkers took over all the Seven Kingdoms, then his actions wouldn’t matter, but they would if Daenerys defeated them. Tyrion would call that a Nash equilibrium, if her memories were right.

“You believe you are a prisoner, I can see that,” Baelish had told her. “But a day will come when you will thank me for what I’ve done for you.”

Sansa felt that Littlefinger’s plans were that of a man desperate for power, risking everything. His plan was only to bring chaos, and to use this chaos to his advantage. That’s what he always did. Plant the seeds for chaos, and then climb the ladder while everyone was too busy fighting in the pit.

There was something that Sansa couldn’t support, and that was the constant lies Littlefinger told about her husband. He kept reminding her of the rape of his first wife, but he changed the truth, repeating that Tyrion gave Tysha to his father’s men and willingly took part to the rape. Even Harrold Arryn talked about it when they supped yesterday.

“He might have told you that it wasn’t his fault, but you mustn’t let him fool yourself, my lady. He is a Lannister, and the Lannisters are all liars. They’re the ones who murdered your father.”

Arryn was either stupid or a liar like his counsellor. Littlefinger was the greatest liar in all the Seven Kingdoms, and he contributed to the downfall of her house as much if not more than the Lannisters. He was a damn son of a whore.

“You should watch your tongue, my lady.”

The voice of the maid who helped her to take a bath brought her out of her thoughts. “I said nothing,” Sansa denied.

“You’re not very good at lying. I heard you very well. Don’t worry, I’ll tell no one. I don’t see any reason why to do it. Get out the tub.”

Sansa did as she was told. She was reduced to a doll who did everything she was told. The maid, Vala, draped her in towels and dried her.

“Stay still, my lady.” She led Sansa to a glass and began to brush her hair. Vala was assigned to her at her arrival. Probably in the forties, she was no longer of the first youth, but a respectably handsome woman nonetheless. Her blond hair fell in disorder on her shoulders and her blue grey eyes were sharp. She never smiled and performed her tasks dutifully, nothing more. Sansa sometimes felt patronized by her.

“Eager to marry Lord Arryn?” she asked, almost on a tone of reproach.

“I didn’t have a say in the matter,” Sansa replied.

“No, you didn’t, of course. Still, many would be thrilled to be his wife.”
“Many, but not all of them.”

“True. Just like many women would like to share his bed. Do you want to?”

“What would my answer change?”

“Nothing,” Vala acknowledged. “Women don’t get to choose who they marry, or who they sleep with, for that matter.” She twitched Sansa’s hair by inadvertence. “Sorry, my lady.”

“Do you know Lord Arryn? Or… what do you know of him?”

“Only what everyone knows,” Vala replied. “He brings every woman who has the bad luck to be in his eyesight to his bed, he fucks them, gets them pregnant, then leaves them to fare on their own.” She stopped to brush for a moment, then sighed before she resumed. “I doubt it will change with your marriage. Men never change.”

“You’re wrong. They can.” She thought about Tyrion.

“They can’t,” the maid insisted. “Deep down, they always remain the same. They are either good or evil. The good ones die protecting those they love, the evil ones live abandoning those they claim to love. Any lord in this castle would sacrifice everyone they know to save their skin, Lord Arryn the first.”

“You shouldn’t say these things?”

“Why? No one cares. Everyone knows it’s the truth. As long as we respect the protocol and don’t spit it as his face in front of everyone so they can pretend they have a great lord, no one will be bothered by my words. As a servant, I am nothing, and how could words from nothing matter to the proud and great Harrold Arryn? Here, you’re ready.”

Her hair style was very complex, a chain of tresses that reminded her of her wedding. Shae and Brella had bathed her, dressed her, brushed her hair, and perfumed her like a doll for that day. They had just been done when Tyrion walked in. The husband of your dreams, he had joked, before he said that she did look glorious. Tyrion only believed half of what he said on this day, and she wasn’t sure she believed anything he said, but he was the closest that a man could be to the husband of her dreams.

Three years ago, she would have been overjoyed to marry Harrold Arryn. Now she would give everything she had to escape and run back to Tyrion.

If he’s still alive, a voice said in the back of her mind, very similar to that of Littlefinger. She chased the voice. Her husband, her true husband, not the one they were forcing her to marry today, was still alive out there, somewhere. She was Sansa Lannister.

Vala kept pestering and complaining about men as she put away a few accessories. Sansa noticed her harsh words, barely disguised, were directed towards someone in particular.

“What did Lord Arryn do to you?” she asked Vala.

“What every man do, especially those like him.”

“What is it?”

Vala sighed. “You will hear about it, sooner or later. I have a daughter. Her name is Cissy. She used to work as a servant for Lady Waynwood, just like me. She also happened to be pretty, so pretty that she caught the eye of the young and handsome Harrold Hardyng. He got her pregnant. She was only
The servant scoffed. “Men are all the same. I warned Cissy, I told her not to trust him. Her own father got me pregnant and left me alone to bring up a daughter on my own as soon as he discovered I was pregnant. Cissy thought that the proud and great Harrold Arryn was different. She said he would marry her, that they would live together, like one big happy family. The moment she told him she was pregnant, he lost all interest in her. You can still hear him telling jokes about my daughter’s fatness. She gained weight during the pregnancy, and because of that Harrold Arryn mocks her. Not that he didn’t mock her before, but after he left her, he kept laughing at her while she cried and screamed, bringing his child into the world. A child he never cared about. He boasts that he had a little daughter from her, but he doesn’t care about the child. Lady Waynwood was kind with Cissy. She is a woman, so I guess she understands what it can be like to be abandoned by a man. She married her to one of her men-at-arms. I can’t say it’s much better. Back when I was still at Ironoaks, every time I saw Cissy, she had bruises on her arms and her face, and I don’t think it comes from the steward. Lady Waynwood ended up sending me here. She wanted to get me far from her young knight, to prevent a scandal, because I started telling everyone what I really thought about him. A knight? Horseshit, I say! He’s a damn son of a whore!”

“You shouldn’t say these things,” Sansa warned her again.

She agreed with her about Harrold Arryn, but it would do the woman no good if she was beaten, whipped or executed for insulting the Lord Protector of the Vale. It was useless to insult someone openly. She learned it the hard way during her time in King’s Landing. You only said your opinion about someone when it was of use for you, and right now they had no use for that.

“Why shouldn’t I? If these tales about the demons in the North are true, then I’ll be dead before this winter is over, so why not use the time that’s left to me to let the truth come out. And this way you know how lucky you are to marry this son of a whore.”

Two more servants entered at this moment. They were carrying a package, and Sansa had quite a good idea of what it was. Vala, shutting her mouth, helped them to put it on Sansa. She noticed the gown was grey, but nothing more. She couldn’t care less. This wasn’t a wedding, this wasn’t a wedding gown, and she wasn’t a bride. She already said the words, to another man, and deep down she knew he was still alive. Littlefinger always lied.

They could make her wear a costly gown with a cloak to the Stark colors. They could force her to walk down the aisle to the altar where a man would wait for her. They could tie her hand to his in a ribbon. They could make her say pretty words to him. They could force her to sit by his side during the feast that would follow. They could bring her to his chambers, but she knew who she was. She was Sansa Lannister. No one could take that away from her.

When she was ready, the servants left her alone. Sansa didn’t look in the glass. She had no interest in seeing how she looked like. The woman who wore this gown and was about to get wed wasn’t her. It was another woman, the one who spoke pretty words and empty courtesies to survive. She looked through the window. Her daughter was out there, somewhere. Maybe. She pushed back the thought that she might be dead. Joanna couldn’t be dead. She had to be alive.

The door creaked as it opened, and Sansa had a quite a good idea of who it might be.

“You are beautiful, Lady Sansa.” She wanted nothing more than to rip out his tongue.

“I suppose you know about the expression a golden cage, Lord Baelish. Have you ever been in
“I have.” That surprised her, but she refused to face him. She kept her back turned on him. “Back to Riverrun, when I was fostered to your grandfather. I was a ward, an honored guest, but in fact I was a prisoner. An honored prisoner, but a prisoner still. I was forced to look at the woman I loved being taken away from me, and there was nothing I could do. I was in a cage, Sansa. There is no worse cage than the one where you must look at the woman you love being kept away from you. Where you see her being taken away from you.” He made a pause. “I loved your mother dearly.”

“Did you cry when she died? Did you regret helping the men who had her killed? Was there even a moment when you regretted your actions that led to her death?”

Littlefinger took his time to answer. “I loved your mother more than you could ever know. In a better world, one where love could overcome strength and duty, you might have been my child. But we don’t live in that world. I could never be with your mother. It was impossible. I ran after the impossible.”

He had approached her as he spoke and was now caressing her hair. A chill went through her spine, and she had to think very strongly about Joanna to not spit in his face. He then ran his hand on her shoulder, then down her back. It was bare because of the gown, until he reached her hips. Then he approached his lips from her ear.

“You’re more beautiful than she ever was.”

She stepped forward, freeing herself from the touch of Petyr Baelish. She turned to face him, and he seemed surprised by her expression of hatred.

“My mother saw you as a friend. You will not even get that from me.” She let some time slip. “Unless you prove yourself first.”

“What do I have to do?” he asked. He had his interested look again.

“Give me back what you took away from my mother. I want my daughter, and his father.”

He smirked, but before he could answer, someone else opened the door. It was another servant. She was closer to Sansa’s age, in the twenties, with long black hair and blue eyes. “It is time. The ceremony will begin.”

Petyr Baelish bowed to her. “Enjoy, my lady. This is a new life that begins for you.”

This was no life, but she didn’t say it. Littlefinger left and the servant stepped aside to let four men escort Sansa to the sept.

Sansa was like a ghost during the whole ceremony. She walked, moved and spoke without thinking. She felt nothing when she walked to the altar, barely noticed the man who claimed he was her new husband and the guests who were present for the ceremony, barely heard the septon speak the words. She almost didn’t feel the ribbon on her arm, or the hand of the man standing before her, and she said things without even thinking about them. The words were thought to all the young ladies from the age of four. All knew it by heart. What brought her back to the reality was the kiss.

It felt so wrong. She probably pushed and almost spat at Lord Arryn. She was close to wiping her mouth after. When she looked at Harrold Arryn again, she saw him all smile, contemplating her, before he turned to the assembly that applauded them. Sansa turned as well. She saw Ser Vance Corbray among them, just like Lord Belmore, and most of all Littlefinger, who stood before everyone else and looked at her with that smirk, accompanied with the look of desire in his eyes.
The sept was in the castle, so they managed to get to the Great Hall without going outside.

“Normally, we would do a procession in the courtyard, my lady,” her so-called new husband explained, “but with the cold times, I thought it would be better for you if we headed immediately to the feast.”

She couldn’t care less, and indeed she cared not for the feast at all. She ate a few crumbs, nothing more. She answered with a distant voice to any attempt from Harrold Arryn to engage a conversation with her. He managed to amuse himself with other people, anyway, especially with lords and knights coming to congratulate him. Sansa said the usual words of thanks and gratitude to those who came to her, and pulled up a smile, but it faded as soon as they were gone. She would make it clear to the man sitting by her side that she wasn’t happy, and she would tell him the reason why when the time was right. She would get Joanna back.

There was some dancing afterwards, and she refused to participate. That didn’t stop the Lord of the Eyrie to dance with half the women of the assembly. Of course, he danced with the half that was pretty and young. All this time, she felt the gaze of Littlefinger on her. She knew he was undressing her in his mind. What else would a brothelkeeper do? He probably undressed in his mind every woman he saw, evaluating how worth they were. She was no different. He assessed her value for his plans, and he decided she was valuable as a wife for the Lord of the Eyrie, another piece in his game.

There were songs too, bards and musicians who came to play between dances. Sansa always loved music, but this time she couldn’t find any interest in it. She found no interest in anything about this feast. She was giving the impression to Harrold Arryn that only one thing could interest her. Well, two things in fact.

She barely ate, but she drank more than her share. Tyrion told her that one of the reasons why he got horribly drunk during their wedding feast was that he hoped to be drunk enough that, come the morning, he would have forgotten everything. In some way, Sansa was following his example as well as honoring him. She didn’t drink as much as he did that night. Tyrion was the drinker, not her. Her mother and Septa Lemore educated her too well. She couldn’t bring herself to be totally drunk. Still, it helped to be partially drunk. Her husband used to say that everything was better with some wine in the belly. After a few cups, Sansa effectively felt better. Not much better, but better all the same. She thought she might get through the feast.

A woman was just done singing The Bear and the Maiden Fair. This song was sung at every wedding. She heard it at all the weddings she attended, including hers. She wished she had enjoyed listening to it back then, for she could not see a way to enjoy it now. The so-called groom, the lord who Littlefinger said every woman in the Vale wanted, danced with the servant who interrupted Sansa’s discussion with Littlefinger. She was probably older than Harrold Arryn, but it didn’t seem to bother him. As long as the woman was pretty, it was good for him. They both laughed as they danced and she whispered something in the ear of the Lord Protector of the Vale.

“A pretty sight, isn’t it, my lady?” Ser Vance Corbray had come and was standing before her, on her right, just to let her see what was going on the dance floor.

“A sad thing for this girl. She’s not the one marrying him,” Sansa commented dryly. She secretly wished it was this girl who was the new Lady of the Vale.

“That’s a sad thing for you too, my lady. I suppose it is hard to look at your husband going to whores. Though I suppose you must be used to it by now, considering your previous marriage.”

“Unlike certain men, Tyrion Lannister held up his promises.” She stared at the knight who betrayed them straight into his eyes.
“Unlike certain men, Tyrion Lannister is dead,” he replied. Corbray smiled. “We have a surprise for you, my lady. I heard you were very fond of singing. Well, I hope you will like the next song.”

He left with a cruel smile. Sansa watched him go as the guests exploded in applause. The dance was over and a new bard was coming forward, a tall and slim man with a small beard, dressed like a Lannister soldier, but with a harp in his hand. He sat and prepared as Harrold Arryn staggered to his place at her right. He was probably at least beginning to get drunk. The song began. Sansa never heard it before.

He rode through the streets of the city
   Down from his hill on high
O'er the winds and the steppes and the cobble
   He rode to a woman's side
   For she was his secret treasure
   She was his shame and his bliss
   And a chain and a keep are nothing
   Compared to a woman's kiss
   For hands of gold are always cold
   But a woman's hands are warm
   For hands of gold are always cold
   But a woman's hands are warm

Sansa hated the song the moment she heard the first verse. She saw Ser Vance and Littlefinger smiling cruelly at her. She wasn’t stupid, and they knew it. They knew it would hurt her to hear about the woman Tyrion loved before her.

And there he stood with sword in hand
   The Last of Darry's ten
   And red the grass beneath his feet and red his banner's bright
   And red the glow of the setting sun that bathe him in its light

"Come one, come on", the great lord called, "my sword is hungry still".
And with the cry of savage rage they swarmed across the rill
And with the cry of savage rage they swarmed across the rill

He rode through the streets of the city
Down from his hill on high
O'er the winds and the steppes and the cobble
He rode to a woman's side
For she was his secret treasure
She was his shame and his bliss
For a chain and a keep are nothing
Compared to a woman's kiss

She was his secret treasure. She was his shame. She was his bliss. If you ever set foot again in Westeros, I’ll have your head. And you’ll never see Tyrion again. He’s my husband now. These words were meant to be the last she would say to her former friend, to the woman who betrayed her. But before she left the cell, Shae warned her about someone else. She warned her about the very person who kidnapped her, took her daughter away from her and murdered the man she loved. No, he didn’t murder him. It was a lie. Everything he said was a lie. With Littlefinger, even the truth was a lie.

For hands of gold are always cold
But a woman's hands are warm
For hands of gold are always cold
But a woman's hands are warm
For hands of gold are always cold
But a woman's hands are warm
For hands of gold are always cold
But a woman's hands are warm

The hall roared in applause again. Sansa clapped her hands without enthusiasm. The bard was departing and the musicians were about to start again when Lord Harrold Arryn decided to stand. Everyone fell silent.

“My lords, my ladies, we are all together today for a great event. The union of the two greatest houses in the history of Westeros. House Stark and House Arryn, two houses that should have been united a long time ago by the bounds of marriage. Two houses that have waged wars against common enemies, two houses who never raised the sword against each other.”

Sansa almost didn’t manage to hold her laughs. The Starks and the Arryns had been at war before, and more than once, in conflicts that lasted over a thousand years. The knight didn’t know his history well.

“Today, we do not only face a common enemy together. We finally are one and only family. My lady wife’s father once was a ward for Lord Jon Arryn, and the sister of his ward’s lady wife was his own wife. Our houses were bonded through these marriages, but today we are one and only house. We will avenge all those who died at the hands of usurpers and bring justice to them. From the deserts of Dorne to the icy landscapes of the North, from the Sunset to the Narrow Sea, from the Iron Islands to Dragonstone, from King’s Landing to the smallest village in the Seven Kingdoms, I will avenge the deaths of Jon Arryn, Eddard Stark, his children, and all the others who died at the hands of the Targaryens and the Lannisters. I will have no rest until these houses and their allies are defeated and sent where they belong. Under the ground!”

The men in the assembly roared in approval. Sansa remained impassive. Her so-called husband didn’t stop.

“But for now, let’s rejoice before the real war begins. Let’s enjoy this moment before glory and honor calls for us. Let us listen to a song in honor of the Lady Sansa of House Stark, the most beautiful woman in the Seven Kingdoms, and of the entire world. Let us not forget that, sooner or later, war must end so we can go back to the people we love.”

The servant Harrold Arryn was dancing a few moments ago stepped forward. When she sang, Sansa immediately recognized the song. She sang it during the Battle of the Blackwater, and she sang it for Tyrion while he was recovering, after the trial. He had woken up while she sang it for him.

\[
\text{Gentle Mother, font of mercy,}\\
\text{Save our sons from war, we pray.}\\
\text{Stay the swords and stay the arrows,}\\
\text{Let them know a better day.}\\

\[
\text{Gentle Mother, font of mercy,}\\
\text{Save our sons from war, we pray.}\\
\text{Stay the swords and stay the arrows,}\\
\text{Let them know a better day.}\\
\]

\[
\text{Gentle Mother, strength of women,}\\
\]

Help our daughters through this fray.
Soothe the wrath and tame the fury,
Teach us all a kinder way.

Stay the swords and stay the arrows,
Let them know a better day.

Gentle Mother, font of mercy,
Save our sons from war, we pray.
Stay the swords and stay the arrows,
Let them know a better day.

Gentle Mother, font of mercy,
Save our sons from war, we pray.

Gentle Mother, font of mercy,
Save our sons from war, we pray.

Stay the swords and stay the arrows,
Let them know a better day.

At the end of the song, Sansa was singing with the other woman. They both had wonderful voices, so it created a beautiful duo singing the Mother’s Hymn. A silence followed, and then everyone applauded. Sansa’s eyes met the woman’s eyes. She smiled at Sansa and bowed. Applauses continued for quite a while. When they were over, the young woman didn’t leave. She remained where she was and addressed Lord Arryn without being asked, something quite rare for a servant.

“Lord Arryn, do you wish me to continue?” she asked. The Lord of the Eyrie looked unsure for a moment. “You asked me for another song, don’t you remember?”

His face lightened up. “Oh, yes. Forgive me.” He stood once again. “Although I have no love for him, my lady wife had another husband before me. And although he didn’t deserve her, he did protect her in his own way, and gave me the opportunity to meet her. For that I am thankful.” Harrold Arryn complimenting Tyrion Lannister. Everything was possible in this world. “Tyrion Lannister is dead, and only for keeping the Lady Sansa alive, he deserves that we keep some good memories of him. So, in his honor…”
He raised his cup to the servant and sat back. This time, a musician played to accompany her, and she sang something Sansa never heard before.

There are some who are born distinguished
There are some who are raised in praise
But me I was always the last in line
A blot in my father's gaze

No cheekbones chiselled on a feline face
No skill or savvy with a sword
But this game we all play is won in wily ways
And sly is this littlest lord

Cruel tricks of romance
Degraded by their spite
You snub your cub too many times
You just might feel his bite...

Beware, beware of the words I twist
I am small but my reach is long
And the ravens black against the winter's mist
Are whispering the half-man's song
They're whispering the half man's song...

The land is a blooming orchard
With fruits so juicy and ripe
With a clink of a coin loose the lion's loin
Play a tune on the half man's pipe
In the arms of a whore I made a promise
Sinking deeper into danger every day
Cut through all their shit with a brazen wit
Molding puppets from their minds of clay

I'm no man of honor
Myself is my true king
But somewhere deep within me
The bells of conscience ring

Beware, beware of the words I twist
I am small but my reach is long
And the ravens black against the winter's mist
Are whispering the half-man's song

They're whispering the half-man's song...
Whispering the half man's song...

The hall was silent as a crypt when she was done singing. You could hear a fly. Then someone clapped her hands. It was Sansa who did it. She felt the gaze of Harrold Arryn on her, and he followed suit. Soon everyone applauded, though the cheers were forced. The young woman bowed again and walked away. Sansa noticed that Littlefinger was one of the few to not applaud. He stepped forward as soon as the applause calmed down.

“My lords, my ladies, this is getting late, and if we want this marriage to be complete, then I believe there would be no better time for the bedding.”

Immediately, people cheered and shouted to bring them to bed. Sansa’s body tensed. She looked at Harrold Arryn, who was smiling like it was the most beautiful day of his life. This time, her husband wouldn’t forbid the bedding ceremony.

Hands clapped and people kept shouting as the men rushed towards Sansa and the women towards Harrold Arryn. Sansa shut her mind to the rest of the world, trying to ignore what was happening as they lifted her up and began to remove her dress, layer by layer. Despite her attempts, there were some details she couldn’t ignore. Among them were the avid eyes and pressing hands of Petyr Baelish.

It seemed to take an eternity. She felt every touch, every movement, every piece of clothes that was ripped from her body. She didn’t move an inch. She was moved, used like a doll. So that was how you felt during a bedding ceremony. You didn’t feel like a child excited to become a woman. You felt like a toy the others were using. When they reached the bedchamber, she was thrown into the bed, only clad in her underwear.

Harrold Arryn arrived not much later, without much more clothes on him than her. The women couldn’t push him into the bed like the men did for her. Everyone left the room and left them alone to consummate their marriage.

Sansa’s heart was pounding in her chest. She saw the excitement on Harrold Arryn’s face, and on a lower part of his body. The girl who left Winterfell would have been excited about this moment, but she was no longer that girl. She knew who Harrold Arryn was, and she knew who she was. Sansa Lannister turned her back on him. It almost served no purpose since he placed a hand on her shoulder right away and kissed her neck.

She shied away. Tears were coming to her eyes.

“Sansa, are you alright?”

What a question! She was forced into a marriage she never wanted, separated from all those she loved, a prisoner in a golden cage, about to be raped, and he asked if she was alright? She wanted to slap him, tear his eyes away from their orbits and slice his throat with a knife. Instead, she only cried.

“Sansa, tell me what’s troubling you? I’m your husband.”

No, he wasn’t her husband. She pushed his hand away again when he tried to lay it softly on her back in an attempt to comfort her. He was the man she was forced to marry, the man who was too stupid to see that she didn’t want him, that her heart belonged to another, and that he would never make her happy. She was this man’s prisoner, and he didn’t realize it.

She told him nothing of what went through her mind, nothing of what she thought of him. Instead, she told him something that was true, the main reason why she didn’t try to kill him yet.

“I miss my daughter.”

He didn’t speak for a while. “I can have her brought here if you want.”

She turned to him and pulled up a face full of hope. “You would?”

“Yes, if that can make you happy. Does that make you happy?”

She made sure she looked uncertain. “When she is here, then yes, I think I could be happy. I haven’t seen her for so long.”

“I’ll write tomorrow to bring her to the Eyrie as quickly as possible.”

She smiled. “Thank you.” She might see her little Joanna again soon. She couldn’t be sure, but that was better than nothing.

“Now…”

Before Harrold Arryn could say anything, the door of their bedchamber slammed open and two guards wearing the Arryn colors walked in.

“What are you doing here?” Lord Arryn roared. “It better be important…”
One of the men punched him in the face. He collapsed on the bed next to her. Sansa put some distance between them and covered herself with the sheets as the two men pulled their lord away and tackled him on the wall. The distant cousin of Robin Arryn had a hand on his face and was groaning in pain.

“My lady.”

Sansa turned to the voice and saw her worst nightmare standing in the doorsteps. He carefully closed the door, not lifting his eyes from Sansa a single moment. The stare was more terrible than ever before. The grieving feeling in her stomach was growing.

“You are indeed a hundred times more beautiful than your mother ever was,” Littlefinger said, looking at her as if he could see through the sheets and the thin fabric of her underwear.

“What’s the meaning of this?” Harrold Arryn was able to articulate words again. He looked at Petyr Baelish in confusion. “What are you doing?”

“I’m taking what is mine by right,” Littlefinger replied.

“Yours by right?”

“Yes, my boy. As you said, she is the most beautiful woman in the world, and the most beautiful woman in the world is mine by right. You remember you promised to reward me for my services. Well, I’ve come to claim my reward.”

“She is my wife!”

“Really? Did you consummate the marriage yet? I don’t think so. She has far too many clothes on her. I’m well informed on that kind of things. This is my profession after all.”

“I am the Lord Protector of the Vale.”

“A wise man once said that every man who must say I am a lord is no lord.”

“You have no right here! You are on my lands!”

“Your lands? My dear boy…”

“Don’t call me boy!”

Littlefinger ignored the outburst. “My dear boy, the Vale of Arryn isn’t yours. All these lords here follow you because I convinced them to follow you. Because I paid them, because I promised them this or that, because they decided to follow me to serve you. I could convince them to serve any other lord in your place. Only, it was easier to make them choose you. You have the right name, you have the titles, you have the appearance. The lords and the people want a lord like you. I could have made them choose me to rule the Seven Kingdoms if I wanted, but it is far easier for me to put you in the throne with Sansa at your side. Far easier for me to let you be king in name while I am king in all but name.” He looked at Sansa. “And one of the king’s main duty is to further the family line. To make a child to the queen.”

He approached the bed. Sansa knew she had nowhere to go now. Littlefinger was beginning to open his breeches. No, she wouldn’t allow that to happen. She would kill him before he could have her. She had sheets covering her. She would strangle him with them. She tightened her grip on them and prepared to do what was necessary. She closed her eyes.
I love you, Joanna. I love you, Tyrion.

A thunderous sound came from the entrance of the room. Sansa opened her eyes and looked at where the sound came from. Another guard with the emblem of House Arryn walked in and drew his sword. Sansa saw his yellow eyes staring at her for a moment, and only for a moment. He immediately turned his attention to the two guards holding a struggling Harrold Arryn to the wall. Pushing Littlefinger aside like a mere nuisance, he slashed his sword across one of Baelish’s guards’ neck. The other guard managed to draw his sword, to no avail. He stopped the first blow, only to end with the point of the sword piercing through his heart and emerging from his back. He collapsed on the floor as the newcomer pulled back the weapon from his chest.

Within less than ten seconds, the two guards of Littlefinger were both dead. The man they were supposed to protect was getting back on his feet after being pushed on the floor. Harrold was free from his captors and looked at his savior.

“Thank you, ser.”

Without warning, the said ser slapped him in the face, and the Lord of the Eyrie collapsed once again against the wall. “I am no ser,” the man said on a grave voice. He removed his helmet to reveal a face covered by scars and long silvery hair.

Littlefinger now stood again on his two feet and looked in consternation at his assailant. “Who the hell are you?”

“You have forgotten your own lessons, Lord Baelish. Never turn your back on an enemy.”

The voice came from the door, and Littlefinger looked right there, but as soon as he turned to face the origin of the voice, he cried in pain and ended up lying on the floor, his hands around the place where he opened his breeches, soaked with blood. Between his fingers, Sansa noticed the presence of a bolt. When she looked at the origin of the voice, she saw a crossbow, unloaded.

The person who held the crossbow had long black hair and blue eyes. The individual wore simple clothes, well kept despite their simplicity. And that individual was a woman. More surprising was the fact that Sansa knew that woman. She was the servant who danced with Harrold Arryn during the feast and who sang just before the bedding ceremony. She was the same woman who interrupted her discussion with Littlefinger before the ceremony. Her eyes were not lit with joy now. They were full of hatred. Sansa seldom saw so much hatred in somebody’s eyes.

She looked to Sansa, and for a moment her expression softened. “Are you alright?” Sansa nodded. “Good.”

She turned back her attention to Littlefinger, wailing on the floor, holding the very thing he was going to use on Sansa. The servant only looked at him, and Sansa realized that this woman enjoyed looking at him suffering. Staring at Littlefinger, she had to admit that she felt no pity for him in that instant, and she didn’t mind if he suffered.

“Tell, Petyr Baelish,” the servant said, “how does it feel?”

Littlefinger struggled to move slightly on the floor and looked at Sansa. “Cat, help me. I… I love you.”

“You want to help him?” the servant asked Sansa, her tone indicating she didn’t expect her to answer by the affirmative. She was right.

“No.”
Littlefinger’s expression changed, turning to rage. “If I die… your daughter dies.”

Sansa recalled what he told her before. She had forgotten. “He’s lying,” the servant declared.

“She will. I swear. I left precise instructions. My men will kill her the moment they hear of my death.”

“They will not hear of your death, Petyr Baelish. You are dying, and you will die unknown to most. In a century, no one will remember your name.” The servant approached him as he kept looking at Sansa. She knelt close to him. “Does it hurt?”

She placed her hand where the bolt was and pushed it. Littlefinger yelled in pain. She kept pushing, blood staining her hand. “Did you ever wonder how they felt? All these women who worked for you? Did you ever wonder how they felt when a man entered them? I’m sure you never did. All you cared about was to satisfy your clients so you could make money out of all these desperate girls you used to your own benefit. Well, now you know how it feels.” She pushed even harder and more blood came out. Littlefinger wailed even louder. “That’s how it feels. Every time, that’s how it feels.”

She released her grip. The former Master of Coin kept wailing on the floor, blood pouring out of him with his life. The servant remained close to him.

“You’re going to die, Petyr Baelish,” she continued. “Nothing can save you this time. Your lies, your plots, your knowledge, nothing can save you. You should never have lied. You grew up in the Faith of the Seven, am I wrong? There’s a passage in the Book of the Father. It is one of the ten greatest principles of your religion. You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor. And you just spent your last days bearing false witness against your neighbor, and you didn’t even realize it.”

She approached her mouth from his ear. Littlefinger was still looking at Sansa. His eyes kept saying that if he died, her daughter died. Sansa couldn’t save this man, not after everything he did. Anyway, how could she stop him from dying? He received a bolt between his two legs. He wouldn’t survive long. His expression never changed, a mix of pleading and threat. He gave no consideration to the servant who talked to him. However, after she was done whispering in his ear, his expression changed completely.

He turned his head towards the servant who smiled cruelly at him. His face now showed a mix of terror and utter confusion. The servant stood up and proceeded to reload the crossbow.

“That’s impossible,” he whispered.

“Information is power, Petyr Baelish. Tell me, what power do you have left? You will die knowing the truth, and there’s nothing you can do about it.”

The crossbow was ready. She pointed it. Littlefinger looked back at her. “Sansa…”

Her name was the last word he uttered. A bolt in the eye shortened the life of the mockingbird. Sansa had her eyes fixed on his lifeless body. He was dead. The man who caused so much suffering to her family was dead. Joanna.

She heard another bolt fly. When she looked, she saw that Harrold Arryn wouldn’t live long either. He had a bolt in the neck. He died spitting blood, unable to breathe, much like Ser Hugh of the Vale five years ago. Ser Hugh had been the first man who Sansa witnessed dying. She had been fascinated back then by his death. Now she was terrified. She looked at the servant.

“Why did you do this?”
“I have little more respect for men who sleep with every woman they come across and abandon them once they’re pregnant than I do for brothelkeepers,” the servant answered.

“They’re going to kill us! Someone must have heard us. They’re… they’re going to kill my daughter.”

“They won’t.”

Her hand traveled under her clothes and came back as a fist. When she opened it, Sansa looked at a red stone in the shape of a hexagon.

Chapter End Notes

I hope for those who waited that you'll find some consolation with this chapter, for this is a central part for the final sprint of this story.

This is the shortest wedding chapter I ever wrote to this day, but I think you will agree with me this wasn't a wedding on which we wanted to expand. For once, however, I respected the tradition of Game of Thrones to make weddings a horror. After all, according to Tyrion and Varys, bells always ring for horror: a dead king, a city under siege, or a wedding.

Chapter Notes

As I promised last week, a new chapter every Saturday.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

DAENERYS XI

A mountain was fuming, spitting dark smoke, red trails furrowing its summit. It was a terrifying yet marvelous sight. Destructive, yet it was an object of fascination for Daenerys. She had heard that Valyria was surrounded by dozens of similar mountains in its glory. The mountains that surrounded Valyria made its wealth and glory, but they also were the cause of its doom, for when they all erupted together, the Valyrian civilization disappeared, and only her family survived on Dragonstone. From this family would come her ancestor, Aegon, and all the kings and queens who followed, until her.

The land all around was covered with a dark rock. Nearly all vegetation had been buried under it. All but a tree, and around this tree little green creatures were working. With tools made of dragonglass, they sculpted the volcanic stone and erected pillars all around the tree, in a strange pattern that reminded of a whirlwind. The Children of the Forest worked tirelessly in that limited area around the tree, under the watch of the bloody face. The ground shook under their feet, but the Children kept working. They wandered from one obelisk to the other on the grass that survived around the weirwood, ignoring the danger over them. The tree was at the feet of the volcano, and yet it was undamaged.

The vision stopped. Daenerys released Bran’s arm, and her nephew did the same. “Did you see it?” she asked him.

“Aye,” Jon Snow answered, barely giving her any attention. He was looking at his cousin. “What was it, Bran?”

“The place where the Night King was created,” the boy replied. “This is where every White Walker was created ever since the Long Night. You have to destroy it. If you don’t, then the Walkers will only come back. It might not happen before thousands of years, but they will come back. The only way to stop them forever is to destroy this place.”

“Where is it?” Daenerys asked.

The boy made a sign to someone in the room. The Red Priest Revan stepped forward and placed a map on the round table. They were in a large room in Highpoint, where they gathered a war council. The people present were Daenerys, Jon Snow, Brandon Stark, Malcolm Branfield, Gwyn Whitehill, Garlan Hightower, Robett Glover and Lyanna Mormont.

For a month now, they fought to throw out the White Walkers from the North. So far, the results were uncertain. They managed to free several strongholds, including Karhold and the Last Hearth, and succeeded to defend the Dreadfort. They had divided their forces in three armies. One was following the Kingsroad and heading for Castle Black. This was the main body of the army that Jon Snow and Daenerys were leading, with the ultimate objective to take back the control of the Wall.
The second army was led by Lord Glover and headed for Deepwood Motte. They had the task to secure the western half of the North and to help the Mormonts to take back the control of their island. The third army right now was at Karhold. Led by Ser Brynden Tully, the Blackfish, their task was to secure the eastern regions of the North.

Fighting the White Walkers was very different from fighting any enemy Daenerys ever faced. They didn’t defend the castles. They didn’t hold them. They hid in the forests, or in caves, wherever they could hide and from where they could launch unexpected attacks on any group of people passing by. Sometimes they simply hid in plain sight, during a storm. This was no usual war at all. It reminded Daenerys of her struggle with the Sons of the Harpy back in Meereen, but worse.

The White Walkers and their wights seemed to be retreating, but some obviously remained behind to cause trouble to their forces. The movements of the enemy were very difficult to track down, since they had no contact north of their position to inform them of anything that was going on. Even Varys had no little birds where there were no people alive. Freeing the North wasn’t an easy task. Wights were difficult to find, even to locate approximately. The commander of the garrisons left in the southern regions of the North sometimes reported that wights were spotted, in places south of Winterfell. It was like tracking criminals who hid in every corner and dark place inside a huge city. The most they could do was to place garrisons in the castles to intervene as quickly as possible everywhere the enemy was spotted, and most importantly to take back the Wall so no more enemies could cross south.

The map Revan showed them had a thick line in the south. The line was the Wall. The map displayed territories far beyond the Wall. There was a cross almost at the northern limit of the map. The masked Red Priest pointed it. “This is the place.”

“Are you sure? In the vision Brandon Stark just showed us, this place looked like it was in the Reach. There were no traces of snow,” she said.

“It’s because I showed you what happened eight thousand years ago, before the Night King was created. Back then, there were no winters in Westeros,” the boy answered.

“No winters? I find it hard to believe,” Lord Glover said.

“As strange as it may seem for a Lord of he North, it is the truth,” Revan said. “The Long Night was the first winter. The Others didn’t come with winter. Winter came with them. If you destroy this place where they were created, this winter will be the last.”

“Your Grace, we need to focus on taking back the North,” Lady Mormont declared. “The White Walkers are already a threat. With all due respect to your brother, our enemies are the White Walkers, not winter. The North survived winters for thousands of years, and we will continue to survive them, but we will not survive the White Walkers if they are not destroyed to the last.”

She said your Grace, but it wasn’t Daenerys she was addressing. For Northerners, Jon Snow was their king. She had no illusion about it. They followed her because he followed her, and for no other reason.

“I can assure you that we will deal with the White Walkers, together, all of us,” Jon Snow said.

“You are brave, Lyanna Mormont,” Revan said, “but you are short sighted and blinded by things you have considered to be true for far to long. Before the First Men came to Westeros, back when the Children of the Forest ruled over this land, there were no winters.” He looked at Daenerys. “Queen Daenerys, you’ve grown up in Essos. Do you remember anything that looked like winter there?”
“No, there’s no winter in Essos.”

“Exactly, but there are winters in Westeros, and it’s because of the Others. You saw it in the vision the Three-Eyed Raven just showed you. The place where the Night King was created is at the feet of a volcano.”

“Aye, so? What difference does it make?” Lord Glover asked.

“Have you ever wondered why places like Winterfell and the Dreadfort were built upon volcanic grounds?”

Everyone in the room exchanged quizzical looks. “Winterfell is not built upon volcanic grounds,” Jon Snow stated.

“Where do you think the hot pools that warm the castle come from?” the Red Priest asked.

Jon Snow didn’t answer. Daenerys questioned her advisor. “What are you trying to say, Revan?”

“The climate of the whole world is regulated by volcanos. They are everywhere, in Westeros and Essos. However, there’s a problem with this one.” He pointed the position where the first White Walker came into the world. “When the Others appeared, they started to kill not only men, but the Children of the Forest too, and they used the powers of the Children to their advantage. They stopped the volcano. He doesn’t release any heat like he used to. That’s why the weather of the northern regions is so harsh, and that’s why there are winters. Volcanos used to regulate the weather, but now they can’t, not as well as they did before.”

“You’re telling us that there are winters because a volcano stopped?” Ser Garlan asked, clearly unbelieving.

“He’s telling the truth,” Bran Stark said. “You only need to look at a map to understand it.”

“To look at a map?”

“Aye. The map shows the position of most volcanos in Westeros, those that Bran the Builder protected.”

Daenerys looked at the map of her country on the large table. There were mountains, but none were indicated to be volcanos. In fact, she didn’t see any since she arrived on the mainland. Dragonstone was the only place where she saw volcanos. Her ancestors live in a city surrounded by them, but she never saw any in her whole life until recently. Cities in Essos were built far from them, in fear of meeting a similar fate to that of the Valyrians, and Dothrakis avoided them as well.

Daenerys blinked while staring at the map. The most visible items were the names of the kingdoms, the roads, and the castles. Then she recalled something from tales she read a long time ago. It was in the histories and songs that Sr Jorah gave her for her wedding. The tales were about the construction of the great castles of Westeros. For each castle, there was one name that always came back.

“The castles. Bran the Builder built them.” She turned to the boy in the wheelchair. “Why did he truly build them?”

“To protect something,” he replied. She turned to Revan.

“You said that the North would be lost if we lost Winterfell, and you also said that the Dreadfort shouldn’t fall at all cost. You knew that.”
“There are many things that are known in certain circles of the Red Priests, and that are ignored by most people, especially those who believe they know the truth,” the priest said.

“What’s that all about?” Jon Snow asked.

“Every story about the construction of a great castle of this country involves Bran the Builder. He didn’t only build the Wall, but also Winterfell, Storm’s End, Highgarden, Casterly Rock.”

“These castles were not built to welcome wealthy and powerful families,” Revan continued. “They were built to protect something. Something Bran the Builder couldn’t afford to let fall in the hands of the Others.”

“Wait a minute,” Ser Garlan interrupted. “Are you telling us that Highgarden is built upon a volcano? That’s impossible.”

“The volcano is dormant, but it’s there.”

“You’re going to believe a man in red robes, your Grace?” Lord Glover asked his king. “They are fools who sing in front of a fire and burn children alive.”

“These fools saved your lives, Lord Glover, and they’re helping you to take back your lands,” Daenerys objected. “You will show them a minimum of respect, especially to those who didn’t burn people alive.”

Lord Glover seemed about to reply, but a look from Jon Snow stopped him. The former King in the North spoke. “Listen. I’m not sure if we can trust the Red Priests, but I trust my brother. If there’s a place where we can destroy the White Walkers for good, then we must go there. The First Men and the Children of the Forest fought the White Walkers together, and they built the Wall in order to protect us, but it wasn’t enough. They came back. If there’s a way to prevent them from ever returning, then we must take it.”

“I don’t know for you, Jon Snow, but this place is very far in the North,” Malcolm Branfield said. He looked at his queen. “Please forgive me, your Grace, but our army is not ready for such a march. Even if we go directly to the place Brandon Stark indicates, we will need one month to reach it, and that would be in the best conditions. We don’t know the territory, and the Dothrakis and knights from the southern kingdoms are not ready to face such a hard weather. We may need three months to reach our destination from the Wall, and as much time if not more to come back. Most of our army will not make it. The Northerners and the wildlings would have a better chance, but there are not enough left. Not to mention we still have to take the Wall back and to cleanse the North from all the wights that still infest it. I don’t believe an expedition is feasible.”

“Nor is it desirable,” Revan added. “I agree with Malcolm. An army will never make it to the sacred site. Anyway, by the time we send the men north of the Wall, the Others will have regrouped at this place, and they will be ready to protect it. No army will have a chance to win. Dragons, however…” Daenerys felt the gaze of the Red Priest through his mask. “The two of them can carry about fifteen people. With their dragonfire, if you left right now, you could end this.”

“Leave now? Abandon the army?” Ser Garlan said, unbelieving.

“Right now, the Others and their servants are fleeing, retreating, but most of them are still south of the Wall. Winterfell and the Dreadfort are secured. They can’t take them now. Daenerys Targaryen and Jon Snow could head north with the dragons and a few men. The sacred site is undefended. But if we wait until the whole North is free, it will be too late. The enemy’s forces will have gathered there, and it will be impossible to destroy it, and all you’ve done to defeat the dead will have been for nothing."

Jon Snow was lost in his thoughts. He looked at Brandon. “Bran, what do you think of it?”

The boy didn’t answer immediately, but when he did, his voice was full of gravity. “Destroying this place is the only way to stop the White Walkers forever. If you let them go back there, they will come back, maybe not before another eight thousand years, but they will come back.”

“And this… place… is undefended right now? It’s vulnerable?”

“Aye, but it won’t be for long. Revan is right. It must be destroyed, before it’s too late.”

Brandon Stark and Revan exchanged nods. Jon Snow looked at the map, then turned to face Daenerys. “How much time would your dragons need to bring us there?”

“I would say two weeks, at most,” she answered.

He looked back at the map, pondering. “Aye. Let’s do it.”

“Your Grace…” the young Lyanna Mormont began.

“Lady Lyanna, I understand your concerns, but we have a chance to end things with the dead in a definitive way, and we can’t let it slip.”

“We need the dragons to fight the dead,” Garlan Hightower argued. “What’s telling us the dead will not come back into force once the dragons are gone? Let’s send only one, and the second can stay here. Or bring the third back.”

“Drogon and Rhaegal obey me, they will go wherever I go,” Daenerys declared. “As for Viserion, he is needed somewhere else. If my dragons are going north, they both go, and they go with me. However, we will need a second rider for Rhaegal if he is to accept anymore people on his back.”

She stared at Jon, a half-smile on her smile. She saw that his nephew understood what she implied.

“Your Grace, don’t do it, it’s a folly,” Lord Glover told Jon Snow.

“You have dragonblood. You can ride one. I think it would fitting that you ride Rhaegal. He was named after your father,” she said.

“What makes you believe he will accept me?” Jon asked.

“I don’t know. I just believe he will.”

“Your Grace, this is a trap,” Glover warned.

“Why would that be a trap?” she asked, beginning to feel unnerved.

“I don’t know. Maybe for your beast to bring him high in the sky and then drop him, so you can get rid of our king.”

“He’s no longer your king, Lord Glover. He bent the knee, have you forgotten?”

“No, I didn’t forget.” He cast a dark glance at Jon Snow.

“Lord Robett Glover, since I arrived in the North, all I’ve done is to help your people free their lands from the White Walkers. Have I given you a single reason to doubt my intentions?”
“It seems you forget quickly, like your father. You slaughtered Northerners at Moat Cailin.”

Once again, this came to bite her. “I regret what happened.”

“Regret? Aye. As much as the Mad King regretted murdering Lord Stark and his son, I guess.”

“I find it odd that a man so prone to judge my house accepted help from the Boltons and even sided with them, after the Red Wedding.”

“We never sided with them!”

“You refused to fight them. You accepted them as your Wardens of the North. You supported usurpers. You’re lucky that Jon Snow spared you, for your king would have been in his right to execute you for treason.”

“Enough! We already have a common enemy to fight. We have no time for this,” Jon Snow roared. “I’ll try to ride your dragon, if this can help to defeat the White Walkers that are left. The discussion is over. We will leave as soon as possible.”

People began to leave the room. Malcolm Branfield accompanied his niece-in-law, an arm around her shoulders. The Lady of Highpoint didn’t say a word during the whole reunion. Daenerys had spoken with her briefly when they arrived. She had lost all her family and now her husband was dead too. Her only brother who was still alive was at the Citadel. She managed to remain strong, but Daenerys could see that she was grieving. She had shared her personal experience from her time after the death of her own husband with the lady, and she had seemed grateful.

Daenerys and Jon Snow walked to the courtyard. Her dragons were outside the gates. Her nephew asked her a question.

“Do you really trust me to ride one of your dragons?”

“Since we met, you’ve done everything you could to make the northern lords obey me. I think that’s the least I can do. If I can’t trust anybody in the North, I will never be able to rule it justly. Better to begin with my own blood.”

Truth be told, Daenerys wasn’t certain if she was making the right choice by allowing Jon Snow to take his chance with Rhaegal. However, the visions that both Bran Stark and Revan showed her always proved to be true. She was the queen of all the Seven Kingdoms, the Protector of the Realm. She had a duty to protect her people not only now, but also in the future, long after she was dead. If destroying the place of origin of the White Walkers meant they would never return, then it was her duty as a queen to destroy it, and they couldn’t go there with only one rider.

“Thank you,” he replied. “But I’m not sure I will succeed. I know nothing about dragons.”

“I didn’t know how to ride one before I climbed on Drogon’s back, but that didn’t stop me from riding him.”

“What if I fail?”

“Let’s hope you won’t. You can still refuse to try, but then we will only be able to bring half a dozen people with us.”

“No, I’ll try. I’m just uncertain of the results.”

“You have it in your blood. You will succeed,” she insisted.
Daenerys wasn’t in fact that certain he would succeed, but she believed he would. She had seen him approaching Drogon one day. Her child had allowed him to approach without problems. To her, that was the proof that Jon Snow was indeed her nephew. The vision Brandon Stark gave her was another proof.

“Did you spend all your childhood in Winterfell?” she asked.

She tried to know him better during the last few weeks, but her nephew was quite gloomy and didn’t talk much. He also seemed to be avoiding her, though he did everything to support her in front of the Northerners and to make them accept her as their new queen.

“Aye, quite most of it. For me, it’s always been my home.”

“Lord Stark really never told you who you were? You always believed he was your father?”

“Aye.”

“And he never talked to you about your mother?”

“Never.”

The silence lingered between them. He was indeed not easy to talk with.

“When I left Winterfell, when I went to the Wall and joined the Night’s Watch, he told me that the next time we’d meet, we would talk about my mother. But we never met again.”

“I’m sorry. Eddard Stark took part to the rebellion that slaughtered my family, but I know he’s also the only one who tried to stop Robert from sending assassins against me.”

“My father didn’t take any part to your family’s slaughter.” His tone had climbed. Daenerys forced herself to not go down this path.

“I mean that he was part of a rebellion that ended with the death of most of my family,” she said, as calm as she could.

“Your father had his father and brother burned alive.”

“My father was a cruel man. I know what he did, and I know the Mad King earned his name. But don’t forget that he was also your grandfather. I hope you don’t judge me on my father’s actions, for I don’t judge you on yours.”

“I apologize. I didn’t mean to be rude. You helped us, your Grace. Without you, Winterfell would have fallen, and what’s left of my family would be dead. It’s just… difficult right now. All my life, I was Jon Snow, and I dreamed of being Jon Stark one day, and now I learn that my real name is Aegon Sand, or Aegon Snow, I don’t know anymore. And I learn at the same time that my grandfather murdered my uncle and my other grandfather, and that my two families fought and killed each other. Do you have any idea how it is?”

“No, I don’t,” she recognized after some time. “I knew who I was from the very beginning, and I’ve always known who I was, but it’s only recently that I’ve understood what it meant.”

“What did it mean?”

“That it was my duty to protect my people. I am their rightful queen. If I don’t protect them, who will?”
“Your father and my grandfather didn’t seem eager to protect them, even though he was king.”

“No, he wasn’t. No more than my brother Viserys. My father was a horrible king, and my brother would have been a horrible king as well.”

“What happened to him?”

“He threatened to cut out my baby when I still carried it, so my husband poured a crown of molten gold on his head,” she said on an impassive voice. Her nephew seemed troubled.

“I can see you had a wonderful family.”

“Was yours better?”

“None of my brothers and sisters tried to kill me, if that’s what you’re asking. Lord Stark treated me like his son, but he was careful to not spend too much time with me. Lady Stark was colder towards me, and Sansa called me half-brother and bastard as soon as she knew who I was, but things could have been far worse.”

“Sansa Lannister? Lord Tyrion’s wife?”

“Good to hear. Sometimes, Viserys would welcome me at night and talk to me about our homeland, but mostly, he vented his frustration of not being king on me, because I was the only one he could blame for that. I wish I had known my brother Rhaegar. Everyone said he was a good man.”

“That didn’t stop him from fleeing with my mother and starting a war.”

“Still, I would have liked to know him.”

Just like she would like to know his son, but for now, the task remained quite hard. They arrived in the courtyard and walked through the gates. As they approached her dragons in her camp, she noticed how uncertain her nephew looked.

“Don’t be afraid. They won’t hurt you. They didn’t hurt Tyrion Lannister, so I doubt they will hurt you.”

Her nephew shook his head. “How did Tyrion manage to mount one?”

“I don’t know,” Daenerys genuinely replied. “He claims he has no dragonblood, but I don’t see how else he could have done it. Do you know if there has ever been a marriage between a Lannister and a Targaryen in the past?” she asked him. Lord Tyrion told her there had never been one, but she doubted it.

“Not that I know of, but I didn’t spend my life studying the lineages of the families of Westeros. Why did you allow him to ride Viserion?”

“I’m not sure. I trust him.”

“A Lannister?”

“He proved his loyalty more than once.”

“Including at Moat Cailin?”
Daenerys pressed her lips together. The word had gone out quickly, despite their attempts to silence it. “It wasn’t what I wished for, Jon Snow, but if your men in the Neck had slowed us down, I wouldn’t have been there to save you at Winterfell.”

They stopped before the green dragon. “Rhaegal, named for my valiant brother who died on the green banks of the Trident, and who I never got to know,” she said. “Named after your father, Jon Snow.”

Her nephew looked afraid. Rhaegal was staring at him with intensity. Drogon, not far away, was also staring aggressively. “It’s ironic. With the way you described your brother, I wouldn’t have expected that Viserion would be the calmer of the three.” He didn’t stop looking at Rhaegal a single moment as he spoke.

“Viserys was cruel, weak and frightened, yet he was my brother still. When I gave his name to Viserion, I wanted my dragon to do what my brother could not.”

“I wish he was the one I tried to approach.”

“Get closer.”

Her nephew made one step towards Rhaegal, then another, and another. Rhaegal kept eyeing him, but he didn’t make any attempt against Jon. He only remained careful, very careful. And so was the man approaching him. When Jon Snow was close enough, he brought his hand to the muzzle. After a few seconds, Rhaegal calmed down.

“See? You have it in your blood. He will let you climb him.”

The former King in the North looked at her, still unsure, then he slowly got around the wings and carefully mounted her child. Daenerys then stepped aside and gave the word in Valyrian. Rhaegal flew in the sky.

She watched her nephew on the back of the dragon bearing his father’s name for quite some time. He seemed to be doing fine. A smile came to her lips. For the first time in a very long time, she didn’t feel alone in this world.

“It seems there’s a second head to the dragon.”

Daenerys knew this voice, and her thoughts turned darker all of a sudden. Melisandre was standing not far from her. Revan and two other Red Priestesses were at her side. She knew now what this woman did to the daughter of Stannis Baratheon. Red Priests weren’t as helpful as she initially thought they would be. Melisandre looked down when she realized Daenerys was staring at her and walked away. Revan approached her in the mean time, the two other priestesses remaining behind.

“I suggest you bring people who know the Others, your Grace, and skilled warriors too. It would also be better that they carry weapons that can destroy Others and their servants,” he told her.

“That makes you part of them,” she replied.

“I spent my life preparing for this moment, your Grace. If I die there, it wouldn’t bother me, for I would have fulfilled my duty.”

“I would prefer it if you lived, Revan. You are a valuable advisor.”

“A valuable advisor in times of war, your Grace. When peace comes back, you’ll need other people at your side. But for now, all that matters is to do what men should have done thousands of years ago.”
“Revan, tell me, the Children of the Forest created the White Walkers. They knew where they came from. They knew how to destroy them, didn’t they?”

“They knew, your Grace. The Three-Eyed Raven has all the knowledge of the Children. Brandon Stark took his information from them.”

“Why didn’t they destroy this place back then?”

“They should have,” Revan replied after a moment. “But they didn’t. That was their greatest mistake, but they are not the only ones to blame for that.”

“What do you mean?”

“I told you about the origin of my order. Azor Ahai created it and fought the servants of the Great Other. However, his servants were defeated in Essos much sooner than in Westeros. In the west, the battle was far more difficult. The Others were stronger, and there were more of them than in the east. When the war was over in Essos and the ice receded in the Shivering Sea, Azor Ahai left Essos. He sailed for Westeros and fought alongside the First Men against the Others. And just like in Essos, they finally retreated. But Azor Ahai didn’t finish what he began. Instead, he went back home.”

“Why?”

“No one knows exactly the reasons that motivated his choice. Some say he saw a bigger threat in the east, others believe he wrongly assumed the enemy was defeated, some say he missed his home. We don’t know for sure. What we know for sure is that he could have ended it, if he had wanted. He could have destroyed the Others forever, but he didn’t. Instead, the First Men and the Children were left alone, too weak to destroy the Others on their own. Instead, they did what they could to preserve what they had left. They built the Wall, and castles where the volcanos were, to protect them from the servants of evil. They did well. They kept the Others away for thousands of years, but they couldn’t keep them away forever. And today, millions of people pay the price for the mistake of one single man, not to mention all those people who died because of the hundreds of winters that happened in Westeros during these last eight thousand years.” He looked at Daenerys. “Don’t make the same mistake, Daenerys Targaryen. You and Jon Snow can defeat the dead for good. Finish what men began eight thousand years ago. You have dragons. They had none.”

He walked away. Daenerys looked back at the skies where her nephew was learning to fly. She thought about her third child, the one she sent with Tyrion to the Vale. When she would come back from their expedition in the North, Daenerys hoped that her Hand would bring her news that the Vale was hers. She also hoped that Tyrion would find his wife and his daughter. According to him, it was in the interest of the Vale lords that nothing had befallen them, or else a certain girl would poke some of them full of holes. That was, if he didn’t kill them first.

Chapter End Notes

So, I came up with this idea of volcanos regulating the weather in Westeros quite late after I started writing. I don’t know what you think of it, but I felt somehow White Walkers and winters couldn’t only be explained by magic, but also with science, since both are present in Game of Thrones. And to quote Arthur C. Clarke, magic is just science we don’t understand yet.

Tyrion back in the Vale, though not as a prisoner this time.

TYRION XXXIV

The Gates of the Moon stood tall, though not very tall. It was a small castle by many standards, especially for a lord paramount and a warden, and even more so for kings. That was why Roland Arryn the First, fourth king of the Vale, had decided to build the Eyrie, in order to compare to Casterly Rock and the Hightower. Ironically, the Eyrie remained the smallest of the great castles of Westeros to belong to a paramount family. It was even smaller than the Gates of the Moon, and the Arryns could only live in the Eyrie during summer. When winter came, they had to transfer their family and their court to the Gates of the Moon. The Eyrie might be said to be impregnable, but to the opposite of Casterly Rock, the Hightower, Highgarden, and even Winterfell, it wasn’t a very pleasant place to live.

Tyrion had horrible memories of his days in the Eyrie. Now the castle was empty and the Gates of the Moon were the centre of the Vale of Arryn. The Eyrie was nothing more than an empty castle. A beautiful castle, indeed, but empty still. The Eyrie didn’t matter now. Only the Gates of the Moon mattered.

“You’ve been here for quite some time, haven’t you Grey Worm?” Tyrion asked to the tall Unsullied commander standing straight like a column next to him.

“We have not managed to take the castle yet. Too well defended,” he replied.

“Not many castles in Essos, isn’t it?” Tyrion tried to say in High Valyrian. Grey Worm looked at him with puzzled stare. He supposed his Valyrian was a little rusty.

“Unsullied will do what is necessary, but too many will die taking this castle.”

“I agree. The Gates of the Moon were made to withstand any assault. Even men who do not fear death will have a hard time taking it. We cannot walk around it. This is the entrance to the Vale. No one enters the Vale or leaves it without passing by the Gates of the Moon.”

The truth was, you couldn’t travel through the Vale and ignore a castle on your way. The Vale was a fertile valley surrounded by the Mountains of the Moon. The Gates of the Moon and the Eyrie guarded the entrance to the valley by the Eastern road, the only safe point of passage through the mountains, and safe was a relative statement. The hill tribes attacked everyone wandering on the road. The Unsullied had a hard time with them on their way. Tyrion wondered if Shagga or Timett was behind some of these attacks. Either way, the fact remained they had to take the Gates of the Moon if they were to proceed through the Vale.

“How many assaults did you lead against them?” Tyrion asked.

“Two, each was a failure.”
“Well, now things are different. We have a dragon with us.”

“Do you think Sansa could be here?”

The girl who asked the question was standing to Tyrion’s right while Grey Worm stood at his left. Arya Stark looked impatiently to the castle. She had arrived yesterday along with Tyrion. They travelled together on Viserion’s back. They both had the same objective, to save Sansa.

“The Gates of the Moon are the seat of House Arryn during winters, so yes, she may be here. That’s why we cannot just burn the castle to the ground. If Sansa is inside, then she would die with everyone else. And for the time being, it would be better to keep the castle intact. It can still be useful.”

“So, what do we do?”

“The Keeper of the Gates of the Moon is a certain Nestor Royce, if I recall?”

“Aye, that’s him.”

“Well, I suppose we need a little talk with Lord Nestor. I hope his conversation proves to be better than yours with Yohn Royce. Grey Worm, send a man to ask a parley with Nestor Royce. Tell him the Hand of the Queen wants to speak with him.”

Grey Worm left to perform the order. He executed every order Tyrion gave him without question. These Unsullied were indeed very efficient. Too bad the soldiers of Westeros weren’t as reliable. His father might have mocked the Free Cities for hiring sellsword companies to fight for them, but you had to give at least one thing to Astapor, their Unsullied were by far very superior to any army in Westeros.

“What if she’s here?” Arya asked.

“We find a way to free her. Royce probably doesn’t know I’m here, but he knows we have a dragon now. It might play in our favor. I don’t believe he wants the Gates of the Moon to turn into the Gates of the Ashes. Fear might be enough.”

“And if she’s not here?”

“Then Royce would be better to surrender because I won’t waste time here. If need be, I will burn the Gates of the Moon, as much as I would like to avoid it.”

Tyrion turned away and walked back to his personal tent. His sister-in-law followed him. “If Sansa isn’t here, then where do you think she could be?”

“I have no more idea about this than you, Arya. Sansa could be anywhere in the Vale. She might even not be there, but this is our best chance. She was kidnapped by lords from the Vale, so she is likely somewhere here. We may get some answers from Nestor Royce.”

Nestor Royce better had some answers for them, indeed. Tyrion had no idea of where his wife and his daughter were, and for the first time he was ready to do everything to reach an objective. If finding and rescuing the two people he loved the most in this world meant burning whole castles, he would do it. He wouldn’t do it until it was necessary, but he wouldn’t back down.

“I don’t know Nestor Royce,” Arya said. “I met Lord Yohn at the Eyrie after aunt Lysa died, but I never met Nestor Royce. What are his ties with Yohn Royce?”
“From what I know, he is the leader of a cadet branch of House Royce. They have no lands and no castles, nothing that belong to them in their own right.”

“What about he Gates of the Moon? Doesn’t it belong to them?”

“No, the Gates belong to House Arryn, just like the Eyrie. In fact, Nestor Royce is not really a lord. His true title is Keeper of the Gates of the Moon. This is a title bestowed by the Lord of the Eyrie to a man he trusts to keep and manage the Gates of the Moon and its territories in his name when he resides at the Eyrie in the summer. But once winter comes, the Lord of House Arryn moves to live at the Gates of the Moon. The Keeper only keeps the castle for Lord Arryn. He is named by him and can be removed at any moment, though I don’t think it often happened. Through history, the Arryns had a tendency to choose people of their own family to act as the Keeper, but Lysa Arryn seems to have broken the tradition. Not that she had too much choice.”

“Aye, true. There were no other Arryn apart from her son, and Robin Arryn was small, frail and sick. He could never run a castle.”

“From what I’ve seen of this boy, I’m not sure he could ever do anything.”

“I agree.”

For some time, they only walked. Arya Stark was taller than him, which was no surprise. Even Tommen was taller than him the last time he saw him. Tyrion thought with sorrow about his deceased nephew. He and Arya had the same desire to save Sansa. It was strange how the dwarf she was married to by force and the sister she kept fighting with now teamed up to find her.

“Was she able to run it?” his sister-in-law asked.

“What?”

“Casterly Rock. Could Sansa run it? Because at Winterfell she was horrible with sums and figures. I couldn’t see how she would be able to run the Red Keep for Joffrey.”

Tyrion smiled. “Well, the Rock had been run without a lady for more than thirty years before Sansa came, so the place didn’t have to fear much. She had a lot of help. And Creylen gave her lessons,” he added with a wink.

Arya laughed. “When we find her, I’ll be sure to remind her of it all the time.”

“Don’t tell her it’s me who told you about it. She could kill me for that.”

That was if they could find her. They would need some answers from Nestor Royce.

“You came here before the war, didn’t you?”

“Yes,” he answered. “Your aunt offered me the hospitality of the Vale, and I think you know by experience how welcoming she and her son were.”

“Aye. I know what the sky cells are.”

“I wonder if your mother would have been so quick to trust her sister with me if she had known that Lysa Arryn would throw her daughter into a similar cell to mine later.”

She looked at him. “I’m sorry. She was wrong to arrest you.”

Tyrion shook his head. “She wanted to protect her children. She was looking for the person who tried to kill her son, and Littlefinger gave her someone, just not the right person. Your mother was a strong and proud woman, fierce and dangerous when she wanted to protect her family. I cannot claim that I loved her, after all I spent time freezing in a sky cell because of her, but I admired her. I can see some of her through Sansa, and through you too. Sansa may have your mother’s looks, but you are as dangerous as she was.”

That got him a smile from Arya Stark. She didn’t smile very often. He let her go to train while he went back to his tent and studied maps. After pouring himself some wine, he sat and stared again at a map of the entire Vale. The Eastern Road ended at the Bloody Gate, the last point of access before the Eyrie. Before they reached the Bloody Gate however, they had to take the Gates of the Moon. Once they had gone through both gates, there were several minor roads built at the time of the Kings of Mountain and Vale, back when the Arryns were kings just like the Lannisters or the Starks. They could use these roads to easily travel through the Vale. Because of the limited size of their army, Tyrion couldn’t split their forces without taking a huge risk that Harrold Arryn could come upon one and destroy it. The best course of action would be to march on the region of Runestone and Gulltown. The castle and the harbor were vital for the Vale, for their symbolic and economic value. Taking it would cut off the legs of House Arryn, depriving them of their main harbor and one of their most powerful bannerman. It would force Harrold Arryn to fight fifteen thousand Dothrakis and Unsullied, plus one dragon. One victory in open field could be enough to make House Arryn crumble into dust. The Arryns might have held the Vale for a very long time but seeing them unable to defend the Vale would turn some of their bannermen against them.

That was what they had to do. They had to force Harrold Arryn to meet them in the field. Threatening the most vital part of his kingdom was the best way to get him to face them. Anyway, Tyrion suspected that the young lord wouldn’t be able to resist the temptation to fight them by following the rules of chivalry. They just had to get through these bloody gates.

Sadly, this was easier to say than to do. Tyrion could understand that the Unsullied and the Dothrakis failed to take the Gates of the Moon. Dothrakis were not used or trained for sieges, and even though he had no doubt the Unsullied could do very well in that kind of battle, they had the disadvantage to fight during winter, something they weren’t used to while the Knights of the Vale were. And the Gates of the Moon were truly impregnable. The castle was in enemy territory, built to resist against the attacks of the hill tribes and to launch attacks against the hill tribes too. No wonder the Vale was never taken by exterior forces between the invasion of the Andals and Aegon’s Conquest.

An Unsullied walked towards them. “Nestor Royce is willing to discuss with you.”

Two hours later, as the sun was falling on the horizon, Tyrion stood on his horse, with Arya, Grey Worm and a Dothraki commander whose name he didn’t remember, facing Nestor Royce and two knights accompanying him.

“You were told wrong,” he replied. “I am alive, and now Hand of the Queen for Daenerys Targaryen. There’s a lot of that kind of things that happened recently. Look at Arya Stark right here. Everyone believed she was dead, and yet she’s here, alive and well. Believe me, I know how you feel right now. I almost thought she was dead me too.”

Nestor Royce eyed Arya carefully. “Apparently it was you who killed Lady Arryn.”

“Aye,” she said. “After she tried to kill me.”

“Lord Royce, I’m afraid the Knights of the Vale are no longer as high as honor. Some attacked me and my men on the road to Winterfell. They left me for dead but I was saved by an unexpected and quite appreciated help. However, they kidnapped my wife and my daughter in the process, and I have good reasons to believe they are in the Vale, for I do not see where else they could be. So if you have any information regarding Sansa Stark and Joanna Lannister, I would appreciate that you share it with us,” Tyrion said.

Nestor Royce’s expression changed a few times as Tyrion talked, but when he answered he displayed the usual pride the Knights of the Vale felt entitled to. “Your version of this story is quite different from the one I heard, my lord, for according to Lord Arryn the Lannisters tried to betray their allies and to seize the North for themselves. Lord Arryn and his men stopped you from doing so and saved the Lady Sansa and her child before your own men tried to kill them.”

“I see the Arryns are better at lying than I thought.”

“Lannisters are pretty good liars too. You are men without honor,” Royce spat.

“Now, now. Let’s calm down. Lord Harrold Arryn told you I was dead, Lord Royce. And yet here I am. If he lied about this, what’s telling he didn’t lie about the rest?”

He saw doubts in the man’s eyes for a second, but it was quickly gone. “Lord Arryn is an honorable man, Imp. He would never lie. I’m sad he believed wrongly you were dead, for he intends to marry the Lady Sansa.”

A stunned silence followed. Tyrion felt a mix of boiling anger and cold fear in his guts. “What did you say?”

“You heard me, Imp. Lord Arryn is going to marry her and to take care of her child.”

“Tell me where she is,” Tyrion slowly said, making sure that his voice carried the threat he was ready to execute.

“Runestone. That’s where the wedding is taking place.”

Tyrion’s hands gripped the reins of his horse. “Surrender immediately, Royce, or I swear I will burn the Gates of the Moon to the ground until even Harrenhal looks shining and newly made compared to it.”

“Your threats are not frightening me, Imp.”

“They should. We have a dragon. If you didn’t see it, I’m sure your sentries did. I won’t hesitate to use it. Yield the Gates, bend the knee and proclaim Daenerys Targaryen as your true queen, or I will make sure you regret working for Harrold Arryn.”

“I will never bend the knee before a Targaryen.”

“Then in this case, you leave me no choice. The Gates of the Moon will be mine by tomorrow, or at least what’s left of them.”

As if to emphasize his saying, a great roar came from their camp, where Viserion was. Nestor Royce looked uneasy, but it didn’t prevent him from standing on his position. “I will guard my family’s castle. You will never have it.”

“It’s not your castle, Royce. It belongs to the Arryns, and you will die fighting for something that is not yours, and for a man who forces a woman to marry him when she’s already married. I expected more from a man who descends from the people who brought the Faith of the Seven in Westeros.”
The Keeper of the Gates looked furious. He had his horse turn away and rode towards the castle he would uselessly die defending. Tyrion and the others rode back to their camp as well. He went to see Viserion. The dragon was very quiet when compared to his brothers. He looked even calmer when Tyrion was around.

“Well, my boy,” he said when he was close enough.

He didn’t know if it was accurate to call him boy. Maesters debated for a very long time, without reaching a consensus, as to whether dragons were males or females, or both. If there were male and female dragons, no way was found yet to distinguish them. So Tyrion didn’t know if Viserion was a male dragon, but since he was called after Daenerys’s brother, it seemed appropriate for him to call him that way. Viserion didn’t seem to be bothered by it.

“You may have work to do before tomorrow. They know we will come, so be careful. You’re powerful, but not invincible, and I’m not sure this time we will have a Red Priestess to bring us back to life if we’re shut in the skies.”

“You’re really planning to burn it to the ground?” Arya Stark had followed him.

“Why, you don’t agree?”

“No. In fact, I think you’re right. It’s the only way forward. Sansa is somewhere in the Vale, and I’m not going to let someone marry her against her will.”

“I’m lucky you were not in King’s Landing during our wedding.” He turned his attention back to Viserion. He remained quiet. Arya’s presence didn’t seem to bother him.

“How can you ride him?”

“I don’t know,” he lied.

“Do you think Jon could ride one of them?”

“Maybe, if the queen allows him.”

“But, I mean, he’s a Targaryen. He can fly one. When Aegon came to Westeros, he was riding Balerion, and his sisters Visenya and Rhaenys had their own dragon, Vhagar and Meraxes. So he must be able to ride one.”

“Surely, but there’s a lot to dragonlore we don’t understand yet and that we may never understand. Not all Targaryens were dragonriders, and not all dragonriders were Targaryens.”

“I’d like it though, if Jon could ride one.”

“It wouldn’t bother me much, I have to admit it. He would certainly make a better use of a dragon than most people.”

“He could almost do everything with one.”

“Be careful, Arya. Things don’t always end well for dragonriders. Rhaenys and Meraxes died when Meraxes received a scorpion bolt through the eye. Dragons are powerful, but not invincible. They can be killed.”

He hoped this would not happen.

“Make sure you don’t die. When I find her, I don’t want to tell Sansa that her husband died. She would never forgive me.”

Arya left him and he spent some more time with Viserion. He felt a strong bond between him and the dragon. He wondered how the beast managed to know where he was and to find him at the right moment. This couldn’t be a coincidence. The likeliness of such an event happening was too small for it to be a coincidence. Something brought Viserion to him and made the dragon save him. Tyrion didn’t know what it was, and for once, he didn’t think he cared to know why. He had dreamed to have a dragon for a long time, and now he had one. He wouldn’t complain about it. What bothered him the most were his origins, now that he knew them.

It was still difficult to cope with the fact that he was the son of Joanna Lannister and Aerys Targaryen. He hadn’t dared to tell anyone yet. The queen didn’t know one of her dragons was being ridden by her half-brother, and Jon Snow didn’t know that Tyrion was his half-uncle. He wondered how the maesters would manage to arrange their family trees.

It was strange, but he had felt a bond with Jon Snow and Daenerys Targaryen the moment he met both of them. Did he manage to get along with them because they shared the same blood? Tyrion doubted it. He never managed to get along with Cersei, despite the fact they had the same mother. Perhaps Jon Snow and Daenerys Targaryen were simply kinder than Cersei ever was to him. The three of them were somehow strangers, people who were cast aside by the world, one because he was a bastard, the other because she was an exile, and the last because he was a dwarf. And yet today here they were, the queen of the Seven Kingdoms, her Hand and Lord of Casterly Rock, and the King in the North. They had gone a long way.

Tyrion looked through the space between tents towards the Gates of the Moon, whose towers could be seen from where he stood. He thought about the ruins of Harrenhal and that he had no wish to do the same as Aegon, but then he remembered Sansa, held prisoner somewhere past these mountains, forced into another marriage, his daughter being held prisoner as well, and then all his doubts vanished. If one burned castle, or two, or three, were the price to pay to get Sansa and Joanna back, then he would pay it, and gladly. A Lannister always pays his debts, and Harrold Arryn would know what it meant soon enough.

That night, Tyrion dreamed he was back in the Westerlands, near the Sunset Sea. There was a small cottage in front of him, an old house that threatened to fall into ruin. To every noble man in Westeros, it would look like a miserable place to live, a place that was unworthy of a rich and powerful lord. To every lord, it would look like a ruin, but not to Tyrion. This place was where some of his best memories remained buried.

He walked in. There wasn’t much inside. A table, a few cups and plates, some chairs. There was the couch, of course, and the hearth. Tyrion shivered. It was cold. Snow was falling outside. Winter had come upon the Westerlands, just like in the Vale.

“You always forgot to put wood into the fireplace. You were a lazy husband, except in bed.”

“Yes, I was.” He didn’t turn to face the origin of the voice that came from behind his back. “What kind of a husband am I?”

“The kind who loves his wife. The kind who’s ready to do everything for her,” she replied.

Tyrion scoffed. “Look at what happened to you, and now to Sansa. I couldn’t protect you, I couldn’t protect her, I couldn’t protect my daughter. I’m a dwarf. It doesn’t matter if I can ride a dragon, I cannot protect the people I love. I can’t even protect Jaime. He’s in a dungeon somewhere in King’s Landing, and he’s probably going to be killed, and there will be nothing I can do to save him.”
He looked at the fireplace, then back at the couch, to days that were gone and that would never come back. He thought about Sansa, about all the nights they spent together, her head on his shoulder or his chest, her fingers intertwined with his own. He thought about the night of her sixteenth name day, the night when they truly became man and wife. The most beautiful night of his life. He thought about the day she came back to Winterfell and showed him their little daughter. The daughter she named after his mother, the woman who died by bringing him into the world.

“She loves you, Tyrion. Don’t ever give up on her. Find her. Find them.”

Yes, Sansa loved him. Tysha may never have loved him, but Sansa did. That was the one thing he could never doubt. He closed his eyes and saw her face, her beautiful blue eyes, the long red hair, her high cheekbones. There was only one other woman he had ever found so beautiful, and he couldn’t remember how she looked like.

He opened his eyes and looked over his shoulder. She was gone. He walked outside and looked around. Far away, he saw a shape walking away.

He woke up, shaken by an Unsullied. “The Royce man wishes to speak with you.”

Tyrion stirred himself and blinked a few times. Had Nestor Royce changed his mind?

Surprisingly, Nestor Royce was found into the command tent. He rode all the way into their camp, saying he wanted to surrender. Tyrion didn’t need to wait for a very long time before the Keeper of the Gates of the Moon gave an explanation. He showed a raven’s scroll.

“I just received this. Harrold Arryn is dead. He was murdered during his wedding night. They found him lying in his own blood, a bolt shot from a crossbow in his neck. Sansa Stark disappeared, she is nowhere to be found.”

Tyrion read the message. It was just like Nestor Royce said, except for one little detail. Someone else’s body was found in the room with Lord Arryn’s body.

“I get that Littlefinger was still alive,” he said. He didn’t wait for an answer. “I guess now we know who tried to kill me and to take away my wife and my daughter.” It was too bad that Baelish wasn’t still alive. He would have liked to kill him, after he made him suffer.

“I don’t know who organized all this, my lord. I swear, I have no idea of what happened in the North.”

“Well, now you know. Littlefinger tried to kill me. I see this raven comes from Lord Vance Corbray. His men were at Winterfell when my wife disappeared, and strangely none of them were to be found afterwards.”

