The tourney was to take place outside the walls of Lannisport. Tyrion was already there and everything was ready by now if nothing went wrong. Sansa noticed grey clouds covered all the sky. She hoped rain wouldn’t start during the tourney. On the way, Sansa discussed with the three other girls who shared the carriage with her. Myrielle spoke less to Sansa than Joy and Cerenna, but she talked to Sansa all the same. Joy talked a lot about her embroidery lessons with Sansa. Sansa regretted she lied to Joy previously. She used the fact Joy felt very sorry for what happened to Sansa’s family at the Red Wedding to bring her to spend time with the heir of the Crag. Joy felt sorry for the boy who lost someone in this butchery. But how could Sansa tell Joy the truth? Anyway, if Rollam Westerling proved to not be someone good, then they wouldn’t talk about it again. Tyrion swore it to her, and he always kept his promises. Despite this, she felt bad for using Joy’s feelings. She was only a child, just like Sansa was not long ago.

After a short trip, they arrived at the site where the joust was to take place. Cerenna and Myrielle left them to reach their own places among the lords and ladies. Joy followed Sansa to the platform where they would take place, at the place of honor. There were some people in Casterly Rock who were jealous of Joy because she had the privilege to appear very close to Tyrion and Sansa despite the fact she was a bastard. Sansa felt all eyes on her as she walked to the platform where Tyrion was waiting for her with Genna and Ser Damion. Tyrion rose from his seat to welcome her when she arrived, just like Genna and Ser Damion.

“My lady,” Tyrion said as a greeting along with the smile she had come to love.

“My lord.”

Sansa sat at his left. Damion Lannister was on Tyrion’s right while Genna was on her own left. Joy took place at Genna’s left. People kept gathering around the grounds to attend the joust.

Sansa couldn’t stop smiling. She assisted to a tourney a long time ago, in King’s Landing. It was the Hand’s tourney Robert Baratheon ordered to celebrate the appointment of her father as Hand of the King. Sansa had been amazed by the tourney at the time. But this tourney was entirely different. It was prepared for her, and knights would fight for her. She was touched by this. Tywin Lannister murdered her family, Joffrey killed her father and Cersei tried to murder her husband, but the Lannisters weren’t an evil family. Not even Genna. She had helped Sansa to become the true Lady of Casterly Rock. She was their lady now, and no one could deny it.

The herald came forth and the silence fell. With his powerful voice, he announced the beginning of the tourney, speaking to Tyrion and her first, then to the crowd. “My lord, my lady, my lords, my ladies, people of Lannisport, of the Westerlands and of the Seven Kingdoms, welcome to the tourney of Lannisport in the honor of our lady, Sansa Lannister.”

People cheered and clapped their hands. A year ago, Sansa would probably have been insulted by the crowd of King’s Landing before such a declaration. But after a few months, the people of the Westerlands seemed to appreciate her now. The herald commanded the silence.

“Our first contenders. On the left, Ser Melwyn Sarsfield.” A man on a black stallion with a sigil representing a green arrow on a white bend and a green field advanced and bowed before them. “On the right, Ser Bronn of Blackwater.”

Sansa couldn’t have been more surprised. The former sellsword advanced on a brown mount and bowed deeply and mockingly as he always did, a grin on his lips. He wore his usual black chainmail, no more armor than that, and a very basic helmet. The two knights rode separate ways for their first confrontation.

“I wonder what will be the result,” Tyrion said on her right. “I would bet on Bronn anytime for a duel to the death, but for a joust? I didn’t think this kind of things was for him.”

Perhaps he’s attracted by the prize,” Sansa suggested.

“For sure, he’s attracted by the prize. For enough money, Bronn could do anything. He’ll always be a sellsword, no matter the titles and lands he received.”

It seemed Bronn wasn’t only good at killing (and drinking and fucking as he said so often). Ser Melwyn fell from his horse at the first passage. Bronn celebrated his victory by brandishing his lance in the air and people cheered him. As the recent landed knight went to his squire and dismounted, Sansa recognized the girl who was waiting for him, smiling euphorically. It was the whore, Daisy. She saw her discussing with Tyrion during the ceremony at Casterly Rock where their bannermen pledged themselves to their liege lord and lady. That had made Sansa angry back then to see Tyrion discuss with this girl who was a whore. It had brought back memories of Shae to her mind, but more than everything memories she knew now were times when Tyrion loved Shae in secret. She looked at Tyrion from the corner of her eyes, trying to decipher anything that could show he loved or spent time with another woman. There was no way to know it for sure by only looking at him this way. Sansa returned her attention to the joust.
Hedge knights, landed knights, sons of lords and even a few lords participated to the joust. Some of them wore the favor of a woman or another. The best moment was when the herald announced a jouster most of the people didn’t expect.

“Lady Brienne of Tarth.” There were many gasps when the woman removed her helmet to reveal who she was. If many people at Casterly Rock knew her at least of view, people of the Westerlands only heard about her at most. To hear about the female warrior who protected the Lady of Casterly Rock and to actually see her with your own eyes were two entirely different things. Sansa told her to participate to the tourney instead of protecting her for today.

Brienne raised her lance. “I fight for the Lady Sansa,” she shouted loudly for everyone to hear. There were new cries of surprise. Sansa smiled hearing this. Most of the knights would just not believe it.
She gave her favor to a woman. She shared an amused look with Tyrion. Brienne defeated her first opponent very easily.

Many jousters followed before Sansa saw a knight with a shield bearing a sigil she never saw. The shield was divided in four. The two parts of the bottom presented symbols she didn’t know, but she recognized the symbol on the top. It was the moon-and-falcon sigil of House Arryn. He was the knight of the Vale Cerenna told her about. Sansa eyed him suspiciously. He advanced his horse before her and Tyrion and removed his helmet.

“Ser Harrold Hardyng of the Vale,” the herald declared. The young man had sandy hair, deep blue eyes and an aquiline nose. Sansa realized many young girls in the crowd were looking at him with desire. He bowed deeply. His opponent came forth. Sansa noticed he didn’t lift his eyes from her.
Even after he rode to prepare for the first charge, Sansa noticed he always had an eye on her. She didn’t like this. He came from the Vale, the kingdom actually ruled by Lord Petyr Baelish. He looked too much at her for her taste. He defeated his first opponent at the second charge and sent a mysterious smile to Sansa as he rode before her to leave. She really didn’t like it.

The joust carried on for all the morning. They served them wine and pastries all the time, and Sansa enjoyed it a lot. Between two duels, lords and landed knights came to pay their respects to her.
Bronn visited them with Daisy, and Sansa noticed Genna wasn’t pleased by the girl’s presence.
Sansa wasn’t either very pleased to see her there, especially considering how she smiled fondly at Tyrion when she curtsied. Her curtsy wasn’t very well done, but it was better than the one Shae made during the Battle of Blackwater. The former sellsword didn’t bother to take some of their wine for the occasion.

Eventually, Lord Gawen Westerling and his son came to pay their respects as well. It was time to act.
“My lord. My lady.” Lord Westerling bowed to each of them. “My lady, you have all my good wishes for your sixteenth name day.”

“Thank you, Lord Gawen,” Sansa answered very courteously. “Lady Sybell isn’t with you?”

“No, I’m afraid she couldn’t come. She didn’t feel well and had to stay in Lannisport. But I have great hope she will feel good enough in the evening to be present at the feast.”

I’ll have something to reproach to her then, Sansa thought not without pleasure. But she hid it. She noticed Lord Westerling’s face grew dark as he spoke of his wife. “We’ll be happy to receive you. Is it your son, my lord?”

“Yes.” The boy accompanying Lord Gawen advanced timidly. He looked sad, perhaps because of his brother’s recent death. “My son and heir, Rollam.” Rollam Westerling bowed awkwardly before them. He was thirteen according to Tyrion.
“My lady, I wish you all the happiness and the health in the world,” Rollam said.

“Thank you, Lord Rollam. I appreciate it a lot.”

“I… I met your brother, Robb Stark, when he stayed at the Crag. He seemed to be a good man.”

Sansa nodded. “He was,” she answered with a low voice. Sansa turned her head on her left. “Joy, Lord Rollam looks alone. I’m sure he would be pleased to enjoy your company.”

“Yes, San… my lady.” Joy left her seat and went before Rollam, curtsying. “My lord.”

“My lady,” he said as he bowed his head to Joy.

“Thank you, my lady.” Lord Westerling left them on these words with Rollam and Joy. Both of them didn’t say a word as they went away.

Bronn and Brienne both went through two other opponents. Without the Mountain, no one died. Sansa was relieved by this. She didn’t want deaths for her name day. When midday arrived, the tourney was interrupted for two hours to let people eat and rest. Long tables were set in the fields to allow all the noblemen and noblewomen who were present to take part to it.

This was the moment for everyone who was present to give their presents for her name day. For almost the entire meal, Sansa had to receive gifts from everyone. The poorest lords and knights gave her capes, gloves, boots, horses, engravings. Sansa showed her appreciation to everyone with her smiles and her words. The richest houses brought much more refined and costly presents. A huge cup made of gold in the form of Casterly Rock was given by Lady Alysanne Lefford. Lord Lyman Serett of Silverhill gave her a dozen silver brooches. There was also Ser Harrold Hardyng who came to offer her a blue cape with an eagle brooch to attach it. Sansa accepted the gift and thanked him with grace, but she still didn’t like the way he looked and smiled at her. It reminded her of someone dead, someone Sansa didn’t regret to be dead.

The gifts she appreciated the most were those from the Lannisters. Joy gave her a simple wooden figurine of a direwolf she carved herself. Sansa kissed the little girl on her forehead before everyone. Dorna gave her a copy of the Book of the Mother. Ironically, Genna and Darlessa gave her copies of the Book of the Maiden and the Book of the Crone. The books had bindings in gold and silver and were richly drawn. Ser Damion and his wife gave her a ring that belonged to Ser Damion’s mother. There were also gifts from Lanna, Margot who came from Starpike, Ser Emmon and all his sons. Cerenna and Myrielle brought their gifts together. Each had a cup. Cerenna presented first a cup made of gold with four faces of lions on the outside. Then Myrielle brought a cup made of silver with four faces as well, but faces of wolves. When Sansa thanked her, for the first time, Myrielle seemed to smile sincerely at her.

They went back to the jousting ground when the meal was over. On their way, Sansa realized something. “You gave me nothing,” she said to Tyrion who was walking alongside her.

“Don’t worry. I’ll show it to you tonight, after the feast. That’s not something I can give to you during dinner.”

Sansa was confused by the enigmatic smile Tyrion had while he said it. She wondered what he prepared for her that couldn’t be given during the day. But considering the previous times he gave her presents, she guessed she could expect something very good as a gift.

The jousting resumed. The number of contenders decreased as people got eliminated. In the end of the day, only four competitors were left: Ser Harrold Hardyng, Ser Bronn of Blackwater, Ser Lyle Crakehall and Lady Brienne of Tarth. In the semi-finals, Bronn faced Brienne first. The Maid of Tarth defeated Tyrion’s friend at the second charge. Bronn managed to get on his feet and removed his helmet. He grinned widely.

“Everyone who doesn’t want to end worse than me, don’t try to fuck her!”

Sansa blushed at the improper banter, but so many people, including Bronn and Tyrion laughed that in the end she couldn’t resist but join everyone who was present. Even Genna was smiling and barely retained laughs. Brienne still wore her helmet, so Sansa couldn’t know how she reacted to it. Bronn left the jousting ground and Brienne stayed aside, preparing for the final.

“It’s a chance I didn’t place a bet,” Tyrion told her. “If I had, I would have lost a lot of money.”

“You would have bet on Bronn?” Sansa asked incredulously. “You were the one this morning to say you weren’t sure about his skills in jousting.”

“I never bet against my brother. Do you think I would bet against a friend?”

He took a faked insulted air that made her chuckle. “Then you did well to not bet. I should watch you over gambling as well.”

“What have I done to deserve this? My wife will soon spy me over everything I’m doing.”

Their short discussion was interrupted by the second semi-final. Harrold Hardyng and Lyle Crakehall, the Strongboar, faced each other. Sansa felt the eyes of the knight of the Eyrie on her before they confronted and between the charges. They needed four charges before Ser Lyle was unhorsed. People shouted after Ser Harrold, obviously unhappy a knight of the Vale defeated one of the fiercest warriors of the Westerlands. He kept looking at Sansa all the time he received the crowd’s outcries. Sansa hated it more and more. Couldn’t he look somewhere else?

It was odd for a tourney originally meant to be only between knights and lords of the Westerlands to have a final between a knight from the Vale and a lady from the Stormlands. Sansa wondered who the assistance would favor. Ser Harrold only received outcries when he was presented for the final, except for a few girls, while Brienne received many cheers. Probably people realized she was closest to the Westerlands than the handsome knight in shining armor since she wore Sansa’s favor. Perhaps people started to know that she was in Sansa’s personal service now, hence a much better contender to support than the stranger from the Vale of Arryn. Sansa hoped Brienne would defeat this man. She didn’t like at all the way he looked at her.

Brienne and her opponent went to opposite sides of the jousting ground. They both seized their lance and prepared for the first charge. The horn sounded and the two people charged at full speed. The first confrontation was without result as it often happened. The second and third charges were fruitless as well. Sansa tried to maintain her composure, but it was difficult. She wanted Brienne to win. Between the third and fourth charges, Sansa noticed the knight didn’t look at her for the first time. At the fifth charge, he nearly fell from his horse but managed to hold the reins and gained back his position on his saddle. At the seventh charge, Brienne was struck by his lance quite strongly, but she only pushed back her shoulder behind for a moment, barely moving on her saddle. Charges continued, none being able to unhorse the other. Brienne broke two lances, the knight of the Vale broke three. The knight of the Vale didn’t give any attention to Sansa now. Perhaps he didn’t expect such an opponent. Sansa couldn’t deny he was good with all the jousters he defeated, some among the best in the Westerlands. But now he showed signs of impatience. They were now at the fifteenth charge. Sansa was sitting at the tip of her chair. The two horses ran at full speed. Sansa saw Ser Harrold’s lance pointed toward Brienne’s head. Brienne’s lance didn’t target anything particularly. At the moment the lance was about to hit her helmet, Brienne tilted her head on the side and brought her own lance on the knight’s leg. Any knight who would have made such a movement would have killed the horse of his opponent and would have been disqualified for this reason, but Brienne was far better than any knight. Her lance went directly between the saddle and Ser Harrold’s leg and the knight was lifted from his saddle by the lance who came up in the blink of an eye. Ser Harrold Hardyng of the Vale flew in the air for a few feet and landed heavily on the earth.

There was a huge silence only broken by Ser Harrold’s cries of pain. Brienne came back close to the fallen knight and dismounted, removing her helmet on the way. She extended her hand to help the young man to get on his feet, but he only turned away and got up without Brienne’s help, dropping his helmet on the ground once on his feet and walking away without a single glance to the woman who defeated him or to anyone else. Another heavy silence followed, until finally someone shouted.

“BRIENNE OF TARTH!” And soon people were shouting her name everywhere. “BRIENNE! BRIENNE! BRIENNE! BRIENNE!” Brienne was reddening. She could only take Sansa’s favor from her lance and lift it up in the air. People only cheered her even more. Brienne just won twenty thousand gold dragons and the admiration of most of the people of the west.

Brienne was sacred champion of the tourney, but since she was a woman, no one was chosen as queen of love and beauty. A woman couldn’t choose another woman for this. As the tourney ended, the light of the day was beginning to fade. The smallfolk went back to their homes and their fields while the highborn people went back to Casterly Rock for the feast that would follow, Sansa’s carriage and Tyrion’s litter leading the procession. Sansa noticed scrolls and books were piled in Tyrion’s litter as she entered her carriage with Myrielle, Cerenna and Joy. Even on his wife’s name day, the Lord of Casterly Rock had to work. Sansa thought with dread about the large amount of work she would have to catch up tomorrow. She would be better to enjoy this day as much as she could.

Once they were inside the Rock, Sansa and Tyrion went back to their rooms to change their clothes for the feast, just like everyone else. Sansa noticed with regret that clouds covered skies so well that she wouldn’t be able to see the sunset before the feast. She liked to look at it in the evening when she could. Sometimes Tyrion joined her to contemplate it. Sansa went to the dressing room to put her gown for the evening while Tyrion used his solar to change his own clothes. Sansa decided to wear the gown Tyrion offered her for the royal wedding when they were in King’s Landing. When she thought about it, she didn’t wear it since that time, perhaps because there weren’t many occasions to wear it. Her handmaidens helped her to don the gown and to arrange her hair in braids that a golden hairnet held in place. She also put the medallion with the red ruby around her neck, over her lion-direwolf necklace, and she changed the rings at her fingers, except for her wedding ring.

Sansa looked at herself in the glass. Her body wasn’t done growing. She grew even more since the royal wedding. Her handmaidens had to adjust her gown in comparison to how Mira adjusted it the last time. How much time passed since she wore this gown for the first time? Many months. She was sixteen now. No one could say she was a child anymore. She left the dressing room and saw Tyrion reading in the living room. He lifted his eyes from his book when she approached to look at her. She recognized the admiration he showed to her in all circumstances like this one.

“How do I look?” she asked.

“Breathtaking, as always.”

Sansa flushed a little. “You still didn’t give me your present.”

“After the feast.” Tyrion put his book aside. He looked at her for another moment, then rose and offered his hand. “Shall we?”
Sansa took his hand and followed him to the feast that would take place in the Great Hall. Many people had already arrived when they entered and took place on the dais. They were warmly welcomed. Other members of House Lannister were the ones who shared the dais with them, including Genna, her husband Ser Emmon, her eldest son Cleos and his wife Jeyne, Joy, Ser Damion, his wife Shiera and their daughter Lanna. The feast consisted in seven courses of the finest and plumiest plates. Wine also seemed sweeter than everything she tasted in her memory. But she made sure all the same that Tyrion didn’t drink too much. Her name day was no excuse to let him get drunk.

Jugglers, singers, bards, acrobats, musicians and fools entertained them as they ate. Many songs were performed, but to her great surprise, Sansa realized musicians played northern music. She heard music she didn’t hear since she left Winterfell. She recognized some of the musicians to be Northerners by their looks. The last artist to perform was Sansa’s personal singer. She sang five songs, including the Mother’s Hymn and My featherbed. Sansa recognized two other songs since she sang it to her before, False Love and The Wolf and the Moon. The latter was a song of the North. However, what surprised Sansa was the fifth song she performed.

The snow glows white on the mountain tonight,

not a footprint to be seen.

A kingdom of isolation and it looks like I'm the queen.

The wind is howling like this swirling storm inside.

Couldn't keep it in, Heaven knows I tried.

Don't let them in, don't let them see.

Be the good girl you always have to be.

Conceal, don't feel, don't let them know.

Well, now they know!

Let it go, let it go!

Can't hold it back any more.

Let it go, let it go!

Turn away and slam the door.

I don't care what they're going to say.

Let the storm rage on.

The cold never bothered me anyway.

It's funny how some distance, makes everything seem small.
And the fears that once controlled me, can't get to me at all It's time to see what I can do, to test the limits and break through.
No right, no wrong, no rules for me.
I'm free!

Let it go, let it go.
I am one with the wind and sky.
Let it go, let it go.
You'll never see me cry.
Here I'll stand, and here I'll stay.
Let the storm rage on.

My power flurries through the air into the ground.
My soul is spiraling in frozen fractals all around
And one thought crystallizes like an icy blast
I'm never going back; the past is in the past!

Let it go, let it go.
And I'll rise like the break of dawn.
Let it go, let it go
That perfect girl is gone
Here I stand, in the light of day.

Let the storm rage on!
The cold never bothered me anyway

It was a song from a very ancient northern tale and everyone in the North knew it. When she was young, Sansa used to hate that tale. The story was about two sisters, a queen and a princess. The queen had powers to create ice and snow, but couldn’t control them. She accidentally brought an eternal winter to her kingdom and her sister helped her to put an end to it. However, Sansa had hated this tale because the prince who the princess fell in love with at the beginning proved to be a traitor who tried to kill the queen and the princess. The princess finally fell in love with a mountain man. Sansa disliked that story before she left Winterfell because the beautiful prince wasn’t a perfect man. It wasn’t how songs and stories were supposed to be. She should have loved this kind of stories better. That could have helped her with Joffrey, much more than Florian and Jonquil.

Sansa listened to all the songs that were played, exchanging opinions about them with Tyrion between two. She also asked Joy and Genna for their opinion a few times, but it was mostly with Tyrion she spoke and laughed. Afterwards, musicians played dancing songs and people started to gather on the floor. Sansa liked to dance, but she didn’t dare to join the people. She decided to stay on the dais and to talk with Tyrion. She felt heat in her cheeks after a moment. Most people on the dais were dancing or discussing with people on the floor, but Sansa remained with her husband. She noticed Joy was dancing with Rollam Westerling. The boy was smiling.

“It seems your idea wasn’t such a bad one finally,” she told Tyrion.

Tyrion followed her gaze to the two children. “That will make things much easier.” Tyrion looked at her. “Sansa, you can dance if you want. They’re the festivities for your name day, after all.”

Sansa averted her gaze. “No, it’s alright.” She felt Tyrion’s gaze lingering on her. She stammered. “Would… Would you want to dance?”

Tyrion seemed quite surprised by her question and chuckled after a moment. “I don’t think it’s a good idea. I’ll only get people to laugh at you. But don’t stop yourself from dancing because you’re married to a dwarf. It’s your name day. Enjoy it.”

Sansa sighed, half discouraged, half smiling. She rose from her seat. “If my lord husband insist,” she said with a mocking voice. She took the jug of wine on the table between them. “But I’m taking this with me.”

“You’re really a cruel wife!”

“I know.” Sansa laughed, louder than she did usually. She walked away, still laughing, putting the jug on another table. She noticed the content was quite low. She couldn’t have let Tyrion drink so much. She put her hands on her forehead and her cheeks and realized they were quite hot. She felt lighter than in usual circumstances. Now she understood why the jug emptied so much. She shouldn’t drink for the rest of the evening. Did Tyrion notice it? If he realized she was drunk…

“Lady Lannister.”

Sansa turned to see Lord Gawen Westerling standing a few feet from her. “Lord Westerling.”

“My lady, would you do me the great honor to give me a dance.”

Sansa smiled, though her smile wasn’t entirely sincere. “Of course, Lord Gawen.”

He led Sansa on the floor and they started to dance. Sansa didn’t really know what to think of the Lord of the Crag. He wasn’t the one who betrayed Robb, but his wife and her brother did. She held him responsible in some way for allowing his family to betray Robb. Ser Damion was the next one she danced with, then followed Lord Jast, Ser Cleos, Lord Sarwyck, Rollam Westerling who broke his dance with Joy for a moment, Lord Marbrand and many others. She even danced with Bronn for
She finally left the dance and went to take a cup of wine before she realized she shouldn’t drink too much. She ate some pastries while drinking to make it less worse. She engaged conversations with other ladies, including Genna, Margot, Lanna, Cerenna, Myrielle and finally Alysanne Lefford. As she spoke with the Lady of the Golden Tooth, Sansa realized Tyrion was talking with Bronn and Daisy on the dais. Lady Alysanne seemed to notice it as well.

“Who’s this girl? I heard she worked in a brothel before. Is that true?”

Sansa decided to not reveal the truth to Lady Lefford. “We can expect everything with a former sellsword. This girl could have been anything before she became his paramour.”

“Anything,” the Lady of the Golden Tooth conceded. “But as a landed knight, he should marry instead to have a whore following him everywhere.”

Alysanne Lefford was a tall brown-haired woman with a shapely figure and a bright smile. She was quite attractive and reached her eighteenth name day last month. Sansa wondered why she wasn’t already married. Suitors surely didn’t lack. A beautiful young woman at the head of the second richest family of the Westerlands could only attract marriage propositions.

“And you, when are you going to marry, Lady Lefford?”

Alysanne shrugged. “I’m not in a hurry. I have all the time I want.”

Sansa thought she knew what she meant. She would wait to choose the best suitor she could get, just like the Tyrells waited to give Margaery the best match possible. Their conversation was interrupted by a presence in Sansa’s back.

“My lady. My lady.”

Sansa turned to face Ser Harrold Hardyng. He wore a blue doublet instead of his armor during the tourney. Sansa noticed how muscular he was, and very handsome, much more than from afar. He was probably no more than twenty years-old. He bowed before Sansa and Lady Lefford, dimples appearing as he smiled to them.

“Ser Harrold. It is a pleasure to meet you,” Alysanne exclaimed. “You rode very well in the joust.”

“Thank you, my lady,” the knight answered with a pleasant smile.

“Do you dance as well as you joust?”

“Even better, Lady Lefford. I would gladly ask for the honor to dance with you, but I already have a partner for all the following dances.”

“How unfair it is. I do hope this or these women who dance with you will enjoy it. Ser. My lady.”

Lady Lefford left, leaving Sansa alone with the knight. He always looked at her smiling between the words he exchanged with Lady Alyssanee, and Sansa didn’t like it anymore than during the tourney. His handsomeness, his pleasant ways and his smiles remembered her at the same time of Joffrey and Ser Loras, and the memory of these two men wasn’t to make her happy.

“I was surprised to see you at this tourney, Ser Harrold. We didn’t expect knights of the Vale to participate,” Sansa commented with her unemotional voice.
“Yes, my lady. I have no difficulty to imagine your pleasant surprise when you saw me compete. But I happened to be of passage in Lannisport when I heard about this competition, and I decided to do you the honor of my participation.”

“I appreciate it very much, ser. What were you doing in Lannisport?”

The young man seemed to search for an answer. “I… I was visiting the Westerlands. I decided to travel through Westeros recently and just happened to be there when I heard of the tourney. It was pure chance.”

“You decided to travel through Westeros in the middle of a war?” Sansa asked skeptically.

“Aye,” the young man answered after a moment, smiling again. “I wanted to see some of the country, and up to now, I’m not disappointed of the many beautiful marvels I’ve seen.”

These were the kind of compliments Sansa would have liked back when she was the sweet girl of Winterfell. But she was no longer this girl and she didn’t like the knight’s behavior. And she didn’t like the fact he happened to be there by apparent luck. How many knights decided to travel from the Eyrie to the Westerlands in the middle of the War of the Five Kings?

“You see me very pleased of this, ser. I hope the rest of your journey will be much entertaining as the beginning. If you’ll excuse me.” Sansa started to walk away.

“Lady Sansa!” the young knight nearly shouted as she walked away. Nearly shouted. “Would you make me the honor to dance the next dance with me?”

Sansa took a surprised look. “I thought you already had a partner for all the dances.” She raised an eyebrow.

Ser Harrold Hardyng looked taken aback for a moment, but he recovered quite quickly. “For you, I could set aside all the other women in the Seven Kingdoms.”

If he hoped to please Sansa with these words, he was wrong. “This isn’t very worthy of a knight to go back on his word, Ser Harrold. I wouldn’t want to force you to forsake a promise.”

“Yes, I know, but… I beg you, my lady. Please accept to give me the honor to dance with me.”

“I’m afraid I can’t. I’m very tired and need to rest.” Sansa turned around and started to walk away again, only to be followed by the young knight.

“Lady Sansa, I beg you. Only one dance. Only one.” Sansa continued to walk, her back turned on him. “I need to speak with you.”

Sansa finally turned again to face him, hoping she could get rid of him quickly if she let him speak. “Tell me what you have to say.” She stared in the eyes of the man.

Ser Harrold Hardyng paused for some time before he spoke. “Lady Sansa, I am only the son of a landed knight sworn to Lady Anya Waynwood of Ironoaks, one of the greatest ladies of the Vale. I was raised at Ironoaks since my childhood and was knighted only recently. Lady Waynwood talked a lot about your father. I never had the chance to meet him, but I wish I had. I was angry and very sad when I learned Lord Eddard Stark was killed, and my only wish was to fight to avenge him. Your father was loved in the Vale. All the lords there said he was a very good man, a man of honor. And they respected House Stark more than you can imagine. I just want to tell you… If you ever need any help, the Vale is ready to fight for you.”
Sansa wasn’t impressed by the speech. Even less when she saw the smile on the knight’s lips. Anger boiled in her. “I thank you for your offer, Ser Harrold, but I don’t need any help. I am safe here at Casterly Rock, and I have the lords of the Westerlands on my side.”

The knight of the Vale looked quite surprised by her words. “Lady Sansa…” He looked around himself and spoke lower. “You cannot trust the Lannisters. They are your family’s enemies. You’re not safe here.”

Sansa smiled. “Ser Harrold, the last time a knight who wasn’t from the Westerlands offered to help me and my family, he put a dagger on my throat and threatened to kill me.”

Ser Hardyng was taken aback again. “My lady, I… I would never do such a…”

“I wasn’t done speaking, ser. It isn’t proper for a knight to interrupt a lady while she talks.”

“For… Forgive me, my lady.”

“The person who saved me from this knight,” Sansa resumed immediately, “is now my sworn shield and my personal guard. With the protection of Lady Brienne, I have nothing to fear.”

“Lady Brienne?” Ser Harrold looked horrified. “But she’s only a woman!”

“A woman who defeated you this very afternoon, ser,” Sansa remembered him with a satisfied smile. “I hope you understand why I gave her my favor. If she can defeat you, I’m sure she can defeat anyone who approaches me.”

The knight’s face turned red. Sansa resumed. “When my father was executed for betraying his king, the North and the Riverlands rebelled against King Joffrey. They were traitors, but they fought for my father all the same. In the meantime, the knights of the Vale refused to join the rebellion and refused at the same time to answer the call of King Joffrey for help. The knights of the Vale remained behind their mountains. My brother Robb may have been a traitor, but no one can say he was a coward.”

The knight looked entirely confused by her words. Sansa witnessed with a great satisfaction how he couldn’t find something to answer. She took a step forward. “I would give you an advice, Ser Harrold Hardyng of the Vale. You said I couldn’t trust the Lannisters. I am Sansa Lannister of House Stark, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands and Lady of Winterfell. You’re speaking against my family in my own castle, on my lands, and you pretend you respected the former Lord of Winterfell while you did nothing when he was executed. The next time you dare to speak against House Lannister or against House Stark within these walls, there’s a huge risk of an accident happening to you before you leave.” Sansa didn’t know if it was still only confusion on the knight’s face or if fear had been added, but she didn’t stop. “I give you until midnight to leave my castle, or else I’ll make you leave myself after you’re accused of high treason for speaking against House Lannister and the king. And I’ll make sure Lord Robin Arryn is informed of the way your journey in the Westerlands ended. Leave now. I don’t want to see you or any man like you again.”

Sansa left the bewildered knight there and went to give orders to the guards in the Hall to make sure the handsome knight would leave. If Littlefinger sent him, he would understand she wanted nothing to do with him. Sansa wasn’t about to let another Ser Dontos put a knife on her throat, no matter he was handsome like Ser Loras or ugly like the Hound. Sansa’s anger was palpable when she joined Tyrion on the dais. He managed to get a new jug of wine, as always. Sansa took it away from him again and put it down on the table too abruptly.

“Are you alright?” Tyrion asked her, not complaining about the wine this time.
“Yes, I am,” Sansa answered angrily.

Tyrion leaned towards her. “Sansa, what’s going on?”

Sansa decided to tell him. After all, they both had many reasons to hate the Vale of Arryn, and she had nothing against sharing what just happened with her husband. Tyrion listened attentively to her story.

“Strange,” he said at the end. “Perhaps he’s only a foolish knight who wants to be gallant. He may have no link with Baelish, but we should keep an eye on him. It’s quite unusual he was present for your name day. But perhaps he only wanted to be a knight in shining armor.”

Sansa snorted. “He looks like a combination of Joffrey and Loras.”

Tyrion chuckled. “The worst possible combination. Let’s hope he followed your advice and went away. Do you see him?”

Sansa looked at the floor where people danced and didn’t see Ser Harrold Hardyng. “No. He probably left to hide. That’s what the knights of the Vale do best. Hide. But I’ll ask Brienne to stand guard before our rooms tonight, just in case.”

“What a reward for her victory at the tourney,” Tyrion remarked sarcastically, but smiling. Sansa looked at Brienne standing in one of the galleries. She was watching people, clad in full armor, Oathkeeper at her belt, her hand on the pommel, trying to detect some possible threat. Sansa couldn’t repress a chuckle. Brienne just won a tourney and she didn’t celebrate. She continued to do her duty as if nothing happened.

The musicians started a new song for the dance. Sansa never heard it before.

When in the springtime of the year
When the trees are crowned with leaves
When the ash and oak, and the birch and yew
Are dressed in ribbons fair

“Sansa, you’ll never know what Bronn asked me while you danced,” Tyrion told her all of a sudden. From the smile he displayed, Sansa expected something funny again.

“What did he tell you?” she asked with a false haughty smile.

“He asked for a wife. You remember, we still owe him one.”

“I thought he wasn’t eager to marry too soon.”

When owls call the breathless moon
In the blue veil of the night
The shadows of the trees appear
Amidst the lantern light

“Well, it seems he’s eager now.”

“So, it seems you’ll have to find him a wife now,” Sansa remarked.

“Me? You’re the one who promised him a wife, remember.”

“And you’re the one who lives thanks to that promise. So it’s your duty to find the wife,” she said with a wicked smile. Tyrion laughed at her expression.

We’ve been rambling all the night
And some time of this day
Now returning back again
We bring a garland gay

“I won’t have all this trouble. Bronn asked for a very specific wife.”

That revelation startled Sansa. “What? What do you mean? Bronn asked to marry one woman in particular?”

“Yes. He’s dancing with her right now.”

Tyrion pointed with his eyes to the dancing floor.

Who will go down to those shady groves
And summon the shadows there
And tie a ribbon on those sheltering arms
In the springtime of the year

Sansa made out Bronn among the dancers. She recognized immediately the woman he was dancing with. She was speaking about her with Lady Lefford a few minutes ago.

“Daisy?” Sansa was completely taken by surprise. “You can’t be serious!”

“You know how I love to make japes all the time, my lady, but this time I’m very serious. And Bronn is too.”

Sansa looked again at the pair dancing. Bronn wasn’t a great dancer, and to be honest the way Daisy danced looked a bit indecent.

\[
\text{The songs of birds seem to fill the wood} \\ \text{That when the fiddler plays} \\
\text{All their voices can be heard} \\
\text{Long past their woodland days}
\]

“Bran wants to marry… a whore?”

Tyrion’s expression was between amusement, awkwardness, and sadness too. “Well, he wouldn’t be the first.”

Tyrion’s gaze seemed lost for a long moment. Sansa didn’t dare to speak. She never knew what to say when his first wife came as a subject. She preferred to believe he thought about Tysha than about Shae.

\[
\text{We've been rambling all the night} \\
\text{And some time of this day} \\
\text{Now returning back again} \\
\text{We bring a garland gay}
\]

Tyrion seemed to recover his ability to speak after a moment, sparing Sansa the task to resume the conversation. “Mostly, from what he told me, he prefers a wife who’s not complicated. He believes a highborn lady would be too much trouble and too much demanding. Perhaps he’s not wrong.”

He looked at her seriously, then a smile appeared again on his face. Sansa couldn’t hold a laugh.
“You believe I’m too much trouble?”

Tyrion tilted his head to the side. “Well, you made it very difficult for me to drink wine.” His eyes wandered to the far side of the long table where Sansa moved the jug. “And it has become very difficult for me to awake in the morning. I’ve never slept better than since we started to sleep

They bothe chuckled at this, but Sansa noticed Tyrion was sincere in what he said. Sansa knew he was saying the truth, even though he tried to make it a jape. He slept much better since she welcomed him into her bed, and Sansa slept much better as well since that time. She awkwardly averted her eyes and looked at the dancing floor, trying to listen to the end of the song.

\[
\text{And so they linked their hands and danced}
\]
Sansa and Tyrion finally resumed their talk. Without thinking, Sansa went to take the jug of wine and poured a cup for each of them. She felt red rising to her cheeks, and she didn’t think it was because of the way Tyrion looked at her or complimented her in his special way from time to time. At least, that wasn’t the only reason. Very late in the night, when most of the people were drunk or too exhausted to celebrate anymore, they left the feast after a last toast to Sansa. On their way back to their chambers, accompanied by Brienne, she stumbled a few times. In the end, she held Tyrion’s hand until they reached their rooms where Brienne left them, standing before the golden doors.

Sansa went directly to their bedchamber and let herself fall on the bed. She felt some dizziness and brought her hands on her face. She felt a pressure on the mattress next to her. She put her hands away from her eyes and saw Tyrion looking at her amusingly.

“It seems my lady is somewhat drunk,” he commented with a smile.

Sansa could only laugh. “I fear I am.” She looked back at her husband who was looking fondly at her. “You don’t look drunk, Tyrion.”

“Well, between the fact you stop me from drinking whenever you can and the fact that I am accustomed to wine, that’s no surprise. You would have no chance in a drinking contest against me.”

Sansa laughed again. “I can’t argue with you on that. You’re the drunkard here.”

“This night, it’s you,” Tyrion replied. Sansa laughed again. She laughed too much. She was drunk for sure. Tyrion started to caress her cheek as he stroked one of her braids. Sansa closed her eyes, letting his fingers wander on the right side of her face. It felt good. It felt very good.

“Did you like your day?” Tyrion asked her kindly.

Sansa opened her eyes, smiling widely. “I loved it.” She sat up straight. “Thank you, Tyrion.”

She looked straight into his eyes, the green eyes she loved so much. Without realizing it, Sansa found her face closer and closer to Tyrion’s. She was attracted by his eyes who looked happily at her. Before long, their brows were in contact and her lips joined his. She kissed him. He returned the kiss almost immediately. Sansa’s mind was too numb to notice anything else. She kissed him deeper, and deeper, and he did the same. The taste of wine on his lips she felt the first time they shared a kiss came back to her mind, and she realized it was still there. Sansa only had one wish, to continue. She gasped as their kiss lingered. She didn’t want it to stop, not like the last time. There was no Joffrey to die and to interrupt them. She could only kiss him more fiercely each second, and Tyrion was doing the same.

But it seemed the gods didn’t want to let this moment last forever. Tyrion broke the kiss, but he didn’t back away. Their foreheads were still touching. Sansa was panting, and she realized Tyrion was too. Their heads were lowered a little, her eyes half-closed just like she believed his own were.

“What are you doing?” he asked her.

Without thinking, Sansa answered. “Something I want to do.”

She took his face between her hands and kissed him again. She couldn’t get enough of it. She wanted more. Even though they were both sitting on the bed, she was towering Tyrion with her height. His hands went to her hips. She remembered these times in the morning when his hands caressed her body. That only convinced her to kiss him more deeply if that was possible as the warm feeling she felt these mornings filled her whole body. After a moment, she felt his tongue entering her mouth. Sansa squealed when she felt his tongue touching hers. The warm feeling spread everywhere in all the parts of her body. She couldn’t bring herself to end their kiss, even if she was beginning to have some difficulty to breathe. She needed more.

But Tyrion broke their kiss again. Sansa was breathing quicker than she ever did, as far she could remember. “Sansa.”

Tyrion let her name escape from his lips. He was trying to catch his breath just like her. To hear her name said from him in such a low voice brought butterflies in her stomach. She talked to him the same way.

“Tyrion, I want to do it.”

“To do what?”

Sansa took some time to answer. It seemed her mind started to work again. Did she really want it? After a few seconds, she knew the answer. “To consummate.”

Tyrion raised his eyes, looking at her, unbelieving. Sansa herself couldn’t really believe what she just said. Seconds that looked like an eternity passed, during which their breathing slowed a little. Their eyes never left those of the other one. “Are you sure?”

“Yes.” She answered after a second, but not because she hesitated, only because her breathing was still hesitant.

“Why?” He was still looking at her, not believing what she just said.

“So I need to tell you?” Was it so difficult to understand? She kissed him again, but slower this time. Tyrion didn’t react first, but then he returned it in the same kind. The fire that burned in Sansa only a moment ago was replaced by another feeling, less consuming, but sweeter, at least as much enjoyable than the previous one. She could still taste the wine on his lips, but instead of drinking the cup entirely in a single swallow, she wanted to drink it slowly. She wanted to savor it.

To her great sorrow, Tyrion broke their sweet kiss again. “When?”

She knew what he meant. “I don’t know. It just… happened. I just know I do.” She looked in his eyes, green eyes who looked at her with joy she never saw in them. A timid smile, as if it was frightened to appear, was playing on the lips she just touched with her own. All of a sudden, a question came to her mind. “Do you…?”

He seemed speechless for some time, then a very kind smile that his eyes followed appeared on his lips, a smile of regret. “Sansa.” He caressed her left cheek with his right hand. A part of her wanted to close her eyes and let his fingers run on her cheek without caring about anything else, but another wanted to know. She kept her eyes on his, afraid and excited of what he might say next. “It’s been a very long time now.” Her heart was running faster than she ever imagined it could. “I have loved you for a very long time.”

She closed her eyes and tears of joy left her eyes to run on her cheeks. He loves me. He loves me. He really loves me. She couldn’t open her eyes. She wouldn’t be able to see anything with the water flooding them. He loves me. He loves me. She was laughing. His other hand went to her right cheek and he proceeded to wipe the water flowing on both. She had never been so happy to feel his touch. She felt that his hands were bringing her head downwards. And she felt his lips on hers. He was kissing her. Before, she had always been the one to initiate their kisses. But now he was the one to kiss her first.

She didn’t return the kiss first. She wanted to know what it was to be simply kissed by him. But after some time, she couldn’t resist and kissed him in return, deeply, but slowly too, sweetly. That was so beautiful, so sweet, so perfect. His hands left her cheeks and went to her neck, her shoulders, her arms, her hips. Her body shivered in anticipation. Her heart was pounding in her chest. Was his heart pounding as well? She laid a hand where she thought his heart was, and she felt a very quick beat. She smiled in their kiss. He felt the same way she felt.

This time she broke their kiss. She looked into his green eyes that sparkled like she never saw them shine before. She smiled at him as he smiled at her. Surely her own eyes were shining as well. She hoped they did. She wanted him to see how she loved him. They remained there, only smiling at each other, until Sansa realized something. She said she wanted to consummate. Her smile faded. Tyrion noticed it and looked at her questioningly.

“Is there something wrong, Sansa?”

It took her a few seconds to answer with a very hesitant voice. “I… I… I don’t know what to do.”

She wanted to do it. Perhaps it was the wine that helped her to finally dare it, but she wasn’t more certain about what to do. She never did it. How should she act? She was never given any detail how to do it. She knew how it was done, but not what she should do on her side. What if Tyrion didn’t like it? A fear crossed her mind. Tyrion spent so much time with so many other women, and these women were trained to please men. Who was she in comparison?

She thought of Shae, with her black hair and black eyes, her tanned skin and her dress that displayed a great part of her body. It was no surprise that Tyrion was attracted to her when she thought about it. What had Sansa to attract Tyrion? She was sixteen, but in his eyes, who was she? Probably still a child. An unexperienced child. A child with stupid dreams of knights in shining armor. A child who just admitted she had no idea how to share a bed with her husband.

Tyrion looked at her with concern. “You’re afraid?”

Sansa nodded. “Yes. I… I have no idea… I don’t know…” Sansa buried her face into her hands. Why is it so difficult for me? Everyone does it. Why am I afraid?

“You don’t have to worry, Sansa. It may be… painful, even traumatizing the first time. Every woman must go through it. It gets better with time. But I won’t hurt you, I promise.”

Sansa wasn’t afraid of the pain. She was afraid Tyrion may not appreciate her. Afraid he may judge her. Afraid he may not think good of her. She couldn’t get her face out of her hands. “If you don’t feel ready, we don’t have to do it tonight.”

The mention of this possibility forced Sansa to discover her face again. “No, I want to do it now.” She said it with a lot of determination. She wouldn’t retreat. If she didn’t do it tonight, then when? Tyrion seemed surprised by her sudden determination. He smiled fondly at her. She loved this smile.

“Very well. Lie down on your back.”

WARNING: VERY EXPLICIT SECTION

EVERYONE WHO DOESN'T LIKE THAT KIND OF STUFF, YOU CAN SKIP TO THE END OF THIS SECTION
Sansa complied to the command. If she was sure of one thing, it was that Tyrion knew better than her on this matter. Surely he knew what he was doing. Her arms were along her sides and she waited. Tyrion was looking at her, a strange look in his eyes, something she never saw before. She couldn’t decipher what he was thinking in this moment. But he kept his eyes on her face, not leaving it a single moment. He brought his hand on her hips and started to rub them. Sansa remembered when he used to do it these few mornings and how she liked it, but right now she couldn’t enjoy it like before.

“You’re shaking.” Tyrion was right. Sansa’s whole body was shaking, more than she ever did. She was nervous. What would he think of her? She tried to see if there was any reproach in Tyrion’s eyes, but she only saw concern, or perhaps regrets.

“What should I do?”

“Close your eyes. Try to relax. Don’t think about anything.”

Sansa did as he suggested. She tried to think about nothing. Even though she didn’t entirely succeed, the movements of Tyrion’s hand on her belly reduced her trembling a little. She began to enjoy it. The feeling wasn’t as good as when he did it on previous mornings, perhaps because her gown was thicker than her nightgowns, but it was an enjoyable and calming feeling all the same. Her breathing slowed a little and she calmed down. She opened her eyes and looked at her husband who was looking intensively at her.

“So, feel better?”

Sansa smiled. “Yes.”

Tyrion leaned over her face and kissed her tenderly. He kept the hand he already worked with on her hips while he brought the other on her cheek to rub it. Sansa closed her eyes again. The kiss was sweeter and better than all the others they exchanged before. She kept her hands on her sides, not wanting to do anything. She only returned the kisses Tyron was giving to her, trying to make them as sweet as she could.

A pleasant warmth spread through her body again, fighting her anxiety and reducing her shaking even more. The hand on her cheek moved to her neck. Tyrion’s lips left her mouth to wander on her nose and her brow. Sansa sighed, feeling like she felt in their previous private moments. His hand left her neck to come back to her cheek, then to her temple and finally in her hair. The other hand left her hips and travelled all the way along her body to her hair as well. On its way, it passed on her left breast. Sansa cried a little when it happened. She felt Tyrion’s hands playing with her hair, his lips going upper to kiss her hair as well. Tyrion was removing something and she sensed the braids and the coiffure her handmaidens prepared hours ago were undone, her hair falling freely around her. She turned her face on the side and opened her eyes long enough to see her golden hairnet being dropped unceremoniously on the floor. He also removed the two necklaces she wore, breaking the contact of his lips with her forehead a few seconds to do it.

She didn’t keep her eyes open very long since Tyrion lowered his lips again and began to kiss her cheek. She let the feeling of the kiss invade her as Tyrion’s hands both returned to her hips. His mouth continue to go down as well, reaching her neck. It went down very slowly and Sansa straightened her head on her neck. Tyrion’s kisses on the skin of her neck felt even better than on her cheek. She was trembling, but not in fear now. Tyrion remained in this region of her body for a very long time, and Sansa didn’t complain about it. She still didn’t dare to do anything on her own, afraid she might break this moment. She let Tyrion do what he thought was better.

“Astoundingly long.”
The words came out of his mouth as he continued to kiss the bottom of her neck. Sansa couldn’t hold a giggle as she remembered what he said about her neck during their wedding night. She opened her eyes to look at him. She saw a smile playing on his lips as he kept going down, reaching her collarbone, then going still lower. She closed her eyes again, enjoying the gentle kisses he put on the small region of skin that wasn’t covered by the silk of her gown. His hands were still moving on her hips, upward and downward, slowly, kindly, without interruption. The fresh air coming from the balcony made the places he touched with his lips colder when the breeze caressed her skin.

Sansa felt her breasts tightening against the fabric of her underclothes. Tyrion’s lips brushed their outline. She wanted him to go lower. But he didn’t. Instead, he brought his lips upward, kissing areas he didn’t touch before and bringing his lips back on hers. They kissed deeply this time and his tongue made its way into her mouth. Sansa tried to play with her tongue on his as well, but it felt awkward. Again, she didn’t know what to do. But she enjoyed the kiss all the same.

Tyrion began to unlace her gown, very slowly. Little by little, her gown opened until it was entirely unlaced, and Tyrion removed it and cast it aside. Sansa’s shoulders were uncovered and Tyrion used the situation to kiss them. Sansa still had her head thrown back and her eyes closed, enjoying the feeling of his lips on her body. Tyrion started to unlace her underwear now. She felt the pressure on her breasts lessening as the laces were undone. Like her gown, it was tossed away.

Tyrion stopped kissing her shoulder. Sansa opened her eyes to see him looking at her body. Above her hips, Sansa wore nothing. Tyrion took care of everything under her hips quite quickly. After staring at her chest for a time, he grabbed the sides of her dress along with the underclothes under it and slowly lowered them along her legs, until her feet left the fabric. Sansa really wore nothing now. She was entirely naked.

By instinct, Sansa brought her hands to her breasts. She had never been naked in front of a man before. Her shyness took over.

“No.” Tyrion only said a word, but his hands told much more than his mouth. He took her hands and removed them gently from her breasts, revealing her entire body. He stared at her with intensity. Sansa recognized this look. He looked at her the way he admired her after she put on a new gown, but his gaze was more intense than she ever saw. Sansa felt his eyes lingering on her legs, her hips, her belly, her breasts, her arms, before he returned to her face. There were such sparks in his eyes. She never saw him like this before. She was shivering again, she didn’t know if it was because she was expecting or anxious.

“You’re beautiful.” He leaned over her and kissed her again on the mouth. “So beautiful.” The words came out of his mouth as they shared a very deep kiss. Sansa was trying to kiss him the deeper she could. She wanted him to know her feelings for him, but without words. His hands went to her own and he removed the rings on her fingers. All safe her wedding ring. That was the only thing she needed on her. Except the proof of their marriage, Sansa’s body was entirely free of any jewel or clothe of any shape.

Tyrion’s hand came to grab her left breast and he began to massage it. Sansa let a moan escape her mouth in their kissing. His thumb ran on her teat, each passage leaving her with a wish to get more. His lips left hers and he trailed his mouth along the same path he took the last time, kissing her chin, her neck, her collarbone, and reaching the outline of her other breast. Her eyes were still closed, but she could feel all his movements and his touches. His lips followed the outline of her right breast, circling it. She opened her eyes to see him do it. He got closer and closer to her teat, and finally he sucked it. Sansa arched her neck, moaning as she closed her eyes again. It was so good. She was breathing heavily and she felt a wetness grow between her legs.
Tyrion kept going with the massage of a breast and the licking of the other one. His free hand was cressing her belly and her thighs in the meantime. His right hand left her left breast after a time, then his mouth left the right one. She wanted to grunt in displeasure until his mouth took her left breast.
His left hand came to knead the other breast now left uncared and his right hand took over the work to rub her belly. Sansa felt she could stay there, allowing him to continue, forever. She didn’t dare to move. She didn’t want to risk to ruin it with an inappropriate movement.

But it didn’t last forever like she wished. Tyrion brought his two hands to the underside of her thighs and his mouth left her teat. Sansa really grunted this time. The trail of kisses he left from her belly to her hips felt good, but not as good as the feeling of his hands and mouth on her breasts. She was still gasping. Tyrion was too.

Suddenly, Tyrion brought one of his hands between her legs and massaged the zone. She let another sound leave her throat. She felt his thumb entering her crevice and touching something at the top of it. Sansa nearly screamed this time. The thumb kept moving against whatever it touched, and Sansa kept whimpering. It only lasted a few seconds before Tyrion removed his hand from between her legs, but Sansa never felt something like this. She didn’t know she could feel so much… delight.

Tyrion’s hands weren’t moving anymore and he stopped to kiss her hips. Sansa opened her eyes to look at him. He was looking at her and she knew what he wanted. He wanted her. And she wanted him. She was breathing more heavily than ever, eager to see what would come next.

“Do you trust me?”

The question startled Sansa. She answered with a voice she never used before. “Yes, I do.” She just wanted him to resume his touching. Right now, she would be ready to do anything he asked from her. She kept her half-closed eyes locked on his.

“Close your eyes.” His voice was soft, beautiful to hear. She wished she heard it before. Sansa closed her eyes. She knew what he would do. After more than a year, he would do it.

First she felt his hands running on her thighs and her hips, until he spread her legs. Yes, he was going to do it. Sansa knew it was going to be painful. Everyone said it. Her septa told her so. Her mother told her. Even Tyrion told her. But she trusted him. If she was to lose her maidenhead, she wanted to lose it to him and to no one else. I won’t ever hurt you. And he never did. He wouldn’t hurt her. She felt thumbs opening her entrance and something got inside. It was wet. Sansa could barely hold a cry of pleasure. Moaning and whimpering, she brought her arms above her head as Tyrion entered her. Pleasure was filling her body, coming from her sex and spreading through all her members. It grew more intense with time. She couldn’t think about anything else now. Her whole body shook without interruption, and the shaking only kept growing. Her moans threatened to turn into screams of pleasure. She thought she might explode like the wildfire her husband unleashed on Stannis’s fleet.

Her body convulsed and she felt a pleasure she couldn’t imagine fill her body. She screamed this time, even if she managed to keep it low, or at least she hoped she succeeded to keep it low. Tyrion was still moving inside her and it still felt wonderful, but pleasure wasn’t burning her body anymore as it did before, and it stopped building up. Tyrion left her womb, but her body was still filled with a pleasure slowly receding that left a comfortable warmth within her. He resumed his kissing of her hips and brought his mouth upwards. His lips passed on her belly, then on her breast, her neck and finally rested on her cheek. Sansa turned her face and kissed her husband passionately. She didn’t open her eyes. She didn’t need to see. She only needed to feel. Tyrion returned her kiss with the same passion. They were smiling and laughing as they did so, their tongues playing together.

To her regret, Tyrion broke their kiss, but it was only to sweetly kiss her neck. His hands were wandering on her body, brushing her teats, sometimes staying on them for a few seconds. Sansa felt her body was growing somewhat tired, but she only liked even more the attention Tyrion gave to it. For the first time since he began to play with her breasts, Sansa managed to think clearly.

They did it. They finally did it. Well, in fact, she didn’t do much. Tyrion was the one to make most of the work, if not all. What he did between her legs… It was divine. And it didn’t hurt. People didn’t know what they were talking about. Everyone said the first time was horrible and it got better with practice, but Sansa felt no pain at all. Only pleasure. Pure pleasure. A pleasure she didn’t know could exist. A pleasure she still felt right now, though less violently, thanks to the way Tyrion gave attention to her body. Recovering the boldness she had when she kissed Tyrion for the first time tonight, Sansa took his face between her hands and kissed him with all the passion she could muster in. His lips tasted wine, like before, but she noticed something else. She didn’t care and kept kissing him, stroking his hair just like he stroked her own. Still resting on her back, she kept him stuck with her.

“Tyrion, I love you.” She said it.

“Sansa. I love you too. You can’t know how much I love you.”

They resumed their kissing. He could talk, but after everything he made her feel, she thought she knew how much he loved her. He was probably the one to not know to what extent she loved him. It had nothing to do with the fancy she once had with Joffrey or Loras. She loved him for real. She trusted him. She wanted to share his burdens, his joys, his sorrows, his life. She wanted to live with him.

_He needs you. Not only as a wife to stand beside him during official events or to have children. He needs you in his life. He needs someone to share his life with. Someone who will look after him. Someone who cares about him, who wants him to be happy. Someone who will make him happy. You understand what I mean? Now she understood what Kevan Lannister once told her. Every man needs a woman at his side, especially a woman he loves._ Genna’s words echoed those of her brother. Sansa felt in this very moment she was more than what they asked from her. She loved Tyrion. She could give him her love without restraint. She wanted to give her love to him. She loved him.

Sansa laughed, and this time she was the one to break their kiss. That didn’t stop Tyrion from resuming his light and soft kisses on her neck. And to say she waited for more than a year to consummate their marriage. How silly she was. She had the best husband she could dream of, and she waited for so long before she finally accepted him. She should have accepted him on their wedding night. How wonderful it would have been. How perfect their marriage would have been since the beginning.

“Well,” she began with a sleeping voice, “the people who say that consummation is painful are wrong.” She couldn’t stop to chuckle on this. She barely noticed Tyrion stopped to kiss and massage her and straightened up on their bed. When she fully realized it and opened her eyes to look at her beloved husband, he was looking at her with unease.

“I… We didn’t consummate, Sansa.”

She couldn’t have been more surprised by this statement. She stood up on the bed while remaining seated. “What do you mean?”

With a strange smile, Tyrion answered. “It wasn’t my cock inside your womb.”

Even if Tyrion had a cruder language than most of the people Sansa knew, he always spoke more properly in her presence. But it wasn’t his choice of words that struck her. His manhood didn’t enter her. But then…

“But… What… what did you…?”

Tyrion chuckled a little while looking at the mattress. “I don’t think it’s a discussion for tonight. Did you like it?”

“Yes, of course, I liked it!” She was nearly insulted by this question. How could he doubt she didn’t like it?

Tyrion chuckled again. “That’s what I thought, or else I would never have been able to explain why you squealed, moaned, whimpered, shook and screamed that way.”

Sansa was taken aback by the description of how she reacted to his touch. Tyrion laughed this time. Sansa flushed even more than she already did. She tried to gain back her composure. She realized suddenly Tyrion was still wearing his clothes. None had been removed. Even his breeches weren’t unlaced. He told the truth. It wasn’t his manhood she felt inside her. But then, what did she feel?

Tyrion managed to get back his seriousness. “Don’t worry with this. I just did you something to make you feel better. It makes things much less painful, and a lot more enjoyable, when it’s time to consummate.” He leaned in her direction and took one of her cheeks in his right hand. “You still want to do it?”

She only saw sincerity in his green eyes, as always. He was really ready to not go any further if she didn’t want. How could she find herself with such a good husband? She forced a smile on her lips. “Yes, I want.”

She had to force the smile not because she wasn’t sincere, but only because she was disappointed what she just felt wasn’t the loss of her maidenhead. It felt so wonderful. Would it feel so good when they would join for real?

Tyrion smiled at her again, perhaps a bit smugly this time. “I guess you know what to do.”

Sansa smiled a little and lied again on her back. Tyrion leaned over her again and resumed the caressing of her hips and belly. But before she abandoned herself to his touch, Sansa needed to know something. “Will it hurt?”

Tyrion looked at her with eyes that showed some regret. He averted his eyes from hers for a short moment before he looked at her again. “I won’t lie to you, Sansa. It hurts. There’s no way around it, I’m sorry. What I just did will make it less painful, and I can do other things to make it even more bearable, but the pain can only be lessened. I cannot make it disappear. I wish I could. You don’t deserve to suffer more than you already did.”

Sansa could see he really regretted it. He wanted to please her, and he was sad because their joining would be painful for her. She wanted to hug him, to kiss him, for that. Joffrey would have raped her. Loras Tyrell would probably not have cared for the way she felt. But Tyrion did. She closed her eyes and tears threatened to roll on her cheeks. She opened her eyes and saw him looking at her, with eyes that seemed to ask for her forgiveness. He didn’t need to ask for it. She was the one who should ask him for forgiveness. For how long did she reject him only because he was a dwarf? A Lannister? She lifted up her back and kissed him tenderly, her tears leaving her eyes and rolling on their cheeks.

His hands went to her back as she leaned to kiss him. Her own hands came to his small body, but she met his clothes instead of his skin. How would it feel to touch his flesh? She broke their kiss. He was looking down and she looked down too, but since she was taller than him, she was looking at his face. She ran a finger on his scar. It healed since the battle. When they married, it was still a huge and fresh red line, but now it was only a pale mark on his face. He’s rather good-looking even with the scar. Especially with the scar. Margaery was right. It made him more handsome. Cersei tried to have him killed, and he would keep this mark for the rest of his life because of his sister’s cruelty. He had another scar, more recent she knew, on his chest. Sansa felt bold enough to open his doublet and, without thinking afterwards, she took off his shirt, pulling it over his head.

She looked at his bare chest. She saw Tyrion half-naked, or even entirely naked, a few times when they lived in King’s Landing, mostly in the first weeks of their marriage. However, she mostly saw him like this when his back was turned on her, and in the darkness. She looked at his chest, trying to remember every detail, but her eyes were attracted in the end on the huge scar crossing his chest above his navel and under his own breasts. It wasn’t entirely healed like the one on his face. She knew Creylen still took a look at it from time to time. She passed her hand along the second scar Cersei gave him.

She remembered how desperate she felt when this happened at the end of the trial. She just managed to save Tyrion from a sentence to death and Margarey had hugged her. She had succeeded. But then, a kingsguard had pushed aside Ser Jaime and tried to stab her husband in the heart. Tyrion managed to avoid a deadly stab, but blood had spurted all over him. Sansa had stared in horror at the scene before her. She did everything to have Tyrion cleared, but in the end it had been useless. Back then she had been like the little girl she was when her father was executed. Only, this time, no one was holding her and she had run to Tyrion, trying to stop the bleeding, screaming for help. She had remained at his side for more than a day afterwards, praying to the Old Gods and the Seven to save him. And he lived.

And now here he stood, her husband, the man she loved. He looked back at her, his eyes meeting hers. She kissed him. She didn’t stop. She didn’t want to stop. She wouldn’t let someone try to take him away from her again. She wanted to be with him forever. She didn’t know how long they shared this kiss, but it was surely longer than all the others they shared tonight. What time of the night was it now?

To her dread, Tyrion broke their kiss, but she resumed it almost immediately. He broke it again, but with the same result. Only at the fourth attempt he managed to place a word. “If you really want to consummate, I’m afraid you’ll have to remove my breeches too, my lady. Unless you want me to remove them myself?”

Tyrion was smiling and laughing a little as he said it, and Sansa could only do the same. “No. I’ll do it.”

With haste and trembling hands, clumsily, she unlaced Tyrion’s breeches and revealed his manhood. He was naked before her just like she was before him. She looked at all his body, trying to memorize all of it. Surely it was what he tried to do when he looked at her after undressing her completely. Tyrion looked away as she observed him.

“What do you have?” she asked, concerned.

“Nothing.” He tried to smile and to laugh, but she could see he forced himself. “It’s just… You’re so beautiful. You deserve better than an ugly dwarf for a husband. I know I’m not a pretty sight.”

Sansa wished she could say something. She never knew what to say when Tyrion talked lowly of him. About his dwarfism. About the horrible things his family did. About his first wife. Did he think about her in this instant? Sansa pushed the thought aside. She took Tyrion’s shoulders and forced him to look at her. “I don’t care what you look like. I love you.”
They kissed again. After a moment, Sansa ended lying on her back like before, but this time her hands were running on her husband’s body, feeling his flesh between her fingers. She wasn’t afraid of what she might do anymore. She wanted him. She could feel his manhood pressing against her belly. She was so lost in her embrace with the man she loved that she couldn’t look at it. She barely remembered how it looked like, even if she saw it no more than a few minutes ago. But she felt his manhood against her all the same. Was it so little as he said at their wedding? Would she really feel nothing, as if he wasn’t there? For the time being, she felt it against her.

Tyrion broke their kiss and repeated the journey of his mouth over her body, stopping at her neck and her breasts. The same feelings came back to Sansa, filling her body with pleasure. Tyrion may surprise you. From what I’ve heard, he’s quite experienced. Margaery was right. Sansa never thought she could enjoy the touch of Tyrion Lannister so much. She knew nothing. Margaery knew. And to say the Queen of Thorns tried to have her married to Tyrion instead of Sansa after Joffrey’s murder… Sansa knew what Margaery was missing now. And she wasn’t about to regret it.

Tyrion resumed his path after he gave enough attention to her breasts. His mouth was trailing on her skin, causing gooseprickles to form where he left some saliva on her. His mouth reached her left thigh where it stayed. Sansa was breathing deeply, occasionally moaning, at the same time excited and afraid of what he would do next. Her hands were once again on her sides, laying on the bed cover.

Tyrion stopped to kiss her thigh and raised on his legs. It was strange to see him towering her, but she didn’t hate it. He looked straight in her eyes as he opened her legs and brought his hand between them, massaging the space between her thighs. Sansa closed her eyes again. She let them open since they began their second embrace, but she couldn’t now. His touch was sure, and she could feel the wetness between her legs growing. His fingers were soon sliding. His thumb entered her womb like the other time. The delight she felt when he touched it was as good as the first time, if not better. He rubbed it longer than previously and Sansa felt the same tension growing in her belly. Was it how he did the first time? Instead of his manhood inside her, was it his thumb? No, that was impossible. Sansa remembered how the thing he introduced inside, and it didn’t feel like his thumb. How did he do the first time? She couldn’t find an answer to this question as the burning intensified once more. But all of a sudden, Tyrion stopped his movement and withdrew his finger.

Sansa’s breathing was very quick. She wanted more. Her body wanted more. She opened her eyes with the attention to order her husband to continue. But he spoke before her.

“You’re ready?” Sansa realized. They were supposed to consummate. Her body was crying for him. She nodded immediately, nearly forgetting the pain to come.

Her eyes went to his manhood. It was straight and long. She never saw another one, so she didn’t know if it was really little in comparison to the others, but to her it didn’t seem very small. Tyrion seemed to notice her interest.

“If you want me to stop at any time, just say it. I’ll stop.”

Sansa lifted her eyes to stare into his own. “Do it.” Her body was still screaming for him. She wouldn’t reject him. She wanted him. She wanted to be his wife. To really be his wife.

“Then let us do our duty.”

He leaned over and gave her another lingering kiss. She felt his manhood on her belly again. Soon it would be inside her. She knew it. Tyrion’s lips left hers and he positioned himself over her. She tensed in anticipation. She felt something damp at the entrance of her womb first. Then Tyrion positioned his hands on her folds. She felt his thumbs opening it. And he processed to enter.
It was nothing like the first time. It was definitely not his manhood that entered her back then. But now it was, and to the opposite of the first time, the thing she felt the most was pain. She caught deep breaths of air as his manhood filled her. He did it slowly, progressively, but it hurt all the same. Finally he filled her completely. My poor wife won’t even know I’m here? What a joke! She could feel him, and feel him very well inside her.

Once his manhood was entirely inside her, Tyrion didn’t move for a time. He was only looking at her, as if he expected something. Sansa didn’t want him to believe he was hurting her. Perhaps he would take the sounds she made for gasps of pleasure and not of pain. She smiled at him. They were husband and wife now. Now and forever. Sansa was happy for that.

Tyrion moved inside her. He pushed. Sansa let a cry escape her throat. It hurt. She gasped and tried to hide the pain she felt. Her gaze left Tyrion’s face when he pushed. He backed a little, something Sansa found more enjoyable, or at least less painful. She still didn’t accommodate to the presence of his manhood inside her womb.

Tyrion looked at her with something that looked like a sorry face. He didn’t move again. Well, he didn’t move between her legs. He brought his left hand to knead her right breast. After a few squeezes, Sansa felt some pleasure coming back to her body and her mind. He massaged her breast gently, caressing her teat with great attention. It was impossible to forget he was present between her legs, but this presence became more uncomfortable than painful. He lowered his face and went to suckle her other breast. She whimpered in pleasure from the movements of his hand on her right breast and from the movements of his mouth on the left one. THAT felt good. He continued to do it for a time, then he gave another thrust inside her. It was painful, but the attention he gave to her breasts made it less unpleasant.

They continued like this for some time. Her teats receiving attention all the time while Tyrion tried a thrust from time to time. Sansa still couldn’t enjoy what he did between her legs, but she could appreciate the overall lovemaking. Each thrust seemed more bearable than the previous one. Her eyes were closed again.

“Raise your legs.” Sansa’s mind had grown numb. She didn’t understand what he meant.

“What?” He voice was very low. She couldn’t speak louder.

Tyrion’s tongue stopped to lick her left teat for a short time. “Raise your legs. You’ll like it better.”

He went back to her teat. Sansa didn’t know why he wanted her to do so, but she wasn’t in a mind’s state to refuse him. She raised her legs a little. Tyrion’s free hand, the right one, helped her to lift them more. He thrusted again. The pain was still there, but she felt some small pleasure from the movement this time. He did it again with the same result. She started to enjoy it. She felt his breath quickening on her left breast. She liked the feeling of his mouth’s hot breathing on her body. She slowly brought her arms around his head, wrapping it tenderly, though she would have wanted to do it more fiercely. But he was kind and gentle with her, and she didn’t want to be any different with him.

It was at this moment that she felt something else between her legs. Something was slipping between her husband’s member and what few space was left in her womb. It reached the little mound inside her. She recognized what it was when it rubbed the siege on her pleasure. Tyrion’s thumb was inside her, just like his manhood. She cried as his thumb caressed her little butt, not in pain but in pleasure. And he started.

Tyrion was moving inside her. Her legs were wrapped around his hips. He thrusted in her and rubbed her mound with his thumb at the same time. Sansa moaned. It was pleasant and painful at the same time. He did it again, and again, and again. He adjusted the movements of his manhood and his thumb so they would be simultaneous. At the same time he kept suckling and kneading her breasts.

Sansa found herself lost in a haze of pleasure and pain. Each thrust of Tyrion with his manhood was accompanied by a caress of his thumb on her mound. Pleasure and pain were mixed within a single blur. Sansa didn’t know if she enjoyed the pain or feared the pleasure. She tightened her arms around his head and he sucked her left breast more sharply. She didn’t only feel his tongue and his lips, but also his teeth on her teat now. There was nothing she could do but feel. Delight and pain fought and joined in each member of her body. Tyrion’s movements became erratic and quicker, always more insistent, and the waves Sansa felt flowing through her body followed his rhythm. Her moans and whimpering threatened again to turn into screams as the waves hit her. She could hear Tyrion making sounds with his mouth against her breast too.

For the second time this night, Sansa hit a wall and her body convulsed, her back arching. Two or three thrusts inside her and Tyrion let escape a deep and loud groan, abandoning her left breast. A loud sound escaped from Sansa’s throat as well. She realized they were both shaking as their joined bodies relaxed after reaching their peaks. Tyrion’s thumb continued to rub whatever was inside her womb for a moment, until he finally got it out. His manhood was still inside her, but it wasn’t the only thing Sansa could feel. Something heavy but not solid seemed to flow in her womb. Tyrion stopped to massage her right teat with his hand and put a light kiss between her two breasts. Sansa’s body was resolving from the encounter and she felt a peace and a feeling of well-being she never felt before spread from her feet to her head. Tyrion finally went out of her. His manhood was no longer in her, but she still felt the heavy fluid she suspected to come from her husband.

END OF THE VERY EXPLICIT SECTION

Tyrion was sitting next to her now, a gentle smile on his lips. “How did you find it?”

Sansa thought she perceived concern in his voice. He was afraid he might have hurt her. He didn’t. She came on her thighs and kissed him the most tenderly she could. “I loved it. Thank you.”

Sansa thought she never saw him so happy before. And she was happy too. She kissed him again, lighter, then rested her brow against his head. She didn’t know how long they remained in that position, but they probably stayed this way for a long time. Her body grew tired and she felt a great desire to sleep. She let herself fall on the bed cover. Tyrion rested his smaller body next to her. They didn’t leave each other’s eyes. Tyrion extended a hand to pass it through her hair. Her eyes grew heavy with sleep. But before she fell asleep, there was something she needed to say to her husband.

“I love you, Tyrion.” It was nothing more than a whisper, but she said it.

“I love you, my lady. I love you, Sansa.” These were the last words she heard before she fell asleep.

She walked down the alley to the High Septon who waited for her with her betrothed, Ser Loras Tyrell, between the altars of the Mother and the Father. Her father was accompanying her, leading her with her arm under his. She wore a beautiful golden gown with a direwolf cloak. Ser Loras was waiting for her with a green cloak. He climbed the steps with her. Arrived before the High Septon and her soon-to-be-husband, her father released her arm and took the grey cloak off her shoulders. Ser Loras cloaked her with the green one. The ceremony carried on in the same way every wedding ceremony was celebrated in the sight of the Seven. After they exchanged vows, Sansa looked down at the people assembled for the occasion. Her father, her mother, Robb, Arya, Bran, Rickon, all their direwolves including Lady, even Jon and her uncle Benjen were present. Sansa also saw Margaery and Mira in the assistance, and her friend from Winterfell, Jeyne Poole. They were all smiling at her, happy she was getting married. Sansa was happier than she ever was. She smiled fondly at all of them, then turned to face her husband for the kiss. But he wasn’t there anymore.

Where was he? Where was Loras? She looked back at her family and her friends, but they kept smiling at her, as if there was nothing strange.Sansa didn’t understand. She looked right before her again, but she saw nothing. Where was her husband? Did she imagine it? Was there no one to marry her? Were her family and her friends mocking her? No, that couldn’t be something she imagined. He put a cloak on her shoulders. She could feel the weight of the cloak on her. She looked at her left shoulder to be sure she was really wearing a cloak.

She had a great shock. She wore a cloak, a wedding cloak, but it wasn’t green like the one she was just draped in. And it wasn’t grey either, like the one she came with into the Great Sept. This cloak was red. It looked like the cloak… She stared before her. Life is a song. And yours is just about to begin. The bard was there too. She heard his voice. Now she knew. All previous times, she thought her husband disappeared after the vows. But now she knew. She looked down, and she saw him.

He wore the same clothes she remembered him wearing. Tyrion Lannister. The voice of her father resonated in her head. When you’re old enough, I’ll make you a match with someone who’s worthy of you, someone who’s brave and gentle and strong. Tyrion was smiling at her. Not smiling with lust or desire or cruelty, but with kindness, meaning she had nothing to fear from him. She looked again at her friends and her family. They were still all smiling at her, including her father. Someone who’s brave and gentle and strong. She turned to face her husband again and couldn’t help but smile. She knelt and they kissed for the first time. People cheered and they turned to face them.

A feast followed where she spoke with everyone present. Tyrion may surprise you. From what I’ve heard, he’s quite experienced, Margaery told her. Mira said he was a good man. He’s brave, gentle and strong, her father told her. Her mother gave her advices about how to be a good wife, and Robb came to congratulate her. There was a woman heavy with child she never met before with her eldest brother. Bran and Rickon hugged her, just like Jeyne and her mother. Even Jon came to give her his best wishes. Arya laughed about how she was twice the height of her husband, and Sansa laughed with her. Everything was so perfect. She saw her father and Tyrion exchange a few words and shake hands. She saw him exchanging jokes with Bran, Rickon and Arya, then with Margaery and Mira. Tyrion talked about a special saddle with Bran who had to be carried by Hodor since he couldn’t walk. Only her mother and Robb seemed to have some reserve towards her husband and stayed away from him. Then came the bedding ceremony. The only thing Sansa didn’t like in the bedding was the suggestive eyes Margaery made to her husband. But when they arrived to their wedding bed, they only had eyes and ears for each other and Sansa spent the best night of her life. She was now Sansa Lannister, wife of Tyrion Lannister, the man she loved. Life is a song. And yours is just beginning.

Chapter End Notes

OK... They finally did it! I'm sure many of you must have thought this at the end of the chapter. Some may have thought I was going to deceive them again. But no, this time this is real, the marriage is consummated.

I'm really sorry everyone who waited for so long for this. I received many comments and reviews saying they wanted Tyrion and Sansa to become husband and wife for good, and many wondered if I would ever bring them physically together. I'm sorry again for the long time it took. Does anyone know a Tyrion/Sansa fic where it took 73 chapters or more to reach the consummation? I think I set up a record.

That was my intention since the beginning to have Tyrion and Sansa consummate their marriage on her sixteenth name day. In my country (Canada), it is legal for an adult to have sexual relationships with someone as long as he is at least sixteen-years-old, so I thought this was a minimum to reach. And what better opportunity than a name day for that.

The songs in this chapter (in order of appearance):
- Written in Starlight (by Karliene Reynolds, available on Apple Music and Spotify, impossible to find entirely on Youtube)
- Mother's Hymn (by Karliene Reynolds, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=CKvOQXPfrMA)
- My Featherbed (by Karliene Reynolds, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SogjdgwYy9c)
- False Love (by Karliene Reynolds, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=AZvRpMDGUyE)
- The Wolf and the Moon (by Karliene Reynolds, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=e7ejbNmyJ04)
- Let it go (by Indina Menzel, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=iEKLFS-aKcw)
- The Mummer's Dance (by Loreena McKennitt, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qxTpVA-pUG0)

There are a lot of things new that happened in this chapter. This is not only about the consummation, far from it. Aside the fact Tyrion and Sansa are now truly married, here are the important things to remember for the future of the fic:
- Sansa's indentifying herself more and more to the Lannisters
- Ser Harrold Hardyng
- Joy Hill/Rollam Westerling
- First real appearance of Alysanne Lefford
- Marriage Bronn/Daisy
- Tyrion's present (he didn't give it to Sansa yet)
- Tyrion/Sansa sealed forever
Also, I want to make it clear. I wrote an explicit scene, and that's not going to happen again. I decided to do it once, but that will be all. I've never been very comfortable with sex and nudity on television, and only a little in books. This is me. I wrote the consummation to show how the relationship between Tyrion and Sansa reached a decisive point, and I won't depict things like this again.

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Thank you to everyone who reviewed on the previous chapter. I really appreciated the feedback on it.

This chapter takes place about a week after the previous chapter. Tyrion has a lot to think about. And there's someone who's not happy about a certain marriage.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

“‘This is outrageous! An insult! I will not allow it!’”

Tyrion didn’t lift his eyes from the order he was writing for the officials of the cells of Casterly Rock, Lannisport and all the other castles and towns in the Westerlands. The order was more pressing than the complaints of the woman before him.

“‘Did you hear me, Imp! I will not allow it!’”

Tyrion stopped to write and looked at the woman who stood tall before his desk, fury obvious on her face. Lady Sybell Westerling was no better than her brother, but probably more dangerous. Tyrion had the feeling she was the real mind behind the betrayal of the Westerlings.

“If I were you, Lady Westerling, I would be careful of the words you use in my presence.”

Tyrion’s words didn’t seem to calm the woman. “Lord Tywin promised us a bride for our heir if we played our part, and you give us some wretch.”

A silence followed the lady’s words. Tyrion looked at her. She was still staring at him, furious. Tyrion put down his pen. He seized a bell on his desk and rang it. Bronn immediately burst through the door and entered Tyrion’s solar. Without waiting, he grabbed Sybell Westerling from behind and put a knife on her throat. The woman who stood so tall and proud a moment ago was now paling and shivering like an old woman who could barely stand. Her eyes looked around in distress. The doors shut behind Bronn immediately after he came in.

Tyrion rose from his seat behind his desk and went to stand before the Lady of the Crag. He could be small, but in this moment height meant nothing. He stood taller than the heartless and trembling woman before him. “My lady, I present you Ser Bronn of Blackwater. Surely you heard about him. He’s the one who took Clegane’s Keep after Ser Gregor unfortunately died. I’m quite certain you know about the way Ser Gregor’s men died afterwards. For the right amount of gold, he could kill anybody, and it so happens I have the right amount of gold for your head. A single word from me, and he would slit your throat like it was nothing, and you would run out of blood within seconds. Do you want me to give the word?”

Lady Westerling was panicking. She didn’t expect this. To be honest, Tyrion would be happy to see Bronn kill this treacherous schemer, but that wouldn’t be for the best. It was never good to kill one of your bannermen’s wife in his own solar. Lady Westerling pointed it out herself. “You wouldn’t dare. You wouldn’t dare. You wouldn’t kill the Lady of the Crag inside the walls of the Rock.”

“I would. If you were to attack me in hatred for organizing a marriage for your son that you disapproved, then I would be in position to pledge legitimate defense. And after all the schemes you participated to, I don’t think people would weep for you, or care for your death, or even question my version of the facts after your role in the Red Wedding.”

She was stuck. She knew it, and Tyrion knew it. “Please, my lord. Forgive me. I spoke out of anger. I didn’t know what I was saying. Please spare me. I will do everything you ask from me. Everything. Just let me live. I beg you. I won’t protest against this marriage. I promise.”

That was very satisfying to see this woman pleading for her own life after she insulted him, so proud she was of herself. Tyrion put a mischievous smile on his face. “Let’s make a deal, Lady Westerling. You will forget I threatened you today. If you do it, I will be in your debt. And a Lannister always pays his debts. So if you never talk about the way my friend and I threatened you, I will forget you insulted me and my cousin. We will resume this discussion in good terms and do as if nothing ever happened. Is that a deal good enough for you? I fear the other solution is quite at your disadvantage.”

The Lady of the Crag seemed confused by the offer, but after a moment she nodded strongly to show her approval. It was a deal. On a sign of Tyrion’s head, Bronn let her go.

“My friend will stay here for the rest of our meeting,” Tyrion added. “He will be able to confirm our discussion went without trouble.”

Bronn went to sit in a corner of the solar, sheathing his dagger. However, he unsheathed his sword and started to sharpen it with a whetstone. The noise of the sharpening sword went out, regular and threatening. Tyrion knew it had some effect on Sybell Spicer. She smoothed her gown and sat on a chair before Tyrion’s desk.

“Thank you, my lord.” She sat without being invited, and her disdain was quite obvious in her voice. She won’t forget that. Good.

Tyrion went back behind his desk. “So, as I told you earlier before this interruption, your son Rollam will marry in four years when my cousin reaches her fifteenth name day.”

“Your father promised joy for my son,” Lady Sybell specified.

“And that’s what your son is getting. A Lannister always pays his debts.”

“We were promised joy, not Joy.”

“I think this is the same. Joy is a sweet, beautiful and lovely girl. And your son seems to like her a lot. She will make a fine Lady of the Crag in time.”

“A bast…” Lady Westerling refrained at the last moment. “A natural daughter cannot become the Lady Westerling, my lord. What marriage prospect would there be for my grandchildren?”

“I believe they would have much more chances to marry than your children. Joy is the niece of Tywin Lannister. She may be a bastard, but Lannister blood runs through her veins. Her children will have much more possibilities of marriage than the children of a merchant’s granddaughter.”

Fury was plain in Lady Sybell’s eyes. “He’s my son. My last son. He deserves better than this.”

“You’re right. He deserves a better mother than you.” Lady Westerling was in obvious shock before the statement. “You participated to a plan that led to the breaking of the guest rights. You betrayed your liege lord, and your king. And by the same way you had your eldest son, Raynald Westerling, killed.”

“You participated to a plan that led to the breaking of the guest rights. You betrayed your liege lord, and your king. And by the same way you had your eldest son, Raynald Westerling, killed.”

“The Freys killed my son,” the woman tried to argue.

“Because you conspired with them,” Tyrion countered.

“Just like you.”

Tyrion breathed deeply before he answered. “You conspired with my father, my lady. And you conspired with him to murder my mother-in-law, my brother-in-law and the child who would have been my nephew. And you also conspired to kill the sister-in-law of my wife. And your king. And many other people.”

“They were traitors, my lord. We served House Lannister. We served your father.”

“Yes, you served my father. You didn’t serve me. Consider yourself lucky. I confirmed the granting of Castamere to your brother, and I arranged a marriage to your son with a suitable wife. I paid the debts of my father. Don’t give me a reason to pay my debts for the sufferings you inflicted to my wife, your liege lady. Everything you did to her, you did it to me as well. You have what you were promised. Rollam Westerling will marry Joy Hill in four years. Now go. The next time House Westerling has something to ask from Casterly Rock, send your husband. I suffer him much better than you. He’s not a turncloak and he took no part in the death of his son and heir.”

Tyrion went back to writing the order. Bronn left the corner where he sat previously and approached the horrible woman. Reluctantly, she left and was escorted back to the door where a guard took over Bronn’s task. The doors shut behind her. Good riddance.

Brons came to sit into another chair before Tyrion’s desk. He took his usual comfortable position with his boots on his desk. “For a knight, you don’t behave properly in the presence of your liege lord,” Tyrion noted.

“I never behaved properly in anyone’s presence,” the former sellsword replied. He started to cut his nails.

“Not even in your wife’s presence?”

Brons stopped as quickly as he started to cut his nails. “She’s not my wife yet. By the way…”

“Don’t worry. You’ll have your wedding rings. The goldsmiths of Lannisport are working on it.”

“And it will be free?”

“That’s not free since you get them for being my guard until your wedding.”

“I would have been your guard anyway. Life here is too boring. I would have guarded you even without payment.”

“Life is boring? Here? In Casterly Rock?”

“I don’t enjoy books like you, your knights refuse to spar with me since they believe me to fight unfairly, Daisy is busy with the marriage preparations, and you forbade me from fucking the servants.”
“Sansa forbade you,” Tyrion corrected.

“What difference is there for me, whether it was you or the Stark girl?”

“None.” Tyrion signed the order and put his seal on it. He looked back at his friend who resumed the operation on his nails. “I still don’t understand why you’re marrying her. Didn’t you want a highborn lady?”

“Now I have lands, I wanted a highborn lady so I could get a castle from her, but I don’t need it anymore. She would only give me trouble. Daisy gives me no trouble. Only a good fuck at night.” Bronn didn’t stop to cut his nails as he spoke.

“What about your children? They’ll be poor marriage prospects if you marry a whore.”

Brons shrugged. “The elder will inherit my lands. We might have only one child. Daisy has no problem using moon tea, and I have no problem with her using it. All the other servants at my keep take some too.”

Tyrion rolled his eyes. “You’re not very faithful for a soon to be married man.”

“Soon to be married. I’m going to enjoy my freedom as long as I have it. After the wedding, we’ll see if I’ll keep fucking the other women at my keep. I’m not there yet.”

Tyrion wondered if Bronn really didn’t have any heart within himself. How would Daisy feel with a husband who slept with all the women working at their keep? Perhaps she wouldn’t care. After all, she was a whore most of her life. Tyrion remembered how Shae had been angry when he married Sansa, but Shae had loved him. Or at least she seemed to love him before her betrayal. Did Daisy love Bronn? From the way she behaved with him, Tyrion thought that she did. Did Bronn love her too? Tyrion couldn’t really imagine Bronn loving someone. Or even befriending someone. Even their friendship was mostly based on gold more than anything else. But there was something in the way Bronn behaved with Daisy that let Tyrion perplexed.

“Why are you marrying her?” Tyrion asked. Bronn stopped to clip his nails again and put down his cutter. He looked at Tyrion.

“She’s young, soft, warm, pretty, and she fucks well. And she’s not difficult. She likes the life at our keep. Most ladies would ask a hundred things from me, unlike her. I don’t want trouble. I have lands, a keep, incomes. For me that’s enough. All I want is some peace now. I want a boring death after the adventurous life I had. My death will be quite boring with Daisy.” He took a questioning look.

“Except if I die while I’m inside her. I could die in my own bed, at the age of eighty, with a belly full of wine and Daisy’s mouth around my cock.” Tyrion remembered saying something similar one day. “No. She would be too old at this time. I wouldn’t want her mouth around my cock anymore.”

Sometimes Tyrion was discouraged by his friend’s thoughts. Though he had to admit his own thoughts wouldn’t have been that different a few years ago. “So that’s why you decided to marry her? To have a boring death?”

Brons took off his feet from the desk and grabbed a cup of wine he filled. He could be a landed knight now, but he would always behave like a sellsword. Perhaps that was what Tyrion liked about him. Finally someone who served him without licking his boots. Bronn drank an entire cup.

“Arbor Gold. I missed it.” He filled another cup. “I don’t want her to go. She’s a good and kind girl. She’ll make a good wife for the rest of my days. She won’t give me any problems and she’ll be happy. She’s already acting as the Lady of Blackwater Keep and everything is alright, so why change it? She’ll have a better life with me than anywhere else.” He ended his second cup. Bronn was grinning again. “And she fucks well. Very well. What do you to reproach me anyway? You married a whore, remember.”

Bad memories came back to Tyrion’s head. For an entire week he didn’t think about Tysha or Shae, and now his discussion with the sellsword brought them back to his mind. “I don’t think this is good reference.”

“I don’t have a father to get my wife raped, or to force me to marry some suitable highborn lady, and I’m not a great lord. Only some landed knight. Who will care about this?”

More people than you could think. People knew Bronn was Tyrion’s man. The new of his marriage with a whore would spread quickly and may cause some humiliation for Tyrion and his family.
Though, when Tyrion thought about it, so many people already mocked and laughed at him that it would make no difference. And between Bronn and the Mountain… No, that wouldn’t pose much problems. Only Genna would openly complain, but since Tyrion organized the wedding ceremony next week in Lannisport instead of Casterly Rock, Genna kept quiet.

Tyrion sighed internally. “You’ll have the rings on the day of the wedding.” Tyrion hoped it would conclude their meeting, but Bronn remained here, laying back his boots on Tyrion’s desk. Tyrion brought back his attention to him after he took a scroll from Faircastle. “Don’t you have anything else to do? You have a wedding to prepare.”

“Daisy takes care of it. I’m not interested in organizing it.”

“You’re not interested in your own wedding?”

“Only with the bedding ceremony and what comes after.” Tyrion started to read the scroll from Lord Farman. “And you? How does the bedding go?” Tyrion stared at his friend in surprise. Bronn took an appearance that could be as close to innocence as it could be. “Don’t look at me this way. A kitchen wench told me after I fucked her. Almost half the servants in this rock already know it. I guess the other half will know within a few days.”

Tyrion wanted to curse. The people knew. Well, now there would be no argument left to contest Sansa’s place as Lady of Casterly Rock. It only happened a week ago, the night after the celebrations for her name day. They had consummated their marriage, finally. And more than that, they both admitted their love for each other. Tyrion still had some hard time to believe Sansa truly loved him, but all her demeanor seemed to prove it now. All the same, Tyrion had tried to hide they finally found themselves as husband and wife. He didn’t really know why. Perhaps he only wanted this to remain between him and Sansa. He didn’t want anyone else to know about what was going on in their bedchamber. But he should have known people would discover the truth sooner or later.
Between the blood on the bed cover the morning that followed Sansa’s name day and the fact that her handmaidens would find Sansa without clothes in their bed at the beginning of each day, it was no surprise everyone would know after some time. It was probably the main subject of discussion among the household’s staff now, and maybe among Tyrion’s kin as well.

“So, nothing to say?” Bronn asked, getting him out of his thoughts. “Is she good?”

Bonn seemed to expect something. Tyrion waved a hand. “Get out of here, Bronn. That’s an order.”

The sellsword looked surprised, and disappointed. “Alright. I’ll go find the wench. Perhaps she’ll want to give me a fight and beat me like in the tourney.” He left with a last grin. Tyrion wondered for a moment if Brienne would accept to spar with Bronn. She didn’t have a very good opinion of the man, and this was an understatement.
Tyrion’s thoughts on that matter disappeared as soon as the door closed behind Bronn. The Lord of Casterly Rock was alone in his solar. His thoughts wandered to his wife, as they often went to her since the last week. Well, they often went to her before, but since the name day they went to Sansa almost all time Tyrion’s mind wasn’t occupied by some work.

He thought about their first real night together. Tyrion hadn’t expected this. He had hoped Sansa would be very happy about her sixteenth name day, but he never thought she would willingly share her bed with him this way on this night. Or ever. She had kissed him so suddenly, taking his face between her hands. Her kiss had been unexperienced, but passionate. Tyrion never saw something like this in Sansa. She kissed him as if she wanted him. And when he understood she wanted to consummate... and that she loved him...

Tyrion had finally confessed that he loved her too afterwards, and he had never been happy to see a woman cry but in this occasion. They were tears of joy. And they had begun. That was a long time since Tyrion desired Sansa. Perhaps he desired her even before their wedding, ever since the time they were betrothed probably. Bronn may have been right. You want to fuck that Stark girl. You just don’t want to admit it. Tyrion had wanted Sansa for a very long time, but he didn’t want her as he wanted a whore. He wanted her as his wife. He wanted her to bring him her sorrows, her happiness, her joys, her lust. He didn’t want to take her. He wanted her to give herself to him. And she did it on that night.

That had been more than a year since Tyrion last had a woman. But despite his strong desire to have a woman, and to especially have her, he had resisted and performed slowly. It was obvious she was afraid. It was her first time. He didn’t want to hurt her. So he prepared her body and made everything so she would enjoy it. It had been difficult for him to not get on with the act immediately, but he couldn’t resolve to hurt her. He couldn’t. And she enjoyed it. She said so to him that night, and the night that followed.

For the last week, they had made their duty as husband and wife each night. After such a long time without a woman, Tyrion couldn’t get enough of Sansa. She was soft, warm, sweet, shy too, but her shyness only made her more attractive in his eyes. Making love to her was so different from making love to a whore. Whores were paid and trained to look pleased, and very often they did much of the work. Men went to whores to be pleased, not to please them. Tyrion had been no exception to the rule. The memory of this made him feel guilty. But that wasn’t entirely true. Tyrion hadn’t gone to whores only to have them please him. The first time, yes, he let them do what he paid them for, but as soon as it was the second time, Tyrion was the one to do some things to them. Most of the time, he thought they liked it. It was a way to repent for the horrible things he did to Tysha. He had raped her. He didn’t want to only take advantage of these girls like he did with her. So he tried to give them something. Gold wasn’t enough. They wouldn’t refuse it, but Tyrion wanted them to believe they were liked, or at least appreciated, just like he wanted to believe they liked him. Did they? Tyrion doubted it.

With Sansa, he was the one trying to make it comfortable for her. He wanted her to be happy, to enjoy it, to enjoy the time she spent with him. And up to now, judging from the way she reacted ever since the first night, she seemed to like it. Her reactions in bed were natural, sincere, real, true, without any attempt to hide how she felt. Tyrion liked to hear her squeal, gasp, cry or moan, or to hear his name whispered on her lips. Sansa was a woman now. She was sixteen. No one could deny she was a young and beautiful woman, probably the most beautiful in the Seven Kingdoms. Tyrion never enjoyed his time with a woman like he enjoyed his time with Sansa. Never. Except...

The memory of a young girl crying as he broke her maidenhead came back to his mind. It had been so long ago. She was only a whore, damn fool. Everything she did was for gold. She didn’t love you. Tyrion tried to convince himself of these words. She was a whore. Everything she told me, everything we shared, all of it was a lie. But other words came to his mind. Was it a lie? Was I the liar? The words lingered in his head. Was I the liar? What did she mean? Someone else lied? Jaime told him she was a whore he paid for. She was a whore. A lie. Nothing more. The dream of her was a lie too.

Tyrion looked outside the window. From the position of the sun, he would say they were in the middle of the afternoon. He wouldn’t see Sansa before a few hours. He sighed, discouraged. He would give anything to spend more time with her, but their days as Lord and Lady of the Westerlands were entirely occupied by their duties. They often only met in the evening when it was time for dinner. Tyrion stopped to drink in his solar after dinner so they could spend more time together, but for him it wasn’t enough. He wanted her to be with him right now. When he was with her, he forgot everything else. The world was limited to the two of them at night. Nothing else mattered in these moments. All the worries and thoughts of day would leave him as they slept together. He needed her to forget about Tysha. He remembered her face, the tears and the screams as his father’s guards took their turns on her. And her distress when he went last. Was I the liar?

Tyrion took his head with his hands, trying to get the image out of his head. When it began to recede, he filled himself another cup of wine and drank deeply. He sighed in relief and went back to the scrolls. Lord Sebastion Farman was reporting an attack on a ship from Fair Isle, probably by Ironmen, but he couldn’t be sure. Many lords sent reports of their efforts to prepare for winter. With plundered lands and the war still going on, not to mention the threat of the Iron Islands and the preparations of their invasion, many lords complained about the difficulty to gather enough food stocks to go through winter.

Tyrion finally reached a message he read hours ago. A message from the Night’s Watch and his brother-in-law.

Lord Tyrion,

Stannis Baratheon left the Wall. If you want to help us, now is the time. We need all the help we can get, and quickly. Take care of my sister.

Jon Snow

The first decisions about this matter had been taken by Tyrion earlier in the day, not long after he read the scroll for the first time. If Stannis Baratheon wasn’t at the Wall anymore, then Tyrion could act. Though Tyrion wondered where Stannis went if he left the Wall? Jon Snow didn’t tell in the message. Perhaps he wanted to hide it to Tyrion. Stannis saved them from the wildlings while Tyrion was sitting here in Casterly Rock with Sansa, doing nothing. Perhaps Jon Snow had some respect for Stannis Baratheon for saving the Wall. Or perhaps he knew his father tried to name Stannis king after Robert died. Or it may be only because the Night’s Watch took no part in the wars of the Seven Kingdoms. All the same, he would send help to Jon Snow and the Night’s Watch, and soon. Someone had to.

There was also another report from White Harbor. Lord Wyman Manderly sent information regularly to Casterly Rock about the state of the North and House Bolton. Perhaps he hoped Tyrion would march on the North to kill Roose Bolton. But the most interesting things about House Manderly’s reports, and the most horrible, were the details they gave about Roose Bolton’s son, Ramsay. Tales about his madness and cruelty began to spread through the North. Girls were found in the woods, clothes all torn apart, sometimes without clothes at all, telling horrible stories about the bastard of the Dreadfort. How he skinned their fingers to make them beg to cut them, how he would rape them until he grew bored and released them in the forests to chase them with his dogs. It seemed they found someone crazier than Joffrey. And it was a decree from Tyrion’s nephew, a decree prepared by his own father, that legitimized this bastard and made him the heir to the Dreadfort. Here are the results of your actions for family, Father. A mad dog will rule the North one day. News had come to Tyrion from his ambassador at Winterfell that Lady Walda Bolton was with child. Perhaps Roose Bolton would set aside his legitimated bastard son for his new legitimate one. Tyrion wouldn’t oppose this. Between the rumors of peeled bodies that hung before the doors of Winterfell, the assassination of Lord Cerwyn and his family and the stories about raped girls, Ramsay Bolton didn’t look like a desirable Warden of the North. Sansa had been horrified when she read the scrolls about the horrors the bastard perpetrated. Tyrion wondered if the behaviour of Ramsay Bolton could be a reason strong enough by itself to invade the North and take back Winterfell to give it to Sansa. She would like it surely. But Tyrion wasn’t sure. For now, he had to wait and collect all the information he could on the situation in the North.

Tyrion took a look at the results of the mining of the last month. Thanks to Yroan’s good work, revenues started to increase. But the increase wouldn’t be as great as Yroan promised, and that by Tyrion’s fault. It was sad, but with White Walkers coming, the safety of the Seven Kingdoms was more important than his family’s wealth. Tyrion would have to do with it, and with the new rules Tyrion and Sansa put into place. Mine administrators weren’t allowed to make anyone work for more than twelve hours each day in the mines now. Tyrion also removed two administrators who forced miners to pay them for the food they were given and to work on easier hours. The last time he went into the mines, the miners seemed to show some recognition and he talked with a few of them. He asked them questions about their working conditions and their life, and Tyrion learned a lot this way. It wasn’t by staying into a solar that you could know how your people lived and what they needed. Tyrion had some ideas to make the work in the mines less horrible for men. He would need to think about it and to talk with some administrators he could trust, especially Yroan, to see if these solutions were possible to apply.

Tyrion spent hours reading scrolls, messages, reports, accounts, writing messages and orders. Finally the sun was about to disappear and he decided he worked long enough for today. He went back to his chambers.

Sansa was standing on the balcony, looking at the last rays of the sun. Since the sunlight was fading, it didn’t color her hair very much, but it still did enough to make a difference, even with her back turned on him. Tyrion stood away from her, looking at her frame in the dim color of the sunset.

“Don’t you think you already look enough at me during the night?” Sansa knew he was behind her of course.

“I don’t know. What’s your opinion on the matter?” Tyrion asked, faking ignorance. He couldn’t get enough of her sight, no matter what she wore. Right now, she wore a yellow gown.

“That you should come and look at it with me.”

She didn’t turn her head to face him, but Tyrion knew she was smiling. He approached to stand at Sansa’s side and laid his left hand on her right. Her hand was smooth like always. She intertwined her fingers in his and they held each other’s hand. She looked at him for a moment, smiling sweetly like she was the only one who could. She turned her eyes again to look at the sun falling at the horizon. Tyrion looked at it too. When it had disappeared, they went back into the living room where their dinner was waiting for them. Sansa sent away the two handmaidens who brought it and they found themselves alone, like every dinner.

“You had a rough day?” Sansa asked him.

“No rougher than the previous ones. I received a raven from your brother.”
“Me too. He asked for help again. But he also asked other news from me. And he beheaded Janos Slynt.”

Tyrion almost choked on the wine he was drinking. Sansa had to pat him in the back a few times before he could express anything before this unexpected new. “Janos Slynt? Your brother beheaded Janos Slynt?”

“Yes, he did.” The shadow of a smile appeared on her lips for a moment. “He refused to obey Jon’s order to rebuild Greyguard. So Jon had no other choice but to execute him.”

“I won’t blame him. I had quite a mind to have Janos Slynt beheaded when I was Hand of the King.” This child’s butcher finally met the end he deserved. Tyrion couldn’t repress a light chuckle.

“Me too. It seems there’s some justice finally.” They resumed to eat for a moment. “What did Jon tell in his message for you?”

“Mostly the same thing than yours. But without the new about Janos Slynt. He asked for help to the Wall, and to take care of you. And he said Stannis left the Wall.”

Sansa swallowed the carrots she just picked with her fork. “We should send him help. It’s time.”

“I agree, Sansa. I already took dispositions. Ravens will fly all over the Westerlands tomorrow. All the lords and landed knights are to offer to all their prisoners the option to go the Wall, whatever their crimes. They will be brought here to Casterly Rock, then sent to King’s Landing where they’ll wait for the next ship that will bring them to Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. I’ll also send large amounts of food from our stores at the same time.”

Sansa was looking at him with a strange expression. “Prisoners? That’s all we can send him?”

Tyrion wiped his mouth with his towel. “I’m afraid. I cannot send an army yet.”

“Why?” Sansa’s voice wasn’t without outrage. Tyrion didn’t like to see her like this. Not when she was outraged at him.

“Stannis left the Wall according to your brother. But I don’t think he left with his fleet. It is still anchored at the port of Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. Stannis knows he doesn’t have enough forces to take back the advantage in the south. He doesn’t have enough men to take King’s Landing, or the Vale, or Storm’s End. But there’s a kingdom that is weak right now, where he might find allies, and very close to Castleblack.”

Realization came to Sansa’s face immediately. “The North. He wants to take the North.”

Tyrion nodded. “The Boltons are hated for their betrayal to your family, and many northern lords will be more than happy to see Stannis mount Roose Bolton’s head on a spike, and his son’s head next to his. This is the best target, and probably the only one Stannis has a real chance to take.”

“Do you think he could succeed? That he could defeat the Boltons?” There was hope in Sansa’s words, and in her eyes too.

“I think Stannis could. He’s a brilliant battle commander. No one can take that from him. Without my father’s arrival, he would have defeated me at Blackwater. But for many Northerners, Stannis is probably just another southern king who wants to impose his law on them. He may not get many allies in his war against the Boltons. But no matter who is defeated and who wins, I guess we’ll have one enemy less to care about.”
A silence followed. “I hope Stannis will kill the Boltons.” She looked at Tyrion with something like regret, but also with determination. “I’m sorry, but that’s what I want.”

“I wouldn’t mind to see all the Boltons dead. Between Roose Bolton and his mad son, I think the world would be much better without both of them. But if Stannis takes Winterfell, I hope he won’t burn the godswood like he did at Storm’s End.” Fear flashed through Sansa’s face for a time. The idea to see Stannis rule the North probably didn’t look so enticing all of a sudden. “Anyway, I can’t send an army of Lannister soldiers at the Wall claiming they’re here to defend the Realm and not for the war. Stannis will attack them, and since the castles along the Wall aren’t very fortified, the army would be easily defeated. We would have sent men for nothing. Stannis’s ships at Eastwatch won’t let them pass. But they will let prisoners and food pass. I’m sure of that.”

Sansa sighed. “We should do more.”

“I wish we could, my dear. For now, I fear we’re confined to this castle.”

“At least, we have no reason to be bored.” She smiled at him and Tyrion understood the second meaning.

They spoke about many other things, including Joy’s betrothal to Rollam Westerling and the marriage between Bronn and Daisy, but Tyrion’s mind wasn’t entirely there. The images he saw this afternoon went back from time to time and turned his mood dark. The subject of Bronn’s marriage brought it back to the surface. Sansa noticed it after some time and asked if there was anything wrong with him.

“T’m alright, Sansa. Don’t worry.”

Sansa didn’t seem convinced by his words. She put her hand on his. “Tell me what’s going on.” Her eyes were a mix of command and worry.

“That’s nothing, Sansa. I just… I discussed with Bronn about his marriage today, and it brought me back memories of my first marriage. Memories I don’t like.” The last sentence was said with a very low voice. Sansa looked at the floor. Tyrion took his hand out of hers. “It’s alright, Sansa. It will pass. I just need some time.”

They managed to restart a conversation later around desserts, and Tyrion nearly managed to forget about Tysha. He read for an hour after dinner while Sansa made some embroidery. She left for their bedchamber before him. He went to join her not long after. She wore a lighter nightgown than she did the previous nights. When he climbed into their bed, she kissed him and very soon nothing mattered but her.

Some time later, Sansa was asleep, her belly resting on the mattress, sheets covering her back up to her breasts. Her face was turned towards Tyrion, a thin smile crossing it. There were times Tyrion wondered if all this wasn’t only a dream. He was afraid of the time this dream could end. Sansa meant so much for him. He couldn’t imagine his life without her. He didn’t know what he would without her. He remembered his uncle Gerion told him that when his mother died, the best part of his father died with her. Would the same thing happen to him if Sansa was to die? Words of Kevan came back to his mind. You once told me you weren’t your father, Tyrion. It’s true, you’re not Tywin. But now I realize that of all his children, you’re the one who looks the most like him.

Was he really like his father? Or was he really the one who looked the most like him? Tywin Lannister had always hated his second son. How could the son he hated above all be the one who looked like him? Tyrion remembered Tysha again, when he raped her. He did it on his father’s orders, but he did it all the same. He was the one to do it. He took his hand off his wife’s back. He didn’t deserve this, not after what he did. Everything he did for Sansa couldn’t erase the wrongs he made to Tysha. She was his wife, and he raped her. He swore to protect her, and he let his father have her raped by his guards. If his father had lived, if he didn’t die on this night in King’s Landing, would Tyrion have respected his promise to protect Sansa? Or would he have obeyed his father in the end? What would he have been ready to do to not consummate his marriage without Sansa’s consent? Would he have been ready to kill his father? Would he have dared to become a kinslayer to protect his wife? A child from a family who was in war with his own? Sansa said she loved him. Did he deserve this love? In this moment, Tyrion felt he didn’t. If things had gone differently, he could have raped the young woman he slept with. Tears began to roll from his eyes as Tyrion fell asleep, the peaceful face of his wife turned toward his own scarred face.

He was riding on a road near Lannisport. It was the end of a beautiful day of summer. Although he was close to home, Tyrion felt the need to stop somewhere to eat and rest. He caught sight of an inn not far away and stopped there. He was hungry, and tired. Tyrion paid the innkeeper enough silver to have three chickens and a flagon of wine. Once he was done with the food and the wine, Tyrion was guided to a chamber where he could rest. When he entered the chamber, Tyrion realized something was wrong. He knew this place. He slept in this room, in that very bed, a long time ago. With someone else.

“You remember?” The voice came from behind. Tyrion didn’t turn to face the woman to who it belonged. “That’s where we did it. That’s where you made me a woman.”

Tyrion stared at the bed before him. Images of the past flowed through his mind. Images of a girl with black hair. He felt her approaching him in his back. He wouldn’t look at her. He couldn’t.

“I cried when you went into me the first time. I never felt so much pain. But after I was happy.”

Tyrion nodded faintly. “You kissed me. You sang me a song.” A silence weighed the atmosphere in the room. “I shouldn’t have done it. What I have done… I should have disobeyed. I should have protected you.” You were a whore, but I was your husband. I married you. I swore to protect you, and instead I raped you. I should have opposed my father. At least I should have refused to take you last. Like I refused with Sansa.

He felt a hand resting on his shoulder in a calming gesture. “It’s done.” Yes, it was done. There was nothing Tyrion could change to what he did.

“I should have done something against my father. I should have stopped him from doing what he did to you. I was supposed to defend you. Even if you were a whore.”

Tyrion heard Tysha sigh behind him. “Even if I was a whore. Even if I was.”

Tyrion moved forward to escape the hand on his shoulder. “That’s who you were. Jaime hired you for me. He even paid you double since you were a maiden.”

A silence followed before the young woman replied. “Perhaps he could have done something for me then. And for you. He hired me for you. He should have made sure I wasn’t mistreated.”

Tyrion dismissed the suggestion immediately. “He couldn’t know that I would fall in love with you. He couldn’t know that I would marry you. He couldn’t know what our father would do next.”

Another silence followed before an angry voice answered Tyrion’s statements. “He should have known. You should know better, Tyrion.” Footsteps on the floor indicated Tysha had left the room. After a moment, Tyrion sat on the edge of the bed. The bed where he deflowered the woman who would become his first wife. And he wept.
Tyrion woke up with tears flowing silently on his cheeks. Sansa was still sleeping peacefully in the same position next to him. She was beautiful. Tyrion closed his eyes. He lost Tysha. He lost Shae. If he ever lost Sansa, he didn’t know what he would become.

Chapter End Notes

OK, the end is a bit gloomy, I admit it. Especially when we compare it to the chapter that came right before. But there is a reason why it ends this way and why Tysha appears again at the moment when the relationship between Tyrion and Sansa is really blooming. Also, there is a very happy chapter coming for another character.

By the way, I recently ran into a very good video on Tyrion. I don't understand why less than a hundred people watched it yet. Here's the link: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tyH_Bo4PHhU

Please review

Next chapter: someone we haven't seen for a very long time
Cersei IV

Chapter Notes

OK, not the chapter I loved to write the most, but I thought it would be good to know how was Cersei in the meantime. I tried to make it some sort of funny chapter with humor, though Cersei is far from being a funny character.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

CERSEI IV

“There wouldn’t be sunflowers. I don’t like yellow. But roses are very nice. There would definitely be roses. And many other flowers. I don’t know all their names, but they would be there. I would have music too. I adore music. But without flutes. I hate flutes. A harp maybe, but no flutes. Perhaps bells too. And the food. That would be the most important thing. And the guests too. Guests are even more important.”

Cersei had to refrain to not hit Lollys Stokeworth in the face. She had been babbling about how she would make her marriage for months now. It was always the same stupid comments about flowers, food, music, dance and guests. She ignored the second daughter of Lady Tanda Stokeworth, focusing on the flowers of the garden she knew only too well now. For six months now she had wandered in this garden every day, not knowing what else to do. It was so small that she knew every corner by heart now. And she had to support the company of a Stokeworth almost half the time she came here. Today it was Lollys who came to tell her again how she would imagine her marriage. Only a sellsword or a dwarf would accept to marry you, and only if he was given enough gold. Cersei wondered for a moment why her father didn’t marry the Imp to Lollys instead of Sansa. How much trouble would they have avoided then?

“Isn’t it what you ate in the capital?”

Lolly’s question came from nowhere. Cersei turned to face her. “You were saying?” She had no intention to show any interest to Lollys Stokeworth. She couldn’t send her away, but nothing obliged her to listen to her incessant jabber.

“About the pigeon pies. Isn’t it what they eat in King’s Landing for weddings?” The ugly woman didn’t seem aware of Cersei’s indifference.

“Yes.” Cersei said nothing more.

“Then we should have some. And many other things they eat for weddings.”

Cersei had to support a long monologue from Lollys she tried to not hear before she could excuse herself and go back to her rooms. The ill-favoured maid talked about the wedding she could have had again and again ever since her betrothal with the Imp’s sellsword was called off. Cersei regretted she didn’t marry the ugly thing to the mercenary. She would be away in the Westerlands right now, and Cersei’s wretched brother would be the one to suffer Lollys Stokeworth. But a Lannister always pays her debts. Bronn helped Tyrion to escape the judgement he deserved, and Cersei wouldn’t give anything to the sellsword in retaliation.

She was accompanied by two guards on her way back to her rooms. Kevan gave them to her along with fifty others to officially ensure her protection here, and to prevent her from leaving the castle officiously. Cersei had already tried to convince them to let her go back to King’s Landing to visit her son, or to let her wander through the castle and its surroundings without them on her trails, but all her attempts had failed. They were her uncle’s men, and didn’t obey or listen to her orders.

All this unnerved Cersei and made her angry more than she could show. These men should be hers by right, and follow her orders. She was their legitimate lady, the only true Lady of Casterly Rock, and yet they kept her prisoner here among fools. While Cersei was stuck here, the little monster occupied the castle and the golden throne of the father he killed. Cersei would have him killed one day. And the Tyrell bitch as well. And Sansa too.

Cersei couldn’t understand how she had been blind enough to not see Sansa’s real nature. She was a traitor from a family of traitors, and yet Cersei mentored her and advised her in the hope she would make a fine queen one day. And to reward Cersei of her help, she turned against her, spread lies about her and took the title that was hers. It made Cersei sick to think that Sansa Stark was now acting as Lady of Casterly Rock at Tyrion’s side when both had no right upon it. She would have them all killed.

She should have dealt with all of them long ago. Tyrion, Sansa, Margaery. She was sure now that the three of them were part of an alliance to bring her down and seize the power for themselves. They killed her father with poison and forged a false will where he gave Casterly Rock to Tyrion and Sansa. Without Tywin Lannister, Margaery surely thought she could have Joffrey for her alone while Tyrion and Sansa would get Casterly Rock. The three of them had something to gain from it. Sansa could get her revenge for her family by the same way.

Only, they hadn’t expected Cersei to elude their plan by arresting Tyrion. But the dwarf managed to convince Jaime to talk to Joffrey and to call their uncle. Kevan, stupid like he was, believed Tyrion over her. Despite this, the trial should have proved the guilt of Tyrion and Sansa, but that was when Cersei made her mistake. She didn’t consider that Margaery could turn people against her and convince Kevan that Tyrion was innocent. Even more unexpected was the way Margaery used Sansa at her own advantage. She and the little dove spent so much time together. Perhaps that was when Sansa changed. Margaery perverted her. In normal circumstances, the trial would have ended with Tyrion being executed. Cersei would have received Casterly Rock since it was hers by right, Sansa would have been married off to someone else, perhaps some of Cersei’s cousin, and Margaery would have found herself alone.

Instead, Cersei was stripped of her powers and dignity, imprisoned in her own chambers, deprived of her right to see her children, and sent away to some insignificant castle. She was even forbidden to ever come back in the Westerlands as long as her little brother would rule from Casterly Rock, but it hadn’t been enough for these three schemers. Sansa wanted more revenge, Margaery wanted a more pliable husband, and Tyrion… She guessed the two whores probably convinced him after a few nights with both of them. She had no difficulty to imagine Margaery licking her brother’s little cock to get what she wanted from him. And since Margaery had a lot of influence on Sansa, the traitorous wolf probably did it too. Anyway, Tyrion hated Joffrey and wanted him dead. Cersei understood the day he decided to send him on the battlements for the Battle of Blackwater. He wanted her son to die. And the three had what they wanted. They poisoned Joffrey, just like they poisoned her father. Joffrey wouldn’t have let Margaery control him in time. She wanted a husband she could manipulate in every circumstance, and Cersei’s sweet and weak Tommen was more than ideal for this.

The valonqar. The whore of Highgarden. The wolf bitch. They would all die. Cersei kept her anger hidden before the Stokeworths, but one day she would get her revenge. She would destroy them and give them justice for what they did. She would free her family and her children from the control of these three plotters. In the meantime, she had to stay here, doing nothing. With hope, the Stokeworths could prove to be allies. If she could put them on her side, she would be able to use them when time would come to take back what was hers. They were already more than happy to have her as their guest. She could turn it to her advantage. But for now, she wanted to go back to the tranquility and the solitude of her rooms. She wouldn’t be able to support the Stokeworths more than for dinner. If she saw one of them again before or after…

They arrived before her door and there, one of the two men guarding it stepped forward to stop her. He wouldn’t dare if I was still the queen and the Lady of Casterly Rock.

“Your Grace.” He bowed lightly before her.

“Stand aside and let me enter.” Cersei had no time to lose with her uncle’s men.

“Your Grace,” the guard resumed without flinching, “your brother is here.”

Cersei’s heart stopped. My brother is here. Which one? I have only one real brother. It has to be him.

“Ser Jaime arrived while you were in the gardens. He is waiting for you in your chambers.” The guard added it before her lack of reaction.

Cersei pushed the man aside and burst into her rooms. Here he was, sitting in a chair, his right arm with a golden hand resting on the arm of the chair, his left arm on his thigh. He raised his head when she entered. His hair was still cut short like the last time she saw him. He wore his armor and the white cloak of the Kingsguard. When the door closed behind Cersei, he stood up and walked slowly to her.

“Cersei.” She didn’t see the usual lust and hunger in his eyes when they were alone. Instead his expression seemed to show something like pain. But to Cersei it didn’t matter.

She ran to him and pulled him into an embrace. He was there, her twin brother, her lover, the father of her children, the man she came with into the world, her other half. Her face was buried into his shoulder. He didn’t react first, but after some time he put his left arm around her shoulders.

“Jaime. Oh, Jaime. My love.”

She kissed the man she loved passionately. How much time since they did it for the last time? She didn’t care. She wanted him. Now. Jaime tried to resist, arguing they could be surprised, but she shut him up with her tongue in his mouth. She knew he couldn’t resist, no more than she could resist. They were made for each other. They needed each other. They weren’t full as long as they weren’t together. After some resistance, her lover finally gave up and started to rip her clothes apart. She removed his armor and soon they were joining. It was a blur of pleasure and completeness she didn’t feel for so long, something she needed more than she realized until this very moment when she saw her twin brother. They ended up sweating against each other on the floor, Jaime under her. She was the one in control.

“We shouldn’t have done this,” Jaime said when they were done. “Someone could see us. There are guards outside the door.”

Jaime got up to put on his clothes and armor again, not leaving Cersei any time to stop him and to resume their joining. Cersei saw her clothes torn apart on the floor. She wouldn’t be able to wear them again. She went to another room to put on another gown. When she came back, Jaime had barely managed to put on half of his clothes, not to mention his armor still laid on the floor. Cersei had to help, enjoying all the parts of his body she touched. She felt him tense wherever she touched him. When he was finally entirely clad into his clothes and armor, they sat and Cersei called a handmaiden to pour them some wine.

“It’s been such a long time,” Cersei began. “I barely received news from you or anyone else.”

“I’m sorry. Everyone is very busy. Tommen is learning to be king, we must deal with fanatics who invaded the streets of the city, the Redwynes are still fighting on Dragonstone…”

“I understand.” The handmaiden left the room at this moment. “Learning to be king is more important for my son than worrying about the well-being of his mother, and fanatics are a more pressing matter than your sister.”

Jaime stared at her for a moment after her reproach, then sighed. “Tommen doesn’t have to worry about your well-being. The Stokeworths are loyal to the Crown, and from what I’ve seen you’re treated with more than respect.”

“Respect?” Cersei nearly spit. “I have to endure fools and halfwits from morning to evening. My eldest son is dead, Myrcella was sold like livestock, Tommen is in the hands of some whore from Highgarden, and a wolf bitch has taken the place of Lady of Casterly Rock that should be mine.”

“I didn’t come here to listen to your complaints about the supposed injustice you are victim, sweet sister. I came here to give you news about your children.”

Jaime’s abrupt reply left her frozen for a time, but she recovered quickly. That would be no use to argue with Jaime. He was a fool, just like the Stokeworths.

“How is Tommen?” If Jaime was there to give her news about her children, then all the better if he gave them immediately. Cersei would know quicker how her children were and Jaime would leave sooner.

“He’s alright. He spends most of his days with Kevan learning what it is to be king, and with the queen too.”

Anger rose in Cersei. “The queen? So that’s how you call this little bitch who murdered our son?”

Jaime dropped his arms. “Margaery didn’t kill Joffrey. Ser Meryn did this. And if you didn’t tell him to do everything to protect Joffrey from the rose, your son might still be alive.”

Cersei should never have trusted Ser Meryn and Ser Boros with Joffrey’s protection. She should have named more competent people in the Kingsguard. “How does it come Tommen sent me no raven? No message? No letter? Why didn’t he visit me?”

“As I told you, he’s very occupied.” Cersei smashed her cup of wine on the table. Some of the content spilled from the goblet.

“It’s Margaery, isn’t it? She’s the one who keeps him away from me?”

“He just got married, Cersei. Don’t you find it normal that he wants to spend some time with his wife.”

“You’re really a fool, Jaime. Can’t you see it? She’s stealing our son away from us.” Cersei was screaming.
“Not so loud.”

“Not so loud? Our baby boy is being taken away from us and you’re worried I’m speaking too loudly?”

“People can’t know he’s our son.” Jaime’s voice was barely more than a whisper.

“Then don’t call him your son. You’ve never been a father to him.”

“If I was a father to any of my children, they’d be dead.”

“And what has your caution brought?” Cersei asked. “Our eldest child murdered during his wedding night. Our only daughter shipped off to Dorne. Our baby boy married to a smirking whore from Highgarden.”

Jaime didn’t seem to know what to answer. Cersei took her cup and drank, savoring that little victory. It had been so long since the last time she won against someone. She had nearly forgotten how good it tasted.

Jaime looked around for a minute, then he rose from his chair and finally looked at her. “I didn’t come here to bring you news from Tommen, but I talked to him before I left King’s Landing, to know if he had any message for you. He says he misses you, and that he’ll come to visit you as soon as he can. He doesn’t know when.”

This brought some relief to Cersei. Her last son wasn’t lost yet. Margaery hadn’t taken control of him entirely. He wasn’t strong like Joffrey, but he was still her son. He had some force within him.

“But as I said, I didn’t come here to talk about Tommen. I came here because of Myrcella.”

Jaime’s words struck her. Myrcella. That was even longer since the last time she saw her. How old was she now? Surely she became a very beautiful young woman now.

“What of her?” Cersei asked, eager to know about her only daughter.

“We received a message from Dorne. Or to be more precise, a threat.”

Cersei’s breathing stopped. “A threat?”

“A box with Myrcella’s necklace in the mouth of a viper. There was no note with it. We don’t know who sent it, only that it came from Dorne. Kevan doesn’t believe Doran Martell is behind it.”

The necklace of her daughter in the mouth of a viper? Cersei’s breath quickened suddenly. First she panicked. Her daughter was in danger. Her beautiful and sweet daughter. Soon distress was replaced by anger. “If they ever dare to touch her, I will burn their cities to the ground! What did Kevan do?”

Jaime looked at the floor. “Nothing. He sent back the necklace with a message to tell Prince Doran that anything done against her would endanger our alliance with Dorne.”

Cersei would have ripped her uncle’s heart if he had been there. She rose from her seat. “My daughter is in danger in Dorne and all he finds to do is to remember to Doran Martell of our alliance? He’s weak! Father was wrong to keep him as an advisor.”

“Cersei, there is nothing we can do. I just wanted you to know.”

Cersei stared at her brother with all the fury she could gather. “So, that’s all? You’re going to remain idle while our daughter is in danger? While she could be killed anytime?”
“Doran Martell won’t kill her. He’s too cautious. He will do everything to ensure her safety. We’re talking about a man with the gout, stuck to a chair, who did nothing when his sister and her children were butchered. He’s not the Red Viper. Oberyn is dead. The threat probably came from someone else in Dorne. Doran Martell won’t let Myrcella being hurt after the message Kevan sent.”

“You trust a Martell? They loathe us. They would kill us all if they could.”

Jaime’s face turned angry now. “You told me the same thing about Tyrion not long ago. And look at our situation now. Look at your situation.” He took a step toward her. “You tried to kill my brother. Our brother. You fucked our cousin.” He shook his head. “I should never have come.”

Jaime walked away, leaving her there like this, and opened the door. “Farewell, your Grace.” He left the door without another look behind.

Cersei collapsed in her chair. Her little daughter, her good and sweet Myrcella, was in danger. The Martells wanted to kill her, and there was nothing she could do about it. She cried. Gold will be their crowns. Gold their shrouds. The prophecy was coming true. And there was nothing she could do to stop it from coming true. She was powerless. For the first time in her life, she had no power. Her daughter was in danger, and all that was Tyrion’s fault. He sent her to Dorne. He had Gregor Clegane kill Oberyn Martell. He wanted Myrcella to be killed, just like he wanted to kill Joffrey before.

Her handmaidens entered to prepare her for the dinner. Cersei would have to sit through a whole meal with the Stokeworths like she had to twice a week. She dried her tears and prepared. The dinner was boring, but less than it was in normal circumstances. Cersei didn’t care about the discussion around her, her mind entirely set upon Myrcella. Jaime wasn’t there. Lady Falyse said he left not long after he visited Cersei, saying he had urgent matters awaiting him in King’s Landing. Her poor daughter could die any moment, and no one did anything to save her. Jaime and Kevan had no intention to do something about it, and Tyrion surely plotted to make sure Myrcella would die. She had to do something for her little girl. She was the only who was ready to save her.

“What do you think of it, your Grace?”

Lady Tanda Stokeworth was addressing her. Cersei was in no mood to talk. “Think of what?” She didn’t try to hide she wasn’t listening.

“About the tourney at Lannisport. About the fact a woman won it.”

That caught Cersei’s attention. “A tourney in Lannisport? Won by a woman?”

“Yes, your Grace,” Lady Falyse confirmed. “Ser Jaime told us. There was a tourney there about a month ago, organized for the name day of the Lady of Casterly Rock.”

To hear that her wretched brother organized a tourney for Sansa brought more anger to Cersei. As much anger that it brought to hear the little girl being called the Lady of the Rock, Cersei’s title.

“Ser Jaime said the tourney’s champion was a woman,” Ser Balman Byrch, Falyse’s husband, confirmed. “What was her name?”

“Brienne,” Tanda Stokeworth said. “I remember she was there at the royal wedding. I think she is the daughter of some lord in the Stormlands.” Jaime talked about this woman? That was curious. “Such a shame. To believe that Lollys could be the Lady of Casterly Rock if I convinced Lord Tyrion to marry her when he was Hand of the King. What a great lady Lollys would have made.”

Lollys Stokeworth seemed lost in her thoughts and to not hear what her mother just said. Cersei glared at this ugly woman. She didn’t know what made her the sicker. The idea of Lollies Stokeworth as Lady of Casterly Rock, or the knowledge that Sansa Stark was the lady of the home where Cersei grew up. Balman Byrch was boasting how he would have been more than pleased to participate in the tourney if he had known about it. He believed he would surely have won it. The knights there were probably poor jousters since a woman defeated them all.

“Well, anyway, now it’s too late,” Ser Balman threw. “And for Lollys too. She could have had a chance before, but now it’s impossible to end the marriage between Lord Tyrion and Lady Sansa. If Ser Jaime is right, Lady Sansa is no longer a maiden. That’s what his brother told him in his last message.”

Cersei excused herself when the main service was over. She went back to her chambers. She would make them all pay. Jaime. Kevan. Tyrion. Sansa. Margaery. Brienne. All their allies. She would get back Casterly Rock. She would save her children. She would rule the Seven Kingdoms like she should always have, and people would remember her for centuries afterwards, while her enemies would disappear in the shadows. No one would take another of her children away from her. She would protect them like she always did. They would have golden crowns, but no shroud. No queen would cast her down. She would have Margaery’s head. And she would have the valonqar’s head before he could even try to kill her.

With satisfaction, Cersei thought that Sansa may regret to have fought to save her dwarf husband. What horrible things could the girl be going through now that Tyrion put her into his bed? Surely Sansa already suffered much more than Cersei suffered in sixteen years between Robert’s hands. I will let her suffer. Then I will kill her before Tyrion’s eyes. And I will make him suffer, just like I will make Margaery suffer. They will all suffer before I take their heads and plant it on spikes. Cersei Lannister would come back to King’s Landing. And when she would come back, she would have her revenge.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Mira (one of the chapters I loved to write the most up to now)
“You’ll be more beautiful than you’ve ever been. I can’t wait to see how Ser Gerold will react when he’ll see you walking in his direction.”

Sera didn’t stop to talk ever since she started to help Mira getting prepared. Mira on her side stood silent as Sera helped her to put on her gown and arranged her hair. Mira wore a white gown with black regions where was the girdle, on her shoulders and on the sides of her tummy and her chest. The gown was quite lightweight and remembered her of the one Queen Margaery wore at her own wedding, though this one was less richly decorated and displayed much less her body. Her back was entirely covered, but she had a generous triangular neckline that plunged deeply. Mira was used to gowns lighter than the ones she wore in the North after her years in the south, but she didn’t feel quite comfortable with this neckline. She had the impression to be naked from time to time. There were silver lines that followed the neckline and the hem. She also wore a silver necklace that her betrothed gave her this morning through his sister during the breakfast. The gown outlined her thin figure very well. As for her hair, flowers held a few braids that would fall on her shoulders and her sides in normal times to only let a trail of smooth black hair fall on her back. Sera was completing the arrangement of her hair as Mira stood still.

They had arrived at Hightower only two weeks ago. Mira had been restless during the last days of their travel. Before that, their journey had been eventless and without problems. Mira and Sera both enjoyed to see the Reach again. They even stayed at Highgarden for two days when they passed by it. Lady Olenna was sharp as always, though Mira felt some coldness toward her. However, Lady Alerie Tyrell proved to be quite welcoming toward them, especially for Mira. She gave her more attention than she ever gave her. Mira had the occasion to learn for this occasion that Lady Alerie had participated to the arrangement of her betrothal with Ser Gerold Hightower. Mira supposed she shouldn’t have been surprised since Lady Alerie was born a Hightower, and that she was the daughter of Lord Leyton. She talked a lot with Mira about Oldtown and her family during their stay, and she kept talking about it on their way to Oldtown since she decided to accompany them at the last minute. Mira gave some news about Margaery in return and Lady Tyrell spoke with her and Sera for most of the journey.

The last days had been more difficult for Mira. She didn’t know what to expect from her future husband. Lady Alerie only gave her general comments about her nephew. She didn’t seem to know him well. Mira had managed to keep a calm behavior in Sera’s presence, but she was afraid all the same. Finally, they had arrived at Oldtown.
Mira had read the Wonders made by man Rodrik sent her long ago. The Hightower, the seat of House Hightower, was among them. It was the highest structure made by man in all the Seven Kingdoms, even higher than the Wall. Some people even said it was possible to see the Wall from the top of the tower, but descriptions in books were nothing when you saw it with your own eyes. The Hightower dominated the city of Oldtown in its center, a great beacon at the top to guide ships into its ports. Mira never saw something so high. It cast a shadow on a great part of the city. That would be her new home soon.

They travelled through the cobbled streets of Oldtown in the carriage. To the opposite of King’s Landing, Oldtown was very well organized. Roads and streets were paved and the wheels didn’t get stuck in the mud like it often happened in the capital. Most of the buildings were made of stone, and there was no stench. This place was so different from King’s Landing. It was also very different from Ironrath. Mira would never be able to feel alone here. She didn’t find this thought very comforting.

Lady Alerie told her about the best places to visit in the city and promised to show Mira everything in time. After a long perambulation through alleys, streets and avenues, all of them paved, they arrived at wharves. Mira could see very well the Hightower on Battle Island right before them. No one could miss it.

“This is one of the many anchorages where we can take safe passage to the island,” Margaery’s mother explained. “It seems there is already a ship waiting for us.”

Mira looked through the window of their carriage and saw it was true. A boat was waiting for them with the sigil of House Hightower on its sail. When their carriage with its guard stopped, Lady Alerie Tyrell was the first one to leave it since she was the highest ranking lady of them all. Mira followed and Sera was last. Lady Tyrell walked in the direction of the men waiting for them. They were five, one standing before them, crossed arms, with the sigil of the Hightowers on his breastplate. Mira would say he was in the fifties. His serious face turned to smile when Lady Alerie walked to him and hugged him tightly.

“Baelor!”

“Glad to see you again, little sister.”

Mira realized she was before the heir to Hightower, the father of her betrothed. He would be her father too very soon. Mira remained behind as the sister and the brother talked about their families and how they were. After a minute, Lady Tyrell turned to her and Ser Baelor’s gaze followed her movement. The queen’s mother went to Mira and took her by the arm, leading her before the heir to Hightower.

“Baelor, I present you Lady Mira Forrester, the handmaiden and a great friend of my daughter the queen. Lady Mira, this is my eldest brother, Ser Baelor Hightower. He is the father of the man you’re going to marry.”

Ser Baelor was still smiling. Mira stepped forward and curtsied before the man. “Ser Baelor.”

“Lady Mira. This is a pleasure to finally meet you. My sister and her daughter spoke highly of you. I can see what they said about your beauty wasn’t exaggerated. My son Gerold is more than eager to meet you.”

“You’re very kind, ser. I can’t wait to meet your son.”

“Then let’s not lose one more moment. The ship is waiting for us. Follow me.”
They embarked on the ship and sailed for the island. Ser Baelor and Lady Alerie spoke to her all the way, telling her how kind, gentle, brave, handsome, comely and of good company Ser Gerold Hightower was. Mira tried to listen, but it was difficult with the Hightower growing before her. The Red Keep was nothing when compared to it. The ship floated easily to the island and berthed on wharves very similar to those they just left. Baelor Hightower helped all the ladies, Lady Alerie, Mira, and even Sera, to get out of the ship, reaching out for them with his arm.

They followed smooth pathways along the battlements that led to the entrance of the tower. Many people of various ages were waiting for them here, but the one who caught her attention was an old man sitting in a sumptuous chair at the top of the few steps that led to the great doors of Hightower. Mira would say he was about the same age than Lady Olenna. He rose from his seat with the help of a cane as they approached and Lady Tyrell went to her father to kiss him on the two cheeks.

“Alerie. How good to see you again. It’s been years now.”

“Yes, Father. And it seems I will assist to another marriage very soon after the two of my daughter.”

Lord Leyton went to look at the people behind his daughter. His eldest son stepped forward. “Father, I present you Lady Mira Forrester.”

Mira stepped forward too and curtsied. “My lord.”

She saw from the corner of her eyes Lord Leyton walking quietly to her with his cane. “Look at me, child.” Mira brought up her face and looked at the old lord’s eyes. He seemed to examine her. After a moment, he smiled. “I guess my granddaughter the queen chooses well her handmaidens. Welcome to Hightower, Lady Mira. I hope you’ll enjoy life here.”

“Up to now, I don’t know how I couldn’t.”

The comment she made brought a little laugh to Lord Leyton. In the meantime, Ser Baelor had climbed the steps and came with a young man with short brown hair who had to be around Mira’s age. He had blue eyes and a long face. He wasn’t excessively handsome, but he wasn’t without charm either.

“Lady Mira,” Ser Baelor began, “I present you my son, Gerold.”

So here was the man she would marry. Mira had curtsied before him and he had awkwardly bowed in response after a moment. He was staring at Mira with an open mouth. It was quite unsettling for Mira and she didn’t know what to think of it. The presentations hadn’t lasted very long since Lord Leyton asked quite quickly afterwards to Lady Elys, the only daughter of Ser Baelor, to accompany Mira to her rooms.

In the days that followed, Mira mostly spent her time with Sera and Elys Hightower. The only daughter of the heir to House Hightower just celebrated her seventeenth name day, so she had the same age than Mira. She had a very sharp tongue and told her opinion about everything. Mira thought she was testing her to see how she would react to her remarks, but Mira knew how to keep calm in every situation, and Lady Elys seemed frustrated to not be able to have Mira react to her misplaced words. However, she enjoyed Mira’s well placed replies to her declarations. Mira also met Lady Rhonda Rowan, Ser Baelor’s wife, and his two other sons, Altos and Garlan.

However, in the two weeks before the wedding, Mira seldom spoke with her betrothed. Gerold Hightower didn’t seem eager to spend time with her. They had one conversation two days after her arrival as they walked together in the gardens of Hightower. He had mostly complimented her on her beauty and asked her a few questions about her time as Margaery’s handmaiden, but he hadn’t looked as if he wanted to speak with her. He kept looking at her with a fascination Mira hadn’t been able to decipher. A few times, she caught him looking at her while she spent time with Sera or Elys, but he went away when he realized she had seen him.

Mira didn’t really know what to think of her soon to be husband. He looked like a respectable knight, but Mira didn’t know much about him. The little she knew about Ser Gerold Hightower, she learned it through her discussions with his parents, his sister and her brothers. Mostly, she knew he was a good man, but nothing more. She hoped to learn more about him through their marriage, but before that, there was the wedding.

Mira was somewhat both excited and terrified at the prospect of getting married today. The Hightowers seemed like good people from what she saw up to now. Their castle was very huge, comfortable and had many interesting things to appreciate, and she knew she would appreciate much more to become a Hightower than a Whitehill. However, there was a great bitter taste in her mouth.
After this night, her family name would disappear to live only in history books. She would be the last Forrester of all time, but she had no choice. She knew a long time ago she would have to marry one day or another. What saddened her more than anything else was that her family wouldn’t be there.
Her mother sent her south so she may learn the ways of the Seven Kingdoms below Moat Cailin and eventually marry a southern lord. House Branfield, her mother’s house, was entirely destroyed at the end of Robert’s Rebellion because they fought for the Targaryens, safe for her mother and her uncle Malcolm, but her mother still had connections in the south and managed to find her a place in Highgarden when Mira was still thirteen.

The dream of her mother had become reality. Mira would marry a knight from the south, but her mother wouldn’t be there to see it. Nor her father. Nor anyone of her family. They were all gone. If only Margaery had been present, but as queen, she had to remain in King’s Landing with the king.
At least Sera was here, but Mira would have been happier of her presence if she was still betrothed to Lord Tarwick. Sera looked happy for her, and Mira believed her friend when she said she was happy, but Mira knew Sera also hid some bitterness since Mira was getting married while she remained unwed. Mira wished her marriage took place under better circumstances.

“Here we are. You’re ready.” Sera had completed the arrangement of her hair.