“Look, Imp, Lord Arryn is dead, and he had no heir. Yohn Royce is away, and there’s no one else that the Vale could rally behind. I don’t trust Corbray. He will try to seize the Vale for himself, and I don’t want that. So let’s make a deal. I kneel for your queen, I let you pass through the Gates of the Moon and make sure the mountains are free for you to travel everywhere you go. In exchange, you let me and my family live, you confirm me as Lord of the Gates of the Moon, and you deal with Corbray.”

“You want to be Lord of the Gates of the Moon? That’s a first in the history.”

“Lord Baelish gave me the title when he was still alive.” Now Tyrion understood. Nestor Royce had been loyal to Baelish because he gave him a title. “Let me keep it, and I’ll serve your queen loyally.”
“Our queen,” Tyrion specified.

“Our queen,” Nestor Royce reluctantly said.

“Nothing will happen to your family or to you, you have my word, but for the title, it will be to our queen to decide. You accept or I burn the Gates and there will be no castle left for you.”

“Alright. I accept.”

The Vale was now open to them. However, there was something else Tyrion needed.

“Now, tell me everything. Where are my wife and my children?”

“I don’t know. I swear. Corbray offers a handsome reward to whoever will find Sansa Stark. He blames her for killing Lord Arryn. He doesn’t mention her daughter. If I were you, I would find them both quickly, for when he finds them, Lord Corbray will not hesitate to kill them. He says they can be brought to him alive or dead.”

Chapter End Notes

As we are nearing the very end of the story, I wanted to explore the kind of relationship Tyrion might have with Arya as his sister-in-law. Safe for the brief discussion they had after Arya unwillingly almost killed her sister, they didn’t interact much, but Sansa’s disappearance gives them an opportunity to get closer as they now share a common goal, and to know each other a little better.

Next chapter : Trystane
And now we see how Trystane and Margaery fare in King's Landing. As you will see, the city is a mess, like always.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

---

He never thought he would see this during his life. A map of King’s Landing, with pieces indicating armies positioned everywhere. Stags, roses, suns pierced by a spear and portcullis occupied strategic position all around the city. The capital of the Seven Kingdoms had turned into a warzone.

King’s Landing was a roughly square-shaped city, encircled by walls, with the Blackwater Rush at the east and the Blackwater Bay at the north. Seven roads made their junction here, and seven gates built into its walls opened the city to these roads. Three hills overlooked the city. Aegon’s Hill, also named Aegon’s High Hill, was home to the Red Keep. The Great Sept of Baelor once stood upon Visenya’s Hill, and Rhaenys’s Hill was topped by the Dragonpit. Of the three structures, only the Red Keep remained intact, the Sept and the Dragonpit now lying in ruins.

“It should have worked,” Mace Tyrell said.

“Well, it didn’t,” said Trystane, allowing the exasperation to pierce his voice. “You said you could take Rhaenys’s Hill, and you didn’t. Quite the opposite, in fact. How many men have you lost?”

The Lord of Highgarden stammered. “Hundreds.”

“Hundreds? Can’t you be more specific?”

“We are still counting…”

“How many?” Trystane asked again, his temper flaring.

“Between five hundred and one thousand men, my prince,” he reluctantly recognized.

Trystane looked over the map. Roses, stags and suns occupied Aegon’s Hill and Visenya’s Hill. After the chaos that followed Tyene’s trial, the city had quickly been divided in two sides. The first side was being led by Trystane and Lord Tyrell. They had under their orders all the Tyrell forces, the Dornishmen who remained loyal to Trystane, a few troops from the Stormlands and the City Watch, almost ten thousand men. The rebels, or the Dornish rebels as most of the people of King’s Landing had come to call them, were composed of the Dornish troops under the command of the lords who turned against Trystane after his cousins’ death. They were led by Anders Yronwood who commanded nearly eight thousand men and controlled Rhaenys’s Hill. Their positions on the map were represented by portcullis, the symbol on House Yronwood’s banner. The portcullis on Rhaenys’s Hill showed who held that position on the map. Trystane and Lord Tyrell’s men also controlled other key points of the city, including four gates, the harbor, and Fishmonger’s and Cobbler’s Squares. Yronwood held the Dragon Gate, the Iron Gate and the Old Gate.

Trystane seized a rose piece on the map and threw it on the floor in anger. “One thousand men, lost
“I couldn’t know these savages would take us from the back,” Lord Tyrell said.

“Well, they did.” Trystane moved a portcullis from Rhaenys’s Hill and placed it on Flea Bottom. “I warned you. This is not a plain. This is a city. Men can hide everywhere to ambush you. You cannot fight like it was a common battlefield.”

“A decisive assault without drawback was our only chance…”

“For what? For a disaster? For an humiliating defeat? For a slaughter?”

They had fought for days to take control of Cobbler’s Square. This strategic point, once an important marketplace, was disputed by the loyalists and the rebels. Today, a combined assault of Trystane’s and Lord Tyrell’s men succeeded to take the Square. An hour later, the Gate of the Gods was falling too, in line with Trystane’s plan to surround Lord Yronwood’s men until they were entrapped on Rhaenys’s Hill. The next steps would be to take control of the two remaining gates, cutting the rebels from any supply lines, then starving them to death while his own men would remain well fed, helped by the stocks being kept inside the Red Keep and the provisions the Reach could send them. Taking the three remaining gates wouldn’t be an easy task, he knew it, and keeping them and all their other positions would be even more difficult, but it would be less risky and cost fewer lives than a full scale assault on Rhaenys’s Hill. Mace Tyrell decided otherwise.

After they took Cobbler’s Square, Trystane directed his men towards the Gate of the Gods, but Mace Tyrell decided to follow his army’s initial movement and to throw them against Rhaenys’s Hill, sending them into a suicidal charge along the Street of the Sisters. They didn’t meet heavy resistance until they were deep inside the hill, far from their allies positioned on Visenya’s Hill. Then they were met by a full wall of Dornish spears that stopped them in their progress. They engaged them, the spears of Dorne able to contain the Tyrells due to their raised position. In the meantime, another group of men, a mix of Dornish soldiers and criminal gangs, emerged from Flea Bottom, followed the Street of the Sisters and took the Tyrells from behind. The slaughter was general. Very few escaped. Trystane now suspected that Anders Yronwood allowed them to take Cobbler’s Square and led them into this ambush. Everything was too well prepared. He couldn’t have organized such an ambush within minutes. Trystane hadn’t found the defense lacking at the Square, far from it, but perhaps this was also part of Yronwood’s plan, to let them believe into a difficult fight followed by a general retreat and bring them to run into the trap. Well, it worked very well. They lost a thousand men, and fights had started again at Cobbler’s Square. Trystane’s officers couldn’t guarantee him they could hold the position, and without the Square they would lose the Gate of the Gods. Weeks of fight and hundreds of dead, all for nothing.

Trystane knew by experience that fighting in the open field was very different from fighting in the streets of a city. The Sons of the Harpy made his life a nightmare in Meereen, and Lord Yronwood was doing the same here. Battalions kept their positions and defended them to the death. They tried to remain on the main streets, as alleys were far too dangerous. Every once in a while, men wandered in the deserted alleys of King’s Landing and never came back. Sometimes they were found slain, the throat slit, looted from their weapons and everything of value they had. Criminals, grouped together as gangs, sometimes attacked soldiers who travelled by groups of two, five or even ten men. Today, however, for the first time, these gangs had taken part to the civil war that tore the city apart. Anders Yronwood seemed to have found a way to convince them to rally his cause. Maybe he even provided them with weapons, or they may simply have used those they stole in the last few weeks.
Perhaps it was a temporary alliance and they only participated to the ambush for an opportunity to loot the dead soldiers. Men of the Reach had more riches on them than Dornishmen. In all cases, the situation was getting out of control and Trystane hardly saw how they could manage to surround Yronwood and his allies now. With the loss of a thousand men within a few hours, their numerical advantage was now reduced to nothing. They could never hope to trap the rebels on Rhaenys’s Hill now.

“Lord Yronwood sent reinforcements to Cobbler’s Square,” the Warden of the South stated, revealing something Trystane was already aware of. “To keep it, we would need reinforcements as well.”

“Reinforcements that wouldn’t be needed if you hadn’t sent your men to a certain death,” Trystane sharply retorted.

“This wasn’t my fault!”

“Then whose was it?”

They locked eyes. Mace Tyrell was furious, and Trystane was too. The man boasted about his victory at Ashford and his almost victory during the siege of Storm’s End. The truth was that Mace Tyrell had very little to see with the victory of the Tyrell forces at Ashford, which was mostly the work of the now deceased Randyll Tarly, while the siege of Storm’s End he led was a loss of time that allowed the Starks and the Lannisters to take King’s Landing and to murder his king. Dorne lost many more men than the Reach during Robert’s Rebellion and actually tried to protect their king, while the Tyrells wiped their asses before Storm’s End. Mace Tyrell was a man who taught himself as a great man, a great general, and he was neither of them. If only he acknowledged his limits as a commander, it would be easier to work with him, but instead he insisted on his own strategies, leading them to huge mistakes and catastrophes like the one that happened today.

“Do you have any suggestion to defeat Lord Yronwood, my prince?” he asked on a tone of defiance.

“And you, do you have any?” Trystane asked in return.

He never knew if Lord Tyrell had an answer or not since at this moment a young squire entered the small council room, exhausted.

“My lord, my prince, Visenya’s Hill is under attack.”

“What?” Lord Tyrell said.

“Visenya’s Hill is under attack,” the squire repeated. “They say they won’t be able to hold it.”

“Nonsense. We have a strong garrison there. We fortified the hill. If the rebels can hold Rhaenys’s Hill, then we can hold Visenya’s.”

“We can’t, my lord. Not with all our men who died today. Many are injured. And they’re attacking us with thousands of men.”

“Thousands?” Trystane asked, all surprise.

“Yes, my prince. Thousands of them.”

“Impossible! They would need to empty Rhaenys’s Hill,” Lord Tyrell interjected. “They would never do that.”
“Why wouldn’t they?” Trystane said. “They know we will not attack it again, not before some time. They can leave a small garrison there and send the bulk of their forces against us on one point with few risks. Their men are all together at one place, while ours are dispersed around the city. I suppose they took Cobbler’s Square?” he asked the squire.

“Yes, my prince. Ser Dickon is asking for reinforcements. He says if he doesn’t have assistance soon, he will be forced to abandon his position.”

Trystane pulled his hand through his hair. Cobbler’s Square had fallen. He had many detachments all over the city to keep the gates and other strategic points. He couldn’t order the companies guarding these points to go to the rescue of Visenya’s garrison. However, if Visenya’s Hill fell, the companies guarding these positions would be vulnerable, separated from the bulk of Trystane’s men, and easily cut to pieces by Yronwood and his men. He had to save Visenya’s Hill, or else he might find himself in a situation similar to that of Yronwood only a few hours ago. So he took a decision and called for a knight who was at the door.

“Send the Dornish garrison of Aegon’s Hill to Visenya’s Hill.”

“All of them, my prince?” the knight asked, all surprised.

“All of them, the whole garrison,” confirmed Trystane. The knight ran to carry out his order. Trystane indicated to the squire to leave as well, and he ran too to go back to Visenya’s Hill.

“You’re sending all your men to Visenya’s Hill?” Mace Tyrell asked.

“All those who are on Aegon’s Hill, yes. About one thousand men should be enough, and your own men here should be enough to make sure Lord Yronwood doesn’t take two hills in a row with the Red Keep along it. Now, if you’ll excuse me, I have other duties to attend.”

Trystane left the small council chamber and Mace Tyrell and walked down into the depths of the Red Keep, crossing the path of several men in green armor. He paid no attention to them as he entered the dungeons. A man in a dark office, lit by a single candle, was writing at his desk when he arrived. His name was Beron, and he was the chief guardian responsible for the castle’s dungeons. He lifted is eyes to look at Trystane.

“Again?” he asked.

“Yes, again,” replied Trystane. It had been quite a few times they exchanged the same words when Trystane came down.

Beron shrugged. “As you wish, my prince.”

The chief guardian seized a set of keys that hung to the wall. As he walked out of his office, the candle still burning behind, he took a torch in the corridor. The door giving access to the dungeons was one made of thick wood, with a small window that allowed to look inside through bars made of steel. All you could see through the bars was a line of torches with cells between. If you looked well enough, you could see a wall at the end of this corridor. The guardian inserted one of the keys in the lock. He turned the key and the door unlocked. One push was enough to open the door. He entered, followed by Trystane, and locked the door again behind them. No door was ever left open or unlocked in this place.

They walked along the dark corridor. They heard people snoring, others wailing or crying. Some pleaded for help. At the end of the corridor, they turned on their left and followed a second corridor. They turned two times on their right, then another time on the left before they arrived before another thick door. It was identical to the first one that gave access to the dungeons, only there were two locks instead of one. The guardian unlocked them and locked them both again once they were on the other side. They followed a narrow stairway that led them to the second level of the dungeon. They passed through another door with two locks before they arrived.

The first level of the dungeons was for common criminals who were placed together in common cells, some shackled and some not, some more heavily shackled that the others. The second level was made up of fewer and smaller cells, destined to highborn captives. The cells had very small windows with bars, but let little light go in. It wasn’t there that Trystane was heading, so he and Beron continued their way through three corridors. Then they had to go through one door with three locks, another stairway, stepper and narrower than the first, and then two more doors. There were the third level and the black cells. Apparently, Tyrion Lannister briefly sent the Grand Maester there during his tenure as Hand of the King. Myrcella had told him about that.

The thought of his beloved brought again painful memories. He thought that killing the people responsible for her death would make things easier for him, but it didn’t. It didn’t ease the pain, quite the opposite. He felt it more acutely than ever. The black cells were even smaller than those of the second level, and without window. Whoever ended up here was doomed to spend days without a single shade of light as long as the king or the queen wanted. However, this was still not Trystane’s final destination.

They arrived at a door with three locks again. On the other side was another door with four locks. There, Beron stopped.

“Waiting here as usual, my prince?” he asked.

“Yes, I am.”

“Better that it stays that way. I’ll be right back.”

He unlocked, opened and locked again the door, leaving Trystane alone, like every time. The prince of Dorne sat behind a simple table, and there he waited, like always. After a waiting that lasted several minutes, Beron finally came back with Goza. The guardian responsible for the fourth level of the dungeons was fitted for it. His face was scarred in many places, and so were his arms, and he was missing one eye. He sat roughly before Trystane.

“Any news?” the young prince asked.

Goza grunted, his only cold eye on Trystane. “Nothing. Dornish people are quite resilient. I’m torturing them for days and still they say nothing. I kill their friends right in front of their eyes, and they say nothing. I’m beginning to wonder if they are men.”

Trystane exchanged a look with Beron, then stared back at Goza. The man who was responsible of the torture in King’s Landing was so twisted and deformed that Trystane was wondering if Goza was human at all. To hear him ask if Dornish people were human was kind of ironic.

“How many died today?” Trystane asked, dreading the answer.

“Two, but I still have about fifteen of them left. Though I’m starting to doubt we will ever get anything out of them.”

Trystane sighed. “Do whatever is necessary. We need to know what Lord Yronwood is preparing.”

“Aye.”
Goza walked away back to the fourth level. Beron locked the door behind him, like always. “This man scares me, and normally nothing scares me,” the chief guardian said.

“You’re not alone,” Trystane said. “Let’s go back to the surface.”

Like always when he walked back to the surface, a sickening feeling grew inside Trystane’s belly. His father had ordered people to be tortured before, but Trystane never did before he arrived in King’s Landing. What was worse in all that was the fact he had his own people tortured, men who took Lord Yronwood and his allies’ side. They were made prisoners since the war inside King’s Landing started. He was fighting along the Tyrells against his own countrymen.

Back to the surface, he wished a good day to Beron, for what good it did.

“We see each other tomorrow, like always?” he asked Trystane.

“Like always,” Trystane replied with a flat voice.

Trystane walked back to the small council chamber. He had to think about another strategy. On his way, he got information about the fight going at Visenya’s Hill. The two armies were still fighting over the hill. None managed to get the advantage so far. The battle was at a standstill.

Trystane looked at the map, trying to see a way to get out of this situation. They lost their small numerical advantage with the many Tyrell soldiers who died on Rhaenys’s Hill. Darkness was closing on them now, and if Anders Yronwood managed to make some kind of alliance with the criminal gangs of King’s Landing, then huge problems were to be expected. These criminals, even if some of them were only poachers or thieves, knew how to hide in the city and when to attack the people when they expected it the less. Movements between points of battle and strategic positions, even in the main streets, would get difficult. Trystane already abandoned Flea Bottom long ago, ordering the City Watch to help them in their fight against the rebels. King’s Landing was now a battlefield with two main enemies, while small groups tried to feed on the leftovers.

He could remove forces from less important positions. When he thought about it, the Mud Gate was almost useless, though there was of course still the danger of not controlling masses of refugees trying to get into the city. He could probably reduce the garrisons at non vital positions and assign them to taking the remaining gates still not under their control, then his plan of starving the enemy should work. For that however, he first needed to make sure Visenya’s Hill would remain in his control.

He was thinking about the number of men he would have to move when Margaery Tyrell walked in. He was surprised to see her. She almost never left her rooms since she came from Storm’s End.

“Lady Margaery. I’m glad to see you out of your chambers,” he told her.

“Thanks, Trystane. I couldn’t remain behind the same door forever.” She indicated the map with her chin. “What’s the situation?”

“Difficult.” That was understatement.

“You remember that after your cousin killed Lord Ashford, you came to see me and asked me to make sure by father’s men would remain quiet, so that we could avoid an escalation of tension between our two kingdoms?”

“Yes, I remember.”

“And I succeeded, temporarily. I managed to convince the men of my country to wait, to trust you, and they did. And now here we are today, fighting together.”

“Yes,” Trystane acknowledged.

“Fighting against your father’s bannermen.” She wore a sad expression. “I’m sorry.”

He said nothing more. Margaery Tyrell had nothing to blame her for. Her father may be arrogant and prone to make huge mistakes, but Margaery had done nothing wrong since she arrived in King’s Landing. Trystane even found a friend in her, in some sort of way. He managed to have a healthy friendly relationship with her, just like his uncle Oberyn and Ser Loras Tyrell did before they died. However, to the opposite of his uncle and her brother, they never went as far as to sleep together. The thought had never crossed Trystane’s mind until today, truth be told. Myrcella was still fresh to his mind. In some moments he still believed she was alive. Myrcella was the woman he loved and nothing less. Margaery was a friend, and nothing more. As for the queen he would marry after the war, she was his future wife, nothing more and nothing less.

“I believed I had no role left to play in this game,” Margaery said. “I had lost everything, and I didn’t see the usefulness to do anything. I believed no matter what I did, it wouldn’t change anything. Because I couldn’t save my own brother, or my friends. I couldn’t save my husband from his mother and himself. But I was wrong. I still have a role to play in this war. There’s still plenty I can do to stop it before it’s too late and more people die.”

“If you have a solution, I’m ready to listen,” Trystane told her.

She didn’t say anything for a moment. “There is one, but it comes with a price.”

“And what is it?” he asked, still looking at the map to find a winning strategy.

“You.”

He slowly turned his head toward her. “I beg your pardon.”

“She’s telling the truth, my prince.”

The sweet voice of Varys was unmistakable. Trystane stared at the man who stood at the end of the small council chamber, his face hidden in the shadows but the shape of his figure very clear.

“How long have you been there?” Trystane asked, angry.

“I just arrived, and so did they.” He pointed the opposite direction. Trystane turned his head again.

Margaery had opened the door. Four guards in the colors of House Tyrell walked in. Their swords remained in their scabbards, but they had their hands on their handles. They were ready to draw.

He looked at Margaery. Her face was one of guilt and apologizing.

“You’re betraying me?” Trystane asked her, unable to believe what was going on right now.

“No, Trystane. I’m saving you.”

“How? By turning me over to Lord Yronwood? By having me killed?”

“No. I chose these men myself. They are loyal to me. They are to bring you to the harbor. There’s a small boat waiting for you. You’ll use it to reach a ship that will bring you back to Planky Town.
From there you’ll be able to rally Sunspear.”

“You’re forcing me out of King’s Landing?” She nodded. “Why?”

“Because your men turned on you. After you sent them to Visenya’s Hill, they defected and joined the rebels. They turned against our men. The Hill just fell. I received the information right before I came here. We lost many men, and the City Watch gave up on us. Its men joined Lord Anders or disappeared in the alleys of the city.” The news choked Trystane out of his breath. “We are outnumbered. My father and his lieutenants don’t believe we can hold any position for long. The Red Keep is isolated.”

“I beg you to listen to reason, my prince,” the eunuch said, leaving the darkness. “Lord Yronwood accepted to lay down his sword and to convince his fellow Dornishmen to do the same if we sent you away from the capital and you never came back.”

“He talked to you?”

“I organized a meeting between him and Lady Margaery about a week ago.”

Trystane looked at Margaery Tyrell again. She said nothing. She only kept the same contrite expression. Anger flared in his mind. “You prepared this for a long time. You plotted to overthrow me all this time.”

“This was a plan for in case things would go horribly wrong. I only planned to use it in last resort, and I’m afraid it’s time to use it now.”

“You betrayed me.”

“No. I’m trying to put an end to this bloodbath and to save your life. Anders Yronwood doesn’t want to kill you. He knows he would incur your father’s wrath if he did that, and that Daenerys Targaryen would help him to destroy House Yronwood until nothing is left of it. He wants to humiliate you, show to the world that you were unable to maintain peace in King’s Landing, unable to rule, and to let everyone remember that you murdered your cousins.”

“I didn’t murder them.”

“You killed two of them in front of many witnesses, and the third died in very strange circumstances when you were present. Lord Yronwood only wants to humiliate the Martells. He wants to take his revenge.”

“Revenge for what?” It immediately dawned on him. “His grandfather.” He looked at the ceiling.

“He didn’t forget how your uncle Oberyn killed him.”

“That was so long ago. I have nothing to do with that.”

“Your brother neither.”

Trystane felt his heart pumping more blood. “What do you mean?”

“I don’t know, Trystane. Maybe there is more to your brother Quentyn’s death than you believe, but I’m not sure.”

No, that couldn’t be. Quentyn died in an accident while he was a ward at Yronwood. Was it possible that Lord Yronwood murdered him? To avenge his grandfather? Her father would certainly have known if that was the case.

“Lord Yronwood knows that if he keeps fighting with the rebels, he will lose everything,” Lady Margaery explained. “Daenerys will execute him and hunt his house forever. Unlike in the First Dornish War, Daenerys will not be alone like Aegon and his sisters were. She will have the support of your father and of many other houses to destroy the Yronwoods and their allies. Lord Yronwood only joined the rebels some time after the fights began. By helping to bring back the peace and by punishing the Dornish who rebelled first, he will reinstate himself and keep his seat on the small council. His only condition for his help is your departure. You will be branded a kinslayer, Trystane, you will be seen as a coward, but you will be alive. Your father already lost his first son. Don’t make him lose the second. Anyway, there’s nothing left for you here. All your men turned on you.”

Trystane wandered his eyes from Margaery to Varys to the Tyrell guards. “I suppose I don’t have a choice.”

“No, you don’t. I’m sorry Trystane. I’m tired of all these deaths, of Cersei, the Sparrows, the Dornish or even my father’s men trying to control this city and killing everyone who stands in their way. I’m done with it. If any of your bannermen turn against the Martells in Dorne, I’ll convince my father to help you if that is your wish.”

Trystane couldn’t believe it was happening. All his men, all the people who came from Dorne, turned against him. How was it possible? “Why did they desert?” he asked aloud.

“For the same reason Robb Stark lost half of his men after he executed Rickard Karstark,” the Spider said. “You’re not their prince anymore in their eyes.”

He stared at her. “I will not forget this.”

“I know. I’m sorry, but that’s the only way to prevent more people from dying and to prevent you from dying.”

He scoffed. “I’m surprised you care so much about me.”

“It’s not only for you and the people that I’m doing it. I’m doing it for Tommen.”

“Tommen?” He didn’t understand. “What does Tommen Baratheon have to see with that?”

“His sister wouldn’t want you to die, and neither would he.”

Trystane said nothing. The words didn’t come out. Finally, his feet brought him to the Tyrell guards who led him out of the small council chamber, then out of the Red Keep.

As he travelled the silent city thrown into the dark, he thought about his father who sent him to Daenerys with a mission. He failed. Everyone turned on him. He kept his face well hidden under the cloak he wore, to avoid people from recognizing him. The guards who escorted him wore similar cloaks to hide their weapons and their armor. Not that they were in any danger. Fires could still be seen on Visenya’s Hill far away. The Dornish were probably still asserting their control over the place. This would keep them too busy to notice five people at the other side of the city going to the harbor.

Like Margaery promised, a small boat was waiting for him and the men escorted him. They took the boat and rowed to a large ship that was waiting for them in the bay. The ship had Redwyne sails. Trystane was welcomed by the first officer of the ship and given his own cabin. Then the captain gave the order to set sail, and Trystane Martell left King’s Landing like a thief in the night.

Chapter End Notes

And Margaery becomes a player again. How that will play in the end remains to be seen.

Chapter Notes

Let's see how Sansa fares after the brutal (but probably well deserved) death of Littlefinger.

We discover who are the people who saved her.

SANSA XXXIV

The house was half in ruin. Part of the roof had collapsed, the chimney was threatening to fall as well, and the door had been smashed for what looked like a long time. Sansa waited outside, standing next to the woman with blue eyes and long black hair. The half-opened door slammed completely open as the man with white hair and yellow eyes came out.

“No one’s here. It will do for tonight. I’ll go and fetch some wood.”

Without another word, he walked away. Sansa attached her horse to a pole and the woman who rescued her did the same. She walked inside the house and Sansa followed her. The interior was no better than the exterior, but Sansa wouldn’t complain. One week and a half ago, she could have become as Littlefinger’s unwilling mistress. The thought of it made her sick. She wouldn’t complain about her situation. If she had any reason to complain, it was about her daughter.

“Still thinking about her?” the other woman asked, as if she read into her thoughts.

“I’m worried,” Sansa answered.

“I understand. I’ve been in your position before, but contrarily to me, you have no reason to be worried. Because your daughter will not die.”

“How can you say that, Kinvara?”

The High Priestess, the woman who saved her from Baelish and Harrold Arryn back at the Vale, had been poking around since they entered, looking for food or anything useful. She stopped her searching and looked directly to Sansa.

“Because I know it.”

“How can you know that? By looking into a fire?”

“I only know. You have to trust me.”

“Trust you? You… you serve Daenerys Targaryen, a queen who wants to defeat my cousin. Why should I trust you?”

“Because your husband and I serve the same queen now.”

She already told her that. “How can I be sure you’re telling the truth?”
“You’ll be sure soon enough, once you see him again.”

“When?”

The woman smiled. “Soon.”

Sansa sighed in exasperation. “How can I know that you won’t kill me?”

“If I wanted to kill you, I would have done it a long time ago, Sansa.”

“Like you would have killed Littlefinger a long time ago, I suppose. You waited for our wedding night to kill him.”

“I needed to wait for the right moment. And considering I saved you from being raped by two men, I think you could show me some gratitude, Sansa. I know what it is, being forced to lay with men you don’t want, and believe me when I say you don’t want to experience it.”

“He said he would kill my daughter!”

“He was lying.”

“How can you know that?”

“Because I know the men like him. They will say anything that serves their interests. He said that because he wanted to live, nothing more. Your daughter is still alive, somewhere, and we’re going to find her.”

“How?”

Kinvara made a pause before she answered. “First, we’ll get you to safety.”

Again, this woman avoided the question. “Why would you help me in the first place?”

“Because I do what my lord commands. And Daenerys Stormborn promised your husband to save you both, your daughter and you.”

The other priest, Geralt, came into the room at this moment with a load of woods. He dropped it on the floor. “You should talk louder, this way you’ll be sure every fat lord in the Vale hears you.” He picked their three gourds. Kinvara previously emptied them into a cauldron where she was tossing away some vegetables now. “I’ll go and fill these.”

Again, Sansa was alone with the other woman. Like every time they stopped, Kinvara proceeded to prepare some stew. She must have prepared their escape very carefully, for they had more than enough provisions for a long journey. Sansa saw her toss several vegetables in the cauldron and boil them all together. She had never known much about cooking. They had cooks everywhere she lived, and never needed to bother how the food she ate was prepared. As Lady of Casterly Rock, she had to oversee the kitchen’s staff, but nothing more. She seldom went there and left the stewards to take care of most of the matters there.

Kinvara filled a bowl and gave it to her. She filled two others and began to eat her own while she left another one for Geralt. Sansa ate with appetite. The stew was good, and its warmth made her feel better.

“It’s a chance we were there to help you. If you had tried to fend for yourself, I don’t believe you would have survived one day,” the woman told her.
Sansa didn’t feel flattered by the remark. “Well, it’s more my sister’s thing. She’s better at surviving in the nature on her own,” she replied.

Kinvara nodded, while continuing to eat. “Your mother should have taught you tricks to survive alone.”

“My mother is dead,” Sansa replied sharply.

“I know. I’m sorry. I know it’s not easy to lose your family.” For a moment, she said nothing. “That stew you’re eating, Sansa, a long time ago, my own mother taught me how to do it. She died not long after.”

Sansa found herself pitying the woman sitting in front of her all of a sudden. “I’m sorry.”

The priestess pushed it aside. “It was a long time ago. I barely remember her. I was very young when it happened, far younger than you. This stew is one of the very few things I remember from her, mostly because I had to make a lot of it after she was gone.”

The priestess kept picking at her stew with a spoon, while looking in the flames that kept the content of the cauldron hot. She often did this.

“I don’t believe my mother thought that I would ever end up in this kind of situation. I don’t think she ever believed I would need anything for this kind of things,” Sansa tried to explain.

“Of course not. When you’re highborn, you have to worry about what you will eat, what you will wear, and what you will do today. I wasn’t highborn, Sansa. My worries were quite different. I had to worry whether I would have something to eat and wear every day. At six, I had to work only to make sure my family could survive. That’s the reality of the common people. We don’t have servants. When we have nothing to eat, we must find it ourselves, or grow it. When we have nothing to wear, we must make it. When it’s winter and there’s a hole in our walls, we have to repair it ourselves. There’s not someone else to do it in our place. We have to hunt and farm for our own food, to gather wood to build our own fire, to clean the place where we live ourselves. When we need something to survive, we must get it, one way or another. That’s the way of the world. Your mother never had to face that kind of situation. She never lacked of anything.”

Kinvara put aside her stew and looked straight at Sansa. “I know I seem rude, Sansa. You worry about your daughter, and I understand that. I’ve been there, me too. But your daughter is not going to die. You will see her again. And even if you didn’t, you have a life better than most of the people in this country, so try to enjoy it.”

“How could I enjoy it? I lost my daughter, I almost got raped by two men, all my family is in danger. I lost my parents, two of my brothers. All the people I care about are dead or in danger.”

“You think this is any different for anyone in this country? You were almost raped, but I can tell you that more than three women out of four in your land didn’t have the chance to escape this treatment like you did. Everyone in this country lost people they love. Some lose everything, but you haven’t. You still have a family who’s alive, and a husband who’s ready to do anything to find you, and not because you are his wife, or because your marriage made him rich, or because he needs you for an alliance of any sort, but because he loves you. Very few women have this chance. You lost people you loved, I know, but everyone in this country lose people they love every day, whether it is to war, to disease, to accidents, or because they are killed by someone. You have more than almost everyone else. So even if you lose Joanna, you shouldn’t stop living for this. Trust me, your fate could have been much worse.”
How encouraging. “I was there when my father died. I begged Joffrey to spare him, and instead he called for his head. He had him killed right in front of me. Does everyone go through that?”

“Do you believe in a god, Sansa, or in gods?” Kinvara asked after a moment.

“I worship the Seven, and the Old Gods,” she replied defiantly. The priestess didn’t seem to show any judgement.

“Do you think your gods would like you to stop living because people around you died?”

“Why do you care? They are false gods for you. You worship the Lord of Light.”

“I do, but it’s better to believe in something that is false than to not believe at all. Besides, your gods are not as false as anyone might think.”

That wasn’t something she expected from a woman who served the same god than Melisandre, the woman who burned Shireen Baratheon alive. “How can you say that?”

“Because different faiths can share many similarities. Do you pray often?”

“I used to pray often.” Now she prayed less.

“Prayers can be useful, and very helpful. Though some say that if you offend your brother, then a prayer will suffice to get your pardon. First apologize to your brother, and then do your prayer.”

Sansa frowned. These words were familiar to her. “Where did you hear this?”

“Book of the Mother.” She smiled wickedly.

“I thought…”

“Following the Lord of Light doesn’t mean I cannot read the holy texts of other faiths. And there are passages in the holy texts of my own faith that are quite similar to this one. Each faith tells its followers to be happy and to enjoy life. I suggest you do it, when you’re reunited with those you love.”

Sansa shook her head. “You seem so certain that I will see those I love again.”

“You will, and you will see all of them again. Trust me. Now, if you’ll excuse me.”

Kinvara stared into the flames, deeply absorbed by whatever she saw in. Sansa took a closer look at her while she was in her trance. The High Priestess of the Red Temple of Volantis wasn’t particularly beautiful when you looked closely at her, but she wasn’t ugly either. Sansa witnessed her talent as a singer during the wedding. She wore plain clothes, more befitting a peasant than a noble woman. She said herself that she wasn’t highborn, though her language betrayed her level of education. To the simple eye, to the person who looked at her without getting past the surface, she was an ordinary woman. Sansa thought so when she saw her for the first time. At first, she was only a servant, then a naïve servant interested in Harrold Arryn, then a very good singer, then an assassin, a Red Priestess, and finally the High Priestess. Appearances could fool many people, and Sansa was fooled like everyone else.

She brought her hand to her neck, where the red stone was kept in place by the chain. That was her main protection right now. Kinvara gave it to her back at Runestone, before they escaped. Thanks to it, they walked past everyone they came across as they proceeded to leave the castle. Whether they were servants, soldiers, lords or ladies, they let them pass without giving them much attention. The necklace changed Sansa’s appearance. She didn’t want to believe it first, but after she reluctantly put the chain in place around her neck and looked at her in the glass, she saw that it was no lie. Back in the room where Kinvara killed Petyr Baelish and Harrold Arryn with a crossbow, Sansa saw a perfect stranger staring at her. The woman who looked at her in the glass was about twenty years older than her, with curly blond hair, green eyes, a square face and a bosom more generous than hers. That was the appearance she had since their escape. According to Kinvara, as long as she wore this necklace, she would have this appearance for anyone who looked at her. Only those with magical powers could see through it.

Sansa was still unsure of what to think of the High Priestess. She had been shocked when Kinvara told her she was a Red Priestess, but even more so when she was told that she was in fact the leader of the Red Priests, something like a High Septon for them. Sansa had some doubts about the woman. She was rude and sometimes looked exasperated by her, but at the same time Kinvara saved her from the people who captured her, and more. Two days after they left Runestone, a patrol of men with the sigil of House Corbray had come upon them. It just happened the knight who led them was present at her wedding. He didn’t recognize Sansa, for she was hidden by the disguise created by the necklace, but he did recognize Kinvara. Her song had made quite an impression. Kinvara and Geralt had fought the six men and managed to kill them all, keeping her safe.

Geralt was quite different from his High Priestess. He spoke very little, only when it was necessary, and always with a rough and grave voice. He was very well-built and strong. Sansa saw him snap the neck of a man without effort. He reminded her of the Hound in some way, especially with the many scars he was bearing. He always had two swords with him. Sometimes he fought with the two of them in each hand. Other times, he didn’t hesitate to slit the enemy’s throat with his dagger. Sansa had tried to engage a conversation with him during the first days of their escape, but without success. As a result, she ended up mostly talking with Kinvara.

If she understood well, Geralt was a Red Priest, but he didn’t look like the sort who would preach to people. He seemed to be Kinvara’s personal shield, though from what Sansa saw, the High Priestess knew how to defend herself. When they were intercepted, she stabbed a man in the heart without hesitation, and there was also something strange that happened. A soldier was charging her, his sword brandished over his head, ready to kill her. She just raised a hand and the man had let his sword drop on the ground, placing his arms before his eyes, as if something blinded him. Geralt had killed him two seconds later, bringing his sword down on his hip, cutting his legs from the rest of his body.

Their group didn’t make for a very happy company. As if to emphasize this, Geralt just walked in, dropped the now full flasks and walked out after taking the bowl Kinvara prepared for him. He went to the door, standing guard like he did every night. Sansa never saw him sleep when she thought about it. Kinvara didn’t sleep much either. She spent most of her nights staring at the flames, like she was doing right now. Sansa wasn’t sure if she liked the woman. After all, Littlefinger was dead and Sansa escaped her captivity thanks to her, but despite the fact she tried to comfort Sansa, there was something in the woman’s behaviour she didn’t like. It was as if she was warm and cold with Sansa at the same time, as if she cared about her, but despised her, or rather saw her as inferior or worthless. She didn’t understand this behaviour. The only other person who had a similar way to behave in her presence was… the Hound. Sandor Clegane, the man who cared for her, but also who mocked her because she still behaved like a little girl who was waiting for her knight in shining armor to come and rescue her. Was that the same with Kinvara? But why would she care for her? There was something very odd with this priestess, and she had a way to speak with Sansa that left her dumbfounded.

“Kinvara, may I ask you a question?”
“You may.” The High Priestess didn’t lift her eyes from the fire. Sansa decided to go forward with her question all the same.

“You said that you’ve been where I was before. What did you mean by that?”

Her gaze remained on the fire, but she answered to Sansa all the same. “Most women get pregnant in their life, Sansa, whether they are married or not.”

“You have children?”

“Long before I was High Priestess, before I entered the orders, I was someone else. And yes, the girl I was back then had a child.”

“What happened to him?”

A long silence followed. Finally, Kinvara turned her head to look at Sansa. “She’s gone.”

“It was a girl?”

“Yes.” She turned back her attention towards the fire.

“What happened?”

Sansa saw the priestess close her eyes, then inhale and exhale deeply before she replied. “The girl I once was lost everyone she loved and everyone she cared about a long time ago. But her daughter, her baby, she didn’t lose her. She abandoned her.”

Sansa’s eyes widened in horror. Before she could say anything, Kinvara spoke again.

“Don’t judge this too quickly. The girl was alone, without anyone to help her. She had a choice. Whether she left her baby to die, or she died with her baby. She made her choice, and she lived. Her daughter didn’t.”

“Couldn’t you ask for help?” Sansa asked after some hesitation.

“There was no help available. She was alone, I’m telling you.”

“What about the father?”

“He never knew. Even if he had been aware of her existence, I’m not sure he might have done anything. Sometimes, destiny demands some sacrifices.”

The thought of a father abandoning his children revolted and disgusted Sansa. Kinvara looked at her again.

“This daughter didn’t even live for a year. Yours will live much longer, believe me. She will not die.”

An idea came to Sansa’s mind. “Is this why you’re helping me?”

The High Priestess had already gone back to looking at the flames. “I do what my lord commands.” Kinvara smiled. “We are close. We must leave now.”

“Now? I thought we were stopping for the night.”

“So did I, but the Lord of Light just showed me another way. Come.”
The Red Priestess quickly grabbed what she brought with her and walked outside the ruined house. Sansa followed her. The other priest was leaning against the trunk of a tree, staring at the horizon, probably looking for anything unusual that could suggest a danger. His superior interrupted his trance.

“Geralt, we’re leaving.”

“Already?” She didn’t give him an answer. He just nodded and prepared the horses. Kinvara placed her bags on her own horse, then turned to Sansa.

“You must give me back the necklace.”

“Why? I though it was necessary to protect me.”

“True, but you don’t need it anymore.”

The palm of her hand was waiting. Sansa didn’t believe this was a good idea to do as she was told. She still had this odd feeling about the High Priestess. When she looked at her face, Kinvara made a sign that meant she could trust her. She said that repeatedly since they met, and so far Sansa had to admit the two priests had been very helpful, but she couldn’t shake the feeling there was more to it. Kinvara’s explanations didn’t satisfy her. Her instincts told her she couldn’t trust this woman. Her mind, however, and every rational part of her being, told her she had no reason to mistrust her. So Sansa removed the necklace and gave it back to the priestess.

As soon as she was free of it, she felt as if a weight was lifted from her. For the first time in more than a week, she didn’t have the necklace around her neck. She felt lighter than before. She didn’t have a glass to look at her, but she supposed she looked again like herself. She climbed on her horse and prepared herself for departure. Geralt was about to take the lead of their small group.

“Wait, Geralt. You will follow me this time.”

When Sansa turned her head to look at Kinvara who just spoke, she saw an entirely different person. This woman noticed her dumbfounded expression and placed her hand on her neck. Sansa saw the necklace she just removed, and then she understood. Kinvara had gone from a peasant looking young woman to a woman in the thirties with thick red robes. Her black straight hair that fell behind her back was replaced by brown curly hair falling over her shoulders and her eyes, blue at the origin, were now an intense green. She shot a wicked smile to Sansa and rode forward. After a moment of hesitation, Sansa followed suit, and Geralt closed the march.

As they progressed through the land, a light snow kept falling. Sansa tightened the cloak around her shoulders. That reminded her of her time in the Neck, back when she always felt cold and sick. She had thought that she wasn’t used to the northern weather anymore, but now that she looked back to it, she supposed her state might have been simply caused by the pregnancy. This time however, it was definitely the weather. Winter had come upon the southern kingdoms. She wondered if the snows had reached Casterly Rock yet.

They rode slowly. Kinvara and Geralt showed no sign of strain or that they felt cold. They just kept riding, without talking. Darkness slowly settled. Thankfully, the moon was high and plain, which gave them a good view around them. The path they followed led to a small forest. They had done less than a mile through it when Kinvara stopped. Sansa followed her example, and so did Geralt.

Geralt instantly drew up one of his swords while going on his feet, just like Kinvara. Then nothing happened. Sansa didn’t like it. She didn’t dare to leave her horse.

A rock flew and Geralt stopped it with his arm. Cries and shouts of war came from all around them. Torches were lit and moved toward their position. Then a great light surged and blinded Sansa. After it disappeared the instant that followed and her eyes grew accustomed to the darkness again, she saw the enemy, about half a dozen men, fleeing away from one side. On the other side, it was a different story. Geralt was fighting, cutting down every man who dared to approach him. About ten of them were already lying on the ground.

“Stop!” roared a booming voice. The other attackers stood their ground and remained in position. They kept their weapons ready, but didn’t dare to advance again, except for one. He held a torch high and came through the bunch of men who assaulted them. They all wore furs and helmets with two horns. Most of them had gruffy beards. They reminded Sansa of some of her father’s bannermen that she saw in her childhood, those who lived in the far North, close to the Wall. Geralt was about to stop him.

The savage man looked at the Red Priest. “The white wolf knows how to fight.” Then he looked at Kinvara, then finally directed his torch towards Sansa. At the light of the fire, she thought she saw smile. “The girl grew up.”

He kept smiling at her. While looking at him, Sansa found something familiar about this man. And then she remembered the day she saved Ser Dontos Hollard, and who she met for the first time right after she convinced Joffrey to spare him. Most importantly, she remembered who was following him.

Next chapter: Tyrion
“Five days of march, that’s it?”

“It is,” confirmed Grey Worm.

Tyrion looked at the falcons positioned north-east to their army. They were close, very close.

“We leave at first light tomorrow,” Tyrion declared.

“Yes, my lord.”

After Grey Worm walked out, Tyrion was alone in his personal tent. An army of thirty thousand men was assembled by Harrold Arryn and now marched against them. The Lord of the Vale had more time to raise an army this time, and he also brought some of his men from the North back when he returned home. As a result, he had a stronger army in number than Tyrion had. Too bad the young man couldn’t live long enough to lead it into battle.

On their way through the Vale, Tyrion had received the surrender of many lords. The sight of a dragon discouraged many of them to resist. Lord Vance Corbray had called for every lord in the Vale to take arms against the foreign invaders, but so far, there were as many of them who dropped the sword than those who raised it. Tyrion didn’t lose his time. He didn’t organize any siege against those who refused to surrender. He only devastated their lands on his way, allowing the hill tribes and the Dothrakis to satisfy their desire for plunder, while sparing the lands of the lords who kindly bent their knee. He also forced the lords who accepted to swear fealty to Daenerys Targaryen to provide men for his army.

Tyrion Lannister was now at the head for an army strong of twenty thousand men. If the alliance to free the North and fight the White Walkers had been uneasy with Lannisters, river lords, Northerners, Knights of the Vale, wildlings and even Hightowers, this one was wildfire ready to blow at any moment. A third of the army was made up of Unsullied. They were the ones who caused no problem and helped him to keep the other factions from each other’s throats. The Dothrakis made for another third of the men he commanded. They were wild and difficult to control, and Tyrion almost regretted each time he gave them leave to ravage the lands of a resisting lord. The hill tribes were barely better. They were undisciplined, ready for a fight at any moment, looking for trouble among themselves, but also with the soldiers of the Vale and the Dothrakis. Three thousand hill tribe men had been difficult to control in the Riverlands, and now Tyrion had four thousand with him. As for the few men from the Vale who fought in his army, no more than one thousand, they got along with no one, but since their situation was precarious, they kept for themselves and tried to avoid hill tribes, Unsullied and Dothrakis all alike.

After the Gates of the Moon fell, their column was attacked by some men of the hill tribes. The Unsullied stopped them and made one prisoner. Lucky for the prisoner, since his name was Shagga, son of Dolf. Had it been the Dothrakis he fell upon, they would have killed him without second thought. Instead, Tyrion reunited with an old friend, as much as he could be called an old friend. Through hard negotiations, as far as they could be called negotiations with a leader of the Stone Crows, which included a few insight jokes concerning the difficulty to feed Unsullied’s cock to the goats, Tyrion convinced Shagga to join him, and to convince as many tribes as possible to fight with him against the Knights of the Vale.

Tyrion gained the help of the hill tribes by promising them lands in the Vale. Not every land, but some of them. The lords who initially refused to surrender on their passage would be the main contributors. Tyrion knew he promised a long time ago to the hill tribes he would give them the Vale, and a Lannister always paid his debts. Shagga was quick to remind him his promise when they met. However, Tyrion countered that since he accepted his father’s money in exchange of returning to the Vale, he somehow gave up his claim to the fertile lands of the Vale of Arryn. Tyrion knew he couldn’t give the whole Vale to the hill tribes, but certainly he could give them a part of it. And when he showed Viserion to Shagga, the leader of the Stone Crows understood it was better to not upset Daenerys Targaryen and her new Hand. The other leaders, even Timett son of Timett, seemed to understand it too. Chella wasn’t there to see him since she died some time ago. Her sons now led the Black Ears, and just like her they wore necklaces of ears, though none had as many as she had.

The twenty thousand Unsullied, Dothrakis, men of the hill tribes and the Vale would meet the army of Vance Corbray in approximately five days. It could be four or six, depending on the speed of their armies and the weather, but they would meet very soon. Tyrion knew the Knights of the Vale favored battle in open field, in plains or valleys, for it was there they had the real advantage. In the mountains, where the country was more appropriate for ambush, surprise attacks and hiding, the hill tribes were in better position.

Overall, however, Tyrion wouldn’t say that Lord Corbray had the better hand. There was disorder in the Vale since the death of Harrold Arryn. Many lords who gave up the fight and swore fealty to the new queen did so because they didn’t trust Vance Corbray. Vance Corbray’s army might seem united when his was a mess, but it wasn’t the case. Corbray would have his own problems to deal inside his army as he marched against Tyrion. Furthermore, the discipline of the Unsullied couldn’t be matched. They would do as they were told, no matter what it was. The same couldn’t be said about the men fighting in the army of the Vale. Dothrakis were unruly, but didn’t fear death, and neither did the hill tribes. Two third of the army might be unaccustomed to winter, but the hill tribes and the men of the Vale with them didn’t have this problem. Almost all of Tyrion’s army was made of seasoned warriors, people used to fight, while a large part of Corbray’s men would be green boys. Even better was the element of surprise. Tyrion had studied the characteristics of his men very closely during the last few days, and he thought he knew how to get the better out of them. He also knew the forces and the weaknesses of the forces of the Vale. Corbray didn’t know how the Dothrakis or the Unsullied fought. As for the hill tribes, he talked with Shagga and Timett and had a good surprise in reserve for whoever would come on their way. And he had Viserion, of course. Not to mention the two Red Priests who followed the army. If they were as powerful as those who fought at Winterfell, then the progeny of the Andal invaders was about to realize that the Seven wouldn’t protect them.

The sun disappeared from the horizon for quite some time. The nights were longer, coming sooner and ending later. Tyrion should have gone to sleep, but he didn’t. His sleep was plagued with nightmares about the people he loved. He saw Jaime being beheaded, or even burned alive. He saw Sansa being raped by Harrold Arryn, or Joanna being carried into the sea by the man he thought to be his father for a long time. The worst of all had been when he dreamed that he ordered Viserion to burn Jaime himself. Rather than face this, Tyrion decided to drink, read, and look at maps and think about strategies and tactics. It gave him more rest than nightmares. Sometimes he invited Shagga to drink with him. Damn, he missed Bronn and Pod. Sometimes he dreamed about them too, seeing their deaths again. He also consulted the two priests, Jolee and Juhani, in case their fires told them anything.

He stared into the fire that was lit in his tent.

“I wonder how they can see anything into the flames,” he wondered aloud.

Back in his childhood, he would light fires in the bowels of Casterly Rock and imagine his father or his sister burning in it. Sometimes he imagined the fire came from the mouth of a dragon, so much that he had the impression an actual dragon was there with him. His fascination for them might come from his real father. The shape of the dragon appeared, the flames licking the outline of his figure. There was someone on his back. Tyrion first thought that was him, and that he imagined himself riding Viserion, but he realized the person on the dragon had long hair flying in the air. Then the outline of another figure started to appear, and as soon as Tyrion blinked, it was all gone. He rubbed his eyes. He had to be very tired.

“Congratulations, Tyrion. Not only you talk to yourself now, but you see things that are not there. You must be short of ideas to think about something else than Sansa.”

Saying the word was enough to feel a weight adding on his shoulders. He tried to occupy his mind with anything to not think too much about Sansa and Joanna. They could be anywhere. He tried to get answers from the lords and landed knights he met on their way, but none could provide any information. Littlefinger covered his tracks very well.

He returned his attention to the map, imagining everything that could happen on their way to Gulltown, any way the battle could go, trying to foresee the enemy’s actions. He ate a little and drank much as he did so. It was straining for his mind, but Tyrion Lannister worked on his mind for over thirty years and he would be damned if it wasn’t strong enough to think of war and battles instead of a wife and child. At some point, he began to doze off.

It was the timely arrival of one of Grey Worm’s lieutenants that saved him from slumber.

“Shagga says he needs to speak with you,” he told Tyrion.

“Shagga? I thought he and his men were scouting ahead of us. What does he want?”

“Speak with you.”

Tyrion sighed. “I see. I won’t have more clarifications.”

At least, no matter what Shagga wanted to see him for, it would keep his mind occupied and away from thoughts of his wife for a little while. The encampment was largely asleep safe for the men standing guard. Fire camps and torches lit the spaces between the tents. Shagga was waiting for him at a corner between two alleys.

“So, mighty Shagga son of Dolf, what is it that is so important to take Tyrion Lannister out of his bed?” he quipped.

“I know, I know. A Lannister always pays his debts. There’s no need to remind me of what I owe you again.”
“You owe me more.”

Shagga stepped aside, inviting Tyrion to turn to his right. Tyrion shook his head, exhaustion taking its toll on him. He turned on the other alley and saw a group of Stone Crows standing with torches. But it wasn’t them who attracted his attention. It was someone in the middle of them. Before he could say anything, she rushed and threw herself at him, burying her face in his shoulder.

“Sansa.”

“I thought I might never see you again. There were people who told me you were dead.” She was crying.

He pulled a little and took her face into his hands. That was her, no doubt. He wasn’t dreaming. She was there, tears falling from her blue eyes along her cheeks, of joy or sadness he couldn’t tell.

“That’s all right. I’m here. I haven’t been far from dying, but I’m not dead.”

She made a nervous laugh, just like he did. Then she kissed him. Tyrion was taken aback by the kiss. Not that it was unusual for his wife to kiss him, but she just came out of nowhere when he expected her the least. Once the moment of surprise was gone, he returned the kiss and for the first time in months, Tyrion Lannister felt good, happy. For a moment, time slowed down and it was as if they were alone and the rest of the world didn’t exist. It was not meant to be last, for a great laughter exploded. Tyrion had to break their embrace and looked to Shagga to see him laughing to death.

“Well, I suppose I truly owe you a debt,” he shot at him. “Where did you find her?”

“It would be more appropriate to say that we found you.”

Tyrion realized at this moment that Sansa hadn’t been the only one who wasn’t a Stone Crow around. Another woman was standing in front of them, all dressed in red, her green eyes fixed on him.

“What are you doing here?” Then he noticed the presence of the Red Priest Geral next to the High Priestess Kinvara. “And I could ask you the same question. Shouldn’t you be in Essos right now?” Geral was banished by Daenerys after he killed someone during a parley at Moat Cailin.

“Be careful of what you say, Imp. If I was in Essos, your pretty wife might have been raped by a brothelkeeper,” the scarred priest retorted.

Tyrion turned to Sansa. She shook her head. “Nothing happened. They... they helped me to escape Runestone. They’re the ones who killed Harrold Arryn and Littlefinger.”

Tyrion stared back at the two priests. “You’re lucky my wife is safe and sound,” he shot to Geral. “Come,” he told his wife, and they left everyone else behind.

As soon as they were back in his personal tent, Tyrion gave Sansa some mulled wine to soothe her. He also took some for himself.

“Sansa, are you sure everything is alright?” he asked her.

“Yes, I’m fine.” She was shaking. “It’s just... I’m so happy to see you, but... No, I’m not fine at all. Joanna... I don’t know where she is.”

It was as if someone just dropped a bucket of cold water on him. “Let’s start with the beginning. Tell me what happened.”
And so Sansa began her tale, from the troubles at Winterfell until Shagga found her not far away from here. She told him she was separated from Joanna when she left the northern soil. Ever since, the only information she got about their daughter was what Petyr Baelish deigned to tell her, but she didn’t know if he was saying the truth. She told him about the wedding, and her near rape by Littlefinger. She almost broke into tears when she arrived at this part of her tale. She then went on with her rescue by Geralt and Kinvara and the days they spent riding until they were ambushed by Shagga’s men. Tyrion could see that Sansa was deeply affected by all this, but what scared her the most was that she had no idea of where Joanna was, or what might have befallen her. Littlefinger said before he died that he gave specific orders for Joanna to be killed if he came to pass away. When she told him that, Tyrion felt the envy to bring Littlefinger back from the dead only to torture him before he killed him again. And he would kill the man himself, the Old Way if necessary.

However, that wasn’t his main concern right now. His wife just escaped a second marriage. Harrold Arryn was lucky he was dead. But more than that, he had to keep his mind clear to find his daughter. Baelish could have hidden her anywhere, even in a brothel. The thought of his daughter growing up in this kind of place angered him. He visited more than enough whores in his life to know this was no place to raise a child.

“Sansa.” He knew that was a lot to ask from her, after she went through such an ordeal, but he had no choice. “After you left Winterfell, after you and Joanna were made prisoner, do you remember anything, even a small detail, something that might give you an idea of where Joanna might be?”

Sansa remained still for a time, not talking. “I don’t know. After we left Winterfell, I never saw her again. I don’t know where they brought her. She may still be in the North for what I know.”

“No. Baelish would keep her close to him, somewhere he could use her. She’s the heir to Casterly Rock. She’s too precious for him to keep her in the North. She must be in the Vale.”

Did he try to convince Sansa or himself, he wasn’t sure, but surely Littlefinger wouldn’t leave Joanna in the North. He had no allies there, and the White Walkers were closing on Winterfell at this time. Furthermore, except for the Vale, there was no place where Littlefinger truly had power now. He must have hidden her somewhere in the Vale. There was no other option.

“There’s something you must know, Tyrion. I heard conversations while I was their prisoner. Apparently, they had help. The Knights of the Vale, I mean. They had help. They weren’t alone in all this.”

“What do you mean? Someone from inside Winterfell helped them?” he asked.

“No. Well, maybe. I don’t know. I’m not sure they needed help from the inside. They were already in. But I heard them talk, and they said that Rolph Spicer and Serion Lannister helped them.”

“Serion Lannister and Rolph Spicer?” Tyrion asked very quietly.

“Yes. I don’t know how, but I heard them say that they had to thank them, or that it would never have been possible without them.”

Tyrion made an effort to remember certain things. Images came back to his mind, images of the day when he died. “When I was ambushed on my way to Winterfell, I saw some of my own men fighting amongst each other.” He closed his eyes, damning himself. “Among the men I was bringing back with me, some were serving the Lannisters of Lannisport.”

Serion Lannister, the eldest son of Reginald Lannister, Lord of Lannisport, had developed a certain hostility toward Tyrion after he stopped a plot that would have allowed him to marry his brother to the daughter of another lord against his father’s wishes. Tyrion hadn’t considered the heir to House Lannister of Lannisport as a major threat, but he knew Littlefinger had a talent to use the feelings and interests of people to do his dirty work. After all, he did use Arya Stark to get rid of Lysa Arryn.

Arya. He forgot about her. He went to the entrance and ordered one of the guards to bring Arya Stark immediately. She and Tyrion had the same determination to save Sansa, after all, and he should have sent someone to fetch her as soon as Sansa came back.

“Arya is here?” Sansa asked, surprised.

“Yes, she came with me.”

“And Bran? Jon? How are they?”

“They are well.” At least they were, the last time he saw them. “They’re fighting the White Walkers with the help of Daenerys Targaryen.”

Sansa looked at him for a moment without speaking. “So, it’s true? You serve her now?”

Tyrion sighed. “She saved Winterfell. The castle was under attack, and about to fall. She arrived just in time with her army to save it. She saved all your family, Sansa. And she sent me here so I could find you.”

“But, what’s going to happen to Jon?”

“He will join the Night’s Watch again once this is over. Anyway that’s what he wanted to do. Daenerys agreed to it. And don’t worry, she’s not going to do anything to you or any Stark. She’s different from Cersei. As long as we accept her as the queen, there will be no problem.”

Sansa sighed. “Well, I suppose anything is better than Cersei.”

“Sansa!”

His sister-in-law had arrived. She walked to Sansa and the two sisters hugged.

“You’re here,” Arya said.

“Yes, I’m here,” Tyrion’s wife replied.

“Is everything all right? Where is Joanna?”

Sansa didn’t answer. Tyrion did. “We don’t know yet where she is. She and Sansa were brought in two different places.”

“But we’re going to find her.”

“Of course, we will.”

“What if…?” Sansa didn’t finish her sentence. She couldn’t finish it. Tyrion approached and took her hands into his.

“We’re going to find her, Sansa. There’s no one who will get between us and our child.”

“And I’ll kill everyone who does,” Arya added. On this, Tyrion allowed himself to laugh a little.

“We may have track. Sansa heard conversations while she was a prisoner. It seems some of my bannermen took part to her kidnapping and the attempt of murder against me. More specifically, the Spencers and the Lannisters of Lannisport.”

“Lannisters? People of your own family tried to kill you?”

“They are a cadet branch, distant cousins who rule the city of Lannisport. They’re like the Karstarks for your family. I will send a raven to Genna and tell her to make inquiries, maybe prepare an intervention. If the Spencers had a hand in all this, then I might have to make a re-enactment of the Rains of Castamere.”

He looked to Sansa. She looked exhausted. He was too. Arya, on the other side, seemed fresh and ready for battle.

“I think it would be better for Sansa to rest,” he said.

“Aye, you’re right,” Arya agreed. “You’re tired, aren’t you?” she asked her sister.

“Yes, I am,” Sansa replied after a moment. She was breathing heavily, still taking a sip of wine from time to time.

“Do you want me to stay? I could stand guard for tonight,” she offered.

“No, Arya, it’s alright. You can go back to sleep.”

“Very well. Just ask if you need anything. We’ll talk more tomorrow.”

Arya hugged her sister one last time and she left. Tyrion was alone with his wife. “There are a few things I must do, Sansa. I will be back soon,” he told her.

“No, please. I… I just came back. I don’t want to lose you again.”

She was distressed. Who could blame her, after everything she went through, and the uncertainty concerning their daughter. Tyrion was worried as well, though he was very happy all the same to see his wife again. He cupped her cheeks with both his hands and looked straight into her eyes.

“Everything will be fine, Sansa. I promise.”

Again, tears fell from her eyes. “I was afraid I might never see you again.”

“I feared the same.” He kissed her tenderly on the mouth. “Come. You must rest.”

He led her to his bed. It wasn’t made for two people, but he wouldn’t let her anywhere far from him. He climbed into the bed with her, without caring to change his clothes. She buried her face into his chest and brought her arms around his neck, as if she was afraid he might somehow get away. There were other things Tyrion could have done tonight, with everything he just learned. He had to warn Genna at Casterly Rock, but also Daven in the North, about the betrayal of his bannermen. He also had to thank Kinvara and Geralta, but he decided he would do that tomorrow in the morning. He had been so afraid that he could never see the woman he loved again, and now here she was, and she needed him. He brought his hand to the back of her head. For the first time in what seemed to be forever, he slept with his wife. He kept an eye on her for most of the night. He supposed he was afraid too that she might disappear when he would wake up in the morning. Finally, he dozed off, for real this time. When he woke up, she was still there. He found his wife. Now he would find his daughter.
So, this was a chapter many people were waiting for. I hope it was worth the wait. I might not have extended on the reunion as much as I initially planned to, but from now on, Tyrion and Sansa are going to stay together. So every time you see a chapter told from their perspective, expect time for the power couple of this fanfiction.

Next chapter: Jon
They had stopped on the top of a mountain. The dragons were resting, and so were the men and women who travelled on their back. Their party was a mix of very different people. With Jon on Rhaegal had come Ser Beric Dondarrion, Thoros of Myr, two Northerners and two Free Folk warriors chosen by Toregg, Tormund’s eldest son. Now that his father was dead, he had taken the leadership of the Free Folk army, or what was left of them, though there were people who opposed his authority. That was the way of things among the Free Folk. With Daenerys Targaryen on Drogon had come mostly Red Priests, including Revan and Melisandre. Two other priestesses followed them. Ser Garlan Hightower, Lord Dickon Tarly and one of his men completed Drogon’s crew.

It had been almost two weeks now since they left Highpoint. Revan said they weren’t far from the place. Jon was surprised by the knowledge the Red Priest had of the lands north of the Wall. Even the Free Folk with him were impressed. Despite this, Jon wasn’t sure at all. They were going somewhere no living man had gone for the last eight thousand years. He would feel safer if Ghost was with him. He was forced to leave him behind at Highpoint.

They would only stop for an hour, no more time. It was decided they had to reach the site where the first White Walker was created as quickly as possible. So far, they hadn’t come across any wight or White Walker. That could either be good news or bad news. Jon ate the mush they were given for the trip, light snow falling in it. It kept people alive, but it didn’t keep the belly full nor had any taste. He ate worst in his life.

He was sitting with Beric Dondarrion and Thoros of Myr. Arya didn’t have a very good opinion of them after she met them in the Riverlands, but they had fought with them against the common threat. Most of their Brotherhood was gone now. They were the first men from the south of the Neck to come in the North specifically to fight the White Walkers, unlike all the others who first came for other reasons. Tyrion and Sansa had come to free Winterfell and Arya, before they knew his sister wasn’t at Winterfell. Daenerys Targaryen had come to invade the North and conquer it. The Brotherhood Without Banners were the only ones who came for and only for the White Walkers. And they paid the price.

“At first, we wanted to protect the people,” Beric explained. He didn’t eat his mush. “That was our task, our reason to fight. And then, some of us started to kill the people. We tried to stop this, by hanging the traitors, but all it did was to make people flee. There isn’t much left from the Brotherhood Without Banners. I wonder what will be left of it after this.”

“With some hope, more than what would be left had the White Walkers swarmed through all the Seven Kingdoms. No matter how many of your men died, they died for a reason, with honor,” Jon said.

“Yes. I suppose we must take comfort in that. The Brotherhood will probably not exist anymore after this is all over, but at least it will have existed for a reason. And maybe I’ll find out why the Lord brought me back six times.”

Jon turned toward Thoros of Myr. “You truly brought him back six times?”

“Yes,” Thoros replied, taking a goofy gulp of his flask of wine.

“And only by saying a few words?”

“Yes, but in fact, it wasn’t me who brought him back. It was our Lord. Just like he brought you back, Jon Snow. There’s a reason for it. I don’t know what it is, but there is one.”

“There’s always a reason, even when we believe there are none.”

Melisandre had joined them. She was dressed in a very similar way to when she and Jon spoke in the winch cage at Castle Black. Jon had stopped trying to understand how she could be so lightly dressed and not feel cold.

“Well, my lady, as gorgeous as ever,” Thoros told her.

She acknowledged the compliment with a small nod, but nothing more.

“I suppose you two have a lot to talk about. Come on Thoros, let’s give them some space,” Lord Beric said.

The two leaders of the Brotherhood Without Banners walked away. Jon stood up, leaving his bowl near the fire to keep it warm.

“What do you want?” he asked her.

“I wanted to apologize.”

“For what?”

She pulled on a face that meant everything. “You know for what?”

Jon stared away. He hadn’t forgiven her, and he didn’t think he could ever forgive her. “I’m not sure I’m the one you should apologize to. You should apologize to all those who are dead, but you cannot because they are dead.”

“It was my fault.”

“Aye, it was.”

An awkward silence followed, that Melisandre broke. “I thought I knew what my Lord wanted from me, but I was wrong. I don’t know what he wants. I receive his signs, but I cannot be sure of their meaning. I try to interpret them the best I can, but sometimes I make a mistake.”

“How many thousand of people would still be alive had you not misinterpreted your Lord’s will? How many people have you burned because you thought your god wanted this? Can you say that it was his will now?”

“I can’t. Perhaps I made mistakes. Perhaps the Lord of Light wanted me to do these mistakes so I could realize my errors when the time was right. I don’t know.”

“What kind of god would do something like that?”
“You know the answer, Jon Snow.”

Jon sighed. The one we’ve got. He didn’t know what the Old Gods or the New wanted from him, but he refused to believe they would expect him to burn children alive.

“I wanted to thank you,” Jon said. He never had the opportunity nor the courage to tell her before, since he did everything to avoid her, but now that they were talking, and considering what might be coming, it may be Jon’s last chance. “For helping at Winterfell. You brought me back from the dead, but this time I guess you saved my life. It was you, wasn’t it?”

She nodded without saying a word. When Jon had fought the Night King, he felt his forces vanish, when a wave of warmth had gone through him and gave him what he needed to destroy the leader of the wights. He had suspected it for some time, but now he knew where it came from.

“Just so that you may know, I haven’t changed my mind. For me, you’re still exiled,” he told her.

“You’re no longer the king, Jon Snow.” She looked over her shoulder, and Jon followed her gaze to Daenerys, his aunt, who talked with Dickon Tarly, Garlan Hightower and another Red Priestess.

“Aye, but many lords in the North will continue to obey the decisions I took. Don’t expect them to welcome you.”

“I do not plan on staying after this battle is over.”

“Where will you go?”

“Wherever my Lord wants.”

“What if you don’t know what he wants?”

She smiled sadly. “I’ll do my best. I may go with Revan, if he would have me.”

Jon looked again behind him, seeing the said priest standing near a cliff with another comrade.

“Who is he?” Jon asked her.

“The man who saved me.” Jon looked back at her, utterly surprised. “I wasn’t always Melisandre of Asshai, Jon Snow. A long time ago, I was no better than a whore. Revan came and saved me. Without him, I would never have met the Lord of Light.”

He looked more carefully from where he stood to the back of the Red Priest. He seemed to be engaged in an important conversation with his fellow priestess. “Who is he exactly?”

“No one knows. He comes when people need him, and goes where the Lord is telling him, just like me. Just like all of us.”

Jon watched the scabbard hanging at the man’s belt. Beric Dondarrion and Thoros of Myr had flaming swords too, but Revan’s seemed different. The fire didn’t seem… natural.

“You said he saved you. Don’t you know anything about him? Have you ever seen his face?”

“He shows his face to very few, and as I said, Jon Snow, no one truly knows him. You may try to know, if you want.”

Jon hesitated, and then he walked towards the Red Priest, leaving Melisandre behind. He had to know. Too many things were strange with this man.
“Revan. May I have a word?” he asked once he was close enough.

“Of course, Jon Snow. Meetra, leave us alone. Don’t forget what I told you.”

The Red Priestess he was talking to walked away. Her blue piercing eyes examined Jon as the woman with brown hair and a very white skin passed next to him. Jon continued his way until he stood next to Revan.

“What do you want to know?” the priest asked him.

Jon cleared his throat. “How does it come you know so much about the White Walkers? You know things that no one else knows, not even Melisandre, and I’m quite sure the other priests don’t know about it either. How?”

A silence settled, and it lasted for so long that Jon believed the man wouldn’t answer. He wasn’t looking at him. The masked face was turned towards the horizon that began at their feet and never stopped.

“I travelled a lot in my life, Jon Snow. I’ve seen many things and heard even more. You may think you know the order of the Red Priests, but you don’t. In fact, there are many orders of Red Priests. The order based around the Red Temple of Volantis is only one of the closest and better known. It’s also one of those with the most followers. But there are many societies of Red Priests, some so small and so far that very few are aware of their existence. It is said that Azor Ahai created the Red Priests in order to prepare for the return of the Others, but through thousands of years, schisms, splits and discords happened. Azor Ahai didn’t leave any written record, or if he did we have no trace of them. Writing barely existed at that time. Many of his teachings and history were lost, or changed, on purpose or not. But some circles remember his original story, and I visited them through the many years of my life. That’s how I know, Jon Snow.”

Jon wasn’t convinced. “Did Azor Ahai even exist?”

“He did, for sure. There are too many testimonies all around the world. That cannot be a coincidence. Azor Ahai truly existed, though who he was, what he did, how he died, and how he defeated the servants of the Great Other remains uncertain.”

“With dragonglass?” Jon offered as an explanation.

“It helped, for sure.”

“The Children of the Forest and the First Men battled together against the White Walkers. It was the Children who provided the men with dragonglass.”

“But why would they need Azor Ahai to defeat their enemies?” Revan asked. From the tone of his voice, he knew the truth, but seemed interested in what Jon would answer.

“I don’t know. Maybe he was the leader of the First Men.”

Revan made a small noise that Jon didn’t know how to interpret. “What do you know of Azor Ahai?”

“Not much. Only that he is a hero who was chosen to fight the darkness, and that he used a magic sword for that, a sword he plunged through the heart of his wife, Nissa Nissa. Melisandre believes the darkness was the White Walkers.”

“Indeed. The legend varies from place to place and depending who tells the tale, but you summarized the common points they almost all have. That doesn’t mean this is true, though. The Others invaded this country for the first time eight thousand years ago. The texts who speak of Azor Ahai in our holy faith are only old of five thousand years. Do you believe in this legend?”

“I don’t know. It seems drastic to kill the love of your life to forge a sword.”

Revan snorted. “If you want my opinion, this legend is very far from the truth, a result of tales that were modified through the centuries until almost nothing was left of the truth.”

Jon was surprised to hear a Red Priest talk in this way about a legend that was at the core of his religion.

“There’s another version of the story of Azar Ahai that I heard one day, Jon Snow. It may only be a variant of the story, but I think there might be more truth to this one than the one you heard about.”

“We don’t know who Azor Ahai was,” he continued. “He may have been a slave, a master, a sailor, a fisherman, a carpenter or a soldier. It seems that he was born in Essos and that he had lived all his life there. Then one day the servants of the Great Other came. The Shivering Sea froze, allowing them free passage on the main land. They began to slaughter the people and to turn them into monsters. Azor Ahai, like many others, seized a sword and fought them. The fight was long and difficult. Many people died, but in the end, the living prevailed over the dead. Those you call the White Walkers were repelled and sent back where they came from. Essos was free of them. After all was over, Azor Ahai only had one wish, to rest. It was then that news came from across the Narrow Sea, from another land. They said the Others had come there too, and that they killed everyone there. Word of it reached the ears of Azor Ahai.”

“He did what he had to do. He set sail for this other country he had never set eyes upon. There he met the First Men and the Children of the Forest. The two people hated each other. They had been at war for a very long time and didn’t trust each other. Azor Ahai convinced them to join their forces, and they fought the dead together. And just like in Essos, the Others were driven back and defeated.”

“Only to come back eight thousand years later,” Jon completed.

“Yes,” Revan agreed after a moment. “Why do you think Azor Ahai did this?”

“What?”

“Why? Why would he travel the entire world to come here, to a land he never set eyes upon, a land where he knew no one, to fight an enemy who was already defeated in his homeland? If you learned tomorrow that Ramsay Bolton was alive and taking control of Asshai, would you go there to stop him?”

“No,” Jon conceded.

“No. Then why Azor Ahai would?”

“Maybe he knew Essos wouldn’t be safe as long as the White Walkers were still breathing.”

“Indeed. Azor Ahai wasn’t the only one who heard of what was happening in Westeros. Many were the people in Essos who knew, and many were fully conscious that the Others would remain a threat as long as they wouldn’t be totally exterminated. But Westeros was far away, and many probably reasoned that by the time the Others and the wights would come back, then they would be dead. Most men don’t want to worry about problems that don’t affect them, or they prefer to ignore them until they are forced to face the truth. Azor Ahai was the only one to go to Westeros. All the others remained behind. Why?”
Jon didn’t answer. There was no answer to that question he could give, aside from saying the man was honorable. He didn’t think this would be a satisfying answer.

Revan resumed. “Azor Ahai didn’t fight the Others alone, you know. There were people who helped him. Back in Essos, among them was a warrior, the person Azor Ahai saw as his equal. The person he could always rely on. The person who later would become his wife.”

Jon was surprised. “Azor Ahai was married?”

“According to the tale, yes, he was. He met his wife during the war against the Others in the east. When the war was over, he only wished to live with her for the rest of his days. The day he heard about the great war in Westeros, his wife told him she was pregnant. It was at this moment that Azor Ahai decided to leave for Westeros. He didn’t go there to save Essos. It was for his son that he did it, and his children and their children after them. He didn’t want them to live in a world that would be constantly under the threat of the dead. So he left his wife with their son in Essos and set sail for the west. He fought for a very long time, until the day when he had the chance to destroy the Others once and for all. But he didn’t seize his chance.”

“Why? He had done so much to fight them. Why would he give up at this moment?”

“Do you know how long the Long Night was?”

“Forty years.” Every child in the North knew that.

“Forty years. And Azor Ahai spent most of this war here, in Westeros. The war against the dead was far longer in the west than it was in Essos. While Azor Ahai fought the dead, his son grew up. He wasn’t there for his birth, his first steps or his first words. The son grew up without his father. He became a man, got married, and even had children of his own. In the end, when Azor Ahai finally could end all of this forever, he was so tired and missed his son so much that he walked away. He left Westeros and sailed back to his homeland. Without him, the Children of the Forest and the First Men couldn’t destroy the Others. They were reduced to build a wall and to create a permanent organization to defend it. The Night’s Watch was created at this moment.”

Revan looked at Jon then. “Why did you think the sworn brothers of the Night’s Watch cannot take a wife or father children?”

Jon’s eyes widened in surprise. “That’s the reason?”

“Yes. Family stopped Azor Ahai from doing the right thing. Bran the Builder didn’t want that to happen again.”

Jon echoed the words of Maester Aemon. “Love is the death of duty.”

“Indeed.”

“Did he get to see his son?” Jon asked, curious.

“He did. He saw his son, but he could never get to know him, or talk to him. His son died two days before he got home. They say he arrived during the funeral. He could only get a glimpse of the body before it was buried forever.” Revan sighed. “Not only Azor Ahai couldn’t see his son grow, but he didn’t finish the task he had. It was too late now. He couldn’t go back to Westeros. He missed his chance to make the world safe. Had he taken a different decision, hundreds of thousand people would still be alive, and we wouldn’t be there, fighting the greatest enemy men ever had to face.”

“What happened to Azor Ahai afterwards?” Jon asked following a moment of silence.
He created the order of the Red Priests, or what would become the Red Priests, to keep the memory of what had happened, and to be ready when the enemy would come again. And just like Brandon the Builder with the brothers of the Night’s Watch, Azor Ahai decided that Red Priests couldn’t marry and couldn’t have children. He remembered the lesson. If you want my opinion, the story of Nissa Nissa comes from the fact Azor Ahai had to sacrifice the people he loved in order to defeat the dead, but not the way people usually see it.”

Revan looked straight at Jon. He could feel the intensity of his stare behind the mask. “Don’t repeat the same mistakes than Azor Ahai, Jon Snow. This time, we must deal with the Others, definitely.”

Jon nodded. He couldn’t agree more. However, something came to his mind. “You believe this story is true?”

Rean shrugged. “I think it is more believable than the common legend, but again, it is difficult to know for sure what happened eight thousand years ago.”

Jon’s gaze wandered to his scabbard. “How does it come that your sword can burn with fire?”

Revan released a very quick chuckle. He detached the sword from his belt but didn’t put it out of the scabbard. “This sword, Jon Snow, was the last sword ever made by the blacksmiths of Valyria.”

He looked at the priest. “The last one?”

“Yes. It came out of the forge a few minutes before the Doom, and someone managed to smuggle it out of the city before it was too late. This is the last relic of the Valyrian civilization. There will never be another sword like that ever made.”

“Yes.”

“How did you get it?”

Valyrian steel swords were rare and costly. Only the most wealthy and powerful families in Westeros had one, and they kept it like a treasure. Since the destruction of Valyria, their value had increased tenfold. How could a Red Priest put his hand on one?

Before Revan could reply, a great roar was heard.

“They know,” Revan said. He unsheathed his sword immediately and it burned like hell immediately. Revan ran towards the origin of the noise, and so did Jon. A large bear was fighting against Beric and Thoros. Their flaming swords were dancing in the air. They had managed to hit the bear, and his fur was on ablaze, but he kept moving. His eyes were blue.

Revan reached the bear before Jon. It was occupied to fight the two other men and didn’t pay attention to the Red Priest who stabbed him in the back. A horrible cry escaped from the bear, and he burst into fire a moment later, turning into ashes. Behind the carcass appeared dozens of wights.

“They’re here! The dead are here!” Jon shouted.

Wights ran at them, their weapons brandished. Longclaw and the three flaming swords cut through the air, slashing the enemies, rendering them inanimate. One the wights swung a club at Jon. He ducked and swung his sword on the back of the wight, reducing him to rubble. Beric, Thoros and Revan were setting fire upon all the dead they came across. More were coming.
A large burst of fire came from behind Jon, destroying all the wights that were coming at them. He turned to see Rhaegal unleashing hell upon the dead. Not far away, Drogon was doing the same for another group of dead men. Jon realized the dead were coming from everywhere, from all the pathways that led to the top of the mountain. They must have encircled the mountain as they stopped. The falling snow prevented them from seeing the ground, so they didn’t see the enemy coming. Ser Garlan and Lord Dickon fought, the Valyrian steel of their sword rendering the dead inoffensive. Daenerys remained near Drogon, protected by the three men of the Reach who came with her. Jon saw that one of the Free Folk had already been killed.

“We must leave!”

The others near him understood. Thoros and Beric drew back, but Revan didn’t. Instead, he sunk his sword into the ground, and a wall of fire came out from it, cutting any access to the dead from one side of the mountain.

Daenerys had already climbed on her dragon, and she was helping Lord Dickon Tarly to climb as Ser Garlan kept fighting the dead. Melisandre wasn’t far and proceeded to climb as soon as Lord Tarly was on Drogon.

Jon went on Rhaegal’s back while the dragon kept throwing fire at the dead, keeping them at bay. He helped Thoros and Beric to climb, and then the man of the Free Folk. The two Northerners were about to climb as well, but one of them was stabbed in the heart and fell on his knees. The other one plunged a dagger made of dragonglass into the wight who just killed his friend, which cause the wight to stop moving. The dead kept coming from this side. Jon tried to move Rhaegal around so that he would target the dead from this side and allow the Northerner to climb him, but he wasn’t fast enough. By the time Rhaegal was in position to blow fire upon the wights, the other Northerner was dead too.

Jon looked at Drogon. Everyone was on him, safe for two people. There was a Red Priestess in the snow, and Revan was protecting her, killing all the wights approaching her.

“RHAEGAL, VALAHD!”

Daenerys’s shouts came through the battle, and Jon felt Rhaegal taking flight. He tried to stop him, but his reflexes when it came to directing a dragon were still too slow. He couldn’t stop him, and the dragon flew away, leaving Daenerys, Drogon and all the others on the ground, surrounded by the dead. Revan grabbing the priestess he saved towards Drogon while the dead were closing on them.

DAENERYS XII

She continued to look through the sky as Drogon flew towards their destination. Snow fell, reducing the visibility. Rhaegal was nowhere to be seen.

They barely managed to escape. Drogon received injuries from the wights as the two last priests climbed on him. Daenerys could feel it was harder for him to fly. The quality of the flying was the same, but her child struggled to maintain it. Hopefully, the swords and clubs of the dead didn’t cause major injuries. She wished she could make Drogon land so she could check on his injuries, but they had to find Rhaegal and Jon Snow first.

Wind whipped her face. She may be immune to fire, but not to the cold or the wind.

“We shouldn’t be far,” Revan said not far behind her.

“Do you think Jon Snow will manage to get there?” she asked him.

“He should, unless something unexpected happens. Let’s be ready for anything. The Others know we’re here. They wouldn’t have sent so many of their creatures after us otherwise.” The Red Priest turned toward his partner he saved before they took off. “Are you fine, Bastila?”

The priestess with brown hair brought together in a bun, allowing a short ponytail, looked back at him. She was holding to Drogon with her right hand while the left maintained a pressure on her leg.

“It’s not too bad, and it’s healing. I will be able to fight,” she replied.

All the others who were on Drogon with her were gripping at anything to not fall. It had been like that for two weeks, and she could feel it taking its toll, especially on Dickon Tarly and Garlan Hightower.

She searched the sky again, still unable to find any trace of Rhaegal and the people he carried. She was worried about Jon Snow. He was all the family she had left, and she barely began to know him. She didn’t want him to die.

During their journey to the Lands of Always Winter, Daenerys had kept trying to know her nephew better. He answered to her questions, and even shared some anecdotes with her, but overall he didn’t speak a lot. However, he kept advising her on how to make sure the northern lords would accept her and obey her. He seemed more concerned with making sure she could rule the North than about knowing her. She regretted that he kept his distance.

There was something she wanted to tell him. She wanted to tell him while they stopped to rest, but right when she was about to speak with him, they were attacked by wights, and the battle that followed prevented her from talking to him. Now he was somewhere out there, and she didn’t know what his situation was. When was the last time she felt so concerned about someone? She was never concerned that much about Viserys.

Her thoughts turned towards Viserion, actually in the Vale with Tyrion Lannister. Her armies didn’t manage to break into the Vale up to now, and she hoped one of her dragons would be enough to turn the tide and bring the Vale to her. It was the only kingdom that didn’t recognize her queen. Even the North bent the knee when she arrived at Winterfell, though she had to fight to free the North from the threat of the dead. That was the price to pay to be queen. You didn’t do what you wanted, but what had to be done to protect your people, no matter who they were.

The wind got stronger, and Daenerys had to place her hand before her face to protect her eyes from the snow that hit hard. She saw this phenomenon before. It was at Winterfell, when she arrived into the battle. She knew what it meant.

“We’re very close,” Revan shouted. “Melisandre, Bastila, Meetra, now!”

Daenerys felt a great wave of heat spread, and the storm weakened. Her vision improved, and after the moment, as the heating wave created by the Red Priests continued to spread, she saw a mountain appear.

“That’s it! We’re there!” Revan shouted.

Daenerys recognized the place a moment after the Red Priest. She saw it in the vision that Brandon Stark showed her. The place where the White Walkers were created. The site was somewhere at the feet of the mountain. She had Drogon fly in circle around it, searching for the place where the sacred site was, and also for Rhaegal.

The answer didn’t come from her eyes, but her ears. The ground was still difficult to distinguish from this altitude, so she ordered Drogon to fly lower. Still, she heard Rhaegal before she could see him. His roars echoed, and Drogon answered it with his own shout. Daenerys tried to follow the roars of her second child, and as she did so, she began to see the ground.

It wasn’t Rhaegal that she saw, but scattered individuals, all heading into one direction. Something told her these were not living things. Drogon flew over a ridge, and once they were on the other side, she had a very good view of the whole scene. The sacred site was there, different, but it was there. Obelisks had turned white, and the weirwood was gone, but she recognized the shape and the symbols. It was there without any doubt.

This time, she saw Rhaegal, and she also distinguished two flaming swords, but also several other shapes. There were far more than the people Rhaegal carried. The dead were here. Rhaegal was blowing fire all around him.

“We have to help them. Prepare yourself,” Daenerys shouted to the people behind her. Drogon dipped, flying towards the sacred site. Daenerys would destroy it and land next to Jon Snow and his men to help them.

“Your Grace, it’s useless,” Revan shouted.

“What?”

Before she could do anything, Drogon had already unleashed his fire upon the site. Then he threw his fire at a group of wights, clearing a space in which he could land. Daenerys looked at the sacred site. The obelisks and the altar at their center were intact. No damage was done.
“Your Grace, the power of this place is strong. A simple burst of fire will not be enough.”

It was true. Revan explained it to her during their journey. In the heat of the situation, she forgot about it. She turned to Melisandre and the other Red Priests.

“You know what you have to do.”

With these simple words, they all got off Drogon’s back. Wights were coming from everywhere around them. As soon as everyone was on the ground, Drogon blasted fire at the coming enemies. Ser Garlan and the knight who accompanied Lord Tarly remained at her side, ready to protect her. The Lord of Horn Hill for himself ran to join the battle, just like Revan. Jon Snow and his men were busy fighting a legion of wights and two White Walkers. One seemed to have just arrived. He thrust his sword inside the belly of Thorsos of Myr. His friend, Lord Beric Dondarrion, tried to rescue him and stabbed the White Walker with his flaming sword. It had no effect. The White Walker seized his sword with his hand, and it was reduced to shards. Then he stabbed Beric Dondarrion too. This time, he wouldn’t come back.

Jon Snow was dealing with the other White Walker. Dickon Tarly rushed towards the one that just killed Lord Beric, engaging him into another duel, while Revan unleashed his flaming sword upon coming wights, reducing them all to ashes. Rhaegal kept throwing his fire at the enemies that were coming, just like Drogon, but more dead arrived to replace those who fell. In the meantime, Melisandre advanced towards Jon Snow, flanked by both Meetra and Bastila.

The woman from Asshai raised her hands. A moment later, Jon Snow deflected a blow from the White Walker he was fighting to his right, then smashed his sword across his face. The White Walker exploded into thin pieces.

Daenerys considered the options she had. She could choose between Rhaegal and Drogon. It wasn’t an easy choice. No matter what she decided, one of them would be left vulnerable. She had thought about it and come to a logical conclusion. She barely hesitated.

“RHAEGAL!” Her green dragon looked at her. She thought about the altar surrounded by icy obelisks and pointed them to the dragon. “DRACARYS!”

Rhaegal unleashed his fire on the site right away. From this angle, it was a little difficult to see, but Melisandre’s necklace was glowing. Rhaegal’s fire was continuous. It never stopped. Melisandre was increasing the power of Rhaegal’s fire with her magic, making it stronger and longer. The obelisks started to melt down.

She crossed the eyes of Jon Snow, and for a short moment, she thought she saw him smile. It seldom happened. Then he went back to battle and disappeared behind Rhaegal’s large frame, most likely defending her child from the enemies that came from this side. In the meantime, the two other Red Priestesses began to fight the wights, their swords ablaze with fire.

Dickon Tarly’s fight against the second White Walker was quick. He thrust his sword right where the heart of a living human would have been, and the White Walker disappeared like his comrade when Jon Snow defeated him.

Rhaegal’s fire had almost melt half of one of the obelisks. Even for Daenerys, the place started to get hot with Drogon’s and Rhaegal’s fire, not to mention the three flaming swords that danced in their limited space. Wights kept being destroyed, and other wights kept coming after them. Was there a limit to their numbers? Daenerys had seen their army at Winterfell, but she wondered if they could truly move so many wights from Winterfell to this place in this limited amount of time.
She could only watch. For once, she wished she knew how to wield a sword, for she felt useless in this melee. All she could do may be to direct her dragons’ fire in the right direction, but they already did it well on their own.

She noticed something strange. Among the chaos, Melisandre was the only one to not fight aside from Daenerys. Her necklace kept glowing, more intensively than ever, but it wasn’t what caught Daenerys’s attention. Melisandre’s hair was getting shorter, and whiter. Her face changed too, turning more round and losing its charm. Wrinkles appeared on her face, on her hands, and her head turned bald. Daenerys had seen many strange things in her life, and that was one of them. The necklace glowed brighter than ever. It looked as if it was burning.

The flaming swords were getting brighter too. The intensity of the fire around the blades increased, and it seemed the swords no longer needed to make contact with the dead to destroy them. The blades were longer thanks to the fire that became an extension of the weapons.

Melisandre’s necklace flashed, and the burst of fire from Rhaegal tripled. Obelisks were shattered as the fire reached the altar. The Red Priests raised their swords and a gigantic wall of fire in a semi circle surrounded their group. Some wights tried to step through it and ended like so many of their fellow beings. Garlan Hightower looked as impressed as she was as they looked at what was going on.

Then it all ended. The wall of fire, Rhaegal’s fire and the glow of Melisandre’s precious stone on her neck, all disappeared in an instant. And the altar was gone too, replaced by water. It was all that was left of it.

The important is what is at the core of the site. This is where the Others create themselves, the source of their power. Once it is destroyed, they won’t be able to create more of them.

The altar was at the core of this place, and it was gone. Cries came out from everywhere, and Daenerys saw the wights all running at them again. The ring of fire kept them at bay, but many had come in the meantime, and now they all rushed towards Daenerys and her allies. Garlan Hightower and Dickon’s man braced for the upcoming fight. Melisandre collapsed, her beauty gone, replaced by the body of a very old woman.

Revan sunk his sword into the ground, and just like at the mountain, it erected a wall of fire. It didn’t surround their group, but it created a barrier the wights had to get around. Drogon reduced to ashes a large group of dead men running towards him.

A shattering cry pierced the air. Daenerys looked at Rhaegal, and she saw something she had hoped to never see again. A spear had come through his green neck. It didn’t look like a conventional spear, like the ones Drogon received in Meereen. This one was white and looked like it was made of ice. She had seen one similar before, at Winterfell, when a White Walker tried to throw it at Drogon. Viserion and Tyrion saved her this day.

Today, they didn’t. They were far away in the Vale, and a second spear went straight through Rhaegal’s stomach. In an agonizing screech, her child threw short flames, and collapsed on the ground.

“Rhaegal!”

Ignoring the battle that raged all around her, she ran to him, but before she could do anything, a sword went through Rhaegal and his body burst in flames.

“NO!”
Revan’s sword reduced Rhaegal’s to ashes. He looked at her for a short moment, then turned his back. A White Walker was there, and Jon Snow wasn’t far. A gauntleted hand grabbed her arm.

“Your Grace, we must leave, now!”

The voice of Ser Garlan Hightower went through one ear and left by the other. Daenerys couldn’t detach her eyes from what was left of Rhaegal. She had hatched him herself. He was her child, one of the only three children she would ever have.

“Your Grace, we must go!” the knight repeated.

All around her, wights were coming, and kept appearing everywhere. Fire and Blood. Rhaegal’s blood was spread all over the ground.

Reluctantly, Daenerys let herself being dragged by the knight of House Hightower. She saw Drogon still sending fire upon the dead. She realized that she needed to do something to make sure another one of her children wouldn’t die today. People were already starting to gather around Drogon. Jon Snow was rushing towards them, hacking a few wights on his way. She found herself praying that he wouldn’t die today.

She helped to get everyone on Drogon’s back. Melisandre’s body remained unmoving, and it was to be assumed she was dead. There was only one person still breathing who didn’t come back to Drogon.

“Revan!”

A Red Priestess shouted as the masked man kept fighting the wights. Everyone was on Drogon’s back except for the Red Priests now. Daenerys wondered if Drogon could carry them all.

“Go, I’m staying!” the priestess with a ponytail told her comrade with short hair.

“Bastila…”

“Go! We’re going to hold them off.”

The land shook at this moment, and Drogon had a hard time maintaining his stance. Lord Tarly barely managed to remain on his back and almost slipped to the ground.

“Go, we don’t have much time.”

The priestess they called Meetra climbed on Drogon as the other priestess swung her two swords lit with fire at all the enemies who dared to approach her. Drogon helped by spitting more fire and reducing the number of foes. Still, one or two sometimes managed to get close enough to hit him, and Drogon would toss them away with his legs or his wings. They wouldn’t be able to hold much longer. They had to leave, now.

“VALAHĐ!”

Drogon ran forward and made a few steps, crushing more wights until he took off. Daenerys looked down to see Revan destroy the White Walker he was fighting, and the priestess Bastila making her way to his position, positioning themselves back to back.

As they did so, the land shook again. Even in the air, they could feel it, and gases came out from the mountain, and a red streak began to pour from its top.
“Bran was right. The mountain is a volcano,” her nephew said next to her.

“Yes, he was right.”

Drogon kept flying, putting more distance between them and the mountain now in eruption. Daenerys looked one last time to the receding remains of Rhaegal. They succeeded, but the price had been high. Was it worth it? She looked at the people who came back from this expedition. Jon Snow was among them. She would have to take comfort in it.

Chapter End Notes

So, many people died, as it should be expected. Even with dragons, the Lands of Always Winter are hard to survive.

A recurring theme in Game of Thrones, I think, is how people’s deaths are often useless and pointless, because let’s face it, the wars in the south are stupid and turn around a bunch of rich people fighting for crowns and thrones. At least, they look stupid when compared to the real threat in the North and the fighting taking place there. As a result, thousands of people died for no reason through the series, when they would have better served had they fought the White Walkers. In this chapter, it is quite the opposite. Each death was meaningful. We could even say that Melisandre found absolution with her last actions.

I hope you liked it. It may seem short, and perhaps Daenerys is not the best POV for a battle chapter, considering she’s mostly a spectator (Daenerys cannot do much in battle when she’s not on the back of a dragon), but I hope you liked it. And after all, battles happen quickly.

Next chapter : Sansa
I'm sorry for how late this chapter is being uploaded. A lot of stuff happened in my life recently and I was caught in all this, neglecting this fanfiction. I'm truly sorry about it.

And I'm sorry about what happens in this chapter. Many people will hate me and certainly want to kill me at the end. We see that Tyrion and Sansa have found each other, but there is still a distance separating them.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The beast unleashed its fire upon the routing enemy army. Whatever forces Vance Corbray brought into battle proved to be powerless against the discipline of the Unsullied, the savagery of the Dothrakis, the ferocity of the hill tribes, the despair at the sight of Knights of the Vale fighting their own countrymen, and the destruction unleashed by a dragon. The great army Harrold Arryn gathered and that Lord Corbray led into battle disbanded like the lords who ran away from Joffrey’s court as soon as he declared he was done for a day.

Even without the combined forces that attacked the army of the Vale, the dragon would have been enough to destroy it all. He spat fire on the enemy, sparing no one, causing most of the men to run away. Sansa could hear the cries of some of them along with the shock of swords as she stood upon the hill, watching the battle from afar. It was the first time since the battle of Moat Cailin that she witnessed an engagement between two armies. Mira was at her side the last time. Today only five Unsullied soldiers kept her company. She didn’t think they had no tongue, but they certainly didn’t know the language of Westeros. As a result, they just watched the battle from afar. Tyrion had thought it would be better to leave her in the care of Unsullied rather than Dothrakis or men of the hill tribes.

Her husband was fighting and so was Arya. Like always, Sansa had to stand aside and watch as an observer while the people she loved risked their lives. At least Arya wasn’t in the vanguard, but she fought alongside the hill tribes. Tyrion and Sansa wanted her to fight with the Unsullied, or with the men of the Vale who were part of their army at worst, but Arya would have none of it. Finally, Tyrion yielded, but at the condition Arya wouldn’t be part of the vanguard.

Tyrion had spent the evening preceding the battle to reassure her. Arya survived White Walkers and worse, and even Tyrion survived two battles, including one where he was part of the vanguard. Sansa had countered that he didn’t take part to the battle the first time since he was knocked out by his own men, and the second time he almost got killed by Ser Mandon Moore. The scar the kingsguard left was still there, visible to everybody. At least, Tyrion risked less this time. He wasn’t on the field, a sword or an axe in hand, but on the back of a dragon. As long as he didn’t fall, there would be no problem.

The dragon kept chasing the men who were running away, and so did the Dothrakis. However, Dothrakis didn’t spit fire on the fleeing army. Sansa had been shocked and more utterly surprised than she could ever be when Tyrion told her he could ride a dragon. The day after they were reunited, he explained her everything that happened since she was kidnapped at Winterfell. He explained how he died, and even showed her the scars that the arrows left, how one of Daenerys Targaryen’s dragons brought his body and how the Red Priestess Kinvara brought him back to life. He also told her about the Second Battle of Winterfell, how he climbed on the back of one of the dragons and found out he obeyed his orders, and that he saved Daenerys Targaryen from a White Walker during the battle, ending up as her Hand and being sent to the Vale to submit the region.

Sansa couldn’t understand why Kinvara didn’t tell her that she brought Tyrion back from the dead. She would have trusted her sooner. Why didn’t she tell her everything, including Tyrion’s special bond with the dragon? Sansa had wanted to ask questions to the High Priestess, but the morning after she reunited with Tyrion, Kinvara was gone, and so was Geralt and two Red Priests who followed Tyrion’s army. They told no one where they went. It was as if they vanished in the nature.

What had caused an even greater shock to Sansa was to discover that Tyrion was a Targaryen. When he first told her that he was the son of the Mad King, Aerys Targaryen, and that his mother had an affair with him, Sansa didn’t want to believe him. But it was obvious that her husband wasn’t joking. She knew when Tyrion was joking, and he definitely wasn’t this time. Then she recalled something she read at White Harbor, while she was pregnant with Joanna, something concerning a visit Lord Tywin’s wife made to King’s Landing with her two older children, and Tyrion was born next year. There had been an accident at this moment, some comment the Mad King made towards the lady Joanna. When she shared this information with Tyrion, he just replied, I suppose that now we know when I was conceived, all bitterness.

They didn’t talk much about it thereafter. She supposed Tyrion didn’t want to discuss the topic, and truth be told Sansa was very hesitant to bring it up. If learning that her husband was a Targaryen and a dragonrider was a shock for her, then what could it be for Tyrion to learn that all his life he wrongly believed that Tywin Lannister was his father.

Sometimes, Sansa thought that Tyrion was avoiding her. He came to her as soon as she asked for him, or whenever she needed him, but he seemed distant considering the time they spent away from each other. At night, she would rest her head against him, but he always hesitated to wrap her into his arms or to wander his fingers through her hair like he used to. He even hesitated to touch her. More than once, he seemed about to tell her something, but didn’t.

She hadn’t asked him what this was all about. In fact, they avoided the subject of this lingering awkwardness between them. They talked about Joanna and how to find her. He also told her about Daenerys and reassured her that everything would be fine, that she would allow them to keep Casterly Rock and wouldn’t touch to the Starks or the Lannisters. He also worried constantly if she was well, if she had everything she needed, and if she wasn’t too much mistreated back when she was a prisoner. It had been difficult for her, but she told him everything that happened, including the near rape. It wasn’t easy for her to talk about it. Most of the time, she tried to forget it. At night, if the memory made its way back to her mind, she would move closer to Tyrion and take comfort in his presence. She repeated to herself that it was all over, that Littlefinger and Harrold Arryn were dead, that it was all in the past and she didn’t have to be afraid anymore, but it was difficult to not be afraid with the lingering thought that Joanna was still in danger.

If I die, your daughter dies. My men will kill her the moment they hear of my death.

The words haunted her. She told Tyrion of her worries. Although he tried to reassure her, saying that Littlefinger would never kill the heir of Casterly Rock for Joanna was too valuable, she could feel the fear through his voice. He was just as afraid as she was.

The battle was over very quickly. Sansa had spent her childhood reading stories of great and handsome knights, and the Knights of the Vale had been a part of that childhood. Their courage, their honor and their valor were praised in songs, in stories and in history books through all the Seven Kingdoms, and yet they could do nothing against a dragon, castrated soldiers and savage men.
Sansa now saw with her own eyes what the true valor of the Vale was, and it amounted to nothing.
They were cowards playing with swords and thinking themselves to be heroes. The closest man to a hero on this battlefield was flying in the air, showing to the entire Vale that Ronnel Arryn had been right to welcome a dragon instead of fighting him.

Sansa just stayed there while the men chased after the enemy. However, she didn’t remain still for long since the dragon flew in her direction. She tightened her grip on her horse’s reins, just in case he would panic. Sansa noticed that horses were nervous near the dragon. She was afraid as well. Tyrion might try to alleviate her fears, no matter what the fear was, it only partially worked. The fact Tyrion tried to keep her away from the dragon wasn’t about to make her feel more confident around the animal.

They landed not far from her, but far enough all the same. Tyrion had to walk a little after he came down the beast. Her guards let him pass without saying a single word. They barely seemed to notice his presence, let alone the presence of the dragon. Did Unsullied truly fear nothing?

“The battle is over. We have won,” Tyrion told her as he approached. “Though I suppose you already suspected as much.”

“Yes, I did,” she said.

Again, he seemed about to say something, but didn’t. “I just… wanted to make sure you were alright. I have to go back. War business.”

“Tyrion, wait.” He had almost turned his heels but turned back to face her as soon as she said his name. “I will come with you.”

He nodded. “Very well.”

He spoke to the five Unsullied in Valyrian, and they followed them. He also said something to the dragon as they walked by him, and he took fly. Sansa couldn’t speak nor understand Valyrian, and according to Tyrion there were several types of Valyrian, so she had no idea what he talked about.
The war council meetings were hard to hold, as Unsullied, Dothrakis and the men of the Vale spoke different languages. The task was complicated by the accent of the hill tribes men, making their language difficult to understand even for some Vale lords. They always needed someone to translate everything that was said. Most of the time, it was an Unsullied. Some had been trained to speak various languages. Tyrion sometimes spoke Valyrian with the Unsullied, though she could perceive he was struggling.

“So, how was it, to ride a dragon into battle?” she asked him.

“Easy enough. My Valyrian is quite poor, but Viserion seems to understand everything I say, and he’s following my orders.”

Tyrion always addressed the dragon in Valyrian. When he spoke to him, she thought she could hear the word Viserion, the dragon’s name. Tyrion always called him that way, but Sansa had a hard time calling the dragon by his name yet. Tyrion seemed so familiar around the creature, but she just couldn’t. Sometimes, she thought that the dragon was looking at her, and she didn’t know if she ought to be afraid about it. That wasn’t as if it was Lady who stood before her.

“Are you never afraid of him?”
“Not really. To be true, he is very nice for a dragon. Drogon is way more scary, and bigger. I suppose it’s fitting that I end up with the smallest of the three.”

Sansa already found the dragon Tyrion rode enormous, so she wasn’t eager to see how huge the two others were.

They reached the battlefield. Corpses littered the ground. Some of Tyrion’s men were stripping the bodies of dead men of everything they could find that had value. The hill tribes men seemed to excel in that. There were also Silent Sisters and septas taking care of the wounded. Most bodies were those of Westerosi, with a few Unsullied, Dothrakis or hill tribes men there and there.

It wasn’t the first time Sansa walked through a field after a battle took place. She had a similar view at Moat Cailin, and since the death of Ser Hugh of the Vale, she knew what a man looked like after he was killed. Still, she knew that there were men among the victims today who didn’t deserve to die, but her pity was offset by the horrible treatment she endured in the hands of Harrold Arryn and his men. She wouldn’t weep on the fate of the Vale. If history remembered that the armies of the Vale only arrived after battles were fought or lost them to a few foreign soldiers, she was glad of it. They got what they deserved.

They met Grey Worm, the commander of the Unsullied, in the middle of the battlefield. The conversation between him and Tyrion took place in the common tongue.

“So, Grey Worm, what’s your report on the battle?”

“The enemy is gone. We killed thousands of them. Dothrakis are still after them.”

“Good, let them chase. They’re the best at this. How many men have we lost?”

“It is too early to say for sure, but I would say no more than a few hundreds.”

“Good. Let’s hope we won’t lose more to desertion. The hill tribes and the Dothrakis are not known for their discipline. What about prisoners?”

“We are gathering them. What should we do of them?”

“Let them go, all of them. At least the common soldiers. We may not have what it takes to feed them all. Strip them from their weapons and armors. They may leave with the clothes on their back and what food they can bring inside a bag, but nothing more. Bring me the knights and the lords, and their relatives. We can use them as hostages to obtain their families’ oath or to be ransomed. And I have questions to ask them. If you find Lord Vance Corbray, send him to me.”

“Yes, my lord.”

Grey Worm walked away. Tyrion kept walking around on the battlefield, asking questions to the men and the officers. At one point, he crossed the path of Shagga, a leader of one of the many hill tribes, who escorted Sansa back to Tyrion. They exchanged a few japes of questionable taste. Sansa was used to Tyrion’s sense of humor, but she could never get along with the same people that he did. He talked with other people of the hills tribes, but avoided the Dothrakis in general, although they crossed very few of them. He barely spoke to her, or even looked at her in the whole time.

“Tyrion, what’s going on?” she asked after some time.

“Well, I’m just hoping this will be the last battle of this war. I’m tired of fighting,” he replied.

“That’s not what I’m talking about. I get the feeling that you’re avoiding me since I came back.”
He stopped and looked at her, a pained expression on his face. “I’m not avoiding you, Sansa. I’m just…” He turned towards the Unsullied and told them something in Valyrian. They moved and placed some distance between them and Tyrion and Sansa. He returned his attention to her. “You’re the only one I told the truth up to now, and… I guess I’m afraid you might look at me differently.”

“Why would I?”

“Just think about it. My father burned alive your grandfather and strangled your uncle to death. And he laughed as they died.”

“That’s not much different from Tywin Lannister. And Jon is a Targaryen too. It… it didn’t change the way I thought of him.”

“Really?”

She closed her eyes. “Maybe a little, but only at the beginning. And… and you’re not Jon, Tyrion. You’re my husband.”

“All the more reason to look at me differently.”

“Well, I don’t. I swear.” He looked at her, then back on the ground. “You don’t believe me?” she asked.

“No, I… I know you think what you say, but… That’s impossible to learn something like that and not see people differently. I’m not the person you believed I was, Sansa.”

“You were not the man I thought you were when I met you either. That didn’t stop me from falling in love with you. I still love you. I don’t care who your parents are. We don’t choose them. It’s not your fault if your father was the Mad King. No more than it is Jon’s fault if Rhaegar Targaryen is his true father and that my father hid him the truth for so long. You’re my husband. It won’t change.”

Tyrion sighed. “I’m sorry. It’s just that… I thought that I was the son of Tywin Lannister all my life. I never loved my father, but I was proud to be his son, and I wanted him to be proud of me. I know that I shouldn’t have felt that way, but I did. And now, I just learned that I was never his son. That’s probably why he never loved me. He must have suspected something. He wanted to throw me into the sea when I was born, and he’s wanted me dead more often than I can count. And now, well, I don’t really know who I am anymore. Am I a Lannister? A Targaryen? Both of them?”

She approached him. “I don’t know, Tyrion, but I want to help you.”

“I’m not sure you can,” he said on a sad voice. “I just need to adjust. I’m beginning to understand how your supposed half-brother felt when he learned about his true origins. I just need time. For now, let’s focus on ending this war and finding our daughter. Everything else can wait.”

Sansa reluctantly agreed. He was right. Finding Joanna was more important than anything. They walked in the direction where all the prisoners were kept. Those who were highborn were placed apart from the others. Ser Nestor Royce was there. He was the first lord in the Vale who joined Tyrion. He spotted them arriving and gave an order to his men. Two grabbed a prisoner among the many who were there. There ought to be dozens at least, if not more. Sansa recognized the man they dropped on his knees before them.

“Lord Corbray.”

Vance Corbray looked at her, and it was obvious he wanted nothing more than to kill her.
“You. You did all this,” he accused her.

“No, I did,” Tyrion said, positioning himself between Sansa and Lord Vance. Nestor Royce remained close. “So, you’re the man who slaughtered everyone in Winterfell, betrayed a king you swore to follow, and kidnapped my wife and child?”

This was a rhetorical question. Sansa knew Tyrion didn’t expect an answer. He already knew it. His look wandered over all the other prisoners, and he walked to one of them. He seized his chin and forced the man to look at him.

“Well, look at it. Serion Lannister.” He was one of the people inside Tyrion’s army who plotted with the Knights of the Vale to kidnap her. Tyrion said Serion’s men had turned on him on their way to Winterfell. “Bring them. I have a few questions for these two.”

“Yes, my lord.”

Ser Nestor Royce did as Tyrion told him, forcing the two prisoners on their feet and pushing them forward. Sansa realized that Tyrion was heading towards his dragon, who landed somewhere next to the battlefield, far from everything.

“Sansa.”

Arya came from her right at this moment.

“Arya. Are you all right? Are you hurt?” Sansa asked her, seeing the blood on her armor.

“Aye, I am. I mean, I am well. I’m not injured.” She turned to Tyrion. “You’re still alive?”

“As you see,” he replied.

“Good. Keep it that way.”

“A Lannister always pays his debts.”

Sansa didn’t know what it was about, but before she could ask her sister or her husband, Lord Vance Corbray spoke.

“You’re the one who killed my brother, you damn whore!”

Ser Nestor punched him from behind and he fell into the mud. His stare went from Arya to the ground he splashed into. Lord Vance was then forced back on his knees to keep walking, mud and blood covering his face now.

“Say that word again, and you will pay for this, Lord Vance,” Tyrion warned.

They arrived near Viserion after some time. Vance Corbray and Serion Lannister were forced on their knees again. Everyone stood at a respectable distance from the dragon, except for Tyrion who approached and stood next to him and faced the accused.

“I present you Viserion. Daenerys Targaryen, our queen, named him after her dead brother, Viserys Targaryen. Her brother never loved her, he was stupid and cruel. She wanted Viserion to be what her brother never was. And I’d say that her wish was accomplished. Viserion is kind, far from being stupid, especially for a dragon, and he loves the queen. He is also the smallest of her three dragons, and less prone to burn someone alive when that someone approaches him. But don’t let that fool yourself. If I command him to burn you alive, he will do it without a single hesitation.”
The dragon made a big sound with his throat at this moment, as if he was approving what Tyrion said. His eyes were fixed on the two men on their knees. Everyone stood away from them, assuming they could eventually be under fire.

Lord Corbray seemed afraid and looked at the beast with big eyes, while Serion Lannister seemed to be looking at Tyrion instead.

“Don’t make us believe you can command this beast,” he spat.

“I can, dear distant cousin,” Tyrion replied. “Or else why would I have been on his back during the battle? Now, I have a few questions, and for you own sake I hope you will answer them. First, where is my daughter?”

Sansa impatiently waited. None of them answered. Tyrion had approached them as he spoke. He turned away. “Very well. In this case, let’s play a little game. I call it the Prisoner’s dilemma. Here’s how it works. If you both refuse to speak, I’ll have Viserion here roast you both alive. If one of you tells the truth and the other says nothing, the one who spoke is free and will keep his lands, his titles and everything he has. The other will die. If you both speak, I’m sending you both to the Wall. In all cases, you would be better off to speak. So, who wants to speak first?”

None of them spoke at first, but then Serion Lannister started to laugh, or at least to snigger. “Really? You expect we will talk for that? A promise to be sent to the Wall?”

“Or to recover your freedom, given your friend doesn’t speak at all,” Tyrion said.

“You really think yourself to be funny, Imp?”

“I do think that I’m funnier than you, unless you believe that kidnapping babies is funny. So tell me, where is she?”

“You ruined my plans. I don’t see any reason to talk to you. Except one.” He looked straight at Tyrion. “Petyr Baelish has been playing you from the beginning. Even when you were drinking in King’s Landing, back when your lord father was still alive, he was already plotting to overthrow your family.”

“I think we’re all aware of that now. Too bad his plans didn’t end the way he wanted, just like yours.”

“You think this is over? People mock you, Imp. Everyone does. They mock you and they hate you, you and your whore of a wife.”

Tyrion leaned toward the man. “Say that word again, and you’re a dead man.”

“Don’t test me.”

“You don’t have it in you. I am a Lannister, more than you will ever be. You spare everyone, even the assassins. You will not kill me. You will never become a kinslayer. You’re not ready to do what’s necessary.”

“We will see. You have no idea what I’m ready to do for my family.”

“You promised I would keep everything if I told you truth, very well. I will tell you the truth. You ruined my plans back in the Westerlands. Lord Baelish approached me, and he promised me everything I wanted in exchange for my help.’’

“What did he promise you?’’

“Casterly Rock.’’

Tyrion laughed in derision. “Then you’re really stupid.’’

“You’re the one who’s stupid to believe that your daughter is still alive, and to believe you are safe. I’m not the only one who worked for Littlefinger. The Spicers did too and many more. They will kill you. Your rule will be short.’’

“What did you say?’’ Tyrion asked very slowly. Sansa heard her heart pounding inside her chest.

“Do you really think Baelish would keep the baby of the Imp and his whore? He wanted your whore for himself, I could tell. He was obsessed with her. He would never have let her live. That’s why he told me to get rid of her.’’

“Where is she?’’

“I threw her into the sea as soon as I arrived on the ship who brought me here. That was quite a sight, seeing a little baby drown.’’

“You’re lying.” Yes, he was lying. He had to.

“No, I’m not. We didn’t need that child. Littlefinger didn’t want her. All he wanted was your whore. He had me for Casterly Rock, a true Lannister, unlike you. He had no use for your baby. And now, you will never have another. He chose himself everything your whore ate when she was in the Vale. He put something in her food to make sure she would never conceive a child again. House Lannister will die with you.’’

Sansa felt Arya’s hand sliding into hers. Her legs were weak and she felt she could collapse any time. Joanna. Tyrion was looking at Serion, pure hatred on his face.

“You said the word whore far too often.’’ He then pointed Lord Vance. “And you said nothing.’’ He walked away and stopped right next to his dragon. The beast looked agitated all of a sudden. He was far from quiet as he was before.

“The game is over. Viserion, dracarys!’’

“No, my lord, please, I have information…’’

The last words of Lord Vance Corbray were drowned by the flames that engulfed both men, and the last sounds they both made were cries as the fire consumed their bodies and they struggled for the last few seconds of their lives, hoping against all odds to put off the fire. As Sansa looked at their lifeless bodies, all darkened, there were only two things she could think about. The first was her daughter. Littlefinger said she would die if he died, and Serion Lannister just declared that he did kill her. He threw her into the sea, just like Tyrion Lannister had wanted to do with Tyrion. The second thing she thought about brought her hand over her belly. She would never have children again. Littlefinger poisoned her.

Next chapter: Gerold
GEROLD II

The blue eyes were fixed on him. His brother laid dead, a severe injury where his heart was. The ice demon brought his sword of ice down on Gerold. He seized his brother’s sword and swung it, blocking the blow before it hacked his head off. On his knees, keeping his brother’s sword up, it was difficult to hold the enemy blade away. He could feel the cold emanating from it.

The pressure was released. The White Walker brought his weapon down again. The Valyrian steel blocked one more time. Gerold couldn’t get back on his feet. He had been injured and couldn’t stand. He was forced to stay like this, one knee on the ground, parrying every blow, struggling more to keep the deadly blade away from his flesh each time.

Another blow was so powerful that he couldn’t block it. Instead of stopping the motion of the enemy’s sword, the Valyrian steel followed its motion and ended up digging into the flesh of his left shoulder. He cried in pain. The icy sword traveled along the steel until it met his fingers. He lost two. The Valyrian steel sword of House Hightower slipped from his hand, and the next moment the icy sword of the White Walker was thrust into his heart.

As the weapon was pulled back, he collapsed on the ground. Blood pouring from his chest, and soon from his mouth. He turned to Garlan, the only one in his family he had ever been close to. He was gone, and soon Gerold would join him too. It was probably as good this way. If Garlan died, what was the point of staying amongst the living? What did he have worth living for?

As his vision blurred and he couldn’t distinguish the outline of the figures, he saw the White Walker moving away and disappearing. And then another shape appeared, followed by a second, much smaller. Their appearance didn’t muddle. It got clearer. The image slowly became much clearer, until he recognized the dark-brown hair and the green eyes of Mira. The boy looked like her brother Ryon, but he didn’t have her eyes. He had his. He tried to reach them, but his forces were exhausted. His vision decreased until only Mira and his son were left, and then they disappeared too.

He woke up, panting, feeling way too warm for the place where he slept. Thick furs covered him, and a fire was burning in the hearth. Gerold removed the furs and proceeded to sit. He regretted it immediately as pain stabbed in his right leg. He looked at the bandage. It still seemed fresh. Now he regretted not only to have sit too quickly, but also to have dropped furs on the floor, for the cold replaced the warmth. He began to shiver. He took back the furs that were still on the bed and put them on.

“How the Northerners do to live there?” he asked aloud. He was all alone in the room, and as such he got no answer.

Gerold slowly dropped off his bed, trying to put as fewer weight on his injured leg as he could. He limped to the nearby chair by the fireplace and sat there. The warmth emanating from the fire comforted him a little.

They had arrived in Castle Black two days ago. The journey from Highpoint had been mostly uneventful, until they arrived on the lands of the Gift, the band of lands south of the Wall that belonged to the Night’s Watch. The moment they reached it, the wights fell upon them. The dead harassed them all their way to Castle Black. At night, the sentries were first doubled, then tripled. Men expected the dead to crawl to them from anywhere. This slowed down their progress. When they finally reached Castle Black, they had lost over a thousand men. And the ordeal was not over.

Wights were waiting for them in great numbers at the castle. Malcolm Branfield, left in charge of the army in the absence of Dickon Tarly, who had gone north with the queen and Jon Snow, barely had the time to mount a defence position before the dead came upon them in the thousands.

For Gerold, the battle was a blur, a series of fights and duels without end. He didn’t remember much of it. All of it was a confused melee involving tens of thousand people, alive and dead alike. Malcolm Branfield had provided him with a dagger made of dragonglass not long after they met the first dead in the Gift.

“I refuse to let the husband of my niece go into battle against White Walkers without this,” the man had told him.

The only part of the battle Gerold remembered very well was his duel with a White Walker. Unlike in his dream, he wasn’t killed, Garlan didn’t die since he was far away with the queen, he didn’t wield a sword made of Valyrian steel, and the White Walker didn’t walk away from their duel without a single scar. But like in his dream, Gerald had been injured to the leg and forced to drop on one knee. Instinctively, the moment he was on the ground, he drew the dagger of dragonglass, and as the White Walker was about to deliver the final blow, Gerold buried the dagger into his opponent leg, right at the same place where he was stabbed in his own.

Then Gerold had collapsed and fainted. The last thing he saw before he lost consciousness, except for all the men fighting all around him, was the face of the woman he loved.

In his dreams, Gerold didn’t faint on the battlefield because of his injury. He was killed, and he knew he could never see his wife again, and that he would never have the chance to see his son. The nightmare ended when he saw them together, looking at him. It was the moment he was brought back to reality. He could never remember what their expression told.

An old man who traveled with their army and occupied the unofficial position of healer came to see him at this moment and removed his bandage.

“The wound is healing. I suggest you limit your efforts for another two days, ser. After that, your limp should be gone.”

This was good news. The old man left him quickly. He had other wounded to attend, and not all of them were granted a personal chamber inside Castle Black like Gerold. Gerold grabbed a stick that helped him to walk for the time being. With great caution, he went down the stairs. It took him ten times what time he usually needed. He walked to the common hall where he found about a hundred men there. He took the stew they were serving and went to sit alone in his corner. He didn’t really wish to speak to anybody right now. Since Winterfell, he avoided company.

It seemed that company didn’t avoid him though, since Malcolm Branfield came to sit with him.

“Glad to see that you’re strong enough to walk again,” his uncle-in-law told him.

“Thanks,” he replied shortly. He still didn’t really feel like talking.

“Our men who have gone hunting around Castle Black found several wights, and strangely they didn’t seem hostile. I think this may have a link with the White Walker you killed.”

“How?” he asked, completely uninterested.
“The wights started to act weird right after you destroyed it. They no longer seemed to know what to do. Some wights started to fight each other, others fell limp on the ground, and others just threw themselves on us. But they were no longer acting as if they had orders, or objectives. It was like an army without a general, but worse. We keep finding more wights in the Gift, and our men say they never fight. They claim they look like dead men, and real dead men.”

“Good thing,” he said.

“Gerold, you probably saved thousands of men when you destroyed the White Walker. You should be proud.”

Of course, he should be proud. Yesterday, when he woke up for the first time, Ser Davos Seaworth had come to see him, telling about what happened after the White Walker was destroyed. It was just like Malcolm said. The Onion Knight thought that the wights had no master to obey anymore, just like when Jon Snow killed the Night King at Winterfell.

Gerold had risked his life, endangered it. He fought not only for his family, but for the whole Realm and for their new queen, and he had defeated a foe very few could boast to have defeated. He almost gave his life to kill it. He should feel something. Pride. Happiness. Relief. Satisfaction. Exhaustion. The problem was he didn’t feel a thing. He felt hollow. It was like this since he left Winterfell.

“Still thinking about my niece?” Malcolm asked.

Gerold didn’t answer. Of course, he thought about her. He always thought about her, and about his son, ever since Garlan told about him before they marched on the Wall.

You may come in. The words haunted him. Just before they left Winterfell, he went to see her. He knocked at her door and called for her. You may come in. He had not heard her voice in months. It was still as beautiful as he remembered. He had wondered back then if she would look any different, after going through a pregnancy and bringing their child into the world. He wanted to walk in, look at her, hold her into his arms and kiss her like he used to. He wanted to smell the scent of her hair, feel the warmth of her skin against his, gaze into her green eyes. But he didn’t walk in. He turned the handle, but barely pushed the door. He was afraid, afraid of how she might react to his presence.

He had abandoned her, to obey a family that barely respected him, a family that barely gave him any value. A family that had been ready to send him in the North to get rid of a thirdborn son. That was probably the best thing his grandfather had ever done for him, to arrange his marriage with Mira, even though Gerold’s happiness had never played any role in that decision.

He only opened the door enough to speak to her without having wood and stone splitting them apart. He told her many things. He didn’t remember them all. But there was one thing he remembered saying very clearly. He loved her. I love you. These were the last words he told her, and he thought that they might be the last he would ever tell her. Back then, he wasn’t sure he would come back to her, and he wasn’t sure either if he wanted to. Now he was almost certain to go back to her, and he still wasn’t sure if he wanted to see her again. In fact, he wanted nothing more than to see her again, but he dreaded to face her.

Abandoning a woman alone with a child when he’s yours is probably one of the things I despise the most. I hope you will never meet a Forrester again, because they all want to skin you alive right now. The words of Tyrion Lannister resonated in his head. The disdain and hatred on his face had remained in his memory, very clear. And when Gerold arrived at Winterfell, he had to face the judging expressions of the Forresters too. First Mira’s sister, Talia, and then her little brother Ryon. After that, he never had the courage to face his wife, and thus he ran away. For the second time, he left her behind.
Malcolm Branfield had been kinder with him, especially after the Second Battle of Winterfell. His uncle-in-law spent some time with him on their way north when he could spare the time, and they talked about Mira. Her uncle told him several anecdotes about her, some he knew about, some he didn’t know about. There were small details about the way she slept, the way she talked or moved that came to his mind during these conversations. They were all beautiful memories and he cherished them, for he was afraid there would be no more in the future.

“Look, this war is about to end. I can feel when a war is coming to an end, and this one is about to end,” Malcolm told Gerold. “You’ll see her again.”

A long silence lingered between them, until Gerold finally asked his uncle-in-law a question. “Have you ever been married, Malcolm?”

“No. There was a time when I almost got married, but in the end, I didn’t.”

“What happened?”

Mira’s uncle let his spoon into his bowl, his stew half-eaten. Gerold had barely touched it. “Not long before Robert’s Rebellion started, my father arranged a marriage between me and Marissa Edgerton. She was the youngest daughter of her family, the third, a little like I was the youngest son of mine. It was an appropriate match. My parents didn’t intend to leave me with nothing, so for Marissa’s father it was a rather good deal. He just had to bring enough money, which he had agreed to do. I suppose I would have lived happily with her, hadn’t it been the war.”

“Why didn’t you marry her after the war was over?”

“House Branfield technically disappeared after the war. After the Battles of the Trident and the Bells, some families in the Crownlands turned against the Mad King and sided with Robert Baratheon and Ned Stark. My father wasn’t among them. He fought for his king until the end. He died on the fields of battle, and so did my brothers. I only escaped the slaughter because I was in the North when Lord Stark and his son were killed. My brother-in-law kept me at Ironrath as a guest. His wife may have been a Branfield, but he was loyal first and above all to House Stark. I spent the entire war in the North, and when this was all over and my whole family was dead, well, there was nothing left to do but to accept the situation. Elissa was married to a Northerner, so she didn’t have to suffer from the fall of our family. She tried to negotiate for our family’s lands and titles to be given to me, provided that I would swear fealty to Robert Baratheon, but Robert didn’t see it that way. Finally, Robert decided to let me live if I swore fealty to him, but he forbade me from ever coming back on my family’s lands and forced me to give up any claim on them. I was allowed to live with my sister at Ironrath. Gregor was very kind with me. He tried to talk the king into giving me back my family’s rights, but to no avail. So he made up a place for me in his household. But I was left with nothing, and now I lived far from the Crownlands. Lord Edgerton cancelled the betrothal. I had nothing left to give to his daughter, let alone to him, and he didn’t want his house to be associated with mine. And so I spent the next twenty years in the North, seeing my nephews and nieces grow. In some way, they were the children I could never have.”

“Do you miss her sometimes?”

“I can’t really miss someone I never met.” Gerold frowned. “You only met Mira two weeks before your wedding. For myself, I never got he chance to meet the woman I was betrothed to. In fact, the union was decided without me, while I was visiting Elissa. I never saw Marissa, and she never saw me.”

“Do you think your life would have been better with her?”
“Maybe, though I wouldn’t have married her without the certainty that I could provide for her and our children. The moment the lands of the Branfields were taken away from our family, I knew I could never marry.”

“In this case, perhaps I should never have married your niece.”

“Don’t say that, Gerold.”

“Why not?”

“Because it’s useless. For a very long time, I wished that my family had never died, that we never lost our lands, but it is futile to wish for something that will never happen, or to wish that things had been different. It will not change the past. You are married now, you have a son, and thus you have a responsibility towards both your son and your wife.”

“What if my wife doesn’t want to see me again? What if she hates me?”

“Mira doesn’t hate you.”

“And how can you know that?”

“Because I am her uncle. I was there when she was born, and I saw her grow into the woman she is today. I didn’t see her much after she left for Highgarden, but I know her very well. I spoke with her when we stopped at Winterfell, and believe me, she doesn’t hate you. In fact, I’m ready to bet whatever you want that the only thing she wants is for you to come back.”

“Why would she want that? She told you?”

“No.” And here he foolishly hoped for the best. “But I know this is what she wants.”

“I doubt it.”

“Do you want to see her again?” Malcolm asked him.

“I don’t know.”

“Well, you will have no choice. When you ride south, you will have to speak to her. Why don’t you want to see her again? She is your wife.”

“A wife that I abandoned, when she was pregnant.”

“Well then, perhaps it’s time for you to repair the damage.”

“How?”

“By not leaving her alone again. Look, Mira has always been the most open-minded of the children of Elissa and Gregor. If someone can understand why you left her behind, that’s her.”

“But she’s the one I left behind. Do you really think she could forgive me that?”

“The only way for you to find out is to face her. If you don’t, you will regret it for the rest of your life. You’ll ask yourself all the time what would have happened, had you just talked to her.”

Gerold didn’t reply yet. He wanted to see Mira again, of course, but there was something else that stopped him from going back to her.
“What if I can’t forgive myself?”

Malcolm Branfield looked at him for a moment. “Well, in this case, I know someone who might help you with that.”

“Really?”

“My niece.” Gerold rolled his eyes. “Listen, my boy, you are a married man and a father. You have responsibilities. Your wife has duties as well, and Mira gets it. She’s not going to turn her back on you.”

“Why wouldn’t she? I did.”

“Because she is your wife. The problems are between the two of you, and you will never solve them unless you talk about it. I can see that you’re afraid, but my niece is afraid as well. She just had a baby, she’s all alone, her husband left her, and all that in the middle of winter and a war. How do you think she feels?”

A moment went on where none of them talked as Gerold thought about it. Of course, Gerold had thought about how Mira felt about him. What he never truly thought about was how his wife felt overall. He had ridden to Winterfell to fight the White Walkers. He was ready to die for her, and he still was, but he never thought about how she felt with all these dangers around. He never asked her. He never got the chance to.

“She needs you, Gerold, as much you need her from what I can see. All this will be over soon. You’ll have the chance to see her again, and this time open the door. My niece may be keeping it closed, but it’s not locked. You only have to open it.”

Gerold was lost in his thoughts for the rest of the time they spent eating their stew. Malcolm Branfield went back to work once it was over. Gerold lingered a little behind. His injury prevented him from going to patrol. At best, he could stand guard upon battlements or around camp’s limits, but there were no battlements to guard right now, and he was dispensed of guard duty for the time being. The healer feared his wound might fester or worse, considering it was made by no ordinary blade. For now, Gerold was healing normally. Apart from two missing fingers on his left hand, he got out of this war unscathed. He had lost one on his way to Ironrath back from Highpoint, and the second after he left Ironrath, before he found the army of Daenerys Targaryen. Maybe that was the price he had to pay for abandoning his wife.

Gerold finally left the common hall and walked back to his room, slowly progressing with the help of his stick, but quicker than he had while descending the stairs. Before he arrived at the steps of the towers where he temporarily resided, he came across two men. One wore the black cloak of the Night’s Watch. He was one of the few members of the Night’s Watch who survived the Fall of the Wall and the war that followed, and one Gerold tried to avoid as much as he could. The other was older, with a balding head and a greyish beard, but he didn’t wear the black.

The two men were engaged in a conversation, but the youngest of the two stopped as soon as he spotted Gerold. He stared at the knight, giving some attention to his stick, then returning his gaze to his face.

“You’re lucky you only got injured, Hightower. This White Walker should have ended you.”

He walked pass him, not without giving a punch into his shoulder. Gerold held his stick more firmly to avoid falling on the ground. The old man remained beside.
“Gared Tuttle doesn’t like you for sure, Ser Gerold,” Ser Davos Seaworth, the Onion Knight, told him.

“I’m not surprised. Sometimes, I hate myself,” he replied to the former Hand of Stannis Baratheon.

“Don’t. If we start to hate ourselves, we will never live. And you have no reason to do so. You probably killed the last White Walker, and without Valyrian steel. That’s no small feat.”

“Yes, I know,” he replied, bored.

“You miss your wife, don’t you?” the Onion Knight asked.

“Yes, I do. It’s been months now since I saw her.” Yes, he missed Mira, but there was so much more about her that weighed down on him, and he dared not to speak about it. Not again.

“I understand. I haven’t seen my Marya in years. She still lives in our keep, alone. I didn’t have news from her in an eternity. I don’t even know what happened to her when the Dragon Queen invaded the Stormlands, but I hope she’s well. I tell myself that I would know it if she had died.” The old knight sighed. “I was a better smuggler than a knight, a better knight than a King’s Hand, a better King’s Hand than a husband. I left my family behind to serve my king, and I wonder today if it was worth it. My only consolation is that by fighting the dead, I protected her. Sometimes we must leave the ones we love behind to protect them.”

If only that was the reason why Gerold had left Mira behind. As he thought so, they heard a powerful scream through the air. The scream wasn’t human, and it came from the other side of the breached Wall.

Chapter End Notes

Gerold is a POV who arrived quite late in the story. This is only the second chapter told from his perspective. If we think about it, Game of Thrones is mostly told by powerful people, or people who live very close to powerful people. More important, it is told from the point of view of the most powerful among the powerful (safe for exceptions like Brienne and people who are POVs for first or last chapters of certain of the books).

Gerold represents the point of view of the middle-class of medieval times, if there was one. Although he is a Hightower, he doesn't wield much more power than a commander in the Lannister army like Ser Addam Marbrand. He is some sort of crossing between the emerging knight trying to find his place in the world and the landed knight who is fighting for the people he loves and the lands he owns. I think this gives value to his perspective because, unlike Davos, he's not very close to those who rule and decide, and he doesn't have much of an influence on the decisions that are being taken. That doesn't make him less valuable or less important.

Chapter Notes

Hi everyone.

1,000,000 words!

With this chapter, "A Shadow and a Wolf" officially becomes the first ASOIAF and Game of Thrones fanfiction on Archive of Our Own to reach a million words!

It is crazy, and even crazier is the fact that this story isn't over yet at a million words.

I want to thank everyone who followed me on this journey that started over two years ago. I could never do this without your support. Every person who read this story drives me to keep writing. You cannot imagine how I like it when I see someone is reading, kudoing, commenting or bookmarking this story. Again, I thank you all.

Now, to the new chapter that I should have uploaded two days ago.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

JON XVI

They saw the Wall long before they reached it. They were fifteen men and women and two dragons who left Highpoint for the Lands of Always Winter. They were only six and one dragon who made it back to the known lands. Jon was the only one who came on Rhaegal’s back to survive. Thoros of Myr died at the hand of a White Walker, and Beric Dondarrion was killed trying to save his friend. With them, the Brotherhood Without Banners was gone. Jon’s Northerners died at the mountain where they stopped before the final battle, along with one of Toregg’s men. The second man died at the sacred site, overwhelmed by wights. Melisandre gave her life to defeat the dead, and Revan and Bastila remained behind to cover their retreat. Only one of the four Red Priests who had gone with them came back, and she was silent as a crypt.

None of them really spoke on their way back. Jon should have been relieved. They did it. They defeated the White Walkers, and for good this time. However, a feeling lingered that everything wasn’t completely over. That couldn’t be all. Jon didn’t believe an enemy could be defeated for good only by destroying some altar. Wars were not won with a secret weapon that solved every problem, or by cutting the head of one man. He knew that magic existed, but he didn’t believe in magical solution. They only destroyed the place where the White Walkers created themselves, or reproduced, however it was called. What if they built another one, or if there was already another one somewhere, something they were not aware of? And what of the White Walkers who still wandered the land? They could be anywhere from the North to the Lands of Always Winter. The territory north of the Wall was vast and mostly uncharted. A White Walker, or many White Walkers, could be hiding there. If any of this was true, then Melisandre, Revan and Bastila might have sacrificed their lives for nothing.

Jon didn’t know Bastila. They barely exchanged a few words. However, he found himself regretting Revan. For the brief time he knew him, Jon felt the weigh this man was bearing on his shoulders and the wisdom that came with it. During their discussion before the battle, for a very brief moment, he had the impression to talk with someone who had seen as much if not more than Maester Aemon. The man was a Red Priest. He was supposed to be a fanatic, ready to do anything for the Lord of Light, just like Melisandre, and yet it wasn’t what Jon had found about the man, no matter how little he knew about him. Jon had talked with the surviving priestess, Meetra. She spent her time in contemplated silence, like most of them, and stared in a fire whenever they stopped. She didn’t tell him much, but she seemed to have known Revan in some way. There was one thing she said that he would never forget.

“He spent his life preparing himself for this moment. He gave up everything he held dear, all that so people who never knew him and never heard of him could be safe. All that so that millions of people who were complete strangers to him could live. And now he’s gone, and he will not come back.”

It reminded Jon of a discussion he had with Qhorin Halfhand a long time ago, when he just joined the Night’s Watch and he thought he understood what it was to be a sworn brother of the Night’s Watch. Your death will be a gift for them south of the Wall. They’ll never know what you’ve done. They’ll never know how you died. They won’t even know your damn name. But they’ll be alive because some nameless bastard north of the Wall gave his life for theirs. It wasn’t a nameless bastard who gave his life for theirs. No nameless person gave his life in that war. These people all had names, whether it was Revan, Beric, Thoros, Grenn, Pyp, Asher or Melisandre.

Jon thought he regretted the death of Melisandre more than anyone else’s death. He shouldn’t. The woman committed horrible crimes, but in the end she played a vital role in the defeat of their enemy. He knew when she used her powers now. She had helped Rhaegal to destroy the Walkers’ altar, increasing his strength like she did for him at Winterfell. Now she was dead, and finally Jon found that he could forgive her. It saddened him that the woman had to die for that. She saved him, twice, and he couldn’t forgive her while she was alive.

She had looked at him before the life left her. While he ran to Drogon at the end of the battle, he looked at her unmoving frame on the ground, and their eyes met for a brief moment. Then she closed hers and they never opened again. They left her body there. She wouldn’t even have a proper burial, like everyone they left behind. Jon hoped that the volcano would consume her body forever, preventing her from returning as a wight. The thought of a possible wight with powers like Melisandre’s sent chills along his spine.

Drogon followed the Wall, flying east, until they came upon the breach. From where they flew, high in the sky, Jon could see Castle Black, or what was left of it, along with many tents south of it. Their army made it. The banner of the three-headed dragon flew over the Wall. He allowed relief and some joy to ash over his worries and doubts for a moment. Things were getting better.

Daenerys led her dragon downwards. There wasn’t enough space for Drogon in the courtyard of Castle Black, so instead she landed south of it, outside its walls, between the castle and the large encampment for their army. They all climbed down, Jon, Daenerys, Meetra, Garlan, Dickon Tarly and his man Rikerd. They were the survivors, the only people left alive to tell about what happened in the Lands of Always Winter.

People gathered around them. They were all silent. No one dared to say a word. Jon supposed their men expected them to say something, but he couldn’t think of something to say about what happened. Finally, it was Drogon who broke the silence and screamed. A Dothraki burrowed under furs stepped forward and turned toward all the people behind him. He said something, spoke in his own language that Jon couldn’t understand. Then he drew his arakh and roared in a very bad Westerosi.

“Our queen is back!”
All the Dothrakis followed suit. They all shouted one name. Daenerys. Many other Westerosi did the same. The Northerners hesitated, but then some of the Free Folk joined the shouting, and a few Northerners imitated them. Soon, everyone was shouting Daenerys’s name. Jon looked at his aunt’s face. She betrayed no emotion as she was proclaimed queen by all the Seven Kingdoms.

Later, they were all together in one of the largest rooms of Castle Black that survived. The two Hightower knights, Garlan and Gerold, Lord Dickon Tarly, the Red Priestess Meetra, Jon, Daenerys, Ser Davos Seaworth, Toregg the Tall and Eddison Tollett. They told each other of the events that happened on each side of the Wall concerning the dead.

“Well, let’s hope these fuckers are gone for good,” Edd said once Jon was done relating the events that happened.

“It may be too soon to cry victory but judging from the wights we came upon in the Gift recently, I’d say whatever controlled them is gone,” Ser Davos said.

“There might still be White Walkers alive somewhere,” Jon pointed out.

“No, there are none,” Meetra declared and everyone looked at her. “The dead marched on the Wall because the servants of the Great Oher ordered them to. They received their orders from them and only from them. If they do nothing, it’s because they have no orders anymore, and this means the Others are gone.”

“But wights kept attacking us back there, in the north. They were still a danger.”

“Yes, but there were still Others to command them. There was at least one where we were, and Revan destroyed it while we flew away. Ser Gerold Hightower must have eliminated the last two days ago. That’s why the dead are doing nothing now. The last Other who could control them is gone. Without someone to control them, they are only walking dead without purpose, lifeless moving bodies without goals that will wander the land until they are burned or what’s left of their bodies fall apart.”

“So you say it’s over?” Daenerys asked the Red Priestess.

“Yes, it is, your Grace. Evil is vanquished.”

“Good.” That was all. The greatest enemy the Seven Kingdoms had ever known was defeated, and all Daenerys could find to say was good. Jon couldn’t find something else to say either. “Now that this is over, I believe it would be better to send back home the southern armies. Many are not accustomed to winter and they are longing for home.”

“We still need men to defend the Wall and rebuild it, and to hunt down the remaining wights,” Jon said. “I think it would be too presumptuous to believe we have already won. There’s a risk that the enemy could still be out there.”

“Jon Snow is right,” Toregg said. “I will believe the dead are gone when we haven’t seen them for another eight thousand years.”

“I agree,” Ser Davos intervened. “It would be better to keep some men. We need a few thousand, at the least. The Northerners and the Free Folk won’t suffice. Too many of them died in the war. We will also need supplies to last through winter…”

“We will provide what you need,” the queen interrupted, “but most of my men will go back home nonetheless. Someone told me the Northerners don’t like strangers on their territory, and I saw he was right since I arrived in the North.” She shot a look at Jon before she continued. “A long war just came to an end, but this is only the beginning. It is easy to win a war, but it is far more difficult to rebuild when the war is over. I will give you all the help that you need, and I will make sure that the Wall is properly manned. I will not turn my back on you like the Baratheons did. Now, are there any news from the south?”

“Yes, there are. Tyrion Lannister wrote from Gulltown some time ago. Harrold Arryn is dead and most of the Lords of the Vale have bent the knee.”

“Most of them? That means some still resist.”

“According to Lord Tyrion, only minor lords who don’t have the means to fight you. They are merely small pockets of resistance. All the powerful lords have surrendered. Yohn Royce sent his pledge from Eastwatch-by-the-Sea.” The Lord of Runestone, one of the most powerful and influential men in the Vale, had managed to keep Eastwatch-by-the-Sea despite the attacks of the White Walkers ever since the Fall of the Wall. If he bent the knee, no one in the Vale would dare or would be able to resist for long. “The other lords of the Vale who are in the North did the same, and the army Harrold Arryn raised is gone. It seems that all the Seven Kingdoms are yours, your Grace. Tyrion Lannister is asking you to meet him at the Gates of the Moon. He is gathering the Lords of the Vale there.”

“Did he tell you if he found his wife and their child?”

Jon listened attentively to the answer. “The Lady Sansa is safe. She managed to escape from Harrold Arryn and Petyr Baelish who held her prisoner. However, there are no news from Joanna Lannister. She’s still missing.”

Jon was relieved to hear that Sansa was alive and well, though the news that her daughter was still missing were distressing. Jon hoped she had nothing. Sansa faced more than enough ordeals in the last years. She shouldn’t have to lose her daughter as well.

“There is also word of some trouble in King’s Landing between the Tyrells and the Martells,” Ser Davos continued.

“That’s no surprise. The Reach and Dorne have a history carved with blood,” Ser Garlan Hightower said.

“I will deal with this,” Daenerys declared. “I will head for the capital and stop by the Vale on my way to meet Lord Tyrion. In the meantime, the Dothrakis will head back to the south. They have no place this far north. I will order every house to give some men to keep the Wall and progressively call them back home.” She turned to Toregg. “I know the Free Folk are living on the lands of the Gift. I expect you to help in the defence of the North and to respect the laws of the Realm.”

“We will,” Toregg said after a moment. Tormund’s son had been present when Mance Rayder died, and the war against the dead had softened his resolve to not bend the knee, but Jon expected this to cause problems in the long term. You couldn’t expect the Free Folk to change that much.

“My men and I will stay in the North,” Ser Gerold Hightower said. “My place is there now, anyway, and I have some matters to settle before I go back in the Reach.”

No one opposed his decision. Volunteers to stay in the North would be rare. The rest of the meeting was spent deciding how many men would be dispatched along the Wall and how. When it was over, Daenerys asked Jon to stay. She needed to talk with him.

She looked at him for a moment without saying anything, her face expressionless. When she finally spoke, it was with a detached voice.

“So, it’s over.”

“Aye. It’s over,” he repeated.

“What are you going to do?” He was surprised by the question.

“Just what I told you. I’ll say my vows again and join the Night’s Watch like I did years ago.”

She kept looking at him, her face betraying nothing. “Do you have to?”

“Your Grace?”

“I’ve been thinking about it, Jon.” He was surprised that she called him only by his first name. Previously, she always used his full name, Jon Snow. “You are the only family I have now. I would like you to come back to King’s Landing with me.”

Jon was caught off guard by this. That was the last thing he expected. “Your Grace, I do not understand.”

For the first time today, he thought he saw some emotion on her face. “Back in the north, before we went to the place of the White Walkers, before the battle, I wanted to tell that if I was to die, then the Iron Throne would be yours. I still believe it. I want you to stay by my side and help me rule the Seven Kingdoms. I tried to rule by myself in Slaver’s Bay and I failed. I cannot rule alone. I need help.”

“You have advisors for that, and Tyrion Lannister is your Hand. You told me you trusted him.”

“Yes, I do, but he’s not my family. You are. I need you by my side, Jon.”

Her eyes were pleading him to accept. She was being honest. She really wanted his help. “I can’t.” He shook his head. Stannis once offered him to be Warden of the North, and he refused. He wouldn’t accept a similar offer today. “I can’t. I’m needed here.”

“The dead are gone.”

“We don’t know for sure. And even if they’re gone, who is to say they will never come back? I swore an oath to protect the realms of men. I have to uphold it. I thought I was released from it when I died, but I was wrong. Melisandre said she didn’t know why I came back, but I think I do. I am the watcher on the walls, the shield that guards the realms of men. I tried to be a king and I couldn’t even defend my own country. My uncle Eddard Stark went to King’s Landing to be Hand of the King and he died. Robb marched on the south and he died too. My family was never meant to rule the Seven Kingdoms. We were meant to protect them, and that’s what I intend to do, here. Your place is in the capital, your Grace. Not because it is your right, but because you deserve it. You just saved the Seven Kingdoms. We would never have won against the dead without you. Without you, we would all be dead. You’re the queen, and I’m a sworn brother of the Night’s Watch. My place is here.”

She looked at him for a long moment. “There’s no way to change your mind?”

“No.”

She smiled sadly. She seemed disappointed. Not angry, but disappointed. “Well, it is true what they say about the Starks. They remain true to their word. We have that in common. Just know that you will always be welcomed in King’s Landing.”
“I cannot speak for the future Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, but as I am concerned, you’ll be welcomed at the Wall anytime.”

She frowned. “I thought you were Lord Commander.”

“I left the Watch and came back. If I am to be Lord Commander again, it will be my brothers’ choice.” No Lord Commander had been elected after him. Edd was just accepted by the other sworn brothers without discussion, but the Lord Commander needed to be elected.

She nodded. “A Targaryen in the North and another in the south. We will be everywhere.”

She looked at him for a very long time, sadness plain. Right now, Jon wanted to go back with her, but he made a promise to stay at the Wall. He had to make sure things were truly over. Azor Ahai left before he finished the work, and it cost the lives of hundreds of thousand within the last few years. And Jon wasn’t dumb, he knew many Northerners still wanted him for their king. Joining the Night’s Watch again was the only way no one would try to use him against his aunt.

“Farewell, Jon Snow.”

She made it to leave the room, but before she did, Jon told her one last thing. “Dany, I’m sorry for Rhaegal.”

She turned back to look at him. “Dany? It’s been a long time since someone called me that?”

With a last smile, she left, for good. Jon left as well some time later and walked toward the Wall. He looked at its top. He remembered his first nights patrolling it. He was assigned one mile of it to guard, and the watch commander told him to walk along this mile to keep his blood from freezing. Tyrion Lannister had joined him and pissed off the edge of the Wall during one of his guards, right before he left. How could Jon have known back then that the little man would marry Sansa and become the Hand of the Queen for his aunt? It was also there that his uncle Benjen stood with him the first time he went to the top of the Wall, and before he left for a ranging to never came back. According to Bran, he was still alive out there, somewhere, kept alive by the magic of the Children of the Forest. It was also at the top of the Wall that he spoke of Ygritte to Sam before Mance Rayder attacked and Ygritte died. She died in his arms, an arrow shot between her breasts because she hesitated when she had the opportunity to kill him. So much had happened here. There had been tragedies, but there were also good memories. He made friends, met good people, and although some were gone, they had died for a reason, not for a king or for glory, but for the people south of the Wall, so they could live because nameless bastards, priests, farmboys and singers gave their lives for them. That was Jon’s home, and it would always be his home.

The men had begun to erect new barricades, but they were still in the early works, so it was easy for Jon to walk through them. It was a day without snow, and after the long journey on dragon’s back, the wind that struck his face felt like a light breeze. A red figure stood with her back turned on him. For a moment, Jon believed it was Melisandre, but he quickly realized that instead of the long and flaming red hair of the woman who brought him back from the dead, this one had very short brown hair. She was the only priest to survive the Lands of Always Winter. Jon walked to stand by her side and looked to the north, to the real North. Not far from there, he burned Ygritte's body. All that happened so recently, and yet it seemed like a lifetime ago.

“If it wouldn’t bother you, Jon Snow, I will stay at Castle Black for the time being,” she told him.

“I won’t say no.” After seeing what the Red Priests could do, he wouldn’t turn down their help.

“They say that life and death are engaged into a battle that never ends. The Others are gone, that I’m certain, but the Great Other will find a way back. Somehow, he will come back, stronger. Perhaps in another form. Perhaps this time he will not be wielding a sword or bringing winter down on us, but he will come back, and we will have to be ready.”

“We’re fighting an enemy that’s not going anywhere,” Jon summarized, thinking again of the words of Qhorin Halfhand.

“Right. He will always be there.”

“Why are you doing this? Giving your lives for people you don’t even know?”

“Why do you?”

Her blue eyes stared at him. “I don’t know,” he confessed. “It seems to be the right thing to do.”

“We serve the light, Jon Snow. Our duty is to spread it, for where there is no light, darkness settles, and it stays. The only way to stop the world from turning into ashes is to shed light upon the darkness so it retreats in corners hopefully no one ever goes to visit.” She looked at the horizon. “Darkness had taken a hold on this country. Now light is upon it, but light can always leave. I will not allow it. I will stay, until the Lord tells me otherwise.”

A long silence followed.

“Do you think Revan is truly dead?” Jon Snow asked her.

“This time, I’m afraid he is,” she said in a heavy voice. “But this is not the first time he disappears only to come back when we need him the most. I’m not giving up on him, not yet. The Lord of Light may still have plans for him, just like he has for every one of us.” That was a change from when they talked during their journey.

“Who was he, really?”

The Red Priestess Meetra turned to look at him. “I think you already know, Jon Snow.”

She walked away and went back to Castle Black. Jon stood there alone and stared at the horizon, mountains and forests ahead of him. Could Revan have survived? They didn’t see him die. He even destroyed the White Walker he fought as they flew away. Meetra just told him he knew who Revan was. Jon had a mad, stupid idea of who Revan might be, but it couldn’t be true. No, Meetra was wrong. Ygritte and Melisandre had been right all along. You know nothing, Jon Snow.

Chapter End Notes

It seems the enemy was defeated for good, but let's remember nothing is ever certain in Game of Thrones, and like a small man once said, "Every time we deal with an enemy, we create two more."

The dynamic between Jon and Daenerys is not the same as in the show. When I started writing this, Season 7 had not aired yet and I didn't plan for a Jon/Daenerys pairing. The nature of their relationship is more a brother/sister rather than lovers, even if among the Targaryens, the distinction is sometimes hard to make.

As for Revan, he will not appear again in this story. Initially, he was only supposed to be a cameo, like most of the Red Priests with names of Star Wars, Harry Potter, Black Mage and Witcher characters, but he ended as quite an important character due to my fascination for this Star Wars character. I ended giving him quite an important role. I tried to keep him in the back stage, but I'm afraid I failed and couldn't resist to make him important for the story. And for those of you who have theories about the true identity of Revan in this story, everything will be revealed when the epilogue is uploaded, along with a few other mysteries.

Next chapter: Mira
“We will leave in the morning,” Talia told her. “You feel ready for this?”

“I made the journey with Rodrik inside me. I think I can do the same with him in my arms, especially if there are no dead left.”

She looked at her son, who was sleeping peacefully as she carried it with her. She and Talia were heading back to her chambers. Mira had recovered from the delivery, though she still had to be careful to not overextend herself according to the maester’s recommendations. She wished Ortengryn had been there to help her deliver. He would have loved to bring a second generation of Forresters in the world.

“I thank you, Talia, for organizing everything.”

“It’s normal that I do it, Mira. You’re taking care of Rodrik. You don’t need to be bothered by departure preparations. Can I hold my nephew for a moment?”

“Of course.”

She carefully gave Rodrik to Talia. It was a welcomed relief for her arms. She didn’t realize that carrying a child over a whole castle could take a toll on your arms. Though she didn’t complain about it. Rodrik had been a light for them all in their darkest hour.

They were about to leave Winterfell, Mira, Talia and their remaining men who didn’t die in the war and who didn’t leave with Lord Glover after the Third Battle of Winterfell. Ironrath was occupied by their men again, and the Glovers had claimed again Deepwood Motte. They had chosen to remain in Winterfell while the war against the dead still raged, but now that the White Walkers were defeated, Mira and Talia had agreed they could go back home. It should have been a time for rejoice, but neither of the two sisters felt very joyful in truth.

They arrived at Mira’s chamber. Talia placed very carefully Rodrik in his crib. Mira looked at her son, envying him. He didn’t know about everything that happened all around him. She wished she could just sleep like him and not care about problems, although she knew it was a luxury she would never be able to allow herself in the future.