Mira left her seat to look at her reflection in the glass she had. Her black and white wedding gown couldn’t have been more suited. These were the colors of her family’s sigil. At the same time, the white symbolized her virginity while the black showed she was still mourning the loss of her family.
Without the plunging neckline, Mira would have found her gown perfect. Her hair were also very well arranged. Sera did a very good job. Margaery would have liked it.

Mira caught Sera’s reflection behind her in the glass. She was smiling, though some regret showed through it. “I’m sorry you’re not to the one getting married, Sera.”

Sera’s smile faded. “Please, Mira. It’s your wedding. You should enjoy it. Don’t ruin it because you pity me. There’s nothing both of us can do about it.”

Mira turned to face her friend and smiled empathically at her. “Alright. But I only accept to enjoy my wedding if you enjoy it.”

Sera chuckled weakly. “How couldn’t I? My best friend is getting married. You can count on me.”
After a moment, Sera threw her arms around Mira’s shoulders and hugged her tightly. Mira returned the hug after she recovered her breath. “I’m so happy for you, Mira. So happy.”

“Thank you, Sera. But unless you want to ruin the hair you just arranged, I would suggest you to back away.”
Sera pulled away immediately. “Oh no. I hope I haven’t undone anything.”

Sera Durwell went immediately to examine Mira’s hair on all sides and from every possible angles. Mira wanted to laugh at her friend, but she kept it inside and simply smiled. Sera didn’t notice the smile, occupied like she was to check her hair. Sera worked so long on them and thought for such a long time about the way to braid and brush Mira’s hair for the wedding that it became an obsession these last days. The only thought that Mira’s hair could be ruined caused her to panic. It was funny in some way to see Sera more preoccupied by the bride’s hair than the actual bride. Sera finally stopped to turn around her and sighed in relief.

“Everything is alright. Everyone will envy you.”

Mira sniggered. “I doubt it. I’m not Margaery.”

Mira’s handmaiden chose this moment to enter her room. The Hightowers assigned her to Mira’s service after she arrived, even though Sera almost acted as her handmaiden. However, Sera was officially only a friend who came for the wedding and had no official position, and Mira didn’t want to consider her as her handmaiden after they spent so much time together in Margaery’s service. It wouldn’t be fair for Sera. She had her own chamber, though much smaller than Mira, and spent most of her days with her, and liked to help Mira prepare for each day. For the wedding day, she had insisted to be the only one to help Mira prepare. As for Mira, a friend helped her to get ready, not a servant.

“Lady Mira,” the girl said, “Ser Gerold would like to speak with you for a moment. Alone if that’s possible.”

Mira looked at Sera who nodded to mean she didn’t object. “Of course. Please leave us, Sera.”

“The wedding will start very soon. I’ll be waiting for you at the litter,” Sera said as she left.

As soon as she was gone through the door, Ser Gerold Hightower came in and closed the door behind him. He wore a costly grey doublet with some red on the arms for the occasion. He just remained here, looking at her with the same expression he had the day they met. Mira had the impression his eyes lingered on the neckline of her gown. A few minutes passed before he spoke.

“Lady Mira, let me tell you… You’re beautiful.”

Mira answered while smiling. “Thank you, ser.”

“Please, call me Gerold. We are going to be wed very soon after all.”

“Please forgive me. Thank you, Gerold.”

“There’s… there’s nothing to forgive, my lady.”

“If you want me to call you by your name, then you should do the same with me,” Mira pointed. Her betrothed chuckled and lowered his head for a moment.

“Yes, you’re right. Forgive me, Mira.”

“There’s nothing to forgive.” They both chuckled at her words. Mira realized he was uncomfortable and anxious. Another moment went away and she decided to break it herself this time.

“You wanted to speak to me?”
“Yes.” Again there was a silence. “Sorry, Mira. I just… I was never very good at it, and… I just wanted to tell you… I never thought I would marry someone like you.”

The declaration could be interpreted in various ways. “I guess I must take it as a compliment.”

He seemed to realize what she implied. “Yes, of course. I never meant… Sorry. I have never been good talking with women. Even with my cousins.” He breathed deeply. “I just wanted to ask you… Are you happy here?”

“Yes, I am. Hightower and Oldtown are very beautiful places. More beautiful than King’s Landing. They rival with Highgarden.”

That brought a smile on the knight’s face. “I hope I’ll be able to make you happy, my lady.”

“I hope I’ll make you happy too, Gerold,” Mira replied. “But you forgot to just call me by my name.”

He looked ashamed. “Yes, I did. I’m really sorry, again.” He walked toward her slowly. Mira had the impression he walked as if he was afraid of her. “May I escort you to your litter?” He offered his arm for her to take.

Mira smiled to show her agreement and she took his arm. They left her room. When she thought about that, it was probably the last time she would spend in it. She would live in the same rooms than her husband after the wedding. They came down the many stairs in silence. The man who would be her husband let her go when time came to enter her litter with Sera.

The wedding would take place at the Starry Sept of Oldtown and there was some distance before they arrived at their destination. Mira didn’t talk on the way. She was about to marry after all. A new life was waiting for her at the end of this path. Finally they arrived before the sept near the Honeywine, the large river that crossed Oldtown. Mira thought that weddings of people from House Hightower probably attracted a great crowd, but it didn’t seem to be the case today. Perhaps it was because it was only the wedding of a thirdborn son of the heir of Hightower, or perhaps because he was marrying a Northerner. Mira knew only too well the prejudice against people of the North in the Reach. She suffered it years ago when she arrived at Highgarden. They stopped before the Starry Sept and left the litter.

“Wait a minute, Mira.” Sera took a black cloak in the litter. When she unfolded it, Mira saw a white tree with a sword in its heart on the black ground. It was the sigil of her family. Her maiden cloak. “I helped to sew it. I hope it’s representative.”

Mira smiled fondly at her friend. “Yes, it is. Thank you, Sera.”

Her friend helped her to don the cloak. Mira hugged it against her. It would probably be the last time she would bear her family’s sigil. She walked toward the steps of the large sept. Ser Baelor Hightower was waiting for her at the beginning of them.

“Lady Mira,” he said when she was close enough to him, “I know your father should lead you to my son, but since he cannot be here, I hope you’ll consent to give me this honor.” He had a sorry expression on his face.

“I consent. Thank you, Ser Baelor.” She took his arm and they walked toward the sept.

The climb to the entrance seemed to last forever. Mira’s stomach fluttered and she had to breathe deeper to control her breathing. Step by step, they approached the huge doors of the Starry Sept. It wasn’t high like the Great Sept of Baelor, but it was very impressive all the same. Before the construction of the Great Sept by Baelor the Blessed, it had been the seat of the High Septon for more than a thousand years. Mira would be wed in this place. They finally reached the huge doors of the sept and, after a moment, they opened.

Mira knew from the weddings she assisted in the capital (the wedding of Sansa and Lord Tyrion, and the two weddings of Margaery) that a great light entered the Sept and probably blinded the people. It could give an impressive first vision of the bride when she would enter the Sept. Margaery had been wonderful the two times she married at this moment, and Sansa had nothing to envy her on that account, but Mira wondered what impression she gave. She wondered if the effect of the colors of her clothes would be good. She wore black and white on her gown, just like on her cloak, and she knew that her skin was whiter than most people in the Reach and her hair black like ink. Black and white. Would that make a pretty sight? Mira didn’t concern herself so much about her appearance usually. She did, but less than the other people in Highgarden and King’s Landing. However, today was her wedding, and she was anxious about anything that could go wrong.

The walk down the alley to the marriage altar took an eternity. Mira walked slowly, looking right before her and displaying a discreet smile. A bride had to smile for her wedding. She spotted Sera smiling widely at her with Alerie Tyrell at her side on the left while most of the Hightowers were on the right. Elys Hightower had her usual wicked knowing smile. Lord Leyton was standing straight with the help of his cane. Most of the people were smiling, but the one who smiled the most was her future husband waiting for her between the statues of the Mother and the Father. Ser Gerold Hightower looked happy like a maester about to be chained or a knight about to be knighted. However, Mira thought she saw some nervousness in his smile. She smiled back at him, trying to reassure him this way.

However, what caught the most Mira’s attention weren’t the people who were present. It was the people who weren’t there. There was only one person Mira was very close to who was present, and it was Sera. Mira had never been especially close to Margaery’s mother. That wasn’t supposed to be like this. Mira’s family should have been there. Her mother had always wanted her to marry a southern knight or lord. Her wish had been fulfilled, and she wasn’t present to see it realized. Her father wasn’t there either, no more than Talia or her brothers, or her uncle Malcolm. Even Gared Tuttle wasn’t here. Perhaps he was still alive, but if that was the case he was at the Wall, at the other end of Westeros. Even Margaery and Sansa weren’t there. The first one was in King’s Landing, the second one at Casterly Rock. Mira wished more people close to her could be here.

She climbed the first row of steps to the altar at Ser Baelor’s left. When they reached the middle of the steps, Ser Baelor released her from his arm and went behind her to remove the cloak from her back. Mira closed her eyes as she felt the white tree of House Forrester leave her. She would never wear it again. The heir of Hightower went down the stairs with the cloak under his arm, leaving Mira with the man who would soon be her husband. She took the arm he offered her, standing at his left, and they climbed the last steps to the septon waiting for them.

“You may now cloak the bride and bring her under your protection,” the septon declared when they stood before him.

The second son of Ser Baelor, Ser Garlan, handed the cloak to his brother. Mira turned her back to Ser Gerold so he could put the cloak on her shoulders. Again she closed her eyes when she felt the grey cloak with a white tower crowned with flames fall on her shoulders. She felt the hands of her betrothed shaking as he cloaked her. Mira opened her eyes again, breathing deeply. She tried to think about the fact the two cloaks weren’t so different. From dark with a white tree to grey with a white tower, that wasn’t such a change. She turned to face the septon again.

“My lords, my ladies,” he began, “we stand here in the sight of gods and men to witness the union of man and wife. One flesh, one heart, one soul, now and forever.” He continued the usual speech for every wedding until he showed a white ribbon to them. Mira and Ser Gerold took each other’s hand and the septon tied the ribbon in a knot around it. “Let it be known that Mira of House Forrester and Gerold of House Hightower are one heart, one flesh, one soul. Cursed be he who would seek to tear them asunder. In the sight of the Seven, I hereby seal these two souls, binding them as one for eternity.” He untied the ribbon and Mira kept her hand in Gerold’s, still feeling the shaking of her betrothed. She remained calm. “Look upon each other and say the words.”

Mira turned to be face to face with the man she was marrying. She recited her vows as Gerold recited his. “Father, Smith, Warrior, Mother, Maiden, Crone, Stranger. I am his and he is mine. From this day, until the end of my days.”

Mira noticed a shining in the knight’s eyes as he said the following words. “With this kiss, I pledge my love.”

He didn’t divert his eyes from her as he spoke and tenderly touched her cheek with his right hand. Mira gave in and kissed a man for the first time in her life. The people present applauded as the kiss lingered. When they broke it, they turned to face the assistance, smiling widely. Mira and her husband left the Starry Sept, followed by all the people of the assistance and a litter brought them back to the Hightower where a feast would take place.

Most of the people went to their rooms to change their clothes or, and Mira knew it was the main reason, to satisfy natural needs. The change of clothes was only an excuse most of the time. However, the groom and the bride couldn’t allow themselves this luxury. They had to go directly to the wedding feast, without any opportunity to go anywhere else before.

On the way to the Hightower and to the feast, Gerold spoke more than she ever saw him do. He asked her questions about everything on her, from her favorite food and colors to her time in Highgarden. Mira was surprised by this. He never seemed very interested in her before, but now he was drinking her words. She found it unsettling, but she had to admit she liked it. She tried to ask questions about him in return, but he seemed too eager to know more about her and barely allowed her to place any word out of her answers to his own questions.

Mira abandoned the grey cloak of Hightower she was cloaked in to her handmaiden when they arrived. She walked with her husband to the dais in the Great Hall where the feast would take place. Some of the guests had arrived to the Hightower before them to be present when they would arrive and most of them were there when Mira took her place. The people on the dais were Hightowers for the majority, including Gerold’s brothers, sister, father, mother and grandfather. Lady Tyrell was there as well, and Sera too. Mira had managed to convince Lord Leyton to let Sera sit on the dais since she was the closest person she had for a family here.

The wedding feast consisted of seven courses with various bards, musicians and singers entertaining the people. The first course was a mushroom soup with rosemary as flavoring. There was a first toast to the newlyweds when it was served, and Mira was sure it wouldn’t be the last one. Mira remembered the first service of the wedding of Margaery to Joffrey had been a similar soup, though of a much more refined type. She didn’t complain about it. After the pomp and the luxury of King’s Landing, she appreciated something simpler.

“Was the soup to your taste, Mira?” Gerold asked her when they had emptied their bowls.

“Yes. Thank you.”

He looked a little hesitant when he asked her another question. “You surely weren’t used to that in the North. Weren’t you?”
“No,” she confirmed. “Life is much less refined there. My family lived very comfortably and we ate well, but we didn’t have the possibility to make too much refined things. Life can be hard in the North. Many people live from hunting and fishing. Lands are not very fertile.”

Gerold nodded in understanding. “My father had a sister. I think her name was Lynesse. She married some northern lord at the Tourney of Lannisport. She left with him but turned miserable where they lived. My father doesn’t remember the name of the lord, but I think he came from an island.”

The mention of the Tourney of Lannisport brought back memories to Mira. I met your father once. At the Tourney at Lannisport. Even then he didn’t trust Roose Bolton. We only spoke briefly, but your father struck me as an honourable man. Lord Tyrion’s words resonated in her head, but she managed to put them aside. “Could it be Bear Island?” she asked.

“Yes, I think that’s it. Bear Island. They eventually left Westeros and went to the east because the lord started to sell people into slavery. We don’t know what happened to them.”

“I’m sorry for your aunt. Bear Island is a very little island with very few people. And it’s in the north of the North. Life is quite difficult there, even for the lords and ladies. It can be difficult to get used to life there when we come from the south. But I’m quite used to that kind of things now. I spent enough time in Highgarden and King’s Landing. The soup reminds me of the one they served at the beginning at the feast for the royal wedding.”

“Really?”

“Yes. The one between Queen Margaery and King Joffrey,” Mira specified.

“Of course. I should have known. You were the handmaiden of the queen at this moment.”

Mira smiled timidly. “Not really.”

Gerold looked at her, puzzled. “What do you mean? You were the queen’s handmaiden, weren’t you?”

“No at this time. I was at the service of Lady Sansa Lannister at this moment. The queen put me to her service for some time because she lacked a handmaiden.”

They didn’t have time to continue their conversation since the second service arrived. It was essentially a salad with lemons, pomegranates and a red sauce. Mira’s husband started again to ask her question about her life at Highgarden and in King’s Landing. Between the questions, they received the visit of many guests who congratulated them and gave them their best hopes. The third service was composed of shrimps covered of garlic with three different sauces. They were probably fished in the Whispering Sound, the large bay where the Honeywine emptied right where Oldtown stood.

Musicians started to come on the floor to play their songs one by one. The songs weren’t so different from the ones Mira heard in Highgarden or King’s Landing. The fourth service arrived. This time it was chicken soaked in a tomato sauce along with potatoes, lettuce and corn. They brought them wine from the Arbor. Gerold was surprised when she told him it wasn’t the first time she drank of it. He looked impressed by the fact she had been so close to Margaery, and more a friend than a handmaiden to the queen.

While they were at the middle of the fourth service, a woman with a harp came with many other musicians. The song caught Mira’s attention.
On either side of the river lie
Long fields of barley and of rye,
That clothe the world and meet the sky;
And thro' the field the road run by
To many-towered Camelot;
And up and down the people go,
Gazing where the lilies blow
Round an island there below,
The island of Shalott.

Willows whiten, aspens quiver,
Little breezes dusk and shiver
Thro' the wave that runs for ever
By the island in the river
Flowing down to Camelot.

Four grey walls, and four grey towers,
Overlook a space of flowers,
And the silent isle imbowsers
The Lady of Shalott.

Only reapers, reaping early,
In among the bearded barley
Hear a song that echoes cheerly
From the river winding clearly Down to tower'd Camelot;
And by the moon the reaper weary,
Piling sheaves in uplands airy,
Listening, whispers '"tis the fairy
The Lady of Shalott."
There she weaves by night and day
A magic web with colours gay,
She has heard a whisper say,
A curse is on her if she stay
To look down to Camelot.

She knows not what the curse may be,
And so she weaveth steadily,
And little other care hath she,
The Lady of Shalott.

And moving through a mirror clear
That hangs before her all the year,
Shadows of the world appear.
There she sees the highway near Winding down to Camelot;
And sometimes thro' the mirror blue
The Knights come riding two and two.
She hath no loyal Knight and true,
The Lady Of Shalott.

But in her web she still delights
To weave the mirror's magic sights,
For often thro' the silent nights
A funeral, with plumes and lights
And music, went to Camelot;
Or when the Moon was overhead,
Came two young lovers lately wed.
"I am half sick of shadows," said
The Lady Of Shalott.

A bow-shot from her bower-eaves,
He rode between the barley sheaves,
The sun came dazzling thro' the leaves,
And flamed upon the brazen greaves
Of bold Sir Lancelot.

A red-cross knight for ever kneel'd
To a lady in his shield,
That sparkled on the yellow field,
Beside remote Shalott.

His broad clear brow in sunlight glow'd;
On burnish'd hooves his war-horse trode;
From underneath his helmet flow'd
His coal-black curls as on he rode,
As he rode back to Camelot.

From the bank and from the river
He flashed into the crystal mirror,
"Tirra Lirra, " by the river
Sang Sir Lancelot.

She left the web, she left the loom,
She made three paces taro' the room,
She saw the water-lily bloom,
She saw the helmet and the plume,
She looked down to Camelot.

Out flew the web and floated wide;
The mirror cracked from side to side;
"The curse is come upon me," cried
The Lady of Shalott.

In the stormy east-wind straining,
The pale yellow woods were waning,
The broad stream in his banks complaining.

Heavily the low sky raining
Over towered Camelot;
Down she came and found a boat
Beneath a willow left afloat,
And round about the prow she wrote
The Lady of Shalott

And down the river's dim expanse
Like some bold seer in a trance,
Seeing all his own mischance -
With a glassy countenance
Did she look to Camelot.

And at the closing of the day
She loosed the chain and down she lay;
The broad stream bore her far away,
The Lady of Shalott.

Heard a carol, mournful, holy,
Chanted loudly, chanted lowly,
Till her blood was frozen slowly,
And her eyes were darkened wholly,
Turn'd to towered Camelot.
For ere she reach'd upon the tide
The first house by the water-side,
Singing in her song she died,

The Lady of Shalott.

Under tower and balcony,
By garden-wall and gallery,
A gleaming shape she floated by,
Dead-pale between the houses high,

Silent into Camelot.

Out upon the wharfs they came,
Knight and Burgher, Lord and Dame,

And round the prow they read her name,

The Lady of Shalott.

Who is this? And what is here?
And in the lighted palace near Died the sound of royal cheer;

And they crossed themselves for fear,
All the Knights at Camelot;

But Lancelot mused a little space
He said, "She has a lovely face;

God in his mercy lend her grace,

The Lady of Shalott

After the song was over Gerold began to explain her something. “This woman is very popular in Oldtown. She’s asked to play at every feast and event. I heard she travelled through all Westeros, from Dorne to the Wall.”

Mira was quite surprised by this. “I never heard of her.”

“Apparently she only played for the smallfolk when she travelled. That’s why she’s not well-known among the nobleborn, but here in Oldtown, she’s barely less than a legend.”
Before Mira could ask more, another song began from the same woman.

The thundering waves are calling me home unto you

The pounding sea is calling me home unto you

On a dark new year's night

On the west coast of Clare

I heard your voice singing

Your eyes danced the song

Your hands played the tune

T'was a vision before me.

We left the music behind and the dance carried on

As we stole away to the seashore

We smelt the brine, felt the wind in our hair

And with sadness you paused.

Suddenly I knew that you'd have to go

Your world was not mine, your eyes told me so

Yet it was there I felt the crossroads of time

And I wondered why.

As we cast our gaze on the tumbling sea

A vision came o'er me

Of thundering hooves and beating wings

In clouds above.

As you turned to go I heard you call my name,

You were like a bird in a cage spreading its wings to fly
"The old ways are lost," you sang as you flew
And I wondered why.

The thundering waves are calling me home unto you
The pounding sea is calling me home unto you
The thundering waves are calling me home unto you
The pounding sea is calling me home unto you

People nearly exploded in applause when the singer was done. Talia would have liked to sing this song. The fifth service arrived not long after the end of her last song. They ate various fruits with white cream. Mira noticed some people started to find it difficult to eat more. There were even more people who were drunk. Toasts multiplied. The sixth service was the gigantic pigeon pie they brought. It wasn’t huge like the one for Margaery’s wedding, but it was huge all the same. At least Mira’s husband used a common sword to slice the pie, and not a Valyrian steel sword. The seventh and last service was made of pastries, some rich and others light. Of course, more wine was brought to wash it down. There were already some people about to fall asleep on the tables right before them, and the celebrations weren’t over. Wine would continue to flow until late in the night.

Since the dinner was over, it was time to dance. Mira and Gerold were the ones to lead the dance since this was their marriage. They started to dance alone, everyone’s eyes fixed on them. Mira knew how to dance quite well. Her mother showed her when she was a child at Ironrath, and she had the possibility to improve her dancing talents after she arrived in the south. Feasts and celebrations were far from rare both in Highgarden and the capital. Her husband seemed a little unsure at the beginning, but with time he gained assurance. Their movements were fluid and well arranged, and soon other people joined them to dance, beginning by Ser Baelor and his wife, Lady Rhonda Rowan. As they changed of partners, Mira found herself dancing with all Gerold’s uncles and his brothers, and with a few bannermen of the Hightowers. Altos Hightower, the eldest son of Ser Baelor, proved to be a little too much patronizing for her taste. The second brother, Garlan, was kinder and wished her all the happiness in the world with his brother, saying he was a good man. Garth Greysteel didn’t talk much. Ser Gunthor and Ser Humfrey, the two other uncles of her husband, proved to be of better company, though Ser Humfrey obviously needed dance lessons. Ser Baelor told her he never saw his son so happy in years.

Mira had to admit the man she just married looked more than happy. His lips were fixed in a smile that could only widen, his eyes were shining like Mira rarely saw eyes shine, and she had the impression he always kept an eye on her, even when the dance separated them.

After a long time, Mira left the dancing floor to take some rest. She noticed Elys Hightower drinking near a table full of lemon cakes. Since Sera was still dancing, Mira went to her new sister-in-law.

“Elys.”

“Mira. Or should I call you sister now?”

Both chuckled. Mira thought about Talia. “If you want. Shouldn’t you be dancing?” Gerold’s sister hadn’t gone on the dancing floor up to now. She remained in her corner, observing the others.
“Why should I? It’s not my wedding. And I never really felt attracted by the dance. I have other talents and interests.”

“Yes. I know your greatest skills reside in your tongue and not in your feet and legs.”

Elys’s smile was close to being mischievous. “I like to say what I think. No more, no less. And you like to subtly put back people to their place with the right words.”

“It’s better to win over people with words they can do nothing against.”

“But it’s not amusing like telling them straightforward who they are and how things really are.” Elys’s smile didn’t leave her face. “For example, do you want to know what I think about your wedding?”

“After two weeks with you, I know my answer won’t matter.”

“Then I will tell you. The ceremony is great, but to be honest, if you wanted a good marriage, you would have been better to marry Altos or Garlan. Altos is insufferable, but he will be heir to Hightower when my grandfather dies. As for Garlan, he’s better than Gerold at almost everything. Too bad for you the two of them were already married.”

“Gerold is not so bad,” Mira replied.

“No, but he’s middling. He doesn’t have any particular talent. He’s middling at everything. And he’s a thirdborn son.”

“And I am a thirdborn child. I don’t really care about it, Elys.”

Elys Hightower shrugged. “As you wish.” Mira’s sister-in-law brought back her attention to her cup of wine.

To Mira, it wasn’t really important that she married a thirdborn son or that her husband was not extraordinary. She had asked for this kind of marriage. It was far better than the betrothal Ser Kevan tried to arrange with Torrhen Whitehill. Mira had the best claim on Ironrath in all the Seven Kingdoms. When time would come, the Hightowers could try to take back her home and Mira would be the Lady of Ironrath. If her home wouldn’t be the seat of House Forrester any longer, at least House Hightower of Ironrath would come from a Forrester and it would be far better than to have a Whitehill ruling the place where she grew up. Ser Gerold Hightower didn’t seem to be evil, and for Mira that was enough. If Margaery could accept to be married with Tommen, then why wouldn’t she be able to marry Gerold?

Sera left the dancing floor to come to meet them and congratulate Mira. They spoke for some time about the guests, the decorations, the ceremony, Oldtown and many more or less important subjects until Mira and Sera both decided to join back the dance, leaving Elys to drink alone. Mira noticed red was beginning to flourish on the lady’s cheeks.

Mira managed to find back her husband who was talking with his brother Garlan. He was still smiling and his smile only grew when he saw her. They returned to dance as musicians played slower songs. Mira supposed the end of the day was coming. The dances were now without changing of partners and Mira ended dancing with her husband for a very long time as a consequence. She didn’t know how many compliments he told her, but he did a lot. The world seemed to grow smaller as Mira focused on the dance. It was her wedding, so best to enjoy it.

The music stopped after one more dance was completed. Mira asked Gerold for a pause and he followed her outside the dancing floor like most of the people. It was at this moment that Elys Hightower decided to show everyone she existed.

“Aye, everyone! Good dance! You really danced and ate and drank very well.” She walked to the middle of the dancing floor, a cup of wine in her hand. She was drunk for real now. Mira was afraid of what the lady could do, but she smiled in amusement a little all the same.

“Don’t worry, Mira,” Gerold told her. “She always puts a show like this. Every time. I just hope she won’t say something that will ruin all of it.” He tried to be reassuring, but after everything she saw in King’s Landing, and a few things she witnessed in Highgarden, Mira was ready for everything. She wasn’t sure something could surprise her anymore.

“So, we have a septon who said prayers, we had vows, a cloak, a feast, wine, food, dance and, more important than everything else, we had a pigeon pie!” Some people laughed at the jest. “But, there’s a part of a wedding that wasn’t completed yet.” Mira shuddered. She had a good idea of what was coming. “It’s time my brother proves he is a man! What do you say, Lord grandfather?”

Lord Hightower still sat on the dais. He couldn’t dance with his cane. There was a silence, then people started to cheer and to pound their cups and fists on the tables. “To bed! To bed! To bed! To bed!”

It continued for a time. Mira glanced at her husband. He looked… afraid. If Mira was in some way uncomfortable with what would come, it seemed he was even more than her. Mira knew it would happen. That was part of a wedding ceremony. Better to face it while keeping the head up. Cheering, pounding and shouting continued for a long moment, until finally Leyton Hightower rose and asked people for silence with a gesture of his hand.

“Well, my son and heir Baelor has three sons. Two of them are already married. It’s time for the last one to be too. Let’s bed them!” He clapped his hands and people burst into even more cheers.

“TO BED! TO BED! TO BED! TO BED! TO BED! TO BED!”

People were advancing on them now. Mira cast her eyes on Gerold and put a reassuring smile. She walked ahead, slowly and graciously, head up, looking straight before her. The men who converged on her let her pass, and then she was seized by the arms and legs and put on about ten men’s shoulders. She looked behind and saw Gerold being lifted by a few women. Sera and Elys were among them. Mira couldn’t hold a giggle at his expression. It was a mix of excitement and fear.

“TO BED! TO BED! TO BED! TO BED! TO BED! TO BED!”

People at the feast kept shouting and clapping as she was carried to her wedding bed. Soon, they were far from the Great Hall and the sounds of the people left at the feast receded until they disappeared. Shouts were replaced by ribald suggestions by the people who carried the groom and the bride. On the way, the men removed her clothes one after one. When they finally reached the bridal chamber, only her smallclothes were left on her and she was dropped in the marriage bed. Her husband followed not long after, only wearing smallclothes too. The men and women left them and closed the door behind, leaving Mira alone with her husband. She observed him like he observed her. He was approximately the same height than her. He wasn’t very muscled, but he wasn’t frail either. In his eyes, Mira thought she saw hunger, but also shyness as he looked at her.

“Well, it went better than I thought.” He tried to laugh, but barely managed to do it. Mira chuckled as well. She kept looking at him, waiting for what he would do. After a moment he looked at her from her head to toe, he brought a hand on her cheek and looked directly in her eyes. “You’re beautiful, Mira.”
Gerold Hightower approached his head from hers and kissed her. Mira returned the kiss the best she could. She never kissed a man before this day. She was probably one of the very few women in Highgarden who never at least kissed someone else. Despite her friendship with Margaery, there was one thing in which Mira would never have followed the queen: to have sexual relationships before her wedding. She was a maid. The hand of her husband wandered from her cheek to her shoulder and her arm. Soon Mira was lying on the sheets of their bed with him over her, still kissing her lips. The kisses felt good. They nearly struggled to get inside the bed covers and the blankets. Her husband didn’t want to leave her lips even a single second. His kisses became more insistent. He also struggled to get her smallclothes out of her. From what she heard in Highgarden and her discussions with Margaery, she guessed that meant he hadn’t been with other women very frequently. He released himself from his own smallclothes very soon. They were both naked now. He consummated their marriage immediately.

It hurt. It hurt a lot. Mira knew that was the way things went the first time, but nothing prepared her to the pain. At least it didn’t last long. After a short moment, he laid on the bed next to her while Mira was trying to recover from the encounter. She was a Forrester no longer. Now she was Mira Hightower. The thought nearly brought tears in her eyes. She only managed to keep them away thinking about the fact she may just have saved her family’s home from the Whitehills.

Their movements in the bed had put aside some of the blankets that covered them and Mira could see the blood where her thighs met. No one would doubt their marriage. Mira thought about Sansa whose marriage was still unconsummated, unless she finally decided to give in to Lord Tyrion. She turned her head on her left to look at her husband who was looking at her legs. There seemed to be a shock on his face.

“Did I hurt you?” He looked at her face, a worried expression in his face. “Are you alright?”

Mira tried to put away his worries. “Don’t worry. That’s what happens the first time. And you know now for sure that I was a maiden.”

She put on a smile despite the pain that lingered between her legs. Her husband smiled lightly. “I never doubted it.” The smile faded immediately. “I’m sorry. I’ve been too eager. I’ve… I’ve never been with a woman before.”

You must be one of the few ones in the Seven Kingdoms. At least at the south of Moat Cailin. Mira knew very well most of the men didn’t wait for their wedding to bed a woman. If her husband said the truth, he was among the exceptions. She raised a little and put a tender kiss on his cheek. “Don’t feel guilty. I’m your wife. You’re my husband. That’s what wife and husband do.”

He smiled back at her after a short moment where he seemed to process the things she just told him. He brought his hand again to her cheek, caressing it tenderly. Mira liked it much more than when he had been inside her.

“Mira.” Her eyes met his. He was looking intensively at her, a strange fascination plain on his face, but also something that looked like sadness but wasn’t sadness. “You know, when I saw you the first time, when you arrived, I couldn’t believe what I saw before me. I couldn’t believe you were the one I would marry. I just… I wasn’t expecting someone like you.”

Mira stopped her from chuckling but she smiled as she looked down. “What were you expecting?”

He looked ashamed. “I don’t know. There are… There aren’t many people from the North that come to Oldtown, and we don’t know them very much. I was afraid…” He took off his hand from her cheek and looked away. “I never had very much. Because I am the third son of my father. Most of the time, I’m left with nothing while my two brothers get everything. So, when my father told me I would marry a Northerner… I just… I didn’t know who I was about to marry. And then I saw you.”
He faced her again, his eyes shining once more. “You were beautiful. You behaved very well, like a true lady, more than many women I met in my life. And I observed you for two weeks, and I still couldn’t believe you were real. You’re kind. You’re intelligent. You’re brave too. You need to be after you spoke to my sister like you did. And you’re probably the first person I met who was able to make her shut her mouth.”

He chuckled on the last remarks and Mira chuckled as well. She also reddened. No man really complimented and praised her this way before. When she looked back at him, he didn’t say a word. He just kept looking at her, and she did the same. Slowly, he approached of her and Mira closed her eyes when he got close enough. His forehead met hers. He was breathing heavily, and Mira’s heart had started to pound too. She could hear it.

“I love you, Mira.” She felt his lips approaching her own as his hot breath caressed them. “I love you so much.”

He kissed her again, tenderly, sweetly, softly. There was some aftertaste of wine and garlic in his mouth as she returned the kiss. Mira grew hungry for it, just like he was hungry for her mouth. First they were sitting on the bed, but with time Mira returned to her position when they became man and wife. He kept whispering her name. She liked it. When he took her for the second time, she wasn’t hurt like the first time. There was still some pain, but perhaps it was mostly remains from their first time. Essentially, it was uncomfortable, but not entirely unpleasant.

When they were done, they lied next to each other, breathing quickly. Mira rarely felt so exhausted in her life. She drifted away into sleep very quickly after pulling a blanket on her naked body. She slept well this night. No nightmare came to disturb her.

The next morning, Mira woke up as the sun came out and bathed her face with his light. She looked on her left to see her husband, his back turned on her. She didn’t dream. She was really married. Mira noticed an ache between her legs. She sat in the bed, keeping the blankets on her chest to hide her breasts, though when she thought about it, the only one present in that room was her husband, and they didn’t have anything to hide to each other now. Mira saw a dressing gown on a nearby chair. She left the bed, abandoning the blankets behind her and put the gown on her. She felt better that way. She noticed flowers on the floor around their bed. She wondered where they came from for a moment, but when she brought her right hand to her hair, she realized something was missing. She had a good idea who removed them. She looked at her husband, still sleeping.

Mira went to wash her face in a basin and took more time to observe the room where she was. It was cozy, with chairs, a large bed for two people, two tables including one with a game of Cyvasse. She had played to the game a few times when she lived at Highgarden. There was also a balcony. Mira went to it. Hightower really deserved its name. She was actually several hundred feet from the ground. She could see ships sailing in the Honeywine and the Whispering Sound from where she was, and she managed to find some buildings of the Citadel and the Starry Sept where she was wed yesterday. And it wasn’t stinking. Oldtown was a much better place to live than King’s Landing. From this altitude, the wind was quite strong and Mira’s hair were flying around a little. She stepped away from the balcony a little, but kept looking at the city of Oldtown.

Arms suddenly wrapped around her hips. Mira shrieked a little and tried to duck for a second, but she realized it was Gerold. He began to kiss her neck on the side, discarding some of her hair. Mira closed her eyes. She wasn’t going to send her husband away. Not after everything they did last night. A warm feeling of well-being and contentment filled her body, along with excitement.

“How’s my lady slept well?” he asked with a whispering sound that sent shivers on Mira’s back.
“Yes, she has. And her name is Mira. Remember,” she replied on a low voice.

He untied her dress and dropped it on the floor. For the first time, Mira moaned loudly. They went on the bed and joined. Everything felt good this time. She was relaxed, and his kisses all over her face and body filled her with joy and desire. Soon they were entangled around each other and a blur of pleasure seized her.

Mira lied among the sheets, blankets barely covering half of her legs. Her husband was no different from her. They needed some time to catch up their breath after such an expenditure of energy. Before Mira felt she had recovered, Gerold came back to kiss her in her neck, caressing her skin with his lips. Mira kept her eyes closed.

“You’re so lovely, Mira. So warm. So perfect.” After everything that happened within a single night and a single morning, Mira could only enjoy the words her husband said with such an enticing voice.

Her husband brought his head at the level of hers and laid his own body on hers. They kept kissing and whispering to each other. Mira let his name escape from her lips more than once. Was it how her mother and her father felt when they married? She didn’t know. She wasn’t born yet at this moment. At best Rodrik was on his way. Would a child be on his way in her belly after this night? They remained in that position for a very long time, without joining. They didn’t need it.

“Mira. You’re so good,” her husband said as he nibbled behind her ear. “I would spend my whole life with you.”

“You will,” she replied with a sleepy voice. “We’re married. Remember.”

“I know. But I would like to spend my whole life with you in this bed. Just with you.”

Mira chuckled. “I’m afraid your family won’t allow it.”

He looked at her. “What about today?”

“You think your father would like you to spend all the day here?”

“I don’t care if he likes it or not. I only care for you. Only you.”

They resumed their kissing. Mira never felt like this. She didn’t know for how long they remained there in each other’s arms. A servant came in at some moment to bring their breakfast, but Gerold sent her away with an angry voice before he dedicated all his attention to her again. When she thought they were reaching the middle of the day, Mira succeeded after a few failed attempts to convince her husband to let her leave their bed. Reluctantly, he let her leave and she put the dressing gown still lying on the floor on her shoulders. Mira then called a handmaiden so she could take a bath. She needed one after everything that happened since yesterday. The handmaiden who was at her service since she arrived brought buckets of hot water to the bathtub in an adjacent room and Mira washed herself. Her clothes were there and she could dress in a light blue gown.

Gerold had put some clothes on him when she came back and he went to take a bath too. The breakfast the servant brought earlier was still on the table and Mira helped herself with some lemon water. Images of the morning and the night were swirling in her head. More than once, she smiled at the thought of one thing or another. Her husband came out from the other room and joined her in the late breaking of their fast. Gerold seemed to consider seriously what he said before since they spent the whole day together in their rooms. Mira had received a few books during the breakfast last morning and started to read some of them, including a special copy of the Wonders made by man that Ser Garlan gave her. She noticed Gerold often spied on her as she read. They also played Cyvasse, though both weren’t very good players, and they talked a lot. Mira managed to know more about her husband in a single day than in the two previous weeks.

Next morning, Mira left their rooms in the morning to break her fast with Sera. She had abandoned her friend long enough. Sera welcomed her quite warmly, but she seemed a little upset that Mira didn’t come to visit her yesterday.

“I’m sorry, Sera,” Mira apologized as she ate some eggs. “It wasn’t my decision, believe me.”

Sera looked intrigued by this. “It was your husband?”

Mira smiled thinly. “He didn’t forbid me to see you, but let’s say he was very insistent that we spent the whole day together without anybody else.”

Sera nearly burst into laughs. “And I thought you finally abandoned your septa’s attitude! So your husband kept you in your bed for all the day?”

“No,” Mira was quick to deny. “We just spent our time in our rooms. It’s good for knowing each other.”

“Of course.” Sera didn’t really seem to believe her. “So tell me. How was it?”

Mira sighed. “Sera, I’m not talking about this.”

“Come on. You were just wed. Loosen yourself a little. Everyone talks about these things. You remember the kissing games of Alla and Megga?”

“Yes, I do remember, Sera. They tried to convince me to join them one day. And I’m sure you remember the answer I gave them.”

Sera knew it and nodded. “Please, Mira. Give me a few details at least.”

Mira sighed. Sera was her friend. “You promise me to not repeat it to anybody? I don’t want everyone talking about it all around the castle.”

Sera smiled patronizingly. “Very well. I won’t talk about it to anybody. You have my word. Tell me now.”

Reluctantly, Mira told her what happened during her wedding night and the morning that followed. Before Sera’s insistence, she also added some details about the events of last night. Mira wouldn’t talk about it to anyone else, no one except Margaery one day if the queen ever asked her about it. But there was one person she would never talk about it to: Elys Hightower.

Chapter End Notes

For those who wonder why there was no death, no poison, no threat of gelding and no psychopath, I thought it was time to have a marriage where the worst thing that could happen was a drunken sister calling for the bedding ceremony. There are some marriages that must go on without major problems at some time, even in Game of Thrones.

The characters of Lord Leyton Hightower and his sons exist in the books, but the children of Ser Baelor Hightower, including Mira's husband, are all characters I made myself. For Gerold Hightower, I took some inspiration from Quentyn Martell in the books, more on the psychological side than the physical one.

Again, the songs played at the wedding are real:
- The Lady of Shalott by Loreena McKennitt (https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5QguMgi_lq0)
- The Old Ways by Loreena McKennitt (https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-4PC451UEhU)

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa XX

Chapter Notes

Everyone who wondered what was the gift Tyrion gave to Sansa for her name day, you’re just about to discover it. A key chapter to the story.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Sansa XX

“That’s your sister? Arya?”

Sansa had brought Joy to see the tapestry. Winterfell stood, proud and undamaged, in the background. Before it stood House Stark. Her father had a grim expression as he stood tall, Ice unsheathed and straight before him as if he was leaning on it. Benjen Stark, the uncle Sansa had never known enough, stood next to him, all clad in black like every brother of the Night’s Watch ought to be, a little smile playing on his lips. Robb stood on the other side of her father. Bran had an unbowed bow and an arrow in his hands. Rickon wasn’t far from him, crushing nuts on a stone. Her mother was looking benevolently at her two youngest sons. Sansa was there too, sitting on a rock, making an embroidery. Arya was on the other side on the tapestry, holding a wooden sword in her hands while Jon, clad in black like their uncle, was ruffling her hair. The plucky little girl with a sword was the one Joy pointed.

“Yes, that’s her. And right next to her is my brother, Jon Snow.”

Joy stared in wonder at the image of Sansa’s half-brother. “He looks so handsome.”

Sansa couldn’t hold a smile. Joy was right. Her brother Jon was far from ugly. If he had been born a legitimate son, girls would have turned around him just like they turned around Robb. From what Sansa could recall, Jon and Robb were nearly equals in everything, or if one was better than the other in something, it was compensated by being less talented than the other in something else. Jon was deprived of so much only because he didn’t have the right mother. Sansa was pained at the idea she had shared her mother’s distaste for bastards. Jon had been her brother just like Robb, Bran and Rickon, but she never showed him the affection a sister owed to her brother, all that because Sansa wanted to follow her mother. It would be so good to see him again.

“Remember, Joy. You are betrothed now,” Sansa remembered her not very seriously.

“Sorry, Sansa.” Joy went back to look at the tapestry. “Is that you?” She pointed the redhead girl.

“Yes, it’s me.”

“You look different.”

“It’s me when I was younger.”

The tapestry was made to represent House Stark before they left Winterfell. Tyrion had ordered it many months ago. He had people who knew her family to help the artisans draw it. It took a lot of time to make one of good quality, but they succeeded. Sansa had been speechless when Tyrion showed it to her the first time. The day after her sixteenth name day, in the evening, he had led her to the ancient Great Hall of Casterly Rock and showed her this in one of the galleries. Sansa was still amazed by the realism of the representation of her family a month later. It was Tyrion’s present for her name day. He had wanted to show it to her on the evening of her name day, but something both Tyrion and Sansa didn’t expect had prevented him from doing so. Thus Tyrion had showed her the next day.

It was so well done. Everyone was represented so well. By looking closer, you could see the six direwolves running in the background near Winterfell. Five were grey, the other one was white. Everyone was exactly like she remembered them back when she left Winterfell, with a few changes. Bran wasn’t a cripple, and Jon was garbed with black clothes as if he already was a member of the Night’s Watch. Sansa didn’t really care about the changes. Overall, it showed her family before everything started.

This tapestry showed the time when Sansa only cared about what she didn’t have. She hadn’t been able to appreciate what she had back then. Her song had been at Winterfell, before she left. The moment they went south was the end of her song, the moment when her life became a nightmare. She looked at the little girl she had been. A pretty little girl with good manners, always behaving like a lady, who loved lemon cakes, needlework, knights, stories, songs, and who only waited for a knight in shining armor or a charming prince to come and bring her somewhere they would have a perfect life in a great castle.

Sansa had never met her knight in shining armor, nor her charming prince. These men didn’t exist. Instead, she met Tyrion. The nightmare that began when she left Winterfell ended when she left King’s Landing and came to Casterly Rock. Now she was the lady of a great castle, she had real friends, and a husband who loved her. And even more important, she had a husband she truly loved.

“It’s cold,” Joy complained all of a sudden.

She was right. Sansa had started to shiver too. “Yes. Let’s go back to the surface.”

That was a way of speaking. Inside the Rock, they were never really at the surface, but they could get closer to it. As they walked out of the Great Hall, Sansa remembered another time when she shivered much more violently as she left the depths of Casterly Rock. About a month after she arrived here, Tyrion had showed her the watery caverns deep inside the castle. These caverns were beautiful, but they were also very dark. There wasn’t much light in it. Sansa had stumbled on a stone and fallen into one of the lakes down there. She had come back to their rooms all soaked and cold. Tyrion had been barely able to contain his laughter. She had gone back to the caves with Tyrion last week, but the memories related to that second time were much more pleasant.

“Will you bring me with you when you’ll go back North? I would like to meet Jon.”

Sansa had told Joy she would travel to the North one day, when the time would come to go back to Winterfell. She told Joy that she would probably visit her last brother at the Wall at the same time.

“I don’t know when I’ll go to the North, Joy. Probably after winter. I’ll have to wait a long time before I see Jon again.” Let’s hope the dead won’t have made him one of them by this time.

“Do you think he would like me? Is he kind?”

“Of course, he will like you, Joy. And yes, Jon is very kind. I mentioned you in one of the ravens I sent for him.”
“Really?” Joy looked very enthralled by this revelation.

“Yes,” Sansa answered as she kept smiling. “I told him you’re a great friend of mine.”

Joy was smiling madly now. “Sansa, promise me you’ll bring me in the North. You always say how Jon is a good man and how Winterfell is beautiful. I want to see it. I don’t care if it’s in five years or ten years. Just promise me.”

Sansa surrendered. “Very well. I promise, but it’s very possible that you’ll be married at this moment. You must marry Rollam when you’re fifteen.”

Doubts showed on Joy’s face. “Rollam is kind. He’ll let me go. I only want to see it once. And you can order him to let me follow you.”

“Alright. I will force your lovely and kind husband to let you accompany me. Are you satisfied now, Lady Joy Westerling?”

The little girl chuckled. “Yes, I am.” They remained silent for a moment. “Do you think I’ll be a good lady?”

“You’ll be. Everyone will be jealous of you, and they will be jealous of your husband since he married a Lannister.”

Sansa stopped and took Joy by the shoulders. She knelt to have her eyes at the same level than hers. “Joy, look at me. You know what my name is?”

The girl seemed distraught for a moment. “Sansa.”

“And my complete name?”

“Sansa Lannister of House Stark, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands and Lady of Winterfell.”

“Because you were a Stark before.”

“Yes. I was born a Stark. You just saw the tapestry. I am the daughter of Eddard Stark, who was the son of Rickard Stark, who was the son of Edwyle Stark. If we go farther into the past, we find that my ancestor is Bran the Builder, the man who built the Wall and Winterfell. I am only a Lannister by name, Joy. The only reason I have this name is because I’m married to Tyrion. By my blood, I am Stark. However, Tyrion is a Lannister. His father was Tywin Lannister, whose father was Tytos Lannister, whose father before him was Gerold Lannister. Tytos Lannister was the father of your own father. He was your grandfather, and Lord Gerold was your great-grandfather. And if we go far enough in the past, we find that you descend from Lann the Clever, the man who took the castle where we live only with his wits. You are a descendant from Lann the Clever just like I am one of Bran the Builder. You are a Lannister, just like I am a Stark.”

“But you’re not a bastard.”

“It doesn’t matter, Joy. My brother Jon is a bastard, just like you, and he is a Stark. He may not have the name of the Starks, but he has the blood. You don’t have the name of the Lannisters, but you have their blood. Much more than I’ll ever have. You are more a Lannister than myself. It doesn’t matter that your name is Hill or Snow or Lannister or Stark or Waters or Westerling. The blood of Lann the Clever runs through your veins. You are a Lannister, and you will always be a Lannister. No matter what the others say. This is the truth.”

Joy listened to Sansa attentively. Tears started to appear in the little girl’s eyes. Sansa patted her shoulder empathically. “Come now. We have a meal to take with Cerenna and Myrielle.”

They resumed their walk. As they reached the upper levels, Joy managed to speak again. “Thank you, Sansa.”

They arrived at her private rooms. The two daughters of Stafford Lannister were already there. They took place immediately and the discussions started around rice, bread and soups. Myrielle really was Sansa’s friend now. Sansa couldn’t pretend she was close to her like she was to Joy and Cerenna, but she had become a good friend in the end like every other woman at Casterly Rock. Myrielle also behaved very well towards Joy, not wishing to insult her again after the incident during the first day Sansa spent at the Rock.

In the middle of a conversation about sweets, Cerenna indirectly informed Sansa of something. “While we talk about sweets, Sansa, the lemon cakes have arrived.”

“Good. They arrived the way I asked?” Sansa wondered.

“Yes. Everything is in order.”

“What are you talking about? What lemon cakes?” Joy asked. Myrielle and Cerenna exchanged an amused look. Sansa was the one to answer.

“I commanded heavy shipments of lemon cakes before winter prevented us to bring in more and that the harvests are exhausted,” she explained.

“Oh, good. I love lemon cakes.” Joy didn’t seem to find anything strange. That was good. Cerenna, Sansa and Myrielle developed a secret language to talk about the festivities for Joy’s twelfth name day. The lemon cakes were used to designate the preparations. It meant everything was ready for Joy’s name day that would come next week.

“Joy, how do you find your betrothed? Rollam Westerling?” Myrielle asked suddenly.

“He’s very kind. I just wished his brother wasn’t dead. He’s very sad about it. I hate the Freys!” Joy seldom showed hatred, but this time was among the few she did show some. Her voice was filled with it.

“I agree,” Cerenna supported. “They’re horrible. And they’re all ugly from what I heard. Genna’s sons are not bad people, but they don’t distinguish themselves with their looks. I would kill myself before I marry a squid like one of them.”

“Sansa, do you think you could do something for Daven?” Myrielle asked.

“Forgive me?” Sansa replied.

“Do you think you could stop it? His marriage with a Frey girl?”

“What does she mean?” Joy interrupted. “Daven must marry a Frey?”
Sansa never told Joy, and she had no way to hide it now without looking suspicious. “Yes. Lord Tywin arranged a betrothal between Ser Daven and a daughter of Lord Walder Frey. He made it not long before he died.”

Joy looked astonished. “But… you can’t let that happen! The Freys are murderers. They’re evil! They killed your brother and your mother! They killed Raynald, Rollam’s brother!”

“I know, Joy.” How could she say that in the presence of Myrielle and Cerenna? “But your uncle organized this, and a Lannister always pays his debts. For now, I’m afraid we can’t annul Daven’s betrothal.”

Myrielle spoke at this moment. “Sansa, our father was negotiating with Lord Paxter Redwyne before the war started. He was trying to arrange a marriage between his daughter Desmera and our brother. Perhaps you could write to him and arrange a marriage for Daven with her.”

Sansa hesitated. “Lord Tywin promised a marriage between Daven and a Frey. The betrothal between Desmera and Daven was only discussed. Nothing more. I cannot use that.”

“But you managed to annul the betrothal between…” Sansa silenced Myrielle with a glare. She didn’t want Joy to know that her grandfather had planned to marry her to some Frey bastard.

“I think that what Myrielle tried to say,” Cerenna resumed, coming to the rescue before Joy suspected something, “is that there may be a way to spare Daven a marriage within a house of murderers and stoats.”

“Yes, there must be,” Joy supported.

Sansa looked at the three of them, all looking at her, expecting a solution, an answer. “I’m going to discuss about it with Tyrion this evening. Believe me, I’m not happy about any marriage between the Lannisters and the Freys, but we must be careful. Walder Frey is not someone we can hope to displease without consequences. He would never forget that if we acted too rashly.”

Myrielle didn’t look satisfied of the answer. Cerenna seemed to understand more what Sansa meant. As for Joy, she was obviously unhappy too. Sadly, there was nothing Sansa could tell to any of them. She and Tyrion had to keep the secret. They couldn’t stop Daven’s marriage. To arrange another one for Joy was already dangerous when it only concerned a bastard son of Walder Frey. To cancel a betrothal that involved a legitimate daughter could be suicidal. Tyrion was now decided to have Daven marry Amerai Frey once the siege of Riverrun would be over. At least, Daven would get lands and a castle along with his wife, Tyrion said. Sansa didn’t like the idea, but there wasn’t much she could do. She had argued, tried to convince Tyrion to find a way out for his cousin, but Tyrion simply stated he couldn’t call off two betrothals his father promised, not to mention the complications that would follow the vacant seat of Darry. Sansa had to give up. She wasn’t eager to announce the new to Cerenna and Myrielle, especially when Myrielle just stopped to hate her. She would tell them once the betrothal became official.

Once they were done eating, Sansa went to meet the stewards about the preparations for Joy’s name day. She thought for a moment afterwards to pay a visit to Tyrion in his solar, but she thought in the end that it wasn’t the good time. She had too much work, and Tyrion surely had a lot to do as well. Couldn’t this day end faster? Sansa went to her own solar and sighed heavily after she sat before the great piles of requests and letters.

The requests Sansa received as Lady of Casterly Rock and the Westerlands varied greatly. Many asked her to intercede for them before Tyrion, but many also asked favors to her directly. Lords asked for positions in Casterly Rock for members of their family, some offered children as wards, or even suggested betrothals with members of House Lannister. Cerenna and Myrielle had their share of demands, just like Ser Lucion and Genna’s sons and grandsons. Sansa let Genna take care of the proposals for her own family, but she took care of the other ones. There were even demands for Daven. Some didn’t know yet about his betrothal to a Frey. Sansa had to answer carefully to every proposal, not accepting nor refusing, except for Daven where she had to explain he was already engaged. There were also messages from the charity works she opened in Lannisport, mostly asking for financial support or for a visit from her. Sansa had already two visits planned for the next week. The septon of the city near the Rock also regularly asked for her support. There was even a group of citizens of Lannisport who recently asked if she could build a godswood in the city for the few people living here who followed the Old Gods.

When the afternoon neared its end, Sansa decided to walk a little to clear her ideas. The day had been long. She went to the gardens and walked alone. She tightened her gown firmly around her. The days grew colder. Winter is coming. All the same, fresh air did her some good. She sat on a bench after a few minutes, listening to the quiet sounds around her. She thought she heard the waves crashing against the castle even from there. The peace was disrupted when Sansa felt a hand on her shoulder. Cerenna had found her.

“Does it bother you if I sit?” the Lannister girl asked.

“No. Make yourself comfortable.” Cerenna sat right next to Sansa on the bench with her authorization.

“You managed to cancel Joy’s betrothal, didn’t you?” Cerenna asked after a moment. That was the moment Sansa dreaded.

“She was betrothed to a bastard. And with her betrothal with the heir to the Crag, we can still say we were proposed a much better match, but for your brother… It is more difficult.”

Cerenna sighed. Sansa wanted to do the same. “So. Who’s going to be my sister-in-law?”

“I don’t know yet,” Sansa lied. “I’m trying my best, Cerenna. Believe me. I hate the Freys. I hate them much more than you. But I’m not the Lord of Casterly Rock. The decision belongs to Tyrion in the end.”

“Can’t you really convince him?” Cerenna looked exasperated and despaired.

“I’ll try again. Who knows? Perhaps an opportunity will present itself. I won’t abandon your brother.” Sansa didn’t want to lose Cerenna’s friendship. She would try to spare Ser Daven such a marriage, but she doubted she would succeed.

“Perhaps you could use new methods to convince my cousin.”

Sansa frowned at Cerenna’s suggestion. “What do you mean?”

“You know what I’m talking about.” Sansa’s friend was now smiling wickedly. “Make him happy tonight.”

Sansa knew very well what she meant, but she wouldn’t use that kind of things, and she wouldn’t talk about it. What happened between her and Tyrion in the bedchamber was only for her and Tyrion to know, and no one else.

“That’s not an option.” Sansa said it firmly. She would leave no place to discussion.

“Who knows, Sansa? Perhaps if you screamed a little louder than last night, that would be enough to Sansa averted her face. “I’m not going to talk about this topic.”

Cerenna shrugged. “Alright. Then I’ll talk about it. I’ll tell you about the time when I fucked this squire in the pantry.”

Sansa tried to ignore the story. It had been a month now since she and Tyrion had come together as husband and wife, and still this was the main subject of conversation at the Rock. Servants, knights, and even the other members of House Lannister were all talking about this, or at least she thought so. They never talked about it in her presence, but she surprised a few whispers between some people and others. After a week, Cerenna had started to ask her details about her nocturnal activities. That wasn’t something Sansa wanted to talk about. After a few failed attempts, her friend finally decided to tell her tales of her own experiences. Sansa didn’t think they were all true, but after the nights she spent with Tyrion and the other intimate moments they shared, she knew enough to realize Cerenna was no maiden at all. When she thought about it, Sansa came to the conclusion Margaery probably wasn’t a maiden either when she married Joffrey. The things she told her before her wedding with Tyrion were proof enough to Sansa’s eyes. All the same, Sansa wouldn’t speak about her intimate activities with her husband, except to her husband.

“Let me tell you he had a hard time explaining to the knight he served how his clothes were all torn apart. I heard the knight wondered if his squire had been attacked by some lion. He wasn’t far from the truth. Only it was a lioness who assaulted the poor boy.”

Despite the fact Sansa didn’t want to hear more stories of Cerenna’s private experiences, she couldn’t retain a laugh. “You made my day, Cerenna. I think it’s time for me to leave.”

“Did I make your night? I wouldn’t want to deprive your husband from the good fucking he probably expects.”

Sansa sighed internally. “Good evening, Cerenna.”

As Sansa left the bench and walked away, Ser Stafford’s daughter called for her. “Sansa. Please, do something for my brother. I don’t want him to end up married with a stoat.”

“If only it depended on me, your brother would marry Desmera Redwyne, but it doesn’t depend only on me. I’ll try to convince Tyrion, but I can’t promise you anything.”

Sansa didn’t turn to look at her friend. She knew Tyrion wouldn’t change his mind and she didn’t want Cerenna to see it on her face. He wanted Darry to be kept between Lannister hands, and the only way for that was to marry a Lannister to Amerei Frey. Sansa couldn’t deny Tyrion’s reasons were good. They couldn’t break two betrothals with House Frey like that, and Sansa wasn’t about to give Joy to a Frey to save Cerenna’s brother. She hated the fact she thought like this, but if she was to give a Lannister to a Frey, she preferred to sacrifice Ser Daven than Joy.

Sansa walked back to her private rooms. She knew her way around the castle well enough now. There were still places she didn’t know quite well, but she could walk around Casterly Rock easily enough. As she walked, she wondered how tonight would be. A smile rose to her lips and her cheeks reddened. Ever since her name day, every night with her husband had been very occupied. Even a moon after they started to perform their duty, Sansa still had difficulty to believe there were so many ways to join with him. Every time she thought she understood what Margaery had meant when she told her Tyrion was quite experienced, Sansa discovered she still didn’t fully know what it meant. Tyrion used so many ways to make her enjoy it. There were even nights he didn’t even try to put a child in her, as if he only wanted her to feel pleasure. Sansa didn’t complain about this. That made the nights only more exciting. Even more so since Tyrion convinced her to initiate things on her own.

Sansa flushed at the memories of some things she did with her husband. The way she acted in their bed was completely unladylike, but she didn’t want to end it. Tyrion didn’t seem to disapprove what she did. In these moments, he looked at her like she never saw him look at something or someone before. What made her flush the most were the few initiatives she took during the two last weeks, when she visited Tyrion in his solar during the day. It was a good thing she ordered the guards to let no one enter when she did, but she also noticed their amused looks on their face, sometimes when she left her husband’s solar. A giggle escaped from her throat.

Sansa was no longer a child. She was a married woman, and a Lannister. She had consummated her marriage. Despite what she said to Joy this morning, she felt less and less like a Stark every day. She didn’t dare to talk about it with Tyrion, or with anyone else. She had changed. She felt her place was in Casterly Rock. She felt that she belonged there. She still felt attached to Winterfell, but it was so far, and she was unable to visit it for now. All her family was dead. The tapestry showed what her family was before they left Winterfell. Of all the people on it, only Sansa and Jon still lived, and she was a Lannister now. She could feel it everywhere in her body, even more when she was with Tyrion in their marriage bed. She loved him, and she wanted to be happy with him. Beyond Tyrion, she had Cerenna as her best friend and confident, Joy who was like a little sister, Genna, Dorna and Darlessa who were like aunts, Lanna and Myrielle who were good friends, and she even started to appreciate Genna’s sons. She had come to realize they weren’t prouder to be Freys than their mother. The only one she couldn’t really support was Ser Emmon Frey. She pitied Genna to have married this man, though sometimes he was the one she pitied when she saw how Genna ruled him.

Her family was dead, or far away. House Stark was dead or far away. The tapestry was a reminder of the past, not a picture of the present. Her life was here now, at Casterly Rock, with Tyrion. I am a Stark no more. I am a Lannister. Sadness filled her. One of her hands came to her tummy. It seemed normal. Her last moonblood had taken place two weeks ago, but considering how often they made love, Sansa may already have a child within her without knowing it. She thought about asking Creylen how long it could take to get with child the last time she visited him for her lessons, but she had feared too much to speak. She would ask him the next time. Her next lesson would be next week. She also wanted to ask him something else.

Tyrion was a dwarf. What if their children…? Sansa wanted children. Deep within herself, she wanted them, but she was afraid. Afraid of what may happen during the pregnancy. Afraid of what may happen during the childbirth. Afraid her children could be dwarves. She didn’t know what Tyrion thought about it. They never talked about having children, but she knew they would need some one day. How would Tyrion react if they were like him? How would she react herself? Sansa didn’t know. Things that had seemed so natural to her when she left Winterfell had turned so complicated. She needed answers. She would ask the maester, and order him to not talk about this with Tyrion. She would need another conversation with her husband on these matters. But not tonight. Sansa had enough problems for today, and she longed for a fine dinner and a good night of sleep. Well, not a night only with sleep.

This thought lifted Sansa’s spirit and she managed to get rid of unpleasant reflections. She had enough work and problems during the day as lady of this castle. There was no need to add more concerns for the evening. Her feet brought her without thinking to the huge golden doors where Brienne stood. Sansa stopped before her.

“Lady Brienne.”

“Lady Sansa.” As always, Brienne bowed before her.

“You may leave. I don’t think I need your protection for tonight.”

“As you wish, my lady.”

The lady knight left without any other word. Sansa had started to dismiss her from some of her guard duties a few weeks ago. Since Brienne told her two weeks ago about the noises she heard one night, Sansa had decided it was useless to have guards before her rooms during the night. There were already guards at the extremities of the corridors and it was more than enough. No one could reach the rooms she shared with Tyrion without meeting at least one of them, and these guards would unlikely hear something.

Sansa pushed slowly the huge doors, trying to make no sound. If Tyrion was already there, she could make him a surprise. Sadly, he hadn’t come back yet. Most of the time, it was like that. Tyrion always had more work to do than her and arrived for dinner after her almost every day. Sansa picked a book from Tyrion’s library on economic matters. Creylen encouraged her to read about this to understand the matter better. The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money by Archmaester Maynard was easy to read for her now after months of lessons, but she had discovered it was one of the easiest to understand. Other works about financial matters and economics were far more difficult.

Her handmaidens brought their dinner a few minutes later and put it on the table of the living room.
Sansa waited for Tyrion to show up. He told her a few times she could eat before him if he took too much time, but she wouldn’t. Time passed and Sansa wondered what was going on. Tyrion didn’t come. She found it strange. He didn’t take so much time usually, and when he did, he sent Podrick to tell her he would be late. No one came this time. She summoned one of her handmaidens to summon Tyrion here. She came back saying Lord Tyrion had very important matters to attend to and wouldn’t be able to come until the middle of the night. Sansa wasn’t pleased by that. In the end, she couldn’t keep waiting. Her stomach was grumbling. She ate without her husband for the first time in… a very long time. She thought it was probably the first time she didn’t dine with Tyrion ever since he left the cells of King’s Landing.

Sansa went to take a bath and tried to relax. She had some lemon perfume put into the water. She liked the scent. She slipped on a dressing gown and went to sit in a chair in their bedchamber. There she waited. What could take so much time to Tyrion? She heard a door screeching and woke up from her dozing. She nearly fell asleep. What time was it? The candles had almost burned out and only a very dim light was left in their bedchamber. She saw the shape of her husband walking through the living room toward their chamber. He was walking slowly, making very few noise.
Sansa thought he probably removed his boots to not make so much noise. She smiled in the darkness and rose from her seat as he entered the room.

“You’re late,” she said on a false accusing tone.

She thought she saw Tyrion jump in the near darkness. He hadn’t noticed her. “Sansa. I… I thought you would be sleeping.”

“Why are so surprised? Did you want to awake me the same way you did this morning three days ago?”
“Hmm… well… I just… didn’t expect to find you awake.”

He was stammering. Sansa found it strange, but decided to not care about it. They were late. He was probably tired. “Well, now that you’re here, we can go to sleep. After such a rough day, I think you need it.”

Sansa walked to their bed and started to undo her dress on the way, but before she could start to pull it off, Tyrion’s voice came from behind. “Sansa, stop. I need to tell you something.”

Sansa turned her head to look at him, but not her body. “Can’t it wait tomorrow?”

She noticed the serious look on Tyrion’s face. He shook his head slowly. “No. It can’t.” Sansa realized he had a strange expression on his face, as if he was asking for her forgiveness. As if he had done something terrible. She tied back her gown and turned completely to face him.

“What is it? What happened?”

Tyrion averted his eyes from her. He walked on his left, then on his right, closing on her, then withdrawing, putting his hand on the covers of their bed before removing it, never looking at her. She found his behavior stranger each minute that passed. She never saw him like this before, not even when he told her about Tysha.

“We’ll need some wine. And some light. I’ll light the candles.”

He then began to light them. Sansa didn’t understand what he was doing, but she went to the table of their bedchamber and poured for each of them a cup of wine. When all the candles were lit again, Tyrion finally came to sit with her. He grabbed his cup immediately and almost emptied it in one single gulp.

“Much better.” Dawn came on her.

“You’re drunk.” That was a statement, nothing more. He wasn’t drunk very much. It took a lot of wine to have Tyrion really drunk. Sansa knew it from experience when they did a drinking contest one night. She wasn’t about to repeat it.

“Not much. The servants refused to bring me all the wine I asked for.” Sansa smiled and the beginning of a laugh escaped her throat. Her orders were followed.

Tyrion remained silent for a very long moment. Sansa didn’t pressure him to talk. She started to feel she wouldn’t like what she would hear. Finally, Tyrion seemed to gather enough courage will to speak.

“Sansa, I received news from the North this afternoon. Good news and bad news at the same time.”

What news could put Tyrion in that state? “What news?” she asked.

“I’ll give you the good one first. Your sister is alive.”

Sansa remained there, mouth wide open as she tried to understand what Tyrion just said. “Wh… What?”

“Your sister Arya is alive.”

Sansa’s mind began to realize what he just said. Arya was alive. Arya, her little sister she believed dead. “Arya? Are you sure? She’s alive?” Her breathing quickened.
“Yes. She is.” Sansa let huge exclamation escape from her lips. Without realizing it, she was running to her husband and hugging him while he was still sitting in his chair. Tears filled her eyes. Tears of joy.

Sansa broke the embrace after a long moment and looked at her husband. “That’s wonderful. Why didn’t you tell me before? Is she alright? Where is she?”

Tyrion was looking away from her again. He hadn’t returned her embrace. “She’s alive, Sansa.” He looked into her eyes. His own seemed pained when they met hers. “At Winterfell.”

Sansa froze immediately. It was her who stammered now. “Win... Winterfell?” How was it possible?

Tyrion pulled something from his doublet. It was a small piece of paper, a raven scroll. “Creylen received it last week, but he had too much work. He only learned about the content today and brought it to me as soon as he knew.”

Sansa’s eyes went from the scroll to her husband’s face, then to the scroll again. She snatched it from Tyrion’s hands and walked away to read it.

Roose Bolton betrothed her to his son Ramsay. Wants to consolidate his hold on the North. Wedding to take place in two moons.

Man at Winter Town

The scroll had many gashes and the ink looked old judging by the color. Thoughts ran wildly through Sansa’s mind. Her sister was alive, at Winterfell. She was a prisoner. She was to marry Ramsay Bolton. Her little sister would marry a monster. And it would happen in two moons.

Sansa looked at Tyrion, panicked. “How did she arrive in Winterfell? Everyone thought she was dead.” She was nearly yelling.

“We don’t know,” Tyrion answered. “No one knows. My man at the Winter Town gave no detail about it. He probably doesn’t know it himself.”

The marriage was to take place in two moons. Ramsay Bolton. After what Sansa heard about him... No, she couldn’t let that happen. “We must do something. We can’t let that happen. We... We must write to Winterfell. Tell them to send Arya back here. She was the Crown’s ward just like me. We can order it to Roose Bolton. He’ll be forced to obey.”

She started to walk towards the huge doors to go to Creylen’s tower when Tyrion’s voice stopped her. “Sansa. Wait.” She stopped and wanted to reply they had no time to lose, but Tyrion spoke before she could. “It’s too late.”

Tyrion had left his chair. Not that it made a great difference of height. “What do you mean, too late?”

“The message came from the spy we had in the Winter Town outside Winterfell. He couldn’t send it by raven. He had to send a rider to White Harbor for Lord Manderly to send it to us. And it waited a week in Creylen’s scrolls before he opened it. Look at the date on the message.”

Sansa had rumpled the scroll in her fist. She smoothed it the best she could and looked at the date on it. Her heart bumped into her chest. The message was old of almost three moons. Three moons. She read the message over. Wedding to take place in two moons. She read it another time. Roose Bolton betrothed her to his son Ramsay.

The wedding already took place. Memories of another scroll Sansa read not long ago came to her mind. Ramsay Bolton imprisons women and tortures them. He starves them, peels their skin off a few of their fingers, beats them, rapes them and inflicts them many other horrible things. After a few months or a few weeks, he releases them and hunts them with his dogs in the woods once he’s tired of torturing them. If he catches them, his dogs eat them. Sansa felt her legs shivering. She burst into tears as she fell on the floor. She heard someone calling her name, but she couldn’t care about it. The only thing that mattered was Arya. She screamed uncontrollably and lost all coherent thoughts. Her sister was alive, and she was wed to a monster. A real monster.

Chapter End Notes

I must admit the beginning of the chapter was a lot much happier than the end. However, there is one thing I want you to know: I never write stories with bad endings. My endings are never perfect like in fairy tales, but they are happy. At most, they will be bittersweet, like GRRM once said "A Song of Ice and Fire" would end.

Please review

Next chapter: Doran
The body was cold, lying in a bed before them. Caleotte had tried everything to save her, but it was useless. Doran’s brother had studied at the Citadel, forging six links before he grew bored of the studies. Caleotte knew about poisons too, but not as much as Oberyn. Doran’s little brother had travelled through the Free Cities, learning much more about poisons during this time, and Caleotte didn’t have the knowledge of the cure to some of the poisons Oberyn learned about there. And sadly, Oberyn had passed his knowledge to his daughters. If Oberyn had known how they would use it…

The result of all this was right before them. Doran was sitting away in his wheelchair, Hotah behind him as always, on guard, while Trystane was crying on his knees, holding her hand. Doran had seen them walking through the Water Gardens each day, holding each other’s hand, discussing, smiling, laughing, kissing. All it took to ruin it was a little cut from one of Tyene’s daggers. The poison took some time to take effect, but a few hours after the supposed failed attack, blood had begun to run out from Princess Myrcella’s nose. A minute later, she was dead. There was nothing Caleotte could have done, even if he had arrived before the princess was dead.

Her body now rested here, under the eyes of the three men. Doran looked at Hotah. He showed nothing right now, but Doran knew Hotah was blaming himself for this. Doran had sent him to stop the Sand Snakes as soon as they began their attack on Trystane and the princess. Their goal was still unknown to Doran, but he knew it was nothing good. They probably wanted to torture her, to send her one finger at a time to her mother like Ellaria suggested not long ago, and eventually kill her. In the end, it hadn’t mattered. Trystane had taken his sword to fight his cousins and managed to hold them in respect with a few guards that happened to be there at the moment, and Hotah arrived in time with reinforcements to end this folly. Sadly, Tyene had cut the princess on her left arm right before she was arrested, causing her death a few hours later. The Sand Snakes and Ellaria were now under arrest, but the damage was done.

Princess Myrcella dead, five of my guards killed, the Sand Snakes and Ellaria in prison. It’s a catastrophe. Doran looked at his son weeping next to the body of the young woman he had come to love. That wasn’t what Doran had wanted. He never wanted the girl to die or suffer, no more than he wanted his son to suffer. It wasn’t supposed to be this way. An innocent child was dead, his son was heartbroken, and the plans he worked on for years were in danger.

“I will avenge you.” The voice of Doran’s son resonated in the piece. “I will avenge you, Myrcella. I swear it. Those who killed you will pay.”

Doran turned to look at Hotah. With a sign of head, he made him understand he wasn’t to allow that to happen. The bearded priest nodded, confirming he understood the order. With another sign with his hand, Doran commanded the captain to give the necessary orders to the other guards. After a short hesitation, Hotah left to carry out his duty. Doran found himself alone with his second son and heir. He lost a sister long ago, along with a nephew and a niece, then he lost a son, and a wife, and more recently a brother. He couldn’t take the risk to lose another son. He couldn’t conceive to lose his last living son. And yet, he knew he would have to take that risk. You couldn’t be cautious all the time. In order to win, you had to make a decisive move when the time came, and any decisive move was risky by nature.

Trystane rose from his kneeling position and faced his father. “I want their heads. Ellaria, Obara, Nymeria, Tyene. All of them.” Doran could see the hatred in the eyes of his son. The same hatred and lust for vengeance Oberyn once had when he was alive. The same hatred that got him killed.

Doran tried to appease him. “To kill them will not bring back your love, my son.”

“No, but at least she will get the revenge for what they did to her. The people who killed her will be dead.”

“Oberyn wanted vengeance for Elia,” Doran explained carefully. “He got killed for that. Ellaria, Obara, Nymeria and Tyene wanted vengeance for him, and for that they killed the woman you love. Now you want death for the four of them. They have five sisters. Sarella, Obella, Elia, Dorea, Loreza. Three of them share the same mother than Tyene. They worship their older sisters. If they must die, should their five sisters seek vengeance for them? Is that how it goes, round and round forever? Tell me. Where does it end?”

“This is not vengeance. This is justice.” His son was still crying. Trystane knew what his father said was true. Doran gave him his principles for ruling, but his son didn’t want to admit it. He was desperate, in pain. He just lost the woman he loved. Doran couldn’t blame him. His son would come to accept he couldn’t avenge his love, but for now he needed his father more than ever to stay in the right way.

“As much as it will be justice for Sarella, Obella, Elia, Dorea and Loreza when they will try to avenge their sisters by killing you. You are the heir to Sunspear. A prince of Dorne. A prince doesn’t live to satisfy his personal desires. He lives for his people. For the people he has the responsibility to rule. And what will four heads bring to you? Can you take a skull with you to bed? Can you give it comfort in the night? Will it make you laugh? Will you write songs for it? Will it care for you when you are old and sick? Just as I am now?”

The eyes of his son were full of water now. “I loved her, Father. I loved her.” His son burst and fell on his knees. Doran had never been a father to hug his children or to kiss them, but he loved them like any father should. It pained him to see his son in this state, much more than the gout he suffered of. With great effort, he got up from his chair and slowly walked to put a hand on his son’s head. Trystane lifted it to look at his father, tears streaming on his eyes.

“I wish I could give you what you want, my son. But I can’t. They are my nieces. And they are your cousins. We do not slaughter our own family in Dorne. Now while I rule. I’m sorry.”

Doran was. His son bobbed his head. He kept crying. The pain in his legs became insufferable for Doran, but he wouldn’t go back to his chair, not while his son knelt on the floor, broken. Caleotte arrived not long after with Hotah. Doran instructed him to bring the prince to his chambers and to give him some essence of nightshade if needed. In the meantime, Hotah brought him back into his wheelchair and led him to his chamber for the night. Caleotte allowed him to take some milk of the poppy for the pain and Doran managed to sleep.

Next morning, Doran was brought to the cell of the woman who organized the murder. He had put her and all the Sand Snakes in separate tower cells where they had everything they needed. For more safety, he even put the four ones who were in the Water Gardens or in Sunspear and who took no part in the plot, in case they would try something. They were given the same advantages than their mother and sisters. Only Sarella wasn’t imprisoned since she was in Oldtown. Doran had no control on her movements, and as long as she stayed outside of Dorne, he had no reason to worry about her actions. Who knew what new trouble she was running into right now?

He entered the cell with Hotah standing next to him, holding his axe in guard position, ready to act at the first sign of danger for Doran. The door of the cell closed behind him. Ellaria Sand stood from her chair when he entered, a defiant look on her face. Her cell was well furnished with a featherbed, a table with a Cyvasse game in a corner, another table with fruits at the center, a window with bars that allowed the sun to fill the place, and a bathtub. Most of the prisoners couldn’t pretend to such comfort.

“Have you come to tell me you’ll finally go to war?” That was the first question she asked. “Or do you mean to continue to sit in a chair doing nothing and staring at the empty Water Gardens?”

“I haven’t come to receive questions from you. I’m not the one who murdered an innocent girl. What would you say if I murdered Tyene? Or Obella? Or Elia?”

Horror came to Ellaria’s face. “You wouldn’t dare. You are weak. You’ll never do what’s necessary.”

“For Dorne, I will do whatever is necessary,” Doran replied. “What is the life of one of your daughters before the lives of thousands of people? My people. The people I swore to watch over and to care for. What do you think will be the first demand of Cersei Lannister when she will learn you assassinated her only daughter? She will ask for the head of one of your daughters if she is kind. And if she’s not, which is very possible, she will ask for the heads of all your daughters, and all Oberyn’s daughters. And yours as well.”

“And you would give her?” Her voice was full of scorn and hatred again.

“As I told you, what is the life of the eight daughters of Oberyn, and yours, compared to the thousands of lives I would save by preventing a conflict we are bound to lose.”

“You won’t dare.” She said on a convincing tone.

“Are you sure you want to test my determination? I wouldn’t if I were you. Your daughters are my nieces. I love them very much, but you share no blood with me. For their sake, I would hope to live a long and happy life if I were you.”

Uncertainty appeared again on the face of the woman who loved his brother, but Doran wasn’t over with her. “Tywin Lannister is dead. So are Robert Baratheon and Gregor Clegane, all those who had a hand in murdering Elia and her children. Even Joffrey, who was not yet born when Elia died. You saw the boy perish with your own eyes, clawing at his throat as he tried to draw a breath. Who else is there to kill? Did Myrcella need to die so the shade of Rhaenys could be at rest? Does Tommen need to die for Aegon’s shade as well? Have thousands of people to die so Oberyn could be avenged? Where does it end?”

“It ends in blood, as it began. It ends when Casterly Rock is cracked open, so the sun can shine on the maggots and the worms within. It ends with the utter ruin of Tywin Lannister and all his works.”

“The man died. His wretched son took his place. The same son who gave us Ser Gregor’s head.”

“After Oberyn died!” Ellaria yelled. Hotah tensed beside Doran, ready for action. “I was there when he died. You weren’t there when the Mountain crushed his head with his hands. I was! I saw him die! The man I loved. Your own brother.”

“You don’t need to remind me who he was. I know very well who he was. If you believe I did nothing to avenge Elia, then this means you know nothing of me. You pretend to know Oberyn, but you didn’t know him as I knew him, or as he knew me. He knew what I was doing.”

Ellaria looked questioningly at him. “What were you doing? You’ve been sitting in your chair for years, doing nothing.”

“That’s what you think. Oberyn was the snake, and I was the grass. But have you ever wondered why Oberyn could live like he lived? Travel through the world, taste the finest men and women there were, fight when he wanted and when he liked, drink as much as he wanted, have daughters with all the women he wanted? Do you know why he could be so unpredictable? It was because I was predictable. Because I was the grass that hid him. Because I was predictable in the eyes of all the Seven Kingdoms. Because I looked quiet, when in fact I conspired all these years to undermine Tywin Lannister’s influence and power.”

“By doing what? By sitting in a chair and looking at the sky?”

“By letting the Lannisters weaken themselves in the War of the Five Kings. I didn’t engage our people in this war because we had nothing to gain from that. I let the other houses ruin themselves in their conflicts for the Iron Throne. I accepted the betrothal of Trystane to Princess Myrcella so we could have a hostage that would make the Lannisters think twice before they attacked us. I kept our people safe and strong for when the time would come.”

“When the time would come?”

Doran sighed. “A good ruler never starts a war he cannot hope to win. The good general is not the one who can win all the battles, but the one who knows when he can fight and when he cannot. I was waiting for the good time to strike, nothing more, nothing less.”

“And when would that time be? You waited for twenty years.”

“Better to wait twenty years to get our revenge, than to seek it immediately and to get ourselves killed. Seeking something is quite useless when we can’t get it. And revenge means nothing when all our people are dead.” Doran paused, choosing well his words before he spoke. “There is someone across the Narrow Sea. Someone who has the same enemies than us. The Lannisters, the Baratheons, the Starks. She was going to come to Westeros. With her forces allied to ours, we would have been able to defeat the Lannisters, and to get the revenge we wanted. A revenge we couldn’t hope to have only with our armies. I never told Oberyn, but he knew I was preparing something. He understood I would never let my sister’s murder go unpunished.”

Some realization seemed to come on Ellaria’s face. “Myrcella was meant to be a way to pressure the Lannisters? When this… friend would come?”

“Yes. And if you hadn’t killed her, we could have used her when time would have come. But now she’s dead. And our friend across the Narrow Sea is not coming yet. What do you think the Lannisters will do when they’ll learn we killed their princess? I could send them your head, but that wouldn’t be enough. They would ask for Tyene’s head too at least. And I’m not going to give it to them. They will declare war upon us as soon as they learn what happened to Princess Myrcella.
They will march against us with the full power of the Reach, the Westerlands, King’s Landing and the Stormlands. Do you really think we can fight that many enemies and get out of it victorious? Or alive? Who will support us? The Tullys, clinging to life while hiding in their fortresses? The Northerners, stuck with the coming winter? Stannis Baratheon, who’s at the other side of the world? The Arryns, who hide behind their mountains and refuse to be involved in this war in any way? What do you think the Lannisters will do to your children when they take Sunspear? Will you still like the taste of revenge when you’ll see the dead bodies of your four girls and their sisters hanging from the walls?"

Oberyn’s lover was now playing with her fingers and looked around for a moment. “Why didn’t you tell us? I wouldn’t have done anything if I was aware?”

“And you would have told all of it to your daughters. And they would have told it to their other sisters. They would have said it to their lovers and their friends, and these friends would have told their friends, and so on. My plans needed to be kept secret. When they see the grass moving, people are afraid. I needed to remain unmoving in appearance so the viper could strike in time.”

“What are you going to do now?”

“We’re not ready yet. We need more time. We cannot hold against the Tyrells and the Lannisters united. I will hide the princess’s death for as long as I can, but sooner or later, the Crown will discover the truth. We cannot delay things indefinitely anymore. I will send Tyene to King’s Landing, just like Nymeria. Obara will go to Oldtown. You will remain here in this cell, and the other Sand Snakes will remain here under guard as well. I will allow you to have some time with your daughters every day. I can even arrange for you to have a larger common cell. You will serve as a gage so the others may perform their tasks well.”

“What tasks?”

“I’m afraid I can’t tell you. You know why. You want revenge for Oberyn? You’ll have it, but not with destruction of Dorne as a price. If the Sand Snakes play their parts well, everything will be alright.”

“And if everything doesn’t go as you planned?”

“Then you should pray, and regret you killed the Princess Myrcella. If you hadn’t killed her, I wouldn’t be obliged to take such risks. If you have need of anything, ask my men. They’ll see that you are satisfied.”

Doran left, helped by Hotah like always. He was stuck to this wheelchair most of the time. He couldn’t walk without the help of someone else and high doses of milk of the poppy. However, that didn’t mean he couldn’t be dangerous. Unbowed, Unbent, Unbroken. Despite being attached to the chair, Doran was still the three things the Martell’s words said they were. After visiting Ellaria, Doran went to see the first of his nieces, Tyene. She was the one who poisoned and thus caused the death of the princess. After dealing with the mind of the revolt, it was always better to deal with the sword.

The young woman rose as soon as he entered her own cell. “Where are my sisters?”

“They are all here, and well,” Doran reassured her. “Except Sarella who is still in Oldtown as far as I know.”

“Myrcella wasn’t even born when your aunt died, and she had nothing to do with your father’s death in Ser Gregor’s hands. You killed an innocent girl. Your father would never have approved that. We may have had our differences, Oberyn and I, but we agreed on many things all the same. And one of our shared views was that we don’t kill little girls in Dorne.”

“Little girl, my eye. She was almost a woman.”

“That doesn’t change anything to the fact she had nothing to do with your father’s death, and that Oberyn would have disapproved killing her. You dishonored your father with what you did. You committed atrocities he would never have done or approved. You brought us to the low level of our enemies. You acted in no better way than Tywin Lannister.”

“My father died. I avenged him.”

“And do you feel better? Did killing Myrcella bring your father back? Did it kill Cersei Lannister? Or Ser Kevan? Or the Imp? Did it kill anyone who may have a hand in Oberyn’s death? Or in Elia’s death?”

“At least, they will know what it costs to kill Dornishmen.”

“And they will declare war upon us.”

“Good. I will be waiting for them. We will fight. And we will avenge my father for real.”

“No,” Doran denied. “We will fight, and we will be defeated. The historians of the Seven Kingdoms and the Targaryen monarchs have grown the number of our troops so their failed conquests wouldn’t look as shameful, but that doesn’t change the reality. We don’t have the men to defeat the Lannisters, the Tyrells and the Baratheons together. There is no vengeance to get in a war we cannot win, and you may just have sentenced tens of thousands men, women and children to support a horrible war. A war we can no longer escape.”

“That’s all too good. Finally, you’ll get out of this chair and fight instead of doing nothing.”

I have been sitting in this chair and doing everything to avenge my sister and her children for twenty years. “There will be a war. We won’t be able to avoid it. You precipitated this war with your stupidity, that’s all. But since you caused this, you will also make sure we win this war.” Doran took a threatening look. “Your sisters and your mother will be kept here. As long as you do what I order you, nothing will happen to them. And if you do as I say, you will get the revenge you want so much for your father, and I will get my own for my brother, my sister and her children.”

Tyene had a skeptical expression now. “What do you want me to do?”

“We are not ready for a war. I am waiting for friends to support us. I will hide Princess Myrcella’s death as long as I can. In the meantime, you will go to King’s Landing.”

“King’s Landing?”

“You are good to pose as a septa. You know the Seven-Pointed Star by heart. The Crown has troubles right now with a group of fanatics who call themselves the Sparrows in the capital. You will go there and infiltrate them. Befriend their leaders. Bring them to spread chaos in the city. When the time comes for war, the chaos in the capital will make it difficult for the Lannisters to move against us.”

She still looked uncertain. “Do I have your permission to kill any Lannister I could meet?”

“When the war is declared, you may kill as you want. But not before. For now, we hide in the grass, and you will hide too. Leave your hiding when the war starts. Then you will have the revenge you’re seeking.”

Doran went to see Nymeria next. She was the second daughter of Oberyn, and the daughter of a noblewoman from Volantis. She was as beautiful as she was deadly, just like Tyene. To the opposite of her half-sister, she didn’t stand up when Doran entered. She stayed quiet on her bed.

“You leave for King’s Landing.” Doran went straight this time. He didn’t feel the necessity to repeat what he already said to Tyene or Ellaria to Nym.

“Well, that’s not something I expected. I thought you would execute us yourself.”

“I would never execute you. You are my nieces. My own blood. And I wouldn’t send you to be killed either. You will go in King’s Landing to occupy the vacant seat Tywin Lannister granted to your father on the small council. You are better than all your sisters for politics.”

She rose now. “You want me to work with the people who murdered my father and his sister?”

“Just like your father did. Yes. But more than everything, I want you to do in the Red Keep what Tyene will do in the streets. She’s leaving for the capital just like you while your other sisters will remain here under arrest. When the Lannisters will discover Myrcella was killed, I will tell them Tyene did this and make them believe I executed her. In the meantime, your sister will be spreading chaos in the streets of the capital.

I want you to do the same in Maegor’s Holdfast. Undermine the alliance between the Lannisters and the Tyrells. Make them up against each other. Put mistrust between the two families. When the news of Myrcella’s death will arrive, their alliance must be weakened. Only then we will be able to defeat them in a war. I will let you see your sister before you leave.”

The last of the Sand Snakes Doran had to talk with was Obara. Doran ordered her to go to Oldtown and to find her sister Sarella and try to convince her to come back. In fact, Doran mostly wanted to send Obara away from Dorne so she wouldn’t cause any trouble. When the war would start, he would summon her back to lead men. She would prove useful then, and Sarella may have uses as well. Doran visited his four other nieces, the youngest ones, last to reassure them and allowed them to visit their mother and their sisters who would remain behind.

Obara left secretly in the evening for Oldtown. Doran also had a conversation with Tyene and Nymeria before they left for the capital. Doran would send a raven to the king, explaining Oberyn’s daughter would take his place on the small council, and Nymeria would leave in a few days with an important retinue. Tyene would be part of the retinue, disguised as an itinerant septa, but would leave them as soon as they entered the capital to mix with the Sparrows. Doran gave them general tasks and more specific ones. They were to do exactly as he said and to let no one know about Myrcella’s death until time was ripe for war.

Later, when the night was about to fall and as Hotah was leading him to his chambers, Doran thought it was time to speak with his Captain of the Guard. “You feel responsible, Hotah. Don’t deny it, I know you do.”

“You charged me to protect the princess, my prince, and I failed. She died.” Doran could perceive the sadness and the regret in the voice of the Norvosi. Instead of leaving with Mellario when she went back to Norvos, he stayed behind. His loyalty to Doran was unquestioning.

“We both failed her, Hotah. I should have taken more precautions against my nieces and Ellaria. Let me share my part of the burden.”

“You gave me this burden when you ordered me to protect the little princess, my prince. I’m the one who failed her. And I failed you at the same occasion.”

“No, Hotah. You didn’t fail me.”

“Yes, I did, my prince.”

There was no way to convince the bearded priest he wasn’t responsible of this. Serve, Obey, Protect. Simple vows for a simple man, the tall man once told him. They arrived at Doran’s chamber. Hotah helped him to get into his bed. As Doran took place to sleep, Caleotte arrived with milk of the poppy.

“For the sleep, my prince,” the maester simply said.

“Thank you, Caleotte. Could you fetch my son? I would like to speak with him before I fall asleep.”

“Yes, my prince.”

The maester left and Doran was alone with his captain. Hotah stood there on guard like always. He wouldn’t leave before Doran gave him the order. He knew the Norvosi would sharpen his axe before he slept once in his small chamber, but for now he stayed with Doran. He needed his presence, not for his personal protection, but more as a moral support. He would need it. The man suffering from the gout and the bearded priest stayed there together in silence, the prince sitting in his bed as pain journeyed through his body, the guard standing ready for anything that would put the life of the prince in danger. Doran looked at the milk of the poppy in the little bowl next to his bed. After looking at it for a moment, considering drinking it, he chose not to. He needed all his senses for the discussion to come.

Trystane arrived. His eyes were still red from the tears he shed for the princess. Doran knew the pain of the gout was nothing compared to the pain his son was feeling right now. Trystane stood before his father, his head bowed.

“Father.”

“Trystane.”

“Father, I apologize for what I said yesterday. You’re right. I cannot kill them. I cannot kill my cousins.”

“No. You cannot kill them.” Doran kept his voice firm. He didn’t want to be imperious with his son right now, but he would rule Dorne one day. He couldn’t allow his son to put desires of vengeance before their people. The Sand Snakes did it, and the consequences could be terrible for the whole country. All the same, he felt how it was difficult for his son to renounce it. Doran was never able to renounce his will to avenge Elia. He wondered if his son would succeed where he failed.

“Myrcella is dead.” It was obvious Trystane was trying to fight back the tears that threatened to leave his eyes, but Doran couldn’t blame him.

“Do you remember when your mother left?” Trystane nodded to mean he remembered. “I kept doing my duties as Prince of Dorne despite everything. Not because I wanted to, but because I had to. All I wanted was to lock myself in my chambers to see no one, or to sail across the Narrow Sea to beg her to come back. But I didn’t. I couldn’t abandon the people of Dorne, not even for the woman I loved and for the mother of my children. I still wish things had been different, that I could have convinced your mother to stay. She didn’t die, but I lost her. Just like you lost Myrcella.”

Trystane walked to a chair and sat in it. He looked utterly destroyed, and Doran knew he was. “What are you going to do with the Sand Snakes? And Ellaria?”
“Obara already left for Oldtown. She’s going to find Sarella. Tyene and Nymeria will leave for King’s Landing very soon. Ellaria and the other daughters of Oberyn will remain here under guard.”

Trystane looked at his father, astonished. “You’re sending them away? You’re releasing them? After what they did?”

Doran looked at his legs. “The Lannisters will learn about Myrcella’s death sooner or later. I need them to carry out special missions. Tyene and Nymeria will spread chaos in the capital and between the Tyrells and the Lannisters. This could make the difference between survival and destruction for Dorne.”

“They killed Myrcella! She was a girl! And I loved her! How can you tell Dorne needs them?”

“I can tell this because it’s the truth, my son. Remember you’re speaking to your father and your prince.”

Trystane calmed down. “Sorry, Father. But… it’s unfair. Myrcella did nothing wrong. She was a sweet girl. Nothing like her monster of a brother. I will never forgive them what they did. Ellaria, Tyene, Obara, Nymeria… I will never forgive them.”

“Neither will I. Neither did I ever forgive the Lannisters and the Baratheons for killing Elia and my nephew and niece. Neither Oberyn could ever forgive them. We cannot forgive that, and we cannot forget it. But we must think about Dorne first. And right now this is what I need you to do. You cannot allow yourself to think about vengeance against your cousins during your journey.”

“My journey? What are you talking about?” Confusion was plain on his son’s face.

“I sent Obara to Oldtown and Tyene and Nymeria to King’s Landing. I’m sending you somewhere else, across the Narrow Sea, to find allies that will allow us to defeat the Lannisters once and for all, and to save our country.”

“Where?”

“In Slavor’s Bay. You will leave for Planky Town tomorrow, pretending to visit Lord Dalt at Lemonwood. From there you will take a ship that will bring you to Meereen. There you will meet Daenerys Targaryen and offer her the spears of Dorne to support her claim on the Iron Throne. You will convince her to come to Westeros at once, and you will bring her a proposal to unite House Martell to House Targaryen through marriage.”

Trystane’s facial expression showed he slowly understood what Doran meant. He jumped from his chair. “You can’t be serious! Myrcella just died and you want me to marry another woman right away, like she never existed!”

“Sit, my son.” Doran spoke quietly. He would need to choose his words well for what would come. “Trystane, I must be honest with you. I should have been before. I should have been before. I should have told you at the very moment I saw you develop feelings for your betrothed.”

“What do you mean, Father?”

“I never meant to have you married to Princess Myrcella. I accepted the alliance Tyrion Lannister offered us to keep Dorne out of the War of the Five Kings. But I never wanted you to marry Myrcella Baratheon. The betrothal was never supposed to end with marriage. I’ve been planning to marry you to the last daughter of the Mad King for years now. This was always my intention after your brother Quentyn died. Your betrothal with Myrcella was only an act.”
Doran then explained everything to his son. For the first time in twenty years, Doran shared his plans with someone. Not even Oberyn had known about this. His brother had known he was preparing something, but he had never known exactly what Doran plotted all these years. He made a pact long ago to marry Quentyn to Daenerys Targaryen and to support Viserys Targaryen when he would come back to Westeros. Oberyn had been the one to sign the secret pact, though he had ignored if his brother would really fulfill it. Now that Quentyn was dead, it fell on Trystane to honor the contract. He would be King of Westeros and Prince of Dorne one day. Daenerys would come to Westeros and Dorne would support her claim. But they needed her to come immediately, and to convince her that if she stayed too long in Essos, Dorne could be defeated and she wouldn’t be able to take back her father’s throne without the support of the south.

Trystane was agape before everything his father told him. Doran understood it was a lot to take at the same time. He explained it very carefully, wanting his son to understand why he did this and how. When he was over with his explanations, Trystane looked at him, pained.

“You would never have let me marry Myrcella?”

Doran shook his head, almost closing his eyes. He feared his son’s reaction. “I’m sorry, Trystane. Never. You are a prince of Dorne. She was no fit to marry you.”

“Myrcella was a princess, just as much as Daenerys Targaryen when you made this pact.”

“No, Trystane. Myrcella is no princess. I have always been loyal to the Targaryens. House Baratheon has no right on the Iron Throne, no more than House Lannister. Myrcella is no princess here in Dorne in the eyes of the Targaryens. She is not even a lady. The rumors are true.”

“What rumors?” Dorn could see fear in his son’s eyes. Trystane surely knew what was coming.

“Myrcella is not Robert Baratheon’s daughter. Her father is Jaime Lannister, the Kingslayer. She is of noble birth, but she is a bastard. Even worse, she is born of incest. I could never have let you marry her.”

“But… but… that’s impossible. That can’t be.”

“My sources are clear. Lord Varys investigated on Robert’s bastard children. They all have black hair and blue eyes like him, and every marriage between Lannisters and Barathens produced children with the Baratheon’s features. Myrcella had the green eyes and the golden hair of her mother and her father. What Stannis Baratheon said was true. Everything is true. My own men confirmed the information from the Spider.”

“No. No… No.” Trystane took his face into his hands. Doran knew that this time he was really crying. He wished he could reach his son. What have I done? Is revenge worth all this?

Doran allowed his son to weep as long as he wanted. When Trystane could finally get his face into the light, his eyes were red from the water they still contained. Doran resumed. “You must leave tomorrow. You have to reach Meereen as quickly as possible. The fate of thousands of Dornishmen may depend on your mission.”

Doran didn’t know what else to tell his son. Trystane rose from his seat. Doran could decipher a mix of despair and hatred in his son’s eyes. Right now he looked very much like his mother.

“You lied to me. All these years, you lied to me.”

It was no question, and anyway Doran couldn’t have refuted it. “Yes, I did. I wish I hadn’t.” He didn’t look at his son. He couldn’t look at these eyes who came from Mellario.
“Would you have killed her?”

Doran gathered the courage to look back and to support the eyes. The gout looked so easy to endure right now. “No. We don’t kill little girls here in Dorne. I never lied about it.”

“And yet you take Oberyn’s youngest daughters in hostage. And you send those who killed Myrcella to do your dirty work. You let them escape punishment. You always taught me about justice. Is that justice?”

Doran averted his eyes again. “It’s what needs to be done if we want justice.” For Elia. For Vengeance. Justice. Fire and Blood.

“I don’t call it justice. I call it indifference.” A silence fell in the room, a silence that lingered for a very long time. Doran felt the eyes of his son on him, but he couldn’t return his gaze. Finally his son broke the silence. “I’ll leave tomorrow. And pray for that I don’t meet any of my cousins before a long time. Because when I see them, I will deliver justice. For Myrcella.”

His son left. Doran got back his eyes on him just in time to see Trystane leave. He had sent his last son on a dangerous mission. Would he come back alive? Doran didn’t know. He remained there in Hotah’s company. The priest had stood still all this time, as if he ignored the conversation that had been going on. Doran knew he heard everything, and that Hotah was worried. His stance may be rigid, but Doran could decipher the guard’s emotions.

“Do you think I did well, Hotah?”

The Norvosi looked at him, a stern face with sorry eyes. “It is not my place to question your decisions, my prince.”

Doran wished Hotah could tell him if he had been right or not. No matter the answer, it would have brought him some reassurance. He wished Mellario was there too, though he knew very well she would disapprove. But Mellario was far away, and Hotah would never criticize him for his actions. Probably he couldn’t criticize them. Doran whined at the pain through his legs, though it wasn’t the worst.

“Captain, fetch the maester. I need to speak with him.”

Hotah bowed and let Doran alone. He came back a few minutes later with the man who had served as maester of Sunspear ever since the time Doran’s mother ruled Dorne. Caleotte worried about Doran’s state, but Doran pushed the subject aside. He refused to drink the milk before he gave his final instructions to the maester. He told him everything that needed to be told to Trystane before he left on the morning, and everything his son would need for his journey. Doran wouldn’t see his son before he left. That would do no good for both of them. The maester bowed when he left with Doran’s orders. Doran gave orders to Hotah about the protection of Ellaria and Oberyn’s children who would stay in Dorne, then sent him to sleep. The bearded priest deserved to sleep. The Prince of Dorne drank the milk of the poppy next to his bed and fell asleep. In his dreams, they were all there. Elia, Mellario, Quentyn, Oberyn, all those he loved. All those he lost. In the semi-consciousness he was, Doran prayed Trystane wouldn’t come to join them.

Chapter End Notes

Sorry for everyone who wanted me to keep Myrcella alive. However, with the absence of Jaime and Bronn to fight the Sand Snakes, that changed a few things in Dorne. The Sand Snakes are unlikely to kill Doran and Trystane the way they did in the show. I don’t think the showrunners did their work well with killing Hotah, Doran and Trystane. That seemed so unrealistic. Doran will be more like in the books now.

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Okay, the last time we were in Casterly Rock, Sansa just received news that Arya was married to Ramsay Bolton. I'm afraid this chapter is not a happy one. However, it starts a new part of the story.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

“Okay, the last time we were in Casterly Rock, Sansa just received news that Arya was married to Ramsay Bolton. I'm afraid this chapter is not a happy one. However, it starts a new part of the story.

For the fifteenth consecutive day, Tyrion had asked the question to Creylen, and the answer was still the same than the first day. He sighed, just like he did each time he received the negative answer, twice a day.

“I swear that I will warn you as soon as the raven will arrive. I check the rockery regularly and read every scroll as soon as it arrives. You'll be informed the moment the reply will come.”

“I would have liked to be informed about the marriage of my sister-in-law when the new arrived, not a week later,” Tyrion replied angrily.

Creylen closed his eyes. Tyrion knew he regretted to not have read the infamous message immediately, but right now it couldn’t make Tyrion more sympathetic to the maester. Sansa had locked herself in their chamber for the last two weeks and no one managed to convince her to leave them. She scarcely ate, rarely left her bed, seldom talked and spent most of her time looking blankly when she wasn’t crying and sobbing. Tyrion felt powerless just like when her brother and her mother were killed.

Things had been so good between Tyrion and his wife ever since they arrived at the Rock, especially during the last month. All of it was gone now, destroyed by the Boltons. Tyrion wanted to chop the heads of all the Boltons only for this, and he wanted to revive his father so he could kill him himself. None of this would have happened if his father hadn’t organized the Red Wedding and given the North to Roose Bolton. Just when his relationship with Sansa really flowered, it had to be crushed by his father’s doings. Even dead, Tywin Lannister was ruining his life.

“I know how you feel, Tyrion. But all we can do for now is to wait.” Creylen’s words looked foreign to his ears.

“How could you know how I feel?” Tyrion spoke harshly.

“Because you have the same attitude than when you came back from this journey all over the Westerlands. You acted the same way back then when you visited me.”

Creylen’s words didn’t make him happier. He remembered this journey when he was sixteen. It was on his way back to Casterly Rock that he met Tysha. “The maesters are supposed to advise the lords they serve. Do you have any advice to give me, Creylen?”
The maester he spent so much time with when he was young gave him a sorry look. “I’m not married. But if I was at your place Tyrion, considering what happened the last time, I would stay close to my wife. I would try to be there for her.”

Tyrion nodded and left the maester’s rooms. Creylen knew Tyrion very well. Tyrion was the one who spent more time than anyone else with the maester when he was a lad. Being a dwarf, what other choice did he have but to study and learn? Tyrion reflected on his advice. He wanted to spend more time with his wife, but like the last time when she lost who she thought to be the last living members of her family, he didn’t know what he could do. His family put House Bolton at the head of the North. If Arya Stark was married to Ramsay Bolton, it was in part his own fault. He remembered the little girl from Winterfell. She looked more like a Stark than Sansa with her brown hair and her grey eyes. He saw her eyeing her brothers sparring in the courtyards quite often, and saw Jon Snow ruffling her hair once. The bastard looked much closer to her than Sansa. Even on the tapestry he ordered for Sansa’s name day, Tyrion told to have Jon Snow ruffling the wolf girl while she held a sword. Tyrion had thought for a moment sending a raven to Castleblack to warn the Lord Commander about his sister’s fate, but in the end he chose not to. It would do no good if Jon Snow rode to Winterfell and broke his vows in a foolish attempt to save his little sister. Sansa would never forgive him if he caused the death of another brother. And Tyrion didn’t want Jon Snow to blame him too for Arya Stark’s captivity. Sansa wasn’t blaming Tyrion, not openly, but he felt he was to blame all the same, and he didn’t want the lad to hold him responsible for this. It was a selfish thought, but he couldn’t help but feel that way.

Tyrion went back to his solar where he tried to work. Lord Reginald Lannister of Lannisport still sent him reports about his son Serion’s attempts to cause trouble into his family. Yroan’s reports on the mining activities were waiting for him to examine them. Tyrion tried to look at them, but after a few minutes he pushed them away. How could he focus on such petty matters like gold digging when the sister of his wife was being raped by a psychopath? When his own wife spent her whole days weeping? Tyrion should be with her, consoling her, or at least trying to do so. What kind of husband was he? He read the scrolls from the bannermen who returned the ravens he sent two weeks ago, but as long as he didn’t have the answer he was waiting for, it was useless.

Tyrion left his solar, but as he walked to his rooms, his courage to face his wife faded and he found himself walking to the Stone Garden. He didn’t know why his legs brought him there, but he found himself in the godswood all the same. He walked through it to the dead weirwood tree and found himself before it. He remained there, looking at the huge thing with eyes and mouth. He had stopped to believe in the Seven a long time ago, and despite Sansa’s faith in the gods of her father, Tyrion didn’t believe in them. But he needed to release his anger and his frustration, and who better to release them on than the gods who pretended themselves to be good.

“Can you tell me what is just in that? Perhaps I’m a monster. I killed my mother when I came into the world. I wished my father and my sister dead more often that I can recall. I had people executed because they disobeyed the laws of a mad king. I killed thousands of people to defend a king who didn’t deserve to live. I have blood on my hands. If you want to punish me, then so be it. I probably deserve it. But Sansa… she did nothing. She is innocent. All she did for years was to suffer because of monsters, and right when she starts to be happy again… Can you tell me, if you gods are so just, then me why is the world so full of injustice? Why?” Tyrion looked at the face of the tree. “TELL ME WHAT IS JUST IN THAT!”

Tyrion just stood there, looking at the face who didn’t answer. If there were gods, they didn’t listen to prayers. They only watched people suffer, and they did nothing about that. Tyrion didn’t see why he should pray for such gods, no matter their names. Gods who allowed innocent girls to be beaten, raped and killed didn’t deserve to be worshipped. Tyrion turned around and left the stupid tree behind him. That was just a tree with a face, nothing more.
Tyrion noticed the wind got stronger for a moment. He thought he heard something behind him. I rode. Tyrion turned and looked at the weirwood tree. There was no sound. Surely he mistook the wind for something else. But he heard another sound from the opposite direction.

“Uncle Tyrion?”

Tyrion looked to find his uncle Gerion’s daughter before him. “Ah, Joy. Your name couldn’t be more fitting than in this moment. Joy is what I would need right now.”

She was looking at him with a worried face. “I heard you shouting. Is there something wrong?”

Joy was already taller than him, but Tyrion could see she was afraid. He sighed. He didn’t want Joy to be afraid because he was angry at everything because of Sansa’s despair. “Sorry. That’s nothing. Just a little anger I needed to spit out. I’m not angry at you, or at anyone in particular.”

“How is Sansa?” Joy asked. “I didn’t see her for days. I tried to invite her to pray with me, but she wouldn’t. She wasn’t even there for my name day.”

The Red Wedding consequences were repeating. Sansa stopped to pray, both to the Seven and to the Old Gods. And it was true she didn’t come to the celebrations for Joy’s name day. After weeks of preparations, Sansa hadn’t wanted to assist the festivities she organized herself. Everyone else had been present, including Tyrion, but Sansa’s absence had been noticed very much. It hadn’t been the same without her. Joy didn’t know why Sansa remained hidden in her rooms day and night. Tyrion thought it was better to hide it to her. She had become so close of Sansa during the previous months and she was so sweet and innocent that Tyrion didn’t want her to be destroyed when she would hear what happened to Arya Stark.

“Sansa hasn’t been feeling well recently. I’m afraid she’ll stay in her chambers for a long time.”

Joy looked sad. “I’ll pray for her. Cerenna told me she cried all day. Blessed are those who mourn, they shall be comforted.”

Joy went her way and knelt before the tree. Tyrion recognized these words from the Book of the Father. It was one of the beatitudes. Contrarily to him, Joy still had faith. Tyrion hoped she would keep it along with her innocence. He walked away, leaving his cousin to pray for Sansa. If he had been less than sixteen, he would probably have joined her, but Tyrion was no more the lad who dreamed of being High Septon. He was the Lord of Casterly Rock, a dwarf, and a husband who couldn’t manage to console his wife. Tyrion walked to his and Sansa’s rooms, for real this time.

Two guards stood before the doors. They let Tyrion enter without question. Slowly, fearing what would come next, Tyrion walked to their bedchamber where he knew his wife was. A handmaiden was staying with her all the time, just in case she would have a new panic attack or try something foolish. Tyrion sometimes feared Sansa would try to jump from their balcony, just like she thought about jumping from a tower of the Red Keep after her father’s death. That was why the handmaiden always sat in a chair positioned on the way between the bed and the balcony.

When Tyrion entered the chamber, Sansa wasn’t alone with the handmaiden. She sat in their bed, her back against the headboard, the blankets covering her body up to her hips, wearing a nightgown, her eyes fixed straight in front of her, her look empty. His cousin Cerenna was there as well, trying to talk to her. There was a plate with food near the bed and Cerenna was trying to convince Sansa to swallow some lemon cakes. It looked exactly like in King’s Landing after the Red Wedding, and Tyrion didn’t feel any better than back in this time.

“You have to eat something, Sansa. I beg you.”
“I don’t want to eat.” Sansa’s voice could have been the one of a dead woman. Tyrion felt Cerenna’s pleas would be useless. His cousin noticed his presence at this moment and rose to greet him, just like the handmaiden.

“My lord, tell her she must eat.” Cerenna’s request really gave him the impression to be back one year ago. He remembered Shae, and that made him feel even worse.

“My lady, she’s right. You need to eat,” Tyrion tried. Sansa looked at him for a moment, then stared again before her. Tyrion wondered what she could be looking at. He turned to Cerenna and the other girl. “Please leave us alone. I would like to be alone with my wife.”

Cerenna and the handmaiden left. The best friend Sansa made since she arrived at Casterly Rock closed the door behind her. Tyrion was alone with his wife who still stared blankly at nothing. Tyrion advanced awkwardly to his wife. She spent most of her days in the bed, doing nothing, barely eating anything. Creylen had come to examine her state a few times. Not only Sansa barely ate, but what few she ate threatened to be vomited only a few minutes later. He could only advise she needed to eat more. Sansa had lost weight again, her body getting thinner. She looked more fragile than Tyrion ever saw her, and that only made him love her more. She’s heartbroken, her sister was forced to marry a psychopath, and here I am, reflecting how she looks beautiful in these moments.

Her right hand was lying on the covers. Slowly and hesitantly, Tyrion took it into his own. The last time he did it in King’s Landing, she had pulled away. This time she didn’t, but she didn’t turn to look at him either. He climbed on the bed to kneel beside her.

“Sansa.” He called for her, softly, but got no reaction. What could he do? “Sansa, you know I can’t let you starve. No more than the last time.”

He regretted immediately what he said. That could only bring more dark memories. But Sansa didn’t react. She kept staring right before her, unflinching, pale. All Tyrion could do was to stay there, her hand in his own, looking at her from time to time, hoping she would do something, say something. He could only stay there and nothing more.

“Jeyne used to call her Horseface,” she said after what looked like an eternity. “She said it in a hushed voice, but Arya could always hear her. I laughed with Jeyne almost each time she said it, and in the evening I would find my bed stinking.” It wasn’t difficult for Tyrion to know why Sansa’s bed was stinking after she laughed at her sister. Sheepshift, Sansa once called it. He smiled a little, but Sansa didn’t. Her eyes were still hollow.

“Do you know what was the last thing I told her?” Her voice was trembling. “I told her she was horrible. I said she should marry Hodor. That she was just like him. Stupid, hairy and ugly. I told her they should have killed her instead of Lady.”

Sansa burst into tears. They were streaming all over her face as she leaned forward. Tyrion managed to put a hand on her shoulder before she could fall on the bedcover and held her the best he could. Slowly, he led her face on his shoulder. She sobbed for a very long time, and all Tyrion could do was to hold her. There were times he thought Sansa tried to say something, but she didn’t. She only kept weeping.

Tyrion didn’t know for how long they remained in that position, but in the end they were both lying in the bed, Sansa with her head resting in his lap while he passed his hand through her red hair. She normally liked it when he did this, but right now nothing seemed able to console her or lift up her mood. Sansa continued to cry, though silently. Sometimes a sob escaped her mouth. They were late in the afternoon when Tyrion had come to their chamber and he wasn’t hungry. Even wine didn’t have much lure for him right now. He stayed with Sansa, only leaving the bed a moment when night came to put on nightclothes. He had started again to wear them after the new about Arya’s wedding arrived. A week after he and Sansa began to share their bed as man and wife, Sansa had stopped to sleep with clothes and Tyrion had imitated her. Tyrion sometimes regretted he couldn’t take her clothes off anymore. But after they learned what happened to her sister, they started again to sleep with clothes.

Sansa managed to fall asleep during the night. Tyrion on his side couldn’t sleep. His mind was working. He cursed his father, Roose Bolton and his bastard son, the morons in King’s Landing, his own family, the northern lords, and himself. They were responsible for what happened. He even cursed Jaime who pushed the Stark boy from the window. What was he doing, fucking Cersei in that damn broken tower? Did he really expect no one to see them? Without the fall of Brandon Stark, Joffrey would never have sent a man to kill him, and all this war and all its consequences would never have happened. Tyrion could almost forgive everything to his brother, but right in this moment he felt he couldn’t forgive him. His brother started the chain of events that led to the War of the Five Kings, and this war shattered Sansa’s family before it almost destroyed it. And now, the last outcome of this war was the marriage of her only sister to a monster even worse than Joffrey.

Tyrion looked at his wife. While sleeping, Sansa seemed calm, but he knew her sleep was troubled by nightmares. He had to calm her by holding her firmly in his arms a few times this night. Her lips didn’t display the smile she had most of the time while asleep. Tyrion had wanted so much for her to be happy, and all that was broken by a few words brought by a raven. He saw the remnants of a tear on the corner of her left eye. He had to find a way. He couldn’t let things go like this.

When dawn was about to appear at the horizon, Tyrion left the bed and rested his wife’s head softly on the pillows, hoping she would have a few more hours of sleep. Even now, he could only marvel at her beauty. He passed a hand through a strand of her hair and kissed her brow. He missed the nights before the dire new arrived, when they would kiss, fondle, lick and fuck. He remembered how she moaned and whimpered the first time they did it. And he remembered how she screamed his name the next times. It had only been two weeks ago, and it already felt like it happened in another life. Perhaps all that had only been a dream. There was always a part of him that feared all of this was only a dream.

Tyrion left their rooms after ordering a handmaiden to look after Sansa. He walked to the top of the castle to make his first daily visit to Creylen. Like always, he entered without knocking. Creylen wasn’t in his solar and the door of his bedchamber was closed. He was probably still asleep. Tyrion decided after thinking about it to not disturb the maester. It wasn’t because of Creylen if Sansa was spending all her days crying in her bed or if Arya Stark was probably being raped right now. The vision of another rape a long time ago came to Tyrion’s mind. He pushed it away with great difficulty. In the end, he climbed the stairs to the rockery with the ravens. Creylen showed him how to take care of ravens when he was young, back when the maester still hoped to send him to the Citadel. Tywin Lannister hadn’t even wanted his son to become a maester. Not even the Citadel was to laugh at him for his second son.

The ravens started to croak when Tyrion entered. He remembered Creylen told him the ravens were quieter with people they were used to, and Tyrion wasn’t one of them. He saw that two ravens had a scroll attached to their feet. They probably arrived during the night if Creylen hadn’t taken care of them yet. Tyrion detached the messages, not without a few scratches from the unhappy birds. One came from the Golden Tooth and bore the seal of House Lefford. The other one came from King’s Landing. It had the seal of the Hand of the King.

Tyrion left the rockery and the raven’s cries. Quickly he broke the seal of a first scroll when he arrived in the maester’s solar. He realized it wasn’t the good one. Lady Alysanne Lefford only wrote to tell him the preparations were going well at the Tooth. Tyrion cast it aside and opened the other scroll. He read the few words his uncle put in it. For the first time in two weeks, Tyrion felt some pressure leaving his shoulders. He sighed in relief. He could take action now.

Tyrion went directly to Creylen’s chamber and drummed on the door for more than a minute until the old man opened it. He looked half-asleep, but he didn’t seem surprised to see Tyrion there. The Lord of Casterly Rock didn’t allow him to speak first.

“Kevan answered.” These two words meant everything. Creylen looked like he was waking up.

“He answered?”

“He did,” Tyrion confirmed.

“So?”

“He agreed. I need you to send ravens, and to write an important paper. Now.”

Creylen gathered his senses and was soon ready to work, sitting behind his solar. First Tyrion read out the paper he wanted him to prepare. The maester stopped in the middle of his writing, looking at him with a queer look.

“Tyrion, are you sure this is wise?”

“I was given full authority on this matter. Keep writing.”

Reluctantly, the maester went back to writing the words Tyrion recited. When it was over, he handed the parchment to Tyrion. The Lord of Casterly Rock ordered the maester to send ravens to many bannermen. Tyrion left with the paper and went to his solar. There, he wrote and signed many documents assigning functions, charges, responsibilities and instructions. He gave a look at his family’s accounts and resources, and to the resources accounts of all the Westerlands. While he fulfilled these tasks, he noticed the scroll that arrived a few days ago to confirm the wedding between Arya Stark and Ramsay Bolton. Tyrion put it in a safe place.

At the end of the morning, he went to see his aunt, Lady Genna Frey. She was busy giving orders to her husband like she ordered her handmaidens all around when he entered their rooms. Once Tyrion told her they had to talk, she sent both Ser Emmon and the girls outside. Tyrion was alone with his aunt. He knew that would be the hardest part, but he had to do it. He had no choice. He stood against his father, so he would be able to stand before his aunt as well. Without saying anything, he handed her the paper Creylen prepared a few hours ago. Genna took it without question and read. Her face showed no emotion, but she was obviously unhappy when she talked.

“So, that’s how you thank your aunt for her help?”

“Don’t get me wrong, Genna. What I’m doing is for House Lannister as well as for the Realm.”

“Really? You strip Emmon and my children from their rights over the Riverlands and you say it’s for the good of the family?”

“Genna, you were always almost clever as my father. You know very well Riverrun is a poisoned gift for you and your children. They bear the name of the people who broke the guest rights and murdered people under their roof. Everyone in the Seven Kingdoms hate them, and the river lords more than the rest. If there was to be another war, and we should expect one in the future, if not in the near future, who do you think the Lords of the Riverlands will fight for? For Emmon? For Cleos? The Freys inspire nothing good. The other lords have no love, no respect, no fear of them. They’re not able to hold the Riverlands on their own. Riverrun, Seagard, Raventree, they all resist their rule.
Do you think Emmon or Cleos will be able to enforce their rule? Especially since Edmure Tully has a son?"

Genna nodded faintly after a silence. “I know that very well, Tyrion. I’m not blind. And even without everything you said, there is still Robin Arryn. He’s the son of Lysa Tully and thus has a claim on Riverrun just like Lord Edmure’s son. I know Riverrun is a dangerous gift. Especially now with Freys dying all over the Riverlands because of this Brotherhood Without Banners. I would rather receive Darry than Riverrun. We could marry Ty to Amerei. But Riverrun was given to me and Emmon and it’s the only thing I have for my children.”

“I will never abandon your children. I may not have liked my father, but I understand like him how family is important. If there’s a lesson I kept from him, it’s this one.” Tyrion tried to take a reassuring voice.

“Is that necessary?” There was no plea in Genna’s voice. It was a simple question, nothing more.

“We need to pacify the Riverlands,” Tyrion explained. “For the long term. We cannot pacify this kingdom with House Frey ruling it. The other lords will never follow a Frey. That’s necessary.”

Genna shrugged. She signed the paper. “I’ll have to force Emmon to sign it. He will complain, but I’ll force him to. He will comply. That’s not as if he was anytime soon to get the castle anyway.”

“Thank you, Genna.” Tyrion’s aunt made a little move with her head to show she appreciated the thanks.

“Don’t you think you could grant Darry to Ty? He would only have to marry Amerei Frey instead of Lancel.”

“It’s already decided, dear aunt. Daven will marry Lady Amerei. I prefer to limit the links between our house and the Freys. If Daven is to marry a Frey, better the one who’ll give him Darry. And I don’t want to give Walder Frey the pleasure to have a lesser branch of his house in Darry.”

“You’re probably right,” Genna said, resigned. “Best to have the Lannister name on Darry than the Frey name. I’ve been carrying this name for decades, and not a single second I liked it. You should go now. You have many things to prepare.”

Indeed, Tyrion had a lot of things to prepare. “My lady.”

“My lord.”

Tyrion left, letting his aunt with the pleasant task to have Ser Emmon sign the paper by which he would give up his rights over Riverrun. The Hand of the King gave Tyrion full power to put an end to the war in the Riverlands, and Tyrion would use this authority. He would put an end to this farce once and for all. The Freys had proven to be incompetent fools, unable to restore peace in the kingdom the king granted to them, and anyway they were turncloaks, traitors and oathbreakers. Tyrion would put someone better at the head of the Riverlands.

Tyrion then went to visit the next person he needed to talk with. She was now sitting on a chair, looking outside the windows, but away from the balcony. Tyrion told the servants to not allow Sansa close enough to it. Tyrion dismissed the handmaiden that kept her company. When the girl had left, Sansa turned to face him for a moment before she looked away again. The corners of her mouth twitched an instant, as if she was trying to smile, but if she tried she failed miserably. Well, that’s a start.

“How are you?” The question he asked seemed unnatural.
“Fine.” He knew she wasn’t fine, but better to say we were in these circumstances. Tyrion approached her a little.

“Do you want something, Sansa? If you have need of anything, you only have to ask.”

“No. That’s alright.” Her voice was weak, but less than yesterday. Tyrion hoped it wasn’t temporary. For the first time since his trial, he would need Sansa for a very important task.

“Sansa, there’s something I must tell you.” He took a pause before he said it. Sansa was still staring at the sky. “I’m leaving.”

For the first time in two weeks, Sansa reacted to his words and looked back at him. “What?”

“I’m leaving Casterly Rock. The siege of Riverrun takes too much time, and there are two other strongholds that still resist in the Riverlands. I’m going to put an end to all of this before winter comes.” His wife’s eyes showed complete incomprehension. “Then I will march on the North.”

Sansa looked as if she just received a punch in the stomach. “You will… march on the North?” she asked incredulously.

Tyrion came right before her and gave her the scroll he received from King’s Landing this morning. “Kevan sent me this.” Sansa slowly took the message and started to read it. Her eyes were going from one side of the scroll to the other, incomprehension still plain over her face.

“How?” she just asked.

“Two days after I received the news about your sister, I wrote to Kevan and Tommen. I told them they had the choice between letting me handle the situation in the Riverlands and the North in my own way with their approval, or to see me do the same without their approval.”

Sansa returned her eyes to the paper and read aloud. “To Tyrion Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Lord of the Westerlands and Warden of the West. King Tommen Baratheon, the First of His Name, gives you all power and authority to end the fighting in the Riverlands and bring a lasting peace to this region. Once this duty is performed, you will march on the North to take it back from House Bolton. The Boltons will be stripped of all their lands and titles once the Riverlands are pacified. Do quickly before winter comes. Ser Kevan Lannister, Hand of the King.” Sansa’s eyes had widened. “But… How did you do it? Do they know?”

“I told them. They know what happened to your sister. Arya Stark can be considered a ward of the king, so Roose Bolton had no right to marry her to his son. And with the things Ramsay Bolton is probably doing… All this can be considered treason. The Boltons will be declared rebels to the Crown, but first we must put an end to the war in the Riverlands. Most of our forces are still at Riverrun. I’m gathering new levies, but that won’t be enough. The siege of Riverrun must end, and all the others too. Once it’s done, we will march on the North.”

Sansa was still looking at him in utter surprise, as if she couldn’t understand what was going on. “You… you’re going to…?”

Tyrion nodded. He walked to a chair and sat in it, facing his wife. “I cannot bring back the members of your family who are dead, Sansa. But if your sister Arya is alive, then I have to do something. I can’t just stay here doing nothing. My father started a war when I was arrested by your mother. If he did it for me, the family’s embarrassment, who would I be if I don’t do the same for your sister? And the Boltons slaughtered your family. I don’t want them to rule the North. I cannot allow it. And I don’t want to see another innocent girl mistreated by a monster. Even if Kevan hadn’t agreed to my plans, I would have gone all the same.”

Sansa looked back at the message. “You must first pacify the Riverlands. That will take too much time. Probably months. Arya will remain in this bastard’s hands in the meantime. We should go North immediately.”

That was the point in his plan Tyrion wasn’t sure about, but he had no choice. “Most of the Lannister forces are at Riverrun under Daven’s command with the forces of House Frey and the other river lords who rallied the Crown after… No matter. These forces cannot leave the castle until it surrenders. If they were to leave, the Freys and the other river lords would probably kill each other. Not that I would mind if some Freys died. They are far too many. But that would resume the war for real in the Riverlands, and in the fields this time, not only around a few besieged castles. I cannot leave the Riverlands in chaos as I march on Winterfell.”

“You could raise more troops,” Sansa suggested.

“Not many. The War of the Five Kings exhausted the Westerlands. Of the three armies my father raised, one was entirely destroyed and scattered at the Whispering Wood, only a few remnants are left of the second defeated at Oxcross, and the other one who saved King’s Landing from Stannis took heavy losses. We don’t lack gold, but there’s a limit to the number of men we can muster. I could only ask for five thousand men to march with me to Riverrun. I have to keep man power in reserve in case the Ironmen would attack us and to invade their islands eventually. The new levies are gathering at the Golden Tooth. Many could die of disease and cold, and even starvation during our campaign in the North. We’ll need the forces at Riverrun. And we’ll need Riverrun to maintain our supply lines. If I leave the Riverlands in war behind me, we have no chance to seize back the North. And the war could restart in an even worse way.”

“What about the Tyrells? They could help us. And the other northern houses? They are loyal to my family. They will fight for us.”

Tyrion sighed. “I wish I could be sure they would side with us. House Manderly will fight with us, surely. Lord Wyman is the one to inform me the most. But the Boltons have spread so much terror in the North that many lords could hesitate to rebel. Most of them don’t have much forces left. They lost nearly all during the war. And even though the Northerners hate the Boltons, they are still Northerners. Many will see us as invaders of the North, not as saviors of the North.”

“But I’m the Lady of Winterfell. I am the daughter of Eddard Stark. They will fight for me.”

Tyrion regretted what he said next, but he had to. “Your name is Sansa Lannister, now. They might not see you as the daughter of their liege lord. Some will see you as a traitor. And with your sister married to Roose Bolton’s son, House Bolton has a Stark on its side too.”

“But he’s raping her! They forced her to marry him!”

“Just like my family forced you to marry me,” Tyrion replied bitterly.

Sansa seemed to calm a little. “And the Tyrells? I could convince Margaery to give us men.”

Tyrion shook his head. “The Tyrells won’t send troops in the North. They’re not used to winter, and they’re already fighting at Storm’s End and Dragonstone. They have no interest in the North and nothing to gain there. The North is yours, not theirs. We have to take it with our own forces. Do you think Olenna Tyrell will send us troops out of kindness because you’re her granddaughter’s friend?”

Sansa had nothing to reply there. But her face was moving all around. “How will you end the fighting in the Riverlands?”

Tyrion rose from his seat and started to pace all around the room. “It’s Riverrun we need. It occupies a strategic position on the River Road. As long as it stands, we cannot invade the North.”

“But Riverrun has been under siege for… what, more than a year now.”

“Yes. And according to what I know, the castle has stores enough to gather two years of supplies. This means the garrison there can still hold many more months. I’m afraid we don’t have that time to wait. At least, your sister doesn’t have that time.”

Sansa remained silent for a moment. “Ser Brynden Tully is the one commanding Riverrun, isn’t he?” Tyrion nodded and looked away from his wife. “He is my granduncle.”

“Yes. And from the little I know about him, he’s more than stubborn. I’m afraid he won’t give up Riverrun so easily. He will fight to the end to keep it.”

He looked back at his wife who was staring at him. “You’re going to kill him?”

Tyrion pressed his lips together. “I hope that won’t come to that.”

“But… you say he won’t give up Riverrun.”

“No, indeed. He will never surrender the castle. Not to me. Nor to the Freys, nor to any Lannister. That’s why I will need you.”

“Me?”

“You are his grandniece, Sansa. If there is a single chance for the Blackfish to listen to someone, it’s to you. We need him to bend the knee to Tommen and to give up Riverrun.”

Sansa looked uncertain. “I haven’t met him for years. I was probably only six the last time he saw me. He may not even recognize me. And my mother told me he was stubborn and determined. I don’t think he will listen to me.”

“Perhaps. Perhaps he won’t listen to you, Sansa, but he will be much more receptive to you than to me or anyone else.” Tyrion approached until he was next to his wife. “Sansa, I don’t want other people to die because of this stupid war. This war was a mistake and a foolishness since the beginning. But I will need you. You can stay here at the Rock if you want and cry for your sister. To be honest I won’t blame you for that. But if you want to help her, and to help the members of your mother’s family who are still alive, you must come. They need you. I know one thing, your mother wouldn’t want you to remain here. She would want you to fight.”

Sansa seemed to think about Tyrion’s words for a moment. “I’ll come. But I’m not sure I’ll succeed to convince my uncle.”

“I hope you’ll succeed.” Tyrion really hoped she would.

“And if I fail?”

Tyrion sighed heavily. “We will have the choice between resuming the siege and take the risk for winter to surprise us, or to storm the castle immediately. If we were to choose the first option, well… I don’t think it would be in your sister’s interest. Let’s hope we won’t have to make this choice.” Let’s hope the Blackfish will accept the terms I’ll present.
“When do we leave?”

“Tomorrow. At dawn. I have a lot of things to prepare. I’ll join you in the night, late.”

Tyrion left Sansa. He found himself in a situation where he could have to choose between sacrificing the Tullys or Arya Stark. He didn’t enjoy any of these prospects. The worse was that Sansa would have to face the same choice. How could he ask her to choose between her mother’s family and her little sister? And yet, they both had no choice. What would Tyrion do if he was given the choice between sacrificing Jaime or one of his cousins? He knew very well what choice he would make. The decision would be much easier to take if he was to choose between Cersei and any other member of House Lannister. Tyrion could only hope the Blackfish would listen to Sansa and surrender Riverrun.

Tyrion spent the rest of the day making preparations. He gave instructions to Damion who would act again as castellan in his absence, to Cleos who would command the Lannister fleet when the time would come to attack the Iron Islands, to the supervisors of the mines, and to anyone else who was to take care of important tasks while he was fighting. In the end, he went to see Genna who had summoned him. She was the only one who could summon him here in Casterly Rock without fear he would refuse. Well, Sansa could summon him as well and he would obey, but she never did.

As soon as he entered his aunt’s room, she threw the rolled and sealed paper to him and Tyrion managed to catch it at the last moment. “Everything is in order,” she declared. “Emmon complained, as we expected, but he signed. Now you can put your plan in motion.”

His aunt’s voice wasn’t without scorn. Tyrion felt remorseful in some way. “I’m sorry.”

“Don’t be. You’re right. Better to have no castle at all than to have a castle that will get you killed later. Perhaps this is one of the things Tywin never understood and that you do. If he hadn’t wanted so much a queen for a daughter and a king for a grandson, perhaps we wouldn’t be in all that mud today.”

“It’s certain that Cersei was never made to be queen.”

“No,” Genna recognized. “It saddens me to tell that, but the Mad King probably took the right decision when he refused the betrothal your father offered between Cersei and Rhaegar. She’s my niece, but that doesn’t mean I cannot see her flaws. Or yours.”

Tyrion looked skeptical at his aunt. “And what are my flaws?”

Genna smiled kindly. “You have your father’s intelligence and cunning, Tyrion, and you have compassion. That is quite rare within a single person. Some people would say these two traits cannot coexist. And yet here you are, riding to war against the North to save your wife’s sister while seizing it for your children. But I’m afraid this is more the love you have for Sansa that led you to take these decisions. And even though Tywin wasn’t right on everything, he may not have been entirely wrong when he said love was useless. Or perhaps he would have been right if he said it another way. Love blinds us, and it brings us to make things we wouldn’t judge reasonable in other circumstances. I just hope it doesn’t blind you too much and that your plan with the Blackfish will work out well. If it doesn’t, I don’t want to imagine what will be the repercussions for House Lannister.”

Tyrion remembered something his uncle told him in King’s Landing. You once told me you weren’t your father, Tyrion. It’s true, you’re not Tywin. But now I realize that of all his children, you’re the one who looks the most like him. “What would my father have done, if a sister of my mother was being raped, skinned and beaten by the son of another lord?”
Genna seemed to reflect about it. “It would have depended on your mother’s reaction to this. If she had reacted like Sansa, he would have gone to war just like you.”

Tyrion straightened himself. “Farewell, Genna.”

“Good luck, Tyrion.” As Tyrion left the rooms, he heard the last words he would hear from his aunt for a very long time. “If the Blackfish refuses, you know what to do.” Tyrion knew it only too well.

It was late in the night when Tyrion came back to his chambers. He was tired from the day, and he would need to wake up early in the morning to leave Casterly Rock. He longed for his bed, but thought it would be better to wash himself a little before the long journey he would start. He went to the bathroom and was surprised to find his wife already in the tub. Her eyes were half-closed and her breathing deep and steady.

“A strange hour for the bath,” he commented.

“That will be a long time before I can take another one. And I couldn’t sleep.”

Sansa didn’t seem bothered by his presence. She talked to him as if they were talking of the weather while breaking their fast. A situation like this one would have been unbelievable for them last year. Tyrion felt his eyes drawn to her body he could see through the water. He tried to not look at it, but it was difficult.

“Care if I join you?” he asked, trying to think about something else, but not without success.

“No.” He saw the beginning of a smile on her lips, but it didn’t remain there for long.

Tyrion got rid of his clothes and joined Sansa in the bathtub. He shivered as he entered it, the water having turned colder after the time Sansa spent in it. All the same, it was a good feeling and it brought him comfort. Sansa’s knees came to rest around his body. The tub wasn’t large enough.

“One of the few advantages to be married to a dwarf. You have a lot of place for yourself.” He only tried to lighten the mood and the beginning of a laugh escaped from his wife. She was beautiful when she laughed. She was always beautiful, no matter how she felt and how she dressed.

They remained silent for a long moment, just relaxing, their legs touching the ones of the other. Tyrion’s uncertainty and fears left his mind for a moment and he closed his eyes, just savoring the time being. After what looked to be an eternity, he opened his eyes again to see Sansa looking at the side of the tub. Her expression troubled him.

“Are you afraid?” That was a stupid question to ask, but he asked it all the same. Sansa nodded.

“Good. You’re in the great game now. And the great game is terrifying.”

“You’re not very helpful,” Sansa replied, still looking away.

“No. I suppose not. I’m terrible at consoling.”

Sansa smiled a little. “Sometimes, yes, you are.”

Tyrion didn’t say anything more. He only kept looking at his wife while she remained in a half-asleep state. He marvelled at the fine shape of her body. She slimmed for the past two weeks, but it took nothing of her beauty away. She was still the most beautiful woman Tyrion had ever met.

It wasn’t the first time they found themselves together in the same bath, and even less the first time he saw his wife in the tub without any clothes. However, the previous times had been in much better circumstances and in lighter moods. Despite this, Tyrion found his cock stirring and arousing. He sighed in silence. He didn’t want Sansa to see it when he would leave the tub. He tried to relax himself, but it proved to be difficult with the woman he loved naked right before him and her legs and feet brushing his legs and chest. The fact they didn’t share a bed in two weeks didn’t help either.

Finally, Sansa got out of the tub, and while she was dressing and looking away, Tyrion seized the opportunity to leave the tub as well and hid everything down his hips with a towel. They both put on dressing gowns. The sparse visions of Sansa’s legs through the opening of her dress didn’t help in softening his cock. Couldn’t he think about something else? They both got in the bed, but neither of them managed to find sleep. Tyrion knew it from the unsteady breathe Sansa let escape from the other side of the bed. He already had the impression the night was getting clearer. He hoped they would manage to sleep better once on the River Road.

He felt Sansa moving next to him. They both had their back turn on each other as they tried to sleep, but suddenly he felt her head resting on his shoulder from behind. Immediately his cock awoke again. It had taken a lot of time and control to convince it to relax, all for nothing. It was back. Sansa did nothing else than staying there with her head nearly on his, but it was enough to double the size of his manhood and to make it stay that way. Nothing could make it quiet again.

“Do you really think we can save her? I mean, even if we took back Winterfell, do you think we can save Arya?”

Tyrion noticed the fear in his wife’s voice. He wished he could hold her and reassure her by telling he was sure they would save her sister, but it would have been a lie, and he wasn’t in a position to hold her right now. “I don’t know,” he finally confessed. “There’s only one thing I’m sure of. If we don’t try something, Arya Stark is lost.”