She and Talia left Rodrik to sleep and went out into the corridor.

“Is there any chance that he may come back?” Mira asked.

“I don’t think so. He made himself very clear.”
“How could he leave like that?”

“How could he leave like that?”

“Don’t blame Ryon too much, Mira. He’s been through a lot. Sometimes, it’s easier to run away, like for Asher.”

“But Asher had no choice, he was exiled. Ryon… He didn’t have to do this. He could have stayed with us. How could he flee when things were finally about to go back to normal?”

Talia looked away for a moment before she refocused her attention on her sister. “Ryon was there when Ethan was killed, Mira. He was there too at Asher’s wedding, when Mother died. He’s lost everyone, and he’s not even ten. For him, things will never go back to normal because they were never normal. I don’t think he could have come back and lived with us, not with the ghosts of everyone else.”

“I know.” Mira sighed. “It’s not easy for anyone. We lost so many people. Who could have guessed that our parents, Ethan, Rodrik and Asher would all die when this war began? Ironrath will never be the same. And now that Ryon is gone…” Mira looked at her sister. “Please tell me you’re not going to leave you too.”

“I won’t. I will never be far, Mira, even after I’ll be married. You will never be alone. And don’t forget, you have Rodrik.”

That was a small consolation. If only she didn’t have to think about Gerold each time she looked at her son. Rodrik also made her think of Ryon. He had only been a baby when she left Ironrath, and in her mind he was still that little baby she left behind when she rode for Highgarden. Perhaps that was why his departure was so hard for her. She couldn’t believe that the little baby who made her mother so happy, the first baby Mira held in her arms, was gone and would never come back.

The news of the final defeat of the army of the dead had arrived yesterday, and Brandon Stark, who came back from Highpoint and was acting Lord of Winterfell for the time being, announced it in the Great Hall. The news was welcomed by loud cheers. The war was over. But the merriment Mira and Talia felt was short-lived, for this morning they found Ryon’s chamber empty with a note left on his pillow.

With his childish handwriting, Ryon told them that he was leaving with Beskha for Essos. The news had been shattering. They couldn’t send their men after him, nor could they stop him from leaving. Ryon was officially Lord of Ironrath after Asher died, and he had full freedom to leave the North if he wanted. Their men had to let him go. He gave them the order just before he left, along with an order to not warn his sisters before they found his note.

The words he left hurt. He said he could never live again in the North, not after everything that happened, and that he was heading for the Free Cities to live like Asher did. He said that everyone was gone and that he had no reason to stay here. Mira would have thought that she and Talia meant something for their little brother. Apparently, they didn’t mean enough. Mira had been away for so long, and Ryon was separated from Talia for a very long time as well when he was a prisoner of House Whitehill.

Ever since they were reunited, Mira noticed how often Ryon was with Beskha. He even ate with her, most of the time apart from them, and seldom talked to his sisters. Perhaps it had been partially their fault. When Mira learned she was pregnant, she focused her attention on her baby and Talia helped her. They drifted away further from Ryon. Their little brother, as far as they knew, spent his days training with Asher’s friend. The woman had taken a liking on Ryon, and somehow she had become his big sister, more than his actual sisters.
Now Ryon was gone. Mira hoped he would come back. Perhaps it was only a folly of childhood, but she didn’t think so. Ryon himself had given orders to their men to not tell Mira and Talia about his leaving before they found his message. Mira felt that she had lost her last brother. She would head back to Ironrath tomorrow with the last sibling she had left, her little sister Talia, who grew taller every day and would get married soon.

“Do you think Father and Mother ever thought that this could happen to us?” Mira asked her sister.

“I don’t know. But I guess… Mother lost her family when she was quite young. Perhaps… perhaps she feared it, and that’s why she so desperately tried to kill Ludd Whitehill.”

“Gerold took care of him in the end.” Mentioning her husband was difficult for her, but she kept doing it all the same.

“I don’t think we can foresee that kind of things. I don’t think we can be prepared to lose all our family. How can we?”

“We can’t,” Mira replied. “We can’t.”

She tried to imagine losing her son, and she couldn’t. How could Sansa be feeling right now, her daughter’s fate being unknown? Mira tried to imagine her state if she was in her situation, and it was impossible.

“What are you going to do about your husband?”

“I don’t know, Talia. I guess… I should just hope that he comes back.”

“And what will you do if he does? I mean, how will you know that he’s not coming back because you’re the Lady of Ironrath now?”

My family gave me this army because they believed that I could become Lord of Ironrath. Gerold’s words played in her mind. Now that Ryon was gone, the laws of succession made Mira the Lady of Ironrath. Once again, Mira found herself at the head of what was left of her family, the first lady of House Forrester, something she never envisioned nor wished for. The Hightowers got what they wanted in the end.

“I guess we will have to find out,” Mira finally, unable to think of something else to do.

In truth, there was little they could do, even if they wanted. She and Gerold were bound for life and made their vows before the altar. Their marriage was consummated. Rodrik was the undeniable proof of it. Even if there was still a High Septon in King’s Landing or that a Council of Faith could be summoned, they couldn’t declare an annulment.

They could try to stop Gerold from ever entering Ironrath. Her father’s men would most likely stand by her decision, especially after the Hightowers abandoned them the first time, but nothing was guaranteed. The men of House Ironrath were exhausted by the recent conflicts and if the Hightowers decided to take matters in hand and to seize Ironrath by force, Mira doubted they had the strength to fight them. Of course, they could ask the help of House Stark, but even if the Wardens of the North stood for House Forrester, the Hightowers would be supported by Daenerys Targaryen without any doubt. The North had resisted the advance of the new queen in the beginning, to the opposite of the Reach that sided with her almost at the very moment she landed in Westeros. Both on military and politic grounds, Mira didn’t see her winning.

The only way to keep Ironrath out of the claws of House Hightower was to convince Gerold’s family to give up any claim on the castle by somehow agreeing that Mira was Lady of Ironrath and that Gerold wasn’t its lord, but she didn’t see how or why the Hightowers would agree to this. And to keep Gerold out of Ironrath, he and Mira would need to agree on some arrangement that would make them live apart. That wasn’t something Mira wanted.

She knew her husband well, or so she thought. They had spent a lot of time together, and they even had a son. She also knew how much pressure he received from his family. And she didn’t think he married her for Ironrath. If that had been the case, he wouldn’t have nearly killed his eldest brother after he slapped her in the face.

Mira knew what family could mean for someone. She had endangered Lady Margaery’s position in King’s Landing with her attempts to help her house. Somehow, she wasn’t afraid of her husband. She still resented him for leaving her with Rodrik, but if the sound of his voice had been any indication at Winterfell, he was truly sorry for what happened. The Book of the Father taught not to forgive up to seven times, but to seventy-seven times. Certainly, she could give her husband a second chance. If not his family, she could give him that chance, for she knew the Hightowers would want Ironrath and that it was all that interested them.

Mira had come to realize that the whole problem could be summarized to her relationship with her husband. Rodrik was a Hightower, and there was no way around it. With Ryon’s departure and all her brothers dead and without children, she would be the last Forrester to rule over Ironrath, no matter what happened. From there on, all that mattered was a reconciliation with her husband.

“I’ll need to talk to him, Talia. There’s no other way.”

“Alright, but I don’t like it,” her sister said bitterly.

“It’s not as if we had a choice. We cannot kill him. And I forbid you to do so,” she added as a warning.

Talia frowned. “You still love him.”

“He’s my husband, and the father of my child. I know you didn’t see him at his best, but if you had known him when we lived at Oldtown, you would understand.”

“If you say so, but I warn you, he won’t get Ironrath so easily. I’ll have my word to say.”

“He won’t get Ironrath, Talia,” Mira reassured her, placing a hand on her shoulder and speaking firmly. “Ironrath belongs to us, and it will be ours as long as we live. And one day, it will be Rodrik’s. The Hightowers won’t take it from us.”

They shared a smile and remained together for a little while longer before Talia went back to oversee the preparations for their departure.

Later in the evening, not long before the dinner was served, Mira went to see Brandon Stark. Sansa’s little brother seldom left his rooms. Meera Reed was one of the few people to see him. Even at dinners he only stayed the minimum time required and retired to his chambers early in the evening. He was nowhere to be seen either during breakfast or lunch. He reminded Mira of Lord Leyton Hightower who was seldom to be seen as well, remaining at the top of the Hightower most of the time.

Mira was welcomed inside the apartments of the Lord of Winterfell. Sansa’s brother was waiting for her, and Meera Reed was with him like always. He smiled as soon as she entered.

“Lady Mira, I’m glad to see you.”
“Thank you, my lord. Lady Meera,” she made a sign toward the daughter of Howland Reed, now the Lady of Greywater Watch. The young woman, who was about the same age as Mira but much smaller, forced a smile on her lips.

“Please, sit,” Lord Brandon told her. He shifted uneasily in his chair. Sansa told her that her brother used to climb to walls and that he loved to run and ride. The boy he was back when he lost the use of his legs must have been utterly broken.

The acting Lord of Winterfell turned toward Meera Reed. “Could you leave us alone a moment, please?”

“Of course. We won’t see each other ever again soon, so why not start now?”

She stormed out of the room and left Bran with a hurt expression. He forced himself to smile again after a moment and looked once again at Mira. “Please excuse her. She had a lot to deal with recently.”

“Yes, I know what happened to her father and her brother. I don’t blame her,” Mira replied. Sometimes, she wanted to snap as well. It was a chance that she learned to retain if not conceal her emotions while she was in the Reach.

“Me neither. She had a lot to bear on her shoulders. We all had. Look at me, the Three-Eyed Raven. And you now, the Lady of Ironrath. I’m sorry for Ryon.”

She nodded to acknowledge his support. “We’re leaving for Ironrath tomorrow, my lord. I came to thank you for granting us your hospitality and a refuge in these difficult hours. I also want to assure you that my family will not forget your kindness, and that we are all very grateful. Thank you.”

“You’re welcome. My family did their duty, and I’m glad you survived you, your sister, and your son. How is Rodrik?”

“He’s fine, and growing up.”

Brandon Stark smiled again. “Take care of him, and make sure that he’s prepared for when the time comes. I wasn’t ready when the war started. My parents should have prepared me better, but instead my lady mother wanted me to stay a child as long as possible. My lord father was better. He always said that winter is coming.”

“Winter is coming,” Mira echoed. Indeed, the Starks were always right.

“He led me to see an execution not long before he headed south,” Brandon Stark continued. “He told me that the man who passes the sentence must swing the sword, and he forced me to look at the man he beheaded. That man… he ran away from the Night’s Watch because he had seen the White Walkers, and we didn’t believe him. If we had, I wonder if everything could have been different. My father may never have gone to King’s Landing, and maybe all this war would never have happened.”

“No, indeed. Things would have been very different.” She thought of all the people she lost, all the people who might have lived had the North prepared for the invasion of the dead instead of warring in the south.

“Are you upset, Mira?” he asked.

She frowned. “Upset? Upset about what? About you?”
“No, about Ryon and the fact that he left.”

She closed her eyes. “I am. I didn’t see it coming.”

He nodded in understanding. “Meera is upset too.” He sighed deeply. “I’m going to tell everyone at dinner, so why not tell you now. I’m leaving, me too.”

“Leaving? Where?”

“I’m heading north. I’m returning north of the Wall, truth be told.”

“You can’t do this!” she exclaimed, perhaps a little too loud.

“I have to.”

“Why?”

“I have to.” He didn’t give her further explanations.

“You can’t do this. You are the Lord of Winterfell.”

“No, I’m not. I already made it clear to Daenerys. Sansa is going to be Lady of Winterfell and Wardeness of the North. She’s capable of that, I know it. She will be far better to rule than I am.”

“How can you say that?”

“I know it, that’s all.”

“But you can’t abandon your family.” Not you too. “You have sisters and you have a brother too, and they need you.”

“I know what you think, Mira,” he told her. “You think I’m not caring for the people I love, like Ryon.” As much as she would like to deny it, she couldn’t, for it was the truth. “But I care about them, and only that is a reason for me to leave.”

“How is it? You’re abandoning them, right when the war is over, right when you could all be together again.”

“We won’t be together again, Lady Mira. We’re no longer children. Jon is back at the Wall, and soon he will make his vows again. Arya cannot stay in one place for long. She will never be a lady and live in a castle, no more than my aunt. And Sansa… she has a husband, and a daughter, a life at Casterly Rock. No one needs me, but I’m needed north of the Wall.”

“For what?”

“To make sure the Long Night never comes back.”

He was stubborn. Mira had heard people saying that Brandon was close to madness, and she could understand their claim.

“How will you do that? You can’t even walk.”

He didn’t seem affected by the remembrance of his crippling. “Meera will accompany me to Castle Black, and from there I’ll have other people to help me. Don’t worry. I risk nothing, not now that the White Walkers are gone. I will leave soon. I will only stay for the time needed to organize everything for when I will be gone.”
She sighed. “That’s why Meera Reed looked so upset?”

“Yes,” he admitted on a regretful tone.

“Well, I hope you’ll be happy north of the Wall.”

“I’m not looking for happiness, Mira. I’m looking to be useful. I’m trying to do my duty.”

She almost scoffed. “If people only do their duty and are never happy for it, what’s the point to live? I wish you good luck, my lord.”

She stood up and left, but as she closed the door Brandon Stark told her one last thing.

“He doesn’t care about Ironrath, Lady Mira. He’s coming back for you.”

She walked away back to her chambers, where Rodrik was waiting for her. Ryon abandoned her, and now Bran was abandoning Sansa. Were families destined to be torn apart in times of peace and in times of war all alike? Mira and Talia lost four brothers, five if they included Josera Snow who died inside these walls when the White Walkers attacked Winterfell. Sansa and her sister Arya lost three brothers. Margaery lost Ser Loras. Who didn’t lose a brother yet?

Chapter End Notes

I hope you liked the discussion between Bran and Mira. I am closing all the story arcs with these last chapters, but there is still one chapter left for those two characters to close their arc for good.

I think there’s some sort of fatality in Game of Thrones that we get to see in our world too, though at a much smaller dramatic scale. Childhood is a time of innocence for most characters, at least those who grew up in wealthy and noble families, where brothers and sisters grow up together, but when war breaks childhood ends and they all must go separate ways in order to survive and to help their family. The same thing keeps happening today, families get separated as children grow up, though most of the time they have more time before it happens since our societies are more stable, at least in occidental countries.

TYRION XXXVI

The Gates of the Moon were larger than the Eyrie, but even they weren’t large enough to welcome all the lords of the Vale, powerful or not. Tyrion had sent the order to all the lords and knights who held some lands, even the thinnest, to come to the Gates at this date and to swear fealty to Daenerys Targaryen, or else their lands and titles would be taken away from them and given to loyal subjects of the queen. Most had complied and rode day and night to arrive in time.

Now he stood before the Gates at the side of the queen over an improvised platform, with all the lords of the Vale standing before them, surrounded by Unsullied. They had thought to hold the event in the castle’s courtyard, but it soon proved to be impractical. It was probably for the better, anyway. The view over the sky was much better this way. With Tyrion and Daenerys stood Sansa and Arya, Grey Worm, two Dothraki commanders, Shagga and Timett, and Nestor Royce represented the Vale. Like it or not, even though he resisted for a long time, he was the first lord in the Vale to bend the knee to Daenerys Targaryen. Some who were in the North had made their intentions clear before him, but they were not in the Vale right now.

“House Pryor of Pebble swears fealty to Daenerys Targaryen,” Lord Pryor declared, one knee on the ground.

“Rise, Lord Pryor, as Lord of Pebble,” Daenerys replied.

It had gone that way for an hour now. All the houses of the Vale had to swear loyalty to the new queen, one after the other, which made for a long procession. Not long ago, they were still fighting her, the queen who brought foreign invaders to their lands, but after seeing what hordes of Dothrakis, legions of Unsullied, fierce men of the hill tribes and a dragon could do to their armies, they seemed more open to the idea of allowing a woman who grew up on another continent to rule them. The presence of two dragons behind Daenerys and Tyrion who towered everyone was another convincing argument.

“House Sunderland of Sisterton swears fealty to Daenerys Targaryen.”

Tyrion watched as each lord made his oath of loyalty. All of them who before swore by the Seven they would never bend the knee before the Dragon Queen and the Imp now did it without hesitation. The Knights of the Vale, the most feared and respected warriors in the Seven Kingdoms, had been easily defeated by the men they called savages. They were men who draped themselves into pride and called it honor. Tyrion had met many like these through his life, men who thought themselves to be better than the others because they had a bloody title. Sellswords like Bronn and clumsy squires like Prodrik had more honor than they ever had, and they killed them. They kidnapped Sansa, forced her to marry another man, worked for a brothelkeeper who promised them gold, lands and titles, and took away his daughter, a baby. How surprising that they didn’t side with Cersei and Joffrey during the War of the Five Kings. They had a lot in common.

“House Hunter of Longbow Hall swears fealty to Daenerys Targaryen.”

Tyrion looked at the men who stood by Daenerys Targaryen. He wished Nestor Royce was kneeling like the others, but the reality of politics had won over his deepest desires and made him agree with the queen to keep him by her side while she received the submission of the Vale. He was more satisfied to see Shagga and Timett on the platform. The hill tribes had bled during the War of the Five Kings and the conquest of the Vale. They had helped to defend King’s Landing at the Battle of Blackwater, and they were still despised by the whole Realm. They had earned their place and they deserved the lands of the lords who didn’t come today. Tyrion had found they had more honor than those knights kneeling before them. The same could be said of the Dothrakis. Their ways may be barbaric and violent, but they were no worse than the men of Westeros. He could still hear the complaints of Westerosi saying the Dothrakis would burn their castles to the ground, ravage their lands and rape their women. Bloody hell, the knights and the lords of the Seven Kingdoms did the same. How did it matter that the powerful came from Westeros or from Essos? The powerful would always prey on the powerless. That was how they became powerful in the first place. As for Grey Worm and the other Unsullied, even though Tyrion would loudly mock their lack of certain parts, they had his respect and even his sympathy for their discipline, their loyalty and the harsh treatments that had to go through during their training.

“House Belmore of Strongsong swears fealty to Daenerys Targaryen.”

Tyrion looked at one of the most powerful lord of the Vale who befriended Littlefinger. Ser Nestor said the man was corrupted. No wonder the brothelkeeper managed to get in the good graces of this man so easily. Tyrion wondered if he had played any part in Sansa’s kidnapping.

“House Waynwood of Ironoaks swears fealty to Daenerys Targaryen.”

Lady Anya had been one of the few who didn’t fight with Lord Corbray against Tyrion. She had removed her troops from his army as soon as she learned that Sansa was in the Vale and almost forced to marry Harrold Arryn. If Tyrion allowed his emotion to lead his choices, she would be one of the few people below him he wouldn’t burn alive.

Tyrion looked at Daenerys Targaryen, his half-sister. The thought was still odd for him, though not as much as it was before. The discussion they had yesterday had helped. Daenerys had just arrived with Drogon from Castle Black. Tyrion had been intrigued to see that Rhaegal wasn’t with her. First, he thought she might have left him with Jon Snow, but that was before they sat before a generous jug of wine and that she explained him all the events that happened in the North. Considering his current state, Tyrion had been thrilled to hear about their journey in the Lands of Always Winter and the story of a place where all the White Walkers were created, not to mention that Jon Snow was capable of riding Rhaegal. That was until she told him about the battle they had with the dead. Fewer than half of the people who went north returned, and Rhaegal was one of those who were left behind.

When she arrived at this part of the story, Tyrion noticed how hard it was for Daenerys. She really cared about her dragons. Strangely enough, Tyrion fully understood what she meant. He had quickly grown very fond of Viserion, and after losing Joanna he knew what it was to lose someone you truly loved.

“I was there when he was born. I hatched his egg myself and fed him to my breast,” she said. “I watched him grow for years. I travelled through the Red Waste, I faced the Thirteen and the warlocks in Qarth, I slaughtered the Good Masters of Astapor to save them. I worried about them all when they were young, but now… I never really thought one of them would die, not after they grew up.”
“That kind of things never happen when we expect,” Tyrion had replied.

“No. Things never go the way we want.”

“What about Jon Snow?”

Another shadow passed over her face. “He joined the Night’s Watch.”

“Again,” Tyrion sighed.

“He will be no threat to me, for sure.” She wasn’t happy about the way it ended obviously, and Tyrion discovered why instantly. “I offered him to be my heir, to follow me in King’s Landing, and he refused.”

“The Starks are not known for their ambition. I think Robert Baratheon used to say that Eddard Stark only wanted to stay in the North and bury his face in the snow. It seems he gave that to his nephew.”

“He’s more Stark than Targaryen,” she summarized. Tyrion raised his cup and drank. “Oddly enough, that might be the thing I liked about him.”

“You don’t like your family very much?” he asked.

“My father was the Mad King, and my brother would certainly have been the second Mad King had he been given the chance to sit on the Iron Throne. Ser Barristan used to talk fondly of Rhaegar. He said he was a good man, but I never got the chance to know him. Now the dragon I named after him is gone, and his son will spend the rest of his life at the Wall. I guess I’ve lost him for good.” She took a sip of the wine goblet she held in her hand. “Thank you for taking care of Viserion. I don’t know what I would do if lost him too.”

“Well, I didn’t do much, except riding him. And the Knights of the Vale have more pride than prowess into battle, so he was never really into much danger.”

“Still, I thank you.”

“You didn’t like your other brother? Viserys? Not at all?”

She looked away, lost in her thoughts. “I have some good memories of him, but there are few. I mostly remember how he used to vent his anger and his frustration on me. He said that I woke up the dragon when he did, and most of the time I had done nothing. In the end, he threatened to carve my child out of my belly. When he said that, he was no longer a brother to me. I’m not even sure if I ever was his sister.”

Tyrion nodded. “I probably never was Cersei’s brother either. She never loved me.”

“Well, she put a price on your head and the heads of your wife and your child. She didn’t seem quite different from the brother I knew, and she did burn King’s Landing.”

“Indeed. I guess madness exists in all families. Though there were times when I almost liked her, back when her children were still alive, and before my father died. She loved her children, no matter how despicable she was. That was her one redeeming quality, that and her cheekbones.”

They remained silent for a moment afterwards, both lost in their thoughts.

Tyrion detailed her the events of the Vale just like she did for the North. He omitted personal matters and talked about the political and military events. The queen listened carefully to his advice concerning what to do with the rebel lords and those who still refused to bend the knee.

“What about House Arryn? Who is their lord now that Harrold Arryn is dead?”

“That’s hard to say. Harrold Arryn died unwed and without children, at least without legitimate children. He had two or three bastards, but the eldest is not even five and she’s a girl. Furthermore, they were all fathered on lowborn women. We would need to look further into the family tree of House Arryn to find an heir, perhaps amongst the Arryns of Gulltown or the other minor branches.”

“Is that necessary to choose an Arryn to rule the Vale?”

“Well, the family’s been ruling the Vale for thousands of years. Some claim they ruled it since the Andal invasion. They bent the knee quite easily when Aegon invaded Westeros, so it’s understandable that he spared them. He needed someone to rule the Vale, and why not keep the ancient rulers as long as they accept to bend the knee.”

“So I should just find whatever heir Harrold Arryn has and name him Warden of the East?” she asked skeptically.

“You need a Warden of the East, I agree, but he doesn’t have to be an Arryn. And considering how hard it might prove to find Harrold Arryn’s heir, and the fact he was one of the few lords to openly defy you until the end, I suggest you choose someone else to rule the Vale for you. Aegon did the same when he destroyed Harren the Black and gave the Riverlands to the Tullys, and when the Gardeners were gone he gave Highgarden and the Reach to the Tyrells. Why not do the same now? You could remind every house that you have the power to take away their lands if you want.”

They discussed for a long time about how to deal with the Vale and its lords, and also about how to send a strong message to everyone in Westeros that rebellion would not be tolerated.

“How is your wife?” Daenerys asked once they were done. The jug was almost empty. Tyrion had drunk most of it. “I would like to speak with her.”

Tyrion looked at the floor. “You may if you want, but I warn you, she’s not been feeling very well lately.”

She had an understanding expression on her face. “You haven’t found your daughter yet?”

Tyrion gripped his goblet. “She’s dead.” He explained everything he hadn’t told her, all the information they got from Serion Lannister and Vance Corbray before he burned them.

“I would have done the same had I been in your place,” Daenerys said when he was done.

“If that son of a whore was right, then Sansa and I will never have children again.”

“I’m sorry,” the queen said after a moment. “I lost a child me too, a long time ago. I should speak with Sansa. I have gone through the same ordeal she is facing. I could help her.”

“Feel free.”

Daenerys had left him to see Sansa. Tyrion didn’t know what she told her or if it had any impact on his wife. He looked to Sansa who was standing on the platform just like him as the lords kept swearing their oaths. Her face was expressionless. Her right hand was clasped around her sister’s hand. The other hand laid by her side, away from Tyrion. They didn’t speak a lot since the death of Serion Lannister. They spent time together, of course, ate together and slept together, but they barely said something, at least nothing that was of any matter. Tyrion kept holding her in his arms during the night, but that was it. She was grieving the death of their daughter, and Tyrion didn’t see how he could comfort her. He had never been good at this. He couldn’t find a way to make things better. He hadn’t been able to comfort her after the Red Wedding, and neither could he when she falsely learned that her sister was being held by the Boltons.

When the news that Arya Stark was at Winterfell arrived, Sansa had fallen into despair. Tyrion had managed to lift her hopes by raising an army and marching on Winterfell to save Arya Stark. But this time, there was no way to save Joanna. She was gone, just like Catelyn and Robb Stark, and on top of that, Sansa would never be able to bear another child. She could never be a mother again. Tyrion knew how much it meant for Sansa to have children. This news had destroyed her, and again he was powerless to help her. He couldn’t bring back their daughter. He couldn’t give her another child, no matter how hard he would try. All he could do was to punish those who hurt her.

Tyrion’s mind was focused on that. A Lannister always pays his debts. He had sent instructions to Genna to arrest the Spicers and the Westerlings and to seize their castles and their lands. She was also instructed to arrest every man who conspired with Serion Lannister. Sansa was mourning but Tyrion wasn’t. He would grieve the day everyone who had a part in his child’s death would have paid for it.

The last lord, Ryan Ruthermont, just bent the knee. Finally. Tyrion had allowed himself to be carried away by his thoughts and couldn’t tell half the houses who made an oath today. Now the time had come. His sister stood from her improvised throne.

“You all swore loyalty to me today. I expect this loyalty to be honoured by your children and grandchildren, to me and my successors, until the world comes to pass. Not long ago, you served a lord who turned on his allies, kidnapped married women and murdered babies. I’m ready to forgive your past known actions for the sake of the oath you swore today, but I’m not about to pardon House Arryn for its recent actions. They have proved to be unreliable, traitors, and abandoned the people who fought to save the Realm when the Seven Kingdoms needed them the most. As such, House Arryn has lost its right to rule the Vale. I forbid any Arryn to ever serve as Warden of the East or Lord Paramount of the Vale, or to ever marry into one of the great houses of Westeros. I forbid them to serve in the Kingsguard or to occupy any function in the capital. I forbid them from serving or occupying positions into the household of the future Lords Paramount of the Vale and the future Wardens of the East, or in any other households of any Lord Paramount. And I forbid them from ever travelling into the North again, except if it is to join the Night’s Watch, or into the Riverlands or the Crownlands. We will not have more of their treachery where they already exerted it.”

There were a few lords who whispered, including those leading minor branches of House Arryn who were present today, and some even started to shout, but they were silenced by the stronger noise produced by the dragons. The complaints stopped with it. Tyrion stepped forward to speak.

“Harrold Arryn kidnapped my wife and tried to marry her when I was still alive. He killed my daughter, a baby who hadn’t reached her first name day. He betrayed us while we were fighting an enemy that threatened to kill all the living souls in Westeros. Before that, I was falsely accused by Lysa Arryn of killing her husband and her son wanted to execute me without proof, for the pleasure to see me fall for miles. You know what the great Robin Arryn kept saying during my so-called trial?
Make the bad man fly. And before that, Lysa Arryn poisoned her husband, and then she tried to kill Arya Stark. You thought you served House Arryn after Jon Arryn died, but do you want to know the truth? House Arryn died with Jon Arryn. For all that we know, Robin Arryn might have been the son of Lysa Arryn and a brothelkeeper. As for Harrold Arryn, he was Harrold Hardyng before he became Lord Protector of the Vale and he never showed that he was a lord, only a spoiled boy who thought highly of himself because he could knock people from their horse with a stick.”
Tyrion looked at the Eyrie and pointed it for everyone who was present to look at it. “You see the Eyrie? It is said that Rolland Arryn built it because he felt the Gates of the Moon was inferior to Casterly Rock and Highgarden. Well, he was right. I spent some time in the Eyrie and it was one of the worst periods of my life. The Eyrie is worse than the Gates of the Moon. The Arryn words are As High as Honor. Well, the Arryns proved they had no honor at all with their last generations. The Eyrie was not even high enough to represent their pride or their hypocrisy. The Arryns don’t deserve the Eyrie, and you neither.”

He looked at Daenerys. She nodded, and he returned the nod. They both walked away from the platform, toward the dragons, and each climbed on their own. Drogon and Viserion rose in the air and climbed, higher, higher, always higher, until they were at the right level. They almost reached the sky. Then Tyrion flew Viserion down towards the target. Daenerys followed behind. She promised to give him the first shot.

“It’s time to take the Arryns out of the skies and to bury them under the earth. Dracarys,” Tyrion said when they were close enough.

A large burst of fire was unleashed upon the empty and frozen castle of the Eyrie. Tyrion heard another burst behind him as Drogon released his own burst of fire. Viserion turned around the small castle, setting fire upon every side. He gave a particular attention to the sky cells, making sure they didn’t escape the destruction he unleashed. Drogon did the same. The two dragons danced around the pride of House Arryn, reducing it to ashes and rubble.

When it was clear the whole perimeter was ablaze, he had Viserion stay in stationary fly and release his fire upon the interior of the Eyrie, blazing towers, courtyards, battlements, corridors and halls all alike. The snow melted first, and the marble that made the beauty of the Eyrie started to blacken, then to melt as well. There was no one inside the Eyrie. It had been emptied of its occupants for winter. All that was left to consume was stone, wood, marble and earth. And the symbol of House Arryn.

They did it for hours, most likely. When they were done, the Eyrie was a fuming ruin. Tyrion knew the Lords of the Vale were watching from below. The Unsullied were ordered to make them observe the Eyrie disappear from the face of the earth. For them, it was the end of an era when the Arryns ruled the Vale. For Daenerys, it was her Harrenhal, but without all the dead, some sort of kind Harrenhal, where all that was burned was a castle, a strong symbol, but no human being. For Tyrion, it was his revenge for everything the Arryns did to his wife, and the murder of Joanna. Since he couldn’t burn them, he would burn their castle and erase all trace of their existence.

A Lannister always paid his debt. And Tyrion Lannister was determined to pay them all, no matter the cost.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter was meant to show both the continuity but also the divergence of Tyrion and Daenerys from their ancestors. Just like Aegon Targaryen who destroyed Harrenhal, Daenerys burns down one of the mightiest castles in Westeros after the house fought her, and Tyrion mirrors Tywin’s actions at Castamere and Tarbeck Hall.

However, the similarity with their ancestors is limited by the fact that the castle they destroyed was empty. Hence, no one died. The destruction of the Eyrie is more symbolic than anything, House Arryn having collapsed after the death of Harrold Arryn.
Still, it sends a strong message, similar as if the Kremlin in Russia or the White House in the United States were destroyed, but without killing anyone inside. This is in line with Daenerys' declaration at the end of Season 6 that she, Tyrion, Yara and Theon all had horrible fathers and they were going to leave the world better than they did, while remaining in line with her family's tradition an basing her claim over the Seven Kingdoms on her family's rule of three centuries.

Kinvara VI

Chapter Notes

A chapter that I really enjoyed to write. I have become very fond of Kinvara as I wrote her, and I loved to write from her POV here.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

KINVARA VI

“Are you sure?” Kinvara asked.

“Yes, High Priestess. I saw it with my own eyes. The dead are no longer a threat. They wander in the lands, not knowing where they are or who they are. They are weapons no longer. The Others are gone.”

The pale face with blue eyes below short brown hair gazed at her through the flames. Meetra managed to summon enough power at the Wall to contact Kinvara. She said that magic was more powerful at the Wall than anywhere else in Westeros. As soon as she could, she found Kinvara and spoke with her through the flames they were both gazing at.

“So, all the servants of the Great Other are gone?”

“Yes, they are all gone,” Meetra confirmed.

Kinvara closed her eyes and said a prayer of thanks to the Lord. When she opened them again, Meetra was still staring at her. “You have done well, Meetra. What about the three others who were with you?”

“They couldn’t make it. I was the only one who escaped. Revan and Bastila covered us.”

“And Melisandre?”

“Dead. She’s on the other side now.”

Well, at least Melisandre gave her life fighting the servants of the Great Other. Maybe the Lord would welcome her, though Kinvara wouldn’t mind if he didn’t. The Lord of Light may forgive everything, but there were some things she couldn’t.

“What about Revan and Bastila? Do you think they made it?”

“I don’t know. I couldn’t find out what happened to them.”

Kinvara nodded. “Their memories will be honored. Stay at the Wall for now, like you planned. Darkness is everywhere, in the places we expect it the less. Be careful. The Great Other lost some servants, but he’s not gone.”

“Yes, High Priestess. I will be careful.”

The image faded and the Red Priestess Meetra disappeared. Only the flames were left. Kinvara turned away to look at the three members of her order who followed her, Geralt, Juhani and Jolee.

“Seems like we did it,” Jolee said. He was the oldest looking of them all, tanned-skinned and bald-headed with a small white beard.

“The great threat of our time is gone,” Kinvara confirmed. “The Lord of Light showed us the path and we took it. Today, he rewards us for believing in him and in the Prince that was Promised.”

“Well, I guess it means I have nothing left to do in this damn country,” Geralt said with his casual rough voice.

“You will leave as soon as we are done here,” Kinvara told him before she looked at them all. “We will rest for tonight. Tomorrow, we shall reach our destination.”

Jolee and Juhani went to sleep, the latter without a word. The young woman had a contrite expression on her face. Geralt didn’t go to sleep, as usual. He stood guard. Kinvara didn’t sleep either. Some Red Priests were not powerful enough to spare themselves the needs of human beings like her. Jolee and Juhani were among them. While they slept, she contemplated the fire of their small camp as Geralt watched over their horses or any threat that might come near them. Kinvara didn’t see if they would meet any danger on their way, but she knew for a certainty that they would reach their destination. The Lord showed her the way.

She sat there on the ground, her legs crossed, staring in the flames, waiting for the Lord of Light to show her something, but it seemed he didn’t want to show her something yet. She kept gazing at the red and yellow dancing in front of her, calling for her god to enlighten her, to show her the future. She saw nothing.

She heard a grunt as Geralt sat down next to her. “Still staring at the fucking flames?” he asked.

“Yes,” she flatly replied.

She was used to Geralt’s rough language as much as she was used to his rough voice. Some were bothered by this in Volantis, saying he didn’t behave like a true priest, but Kinvara didn’t mind. There was far worse than talking in an unkindly way about their Lord. She had found that people who cared too much about the way they expressed their thoughts or the way other people expressed themselves were far from the Lord, but the opposite wasn’t that true.

“Can see if I’ll go back in the east?”

“I don’t need the Lord to say that you will leave,” she stated. Daenerys Targaryen’s decision was without appeal. Geralt had to leave. “I suppose you want to know who you will leave with.” He looked suspiciously at her. “You sincerely believed I didn’t know? I’m afraid I cannot provide you an answer. Only you can find it. The choice is yours.”

He grunted again and walked back to the horses from where he kept examining their surroundings. This land was barely inhabited. The most likely intruders were sheep. Kinvara went back to her contemplation, unbothered by the unthreatening environment they travelled in.

It was only near dawn that the Lord finally granted her a vision. The dragon was there, with the same young blond-haired woman on his back. She flew across the lands, green lands, fertile, lush with vegetation, full of people working them. The sun was high in the sky, illuminating the whole world with its light. And just as she saw how beautiful this land was, the sun appeared at the horizon and the vision ended.

They left right away and rode north for most of the morning. The waves crashed against the stony shores. The soil allowed nothing to grow, at least nothing consistent enough to allow humans to live. Yet she knew people lived there. They crossed the path of several shepherds on their way, conducting their herds through the lands as the sheep ate the grass under their feet. The animals were these people’s only wealth. They fed them and dressed them both. She saw the scars left by the wars as she travelled through the Seven Kingdoms, the result of petty conflicts between high lords for a few pieces of land, an uncomfortable chair, or a hat on their heads that didn’t protect from rain, snow or sun.

Here, no trace of it. When they entered the village, no burned homes, no soldier, no sword in sight, nothing that was destroyed by the work of men. Here, men built and the nature destroyed, unlike in wars where men destroyed what the nature produced. This place hadn’t known war or violence for a while. People went about their business, probably unaware of the conflicts that tore apart the whole continent not so long ago. They were cut from the world. The village was small, much smaller than the one where Kinvara grew up. Fewer than a hundred people lived there. But the peace, the simplicity of life, the absence of oppressive lord or master, of worries other than feeding, housing and dressing your family made it a place where Kinvara wished the girl she was had been born there. But if that girl was born in this place, she wouldn’t have known the Lord of Light, she wouldn’t have found Daenerys Stormborn, and she wouldn’t have been able to fight the servants of the Great Other to protect people like them.

They rode through the village under the curious and wary eyes of the people who lived there. They certainly never saw Red Priests before, and even the horses they rode were probably a sight they seldom experienced. Kinvara and her three priests rode out of the village as easily as they rode in.

From there, a small tower was visible. She entered more than enough tall constructions in her life to tell that this one didn’t have more than four floors. Kinvara, Geralt, Jolee and Juhani headed for the tower, getting closer. For the people who lived there, it must look like a castle. For the masters Kinvara served before she escaped slavery, it was a ruin.

As they approached, the tower didn’t look better. Whatever small improvement it gained in height, it lost in appearance. It was a ruin, and not only to the masters of the east or the lords of the west. She heard barking, and three dogs came out from an open door and ran at them. The priests stopped in their track. While the dogs stopped and remained at good distance from them, still barking, a very old man, probably in the eighties, came out of the first floor as well. He had a sword at his side, but Kinvara doubted the man had ever used it.

“Who are you?” He looked at them as his dogs kept barking, obviously not knowing what to think of the intruders. “Who are you? Why are you trespassing…”

“We know whose territory it is,” Kinvara interrupted. She climbed down from her horse and her three friends followed suit. She then walked forward.

The dogs barked louder at her, but they didn’t attack. She placed a hand on Geralt’s arm as she felt his arm move to draw his sword. She looked at him, then to Jolee and Juhani, silently ordering them to let her deal with this situation. There was no need for blood to be poured today. She wouldn’t break the idyllic peace that this place enjoyed.

After she ensured her priests wouldn’t do anything inconsiderate, she made a few steps forward under the increasingly loud barks of the dogs. The old man brought his shaking hand to the pommel of his sword. She raised her hand again.

“We bear you no ill will,” she told the man. Then she looks at the dogs. “Quiet.” Immediately, they stopped to bark.
She went on her knees and approached one of the animals. Carefully, she placed a hand on his head and slowly stroked it. The dog wailed, and two others imitated him. She gave them a stroke as well.

She was brought to a time when she wasn’t Kinvara. She had another name, a family, brothers and sisters, a father, friends. A dog stood guard before her father’s shop. He barked at anyone approaching it, grinded his teeth, but he never attacked unless her father told him to. The rest of the time, he was a kind and sweet animal to those he knew. The girl she was used to be his favorite. He would whimper the same as this one did right now when she caressed him. A smile, the smile of a girl long gone came to Kinvara’s lips, and for a moment she was that girl again. She wasn’t a High Priestess, she wasn’t a servant of R’hllor, she wasn’t a young woman, she wasn’t an advisor of the Lord’s Chosen One, she wasn’t a mother, she wasn’t a slave or a whore, not a woman whose childhood was taken away from her. She was just a child.

“Who are you?” The question brought her out of her memories. She was Kinvara again. The girl was dead. She died a long time ago. Kinvara kept stroking one of the beasts, then stood up.

“Go,” she said. The three left. She was alone with the old man, the other priests behind her.

“Who are you?” he repeated, obviously afraid, his hand still on the sword.

“Don’t try that, old man,” Geralt warned him. “Or you’ll lose your hand before you can use that blade.”

Kinvara silenced him with a stare, then turned back her attention to the old man. “Please forgive me. I am Kinvara, High Priestess of the Red Temple of Volantis, the Flame of Truth, the Light of Wisdom, the First Servant of the Lord of Light, advisor to Daenerys Stormborn, of House Targaryen, the First of Her Name, the Unburnt, Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynars, Khaleesi of the Great Grass Sea, Breaker of Chains and Mother of Dragons.”

The man blinked. Three people joined him from the floor at the base, a man and a woman who seemed almost as old as he was and a younger one with a fat belly. She was pregnant.

“And who are you?” she asked him.

“My name is Bryen, and this is Umfred, Grisel and Kella. We are the servants…”

“I know. I’m sorry to bring you this news, but he’s dead.”

They were all under shock. “Dead?” the young woman said.

“Yes.”

“How?” Bryen asked.

“There’s a war, and your lord died in it,” she told them.

They all seemed in distress. “What are we gonna do?” the fat woman said. “Without him, we’re lost?”

“Are you? Did you ever need him?”

“I beg your pardon?” the other old man asked.

“How much time did he spend here in the last few years?” They didn’t answer. “A few days, maybe two weeks at most if you put all the days together. And you survived. He was never there for you, and yet you managed to live. I don’t see any difference from now.”

She let that sink into their minds. She looked at the last floor. Now that she was close enough, she could see there were three.

“I need to get in.” She made it to walk towards the exterior stairs. Bryen and the two other old people blocked her path.

“I’m sorry, my lady, but we cannot let you in.”

“I serve Daenerys Targaryen, your queen. You must let me in,” she kindly said, purposefully keeping away anything that could be perceived as a threat from her voice or her facial expression.

“Targaryen? The Targaryens are gone.”

“No more. She’s the queen now, your queen, and mine. Our queen.”

“I thought Joffrey was the king, Robert’s son.”

They definitely were cut from the rest of the world. “Joffrey Baratheon died years ago, and all the children of Robert Baratheon and his brothers are dead too. Daenerys Targaryen sits on the Iron Throne. Let me in.”

“We can’t,” the old woman stubbornly said.

She looked at them. Apart from the youngest, they all seemed determined to not let her in. She raised another hand behind to stop Geralt’s movement to draw his sword.

“Do you know what your lord was? What he did?”

She looked at each of them. Finally, the young woman answered. “I do.” They all looked at her. “I know who he was.”

Kinvara fixed her gaze upon her. “Then, do you really think that whatever it is you’re keeping is his? How would you feel if he did the same to you?”

The girl looked down at her belly, then back at Kinvara. A mutual understanding passed between them, an understanding that only women like them could share.

“Let her in,” the young girl said.

“But Kella…” Bryen began to protest.

“Let her in. There’s no reason for us to resist. He’s dead. And judging by the people she has with her, I would rather not take my chance. There’s nothing we can do for our lord anyway.”

The three old people hesitated, but finally they stepped aside. Jolee walked to Bryen and extended his hand, silently asking him to surrender his weapons. He did. The path was clear.

“I’ll go alone,” Kinvara said. She had to do this. She had to, but alone. The Lord of Light demanded it.

She climbed the outside stairs, seeing what looked like kitchens at the ground level. In the middle of her path, she came upon what looked like a small hall. She completed her climb, avoiding the cracked steps, feeling the wind growing slightly. Then she arrived at something that looked like a bedchamber. And there was what she had been looking for, near the fire.
She was a little girl again. No, not a little girl. She was a woman now. A woman with a child. The baby was cuddled in her arms, crying. She was hungry, but her mother couldn’t feed her. She didn’t eat enough and her breasts couldn’t produce enough milk for her child. She was so hungry, and her little girl was hungry too. She could end this, quickly, be done with it, but she couldn’t bring herself to do it.

Life had been good to her. Never easy, but good. She barely got the time to know her mother before she left the world, but she had a good father, brothers and sisters she cared about and who cared about her. She had friends, and they had a home. She had to work in order to eat, but at least she ate enough. More than many children.

How could everything have gone that wrong? How could she end up here, far from the place where she grew up, far from everything she loved? The knight had helped her to escape. He had been kind with her, but now she was alone, with a baby she couldn’t even feed. She couldn’t take care of her. But she couldn’t end her suffering either.

She was near the docks. She spotted a steep slope and a beach not far from there. There was almost no one. They were at the end of the day and darkness was beginning to fall. Fishermen were leaving the shore. She descended to the beach and approached the water. She tried to decide whether or not she was close enough or far enough from the water and the place where the waves crashed.

Her little daughter was still crying in her arms. She couldn’t do it. She couldn’t do it. Tears were welling her cheeks, but she couldn’t do it. She couldn’t take care of her. Slowly, she put down the only person who still mattered in her life.

“I’m sorry.” She kissed her forehead. “Mom is sorry.”

She stood up and walked away, the cries of her baby girl following her at each step. She walked at first, and then she accelerated her pace, until she ran. She stumbled in the slope as she climbed it, still hearing the cries behind her, cries she joined with her sobs. She felt something sharp cutting her hand and her knee, but she stood up and kept running, running away from the last person she loved.

The little girl she was now holding in her arms was crying, just like the one she abandoned. And just like years ago, she cried. Tears fell on the blanket around the small body.

She looked ahead of her to meet a glass, and in that glass she saw her reflection, the reflection of who she really was. For years, she was Kinvara, High Priestess of the Red Temple of Volantis, the Flame of Truth, the Light of Wisdom, the First Servant of the Lord of Light to everyone who looked at her, but whenever she looked at herself, she didn’t see Kinvara the High Priestess of R’hillor. She saw the mother who abandoned her child. She saw the person she was back then, and the person she still was. She could fool the others, but she couldn’t fool herself or her Lord.

She looked down on the small human being who kept crying. This girl too lost her mother. Kinvara caressed her shining blond hair. The difference was that her mother didn’t abandon her. She moved the back of her hand across her small cheek. She needed a mother.

She looked again at her reflection in the glass, that of a very young woman black of hair and blue of eyes, the woman she was trying to turn away from. She then looked back to the baby she was holding, who was a little calmer, then again to her reflection.

She walked out of the chamber and never looked back again. As she went down the stairs, the little girl went all silent and looked at her with big eyes. Big green eyes.

DAENERYS XIII

“Anders Yronwood, Lord of Yronwood, do you swear loyalty and obedience to Daenerys Targaryen, the First of Her Name, as Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynars, Lady of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm?” the herald asked.

“Yes, I do,” the said lord answered, one knee on the floor.

“Rise, Anders Yronwood.”

He did as Daenerys told him. The herald then called Mace Tyrell. The Warden of the South approached and knelt before Daenerys as well.

“Mace Tyrell, Lord of Highgarden, do you swear loyalty and obedience to Daenerys Targaryen, the First of Her Name, as Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynars, Lady of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm?”

“Yes, I do,” the fat lord replied.

Daenerys allowed him to stand as well. Then finally came his daughter.

“Margaery Tyrell, heir to Highgarden, do you swear loyalty and obedience to Daenerys Targaryen, the First of Her Name, as Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynars, Lady of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm?”

“Yes, I do.”

As soon as the former queen joined back the assembly, it was done. They all said it. Daenerys sat in the Iron Throne, surrounded by the men in the capital who she thought to be the most loyal to her. They included two Red Priests, Lord Varys, and mostly knights from the Reach. She believed them to be more trustful than the Dornish.

“Thank you everyone, for pledging your loyalty to me,” she declared. “I trust that you and your children and grandchildren will uphold the oath you just made. Now, if you would like to follow me.”

Daenerys left her throne and walked out of the Great Hall, still surrounded by all her guards. The lords and ladies who just swore to follow her did it.

When Daenerys arrived in the capital, she didn’t expect to find the city in such a sorry state, though apparently things had been far worse when Trystane was still there. War had broken out between the factions of Dorne and the Reach while she was away. In fact, according to her advisors, it was more complicated than that, for the Dornish at first were divided, but in the end they all took the same side.
against the Reach. That was when Trystane Martell left King’s Landing. After that, Anders Yronwood negotiated a truce with Mace Tyrell to put an end to the fight. A few factions from Dorne refused to lower their weapons and kept fighting. So Yronwood and Tyrell united their forces and neutralized the rebels. According to Varys, most of the people who refused to comply with the truce had been among the first to rebel against the Prince Trystane. They were all lined up in the main courtyard of the Red Keep.

They were half a dozen lords, mostly from minor houses. They were the first to take up arms and they were the last to fight after Daenerys’s betrothed escaped the capital. Now they all stood with two men holding their arms, each before a block. A third man for each of these lords stood next to the block, a sword in hand.

Daenerys stood before them. She looked at each one of them. Some were looking down, but most were staring at her in pure hatred. These were the first men in Westeros to join her when she crossed the Narrow Sea, and these men had started a civil war inside King’s Landing, all that because the man she left in charge of the city killed his cousins after they murdered Reach lords and started a fight during a trial. Here they were.

She waited for the courtyard to be full. Tyrell guards and gold cloaks kept the crowd of lords away from the convicted. When she judged everyone was there, she cleared her throat and spoke in a loud and clear voice for everyone to hear.

“You violated the laws of the Seven Kingdoms, you laid death and destruction to this city and rebelled against me and the people I chose to rule King’s Landing in my absence. For this, justice demands that you die. You have one minute to pray, then you will join your gods.”

The minute went on. Two of the condemned men kept staring at her. Either they made peace with their gods previously or thought the last moments of their life to be better spent hating her than preparing for their departure of this world.

The minute was over. Daenerys gave the sign. The two guards overseeing each man forced them on their knees and held their necks firmly on the block. The six executioners lifted their longswords, then brought them down. Six heads rolled on the ground. The entire courtyard was silent. Not a word was said.

An hour later, Daenerys was sitting again, but not in the Iron Throne. It was in the small council chamber, with her advisors. On one side, Mace Tyrell, Paxter Redwyne and Anders Yronwood. On the other side, Varys, Yennefer and Marcon, the new Grand Maester.

“I don’t intend to talk further about who is responsible and who is not responsible of the events that took place in my absence,” she declared. “The first responsible for the rebellion were treated as I shall treat every lord who violates the laws of the Seven Kingdoms and rebel against my authority.”

Only the next time, she would execute them with dragonfire. It had been her first plan with the rebellious lords today, but the courtyard of the Red Keep wasn’t large enough to accommodate Drogon. She needed a public demonstration to be seen by all the lords present in the capital and forcing them to walk all the way to the Dragonpit where her child took up residence would have been too dangerous with the chaos lingering in the streets.

“What news of the Prince Trystane?” she asked to Varys.

“For now, nothing, your Grace,” the eunuch said.

“No news from Dorne,” the Grand Maester confirmed.
“Doran Martell is probably being cautious, like always,” Lord Yronwood said. “Don’t worry about him, your Grace. No matter what you decide concerning his son, he will stay on his knees before you. I would worry about the possible repercussions of today’s executions instead. There are some people in Dorne who will not be happy about it.”

“The people who were executed rebelled against their queen,” she stated. “The punishment for rebellion is death. If your people cannot understand this, then they will understand soon enough.”

“All the same, I think it would be wise to communicate with Prince Doran,” Varys said, “to ensure that he will help us would any trouble arise in Dorne. The men you executed today chased his son from King’s Landing. I highly doubt he will take their side.”

“I do hope we can count on your help as well to neutralize any threat in Dorne, Lord Yronwood. If you want to prove your loyalty to House Targaryen, there would be no better opportunity.” She looked intently at Lord Anders.

“You have my word, your Grace.” His voice and demeanor lacked any enthusiasm, but she would settle for this for now.

“I suppose I can count on the support of the Reach too.” She addressed Lord Mace and Lord Redwyne.

“Of course, your Grace. Highgarden is loyal to you forever,” the Lord of Highgarden assured.

“Good. Now, I have an announcement to make. I delayed this decision so far because I wasn’t sure if I wanted to continue this tradition, but recent events proved that it was necessary. There will be a Hand of the Queen.”

Truth be told, she chose one long before she knew of the events in King’s Landing, but it was also true that the events that took place here in her absence led her to believe a Hand, someone officially speaking for her, could have avoided such disastrous results.

“It is quite a wise decision, your Grace,” Maester Marcon said. Despite his obvious age, he seemed quite robust and hadn’t lost all his hair yet. “All kings and queens had a Hand to assist them in the task of ruling. The Seven Kingdoms are simply too vast for the king, or the queen in this case, to rule alone, with or without dragons.”

“Your Grace, I would be willing to serve as your Hand if that is your wish,” Lord Tyrell said.

“I thank you, my lord, but you already are the Master of Coin and I would rather not add to your burden. I heard the financial situation of the Crown is dire and that we are not far from bankruptcy.”

“Huh, it is true that the Crown has a huge debt. However, if her Grace does me the honor, I will gladly assume the duties as Master of Coin and Hand of the Queen, if that is her wish.”

This one was a man of court, obviously, much like the nobles she had to deal with in Meereen. “Your intentions are all to your honor, Lord Tyrell, but I’m afraid in the interest of the Realm, I cannot have the Master of Coin disturbed by other matters than the financial situation of the Seven Kingdoms. Furthermore, I already chose my Hand.”

“Who shall it be, your Grace?” Marcon asked, his quill over a ledger he brought with him.

“Tyrion Lannister.”

“The Imp?” Lord Yronwood asked, incredulous.
“A very interesting choice, your Grace,” Varys said, with a smile on his face that was difficult to interpret.

“Your Grace, with all the respect I owe you,” Mace Tyrell began, “the Lannisters were our enemies not long ago.”

“They were also your friends not long ago, Lord Tyrell,” she retorted.

He spluttered. “Yes, I made a mistake. I realized it the day they arrested my daughter and killed my son.”

“Tyrion Lannister didn’t kill your son. Cersei Lannister did, with the help of Jaime Lannister, her twin brother. Lord Tyrion wasn’t in King’s Landing when it happened. He was in the North, fighting the dead. Ever since he bent the knee, he proved his loyalty at the Battle of Winterfell and during the invasion of the Vale. He already served as Hand before and by all accounts did quite well, considering the king in question spent his time torturing animals and little girls. I think he is quite well suited for the office.”

“I have nothing against it,” Lord Redwyne said. “I was there at the Battle of Blackwater. Many say it was Tywin Lannister who saved the city from Stannis Baratheon, but without Lord Tyrion’s trick with the wildfire and his efficient and courageous defense of the city walls, King’s Landing would have fallen before our armies could arrive. His accomplishments in the North and the Vale, both on diplomatic and military grounds speak by themselves. I think it is better to have him as an ally than an enemy. He is much more useful alive than dead.”

“I must advise you against this choice, your Grace,” Lord Yronwood said. “You overthrew his sister. She died when you took King’s Landing, along with many Lannister troops.”

“From what I heard, Lord Tyrion didn’t have a very good relationship with his sister. I think she tried to have him killed more than once. And when she was queen, she even put a price on his head,” she opposed.

“What about Ser Jaime? He is still in the black cells and must be judged for his crimes. I doubt his brother would stand aside and do nothing while you execute him. His father had your brother’s children butchered.”

“My decision is taken. Tyrion Lannister swore fealty to me just like you did. It is not Tywin Lannister that I name to be my Hand. Children are not responsible for their father’s crimes. Right now, Lord Tyrion is heading to the Westerlands where he must deal with some local matters there. As soon as it is done, he will come here and take his office. And considering he can ride one of my dragons, I suggest you show him some respect when he arrives.”

Most people were stunned. Yennefer the Red Priestess was smiling. “So, the third head of the dragon was found.”

“It is true?” Lord Tyrell asked this question, looking to Daenerys, then to Varys. “The rumors were right?”

“It seems so,” the Master of Whisperers replied with an amused expression.

“Now,” Daenerys said, cutting short to the interlude, “I’d like to know the state of the city’s provisions for winter.”

From the information Varys, Marcon and Lord Tyrell provided, it was clear, as Daenerys expected but hoped against, that the city wouldn’t get through winter. Some granaries had been looted if not destroyed or burned in her absence. The fights slowed down, and in some districts stopped the reconstruction effort. People were moving back into the city, for the surrounding areas offered little alternative for shelter. Villages such as Rosby complained about the great number of refugees that swarmed in their alleys. The fields gave their last harvest a long time ago and peasants were very reluctant to share what they could save for winter with the homeless of King’s Landing. Cases of farmers found assassinated and their homes plundered were signalled. On top of that, Lord Tyrell tried to not complain about the fact that the large amount of foodstock they sent to the city was beginning to exert a real toll on the Reach. The likelihood to provide enough roofs and food for everyone to survive the long winter ahead of them grew smaller.

“Of course, we can still hope for this winter to not be as long as the Citadel expects,” the Grand Maester said.

“They say a long summer means an even longer winter,” the Master of Whisperers said. “And according to the Citadel’s forecast, we can expect this one to last several years.”

“My maesters in the Arbor said the same,” Lord Redwyne added.

“It is true,” Marcon acknowledged, “but my most recent observations are… troubling, to say the least. On one side, there are elements pointing towards a very harsh winter, harsher than previously measured, but my observations also point towards a shorter winter. I don’t know what happened, but in the last few days, the state of the upper sky changed drastically. I’ve never seen something like that in my life. The records I hold say that the last time this phenomenon happened, a very short and harsh winter came upon Westeros, and it was quickly followed by a very warm summer.”

“When did it happen for the last time?” Yennefer asked.

“Over four hundred years ago. I couldn’t give the exact date.”

The Red Priestess smiled. As for Daenerys, she wondered for a moment… The Doom of Valyria took place about four hundred years ago.

“I think it would be best to assume that this winter will be long, your Grace, instead of resting the fates of the people upon the hope that this winter will be short,” Varys said.

“I agree with Lord Varys,” the Grand Maester said. “My measurements could be wrong. I was surprised myself of the results they gave, and the predictions of the Citadel have always been relative if not entirely wrong when it came to weather. We are lucky when half their predictions are accurate.” He sighed. “Better to be careful than to be sorry.”

Daenerys nodded. She agreed too. The people of King’s Landing, just like all the people of Westeros, were her people, and as such she had the duty to protect them, to keep them alive and well. “The Crownlands cannot sustain the city through winter, nor can the Riverlands. They were devastated by the recent wars. The North, Dorne and the Stormlands simply don’t have the necessary resources to feed so many people.”

“What about the Westerlands? Surely they can spare…” Lord Tyrell began.

“The Westerlands were never farming lands, Lord Tyrell,” the Grand Maester interrupted. “There are maesters in these lands that I know personally. What farms they had were hit badly by Robb Stark during the War of the Five Kings, and the output of the last harvest was poor. There weren’t enough men to take the crops after the losses of the war and the levies Lord Tyrion made when he marched north. Whatever the Westerlands could provide will not be enough. The Reach remains the kingdom with the higher capacity to contribute.”
“But… we already gave plenty. If that goes on, it will be our people who will starve.”

“Lord Tyrell.” The Lord of Highgarden looked at her, expecting the worst. “I will not force the Reach to give more. I only ask that you provide what your house already promised.”

Relief was plain on the fat man’s face. “I thank you, your Grace.”

“The Vale will provide what we lack,” she declared. “They were untouched by war until recently and they had time to fill their granaries before it broke on their lands. They are closer to us and with the harbor of Gulltown, the rations will arrive more quickly by sea.” She turned toward Lord Redwyne. “Are the docking installations of King’s Landing in a good enough state?” she asked.

“They need some repairs, but it will be feasible.”

“Good. Lord Tyrell, Lord Yronwood, since most of my Unsullied and the Dothrakis will be back in the city soon enough, we won’t need your men for long to ensure the peace. I think it’s about time they go back home to their families. Since Dorne is farther and the actual weather more difficult to suffer to its people, I ask that all the Dornish, safe for those under the direct command of Lord Yronwood, go back home. The men of the Reach will leave as soon as my army is back.”

With the Dornish gone, the odds of having another war between Dorne and the Reach inside King’s Landing would disappear, and the need to feed them as well. Dothrakis and Unsullied were used to harsh living and only required the minimum. Replacing the Westerosi by them to ensure the safety of the city would increase the amounts of food they could give to the people.

They discussed about several other matters. Lord Tyrell wondered aloud who would rule the Vale now that Harrold Arryn was dead. For the time being, Nestor Royce would be acting ruler until Daenerys chose a new Lord Protector of the Vale. She also delayed the decision of naming a new Lord Paramount of the Stormlands. When she ended the meeting, she asked Lord Varys to stay with her.

He spoke before she could as soon as they were alone. “I must congratulate you for sending the Dornish away, your Grace. It was quite a sound idea.”

“I don’t want to see my people suffer because the Dornish and the Reach men cannot suffer each other.”

He nodded. “Lady Margaery Tyrell said something similar when she decided to force Trystane Martell out of the city. Though I believe she said the people, not my people.” Good. She knows where her place is. “She wishes to speak with you, by the way.”

“Later. For now, there’s something I want to discuss. You know Tyrion Lannister?”

“I was on the small council when he was acting Hand for his father and before, and after as well.”

“You’ve only had good words for him ever since we met, Lord Varys. You said yourself that you worked closely with him in the past. You testified for him at his trial and you defended him every time you had an opportunity. Tell me, why didn’t you try to make him king? Seeing how you jump from one king to the other, I’m surprised you never considered this possibility.”

The eunuch’s eyes were wide of surprise for a short moment. “I thought about this for a very short time, your Grace, I’ll admit it. Before you came to Westeros, and before I got to know who you were after your brother’s death, Tyrion Lannister was one of the few people alive who could make this country a better place. He had the mind for it, the will, and an appropriate last name if not the right one. And later, when his name was cleared and Lord Tywin dead, he had the power and the titles too. And I still believe he’s one of the most capable people to make Westeros a better place to live.”

“Then why didn’t you support him?”

“Because although he might have everything to make Westeros better, he doesn’t have what is required to be king. Tyrion Lannister will never sit on the Iron Throne. He could never sit on the Iron Throne and he knows it. No more than I could. People follow leaders like you, your Grace. They will never follow dwarves or eunuchs. They find us repulsive. But at least dwarves and eunuchs can help the leaders from the shadows to rule for the people.”

“To rule for people who find you repulsive?”

“Yes, for even though they find us repulsive and we find them repulsive, we are all repulsive in the eyes of the highborn. That allows us to identify with the people, for we are all looked down upon. And for myself, I’ve been part of this people once, and I would rather not see another one of them end up like me.”

She couldn’t tell if the man was lying or not. His trade was in secrets, so she supposed it was normal if he could hide his true feelings and intentions very easily.

“What do you know of Tyrion Lannister?”

“He is a good man. Too prone to drink, and also to gamble and to visit brothels, at least before he met a woman he loved. Now he’s only too prone to drink. He has his father’s instincts for politics, but also compassion. He loves power but despises those who use it to prey on the powerless. He also has a sense of honor that House Lannister lacks most often than not, though he’s also ready to do what is necessary. I liked him as Hand of the King. He played the game well.”

“Do you have any idea why he would be able to ride one of my dragons?”

The Master of Whisperers sighed. “Dragonlore is not something I know a lot about, your Grace. When I first received word of your dragons, I didn’t want to believe it. For me, dragons had been gone for over a century and would never come back. I’m afraid I cannot provide you with an answer and certify that it will be true.”

“But you have answers. You always do, even when you’re not sure.”

“I have possible answers… each one more fantastic and unlikely than the others.”

He showed the palms of his hands to display his powerlessness. He was hiding something.

“But you, what do you think of Tyrion Lannister?” he asked.

“He helped me,” she answered carefully. “He proved he was loyal. He saved my life at Winterfell.”

“Did he?” the eunuch, surprised.

“Yes, he did.” That was the first time he rode Viserion. How could he do this? How could he ride Viserion as naturally as she could ride Drogon? I feel that I can trust him, but I shouldn’t trust a Lannister so easily.

“Well, your Grace, I think you couldn’t have chosen a better Hand. And I’m not saying that to flatter you.”

“I hope not. I always wanted you to tell me the truth, nothing more, and I hope for your sake that you
“I will, your Grace. Didn’t I prove it by providing the answers you recently seek?”

Yes, he did. She had her confirmation. Not that it mattered much now that Jon Snow joined the Night’s Watch again.

“Fetch Lady Margaery. I will talk to her.”

She turned her back to him, indicating the discussion was over. She heard his soft footsteps behind her. Margaery Tyrell wouldn’t be there before a few minutes. This time belonged to her, and only to her.

Her thoughts turned to Rhaegal, who was dead, and to her nephew, though it didn’t really feel like he was a nephew. She and Jon Snow had been born the same year, at the end of the war that shattered their family and killed their parents. She felt that she didn’t have enough time to know him before they went on their separate ways, he to join the Night’s Watch and stand guard in the North for every danger that might still come from the unknown lands, she to rule the Seven Kingdoms.

She had everything she wanted, everything she fought for. With the submission of the Vale, all of Westeros, from the Wall to the southern shores of Dorne, belonged to her. She had fought for this for years, endured all kind of ordeals and challenges to arrive at this moment, and now that she was there, it didn’t seem as fulfilling as she thought it would be. It wasn’t glorious, like when she burned down Astapor, or a celebration of joy like when she took Yunkai and Meereen. Here, in King’s Landing, when all was complete, when she was the queen she always vied to be, there was almost nothing she felt. Well, not really.

She felt overwhelmed, with the weigh of the world on her shoulders, much like in Meereen when she realized how difficult it would be for her to maintain peace and freedom in Slaver’s Bay. Her capital was in ruins, a gift left by Cersei Lannister. Half the North was devastated by the army of the dead, and before that, the War of the Five Kings devastated half the Seven Kingdoms. Winter had come, and it would be a race against time to be prepared for it, to make sure her people could survive. Snow was already falling on the Crownlands and it would fall on the Reach and the Stormlands very soon. Maybe it would even reach Dorne.

She knew why she didn’t feel anything. She had too many concerns to feel joy over her victory. Too many people had died in this war, her own people, people who relied on her, and it was now her responsibility to care about them. She wasn’t the inexperienced conqueror who entered Meereen under the acclamations of the slaves she freed. She was a queen and she knew what lied ahead of her. It was much more difficult to rule a kingdom than to conquer it. She learned it the hard way in Slaver’s Bay, and Tyrion Lannister reminded her of that before he left for the Westerlands. She wished he was there. His counsel had been a great help ever since they met, but she understood he had to deal with the matter of the Westerlands. She killed Mirri Maz Duur after she murdered Drogo, and she couldn’t deny her Hand the same thing. Furthermore, people who killed children deserved to die. This was about justice as much as it was about revenge.

A handmaiden with curly brown hair entered. “Lady Margaery Tyrell,” she announced.

Daenerys told her to come in. The single daughter of Mace Tyrell walked in and the handmaiden left.

“Your Grace,” the young woman said.

She was a few years older than Daenerys and quite pretty, but you could see on her traits that she had been through a lot. Daenerys was aware of the hard times she had with Cersei Lannister and she sympathized with Margaery Tyrell, but she couldn’t feel as close to her as she felt to Sansa Stark when they spoke in the Vale. Lord Tyrion’s wife had never been queen before and she wasn’t a potential threat to Daenerys’ power. Margaery Tyrell, on the other hand, was and would always be. She claimed that she had no longer any interest in the crown, but even if she told the truth, Daenerys couldn’t be sure she would have no interest in the future or that no one would ever try to use the woman against her. She had to be careful with the future Lady of Highgarden.

“I heard you wanted to talk to me, Lady Margaery,” she said.

“Yes, I did. First, I wanted to tell you that the only reason why we sent Trystane Martell away…”

“… was because you had no choice. I know, you already told me. I got it. But I don’t think that’s the reason you came to me.”

Daenerys had a pretty good idea why Margaery Tyrell had come to her. “How is my son?” She was right.

“He is alive and well, though I cannot give you any specific news for the moment.”

Lady Margaery took her time before she spoke again. “Your Grace, I beg you. He is my son. I want… I need to know how he is.”

Daneereys sat down at the seat reserved for the queen. “I made things clear when we met at Storm’s End. Your son is being well taken care of, and he will be taken care of for his whole life. You will never see him again, but he will have a good life.”

“I know, but that’s not enough. He’s all I have left. You had a son before, you must know how it feels.”

“No, I don’t.” She stood up. “Because my son is dead. He was dead the moment he left my womb. Your son is still alive and well, and he will have a good life. If I were you, I would cherish the fact that I know he is well instead of complaining about he fact I cannot see him. Because I would rather have a living child I cannot see than a dead child. And don’t say he’s all you have. You still have a family. I don’t.”

She could have a family again, but Jon Snow decided to stay at the Wall. She was forced to leave the family she may have the moment she began to know him.

“Will I ever be able to see him?” Margaery asked.

“I was clear. You cannot know where he is, or his name, and you cannot see him again. I’m sorry.”

“I understand,” Margaery said after a moment with an obvious effort.

“Good. You were queen for a time, and you betrayed Trystane Martell who, according to Lord Varys, was a good friend of yours. I expect you to know sometimes there are unpleasant decisions to take.”

“I do, but I betrayed Trystane in order to save him. All his men had turned on him. It was our only chance to end the fighting. Lord Yronwood couldn’t convince so many lords to abandon the hostilities without this. If we hadn’t done it, you would have found King’s Landing in a much poorer state when you came.”

“I still find it odd that Dornish would stop fighting only after their prince is forced to leave.”
Daenerys nodded. “Would you marry Trystane Martell if you had the chance?”

“Do you mean whether I would marry him if I were you or if I would marry him if you proposed him to me as a husband?”

“Whatever you like.” She was curious to hear the answer to both questions.

“Trystane is a good man, but considering the actual circumstances, I wouldn’t marry him, queen or not. He is already contested by his fellow countrymen and marrying him would cause problems with my bannermen, no matter the position I have. I regret what I did to him. I wish there had been another way.”

“Sometimes, there are no other ways. I will not hold you any longer, Lady Margaery. You may leave.”

Daenerys remained to think for a moment. If roles were exchanged, she would indeed be furious as well if Margaery Tyrell confiscated her child. However, roles were not exchanged and she had to think about the peace and stability of the Seven Kingdoms and the well-being of her people before everything else. She couldn’t allow someone to use the son of Tommen Baratheon against her or allow the boy to know who he was so he would start a rebellion one day. She could have killed him. She would have been well in her rights, with the way the Baratheons and the Lannisters treated Rhaenys and Aegon. It would have been justice for both Tywin Lannister and Robert Baratheon. But she didn’t kill the boy. It wouldn’t have been justice for him. Margaery’s son had done nothing to deserve death. Daenerys would make sure he lived, and that he had a good life, but she wouldn’t take the risk to see him endanger her rule. That she wouldn’t permit.

She thought with sadness about Sansa’s daughter, gone for good, and about her own son, dead before he could see the light of day. And Margaery would never see her son either. All the three of them lost their child, just like so many men and women in this country and across the Narrow Sea. Still, her son and Sansa’s daughter were dead. Margaery’s son was not.

She left the small council room and went to her apartments, the queen’s apartments. There she wrote a letter, then brought it herself to Marcon. He lifted his eyes from whatever he was writing when she entered.

“Yes, your Grace. How may I help you?”

“Send this to Sunspear.”

Chapter End Notes

Daenerys is actually beginning to rule the Seven Kingdoms instead of conquering them, and she's already taking decisions crucial to the future of her reign, that could determine the fall or the survival of her regime. Although Daenerys is capable to make compromise, she can also be inflexible in specific matters, especially when it comes to dealing with rebellions or anything compromising her own vision of a just society, like we can see here. We also see how Daenerys used her time in Meereen to learn how to better deal with different factions inside the same country, even the same government.

Next chapter: Sansa
Chapter Notes

Quite a short chapter. The structure is unusual, going from the present to the past, but I hope you'll like.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Sansa XXXVI

Joanna is dead.

The words pounded in her head. They came again and again, no matter how many times she would try to drive them out. It was like that ever since Tyrion said them.

Joanna is dead.

This time, she wasn’t praying. There was no godswood, no weirwood, no statue, no gods to turn to. Only fire.

Joanna is dead.

From where she stood, on the borders of the small camp that was set in front of the castle, Sansa could see everything, just like every of the two thousand men who were quickly assembled to lay siege upon Castamere. Only this time Castamere didn’t need to be besieged, nor stormed.

Joanna is dead.

There had been a short war council when they arrived. Sansa, Tyrion and Arya had flown on the dragon’s back all the way from the Eyrie. They stopped at the Golden Tooth on their way, where she could see Alysanne Lefford who was very kind with her, much like their new queen was in the Vale. Then they resumed their path that led them here, to Castamere.

Joanna is dead.

Tyrion had stood with his officers as they looked upon maps in the command tent. The sun was setting on the horizon. There had been two maps, one of the surroundings of the castle, the other one of the Westerlands. The officers, Sansa didn’t know their names, discussed of the best way to take the castle, some arguing to starve the besieged to death, others declaring they should storm the castle right away, another worrying about the number of men they might lose and looking for the strategy with the fewer losses. Tyrion didn’t say a word. He kept looking at the map of the Westerlands.

Joanna is dead.

Arya stood by her side as they watched from afar. “Do you feel better?” her sister asked her. Sansa didn’t answer. How could she ever feel better? She brought her hand to her belly. She felt she was about to give back whatever small food she ate for dinner.

Joanna is dead.
“I was once married to a man against my will. He wasn’t a good man, but he had his good sides and he loved me. I came to love him too. We had a baby, a son. I called him Rhaego, after my dead brother, the brother I never knew. Rhaego never lived long enough to breathe the air of our world. He died the moment he came into it.” She barely listened to the words of Daenerys Targaryen, just like she barely drank from the cup of wine before her, in a small chamber of the Gates of the Moon. “I thought everything was lost after that. I was alone, in a hostile land, with people counting on me. But I took strength in my loneliness. I became stronger through this. And I found out that living was still worth it, even if every day was a fight. Because things get better. When we touch the bottom, when the world seems about to collapse around us, this is when we must be strong, and this is the moment we choose to live.”

Joanna is dead.

She looked at her little sister. She had changed so much since they left Winterfell. How she wished they had never left. None of this would have happened had they stayed home. They would still have a family. Father, Mother, Robb, Rickon, they would all be alive. If she had begged her father to stay in Winterfell instead of King’s Landing, she may not be standing here right now, assisting to the end.

Joanna is dead.

At night, she slept with her lord husband. She rested her head on his chest, and then she cried. He gently brought his arms around her neck, and he comforted her. This was the only time when he did it. The rest of the days was spent avoiding each other. Sometimes, she thought he wanted to tell her something, but he didn’t, and when she tried to talk about it, it never ended well.

Joanna is dead.

Sansa asked Arya what she was seeing. Her sister looked forward and Sansa stared at the same place. “I say that I see justice.” This wasn’t what Sansa was seeing. It might be night, but how was it possible that their eyes didn’t see the same thing.

Joanna is dead.

She remembered when she saw her for the first time, when she just came out of her. The labor had been an ordeal for Sansa, but then she saw her, her daughter. She had her father’s eyes. She used to fall asleep when Sansa sang her a song. She was so quiet, and so beautiful.

Joanna is dead.

“I’m sorry,” her sister told her. “I know I told you already, but I’m here no matter what you need. Is there anything I can do?” Arya was almost pleading to her. Sansa didn’t answer. What she wanted, Arya couldn’t give it. There was only one thing in this world Sansa wanted, and she wanted her daughter.

Joanna is dead.

“It’s not your fault.” He said that as a matter of fact, without the usual warmth and care in his voice that she had grown accustomed to when he addressed her. He had changed. Ever since the Battle of the Vale, he hadn’t been the same. Or perhaps she was the one who changed. Perhaps she was no longer Sansa Stark. Perhaps Sansa Stark was truly gone. Only, she wasn’t sure if she was Sansa Lannister either, not anymore. Who was she? If only she could ask her husband, but she didn’t think he would answer her.

“Lord of Castamere one night, a pile of ashes on the morning,” said a man nearby, probably unaware she heard him. “I was there the first time. Back then we used water. Now it’s fire.”

Joanna is dead.

When his men stopped arguing during the war council, Tyrion spoke. “We don’t need to take Castamere.” The officers had all looked at him, utterly surprised, but he didn’t give them any consideration. “We don’t need to besiege it. We don’t need to storm it. We don’t need to attack it.” He took a piece, threw aside the spice that represented the small force of House Spicer, and planted the piece in its place. The piece was carved in the shape of a dragon.

Joanna is dead.

The huge dragon flew over the castle of Castamere, spitting his fire of destruction upon the barely rebuilt fortress. Rolph Spicer was inside, along with all his household, and they wouldn’t get out. The moment he saw a dragon flying in the skies, he sent one of his men to offer his surrender, to the condition he would keep his life. Tyrion had laughed and ordered his men to not let the messenger leave the encampment. He told Spicer’s man that he did him a favor and that he would be much safer here than with his master come the night.

Joanna is dead.

Only a few days ago, Tyrion had been flying over another castle, much higher. It hadn’t been the first time she saw him fly on the back of the beast. He had done it when he fought Vance Corbray’s army, but it had been soldiers he rained fire upon. And once the men of the Vale saw the huge army facing them helped by a dragon, they flew away. Relatively few of them were actually burned alive. The way Tyrion had burned Serion Lannister and Vance Corbray after the battle had been much more shocking. Sansa didn’t remember well this moment. It was then she had learned the truth. She knew there had been flames, but everything was a blur. The destruction of the Eyrie was much clearer in her mind. The two dragons flew like brothers and spit their fire upon the empty castle, reducing it to rubbles just like Ramsay Bolton did with Winterfell. However, everyone was there to see it this time. The Lords of the Vale had been desperate when they saw the pride of their kingdom destroyed and being powerless to do anything against it. Some tried to escape the wall of Unsullied surrounding them in a futile attempt to save the seat of House Arryn, only to be knocked out.

Joanna is dead.

The makeshift platforms that were erected to rebuild the huge castle were all burning. The walls, whose reconstruction had barely begun, were licked by the flames and already blackening. From where she stood, Sansa saw a man running from the castle’s gate. He made a few steps. As his figure detached itself from the fortress, they could all see he was aflame as much as the castle he just left. He only made a few further steps before he stumbled to the ground. He never got up.

Joanna is dead.

They took her away from her. When they captured her, they took her daughter away from her. She begged, cried, screamed, but nothing would change their mind. They took her away from her, and she would never see her again.

Joanna is dead.

Sansa looked at the place where the burned man fell. She saw few men who were actually burned alive on the battlefield in the Vale, or perhaps she saw more and she didn’t remember. All the events that took place on this day were blurry at best. She had been somehow fascinated the first time she saw a man die, thinking no one would write a song about him. Now, however, seeing a dead man had an entirely different meaning for her. This man died because Tyrion wanted it. To admit it was terrifying. To acknowledge the fact that Tyrion wanted everyone in the castle to die was terrible. This wasn’t the husband she knew. This wasn’t the man she had Joanna with.

Joanna is dead.

Joanna is dead. He told her that. After his officers were gone and he had decided to burn Castamere to the ground, Sansa had been alone with him. And just like every time they were alone lately, they had nothing to tell each other. Only this time Sansa dared to speak. She tried... she tried in a very weak way, but she tried all the same... to tell him that maybe... there could be another way. She wasn’t sure if she wanted Rolph Spicer dead. She knew he played a role in Joanna’s loss, but the only thing she was sure to want was her daughter. When she had tried to convince Tyrion not to burn the hundreds of people inside Castamere, she only met the icy stare. The stare he had when they met Walder Frey.

Joanna is dead.

That was when he told her, and he said nothing else. That was enough. It meant he wouldn’t come back on his decision. He left the tent and Sansa didn’t see him again before the night. Water once drowned the people in this castle, tonight they were cooked alive inside its walls, and those who tried to escape like this man burned alive all the same. Tyrion didn’t lie to his men or to her, for when darkness fell upon the Westerlands, he climbed on his dragon’s back and flew towards Castamere to destroy it. She couldn’t forget his words to his officers before he left. I will finish what my father started.

The Eyrie, and now Castamere. But Castamere wasn’t empty like the Eyrie. The husband she knew wouldn’t have done this. He would have warned the people inside, given them a chance to surrender. He didn’t. He only spared the messenger, and he sentenced all the others to die, just like he sentenced Serion Lannister and Vance Corbray. Only most of the people inside this castle had nothing to do with her kidnapping or Joanna’s death.

Tears began to fall on her cheeks. They weren’t caused by the smoke that reached them. She lost her daughter. She looked at Arya. Her little sister was looking toward Castamere, fascinated by what was going on. She was so different from the sister she had known. Had she lost her too? Was she about to lose Tyrion as well?

Joanna is dead.

The burning of Castamere lasted all night. Tyrion rained fire on the fortress until dawn. There wasn’t much left when he gave up. As he came down, Sansa noticed something odd in the dragon’s eyes. His eyes, two pools of molten gold, looked at her, and as they met with her own gaze, she thought he was asking for her help.

Joanna is dead.

She looked away. She didn’t want to look into the beast’s eyes. Every time she looked at him, she feared the worst for Tyrion. She was afraid of what he might become. She was afraid of the truth he told her. Only, by avoiding the eyes of the dragon, she met the eyes of the man she loved, and they were not to make her feel better. There she found another one of her fears, a much older fear, and she felt this fear was beginning to become a reality. A song played in the background, a familiar song, but it was different.
With a mane of gold or scales and wings

The beast always has claws

And yours are long and sharp my lord

With fire unlike mine

And so he thought

And so he thought that lord of Castamere

As the fire rained o’er his halls with everyone to see

Yes now fire rains o’er his halls with everyone to see

And while they all listened to the song, the only thing Sansa could see were the cold green eyes of her husband and the icy stare again that came with them. The stare she feared and that she saw at the Twins. It was the face of Tywin Lannister. He looked like the man who murdered her mother and brother.

Chapter End Notes

The structure of this chapter was inspired by the structure of a part of Sansa III, where Sansa keeps reminding herself or hearing something again and again. The chapter is mostly about her thoughts and memories as Castamere is burned to the ground by Tyrion. It’s probably where Tyrion embodies the worst sides of both his fathers.

Next chapter: Doran
Doran had two chapters early in this story. I have the impression it's been a lifetime since I wrote from his perspective. He is probably not the most interesting character of Game of Thrones, but he is certainly one of those which death was done in the most stupid and illogical way in the show. Doran Martell is one of the few people in Westeros to actually rule his lands for the good of his own people. Of all the paramount lords who ruled the Seven Kingdoms when Season 1 started, Doran was probably the only one to take decisions with the well-being of his subjects as the first priority. Even Ned Stark, in my opinion, cannot claim the same for he seemed to be serving honor codes more than the interests of Northerners, nor Tyrion when he was acting Hand for his priority remained to protect his family's interests, despite his attempts to make things better for the people of the capital.

Sorry, too much ranting. Back to the story.

And I apologize for uploading this chapter so late once again.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

To Doran Nymeros Martell, Lord of Sunspear, Prince of Dorne,

Recent events forced me to reconsider a marriage between me and Trystane Martell. Although I would be honored to have such a husband, the said events prevent me from accepting for the good of the Realm. Your queen will never forget your loyalty and the help you provided. House Martell can always count on my full support and help against their enemies. Our two houses have been friends for a long time and it will remain that way.

Daenerys Targaryen, the First of Her Name, Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynars, Lady of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm Doran laid down the raven scroll, his swollen hand shaking. Milk of the poppy soothed the pain, but there was still a tingle in his palm and fingers. Although Doran was disappointed with the situation, it was far better from what it could have been. Trystane had come back from King’s Landing, chased from the city after fights erupted following the death of his three cousins, Obara, Nymeria, and Tyene.

Doran had planned the marriage between Daenerys Targaryen and Quentyn, then with Trystane, to ensure the safety of Dorne after the Targaryen dynasty was reinstated. Dorne couldn’t live apart from the rest of Westeros. They had to maintain good relations with their neighbors. After the repetitive failed invasions of Dorne, the Reach and the Stormlands had come to avoid war in the deserts of the south. As long as Dorne wasn’t a threat to their lands, the Baratheons and the Tyrells wouldn’t bother Doran’s people. In consequence, he never threatened their lands in any way. Even when he made an alliance with Joffrey Baratheon, he limited his military involvement by positioning troops near the frontiers, but they remained on Dorne’s territory. Not a single Dornish soldier set foot on Renly or Stannis’ lands.
When Daenerys Targaryen came to Westeros, he knew this fragile but lasting balance would be broken. For the first time since the fall of the Mad King, Dornish soldiers went north of the Red Mountains. The balance was lost, and with the queen confirming the territories in the Stormlands that were granted by the Lannisters during the War of the Five Kings, Doran knew these concessions could become a source of conflict in the future. He had never truly wanted more territories in the North, but he couldn’t give them back now, especially not now that such a move would make him look weak at the worst possible time.

The guarantee of peace after the Baratheon dynasty would be overthrown was the marriage of Daenerys Targaryen with his son, ensuring the close alliance of House Martell with the new queen and dissuading any lord from seeking fight against Dorne. Now however, with Trystane back to Sunspear, the project of marriage tattered, and several minor houses in Dorne angry after House Martell, and possibly already preparing for war, all his plans of peace had gone into dust. The message of Daenerys Targaryen was somehow relieving, since she guaranteed help against their enemies. Doran understood the meaning of her words. This meant she would help them fight any house that would rebel against them as a consequence of the recent events in King’s Landing.

Doran knew it wouldn’t be easy. He would have to restore the authority of House Martell over Dorne. He knew his people and they were still thirsty for blood and revenge, just like he was. However, he doubted they would be as patient as he was to get their revenge. They would go to war right away if not very soon. It was good news in some way, for people who went to war at the first provocation were less dangerous than those who waited for the right moment to strike, but what was good news for his family were bad news for Dorne, for the people would suffer of this war. However, it was unavoidable at this point.

“Hotah.” The captain of his guard looked at him, his axe ready as always. “Bring me my son. We need to talk.”

Hotah did as he was told. While he was away, Doran looked at the Water Gardens. Not long ago, Trystane and Myrcella had been walking there, two children in love who were unaware of how the world wanted them dead. Myrcella was dead, and Doran’s son was only a shell of the young man he once was.

His son walked into the room where Doran sat without saying a word. The young man full of life that Doran knew was gone. There was only a ghost. He hadn’t been like this when he arrived in Sunspear. After he took time to restore himself, Doran had had a very long and painful conversation with him. Trystane defended the decisions he took in the capital. He went on a monologue that lasted for about fifteen minutes, explaining himself, trying to convince his father that he had done the right thing by condemning Tyene.

Trystane had been furious all along his speech. Doran had listened to him, the pain to see his son in such a state greater than the pain of the gout. After his son’s tirade was over, it was Doran’s turn to speak. He spoke more slowly, without raising the voice, letting his reason and his head talk instead of his heart. He reminded Trystane of the duties he had as future Lord of Sunspear, of his failures, of how he betrayed his people by placing his personal vendetta before Dorne.

First, Trystane had objected, but as Doran kept speaking, his son’s complaints grew weaker. He could only mutter objections, then he didn’t argue anymore and simply listened to his father. At the end of their conversation, Doran’s last son couldn’t look into his father’s eye.

Doran didn’t like to see his son this way, broken, but he had no choice. Trystane would be Lord of Sunspear someday. He would rule the entire people of Dorne, lead the destiny of their nation, and for that Doran needed to lower his son so he could rise again. Trystane had to understand the mistakes he made so he could take back the right way.

His son was just in the same state as when they had stopped to discuss days ago. He knelt before his father when he entered and didn’t dare to look at him. Trystane never behaved this way. He was always respectful towards his parents, but never obedient to the point he would bow like a servant.

“Rise, Trystane. You’re my son, not my serf.” His son slowly stood up, still refusing to make eye contact with Doran. “Sit.”

Doran indicated the seat in front of him, and Trystane did as he was told, keeping his eyes on the floor. Hotah remained at the entrance, ready to intervene at any moment.

“Hotah, leave us,” he told him.

The strong man didn’t say anything, which wasn’t surprising. What was surprising was that he didn’t move.

“My prince…”

Areo Hotah never questioned Doran’s orders, less disobeyed him. Doran felt that for the first time, Hotah might be tempted to do so.

“Leave us, Hotah. He is Mellario’s son.”

Doran knew that Hotah, although he remained in Dorne when Mellario left, remained deeply attached to her. Doran tried to communicate to him through his eyes that Mellario wouldn’t have wanted him to suspect her son this way. A ray of understanding might have passed through Areo’s eyes, and he left the room. Doran was alone with his son.

For a long time, they remained silent, Doran gazing at his son while the latter refused to look at him. Not far away, he could hear the water of the gardens dripping. This environment helped with the health of his body as much as that of his mind, but they couldn’t divert his thoughts from Oberyn’s death after the Mountain killed him, and they couldn’t do better now.

Doran started the conversation with a simple question. “Did you have time to think?”

“Yes, Father.” Trystane’s voice was flat, dull. He still didn’t look up.

“And?”

“I don’t know. I… I know that… I don’t know. I don’t know, Father. I know what happened is because of me, but… What else could I do? They killed her. What did you expect me to do?”

“I was hoping you wouldn’t make Oberyn’s mistakes, or the mistakes I almost made.”

“I’m sorry. I… I don’t know anymore if what I did was right or wrong.”

Doran knew what his son was going through. He had gone through this long ago, when Elia and her children died. He had only wanted to kill everyone who had something to see with her death. He had been like Oberyn. He wanted to go to war against Robert Baratheon, Ned Stark and Tywin Lannister and kill them and all their men. Only, something stopped him from doing so. Doran had always been a man who thought before he acted. In his youth, before the gout stuck him to a chair, he would often walk in the corridors of Sunspear or the Water Gardens, using the opportunity to reflect on a situation before he took a final decision. That day however, the day he learned of Elia’s death, he had gone to walk in the streets of the city.
Doran seldom went down in the streets. Most of the time, he was carried by litter. He cared about his people but didn’t meddle with them like Oberyn did. That day, however, had been different. He went into the streets, alone. And there he saw the misery of his people. The widows, the orphans, the cripples, all those who suffered from the war. And he had realized how worse it would get if he kept making war against all the other kingdoms.

Oberyn had been with him. They disguised themselves as simple merchants. His brother had wanted him to see the suffering of their people so that he would be convinced to bring justice to Elia’s murderers. Instead, Doran asked himself what Elia would want him to do. Would she have wanted their people to suffer so that they could kill the people who murdered her? The answer was easy to find.

Later, Doran had come to the conclusion that if they fought the new dynasty, they would be alone. He feared the Tyrells wouldn’t fight long when they would realize Aerys was dead, and the end of the siege of Storm’s End proved that Doran was right in his predictions. They needed allies. So Doran delayed his vengeance. He made alliances in secret, prepared the return of the Targaryen dynasty, hid and waited for the right moment to strike. And he succeeded.

Doran knew that Trystane had been facing the same dilemma. He had to choose between avenging his beloved or serving his people. He chose the first, and now the people of Dorne would suffer from it. They would fight each other, and thousands would die in fratricidal war.

Trystane may have forgotten it, but Doran reminded him of that during their conversation that took place days ago. Now his son was torn apart as he realized the full consequences of his actions.

“You remember what I told you one day. What decides whether something is right or wrong?”

“Yes. The best decision, and the one we must always take, is the one that benefits the most to the people of Dorne. It is not justice, riches, victories, the nobles, or even the people who decide what is the right decision to take. It is what is best for the people that decides what we must do. Were your decisions in King’s Landing the best for Dorne?”

He didn’t reply.

“Look at me, Trystane.” Slowly, his son raised his eyes. “Were your decisions in King’s Landing the best for Dorne?”

“No,” he confessed.

“Then you know that you did wrong.”

A single tear fell from his left eye. “I loved her.”

“I know. I saw you every day, wandering in the gardens. Happy. Tell me Trystane. You knew Myrcella, better than I did. Do you think she would have wanted you to avenge her if that meant the death of thousands of people?”

“No,” Trystane whispered.

“Now, was revenge worth it all?”

“Was it, Father?”
For the first time, his son looked straight at him and their eyes met. He wasn’t defying Doran. He was looking for an answer. His son was a broken man. Doran wished he could give his son what he wanted, but he couldn’t.

“Only time will tell us. What I know is that it wasn’t worth my brother’s death.”

If Doran could get back his brother by reinstating the family who murdered Elia and his nephew and niece, he would. Only he couldn’t, and it was useless to wish Oberyn could be back with them. He was gone, just like the Sand Snakes, and now Doran had to care about those who still lived, beginning by the young man who sat in front of him.

“I received a message from Daenerys Targaryen,” he announced.

“Oh.” His son didn’t look surprised. Trystane was clever enough to know this would happen.

“There won’t be a marriage.”

“Oh,” he repeated, still unconcerned.

“However, she assured that she would support us against any enemy we would have. What do you make of it?”

“She will help us, Father. She is true to her word.”

This confirmed what Doran thought and hoped for. “The next months will be difficult for us, my son. We will have to fight rebellions in Dorne. We may have the support of House Targaryen, but we will have to bring the peace back by our own means. This will require force and diplomacy at the same time. It will be difficult to keep Dorne united without sacrificing too many of our countrymen, but we will have to do it. You will have to do it.”

Trystane nodded. “Yes, Father.”

“You will be Lord of Sunspear one day, my son.” Maybe sooner than you think. “You will have to behave like the Lord of Sunspear from now on.” He sighed, then resumed with a softer tone. “We do not have an easy task, Trystane. We have the destinies of over two hundred thousand people in our hands. This is a great responsibility. We cannot allow our personal feelings and desires to infringe on our duties. Everyone in Dorne is counting on us. They depend on us, rely on us, and we cannot disappoint them. I know this is hard. This is something inhuman to ask, but it is something we must do. If we don’t do it, no one will, and everyone will suffer more than we will ever suffer from repressing what makes us human. Do you understand?”

“I understand, Father.” Trystane replied with a voice that wasn’t as hollow as it used to be. It was still flat, but you could hear in the tone that he was ready to do his duty. In time, he would learn to carry his burden and to live with it, as Doran learned to live with his.

When his son was gone, Hotah came back. The bearded priest stood at the entrance of the room, like he always did, alert and ready to react to anything. Doran stayed there, watching the peaceful nature of the gardens in silence. It looked so empty now. Elia and her children were gone. Quentyn was gone. Oberyn was gone. Myrcella was gone. Obara, Nymeria and Tyene were gone. Ellaria Sand was imprisoned in a tower cell, probably for the rest of her life, in Sunspear. Oberyn’s remaining daughters were kept there as well, free of their movements but under heavy supervision. Only Doran, Hotah and Trystane remained, and soon they would go too.

“Did you ever regret serving me, Hotah?”
Despite his cold stature, Hotah allowed for the keen observer to see he was surprised by the question. “I never regretted anything, my prince,” he replied.

“Never?”

“Never.”

“Not even when Mellario left?”

For a moment, the bearded priest hesitated. “I was sad, my prince.”

“Me too.”

A long silence followed, a silence which both men respected.

“Hotah, bring me to Caleotte.”

The guard his wife left when she went back home pushed Doran to the maester’s apartments. There, Doran dictated a letter. He started it all over again three times and asked for Caleotte and even Hotah’s advice more than once. Strangely, he found the short answers of the bearded priest to be more helpful than the long suggestions of the maester. In the end, it gave a letter that Doran thought might be appropriate.

The next day, the letter left the Water Gardens for the closest harbor. There, it would take a ship to Essos. Doran prayed it would reach Norvos in time, before it was too late.

Two days later, news came to the Water Gardens that Myria Jordayne, Lady of the Tor, had entered into open rebellion against House Martell. Her father had been among the lords executed by the new queen.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter closes Trystane’s storyline. I hope that he didn't look too much like a cliche character through this fanfiction, like the man who's only trying to avenge the woman he loves. I tried to put emphasis on his attempts to rule Meereen, then King’s Landing in Daenerys' absence, picturing him as a ruler trying to emulate his father, while being confronted every day with the memory of the woman he lost, and added his friendship with Margaery to give more color to the character. In the end, still, it was his search for revenge that condemned him.

As for Doran, well, he was more of a backstory character, someone acting in the shadows like Varys, but whose decisions played a great role in the events that shook Westeros and in shaping the story. His death was so stupid in the show, and I'm glad that I produced something that I deem more realistic for him, and that allowed him to actually help Daenerys to come back to Westeros. Daenerys may be hated by some, loved by others, and produce mixed feelings among the rest, she still helped to defeat the White Walkers, so we can credit Doran for the far but determining role he played in the defeat of the great enemy. A peaceful, ill, quiet lord who, in my opinion, deserves more praise and a better place in history books than conquerors like Aegon, Tywin or Daeron.

Chapter Notes

Two chapters this week. I was planning to upload this one week ago, but these two chapters go so much together that I thought it would be better to not leave you on your appetite for a complete week. Furthermore, these two chapters are quite short.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SANSA XXXVII

They walked inside, surrounded by four men with the armor of House Lannister. Pushed in the back, Gawen Westerling, Lord of the Crag, and his wife Sybell Spicer fell on their knees. Tyrion stepped forward, dominating them in his position, his shadow covering them both.

“So, you needed one day with my armies at your gates, and another one with a dragon over your heads to understand that resistance was useless?”

Normally, Tyrion would have said that with a hint of humor. His voice was now devoid of any such thing. It sounded like the voice of someone who was dead. Every day, Sansa had the impression he was coming back, and she came to doubt that Tyrion wasn’t the son of Tywin Lannister.

All their eyes were set on them, the two prisoners and the man who held the power of life and death over them. Sansa stood away with the officers and Genna. Tyrion’s aunt had accompanied if not led the troops Casterly Rock sent to besiege the Crag. She had only been there for one day when Tyrion and Sansa came from Castamere by dragon. They arrived in the middle of the day, and a few hours later Gawen Westerling surrendered unconditionally. It was night now, and they were defeated.

“Do you know what is on this table,” Tyrion resumed, “apart from a map of the Westerlands? These are copies and traces of correspondence between the Crag and three men: Rolph Spicer, Serion Lannister, and Petyr Baelish. It is quite a chance that your maester keeps a copy of everything you send and receive.”

He walked towards Lady Sybell, who looked on the ground. “And it is quite good news too that your maester refused to burn his archives like you asked him to, right before Lord Westerling opened the gates.”

Lord Gawen’s expression changed at this moment. He looked at his wife with a bewildered expression.

“And it is quite a coincidence that all the messages you exchanged with Serion Lannister, your brother and Littlefinger were addressed to you and signed by you, Sybell Spicer.”

“Don’t believe a word of what he’s saying, Gawen.” The Lady of the Crag spoke for the first time.

“It’s useless, my lady. Ser Daven sent a raven to Casterly Rock. He questioned your men in the North. One of them was stationed at Winterfell when Lady Sansa and our daughter were taken away. He returned to the army later, after the Wall fell a second time, hoping that in the confusion no one would notice him, but he was wrong. He confirmed the role your house played in the kidnappings. And he also confirmed that he received his orders from you.”

“Anything to say?” he added after a heavy moment of silence.

She looked up at him, hatred painted in his eyes, but she said nothing.

“Sybell, how could you do this?” her husband said.

“I did it for our children,” she replied, still looking at Tyrion. “They deserve better.”

“You had the great privilege to see your son marry one of my cousins.”

“A bastard!” she spat.

“A Lannister! A Lannister who was ten times above him, ten times what your entire family will ever be. I gave you a chance after you betrayed the Westerlands and sided with Robb Stark. My lord father wouldn’t have shown you the same mercy. I think I should have done what he would have done back then. Kill you and everyone one of your family.”

“Well,” Tyrion continued after another moment of silence, “that’s what I’m going to do now. Gawen Westerling, and you, Sybell Spicer, his wife, I sentence you and all House Westerling to death. The members of your household who are not members of your family will live and remain in service at the Crag for the family who will take your place.”

“Wait, my lord!” Lord Gawen begged. “I didn’t know about this, I swear. I had no part in this conspiracy.”

“Well, you should have known. For then you would have stopped it and informed me. Seeing you cannot stop your wife from plotting against her liege lord, that makes you as guilty as she is.”

“But my children…”

“You already lost a son, I’m sure you’ll be happy to see him again with all your family. I will not allow something that came out of this cunt to live.” He pointed Lady Sybell as he spoke. She was paler than bed’s sheets. “Take them away. They die at dawn.”

“No, my lord, please, please…”

Everyone was silent in the command tent as they dragged Lord Westerling and his wife, mute and despair, out. Once the cries of Lord Gawen were far away enough so that they wouldn’t hear him, a complete silence settled. Tyrion slowly turned on himself to face them, and again she saw the eyes of Tywin Lannister.

“You may leave, all of you. There’s nothing more to discuss tonight.”

The officers left quickly, but Sansa lingered behind. She was shaking and didn’t dare to look anywhere but to the ground. Tyrion had just sentenced a whole family to die. The youngest son was only twelve.

“Sansa.” She almost jumped when she heard the voice. She hadn’t heard it in a while. She turned her gaze toward him in a quicker way than she would have dared only a moment ago. “You should go and take some rest.”

He was back. She nodded and quickly walked out before the icy stare of Tywin Lannister would come back and she wouldn’t remember the last time she looked at Tyrion tonight as the time when he was the husband she loved again.

She stormed more than she walked into their personal pavilion. She clung to the memory of this rare moment in the last few days when Tyrion had been himself again. She was so afraid of losing him after she lost Joanna that she didn’t dare to talk to him. She feared it might send him further down. She was afraid that anything she would do might have dire consequences. All she could do was watch and pray for him. She didn’t have the courage to speak to him anymore.

“There you are.” Genna had walked in without asking for permission, of course. “So, what are you going to do?”

Sansa frowned. “What do you mean?”

“Are you planning to remain in that chair doing nothing, or will you talk Tyrion out of this idea?”

She was confused. Genna sighed and spoke again.

“You remember the day you arrived at the Rock? On our way back from the ancient Great Hall, I told you Tyrion would need you one day. I hope you didn’t forget.”

Sansa didn’t know what she was talking about first, but then the memory came back to the surface, something she heard a long time ago and that she couldn’t forget easily. When this day comes, Tyrion will need you. It will be your duty to stop him from doing something he may regret for the rest of his life.

“Ah, I see you remember.” Genna must have noticed it from the expression that went through her face. “So, what are you planning to do?”

“Nothing,” she whispered after some time. It was barely audible, but Genna seemed to have heard it nonetheless.

“Nothing?” her aunt-in-law asked, unconvinced.

“If you don’t want the Westerlings to die, talk to him yourself.”

“He will not listen to me, Sansa.”

“Then he won’t listen to me either.”

Genna sighed. There was a chair right next to Sansa and she sat on it. The wood made a strange sound when she took place. An enormous hand landed on Sansa’s shoulder, firm yet kind.

“You’re the only one he will listen to right now, Sansa.”

“No, he won’t. Things have changed.”

Genna said nothing for a few seconds. “I know it is hard to lose a child. I’ve been there, but you cannot let it destroy you.”

“She’s gone,” Sansa said with a strangled voice.

“I know,” Tyrion’s aunt replied softly, almost in a whisper.

“We sent people to look for her through all the Vale, and they found nothing. She’s gone, somewhere at the bottom of the Narrow Sea, or lying on a coast somewhere. Her body all…”
She couldn’t finish. Tears threatened to fall again.

Again, the two women said nothing. They sat alone in the pavilion that felt so empty to Sansa, without any of the people she loved. Arya was training somewhere in the camp. She didn’t think her little sister could be of any help to her anyway. Arya said she would always be there for her, but she wasn’t. Sansa was alone.

“How were things at Castamere?” Genna asked her.

Sansa refused to answer. She didn’t feel like she could lie to Genna, and she didn’t want her to know that what horrified her the most in the second destruction of Castamere was the way Tyrion had looked more than ever like Tywin Lannister.

“I heard another song was composed,” she resumed. Yes now fire rains o’er his halls with everyone to see. “I was hoping things would be different, but Tyrion proved without a single doubt that he was my brother’s son.”

“Is he?”

She didn’t look at Genna, but she stopped talking for a moment. Only for a moment. “People say Tywin smiled as Tarbeck Hall fell, and I wouldn’t be surprised if he smiled when he flooded the tunnels of Castamere with all its people inside, though Tygett never told me about it. Tell me, did Tyrion smile?”

“No, he didn’t.” There was no smile upon Tyrion’s face when he was done destroying the castle. There was only… she couldn’t really describe what it was. It was easier to describe what it was not. It was devoid of any mercy, any compassion, any pity.

Total absence of love. That’s what it was. That’s what was inside Tyrion’s eyes when he was done burning Castamere to the ground.

“Joanna wasn’t there when Tywin destroyed Castamere and Tarbeck Hall. She and Tywin were not married yet.” Sansa thought that the mother-in-law she never knew was lucky. She didn’t have to see the man she loved at his worst. “You know she regretted it later.”

“Why?” Sansa asked, surprised.

“Because she felt that she missed her chance to save him. She told me not long before she died. It is sad that Tywin was only ruled by his wife at home. Maybe it would have been for the better if he was ruled by her in other circumstances.”

Genna stood up and looked down on Sansa. “This is your choice, my dear, but I suggest you do something before dawn or else history will just repeat itself.”

Sansa was left alone once more. She was used to solitude. Even when she was with Tyrion now, she felt alone. All her family seemed thousands of miles away from her, as if a wall was erected between them, and she was afraid they might slip farther from her than they actually were.

Reluctantly, as if she was being forced to do it, Sansa left her seat and walked out into the night. Her footsteps brought her back to the command tent. When she arrived, Tyrion was reading something, his back turned on her.

Tyrian has a lot of Tywin in him, but also his mother’s compassion. Up to now this compassion has kept Tywin’s ruthlessness away, but I fear one day it might not be enough. When this day comes, Tyrion will need you. It will be your duty to stop him from doing something he may regret for the rest of his life.

The words Genna told her a long time ago haunted her. Tyrion wasn’t like his father yet. She had seen it tonight, just before she left. When he spoke to her, the caring husband she knew was there. Was it a remnant of the Tyrion she knew? Was he truly turning like his father? The Rains of Castamere were playing not far away. By the sound of it, they were a group of drunken men, probably sitting around a campfire with mugs of wine. They probably hadn’t heard of the Fires of Castamere yet. Although they had not heard the song, everyone knew what happened at Castamere. Maybe they thought the same would happen to the Crag.

She must have made a sound when she entered, for Tyrion quickly turned to look behind him. His expression softened when he saw her.

“You should be resting.” He went back to his reading.

“You need rest too,” she replied.

“That’s useless. I cannot sleep.”

Tyrion had a horrible sleep before they were wed. It got better as their marriage went on. However, now that Sansa thought about it, Tyrion hadn’t slept much more than her since they learned about Joanna’s death. Her nights were lacking in sleep that she failed to realize that Tyrion was no better.

At least, Tyrion must have noticed that she lacked sleep too, hence his recommendation.

“I cannot sleep either,” she said, while sitting next to him.

“The sleepless demon monkey and the sleepless disgraced daughter.” He sighed. “We’re perfect for each other.”

A smile, a fugitive smile, came to Sansa’s lips and remained there for less than a second at the memory of a joke he made a long time ago. The same day, Sansa learned that her family was murdered at the Red Wedding, gracious gift from Tywin Lannister.

“You shouldn’t do this.” The words had come out of her mouth before she realized she was saying them.

“Reading?” He didn’t lift his eyes from the scroll.

“No. Killing the Westerlings.”

He looked up, but not in her direction. Tyrion stood up and nonchalantly threw the scroll on the table. “I have no choice. They killed her.”

Sansa gazed at her feet. She despised Sybell Spicer for the role she played in her abduction at Winterfell and the death of her daughter, but she felt that she had to say something.

“Tyrion… you cannot kill children.”

He sighed. “If I let them live, with the memory of their mother executed, they will hate me forever and conspire against us at the first opportunity.”

Her husband still refused to look at her. Sansa felt her heart stopping when she heard his words. She looked at Tyrion. The candles projected his long shadow on the tissue of the tent’s wall.

She shivered. When she was in King’s Landing, not long after the Battle of Blackwater, she was forced to assist a court session. Joffrey wasn’t present, too busy spending time with his new betrothed. Tywin Lannister, despite the fact he never wore a crown, was more a king than Joffrey ever was, and he looked more like a king than his grandson had ever looked to be. When the session had been over, the Hand of the King had risen from the throne and Sansa had seen his shadow on the floor below the dais. It was the same shadow Sansa was seeing tonight.

She looked at Tyrion instead of his shadow. There was no way she could confuse him with Lord Tywin, but as soon as her eyes wandered on the shadow that loomed not far from her, a terrible chill ran on her back as she had the impression that Tywin Lannister stood right next to her.

“How are you different from your father then?”

Slowly, he turned to face her. His face was unreadable. It was as if he didn’t understand what she just said. Her whole body was shaking. Tyrion made a step towards her. She stood up immediately and walked out as quickly as she could without running. When she was out and the wind hit her face, she realized there were thin lines on her cheeks that were very cold. They were tears. She was crying.

Next chapter : Tyrion
How are you different from your father then?

He looked at his wife walking away from him. Was it fear on her face? Or sorrow? Or both?

He dropped his arm. He raised it to comfort Sansa. It had felt so awkward when he did it. Before, it had been natural for him to touch his wife, to hold her hand, to cup her cheek, after it had been awkward at the beginning of their marriage. Why did it feel so unnatural again?

He knew why, of course. It was since they were reunited, since he learned he was the bastard son of Aerys Targaryen, since they learned of their daughter’s death. He had failed to save her, failed to protect his family. That’s why he wanted to punish those who did it, to stop them from ever threatening those he loved again. Wasn’t it?

He sat back in his chair and pressed his left elbow on the table, leaning his face against his closed fist. His eyes fell on the ring of his fourth finger, the ring he had for three years now. Tyrion didn’t know for how long he remained lost in his thoughts, just looking at the ring.

“I see you haven’t lost your good habits,” a voice came from the entrance. Tyrion wished it had been Sansa’s, but he knew when he heard that it was the voice of his aunt.

“Maybe, but I don’t recall you not being able to sleep at night,” he replied.

“With Emmon as a husband, I hope you don’t assume my nights were perfect.”

Tyrion thought about the miserable Frey who married his aunt. “No, I wouldn’t.”

It was the first time he was alone with his aunt since he arrived at the Crag. She sat in front of him from the other side of the table. Tyrion spoke before she could place a word.

“You knew, didn’t you?”

She feigned ignorance. “What did I know?”

“Don’t take me for a fool, Genna. You think I ignore why I can ride a dragon?” he snapped.

His aunt was completely taken aback. She must have thought he was accusing her of something else when he said she knew something. Perhaps she knew that Sansa would come to see him. Anyway, she obviously wasn’t expecting this.

“What did you hear?” she asked. Tyrion could see she was tensed.
“My mother took Moon Tea, didn’t she?”

Again, she seemed surprised. She looked away. “Yes, she did.” She seemed relieved, but Tyrion didn’t allow this relief to last long.

“You weren’t there Genna, that night. When I was called by the king, he did nothing. He said nothing, he didn’t stand up, or lifted a finger, or moved the slightest. He didn’t even dare to look at me. And he knew. Don’t try to justify him.”

His aunt was stunned. Tyrion just said the words his lady mother told her when she was about to give birth to him. She had been all alone with her when they talked. His aunt closed her eyes and her lips tightened.

“How much do you know?”

“I know more than enough,” he replied.

“Then why ask me, if you already know?”

He didn’t reply right away. When he did, he couldn’t cover the anger in his voice. “You hid this from me.”

“What else did you want me to do? Being a Lannister was all that protected you. And it was already difficult for you to know you were a dwarf. There was no need for you to know that you were more than this.”

“Yes, a bastard.” All dwarves are bastards in their father’s eyes.

“You were Joanna’s son, and you still are. That makes you a Lannister.”

“What a consolation,” he ironized.

“That’s not a consolation. That’s a fact. Joanna carried you, Tyrion, she brought you into the world. She was a Lannister long before she married your father.”

“My father? Can you tell me one moment when Tywin Lannister was a father to me?”

Genna took her time to answer. “Maybe never. Maybe he was never a father to anyone.” He frowned. “Maybe you, Jaime and Cersei were his heirs, but never his children. All I know is that he would refuse to hear that you were his son. He wouldn’t speak to someone for months after he told him that, even if the someone was of his own blood.”

“Did he know?”

She sighed. “I suppose we will never know.”

“Who else knows?”

“No one. I would never spread stories like this.”

They fall back into a heavy silence. Tyrion thought about he discussion between his lady mother and Genna that Brandon Stark showed him at Winterfell. He had run away to the sept when he discovered the truth, something he never thought he would do. His sister-in-law had found him afterwards and it was their shared determination to save Sansa that allowed him to go forward.

Genna broke the atmosphere. “Tyrion, all this doesn’t matter to me, and it shouldn’t matter to you either. I know this is difficult, but you have to be over this. I wouldn’t be surprised if there were at least a dozen bastards who were not the lord’s child in our family tree. Men are men and women are women, and they will always be. You need to focus on what’s happening right now.”

She stood up and proceeded to leave, but she stopped before she made five meters. “Let us be clear, Tyrion, Joanna was your mother and she loved you. She loved you before you were born. The last thing she did before she died was to beg Tywin to let you live. Tywin did raise like his son, if not like a son. You have more of him in you than Jaime and Cersei ever had.” She stopped before she added something else. “But that doesn’t mean you have to be like him.”

Then Genna left for good. Tyrion didn’t sleep at all this night. He spent it thinking, or simply just staring at something. It could be his wedding ring, the map on the table, a chair, or even the coming light through the flap as the night came to an end. When the time was right, he left the tent as well.

The place he chose for the execution was in an open field between the Lannister encampment and the Crag. A group of six knights followed him to the location. When they arrived, Gawen Westerling, Sybell Spicer and their three children, Jeyne, Eleyna and Rollam, were already there, hands and ankles tied, in kneeling position. Tyrion stopped at good distance from them. Genna was present too. Sybell Spicer was looking at him with pure hatred, and he gave it back to her in kind. Tyrion waited, and finally he came.

Viserion had gone to hunt yesterday, and now he was back, right when he was needed. The dragon with golden eyes swiftly landed next to Tyrion and eyed the prisoners in front of him. Lord Gawen and his children were obviously terrified by the beast. Tyrion wondered what it would be if it was Drogon who stood before them.

Lady Westerling was trying to hide her distress, but she was afraid of Viserion just as much as her husband. Tyrion stepped forward until he was standing right in front of her.

“Tell me, Lady Westerling, who would you prefer to die first? Your husband or your children? Unless you want to die first.”

She didn’t reply and kept looking at him the same way than before, hating him with her eyes.

“I suppose it is hard to decide. Whoever dies first, you’ll have to look at him burning alive until this is your turn. That’s not an easy choice.”

Still the same gaze of hatred.

“Why did you do this?” Tyrion’s voice took a less mocking tone. “You lost a son. Wasn’t that enough for you? You may not have received what you thought my father promised you, but was it worth risking your entire family in the hope that a brothelkeeper would give you more? You really thought Littlefinger cared about you? That he would reward you for your contribution to his plan?”

“Go on and be done with it, Imp,” she replied spitefully. “Kill us now.”

“So eager,” Tyrion mocked. “I would believe a mother would try to save her children at all cost, not demand that they be killed right away.”

No reply, and still the same hatred in her eyes. Tyrion look at Lord Westerling. “I pity you, Lord Gawen. Being married to this woman. It must have been horrible for you. I knew a man who was married to a woman very similar to her. Ambitious, cunning, power hungry, spiteful, odious, insufferable. She ended up having him killed, then her three children died, and in the end, she died as well. Her whole family died because of her lust for power.” He looked again at the woman. “Would you be ready to sacrifice all your family if it allowed you to get a bigger castle or a throne?"

She didn’t answer. She seemed about to spite on him.

“Who is silent consents,” Tyrion declared. He turned to Lord Westerling again. “I really pity you, my lord.”

“My lord, please,” Lord Westerling begged. “Spare my children. They did nothing. If you want to kill me, then do it, but please spare them.”

Tyrion looked at the two young girls and the boy, who was still officially betrothed to his cousin Joy. They were crying, the three of them. Tyrion didn’t show any reaction to this.

“You lost a son in the last war, Lord Westerling, didn’t you?”

“Yes, my lord. My son Raynald.”

“It must have been difficult for you.”

“Yes, it was.”

“Then you know what I’m going through. In fact, I’m going through worse, for you lost one child out of four. Joanna was my only child.”

“I’m sorry, my lord, but I swear that I had nothing to do with that. I knew nothing of all this.”

“Yes, obviously you know nothing, Westerling.”

Tyrion stepped back and looked at the five of them. The Westerling were an impoverished house, and Sybell Spicer and her brother, who were of modest origin, had wanted to climb into the highest spheres of the society. Rolph Spicer had paid for his crimes with his life, but that wasn’t enough.

“Sybell Spicer, Gawen Westerling, Jeyne Westerling, Eleyna Westerling and Rollam Westerling, you will all die.” Viserion straightened behind. The Westerlings all panicked. They felt their last hour was coming. The Spicer was still looking at him, probably wanting to rip his heart out of his chest. Only she wouldn’t be able to do so. She didn’t have much time left.

“But not today,” Tyrion added. They all looked in consternation and utter surprise to each other, including the woman. Tyrion looked at the father and his children. “Lord Westerling, you and your children will be brought back to the Crag right away. Our queen doesn’t consider children to be responsible of their father’s or mother’s crimes, and me neither. I expect to have no further problem with House Westerling in the future. You will have a garrison of soldiers loyal to House Lannister stationed inside your walls from now on. You will have to see to their needs, of course. The garrison will stay there as long as I think it is necessary. Whoever in your household is found to plot against House Lannister or the new queen will be executed. Bring them to the Crag while I deal with this woman,” Tyrion added for his men.

They seized a Lord Westerling, two young women and a boy all confused about the way events turned. Before they were far away enough, the eldest daughter yelled. “What are you going to do to our mother?”

Tyrion turned his attention back to Lady Westerling, who after showing confusion for a moment, went back to her hatred expression as soon as Tyrion looked at her. “As for you, Sybell Spicer, you took part to the plot against House Lannister. You are entirely responsible for your actions and their consequences, which include the death of my daughter. However, out of concern for your husband and your children, I will spare your life for now. I exile you from Westeros. You will be brought to Lannisport and thrown onto the first ship to leave for the Bay of Dragons, with nothing but the clothes on your back. I expect you to not survive more than a few days.”

With a sign from his head, soldiers escorted her, still tied. Tyrion wasn’t about to let this woman get out with it. He would make sure to tell the captain of the ship that would bring her to Essos that the Lord of Casterly Rock would be very thankful if the Lady of the Crag accidentally fell in the sea during the journey to the east.

Tyrion turned to his dragon. “No burning today, Viserion. Sorry to have bothered you for nothing.”

Viserion didn’t seem to be bothered. In fact, Tyrion even thought he saw relief in the dragon’s eyes. Well, he would rather have a dragon who didn’t enjoy burning people alive. Tyrion thought he was done with it. He didn’t want to turn like his father.

He walked away and noticed from the corner of his eye a barely visible smile on his aunt’s lips. The Mad King wasn’t the only father he would be different from.

Chapter End Notes

Some of you were very worried about the path Tyrion was taking, and some even came to hate him for what he did at Castamere. Tyrion has these moments he will decide to do something rash and totally irrational, to follow his emotions, and right after he's going to regret it (see Tywin's death) or try to take back what he did (see the threat to Joffrey when he insisted to go with the bedding at Tyrion's wedding). That is part of his character, and sadly it can push him to do horrible things in specific circumstances, especially when he is in a position of power like now. However, Tyrion remains a good person deep down. He just needs someone to stand up and tell him he's wrong, and that he's not forced to be like his father, whoever he is.

Next chapter: Gerold
A short detour by the North before we go back south.

GEROLD III

The small group of men quickened their pace as they saw their home appear. Ironrath stood tall in the distance, identical to the last time Gerold saw it. Snow covered a large part of the castle, but he supposed that for the Northerners it was normal. Gerold himself had grown used to snow after such a long time in the North.

He was the only man of the Reach heading for Ironrath. The remnants of his army were at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea with Garlan. Most of them were waiting for the next ship heading for Oldtown to go home. Some were told they would stay behind with Gerold. For the time being, they were all at the Wall, protecting the North from any threat that may arise in the region. The soldiers of Ironrath were all given leave to go home. The need to rebuild Ironrath, still mostly in ruins, and for the harvesting of ironwood justified this decision. Men in service of House Forrester were more useful working ironwood than standing guard on the Wall and patrolling the Gift. As a result, Gerold would come back to Ironrath alone, without any of his own men.

He spent a large part of the journey alone. Sometimes he would speak with the other men, but not much. Despite their shared time fighting the dead, there was still resentment over his departure from Ironrath. The truth was that Gerold blamed himself too. He didn’t know Mira was pregnant, but the fact remained he left a woman heavy with their child behind. He also condemned many of his men to die from the cold by leaving in the thick of winter like this, like Garlan explained to him long ago. Only, back then, he wanted to go home. The battles had been a shock for him. All he wanted to do was to get away from this, and when Mira refused to follow him, he felt betrayed.

The castle walls were getting closer and bigger. What would he tell her? They had been apart for a very long time, and not only physically. There was so much he wanted to tell her, and yet he didn’t know where to begin.

On his way to Ironrath, they came upon Brandon Stark who was heading to the Wall. Gerold talked with him shortly. That was through him that Gerold learned that Ryon Forrester ran away to Essos and that Mira was officially the Lady of Ironrath.

Gerold didn’t feel much at the news. All he wanted was to see Mira again. It was a shock, something he didn’t expect, but nothing more. Later, he thought that his father and grandfather would probably rejoice at the news. He hated them for that. His wife’s brother just left, and all they would do was to find it appropriate for House Hightower. Altos would probably be angry to discover that his brother would be Lord of Ironrath, and Gerold hated him for that too, but at least he got some satisfaction at the idea that his elder brother would be seething with rage.

Truth be told, Gerold didn’t really care about Ironrath. He came back for his wife, not for a castle. Not long before they resumed their way, Brandon Stark talked with him one last time.
“We all have duties. Sometimes it’s to a master, sometimes to the Realm, often to something greater than us… and what is greater than us is our family.”

That, Gerold had known since his birth. House Hightower was more important than every one of them. Altos probably thought he was House Hightower by himself, which might explain why he cared so little for his siblings, especially the little brother with nothing.

They arrived before the gates. The portcullis arose. They barely needed to slow down before they rode into the main courtyard. It looked as desolate as in Gerold’s memories, maybe with more snow. Men climbed down their horses, welcomed by women and children. As Gerold dismounted, he saw her.

She stood away from the crowd welcoming back their men at home. She must have noticed him for she was looking straight in his direction. Gerold didn’t ride at the head of the group. The people of Ironrath were not his people after all. His men were at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea with his brother. It hadn’t stopped his wife from seeing him in the group right away.

He made his way through the small crowd and walked toward her with a measured pace. Her sister Talia was by her side, with four guards, two on their left and two on their right. Every one of them looked at him suspiciously. All but his wife. Her own expression was neutral. Gerold wondered what was to be read in that, or if anything was to be read. He wanted to say something, but it got stuck in his throat. They just stayed there, saying nothing.

“Come.”

That was the first word Mira told him within months, and the first thing she did after that was to turn around and walk toward the wooden castle. Gerold stood there, uncertain about what to do. All the others were still there, eyeing him with the same suspicion. Still hesitating, he made a few steps forward. When he saw they wouldn’t try to stop him, he walked more decidedly and went past them, only to be followed all the way inside.

In the entrance, Mira was waiting for him. She said nothing and continued her path, not toward the Great Hall, but she headed to the stairs. Gerold kept following her. He wasn’t sure where they were going, but he came to recognize the place. When she put her hand on the handle of a door and opened it, he knew that was the lord’s rooms. He had gone in this part of the castle the last time, although he never lived there. Mira was now the Lady of Ironrath. He shouldn’t be surprised that she settled there.

The door was left open. He thought it might be a sign that she was inviting him inside. Before he walked in, he looked behind. No one followed him. They were alone. He only thought it for a very short time. When he walked in, Mira was taking something in a cradle and settling it into her arms.

“Is that…?” He didn’t finish.

“That’s our son,” she answered. “I called him Rodrik, for my brother.”

He slowly approached and looked at him. His eyes were closed. Somehow, Gerold ended holding him in his arms. When his son opened his eyes, he met those of his wife. His son was calm. They just looked at each other. Nothing was said and the three of them just stayed there in silence.

Later, he walked with Mira in the grove behind the castle. The trees were devoid of leaves. When he arrived, the skies were covered but no snow was falling. Now small flakes whirled in the air. The state of the grove was much better than the forests around. The Whitehills left scars that would take many years to heal. He heard from Malcolm Branfield that his family had seeds to repopulate the forests with trees, but they wouldn’t be able to plant them before the snows were gone. He had grown used to winter, but he still had the impression Mira was more in her element than he was. He felt like a stranger.

“Malcolm told me to inform you that he will come to Ironrath soon. For now, he’s at the Wall, but as soon as they will be sure no White Walker is left he will come back,” he told her as they walked on the thin but hard layer of snow.

“I would like to see him again,” she said.

“You will. I promise.” Mira had already lost more than enough. He wouldn’t believe she could lose more.

“He sent a raven. He wrote you were injured at the Wall. How’s your leg?”

“It’s alright. Don’t worry about me.” He was still limping a little, but he didn’t need a stick anymore and would be completely healed by next week.

“I do. I was afraid you might die,” she added.

She stared straight ahead after she said that. He saw that she was sad. They stopped before a clearing.

“That’s where you played with your brothers and Talia?” he asked her.

“Yes. That tree.” She pointed it. “Elena Glenmore would always hide behind it, and Rodrik would always find her. She wanted to be found.”

“Did you have any news from her?” Elena Glenmore was the betrothed of Rodrik Forrester when he was still alive.

“Back home, in the Reach. I don’t think we will ever see her again.”

They remained silent. He dared to take her hand. She didn’t flinch away. “I’m sorry Mira. For Asher. For Ryon. For everything.” He tried to explain himself. “I… I was stupid. I should never have left you. I was… I was broken after the Battle of Highpoint. My mind wasn’t clear. I spent every moment since Moat Cailin cursing myself. I won’t leave you again… unless you want me to.”

It cost him to say it, but he had to. He had tried to force her to come with him when he left. He wasn’t going to do it again. That wasn’t what he wanted.

Without warning, she threw herself on him. He wrapped his arms around her, and he felt tears falling on his neck. She was crying, silently, without making any noise. He buried his face in her hair as she buried hers in his neck. He didn’t know for how long they remained there, just the two of them, in each other’s arms, but when they left the clearing, it was to both go back to Ironrath.

Gerold Hightower didn’t leave Ironrath that day, nor the day after. He only left after his sister-in-law, Talia Forrester, left for Deepwood Motte, and when he did it was with his wife, for a wedding.

This chapter closes the Forrester arc. It's not been the most interesting part of this fanfiction, but this way I bring the story of Telltale Game to an end, something that is more unlikely every day to happen for real.

Next chapter: Tyrion
Chapter Notes

In this chapter, we get some news about a character we haven't heard of for quite a while: Jaime.

TYRION XXXVIII

A cascade of red threads blocked his vision. His nose, buried in them, picked the familiar scent. Tyrion closed his eyes again and allowed to take comfort in them for a little while longer. The heat emanating from her body pressed against his was a welcomed warmth. The place where they were sleeping might not have been as cold as where they had been for the last year, but now that winter had settled even in the south, they needed all the warmth they could get everywhere they went.

Tyrion inhaled one last time the scent of his wife’s hair. He didn’t realize how much he missed it. Reluctantly, he pulled away, careful to not wake her up, and got out of bed. Dawn was coming. He dressed himself. Tyrion couldn’t be late for today. The stakes were too high.

He looked back to his wife. The events at the Crag were only a few days away. That was the day he made a decision that he hoped he would never regret. He and Sansa barely spoke that night. At one point, she asked him why. Why? She asked nothing more, and nothing else. The answer was quite simple.

“I’m not my father.”

Tyrion wasn’t sure which father he meant. He knew who his real father was, but whenever he thought of his father, it was the image of Tywin Lannister that came to his mind, not that of the Mad King. Tywin Lannister had left permanent marks on all the children he raised. Tyrion could still not reasonably think that he was not the son of Tywin Lannister. Whenever he thought that, it felt awkward, unnatural. The man had never been kind to him, barely acknowledged him as a son, and only did so when it was required or when he could get some advantage out of it, but the Old Lion shaped the halfman he became. A good man does everything in his power to better his family’s position regardless of his own selfish desires.

To always serve the interests of House Lannister. That was what Tyrion had been taught to do. Was he serving the interests of House Lannister when he burned down Castamere a second time? And when he wanted to slaughter the whole House Westerling? Would the Fires of Castamere, the new song that was sung while he rained fire on Rolph Spicer, become the new weapon bards would sing to dissuade any rebellion? Or was it simply by pure will of revenge that he wanted to kill every living Spicer and Westerling? Not only for Joanna and Sansa, but also for Podrick and for Bronn. Tyrion lost the boy who had always been loyal to him, and Daisy lost her husband and the father of her child.

They had killed his only daughter, and it had destroyed Sansa. The loss of her child had been harder on her than it had been on him. Tyrion just wanted to burn everyone related to the kidnapping and the death of Joanna when Serion Lannister told them. Was he really like his father? Would his father have acted out of anger like this, or would he just have done what he thought was best for House
Lannister, like when he invaded the Riverlands? Did he behave like the son of Tywin Lannister?

You’re not your father.

How was he different from his father? How was he supposed to be different? Sansa was there, sleeping, seemingly enjoying some peaceful time. She ran away from him that night at the Crag. How are you different from your father then? He didn’t know. It was easy to differentiate yourself from the Mad King but doing the same with Tywin Lannister was another game.

Tywin Lannister wouldn’t have spared Sybell Spicer. He would never have let someone who contributed to the death of a Lannister get away with this. He would have made an example with her. Would he have spared her family? Tyrion didn’t think so. Sybell’s family would never forget or forgive. No one would resent Tyrion for killing them. The Westerlings were poor, without influence or relations. By killing them, the Lord of Casterly Rock ensured he got rid of a potential enemy, while gaining or reinforcing an ally by bestowing the Crag to someone. By sparing them, he didn’t dissuade future traitors and allowed a very likely foe to live, with his lands and castle still intact.

No, that wasn’t what Tywin Lannister would have done. Tyrion didn’t do what his father would have done, and that was because of Sansa.

His wife moved and stirred at this moment. From sleeping on her belly, she ended on her back and opened her eyes. Tyrion thought not for the first time, and certainly not the last, how beautiful she was. The child of fourteen that Tywin Lannister forced him to wed was gone, Sansa was now eighteen. By all standards, she was a grown woman, the most beautiful lady of the Seven Kingdoms in Tyrion’s eyes, one of the most beautiful in everyone else’s view, a wife, and a mother. A mother whose child was taken away from her, all that because the child was from Tyrion.

“It’s already time?” she asked.

“Yes,” he replied. The night was short. It would have been longer had Tyrion not slept with Sansa. She dropped her eyes to the sheets still covering her body. She wore a nightdress below, something that wasn’t too much with this weather. Tyrion joined her back in the bed, though he only sat in it, and took her hand in his own. She looked up to him in his eyes. She wasn’t afraid like she was that night. She gripped his hand harder than he gripped hers.

“I’m sorry, Tyrion,” she said.

“What do you think will happen to him?”

“Well, since I brought the Vale to our queen, she might relent from death and instead send him to the Wall. I could ask this as a favor.”

“I hope she will accept.”

A muffled laugh escaped his mouth. Sansa had always been good at courtesies. She wasn’t hiding behind them any longer when they were together, but she was careful about how she said things. She wouldn’t say she knew or thought that Daenerys would send Jaime to the Wall.

“Yes, hope, we can hope,” he mocked.

She didn’t remove her hand. “I’ll be there for you.”

“If you don’t want to see my brother, you don’t have to.”
“It’s not for him that I will be there. It’s for you.”

“Thanks.” She didn’t know how much it meant for him. “I have to see the queen.” And someone else.

She nodded. “Then go,” she whispered.

Before he walked out of the room, he leaned and gave a long kiss to his wife. She accepted it and never pushed back. Tyrion didn’t want that kiss to end. She was so sweet, so good, and he wanted her to know that he loved her, and that he would always love her, no matter what would happen. He couldn’t lose her, not again.

Tyrion entered the small council chamber some time later. He and Sansa were settled into the Hand’s apartments, but the way to the room where the small council gathered was longer than it used to be under his father. Daenerys Targaryen decided to bring back the small council to his ancient room. The queen wasn’t about to let the Hand claim that he ruled the Seven Kingdoms. Daenerys Targaryen was there to rule Westeros, not only to be its queen.

Varys was already there when he came in.

“Oh, my good friend. I hope your journey was uneventful.”

“It depends which journey you’re talking about. The one from the Eyrie to here, or the one from the Crag?”

“Is your lady wife feeling well?”

“As good as she can be, considering the circumstances.”

“I was very sorry to hear about your daughter.”

“Were you?” Tyrion asked.

Varys had been an ally in King’s Landing, and a friend, as much as he could be, but Tyrion wasn’t about to trust him into all matters. His disappearance following Kevan’s death was also suspicious. Had Varys something to do with his uncle’s death, or did he just vanish when he realized Cersei would seize power? He had a discussion with the eunuch yesterday after he arrived, and Varys told him he had been working for a Targaryen restoration for a very long time, ever since Robert Baratheon took the crown. Varys claimed he never wanted Kevan to die, for he was a far better ruler than Cersei, but once he was dead Varys thought he would be more useful to Daenerys Targaryen in Meereen than here. Overall, Varys never confessed or denied any involvement in Kevan’s death.

“Of course, I was, my friend. It hurt me every time you are injured, and I can’t imagine a greater pain than the loss of a child.”

“How can you know? Did you ever have children?”

“No, my friend, but the children are the people we fight for, so they may know a better world than the one we knew.”

“Well, my daughter will never know this world, no matter how better or worse he is,” Tyrion replied bitterly.

“You have all my condolences.”
“Did you know it was Littlefinger?”

“Who kidnapped your wife and your daughter? I’m afraid I only knew too late. I had been away from Westeros for a very long time and my network of spies and informants will need some time to recover.”

Tyrion nodded.

“You do not trust me, don’t you?” Varys asked.

“I’ve never known if I could trust you.”

“And you were right to be suspicious. I contributed to the downfall of the Lannister and Baratheon dynasty. However, I would never have been the cause of your downfall, my friend.”

“Why not? I’m a Lannister, have you forgotten?”

“No, I never forget anything, not even rumors. And I could hardly ignore that you now have a dragon. It is also difficult for me to forget there once were rumors concerning the Mad King and the ladies in waiting of Queen Rhaella.”

For a long moment, Varys innocently looked at him in a way that was not so much innocent. Tyrion said nothing, and it was finally Varys who spoke, and he didn’t ask a question. “So you know. I’m not sure if this is for the better.”

“Why would the fact that I know anything that you believe I know be for the better or not?” Tyrion asked him.

“A wise man once said information is power.” And power is a trick, a shadow on the wall. “But do you know how we get power from information?”

“I’m sure you already have an answer.”

“From the way we use that information, or the way we do not use it. How do you plan to use it or to not use it?”

“How would you suggest I use it or not?”

“Answering a question with another question. How clever,” Varys said while smiling.

“Will you answer with another question as well?”

“Oh no, though my answer might call for a question. I would only say that I would never suggest anything that might involve another war, not now that we finally have a queen who cares about the people, despite all her flaws.”

Tyrion walked past Varys, took the decanter on the table and poured himself a generous glass of wine. After one great sip that made him fell better, he looked straight into Varys’s eyes, with no intention of playing games this time.

“I just lost my daughter in this war, and too many people have died. I don’t have any intention of getting into another war if I can avoid it. And for the record, I’m not interested in the Iron Throne. I never was. I’m not my father.”

Varys looked skeptical for a very short moment, then bowed and smiled. “You can’t imagine my relief, hearing those words, my lord. I was fearing the worst after the reports I received from "Castamere."

"Well, you have nothing to fear from me, as long as I have nothing to fear from you."

"Oh, don’t worry about it. The only reason you could worry about me is if you turn like your father, and I don’t think you will. I hope you will not."

The door opened, and Daenerys Targaryen walked in. Tyrion wondered if Varys had planned all this and the queen heard everything they said. Did he tell her the truth? Tyrion should have known Varys would know something, or at least suspect something. The Master of Whisperers was supposed to know everything, and Varys excelled in that domain.

"I didn’t expect you to be here, Lord Varys," she said. The queen looked intently at him.

"Forgive me, your Grace, but when I heard that Lord Tyrion had an appointment with you so early in the morning, I thought it would be a good opportunity to speak to you about certain developments."

So Varys wasn’t supposed to be here. If it was a setup, Daenerys Targaryen wasn’t aware of the plan, or she feinted to ignore it, but somehow Tyrion doubted it was the latter.

"What developments?"

"About what you asked me to find concerning your nephew. I have new information." The queen looked to Tyrion, then back to Varys. He opened the hands. "I thought the Hand of the Queen might help the queen to take a decision."

She looked at Tyrion for a moment, as if trying to decide something. "Very well. What did you find?" she asked, looking again at her Master of Whisperers.

"Please, wait."

While Varys walked to a sidestep door, the queen addressed Tyrion. "Unless I tell you otherwise later, everything you will hear onwards will remain in this room."

"You have my word."

She was serious, and there was no reason to not do as she told. Varys came back with a woman between two ages. She had a tanned skin and black hair with strays of grey. Some wrinkles were beginning to appear on her face, but by all account she was still a beautiful woman by many standards. Tyrion guessed immediately she was from Dorne. Some of her physical characteristics were specific to some population of this desertic land. The way she looked on the floor proved she wasn’t noble, and Varys confirmed it.

"Your Grace, my lord, this is Wylla. She’s been a servant of House Dayne of Starfall since her birth, and so were her parents and her grandparents before them." The woman bowed while saying Your Grace. "Wylla has some information concerning the matter you’re interested in, your Grace."

Wylla was keeping her hands crossed and still looking on the floor, her hair falling on both sides on her oval face.

"You may speak, Wylla," Daenerys said, her voice encouraging and soft. Tyrion noticed it when she spoke with the common folk. She always had a behaviour telling them that they had nothing to fear. The opposite was true for noble people.
The servant looked up. She wasn’t afraid. “Your Grace, I have served House Dayne since my birth, as Lord Varys just told you. Lady Ashara and Ser Arthur always spoke fondly of Prince Rhaegar.”

Daenerys nodded. “I know my brother and Ser Arthur Dayne were very good friends. Ser Barristan Selmy used to tell me he doubted Rhaegar would have died on the Trident had Ser Arthur been there.”

“It is not for lack of want, your Grace. I can tell you, for I was there when it happened, that Ser Arthur almost begged Prince Rhaegar to let him follow him to battle.”

“But my brother refused?”

“Yes, your Grace. He had another mission for Ser Arthur.”

“Guarding the Tower of Joy.”

It wasn’t a question, and Wylla didn’t confirm nor deny it. She looked to Tyrion, then to Varys, and back to the queen. “I can tell you what I know, your Grace, but I wish I could tell it to you and only to you.”

“Why? So you could tell our queen that you are the mother of Jon Snow?” Tyrion asked out of nowhere.

Wylla was surprised, and so was the queen. Varys wasn’t as much surprised, but an amused expression went through his eyes.

“A certain girl of the name of Arya Stark met a certain Edric Dayne some time ago, and he told her that you were the mother of Jon Snow, and also that you nursed them both, Edric Dayne and Jon Snow. At least, that’s what Lady Arya claimed that he claimed he heard at Starfall.”

Daenerys Targaryen looked to Tyrion, then to the servant. The latter recovered. It was obvious she was not intimidated before highborn people. She was merely respectful of them, but she could stand before them without any problem. “Your Grace, this is not what you believe.”

“Are you the mother of Jon Snow?” the queen asked.

She looked to Varys and Tyrion again, then sighed. “Officially, yes. At Starfall, I am known as the mother of Jon Snow, the bastard son of Lord Eddard Stark. And this is what he told Robert Baratheon and many other lords, at least in the south.”

“And unofficially?” Tyrion asked.

“I was there when Jon Snow was born. I was at the Tower of Joy.”

Wylla explained to them everything. Not long before Robert’s Rebellion began, Lady Ashara Dayne received a raven from her brother, Ser Arthur Dayne. They needed a maid somewhere in the Red Mountains of Dorne. Wyla had been chosen personally by Lady Ashara. She was instructed to tell no one about this, not even the Lord of Starfall, Lady Ashara’s elder brother. Wylla left discreetly and arrived to a place called the Tower of Joy. There she discovered Rhaegar Targaryen and Lyanna Stark, for who she worked for weeks. Through the conversations she heard, she learned that Prince Rhaegar had annulled his marriage to Elia Martell and wed Lady Lyanna in a secret ceremony in Dorne. They lived together for some time, then Rhaegar Targaryen left for the war. Lady Lyanna, now pregnant, was left in the care of Wylla and a midwife.

Varys interrupted Wylla’s tale to say he searched for this midwife and discovered she died of an illness ten years ago. Wylla resumed to explain that she, Ser Arthur Dayne, Ser Gerold Hightower and the midwife were ordered by Prince Rhaegar to bring Lady Lyanna and her child to safety if anything was to happen to him. When they received news of the Battle of the Trident, however, the pregnancy was already too advanced and Lady Lyanna couldn’t travel. They remained at the Tower, hoping against all odds that the Targaryen army might prevail and that the war would be won. Dorne was still loyal to the king and the fight was still far away. News of the Battle of the Bells arrived, then of the Sack of King’s Landing. Lady Lyanna’s pregnancy stretched and her state got worse, so running away was out of the question. They finally heard of the submission of House Tyrell, and the day after Lyanna Stark went into labour.

Her labour lasted for what seemed like days, and she lost a lot of blood. She and the midwife did their best, and just when Lady Lyanna was giving birth, her brother arrived with five other men. Wylla didn’t see the duel, but Ser Gerold and Ser Arthur both died. When Lord Stark ran into the room, his sister was already dying. He promised her before she left this world that he would protect the baby.

Wylla had told Eddard Stark everything on that day. He had accepted to escort her back to Starfall, where he had to bring back Ser Arthur’s sword anyway. The initial plan was for the baby, who was named Aegon Targaryen by his mother, to be raised at Starfall by Lady Ashara. However, the day after they arrived at Starfall, Ashara Dayne jumped from a cliff. Eddard Stark decided to bring the baby with him to Winterfell. Wylla accepted to make everyone believe the baby was hers and that he was the bastard son of Ned Stark. In Starfall, everyone believed it, for Wylla was absent for a long time and Ned Stark claimed the baby as his before the Lord of Starfall. Wylla was allowed to follow him to Winterfell where she nursed him, then came back to Starfall where she maintained the lie.

“I swore to never talk about this, but the prince was your brother and I think you deserve the truth.”

Daenerys had listened to the tale from the beginning to the end. Her expression remained even through it. When she spoke, her voice was measured. “I would like you to not talk about this, and to keep the oath you made a long time ago.”

“Yes, your Grace.”

“You may leave.”

When Wylla left, Tyrion was first to speak. “That confirms what Howland Reed already told us.”

“Is that all you found?” the queen asked Varys.

“No.” Tyrion’s friend showed a piece of parchment. “From the Citadel. My little birds there got their hands on an excerpt of High Septon Maynard’s records, and more specifically the passage where he speaks of the wedding between Prince Rhaegar and Lady Lyanna.”

The queen read it, then gave it to Tyrion. When Tyrion was done reading, there was only one thing he could say. “Anyone has doubts now?”

“It seems… that Jon Snow is the lawful heir to the Iron Throne,” Varys said carefully. The queen nodded. She was looking away from them.

“I don’t think it matters much,” Tyrion said very quickly. “Jon Snow doesn’t want to be king, and he said he was planning to join the Night’s Watch again…”

“I know. He sent a raven not long ago. He said his vows again,” she replied.

“So, that means the only other Targaryen in this world, to our knowledge, gave up any claim he might have on the Seven Kingdoms,” Varys said as he looked to Tyrion while he said that. Daenerys was still looking away, which was a good thing for she didn’t see the exchange of looks between the eunuch and the dwarf.

“It seems so.”

“Perhaps it would be better to destroy that document.” Varys was talking about the page of Maynard’s records that Daenerys still held in his hand. “Although Jon Snow is a member of the Night’s Watch, some people might eventually use it to rebel against you.”

Daenerys stared at Varys, then at Tyrion. He made a movement of head that meant that it was possible. She looked at the page, and finally gave it back to Varys. “Send it back to the Citadel. One day, the truth might come out.”

Varys bowed and left. Tyrion was now alone with Daenerys.

“Do you think I made the right choice?” she asked him.

“Well, Varys isn’t wrong, Jon Snow’s claim could indeed be used against you.”

“You think he could challenge me if he learned the truth about the marriage of Rhaegar and Lyanna?”

“I doubt it. Unless you turn like your father.”

“I don’t intend that to happen,” she said firmly.

“Then you have nothing to fear from Jon Snow. Other people could contest your claim by using this, but the mere fact Jon Snow is again a member of the Night’s Watch will limit the impact these records could have if they tried to start a rebellion. Furthermore, they will be hidden somewhere in the Citadel, and there aren’t a lot of people like Jon Arryn and Ned Stark who are ready to go through an entire book to find clues about the legitimacy or illegitimacy of kings. I’d say you’re quite safe.”

“Nothing leaves this room,” she reminded him.

“Yes, I understand.”

“You know why I asked you to come.”

“I suppose this has something to do with the trial of Jaime this afternoon.”

She nodded and indicated a chair where he sat. She took place not far from him. They were more similar in height like this. He thought that a long time ago, he had been sitting there with another sister, when he was just named Hand of the King. The resemblance stopped there.

“I want you to know that Jaime Lannister’s trial is not related in any way to you. You have nothing to blame you for, and nothing to fear where you and the rest of your family are concerned.”

“Well, how comforting it is.”

“I will sit as judge at the trial, with Mace Tyrell and you.”

He frowned at this. “You’re asking me to judge my brother?”

“I’m allowing you to take part to the process that will determine if he is guilty or not guilty, and the sentence he will face if he is found guilty. Consider it some way to show that I trust you, and to show you gratitude for your services these last months, in the North and the Vale.”

“Well, thank you.” Maybe Jaime had a chance if he had a say in his sentence.

“However, I want to be clear. I will not tolerate that you declare your brother not guilty if it is obvious that he is.”

“So, you’re forcing me to declare my brother guilty?” he asked, making sure he looked hostile this time, which he was.

“I’m forcing you to be an impartial judge.”

“Just like you?”

She obviously didn’t appreciate the rebuke, but she found a way to look sincere once again. Strangely, Tyrion thought she was genuine. It wasn’t Cersei who sat next to him. “Jaime Lannister will have a fair trial. I promise. Although I think it very unlikely, I will clear him if he is not guilty. If he is guilty, you will have a say in the sentence. I will consider your opinion, and everything your brother will say.”

“Can I ask for a favor?” Tyrion asked after a moment.

“Go on.”

“Can I see him?”

His sister took her time to answer. Finally, she nodded. “I will go to see the Lady Sansa while you visit him.”

“Thank you.”

He didn’t see any objection to Daenerys visiting Sansa. His wife didn’t seem to dislike her half-sister-in-law, and Daenerys really seemed to sympathize with Sansa’s situation of losing a child.

“Do you love your brother?” she asked him as they left.

“Yes, I do. He’s probably the only one in my family who ever truly loved me, and who was ever close to me.”

“I understand.”

She walked away in the direction of the Tower of the Hand, while Tyrion headed for the dungeons.

Chapter End Notes

I have great news for you. This week, I finished to write the final chapters of "A Shadow and a Wolf". There are eight chapters left after this one. Since everything is ready, I will go back to a cadency you haven’t seen for quite a while : two chapters per week. I hope you will enjoy the final chapters of ASAAW.

Next chapter: Jaime
Jaime IX

Chapter Notes

For the first time in forever, we get to see things from Jaime's perspective. Remember he's been in a cell for... about 50 chapters.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

JAIME IX

He had been in this cell for too long. He didn’t think he would be able to walk if he tried. He didn’t think he would see if he tried, not in the light of the day. He was back in his cage in Robb Stark’s army, but worse since he couldn’t be exposed to the elements of nature. Rain could wash him a little, and the sun could warm his face even if it could also burn it. Here, there was nothing, not even something to spend time like looking at the nature or the men marching to war, not even the hope to escape.

Was Brienne still out there? How long since he abandoned her. Jaime had lost count of the days he spent in this cell. Anyway, without the light of day, how to estimate the time he spent there? However, as time went on, Jaime found out he thought less of Cersei and more of Brienne, until his twin sister was nothing but a fog of unreal memories, some involving sex and others daggers and blood. How could he remember sleeping with a woman, then killing her? It made no sense. His life made no sense as he looked at it. Who was he? Who had he tried to be?

You are nothing, Jaime Lannister.

Kingslayer, oathbreaker, man without honor, ser. All these names and titles didn’t ring well to his ears. He couldn’t define who he was, who he had been. People would think that after so much time to reflect on everything, alone in his cell, he would have come to some sort of conclusion, would have understood what kind of life he led, but he didn’t. A man had come to tell him his trial would be tomorrow, but he couldn’t make out what tomorrow was, not when left alone into darkness.

He heard footsteps. His hearing had increased considerably since he came here. The most simple and imperceptible noise was caught by his ears. A small panel prevented him from seeing through the window in the door. Someone opened it. Jaime was blinded immediately by what small light came from there. It had to be time for a meal, whichever it was.

A key turning into a lock was heard and hinges creaked as the door was opened. The first look Jaime had on the corridor leading to his cell was a show of torches that completely blinded him. He raised his arms to protect his eyes from the sudden light. Before he could do anything, had he intended to do anything, two men caught him by the arms and carried him out. Jaime let those men drag him. His legs could barely move after all this time sitting in the cell. He hadn’t been bound by chains, but saw no use to walk, so he had spent most of his time sitting on the soiled floor. His arms were in a better state, for he had used them to eat, while he crawled with his legs to get to the food.

They brought him higher and higher, judging from the increasing light, the many windows they crossed on their path, and the stairs they climbed. They arrived in a room where maids got him rid of his rags, bathed him and dressed him. Jaime complied with everything they asked, but never spoke a word. By the end, when they showed him into a mirror, he was presentable again. They even cut his hair, making them as short as they used to be before he was imprisoned.

The man who looked at him in the mirror was like the same old Jaime Lannister, physically speaking that is. The resemblance stopped there. Jaime couldn’t recognize himself. He didn’t know who was looking back to him in the glass. Which Jaime Lannister was it? The one who killed his king? The one who saved Brienne? The one who murdered his sister? The one who abandoned Brienne? The one who served the Mad Queen or the Mad King?

“Glad to see you back, big brother.”

The voice caught him by surprise. It had been an eternity since he heard it. When was the last time they spoke? Probably before he left for Casterly Rock, to live with his wife. Jaime slowly turned his head to meet the eyes of his little brother.

“Tyrion?” Was that really him? He thought he would never see him again.

“Glad to see you, Jaime.”

“I… I thought you might be…”

“Dead?” his brother completed.

“I… They never told me anything,” Jaime said emptily.

Tyrion frowned. “You don’t know what happened?”

“Not since…” Not since he killed Cersei, he was going to say, but he said something else. “Not since Daenerys Targaryen took King’s Landing. Where is Brienne?”

“Brienne of Tarth?”

“Yes. Where is she?”

“Jaime, she died.”

He felt all blood being drained from his face. “How? When?”

“A long time ago. She died during the Battle of King’s Landing.”

Should Jaime have cried? He didn’t think he did, but he felt much worse than crying. He almost felt nothing. Brienne was gone too. She truly sacrificed herself so he could do what she came to do in the capital. He suspected she didn’t have much chance to survive the battle, he prepared himself for the news of her death, but there had been a small part of him, a very small part, that hoped against all odds that the Maid of Tarth would escape all this alive. Now he knew she was gone, and he felt nothing.

“I should have known they told you nothing of what happened. Let me fill the blanks for you.”

Tyrion quickly told him what happened during the months Jaime spent in his cell, cut from the rest of the world. Jaime noticed during the conversation that Tyrion had the Hand’s badge on him. Jaime had a very hard time believing that Daenerys Targaryen chose Tyrion to be her Hand. This surprised him more than the fact his brother could ride one of her dragons. The hardest part for both brothers to hear was the fate of Jaime’s niece, Joanna Lannister. When Tyrion was done relating everything, the two brothers sat in silence. Jaime managed to break it.

“How is your wife?”
“It’s very hard for her. I… I almost lost her too.”

Jaime could see all the suffering Tyrion had been through, and he also saw this wasn’t over. He recalled, not for the first time, how Tyrion was devastated by the loss of his first wife. He started to drink and whore after this event, after their lord father had the poor girl raped by his men and then forced Tyrion to rape her.

“Things are a little better now. We’re beginning to accept that she’s gone, but I don’t believe Sansa will ever be able to forget what happened.”