They remained silent for a long moment afterwards. Then Sansa kissed him on the cheek and wrapped one of her legs around his own. “I love you, Tyrion.” Her breathe was deeper than before, and less steady. Tyrion could feel her body getting closer and tighter with his. His cock kept stiffening. How long since he had her for the last time? Sansa’s whole body was shivering against him.

“You remember what you did to me? On our first morning here?” she said in a low voice. It’s wasn’t a voice made for desire. It was a voice full of sadness, and regret, but for Tyrion there was nothing worse than this. It only drew him to want her even more.

“How could I forget?”

He remembered this morning just like he remembered their first night as man and wife. Sansa wore a fine nightgown made of silk that was so thin that it was as if she wore water as clothes. Tyrion had wanted her this morning, but he had relented. He swore he wouldn’t share her bed as long as she didn’t want him to, and she hadn’t. But that changed nothing to the fact he had wanted her more than he had ever wanted up to this moment. She had whimpered. She had seemed so delicate, and welcoming. She had looked to appreciate it. It had been more than difficult for Tyrion to stop touching her, but not as hard as it would be to stop this night he thought.

“I wish I could go back to this moment. There was only you and me back then. That was the moment I felt… well.” Her voice was still low and sad. “For once everything seemed perfect.”

She stuck her face against his cheek. There was nothing Tyrion could do. She probably didn’t want to do it, just like him. How could they think about it when her sister was in danger? But at the same time they wanted to do it. Sansa enjoyed their nights together just like he enjoyed them and it had been two weeks now since they did it for the last time. But it was no time for this. They only remained in the same position and didn’t sleep a single moment in the end. When dawn came, they were both exhausted by the lack of sleep. A quick bath, a short breakfast and running preparations made them leave only an hour later at the head of a column of a thousand soldiers. They were heading for the Golden Tooth to rally the other recent levies, then they would ride for Riverrun, Raventree Hall, Seagard and, if the gods existed and were with them for once, to the North. Tyrion Lannister and Sansa Stark were marching with an army against the flayed man.

Chapter End Notes

Here ends the arc of Casterly Rock. We won't see Joy, Cerenna, Creylen or Genna before long. However, since Tyrion and Sansa are going to Riverrun, we will see new people appear in the story.

When I started this fic, my objective was to imagine how things could have been different with a single change in the show, Tywin's death in this case. The fic up to now mostly limited the effects of Tywin's premature death to King's Landing on the political plan. It didn't change the general events in Slavor's Bay, or at the Wall, or in Dorne, or in the Riverlands. However, now the story starts to move forward for real. To resume the consequences of Tywin's different death:

-Tyrion and Sansa are in love (and let's say they are some form of power couple now)
-Tyrion is Lord of Casterly Rock and has the riches and the forces of the Westerlands at his disposal
-Sansa is acknowledged by more than half of Westeros as the legitimate Lady of Winterfell and future Wardeness of the North
-Arya didn't go in Braavos and is still in Westeros (the last time we saw her she was at Greywater Watch with Howland Reed)
-Myrcella died sooner and Dorne is now preparing a real war against the Lannisters
-The Sand Snakes are travelling through Westeros to spread chaos
-Trystane is on his way to Meereen to meet Daenerys and make an alliance with her
-The Lannister army is now about to invade the North
-Mira Forrester is now married to a Hightower (change from Telltale Game)
-Kevan rules in King's Landing instead of Cersei

Up to now, the story has mostly been centered on the growing love between Tyrion and Sansa, and we have seen what it changed in the politics of the Seven Kingdoms. However, for the average people living in Westeros, nothing really changed. The same wars were still fought, without much difference from the initial scenario. However, now, things are really going to change for the people, with new alliances taking place and characters meeting when they never did up to now.

-Trystane is going to Meereen, which means Dorne will get involved in the politics of Slavor's Bay and that he could meet Daenerys, Grey worm, Missandei...
-Two Sand snakes are going to King's Landing, which could occasion some tensions with the Lannisters and the Tyrells (imagine Nymeria or Tyene meeting Margaery, Tommen, Kevan, Varys...)
-Obara is heading for Oldtown to see Sarella, and Mira is in Oldtown
-Sansa and Tyrion are going to Riverrun, then to the North (meeting with Brynden Tully, Edmure, Daven, Jon Snow, Davos, Melisandre, Ramsay, Roose...?)
-Also, ask yourself a question: Where Arya really is? At Winterfell? At Greywater Watch? Or somewhere else?
Finally, with the new development of the story and the effects of the change really coming out, we will see more of Jon, Davos, Daenerys, Kevan, Margaery and Arya, and their POV chapters won’t be mostly repetitions of the show anymore. Cersei and Jaime will make new appearances as well. There are also two new POVs who will start in Meereen as the story moves this way.

Please review

Next chapter: Mira
“This is the biggest library in the Seven Kingdoms,” Gerold told her.

“Yes, I know,” Mira replied. “But we need to see it to realize how big it is.”

They were within the walls of the Citadel, in the great library of the maesters and their novices. Mira had heard about this library, of course, but she never thought it would be so huge. The little library they had at Ironrath was a simple box in comparison. Even the one in King’s Landing was small when compared to it. The shelves went so high they needed ladders tens of feet long to reach the top. The height of the shelves was nothing aside the surface the library covered in the Citadel. Mira wasn’t sure Highgarden would be large enough to contain it.

“I should have made you visit this place before. I know you love books. But it’s not very easy to convince the archmaesters to let a woman enter this place.”

Gerold was right. No woman was allowed inside the Citadel. Maester Ortengryn told her back at Ironrath. He spoke a few times of the Citadel where he studied, but nothing could have prepared Mira to this. In fact, she couldn’t have been prepared to anything in Oldtown. The city was entirely different from King’s Landing and there were many more interesting places to visit than in the capital. Mira had spent the last month visiting the Hightower and the different districts of Oldtown. The septs, the docks, the wharves, the markets, and now the Citadel.

Mira looked all around at the shelves. All the books you could think about were there, often in multiple copies. She travelled through the shelves between maesters and novices copying, reading or searching for different works. Most of them looked very surprised to see her here. They weren’t used to see a woman in the Citadel. The secretary at the entrance hadn’t wanted to let her come in, until Gerold showed him a paper signed by the Seneschal, authorizing Lady Mira Hightower to visit the Citadel. The maesters could hardly refuse something to House Hightower.

Mira and her husband remained a long time walking through the library. They both took books to read. Mira was mostly interested by a History of the Northern Houses by Publius Tacitus. The work contained beautiful images of the seats of all northern houses, including Ironrath. When Mira showed it to her husband, he was agape. She had tried to describe it to him before, but it was difficult to make him imagine her home when he spent most of his life in the Hightower and on cobbled streets between stone houses. He found the seat of House Forrester quite beautiful. Mira read the section about her family. The author had written it a few decades ago, back when her grandfather was the heir to Ironrath. Even her father wasn’t mentioned in it. Perhaps she could ask Gerold if it was possible to ask a maester to write an updated version. Mira kept reading about the northern houses while Gerold tried to read a book about the great knights of the Seven Kingdoms. Mira thought he didn’t try very hard since he kept his eyes on her most of the time. She blushed the times she felt his gaze upon her. Weeks after their marriage, the favorite pastime of her husband still seemed to be looking at her. Unless his favorite pastime was instead the things they did at night. That was another subject that caused Mira to redden.

After some time, Gerold got up on his feet. “Excuse me, Mira, but we need to go back to the Hightower. I promised to spar with Altos this afternoon. We’ll be late if we don’t leave now.”

Mira didn’t want to leave right now. She didn’t think she would have the right to enter the Citadel again before a very long time. “I would rather stay here, Gerold. If it doesn’t bother you.”

Gerold didn’t look happy about it, but he was more sad than angry from what Mira could say. “Alright. I’ll tell our litter to stay here and to bring you back.”

“Oh, that’s not necessary. I’ll come back walking. Just leave a guard to escort me.”

“As you wish. I’ll see at dinner, my love.” Gerold kissed her and left.

Mira looked at her husband going away. She had become quite fond of him during the last weeks. There was nothing extraordinary about him. He was a decent fighter with a sword, could shoot arrows well enough, wasn’t stupid though not a genius either and behaved decently. He was kind and very attentive to her. It wasn’t difficult to see he loved her. She had married a good man.

“Well, it is rare to see a woman here.” Mira turned to look at the novice who just made this comment. “And it is also rare to see two people kissing here, though not as rare as some could think.”

The intruder was a young man with dark brown skin, curly and short black hair and widow’s peak. He wasn’t neither tall nor short. He wore the robe of the novices and had a chain with three links around his neck.

“I don’t have the pleasure to know who you are,” said Mira.

“And that’s a problem, I know.” He said it seriously, but Mira didn’t feel he was serious. “My name is Alleras. I’m a novice here at the Citadel.”

“My name is Mira. Mira Hightower.” Even weeks after her marriage, it still felt very odd to Mira to say another name than the one she was born with.

“Hightower? That explains why you’re admitted here. Only women from House Hightower could ever be allowed here, and only for visiting. None could train.”

Mira thought she caught some bitterness in the novice’s voice. “Is that a problem?”

The young man smiled. “No. May I know what you’re reading, my lady?” Mira moved the book so he could see the cover. “History of the Northern Houses. Tacitus is not the best author there is, but his work is quite complete. He pretends the Northerners are stronger than the people of the other kingdoms and could defeat them all one day because they live in simple ways.”

“I am a Northerner,” Mira revealed.

“Oh. So you’re the young lady who married a Hightower. Well, welcome to the Citadel, my lady.”
“Thank you, Alleras.”

The novice looked around him, as if to verify no one was listening. “If you want, I can manage to give you a copy of this book so you could bring it with you in secret. I know the maester in charge of these tomes. He won’t notice the absence of a lone copy.”

Mira was quite shocked by this. He was ready to steal a book. She didn’t think it was a good idea. Sera once stole something in King’s Landing, and it gave her problems. “Thank you, but that won’t be necessary.”

“Why? I’m offering it to you. Don’t tell me you’re going to refuse.”

“It’s very kind of you, Alleras, but really, I don’t want you to steal something.” She said it in a whisper so no one would hear them. “Just leave me alone and go back to your studies.”

Mira dedicated her attention again to the History of Tacitus and started to read the part about House Stark. Without surprise, it was the house with the most pages dedicated to it, its story from Bran the Builder to Lord Rickard Stark, Lord Eddard’s father, written in detail. She also read about House Glover, the family to which her own house was sworn, until she realized she was a Hightower and was no longer linked to the Glovers, about House Mormont, House Bolton, House Karstark, House Manderly, House Whitehill, House Cerwyn, House Umber and many others. Mira finally set the work aside and left the library. When she arrived outside, her handmaiden was waiting for her. She had a huge book in her hands and Mira recognized the title of the one she just read.

“What are you doing with this?” Mira asked.

“This is a novice. A young man with black hair and brown skin. He just came over me and game this. Said it was for you, my lady.”

It seemed Alleras had decided to not care about her refusal. Mira shrugged. There was nothing they could do about it now. She couldn’t bring the copy back inside without awakening suspicions towards the novice. A Hightower guard stood close to Mira’s handmaiden and he escorted them through the cobbled streets of Oldtown to the Hightower. However, as they left the sector of the Citadel, Ser Garlan Hightower, her brother-in-law, arrived to escort them. He had thought Mira would appreciate another man to escort her. Soon, Mira took the lead with Ser Garlan at her side while her handmaiden and the guard remained a little behind. The streets of Oldtown were much safer than those of King’s Landing, as long as you remained in the principal arteries.

“You look radiant, Lady Mira.”

“Thank you, Ser Garlan.”

“The colors of House Hightower suit you well, my lady.”

Mira nodded slightly. After the wedding, she had thought it would be better if she identified herself more to her new family. When she was in Margaery’s service, she had come to wear clothes proper for the Reach, but still kept colors that reminded of her belonging to House Forrester. Now that she was married to a Hightower, she had decided to bear the colors of this family. As a consequence, she wore red and white gowns now. However, she always kept a part of the gown with black and white, whether it was a small section on her shoulders or under them, around her hips or at the hem. She was a Hightower, but she didn’t forget her origins.

She and Ser Garlan remained silent for a moment before he spoke again. “I’m very happy you’re here, my lady. You had a very good influence on my brother. He changed a lot since you arrived.”
“Really?”

“Yes. You don’t know how much you helped him. He was bitter, gloomy, frustrated… very often before he met you. Even more after our grandfather announced him he would marry you.” Mira didn’t know how to react to this. “You must know, my lady, that being a thirdborn son, my brother didn’t have much to expect. He was always set aside in some way. Not that our mother and our father neglected him. They love all of us. Me, Altos, Gerold, Elys. But Altos is to be the Lord of Hightower one day, and I will probably be his right arm. I’m very good for leading men. Altos, my father, and even my grandfather rely on me for leading the Hightower armies. But Gerold… I’m sad to say that, but he has not been gifted with anything special. He has nothing to make his place in the world.”

“That’s wrong! Your brother isn’t… He isn’t a fool, or an incompetent. He’s capable, and decent at everything.”

“Yes, I know, and that’s the problem.” Mira didn’t understand what he meant. “My brother is decent at fighting, studying, leading, and almost at everything. If he had been the firstborn he would have made a perfect lord one day. The problem is he is not the firstborn son. Gerold is good at everything, just like you said, but he’s not exceptional at anything. That’s his problem. His name didn’t help either. He was named after our grandfather’s uncle, the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard, and Gerold cannot match his skills with a sword. That’s why life didn’t promise him much, and Altos and Elys mocked him for this reason. Altos in an evil way sometimes, Elys only because she mocks everything and everyone. But because he was always set aside, Gerold never learnt to take Elys’s mockeries with humour. I think it’s probably why my grandfather accepted the betrothal when the queen and Lady Alerie proposed it. It gave him a chance.” Ser Garlan stared at the cobbles under his feet as they kept walking. “Sadly Gerold didn’t see it that way first. You wouldn’t have wanted to be there when my grandfather told him he would marry you. I never saw him so angry.”

“Why was he angry?” Mira didn’t know about the facts Garlan Hightower was telling her.

“He thought we wanted to send him far in the North to get rid of him. He entered such a fury. I think he let go most of his frustration at this moment. He accused us to have always ignored him and put him at the lowest level because he was born last. He said he was never given any consideration. He was angry that we were to marry him with some ugly and stinking girl from the North with a beard.” Mira was about to react quite harshly to these revelations, but Ser Garlan put on a compassionate smile. “I don’t think he meant it. He was very angry. And there are a lot of prejudices against the Northerners here in Oldtown. People don’t know you very much. Gerold really thought our grandfather was trying to humiliate him. I could barely manage to calm him this evening.”

“I didn’t know about this.” That was all Mira could say.

“Please don’t tell my brother that I told you. It’s not something he’s very proud of. And his opinion changed a lot after your arrival.”

“What made him change his mind?” Mira was curious.

“Well, first he realized his family didn’t arrange him a marriage with some ugly and stinking girl with a beard when he saw you.” They both chuckled at this. “And then I don’t know, but he changed all of a sudden. Gerold has never been good with women. They weren’t interested by him, or perhaps he didn’t try to have them interested in him. So he watched you from afar, and believe me when I tell you that, because he talked to me a lot during your first times here, before the wedding, and he fell madly in love with you. Each day he came back talking to me about how beautiful and fantastic you were. I think he was nearly ashamed to marry a woman who could stand up before his own sister when he couldn’t do it himself.” New barks of laugh followed this comment.
However, Ser Garlan took a more serious expression. “You’ve been very good for my brother, Lady Mira. I never saw him so happy since the day he was born. He loves you. I never saw him like this before, ready to do everything for someone else. And he always tells me how wonderful you are. I would like you to take care of him. He needs you. You’re probably everything that gives him happiness in this world now. And he will always be devoted to you.”

“Don’t worry, Ser Garlan. I appreciate your brother very much. And this is not the first time I have to confront prejudices against people of the North. I met a lot of these since I left my home. I’ll take care of your brother. I’m his wife, after all.”

“Thank you, my lady.”

They spent the rest of the way to Hightower talking about the Citadel that Mira just visited. She used the opportunity to thank Ser Garlan for the work of Lomas Longstrider he offered her for her wedding. Her brother-in-law had noticed she had an exemplary in her personal belongings and had thought she would like a better version of it. They parted ways once inside the Hightower and Mira went to her chambers.

Her husband was probably still sparring in the courtyard. She might have gone to see him, but right now she wanted some time alone. Gerold could be among the kindest men she ever met, but he almost wanted to spend every minute of every day with her, and she longed for some solitude. She went to her personal desk and saw the letter she received this morning. It was from the queen and arrived by ship from King’s Landing yesterday, but it took some time before the officers at the docks sent it to her. Mira took the letter and read it again.

My dear Mira,

You don’t know how much I miss you. I lost a friend when I sent you away to Oldtown, and this time I want to blame you not for betraying me, but for leaving me alone among lions. Your advice and your cunning would be much appreciated right now. Tommen is very kind with me, but I don’t think the Hand shares his feelings. Since I arranged your marriage, he is much more prudent and ill-disposed. He’s trying to get Tommen a little far away from me, though he cannot completely succeed. After all, he cannot prevent Tommen from sharing his bed with me.

I do hope you are happy at Oldtown. The Hightowers will help you in time to claim what is yours by right if you are convincing enough with them. I would like you to remember what I have done for you Mira. This caused me a few problems in the capital and problems don’t lack right now in King’s Landing. The Sparrows are causing trouble in the streets, and they seem to grow bolder. Some of the people seem to be on their side. You probably left the city at the right time, though I wish you were there. If it doesn’t bother you, I would like Sera to come back immediately if she hasn’t left yet. I miss you two greatly.

Don’t forget you owe me something. There may come a day when I will need you. Enjoy life at the Hightower and with your husband. Be happy with him. I hope you are happier with him than I am with mine.

Margaery

Mira knew very well she owed a lot to Margaery. She knew Ser Kevan hadn’t appreciated the fact Margaery arranged a marriage for her when he tried to do the same. He wouldn’t forget it easily. Mira may never have found a place in Highgarden, or in King’s Landing, without the queen, and she would never have married Gerold. Mira wondered what problems the Sparrows could cause. They didn’t look much of a threat when she left. They forced people to walk naked in the streets, but they didn’t cause riots or started uprisings. Most of them lived in misery with their brothers near the Great Sept and tried to help the poor. Did they change after she left? The rivalry between Margaery and Ser Kevan was preoccupying as well, though Mira didn’t think they had to be too much concerned. Ser Kevan was a good man overall, and he knew the Lannisters needed the Tyrells to maintain their hold on the Seven Kingdoms. He would try to limit Margaery’s influence on Tommen, but nothing more. The knight wasn’t Cersei.

Mira took some ink and paper to write a reply to Margaery’s letter. She had enough time before Gerold came back for dinner and she would be able to send the letter with a ship heading to King’s Landing before the day was over with some luck.

My queen,

I was glad to receive of your news. My husband is very kind and caring about me. Perhaps a little too much. Overall, I cannot complain. We both know we could have married much worse. Life at Oldtown is very pleasant and I don’t have time to get bored. I and Lady Elys, my new sister-in-law, get along quite well. She could compete with Lady Olenna for her sharpness. Ser Garlan, Ser Baelor’s second son, is very gentle with me as well. The eldest son, Ser Altos, is somewhat arrogant and mocking, but my husband’s parents behave very well with me.

I’m sorry I left you, your Grace. I wish I could have stayed, but I’m afraid I could only choose how to leave. I’m sorry for the problems I caused with Ser Kevan. When I asked you to intervene in my family’s favor before Joffrey, I told you I would be forever in your debt. This hasn’t changed. You’ve been very good to me ever since the day I arrived at Highgarden, and I will never forget everything you’ve done to me. You can count on my help whenever you need it. I once said I was loyal to you before Cersei. I meant it, and I still mean it.

Sera left Oldtown last week as I’m writing to you. She should have arrived in the capital when this letter will reach you. I wish you well, your Grace. I hope we’ll meet again soon.

Mira Hightower

Mira called her handmaiden. Her name was Saryn and she came from a minor house sworn to the Hightowers. She was only thirteen and had just arrived, so she was quite shy, even before Mira who was a newcomer just like her. Mira liked the girl, though they didn’t grow very close. She regretted Sera’s departure. Elys was of good company, but sometimes her comments and mockeries turned annoying after you listened to them for hours. Mira commanded Saryn to bring her letter to the harbour tomorrow and to find a ship that would bring it to King’s Landing. She also ordered her to prepare a bath. Mira took one and brushed her hair herself afterwards. When Sera was still there, she was the one to brush Mira’s hair. It allowed them to spend more time together. However, after Sera left, Mira decided she would brush her hair herself, just like she did in King’s Landing. It removed a duty from Saryn’s shoulders this way. When Mira was satisfied with her hair, she went to continue reading the book Alleras stole for her. If it was stolen, better to have it stolen for a reason.

She consulted with more caution the chapters concerning House Forrester and House Whitehill. When she read again the passages about the origins of each family, she realized both claimed to descend from a man called Regald Ironwood, the last lord of a forgotten House Ironwood. The family lines couldn’t lead directly to this man in both cases since there were missing lords in the timeline of both families, but Tacitus emitted the theory that both houses once formed only one, and that for a reason or another, they were separated one day. The Forresters made their seat at the borders of the Wolfswood, which allowed them to harvest ironwood, while the Whitehills settled in the hills between the Wolfswood and the northern mountains. In the end, both families had a great fortress almost impossible to penetrate, but the Forresters learned to work ironwood better than the Whitehills, which made them richer than their former cousins. For Mira, it was quite a surprise to learn Forresters and Whitehills may have been a single family a long time ago. That wasn’t something she could conceive easily after everything that happened between them.

Mira got lost in her reading, trying to find as much as she could about her house, House Whitehill, House Glover and House Bolton. It could prove useful when the time would come to go in the North. Suddenly she felt arms wrapping around her hips and lips kissing the side of her neck. She giggled in surprise.

“Hi, my love,” a low voice said in her ear.

Mira couldn’t help but smile. She was probably too lost in her reading and didn’t hear her husband who had come back. Gerold liked to surprise her like that from behind and to kiss her neck, and Mira had to admit she didn’t hate that.

“Gerold.” Mira could only say his name as he nearly nibbled her skin. “How did the practice go?”

“I defeated Altos.” He sounded very happy about that. Mira knew why. Gerold didn’t get along quite well with his eldest brother.

“It seems I missed something then.” Mira laughed again as he kept trailing kisses from her neck to her cheek, but he stopped all of a sudden.

“What’s this?”

Gerold was looking at the image on the first page of the chapter about House Whitehill. “It’s Highpoint. The seat of House Whitehill,” she explained.

“It looks like a ruin. I don’t understand how these people could defeat your family. Ironrath was entirely different.”

Gerold still had a lot to learn. “The castle doesn’t make the power. And appearances can be misleading.”

“Yes. I’m sorry. That was a stupid thought. I think I’m going for a bath.”

He walked to the bathroom. “I’ll be waiting for you,” she told him before he entered the other room. He half returned the smile. Still weeks after their wedding, Gerold was still shy from time to time in her presence. Mira noticed he was shy around all women, even around his own wife. No wonder he only talked with her a single time before their wedding. Mira turned her attention to her book again. She had talked about her family to her husband, and also to the other Hightowers, and about Ironrath as well. She needed to do it if they were to help her to claim it one day. One night, Gerold had sworn to her he would give her back her family’s home. Perhaps after seeing images of Ironrath today he would be more motivated. Mira had to subtly convince Gerold and his family to support her. She watched Margaery do it long enough to master this art well enough herself. She learned from the best.

Gerold returned washed and clean some time later. They dined together and talked about their visit of the Citadel today. Mira told him how she liked it and asked him questions about how he defeated the future heir to the Hightower in single combat. Gerold obviously enjoyed telling her and Mira told him tales about the times she saw her two older brothers spar against each other at Ironrath, when she was younger. Their dinner was however disturbed by the sudden arrival of Elys who came to tell in her own way about the fight between Gerold and Altos in the sparring ground today. Gerold was obviously irritated by his sister’s irruption, but Mira let her sister-in-law talk long enough before she drove her away much more diplomatically than her husband would have ever done.
“Thank you,” Gerold told her as Mira closed the door behind Elys Hightower. “I thought she would never leave us alone.”

“Her recital of the duel was quite entertaining, but I think she should make it shorter,” Mira commented.

“I’m tired of this. Of her mockeries. I already have too much with Altos. Only Garlan is alright with me.”

Mira sat again and put her hand on his. “Your sister is not evil, Gerold. She’s laughing at everything. She’s like that. We cannot help it. She doesn’t hate you.”

Gerold sighed. “I wish Father could marry her so she would leave Hightower, but up to now she managed to chase every suitor who was presented to her. They never came back asking for her hand. As a result I must continue to suffer her.”

Mira smiled sadly. Her husband was too touchy. “You just beat your brother. Don’t let your sister ruin it. Enjoy the moment.”

He smiled back at her. “You’re right. As always, my love.”

Later in the night, Mira was resting her head on his chest as they both laid in their bed. Mira hadn’t known what it was to sleep with a man before her wedding night, but now that she knew what it was, she didn’t want it to stop. She closed her eyes and kept her body on his, just enjoying the feeling of calm and serenity the position gave her. Gerold was passing his hand through her hair or caressing her back. Mira didn’t move, simply not wishing this to stop.

Gerold brought his lips to her hair and kissed the top of her head. “I love you, Mira.” Mira knew that. Everyone who had eyes or ears or even only a nose could realize her husband loved her. “I would do anything for you.”

“Anything?” She wasn’t sure if she should believe him and nearly laughed at the declaration.

“Anything.”

Mira didn’t care what it meant, but she was happy to be married to a man who loved her. She may have lost a family, but there were other people who loved her in this world, and the man who held her in his arms and kissed her in that very moment was among them.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter was mostly about knowing more about Mira's husband, and also to see how her marriage is going. Ser Garlan Hightower is mostly the equivalent of Garlan Tyrell. I really regret they didn’t include him in the show only to keep Loras as Margaery's sole brother, so I decided to bring him into this fic under another name.

Please review

Next chapter: Brienne
Brienne II

Chapter Notes

Here begins the arc of the War in the North. This arc of the story will see more chaos, more treachery, more fighting, more battles and more uncertainty than there were up to now. People are going to die, people we love and people we hate, sometimes people we love to hate too. Despite its name, this arc will not only be about the war in the North. The action will be centered mostly around the Lannister army marching on the North (with Tyrion and Sansa leading it), King’s Landing and Meereen. The great game of this fic starts.

This chapter is the first of a round of five chapters whose action is taking place around Riverrun. Since the events of Riverrun will only take place in three days at most, these chapters will be updated two days from each other, instead of my usual schedule with two updates per week.

---

BRIENNE II

They had left Casterly Rock less than a month ago. Their speed of travel had been much greater than the one they had when they had left King’s Landing. There was no carriage with them this time, though carts followed them, carrying supplies, weapons, clothes, gold and silver for the campaign that announced itself. They were about five thousand men, most of them on feet. The Lannister cavalry was almost entirely already at Riverrun. This little troop that accompanied Lord Tyrion and Lady Sansa in the Riverlands wasn’t much when compared to the army that was waiting for them before the seat of House Tully. They would reach Riverrun tomorrow. For Brienne, they weren’t quick enough. They were lucky the rains didn’t slow down their march, and they would need more luck to move from Riverrun to Winterfell quickly enough.

It had been a great shock for Brienne to learn that Arya Stark was still alive, but it had been horrible when she learned the Lady Arya was forced to marry Roose Bolton’s son. Brienne had sworn to Lady Catelyn that she would protect her daughters and bring them back to safety. Brienne had succeeded with the Lady Sansa. Well, maybe she didn’t have much to do. It was Ser Bronn who mostly saved her from Ser Dontos in King’s Landing, and afterwards Brienne only had to serve as her guard. Sansa was safe at Casterly Rock and didn’t really need any protection, but Brienne remained at her side all the same. She swore a vow to Lady Catelyn, and now she had a vow binding her to her daughter. She wouldn’t leave her service.

Everything had changed when the news about Arya Stark reached them. Everyone assumed she was dead, and now all of a sudden she was alive. Brienne had sworn to Lady Catelyn to keep both her daughters safe, and not only one. When Lady Sansa told her about her sister, and about the horrible things Ramsay Bolton did to women, she had wanted to ride immediately to Winterfell and to rescue the other Stark girl. However, Podrick, the squire in Lord Tyrion’s service and who she began to teach how to fight with a sword at Casterly Rock, reminded her she was bound to Lady Sansa’s service, and that her chances to free Arya Stark alone were meager. In the end, after a great conflict with herself, Brienne had decided to remain at Lady Sansa’s side. It didn’t prove to be such a wrong choice since her husband decided to ride for the North. Brienne would be more useful in the army than on her own.

Brienne was however afraid about the fact Lady Sansa came with the army. Brienne was glad to ride to save Arya Stark, despite the fact they were still going too slow for her taste, but she didn’t think it was a good idea to bring Lady Sansa with them. She should have stayed at Casterly Rock. After her initial reluctance and mistrust towards the Lannisters, she had come to trust them if not appreciate them. Their arrogance was still something she couldn’t support, but Lord Tyrion and Ser Jaime had proven themselves worthy of trust, and the rest of their family at Casterly Rock had revealed themselves to be quite decent people. Lady Sansa would have been safe at Casterly Rock, protected by the Lannisters, as strange as it may seem, but on the road she could be in danger anytime, even with an army around her. Brienne had voiced her concerns to the lady, but she had refused to listen to her. Before the Lannister troops could travel North, they had to put an end to the siege of Riverrun. As for Brienne, the Lannisters should simply give it back with the Riverlands to House Tully, Lady Catelyn’s house, make peace with Ser Brynden, and then head to Winterfell. They would lose less time this way, and that would be only fair. However, Lady Sansa said she might be the only one capable of persuading her granduncle to surrender Riverrun and to bend the knee to Tommen. Even worse, she was determined to follow the army when they would march on the North. She wanted to be there when they would free Winterfell and her sister. Brienne could recognize the same courage her mother had, but she was afraid this courage might get her killed. Lady Sansa remained deaf to her words and was decided to go to the North.

Brienne thought there could be another reason why Lady Sansa wanted to follow the army, and this reason didn’t reassure her, quite the opposite. Brienne was well aware of what was going between the young lady and her husband at night. She had informed Lady Sansa about it after a night she was guarding their chambers and she had heard very loud noises from the other side of the doors. Considering how heavy were the doors, that said a lot. After this, Lady Sansa banned guards from before their doors at night. And since they left Casterly Rock, there had been a night when Brienne was guarding their tent when she heard her mistress’s moans. The good thing was that it only happened once, as far as Brienne knew, and the noises were far less loud than back at the castle. Brienne still didn’t know what to make of it. She had come to have quite a good opinion of Tyrion Lannister, just like for his brother. What enhanced the most her esteem for the Imp was his constant refusal to bed Lady Sansa without her consent. Brienne also witnessed he really tried to protect her. The opinion people had on him were as false as the one they had on Ser Jaime. However, he still had a crude language and remembered her of his father from time to time. And since Lady Sansa started to share her bed with him… Brienne didn’t know when it began exactly, but it wasn’t far from Lady Sansa’s sixteenth name day when Brienne won the tourney against a knight of the Vale. She really didn’t know what to make of it. On one side, Lord Tyrion didn’t mistreat Lady Sansa at all, quite the opposite. She rarely saw a man so devoted to his wife, but she wondered what would Lady Catelyn say of that if she was still alive. If she learned that her eldest daughter had fallen in love and spent her nights with the Imp.

The army established a camp for the night as the light of the day was beginning to fade. Brienne hate away from the other soldiers, but as it often happened the sellsword Bronn came to join her.

“Hi.” He sat on the same stump than her with his bowl of stew and his tankard of ale.

“Ser Bronn.” Brienne didn’t lift her eyes from her bowl.

“No need to call me this way. You’re more a knight than me.” Brienne wouldn’t argue against it.

The man was a sellsword and would always be a sellsword, though he didn’t behave differently from some other knights in this army. “Or him.”

Bronn pointed a man with blond hair eating not far from them with other men. His armor bore the sigil of a gold lion on a crimson field with water at the bottom. “He shouldn’t be there,” Brienne simply stated.

“Well, the dwarf believes it’s better to have him away from Lannisport. He caused enough problems in his family.”

“He will cause problems here as well.” Brienne didn’t trust Serion Lannister from what she saw at Casterly Rock. He always tried to spread chaos in his own house, the Lannisters of Lannisport.

“Well, let’s hope then he will die in battle. In the meantime, we should both watch him. Who knows what he might try?” Brienne could agree on that. “You’re shit at talking. I’ll go and drink with my men. Just remember to keep an eye on this guy.”

“I will.”

Ser Bronn of Blackwater left and Brienne was alone again. She didn’t like the sellsword, but he protected Lord Tyrion, and his wife as a consequence, so Brienne was ready to work with him when it came to protect Lady Sansa. He was entirely loyal to Lord Tyrion, as much as a sellsword could be and maybe more since Lord Tyrion authorized and approved his marriage with a girl who was formerly a whore, so Brienne grudgingly accepted to work with him, though she wouldn’t like him more for that.

When she was done, Brienne went to see Podrick so they could practice his swordplay like they did each evening. The boy showed some progress since she started to teach him at Casterly Rock. He wanted to become a knight, but no one wanted to teach him how to fight, so Brienne had begun to show him and kept practicing with him after they left the castle. However, it wasn’t Brienne who found Podrick but Podrick who came to find her.

“My lady, Lord Tyrion would like to speak to you. He asked me to fetch you to his tent.”

Brienne followed Podrick to Lord Tyrion’s tent, the tent that was that was also Lady Sansa’s. The tent was well furnished with a featherbed, cushions, furs on the ground, a desk with ink, paper, maps, quills and candles on it, tables and many books. Lord Tyrion was looking at a map when Brienne entered, but lifted his eyes from it when she came in.

“Lady Brienne.”

“Lord Tyrion.” Brienne bowed. “You wanted to see me.”

“Yes, I did.”

“Where is Lady Sansa?” Brienne found it strange she wasn’t there. Lady Sansa was almost all the time with her husband since they left Casterly Rock.

“She’s talking with Lord Westerling. That’s why I asked you to come. She’s not here for the moment. I want you to keep an eye on Sansa in all circumstances. Tomorrow we will reach the encampment of the army besieging Riverrun. Or to be more precise, the armies. The Freys have considerable forces there, but also many lords of the Riverlands are there. I need you to be with Sansa all the time, without exception. These people could hurt her.”

“The lords of the Riverlands would never dare anything against Lady Sansa. Her mother was the daughter of their liege lord.” Brienne understood she had to watch the Freys, but the men of the “Unless you forgot, Lady Brienne, Sansa is a Lannister now.” Brienne wanted to argue on this, but Lord Tyrion didn’t give her the time. “She bears the name of the family who organized the Red Wedding. They could see her as a traitor, despite her Tully looks. Her red hair and her blue eyes may even make things worse for the river lords. They would see her a greater traitor for that probably. Even my own men may not look at her very well. Most of the Lannister soldiers at Riverrun are seasoned soldiers who fought in my father’s army or in Stafford’s army. They fought against the Starks and Sansa’s brother. Some lost their friends or members of their family, or have been close to die in northern hands. You must stay at her side all the time. All the time. Do you understand?”

Brienne nodded. He was right. She didn’t consider these things. All the men in these camps would have something to reproach to Lady Sansa. Brienne would stay close to her. She swore to protect Sansa Stark, both to Sansa Stark and to her mother.

“Good. You may go. She doesn’t leave your sight a single moment from next morning.”

Brienne bowed and left. Podrick, who had remained outside at the entrance of the tent, asked her if they could train and Brienne said they would. They went to the place where they organized a practice ground and took practice swords. Podrick was slowly getting better, but he was getting better all the same. He might make a good knight one day with enough time. Ser Bronn was practicing not far away from them with his own men, beating them very easily. It was more a lesson he was giving them than an actual practice and many had cuts and bruises from the hits they took. It was a luck they fought with practice swords, or else they would all be dead.

After a time, Brienne noticed Lady Sansa was watching them spar. When she realized it, she turned to face her and knelt on her knee. “My lady.”

“It’s alright, Lady Brienne. You can rise.” Brienne did so. “Please follow me. I would like to walk a little and some company would do me some good.”

Brienne turned to Podrick with a sorry look and the squire brought back his practice sword to its place before he walked toward his lord’s tent. Brienne put back into its place her sword as well and followed Lady Sansa away from the camp. Her face showed nothing of the happiness Brienne had seen in the previous months after Lord Tyrion was cleared at his trial. The emotions painted on her face and displayed by her eyes were much alike those her mother showed back when Brienne was at her service. She looked very much like Lady Catelyn Stark in this moment. When they were at some distance from the camp, though not too far, Sansa began to talk.

“Do you have any brothers or sisters, Brienne? I never asked you before.”

“I had once, my lady,” she answered shortly.

“Once?”

“I had a brother, Galladon. He died drowning when I was eight. I also had two sisters but I never had the chance to see them. They died while still in their cradle.”

“I’m sorry, Brienne.” Lady Sansa kept walking forward, her eyes fixed right before her. Brienne thought she ought to say something.

“I don’t remember who my mother was, Lady Sansa. I was so young when she died that I can’t even remember her face. I was eight when my brother died. I may have been young, but I had a good idea of death all the same. I have an idea how you may feel.”
Lady Sansa didn’t answer immediately, but after a moment she asked a question that had no link with the previous subject. “You are the only living child of your father, aren’t you?”

“Yes, my lady.”

“So you are the heir to Evenfall.”

“I am, my lady,” Brienne confirmed.

“No man ever wanted to marry you?”

That wasn’t a matter Brienne wanted to talk about, but the lady she swore to serve asked her a question. “My father organized me three betrothals. The first time, the boy caught a chill and died before I flowered. The second one gave me a rose when we met and told me it would be all I would have of him. The third ordered me to behave like a woman should once we would be married.”

“And what happened?”

“I was sixteen at the time. I told him I would only accept his demand if he could beat me in combat. He left Evenfall with four broken things: three ribs and a betrothal.”

Lady Sansa laughed lightly at the story and Brienne had to smile as well. Lady Sansa barely smiled since she learned the fate of her sister. To make her laugh was almost an impossible task these times. Even her husband couldn’t succeed, and he normally succeeded.

“I guess there were no other betrothals afterwards,” her lady asked.

“None,” Brienne confirmed. She fell in love in the end, with a kind man, but Renly could never return the love she had for him.

“I wish I could have done the same to Joffrey. We were both unlucky in our betrothals. Before marrying Tyrion, I was promised to a monster, then to a man who preferred sleeping with men than women.”

“Lord Tyrion is a good man, Lady Sansa. He treats you well.” Just like Renly treated me well. “And he loves you.” Renly could never love me. You had more luck than me, my lady.

“Yes, he does love me. And I love him.” A sad smile appeared on the young lady’s lips. It reminded Brienne of Lady Catelyn’s smile. “Have you ever met Lord Edmure or Ser Brynden, Brienne?”

“No, my lady,” Brienne confessed. “They weren’t with the army when your mother released Ser Jaime and charged me to escort him to King’s Landing. I never saw them.”

“I’m afraid. Tyrion believes I may be able to convince them to surrender Riverrun, but I never met my uncle and I haven’t seen my granduncle for years. I could have been seven the last time I saw him. And I will see them tomorrow. They will probably not recognize me.”

There was something Brienne had on her mind that she needed to tell to Lady Sansa. “My lady, if you allow me, I think we should just leave Riverrun behind and head north right now. You shouldn’t fight against your family. We shouldn’t. I swore to keep you and your sister safe, not to fight against House Tully. Your mother was from this house. The Boltons are the true enemies, not the Tullys. The Lannisters started this war. They have no right to take Riverrun.”

Lady Sansa looked thoughtful for a moment. “If you had a sister who was being raped, beaten and worse Brienne, and that you needed to fight your own family to save her, what would you do?”
“We don’t have to fight them, my lady.”

“We cannot leave Riverrun behind. We need to secure the way from Casterly Rock to the North, and Riverrun is on the path. We need my granduncle to surrender the castle.”

“And if he doesn’t?” Brienne asked.

Lady Sansa looked down. “Arya is in danger. That’s all that matters. Let’s go back to the camp. It’s getting cold.”

It was getting cold, indeed. Brienne accompanied Lady Catelyn’s daughter to the tent she shared with her husband. Brienne took the guard for tonight. Lord Tyrion ordered her to watch Sansa Stark all the time, and Brienne agreed it was the right thing to do. The night was quiet and eventless. They rode early in the morrow the next day. Lord Tyrion and Lady Sansa rode alongside the army, observing their troops and the country, sometimes talking but often in silence. Ser Bronn was the one doing most of the talking. He followed the Lord and the Lady of Casterly Rock just like Brienne. Bronn was in charge of Lord Tyrion’s safety (he had even more chances to being killed before Riverrun than his wife) while Brienne was in charge of Lady Sansa’s safety. They arrived in the castle’s sight in the middle of the day.

From the top of a hill, they could see Riverrun standing tall like an island, surrounded by the water the Red Fork and the Tumblestone River brought where they met. Brienne could see why the castle held the siege for more than a year. To take it by force wasn’t far from invading an island without boats. Below, they could see the banners all around the castle, surrounding it everywhere, dispersed. If an army had come to the rescue of Riverrun, Brienne didn’t see how the besiegers would be able to fight back in their current positions. Brienne could see banners of House Frey covering the north of the Tumblestone. South of the Red Fork was a mix of Frey and Lannister banners with many others, some Brienne recognized to be bannermen of House Tully, now former bannermen. Between the rivers only Lannister banners and red tents stood, facing the gates of Riverrun. The castle was entirely surrounded, and yet it resisted.

“It’s the first time you see it?” Lord Tyrion was talking to his wife.

“Yes.” A long silence followed Lady Sansa’s answer. “This is the place where my mother grew up. She was born in there.”

“Let’s hope we can keep it intact.”

On these words of the Lord of the Westerlands, the two women and the two men rode forward, taking the lead of their army. They approached the camp only made of red before the gates of Riverrun and entered it with their men. The camp was well organized, even better organized than the ones Brienne lived in when in Renly’s service and the one where she went with Lady Stark before they released Ser Jaime. Brienne wondered what he could be doing right now in King’s Landing.

They stopped before a tent that was larger than the other ones, but simple at the same time. A man was waiting for them before it with some twenty men in full red armor behind him. He had a bristling beard, a bushy mustache and sidewhiskers thick as a hedgerow. His hair was long and unkempt, all yellow, and his eyes hazel. A pug nose managed to find his way out of this bush of hair.

“My lord! Tyrion.” The man walked towards them as they dismounted. “The rumors were false. You still have a nose!”

“Yes, coz. I didn’t lose a nose, but I gained a scar,” Lord Tyrion replied as he walked toward him.
“Good. Without scar, no one would ever believe you fought in battle. And you’re more handsome with it.”

“I wish I could say the same about your mane. Did some outlaw steal your razor?”

“I vowed I would not let my hair be cut until my father was avenged. But someone rubbed me of my vengeance. But I like a bit of hair. The nights grow colder, and a little foliage helps to keep your face warm. Perhaps, you should let a beard grow you too.”

Tyrion Lannister seemed thoughtful about it for a moment, then turned to Lady Sansa who had remained behind, out of the conversation, after she dismounted. “What do you think about it, my lady? Should I have a beard?”

“No, I think not.” A timid smile appeared on Lady Sansa’s smile and her husband returned it.

“The Lady of Casterly Rock spoke.” He turned back his face to the man who was now looking at the Lady Sansa. “Daven, I present you my wife, Sansa. Sansa, this is my cousin, Ser Daven Lannister.”

Ser Daven walked toward Lady Sansa. Brienne tensed, ready to react. Ser Daven Lannister was the son of Ser Stafford Lannister, the commander of the Lannister army who was killed at the Battle of Oxcross by Lord Karstark. His sisters may be friends of Lady Sansa now, but she couldn’t be sure about their brother. Ser Daven stopped at a respectful distance from Lady Sansa and bowed.

“Lady Sansa. It’s a pleasure to meet you, finally.”

“It’s a pleasure for me too, ser. Your sisters talked very highly of you,” said Lady Sansa.

“They probably exaggerated then. I received a letter from Cerenna a few months ago. She seemed to appreciate you very much.”

Lady Sansa smiled. “Yes, she’s a very good friend. Your other sister Myrielle as well.”

“Really? That’s good news. I fought against your brother during the war. The only thing I have to blame him for is that he killed Lord Karstark in my stead.”

Lady Sansa nodded. “I think all of us here agree on the fact Lord Karstark deserved to die.” Sansa turned her eyes towards Brienne. “This is Lady Brienne, Ser Daven. She’s the one who brought back Ser Jaime Lannister to King’s Landing on my mother’s orders. She saved him from Lord Karstark at the same occasion. He wanted to kill him.”

Ser Daven looked at her strangely, as if he wasn’t really sure if Brienne really stood before him. Brienne was used to this kind of reaction. “Well, you have my thanks then, my lady. Thank you for saving my cousin.”

“I obeyed to the order Lady Stark gave to me,” Brienne stated as an answer, before she added something else. “Ser Jaime saved me during our journey to King’s Landing. He’s a good man.”

“He saved you?” The knight was quite astonished by this. He looked back at Lord Tyrion. “How many surprises like this do you have in store for me?”

“Many more,” the dwarf answered. “But for now I would like to know how the siege is going on.”

“Let’s go into my tent.” He went to the tent and Lord Tyrion turned to his wife, inviting her to follow him with a sign of his head when they heard noises coming from the castle, something that looked like a gathering crowd. Ser Daven turned to the direction where the noise came from. “Again? They do it every day.”

“What are they doing? Who are you talking about?” Lord Tyrion asked.

“It’s those damn Freys. Whilst I’ve been building rams and siege towers, they raised a gibbet. And they do the same every day. They bring Edmure Tully, drape a noose around his neck, threaten to hang him unless the castle yields.”

“What?” Everyone turned to Sansa whom the outcry came from.

Ser Daven turned to her and tried to reassure her. “Don’t worry, my lady. They’ve been doing so every day for a year and they never executed the threat. Sometimes they threaten to hang him, other times to slice his throat, and they even threatened to geld him a few times, or to take a hand, a finger, a foot, everything you can imagine. Each time they don’t carry out the threat. It’s more tiresome than anything else now. Wait! My lady!”

Sansa Stark had started to walk toward the gates where the shouts came from, and to walk very quickly. Brienne followed her immediately. She had to protect her. Behind her back she heard Lord Tyrion tell his men to follow him. After getting through the whole camp, they arrived before the gibbet where a dozen men wearing the sigil of House Frey stood. Two men stood on the gibbet, their backs turned on Brienne, one in rags, the other one in chainmail. The one in chainmail had a dagger in his right hand on the other man’s throat. He was shouting in the direction of Riverrun.

“Come out and face, you Blackfish. Yield the castle or your nephew will die. You think I won’t do it, old man? I sliced your niece’s throat from here to here. I won’t hesitate to do the same to your nephew. Yield the castle or I’ll slice his throat.”

Lord Edmure was the one in these rags with a knife on his throat. Before Brienne could do anything or someone inside Riverrun could reply to the threat, someone else screamed. “STOP IT! HOW DARE YOU, SON OF A WHORE!” Lady Sansa pushed aside one of the Frey men, walked furiously to the gibbet and climbed its steps. The man threatening Lord Edmure turned to face her, anger plain on his face.

“Who called me this? The one who said that…”

The man who held Lord Edmure didn’t have the opportunity to say anything else and stumbled from the gibbet, falling heavily on the ground. Just like everyone else who was present, Brienne was stunned by the event they just witnessed.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa (discover what Brienne just witnessed)
Sansa XXI

Chapter Notes

Second Riverrun chapter. Discover what happened at the end of the previous chapter that let Brienne stunned.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

SANSA XXI

The pain was great in Sansa’s right hand after she slapped the man in the face. He had threatened to kill her uncle, her mother’s brother, so she had to put an end to it. She had allowed her anger to guide her and instead of stopping him with words, she stopped him with her fists. That was the first time she did it. Sansa turned to look on her left. A man all dirty with dust and mud was looking with an astonished look.

“Cat?” Then his mouth opened and his eyes widened. “Sansa? It’s you?”

“Arghhhhh! Dirty bitch! I’m going to kill her.” The man she just slapped had come back on his feet and was now walking toward her with an angry look, but before he could approach her enough with his knife, a sword appeared at his throat.

“One more step, and you die.” Brienne’s voice wasn’t as angry as the man’s voice, but it was much more threatening with a sword on his throat. The man stopped and laughed as he looked at Brienne. Sansa recognized from his general appearance that he was a Frey. She saw enough of Cleos, Tion, Red Walder and Tywin Frey at Casterly Rock to recognize any Frey at first sight.

“What’s this? An ugly woman or a man who looks like a woman?”

“This is Lady Brienne of Tarth.” Tyrion intervened. “She was sworn to Catelyn Stark before your family murdered her, and now she serves her daughter. And you just threatened her daughter. Her daughter who just happens to be my wife.”

The Frey looked at Tyrion, but Sansa couldn’t see his expression. However, another man with limping legs approached Tyrion at this moment. He was a Frey as well. “Lord Tyrion. We didn’t know you were coming.”

“Yes, it’s quite obvious. Since you’re limping, I suppose you are Lame Lothar Frey.”

“At your service, my lord.”

“I don’t want your service, and I don’t need it. The last time I met someone like you who murdered children, I sent him to the Wall, though I would rather order my men to cut you in half this time.” The smile on the man’s face faded as quickly as he had appeared. Tyrion turned to his men. “Have Lord Edmure bathed and fed. And untie him.”

“Wow!” The other Frey who threatened to kill Sansa’s uncle tried to walk toward Tyrion, only to be stopped again by Brienne’s sword. He tried to duck it but Brienne knocked him on the ground.
Tyrion walked to the man sitting in the mud. He towered him in their positions. Bronn unsheathed his sword and put it on the man’s throat.

“You were saying?” the sellsword asked.

Tyrion looked intently to the Frey. “Who are you? I don’t have the pleasure to know your name.”

It was Lothar Frey who answered. “It’s my brother. Walder Rivers.”

Sansa looked at this man closely. Walder Rivers, a bastard son of Walder Frey, also known as Black Walder, was the man who killed her mother at the Red Wedding. Sansa also knew Lothar Frey was the one to plunge a knife in Robb’s wife while she was with child. These two men were right here, before her, alive and well, while her mother and her brother were dead. Sansa wanted to order Brienne to kill them both.

“Then you’re lucky this is not Lady Brienne who’s pointing the sword at you. Or else you would probably be dead, bastard.” Black Walder tried to stand up when Tyrion called him a bastard, but Bronn’s sword prevented him from doing so. Tyrion turned his head away from the man lying on the ground, but Bronn kept his sword near his throat. He talked in Lothar’s direction. “I’m here by the king’s command to take back this castle. The siege is now under my command. And I command you to go back to your camp and to never appear in this camp unless I say otherwise. Bring your brother and all your men with you. None of your men is to ever enter this camp without my leave. If they do, I’ll let my wife decide their fate. And considering how you treated her family when they were your guests, I wouldn’t expect her to be merciful if I were you.”

“Yes, my lord.” Lame Lothar didn’t lose time to obey the order. His men followed him, and after a moment, Bronn let go Black Walder. Sansa didn’t know if she was happy about it. She would like to see this man die. He killed her mother. She almost hoped the Freys would disobey Tyrion’s order.

“Lord Edmure.” Tyrion had advanced towards her uncle. Sansa looked at him. Her uncle’s face was completely dirty and unwashed, but his disgust and revulsion was quite obvious.

“Lord Tyrion.”

Tyrion turned again to his men. “Give him a proper tent with everything he needs. Put guards around it. Have him bathed and fed. And untie him.”

Tyrion’s men came to execute their orders and brought her uncle with them after untying the ropes around his hands. Her uncle massaged his hands as he was escorted somewhere else, not looking at her while she kept looking at him as he walked away. She realized Tyrion had approached her, the same sorry look he had on his face almost all the time lately. “The reunion wasn’t what you hoped, I suppose.”

Sansa couldn’t deny it. “No.”

“You could dine with him this evening. Alone. It would be better if I wasn’t present. He may be in better spirit then.”

Sansa nodded slightly. She followed Tyrion as he invited her without words to come with him. Sansa had noticed the queer looks the Lannister soldiers gave her when they arrived in the camp, but now she thought they looked at her even more queerly than before. Ser Daven had acted courteously enough with her when he welcomed them. After all, he knew Sansa was a friend of at least one of his sisters, even a friend for both his sisters now, but his men probably saw in her the sister of Robb Stark, the man who fought them and defeated them at Oxcross.
It took a few minutes before their tent was raised. When it was ready, Sansa let herself drop into a chair. Her whole body was shaking from everything that just happened. Her uncle was close to being killed right before her, she slapped a man and met two people who murdered her family at the Twins. Tyrion gave her a cup of mulled wine. She thanked him and took a gulp while he poured himself another cup.

“Well, that was an arrival. I would pay to see that again.”

“What are you talking about?” Sansa asked her husband.

“You. Slapping Black Walder. That was impressing. Bronn would like to see that again too, I bet.”

Sansa didn’t have any heart for jesting. “He killed my mother. I should have killed him. I should have planted a knife in his heart, or tear off his eyes from his face. My family is dead, and this man lives, as if he did nothing. And his brothers too. And their father too.”

Tyrion dropped his gaze on the ground. Sansa kept drinking her cup, slowly. They remained in an awkward silence for some time, until Bronn entered the tent. “They’ve all been warned.”

“Good. Thank you, Bronn.” The former sellsword left. “Are you ready, Sansa?”

She nodded to show she was, though in reality she didn’t know at all. Sansa and Tyrion had discussed about what they would do once at Riverrun. They had planned everything. They knew the situation wasn’t good between the Lannisters, the Freys and the former Tully bannermen who besieged Riverrun. Tyrion was to speak to the Frey and the Lannister commanders to re-establish order, while Sansa would do the same with the river lords. Tyrion thought Sansa would have more success than him with the bannermen of her mother’s family, but Sansa wasn’t so sure about that.

She felt the hand of her husband on hers. “Everything is going to be alright, Sansa.” The green eyes she had come to love were looking at her, trying to comfort her, but ever since the news about Arya reached Casterly Rock, even Tyrion was barely able to lift her mind.

“I never did this, Tyrion. I never met these men.”

“Sansa, you managed to put Cersei out of King’s Landing, and you’ve acted as Lady of Casterly Rock for months now. You are capable of doing so. These lords of the Riverlands won’t listen to me, but they will listen to you. You’re half a Tully, remember.”

Sansa wished she could believe it, but she didn’t voice her doubts. She knew she had to do it. It could be their only chance to save Arya. They had no time to lose. She already despaired about the time they lost by stopping at Riverrun, but she had to admit Tyrion had been right. They needed the men besieging it to march on the North and save Arya. Sansa had to do it. For Arya. She finished her wine and stood up. She and Tyrion went to the camp south of the Red Fork where all banners cohabited. Frey, Lannister and river lords colors were all together in this camp, but when she and Tyrion entered it she quickly noticed this was no united camp. It was mostly a camp divided in multiple camps, each river lord staying away from Lannisters and Freys, and Lannisters stood away from the Freys as well. This camp was disorganized when Ser Daven’s camp was almost organized like a city. Frey men were drinking and laughing loudly, animals wee wandering everywhere without anyone to watch them. It was as if the Freys took King’s Landing as a model for their camp. Tyrion and Sansa were followed by Lady Brienne, Bronn, Podrick, Ser Daven and about fifty Lannister soldiers. At some point, they parted ways and Sansa headed to the south of the camp where the banners of Tully bannermen stood while Tyrion headed for the north. Brienne and about thirty men followed her.
As they walked among the banners of the river lords, Sansa noticed the way their men looked at her. They didn’t look at her in a much different way than the Lannister soldiers she saw when they arrived. She thought she saw surprise on some of the men’s faces, but mostly she saw hostile glares and disdain. They don’t see me as Lady Stark’s daughter. Or as their king’s sister. They see the Lady of Casterly Rock. They see Sansa Lannister, not Sansa Stark. Perhaps Sansa should have made a change of clothes. She had a red gown on her when they arrived, hoping this would make the Lannister soldiers better disposed toward her. It didn’t seem to succeed with them, but she had forgotten to change her gown after the encounter with the Freys and her uncle. She also had her necklace that could make it worse, but she wouldn’t go without it. There was no way to argue about this.

They reached the tent where an officer of the Lannister army told her the lords of the Riverlands gathered. This man came with them from the Westerlands and seemed to have a decent opinion of Sansa since he travelled with her and Tyrion through the Westerlands. Furthermore, he was sworn directly to Casterly Rock, not to a bannerman of House Lannister. Tyrion had made sure the men to escort them were loyal. Sansa took a deep breath and opened the flap of the tent. Only Brienne accompanied her inside. The most important lords of the Riverlands who had bent the knee to Tommen were almost all there. Sansa knew Lord Tytos Blackwood and Lord Jason Mallister wouldn’t be there nor would they have any representative since they were still fighting against the Iron Throne. Tytos Blackwood had never bent the knee after the Red Wedding, while the Mallisters rebelled recently after initially bending the knee. Lord Jonos Bracken wasn’t there either, occupied at besieging Raventree Hall. As for the men who were present, Sansa didn’t know them. She never met any of the river lords before.

“My lords,” Sansa said as greeting, trying to look impassive.

Most of them got up when she entered. “Lady Sansa,” some of them said as they bowed. Sansa noticed one of them didn’t bow.

The lords of the Riverlands started by presenting themselves. Norbert Vance, Lord of Atranta, was blind and needed help from the other Vance to stand on his feet. Ser Karyl Vance, Lord of Wayfarer’s Rest, with brown hair and a winestain birthmark on his face, had a melancholy look as he said his name. Clement Piper, Lord of Pinkmaiden, was a short man, fat, bowlegged, with red hair. He was the one to not stand up when Sansa had entered and he didn’t rise either when he presented himself. His eyes were clearly hostile. Lord Lymond Lychester was very old, almost as old as Grand Maester Pycelle Sansa would say, with a half-bald head and a tired face. Edmun Roote, Lord of Harroway’s Town, was a man of middle age with a black beard. He didn’t look very friendly. Ser Lyman Goodbrook represented House Goodbrook. Lord Theomar Smallwood of Acorn Hall was tall with side whiskers and a blond moustache. House Smallford was represented by their heir, Ser Leo Smallford, since his father was too old and sick to come himself. They behaved decently, but Sansa could see for some of them they had no joy to be here, though some looked sorry and deeply respectful.

“My lords,” Sansa began after they all took their place around the table, “I think you probably know why I am here. Lord Tyrion and I have come here on the orders of the king to put an end to this siege that has dragged far too long. We hope to end it without spilling blood.”

“With all your respect, Lady Lannister,” Lord Roote said, putting much emphasis on the family name, “the Blackfish will never surrender Riverrun. He took all the food from the surrounding lands and only kept the necessary mouths to hold the castle. They still have enough food to last a year, and Ser Brynden will never give up his home.”

“I have known Brynden Tully since we were squires together, in service of Lord Darry,” said
Norbert Vance. “If it pleases my lady, if you want to end this siege peacefully, let me go speak with him and try to make him understand the hopelessness of his position.”

“He understands that well enough,” said Lord Piper. “The man’s not bloody stupid, Norbert. He has eyes… and too much to yield to Freys. Or to Lannisters.” He looked at Sansa as he spoke the last words. Sansa tried to keep her composure.

“I thank you for your offer, Lord Vance, but that won’t be necessary. Lord Tyrion and I will negotiate with my granduncle tomorrow and put an end to this.”

“He won’t even accept to speak with you,” Lord Piper almost shouted. “Ser Brynden will never deal with Lannisters after everything you did. Everyone knows who’s behind the wedding at the Twins. My son Marq went there with five knights and twenty men-at-arms. They were guests under their roof.”

“My lady.” Karyl Vance interfered. “Lord Piper is speaking out of grief. Ser Marq Piper is his heir and all the knights accompanying him were nephews and cousins.” The Lord of Wayfarer’s Rest turned to the Lord of Pinkmaiden. “Your son and the knights are only hostages at the Twins, my lord. They are alive and well.”

“Let me doubt it when we look at Lord Edmure’s state,” Clement Piper countered. “You broke the guest rights, you and your Frey allies. The Blackfish has nothing to do with you, and I agree with him. Freys and Lannisters, they’re all the same. Even the women, Lady Lannister.”

Anger rose in Sansa. “Lord Piper, is your son alive?” she quietly asked.

“He is a hostage!” he almost burst.

“Don’t start to tell me that. Until very recently, I was a hostage as well in King’s Landing. I know what it is.”

“I don’t see a hostage here,” replied the Lord of Pinkmaiden. “I only see a girl wearing the Lannister colors and serving them, cooperating with turncloaks who broke the guest rights and murdered our sons, our brothers and our friends.”

“Your son may be a hostage, Lord Piper, but he’s still alive. Are my mother and my brother alive?” Sansa asked harshly. No one answered. “They were murdered. I know very well who the Freys are. I lost not only my mother and Robb this day, but I also lost a sister-in-law I never got to know, and a nephew or a niece who never had the chance to see the light of day. Before that, I lost my two youngest brothers to the Ironmen who burned my home. And before, I lost my father. I was there when he was assassinated. I watched him die.” And now my sister is being tortured by a monster she was forced to marry. And my only brother left is at the Wall, in danger of being attacked by dead men. “How many of you have seen people of your family die before them, or lost all their family, my lords?”

No one said anything. Many looked down. Sansa was angry that they saw her as a Lannister. No, in fact, she wasn’t angry about that. She was angry they saw all the Lannisters as traitors. She thought about the sweet and young Joy. She thought about her friends Cerenna and Myrielle who lost their father. She thought about the kind Dorna who lost her three sons to this war. She thought of the little Janei, always trying to play with her hair. She thought of Genna, who helped her to be accepted at Casterly Rock, despite the fact she lost a son too against Sansa’s brother. She even thought about Genna’s other children and grandchildren, despised for the mere crime to be born with the Frey name. And she thought of Tyrion, the man she loved, the man who saved her.
Before she could stop herself, Sansa started again to speak. “When I was in King’s Landing, do you know what I had to endure, my lords? I was being beaten and hit by the knights of the Kingsguard on Joffrey’s orders. Once I was even stripped of my clothes and beaten naked in front of the whole court. The only man who stood up for me, who protected me, was my husband. Lord Tyrion Lannister tried to make peace with you and my brother while he was Hand of the King. He spoke for the North and the Riverlands on the small council. The only thing he wants, just like me, is to put an end to this useless war without violence. And if you really want to know, then yes, I confirm it, Tywin Lannister is the mind behind the Red Wedding. But Tywin Lannister is dead. Joffrey is dead. Are you going to continue this war, to have your lands destroyed, to have your families shattered and butchered, all that for getting revenge on men who are dead?”

Another silence lingered during which Sansa stared directly at each lord in turn, daring them to contradict her. Finally it was Ser Goodbrook who spoke.

“My lady, we understand what you mean. But with all the respect we owe you, many of us here still have kins held hostage by the Freys, or who were slain by the Freys. The Freys still live, and we are forced into working with them to besiege and take the castle of our liege lord. We don’t want anyone else to die, but you can’t hope for us to work the Freys hand in hand as if nothing happened.”

“I know, my lord,” Sansa said with a cooler voice. “I’m not asking you to forget the crimes the Freys committed. I’ll never forget them either. But I want you to think about your house’s interest. Too many people already died, and we must put an end to this. And for that, whether we like it or not, we must cooperate with House Frey.” Sansa didn’t like it, but she had no choice. For Arya, she had to do it.

“So you expect to do as if nothing happened?” asked Lord Piper. “After everything the Freys have done? And with the way they act now? They spit at us, insult us whenever we cross paths, keep all their food they bring from their lands and feast while our own men starve because our own lands were devastated. You ask us to keep quiet while they threaten to hang Lord Edmure every day.”

“They won’t do it again. I saw to it when I arrived. As for the other problems you have with the Freys, Lord Tyrion and I will see that they treat you and your men with respect up to now and that they share the supplies they bring from the Twins. You have my word. But you must behave well towards them in return as well.”

“We have the word of a Lannister,” Lord Piper mocked.

“Yes, you have the word of a Lannister, Lord Piper. And a Lannister always pays her debts. All her debts.” Sansa was exasperated by this man. “Can I count on your help to put an end to this siege?”

All the lords voiced their approval, some more reluctantly than others. Ser Goodbrook had something else to say however. “My lady, I think we all trust you here. All of us here, we fought for your brother and declared him our king. We respected your mother, and your uncle and your grandfather before him as our liege lords, but can we trust Tyrion Lannister? Your mother arrested him because he tried to have your brother, Brandon Stark, killed. A boy of ten. A cripple. How can we trust such a man? I find it hard to believe he has the best intentions for the Riverlands or that he really spoke for your family in King’s Landing.”

Again, Petyr Baelish’s lies came back to haunt them. All this war started because of him, because of a few lies he whispered in her mother’s ears. How could her mother have trusted such a man? How could Sansa have ever trusted such a man? Sansa closed her eyes and opened it again, sighing heavily. “Lord Tyrion never tried to kill my brother. This is a lie.”
“Your mother looked quite certain about the Imp’s culpability, Lady Sansa,” said Lord Karyl Vance.

“My mother was wrong. She probably told you that an assassin tried to kill my brother Bran while he was still unconscious after his fall. Then my mother went to King’s Landing in the hope she might try to find answers about the attempt of murder. She met Lord Petyr Baelish, a childhood friend who once was a ward at Riverrun, who revealed to her that the knife used against my brother once belonged to him. It was a very costly weapon made of Valyrian steel with a dragonbone hilt. Lord Baelish told her he had lost this dagger to Lord Tyrion in a bet during Prince Joffrey’s name day. My mother travelled along the Kingsroad to go back to Winterfell, and while she stayed in an inn for a night, she met my future husband and had him arrested for this crime. This arrest led to the war between the Riverlands and the Westerlands. This is the story you probably heard.”

Lord Lymond Lychester spoke for the first time. “We didn’t know about the role the Master of Coin played in this, Lady Sansa. But this only proves that Tyrion Lannister is most likely the one who hired this assassin, or at least that it was someone close to him who did it. The Lannisters are behind this.”

“There are only three things that make it much unlikely. First, my husband had no reason to kill my brother. Second, why would he try to kill him, and then give him the design of a special saddle so he could ride again not long after? And third, Lord Baelish claims Lord Tyrion won this dagger in a joust where Ser Loras Tyrell unhorsed Ser Jaime Lannister. My husband never bets against his brother.” The lords were silent. “Now, let me tell you what really happened. The dagger was never won by Lord Tyrion. Lord Baelish lost it, it’s true, but not to my husband. He lost it to King Robert.”

There were reactions of surprise all around the table. “That’s impossible,” said Lord Smallwood. “It can’t be.”

“It can.” Brienne stepped in the conversation. “It’s the truth.”

The lords looked queerly at her. “Who are you?” asked one of them.

“My name is Brienne of Tarth. I was the sworn shield to Lady Catelyn Stark before she died. Now I serve Lady Sansa. I was there when Lady Stark questioned Ser Jaime Lannister. He told his brother never bet against him, just like Lord Tyrion told her when he was her prisoner in the Vale. Ser Jaime told her King Robert had a dagger like this one after she described it to him.”

“The words of a kingslayer. You would have us believe the man who killed the king he swore to serve?” asked Lord Piper.

“He told the truth,” Brienne replied.

“Really? Let me doubt it. And why should we listen to you? I heard your name once. You were a kingsguard for Renly Baratheon. Some say you even killed him.”

“I didn’t kill him. I tried to save him.”

“Let me doubt it again,” Lord Piper repeated on a hateful and disdainful tone.

“My lords, this is irrelevant.” Sansa put an end to this quarrel. “We know who tried to kill my brother. It wasn’t Lord Tyrion. It was Joffrey.” New reactions of surprise. Sansa resumed. “King Robert said something about the fact people had no courage to deliver a final blow to a dying child like they could for a beast after my brother’s fall. Joffrey was a spoiled boy who looked for approval from his father. He imagined he would earn some admiration from the king if he did this. He hired a footpad and gave him this dagger his father brought with him. That’s the truth about the assassination...
The lords were appalled. “But my lady,” asked Ser Smallford, “if what you say is true, then why did Lord Baelish say otherwise to your mother?”

It was time for them to know the whole truth. “He wanted a war between the Starks and the Lannisters. As far as we know, that’s the reason.”

“But why? Lady Catelyn and he grew up together at Riverrun. They were friends. Why would he want to start a war?” asked the blind Lord Norbert Vance.

“For power. I don’t know what are Littlefinger’s real objectives, but he wants power, that’s all I know. Thanks to the war, he became Lord of Harrenhal, he married my aunt Lysa, and now that she is dead, he is the Regent of the Vale. He lied to my mother. He manipulated my father into trusting him while he served as Hand of the King, and when my father tried to arrest Joffrey and Cersei, Littlefinger turned the gold cloaks against him. He betrayed him. And he tried to kidnap me when I was in King’s Landing. He was in love with my mother when he was younger, and she refused him. He lost a duel against my uncle Brandon Stark for her hand. My mother was stupid to trust him.” As I was stupid to trust him. “She arrested an innocent man and triggered a war with this act. All this war, everything that came with it, the destructions of the Riverlands, my family’s slaughter, the Red Wedding, everything comes from this man. He started a war so he could rise higher.”

The lords were all talking to each other. Some of them cursed. Sansa let them speak for a time before she stood up. A silence followed. “My lords, I have no intention for people of the Riverlands to die because of the lies a brothelkeeper whispered into my father’s and my mother’s ears. I’m here to put an end to this siege and to this war. If you want to continue this war and to keep seeing your lands ravaged, your people slaughtered and your families murdered, then so be it. But if you want peace before winter comes, then I suggest you to stand with me. Do I have your support?”

One by one, the lords gave their support, beginning by the two Vances and ending with Lord Piper. Sansa made them swear to not repeat what she just told them about Petyr Baelish, and then she took her leave. Things had gone better than she had hoped. She hoped it would go well with her granduncle too. For now, she had someone else to meet. Brienne and her guards followed her back to the Lannister encampment. The sun was already coming down when Sansa arrived before the tent.

She stayed there for a moment, balking before what she would find on the other side. Lord Edmure Tully had been given this tent after they rescued him from the Freys. After travelling through two camps with suspicious eyes on her and the meeting with the river lords who treated her like a Lannister, she was afraid how her uncle would react before her. Perhaps she should really take a change of clothes. But it would seem stupid if she went back to her own tent only to come back some time later with a different gown. Sansa took a deep breath and went inside, Brienne the only one following her.

Her uncle’s new residence was surely far better than the one the Freys had given him considering the state she found him earlier. He was sitting in a chair near a table full of food, but it was obvious he ate nothing. He wore clean and fresh clothes. His back was turned on her and he didn’t turn to face her when she entered.

“I don’t need more food. There’s already more than I could eat.”

Sansa slowly approached him until she was almost standing before him, but he didn’t look at her.

“Uncle Edmure?”

He seemed to wake up suddenly and lifted his eyes. He didn’t seem to recognize her. He stood up and kept looking at her with an expression she couldn’t decipher. “You’re Sansa? Cat’s daughter?”

He wasn’t sure of who she was.

Sansa couldn’t hold anymore. She was happy to see him, no matter if it was the first time. She threw her arms around him and put her head on his shoulder. After some hesitation, he put his hands in her back as well. For the first time in years, Sansa saw someone of her family. She was happy, even if he wasn’t happy to see her. They broke their embrace after some time and her uncle kept staring at her until the beginning of a smile appeared on his face.

“You look a lot like your mother. But Cat was right. You grew to be more beautiful than her.”

He laughed lightly and Sansa followed him. They remained in an awkward silence for some time. Sansa looked at the table. None of the plates were touched.

“Are you hungry?”

Her uncle looked at the table. There was regret on his face. “I fear the Freys may poison me.”

“You’re no longer in the Frey’s custody. It’s over. You have nothing to fear here.”

“Nothing to fear?” He didn’t believe her. She tried to speak about something else. That’s not how she imagined her meeting with her uncle. Well, in fact, she hadn’t tried to imagine how it would be.

“Are you sure you don’t want to eat?” He looked again at all the food beside him. There was envy in his eyes. Sansa took a piece of bread and swallowed it right before his eyes. “It’s not poisoned. I told you. You’re safe here.”

Finally, Edmure Tully gave up, sat and took lots of food in his plate. He really was hungry. Sansa wondered how the Freys fed him while he was their prisoner. Sansa joined him but took smaller portions than him. There was wine as well and Sansa poured some for both of them. He almost swallowed an entire cup before Sansa began to drink her own.

“Are you alright?” she asked him, trying to start a conversation.

“Alright? My father is dead. My sister and my king were murdered on my wedding night. I am married, to a wife I haven’t seen since this very night. I have a son, a son I never met. I spent the last year in a cage at night and on a gibbet during the day. And now my home has been given to the people who massacred my family, and when they take it, my uncle will die. Yes, I’m alright.”

That was a stupid question to ask. “I’m sorry. I’m sorry for everything that happened. I’m sorry.” Tears nearly climbed to her eyes. Her uncle seemed to realize it.

“I’m sorry, Sansa. I shouldn’t be harsh on you. We both lost a lot. And now you’re married to the Imp. Cat would be destroyed if she knew this.”

“It’s alright. Tyrion doesn’t mistreat me. He’s a good man.”

Her uncle stared oddly at her. “A good man? He’s a Lannister! He tried to kill your brother Bran. I know it. Cat told me when she was at Riverrun.”

“That’s not what you think. That’s… that’s not what happened.” She burst into tears. She revealed everything. From the day on the Kingsroad when Lady died to the day Tyrion decided to leave Casterly Rock to save Arya. She told him everything. All the horrors she endured in the capital, her marriage, the trial, but also the time she spent in Casterly Rock and how she came to trust, then to love Tyrion. Her uncle asked her many questions as she told her tale and seemed to barely believe everything she told him. He was horrified by what Joffrey did near Castle Darry and by her father’s death, and also by the way Joffrey tortured her. Each time she told him about Tyrion’s kindness, her uncle didn’t seem to believe her and she had to repeat it very often before he finally considered her husband may not be a monster. He was utterly surprised when she told him Tyrion refused to consummate their marriage on their wedding night, and much more surprised when she told him they had consummated the marriage two months ago. In the end, her uncle looked as if he didn’t know what to think about all this.

“So, your sister Arya, she is at Winterfell?” Sansa confirmed with a nod. She had told him that too. “And she was forced to marry the son of Roose Bolton. That’s why you came here?”

“We must put an end to the siege of Riverrun to go in the North, or else we may never be able to free Arya. We cannot let the Riverlands in war behind us. And most of the Lannister soldiers are here. We cannot bring more from the Westerlands. We need them to face the Ironmen.” Could he understand why she had to do it?

Her uncle looked at her with a sorry look. “I’m sorry.” He sighed. “What would Cat think of it? One of her daughters married to a rapist, the other one to a dwarf.” Before Sansa’s angry eyes, Lord Edmure quickly corrected his words. “Though it seems to have worked out quite well for you. I wish it could work out well with Arya. We all thought she was dead.”

“She’s not. Maybe it would be better if she was dead. But I can’t stay hidden at the Rock while my little sister is being tortured by a monster. I was tortured by a monster before I met Tyrion, and these were the worst times of my life. I don’t want Arya to suffer like I suffered. I can’t allow that.”

“That’s really the reason why you came here, you and your husband?”

“We must take back the North from the Boltons. They murdered my family. They do horrible things there. And my sister is their prisoner.”

“But, that would give the North to the Lannisters. Is that really what you want?”

Sansa looked back defiantly at her uncle. “I prefer to see Winterfell in Tyrion’s hands or in my son’s hands than to see it in Bolton hands.”

Her uncle looked utterly unbelieving at her. “Your son’s hands?”

“I’m not pregnant. But once we have children, the second in line will be Lord of Winterfell.”

Her uncle seemed to need some time to recover his senses. “Alright. I understand. But what’s going to happen to us?”

Sansa had to make him understand. “Riverrun must surrender. Tyrion won’t kill anybody, but all the Riverlands must bend the knee to Tommen. And quickly. Each day, each hour we lose is one more day, one more hour that Arya is kept prisoner. We have no time to lose.”

“You could try to convince him,” suggested Sansa. Her uncle shook his head.

“He won’t listen. He will resist until the men inside the walls are starved. He will never give up Riverrun. Never. Neither I, nor you, nor the Imp, nor anyone will be able to change his mind. He will fight until the end. This castle is his home, and my home. The Freys won’t have it without losing blood. A lot of their blood.”
Sansa looked at her uncle. He didn’t want the Freys inside Riverrun, and she shared his wishes. Only, they couldn’t allow themselves to storm the castle. They needed all the troops they could get. All the troops. She looked straight in the eyes of her uncle.

“And what if the Freys weren’t the ones to get Riverrun?”

Chapter End Notes

I know Black Walder would deserve more than a slap, but Sansa didn’t have a dagger on her to kill him, and she’s not yet at the stage where she can murder someone like that with her own hands. The objective here was more to make it comical to have Black Walder slapped by Sansa in front of dozens of people.

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
All the commanders were there. Tyrion was presiding the war council at the head of the table. Bronn was at his left, a cup of wine before him. Tyrion had one before him as well, half-emptied. Wine helped him to think clearly, no matter what Sansa said. Perhaps it was strange to have a sellsword recently converted into a landed knight sitting right next to him, but as strange as it seemed, Tyrion trusted Bronn more than most of the people here, except Podrick. His squire was staying behind, silent as always, away from the lords that had gathered under the tent. At Tyrion’s right sat Ser Daven Lannister, his cousin, the commander of the Lannister forces before Tyrion arrived. Daven had never been evil with Tyrion. In fact, Tyrion appreciated him quite a lot, even if they were never close. Daven was jovial with a talent to lighten the mood, but he was also competent and serious whenever the circumstances required it. If he held any grudge toward Tyrion for not sending him reinforcements when he asked for some or if he had any hatred towards Sansa because of his father’s death, he didn’t show it. Anyway, Daven had no love for the Freys, so in this tent, Tyrion could count on him as an ally. He wondered if Daven would still look so ready to follow him once he told him about his marriage. Ser Lyle Crakehall, the Strongbear, sat at Bronn’s left and Ser Forley Prester on Daven’s right. They represented the Westermen at this council. Farther at the table sat the representatives of House Frey, all sons or grandsons of Walder Frey. Tyrion wondered if all the army the Freys brought here came from the old man’s seed. Lame Lothar and Black Walder Rivers sat on the left side of the table while Ser Ryman, the heir to the Twins, and his eldest son Edwyn sat on the right side. Ser Ryman was obviously drunk. Here sat the commander of the Frey army. No wonder they did poorly at the siege.

“Sers, I think you all know by now why I’m here. I have come with the king’s command to put an end to this siege. This farce lasted long enough. The Blackfish kept you away from his walls for more than a year now. It’s time for this to end. I expect you to follow my orders in every time and every circumstances, or else you would be disobeying the king’s orders. Do you understand?”

Bronn was the first to react to Tyrion’s speech. “I don’t think this speech was for me. I had no part in the stupidities the men did here. I was at my keep with my wife and I would still be there her if these morons knew how to take a castle.” Then Bronn took a sip of his wine.

“My men are at your disposal, Lord Tyrion,” Daven said soberly.

“I am at your service, my lord,” said Ser Forley as well.

“I am as well, Lord Tyrion. If you allow me, I would challenge the Blackfish to single combat. Mace or axe or longsword, makes no matter. Ser Brynden Tully deserves a noble death, and I’m ready to give it to him.”
The Strongboar was quick on matters and started the council even before Tyrion wished it. “I will consider your suggestion, Ser Lyle. But first I would like to know the disposals House Frey. All House Frey.”

Lame Lothar was the first to answer. “We will do as you wish, Lord Tyrion.” His smile as he said it and bowed his head was the smile of a sycophant. At least he would pose no problem, but he wouldn’t be very useful. Tyrion preferred useful men like Bronn to lickspittles like Lothar Frey.

Black Walder, the bastard, reluctantly agreed. “As my brother said.” His voice’s tone and his angry look told the opposite. He hadn’t forgotten the slap he received from Sansa or Bronn’s threats. His eyes lingered on the former sellsword who kept drinking as if nothing was going on.

Edwyn Frey was the last to speak. “I can give you my word, my lord, that Riverrun will fall before we realize it.” Then we must need a lot of time to realize it.

Ser Ryman Frey didn’t speak, lost in his cups, drinking his second cup of wine since Tyrion entered the tent. He didn’t seem to know he was at a war council.

Tyrion addressed to the heir of the Twins. “Ser Ryman, did you hear me, or does wine take all your attention?”

Ser Edwyn stepped in to defend his father. “I will speak for House Frey, my lord. My father is quite indisposed.”

Ser Daven gave a snort. “Is he drunk, or just greensick from last night’s wine?”

Lord Edwyn wasn’t happy about the joke. “Lord Tyrion, must I suffer such discourtesy?”

“Is your father drunk, Ser Edwyn?” Tyrion simply asked.

The son looked at his father who still seemed unaware of what was going on right before him. “He… my father has a bad belly, my lord. Red wine helps him with his digestion.”

“He must be digesting a bloody mammoth,” said Ser Daven.

“A bloody mammoth? You mean two bloody mammoths.” Daven’s remark had already brought laughter to the Westermen, but Bronn’s addition made it even better.

Tyrion decided all the same to put an end to this. “We are here to take a castle, not to laugh at drunken fools. Bronn, accompany Lord Walder’s heir back to his tent. That’s the place he will be the less useless.”

Bronn carried out the order with great pleasure, pushing Ser Ryman Frey on the ground from his chair and almost forcing him to walk on four legs out of the tent. In the end, it took him so much time that Bronn seized him by the arms, only to throw him through the flap of the tent. They heard a splash outside as Ser Ryman fell on the ground again.

“With some hope, that will awake him a little,” said Bronn as he left too.

“Now that we only have those present of both body and mind here, we can start this war council. May I know how does it come that Riverrun still resists despite a siege that has lasted for more than a year now?”

Tyrion looked at the Freys as he said so. Daven hadn’t remained idle, building trebuchets, catapults, rams, siege towers, trenches, setting a strong perimeter around his own camp, while the Frey camps were disorganized with animals and men wandering all alike, seeming to not know what to do. As for their commanders, they were stupid or drunk when they weren’t both. It was to them that he asked an explanation, though he doubted they would be able to give a good one.

“The Blackfish refused to surrender, my lord,” finally said Lame Lothar.

“That’s quite obvious. Everyone can see the Tully flags on Riverrun’s walls. Ryman Frey may be the only one unable to see them in his drunken state. The real question is, how does it come he didn’t surrender yet?”

“We did everything we could, my lord,” explained Lothar. “We threatened to hang Lord Edmure, but the Blackfish…”

“How many times have you threatened to hang Edmure Tully?” Tyrion interrupted him.

“Almost everyday. But the Blackfish…”

“Only a fool makes threats he’s not prepared to carry out. Whose idea was this threat?”

“And why didn’t you carry out this threat that the Lord of the Crossing and the Lord Paramount of the Riverlands suggested?”

“If we had hanged the man, then we would have no hostage. Have you considered that? Or did you only consider to treat you wife’s uncle like a guest? That won’t bring the Blackfish to surrender, Imp.”

“Imp?” You shouldn’t have said that, bastard. “Let me ask you a question, Walder Rivers. If I were to threaten to have one of my men hit your head on this very table until your face was all covered by blood and your nose broken, unless you shut your mouth, and you presumed to speak, what do you think I’d do, bastard?”

Tyrion had the reaction he expected. “You, son of a wh…” Walder Rivers’s head hit the table once, twice, thrice, until his nose was broken and his face all bloody. Bronn had come back from behind the Freys without being noticed and had carried out Tyrion’s threats with his usual efficiency. When Bronn had done smashing the bastard’s head on the table under the surprised expressions of everyone in the tent, Tyrion ordered Bronn to get him out as well.

“Bring him to a maester, if there is any here. For once he’ll have an injury to attend to.” Bronn brought the second Frey outside in the same way than the first one, though this one resisted a little. Tyrion turned to the two remaining Freys here. “Now, you know what happens to drunks and disrespectful fellows. I suppose I can count on you to remain sober and respectful.” Lothar and Edwyn nodded their head very quickly. “Good. Now, you made empty threats and the Blackfish knows it.”

“We couldn’t carry the threat out, my lord. Our father would never forgive us to sacrifice out only hostage,” pleaded the lame one.

“Then Lord Frey is as stupid as his sons, grandsons and great-grandsons. The king gave you the Riverlands so you could bring back peace to them. And not only you couldn’t manage to bring the peace back, but you managed to start new rebellions against the Crown. Riverrun still holds, Raventree Hall as well, you failed to get rid of the Brotherhood Without Banners and you let the Mallisters rise up against you. The other lords of the Riverlands neither fear nor respect you. They fear the Lannisters. We gave you the Riverlands to hold the Riverlands. If we have to ride into them and take them back for you every time you lose them, why do we need you?”

“Lord Tyrion,” began Edwyn Frey, “if you mean to imply…”

“I’m implying nothing, Lord Edwyn. I’m only asking a question. Can you answer me, or are you also incapable of that? The Freys haven’t proved capable of much lately.”

“We fight for the king, my lord. We pledged our swords to King Joffrey, and then to King Tommen after him, and have fought valiantly for him…”

“If you ever fought valiantly, it was for Robb Stark. You declared for him, turning against your king in the hope that a Frey would be Queen in the North, and when you realized that would never happen, you turned your cloak again. That makes you twice as treacherous as all the other houses of the Riverlands. Your only notable achievement in this conflict was the butchery at the Twins where you murdered people under your own roof, while they were under the protection of the guest rights. Tell me. Who were the most difficult to kill? The drunken lords? The young king with about five bolts in the chest? Or the woman with child?”

He looked angrily at Lame Lothar when he mentioned the murder of Talisa Stark. The man whitened. Edwyn Frey spoke again. “Lady Frey died that day my lord. Lady Catelyn Stark, Robb Stark’s mother, killed her.”

“Yes, she did. After you stabbed her son in the heart right before her eyes. And I heard Lord Frey said something very interesting when Lady Stark said she would cut his wife’s throat if he didn’t let them go. I’ll find another. I think that’s what he said.” Tyrion put on his most threatening and angry expression. He hated the Freys for the traitors and turncloaks they were, for their smug pride, and for what they did to Sansa’s family. They reminded him of Cersei and Joffrey. None of them dared to speak now. “I’ll make things clear for you, Freys. My father promised you the Riverlands if you could keep them, and the Riverlands you will keep if you can indeed keep them, for a Lannister always pays his debts. However, since you’re unable to do anything of any use here, you will no longer be given the right to speak in the war councils or to attend them unless I wish you to. You will lead your men like real commanders and follow the orders you’ll receive from me and my men without discussion. If you refuse to follow them, you’ll be dealt with the same way we deal with soldiers refusing to obey orders like in every good army. I don’t want any incident between you and my soldiers, or the soldiers of the other river lords who are gathered here. If anything happens, you’ll be held accountable for that. And you will show to the other river lords as much as us the respect we deserve. Do you understand, or do you want my friend to give you an example of how we deal with mutineers?”

The two men realized at this moment that Bronn was at the other extremity of the table face to Tyrion, a large grin upon his face. For once, Freys were quick to understand.

“We’ll do as you please, my lord,” said Lame Lothar.

“As you please, my lord,” repeated Edwyn.

“Good. Now leave us. We have matters of war to discuss.” As the two Freys were leaving, Tyrion warned them. “In your stead, I would remain away from the Lannister camp. My wife is not really happy about how you treated her family when they were your guests. She would probably order any Frey she meets to be beheaded the moment she would recognize him as a Frey, and it wouldn’t take long since you all look alike. And I couldn’t stop her from having you executed. Nor would I want to. So stay away from the Lady Sansa. Lord Edmure will remain in Lannister’s custody, and as soon as your father gets sober enough, Edwyn Frey, have him send a message to the Twins. And send the same message yourself. All the prisoners your father is keeping at the Twins are required by the Crown. They are to be delivered to us as soon as we will come to the Twins, in good health and sane.”

The Freys said again they would do as Tyrion wished. With some hope, the Freys wouldn’t pose a problem any longer. When they were all gone, Daven burst into laughs, soon joined by all the other men.

“I’ve been trying to bring the Freys to heel for a year, and you did it within a few minutes,” said Tyrion’s cousin. “Well done, coz. Let’s just hope this will last.”

“I think this calls for a drink,” said Bronn while taking one of Ser Ryman’s cups he left behind. “To the Imp.”

All the men raised their cups and drank. Tyrion joined them. When they had all put down their cups, he cleared his throat. “Now, to serious matters. What’s the situation with the siege?”

“Well, as I told you before, we’ve been building rams, siege towers, raising a well defended boom across the Red Fork,” said Ser Daven. “But while I keep our own men in order and working, the Freys spend their time feasting and whoring and mocking the other river lords. I tried to convince the others to attack, but the river lords are not eager to do that and the Freys prefer to linger here until the end of time.”

“The problems between the Freys and the other river lords might lower now after their little lesson. And Edmure Tully is no longer their hostage. That should help as well. Are we well supplied?”

“We receive food from the Westerlands. I also gave nets to my men to fish in the river, but when winter will come, we could starve. The horses will die first. The Freys refuse to share the food and fodder they bring from the Twins with us, so we must forage for ourselves. But the Blackfish picked this country clean. Half the men I send looking for food never return. Some are deserting, others are found ripening under trees, with ropes around their necks. Our supply lines are also attacked regularly by outlaws.”

“The Brotherhood Without Banners,” said Tyrion. “The hangings are probably their doing as well. We’ll have to take care of them in time. But first, we must take Riverrun, and then the other forts still resisting, Raventree Hall and Seagard. Then we will march to the Twins and get the people Walder Frey kept as guests after his wedding. After that, we will take care of the Brotherhood. What’s the situation for the besieged?”

“As I told you, the Blackfish only kept the necessary mouths. All the others he expelled from Riverrun.” A clever move. That’s the kind of things my father would have done. “He still has enough reserves of food to stand a year, and he keeps his men alert and ready to fight.”

“Is there any hope they could lower their guard? Or even turn against the Blackfish?” Tyrion knew the answer before it came.

“They may have lowered their guard, but not as much as our own men. They’re tired. This war lasted too long. They want to go back home for the winter.” This could be a problem. “The Blackfish’s men are within a castle, well fed and warm, while our own will soon starve and freeze.”

Tyrion took a sip of wine and put back the cup on the table. “Then we cannot wait for a year to starve the Tullys. We must take the castle. And we must take it now.”

“Then we must storm the castle. As I’ve been saying all along. Siege towers, scaling ladders, a ram to break the gate, that’s what’s needed here.”

“I will lead the assault,” added Ser Lyle. “Give the fish a taste of steel and fire, that’s what I say.”

“We will lose many men if we try to storm the castle,” pointed out Ser Forley Prester.

“We will lose them as well if we remain outside waiting for winter,” countered Daven.

“You are both right, sers,” said Tyrion. “We cannot wait outside, but storming the walls would be very costly. Ser Brynden is no idiot. He’s a veteran of a hundred battles. He knows he’s doomed, but he will fight all the same. We murdered his family and gave Riverrun to the Freys. How would we feel if Casterly Rock or Crakehall or Feastfires was given to the Starks or the Tullys? Or to the Freys? He will fight and lose, for sure, but he will bring thousands of our men to the grave with him.”

“Then let’s send the Freys first,” suggested the knight of Feastfires. “Then we’ll send his bannermen’s men. And if that’s not enough, then we will send our own men to deal with what’s left of the garrison. We will reduce our losses, and these damn Freys will support them for once. The castle will be theirs after all, so their blood should the one to be spilled for it.”

“Riverrun was given to Lady Genna and her husband. She is a Lannister by blood. We get Riverrun as much as the Freys, and we should participate to its taking as well,” said Daven. Tyrion was tempted by Ser Forley’s proposition to let the Blackfish slaughter the Freys. There were so many that Walder Frey may not care for their death. However, he couldn’t allow that.

“I would rather use a tactic that doesn’t involve thousands of deaths,” Tyrion simply stated.

“Then let me challenge the Blackfish,” said Strongboar.

“Why would he deign to accept your challenge, ser?” asked Ser Forley Prester. “What could he gain from such a duel? Will we lift the siege if he should win? I do not believe that. Nor will he. A single combat would accomplish nought.”

“Do you have a better suggestion then, Prester?”

“We could send men inside the castle during a night without moon,” suggested Bronn. “We send them in silence to the walls and they escalate them with ropes and grappnels, then they would open the gates from the inside. I can lead them myself. I won’t need more than twenty good men for that.”

“Brynden Tully won’t be duped with such tricks. Storming the walls is the only option. There will be many deaths, but the sooner we attack the walls the better. The more we delay the assault, the more we will lose men to desertion, to outlaws and to the cold. We must take Riverrun. And we must take it now,” said Daven.

“I think we all agree Riverrun must fall now,” declared Tyrion. “This siege lasted for too long. However, none of you seems to have considered diplomacy. I intend to try this approach. Ser Daven, you will send a message to the Blackfish, asking for a parley at dawn tomorrow.”

“My lord, I doubt diplomacy will help us in any way,” commented Daven.

“The Blackfish won’t surrender. He won’t accept to speak with you,” supported Ser Forley.

“Have you tried?” Tyrion asked. The silence revealed the answer. “Then it’s time to try.”

“Wars are not won through parleys,” declared Strongboar. “Swords, shields and arrows win wars,
“Without diplomacy, we wouldn’t have the support of House Tyrell and House Martell, and we would probably all be dead right now. Diplomacy don’t win wars, I agree, but they can end them. Let’s try to end this war with it. If it doesn’t work, then we’ll settle for the military approach. In the meantime, I want you to make sure the Freys share their food and fodder with us, to keep a close eye on Riverrun and to make sure there is no incident between the Freys and the other river lords. It’s time for this siege to become a real siege. Daven, don’t forget to send the message to the Blackfish for the parley. Once you’re done, come to dine with me. I have matters to discuss with you in private. You’re dismissed, sers.”

They all left the tent. Tyrion went back to his own and Bronn positioned some of his men along with some of Tyrion’s guards around it. Podrick helped him to remove the armor he wore since he arrived. Tyrion had to wear it while in war. Daven arrived about half an hour later, still wearing his armor. Podrick had started to bring the services for dinner and Daven fell heavily on the chair face to Tyrion.

“A siege is tiresome, as I see,” commented Tyrion.

“You’re very perceptive like always, coz,” Daven replied with a tired voice. “Those damn Freys! I don’t know why I said in the war council we should participate to the taking of Riverrun and to not let the Freys suffer all the losses. After all it’s all their fault if this siege is dragging on. We should send the insufferable ones in the first wave and keep the decent ones in the last one with us, after the Freys and the Tullys are all dead.”

“Are there decent Freys?” asked Tyrion.

“Ser Perwyn looks like a decent man. He’s the brother of Roslin Frey, Lord Edmure’s wife. He wasn’t present at the Red Wedding. I think his family probably thought he was too sympathetic to the Young Wolf to be present. His brother Olyvar was Stark’s squire too. He told me his sister loves her husband and she prays everyday for him to survive. But the others… Ryman, Edwyn, Lame Lothar, Walder Rivers… The last one more than everyone else. Hates that he’s a bastard, and hates everyone who’s not.”

“Let’s hope they will keep quiet after what Bronn did to them,” Tyrion said as he swallowed a piece of pork sausage.

“I doubt it. But I appreciated what your new knight did. Looking at the Freys receiving a lesson was gold. I think I should try to know him better.” Daven drank wine deeply. “Still with the best wine there is I can see.”

“You know me too well, cousin.”

“Now that you’re the lord, you must have everything you ever wanted. I saw your wife. She’s something.”

“Sansa is a lady and a person, not an object to contemplate,” Tyrion said with an exasperated and reproachful voice.

“Calm down, my lord. I didn’t mean it like this. I just meant she seems to be alright. I don’t think Cerenna would become friend with a Stark if she wasn’t kind and decent. I have nothing against her. I fought against her brother, not against her. And if she’s a friend to my two sisters now… Anyway, she is my liege lady. She doesn’t have to fear anything from me. It’s my men she should fear.”
“I count on you to keep them in line,” warned Tyrion.

“I will. Don’t worry, they won’t try anything against her. She’s the Lady of Casterly Rock after all. But many of my men here survived the Whispering Wood or Oxcross. They were almost killed by Robb Stark. Don’t expect them to be ready to kneel before her, or at least to do it heartily.”

“Just keep them in line, Daven. That will be enough.”

“No problem. Where is she by the way?” Daven asked. “I thought you would dine with her. And I would like to have news of my sisters.”

“Cerenna and Myrielle are alright. But Sansa needed some time with Edmure Tully.”

Daven nodded silently. “You know that storming the castle is the only option, Tyrion.”

Tyrion sighed. “We will storm the castle only if necessary. First we will negotiate with the Blackfish. If he doesn’t want to surrender, then we will storm the castle.”

“He could decide to kill you at the parley.” There was worry in Daven’s voice. “He has nothing to lose. He will bring with him in the death as many people as he can. Do you think he won’t try to bring the Lord of Casterly Rock to the grave?”

“This is a parley. We are talking about Ser Brynden Tully, not Walder Frey. And Sansa will come with me. If the laws of war mean nothing for the Blackfish, family will mean something. He won’t dare anything if it can endanger his grandniece.”

“So you will negotiate with the Blackfish along with your wife? I’m not sure it’s the best tactic.”

“Ser Brynden will listen much more if a member of his family is there to convince him. Sansa doesn’t want the castle to be stormed. She will do everything to convince her granduncle.”

“And if you fail? What will your wife do? Will she let you storm Riverrun like this?”

Tyrion put back his cup of wine on the table after taking a sip. “Sansa knows we’ll have no choice but to attack if Ser Brynden refuses to surrender peacefully. But at least Edmure Tully will stay alive. I intend to bring him back to Casterly Rock if we storm the castle. We’ll force Walder Frey to give us his wife and his son and they will live at the Rock for the rest of their days, far from the Riverlands. Perhaps some day I will even give Edmure’s son some lands after he’s knighted. Don’t repeat it to the Freys.”

Daven looked at him closely. “Your wife has a big influence on you. I don’t know if it’s good or bad.”

“I think we already murdered enough Starks and Tullys like that. And you’re not the one who was married to her when she learned your father had slaughtered her family at a wedding.”

Daven nodded with a grim look. “Well, at least you have a lovely wife. Can’t say the same for me. I’m to marry a Frey girl, I hear. Your father might have seen fit to consult with me about this marriage, by the bye. My own father was treating with Paxter Redwyne before Oxcross, did you know? Redwyne has a nicely dowered daughter.”

“Desmera Redwyne.” Tyrion knew. Sansa talked to him about that. His cousins Cerenna and Myrielle wanted them to annul the deal with Walder Frey to marry Devan to one of his daughters, but Tyrion couldn’t. “Sorry that my father destroyed the marriage of your dreams, but he’s never been good at arranging marriages, not even for his own children. Cersei ended up with a drunken fool, and I ended up with a child of fourteen whose family was at war with us then murdered not long after I married her.”

“Your father seemed better at ruining marriages. Any hope you could annul my dreaded betrothal?”

“I’m afraid not, Daven. Walder Frey is prickly and proud. I already called off two betrothals, so a third is out of question.”

“Two?” Daven seemed perplexed.

“Well, Lancel left for Quiet Isle, so Amerei Frey lost her betrothed. And I arranged a betrothal between Joy and Rollam Westerling. Walder Frey will have to find another wife for one of his bastards.”

“Joy? Married to a Westerling?”

“Not yet. It’s a betrothal. They will marry when she will be fifteen. But with a betrothal to the heir of a minor house, I have every good reason to refuse a marriage to some bastard.”

Daven burst into laughs. “That’s something. Gerion’s bastard daughter marrying the heir of the Crag.
How did you do it?”

“I can be persuasive when I want. My father promised a wife for Lord Westerling’s heir. I thought Joy would be good enough for them. Apparently my father said they would have joy from the bride.”

Don’t forget to invite me to the wedding.”

“I’ll remember.” Tyrion took a more serious expression. “But now we have your marriage to organize, as much as you hate it.”

“I’ll wed and bed my stoat, never fear. I know what happened to Robb Stark. From what Edwyn tells me, though, I’d best pick one who hasn’t flowered yet, or I’m like to find that Black Walder has been there first. I’ll wager he’s had Gatehouse Ami, and more than thrice. Maybe that’s why Lancel decided to confess his crime, so he wouldn’t marry her. Still can’t believe he killed the king. Amerei must be stoatish than I’d heard is she could drive him to that.”

Tyrion doubted Amerei Frey had anything to do with Lancel’s confessions. He never saw her before he revealed the role he played in Robert’s death. “I hope not. Because once this siege is over, we will travel to the Twins and stop at Darry on our way. Amerei Frey is there. And that’s where your marriage will be celebrated.”

Daven looked at him questioningly. Slowly, he understood what Tyrion meant. He snorted. “So, is that how you reward your good cousin, my lord? You know why they call her Gatehouse Ami? She raises her portcullis for every knight who happens by.”

“The man who has Amerei Frey can claim Castle Darry and its lands. Lancel is exiled, we need someone else to take his place at the head of House Lannister of Darry. You’re already promised to a Frey. If you are to marry a Frey, better to marry a rich one. Your children will have something to inherit at least.”

“If they are my children,” Daven countered bitterly. “There’s a huge possibility any child Amerei Frey could have would come from some random knight.” Daven smiled in the end. “But you’re right. Better to marry a stoat with a castle than a stoat with nothing. I’ll marry her, since I have no choice.” Daven looked at the outside. It was getting dark. “I’ll go, Tyrion. Thank you for the dinner, my lord.”

Daven left. Tyrion went to his desk and sat heavily, just like his cousin had done when he had arrived. He was tired from the journey from Casterly Rock. He looked at the map before him, with pieces showing the positions of the different armies through the Seven Kingdoms. They had so much to do. First, they had to take Riverrun. Then, they would have to go to Raventree Hall and end the siege on House Blackwood. Darry would be another stop on the way, only the time to celebrate Daven’s wedding with Amerei Frey. Then they would go to Seagard and force Lord Jason Mallister to bend the knee to Tommen. Finally, they would have to collect the hostages Walder Frey still kept at the Twins along with Roslin Tully and her son. Tyrion didn’t intend to pursue the Brotherhood Without Banners. The river lords would have to deal with them by themselves. Their halts at Riverrun, Darry, Raventree, Seagard and the Twins would already delay them too long. Sansa was right. They should march on the North right now. Tyrion shook his head. He couldn’t let the Riverlands still in chaos behind him. He would have to restore the king’s peace quickly though. Once it was all done, he would march on Winterfell with a great army, plant Roose Bolton’s head and his son’s head on spikes, and rescue Arya Stark. If she was still alive at this moment. Tyrion had some doubts she would still be alive when they would reach Winterfell, or not missing a few parts. He would have to watch out his tongue to not voice his thoughts before Sansa.

The fact Stannis Baratheon was marching on Winterfell as well didn’t help them either. Stannis was a proven and experienced battle commander, and to the opposite of the Blackfish, he wasn’t stuck between the walls of a castle with only a small garrison. He had about ten thousand men from what they knew, seasoned men and sellswords with experience of battles and war. Stannis was an additional variable they had to consider. Most likely he would besiege Winterfell before Tyrion’s army would reach it, and with winter coming, Stannis wouldn’t lose his time like the Freys did. He would storm the castle. Tyrion wondered who would win? The Boltons had a better position, but Stannis had more men and was the best commander. In both cases, one thing was sure, there would be heavy losses. Whether Stannis won or the Boltons won, the winner would support heavy losses just like the one who would be defeated. The weakened army would then face Tyrion’s host.

Tyrion wondered who the northern lords would support. For now, House Manderly was the one who helped Tyrion the most in the North, sending him the most information on the Boltons and cooperating with him to weaken their rule. However, Roose Bolton had Arya Stark. If the Boltons won, who would the northern lords support? The man who stabbed their king in the heart? Or the evil dwarf who forced himself on Ned Stark’s daughter? Sansa was officially Lady of Winterfell and had a stronger claim than her sister, but the northern lords could prefer the Boltons. After all, they were Northerners. Tyrion wasn’t, and their children to him and Sansa wouldn’t be seen as Northerners. They would be Lannisters. On the other hand, if Stannis won, he could declare Arya Wardenness of the North and marry her to one of his bannermen, or to a northern lord who would pledge himself to Stannis. The Red God Stannis followed could make some lords hesitate to join him, but if he promised them revenge against the Lannisters... Tyrion had to consider the possibility that no northern lord would join him against whoever would hold Winterfell once they would penetrate the North. The Lannisters were hated. Everyone suspected his father to be the mind behind the Red Wedding, and they were right. They would possibly have to fight the entire North, but they had no choice if they wanted to save Sansa’s sister. And if what Jon Snow said was true, then it was very important to bring a full army in the North. Far in the North.

Tyrion wondered if they should have warned Jon Snow. They could have asked him to join them in their crusade against the Boltons. On the other hand, the Night’s Watch always stood away from the wars of the Seven Kingdoms, and the black brothers already had their own foes to face. Perhaps Jon Snow would side with Stannis if he learnt his other sister was at Winterfell. That’s why Tyrion hadn’t warned him. Also, if the lad broke his vows, then the laws of the North said he should die.
They would have to fight to get back Winterfell. Sansa would have to face the former bannermen of her father and brother.

As Tyrion was lost in his thoughts and tried to think about a faster way to reach Winterfell and to avoid conflict with all the North, Sansa came inside. She smiled at him, but it was obvious her smile was forced. Tyrion missed the natural smiles she displayed back at Casterly Rock. She had been happy there. She sat in a chair before him.

“They things went well with your uncle?” Tyrion asked. Sansa nodded, but it wasn’t very convincing. Tyrion supposed Edmure Tully was in no good mood. Tyrion wished he could do something. They remained there for a few minutes, Sansa staring at the floor, Tyrion wandering his eyes from his wife to the map before him. Finally, Sansa left her seat.

“I need to sleep, Tyrion.”

“Of course, Sansa. You must just know… We will meet Ser Brynden at dawn tomorrow. If you need more time, I can still send him a message to delay the parley…”

“No.” Sansa shook her head strongly. “The more we wait, the less we have a chance to save Arya.”

Just like her mother was ready to do everything for her children, Sansa was ready to do everything for her family. “As you wish.” Tyrion resumed to look at the map, trying to choose the best routes for his army once Riverrun would be theirs. After a moment, he realized Sansa was still standing before him, playing with her hands. “Is there something you want, Sansa? Is there something wrong?”

“Could you… could you just spend the night with me?”

“Yes, of course. If that’s what you want.”

“That’s what I want.”

Tyrion forgot about all the problems they had for the next hour. Only Sansa mattered in these moments for him. In the end, her head was resting on his chest and one of his hands was wandering through her hair. No matter how she felt, she was beautiful. Right now, she had the same smile she had each night they spent together at Casterly Rock. He didn’t want to break this moment for her, but he had to.

“How was your uncle?”

Just like Tyrion feared, the smile disappeared immediately. “He was alright.” Tyrion didn’t know how to ask her, but after some time she answered before he asked any question. “I told him about our plan. He’s not certain he can trust you. I think he doesn’t trust me. Not entirely. Well, I think he does trust me, but he doesn’t trust you.”

“We can’t blame him,” said Tyrion.

“He said his uncle would probably not listen, not even to me.”

Tyrion brought his hand to her back and rubbed it, trying to relieve her from some tension. “We’ll meet the Blackfish in a few hours, Sansa. We’ll see by ourselves at this moment. Just try to sleep for now. We both need a good night.”

He kissed her on her forehead and laid back. Sansa kept her arms around him and her head rested on his body and after some time, Tyrion managed to fall asleep.
The next morning, Tyrion didn’t know if his wife had slept at all since they were awakened by Podrick who warned them dawn was coming. Podrick reddened when he seemed to realize Sansa wasn’t wearing any clothes under the furs. They ate quickly and reviewed everything they had to do. The parley with Brynden Tully would determine if they would need to storm the castle. Sansa was still unsure. Tyrion was as well, but he tried to comfort his wife and to reassure her all the same. Tyrion donned his armor again with Podrick’s help while Sansa dressed with a simple red gown.

They took horses to go to the main gate of Riverrun. Tyrion could see Sansa was worried. Daven accompanied them to the bridge that led to the drawbridge with fifty men. Podrick and Bronn followed them as well. If things went wrong, Bronn and ten of his men had the mission to ensure Sansa would get out. Podrick was the one to carry the peace banner while another man carried the banner with the Lannister sigil. The twilight didn’t allow them to see very much, but with the torches on the walls, Tyrion distinguished at least ten crossbowmen on the battlements between redoubts. Tyrion and Sansa unhorsed while the other men stayed behind. Bronn wished him good luck as he and Sansa walked on the bridge. They stopped before the drawbridge that was still raised. Tyrion could better distinguish the men on the walls. They were pointing their crossbows at him, or at least he hoped so. If any of them targeted Sansa and released a bolt on her, then he would show them he was the son of Tywin Lannister. No one would want Riverrun afterwards.

They waited for some time. He could hear Sansa breathing heavily beside him. He took her hand trying to reassure her, and he thought he felt her breath slowing down. She kept staring before her at the drawbridge. The last time Sansa had seen her granduncle, she was only six or seven-years-old and she could barely remember him. She wasn’t even sure Ser Brynden Tully would recognize her. Tyrion was beginning to grow impatient of the waiting when, finally, the drawbridge slowly lowered.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa (we meet the Blackfish)
Sansa XXII

Chapter Notes

For all those who were waiting for Brynden Tully to appear in this story, this is your chapter. Let's see if Tyrion and Sansa do better than Jaime when it comes to negotiate with the Blackfish.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sansa found it very long before the bridge moved, but now she found the bridge lowered too quickly. What could she expect from Ser Bynden Tully, the uncle of her mother, her granduncle? She couldn’t even remember what he looked like. How would he react to her? Would he hug her? Smile at her? Kiss on the cheek? Or would he see her as a Lannister? Sansa hadn’t been sure at all how to dress, but she had decided during the night that she would wear the colors of House Lannister. She had to assume the fact she was the Lady of Casterly Rock now, that she was Sansa Lannister of House Stark, and to show it to everyone. Too quickly the drawbridge lowered and joined the bridge where she and Tyrion stood.

When the drawbridge was low enough, Sansa could see the men on the other side, inside the courtyard of Riverrun. A tall man with a grim face, grey hair, broad shoulders and suspicious eyes walked towards them. After ten years, Sansa thought she remembered him a little, but not precisely enough. If she had met him on luck, she wouldn’t have recognized him. He stopped a few feet from them. He was staring at her.

“Sansa?” he asked her.

Sansa tried to smile. “Ser Brynden.”

The Blackfish let the beginning of a smile appear at the corners of his mouth. “Last time I saw you, you were only a child.” He turned his attention to Tyrion and the grim expression returned to his face. “Imp.”

“Blackfish,” replied Tyrion.

“I assume you’re here to fulfill the vow the Kingslayer gave to my niece, and the promise you made to her as well. She sent your brother back to you, alive. I think it’s time you keep your part of the bargain. I see Sansa, but I don’t see Arya. Where is she?”

“I do not have Arya Stark, Ser Brynden,” said Tyrion. “As for Sansa, she can go back with you inside Riverrun if she wants, but I won’t force her to come with you if she doesn’t want. I promised Catelyn Stark to send her daughters back to her, not to you. And since sending Sansa back to her mother would mean to kill her, this is not really a promise I wish to fulfill anymore. And I’m sure you agree with me.”

“Pity. Do you wish to take your brother’s place as our captive then?”
Sansa didn’t like the turn this discussion was taking. “No, thank you, ser. I’m sure your cells are better places to live than the sky cells of your niece, but I prefer the comforts of my pavilion.”

“Whilst Catelyn enjoys the comfort of her grave,” Sansa’s granduncle replied gravely. Tyrion didn’t seem proud of that, and she knew he wasn’t. “Why are you here? And why is my niece’s daughter here?”

He looked at Sansa suspiciously and questioningly. Tyrion was right. It would be better if she was the one to talk, so she did. “Ser Brynden, the king gave to Lord Tyrion the task to bring back the peace in the Riverlands. For that he has full authority to do as he sees fit. We’re here to propose you an agreement that would put an end to this war and bring back the peace in the Riverlands.”

“Peace in the Riverlands. Really? A peace with House Frey in command? I think not. I was there at the Twins when your mother and your brother were killed.”

Sansa closed her eyes and opened them again. “You don’t need to remember me how they died. I know it.”

“And yet here you stand, Sansa.” He made a few steps towards her. “Proposing to surrender this castle where I grew up, where your mother grew up. And to surrender it to who? To the Freys and to the Lannisters. And you propose this as you wear the colors, the sigils and the symbols of House Lannister.” Both the voice and the face of Ser Brynden showed contempt. “I do hope and believe you’re saying these words under constraint. Perhaps they promised you they would spare me and Edmure if you convinced me to surrender. Your mother would have done the same in your place. But I won’t accept.” He looked back at Tyrion. “If you believed that bringing my grandniece would convince me to give you my home, then you were wrong. This is my home. I was born in this castle and I’m ready to die in it. Nothing you will tell me will change my mind on it.”

Tyrion sighed. “Ser Brynden, you are surrounded by an army at least ten times yours. The war is over. I’m here to offer you a chance to save the lives of all your men. We both have two choices. We can either fight each other for this castle or we can end it now without violence. I could storm the castle, but I would rather have you lay down its weapons instead of having thousands of men dying for a stupid and useless war.”

“Thousands of your men, Imp.”

“These men will be yours as well, Ser Brynden. Look inside and outside your castle. These are your men inside, and these are your men as well outside. These are your bannermen. They will die when we’ll attack Riverrun. They will be in the first waves alongside the Freys. You won’t be able to kill one Frey without killing one man from the river lords. The Riverlands will bleed in this battle. Men of the Riverlands will die. Is that really what you want?”

“If this is what I need to do to keep my home away from you Lannisters and Freys, then yes I will.”

“Blackfish.” Tyrion obviously started to get unnerved. “If you do not lay down your weapons…”

“Then you will hang Edmure. My nephew is marked for death no matter what I do. So hang him and be done with it. I expect that Edmure is as weary of standing on those gallows as I am of seeing him there.”

“He will not hang Edmure,” almost shouted Sansa. Almost. Why was Ser Brynden so blind? They were trying to help him. “Edmure is in the Lannister camp and well treated now. The Freys have been set aside. You don’t need to fight for Riverrun. The war is over.”
“I doubt it, Sansa,” replied her granduncle. “As long as I’m standing, the war is not over.” He turned again to Tyrion. “You can either attack, or try to starve us out. We still have enough provisions for a year. Do you have a year, Imp?”

No, we don’t have a year. Arya doesn’t have a year. She may not even have more than a few months. Ser Brynden Tully started to walk away to the drawbridge and its castle. No, he can’t leave like that. What is he doing? He’s condemning himself, Arya, all of us. Sansa couldn’t let that happen. “Uncle Brynden, let me discuss with you in private. Or has family no longer any value in your eyes?”

The Blackfish stopped and turned to her, a queer look on his face. “You may come, but only you,” he said after a moment. Sansa could feel Tyrion’s worried eyes on her. Ser Brynden resumed his path, not looking behind.

Sansa looked at Tyrion, trying to reassure him by showing confidence, but she didn’t think she succeeded. In the end, she said nothing and it was Tyrion who spoke. “Be careful.”

Sansa tried to smile and walked inside Riverrun. That wasn’t how it was supposed to happen. They were supposed to both speak to Ser Brynden. Tyrion was better to negotiate than her, no matter what he said about her own aptitudes for diplomacy, and she felt better when he was there to support her. But it was obvious her granduncle wouldn’t listen to her husband. He barely listened to her. So Sansa had had no choice in the end but to ask for a private discussion.

As she was done crossing the drawbridge, she heard it raising again behind her. She turned to see Tyrion disappear as he was hidden behind the raised bridge. Sansa was alone inside Riverrun. She turned again to the courtyard and saw at least a hundred men looking at her from the battlements, the windows, the stairs and the courtyard where she stood. Ser Brynden was right before her.

“Follow me,” he said.

He walked through the courtyard and Sansa followed him. The men wearing the silver trout were all looking at her with various facial expressions. Astonishment, curiosity and respect were visible along with disdain, hatred and sadness. Sansa felt like she felt when she arrived at Casterly Rock through the Lion’s Den months ago, but worse. This was Riverrun. She wasn’t supposed to feel unsafe where her mother had grown. Yet she did. She followed Ser Brynden Tully to what was the keep of Riverrun. It was triangular just like the castle itself. They climbed the spiral stairs in silence and arrived in a solar that was triangular as well. Sansa noticed a stone balcony all around it. She realized that from this solar, you could see everything about twenty miles around. No movement from the enemy could be missed.

“As you can see, you won’t have any chance of seizing this castle.” Ser Brynden said, as if he was reading her thoughts. “You can tell that to the Imp. My men are hardened warriors and ready to die to defend this castle just like me. We can see every upcoming attack. And this is not a dwarf with five thousand men that will change anything.” He knew how many men Tyrion brought. If only he wasn’t fighting against them but with them. Sansa’s granduncle sat behind a huge desk. “You may sit.” Sansa accepted the offer.

They sat there, looking at each other, Sansa folded her hands before her. Ser Brynden was examining her. His expression had softened and turned sad. She thought she recognized more the man she met ten years ago, or at least what few she remembered of the man.

“Cat once told me you would grow more beautiful than her. It seems she was right. I wish she could see you today.” He sighed. “So, why are you here? And tell me the truth now. You don’t need to lie. I won’t repeat what you’ll tell me here. It will remain within this solar.”
He thought Tyrion forced her to be present. Sansa would have to convince him of the opposite. By luck, she was the one who had the scrolls. She produced them from folds in her gown and put them on the desk.

“What is it?” asked Ser Brynden.

“One of these scrolls come from Ser Emmon Frey and his wife. The other one comes from Tommen. This is a royal decree.”

He looked at her strangely, as if he didn’t know what to think of it. “Can you tell me what does it mean? Did he send you to parley with me in his stead? If that’s the case…”

“He didn’t send me,” Sansa cut. “I came here by my own will because you refused to listen to us right away. That’s why I decided to come inside. To discuss with you.”

Ser Brynden’s lips twisted. “What did he promise you in exchange? My life? Edmure’s life? My men spared? That’s really kind of you to try to save us, Sansa, but it’s useless. House Tully is lost, no matter what happens. I can keep you here inside Riverrun if this is your wish, but I will let you go if that is what you want. I wouldn’t condemn Cat’s daughter to death against her will.”

Sansa was getting unnerved by her granduncle’s behavior. “If you would only cast a glance at these scrolls, you would know that House Tully will get back Riverrun and the Riverlands as soon as you and Edmure bend the knee to Tommen.”

Brynden Tully looked at her as if he saw her for the first time. “What did you say?”

“Read the scrolls,” Sansa ordered him.

With great care, Brynden Tully took the first scroll, the one who came from Tommen, still eyeing her. He broke the seal and read it. Incomprehension and bewilderment were plain on his face. He unrolled the other scroll coming from Genna and Ser Emmon and read it as well. When he was done with reading it, he threw it on the desk and almost spite.

“Does he really think I’m going to believe it? Do you believe him when he told you this?”

“He’s sincere. It’s the truth. This is an official royal decree signed by Tommen Baratheon him…”

“Tommen Baratheon? Isn’t it more Tommen Waters? Or Lannister? We all know who his real parents are.” Sadly, Sansa knew it. Tommen was a bastard born of incest, but he was all the opposite of Joffrey, a kind and sweet boy who was incapable of hurting anyone or anything. “These are words from Lannisters and Freys. Do you really think they will give up their claim on Riverrun and give it back to us? Their words mean nothing. Your brother and your mother experienced it firsthand.”

Sansa tried to recover. “Uncle Brynden, Arya is at Winterfell.”

Her granduncle sighed, looking pitifully at her. “Your sister is dead, Sansa. Arya is gone.” He rose from his chair and went to sit right before her on the same side of the desk. “I understand you cling to the hope she might still be alive. Your mother did the same. But she’s dead. No one saw her or had any news from her ever since your father’s death.”

“Arya is alive,” Sansa stated firmly. He didn’t believe her. “I know it. She is at Winterfell right as we speak. She’s been forced to marry Ramsay Bolton, and he’s a monster. He imprisons girls in dungeons, he beats them, skins them, rapes them, and when he’s bored by them he releases them in the forest and hunts them like animals. We have to save her.”
“Alright.” Ser Brynden raised his hands to stop her. “Who did you get this information from?”

Sansa gulped. “From Tyrion. He has spies in the North.”

Ser Brynden sighed. “Sansa, he lied to you.”

“No, he didn’t lie. He’s telling the truth, just like I’m telling you the truth.”

“He lied to your mother, Sansa. Just like his brother. Your mother released the Kingslayer because the Imp promised her to send you and Arya back to her if he got back his brother.” Sansa already knew that. “The Kingslayer swore that he would bring you back to her. And what did they do? Instead the Imp married you and his brother forsook the vow he made to your mother. The Lannisters and the Freys are lying.”

Sansa tried to explain. “You don’t know what happened. They both wanted to send me back to my mother, and Arya too once they would find her. But when Ser Jaime reached King’s Landing, it was too late. I was already married to Tyrion and Mother and Robb had been killed.”

“Yes, killed at the Twins by the Freys, with Lannister’s complicity. This wedding smells of Tywin Lannister. I know he was behind this.”

“Tyrion and Ser Jaime had nothing to do with this. Tywin Lannister organized it alone. They had no hand in it.”

A silence followed during which Sansa hoped foolishly her granduncle would believe her. “Then it confirms what I suspected. The Lannisters are the ones behind the Red Wedding.” He was angry. He didn’t understand well. “I will not surrender Riverrun to the people who murdered my family and my king. Riverrun will stand.”

Sansa was desperate. “You don’t know what really happened. You weren’t in King’s Landing this whole time. Tyrion didn’t want to marry me. His father forced him to. He was forced to wed me as much as I was forced to wed him. He protected me from Joffrey, Cersei and Lord Tywin, even before we were married, when he had no interest to do so. He put his life in danger for me. He has been nothing but kind and gentle with me. He… he didn’t consummate our marriage during our wedding night. He told me he would wait for me to be ready, and he held his promise. He’s not like the rest of his family. And the Lannisters are not all monsters. I met them, I spent time with them during the past year. Most of them are very kind and decent people. They didn’t take part to the Red Wedding and hate the Freys as much as us. Some are only children. Even Ser Emmon’s sons hate to be Freys. I can’t pretend I like Ser Jaime Lannister, but he’s not as bad as people think. Even he helped me in King’s Landing. The Lannisters are not the monsters you think. Only Tywin, Joffrey and Cersei are monsters. The others are not worse than us.”

Ser Brynden Tully was looking at her. His face turned hard with time and he rose from his seat and went back behind his desk, moving slowly. When he looked back at Sansa, he looked angry. “You speak as if you were one of them.”

Before she could hold her words, they came out of her mouth, with a determination and a certainty she didn’t know she had. “Yes. Because I am one of them. I am their lady. I am the Lady of Casterly Rock.”

A long silence lingered after what she said. “I didn’t want to believe it when I first saw you. After the drawbridge had lowered.” His voice was somewhere between anger and sadness. “You were standing there, looking every bit like your mother. Only you were wearing a red gown, with a gold necklace, holding the hand of the Imp for a moment. And when I approached I saw what was on your necklace. A sigil. A golden lion. I gave you the benefit of the doubt and assumed this was a play, that you were forced to do this and that you tried to save me and Edmure, and your mother’s home. But it seems I was wrong. I think your mother would have feared the same. She never learned you were married to a Lannister. It’s probably better like that. She would have wondered if her daughter had betrayed her. She wouldn’t have believed it, but she would have wondered all the same. And the mere thought of that would have killed her, after everything she endured. But it doesn’t matter. Your mother is dead. Your brother is dead. They were murdered by the people you defend. And now you’re helping them.”

Her granduncle was looking at her accusingly. It was like with the river lords, and in some way a little like with her uncle Edmure. He saw her as a Lannister. She could see that. He looked at her the same way the Lannister soldiers were looking at her. Only when they saw her as a Stark, Brynden Tully, the uncle of her mother, saw her as a Lannister. And he was right. She was a Lannister, but not only a Lannister. She was also a Stark, and she was a Tully as well through her mother’s blood. But that wasn’t what the knight standing before her saw in her. He only saw the lion and red, not the wolf or the blue eyes or the auburn hair. He walked to the door and opened it.

“I think we have nothing else to tell each other,” he said.

Sansa rose from her chair but didn’t walk to the door. Instead she looked straight into his blue eyes, the same blue eyes she had and that her mother had. “Let me be clear about something, ser. My sister is held prisoner by a rapist and a murderer. She is being tortured and raped as we speak. And I will do everything to save her. If I need to destroy these walls and to take Riverrun by force for it, then I will do it. You stand in the way to my sister, the only sister I have. I won’t let you stop me from saving her. I won’t let you and your stupid pride and will of revenge get in my way and have her killed.”

Sansa heard spite in her voice. At the end, she was almost shouting. Ser Brynden Tully walked towards her. He was towering her, taller than her he was. And he was angry, angrier than ever. “I lost a niece and a king at the Twins. I will not let the Freys and the Lannisters take my home. Perhaps you don’t understand that, but I will not let these murders go unpunished. If they take this castle, they will pay for it. They will pay with their blood. If they ever take it.”

“Yes, you lost a niece and a king, ser. I lost a mother and a brother. Before that I lost two brothers. They were only children and they were burned like animals. And before that I lost a father. I was there when he was executed. I saw his head cut from his body, and I saw it roll on the steps of the Great Sept of Baelor. After that I was beaten before the whole people of King’s Landing on the orders of a man who said he loved me. And the only one who dared to challenge him, who dared to protect me in these moments is the man I’m married with today. The man who I love.” She stared at him, holding his gaze. “You think you lost a lot? I lost much more than you. You still have a nephew, and there are still two daughters of your niece who are alive, and the son of your other niece. All I have left now is Arya and Jon, and I will not abandon my sister. Family still means something for me. My family who lives, not the one who’s dead. You can either choose to march with us on Winterfell to save Arya, your grandniece, or you can choose to stay hidden behind these walls like Aunt Lysa did when you needed her. You can turn your back on your family like she did. I think your families’ words need to be changed. It should be Pride, Duty, Honor and As High as Pride. The Lannisters care more about their own than you. And they aren’t the only ones to murder children, unless you already forgot about Martyn and Willem.”

Ser Brynden Tully didn’t flinch. He kept staring at her. “I want you to leave. You’re no longer welcome here. I don’t want any Lannister in my castle.” He turned his back on her and walked back to the huge desk. Sansa remained there, unmoving. When her granduncle reached the other side of the desk, he looked back at her. He looked angry and sad at the same time. “I told you to leave. I Sansa put out the necklace she always bore and threw it at the knight who caught it in the air. “Clasp it in your hand when I’m gone. I’m still loyal to my family. Are you? You have one day to decide. If at the first light tomorrow you haven’t surrendered Riverrun, we will storm the castle.” There was no time to lose. Arya had no time to lose.

She turned on her heels and walked away. She followed the same way they took to arrive in the keep. The drawbridge lowered for her and she left the castle where her mother grew up. That wasn’t at all how she imagined the first time she would come to Riverrun. But when she had imagined it, she was still a little girl with dreams of gallant knights and handsome princes. The only men she met in King’s Landing who were gallant were a dwarf and a dog with a half-burned face.

Tyrion was waiting for her with all the other people who accompanied her. When he tried to know what had happened, she just moved away from him, climbed on her mount and rode for their pavilion. She didn’t care about anyone else around and reached her tent very quickly. There she sat on the bed. She caressed the furs between her fingers.

These are words from Lannisters and Freys. Their words mean nothing. Your brother and your mother experienced it firsthand. The Kingslayer swore that he would bring you back to her? And what did they do? Instead the Imp married you and his brother forsook the vow he made to your mother. The Lannisters and the Freys are lying. The Lannisters are the ones behind the Red Wedding. You speak as if you were one of them. I didn’t want to believe it when I first saw you. Your mother is dead. Your brother is dead. They were murdered by the people you defend. And now you’re helping them. I will not let the Freys and the Lannisters take my home. You’re no longer welcome here. I don’t want any Lannister in my castle.

The words of her granduncle echoed through her head. Then someone entered. Sansa turned to face the intruder. It was Brienne.

“My lady,” she said, “is there is anything I can do for you?”

“Leave me alone.” Sansa averted her gaze from her. It took some time for the Maid of Tarth to reply.

“As you wish, my lady.” She left. Sansa was alone again.

She didn’t know how long she stayed here. Her discussion with Ser Brynden Tully was playing back again and again in her head. Your sister is dead, Sansa. Arya is gone. The two little sentences came again and again. Was Arya dead? Was everything she was doing useless? Did she just say they would take the castle with force if they didn’t surrender without reason? Everything she did, it was for Arya, for the little sister whose quarrels she regretted now. For Arya, who loved to ride horses, to fight with a sword, to shoot with a bow, to soil herself from head to toes while exploring swamps, bogs, forests and trees. For her sister who hated needlework, singing, dancing and playing music. For the sister who put sheep shit under her bed when she was angry with her. For Arya who was always angry with her. Ramsay Bolton imprisons women and tortures them. He starves them, peels their skin off a few of their fingers, beats them, rapes them and inflicts them many other horrible things. After a few months or a few weeks, he releases them and hunts them with his dogs in the woods. If he catches them, his dogs eat them. The marriage already took place two months ago, perhaps more. After a few months or a few weeks. Were they already too late? She just said they would storm Riverrun. For nothing.

Sansa burst into tears. What had she done? She cried, and cried, and cried. She felt a hand on her shoulder. She knew to who it belonged. She had already felt it almost everywhere on her, with or without clothes, to know only with the feeling of the touch whose hand it was. He just stood right next to her, his hand on her shoulder. Sansa kept crying. Finally, she managed to say something.

“He refused.” That was all she could say, and yet it was enough for another sob to escape her throat.

Tyrion moved to sit next to her on the bed. His hand wandered on her back, comforting her a little.

“The meeting didn’t go well. I feared it.”

It was a statement, not a question. She knew he didn’t need to ask her to know what had happened.

“I told him he had until next morning to surrender. That if he didn’t, we would attack.” She told him everything that was important for him to know about their conversation. “He told me Arya was dead. That she was gone. What if he was right? What if Arya was already dead? What if he already…”

She couldn’t say the rest. She couldn’t imagine her sister devoured by… She sobbed again. She let her head fall on the shoulder of her husband. The gentle hands who stroke her hair so many times did it again, but it barely managed to comfort her. “Do you think she’s dead? Do you think we can still save her?”

After a long moment, he answered. “I hope she is alive, Sansa. And I believe she is still alive. She is too valuable for the Boltons. They need her to keep their hold on the North. They will keep her at least enough to have…” He seemed to change his mind and didn’t finish. Sansa thought it for the better. She didn’t want to hear him tell it. He pulled her head away from him and looked directly into her eyes. “Sansa, your sister is still alive. I saw her at Winterfell, and from the little I saw she is strong. Just as much as you are. I’m sure she is still alive. I know it. They won’t kill her.” He cupped her left cheek with his hand. “We will save her. I promise. But I must leave you. I must go and speak to some people. Podrick and Brienne will remain close.”

He kissed her on the right cheek and left. Sansa looked at him leaving the tent. She knew who he had to speak with. He would meet all the commanders to prepare an assault on Riverrun. They would have no choice. They couldn’t wait. As difficult as it was, they needed to take Riverrun, and to take it now. If Arya was still alive… Though Sansa wondered in what state she was if she still lived. She tried to push these thoughts aside. She couldn’t think about it. She didn’t want to think about it.

She stayed in the tent all the day. A handmaiden she brought with her brought her a meal in the middle of the day, Podrick came inside a few times to ask her if she needed anything, only to be dismissed each time with a negative answer. She kept weeping half the time. The other half she tried to do something to occupy her time and to think about something else, but nothing succeeded. She tried to write letters to her friends in Casterly Rock or to Jon, only to crumple all of them in the end. Every time she tried to read she put the book aside before the first page was over. Even embroidery works couldn’t distract her. She had unconsciously started to embroider the sigil of House Tully, but it was all twisted. She threw her work on the floor as soon as she realized it. Tyrion only came back for dinner and they ate in silence. Sansa didn’t dare to ask him questions. She ended sitting on the bed like before.

“Tyrion?” she asked all of a sudden as Tyrion was writing something. He raised his eyes to her immediately.

“Yes, Sansa.”

“Do you think I’m a Stark?”

She could see the puzzled expression on his face. “Of course, you are a Stark, Sansa.”

“I don’t feel like one.” She had finally said what she feared so much to tell loudly. “I don’t feel like a Stark.”
Tyrion approached. “Sansa, what are you saying? You are a Stark, you know that.”

She wished she could agree with him. “I never was. When I was at Winterfell, I only dreamed of the day I would leave my home to marry a prince or a lord from the south, and live happily in a great castle, like in a song. I only cared about what I could have, not about what I had. I never really cared about my family. I only cared about myself. Arya is a prisoner of a Bolton. Jon is thousands of miles away and I never saw him as a brother. I have been closer to Cerenna and Joy than I ever was to Robb, Arya, Bran or Rickon. I was even closer to Margaery in King’s Landing than to them. I’m not a Stark. I was never one.”

Tears were running on her cheeks, silent tears rolling without a sound. Tyrion had come closer and taken her left hand in his own. “Sansa, you care about your sister, and you care about your half-brother. And you care as well for your brothers, and your mother, and your father, even after they’re dead. If you weren’t a Stark, you wouldn’t. Where is your necklace?” he asked suddenly.

Sansa brought her hand where the golden necklace always was, and only found her naked throat and neck. She remembered. “I gave it to Ser Brynden before I left Riverrun. I wanted him to look inside. To see who I was. Who I thought I was.” She gulped, hardly holding another sob. “He told me he wanted no Lannister in his home. He saw me as a Lannister. And the river lords and their men, and my uncle Edmure, and even the Freys I think, they all see as a Lannister. But our men see me as a Stark. They always see me as an enemy. And I think Ser Brynden was right. I am a Lannister. I feel like one. I am the Lady of House Lannister, the Lady of Casterly Rock. I’m not a Stark anymore. The river lords see me for who I really am. My mother’s uncle saw me for who I really am.”

A long silence followed. Sansa could feel it in her. She was Sansa Lannister, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands, Lady of Winterfell, wife to Tyrion Lannister the Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands and Warden of the West, friend to Lannisters, in love with a Lannister, and soon she would bring Lannisters into the world. She was also the friend of Queen Margaery Tyrell of Highgarden. Margaery had kept her origins. She was still a Tyrell, and she would be all her life, no matter who she married. Sansa was no longer who she was when she left Winterfell. If she had ever been a Stark, this Stark had died when she left Winterfell. From this moment, she had been a little girl promised to other men and she had abandoned her origins. That was what she had wanted at the time, and that’s what she got.

“Sansa,” resumed Tyrion, “I have been a dwarf all my life. I have been some sort of an outcast in my own family. An embarrassment for House Lannister. People looked down at me, whether they knew me or not. I was a disgrace hidden to the rest of the world. People saw me as a dwarf, a misshapen little creature. At first I was angry with that. I lit fire in the caverns below Casterly Rock, imagining the people who spoke to me that way burning in that fire. But I didn’t feel any better for that. And progressively, I came to understand that people would always see me as a dwarf. Because it was who I was. So, I accepted that it would always be like this. I decided to never forget who I was, and to wear it like armor, so it could never be used to hurt me. And with time I wasn’t bothered anymore by the fact they looked at me like a dwarf. I even learnt to use it to my own advantage. People always underestimate a dwarf. It served me well.” He stopped for a moment before he spoke again. “It doesn’t matter how people see you, Sansa. All that matters is how you react to this, and how you use it. And one day or another, people realize we are more than what they thought we were. Most of the people, at least.”

Tyrion’s words helped her to stop crying. Sansa understood what he said. She had been a prisoner in King’s Landing for so long, and she knew the way you behaved when you faced people judging you wrongly was important. Sansa had built an armor of courtesies around her back when she was Joffrey’s toy. But she had abandoned her armor when the time had come to play the game, and after so much time in Casterly Rock where she had been well accepted despite some initial reluctance, she wasn’t used to other people looking at her like a traitor, or worse. What was worse now however was the fact members of her own family, her mother’s family, were looking at her like she was a traitor. Perhaps Tyrion felt like this with his own family.

Tyrion stayed with her for a long time, just being there for her like he always was. The sun had set on the horizon and evening was giving way to night. Sansa remembered the ultimatum she gave to Ser Brynden. She was about to ask him what they would do at dawn, but Podrick came in at this moment.

“My lord. My lady,” He bowed awkwardly to each of them like he always did. “My lord, Ser Brynden Tully sent a messenger. He’s asking for another parley with you.”

Sansa’s heart bumped inside her tummy. “What does he want?” she asked immediately. “Did he say why he wanted to parley?”

“No, he only said he wanted another parley. Right now.”

Sansa jumped on her feet. “What are we waiting for?” She started to walk to the flap of the tent. Her granduncle had accepted to surrender.

“My lady, he doesn’t want to talk with you.” Podrick’s words stopped her.

She looked at him. “What do you mean?”

“He asked for a private parley with Lord Tyrion. Alone inside Riverrun.” Sansa turned to look at Tyrion. He looked as dumbfounded as she was. “He says that’s how he will parley. Or else we’ll have to take the castle by force.”

Chapter End Notes

I know there are some of you who must be raging "Another cliffhanger!!!". Sorry if you do. I like to do them too much. Next chapter will be the last one about the siege of Riverrun. Don't miss the denouement of this part of the story.

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
He didn’t know what to expect from this parley. The Blackfish could have set a trap for him, hoping to kill the Lord of Casterly Rock before his army launched the assault on Riverrun. Ser Brynden had nothing to lose anymore. If he didn’t surrender, he knew enough in military matters to know Riverrun would fall. Yes, thousands of Tyrion’s men would die, mostly Freys if they were lucky enough and sent them first, but they would take Riverrun all the same. Perhaps the Blackfish hoped to kill him before the battle. Tyrion wasn’t stupid enough to fight in the first lines, or even to fight at all if they stormed the castle, and the Blackfish surely knew it. Or he certainly believed Tyrion was a coward. By killing him during this parley, he would bear a great stroke at the Lannister army and have the satisfaction of killing the Lord of Casterly Rock before Riverrun fell. However, Riverrun would fall. Bronn, Crakehall and Daven would make sure of that.

But Tyrion chose to go to the parley all the same. He had to try. Sansa wanted to save her sister at all cost, and was ready to take Riverrun by force as well if they had no other choice, but his wife already lost enough people of her family and Tyrion didn’t want to add to it by killing her granduncle. He also feared she might resent him one day for destroying her mother’s home. Tyrion had to seize his last chance to take Riverrun without bloodshed, even if he highly doubted Ser Brynden Tully had changed his mind. Their previous meeting before the gates of Riverrun and Sansa’s tale of their private discussion inside the castle didn’t promise much. Her granduncle treated her like a Lannister.

Tyrion didn’t know what to make of it. Sansa told him she felt more like a Lannister than a Stark. Tyrion had never really thought about this as a possibility. He had tried to make Sansa happy as much as he could at Casterly Rock, but he never expected this. He only hoped she would come to not see all Lannisters like monsters. He even had the foolish hope she would love him one day, which happened against all odds, but he never expected she would think of herself as a Lannister. Tyrion always saw her like a Stark. He meant it when he gave her the necklace. No matter she bore the name of House Lannister, she was a Stark through and through in his eyes. What could have happened for her to see herself as a member of the family who butchered her parents and her brother?

Tyrion put these thoughts aside for another time. He had to focus on convincing the Blackfish to surrender. He had accepted his conditions for the parley, or in fact a part of the conditions. Half an hour after Podrick entered their tent, Tyrion was standing before the drawbridge of Riverrun, but he wasn’t alone. Lord Edmure Tully stood with him. He wouldn’t go alone, and Edmure Tully had been convinced it was in his interest for Riverrun to surrender. It was dark and both Tyrion and Edmure were holding a torch. They were in the middle of the night.

“Who goes there?” shouted someone on the battlements.

Tyrion thought he heard voices from the battlements, but he couldn’t understand what they said. The soldiers were probably arguing amongst themselves, or with the Blackfish himself. The Blackfish probably thought this was a trap. He wasn’t entirely wrong. It would be a trap to let Edmure Tully inside only if Ser Brynden refused to surrender Riverrun himself. One way or another, Riverrun would surrender.

“Lower the drawbridge,” a voice finally shouted from above after some time.

The drawbridge began to lower. Tyrion looked at Sansa’s uncle. “You know what’s good for House Tully. What’s good for your wife. What’s good for your son. What’s good for Sansa. What’s good for you. Even what’s good for the Blackfish, whether he knows it or not.”

“I know, Lannister. You don’t need to remind me what I must do,” replied the lord.

Despite the fact he trusted Sansa, Edmure Tully’s trust for his niece didn’t go as far as her husband. Tyrion supposed he couldn’t really blame him. His sister was killed because of Tywin Lannister. However, the Lord of Riverrun was far less hostile to him than his uncle. The drawbridge was completely dropped and they entered Riverrun. Tyrion and Lord Edmure both wore full armor. They had managed to find an armor of Riverlands soldier that fitted Sansa’s uncle. The garrison watched them, not moving in the light of the torches. The Blackfish appeared behind his men as the drawbridge was raised.

“I told you to come alone,” said the war veteran, not even welcoming his nephew.

“Yes, you told me, Ser Brynden,” answered Tyrion. “But Lord Edmure, your lord, decided to come. After all, this is his castle. If there are to be negotiations concerning Riverrun, he should be there.”

“Yet he wasn’t there this morning.”

“Now he is.”

“I came here of my own accord, Uncle,” confirmed Edmure, though he didn’t mention Tyrion had pressured him to come.

Ser Brynden Tully looked about to spit, but instead turned and walked to the keep. Tyrion Lannister and Edmure Tully followed him to the top where the solar of the Lord of Riverrun was. It was the first time Tyrion saw it, but he knew what it looked like from the descriptions in some books he read. Tyrion and Edmure sat on the opposite of Ser Brynden before the desk.

“Before we discuss about Riverrun, there are certain things I want to settle. First, tell me what is the necklace my grandniece gave to me yesterday.” The question was clearly addressed to Tyrion.

“This is a necklace made of gold and silver. On the outside it looks like a medallion made of gold, displaying a lion. However, there is a mechanism that makes it open when you clasp it in your hand. It shows a silver direwolf once open.”

The knight looked at him with a grim expression, then threw something on the desk right next to Tyrion. The necklace he gave to Sansa long ago landed with a resonating sound on the desk, opened and showing the direwolf. “You didn’t lie, I’ll give you this. Bring it back to Sansa. I’m sure she must miss it. And I wouldn’t want her deprived of one of the few things that still links her to her “Family.” Tyrion took the necklace. “Now I want the truth on another matter. Is Arya Stark still alive?”

“She is,” confirmed Tyrion.

“How do you know it?”

Tyrion had prepared for this. He produced two messages White Harbor sent to him. Ser Brynden read them. “They come from official ambassadors and spies I sent in the North many months ago. Read well the message about how Ramsay treats women. I suppose you’ll understand why it is so urgent to take back Winterfell.”

The knight’s face turned harder as he read the message in question. He put it down roughly. “How did my grandniece ended up there?”

“I don’t know.”

“You’re lying. The last time she was seen was in King’s Landing,” Ser Brynden accused him.

“Arya Stark disappeared the day Eddard Stark was arrested in the capital. Nothing is known of her movements ever since. She reappeared only recently when my men in the North informed me she had been betrothed to Ramsay Bolton. I don’t know how she came back to Winterfell, and her whereabouts in the meantime are unknown.”

“And you expect me to believe you?”

“You have the ravens of my agents right before you.”

“They could be forged. And if I remember well, you had someone tell my niece that you had Arya Stark in King’s Landing, when you promised to exchange both Cat’s daughters for the Kingslayer.”

“I lied,” admitted Tyrion reluctantly.

“Why should I believe you’re not lying now? Roose Bolton is your ally. You gave him the North after he stabbed Robb Stark in the heart.”

“My father gave the North to Roose Bolton. My father is dead, and I have no wish to maintain this alliance with House Bolton. Do you think I want to work with the man who murdered my brother-in-law?”

“Did Tywin Lannister arrange the Red Wedding?”

“My father did.”

“And you knew it?”

“No. I was only Master of Coin at the time, recently married to Sansa and my father barely acknowledged me for his son. Do you really think he would have told me?”

“That fits Sansa’s story.” Tyrion understood now. Brynden Tully was testing him. “However, I would like to know how you made her forget about the way you paid an assassin to kill her brother Bran. Catelyn told me everything about it.”

Tyrion sighed. Again. “I have nothing to see with the attempt of murder on this boy. I said so to your niece when she captured me. And even after I saved her from an attack of the mountain clans, she still believed me to be guilty. Joffrey is the one who tried kill Bran Stark. He’s the one who hired the
So you admit your family was behind this assassination attempt.”

“I admit that my stupid nephew, who had Sansa beaten publicly for the crime of being Robb Stark’s sister, decided to kill Bran Stark because our good king Robert said in his presence that no one had the courage to kill a cripple whose life was useless.”

“According to my niece, the dagger found on the assassin belonged to you.”

“And she got this information from a brothelkeeper. A brothelkeeper who was the one later to tell her Arya Stark was alive and well in King’s Landing. A brothelkeeper who worked for my father during all the war, who betrayed Ned Stark after he promised to help him. A brothelkeeper who once challenged Brandon Stark, your first niece’s betrothed, into duel and was almost killed by him. And your niece was stupid enough to believe him. And by listening to his lies, she started a war.”

“Your father started this war,” pointed out the knight.

“After your niece arrested me. If she had been a little more suspicious of Petyr Baelish, we wouldn’t be at war, and there would be no siege on Riverrun right now. And her daughter wouldn’t be married to a psychopath.”

Tyrion was tired of being accused of his family’s crimes, or of crimes others committed. The attempt of murder against Bran Stark. The starving of King’s Landing and the other ills of the city during his tenure as Hand. The new taxes his own father forced him to introduce while he was Master of Coin. The huge debts of the Crown collected by Robert and Baelish. Joffrey’s murder. He had enough of this.

“So you deny that your family beheaded Ned Stark?” asked the Blackfish.

“I wasn’t there.”

“Do you deny it?”

Tyrion pressed his lips. “No. I would have tried to prevent that from happening. But since your two charming nieces kept me at the Eyrie for quite a long time, it was difficult for me to help Ned Stark.”

Ser Brynden got on his feet. “I defend you to talk about Catelyn this way. She is dead, killed by you, Lannisters.” His voice was controlled, but dark and threatening, full of fury.

“Yes, Ser Brynden,” Tyrion conceded. “You lost your king to Roose Bolton. And my brother lost a hand to one of his men. So we have a common enemy.”

“You compare the loss of a hand to the death of a king.”

“For Jaime, the loss of his hand is no better than death. He is entirely defined by it.”

“Ah!” the knight snorted. “I have no doubt about it. The hand of a kingslayer. The hand who shove a blade in his king’s heart. Though the Kingslayer didn’t die with the loss of his hand. He’s still breathing. The Bolton men should have sliced his throat like he did to his king.”

Fury filled Tyrion, but he kept his control. “Have you ever wondered, Blackfish, why my brother killed the king he swore to serve, to protect, to defend? Why did he stab him in the back?”

“Because this is your nature, you Lannister scum!”
It was time for the knight to learn the truth. Jaime had hidden it for far too long. “Do you remember who was the last Hand of the Mad King?”

“Quarltont Chelsted. Until the Mad King burned him.”

“Yes. But do you know why the Mad King burned him? No need to answer, you have no idea. Lord Quarltont Chelsted was named Hand of the King after the Battle of the Bells when he exiled Lord Jon Connington.”

“I know that. I don’t need a history lesson.”

“You do. Because you don’t know what happened behind the doors of the Red Keep after the Trident. Once it was obvious that the war was lost, the Mad King decided to make sure Robert Baratheon would only have ashes to rule. So he set a plan. He hid caches of wildfire all over the city. Under the markets, under the streets, under the squares, under the whorehouses, under the gates and the battlements, under the Alchemists’ Guild, the Great Sept of Baelor, even under the Red Keep itself. He commanded the pyromancers to burn the capital once the rebels would be close enough. Lord Chelsted discovered it, and he tried to convince Aerys to renounce this scheme. When the king refused, he resigned from his position as Hand and the Mad King had him burned alive. He named the Grand Master of the Alchemists’ Guild, Rossart, as his new Hand. Jaime was there when all of this happened. The Mad King kept him close to him all time. When my father’s army sacked the city, my brother pleaded the king to surrender. Aerys, in his great wisdom, ordered my brother to kill our father and to bring him his head. So Jaime killed Rossart when he tried to execute Aerys’ scheme, and after he killed Aerys like you said.”

A heavy silence had fallen on the room. Edmure and Brynden Tully were looking at him with an incredulous expression. Tyrion kept his eyes on the Blackfish. He had enough of him or Jaime being on trial all their life when they both saved a city and hundreds of thousand people.

“Tell me, Ser Brynden,” resumed Tyrion, “if you had been in my brother’s stead, if the Mad King had ordered you to murder your father and your family, and to watch hundreds of thousand people burn alive, what would you have done? And before you ask why my brother never told to anyone, then you should know that Eddard Stark shouldn’t have considered him a kingslayer as soon as he entered the Great Hall. That’s the problem with you, the so-called men of honor. You only see the world through your code and your vows, and when you see someone who doesn’t follow one of his vows, you consider him an oathbreaker, a man without honor. But you rebelled against your king, twice, only because a member of your family had been killed. What’s the difference between you and my father who declared war upon you after you tried to have me executed? Or Jaime, who killed his king after he ordered him to kill his father? Tell me the difference, Blackfish. And you should be happy that I am alive, ser. If not, Sansa would be miserable right now, and there wouldn’t be an army marching on the North to save her sister. And it so happens that you stand in the way of this army.”

Edmure Tully seemed to gain back his wits at this moment. “Brynden, they offer us Riverrun. We can have our lands again. This is much more than we could hope for. We have to accept their offer.”

For the first time, the Blackfish didn’t seem to know what to do. He looked at his nephew. “You trust this man?” he asked while glancing at Tyrion.

Edmure looked at Tyrion for a moment, then turned his attention back to the knight. “I don’t know, but Sansa trusts him. And if he really helped her, and that Arya Stark is really alive at Winterfell, then it would be foolish to fight. You have no chance against the Lannisters and the Freys together. We have no chance.”
Ser Brynden looked closely at his nephew. “He promised you your son and your wife, I guess.”

“I did,” Tyrion confirmed. “I also promise you your lands, your titles, your castle, and everything we took from you we can give you back. If I could, I would also give you back the people who died at the Twins, but I don’t have the means to bring back people from the dead. The gods will deal with my father about this matter.”

“May the Father judge him justly,” said the knight on a mocking tone.

“Joffrey is dead,” Tyrion resumed, ignoring the dark jape. “My father is dead. My sister is no better than exiled. All the people of my family who played a role in your family’s death or the outbreak of this war are dead or neutralized. And I know you want revenge for what happened at the Twins. You have no revenge left to find in House Lannister. But Roose Bolton is the one who killed Robb Stark, and he’s at Winterfell right now. The only thing you have to do to get your revenge is to bend the knee to Tommen and to accompany us in the North with the Tully forces and those of your bannermen. Then you will have the revenge you’re seeking. And you will save the daughter of your niece at the same time.”

Ser Brynden seemed to consider the matter for a moment. “Is Tommen Baratheon a bastard?” He seemed unsure about that fact.

“You believe Stannis Baratheon?”

“I have a tendency to believe him more than a Lannister,” he admitted. That would be a long time before he trusted Tyrion or any Lannister.

“Ned Stark had discovered, just like Stannis, that all of Cersei’s children were bastards born of incest with our brother Jaime. But who do you think told this to Ned Stark? Who was the only person Ned Stark trusted in the capital? Someone your niece trusted. He married your other niece recently, and she died not long after.”

The Blackfish’s eyes went wide in horror. “You mean that Littlefinger is the one behind this?”

“Sansa told me he betrayed her father, turned the gold cloaks against him when he tried to arrest Joffrey. You think he made Ned Stark believe Joffrey Baratheon was a bastard?” Lord Edmure asked to Tyrion.

“That wouldn’t surprise me,” Tyrion replied. Technically, he wasn’t lying. He was only suggesting something that could have been true. “If Baelish tricked Ned Stark, and that Ned Stark sent the information to Stannis, who he thought was the lawful heir, this is no surprise that Stannis claims it on all the roofs in the Seven Kingdoms and declared war upon Joffrey.”

“Why would Baelish do such a thing?” Ser Brynden asked.

“Who knows? He gained a lot with the war. He has a title, and rules the Vale until Robin Arryn comes of age. The war was quite good for him and his station. Perhaps he arranged for Ned Stark to be killed in the hope he would be able to get back Catelyn Stark. When he was Master of Coin, he spread a rumor in all the Red Keep that he took her maidenhead one night. Everyone heard it.”

“WHAT?” The two Tullys shouted exactly at the same time.

“Lady Stark’s reaction wasn’t far from it when I told her on the Eastern Road.”

“This is a lie!” said Ser Brynden. “That wasn’t Cat he slept with. It was Lysa that he….” He stopped at once. Tyrion looked at the knight. What did he just say?
“Littlefinger took Lysa Arryn’s maidenhead? He slept with her?”

“Uncle?” asked Lord Edmure.

The knight tried to recover. “This is not a tale for now. But about Catelyn, that’s a lie. You can be sure of that.” He sighed. “Alright. You’ll give us back Riverrun, its lands, the title of Lords Paramount of the Trident?”

“All of it,” confirmed Tyrion. “You will also get back your new lady, Roslin Tully, and the heir to Riverrun, her son, who are kept at the Twins right now. You can deal with the Freys like you want, but I would suggest you do not seek revenge on them too harshly or too quickly. The two documents Sansa gave you yesterday will be an assurance for that. Your forces, and the Frey forces and all those of your bannermen, will follow us in the North to prove your fealty to your king by removing the rebellious House Bolton from Winterfell. You will have an opportunity to kill the man who murdered Robb Stark, and all this will be over.”

“And you will get Winterfell instead of Roose Bolton,” completed the Blackfish.

“Winterfell belongs to Sansa, and to her children when we will have some. I intend to give the namesake of House Stark to the one who will become the Lord of Winterfell. House Stark will rule the North again. It will have some Lannister blood, but I suppose this is better than the flayed man floating over the walls of Winterfell.”

Tyrion had this idea in mind for a very long time. He didn’t tell Sansa yet. He would have to convince Tommen, but he didn’t think he would oppose. Kevan may have some reluctance, but Tyrion could convince him as well. As for the Tyrells, they wouldn’t oppose this. Giving the name Stark to the man who would inherit Winterfell would cause them no problem.

Ser Brynden seemed to take his time to decide. His nephew begged him to accept. Finally, the old knight faced Tyrion. “That’s not enough.”

Tyrion frowned. “Not enough?”

“Catelyn, Robb, Talisa, their child. This can’t go unpunished. I will bend the knee to this boy king. I heard he’s not mad like his brother. I don’t care he’s a bastard. I will follow you in the North and kill Roose Bolton myself for what he did, but only if you meet my demands.”

Tyrion sighed. “What do you want?”

Ser Brynden answered with a single word. “Justice.”

They spent the next hour arguing, making plans and looking at a map. When Tyrion left Riverrun, he was alone. Edmure Tully stayed behind. With him inside the castle, it would surrender no matter what happened. Tyrion assembled his war council, composed of Daven, Bronn, Lyle Crakehall and Forley Prester. Sansa was there as well. When dawn came, they went to receive the yielding of Riverrun.

They waited not far from the bridge leading to the main gate of Riverrun. Tyrion and Sansa stood at the head of everyone. They would be the ones to receive Ser Brynden’s surrender. Behind them was the highest officer of the Lannister army, Ser Daven Lannister. Lothar Frey and Walder Rivers represented House Frey, and the present river lords were Karyl Vance and Lyman Goodbrook. They were surrounded behind by a host of soldiers in red armor with a few Frey guards for Walder Frey’s brood.

At first light, the drawbridge lowered for the fifth time within a whole day. A column of Tully men emerged from the gates. They were about fifty from what Tyrion could judge. He could feel Sansa shaking next to him. He held her hand, managing to smooth her a little like always with this simple gesture. Sansa didn’t feel well about all this. The two Freys standing behind her had killed her mother and her brother’s wife. Tyrion knew Black Walder hadn’t forgotten the slap he received from the Lady of Casterly Rock, but his brother, or whatever he was considering the family tree, managed to keep him quiet. Ser Brynden and Lord Edmure arrived at the head of the column, still wearing their weapons. They would lay them down very soon.

“Imp.” The old knight was as warm in his way to greet as usual.

“Blackfish,” replied Tyrion like when they met.

“Finally you come out of your walls, old trout,” mocked Black Walder. The Blackfish eyed the bastard angrily.

“Lord Tyrion, House Tully is ready to bend the knee before Tommen of the House Baratheon, First of His Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, and Lord of the Seven Kingdoms,” declared Lord Edmure.

“As long as you keep your word,” Ser Brynden added.

Tyrion smirked. “Blackfish, there are words we love very much, us Lannisters.” Tyrion turned to Sansa. Uncertainty still on her face, she turned her back to the Tullys and faced the river lords, the Lannisters and the Freys behind.

“A Lannister always pays her debts.”

Swords were drawn, men charged, and soon the twenty Frey soldiers who were present laid dead on the floor, taken by surprise by the attack of the Lannister troops right behind them. Lame Lothar and even Black Walder couldn’t react quickly enough. They were seized by Tyrion’s men and put on their knees. They both struggled to get free.

“Let me go, you whore sons.” Black Walder’s words only earned him kick and punches. Lame Lothar was too much caught by surprise to say or do anything, still in state of shock.

A man brought a wooden block and Black Walder’s head was forced on it. Lothar Frey asked what it meant while the other one kept cursing. Sansa stepped forward. Ser Brynden Tully came next to the block and unsheathed his sword.

“Walder Rivers, I, Sansa Lannister of House Stark, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands and Lady of Winterfell, in the name of my brother, Robb Stark, Lord of Winterfell and King in the North, and in the name of Tommen of the House Baratheon, First of His Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, and Lord of the Seven Kingdoms, I hereby sentence you to die for the murder of Catelyn Stark under the protection of the guest rights. Do you have any last word to say?”

Black was staring at her in a mix of shock and fury. “You won’t do this. If our father hears, you are doomed. He will kill all the hostages we have at the Twins.”

Sansa nodded to her granduncle who raised his sword and brought it down, cutting the head of the bastard off his shoulders in a single swing. Lame Lothar was brought ahead next and his head was forced on the block as Black Walder’s body was taken away and his head put in a sack. He kept wailing and pleading for them to spare him. The Blackfish took the same stance he had before he beheaded his bastard kin.
“Lothar Frey,” said Sansa, “I, Sansa Lannister of House Stark, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands and Lady of Winterfell, in the name of my brother, Robb Stark, Lord of Winterfell and King in the North, and in the name of Tommen of the House Baratheon, First of His Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, and Lord of the Seven Kingdoms, I hereby sentence you to die for the murder of Talisa Stark and her child under the protection of the guest rights. Do you have any last word to say?”

“Please, don’t kill me. I’ll do everything you want. Everything. Just don’t kill me.” He was crying like a little girl calling for her mother.

Again, Sansa nodded to the old knight who cut the head in the same fashion than the previous one. Tyrion looked at Sansa. Her face was stone, but her eyes betrayed the agitated state of her mind. The second head was put in the same sack and brought inside Riverrun by a Tully man.

Tyrion turned to Ser Brynden. “We filled our part of the bargain, Blackfish. It’s time you fill your own.”

The knight nodded and went on his knees, head bowed. “I swear fealty to Tommen of the House Baratheon, First of His Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, and Lord of the Seven Kingdoms, from this day, until my last day.”

Edmure Tully repeated the oath in the name of House Tully and all the Tully men here knelt as he swore fealty to the Iron Throne. The two river lords present knelt as well as their lord paramount made his oath. In the distance, they heard sounds of battle and horses. The standard of House Frey had fallen on the ground when they had killed their men. That was the signal for Bronn and his men, and also for Prester’s men.

When Tyrion went to the two camps the Freys occupied, he found their armories and food stocks guarded by Lannister soldiers, some soldiers bearing the Frey colours lying dead or injured on the ground and all the Frey commanders assembled at the same spot not far from the walls of Riverrun. Bronn carried out his orders perfectly like always, though he limited the number of deaths this time, on Tyrion’s special order. That had been the plan they devised in the night. The Blackfish, the Imp and the Lord of Riverrun had planned to neutralize the Frey army by depriving it of their commanders at dawn, when their soldiers would still be sleeping or just waking up. The Lannister soldiers rushed on them at dawn while Walder Rivers and Lothar Frey were executed. They had positioned them all around the borders of the Frey camps, hidden behind forests or hills. The executions had been the justice the Blackfish demanded for his surrender. However, seeing his resolve, Tyrion had decided they would neutralize the whole Frey army in a quick stroke to prevent any problem. Doubtless some Frey soldiers would escape and report to Walder Frey, but they had no way to stop all of them. Most of the manpower of the Twins was there at Riverrun, and by holding them at the throat like this, they deprived Walder Frey of almost all his forces.

They had a platform risen and forced all the Frey soldiers to look at it two hours later. First they brought all the other commanders in chains. Ser Ryman Frey, still drunk, his son Edwyn, Ser Perwyn Frey, brother of Roslin Tully, and about half a dozen more. Some were only squires, still children. They brought up two spikes on which were planted the heads of the two men beheaded, and both soldiers and family members stared in horror. Tyrion, Sansa, Brynden, Edmure and Daven stood on the platform, the other Freys on their knees, trying to not look at the heads of their kin.

“Look at it, everyone,” shouted the Blackfish. “This is what happens to everyone who breaks the guest rights and slaughter people under their roof. Look at it! Look at the oathbreakers!”

Some Freys looked up while their men couldn’t detach their eyes from the show right before them. Daven took the scroll Tyrion had signed by Genna, her husband and their eldest son before he left Casterly Rock. He read it.

“\textit{I, Ser Emmon of House Frey, son of Walder Frey the Lord of the Crossing, hereby renounce any claim on the castle of Riverrun and the lands, titles and revenues attached to it, and renounce any claim my children might have over it. I humbly ask the king to give it to anyone he considers worthy of the castle and its titles. May the Father lead him to take the best choice there is. Signed Ser Emmon Frey, Lady Genna Frey, and Ser Cleos Frey their son and heir.}”

There were groans among the crowd of soldiers who muttered words to each other. Then Daven took the other scroll, Tommen’s decree Tyrion asked, or more precisely ordered Kevan to produce as soon as he learned the fate of Arya Stark. Daven read it as well.

“I, Tommen of the House Baratheon, First of my Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, and Lord of the Seven Kingdoms, hereby confirm House Tully in their rights over Riverrun and all its lands and revenues. I grant it to them for swearing their allegiance to me, and seeing the wrong in their rebellion in the time of my brother’s rule, King Joffrey of the House Baratheon, First of His Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm. I name Lord Edmure, of House Tully, Lord of Riverrun and Lord Paramount of the Trident, titles to be held by his children and grandchildren until the end of time, as long as they remain loyal to me and my descendants.”

Tyrion stepped forward and spoke loudly. “Men of House Frey. Swear fealty to your liege lord, Edmure Tully, or suffer the consequences of rebellion against the Crown.” The Frey soldiers got on their knees and pledged themselves to Edmure, surrounded they were by Lannister and Tully men armed to the teeth while they had no weapon. Tyrion turned to the Freys in chains. “You are given the same choice, Freys.” They all bent the knee before their liege lord, Ryman Frey the first, probably realizing for the first time his life was in danger through all the wine he swallowed. Their chains were removed, but they were escorted back to the Lannister camp and kept under heavy guard.

Later, not long before the middle of the day, they were all together in the Great Hall of Riverrun, the Lannister commanders, the re-established Lord of Riverrun and his uncle the Blackfish, the river lords, Tyrion and Sansa. To Tyrion’s great surprise, Daven brought Ser Perwyn Frey to represent his house. His speech left some people without words.

“I know what my family has done, and I am ashamed to be part of a family who committed such horrible crimes. Lothar and Walder were my half-brothers, but they got what they deserved. My Lord of Riverrun, my sister is your wife. Your son is my nephew. We both knew nothing of this treachery that our father prepared. I do not ask to be given command of the Frey forces. I only ask to be given the right to speak for my house in the war council. I will return to my confinement as soon as this council is over if that is your wish.”

Tyrion remembered Daven saying that Ser Perwyn was a decent fellow. The Lord of Riverrun gave him the right to be present at the council. These formalities done, the council started. The river lords were angry that they were set aside in all this. Some like Lord Piper would have liked to participate and kill some Freys in the process, while others complained they still had family held at the Twins and that they were in danger.

“This is why we will march on the Twins,” said Tyrion. “Walder Frey is hiding in his castle now. The Twins are strong, it’s true, like Riverrun, and yet they can be taken. The Crossing only has a small garrison left, and the two banks of the Green Fork are without defence. We will besiege them, and if Walder Frey dares to threaten the life of his hostages, then we have our own hostages.”

“My lords,” interrupted Ser Perwyn, “If I may, my father doesn’t care about most of his children. We are so many that he doesn’t give a shit if one of us die. He doesn’t lack sons or grandsons to replace any who dies. He won’t give you back the hostages if he learns you executed Lothar and Back Walder.”

This is what Tyrion feared. Walder Frey wouldn’t care for his progeny. It was too huge already. However, he may care for himself and Tyrion had his little idea about how to force the Lord of the Crossing to surrender the hostages. Or else they would have problems with the river lords, like Lord Clement Piper outlined it right after.

“My son is still at the Twins. We must prevent Walder Frey from knowing about this at all costs.”

“That will be impossible,” said Tyrion. “We cannot stop every man from deserting and spreading the word of what happened here. But Walder Frey may hesitate before he executes anyone. He is many things, but he’s not brave, and he’s not stupid. He will realize he stands alone soon enough without his army, and that each hostage he executes will only make his situation worse. He was the one to command to not execute Lord Edmure if I remember well. He knows his hostages are too precious.”

“My Lord Lannister,” said Ser Perwyn, “my father is bitter, proud, and prickly. He may act harshly and without consideration when he learns about Riverrun. I fear what he might do.”

People were murmuring all around the Great Hall. Ser Brynden hit with his hand on the table and stood up, towering everyone with his huge size. “House Frey murdered people under the guest rights. They killed and imprisoned family members and men of all the houses who are present. Or at least most of them.” He looked in Tyrion’s direction as he said the last sentence. “I say we destroy the Twins. Let’s burn their two towers to the ground and put their bridge into pieces until there is nothing left of it but rubble. They played the Rains of Castamere for us at Robb Stark’s wedding while they were murdering him. I say we sing the song for them now.”

A huge silence followed, until it was broken by the shout of Perwyn Frey. “You can’t do this! The Twins are my home. I have a brother and a sister, two nephews and a niece who are there.”

“Then let’s hope they will have enough sense to leave it before we attack them. You should have tried to stop your father, Ser Frey,” countered the Blackfish.

“What my father did is horrible. I was angry when I learned Robb Stark had married a foreigner after he promised he would marry a member of my family, but what my father did is unforgivable. Still, he is my father.” Tyrion could only agree with that. “My brother Benfrey participated at the Red Wedding, and he was killed there. He got what he deserved. But I was away at this moment, and my brother Olyvar too. He was Robb Stark’s squire and wanted to remain at his side even after his marriage to the Lady Talisa. And Roslin is at the Twins too, just like him now.” Ser Perwyn turned his face to his liege lord. “Lord Edmure, my sister loves you, and she had a son. Your son. They are all at the Twins. If you attack the castle, if you destroy it, my father will kill everyone there before it’s taken. I beg you. Spare my house, for the sake of those who didn’t take part to the Red Wedding. My family is not only a bunch of traitors and assassins. You know it. You’re married to my sister, and she loves you.”

A long silence followed. Tyrion thought there were probably good Freys somewhere. After all, Genna’s sons weren’t bad people like their insufferable father. No, they couldn’t destroy the Twins.

“Then let’s propose a deal to the other Freys,” suggested Lord Roote. “We let them live if they give us Walder Frey. The man planned the Red Wedding. He should die. His children will deliver him. And we have his heir and his heir’s son. We will control the Twins once the old man is dead.”

There were shouts of approval, but Tyrion decided to step in. “My lords, I was given orders to bring back the peace in the Riverlands, and Riverrun was given back to House Tully in that goal. To kill Walder Frey would start a war inside House Frey and bring chaos on the Green Fork. All his children will compete for the title of Lord of the Crossing. They may end up killing each other.”

“Good riddance,” commented Lord Roote.

“Furthermore,” continued Tyrion, ignoring the comment, “Walder Frey is old. He was ninety the last time I looked. He doesn’t have much long to live. He will die soon, and Ryman Frey being an incapable ruler, House Frey will doubtfully pose a threat. No need to storm the Twins. All we have to do is to get the hostages back and to keep Edwyn Frey hostage so Ser Ryman won’t try anything.”

“The old man murdered people under his roof,” said Ser Brynden with hatred. “He must die. Now.”

“Are you willing to risk the life of your son and your wife, Lord Edmure?” asked Tyrion to the Lord of Riverrun. “Because if you want, you only have to attack the Twins.”

“Lord Tyrion is right, my lord,” supported Ser Perwyn. “My father will kill your son if you attack the Twins. He may spare Roslin since she is his daughter, but he will kill her son, have no doubt about it. Please, Lord Edmure. Don’t destroy the Twins. Force my father to give you the hostages we still hold and besiege the castle if necessary, but don’t storm it. This will be a bloodbath, another butchery.”

Everyone was looking at Lord Edmure Tully now. He seemed to hesitate, but after a long time, he spoke and made his decision. “The Twins will not be destroyed. Despite everything they did, the Freys are my bannermen and this war needs to end. My wife comes from this house furthermore. I will not execute her father. But we will get back the hostages Lord Walder is keeping. I swear it by the Old Gods and the New.”

“Then we should march on the Twins at once,” the Blackfish declared. “The Blackwoods are still besieged by the Brackens and Seagard rose up against the Freys as well. We should inform them.”

“You will go to Seagard and make sure they join us on our march, Ser Brynden,” said Lord Edmure. “As for me, I must bring back the peace in the Riverlands and take care of the lands with winter coming. I will go to Raventree Hall to end the fighting between the Blackwoods and the Brackens, then I’ll come back here. I name you commander of all the forces of the Riverlands, Ser Brynden.”

“I’ll accompany you to Raventree Hall, my lord. It’s on the way to Seagard anyway. Then our army will follow the west bank of the Green Fork to the Twins.”

“The Lannister host will follow the River Road and the Kingsroad to the Twins on the east bank,” completed Daven. “But we will have to make a stop at Darry on our way.”

“Darry? Why stop at Darry?” asked Lord Piper.

“I am to marry Amerei Frey and to become Lord of Darry, my lord,” said Daven bitterly.

“A Lannister at Darry! That’s unacceptable!” shouted Lord Roote.

Sansa spoke up before Tyrion could. “Castle Darry was granted to Ser Daven Lannister by royal decree at the condition he would marry Lady Amerei Frey. Ser Daven will swear fealty to Riverrun as soon as he will take possession of the castle and its lands.”

“If you want, I can swear my fealty to you right now, Lord Edmure,” Daven offered.

It was done before all the river lords and the Lannister commanders. Afterwards, the discussions were on details concerning, among many other things, the Brotherhood Without Banners. They were still active, and the river lords weren’t sure if they should consider them as outlaws to be chased and hanged, or rebels against House Frey’s rule who should be given the chance to lay down their weapons. After some argument, it was decided they would give a month to the Brotherhood to end its activities and for their members to surrender to any lord in the Riverlands, after that those who refused to yield would be treated like outlaws.

It was decided the armies would march immediately and that each host would keep half the prisoners of House Frey and half their forces. They would have to watch them closely. They broke camp almost as soon as the war council was over. Two hours later, the two armies were on march, the Tullys and the river lords heading for Raventree and Seagard, the Lannisters going to Darry. Tyrion sent ravens to King’s Landing and Casterly Rock to inform Kevan and Genna of Riverrun’s surrender.

“Don’t you think we should have made hostages?” Sansa asked him about an hour after they left, while they watched the column advance on their horses.

“We already have hostages from House Frey, Sansa.”

“No, I meant hostages from the river lords.” Tyrion looked at her. Was she serious? It seemed so. “I’m not sure they will follow us. Perhaps it should have been better.”

She looked afraid. Tyrion tried to reassure her. “The Blackfish will keep them in line. Your granduncle is a man of honor, like they say. He will keep his word. And the river lords want to get back their sons and their brothers. They will follow us to the Twins. Anyway, at least a member of each house in the Riverlands will be with us in the army. In some way they could be considered like hostages, and they know better than to start a new rebellion against the Crown.”

“But after? What’s telling us they will follow us to Winterfell. They don’t even know Arya is there, and our own men neither. What if they decided to not go in the North?”

Tyrion feared it too. “Your uncle Edmure and Ser Brynden will force them to go in the North. And our men owe their allegiance to us. They will obey.” They hadn’t revealed the true purpose of the march. Except Tyrion, Sansa, Edmure and Brynden Tully, no one in the army knew they would head north after the Twins. Bronn knew as well, but he was no longer there. He had left on Tyrion’s orders with a hundred men for a secret mission in King’s Landing. The river lords, and the lords of the Westerlands too, wouldn’t have followed them in the North when winter was so close, so they would only tell them once the Twins had surrendered and they were far away from their homes.

“You’re worried for your sister?” he asked. She nodded. Of course she was afraid. “We took Riverrun. The Blackwoods, the Brackens and the Mallisters will join us soon. Once Walder Frey has surrendered to your uncle, there will be nothing to stop us on the road to Winterfell.”

“And what if Walder Frey refuses to surrender? Your heard what Ser Perwyn said.”

“Don’t worry, Sansa. Walder Frey will surrender, and quickly. I have a plan.”

“What plan?”

As she said those words, rain began to fall. They pulled their hood over their heads and ordered their horses to move forward along with the column. They should all be wary of the weather. Winter was coming.
I hope you liked my version of the siege of Riverrun. I will only update one chapter next week since I just released five in less than two weeks. However, I will also release an important chapter of my other fic, "A Rose and a Lion", to compensate in some way.

Please review

Next chapter: Mira
She woke up lying on her tummy, her right cheek resting on a pillow, a warm breeze caressing her back from her waist to her shoulders. She saw through the window the sun illuminating their chamber. She sighed, feeling comfortable and peaceful. The Hightower was a beautiful place to live and the streets of Oldtown were a pleasant place to walk. Oldtown was everything King’s Landing wasn’t. Clean, organized, pleasant, beautiful, safe, well fed, full of life.

She turned her head towards her husband, lying in the same position than her. He was still sleeping. She smiled fondly while looking at him. Just like her, the blanket only covered his body under his waist, though Mira wouldn’t mind if there was no blanket at all. Since they met, he had let his hair grow a little and had strands of it falling on his forehead. Mira liked it. She could discard his hair when she was close enough to kiss him or look at him deeply in the eyes. He wasn’t muscled like his brother Garlan, but he had some thin muscles on his arms that were strong enough for her taste. They were strong enough for her to feel safe whenever he took her in his arms, just like he did last night. The memories she had of that night brought another smile on her lips and she closed her eyes for a moment to revive them.

She opened her eyes again and quietly removed the blanket from her legs. She seized a dressing gown laying on a nearby chair and put it on her. Gerold once said the only thing he regretted from her northern origins was her modesty whenever she left their bed. It was half a joke and half a wish, but Mira wouldn’t give up on this. She had no problem sleeping without clothes beside her husband, but it wasn’t appropriate to wander naked in their chambers. She walked as silently as she could to the bathroom and discretely called Saryn, her handmaiden, to prepare a bath. Fifteen minutes later, Mira was resting in the tub. Another fifteen minutes later, she was all dressed and prepared for the day, wearing a grey gown with white on the shoulders. She had already dressed all alone when Saryn came back. Even after two months in Oldtown, she still kept the habit to prepare herself for the day on her own, like she did when she was in Margaery’s service. Saryn only had to arrange her hair like she used to style it in King’s Landing. Mira thanked her when she was done and Saryn left. Mira hadn’t grown very close to her handmaiden. Saryn wasn’t very talkative. She missed Sera.

Mira went back to their bedroom, her husband still sleeping in the same position. She went to her desk and started to write a letter for her best friend, trying to give her news while not making her too envious. Mira pitied Sera. She wished her friend was married like her to a good man. She had grown to appreciate Gerold during the last month. He had his flaws like everyone, but he was kind and gentle all the same, and had many other qualities Mira could only love. She didn’t know if she loved him yet, but she enjoyed her time with him, day and night. She would repay it to Margaery one day. Without her, she would be married to the heir of Highpoint in this very moment. Who knew how her life would be if Ser Kevan and Roose Bolton had succeeded in their plot? She couldn’t imagine... herself living happily with a Whitehill. Mira was done with her letter very soon and sealed it.

She then took a copy of Frozen she found in one of the many libraries of the Hightower and resumed the reading she started yesterday. A discussion between Anna and Elsa brought a smile upon her face. You can’t marry a man you just met. Sometimes they didn’t have the choice to do it. Saryn brought their breakfast. When she left, Mira realized her husband was now lying on his back and was looking at her. A small smile he had on his face widened when she looked at him.

“How much time have you been watching me?” she asked with a thin smile as well, returning to her reading.

“I don’t know. Not enough time, I guess.” She kept reading, knowing Gerold loved to watch her.

He had loved it ever since they met before the entrance to the Hightower. She had to admit she didn’t hate the attention. There hadn’t been many men interested by her in King’s Landing and Highgarden, though there had been some. But she preferred the way Gerold was interested in her, admiring her when young men in Highgarden had tried to convince her to spend some intimate time with them, whether it was in one of the many gardens, the maze or in their own personal chambers. Mira always refused. Only her husband would ever know her. As a highborn lady, it was to be that way, and Mira didn’t have to regret it up to now.

Gerold finally got up after a moment and walked to the bathtub in the other piece. Mira kept her attention to her book as he walked away without any clothes on him. He returned some time later with fresh clothes on him. Mira had to set the tale aside at the moment the second sister met the mountain man. They broke their fast together. Her husband was to train in the sparring grounds this morning, so she accompanied him. They parted ways once arrived, Gerold heading to the armory to take weapons and armors. Mira joined the other ladies assisting the training. Elys shook her hand in the air to attract her attention and Mira went to join her.

“Glad to see you, Mira.” Her sister-in-law already had a cup of wine in hand. She had no problem drinking at anytime in the day, but Mira had to admit she rarely saw her drunken, except in feasts and special events like her wedding. “So, how was the work tonight? Did my brother wear you out?”

Mira sighed. “I already told you I wouldn’t talk about it, Elys. This is between me and your brother.”

“Alright. Like you always say. Though in this case I wonder why your friend Sera had so much to say about it.”

Mira turned her head to look at Elys in complete surprise. “What do you mean?”

“She gave me many details about your nights with my brother. Who would have thought he was such a beast in the bedchamber?”

Mira couldn’t believe it. Sera told her everything. She had promised to tell no one. For a moment she thought about telling Elys about Sera’s true origins, but she thought better. She wouldn’t reveal Sera’s secret. She tried to gain back her composure. “What did she tell you?” Mira asked, trying to look indifferent.

“She told many details about your first week with Gerold,” she said with a wicked smile.

There was something wrong in what Elys said. Mira only told Sera about her wedding night and the day and night that followed. They never talked about it again afterwards. Mira thought she understood now. “Well tried, Elys, but I only told Sera about the first two nights, not about the whole week.”
The smile didn’t leave Elys’s face. “Thank you. Now I’ll know what to ask Sera the next time I see her.”

Mira wanted to curse. Elys had played well. Now she knew Mira told some things to Sera. She would have to be careful the next time Elys Hightower and Sera Durwell found themselves in the same place. They watched the knights sparring before them. All Ser Baelor’s children were among the fighters. Garlan was the best of all of them. Gerold wasn’t bad either, but like Ser Garlan once told her, he wasn’t the best either, nor even one of the best. It was a shame he was named after a Lord Commander of the Kingsguard known as the White Bull. But Mira had observed he was getting better in the last weeks. He spent a lot of time practicing. Perhaps he was trying to impress her. Sadly, Gerold didn’t have the same muscles than many other knights and that put him at a disadvantage. Asher would have defeated him within a few seconds, and Rodrik within half a minute. Elys gave her opinion on all the young men who fought in the grounds, still holding her cup of wine. Mira drank water next to her and ate one lemon cake from the plates servants were carrying all around.

Gerold defeated more people than the times he was defeated. He lost against Garlan, but his brother helped him to get on his feet after he was on the ground and they left in good spirit. Mira knew Gerold’s frustration when he was defeated was one of his main flaws. She worked hard to correct it, but it was easier to say than to do. All the same, there was an improvement in comparison to the first time she saw him sparred. She had been quite hard with him after this first time, telling him he acted like a child before everyone. That had stunned him, but Mira knew he needed the scolding. He couldn’t keep reacting this way every time he lost only because he was angry after some people mocking him. Gerold tried to act better after that, and he also fought better.

All of a sudden, Gerold had to face his eldest brother, Altos. Mira knew the relationship between the two was delicate at best. They faced each other, shields and swords risen. Everyone was looking at them. Everyone knew they had few love for each other. At the beginning, Mira had thought Altos was a little like Elys who simply mocked everything and bore no ill to his brother, but it turned out Altos was really evil, sometimes even vicious with his youngest brother. He really looked at him like a lesser brother, simply because Gerold supposedly would have nothing to offer him once Altos would be Lord of Hightower. He would never act with Garlan like he acted with Gerold. He took pleasure in lowering him, and that had gone worse recently after Gerold managed to defeat the firstborn a few times.

The duel began. They were of equal force, a match for each other, their swords clashing, their shields blocking each other’s strikes. It lasted quite a long time like this, none of them being able to take the advantage on the other. She saw Ser Altos’ wife, Lyanna Norcross, cheering for her husband. Mira decided to stay quiet. At one moment, Gerold looked about to lose his balance. He didn’t, but his brother used it to take the advantage and launch series of attacks, barely allowing him to parry the blows. Mira remembered a time when Asher was fighting with Ser Royland and how he had madly repelled the master-at-arms, raining his sword upon him until the knight had fallen on the ground. That was the same thing Mira saw here. Gerold finally stumbled and fell on the ground. Lyanna cheered louder than ever, but it wasn’t over. Ser Altos tossed away Gerold’s shield and swung his sword at her husband on the ground. Gerold stopped the first hits until the sword slipped from his hands. Altos Hightower was pointing the pointy end of his sword towards his own brother, lying on the ground without defense.

“Yield.” Before Gerold could answer, he kicked him in the ribs. Gerold screamed as he received a second, then a third kick. “Not quickly enough. You should learn to surrender quickly. That’s all you’re good for.” Ser Altos kept turning around his brother, delivering a new blow at different places, even his head. That was horrible. Gerold was on the ground and clearly defeated. Nothing in this was necessary. It was pure viciousness. Without realizing it, Mira got on her feet and walked toward her brother-in-law on the sparring ground. She reached his level and put a hand on his arm to stop him while his back was turned on her, trying to put an end to this without causing further problems.

“That’s enough, Ser Altos. He surren…”

She didn’t have the time to complete her sentence. The back of a hand met her cheek too quickly for her to see it coming. She fell on the ground, face ahead, in the mud. She felt dizzy for a moment, but she thought she heard a few cries, then a raging scream. Sounds of metal could be heard very close along with several footsteps. Before she could regain her senses, hands seized her and helped her to move away.

“Mira, are you alright?” asked a voice. Was it Elys? She looked around her, only to have dizziness taking hold of her head again. Arms and hands brought her reeling to what she thought was a bench. “Mira, look at me. Are you alright?” She thought she recognized Elys’ features, though it wasn’t the only face looking at her. She discerned three or four men holding another one in full armor who tried to escape their hold, screaming madly.

“I’M GOING TO KILL HIM! I’LL KILL HIM! I’LL KILL HIM!”

She never heard her husband yell like this. Another man was lying on the ground, in full armor as well, surrounded by a few other people. She thought she saw blood on the ground. A woman was close to him as well.

“Come, Mira. We mustn’t stay here.”

Elys and a few other girls brought her back to her chambers. A maester and Saryn came to tend to her wounds. A good thing to be in Oldtown was that you didn’t lack for maesters. The Hightower alone had about ten maesters at its service. From what she understood, she only had a few bruises on the right side of her face. When the maester was gone, her handmaiden helped her to get out of her dirty clothes and to take a bath. Mira didn’t expect she would have to take another bath this day. She was garbed into clean clothes once this was over.

When she sat in a chair, Mira started to realize what just happened. Ser Altos had hit her. And Gerold? She remembered seeing him screaming like a mad man, and his brother on the ground, with blood. Did he…? No, that was impossible. She looked at Saryn who was there.

“Where is Gerold?”

“There is a maester tending him, my lady,” her handmaiden answered. “Do you need anything? A cup of wine? Something to eat? Or only water?”

Mira repeated her question. “What happened to Gerold? What happened to my husband? Where is he?”

“I don’t know, my lady.”

“Then find out. Only return when you have the answers.” She almost shouted the order, and the handmaiden was quick to obey it.

Mira found herself alone. She realized her breathing was quick. She tried to calm herself, but she was worried. What happened to Gerold? What did they do to him? If he hurt his brother, then what would become of him? After a few minutes, someone entered. It wasn’t Saryn like Mira expected, but Elys.
“Mira.”

“Elys. Where is Gerold? Is he alright?”

“Don’t worry,” she said, making an appeasing gesture with her hands. “Gerold is alright. They just keep him far away from Altos. Truth be told, my eldest brother is the one who’s not very well. Gerold almost ruined his face, and he keeps saying he’s going to kill Altos.”

“Did they put him into a cell?” asked Mira, horrified.

“No, gods be good! He’s alright, I told you. They just keep him in another room until he cools down.” Mira quietened down a little. Gerold wasn’t in a cell, or in danger. She didn’t want him to be. Her friend came to sit close to her. “I have to admit that was something to see. I never saw my brother like this. He looked like a savage beast. Gerold jumped on Altos right after he slapped you and almost beat him bloody. It will take a lot of time for Altos to be presentable again. That should give us some peace for a while, though that may be worse when he gets back on his feet. Or it may get better, if he learns to not provoke Gerold.”

Mira sighed. “I shouldn’t have done this. I shouldn’t have tried to intervene. None of this would have happened.”

Elys scoffed. “You couldn’t know Altos would be stupid enough to hit you, and that Gerold would respond by disfiguring him. Though I have to admit you’re probably the only woman here who would have tried to stop a knight in the middle of a fight. Except myself perhaps, but I’m not married yet and I have no suitor for now, so I’m not a normal woman.”

They both laughed. “That’s not funny, Elys. One of your brothers is badly injured.”

Elys Hightower shrugged. “That won’t be permanent. He’s not in danger. And if he was, we have the best maesters and healers of the Seven Kingdoms within hand’s reach. Perhaps that will teach him to be less arrogant, though I doubt it. But it was amusing to see him being beaten by the little brother he always mocks.”

A silence followed. Mira was lost in her thoughts. What would happen after that? That was no small accident that just happened. The future heir to Hightower was almost disfigured.

“Show me your wound, Mira,” Elys asked after a moment. Mira showed her the right side of her face and Elys put a hand on the bruise. The pressure brought some pain upon her face. She gasped. “Nothing serious. That will be gone in a few days. And once Gerold will be calm again, he’ll be able to kiss it during the night.”

Mira wasn’t really in the mood for this kind of thoughts or jokes, whatever it was for Elys. The door opened and two people entered. It was Ser Garlan Hightower and his wife, Lady Venia Webber. They were bringing news of Gerold. They had managed to calm him enough so that he would stop saying he would kill his brother. He was alright but asked for her news and was worried about her. Mira told them she was alright and to repeat it to her husband. Venia told her she shouldn’t have intervened, that it was inappropriate for a lady, but Garlan scolded his wife and said Mira had nothing to blame herself for. Altos was the responsible one. They left a few minutes later. Mira also received the visit of Ser Altos’ wife, Lady Lyanna, who expressed her apologies for her husband’s actions. He was the one who hit Mira, which was unforgivable, and she asked for Mira’s forgiveness. Mira granted it as long as they didn’t hold rancor against her own husband and wished Lyanna that Ser Altos would recover quickly.

Mira spent most of the day in Elys’ company. They decided to make some embroidery to spend time.
They even dined together, though Mira wasn’t hungry. Elys remarked Mira couldn’t eat less than she already ate. Mira knew very well she ate less than most of the people at Hightower and in Oldtown. This was another inheritance of her northern education.

Passed the time when the sun disappeared, the door finally opened to let Gerold enter. Elys quickly excused herself and let them alone. They remained still for a moment, looking at each other. He had a few bruises too, and Mira could see by the way he walked that his ribs and legs pained him. Unable to hold anymore, she ran to him and threw her arms around his neck. His own arms came around her back, and Mira wept. For the first time in months, she cried. She buried her face into his shoulder. They remained this way for some time.

“I was afraid for you,” he finally said.

“And me for you.”

“I’m alright. Only some pain in the back. Nothing serious. And you?”

He backed his head to look at her face. His hand brushed her right cheek and Mira felt the same pain than when Elys touched it. “It’s nothing. It won’t remain here for long. I’m alright.” She still had water in her eyes and her husband wiped the tears with his fingers.

“If he ever touches you again, I’ll kill him for real.” There was a determination in his eyes she never saw before.

“Please don’t do this, Gerold. He’s your brother.”

“I don’t care. If he ever tries to hit or slap you again, I’ll kill him. I almost wish I had this morning.”

“You cannot do this. You don’t have to do this.” She would have to watch her husband so he wouldn’t meet Altos too often.

“I do. You’re everything to me. I would kill for you. I would do anything for you.” He pulled her into a new embrace. “I love you, Mira. I love you.”

He held her against him, his arm tightening around her. Mira had tears filling her eyes. She felt something break inside her. She cried, and cried again. She spent the night into her husband’s arms. He held her tightly, as if he was afraid to lose her. He fell asleep before her. When she was sure he was sleeping, Mira murmured with the lowest voice she had.

“I love you, Gerold. I love you, my love.” She fell asleep not long after.

The next morning, they broke their fast in silence, and spent most of the morning in silence as well. Gerold didn’t seem eager to leave their rooms, and she wasn’t about to encourage him to do so. She didn’t really want to leave them either. However, as midday approached, Saryn came to inform them their presence was required in Lord Leyton’s solar. They had no choice but to go. They crossed the path of a few people on their way to the solar at the top of the Hightower. Many bowed among the servants and Mira could see their empathy for her if not for Gerold, but some also tried to not look at them. They even met a few hostile looks, though there were very few.

Leyton Hightower, Lord of the Hightower, Lord of the Port, Voice of Oldtown, Defender of the Citadel and Beacon of the South, sat behind his desk and welcomed her with a smile. He didn’t stand up however like the other people already with him in his solar, Ser Baelor and Ser Garlan.

“Mira, I’m glad to see you are well. Sorry I didn’t pay you a visit. I hope your cheek doesn’t hurt,” the old lord told her.
“No, my lord,” Mira assured him. “The maester told me the bruises would be gone in a few days. It doesn’t hurt much.”

“Good.” There was relief on the old man’s face. Mira saw that her father-in-law was looking at Gerold with something between anger and disappointment.

“Is Ser Altos alright?” she asked.

“He is,” answered immediately Garlan. “I visited him this morning. He fares well. He has a few broken teeth and will have marks for some time, but he will recover. Lyanna is always with him.”

“You shouldn’t have interfered, Lady Mira,” declared Ser Baelor. “It wasn’t your duty to interfere in the duel. As for you Gerold, I thought better of you. I didn’t think you would beat your brother like this.”

“He hit my wife!” shouted Mira’s husband.

“He is your brother.”

“What would you have done if Altos had attacked our mother?”

Ser Baelor didn’t seem able to reply to this. Ser Garlan intervened. “Father, Lady Mira shouldn’t have tried to intervene and Gerold shouldn’t have beaten Altos either, you’re right. But Altos is the one who started all of this. He kept beating Gerold while he was still lying on the ground and he’s the one who hit Lady Mira. He’s responsible of this. Lady Mira may not have acted like she should have, but remember she comes from the North. From what I know, women in the North don’t stay still while their husband is being beaten.”

Mira shot a grateful glance at Ser Garlan. What he said wasn’t untrue, especially far in the North among families like the Umbers or the Mormonts, but Northerners weren’t wildlings either. Women seldom fought on the battlefield, and Mira’s mother came from the south. Her parents hadn’t encouraged Mira and her sister to fight and mostly they were taught to remain discreet and to support their husband and their family in privacy more than publicly. Nevertheless, Mira had grown up in the North and women weren’t expected to stay hidden doing nothing while their husband did all the work. The North was hard, and everyone had to stand up and work to survive.

“I will have a good discussion with Altos once he feels better,” said Lord Leyton. “He is to be Lord of the Hightower one day. We cannot allow such behavior from him, and neither from you, Gerold. I don’t want this to happen again.”

“He attacked my wife!” Gerold argued.

“That won’t happen again. I expect you to not assault your own brother in return. Do I have your word?”

Gerold didn’t want to comply, Mira knew it. She gave him a pleading look and, grudgingly, he accepted. “You have my word, grandfather.”

“Then the matter is settled. Now please sit. There is something else we must talk about.” Gerold took a seat between his brother and his father. “You too, Mira. This concerns you.” Mira sat as well between her husband and his brother.

Lord Leyton took a long inspiration. “We received a raven yesterday in the afternoon. A raven for you, Mira. It came from King’s Landing. From the king.”
“The king?”

“Yes, my lady. Maester Alfryd would have given it to you yesterday, but with everything that happened and the matter of the message, I thought it would be better to wait.”

Lord Leyton slowly handed the scroll to her. Mira read it and couldn’t have been more surprised.

Lady Mira,

You were always very kind with me, and your family didn’t deserve to die. I want to inform you that Roose Bolton will soon be branded a traitor to the Realm. My uncle discovered that Lord Bolton captured Arya Stark and forced her to marry his son. Everyone agrees this is treason. He will soon be removed from Winterfell, and I’ll see that you get back your home.

Yours sincerely,

Tommen of the House Baratheon, First of His Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoylnar, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms

Arya Stark? She remembered Sansa speaking about her little sister a few times, but she was supposed to be dead. She had disappeared not long after Lord Eddard Stark was arrested. All of sudden, she appeared again, at Winterfell, married to Ramsay Snow. She diverted her attention from the scroll and looked back at Lord Hightower. He was looking intently at her.

“I didn’t know you were so close to the king, my lady,” he said.

“I wasn’t very close to the king, my lord, but I was a handmaiden and friend of Queen Margaery. I spoke a few times with his Grace, and the queen said she would help me get back Ironrath one day,” Mira explained.

“Yes, I have no doubt about it. It seems this time is coming. House Whitehill is allied to House Bolton. If the Boltons fall, the Whitehills fall with them. However, I didn’t expect the Boltons would be stripped of their titles so soon.”

“Then we should prepare,” declared Gerold. It seemed he had read the scroll over her shoulder. “If the Boltons are to be deposed, we should be prepared to go in the North.”

“Don’t be so quick about it, Gerold. Mira, how many men the Whitehills have?”

Mira considered a moment before answering. “They could muster approximately the same number of men than my father at the beginning of the war, so five hundred men. However, they lost some during the war and some more when they attacked Ironrath. They could raise some more men from the lands attached to Ironrath. They could also hire sellswords, but I doubt they have the money for it. I think that right now they can raise an army of five hundred men like at the beginning of the war.”

“And they have two fortresses,” added Ser Baelor. “Highpoint and Ironrath. We would need a bigger army than the one they have.”

“Not necessarily, ser,” intervened Mira. “I know Lord Tyrion Lannister recently led an army in the Riverlands. Officially, it is to pacify the region and end the siege of Riverrun, but I don’t think so. I know Lord Tyrion, and he loves his wife. I can’t imagine him taking by force the castle of her mother’s family. Catelyn Stark was a Tully. I think he’s leading a great army in the North. He’s preparing an invasion and he uses the chaos in the Riverlands as an excuse. He is about to attack the North. If we were to join the Lannister host, we wouldn’t need to send too many men in the North.”
“These are only suppositions, Lady Mira,” pointed out Ser Baelor. “Lord Tyrion could really be in the Riverlands to restore peace and nothing else.”

“It’s possible, Father,” conceded Garlan, “but it would be strange for him to go there himself. Why would a dwarf go in the Riverlands? He could have given the task to one of his commanders. But if he is about to invade the North and to take possession of Winterfell, then that would explain why he’s leading the army himself. And with the message we just received from the king… It seems an invasion of the North by the Lannisters is inevitable. The question we ought to ask ourselves is, will we stand aside while the Lannisters conquer the North? They may refuse to give us Ironrath if we don’t participate to the invasion. But if we join them, they would have no choice but to give back Ironrath to its lawful heir.”

Ser Garlan looked at her. Mira agreed with him. If Lord Tyrion was about to invade the North, then they had to join him and to take back Ironrath from the Whitehills. The odds would be much more in their favor with the might of the Westerlands at their side, and Mira had no doubt Sansa would make sure Ironrath was bestowed to her, and Margaery would make sure Tommen acknowledged her and Gerold as Lady and Lord of Ironrath.

“We should go in the North,” declared Gerold. “Ironrath belongs to Mira, and she is one of us. She is a Hightower now. We cannot stay here and take the risk to have Ironrath taken away from us.”

Lord Leyton was tapping the desk with his fingers. He looked lost in his thoughts. “The Citadel tells us winter is coming. The weather is already getting colder. I think we could defeat the Whitehills, and their Bolton allies with the help of the Lannisters, but it is a long march to Ironrath. Where is it exactly?”

Lord Leyton shook his head. “It is even farther than Winterfell. If we were to send an army so far in the North, many would die of cold, or starvation without good supply lines. Not to mention the possible desertions. Our men are not used to this climate. The Stark words have never been more true. Winter is coming.”

Mira saw she was losing them. They wouldn’t join the invasion on the North, but they had to. That may be her only chance. Her husband stepped in. “We promised Mira to give her back Ironrath. We cannot stay here doing nothing.”

“Would you have us sacrifice hundreds, perhaps thousands of men uselessly? Not to Whitehill and Bolton men, but to the frost, the snow and the cold?” asked his father.

“The Northerners don’t die in the North, even when in war,” said Mira. “But they are equipped with appropriate clothes and garbs for winter. Furs, gloves, heavy cloaks, fur-lined boots. That’s how we manage to survive. If your men have this, they will make it through the march to Ironrath.”

“We’re not keeping stocks of these items,” Ser Garlan revealed, “but there are many ships here in Oldtown, and a few will probably have that kind of goods. We could probably find them and have enough for a small contingent. This may be our best chance to take Ironrath back from the Whitehills, no matter the fact winter is coming. We won’t have the castle if we stay here, that is certain.”

Lord Leyton had brought his hand to his chin, obviously thinking about everything he just heard. As Lord of the Hightower, the decision would come to him in the end. Mira waited anxiously. She had tried to convince her husband, but also all his family of the interest they had to take Ironrath one day.
Mira was the only Forrester still alive, so Ironrath belonged to her, and Gerold could become Lord of Ironrath at her side and create a cadet branch of House Hightower in the North. The Hightowers had all interest to take her home from the Whitehills, but there were risks all the same. Mira was well aware of that. Finally, Lord Leyton let his hand fall on the desk and looked at his grandson.

“Gerold, I will give you a thousand men. It’s time you command an army.”

Chapter End Notes

Sansa is not the only northern girl heading for the North.

Please review

Next chapter: Kevan
Kevan IV

Chapter Notes

I suppose it was time we came back to King's Landing. The last time we were there, it was when Mira left the city for Oldtown. The storyline in King's Landing will start now, with the consequences of Myrcella's death beginning to appear and Dorne starting to play a real role in the politics of the Realm.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

KEVAN IV

Riverrun surrendered. Lord Edmure Tully has been given the castle and reinstated as Lord Paramount of the Trident before the obvious inability of House Frey to keep the Riverlands in the king’s peace. Men were dispatched to Raventree Hall and Seagard to end the fightings still going on there, as well as to the Twins to receive the fealty of House Frey to the Crown and to their liege lord. Peace will be re-established soon in the Riverlands.

Tyrion Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Lord of the Westerlands and Warden of the West.

Pycelle’s quivering voice read the message they received from Tyrion yesterday. It was sent from Riverrun with one of their ravens, but it had the seal of Casterly Rock on it and Tyrion’s signature. Kevan had sighed in relief when he had read the message for the first time, but now he showed no emotion as the Grand Maester read the new before the small council.

The small council had taken a very odd appearance in the last weeks. Tommen still sat at the head of the long table with Kevan at his right. However, for two weeks now, the queen sat left to the king, face to face with Kevan, and it became very obvious for more and more people that the Hand and the queen were fighting for the king’s ear. Kevan could live with that, though he wished he didn’t have to. Tommen hadn’t wanted to back down on this matter and ordered that Margaery Tyrell would be present at every meeting of the small council. Kevan didn’t have many reasons to give against it. Cersei’s decisions back when she was Queen Regent came back to hunt them. She created a very recent example that legitimated Margaery Tyrell’s place on the small council. If a Lannister queen once sat on the council, why not a Tyrell queen? There was nothing Kevan could oppose to that.

On the queen’s left were her father, Mace Tyrell, the Lord of Highgarden, and Paxter Redwyne, the Lord of the Arbor and the Master of Ships. The Tyrell queen, the Lord of House Tyrell, and a Tyrell bannerman. Kevan was worried that there were so many Tyrells on the small council and in the capital. At least, Mace Tyrell was only there as an advisor and held no real power. Things were different for the Master of Ships and the queen. Kevan had his ow allies however. Ser Harys Swyft, his father-in-law and the Master of Coin, sat at his right. Kevan would have preferred to have Tyrion as Master of Coin, but his nephew was in the Riverlands, and marching on the Twins now. Pycelle was also a staunch supporter of House Lannister, though Kevan doubted his usefulness lately. The Grand Maester cumulated errors and failures for the last months. There was also Varys, the Spider, the Master of Whisperers, a man so mysterious that no one could guess who he was loyal to. He sat on the side of the table where Kevan and his allies were, but he couldn’t be counted as an ally.
The member of the small council who made it quite unpredictable and dangerous was the Lady Nymeria Sand. She had arrived last week with a large retinue to take the seat her father occupied before his death. According to Varys, she was twenty-five and the second daughter of the Red Viper. He had her with a noblewoman from Volantis. Kevan couldn’t have believed it from her appearance. She had a skin so pale that she could have come from the north of the Wall. However, if she had lived north of the Wall, she would have frozen immediately in her attire. She wore a very lightweight dress displaying most of her body with three overtures on the sides and between her legs. Her shoulders were entirely free of any cover just like almost half of her breasts, except for the long single braid that assembled all her black hair and fell to the level of her breasts. Margaery Tyrell’s lightest gowns would have looked decent for the Sparrows in comparison. She sat there, at Lord Paxter’s left, a leg crossed on the other one, listening to what was being said without really looking interested. She was the daughter of Oberyn Martell, there was no doubt about it.

The Sand Snake, like Varys told him Oberyn’s daughters were called in Dorne, could turn a meeting of the council into hell with a single insult and could offer comments that could be very wise or so impertinent that it would make everyone around the table blush. She was also eyeing Tommen and every other man on the council, except Kevan and Varys after she probably understood she would get nothing from them. That made the relations between the two women on the small council silently thunderous, especially when Nymeria Sand was trying not very subtly to seduce Tommen. Kevan wished they had Doran Martell, or even his son Trystane, in the lady’s place. She was an ally to no one, could cause more trouble than they could imagine and was totally impossible to predict just like her father.

If Prince Doran or Prince Trystane had come to King’s Landing, Kevan would probably have bestowed the office of Master of Laws on him, freeing himself of the duties of the office he had to assume while acting as Hand at the same time, but he would never give the office to this young woman and preferred to keep Mace Tyrell far from any official position. If only Doran Martell had sent his son. Myrcella would have come back at the same time. The king was eager to see his sister again and asked very often questions to Lady Nymeria about her. That didn’t help to mend the feud between the Sand Snake and the queen. As for Kevan, he would be happy for the princess to be back in King’s Landing, considering the threat they received. Nymeria Sand had assured him Princess Myrcella was alright and safe at the Water Gardens and that no one would touch her, but Kevan didn’t trust the word of a Sand Snake.

“It was time,” commented the Sand Snake after Pycelle was done reading. “How much time did you need to take that castle? A year? Two? My sisters and I could have taken it within a single day.”

“No one doubts the abilities and the courage of the people of Dorne, my lady,” said Kevan. “However, if we could end this siege without storming the castle and have thousands of men killed, this is all for the better.” He turned to the king. “Your Grace, it seems the war is almost over, and for good. Riverrun was the last important fortress to hold against you. There are still two keeps resisting in the Riverlands, but with House Tully back in power, it is only a matter of weeks before the last resisting houses bend the knee. Storm’s End surrendered a month ago, Dragonstone fell last week, and now Riverrun is back into the fold. Peace has returned to Westeros, at last.”

“Yes, these are very good news,” acknowledged the king. “I want to thank you all for the fantastic efforts you deployed to bring back peace. Lord Tyrell, Lord Redwyne, Ser Kevan, and all of you, I thank you. I wish Lord Tyrion could be there so I could thank him as well, but I will send him my thanks by raven later in the day. We can all be proud of what we accomplished these last months.”

“I agree with you, your Grace,” approved the queen.

“Your Grace,” began Lord Tyrell. “Perhaps it should be time to consider the matter of Storm’s End.
The castle yielded in great part thanks to the efforts House Tyrell deployed. Maybe you could consider granting it to the queen’s family.”

As always, Mace Tyrell asked for very much in inappropriate circumstances. Pycelle coughed. “Storm’s End has always belonged to House Baratheon. To hand it to another house… That can’t be.”

“Well, House Tyrell supported most of the burden and the losses for taking Storm’s End. It is normal we get it for the efforts we put in the siege.”

“All the efforts you put in the siege?” Lady Nymeria scoffed. “You needed an eternity to have the castle yield. You didn’t take it. The men holding it surrendered because they were starving. They were only two hundred men to hold it and they repelled four assaults you made on the walls. I know it. I visited your army’s encampment on my way. Your men were drinking and laughing and feasting all the time. They didn’t seem to have taken so many losses. You just starved the garrison because you were incapable of defeating it. Thousands of your Reach asses couldn’t take down two hundred Stormlanders.” The Lord of Highgarden was red from anger and searching for his words, and though the queen was better at hiding her feelings, it was obvious she wasn’t pleased by the comments. “Anyway, the old man is right. Storm’s End belongs to House Baratheon. And even though in Dorne the laws of succession are different from here, a castle that belongs to a certain house cannot be given to another house unless the first house rebelled. Would you say that our king rebelled against himself? I don’t think so. House Tyrell has no right over Storm’s End. In fact, if anyone had any right on the castle, it would be Princess Myrcella, King Tommen’s heir. Storm’s End belongs to her. Unless our queen has some little feet moving in her belly that I’m not aware of.”

The queen decided to reply to this insinuation. “I agree with Lady Nymeria. Storm’s End belongs to House Baratheon. However, like my lady just outlined it, Princess Myrcella is the heir to the Iron Throne. If my memory is right, the heir to the Iron Throne doesn’t hold Storm’s End, but Dragonstone. Hence the princess is the Lady of Dragonstone. I don’t think sweet Myrcella could rule Storm’s End and Dragonstone at the same time. That would be too much for her.”

“Usually, the queen is right,” began Pycelle. “The heir to the Iron Throne is given the seat of Dragonstone until the king dies and he takes his place. However, this is only a custom, not a law. The king could give whatever he wants to Princess Myrcella, or name any lord he wishes to hold Dragonstone and Storm’s End. He could also consider himself Lord of Storm’s End and Dragonstone, or only one the two. The decision belongs to the king in all cases.”

Tommen seemed indecisive and Kevan stepped in before the queen could. “Your Grace, since Princess Myrcella is your heir actually, I think it would be good to give her some recognition. Grant her the title of Lady of Dragonstone. This would have the benefit to show to the rest of the Realm that Dragonstone was clearly retaken. When you will have a son, he may take the title in your sister’s stead since he will be your heir and the princess will become the Lady of Sunspear when Trystane Martell will become its lord. As for Storm’s End, to prevent any succession problems, I would advise you to take the title of Lord of Storm’s End and Lord Paramount of the Stormlands until you have a second son or a daughter who comes of age. In the meantime, you could choose someone you trust to act as castellan at Storm’s End since you won’t be able to be there most of the time.”

After a moment, Tommen acquiesced. “I will do this. I will release a decree tomorrow acknowledging Myrcella as my heir until I and Margaery have a son, and I will recognize her as Lady of Dragonstone as well. And her betrothed, Prince Trystane, as Lord of Dragonstone.”

“You can’t do that, you Grace. Prince Trystane is not married yet with your sister. You should wait for the marriage to name him Lord of Dragonstone. If you don’t have a child by this time.”
“Yes, you’re right, Ser Kevan. I’m sorry.” Tywin would have said that a king should never apologize. Not that a king couldn’t make mistakes. Well, he shouldn’t in the best of the worlds, but it was impossible to make no mistake. Even Tywin made mistakes. However, a king could never show he could be wrong, or else the others would see it as a weakness they could use.

“In Dorne, Princess Myrcella would be the one sitting on the Iron Throne, not her brother,” Lady Nymeria suddenly said.

“Perhaps, my lady, but we are not in Dorne.” Kevan was firm. He wouldn’t let the Dornishwoman start a discussion about the rules of inheritance. Kevan turned to the Lord of the Arbor. “Lord Redwyne, what’s the situation of your fleet after the Battle of Dragonstone?”

To the opposite of Storm’s End, Dragonstone had given a fight and was taken by force. The garrison, seeing they had no chance to receive help from Stannis or anyone else, and probably learning recently about the fall of Storm’s End, had decided to make a bold attempt to break the siege. They had apparently sent ravens to all the other islands of the Narrow Sea and asked them for assistance into destroying the Redwyne fleet. The fleet had remained there for a long time and grown carefree. So when small boats attacked them in the night, they had been taken unaware. The boats came from Driftmark, Claw Isle, Cape Wrath, Sharp Point and Sweetport Sound to assault the unprepared fleet in the middle of the night. They had sunk some ships, burned others, and were joined by the garrison of Dragonstone who put boats at sea as well. They caused heavy damage. However, the Redwynes recovered after the initial surprise and beat off the attackers. In the end, most of the small boats sank in the Narrow Sea or barely managed to escape the battle. The garrison of Dragonstone surrendered on the morning when the men saw their last attempt had failed, and the other islands surrendered in the days that followed.

“It could be better, but it could be worse as well, my lord Hand,” answered Paxter Redwyne. “We lost only ten ships in the attack, but about sixty were badly damaged. We will need time to repair them.”

“Do it quickly then. We need the whole fleet of the Arbor to invade the Iron Islands,” ordered Kevan.

“Two weeks should be enough, my lord.”

“Very well. The Lannisters will leave a garrison at Dragonstone in case Stannis would try to take it back, and the royal fleet will defend the city if Stannis’s fleet or his pirates attack.”

“For now, it is very unlikely, my lord Hand.” Varys entered the discussion. “My little birds in the North are few, but they reported that Jon Snow left Eastwatch-by-the-Sea with Stannis’s fleet and all the ships the Night’s Watch owns there. However, they were seen going north, not south.”

“Why would they sail this way? There is nothing north of the Wall. Except snow. And wildlings too,” Lord Paxter wondered.

“Perhaps he thinks to return to its source, in the snow. After all, this is his family name,” joked Nymeria Sand.

“Ser Kevan,” said Tommen, “I think we don’t have to worry about Jon Snow. He is Sansa’s brother. I don’t think he would try anything against us.”

The queen spoke. “We must be careful, your Grace. Lady Lannister is worthy of your trust, no one denies it, but we don’t know much about her half-brother. She seldom spoke about him to me. Maybe he’s trying to fool us by having us believe he’s sailing north. What if he joined Stannis’s cause? Lord Paxter, do you think Jon Snow could feign to head north and turn around to launch an attack on us?"

“That would be possible,” recognized the Lord of the Arbor.

“But not very likely,” said Kevan. “I doubt Jon Snow would believe Varys has little birds so far in the North. He wouldn’t think it necessary to fool us this way. Anyway, up to now, he only allowed Stannis’s troops to remain at the Wall. The Night’s Watch was far outnumbered by Stannis’s army, so they had no choice. They sheltered his troops before Jon Snow became Lord Commander.”

“All the same, I believe it is very dangerous to let the son of a traitor lead the Night’s Watch,” Pycelle pointed out. “Perhaps we should ask the Night’s Watch to remove Jon Snow from his command. There are a few cases through history of the Night’s Watch removing their Lord Commander, or of the Starks defeating a Lord Commander, when he proclaimed himself king I think.”

“Perhaps, Grand Maester,” recognized Kevan. “Only Jon Snow didn’t proclaim himself king. To interfere in the internal affairs of the Night’s Watch could have a few consequences. That may push Jon Snow to support Stannis for real.”

“But he’s already supporting him, Ser Kevan,” sputtered Lord Tyrell. “Eddard Stark tried to take the Iron Throne for himself when King Robert was still alive. His son may try the same. We cannot allow him to help Stannis, the last man to contest our king’s birthright.”

He was forgetting about Balon Greyjoy. “As long as Jon Snow remains at the Wall, we will not brand him a traitor. We have enough enemies like this. No need to send one more into Stannis’s hands.”

“Anyway, Stannis left the Wall,” revealed Varys. “He is certainly marching on Winterfell, trying to conquer the North.”

That was new. “Has any northern lord joined him?”

“Not from what I know, my lord. But they may if he manages to defeat the Boltons and take Winterfell. Stannis has about ten thousand men who could recover their strength at the Wall. House Bolton doesn’t have that much.”

Kevan thought about this new development as Tommen raised his voice again. “Lord Tyrion is already in the Riverlands. Perhaps we could send him in the North to face my uncle. Or maybe we could try to reason Stannis. Certainly he knows he cannot win.”

Kevan didn’t doubt Stannis knew his chances to win were low, but the Lannisters had been about to be defeated by Robb Stark not long ago, and they kept fighting, because they knew they had no choice but to win. Stannis knew what was waiting for him too when he would be defeated. He would never surrender.

“Your Grace, this is all in your honor to hope Stannis Baratheon would lay down his weapons, but he won’t. As for Lord Tyrion and his army, they still have to pacify the Riverlands. Even if we sent them north immediately, they would barely reach Moat Cailin before Stannis attacks Winterfell. Time is getting colder every day. We cannot send the Lannister army in the North. It would be better to let Roose Bolton deal with him. He was named Warden of the North by your brother. It is his duty to protect the North. Hopefully, Stannis’s army will die outside Winterfell if the cold arrives quickly enough and Lord Bolton will defeat him. He has more support than Stannis in the North.”
Kevan looked intently at the king while he said so. Tommen was clever enough to understand they were not to speak of this matter anymore. For now, people couldn’t know Tyrion was already heading to the North with his wife and an army of at least twenty-five thousand men. This included the men he brought with him from the Westerlands, those who were already besieging Riverrun, the armies of the river lords and House Tully who joined him after Brynden Tully surrendered, and possibly the Frey forces they captured.

He hadn’t approved his nephew’s decision. It was a very dangerous move he made. Winter was almost there, and besieging Winterfell at this time of the year was much more dangerous than besieging Riverrun. However, Tyrion had bluntly told him in his ravens that he would march on Winterfell with or without Tommen’s approval. Kevan had finally persuaded Tommen to sanction Tyrion’s actions. If he was to take down Roose Bolton no matter what happened, better to do it with the king’s support.

Kevan still found it difficult to believe that Arya Stark was at Winterfell. Varys and Littlefinger had failed to find her, and Varys had really looked utterly surprised when Kevan had asked him about Arya Stark’s presence in the North. He didn’t know about it, or feigned to know nothing about it, but he promised he would investigate about Ramsay Bolton. Kevan didn’t think Tyrion lied. He had no difficulty to imagine Tyrion starting a war to save his wife’s sister. Tywin would have done the same for Joanna, and Kevan would probably be ready to do the same for Dorna. Still, Tyrion took huge risks. If the invasion didn’t go as planned… No one could know about Tyrion’s destination until it would be too late for the Northerners to react. The combined forces of the Westerlands and the Riverlands would penetrate in the North at the moment Tommen would declare Roose Bolton a traitor to the Realm for holding Arya Stark prisoner. It was a good thing Pycelle for once intercepted Tyrion’s messages without allowing Maester Vallis to read them first. The queen was unaware of the situation. Only Kevan, the king, Pycelle and Varys knew about Arya Stark. Stannis Baratheon and Roose Bolton would fight before Winterfell and weaken each other, making things easier for the army Tyrion was actually leading.

Tommen understood what Kevan’s gaze meant and approved him. They went through reports of more recent ironborn attacks afterwards, and they all agreed again that the Redwyne fleet would leave as soon as it was repaired and join the Lannister fleet Tyrion reinforced during the last months. Then another threat to Tommen’s rule would be eliminated. Tommen seemed to hesitate when Kevan said there would be no mercy for Balon Greyjoy this time. He rebelled against the Iron Throne for the second time. He couldn’t be forgiven twice. Nymeria Sand heartily approved that weak men could believe in second chances, but only fools believed in third chances.

They went on the financial matters. Harys Swyft wasn’t as capable as Tyrion or Baelish as Master of Coin and the debts of the Crown were still overwhelming. The reconstruction of the royal fleet would soon be over, but even that wouldn’t be enough. They may have to hire new gold cloaks soon. There were growing problems with the Sparrows. They became more unruly each day, more than ever recently. The number of people they forced to walk naked in the streets to “atone for their sins” was increasing and there were a few clashes with gold cloaks. It was a miracle it hadn’t gone to fists yet. The High Sparrow was still distributing food to the poorest people and didn’t seem to care about what was going on. It would be useless to arrest him. Kevan didn’t think he had much hold on the other Sparrows, and his arrest or execution would only infuriate these fanatics furthermore and may rise the people against Tommen. The High Sparrow and the queen were competing for the people’s support. Kevan had even asked Tommen’s wife to make more work with the poor. Money was no object he told her, and she accepted to help him on this matter. All the same, they had to clean the Crown’s finances from the follies of Robert’s and Joffrey’s rules. Some cartels and guilds from across the Narrow Sea refused to lend them money anymore. At least, for now, they didn’t have to borrow more money and some gold was accumulating in their coffers, though not enough yet. They would have to repay some debts very soon, and to not borrow more money in counterpart.
The small council was dissolved and Tommen left first with the queen. The others began to drop out but Kevan intercepted Nymeria Sand before she could go.

“My lady, I was hoping we could talk.”

“Of course, ser. You can call me Nym if you want,” she answered with a smile. Kevan had to be careful with this one. He wondered if Oberyn Martell’s daughter were all unpredictable and dangerous like him. They followed the corridors of the Red Keep.

“My lady, I was wondering how was my grandniece the last time you saw her. It's been a long time since I saw Princess Myrcella.”

“The last time we saw each other was the day before I left. We were swimming in the pools of the Water Gardens with my other sisters and other noblemen’s daughters. Dorne did her wonders. She has become a great beauty. My cousin is madly in love with her.”

“I’m glad to hear it. Her mother would be happy to hear it as well. Let me thank you and your family in her name.”

The Sand Snake scoffed. “Don’t try to fool me, ser. Cersei Lannister hates that her daughter is away from her. I know it. Myrcella told me herself. And I know the Dowager Queen hates us all, Martells and Sands, and that she’s probably very happy that my father died.”

“I cannot speak for my niece, my lady, but I for myself had no wish to see Prince Oberyn die.”

“So be it then,” she said dryly.

“Princess Myrcella will soon be granted the seat of Dragonstone, my lady. And she is more than old enough now. I think it would be a good time for her to marry Prince Trystane. Now.”

She stopped and turned to face him. “Are you sure?”

“Of course, my lady. She could marry Prince Trystane, then they would be able to go to Dragonstone and rule the Narrow Sea together. And it would get the princess closer to the king. I’m afraid his Grace misses his sister greatly. You have sisters. I’m sure you know what I’m talking about better than me. I only have one.”

Her eyes were indecipherable, but she smiled. “Yes, of course. However, Myrcella has grown quite attached to Dorne. She likes the place. I would find it cruel to force her to live on a rock in the middle of the sea right when she started to love her new home so much. And the people in Dorne wouldn’t like that their future Princess was sent far away with their future lord when they were just wed.”

“The princess will be Lady of Dragonstone within a few days. It will be her duty to live in Dragonstone,” Kevan argued.

“Lord Stannis was Lord of Dragonstone for a very long time, and yet he spent most of his time in the capital as Master of Ships. Just like Rheagar Targaryen before him. At least before he got killed and that his son, his daughter and my aunt were butchered.”

Her eyes had turned hard. Very hard. This was dangerous ground. “Lady Nymeria, some of your people in Dorne have no love for the Lannisters and the Baratheons. We both know it. If there was to happen something to the princess because they want revenge, then the alliance between the Crown and House Martell would be in great danger. We left the princess in your care. I think she would be far safer on Dragonstone, and I am sure that if you asked Prince Doran himself, he would agree.”
They stood there, motionless, looking at each other, for a long time. Finally, the Red Viper’s daughter smiled again. “You are right, Ser Kevan. And it would be a great honor for Dorne to see its heir Prince of Dragonstone. I’m sure the king wouldn’t oppose to acknowledge his brother-in-law.”

“No, he wouldn’t. If he is his brother-in-law. And for this, he must marry the princess.” They needed Myrcella to marry Prince Trystane quickly. That would strengthen their ties with Dorne.

“It will take some time before they can get married. If that is the king’s desire, I will write to my uncle and tell him this is the wish of the king to see his sister wed at once. However, with the time for the raven to reach its destination, and with the time required to organize a wedding worthy of a prince and a princess, Princess Myrcella may not be married before two months.”

She was trying to gain time. The Martells, and if not them all then this one, didn’t want to see Myrcella Baratheon married to Trystane Martell too soon. “Then in this case Prince Doran should be informed as quickly as possible.”

“As you wish, my lord Hand.” She curtsied before him, making her breasts even more displayed than before. Kevan hoped his grandniece wouldn’t be dressed in the same way when she would come back. “I will tell my cousin to visit the capital with his new wife after the marriage, before they go to Dragonstone. I’m sure you would all be happy to see Myrcella again. Perhaps you should invite Lady Cersei as well. She will be very happy to see her daughter again, and I’m sure the princess will feel the same.”

“That will be for the king to decide,” replied Kevan. He had no wish to see Cersei again in the capital. Not after everything that happened to Lancel and the many times she tried to have Tyrion killed. Not to mention Kevan didn’t want Jaime and Cersei close to each other ever again.

“I will go and write the raven to my uncle immediately.”

She curtsied again, a wicked smile on her lips. Kevan thought she probably tried to seduce him, or to make him uncomfortable with the way her dress revealed more of her body when she curtsied. However, if she hoped to seduce him, she would only be deceived. She would only manage to make him uncomfortable with her light dresses. Nymeria Sand walked away. Kevan would know if she wrote the message soon enough. Pycelle and Vallis had both no love for the Dornish. If Lady Nymeria didn’t send the raven, Kevan would know. And if she wrote anything different from what she was supposed to write, Kevan would know as well.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
“There is only one solution to a quick victory. We must attack at once. From both sides.”

“I will not send thousands of men to death, Ser Brynden. We will need them in the North.”

They were three in the tent. Ser Brynden had come to discuss, or rather to yell, in the pavilion Tyrion shared with Sansa. “It’s been two days now that Walder Frey has hidden inside his walls like the craven he is.”

“Strange that you call him this way since you did the same not long ago,” Tyrion quipped.

He regretted it almost immediately. The Blackfish drew his sword and brought the point on Tyrion’s throat. “Dare to repeat that, Imp.”

“Stop that! Both of you!” Sansa stood up eyeing her granduncle darkly. Reluctantly, he lowered his sword but kept it unsheathed. “You look like two squabbling children. Have you forgotten why we’re here? To get the hostages back and to save Arya.”

Sansa was shooting angry glares at the Blackfish, but also at Tyrion. “Forgive me, my lady,” he apologized.

“Please accept my apologies, Sansa,” the Blackfish said.

Ser Brynden sheathed his sword, but Tyrion knew he wasn’t sorry. He could see it every time the Blackfish looked at him. He didn’t trust him, even after he gave back Riverrun to his family. Tyrion doubted that the knight liked to see him married to Sansa. Sometimes he had the impression the Blackfish was there to remind him what Sansa’s mother would think of their marriage.

“So, what do we do?” The old knight asked. “If we’re not to storm the castle? Walder Frey won’t kindly open the gates for us.”

“He won’t open them kindly for sure, but he may open them all the same if he faces the annihilation of his house,” explained Tyrion.

“The old man doesn’t care about his brood. Our hostages are useless. Ser Perwyn was right. We should just kill them and be done with it.”

“Some of them have nothing to see with the Red Wedding. Ser Perwyn was very helpful, and there are several women and children inside these two towers. You want to kill them as well?”
That seemed to give something to think about to the Blackfish. “So we stay here and starve them? That is your plan? We will need months to have them surrender this way. I thought you wanted to save Arya Stark.”

“That is my plan. But we must also get back the many hostages the Freys are keeping inside their damn castle. If we storm it, you can be sure the last order Walder Frey will give before he dies will be to kill all the hostages, including Lady Tully and the heir to Riverrun. Especially them in fact. Do I have to remember you there are several of your bannermen who have sons, brothers, nephews, even fathers imprisoned there? What do you think they’ll do when they will die? Do you think they will follow us in the North?”

The Blackfish didn’t show any defeat or surrender. “Then what do you propose?”

“Give me three days, including this one. If at the end of the third, Walder Frey has not yet surrendered, we will storm the castle. And we will storm it your way.”

“Very well, Imp. But I warn you. At the end of the third day, when the sun sets, I attack the Twins, with or without your help. And I will kill Walder Frey, and all his sons, grandsons, great-grandsons, legitimate sons and bastards, who took part to the murder of my niece.”

“You have my word.”

“The word of a Lannister,” the knight scoffed. He bowed to Sansa and left, probably going to ram through the strong currents of the Green Fork and go back to his camp on the west bank.

“I think he’s starting to like me,” Tyrion said to his wife once they were alone again.

Sansa didn’t laugh. “Are you sure this will work? Your idea?”

Tyrion shrugged. “The only way to know for sure is to try it.” He took a gulp of wine.

“Tyrion, I’m not sure about this. It is… It looks like… I mean…”

“It is horrible? Barbarian? Cruel? I know what it is, Sansa, but it may be our only chance to have Walder Frey surrender without a fight, and could save the life of thousands of men. Men who have wives, children, parents, brothers and sisters. Two lives are a low price to pay for it.”

Tyrion drank again. He needed wine when he talked about these things. “So, that’s all we can do? Choose who and how many we kill?”

Tyrion sighed. “I understand what you feel, Sansa. But tell me, when you wanted to push Joffrey from the drawbridge, don’t you think it would have been worth it, if you saved thousands of people who died because of him afterwards?”

“That was different! Joffrey was a monster. He murdered my father, he… He did horrible things.”

“And when I fought Stannis on the Blackwater,” continued Tyrion. “You remember how I had thousands of men killed with wildfire? How many burned alive? Their blood is on my hands and their death is on my mind, but I saved a city of half a million people from destruction with that.”

Tyrion was trying to convince himself of that while he told so to Sansa.

“But you did it to save the city, Tyrion. They were attacking us. You were just defending King’s Landing when you did this.”

“Yes, but I killed these men all the same. Good men for the most, who were only obeying their liege lord. They only followed Stannis, that was their only crime. And perhaps Stannis would have made a better king than Joffrey. Perhaps he had more right to the chair than my nephew.”

They remained in silence for some time before Sansa broke it. “Tyrion, was Joffrey a bastard? And Tommen? And Myrcella? Is it true, what Stannis said?”

Tyrion averted his eyes for a moment before he answered. “Do I need to tell you? Most of the Realm suspect it by now.”

“Tyrion, I want to know. From you.”

She was fixing him with her blue eyes. Tyrion wished he could tell her. Could he? “If I revealed it was true, then what would happen to Tommen and Myrcella? I wouldn’t be bothered to say it about Joffrey, but my nephew and my niece are good children. I don’t want them to be known as bastards for the rest of their lives. They don’t deserve this.”

He tried to make Sansa understand with his eyes. She seemed to understand. “I know they are, Tyrion.” That startled him. “I know Ser Jaime is their father. Mira surprised him and Cersei next to Joffrey’s body in the Great Sept of Baelor, and she told me.”

Tyrion was horrified. “Lady Mira Forrester saw them?”

“Yes. And she heard them saying they were their children. She only told it to me. She won’t reveal it to anyone else.”

Tyrion hoped she wouldn’t. He was angry at his sister, and at his brother too, though he knew the anger for his brother wouldn’t last long. “Damn them! Fucking next to Joffrey’s dead body, what were they thinking? And in the Great Sept! Sometimes I wonder what Jaime has between his ears.”

“I won’t tell anybody. I don’t want something to happen to Myrcella and Tommen me neither. Only, I wanted you to know that I know.”

Tyrion nodded and emptied his cup. “I’ll see if Ser Forley came back.”

He left the tent, leaving Sansa alone inside. He didn’t think she would reveal it. Sansa liked Tommen and Myrcella. However, Tyrion didn’t know what to make of Lady Mira. If she found herself in a difficult situation, she might reveal it to get out of it. He would have to make sure the daughter of Gregor Forrester wouldn’t run into trouble. Anyway, for now there was nothing he could do about it. Mira Forrester was thousands of miles away in Oldtown.

Tyrion looked at the two towers standing tall over the Green Fork. His own army besieged it from the east bank since yesterday. The Tully forces besieged it from the west bank for two days. Still, the castle had provisions for a few months at least. Months they couldn’t wait. Winter kept approaching, nights grew cold and Sansa’s sister was still at Winterfell. Walder Frey had to give them the hostages, and to give them now. Hopefully, if the old stoat was a coward as much as Tyrion believed, he would surrender before Ser Brynden could attack the Twins. In the meantime, men kept building rams, trebuchets, catapults, siege towers, assembled scorpions and ballistas, and even built boats to attack the bridge. They had the Frey men participating to the operations. That kept them busy, and made them useful as well. Tyrion made sure they wore the colors of House Frey while working to make Walder Frey see that his own men had turned against him.

The march on the Twins had been without story. Well, almost without story. The Brotherhood Without Banners had showed no sign of life. However, there had been a few clashes between Frey prisoners and Lannister soldiers, but surely far less than in the Tully army. All the same, the Lannister men spat on the Freys because they were turncloaks and traitors, and the Freys saw the Lannisters as traitors as well for turning on them. Daven went to great effort to keep them in line, and Ser Perwyn Frey, who accompanied them, did very much for that as well. Tyrion had to admit he had some respect for the man. Not at all proud or insulting like his kin. Even Sansa seemed to like him a little, though she couldn’t forget he was a Frey all the same.

The sole event of importance on their way to the Twins had been Daven’s wedding. Tyrion had sent his cousin ahead with two hundred men so they could prepare the wedding before the entire host arrived at Darry. Daven had wed and bedded Amerei Frey in a ceremony that could be described as lavish for a castle like Darry, but he had done it without great enthusiasm. Tyrion supposed he enjoyed much more that night, the first one he spent with Sansa in an appropriate bedchamber for a month. They left the next day, not wishing to waste more time than necessary. Daven left as a married man and Lord of Darry, though the main thing he told Tyrion after they left was that if his wife got herself with child, he would have doubts that it was his own. He also said Gatehouse Ami had been very close to the Strongboar during the morning that followed the wedding, and that Lyle was far from looking uninterested.

On the Tully side, as far as Tyrion could tell, the Blackwoods, the Brackens and the Mallisters had all accepted to join them in besieging the Twins. However, the Brackens were not happy that the siege of Raventree was ended without gaining any land on their old rivals. Tyrion knew it could create problems later. The Lannisters had quarrels with the Freys and the river lords. The Freys had quarrels with everyone and among themselves. The river lords had quarrels with the Freys, the Lannisters, and among themselves. That was no good. They had to unite this army. They needed a common goal.

The two men Tyrion sent to the Twins were coming back from its gates. Tyrion went to see them with ten men surrounding him. He missed Bronn. Ser Forley dismounted his horse and bowed before him. The bard did the same.

“So, how did he react?” asked Tyrion.

“He said nothing, my lord,” answered Ser Prester. “We told him what would happen if he didn’t surrender and I had the song played like you ordered.” He shot a glance at the bard with a harp in his hands. “He only let us go, without a word.”

“How did he look like while you played the song?” Tyrion asked the bard.

“Afraid, my lord. He was shaking. I though he would die like that before us.”

A pity he didn’t. Tyrion tossed a golden dragon to the bard. “For your trouble.” The bard bowed and left, keeping the piece against his heart. There was a whore, or whores, who would have a lot of job tonight.

Ser Forley Prester was looking at him, hesitating. “My lord, are you sure this is wise? Only two days?”

“Three days,” Tyrion corrected. “We have no time to lose, Ser Forley. Let’s just hope the Late Lord Walder Frey won’t be too late to save his own house. Go see to your men.”

“Yes, my lord.”

The knight left to perform the order. Tyrion went around the camp with his guards, making sure his men were all occupied, whether at building siege engines, though he hoped they wouldn’t need them, whether at practicing their skills at sword, whether watching over the Freys. When he came to his tent, he found Sansa kneeling on the floor, her hands joined, praying. That gave hope to Tyrion to see his wife praying like she used to. She had stopped for a moment after her mother and her brother died, and again when she learnt about her sister’s captivity. She opened her eyes and looked at him when he entered.

“Sorry, Sansa. I didn’t want to disturb you,” he apologized.

“No, that’s nothing.” She stood up. “I wish there was a godswood, or even only a weirwood tree somewhere close. Do you think there is one inside the Twins?”

Tyrion searched his memory for anything concerning a godswood inside the Twins. “They may have a godswood, but I doubt there would be a weirwood tree. The Freys built their towers here for the toll they could get, not because there was a tree with a face around here.”

Sansa went to sit in a chair. “Tyrion, I know why you’re doing this. I understand. And I hate the Freys. But still, if we do the same than them, how are we better?”

That was a good question, and Tyrion had no answer to this. “We do this to save your sister, Sansa. And to prevent thousands of men from dying in the assault on the Twins. I suppose it’s better than to kill people at a wedding because they broke a promise of marriage.”

Sansa nodded, though she didn’t seem convinced. Tyrion wasn’t either. Explain to me why it is more noble to kill ten thousand men in battle than a dozen at dinner? His father’s voice was clear into his head, and Tyrion’s voice answered in his head as well. So that’s why you did it? To save lives? The same reply came. To end the war. To protect the family. Why is it more noble to have thousands of people killed by launching an attack on the Twins than two by executing them before their family? It was to save lives, to end the war, and to protect the family. Sansa’s family. Tywin Lannister would be proud of his son right now. The thought didn’t make Tyrion any happy.

Daven emerged in the tent at this moment. “My lord, forgive me. But there is something going on the battlements. The Freys have brought someone and are threatening to kill her.”

“Her?” Tyrion and Sansa said the word together.

Daven was a little blank and obviously worried if not afraid. “It’s Roslin Tully.”

The Lord and the Lady of Casterly Rock ran out to the end of the camp where siege weapons were raised and looked at the battlements where a Frey was holding a young girl with a knife on her throat. The girl was thin, short, with a lovely face in the form of a heart and black hair. It seemed Walder Frey gave to Edmure Tully one of his few beautiful girls. She was much prettier than Amerei Frey.

“Imp!” the man with the dagger shouted. “Release our brothers, and nothing will happen to her. Do it now or we slit her throat.” Terror was obvious on the girl’s face. Even from afar, you could see she was pleading for help. “Do you think we’ll hesitate? You know what happened at the Red Wedding. We won’t hesitate to repeat it.”

Tyrion turned to one of his guards. “Bring him,” he commanded. He left with three other men. Tyrion looked again at the battlements. The girl did nothing for this. Tyrion said something dangerous, but it was the right thing to say. “Go on. We’re waiting.”

Nothing happened. The knife stayed on the girl’s throat, but didn’t move. The Frey didn’t kill her. “You really think I won’t do it?” he repeated. “Release our family now or I kill her.”

“You already told us,” Tyrion yelled in return. “I gave you our answer. It won’t change.”
He turned to Sansa who looked at him in stupor. He knew they could decide to kill the girl, but there was nothing they could do against it. They couldn’t yield before this. Tyrion thought, and hoped, that the Freys would do like for Edmure Tully and not carry out the threat. It seemed to be the case since several minutes passed without anything happening to Roslin Tully.

Tyrion’s men came back with Ser Ryman Frey in chains. They let him drop on his knees before the battlements of the Twins. Tyrion stepped forward while remaining away from archer’s reach. “This is Ser Ryman Frey, future Lord of the Crossing and heir to your lord, Walder Frey. I warned your lord. Let me show you that a Lannister always pays his debts.”

He made a sign with his hand. One of his guards seized Ser Ryman by the hair and sliced his throat with his dagger. There were cries on both sides, from the battlements and behind Tyrion in his own army. His guards cut the dead man’s head, then brought the headless body of Ser Ryman to the Green Fork and threw it in the river.

“If I remember well,” shouted Tyrion to the battlements, “this is how Lady Catelyn Stark died when she was your guest. I hope Ser Ryman enjoyed our hospitality as much as she enjoyed yours. Tell Lord Frey what you saw. Tell him I hope he will keep his new heir for more than a day.”

Tyrion walked away with his guards, people standing aside as they passed. Some of these men were found by Bronn. Sansa followed him after some time and walked faster to reach him. Tyrion wondered if he really was different from his father.

“You’re not your father, Tyrion.”

“Thank you, my lady,” he said bitterly.

“What?” Sansa asked.

“I hope you’re right. That I’m not like my father like you just said.”

“I said nothing, Tyrion.” Tyrion looked up. She was looking at him strangely.

Tyrion shook his head. “I must be tired. Now I hear voices.” When he thought about that, that hadn’t looked like Sansa’s voice. It looked like… No. He chased the idea from his head.

“You’re not your father.” This time, that was really Sansa who said it. Tyrion nodded in acknowledgment and they walked in silence back to their tent.

The next day, at the end of the afternoon, at the time Tyrion had warned Lord Frey in his message, Edwyn Frey, the new heir to the Crossing after the death of his father yesterday, was brought to the same place than his father was the day before. There were many more people on the battlements than yesterday. That was good. The more people who would see it the better. Tyrion had executed Ryman Frey sooner than expected yesterday because they had threatened Lady Tully. No threats had been made today, so they proceeded like they told Walder Frey.

To the general surprise, the Lord of the Crossing himself came on the battlements, supported by two of his sons or grandsons. No one knew who they were. He stared in Tyrion’s direction who had his great-grandson in chains not far away from him.

“So, Lord Frey,” Tyrion shouted. “Have you decided? Do you want to lose two heirs in two days?”

Tyrion thought he saw the old man talking with one of his brood. Edwyn Frey had the virtue to not cry and wail like his father did before he was executed. He would have made a better Lord of the Crossing, though he was proud and arrogant like his father.
“Lord Tyrion,” shouted a man on the battlements, the one Walder Frey spoke to a moment ago. “Walder Frey, Lord of the Crossing and Lord Paramount of the Trident would like to discuss with you about the terms of surrender inside his castle.”

Tyrion smirked. The old lord made a mistake to mention the title he no longer had, no more in name than in fact. “There are no terms to discuss. I gave you the terms two days ago. Does the Lord of the Crossing accept them?”

Before the absence of answer or reaction from the battlements, Tyrion gave the signal again. This time, his guard stabbed Edwyn in the belly repeatedly with a dagger. The cries of the man could be heard from the battlements. Tyrion was sure of that. When the new heir to the Twins was dead, his head was cut as well and his body thrown into the river just like his father was.

“That was for Talisa Stark,” Tyrion shouted. “So, Lord Frey. You lost two heirs. Do you want to lose your castle, your whole family, and your life as well?”

Again, the Late Lord of the Crossing said something to his man. “If you attack, we kill the hostages.”

“Good,” answered Tyrion. “I’m sure the river lords will spare you for that. I gave you the terms. You have until tomorrow at sunset to accept them. Or else, we let the Blackfish avenge his king and his niece. In the meantime, I have a gift for you. As a sign of good faith.” A trebuchet was activated and threw a bag over the battlements of the eastern tower. Tyrion thought he heard cries coming from the courtyard. “Happy family reunion, Lord Frey. You have one day. I hope for you this won’t be your last.” Though that wouldn’t be surprising if it was.

The night came and passed, dawn came and passed, morning came and passed. Finally, while Tyrion was taking the meal of midday with Sansa, Podrick came to tell them that Walder Frey had accepted to meet Tyrion outside the castle. Immediately, Tyrion dispatched men to inform his commanders and the army camping on the western bank. When Lord Walder Frey came to meet him in his litter and what was probably a tenth of his family, Tyrion had Sansa, Ser Brynden Tully, Lord Clement Piper, Lord Edmun Roote, Ser Perwyn Frey, Daven, Ser Forley Prester and his guards with him. A seat was brought so Lord Walder could sit in.

“Lord Frey. You are late, as usual. Too late for your two heirs. According to your son, Ser Perwyn, your heir is now the Lady Walda Frey, your great-great-granddaughter. A child of eleven or twelve. Thanks to you being late,” Tyrion said with a smile he made smug.

“Lord Tyrion,” said the Lord of the Crossing, trying to maintain some pride and dignity, though he had nothing of the latter and kept the first with much difficulty. “I decided to accept your terms with some changes. We will hand all the hostages we have to House Lannister. We will bend the knee for King Tommen and for you. But we will never swear fealty to House Tully again. We ask you to make House Frey bannermen sworn to House Lannister of Casterly Rock, with the commitment to pay you half the revenues we get from the tolls on the Crossing. We will fight alongside you when called upon, fight your enemies, make peace with your allies, and be loyal to you until the end of all time.”

That was a bold offer, even for Walder Frey. Tyrion laughed and made his laugh evil. “Lord Frey, do you really think I want House Frey as bannermen of my house? Do you really think I want my family to be associated with a family of turncoats, traitors, cravens, bastards, cowards, oathbreakers, kingslayers and breakers of the most sacred laws in the world? Look at my wife, Lord Frey. You probably never met her, but I’m sure you know who she is.”
Sansa stepped forward. “My name is Sansa Lannister, Lord Frey. Sansa Lannister of House Stark. Catelyn Stark was my mother. Robb Stark was my brother. Talisa Stark was my sister-in-law. Her child was my nephew or my niece.”

Sansa was staring angrily to the man nailed to his chair, and her voice was harder than Tyrion ever heard. Lord Frey was looking at her with mouth wide open and terror obvious in his eyes. Sansa looked enough like her mother to give him the impression Catelyn Stark had come back to haunt him.

“Lord Frey,” resumed Tyrion, “you have a choice. Accept the terms I gave to you two days ago, or solve your disagreement with the Blackfish.” Tyrion turned to the man who partially unsheathed his sword. The man was looking in utter hatred at the Lord of the Crossing. He killed his niece and his king. Tyrion smiled when he turned again to face the Lord of the Crossing. “Music,” he shouted. He continued on a softer tone as The Rains of Castamere began. There was a bard among the delegation. “I heard you love this song very much, my lord. That you even played it at a wedding. While you were butchering your king. His wife. His child. His mother. His men. Under your roof. Under the guest rights.”

Tyrion took his most ruthless and threatening face. He remembered how Sansa was despaired and destroyed after her family died. He would have given anything to see the old man die right now, but he had to think about the people he could save inside the Twins.

At the middle of the song, when Lord Frey heard the bard replace the word Castamere by the Crossing, Lord Walder, shaking uncontrollably, stammered. “No, please. Stop it. Stop it. I yield. I'll do everything you want. I will. Just stop it. I beg you.”

Tyrion let the music play for some time before he stopped it. He took a menacing voice again. “You will free all the hostages you’re keeping. All of them. Lady Tully and her son first. You and all your family will bend the knee to Tommen, and to your liege lord. Since Lord Edmure is not present, you will all bend the knee together before his uncle, Ser Brynden Tully, and swear fealty to House Tully forever.”

“We’ll do everything you want,” the old man said, almost crying.

“Then do it now,” said Tyrion dryly. “Before I tell my bard to resume the song where he stopped it.”

The Freys became efficient like they had never been. Fifteen minutes later, all the hostages were brought to the Lannister camp. Ser Perwyn hugged his sister Roslin when she came forth with a baby in her arms. She was crying as her brother pulled her into an embrace. Lord Piper hugged his son Marq se well. Tyrion could see how much the hostages and their families were relieved. Ryman and Edwyn Frey wouldn’t be missed by many. He felt he did the right thing.

“Now,” resumed Tyrion when all the hostages were safe, “let me remind you the terms I offered you. House Frey will give two hostages to House Tully to be held in Riverrun with all the comfort their rank requires. The hostages we already have will remain in our custody at King’s Landing or Casterly Rock for the next five years. Half the revenues you get from your tolls will be given to House Tully from this day and forever. A garrison of three hundred men, constituted of both Lannister and Tully soldiers, will be kept inside the Twins for the next ten years and be maintained with the revenues of House Frey. You will also pay reparations to House Tully for the ravages in the Riverlands since you’re partially responsible for them. The amount of these reparations will be fixed later. Your forces will remain with us at the command of Ser Perwyn Frey. And you will bend the knee. All of you. Now.”

Reluctantly, but without waiting, Lord Walder Frey got on his knees and swore fealty to House
Tully, acknowledging them as their liege lord. All his sons and daughters who were present knelt as well. When they were done, the Blackfish made a demand Tyrion wasn’t expecting.

“We want your son Olyvar as well with his brother. I don’t trust you with him, and he’s among the few among you who I can trust.”

Lord Frey made a move of his hand as if he didn’t care. The young man who was Olyvar Frey, who seemed above twenty, came forward and bowed before the Blackfish. “Ser Brynden, I’m glad to see you again.”

“Glad to see you too,” the knight answered. Olyvar went to stand beside his brother. Walder Frey handed them two sons to serve as wards at Riverrun.

“Lord Frey, welcome back into the king’s peace,” said Tyrion. The late Lord of the Crossing nodded, though it was obvious he was angry. “Now we have a few other matters to discuss about.”

The old man was taken aback. “I gave you everything you asked. We respected all the terms.”

“The terms concerning your surrender to Riverrun, my lord,” Tyrion specified. “However, there are a few matters concerning specifically House Lannister and House Frey that need our attention. First, my lord father arranged several marriages between our two houses. Sadly, wars being wars, some of these marriages can no longer be made. Your granddaughter, Lady Amerei, was supposed to marry my cousin, Ser Lancel Lannister. But since my cousin was accused of kingslaying and exiled to the Faith, I’m afraid this marriage is no longer possible. But I have the great pleasure to tell you, Lord Frey, that your granddaughter still married a Lannister.” Daven stepped forward. “I present your new grandson. Daven Lannister, Lord of Darry.”

Lord Walder Frey was speechless for a moment. “But… But you promised me he would marry one of my daughters.”

“My father promised,” Tyrion rectified. “And he married one of your daughters. Or granddaughters I think. That doesn’t make much difference anyway, she’s still a Frey. The deal was respected.”

“Lord Frey.” Sansa moved forward as well, speaking harshly to the Lord of the Crossing. “I have to announce you that the betrothal between Joy Hill and one of your natural sons was called off. Lady Joy Hill is now betrothed to Rollam Westerling, and when Lord Gawen will die, she will become the Lady of the Crag.”

More stupor and flounce came to the old man’s face. “This is… This is outrageous!”

“My father understood we preferred the heir of one of the oldest families in the Westerlands to a bastard from the Late Lord Walder Frey. You would have done the same in our stead,” said Sansa dryly. She continued on an accusing tone. “Furthermore, you owe something to House Westerling since their eldest son and heir, Ser Raynald, died at the Red Wedding. I think that to sacrifice a marriage with a bastard is quite a low price for killing an heir. But you’re lucky, Lord Frey. A Lannister always pays her debts, and I am a Lannister as much as I am a Stark. I propose you another marriage. Lady Genna Frey has a grandson who’s of age with your heir, Lady Walda. I propose they are wed as soon as the future Lady of the Crossing has flowered. I’m sure you will accept. This is a much better marriage than the one you would have with Joy and a bastard of yours. You wanted to strengthen the ties between House Lannister and House Frey. Here’s your chance. No one else will want to marry your heir to his son.”

The Lord of the Crossing hesitated, but finally he spat on the floor. “Alright. At least the Twins will remain in the hands of a Frey. Are we done now?”
“I think we are,” said Tyrion. “You only have to open your gates and to let the Tully forces on the west bank travel to the east bank.”

The parley was over. Two hours later, all the forces on the west bank, those of House Tully, of the river lords, and their Frey prisoners were on the opposite bank with the Lannister forces. Tyrion retired in his tent for a time. Sansa joined him. To his great surprise, she poured a cup of wine for both of them.

“I think we both deserve it,” she said with a sad smile. The both took a sip.

“That was brilliant of you, my lady. To think about marrying Tywin Frey to the new heir of the Crossing. I hope Genna will appreciate.”

“Her sons will not have Riverrun, but at least they’ll get the Twins. Tywin seems like someone good.” Tywin Frey, nicknamed Ty, was Genna’s grandson. They had just arranged his marriage with Walda Frey.

“He can’t be worse than the old man who refuses to die. I hope he’ll die soon, and painfully.”

“I agree.” Sansa took another gulp. “I’m sorry I doubted. You were right.”

Tyrion sighed. “I could have been wrong. We pushed Walder Frey a lot. Though I don’t regret it. With everything we did, House Frey has been weakened considerably and the Crossing won’t pose any problem for at least a decade. But Walder Frey is prickly, and spiteful. He won’t forget it.”

“I wish we executed him,” said Sansa. On that she agreed with her granduncle.

“He will die soon enough. He can’t live forever. With some hope, one of his sons or grandsons will poison his wine or slice his throat before dropping him in the river.”

Podrick entered at this moment. “My lord, my lady. It’s time.”

“Thank you, Podrick.” Tyrion looked back at his wife. “The time has come. Let’s see if people will follow us.”

They left their half-emptied cups on the table and went to the great pavilion where all the lords, knights and commanders of the Westerlands and the Riverlands were gathered. Even the Freys were present, though Ser Perwyn and Olyvar were obviously the ones leading them. Guards watched them closely and the river lords hated to see them here. Only Ser Perwyn seemed to receive some small consideration. When Tyrion and Sansa took place, all the other lords had not arrived. Olyvar came to them.

He bowed before each of them, but it was to Sansa that he spoke. “My lord. My lady. Lady Sansa, I knew your brother, Robb. I was his squire back during the war. He was a good man. I knew your mother and the Lady Talisa as well. They were all good people. I respected them a lot. I’m sorry for what happened. I wasn’t there when the wedding took place. If I had known… I didn’t want to leave Robb, even after he broke his promise to marry one of my kin. He was an honorable man, and I was proud to fight by his side. Just… I know you hate all my family. You have good reasons to hate us all. I’m just… sorry.”

Sansa was looking intently at the young man. Tyrion was too. He didn’t see anything feigned. He really looked ashamed. Sansa replied. “Thank you, Ser Olyvar. But forgive me, before I trust a Frey once again, I will need some time. And I will need you to prove yourself.”

“I will, my lady. I promise you. But I am no knight.” He bowed and went back to his brother. There was a resolve in his eyes Tyrion rarely saw.

When everyone was here, Brynden slammed on the table to bring silence. They had decided to let the Blackfish do the talking. They would have more chance of success this way.

“My lords, my lady, sers, we all brought you here to discuss about something very important. We are not going back home. Quite the opposite in fact.” He took the first scroll of the two lying on the table. “This is a message from a spy Lord Tyrion and Lady Sansa have in the North. Here is what it says. Arya Stark is at Winterfell. She was brought there by an unknown man. Roose Bolton betrothed her to his son Ramsay. He wants to consolidate his hold on the North. The wedding is to take place in two moons.” There was gasps of surprise. The Blackfish let some time pass, the he took the second scroll. “That message was written almost five months ago, so the marriage has already been celebrated. And this is a report from White Harbor. It was sent by Lord Wyman Manderly himself. Ramsay Bolton imprisons women and tortures them. He starves them, peels their skin off a few of their fingers, beats them, rapes them and inflicts them many other horrible things. After a few months or a few weeks, he releases them and hunts them with his dogs in the woods. If he catches them, his dogs eat them. Few are the girls who survive to tell the story.”

There were gasps again, but of horror this time. The old knight pounded the table again. Silence came back. “I am not going back home. Roose Bolton murdered Robb Stark. He stabbed his king in the heart, and now he has his sister. I will not stay idle in the south while my grandniece is being beaten, raped and flayed by his bastard monster.” The silence that followed hung heavily in the air. “We march on the North.”

There was a moment while no one moved or made any sound, then an uproar exploded. “We can’t go in the North now,” shouted Ser Forley Prester. “Our men are tired. Winter is approaching. We should go back to our homes, and let our men prepare for it.”

“My sister doesn’t have the winter to wait,” said Sansa loudly. “Roose Bolton will only keep her alive the time she needs to give Ramsay Bolton a son or two. After that, he will let his son have his ways with her. As long as the Boltons will rule the North, everyone in the North will suffer. Men, women and children get themselves flayed for resisting against their rule as we speak, and innocent women are being raped. Is that what you want?”

“My lady,” said Lord Karyl Vance after a moment. “We understand the horrible situation of the North. But if we march on the North and get trapped in the snows, then we will be doomed. Thousands of our men will die.”

Tyrion knew he was right, but he had to say something. “Not if we walk quickly. If we march fast enough, we will reach Winterfell before winter is upon us. But we will have to march immediately.”

The lords began to speak among themselves again. Surprisingly, it was a Frey who spoke loudly. “Arya Stark was supposed to marry my brother once.”

That stopped the chatting. “Who are you?” Sansa asked.

“This our brother Waltyr, Lady Sansa,” answered Ser Perwyn. “He tells the truth. When your mother negotiated with our father the alliance with House Frey, a betrothals was arranged not only for your brother, but also for Lady Arya and Elmar Frey. Our father called it off when he learned your brother married Lady Talisa.”

“My brother is Roose Bolton’s squire. He’s been his squire since the war started,” resumed Waltyr Frey. Tyrion would say he had to be about fifteen. “I know him well from what Elmar told me. If you can have any use of me, then I will follow you in the North.”
The lords started to whisper again after the lad’s declaration. Even more strangely, it was another Frey who spoke next.

“I was Robb Stark’s squire for almost a year. He was a good man. I will avenge him. My sword is yours, my lords.” Olyvar Frey unsheathed his sword and got on his knee. His brother Waltyr did the same, but without a sword since he had none.

Ser Perwyn Frey spoke. “Robb Stark was a man of honor. We cannot bring him back to life, or apologize enough for what we did. But we can avenge him, and kill the man who murdered him.” He unsheathed his sword as well and got on his knee. “House Frey will march on the North.” All the other Freys followed his example.

The Strongboar roared. “I didn’t have the chance to fight here. I hear the Boltons like to flay their enemies. Perhaps I will flay them myself. And we have a good reason to fight. To save a highborn lady, the sister of our lady.” The sword was drawn. “To the North!” He knelt as well.

And then, one after one, all the knights and lords drew their sword, brandishing them in the air and shouting.

“TO THE NORTH! TO THE NORTH! TO THE NORTH! TO THE NORTH! TO THE NORTH!”

Here they had it. The unity, the common goal they needed to bring these many armies together.
Tyrion looked at Sansa, a smile on his lips. She seemed to finally realize what was going on. She smiled widely in return. Tyrion turned to the Blackfish. After a long moment where his expression remained grim, he smiled mischievously. They were in war against the Boltons.

Chapter End Notes

I wrote this chapter in the objective to show a darker side of Tyrion, the one he inherited from Tywin. It'a also meant to show everything is not entirely perfect between Tyrion and Sansa. Tyrion never confessed to her the true origin of his nephews and niece, and when she asks him to tell him the truth, he doesn't deny, but he cannot confess either. Also, Sansa didn't go through as many hardships as in the show (all the time with Ramsay and Littlefinger's influence), so she cannot really look at people being executed without some reluctance, no matter how they deserve it. Also, for those who remember, there is something that Genna Lannister told to Sansa about Tyrion when she arrived at Casterly Rock. This chapter shows that Genna's fear isn't without foundation.

I tried to write the last scene with all the lords of the Riverlands and the Westerlands similar to Jon's acclamation at the end of Season 6. The group effect caused all the lords to swear their sword to the northern invasion and to save Arya after a few proclaimed their resolve. When you just learnt the truth about Arya and Ramsay, and once a few have spoken for the invasion, it's difficult for the people assembled there to not follow the others.

Please review

Next chapter: Daenerys
Daenerys II

Chapter Notes

Let's see what's going on in Meereen.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

DAENERYS II

The people were shouting and raising their hands at them in praise. Daenerys Stormborn had never been so popular as a queen since she freed Meereen from the slavers. The Great Masters now accepted her as their queen, and the former slaves loved her again since she reopened the fighting pits. Everything she got, the peace in the streets, the support of the people, the acknowledgment of the masters, she got it because to the man who sat beside her in the litter.

Her engagement with Hizdahr zo Loraq and the reopening of the fighting pits he suggested had brought back peace and prosperity to Meereen after the attacks perpetrated by the Sons of the Harpy. Ser Barristan Selmy, one of the very few people she trusted, had died in one of these attacks. He had crossed the Narrow Sea and two continents to serve her, and now he was dead. She lost Ser Jorah, and now Ser Barristan, the two only Westeros she trusted. She had none at her side now. She claimed to be Queen of Westeros, but she had never spent a single day in Westeros and had no one from Westeros to advise her. She could still take the navy of Meereen and sail to for King’s Landing with her Unsullied and her Second Sons, but would that be enough? She had no allies there, and no way to know who would fight for her. She had three untamed dragons, one wandering freely, two others chained under the Great Pyramid. She wouldn’t, and she couldn’t abandon the people she freed from slavery.

She could have decided to slaughter all the masters like Daario had suggested, but she decided against it. That wouldn’t stop the Sons of the Harpy. She couldn’t fight the Sons of the Harpy inside when there was a threat that the other cities would attack Meereen. She could have chosen to marry Daario Naharis instead, but she didn’t. She had to think about her people. A queen belonged to her people, not to herself. If she was the only one who wasn’t free in this city, then so be it. That was an acceptable price for the freedom of the hundreds of thousands other people living in Meereen.

The litter stopped before the Great Pit of Daznak where the games would take place. People were still cheering, certainly for her. She had reopened the pits and freed them. Hizdhar was only a consort she was marrying to calm down the former Great Masters.

“Please forgive me, your Grace,” her future husband told her as they got out of the litter. “I have several people in my acquaintances to meet before the Great Games begin. If you would allow me.”

“You have your leave,” Daenerys told him, and he left.

She noticed Daario looking gloomily at the former Great Master as he walked away. She knew he didn’t trust him. Perhaps it was mainly jealousy. Daario said he believed Hizdahr zo Loraq was the leader of the Sons of the Harpy. Daenerys didn’t believe he was, though she had to admit it was strange all attacks stopped at once after she announced her betrothal. That could be simply because the former masters were happy to see one of them as the future King of Meereen. Daenerys didn’t believe Hizdahr zo Loraq was working against her. His advice seemed to work out well for now. She only had to look around her to see it. All the same, Daario’s words managed to make her doubt about her future husband. She would keep an eye on him.

They walked inside the Great Pit, she, Daario, Missandei and some of her best Unsullied. Grey Worm wasn’t there, still badly injured. He had the chance to survive. Ser Barristan didn’t have the same luck. When they entered, a great crowd of about fifty thousand men and women, former slaves and former masters, welcomed them with cheering and clapping. They walked to the platform erected for them and took place. Slaves and masters were all sitting together. Daenerys had forbidden that there would be assigned places. In fact, the Unsullied made sure all the people were mixed, not allowing a group to occupy for himself one section or another. The Great Games were supposed to unite the people of Meereen together. If they were to be united, it would be as equals, not as masters and slaves.

People kept coming inside. Daenerys knew the arena, despite being the largest of the all the fighting pits of Meereen, couldn’t contain all its population. However, those who couldn’t attend the Games today could attend them during the next six days that would follow. The Great Games would last for an entire week. That wasn’t a week Daenerys would enjoy.

The four standard bearers came riding into the center of the pit and people cheered very loudly. Daenerys had to admit the number of people standing in the arena was impressive, even if that was to watch men killing each other. Each standard bearer had a flag for one of the cities of Slavor’s Bay, except for one who had the flag for the city of Volantis. These were the four cities who brought men to fight in the games. Daenerys knew there were Masters from Yunkai, Astapor and Volantis among the crowd. She had met some, though she delegated most of the work to meet them to Hizdahr zo Loraq. She looked at the seat at her right. He wasn’t there. What was he doing? He was the one to insist so much on organizing these games, and when they took place, he decided to be absent.

Daenerys looked at all the people applauding, yelling, crying, cheering before the prospect of the games. That was so barbarous. She had tried her best to rule her people for their own well-being. She abolished the games because slaves fought to the death in it, but it seemed even the slaves appreciated the fighting pits. Many pit fighters had even begged her to reinstate the games. How could someone love to fight in the pits? How could we enjoy killing other people for the pleasure of others? How could we enjoy watching people kill each other? She had ordered people to be killed, but she had done it for the sake of justice, and to free the slaves. That wasn’t the same thing.

Her future husband suddenly appeared from nowhere and sat. “Where have you been?” she asked him sharply.

“Just making sure everything is in order.” He had a small smile on his lips. He was eager for the games to begin. Daenerys knew he loved them, and that he owned some of the pits, including this one. She wouldn’t be surprised if he went to see the famous acquaintances he spoke about to place a bet or another. That wouldn’t make her like him more, though she still needed him. He was her main advisor now in the matters of Meereen. She wished she had someone better than him to advise her. Missandei was sitting on her left, impassive like always. Daenerys wished she had another advisor sitting on Hizdahr’s right, but the place was empty. There was no fourth seat.

The gates of the pit opened and the four riders left, allowing a man wearing the tokar, with long brown hair and a beard to come in. He walked to the center of the pit and bowed to Daenerys and Hizdhar. Then he raised his arm and pointed to his left. He moved it more on the left, and as he made the turn of the arena, people sat and went silent.
“Free Citizens of Meereen!” the herald proclaimed loudly in Valyrian. The sound of his voice went very well through the arena. Everyone could hear him. “By the blessings of the Graces, and her majesty the Queen, welcome to the Great Games!”

He raised his arms high as if he tried to touch the sky, and the people raised with them, exploding again. Two men ran to stand before the herald and looked at the platform. One was tall and muscled with a very long and heavy sword. The other was shorter, with a smaller sword and a small shield. The crowd cooled down.

“My Queen, our first contest. Who will triumph?” shouted the herald. “The strong, or the quick?”

The short man stepped forward. “I fight and die for your glory, oh glorious queen.” He bowed the head and his opponent did the same. The herald left.

Daenerys knew what would happen now. They would fight. Two entered the pit, and only one would leave it alive. The arena was completely silent. It was as if, just like her, they knew someone would die soon and didn’t dare to do anything, trying to delay the inevitable. In the end, Hizdahr zo Loraq brought her back to life.

“They’re waiting for you. Clap your hands.”

Daenerys looked down at the two men standing before her. Soon, she would sentence one of them to die. Was there no way to save them both? To save one from death, and the other one from becoming a murderer? She was the queen. Didn’t she have that power? No, she didn’t. A queen belonged to her people, and her people, as sad as it was, wanted to see blood. Slowly, reluctantly, she raised her hands and clapped them, sentencing a man to die like she did when she condemned Mossador. Only this time, there was no silence that followed the sentence, and no hiss. People cheered instead. How could that be? She executed a man for murder and was hated for that, but now she sentenced an innocent to death and was loved for this.

The two men started to fight. The smaller one was quick, avoided most of the stronger man’s attacks or blocked it with his shield. He managed to get behind his opponent and made a cut in his back, though the bigger man stood tall as if nothing happened. He seemed to wear some sort of armor while the smaller man had none and a less efficient sword.

“That one, the smaller man. No question, that’s where you should put your money,” said Daario as he leaned between Daenerys and Hizadhar. He would always try to stand between them, even if that wasn’t necessary.

“I’m not putting my money anywhere,” she replied darkly.

“Kings and queens never bet on the games. Perhaps you should go find someone who does,” suggested the future King of Meereen. Perhaps he didn’t visit friends for bet finally. Why did he visit them then?

“People used to bet against me when I fought in the pits,” Daario continued. “He would have bet against me. Common novice mistake.”

“I’ve spent much of my life in this arena. And in my experience, large men do triumph over smaller men far more often than not.”

“Has your experience ever involved any actual fighting?” she asked her future husband. “You yourself? Have you ever tried to kill another man who was trying to kill you?”

The leader of one of the great families of Meereen didn’t find something to answer to that and looked away. Daario was smiling between them and Daenerys only wanted to join him.

“Whenever I got into the pit against a beast like that one, the crowd saw me, all skin and bone back then, then they saw a pile of angry muscles ready to murder me. They couldn’t get their money out fast enough.” Daario produced a dagger as he spoke of his time in the fighting pits and brought it before Hizdahr zo Loraq’s face. “But the pile of angry muscles never had any muscles here.” Daario brought the dagger under his chin, the point almost against it. “Or here.” The dagger was almost again Hizdahr’s cheek now. “And the big men were always too slow to stop my dagger from going where their muscles weren’t. Yes, whenever I saw a beast like that one standing across from me making his beast faces, I knew I could rest easy.”

The crowd shouted loudly in pleasure. Daenerys realized the pile of muscles had cut the head of his opponent. The headless body fell slowly on the ground while the survivor roared. Whatever distraction and amusement Daario’s tales brought, they were gone. A man was dead, and people liked that.

“You may find it horrible, your Grace, but this is no worse than thousands of men dying in battle. Soldiers killed in battle are never remembered. These ones will have their name graven on the Gates of Fate. They will be remembered. Nothing has ever been accomplished without killing or cruelty. These are necessary conditions for greatness,” the man sitting at her right explained.

“That is greatness?” Daenerys asked disdainfully while they took away the body of the dead man and brandished his head, earning more applause from the crowd.

“That is a vital part of the great city of Meereen, which existed long before you or I and will remain standing long after we have returned to the dirt.”

The herald came back to announce the next contest, but Daenerys paid him no mind. She had no interest in the games. “One day your great city will return to the dirt as well.”

“At your command?” Hizdahr asked.

“If need be.”

“And how many people will die to make this happen?”

“If it comes to that, they will have died for a good reason.”

“Those men think they’re dying for a good reason,” he said, glancing at the pit. Daenerys didn’t follow his gaze.

“Someone else’s reason.”

“So your reasons are true and theirs are false? They don’t know their own minds, but you do?”

Daenerys didn’t reply. She hated that man. She wished she had Ser Barristan or even Ser Jorah to give him a good reply right now. She held his gaze for a long time and he kept smiling at her, as if he won, until her attention was brought back to the pit.

“I fight and die for your glory, oh glorious queen.” She knew that voice, even if it spoke in Valyrian instead of the common tongue it usually used. There were six men in the pit, and it was the last one at the right who had talked. He was her bear. Ser Jorah Mormont.

How could that be possible? She exiled him. She told him to leave and to never come back. What was he doing here? She kept looking at him in complete stupor. How could he be there?
“Your Grace,” started her betrothed.

“Shut your mouth,” Daario cut before he could say more.

Daenerys barely heard them. She stared at the man who had followed her ever since Pentos, a man who had loved her. He looked at her too, his eyes asking the same thing he asked her the last time they saw each other. He asked for her forgiveness. He betrayed me. My child died because of him. I exiled him, telling him I would have him executed if he ever came back. Yet he came back. She had spoken. He made his choice. She clapped her hands and the fight began. Ser Jorah nodded, as if he was saying that he understood. It didn’t matter if he understood. He came back. She swore to kill him if he did. Why should the people trust a queen who can’t keep her promises?

Ser Jorah first fought a man with a longaxe. He was a bearded priest from the city of Norvos. He hit Ser Jorah to the belly, then to the face with the wooden extremity of his axe, but couldn’t finish him as he was lying on the floor. The knight managed to duck the attack and to get back on his feet. However, his opponent managed to disarm Ser Jorah afterwards. As he tried to give the coup de grace, Ser Jorah disarmed him as well, and as they fought with fists and hands, Ser Jorah used his dagger to plant it in the man’s heart. He looked at her as life left his opponent, then turned to face his second opponent, throwing his dagger on the ground and taking back his sword.

Ser Jorah’s new opponent had a sword as well, but much thinner and shorter. However, he moved quicker than any other man Daenerys had ever seen. She recognized the Braavosi water dancing. There were some men practicing it in Pentos when she lived there. The Braavosi reached Ser Jorah’s cheek, then his leg, and finally his arm with his short sword. The bear was obviously no match for his opponent. He was hit several times by fists and feet as well and soon found himself lying on the ground, without his sword, the thin sword pointed at his throat.

As the Braavosi was about to kill him and the crowd chanted for his death, Ser Jorah looked to her again. Was he pleading for her to save him? Or asking forgiveness one last time? Could she end this? She wanted to, but she couldn’t. As the final blow was about to be given, a spear pierced the Braavosi’s heart. The Meereenese champion had defeated his two opponents and stabbed a third in the back. Daenerys knew Ser Barristan would have disapproved, but right now she could only feel relief. The champion let Ser Jorah go back to his feet and take back his sword. People kept cheering for the local champion. This was obviously no joust, and this wasn’t Westeros. These were the Great Games of the city of Meereen.

The Meereenese champion and the Westerosi knight were the two last competitors. The four others were dead, including a Dothraki. The two men fought. They were a match for each other. Ser Jorah got to the ground at one time and the champion tried to thrust his spear through the knight’s heart, but Ser Jorah stopped partially the spear by gripping it with his hands and his armor made the rest of the work. He got back on his feet as the crowd booed him. They faced each other again. With a roulade, Ser Jorah thrust his sword in his opponent’s heart. The crowd shouted in displeasure. Their champion was dead.

Ser Jorah looked at her. He had won. She supposed she could let him go again, but she wouldn’t take him back at her service if that was what he asked silently as his eyes were on her. Daenerys did her best to keep her face impassive. He was no longer in danger and she was master of her emotions once again. Then all of a sudden, his expression changed. He seized the spear and threw it in her direction.

Daenerys stooped just in time, Daario seizing her to give her some protection. Jorah had tried to kill her. The spear thumped into someone else behind. She looked and saw him fall on the ground. He wore the tokar, but he had a mask. She knew this mask. A Son of the Harpy. People were panicking... around. She looked back at her bear. He just saved her life. She turned around again and saw them.

They were everywhere, wearing all kind of clothes, with their golden masks. It took some time for everyone to realize what was happening. People screamed and ran away in total panic.

“Protect your queen!” shouted Daario.

Her Unsullied took position to protect her as chaos won the arena. The Sons of the Harpy were killing everyone, mostly former masters. Daario killed one who had seized a spear. Her Unsullied were trying to reach her, but many were killed. They were outnumbered everywhere. Daario killed some more men.

“Yes Your Grace! Your Grace!” yelled Hizdhar. “Come with me. I know a way out. I know a way…”

Her betrothed could never finish his sentence. Three Sons of the Harpy stabbed him in the heart. He wasn’t their leader. Daario was wrong. He had really tried to help her, and just like Ser Barristan he paid it with his life. Daario dealt with the three intruders, along with Jorah’s help.

Ser Jorah walked towards her and offered his hand. He had saved her. How wrong was she? She took it and they all walked away. She cast a last look behind her, seeing Hizdahr zo Loraq dying in his blood, betrayed by his fellow former masters. There was nothing they could do for him.

Daario and Jorah helped her to get down the platform with a few Unsullied. In the arena, some more Unsullied had arrived, but they kept being killed. They tried to escape by the gates, but it was closed as they approached and a Son of the Harpy blocked their path. Ser Jorah dealt with him, but they were still locked inside the pit.

“The other side. Follow me,” Daario said and they followed him.

More Unsullied joined them and made a wall all around her as they crossed the arena to the other end. It was chaos. People were running all around, screaming, killing or being killed. Before they could reach the other gate, dozens of Sons of the Harpy poured from it. Dozens poured in the pit from every gate. More came from the platform and the benches. Soon they were surrounded.

Looking at the platform, Daenerys noticed a dark form with black and bulky hair lying lifeless. Missandei. She was dead. They forgot to take her with them. How many were dead? Only a dozen Unsullied, Daario and Ser Jorah were left to defend her. They faced at least a hundred Sons of the Harpy. For now, they kept them away with their shields and spears, but for how long? The Sons waited with their daggers, hesitating to attack but not backing away.

Some of the Sons of the Harpy attacked, and they died, by Jorah’s, Daario’s or her Unsullied’s hands, but some Unsullied died as well. They had no way to escape. She wouldn’t survive this. They would die for her, but they wouldn’t save her. Viserys. Drogo. Rhaego. Irri. Jhiqi. Doreah. Ser Barristan. Hizdahr zo Loraq. Missandei. Soon Ser Jorah and Daario would join them, and she would follow. Grey Worm would probably be the last to join them. That was the end. Daenerys closed her eyes. Perhaps death wouldn’t be so bad. She had lived with the threat of death all her life. Being freed from this threat may be good. She was resigned to her fate.