No, of course, she wouldn’t. Even Cersei could never forget her children. Jaime knew his sister enough, even if he didn’t know her as much as he thought. Cersei had tried to forget her children after they were all gone but Jaime knew she failed. If Cersei failed, how could Sansa Stark ever forget how her only child, a baby, was killed in the most barbaric way? Tyrion might try to sound convincing when he said things would get better, Jaime knew this was far from over for his little brother.

“Do you have anything to fear from Daenerys Targaryen?” Jaime asked him.

“No, I don’t think so. She trusts me after the wars in the North and the Vale. She even allowed me to be one of the three judges at your trial.”

“Really?” Jaime was skeptical, but one look to his brother revealed this was very true. Maybe there was hope after all.

“The queen and Mace Tyrell will be the other judges. The trial begins in three hours.”

“Well, that leaves a lot of time to prepare myself.”

“I know. I’m sorry about that, but I couldn’t have the queen delay your trial. Apparently, she already led an important inquiry. But you’ll get a fair trial.”

“Like the one Cersei was planning for you after Father’s death?”

“No. You will be able to call your own witnesses, and to question all the people who will be called to testify against you. You will have complete freedom to speak and to explain yourself.” Jaime wasn’t convinced, and Tyrion must have seen it. “I know this is hard to believe, Jaime, but Daenerys really wants to know the truth.”

“Really?”

“She knows her father was a monster, and she doesn’t want to be like him. You have to tell her. You have to tell her everything.”

“So I’m accused of her father’s murder, and all I have to do is to tell her how the Mad King wanted to destroy the city so I will be forgiven?”

Jaime didn’t believe he would get out of this so easily, and Tyrion confirmed it, a regretful expression on his face. “You still killed her father. I doubt she will declare you not guilty, even with the circumstances in which you killed him. But I think she could send you to the Wall or exile you in the east.”

“What a relief,” Jaime exclaimed with sarcasm.

“You must know that you are not only accused of regicide.”
“Oh. What other crimes did I commit?”

“Kinslaying, for the murder of our cousin Alton, and attempt of murder on Brandon Stark. She wanted to accuse you of Cersei’s murder too, but she dropped the charges.”

“Well, at least I will be declared kinslayer, but not for killing a twin sister. I guess it’s not as bad for a cousin.”

There were many things Jaime regretted in his life. Alton’s murder wasn’t at the top of the list, but he regretted it all the same. He no longer thought of killing Cersei as a crime, for he had done what was right to do. He stopped another catastrophe. Then why did Cersei’s death affected him more than Alton’s, if the first was justified and the second a crime by all accounts? Shouldn’t it be the opposite? Did anything make sense in this life?

Tyrion went about a long ranting about how they could explain each accusation was true but done in particular circumstances. There was no witness to the murder of Alton. Jaime was the only one who knew what truly happened in this cage. He could plead that the death occurred during a fight between them and was an accident, that he didn’t have clear ideas back then after many months spent chained into a cage. As for Brandon Stark, he could put the emphasis on the fact the boy didn’t die and put forward reasons like the protection of his three children, who would have died had Bran told anyone what he saw on that day. They could also clear him of suspicion concerning any involvement with the footpad by proving that it was Joffrey who hired this man.

Jaime barely listened to what Tyrion was saying. His brother might say that he would convince the queen to not execute him, Jaime didn’t feel like he wanted to not be executed. He didn’t think he wanted to die, but he didn’t think he wanted to fight to live either. What would he do if he was exiled in Essos? Where would he go from there? What would he do at the Wall, now that both wildlings and dead men were gone? Jaime had fought for Cersei when the true fight was in the North, when he should have been there to help Tyrion and the others fight the dead. His knighthood was a complete failure from the beginning to the end.

“I will probably have to declare you guilty, Jaime, at least on the murder of the Mad King, but this way I will be able to negotiate your sentence with the queen. I’m not going to let you walk to the execution block.”

“Is that the tower cell?” Jaime asked out of nowhere.

“Yes, it is. I had you moved here before the trial. The trial is open to everyone. The queen’s men couldn’t deny you a bath before you were to be seen by everyone.”

Of course, Jaime had to be presentable for the moment of his death. “Is that the same where you were?” He was talking about the time when Tyrion was accused of their father’s murder, a stupid accusation Cersei made up. Jaime’s accusations made more sense, and they were true.

Tyrion seemed unsure. “I don’t know. Maybe.”

“You once said in that cell that you were done with House Lannister, that your loyalty was now to your wife.”

“Yes, I recall. I also said my loyalty was to you.”

“Yes.” Jaime remembered. It was a loyalty he didn’t deserve.

“I’m not going to let you down, big brother. I’ll get you out of here,” Tyrion assured him. “Just… tell the truth. I think it’s the best thing to do now. It’s time that everyone knows the truth. The whole truth.”

The whole truth. Tell him, or I will. The voice rang like a bell through his mind. It had been so long since the words were said to him, but he heard them again and again ever since. Tell him, or I will.

“Tyrion… are you safe?”

“Safe?”

“With the new queen, I mean. She could sentence you to die, or revoke your titles, anything, if she thinks you are not loyal to her.”

“I’m not at risk, Jaime.”

“If protecting me puts you or Sansa in danger…”

“It doesn’t.” Tyrion cut him short before Jaime could finish his thought.

“Don’t put yourself in danger for me!” It was supposed to be a yell, but it came out so hoarse that Jaime doubted they could hear it outside the cell.

“I will not give up on you, Jaime.”

“Look at me. Look at me, Tyrion. There’s nothing left of me. I killed my sister, our sister. I’m a dead man. Even if by some miracle I’m spared, what will I do in the east or at the Wall? There’s nothing left for me in this world. Don’t trouble yourself with me, little brother. I’ll tell the truth at the trial and face whatever judgment I receive. I have nothing left to lose.”

Almost nothing. There was still one thing Jaime had to lose, something that was even more precious than Cersei or Brienne, or anything else he ever had in his life, and he didn’t want to lose it. Tell him, or I will.

Tyrion’s face was shut. “You’re not dying, Jaime. I’m getting you out of this.”

For a moment, Jaime saw a shadow of his father, when he decided something and wouldn’t hear anything about it, with the exception that Tyrion’s eyes, instead of saying he had no say in this, immediately shifted to another language, stating he would never abandon his family, and that Jaime could rely on him. Jaime would have preferred if Tyrion had behaved like Lord Tywin, only saving him by duty, and not out of love.

“The trial starts soon.” Tyrion stood up. “Everything is going to be fine.”

He walked back to the door cell, but right when he was about to hit the wood to call the guard to open, Jaime spoke up.

“I lied to you.” He had to tell him. Tell him, or I will. He couldn’t have Tyrion hear it by anyone else. It had to be from him.

His little brother turned back to look at him. “What do you mean? Lie to me about what?”

Tyrion was clueless. Of course, he was. He never doubted Jaime’s word.

“I lied to you about your wife.” Confusion increased in Tyrion. “Not Sansa. Tysha.”

Tyrion’s traits changed. His lips were quivering, and he got pale. “What of her? She was a whore.”
Jaime could tell from the way he said it that Tyrion didn’t believe it, or at least he didn’t entirely believe it. His little brother had always been the clever one in the family. Jaime should have known Tyrion would have doubts, suspect something. He was surprised in fact that Tyrion never figured out the truth before, and never asked any question about the girl. But then, when it came to women, Lannisters didn’t seem very rational. Jaime had thought for years he knew Cersei, only to discover this woman was everything but what he believed she was.

“She was no whore.” The pot of wildfire was thrown. He did it. Tell him, or I will. Well, he told him. But he didn’t stop there. Words spit from his mouth. “I never bought her for you. That was a lie Father commanded me to tell. Tysha was… she was what she seemed to be. A wheelwright’s daughter, chance met on the road.”

Tyrion remained speechless for a very long time, just staring at him. Jaime looked away. He was unable to look into his brother’s eyes. “Tysha. She wed me,” Tyrion croaked.

“For your gold, Father said. She was lowborn, you were a Lannister of Casterly Rock. All she wanted was the gold, which made her no different from a whore, so…” Jaime knew it wasn’t true. He knew the truth now, but back then he couldn’t be sure, and he had taken Father’s word for granted. “So it would not be a lie, not truly, and… he said that you required a sharp lesson. That you would learn from it, and thank me later…”

“Thank you?” Tyrion’s voice was broken, but Jaime refused to look at him. He couldn’t. “He gave her to his guards. A barracks full of guards. He made me… watch. And…”

“I never knew he would do that. You must believe me.”

“Oh, must I?” Now Tyrion was furious. Jaime would be in his place. “Why should I believe you about anything, ever? She was my wife!”

“Tyrion…”

Before Jaime could say anything, he received a powerful slap from the back of Tyrion’s hand. His brother had approached him while they spoke. The slap stung. Jaime had forgotten what physical pain was. He was used to receive blows, but it had been an eternity since he received one, after he was thrown into a cell.

“I… I suppose I earned that,” he managed to say.

“Oh, you deserve more than that, Jaime. If Father was still alive, you cannot imagine what I would do to him.”

“Did you kill him?” Jaime didn’t know where the question came from, but it came out. Tyrion laughed, not of his usual laugh to make fun of something, but an evil laugh.

“No, of course not, but I wish that I had. I wish that I had killed Joffrey myself too, and that I had killed Cersei as well in your stead. You all deserve to go to hell!”

“Probably,” Jaime conceded in a low voice. Tyrion stood in front of him for a long time. Jaime expected anything. Perhaps he would use the small dagger at his belt to slit his throat. Maybe it would be better that way. Jaime probably deserved more to die for the lie than for killing a mad king.

Tyrion didn’t bring his hand to the knife. Instead, he just walked away furiously and pounded on the door.

“I always loved you more than Cersei,” Jaime said in a last attempt.
“My sister is waiting for me.” He was finishing saying these words Jaime didn’t understand when the heavy door opened with an Unsullied guard on the other side. “By the way, Jaime, did you know your father allowed someone to rape his wife because he thought it would allow his grandchildren to sit on the Iron Throne? My wife is not the only one who he had raped by other people.”

With that, Tyrion walked out, and the door closed on their brotherly relationship. Jaime Lannister had lost the last thing he had to lose.

You are nothing, Jaime Lannister.

Chapter End Notes

With this chapter ends Jaime's role in this story. We shall never see his like again... as a POV.

I'm kidding. Next chapter is the trial, so we'll see Jaime there. Only it was the last time he was there to show us events from his perspective.

I planned very early for the truth about Tysha to come out at the end of the story. Tyrion's exit, "My sister is waiting for me", is in some way Tyrion's denial of his Lannister origins, although Jaime might not understand it, and the end of his attachment to the idea of Tywin Lannister being his father in any positive sense of the term.

Next chapter: Daenerys
The melted swords were sharp. She would need time to get used to this throne. She missed the ebony bench of Meereen. It might not have been the most comfortable seat for a queen, but the Iron Throne was way worse. She had to be careful to not cut herself and to move as little as she could, while maintaining a dignified position.

People poured inside the Throne Room. Rows of seats were placed on both sides of a corridor going from the large doors to the dais where Daenerys was sitting. Noble born people were taking place in the seats, while the lowborn packed on the sides and the far end of the hall. Everyone wanted to witness the fate of Jaime Lannister. The guards had allowed an access to the Red Keep to the common people, but too many came and they were forced to force many out of the castle. They would know of the knight’s fate when the heralds would announce it all over the city, once the trial was over.

On the dais, two chairs were positioned near Daenerys, one on her left and the other on her right, just one step below her. Mace Tyrell was supposed to occupy the seat on her left. He was right now engaged in a discussion with his daughter, Lady Margaery. She and other people, such as Lord Varys, the Grand Maester Marcon, the Red Priestess Yennefer, and Lord Anders Yronwood were provided seats on the inferior steps of the dais as well. There were also a few guards at the dais’ feet, and more all over the room, mostly men from the Reach.

Tyrion Lannister wasn’t there yet, nor was his wife, the Lady Sansa. Daenerys had gone to see her before the trial. She seemed in a better state than when Daenerys met her in the Vale, but the death of her daughter still affected her deeply. Her sister, the Lady Arya, who was probably the less lady woman Daenerys had ever met, was present. Sansa had talked about her little girl to Daenerys. In fact, it was Daenerys who pushed Sansa to talk about her, to tell her everything about her daughter. As a result, despite initial reluctance, Sansa Lannister managed to tell her every detail about her daughter, from the color of her eyes to her sleeping habits. She seemed better at the end of their conversation.

She used the opportunity to raise the matter of Winterfell with her. Sansa wasn’t enthusiastic at all to inherit her family’s home, but she was ready to be Lady of Winterfell since her brother Brandon was unwilling. One way or the other, since her brother couldn’t have children, her own children would rule the North one day.

Lord Tyrion was still to be seen. Mace Tyrell now sat in his chair, but Daenerys’ right remained empty. She wondered if the small man would finally refuse to stand as judge for his brother’s trial. If that was the case, Daenerys wished he told her about it before the trial was about to begin. She had come to trust Tyrion after all this time, even going as far as to name him her Hand after the Battle of Winterfell, but she wouldn’t tolerate that he undermined her authority.
Finally, he came. The Lady Sansa was with him, along with Arya. The desire Daenerys felt to berate him for being late was replaced by uncertainty when she saw the way he carried himself and his expression. He walked with his wife and his sister-in-law until they were at the dais. There, they went separate ways. Sansa Stark headed for her own chair lower, and her sister stood next to her, looking more like a soldier than a lady of the court, while the Hand took his place next to the queen. Tyrion Lannister no longer seemed to be grieving like this morning, but angry. As for Sansa, something seemed to have shaken her up.

“When do we start?”

He asked her the question as if he was eager for the trial to begin. He could have been angry at her because she was about to judge and condemn his brother. Daenerys could understand. The brother she knew had been killed in front of her and she had not felt a thing, but there had been a time when she would fear for his life, back when they travelled through the Dothraki Sea. She saved his life by begging one of Drogo’s warriors to spare him, even though he assaulted his khaleesi. But it wasn’t at her that he looked angry.

Three strong pounds resonated through the hall. The three judges were present. It was the signal the trial could begin, and the herald announced it. The doors closed, and the people rushed to their places, everyone walking on everyone’s feet, running into each other. With the help of the guards, order came out from chaos. People were only whispering, creating a background noise. A man in the colors of House Tyrell who was standing by the door opened it for a few inches, then silently closed it and made a sign with his head in Daenerys’ direction.

Three new pounds were made by the herald with his stick. The whole hall fell silent. When the doors opened, the noise of their movement reverberated on the walls and ceilings. Escorted by four gold cloaks, chained on the wrists and the feet, Jaime Lannister walked in.

Daenerys hadn’t seen him since the day she took the city, when she found him in this very room, at the feet of the Iron Throne, his dying sister in his arms, stabbed with his own dagger. He remained in the cells beneath the Red Keep ever since. Now he walked to her, and soon he was stopped in a free space near the dais. No guard stood directly between him and Daenerys. He might try to attack her, but after weeks spent in a cell and his four members bound by chains, she doubted he would be in any state to try anything on her. He could still try. Her men were ready to stop him, and she was ready as well.

Here he was, the man who murdered her father, in the throne she was sitting upon. Robert Baratheon might have pardoned him, but she wouldn’t. She would serve justice to those who deserved it.

Jaime Lannister met her eyes, and her eyes met his. As she stood up, the room was silent. The time had come. The herald announced her.

“Daenerys Stormborn, of House Targaryen, the First of Her Name, Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynars, Lady of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm, the Unburnt, Khaleesi of the Great Grass Sea, Breaker of Chains and Mother of Dragons.”

“We are today assembled for the judgement of a man in the light of the law of the Seven Kingdoms,” Daenerys began. “There is no justice without laws, and no one is above them. I will preside this trial, and with me Tyrion of House Lannister, Hand of the Queen, Lord of Casterly Rock and Warden of the West, and Mace of House Tyrell, Master of Coin, Lord of Highgarden and Warden of the South. May justice prevail.”

She sat down. A septon designated by a council of septons from Oldtown made a prayer, asking the Father Above to guide them to justice. Another prayer was made by Yennefer, begging the Lord of Light to guide them to the truth, reminding everyone that no hidden truth would be kept in the shadows forever. As the prayers were made, Daenerys noticed how Jaime Lannister spent his time looking up to her, then back to his feet. After a few times he repeated this chain of movements, she realized he always looked down after he looked on Daenerys’ right. She looked at her Hand from the corner of her eyes, to realize he was looking at his brother with the look of a viper, and gripping the arms of his chair so hard that his fists were white. Not a single time did he look to Daenerys or his wife. His gaze was for his brother and only his brother.

When the prayers were over, the Grand Maester gathered several papers he had on a very small table in front of him and brought them to Daenerys. Marcon had spent the prayers in silence, his hands joined before him, so he rushed to have all the documents ready. Among them were all the proofs Daenerys had, declarations signed by people attesting Ser Jaime’s crimes. Some were from lords of both the Riverlands and the North, who had been present when Ser Alton Lannister died. One was also signed by Brandon Stark. He gave it to Daenerys when she last saw him in the North. She was ready.

“Ser Jaime Lannister,” she began, “you stand accused of the regicide of Aerys the Second of House Targaryen, the king you swore to serve and protect as a member of the Kingsguard. The usurper, Robert Baratheon, pardoned you for this crime, but I am not willing to forgive so easily. There are laws in this world, and I do not turn a blind eye on them. Hence you stand on trial today since you didn’t answer to these crimes twenty years ago. You also face accusations of murder on your cousin, Ser Alton Lannister, and for an attempt of murder on Brandon Stark. How do you plead?”

The Kingslayer raised his eyes to look at her. He stared right into hers. “Guilty.”

The whole crowd muttered. Daenerys didn’t show it, but she was surprised by this. She expected Ser Jaime to deny the accusations. “You recognize that you committed these crimes?”

“Yes, I do. Everyone knows I did it. I also killed my sister. You know it, you were there when I plunged a dagger in her throat. So why bother with a trial when you already know everything I did and it’s already decided I will be declared guilty? Why not give me to your dragon right away?”

New reactions came from all over the hall when he confessed to killing his sister. The herald had to bring back the silence. “You have not yet been declared guilty, Ser Jaime. I do not sentence my people to death without first listening to what they have to say. I’m not my father.” The declaration shut the mouth of everyone in the room. “Now, you stated you were guilty of all these crimes. Do you have anything to say that could justify your actions?”

Strangely, she found the scene similar to the time in Meereen when she had to judge Mossador for the murder of the Son of the Harpy.

“I have to say… that killing Alton and pushing the boy from the top of that tower were probably two of the worse things I did in my life. But killing your father, the Mad King, and murdering my sister, these are probably the two best things I’ve ever done.”

New shocks. The herald had to bring back order again. She shot a look at Tyrion, who was still looking at his brother with the same cold expression.

“Perhaps you would care to explain why murdering the king you swore to serve and murdering your own sister were the best decisions of your life,” she asked harshly.

“You knew what my sister was planning, didn’t you? The eunuch and his little birds found out about it after the battle, I’m sure. Unless he didn’t tell you. Varys is very good at hiding secrets. My sister wanted to burn the whole city instead of letting you have it. She had hidden caches of wildfire everywhere. When I came into the Red Keep, Qyburn was on his way to start it all. So I killed him, and then I went to Cersei and killed her too.”

This was in line with what Lord Varys discovered, and in accordance with the declarations of Jaime Lannister when she found him in the Throne Room the first time. “How did you know of your sister’s plans? Did she tell you about them?”

“No, of course not. She didn’t trust me anymore. But I knew her. She had already destroyed the Great Sept. I knew she wouldn’t hesitate to burn the rest of the city. You must know it, Lord Tyrell. She killed your son, and almost killed your daughter too.”

“I know it only too well, Kingslayer,” he replied on a hard tone.

“Well, in this case, why didn’t you stop her the first time, when she murdered my son?” the lord asked.

“Because I was outside the walls when it happened, and I never suspected she would do it back then. But after the Great Sept, after that day… I knew what she was capable of. So when I saw Qyburn, I knew what she had in mind. She had the same thing in mind than your father.”

“What did my father have in mind?”

Jaime Lannister laughed. “Your father was mad. He was obsessed with wildfire. He burned Rickard Stark with it, while his son strangled himself by trying to save him, and he laughed while it happened. Burn them all, he always said, burn them all. He was the first to have the idea, you know. After the Trident and the Bells, he had Rossart place wildfire caches all over the city. He was his favourite pyromancer, the one who cooked Rickard Stark alive. After Qarlton Chested confronted the Mad King about this, he resigned as Hand. It was probably the only time Quarlton was brave. He had always been a craven and a sycophant, looking for favors from your father. His moment of bravery cost him his life. He was burned alive, and Aerys gave the badge of Hand to Rossart.”

“I was there all the time they plotted this. Your father loved to have me around. Finally, the day arrived when the rebels marched on the capital. My father arrived first, claiming he was there to protect the city. I warned the king to not open the gates. My father would never pick the losing side. You can ask Varys, he was there. He told your father the same. But your father chose to listen to Pycelle, the Grand Maester Pycelle. He said he could trust the Lannisters. So the gates were opened, and my father sacked the city. I went back to the Mad King and begged him to let me negotiate a surrender. Instead, he ordered me to bring him my father’s head, and then he sent Rossart to burn the city. I went to kill Rossart, and then I came back into the Throne Room and stabbed the king with my sword still red from Rossart’s blood. The Mad King kept laughing on the floor. I guess he didn’t think he would die. I made sure he would and plunged my sword in his back. That’s why I killed him. This is the best thing I’ve ever done as a kingsguard. I protected the people. I suppose that’s what a true knight should do.”

The hall was silent as if no living soul had been present. Daenerys herself was taken aback with the story. She knew her father was rightly called the Mad King, but she didn’t know what his intentions had been concerning the city. Tyrion told her there had been a very specific context to his brother’s actions. She hadn’t known what to expect.

“You said you knew of my father’s plans. Did you try talk him out of this?”

“My duty as a kingsguard was to protect and obey the king, not to question him. Anyway, all those who did ended burned alive.”
“Why didn’t you tell anyone back then?”

“Because no one was interested to hear it. It was much easier for them to simply hate the man who murdered his king than to face the questions whether a knight should obey his king in all circumstances. And it allowed them to not take the blame for a king’s death. You think Eddard Stark or Robert Baratheon were interested to hear the reasons why I killed the king? No one wanted to hear it.”

“I think the people who died in the Great Sept of Baelor would have liked to know. Maybe your sister’s plans could have been stopped if people had known there were large stocks of wildfire under the city, and thousands of people would still be alive.” The Kingslayer scoffed. “What about Ser Alton Lannister? Did he plan to burn King’s Landing too?”

“He planned to burn Riverrun. No, my cousin’s only crime was to be a Lannister and an opportunity for me to escape. I killed him so someone would open my damn cage and I could escape Robb Stark’s camp. Too bad I failed.”

“You murdered a cousin of yours?” Lord Tyrell asked, outraged.

“What? Don’t tell me there’s never been murders of cousins among the Tyrells.”

“And Brandon Stark?” Daenerys interrupted it before it went too far. “Why did you try to kill him?”

At that, Jaime Lannister looked less proud all of a sudden, even remorseful. “I didn’t want to kill him, but I had no choice. He saw me with Cersei. He was going to tell everyone about it. I did it to protect the woman I loved and our children.”

“The woman you love? Your children? To you both?” It was Mace Tyrell again who spoke.

“Come on, Fat Flower, everybody knows about me and Cersei. Don’t tell me you wed your daughter to two bastards born of incest without any knowledge of it.”

“Enough!” Daenerys put a stop to it. “Mace Tyrell is one of the judges here at this trial. You will show him some respect, or else this will be held against you.”

“What does it matter? I’m already condemned. I’m guilty. Guilty, you hear! So get over with this and give me a quick clean death so I may no longer have to bear being judged by every one person in the Seven Kingdoms.”

The crowd was silent. All eyes were turned to Daenerys. They were waiting for her decision. However, this decision did not belong only to her. “Do you have anything else to say, Ser Jaime?”

“Only what I’ve already said. I regret that I killed Alton, and I regret what I did to the Stark boy even more, but I don’t regret what I did to Cersei and your father. Any true knight would have done the same.”

She nodded. “We heard you, Ser Jaime. Know that since you acknowledged your guilt, everything you said will only serve to determine the appropriate sentence for you. I will retire now with Lord Lannister and Lord Tyrell to deliberate. The trial is adjourned. The sentence will be given after the bells ring.”

“Clear the court,” the herald shouted.

Before Daenerys left the hall, she looked to Varys. “What he said, is it true?” she whispered.
He nodded. Followed by the other two judges, she walked to the small council chamber.

“He’s guilty,” Lord Tyrell said as soon as they were in.

“How brilliant you are, Lord Tyrell. You just stated the obvious,” Lord Tyrion mocked.

“To your knowledge, Lord Tyrion, is your brother telling the truth?” she asked.

“He told me the same story a long time ago,” he replied dryly. Considering the length he went to protect his brother, Daenerys found his behaviour quite unusual.

“How do we know he’s not lying?” Lord Mace asked.

“Lord Varys confirmed the facts,” Daenerys stated. “I know what my father did, only I didn’t have all the details. We have to give it to Ser Jaime, he saved thousands of people when he killed my father, and he did the same for Cersei. We would be discussing about ruins without him.”

“That doesn’t erase all the other things he did. Trying to kill a child, murdering his cousin, sleeping with his own sister and having children with her, and then killing her!”

“Ser Jaime is not accused of incest, nor is he of killing Cersei. We must only consider the current accusations, and he is guilty of all of them. Regicide, murder, kinslaying, and attempt of murder. All these crimes are chargeable with death.” She turned to her Hand, who was unusually silent. “What do you think, Lord Tyrion?”

He stared back at her, his gaze even. “It’s like you said. He’s guilty, all these crimes separately are punishable by death. Even if your father’s murder was justified, he still killed his king and you can sentence him to death for the two others, which are not justified.”

She frowned, but her Hand showed no reaction. She turned to Lord Tyrell and interrogated him with her eyes.

“He deserves death, your Grace.”

She nodded, looked back to Lord Tyrion, who still showed no reaction, then back to the Lord of Highgarden.

“Leave us alone, please. I would like to discuss with the Hand alone.”

Lord Tyrell seemed offended, but if he was he said nothing. He left the room and Daenerys addressed Tyrion right away. “What’s going on?”

“A trial, I guess.”

“You know what I mean. You were adamant for me to spare your brother only a few hours ago. Now you seem indifferent to his fate, even willing to have him executed.”

“Shouldn’t it please you?”

“What’s going on?”

He sustained her gaze for some time, then sighed and looked away. “Let’s just say that I discovered a side of my brother that I wasn’t aware of before.”

He kept looking away for some time, then stared again into her eyes. “Have you made up your mind?”
“I’m not sure,” she replied.

“Well, I have nothing else to tell you. I’ll be back when the bells toll. Your Grace.”

He bowed and left. She looked at him walking away, wondering what had happened within the last few hours.

She spent some time alone, trying to decide what to do. She hadn’t thought it would take so much time to decide the fate of Jaime Lannister, but new elements and facts required a longer period of reflection than she expected.

When she took back her place on the dais, the bells tolled, and everyone came back in the hall. The herald hit the floor with his stick three times and everything went silent. Jaime Lannister was staring right at her. He didn’t show any fear. The man was ready to face his destiny. Slowly, she stood up from her throne, the one where her father was killed a long time ago by the man standing below her. He didn’t regret it. Of all the crimes he was accused of, it was the only one he didn’t show any regret for.

“Ser Jaime of House Lannister, son of Tywin Lannister, you have been found guilty of regicide, murder, and attempt of murder. You killed the king you swore to serve. You killed a member of your own family. You tried to kill a child.” Not far from her, Marcon was taking notes, writing everything she said, his quill scratching the surface of his parchment. Tyrion was still looking intently to his brother, unflinching, without any trace of brotherly love.

“Nothing justifies what you did to your cousin and to Brandon Stark, and although there are reasons behind the murder of your king, it still remains a murder, made worse by the vows you took to protect him with your life. You didn’t have to kill him. After Rossart was dead, his plot was impossible to carry on. You could have brought my father out of the city to Dragonstone, where he wouldn’t have been a threat to King’s Landing, or escape if you thought he would have you executed and let the rebels take him prisoner. It would be treason and disobedience, which are crimes as well, but not as worse as regicide. The fact remains that you didn’t have to kill my father, and no matter the circumstances, killing him remains a regicide, which is punishable by death like all the other crimes you confessed today.”

She could see people were on the edge of their seats, waiting for the sentence to fall. Those who were not sitting were leaning to better see her and Ser Jaime. “I’m not my father. Unlike the Mad King, I do not take joy in killing the traitors and my enemies, and I know sometimes we face difficult choices. My father was a cruel man, and his decisions made the Realm bleed and suffer. Your crimes remain, Ser Jaime, and nothing you can do will erase what you did.” The Kingslayer was still looking at her, waiting patiently for his sentence. “However, your crimes don’t erase the good actions you’ve done. The fact remains that you saved this city twice.”

On that, Jaime Lannister was taken aback.

“For your actions that saved the lives of many people, including some who are present today, I offer you the choice to take the black and join the Night’s Watch, where you can have another chance to serve the Realm. If you refuse, then I will have no choice but to execute you for the crimes that you admitted.”

The knight was all confused. He wasn’t expecting this. On her right, she noticed Tyrion had a similar expression. She fought to not let a smile appear on her face and maintained her neutral expression, the expression she had to keep as a queen. Everyone was stunned in the room. Even Marcon looked up from his parchment to gaze at her over his shoulder. Varys and Yennefer seemed to be the only ones to not be surprised in any way, or who managed to not show any surprise.
When Ser Jaime spoke, it came out as a croak. “I choose to take the black.”

Eyes turned to him, then back to her. “So be it. You will leave for Eastwatch-by-the-Sea by the first ship. In the meantime, you will stay in prison. This trial is over.”

The herald, probably surprised too with this turn of events, pounded three times. The guards came to escort Ser Jaime back to his cell. The heavy doors were opened so they could get out, and people followed them on their feet and with their eyes. Daenerys walked back to the small council chambers. From there, she took less used corridors to go to her apartments. She just sat down and poured a glass of wine when someone knocked on her door.

“Come in.” It was Tyrion. She should have expected him.

“Why?” He looked as confused as his brother. She put down her cup.

“You know I had a brother once. Viserys.”

“Yes, the who ended with a crown of melted gold on the head.”

“Yes. I hated him, after he threatened to kill my baby. When I saw him die, I didn’t look away. I didn’t feel any pity for him, even though a few moments ago I was trying to get him out before he pulled out his steel sword and my husband would kill him. All that was gone in an instant when he pointed the sword towards me and said he would carve out my child and leave it to my husband. Within a few seconds, he was no longer my brother.”

Tyrion was frowning. “Most of the time, I don’t regret his death at all. But there are times when I regret some moments we spent together, moments when he was actually nice. I don’t know what happened between you and your brother, but I guess it is better to regret that he is alive and unable to do any harm, than to risk regretting he is dead.”

He opened the mouth but said nothing. He closed and opened it again a few times, before finally a few words came out. “Thank you.”

“Your brother will probably leave soon. There are ships leaving all the time for Eastwatch right now, carrying the food and other things our army at the Wall needs. If you want to talk with him, the sooner would be the better.”

“Yes. Yes, probably,” he stammered. He turned around and was about to walk out, but then stopped in his motion and slowly turned back to her. “There’s…” He hesitated a long time. “There’s something I have to tell you, and I’m not sure if you’ll like it.”

“Why?”

“Because… it concerns your father. And my mother.”

She raised her eyebrows.

Chapter End Notes

Much shorter than Tyrion's trial, I admit, but with the accused who confesses all the crimes, the procedure is quite shortened, and trials in medieval societies were much more expeditive than today. Everyone knew Jaime was going to be declared guilty, there were only doubts on the sentence.

This chapter is also the last appearance of Jaime. This time, we shall indeed never see his like again, though he may be mentionned in the chapters that are left.

Next chapter: Bran
“Are you sure you want to do this?”

“It’s not about what I want to do. It’s about what I need to do,” he replied.

“You’re giving up everything to go up there?”

“I already gave up everything, Jon. I gave up everything I held dear the day I fell from that tower.”

“Bran, you don’t have to do this. The White Walkers are gone.”

“You know that’s not true, Jon. They’ll never be gone for good. There’s always a chance they could resurface.”

“When? Where?”

“I don’t know. Maybe in a few years, maybe only in another eight thousand years or longer, but they can always come back.”

“If they only come back in thousands of years, then why would you go north of the Wall? You’ll be dead by the time they come back. You still have a full life ahead of you, and you have a family. How can you give up all this for something that might never happen?”

“How could you? You did the same when you took the black again.”

“It was different,” Jon replied on a mournful tone. “There was no place for me in the south.”

“And there is no place for me either, Jon.”

“You’re wrong.”

“I wish you could understand, Jon. There are things that go beyond what you can understand. It’s complicated.

“Then explain to me.”

“I can’t. I wish I could.”

Jon made an impatient sound and stood to walk to the nearby window. “I didn’t fight the dead so you would end up going back on their lands.”

“It’s no longer dangerous. They are not a threat to me anymore.”

“Then why go back?”

“Because they might be a threat to someone else in the future.”

“How? They’re gone.”
“They could come back.”

“You keep telling this, but you don’t even have the slightest idea of how they could come back, or when, or where.”

“I do. It’s just complicated.”

“Everything is complicated!”

“Yes, they are,” Bran replied calmly to Jon’s outburst.

His brother sighed in despair. “I already took the black again. If you leave, what’s going to happen to Sansa and Arya? They will be alone.”

“Sansa already has someone to take care of her, Jon. She has a new family. She no longer feels like a Stark.”

“Don’t say that.”

“It’s the truth. I don’t like it, but that’s a fact. As for Arya, she doesn’t need anybody. She never did.”

“And the North? Who will rule it?”

“Sansa will do it. You know that, Jon. You’re just trying to find an excuse, as stupid and illogical it might be, to keep me here.”

“I just don’t understand.”

“I know, and I’m sorry for that, but you must believe me when I say this is for the right reasons.”

He wished he could tell the truth to Jon, but he couldn’t. He couldn’t tell anyone that the Children of the Forest still lived somewhere in the places known to men as the Lands of Always Winter, hidden from both men and White Walkers. They were not ready to come into contact with men again, not after they spent so much time alone, cut from all societies other than theirs. The Children he spent time with in the North were a small group who willingly left their communities and ventured in the south, seeking to destroy the White Walkers that threatened the realms of men and would turn on the Children as soon as they were done with the kingdoms of men. Now that the White Walkers were gone, Bran had to go north and find where the other Children still lived. He was the Three-Eyed Raven, the only man who could serve as a bridge between the two races. For when the men and the Children meet again, and they would, a wall of misunderstanding would exist between them, settling all the conditions for a war so devastating that it would span thousands of years and consume both peoples. Just like for the first war, when the First Men came to Westeros, the consequences would be disastrous, only this time they might be worse, for both species had improved their weapons and powers, and they developed their abilities in domains that were specific to the opponent before. Men now controlled magic, and the Children had more powerful weapons as well.

Only Bran could prevent this from happening. He could help the Children to understand men again, and when he would die, the men and women who would succeed him would lead the Children so that when men would find them, the two races could live together, in peace. The men were bound to find the Children. With the White Walkers gone and the great volcano of the North now free of the Walkers’ hold, this winter would be the last one. It would be harsh, harsher than anyone could have foreseen, but when it would be over, summer would settle and never end. Men would start to occupy the lands beyond the Wall like they never did before, they would grow in number, and sooner or later, one of their kingdoms would meet the Children.
The first war between the two people had led to the creation of the White Walkers and the unending succession of summers and winters that followed, with all the death and suffering it involved. The world had not been perfect, unlike some of the Children would like to think. Men had brought some good with them, and the Children couldn’t see it because they were too occupied to look at the wrongs they did. By their intolerance, their refusal to consider change, and their lust for war and glory, both sides made themselves suffer, and none won in the end. Everyone lost, and it was only with the appearance of a new foe they all contributed to create that they became allies and learned to live together.

Now Bran had to make sure history wouldn’t repeat itself, but he couldn’t say anything to Jon. It was true that the White Walkers could reappear. Some Children might even be thinking about it in this very moment, but more than anything, Bran had to protect men and the Children from themselves. Only he could do this.

“Jon,” Bran said carefully, “you cannot hold me here. You have an important role to play in Westeros, and I have one just as important to fulfill on the other side of the Wall. I already sent messages to everyone in the North and to King’s Landing that I renounced to my claim on Winterfell and asked all the Lords of the North to swear fealty to Sansa. It’s over. I was never meant to be Lord of Winterfell, Jon, no more than you. We were both called to something else, something greater. And look around, it worked. We defeated the dead, we saved the realms of men. But our work isn’t over. It will never be over. I must go north of the Wall. This is my duty.”

Bran leaned forward as much as his useless leg allowed him to. “You’ve seen what the White Walkers were capable of. If they ever come back, you know what a catastrophe it would be. I have to make sure it never happens, and the only way I could ensure this is north of the Wall.”

“How? There’s nothing left north of the Wall. You will die out there alone.”

“I’ll have help.”

“You really want Meera to come with you? She will follow you everywhere, but don’t you see that she suffers? You make her suffer with what you’re doing.”

“Meera is not coming with me,” Bran revealed. He had hoped Jon would learn it only at the last moment, when he was long gone.

“If Meera doesn’t go with you, then who will help you?”

Bran didn’t answer. Jon looked at him queerly, realizing there was something more that Bran refused to tell him. He kept his mouth shut all the same. It would be better if Jon didn’t know what help Bran was talking about, or uncertain about the identity of those he thought about.

“Bran, tell me.”

“I cannot. I’m sorry, Jon. You have to trust me.”

“How am I supposed to trust you if you don’t trust me?”

“It’s not a question of trust, Jon. It’s just that no one must know. I swear to you, Jon, I must go north. It’s vital, just as this was essential that you joined the Night’s Watch.”

Jon seemed to think about it for a moment. “I don’t like it, Bran.”

“Me neither. When I was in this cave, the Three-Eyed Raven told me he didn’t want to end up like this, with roots growing on him, but he had to do it. I must do the same now, just like him, just like you, and like many other people. People will not remember me, but I will have saved them. They will not be aware that they needed to be saved, but they will be alive and well because I have given my life for them."

Jon shook his head several times, paced a little and came back to sit behind his desk. “Alright. I don’t like it, but I won’t stop you. Will we ever see you again?”

“One day, maybe we will.”

“Be careful out there.”

Bran nodded. “I will leave tomorrow in the morning.” It will be the time.

Jon called Meera and she came to carry Bran to his room. They left Jon’s office to go to one of the rooms that had been repaired. Castle Black was busy with men from many horizons working to rebuild the castle and reinforce the fortifications around the crevice. Few of them were members of the Night’s Watch. Most were Northerners and wildlings. Some of them came from the Riverlands, and even a few from the Westerlands. Jon had taken the black again and swore his vows. No Lord Commander had been chosen yet but by all accounts, Jon was unofficially the leader of the Night’s Watch. There should be an election soon.

The room Bran was given was on the ground level, hence the uselessness to climb stairs to reach it. Meera helped him to get into bed.

“You know that I spoke to your brother, don’t you?” she asked Bran, almost to blame him.

“I suspected it,” he recognized.

“I hate the Three-Eyed Raven. He should never have left this cave.”

She walked away. “I’m sorry, Meera.”

She got out as he said her name. He didn’t sleep that night. He almost never slept now, and when he did, he visited the past. This was no longer sleeping. This time, however, he had no visions. He thought of Meera. Although he was the Three-Eyed Raven now, he was also Brandon Stark, and Brandon Stark was the boy who had fallen in love with Meera Reed. However, he couldn’t allow the desires of Brandon Stark to take precedence over the duty of the Three-Eyed Raven.

Love is the death of duty. But love couldn’t have a hold strong enough on him, no matter the love in question. Love for family, love for the North, love for Meera, none of it mattered before the task ahead of him.

He spent the whole night thinking about it. Brandon Stark wanted to stay, but he also knew, and the Three-Eyed Raven knew as well, that he couldn’t stay. The Three-Eyed Raven understood Bran, and Bran understood the Three-Eyed Raven. They both knew the personal desires of one man had to be sacrificed for the future of two races. They both knew what had to be done.

In the morning, Bran didn’t feel tired. He was at peace with himself. A small part of him hated himself for what he was doing to the people who loved him, but it didn’t matter. Only the future mattered. He broke his fast for the last time in the realms of men, and then he was carried to the tunnel. Meera pushed him without talking. Before the inner gates, Jon was waiting for him. Bran knew he wouldn’t stop him. Jon ordered the gates to be opened.

As it was raised, Bran took a last look at Castle Black. A considerable part of it was already usable again. Jon made a very good job at rebuilding it. He kept looking at it as they progressed through the tunnel, until all he saw was a white point far away.

He looked to Meera, who maintained her eyes straight ahead, refusing to make eye contact with him. He knew she was looking at him only a few moments ago, but she wouldn’t look at him while he looked at her. She wouldn’t meet his eyes. So he decided to look forward as well, and he felt her eyes on him again. It was a soothing and comforting feeling, the last time he would ever feel it.

They progressed through the tunnel in silence, Meera, Jon and Bran, none of them daring to speak. They didn’t know what to tell each other. Only when they reached the outer gate did Jon talk.

“You can still change your mind.”

“No, I can’t.”

That was all Bran said. That was all he could say, for in this moment, if he spoke more, he might actually change his mind and turn back. Reluctantly, Jon raised the torch he carried and made two semi-circles with it. Slowly, the outer gate was raised. He heard Meera take a long inhalation, and then she pushed his sledge and Bran found himself on the other side of the Wall. There he waited, all in black, a long scarf covering all his face, waiting for him on a horse.

“You’re right in time,” he said in a very grave voice.

Jon and Meera stopped at a good distance from him. They were afraid and didn’t know what to expect of this man, for they didn’t know he was a friend, and more than a friend. The man in black stepped down his horse and approached. Bran heard Jon putting his hand on Longclaw and Meera seizing a dagger. Then the man removed the scarf from his face and revealed it for everyone to see.

Bran wasn’t surprised, for he knew who he was already. Meera remained suspicious for she didn’t know him. Jon, on the other hand, was agape.

“Uncle Benjen.”

Coldhands, as he was also known now, smiled to both Jon and Bran, and then to Meera, who looked, confused, to Jon.

“We thought you were dead.”

“I thought so me too,” he replied, “but the Children of the Forest saved me.”

Bran turned to Jon. “I told you I would have help.”

Jon was too stunned to say anything. Bran hoped Jon would just believe him and not ask any other question. Benjen looked to Bran.

He walked forward and Meera brandished her dagger, but Jon stopped her with his arm. Coldhands lifted up Bran from his sledge with an impressive strength. He brought him to his horse where he carefully saddled his nephew.

“Don’t worry. I’ll make sure nothing happens to him,” Coldhands told Jon and Meera. He climbed on his horse as well.

“Wait! Where are you going? Benjen… Talk to me. How are you still alive? Where have you been?”

“That I cannot tell you, Jon. There are a lot of things I cannot tell you. But I can tell you this. We’ll meet again, and then you’ll know everything.”

Benjen hurried his horse forward and raced at high speed. The last image Bran had of the realms of men were the two figures of Jon and Meera, the first mouth opened and looking helpless while looking to his brother disappearing, and the second with tears streaming from her eyes. They got smaller and smaller until Bran couldn’t see them anymore. He turned his back to his past and looked to the future. The wind hit his face strongly, but that wasn’t the reason he was crying. His life as Brandon Stark was over. His life as the Three-Eyed Raven was beginning for real.

Chapter End Notes

Another character leaving us.

I'm trying to wrap up all the arcs of the story. Bran didn't occupy the place in "A Shadow and a Wolf" like he did in the books or the show. He only had two chapters written from his perspective and he was more a background character, providing information and explaining the whys and the hows of the events occurring on the magical realm.

I'm trying to provide an explanation to the decisions of the Children of the Forest in this chapter. To me, it is unlikely that all of those who were still alive died in that cavern, and although it is not impossible, it seems unlikely that they only trained Bran to save humanity when they fought mankind for thousands of years. That these were the actions of a marginal group among the Children is more likely, while there are others still alive somewhere.

I guess that if there could be a sequel to "A Shadow and a Wolf", this chapter is the one leaving the door open for such a sequel. I'm not planning a sequel right now, not with "A Rose and a Lion" still being written and far from finished, and I have other projects ongoing, but who knows? Let's not close the door forever. We never know what life is keeping in store for us.

Next chapter: Tyrion
Chapter Notes

Sorry for being late with this new chapter.

A very political chapter that shows the beginning of Daenerys’ rule and her very first decisions as queen. As you will see, she's not going to leave Westeros as it is.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TYRION XXXIX

They all stood next to their seat, waiting for the queen to arrive. The first meeting of the small council where all members would be present was about to begin. Tyrion understood what Daenerys was doing. She tried to show she was the queen, for the small council would only start when she would be here, and she would be here when she wanted to arrive.

In the meantime, the other members of the small council were busy doing one thing or another. The Master of Coin and the Master of Ships, respectively Mace Tyrell and Paxter Redwyne, were engaged in a long conversation. Anders Yronwood, the Master of Laws, talked with Varys, Master of Whisperers for a queen, a first time. Yennefer, the Red Priestess who represented the High Priestess in her absence, looked at the glass that allowed light into the room. Kinvara had not come back yet. The last time Tyrion saw her was at Moat Cailin. Ever since she left with the Red Priest Geralt to accompany him until his departure of Westeros, no one had seen her. Tyrion found this very odd. Yennefer had been discussing with Grand Maester Marcon for a time but had hostilely turned her back on him after he spoke of a Red Priestess with red hair another maester in the Stormlands told him about. Ever since, he was writing notes on a pile of paper. Intrigued, Tyrion approached him. The Grand Maester didn’t show any sign he was aware of Tyrion’s presence near him.

“Am I bothering you?” he asked the maester.

“Not at all, my lord.” The Grand Maester looked up and removed his Myrish glasses to look at Tyrion. He only needed them to read. Very few people used them, for they were very costly, but this maester seemed to have the means to pay for them. “What can I do for you?”

“You seemed very focused while you were writing.”

“Yes. I’m not always like that. Sometimes, I pace while I speak to myself, reciting what I want to write before I go back to work. But here… well, it wouldn’t be appropriate in front of all these important people.”

“Do you include me in these important people, Grand Maester?”

“You are the Hand of the Queen, my lord,” he replied, a small smile on his face.

“Clever answer.”

The Grand Maester laughed shortly. Tyrion wondered how he was chosen to be Grand Maester. The man barely had a few grey hair. He was no older than forty and very young by Grand Maester standards.

“‘To go back to the matter that occupied us, what were you writing?’”

“‘Notes, my lord.’”

“‘Notes, indeed. I guessed so. Notes for what?’”

“‘Well, stuff.’ The Grand Maester seemed reluctant to answer. ‘It is for a book, my lord.’”

“‘What book?’”

“I intend to write a book about my tenure as Grand Maester.”

“Won’t your tenure end with your death?”

“Indeed. I’m afraid I will never see the work finished, but I think one of my friends in Oldtown will be kind enough to complete it when I’m gone. I might also use these notes for other works, such as the beginning of this new era. I’d like to relate how the Seven Kingdoms were changed as the new queen modified the political and economic structures of our country.”

“Are you sure you will have the time to do this, with your responsibilities as Grand Maester?”

“Not as much time as I’d like. I wish the days were longer, but I will do my best, and no matter how much I manage to write, that will be something I wrote, which is better than nothing. I want to leave something behind me.”

“We all do, Grand Maester,” Varys said from behind Tyrion. He had stopped talking with Lord Yronwood. “I just hope you realize it is more important to change the world for the better than to write about it.”

“I hope to do both,” Marcon replied with conviction.

Varys nodded in respect and turned to Tyrion. “My good lord Hand, a word in private, if I may.”

“You may as much as you want, my good friend,” Tyrion replied and followed.

“I heard the Lady Sansa is feeling better.”

“You heard well.”

“What about you?”

He could have looked surprised that Varys was so concerned, but instead he replied, “things could be better. I take it one day at a time.”

“And your sister?”

He whispered the last question, which left no doubt on which sister Varys was talking about. “She didn’t kill me yet.”

“I shall hope so. It would be very sad if she lost another brother.”

“What do you want, Varys?”

“Me? Only to be sure that my friends are safe.”
“For now, everything is alright.”

“I hope it will remain that way. I would be careful as to who you tell your secrets in the future.”

Varys walked away from Tyrion, who again found himself alone. He didn’t know why he told Daenerys the truth about their parents. Varys was right. She could have him executed on the spot. It had been stupid but when she told him why she didn’t kill Jaime, he felt like telling her, as if he owed it to her. Jaime had left the city two days later. Tyrion had gone to see him one last time before he left. They didn’t speak a lot, but they left on better terms than how they parted ways before the trial. Tyrion said he would go to visit him at the Wall. He still wasn’t sure if he would do it, but he wasn’t sure that he wouldn’t do it either. Jaime had apologized again and told him he would do everything he could to make amends at the Wall. He joked, saying it might have been the best place for him from the beginning.

Now Jaime was gone. Tyrion didn’t tell him the truth. The only people he told were Sansa and Daenerys. Apart from them, only Genna, Bran and Varys knew the truth. When his half-sister learned the truth, she was first stunned, then shocked. Tyrion had explained everything very carefully. Daenerys knew the powers Bran had, having experienced them firsthand, and since Tyrion could ride a dragon, she believed him quite quickly. She had required a moment for herself then, and half an hour later, she summoned Tyrion. He had gone back to Sansa in the meantime. He informed his wife of what he just revealed to the queen. Sansa feared the worse but when Daenerys called him again, she went with him. They discussed for hours. Daenerys took it pretty well, considering the circumstances. It wasn’t the first time she discovered she had a family member who was still alive. They talked about many things, from personal stuff to the political ramifications of this situation. Tyrion swore he had no interest in the Iron Throne, and he thought Daenerys believed him. Anyway, he was a bastard, and thus had a weaker claim on the throne than her, not to mention a smaller dragon and a height problem. The three had agreed not to reveal any of it.

They heard a door open and close. The queen came in, alone. She looked to no one, except for Tyrion who she looked at for an instant, and took place on her chair. The small council, who had waited for her, followed her example. Tyrion ended at her right, presiding the small council meeting with her.

“We have several matters to attend today, so let us begin right away. First, the Iron Islands. As you all know by now, I promised Yara Greyjoy that I would acknowledge her Queen of the Iron Islands. I will keep my promise.”

“Your Grace, I know you made a promise,” Lord Redwyne began, “but the Greyjoys are dangerous. I can’t remember how many times they rebelled against the Iron Throne, and each time the Reach bled.”

“Euron Greyjoy made the Reach bleed. His niece helped to protect the Reach and fought alongside you at Oldtown. She helped to free the Shield Islands. Have you received any information that Ironborn would have attacked your lands since Euron was defeated?”

The last question was destined to Mace Tyrell. “No, your Grace, but that doesn’t mean they will not attack again. The Ironborn always invade our lands, sooner or later.”

“In this case, it would be better not to give them a reason to raid your lands,” Tyrion said. “Yara Greyjoy is on our side. I’d say I would rather have a queen of the Iron Islands who’s friendly to us than a Lord or a Lady of the Iron Islands who would be ready to rebel at the first opportunity. Giving the crown of the Iron Islands to Yara Greyjoy may be our best chance to ensure the Ironborn remain quiet.”
“They will attack us someday,” Lord Redwyne opposed.

“They will attack someday, whether they are independent or subjects to our queen. The Ironborn always invade Westerosi lands. No matter what happens, the last centuries proved that the Ironborn cannot remain idle on their islands for long. A new war with them is inevitable in the long-term. But for the next twenty years, I believe giving independence to the Iron Islands is the best way to avoid a new war. If we deny Yara Greyjoy what she asked, you can be sure we will have a new war within three years.”

Tyron knew that giving their independence to the Iron Islands could create a precedent that would cause other kingdoms to look after the same thing. However, for the time being, the North was too exhausted from previous wars to think about sovereignty, and the Dornish lands were ruled by a prince who had no desire to bring his people into another war and already occupied by a rebellion of his own bannermen. Tyrion knew the Ironborn would try to return to their old ways. It was bound to happen. But they could delay the coming of that day and ensure peace with the Iron Islands for the time Yara Greyjoy would rule them. When the Ironborn would rebel again, they had dragons to deal with them and to bring the islands back into the Realm. But not yet.

“I will not come back on my word,” Daenerys said. “Yara Greyjoy will be queen of the Iron Islands as long as she recognizes me as queen of all the other Westerosi lands. I will honor the pact we made in Meereen, and so she will. She engaged herself to respect the integrity of the Seven Kingdoms and to end piracy activities.”

“She will not,” Lord Tyrell declared.

“When she does not, I will deal with her, but not before. The matter is closed. I’ve made my decision.”

The decision about the Iron Islands was accepted, though only reluctantly by most of the councillors. No one was fond of the Iron Islands. Lord Redwyne and Lord Tyrell would barely have been more displeased had the queen decided to give its independence to Dorne.

“Can we be sure the Red Priests will be able to spread the word of R’hllor in the Iron Islands?” Yennefer asked.

“My deal with Yara Greyjoy includes the freedom of religion. All faiths will be allowed in both the Iron Islands and all over Westeros,” the queen answered.

“That was to be expected. “Doran Martell already told us he can deal with the rebellion himself. I promised him to lend him my support if he ever needed it, but for now it seems he can end the rebellion without my intervention. I will not intervene in Dorne unless it is necessary,” the queen decided.

The decision had come from a discussion Tyrion had with Daenerys yesterday. At the news of the rebellion, she had wanted to go to Dorne and help Doran Martell immediately. She saw it as her duty, since she promised Prince Doran her help whenever he needed it. But the people of Dorne didn’t appreciate strangers on their lands, and they had been the only ones to resist the dragons in history. It was better to let a Dornish who was your ally end the rebellion if he could, than to feed the said rebellion by marching on Dorne or flying over the kingdom.

“I agree with your decision, your Grace,” Lord Yronwood said. He must have received instructions from the Martells about it.

“Prince Doran Martell may not be present for the ceremony if he is to deal with a rebellion on his lands,” the Grand Maester said. He kept writing as he spoke.

“The coronation only takes place in two months. I’m sure that if the rebellion is not neutralized by this time, Prince Doran will still be able to send someone to represent him,” the queen said.

“Anyway, I heard Prince Doran’s health doesn’t allow him to travel very much. He is unlikely to come, no matter what happens,” Tyrion added.

“He should be there for the crowning of his queen,” Lord Tyrell argued.

“Prince Doran is the only Lord Paramount of the Seven Kingdoms who gave me his support before I arrived in Westeros. I trust him. He doesn’t need to travel hundreds of miles to prove his loyalty,” Daenerys declared. “Things are different for those who joined me later.”

“While we are on the ceremony, maybe we should decide who will rule the North, your Grace,” Marcon suggested. “Brandon Stark left Winterfell and declared he would never come back. We just received confirmation from the Wall that he went in the Lands of Always Winter. We need a Warden of the North to declare his fealty to you during the ceremony, and someone to rule the North in your name as well.”

“Her fealty,” she corrected. “Lady Sansa Lannister of House Stark will be Wardeness of the North.”

There was some uncertainty around the table. Strangely, it was the Grand Maester who intervened first. “I don’t believe it is wise to let someone rule two kingdoms, your Grace.”

“Since Jon Snow took the black and that Brandon Stark is gone forever, the Lady Sansa is Lady of Winterfell.”

“How will she rule the North from Casterly Rock?”

“Don’t worry, Grand Maester,” Tyrion reassured him with a smile on the corner of his lips. “I was able to rule a city on the brink of civil war. My wife and I are capable of ruling two kingdoms.”

“Maybe we should think about what we will do about the Stormlands,” Lord Tyrell said all of a sudden. “All the Baratheons are gone. It is time to name a new Lord of Storm’s End. It would be preferable to name someone who has some knowledge of the Stormlands, and one of your current allies, your Grace.”

Mace Tyrell wasn’t very good to hide his intentions to Tyrion. He knew what game the Lord of Highgarden was playing. Seeing Tyrion had two kingdoms, he was trying to obtain the same. Daenerys had already acknowledged the lands in the Stormlands that his lord father gave to Mace Tyrell after the Battle of Blackwater, and also those Tyrion promised to Doran Martell as part of his alliance early in the War of the Five Kings. However, if Mace ever wanted to hold both the Reach and the Stormlands, his hopes would be quenched very quickly.

“There will be a new Lord of Storm’s End, but no more Lord of the Stormlands.”

The news let most of the people of the small council stunned. It didn’t stun Tyrion, for he had already been stunned when Daenerys told him of her projects days before. Now he had come to accept this was an interesting idea. Bold as well, but interesting nonetheless.

“What do you mean, your Grace?” Lord Yronwood asked.

“So no, all the lands that were under the authority of the Lord Paramount of the Stormlands when I arrived in Westeros will be part of the Crownlands.”

All were shocked. Even Varys seemed concerned.

“This would double the size of the Crownlands,” the Grand Maester said. No one could deny it.

“The Stormlands… part of the Crownlands?” Lord Yronwood was skeptical.

“Your Grace, we have lands in the Stormlands,” Lord Tyrell said.

“You will keep them, and so will Dorne. As I said, only the lands under the authority of the Lord Paramount of the Stormlands when I arrived in Westeros will be integrated to the Crownlands.”

“This is… unexpected,” Lord Tyrell babbled. “The Crownlands have never been expanded since Aegon arrived.”

“Now they will. The Baratheons ruled the Stormlands, and they rebelled against their king and seized the Iron Throne. See it as an example of what can happen to those who defy their king, or their queen.”

“What about the Vale? Will it be included in the Crownlands as well?” Lord Redwyne asked, as if he was not sure he wanted to hear the answer.

“No. The Vale will become a province, a territory that will be ruled by a man of my choice. He will have no right over the Vale, no hereditary rights, and he will rule on my behalf and only on my behalf. For now, Nestor Royce will act as governor until I name another one.”

The lords around the table were all worried. Marcon was writing more quickly than ever. The queen resumed. “Doran Martell will be Prince of Dorne, Mace Tyrell will be High Marshal of the Reach and Warden of the South, Tyrion Lannister will be Lord of the Westerlands and Warden of the East, Edmure Tully will be Lord of the Riverlands and Lord Paramount of the Trident, and Sansa Lannister of House Stark will be Lady of Winterfell and Wardeness of the North.”

“Who shall be Warden of the East?” the Grand Maester asked.

“Me.” Marcon stopped to write again, and he looked to Daenerys. Tyrion saw a flash of excitement in his eyes, then he went back to write.

“You, Your Grace?” Lord Redwyne asked.

“Yes. Since the Crownlands include most of the lands in the east and that the Vale will be under my rule through a governor, it will be me.”

The rest of the small council meeting concerned questions like the return of the troops in the North to their homes and the measures to put into place to ensure the population of the Seven Kingdoms and the troops still at the Wall had enough food and shelter to last through winter. The Reach and the Vale were to provide most of the provisions to make sure the whole Seven Kingdoms didn’t starve through winter. Repairs on the docks of King’s Landing had to accelerate, and the gold cloaks were to be mobilized to help build more shelters in the city. Wells and aqueducts were to be rebuilt.
Financial help was to be provided by Casterly Rock and Illyrio Mopatis, a merchant of Pentos who supported Daenerys when she was in Essos. Daenerys also got a guarantee from Tyrion that Dothrakis could settle on the deserted lands of the North, where the White Walkers decimated the population. Tyrion said he would have to speak to his wife first, but he knew he and Sansa had no choice to accept. Dothrakis would cause fewer trouble in the North than if they were settled in the Crownlands or the Riverlands. And although you could reason Daenerys and try to change her mind, she expected everyone to obey her orders and follow her decisions once they were taken.

After the small council session, Tyrion found himself with his sister in her private apartments.

“So, do you think I’m crazy and mad like all the others?” she asked him directly.

“I’d say you were bold. Not mad or crazy, but bold, and shouldn’t a queen be bold?”

A small smile crept on her face. “They’ll have to get used to it. I’m not going to sit in my throne and let the world stay as he is. I intend to make it better.”

“Still, we must give the world the time to get better. When we try to make it better too quickly, it can backfire and turn worse. Change is a long process. Look at the Bay of Dragons.”

She looked down for a very short moment. The information they got from Essos were not very encouraging. The former masters were still trying to get back to power, and there were also quarrels with the Red Priests and among them. No matter what they did, some people would always believe in slavery on the other continent.

“I intend to make all my reforms all the same,” she stated, visibly determined. No one would make her change her mind on this.

“I know, and this is admirable from you, but you must give time to the high lords to accept these. Only by taking possession of two kingdoms for yourself and the title of Warden of the East you created quite a shock. If you had taken away their lands in the Stormlands, I am afraid they wouldn’t remain loyal to you for a long time.”

If not worse. When people couldn’t rebel, like when the queen had dragons and any rebellion was doomed to fail, they turned to assassination or other ways to bring down their rulers.

“I will not change my mind about a royal army, you know that,” she said.

“I know. Only, if they had heard in the same meeting that you annexed two kingdoms and created a permanent army for yourself, they could have rebelled against you on the spot, or plotted to all turn on you together as soon as the meeting was over.”

“They know what will happen to them if they dare to rebel.”

“Yes, but men are not always logical. Sometimes they rebel without thinking of the consequences. We must make sure your reforms can withstand the test of time. Aegon V made a lot of laws to reduce the power of the powerful over the weak and to make lives of the latter better, but when my… Tywin Lannister arrived as your father’s Hand, he repealed all of them.”

“That won’t happen. Anyway, for the royal army, the lords of Westeros don’t need to worry. The core of it will be my Unsullied.”

“Yes, but if you accept in your army the people from all over the Seven Kingdoms and free them from their oaths to all other lords and kings, that will be a cause of anger for the other lords. For now, it would be better to wait for the Unsullied to come back. Then you will announce that they are your permanent royal army, and after a year or two, you use the justification that Unsullied are not immortal and that some died to begin to recruit people from all over the Seven Kingdoms.”

She nodded, though it was obvious she was impatient. This queen had learned the hard way she couldn’t change everything in one night, but she was still upset she couldn’t change things more quickly.

“I will need you in the coming years,” she said. “I still don’t have to worry about you?”

“As I said, I have no interest in the Iron Throne. Casterly Rock is more than enough for me, and I can’t keep it if the truth comes out. So let’s keep it a secret. It will be better for you, for me, and for everyone in the Seven Kingdoms. I don’t think they want another Dance of Dragons.”

“Me neither.” She looked at the balcony, through the vast windows that allowed air and light to come in. “Ser Barristan told me there had been words of a relationship between my father and a lady of the Lannisters, but he assured me these were only gossips.”

“I guess they were more than that,” Tyrion commented. He wondered if Barristan Selmy ever wondered if he was the bastard son of the king he saved at Duskendale. Maybe he had even thought that Cersei and Jaime might be his children. After all, the rumors existed well before Tyrion was born, and his lady mother was a lady in waiting for Queen Rhaella many years before she was married.

“I don’t intend to be like my father. I don’t want to have anything to do with him. I don’t want my rule to be based on his own.”

“In this case, you might prefer to create a new dynasty with no links with him. Aegon came to Westeros with dragons, and he had no ancestors to base his claim on. He became king by right of conquest. You can do the same. It would also have the benefit to weaken any claim any other Targaryen would have.”

He showed his hands to her and smiled comically. She smiled in return. Tyrion turned serious again quite quickly though.

“Although, since we’re talking of dynasty, I know you broke your betrothal with Prince Trystane, but we should begin to think about finding another consort. Unless you want to put into place a new system to choose kings and queens. The Iron Islands, for all their flaws, have their own after all. Not all kings and queens are followed by their children or even by their heirs.”

The eyes of Daenerys turned dark, and her face showed sadness. “I cannot have children.” Tyrion frowned at that. “When I travelled in the Red Waste and I lost my child, the witch who helped me told me I could never have children again. My womb quickened. I will bear no other children. Not until the sun rises in the west and sets in the east.”

“Are you sure of that?” Tyrion asked, uncertain.

“My moonbloods have stopped, and I have lied with men and never got pregnant again.”

He saw how she was pained by this. He exhaled for a long time. He and Sansa were facing the same situation. Although sometimes he wondered if Serion Lannister had told the truth. What if the poison didn’t work? Sansa had her moonblood only a few days ago, so maybe she could still have children. Maybe he should have Marcon take a look at her.

“Are you really sure?” he asked again.
“Yes, I am. My dynasty will end with me.”

Tyrion looked away, lost in his thoughts. He had thought about a someone very specific to marry Daenerys, but now all went to dust. If Daenerys couldn’t have a child… then maybe the king consort he was thinking about could.

“What about Jon Snow?”

She turned to look at him, intrigued. “Jon Snow?”

“Well, he is your last relative alive, officially in the least. From what I know, he’s not unable to have children. If he was to marry, then his children could be your heirs.”

“Jon will not accept.”

“I can try to convince him. I’m quite good at persuading.”

“He’s in the Night’s Watch. He will refuse.”

“Let’s have him leave the Night’s Watch.”

“He won’t. Anyway, he can’t. He took his vows again.”

“I’m not sure we can take vows to the Night’s Watch twice. Furthermore, the White Walkers are no longer a threat and there are plenty of men at the Wall. They can do without one.”

“Even if you managed to persuade him to leave the Night’s Watch, who would he marry?”

Tyrion smiled. The idea had come to his mind as soon as his sister was no longer a possible bride for Jon Snow.

Chapter End Notes

The map of Westeros changed within a single meeting of the small council. One kingdom was integrated into another, another one was converted into a province, and the Iron Islands are independant.

Beyond this, Daenerys is establishing her authority. In Meereen, Daenerys ruled as an absolute queen, unlike the kings and queens of Westeros. During the first centuries of medieval ages in Europe, the true power lied more with the lords, dukes, earls, counts and other minor lords than with the kings. Kings and queens relied on their bannermen to hold their power. A shift occured by the end of Middle Age as the power moved to the monarchs, culminating in France with the absolute monarchy of Louis XIV. The Targaryens managed to be closer to absolute monarchs while they had dragons, but after the dragons died they relied on their alliances with powerful families to maintain their power over all Westeros, and Robert, Joffrey and Tommen had to do the same. Daenerys has dragons, so she's shifting to a politic model where she holds more power, like in Meereen, and she begins to put it into place by placing two kingdoms under her direct authority, and she plans to create a permanent royal army with the Unsullied as the core. The creation of permanent royal armies in medieval times were the signs that monarchs could apply their power to all their lands and not rely on temporary armies made of peasants only in times of war.
And for those who regretted that Jon Snow might spend the rest of his life to the Wall, there might be some hope for you now.

Next chapter: Sansa
The sun was beginning to make its appearance on the horizon. Sansa looked to the other side of the bed, empty. Tyrion had left yesterday for the Wall, and she already missed him. She could barely get a few hours of sleep tonight.

She had been so relieved to see the man she loved again, to see Tyrion not follow his father’s path. They had managed to speak to each other again, to get through their loss together. However, Tyrion was gone again now. It wasn’t the first time they were separated, but the first time it happened she discovered a plot of Littlefinger against him, and the second time she was kidnapped, and Joanna was taken away from them, forever. She tried to tell herself not to worry, but she was still afraid to lose Tyrion. Not in the same way, of course. When she heard that he spared the Westerlings, she had been relieved like she had never been in her whole life. She still feared he might turn into Tywin Lannister again, but she was also afraid anything might befall him while he was at the Wall. She heard there were still wights, and although they said the White Walkers were gone, she wasn’t ready to believe it so easily. After losing Joanna, she couldn’t support losing Tyrion as well, not when he already came back to her when she feared he might disappear.

The night before his departure had been wonderful. It was the first time they laid together as husband and wife since they were reunited. Sansa had almost forgotten what it was to actually be with him. Now she missed him.

She got out of bed and called for her handmaid. Once she was dressed and prepared for the day, she walked out to find Arya standing in front of her door.

“Did you sleep tonight?” Sansa asked her little sister.

“Aye, but not long.”

“You don’t have to stand guard in front of my door, you know.”

“I don’t sleep as much as you do. Or perhaps I sleep more than you but spend less time in bed.”

Something on Sansa’s face must have betrayed her. As they walked through the corridors of the Red Keep, they met several people, including handmaidens, guards, knights and other noble lords. When they crossed the path of a man and his wife talking in ushered voices to each other, Sansa followed them with her eyes even when they moved behind her.

“You miss your husband?” Arya asked her.

“Yes, I do.”

“You still won’t tell me where he went?”
“I can’t.”

Arya sighed, discouraged. “You tell him everything, he tells you everything, but you don’t tell me everything, even if I’m your sister.”

“I’m sorry, Arya. We just agreed to tell no one. It’s too important. If Jaime Lannister was still here, Tyrion would have told him nothing either.”

She hoped that Tyrion would tell him nothing. He told Sansa everything about the revelations his brother did, right after his visit, in the very few hours preceding the trial. Sansa had been horrified the first time she heard the story. Now it was even worse. Tyrion was broken by the truth. Sansa thought he would certainly have sentenced his own brother to death if he had the chance, and she would have agreed. Tywin Lannister had truly poisoned everyone in this family. But now, she was relieved that Daenerys spared Jaime Lannister. She hadn’t thought about right away, too horrified that she was by the revelation of the truth about Tysha, but she feared Tyrion might have gone back to his father’s ways had his bother been executed.

“He went in the North, didn’t he?” her sister asked.

“How do you know that?” She couldn’t catch herself before it was too late. She dropped her guard with Arya. Her sister was smiling cunningly.

“I saw him heading north when he left with Viserion. He must be going quite far to travel by dragon’s back.”

“I won’t tell you more, Arya,” Sansa warned her.

“Have it your way. But you don’t deny it. He’s going far away.”

“Anyone traveling on a dragon must go somewhere far away.”

“You confirm it.”

Sansa rolled her eyes, and Arya imitated her. They ended up laughing as they entered the gardens. Arya kept following her. She was acting like some sort of personal guard, and with the two swords she carried, she had indeed the required weapons and appearance for a guard. Sansa thought about Brienne, who died fighting near the walls of this very castle. She joined her father, and now Evenfall was empty.

“You really like it here?” Arya wondered.

“Not that much. I prefer the godswood but the gardens are where Margaery prefers to be.”

They only needed to make a few more steps and to turn a corner to see Sansa’s friend sitting on a bench. She stood, an honest smile on her face.

“Sansa. I’m happy to see you. How are you?”

“I’m fine.”

“Are you sure? You look a little pale.” It was obvious that she didn’t sleep a lot.

“She misses her husband,” Arya explained.

Margaery smiled with empathy. “I understand. What about you, Arya?”
Her little sister shrugged. “I’m fine.”

Margaery turned back her attention to Sansa. She was in much better terms with Sansa than with Arya. “Let’s walk a little.”

They progressed side by side through the garden, Arya staying behind. Sansa knew she was eyeing Margaery very closely. Arya didn’t trust her. Sansa tried in vain to convince her sister that Margaery was a friend, she wouldn’t stop watching her.

“I loved this garden better during summer,” Margaery said. Indeed, snow covered the alleys and were dying. Sansa and Margaery both wore heavy cloaks to keep themselves warm.

“I’m afraid the flowers will not bloom before many years,” Sansa added. It was a sorry spectacle indeed, all these dead flowers that had been so gorgeous before. Sansa could barely enjoy their beauty while she was in King’s Landing, with all her problems with Joffrey and the Lannisters back then.

“I’ve never seen the queen here. Do you think she dislikes gardens?”

“I don’t know. I guess she’s too busy to visit them, and anyway they’re not in a very good state during this season.”

“I thought you may know more of her tastes, considering you see her every day.” There was a hint of blame in Margaery’s voice. Sansa knew why. When she arrived in the capital after the Crag, Margaery had been there for her. In view of the death of Joanna, Margaery had revealed to Sansa the truth about her own child. Very few people knew about it. Sansa didn’t talk about it to anyone else, not even Arya who followed them right now, and not even Tyrion.

“She comes to visit me every day, indeed,” Sansa acknowledged. “She’s lost her son too, so she can understand what I’m going through. There are few women here who can say they lost their baby.”

Sansa looked at Margaery to make her understand that she was included in that sentence. “Yes, I know,” Margaery replied. Sansa perceived that Margaery didn’t entirely share the same feelings towards the queen.

“She’s not a monster like her father or Joffrey or Cersei. I can’t imagine her murdering children.”

Margaery looked away and sighed. “I know that I would probably do the same if I was in her place. She is the queen now, after all. But I can’t help but hate her. She took away something very dear to me.”

“I know. I’m sorry.”

They continued to walk together, taking news of their families.

“My grandmother says she will come for the coronation in two months. She’s not eager at all to come back here, but she wants to see me,” she confided.

“I’ll be happy to see her again,” Sansa told her friend.

“She and my father will probably try to get an authorization to send me back to Highgarden. I wish them good luck. My father is probably already looking for a new husband for me, but without the new queen’s approval, I’m condemned to celibacy.” Sansa said nothing and let Margaery talk. “I’m not sure anyway many men will want to marry me, I had three husbands and the three of them are dead.”

“Maybe not, but I’ll make sure the fourth doesn’t try to be king. It might reduce the chances for him to die. Look at your own husband. He never tried to be king, and he’s still alive, while all the people who tried to be king or queen in Westeros are gone.”

“All except Daenerys Targaryen.”

“And Yara Greyjoy,” Margaery recognized. “But I don’t intend to tempt fate. My days of dreaming to be queen are over. I don’t want to see other people I love die because of my family’s ambitions. I don’t want to see anyone die because someone wants to sit on a throne.”

Sansa couldn’t agree more. She saw enough suffering for her entire life. The image of her little girl drowning came to her mind.

After her walk in the gardens with Margaery, Sansa went to read the ravens sent by Casterly Rock and replied to them. In Tyrion’s absence, she had to take care of the problems referred to him. Margaery was spending some time with the ladies of Highgarden that her father brought for her. They were not the ladies-in-waiting she had before. Almost all were dead, killed on Cersei’s order, and Sansa knew it was no longer the same for Margaery to spend time with friends, not after the loss of her brother, her separation from her child, and all the ordeals she went through. Sansa was well placed to know what it was to see your world collapse.

Following the lunch, Margaery and Sansa crossed path again in the Great Hall when Daenerys held court. Many people had issues to bring forward, from lords to the common people. Among the commoners, requests mostly concerned needs for shelter and food, or claims of injustice and mistreatment committed by the gold cloaks or the other soldiers. Lords complained about taxes and the burden of welcoming refugees on their lands, and in their streets for those who managed towns. There was also a representative of the Iron Bank of Braavos today. He claimed that he only wanted to make sure the new queen would honor the debts the crown had towards the Iron Bank. Daenerys declared that she wasn’t the one who spent the millions of golden dragons the previous regimes borrowed from the bank. In fact, she was very blunt, stating the Iron Bank should only blame itself for lending money to Robert Baratheon and his successors, considering it was obvious they wouldn’t be able to pay back. She declared that she would speak privately with the representative later, to settle any financial problems the bank may have with her.

When the court was cleared and people left the Throne Room, Sansa was approached by one of the queen’s men.

“Lady Lannister, the queen wishes to speak with you. She’s asking you to wait for her in your apartments. It is a very urgent matter.”

Sansa went immediately to her apartment, Arya still with her. When they came back to her rooms, Arya remained outside, probably to welcome the queen when she would arrive Sansa closed the door behind her. Someone was sitting in front of the hearth.

“Sansa, I was waiting for you.”

She knew this voice. A sweet, melodious voice, who sang at her second wedding. The woman stood up and faced Sansa, her red robe and brown hair swirling around as she turned, her green eyes setting on Sansa, her hands crossed before her.

“Kinvara.” Sansa did her best to hide her surprise, something she had elevated to an art. “I didn’t expect to find you here. I didn’t know you were back.”
“I just came back.”

“You were gone a long time. No one knew where you were.”

“Sometimes it is better to stay in the dark to serve the light.”

“I thought you were gone to accompany another priest until he left Westeros.”

“I was, but he had something to do before he left. You see, he didn’t leave alone. You see, some people are not made to be alone.”

“Well, I’m happy to see you well.”

Sansa wasn’t sure, however, if she was happy to see the High Priestess. She always felt strange in her presence. The woman saved her from Littlefinger and the Arryns, she even killed Littlefinger, and she was also the one to bring back Tyrion from the dead, but she couldn’t help but feel uncomfortable in her presence. The fact she entered her rooms without her permission wasn’t making it better.

“What about you, Sansa? Are you well?”

“Yes, I’m fine.”

Kinvara shook her head. “You’re not.”