Suddenly they heard a roar. She knew that sound. She knew where it came from. The roars resumed and everyone, knights, sellswords, queen, Unsullied and Sons of the Harpy looked at the skies. And he appeared. Her child. Drogon. He spat fire, his great wings outstretched, flying around the arena. Many of the Sons of the Harpy ran away as her first child landed in the pit, roaring.

A Son of the Harpy madly ran on her, but Drogon took him in his mouth, shook his head and tore the man’s body in two. He unleashed his fire on the Sons of the Harpy. Sadly, he shot his fire without discerning friend from foe and burned an Unsullied as well. Spears were thrown in his direction and he sent fire everywhere, even burning innocent people without mask. Spears kept flying at him. He was injured.

“Drogon!” she called him out. She couldn’t lose him too.

She walked to him, not caring about her men still fighting the Sons of the Harpy around her. He was in pain. She took one of the spears and pulled it out of his neck. He screeched at her, his mouth wide open, but closed it after a moment and looked at her. She raised her hand, approaching it gently of his muzzle, still looking straight in his eyes. She was afraid of touching him. The last time she tried, he had flown away. Before she could reach him, another spear pierced him. He turned and roared at the attackers. He was hurt. He couldn’t take any more spears or he could die. She had to get him out of here.

Slowly, she walked to his side and approached him. Then she climbed on his back. Perhaps it was suicidal, but she had to do it. She had to save him. She took place awkwardly among his scales. She hesitated a little, but finally she said the word. “Valahd.” It meant fly in Valyrian.

Her child charged forward, where her men and her enemies were still fighting. They stood aside and got out the way of her dragon. Drogon spread his wings and took fly. Daenerys gripped his scales tightly. He flew away, high in the sky, out of the arena. As they left the Great Pit, Daenerys felt a happiness she didn’t know to exist overwhelm her. She was the Mother of Dragons. That was her rightful place. They flew high, and as Daenerys looked down, she saw Meereen get smaller and smaller until it was only a point at the horizon. They flew north. Always north.

Chapter End Notes

Not very original I admit. Mostly, this chapter is the scene at Daznak's Pit without Tyrion. I'm really sorry that I killed Missandei. I really like her character, but since Tyrion wasn't there to save her, that was something to expect.

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Chapter Notes

I'm sorry I didn't update sooner everyone, but let's say I had a very busy agenda lately. My Master in Economics and my new job takes a lot of my time. There will only be this chapter and another one Saturday for this week. Sorry I can't entirely keep up with the pace I used to.

The first chapter where Tyrion and Sansa are in the North (the Neck is part of the North technically).

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TYRION XXI

Tyrion Lannister awoke at the sound of the rain hitting the roof of their tent. His face went immediately to Sansa. She was lying on her belly, her face turned to him. She was a little paler than usual. Ever since they arrived before Moat Cailin, Sansa hadn’t felt very well. She wasn’t the only one to be ill these times. The cold rain and the swamps that surrounded their long camp made many men sick. It was obvious they were going north, and winter was coming. The rain didn’t stop for three days now, and this rain couldn’t have been worse. It was a mix of melting snow and cold water. Nothing worse to demoralize the troops.

Tyrion removed the furs that covered him. He almost regretted it immediately. It was very cold. He put on some clothes hastily. He went to the brazier not far from their bed and fueled it a little to make the air warmer in the tent. That was a difficult exercise with his short height. He looked at his wife in the bed, her shoulders uncovered. He moved some furs on their bed and added them to the ones that already covered her. Sansa would be better this way. Then Tyrion went to the guards before their tent and asked one to fetch Podrick. His squire arrived a few minutes later and helped Tyrion don his armor like every day. Sadly, with his clumsy ways and the sound the armor made, they woke up Sansa.

“Tyrion,” she said in a faint voice, both from tiredness and from the cold she had.

“Excuse me, my lady. I didn’t want to awake you,” he apologized.

Sansa rolled a little in the furs. Podrick seemed very eager to look away. Tyrion found the boy’s shyness funny, though he would probably relieve him from his functions as a squire if he started to look at Sansa in an interested way. Anyway Sansa didn’t leave the furs. Podrick, on his side, left quickly as soon as Tyrion was clad in his whole armor. He turned to face Sansa.

“You’re very handsome,” she said, smiling.

“All courtesy like always.” He climbed with difficulty on the bed in his armor and kissed her tenderly on the forehead. “Try to rest for today. Heal yourself.”

“I almost forgot how cold it was in the North. I’m no longer used to it. I spent too much time in the “Just make sure you get better. I’ll go speak with your granduncle.” He kissed her again, on the lips this time. Her eyes were shining when he walked away. He wondered if Sansa shouldn’t wear a nightgown while sleeping like before. She would be warmer this way, and that would have the benefit of reducing the risk of someone walking into their tent without warning and seeing her naked. Sadly, one of the disagreements with a coldness was that you always felt it was too cold or too hot. Not that Tyrion knew it from experience. He wasn’t sick very often. He couldn’t even remember precisely the last time he had an illness. All he knew about this came from his readings and the siblings he saw with a disease.

The rain was falling heavily on him when he left the tent. How much time would that last? He put on his helmet, but the protection it provided against the rain was quite dubious. It was a helmet after all, not a hood. Armors were made to protect against swords and arrows, not against snow and rain. Men who were on guard duty stayed under tents or any other shelter they could find. That wouldn’t be good if they were attacked, but there was no way they could force their men to stay under the rain. Anyway, they could die if they did force them. Tyrion walked to the Blackfish’s tent.

The old knight was already awakened like Tyrion expected, talking with some of his commanders including Lord Karyl Vance. They were leaving as Tyrion entered. The Blackfish barely acknowledged the intruder. Despite the last weeks where they almost commanded the army together, Ser Brynden Tully was still cold towards Tyrion like the rain outside. Tyrion dropped his wet helmet on a nearby table.

“We lost three men last day,” Tyrion announced.

“And we lost two,” replied the Blackfish. “The Freys lost one, because he was foolish enough to venture into the swamps.”

All their morning meetings began this way, by announcing how many of their own men they lost to disease, cold or animals from the Neck the previous day.

The knight sighed and dropped some parchment on his desk. “Two weeks that we’ve been stuck here, south of Moat Cailin. These Dustins and these Cerwyns! We live in the mud and the swamps thanks to them.”

“They live in them as well,” Tyrion pointed out. “Moat Cailin has seen better days. It’s not really a place to live in. They surely have as many problems as we have.”

“Yes, but they hold the fortress all the same,” the knight replied. “How does it come they were here? Roose Bolton shouldn’t have had the time to send men. The announcement of his disgrace only came out when we had almost reached this place.”

“Perhaps Walder Frey warned Roose Bolton he was besieged,” proposed Tyrion. “He could foolishly hope his son-in-law would send him help and Roose Bolton deduced he may be next. The man is no idiot.”

“No, he’s not,” Brynden conceded. “Olyvar was in the Twins. As far as he knows, his father sent no ravens in the North while we besieged him.”

“Does Walder Frey tell everything to his son? Or anything?” asked Tyrion uselessly.

“That’s a possibility,” the knight acknowledged reluctantly. “You should have considered this when you devised your plan to invade the North,” he accused, contempt in his voice.
“We cannot foresee everything in war. As a war veteran, I think you know this better than me.” The Blackfish didn’t look happy to receive lessons on warfare. “That matter is irrelevant now. We must focus on taking Moat Cailin.”

“We cannot take it from the south,” the old knight almost roared. “Our attack when we arrived ended with three hundred dead men in our ranks, mostly Tullys. My own men. We cannot get around Moat Cailin, our army would sink in the swamps. And that’s the problem. If we cannot send men north of Moat Cailin, then we won’t be able to take it.”

“I sent a raven to White Harbor. Lord Manderly will soon take the fortress by the north. They won’t hold for long when he’ll arrive.”

“He could never come. The Boltons can threaten him.”

“The Boltons are far from White Harbor,” explained Tyrion. “Right now they must deal with Stannis marching on Winterfell. We have Lord Wyman’s son and heir, Ser Wylis. His father is the one who informed me the most about the situation in the North while I was at Casterly Rock. He will come to our aid. And if he doesn’t, we can still expect the crannogmen to have noticed our presence. Our army is hard to miss. We have almost thirty thousand men. Howland Reed may come to speak with us when he sees the banners of House Tully. I think he won’t complain about helping us to overwhelm the man who killed his king.”

The Blackfish nodded. They both knew they could only wait for now. The Manderlys would come, and then they would be able to take Moat Cailin and to resume their march on Winterfell. In the meantime, they had to be patient.

“How is Sansa?” asked the man standing before Tyrion.

“Still sick. She even gave back her dinner yesterday, but today she seems better. She only needs to rest.”

“I think I’ll pay her a visit later,” her granduncle said. He and Tyrion stood there, looking at each other. Finally, the knight spoke. “I don’t trust you, Lannister.”

That was nothing new. Tyrion was no longer surprised of that. “I gave you back your castle, your lands and your titles to you and to your family. I gave you most of the revenge you wanted against House Frey and I’m endangering my own men to free Catelyn Stark’s daughter, and to kill the man who murdered Robb Stark. Is that not enough to convince you that I’m an ally?”

“Yes, we are allies,” acknowledged Ser Brynden. “But only because we both want Roose Bolton with his head on a spike, his son next to him. That doesn’t make us friends. You took care of Sansa, for that you have my gratitude in Cat’s name. But I know you’re not only marching on the North to save Arya Stark. I know that Sansa is the Lady of Winterfell, hence through her you can claim the North for yourself and House Lannister. Let me be clear.” He stepped forward until he towered Tyrion with his height, only two feet away from him. “If you ever mistreat Sansa, or harm her in any way, I will free her from her marriage, and in a permanent way. It’s only because she loves you and because you seem to treat her well that you’re alive.”

“You’re still better than your niece,” said Tyrion. “After I saved her from tribesmen, she still wanted to have me executed.”

Tyrion walked out on these words. “Perhaps you didn’t try to kill Bran Stark, but I keep wondering why he fell in the first place.” The Blackfish’s words accompanied him as he left the tent back into the rain. Again, the helmet proved to be little protection against the rain, but it was still better than nothing.

Tyrion went to the outposts and the sentinels watching Moat Cailin. His men would have a better morale if they saw their lord share some of their disagreements. The fact Sansa was sick like many of them also made his men closer to Tyrion since they felt their lord and lady were suffering of the same sickness than some of their comrades.

Tyrion looked at the fortress in ruins. He had spent time there when he had gone in and out of the North before the war, but he couldn’t remember any way to breach it. This ruin was enough to protect the North against any southern invader. Now the banners of House Dustin and House Cerwyn were hanging from its battlements alongside the red flayed man of House Bolton. Tyrion cursed in silence like every day. How could Roose Bolton have known they were marching against him? Tyrion wanted to chop Walder Frey’s head for that. At least they kept receiving supplies from the Twins. The garrison there made sure of it. They also received supplies from the Westerlands, though more slowly recently as they progressed farther from the Golden Tooth and the rain slowed down the wagons. There were a few desertions at the south of the camp, though Daven made a good job in limiting them. Their camps spread on leagues on the thin strip of land following the Kingsroad in the Neck, and the Lannister troops were kept at the far south since they were the men who were the less prone to desert. They were farther from their homes than the soldiers of the Riverlands.

Tyrion finally went back to his tent. Sansa seemed to feel a little better again. She was now sitting in the bed, wearing a woolen gown, though still covered with furs and shivering from time to time. She smiled when he entered. Tyrion forgot about the Blackfish, the North, Moat Cailin, the army, the Neck, the Dustins, the Cerwyns, the Boltons and the Freys. He spent time with his wife, removing his armor and taking more usual garb, remaining with her in what warmth their tent could give them. They also did something else to warm themselves, and luckily no one walked through the flap of their tent while they did it.

“What a Lady of Winterfell I make,” Sansa mocked later, still wearing woolen clothes under her furs. “Getting cold as soon as she enters the North.”

“You’re not the only one who does, Sansa,” Tyrion said.

“Yes, only the others are not Northerners.” She wasn’t wrong. “How can I claim the North if I cannot support its weather?”

“You are the eldest daughter of Eddard Stark, Sansa. You are the Lady of Winterfell,” Tyrion argued.

“A Lady of Winterfell who doesn’t live at Winterfell. A Lady of Winterfell who hasn’t seen Winterfell, or even the North, for years. A Lady of Winterfell who bears the name of the family who slaughtered the last Lord and Lady of Winterfell and the King in the North. A Lady of Winterfell whose path is blocked by Northerners who swore fealty to her family hundreds of years ago.”

Tyrion didn’t like to see her like this. Ever since Riverrun, Sansa was expressing doubts about being a Stark or even a Northerner. Tyrion thought now her doubts had begun before that and were only reinforced by the way the men were looking at her. The commanders of the Lannister army and more and more of their soldiers looked more and more at her like a Lannister, which was a good thing since they had more respect for her, but sadly it had the effect of making her feel even less like a Stark. Tyrion felt he was responsible for this in some way. He made Sansa his wife, and in all senses of the term, making her bear the name of the Lannisters. Her necklace could be hiding a direwolf under the lion, but the direwolf was still hidden. It was the lion that the river lords, the Freys and the Tullys saw.
“Sansa, in my eyes, you will always be a Stark, as much as you are my wife,” Tyrion told her, hoping this would reduce her doubts in some small way. “You are a Stark, and you will always be a Stark.”

“I wish the Dustins and the Cerwyns saw it the same way than you,” she said. She smiled thinly at him, but she was still bitter about the way the only Northerners they met up to now fought against her.

“They may not see you as a Lannister, Sansa,” Tyrion supposed. “They may simply fear the Boltons. I wouldn’t blame them considering what we know of Roose Bolton’s son. We know he flayed the father, the mother and the uncle of the actual Lord Cerwyn. My father knew how fear was effective in keeping people obedient. I’m afraid his friend Roose knows it as well. The Cerwyns are afraid. And they probably fight more against the red banners than against you. I have probably far more to see with their resistance than you.”

Sansa nodded, though she still seemed unconvinced. Tyrion hoped the Northerners didn’t see her as a Lannister and that he was the one they hated, or else they would have no chance of rallying them to their cause, before or after the defeat of House Bolton, if they defeated them. They needed Sansa to be seen as a Northerner, or else the Northerners would fight for the Boltons with Arya Stark and would never acknowledge Sansa as their lady. Tyrion remembered how the little girl had looked almost like a real wolf at Winterfell. He looked at Sansa with her Tully red hair and blue eyes, her southern courtesies and manners, and her silken gowns. Her sister had obviously more wolf blood than her. Even Tyrion had to concede it.

Podrick came in. “My lord, my lady. There are riders who just came from the south. They asked to speak with you and Ser Brynden.”

“Riders?” Tyrion found it strange. “Who are they? How many?”

“A dozen, my lord. They were knights. They asked to speak with you and Ser Brynden. They had a banner with a white tower on it.”

A white tower? There was only one house with a tower as a sigil. “I’m coming, I’ll come back soon, Sansa,” he added for his wife. He put a cloak to protect him from the rain before he went out. The hood did a much better job than the helmet, though it was quickly wet. Still, it was better than a helmet. Ser Brynden was already inside the command tent.

“Can you tell me why Hightowers come to see us?” he asked immediately as Tyrion came inside.

“I was about to ask you the same question, ser,” Tyrion retorted.

“I have no link with the Reach, you know that. You, on the other end, the Tyrells are your allies. And House Hightower is sworn to House Tyrell. If they came, that was for you.”

They waited in silence for a time, then a group of knights entered. They were all wet and had obviously ridden for a long time. Their armors displayed the sigil of House Hightower along with various other sigils.

“My lords,” the leader bowed. He had a sigil black and yellow with three beehives on him. “Ser Hugh of House Beesbury, at your service.”

“Ser Hugh,” the Blackfish greeted him. “May we know what brings you here?”

“They are my escort,” said a voice behind, a woman’s voice. A hooded shape came from behind the knights. She removed her hood. The face under it, with black hair and green eyes, was the last Tyrion was expecting.

“Lady Mira?” he asked.

“Lord Tyrion,” she greeted him with a smile and a courtesy. “It’s a pleasure to see you again.”

“The pleasure is shared, my lady. Though I didn’t expect to see you here.” He noticed her cloaks and travelling clothes were all wet just like those of her escort. She looked very tired and had dark circles around her eyes. Her hair was all matted. They seemed to have ridden for days. “Perhaps you and your men would like to rest.”

“My men, yes, but I need to speak with you first.”

“Podrick.” His squire was on the right side of the tent. “Show these men a place where they can rest and dry themselves.”

Podrick carried out the order and the men left, leaving Tyrion, Lady Mira and Ser Brynden alone in the tent. Tyrion remembered something then.

“Perhaps I should have thought about this before. You are a Hightower now, my lady. Aren’t you?”

“Yes, my lord,” she confirmed. He remembered Sansa telling him back at Casterly Rock that her friend had been married to a grandson of Lord Hightower.

“Excuse me, my lady,” intervened the Blackfish. “But I don’t have the pleasure to know you.”

Tyrion made the presentations. “Lady Mira, this is Ser Brynden Tully. Ser Brynden, this is Lady Mira Hightower. Previously Mira Forrester. She served as a handmaiden for Sansa in King’s Landing.”

“Forrester?” asked the knight, a queer look on his face.

“Perhaps you’ve met my father, ser. He was fighting with Robb Stark during the war. And my eldest brother too,” said the lady.

“You are the daughter of Gregor Forrester?”

“Yes, ser.”

The knight’s face softened. “Your father was a good man. And your brother a great warrior. I remember him. Rodrik was his name, wasn’t it?”

“Yes, ser,” she confirmed.

“I’m sorry for what happened to them. But why are you here?”

“My husband is bringing an army of a thousand men to the North. They are a few days of march from here, though they progress more slowly in this rain.”

“Your husband?”

“Ser Gerold Hightower. He’s not the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard,” she added before the Blackfish’s skeptical look. “But he was named after him. He’s a grandson of Lord Leyton. His father is the heir to the Hightower.”

The Blackfish seemed to understand. “Let me guess. They want Ironrath,” said Tyrion.
The lady nodded, with a smile on the corners of her lips. “I convinced them it was time with the Boltons disavowed.”

“Clever girl,” Tyrion said, not without admiration.

“Do all lords of the south have Northerners in their family to convince them to march on the North?” the knight asked. “We thank you, my lady. Your men may be useful, but not for now. We’re stuck here in the Neck.”

“Because of the rain?” asked Lady Mira.

“No,” answered Tyrion instead of the Blackfish. “Moat Cailin. Northerners put a garrison there. Mostly Cerwyns and Dustins. We cannot cross it.”

The young lady looked completely surprised, and terrified. “You can’t be serious.” Tyrion nodded to mean they were more than serious. Lady Mira seemed to panic. “The men of the Reach are not used to that weather. We left before they entered the Neck and even then they had a hard time supporting the cold rain.”

“Well, now it’s too late,” the Blackfish remarked. “I hope you brought food with you. Our supply lines could be better right now.”

“We have enough food to stand on our own for a year. I told Lord Leyton when we left that it would be safer to bring more.”

The lady reassured them with these words. Again, Tyrion had to admit she was clever. He wondered if Margaery Tyrell sent her to the Hightowers because she found her too much clever.

“Well, for now, your husband’s troops will have to wait here just like us,” Tyrion said. “You should as well settle yourself as comfortably as you can. Come, I’ll walk you out.”

They left the tent and Tyrion led her under the heavy rain. Couldn’t it stop for a moment? “There is someone who will be overjoyed to see you again,” Tyrion told her on the way.

“How is the Lady Sansa?” she asked.

“A little sick, I’m afraid. Because of the swamps and the rain. But she’s getting better. She stays in our tent. She’ll be happy to see you again.” A moment passed, and an idea came to Tyrion’s mind. “Lady Mira, could I ask you a service?”

“Yes, my lord.”

“Sansa doesn’t feel well, but not only because of the cold she caught. She… She has the impression to have lost her northern roots after spending so much time in the south. You’re probably the only one who may have an idea how she feels. Do you think you could help her?”

“I’ll try,” she promised.

Tyrion thought about discussing what she saw in the Great Sept of Baelor, but it didn’t seem to be the time. Someone could hear them there outside, and anyway he didn’t think it would do much good to talk about it right after he asked a favor to the lady. Maybe it would be better if he asked Sansa to talk with Lady Mira about it, to make sure she wouldn’t tell anyone. They arrived at the tent. Sansa was reading. When they entered and removed their hoods, she smiled at Tyrion before realizing who was with him. Her eyes showed complete surprise, then utter happiness.
“Mira!”

“Lady Sansa,” the former Forrester curtsied.

Sansa went out of her furs and approached. “I’m glad to see you. What are you doing here?”

“My husband is bringing an army with him. He means to retake Ironrath, and to help you retake the North.”

“That’s wonderful news. How is he?”

Some red appeared on the girl’s cheeks. “He’s a good man.” Something hit Tyrion at this moment.

“Lady Mira, how did you arrive so quickly? You couldn’t have made the travel from Oldtown in less than three weeks,” Tyrion asked.

“No, my lord,” she answered. “We needed almost two months to reach you.”

“How could you leave so soon? The news about Roose Bolton’s demise were revealed only two weeks ago, three at most.”

“King Tommen sent me a raven to warn me in advance.”

The Hightowers knew Roose Bolton would be branded a traitor before everyone else. What if…?

“Lady Mira, who knew about this message Tommen sent to you?”

“Only Lord Leyton, his eldest son, me, my husband and my brother-in-law.” Lady Mira seemed to find his questions strange.

“What about the maester who received the raven? Did he have any link with the North?”

“Not that I know. Though I must admit I didn’t know this maester very much. But as far as I know, I was the only Northerner in the Hightower. Why?”

There was no clue of it then. That could still explain Roose Bolton’s prompt reaction, but nothing was certain.

“Nothing. I think I’ll leave you between Northerners. You surely have a lot to tell each other.” Tyrion went away, going back into the rain. He would inspect the trenches again and see if there was any new about Bronn. He hadn’t returned from his mission in King’s Landing. As he left, he heard the two women talk.

“Have you seen Margaery?” asked his wife.

“Yes, I saw her when we stopped at King’s Landing. She’s alright. Her marriage with the king is going well. Though they have problems with religious fanatics. They call themselves the Sparrows.”

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Roose
Roose II

Chapter Notes

Quite a short chapter, but with much important information. It allows us to learn more about the situation in the North while the Lannisters, Tullys, Freys and Hightowers are trying to breach through Moat Cailin. I don't like Roose Bolton at all, but there is no better character right now to see the political situation of the North in an enlightened way.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

ROOSE II

The men were preparing, almost all cavalry. They were well fed and rested. Stannis's troops were not. Their scouts had reported the army was approaching only on feet, without any horse. The men looked frozen. Ramsay’s plan had worked out well. Stannis had faced many desertions and now only had as much as men as they had, without horses. That wouldn’t be battle. That would be butchery.

His son came out from the tower where his wife lived, or was kept. With Ramsay, there was no difference between the two states. His sword was unsheathed and his father noticed blood on it.

“I do hope you didn’t start the battle by killing one of our own men,” Roose commented sternly.

“This is my wife’s blood. I made her kiss it.”

“On the edge? I saw men doing the same thing before the battle cowering before the enemy when he charged. Your men are waiting for you, and you’re losing time. Finish what you started.”

Ramsay nodded and walked to his horse. He had some of his men bring his dogs. Roose climbed the steps to the battlements. From there, he had a perfect view. They couldn’t distinguish the enemy from afar yet, but he knew they were approaching, starved, exhausted, cold and spiritless. Still, they were led by Stannis Baratheon, and the man had an iron will. Ramsay didn’t fear Stannis, and that was a terrible mistake. You should never underestimate your enemy, and his son did it all the time. He would lead the charge against Stannis’s army, but Roose had given specific instructions to his commanders. They would follow these instructions, not Ramsay’s. The Warden of the North wouldn’t risk the outcome of the battle with his son’s thirst for blood and screams. Roose would soon see how Ramsay fared in battle. At least, he would see if Ramsay fought well, something he would be surprised but pleased to see. If Ramsay got himself killed… Well, let’s hope the maesters were right and Lady Walda was carrying a boy, or that Ramsay somehow managed to impregnate Arya Stark before the battle. He feared his son didn’t think enough about putting a child in the girl and too much about playing his games with the Stark girl.

The men got out from the castle through the main gate and positioned themselves in a slope that would make them invisible to Stannis’s army. After thirty minutes of something that looked like an endless waiting for everyone else but Roose, the banners with the burning heart appeared on the horizon. They moved slowly. Roose Bolton let them approach, more and more, until he judged they were close enough. The army seemed to have stopped in some way. That was the time. He ordered the sign. A flag with the flayed man was waved. His commanders ordered the men to move forward, first slowly, then they called for the charge. Roose saw his son, among the commanders in the first lines, not moving, staying away from the fights with his dogs while the men charged. He had ordered the charge as Roose had the signal made, believing he was the one commanding. Roose didn’t entirely reproach to his son his decision to stay behind, but when you didn’t have the intention to fight in battle, you shouldn’t place yourself right in front of your men at the beginning of the battle, then let them charge without you. They could feel uneasy and afraid seeing their lord not going to battle with them. By chance, they didn’t face a true army.

The cavalry extended, forming in a formation wide enough to encircle the army and attack it from the head and the flanks simultaneously. From his point of view, Roose could see about half the army running away, many men trying to hide in the forests. A part of the army managed to keep some formation. This was really Stannis Baratheon they were fighting. Any other commander would have lost all his men to stampede. Roose had to admit he felt some respect for Stannis, just like he still felt some for Robb Stark even after he killed him. The cavalry thrusted into Stannis’s army from all sides. He could hear the sounds of swords clattering and men crying. Ramsay finally charged with his dogs. They didn’t go to the strong point of the army. They chased the deserters in the woods. Ramsay saw battle like a hunt. Unsurprisingly, Roose was deceived by his son once again.

The battle went on. The center of the enemy army could hold only for a few minutes, and they were all slaughtered. Soon the men only had to chase Stannis’s troops fleeing all around. Roose knew some would escape, but that wouldn’t matter as long as they captured Stannis Baratheon. He was the one they needed. If Stannis escaped, he could still regroup the remains of his army and keep fighting. The man could adapt and would never abandon. Capturing Stannis was everything that mattered.

His commanders followed the orders he gave them. They kept chasing every man until they found Stannis. A few men returned with nothing, but finally a group of ten men came back with a man bearing the burning heart on his armor, attached from wrists and feet. He had grey hair, was badly injured at the right leg, was very slender and had a hard face. They dropped him before their lord.

“Who’s this?” Roose asked them.

“Stannis Baratheon,” answered one of the men.

Roose Bolton took a close look to the man. He had blue eyes and black hair, was broad shouldered and sinewy. It was obvious he was tall even on his knees. His armor proved he was someone important. It could be Stannis Baratheon.

“You know who I am?” Roose asked him.

The man looked back at him. He had lost, and was a broken man, but maintained a certain hardness and force that allowed him to be somewhat strong as he looked up at the Warden of the North standing tall right before him.

“Roose Bolton.” His voice was hoarse, but not nervous. “The man who plunged a dagger in Robb Stark’s heart. We have something in common. We both killed someone who pretended to be king. Do you know that it is thanks to me that you killed Robb Stark and now stand where you are? I used blood magic. Spoke three names to the Lord of Light. Balon Greyjoy, Joffrey Baratheon, Robb Stark. I asked for their deaths. Only the first still lives as far as I know. I suppose he will die soon. You will probably die soon as well. All the Northerners want your head for killing the man they chose to be their king.”

One of Roose’s men kicked the fallen king in the back. That wasn’t really necessary. Words couldn’t hurt the Lord of the Dreadfort, and he thought Stannis knew it. The man lying in the snow before him knew he was lost.

“You are not very well placed to use such words, Lord Stannis,” Roose commented.

“Am I well placed to use any word?” the pretender replied.

“No,” answered Roose sternly. “Bring the execution block,” he told his men before returning his attention to the usurper. “You’re lucky my son didn’t find you in the first place. I will spare you the peeling of your skin. If he ever does it, it will be on your dead body, though he probably won’t. He likes to do it on people alive much more.”

The block was put into place and Roose Bolton held his sword tall next to Stannis Baratheon’s head. Most of the men in the courtyard were looking at it.

“Stannis of the House Baratheon. You rebelled against your rightful king and nephew,” he began.

“As you did. Twice,” Stannis interrupted. He received another kick in the ribs. He barely whined. Roose resumed.

“In the name of Tommen of the House Baratheon, the First of His Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm, I Roose of the House Bolton, Lord of the Dreadfort, Lord of Winterfell and Warden of the North, sentence you to die. Do you have any last words?”

“Go on, do your duty.”

He was resigned to die. Roose Bolton swung the sword and the last contender to the Iron Throne died. That was the Old Way. The man who passes the sentence should swing the sword. Better to honor tradition. Some northern houses held these traditions very dearly, and they needed these houses more than ever now. Stannis Baratheon’s head was planted on a spike and put on the battlements to be seen by everyone. His body was buried along with many others in a common grave outside the castle’s walls.

Five hours later, Roose Bolton was sitting in his solar, reading reports about the battle. For now, they counted one hundred men lost on their side. A small price to pay for killing Stannis Baratheon. One less threat. However, Shireen Baratheon, Stannis’s daughter, hadn’t been found. She was probably still at Castleblack with her mother, Lady Selyse. She was no great threat for now, without men, and only a girl of ten from what they knew. It would probably be better to let the Iron throne take care of her. She was no threat for the North. Roose’s son finally arrived, smiling wildly. His father paid him no attention.

“Sit,” he commanded. His son executed the order.

“I have killed a hundred men,” Ramsay said uncertainly.

“How many men have you fought?” his father asked. He stopped reading and looked at his son. “How many did you actually fight? Or were they all men crawling on the ground? Do you include those your dogs devoured?” His son didn’t answer. “Then why are you talking about it? Do you feel proud to be less efficient than your mad dogs? You missed Stannis’s execution. His head is on the battlements.”

“We should have flayed him. To honour our traditions.”

“I honored the traditions of the North by killing him in the old way. That’s how we can keep northern houses on our side. We need them. While I was gaining support from the other houses and killing the usurper, you were hunting men who would have ended up dead anyway. I ordered you to come here hours ago.”

“My wife was lonely. I paid her a visit,” the boy offered as an excuse, still with a wide smile.

“I’m sure she wouldn’t have complained about waiting. You wasted your time. And time is something we cannot waste right now. Did you put a child in the girl at least?”

Ramsay shrugged. “I don’t know.”

“Then I would do my best to put a child in her soon if I were you. Perhaps your technique is not the right one. From personal experience, the women who end up with child willingly produce better results than those who have children unwillingly.” He thought about Domeric, how better and worthier than Ramsay he always was. He rose from his chair and looked straight in his son’s eyes. “It is a great victory we had today. Your command of the cavalry was impressive. Do you feel like a victor?”

“Yes.”

His son was really stupid. “Do you think that burning wagons in the night and moving down tired, outnumbered Baratheons is he same as facing a prepared and provisioned Lannister army?”

“No,” his son finally said while shaking his head. Perhaps he wasn’t completely a fool.

“What do you think are our chances against a prepared and provisioned Lannister army, supported by the Blackfish, the river lords, the Freys, the Hightowers and the Crown? And with Sansa Stark with them? How long do you think the North will stand on our side with Sansa Stark coming back home at the head of a powerful army?”

“We have Walda Frey. Let’s send Lord Frey a finger of hers. He will withdraw his men.”

“Lady Walda is my wife, and the Lady of the Dreadfort. And your stepmother. You sent Theon Greyjoy’s favorite toy, like you call it, to his father. Did he order his men to leave the North after that?” His son shook his head. “If Balon Greyjoy didn’t withdraw for his son and heir, do you think Walder Frey will withdraw for one of his fifty granddaughters?”

“We have Arya Stark,” Ramsay tried to argue again.

“Arya Stark is after Sansa in the line of succession, and she doesn’t have tens of thousand men with her. You didn’t even get a child from her yet, and people barely see her. Who do you think the North will support? You?”

His son had no answer. The Lord of the Dreadfort resumed.

“Our house has been attainted by the Crown. Every lord and lady in the North knows it by now. We won’t be able to hide it to our men for long. We are no longer officially the Wardens of the North, and people know how you treat the daughter of Eddard Stark. I rebelled against the Crown to arrange your marriage with Arya Stark. A reckoning is already on his way in the Neck.”

“The Lannisters are blocked in the Neck.”

“For how long? You think the Cerwyns and the Dustins want so much to fight against Sansa Stark and for us? We are lucky Lord Whitehill has a son at the Citadel who happened to be friend with one of the maesters at the Hightower. Or else we wouldn’t have known about our disgrace before it was announced and the Lannisters would be walking on us as we speak, northern houses joining them on their way. And we have another enemy to deal with now.” He tossed an unrolled scroll to his son. “Read. I suppose you can.”

His son read for a very long time before he said something. Roose knew he had difficulties to read. “Wildlings? They are no threat,” his son mocked.

“They are. Now that Jon Snow let them pass through the Wall. They are on the lands of the Gift for now, but that won’t last. They will head south as winter comes. Head against the houses that are the most likely to support us against the Lannisters. The Glovers, the Whitehills, the Karstarks. They could even attack the Dreadfort. If the Lannisters take Moat Cailin, we’ll have two enemies on two sides. We cannot hope to defeat them both.”

“Then let’s attack the wildlings and end their threat right now,” proposed Ramsay.

“We would have to cross the lands of the Umbers. Do you think Jon Umber will let us pass without question? He remains loyal to the Starks up to this day.”

“Then let’s kill him.”

“If we do that, if we assassinate the head of one of the most powerful houses in the North, what few support we have will diminish considerably. And we will have to fight the forces of House Umber. Our own forces will be greatly weakened after a fight against the wildlings and the Umbers. Do you think we’ll be able to stand against the Lannisters after that?”

No answer. His son was speechless. Roose always had to lecture him. He resumed one of his many lectures. “Put a son in Arya Stark. If you don’t succeed, then let’s hope Lady Walda is carrying a son.”

He could see worry on Ramsay’s face as he left his solar. That could push him to really impregnate his wife instead of playing with her body. It was a chance the marriage between Tyrion Lannister and Sansa Stark was still unconsummated. If she had a son, then they would have no chance of keeping the North in the long term.

Lord Bolton had ravens sent to all the houses in the North to inform them the usurper Stannis Baratheon was dead and executed according to the old way. He also reminded them that southern invaders were still trying to breach through Moat Cailin, but for now were kept away by the courage and the determination of the Northerners holding it. All the same, they had to defend the North from thieves who were trying to kidnap Arya Stark, the daughter of Eddard Stark. He also warned the lords about the recent arrivals of the wildlings on the lands of the Gift, allowed to pass through the Wall and to live on the lands they ravaged for centuries by the Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, Jon Snow. With some hope, that would make everyone in the North more suspicious about the Starks who weren’t with House Bolton.

Next, Roose summoned Torrhen Whitehill. The heir to Highpoint entered with a stern and serious look that he would make threatening before anyone else.

“Lord Bolton,” he said as a greeting.

“Sit, Lord Whitehill.” The man sat. “I owe you thanks, I guess. Without you and your brother, we would have a Lannister army marching on us as we speak.”

“My house has served House Bolton faithfully and diligently for centuries, my lord. We’re not about to stop now, even less with the advantages you gave us.”

“And yet, despite these advantages that I gave, your father made mistake after mistake. He destroyed Ironrath, killed all the Forresters there. He is now unable to provide me the necessary ironwood. And when he was given a chance to marry his son to the last Forrester alive, he refused. Thanks to his refusal, the Hightowers joined the Lannisters in their crusade against us.”

“My father serves you faithfully, my lord,” the heir to Highpoint said in defense. “But I have to admit he can be prickly and proud.”

“Very proud and very prickly, you mean. And very often. His pride led him to mistakes that may cost you the control over the Forrester lands and your family’s wealth. It may even compromise the survival of your family. What do you think Mira Forrester will do when she comes home and see what your family did to hers? Do you believe she will spare you?”

“Sansa Stark may not be more lenient,” Torrhen observed.

“Then we share a common goal. If the army of the south defeats us, both our families are doomed. I hope you understand that.” The man nodded. “I expect your father to send me all his men when we’ll need them. And hopefully, we will defeat the Lannisters. When this will happen, you will marry Mira Forrester. We’ll make sure her husband dies on the battlefield. But this will happen only if we win.”

“I understand, Lord Bolton. We win together, or we die together. House Whitehill will stand side by side with House Bolton, in prosperity and in defeat.”

“That’s a good thing,” Roose remarked sternly. “Go back to Highpoint. Reason your father. Make sure all your men are here when the Lannisters come. You are free to use all means necessary to convince him.”

Torrhen Whithehill rose from his seat and walked away, but before he left he made another observation. “We have to admit one thing however, my lord. My father was utterly stupid when he refused the Forrester girl. However, without his refusal, the girl would never have gone to Oldtown, and my brother would never have warned me. In some way, my brother used our father’s mistakes to our advantage.”

The Warden of the North approved. “Lord Whitehill’s children are more intelligent than him.”

“Yes, we are. My sister Gwyn especially. Too bad she chose her love for some Forrester second son over her own blood. I was the one who discovered their affair many years ago. She died at Ironrath.” The man’s expression turned sour. “She should have been wise enough to forget about him.”

“Too bad,” Roose commented without emotion. “I hope you won’t make the same mistake than her.”

“I won’t. My lord.” Torrhen Whitehill bowed and left.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: someone we haven't seen for a very long time
Jon III

Chapter Notes

I'm sorry for those who hoped that Arya would be back, but not yet. She will come back, don't worry.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

JON III

Jon looked to the north. The wind was whipping at his face, colder than ever. The Citadel may say that winter wasn’t there yet, but Jon knew it was. North of the Wall, it was settled, and it was settled to stay. In his dreams at night, he would see him again. The Night King. Raising his hands. The tens of thousand people who would rise from death behind him. The biggest army in the world.

Jon looked all around at the Wall he was standing at the top of. Could the Wall hold them off? Could the Wall hold the dead? Sam told him there was some magic in the Wall, and Melisandre said the same. Was this magic powerful enough to contain the White Walkers and the dead on the other side? Jon couldn’t know. He would ask Sam if he was still here, but Sam had left several days ago for Eastwatch-by-the-Sea with Gilly and her son. Now that Maester Aemon was dead too, Jon had no one to look into the many books and scrolls of Castleblack’s library. Sam was right. He was better than Jon at reading, and right now they needed someone who could read. They needed someone to find answers.

“Lord Commander,” said a voice on his right. Jon looked at Ser Davos approaching. He arrived yesterday, asking for help. Stannis was stuck in the snows near Winterfell. Jon had an idea where this tempest came from. From Hardhome. He had allowed the Onion Knight to stay at Castleblack, but refused to help Stannis. The Night’s Watch took no part in the wars of the Seven Kingdoms, and the wildlings just survived from Hardhome. He swore a vow. They all swore a vow.

“Ser Davos,” Jon greeted him.

He expected the knight to ask for help again, but he didn’t. “I’ve been talking with some of your men. The ones who came back from Hardhome. Is that true? You fought the dead?”

“We did,” Jon simply answered.

“And… the Night King? His great army?”

“Tens of thousands.”

Ser Davos sighed. “No army in the world can defy it.”

“And their army will keep growing. If they get through the Wall, they will slaughter everyone in the North, then bring them back to fight in their ranks. Then they will invade the Riverlands, the Westerlands, the Crownlands, until they reach Dorne. At each battle, their army will grow stronger, and ours weaker.”
“Can they? Can they breach the Wall?” Fear was plain on Ser Davos’s face. Jon shared it.

“I hope they can’t.” That was all he could say. Jon walked away. Stannis’s Hand followed him. They went to the cage and it began to go down.

“We need Stannis more than ever,” Davos said. “He is a proven battle commander, and he’s the only one among these noble people who knows the White Walkers are coming. But he won’t be able to fight them if he doesn’t take Winterfell, and he won’t take Winterfell without more men.”

“The Night’s Watch doesn’t take part in the politics of the Realm,” repeated Jon. He had been clear about it before, and it wouldn’t change.

“When I left,” resumed Davos, “the horses were dying, our men starving, the sellswords were deserting more and more, and Bolton’s men had attacked us, burning most of our supplies and our siege engines.”

“That changes nothing. The Night’s Watch doesn’t participate to wars among lords and kings.”

“You swore to be the shield that guards the realms of men.”

“Aye, and that’s why we must stay here and defend the Wall against the dead. When the dead come, we need men on the Wall to fight them. We cannot allow ourselves to fight in the south, or else we’re doomed. It won’t matter who sits on the Iron Throne or rules Winterfell if the White Walkers get through the Wall.”

“Who answered your call when Mance Rayder marched on the Wall?” Ser Davos’s voice was angry now. “Who saved you from the wildlings when all was lost? Who lent you his ships when you needed them to save the wildlings beyond the Wall? Who’s the only lord in Westeros to realize and to understand the threat the White Walkers represent?” They had arrived on the ground. Jon opened the grid of the cage. Ser Davos kept following him. “Who came to your aid? Stannis. Now he needs you.”

“We don’t have enough men to make any difference,” said Jon on an exasperated tone. That was the same debate than yesterday.

“The wildlings will make a difference.”

“The wildlings will never fight for Stannis. I told him before,” Jon replied angrily as he turned to face the Onion Knight.

“You saved their bloody lives. If they’re gonna live in the Seven Kingdoms, safe behind our wall, they ought to fight for the damn place.”

“It’s not their fight,” Jon countered firmly. He wouldn’t force the wildlings to spill more of their blood, not after Hardhome and what they faced there. They needed the wildlings when the Wall would be attacked, not to fight for Stannis. The Wall and the Night’s Watch were created to protect the realms of men, including the wildlings. The Wall was theirs as much as it belonged to those who lived south of it.

Before Jon or Davos could say more, someone shouted to open the gates. Jon looked behind him as they opened and saw the last person he expected. The Lady Melisandre. Even from afar, Jon was struck by the expression on her face. It seemed… lifeless. What was she doing here? He looked at Davos, who didn’t seem to understand either. Jon went down the stairs quickly and approached as she dismounted and walked away.
“Stannis?” She didn’t dare to look at him as he asked. Something struck Jon. Normally heath seemed to come out of her body whenever you approached her, but now he could feel nothing. It was cold around her just like everywhere else in Castleblack. She tried to keep walking forward, not looking at him a single time. Davos came to stand before her as she tried to walk away.

“Shireen? The princess?” the knight asked.

She lifted her head after long moments. Her face seemed to glow in usual circumstances. Now it was cold and without expression. She said nothing. She simply walked away, not glancing behind a single time. If she was there, and that Stannis didn’t come back with her, that could only mean one thing. Jon could barely recognize the woman who had tried to seduce him, and almost succeeded.

Jon ordered stewards to prepare a comfortable room for her just like he did for Ser Davos. An hour later, the knight came back to talk with him as Jon was working in his solar. He seemed utterly destroyed, just like the Red Woman, though that didn’t strike like for the lady.

“So?” asked Jon.

“I tried to speak with her,” explained Ser Davos as he sat. His voice was heavy. Jon poured a cup of ale for each of them. “She didn’t speak much, but from what I gathered, the snows melted. They had free passage to Winterfell, but almost all the sellswords deserted and ran away with all the horses. She said nothing more.”

The worst was almost confirmed. “Without the sellswords, how many men could Stannis have?”

“Five thousands, at best.”

“Five thousand men, without supplies, without horses, without siege engines, frozen and tired. What are the chances that Stannis took Winterfell all the same?”

“I’m not the best military mind there is, but I would say none. With the Red Woman here, there is no hope left for Stannis.”

Jon closed his eyes. Stannis was dead. “What about Stannis’s wife? And his daughter?”

“She couldn’t tell me anything about them, but since they didn’t come back with her, I fear…”

Pain and sadness were plain on the knight’s face. His king was dead, and his family too. Jon remembered seeing Ser Davos spending some time with the princess. The Hand of a now dead king was close to tears.

“I’m sorry, Ser Davos. If you wish, I can arrange for a ship at Eastwatch to take you back to your home, wherever it is,” Jon offered.

“It is kind, Lord Commander, and I appreciate the thought, but my home is on an island in the Narrow Sea, near Dragonstone. Dragonstone is besieged as we speak. My keep will soon be taken.”

“I can arrange a passage for you all the same. If the ship bears the colors of the Night’s Watch, it might have a chance to pass through the enemy fleet. You could see your family again.”

“I was Hand to an usurper, officially, for the boy who sits on the Iron Throne now. And this usurper is dead. When they’ll find me, they’ll kill me. My son died on the Blackwater. I have nothing left at home. If my wife is wise enough, she will surrender our keep to survive, when they’ll order her.”

“I can allow you to remain at Castleblack for now, but not forever. Only men of the Night’s Watch can remain here. Of course, you could still take the black. The Lannisters and the Boltons wouldn’t be able to touch you if you did.”

Ser Davos sighed. “That’s a kind offer, my lord. And a wise one, surely. I’ll think about it.” Davos looked up at Jon. “Stannis saw something in you. He believed in you. He trusted you, and believe me, you needed a lot to earn his trust. The dead are coming, and Stannis saw the necessity to fight them. No matter what happens, I will fight them. But with Stannis dead… No other lord in the Seven Kingdoms will be ready to help us.”

Jon realized something. Stannis was dead, his armies scattered. There was no longer an enemy of the Crown at the Wall. “You’re wrong, ser. I just got words from Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. Ships have arrived with two hundred prisoners from the Westerlands. And with supplies too. Lord Tyrion Lannister sent us help, and now that Stannis is dead… He will be able to send us more men. Not only prisoners this time. Soldiers.”

Davos looked at Jon. “Are you sure?”

“Lord Tyrion visited the Wall three years ago. He knows the White Walkers are real and back. He’s married to my sister. He will send us help, now that Stannis is no longer here.”

Davos nodded, though it was obvious he wasn’t eager to accept help from the Lannisters. Jon understood. Despite Sansa’s assurances that she was well treated and happy at Casterly Rock, he couldn’t help but hate House Lannister for the Red Wedding and everything that happened to his family. He wasn’t sure if he could still consider Tyrion Lannister a friend, but he sent them some help at least. That was a beginning.

Ser Davos rose from his seat. “I will go, and take some rest. I need it. Good night, Lord Commander.”

Ser Davos left. Jon was served his dinner by Olly, and like always he ate alone in his solar. He wrote dozens of messages to be sent by ravens to the other houses, and two specially for Casterly Rock. One was for Lord Tyrion, saying Stannis was dead and they needed his help more than ever after the massacre of Hardhome. The second one was for Sansa. Jon wanted to reassure her. He told her he had gone beyond the Wall and that was the reason why she received no ravens from him for some time. He wrote he fought against the dead, but got out of it without injury. However, he scrapped the first version of the message and removed the part about the battle at Hardhome in the second version he gave to Olly. Maybe if he sent enough ravens to all the lords, some would begin to understand they weren’t joking when they said the dead were back. With hope, House Bolton would even understand why he let wildlings go through the Wall, though Jon had some doubts about it. Would the Northerners accept the wildling’s presence on the Gift? Jon knew there would be some opposition, especially from those living close to the Gift.

Late in the evening, at the light of candles, Jon tried to catch up with the ravens he received while away at Hardhome. Many were unread and unrolled because of Maester Aemon’s death and the time Sam spent at his side in his last hours. Some came from the other two castles on the Wall, others were polite answers from lords to who he asked men. Mostly, they refused, giving all sorts of pretexts. With Stannis dead, it was obvious their only chance to get help from the south was Casterly Rock.

Jon found a scroll with the crowned stag on it. It came from King’s Landing, from the king. Jon unrolled it and began to read, his mind half away, tired of the day.

_I, Tommen of the House Baratheon, First of My Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, and Lord of the Seven Kingdoms, hereby strips House Bolton of all its lands, castles and_ titles. House Bolton is declared traitor to the Realm for the abduction and the forced marriage of the Lady Arya Stark to Ramsay Bolton.

Jon’s heart bumped into his chest. Arya. Arya? Arya was dead. She disappeared after their father died. And now she was back? And married to Ramsay Bolton? Jon went back to reading the scroll, his senses fully alert now.

House Bolton is attainted. All who shall remain loyal to them and follow them are to share their disgrace. Ramsay Bolton raped, beat and sequestered the Lady Arya in Winterfell. All houses of the North are called to fight against House Bolton and to recognize Sansa Stark as Lady of Winterfell and Wardeness of the North. All those who oppose her will be branded traitors to the Realm.

The king’s stamp was at the end of the message. Jon’s heart had stopped. Arya was at Winterfell. Ramsay Bolton raped, beat and sequestered the Lady Arya in Winterfell. A million thoughts were running in his head. Why didn’t Sansa tell him anything? Surely she knew about this if the king knew. Jon looked among the messages the ravens brought. He found the last one Sansa sent, but that was only a few words on her name day and a tapestry Lord Tyrion had made for her, representing all their family with Winterfell behind. Even Jon was on it. How could Sansa speak about a tapestry when their sister was being raped by the Boltons? Right now, Jon only wanted to saddle his horse and ride for Winterfell to save his little sister.

That was when Olly burst into the solar without warning. “Lord Commander. It’s one of the wildlings you brought back. Says he knows your uncle Benjen. Says he’s still alive.”

Jon was too dumbstruck to react first. He just learnt Arya was alive, and now it was his uncle Benjen. Before his lack of response, Olly spoke again.

“He’s outside, my lord. Waiting for you.”

Jon realized what was going on and got on his feet. “Are you sure he’s talking about Benjen?”

“Said he was First Ranger. Said he knows where to find him.”

Jon walked immediately out of his solar, conflicting thoughts in his head. Arya and Benjen were both still alive. He had to save them both. He couldn’t lose another member of his family. He came into the courtyard, putting on his gloves while walking. Ser Alliser Thorne was waiting at the end of the stairs.

“Man says he saw you uncle at Hardhome at the last full moon,” the knight said.

“Could be lying,” replied Jon, though he hoped it was no lie. He followed his First Ranger. If he hoped there was some lie in what he learnt this evening, he hoped it was in the ravens he received form the king and that Arya was not really in Winterfell between Bolton hands.

“Could be,” conceded Ser Alliser. “There are ways to find out.”

“Where is he?”

“Over there.”

Ser Alliser pointed a group of men assembled near a corner of the courtyard with torches. Jon pushed them aside and walked to the man they encircled. But there was no man. Only a wooden cross. With the light of the torches, Jon could see what was written on it in black ink. TRAITOR. There was no wildling. Only the cross with the word. And Jon was standing right before it. He slowly turned to face the men behind him, only to come face to face with Ser Alliser.
Jon felt a sudden pain in his belly. Ser Alliser had planted a dagger into him and looked at him with hatred in his eyes. Jon let a groan escape from his mouth. Ser Alliser’s expression did not change as he said the words.

“For the Watch.”

The knight retrieved the knife. A second man shove another knife in Jon’s belly and said the same words. It was Othell Yarwyck, his first Builder. Then Bowen Marsh, the First Steward, did the same. Jon received other knives. He recognized a man who arrived only recently from King’s Landing. Ser Meryn Trant. The man who poisoned Joffrey. In the end, he was on his knees, feeling blood coming to his mouth. The men were all looking at him. TRAITOR. That was what they thought he was. A traitor. Their eyes said so. They betrayed him. Why? He did what was good. He respected his vows. From the crowd standing before him, a figure detached itself.

It was Olly. No. Not you too. Olly was looking at him. Not with the angry eyes he had all the last times they saw each other, but with something else. Terror. Fear. Jon tried to speak, but he couldn’t. The pain in the belly… He tried to speak to the boy. He couldn’t let him do this. He was only a child, a boy of ten, no older than Bran.

“Olly…” He couldn’t manage to say more. He felt his body getting empty of blood. Olly’s face hardened. The wildlings had taken his home and his family, and Jon let them live on the lands where he grew up. He thrust his own dagger inside Jon’s heart.

“For the Watch.” Only hatred was left on his face as he said the words.

Jon fell on the ground behind him. All was going black around him. Sensations were leaving his body. He thought about his father. About Robb. Did he feel like this when he was stabbed in the heart? About Benjen, who he wasn’t sure if he was alive or dead. About Bran and Rickon, probably still alive. About Sansa, her messages still in his solar. About Arya, who he just discovered was still alive. He could never save her. He would never see them again. Bran. Rickon. Sansa. Arya. He remembered ruffling her hair. First lesson: stick them with the pointy end.

After that, there was only darkness. There was nothing. Nothing at all.

Chapter End Notes

Very similar to the show, though with a few changes. We go back to original chapters with the next one.

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
“I suppose he sent Gerold with the army in part because he didn’t want any other accident to happen. That wasn’t the main reason, but I think it had some role in it.”

“And he sent you away with your husband as well? A lady travelling with an army?” Sansa asked, a little surprised.

“I told Lord Leyton that the people of my family’s lands would be more likely to fight on our side if I was there. I spent several years in the south, but I’m still a Forrester, and the last one. If I’m not here, my family’s men could only see southern invaders coming to take Ironrath.”

Mira’s explanations reminded Sansa of someone else’s situation, though to the opposite of Mira, Sansa didn’t feel like she was still a Northerner. Mira was trying to persuade her she was still a child of the North, but so far her attempts didn’t have more success than Tyrion’s. Sansa suspected her husband was behind Mira’s attempts. She appreciated their efforts, but no matter what they would say, Sansa couldn’t get out of her the feeling that she was now a Lannister through and through. The fact that the path to the North was blocked to her and her sickness when they were almost there seemed to only confirm her doubts. How much time had passed since she last opened her necklace and looked at the direwolf? Instead, during the hours when Tyrion was away, she would look at the golden lion, unable to make her eyes leave it. She missed Cerenna, Genna, Joy, Myrielle, Lanna, even some of the Frey boys, Genna’s grandsons. She was happy to have Mira back with her, but still.

Sansa’s health had improved enough in the three weeks following Mira’s arrival so that she may start again to leave her tent. She participated to war councils, visited the sick and the injured, and spent a lot of time with Mira. They were the two only women in the camp. It was a good thing they were both here. They had a lot to tell each other about their new lives in Casterly Rock and Oldtown. Sansa was shocked about Mira’s tale of the accident that happened not long before they left the Hightower with their men. No one would have dared to raise a hand against Sansa in Casterly Rock. However, when she thought about it, Mira was only married to a grandson of the Lord of the Hightower. Still, that was unacceptable. Sansa almost laughed when she tried to imagine how Mira’s brother-in-law had looked like after the beating her husband gave him. After the Twins, Ser Gerold’s way to deal with someone slapping Mira looked funny.

Sansa had told Mira about the events at the Twins. Sansa was still unsure about what to think about it. Tyrion had ordered two men to be executed right in front of everyone, then their bodies thrown into the river, like the Freys had done to her mother’s body. And then, he had sent their heads over the walls of the Twins with trebuchets. At Riverrun, Sansa hadn’t really cared about the executions of Black Walder and Lame Lothar. They were executed for their crimes. That was justice. However, at the Twins, that wasn’t really justice. Sansa didn’t really feel pity for the two Freys who had died. They were despicable and had participated to the Red Wedding, but it was the staging Tyrion put in place for their death that worried her. He had done it to force Walder Frey to surrender. That had worked well. They had gotten back all the prisoners and the Frey army was with them on their march to Winterfell. All the same, the way Tyrion had these men killed publicly…

While Tyrion had been conducting the executions, he had seemed… He had looked like… The icy stare. The cold face without emotion that showed no concession would be made. The song when they negotiated with Walder Frey. Words that Genna told her long ago had come back to her mind. Tyrion has a lot of Tywin in him, but also his mother’s compassion. Up to now this compassion has kept Tywin’s ruthlessness away, but I fear one day it might not be enough. When this day comes, Tyrion will need you. It will be your duty to stop him from doing something he may regret for the rest of his life. At the Twins, Sansa hadn’t seen the kind husband who offered his hand after she was beaten before the court. She had seen the son of Tywin Lannister. The cruelty Tyrion used there was only limited to two people, and two people who certainly deserved to die, but all the same, it was disconcerting, and frightening, to see Tyrion look so much like his father. Was Genna right? She hoped not. She didn’t want to see Tyrion turn like his father. For now, everything seemed alright. She hadn’t seen the shadow of Tywin Lannister in Tyrion’s eyes after they left the Twins, and she hoped she wouldn’t see it again. If it came back, Sansa may have to do what Genna told her. She would have to stop Tyrion to do something he may regret for the rest of his life. But what would that something be? How would she stop him? She hoped Genna’s prediction would never become real.

Mira had been surprised and looked uneasy after Sansa told her about the Twins. Her friend didn’t have much respect for the Freys either. She stayed away from all of them, even Olyvar and Ser Perwyn. In the end, Mira had said it allowed to free dozens of people without killing thousands. All the same, Sansa could see Mira didn’t entirely approve what Tyrion had done and was uncomfortable with that.

“I’m glad you’re here, Mira. I needed company,” said Sansa as she took a gulp of wine. Tyrion had made sure they had enough of it when they left Casterly Rock. Too bad they couldn’t bring as much food with them, considering the supply problems they had recently. They were not that major, but they were problems still.

“Well, I’m sure you could survive without me, Sansa. I heard that you get along quite well with Lord Tyrion now,” said Mira.

“Yes. Finally.” Mira nodded. She knew what Sansa meant. “Things seem to go well with your husband as well.”

“Yes.” Mira’s cheeks reddened a little. “He’s not the most fantastic man there is, but he’s kind and gentle, and he loves me. Someone would need to be blind to not see it. Margaery saw it the second she saw Gerold before her.”

Sansa smiled. Mira and her husband had stopped at King’s Landing on their way to the Neck, and Mira had the chance to see Margaery and her friend Sera during the day they stayed in the capital. She had learned there that Dragonstone and Storm’s End had fallen. The last holdouts of Stannis Baratheon were gone. Sansa wished she could see Margaery again. According to Mira, Margaery had a few problems in the capital with religious fanatics and Ser Kevan’s mistrust. Mira hadn’t really liked her stay that night in the capital after Nymeria Sand, Oberyn Martell’s daughter who came to replace him on the small council, had tried to seduce her husband. Mira told her she had surprised Ser Gerold Hightower talking with the Dornish young woman and that her husband had looked ashamed at this moment, when he realized Mira saw her. If Oberyn’s daughters were like their father in private life…
“I suppose anyone who slaps you will end without a few teeth,” supposed Sansa.

They both laughed quietly. “I hope so. Or else they will end dead. Gerold was really going to kill his brother. He would have if they hadn’t been separated.” Mira seemed worried.

It was at this moment that Ser Gerold Hightower entered the tent. Sansa had seen him several times before. He wasn’t a very handsome man, but he wasn’t ugly either. What transpired the most of him in all circumstances was frustration, but also his love for Mira. He was often displeased about himself and the waiting in the Neck, and only his wife seemed able to calm him.

“Oh, excuse me. Lady Lannister.” He bowed before her. He always seemed troubled in Sansa’s presence. Mira thought it was because he rarely saw highborn ladies from other houses. He had acted the same way with Margaery in King’s Landing. “I didn’t want to interrupt something.”

“You interrupt nothing, Ser Gerold,” Sansa said. “I hope everything is alright in the camp.”

“It could be better,” he said with a tired voice. He went to Mira. “Hi, my dear.” He kissed her on the forehead and went to pour himself a cup of wine. He sat next to Mira. “My men are growing restless. I lost fifty when we attacked the fortress.”

“We shouldn’t have attacked it, Gerold,” said Mira. She laid her hand on his. “Moat Cailin has never been taken by force. We had another proof when we tried last week.”

“I know, Mira. But I still don’t understand how a ruin can be impregnable. Moat Cailin is falling into ruins.”

“Just like Harrenhal,” pointed out Sansa.

“And Highpoint,” added Mira. “You remember when I showed you the picture?”

Mira’s husband nodded. “Yes, I remember. Perhaps I should have remembered before I decided to put my men in the vanguard when we assaulted the fortress.”

Suddenly, Sansa didn’t feel very well. “Please excuse me.” She left the tent and came back two minutes later. “Forgive me. It’s these swamps, I’m afraid.”

“It’s alright, Sansa. No need to apologize,” Mira said.

Sansa spoke with her friend and her husband for a few more minutes when Podrick came in. “My lady, Lord Tyrion is requesting your presence. There are people who just arrived who wish to speak with you,” the squire explained.

“Which people?” Sansa asked.

“I don’t know, my lady. One had red robes and the other a patch on the eye.”

Sansa frowned. She knew no one fitting that description, but she excused herself to Mira and Ser Gerold and followed Podrick outside. He led her to the tent of the commanders. When she entered she saw Tyrion and Ser Brynden on one side of the table and the two men Podrick described on the other side. They wore ragged clothes but had chainmail on them too. They looked quite miserable. However, when she entered, they rose from their seats and bowed before her.

“Lady Sansa,” said the one with red robes. “It’s pleasure to see you again after all this time. Perhaps you do not remember me. The last time we saw each other was in King’s Landing. I was fat, and with a burning sword.”
Sansa looked carefully at the man’s face. She had the impression to have seen him before, and then she remembered. The flaming sword. “You are Thoros of Myr,” she said.

“At your service my lady.” He opened the arms and bowed a little again. “And the man at my side is my friend, Lord Beric Dondarrion.”

Sansa looked at the man standing next to Thoros of Myr. She couldn’t recognize the handsome knight she saw during the Hand’s Tourney. “My lady. I’m sorry for your father. He was a good man. I tried to carry out his orders, and sadly I failed,” Lord Beric said.

Sansa tried to recompose herself. “You did your best, Lord Beric. I’m sure my father would have nothing to reproach you. You are of the Brotherhood Without Banners?”

“We are,” answered Thoros. “Or at least we are what is left of the Brotherhood. We are no longer who we were. The war in the Riverlands is over thanks to your husband’s efforts. Many of us have turned outlaws. We could gather only a few of them to follow us here.”

“They are only fifty,” explained Sansa’s granduncle. “But they laid down their weapons, so they can live. Since Lord Dondarrion is a lord, we accepted to let him join us. More men,” scoffed her uncle. “If only we could get a way to breach through this moat with more men.”

“Lady Sansa,” said Lord Beric. “We have some things to tell you. To you alone.”

Sansa looked at Tyrion and Ser Brynden, then back to Lord Dondarrion. “If you want to tell me something, you can tell it before my husband and Ser Brynden. They are my family.”

Thoros of Myr and Lord Beric seemed to hesitate, but finally they accepted and sat. Sansa went to sit next to Tyrion. She noticed Lord Dondarrion was looking at him suspiciously. The two men before her asked for wine and they were given some by Podrick. He also poured some for Sansa, Tyrion and Ser Brynden, though Sansa eyed Podrick to make him understand to not give too much to her husband like always.

“Well, my lady,” began the red priest after a long sip of wine, “let’s go straight to the point. We saw your sister.”

Sansa almost choke on the wine she just drank. “What? You saw Arya? In Winterfell? How is she?”

“No. Not in Winterfell. In fact, we only learned recently that she was there. That’s one of the reasons why we came here. We saw her in the Riverlands. About a year ago.”

“A year ago?” Tyrion asked.

“Aye. A year ago. Not long before the Red Wedding. We found her on the Kingsroad, travelling with two boys, one fat and another one who looked like a young Robert Baratheon. She was dressed like a boy. We brought them to an inn and gave them supper. We didn’t know first who she was. We were about to send them away when the Hound was brought before us.”

“The Hound?” Sansa asked, even more surprised.

“Aye. Sandor Clegane. We captured him not long after Blackwater. We judged him for his crimes in a trial by combat and he won. So we let him go. But before he left he recognized your sister. She spent some time with us, a few months. We were planning on bringing her to Riverrun and give her back to your brother.”

“And get a fine ransom by the same way, I suppose,” said Tyrion.
“We needed weapons to fight for the people,” replied Lord Beric. “And we needed gold to buy weapons. We could simply have sold her out to you, Lannister. We would have gotten much more gold.”

“If you had tried to sell her to my father, he would have had you executed after paying you. A Lannister always pays his debts, but he pays all his debts.”

“And I suppose he was paying debts when he ordered his mad dog to ravage the Riverlands?”

“Enough!” said Sansa firmly before this went without control. “What happened to my sister? What happened to Arya? How did she end up in the hands of Roose Bolton?”

“We don’t know, my lady,” answered Thoros. “As I said, we wanted to bring her to Riverrun, but we did some detours and she didn’t agree with us. She escaped one night, and we never saw her afterwards. That wasn’t long before the Red Wedding. After that, we never saw her again, though we heard a strange tale one day. I visited an inn not long after the Red Wedding. It had been turned down and was a real mess. The innkeeper told me that some Lannister men had visited it and that the Hound showed up not long after they arrived. He was with a boy according to the man, but from the description he gave us, the boy could have been your sister. There was a fight and the Lannister soldiers were killed. Your sister killed two men according to the innkeeper and his daughter. After that, we know nothing of her whereabouts.”

“The Hound and Arya Stark,” said Tyrion on a skeptical voice after the tale was over. “Quite an odd pair. Though Arya Stark was no ordinary girl. What would Sandor Clegane have tried to do with her?”

“Probably ransom her, just like we intended.”

Tyrion looked thoughtful. “Thank you, Lord Beric. Thank you, Thoros of Myr. My men will find some tents for your own.”

“With pleasure.” The red priest rose and his friend did the same, though not with the same enthusiasm. Lord Beric had a strange expression. His face looked… lifeless. “Can we get wine? I need some. If you want, Lord Tyrion, I’ll give you a revenge for our last drinking contest.”

“If I remember well, you’re the one who would need a revenge.”

“I never said whose revenge it was.”

“No drinking contest,” said Sansa harshly.

Tyrion looked at her, then made a twisted smile to the red priest. “Sorry, Thoros. My wife says I can’t.”

Thoros of Myr looked with a queer face to Tyrion, then to Sansa, and burst in laughter. “Did you stop visiting brothels as well?”

“Yes, he did,” answered Sansa for Tyrion. “And before we were married. You would do well to not try to bring it back.”

Thoros of Myr left, laughing, Lord Beric following him with a sour face. Sansa noticed he hadn’t drunk at all. His cup was full. Sansa took it and spilled it on the floor before Tyrion could think about drinking it.

“Well, now we know where Arya was last year. In the Riverlands. Too bad Robb didn’t cross her
“She would have died at the Red Wedding then,” Sansa replied gloomily. “But what happened after. If the accident at the inn is true… Where did the Hound bring her?”

“He probably delivered her to the Boltons. That would explain how she ended up in Winterfell,” assumed her granduncle.

“No, the Hound would never have done something like that.” Sansa knew he wouldn’t have. She hoped he hadn’t. He had wanted to bring her in the North with him. He had protected her in King’s Landing, as rude as he was. She had even thought for a time that he had kissed her before he left her chamber that night of the battle. She had never seen him again afterwards. What happened to him?

“Why would the Hound have brought Arya Stark to the Boltons?” asked Tyrion. “He had nothing to gain from that. He didn’t serve House Lannister anymore, and the Boltons were allies to my father at this time. I think Thoros of Myr was right. He would have tried to give her to someone who would have been ready to pay for her. My father would be the best choice if you want the biggest amount of money, but the Hound has a bounty of a hundred silver stags on his head. He deserted the Kingsguard during the Battle of Blackwater. He would have been executed at the moment he would have set a foot inside King’s Landing again. No one can miss him. His face is too much recognizable. The most logical choice after the Red Wedding would have been Riverrun.”

Tyrion questioningly turned his eyes to Ser Brynden. Sansa’s granduncle shook his head. “I haven’t seen anything resembling the Hound or Arya Stark at Riverrun. Though I never saw your sister, Sansa. I wouldn’t have recognized her anyway. But with his half-burned face, I think I would have recognized the Hound. Anyway, we were under siege. Even if he had wanted to give her to me, he wouldn’t have been able to pass through the Lannister lines unnoticed.”

“You’re right, Ser Brynden. All we know is that Arya was with the Brotherhood for some time, then possibly with the Hound not long later. We don’t know what happened to her afterwards.”

“We know she ended at Winterfell. This is all that matter. It’s not about how she arrived between Bolton’s hands, but where she is now. We have to save her. Let’s hope your Manderly allies will arrive soon, or else we’ll freeze in the Neck when winter comes.”

On that, the Blackfish left after a bow to Sansa. She and Tyrion left not long after and went back to their tent. On the way, Sansa wondered how Arya ended with the Boltons all the same. Had the Hound given her away to them? No, he wouldn’t have. He swore he would protect her if she followed him. That he would bring her back home. He wouldn’t have given Arya to her family’s enemies. Then how did she end in Winterfell? Did she escape the Hound and went there all alone? Where they captured? Sansa wondered if the Hound was still alive somewhere. She hoped he was.

As they approached, Sansa had to excuse herself again and only entered the tent a few minutes later. She dined with Tyrion like always, but she wasn’t very hungry.

“You did it again?” Tyrion asked.

“Yes,” she answered.

“I’m worried, Sansa. You have no longer any fever or cough, but you’re still sick. You should see the maester about it.”

Tyrion really seemed worried about her. “I’ll go and see him,” she promised.

Sansa did it as soon as the dinner was over. Maester Wyllam, who was in service of a small house in the Westerlands whose name Sansa couldn’t remember, examined her to see what was wrong. He took her pulse and her heartbeat. He had a strange look on his face as the examination went on.

“You’ve been sick recently, my lady. Am I wrong?” he asked.

“Yes. A cold not long after we arrived. Because of the weather,” she answered.

“You were not the only one to catch one. It’s no surprise. All the symptoms disappeared? You don’t feel cold? You don’t cough? No fever?”

“None. It stopped about two weeks ago. But the vomiting persists.”

“Did you eat a lot recently, Lady Sansa?”

“No. I barely eat anything. Everything I eat seems to leave.”

Those damn swamps. Sansa wanted to curse them, though she wouldn’t do it loudly. Tyrion was better than her for this kind of things. Though that changed nothing to the fact she wanted to leave this damn place and go anywhere except the Neck. They were losing time here. Couldn’t these men inside Moat Cailin see that they fought for monsters? They probably knew it. The men serving Joffrey knew he was a monster, and they kept serving him all the same. Perhaps her father had been wrong about the loyalty of Northerners to the Starks. They let her little sister being a toy for a bastard. The maester continued his examination for some time. After many minutes, he had a queer look on his face.

“And?” Sansa asked.

“Lady Sansa,” he began, hesitating. Was it grave? “If I may ask you… Do you remember the last time when you had your moonblood?”

“Yes. That wasn’t long ago. It was…” Sansa realized something. She remembered when it last took place. It was back when they were at the Twins, but it was almost… two months ago. She looked at the maester. That couldn’t be.

Maester Wyllam was now smiling. “I don’t think you’re sick, my lady.”

Without thinking, Sansa ran outside the maester’s tent, not even caring to thank him. She ran through all the camp until she finally arrived to her pavilion. People were yelling inside.

“Where are the Manderlys? Tell me,” asked an angry voice.

Another voice answered. It was her husband’s voice. “I don’t know where they are. I sent them a raven.”

Sansa came in the middle of an argument between Tyrion and her granduncle. That wasn’t the first. They stopped when they saw her at the entrance.

“Oh, Sansa. And? What did the maester say?” asked Tyrion, his voice much softer than before, but showing some exasperation all the same.

“Tyrion.” She couldn’t contain her excitement. “I’m pregnant.”

Tyrion’s face changed completely, going from worry and tiredness to utter surprise and incomprehension. “What?”
“I’m pregnant,” she repeated, a large smile on her face.

Tyrion still didn’t seem to understand. That was quite simple though. She was with child. His child. Tyrion looked back to the Blackfish who looked as stunned as he was. Tyrion looked back at her. “Are you sure?”

“Of course, I am. I’m pregnant.”

Tyrion seemed to understand what she just told him and a wide smile slowly appeared on his face. “That’s… That’s marvelous!”

She couldn’t wait more, knelt and pulled him into an embrace. She was giggling, her head on his shoulder. They stood like that for a moment until she felt a shadow on her. Ser Brynden Tully was standing before them, a little smile on his lips. She broke her embrace with her husband to stand before her granduncle.

“Well,” he said, “I never thought I would live long enough to be a great-granduncle. Your mother would be proud of you.”

He opened his arms and Sansa jumped in them. For the first time since they met at Riverrun, Ser Brynden Tully hugged his grandniece.

Chapter End Notes

To all those who suspected Sansa was pregnant in the last chapter, you were right. She is pregnant. The symptoms in the last chapters might have been caused by the cold she caught or her pregnancy, or both of them, but she was pregnant.

Please review

Next chapter: a new POV
Trystane I

Here begins the arc of Meereen, and with it comes a new POV: Trystane Martell. Yes, it took him about twenty chapters to get there, but he did. There's also another character who makes a first appearance.

One of the crew members came to tell him they were approaching Meereen. Trystane nodded to show he understood and the man left. Trystane Martell had left Dorne many months ago after his father gave him the order to find the Dragon Queen. He had taken a ship at the Planky Town for Lys, then another one from there brought him to Volantis, and a third was bringing him to Meereen. And now he had reached his destination.

Trystane had paid the captain enough to not have to work while on the ship, but not too much in order to not awake suspicion. No one was to know that the heir to Sunspear was going to Meereen. He was travelling under an alias and spent all his time in the crew quarters, speaking to no one, answering to no one, looking to no one. He heard some men calling him “the man without a tongue”. He could have been without tongue right now. He didn’t want to speak. He didn’t want to think. He didn’t even want to live. Not without Myrcella.

As always when her memory came back while he was alone, he let tears come to him. It would be better if he cried alone, when no one was looking, all the crew working on the deck. He remembered her beautiful green eyes. Her shining golden hair, like a crown under the sun. Her soft skin. Her sweet lips when they kissed. Her smile. He loved her, and now she was gone. He hadn’t been able to save her. His father had failed to protect his own sister, and Trystane had failed to protect the woman he loved. She died right in front of him, blood running out of her nose and covering her face. Even in death she had looked like a beauty from another world. Trystane wept for Myrcella, letting the tears flow until his eyes were dry again. When they docked, he was able to leave the ship without showing anyone his sorrow. He wore a hood so that no one may recognize him, even though he thought that was unlikely to happen so far from Dorne.

As soon as he left the ship, he could see the Great Pyramid of Meereen standing tall at the center of the city. Trystane had never seen such a tall building. He wondered if he would be able to climb the stairs to the top. Daenerys Targaryen surely lived at the top of it. He felt the parchment, inside a fold of his tunic, rubbing against his belly. He hated this contract. Myrcella’s body was barely cold and he had to marry another woman. He hated his father for that. But despite this, Doran Nymeros Martell, Lord of Sunspear and Prince of Dorne, was still his father and Trystane had to obey his orders. His father had always taught him to never let his personal feelings bring him to make decisions against the well-being of the people of Dorne. Today, Trystane had to apply this principle, and it was far more difficult then he ever imagined. His father was right. The Lannisters would seek retribution for what happened to Myrcella. Trystane was seeking retribution as well, but he doubted the Lannisters would accept his father’s explanations about the fact Myrcella was killed by Tyene, and his father... didn’t want to execute a family member. Trystane wished his father no longer considered Tyene like family. Trystane walked in the direction of the Great Pyramid. The part of him who loved Myrcella hoped the Targaryen queen would refuse his father’s proposal, but the part who encouraged him to act as the future Lord of Sunspear, although it was weak for now, hoped she would accept. Trystane wondered how Daenerys Targaryen looked like.

The docks were busy, like it was to be expected, but as soon as Trystane left the area of the port, everything changed. The streets should have been busy with merchants and customers and people walking all around to perform their tasks and go there or there, like he saw in Volantis and in Lys. Instead, the streets were almost empty. Everything was silent. Even the Water Gardens, a haven of tranquillity in Dorne, looked like a noisy market in comparison. There wasn’t a single sound. Some wooden constructions had even fallen apart in some places, and no one took care to clean the debris. Everything was so silent and looked completely frozen in time. The very few people who walked into the streets were walking quickly when they weren’t running. The only people who didn’t try to leave the streets as quickly as possible were beggars, and even then they looked afraid of anyone approaching them. Trystane had converted his Westerosi currencies into money of Slavor’s Bay before he left Volantis. His father always told him to give what he could to the needy when he met some. Their family was lucky to live comfortably and richly. It was their duty to alleviate the sufferings of those who didn’t have their chance. Trystane gave a coin to every man and woman and child he met who asked for some.

The way from the docks to the base of the Great Pyramid was long and climbing. It took him some time before he arrived before the Great Pyramid, and there he was intercepted by men clad in black leather armor, with black helmet, black shield and all carrying a spear. They blocked him the path to the stairs.

One of them asked him something in Low Valyrian. Trystane thought he asked him what he was doing here, though his Valyrian could be better. He mostly knew High Valyrian, the language of the elite in Westeros, but Low Valyrian was another matter, and sadly that was the language spoken by most of the people in Meereen. These men were soldiers, certainly the Unsullied Daenerys Targaryen had found in Astapor. Did they understand High Valyrian like the Low? Surely they would understand it better that the common tongue of Westeros.

Very slowly, choosing his words very carefully, Trystane tried to explain. “My name is Trystane Martell, son of Doran Martell, Lord of Sunspear and Prince of Dorne. I am here to speak to the queen on behalf of my father.”

The men exchanged queer looks between them. One stepped forward and asked a question in the common tongue. “What business have you with our queen?”

His mastering of the common tongue could be better, but Trystane was relieved to see one of them could understand him in this language. “I will state my business to the queen, and only to the queen.”

The soldier stared at him for a moment, then he turned to another man beside him and told him something in Low Valyrian so quickly that Trystane couldn’t understand. The other soldier ran toward the pyramid immediately. The one who knew the common tongue turned back his attention to Trystane. “You will wait here.”

Trystane supposed the man was sent to inform Queen Daenerys of his presence. So Trystane waited, the eyes of a decade of Unsullied staring at him, watching every one of his movements. He wondered if they didn’t receive a similar formation to the one Hotah received in Norvos.

It took a long time before the soldier who was sent came back. Perhaps it was only the long stairs to climb to the top of the Pyramid, but Trystane wondered if Daenerys would like to see him. She would surely accept to receive him. House Martell had fought loyally for her family during Robert’s Rebellion, and they paid the high price for this. Trystane was a relative for her since his aunt had been married to her brother, Rhaegar Targaryen. At the same time, Trystane had heard terrible tales about Daenerys Stormborn, the Breaker of Chains. It was said she burned thousands of people and the whole city of Astapor when she took the Unsullied from their masters, and some said she executed masters by the thousands in Meereen as well, crucifying them and letting them rot in the sun for hours or days until they were so desperate to ask for death, then she would feed them to her dragons. Trystane didn’t approve slavery, but he didn’t approve cruelty either. If the stories about this young woman were true, then Trystane wondered if the vengeance his father was seeking was really worth it. Did they really want another Mad King? Or a Mad Queen?

The soldier who left finally came back and told something in the ear of the one who Trystane spoke with. This soldier turned again to face him. “Follow me.”

He turned away and walked to the stairs of the Great Pyramid. Trystane did as he was told after a moment. The climb to the top of the Pyramid was long, but at least most of the steps were inside the pyramid and not outside, so they were protected from the heat of the sun. The temperature was quite cool inside. They arrived to what seemed to be an audience chamber, with an simple ebony bench at the top of the stairs, pillars, walls, ceiling and floor all made of marble, about ten Unsullied standing tall, their back turned to the walls. However, it wasn’t a queen sitting on the bench who welcomed Trystane, but a slender man standing straight in black leather without helmet, with a shaved head and a tanned skin, who was waiting at the base of the stairs leading to the bench. He stared at Trystane with a serious look, undisturbed, like he was a statue. Again, this remembered him of Hotah. Trystane supposed he had to be an Unsullied as well, perhaps their commander or at least an officer since he wore no helmet.

“You are Trystane Martell?” the man asked, not caring about welcoming him. His mouth was the only thing that moved as he spoke, the rest of his body unflinching.

“I am,” answered Trystane, trying to put some assurance in his voice.

“What is your business with our queen?”

“I will only talk about it with the queen,” Trystane replied. He tried again to sound sure of himself, though he wasn’t with all these overtrained soldiers in the room. Trystane only had a dagger on him, and it was removed before he entered the Pyramid. He was an unharmed man among armed men trained to kill since they were born.

The expression of the officer standing before him seemed to change a little, but only for a moment. Something like sadness or regret showed up on the face for a moment. “Our queen is gone.”

Trystane stood there for a moment, struggling to find his words, everything silent around him. “Gone?”

“You must be the only one to ignore it. She left about two weeks ago.”

“Where did she go? Tell me where I can find her.” Trystane had to find Daenerys Targaryen. If he didn’t find her, and couldn’t convince her to come to Westeros immediately, then Dorne was lost.

“No one knows where she went. She left on the back of her dragon, and no one saw her ever since the Great Games.”

Daenerys had left on the back of a dragon? That seemed almost impossible, and yet, there had been dragons only a century ago. Now they were back, and she could ride one. The rumors were true.
That meant she could help them. His father was right. The Dragon Queen may be their only chance to save Dorne.

“Where is she?” he asked again.

“We don’t know. We sent two men to find her.”

“Two?” Only two men? How could they hope to find her? Dorne needed her right now. He knew what he had to do. His father gave him a mission, and if he failed, Dorne was lost. “I must find her. I’ll go and search for her.”

Trystane turned on his heels and walked to the exit, only for his path to be blocked by the spears of the two men guarding it. “You’re not leaving. You will stay here until our queen comes back.”

Trystane turned again to face the officer. “You would get yourself killed outside, and no one is leaving the city. You could spread news about our queen’s disappearance. I will have servants organize rooms for you, but you won’t leave the Great Pyramid until our queen returns.”

“Daenerys Targaryen is out there. I have to find her.”

“Our men will find her. She will come back, and then you’ll speak with her. But only when she comes back.”

“And if I refuse to stay?” It was out of question that he remained in that pyramid. He had come to convince Daenerys Targaryen to come back to Westeros, and he wouldn’t succeed if he stayed there while she was outside the city.

“We’ll make you stay,” replied the soldier. “We’ll put you into a cell.”

The answer was placid, cold, serious. Trystane looked around. The Unsullied were all standing tall, ready to intervene. He wouldn’t manage to escape. It was frustrating and humiliating for a prince to find himself receiving commands from former slaves, but it was obvious he had no choice there. He gave up.

Two hours later, Trystane was settled comfortably in a room at the thirty-first floor of the Great Pyramid. He lacked nothing of all the comforts he could ask for. He knew he was still a prisoner, but better to be a prisoner in comfort than one in dark and muddy cells. He wondered if the Sand Snakes and Ellaria thought the same when his father arrested them. Most of the servants were very young and knew the common tongue, hence Trystane had no problem speaking with them. One was very talkative and revealed that his father had once traveled to Westeros. Trystane learnt that these children were wards that Daenerys Targaryen had taken into her service not long after she began to rule Meereen. They were all children from the great families of Meereen, and they seemed to like Daenerys very much the way they spoke of her.

Trystane didn’t have much to do. He was done exploring his new apartments very quickly. There was a box on one of the furniture, and he placed something very precious that his father gave him inside. He shut the box. He hoped the content would see the light of the day again. It had spent almost one hundred and fifty years in the dark. If only the queen was there.

The heir to Sunspear spent much of the day thinking since he had nothing else to do. As always, Myrcella came back to his mind. He wished she was there right now. She would know what to do. But she wasn’t here, because his cousins thought her death would avenge Oberyn’s death. Trystane had liked his uncle. He showed him to fight with a spear, and he made him discover many things despite the very long periods he spent out of Sunspear and the Water Gardens. Trystane’s father had been the one to teach him about ruling, but his uncle thought him about life. He remembered Oberyn hadn’t seemed happy when Myrcella had arrived, but as time had passed, Trystane had seen him grow fond of his nephew’s betrothed. Myrcella even played with some of his daughters, especially the youngest, Elia, Dorea, Obella and Loreza. Three were Ellaria’s children, and yet that woman had killed her. His father had told him they couldn’t kill their family despite what they did, but for Trystane it was very difficult to follow his father on this. Myrcella’s memory, how she died and by whose hands, all of it was still fresh in his mind. He thought he understood how his uncle felt when his aunt Elia died, or what Ellaria felt when she saw Oberyn die. However, Myrcella didn’t deserve to die. He could understand they wished to kill Tywin Lannister, or the Mountain, but Myrcella? She had done nothing. She was so sweet, so kind, so good. She had even wept when they heard Oberyn was dead. Trystane didn’t think his uncle would have wanted her to die.

Trystane wouldn’t stoop to his cousins’ level. He wouldn’t avenge Myrcella by killing their kin.
Sarella, Elia, Dorea, Loreza and Obella had nothing to see with Myrcella’s death. He wouldn’t make them pay. But Ellaria… Obara… Nymeria… And most of all, Tyene… They would pay one day.
They killed Myrcella, and she was innocent. He would avenge Myrcella’s death, and not by killing someone innocent. He would kill her murderers. He didn’t care they were supposed to be family.
They killed the woman he loved. They were no family anymore. Family wouldn’t do that. Trystane had come to this conclusion on his way to Meereen.

In the evening, after Trystane had eaten his dinner, he received a visit. A slim man with brown hair, green eyes, a sword at his belt, a slight beard and a moustache entered in his rooms and bowed before him.

“Prince Trystane. It’s a pleasure to meet you. I wish I could come sooner, but I was rather occupied with everything going on in Meereen. My name is Malcolm Branfield.”

He extended his hand and Trystane shook it. He stared at the man carefully. His way of speaking was quite close to the one Myrcella had. “You are from Westeros?” Trystane asked.

“Yes, my prince. I came to Meereen about a year ago. Queen Daenerys took me at her service. We have a few things in common, Prince Trystane. Both our families suffered a lot during the last war.”

“What do you mean?”

“House Branfield was a minor house in the Crownlands. We fought for the Targaryens during Robert’s Rebellion. I fought myself in this war, along with my brothers, but like you know, we lost.
My whole family died. I was the only survivor. I, and my sister, Elissa, who was married to a northern lord. She escaped death thanks to this.”

Trystane understood now. The man standing before him had lost all his family. He shook his hand.
“I’m sorry. My loss is nothing in comparison. I only lost an aunt and two cousins, and I wasn’t even born. You may sit. Do you want something to drink?”

“Thank you, but I won’t drink.” They both sat at a table. “My prince, as I said, my sister was married to a northern lord. She was the Lady of House Forrester. Lady Elissa Forrester. I received no news from her for quite a long time now. Have you heard anything about her, or about the Forresters before you left?”

Trystane searched into his mind, but the name didn’t bring any memory to him. “No, I’m sorry, my lord. I heard nothing about House Forrester.”

The man sighed. “And I hoped I would finally get some news.”

“I’m sorry.”
“So, you came here to see our queen,” Malcolm said, changing of subject. “Why? Grey Worm couldn’t really give me detailed explanations.”

Trystane pondered for a moment. Could he reveal the truth to this man? He took his decision. “I came on behalf of my father, Prince Doran Martell of Dorne, to offer our help to Queen Daenerys. Dorne is ready to help her in her quest to take back the Iron Throne.”

Malcolm Branfield looked surprised by this. “So, Doran Martell finally decided to do something. Everyone in the Seven Kingdoms thought he had no spine. Did he get one recently?”

Trystane rose up in anger. “Be careful about what you say. You’re talking about my father.”

Branfield raised his hands in an appeasing gesture. “Alright, alright. Forgive, my prince. That’s not what I meant. Only this is a surprise to see that Doran Martell is ready to do something after so much time. He did nothing for almost twenty years.”

“You’re wrong. My father was always a Targaryen loyalist. He worked in secret to overrun House Lannister and House Baratheon for all these years. It was his plan all these years to bring back the Targaryens into power. Everything he did was to make it possible one day.”

The man sitting before Trystane looked thoughtful for a moment before he asked a question. “Why do you come now? Why didn’t you try to bring House Targaryen back to power before? Why now?”

Trystane couldn’t give him the real reason. “We didn’t know where Queen Daenerys was until recently. We learnt she was in Meereen not long ago. She has an army, and with the support of Dorne, she could take back the Iron Throne.”

“From the last news we had, the Iron Throne is occupied by the son of Cersei Lannister, and he is married to Lady Margaery Tyrell. Even with both our armies, it would be difficult to conquer the Seven Kingdoms.”

“She has three dragons, if rumors are true,” Trystane pointed out.

“She fled on one of them, and the other two are chained under the Great Pyramid. They are untamed. She doesn’t control them yet. Furthermore, if what I heard is true, House Martell has an alliance with the Lannisters. I even heard that the heir to Sunspear was betrothed to Princess Myrcella Baratheon.”

Why did he have to speak of her? Trystane sat back. “Myrcella is dead,” he confessed.

“Ah, I see,” said Malcolm Branfield after a moment. “The Lannisters are not happy about that, I suppose. Did they declare war to you?”

Trystane tried to escape this. “Our alliance with them no longer holds.”

“Sure. It doesn’t hold any longer. How did she die? Was she assassinated? Or of disease? I suppose Cersei Lannister is not happy about that, no matter how she died. Your family is in trouble, don’t deny it. Is that why you’re here? To ask the help of our queen?”

To that point, it was better to reveal everything. Malcolm Branfield had already guessed most of the truth. “My uncle, Oberyn Martell, was recently killed by Ser Gregor Clegane, the same man who murdered my aunt Elia and her children. His daughters assassinated Myrcella in retaliation. My father arrested them, but he won’t kill them. They are family. For now, we’re hiding the death of Myrcella, but sooner or later, the Lannisters will discover it. When they do, they will declare war upon Dorne.”
“So, this is what I thought. You need our queen. To defeat the Lannisters and the Tyrells.”

“If the Lannisters and the Tyrells defeat us, your queen won’t be able to count on us when she invades Westeros. I know she has a powerful army, but like you said, the Lannisters and the Tyrells are allies, and with a Tyrell queen, their alliance is not about to fall apart. Queen Daenerys may have ten thousand men and three dragons, but her dragons are untamed, like you just said, and her own army won’t stand before the might of Casterly Rock and Highgarden. The other houses will never support her. Only Dorne is ready to help her. If she wants Dorne to support her when she comes, then she must come soon. Or else Dorne will be destroyed when she will arrive to seize the Iron Throne and she will have no ally.”

The man sitting in front of Trystane seemed to think about what he just said for some time. “You are right. We will need allies in Westeros. I don’t really see the Vale, the North or the Riverlands siding with our queen. But why should we think you would side with us? I just revealed to you we don’t have so much chance of winning. You could fight for the Lannister boy and get a pardon for that. Why risk everything?”

“My father wants revenge for the death of his sister, his brother, his nephew and his niece.” Trystane got on his feet and walked to take a long scroll he had hidden in a corner. “And because of this.”

He handed it to Malcolm Branfield who unrolled it and read the content. He looked surprised. “A contract of marriage between Daenerys Targaryen and Prince Quentyn Martell, heir to Sunpear, signed in the year 285 After the Conquest by Prince Oberyn Nymeros Martell and Ser Willem Darry at Braavos.”

“As you can see, my father was always loyal to the Targaryens.”

“Quentyn Martell?” Malcolm Branfield asked, a frown and a skeptical look on his face.

“He was my brother. He died a few years ago while hunting.”

“And now, I suppose your father wants you to marry Daenerys.”

“Yes,” Trystane replied shortly, sighing in the process.

“You don’t seem very eager to the prospect,” Branfield commented.

“I loved another.” A sweet girl with green eyes and golden hair. “I had to leave her behind when I left.” I couldn’t even bury her.

Malcolm Branfield seemed to understand. His face showed some empathy. “For what it’s worth, I can tell you Daenerys is very beautiful.”

“Yes, I know,” replied Trystane angrily. He heard all sort of tales on his way to Meereen, but despite their differences, they all spoke of a beautiful young woman with silver hair and purple eyes who had dragons.

“Well, who knows, maybe our queen will accept your father’s offer. I hope she does. For you. But she may refuse, I must warn you about this.”

“My father is offering her twenty thousand spears, maybe more, to help her take back her birthright. Isn’t that enough?”

Malcolm Branfield rose from his seat, sighing in the process. “Daenerys Targaryen fought almost two years now to end slavery in Slavor’s Bay. The people call her Mhysa, which means Mother in Ghiscari. She sees them as her children. She will not abandon them to the slavers. She swore that no child born in Slavor’s Bay would know what it was to be sold or bought. She will continue that fight to the end. She will not leave Meereen before she can be sure slavery won’t come back after her departure. Anyway, she’s not here right now. She cannot leave for Westeros.”

That was bad news. Dorne wouldn’t be able to stand alone against the Crown. If Daenerys Targaryen didn’t come soon, they were doomed. “If she doesn’t come now, my house won’t be able to help her when she tries to seize back the Iron Throne.”

“You’re right, my prince,” conceded the man. He started to pace slowly around the room. “This means slavery must be ended at once so Daenerys can come back to Westeros. That is the only way she will accept to leave Meereen once she’s back.”

“If she comes back,” countered Trystane. “The man who received me when I arrived, the Unsullied officer…”

“Grey Worm,” completed Branfield.

“Grey Worm?”

“The Unsullied all received names like this during their trainings. Some decided to change their names when they entered Daenerys’s service, but other decided to keep them since they were the names they had when the queen freed them,” the Westerosi explained.

Trystane found it strange for someone to keep such a name. “He said only two men were sent to find your queen.”

“Aye, it’s true, but they’re no ordinary men. They will find her. We can count on them. Our main concern in the meantime is to keep the peace in Meereen and Slavor’s Bay while she is absent.”

Malcolm Branfield then explained him everything about the problems Meereen faced since Daenerys Targaryen conquered it. The discontent of the former masters, the insufficient food stocks, the olives the masters cut and burned as Daenerys approached the city, the attacks of the Sons of the Harpy, including the one they launched during the Great Games two weeks ago, the murders of former masters by former slaves, the resurging power of masters in Astapor and Yunkai, the death of most of the former masters supporting the queen. He also spoke about the murder of Ser Barristan Selmy, the exile of Ser Jorah Mormont, and the death of Missandei, a young scribe and translator who was the queen’s closest confident. Trystane had never seen such a desperate situation. His father had never faced such things from what he recalled.

“You see how the situation is dire,” said Malcolm Branfield as a conclusion.

“Yes, I do. How will you be able to bring back peace to Meereen without the queen?”

“I don’t know. I am a soldier, and Grey Worm too, just like every Unsullied. We can patrol streets, fight the Sons of the Harpy in the city or the masters on the battlefield, but none of us left are fit to rule Meereen. Most of the former masters supporting Daenerys died when the Sons of the Harpy attacked Daznak’s Pit. The ones left are quarrelling about who should rule in their queen’s absence. The city has been without government since the attack during the Great Games. We have no one to rally around.”

The situation really looked desperate. They needed Daenerys Targaryen, but he couldn’t leave right now. “Is there anything I can do?” Trystane asked, not knowing what to do.

Malcolm Branfield looked at him queerly. “Aye, there is something you could do. You are the heir to Sunspear. Surely your father introduced you to ruling.”

“Of course, he did.” His father would never let Dorne pass into unexperienced hands.

“Then, you may be the solution we were looking for. You want Daenerys to come to your family’s help? Help her, and she will help you. Rule Meereen in her absence.”

“Just like me, and Ser Barristan and Ser Jorah before me. You are a supporter of our queen, you are a prince, the heir to a great kingdom in Westeros. Our actual rulers cannot agree who will rule among them, so let’s put someone from the outside who has the queen’s approval and who is supposed to marry her soon.”

“I doubt they’ll want an outsider to rule their city.”

“They will, if you have the support of the Unsullied. I’ll talk to Grey Worm. If he supports you, the former masters will have no choice but to accept you as ruler of Meereen. And if you do a good job, I’m sure she will accept your father’s offer when she’ll come back.”

The man started to walk away. “Wait. Give me back the contract.”

Malcolm Branfield was still holding the scroll Trystane gave to him before. “I’ll show it to Grey Worm. He will be more willing to support you once he sees it. I’ll put it in a safe place and give it to our queen as soon as she gets back. My prince.”

Malcolm Branfield bowed and left, this time for good. There was nothing Trystane could do to get back the contract anyway. The Unsullied wouldn’t let him. At least, he still had the gift for the queen in the box.

Trystane didn’t sleep well this night. He never slept well since Myrcella died. He dreamed of her. In his sleep, he heard his father repeat the same words he repeated to him every night. Myrcella is no princess. Myrcella is not Robert Baratheon’s daughter. Her father is Jaime Lannister, the Kingslayer. She is of noble birth, but she is a bastard. Even worse, she is born of incest. I could never have let you marry her. Myrcella had the green eyes and the golden hair of her mother and her father. What Stannis Baratheon said was true. Everything is true. When he woke up, he said in a low voice the same words he pronounced every morning for months.

“That’s a lie.”

His second day in Meereen went on without great events. Trystane was kept into his rooms. He spoke a little with the children of the masters, but in fact they did the talking much more than him. They wanted to know more about Dorne, and Trystane reluctantly gave them short answers. Still, they seemed to find Dorne marvellous. Trystane wondered if he would find Dorne as beautiful as it was when he would go back. If he ever went back. What would be life there without Myrcella? What would be life with Daenerys Targaryen, the Mother of Dragons?

As the afternoon was ending, the officer of the Unsullied, the one they called Grey Worm, came to see him, with the same stern face than before. He stood there without speaking for a long time.

“Prince Trystane Martell. Malcolm Branfield tells me you want to help our queen.”

“I do,” answered Trystane. He had no other choice. He was stuck in Meereen. He couldn’t go back to Dorne without the Dragon Queen.
“Malcolm told me you wanted to marry our queen.”

“My father is offering her the support of Dorne and a marriage to me, his son and heir, to help her take back her father’s throne.”

A silence followed as the soldier kept looking at him. “Do you swear that you will do everything you can to restore peace in Meereen and put an end to slavery?”

“If this can help Queen Daenerys, then yes, I will.”

Another long silence lingered until the man they called Grey Worm spoke again. “Then my men are yours, Prince Trystane. As long as you remain loyal to our queen, we will serve you and obey your orders. Meereen is yours, until our queen returns.”

Chapter End Notes

The arc of Meereen will be mostly centered around Trystane, Grey Worm and Malcolm Branfield. Malcolm Branfield is Mira's uncle, the brother of her mother, and he is the second character from Telltale Game who I introduce in this story. The action in Meereen will be told from two people's perspective, and Trystane will be one of them. I let you wonder who will be the second one.

Daenerys will not come back in this fic before some time, since most of what will happen to her will be very similar to what she gets through in Season 6 before her coming back to Meereen. However, the situation of Meereen may turn different since Tyrion is not the one ruling it and that Missandei is dead. Grey Worm will have a different evolution because of that.

Please review

Next chapter: Margaery
Margaery V

Chapter Notes

Back to King's Landing with the Sparrows. Just like Cersei, Margaery seeks allies to reinforce her position, but with different methods than those used by her mother-in-law.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

MARGAERY V

Her husband was being dressed right before her by his squire. There was no problem for the queen to be present while her husband was putting on clothes. She and Tommen shared the same bed for more than long enough, and anyway to be honest, her husband didn’t have much to hide. A small council meeting was about to begin, but Tommen had arrived late. He had been gone for two hours, choosing the next horse he would use, to finally buy a beast that was no better than the average. Tommen was kind and well-intentioned, but whenever he had to take a decision, he needed an hour to take it on his own, or else he would take none. Someone always had to tell him what to do. Joffrey was a stupid monster who took harsh decisions very quickly, but Tommen was the entire opposite. Margaery was afraid she would end like her grandmother.

When the squire was finally done, Margaery was alone with her husband. He turned to her. “Do you think I look fine?”

Margaery put on one of her sweet smiles. She wondered if her lips would get too tired one day, forcing smiles to appear natural on her face. “You look every bit like a king should look.” She kissed him.

“Thank you.” His face was reddening again, and yet she had only kissed him.

“Tommen.” Margaery took a concerned expression, and this was not a fake. “Have you received any news from Sansa or Lord Tyrion? I’m afraid for them.”

“Well... No, I haven’t received any news. I should ask Kevan and the small council.”

“I fear for them. I hope they’re not still stuck in the Neck. I’m worried for Mira as well.”

Tommen nodded, a sad expression on his face. They both worried about Mira and Sansa, and Tommen also worried for Lord Tyrion. “We will ask at the small council meeting.”

He took her hand and they walked out to the small council. Margaery found that Tommen couldn’t share as much information as before with her. She suspected Ser Kevan to no longer inform Tommen like he used to do. He knew Margaery was trying to influence Tommen, and he didn’t want to give her weapons against him. That put Margaery in a rather difficult position. Not that her position as queen was threatened, but her influence on Tommen would be of no use if Tommen had no real power. Kevan Lannister was concentrating all powers between his hands, trying to leave the Tyrells with leftovers. Lord Paxter Redwyne had left last week, heading for the Sunset Sea with his fleet to attack the Iron Islands. Margaery wasn’t unhappy that finally they would attack the Iron Islands. The Reach would be in danger as long as they didn’t deal with the Ironmen, but she had lost the only person loyal to House Tyrell with any real power on the small council. Her father occupied the position of Master of Ships now, but like her grandmother liked to say, Lord Mace Tyrell was an oaf. He wasn’t a very useful ally, no matter how well-intentioned he was. Margaery felt isolated. She should have forced Mira to stay with her when the Hightower army came to King’s Landing. At least, she would have someone to advise her. She didn’t even have that now. Her cousins, Loras and Sera weren’t of great help when it came to politics. It was a chance that Cersei was out of the capital, or else life would be a living hell for the queen.

They arrived at the small council. Margaery took place at Tommen’s left like always, her father sitting on the same side of the table than her. Ser Kevan was facing her, with Ser Harys Swyft and Grand Maester Pycelle at his side. The small council was always divided this way with Lannisters at the king’s right and the Tyrells at the king’s left. Lord Varys was sitting with the Lannisters this time, but he always changed his seat. He was on no one’s side. The other members of the small council all stood up when Margaery and Tommen entered, except for Nymeria Sand, who was sitting at the end of the table, to the opposite of the king. She never stood before Margaery and Tommen, and Margaery was tired of her attempts of seduction on Tommen. Not that Tommen was about to fall under the spell of that Dornishwoman, Margaery made sure of that, but still.

“Your Grace, I’m afraid we must begin this small council with a very unpleasant matter,” began Ser Kevan. “The High Septon was surprised in a brothel again. The Sparrows forced him once more to walk naked in the streets. We closed the eyes on the first incident, but this time we can’t. Ser Addam Marbrand intervened quickly enough to arrest the Sparrows who took part to this walk of atonement. However, the people saw their High Septon naked for a second time. That situation cannot last.”

“A High Septon who visits brothels…” Like always, her father’s comments proved useless.

“What do you suggest we do, Ser Kevan?” asked Tommen.

“I propose that this time, we put the Sparrows involved in this to death,” declared the Hand. “We warned them. However, the High Septon should be forced to resign his position and retire to Quiet Isle. We cannot have a High Septon with such a soiled reputation in these times. Some of the people in the streets are starting to support the Sparrows in saying the Faith has been corrupted.”

“Is that wise to remove the High Septon?”

“I’m afraid we have no choice. Lord Tyrion influenced the septons to choose the actual High Septon. I think that by allowing the Faith to choose its own High Septon this time, we would extinguish some of the protests. In the meantime, I would like to reinforce the City Watch. The Sparrows are becoming increasingly reckless. We must reinforce security in the city.”

“Do we have enough gold for that?” asked Margaery.

“Ser Harys will be in charge to find the money. We have no choice. We must maintain the peace, and for that we need to reinforce the City Watch. There isn’t a day without an incident involving at least one Sparrow.”

“Very well,” said Tommen. The matter was closed. “Ser Kevan, we still have no answer from Princess Myrcella.”

The Hand of the King turned to Nymeria Sand. “Lady Nymeria, two months ago you sent a raven to Sunspear. How does it come we have no news about Princess Myrcella yet?”

“I don’t know,” answered the girl. “I sent three other ravens ever since, but without answers. I suppose there must be a problem that stops my uncle from sending any raven. But I can assure you that Princess Myrcella is well. Prince Doran would never dare to harm her, nor would he ever let someone hurt her. His son is in love with her and he likes the princess very much himself. I can assure you she is alright.”

Margaery turned her head to Tommen. She made him understand it was time with a very slight move of her head. They had talked about it. It was time for Tommen to show he was the king. Tommen stood up on his feet and looked straight into the eyes of the Sand Snake.

“Lady Nymeria, this is completely unacceptable. My sister is living with your family at Sunspear. We gave her to you so you would look after her. I will write myself to Prince Doran for news. If we get no reply in two weeks, I will send one of my kingsguards with one hundred men to Dorne to bring her back to King’s Landing. With or without the approval of Prince Doran.”

Lady Nymeria didn’t seem impressed by the speech, but Tommen didn’t flinch either. Margaery had made him repeat this a few times before this meeting. “As you wish, your Grace.” The Sand Snake replied as if nothing was amiss. Tommen sat back, shaking a little. Margaery took his left hand in hers and he relaxed. She shot a glance to Ser Kevan with a smile at the same time. This controlled outburst was more destined to attract the attention of the Lannister knight truth be told.

“Your Grace,” said Lord Varys at this moment, “I think you will be glad to learn that my little birds confirmed the death of the usurper Stannis Baratheon. He was effectively executed by Roose Bolton after his defeat at Winterfell.”

They had learnt it last week. Stannis Baratheon had tried to take Winterfell with the army he had brought in the North, but they hadn’t survived the cold and the snow. The desertions had almost defeated Lord Stannis before he reached Winterfell and what was left of his army was destroyed by the Boltons.

“So, it is sure now? My uncle is dead?” asked Tommen.

“Yes, your Grace,” confirmed Varys.

Tommen looked sad. He was never happy to hear that someone died, not even an enemy. “I know that for many, Stannis Baratheon was an enemy of the Crown, and an usurper. But still, he was my uncle. I would like us to observe a minute of silence in his memory, and to regret that he died as an enemy instead of dying in service of the Crown.”

They observed a minute of silence. Ser Kevan was the one to break it in the end. “Of course, your Grace, despite the fact that we can regret that your uncle never saw the injustice of his cause, you now have no one to contest your place on the Iron Throne. The only enemies left are the Greyjoys on the Iron Islands and the Boltons in the North.”

“Since we are talking about it,” intervened Margaery, “has there been any progress near Moat Cailin? I hope they’re not still blocked there.”

“I’m afraid they are, your Grace,” answered the Spider. “A garrison of northern lords loyal to the Boltons occupies Moat Cailin and makes any attempt to penetrate in the North impossible. The army of Ser Gerold Hightower has reached Moat Cailin, but they are stuck there with the troops from the Westerlands and the Riverlands.”

“How many men do we have waiting before Moat Cailin?”

“About twenty-five thousands, your Grace,” answered Ser Kevan.
“Can’t they just storm the fortress?” asked Margaery.

“No, your Grace. Moat Cailin was never taken by storm. They won’t succeed this way. We need another army to attack Moat Cailin from the north. Then it could fall.”

“Is there no one in the North who could attack Moat Cailin from the north then? Don’t tell me no one rebelled against Roose Bolton? He’s been attainted by the king. Lady Sansa is following the army in the Neck, and she is the eldest living child of Eddard Stark,” said Margaery. She couldn’t believe the army was blocked there. She didn’t want Sansa to die in the swamps of the Neck with the army there, even less considering that Mira was there too and the Hightowers, her mother’s house, had an army engaged in this conflict.

“Most of the northern houses are staying away from this conflict,” explained Ser Kevan. “There is little love for the Lannisters in the North, but they don’t love the Boltons either. Many may decide to not get involved in this conflict and to let our armies and the Boltons fight each other.”

“The Manderlys have taken action against the Boltons not long after the decree stripping them from their titles was enacted,” said Varys. “My little birds reported to me recently that the Manderly army is besieging the city of Barrowton.”

“They shouldn’t be there,” said Ser Kevan. “With your permission, your Grace, I would send a raven to White Harbor and order Lord Manderly to leave Barrowton and to attack Moat Cailin from the north. One of his sons is in the Neck with our armies, so he should not hesitate to comply.”

“Very well. Do it, Ser Kevan,” Tommen said shortly.

The rest of the small council meeting concerned essentially the Redwyne fleet that was moving to the Arbor and the preparations for an invasion on the Iron Islands. Lord Varys also gave them news about Daenerys Targaryen in Meereen. The city was in chaos and the masters were trying to take back the cities of Yunkai and Astapor now. The last Targaryen had apparently left the city on the back of her dragon according to certain stories, but other said that wings had grown on her back and that she flew away herself, or that she was burned alive by her own dragon. In all cases, Daenerys Targaryen didn’t look like an immediate threat.

The small council was over quickly and Margaery could return to her rooms with Tommen, not without noticing the smirk Nymeria Sand was shooting at her. Margaery wouldn’t dine with her husband this evening. She had invited the Hand of the King to eat with her instead. They had important matters to discuss.

When Sera and the other handmaidens had brought all the food and were gone out, Margaery decided to bring up the topic for which she invited Ser Kevan.

“Ser, I think we both agree this is rather unlikely for the Martells to not have given any news concerning Princess Myrcella unless they didn’t want to give these news,” said Margaery.

“I have to admit this is rather strange that we sent four ravens and that none of them returned,” recognized the knight.

“The Martells are planning something, I can feel it. Don’t tell me you find Lady Nymeria’s behaviour normal.”

“No more normal than the behaviour of her father.”

Margaery changed of topic. “The Sparrows are becoming a real problem. They are no longer simple beggars in the streets. Some people within the Faith have started to support them. A few even speak for them openly. I have discussed with septons, septas, brothers and sisters while working for my charity works, and they are all afraid of the Sparrows. When I visited an orphanage today, the septas running it almost fought because some refused to let me enter to give them food and money. The Sparrows know that we are trying to turn the people against them.”

“There is nothing new in what you’re telling me, your Grace. I am fully aware of the growing power of the Sparrows. Varys has spies everywhere and he keeps me informed about everything going on in the city.”

“Do you really believe that hiring more gold cloaks will be enough to neutralize them? Cersei tried to maintain her hold on the city this way, and in reward she got riots.”

“What are you trying to tell me, your Grace?” asked Kevan, stopping to eat.

“All I want to say, Ser Kevan, is that we have two enemies. The Martells outside, and the Sparrows inside. I am married to his Grace, so his enemies are my enemies. Whoever threatens his reign threatens my position as queen, and the alliance between our two families. I propose we put aside our rivalry and that we work together against the actual threats.”

“Why would you want to do so, your Grace? You want the king’s ear for yourself, don’t deny it.”

“It’s quite useless to have the king’s ear when he cannot make decisions or when he is no king at all. We both whisper different things into Tommen’s ear, and that leads him to behave erratically. We cannot allow that right now. Princess Myrcella is in Dorne, and with the death of Oberyn Martell, I’m afraid something may have happened to her. I don’t know her, but Tommen loves her, and I would rather not see her hurt.”

“Are you telling you care for Princess Myrcella because you love Tommen?”

“No. But I like Tommen. He is a very kind and sweet boy, and I am married to him. Anyway, if anything happened to Myrcella, we will have to face the Martells, and you will need the support of my family for that. The Martells may even try to use Myrcella and to declare her Queen instead of Tommen, and we both have no interest in allowing this to happen. As for the Sparrows, if they take control of the Faith, we are doomed since the Iron Throne promised to protect the Faith long ago. There is nothing we could do against them if they take control of it. We must stop to fight for the influence on Tommen and deal with our current enemies. We must focus Tommen on the actual dangers by both telling him the same things, or else he will be unable to act against the Sparrows and Dorne.”

“The idea of an alliance is tempting, your Grace,” recognized the Hand. “However, what tells me you won’t try to use the situation to your advantage?”

“Nothing, but we need each other, Ser Kevan. Be sure that I won’t whisper thoughts against you in Tommen’s ear, that is not in my interest. I know that you resent me for marrying my handmaiden to a Hightower, but considering that with your initial plan she would have ended with a Whitehill, I think I rather made a good choice by preventing the reinforcement of Bolton’s bannermen.”

Ser Kevan was silent for a moment, looking thoughtful. “I can’t argue with this, your Grace. I recognize the silence from Dorne is preoccupying, and I know the Sparrows are a real threat. I know that our quarrels make Tommen quite confused, and that none of us can hope to get a complete influence on him. It’s all right. I accept the idea to ally our forces against our present enemies. We both know that we cannot trust Varys entirely anyway, so we can use your relations among the Faith and the people to get information. The first thing is to make sure the septons will not choose someone supporting the Sparrows. I would like you to use your influence on the members of the Faith you meet to bring them to consider a candidate who will neither be an instrument of the Sparrows nor a source of scandals. If we bribe some septons discreetly with that, that should be enough.”

“We may have to use force against the Sparrows all the same,” pointed out Margaery.

“You’re right. This is why I will strengthen the City Watch. We could use the financial help of your family for this.”

Margaery nodded. “I will speak with my father about this. However, more gold cloaks won’t be enough. We need someone to lead them who would be able to suppress an uprising if it comes to that.”

“What do you mean exactly, your Grace?”

Margaery spoke carefully. “You occupy the office of Master of Laws while being Hand of the King, Ser Kevan. Don’t tell me you’re not exhausted. We know this isn’t true. I propose to bring someone at this office who could lead the gold cloaks to suppress the threat of the Sparrows.”

“Who are you thinking about?” Ser Kevan looked skeptical.

“Lord Randyll Tarly. If someone can deal with an uprising from the Sparrows, that will be him.”

“Randyll Tarly? Master of Laws? We can be sure he will apply the law to the letter, but he’s not very useful in times of peace.”

“But if fights break up with the Sparrows, he may help us a lot.”

Ser Kevan obviously didn’t like the idea, but Margaery was sure that he admitted himself that if they were to fight the Sparrows, then Lord Tarly would be the man of the situation. “Very well,” conceded Kevan. “Lord Randyll Tarly will be appointed Master of Laws. I will remain at this office until he arrives. However, I believe your father, Lord Mace Tyrell, should leave. If you allow me to say so, he is not very helpful, just like Lady Olenna loved to tell everyone. He will be more useful in Highgarden, and anyway the Reach will be well enough represented on the small council with you and Lord Tarly.”

“What about the office of Master of Ships?”

“For now, there is no longer much to do with Stannis defeated. The Iron Islands are the main threat. I intend to give the office back to Lord Redwyne.”

Ser Kevan was excluding her father from the small council and appointed another lord from the Reach to the office he occupied, though Lord Paxter wouldn’t be there. Margaery had to make this alliance work. She wasn’t in position to refuse. That may be the price for this alliance. Ser Kevan would not allow her house to become too powerful on the small council. These concessions had to be made to bring Randyll Tarly here.

“Let my father stay until Lord Randyll comes. Or else, we’ll be missing two members on the small council in the capital.”

“Very well,” agreed Ser Kevan. That was a small victory, but a victory all the same. Even with the departure of her father, the arrival of Lord Tarly would reinforce her position and help to deal with the Sparrows if it came to fight. Margaery hoped it wouldn’t. Nobody would love Tommen or her if there was blood in the streets.

After the dinner, Margaery went to the gardens and sat on a bench. Her father would leave soon.
Loras would stay with her, at least. She wouldn’t like it to have no one of her family with her in the capital. She already felt lonely with Mira, Sansa, her grandmother and her mother away. Now her father would leave too. It was no small task to be queen. She wondered what was going on in the North. She hoped nothing bad had happened to Sansa or Mira, and that they would get back their homes. Margaery didn’t know how she would feel if Highgarden was burned to the ground and all her family slaughtered. How difficult it had to be for her friends. They had better husbands than her, but Margaery would rather have a mean husband and all her family alive than a fantastic husband with all her family dead.

Margaery walked back to the rooms she shared with Tommen. They would have to make their duty as husband and wife tonight again, until she was with child. Margaery started to be bored by this. Tommen was kind and gentle, but not a very good lover, even if he loved her. Maybe her grandmother had been right and she would have been better off with Tyrion Lannister. She decided she would go to the Great Sept of Baelor tomorrow with Tommen and pray for Sansa and Mira. She would light a candle to the Mother to deliver her a son and to have mercy on her friends, to the Crone to show her the path to wisdom in these troubled times, to the Maiden to protect Mira and Sansa, and to the Warrior to give courage to the men in their armies.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
“This farce of a siege cannot go on forever,” declared Ser Perwyn Frey. “We have been here for more than two months now, and we still have no way to get through Moat Cailin. The fortress cannot be taken without support of an army from the northern side. Our men are growing impatient and tired. We won’t be able to maintain this situation much longer.”

The commander of the Frey forces hadn’t said that on an angry tone. It was merely an observation, but that was an unpleasant observation, especially when it was made in front of the war council on a bitter tone. The council included all the commanders of the armies that participated to the invasion of the North. Ser Brynden Tully represented the Tully forces, along with Karyl Vance and Clement Piper. Ser Perwyn Frey and Olyvar Frey were there to represent the Frey forces. Ser Gerold Hightower, Mira’s husband, was there as well. Lord Beric Dondarrion was there for the Brotherhood Without Banners. Ser Daven Lannister, Ser Forley Prester and Ser Lyle Crakehall were there to represent the Westerlands, whose forces constituted most of the twenty-five thousand soldiers camped in the Neck. Tyrion and Sansa were there too, sitting at the head of the table with Ser Brynden. Sansa had to assume the double role of Lady of the Westerlands and Wardeness of the North.

Sansa often felt useless at these councils, and alone in some way despite Tyrion’s presence. Mira should assist these meetings as well. She had as much right to attend these councils than her husband. Sansa’s presence was quite questionable since she had no men under her command here. No Northerner had joined them up to now. Not even the crannogmen went to their side, despite the long friendship of her father with Lord Reed. However, for Tyrion, it would be stupid to not have the official Wardeness of the North sit at the war council when the purpose of the army was to free the North. At least that was what he said. If only the Northerners saw them as liberators and not as invaders.

“We have more and more difficulties to keep control on our men,” added Lord Piper.

“My lords,” started Tyrion. “I think we are all aware that our current situation is far from desirable. However, it could be far worse. We receive supplies and fodder from the Twins, from the Westerlands, and even from the Reach since the Hightowers have arrived. Our army will not starve to death. We could still stay here for six months, with full supplies.”

“We cannot stay here for six months. We still have no word from the Manderlys. Without their help, we won’t be able to take Moat Cailin and to penetrate in the North,” pointed out Ser Brynden.

“Are you suggesting we should retreat, Ser Brynden?” asked Tyrion.
Sansa’s granduncle didn’t answer, but Ser Vance did. “I think we should, my lord. We cannot hold here in the Neck forever. Yes, we are well supplied, but we lose men to sickness and cold every day. Not many men, of course, but we keep losing them slowly. If the Manderlys are our allies, then we should go to King’s Landing and sail for White Harbor from there. Or we could sail from Gulltown.”

“I doubt Lord Arryn will allow us to travel through his lands, and with the royal fleet that was destroyed, there will never be enough ships to carry enough men to the North by the sea. The Redwyne fleet will have left for the Sunset Sea by the time we reach the capital.”

“But we cannot stay here,” insisted Ser Vance.

“My lords,” Sansa said loudly and with an authoritarian voice. She stood up. She was the only one to sit among the people here. “You all know why we are here. We are here because we all decided to overthrow House Bolton. Roose Bolton killed my brother, the king he swore to serve, with his own hand, the same king many of you here declared their king. He plunged a dagger in his heart. His son skins people alive and forces himself upon my sister as we speak, and upon many other innocent girls, before he let them to be fed to his dogs. We are fighting against monsters. We received an order from the king to kill these monsters and to bring them justice. Are you going to let Roose Bolton and Ramsay Bolton get away with their crimes? To let them rule the North as if it was theirs, as a reward for killing innocents? Are you going to run away? If you do so, then we lose. The Boltons will keep the North, and their crimes will remain unpunished. The Red Wedding will remain unpunished. That’s not something I will allow. The question now I am asking you: Are you going to allow it?”

They all listened to her. They didn’t have much choice. Sansa’s condition as a pregnant woman had its advantages. No one could be rude with her and everyone showed her more respect than ever. She knew her words had much effects on the Freys, the river lords and on Lord Beric, and also on Tyrion, though she didn’t need to convince him. It had less effect on Ser Gerold, but Sansa relied on Mira to keep him in line outside the war councils if he ever thought about abandoning. The Lannister commanders were the ones that her speech probably affected the less, except for Ser Lyle. Ser Daven respected her and Robb enough to be affected in a small way, and he was the one to speak first after her intervention.

“I think we all know at this stage that if we withdraw from our actual position, then the North will be lost to us for good. Yes, winter is coming, but if we retreat, even temporarily, then when we’ll come back winter will be here for good, and this one will last several years. Whether we abandon the North for good, or we stay here until the Manderlys show themselves at the north, which will probably happen sooner or later. We’ve been all over this discussion more than once. We have orders from the king, so we have to carry them out. Our position is still good right now. We can keep it without too much loss for the time being. When our losses will become too heavy, then we should discuss about withdrawing, but not before.”

“I agree with Ser Daven,” said Ser Brynden bluntly. “We stay here. We’re not going to abandon the invasion when it could be about to begin at any time.”

“We stay,” agreed Ser Perwyn. “We swore to avenge Robb Stark, and we will have no rest until it is done.”

“I won’t fly away from a fight before it begins, nor before it is over,” declared the Strongbear.

“My men will stay here as well,” said Ser Gerold Hightower.

Everyone agreed to stay in the Neck in the end, at least for the time being. They wouldn’t abandon their plans to overthrow the Boltons. The war council ended with Tyrion and Ser Brynden encouraging the other commanders to organize sparring and fighting competitions for their men with tourney weapons so they would be prepared to fight and to occupy their time. Their worst enemy was boredom, even more than sickness or cold. If they kept the men occupied, they wouldn’t desert.

The council was over and the lords began to pour out of the tent, but Ser Gerold came to her as she stood up. “Lady Sansa, my wife would like to know if she could visit you today.”

“Of course, she can visit me whenever she wants. We are friends.”

Ser Gerold bowed and left, but as she walked to the exit with Tyrion, her granduncle stopped her. “Sansa, I would like to speak to you. Alone.”

She turned to face him. He was looking at Tyrion. His face was not threatening. It was almost a plea for understanding, though not entirely. Tyrion was looking at her, waiting for her to answer.

“It’s alright. I’m following you,” she told him.

He left with a smile. He always smiled at her these times. Her pregnancy had made her husband very happy, and it had also lifted the spirits very much for a time. However, there were times she thought Tyrion was… afraid. She didn’t know why, but he seemed concerned from time to time. Anyway, to learn that the Lady of Casterly Rock was with child was a cause of great joy among the Lannister soldiers. The reactions were more mixed among the men of the Riverlands. Sansa suspected they didn’t know whether to be happy that Catelyn Tully’s daughter was pregnant or to be angry that a Lannister put a child in her. The Frey commanders, Perwyn and Olyvar were all happy about it, though she doubted their men shared their enthusiasm. As for the Hightower men, they were happy for her, but not excessively. Mira was the one to be really enthused when Sansa told her.

“Let’s sit,” told Ser Brynden. “You are with child. You mustn’t tire yourself.”

“You care a lot about my well-being, uncle,” Sansa commented.

“You care a lot about my well-being, uncle,” Sansa commented.

“You care a lot about my well-being, uncle,” Sansa commented.

“Your mother would never forgive me if I didn’t.”

“I suppose she would never forgive Tyrion for taking care of me.” Sansa didn’t say the latter sentence without gloom.

Ser Brynden sighed. “Probably not. I can almost consider Lord Tyrion as someone I can trust, at least temporarily, for the time being. But your mother would never have accepted your marriage.”

“Do you?”

A long silence followed. “He treated you well. And up to now, he kept his word, so I can do with it. But if he ever harms you in any way…”

“You will put an end to our marriage in a permanent way,” Sansa completed. “I know, he told me. That won’t be necessary. He will never hurt me.”

“So you say.” She hoped she didn’t hear any skepticism in Ser Brynden’s voice. “How are you? How is the pregnancy going?”

“I’m only three months in it. I’m alright. I still have morning sickness, but nothing more. And Tyrion makes sure I have everything I need. Maester Wyllam comes to see me every day.”

“Be careful all the same. Your mother would never forgive me if she was to lose another grandchild before he saw light.”
Sansa nodded. She understood. “Brienne accompanies me everywhere. I am safe.”

Her granduncle remained silent for a moment before he cleared his throat. He straightened up in his chair. “Sansa, you can’t stay here.”

Sansa didn’t understand. “What do you mean, I can’t stay here?”

“I’ve been thinking about this lately. We could send you back to Riverrun. Edmure and Roslin will take care of you there, and of your child, of course.”

“I can’t leave!” shouted Sansa, outraged. “Arya is still prisoner at Winterfell. I have to go there!”

“Sansa, you are pregnant. An army is not the place for a pregnant woman.”

“Robb’s wife followed him everywhere, even while she was pregnant,” she protested.

“First, we learnt about her pregnancy on our way to the Twins, when we were almost there. Second, have you forgotten what happened to Talisa? She’s dead. She was murdered. If she had stayed behind, at Riverrun, she would still be alive, and your nephew as well. Third, Talisa was a healer. She helped to treat the men who were injured. Do you?”

“No. But I am the Lady of Winterfell, and the Wardeness of the North. How could you invade the North without me? You already look like southern invaders. Even you talk of it as an invasion. What do you think it will be if I’m no longer with you? No one in the North will side with you if I’m gone.”

“Sansa, you are pregnant. Your condition is going to get worse as time passes. It will not only be the morning sickness. It will become hard for you even to walk as your belly grows. What if you were to enter labor while we are stuck in a tempest? Or during a battle? This is no situation to deliver a child. I forbid you to come with us.”

Sansa’s fury flared. “I am the Lady of the Westerlands and the Wardeness of the North. You have no power to give me any order. Most of the men in this army are Tyrion’s and mine. Monsters have taken my home. I will not stay behind in comfort while Arya is being raped and the Boltons are feasting in our halls. I will go in the North with you, whether this pleases you or not.”

Sansa got on her feet and left, not allowing her uncle enough time to reply. She stormed out of the tent, Brienne following her as she walked to the pavilion she shared with Tyrion. She wouldn’t go back to a warm and comfortable castle while her sister was being beaten and worse by a monster. Sansa would have his head, but before that, she would save Arya. At Winterfell, it would be the same than Riverrun. She would avenge and save her family at the same time. She would make the Boltons pay for every bruise, every cut, every scratch they did to her sister. Sansa had enough of her family suffering. She was in position to protect the people she loved now, and she would use it. And she would make everyone who made her family suffer pay for what they did. A Lannister always pays her debts.

Sansa arrived at her tent and found inside a pair she wasn’t expecting. Lady Mira Forrester and Ser Perwyn Frey. They got on their feet when she entered. Ser Perwyn bowed as Mira curtsied.

“Ser Perwyn, I wasn’t expecting you,” said Sansa. She certainly didn’t expect him here with Mira furthermore. Mira stayed away from all the Freys.

“Forgive me, Lady Sansa. I didn’t want to invade your privacy.”

“It’s alright. Are you well, Lady Mira?”
“Yes, my lady. Ser Perwyn and I were just discussing.” There was no sound of disdain, hatred or harshness in Mira’s voice. In fact, she seemed calmer than usual.

“Well, I think I will take my leave. Is your child all right, my lady?” Ser Perwyn asked to Sansa.

“The maester says he is alright,” she answered. “For now, I can’t feel him. Not yet.”

The knight nodded. “My sister was pregnant not long ago. Everything went well. I’m sure nothing wrong will happen to you, Lady Sansa.”

He bowed to both Mira and Sansa and left. Sansa was alone with her friend. She turned her face to Mira, a questioning look on it.

“He just came to apologize,” the Forrester girl explained. “For what happened to my father at the Red Wedding. Apparently, he didn’t know my father died there. He seemed to be honest.”

“He is,” Sansa assured her. She took place in a chair and Mira sat as well. “Ser Perwyn wasn’t there during the Red Wedding. His family thought he was too close to my brother and the Northerners to take part in it, and that he could betray them. It was the same for Olyvar. He was Robb’s squire. He didn’t want to leave him after he wed Talisa. Ser Perwyn accompanied my mother when she went to negotiate with Lord Renly. I think he really wants to help us. I saw his sister Roslin at the Twins, with her son. I could hardly believe she was a Frey.”

Mira nodded in silent. “You remember about my brother Asher? The one who was exiled. You know why he was exiled.” Sansa nodded. “I met Gwyn Whitehill one day. I liked her. She wasn’t at all like the rest of her family. And she loved Asher. She loved him very dearly. When we think about it, if Ludd Whitehill had accepted to let her marry Asher, maybe there would have been no war between my family and hers. They would have been linked, like they were a long time ago.”

“A long time ago? What do you mean?”

“I read something while I was in Oldtown. When I visited the Citadel. A book on northern houses. Apparently, the Whitehills and the Forresters have a common ancestor. A certain Lord Regald Ironwood, a lord from a lost house. There would have been a split in House Ironwood that would have given birth to my house and to House Whitehill. Our two families may have been only one once. It’s sad to think that we ended killing each other.”

“Personally, I hope I share no common ancestor with the Boltons,” commented Sansa dryly.

“Don’t get me wrong, Sansa. I’m not eager to be related to Ludd Whitehill. I just… wish my family hadn’t died.”

Sansa could understand that. She wished the same. “We cannot bring them back, but at least now we avenge them, and make sure those who murdered them won’t make other people suffer.”

A long silence settled in the tent. Sansa knew they were both lost in their thoughts. It was difficult to not let a conversation slip sooner or later to a sad or gloomy subject these days, but she preferred to spend some time in silence with someone else than to spend it alone.

“How is the baby?” asked Mira suddenly.

“I can’t feel him for now.”

“Him? You believe it’s a boy?”
“No. It could be a girl. Maester Wyllam cannot tell if it’ll be a boy or a girl. I hope it’s a boy. This way the succession will be solved about Casterly Rock.”

“Does Lord Tyrion think the same?” Mira asked.

“He says he doesn’t care if we have a son or a daughter. He will be happy with one or the other. But… I think he says that to not indispose me. He does everything to keep my mood up these times. I think he hopes it will be a boy too.”

“We can’t blame him. You need two sons. One for Casterly Rock and one for Winterfell. I hope he won’t be deceived if it’s a girl.”

“No, he won’t.” Sansa was sure of that. She couldn’t imagine Tyrion hating their child because she was a girl. “Though I find him a little overzealous when it comes to my well-being. He always tells me to not go out without heavy warm gowns and furs on me, to never approach the swamps. He even told me I could skip the war councils if I wanted.”

“He’s not entirely wrong, Sansa. He cannot allow something to happen to you, or to the baby. Especially with the weather. It’s getting colder out there. Winter is almost here.”

Sansa knew it only too well. “Winter is coming.”

“What happened at the war council?” her northern friend asked.

“Nothing much. Mostly some commanders complaining about the length of the siege, the men getting bored and impatient for action. It’s hard to maintain discipline here. We’ve been stuck in the Neck for too long. More and more commanders are getting unnerved about this. Don’t worry, your husband isn’t among those who asked for retreat, but I would like you to make sure he doesn’t come with that idea.”

“I will. Gerold listens to me.”

Sansa remembered something she thought during the war council. “Mira, perhaps you could attend the meetings of the war council. We are invading the North, and I am the only Northerner at the table. And the only woman too. I think you should be more involved.”

Mira smiled in gratitude. “Thank you. Yes, I think I’ll like that. There isn’t much to do around here anyway. But do you think the other commanders will accept my presence? I don’t think Gerold will mind. He would cut his veins for me. But the other men?”

“Tyrion won’t oppose. He respects you. As for the others, I’ll only have to remind them that you are the Lady of Ironrath and that we should have all the Northerners we can find at the council.”

“I’m not yet the Lady of Ironrath, Sansa.”

“You are. I am the Wardeness of the North and I say you are the Lady of Ironrath. That’s all it takes.”

“Perhaps officially, Sansa. But our homes are both into the enemy’s hands, and we haven’t even been able to penetrate into the North. Our titles don’t mean much in the North for the time being. They are only titles in the end.”

“Indeed.” Sansa thought for a moment. Then she decided she could trust Mira. “Mira, do you think I should be the Lady of Winterfell?”
“Of course you should, Sansa. And you are, like you just said.”

“I don’t think so, Mira. The Northerners may never accept me. I bear the name of House Lannister, and my children will bear this name as well. Perhaps I should let Arya have Winterfell when she is freed. She looks more like a Stark anyway, and I don’t remember any case where someone held two of the Seven Kingdoms.”

“It certainly happened in the past, Sansa. I don’t think it would be good to give up your rights on Winterfell. You are the eldest living child of Lord Eddard Stark.”

“I’m not. I have a brother.” Sansa had come to be angry when Jon was set aside because he was a bastard.

“Forgive me, Sansa. I didn’t use the right words. I meant that you are Lord Eddard’s heir because you are his eldest legitimate child now and all your legitimate brothers are dead. Winterfell is yours, whether you want it or not. Anyway, even if Jon Snow was a legitimate son, it wouldn’t change anything since he is in the Night’s Watch. But that’s not the point.” Mira’s expression was pained. “I hope this won’t happen, but it is quite possible that Lady Arya won’t be alive when we will free Winterfell. Or she could even be pregnant.”

Sansa’s heart jumped inside. She wasn’t sure what would be worse for her sister between death or being alive with Ramsay Bolton’s child in her belly. Mira resumed. “I’m afraid you have to accept to be the Lady of Winterfell. If… If your sister was with child, and that you gave her Winterfell, then a Bolton would rule the North one day, and not any Bolton. It would be Ramsay Bolton’s child.” Mira looked as if she wished to do what Sansa did every morning these last times. “Is that what you want? As for me, I would rather see Lord Tyrion’s child than the bastard’s child at Winterfell.”

Sansa knew why Mira said these things. Her brother Ethan was killed by Ramsay Bolton. She wanted to see Ramsay Bolton die as much as Sansa wanted, and she probably couldn’t support the idea of the monster’s son ruling the North. The discussion wasn’t lightening the mood very much. Sansa would try to see if that was possible to make Arya the Lady of Winterfell once she was free. She tried to imagine her sister as a lady, and she almost laughed at the idea. She tried to bring it in a more pleasant direction. “How are things going with your husband?”

Mira’s face lightened. “Things are good. He’s eager to see the North, and Ironrath. He’s impatient. And not only about seeing my home. I had to refrain him recently.”

“What do you mean?”

“Well, I convinced him we should be more careful about our nocturnal activities.” A wicked smile appeared on Mira’s face. Sansa giggled a little.

“What? Are you bored already?”

“No. Not at all. Though I’m sure I’m much closer to being bored than he is. Only, I don’t think it would be good if he got me with child right now. Not while we’re marching on Ironrath. A military campaign in the middle of winter is all but the time to have children.”

Sansa hated to hear her granduncle’s arguments again. “So, you’re not expecting children anytime soon?”

“Not right now. I had my moonblood two weeks ago. But as soon as we get Ironrath back, we’ll be able to work on it.”

When Sansa thought about it, Mira was probably right. It wouldn’t be easy for her on the way to Sansa hadn’t been entirely sincere when she told Ser Brynden that she only had morning sickness. She fell things much more than before, and ate much more. She often asked for more food at dinner, and ate between the meals, only to give it back next morning. She also needed to make water more often. Maester Wyllam had told her these were among the things that could happen when women were pregnant. When she had asked what were the other possible symptoms, she hadn’t liked the answer: exhaustion, pain to the breasts, bleeding, blackouts, fainting, headaches, back aches, heat, constipation, cramps and many other pains she couldn’t remember. Was that so difficult to bring a child into the world? She only worried about if her children would be dwarves, but she never thought about asking Creylen for details about the pregnancy itself. She had been like the little foolish girl of Winterfell, thinking everything would be alright.

Sansa and Mira kept speaking until time for dinner arrived with Tyrion. Mira excused herself, leaving Tyrion and Sansa together. “Are you well?” he asked her immediately, like every time they saw each other since they knew she was pregnant.

“I am. Don’t worry for myself. Maester Wyllam looks after me every day.” But she knew he would all the same. Tyrion was a caring husband, and he had become even more so since they knew she was with child. She decided to turn the conversation to another subject. “I would like Mira to attend the meetings of the war council. She is the future Lady of Ironrath after all.”

“Well, I won’t say no. I would like more clever people on the council, and she seems to be more clever than her husband. I’m afraid she is the mind in the pair.”

“And who’s the mind in our pair?”

“I don’t know. Who do you think it is?” Tyrion asked, a wicked smile on his lips. Sansa returned it.

“I don’t know.”

Their heads got close and they kissed. Sansa was tired, and she felt better when they were together. She was sitting while Tyrion was standing up, and still she had to lean, but it didn’t matter. All that mattered for now was their lips, their breaths, and his hand caressing her chin.

“My lord. My lady.” To her regret, Tyrion broke the kiss to look at Podrick who was standing at the entrance of the tent with a tray of food. He was looking away and all red in the face, like every time he surprised them in some intimate moment, even if that was only kissing.

“Come in, Podrick. That’s not as if were fucking each other,” said Tyrion with a grin. Her husband liked to tease his squire. Podrick obeyed and put the food on the table, his face turning redder. Willia, Sansa’s handmaiden who followed her from Casterly Rock, came as well with more food.

“Thank you for your help, Podrick,” Willia said.

Podrick smiled widely at the girl as she walked out. He took the same path some time later, probably realizing he had nothing to do here.