Her eyes only showed compassion, but Sansa couldn’t shake the feeling there was more to it. “I’m as well as I can be.”

“That is true.” She wasn’t judging Sansa, and again, she was sure there was something more behind this.

“How did you get in there?”

“I opened the door.”

Sansa tried to change of subject. “I never thanked you for saving my lord husband.”

Kinvara raised a hand. “You don’t need to thank me for anything, Sansa. I’m only doing what the Lord wants me to do. Do you remember when I told you how I lost a daughter, a long time ago?”

Her expression had taken a much sorrowful turn. “Yes, I recall, in the Vale.” She had abandoned her daughter before she became a priestess.

“We turn our back on who we’ve been when we join the orders, but what the person before us did isn’t erased. It stays. Take yourself. Are you the same woman today than who you were when you left Winterfell?”

“No.”

“Does that make your past actions less real?”

“No.” Sansa remembered her father’s death.

“We cannot change the past, but we can change the future.”

She looked to somewhere on her left and on Sansa’s right. She followed the priestess’ gaze to fall “Men like Petyr Baelish always lie when it is in their interest, Sansa. And I know these men and when it is in their interest to lie.”

Footsteps, a closed door, maybe the barely perceptible sound of tissue sliding on the floor. That was all Sansa heard, without really realizing she heard them. For all she could do was to look. On the couch… She stood there for she didn’t know how long. Somehow, Sansa's legs moved her until she was right before it. Then she knelt to be at the right level. The green eyes met the blue ones. The blond hair, that would have been shining in the sun, did not change. She looked to Sansa, quietly, examining her.

“Mama?”

Sansa realized she was crying. She grew up, but it was her, and she was there, alive.

“Joanna.”

That was all she could say in a wavering voice, and all she needed to say. Her daughter was alive, and she was smiling at her, raising her little arm to her.

“Mama.”

Chapter End Notes

For everyone who asked if Joanna was still alive, you have your answer.

Next chapter: Jon
The dark shape of Castle Black was visible. The day was coming to an end, and Jon was eager to be back to the castle. He knew he wouldn’t find much rest there. Too much work remained to be done. He spent the whole day trying to solve quarrels between different Free Folk tribes. They were already difficult to control when Mance was alive. Tormund barely succeeded, and now he was gone. Toregg, his son, did his best, and although his father prepared him, he was young and needed to assert his authority, which he had no choice but to do in the way of the Free Folk. That meant a lot of dead bodies and broken bones.

At least he could get a warm meal and work with a fire burning in the hearth. It would be work until late in the night, but with some heat, not like the cold that seemed to be piercing his skin right now. It seemed that winter didn’t need the White Walkers to make its existence known to everyone. Sometimes, Jon feared one of them would appear in the blizzard. So far, it didn't happen.

The gates were opened as soon as the men recognized him. Some men were still working outside in the courtyard. A storm was coming, and they were preparing for it. They may be buried under snow for days if not longer. The remaining tunnels under Castle Black would be very useful in that case. Jon was glad he sent men to unblock the tunnels. Many more would work on it during the snow storm if they remained stuck inside.

As he unhorsed, Edd walked to him. “Lord Commander.”

Jon had gotten used to be called this way again very quickly. The vote had been quick. All the remaining sworn brothers chose him without discussion at the first turn. He didn’t know if they chose him because he was the best candidate, or because there was no other true choice. Edd had been designated as the candidate by someone, but he had been the first to say he would be the worst Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch they could find, as his time while Jon was King in the North proved it. Jon didn’t share Edd’s opinion, but in the end almost everyone voted for him and here he was, 999th Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, after he was the 998th.

“Edd. Glad to see Castle Black didn’t collapse in my absence.”

“I’m as surprised as you’re glad of it. How much trouble did you have with the wildlings?”

“No more than usual.”

“That means a lot of trouble, you know that?”

“We both know that, Edd.”

He nodded. “There’s someone waiting for you in your office.”
“I’ll go and see him soon.” For now, all Jon wanted was a bowl of stew with his men, to breathe if only for a few minutes.

“I think you’ll want to see him right away. I wouldn’t have someone sent by the queen wait if I were you.”

“The queen?”

“Aye. Better go and see him right away. If she sent him, it must important as hell. He said it was urgent.”

Jon walked to his office. Inside, candles were lit near his desk, and a small man covered in furs waited for him, a horn in one hand.

“You’d think after thousands of years, the Night’s Watch would have learned how to make a good ale,” he told Jon before taking a sip. He didn’t seem much bothered by the taste. “It’s a chance for you that I can drink almost anything, even though I prefer vintage.”

“Tyrion. What are you doing here?”

The small man pulled a seemingly offended face. “Glad to see you too, Jon Snow.”

“Edd told me you had something urgent to tell me.”

“Urgent? No. Important, yes, but urgent, I wouldn’t say so. At least not yet. Things that are not urgent today can be urgent tomorrow, or the next month, or in a few years. I suppose anything that’s not urgent becomes urgent one day if we haven’t dealt with it before it became urgent.”

Jon sighed, then allowed himself to laugh. “Welcome to Castle Black, my lord.” They shook hands and Jon took place behind his office. “How did you come here?”

“Viserion, of course.” Jon should have known. “He’s hunting right now. He’ll be back when I need him.”

“I’m afraid you’ll be stuck here for quite some time. There’s a storm coming.”

Tyrion grimaced. “And here I thought all this snow and this wind was just a normal northern winter.”

“It is, but storms are normal in the North during this season.”

“Well, it seems I’ll have to suffer living at the Wall for some time. If this goes on, people will believe I am a sworn brother of the Night’s Watch me too.”

“I wish I could convince you to be one of us. We need clever men right now.”

“Thanks for the offer, but I don’t believe your aunt would appreciate that if her Hand chose to join the Night’s Watch. She’s already disappointed that her nephew chose the Wall over her.”

“She told you that?”

Tyrion sighed heavily and drank. His face didn’t show disgust, but he slightly shook his head and put down the horn he was drinking from. “Yes, she did. I’m her Hand, so she tells me a lot of things, and I hear a lot of things as well.”

Jon remembered how Daenerys looked like when she understood he wouldn’t come to King’s Landing with her. “I’m sorry that she feels like that, but my place is here, at the Wall.”

“Is it?” Tyrion showed skepticism.

“Yes, it is.”

“Have you found any White Walker since your expedition in the north?”

“No. There are wights. Our men come upon them once upon a time, and we have reports from the castles near the Gift that wights are spotted on their lands.”

“I suppose half the people who claim to have seen wights only imagined they did.”

“Maybe, but the other half actually saw them,” Jon replied.

“No arguing on that. Are the wights really a threat though?”

“Depends. When our men find them, most of the time they don’t seem to know what they’re doing, but they fight if attacked, and some deaths were reported among the population.”

“How many deaths?”

It was Jon’s turn to sigh. “I don’t have an official counting.”

“Would you say there are deaths every day, every week?”

“Every week, probably.”

“And you have enough men to deal with them?”

“Aye. They’re disorganized. It’s more a hunt than anything else. Northmen are strong, and they know how to fight. We won’t need the southern troops for long.”

“I know. We receive your reports in King’s Landing.”

“Then why have you come?”

Jon was glad to see Tyrion again, but he had a lot of work to do and didn’t have much time to spare for his friend. Tyrion straightened on his seat. He was about to talk about the real matter of his presence.

“We have a problem, Jon Snow. A problem that might endanger all the Seven Kingdoms eventually.”

“What is it?” Jon was all ears opened. They already had a lot of challenges to face, but he couldn’t turn his back on something that threatened people he swore to protect.

“Daenerys is barren.”

Jon was stunned for a moment. That was not what he expected at all. “What?”

“She cannot have children.”

Jon shook his head. “I know. I get it. What I mean is… How?”

“To make it simple, let’s just say she lost her ability to have children after her miscarriage. She has not bled since then, and none of the sexual relations she had ever since led to pregnancy.”
Jon remained still for a moment, assimilating the news, then fell back in his chair. “I didn’t know.”

“That’s not something many women like to talk about,” Tyrion muttered. “However, it poses a problem that goes beyond the queen’s desire to have children. The problem lies in the fact that she is the queen.

“Of course.” Jon hadn’t thought about this right away, but this was no secret to everyone with that information. “If Daenerys cannot have children, then she will have no one to succeed her.”

“There. Even if she gets married, and I doubt she ever will in her circumstances, after her death, there’s no one to take the crown. The Seven Kingdoms will fall into chaos and a war will decide who will sit on the Iron Throne, and that is if someone succeeds. The last century proved how difficult it was to keep seven kingdoms united without dragons.”

“What are you going to do?”

“Well, I may have a solution, but I don’t think you’ll like it.”

Tyrion was staring straight at him. “No.” Jon knew what he was thinking about, and it was out of the question.

“There are only two Targaryens left in this world. You are the only one who can be her heir.”

Jon scoffed. “I swore a vow to the Night’s Watch.”

“And this vow ended the day you died.”

“I swore it again.”

“It is questionable that a man can make the same vow twice. Has it ever happened in the history of the Night’s Watch?”

“Probably not, but that’s not the question.”

“Of course, it is. We can use it as an excuse to make you leave the Watch, while not creating a precedent that could be used by everyone else to desert it. You’re the only one who can claim he swore the vows twice.”

“That’s ridiculous. You’re trying to use any excuse you can find to get me out of the Night’s Watch.”

“Of course, I am. That is the only way for the Seven Kingdoms to not fall into chaos after Daenerys is gone. She cannot have children. If you are released from your vows and able to marry and have children, all this problem is solved.”

Jon couldn’t believe what he was hearing. “You want to use me so I can give nephews and nieces to Daenerys?”

“I wouldn’t say it that way, but yes, just like your brother Robb did when he made his will and chose you as his heir if he died childless.”

“That’s not the same thing.”

“Yes, it is, Jon Snow, and you know that.”

Jon sighed and stared at his friend. “I won’t do it. My time as king is over. I have a duty to stay here, to protect the Seven Kingdoms.”

“Yes, I know. You are the shield that guards the realms of men. But have you ever wondered if the best way to protect the realms of men was not to freeze your balls at the Wall?”

Ser Davos told him a similar thing once. “My place is here, at the Wall. People need me here. I am their Lord Commander.”

“People need you much more somewhere else.”

“I made my choice a long time ago. And I won’t change my mind?”

“Why? Can you explain to me why you’re so set on spending the rest of your days at the Wall? The White Walkers are gone, and the wights are no more a threat for the people than bears or other wild animals. You are not needed here. We have more than enough men to repair the Wall and to guard it. Why won’t you leave it?”

Jon inhaled deeply to calm himself. “There are many reasons.”

“Well, tell me then.”

“First, I swore a vow, no matter what you say, this is important to me. When too many people make false promises, words stop meaning anything. Then there are only lies, and lies won’t help the world in any way. Second, there are people who count on me here, brothers that I abandoned when I rode south to Winterfell, and I refuse to abandon them again. But the main reason is that my place is at the Wall. I am the bastard of Winterfell, or the bastard of the Tower of Joy, whether I am Jon Snow or Jon Sand or whatever my name is doesn’t matter. My place is not on the throne, or anywhere near it. My parents started a war, and I refuse to be the possible cause of a future war. I refuse to take a chance that somehow, a war could start because of my presence in the south.”

Maester Aemon had made this choice a long time ago, and he had lived with that. Jon couldn’t say he was happy to make this choice, but he was ready to live with it as well.

Tyrion Lannister looked at him as if he was a child of ten. “You may be more Ned Stark’s son than Rhaegar’s.”

“Yes, he’s the man who raised me.”

“Yes, and honor was very important for Ned Stark. He got killed for that.”

“Joffrey killed him.”

“True, but if Ned Stark hadn’t wanted to do the honorable thing, he might have stopped Joffrey before he got killed, and this war that destroyed your family might never have happened. Sometimes you have to do dishonorable things to make the right choice.”

Tyrion leaned towards him. “Now, let’s talk about your vows. What is it? Night gathers, and now my watch begins. It shall not end until my death, and it goes on. I think at one moment you must say I shall live and die at my post. I am the sword in the darkness, I am the watcher on the walls. I am the shield that guards the realms of men. Am I right?”

“Yes, you are.”

“Well, a wise man once told me that the best way to help the most people might not be sitting in a frozen castle at the hedge of the world.” Tyrion smiled as Jon remembered when he heard this. “Ser Davos is doing quite well with the Dreadfort. I stopped there on my way. Second, you will not abandon your sworn brothers by leaving them, because you will probably prevent future wars, and wars are everything but helpful to the Night’s Watch. As for being a bastard and cause for possible future wars, you are more likely to be a cause for future war if you stay here than if you go in the capital and accept to be your aunt’s heir. And being a bastard almost means nothing now. Look at us. You’ve been named Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch twice and King in the North once, and I am Lord of Casterly Rock and Hand of the Queen.”

“You’re not a bastard, you know it.”

“Yes, I am, Jon Snow. I know it better than anyone.”

All dwarves are bastards in their father’s eyes. He said that to him a long time ago, the first time they met. “I will not go.”

Tyrion sighed in despair. “We’re giving you the chance to get married, to have children and start a family, and to see those children become kings and queens one day. And you’re going to say no?”

“And who would want to marry me?” Jon asked, meaning that no one would want to marry a bastard.

“Margaery Tyrell.”

Jon looked carefully to his friend to be sure he wasn’t lying. “Margaery Tyrell?”

“She’s already agreed. We only need your approval. Don’t act as if it’s surprising. After all, she would be marrying the heir of the Iron Throne. It’s barely a step below marrying a king, and the three she was wed to were pretenders.”

“I guess she hopes to see her children on the Iron Throne one day.”

“Probably,” Tyrion conceded. “I suppose she also hopes that her fourth marriage will be the right one. The first three didn’t end very well.”

“That’s reassuring.”

“You know I will not go, Tyrion. Why have you come?”

“Because I do not share your certainty, Jon Snow. You are stubborn, but that didn’t stop you from getting the wildlings south of the Wall when no one else would. It didn’t stop you either from accepting to become king when we needed it. When it’s necessary, you can do what is necessary. Well, this is the case again. You swore to be the shield that guards the realms of men. Here at Castle Black there is no shield you can be that another man couldn’t be. But in King’s Landing, you have a role to play that you and only you can play.”

Tyrion stood up. “Sleep on it, Jon Snow, or Aegon Targaryen if you prefer.”

He left Jon’s office. The Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch got out of the room to dine with his men later. He didn’t talk during dinner, lost in his thoughts. Daenerys and their last discussion came back to his mind. She had looked very sad that he wasn’t coming with her. Jon still struggled with the fact she was his aunt. Accepting that the Targaryens were his family as much as the Starks wasn’t something easy to cope with.
When he was done with his dinner and walked outside, Ghost came to join him. He was back from the hunt. Jon caressed his white fur. Ghost was alone, just as he was. All his brothers and sisters were gone, either dead, nowhere to be found or far away. Jon thought about Bran, who left for the north… with Benjen. Jon hadn’t known what to do when his uncle rode away with his little brother. Benjen disappeared north of the Wall a long time ago. Everyone thought he was dead. The only time they thought they knew something about what happened to him was when Jon’s men lured him into a trap, telling him a wildling saw Benjen. It was only a lie meant to have him killed, and it worked. Jon felt the scars on his chest for a moment.

What had happened to Benjen? It was him, for sure, but he looked different, as if he was… As if he was dead and brought back to life. Ghost was standing still in front of him, allowing Jon to pass his hand through his fur without complaints. He was the last direwolf still with his master. Nymeria may be alive somewhere, but Arya had not seen her since her journey to King’s Landing so many years ago. All the others were dead.

“What are we gonna do, boy?” Jon asked him. Ghost looked at him, not giving any answer, though Jon felt he understood what he was going through.

The storm was approaching, and winds were getting stronger, but that didn’t stop Jon from seeing the dragon fly and land on the Wall, far over their heads. Jon and Ghost must look like ants to him from his position. Stark and Targaryen blood ran equally through his veins, but Jon didn’t feel like a Targaryen. He never did. He always wanted to be a Stark, and always felt like a Stark. Almost. There were times he didn’t feel like one, because he was a bastard. Wasn’t it? He felt different from his brothers and sisters because they didn’t have the same mother, or so he thought, not because he was a Targaryen.

All of a sudden, he wished Maester Aemon was still alive. There were so many things he needed to know. He could have asked questions to Daenerys, but he never really tried to know more about his other family. She was miles away, in King’s Landing. The closest living being that connected him to his father was the dragon that sat on top of the Wall. Rhaegal gave his life to defeat the White Walkers. Two dragons remained, and just like the two Targaryens who remained, one was in the south, the other in the north.

Jon’s steps brought him to the winch cage. They had repaired it not long ago. Ghost followed him. Before he stepped into the cage, Jon looked up to the dragon, then down to the wolf.

“Stay here, boy.” He wasn’t sure of how the dragon and the direwolf would react in the presence of each other. Jon left his wolf behind as the cage brought him up to the dragon, Ghost reducing to a point on the ground while Viserion kept growing as Jon approached.

When Jon reached the top of the Wall and got out of the cage, he only made a few steps before he realized Viserion wasn’t alone. Tyrion was there, standing next to him. Dragon and man were looking north. Jon couldn’t help but find it odd that the small man stood next to Viserion, the small dragon Daenerys named after the brother she despised.

“You want to admire the view, Jon Snow? I’d have thought that you’d be bored by now,” Tyrion said as he noticed his presence.

“I haven’t come for the view,” Jon replied.

“Why have you come then?”

“I guess I’m looking for answers.” Tyrion and Viserion were both looking at him, green and golden eyes fixing Jon.
“Answers to what?”

“Questions, I guess.”

Tyrion smiled, recognizing a joke of his own style. “Well, ask. Maybe I can answer, and this might help you in your decision.”

Jon brushed aside the decision for now. “How can you ride Viserion?”

That was the first question to come to his mind. He couldn’t ask Tyrion many questions about the Targaryens. He wasn’t one. But he could ask him questions about dragons. His friend was fascinated by them.

“The same way you and Daenerys can ride one.”

For a long moment, Jon and Tyrion just looked to each other. Then Tyrion just shot another mocking smile and looked north again. Jon met Viserion’s eyes, who kept staring at him to the opposite of Tyrion. Jon forced his eyes back on his friend.

“What are you talking about?” he asked, confused.

“You remember when I told you I used to dream I had a dragon? Well, you did the same kind of dreams, and so did our queen.”

Another long moment went by. Jon’s brain was in a haze. “That’s impossible.”

Tyrion grimaced. “If that was impossible, I wouldn’t be here.”

“How? That can’t be. You were born at Casterly Rock. Your mother was…”

“Joanna Lannister. She’s my mother, no doubt about it. I came out of her. But I didn’t come out of Tywin Lannister.”

“Who?”

Tyrion inhaled deeply before he answered. “The Mad King. He raped her. Don’t be so surprised. The man was ready to burn down an entire city to ashes. Does that surprise you that he would rape the wife of his Hand? And that the Hand in question would let him do in the hope that his daughter would be queen?”

Jon was horrified. Not only by the revelations, but also how calm Tyrion looked as he said it.

“I hope it’s not one of your jokes, for there’s nothing funny about it.”

“I’m not jesting, Jon Snow. I am the bastard son of Aerys Targaryen the Mad King and Joanna Lannister, half-brother to Daenerys Targaryen and half-uncle to the man standing right before me who’s freezing his balls because he’s not close enough to a dragon.”

Jon shook, still unable to believe what he heard. “What’s going on? Is everyone in the world a secret Targaryen?”

“It might be difficult to prove out of any doubt, but we might well be the only three left.”

Jon sighed, unbelieving. “So, you’re my uncle?”

“Yes, Snow. I am. I wish my nephew was a little less gloomy.”
“Does Daenerys know about this?”

“Yes, she does.”

“Well, it seems she has the heir she needs after all.”

“Are you dumb?” Jon was surprised by the question. “You really think I can be her heir?”

“Why not? You are her brother…”

“Don’t tell anyone.” From the tone of his voice, it was a warning. “What do you think? That I can go before everyone in the Seven Kingdoms and proclaim I am the bastard son of the Mad King? I can’t. Daenerys needs me to rule Casterly Rock. The moment the truth comes out, I’m a dead man. House Lannister and the Westerlands rebel against me. Anyway, I’m not even sure I can have children now.”

The last sentence was almost said in a whisper. “What do you mean?”

Another sigh accompanied the response. “When I found Sansa in the Vale, we met one of the men who conspired to kidnap her. He said Littlefinger poisoned her. She will never be able to have children again.”

The shock was greater than for the news of Tyrion being a Targaryen. “That can’t be.”

“As if Joanna’s death wasn’t enough.”

“What?” This time, it was as if someone struck him to the stomach. Tyrion looked at him as if he was a stranger, then his mouth opened.

“You didn’t know?” He looked on the ground. “Littlefinger killed her. One of his men dropped her in the sea.”

“No.”

Jon was breathless. He leaned against a wall of snow. He remembered seeing Sansa with her child. What kind of a monster killed a baby? He looked to Tyrion, who kept gazing far away.

“I’m sorry.”

“News travel slowly. I suppose you don’t know what I did in the Westerlands.”

“What have you done?” Jon asked, unaware of what Tyrion was talking about.

“It doesn’t matter. It’s done. I don’t know what would have happened without Sansa.”

Jon didn’t push the matter further. “How is Sansa?”

“What do you think? Her daughter is dead.”

“She must be broken.”

“Worse.”

“Does she know? About you?”

“I would never hide anything from her.” He sighed. “She’s just relieved I’m no longer burning castles down. And that’s the problem.”

Jon nodded. “I heard about he Eyrie.”

“No one was inside. We only burned down the castle, not people.”

“I know. Daenerys made it clear in her message.”

Tyrion turned to face him. “She needs you, you know. More than anyone else. You won’t help here at the Wall. The White Walkers are gone. We both know it. The wights will be gone soon enough too.”

“Probably, but they could come back. Bran told me so before he left.”

Tyrion nodded. “Tell me, could the Night’s Watch hold the dead on its own?”

“No,” Jon recognized after a moment.

“Could the dead be defeated with a Westeros divided in seven kingdoms, all vying for power and occupied to fight each other while the real threat is advancing on them?”

“No.”

“Well, if a united Westeros is necessary to keep the dead at bay, and if you really want to protect Westeros from them, then I suggest you figure a way to keep the Seven Kingdoms united once Daenerys is gone. Because I can’t see a way right now, not if you stay at the Wall. Take care, Snow.”

Tyrion patted his arm as he walked past Jon. Before he disappeared at the corner he threw, “As miserable as you are, Jon Snow, at least your parents loved each other, and you grew up with a nice family. Daenerys and I cannot say the same.”

Jon was alone at the top of the Wall. Well, not really alone. Viserion was there, staring at him. Two pools of molten gold were fixed on Jon, and he was conscious of it. They kept staring at him. Jon stayed there for a long time, and the storm kept getting stronger. Finally, he went down. The cage swayed as it carried him back to Castle Black. Ghost was no longer waiting for him in the courtyard.

He spent the whole night pacing in his room, thinking. In the morning, he went to see Tyrion.

SANSA XXXIX

The sheets were comfortable. Sansa rolled in them. She felt better, too much better, at each new position she took. A light breeze, cold but light, caressed her skin where the sheets didn’t cover her body. Her red hair fell on her back and her shoulders, providing some protection from the cold air of winter. She rested her cheek against the pillow, her belly against the bed, her legs entangled. Her arm wandered to her right, where…

Nothing. She opened her eyes to find the other side of the bed empty. Straightening, she looked around. Their bedchamber was filled with furniture, but no living being was to be seen. Her heart rate quickened. She got up from bed, her body suddenly exposed to the cold, and pulled on a nightgown very quickly.

Slowly, carefully, she walked to the closest door, then as slowly and carefully as she walked, she opened it. Through the slit, she saw a small frame sitting in a chair, reading a book. She sighed in relief and berated herself in silence. It happened sometimes in the last two months that she would be worried of not finding Tyrion where she expected him to be. She would need time to lose this instinct to fear the worst.

Her husband looked up from his book and smiled warmly when he saw Sansa looking at him through the door. He then brought a finger to his mouth, indicating her to remain silent. Sansa just opened the door enough to enter, then she closed it and walked to her husband to lay down a kiss on his lips.

“Still fearing that I’ll disappear?” he asked in a whisper.

Sansa looked away, unable to let a smile grow on her lips. She and Tyrion knew each other too well. They didn’t need to talk to know how each other felt during the period that followed Joanna’s disappearance.

She brought her attention to the second person that caused her the most worries in her life. Her daughter had grown up. She could crawl on the floor, and Grand Maester Marcon said it wouldn’t be long before she could walk. For now, she was sleeping, quiet as a lake in a day without wind.

It was two months now since she was brought back to her. Sansa believed she was dead, lost forever. Then, out of nowhere, a woman came to her, and she was there, her daughter. Joanna had been alive that whole time. Littlefinger couldn’t kill her. She was too precious for his possible plans. He hid her in the Fingers, where he grew up, somewhere no one would think to look. No one but Kinvara, it seemed.

Tyrion had been speechless when he came back from his trip at the Wall. He didn’t understand when he saw her so happy at his return, until Sansa led him to their chambers and showed him their little Joanna, alive and well. They both cried of joy that day. A feast was given that evening, and Sansa didn’t remember being so happy, or seeing Tyrion happier. Their daughter was back.

With Joanna’s return, everything changed. She and Tyrion already had their doubts concerning Serion Lannister’s declaration that she was barren. According to the new Grand Maester, there was nothing to prove that she could no longer have children. Now that they knew he lied about their daughter, he most likely lied about that too. Sansa was full of hope for the future. Each time she looked at her daughter, joy threatened to overcome her.

She and her husband remained in silence in the room, their daughter sleeping next to them. None of them dared to wake her up. They just stood there, looking at their child. At one point, their hands were joined. The world was perfect. No war, no winter, no politics or plots, just her, the man she loved, and her daughter.

It didn’t last, for everything was destined to end. The door opened to give way to Willia, her personal handmaiden. “My lord, my lady, please excuse me, but it’s time to prepare.”

And so they went back to reality. They had to leave their little daughter behind and to prepare for the day. Sansa couldn’t blame anyone for that. Today was indeed a very important day. Willia helped her to don a red gown with grey stripes. For breakfast, she wouldn’t wear something too sophisticated. The time would come for finer gowns and hairstyle later today.

Tyrion had donned his own set of clothes for the occasion, and he was quite handsome in that, though he didn’t look like someone who was going to take part to today’s festivities.

“What’s on your mind?” she asked him once Willia and his squire were gone. His name was Tyg. Tyrion always said he missed Podrick, and Sansa couldn’t help but sympathize with him. She missed the shy squire too.

“I should be happy. Shouldn’t I?” His face showed how tired he was.

She sat and laid a hand on his, just like he always did when he wanted to comfort her. “What’s going on?”

“I can’t stop thinking about that day. At Castamere.”

For a very short moment, her hand wanted to withdraw from his. Sansa had not forgotten that day either. Tyrion had burned down an entire castle to the ground, repeating the actions of the man who raised him, emulating the methods of both his fathers. Sansa feared to lose him that day.

“I killed people, Sansa. I don’t regret killing Rolph Spicer or any of his men who took part to your abduction, but… There were other people I killed in that castle. People who didn’t deserve to die. I could have found a way to spare them, but instead I just… burned them.” He looked at her. “Does that make me a monster?”

She could see how doubts were devouring him. They had talked about it before, especially after Joanna was brought back to them. Tyrion blamed himself for killing people out of revenge when their daughter was still alive. He would regret not killing Sybell Spicer sometimes, but most of all he regretted killing innocents, people who had nothing to see with her and Joanna’s disappearances. He was suffering for what he did. He confessed everything to Daenerys, who forgave him, saying she made mistakes in the past as well, and that she could understand someone’s will to avenge the people he loved. Jon had not been so understanding first, but he had come around it.

“You’re not a monster,” she declared. “I was afraid for a time that you would turn like your father, but you didn’t. They were the monsters. You’re not. You were just… hurt, and you didn’t know what to do. I didn’t know what to do either.”

“I wish I could take back what I did.”

“You will not be remembered for that,” she told him.

“I’m not sure. I may have ordered the Fires of Castamere to not be played today, the song will be sung for a long time by bards in the taverns, and not only in the Westerlands.”

“I’m sure everything will get better. We all make mistakes. I made my own.”

Tyrion nodded, then looked back to Sansa and forced himself to smile. “We’d better go. We must break our fast with the groom.”

Sansa chuckled at the mention of the groom. She took Tyrion’s hand and, together, they went to the Queen’s Ballroom. When they arrived, everyone else was already present. It was a breakfast in small committee, nothing to see with Joffrey’s wedding. Only the members of the family were present.

Jon sat at a corner of the round table, with Daenerys on his left and Arya on his right. Jon and Daenerys were engaged in a discussion when Tyrion and Sansa walked in. Arya was listening to them, but her eyes turned to Tyrion and Sansa before they stepped inside the room. The suspicious expression she had disappeared as soon as she realized it was her sister.

“You’re late,” the queen declared when they arrived near them.

“Later than you,” Tyrion replied, which earned him a discreet berating smile from his half-sister. Even after two months, it was not always easy for Sansa to conceive that Tyrion and Daenerys Targaryen were related, and to think of her as her half-sister-in-law. Sansa and Tyrion took their place in front of Jon and Daenerys. “I hope we didn’t interrupt anything.”

“They were going over today’s agenda,” Arya answered. “A coronation in the morning, the wedding at the beginning of the afternoon, and the wedding feast in the evening and, well, the wedding night afterwards.”

Arya struggled to not laugh uncontrollably at the mention of the last stage. Jon looked uncomfortable all of a sudden, while trying his best not to show it, and Sansa had to refrain from laughing as well. Daenerys and Tyrion were sharing an accomplice smile.

“I hope we don’t have any poisoning on the menu today,” her husband declared.

“I made sure it wouldn’t happen,” Daenerys told them.

“I wish I had been there the first time. I would have liked to kill Joffrey, with a chicken wing if needed,” Arya said.

“How do you kill a man with a chicken wing?” Tyrion asked.

“I don’t know, but I would have found a way.”

“I think we could discuss something else than murders at wedding for a wedding day,” Sansa suggested.

“I agree,” Daenerys said. “Since you’re all here, I think it’s time for presents.”

Jon dropped the piece of bacon he was chewing on. “I told you it wasn’t necessary.”
She made a sign to a nearby servant who left through a side door. Sansa looked at the four people assembled with her around the table for breakfast. The traditions of the Reach dictated that a bride should break her fast with the women of her own family on her wedding day, while the groom was to break his fast with his family and the men in the family of his future wife. However, Jon and Margaery had agreed to have their breakfasts with their respective families. Jon didn’t wish to receive any gift on his wedding. Margaery had been surprised, and Mace Tyrell had been even more surprised, but Margaery had agreed with Jon in the end, saying it wouldn’t do to offer costly gifts in the middle of this harsh winter.

As a result, Margaery was breaking her fast in another part of the castle with her parents, her grandmother, and several of her cousins who came from Highgarden. As for Jon, he was with his own family, which was limited to Daenerys on his father’s side, and Arya and Sansa and Tyrion on his mother’s side. Apart from Jon, Daenerys, Sansa, Varys and Genna, even though the latter didn’t want to admit it, no one knew of Tyrion’s true origins, and it had to remain that way.

Sansa regretted Jon didn’t have more of his family present for his wedding. Wars, from Robert’s Rebellion to the War of the Others, as some started to call it, had cost dearly in lives to both Targaryen and Stark families. Bran was still alive according to Jon, but far away, north of the Wall, and he doubted they would ever see him again. If they counted Sansa, there were only three Starks left in the Seven Kingdoms.

The servant came back, an absurdly long object in his hands, wrapped in long sheets. He slowly removed the sheets and presented what was hidden under to Jon. Sansa gasped when she recognized the sword, sheathed into the pelt of a wolf. Jon and Arya’s reactions were no different. Jon slowly stood up and walked to the man, then seized the sword with his two hands. It was a long and heavy sword, so long and heavy that Sansa didn’t see how he could hold with a single hand.

“How?” He turned to Daenerys, asking her how it was possible. Sansa had the same question on her mind, and she suspected Arya did too.

“Tywin Lannister had it melted down and forged two swords with its steel. I thought it would be appropriate to melt down the two swords and return the true sword to its legitimate owner.”

Ice. The name of her father’s sword. Looking at Jon holding it, she really thought it was brought back. The pelt that was used as a scabbard looked just like the one Theon used to carry when her father left Winterfell to bring justice.

“I’m sorry if it’s not totally identical to the original. The smith did his best to reproduce the blade he melted three years ago,” Tyrion said.

Sansa turned her head to look at him. “You knew?”

Her husband shrugged. “Daenerys asked me before she had it forged again. Both Widow’s Wail and Oathkeeper officially belonged to House Lannister. But I never liked Widow’s Wail, not since Joffrey used it to cut to pieces my wedding gift. As for Oathkeeper, well, I think both Jaime and Lady Brienne would have wanted your father’s sword to be forged again.”

“Wait, Oathkeeper was in Winterfell,” Arya interrupted. “How did you get it?” she asked to Daenerys, almost accusing her.

“I’m the one to blame, Lady Arya.” Tyrion was smiling smugly as Arya threw daggers at him.

“You cousin and I stopped by Winterfell on our way to King’s Landing. I brought the sword with Sansa couldn’t believe it. Tyrion hid this from her. She was furious at him. So furious that she would kiss him were other people not present. She managed to hold back laughter, but her smile gave up much of her feelings. Jon was still staring at the sword he held in his hands. Then slowly, cautiously, he sheathed it back into the pelt, then looked to Daenerys.

“Thank you, Dany.” Only Jon called her this way. “But I can’t accept it. This sword has belonged to House Stark for centuries. Only the Lord of Winterfell can wield it. It’s not mine.”

Daenerys’ face remained neutral. She showed no surprise or insult when she replied. “This is a gift, so it’s yours, whether you like it or not. You can do whatever you want with it. If you think it does not belong to you, then you are free to give it to whoever you want.”

Jon looked at the sword in silence for a moment, then turned to Sansa and presented the sword to her. “You’re the Lady of Winterfell. This sword is yours.”

She looked at it, the handle just like she remembered, the pelt hiding the blade. And then she remembered a time, when she was a little girl, and a man took this sword and brought it down on her father’s neck. This sword was used to end her father’s days.

“I can’t.” She may be the Lady of Winterfell, but she wasn’t a Stark anymore. She made peace with that, but she wouldn’t try to be someone she wasn’t. “Father… he would have wanted you to have it.”

“She’s right. That’s what he would want,” Arya added.

Jon looked at both of them, then to the sword again, and finally to them. “Thank you. It means a lot to me.”

Ice was brought to Jon’s apartments by a servant and the matter was close. The sword of House Stark would remain in the hands of the heir of the Iron Throne. The rest of the breakfast was uneventful. There were eggs, bread, apples, grapes and several other fruits, though they didn’t seem as tasty as usual. Winter prevented them from having the best.

They discussed of light matters. This short moment was meant to relax before the eventful day that was waiting for them. The day was doomed to be busy and tiring. They went back to their rooms to get ready for the coronation.

Willia had to arrange Sansa’s hair in a very complicated style, a crossing between the uses of the North and the fashion of the Westerlands. The jewels that adorned her head would have caused mixed reactions among northern ladies. A third of them would laugh for finding her stupid to carry so much riches on her. Another third would turn red out of jealousy. The last third would notice the small details betraying her northern origins. Her hairstyle wasn’t that different from the one displayed by Lord Manderly’s daughters at White Harbor, though it displayed more wealth and wasn’t dyed.

She had two necklaces around her neck. The first she always wore. It was a simple gold chain with a small medallion also made of gold, displaying a lion on the surface. The inside of the medallion was made of silver. If you opened the medallion, you would find a direwolf under the lion. Never forget what you are. Indeed, she would neve forget. Above the first medallion, a second one was placed, consisting of a huge red ruby with a golden lion above it. It was the same she wore for Margaery’s wedding with Joffrey.

The gown Sansa put on for this morning was made of silver silk, with red embroidery running all over it, displaying shapes of wolves and lions. When she looked at herself in the glass, she found the result quite satisfying. The gown was more grey than silver. All her appearance was a delicate balance between Stark and Lannister. She went to the next chamber. Joanna was playing there.
Sansa laid a kiss on her forehead and her daughter nearly managed to get hold of a strand of her hair.

When Sansa went back to their rooms, Tyrion was back from his solar, wearing a rather dark attire, with red shades. She allowed him to contemplate her for a moment, smiling at his expression. She had a pretty good idea of what he was thinking about.

“You look glorious,” he finally said.

“You look handsome.” His smile falsely told her he didn’t believe what she said. He offered his hand, which she took, and they walked to the Throne Room together, leaving a servant to take care of their daughter.

The Great Hall was crowded with the people who had come to King’s Landing from all over the Seven Kingdoms. All the great lords of Westeros would swear their fealty to Daenerys Targaryen and her children and grandchildren on this day. They found Jon standing on the side of the court, a lone, talking to no one.

“I think my brother requires my help,” Sansa told her husband.

“Probably. Would it bother if I left you alone with him? I have to discuss with some people,” he asked her.

“Go on.”

Sansa headed towards her half-brother. He forced himself to smile when she approached. “You’re beautiful, Sansa.”

“Thank you, Jon. You’re quite handsome as well.”

Jon reddened. He was garbed in costly but quite simple leather clothes. He was the very image of her father and his uncle. No wonder no one ever suspected he was the son of Rhaegar Targaryen.
Despite this, Jon seemed very uncomfortable in his attire.

“You don’t look like someone who’s about to get married.” Not to mention he was about to be officially recognized heir to the Iron Throne.

“Well, judging about the way weddings tend to go in this city, you’ll forgive me if I’m not jumping to the roof.”

“Everything will be fine, Jon,” she said, a reassuring smile on her lips.

“I know. It’s just that I never thought I would get married, and even now that I’m about to be wed, I can’t shake this feeling that I shouldn’t be doing this, that I’m doing a great mistake.”

“What kind of mistake?”

Sansa had seen her coming from behind her half-brother. Margaery wore a gown made of green silk, displaying more wealth than Sansa did, and also covering less than the gown Sansa wore. Jon turned very quickly, completely caught by surprise by her voice. Margaery smiled sweetly at him, and it wasn’t difficult to see that Jon was losing all his means.

“I hope you don’t mind me talking to you before the ceremony,” she told him.
“No. Not at all, my lady,” Jon stammered. “How are you today?”

“I’m good. Very good, in fact. It’s the day of my wedding, after all. Shouldn’t I be happy?”

The situation was comic, Jon obviously not knowing what to say in Margaery’s presence. Sansa’s friend had taken the habit of teasing Jon during the last weeks. Sansa had tried to help Jon to be prepared at the life at court, but this was no easy task. Jon had never really participated to balls and festivities at Winterfell. He sat in the seats below, away from his family, who sat on the dais, in front of everybody.

As a result, Sansa had somehow tried to educate Jon in the ways of life in King’s Landing. Sansa had taught him to dance, and after clumsy beginnings, Jon had managed to master the dance decently. He also spent time with Margaery, at least once every day. Their first meeting had been difficult. Margaery no longer had the same assurance with men, and Jon never had any with women. With Sansa’s help though, they managed to hold a conversation and got to know each other. Margaery finally got used to tease Jon on every subject. Jon looked gloomy and sullen first, but then Sansa noticed his behaviour changed when he was in the presence of Margaery. He began to be more comfortable around her. Sansa suspected he took some pleasure in his future wife’s banter. He even laughed a few times.

This time, however, he wasn’t laughing. There wasn’t even the twinkle Sansa witnessed when he was with Margaery in the past days. He was just frozen like a statue. Margaery seemed to have realized it, for behind her happy appearance Sansa noticed the concern in her eyes.

It was appropriate that the heavy doors of the Throne Room opened at this moment to let Daenerys enter. She was accompanied by a guard of Unsullied soldiers. They escorted her to the Iron Throne, all the people in the room, lords, ladies and knights of Westeros giving way to her.

“I’m afraid it’s time for me to join my family. We’ll see each other later, my soon-to-be husband,” Margaery said on a playful tone, managing to almost not make it sound forced. She walked away, and Sansa heard Jon exhale deeply after she disappeared into the crowd.

“Everything is right, Jon?” she asked her brother.

“Aye. You better go find Tyrion.”

He wasn’t wrong. Sansa promised herself to go and talk to her brother later. She found Tyrion in the first rows of the attendance.

“We have a new queen,” Tyrion said just as Daenerys took place in the Iron Throne. With her dark robes contrasting with her silvery blond hair, she was the image of beauty and terror united. Even if Sansa could call Daenerys a friend, she couldn’t deny the fear the queen could instill to other people and how dangerous it was to have her as your enemy. She was a Targaryen through and through.

“Better her than me,” Sansa whispered so only her husband could hear her. They exchanged a gaze and smiled, both remembering a similar exchange they had for another wedding.

“You all stand before Daenerys Stormborn, of House Targaryen, the First of Her Name, the Unburnt, Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynars, Lady of the Seven Kingdoms, Warden of the East and Protector of the Realm, Khaleesi of the Great Grass Sea, Breaker of Chains, Mother of Dragons, Doom of Death.”

The strong voice of a herald travelled through the room, making the silence previously established more solemn. Of all these people assembled today, some among the most powerful men and women of Westeros, none dared to speak, not even Tyrion with his sharp tongue. The Throne Room was decorated for the occasion. In Robert’s times, it used to be decorated to display the prosperity of the Seven Kingdoms during Robert’s reign. Joffrey had changed it only a few days after he climbed on the throne, changing the appearance of the Throne Room so it would inspire fear among those who would walk in. Daenerys had taken a different approach from both. The dragon skulls, hidden in the dungeons for twenty years, were back. That of Balerion, Aegon’s mount, was half the width of the room. The smallest of the skulls could have been mistaken for a cat. The skulls themselves were enough to intimidate anyone who walked in. Heavy clouds covering the whole sky, the dark day, and the many torches that lit the room enhanced the feeling of threat created by the dragons’ skulls.
The roof, destroyed by Drogon when Daenerys took the city, was repaired. The other decorations were stark in contrast, but nonetheless managed to create some sort of beauty and peace, encouraging petitioners to present their request while remaining careful not to anger their queen.

“Twenty-two years ago,” Daenerys began, “my father, Aerys of House Targaryen, the Second of His Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoyans, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm, died here, while sitting in that very chair when I am now.”

The crowd of noble was completely silent, waiting for what their queen would say next. She stood up from the throne. Daenerys surprised them all with her next words.

“My father should never have been king. He should have died long before that fateful day when the rebels took this city. Jaime Lannister’s greatest crime was not to have killed his king. It was to have let him live long enough to attempt to destroy the city.”

The words created a wave of shock among the assistance. Of all the things they expected the queen to say, these were the last they imagined.

“My father,” Daenerys continued, “was a monster. There was a time when I was child that I thought that all these stories about my father, about the Mad King, were lies created and spread by his enemies. It was only a few years ago that I heard the truth about the extent of the Mad King’s cruelty. He set towns and castles aflame and killed their inhabitants by the thousands.”

Sansa heard Tyrion shifting next to her. She seized his hand, trying to make him understand she was with him.

“He murdered sons in front of their fathers,” the queen continued. “He mistreated his wife and his children, people of his own blood. He burned men alive with wildfire and laughed as they screamed.
He would have destroyed this city if he wasn’t stopped in time, with all the men, women and children inside, loyal to him or not.”

“I have not come to restore the Targaryen dynasty. This dynasty ended in the chaos and the blood of innocents spilled so that the powerful of this world could create their own dynasty, to crush people on the ground just like the Mad King did. Aerys Targaryen, Robert Baratheon, Tywin Lannister, Cersei Lannister, Euron Greyjoy, they were all spokes on a wheel. This one was on top, then that one was on top. And on and on it spun, crushing those on the grounds.”

“I have not come to conquer Westeros like they did. I have not come to be one more spoke on the wheel, and I have not come to stop the wheel. I have come to destroy it. I have come to save Westeros from the real threat, while the Aerys Targaryen, the Robert Baratheon, the Tywin and Cersei Lannister and the Euron Greyjoy of this world bickered like children for ruins.”

“I am not restoring the Targaryen dynasty. I am creating a new one, one that will last forever I hope, one that will protect the Seven Kingdoms instead of enslaving them, and if one day that dynasty turns to be just like the previous ones, that it turns out it cannot protect Westeros from the real threats, then I expect someone will end it before it crushes too many people on the ground.”

“I ask you to acknowledge me as your queen. As the one true queen of all the Seven Kingdoms, and to follow my successors, and to stop them if one day they ever stop serving the people of Westeros.”

A heavy silence settled in the Throne Room. The speech Daenerys Targaryen just gave was nothing like the speeches made by other kings through history. She looked to them, waiting for them to answer her question, but Sansa suspected she was also warning them of the dire consequences if they refused her as their queen.

“Long live Daenerys Stormborn, the one true queen of the Seven Kingdoms. Long may she reign!” someone shouted in the crowd. Some people stood aside from the origin of the voice. It came from a man stuck to a wheeling chair. Doran Martell, Lord of Sunspear and Prince of Dorne.

“Long may she reign!” Tyrion shouted to his turn.

“Long may she reign!” a knight nearby added.

“Long may she reign!”

Soon, the whole room was shouting for Daenerys, some with enthusiasm, some for the form. When it seemed everyone had acknowledged Daenerys as the queen, she sat back into the Iron Throne and raised her hand to impose silence.

“Jon Snow, come forward.”

Jon did as his aunt ordered him to. He stood in the small rectangular space that was left empty in front of the dais and knelt before Daenerys. Sansa thought, not without regret, that not long ago, Jon was King in the North. Now he knelt before a southern queen. She could be his aunt, he remained a king who was forced to abdicate.

“When I first came to Westeros and heard of the King in the North who claimed to be the son of my brother Rhaegar, I thought of you as an enemy. I was wrong. Before we met, what I saw was a pretender. I know the truth today. You are my brother’s son. I never got the chance to know Rhaegar. He died before I was born, and I will always regret it. But I don’t regret meeting you. You didn’t choose to be king. You were chosen by the people of Westeros to protect them, and that’s what you did. If it wasn’t for you, half of the Seven Kingdoms might have fallen to the White Walkers. The people of Westeros are in your debt forever, and so am I. You abandoned your crown when it was the right time, which only shows further how honorable you are. I can think of no one else if something was ever to happen to me. Rise, Jon Targaryen, Prince of Dragonstone and heir to the Iron Throne.”

Daenerys’ smile grew as she said it. Sansa seldom saw her so happy. Jon stood up and came to sit on her left. He smiled as well when he faced the crowd, though not as much as his aunt.

Sansa’s husband stepped forward and knelt just like Jon did a moment before. Very few knew it, but he was kneeling before his sister.

“Ever since we met, you advised me. And every one of your advices contributed to saving Westeros and ending this war. You helped to bring together the kingdoms so they could fight their common enemy. Where your lord father slaughtered Northerners, you saved them and fought by their side against Ramsay Bolton, then against the White Walkers. You proved your loyalty, your honor, and your competence ever since the War of the Five Kings began. One of my dragons trusted you enough to make you his rider. And you saved my life.”

“While in Essos, I thought all the houses who rebelled against my family and sentenced me to a life of exile were traitors who deserved to die. You were the first to prove me I was wrong. I owe you a lot, and I will never forget the help you provided to me since the first time we met. Rise, Tyrion Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Lord Paramount of the Westerlands, Warden of the West, and Hand of the Queen.”

Tyrion did as he was told, just like Jon, and climbed the steps of the dais.

“For a very small man, he casts a very large shadow.”

The voice came to Sansa’s right. She slightly turned her head to see Kinvara standing there. Sansa hadn’t noticed her presence. She turned her head to Tyrion as he climbed the last steps. Indeed, the torches created a long shadow behind Tyrion’s back, a shadow that loomed all over the steps he climbed. It was something that many people seemed to notice, how Tyrion’s shadow often made him look taller than he actually was.

“Yes, he does,” Sansa acknowledged as her husband took his place.

Daenerys now sat surrounded by Jon and Tyrion. “The three heads of the dragon are gathered together,” Kinvara whispered echoing Sansa’s thoughts. “How is your daughter?”

“She’s fine,” Sansa answered, unable to stop a large smile from appearing on her lips.

“Good.”

Sansa didn’t have more time to discuss with Kinvara. She had come to appreciate the High Priestess very much after she helped her escape Littlefinger and saved Joanna. Daenerys called her name

“Sansa Lannister of House Stark.”

Her heart bumping in her chest, Sansa came before the dais and curtsied.

“There is a long history between House Stark and House Targaryen. What my father did to your grandfather and your uncle was a horrible crime, and he deserved what happened to him. And so did Joffrey Baratheon and Tywin Lannister for what they did during the last war to your family. But before that, for hundreds of years, House Lannister, House Stark and House Targaryen were allies. Torrhen Stark knelt before Aegon the Conqueror without fighting, and Aegon chose him as his Warden of the North, and his successors continued to entrust the North into the hands of House Stark for three hundred years. One of the many Lords of Winterfell during that period even served as Hand of the King. And the Starks only rebelled when my father betrayed their trust and their loyalty. I know only words cannot repair what has been made in the past, but I hope that one day the alliance between the North and the former dynasty of Targaryens will emerge again, stronger, and will last longer, between the dynasty I wish to establish and your family. Rise, Sansa Lannister of House Stark, Lady of Winterfell and Wardeness of the North.”

When Sansa looked at Daenerys her smile was reassuring. She looked a little bit longer to Jon. His expression was encouraging as well. As for Tyrion, her gaze remained on him the longest. His face showed he would always be with her, no matter what happened. Sansa joined back the crowd. She had no place on the small council, hence she wouldn’t stand on the dais. At least half the northern lords who were present had mixed expressions. Some looked at her as if she was a traitor.

Yesterday, Sansa, the queen, Jon and Tyrion had met the northern lords all together. The most powerful families, the Umbers and the Manderlys, had been warned in advance, but the other houses were told their plans at this moment. It was decided that the child of Tyrion and Sansa who would inherit the North would be raised in Winterfell from the age of six. The new Lord of the Dreadfort would be in charge of his education, but their child would live at least four months every year in one of his bannermen’s castles. It eased the protests of the Northerners, who sometimes looked about to revolt. There were fewer who seemed about to enter rebellion now in the Throne Room, but still a few.

Her uncle Edmure was next to kneel, accompanied by his wife Roslin Frey. The speech Daenerys had for him was shorter, and he quickly stood up as Lord of Riverrun and Lord Paramount of the Trident. Mace Tyrell was called forward with Lady Alerie and went back to the crowd, confirmed as Lord of Highgarden, High Marshal of the Reach and Warden of the South. Then came Margaery, who personally knelt before Daenerys, confirming again that she gave up any claim to being queen. The last Lord Paramount to kneel was Doran Martell.

The Lord of Sunspear had to be pushed in a wheelchair by a dark man with a strange axe. It was obvious any movement was painful to him, but he managed to kneel, with the help of a woman who was his wife, Mellario of Norvos. Daenerys’ words for him were very kind and respectful. It was obvious she appreciated not only his support during the war, but also his coming to King’s Landing, considering his health. She also welcomed his wife, who had arrived from the other continent two days ago. The Lord of Sunspear was confirmed in all his titles and named Master of Laws. He declared he was honored by the nomination but couldn’t accept because of his duty to his people and his declining state. Daenerys accepted that Anders Yronwood would serve on the small council on Prince Doran’s behalf, and the Lord of Yronwood went to sit on the dais as well. Doran Martell took place on the dais too, his lady wife remaining at his side and helping him to sit.

Daenerys called forward the remaining men who would constitute her small council. Paxter Redwyne was confirmed Master of Ships, and Lord Varys was named Master of Whisperers without much surprise. Kinvara was made a special advisor. The most unforeseen nomination was that of the Grand Maester Marcon, who would also act as Master of Coin. The commander of the Unsullied, a man called Torgo Nudho, was given a lordship, as well as Dothraki commanders. The queen also announced, to the great surprise of many people, that there would be no Queensguard and that her safety would be ensured by Torgo Nudho and the Unsullied. The commander of the Unsullied was also granted a seat on the small council. Ser Jorah Mormont and Ser Barristan Selmy would be known as the last knights of the Kingsguard. She then named Lord Dickon Tarly Governor of the Vale and gave the authorization to the wildlings to live on the lands of the Gift under the authority of the Night’s Watch. Toregg, the eldest son of their former leader Tormund, was there to acknowledge it. He didn’t kneel or bow or do anything. All he did was to nod to thank Daenerys.

All the lords who were present then had to pledge their loyalty to the new dynasty, one by one. The Lords of the Vale had to do it all over again, like they did at the Gates of the Moon. So many went on that Sansa only noticed a few of them. Wyman Manderly was the most civil of the Northerners, Robett Glover was the most hostile, but all knelt nonetheless. Some had a scornful gaze for Sansa on their way back and forth. Ser Davos Seaworth stood out from the rest with his plain clothes more fitting a sailor than a nobleman. Daenerys confirmed his position as Lord of the Dreadfort, kindly advising him on a humoristic note to be better than his predecessors. The former smuggler said that if he wasn’t better than the Boltons, he feared Daenerys’ retaliation as much as 62 furious men of Bear Island. That brought laughter into the room, lifting the solemnity of the ceremony for a moment.

All the other major houses of Westeros, the Mallisters, the Blackwoods, the Brackens, both Houses Royce, the Hightowers, the Leffords and many more swore fealty to Daenerys and her children and grandchildren.

The crowning of the queen didn’t happen just yet. The new High Septon gave a long prayer for the new queen and the new Targaryen dynasty. Then Kinvara came and delivered a long speech about the war that just ended, using many expressions that left a part of the crowd dumbfounded. Some seemed to think the Red Priests had no place here.

Finally, the crowning came. In normal circumstances, the queen would have been crowned before everyone made their pledge, but Daenerys had taken a different path. She told Sansa she wanted the people to choose her as their queen, not to barely accept her only as an accomplished fact, but to actually choose her. Another change compared to usual ceremonies was that it wasn’t the High Septon who crowned Daenerys. It was the Grand Maester who did it. One moment he was writing feverishly and the next he was taking a crown made in Valyrian steel with square-cut rubies. He was the one to place it on the queen’s head. Tyrion had explained Daenerys didn’t want a representative of any religion to crown her. She didn’t want to give the impression she was favoring one faith over the others.

Daenerys stood with the crown that was worn by Aegon the First three centuries ago, opening a second dynasty of Targaryens with the crown that started the first one. When Marcon proclaimed Long may she reign, the crowd echoed and burst into applause. All wasn’t over for Daenerys walked through the crowd that stood aside on her passage. She arrived to a group of people whose attire was more similar to Ser Davos’ one. They were led by a woman.

Yara Greyjoy and Daenerys Targaryen were face to face for everyone to see. Tyrion and Jon were right behind their queen, and the rest of the small council wasn’t far beyond. The two queens remained there, as if eyeing each other.

“Your Grace,” finally said Yara Greyjoy, without bowing or curtsying or making any movement showing any kind of submission.

“Your Grace,” Daenerys replied in kind. Another moment of silence followed as both queens kept staring at each other. The Lady of the Seven Kingdoms was the first to speak again. “I recognize your authority over the Iron Islands and its people, as their queen.”

“And I recognize your authority over the Seven Kingdoms and its people. The Iron Islands will respect the integrity of your lands.”

“And we will respect the integrity of yours.”

The queens then took each other’s arm, and the pact between the Iron Islands and the Seven Kingdoms was officially sealed.

The festivities were cut short afterwards. A feast should have followed, but it was kept for later. The coronation was to be followed by Jon’s wedding with Margaery in the afternoon after all, and it was quite a challenge to hold a coronation and a royal wedding within the same day.

She and Tyrion went back to their rooms where they took a quick lunch and changed for the wedding. Sansa donned a new gown and new hairstyle. Her new gown was a delicately arrangement of blue, red, gold and silver. Tyrion was way quicker to change. Before Willia had time to help Sansa don her gown, Tyrion walked in. Their handmaiden looked at him in shock.

“My lord, you shouldn’t…” she began, but Tyrion interrupted her.

“Come on, Willia. That’s not the first time I do it, and that’s not as if my wife and I had much to hide from each other. Please forgive my intrusion, my lady,” he told Sansa while performing a stupidly extensive bow.
“You’re all forgiven, my lord, but don’t expect me to forget about it,” she replied on a joking tone. “I’ll make you pay one day.”

“I’m eager to see what kind of punishment my lady wife has in store for me. I think I’ll leave you to your preparations. I must talk with the queen and with the groom before the ceremony. It doesn’t bother you?”

“No, not at all. I’ll meet you in the Great Hall.”

Tyrion nodded and left the room. When Sansa was ready, she went to see that Joanna was still well, and once she was sure of it, she walked to the Maidenvault. The guards knew her well, so they let her pass. When she arrived to Margaery’s apartments, it was Mira who answered her.

“Lady Sansa.”

“Lady Mira. Can I see Margaery?” Sansa asked her.

“They are almost over with preparing her for the wedding. I’ll tell you’re here,” her friend answered. Mira had been invited to the coronation and the wedding, and for the time she was in the capital she had offered to act once again for Margaery as a handmaiden. Margaery was only too eager and pleased to accept. All her friends from her time in the city were dead. Mira was the only one to survive because she left before Cersei unleashed her madness.

Sansa didn’t have time to talk further with Mira as she walked back into the room. She came back a moment later.

“Lady Margaery is ready to receive you.”

“Thank you, Mira. How are you today?”

“I’m all right, my lady. It’s easier than the first time, and this time his father will be there.”

Sansa knew what she was talking about. She had experienced giving birth when her husband was away, and she hoped that when their next child would come Tyrion would be present. They were almost sure now that she could still have children. Nothing Serion Lannister told them before he died could be taken as granted.

When they walked in, Margaery was up and everyone including her mother and all her cousins and handmaidens were admiring her gown, made of white satin. Everyone but Lady Olenna who, as sharp as ever, turned her attention to Sansa as soon as she walked in.

“Well, look at this. A wolf among the roses. Or a lioness. I’m not sure. How do we call an animal who’s half a wolf and half a lion?”

Margaery laughed. She had seen Sansa enter only the fraction of a second after her grandmother. She walked to her and kissed her on the cheeks

“Hi, Sansa.” She turned to the other women in the room. “Could you please leave me a moment alone with Lady Sansa?”

“Of course, my dear,” Lady Alerie said. “Ladies, come.”

“So, I’m kicked out without ceremony like all the half-minded women in this room?” the Queen of Thorns said once only she, Margaery, Sansa and Mira remained.
“I can come with you, Lady Olenna,” the latter suggested.

“Good.” She stood up and Sansa listened to her rambling as she left with Mira. “I have all the difficulties in the world to find another handmaiden for my granddaughter with some kind a mind of her own. The intelligence of her entourage didn’t cease to drop since you left her service. If only you weren’t married. Not only you would still be in Margaery’s service, but I could betroth you to one of my cousins who needs a clever woman to talk some sense into his head.”

Margaery and Sansa couldn’t hold back their laughter as the door closed on them. “I think this baby will clearly remember my grandmother’s voice when he’s grown up,” Margaery said.

“Your grandmother makes quite an impression on most people,” Sansa commented as she took hold of herself.

“On all people, you mean. So, how do I look?”

Margaery wore a gown similar to those she wore for her two previous weddings, but that also put differences in evidence. The one she wore today was thicker to protect her from the cold of winter. As such, it covered her shoulders and hid her back, although the fabric was thinner in these places. It was richly decorated with leaves of gold and silver branches, and her brown curls were falling on her back and on both sides of her head.

“I believe many men will be jealous of Jon.”

Margaery chortled, but turned her head away. Her face took a sadder expression. “I wonder. My first three husbands all died. One was assassinated by a shadow, another was poisoned, and the last committed suicide.” Speaking of Tommen, Margaery’s voice came out weaker. “What should I expect for the fourth?”

“None of your husbands were like Jon.” Sansa tried to be reassuring, but she doubted that it worked.

“No, they weren’t, but they’re all gone. The four of them are gone.” Margaery didn’t need to specify who was the fourth in question. “I envy you, Sansa. I’ve been straying from one marriage to the other for the past years and… I wasn’t happy in any of them.”

“Not even with Tommen?”

Margaery hesitated before she spoke. “Maybe I didn’t try to be happy with him. Now all that’s left of him was taken away from me.”

“I’m sure you will be happy with Jon. He’s a good man.”

Her friend nodded. “I know. A bit gloomy, but I’ve seen worse. He’s also quite good-looking, and more important than anything, Grandmother believes he has more brain than all the men I married before.” Smiles came back on their faces. “Do you know if he’s a virgin?”

The question startled Sansa. “I don’t know.”

Margaery looked thoughtful for a moment. “Is your brother capable of lying?”

“Yes, he is, though he’s not lying very often.”

“That’s what I thought. He has too much of the North in him. I asked him if he was a virgin once.” Sansa said nothing for a while. “And… what did he answer?”
“No.” Marhaery shrugged. “Only no. Well, I hope whoever he slept with taught him a few tricks.”

Sansa could see that Margaery forced herself to look merry. “Are you alright, Margaery?”

Her friend sighed. “My children will be kings and queens one day. I may never be the queen, but it’s almost as if I was becoming one by marrying your cousin. I should be happy. That’s what I always wanted. But I don’t feel like I’m happy, or at least not like I should be. I guess…”

Margaery’s eyes were lost in the horizon. Sansa knew what it was. Margaery had lost many people she loved to Cersei. Sansa had wanted to be queen just like her not long ago. Margaery had come to King’s Landing better prepared, but she wasn’t ready for Cersei’s madness, and in the end, they ended up in similar situations.

“Never mind.” Margaery’s voice was hoarse, but the next moment she straightened herself and stood proud, displaying again a merry expression. “It’s time for me to wed again, and this time I won’t allow my husband to die. If he does, I’ll kill him, if my grandmother doesn’t kill him before me.”

With a last chortle, Sansa and Margaery walked out together and headed for the Great Hall, where another royal wedding was about to take place.

Next chapter: Tyrion
“So, ready to tie yourself to a rose? Be careful, she has thorns.”

“Were you so cheering when you wed Sansa?” Jon Targaryen replied.

“I tried, and I failed. What do you think? That I was overjoyed to marry a girl of fourteen? A girl who was my family’s prisoner, whose father was beheaded by my nephew, whose family was at war with mine? And that was before I knew what my father was planning for her mother and brother.”

“You’re not very good at preparing people for marriage.”

“No, I suppose not. I’ve never been good at making people feel better.”

He and Jon Snow were alone before the ceremony. It would begin very soon, but they still had some time ahead of them. Jon Snow wore a simple doublet. The only decoration were silvery pins to hold it closed.

“How did you do, with Sansa?” he asked. “How did you manage to live with her, to be happy with her?”

“I don’t know,” Tyrion answered. “It just happened. We got to know each other, we learned to live together. We had time for this. I guess the fact we both hated Joffrey also helped. But one day I realized that I loved her. Are you wondering if the same will happen to you and Margaery?”

The young man didn’t seem convinced. “I don’t see myself falling in love, not again.”

They stayed silent. Tyrion thought of Shae, but most of all about Tysha. He had fallen in love with her. He was young and stupid. You are still young and stupid, Shae had told him. Was he still young and stupid? Tyrion had felt younger than ever as his marriage with Sansa blossomed. But he didn’t have the impression to be young and stupid like he was. The idea that the love Sansa felt for him was fake couldn’t set foot in his mind. Maybe the love of Shae was fake, but the love of Sansa? And for Tysha, he knew now that he wasn’t young and stupid. She was no whore. Tysha was… she was what she seemed to be. A wheelwright’s daughter, chance met on the road. Had she really been in love with him? He thought of Sansa. There were so many things about her behaviour that reminded him of his first wife. She must have loved him for real. And he raped her.

Tyrion was aware of the story of Ygritte, the wildling girl Jon Snow fell in love with while he lived among the wildlings. No wonder he didn’t want to fall in love again. Love hurt. Tyrion had experienced it far too often. But at the same time, he thought of Sansa and Joanna, their little daughter who was starting to learn how to walk and talk, and despite all the suffering he endured because of love, he couldn’t deny all the happiness it brought to his life. A happiness he had lost hope of knowing.
“We never know what life is preparing for us. If I were you, bastard, I wouldn’t say my vows a third time too quickly.”

“Even if I tried to, you would talk me out of it, Imp.”

Tyrion leaned forward. “Look, I fell in love with Sansa, which is no surprise at all.” It was possible he was in love with her before they got married and he didn’t realize it. “And she fell in love with me, the Imp of Casterly Rock, the bastard born from a royal rape. Can you fall in love with the Rose of Highgarden? Can the Rose of Highgarden fall in love with the heir of the Iron Throne? I’d say the question requires no answer, nor does it need to be asked.”

Jon looked to Tyrion with a smile at the corner of his lips. “Maybe you’re better at consoling people than you think.”

“Only when they’re bastards, cripples and broken things.”

Jon Targaryen was a bastard. Officially. He still thought so. Tyrion and Daenerys never told him about the marriage of his parents. Brandon Stark was a cripple when Tyrion gave him the plans of a saddle so he could ride again. Sansa was a broken thing when they first spoke.

“Is it true that the Tyrells tried to marry Lady Margaery to you?” his nephew asked all of a sudden.

“Yes, they tried. But I was already married.”

He never regretted refusing the offer. Kevan might have thought it was a better deal for House Lannister, Tyrion couldn’t imagine his life with someone else than Sansa.

“How do you think it would have been between you two, had things be different?”

“I don’t know. I guess we will never know. But one day, we’ll be able to say whether you and Margaery Tyrell being together is a good thing. But before we get to that point, we have a wedding. I just hope you will live longer than her other husbands.”

“I hope so too.”

The heir of the Iron Throne had a resigned expression on his face. “Let me give you some advice, bastard. Give a chance to your rose. I know I would if I were you. Just be careful, like I said, she has thorns. Wear an armor and never let them stick in your skin.”

Jon chuckled. “What the hell do you know about being married to a rose?”

Tyrion thought of Sansa. “All the dwarves in this castle are married to a rose. Be ready, Jon Snow. War and marriage are not so different. Allies can turn into enemies, and enemies can turn into allies.”

With that last word, Tyrion exited. Except for a few Unsullied, the corridors in this part of the Red Keep were almost desert. Everyone had to be in the Throne Room already, where the wedding ceremony would take place.

When he arrived, Tyrion thought they had made quite a good work at preparing the place. New decorations were installed for the second ceremony. The decorations were about celebration now, where those for the coronation had been sterner, more solemn. The room was already full when he walked in.

With his small frame, he managed to make himself a way to the dais where Daenerys was discussing with the High Priestess. Kinvara turned to look at him as soon as he emerged from the crowd, and his sister noticed his presence at the same time.

“Here you are. Is Jon ready?” the queen asked.

“I think he will survive the wedding. The wedding night might be another story.”

An imperceptible smile was all that betrayed Daenerys’ amusement. “The wedding night is none of my concerns. Only the wedding is.”

“I have to disagree. If you want Jon Snow to have children, I’m afraid his activities in the bedchamber will have to be at the top of your list of concerns.”

It was strange that he was telling something Tywin Lannister would have told, though not as a jape. Tyrion didn’t think that having children would be a problem for a couple. The two seemed in perfect health and nothing pointed to a barren marriage. Jon Snow, or Targaryen now, was a man of duty like his uncle, and Margaery Tyrell was unlikely to not wish for the consummation of the marriage. She wasn’t marrying a dwarf after all.

“The Lord of Light will see to the success of this union,” the High Priestess declared.

“Is that written in one of your holy texts or one of your prophecies?”

Kinvara had a sorry smile. “Still skeptical about our Lord.”

“Forgive me, but I guess I lost any faith I could have in gods a long time ago, and it will not come back. Don’t lose your time trying to convert me, my lady. You’ll have more chance with other people.” She nodded, as if she understood. “I never got a chance to truly thank you.”

“For what? For saving your life, for saving your wife, or for saving your child?” she asked.

“All of them, I guess.”

“You don’t need to thank me. I’m only doing what my Lord commands.”

“And he commanded you to save three Lannisters?”

“The fact the three of you are still alive is the proof that he wanted it. You will excuse me, my queen.”

The High Priestess walked away after bowing towards Daenerys. Sansa arrived at the same moment.

“Was that Kinvara?” she asked.

“Yes,” Daenerys replied.

Tyrion only had eyes for his wife. “Well, everyone will be looking at the bride except for me. I’m afraid I won’t be able to detach my eyes from you, my lady.”

Sansa reddened at the compliment, which made her look even more beautiful. She was a shining beauty.

“I think it’s time for the ceremony,” Daenerys decided.

She made a sign to the herald who hit the floor thrice with his heavy stick. Tyrion and Sansa joined the crowd, while Daenerys remained on the dais. Jon crossed their path and Sansa gave him an encouraging smile as he joined his aunt.
It took some time for the people to position themselves well enough for an alley to take shape between the dais and the great doors. Since the Great Sept of Baelor was destroyed, there was no sept large enough for the ceremony to take place. The High Septon offered to have it in another of the septs in the capital, but Daenerys decided the wedding would take place in the Throne Room, probably a way to assert her authority over the Faith. The High Septon had seen his power decrease since the events with the High Sparrow and Cersei’s reign, and Daenerys was determined to not engage herself in favor of any religion. As a result, both the High Septon and the High Priestess Kinvara stood by her side at the top of the dais.

The large and heavy doors opened to reveal the bride. Margaery Tyrell stood there. Tyrion had to admit she was beautiful. Not as much as the woman who stood by his side, the mother of his daughter, but still beautiful. The bride made a few steps into the Throne Room. Her father was waiting for her. Mace Tyrell took her by the arm and escorted her to the dais. They slowly progressed through the alley that was left free for them. When they were close enough, Tyrion noticed that Lady Margaery was paler than before. Her façade was gone. Her smile was no longer forced. It was smaller, less shining, but Tyrion thought it also looked more sincere, with a certain sadness in it.

For the fourth time, the Lord of Highgarden gave away his daughter for another man to take her. Only this time, he was giving her to a prince, not a king, and he was giving his heir along with his daughter. Margaery Tyrell stood away from her father and climbed the dais. She arrived at Jon’s level and turned her back to him. Mechanically, Jon Snow put the cloak on her shoulders. It was dark cloak, with the red three-headed dragon on it. Together, they climbed the last steps and arrived at the top, before Daenerys and the representatives of two faiths that everything in the world separated but the queen standing between them.

The High Septon stepped forward. “Your Grace, my lords, my ladies, we stand here in the sight of gods and men to witness the union of man and wife. One flesh, one heart, one soul, now and forever.”

Tyrion had already assisted to many weddings in his life. This one had something particular though. For the first time, a septon wasn’t the only one officiating the ceremony. After he gave a long speech on the duties of both husband and wife, and after he tied the hands of Jon Targaryen and Margaery Tyrell with a ribbon and declared them one heart, one flesh, one soul, the High Priestess stepped forward as well. Judging by his facial expression, the head of the Faith of the Seven was not too happy.

“At the beginning, the Lord of Light made us male and female. Two parts of a greater whole. He also said that man and wife shall leave their families to forge a new one. In their joining, there is power. Power to make life, power to make light, power to defeat the death.” Jon turned his head towards the High Priestess, an uncertain expression on his face. “By becoming one flesh, these two people are fighting death by creating new life. By becoming one soul, they are fighting death by creating a link so strong that they will always face death together, increasing their strength in this fight. By becoming one heart, they reach eternal life. For the Lord of Light is also the Lord of Love, and our Lord is Love. He loves us all, and there’s no link that is stronger than love. These vows they are taking today will never be broken, and they will bind them for the rest of their lives.”

She stepped away. Jon Snow kept looking at her for quite long, but she gave no sign that she was noticing it. Abruptly he turned to look at his bride again and cleared his throat.

“With this kiss, I pledge my love.”

He said it awkwardly, but what mattered was that he said it. Before the queen and the entire Realm, Jon Targaryen and Margaery Tyrell shared their first kiss and became man and wife. The assistance applauded like they always did at each wedding.

The highest lords and officers of the Crown moved to the Small Hall where the main wedding feast took place, while the minor lords remained in the Great Hall where another feast would take place. There was simply not enough place for all the lords of Westeros who were present to hold together into a single room.

The first service came in the form of a mushroom soup with spices that came from across the Narrow Sea. The newly wed couple occupied the presiding place, Margaery on the right of Jon Snow. Her family was on her own right. To the opposite of Joffrey’s wedding, her brother wasn’t there. Tyrion and Sansa were with Daenerys on Jon’s left. He was talking with his wife. Although the conversation didn’t look very cheery, it was constant. Tyrion supposed it was a good sign for the beginning of a marriage.

“Do you think I was wrong to let Kinvara speak at the ceremony?” Daenerys asked him as they were half into the soup.

“I think that when we want to bring radical changes, to change radically but slowly is a better option if we want to avoid rebellions, riots and wars,” he replied.

“What is that supposed to mean?”

“That it was better than letting Kinvara officiate the whole wedding on her own.”

“I think the way she blessed the union was quite beautiful,” Sansa commented from Tyrion’s left. Daenerys was sitting on his right, between him and Jon.

“What’s in that?” Arya asked. She was sitting next to Sansa and refused to wear a gown. Though she accepted to wear clean clothes. She still had her sword on her.

“Spices that grow near Meereen. Its people put it in many of their meals,” Daenerys replied.

The Stark girl grimaced. “Too spicy.”

“Is she always that direct?” the queen asked Sansa.

“Yes, she is,” his wife confirmed, with an apologizing face.

“How many services are there?” Arya asked, looking a little bored already.

“Seven,” her sister answered.

“It’s a chance we don’t have seventy-seven courses. I think some of the guests almost didn’t make it. I’m even surprised Joffrey was the only one to die that day,” Tyrion said.

The next course consisted in a salad, probably made with the last fresh vegetables of the Reach that were available.

“It’s better,” Arya said after she ate the first piece of lettuce. She looked at her cousin at this moment. He was laughing with Margaery. Daenerys was looking at them, a look of envy on her face.

“Are you alright?” Tyrion asked her.

“Yes. I just guess I will never marry again. My wedding was… different.”
As they went through the second service, musicians began to come, replacing the jugglers who entertained the guests so far. First came a bard Tyrion thought he had seen before. She was a woman, and she had a very beautiful voice. The melody she played was beautiful and sweet, and sad at the same time, just like her voice as she sang.

\[\text{Rising fury in the sunlight}\]
\[\text{Soaring up into the sky}\]
\[\text{Flames that douse the chill of moonlight}\]
\[\text{Touching heaven as they fly}\]

The words came back and again. It was more about the music from the lyre than its lyrics. It was soothing, and to the glory of House Targaryen as well, of course. The young woman received many golden dragons from the guests for her performance.

“She has a very beautiful voice,” Sansa commented.

“Do you wish to invite her to the Rock?” Tyrion asked her.

“Why not? I guess singers and troubadours have it hard with the harsh winter that we have. Unless her Grace wants to keep her services for herself?”

“I may ask her to stay for a while, but I will allow her to travel to the Westerlands whenever she wants,” the queen said.

The third service was there, which consisted in another plate of vegetables with spicy sauces. Tyrion knew some of them. Daenerys told him that many came from the other continent. He wished he had been able to make the tour of the Free Cities when he was sixteen.

A group of four bards, two with a lyre, another one with some kind of drums, and the fourth with a flute arrived and began another slow melody. Tyrion supposed it was chosen in honor of the bride who wore a gown of satin of the same color.

\[\text{Nights in white satin, never reaching the end,}\]
\[\text{Letters I’ve written, never meaning to send.}\] \[\text{Beauty I’d always missed with these eyes before.}\]
\[\text{Just what the truth is, I can’t say anymore.}\]

\[\text{Cause I love you,}\]
\[\text{Yes, I love you,}\]
\[\text{Oh, how, I love you.}\]
Gazing at people, some hand in hand,

Just what I’m going through, they can understand.

Some try to tell me, thoughts they cannot defend,

Just what you want to be, you will be in the end.

And I love you,

Yes, I love you,

Oh, how, I love you.

Oh, how, I love you.

Nights in white satin, never reaching the end,

Letters I’ve written, never meaning to send.

Beauty I’d always missed, with these eyes before,

Just what the truth is, I can’t say anymore.

Cause I love you,

Yes, I love you,

Oh, how, I love you.

Oh, how, I love you.

Lady Margaery applauded first and the guests followed. The main course had arrived. Roasted legs of goose were served along with small potatoes, spiced rice, small tomatoes cut in half with herbs on them, and carrots filled with cheese. While Sansa and Arya engaged into a discussion, Daenerys caught Tyrion’s attention.
“Do you think I should worry about the war in Dorne?”