“I believe my squire is in love,” said Tyrion.

“There’s nothing wrong with that. I am in love me too,” Sansa said.

Tyrion smiled fondly at her. There had been a time when he didn’t seem sure that she loved him after their first real night together, but now she was sure he believed her. “I just pity all the women who will never get to know Podrick’s talents.” Tyrion took a sausage with his fork as he said that.

“Is Bronn still trying to get some answers out of him?” Ser Bronn of Blackwater had come back last week from his mission in King’s Landing. The mission had been a success.

“Yes, he is. But Podrick doesn’t seem about to speak about it. I’m afraid Bronn will have to wait before he knows how to leave a brothel without paying.”

“I thought he was married.”

“That won’t stop him. You don’t know Bronn well if you think a marriage will make of him a respectful man. He is a sellsword, and he will always be a sellsword. Even he won’t deny it. A marriage won’t put an end to his wanders into whorehouses.”

“That put an end to yours,” Sansa pointed out.

“Yes. But luckily for you, I’m not like Bronn.” He said it on a mourning tone.

“You’re not like any man.”

Podrick and Willia had put an extra share of food for Sansa. She engulfed it all. She went to bed not long after dinner was over. Night was already falling. Days grew shorter. Willia helped her to change into nightclothes, but in the end, when she had left, Sansa removed them as well. She didn’t find it cold enough yet to sleep with them, and she wasn’t sick anymore, only pregnant. She got under the furs. She really felt tired, though she hadn’t done much today. It seemed she had another symptom of pregnancy.

She didn’t fall asleep however. She looked at her husband. Tyrion hadn’t joined her in their bed. Instead, he worked. Like in Casterly Rock, he always went to sleep after her. Only this time, he wasn’t confined in a solar or separated from her by floors, not even by a door. They were always in the same tent. Sansa contemplated him. Back at the beginning of their marriage, she hadn’t wanted to see anything good in him. She even hated him in some way because she had to marry him, even if they were both forced to marry. She hadn’t wanted to consider the good sides of her marriage. At the time, this marriage only meant another prison. A different kind of prison, like Tyrion had told her. Then she had begun to enjoy her time with Tyrion after she understood he would never hurt her and he wouldn’t consummate their marriage as long as she didn’t want, until the Red Wedding happened. She had needed his arrest afterwards to realize how Tyrion had been good to her, and how a good husband he would be. She needed more time to love him, and even more before she accepted him into her bed as a husband. Now, Sansa couldn’t imagine her life without him. She watched him reading scrolls and studying maps. From time to time, he raised his eyes to her, she smiled at him and he smiled in return before he went back to the map, but it was obvious he couldn’t focus on it. Finally, he gave up.

“How am I supposed to stand here planning a war while I know that you’re right before me, naked under the furs?”

“Do you want me to remove them?” she asked playfully.

Tyrion chuckled. “My mind commands me to say no, but there are other parts of my body who wouldn’t agree.”

They kept looking at each other for a long time, then Tyrion came next to her, standing by the bed, and began to caress her cheek, removing a lock of hair there and there. She loved his eyes, and his face. Again, she could only think that Margaery was right when she said Tyrion was rather good-looking, especially with his scar. In her actual position, she couldn’t see he was short of legs and arms. She could have been on a high raised bed and he could have been of normal height as far as she knew.
“Can you leave the war for one night?” she asked him.

“For you, yes, I can.”

He kissed her, slowly, tenderly, almost timidly, then more deeply as she took his face between her hands. His hand went down to her chin, her neck, and lower. Soon he was climbing into bed with her, and Sansa was removing his clothes. Some time later, she was lying over him, her head right under his own on his chest, his hand stroking her hair and massaging her shoulders. However, she felt a thin, almost imperceptible shaking in his body as his fingers wandered on her bare skin. After so many nights with her body pressed against his, she could feel many things unusual about him that no one else would be able to detect.

“What is it, Tyrion? You’re nervous.”

Tyrion took a deep breath. “Yes, I’m nervous. I’m afraid.”

“What are you afraid of?”

Tyrion needed some time before he spoke. “I’m afraid for our child. I mean… I’m a dwarf.”

Sansa understood what he meant. “I will love him, no matter how he or she is.”

“I know that. I don’t doubt it. That’s not what I’m afraid of. I don’t want someone else to go through everything I went through.”

Sansa rose her head to lean over him, looking deeply into his eyes. “I won’t allow that to happen. We won’t allow that.”

Then Sansa kissed him and they started all over again. All her worries, her doubts, her sorrows were forgotten in these moments. There was only her and Tyrion, and no one else. Everything around her didn’t matter anymore. Her world was limited to her husband and the bed they shared. When they were done, Sansa rested her head again on Tyrion’s chest, panting and sweating. Her eyes were closed and she could listen to the beating of his heart in her right ear. He was breathing heavily as well, his hands tangled into her hair, unmoving. Everything seemed right for the moment and Sansa wanted to enjoy this moment of joy as long as she could.

She felt a current of cold air on her back. It had started before she and Tyrion were done, but she hadn’t taken care of it. Was the flap of the tent opened? Sansa didn’t want to care about that. Couldn’t she enjoy a night without problems with the man she loved? All the same, she lazily opened her eyes to see if a sudden gust of wind had opened the flap. It was quite dark in the tent and the candles were burning out, but there was still some faint light left. It took some time for Sansa to realize it in her dozing state, but there was someone else in their tent.

She almost had an heart attack. Someone was standing right next to their bed with a spear, looking at them with a strange expression. Sansa thought it was revulsion. She sat quickly in the bed.

“Who are you? What are you doing here?” she asked loudly.

“What is it?” Tyrion straightened to sit as well, then noticed the intruder. “BRONN!”

His shout was immediately followed by a scream from the intruder. He charged with his spear. Instinctively, Sansa moved to be right before Tyrion, and he happened to be the one the intruder was targeting. The spear penetrated her shoulder. A strong pain spurted from her left shoulder and she screamed. She heard footsteps and yelling, then she looked at the intruder. He was staring in shock. She noticed his eyes. She knew them. As the pain overcame everything else, all Sansa could perceive was Tyrion screaming her name and the grey eyes of the intruder. She knew these eyes.

Chapter End Notes

Sorry for the cliffhanger again, but I love to make them too much.

The passage of Tyrion and Sansa together during the night is mostly inspired by the scene between Robb and Talisa on their way to the Twins before the Red Wedding. This chapter was to show the situation of the army at Moat Cailin, to have Mira beginning to get more involved in the North, and it brought some action too at the end.

Some might find that things are going too well for the army in the Neck. A great army, stuck between swamps on a thin road for three months, and there wasn't a mutiny yet, they only lost a few men each day, and they are well provided? I admit it doesn't look very realistic, but when I realized it I was already too far gone into the siege of Moat Cailin and I couldn't change it without writing again many chapters. Furthermore, the good situation of the army supplies can be explained by the food they bring from the Reach (untouched by the war) thanks to the presence of the Hightowers, from the Twins (the Frey lands weren't too much affected by the war and are very close) and from the Westerlands (Robb plundered them in Season 2, but he stopped at Lannisport in the books, so the southern part of the Westerlands weren't touched by the war and can still produce something). The lack of sickness can also be explained by the weather. The army is stuck in the Neck in a time of the year where it's quite cold, but not too much. It's still autumn, and not winter. The soldier's clothes are still warm enough, and insects are less active than in summer. So, ironically, invading the North with winter coming is risky, but if your army is to be stuck in the Neck, then better to be stuck there during autumn than during winter or summer.

Please review

Next chapter: I leave it to your speculations (I'm quite eager to have you read it)
For all those who said that it was Arya in the comments in the previous chapter, you were right. It was Arya. Sorry I didn't confirm it, despite the fact it almost jumped to the eyes of many, but I had to keep some uncertainty. Now, we get Arya's thoughts on the situation, and a proper reunion between the Stark girls.

It was raining. Not that Arya complained about that. She was past caring about things as natural as rain. What bothered her the most was her cell, or more precisely her cage. She was imprisoned with nine other crannogmen, including Lord Fenn. They were all kept in the same iron cage, exposed to the elements of the nature and the weather, rain falling heavily on them. They weren’t so bothered by that. The crannogmen were used to live in very rudimentary ways among the swamps of the Neck, and Arya had seen worse. The actual situation was much better than the one she was in at Harrenhal. At least, they weren’t tortured. What bothered the most was they could barely move in it.

Arya had spent the last months among the crannogmen, mostly around Greywater Watch. She had liked her time there. She could always find something to do. Lord Reed and the other crannogmen had taught her how to hunt and fish in their own way, and Arya had liked that. Lord Reed himself was surprised that she loved to live in the Neck so much. Sansa would have hated that in her stead.

Thinking about her sister, another wave of rage went through Arya’s mind. They had planned everything so well. A little more than two months ago, a few people hunting close to Moat Cailin had warned Lord Reed that Northerners had gathered and occupied the fortress. About the same time, other hunters in the southern swamps had informed them that a great army was following the Kingsroad in the direction of the North. There were banners of House Lannister and House Frey in this army. The golden lion rode alongside the twin towers. They were attacking the North. Arya had wanted to go immediately on the Kingsroad and use her new knowledge of the environment of the Neck to kill as many Lannisters as she could. Lord Reed, however, had forbidden her to do so, but he had allowed her to follow groups of crannogmen in charge of watching the progressing army.

Without any surprise, the army of the Freys and the Lannisters had been blocked on their way to the North when they reached Moat Cailin. Two attacks on the ruined castle failed. In the two months that followed, they kept watching the army camp that stretched on leagues and leagues along the Kingsroad. Not long after the Lannisters and the Freys had arrived, another army had joined them. An army with the sigil of a tower with fire at the top of it. Arya remembered this sigil for being the one of House Hightower. What was very strange however was that there were banners from the other houses of the Riverlands, and what almost paralyzed Arya was that the sigil of House Tully, her mother’s family, was among them. She could understand that the Freys and the Lannisters could invade the North. They probably turned against the Boltons in the end. She could even understand that the Hightowers had joined them. After all, House Hightower was sworn to House Tyrell, and the Tyrells were allies to the Lannisters. But the other river lords, and especially House Tully? She However, all that had been nothing to the shock Arya had when she had seen her sister. It had taken three weeks for that, but she had seen her in the end, and not in a situation Sansa would have liked to be found. She was vomiting. Arya laughed when she saw her, but she laughed and cried at the same time. Her sister was alive. She was taller than the last time she saw her, looking more like their mother. Arya also noticed, not without a hint of jealousy, that Sansa had grown more beautiful. She was a woman now. Despite the fact Arya had been happy to see her sister alive and well, there had been a bitter aftertaste to this discovery. Sansa was wearing a red gown with golden lines, the colors of House Lannister. One day, looking very closely to her, Arya had even distinguished a golden necklace. Arya had also seen the Imp, impossible to miss. He hadn’t changed much since the time she saw him at Winterfell, except for the fact he had now a huge scar crossing his face. She also saw Freys, almost impossible to miss as well. She had wanted nothing more but to go right now and take her sister away. She may complain about the poor lifestyle at Greywater Watch, but it didn’t matter. It would be better than living among Lannisters and Freys. Unfortunately, the other crannogmen had stopped her from doing so. She wouldn’t be able to take her sister away from the Lannisters by herself. They needed a plan, and Arya had to agree with them.

They had reported all their observations to Howland Reed. One day, Arya had gone back to Greywater Watch to tell Lord Reed about her sister and that they had to rescue her. Lord Reed had agreed, but also informed her that the Boltons had been declared enemies of the Crown. Sansa was now officially the Wardeness of the North. Arya had found it strange that the Lannisters had made her sister the Lady of Winterfell, but after her discussion with Howland Reed, she had understood why. Sansa was married to the Imp. By declaring her the Wardeness of the North, they wanted the children Sansa would have with Lord Tyrion to rule the North one day. The thought of Sansa having children with Tyrion Lannister disgusted Arya. She also learned at the same time that there had been a battle near Winterfell between Stannis Baratheon and the forces of House Bolton, and that Lord Stannis’s army had been defeated. Stannis Baratheon was dead as well.

The Lord of Greywater Watch agreed that they had to save Sansa, but they needed a few more weeks to put the plan into practice. They watched the routine of the guards, took note of the position of all patrols and the tent where Sansa was living, and prepared a rescue on night. Arya used all these weeks to notice all the little details about the camp, day and night. She followed Sansa almost everywhere she went. She spent most of her time in her tent. Another thing that disgusted Arya was that her sister seemed to live in the same tent than the Imp. She saw Sansa walk and talk with him a few times. Even worse, she saw her sister smile and even laugh with him. There were a few Freys that Arya saw discussing with Sansa as well, and she witnessed her sister smiling at them a few times. There was also a young girl with black hair who had to be around Sansa’s age who spent a lot of time with her. Arya had never seen her before, but Sansa seemed to be very fond of her. Arya also saw Thoros of Myr and Beric Dondarrion once. She never saw so many people on her list together in the same place.

Seeing Sansa with the Imp remembered Arya of what Littlefinger told her at the Eyrie. Was it true after all? Was Sansa really happy with the Imp? Did she really like to be a Lannister? She seemed to, by the way she behaved with her husband and the other Lannister commanders. One night, there had even been something that looked like a feast and Arya had heard toasts made for her sister. All that unnerved Arya. She only wanted to go into that damn camp, get her sister out and she would never be again close to a Lannister. Arya already enjoyed how Sansa would complain about everything at Greywater Watch.

Finally, three days ago, Arya and a group of twenty crannogmen had infiltrated the Lannister camp at night, while most of the people were asleep or drunk. They had killed the few guards on their way to the tent, and those guarding it. According to the plan, Arya was the one to enter the tent alone.
They thought she would have more success in convincing Sansa to follow them. However, when she had entered, she heard strange noises. There was a screen, and the sounds came from the other side of it. Arya had gotten around the screen and seen the last thing she expected. The scene before her was... indescribable. Sansa had shouted a muffled scream the moment she had come in, and afterwards her sister had laid on the Imp. They were both naked. Arya had been paralyzed by the shock caused by the scene. Neither Sansa nor the Imp had noticed her presence. In the end, she had managed to approach closer until she stood only a few feet from the bed, still recovering from her shock. That was when Sansa had noticed her presence. She hadn’t recognized her. Arya wasn’t surprised when she thought about it. She was unrecognizable in her crannogman’s clothes and with her short hair. Anyway, Sansa was always only concerned by Arya because she was her sister and no more. She wouldn’t have even noticed Arya if they didn’t have the same parents. The Imp had shouted for help when he had realized she was there. Finally leaving her trance, Arya had acted and threw her spear in the direction of the Imp. However, Sansa had moved before him and the spear had thrusted into her shoulder. Again, Arya had been stunned. She had just pierced her sister with her weapon. She hadn’t been able to react in time when guards had penetrated the tent and seized her.

Now here she was, with half the people sent to save Sansa The operation had been a disaster. They had failed miserably. Of the ten who were not arrested, two or three managed to escape, but the others were killed. Most of those who were in the cage with her were wounded, some very badly. The maesters had tended to their injuries, but Arya wasn’t sure they would all survive. She found it a great change in comparison to the treatment she had at Harrenhal, but she wasn’t much happy all the same. She had been captured by the Lannisters again. With some luck, they wouldn’t recognize her, but even then Arya doubted that would help her. She had tried to kill their lord. The punishment for such a crime was death. Arya was angry. Why didn’t Sansa let her kill the Imp? They could have escaped afterwards. Though now that she thought about it, Arya wasn’t sure they could have escaped. The crannogmen had been noticed before the Imp ever screamed for his men. Some other patrol or man wandering by luck had probably found one of the guards they killed. Arya had lost time because of her utter surprise when she had found Sansa. If she had acted immediately, they might have gotten a chance to get away with Sansa and they could all be safe right now.

Arya was angry after herself. She shouldn’t have lost time when she found Sansa. However, she was even more angry at Sansa. She was angry at her for not recognizing her sister, and for getting in the way when she tried to deal with the Imp. She was even more angry at Sansa for something Arya hoped that wasn’t true. Arya was afraid Littlefinger had been right when he said Sansa had wanted to marry Tyrion Lannister. She remembered how she behaved with him while Arya spied on them with the other crannogmen. That wasn’t the behavior of a prisoner, far from it. She even seemed to like the Freys. Arya’s sister had betrayed her.

Arya hoped that wasn’t the truth, that there was something else to explain this, and yet that was the only plausible explanation she could find. She was also furious because she had attacked Sansa. That wasn’t like one of their stupid quarrels. These were funny, at least for Arya. This time, Arya was afraid she may have killed her sister. She had seen the blood spurting out of her shoulder after she thrust the spear into it. Was Sansa dead? She had tried to ask the guards, but they wouldn’t give her an answer. In the end, she had stopped. Maybe they didn’t know yet that she was Arya Stark, and she didn’t want to give away her identity.

Arya saw a man approaching from afar. She knew who he was. His name was Bronn. He was a knight and one of the men who had arrested her the night she had tried to save Sansa. He seemed to be high ranked in the Lannister army. Arya wasn’t sure if she hated him. He didn’t look like one of these so called honorable knights they saw in King’s Landing, but he wasn’t Rorge or Armory Lorch or Gregor Clegane either. He even seemed kind in his own way and was always joking around. However, she wouldn’t like him either. He worked for the Lannisters.
He ordered the guards to open the door of the cage for him and stepped inside, looking at them one by one. “Sorry if the accommodations are not to your taste, lads. But I’m sure you understand. If that was Tywin Lannister’s wife you had tried to kill, you wouldn’t even be alive, so consider yourself lucky that he’s dead.” He grinned as he said that. Bronn looked at her and made a movement with his chin in her direction. “You. Follow me.”

Arya had a hard time getting on her feet. She almost hadn’t moved for three days and her legs were rusty. She also had shackles to her ankles and her wrists. Her back was sore as well. They walked in silence to the tent Arya recognized to be the one where Sansa and her husband were sleeping. They entered and found the Imp pacing the room. He turned to look at her as soon as she was inside and eyed her for a moment.

“Last time we saw each other was at Winterfell, isn’t it? You asked me if I really was an imp. Do you remember what I answered?”

He knew who she was. Unless he only suspected and was trying to be certain about it. Should Arya lie? He would probably find out sooner or later, and she didn’t see any chance for her to escape right now. Three days of reflection had been no help.

“You told me you walked on rainbows and carried sacks of gold to Casterly Rock.” She told him what she remembered.

The Imp had been grinning back when he told her that, but now he wasn’t. Strangely, his stare remembered Arya of the way Tywin Lannister stared at his own men. “I didn’t believe Sansa when she told me the first times. I thought she was raving. She wasn’t very lucid these last days, but she seemed better this morning and she still believed it was you. Now I see she was right. You grew up, you changed your clothes and the way you arrange your hair, and you are unwashed, but it’s you. Arya Stark. Second daughter to Eddard and Catelyn Stark.” He let a pause follow his statement. “I suppose I should be happy about your presence here. We thought you were at Winterfell in the hands of a torturer, but you happen to be here, in the Neck. If your reunion with Sansa had happened differently, I would be very happy.”

Again, Arya saw the same icy stare Tywin Lannister had at Harrenhal. She wasn’t moved by this. She was used to it. “Where is Sansa? How is she?”

“She will survive, but she is in quite a bad state. Are you happy about it?”

“Happy?” Why would he think she was happy?

“Yes. You tried to kill her. I thought you would be sad to learn she survived.”

Arya’s fury flared. “I didn’t want to kill her. I didn’t do it on purpose.”

“Well, you planted a spear through her. For me, this is an attempt of murder.”

“I was trying to kill you.” She had nothing to hide. He knew who she was, and what she had done. Better to shout at him before he killed her. She wished she could kill him right now, but he stayed away from her at a respectful distance and he had his man, Bronn, very close to her.

“Me? Why? Why did you want to kill me?”

Arya scoffed. “You killed my father, my mother, my brothers, you burned my home, you tortured my friends and you forced my sister to marry you. And you… You… You forced yourself upon her.”
Arya wasn’t stupid. She knew what her sister and the Imp were doing when she found them. Tyrion Lannister listened to her in silence, then let the silence linger between them before he spoke.

“It seems I’ve been a very busy man. First, I want to precise one thing, Lady Arya.”

“I’m not a lady!”

“As you wish. First, I want to precise one thing, Arya. When a man forces himself on a woman, he is usually on the top of her. Since you surprised me and your sister in the act, I’m sure you noticed she was the one on top. So you should know that I didn’t force myself upon her. But I will answer to all your accusations. I didn’t kill your father. I wasn’t even in King’s Landing when this happened. I was in the Vale because your mother believed a brothelkeeper when he told her I had tried to have your brother Bran killed. I was the one to be almost killed because your aunt accused me as well to have killed her husband, and I was almost thrown through the Moon Door because of that, on no evidence. If you want to blame someone for your father’s death, blame Joffrey and my sister. I wasn’t there to save your father and to stop Joffrey because your mother had arrested me with no reason. I didn’t kill your mother either. I had no part in the Red Wedding and I knew about it only after it happened. My father and Walder Frey are the ones you should blame for that. They are also to be blamed for the death of your brother Robb. As for Bran and Rickon, and for the destruction of Winterfell, Theon Greyjoy is the one who did this, and I hate him as much as you do. I never tortured anyone in my life, so I doubt that I ever tortured any of your friends. And I never forced your sister to marry me. In fact, we were both forced to marry each other by my own father, and I never mistreated Sansa. I was among the very few in King’s Landing who tried to protect her in fact, and she may be dead right now if I hadn’t been here, just like your father is dead.”

Arya hadn’t meant that he was the one to kill all her family himself. “That wasn’t what I meant. I mean that you all did this. The Lannisters. You destroyed my family, and you made Sansa one of you.”

There was something that passed on the Imp’s face for a moment. A shadow of a doubt, or of regret, Arya wasn’t sure, but it disappeared as soon as it appeared. “I never made Sansa a Lannister. I didn’t consummate the marriage on our wedding night. I let her choose the moment we would share the same bed, even if that moment would be never. After my father died, I offered her to annul our marriage, and she refused. She chose to remain my wife. I’m happy she did, but I didn’t force her to be my wife. Everything that happened between us, that was her choice, or at least she agreed to it. You blame me for the actions my family did. Do you know what is my family for me, Arya? I am a dwarf. My mother died the day I was born. For that, my father and my sister hated me for all my life. They both tried to have me killed more than once. When I was sixteen, my father put me in charge of the drains and cisterns of Casterly Rock to humiliate me. Not long after, I married a woman I loved, and because she was lowborn, my father had her raped by his guards right before me and cancelled our marriage. He put me in the vanguard at the Battle of the Green Fork in the hope that I would die. When he returned to King’s Landing, he forced me to marry your sister, and not long after, he had her family slaughtered at a wedding. And the best thing he found to tell me after was that I should rape your sister to get a son from her and that he wanted to throw me into the sea the day I was born. When he died, my sister accused me of killing him without proof and tried to have me executed. When the trial decided that I was innocent, she had an assassin try to kill me. Before that, she had a kingsguard try to kill me as well, in the middle of the Battle of Blackwater. THAT is my family. My father, my sister and Joffrey all hated me, and they were the ones to slaughter your family. Do you know that Joffrey wanted to serve your brother’s head on a plate to Sansa after the Red Wedding? I opposed that, and it was used against me at my trial later. I was the only one to try to make peace with your family, and I even tried to send your sister back to her mother during the war. I’m guilty of being a dwarf. I’m guilty of whoring, of drinking, of gambling, I even had people killed, but I didn’t take part in the destruction of your family. Your father was good and honorable and he tried to do his best for the good of the Realm, and there aren’t many men like that today. I admired your mother, even if she wanted to have me executed. She was a strong woman, and she was fierce when it came to protect her children. I didn’t know your brother Robb. He seemed to be a good man, and honorable just like your father, but I didn’t know him. Your brother Bran was a sweet boy who was unfairly crippled. I gave him the plans of a special saddle so he could ride again when I passed by Winterfell on my way back from the Wall. I didn’t see much of your brother Rickon, but he seemed like a nice boy too and I had no wish to see him dead. And I liked your brother Jon Snow. He is bastard, and all dwarves are bastards in their father’s eyes. I helped him at the Wall. He is good lad. And I love your sister. I have protected her from Joffrey’s and my sister’s cruelty from the day I arrived in King’s Landing. I stood up for her against my own blood, against my own interest, without anything to gain from it. When I was forced to marry her, I let her remain a virgin even if I had every right to take her and even if my father was pressuring me to get a son from her. I put myself in danger for her, even before my father was thinking about marrying us. I have protected her, I love her, and I will protect her and love her until the day I die. If you want to blame someone for the death of your family, blame Joffrey, my father, my sister, even my brother if you want, but leave me out of it.”

Arya was speechless after this long tirade. Tyrion Lannister had gotten closer to her while he spoke. If she had wanted, she could have killed him right now by strangling him with her shackles, but something told her to not do this. Lord Tyrion wasn’t over.

“I almost gave up everything for your sister. I risked my life, what little good reputation I had, even my father threatened me to send men in our rooms to force us to make a child if I didn’t do it myself. It’s a chance he died of a heart attack the night before he was supposed to execute his threat. I have brought my army here, in the Neck, when winter is almost there, risking the life of thousands of people if not more, to save you from a psychopath and a sadist, because you were Sansa’s sister. And you come into our tent, try to kill me, and almost kill the woman I love, your own sister. After that, you blame me for everything that happened to your family, like if I was the one to stab your brother in the heart or to burn your two little brothers alive. I’m tired of this. Taking the blame for everything the others do because I’m a dwarf.”

The Imp stared at her for a time, then he sighed and looked on the ground before he looked at her again. He seemed more calm when he spoke again. “Sansa wants to see you. That’s why I had you brought here. Bronn will escort you to the tent where she’s being taken care of. He will ensure your safety, but I warn you. If you try anything on Sansa, I’ll have you killed without any hesitation. I didn’t allow Joffrey, or Cersei, or my father, or anyone else to mistreat her, and I will not allow you to hurt her either because she’s your sister. Now go.”

Arya could tell by his face that he was serious. If she tried anything on Sansa, he would have her killed. She wouldn’t try to kill her of course. Sansa was her sister after all. But Lord Tyrion made it clear that he would execute anyone who would try to hurt Sansa. Bronn led her outside the tent and they walked away. It was still raining and the sky was grey like a stone. On their way, the Imp’s man talked to her.

“You know, these men you and your lot killed the other night, some of them were my men. Some of my best.” Another one who would complain to her. “I’m impressed. You did a good job.”

“What?” asked Arya, bewildered.

“I can only be impressed. You see, I choose my men according to their talents, not because of some title or name they have. These men were hard to kill, but you killed them all the same. I wouldn’t want you as my enemy.”
“What if I am?”

“Then I shall watch my back very carefully. Or I could try to hire you.” He said all of it while grinning.

“I just killed some of your men, and you would be ready to have me work for you?”

“I want the best under my orders. If someone manages to kill my best men, the better to have him, or her, with me than against me.”

“I’m a girl.”

“So what? We have a woman here. A woman warrior. She’s quite good at fighting. She beats most of the men. Though she may be too honorable. All the same, she’s better than most of the men, including mine. If a girl is better at killing or fighting than a man, then I’ll hire the girl. But I doubt you want me to hire you.”

“No.” She hated him.

“Alright. Then I’ll watch my back closely.”

They arrived before another red tent, and there a surprise was waiting for Arya. The surprise was about six feet tall, with blond hair, broad and muscled shoulders, a flat chest, strong arms, a square face with hard traits, all clad in armor from head to toe, a sword at her belt, her hand resting on the pommel. It was a woman, everyone could say that, but dressed like a knight, guarding the entrance of the tent.

“I told you about a woman warrior,” said Bronn. “There she is. Brienne of Tarth. Also called Brienne the Beauty, the Kingslayer’s whore, or wench for the most intimate people.”

“I’m not a wench, Ser Bronn,” the woman answered hardly. Arya agreed with her.

“Alright, my lady.” The man who was supposed to be a knight raised his hands in the air in an appeasing gesture, but he kept grinning all the same. “I brought the girl our lady asked for. You want me to go inside with her while you stand guard outside, or we do the other way around?”

“The other way,” the woman answered coldly. She looked at Arya and her face softened. She looked for a very long time. “Come in.”

Brienne of Tarth pointed the flap of the tent with her chin. Hesitating a moment, Arya decided to go inside. If this was a trap, there was no way for her to escape. Bronn and Brienne were both obviously trained warriors and she had no chance to get away with her shackles. She stepped forward and entered the red tent.

Sansa was sitting in a heavily cushioned chair, her eyes half closed, looking away to one side of the tent. Brienne was behind Arya and followed her inside. Sansa looked at them. Slowly, her face lightened and she seemed to recognize the intruders. Arya’s sister was wearing a blue gown this time, something Arya preferred very much to the red ones she saw her wearing most of the time since she arrived in the Neck. She could see bandages where her gown wasn’t covering her skin on her left shoulder and her red hair were falling on her shoulders. Sansa stood up from her chair, slowly, wincing in the process, but her blue eyes, the same eyes than their mother, were shining. She advanced slowly towards Arya. The youngest of the Stark sisters didn’t know what to do. How would Sansa react to her presence? She had almost killed her. Arya felt guilty for almost killing her sister, who was among the few members of her family still alive. Sansa stopped close to her. Arya had grown up since the last time they met, but Sansa had too and she was quite taller than her. A huge smile appeared on her lips.

“Arya?” Sansa’s voice was hoarse, tired.

“Arya,” replied Arya, a smile coming at her face too. Despite the circumstances, she was happy to see her sister. How long since they last saw each other?

Sansa’s own smile only widened even more. Slowly, she closed the few steps separating them and hugged Arya. They both cried in each other’s shoulder. Sansa was her sister. She didn’t hate her. Not really. They couldn’t support each other back at Winterfell, but they were family. Almost all that was left of their family.

They broke their embrace. Sansa had tears in her eyes. Arya looked at her shoulder. “Does it hurt?” she asked.

Sansa looked at her left shoulder and winced again. “Yes, but I’m no longer in danger. The maester says that I’m safe. And the baby too.”

Arya didn’t understand for a moment, and then her eyes widened as she understood what Sansa just said. “The baby?”

“Yes. I’m pregnant. I’m with child.”

Sansa had a timid smile on her lips. Arya had thought about many possible scenarios for the time she would be reunited with her sister, but Sansa being pregnant had not been one of them. If she was pregnant… Arya remembered how she found Sansa with the Imp.

“How?” she asked.

Sansa seemed taken aback by the question, and uneasy as well. She looked at Brienne. Arya followed her eyes, and the woman warrior looked uneasy like her sister. Arya stared back at Sansa.

“Well, the same way Father and Mother made us,” Sansa answered, still seeming uncertain.

“The Imp? He’s the father?” Arya was thunderstruck, and as if to mark the moment, they heard thunder far away.

“Yes. Tyrion is the father.” Arya had a hard time to assimilate the information she just received, and the memory of what she witnessed the other night didn’t make her feel better. “I know it’s a lot to take,” tried to explain Sansa. “But Arya, I would like you to not try to kill him again.”

“Why?” Arya was outraged. “He’s a Lannister. The Lannisters murdered our family. Father, Mother, Robb.”

“Please, Arya. Tyrion was not the one behind all of this. He took no part in their deaths. And the Lannisters are not all monsters. I met the other ones at Casterly Rock. Most of them are no worse than you and me. Only Lord Tywin, Cersei and Joffrey are really monsters, and they’re the ones who killed our family. Tyrion is different. I love him.”

Arya didn’t think she could trust her sister then. Sansa had been in love with Joffrey once, even after he killed Mycah and that she saw he was a coward and a monster, but because he was a prince, Sansa had continued to love him.
“You once loved Joffrey too,” Arya commented.

Sansa sighed and slowly went to sit back into her chair. “Arya, please sit. I have a lot of things to tell you.” Arya came to sit not far away from Sansa, her shackles and chains clicking as she walked. “Do they hurt?”

“I’ve seen worse,” Arya commented darkly as she sat.

“Brienne, go find the guards and take the keys to remove these things.”

“My lady, Lord Tyrion forbade to remove them,” argued the woman called Brienne.

“If he complains about that, he will complain to me. You are in my service, Lady Brienne. Not Tyrion’s. I’ll take the blame for everything that will happen.”

The tall woman finally bowed and left. Arya looked at Sansa. “The Imp ordered you to keep me in chains?” she asked.

“Don’t blame him too much, Arya. You threw a spear through me. I was half conscious for the last days, and the maesters weren’t sure if I would survive. I could have died, and the baby too. He only wants to protect me.”

“I didn’t want to hurt you. I wanted to kill him. To save you.”

“I don’t need to be saved, Arya. I’m safe with Tyrion.”

Sansa started to tell her tale of all the events that had happened after their father died. While she spoke, Brienne came back with the keys and released Arya from her chains. Arya sighed in relief as she felt the heavy shackles leave her wrists and her ankles. Sansa told her the horrible things she endured because of Joffrey. The kingsguards hitting her, the threats, the way she was forced to look at their father’s head on a spike, the beating in public, the insults. Arya regretted she wasn’t the one to kill Joffrey more than ever. She told Arya that only very few people tried to help her, and Tyrion and had been one of them. He had apologized for their father’s death, rescued her when Joffrey had ordered her stripped of her clothes and beaten naked before the court, put people in her service to watch out for her. He had been forced to marry her and never forced himself upon her. She remained a virgin during their wedding night, and he was among the few to try to console her after the Red Wedding. When Tywin Lannister died, he was accused of murdering him by his sister, Cersei. Sansa had organized his defense and saved him, but he was almost killed by one of Cersei’s men. Tyrion later forced Joffrey to acknowledge her as Lady of Winterfell and Casterly Rock, and they left the capital not long after Joffrey died. At Casterly Rock, Sansa had met the other members of House Lannister. Some were arrogant, but they treated her very well and even helped her. Sansa also told her about the secret pact Tyrion made with their mother to return both Arya and Sansa to their family for his brother, and the role Brienne had played in that. The Lannisters hated the Ironborn, the Boltons and the Freys just like them. Then they had received information that Arya was at Winterfell, a prisoner of the Boltons, and Tyrion had called the banners to rescue her.

When she had finished, Sansa asked her a question. “How did you manage to escape Winterfell?”

Arya had to correct her sister’s story. “I never escaped Winterfell, Sansa. I haven’t seen it since we left with Father. I spent the last few months at Greywater Watch, with Howland Reed and the crannogmen.”

Sansa’s face showed utter surprise. “I don’t understand. Tyrion’s men in the North told us you were there. That you married Ramsay Bolton.”
“Not at all! It was Littlefinger who wanted me to marry him. That’s why I left him when we were at Moat Cailin.”

A thick silence followed. Arya witnessed the eyes of her sister burning with fury. “Littlefinger?”

“Yes. He tried to bring me to Winterfell to marry Roose Bolton’s son, but I escaped and went to Howland Reed. He was Father’s friend.”

Another long moment of silence followed. “Arya, tell me what happened. Everything that happened since Father died.”

Arya did as Sansa had done a few moments ago and told her all that happened to her since that horrible day in King’s Landing. Sansa almost laughed when Arya told her she had been Tywin Lannister’s cupbearer at Harrenhal, but she didn’t seem to believe her when Arya said they were helped by a man who could change his face. Sansa was already aware of her time with the Brotherhood Without Banners. Beric Dondarrion and Thoros of Myr had told her. Sansa was horrified when she described the events at the Red Wedding, and seemed about to cry when she told her how the Hound died. But all this was replaced by fury and anger when she told what Baelish had done. Sansa didn’t seem particularly outraged, only surprised, when Arya told her about their aunt’s death. Both of them didn’t seem to like their aunt Lysa very much. However, Sansa looked as if she wanted to assassinate Littlefinger.

“This man! That’s not enough for him! After everything he did. Does he want to have all of us dead?”

“He betrayed Father. He sold him to Cersei. The Hound told me,” Arya informed her.

“I know. Tyrion told me too. But that’s not all he did. He lied to our mother. You probably don’t know, Arya, but someone tried to kill Bran not long after we left Winterfell.”

“What?!”

“It was Joffrey. He paid someone to kill Bran for some petty reason and gave him a costly dagger that belonged to King Robert. When Mother tried to discover to who belonged the knife, Littlefinger told her it was Tyrion’s. She arrested him because of that, and that started the war between the Lannisters and the Starks. He tried to kidnap me at least twice, and I think he had a hand in Joffrey’s murder as well. And now this! He tried to sell you to the Boltons.”

Arya was furious as well before these revelations. “I should have killed him when I could. We must do something about him.”

“Yes, we will. Don’t worry. Tyrion and I decided a long time ago we would deal with him one day. Tyrion spent weeks in the sky cells because of this man.” Strangely, Arya found herself sympathizing with her brother-in-law. She knew what the sky cells were like, and if Sansa was telling the truth, then Littlefinger was their real enemy.

“What should we do then?” Arya asked to her sister. They had a common goal.

“For now, there isn’t much we can do. We have to take back Winterfell from the Boltons first. And after that… We must go and meet Jon. He’s Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch now. We will have to see him once we have dealt with the Boltons. There is… something beyond the Wall. Something dangerous. We may not be able to leave the North before long.”

Arya didn’t understand what Sansa meant, but she was ready to fight the Boltons and to kill Roose Bolton. He had killed their brother. They would deal with Littlefinger later. For once in her life, Arya thought she and Sansa understood each other.

“I’m sorry, Sansa. I didn’t want to hurt you, and… I didn’t know the Imp helped you.”

Sansa smiled sadly. “That’s alright. No one is dead. Just don’t try to kill him or me again in the future.” They both giggled a little. “I had a pavilion arranged for you. You won’t miss anything. However, we cannot tell everyone you are here yet. Only me, Tyrion, Brienne and a few other people know about your presence.”

“What about the crannogmen? The people who were with me?” Arya was glad she wouldn’t have to sleep outside anymore, but she didn’t want her friends to stay outside like this.

“I’ll speak with Tyrion and see what we can do. They killed some of his men, so that won’t be easy to make things better for them.”

Arya protested. “They were trying to help you.”

“I know, but they killed some of his men. I’ll do my best. Tyrion will listen to me. He’s not like his father.”

“Sansa, do you really trust him? And… love him?” Arya till had a hard time believing this. Her sister who always dreamed of marrying a prince or a handsome knight, in love with the Imp?

“Yes, I do.” In a strange way, the expression on Sansa’s face reminded Arya of the expression their mother had once when she was talking about their father. “He really wants to help us, Arya. He brought his army here to save you, and to give back Winterfell to us. He already gave back the Riverlands to our uncle Edmure, and he executed the Freys who murdered Robb and his wife, and a few others too. He regrets what his family did and he’s trying to make amends now.”

Arya wasn’t sure if she could really trust the Imp. He was a Lannister after all, and even if Sansa was in love with him, her sister hadn’t proved to love the right people in the past. However, Sansa didn’t seem to be stupid like she was when they left Winterfell. She hated the same people (or almost the same people) that Arya hated, and she wasn’t complaining anymore about stupid things.

“Tyrion is the first person I met who didn’t look at me like a frightened child dreaming of charming princes and knights in shining armor. Though we both know that’s who I was before.” Sansa seemed to read Arya’s mind. She had a smile as she said the last sentence and they both slowly burst into laughs. Her sister took back a serious expression after some time. “I’m sorry about how awful I’ve been with you, Arya. You were right about Joffrey. I was stupid to love him. I needed Father’s death to realize who he really was. If I had been clever like you, perhaps he would still be alive.”

That was the first time Sansa apologized to her. Arya got on her feet and hugged her sister. She was careful to put her head on her right shoulder to not hurt her again. They stood there for a long time. Arya had found back her sister. They had both changed, and Sansa had become a better sister for her. Sadly, Sansa broke the embrace.

“I need to rest now.” Sansa effectively looked tired. She turned to the tall woman who had stayed there all the time their discussion had gone on. “Lady Brienne, bring Arya to the place we prepared for her.”

“Yes, my lady,” answered Brienne.

“And Arya, please stop to call Tyrion the Imp. He has a name, and he is your brother-in-law now.”

Arya nodded. She wouldn’t argue about that, at least not now. Arya left with the armored woman, casting a last glance to her sister. Sansa smiled at her as she laid back in her cushioned chair. Things were better than Arya expected. She thought about the Imp. Sansa’s tale and the things he told Arya before she met her sister quite agreed. There was probably some truth in all this. Arya wondered if she should keep him on her list. Or at least, she wondered if she shouldn’t wait before she was certain she should kill him. She looked at Brienne of Tarth who escorted her. She was a very tall woman, and Sansa said she had saved her and served their mother before they met. Arya was also intrigued by this woman. It was the first time she saw a woman all clad in armor and bearing a sword at her belt.

“Is that true, everything Sansa said?” Arya asked her.

“It is, my lady. As strange as it may seem,” she answered.

“I’m not a lady.” Arya was bored to repeat that to everybody.

“Sorry, Arya.”

“The Imp really protected her?”

“Yes. In fact, I never saw a man behave so well with his wife and care so much for her. I saw him slap Joffrey because he mocked your brother’s death.”

“Really? He slapped Joffrey?”

“Yes.” They both smiled and chuckled. Arya would have liked to be there and see the Imp slap that coward.

“Are you a knight?” Arya asked her.

“No,” Brienne replied. She remembered her father telling her one day that women couldn’t be knights. Arya never understood why.

“But you know how to use that sword?”

“I do.”

“Does it have a name?”

“Oathkeeper. It was forged with the steel from your father’s sword, Ice.”

“What?” Arya looked at the sword.

“Tywin Lannister had it melted down after the Red Wedding. He made two swords out of it. One was given to Joffrey at his wedding, and now it belongs to Tommen. The other one, this one, he gave it to Ser Jaime, and Ser Jaime gave it to me. He told me to protect Catelyn Stark’s daughters with Ned Stark’s steel. And that’s what I did. I protected your sister, and now I will protect you as well.”

“Why did he give it to you?”

“He swore to your mother to bring you and Sansa back safely to her. We thought you dead, but your sister was still alive. So I protected her with it. I would have tried to find you if I had known you were still alive.”

Arya kept looking at the sword. Ice had been twice longer. No wonder they could make two smaller swords out of it. Her father had been killed with his own sword. At least, it was no longer Ilyn Payne who had Ice, but Ice didn’t exist any longer.

“I had a sword before, but I lost it. Her name was Needle,” said Arya. She missed her friend.

“Good name. Was it thin?” commented Brienne with a smile.

“Yes. Who taught you how to fight?”

“My father.”

Arya envied her. “Mine never wanted to. Said fighting was for boys. It was Jon who had Needle made for me before I left Winterfell.”

“My father said the same. But I kept fighting the boys anyway. Kept losing. Finally, my father said, If you’re going to do it, you might as well do it right.”

They both laughed a little. “Do you think you could show me? How to fight?”

Brienne of Tarth stopped and looked at Arya, a strange expression on her face. “I’ll see if I can. I think I might.”

They resumed their path to a red tent where a dozen men clad in red armors were standing around. Arya understood that she was still a prisoner. A well provided and comfortable prisoner, but a prisoner all the same. For now, she wouldn’t try to kill Tyrion Lannister, but she wouldn’t trust him either. He was a Lannister, and she wouldn’t put her life in the hands of a Lannister, even if Sansa loved him. In fact, Sansa’s love for the Imp didn’t encourage her at all to trust him.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Peter Vaughan, who played Maester Aemon Targaryen, died two days ago at the age of 93, on December 6, 2016. And now his watch has ended.

TYRION XXII

A boat was approaching with a white banner and the green banner of House Reed. There had to be about ten men in the boat, all rowing except one holding the helm. Tyrion was standing on the side of the Kingsroad with the Blackfish and Bronn, waiting for Howland Reed. The Lord of Greywater Watch had come to negotiate with them after the failed attempt to kidnap Sansa and kill Tyrion in the middle of the night. Tyrion still didn’t forgive the crannogmen and Arya Stark for attempting to kill him and take Sansa away from him. They could have tried to speak with him, but Tyrion supposed Howland Reed had no wish to speak with him after Ned Stark’s execution and the Red Wedding. Again, Tyrion had to thank Cersei, Joffrey and his father for having him almost killed.

If Howland Reed came for a parley now, it was because he had no choice. They had eight of his people, including one of his bannermen, Lord Aran Fenn. Even more important, they had Arya and Sansa. If Howland Reed was to get them, he had no choice but to negotiate. Knowing the character of Northerners, Tyrion didn’t expect these negotiations to be easy. The boat reached the bank and some of the men started to get off. One of them took their lead and walked to Tyrion and the other men with him. He stopped right in front of Tyrion, a suspicious look on his face.

“Lord Lannister. Ser Brynden,” he said.

“Lord Reed,” replied the Blackfish.

So here was the Lord of Greywater Watch. There was nothing about him to distinguish him from the rest of his people. He wore the same clothes, was as small as the others, and he was among the oarsmen in the boat. However, despite being smaller than all the other men, the crannogmen were still taller than Tyrion. Even among them, he would be a dwarf.

“I’m surprised to see you standing at the side of the Lord of Casterly Rock, Ser Brynden. However, that explains why there are Tully banners in this army. I’m sure you have good reasons to march with the Lannisters,” said Howland Reed, not paying attention to Tyrion.

“I have,” confirmed the Blackfish. “And I will explain you everything, but not here. You want to see Sansa and Arya? Then follow us.”

Howland Reed hesitated. He looked at Tyrion, then to Brynden Tully, and finally he nodded. It was a good thing the Blackfish was there, or else the Lord of the crannogmen may never have followed them. They walked in silence to the pavilion where the others were waiting for them. There were all the people they thought who were needed for negotiations. Sansa sat in a comfortable chair. The maester still said she should move as little as possible, and Tyrion was not about to argue with him.
Not only was she badly injured, but she was also pregnant. Tyrion had feared the worst not only for her, but for the baby as well.

Sitting next to Sansa was her sister, Arya Stark. Tyrion had not expected Sansa’s sister to try to kill him, and almost to succeed in killing her own sister, when they would meet. He didn’t expect to find her in the Neck either, and certainly not in the middle of the night in his own tent, while he and Sansa were making love. During the first two days following the nocturnal attack, Sansa had been raving, saying it was her sister in their tent that night. Tyrion hadn’t believed her in the first place, but the third day she had seemed more conscious and told him in the most serious way that it was her sister, and that she wanted to see her. She had almost ordered him to let her see Arya. Tyrion had Bronn fetch the girl, and he had recognized her after some time. That was Arya Stark.

Now here she was. She still wore the garments of the crannogmen. Only a few people knew who she was. Tyrion didn’t want the news that Arya Stark was in their camp to spread. Almost everyone who knew who she was stood in the tent right now. Tyrion and Arya were both staring at each other. Arya Stark didn’t forgive him for marrying Sansa, and Tyrion didn’t forgive her for almost killing his wife and their child. He remembered how pale Sansa had seemed for days, the blood spurting from her shoulder, the fear he had to lose his wife and his child in the same night. All that because of this little girl who thought he should die. Because Sansa asked, he had allowed her to live comfortably in a tent without chains, but he maintained heavy guard around her at all time. If it had been up to him, he would have let the Stark girl in the cage with the other crannogmen. He had lost thirteen men when they had invaded his camp to kill him in his bed, with Sansa lying next to him, and his wife had almost been killed in the attempt. He wasn’t about to forget. Yet, he accepted to receive Howland Reed. No matter what grudge he had against the crannogmen now, he needed them.

Brienne of Tarth was standing guard close to Arya and Sansa, and Lady Mira Hightower was sitting next to Sansa as well. Sansa thought they could trust her, she was a Northerner, and anyway Sansa had told her about Arya’s presence, so it would be better if she was there. It would be better if there were as many Northerners they could gather to speak with Howland Reed. There was also Lord Beric Dondarrion who was present. With Tyrion, Bronn, the Blackfish, Howland Reed and Aran Fenn who just entered, the men were barely outnumbering the women, something Tyrion had never expected to happen anywhere in this army. The Lord of the Fenns had revealed his identity after they received the request for a parley from his liege lord. There really seemed to be nothing to distinguish highborn from lowborn among the crannogmen.

Howland Reed looked at Tyrion’s wife. “You must be Lady Sansa.”

“Well?” Sansa didn’t seem to realize it was a lord who was standing before her. Tyrion would probably have made the same mistake in her place.

“My name is Howland Reed, my lady. Your father was a good friend of mine. He was a good man, and an honorable one.”

Sansa stared at Lord Reed in utter surprise. She turned her eyes to Tyrion, asking a silent question, and Tyrion nodded to mean it was true. He noticed Arya Stark was repressing laughs.

“Lord Reed,” said Sansa, returning her attention to the small man, “it is a pleasure to meet you. My father always spoke highly of you. And fondly.”

Howland Reed nodded, a pained expression on his face. “I was heartbroken when he died. I wept for him for days.” The Lord of Greywater Watch turned his eyes to Arya. “Are you alright, Arya?”

“Yes, I am,” the young girl answered.
The crannogman turned once again to Tyrion. “Lord Lannister, I don’t wish to linger here any longer than I need, so I will get straight to the point. I want my men who are in your captivity released and allowed to go back to their families. I want Arya and Sansa Stark to come with me at Greywater Watch where I will take care of them. In return, I will allow you to leave the Neck and to go back to your lands without fight. If you refuse, we will wage war on you and harass you from all directions. Your men will die by the thousands in the Neck until almost none of them are left. This is my offer, and it is to take or to leave.”

The negotiations wouldn’t be easy with that one, as it was to be expected. Tyrion looked at the Blackfish before he replied to Howland Reed. “Lord Reed, I have a counter offer to make. You acknowledge Sansa as Lady of Winterfell and Wardeness of the North. You pledge your banners to her. You join us in our campaign against the Boltons. You harass the garrison of Moat Cailin loyal to House Bolton and help us to take the fortress. Once it has fallen, we do not oblige you to follow us at Winterfell, but you are free to do so if you wish. Your men will be released once the terms are accepted, to the exception of Lord Fenn who will remain with us during the siege of Moat Cailin. Once it has fallen, he will be free to go. You will allow our convoys and men to freely get through the Neck. Arya Stark will remain and accompany us at Winterfell where she will live. After all, this is her home as much as it is Sansa’s.”

Tyrion wasn’t about to let Arya Stark in the hands of Howland Reed so he could use her to eventually challenge Sansa’s claim, and he was even less willing to let him take Sansa away from him. Furthermore, they needed the crannogmen to take Moat Cailin, as much as Tyrion hated them for what they did this night last week.

Lord Reed was looking at him intently. “You are bold, Imp, to make such a proposition and expect me to accept it.”

“Someone must be bold to attempt an invasion on the North when winter is almost there,” replied Tyrion.

“Bold, or stupid.”

“Sometimes the difference between stupidity and boldness is not as evident as it seems. People would have said Aegon the Conqueror was stupid when he ordered all the kings of Westeros to bend the knee to him before his invasion, and yet his progeny ruled Westeros for the three centuries that followed.”

Lord Howland Reed kept a hard stare at Tyrion. This one wouldn’t taste his japes. He began to understand why he and Ned Stark got along so well.

“You must be rather stupid, my lord,” said Howland Reed, “to believe that I could accept an offer like this one.”

“Truth be told, I didn’t expect you would accept. At least not immediately,” quipped Tyrion.

“You expected well. I will never agree to those terms.”

“Lord Reed.” Sansa stepped in the conversation. “We all know who rules Winterfell right now. Roose Bolton. He’s the man who murdered my brother Robb Stark. He was the eldest son of your friend, my father, Lord Eddard Stark. Do you really want him to be your liege lord?”

The Lord of Greywater Watch looked at Sansa with a softened expression. “No, and I will never bend the knee to a Bolton. But I am not a fool. I know very well what the Lannisters intend to do. They want the North.” He turned again to Tyrion. “And I will not help you to take it.”
Just like Tyrion feared, the Northerners had no wish to support Sansa because she was married to him. Was he condemned to suffer the consequences of his father’s cruelty until the end of time? Was Sansa condemned to that as well?

“Lord Reed,” started to explain Tyrion. “I don’t know if you read the decree depriving the Boltons from their hold of the North, but it is clearly stated that Sansa is the Lady of Winterfell and the Wardeness of the North. I just said you had to pledge your banners to her, not to me. I have no real position of power in the North.”

“We both know this isn’t true, Imp,” replied the crannogman. “Your house is trying to take the North through Sansa, and I am quite sure that as soon as she has given you a few sons, you will kill her. So I repeat my conditions. Give me back my men, Arya and Sansa, leave the Neck in peace, and no one will die.”

“I will not leave,” said Sansa. “We will not leave. Roose Bolton holds Winterfell. He’s holding my home. And his son is a monster. Arya and I have a brother in the Night’s Watch. I don’t think the Boltons will leave him to be quiet for long. He is our father’s last living son. They will try to kill him sooner or later. We must take back Winterfell.”

“Do you really think the Lannisters will spare your… brother, Sansa? They won’t. He is a threat for them as much as he is for the Boltons.”

“No, he’s not,” intervened Tyrion. “Jon Snow is honorable like his father. He will never break his vows to the Night’s Watch. I have absolutely nothing against him being Lord Commander. In fact, I’m quite glad he is. I met him at the Wall when I visited it. He’s a good lad. And surprisingly more Stark than his brothers and sisters.”

“Lord Reed, you can trust Lord Tyrion,” said Sansa.

“Trust him? Let me doubt about it, my lady,” replied the little lord.

“My lord, if you allow me, you are in no place to judge Lord Tyrion.” Lady Mira was the one to speak. “You don’t know him, you never met him before this day. We are four Northerners here, and of these four, only Lady Sansa and I can claim to know Lord Tyrion. And I agree on everything she just said.”

The Lord of Greywater Watch looked at the young lady with a perplexed expression. “Who are you?”

“My name is Mira Hightower, but until recently I was Mira Forrester. My father, Gregor Forrester, rode side by side with the King in the North during the war. He died for him at the Red Wedding. My brother, Ethan Forrester, was butchered by Ramsay Snow, and my other brothers, my sister, and my mother all died when Roose Bolton’s bannermen slaughtered them and burned my home. Now these men feast in my family’s halls. Maybe the Lannisters had a hand in the Red Wedding, but they didn’t kill my father. The Freys did. They didn’t kill my family either, the Boltons and the Whitehills did. I will have no peace as long as I know that the man who put his dagger through my brother’s throat is to rule the North one day. Would you rather see the man who killed your king and his bastard rule the North, or the daughter of Lord Stark? And know this. My husband and I have our own army here. You may force the Lannisters to leave, but you won’t force us to leave. I have come to take back my home, just like Lady Sansa, and I’m going to take it back, no matter the cost.”

The head of House Reed eyed the northern girl suspiciously. Lady Mira didn’t look very much like a Northerner with her actual attire, and maybe Lord Reed knew nothing about House Forrester. This family wasn’t that known after all, and the crannogmen didn’t look like the ones to know every northern house, small and great.

He finally answered. “I understand what you feel, my lady. I have nothing against the Hightowers, so I won’t get in your way, but I will not help a Lannister to become Warden of the North.”

“Alright, Sansa,” intervened the Blackfish before Sansa could speak. “You don’t need to repeat everything you once told to me, Edmure and our bannermen. I’ll do it this time.” The hero of the War of the Ninepenny Kings faced the Lord of Greywater Watch. “Lord Reed, I know this is probably difficult to believe, but you can trust the Imp. I, for myself, don’t like him, and I doubt I will ever like him, but I trust him, as hard it can be to believe it.”

Lord Howland Reed looked at the Blackfish, great skepticism plain on his face. Tyrion thought he didn’t know what to think anymore. This wasn’t a terrified girl in his eyes who was telling him to trust a Lannister. It was the Blackfish. The two stood there, looking at each other.

“I’m listening, Ser Brynden,” Lord Reed finally said.

The Blackfish cleared his throat. “Not long ago, the Freys and the Lannisters were besieging Riverrun. However, Sansa and Lord Tyrion received information that Arya Stark was being held at Winterfell and forced to marry Ramsay Bolton. The information was wrong, but that’s not the matter. They came to Riverrun with an army. They got the boy who sits on the Iron Throne, Tommen, to give back Riverrun and the Riverlands to my house. I accepted the terms Tyrion Lannister gave to me. Now, my nephew Edmure is free and alive, and he is the Lord Paramount of the Trident again. All the houses of the Riverlands were forgiven, the Freys were forced to release all their hostages, and now the Twins are occupied by a garrison of both Lannister and Tully men. The people who played important roles at the Red Wedding have been executed. The dwarf kept his word. And now, we are all marching together to Winterfell to deal with the man who murdered our king. We have an opportunity to make the Boltons pay for their crimes just like the Freys paid, and also to give Winterfell to Sansa. I know this is not what we would like, but… I never thought I would think that one day, and even less say it, but I would rather have Tyrion Lannister as Lord of Winterfell, especially if Sansa is his wife, than to have Roose Bolton eat at the high table where my niece and her children once took their meals. If that’s the price for having Roose Bolton’s head on a spike, then so be it.”

The Lord of Greywater Watch remained silent for a time after the Blackfish was done with his explanation. He seemed unsure about what to think, though still looking resolved. Tyrion knew it was difficult for a man like Howland Reed to believe what Ser Brynden Tully just said, but it was also difficult to think the Blackfish had lied. Finally, Ned Stark’s friend left his silence.

“I won’t speak about it any further in the presence of any Lannister or their men.” He stared at Tyrion, Bronn and Brienne.

“I hope you don’t include Sansa among the Lannisters, because there are already more than enough river lords who are seeing her this way,” said Tyrion.

“She is not a Lannister. Lady Sansa is Lord Stark’s daughter, hence she is a Stark,” declared Howland Reed. Finally, someone who looks at Sansa like a Stark without seeing her like an enemy.

“Lady Brienne will stay, Lord Howland,” said Sansa. “She is not in service to the Lannisters. She is sworn to me, and only to me. And before that she was my mother’s sworn shield.”

Lord Reed looked suspiciously at the lady in armor. “Very well.”

Tyrion took his leave with Bronn. He tried to shot Sansa a reassuring smile as he left. He hoped that the fact Howland Reed didn’t see a Lannister in her would make her feel better.

“Not angry that you were kicked off the meeting?” asked Bronn.

“I’m not happy about it, but anyway I doubt Howland Reed would listen to me,” Tyrion replied. “It will be better to have the Blackfish and Sansa to discuss with him. He will listen to them.”

“Sure the Blackfish is on your side?”

“He knows the crannogmen can help us to take Moat Cailin. We need them. And even if he doesn’t like me now, he may trust me in some small way. As much as a stubborn Tully can trust a Lannister dwarf.”

“I hope so, you gave him back his home and had a tenth of House Frey slaughtered, which means a lot of Freys dead. And he should be thankful you didn’t fuck his grandniece before she asked you for it.”

“My family still murdered three Starks and imprisoned his nephew at the Red Wedding. I am still a Lannister in his eyes, and I will always be a Lannister for him. Just like you’ll always be a sellsword for many people.”

“I don’t care. As long as I have wine, gold and women.”

They took some ale and sat away from the other soldiers taking a pause. Most of them were training with spear, arrows and spears or standing guard around the camp, looking around for any crannogman attack. The events of last week had shaken the men, giving them something to worry about. They had no complaints about bored men anymore. Tyrion wished they hadn’t needed Sansa to almost die for the men to gain back some discipline.

Strangely, the attempt against Sansa had united the different armies again. All the commanders had shown great concern about her, and the men too. The Lannister men had become fond of Sansa in some way, and the men of the Riverlands and the Reach as well. She visited the sick regularly, which the soldiers appreciated very much, though it was before they learnt she was pregnant. The soldiers of the Westerlands had come to respect Sansa very much after Riverrun and the Twins, really seeing her as their lady. The men from the Hightower army respected her, and as for the soldiers from the Riverlands, even if some still weren’t sure whether she was a Stark, a Lannister or a Tully, they didn’t hate her anymore after they brought back House Tully to power and neutralized House Frey. Only the men in the Frey army didn’t show much love to Sansa. Bronn and Ser Perwyn even told him there were some who were happy and hoped she would die. Tyrion had wanted to execute any man in the Frey army who would show any pleasure or happiness about Sansa’s injuries, but he knew that would be useless. When you tear out a man’s tongue, you are not proving him a liar, you’re only telling the world that you fear what he might say. And if you killed him for what he said, it did the same. Instead, Tyrion warned that any fight a Frey man would start by showing disrespect to the Lady of Casterly Rock would be immediately punished. Three Frey soldiers made the mistake to ignore this and were hanged. After that, the Frey soldiers remained calm.

“What about the stocks?” asked Tyrion to his friend. “Are they well kept?”

“Aye. Under heavy guard, day and night. I’m still not sure if that’s a good idea.” Bronn seemed worried.

“We may need it in the North. You know the Boltons are only the first enemies we’ll have to face there.”
“You don’t really believe it, don’t you?”

“I know you think I’m stupid, but this is the truth. I believe it. Dead men are marching on the Wall.”

“I hope you’re wrong.” Bronn seemed worried again, but not because of what he brought from King’s Landing.

“You’ve been north of the Wall, Bronn. Surely you heard stories about it back then.”

“Aye. The White Walkers. More than one wildling said he had seen one. To me, it looked like they invented it.”

“I thought the same when I visited the Wall. But now, Ned Stark’s son says he saw one of them. Unless Jon Snow found a sense of humor at the Wall, I doubt it was a joke.”

“Or maybe he had an illusion. When it’s cold like this, you can imagine all sorts of things. Let’s hope we won’t have to use the stocks.”

“We’re probably going to need it. Remember how we kill a dead man?”

“Aye. We burn him.”

_When winter does come, Gods help us all if we’re not ready._ The words of Maester Aemon echoed through Tyrion’s head. He would have to speak with him again when they would be at the Wall.

Tyrion went through the camp with Bronn later to see everything was in order. He also had a discussion with Daven and Ser Forley about the state of the siege engines before Moat Cailin and their defenses on the sides of the camp. Just like Tyrion, they thought they wouldn’t get a chance if the crannogmen started to attack them from all sides. They couldn’t protect themselves from their poisoned weapons, and wouldn’t be able to pursue them in the marshes. Tyrion hoped Sansa and the Blackfish would succeed in their talking with Howland Reed.

After two hours, Podrick came to see Tyrion and Bronn. The lord of the crannogmen wanted to see him. They came back to the tent where everyone was still there. Howland Reed faced Tyrion as soon as he entered and spoke immediately.

“Lord Tyrion, I have decided to help you. I will join your campaign against House Bolton. I don’t want to see Roose Bolton as Lord of Winterfell any more than you or anyone else here. However, I will help you on my own terms. My men will all be freed. Arya Stark and Aran Fenn will remain with your army for the time needed to break Moat Cailin, but not as prisoners. Lord Fenn will be my representative at your war councils. He and Arya Stark will be given everything they need as they are your guests and you won’t stop them to meet other people, including your wife. I will also help some of your men to get around the fortress and to reach its northern side to establish a link with the Manderlys. I will have a hundred of my men follow you at Winterfell. They may not be many, but they will be especially useful as scouts if you want men who can go undetected and unnoticed. I will personally follow you to Winterfell once Moat Cailin has fallen. However, I ask for two hostages of high birth to ensure your loyalty. I will release one of them after Moat Cailin is taken, and the second one once Winterfell is taken and Lady Sansa has been acknowledged Wardeness of the North and Lady of Winterfell by all the northern lords. I will swear my banners to Lady Sansa, and only to her. I will make no pledge to you, and you will not be recognized officially as Lord of Winterfell or Warden of the North. These terms cannot be negotiated. You can accept them or refuse them.”

“I would like the two men I will give you to serve as advisors for your men while they harass the garrison of Moat Cailin. Since Lord Fenn will be welcomed at our own war councils, I think this is only fair.” Tyrion couldn’t let his men believe he gave hostages to the crannogmen. He would have liked a deal with House Reed to be less severe, but that was probably the best he could get, and anyway he never really intended to declare himself Lord of Winterfell or Warden of the North. These titles belonged to Sansa.

Howland Reed pursed his lips. “Done.”

“Another thing, Lord Reed. Something I think you will like.”

“I doubt it very much. I told you I wouldn’t negotiate the terms.”

“I am not negotiating. I’m only informing you. In fact, I’m informing all of you. And I’m sure you will like it.” Tyrion looked at Sansa. “Does he know?”

“I told him. He knows I’m pregnant,” Sansa answered.

“Yes, I do know, and on that I recognize that I owe you an apology for the… incident that happened that night. That was never our intent to kill the Lady Sansa, and even less while she was with child. On that, you have my apologies.”

Tyrion noticed Howland Reed was looking very hardly at him. He hadn’t liked the new that Sansa was pregnant, for sure. Surely he wasn’t sorry either about trying to kill Tyrion. He was only sorry that Sansa was close to get killed. Tyrion decided to say what he wanted to say. “Very well. You all know my children to Sansa and I are going to be heirs to both Casterly Rock and Winterfell. The first in line will get the Rock, and the second will get the North. There must always be a Stark in Winterfell. When our son will become Lord of Winterfell, he will take the Stark name.”

Tyrion expected it to surprise everyone, and he wasn’t deceived. Everyone was astonished, except for the Blackfish who knew it from the discussion they had at Riverrun. Even Bronn seemed taken aback, and that didn’t arrive often.

“Why would you do that?” asked the crannogman.

“First, because I am no fool. Perhaps you think I am, but I’m not. I know very well the Northerners will never accept a Lannister dynasty at Winterfell. I told so to my father not long after the Red Wedding, along with the fact that the first Northerner who would cross my path in the North would try to kill me, and I wasn’t wrong.” Tyrion shot a look at Arya Stark. “I think he knew, but he probably didn’t care. He has wanted me dead since the day I was born, but I don’t intend to satisfy him. Second, like everyone always remembers me, my family slaughtered the Starks. I think the least I can do is to prevent House Stark from disappearing. Wouldn’t you agree?”

The Lord of Greywater clearly didn’t seem to know what to make of it, and most of the people in the tent neither. Tyrion had been thinking about this possibility for a very long time now, but he hadn’t talked about it to anybody, not even to Bronn or Sansa. But after months stuck in the Neck, he had no doubts left that it would be necessary if they ever wished for Sansa to remain Lady of Winterfell for more than a few months in practice, and not only in name. Tyrion waited for the crannogman to react. Lord Reed finally gained back some of his composure, still unsure what to do with what Tyrion just told him.

“Very well.”

“So, we have a deal?”

Tyrion extended a hand, and after a moment of reluctance, Howland Reed clasped it. The rest of the day was spent in arranging details of the alliance. There would be an official ceremony tomorrow for Howland Reed to publicly swear loyalty to Sansa. He wanted to swear loyalty to House Stark, but finally Tyrion convinced him with Sansa and Lady Mira’s help that he needed to pledge his banners specifically to Sansa. They reached a compromise by allowing him to swear his banners to Sansa Lannister of House Stark. Ser Serion Lannister and Lord Ryman Sarwyck were chosen to serve as advisors for Lord Reed’s men while Ser Forley Prester was chosen to bring a hundred men past Moat Cailin to the north to join with the Manderlys with the help of the crannogmen. The crannogmen still held prisoners were freed.

In the evening, Tyrion was dining with Sansa. “Why didn’t you tell me, about giving the Stark name to our second child?” she asked him.

“Aren’t you happy about it?”

“Yes, of course I am. I just wonder why you didn’t tell me before.”

“I’ve been thinking about it for a very long time, Sansa, but I wasn’t entirely sure until recently. There are a few cases of children named after their mother’s name through history, but it is rare. We will need a royal decree for our child to be named Stark. I don’t think Tommen will oppose, nor the queen, but Kevan will be more difficult to convince. Once the war is over, I’ll go to King’s Landing and speak with him. I think I can convince him. And anyway I must.”

“We could still have him named after you. That wouldn’t bother me.”

“Do you want your family to disappear?” Tyrion asked.

“No. No, of course. Only… I just meant it wouldn’t bother me.”

“The Stark name will disappear without this, Sansa. All your brothers died without children, except Jon Snow, but he’s not a Stark. Not in name, at least. Anyway, he’s forbidden to have children, and I believed what I said. The Northerners will never accept a Lannister to rule in Winterfell. They will only accept a Stark. I’m afraid if our son was to be named Lannister, he wouldn’t survive long as Lord of Winterfell. I don’t want him to be killed because he has the wrong family name.”

They had been close to losing their first child when Sansa’s sister attacked them, and Tyrion didn’t want to risk the life of another of their children, and even less Sansa’s life. That was the element that decisively decided him to give Sansa’s family name to their child who would get Winterfell. He wouldn’t be the cause of the death of one of their children.

“Thank you, Tyrion. Thank you, really.”

Sansa’s eyes were full of gratitude and thanks as she said it. They held hands. The next morning, the commanders and officers of all the armies taking part to the invasion were assembled to bear witness to the pledge of Howland Reed to fight for Sansa. He got on his knee, and he and all his bannermen who were present swore to serve Sansa Lannister of House Stark, and to help her take back Winterfell from the Bolton traitors. The black lizard-lion was flinging in the wind on the green standard of House Reed. Other standards, like the violet banner of House Fenn with three black lilies, were also there. Arya Stark wasn’t on the stage they had made for the occasion. Her identity was still kept hidden. They had agreed it would be better to have the soldiers believe she was still at Winterfell in Bolton’s hands. This way the men would keep wishing to take Roose Bolton’s head for Sansa’s sister. Instead, she stood with Lord Aran Fenn, pretending to be his daughter. Tyrion was on the stage, but behind Sansa. Howland Reed pledged his banners to her, not to him. Still, as Howland Reed swore to serve Sansa and her children and grandchildren, Tyrion felt the wind was turning in their favor. They had succeeded. Howland Reed became the first northern lord to pledge his banners to Sansa. Tyrion knew he wouldn’t be the last.
We must interpret the words of Brynden Tully very carefully in this chapter. He say he trusts Tyrion, but we must remember he already told Sansa in a previous chapter that he could almost trust Tyrion. Almost. The Blackfish doesn't trust Tyrion with everything, but he trusts him with overthrowing Roose Bolton, and the Blackfish knows they need Howland Reed's help to take Moat Cailin and defeat the Boltons.

I know Arya was quite silent in this chapter, but she will have more lines in future chapters. Don't expect her to stay still for long.

Please review

Next chapter: Roose
ROOSE III

To Roose Bolton, Lord of the Dreadfort and Warden of the North,

Before the threat of the White Walkers, the Night’s Watch has allowed all men, women and children living north of the Wall to come south and to settle on the lands of the Gift. They will not trouble the people living outside the lands under the Night’s Watch’s rule, and if they ever do, the Night’s Watch will not intervene in the matters involving northern houses and the people living in the Gift, as long as the northern houses do not penetrate in the lands belonging to the Night’s Watch. Any lord will be free to give justice for any crime people from the north of the Wall would commit on their lands. Any action to be taken in the Gift will have to be discussed with the Night’s Watch first. The brothers of the Night’s Watch will cooperate with the lords of the North to ensure peace and safety for everyone.

Jon Snow, Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch

Roose Bolton, Lord of the Dreadfort and Warden of the North, put the letter aside. It had been almost three months now that wildlings had been allowed south of the Wall by Jon Snow, and the northern lords complained about it without any surprise. Roose Bolton didn’t believe the wildlings would pose such a problem. The only house that could be really bothered by their presence would be the Umbers, and the wildlings may keep them occupied for a moment.

However, recently, they had received news that Greatjon Umber was dead. His son, called Smalljon, had taken his place as Lord of the Last Hearth. Surprisingly, he had written last week to say he was riding to Winterfell with a gift for the Lord of the Dreadfort, and to propose an alliance against the wildlings. It could help. Roose Bolton could already rely on the help of the Karstarks, and if the Umbers joined them, they may have enough forces to fight against the army in the Neck if they were to get into the North. For now, the Lannisters, the Tullys, the Freys and the Hightowers were still blocked south of Moat Cailin, but with the rebellion of House Manderly, Roose Bolton was afraid they wouldn’t be able to keep them in the Neck for long. The ravens from Moat Cailin were talking about an army so great that it stretched on leagues and leagues, farther than the eye could see. On the Kingsroad inside the Neck, it was no surprise. Even an army of five thousand men may have to stretch on leagues to hold out of the swamps and stay on the Kingsroad, but that meant they had no way to know the number of men behind Sansa Stark.

The Umbers would probably ask House Bolton to help them get rid of the wildlings for their help against the Lannisters, though Roose wouldn’t trust this house for this. They were staunch supporters of the Starks, and to the opposite of Harald Karstark, Jon Umber’s father hadn’t been executed by Robb Stark. He would have to be careful with the Umbers, but they would certainly need their support against the Lannisters. Roose Bolton seized another raven that had arrived from Barrow Hall in the morning. It had been written quickly, showing the distress of the maester who wrote it.

Barrow Hall had fallen. It was the seat of House Dustin. Lady Barbrey Dustin, his sister-in-law, was here at Winterfell with most of her men, and Roose had stopped her from going to the rescue of her keep. Her men wouldn’t be enough to make a difference against the Manderlys, and he wouldn’t send some of his men to die. He couldn’t allow to lose men, not at this moment, when they just defeated Stannis. He may need Lady Dustin’s men if the Umbers asked him to slaughter the wildlings for their help against the Lannisters. Roose may have to march in the Gift for that, but it wasn’t as if Jon Snow could do something against it. No northern lord would complain if he penetrated in the Gift to kill wildlings threatening their lands.

All the same, things weren’t going very well. There was an army besieging Moat Cailin. White Harbor had raised its banners for Sansa Stark. The alliances Roose Bolton made with other houses (Dustins, Ryswells, Karstarks) were fragile at best. Lady Dustin had been furious when she learnt that Barrow Hall had fallen this morning, and she was probably still fuming somewhere. Ramsay’s presence didn’t make her any happier. They lost few men in the battle against Stannis, but many were wounded. All the same, he would keep assembling lords who didn’t want to see Southerners rule the North. It was their best chance to bring the other Northerners to their side against the invading army.

The Lord of the Dreadfort didn’t mention Arya Stark anymore in his messages. He had denied the accusations of the Crown and the Lannisters against Ramsay, but since they were true and that Ramsay’s reputation was spreading through the North, it was better to not speak about it anymore. The less Ramsay and Arya Stark would be mentioned, the better. They had to speak about the southern invasion, and only about that. This way, the northern lords would think less about the way Ramsay treated his wife. It was better to ignore accusations when you had denied them once than to deny them again and again. You were only bringing them back to the surface if you did that. If you didn’t talk about it, the word may just die and the others would stop to talk about it as well.

“Elmar,” said Roose in his casual soft voice, not lifting his eyes from his papers.

His squire stood inside his solar, unmoving, not speaking. “Yes, my lord.”

“Go and see how Lady Walda’s labor is going.”

“Yes, my lord.”

Elmar Frey left without another word. Roose didn’t need, and didn’t like to speak more than was needed with his men and servants. He gave them orders and didn’t expect them to say more than Yes, my lord. When he asked them questions, they had to answer shortly, only with the necessary words. He didn’t even need to look at them to give an order or to ask a question sometimes.

He hoped Lady Walda’s child was a son. This way, if Ramsay was to die one way or another, he would have another heir. Ramsay was his firstborn son, and he couldn’t kill him, but Roose didn’t rely on his bastard son to carry out his dynasty, not with the way he behaved right now. He couldn’t even get a child inside Arya Stark. The Lord of the Dreadfort kept working, looking at the accounts to see if they would have enough to feed their men for the next battles. Elmar Frey came back.

“Maester Wolkan says everything is alright. She is still in labor. The child is not born yet,” he said.

“Very well,” the Lord of the Dreadfort replied, with nothing else to add.

Elmar Frey left to stand outside before the door. Roose Bolton went through the reports concerning their food storage. He had kept replenishing them after the battle, and they now had enough food to last nine months. The Lannisters and the Tullys would hardly find enough food to feed their army, especially if it was a big one, if they came to besiege Winterfell. The best way to defeat the Lannisters would be to keep them south of Moat Cailin, and if they broke through it, to let them march on Winterfell, then let them besiege it. Hopefully, their men would freeze and starve in the snows. They didn’t have the men to fight them in open grounds. The northern lords wouldn’t like him for allowing the Lannisters to march through the North without problem, but they didn’t like him already and wouldn’t like him better if he was defeated by the Lannisters in open field. Staying at Winterfell was the best strategic decision to make. Perhaps Ramsay could try to repeat the feats he performed with Stannis’s army.

The door opened and Roose’s squire entered again. “My lord, Lord Karstark has arrived.”

“Thank you,” Roose replied.

The Lord of the Dreadfort rose up and walked to the Great Hall. Elmar Frey gathered some ink and paper and brought it with him. The Lord of the Dreadfort would keep working in the meantime before Harald Karstark came in. He had ordered the Lord of Karhold to come to Winterfell to help getting rid of the remnants of Stannis Baratheon’s army. And to prepare for the war against the Lannisters and their allies. Roose Bolton could only work for five minutes before Harald Karstark arrived, but it was still five minutes of work. The Lord of Karhold came in with Ramsay. Roose stood up to welcome Harald Karstark, not Ramsay.

“Welcome, Lord Karstark. I hope your journey from Karhold went well,” he said with his usual soft voice.

“Lord Bolton.” The Lord of Karhold bowed before his liege lord. “The journey was eventless, except for a few men of Stannis’s army we came over. They were dealt with very quickly and didn’t oppose much resistance.”

“This is no surprise, considering their commander is dead.” Roose sat down. “What do you have to report?”

“Stannis’s men have not regrouped in any way. His generals most likely all died during the battle.”

“They did,” confirmed Roose Bolton.

“The survivors are wandering without purpose. They won’t pose any threat, and most will die of cold and sickness very soon. Those we met on our way barely knew where they were.”

“They don’t know the North. I think we can discard these men as a potential threat. We have more pressing matters to deal with, and enemies far more dangerous than a few abandoned soldiers.”

“I agree.”

“Thank you for this report, Lord Karstark.”

Ramsay chose to intervene at this moment. He stood near the window, arms crossed. “We all know what is our main threat now. The wildlings have gotten through the Wall. They are threatening our lands and our allies.”

“I am quite aware of that,” Roose replied coldly.

“Jon Snow allowed them to settle in the North,” Ramsay resumed.
“Ned Stark’s last surviving son?” asked Lord Karstark, looking very interested all of a sudden.

“Jon Snow is a bastard, not a Stark,” Roose pointed out.

“So was I, Father,” said Ramsay.

“Your hold on the North will never be secure as long as a Stark can walk through that door,” began to explain the Lord of Karhold. “Jon Snow allowed the wildlings south of the Wall. He let our enemies come to our lands. This is no coincidence. He’s trying to undermine your rule.”

“Maybe,” recognized the Warden of the North.

“Castleblack isn’t defended on the southern side.” Ramsay stepped into the discussion once more. “And the few men left are barely men at all. Farm boys and thieves.” They have a lot in common with you, then. “With a small force, we could storm the castle, kill Jon Snow…”

“All the northern lords had a deep respect for the Night’s Watch. If they were to kill Jon Snow, all of them would rise in rebellion immediately, and everything Roose worked to build since he killed Robb Stark would be reduced to nothing. Since the Lord Commander was Eddard Stark’s son, the murder would be twice worse for the Northerners. Jon Snow may be a bastard, but he was still Eddard Stark’s son. To murder him so plainly was suicidal. All the people in the North would rebel.

“We don’t need every house in the North,” replied Ramsay, an indifferent pout on his lips. “The Umbers, the Manderlys, and the Karstarks command more soldiers than all the other houses together. With their support, none could challenge us.”

At the mention of the Umbers, Harald Karstark was nodding all the time as Ramsay spoke. He agreed with him. That could give ideas to Ramsay. Very bad ideas. “The Starks lost my house the day King Robb cut off my father’s head. It’s time for new blood in the North.”

The two wanted Jon Snow to die. Karstark was only after revenge for his father’s death, so he supported Ramsay’s madness. However, Roose wouldn’t support this madness. Ramsay’s plan was foolish. Even if it worked, it would divide the North. House Bolton was supposed to rule the North, not to fight it and divide it. That was what Ramsay’s plan would give. Anyway, the plan couldn’t be achieved. The Karstarks may support them, but the support of the Umbers wouldn’t be strong and they would turn against them as soon as they had no interest in helping House Bolton anymore. They broke the guest rights to kill Robb Stark. The Umbers would never forget that. As for the Manderlys…

Roose Bolton slowly rose from his seat and walked on his left a little before he looked at his son. “Are you aware that the Manderlys have declared for Sansa Lannister? You seem to have forgotten about this detail.” Again, Ramsay was agape. He never thought about his plans through and through before he decided to adopt them. “Your plan will divide the North at a moment we need it to be united behind us. If you acquire a reputation as a mad dog, you’ll be treated as a mad dog. Taken out back and slaughtered for pig feed.”

If only Ramsay would understand the lesson. He was still too harsh. He did well against Stannis, but the best way to strengthen your power wasn’t by killing your enemies. The best ways were alliances, marriages, hostages and negotiations. Ramsay didn’t understand that. He enjoyed torturing and killing people, and nothing else.
Roose Bolton heard chains clicking from the door. “My lords.” It was Maester Wolkan. Roose turned to face him. “Lady Walda has given birth. A boy. Red-cheeked and healthy.”

Finally, there were some good news. The maester was smiling widely, and Roose almost wanted to do the same. He had two sons now to continue his line. He would have to protect the new one to prevent Ramsay from killing him like he killed Domeric. Hopefully, his new son would be more like Domeric than Ramsay.

“My congratulations, Lord Bolton,” said Karstark.

Roose Bolton sketched a smile for a moment as he looked at Lord Karstark, but it vanished almost immediately. He looked at his son whose expression was somewhere between terror and uncertainty. Ramsay walked slowly to him. Roose was waiting for his reaction. It would tell him what were Ramsay’s intentions.

“Congratulations, Father.” He pulled in for an embrace and Roose put his arms around his son’s shoulders as well. “I look forward to meeting my new brother.” Roose had no doubt about it. He pulled away and put a hand on the shoulder of his eldest son.

“You’ll always be my firstborn.” It was true. Ramsay was his firstborn son. He was his heir, and Roose wouldn’t kill him, no matter what Ramsay did or would do. He was his son. He could see it every time he looked into his eyes.

“Thank you for saying that. It means a great deal to me.” Ramsay was looking up at him. He was his son. He would always be his son.

Ramsay moved quickly and Roose felt a great pain in his belly. He groaned. He felt a knife through his stomach and bowels, and blood rising to his mouth. Ramsay put it deep into him, reaching his heart, then pulled it away as quickly as he had thrusted it inside. He looked into his son’s eyes. He saw the usual madness, but also the calm he had himself. That was the thing Ramsay inherited from him. As soon as he wanted, he wouldn’t show any emotion. He just used it against him.

Roose Bolton fell on the floor. He felt sensations and feelings leaving his body. He remembered Robb Stark. He had stabbed him in the heart the same way. Now he knew what the King in the North had felt at this moment, betrayed by the men he trusted. Roose thought him a fool, but as he died, he realized he had been a fool as well. He had trusted his bastard to never kill him. As he laid on his back, he saw Ramsay one last time. No one was more accursed than the kinslayer. His son stabbed him. House Bolton would be accursed forever. He died with these thoughts, cursing the day he raped the miller’s wife and made this monster.

Chapter End Notes

We shall never see his like again. I know this isn’t very imaginative for a chapter, but we got to know more about the things going on north of Moat Cailin through Roose’s perspective. All the same, I know there are some (I’m thinking about someone in particular) who will be happy to not have to suffer chapters from Roose Bolton anymore.

Please review

Next chapter: Trystane
Here were are. The 100th chapter of "A Shadow and a Wolf"). This is quite a short chapter for the occasion however, I have to admit it. It was supposed to be longer at first, but I split it in two parts, and the next chapter is the longest part of the two. If we don't consider the prologue as a chapter, then the next chapter would be the 100th. I hope you'll enjoy it all the same.

After 530 128 words, 1490 comments, 755 kudos and 85 bookmarks, I am surprised of the size this fic took with time. I'm not entirely sure at which point I am and where it will end. I'm probably at half of the story. So there is still a lot ahead.

Thanks to you all, this story is already the longest of all the Tyrion/Sansa fanfics on AO3. (At least, it is officially, but there is the serie "The Changing of Seasons" from SerGoldenhand that is longer, but divided into two fics and not focusing so much on Tyrion/Sansa, especially in the second part.) It is also in 6th position for the number of words among all the fanfictions of ASOIAF and 3rd for the Game of Thrones fanfictions. Among the Tyrion/Sansa fanfictions, it is also the 3rd most read, the 5th most loved (or kudoed), the 2nd most commented (the first being "UNDER THE SUMMER SUN" from Tativi, one of my most regular commentators who's in part responsible for the great number of comments left on my own fic), and the 10th most bookmarked. Everyone who read it encouraged me to keep going on. I thank you all.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TRYSTANE II

“There have been seven murders last night,” said Skahaz mo Kandaq. “Seven freedmen butchered by the Sons of the Harpy.”

“There were also two former masters who were murdered, including Hizdahr zo Loraq’s brother, Akhar,” added Reznak mo Reznak.

“There were thirteen deaths overall,” stated Grey Worm, taciturn as ever. “Seven freedmen, two former masters and four Unsullied.”

They were in the council room of the Great Pyramid, Trystane with Grey Worm, Skahaz, Reznak and four other men who were supposed to rule Meereen. Right now, this couldn’t be called ruling. The city was in chaos, and if they were safe at the top of the Pyramid, the streets of the city were dangerous for everyone, whether you were former slaves or former masters, whether you were loyal to Daenerys Targaryen or to the slavers. There were murders daily, though most of them happened at night and were the work of the Sons of the Harpy. There were few in the light of day. Trystane wondered if some murders against former masters were the work of the Brazen Beasts instead of the Sons of the Harpy. Skahaz was the most zealous supporter of Queen Daenerys, and he had constituted a secret police, freedmen called the Brazen Beasts for the masks they wore, to fight the Sons of the Harpy. The Brazen Beasts had few commanders, and Trystane only knew one, Marghaz zo Loraq, a member of the family whose Hizdahr zo Loraq came from. He had sworn to avenge his cousin by killing as many Sons of the Harpy and their supporters as possible. Trystane had asked to see the other commanders, but Skahaz hadn’t brought them to him despite many demands.

Trystane often had the impression he had no control, even here in the Great Pyramid. About two months after he arrived, he still had to rely entirely on Grey Worm and Malcolm Branfield to keep what little control they had on Meereen. He didn’t know the city, or its people, well enough. The other nobles of the city had acknowledged him because the Unsullied supported him, but they obviously had no love for him and obeyed his orders, when they obeyed them, with reluctance at best. The most fervent supporters of the queen thought he wasn’t strong enough, and the moderate ones thought he wasn’t ready to make the necessary compromises. For them, he was a boy from a foreign land. Malcolm Branfield and Grey Worm had entrusted him with the task of bringing back peace and order to Meereen. So far, Trystane had failed. He couldn’t even bring the members of the government to heel.

“Make the noble families pay like we always do,” said Trystane. Queen Daenerys created a tax while she was still there to discourage the murders. All families of Meereen had to pay each time there was a murder committed by the Sons of the Harpy. So far, it hadn’t proved to be a success, but it was still better than nothing. “What about the fleet? It burned about one month ago. Is there nothing we found about who did this and how?”

“We’ve been searching for the men who did it ever since it happened, but we found nothing yet,” answered Grey Worm.

“What about the Brazen Beasts? Have they found anything?”

“No. They found nothing,” shortly answered Skahaz mo Kandaq. Trystane didn’t know if it was best to hope for this to be true or false.

“Then keep searching. We still have no clue about who leads the Sons of the Harpy. If we discover who burned our fleet, he or they could lead us to their leaders.”

“We have a better way to get the names of the Sons of the Harpy.”

Trystane knew Skahaz would come back with this idea. He always brought it back on the table. “We will not execute innocent children for the crimes of their fathers.”

“What’s the use of hostages if we do not execute them when their parents murder freedmen?”

“We don’t know for sure if their parents are the ones who murder people during the night.”

“Proclaim through all Meereen that you will kill one of the hostages for each night when a freedman is killed, then execute the threat after it happened, and I can promise you someone will speak once they’ve realized we are serious. They will think twice about murdering people in the night when they see their son’s and daughter’s bodies.”

“That’s out of question. Queen Daenerys refused to execute these children while she was there, and I do not intend to go against her will.”

“The queen is no longer here. She was expelled by the Sons of the Harpy, and now Meereen is in chaos.”

“Yes, you’re right. The city is in chaos, but murdering children will not bring back the order. It will only infuriate the great families even more. They will retaliate with even more murders, and all we’ll get through this will be the death of innocent children. We are here to bring back order to Meereen,
“I agree with Prince Trystane. It is in our interest to keep these children alive,” said Reznak mo Reznak.

Trystane was glad of the support from the man, but he knew he would have to argue about this matter again later. He wouldn’t change his mind. Myrcella was killed because of the crimes of her parents and grandparents. He wouldn’t commit the same atrocities than his cousins. He wouldn’t create more enemies to Daenerys Targaryen. She already had too many of them, and he didn’t want to take the risk of killing a child from a family who wasn’t supporting the Sons of the Harpy.

“Do we have more news from Astapor and Yunkai? Have the masters made their intentions clearer?” asked Trystane, trying to get to a matter where they could make some progress.

“They don’t need to,” replied Skahaz. “We know what they want. They want to expel us from Meereen, take it back and re-establish slavery. I say we send them a strong message of our own. Tell them they are not welcomed anymore in Salvor’s Bay.”

“And how do we send them this message?” asked Akaz zo Nobaq, another Meereenese noble. “A simple letter? Or do we send the Unsullied to take back the cities?”

“Out of question,” said Trystane immediately. “The Unsullied are needed here to maintain what little order we have. If they leave, then Meereen will destroy itself from the inside. We cannot take back Astapor and Yunkai, even less keep them. For now, we’ll do nothing about it. We won’t send anything to the two other cities, to not give away any information about the state of Meereen. They may hesitate to act if they have no idea what we’re about to do. Anyway, they will need time to deal with their own internal problems. You cannot take control of a city without difficulties. We all know that only too well.”

They then went to discuss about the olive problems. They had all been cut and burned by the Great Masters when Daenerys Targaryen had marched on Meereen. She had begun to plant them back, and Trystane strived to keep them growing, but they would need years before they began to produce again. The council meeting was dissolved after this and Trystane went back to his chambers, sitting heavily in a chair.

Ruling was much harder than he believed it would be. He hadn’t been prepared to face desperate situations like the one Meereen was in. His family had problems in Dorne with some bannermen, and his father had taught him to handle these problems so that they wouldn’t have to face or neutralize rebellions. However, he didn’t have to experience rebellions, uprisings, revolts or civil wars. He wasn’t ready for this, and yet he had to put an end to the chaos in which Meereen was sent, and to stop slavery from returning at the same time, all this while composing with members of government whose trust he couldn’t be sure of. He even wondered if some of them were not working for the Sons of the Harpy and faking loyalty to Daenerys Targaryen.

Trystane didn’t know what to do. Astapor and Yunkai had fallen back into the hands of the Good Masters and the Wise Masters. Would Meereen follow? If Meereen fell to the slave masters, then Dorne would fall to the Lannisters and the Baratheons. He had to keep the control over Meereen. He couldn’t send their army against Astapor and Yunkai. Then how to deal with the masters who now held these cities? Should he try to negotiate with them? To make peace? Should he do nothing and wait for the masters to attack? He remembered that when Aegon the Conqueror had invaded Dorne, all the houses, great and small, had set aside their differences and united to fight the common enemy. Maybe all the people of Meereen would fight together if war was declared upon them by the other cities, though Trystane feared the Sons of the Harpy would fight against them. No, peace was the only solution, but how to make peace with your enemy when you were weak? Were the slave masters weak like them? He didn’t know. He barely knew what was going on in Meereen outside the Great Pyramid.

The council had taken place at the end of the afternoon. Trystane spent the rest of the evening reading reports about the state of the finances, the fortifications and the food supplies of the city. They needed more money, they needed to repair some sections of the battlements and some towers, and they needed more food. He could still repair the fortifications he supposed. They didn’t lack workers. He should just hope the people would accept to work without fearing reprisals from the Sons of the Harpy. They would also need money to pay these people. He thought they had probably enough for that. He couldn’t order the people of Meereen to work for free, or what would be the difference with slavery? Furthermore, people would be much more motivated to work if they were paid than if they simply ordered public work for the citizens to rebuild the walls.

The cupbearers brought him his meal for tonight. Among them was Bhakaz zo Loraq. He was the son of a cousin of Hizdahr zo Loraq. Trystane liked this one. He was always playful, and was unaware of the terrible events outside the pyramid. After a day of holding court, presiding an unruly council, reading documents and trying to solve problems impossible to solve, Trystane decided to take a glass of wine to soothe his nerves. Ruling Meereen was nothing compared to ruling Dorne from what he saw of his father’s rule. In Dorne, they had peace and prosperity, and their duty was to maintain this peace and this prosperity, not to get peace and prosperity out of war and misery. Trystane was afraid he would deceive his father and fail Dorne, something he couldn’t.

Grey Worm came in, straight like a pillar as always. “What is it, Grey Worm? Another murder?” Trystane asked. Light was gone, and night was dark and good for death. The Sons of the Harpy always worked at night.

“No. I just wanted to say something.” His face was impassive like always. “We conquered Astapor and Yunkai once. We can do it again, and this time execute the masters.”

Trystane sighed. He hoped he could have a quiet night at least. “If the Unsullied march off to reconquer Astapor and Yunkai, who will remain to defend the free people of Meereen?”

“If we do not fight them, how can we stop them?”

“You asked me to bring back peace in this city, and to make sure slavery would never return here. If we abandon Meereen and fail to take back Astapor and Yunkai, all this will have been for nothing.”

“You swore to put an end to slavery. I supported you for this.”

“I will not put an end to slavery by sending you to death against the Good and the Wise Masters. For now, we must deal with the problems of our city. The problems here, in Meereen. Once we can be sure the Sons of the Harpy are no longer a major threat, we can deal with the other cities.”

Despite his stony face, it was obvious the Commander of the Unsullied didn’t agree with him. Trystane wondered if he would keep them on his side for long. Only Malcolm Branfield seemed to be truly loyal to him, and maybe a few cupbearers.

“Come on, Grey Worm. Let’s not think about the problems of Meereen for some time.” Trystane poured a second cup of wine on the small table before him. “Here, take one.”

“Unsullied never drink.”

Trystane frowned. “Why not?”

“Rules.”
“Queen Daenerys forbade you from drinking?”

“Not Queen Daenerys.”

“Then who? Your former masters?” Trystane supposed it was the case with the absence of answer that followed. He sighed. “Drink it. See it like a way to fight against the slavers.”

The Unsullied took the cup after some time and carefully took a gulp. He grimaced and put it back on the table. “Tastes like it has turned.”

“Fermentation. You really never drank?”

“Unsullied never drink,” he repeated, still standing tall while Trystane remained sitting.

“It’s not the best wine there is. I find the ones in Dorne much better.” He took another sip. “Myrcella loved them. She knew some when she arrived at Sunspear. She said her uncle had made her try a few ones when he visited her in King’s Landing. He was drunk most of the time and made jokes that had her and her little brother laugh until they couldn’t breathe. She said he was the one she loved the most in her family, even more than her mother. She told me she would have liked him to be present the day we would wed.”

Trystane dropped off his cup. Grey Worm was looking at him skeptically. “You loved the Princess Myrcella?” he asked. Grey Worm was aware that Trystane had been betrothed before he came here, and he knew as well why his father had arranged this betrothal.

“I did,” conceded Trystane. “My father said she was born of incest, but… but I can’t bring myself to believe it. She was so good, and kind. Maybe she was the only legitimate child of Robert Baratheon and her two brothers come from an incest. I hope so.”

The Commander of the Unsullied nodded slowly. Strangely, he looked sad now. “I will go back to patrol.”

He bowed and left. Later that night, Trystane thought about what he should do about Astapor and Yunkai. He didn’t have the means to go to war against them, and if he couldn’t go to war against them, he had no choice but to make peace with them. But at what price? Trystane doubted the masters would accept peace if it involved the abolition of slavery. They were fighting for slavery. How could he bring back peace to Meereen without giving the masters what they wanted? Could a compromise be reached? His father managed to deal with the Lannisters and to make compromises with them. However, he had worked against them in secret for all these years. Trystane would be ready to bet the masters would do the same if they ever accepted a deal without full return of slavery.

When he fell asleep, Trystane Martell dreamed. And like every night, Myrcella was there. They walked around the Water Gardens, like they used to do. She was beautiful like always, her golden hair shining more than ever in the sun of Dorne. For hours, they walked, Trystane admiring her. When he woke up, he was crying like he always did each morning, wishing his dreams were real and the reality was a nightmare. As he was getting dressed, Malcolm Branfield came to see him.

“There’s someone asking to see the ruler of Meereen,” he said.

“Can’t it wait?” asked Trystane. He never felt like he could receive petitioners early in the morning. “He could wait for the time when I’ll be holding court.”

“I’m afraid this person won’t wait.”

“What does this man want?” Trystane was exasperated. What was so important for this man to not wait until the time for petitioners?

“Who said anything about a man?” replied Branfield.

Chapter End Notes

Since we reached the 100th chapter, I would like to know what you think of it up to now. Tell me what you liked and what you hated (you can tell me it's too long, as if I didn't know it already :D). You can also tell me what you wish to see in the future chapters, though I must warn you most of the story is already decided and fixed, but I could add a few details or minor plotlines... if that doesn't make it even longer. I would also like it if you could put a note on 10.

Next chapter: a new POV (I wish it had been the 100th chapter, since I was very eager to introduce this new character)
Here's a character I was very eager to bring in this story. Kinvara will have a huge role to play in this fic, and I can't wait to show you more of her.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The ebony bench was empty. She knew it would be, but to know and to see were two different things. There were unpleasant truths, truths we didn’t want to face, truths we refused to accept as the truth because we didn’t want them to be the truth. There were also truths we couldn’t be sure of. When we couldn’t be sure of something, then we had to believe in them. Here, she had to believe. Belief was her life. Faith was her life, and now she needed to believe in her god more than ever. She needed to have faith in the Lord of Light, that he would bring Daenerys Stormborn, Of the House Targaryen, the First of Her Name, the Unburnt, Queen of Meereen, Queen of the Andals and the First Men and the Rhoynar, Khaleesi of the Great Grass Sea, the Breaker of Chains, the Mother of Dragons, back to her people. The world would need her very soon. Kinvara saw it in the flames. The Lord of Light had talked to her for years, and her last visions showed her the time was coming. The young woman with blond hair, flying on the back of a dragon. The vision came back again, and again. Daenerys Stormborn was the only one who could save them. She was the prince that was promised, and her dragons would breathe the fire that would keep the living away from the dead, but for that she would need Kinvara’s help. Meereen couldn’t fall. Astapor and Yunkai had gone back to the Masters. If Meereen went back to slavery, then all would be lost, for Essos and for Westeros. She knew what she had to do. It was what the Lord willed. And she felt this was what she had to do.

The journey from Volantis had been long, but they had no problem on the way. The Lord of Light had assured her their journey would only be tiresome, and everything went as the Lord of Light showed. They met no ships of slave merchants, which was a good thing for the slavers they would have possibly met. Kinvara had arrived three days ago, accompanied with forty priests of her order, the best ones. She had met the other priests who were already in Meereen. Some came from Volantis, others came from other cities, but they acknowledged her high rank. They didn’t need a lot to see that she was serving the Lord of Light.

The situation in Meereen was very poor. People were being assassinated each night by the men hiding behind masks. These men served the Evil, the Great Other whose name must never be said. They hid in the shadows, waiting for the right moment to strike the innocents. They waited, just like their master. Just like the Masters. There were so many things alike between the Masters in Essos and the Great Other. There had been a time when she thought there were no differences between the two. Now she knew better, but still, the resemblance was striking. All the more reasons to fight the Sons of the Harpy.

Two men came from the passage behind the bench at the top of the stairs. One was very young, barely a man. He had black curly hair and wore clothes that were obviously not from Essos. He was certainly the foreign prince. The other man at his side was older, with brown short hair and a beard, and foreign clothes as well, though not in the same style. They both carried a sword at their belt.

Zanrush stepped before to introduce her. He had come to Meereen on Kinvara’s orders not long after the city was taken by Daenerys and the people listened to him with attention. To the opposite of many people speaking against the former masters, he hadn’t been killed. The servants of the Great Other who hid behind masks and hit in the night couldn’t kill him.

“You stand in the presence of Kinvara, High Priestess of the Red Temple of Volantis, the Flame of Truth, the Light of Wisdom, the First Servant of the Lord of Light.” Zanrush stepped aside and let her move forward.

“Welcome to Meereen,” said the young man in a poor High Valyrian. “I am…”

“Prince Trystane Martell,” completed Kinvara in the common tongue before he could finish. “Prince of Dorne and heir to Sunspear, son of Doran Martell and Mellario of Norvos.” She turned towards the other man. “And you must be Malcolm Branfield, son of Ethan Branfield and Talia Branfield, last surviving member of House Branfield. We may talk in the common tongue. I know it very well and your Valyrian seems limited.”

They both looked surprised that she knew who they were and such details. “Thank you. May we know why you asked for this audience, my lady?” asked the young prince in his mother tongue.

“I am no lady, Prince Trystane.” Red Priestesses were no ladies. Those few who were before they joined the order abandoned their titles. Kinvara may wear costly gowns, but she was no lady. She never was a lady, and she would never be.

“Forgive me. How shall we call you?” He was clearly uncomfortable. Kinvara allowed a quick smile to appear on her face.

“You can call me by my name, but if you want to use a proper title, I suppose High Priestess will do.”

“Very well, High Priestess. May we know…”

“I came to help.” She slowly walked to the stairs, climbing them. “Daenerys Stormborn is the one who was promised. From the fire she was reborn to remake the world. She has freed the slaves from their chains and crucified the Masters for their sins.”

“She did, indeed.” Trystane Martell looked uncertain.

“Her dragons are fire made flesh, a gift from the Lord of Light. The dragons will purify nonbelievers by the thousands, burning their sins and flesh away.”

The two men looked at each other before the young prince replied again. “Our queen has followers of many different faiths. I don’t believe she has the intention of burning people who don’t follow the Lord of Light, or that she would like the idea.”

Kinvara smiled again. They heard what she said, but they didn’t understand the words. They didn’t know. “Many people believe in many gods. All of them, they’re looking for the true god, the only one that is true, even if they don’t know it. They are all looking for the truth. These people are believers, no matter the face or the faces their worship takes.”

“I follow the Seven for myself, High Priestess,” intervened Malcolm Branfield. “I have seen one of your kind in King’s Landing once. Thoros of Myr. He spent more time drinking and whoring than anything else.”
“What became of Thoros is very regretful. The High Priest of the time wanted him to bring the Lord of Light in King Robert’s heart, but instead Thoros abandoned the Lord of Light. We pray for him each day, in the hope that he will find his way back to our Lord.”

“There is word that there was another Red Priestess advising Stannis Baratheon. She claimed that he was the Lord’s Chosen One, and Stannis burned septs and godwoods everywhere he went on her advice. In the end, he was defeated at the Battle of Blackwater, and the forces he has left can barely claim to be an army.”

This man obviously wasn’t well disposed towards her. Kinvara was used to this. Trystane Martell didn’t seem to like what was going on. He was probably afraid that would make her angry against them, but it didn’t. If she was angry at someone, it was against Melisandre, and that Stannis who followed her.

“You may be interested to know that Stannis Baratheon was recently defeated for good at Winterfell. He’s dead.” The two men were taken aback. They obviously didn’t know about this. News travelled slowly. “Men and women make mistakes. Even honest servants of the Lord of Light. Melisandre saw in Stannis Baratheon Azor Ahai reborn, but she was wrong. She confused her own beliefs and her wishes for our Lord’s will, and this led her to commit atrocities. She wasn’t one of us. She came from Asshai. She wasn’t attached to the Red Temple of Volantis and we never sent her to Dragonstone. My order doesn’t burn people, godwoods or septs.” Not as long as I lead our order. “We only try to show the way to the people. We don’t force them to take it. This is not what the Lord asks from us.”

“You reassure us, High Priestess,” said the prince quickly. The other man didn’t seem entirely convinced. “We thank you for the news concerning Stannis Baratheon.”

“You must be very happy about his death,” she said.

“Pardon me.” He was skeptical.

“Stannis Baratheon claimed the Iron Throne was his, just like Daenerys Stormborn. His death means there are less people between her and her family’s crown. And didn’t he want to kill someone you cared about, Prince Trystane?”

The young man was agape before her words. He didn’t expect her to know this. She resumed. “I have brought with me my most eloquent priests. They will spread the word in all cities. Daenerys has been sent to lead the people against the darkness in this war and in the great war still to come.”

“We thank you, High Priestess,” said the prince, trying to gain back his composure. “We appreciate your support to our queen. You don’t need to fear for your priests, they will be allowed to preach as long as they respect the freedom of religion.”

“My priests need not to fear you. What they need to fear are the men behind masks in the darkness. They rule over the city more than you do. Can you claim to rule beyond these walls?”

The man with a beard moved forward, a threatening look on his face. “Listen, my lady…”

“I am no lady, and you will be the one to listen, Malcolm Branfield. You want your queen to be worshipped and obeyed. And while she’s gone, you want her advisors to be worshipped and obeyed.”

“We would settle for obeyed,” said Prince Trystane.

“And yet you are not obeyed. Chaos and evil have taken hold on this city. You cannot rule it alone and you know it. You don’t even know who your enemies are. I told you that Stannis Baratheon was dead, but this is far from the only information I have. In Volantis, half the people follow the Lord of Light. And there are many more following him all over Essos. In Braavos, in Lys, in Myr, in Pentos, in New Ghis, even in Astapor and Yunkai. Don’t you want to know what’s going on outside the walls of Meereen?” The two now looked at her with an intrigued expression. She smiled wickedly at them. “The truth is not meant to be hidden. Not forever. But sometimes, it may be best to hide it from some people who could use it unwisely.”

She shot a glance around her. There were Unsullied standing guard everywhere. She wouldn’t tell the truth before all of them. Trystane Martell and Malcolm Branfield exchanged looks again, then stared at her before going back to looking at each other.

“Go and bring Grey Worm,” ordered the prince. The other man bowed and left, eyeing Kinvara.
Trystane Martell addressed her again. “Please follow me, High Priestess. There is a place where we will be more at ease to speak about these things.”

He walked through the passage and Kinvara followed his way. They climbed stairs that led to what Kinvara supposed was the apex of the Great Pyramid of Meereen. She wasn’t surprised that Prince Trystane Martell had chosen this place to live, or that the former Masters had built it to live at the top.
The powerful always wanted to be higher than the powerless. It made them feel powerful and made them convinced that they had the right to do what they wanted to those below them. Kinvara wasn’t impressed by these structures. Not anymore. She had seen taller things than these huge stones put together in the shape of a pointy end. How many people died to build this heap of blocks?

Trystane Martell invited her to sit and offered her some wine. She raised her hand in refusal. “Thank you, Prince Trystane, but I do not drink.”

“You too? Are the Red Priests forbidden to drink?” he asked.

“No. The Lord of Light doesn’t stop us from enjoying life. We are not septons and septas. Quite the opposite, our Lord encourages it. But I don’t like wine.”

The Dornishman sat face to her. “Very well.” He took a sip. “You’re not the only one to dislike wine here, I can tell you.”

“Truth be told, I hate wine. Wine brings out the darkness from men and women and blinds them, making them do things they wouldn’t do otherwise.”

The young man looked uncertain. “It depends. If we do not exaggerate, there’s nothing wrong with drinking.”

“No, indeed. Many people drink because they like wine, or they even believe it will make them feel better. Some fools even believe it makes them stronger. They have the impression it will help them forget everything that’s wrong with the world, or their regrets, or their weakness, or their sadness.”
She noticed a change of expression on the prince’s face, but she kept talking. “Some also drink wine because it’s a way to show that they are richer and live better than their brothers and sisters.”

“What do you mean?” Trystane Martell had a questioning look.

“In the eyes of our Lord, there is no difference between the slave and the master, the child and the adult, the man and the woman, the rich man and the poor man, the Westerosi and the Essosi, for we all are people with sins who will have to face him one day. But there are people who don’t want to accept this simple truth because it doesn’t suit them. They prefer to believe they are superior, and they surround themselves with gold, servants, great houses, silks and the finest wines to feel they are above the others. Yourself, Prince Trystane, do you feel superior to those who are dying in the streets while you stay between the walls of this pyramid, well fed and well protected? And did you feel any different back when you lived in Dorne, away from the common people and their misery inside the place you call the Water Gardens?"

Kinvara watched his reaction. It was probably the first time he was questioned about this. He didn’t seem able to answer for some time. Some anger was visible on his face. “I am a Prince of Dorne,” he finally said. “I was born to rule my people. Yes, I am above them, I live better than them, but I must also look after them. My father did so all his life. I’m trying to save this city, to save my family, and to save my people. I came here seeking the help of Queen Daenerys to save the people of Dorne, and I will not rest until I succeed.”

At least, this one considered he had duties towards the people, even if he thought himself superior to them. All the same, Kinvara gave him an advice she hoped he would remember. “Don’t forget that your power comes from the people, my prince. Without them, you are powerless. You will not defeat the enemies of our queen without their support.”

Malcolm Branfield came back at this moment with an Unsullied. This one didn’t wear his helmet or his armor. The Westerosi who accompanied him made the presentations.

“This is Grey Worm. He is the commander of the Unsullied.”

The commander of the Unsullied didn’t move or speak or do anything to show he acknowledged her presence. He could have been a statue. But he stared at her. Kinvara didn’t blame him. He was a slave. He had been taken away from his parents at the age of five and forced into a brutal training that stripped him of all individuality, empathy, self-worth and consciousness. He was fully castrated not long after, before he could even know what it was to feel desire, was forced to drink an elixir that made him immune to any pain for years. He was given a puppy after he was cut, only to be forced to kill him the next year, under the threat of being fed to the surviving dogs if he refused. The day he received his cap, he had to kill a newborn slave under the eyes of his mother, then to pay the owner of the slave a silver mark. She knew what it was to be a slave, and she didn’t blame any of them for the cruelties they had to perform under the orders of their masters. Without Daenerys Stormborn, the Unsullied would still be slaves forced to kill women, children and innocent men. Now, they were defenders of freedom.

“High Priestess Kinvara,” said the Prince of Dorne, “we understood that you had information to share with us, but that you didn’t want to tell us with so many people around. You can trust me, Malcolm and Grey Worm.”

“It’s alright. You understand I must be careful to who I divulge information. The servants of the darkness can be everywhere, and I know some Unsullied are visiting brothels. It wouldn’t do if one of them was to let escape some misplaced words while the men with golden masks are around.”

“Yes, we know,” said Malcolm Branfield, a little exasperated. “Now, can you tell us what is it that you couldn’t say in front of the Unsullied?”

This man didn’t like her. All the same, she smiled sweetly. “Have you ever wondered who is hiding behind the masks of the Harpies?”

“Of course, we have. We’ve been fighting them for months. Do you really think we never asked ourselves the question? We’re asking ourselves every day.”

“The Unsullied have found nothing about the Sons of the Harpy. We arrested one a long time ago, but he wouldn’t speak,” said the Unsullied.
“That’s no surprise. The Sons of the Harpy are a very heterogeneous group. There are former Masters and former slaves all alike among them. They fight for the return of slavery, for freeing Meereen from its foreign rulers, or for money.”

“Why would a former slave fight to bring back slavery?” asked the heir to Sunspear.

“Why some men prefer darkness to light? Evil to good? Some believe they were better off as slaves, or only see Daenerys Stormborn as a foreign master who replaced the local ones. And some men will always be ready to do everything for gold.”

“You mean the Sons of the Harpy are paid?”

“Some of them. And the people who are leading them make sure they never give away any information about their movement, and that if they ever try to leave their group, they won’t leave it alive.”

“That’s very good to say, but that won’t help us to stop them. We still don’t know which Masters of Meereen are commanding them,” commented the Branfield.

“You’re not asking yourself the right questions, Malcolm Branfield.”

“What does it mean? We’re looking for the people leading the Sons of the Harpy. If we ever want to stop them, then we must find their leaders.”

“True enough, but you’re not looking for their leaders in the right place.” They all had questioning looks now, even the former slave. “You stayed inside the walls of Meereen for too long. You don’t know well enough what’s going on outside. Did you really think the other cities would let Daenerys Stormborn proclaim herself Queen of Meereen and abolish slavery without a fight?”

“Wait a minute,” said Trystane Martell, a flash of understanding coming to his face. “Are you telling us that the Sons of the Harpy are supported by the other cities of Slavor’s Bay?”

“Maybe,” she answered, remaining cryptic. “But perhaps it would be better if I explained you everything that went on while you tried to hold the great city of Meereen. As I said, in Volantis, half the people follow the Lord of Light. Not only slaves, but also free men and women, and even some masters. Among the slaves who worship R’hillor, some are working for powerful and rich masters, and even for the triarchs. They hear and see things, and some come to tell us about it. They dare not lie, for we can see their lies before they come. I saw the sack of Astapor before it even happened in the flames. At the time, I was the Second Servant of the Lord of Light. Benerro was High Priest in Volantis. He began to preach that our savior was coming, that he would break the chains of the slaves. I did too, and all our order did as well. When Daenerys Stormborn freed the Unsullied, it was the proof that our Lord’s Chosen One had come. But at the time, the Masters of Volantis didn’t really notice the threat she was. Astapor was almost a city in ruins, the poorer of all Slavor’s Bay. Anyway, the Masters of Volantis don’t believe in war. Since the failure of the Volantenese Freehold after the Doom of Valyria, they turned to trade to impose the hegemony of Volantis over the Free Cities. They couldn’t care less about the fate of Astapor, and after Cleon the Butcher took power and enslaved the former Good Masters, they had even less cause to worry.”

“But then, Daenerys Stormborn marched on Yunkai and forced them to abolish slavery as well. Yunkai was much richer than Astapor. The Masters of Volantis began to think our queen could be dangerous, but before they could do anything, Meereen fell as well. Then they realized the danger the Mother of Dragons was. Slave trade was disrupted, and it is one of the main sources of riches for the Masters of Volantis. They helped the Wise Masters of Yunkai to seize back power and encouraged chaos in Astapor, and here as well.”
“You mean they created the Sons of the Harpy,” said Branfield.

“No. At the beginning, the Sons of the Harpy were formed and led by the Great Masters who wanted to get rid of Daenerys Stormborn. They were helped by the Masters of Yunkai and Volantis, but they were the ones leading the golden masks. But then Hizdahr zo Loraq convinced the Wise Masters to share the power with the former slaves, and afterwards Daenerys Stormborn chose to marry him. Hizdahr zo Loraq convinced the Masters of Meereen to stop their uprising. Soon, the son of a Great Master would be King of Meereen, and he would bear the name of his father, or so they thought. He could even bring back slavery one day. The Great Masters were not idiots. They knew Daenerys Stormborn was ready to kill them all. She proved it when she crucified so many of them, and when she had the leader of a great family fed to her dragons. They were afraid. It wasn’t difficult for Hizdahr zo Loraq to bring them to his side. So they abandoned their rebellion.”

“However, the Masters of Yunkai and Volantis were not of that opinion. They were not threatened directly by Daenerys Stormborn. They didn’t fear her as much as their fellows from Meereen. For them, she mostly disrupted a trade that made them rich. So they secretly had the Sons of the Harpy turned to their cause. They had agents in Meereen who paid them handsomely. And they organized the attack in the Great Pit of Daznak.”

“The Masters of Yunkai and Volantis were behind the events at Daznak’s Pit?” asked Grey Worm, saying something for the first time.

“They were. It was the perfect opportunity. Daenerys Stormborn, her closest advisors and all the Great Masters of Meereen would be there, together in the same place. They were planning to kill them all.”

“Even the Masters of Meereen? All of them?” asked Malcolm Branfield, incredulous.

“All of them,” she confirmed.

“But why would they do that?” wondered the young prince. “I may understand they wanted to kill Hizdahr zo Loraq and those who supported the queen, but why slaughter all the Great Masters? Surely some would enjoy slavery to come back. They were not their enemies.”

“Really? In Westeros, all the lords and landed knights support serfdom. Does that make them friends?” It was clear from the expression on all their faces that they didn’t think so. “Meereen was the most powerful of all the cities in Slavor’s Bay before Daenerys Stormborn came. Yunkai was the second, and it wasn’t sacked by Daenerys’ army like Astapor. These cities are no friends. At best, they are allies when it serves their interests. Volantis wants to spread its influence, and what better way to do that than to take Meereen and make both Astapor and Yunkai some sort of protectorate. They helped the Wise Masters and the Good Masters to take back power in their respectful cities after the attack on the Great Pit of Daznak, and now the three groups of Masters are working together to keep the Sons of the Harpy spreading chaos into Meereen.”

“So this is not a local rebellion,” said the Martell prince. “This is a seditious movement funded by the other cities.”

“I can’t believe the Great Masters have no longer any hand in it,” said Malcolm Branfield.

“Some may still be part of the movement,” conceded Kinvara, “but very few. After all, many Meereenese Masters died at Daznak’s Pit, and many Masters who once supported the Sons of the Harpy know that they killed Masters who created them. Those who survived probably suspect the movement is no longer into their hands, or that some of their friends turned against them.”
“We know who are our enemies,” said Grey Worm. “We must march on Astapor and Yunkai now.”

“We will discuss about it later, Grey Worm.” The Prince of Dorne shut the Commander of the Unsullied. Trystane Martell didn’t trust her to discuss these matters in her presence.

Kinvara rose from her seat. “You must also know that before I left Volantis, the triarchs were arming a fleet. Officially, it is meant to intervene in a conflict between Myr and Lys, but it is likely that its true purpose is to attack you. Beware of the Good Masters of Astapor, the Wise Masters of Yunkai and the benevolent enslavers of Volantis. They will do everything to bring Meereen down. That is all I had to tell you.” For the time being.

Trystane Martell nodded and stood up. “Thank you, High Priestess. We won’t forget your help.”

“I hope you won’t. Remember. Daenerys Stormborn almost has no allies here in Slavor’s Bay. Only the common people supported her. If you want Meereen to survive and prevent slavery from returning, you will need the people, sooner or later.”

She left on these words. In the Hall, she found Zanrush waiting for her and they walked outside the Pyramid together. Her fellow priest said nothing. No one ever asked anything to the High Priest, or the High Priestess in this case, among their order, except for the Second Servant. They all had to wait for Kinvara to speak first.

“They may be able to help us,” she said once they were far enough.

“For now, they haven’t been able to do much. The people will have to defend their freedom against the servants of the Great Other by themselves,” he replied. Zanrush didn’t believe in politics. His father had been a triarch of Volantis, but the son had decided to give up everything to join the Faith in R’hllor. He had seen too many slaves being mutilated, beaten or killed for nothing worse than saying a wrong word, and was disgusted by all the corruption and lick-spitting among the noble men and noble women of Volantis. It was the idea that all men were equals before the Lord of Light that brought him to them at first, and now he was a leal servant of R’hllor.

“People need leaders, Zanrush. These men speak for the queen in her absence. We need them, whether we like it or not.”

“They’re hiding in their Pyramid while the people suffer in the streets.”

“We cannot help that. They are highborn people.”

“Like I was.” That was no excuse in his eyes.

“Daenerys Targaryen chose them. Do you doubt the decisions of the Lord’s Chosen One?”

“No. But this prince… He wasn’t chosen by her, and he does nothing.”

“He will have a part to play in the great war to come. I saw it in the flames.”

“If you say so,” said Zanrush, resigned.

“Our duty is to spread the word that Daenerys Stormborn is Azor Ahai reborn. We must convince everyone of that, and bring them to fight for her. This is more important than slavery. The Great Other. I can see him better every day. Daenerys Stormborn will come back, but she won’t stay here for long.”

“Then we must convince the people to fight in her stead.”
“And that’s what we’re going to do. Daenerys Stormborn brought the freedom to all these men and women, and our duty is to make them see they must fight to keep it.”

They walked in silence afterwards. There were few people in the streets. Zanrush said the situation was even worse weeks ago. No one dared to leave their homes, day or night. There were graffiti on walls. “KILL THE MASTERS”. “MHYSA IS A MASTER”. “DEATH TO FOREIGN INVADERS”. “ONLY MASTERS AND COWARDS HIDE BEHIND MASKS”. The people whose path they crossed were all whispering. Some of them pointed her to their friends. They had seen Red Priests before, but never someone like Kinvara. If only they knew what they were really looking at. Farther on the street, a woman sat against a wall, a feeding bowl in her left hand while she held a baby feeding at her breast with her right arm.

Kinvara got near the woman. She had ragged clothes, brown eyes, black hair and a tanned skin. The baby was a girl. Kinvara knelt to be at the level of that poor woman.

“What’s her name?” she asked kindly.

“Laraza,” the poor mother answered weakly.

“You have nothing to fear from me. May I hold her a second? I won’t do her any harm.”

Uncertain, the woman let Kinvara hold the baby. This little girl was beautiful, like all babies were. She smiled sadly at her, and the little girl smiled in return. Kinvara put a hand on her forehead, saying a prayer. Lord of Light, protect this child. She gave her back to her mother and put a silver mark in her hand.

“She is strong. Take care of her. May the Lord of Light watch over you.”

The woman bowed her head in recognition. As she walked away with Zanrush to a reunion of the followers of R’hillor, Kinvara remembered another girl who once had a daughter of the same age. A mother who abandoned her daughter. Her baby. At the assembly, she spoke to the people, about how it was their duty to fight for their freedom and for Daenerys Stormborn, telling the Sons of the Harpy were servants of the Great Other who hid in the darkness like all his servants until the right time came, convincing them they could choose between fighting for freedom or slavery, life or death. The people assembled agreed with her. Her words had much more power than those of Zanrush. But at the same time, she couldn’t stop thinking about the mother who abandoned her child.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion
Ser Jocelyn Waterfell was a tall man with freckles all over his face. His arms were a green waterfall with blue birds flying over. Tyrion remembered that House Waterfell was among those who claimed to have left the Reach along with the Manderlys when they were exiled by the Gardeners, though some maesters were unsure if they were truly exiled. Still, they were among the most loyal bannermen of House Manderly. He had come this morning by boat, escorted by Howland Reed’s men through the swamps of the Neck.

In the command tent, Tyrion and Sansa were there along with Daven, Bronn and Lyle Crakehall for the Westerlands, Lady Mira and her husband for the Hightowers, Ser Brynden Tully, Karyl Vance, Perwyn Frey and Clement Piper for the Riverlands, Howland Reed and Wylis Manderly for the North. They were all there to speak with the envoy of the Manderly forces.

Ser Wylis Manderly, Lord Wyman’s firstborn son and heir to White Harbor, had been held prisoner at Harrenhal for years now, ever since the Battle of the Green Fork where he was captured. With his fat belly, there was no doubt about him being a Manderly. His captivity in Harrenhal had broken him, especially with the horrible treatments he suffered at the hands of the Mountain, but his condition had improved considerably after Tyrion had him brought from Harrenhal by Bronn. Lord Wyman Manderly had accepted to help Tyrion against the Boltons in exchange for his eldest son’s freedom, but Tyrion would send him to White Harbor once Moat Cailin was taken and their army joined with the forces of House Manderly. Tyrion didn’t want to take any chance with the Northerners after what happened at the Red Wedding. If Wyman Manderly wanted his son back, he would need to get the Lannisters inside the North first.

“It is a pleasure to see you alive, Ser Wylis,” said Ser Jocelyn. “Your lord father will be more than pleased by your return.”

“I’m sure he will be,” said Tyrion, “but to come back he will need to get through Moat Cailin, and to get through Moat Cailin, we must take it from the Dustins and the Cerwyns. Are your men in position, Ser Jocelyn?”

“They are only two days of march from here. I was sent ahead after Ser Forley Prester came to us.”

“May we know why it took you so much time to come here? We’ve been sitting on our arses in swamps for months,” said the Blackfish. Most of the lords obviously agreed with him, and Tyrion was among them.

“We were securing Barrow Hall and Hornwood, and we wanted to be sure we had enough men to take Moat Cailin before we attacked,” tried to explain the knight.

“You lost months to take fortresses while we could all have died here? Do you know how dangerous it is to remain in the Neck for so long? We lost many men to sickness and cold. We’re lucky to be in the autumn, or else bugs would have spread diseases to all our men.”

“We will deal with this later,” interrupted Tyrion. It wasn’t time to put the Manderlys against them when they needed their army to take Moat Cailin. “How many men are coming, Ser Jocelyn?”

“Two thousand,” Ser Jocelyn replied.

“That’s more than those you brought when Robb Stark rode in the south,” commented the Blackfish.

“We had to make the levies very quickly back then,” explained Ser Wylis. “We couldn’t muster more on such short notice. My father probably had more time to assemble men this time.”

“And we have the support of the Hornwoods,” added the knight of House Waterfell. “They are marching with us. We left garrisons at Hornwood and Barrow Hall, so we have control over the southern part of the North. Our army can now give all its attention to conquering Moat Cailin.”

“Very well. We will need to attack from both sides at the same time,” said Tyrion.

“Lord Tyrion is right,” said Daven. “As soon as you reach Moat Cailin, build rams and ladders as quickly as possible. It should be done within a few days. After that, we may launch a coordinated assault from both sides and take the fortress once and for all.”

“The best time would probably be at dawn,” said the Blackfish. “We may place some of our men in front of their battlements from both sides the day before, and keep them on guard at night while the others get rest. It will force the defenders of Moat Cailin to stay awake all night, and at dawn they will be tired while our men will be rested. We will send those who could sleep during the night against the walls.”

“We already made three attempts against the place, and each time we lost hundreds of men,” opposed Ser Gerold Hightower. “What if the fourth was the same?”

“It won’t be the same. Not with the Manderlys attacking from the other side,” answered Daven.

“Shouldn’t we at least use siege towers along with the rams and the ladders we built? The assault might go better.”

“For any other castle, maybe, but not for Moat Cailin. Siege towers will be almost impossible to move in the marshes. We will have to do with rams and ladders.”

“I will lead the first wave,” roared Ser Lyle Crakehall. “I want to be the first one on the battlements. It’s been too long since I had a proper fight.”

It was at this time Lady Mira Forrester… Hightower, stepped into the conversation. “Ser Lyle, the intent of the southern attack is not to take the walls of Moat Cailin. It is a diversion. The Westermen, the Rivermen, the Hightowers and the crannogmen are supposed to attack the southern part of the castle to bring as many defenders as possible on this side, while the Manderlys will take the walls on the northern part.”
The Strongboar looked at the northern girl with a strange look, but an exchange of glares with Tyrion made him understand that the young lady was right. Lyle Crakehall was of those who believed the place of a woman was the birthing bed, not war councils.

"Then in this case, my lord," resumed the knight, "let me go north. I want to be with the Manderlys when they take those damn ruins. I’m sick of staying here doing nothing."

"As you wish, Ser Lyle," answered Tyrion. "You will leave with Ser Jocelyn when he goes back to the Manderlys. I will give you two hundred more men. I suppose the crannogmen will be able to make them go around Moat Cailin."

"We will," replied shortly the Lord of Greywater Watch. He worked with the Lannisters to bring Roose Bolton down, but that didn’t make him a friend of Tyrion. His nephew had killed his best friend.

"Very well. Ser Brynden and Ser Daven will lead the assault on the southern side while the Manderlys attack on the northern side. When your men are ready, Ser Jocelyn, send us someone to decide when to attack. Lord Reed’s men will make sure they reach us. In the meantime, I want all of you to prepare your men for the fight. Make sure the rams and the trebuchets are ready. Lord Reed, can we count on your men to keep harassing the garrison of Moat Cailin?"

"Of course."

"Then I suppose we have nothing else to talk about." Tyrion thought to conclude the council on this. He wanted to spend some time with Sansa. These last days, after her sister had been found back, Sansa spent a lot of time with her, and with Lady Mira too. It diminished the time she and Tyrion could spend together. Before they could start to leave, Ser Waterfell said something else that caught their attention.

"My lords, before we all leave, I think you ought to know something. We received the news not long before I came here. Roose Bolton is dead."

The pavilion went totally silent within a second. Everyone was looking at the knight with rounded eyes and an open mouth, incapable of saying anything. The silence lingered for a very long time, and finally Bronn broke it.

"Well, it seems the kings are not the only ones dying like flies these days. Wardens of the North too." He drank from a cup of wine before him as he said that, which earned a few angry glares from the river lords and the Northerners.

"What happened? How did he die? How do you know it?" asked Sansa.

"A raven was sent to Barrow Hall from Winterfell. We believe the same message was sent all over the North. According to it, Roose Bolton was poisoned by his enemies," summarized the bannerman.

"Poisoned by his enemies?"

"That’s what the message said. It gave no other detail about Lord Bolton’s death."

How strange. Roose Bolton died all of a sudden, poisoned by his enemies. Which enemies?

"You have men inside Winterfell, Lord Tyrion," said the Blackfish. "Is it their work?"

"I doubt it," Tyrion answered. "I sent them to collect information, not to commit murders. And I sent them no order about killing anyone. I doubt this is their doing. If I had to bet on the identity of Roose Bolton’s murderer, I would choose his son.”

“His son?”

“Do you really believe that a mad dog who uses his spare time to skin people alive and hunt young women in the woods would hesitate to kill his own father? There are rumors that he murdered his own brother, Domerice Bolton, Roose Bolton’s legitimate son. And the mention of enemies is quite vague if you want my opinion.”

All the lords and knights were obviously disgusted, except Bronn maybe. Ser Jocelyn wasn’t done with news. “There was something else that was told in the message. Ramsay Bolton took the place of his father. He declared himself Lord of Winterfell, but also King in the North.” That brought a lot of reaction in the tent. “He ordered all lords of the North to come to Winterfell, to pledge their banners and to bend the knee to him. He swore to defend the North against its enemies and the foreign invaders. He proclaimed that all those who would collaborate with them would be considered traitors to the North, but that those who already supported the invaders could get a pardon if they abandoned them immediately and came to Winterfell.”

“An interesting offer,” commented Tyrion. “What do you make of it?” He was asking this question to Howland Reed and Ser Wylis.

“My father will never support a Bolton. Not after the Twins. Not after what happened to Wendel,” said the Manderly.

“I would rather die than serve a bastard of the man who murdered Ned’s son,” replied the Lord of Greywater Watch. Tyrion wondered if Lord Reed was so angry because a bastard had proclaimed himself King in the North, or because it was Roose Bolton’s son. After all, Ned Stark had brought a bastard at Winterfell after he and Howland Reed went to the Tower of Joy at the end of Robert’s Rebellion.

“What about Arya Stark? Do we have any news about her?” asked Lord Vance. The army still ignored they had the real Arya Stark with them. For everyone but a few, she was Lord Aran Fenn’s daughter.

“Nothing was said about her in the message,” answered Ser Jocelyn.

“Well, nothing has changed,” said Tyrion. “Arya Stark is still at Winterfell, being tortured by a mad man who now styles himself King in the North, the castle is still between the hands of the Boltons, and considering what we know of Ramsay, I’m afraid things will get even worse for the Northerners from now on with such a king.”

“He’s not our king,” almost shouted Howland Reed. “He is a mad dog, a murderer, a bastard from some poor woman Roose Bolton raped during a hunt. His father murdered Robb Stark. No true Northerner will side with him.”

“I’m afraid some already pledged themselves to him,” Ser Jocelyn said. “The message said that Harald Karstark, Lord of Karhold, was supporting Ramsay Bolton’s claim. His seal was next to the flayed man on the paper.”

“Traitors,” said Brynden Tully, looking as if he wanted to spat on the floor. “Who would side with a mad man like this?”

“The same kind of men who sided with the Mad King, I suppose. Men like my father who ally themselves with the worst type of people as long as it serves their interests. He would have fought for the Mad King in the time if the Battle of the Trident had turned differently, make no mistake. Furthermore, Ramsay Bolton is not the one who beheaded Lord Karstark’s father,” Tyrion exposed.

Ser Brynden Tully tightened his lips. He knew Tyrion was right, but he wouldn’t admit it. The other river lords looked with disdain at him while Daven and the Strongboar looked uncomfortable to hear their lord speak so poorly of his own father, but Tyrion saw no need of defending the memory of Tywin Lannister, especially when Sansa was present and that her family was slaughtered on his orders.

“Ser Jocelyn, was anything said about Roose Bolton’s wife in the raven?” the question came from Ser Perwyn Frey.

“Not that I know,” answered the northern knight.

“Then we must march north as soon as we can. My cousin Walda was married to Roose Bolton. Olyvar told me that not long before we left the Twins, our father received a message from her. She was pregnant. Who knows what the bastard might have done to her? And there’s our brother Elmar too. He served Roose Bolton as his squire.”

Fear was plain in the Frey’s voice. Karyl Vance was next to speak. “Ser Perwyn is right. Let’s go to Winterfell as soon as we can. The father may be dead, but the son still lives. Let’s deal with the son and send him to the Seven Hells with his father. I’m sure the kingslayer and the kinslayer will be happy to meet there.”

“Is there any other house who pledged themselves to Ramsay Bolton besides the Karstarks? What about Stannis Baratheon?” asked the Blackfish.

“Stannis Baratheon is dead. He attacked Winterfell, but was defeated. Roose Bolton had him executed not long before he died, if we are to believe his words.”

“My nephew seems to have no competition left,” commented Tyrion. “What about Stannis’s army? Was it all destroyed?”

“Yes. It’s all gone, apparently. But there’s been another development in the meantime. The wildlings got through the Wall.”

New reactions of surprise followed. For the first time during the council, Sansa spoke. “How is that possible? How could they get through it? The Wall cannot have fallen.”

Unless the wildlings regrouped after Stannis left the Wall and led another assault. The Night’s Watch wasn’t enough to stop an army of wildlings. But according to Jon Snow, their leader, Mance Rayder, was dead, and he was the only one who could unite dozens of tribes. How could they get through the Wall then?

“The Wall didn’t fall, my lady,” answered Ser Jocelyn. “It’s the Lord Commander, your brother Jon Snow, who let them pass.”

Daze was complete upon Sansa’s face. “That’s impossible. Jon would never have done this.”

“He sent ravens to all the houses in the North. He said he allowed them to settle on the lands of the Gift. They belong to the Watch, he says. They are not allowed to go any further in the south. I don’t know why he led them through, but he did.”

Tyrion thought he had a good idea why Jon Snow allowed that. The White Walkers were coming. Everything who lived north of the Wall was going to be killed by them. He probably did the honorable thing and tried to save the wildlings, but Tyrion couldn’t explain this here. These lords would all laugh at him.

“Well, this could help us,” Tyrion stated instead, lords looking queerly at him. “Ramsay will have to deal with us from the south as soon as we get through Moat Cailin, and at the same time he will have the wildlings to worry about at the north. He will have to divide his forces to face two threats.”

“You seem to forget that we may have to deal with the wildlings once Winterfell is ours,” said the Blackfish.

“Maybe. Maybe not. If they remain quiet on the Gift, I see no reason to fight them. Especially if they made a pact with Jon Snow.”

“You would let wildlings live on our lands?” said Ser Jocelyn with vehemence.

“First, they are on the lands of the Gift, and the lands of the Gift belong to the Night’s Watch. These lands are out of the jurisdiction of all lords of Westeros, even out of the jurisdiction of the king. If they remain on these lands, there’s nothing we can do without starting a war against the Night’s Watch. Would you start to fight the Night’s Watch, Ser Jocelyn? Anyway, for now, we have more pressing problems. We must deal with the Boltons. We’ll see for the wildlings later. The wildlings are not the ones who murdered your brother, Ser Wylis, or who took your son captive Lord Piper, or who murdered your king and your niece, Ser Brynden.”

“We must focus on taking Moat Cailin and Winterfell,” added Daven. “Once we’ve gotten through the Neck, we will only have Castle Cerwyn on our way north, then Winterfell will be at reach.”

“The Cerwyns may resist,” pointed out Lady Mira.

“Maybe, Lady Mira, but I doubt it,” replied Tyrion. “If Harald Karstark joined with Ramsay Bolton because his father was rightly executed by Robb Stark while he was thousands of miles away, I think the current Lord Cerwyn will not complain too much about joining us since Ramsay Bolton skinned his father, his mother and his uncle alive right before him. I’m sure he would like to see Ramsay Bolton die.”

“We could send him the bastard’s head,” said Bronn. “Skinned, preferably.”

The joke wasn’t very welcomed. The war council didn’t last long after that. Ser Lyle left with Ser Jocelyn to go north of Moat Cailin with the help of the crannogmen. The others went to prepare for the attack that would take place very soon. Before Tyrion could leave with Sansa, her granduncle stopped him, asking for a few words in private. Sansa left, saying she would wait for him in their pavilion.

The Blackfish sat heavily in a chair. “Finally, we’re about to leave this damn place. If we stayed there any longer, I was going to join my men in a mutiny.”

“I was about to do the same,” replied Tyrion, sitting as well. For more than three months they remained in the Neck, and finally they would leave it and march on Winterfell.

“Can we really trust the Manderlys?”

“We don’t have much choice. Without them, we will never take Moat Cailin. Besides, we hold Lord Wyman’s son. He wants him back, and I think Lord Wyman would rather have Sansa as his Wardeness than Roose or Ramsay Bolton.”

“Still, your father organized the Red Wedding. I find it strange they sent you information about the
“As I said, we had his son and heir. And the maester at White Harbor, Theomore, is a Lannister of Lannisport. It made communication between us much easier.”

“How is Sansa doing?” the Blackfish asked.

“She’s alright. It begins to show off, but so far it’s not so bad.”

The Blackfish nodded. “She cannot follow us in the North.”

“What do you mean, she cannot? Sansa is the Wardeness of the North. She must come with us at Winterfell.”

“An army on march is not the place for a woman. These men who follow us left their wives, their children, their families, their homes behind them. How do you think they feel when they see you going around with Sansa? What do you believe they’re thinking when they must spend nights alone while you have your wife to warm you?”

“I didn’t bring her to warm me in the middle of the night!” He hated to hear Sansa being talked about as if she was only there to satisfy his personal desires. “Sansa is the Lady of Winterfell, and the Wardeness of the North. If we want the northern lords to come to us, we need her.”

“What about your child? Do you think it’s safe to bring her with us at Winterfell, when we could get stuck in a storm or in a battle, and that she could enter labor anytime?”

Of course, it wasn’t safe. Tyrion had wondered about this lately. Sansa’s state would get worse as her pregnancy went on. The journey to Winterfell could be very hard on her. And he feared for her, if they were to fail in taking Winterfell. They couldn’t be sure they would win against the Boltons. After all, winter was coming. If it came while they marched on Winterfell, they were doomed. Stannis was just defeated, and he had twice as many men as Roose Bolton. Still, he didn’t want to be parted from Sansa. They hadn’t left each other since the trial. And he wanted to be there when his child would be born.

“I will speak about it with her,” Tyrion finally said. He left after exchanging a nod of acknowledgement with the Blackfish. The old knight had come to trust him when it concerned Sansa, at least, or so Tyrion thought.

Tyrion went back to his tent. On the way, he wondered how he should tell her, or if he should even tell her. He didn’t want her to leave. On the other side, he had taken a vow to protect her when they married. He couldn’t put her life into danger. It would be better if he told her everything right now. When he learned that her sister was in Winterfell (though this proved to be untrue in the end), he had delayed the revelation by working late in his solar. It hadn’t helped. He wouldn’t repeat it now. Sansa was waiting for him. Her belly had begun to grow, though not much. When she wore a gown, it was almost invisible, but at night, when she wore only her underdress or nothing at all, her pregnancy was plain.

“So, what did my granduncle want from you? Did he threaten again to kill you if you mistreated me?” she asked with a smile after she kissed him.

“ Mostly, he told me to send you away. No, that’s not what you think,” he added quickly when he saw her bewildered face. “He says it could be dangerous for you and the baby to follow the army to Winterfell while you’re pregnant.”

Sansa had gotten on her knees to kiss him, but now she stood again and turned her back to him, walking away. Then she turned again to face him. “Winterfell is my home. You know I have to be there when we take it back.”

“Your sister is safe now, Sansa. She is not at Winterfell, mistreated by Ramsay. You don’t have to risk everything for her any longer.”

“But this monster is still living there, eating in our hall, sleeping in our beds, torturing people in our yards. What would you do if the Boltons had taken Casterly Rock?”

He didn’t need to give an answer. Sansa already knew it. He tried to explain. “Sansa, I don’t want you to go, but think about it. You are five months within your pregnancy. It’s beginning to show off now, but it’s only the beginning. Things will get harder for you. Your belly will grow bigger. You will need more rest every day. It will become difficult for you to walk, let alone to ride. We still have at least two months before we reach Winterfell, and after that we have a battle to do. And we don’t know what could happen. What if we lose the battle? Or that the snows surprise us? You won’t be able to follow the army. Not without putting the life of our child in danger.”

Sansa seemed to consider what he said. When she spoke again, her voice was hard. “When do I leave? Where do I go?”

“You’re not leaving right now. In fact, I think I’ll send you to White Harbor once Moat Cailin has fallen. You’ll be far enough in case things turn bad, and close enough to come to Winterfell once we’ve taken it. And the Manderlys will treat you well. They are loyal to your family. You’ll be safe for the birth there, and once our child has come, you’ll be able to travel to join us.”

“This means… You won’t be there for the birth?”

Tyrion looked down. “I must lead the army. What do you think the northern lords would have thought of your brother if he had stayed behind at Winterfell when they went in the south?”

Sansa sat, her eyes cast on the floor. “Do you think we’ll win?” She was looking at him. She was afraid. Tyrion approached and took her hand in his.

“I’m sure we’ll win,” he tried to convince her. “But I can be wrong.”

Sansa looked aside. They stayed in that position, Sansa looking away. In the end, Tyrion couldn’t keep looking at her. He told her he had something to do, and left. Bronn followed him after he went out of the pavilion. He had to do it. He couldn’t take the risk of Sansa or their child dying. He wished they were back at Casterly Rock, where she was safe. Sansa had been happy there. They had saved her sister. Arya Stark was with them now. Tyrion didn’t lack the will to put Ramsay Bolton’s head on a spike, and he knew there was another threat, even more dangerous than Ramsay Bolton, but he wished all of this hadn’t happened.

Tyrion arrived before a tent that was kept by a dozen of his personal guards and went into it. Arya Stark was there, eating, garbed in the clothes of the crannogmen, all dirty and unwashed. He was sure that Sansa liked it. His sister-in-law lifted her eyes from her plate and looked at him. Her eyes turned hard and angry. Like every time they saw each other, she looked as if she wanted to kill him, and Tyrion was sure she didn’t only look like she wanted it. She actually wanted to kill him. He was a Lannister, and his family slaughtered hers. They tried to avoid each other as much as they could. Tyrion didn’t want her very close to him after she tried to kill him and that she almost killed Sansa in the process.

“What are you doing here?” she asked.
“I came to have little talk with my sister-in-law.” She didn’t like the allusion to the fact they were family now. Tyrion didn’t come to sit close to her. Arya Stark had a knife in her hand and she glared at Bronn.

“And him? Why is he here?”

“I protect the little shit,” answered Bronn before Tyrion could. What could have been a mocking smile came to the girl’s face, only to disappear as quickly as it appeared.

“I’m sending you to White Harbor with Sansa,” said Tyrion, a little irritated.

“White Harbor?” Arya Stark asked, surprise on her face.

“Yes, White Harbor. In two weeks, Moat Cailin will have fallen. Then we will march on Winterfell, but you and Sansa and a few men will go to White Harbor.”

“You cannot tell me where to go,” the she-wolf said.

Tyrion shrugged. “I can. I’m only telling you where to go, not ordering you.”

She made a strange face that showed she didn’t understand. “What do you mean?”

Tyrion sighed deeply. “This is quite simple, Arya. Your sister is pregnant, and quite advanced in her pregnancy now. She can’t follow us far in the North. It would be too dangerous for her in her state. She must be somewhere safe for the birthing. White Harbor is the safest one. She will come to Winterfell once our child is born and that we’ve taken it.”

“I would have nothing to do in White Harbor. Nothing. I won’t let you approach my home alone. I’m following you to Winterfell. I’m not pregnant like Sansa.” Her voice was full of scorn as she said it.

“Yes, you can. But you could also follow your sister.”

“Why would I follow her?”

“Because she’s your sister,” replied Tyrion firmly this time. Confusion was obvious on the girl’s face. “Tell me, do you love Sansa? Do you love your sister?”

“Of course, I do.”

“Then why would you rather follow the little monster who married her instead of her? What is there in Winterfell for you that is more important than Sansa? I know Winterfell is your home, this is Sansa’s home too. But if you were to choose between your family and the place where you grew up, what would be your choice?” Arya Stark seemed taken aback by his words. “Or is it that you don’t consider Sansa like your sister anymore?”

A moment went on. “No.”

“Then why do you want so much to come to Winterfell?”

“Because I want to kill Ramsay. And Roose Bolton too.”

“Ramsay will die as soon as Winterfell is released. As for Roose Bolton, it seems he’s already dead.”

“What?”
“A knight sworn to the Manderlys informed us this morning. He’s dead. Ramsay declared himself Lord of Winterfell and King in the North.”

Fury filled the eyes and the face of the Stark girl. “King in the North?! Robb was King in the North. Ramsay has no right to be.”

“Of course, he has no right. You can be sure he won’t be able to boast that title for long.”

“I want to kill him myself.”

“Why?”

“Because I know what he does. I heard about it. Brienne told me.” Sansa’s sworn shield was giving lessons in sword fighting to Arya along with Podrick. The Maid of Tarth told him once that Arya Stark was very skilled, even before she started to spar with her. “I could have been married with him. It could have happened to me. I want to kill him myself. I need to.”

“Is that worth it?”

“It is. It’s fair. It’s justice.”

Tyrion looked down for a moment before he stared back at the girl. “Your father did what he thought was right and fair when he tried to arrest Joffrey. As a consequence, your family was scattered through the Seven Kingdoms. Do you think it was worth it in he end?”

If she had doubts, she didn’t show them. Tyrion resumed. “Look, I have a sister. She hates me, and I hate her. She hated me from the moment I was born, and wanted me dead for all my life. She tried to have me killed more than once, but she’s still my sister. You don’t know how often I wished for things to have been different between us. I know this is a vain hope today, my sister will have no peace until I’m dead. She’s mad. She is lost to me. Sansa is not yet lost to you, but you may lose her one day. You almost killed her not long ago.”

“That was an accident,” she shouted.

“Yes, it was. Still, you were not far from killing her. I know you and Sansa never got along very well. She told me. But except your brother Jon, and he is thousands of miles away, you only have each other. I try to be there for Sansa as much as I can, but I’m not her family. You are. If I were you, I would try to mend the fences between you two before it’s too late. That’s why I want you to go to White Harbor with her. Anyway, Lady Brienne is going there too, so if you want to keep training with her, you have no choice but to follow them. It’s too late for me and Cersei, maybe it’s been too late since the day my mother died, but it’s not too late for you and Sansa. Not yet. Go to White Harbor and spend time with her.” A silence followed where Arya Stark seemed thoughtful. “Unless you already see her only as a Lannister and no longer like your sister.”

“I don’t.”

“Then tell her. She needs to hear it from someone else than me.”

Tyrion turned on his heels to walk away, but as he reached the flap, Arya Stark called for him. “Why do you care about me and Sansa?”

“Because I don’t want Sansa to lose her sister. I brought an army this far to save her sister, I don’t want to have done that for nothing. I want her to be happy with her brothers and sisters again, with her family. And I’m not her family.”
“Do you love her? Do you really love Sansa? Do you really care for her?” Tyrion hadn’t turned to face his sister-in-law, and he didn’t turn either to these questions.

“I do. More than you can imagine.” He walked away.

This night, Tyrion was lying on his chest, caressing the belly of his wife who lied on her back in their bed. Sansa’s belly barely began to grow, and only this was strange for Tyrion. Sansa was so slender that to imagine her with a big belly was almost impossible for him. She was so beautiful. There were times Tyrion wondered if the gods brought her in the world only for him. If so, it only confirmed his conviction that if gods existed, they were not fair. Who could send the Maiden made flesh to an ugly and twisted dwarf like him and be just at the same time?

“Are you sure there’s no way I could follow you north? I could at least come with you to Castle Cerwyn,” she said.

“No, we can’t take the risk, Sansa. We could find ourselves stuck in the snows if a storm begins, and we may have to besiege Castle Cerwyn. And if we fail to take Winterfell, then you might not be able to ride away. You’ll be safer in White Harbor.”

She sighed. Tyrion could see she wasn’t happy about this, and he wasn’t either, but she simply couldn’t follow the troops. Talisa Stark had followed the Stark troops to the Twins, and there she and her child found the same end than her husband and her mother-in-law.

“So, I’ll have to sit down and do nothing while you’re in danger, fighting to take back my home,” she said gloomily.

“And to make sure our child comes in the world safe and healthy,” Tyrion added.

Sansa turned her head to look at him. Her eyes were looking at him with fondness. “I’ll go to White Harbor. Just promise me one thing.”

“Anything.”

“Don’t die out there.”

Tyrion smiled. “I promise. I won’t die. And once our child is born, Ramsay dead and Winterfell freed, you’ll be able to travel to join us. And you’ll be Lady of Winterfell for real, not only in name.”

Tyrion could see his wife smiling sadly even in the darkness. He leaned and kissed her tenderly. She wrapped her arms around his neck and deepened the kiss. For a long time, they stayed like that, kissing each other. He didn’t want this to end. This time, no one trying to kill him interrupted them. There was only him and Sansa, his beloved wife.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: a bastard
Jon IV

Chapter Notes

A little Jon chapter. It isn't very long, but I thought it might be good for you to discover that Jon hadn't gone yet in this fic for Christmas. There was nothing that changed that could have stopped Melisandre from bringing him back to life.

A very merry Christmas to you all.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

JON IV

“Are your people well settled?” asked Jon.

“They are. As much as they can be. The crows won’t bother us after what you did to the guys who killed you.” retorted Tormund.

It was still all so strange to talk about it. Jon had died. He had actually died, and yet here he was, alive, brought back from the dead by the Red Woman. He didn’t know why he was here, and Melisandre didn’t seem to know it either, but he was. After he was killed, Ser Davos, Ghost and a few of his sworn brothers had protected his body until Tormund and the Free Folk came to their rescue. Then the Red Woman had brought him back to life to everyone’s surprise, including hers, and he had resumed his duties of Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch.

The officers of the Night’s Watch murdered him. He was their Lord Commander, their sworn brother, and they killed him. They hadn’t agreed with his decisions, and Jon knew it from the beginning, but they were loyal members of the Night’s Watch, or so he thought. They had all given their lives to the Watch, made the same vows, and they murdered him. Because he did what was right. Jon had had no choice to execute them. He had only executed the men who stabbed him, and only them, not the ones who stayed behind while others killed him. This meant Ser Alliser Thorne, Othell Yarwyck, Bowen Marsh, Ser Meryn Trant, three other men… and Olly. Killing all of them had been difficult, even Ser Alliser. They were all his brothers, no matter what they did, but they betrayed the Watch, and the only possible punishment was death. Jon had to do it. Olly said nothing when he died. Nothing at all. Jon should hate Olly. He killed Ygritte, and he murdered him. But he couldn’t. He was only a boy, no older than Bran.

Jon had died. He had given his life to the Watch. His watch was ended. It would end at his death, and it had come. He was no longer a member of the Night’s Watch. He had stayed two weeks at Castleblack to bring back order, but after that he had left, leaving the Wall to Edd. Now here he was, in one of the many wildling camps on the Gift. They had come to save him. How ironic. The Free Folk who saved the Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. Ygritte may have been proud of it. Sometimes he wished the Red Woman hadn’t brought him back to life. He could be with her now, and with his father and Robb. Though, when he died, he had seen nothing. Was it the end? Was death the end to everything? Was there nothing beyond it?

“What are you going to do now?” asked Tormund, eating a stag with appetite.
“I’m going south. I have a sister at Winterfell, and she’s in the hands of a mad man. My other sister and her husband have an army at Moat Cailin. I’m going to join them, and I’ll help them to free Arya.”

“What if the dead come while you’re away?”

Jon sighed. “Let’s hope the Boltons are all dead when they arrive. My bother-in-law is bringing thousands, maybe tens of thousand men. You’ll have more than enough to defend the Wall when he comes.”

Tormund nodded, not quite convinced. “I hope he’s not going to kill us all with his men.”

“I’ll speak with him. You’ll be left in peace as long as you stay in the Gift.”

His friend scoffed. “Don’t know why you all kneel because someone is someone’s son you knelt before. Don’t understand why you marry someone you don’t want to.”

“That’s how things are done south of the Wall,” said Jon, tired.

Tormund laughed. “Well, you do things quite strangely. You should simply take a woman when you want her, and if you can keep her, then you keep her. Like you did with Ygritte.”

“I never took Ygritte.”

He laughed again while chewing a piece of meat. “You did, boy, whether you like it or not. Or else you would never have fucked her. She wouldn’t have allowed you to do so.”

Jon didn’t argue. He didn’t want to talk about Ygritte. It only brought painful memories. He had to focus on saving Arya. His sister was being held at Winterfell. He should have gone to save her as soon as he was back, but he had to deal with the mutiny first. Now, he had nothing left linking him to the Night’s Watch. He was free to save his sister. Before he left, he was able to obtain more information about the situation in the North. Tyron Lannister had led a great army through he Neck, but for now they were kept south of Moat Cailin by a garrison of Northerners defending the fortress. Jon was angry at his father’s bannermen who stopped the Lannister army in the Neck. Sansa had been declared Lady of Winterfell and Wardeness of the North by King Tommen, the Boltons were stripped of all their rights, Roose Bolton had killed Robb, and despite this some houses were fighting for them against Sansa. She was their real lady, the daughter of Eddard Stark, the true Lady of Winterfell, and they fought against her for the men who murdered their king and Lady Stark. Jon was deceived by the North. He thought his father’s bannermen were better than that. The same thoughts he had about his sworn brothers.

He had first wanted to head directly to Winterfell to save Arya, but after thinking, it didn’t seem like the best option. The Boltons would kill him at first sight, and legitimate it by saying he broke his vows to the Night’s Watch. He would be called a deserter. He couldn’t save Arya on his own. His only chance was Sansa and Lord Tyron. The dwarf had been his friend back when he arrived at the Wall. He treated Sansa well. Surely Jon could trust him. Anyway, Jon was no threat for him. He was a bastard. A Snow. He was no danger for Sansa’s rights. If the Northerners sided with the Boltons, the Lannisters were Jon’s only chance to save Arya.

He still didn’t understand why Sansa didn’t warn him about Arya. He had gone through all the messages he received, and none of those Sansa sent to him referred to or mentioned Arya’s captivity. Sansa had to know if her husband brought an army in the North. Did she only forget? Jon would have to ask her when they would meet, but right now the priority was to save Arya. He would leave Tormund’s camp at the first light in the morning and head for Moat Cailin. The Lannisters would need help in the North, and if they could help Jon to free Arya, he was willing to give them everything they wanted, even if that meant fighting the entire North. It was strange for Jon to think that he would help the Lannisters to take Winterfell after they killed his father and his brother, but he would rather see Sansa Lady of Winterfell with Lord Tyrion ruling the North at her side than to let Roose Bolton and his son hold his family’s home and rape his little sister. Jon gripped the bone he held between his hands. He would kill Ramsay for what he did, and he would avenge his brother and his father’s wife, and his Arya too. Finally, he only left the bone down on the ground.

“I’m going to sleep,” he simply said, and left the tent, Tormund still eating greedily his stag.

Jon walked through the wildling camp. It wasn’t an organized camp like the one Jeor Mormont had set at the Fist of the First Men, or like any army would build. Huts were everywhere, placed where everyone had wanted to put them, without any order or logic. If they were attacked, they wouldn’t stand a chance, just like against Stannis. Stannis had defeated them with no more than ten thousand men, and back then Mance had an army of a hundred thousand. Today the Free Folk were only a few thousands, and this was only one of their many camps. Since it was Tormund’s camp, they might be a thousand here, but no more. Any army from the south would defeat them if they attacked them now. Jon hoped this wouldn’t happen and that the northern lords would leave the wildlings alone.

On his way to the hut Tormund had offered him for the night, he saw Ser Davos Seaworth discussing with the Red Woman. They had both left Castleblack with him when he rode south. Jon still didn’t know what to make of it. The two of them said they had nowhere else to go. Jon wasn’t displeased with the presence of the Onion Knight. He was a good man, had been loyal to Stannis until his death, and convinced Melisandre to save him. He seemed to understand in some way what Jon was going through, as much as someone could understand it. On the other side, he wasn’t sure he liked the fact the Red Woman followed him. She had brought him back from the dead, and without blue eyes, but she said she would follow him wherever he went, calling him the prince that was promised, the same way she called Stannis before. At least she didn’t disrobe in his presence again, and she didn’t seem in the mood to do so. Jon wasn’t either.

Melisandre had completely changed since he was back. The fire burning in her eyes had faded, her assurance had disappeared, and she no longer tried to seduce him, something Jon was grateful. She only seemed to follow him because she saw nothing else to do. All her faith seemed to have disappeared. He arrived as Ser Davos asked her something with insistence.

“What happened down there? What happened to our king?”

“There was a battle. Stannis was defeated,” she answered without life.

“And Shireen? What happened to the princess?” She looked aside and Ser Davos noticed Jon’s arrival. “Lord Commander,” he said with a small bow of his head.

“I am no longer Lord Commander, Ser Davos,” he replied.

“Please forgive me, Jon Snow. Long habits are hard to break.”

“Ser Davos, you don’t have to follow me. I’m going to the Lannisters. I can’t assure you they won’t sentence you to die.”

“Well, that won’t be any different from my time with Stannis. I don’t look forward to meeting the Imp, Jon Snow, truth be told. We faced each other at the Battle of Blackwater, and I got almost killed. My son Matthos died because of his trick with the wildfire. He burned thousands of sailors and soldiers, good men, on this day.”
“He’s not the only one who burned people alive, Ser Davos,” said Melisandre. “All three of us here, we helped or served a king who burned people alive, and not for good reasons.”

Davos tightened his lips, looking furiously at Melisandre. “That’s in the past now, Ser Davos,” Jon intervened. “Lord Tyrion and you were both serving a king. He only did his duty, like you did yours.”

The knight sighed. “I know. Still… If he wants to help us to fight the dead, then I suppose we have no choice, because no one else will want to help us. I only hope you are right.”

“I’ll put a good word for you before him. My sister is his wife, so I may convince him to spare you. Anyway, Stannis is defeated, his armies scattered, there’s nothing left of his power. Dragonstone and Storm’s End both fell. But you can expect them to demand that you bend the knee to Tommen Baratheon.”

Ser Davos didn’t seem to enjoy the prospect, but he nodded all the same. Then he turned to the Red Woman. “We’ll talk about this later.”

The Onion Knight walked away and Jon found himself alone with Melisandre. He thought the air was a little warmer around her, though not much. That was nothing compared to before. Ygritte had been kissed by fire, but the red priestess was fire, and her hair was blood and flame.

“You shouldn’t come, my lady. You burned people alive. I’m afraid you won’t escape execution, no matter what I say for you.”

“I’m not afraid of death. The Lord is not yet done with me, or else I would already be dead.” She said it without fear, but also without the assurance and conviction she once had.

“Why follow me?”

“You are the prince that was promised.” She said it like it was an evidence.

“You once said it was Stannis.”

“I was wrong.” Her eyes dropped on the ground again.

“Don’t you think you could be wrong again?”

“The Lord of Light brought you back to life. I have no power. Everything I have comes from him. If you’re alive, if I could bring you back to life, it’s because he wanted you to come back. I don’t know why. Perhaps I’m wrong again. The Lord send me signs and I try to interpret them the best I can. I can misinterpret them, but I don’t see another explanation to your revival. Maybe he led me to Stannis only to have me realize that I was wrong about him, and because Stannis would lead me to you. I can’t know. The only thing I know is, he gave you to me. Maybe it was only to lead you to this Lord Tyrion so you could have the necessary help against the Great Other. In this case, my purpose is accomplished, and there would be no reason left for me to live. Maybe I have already lived far too long. If that must be my fate, then I’ll face it.”

Strange as it was, Jon thought she wasn’t much different from the good men in the Night’s Watch, living to defend a Realm that would never remember them, accepting to die when the hour would come, all that so hundreds of thousand people could be safe south of the Wall. Qhorin Halfhand had given his life for the Night’s Watch, without a single hesitation. He had accepted his fate, just like this woman was ready to do. Just like Grenn did when Jon sent him below the Wall to die. Even like Ser Alliser, right before Jon executed him. Jon didn’t doubt her words.
“We leave tomorrow at first light. You should get some rest,” he told her.

“I will.” She walked away and Jon found himself alone again. He went to his hut. He saw a girl with red hair on his way, reminding him of Ygritte again, which only made him regret even more the fact he was alive while she was dead. He didn’t sleep much tonight. He could never sleep long since he came back.

Not long before dawn, a wildling boy no more than twelve came to tell him Tormund wanted to see him. Jon went to Tormund’s hut to find someone he didn’t expect.

“Edd!”

“Glad to see you, Jon.” He didn’t smile. He had a scroll in his hands. “We received this a few days ago. The man said it was for the Lord Commander, but I’m quite sure it was for you.”

Tormund was next to Edd, a grim look on his face. Jon took the scroll Edd was handing him. It was a long one, sealed with pink wax in the shape of the flayed man. The sigil of House Bolton.

“Did you read it?” he asked to Edd.

“No. But I don’t think there’s anything good in it.”

Jon removed the wax and unrolled the parchment, beginning to read aloud.

To the traitor and bastard Jon Snow.

You allowed thousands of wildlings past the Wall. You have betrayed your own kind. You have betrayed the North. Winterfell is mine, bastard. Come and see.

Your brother Rickon is in my dungeon. His direwolf’s skin is on my floor. Your sister Arya is in my bed. She is sweet. Very sweet. Especially when she cries and screams. She does it every night when I visit her. I have great plans for her parts once she has given me a son. Come and see.

Come and see, bastard, and I will not trouble you or your wildling lovers. Bring me your other sister. I hear she’s far prettier than the young one. Bring her to me along with the Imp’s head. Keep them from me and I will ride north and slaughter every wildling man, woman and babe living under your protection. You will watch as I skin them living. You will watch as my soldiers take turns raping your sisters. You will watch as my dogs devour your wild little brother. Then I will spoon your eyes from their sockets and let my dogs do the rest. Come and see.

Ramsay Bolton, Lord of Winterfell and King in the North.

Jon stopped a few times as he read the message aloud. Tormund and Edd were looking at him gravely. Rickon was at Winterfell, just like Arya. I have great plans for her parts once she has given me a son. Come and see. Jon crumpled the letter within his hand. It was the right one, the one that was burned when he saved Mormont, and despite the pain he kept crumpling it.

“Is that possible?” asked Edd. “I thought your brothers were dead.”

“It is possible. Sam met my brother Bran when he came back from the north of the Wall,” Jon replied.

Nothing was said for a very long time. Tormund’s face was grave, and Edd’s was too. Jon could barely control his breathing.

A few minutes later, Davos Seaworth and Melisandre were with them in Tormund’s hut, aware of the letter they just received. The knight was horrified. The Red Woman didn’t show much reaction, but had her eyes cast down.

“This is a lie,” said Ser Davos. “Rickon Stark is dead. He was burned by the Ironmen when they took Winterfell.”

“He wasn’t.” Jon explained them what Sam told him. “I learnt it last year. Rickon may be still alive as well.”

“It could still be a lie,” said Melisandre. “A way to attract you to Winterfell alone, so he could kill you. That’s not something we can allow.”

“The Red Woman is right. It could be a trap,” conceded Davos.

Jon nodded. They couldn’t know if Rickon was alive or not. He looked at Melisandre. “Do you think you could find him, in your visions?” he asked.

“I could ask the Lord of Light, but many of his visions are unclear, and there would be no way for me to know if these visions are happening right now, or in the past or the future. And I don’t even know how your brother looks like. I never saw him. I can’t even guarantee the Lord will give me a vision.”

Her answer denied them any way they could have to know if Rickon was really at Winterfell. Jon took another look at the letter. “Lord of Winterfell and King in the North.”

“We received ravens after you left. Roose Bolton is dead. Apparently, he was poisoned. We don’t know who did it. Ramsay proclaimed himself King in the North,” Edd informed them.

“How many men does that shit have in his army,” Tormund asked.

“I would say a few thousands,” said Davos. “Though I don’t know for sure. But if he defeated Stannis, he surely doesn’t have a small army.”

“How many men do you have, Tormund?” Jon asked.

“That can march and fight? Two thousand. The rest are children and old people.”

Tormund’s answer didn’t reassure. Jon read a part of the letter again. Your brother Rickon is in my dungeon. His direwolf’s skin is on my floor. Your sister Arya is in my bed. She is sweet. Very sweet. Especially when she cries and screams. She does it every night when I visit her. I have great plans for her parts once she has given me a son. Come and see. Come and see.

“Ramsay wants me to come to Winterfell,” Jon began. He folded the letter the bastard wrote and put into his doublet. “Very well. I will go to Winterfell, but not alone. Tormund, assemble the elders. I need to talk with them.”

Tormund nodded and went away. Davos looked uncomfortable. “Jon Snow, if you allow me, Stannis was the best military commander in the Seven Kingdoms, and he was defeated with five times the number of soldiers the wildlings have. Even if they accept to follow you, you won’t take Winterfell.”

“I said I wouldn’t go alone to Winterfell. I never said I would only go there with the Free Folk. Edd, what are the last news concerning Moat Cailin?"

“Not good. The Lannisters and their allies are still stuck south of it,” Jon’s friend answered.

Jon sighed. “We can’t wait for them. They may need months to get through it.”

“Without the Lannisters, we won’t take Winterfell,” stated Davos.

“You’re wrong. The Lannisters are not the only ones to hate the Boltons. And the Boltons are not the only people in the North. Many houses have lost kin at the Twins. They want to avenge them as much as I want, and some are still loyal to my family. The Manderlys, the Karstarks, the Glovers, the Cerwyns, the Hornwoods, the Blackwoods, the Lockes, the Ryswells, the Tallharts, the Umbers, the northern clans… I’m not going alone. I’m going with an army. With the North.”

He wouldn’t abandon Rickon and Arya. He wouldn’t abandon his family. He was a Stark. He remembered his father’s words. The last time they ever spoke. You are a Stark. You might not have my name, but you have my blood.

Chapter End Notes

Please review.

Next chapter: Kevan

Happy Christmas again.
“I still believe this is a mistake to allow Cersei back in the capital. She will only cause trouble.”

The queen was wearing a black gown, just like Kevan wore a black doublet. Everyone wore the black today. Joffrey may not have been loved, but few hated his sister. Kevan didn’t have the chance to know her very much, but he knew she had always been a kind and lovely girl. The news of her death had arrived from Dorne two months ago, a day or two after Nymeria Sand sent another raven to ask news about the princess. The king had taken it very bad. He hadn’t been angry, but he had cried. He almost always cried since they told him, and he needed all the attention of the queen to keep eating and doing something of his days. The only good side in this was that Tommen was so deeply thrust into his grief that he never thought a single time to declare war upon Dorne.

“Our Grace, her daughter died. I believe she has the right to be there for the funeral. She will go as soon as Princess Myrcella’s body will be buried. Cersei has no more power here. She won’t be able to cause any trouble,” explained Kevan.

“Still, she could try to put ideas in Tommen’s head. We cannot allow her anywhere near him.”

“That’s impossible. They will be together for the exposure of the body, and anyway Tommen will certainly want to see his mother while she’s here, and it would be cruel to deprive Cersei of the right to see her son for what short time she will be here.”

“You’re making a terrible mistake, Ser Kevan. Cersei is vengeful. She will want to start a war against Dorne, and she will do everything to cause it and to persuade Tommen to start it.”

“I agree, but not when someone else is present. She would only try this in private, but she won’t be allowed alone with Tommen in any circumstance. We will make sure she has no access to his apartments and that one of us is always there when she wants to see her son. Her guards have been given the instructions to not let her see or speak to Tommen if we’re not present. This way Tommen will be safe from Cersei’s influence.”

That seemed to calm the queen. “Very well. I will go to Tommen. I fear the king will need me only to make it to the Great Sept.”

She began to walk away, but Kevan stopped her. “Your Grace, you’ll have to be there for Tommen. He will need to be strong this time. You’re needed at his side more than ever, and not only to keep Cersei away from him.”

“I know.” She left, her last glance being one of understanding. Kevan had no illusion about the true feelings of the queen for the king. He knew that Tommen loved Margaery Tyrell much more than Margaery Tyrell loved Tommen, but Kevan was sure that the queen had no hatred for the king. Who could hate Tommen? He was such a sweet boy.

Kevan went to look outside the city. These were dark days for House Lannister and the Seven Kingdoms. The Princess Myrcella Baratheon, heir to the Iron Throne, was dead, killed by some servant in the Water Gardens who poisoned her wine. Many people hated the Lannisters and the Baratheons in Dorne. Prince Doran had immediately sent a large retinue to bring the body of the princess back to King’s Landing for her last journey. He sent a long letter in which he apologized in deep terms for the princess’ death, and with the head of the assassin as well.

Kevan found it all suspicious, and he wasn’t the only one. Jaime had come to the conclusion immediately that the Martells murdered Myrcella, and while Kevan hadn’t spoken with Cersei yet since her arrival yesterday, he was quite sure the Queen Mother would think the same. The worse was they might not be wrong.

Doran Martell swore he never received any raven asking news of Myrcella. Kevan found it very strange that four ravens never reached Sunspear. He had inspected the rookery himself, to find that five ravens bound for Sunspear (including the fifth that was sent right before they received the news of Myrcella’s death) were missing. The ravens really flew. Could it be possible they flew without message? The five of them? Kevan highly doubted it. And if they had, then surely Doran Martell would say they received the ravens, but without any scroll attached to them.

Kevan had a hard time to imagine that Doran Martell had commanded the death of Myrcella. The Prince of Dorne was a very cautious man. He knew that killing the princess would start a war between his people and the Crown. Thinking about it, Kevan didn’t think the Lord of Sunspear was behind this. Maybe someone else was, and he may have tried to hide it. There was no way to tell for how long Myrcella had been dead. Her body had travelled for two months. Pycelle said she could have died anytime between one or five months ago, and the other maester who helped him agreed with the diagnostic. They had no proof that Doran Martell hid Myrcella’s murder in any way. Varys said his little birds in Dorne didn’t report him anything suspicious. Furthermore, Prince Doran told the truth when he said Myrcella was poisoned. Pycelle had identified the poison that killed her to be the Long Farewell, a very rare poison from Asshai that killed slowly. That wasn’t a poison that a simple servant could buy. He received help from someone who had the means to get it.

If the assassin was still alive, they could have interrogated him, but he was dead. How convenient. As if that wasn’t enough, Myrcella’s betrothed, Prince Trystane, wasn’t here. He hadn’t come to King’s Landing, remaining at Sunspear. Doran Martell said his son was too heartbroken to come, and the gout stopped his father from travelling as well.

Overall, satisfying explanations had been given for everything, except for the lost ravens, and if the explanations were satisfying, there were still some doubtful details about the murder. Prince Trystane’s absence to the funerals, Myrcella’s death in strange circumstances, the execution of the so-called assassin, since they couldn’t be sure he was the assassin, the poison that was used… the context of Myrcella’s death and the behaviour of the Martells were unsettling. What would you have done in my stead, Tywin? They couldn’t risk a war against Dorne. Not now. The Realm barely went out of war, winter was closing on them, and most of the Lannister forces were engaged in the Neck, with what was left of the might of the Riverlands. The Tyrells alone wouldn’t be able to invade Dorne when they had to take care of the Iron Islands, and they couldn’t rely on the Vale of Arryn. That was no easy decision, but they couldn’t deal with House Martell. Not now.

Kevan left his rooms and travelled through the Red Keep. A litter was waiting for him outside. It was a sunny day of autumn. Temperature was decreasing, but it was still warm enough. He thought about Dorna and their daughter Janei at Casterly Rock, and about Lancel at Quite Isle. Was the sun up where they were? Or was it raining? Was the weather colder than here in the capital? In the streets, everything went as it always went. Myrcella might not have been hated by the people of King’s Landing, but she wasn’t much known all the same. Unlike Queen Margaery, she never visited markets with her cousins and handmaidsen, she never went to orphanages, and she never gave money to people in the streets. She was a sweet girl, but surely the people thought sweet girls died all day. Furthermore, Myrcella was in some way the physical image of her mother, who now was known as the Whore Queen among the people. Again, no one had any love for the Lannisters. If Margaery Tyrell was the one who died, half the city would be lamenting her loss, but not for Myrcella. Kevan thought with sadness that his grandniece deserved better.

In a square, a Sparrow was haranguing the people. “The gods have made their will known. The Warrior punishes those who believe themselves beyond the reach of justice. He punished the Whore Queen for her depravity and her incest, by taking away the horror of this incest. Justice is coming for us all. We cannot sin without facing the justice of the gods. Sooner or later, we must face the punishment they reserve to those who believe they are above them. Justice is coming for nonbelievers and sinners. Repent yourselves before it’s too late.”

The voice disappeared as they headed towards the Great Sept. The Sparrows were still a problem. Their support was dwindling now with the election of the new High Septon, but they still had support, and more than enough to cause trouble. The caritative works of the queen, Randyll Tarly’s recent arrival and the new High Septon were giving results, but they would need more time to neutralize the threat of the Sparrows for good. Kevan saw some men with the arms of Horn Hill walking in the opposite direction to his own. Their lord had brought five hundred of them with him. They reinforced the City Watch and didn’t need to be paid, like Kevan’s father-in-law loved to repeat over and over again.

The litter lowered before the steps of the Great Sept of Baelor. Kevan left it and stood before the steps. Three years ago, Eddard Stark was executed in this very place, starting a chain of events that changed all of Westeros, and how much it had changed since that day where Joffrey ordered Robert’s friend to be beheaded. Kevan hadn’t been present, but he knew who had been there. Joffrey, who commanded the execution, was now dead, poisoned during his wedding night. Pycelle and Varys now served their fourth king. Baelish had gone to the Eyrie to marry the sister-in-law of the man who died on this day, and who he helped to arrest. As for Cersei, she was humiliated and disgraced by the young girl who fainted when she saw her father killed.

Kevan thought about the Lady Sansa. He remembered what he saw one day at Tyrion’s trial, when he witnessed his nephew and his wife discussing. Back then, he had the impression to see ghosts of the past. He had the impression to see Tywin and Joanna alive again. Kevan couldn’t deny he had a deep respect for the Stark girl. In desperate circumstances, she had managed to prove the innocence of her husband, in a city full of liars, before hundreds of people who saw her like the daughter of a traitor. From the king’s betrothed, she had become a hostage to the Crown, then had been forced to marry a man whose family was in war against hers, and managed to become one of the most powerful women in the Seven Kingdoms.

Kevan remembered Joanna, Tywin’s wife. She had been a lady in waiting for Queen Rhaella Targaryen, even before she was queen. No many people knew the whole story, but Kevan was one of the few to know it. Joanna had come to King’s Landing when she was very young, and soon became friends with the future queen and the Lady of Sunspear, Prince Doran’s mother. There she also met the future king, Aerys Targaryen, the Second of His Name, later known as the Mad King. At the time though, madness hadn’t taken hold on him, and he was a young and comely man with good manners, very charming. Aerys had noticed Joanna very early, and the young Lannister woman had almost fallen in love with him immediately. There had been gossips that she had given her maidenhead to the prince at the time. For most of the people, these were only rumors, and many, including Pycelle and Tywin, energetically denied them. However, it didn’t change the truth. The rumors were more than rumors. Joanna had been Aerys’s lover.

The affair had lasted for almost two years. Joanna had hoped that she would marry Aerys for some time. She was young and dreamed like little girls dreamed, but as she grew older, she realized it could never happen and that the prince would marry his own sister, Joanna’s very friend Rhaella. Hence, a short time after Aerys was crowned, Joanna ended their relationship, and when Tywin asked for her hand, she accepted. They married in a lavish ceremony a year after Aerys ascended the Iron Throne, but the ceremony was ruined by the comments the drunk Mad King made about the bride.

Kevan didn’t know if Tywin had known of the affair between Aerys and Joanna. He never talked of this with his brother. Kevan feared it might destroy Tywin if he ignored this, and it would make no difference to speak of it if Tywin already knew about it. Maybe Tywin closed his eyes on it and denied the truth before everyone to protect Joanna’s honor. Tywin loved Joanna so much, and Joanna had loved Tywin as well. She gave him three children. Kevan feared that Tywin just didn’t want to know the truth, just like he ignored all signs concerning the infatuation between his two golden children. Anyway, it hadn’t mattered so much. Aerys kept following Joanna even after she married Tywin, and in the end, she was dismissed by the queen and sent away from court. Her marriage with Tywin was a success that ended the day she died. Tywin was never the same afterwards.

When he thought about the wife of his nephew, Kevan could see many similarities between them. Joanna had been the lover of the future king, and of the king for a certain time. Lady Sansa had been betrothed to the future king, then to the king. Both these kings ended mad. Joanna was humiliated by Aerys, and the Lady Sansa was humiliated by Joffrey. Both these kings were assassinated, and the two young women married the man who would become later the Lord of Casterly Rock. They both left King’s Landing married to a Lannister, but they were also changed by King’s Landing. Both were innocent young girls in love when they arrived, but left as strong and powerful women. And both fell in love with the man they married. Genna had written to Kevan to tell her about what happened at the Rock while the Lady Sansa was there. The girl who witnessed the execution of her father on these steps had come a long way, and now she was pregnant and leading an army in the North with Kevan’s nephew. He hoped her fate wouldn’t be the same than a mother-in-law she never knew, and Kevan hoped Tyrion wouldn’t lose his wife like his father lost Joanna when his second son was born. Tyrion didn’t deserve it. Kevan himself didn’t know what he would do if Dorna was to die. What would happen to Tyrion if his wife was to die?

The head heavy with these thoughts, he climbed the steps to pay his last respects to the princess. They were all already there. Tommen stood next to his sister, his face empty, looking at her dead body. His queen was next to him, holding his hand, a mourning expression on her face. Her brother Ser Loras wasn’t far away, but in retreat. Cersei stood next to her daughter, on the opposite side from the one Tommen and his wife were, with her brother by her side. Princess Myrcella lied there on the stone, her eyes covered by stones on which eyes were painted, her golden hair shining like her gown. She had grown since Kevan last saw her, and he could see many similarities with her mother, dressed like she was in her golden gown.

Kevan looked at his niece. He had allowed Cersei to come back for the funerals, but she would leave in two days as soon as it was over and Myrcella’s body was buried under the Red Keep. He knew this could be dangerous, but he wouldn’t keep a mother away when her daughter just died. Cersei was devastated, and it wasn’t hard for anyone to see it. She couldn’t support the death of her daughter anymore than she could support the death of her son. Jaime was a little better than her, but not much. He had never been close to Cersei’s children… but they were his children all the same.
Kevan took place in front of Myrcella’s feet. Queen Margaery held Tommen’s hand. Of all the people standing around the body, she was the one who was the less affected, but she showed sympathy if not sadness. Kevan supposed he couldn’t expect her to weep for Myrcella. They never knew each other.

“She grew up.” Tommen’s voice echoed on the walls, the floor and the roof. His voice was weak, but with the total silence it echoed all the same.

“I wish I had known her,” softly said Margaery.

“Of course, you do.” Cersei’s voice was low but full of scorn. “You wish you had known her so you could use her.”

Jaime closed the distance between him and Cersei and took her arm with his hand, but she threw it away. Cersei got closer to her daughter’s body, tears running on her cheeks. She passed her hand through her daughter’s hair, letting it slip between her fingers. “I will avenge you, my baby. Those who killed you will pay.”

Jaime approached her and put his left hand on her shoulder. “The man who killed her is dead. He already paid,” he tried to say on an appeasing tone.

“We all know who did this. It’s these snakes. The Martells!” She shouted the last two words.

Kevan heard footsteps behind him. The new High Septon, Sorold, came to him. He had been elected last week during a vote that had been disturbed by an attempt of the Sparrows to burst into the Great Sept while the members of the Most Devout voted to choose the new High Septon. However, Randyll Tarly had already arrived back then and stationed dozens of his men to protect the election. Only ten of them protected the entrance to the sept, the others were hiding, so about thirty Sparrows had come with clubs to disturb the election. When the Captain of Lord Tarly’s guard ordered them to disband, they refused and tried to force their way in. The other guards had left their hideouts and slaughtered the Sparrows. None escaped. They only had cubs and no armor, while Lord Randyll’s men were heavily armed with swords, helmets and breastplates. Lord Tarly only lost one man in that skirmish, and ever since the Sparrows were quiet.

“My Lord Hand,” said the High Septon as he bowed. He had been named thanks to the support of the queen. Sorold came from Appleton in the Reach, and he was never far away when the queen visited an orphanage, a poorhouse, or when she distributed food to the people. He was almost as popular as the queen herself.

“Your Holiness,” Kevan replied respectfully.

“May I have a word?”

“This is hardly the best time, your Holiness.”

Cersei was beginning an argument in the presence of her daughter’s body. The queen was trying to calm her down. “Your Grace, this is hardly the time or the place for it.”

“What do you know of this? She’s not your family. You shouldn’t even be there!” Kevan’s niece yelled.

Sorold spoke at low voice very quickly. He was probably eager to leave this place before the argument went farther. “My lord, Septon Ollidor was found by the Sparrows in a brothel and forced to make a walk of shame. I sent for Lord Tarly’s men, but I thought you’d want to know.”
Septon Ollidor was a member of the Most Devout. This was no good. However, Kevan’s attention was brought elsewhere by the argument developing between the queen and her mother-in-law.

“Your Grace, I am married to the king. I feel his loss as if it was my own. I feel the death of Myrcella as if my own sister was dead…” tried to say Margaery Tyrell.

“Don’t ever dare to say that Myrcella was your sister.” Cersei’s voice remained venomous. Jaime didn’t seem to know what to do.

“My lord,” hissed the High Septon.

“Thank you, your High Holiness,” replied Kevan. He would talk about the matter with the High Septon later.

His Holiness didn’t ask twice to leave. Cersei had entered an uncontrollable rage. “They killed my daughter. The Martells have always loathed us. They killed her. I WANT THEM ALL DEAD!”

Her outcry reverberated all over the Great Sept. Tears were still visible on the Queen Mother’s cheeks, but sadness had given way to fury. To everyone’s surprise, Tommen was the first one to reply to his mother’s yelling.

“Mother, I want you to leave.”

The words weighed heavily in the sept. Cersei looked at her son now, anger gone. Tommen kept looking at his sister’s face, not daring to face his mother.

“What did you say?” Cersei looked stunned.

“I wish to mourn my sister in peace. I want you to leave. I order you to leave.”

Cersei remained there, looking desperately at her son who didn’t look back. Finally, Kevan decided to intervene. “The king spoke. Cersei, please leave.”

Cersei looked at him, anger plain on her face. Jaime encouraged her to leave with his arm and accompanied her to the exit. He didn’t come back. Kevan was all alone with the king, the queen and her brother.

“I’m sorry, my love,” said Margaery to Tommen. The king kept staring at his sister and Margaery looked at Ser Kevan. He nodded in her direction. In the previous days, they had both made Tommen understand that no one could behave improperly in the presence of Myrcella’s body, making him understand that even if he or she was a member of his family, the person couldn’t be allowed near Myrcella if it wasn’t to mourn her in silence.

Again, they remained silent. Ser Loras looked uncomfortable, and somewhat he seemed to wish he was somewhere else, but at least he tried to hide it. Kevan could at least appreciate the effort for Tommen.

“You don’t have a sister?” asked Tommen to his wife.

“No. I wish I had one.” The regret in her voice seemed sincere.

“One day, one of my cats got lost in the gardens. I couldn’t find him. Myrcella came to help me. She hid from Mother and skipped her embroidery lessons to help me search him. When we found him, it was almost dark. She was always so kind with me.”

“She loved you very much.”
“Yes, she did. Unlike Joffrey. We didn’t ask for his help. He would have refused, or said we were stupid and foolish. And if he had accepted, he might have done the same that he did to the cat with kittens. He killed her and opened her belly to see the kittens inside.”

Kevan closed his eyes at the mention of this story. Cersei had spoiled Joffrey and ruined him, turning him into a second Mad King. Tywin’s golden daughter had grown into a vain, foolish, greedy woman, and she made her eldest son no better. It was a good thing that Lady Sansa exposed her crimes at the trial. If Tyrion had been sentenced to death, she would have become Lady of Casterly Rock. Left to rule House Lannister, she would have ruined Tommen as she had Joffrey, and would probably have ruined House Lannister as well.

Kevan remained with his grandniece for two hours, but he had to leave after that. He couldn’t leave the Crown to itself when it needed a firm hand more than ever. He left the Great Sept of Baelor alone, the queen and Tommen staying behind. Ser Loras had already left.

Back in the Tower of the Hand, Kevan read reports on the Iron Islands. The Ironborn had lost all their positions in the North, and now Balon Greyjoy was dead, having fallen from a bridge. He left no son. The last, Theon Greyjoy, had died when the Northerners took back Winterfell. He only had a daughter, Yara Greyjoy, but his brother had come back recently from exile. This gave chills to Kevan. Euron Greyjoy had been the mind behind the attack on Lannisport the last time the Iron Islands rebelled. If he was back… Kevan hoped Balon’s daughter would fight for her birthright, but she was a woman, and never a woman had been named Queen of the Iron Islands. The Redwyne fleet was close to the Arbor. They could start the invasion on the Iron Islands soon, before the Greyjoys could organize their forces, and hopefully before they solved their internal quarrels.

His squire came in. “My lord, Ser Jaime wishes to speak with you.”

“Let him in,” Kevan said. His nephew entered, but did not sit. “I’m sorry for your loss, Jaime.”

Jaime looked at him. “You know the Martells killed her.”

Kevan tightened his lips. “We cannot know for sure. Varys says his little birds have found nothing in Dorne in that sense.”

“Come on, Kevan. I know Cersei jumps quickly to conclusions, but this time she’s right. Myrcella was murdered, and you can’t pretend this isn’t strange we received no news of her despite all the ravens we sent.”

“Varys is telling us Myrcella died not long before Prince Doran informed us.”

“Do you really trust Varys?”

“Do you know someone better to inform us on this kind of things?” Jaime had no answer. “Then for now, we have no proof that the Martells are behind this. I haven’t forgotten the strange circumstances of her death, and I will inquire on this. I will inform you as I receive updates. But for now, I have more pressing matters to attend.”

“Wouldn’t you say that the murder of your own blood is a pressing matter? What could matter more?”

Kevan raised from his chair. “I have a king, and seven kingdoms to look after. The Boltons are in rebellion, so are the Greyjoys. The Riverlands were only pacified recently, most of our forces are in the North, and what’s left is required to invade the Iron Islands. Winter is at our door, and we are unprepared for it. What do you want me to do? Declare war upon Dorne? Without proof that they killed Myrcella? Uncertain that they did it? While House Lannister has no men to spare for this war? Aegon Targaryen couldn’t conquer Dorne with his dragons, and his successors all failed. Daeron the First lost his life in it. They needed a marriage to bring Dorne into the fold. You want me to start a campaign on the brink of winter that we couldn’t win?”

Jaime looked straight into his uncle’s eyes. “Myrcella was murdered. Father started a war when Tyrion was arrested.”

“Yes, but we knew for sure who arrested him. We don’t know for sure who killed Myrcella. We will find out about this, and then we will act, but not before. I will not start a war we are unlikely to win without solid proof. Doran Martell is a cautious man. He will not start a war on his own. Better for us to use this time to deal with our other enemies. For the time being, I will send Nymeria Sand back to Sunspear. She is under guard in her rooms and leaves tomorrow. Our alliance included a seat for House Martell on the small council, but since Myrcella is dead, then it doesn’t hold anymore. The Martells will have to prove their loyalty if they ever want one of their own back on the small council.”

The squire came back into the room again. “My lord, my lord, I am sorry to intrude, but there is a boy below. Grand Maester Pycelle begs the Lord Hand to see him at once. It’s about Lord Tyrion.”

Kevan turned to Jaime. “Go and perform your duty, Lord Commander. I must perform mine.”

He left to see Pycelle. Hopefully, these were news that Tyrion had breached Moat Cailin and was now really marching on Winterfell. Kevan would rather not have another type of news.

Chapter End Notes

Exceptionally, I will publish three chapters this week, including one on New Year's Day. These will be the last I upload until February. I need to take a pause from "A Shadow and a Wolf" to refresh my ideas and keep it going on well. I also want to start writing a novel in the meantime.

Don't worry, I will be back as soon as February comes with two chapters each week as usual. I just need a rest. I won't make you wait as long as the showrunners do for Season 7. I will keep updating "A Rose and a Lion" during January.

Please review

Next chapter: someone we haven't seen as a POV for a very very long time
Jaime IV

Chapter Notes

Jaime Lannister is back as a POV after a very very long absence.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

JAIME IV

Jaime stood alone in the Tower of the Hand. Kevan had left to see Pycelle, and he just plainly refused to declare war against Dorne. Myrcella just died, assassinated by the Dornish, and all Kevan found to say was that they had no proof. The Iron Islands could wait. They never posed a threat during the whole war. Anyway, they didn’t need the fleets of Lannisport and the Arbor to take Dorne. All they needed was a powerful army on the land, and the Tyrells could provide one. Also, they could call Tyrion back.

Tyrion’s army was still stuck on the Kingsroad in the Neck. He couldn’t stay there forever with winter coming. Jaime thought that Tyrion was stupid to invade the North at this time of the year. Stannis himself was defeated in the North. Even with his big mind and the Blackfish, Jaime doubted Tyrion could take back Winterfell, or at least take it back with reasonable losses.

Tyrion would be better to come back before winter and to wait for spring to launch a full-scale invasion on the North. Then he would succeed. The North would be weakened and tired enough of the Boltons. They would welcome Tyrion and Sansa with open arms, especially if they came with their child.

Jaime couldn’t believe that his little brother would be a father very soon. He was still surprised that Sansa Stark allowed him to share her bed. Catelyn Stark’s daughter really seemed to love Tyrion. Jaime still wondered how his brother managed to make two women fall in love with him. Soon Jaime would have a nephew. A real nephew. That is, if it was a boy.

He should have followed Kevan to see Pycelle. There he could have tried to convince them to call Tyrion back with his army so they could invade Dorne and avenge Myrcella. Tyrion had always been fond of Myrcella and Tommen, much more than Jaime had ever been. Cersei never allowed him to take an important place in the lives of their children, and truth be told Jaime never asked for it. What he always wanted was to be with the woman he loved and to serve the king. Tyrion had occupied a bigger place in Tommen’s and Myrcella’s lives than Jaime, and perhaps even Cersei. Their sister always focused entirely on Joffrey and didn’t really take care of their other children. During the breakfasts, Tyrion was the one to always make his younger nephew and his niece laugh and smile, while Cersei always disapproved what he did or centered all her attention on Joffrey. Tyrion would come back for Myrcella, Jaime was sure of that. Though…

I don’t care anymore what will happen to House Lannister in the future. I am done with my loyalty to a family that never showed me any. My loyalty is to you now. And to my wife. I swore to protect her when I put that cloak on her shoulders, and she showed more loyalty to me than the average Lannister. These were words Tyrion used one day, during his trial. Of course, things had changed since. He was cleared of his charges, became Lord of Casterly Rock, and with the distance separating him from Cersei, Tyrion was again in good terms with their family. Still, he said these things, and Tyrion led an army a few months ago in the North to save his wife’s sister and give her back her home. Jaime was afraid. Who would Tyrion place first? His family or his wife? If he were to choose between Cersei and House Lannister, what would Jaime choose? And if he were to choose between Tyrion and Cersei? He didn’t know. The last letter Tyrion wrote to him talked about his wife for almost half the space. Now she was pregnant. Jaime was afraid that Tyrion may choose his wife over the family. No, certainly not. He said it at a moment where he was close to being executed for a false crime. Jaime left everything behind when Tyrion was in danger. Tyrion would be ready to do the same for him, but he wouldn’t act foolishly like Jaime did. They needed Tyrion’s mind to defeat the Martells.

They had to call back Tyrion from the Neck. That’s what they had to do. He would talk about this with Kevan tomorrow. For now, he needed rest. After he saw Cersei. Jaime left the Tower of the Hand, keeping his golden hand at his belt. It wouldn’t do to scratch it on the walls or anything. He walked in the silent corridors of the Red Keep. People mourned Myrcella, and unlike when Joffrey died, their mourning looked sincere enough. Jaime hoped this would make Cersei feel better to see that people cared about her daughter’s death.

He arrived before Cersei’s chambers. Two guards stood before, but they let him go in without question. Cersei may not be free of her movements, but people were free to see her, and Jaime made sure he spent as much time he could with his sister. Her chambers were comfortable, though maybe not as much as those she had before, but Cersei didn’t complain about it. She complained about nothing but Myrcella’s death. She sat in a chair, her face hollow, grief making her more beautiful than ever. She said nothing when Jaime entered. She didn’t seem to realize he was there.

“I couldn’t talk Kevan into it. We were interrupted. I’ll see him again tomorrow,” he said awkwardly. Cersei didn’t react, so after a moment Jaime came to the hard part. “I think we should call back Tyrion.” This time she looked at him. “He has most of our forces. If we tell him what the Martells did to Myrcella, he will fight for her. Tyrion cared for her…”

“Cared for her?” Her voice was trembling, but furious. “He sent her to Dorne!”

“He couldn’t know she was going to get killed…”

“Then he’s stupid! The Martells have always hated us, blamed us for the death of Elia Martell and her children. Any fool would know that Myrcella was going to be killed. He’s responsible.”

“No, he’s not. I am responsible. I knew she was in danger. I should have gone to Dorne and brought her back. She was my daughter and I failed her.”

Jaime said these words, and he believed them. They received a warning, and he did nothing. He let Kevan do nothing, and Myrcella was killed because of him. He didn’t try to save her, and she was killed because Elia Martell and her children were butchered long ago. Nothing would have happened if he had protected them this day.

Fury remained on her face for some time, but faded away. His sister seemed tired of being angry. It was easier for Jaime to feel angry since he hadn’t been close to Myrcella like her mother. Grief wasn’t strong enough to drown his anger.

“Do you remember the first time you saw a dead body?” Cersei asked after a moment.

Yes, Jaime remembered it damn well. “Mother.” He remembered seeing her body after Tyrion was born, though he couldn’t remember precisely how she looked like, alive or dead. He was only four when she died.
“All I could think about when she died was what would happen to her now. Every day, every night, what does Mama look like now? Has she started to bloat? Has her skin turned black? Have her lips peeled back from her teeth? I think about locking Myrcella in a crypt. I think about her beautiful little face starting to collapse.”

Jaime approached her and came on his knees before her. “Shh, Shh. Don’t think about it.”

“I have to. I have to. It’s not right she has to suffer alone.”

“She’s not suffering. She’s gone. No one can hurt her anymore.” He didn’t like to see Cersei like this. She was always strong.

“She was good.” A tear came rolling down on her left cheek. “From her first breath, she was so sweet. I don’t know where she came from. She was nothing like me. No meanness, no jealousy, just good.”

“I know.” Jaime cast his eyes on the floor. Joffrey had been horrible, but Myrcella was everything Joffrey hadn’t been.

“I thought if I could make something so good, so pure… maybe I’m not a monster.”

“Listen. Listen to me. She was my daughter and I failed her.”

“No, I knew this would happen. The witch told me years ago.” What was Cersei talking about? “She promised me three children and she promised me they’d die. And gold their shrouds. Everything she said came true. You couldn’t have stopped it. It’s prophecy. It’s fate.”

That wasn’t the Cersei he knew. Myrcella’s death affected much more deeply than Joffrey’s. “You don’t believe that.”

“Of course I do.” She looked at him. “It’s like what Kevan told me the day before the trial. He told me to beware of Sansa Stark. I didn’t listen to him and everything came true.”

“Fuck prophecy. Fuck fate.” Jaime didn’t want to hear about it anymore. He didn’t want to see his sister like that. “Fuck everyone who isn’t us. We’re the only ones who matter, the only ones in this world. And everything they’ve taken from us, we’re going to take back and more. We’re going to take everything there is.”

He wrapped his arms around his sister’s shoulders and let her cry silently for their daughter. The sun was setting on the horizon. A few hours later, Jaime was sleeping in his rooms, alone. He couldn’t stay with Cersei for the night, not with the guards at her door, and anyway she probably didn’t want of him right now. He wasn’t sure he wanted her either, not since she had tried to kill Tyrion. Still, he loved her. He didn’t choose who he loved.

In some way, Jaime envied Tyrion. Unlike him, his little brother hadn’t loved a single woman through his life. First there had been Tysha, then the whore Shae, and now Sansa Stark. When a woman left Tyrion’s life, he found another one. Jaime didn’t think he could find another one if Cersei died. They had come into the world together, and they would probably leave it together. Jaime didn’t know what he would do if Cersei was to die while he lived. Serve as a dignified bodyguard, probably. Protect his son. Jaime thought about Tommen. He didn’t feel indifferent towards Tommen like he had for Joffrey, but he hadn’t really seen him like his son either. He had never tried to know him better. What did he really know of Tommen, or Myrcella, or Joffrey? He knew nothing. They were his children, and he almost knew nothing of them.

He was standing in the Great Sept of Baelor, standing vigil for Myrcella. He stared at the daughter he never knew. It was the first time he was alone with her, and it would also be the last. He wanted to tell her something, but nothing could come out of his mouth. So he just stood there, standing vigil for the princess. The sept was still and dark.

A woman emerged from the shadows, her gown slipping on the floor making soft sounds that echoed everywhere. She walked slowly to the bier, and as she came close Jaime thought he recognized Cersei.

“Sister?” But it was not Cersei. She was a silent sister, all dressed in grey. A hood and veil concealed her features, but he could see the candles burning in the green pools of her eyes. “Sister, what would you have of me?” His last word echoed up and down the sept, memememememememememe.

“I am not your sister, Jaime:” She raised a pale soft hand and pushed her hood back. “Have you forgotten me?”

Can I forget someone I never knew? The words caught in his throat. He did know her, but it had been so long…

“Will you forget your own lord father too? I wonder if you ever knew him, truly.”

Her eyes were green, her hair spun gold. He could not tell how old she was. Fifteen, he thought, or fifty. She climbed the steps to stand above the bier, looking at the body. Jaime realized Myrcella’s body had turned into his father’s.

“He could never abide being laughed at. That was the thing he hated the most,” she resumed, hey eyes locked on Lord Tywin.

“Who are you?” He had to hear her say it.

“The question is, who are you?”

“This is a dream.”

“Is it?” she smiled sadly. “Count your hands, child.”

One. One hand, clasped tight around the sword hilt. Only one. “In my dreams, I always have two hands.” He raised his right arm and stared uncomprehending at the ugliness of his stump.

“We all dream of things we cannot have. Tywin dreamed that his son would be a great knight, that his daughter would be a queen. He dreamed they would be so strong and brave and beautiful that no one would ever laugh at them.”

“I am a knight,” he told her, “and Cersei is a queen.”

A tear rolled down on her cheek. “And you? What did you dream of?”

To stay with my sister, forever, and live happily with her. He couldn’t tell her that. That was all he ever wanted, and he could never have it. There had always been something separating them. When they were children, their mother had kept them apart. Then later, their father did the same when he brought Cersei to court. When Jaime was named in the Kingsguard, he thought they could be together again, but then his father resigned from his position of Hand of the King. Cersei left King’s Landing for Casterly Rock as Jaime left Casterly Rock for King’s Landing. When she married Robert, they were again in the same place, but never really together. They always had to hide from the world, and there was Robert between them all the time. Cersei had put an end to their relationship when she married Robert, but then she came back to him when she realized Robert would never love her. When Tyrion was captured by Catelyn Stark, Jaime rode to his rescue, and again he was separated from her. When he finally came back, it was only to be turned down by her, and to see her accuse Tyrion of their father’s murder. Then he learned she tried to kill Tyrion, that she fucked their cousin Lancel and maybe Osmund Kettleblack, and tried again to murder their brother. She was sent away from court afterwards, and they were separated away. Everything seemed to set them apart, even when they were close. The woman was right. We all dream of things we cannot have.

“What did you dream of?” Jaime asked her.

“The same than your father. Though there was a time when my dreams were different. The first didn’t come true. Your father’s and mine came true, but is that really what we wanted? Is that really what you wanted?”

“I always saw myself as a knight. More than a lord.”

“That’s not what you dreamed of though.”

She looked at him with sorry eyes. Jaime remembered she found them, he and Cersei, together, doing inappropriate things in a bath. He didn’t remember what they were doing, but it was enough for her to place them in chambers in opposite extremities of the castle. She died not long after, giving birth to Tyrion.

“Did he know?” Jaime asked her.

“I hope not. I don’t know what would have happened to him if…” Tears were threatening again to leave her eyes. “You were his son, Jaime. His golden son. And Cersei was his golden daughter. He loved you. He loved you both. He never said it, but he loved you. You were his children.” Jaime looked down on the floor. “Was she your daughter?”

The woman looked at the bier, and when Jaime followed her gaze, he found Myrcella’s body there again. His father had vanished. He looked at her, the girl he and Cersei made one night, or one morning, or one afternoon. He couldn’t tell. But there was one thing he could tell. He could answer to the question. “No.”

She never was his daughter. He never knew her. He never tried to know her. He never tried to know any of the children he sired, nor tried to take any part in their lives.

Jaime remembered their time at Winterfell. He wasn’t there, but he heard from the Hound later that Tyrion had slapped Joffrey in the face when he refused pettishly to offer his sympathies to Bran Stark’s parents. And at the breakfast this morning, Tyrion lifted Tommen from his seat, earning giggles from both Myrcella and her brother. He exchanged smiles and laughs with his nephew and his niece. They liked him. Jaime never really tried to make Tommen or Myrcella laugh or smile, nor did he try to act as if he plotted with them against their mother. He never tried to correct Joffrey’s flaws either. Tyrion had never tried to be a father to Tommen and Myrcella, and even less to Joffrey, but he had been more a father to them than Jaime or Robert ever were. Perhaps this explained why Tommen and Myrcella were good children. Cersei had never really cared about them, focusing all her attention on Joffrey. Tyrion had more influence on them. He made them decent and kind where Cersei made Joffrey horrible, and where Jaime did nothing. Like when Elia Martell and his children were butchered. Like when Rickard Stark and his son were murdered. He did nothing.

“Is that really what you wanted?” the woman asked.

“I don’t know.” He never asked himself if he wanted children. All he had ever wanted was Cersei, and he never had her. Not really.
“How is your brother?”

“Happy, I suppose.”

“Do you know what were his dreams?”

Jaime took time to answer. “To drink. To read. To travel. Be Lord of Casterly Rock. Have a wife who would love him.” He thought about the wheelwright’s daughter.

She smiled fondly at him, and tears ran again on her cheeks. “Maybe dreams can become true.”

The woman raised her hood again and turned her back on him. Jaime called after her, but already she was moving away, her skirt whispering lullabies as it brushed across the floor. Don’t leave me, he wanted to call, but of course she’d left them long ago.

He woke up in darkness, shivering. He raised his right arm and saw the same stump than in his dreams. Was it a dream? He looked at the little table aside his bed and saw his golden hand. He didn’t keep it on him for the night.

Jaime rose and went to pour himself a cup of wine. He wished Tyrion was there, but he was far away in the North, fighting for his wife’s home. The things we do for love. He awkwardly filled the goblet. After a year with his golden hand, it still felt odd to do the simplest things with his left hand. He took a sip, holding the cup carefully.

He wondered if he shouldn’t go back to the Great Sept and stand guard for his daughter. He was never a father to her while she was alive. Would it change something if he tried to be one after she was dead? He thought about Tommen. A sweet boy, playing with cats, round and red cheeked. Nothing like Joffrey. Joffrey was only my seed. Could Tommen be more? Was it too late? Could he still be a father for the last of his children, when he was king and already married? He wondered if the queen… both queens, would allow it? Margaery Tyrell wasn’t going to let someone speak anything to her king. Though lately Jaime found she and Kevan got along quite better than before. Too much better. They didn’t seem to fight for Tommen’s attention anymore. Jaime didn’t like it. Cersei neither. He wondered what Kevan was doing.

Jaime returned to his bed once the cup was empty. He sat there for a moment, thinking about his little brother. Jaime and Cersei had come together into the world. They had loved each other since they were children. They grew up together, and were so alike. Yet, things weren’t going well for them, and they never seemed to have really been together for long. Tyrion’s wife came from another family, who was in war with theirs. Her mother had tried to execute Tyrion, she was about twenty years younger than him and she didn’t want to marry him in the first place. She was tall and beautiful (Jaime couldn’t deny she was, though her beauty was nothing when compared to Cersei’s) while Tyrion was small and ugly. And yet, she had come to Tyrion’s rescue when Cersei imprisoned him, refused to abandon him when she had a chance to escape the capital, and now she had a baby with him. And according to Tyrion’s letters, she loved him. How could that be?

The thought of Tyrion and his wife brought someone else to Jaime’s mind. Someone else he hadn’t seen for a long time. She was with his brother right now, serving his wife. Jaime laid down in his bed, trying to fall asleep without success.

Probably after more than an hour, someone drummed at his door. Jaime had almost begun to doze. The drumming was repeated. “SER JAIME!” cried someone in the outside.

The Kingslayer groaned and got on his feet. He put on some night clothes and walked heavily to the door, opening it with eyes half open. A young boy with arms of a red archer on a green field was standing there.

“Lord Commander. Lord Tarly summons you. He says it’s urgent.”

“Can’t it wait for the morning?” Jaime complained.

“No, it can’t. He’s very insistent, Lord Commander.”

“All right. I’m coming.” Jaime sighed and closed the door. He put on some appropriate clothes and armor along with his right hand and followed the young boy. As they travelled through the Red Keep, Jaime realized they weren’t going to the small council room, nor to the Tower of the Hand, nor to Lord Randyll’s private apartments. They were heading for the rookery. Why? Did they receive a message from Tyrion? Had something happened to him? Jaime walked more quickly. They climbed many stairs to reach the rookery. As they approached the Grand Maester’s chambers, Jaime noticed a great number of Tarly guards. The door was closed. When Jaime tried to open it, two guards with the same arms than the boy stopped him. The young boy knocked on the door. A rough voice asked who it was, and the boy gave his name, saying the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard was there. The door opened and Jaime made his way inside.

He had expected many things, but not this. The scene before him was one of devastation, chaos…and death. Broken bottles, ink dropped everywhere. The smell in the room was horrible, but it wasn’t the most horrible of all. Grand Maester Pycelle was seated at his table. He would have seemed to sleep, his head pillowed on the great leather-bound tome before him, if it wasn’t for the deep red gash in the old man’s spotted skull, the blood pooled beneath his head staining the pages of the book, and the bits of bone and brain, islands in a lake of melted wax, all around his candle. Jaime stared in horror at this. Until the door closed brutally behind him.

Jaime turned to find himself nose to nose with the hard face of Lord Randyll Tarly. “Not a pretty sight, I admit, but I’ve seen worse at war.”

He stood aside and looked at the wall his high stature hid before. Jaime’s gaze fell on the other half of the scene before him. Another dead body was lying on the floor, a bolt in his heart, several stabs all over the corpse from head to toe. Jaime didn’t recognize him until he noticed the badge, all tainted with blood. He moved slowly and knelt by his side.

“Kevan.” He thought he could recognize what had been the face of his uncle through the wounds the knives had left. The eyes had been burst, bits of brains were on the floor just like for the Grand Maester, and dried blood was coming out from everywhere. Jaime stared in horror. He had seen many horrible things during the war, but here, inside the Red Keep? Not since Aerys’s time.

“They were found an hour ago by a serving girl. One of my men stopped her while she was running all over the Red Keep and brought her to me. She told me everything, and that’s how I found all of it,” Randyll Tarly explained. “No one knows except you and me for now.”

Jaime stood up, his eyes not leaving what was left of his uncle. “Who did this?”

“We don’t know.”

Jaime faced the Lord of Horn Hill. “Surely someone saw something. You can’t assassinate the Hand of the King and the Grand Maester without anyone noticing it.”

“My men are searching right now. One of them is awakening the king and the queen as we speak. But if the assassins are still inside the Red Keep, we must keep this new from spreading all over the castle. Or else it will make our task much more difficult.”
Lord Randyll’s words left no place to discussion. Jaime had the strange impression to be listening to his father. “There’s something else.” Lord Randyll handed him a piece of paper with spots of blood on it. “It was found next to the Grand Maester. As Lord Commander of the Kingsguard, I thought you should know.”

Jaime took the paper and unrolled it uneasily with his golden hand. Despite the blood that splattered all over it, the message was clear and very easy to read. Even before his father forced him to sit four hours each day until he learnt to read, Jaime may have been able to read these five simple words.

_The queen sends her regards._

Chapter End Notes

Kevan is dead. We shall never see his like again. Those who are very perceptive may have noticed the similarities in the previous chapter with the epilogue of "A Dance with Dragons" when Kevan was called to see Pycelle. Now, things are really going to move in King's Landing. For everyone who found the plot dull in the capital after Tyrion and Sansa left it, this is the end of it.

Please review

Next chapter: Mira
This is the last chapter I write before February. The former chapter was to end the intrigue in King's Landing for 2016 and prepare for the one in 2017, and now this chapter does the same with the North. The original plan was to have Sansa as a POV for this chapter, but I chose Mira instead since it's been a while she didn't have a chapter. I hope you'll enjoy it.

Happy New Year everyone.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

They rode in silence to the cliff in the decreasing darkness of the night. Dawn was coming, but not yet here. They had fifteen men with them, four before and eleven behind. Well, fourteen men and one woman considering Brienne of Tarth was with them. Five of them were sworn to House Hightower and were given the task to protect Mira. The nine others were sworn to House Lannister. Their duty was to protect Sansa. The two ladies were leading their horses slowly, side by side, to the viewpoint. The dew of the grass crunched under the hooves of the beasts. Everything was still and silent. The calm before the storm.

They reached their destination and unhorsed. Sansa ordered the people following them to stay behind. She and Mira walked to the extremity of the cliff where they had a good view of everything that would happen. The fortress in ruins stood tall in the dim light of the ending night. Mist surrounded it. It was good. It would be more difficult for the defenders to see the enemy approaching.

The standards of the houses Lannister, Hightower, Frey, Tully, Crakehall, Vance, Mallister and all the other houses from the Westerlands and the Riverlands could be seen from afar south of Moat Cailin. On the northern side, Mira could distinguish men far away, but not the banners. She knew those of House Hornwood, House Manderly and House Lannister would be there, but she couldn’t see them from where they stood. The attack would begin soon.

After months in the Neck, the men were eager to fight, take the fortress and leave the marshes. The spirits were up. Mira hoped they would succeed, or else they might begin to have real problems with desertions. Some men had been kept before the southern side of the battlements since the end of the afternoon yesterday, and the crannogmen reported them that the garrison of Moat Cailin had kept a heavy guard all night. The men Lord Tyrion and Ser Brynden had positioned during the night would be relieved by others who had slept. The garrison would be tired while the attackers would be fresh and well rested. The men on the southern side would assault the walls first, blowing their horns as loudly as they could, to attract as many men as they could. The men on the northern side would know by the sounds of the horns that the assault had begun and would start their own not long after. The northern battlements of Moat Cailin would be less manned and easier to take.

“Soon it will be over,” said Mira. Soon, Moat Cailin would fall.
“It won’t be over,” said Sansa. “It’s only the beginning. Once Moat Cailin has fallen, we must take back Winterfell. Then we must take every castle that will oppose us. Every house that will refuse to bend the knee. Karhold, the Dreadfort, Ironrath, Castle Cerwyn, Highpoint… They must all be taken.”

Sansa shivered. “Are you cold, Sansa?”

“No, I’m all right.” Sansa had several furs on her, but her pregnancy was beginning to show off and Mira could perceive it if she looked well at her friend’s belly. She had to be careful. She could only agree with Lord Tyrion when he decided to send her to White Harbor. It would be too dangerous for her on campaign.

Mira looked again at Moat Cailin. The sun was beginning to appear far away. It wouldn’t be long before the assault started. She took a great inspiration, trying to calm herself.

“Are you afraid, Mira?” Sansa asked her.

“I am. Gerold will be fighting there.”

“But surely he won’t be in the vanguard.”

“No. I convinced him to not place our men in the first ranks. We will need them to take Ironrath. But he will take part to the battle all the same.”

Sansa nodded. “I know. I’m afraid too.”

“Lord Tyrion will not fight, Sansa. You don’t need to worry about him.”

“I’m not worried about him. I’m worried about Arya.”

Mira hadn’t thought about it. The two armies were going to attack Moat Cailin following the Kingsroad, but the crannogmen were going to attack the battlements from the swamps, making the defense harder for the Boltons and their allies, releasing poisoned arrows on them. Sansa’s little sister would fight with them. She had tried to convince Arya to not fight, but failed. Lord Reed said they wouldn’t be able to stop her, almost smiling.

“I’m sure she will be all right,” said Mira, trying to reassure Sansa. She knew she would be afraid as well if Talia was to fight in a battle.

“I hope so. Arya never listened to what we told her. She never obeyed. She wouldn’t attend the embroidery lessons, would fight with stable boys and ride, arrive at dinner late, play in the mud with a new dress Mother had prepared for her… But I always did as I was told, and things didn’t really go better for me.” Sansa laughed nervously. “You know, Tyrion asked her to follow me at White Harbor.”

“He did?”

“Yes, but she refused. She wants to go to Winterfell, and help to free it. I wish I could go with her.”

“You must look after yourself, Sansa. And after the baby.”

“I know,” Sansa said, resigned. “I’m afraid Arya is following the army only to be there when Winterfell is freed. I believe she might try something on Tyrion, again. I fear for him. She still hates him, just like all the Lannisters.”
Mira had noticed it. There was no love between Sansa’s sister and Lord Tyrion. “I will keep an eye on her. I promise.”

“Thank you, Mira.” A moment passed. “I think she doesn’t want to be near me either. We never had anything in common, and now I’m a Lannister.”

They remained silent for a moment, Sansa’s words hanging in the air. Then she said something else. “When we’ve dealt with the Boltons, I hope we will destroy the Dreadfort. It should never be seen again. They made my family suffer so much.”

Anger was plain on Sansa’s face and in her voice. “Maybe it would be better to give it to someone else, Sansa. Not long ago, you asked me if Arya wouldn’t make a better Lady of Winterfell than you. Maybe you could give her the Dreadfort? Create a new branch of House Stark?”

Sansa seemed to think about it for a moment. “Arya would have to marry.”

They both looked at each other, and they finally burst into small nervous laughs. “Will she accept to marry?” From what Mira had seen and what Sansa told her, Arya Stark was very unlikely to ever wed.

“I don’t think so. Arya never wanted to be a lady. She wanted to ride on a horse, shoot arrows, fight with swords, play in the mud with butcher’s boys…” At the last words, Sansa seemed ashamed. “I don’t see her ever marrying, and I won’t be able to force her to marry. I wish I had been a little like her when my first betrothal was arranged.”

“You couldn’t know Joffrey was a monster when he arrived at Winterfell.”

“I know, but later I should have realized it. It was so evident, who he was. Instead, when my father said I would never marry him, I begged him to stay in King’s Landing to marry him, saying he would be the most marvellous king that would ever exist. And when my father told me that he would organize me a marriage later, with someone worthy of me, someone brave and gentle and strong, I only told him that I didn’t want someone like that, and that I wanted Joffrey.”

Sansa was almost scoffing about herself. Mira had to admit her behaviour had been quite stupid, but after all, how old was she at the time? Thirteen? “Well, in the end, you got married to someone brave and gentle and strong.”

Sansa smiled. “Just like you.”

Mira felt some red climbing to her cheeks. “Yes, just like me.”

“I don’t think my father was thinking about Tyrion when he told me that. What would he think of me now? Married to the Imp?”

“I think he would be proud of you, and very happy to see that you married a good man.”

Sansa didn’t seem entirely convinced. Silence settled between them and Mira thought about her own husband. Someone brave and gentle and strong. Gerold had his flaws, and he wasn’t the ideal husband, but no one could accuse him of cowardice, wickedness or weakness. Well, some did, like his brother Altos, but they were wrong. Mira looked down, distinguishing what she thought were the banners of House Hightower. Her husband was among them. She prayed to the Old Gods and the Seven to spare him. She didn’t think he would die. He wasn’t in the first ranks, nor were his men, but everything could happen in battle.

A horn blew. A second, a third, a fourth, a fifth followed. The trebuchets Ser Daven built threw huge... stones. They threw three series. Then men in red, black and blue advanced towards the southern entrance of Moat Cailin. The vanguard ran to the gates as quickly as they could as the last blocks were thrown. Mira saw many fall, receiving arrows and bolts. The fortress was reputed impregnable, and she could see why. A rain of projectiles fell on the men advancing on the walls and the gates. The first men who reached them pressed their bodies on the walls, making it more difficult for the defenders to reach them without exposing themselves. For any fortress, it might have given a very good protection, but it was Moat Cailin, and the castle was precisely designed to allow its defenders to strike the enemy no matter where he was. Men died. Stones, rocks, arrows flew. Mira thought she heard their cries from where she stood.

Some men from the Westerlands and the Riverlands had arrows. The archers were protected by other men holding a shield and they started to shoot back arrows at the defenders. Mira thought she noticed a few coming from the swamps. These were from Howland Reed and his men. Arya Stark was among them. They hid in the swamps before the fortress and Mira knew they were almost impossible to see for the defenders. Two waves came crashing on the walls of Moat Cailin, and death kept raining on their men. Mira thought she saw a banner of House Hightower in the second wave.

Then came ladders and the ram. The men carrying them advanced more slowly, especially those with the ram. The ladders were there first. Many men carrying them died as well, but the ladders came to place one after one. The ram was brought forth, heavily protected. They began to smash the door. The losses seemed to be heavy. From the moment the attack began, horns kept blowing. It was as if the men who blew them competed to know which was the loudest one. Then they all stopped to blow, except one. It made three powerful blows, each of the same length.

Mira looked north of Moat Cailin. She feared they wouldn’t come, that they wouldn’t hear the horn or would even betray them. After all, these were Northerners inside Moat Cailin. Would the Manderlys and the Hornwoods fight against the Dustins and the Cerwyns? They couldn’t be sure. After seconds that looked like hours, she finally saw a column of men running to the northern entrance of the fortress. She distinguished orange, red and blue-green standards from afar. She saw a few arrows coming for them, but much less fell than on the southern side. A ram was on its way as well. She couldn’t see the men attacking the battlements on the north. Her position didn’t allow it. Many were hidden by Moat Cailin itself once they were close enough.

On the southern side, men kept dying, but both sides refused to abandon. Men kept climbing the ladders, the ram was still ramming on the gate, but it didn’t break. The gates of Moat Cailin were too strong. Mira saw the ram on the north disappear behind the walls of the fortress. On both sides now, they were trying to breach through the gate. The fight kept going on for some time, and then everything seemed to change. No stone and arrow was released anymore from the battlements and men climbed the ladders much more easily. Then the gate gave way and men hurried inside. Within a few minutes the golden lion was flying over Moat Cailin, and it was followed by the silver trout. And then, when Mira thought it was finally over, another banner raised higher than these two. A grey direwolf on an ice-white field. A banner Mira feared to never see again. The banner her ancestors always followed.

She turned to Sansa. They both smiled. “It has begun,” Mira said.

“Yes. It has. It’s only the beginning.”

They looked again at the first Stark banner they saw in years. Sansa walked away to her horse and Mira followed her. Moat Cailin was taken. Moat Cailin had fallen. The way to Winterfell was open… and the way to Ironrath too.

As they rode through the road to the fortress, they witnessed dead men lying on the road and in the marshes nearby. They had to skirt a few bodies. Men with all sigils from the Riverlands, the Westerlands, the Reach and the North were helping to carry the bodies and the wounded. Most of them had arrows stuck somewhere on their body, but as they got close to the castle, they saw a few with heavy injuries to the head or with hooked members. They had received rocks on the head or had fallen from the ladders, if not from the battlements. Most of the bodies wore the black of House Frey or were from the Westerlands. There were less from the Riverlands, since the river lords brought less men, and Mira noticed one man floating on the waters of the swamps, his head turned towards the depth of the marshes, unmoving, blood surfacing all around him, an arrow through his throat. Crannogmen lifted him as she was close and she recognized him. It was Mattas, one of the men who came from the Reach with them. Mira remembered speaking with him no later than yesterday. Now he was dead. She looked at him as her horse kept moving forward, until she went through the gate.

Inside, many men laid on the ground, wounded or dead as well. There were bodies that hadn’t been cleared off the way yet. She noticed the longaxes of House Dustin, the battle-axe of House Cerwyn, and of course the flayed man of House Bolton among the bodies and the men wearing chains. Mira dismounted near the entrance of the Hall as Sansa did. Her friend needed more time to dismount. Bearing a child began to burden her. Podrick Payne, Lord Tyrion’s squire, was waiting for them.

“My lady. My lady. My lady.” He said it for the three of them who were there. “Lord Tyrion, Ser Brynden and the other commanders are in the commander’s solar.”

“Is my lord husband with them?” Mira asked.

“Yes, my lady. Of course. Ser Gerald is with them.”

Mira could have corrected his misspelling, but she chose to not. They simply followed the squire, all the three women. She ordered her guards to help with the wounded. The solar was quite small for all the commanders to sit there, and some stood tall. Howland Reed was on his feet while Ser Wylis Manderly sat with his heavy weigh. Lord Tyrion, Ser Forley and Ser Daven all stood tall, though for Lord Tyrion it didn’t make much difference whether he sat or not. Ser Brynden had his fingers crossed on the table, and most of the river lords sat as well. The Freys, Ser Perwyn and Olyvar, were on their feet. Gerold was leaning on the wall, but as soon as he saw Mira enter, he went to her and kissed her.

“Glad to see you,” he said.

“Me too.”

She walked to the table. She would like to spend more time with her husband, but it would be later. For now, they had a war council. Gerold came to stand by her side. One of the river lords stood up to let Sansa sit while Lady Brienne remained at the door, guarding it.

“It’s good you’re both here, my ladies,” said the Blackfish. “Because we have something to tell to all of you, my lords. Something… quite unpleasant, I’m afraid.”

Lord Tyrion and Ser Brynden didn’t look very happy for men who just took a fortress they tried to seize for months. Sansa’s granduncle turned to the Lord of Casterly Rock who didn’t seem eager to share the unpleasant new.

“It seems that House Umber has decided to side with Ramsay Bolton.”

A huge silence followed. “But… The Greatjon was the staunchest supporter of Robb Stark,” said Ser Wylis the first.
“Jon Umber is dead,” replied Ser Brynden. “His son doesn’t seem to take much after his father.”

“Traitor!” this came from Lord Reed. “Nothing of this would have happened while Ned was alive. What has become of the North?”

Mira couldn’t agree more. She may understand the northern lords could be reluctant to fight for Sansa since she was a Lannister in name, but to fight for the Boltons, and furthermore for Ramsay! What had become of the North where high lords and minor lords believed to have duties towards their smallfolk and their bannermen? What had become of the North where kinslaying, kingslaying and breaking the guest rights were unforgivable? What became of the North she remembered from her childhood? Where was the honorable North?

“Perhaps the North was never honorable like you believed, Lord Reed,” said Lord Tyrion at this moment, right when she wondered about it. “But it seems the new Lord of the Last Hearth decided to join his forces to Ramsay’s after Jon Snow allowed wildlings in the Gift. It seems they are ready to cooperate with a mad dog if it means he will fight with them against wildlings. I wonder what’s the worst. Wildlings or mad dogs?”

The Lord of Greywater Watch didn’t take this comment very well. “Don’t do as if you had lessons to give us. Your lord father was behind the Red Wedding.”

“And Roose Bolton is the one who killed Robb Stark. He was a Northerner. Rickard Karstark murdered two children in cold blood. He was a Northerner. I don’t have lessons to give it’s true, but you ought to see something, Lord Reed. My father committed horrible crimes. That doesn’t mean all men from the Westerlands are monsters. Ned Stark was an honorable man. That doesn’t mean all the Northerners are honorable. Open your eyes. Three of the four major families in the North have turned against the Starks. Only the Manderlys have remained loyal. Not all men display the same honor than your friend, you know that very well. How many Northerners would be ready to put their own life and their family’s life in danger for a baby? Robert Baratheon, Ned Stark’s own friend, would have slaughtered every Targaryen he would have found, just like my father. He didn’t care more than my father if they were babies still in the cradle.”

Lord Reed was speechless. Lord Tyrion raised an eyebrow, as if interrogating him.

“This is not the time for this,” declared Ser Brynden. Wylis Manderly seemed about to join the argument as well. “The Umbers have betrayed House Stark and the Crown, as have the Boltons and the Karstarks. We’ll have to deal with them. All of you, prepare your men. We leave at first light tomorrow for Winterfell.”

The lords agreed and most of them slowly left, though Howland Reed mysteriously stayed behind, looking intently at Lord Tyrion. Gerold left as well. Mira remained with Sansa to accompany her to her room and give her support if need be. Her friend wasn’t in a good shape with her pregnancy and this new of a new family of the North siding with the Boltons wouldn’t make thing better. Mira was quite sure Sansa would believe again she might not be the appropriate Lady of Winterfell, seeing another great part of the North fighting her. Truth be told, if the Umbers preferred the Boltons to Sansa, then Mira thought it may be time for Sansa to be proud about feeling like a Lannister. They had now more honor than half of the North.

There were now only Lord Tyrion, Sansa, Mira, Lady Brienne, Lord Reed and Ser Brynden in the solar. Mira approached her friend.

“Sansa, maybe you should go to your rooms. You need rest.” With her pregnancy, she needed more than rest. She was almost six months gone.
“Not yet,” intervened Ser Brynden. “Lord Reed, bring Arya here. There’s something you should all know, and Arya has a right to know it before the others.”

“Yes, Ser Brynden,” the crannogman said. He left, glancing one last time at Lord Tyrion. He had to be very affected by the lord’s words about the doubtful honor of Northerners to stare at him this way.

“Sansa, you’ll head for White Harbor tomorrow, as soon as we get out of the Neck. You’ll be accompanied by a guard of fifty men. Your husband and I have already chosen them. They will be men from House Tully and House Lannister only. They will accompany Ser Wylis back to his father as well.”

“Yes, Ser Brynden. Thank you.” Sansa looked at her husband after she answered to her granduncle. Mira saw the regret they both had from being separated. She felt a little out of place all of a sudden and looked away. Mira wondered how she would feel if she and Gerold had to go different ways. She loved her husband, but she didn’t feel like she would be missing someone she needed if they were to be parted. Despite being good friend with Sera, Margaery and many others, she always felt alone in some way since she left Ironrath, even after her marriage.

“My lords, if you allow me, I believe Arya Stark should go to White Harbor as well,” said Brienne.

“I fear my sister-in-law doesn’t need your protection, Lady Brienne. The others are the ones who need to be protected from her,” said Tyrion bitterly, while looking at Sansa with concern.

“We could be taking a huge risk by bringing her along with the army. She knows how to fight and to defend herself, but still. She could be killed during an ambush or a battle,” the lady knight argued.

“I thought that Arya Stark should go to White Harbor me too before, but she may be useful when we reach Winterfell. For now, the North ignores her real fate, but if we bring her with us and show to the lords who sided with Ramsay Bolton that Arya Stark was never between his hands, some may be tempted to abandon him all of a sudden.”

“Tyrion is right,” said Sansa. “There must always be a Stark in Winterfell, and Arya is a Stark. She survived King’s Landing, Harrenhal, the Brotherhood without Banners, the war in the Riverlands, the Red Wedding, the Eyrie, Littlefinger and the Neck. I’m afraid we couldn’t keep her for long in White Harbor anyway. She doesn’t want to come.”

To say that Sansa said it without enthusiasm would be optimistic. Things didn’t go so well between Sansa and her sister since they reunited. Their reunion hadn’t begun quite well with Sansa taking a spear through her shoulder after all, and Arya Stark felt disdain at best for her sister’s husband and his men. Sansa didn’t take it very well since she loved her lord husband. Mira had always gotten along quite well with Talia, but the same couldn’t be said about Sansa and Arya. Sansa said they spent their childhood quarreling and squabbling, and even though they were both happy to see their sister alive, it was obvious they had a hard time together. So much kept the apart.

Lord Reed came back with the supposed daughter of Lord Fenn and closed the door behind him. “So, what is it?” he asked.

Ser Brynden looked at Lord Tyrion who hesitated to speak. Finally, he did.

“The news of House Umber’s defection came from a man I sent to the Last Hearth a year ago. He turned down north of Moat Cailin into the army of the Manderlys yesterday, but he waited for us to take the fortress to inform me. He told Ser Brynden and I about the betrayal of the Umbers, but that wasn’t the only information he brought. We should have told the other lords when they were present, but we felt you should all know first.”
“What is it?” asked Arya suspiciously.

“Rickon Stark is alive. Or at least, he may be alive.”

They were all stunned for a moment. Mira recovered first. “But he died. Wasn’t he burned by Theon Greyjoy?”

“That’s what we thought,” said Ser Brynden Tully, “but if he only displayed burned bodies before the people of Winterfell, he could make them believe they were Bran and Rickon while in fact, they could be any children.”

“Rickon is alive?” asked Arya Stark, unbelieving, hope piercing her voice.

“I hope he’s not,” said Lord Tyrion in a low voice.

“Why?” Sansa’s sister looked outraged now.

“Because this would mean Rickon stands before Sansa as Lord of Winterfell, and that would mean his children would no longer be the future Wardens of the North,” said Howland Reed with disdain.

“Yes, and this would mean that Rickon Stark is most likely at Winterfell right now,” retorted the Lord of Casterly Rock.

“What? At Winterfell?” said Sansa, horrified.

“My spy near the Last Hearth said that Jon Umber left the Last Hearth for Winterfell. He spotted a boy with a bag on his head among the people riding with him. He heard men saying that this boy was your brother, and Jon Umber was heading for Winterfell. Considering what we know of Ramsay Bolton, I wouldn’t want a Stark to end up in his hands, and I hope this is not Rickon Stark that the Umbers are bringing to Winterfell.”

Another long silence followed as they understood the implications of this. The Umbers had sided with the Boltons. If Rickon Stark was alive and they brought him with them, it was to give him to the Boltons.

“We have to save Rickon. We must stop the Umbers!” shouted Arya.

“The spy rode all the way from the Last Hearth to Moat Cailin without resting. If the Umbers haven’t reached Winterfell already, they will be there anytime soon. We cannot intercept them,” explained Lord Tyrion.

“Rickon…” said Sansa weakly.

“We don’t know for sure if that’s him.” The Blackfish tried to reassure them. “The man didn’t see the boy’s face, and he never saw Rickon before. Maybe the Umbers are only pretending to have him. That wouldn’t be the first time the Boltons and their allies make us believe they have a Stark in captivity.”

He looked at Arya as he said the last words. “Was Shaggydog with them?” she asked. “If that was really Rickon, then Shaggydog should have been there.”

“Shaggydog?” asked the Blackfish.

“That’s the name of his direwolf,” explained Tyrion Lannister. “He wasn’t seen, but that proves nothing. If Rickon was captive, they would probably have killed his direwolf. He wouldn’t follow the Umbers willingly. For now, we have no way to be sure this was Rickon.”

“But if that was Rickon, then Bran could be alive as well,” said Arya. “We have to find him. We must search for him. He must be somewhere…”

“Arya, they’re dead.” Sansa cut her sister. “Bran and Rickon are dead. Jon is our only brother who’s still alive, and he’s at the Wall. We know he is alive, but Bran and Rickon are gone. We won’t see them again.”

Arya looked at her sister, agape. “Don’t you want them to be alive?”

“Not if they are to be in Ramsay’s hands. You heard the stories about him. We all know what’s going to happen to Rickon if he’s alive. I’ve been Joffrey’s toy for months when I was in King’s Landing, and all this time I’ve wished I was dead. Ramsay is even worse. Do you want Rickon to cut, or torture, or…?”

The words lacked for the Lady of Casterly Rock. Mira put a hand on Sansa’s shoulder to calm her.

“If Rickon is alive,” resumed Arya, “then Bran is somewhere safe, and we have to find him.”

“But where? Where could he be? Tyrion has spies everywhere in the North, and none said anything about Bran being alive. They found nothing.”

“Perhaps he’s lying.” Arya looked at her brother-in-law with fury.

Ser Brynden stepped in at this moment. “Enough. We cannot be sure that this boy was Rickon Stark. If that was him, then our only chance to help him is to take Winterfell as quickly as possible. We march north tomorrow. That’s the best thing we can do to save your brother if he’s alive, and anyway we must get rid of Ramsay. When we take Winterfell, we will see if Rickon is really alive.”

“But Bran…”

“We will not start to spread rumors about Brandon Stark being alive. Or else people will start to claim any child who’s a cripple in the North to be Brandon Stark, and we will have new rebellions,” Lord Tyrion said.

“The Northerners wouldn’t do that,” declared Lord Reed.

“Really? The Boltons didn’t hesitate to claim they had Arya Stark, the Umbers may be faking to have Rickon Stark, so why some northern lords wouldn’t decide to pick the first young boy they find who can’t walk and proclaim him King in the North.”

“You don’t want us to find Bran, or Rickon. You want Winterfell for yourself!” Arya accused him.

“Arya!” shouted Sansa, scandalized.

“That’s enough!” Ser Brynden stood up. “We leave tomorrow, the time we need to take care of the wounded and question the men who guarded this place. I will inform my family’s bannermen about the possibility that Rickon Stark may be alive. Lord Tyrion, I leave you your own commanders and the Freys. Lord Reed, could you inform the Manderlys and the Hornwoods along with your men?”

“Yes, ser. I will tell them, but know this. If Rickon Stark is alive, then he is my lord.” Howland Reed looked at Lord Tyrion with defiance.

“Yes, he is your lord is he is alive.” Lord Tyrion seemed tired as he said so. “But in the meantime, you pledged your banners to Sansa, and we must take back Winterfell, with or without Rickon Stark. Can we still count on your help?"

“Yes,” the crannogman replied defiantly.

He left after this short reply. Arya remained behind, staring angrily at Lord Tyrion, and at Sansa as well, but she left in the end.

Tyrian Lannister turned his attention to Mira. “Lady Mira, could you accompany Sansa to our rooms. Pod knows where they are. After that, you could tell your husband about Rickon Stark.”

“Yes, my lord,” she replied.

Mira left with Sansa. Her friend exchanged a look with her husband. He seemed sorry. Even with Podrick Payne to guide them, they lost their way twice in the ruins. Finally, they arrived to what was probably the most well provided room of the place, though it wasn’t much since they were in Moat Cailin. Sansa sat heavily, looking tired. Mira wasn’t sure if that was her pregnancy or the discussion they just witnessed that exhausted her. Her face was decomposed.

“Do you think Rickon may be alive?” Sansa asked her.

“I don’t know,” Mira replied carefully. “If we were before the war, I would say just like my father that the Umbers would never lie about something like that, but since they allied themselves with the Boltons… I don’t know. For a time, I’ve been wondering if someone had survived the Battle of Ironrath, but I don’t think it’s very likely. They’re probably all dead, and if I hope that some are still alive, I will certainly only meet deception when I find out the truth.”

Sansa nodded. “We started this war, we marched on the North because we believed Arya was prisoner at Winterfell. Now, just when we discover that it wasn’t true, Rickon may be there. I don’t want him to suffer in Ramsay’s hands, but he could be alive? But how? Why would Theon lie about killing Bran and Rickon? And if he did, then where is Bran? And was Rickon really at the Last Hearth?”

Sansa took her forehead between her hands. “You should rest, Sansa. Ser Brynden is right. We cannot know for sure if your brother is at Winterfell. I suppose we’ll discover the truth when we take it.”

“I’m not only worried about Rickon.” Mira frowned. “Tyrion brought all these men from the Westerlands here, telling them they were to free Arya and give Winterfell to me. But once they learn that Rickon is… may be alive… Maybe they’ll want to desert. My family fought against the Lannisters not long ago. Robb invaded the Westerlands. Many lords here have lost family members in the battles against him. We could convince them to take Winterfell for me, and to free Arya. She’s my little sister. I have proper rights on Winterfell over her, but if Rickon lives…”

“He is the Lord of Winterfell,” finished Mira. Indeed, this was a serious complication.

“The lords of the Westerlands won’t want to fight for Winterfell if it means to give it to my brother. Even less with winter coming. I’m afraid what could happen to Tyrion. And Arya always seems eager to kill him.”

A long silence followed. Mira realized what problems Sansa would face if her brother was alive. Mira had never seen Theon Greyjoy, and Sansa seldom spoke about him. She never knew him very well. Could he fake burning the Stark boys? The Ironmen were known for their violence and their sordid ways in war, but still. To murder two boys you saw grow? Two children you grew up with?
Was it possible he only made everyone believe he burned the children? Then, where were Brandon and Rickon Stark now? For now, the questions were impossible to answer.

Mira left the seat she had taken near Sansa. “I must bring the news to Gerold. Just rest, Sansa. We’ll find out the truth about Rickon, sooner or later.”

She couldn’t find her husband during the day. According to his men, he was helping with the move of the camp. The whole army would march on Winterfell tomorrow, but they were already making it travel through Moat Cailin during the day to set up an new encampment north of the fortress. Only a small garrison would be left behind to keep the castle. Gerold was supervising the movement of his own men. Mira could only meet him right before dinner that night. He was stunned by the new that Rickon Stark was still alive, but Mira found his reaction lacked enough surprise.

During the dinner in the Great Hall of Moat Cailin, Ser Brynden informed everyone that the youngest son of Eddard Stark might be alive at Winterfell, though they couldn’t confirm it. That didn’t change anything since they still had to take back Winterfell. Among the Lannister commanders, the humor looked quite sour, while there were strong discussions among the Northerners. Gerold didn’t seem quite there. Of course, it didn’t change much for him or Mira. Sansa’s brother would most certainly acknowledge Mira as Lady of Ironrath like his sister did. Still, Gerold didn’t seem to be fully aware of what was going on around him.

Later that night, when they had changed, Mira tried to discover what was going on with him. They had a private room for themselves in Moat Cailin since they were husband and wife and that Gerold was among the commanders of the army. They were both sitting on their bed.

“What’s going on with you?” she asked, taking his hand. He was shaking, not much, but he shook.

“You know, when we spar in the training grounds, we get dirty, we receive bruises and cuts. Sometimes, we even bleed a little, or a lot, but no one is killed. We know that at most we will be badly injured, but no more. I never saw a proper battle before. Garlan told me about what it was, I knew people would die, but it’s different to hear the tales and to see them.”

Mira understood. He had been shaken by the battle. He resumed to talk after a moment. “I saw Mattas die. When we made the first assault months ago, some of my men died, but I didn’t actually see any of them die. But now… Now I saw it.”

His breathe was steady, but a little quicker than usual. “That won’t be your last battle. It’s not the last time you’ll see people dying, and it’s not the last time I’ll see that either. But you must be strong,” she told him.

“I know.” He seemed to calm. He looked at her. “I won’t abandon you. I swore to give you back your home, and I will. I love you.”

Mira was touched. She smiled fondly at her husband. “I love you too.”

He closed the distance that separated them and kissed her. His eyes were shining. Mira sighed in their kiss, contentment filling her body. Soon she was lying on her back, Gerold over her. His lips left her mouth and trailed on her cheek, then her neck. His hand came to remove the clothe from her shoulder.

“Gerold, we talked about this,” she said, breathing heavily. They had agreed, on her insistence, that they shouldn’t take the risk of making a child before Winterfell was freed after they learnt that Sansa was pregnant.
“Only this night. It’s been so long. I want you.” His voice was barely a whisper as he uncovered her other shoulder. Mira sighed. He was right. It had been long. She wanted to do it as well.

“All right. This night,” still breathing deeply.

They left Moat Cailin early in the morning. All men from the Hightower followed the army in the North. They were needed to take Ironrath. The garrison consisted in a mix of men from the North, the Riverlands and the Westerlands. Once they had left the Neck and were properly in the North, Sansa had to leave the column for White Harbor. Mira left it temporarily to make her farewells. Sansa made her repeat her promise to look after Arya, along with a new promise to keep an eye on Lord Tyrion as well. Sansa then hugged her sister. She was about to cry, and Mira thought Arya wasn’t far from crying. Despite all their disagreements, they were still sisters. Arya told her sister to be careful, and Sansa told her to not do anything crazy. Then came the moment when Sansa said farewell to her husband. They kissed at length, to Arya’s great disgust. Mira heard her friend saying something from afar.

“Don’t die. You’ll be a father the next time we see each other.”

Then Sansa left with Brienne, Ser Wylis Manderly and their respective retinues. Mira joined back the column where the Hightower soldiers were. They were heading north. Winterfell wasn’t far, and not much farther was Ironrath. Mira Forrester was going home.

Chapter End Notes

So, this is over for "A Shadow and a Wolf" in 2016. It will come back February 1st, even better I hope. In the meantime, I will upload one chapter each week in "A Rose and a Lion", and also start a project of an original book I had in head for a very long time. We meet again next month.

Please review
Trystane III

Chapter Notes

After a month of pause, here I am, back into service. The good news for you is that you'll get again two chapters per week. The bad news for me is that I'll have no life again.

To start again, we go back to Meereen with Trystane, Grey Worm and Kinvara. I hope you'll enjoy this first chapter after four weeks of absence.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

TRYSTANE III

The sun came from the openings in the structure of the Pyramid. It cast its light on half the room and warmed Trystane’s back. The temperature inside the Great Pyramid was quite similar to the one in the Water Gardens, but without the flowers, the fountains, and of course the sun. Without the woman he loved. He wished he could be back in Dorne, back with Myrcella. But she was dead, and now he had to save a city his new betrothed abandoned.

Grey Worm stood outside the reach of sunlight. On his own side, Trystane sat. He was trying to calm himself before the meeting, but so far he failed. So much depended of it. He saw his father negotiate several times with his bannermen, even with representatives of the Free Cities, but he never took an active part in these negotiations. Every time, he was only there to watch. This time, however, he would have to negotiate himself, and almost without help. The meeting was his decision, and only his decision. If it was a failure, it would be his failure, and only his failure, but he had no other choice. He saw no other option.

The angry stares Grey Worm sent him didn’t help to soothe his nerves. The Commander of the Unsullied had disapproved at the second Trystane explained his plan. He couldn’t really blame the eunuch. Not since he knew what the masters of Astapor did to him in his youth, but the survival of Meereen was at stake. They had to do it. He only hoped Grey Worm wouldn’t do something irreparable. After all, he commanded the Unsullied. If he was to order them to kill the emissaries, there would be nothing Trystane could do about it.

They heard footsteps approaching. Trystane tensed. He took a gulp of wine and stood up. They came into the room, all three of them. A young and comely girl, small of frame, with brown hair, certainly a slave they brought with them considering the collar she wore, came forth to introduce them.

“Now come the noble Yezzan zo Qaggaz, representative of the Good Masters, emissary of the great city of Astapor, master of men and speaker to savages, and the noble Razdal mo Eraz of that ancient and honorable house, representative of the Wise Masters, emissary of the great city of Yunkai, master of men and speaker to savages, and the noble Belicho Paenymion of that ancient and honorable house, descendant of Paenymio the Warrior, triarch and emissary of the great city of Volantis and its masters, master of men and speaker to savages.”
So here they were, the representatives of the three powerful cities in war with Meereen. The fact that one of them represented the city of Astapor when Grey Worm was present didn’t make him feel any better about the outcome of this reunion. They looked at Trystane with disdain. They were all older than him. Trystane tried to look sure of himself and in self-control of the situation, though he didn’t quite feel this was the case. How to deal with slavers?

“Welcome to Meereen,” he said as a welcoming. They kept looking at him with disgust. “I am…”

“You stand before Trystane of the House Martell, son of Doran Martell and Mellario of Norvos, heir to Sunspear and Prince of Dorne, ruler of Meereen.” A young woman with green eyes, long brown hair falling before her shoulders and wearing a heavy red gown came out of darkness behind the three masters who almost jumped at her voice. They turned their back to Trystane to look at Lady Kinvara. “And you also stand before Torgu Nudho, Commander of the Unsullied and loyal servant to Daenerys Stormborn, the First of Her Name, the Unburnt, Queen of Meereen, Queen of the Andals and the First Men and the Rhoynar, Khaleesi of the Great Grass Sea, the Breaker of Chains, the Mother of Dragons.”

She had an easy and satisfied smile on her lips. “Good to see you again, Belicho Paenymion,” she added to the triarch of Volantis.

“What are you doing here?”

Trystane couldn’t see the face of the Volantenese master, but he could perceive anger, and also fear, in his voice. The High Priestess of the Red Temple of Volantis surely knew him. They came from the same city after all. Lady Kinvara kept smiling.

“What I always do,” she replied. “Serving my lord, and thus, serving the one who was promised by our lord.”

She walked past them and came to sit next to Trystane. No one else dared to do anything. Trystane hadn’t been sure if it was a good idea to ask the High Priestess to attend these negotiations, but right now he was glad she was here. The masters were confused, especially the one from Volantis.

“This the Lady Kinvara, High Priestess of the Red Temple of Volantis, the Flame of Truth, the Light of Wisdom, the First Servant of the Lord of Light. Would you take place, my lords?” Trystane suggested them. After some hesitation, the three men sat on two cushioned benches to his right. Lady Kinvara was between him and them. Grey Worm was the only one to remain standing. The slave had already left.

“We came here to meet the queen,” said the emissary of Yunkai, “and instead we’re greeted by a priestess and a foreigner.”

“My mother was of the city of Norvos, and my ancestors came from the Rhoyne. And I have many other noble people from Essos among my ancestors. I believe we can say that I am Essossi enough to not be considered a stranger.”

“You pretend to be one of us?” Yezzan mocked. “You must be more foolish than we thought.”

“Less than Kraznys mo Nakloz when he thought he could own a dragon,” replied Lady Kinvara. “I suppose he realized the fool he was when the dragon he bought burned him. I wonder how much time you will need to realize you can’t own people more than you can own dragons.”

The three emissaries didn’t like the comment. Trystane decided to intervene. “Let’s make this simple. We are at war, but we cannot afford war. Astapor lies in ruins, Yunkai’s forces were destroyed or turned against her when it was taken, and those you have now are unreliable. As for Volantis, you don’t have the means to keep control over Slaver’s Bay, and your own slaves are not far from rebellion. I asked you to come here so we may make peace, because war will only result in the ruin of Slaver’s Bay. So, tell me. What do you want against peace?”

“We want you to leave Slaver’s Bay. Take your dragons and your mercenaries and go,” said the triarch. He was eyeing Lady Kinvara who looked at the masters with hard eyes.

“That’s all? Very well, we will.” That took the emissaries by surprise. They looked at each other, then to him. Grey Worm looked at him with surprise, but also hatred. “Queen Daenerys never had the intention to stay in Meereen forever. Her path takes her westward.”

“When we last met, I offered her ships so she could return to Westeros where she belongs. She refused them,” said the representative of Yunkai.

“She refused them because hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children still lived in chains,” replied Lady Kinvara on a hard tone.

“As they have since the dawn of time,” retorted the master.

“Not anymore.” That was the first time Grey Worm said a word since the envoys arrived.

“You think you’re a free man now? You still follow orders,” said Yezzan with disdain. “Just because your master has silver hair and tits doesn’t mean she’s not a master.”

“Torgo Nudho chose to follow Daenerys Stormborn,” countered the High Priestess. “Just like all the Unsullied, he was given a choice when they were freed. Follow Daenerys Stormborn, or go away where they wanted. They all chose to follow her. They weren’t bought. Daenerys Stormborn is their queen, not their master, and they chose her to be their queen. That’s the great difference between a slave and a free man. A slave is bought and doesn’t choose who he follows. A free man chooses who he follows. Did you give the choice to your slaves to serve you when you bought them, or when you inherited them?”

“She is a master nonetheless,” replied the Yunkaii envoy. “A foreign master.”

“Tell me, Yezzan zo Qaggaz, Razdal mo Eraz and Belicho Paenymion, do you have servants?”
asked Trystane.

“Of course, we have,” replied the triarch. “Who do you take us for? We are not savages. We are noble people.”

“And I suppose they clean your house, prepare your food, make your bed, prepare your baths, entertain you, serve you at table, pour your wine, buy whatever you need, plow your fields, and almost make all physical work there is. And all of them are slaves?”

“They are. As you can see, slavery is necessary to the economy of Slaver’s Bay.”

“You also have several slaves who share your bed at night,” pointed out Kinvara, still looking at the triarch. Fear was plain into his eyes.

“We have the same in Westeros,” said Trystane. “We have servants to clean our houses, prepare our food, make our bed, prepare our baths, entertain us, serve us at table, pour our wine, buy whatever we need, plow our fields, work in our mines and almost make all physical work there is. However, none of them are slaves. Slavery has never existed in Westeros, for thousands of years. My family is richer that the three of you combined and I live better than you. Has slavery really worked out in your interest? When I compare Slaver’s Bay to Dorne, I would say no.”

“Slavery is the way of our world,” said Yezzan, not allowing place to any debate. Still, Trystane continued.

“You don’t need slaves to have servants, to be rich or to live well. There have always been people who were rich and powerful and others who were poor and without power. We’re not asking to give up your power and your riches. We’re only asking you to stop selling human beings like cattle. That’s the only thing the queen is asking from you. Just do it, and she will leave, just like you asked. And then you will be free to make money, to drink, and to enjoy life like before. The only difference is that the people serving you will no longer be slaves.”

Trystane allowed a silence to follow. The masters said nothing, but he wasn’t sure he persuaded them. He resumed. “However, our queen recognizes that she erred. Slavery was abolished without any system to replace it. That was a mistake, but there is no way to go back in time. The slaves want freedom, and our queen will do everything to give it to them. There is nothing you can do about it. She won’t leave Slaver’s Bay as long as slavery will exist. Still, she is ready to soften the blow with your help. Here is her proposal. Slavery will never return to Meereen. No man, woman or child living in Meereen or on its territory will ever be sold or bought, and there will be no activity linked to slavery in any way allowed here. As for the other cities of Slaver’s Bay, they will be given time to adjust to the new order.”

“What does that mean?” asked the representative of Astapor.

“Instead of abolishing slavery overnight, Astapor and Yunkai will have five years to end the practice.” A heavy silence followed. The Lady Kinvara was silent, but Trystane knew she didn’t approve entirely. He had spoken to her about his plan before, and she wasn’t very enthused by it. Still, she had accepted to help him with the masters. As for Grey Worm, he was obviously disapproving. The masters didn’t seem to know what to think about it. “Slaveholders can ask for compensation for their losses, of course. As soon as slavery will be ended, the queen will leave Slaver’s Bay, to never come back. In exchange, you will cut off your support to the Sons of the Harpy.”

“We do not support the Sons of the Harpy,” said Yezzan.

“You will cut it off,” retorted Trystane, trying to look decisive. “This term is not negotiable. Of course, you can choose to end slavery before the end of the five years. If you really want the queen to leave Slaver’s Bay as soon as possible, then you should consider this option. Unless you want to risk the ruin of all Slaver’s Bay by attacking Meereen. Such a war would kill countless slaves. It would be a shame if you preserved slavery, but that Slaver’s Bay lied in ruins, without any slave to rebuild it afterwards.” Trystane stood up. “I will let you discuss about it. I expect an answer before nightfall.”

Lady Kinvara stood up as well. “You would be better to accept. You will not receive a better offer. If you were to refuse, remember that slaves want their freedom now, and they will want it for the next hundreds of years to come. If you do not give them what they want now, they will take it with their own means. And they will take much more afterwards. You won’t remain rich if the slaves rebel against you and kill you in your beds. The Sons of the Harpy are not the only ones who can hide into darkness, waiting for the right moment to strike. Look at your sins, masters. The night is dark and full of terror.”

Trystane left with the High Priestess on her words, and Grey Worm followed them. Bhakaz was waiting for them not far away. “There are men asking for an audience with the rulers of Meereen,” he told them.
Trystane wondered what they wanted. He just came out of a delicate discussion with slavers, and he didn’t have a single moment to rest. Still, he had to receive these people. How would his authority hold if he didn’t receive petitioners? Resigned, he walked to the audience chamber.

The people waiting for him were about half a dozen, and they were in circle, discussing among themselves when he arrived. Some of them talked quite loudly for people who tried to whisper. They weren’t happy. Exactly what Trystane needed. Grey Worm and Kinvara both followed him. Even though she wasn’t a member of the government, Trystane couldn’t really send the High Priestess away after all the help she provided. He knew more than ever about the situation in the streets and the feelings of the people thanks to her and the other Red Priests, and she just helped him to negotiate with the slavers. Their fear of the Red Priests and their influence on the people could convince them to accept the terms. As for Grey Worm, he was Commander of the Unsullied, and he might be helpful if these petitioners proved difficult.

“Forgive me, my friends,” Trystane articulated with difficulty. He really needed to improve his Valyrian, but with all the problems of the city, he had no time to do so. “It wasn’t our intent to make you wait.”

Trystane spoke slowly, trying to choose the right words and to spell them well enough to be understood.

“We speak the Common Tongue,” said one of them.

“Thank you,” said Trystane. He almost sighed in relief, but he hid it. His father always told him to not let people you spoke with see your emotions and your weaknesses, except the ones you wanted them to see. It wouldn’t do to reinforce their beliefs that he couldn’t speak their language.

“You met with the slavers today,” added the elder of the group, an old man with wrinkles and a bald head.

“We did,” confirmed Trystane. He had tried to make the arrival and the presence of the ambassadors as discreet as possible, but he supposed it was a foolish hope to expect they could get entirely unnoticed.

“Our brothers and sisters died fighting this scum,” a younger one, who had said they spoke the language of Westeros, almost spat. “Now you invite them to our city and drink wine with them.”

Trystane could feel Grey Worm’s eyes on him, and he knew the Unsullied approved these men. “I invited them, it’s true. To negotiate.”

“Negotiate? Negotiate with the men who tore us from our mothers’ arms and sold us at auction like cattle?!”

“Yes, I did. We did. I, Torgu Nudho, and the High Priestess Kinvara, we discussed with them to make peace. Because the only alternative to peace is war, and if we were to lose this war, then the masters would put you back into chains, and you would have lost the freedom you fought so hard for.”

“You are a stranger here,” the young man said. He and the old one seemed to be the ones speaking for their group, and probably for many other citizens of Meereen. “So why do you represent Meereen in these talks with our enemies?”

“Because I was chosen by the closest advisors of the queen to rule in her stead until she returned…”

“When does she return?” asked the old speaker.
“Soon. You have my word.” For how worthy it was. Trystane had no idea when Daenerys Targaryen would come back, but he hoped, just like these men, that she would return soon. Very soon. If she didn’t, it would be the end for Meereen, and the end for Dorne as well.

“We don’t know you. We don’t trust you,” said vehemently the young speaker. “We know Torgo Nudho. We fight with him against the masters. We trust him.”

“This is why I made him participate to these negotiations. Because you trust him, because the queen trusts him, and because he chose me to rule Meereen while she is away.”

The young man looked queerly at Grey Worm. He spoke to him in Valyrian. “Is it true, Grey Worm? You want to drink wine with these men? The men who would put us back into chains the moment we gave them the chance? You chose this foreigner to make peace with them?”

Trystane turned to Grey Worm, wondering what he would answer. Maybe the Commander of the Unsullied would dismiss him. Well, there was nothing Trystane could do about it. Peace was the only way out he could find, and if Grey Worm didn’t agree with him, then it would make no more difference than if he hadn’t made peace. The Unsullied took his time to answer. He looked to Trystane, then to the former slaves. He fought with them. To him, Trystane was a stranger as well. He supposed his time as ruler of Meereen would be over soon. Finally, the answer came.

“I don’t want to drink wine with these men, and I didn’t. And I didn’t choose this man to make peace with the slavers.” The time had come. Maybe Trystane would be more at his rightful place in the dungeons of the Pyramid. At least, he wouldn’t see the ruin of Dorne, and maybe he would join Myrcella. “However, I am a soldier, not a politician. I chose this man to rule Meereen because he has family ties with our queen, and because he has more experience than everyone else at ruling. He negotiated with the masters because he thought we could get a just peace with them, and because he thought that was the best way for Meereen. If he thinks so, then I think we should take this peace.”

That wasn’t something Trystane expected. He looked surprised to Grey Worm, who only looked back with hard eyes. He didn’t seem to support Trystane with eagerness, and the men before them didn’t look better.

“High Priestess,” said another man behind with brown hair and beard, “you know these men. You know what they are capable of. You told us we had to choose between freedom or slavery, fighting or surrendering, life or death. How can we be free if we don’t fight the slavers?”

This one had the look of a believer of R’hllor. He would certainly only listen to a Red Priest. Trystane turned to look at Kinvara. She didn’t look back at him, and kept looking at these men with an expression of compassion. She walked down the steps, leaving Trystane and Grey Worm at the top, and came to the level of these men. Her voice was soft and melodious when she spoke.

“You are right. Our choice is between freedom and life on one side, and slavery and death on the other side. But the war for freedom has just begun. It will last for years, maybe more than years. In a war long like this one, there are truces, times when we stop to fight to mend our wounds so we can fight again later. Right now, we cannot hope to maintain slavery out of Meereen while taking its roots out of Astapor and Yunkai at the same time. For now, we must accept to lay down our weapons, but we must keep ready to take them back at any time. The slavers were offered terms that forced them to stop supporting the Sons of the Harpy and to end slavery within a few years. The Lord of Light sent Daenerys Stormborn to end slavery, not to kill all the slavers. If they don’t respect their engagements, then they will burn.” She put a hand on the shoulder of the man who asked her the question she just answered. “We’re not asking you to trust the masters. We’re asking you to trust our Lord and the one he sent to free you. Have faith. The Lord of Light watches over us.”
Her words seemed to have a magical effect. Trystane was happier than ever that she was here. He didn’t know what he would do without her.

Most of the men left in better spirit than when they arrived. Not that they were happy, but most of them were less angry than before, resigned if not joyful. Trystane sighed in relief for good this time. He didn’t try to hide it. He walked down the steps and arrived at Kinvara’s level.

“Thank you,” he told her. She dipped her head to acknowledge his thanks, though she didn’t smile. She wasn’t happy either. He turned to Grey Worm who had followed him down. His expression wasn’t better. “Thank you, Grey Worm. I know it wasn’t easy…”

“Do not use me for your lies,” he said with the hard, stern tone he always used.

“I didn’t lie, but these men respect you.”

“They respect me because they know who I am. They know I am loyal.”

“I know you are. I never doubted it.” To think Grey Worm wasn’t loyal seemed to Trystane to be as foolish as thinking that Hotah was a traitor.

“I am loyal to my queen, not you.” That was no surprise either. Hotah was loyal to his father, and no one else. He wouldn’t even allow Trystane to see his father alone unless Prince Doran gave him the order. “If you betray her work, you are my enemy.”

“I am trying to save her city. Is that betrayal to you?” Trystane was tired. He wished he didn’t have to face Grey Worm after facing both masters and former slaves.

“Daenerys Stormborn swore to end slavery in Slaver’s Bay, and you allowed the slavers to keep slavery,” pointed out the High Priestess. She didn’t say it with anger. Her voice sounded more sorry than furious.

“Only for some time.”

“Five years is a very long time for slaves.”

Trystane sighed again. “Look, twenty years ago, my father was Prince of Dorne when half the Seven Kingdoms rebelled against his father-in-law, our queen’s father. He fought for him, sent thousands of his people to war, and almost all of them died. Their widows fell into misery, thousands of children became orphans. His sister, my aunt, was butchered along with her children, our queen’s nephew and niece. He could have kept fighting against the usurper, but he would have lost, and many more people would have died. He couldn’t end war and Robert Baratheon at the same time. He had to choose between two evils. I did the same.”

“You are wrong to trust these men,” said Grey Worm with more life, anger piercing through his voice this time.

“I don’t trust the masters. I trust their self-interest. We can trust they will respect the deal if they’re convinced that working with us is in their self-interest.” The Lannisters, the Baratheons, the Starks, the Tullys and the Arryns had considered it was in their interest to work with his father when he made peace with them, so why not the masters? They were no worse than Tywin Lannister or Robert Baratheon.

“You don’t know them. You don’t understand them. We are not human in their eyes. They look at me and see a weapon. They look at these men we just saw and they see tools. They look at her and see a whore.” He said the last sentence while pointing the High Priestess.
“They look at me and see a foreigner. They underestimate us.” The Lannisters also underestimated his father. “This is their weakness, and I’m going to use it to our advantage.”

“You will not use them. They will use you. That is what they do.”

Grey Worm almost left in a storm, as much as his way to walk allowed it, fury visible from head to toe. Trystane remained there silent for a time. He wondered how this man managed to speak up for him a few minutes ago. Would he be that loyal the next time?

“He’s not wrong.” Trystane realized Lady Kinvara was still here, looking at him with an expression that looked like pity. “They will try to use you.”

Despite her sweet voice, Trystane only grew more exasperated. “I need some fresh air.”

He walked past her to the exit of the Great Pyramid. He wanted to curse it. He wanted to curse this city, its people, Grey Worm, this priestess, the masters, the queen he was supposed to marry, his father, Ellaria, Obara, Tyene, Nymeria… Why couldn’t he be in the Water Gardens, Myrcella still alive, preparing their wedding?

He walked for a long time, trying to go as far as he could from this Pyramid where he spent most of his days. The way he took was a private path taken only by the people living in the Great Pyramid, so he met no one. The sun wasn’t as burning as it was the day he arrived, and there even was some wind. He walked on the battlements now. Unsullied guarded it, but they paid no attention to him, or if they did, they didn’t show it. He stopped at a place where he was as far as he could from any man. He leaned on the bulwark, his arms pressed on it, and looked far into the horizon. There was only sand to be seen, but from where he stood, where he didn’t burn alive, it wasn’t ugly. The view had its charm. He remembered his uncle Oberyn had visited Meereen. He tried to remember what he told him of the city, but he couldn’t. He thought his uncle found the city without interest. Would Myrcella have liked it? If only she was there. She would find the right things to say to comfort him, and she may help him to solve all the problems he faced. But then, if she was alive, he would know all the same they couldn’t marry, because she was… No, that’s not true. She wasn’t.

“You must forgive Grey Worm,” a sweet voice said behind him. For a short time, he hoped this was Myrcella, but then he realized to who it belonged. She probably followed him. “For him, the war against slavery is personal.”

“I’m sure it is personal for many people,” said Trystane, peevish.

“Do you know Grey Worm loved someone?”

He turned to face the High Priestess. “What?”

“Have you ever heard of Missandei of Naath?”

That name didn’t ring a bell for Trystane at first, and then he remembered something Malcolm Branfield told him when he arrived. “Was she the queen’s scribe?”

“She was,” confirmed Kinvara. “Grey Worm was in love with her, and she loved him. She died when the Sons of the Harpy attacked in Daznak’s Pit. She was killed by the slavers.”

Trystane tried to understand. He had always seen Grey Worm so much like Hotah that the thought of him being in love, furthermore when he was castrated, looked foreign like Asshai to him. “I didn’t know.”

“You are not the only one to seek vengeance, Trystane of House Martell. You’re not the only one who lost someone you loved."

Her voice wasn’t entirely without scorn, or at least there was reproach in it. Trystane turned away. “I didn’t know it.” He looked at the desert. Lady Kinvara joined him at this side.

“There are hundreds of thousand people in this city, and they won’t give up their freedom.”

“I’m trying to save their freedom.”

“I know, but don’t expect the slavers to end slavery in five years like you asked them.”

“They have everything to lose from a war,” he argued.

“And everything to gain, as well. How long have you been in Meereen?” she asked.

“Three or four months.”

“Grey Worm is right when he says you don’t know the masters. They have a lot to lose if they end slavery. Many of these men you spoke with made their fortunes in slave trading, and they don’t see the slaves as humans. For them, we are objects, tools, weapons, garbage when we are old. They are attached to slavery as much as your family is attached to its titles.”

“So you disagree with what I did?”

She took some time to answer. “I am no politician like you or your father, I am no soldier like Grey Worm, but I know people, and I know what the people think. I know what they feel. They were born as slaves, and they were told ever since their birth that they would die as slaves. The lucky ones have good masters, but even then they are someone else’s property. Until recently, they thought they would remain slaves for the rest of their lives, but now that they tasted freedom and saw their masters thrown at their feet, they won’t return to their previous life. They will fight for this freedom they earned. Before Daenerys Stormborn came, you were born a slave and you died a slave. You were captured and reduced to slavery, and you were condemned to spend the rest of your life into slavery.
Your children were condemned to slavery before they were even born. Very few had the chance to escape it. Some masters released their slaves when they died, especially if they loved these slaves or when they made them do a lot of money. Very few managed to buy their freedom from their masters.
Some masters freed a man or a woman they were particularly fond of while they still lived, or a few were bought by some good person who pitied them, but most of them never had this luck. They remain slaves all their life.”

“They are fishermen, going into the sea by dawn and returning by dusk. They leave empty handed, and when they return, their boat full of their catches, all they worked to get during the day is taken away from them by the men owning them, and they are left with the remains of the most undesirable fishes. They are builders, working day and night on sites, climbing ladders, lifting heavy charges with their arms, skinning the flesh off their hands with ropes, covered by dust. Sometimes they fall from the scaffolds, they die if they’re lucky enough, and when they’re not, they end crippled, unable to walk. At this point, their master will kill them if he is merciful, but if the gods are not good to them, the master just abandons them in the streets, and they end as beggars, ignored by everyone, tossed away, hit, despised, useless to anybody. They are dung shovelers, spending all their days cleaning the streets from all the trash that accumulates in the day, or washing latrines and waste sites, smelling so much of the stench they lose all scent they could have, covered by shit all the time, smelling it, living in it. Some work to make fabrics and dye them, and this poison their lungs. And if they receive some of the substance in their eyes, then they remain blind forever, and become beggars as well. The less fortunate become whores. Their masters might dress them in fine clothes and they may look happy, but they only act to look happy for the customers. If they don’t, they get whipped.
They are forced to take so much moon tea that in the end they can’t hope to ever have any children. They are slapped, hit, beaten, raped, mistreated and degraded in the most horrible ways there are, and in the end, they are only an empty shell of who they were before, pleasing customers by habit because they don’t know what else to do. And once they’re too old to please anyone, their masters send them to perform some other work even worse than the one they did before. There is no way for them to escape this… unless some good soul comes to save them.”

Trystane listened to everything she said. Then she stayed silent. It remained like that for some time.

“Were you a slave, my lady?”

She had been looking at the horizon as she spoke of the fate of the slaves, but now she turned to him. “I am no lady, but you should know that most of the members of my order are former slaves. Before we served masters, but when the Red Temple buys us, we all become servants of R’hhlor. Some join the Fiery Hand, one thousand warriors, no more no less, sworn to defend the Temple, when they are men. Some women become whores working for the Red Temple, sworn to celebrate the joining of man and woman, two parts of a greater whole. My fate was to be called for priesthood. I trained in the Red Temple and became a priestess, and when the High Priest Benerro died two years ago, I was named to replace him. He saw the victory of Daenerys Stormborn in the flames. He saw her taking Astapor, Yunkai, Meereen, and more. He began to preach she was coming long before the world was aware of her existence, when the red comet appeared in the sky. I started preaching as well. He saw a young woman with silver hair on the back of a dragon, and I saw one too. The woman the Lord of Light told us to help. The woman he told me to help.”

Trystane wasn’t really sure about what she was all talking about. Sometimes she talked very clearly, and other times she was more mysterious than everyone else he ever met. She smiled sweetly in his direction. “You don’t understand. Don’t worry. Even the wisest of my order have difficulties to know what our Lord wants of us, but we all try to serve the best we can, and the Lord wants us to serve Daenerys Stormborn. So don’t worry if you don’t understand everything I say. We are allies. As long as you serve the queen, you have nothing to fear from me.”

She walked away, her red robes brushing the cobblestones, her hair half falling on her back. Trystane watched her go until she turned a corner and disappeared. He was all alone again. He looked again at the sandy plains below him, then at the sky. Daenerys Targaryen had left on the back of a dragon. Where was she now?

Chapter End Notes

Trystane is taking the same strategy that Tyrion took, mostly, but I believe it is likely that a son of Doran Martell would try to make peace with the slavers.

Kinvara only appeared in a single episode in Season 6, and we have no proof that she will ever appear again in the next seasons, but I decided to expand her character. For now, she is taking Varys’s place as Master of Whisperers in Meereen, and she may do more in the future.

Please review.

Next chapter: the aftermath of Kevan's death
We get to know the consequences of Kevan's assassination. Expect events to progress quickly in King's Landing from now on. Margaery can really only count on herself now. All those who found that things were going too slowly, tell yourself this is the end of it.

Margaery looked at the result in the Myrish glass. Sera had done combing her hair. After some musing, she decided she was satisfied with the outcome.

“You may leave, Sera,” Margaery told her.

Her friend left and Margaery found herself alone. She had her personal room for changing, apart from the common rooms she shared with Tommen. The queen looked at herself in the glass. She might be the queen, but right now her position was in danger.

Ser Kevan Lannister had been assassinated last week. Margaery couldn’t get the horror of the scene out of her head. The Hand of the King and the Grand Maester, both killed inside the Red Keep. Worse, the killer hadn’t been found yet. He, or they if there were more than one, managed to escape. They had left no trace behind them, nothing except a short message stating that the queen sends her regards. What could this mean? Margaery was the queen. She suspected a plot to accuse her, and she knew someone who could have done this. Cersei Lannister. She had tried to kill her brother on several occasions, and not in very discreet ways. If she could try to murder her own brother, what could stop her from doing the same with an uncle?

Still, if Cersei was behind this, it didn’t explain the mysterious disappearance of Nymeria Sand during that fateful night. It didn’t explain either how Lord Varys, the Master of Whisperers, vanished two days later. The Spider had been seen during the day that had followed the murder, obeying Lord Tarly’s and Tommen’s orders, but the next day, there had been no trace left of him. This couldn’t be a coincidence. Were they involved in the murders? Margaery could imagine a Sand Snake killing two people without problem. Oberyn Martell had the reputation of being bloodthirsty, and his daughters were rumored to be no different. They had a hand in this, there was no doubt about it. And with Myrcella’s death… Could Cersei have cooperated with Nymeria Sand and Varys? Margaery didn’t think it very likely. Varys had betrayed Cersei at Lord Tyrion’s trial, and she believed the Martells had killed her daughter. With the behaviour Cersei showed at the exposure of Myrcella’s body, no one could believe she would work with Oberyn Martell’s daughter. It was more likely that she would try to murder the Sand Snake instead, as retaliation for Princess Myrcella’s death. Still, the message looked as if it was made to accuse Margaery, and this was Cersei’s style. She couldn’t take any chance. Cersei had to leave King’s Landing, and the sooner the better.

She left her changing room and entered the large living room where Tommen sat alone, his head between his shoulders. He had lost a sister, and now a granduncle in a very horrible way. Margaery was also disgusted, even revolted, by the way Ser Kevan had been killed. The knight wasn’t an evil man. Margaery had managed to learn a little from him about his wife and their children while they worked together. She had written herself to Lady Dorna, to tell her the news and give her sympathies. Margaery regretted that the young Janei would never know her father. She regretted even more the loss of her best ally in King’s Landing. Ser Kevan was the one who ruled the Seven Kingdoms, and by making an alliance with him, Margaery had managed to neutralize the Sparrows and have a better hold on Tommen. Now that he was dead, everything could be lost. Cersei was staying in the capital longer than she should have. Tommen didn’t have the force to order her to leave, and Margaery feared Cersei wouldn’t leave even if her son gave her the order. It was a chance that Lord Tarly was here.

She approached her husband and laid a hand on his shoulder. He didn’t raise his head to look at her. He kept staring at the badge of the Hand he held, playing with it. She remembered how covered in blood it was when they retrieved it from Ser Kevan’s body. The savagery of the way in which he was killed… Margaery was pitying the king, but he ought to try to get over it and act as the king he was supposed to be. Right now, they didn’t need the little boy who loved his cats and looked at them playing. They needed the king.

“The small council will begin soon, my love,” she said, trying to bring his attention to her.

He kept turning and returning the badge, then nodded lightly. “Yes, yes. The small council.” His voice sounded far away.

Joffrey had been cruel and stupid. Tommen wasn’t cruel, but he could compete with his brother’s stupidity. A kind fool could be as dangerous as a cruel fool. “You know what you have to do?”

He nodded again, absently. His mind wasn’t present. It was somewhere else.

“We should go now, my love,” she said.

She patted his shoulder, encouraging him. Since he hesitated, she put her arm under his own and almost lifted him. She had to be Tommen’s mother when she was his wife. They walked to the door, Tommen still looking at the golden pin.

“You know, Mother paid me a visit.” Margaery had her hand on the handle and was about to turn it, but she stopped at the words Tommen just said.

“When?” Cersei wasn’t supposed to see Tommen when he was alone, but with Ser Kevan dead and the castle in such disarray, she probably found a chance to see her son.

“Yesterday. She wanted to talk. She told me we had to stick together, all our family. That people would try to separate us.” He looked at her. “Do you think people will try to separate us? You and me?”

He looked at her, expecting an answer. She smiled sadly. “Maybe.” She laid a hand on his. “But I won’t let them do.” Not even Cersei. Tommen smiled in return. “Did your mother tell you anything else?”

“Well, yes. She said that Uncle Jaime is very good and that… he might make a good Hand of the King. What do you think of it?”

Cersei hadn’t lost time. Her uncle was dead, and she already tried to make her brother Hand of the King. “We discussed about it, Tommen. Lord Randyll Tarly is the best choice for being your Hand.”

“But he’s already Master of Laws. Wouldn’t it be too much work for him?”
“Ser Kevan acted as Hand and Master of Laws for some time. Lord Tarly can do the same until we find a replacement.” She looked into Tommen’s eyes. “My love, we’re going to be at war soon. It will come to us, if we don’t go to it. Randyll Tarly is the best military commander in all the Seven Kingdoms. Your father was the greatest warrior of all the Seven Kingdoms, and Lord Tarly is the only one who ever defeated him. When the time comes to fight Dorne, you will need a Hand with a strong experience of war and battle command. I don’t wish to insult Ser Jaime, but the last time he commanded an army, he was defeated and made prisoner. If it wasn’t for the secret pact Lord Tyrion made with Lady Catelyn Stark, he would be dead right now. Randyll Tarly is the best choice.”