“I wouldn’t call that a war,” Tyrion replied as he wiped his mouth with a towel. “Only seven houses rebelled and three have already been defeated. Prince Trystane is already negotiating with two and believes he can bring them to abandon without problem. Resistance might last through the year, but no longer.”

“Maybe I should be more concerned about the settling of the Dothrakis and the Free Folk in the North.”

“Yes, you should be. We should all be. Dothrakis, Northerners and wildlings, all together on the same lands. The perfect recipe for a complete mess.”

He looked to Sansa. She wouldn’t have an easy task as Wardeness of the North, especially not if she was to rule the North from Casterly Rock.

“Perhaps we should try to think about something else for this evening,” he suggested.

“It’s my duty to worry about my people all the time,” she replied.

“Even kings and queens deserve moments to rest.”

“Not me.”

It was no use to argue with her. Other bards came to entertain the guests with their songs in the meantime. As many people were finishing the main course, a man with a black beard was now coming forward with a whole bunch of people with various instruments. Tyrion realized he had played at Joffrey’s wedding. Either he survived the destruction of King’s Landing, or he was a wandering bard who only came here when there was a special event to celebrate and a few coins to make. Tyrion wondered how this group of musicians could manage to wander all together through the Seven Kingdoms. The lyre began to play, then drums joined.

When the wolves cry out
Echoes in the old walls
Distant are the calls
On the winter’s wind
When the wolves cry out
Honour in the black bonds
Held in the beyond
As the lights they dim
Sometimes the last in line
Are the ones who last in time
Blood on the snow
Blood on the ashes

I’m not ashamed of what I am
Make it my own
Make it my castle

I’m not ashamed of what I am
Honour calls
Honour calls

Casting away the final mists of doubt

When the wolves cry out
The smallest they will grow great

No more shall we wait
To rejoin the pack
They will heed my shout
So much have I lost here
Loves I held so dear
Taken by the black

Sometimes the lost bloodlines
Are the ones who last in time

Blood on the snow
Blood on the ashes

I’m not ashamed of what I am
Make it my own
Make it my castle

I’m not ashamed of what I am
Honour calls
Honour calls
When the refrain came for a third time, most of the northern lords joined the bard. When the song was over, they were very loud to applaud. Jon Snow, on the other side, seemed quite stunned. Everyone else was clapping his hands politely.

“I think your brother has an admirer,” Tyrion told his wife. She was looking at the bard as he and his companions were busy preparing another song.

“He was there at Joffrey’s wedding. He sang something about winter. He may be a Northerner,” she said.

Servants brought the fifth service, which consisted of various fruits. Tyrion had his cup of wine filled again.

“Northerners are proud people indeed,” the queen commented, as the northerners were being very loud across the place. Some had drunk too much already.

“Yes, and stubborn,” he replied. “No offense meant, my lady,” he added for Sansa.

She settled to laugh very shortly, meaning she didn’t mind. The queen resumed to speak in the meantime. “Dothrakis, Northerners, and Free Folk, all on the same lands. Maybe I should have settled the Dothrakis only in the Riverland and the Crownlands.”

“I disagree. Dothrakis are nomads. They are a travelling people. They would never have enough place in the southern kingdoms for that, even with all the victims of the recent wars. And not enough of them would accept to settle for a life where they would live in cities or cultivate the land. Unsullied are more suited for that.”

“I agree. All the same, I expect some problems up in the North.”

“I know.” He looked to Sansa. They would both have a lot of work to do in the northern part of Westeros to prevent any major conflict between the different wildling tribes, the Dothraki hordes, and the northern lords. They would need the help of Jon Snow. Tyrion knew they could rely on him, but they couldn’t expect him to settle all problems.

The bard and his men were ready and began to play again. Tyrion understood very quickly that the song would be about the North again.

From the mists of the mountains a deafening call
Bellows down over the plains
On a host of battle-worn ears it does fall
Pushing out through the thunder and rain
These men of the north they have suffered too long
The anger it swells in their veins
Of the spirited roars of lost warriors’ songs
Distant echoes are all that remain
And my voice is my violence
Clear the sky’s frozen tears
And no more we'll be silent
With this Northerner's song in our ears

And we stand tall
Sons of the snow
We will not fall
Under these blows
For our hearts they are hardy
Our spirits are strong
And our voices are lifted into
This Northerner's song

Conquer the anger and ravenous rage!
Make it a part of your power
Pummeling down let your bloodlust engage!
Under your force they will cower

Feeling the fury so pure and so bright
Breaking the bonds of surrender
Under the moon for our home we will fight
And we will die to defend her

And my voice is my violence
Clear the sky's frozen tears
And no more we'll be silent
With this Northerner's song in our ears

And we stand tall
Sons of the snow
We will not fall
Under these blows
For our hearts they are hardy
Our spirits are strong
And our voices are lifted into
This Northerner’s song
Northerner’s song
Northerner’s song

These perilous peaks
On the rim of the sky
I move in the midst
Of the clouds drifting by
At the top of the world
On a white, doomful day
Men of wisdom will show me the way

And we stand tall
Sons of the snow
We will not fall
Under these blows
For our hearts they are hardy
Our spirits are strong
And our voices are lifted into
This Northerner’s song

This one proved to be slower than the previous, but northern lords appreciated nonetheless. Tyrion spotted Margaery saying something into Jon’s ear, and he saw him nod. The first thing the wife asked to her husband. Without much surprise, he said yes. Jon Targaryen looked more comfortable than at the beginning of the day. The wine certainly helped. Everything was better when your belly was full of it.
The sixth service was the pie. It wasn’t as huge as the one for Joffrey’s wedding, but there was more than enough for everyone present. Unlike Joffrey, Jon Snow didn’t cut the pie with his sword. Tyrion thought that for the first time, Margaery Tyrell might have a marriage that would last if her husband did nothing stupid.

The seventh service consisted in a lightweight dessert. By this time, the music had changed to a slower beat, one that was fit for dancing. As soon as the seventh service was over, Daenerys stood up and all chatter ceased to listen to her. She announced it was time for the dance. Since it was a wedding, Jon Snow and Lady Margaery would have to open. As he walked to the dance floor, Tyrion noticed that his cousin-in-law was throwing a look that asked for help to Sansa. The latter seemed to enjoy the situation, very quietly and very discreetly.

The music started, and the new husband and wife began to dance. It wasn’t difficult to see how uneasy Jon Snow was, but luckily enough for him, Margaery was a very good dancer and led him perfectly. They were soon joined by other people and they disappeared in the crowd of dancers.

“Will you pardon me?” Sansa asked him after a moment.

“Enjoy yourself.” With a smile, Sansa left to join the dancers. She was very good at dancing. Right now, Tyrion regretted he wasn’t taller so he could be with his lady wife on the floor. As a result, he found himself alone with the queen.

“So that’s it,” she said after a while. “My dynasty is ensured.”

“Safer,” Tyrion corrected.

“Mirri Maz Duur thought she would put an end to House Targaryen by killing Drogo and Rhaego. I guess she never thought there was another Targaryen in this world. Or two.” She whispered the last two words for him. She looked with a sincere smile at him. A smile Cersei never had for him.

“Cersei believed she could execute me and put her father’s death on me. I guess she never thought that a Stark girl forcibly married to a dwarf would cause her downfall.”

They shared an accomplice smile. Tyrion looked at his wife dancing. He would never cease to be amazed by her beauty. She danced with Lord Glover, then changed and found herself dancing with Jon Snow.

“You know she doesn’t see herself as a Stark anymore,” the queen told him, taking him out of his reverie.

“Yes, I know,” he replied with an ounce of regret.

“Do you still feel like a Lannister?”

He settled back into his chair. “Yes, I do. Forgive me, your Grace, but it’s difficult to feel like a Targaryen when it’s been over thirty-five years that you thought you were a Lannister and did everything to feel worthy of being a Lannister. Much like Jon Snow… I mean Jon Targaryen will always feel like he’s a Snow, or a Stark, rather than a Targaryen.”

She nodded. “You know, I just announced to all the Seven Kingdoms that I was cutting all links with the previous Targaryen kings and establishing a new dynasty, but I still feel connected to my ancestors and to my father. Despite all the things I know he’s done, he’s still my father, and I still feel like he’s my father. Maybe it would have been different if I had known him. Maybe I would be able to hate him and to detach myself from him.”
“I’m not sure. Tywin Lannister seldom treated me as his son. To him, I was an embarrassment to his family. But when I think of him, even with everything he’s done to me, I still think about him as my father. I guess we can’t choose our family.”

He and Cersei had rare moments when they connected. These never lasted much long. Most of the time, it was when it was question of her children. For despite the fact Cersei and Tyrion despised each other, he always loved Tommen and Myrcella. Cersei probably never believed it, but he cared for her two youngest, and despite all his hatred for Joffrey, Tyrion would never have killed him like she thought. Nor would he ever have killed his father. He remained his father, and Cersei’s and Jaime’s.

With Daenerys, it was very different. In the silence they shared as they looked to the dancers, each understood the other. They could talk and understand each other very easily. Daenerys was no dwarf, and she was no bastard either, but she had spent her entire childhood under the fear of her brother Viserys, forced to flee from one city to another, always hiding from Robert’s assassins. They all faced great challenges, and here they were today, the Queen of Westeros and the Lord of Casterly Rock.

Tyrion commanded a new cup of wine and he emptied it. In the meantime, Daenerys left to talk with Varys and Marcon. Sansa had left the dancing floor. She was now talking with Lady Mira and Lady Margaery in a corner.

“Seems like I’m not the only one who feels like he doesn’t belong here.”

Tyrion was caught by surprise when he was addressed by Lord Davos Seaworth. “You still don’t feel like nobility?” Tyrion asked.

“I never will. I was born a smuggler. I will die a smuggler too.”

“People would believe now that you are Lord of the Dreadfort, you would feel more noble.”

“I don’t. Putting a ser or a lord in front of a name doesn’t change who the man bearing the name is.”

“You don’t feel like dancing?”

“No. I’m quite clumsy at it. Sailor’s legs are not made for dance. And my wife is not very enthralled to dance either.”

He looked in a direction and Tyrion saw the wife of the Onion Lord in discussion with Kinvara.

He kept talking with Lord Davos for a time, until a woman walked in their direction. She was of middle age with black hair, a tanned skin, and when she saluted them, her accent was impossible to hide. Mellario of Norvos, Lady of Sunspear and Princess consort of Dorne, wife of Doran of Martell.

“My husband Doran wished to speak to you, Lord Tyrion.”

“Well, it was nice to speak with you, Lord Davos,” Tyrion said before he followed the Lady of Sunspear. The Onion Lord bowed in respect and walked away. “Do you enjoy the festivities, my lady?”

“I would enjoy them more if my son was present,” she replied dryly.

“Things are complicated,” Tyrion said. “The last time Prince Trystane was here, we had a lot of problems.”
“I know. Doran already explained me everything. That doesn’t make what I said less true. I would enjoy this wedding much more if my son was present.”

“I’m sorry, my lady. I didn’t want to insult you.”

“You did not. I just don’t feel like I belong here. I never felt at home when my children were away.”

She stopped and looked at him. They were outside the dance floor. “Have you ever met my son?”

“I cannot say I have.”

“Trystane wrote to me from time to time. He mentioned you in his letters.”

“He did?”

“Only once. He talked to me about a discussion he had with your niece, Myrcella. He said she loved you very much.”

That wasn’t something he expected. “It was very kind of her.”

“The letter itself was all about the discussion he had with her. She said you used to spin her in circle, even after she grew up to be taller than you.”

Tyrion remembered that. “Yes, I did.”

“It may not be the best moment or the best place, but I would like you to tell me more about Myrcella later. I would like to know the girl my son loved.”

“Yes, of course. That’s not a problem.”

“Thank you. Doran is waiting for us.”

They resumed their path and arrived where the Lord of Sunspear was. His guard with the blade was standing behind him and watching everyone. When Tyrion approached, his hold on his spear tightened.

“Hotah, let them approach,” the prince told him from his wheelchair. The guard kept staring at Tyrion. He didn’t feel comfortable at all with this big man hovering over him. That kind of man created a large shadow.

“Lord Tyrion,” the Prince of Dorne saluted him.

“Prince Doran.”

“Finally, we meet. I regret we didn’t before, but you had the chance to know my brother.”

“Yes, I did. Very shortly, but I knew him.”

“Oberyn respected you. I found it surprising, considering you are a Lannister.”

Not as much a Lannister as you think, my prince. “I guess your brother was more than the bloodthirsty man ready to kill any Lannister he comes across, like some people believe.”

The prince nodded very slowly. “He was my brother.” There was a hint of accusation in his voice.

“And Myrcella was my niece.” Doran Martell didn’t reply for a moment.
“Did you plan for Oberyn to die when you had him fight the Mountain?” he finally asked.

“What I wanted was for your brother to kill the Mountain, so I could get rid of him, and so he could satisfy his desire of revenge. He saved me from the execution when Cersei accused me of my father’s murder. I had a debt toward him, and I was going to pay it. I tried to make sure your brother would win, and I failed. I’m sorry. But your brother was careless and insisted to deal with Clegane himself.”

“That doesn’t surprise me,” the prince said after a time. “Oberyn was never careful.”

“Now, it’s my turn to ask you a question. Did you have Myrcella killed?”

“We do not kill children in Dorne.”

“That’s not the question I asked.”

The Prince of Dorne sighed. “I tried to protect her, and I failed, just like you failed to protect Oberyn. We can either keep blaming each other and continue the cycle of revenge that killed so many of the people we loved, or we can acknowledge that all the people who killed them are now dead. I believe you had no hand in Oberyn’s death. I ask that you believe me when I say that I had no hand in Princess Myrcella’s death either. She was the woman my son loved, and I would never sentence a child to death because of her father’s or grandfather’s crimes.”

“Then we’re done killing and blaming each other,” Tyrion stated.

“We are. I don’t hold you responsible for your father’s crimes. Don’t hold me responsible for the crimes of my nieces.”

“I won’t.”

They shook hands then turned to other subjects. Some concerned the ongoing rebellion in Dorne and other matters of state, but they also talked of history, of dragons, and of their respective families. Doran Martell talked about the life Myrcella had while in Dorne, and Tyrion provided anecdotes about Oberyn Martell’s passage in King’s Landing. They were joined by Daenerys, Mace Tyrell and his wife later. The Lord of Highgarden offered his respects to Doran Martell and Lady Mellario. The two ladies talked with the queen while Tyrion discussed with the prince and the other lord. Lord Tyrell was affable, and Doran Martell proved to be very civil, though a certain animosity would point from time to time. Centuries of wars between the Reach and Dorne couldn’t be erased within one single conversation. Tyrion thought the conversation between the women was much less tensed.

A young woman with green eyes and brown hair, wearing northern clothes with touches that reminded the kingdom of the Reach, came to Tyrion.

“My lord, Lady Lannister needs to see you,” Lady Mira said.

Tyrion took leave from the Prince of Dorne and the Warden of the South and left with the Lady of Ironrath. Mira Forrester made a courtesy to Lord Tyrell before she walked away.

“I hope things are better at Ironrath, my lady,” Tyrion told her.

“They are getting better. We are rebuilding the castle.”

“Good. We don’t want your second child to grow in a home in ruins. It’s bad enough the first was born during a battle.” The wine was taking its toll on him.
“I don’t intend to let this one come into a world of terror,” she replied shortly.

They arrived where Sansa was standing. She was talking with Gerold Hightower, Lady Mira’s husband. The young man was now Lord of Ironrath. Tyrion didn’t know what to think of it. He still believed this man dishonored himself by leaving his wife behind with a child.

“Here you are.” The way Sansa said it and from the colors on her cheeks, Tyrion suspected she had more than her share of wine as well.

“Gerold, should we go and dance again?” Lady Mira asked her husband. He accepted immediately.

Tyrion and Sansa looked at them joining the other dancers. The music was quite swinging, and Tyrion saw sweat on more than one face. Then the music changed to a slower rhythm.

“Do you want to dance?”

Tyrion looked to Sansa. Had she really said it? “Are you sure, my lady? We will make quite an amusement for the other guests.”

She didn’t wait for a reply and seized him by the arm, dragging him to the dancing floor. Without really knowing what he was doing, Tyrion found himself dancing with his wife for the first time. He was tall enough to place his right hand on her waist, and Sansa was of course tall enough to lay her left hand on his shoulder. The other hands were joined. It was clumsy at first, but maybe because of the wine, Tyrion managed to forget about all the people around and that he was dwarf dancing with his wife who was at least two feet taller than him. He kept looking at Sansa, and for a long time they just turned around together. He got lost into the slow melody. There was only the two of them in the world.

He looked at her in detail for the first time since very long. He had noticed how she changed through their marriage, from the terrified girl of fourteen who was afraid to share the bed of the Imp to a young woman who would soon reach her twentieth name day. Her features had kept developing through this period. The last traces of childhood had disappeared.

He couldn’t get his eyes out of her, and she stared at him in the same fashion. He felt her shiver under his touch. Her blue eyes were shining, and a strand escaped her perfectly arranged hair.

The music stopped, and although their hands separated, they couldn’t take their eyes away from each other. She was so beautiful.

The herald chose this moment to hit the floor with his stick. Tyrion turned instinctively to see his sister standing next to the Iron Throne, well in sight of everyone.

“This is the first time I assist to a wedding in Westeros. Up to now, all the weddings I saw followed different customs from here. However, that doesn’t mean I am ignorant of the customs. And I know that as part of the wedding, there is also another ceremony, when the time comes for the bride and the groom to retire to their rooms.”

People shouted immediately, covering whatever Daenerys said afterwards.

“To bed! To bed! To bed! To bed!”

Margaery Tyrell got hoisted into the air right away by half-a-dozen pair of arms. Jon Snow followed suit not long afterwards. Tyrion supposed he really must be drunk for Jon Snow wouldn’t have laughed like this if he was in control of his actions.
People went back to dancing when the husband and the wife were gone, and the music started again. People resumed to dance. Tyrion looked to Sansa.

“Shall we retire, my lady?”

“Yes.”

They left the Small Hall and went to their personal room. Once in the bedchamber, Sansa fell onto their bed.

“I’m drunk,” she said, bursting into laughter.

“Me too.” Tyrion jumped on the bed and slowly approached his wife until he buried his face in her neck.

She smelled so good. He started to kiss her, and he could hear her giggles. As his hands began to wander over her body, the giggles were replaced by moans. Their tongues began to battle. She was so warm. One by one, their layers of clothes were removed, and they ended up making one. They were back to Casterly Rock, where nothing else mattered but their love. They had found each other again.

He woke up later, in the middle of the night, his body still covered with sweat despite the cold temperature. Across his position, Sansa was lying on her side, her face turned to him, her red hair covering half on her left cheek. He brought his hand to it and removed the glowing strands from her face. A timid smile was stamped on her face, probably there following their lovemaking. Tyrion kept caressing her face and tossing strands away from it. She didn’t wake up. He wouldn’t mind if she did, but he wouldn’t mind either if she didn’t wake up. All he wanted was for her to be happy. She was his wife, and right now that was all that mattered to him.

“Tyrion.”

He stopped in his motion. Sansa was still asleep. Her lips hadn’t moved. And it wasn’t her voice who said his name. It was a voice that haunted his dreams and his nightmares. He realized at this moment that Sansa’s hair shouldn’t be glistening they way they did. There was a light in the room. Tyrion turned his head to look at the origin of the voice and the light.

In the doorstep stood a woman who was probably at the end of her twenties, with black hair and blue eyes, wearing simple but well maintained clothes that most of the common folk in the cities of the Westerlands wore. She held a candle in her hand, glowing faintly. She also had a necklace. A simple, but pretty necklace. Tyrion frowned first. The jewel was identical to one he bought a long time ago. And then…

“T… Tysha?”

She gave him a sad half-smile. She was older, but it was her. “I was wondering if you would recognize me.” He turned to Sansa. She was still asleep. He was debating whether he should wake her up when Tysha interrupted his thoughts. “She will not wake up. At least, not for now. When she does, I’ll be gone.”

She sat down in a nearby chair and laid the candle on a table. All this time, she kept looking at him.

“Am I dreaming?” Tyrion asked.
She shrugged. “Does it matter?”

Tyrion didn’t know what to say. He didn’t know what was going on right now. He didn’t have the impression that he was dreaming, but at the same time the current events just seemed impossible.

“What are you here?”

“Truth be told, I don’t know.” She looked to Sansa, still sleeping peacefully, unaware of what was happening, if it was actually happening. Maybe Tyrion should try to wake her up, only to find out if what he was seeing was real. But was the Sansa sleeping by his side even real? If this was a dream, then she couldn’t be more real than the other woman sitting across their bed.

“She’s pretty,” Tysha said. “How old is she?”

“Nineteen,” he answered.

“And she was fourteen when you married her?” He didn’t need to voice his answer. She understood right away. “The same age,” his first wife whispered.

A certain time went on during which no one said anything. Tyrion was still uncertain of what was going on. At the same time, his eyes kept travelling between Tysha, sitting in front of him, and Sansa, sleeping by his side.

“Did you really believe I was a whore?” The silence turned heavy like steel.

“That’s what Jaime told me,” he replied weakly.

“And you believed him. I guess it’s understandable. Who would you choose to believe? The wife you’ve known for a fortnight, or the brother you’ve known since you were born?” She looked down. “Was there ever a moment when you doubted his word?”

“There were times I thought you truly loved me.”

“Only a few times?”

“Times.”

She closed her eyes, then reopened them. “I had a family before. I may have believed my brothers me too.”

Another silence followed. This one was unbearable for Tyrion. “I’m sorry.”

“I used to hate you, you know.”

“You were right to hate me. I should have protected you.”

“How? How would you have protected me from Tywin Lannister?”

“I should have tried.” Like he did for Sansa. He should have refused. Instead he obeyed his father, like a good dog, and he raped the woman he loved.

“Your father did this. He forced you to do it. He forced your brother to lie to you. He had me raped by his men. I still remember each of them. I remember every coin they put in my hand.” Tyrion remembered too. He especially remembered the golden dragon he placed himself. “It was Tywin Lannister who did it.” She inhaled and exhaled slowly. “And now he’s dead.”
“Yes, he’s dead.” Gods be praised, whether they existed or not. “And Jaime will spend the rest of his life at the Wall.”

“Good riddance.”

“Yes,” he said in a whisper he doubted she heard. His relationship with Jaime had forever changed when he told him the truth, but at the same time, Tyrion couldn’t help but try to find him excuses. Most of the time, he tossed them away, but he kept looking for some reasons to forgive Jaime.

Their eyes met. They stared at each other for a very long time. They had never looked at each other this way before. Tyrion remembered how full of love the eyes of his first wife were while they lived in that cottage near the Sunset Sea. Later she had looked at him begging for help, and afterwards she never looked at him again.

“What do you want?” If she wanted to kill him, she could do it right away. He wouldn’t offer any resistance. He thought of what he did to her, of what he did at Castamere, of what he almost did at the Crag. If it hadn’t been for Sansa…

He looked at her. Then his eyes moved to the door that gave on the nursery where Joanna was kept.

“I want to tell you… that I forgive you.” He looked back to Tysha. “I used to hate you for what you did to me, but not anymore. It’s your father who did all this, and no one else. You have a wife now, a child, and you will have more. There is so much you can offer to the others, to this world. You can make it better than when your father lived. You are a good man, Tyrion. I know it. I’ve seen it with my own eyes when I was your wife, and you’re still the good man I married back then.”

“I don’t think I’m a good man.”

“Yes, you are.”

“I raped you.” He looked away. “I burned people alive.”

“You also saved millions of people, and you saved Sansa.” It was strange to hear Sansa’s name from the mouth of his first wife. “No one is perfect. Your father was evil. There is some evil in you, it’s true. But you don’t have to follow it. You’re not your father, Tyrion.” He heard it before. Back at the Twins, before he executed sons of Walder Frey.

“You have so much to give,” she continued. “Don’t let the past stop you. You have a good life ahead of you, and people who are counting on you. Be happy.”

“I could have been happy with you.” He looked at her. He saw the beginning of tears take shape in her eyes. Then she looked down and shook her head.

“I wasn’t meant to be your wife. Sansa was.”

She stood up, took the candle and walked to the door. Before she opened it and left, she turned to him one last time.

“Farewell, my love,” she said in a strangled voice.

Long after she was gone, Tyrion realized he was crying. He wiped the tears from his face and rose from the bed. He put a nightgown and went to the nursery. The servant was dozing next to the crib. Tyrion chased her and climbed on the stool. Joanna was sleeping peacefully. She inherited her mother’s ability to sleep, it seemed. He took her into his arms. She didn’t wake up. He held her through the whole night.

She looked very much like a Lannister. At the same time, Tyrion noticed the similarities with Sansa. She would have high cheekbones, like her. He almost lost her, and that led him to commit atrocities he would never forget. He could have emptied Castamere before he burned it, or he could have let the other people get out and burn it over the head of Rolph Spicer. He could have refused to rape Tysha. He could have avoided the slaughter of the Northerners at Moat Cailin. There were so many things he could have done differently.

_You’re not your father, Tyrion._ He wasn’t sure if he was or not. At the Crag, when he decided to eliminate all House Westerling, he thought he couldn’t run away from who he was, from who his father was. But at the same time, Tyrion couldn’t deny that he had tried to be different from his father since the very beginning. In the very least, he never wanted to be like him. He wanted his father to approve him, to consider him as a son, but he never wanted to be like his father. No matter who his father was, he didn’t want to be like him. That was why he didn’t kill the Westerlings finally. Sansa reminded him. _How are you different from your father then?_ That shook him, and he realized how wrong he was.

Somehow, he envied Daenerys. She never got to know her father. The Mad King would have been terrible with her. Tyrion didn’t have the same chance. He didn’t grow up with his biological father, but he grew up with one who was as horrible if not more with him. His daughter was resting in his lap. He didn’t want to be like Tywin or Aerys. He wanted to be a different father for his daughter.

When the day arrived and that a greyish light started to enter the nursery, Sansa walked in, wearing a red nightgown, yawning. She smiled at him when she saw him with their daughter in his arms.

“You couldn’t sleep?”

“No. A woman kept me awakened.”

She didn’t question him further, probably not understanding the true meaning of his words, and came to sit by his side, caressing the short blond hair that was growing on Joanna’s head. “Was the woman in question quiet?”

“Very.”

Slowly, his left hand took her right one. They looked to each other, like they did the last evening. He thought of what his two fathers had done to their wives. He wouldn’t submit Sansa to the same horrors. She was his wife, and he wanted to be a good husband.

“I love you,” he said, meaning it more than ever.

“I love you too,” she replied.

And they remained sitting there, with their daughter between them. She opened her eyes and looked at both of them, a huge smile appearing on her lips. Tyrion thought that probably for the first time, they were a real family.
And with this "A Shadow and a Wolf" almost ends. There's only an epilogue left and it should be uploaded the next week-end, on Saturday if I have no inconvenient.

Chapter Notes

Hi everyone. Here is the last chapter of "A Shadow and a Wolf". This is the end of a work that started two years, eight months and fifteen days. I hope you loved to read it as much as I loved to write it, and I hope it will be the same for the concluding chapter of this great adventure.

EPILOGUE

40 years later

She shook her head, then when it didn’t succeed, she tossed the blond hair that flew in her eyes aside with her left hand. The wind was strong, as usual when she rode her dragon. Having your hair flying into your face was a small inconvenience of flying. Ever since the day she climbed on him for the first time, she had always loved flying on the dragon’s back. He could be older, he was still strong and capable of flying from the sandy dunes of Dorne to the icy mountain’s peaks of the Lands of Always Winter.

For now, the feeling of freedom and elation that came with the flight allowed her to push back the concerns that tormented her. She knew it wouldn’t last, for when she would land, the time would come to face the problem. In the meantime, she enjoyed the moment. Below her, the landscape was populated with small villages and farm lands coexisting with forests, hills and a few mountains.

The North had changed within the last decades. Joanna knew that the winter that followed the War of the Dead, also known as the Great War, was very hard for all the Seven Kingdoms. Her father told her he had travelled to Dorne when this winter was coming to an end and that snow could be seen on the hills. If snow covered the dunes of Dorne, she could barely imagine how it was here, in the North.

The winter in question lasted three years. It took everyone by surprise. Everyone expected this winter would last at least five years, probably more. But no, it only lasted three. It didn’t mean this winter had been easy. The North had already been devastated by wars in the years preceding the Great War, but the invasion of the White Walkers almost condemned it. Some maesters estimated that the North had lost half of its male population between the beginning of the War of the Five Kings and the end of the Great War, and that was without counting the women, the children and the old. Everything north of Winterfell had been devastated and all life in the region eradicated. The southern part of the North had fared better but faced its own share of battles and lost many men as well.

The winter had claimed many more people. Even the Free Folk, used to harsh winter, could barely survive. The Dothrakis who had been settled on these lands, unprepared for winter, died by the thousands. Some were happy about it, feeling Dothrakis were better allies when they were dead than alive. The situation was the cause of many skirmishes and clashes to claim what few food and livestock was available, increased by the tensions between the three different nations that shared the same territory and who followed different laws.

The Night’s Watch barely survived. By the end of the Great War, with the new recruits from the prisoners of war who chose to join it, the Night’s Watch could only count five hundred men. Most of the castles on the Wall were occupied by the Free Folk. At the end of the winter, barely two hundred men had survived. Three Lord Commanders perished, victims of the weather. There were so few men left that the brothers of the Watch chose the last man who was ready to lead the Night’s Watch. It was her uncle, Jaime Lannister.

She met her uncle three times. The first was when she was sixteen. She decided to make the tour of the Seven Kingdoms, and her father allowed her. She travelled everywhere, beginning by the Reach and continuing to Dorne, then coming back north through the former Stormlands and the Crownlands, making her way along the Kingsroad to the Trident, then going to the Vale and finally visiting the North before coming back home. When she went to Castle Black, a dark castle at the feet of the gigantic stone wall deprived of its ice, Ser Jaime Lannister was waiting for her. He was an old man at the end of his fifties, yet she could recognize the traces of his former shining blond hair in the white ones he now had. Despite his age, he proved to be in excellent physical condition. She saw him spar with his men in the courtyard and none could defeat him. He also fought the knights who accompanied her during her journey, and they met the same fate. They didn’t talk a lot together. Her lord father seldom spoke of his brother, and although he refused to share the reason with her, she suspected something grave had happened, something that wasn’t the murder of the Mad King or their sister. Anytime she tried to engage a conversation with him about it, he excused himself and changed the topic. However, by the end of her visit, he gave her a message for her father. She brought it back with her and gave it to him as soon as she came back to King’s Landing.

That was when her father told her the truth about his first marriage. When she met him again a few years later, they talked about it. Ser Jaime Lannister had nothing to say for his defense. She could see however how much he regretted his actions. When news came the next year that the Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch was dying, she convinced her lord father to fly to the Wall before it was too late. They arrived just in time. She left her father and his brother alone together. No one knew what was said, or if anything was said, but when Ser Jaime Lannister gave his last breath and her father came out of the room, he didn’t say a word. He was devastated.

Now the Night’s Watch was strong of five thousand men. Movements between the Realm and the lands north of the Wall were constant but closely supervised by the Watch. Most of the Free Folk had gone back to live north of the Wall when the winter was over, but many of the tribes maintained good relations with the Crown. Legal trade and travel between the two worlds were no longer prohibited.

After the Last Winter, the climate of Westeros had changed drastically, especially in the northern kingdoms. It had now been thirty-eight years since snow was seen somewhere else than the highest mountains of the continent. A consensus had grown among the maesters that winter would never come again. The cause lied with a volcano north of the Wall. The place where the White Walkers were created was right at the feet of this mountain. It erupted when the place in question was destroyed by the queen Daenerys and the prince Jon. The gases that were then released by the volcano, gases still rejected today, created a kind of a screen that first stopped the heat of the sun from reaching the land. As a result, temperatures dropped, causing the colder winter in living memory. Gases dissipated with time and the air warmed up. The volcano kept throwing gases however, but less than before. Instead of stopping the heat from reaching the land, it prevented it from leaving. As a result, the temperature increased further, and places where summer snow was usual became warm and fit for agriculture. Today, all the southern part of the North had changed for that activity as a way of subsistence. Changes were slower in the northern part, where the soil needed time to adjust, but crops could already be seen growing near the Last Hearth and on the banks of the Last River.

All that, Joanna could see it from where she sat. All the progress made under the reign of Daenerys Targaryen was visible from the skies. With the help of her nephew, the prince and heir Jon Targaryen, and the Hand of the Queen, Tyrion Lannister, the queen ensured peace and prosperity to Seven Kingdoms and their inhabitants. Lands devoted to hunting or deemed useless were converted to farming. New roads were built, old ones were repaired or extended. The same happened with harbors, especially in the Westerlands and the Crownlands. The conjunction of peace and the disappearance of winter allowed the population of Westeros to increase, helped in that by new sanitary measures in cities that allowed to reduce the circulation of diseases and enhanced life conditions for millions of people. Her father was no stranger to these reforms. He used to say that his lord father probably never thought that putting his second son in charge of the cisterns and drains of the Rock would someday improve the life of the common people.

The royal army helped to achieve these results. Two years after her coronation, the queen announced that the Unsullied would train recruits from the common people of the Crownlands to fill their ranks that began to dwindle. The following year, commoners of the Vale were allowed to join the recruitment as well. Five years after the coronation, all the common people of the Seven Kingdoms were welcomed in the army. Another five years and the queen officially announced the creation of the Army of the Realm. It already existed in the facts, but it was announced officially for the first time. Made of ten thousand permanent units and ten thousand more in reserve, the Army of the Realm was stationed all over the Crownlands and the Vale, with its largest contingent in Storm’s End. Seven officers, chosen by the queen, commanded the permanent units. They were to swear loyalty to the queen and to be at her service for all the duration of their service, like all the other soldiers. They had to forsake all the other oaths they made during this period. The units in reserve were commanded by seven other officers. Four of them were chosen by the four Wardens of the North, the South, the West and the East. This meant the queen could choose one, since she was officially the Warden of the East. Another officer was named by the Prince of Dorne, the sixth by the Lord Paramount of the Trident, and the last by the Governor of the Vale.

The Army of the Realm spent its first ten years of unofficial existence serving as both an army and a workforce. Still today, it fulfilled both functions. The Unsullied at first tried to maintain order in the Crownlands. They had a lot of work with the unification of the former Stormlands to the royal lands. They also helped to rebuild King’s Landing and enforce the law in its streets while the City Watch was being reconstituted. And they worked to make the roads more practical for winter. When the Last Winter came to an end, they kept working on extending and improving the network of roads in the Crownlands. Guard posts were established all along the network and especially along the Kingsroad. Two years after the end of winter, the Grand Maester Marcon could declare that the saying that a maid could travel from Dorne to the Wall while keeping her purse and her virginity had finally come true.

The Seven Kingdoms were at peace, and Joanna could see it from where she was. Now she could also see Winterfell taking shape from afar. She was close to the castle. It wouldn’t be long before she landed in the courtyard and was reunited with people she longed to see.

Outside its walls spread the Winter Town. It didn’t change much since the last time Joanna came. Its thousands of houses and minor buildings were still the same, dwarfed by the tall towers of the castle. Joanna knew it was only in appearance that the town didn’t expand. When her grandfather Eddard Stark was still alive, four of five homes in the town were deserted during summer. It was during winter that the town became one of the most populated settlements in the North, when families of everywhere in the North gathered to survive the hardships of winter. The town and its buildings were made to face the harsh winters of the North, but it wasn’t enough to prevent people from dying every day during the Last Winter.

The Winter Town was emptied after this winter was over. The first time she came to Winterfell, Joanna couldn’t help but be surprised by how such a vast town was empty of people. But every time she came back in the years that followed, the population of the town had increased. Now that she was approaching, Joanna noticed a few new houses in the outskirts. The population of the town had grown over the decades, slowly but surely. Now it had grown enough for new homes to be needed, as empty buildings were no longer enough to welcome new inhabitants. A direct result of her father’s policy to offer men of the south with families, but with nothing for their living, an access to the new cultivated lands of the North as they were opened to farming. Even with the increase of the natural population of the North after the Last Winter, the Northerners weren’t enough to occupy the whole land. Settlers from the other kingdoms filled the void, and the North would soon be a kingdom not only remarkable by its size, but also by its population.

Joanna ordered Viserion to descend more gently. The towers of Winterfell were looming closer. They were now at their level. She could see the people on the ground looking up to them, and the faces of the sentinels on the battlements. Viserion slowed down as he neared the courtyard. When he was above it he flapped his wings to hover, then slowly and carefully reduced his altitude. That gave more than enough time to the people in the courtyard to clear the ground. Joanna safely landed and Viserion folded his wings.

Winterfell. The last time she came here was five years ago. It hadn’t changed a bit. For all that was said the North was changing, Winterfell would never change. It would always stand here, proud, a proof that the Starks would always rule the North.

She dismounted her dragon and came to rub Viserion’s head. He closed his eyes. Of the four dragons in Westeros, he was the smallest and the kindest of all. No wonder he chose her father as a rider.

She removed the hood covering her head, letting her long hair fall free. In formal events, she would have them brush so that they would fall over her shoulders and on both sides of her face, but while riding, whether it was a horse or a dragon, it was better to keep them behind your head. They had fewer chance to block her vision.

The household of Winterfell was looking at her. They all knew her. She had come here very often. Still, they stayed away, maybe because they were afraid of Viserion, and probably out of respect as well. The Mistress of Coin deserved respect as an advisor of the queen.

He came out of the Great Hall, wearing the traditional heavy furs of House Stark. His short stern auburn hair contrasted with the brightness of his green eyes. He told her once how uncomfortable the furs were in hot temperature, but how important it was to be seen with them regularly, in order to honor the traditions of the North. He stopped in front of her, arms crossed on his chest. A woman taller than him followed behind, her green eyes pale in comparison to that of her husband.

“Lady Joanna,” the Lord of Winterfell welcomed her.

“Lord Stark.”

They stayed there for a moment. Slowly, a smile crept on both their faces. He opened his arms.

“Come here, sister.”

“Robb.” She let herself be taken in an embrace with her little brother.

Robb was seven years younger than her. Called after their uncle the Young Wolf, he had inherited enough Stark features for the Northerners to accept him. The people of Winterfell said they could see some of Eddard Stark in him, and more of Robb Stark. He had grown up in the North from the age of six, raised mostly by tutors and servants, mentored by Davos Seaworth, the Lord of the Dreadfort at the time and acting Warden of the North on behalf of her lady mother until Robb reached his majority. Lord Davos had died when Robb was only ten. Jon Targaryen had come back to Winterfell after that. He assumed the wardenship of the North for six years, still officially on the behalf of his cousin. When Robb reached the right age, he stepped aside and let him assume all responsibilities as Warden of the North and Lord of Winterfell. At the age of twenty, Robb married a lady of House Manderly, who sadly died in childbirth a year later. The child only survived his mother for a week. Devastated, Robb needed eight years before he wed again, this time with Alysanne Glover, the woman who was standing next to him. She and Joanna welcomed each other as it was appropriate.

“How are Brandon and Sansa?” Joanna asked.

“Brandon is sick. He couldn’t come out. As for Sansa, she’s too young. But they're both strong. You don’t have to worry about their well-being,” his wife said.

“If you say so.”

She looked at her brother. By his expression, she knew he asked her, as usual, to be forgiving with his wife. Lady Alysanne was very protective of her children.

“We’ll have a feast tonight to honor your visit. The hospitality of Winterfell is yours,” Alysanne added.

“I thank you.” Her brother was the Warden of the North and no one could put that into question. But at Winterfell, it could be debated if he was its lord, for his wife ruled the place like she owned it.

“Where is she?” Joanna asked Robb. His face took a sadder expression.

“You’ll find her in the godswood.”

“Thank you.”

She spoke in Valyrian to Viserion and he flew away to hunt. She headed for the godswood where she would find the person she was looking for. The godswood of Winterfell was among the largest in the Seven Kingdoms. She needed time to reach its center, where Joanna suspected she would find her. She wasn’t wrong. Sitting on a stump next to the weirwood, her lady mother had her eyes closed.

Lady Sansa Lannister of House Stark had been called the most beautiful lady in the Seven Kingdoms by many people, her lord husband the first. Though it didn’t mean much. Many women could claim to be the most beautiful woman in the world. The queen herself and Joanna received that nickname more than their share, and so did Margaery Tyrell. Joanna never cared for these flatteries, no more than she cared about the resemblance many people noticed between her and her aunt. Or at least she tried to.

The Mad Queen, as Cersei Lannister was known today, had been her father’s sister. Tyrion Lannister never had something good to say about her. She had tried to kill her parents more than once. Cersei Lannister even placed a price on her head when Joanna was just out of the crib. She burned half the city of King’s Landing. Scars of her fires still lingered in the capital today. She saw a portrait of her one day. To her discouragement, Joanna was indeed the picture of her aunt. Her parents assured her when she was very young that it didn’t matter, that she had nothing to see with that woman, but it was difficult when whoever had known Cersei Lannister was surprised and thought for a moment she was back among the living whenever they met Joanna for the first time.

She had steeled herself against this the best she could, and her family was never bothered by the resemblance. Her father was very supportive. Her mother as well. That woman was only sixteen when she gave birth to Joanna. Now at fifty-eight, her youth, that Joanna witnessed for the first twenty years of her life, was gone, replaced by wrinkles. She had kept her high cheekbones, and among the hair that turned greyer every year, half the strands were still red as an autumn sunset. Behind the closed eyelids were blue eyes still full of life.

“Mother,” she called as soon as she was close enough.

The two eyes opened and looked at her. Immediately, a quiet smile took shape on the thin lips. “I suspected it was you. You’re the only one who can ride Viserion.” Her lady mother slowly stood up and came to hold her daughter into her arms. Joanna didn’t protest and gave in. She laid her head on her mother’s shoulder, and her mother did the same. They were of the same height. “My little girl.”

“I’m glad to see you, Mother. It’s been a long time.”

“Let’s walk a little. I need to stretch my legs.”

They wandered through the godswood. Sansa Lannister was still quite robust, though Joanna noticed she walked slower than before. She hoped it was only because her mother wanted to enjoy the moment longer than because her health was declining.

“How do you feel?” Joanna asked her.

“Better. It’s still difficult, but better.”

“Maybe you should come back. It’s been a year already.” She let some time for her mother to think about it, then added, “We all miss you.”

Her lady mother stopped to look at a tree with triangle leaves. For a long time, she just stared at it.

“We will talk about it after dinner. Give me some time,” she told her daughter. Joanna didn’t dare to refuse. It was difficult for her, but far more difficult for her mother. So she gave her the time she required, and they spent the hours that followed walking among the trees and pools.

Her lady mother might not want to talk about the very subject that brought Joanna in the North, but she desired to talk about other things. She asked questions about her children, and also about her grandchildren.

Gerion had not changed. He was the elder son of Tyrion and Sansa Lannister, the heir to Casterly Rock from the moment he was born. Joanna was only three years older than him. Despite their proximity in age and the great similitudes in their physical appearance, from their green eyes to their shining golden hair, they had nothing in common. Joanna had been quick of wits and mind very early, surprising the two maesters who took charge of her education. At thirteen, she was already discussing matters of state with her parents at dinner, and even with the queen when she was present. At sixteen, she was writing books on dragonlore. Two of them ended in all the libraries of the Seven Kingdoms in the years that followed. At nineteen, she was managing the Westerlands for her lord father, occupied in King’s Landing to help the queen manage the entire Realm. Five years ago, she became the first woman to occupy the seat of Master of Coin on the small council. Her place was among books, with numbers and columns, or inspecting infrastructures, lands, roads and mines to find ways to better operate them. She was good at ruling as well. She had great knowledge of the laws of the Seven Kingdoms, general laws and those applying to specific areas. The queen had considered her for the office of Master of Laws first. When the position was open ten years ago, she wanted Joanna to take it, but her lord father opposed. Not that he doubted her abilities, but he needed her at Casterly Rock, and maybe he also waited for a better position to open up for her. Five years later, it was her father who suggested to appoint her Mistress of Coin. She had enough time to make Gerion Lannister had been officially acting Lord of Casterly Rock, in the absence of his father who was Hand of the King, since he was thirteen. Betrothed since he was twelve, married at seventeen, he had proved his ability to father children, and not only through the three sons and the daughter he had with his lady wife. However, he never really ruled. Gerion was only at ease when he was holding a sword in his hand, or a crossbow, or a bow and arrows. He spent his days practicing his skills at battle, riding, patrolling around the lands of the Rock or in the streets of Lannisport. There had been a time when his only desire was to go to war and prove himself to be the best swordsman in the Seven Kingdoms. He had the opportunity when the Iron Islands rebelled in Year 18 of the New Dynasty. The queen of the Iron Islands, Yara Greyjoy, had died in a tragic accident at sea. Her son, too young to rule, was left in the care of Lord Rodrik Harlaw who acted as Regent. However, Harlaw couldn’t stop the movement in the islands that asked for the Ironmen to go to war against the Seven Kingdoms. Rumors circulated that their queen was killed in an attack from a vessel of the Reach. A group of twelve ships from the island of Great Wyk accosted in the Reach and ravaged many villages. The attack was too sudden and unexpected, and the local lords had no time to react. By the time their forces arrived, the Ironmen were gone, leaving a trail of fuming villages, raped women and murdered children behind them. The retaliation was immediate. All ships of the Iron Islands that were in the harbors of the Reach were seized. Some of the crew were killed when they resisted. Rodrik Harlaw tried to stop the escalation in vain. Without the authorization of their king, all the Iron Islands but Pyke and Harlaw rebelled and declared war against Daenerys Targaryen.

The war was short-lived. Within two months, the Iron Islands were defeated. Each and every lord in the islands waged war in his own way. They had no general to command their whole fleet. The three dragons, Drogon, Viserion and Margarion set all the fleets on fire. The islands and their castles were besieged, and soon all the rebels surrendered or were defeated. Rodrik Harlaw had not rebelled, so he could remain regent and Yara’s son was still king. However, he had to accept garrisons on the islands that rebelled for ten years. That didn’t stop queen Yara’s son, Balon, from rebelling when his uncle died. He foolishly gathered his fleets and made to Lannisport, trying to repeat Euron Greyjoy’s plot to destroy the Lannister fleet and hence have total control on the Sunset Sea. It failed. Her lord father had learned from the attack of the Iron Islands that he witnessed in his childhood. And the garrisons on the islands and Varys’ network of spies warned them of the upcoming attack. Together, Joanna and Gerion with the help of their lord father, they prepared for the invasion. When the Iron Fleet arrived, it was surrounded from all sides. The ships of the Lannister fleet boarded or sunk those on the flanks, while Viserion, that the Ironmen didn’t expect to be there, burned down the others. Barely twenty chips managed to escape, including one with King Balon. Without ships to protect their islands, the Ironmen were quickly invaded. Most of the work was done by the Westerlands. Gerion planned the whole invasion. In the first rebellion, he proved his ability on the battlefield as a knight. In the second, he proved he was also capable of conducting battles and leading a war. By the time the men of their brother Robb and the soldiers of the Reach arrived, half of the islands were conquered, and Pyke was under siege. After six months of resistance, Pyke fell and Balon Greyjoy was executed. His sister Bala was sent into exile and the Iron Islands became officially part of the Westerlands by a decree of the Queen Daenerys.

So was Gerion Lannister. A knight, a great swordsman, a wonderful duelist, a gifted bowman, a war strategist probably more clever than his father. But a lord? Not at all. Joanna had been the one ruling the Westerlands for twenty years. When Gerion conquered the Iron Islands, it was her job to put into place a system that would allow to keep control over the islands. It was a task she would have happily given to another. The Iron Island were a constant source of worry, a pot of wildfire ready to blow at the first opportunity. Despite this, she enjoyed ruling the Westerlands. It became obvious very early that Gerion could never be a lord like their father. He wasn’t fit for that. They tried to have him take care of politics and administrative matters, to no avail. Gerion remained the warrior who led the armies of the Westerlands and rode with his men on his own lands to apply the law while Joanna served justice, held court, negotiated with their bannermen and ruled the lands of their family. All in all, they made a perfect pair, completing each other. She and Gerion had a very good relationship. Unlike the woman and the man they looked like, there was never any thought of incest between them. They loved each other like a brother and a sister. When she was named Mistress of Coin and left for King’s Landing, Gerion was very sad. They had come to rely on each other and were inseparable despite their differences. Although she left very capable officers behind her to fulfill the duties she once performed, Joanna knew her brother would rather have her by his side.

It was some time since she had seen Serena, but she gave what news she had of her little sister. Six years under Joanna, she was married to the Lord of the Hightower. It had taken a lot of maneuvering from her father to arrange this marriage, but he succeeded. She now had four children. Two were already knights, and one of her daughters was to marry very soon into House Lefford.

As for Ned, their little brother to them all, his activities were growing. The Bank of Lannisport that he founded had expanded its activities to Oldtown and White Harbor. He was now considering to open an establishment in King’s Landing, though the laws made it much more difficult to start and conduct banking activities in the city. An undesirable effect of well-intentioned but poor policies to protect borrowers from their lenders. The queen had insisted to pass along this legislation, despite her father’s best efforts to dissuade her.

Ned. The only one of them who inherited their father’s dwarfism. He had suffered from it in his childhood. Despite his parents being very close to him and Joanna’s own efforts to be close to him, he shut up to a large part of the world very quickly. Finally, he made his way into the world. He didn’t want to be respected only because he was a Lannister. He wanted to prove to everybody that he was capable of something. Hence, with a small amount of money their parents gave him, he created his own trade when he was only eighteen. Five years later, he gave back all the money to his father, with interests, saying he should see it as an investment, not a gift.

He was the most lonely of their family, but that didn’t mean he hated them. During the first rebellion of the Iron Islands, Gerion was severely hurt. His wound festered and he almost died. Ned left all his activities behind and spent an entire month by his brother’s side until he was sure he would recover. He said that whenever they needed help, they could count on him. They seldom needed it, but they appreciated it all the time he did something for them.

Her mother asked her questions about Ned’s bride. Indeed, their little brother was betrothed… to the daughter of a wheelwright. Joanna hadn’t met her. She had been shocked to hear about it, but after thinking about it, she thought she ought not to be so surprised. After all, Ned didn’t care whether someone was nobility or not. No more than their own lord father when he got married the first time. If he was happy with this woman, she could live with it. It wasn’t as if he was the heir to Casterly Rock anyway.

She spent the whole afternoon telling her mother everything she knew about her brothers and sister. When the evening closed on them, they went separate ways to prepare for dinner. Joanna hadn’t changed since she arrived. She took a bath, had her hair brushed and combed, and put on a purple gown she brought with her.

The feast was great. It was simpler, less organized than the feasts she organized at Casterly Rock or the ones she participated to in King’s Landing, but it was more than satisfying. The most satisfying part was that she spent it talking with her brother. Their mother didn’t talk much, but she seemed to enjoy it, quietly, in her own way, a smile always displayed on her lips. It was good to see her feel better.
After dinner, when everyone had gone back to their rooms, Joanna walked to the apartments of her lady mother. She let her enter when Joanna announced her presence. Sansa Lannister was looking through the window in the night. Days ended earlier here than in the south. Winter might have disappeared, but days still grew shorter as you progressed north.

“You said we would talk about it after dinner. Should I remind you that a Lannister always pays her debts?” Joanna said.

“You don’t have to. I’ve known for a very long time.” Her mother stood away from the window and came to sit on her bed. “I miss him,” she said in a tired voice.

“We all miss him,” Joanna said in a low tone.

“One year. One year now since he left us.”

Joanna closed her eyes and sat next to her lady mother. Indeed, one year to the day, her lord father had left them. He died peacefully in his bed while he was sleeping. The maester said he felt nothing. Apparently, her father had drunk a lot the previous evening. The maester warned him to not drink too much at his age. At the age of seventy-six, Tyron Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands, Warden of the West, Hand of the Queen, dragonrider, gave his last breath.

There had been a huge tournament in Lannisport during the two weeks that preceded his death. Gerion had won it. That was probably why he drank so much. Gerion confessed some time later that he had been drinking with their father but, too much drunk as he was, he didn’t notice how much his father drank. Gerion still blamed himself for that today.

Because of the tournament, most of the court was there. Daenerys and Jon Targaryen, the half-sister and the nephew of Joanna’s father, although very few knew it (she was the only one of his children to know the truth), were present, and so were the grandchildren of the queen. Gerion, Ned, Serena, Robb, all the Lannisters, they were all reunited for this occasion. What should have been a time for celebration turned into a general mourning. Funerals were organized. Her father’s body was exposed for a complete week in the sept of Lannisport. Their mother watched over him all the time. She refused to leave him except to shit and piss. Joanna relayed with her siblings to bring her food and keep her company. She also received the visits of septons and discussed with people who had come to pay their last respects to Lord Lannister. It seemed everyone was there. Even the High Priestess Kinvara, the Mistress of Whisperers, who everyone believed was in King’s Landing, came to comfort her lady mother. She left for Winterfell with Robb not long after the burial.

“I came here so you wouldn’t be alone,” Joanna told her.

“Thank you. But you should be with your brothers, and with Serena. I already have Robb here.”

“We need you to be there. All of us. Don’t you think it’s time for you to come back?”

“I don’t belong to Casterly Rock anymore.”

“What are you saying? You are the mother of its actual lord. You’ve been the wife of its lord for over forty years. You had five children, four with the Lannister name, and the only one who didn’t receive it was for political reasons.”

“My place is no longer there.” When she looked to Joanna, she was crying. “Your father is dead. Casterly Rock doesn’t feel like home anymore.” She looked around to the walls and the roof of her bedroom. “This is my home. This is where I grew up, where I was born. Your father used to tell me that I would always be a Stark. Never forget what you are, he said." She touched the golden necklace picturing a lion she always wore. "I tried to listen to him, but I couldn’t. I didn’t feel like a Stark anymore. I was a stranger here. At Casterly Rock, I felt I was home. But now that he’s dead, I don’t feel it is anymore. Casterly Rock was only my home while your father was alive. I don’t belong there anymore."

“You remember when you once told me that a mother’s place was next to her children. Well, you have one child at Casterly Rock, and another living right next to it. And right now, your other daughter is with them, commemorating their father’s death, and I would be with them too if it wasn’t for you. So tell me. If your children are at Casterly Rock and your place is at their side, why wouldn’t you belong there?”

Her mother sighed. “You should learn to forget what I say.”

“Like the threat to never talk to me again if I refused to marry Eddard Tully?”

“Oh, please.” Her mother hid her face inside her hands. Joanna couldn’t stop herself from laughing. She mentioned the accident on purpose. “I feel horrible whenever I think about it.”

It happened when Joanna was twenty. Ever since she was twelve, her parents tried to arrange her a betrothal. However, when at thirteen her lord father announced her he was about to conclude a betrothal between her and Jon Targaryen’s eldest son, the future heir to the Iron Throne, she made such a scene and a crisis that Lord Tyrion decided to never conclude a marriage contract for one of his children without his or her approval. His lady wife wasn’t very happy about that, and for cause.

Joanna refused all the pretenders who came to her. She refused to even consider the possibility of getting married. She didn’t tell her parents, but she would hear nothing about marriage. She didn’t know why exactly. Maybe it was because she didn’t want to be bound to a man and wanted to maintain her independence. Perhaps there was also the fact she had never been interested in men. She wasn’t interested in women either. She talked about it with her father once, and he was stunned. He said the only person like that he ever saw in his life was Varys, the now deceased Master of Whisperers. After some research, he came back to her and told her she was among the very few people in the population who felt no sexual attraction to anybody or anything. The fact remained that she refused again, and again, and again to marry.

Finally, her lady mother invited her uncle’s eldest son, Eddard Tully, Lord of Riverrun and Lord Paramount of the Trident, during another tourney. He rode with Joanna’s favor in the tournament. He allowed him to wear it only because she thought it would make no difference. She didn’t care about it. He also danced with her at the ball that closed the tournament. By the end of the night, he proposed to her, and she kindly refused.

Her lady mother had summoned her in the middle of the night. Her lord father was yawning, obviously longing for sleep. Apparently, Joanna’s mother had arranged everything about the visit, hoping her daughter would say yes. It was true that she always got along very well with Eddard, but it changed nothing. She didn’t want to marry, as strange as it may seem for a woman who didn’t want to be a septa or a Silent Sister.

It wasn’t her mother who revealed all this to her. She left Joanna with her father, saying he had something to tell her. Her father proved to be way calmer than his wife. They had a very long discussion, during which Joanna explained why she didn’t want to marry. At first, he was skeptical and tried to tell her everything she would miss, but she wouldn’t change her mind. In the end, she reminded him of his promise to never marry her to someone she didn’t want to. He had looked down to his desk. When he raised his head, a mournful smile was on his face.
“Sometimes, a lord must do what a lord must. Tell Lady Lannister to come in,” he shouted to his squire.

“So?” her mother had asked, looking straight at Joanna. But it had been her father who spoke. He looked very tired.

“Well, it seems our daughter has a very difficult choice to make. She must decide whether or not she will marry a man she doesn’t want to marry.”

“She has to marry one day,” Joanna’s mother had protested. “We were not in love when we were wed. My parents were not in love either. We learned to love each other, just like they did.”

“It’s not given to everybody to fall in love with the person they were forced to marry,” Joanna opposed.

“Alright, alright. No more arguing,” her father interrupted. “A decision must be made, so let’s get to the point. Joanna, you realize that if you refuse to marry Eddard Tully, your lady mother will never forgive you.”

“Yes, I do,” she replied, exasperated. She was fed up with her mother’s persistence to find her a husband when she didn’t want one. She knew it was normal in their world, but she didn’t like what was normal in this situation.

“Very well. Then, you really have a very unhappy alternative before you. Your mother will never forgive you if you do not marry him. And if you do, since you don’t want to marry him, I’m the one who will never forgive you.”

Joanna had been in a state where she didn’t know if she ought to laugh or to cry of joy. Anyway, she left the room as quickly as possible as a heated debate started between her parents. It was said her lady mother didn’t speak to her lord father for an entire week afterwards. She came to her senses in the end and tolerated the situation. The day Joanna was named Mistress of Coin, she said she was proud of her and didn’t regret she never got married.

Today, Joanna couldn’t help but almost laugh at her mother’s behaviour. Joanna thought she regretted more what she said to her husband afterwards than her stubbornness to marry her daughter. The Lady Sansa removed the hand that hid her eyes. “Very well. I’m going home.”

The decision was taken. The next morning, Joanna was breaking her fast with her lady mother before their departure. Her mother’s personal handmaiden, a young woman of twenty with a pale skin, very slender, green of eyes and with hair so brown that they looked black, served them.

“Thank you, Sera,” Joanna’s mother told the handmaid when she came to take back the untouched food to the kitchens.

“You call her by her name now?” Joanna asked.

“I got used to it. It was hard for me. She looks so much like her mother. Whenever I look at her, I see Mira. There’s so much of her in her daughter.”

Mira Forrester was an old friend of her mother. She had served as her handmaiden for a time when she was in King’s Landing. The two women remained in contact afterwards, but twenty years ago, the Lady of Ironrath gave birth to her fourth child. It was a girl, her first one after the three sons she had. However, Mira Forrester only had the time to name her daughter before she died of complications that happened during the delivery. Her mother was in the capital when it happened. She travelled all the way to the North in order to be present for her funerals. Margaery Tyrell, then newly appointed Lady of Highgarden after the death of her lord father, made the journey as well.

Joanna and her mother left early after breakfast. Robb and his wife came to say goodbye. Once the farewells were made, they climbed on Viserion and flew back to Casterly Rock. They needed a few days to arrive there. They stopped at Barrowton, Riverrun and the Golden Tooth, to only name a few. And then, one day, they saw the silhouette of the Rock at the horizon. Viserion didn’t need instructions on the way to land at the Rock. He did it dozens of times if not more.

As soon as they landed, Gerion arrived to welcome them. He embraced their mother tightly and did the same with his sister. Serena and Ned arrived not long after, and they shared the same embraces. Joanna had been afraid Serena would be gone to Oldtown by now, but she chose to stay when they received Joanna’s raven announcing the return of their mother.

Gerion later showed their mother where she would live now. They were all surprised except for Joanna when he showed her the lord’s chambers, the ones she shared with their father for decades.

“These are not my rooms. They belong to you now,” she said to her eldest son.

“As long as you’re with us, these rooms will be yours. That’s what Father would have wanted.”

They then excused themselves at her request. They didn’t protest as they could see she was beginning to cry. Ned stayed behind with her. He had always been the favourite of their mother where Joanna was their father’s favourite. They agreed to meet all together in the crypts in two hours. Joanna used the time to go to her own chambers. She took a bath and put on fresh clothes. As she waited for the time to go below, in the dark tunnels of the castle, lying in her bed and resting after days of travel, a voice disturbed her.

“I see you were successful in your mission.”

Joanna opened her eyes and slowly sat on her bed. “Yes. I’m glad she’s here.”

“Of course, you are,” the woman replied. “I’m glad she’s here me too.”

“Are you?”

“Your father deserves it.”

Joanna nodded. She looked at the torch on the wall. The wall under it seemed normal, but in fact it hid a secret passage that could be opened from both sides. Only the actual Mistress of Coin and Mistress of Whisperers were aware of its existence.

“Will you be with us?” Joanna asked her.

She had a sad smile. “I’m not part of the family.”

“You almost are. You had a daughter with him. You saved his life. You saved my mother’s life. And you saved me.”

She turned around and looked into the fire. “That doesn’t make me a Lannister,” Tysha replied. She was wearing her red robes, her long dark hair falling on her back. “I will be there, in the shadows, but not with you. It’s not my place.”

Joanna understood. They had talked about this again and again for the last twenty years. “The statue of Tywin Lannister will be there.”
“Yes, I know.” She said very softly, but with an edge that would make her hatred of this man obvious to anyone with ears.

Joanna sighed. “I don’t think I will ever understand. How could Tywin Lannister do such a thing? How can a father do that to his own son?”

She knew of course that Lord Tywin had not been the real father of Tyrion Lannister, but he had acknowledged him as his son, just like Eddard Stark did for Jon Targaryen, and her cousin only had good words for the man who raised him. That made her father Lord Tywin’s son whether he liked it or not. How could he do this?

“Total absence of love,” Tysha answered to her question. “Just like darkness is total absence of light, evil is total absence of love. That’s who Tywin Lannister was. Evil.”

Someone knocked at the door. “Lady Joanna, it’s time. Lady Lannister and your brothers and sister are waiting for you,” her handmaiden said from the other side, without opening the door. Joanna ordered all her handmaidens to never enter her rooms without her authorization.

“I’m coming,” she replied. She turned to Tysha who touched a red stone around her neck. Her appearance changed. It wasn’t he first time Joanna saw it. She was surprised when she first witnessed it, but now it didn’t bother her.

“I’ll leave you to it,” she told Joanna.

“Thank you, Kinvara.”

The High Priestess left using the same secret passage she used to enter. Over twenty years now that she knew the truth, when one evening the High Priestess came to her rooms and told her. She was the only one to know the whole truth in all the Seven Kingdoms. Not even her lord father, and even less her mother, were aware of it.

Fifteen minutes later, they were all standing in the Hall of Heroes in front of a statue representing her lord father. Tyrion Lannister was represented a book in one hand, an axe in another. The sculptor did a wonderful work, forgetting no detail. Even the scar on his face was displayed at the perfection. His grave was right under it. On it you could read the following:

_Tyrion Lannister_

_Born in 37 BND_

_Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands, Warden of the West, 3 BND – 39 ND_

_Hand of the Queen, 1 BND – 39 ND_

_Dragonrider_

_Beloved brother, husband and father_

_A very small man can cast a very large shadow_

Indeed, the inscription on the grave couldn’t be more accurate. Torches were positioned, lit in every occasion, that projected the shadow of the statue in such a way that it made three times the height of her brother Gerion.
The current Lord of Casterly Rock was present with his two sisters and his youngest brother. Only Robb couldn’t be there. He had urgent matters to attend in the North which prevented him from following Joanna and their mother to commemorate his death.

Their lady mother stood ahead of them. They remained there for a long time, looking at their father’s statue. Gerions’s wife and his three children weren’t present, no more than Ned’s betrothed or Serena’s husband and children. This moment was for them and only for them, their mother and her children, the immediate family of Tyrion Lannister.

Their lady mother turned to them after a very long time. It was obvious she had cried. There were traces of tears on her cheeks. When she talked to them however, her voice was calm, measured.

“Thank you all. I regret Robb isn’t here with us, but I want you to know something. Your father would be proud of you, every one of you. And I’m proud too.”

She embraced them all one by one, and then they left. Joanna was the last one to leave with her mother by her side. She perceived a slight movement in the dark behind her. She looked away, continuing her path back to the surface, leaving her father some time alone with another woman.

20 years later

There were now two statues. The second was just finished. The axe had been removed from the hand of the man, and now it held the hand of the woman. Tyrion Lannister stood in next her, motionless, stuck in that pose for all eternity. They were together forever. The long shadow that the former Lord of Casterly Rock projected was still there on the stoned floor, while the shadow of his wife wasn’t that long in comparison.

She was fourteen when she met him on that road. Back then, she thought he saved her. In some way he did, though his brother did most of the job chasing the men that chased her. The next morning, she was married to him. Their bliss was short-lived and a fortnight later her life was turned to hell. Tywin Lannister ruined it. His brother, Kevan, helped her escape. She went to Pentos, where she lived for many months. She gave birth to a daughter. She couldn’t know who the father was, but she thought it was him. She couldn’t take care of her, and she reminded her too much of him. She abandoned her. She hated them all, even that child who came from the husband who raped her. It destroyed her, for despite the fact she hated her daughter for being the child of a monster, she loved her too.

Free of anything and anyone binding her, she escaped to Volantis. There, she became a Red Priestess, then High Priestess when Benerro passed away. Through the years, R’hillor showed her the truth. She saw what had happened on this fateful day through the visions he gave her. All her hatred came down on Tywin Lannister, the man who destroyed her life and the lives of those he forced to ruin hers. She also saw the man she loved getting married to another woman, who was the same age as she was when they met. Then one day, she saw a vision that terrified her.

She saw the young woman who married Tyrion, in a dark room, a very cold place, with two other men. One had a diabolical smile on his face, and he forced the other one to stay while he did to her the same thing she was subjected to.
R’hhlor never showed her these visions for nothing. She had seen more than enough to know what she had to do, to change the course of time. For three days, she remained in meditation, connecting with R’hhlor, asking, begging him to provide her with the necessary force to accomplish her mission. The third day, she succeeded. She penetrated the spirit of the man she hated so much. She only did what was necessary. She didn’t rejoice at the idea of torturing. She could have, but it was dangerous for her to use too much power, and that wasn’t what R’hhlor asked of her. She killed him. Nothing more, nothing less. Tywin Lannister never woke up. That changed everything. The girl was never taken away from the city, her fate changed completely.

Later, she went to Meereen. R’hhlor showed her the way again. Only, she misinterpreted them and realized it just in time. She thought the young woman with blond hair she saw flying a dragon was the Lord’s Chosen One, Azor Ahai Reborn, the Prince that was promised. She was wrong. She realized it when she saw Daenerys Targaryen fly over Meereen with her own eyes, in that day when she defeated the masters. She wasn’t the woman Kinvara saw in her visions, nor was it her dragon she saw. She recognized the dragon she saw in her visions for he was in the skies that day, but not with the queen on his back.

These visions kept haunting her, and then others came to haunt her. Visions of a baby, among them. She thought it was her daughter first, but then she slowly realized it was another child. She met him again in the Neck and found him dead. She thought it was over, but she tried all the same, and against all expectations, he was back. It was the last time she kissed him. And when she saw that he could ride a dragon, she understood. The young woman with blond hair was indeed not Daenerys Targaryen. The woman in question was real, only she wasn’t a woman yet. She had just been born.

R’hhlor had showed her the way. She did what was necessary, saved the mother and then the daughter, finding absolution for the horror she committed so many years ago. She had abandoned a child. She saved another and gave her back to her parents. She did what R’hhlor asked of her.

Tyrion probably believed all these years that all he saw that night of Jon Targaryen’s wedding was only a dream. He was wrong. She had never been only a dream. His brother Jaime knew she wasn’t a dream when she revealed herself to him in his cell. Tell him, or I will, she threatened him. And he did tell his brother the whole truth.

She went to see Tyrion after putting something in Sansa’s drink that would make sure she slept. That was the last time Tysha ever spoke to Tyrion. The following times, when she talked to him, it was Kinvara who spoke. She never revealed the truth to anyone but Joanna, after she learned the truth about her father’s first marriage. She owed it to her. In some way, Joanna was the daughter Tysha could have had and that she abandoned.

The daughter was now about sixty. She served the new king as she had served his aunt before. Kinvara had seen many come and go over the last decades. She would have to stay a little while longer. Her mission wasn’t over yet. It would be over only when Joanna would leave, and so far her health remained strong and she was giving many signs that she would live for many more years. Kinvara expected she would outlive all her siblings. After that, she would go back to the east and continue to serve R’hhlor for the years she still had left. Such was the path of all Red Priests: to serve their Lord just like Azor Ahai did and continued to do. Just like Revan had been doing for thousands of years, and kept doing.

For now, the magic of her necklace wasn’t working. She aged more slowly than common people. Despite this, grey hair was beginning to show on her head. Usually, it would be hidden by R’hhlor’s power, but now it wasn’t.

In her hands, Tysha held the necklace Tyrion had bought her a long time ago, while they lived in that cottage. She wore it all the time, and despite the conflicting feelings she had towards him after she left Westeros, she always kept it. Perhaps a part of her always suspected there was more to his actions on that day she was destroyed than it appeared. When her Lord showed the truth many years later, she was relieved to not have thrown it away. She wore it the last time she spoke to Tyrion.

Slowly, she approached the statues with their hands joined. Tyrion was still holding his book, like he always did since he died. Sansa, with her free hand, was caressing a direwolf. There was a little gap in their joined hands, between their thumbs and forefingers. There was just enough space. With caution, she put the necklace in the hole. It slowly disappeared, inch by inch, until it was in their hands, hidden from everyone’s sight.

She stepped away and looked at them one last time. They were meant to be together a long time ago. Tysha was never destined to marry him. Sansa was. Tysha was doomed to disappear and let someone else take her place, so she could be there in time to fight the darkness and bring R'hllor’s light into the world. Tysha had to die for Kinvara to live. She was destined to be alone all her life. Tyrion Lannister and Sansa Stark were meant to spend their life together. Her attention was drawn to the large shadow at Tyrion’s feet and the direwolf by Sansa’s side.

“A shadow and a wolf,” she whispered.

She closed her eyes and turned around. Tysha never looked back. As she walked away, her hand came to the medallion around her neck. Within seconds, Tysha disappeared to never come again. Kinvara left the crypts to continue her mission: to serve her Lord and bring its light into the world. For evil would hide in the places no one would think of and surge when they last expected it.

Author's Notes:

First, about the epilogue. I can now confirm it to everybody: Kinvara is Tysha, Tyrion's first wife. I use the opportunity to compliment CLH_CLH, who was the first to suggest the idea that the two women were only one, at the first chapter where Kinvara stepped into the story. You surprised me by suspecting the truth at the very beginning. As for Revan, maybe it wasn't that clear in this chapter, but he was in fact Azor Ahai, Jon Snow's ancestor, and you can assume he's still alive since Kinvara states he's still serving their Lord.

There are also two references to scenes from TV shows I love very much. The first is the disagreement between Tyrion and Sansa when Joanna related how she refused to marry someone at the age of twenty. It comes from Pride and Prejudice, by Jane Austen. The second is when Kinvara explains to Joanna why Tywin behaved in such a way with Tyrion: "Total absence of love". It comes from Smallville, Season 7 Episode 16, when Clark Kent and Chloe Sullivan discuss the murder of Lionel Luthor by his son Lex.

Now, I spent over two years and a half writing this fanfiction. I didn't think it would turn out to be so long. When I started, it was an experience more than anything else, and I didn't plan to rewrite the entire series. Finally, it came to it: a fanfiction over a million words. I must confess there were times I just wanted to abandon this project. I had other ideas in my mind and wanted to dedicate more time to my original stories and my other fanfiction projects, including "A Rose and a Lion". But I kept writing, encouraged by you, all the people who were reading it, and also by the conviction that I couldn't stop a project that wasn't finished yet.
Now here it is, over and finished. I always meant to end ASAAW this way, with Joanna as the final POV and the explanation of why this story was called "A Shadow and a Wolf". There were modifications on the road. For example, my original idea was to have Jon marry Daenerys in the end.
Margaery was supposed to die when the Great Sept exploded. Revan was also not supposed to become a character with a major role. He was only supposed to be a cameo at first, but I loved so much to introduce him into the story that I couldn't resist making him Azor Ahai and helping Jon and Daenerys to bring a permanent end to winters. The existence of more Children of the Forest very far in the north and Bran leaving to meet them is also a late addition. Kinvara was also not meant to appear, or at least not to play a major role, and she wasn't supposed to be Tysha. But I had this mad idea, while I watched Season 5 and Tyrion listened to a Red Priestess in the streets of Volantis that this Priestess could be Tysha. Somehow I found myself thinking that Kinvara could be Tysha, and I ended making her the cause of Tywin's death.

This story is not perfect. There are a few things I would probably modify if I was to rewrite it. First, the long time spent in the Neck by Tyrion and Sansa and their army. Second, how I handled Margaery's escape from death. Third, the way I told the part of the story evolving around the second destruction of Castamere and how Tyrion almost turned like Tywin that didn't come out the way I was planning to. Despite this, I'm satisfied with what I've written after so much time, and I hope you enjoyed ASAAW as you read it, chapter after chapter.

I want to thank everyone who read this story, who left comments or kudos, who subscribed to it or bookmarked it. You are the reason why I wrote it in the end, and the reason why I kept writing it when I just wanted to stop. I'm proud to have delivered this piece of writing to you, and I'm proud to have been (for a short time) the only person to have written a fanfiction on Game of Thrones long of 1,000,000 words on AO3.

I want to thank especially those who commented on the story from the beginning or who came along later: Tativi and CLH_CLH, SerGoldenhand, morgana67, wildhoneyfritri, AzraelGFG, ValeriaC, 1Astrum1, Alice_1, FrostWyrm96 and many others. All your comments encouraged me to continue.

This may be the end for "A Shadow and a Wolf", but this is not the end for me. The idea to write first came to me when I was sixteen, for a project school. I put aside this idea for the years that followed, but this interest was revived by the meeting of three separate things: Game of Thrones, fanfictions, and Smashwords.

I discovered Game of Thrones when I was seventeen or eighteen, when a friend of mine talked about it for the first time, when the first season was released. But since it seemed to be only about sex and violence, the way he spoke of it, I wasn't interested. Then another friend, probably three years later, while I was finishing my degree, showed me two cutscenes: the Red Wedding, and the Purple Wedding. And in the scene of the Purple Wedding, I saw Peter Dinklage, who I previously saw in "X-Men: Days of Future past". I was intrigued and went to see on Game of Thrones Wiki who was the character he was playing. That's how I met Tyrion Lannister. I ended watching cutscenes where he was present on Youtube, and that's how I also discovered Sansa and began to ship them together.
Then I started buying the seasons on iTunes, watching the whole show from the beginning.

While watching, I also started to read the books, and I also kept looking for websites about Game of Thrones, until one day I fell upon a fanfiction by pure luck. It was "Things we do for love" from pellaeonthewingedlion. I became immediately a fan of fanfictions, and soon I considered the idea of writing one of my own. I finished to read the five books of ASOIAF, then I started to write. The 13th day of February 2016, the first chapter of "A Shadow and a Wolf" was uploaded. On June 8th of the same year, my 23rd birthday, I uploaded the first chapter of "A Rose and a Lion". In the meantime, I also discovered a website called Smashwords, where another fanfiction author published her own original stories. That decided to write my own original stories.

In some way, Game of Thrones gave me back the desire to write. I'll never thank enough this friend at the university who first showed me scenes of the TV show, for without this, ASAAW would never have existed, nor its comrade ARAAL, and neither would I be writing a science fiction series and planning for more fanfictions and original books.

Game of Thrones changed my life, and I hope it will keep changing my life. GRRM still has two books to release, and HBO still has one season to show us. On my side, I still have two more fanfictions that happen in this wonderful world, one already started, another in project. I know GRRM disapproves that we write fanfictions about his work, but I would like to thank him nonetheless, for without him, I may never have started writing.

Again, I thank you all for reading this fanfiction that a poor guy spent more than two years of his life writing. I invite you to read my other fanfiction, "A Rose and a Lion", and those that will follow.

If you wish, you can also consult my personal page on Smashwords, where you can discover who I really am, my projects and, when I start to publish, my original books. They will only be available in French first, but I will do my best to translate them as soon as possible: https://www.smashwords.com/profile/view/Gracques

For the last time, I ask you to leave your reviews and your impression on this story.