Tommen nodded, then looked at the pin again, and nodded once more. “Yes, you’re right. Randyll Tarly is the best choice.” She would have to make sure that Cersei didn’t talk to him again before the meeting of the small council, or else he might change his mind again. “Are you sure we can’t call Tyrion back? He did well when he was Hand for Joffrey. I would be dead without him. He’s the one who defeated Stannis. He burned his fleet, and he got injured while fighting. We should ask him to come back. He dealt with the Martells to arrange Myrcella’s betrothal. He knows them better than many people, surely.”

Tommen may be less of a fool than Joffrey was. “Your uncle is in the North right now, Tommen. He must deal with the Boltons and the houses who rebelled against you and Sansa, and give her back her home. We cannot call him back. We must let him deal with the North. When it’s over, maybe you can ask him. Now, let’s go to the meeting. We cannot be late.”

As they travelled through the corridors, they met several guards from House Tarly, House Tyrell and House Lannister. Lord Tarly had handled things very well after Ser Kevan’s death, reorganizing the protection of the Red Keep without recruiting more men. Tommen and Margaery both had four guards to accompany them wherever they went, and since they were together, eight men encircled them as they walked to the small council meeting.

When they arrived, Ser Harys Swyft, the Master of Coin, Ser Jaime Lannister, the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard, and Cersei, the Dowager Queen, were already there. Margaery wasn’t surprised that Cersei had managed to get there, though she wished she hadn’t. The Queen Mother wanted to take part in the politics of the Realm again, and Margaery couldn’t allow it.

“I’m surprised to see you here, your Grace,” she said to her mother-in-law.

“I’m even more surprised to see you here,” Cersei retorted, no kindness in her voice.

“I am the queen, your Grace. It is my duty to stand by my husband and to support him in his duties.” She sat to Tommen’s left, as she always did. Cersei sat on his right, face to face with her.

“Hi, Mother. I’m glad to see you,” Tommen said.

“Me too, my boy. I’ll always be there for you,” Cersei replied, a softer expression on her face. She had to go, and quickly.

“I was wondering when you would leave, your Grace,” Margaery said.

“Leave? What’s telling you that I’m going to leave?”

“You came for Myrcella’s funerals, your Grace, and now the funerals are over. I believe people would expect you to go back to Stokeworth very soon.”

“I’m not going back to Stokeworth.”

“You’re not?” asked Tommen, curious.
“No, I won’t. I will stay with you, my son. We won’t be separated as we were from Myrcella. I won’t let that happen again.”

“I’m afraid the decision is not yours to take, your Grace.” Lord Randyll Tarly had come in, walking decisively to the table. “And I’m afraid this small council meeting is no place for you.” He stood next to Cersei, which was very impressive since Randyll Tarly was quite a tall man, and his martial expression and standing made him look even taller.

“I am the queen,” Cersei said, as if that broke any argument.

“You are the Queen Mother, nothing more. Queen Margaery has her place here, since his Grace gave her a seat on the council, but you have none. The Hand of the King thought the same.”

“My uncle is dead, killed by a queen who sent her regards.” She stared at Margaery with fury, and Margaery decided to counter.

“I’m not the only one to call herself queen in this room, Cersei.”

The Queen Mother didn’t like to be called by her name instead of her title. “Will you please leave, your Grace?” said Lord Tarly. “Or do I have to call guards inside to escort you?”

“Tommen, she’s your mother,” intervened Ser Jaime. “Let her be there. We have very important matters to take care of, all together.”

“We could allow the Queen Mother to stay. After all, she ruled for some time under King Joffrey, in times of war. She has some experience that we could use,” suggested Ser Harys Swyft.

“Indeed,” confirmed Cersei. “I was member of the small council for more time than anyone else here.”

“With all respect, your Grace,” began Lord Tarly, speaking to Tommen, “I have no wish to insult the Queen Mother, but her experience at ruling is quite limited, and doesn’t speak well of her. During the time she ruled, the Warden of the North was beheaded despite being given the insurance he would live, four kingdoms and the Iron Islands rebelled against your brother’s rule, and the capital fell into chaos. The victories that were gained later in the war were in no way her doing. It was me, Lord Tyrell, Lord Tywin and Lord Tyrion who won the battles in the Stormlands, the Riverlands and here at King’s Landing. Queen Cersei’s decisions mostly put in danger the whole Realm, and if it wasn’t for her brother and her father, she would be dead by now, and King Joffrey would have ended dead on the execution block, not in his wedding bed.” The memories of Joffrey’s death came back to Margaery. She didn’t enjoy to see him die, no matter the monster he was. “If we are to believe the Lady of Casterly Rock, your mother’s ruling was limited to beating whores and trying to kill members of her own family. Her place is not here. She only proved that a woman’s place is not on a war council.”

Tommen was looking at the impressive shape of the Lord of Horn Hill while Cersei fumed. She was the next one to speak. “This is not your decision to take, Lord Tarly. This is the king’s decision.” She looked at her son. “Are you going to send your mother away, my son?” She almost looked pleading.

Tommen looked down, but after some time he looked straight into his mother’s eyes. “Is it true what people say? Did you really try to kill Uncle Tyrion?”

Cersei remained silent. “It doesn’t matter. It’s the past. Only the future matters. We have more important matters to take care of.”

“You told me yesterday that we had to stick together, all the family. Why did you try to kill Tyrion then? I would name him Hand of the King if he was there. Isn’t he a member of our family?’’

Cersei’s face showed a neutral expression that betrayed her anger and her surprise of being questioned by her son. She hated her little brother, that was obvious. “All I did, I did it to protect you, my son. I always only tried to protect you, and your sister, and your brother.”

“Then why didn’t you protect us from Joffrey?”

Cersei was stunned. “What? What are you talking about?”

“He mistreated me. And Myrcella too. He pinched us, he slapped us, he even kicked us sometimes. He threatened to kill my cats and mix their entrails to my food, so I wouldn’t realize I would eat them. He killed one to see the kittens inside and showed them to Father, and Father hit him. Joffrey mistreated me and Myrcella all the time, and you never did anything to protect us.”

“This is ridiculous. Joffrey would never have done that.” If Cersei really believed what she said, then she was an utter fool and she knew nothing of her children.

“He did. Uncle Tyrion was the only one to protect us from him. All the times he slapped Joffrey, it was because he mistreated us, me and Myrcella. You never did anything. You let Joffrey do as he wished. You never stopped him from beating Sansa either. You let him do. Sansa was kind, and you let Joffrey mistreat her just like he mistreated me and Myrcella.” Tommen was close to tears. Cersei couldn’t divert her eyes from him. “I love you, Mother, but I want you to leave. I want you out.”

Tommen buried his face in arms. What a pitiful show he offered to the small council. He was only a boy. He was never meant to be king, no more than Joffrey. Without good advisors, he was lost, and with his mother near him, he was lost as well. Margaery looked at Cersei with hard eyes. “Your Grace, you should leave. The king wants you to leave.” She was angry at Cersei, for allowing her children to be mistreated by her eldest son, but she made herself look angrier than she really was, for the effect.

“Come on, Cersei. You should leave. This isn’t the good time for this.” Ser Jaime had left his seat and come to his sister’s side. He tried to encourage her to stand up with his arm under hers, but she refused.

“So, I am to be set aside? Sent away? When my daughter and my uncle have just been killed? When war is about to happen?” Cersei shouted.

“You have all our sympathies, your Grace, but your place isn’t here, and women have no part in wars. The gods made men to fight, and women to bear children. A woman’s war is in the birthing bed. Your wars are over,” declared Lord Tarly.

Fury flared in Cersei’s eyes again. She looked to Lord Tarly, then to Margaery, then to Ser Jaime, and finally to the Lord of Horn Hill again. “Very well.” She stood up. “You have my regards, Lord Tarly.” She turned to Margaery one last time. “You too, my dear.”

Her last words sent a chill along Margaery’s spine. The Queen Mother walked out, escorted by her brother, while Tommen kept crying in silence, his face still hidden by his arms. Margaery could sympathize with him, but that wasn’t the time for this. Lord Tarly had taken the seat Cersei left free, and he looked at Tommen, disapproving. Ser Harys Swyft looked as if he felt out of place. Margaery tried to revive Tommen, but finally it was Ser Jaime who helped the most when he came back. He approached Tommen and whispered in his ear.

“Be strong, Tommen. You are the king. Myrcella wouldn’t want you to be like this.”
Slowly, Tommen dried his tears and managed to regain some appearance of dignity. He tried to sit straight as much as he could. “Please forgive me, my lords. Shall we begin?”

“Yes, we have several matters to attend to,” said Lord Tarly, still judging Tommen with his voice.

“Yes, of course. First of all, I want you to know that I chose a new Hand, since Ser Kevan is dead.” Tommne looked at Lord Tarly, and handed him the badge. “Lord Randyll Tarly, I name you Hand of the King.”

The Lord of Horn Hill looked at it for a moment, then seized it and pinned it on his doublet without ceremony. “Thank you, your Grace.”

He didn’t look very honored by his new position. Still, he was a better choice than Ser Jaime, or Harys Swyft, or another of Cersei’s minions. Margaery looked around the table. Here was the small council. It had gotten much smaller. Ser Kevan and the Grand Maester were dead, Nymeria Sand and Lord Varys had disappeared. Ser Jaime could attend the meetings, as Lord Commander of the Kingsguard, though he never cared to take part to them before. Harys Swyft, whose daughter was Ser Kevan’s wife, was still Master of Coin, and now Randyll Tarly was Hand of the King and Master of Laws. Lord Redwyne was Master of Ships, but he was heading for the Iron Islands with his fleet as they spoke. They were only five to assist the meeting with Margaery and Tommen. Margaery should have been happy to see the Tyrells have greater control over the small council, but she wasn’t. Ser Kevan had been an ally, and without Lord Varys, they had no Master of Whisperers at all. Tommen’s rule was weakened, and so was Margaery’s. They had to re-establish the situation, and quickly.

Everyone was looking at Tommen, waiting for him to speak. The new Hand of the King was obviously growing impatient. Margaery decided she had to speak. “I think we should begin by naming new members on the small council. We need a new Grand Maester, a new Master of Whisperers, and of course, since Lord Tarly is now Hand of the King, we need another Master of Laws. We are sure you will keep performing the duties of your former office for the time being, Lord Tarly, but…”

“With all your respect, your Grace, this is not to you to lead the reunion of the small council, but to the king and his Hand.” Lord Tarly looked at her with hard eyes. He disapproved her presence just like he disapproved Cersei’s presence. He turned his attention to Tommen. “Your Grace, we must wait for the Citadel to name a new Grand Maester, so there’s nothing we can do about it for now. I have no name for a new Master of Whisperers, but I will start looking for one. As for the Master of Laws, I suggest you name Lord Selwyn Tarth at the office. There is no one from the Stormlands on the small council, which isn’t good. Lord Selwyn didn’t side with Stannis against your brother, and by bringing him here, you will instill loyalty to the Stormlands. He is a capable man who will do his job.”

“As… as you wish, my lord,” said Tommen. Lord Tarly’s direct style caused distraught with Tommen.

“Now, as your Hand, I would advise to declare war upon Dorne immediately. Doubts could still be allowed when Princess Myrcella died, but with Nymeria Sand who escaped the night when Ser Kevan was assassinated, no doubt is left. The Martells are working against your reign, and their rebellion must be crushed. They must pay for what they did. I will lead myself an army made of forces from the Reach and the Stormlands to the Dornish Marshes. One will penetrate through the Boneway, the other one will get through the Prince’s Pass. I would also send another army by sea to land at Planky Town. This way the Dornish will have to face an invasion from three points, and they won’t be able to hold all of them.”
“If… if you say so, Lord Tarly. I trust you.” Ser Kevan was more of the style to make Tommen understand the necessity of an action or another, while Randyll Tarly took the decision by himself. It was true that he was best positioned to decide in matters of war, but he was hard with Tommen. The king was still only a boy. Margaery wondered if he would ever stop to be one.

“Lord Tarly, are you sure you should lead the army?” she asked. “You are Hand of the King. Your presence is requested here to advise…”

“My place is on the battlefield, your Grace,” he cut, not without contempt. “The fanatics have been neutralized. They don’t cause much problem anymore. Their High Sparrow has most likely left the city, and we will never see him again. I’m of no more use here. I’ll leave the day-to-day running of the city to Ser Harys and Lord Tarth when he’ll be here. I’ll be of much more use on the front.”

“I believe we should call back Tyrion. His forces could help us in taking Dorne,” said Ser Jaime. He intervened for the first time since Lord Tarly was named Hand in his stead.

“The Lannister forces are already engaged in the North. The raven we received yesterday said that Moat Calin had fallen. Lord Tyrion will deal with the Boltons while I deal with the Martells,” replied the Hand with a voice that let no place to discussion.

“Myrcella was killed. She was a Lannister as much as a Baratheon. The Lannisters have to take part in this war.”

“Why? For revenge? For the sake of killing Doran Martell yourself? You remember me of Robert Baratheon when I fought him at Ashford. Heading right to his enemy, without looking back, acting without thinking. Like you did at Riverrun. You ran into the ambush Robb Stark settled for you at the Whispering Wood and your whole army was destroyed by a boy. If we were to recall Lord Tyrion and his men, the North would be lost to us forever, and your men would lose faith in their lord. Let the Imp, your brother, take Winterfell while I take care of Sunspear. That will be all for the better. In the meanwhile, the Redwynes and your ships at Lannisport will deal with the Iron Islands and this war will be over at last.”

“Then let me gather some troops in the Westerlands and join you.”

“Out of the question. They would make things more difficult for us. The bigger the army, the most difficult it is to control it and to maintain it. Your men would only be a nuisance. Anyway, they are needed against the Greyjoys and to protect your lands in case the Ironmen decide to attack.”

Ser Jaime and Randyll Tarly were looking at each other with great intensity. Lord Tarly wasn’t leaving him an inch. “Then I will follow you, alone.”

The Hand of the King almost scoffed. “A one-handed man won’t be of much use.”

“A kingsguard should accompany the king’s army. And I can fight with my left hand.”

“You can?” Lord Tarly seemed to doubt it.

“I can. You may have had a good reason to exclude Cersei from the war because she was a woman, but you cannot use this reason with me.” Jaime smirked. If the Lord of Horn Hill found the irony funny, he showed no sign of it.

“Alright. You may still be useful. I will go now. I have ravens to send and a war to prepare.”

“Lord Tarly,” began Margaery, “you will need to divert some of the ships of the Redwyne fleet to attack Planky Town. Don’t you think…”
“I won’t divert any ship. I’ll ask the Hightowers to send their own with their men. They have more than enough by themselves to take the harbor. Now if you’ll excuse me.”

He left on these words. Randyll Tarly wasn’t an easy man to speak with. If only Ser Kevan was still alive. The new Hand saw women as better for nothing else but bringing children into the world and raising them. Still, Margaery didn’t think she would have to suffer him for long. He would leave soon for the war, and he would bring Ser Jaime with him. Cersei would be gone as well, which meant all Margaery’s possible enemies would be away. However, this would leave her alone with Tommen until Lord Selwyn Tarth would arrive. Tommen wasn’t ready to rule on his own, and the Master of Coin didn’t prove to be up to the task. Varys and Pycelle were gone. She would need someone to help her, in case Selwyn Tarth proved to be a problem. Maybe they should have called back Tyrion and Sansa after all. Lord Tyrion would have been able to deal with all the problems, and Margaery doubted he would have been a threat to her. His wife was her friend after all.

The small council didn’t last for long afterwards. Ser Jaime left not long later, uninterested by the matters at hand, and once there was only Harys Swyft left, they discovered they didn’t have much to talk about. Margaery would have to get involved in the running of King’s Landing and the Realm more than she ever was. The small council was dismissed with only one man aside the king and the queen still at the meeting.

Later in their rooms, Margaery tried to talk to Tommen about what to do with the other offices. She talked to him about her granduncle, Garth Tyrell, Lord Seneschal at Highgarden, to name him Master of Whisperers in Varys’s replacement.

“He served my father well, and his father too before him. He has great experience in dealing with spies and information network. He could very helpful in administering the city as well,” she explained to him.

“Yes, of course. I’ll write to him tomorrow, after I visit Mother,” he said.

“Have you to?”

“She’s my mother.”

Tommen could never be decisive. “I think it’s a bad idea, my love. Especially after everything she did. You never told me to what extent Joffrey mistreated you.”

“No.” He looked on the floor. “He said I was stupid, and weak.”

She put a hand on his crossed fingers. “You’re not. You’re kind, and brave, and you don’t act without thinking. You’re everything Joffrey wasn’t.”

He nodded faintly. “I don’t want to part with her on bad terms. I just want to… try to reconcile with her. Before she leaves. That’s all I want.”

Margaery nodded. “Let me be there at least, just in case things don’t go well.”

He looked back at her, smiling. “Thank you.”

Later that day, she went to see Loras. Her brother wanted to leave King’s Landing and go to war with Lord Tarly and Ser Jaime, but Margaery put an end to his dreams. She needed her brother here. He wouldn’t make any difference in Dorne, but she would need him more than ever without Lord Tarly in the capital. They couldn’t be sure. The Sparrows were quiet now. They seemed to have entirely disappeared from most of the city’s districts, but Margaery was afraid they could come back at any moment and cause trouble again. Some of her contacts in the religious circles told her the Sparrows were still active underground.

Margaery then went to meet Vallis, the maester who assisted Pycelle and who would act as a substitute Grand Maester until the Citadel sent them a new one. He informed her about all the messages they received today, and surprisingly one was for Margaery herself. When Margaery opened it, she saw the stamp of House Lannister, along with her friend’s signature.

I hope you are well, Margaery. I am all right, and so is Mira. Moat Cailin has been taken and Tyrion is heading for Winterfell. I’ll get back my family’s home soon. I’m going to White Harbor in the meantime. I’m pregnant. I should deliver within three months at most. I can’t wait for this to happen. I hope everything is well for you in King’s Landing.

Sansa

Margaery smiled at the end of the message. Sansa was pregnant. She knew they had breached through Moat Cailin, but not that her friend was with child. Sansa had finally made the best of her circumstances. These were wonderful news. Margaery hoped, just like her friend did, that everything would go well for Sansa, and that herself she would get pregnant soon as well. A child would be the best guarantee for Tommen to stay in power. She would have to keep working on it.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Jon
Jon V

Chapter Notes

A short chapter, but with important information. We’re getting closer to Winterfell.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

JOHN V

The camp wasn’t very large. It had nothing to see with Mance Rayder’s hundred thousand men, but it was a camp all the same, and they had an army. They could have gotten more, but that was what they had, and they would have to do with it. The location was very well chosen. Jon understood why Stannis decided to install his army here on his march to Winterfell. They had the Long Lake on their left, mountains on their right. They had a stream close for the horses. The enemy could only attack them from the south or from the north. They had left sentinels near the mouth of the lake, in case the Boltons or their allies attacked them from this direction, so they were protected from the rear. Jon was pressing the march south to reach the forest they would have to cross before Winterfell. In the forest, the wildlings and the mountain men would fare better than the Umbers, the Karstarks and the Boltons if they had to fight. Any ambush wouldn’t end well for Ramsay. He wouldn’t be able to repeat his exploit with twenty men.

This wasn’t the army Jon was hoping for. He had sent ravens to all the houses in the North with Castleblack’s ravens. Only the Mormonts, the Forresters and the Mazins answered the call, and Lyanna Mormont only agreed to join them thanks to Ser Davos’s intervention. He had been right to speak about the dead to her. Jon would never have. Any other lord would think he was mad. He was already a deserter for many people. There was no need to make everyone believe he was mad as well. The Mazins had only gathered one hundred and forty-three men, and the Forresters could only bring eighty-four men, remnants of their former army, sellswords, peasants and hunters who were barely trained. Tormund and his wildlings were about two thousand. The bulk of their forces was made of the mountain clans. Flints, Norreys, Wulls, Harclays, Knotts, Liddles, Burleys… They all had accepted to join Jon to save Arya and Rickon. They accounted for about three thousand men. He observed their courtesies his father had told him about so long ago when he visited them, and this gained him their loyalty. Jon still wished Lord Glover had accepted to help them. Instead, only one of his bannermen, one who was disgraced by the Boltons, accepted to join them.

Jon walked through the camp. He saw a brawl beginning not far from here. They had tried to keep the wildlings and the mountain clans as far away from each other as possible, but they had little to separate them with only two hundred men coming from other territories, and these men didn’t have much love for the wildlings either. Now a Norrey was quarreling with one of Tormund’s men. This had to be the third fight Jon saw since dawn. This army was no army. He said that to Ygritte once about Mance Rayder’s army, but now the same could be said about their own army, and it wasn’t big like Mance’s.

With a sigh, Jon walked to put an end to this. A group had begun to form, and he had to stop it before it got any further.

“Stop that right now!” He yelled as the Norrey was about to smash the wildling. He took his fist and shoved it down.

“Why are they here?” the man of the mountain roared.

“They are allies.”

“Allies? They are wildlings!”

“We are the Free Folk, not kneelers like you,” loudly mocked the wildling.

The Norrey tried to punch the man again and Jon stopped him once more. “Why are you defending them?” he roared again.

“I told you they were allies.”

“Allies who say they will kidnap the Ned’s daughter.”

Jon looked at the wildling. “Is that true?”

The man shrugged. “I suppose she must be pretty, if she looks like you.”

The wildlings all laughed. The mountain clans’ men were boiling in anger. They were attached to Ned Stark and his children. Jon knew of course what the wildling meant. Their men kidnapped the woman they wanted for a wife, and if they could keep her against her family’s attempts to get her back and despite her own attempts to escape, then she was their wife. Jon knew what he had to do.

He approached the man slowly. “You want to kidnap my sister Arya?”

“Aye, I do,” he replied, a smirk on his face. Jon smiled at the man and feigned to walk away. Then he unsheathed his dagger and brought him to the man’s throat. All assurance had left his face.

“Listen to me. If you ever dare to approach Arya, I’ll kill you before you can even think of a place where to run away with her.” The blade was sinking into the man’s flesh. His face was mad with fear. “Did I make myself clear enough?”

He nodded after the moment of surprise had passed. That was the sort of wildlings who was more about big words than great deeds. Jon withdrew his dagger. Again, he feigned to walk away and saw relief on the man’s face, just at the moment when he turned back again and hit him hard in the stomach, then twice on the face, then brought him on his knees with a stroke from his knee.

“That’s only the beginning,” Jon told him. He gave him another stroke on the head and he fell on the ground, groaning.

The men of the mountain clans cheered behind him while most of the wildlings laughed at their fallen comrade. Jon left with Norreys and Flints tapping his back and shoulders. He avoided a fight between Northerners and Free Folk, but he doubted they could keep it going on for long. They still had a little more than a month before they reached Winterfell. This army could blow up any time on the way.

Jon resumed his walk. His feet brought him to a section of the camp where a banner with a white tree on a black field stood. His father always said they had to earn the respect of their bannermen, and one way to earn it was to visit them and show them you worried about their well-being. Furthermore, you couldn’t only feign worrying about them. You had to actually care about them. There were about twenty tents around the banner. The man at the entrance of the one at the center, next to the banner, who didn’t look like he was Westerosi, let Jon enter without a word.
Inside were five people, three women, a man and a boy. One of the women, with the scars on her face and arms and the weapons on her back, could have passed for a spearwife of the Free Folk if she wasn’t wearing an outfit that let her arms bare. Jon wondered how she managed to stay this way with the cold out there. The two other women were dressed like ladies from the North, with travelling clothes made for the North. The elder was quite beautiful, with prominent lips, brown hair with a hint of blond, and a face neither angular neither round. Jon never saw Gwyn Whitehill smile since they met two weeks ago. Talia Forrester was younger, with blond twisting hair like her younger brother and bigger cheeks than her sister-in-law. Jon had seen her smile a few times to her brothers. These two women reminded him of Lady Stark before she died. The young brother, Ryon, was coughing when Jon entered, and Asher Forrester, the Lord of Ironrath, was sharpening his sword with a whetstone. He looked up when Jon entered. His face was hard, like it always was since Jon saw him for the first time, emerging from the Wolfswood on his way back from Deepwood Motte. You want people to kill a few Boltons? I’m your man, he told Jon at the time. His resolve hadn’t faded ever since.

“Jon Snow,” he said.

“Lord Forrester,” Jon replied.

The Lord of Ironrath scoffed. “I’ll never get used to that. Not long ago I was a sellsword, and now I have people calling me my lord.”

“You are our lord, Asher,” said his sister. “You have to accept it.”

He nodded while grumbling. “What do you want?” he asked to Jon.

“I wanted to be sure everything was all right on your side.”

“It is the best it can be. I allowed my men to rest for today. I exhausted them more than enough with our constant attacks against the Whitehills’ supply lines, their woodworkers, their camps, their patrols and their villages, and then with this march. At least they don’t quarrel with wildlings today.”

That was a good thing. They already had more than enough problems between Northerners and Free Folk. “There’s another thing. We have a war council in a few minutes.”

He looked at him. “A change of plan?”

“Maybe. Mainly, new information.”

Asher Forrester raised from his seat and sheathed his sword. “I’m coming.”

Talia spoke up at this moment. “Jon, are there any news about Gared?”

Jon shook the head sadly. “Not yet. Tormund is still asking around among the Free Folk, but he came out with nothing so far. I don’t want to be pessimistic, my lady, but I’m afraid the most likely outcome is…”

“That he’s dead. I know. Still, tell me if you ever find something.”

“I promise.”

Gared Tuttle was the squire of the former Lord of Ironrath and the nephew of Duncan Tuttle, the man who was castellan at Ironrath while Lord Gregor Forrester was fighting at Robb’s side. He joined the Night’s Watch after he killed a man who murdered his family. Jon remembered the lad quite well. They had talked together on several occasions. He was at the Twins when Robb and Lady Stark were slaughtered, but he survived. Later, he was accused of the murder of a fellow brother of the Watch, a man who participated to the murder of his family, and was sentenced to death for it. However, he managed to escape the night before his execution, and disappeared along with two friends he had at Castleblack. Jon wasn’t sure what to make of it. Gared had seemed honest and willing to do his best for the Watch. He said the man he killed attacked first and provoked him. Jon didn’t think it unlikely. Still, Gared had killed one of his sworn brothers, and the only outcome of this was death. He couldn’t say that the man asked him to murder him, like Jon did with Qhorin Halfhand. Jon hadn’t seen him from the day he left Castleblack for Craster’s Keep. He may be dead after so much time, just like Bran.

Jon walked out, following Asher. He felt several steps from the Lord of Ironrath, wishing to be alone. He didn’t like company very much since he came back to life. He still wondered what he was doing here. He knew he had to save Arya and Rickon for now, but after that, he had no idea what he would do. He couldn’t return to the Night’s Watch. How could he go back to people who murdered him?

“Jon Snow.” A voice called for him behind. It was Lady Gwyn Forrester. “May I walk with you? I would need to share a few words.”

“As you wish, my lady.”

They resumed the path Jon was following to the command tent. “I was wondering what you will do once you’ll have freed Winterfell. What will happen to the Boltons and their allies?”

“It depends. For the commanders, if they refuse to surrender and bend the knee, we’ll have to either execute them, or send them to the Wall. As for the soldiers, they are only following orders. We cannot hold them accountable for Ramsay’s atrocities. Ramsay will die no matter what happens.”

“Of course. You must know that I have a brother and my father on Ramsay’s side right now.”

Jon looked at her and asked something he often asked himself for days. “Why did you marry Asher? Shouldn’t you hate him? He killed your brother. What was his name? Gryff?”

She stopped and Jon stopped as well. “Gryff died on the battlefield. Asher didn’t murder him in cold blood. And when I compare my loss to Asher’s losses… His father, his mother, two brothers, not to mention the betrayal of a man everyone in his family trusted for years. And his sister Mira may be dead from what we know. The point is… I don’t want to hate someone for things that were done in the past. My family and Asher’s have fought for centuries. I tried to end this feud, and I failed. Now all I want is to prevent anyone else from dying.”

“It seems strange, considering we’re at war.”

They resumed to walk. “Ramsay is mad. Roose Bolton was dangerous, but as long as we followed him, we knew nothing would happen to us. His son is completely different. He’s a danger for us all. Everyone in the North is in danger as long as he lives. Even if we lose, Torrhen and my father will be in danger under Ramsay’s service. He could decide to skin or kill one of them for pleasure anytime. They’ll have more chance to live if Ramsay is dead.”

“Will they bend the knee to House Stark?” Jon asked.

“My father will never bend the knee. He will never surrender. Torrhen might, but if you let him have Highpoint, I’m afraid you will only delay another war between the Forresters and the Whitehills. Torrhen can wait a very long time to take his revenge. He won’t forget about Gryff, or our family’s defeat. I think the best thing to do would be to send them both to the Wall.”
“You would send you own family, all of them, to the Wall?”

“At least, they’ll be alive. They won’t be able to cause anymore trouble, and Asher won’t have a chance to kill them either.”

“You want to protect them from your husband?”

“Asher lost too much. If he is given a chance, he will kill my father, and most certainly Torrhen as well. I don’t want that to happen. Too many people have already died. But if they are sent to the Wall, then maybe peace will be possible. I tried to end the war between us with politics and diplomacy, and I failed. The only way I see now is for one of our two families to win for real, in a permanent way, while the other is exiled. That’s the only way out I can see that may end without more dead. Will you do that, Jon Snow?”

They were close to the command tent. “I’ll see what I can do, but the decision about Ironrath and Highpoint, exiles and executions won’t depend of me. I’m not the Warden of the North. The decision will belong to my sister. I’ll do what I can.”

“Thank you.” She walked away. She didn’t seem very satisfied, but she thanked Jon all the same.

Jon walked the few paces that were left and entered the command tent. Tormund and a few chiefs of the Free Folk, the leaders of the mountain clans, Lady Mormont, Lord Mazin, Lord Forrester and Ser Davos were present. Lady Melisandre was there as well, though in a corner, in retreat. She seldom spoke since they left Castleblack. She assisted the councils, but said nothing. Jon wasn’t the only one who changed after he came back.

“My lords, my ladies,” he began, “I asked you to come because we received news of interest.”

He looked at Lady Mormont. She spoke with an assurance over her age. “The Lannisters and their allies have breached Moat Cailin.”

The men began to discuss between themselves. “We can assume they are marching on Winterfell now,” Jon added.

“Then we’ll have show the Lannisters how well they are welcomed in the North. Let’s give the Imp a taste of Oxford and the Whispering Wood!” The clansmen roared all together at Lord Norrey’s outburst.

“This is folly!” Tormund had roared even louder. “How many men does this lord Tyrion have in his army?”

“More than us, for sure,” answered Ser Davos. “He won’t have come with a small army, we can be sure of that. He has lords of the Riverlands, and the Blackfish with him.”

That name shut the mouth of every Northerner, but not that of Tormungd. “We’re not going to fight two armies at the same time. We already have more than enough to fight with that fucker Ramsay.”

“Coward,” shouted a Northerner.

“Silence!” Jon brought back a temporary order with his command. “I understand your reluctance, but Tormund is right. We cannot fight the Lannisters and their allies, and the Boltons and their allies at the same time. We’re not enough.”

“Aye,” approved Ser Davos. “And though I am no military mind, it seems stupid to me to fight the Lannisters when they are after the same thing than us. They want to kill Ramsay, and throw the Boltons out of Winterfell. We have a common goal. The most logical decision would be to fight with them, not against them.”

“You want us to make an alliance with the Lannisters?” Lord Mazin was both outraged and bewildered.

“It’s better than to fight them and die,” said Davos. “If we weaken each other, Ramsay could take that opportunity to destroy the remaining army after the battle, or to let the cold defeat it like it did for Stannis.”

“Winter won’t defeat us. We are Northerners!” said Lord Flint.

“My sister Sansa is with this army,” Jon pointed out. “The Lannisters have come to support her claim on Winterfell, remove Ramsay and save Arya and Rickon. By fighting against the Lannisters, you would be fighting Arya and Rickon. You would be fighting Ned Stark’s children.”

“Your sister is a Lannister now, Jon Snow,” said Lyanna Mormont. “She is no longer a Stark. She is Sansa Lannister.”

Jon looked at the girl of ten. Her face was unyielding. “We cannot fight two enemies. I told you what’s coming for us. You know what lies beyond the Wall. I’m not asking to forget the Red Wedding, but think about it. The Lannisters may have had a hand in the Red Wedding, I don’t contest this, but Roose Bolton is the one who murdered Robb, our king. His son is at Winterfell. Would you risk to have him ruling the North as we fight the Lannisters and weaken our troops while he stays warm inside the castle? For now, the best course of action is to ally ourselves with Lord Tyrion and my sister. I trust her, and I trust him.”

“You trust a Lannister?” Lady Lyanna showed high doubts.

“He saved my life once, at Castleblack. Without him, I would be dead right now.” Jon instinctively looked at Melisandre after he said it. She looked at him, but said nothing.

“We must send someone to negotiate with the Imp,” said Ser Davos. “We cannot wait for his army to come in sight of us, or else he could consider us as enemies.”

“I agree. That’s why I’m sending you, Ser Davos.”

The Onion Knight looked quite surprised. “Me?”

“Aye. I will stay here and lead the army to Winterfell. You go to Lord Tyrion, my sister and the Blackfish, and ensures they will fight with us. When Winterfell will be taken and Rickon is free, he will be declared Lord of Winterfell. Sansa won’t oppose this. Our brother comes before her in the succession. That’s all. You may all leave.”

The lords slowly left. Only Ser Davos and Lady Melisandre stayed behind. The knight’s face and the way his lips moved showed he hesitated to say something.

“Is there a problem, Ser Davos? If there’s one, speak up.” Jon said.

“There is. I don’t believe I’m well suited for this mission.”

“I cannot trust anyone else with this. All the Northerners hate the Lannisters, I cannot leave the army myself, and I cannot send a wildling.”

“My son died at the Battle of Blackwater.”
“I know. You told me.”

“Aye, but I didn’t tell you how he died. Our ship was among the first in Stannis’s fleet. We were hit hard by the wildfire. Our ship blew up. I saw him die right in front of my eyes. And you know who made this trick with the wildfire?”

Jon didn’t need to answer. They both knew who did it. “I fought against he wildlings. They killed my friends, men I respected, and I killed their men too. And yet here we are, in the same army. I understand what you feel, Ser Davos, but these wars don’t matter anymore. It’s in the past. We will need the men my sister and her husband are bringing to defend the Wall and to fight the Others, and we cannot do that if we cannot work with them like we work with the Free Folk now.”

“Jon Snow is right.” The Red Woman had gotten out of her mutism. “You’ll need men to fight the Great Other. There will be a great battle. I don’t know when it will take place, but it will come. When it comes, you’ll need as many men as you can muster, no matter who they are or where they come from.”

The former Hand of Stannis Baratheon looked at Jon, resigned. “Alright. I’ll do it.”

“You leave on the morrow,” said Jon. “I’ll ask Gwyn Forrester to accompany you. Her family has no grudge against the Lannisters. She may be of help.” And she may be safer in the Lannister camp than here. Being Bolton’s bannermen, the Whitehills weren’t loved among the Flints, the Norreys and the Mormonts.

Ser Davos turned away from Jon and looked at Melisandre. “Any advice from your fire?”

“Succeed,” she only said.

Davos almost grinned. He walked away. Melisandre followed not long after. Jon stayed behind. Arya and Rickon were getting closer, and now Sansa was closer than ever too. They could all be together again, but before, they would have to take Winterfell. One month before they reached it. One month. What could Ramsay do to Arya and Rickon in the meantime? Wishing they could move more quickly, Jon left the command tent, leaving it empty, hoping that Tyrion Lannister would let Rickon be Lord of Winterfell once it was taken.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa XXV

Chapter Notes

Before you read this chapter, I would like those who read ADWD to remember the chapters from Davos's perspective that took place in White Harbor. As for the others who didn't read the books, I just want to point out that White Harbor is the largest city in the North, as is King's Landing the largest city in the Seven Kingdoms. If King's Landing is the best place for betrayals, corruption, stabs in the back, lickspitting... I let you complete the sentence.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Sansa XXV

When Sansa cast her eyes for the first time on the city of White Harbor, she found it beautiful. Arya had visited it twice with their father, but Sansa had never seen it for herself. The city was small when compared to King’s Landing, but it was a thousand times more pretty to the eye, though not as much as Casterly Rock when she admired it for the first time in the sunset.

The city had bright white walls, and the New Castle that stood on the top of a hill inside the walls was the same color as the summer snow. That would be where Sansa would reside for the next weeks, until she gave birth. A pain in the stomach reminded her of the little boy or the little girl growing inside of her. The journey from Moat Cailin to White Harbor had been without incident, but her state began to weigh on her. Fortunately, they weren’t far now. In an hour, she would be in a castle for the first time in months. She thought about Tyrion, and Arya, and Ser Brynden, and Mira. They had to be around Castle Cerwyn by now. She missed them. She missed Tyrion more than all. It was the first time they were truly separated. There had been the months when he was imprisoned, wrongly accused of his father’s death, but they weren’t far from each other, and Sansa hadn’t yet fallen in love with him. For a moment, she wondered if he would have a whore brought into their bed while she was away, but she cast the thought away immediately. Tyrion wouldn’t lay with another woman when he didn’t spend time with Shae at the beginning of their marriage. Where was her former handmaiden now? How did she fare in Pentos?

They arrived at the gates of the city in no time. Their retinue, composed of soldiers sworn to House Tully, House Lannister and House Manderly drew attention from the people out of the battlements. Brienne, Sansa’s handmaiden Willia and Ser Wylis Manderly were with them, and they also brought home the bones of Ser Wendel Manderly, who was killed at the Red Wedding. A group of men with the arms of the Manderlys were waiting for them right before the entrance of the city. They stopped and Willia helped Sansa to get off her horse. Another stroke came from inside her belly. After seven months, it had become quite big.

A knight approached her. “Lady Sansa. Ser Henry of House Clam. Lord Manderly sends us to lead you to the New Castle. There is a litter to carry you up there.”

“Thank you, ser.”

Gods be good. She didn’t feel like climbing on feet, not even to meet the Lord of White Harbor.
Willia helped her to get to the litter. Sansa almost fell in. She lied down, feeling another kick in her belly. She was tired of this journey. She felt the litter move. She closed her eyes while they went forward. She needed rest, and put protectively her hands over her belly. She didn’t think it would be long now. She wished Tyrion was there. That wasn’t how she had imagined things back at Winterfell. She thought her husband would be there when she would give birth. At the same time, the little girl she had been would certainly had found it chivalric that her husband fought a monster to give her back her home and that she would bring him their child once it was taken. Only, she couldn’t be sure they would defeat Ramsay. She couldn’t be sure of anything. She was afraid. The singer in her dreams was wrong. Life wasn’t a song.

She felt they were climbing. She let the movements of the litter carry her, relaxing after a short but exhausting trip. She wished she had her husband, or Arya, or even Mira with her. Brienne was there, of course, but she wasn’t the most talkative person, and she was more a personal guard than a confident.

They stopped. Sansa got herself out of her drowse and left the litter, once again helped by Willia Marbrand. The New Castle was indeed a very handsome construction. Winterfell was huge and impressive, but it was stern, built to be useful rather than gorgeous. The Manderlys obviously came from the Reach. The city below was organized, the houses built of whitewashed stone and steeply-pitched roofs of dark grey slate. That was nothing like the mess King’s Landing was. The capital could be the biggest city in all the Seven Kingdoms, but Lannisport and White Harbor outshined her on every aspect but the number of people living there.

Before the entrance of New Castle stood a very burly man, bigger than Robert Baratheon and Genna Lannister, with silver hair. Sansa slowly walked to him. “Lord Manderly.”

“Lady Lannister.” He bowed his head, and many behind him did, though Sansa noticed a few people who didn’t. Among them were a young girl about Sansa’s age who had her hair dyed in green.

“Welcome to White Harbor. The hospitality of my house is yours.”

“Thank you, my lord,” she said.

“You must be tired. I can have my men show you and your people to their rooms so you can rest. We will have time to speak later.”

“Yes, thank you, Lord Manderly.”

The Lord of White Harbor went past her and walked to his son. They hugged fiercely. It may be against conveniences, but she wouldn’t blame Lord Manderly for this. A woman joined him. She had to be Ser Wylis’s wife. His other son was dead, and the only one he had left just returned after almost three years in the Riverlands. A young woman approached Sansa. She had her hair bound in a long braid like the other one, but her own hair was brown instead of green. It didn’t look dyed.

“Lady Lannister, I am Lady Wynafryd Manderly,” she introduced herself. “I will lead you to your chambers.”

“Why not have a hot bath prepared for her while you’re at it?” scornfully said the girl with green hair.

“Yes, that’s exactly what I had prepared for her,” replied the eldest.

The young one scoffed. “We are housing Lannisters now, after what they did. What will we do next? Hand them White Harbor?”
“Wylla, be careful. You’re talking before the Lady of Casterly Rock.”

“Well, all the better reason to say that.”

“She is also the daughter of Eddard Stark.”

“No true daughter of Eddard Stark would marry a Lannister. No true Northerner would marry a Lannister. They killed Wendel.”

“Wylla, that’s enough,” ordered her grandfather. Sansa remembered that these two young women were the granddaughters of Lord Manderly. Their father was Ser Wylis. Sansa found it odd they didn’t join their grandfather to welcome back their father. She was too tired to argue, even when someone said again that she was no Stark. Maybe she was getting used to it. Another kick in her belly Lady Wylla finally said nothing more and her sister escorted Sansa inside New Castle. She noticed the queer looks people shot at Brienne as she followed them. Willia accompanied them as well, while stewards took care of the guards who came with them. The castle was richly decorated from the inside. It wasn’t luxurious like Casterly Rock, but it was rich. The Manderlys were obviously the richest family in the North.

“Please excuse my sister’s behaviour, my lady,” Wynafryd said. “She is strong willed, and she’s angry after what happened to our uncle. I’m sorry she threw all her anger at you.”

“I thought she could show some restraint after I annulled her betrothal,” said Sansa gloomily. The exhaustion, mixed with months spent with Tyrion, made her forget her courtesies. They had decided to annul the betrothals between he Freys and the Manderlys when they besieged the Twins. That was part of the agreement with Lord Manderly so he would provide them information and side with them against the Boltons.

“She should. By the way, I thank you, my lady. You avoided me a horrible marriage with a Frey as well.”

“No one deserves to marry a Frey, and the Freys don’t deserve to marry at all.” Except Genna’s sons and grandsons, maybe.

They arrived at Sansa’s chambers. They were greater than the one she had at Winterfell, though smaller than the ones she shared with Tyrion at Casterly Rock. Lady Wynafryd told her that if she ever needed anything, she only had to ask. Servants had already prepared a warm bath for her. Sansa got out of her clothes with Willia’s help and entered the tub. She sent Willia away, asking for some time alone.

The hot water encircled her tired and heavy body. Bearing a child was much harder than she ever thought it would be. The stories never told about the hardships you met while carrying a son. Sansa wondered how her mother managed to bring her and four other children into the world. The journey had exhausted every part of her body and she only wanted to sleep for the next few days. She let her breathing grow steady and slow, the warmth filling every part of her with contentment. She thought of nothing. All she could feel was the hot water surrounding her and the kicks her children gave from time to time. She remembered a bath she took with Tyrion before they left Casterly Rock. It already looked far away, and yet not a year passed since they left. Her time as Lady of Casterly Rock had been what she hoped for her time in King’s Landing to be, back when she left Winterfell to marry Joffrey. She wished she could just go back there, to the months she and Tyrion spent there, getting to know each other, slowly building their love. She wished she had been betrothed to the Imp when the king visited them at Winterfell, instead of Joffrey. How better her life would have been.
She wandered her hand over her belly. Tyrion used to lay his hand there during the night. Again, she wished he was with her. If only she could accompany them to Winterfell, but she had to admit Tyrion and Ser Brynden were right. She couldn’t follow them while carrying a child. And the truth was, Sansa was afraid for him. She had the future heir of Casterly Rock, Tyrion’s child, inside her belly. Her duty was to protect him now. Tyrion and her granduncle would take back Winterfell. That was their battle now. Her battle was to bring this child safe into the world. So far, it proved to be quite an ordeal. They should tell them about that when they instructed the young ladies. Her mother and Septa Mordane never warned her about the hardships that came with pregnancy.

Her child was restless. He moved a lot. If his behavior before his birth was any indication of how he would be in the world, she had to expect an Arya or a Bran more than a new version of herself. She caressed her belly, trying to calm the growing life inside of her. In her drowsing state, she began to sing a lullaby she heard her mother sing to Bran or Rickon long ago.

\begin{verbatim}
The Father's face is stern and strong,
he sits and judges right from wrong.
He weighs our lives, the short and long,
and loves the little children

The Mother gives the gift of life, and watches over every wife.
Her gentle smile ends all strife, and she loves her little children

The Warrior stands before the foe, protecting us where e'er we go.
With sword and shield and spear and bow,
he guards the little children.

The Crone is very wise and old,
and sees our fates as they unfold.
She lifts her lamp of shining gold to lead the little children.

The Smith, he labors day and night, to put the world of men to right.
With hammer, plow, and fire bright,
he builds for little children.

The Maiden dances through the sky,
she lives in every lover's sigh.
Her smiles teach the birds to fly, and gives dreams to little children.

The Seven Gods who made us all,
are listening if we should call.
So close your eyes, you shall not fall,
they see you, little children.

Just close your eyes, you shall not fall,
they see you, little children.
\end{verbatim}
The kicks ceased. Sansa had noticed on the way to White Harbor that if she hummed a lullaby, then her child would stop moving. She kept her eyes shut, enjoying the peace after months spent on the road.

Willia came back after some time, and helped Sansa to clean herself of all the dirt that had accumulated while she travelled. Once they were done, Sansa’s skin being all pink and sore from the strong brushing, Willia helped her to don a grey gown. Sansa had arrived with a blue travelling dress, but she thought it would be better to remind everyone that she was a Stark from now on. She wouldn’t wear red before long.

“That’s fine, Willia. Thank you,” Sansa told her once it was over. “You may leave me alone. Could you please tell Lord Manderly that I will talk to him tomorrow? We could break our fast together.”

“Of course, my lady. Though, you should know that Lord Manderly is throwing a feast tonight for Ser Wylis’s return. He’s inviting you.”

Sansa thought about it for a moment. Her time in the tub made her better, but she wanted to sleep all the same. She didn’t think she could participate to a feast. “Thank Lord Manderly in my name for his invitation, but tell him my condition doesn’t allow me to be present. The journey really wore me off.”

“I’ll tell him, my lady. I’m sure he will understand.”

Willia left to bear Sansa’s reply. She hadn’t left for a few seconds that Sansa was already lying down in her bed. It was a featherbed, very comfortable. She lied on her side and dozed off. She was woken by the time of dinner when Willia brought her a tray and that Maester Theomore came to see if everything was alright with her and the baby. Sansa thought he looked quite cold and even rough, but she trusted him since he was a Lannister of Lannisport. He was the main link between Lord Manderly and Tyrion, and it was in part thanks to him if they could gather information on the North. Sansa ate a few crumbs, but she soon ordered Willia to prepare her for the night. Once it was done, her handmaiden left with the tray and Sansa went back to sleep.

She was back at Winterfell. The courtyard was full of people, and a small shape stood before her, examining her. He looked on her left. “She’s going to break hearts, and a lot of them.” She didn’t know why her husband was saying that. She walked away and left the courtyard. She thought she recognized someone else in the courtyard, someone who never came to Winterfell.

Sansa stood in the glass garden now. She recognized the blue winter roses of her childhood. It seemed to be so long since she saw one for the last time. The sky was clear over her head. It was a beautiful day, with a temperature everyone could expect from a summer day in the North. She heard a screech over her head, something she never heard before. She searched the skies and found its source. A large creature with scales and huge wings was flying through the sky. On the back of it, Sansa could see a young woman with blond hair.

“Fire and Blood,” said a voice behind her.

When Sansa turned to look at the intruder, she saw a hooded figure walking away. The figure had its back turned on her, so she couldn’t see anything under the cloak.

She was in King’s Landing, in the Great Hall. She saw Tyrion Lannister greeting her. He wore a complete set of armor. The battle for King’s Landing was about to begin. She had seen him wearing an armor before, when he first arrived in King’s Landing, though he had been all dirty from the battle he came from and the journey that followed. Now he was all in red shining armor, ready for battle. If he had been taller, he would have looked like a great knight. She remembered when he rescued her not long ago in that same place, when no one else dared to speak against Joffrey. He had been brave like a true knight, as small as he could be.

“I will pray for your safe return, my lord,” she told him.

Sansa woke up. The sun was appearing through the window. She slowly got up and came to look outside. Her chamber gave on the harbor, and she could see several ships coming in and out, along with smaller boats, maybe fishing boats, all along the coast. She inhaled the air. It was quite similar to the one in Casterly Rock, the New Castle being close to the sea just like the seat of House Lannister, though the air had something different too. Maybe the Narrow Sea didn’t smell the same way as did the Sunset Sea, or maybe it was something else she was missing. Lannisport and White Harbor didn’t stink like King’s Landing. They were much better places to live in, and according to Mira, Oldtown was a wonderful place as well. Gulltown was the only city Sansa hadn’t visited yet.

The door opened and Willia came in. “Excuse me, my lady, but Lord Manderly is wondering if you’re awake,” she said.

Sansa remembered her breakfast with the Lord of White Harbor. “Of course, I’m coming.”

“He says he can come, my lady. He doesn’t want to burden you with unnecessary walk.”

“Very well. Tell him to come in fifteen minutes.”

“Yes, my lady.”

Willia left, but came back quite quickly to help Sansa to dress for the day. She chose a grey gown like yesterday. She wore no jewel either, except for the necklace Tyrion gave her so long ago. As they prepared, other servants came in and filled the table with tons of food. Sansa found it to be a lot for breakfast, even now as she ate more than usual. The Lord of White Harbor arrived not long after Sansa was ready.

“Lady Lannister,” he greeted her. He wore a green doublet made for his size.

“Lord Manderly.”

“I’m sorry I didn’t welcome you appropriately yesterday. I hope you’ll forgive a father who feared his son was lost.”

“That’s alright, my lord. I know what it is to find someone you thought was lost to you. I don’t blame you. And I apologize for not attending the feast in your son’s honor yesterday.”

He raised a hand. “No apologies are required, my lady. I understand that in your condition and after a long journey, you need rest. I hope you are satisfied with the accommodations we made for you?”

“I am. Thank you.”

“Well, maybe we could break our fast. I don’t know for you, my lady, but personally, I’m hungry.”

Sansa nodded. She noticed that a special seat, larger than any she ever saw, had been brought for the lord. He really was big, and his appetite soon proved to equal his size. He ate much more than Sansa, which said a lot considering the amount of food she ate each day since she got pregnant. There were several fruits, including strawberries and peaches, and bread, but most of the meal consisted in products of the sea. Whitefish, crabs, clams, lampreys, winkles, mussels, cod, salmon, lobster, herring competed for place on the large table and in Lord Manderly’s mouth.
"Let me tell you, my lady, that this is a pleasure and an honor, and a great relief too, to welcome a Stark once more in White Harbor. Your lord father visited our city about five years ago. We feared no Stark would ever come here again."

"Thank you, Lord Manderly. My father always spoke highly of you."

He nodded, sadness plain on his face now. "We all wept for him when he died, here in the city. We also wept when your brother, our king, and your lady mother died, as much as we wept for my son."

"I’m sorry for Ser Wendel, my lord. You have all my condolences."

He bowed to show he appreciated the thought. "You have mine for your losses as well, my lady. I lost a son, but you lost much more. Thank you for bringing back Wylis and Wendel’s bones with you. I can assure you we won’t forget that. Centuries ago, our family was cast out of the Reach, and your ancestors welcomed us and granted us the Wolf’s Den. The North remembers. We will do everything to free Winterfell and to reinstate House Stark."

"Thank you, my lord." She drank some water. "My sister visited White Harbor with my father in the past."

"Aye, I remember her from her last visit. She didn’t look quite like a lady, but she remembered me of your aunt, Lady Lyanna Stark. She asked all sort of questions on the city, and even wanted to visit the Wolf’s Den. She reminded me of Wylla sometimes. It is horrible that she finds herself in the hands of the bastard."

Of course, Arya wasn’t in the hands of Ramsay, but Sansa didn’t enlighten the Lord of White Harbor on this. It was better if he didn’t know. "We’ll save her, and whatever Ramsay may have done to her, he will pay for that."

Lord Wyman obviously approved. "Which leaves us a few questions, my lady. Once the bastard of the Dreadfort is dead, what will we do with the Dreadfort?"

"Do you think it would be a good idea to burn it to the ground?" Sansa asked. She wanted to see Lord Wyman’s reaction to this idea.

He smiled. "The idea is pleasing. Though the Dreadfort remains a strategic point. It would be better to wipe out House Bolton and to give their seat to someone the Starks could trust."

"I do agree, my lord. In fact, maybe I shouldn’t tell you, but I thought I could give it to my sister Arya once she was freed."

Lord Manderly looked thoughtful. "This sounds like… a good idea," he finally said.

"The only houses that are known for family links with House Bolton are the Ryswells and the Dustins, and only through the women. The Dustins and the Ryswells fought against me. I won’t let them take the Dreadfort."

"A wise decision, Lady Lannister," Lord Wyman approved. "We cannot let rebels and traitors get the Dreadfort. Though, I’m not sure you’ll have the power to give the Dreadfort to the Lady Arya."

"Why is that? I am the Wardeness of the North. You pledged yourself and your family to me, Lord Manderly."

"Of course, I don’t question your position or your power, my lady. You are the daughter of Eddard Stark. However, since your brother, Rickon Stark, is alive, shouldn’t he be Lord of Winterfell? In this case, the decision belongs to him, and not to you.”

Sansa was finishing a few blueberries. She wiped her hands with a cloth. “Lord Manderly, I don’t want to look pessimistic. I do hope we will rescue my brother, but you know who Ramsay Bolton is. You know what he does. Do you think my brother has great chances of survival?”

Lord Manderly had his eyes cast on the table. “The bastard could kill him,” he recognized.

“I do hope we will save him, but I’m afraid we won’t.” Sansa couldn’t even know for sure that Rickon really lived. Everyone said he was dead, burned by Theon Greyjoy. The Boltons lied about Arya, so who said they didn’t lie about Rickon too? “My husband’s and my brother Jon’s armies will take back Winterfell. We have at least five times the men Ramsay has, and if Rickon is still alive, he will be acknowledged by the Iron Throne as long as he bends the knee and recognize Tommen for his king. He will be Warden of the North and Lord of Winterfell.”

“Well, I suppose this will be more than enough, to have a Stark back at Winterfell.”

“Lord Manderly,” added Sansa, “you must know that if Rickon dies, I will be Lady of Winterfell and Wardeness of the North. Lord Tyrion will have no title in the North. He will only be a consort. He is satisfied with Casterly Rock. Our children will have Winterfell, but the one who will become the lord at my death will receive the Stark name.”

“I know. Lord Tyrion already explained it to me in a letter. I just want you to know my lady, that if your brother becomes Lord of Winterfell, I have two daughters who could both make a very decent bride for him.”

“My brother is still a prisoner, Lord Manderly,” Sansa pointed out. Rickon wasn’t yet free and they already spoke about finding him a wife to be the future Lady of Winterfell. If Lord Manderly was loyal to her family, he wasn’t without ambition either.

“I just wanted you to know, my lady.”

“I’ll keep that in mind, and when the time comes, I will consider your daughters if my brother must choose a wife.”

That was the diplomatic answer to give. You had to promise to give it a thought, without promising anything tangible. The truth was, even if Rickon was alive and survived Ramsay, Sansa expected Ser Kevan to demand that he marries a Lannister, maybe Cerenna or Myrielle, or even Janei when she would be old enough, or one of Sansa’s children if she had daughters. The Lannister wouldn’t agree to freeing the North without getting anything. If Sansa wasn’t Wardeness of the North, they would ask for something else. If it wasn’t a Lannister bride for Rickon, it would be something else. Tyrion had to give the sense to his bannermen that they came here for something else than just helping a sister or a brother of their lord’s northern lady. He may ask for the Dreadfort if Sansa didn’t get Winterfell.

“Still,” resumed Sansa, “the North must abandon any idea of sovereignty. The Iron Throne may grant us a few advantages, Tommen isn’t hard and Ser Kevan is reasonable, but they won’t allow the North to get its independence. Whoever is Lord or Lady of Winterfell, he or she will have to swear fealty to King Tommen.”

The Lord of White Harbor looked at her queerly. “My lady, I don’t believe Ser Kevan Lannister could receive any request we could send to the king.”

“What do you mean? Why not?”
“Don’t you know?”

“Know what?” What was Lord Manderly talking about?

“Ser Kevan Lannister is dead, my lady.”

For a time, Sansa was too shocked to speak. Then she croaked. “Ser Kevan… is dead?”

“Yes, my lady. The Grand Maester Pycelle is dead too. The versions contradict. Some say they killed each other, others that they were assassinated by the Sparrows in the streets of King’s Landing, some even have them murdered inside the Red Keep. The new Hand, Lord Randyll Tarly, claims that they were assassinated by the Martells. King Tommen has declared war against Dorne.”

Another surprise. “What? But they can’t. The Martells are allies with the Crown. Princess Myrcella is betrothed to Prince Trystane. They cannot…”

“The Princess Myrcella died a few months ago, my lady. She was murdered in Dorne.”

The news of Ser Kevan’s death was already distressing. Sansa couldn’t claim she had been fond of the man, but he wasn’t evil like Lord Tywin and had spared Tyrion at the trial. He even supported his claim on Casterly Rock. And Dorna… and their daughter, Janei… Sansa remembered how the little girl used to play with her hair back at the Rock. Now her father was dead. Dorna just lost a husband after she lost her three sons. What would happen to her now?

But Myrcella? Myrcella was dead too? Sansa hadn’t known her that well, but she was always kind with her. Just like Tommen, she was all the opposite of Joffrey. Naïve, but kind and gentle. Sansa remembered seeing her cry while she was carried out to the ship that would lead her to Dorne. Did Tyrion know? He loved his niece. Sansa didn’t even want to imagine how Tommen was affected by this. Hopefully Margaery could support him a little. She may have married Tommen only to be queen, but she wasn’t insensitive either. Sansa didn’t think Margaery hated Tommen.

“Are you all right, my lady?” asked Lord Manderly.

“Yes.” Sansa took some time to reorganize her thoughts. “It’s just… I knew Myrcella, and she was always kind to me, to the opposite of her brother. I mean Joffrey. And Ser Kevan… Well, he was gentler than Lord Tywin.”

Lord Manderly nodded. “Well, I suppose that’s not difficult to be kinder than Tywin Lannister.” He cleared his throat again. “If you would pardon me, my lady, I have duties to attend.”

“Of course, you may go, Lord Manderly.” Ser Kevan and Myrcella were dead, and now they were at war with Dorne, right at the moment they thought war could end with the taking of Winterfell and the Iron Islands.

Lord Wyman stood up. “By the way, my lady, you should know that reinforcements are coming next week to help our forces against the Boltons. From the Vale of Arryn.”

“The Vale of Arryn?”

“Aye, my lady. The knights of the Vale have finally decided to join the war. Lord Arryn is coming to White Harbor with an army of five thousand men.”

“Lord Arryn?” If what they said about him was true, and that Arya told the truth, which she had no reason to not tell to Sansa, then the Defender of the Vale would probably spend all his time in White Harbor while his men were on campaign. “I’m surprised the Vale changed his policy so suddenly.”
Sansa didn’t like it. Littlefinger was in the Eyrie. What if he was behind this? Sansa would have to learn more about this. He couldn’t be coming here for a good reason.

“Well, their new lord is obviously quite different from the previous,” stated Lord Manderly.

“What do you mean, the new Lord?” Sansa asked.

“You don’t know that either, my lady? Robin Arryn died not long ago.” Another thing Sansa never expected. Her aunt Lysa was dead, and now her son too. She liked even less than before. She didn’t like it at all. Again, she suspected Lord Baelish’s hand. “There is a lot going on in the Seven Kingdoms you don’t seem to be aware of.”

“I was in the Neck for months, Lord Manderly. News don’t reach us easily there,” Sansa pointed out, not without reproach.

“Please forgive me, Lady Lannister. I didn’t mean to insult you.”

“How did he die?” she asked.

“A sickness. That’s no surprise. I heard the boy was quite frail, and the death of his mother must have been hard on him. Still, the new Lord of the Eyrie decided it was time for the knights of the Vale to take part in the wars of the Seven Kingdoms. Though they’re quite late,” Lord Wyman added dryly.

There was something wrong in all this. “Lord Manderly, who’s the new Lord Arryn? My cousin had no brothers and no sisters, and no children either. Who’s the new Lord of the Eyrie?”

“A distant cousin to Robin Arryn. I don’t know his exact parentage with Jon Arryn’s son, but he is the Warden of the East now, and he decided like that to involve the Vale in the war in the North.”

“But who is he? What is his name?”

“Harrold Arryn,” Lord Manderly answered.

Chapter End Notes

So, basically, Sansa finds herself on her own again. Of course, that's not as if she was back in King's Landing in the Lannister's custody, but... Let's just say she was a Stark among lions in the capital. Now she is a wolf/lioness among Northerners. The following chapters in White Harbor will show us Sansa dealing with politics alone. I hope you'll find it interesting.

Please review

Next chapter: Davos
Today is a very special day. Last year, on February 13th, 2016, the first chapter of "A Shadow and a Wolf" was published. One year later, after 111 chapters, over 582 000 words, 1700 comments, 800 kudos, 90 bookmarks and 41 000 hits, I can't believe where this adventure brought me. I enjoyed writing this story very much, and I enjoyed every comment that was made about it, even those criticizing it. I can't believe that this story is on its way to become the longest fanfiction of ASOIAF on this web site. I really must be mad and have no life.

I want to thank everyone who read this story so far, and I give special thanks to my recurrent reviewers: Tativi, CLH_CLH, AzraelGFG, Alice, ThamasD, ValeriaTripodi, Adira, Morgana67, and many others. Thank you very much.

Hopefully, this story will come to an end before this same day in 2018, though I wouldn't bet on it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The horses crunched the snow under their hooves. Thin flakes were falling around them. For now, it was only a light snow. Davos hoped it wouldn’t turn into a storm. Stannis hadn’t been able to defeat this enemy, and Davos had no wish to fight someone, or something, that defeated Stannis. They weren’t far away now. They had managed to avoid Winterfell and the Bolton patrols around it. They were only six, Davos, Lady Forrester and four guards, all Northerners. They were to reach the Lannister army as quickly as possible. Jon Snow wouldn’t be far from his home when they would come back, and they had to make sure they could fight with the Lannisters on their side.

Davos served Jon Snow, like he served Stannis before. The young man may be a bastard, but he was brave, right, and deserved Davos’s respect. Stannis had seen something in him, the Red Woman now saw him as the Prince who was Promised, the men of the Night’s Watch saw something in him too, and the wildlings as well. He had what was needed to fight the dead. Davos had no love for the Red Woman, but he had to admit there was something unnatural about Jon Snow. He could lead them against the dead, and the fact he came back from the dead… This was freaking mad. Davos wasn’t sure he really believed Melisandre could bring him back when he asked her to try, but she did, to their mutual astonishment.

Despite being in service to Jon Snow, Davos couldn’t say he was pleased by making an alliance with the Lannisters. Matthes had died right before him, and Davos almost died as well, when the Imp set their fleet ablaze. His only son had died in this trap. Jon Snow trusted the Imp, saying he saved his life once, but Davos couldn’t agree to making an alliance with him without grumbling. The Imp was the brother of Cersei and Jaime Lannister, who committed incest and had three children together. His father organized the Red Wedding. Davos didn’t think the Lord of Casterly Rock would only help them to free Winterfell, then let Rickon Stark rule without question. The Imp wanted the North. Why else would he marry Sansa Stark? Davos would form an alliance with Lord Tyrion in the name of Jon Snow, but he wouldn’t trust him. He would never trust the Lannisters, no matter what Jon Snow thought of his brother-in-law.

They kept going on through the light snow. Davos would give anything for the warmth of Dragonstone right now, but that was something he couldn’t have. The fortress had been lost. The Lannisters took it. Davos had nowhere to go in the south. The Imp might decide to execute him when he would reveal his identity. After all, he served the rightful king of Westeros, and the rightful king was dead. A bastard boy born of an incest was now sitting on the Iron Throne, and may well sentence him to die for fighting against him.

“Do you think we are close, ser?” Lady Gwyn asked him.

“We’re not far, my lady. Castle Cerwyn is close, and the Lannister army is certainly not far from it. They got through Moat Cailin a while ago. There was no storm, no heavy rain, so there wasn’t much to slow them down. They can’t be far.”

“You’re not looking forward to these negotiations, Ser Davos, aren’t you?”

Davos sighed and tightened his cloak around him. “No, my lady. My son died at the Blackwater, and I served a king who fought Lord Tyrion’s nephew for years. And I don’t trust the Lannisters.”

“I suppose you don’t trust the Whitehills either. You can say you don’t, Ser Davos. I know what my family has done.”

“With all due respect, my lady, you’re not really a Whitehill anymore,” he said carefully.

“Maybe not in my father’s eyes,” she agreed, “but when people look at me, they see the daughter of Ludd Whitehill, bannerman of House Bolton and servant of Ramsay Bolton. It is the way people look at us that matters. They see the Whitehill when they look at me, just like they see the Onion Knight when they look at you.”

Davos knew that only too well. Despite serving Stannis loyally for years, all the lords still saw the up-jumped smuggler when they looked at him. How ironic that he survived most of them. They died with their king at Winterfell or King’s Landing, and now he served a bastard who deserted the Night’s Watch. A bastard who Stannis respected.

“I suppose the Lannisters will welcome you more warmly than me, my lady. You didn’t serve an official usurper, after all. I’ll be lucky if I get out of this camp with my head still on my shoulders,” he said.

“You are an emissary. I doubt they would kill you since you represent Jon Snow and that his sister will be there. But I may not be well perceived. The Whitehills took part in the Red Wedding. The Lady of Casterly Rock lost her brother and her mother in this, and my family helped to kill them. And now they serve the man who rapes her sister and tortures her little brother.”

“Our odds to get out of the negotiations alive may not be great. I wouldn’t bet on it.” Lady Gwyn didn’t seem to find the joke funny.

They continued to ride in silence. They were approaching a bridge that crossed the tributary of the White Knife near Castle Cerwyn. Then they heard shouts. A dozen riders came from their right, and before Davos could react, they were surrounded. They were outnumbered two to one, and Lady Forrester couldn’t fight. She had a dagger at her belt, but what good a dagger could do against the swords and crossbows pointed at them. A robust old man with greyish hair addressed them.

“Who are you? What is your business here?”
Davos looked to their arms on their surcoat. It displayed a trout. They were not Lannisters. They were Tullys. Maybe he wouldn’t die immediately.

“I am Ser Davos, of House Seaworth. Former Hand to Stannis Baratheon, and now in service to Jon Snow. We are on our way to meet Tyrion Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock and Warden of the West, and his wife, the Lady Sansa.”

The man moved his mount forward. “So, you are the Onion Knight? Show me your hand.”

Davos removed his glove and showed the missing fingers of his right hand for everyone to see. “Is that proof enough?”

“It seems it’s you, so you’re not lying about this. But what tells me that you’re telling the truth? Why would the Onion Knight serve Jon Snow?”

“Stannis is dead, for a start, and I trust Jon Snow.” Davos took a scroll from the bad attached to his saddle. “This is my proof.”

The man seized it without ceremony and unfolded it. “That’s Jon Snow’s signature. I recognize it from his letters he sent from the Wall.”

“We need to speak to his sister, the Lady Sansa, and to Lord Tyrion, as quickly as possible. And to your commander too, Ser Brynden Tully.”

The man looked at Davos with an amused face, and the other soldiers with the Tully arms looked amused too. “You have him right before you.”

He rolled the parchment and put it into his own bag. Davos stammered. He didn’t realize. Of course, this was the Blackfish. The trout was black on his surcoat. “Excuse me, my lord. I…”

“I’m not a lord. Only a knight. You want to see my grandniece? I’m afraid that won’t be possible. She is at White Harbor.”

“What is Lady Sansa doing at White Harbor? We thought she was riding with the Lannister army,” intervened Gwyn Forrester.

“My grandniece is pregnant. We couldn’t bring her with us, but her husband is there. I’ll lead you to our camp. But may I know who you are, my lady?”

“Gwyn Forrester. My husband, Lord Asher, the Lord of Ironrath, is riding with Jon Snow. We are loyal to the Starks.”

“Very well, follow us. But you have to surrender all your weapons.”

That was quickly done. Anyway, a few weapons wouldn’t help them. They were far outnumbered, and they had no chance to escape by their own means once they would be inside the Lannister camp. Lady Gwyn handed her dagger and said she had nothing else dangerous on her, but forbade the men to touch her. They didn’t dare to disobey the command.

There was a camp on the northern side of the stream. They crossed the bridge and rode for an hour for the south. On their way, Davos tried to speak with the Blackfish. He had more chance to find a listening ear with him than with the Imp, and bore no ill to the war veteran.

“Ser Brynden, I want to know if I’ll be able to speak before I am executed,” Davos asked.
“You will be able to speak, I think, but I can’t guarantee you will live afterwards,” he said as a matter of fact.

“I know I served the wrong king…”

“Indeed, and so I did. You served Stannis, I served Robb Stark. And yet, here I am, riding with the man whose father plotted the murder of my niece and my king.”

“I just… I fought Lord Tyrion on the Blackwater. I don’t know if I can trust him. Can I?”

“You served a king who burned people alive, but it depends. You say you’re serving Jon Snow now.”

“Aye, I am.”

“Then he might spare you, as he spared me and my family. He killed those Frey fuckers who killed Robb Stark and his mother at the Twins, and he forced Walder Frey to eat wet shit. My home was given back to my house, my nephew is Lord Paramount of the Trident again, and we had our revenge on the people who betrayed us, but in exchange we had to bend the knee to the Imp’s nephew. If he lets you live, expect that he will ask you the same.”

That wasn’t a prospect Davos really loved. Stannis had been his king, and Tommen the usurper. But Stannis was dead, and so was his wife, Queen Selyse, and his daughter, Shireen. There was nothing left of Stannis’s legacy to protect. His death would accomplish nothing. He was more useful alive, especially when the dead were coming. There was a great war coming. On that, the red lady was right. They needed all the men they could get for it. Dying for a dead king wouldn’t help.

“Can I expect him to keep his word?” Davos asked.

“As he always says, a Lannister always pays his debts. He will be true to his word, if you remain true to yours. He pays his debts in both directions… and so do I.”

They arrived at a much larger camp. Davos saw sigils of House Lannister and their vassals everywhere, along with sigils of the Tullys, the Freys and other river lords. He even spotted a banner of House Hightower and the mermaid of House Manderly. They were brought to the middle of the camp, where a large red pavilion had been raised, a high banner with a golden lion flying by its side. The snow kept falling here, just like on the other side of the river. Ser Brynden had sent a rider ahead of them, so they were surely expected.

They were introduced into the large pavilion. There, a man half the size of any common grown man was waiting for them. There was another, of more common height, with him, all clad in black boiled leather. He looked at Davos as they entered.

“So, that’s the Onion Knight. Not very impressive, but better than most knights I saw in my life,” the man commented.

Davos only had eyes for the Imp. Tyrion Lannister wasn’t clad in armor. He wore a red doublet with gold incrusted in it. A huge scar was crossing his face. That was the man who burned their fleet on the Blackwater, the man who killed Matthos.

“Ser Davos,” he said.

“Lord Lannister,” Davos replied. “This is Lady Gwyn Forrester, Lady of Ironrath, and one of Jon Snow’s supporter.”
“Forrester?” The Lord of Casterly Rock eyed Lady Gwyn for a moment. “Pod.” Davos noticed a boy in a corner of the room. “Can you fetch Lady Hightower, please?”

“Yes, my lord.”

The boy named Pod left. Why was he asking for Lady Hightower? Their banner was here, Davos remembered that, but why bring her here? What were the Hightowers doing here in the first place?

“You may sit,” said the small lord. They took place. The Blackfish sat on the right of the Imp, while the other man sat on his left, his legs on the table. “This is Ser Bronn of the Blackwater. He was knighted after that battle.”

“I was the one to shoot the arrow,” Ser Bronn said with a satisfied smile.

Davos now understood. This man had been the one to start the fire that destroyed the fleet, and he was knighted for this. He was obviously no more of noble birth than Davos himself. He was a sellsword who reached knighthood by making the dirty work for the right people. Davos had to beware of him.

“So, you represent Jon Snow?” asked the Imp.

“I am. I gave a letter he wrote for you and Lady Sansa to Ser Brynden.”

The Blackfish showed the scroll to Lord Tyrion who read it. “It seems to be the case. I recognize my half-brother-in-law’s signature and writing. How interesting. Two Hands for two different dead kings. Mine shot on his people and told them to eat their dead when they were starving, yours burned people because he thought that would please his god. It seems to me our two kings met ends they deserved.”

Was it a test? Did he expect Davos to agree with him and recognize that Joffrey was a monster, or to defend Stannis’s honor? In both cases, he could be condemned to death. Or perhaps he expected him to deny Joffrey’s crimes and to denounce Stannis’s. Davos couldn’t do that.

“Whatever Stannis did, he’s dead. I am no longer in his service, and I have no reason to serve a dead king. I serve Jon Snow now,” Davos replied.

Lord Tyrion seemed to examine Davos. “Did Stannis really burn people, as a sacrifice for his Lord of Light?”

“He did.” That was the truth, and it would do no good to lie about it. A hard truth was better than a soft lie. “I advised against it, but he did it all the same.”

“And you did nothing to stop him?”

“Did you try to stop Joffrey’s cruelties?” Davos countered.

The Imp remained silent for a moment, then leaned forward. “In the time when Lady Sansa was betrothed to Joffrey, he had her beaten naked in front of the whole court. Do you think I did nothing while he humiliated and mistreated an innocent girl?”

Davos could see that the answer was no. Strangely, he didn’t think the Imp was lying on this. “Once, Stannis wanted to sacrifice a boy and use blood magic to destroy his enemies with this sacrifice. I helped the boy to escape. I saved his life, and I got almost executed for that. I may not have saved the lives of everybody Stannis wanted to burn, but I saved the life of this boy. The others Stannis burned were traitors who disobeyed his orders. The penalty for this was death.”
What he didn’t say was that some simply disobeyed Stannis by worshipping the Seven, but it wasn’t a lie. He only didn’t say everything.

“Very well. I think we can both agree we served terrible kings,” Lord Tyrion said. “But now they’re dead, and we have new enemies. The Boltons are possibly keeping Arya and Rickon Stark prisoners. I think we both agree they must be removed from Winterfell.”

“We agree,” said Lady Gwyn.

“Jon Snow says he wants to join his forces to us in his letter.”

“That’s right,” confirmed Davos.

“How many men does he have?”

“About five thousand.”

“Five thousand.” The Imp looked thoughtful. “My spies say that Ramsay has about six thousand men. Where are they from?”

“The bulk is made of the mountain clans. Flints, Norreys, and many other small lords.”

“Who else?”

“We have House Mormont, House Mazin and House Forrester to support us.”

“That’s all?” There was a false surprise on Lord Tyrion’s face. “These houses cannot muster many men, if I recall well. Are you telling me the mountain clans could bring about five thousand men on their own?”

Davos had to reveal the truth. “The mountain clans brought three thousand men. Most of the other two thousand are wildlings.”

“Wildings?” said Ser Brynden, not without scorn. “So the rumors are true.”

“Ramsay threatened to kill them all, so the wildling leaders accepted to help us.”

“And the Northerners? Are they getting along well with them?” asked the Lord of Casterly Rock.

Davos sighed. “It’s not easy to march to war with former enemies, but they do.”

Lord Tyrion seemed to think about it for a time. “We have about twenty-five thousand men, Ser Davos, including the men I brought from the Westerlands, the Tullys, the Freys and the other river lords, to which we must add a small detachment from House Hightower, and a few houses of the North, including the Manderlys, the Reeds and the Hornwoods, and the Cerwyns and the Dustins who joined us recently. They won’t be happy to learn that they will have to side with wildlings.”

“Jon Snow will not send them back north of the Wall.”

“Why wouldn’t he?” asked the Blackfish.

“Because they will die there, and worse.”

He looked at Lord Tyrion, trying to make him understand only with visual contact. If Jon Snow said the truth and that Tyrion Lannister knew the threat the White Walkers represented, then he might understand. Lord Lannister looked queerly at him.
“Well,” the Imp finally said, “we’ll have to live with it. Our forces will join before Winterfell, and we will try to keep the Northerners away from the wildlings, and from the Freys too. Once Winterfell is taken, the fate of the wildlings will be decided. My wife, Lady Sansa, will have to decide as Wardeness of the North and Lady of Winterfell.”

“Please excuse me, my lord, but Rickon Stark is the Lord of Winterfell,” Davos pointed out.

Davos felt a chill down his spine. The flap of the tent had been opened. The boy had come back with a young woman who was probably the Lady Hightower the Imp asked for.

“Lady Hightower,” the lad said. The lady in question was quite young, with black hair and green eyes, wearing furs with a common dress from the southern regions.

“Lady Mira, do you know this woman?” asked the Imp.

“Gwyn!” Lady Mira Hightower was looking in utter shock at Lady Gwyn, who looked as shocked as she was.

“Mira! It’s you. It’s really you?”

Davos looked at the women. “My lady,” he asked to Gwyn, “may I know what this is about?”

“She is Asher’s sister, Ser Davos,” Gwyn Forrester answered.

Davos looked at the young woman. He couldn’t see much resemblance between her and the hard Lord of Ironrath. Maybe some, if he looked more closely.

“What are you doing here?” asked Lady Mira, anger plain on her face.

“We have come to negotiate, my lady,” tried to explain Davos. “We are…”

“I have nothing to negotiate with her. Her family slaughtered mine. I have nothing to tell her.” Lady Mira turned on her heels.

“Mira, wait. Your brothers and your sister are alive,” said Gwyn.

The young lady stopped and looked at them. “What?”

“That is, some of them. Asher is alive, and so is Talia, and Ryon too. They are with Jon Snow, in his army.”

A silence followed. The Lady Hightower was speechless.

“Maybe you could continue this conversation in private, somewhere else,” suggested the Imp. “Lady Mira, you could speak with Lady Forrester or Whitehill, whatever her name is, in your own pavilion.”

“Yes… Yes, I suppose. Follow me, Gwyn.”

On that she left. Lady Gwyn excused herself, to Davos and the others, and followed her sister-in-law.

“Sorry for the interruption,” said Lord Tyrion. “You were saying that Rickon Stark is the Lord of Winterfell, didn’t you?”
“I did,” confirmed Davos. “Robb Stark died without children, so the title goes to his older brother still alive. Rickon Stark is alive, which makes of him the Lord of Winterfell.”

“Rickon Stark, as far as we know, is held prisoner by Ramsay. He is in no position to be Lord of Winterfell. Until he is free, Sansa is the Lady of Winterfell and the Wardeness of the North, fully recognized and supported by a royal decree from Tommen Baratheon the First of His Name. When we take Winterfell and that Rickon Stark is free, we will settle things with the king for Rickon to be acknowledged, but not before.”

Davos didn’t like the sound of it. The Lord of Casterly Rock wanted Winterfell for his wife, the Lady Sansa, so he could hold the North. He would have to report this to Jon Snow.

“Ser Davos,” said the Blackfish, “you have to understand that until recently, we all believed that Brandon and Rickon Stark died when the Ironmen took Winterfell. Some believe that all this might be a lie, entirely made by Ramsay Bolton.”

“Jon Snow received a letter from Ramsay, saying he had his sister Arya and his brother,” Davos argued.

“That was very convenient,” said Tyrion. “What better way to attract the last living son of Eddard Stark to Winterfell where he could be easily killed, and remove a great threat to Ramsay’s claim on the throne of the North?”

“You believe all of this is an invention?”

“It might be. We cannot be sure. Don’t get me wrong, Ser Davos. If Rickon Stark is alive, I will do everything I can to save him. He is my wife’s brother, and I brought a whole army this far north to save her sister. If I can save her brother in the process, I will gladly do it. But if he’s dead, there is nothing I can do. Even if he is alive, I doubt he has much chance to live until we get to him. You surely heard about Ramsay’s reputation.” Davos had heard of it, of course. He read the letter he sent to Jon Snow. He wasn’t sure for a moment after reading it if it had been a good thing to become literate. “Even if Rickon Stark still lives when we find him, the odds are heavy that he won’t be able to father any children. Even my wife prefers to believe that he’s dead because of that.”

There was something in Lord Tyrion’s face that made Davos believe what he said. He looked sorry about Rickon Stark. Maybe he was sincere on this.

“We will join our army with Jon Snow’s forces,” declared the Blackfish. “We will meet near Winterfell and fight Ramsay together. You have our word, Ser Davos. We will take Winterfell, free Arya and Rickon Stark, and reinstate House Stark as the Wardens of the North. I lost my niece at the Red Wedding. The Freys paid for their crimes, and I intend to make the Boltons pay their share too. And I am well determined to make sure that the children of my niece get what is owed to them.”

If Davos had doubts about the Imp, he couldn’t doubt the Blackfish. The man was a legend, and well known for his honour. They used the rest of the time to discuss details, exchanging information, deciding where and when the armies would join, settling the preliminary decisions concerning the aftermath of the battle. Davos got a tent to sleep tonight. It was a welcomed offer after weeks on the road and in the snow. He also got a hot meal, which was delicious compared to the food he ate lately. The Northerners weren’t renowned for their food, and the Night’s Watch was even worse.

Lady Forrester came to see him during dinner. They exchanged news. He told her about his discussion with Lord Tyrion, including the fact that Lord Tyrion would give the Stark name to his child with Lady Sansa who would get Winterfell, if Rickon Stark couldn’t be saved. He shared his doubts about Lord Tyrion’s motives, which Lady Gwyn approved. They had to be careful with the Imp. It was a strange thing that the Lady Sansa wasn’t here. The excuse of a pregnancy was legitimate, but who said it was true, or even entirely true, or that this situation wasn’t used to keep the eldest daughter of Eddard Stark far from Winterfell when it would be taken? Davos didn’t know how Jon Snow would react to the new that his sister was pregnant from the Imp. Lady Gwyn revealed on her side her discussion with her sister-in-law. Apparently, Lady Mira Forrester, Lord Asher’s sister, was a handmaiden for Margaery Tyrell during the war. She was later a handmaiden for Lady Sansa Stark, then went back to the service of the queen when Jon Snow’s sister left the capital. The Lannisters planned to marry her to Gwyn’s brother, Torrhen Whitehill, but she managed to persuade the queen to arrange her a marriage with a grandson of Leyton Hightower, Lord of the Hightower. The Hightower troops with the army were under her husband’s command. They had come to take back Ironrath from the Whitehills. They believed that all Mira’s family died in the Battle of Ironrath. Davos could see some trouble ahead.

Later, Davos was wondering what he should do. He had a new letter in his bag, written by Lord Tyrion for Jon Snow. There was a letter Jon Snow gave him that he hadn’t delivered. It was a letter for his sister and her husband, different from the other one he gave to Ser Brynden, and with a much different content. Davos wished the Lady Sansa was here. Was it possible that she was left behind to not interfere with a possible conquest of the North by the Lannisters? Davos didn’t think the Blackfish was conspiring with the Lannisters, but he may be manipulated. All the same, the content of the letter was too important. He had to deliver it, even if only to the Imp. He left his tent.

The young squire introduced him in Lord Tyrion’s tent. Davos lost no time and handed the second scroll to the Lord of Casterly Rock. He read it carefully, frowning quite often. Davos thought the Imp read it more than once.

“Is that true?” Lord Tyrion finally asked.

“Jon Snow wouldn’t be lying about this, and I know he sent you ravens on the matter. He says you’ve been at the Wall, that you know the dangers behind it. The real dangers.”

Lord Tyrion looked at the letter again. He finally laid it on his desk. “Did he really fight them at Hardhome?”

“Aye, he did.”

“Did you see the dead? Yourself?”

“No, but I believe Jon Snow when he says he saw them. All the wildlings saw them too, and many men in the Night’s Watch. And I’ve seen things…”

Shadows. A woman drinking poison without dying. A man brought back from the dead. There was nothing Davos could believe to be impossible now.

“I don’t believe Jon Snow is lying. Jeor Mormont and Maester Aemon believed the White Walkers were real, and they were far from lunatics,” the Imp said. He looked very thoughtful. “It almost seems a blessing that I received information that my sister-in-law was at Winterfell, or else I would never have brought my army here, and the North would be defenseless against the White Walkers.”

“With all your respect, my lord, I don’t believe the rape of a little girl can be considered a blessing.”

The Imp looked at him. There was silence for some time. “I need to show you something, Ser Davos. Come with me.”

They walked through the camp and arrived at a section where the banners showed plants and flowers you could mostly see in marshes. They stopped before one with three black water lilies on a pale violet field. Lord Tyrion walked from there to a tent and indicated to Davos to follow him.

Inside, the furniture was quite simple and minimalist. Only the necessary was there. The tent only had one occupant right now. It was a girl wearing dirty clothes, with brown hair and grey eyes, skinny, short for her age (Davos thought she could be fourteen or fifteen), and with a fierceness in her face.

“What is it?” she asked to Lord Tyrion. Then her eyes caught Davos. “Who’s that?”

Tyrion Lannister introduced them both. “This is Ser Davos Seaworth. Ser Davos, I present you the Lady Arya Stark of Winterfell.”

Davos looked at the girl. Arya Stark? How could that be? “Is that some joke?” he asked.

“It’s not. While I was at Casterly Rock, I received reports that Arya Stark was at Winterfell, wed by force to Ramsay Bolton, but when we arrived in the Neck, we discovered she had been at Greywater Watch with Lord Howland Reed all this time.” Davos looked at the girl again. He had to admit she had similarities with Jon Snow. They had the same eyes and the same hair. “You understand now, why I have doubts about Rickon Stark being in Winterfell. The Boltons lied about Arya Stark. Do you think it’s so unlikely that they are lying about Rickon Stark too?”

Davos kept looking at the girl. She fitted the description that Jon Snow gave of her. Everything he remembered Jon Snow saying about his sister matched the appearance of the girl standing before him.

“Who are you?” she asked.

Could she really be Arya Stark? Davos had to be sure. You never knew with the Lannisters. “May I ask you something, my lady? What was the thing your brother Jon Snow used to do with your hair very often?”

She looked at him with a strange expression. “Why are you asking me this?”

“Please, answer.”

“He ruffled them. Why?”

“Because that’s what he told me.”

Her eyes suddenly widened. “You know Jon? You saw him?”

“Aye. I did. I’m at his service, in fact. He sent me here to negotiate with Lord Tyrion, so we could join our forces to free Winterfell, and you my lady. We were sure you were a prisoner there.”

She remained silent for a moment. Then the questions rained. “How is he? Where is he? Is he alright? When can I see him?”

However, Davos still had some doubts. He had to be absolutely sure that this was Arya Stark. After all, many people could know that Jon Snow used to ruffle his sister’s hair. Lord Tyrion visited Winterfell before. He could have seen it, and tell the girl. He needed to ask her something that only the true Arya Stark would know.

“Before I answer, can you tell me what was the name of the sword that your brother gave you, before you left Winterfell?” he asked.
A short silence followed. Then the girl answered. “Needle.”

There was no doubt left. She was Arya Stark.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Cersei

I may publish one chapter per week from time to time in the near future. My Master is really taking me a lot of time, and I started an original story with that. I wish there were more than twenty-four hours within a single day.
“Everything is ready?” she asked.

“Everything was done as you ordered, your Grace,” the man before her assured.

Qyburn was a maester. Well, not really a maester. The Citadel had taken away his chains for practices they considered immoral. Cersei didn’t care. If her father had considered the morality of his actions, the Lannisters wouldn’t be powerful like they were today. Qyburn was useful, and as long as he would be useful, she would use him. He had healed Jaime after he lost his hand, and now he was in Cersei’s personal service. She kept him near her, in part as gratitude for helping Jaime, in part because she couldn’t suffer Pycelle anymore.

She didn’t miss Pycelle. The Grand Maester had become entirely useless. She had been wrong to rely on him for so long. He proved to be stupid every time she used him. He allowed Tyrion to put him into a cell when he was acting Hand of the King, and allowed doubt to be cast on his testimony at the trial. Because of his failures, the Imp had gotten out of it alive, Casterly Rock now belonged to him and Sansa, Joffrey was dead, Myrcella was dead, and Kevan died.

Kevan had been a fool to trust the Tyrells and the Martells. His most stupid idea had been to make an alliance with Margaery. The queen sends her regards. He even trusted Tyrion. Tyrion and Margaery had plotted against her and against Joffrey. Cersei warned her uncle, and he did nothing. He preferred to listen to the Imp, and Jaime had been barely better. Now, everything fell back on Cersei. She had to save Tommen, her last child, and her family, just like her lord father did when their grandfather died.

The task wasn’t easy, especially in her position, almost without power and without position, but it wasn’t desperate. If only events had unfolded in her favor. She wished Margaery, the little whore, had gotten a child from Tyrion during their conspiracy. Cersei could easily have accused her of fornication and adultery when the child would have been born and the world would have seen it was a monster like her brother. Unfortunately, it didn’t happen. Margaery surely took moon tea. She already had her claws in Tommen. Cersei couldn’t convince Tommen to set her aside. Margaery had enthralled him. She had stolen her son, almost.

Cersei’s situation was precarious, but not lost. She still had friends in the city, Qyburn the first, and some Lannister guards still had some respect for her. Some didn’t like to have a dwarf for their lord. Kevan’s death and Randyll Tarly’s departure for Dorne also left empty places she could fill, and Tommen wasn’t entirely lost to her. She still had some influence on him. He refused to make her go and decided she could stay. She was still being watched, but loosely. More guards patrolled the corridors than before, but that left less of them to watch over her. Randyll Tarly’s men left with their lord for Dorne, and with Varys gone, there was no Master of Whisperers to tell everything to Margaery. Cersei had to deal with her, and quickly. Lord Selwyn Tarth couldn’t be far away now, and Tommen had named Garth Tyrell to be the new Master of Whisperers lately. He was surely on his way from Highgarden. She had to do something before these men arrived and reinforced Margaery’s position. If Jaime had remained in the capital, she would have one more ally, but she would have to do without him.

Cersei looked at Qyburn. She didn’t know where he came from, his age, his family if he had one.
She couldn’t even be sure Qyburn was his real name, but he was loyal, and right now loyalty was all she needed from him. He followed her to Stokeworth, then back to King’s Landing when Myrcella died, and he would stay at her service as long as she would want him to.

“If this doesn’t work,” she said, “you know how we will both end.”

“Yes, your Grace.”

He turned to the wall behind him and pushed two blocks, then two others. Cersei heard something rattling, like some sort of mechanism. Qyburn pushed the wall, and it gave way to a secret passage.
They were at the fourth level of the dungeon, the one where prisoners came alive and left dead, if they ever left. Qyburn had wanted to forego any torch, for people said it was preferable to not see the things at this level, but Cersei had declined. She had seen much worse than the things there could be in the Red Keep’s dungeon. She wasn’t shocked by the things she saw down there. Disturbed, maybe, but not shocked.

Cersei entered the secret passage, Qyburn on her heels. He closed the entrance behind him. This was one of those passages the Spider and his little birds used, according to Qyburn. He managed to bribe some of Varys’s little birds, and they gave him information about these tunnels. Cersei would make him Master of Whisperers if she could, but Tommen had refused, preferring an uncle of his whore queen, no matter how Cersei strongly advised against it.

Qyburn took the lead, his torch held up. They made their way in silence. Cersei knew she was taking a huge risk, but the risk was worth it. She could do it. She was a lioness, the daughter of Tywin Lannister, a child of the Rock, the true Lady of the Westerlands, the queen. She had more of her father in her than any of his other children. If she was a man, she would have everything she wanted.
They turned right, then left, left again, then on the right thrice, before they turned left one last time.
They got through three other doors and arrived to a ladder. Qyburn climbed it first, and Cersei followed. Her arms were aching when they reached the top and the disgraced maester opened the trapdoor. He helped her get inside and closed the trapdoor behind them.

They were in an abandoned room, in an inn near the Iron Gate. There was a table, with black bread and a decanter full of water, and three chairs, nothing more, nothing less.

“The little birds I spoke with told me that Lord Varys used to meet some of his informers here,” explained Qyburn. “No one ever comes in this room. He has an arrangement with the owner of the inn, but he only speaks with him through his little birds. The innkeeper won’t know it was us. He never enters this room. He only leads the people to it when they ask.”

“What do we do now?”

“We wait, your Grace. And we pray for our guest to come.”

Pray. As if prayers would help them. She prayed when she was young, to bring her mother back to life, and to have Tyrion die, and both demands remained unanswered for thirty-five years. The gods wouldn’t help her. She would have to deal with her enemies all alone. Cersei waited. Qyburn helped himself with some of the water, but Cersei refused any. She didn’t trust the quality of the water that was served here. She remembered a time when they were on the road to Winterfell, back when Robert decided to make Ned Stark his Hand. Tyrion had drunk with thieves and sellswords who stayed at an inn where they stopped, drinking wine of the place without complaint. There was a whore in the place, and of course Tyrion spent the night with her, while Robert spent his night with the daughter of the innkeeper. Cersei had been able to spend the night with Jaime this time. Everyone had been happy.

The same couldn’t be said now. Cersei raged when she learned that Tyrion had gotten the Stark girl with a child. If Tyrion had a son, it would complicate matters a lot. Cersei would have to take care of that, when the time would come. For now, however, she needed to take care of Margaery. Her little brother was far away, and she would find a way to deal with him and his wife later. Cersei was glad that they cancelled the betrothal between Joffrey and Sansa. No woman who would bear children for the Imp was worthy to marry her son. A woman who had children with Tyrion was nothing better than a common whore, which madeSansa a whore as much as Margaery was, and that made her unworthy of being Lady of Casterly Rock. Cersei should have foreseen the influence Margaery had on Sansa Stark. She should have prevented that. She should have married the little dove to someone else after her father was arrested. Littlefinger had proposed to marry the Stark girl himself, but she had refused. He wasn’t highborn enough. Now, Sansa was parading with the titles that were Cersei’s. Margaery used other people against her, and she succeeded in setting her aside. For now.
Things were about to change.

The door opened. An old man, with falling grey hair, unwashed, wearing rags, without shoes, stinking shit and piss, came in. Cersei sniffed at the smell he emitted. Qyburn didn’t look bothered by it. The man stood before them, smiling like a fool, not bowing, nor kneeling. Cersei would have him flogged for such impertinence in normal times, but right now she needed him.

“High Sparrow.”

“Your Grace.” He still didn’t bow.

“Would you like a seat?”

“Yes, gladly. My legs don’t support me as well as they used to.” He laughed shortly, and Cersei imitated him dryly.

“Thank you for coming.”

“I have to admit, I found your invitation quite… unexpected. My relations with the Crown could have been better lately.”

“I’m sorry for the way Lord Tarly beat down you and your followers, but I can assure you that things are about to change.”

“Well, this is good news. I would like it if I could walk the streets again without fearing to be executed any second.” Another short laugh. With such a leader, no wonder the Sparrows posed no problem to Randyll Tarly. Her uncle had to be very weak to have let them become a threat at all.
Still, they could be useful. “How may I serve?”

“My son, the king, is very concerned. About the state of the Faith.”

“We share this concern.”
“The Faith has grown into a corrupt institution, led by men who are more occupied by their riches and comforts in life than the souls of the people and the worshipping of the gods.”

“A great shame it is, which is why I came here.”

“And you were right to come, but that’s not everything. All over Westeros, we hear of septs being burned, Silent Sisters raped, bodies of holy men piled in the streets.”

“Wars teach people to obey the sword, not the gods,” he stated.

“My son, the king, knows that, and he wants to put an end to it.”

“I thank the king for that. I pray for his Grace every day.”

“However, he feels that you could help him in reaching that goal, to protect the Faith, and to restore it in its former purity.”

The High Sparrow looked a little surprised for a moment. “I’m quite touched that his Grace thought I could help him, but I don’t really see how.”

“You want to restore the Faith, something the actual High Septon refuses to do. The king believes you should be the High Septon.”

“I’m quite honored of his opinion. I didn’t know the king thought so much of me.”

“He does, and he also knows that the gods need a sword of their own, if they are to be obeyed. In the days before the Targaryens, the Faith Militant dispensed the justice of the Seven.”

“Well, the Faith Militant was disarmed more than two centuries ago.”

“My son believes it is time to bring them back. He believes you are well placed to choose the believers who are worthy of such a task.”

“An army that defends the bodies and souls of the common people?” That was something the old man never expected, obviously.

“An army in the service to the gods themselves. And to you, of course, as the chosen representative of the Seven.”

“An honor I never expected, or wished for. But I’m afraid I’m not the High Septon. Sorold was chosen by the Most Devout…”

“The Most Devout are corrupted, and sinners. Which you are not. Which is why my son issued a decree making you the real High Septon. Unlike the Most Devout, the king is not corrupted, and he cares for his people, both their bodies and their souls.”

“I have to admit I was no longer sure of that, after everything that happened in the last weeks.”

Cersei looked at Qyburn. He produced a parchment from his sleeve and gave it to the High Sparrow. He looked at it and read it. It hadn’t been difficult for Cersei to have Tommen sign it. She simply went to see him while he was signing decrees, and slipped it in the pile. He never read what he signed, so much he loved to sign and stamp. He never took notice of what was written on the papers he signed.

“I wonder if I’m dreaming,” the man finally said. He seemed capable of reading. Cersei hadn’t been sure he could.
“You’re not. The gods are leading the king, and they led him to you. You have all you need to protect the people and restore the Faith. I hope we can count on you to defend the king.”

“The king is anointed by the Seven. He is chosen by them as much as the High Septon, as their chosen representative. We shall do everything to protect his Grace.”

Cersei smirked, but took a sadder expression. She gave herself a concerned look. “Would you help the king against his will?”

“What do you mean, your Grace, if I may?”

“The king wants to do what is best, but he is surrounded by corrupted people. They stopped him from acting in your favor before, and he could only do that because these people are gone now. Most of them.” She looked on the floor. “I’m afraid for him. Afraid of what could happen to him. Afraid that evil men may divert him from the rightful path. He wants so much to do what is good, and yet… I fear for his life.”

A moment of silence went on. “You love your children, don’t you?”

She looked back at him. Of course, I love my children, you dumb fool! “Yes, I do. I do love them so much.”

The High Sparrow seemed to sympathize. “I can feel the Mother’s presence in you, your Grace. When you speak of your children, the Mother’s love outshines everything.” Cersei was in no mood for religious discussions, but she kept playing her part. The High Sparrow had men, and she needed those men. “It was horrible what happened to them. You have my deepest condolences. You can be sure that we will do everything we can to protect the king. We will do everything we can to protect your son.”

You can’t protect him. Only I can protect him. “I thank you so much, but he needs protection from someone very specific. Someone close to him. Someone wicked, a sinner beyond the reach of justice. My son cannot punish that person, as much as she deserves it.”

“A very sad thing, but all sinners are equal before the gods. He shall not escape justice forever.”

“But this sinner endangers the king. We cannot wait for him to face justice in the other world. He is shielded by gold and privilege. He is in our very mist, and yet the king can do nothing against him. But I think you can.”

“I live to serve the gods, and to serve his servant, the king.”

“Then he needs you on this, more than ever.”

They spent some time talking about arrangements afterwards. They would need to act quickly tomorrow. Everything had to be prepared in detail. It wouldn’t be difficult to execute, but they needed to be well prepared and to take everyone by surprise. There weren’t enough men in the Red Keep to pose a real threat if everything was done swiftly. They were scattered through the castle.

That night, Cersei didn’t sleep well. She saw Maggy the Frog again, and Tyrion standing before her, two shadows behind him, his own shadow covering her. She never realized how long and dark his shadow was. She felt hands around her throat. She was suffocating. She saw three bodies in front of her, lying down on the floor. Joffrey and Myrcella had their faces covered by blood, and Tommen, her little Tommen, had his body all distorted. His face looked as if someone crushed it against a wall. She cried, and the life choked from her.
She woke up. That was only a dream. There was no truth in that prophecy. Tyrion was far away. She would deal with him before he could touch her. She called her handmaidens to prepare her for the day. By now, the Sparrows surely occupied the Great Sept of Baelor, and no one knew. It wouldn’t be long before the second part of the plan was executed. Qyburn would see that everything went right.

In the morning, Cersei walked on the battlements. She came over one of the courtyards and saw a few people looking at two young knights sparring. He always sparred at this time of the day. She looked at them for a long time. Jaime was much better than them. It was a shame that Jaime wasn’t there, but it didn’t matter. She was saving their son. Her son.

They came out. There were about twenty of them. Qyburn had made sure they found their way through the tunnels under the Red Keep, to a place very close to this yard. One of the knights was knocked out on the ground. The other one, still standing, could barely remove his helmet before the Sparrows put their hands on him and deprived him of any weapon he had. The squires and other men who were present didn’t react. Even if only armed with clubs and maces, they were more dangerous than knights without their swords.

Cersei saw them gag him and bring him away quickly, to the consternation of everyone. A note was left behind by one of the Sparrows. She wished the whore could be here to see it. She would learn it soon anyway. Cersei gloated. She wished she had wine with her. She walked away on the battlements, enjoying the sun and the fresh air of the autumn. Winter was coming, indeed. It was coming for some people, particularly. She went back to her room and poured herself a cup of her best flagon of wine. She savoured it, along with her first victory in more than a year. In a coat of gold, or a coat of red, a lioness still had claws.

Chapter End Notes
Sansa XXVI

Chapter Notes

This chapter is one of my favourites that I wrote recently. Sansa's storyline in White Harbor is the one going on that I like the most right now, followed by the Meereen plot.

By the way, for those who feel I abandoned Tyrion recently (more than ten chapters since his last POV), don't worry, he'll come back soon. Only there are so many major characters converging on Winterfell that it's difficult to find place for everyone.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

“Anything special with the other servants here?” Sansa asked to her handmaiden, as she brushed her hair.

“No, my lady. Only the usual gossips,” Willia answered.

“I hope you don’t feel out of place.”

“Not really, my lady. In fact, it’s much similar to Casterly Rock. People don’t look different from there.”

Sansa nodded. She supposed that Willia had been somewhat afraid to go in the North. She grew up in the Westerlands, and of course she shared all the preconceived opinions the people of the south had over those of the North. Attending to a Lady of Casterly Rock who came from the North was one thing, but to actually go in the North was entirely different, or so Sansa thought. She didn’t speak a lot with Willia. Since Shae betrayed her, she didn’t really try to get friendly with her handmaidens or to know them. Mira was an exception, since she came from the North just like Sansa and she had lost all her family too. Unlike Sansa, Mira had no chance of ever seeing again her sister or one of her brothers. She really was the last of her family. Except Mira, Sansa didn’t try to know more than necessary about her handmaidens, and mostly spoke with them when it was required and nothing more.

“Did you hear anything about the Freys?” Sansa asked her.

“Not much, my lady. Except, a handmaiden of Lady Manderly who said something like… She said they were surely happy with their accommodations, but she didn’t seem quite convinced, more sarcastic.”

Sansa nodded. She couldn’t get any information about the three Freys who were kept here. She never saw them, and truth be told she didn’t want to see them, but she was curious about their comings and goings. Rhaegar, Symond and Jared Frey had been sent to White Harbor by Walder Frey after the Red Wedding. Rhaegar Frey was supposed to marry Wynafryd Manderly, thus ensuring House Manderly would bend the knee to the Iron Throne. However, when Tyrion and Sansa turned on the Freys at Riverrun, they forced Walder Frey to bend the knee to House Tully again, cancelled the betrothal, as well as another betrothal between Wylla Manderly and some other son of Walder Frey. There were so many that Sansa didn’t know which son it was. She thought there were probably twenty different Walder Frey. Still, not only the betrothals in question were called out, but the three Freys in question were to remain in White Harbor as guests, just like Sansa was a guest in King’s Landing after her father was killed.

The whispers wanted that the Freys were kept in the cells of the Wolf’s Den. Sansa didn’t see the problem in that. Her uncle Edmure had been kept in an open cell when he wasn’t on a gibbet during the siege of Riverrun, and for almost a year. Let the Freys rot in prison. However, there was a remark that she heard from Wylla Manderly not long ago that puzzled her. I suppose the Freys love rats. Were they starving them? She and Tyrion had thought they shouldn’t push too far on the Freys. They already killed many of them, though sometimes Sansa thought this wasn’t enough. She may agree with Wylla Manderly on that matter. The Manderlys were better to keep these Freys out of her sight. Ser Perwyn and Olyvar Frey were decent enough, but she wouldn’t trust any Frey on sight for the rest of her life.

The door opened. Another handmaiden, who was placed at her service by Lord Manderly, came in. “Lady Lannister, Lady Wynafryd is waiting for you.”

“I’m coming,” Sansa said.

Willia hurried to finish her hair. Then, as always when she brushed Sansa’s hair, she put her necklace with a golden lion around her throat. She always had it on her, even here. That was the one thing she would never make any compromise with. Wylla Manderly once looked disdainfully at it, but Sansa wouldn’t stop wearing it for anything in the world.

Lady Wynafryd Manderly was waiting for her outside, indeed. She was richly dressed. If Sansa had visited White Harbor before, she wouldn’t have thought that the North was without interest. There were knights here, and the city was much more welcoming than King’s Landing. They walked to the Merman’s Court where they would welcome the lords, Brienne following them behind. She was Sansa’s shadow here, and was never far from her.

“Still wearing that necklace?” Wynafryd asked her.

“Yes, always.”

Wynafryd smiled to her. “A Lannister outside, and a Stark inside.”

She had been a good friend for Sansa since they arrived. While Wylla Manderly kept sneering and discreetly insulting Sansa and the Lannisters as if they were Freys or Boltons, Wynafryd proved to be very civil. She made Sansa visit White Harbor as much as she could with her growing belly and often kept her company. When she had asked Sansa why she wore the same Lannister necklace all the time, Sansa had showed her the silver direwolf hidden inside. Wynafryd had been courteous with Sansa before, though not more than necessary. After that, she warmed up towards her. Even Wylla looked with a curious glance at Sansa’s neck the next day. She supposed her sister told her the truth about it.

“Do you know anything about this Lord Harrold Arryn?” Sansa asked her. The ships of the Vale had been spotted coming yesterday.

“I never heard about him, but I suppose there had to be some distant relative of Jon Arryn somewhere. The man had a brother and a sister. I heard the brother is dead, and we know his only son, Elbert Arryn, was killed by the Mad King at the same time than your lord grandfather, Lord Rickard Stark, and his son Brandon. Maybe the sister had children.”
“Maybe,” conceded Sansa.

“Well, he already seems better than the previous lord. Robin Arryn remained in his castle at the top of the mountains, doing nothing, while we bled and died on the battlefields.”

Sansa couldn’t agree more. “Robin Arryn was a coward. Just like Joffrey was.”

Wynafryd and Sansa exchanged a smile again. Sansa had nothing to fear from speaking ill of Joffrey with a Northerner. Still, she was careful with the arrival of this new Lord of the Eyrie. Her aunt and her cousin died quite close to each other. Of course, she knew who actually killed Lysa Arryn, but what about Robin Arryn? She suspected Littlefinger to have some role in that. It wouldn’t be the first time he had someone assassinated, or at least helped to his assassination. If the Knights of the Vale were coming and that Petyr Baelish was behind it one way or another, she had to be wary with them. She could still remember the dagger of Ser Dontos on her throat. A man who claims he loved your mother. I think you know who I’m talking about. Don’t trust him! Don’t trust anybody! The last words Shae told her pounded in her head. Don’t trust anybody! Indeed, she couldn’t trust anybody here, except the ones who proved they wanted to help her, and only wanted to help her. There weren’t much people aside her family she could include in that. Except the woman clad in armor who walked behind her, and her lord husband, of course, though Tyrion was family now for her, more than ever with the child they were about to have. The kicks reminded her of this fact once more.

“I’m not sure the Knights of the Vale can help us,” said Sansa. “We already have more than enough men in the North, and they are arriving quite late.”

“We will defeat the Boltons, with or without this Lord Arryn, my lady. We will make them pay. We will avenge the Red Wedding. You can be sure of that. We will avenge Robb Stark, our king.”

“We will, but we will avenge my brother Robb, not our king.”

“What do you mean?”

“Robb died because of the crown on his head. I don’t want to avenge him as a king. I want to avenge him as my brother, and as the Lord of Winterfell. Ramsay will die, and I will make sure that he is the last one to ever be called King in the North by anyone.”

A moment passed. “Of course, my lady.” Lady Wynafryd sounded a bit cold in her answer.

In the Merman’s Court, the great hall of the New Castle, people were gathering all around. People let Sansa and Wynafryd get through. With Brienne close and at hands, no one dared to get in her way, and Sansa’s position as Lady of the Westerlands and Wardeness of the North, added to her condition as a pregnant woman, completed the whole set of circumstances that made everyone careful around her. Despite all this, Sansa could see the few looks of hatred and contempt thrown at her. Many saw her as a Lannister. Again, Sansa wondered who she was. If people looked at her this way here, how would that be farther in the North, when she would take her place at Winterfell?

“Lady Lannister,” Lord Manderly welcomed her when they arrived on the dais. “As Wardeness of the North, you may take my seat to receive Lord Arryn.”

Sansa looked at the large cushioned throne. “Thank you, my lord, but I’m afraid I’m not large enough to take your seat.”

Lod Manderly laughed after a moment. “As you wish, my lady. Take place on my left.”

Sansa sat on the designated seat. She sighed in relief. It became harder to walk. She thought she would be less tired in White Harbor than on the road, but it didn’t seem to be the case. She stayed in her rooms most of the time. Wynafryd took place to her left and Brienne behind her. Lady Wylla sat on her sister’s left. She nodded towards Sansa, the best courtesy she could show towards the Lady of the Westerlands. Ser Wylis Manderly and his wife, on Lord Wyman’s right, completed the set of people on the dais.

Sansa’s thoughts turned to Tyrion and Arya, and to Jon. It had been so long since she last saw him. She had so much to tell him, so much she couldn’t write down on the ravens she sent to Castleblack. She tried to focus on the present time. She had to discover who this Harrold Arryn was. The name rang no bell to anyone here. Maybe Tyrion would know. What would he do in her stead? With all the suspicion surrounding her, Sansa thought this wasn’t that different from King’s Landing. She had to find out the most she could about the others’ intentions, both Manderlys and Arryns. She could see that Lord Manderly wasn’t entirely won to Tyrion’s side. He made an alliance with them mostly to get his son back, and protect his daughters from marrying Freys. Sansa wouldn’t blame him for that, but since she bore the name Lannister now, she saw that the Lord of White Harbor was reluctant in some way to see her as the Wardeness of the North. Tyrion was right. Their son would have to be named a Stark. It was obvious from their first conversation last week that the Lord of White Harbor would rather have her brother Rickon to serve. Shae had been right. She couldn’t trust anybody.

Someone came in from the doors and announced that Lord Arryn and the lords of the Vale were coming. People gathered on the sides of the Court. Sansa tried to look as dignified as she could with the heavy burden in her stomach. The huge doors of the Court slowly opened. The blue banners with a falcon on a moon were the first things to be seen. Two lines of men carrying them took place at each side of the alley that opened between the dais and the doors. Then they came. A few lords and ladies came, all dressed in different ways, but Sansa only had eyes for one of them.

The moustache, along with the small beard on the chin, the face that smiled while the eyes didn’t… Petyr Baelish walked toward her. He was still wearing his mockingbird pin at the collar of his doublet. His smiled as if he was mocking her, and Sansa was quite sure he mocked her more often than she ever realized it. He had claimed to be her friend, but in fact he had tried to abduct her, to use her, he lied to her, betrayed her… Fury was growing inside of her. The small group stopped before the dais. He kept looking at her, and she returned the gaze. If he was surprised to see her, he showed nothing of it. She had a great envy to tell everyone here everything he did, and to have him executed right away. She was Wardeness of the North. Surely she could order his death now if she wanted to.

A stick hit the floor. “Harrold, son of Edmund, of House Arryn, Lord of the Eyrie, Defender of the Vale, and Warden of the East, comes seeking the hospitality of House Manderly,” announced a man Sansa didn’t see. Her eyes turned to the new Lord of the Eyrie.

He was staring at her, and it was as if she received another kick in the stomach, this time not from her baby. She knew this man. Sandy hair, blue eyes, dimples when he smiled like he did right now, broad of shoulders under his armor. Ser Harold Hardyng. Sansa could barely keep her mouth shut.

“Lord Arryn, the hospitality of White Harbor is yours,” declared Lord Manderly.

“Thank you, my lord,” replied the young man. He only looked at Lord Manderly for a moment, turning again to Sansa. There was no doubt. This was Harrold Arryn. How could that be? He stepped back, still looking at Sansa, and pointed his hand towards the people behind him. “Let me introduce you to a few of my most loyal bannermen. Lady Anya Waynwood, Lady of Ironoaks.” An old woman with curly grey hair came forth. “Lord Benedar Belmore, of Strongsong.” An old man with a beard advanced this time. “And Lord Yohn Royce, of Runestone.” The man who stepped forward wasn’t of the first youth anymore, but he seemed quite strong and muscular. Sansa recognized him. She saw him at Winterfell, a long time ago, when he accompanied his son Waymar “Lord Manderly,” The Lord of Runestone bowed to the Lord of White Harbor, then turned to Sansa. “Lady Lannister, it’s a relief to see you again, after all this time.”

“Indeed. Thank you, Lord Royce. It’s a pleasure to see you too,” Sansa replied.

The Lord of Runestone seemed to hesitate for some time. “I’m glad to see you are well.”

“As am I.” The new Lord of the Eyrie joined the conversation, uninvited. “It’s been a long time, my lady. I’m proud to tell you that the Knights of the Vale will fight and do everything necessary to bring back the North to the true daughter of Eddard Stark.”

There were cheers. Sansa felt gazes on her. Was she to explain how they met at her name day? She couldn’t make a misstep when so many people were looking at her. “When we met several months ago, Lord Arryn, you were a knight named Harrold Hardyng, if I remember well. I also remember you were unhorsed by a woman in a tourney.”

A moment of silence went, then a few coughed among the assistance. Sansa noticed that Wynafryd had some difficulty to not laugh as well. The Lord of the Eyrie was stammering, and some of his bannermen were looking at him with queer looks. He didn’t know what to answer.

Sansa decided to add some more. “I’m sure you remember my sworn shield, Lady Brienne of Tarth, daughter and heir to Lord Selwyn Tarth. I do hope you will fight better against the Boltons than against her.” The Lord of the Eyrie seemed to realize who was the woman who stood behind Sansa at this moment. People laughed again.

“Yes, of course, I remember.” The Warden of the East was obviously displeased by Brienne’s presence. “My name was Harrold Hardyng at the time, but my grandmother was Alys Waynwood, the sister of our regretted Lord Jon Arryn. I am the last of her grandchildren.”

Now Sansa understood why he became Lord of the Eyrie. “I’m sorry for your loss, Lord Arryn,” said Sansa.

“What loss?” He really was lost.

“I’m sure you regret the death of your dear cousin, Robin Arryn, very deeply.”

He seemed to realize what she had meant. “Yes, I am. Of course. A terrible sickness that took our dear lord away from us.”

He didn’t look very sad about it. Sansa doubted he was ever fond of Robin Arryn. Maybe he never met him. He told her at Casterly Rock that he was a ward to Lady Waynwood. He was certainly quite happy to be Lord of the Eyrie, and was certainly at best indifferent to his cousin’s death.

“Rooms have been prepared for you, my lords,” declared Lord Manderly. “Your men will have the right to camp outside the city.”

“Thank you, Lord Manderly,” answered Lady Waynwood. It wasn’t Lord Arryn who answered. He seemed quite uncomfortable in the actual situation. Sansa had just humiliated him.

The Merman’s Court was cleared and Sansa got back to her rooms with Brienne. Wynafryd accompanied her. Sansa regaled her with all the anecdotes she could remember on Lord Arryn’s passage at her name day. Both agreed that he mostly looked like a young and arrogant knight who believed he was the best. Brienne remained mostly placid, but Sansa thought she saw a smile threatening to appear a few times as they walked. Wynafryd’s comment that Sansa had the Lord of the Eyrie on her heels and that the Imp should be careful to not lose her didn’t sound very funny to Sansa.

Back in her rooms, Sansa took her leave of Wynafryd and asked Brienne to come in with her. They had to discuss. Brienne spoke before she could.

“We can laugh, my lady, but I don’t like this. This Harrold Arryn… He shouldn’t be there. I don’t know why he came, but I don’t like the idea of him being here.”

“Me neither, but I’m more concerned about Baelish being present. Did you notice Harold Arryn didn’t introduce him with the other lords?”

“I did, my lady. I kept an eye on him all this time. I think we should tell Lord Manderly about Littlefinger’s doings. He is true to the memory of Lord Eddard Stark your father, my lady. If he knows what Baelish did to him…”

“What could he do, Brienne? There will be men of the Vale everywhere inside and outside the city very soon. We know he is bringing ten thousand men now, not only five thousand. If we arrested Littlefinger or executed him, we could have a war at White Harbor. The Knights of the Vale won’t stand idle while the husband of their former lady is being beheaded.”

“We could tell the truth to them as well,” Brienne suggested. “And we could reveal that your sister is alive, and tell them what she told us, about Littlefinger trying to sell her off to the Boltons. No one honorable would follow him.”

“I doubt that all the Knights of the Vale ae honorable.” She remembered the things Arya told them about Ser Lyn Corbray, and Ser Meryn and Ser Boros’s fists. “And even if we did, what proof do we have? My sister is miles away and Littlefinger could reveal the truth about the death of Lady Lysa Arryn. Arya told us that Lady Waynwood and Lord Royce were there when she confessed doing so. He has witnesses. We have none.”

“You are the Wardeness of the North, my lady. The people will believe you.”

Sansa shook her head. She appreciated Brienne’s respect for her, but not everybody shared it. “I am the Imp’s wife, the Lady of Casterly Rock, the first lady of House Lannister, and I’m bearing the future heir to Casterly Rock. For most of these people outside, I am Sansa Lannister, Brienne. They won’t listen to me because I’m he daughter of Eddard Stark, especially not when they believe Rickon could still be alive.”

Brienne looked down, realizing something now. She stared again at Sansa. “You could tell them to leave. No matter what the lords of the North think of you, you are their lady to them all, and all the North belongs to you. You could order the Knights of the Vale to leave.”

“I could, but what reason will I give? That I don’t want their help to get back Winterfell, when they traveled all this way? And I’m quite sure Littlefinger will find a way to keep the Knights of the Vale here.”

“Maybe we could talk with Harrold Arryn. I don’t like him, but he doesn’t seem fond of Baelish. He didn’t introduce him, like you said. Maybe if you tell him about his betrayal of your lord father, after all you told me he said he admired him…”

“No, Brienne. I can’t take that risk,” Sansa cut her. “We must get rid of Baelish, but for now we can’t. I can’t rely on Harrold Arryn. He could be a creature of Littlefinger, just like Ser Dontos. It’s possible he left him in the shadows so he wouldn’t be noticed. Littlefinger always proceeds this way. He stays in the dark. We can hardly retrace everything to him.”

“What do we do, then?”

“We find a way to get rid of Littlefinger without having the Knights of the Vale against us.”

“How?”

A knock on the door interrupted them. Willia announced Lord Baelish. Brienne looked at Sansa, her hand on the pommel of her sword.

“Let Lord Baelish come in, Willia,” Sansa replied.

The former Master of Coin entered in Sansa’s personal room. Brienne still had her hand ready to unsheathe her sword. He acted as if nothing was amiss and that he and Sansa met in the most normal circumstances.

“My lady, to see you after so much time is a blessing,” he said.

Sansa forced a smile upon her face. “Lord Baelish. I’m glad to see you again. There are few left in the world that I can call friends.”

Brienne looked at her, astonished. “You flatter me, my lady.”

Littlefinger cast a look at Brienne, then at Sansa. He wanted them to be alone. Sansa looked at Brienne.

“You may leave us, Brienne. I doubt Lord Baelish will try to kill me with a dagger hidden in his breeches.”

Littlefinger sniggered at the jape. It was half a jape, because it was true. Sansa knew that Baelish was dangerous, but he wouldn’t try to kill her here, and even less by himself. That wasn’t his way of doing things. He always let the others do his dirty work. Sansa made Brienne understand that with her eyes, and Brienne finally accepted to leave, not without casting a threatening look to the former acting Lord of the Eyrie.

Once she was outside, Littlefinger took a seat near the table where Sansa ate most of the time. However, he didn’t sit at the table. He brought the chair close to her, face to face, and sat. Sansa didn’t like the way he looked at her. Men only want one thing from a pretty girl. Now she thought she understood what Shae meant.

“Please forgive Brienne. She’s only trying to protect me,” said Sansa, trying to end the heavy silence that lingered.

“There’s no offense. I understand your need for someone to protect you. Though I wouldn’t have chosen Brienne of Tarth for this.”

“She served my mother before,” Sansa pointed.

“Until she helped Ser Jaime Lannister to escape, which deprived your brother from his only mean to get you back.” He took her right hand in his own. “I’m really sorry about them. What happened at the Twins… is unforgiveable.”

Indeed, it is unforgiveable. As is your part in my father’s execution, and your attempt to sell Arya like cattle to Roose Bolton. “Thank you, Lord Baelish.” His hands were cold.

“And I can’t imagine what an ordeal it has been to be married to a man whose family participated to the murders of your brother and your mother. I can’t begin to imagine how Cat would feel about that.”

Sansa slowly removed her hand from Littlefinger’s, trying to not do it too quickly. “It could have been worse. I could have married Joffrey.”

He smiled. “Indeed. In normal circumstances, I believe congratulations would be in order, but I’m not entirely sure on this one.” He was looking down at her belly.

“That’s alright. Lord Tyrion was quite kind with me. He didn’t force himself upon me.”

Lord Baelish had a queer and curious expression. “Does that mean the child…?”

“No, he’s his. I gave in at the end. I didn’t see the point of remaining a maid forever. And he was kind. He never mistreated me. I suppose I was married to the most decent Lannister I could hope for.”

Lord Baelish’s face was still smiling, but his eyes had grown cold, even furious. “I suppose you were lucky in some way. And your child will be the future Lord of Casterly Rock and Winterfell I presume.”

“For the time being,” Sansa confirmed.

His smile widened once more. “I shall be careful with that guard you’ve got, still. Lady Brienne of Tarth was kingsguard to Renly Baratheon.”

“I know it.”

“And do you know she killed him?”

“I don’t think so. My mother was in his tent when Lord Renly died, and I doubt she would have fled with Lady Brienne is she was an assassin.”

“I was in the camp when the accident happened. From what I gathered, your mother left the tent not long before Renly Baratheon was killed. Lady Brienne was alone with him when he died. I suppose Cat never knew who actually killed him. She was suspected of his murder, and escaped with the first person she crossed who could help her to get outside this camp.”

He lied very well. Sansa wanted to shout at him, and accuse him of all the tragedies that had befallen to her family during these past years, and to call Brienne immediately to kill him, but she didn’t. She had to play the game, just like he did. Margaery was capable of manipulating Joffrey, so surely there was a way to manipulate Littlefinger.

“I didn’t know.” She feigned ignorance.

“I wouldn’t keep her so close of me if I were you.”

“I will look into this, but I don’t believe Tyrion would allow me to send her away.”

“A pity. The Imp seems to impose you a few things that are not to your taste.”

“He’s my husband, and the only protection I have now.”
“Do you think he will still protect you once he’s got all the children he needs from you?”

“I highly doubt he would kill me.”

“Do you really know who the Imp is?”

“I know that he’s been kind to me, and that he treated me better than everyone else in King’s Landing.”

“I don’t doubt it. That’s the same he did the first time he was married.” A silence followed. Sansa didn’t answer. How could he know? “You didn’t know it, didn’t you? You’re not the first wife of Tyrion Lannister.”

He thought she didn’t know. Better to encourage him in this way. “I didn’t know.”

“Well, he did have one. She was about your age, from what I know, quite pretty, but not highborn at all. He remained with her for two weeks. And when he grew bored with her, he made a gift of her to his father’s guardsmen. He might do the same to you, in time.”

He had a sorry and concerned look on his face, but again his eyes didn’t follow. Sansa wanted to slap him in the face just like she did for Black Walder at Riverrun, but she stopped herself from doing so. He was lying outrageously. She would have him dead. Later.

“I didn’t know.” Her voice was trembling. She hoped he would mistake it for fear, or that he would think she was angry at her husband, which wasn’t the case. She knew Tyrion would never do something like that. Littlefinger had lied to her, to her mother, to her father, to everyone. She knew the real story, and Littlefinger wouldn’t fool her again.

“Well, now you do. Do you think you’re that lucky with the Imp?”

“No.” That was all she could reply. He took her hand in his once more. She wanted to snatch it away, but she didn’t.

“I hope you know that I’m your friend, Sansa. Your true friend.”

“I do, Lord Baelish.” She tried to look as sincere as she was two years ago, back when she refused to follow him when he left King’s Landing. She regretted it later, when it was decided she would marry Tyrion, but now she thought it was probably the best decision she ever took before her family died.

“Then believe me when I tell you that I want to help you.”

“I believe you, of course.”

“Then listen to me. I know that you don’t like Harrold Arryn. It is quite obvious from the way you received him today.”

“No, I don’t like him. He reminds too much of Joffrey. He’s arrogant just like him.”

“I understand. Joffrey had you beaten and worse, and it’s understandable that you don’t like anything that looks like him in any way.” Yes, Joffrey had me beaten, and it was Tyrion who saved me, not you. He was my true friend in King’s Landing, and now he’s my husband, and I’m carrying his child. Our child. “But you have to understand that when he visited Casterly Rock for your tourney, Harrold was smitten by you. I am still one of his advisers. He was still a ward to Lady Waynwood until recently, and she says all he could talk about after he visited the Rock was you. You were the first woman to really reject him, and he won’t stop following you. He will do everything for you. If you want to escape the Imp, then he is your best chance. Once he wants something, he doesn’t give up until he gets it. Make of him your ally, and you will be able to escape the Lannisters.”

Sansa thought she ought to look uncertain. “Are you sure?”

“I am sure. Harrold Arryn will do everything for you.”

“But won’t he want me to marry him after I’m free?”

“He already wants to marry you. He has quite a lot of success with women. He already had two bastards, but you’re not of the ordinary sort. You are the daughter of Eddard Stark. He won’t want you for a single night. He wants you as his wife.”

“But I already have a child.”

“He won’t care about that. I think it might even make you more attractive in his eyes. You are a lady in distress who he can help. Ask him to help you, to do anything, and he will do it.”

That looked like a knight from the stories Sansa loved a long time ago. But that was a long time ago.

“I will try.”

“Good.” He let go her hand. “We will see each other at the feast tonight. Make sure to be at your best. Make him fall in love with you even more than he already is. I wish you well.”

Littlefinger left on this. Sansa sighed when the door closed. She wanted so much to kill him. She needed to be patient. She would have him killed, when the time would be right.

Brienne entered the room. “Are you all right, my lady?” she asked.

“I am.”

“Did he do anything to you? What did he tell you?”

Sansa smiled wickedly. “Something that gave me the way to kill him.”

Sansa had Willia prepare her for the feast. She wouldn’t miss it like the one for Ser Wylis’s return. She put on a gorgeous blue gown and had her hair well braided. She also put a few jewels, though not as much as she usually had in Casterly Rock. She couldn’t look too much like the Lady of the Westerlands. She ordered Brienne to keep an eye on her from afar for all the evening, and agreed with her on a course of action.

The feast was refined, with refined music, refined dance and refined food like always. To Sansa, it looked quite casual now, after all her time in King’s Landing and Casterly Rock. She had other concerns. She could feel the gaze of Harrold Arryn on her. She wished he could be away. He was already insufferable back when they met at Casterly Rock, and now was no different. Sansa ignored him and focused on her food. Anyway, according to Lord Baelish, the more she remained indifferent to Harrold Arryn, the more he would be following her everywhere. Though, she couldn’t be sure she could believe what this man said. After all, he lied to her more than often. He may have lied about it as well. Either way, Sansa gave no attention to the Lord of the Eyrie.

Still, he came to her on the dais and bowed deeply. “My lady.”

“Lord Arryn. I hope you’ll forgive the way I welcomed you. You understand, women in my condition have a sensible mood and our last meeting didn’t go very well,” Sansa said.
“No, indeed. That’s why I came to you. I wanted to apologize for what happened the last time, at Casterly Rock.”

“A wise man once said that only great men admitted their mistakes.”

“Well, I agree with him.” He looked as arrogant as he always was. He was too much like Ser Loras.

“Let us put our differences aside. You came to help my family. I appreciate that.”

“I came here to help you, my lady.” The little girl she once was would have been touched. The woman she became wasn’t.

“I thank you, Lord Arryn.”

“I would gladly invite you to dance.”

“I’m afraid I can’t, in my condition.”

He laughed. “No. It’s a shame. I would like to know if I could see you later. Speak to you more… privately.”

She didn’t like the sound of it. She would have to be careful. She smiled sweetly. “As you wish. Come to see me in the godswood in the evening. I always go there to pray before I go to bed.”

“I’ll see you there, my lady.”

He had a large grin as he turned around. Sansa would make sure he wouldn’t try anything. Brienne and a few hidden men should be enough to keep her safe. The lords of the Vale who were present came to see her as well. Lady Waynwood was quite kind, and defended her liege lord, who was her ward until very recently. Lord Vance Corbray was brief in his salutations. Lord Belmore assured her they would free her sister. Lord Royce was the one to speak the most at length with her after Lady Waynwood. He spoke a lot about her father, how they used to hunt with Robert Baratheon when he lived at the Eyrie. Before he left however, he gave her a warning.

“Be careful around Lord Baelish, my lady. He is not to be trusted. He had a very inappropriate and harmful influence on our lord Robin Arryn, and I fear he is too close to Lord Arryn now. Lord Harrold listens to him too much. He…” He opened his mouth to say something, but he didn’t. “Don’t trust him. Never trust him.”

That, Sansa already knew it. However, Lord Royce just gave her more proof that Harrold Arryn may be Littlefinger’s toy. She could be sure now that he wasn’t to be trusted. Sansa sent Brienne off the hall before she left herself the feast, giving her specific orders to position men in key positions inside the godswood. Later, after she had gone back to her chambers and put on a warm cloak for the cold temperature outside, Sansa went to the godswood with Willia. She left her handmaiden at the entrance. She wasn’t supposed to be with anyone when Lord Arryn would come.

She knelt before the tree. New Castle’s godswood wasn’t much used. Most of the people in White Harbor worshiped the Seven. She was all alone, except for her men hidden in bushes and behind trees. She closed her eyes and prayed. She prayed every day for her child, and for all those she loved who were far away. Tyrion. Arya. Jon. Edmure. Ser Brynden. Mira. Cerenna. Dorna. Joy. Myrielle. Janei. Margaery. She prayed a lot. She didn’t have much else to do. What was left of her family was in danger, fighting or about to fight Ramsay. Dorna and Janei had lost a husband and a father. Ser Kevan had been the first one to tell her she had to take care of Tyrion. How many people still had to die before it was all over, if all this ever came to an end? Would the bloodshed ever end?
She heard a branch crack. She opened her eyes and turned to see the source of the noise. The Warden of the East was there. “Please excuse me, my lady. I just thought… You are beautiful like this. I couldn’t stop myself from admiring you.”

Who did he think she was? Probably a shy maid. “I’m sure there are many other things of interest you could look at.”

He laughed shortly. “Not when you’re around.” He really started to get on her nerves. She was a married woman, and she was carrying a child.

“You wanted to talk with me alone?” she asked, focusing the topic of discussion about the matter at hand.

“I did, though I wonder why you brought me here, in a such a deserted place.”

“I was praying.”

“Sometimes I forget that you are from the North.”

“You have quite a lot of nerves, to say that to the Wardeness of the North, Lord Arryn. Especially when you are in her kingdom. I could order my men to throw you into the sea and let you swim all the way back to Gulltown.”

She let a smile appear on her lips. He laughed. “I’ll have to get used to this sharp tongue of yours, Lady Sansa.”

If he wasn’t more careful with what he said, she might really order her men to throw him into the sea, and right away. “What did you want to tell me?”

He approached her. “Only that, back in Casterly Rock, I meant what I told you. I really meant it when I said I would do everything to help you. The Vale should have helped your family during the war, and we didn’t. I intend to correct this. If you ever need my help in anything, I’m here for you, Lady Sansa.”

He really saw himself like a knight in shining armor. “Thank you, Lord Arryn.”

“I will give you back your home, my lady. You can rely on me.” He was getting closer. Sansa didn’t feel comfortable about it.

“My sister and my little brother are at Winterfell,” she said, making her voice weak.

“I will free them. I promise you.” He stepped forward again. Could he stop coming closer? Sansa doubted that a man who was Baelish’s creature could be trusted. She walked away a little, taking a pained expression.

“Each day Arya and Rickon spend at Winterfell is a day they suffer in the hands of a monster.” Sansa couldn’t be sure Rickon truly lived, and she didn’t want him to be alive if he was to be… She couldn’t imagine the things Ramsay may be doing to him if he really was alive. Tears that were not entirely false ran down on her cheeks. “The more time your men spend here, the more my little sister and my little brother will suffer.”

A silence followed. “Of course. We will head north to Winterfell as quickly as possible, and we will free Lady Arya and Lord Rickon.”

“You must bring all your men with you.” Sansa turned again to face him. “Absolutely all of them.
Don’t leave any of them behind. I must be sure they will be freed.”

“Don’t worry, we will release them.”

Again, he was closing on her. “Bring all your men. Promise me.”

“I promise, my lady. You have my word.”

He put a hand on hers. At least they were not as cold as Littlefinger’s, but they couldn’t reassure Sansa like Tyrion’s hands could. She remembered the first time he took her hand, in the Great Hall, after she was stripped naked and beaten by Ser Meryn Trant. It was Tyrion who saved her back then, and Sandor Clegane who wrapped her in his cloak to cover her. It wasn’t a knight, and even less Petyr Baelish, who saved her that day. She wanted to jerk away, but she didn’t. She needed one last thing.

“I would have one thing to ask you, Lord Arryn.”

“You may ask anything you want, my lady.” He looked intensively at her.

“I know Lord Baelish is one of your advisors, but back in King’s Landing he was the only true friend I had. I cried when he left for the Vale. Couldn’t you could make him stay in White Harbor once you’ve left? I would feel much safer if he was close.”

“Of course, that won’t be a problem. I need to leave someone behind to represent me before Lord Manderly, anyway. I will order Lord Baelish to stay here with you. I could also leave you some of my men to protect you.”

“No, thank you. I have my own men. My granduncle, Ser Brynden, gave me some of his own to ensure my safety. I would feel much better if your men were put to good use in saving Arya.”

“As you wish, my lady.” He kissed her hand. “Is there anything else you require of me?”

“No. Thank you, Lord Arryn. I will go back to my rooms now. I feel very tired.”

“Let me accompany you back there.”

Sansa decided to not object. She couldn’t really refuse. She had no guard to escort her, at least not visibly, and only a handmaiden at the entrance of the godswood. Lord Arryn walked quite close to her all the time. She longed for her rooms where she would be separated from him. Still, she used this walk to get more information about the forces he brought. He had ten thousand men. They would all be here within a few days, then they would all leave for Winterfell. She grabbed some information about the other lords of the Vale, and managed to know some which were at odds with Littlefinger, and others who were better disposed towards him. She even managed to learn how many men would stay behind as a guard of honor for Lord Baelish.

They finally arrived to her rooms, and Sansa got rid of the Lord of the Eyrie, not without another kiss on her hand. Inside her rooms, she sighed in relief as Willia prepared her for the night. Her child kept moving. When Willia was away, she sang another lullaby, and he stopped kicking her as she laid in her bed. She wished Tyrion was there to help her, but he was miles away, fighting to give her back her home. She would have to deal with Littlefinger on her own. She hoped the Knights of the Vale would leave very soon. Only Baelish would remain behind. A mockingbird, all alone among Northerners. Sansa was eager for this to happen. As she fell asleep, she dreamed of Tyrion.
Sansa is playing the game of thrones.

Please review

Next chapter: Margaery
Chapter Notes

We get to see how Margaery reacts to Cersei’s actions. Don’t expect her to be happy.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

MARGAERY VII

“She should have left weeks ago. You were supposed to send her back to Stokeworth!” Margaery shouted. She never yelled to her husband, but now her patience was at an end.

“I wanted to send her away…”

“But you didn’t. Why? Why are you keeping her here?”

“She’s my mother,” he answered weakly. That didn’t calm Margaery.

“Her place is not here. She tried to kill your uncle, Tommen, her own brother, and still you’re keeping her here. Her place is no longer at court. Your cousin Lancel even said she had your father assassinated. I was there. I heard him. You want to keep the woman who murdered your father, tried to assassinate your uncle, and let Joffrey mistreat you and your sister, close to you?”

“No, I don’t.”

“Then it’s time for her to leave.”

“Yes, you’re right.” He didn’t look convinced. “I’ll go and tell her. She leaves on the morning.”

“No. Every time you went to tell her to leave, you allowed her to stay in the end. It’s time you take decisions, Tommen. Cersei Lannister is leaving, and is never to come back to King’s Landing under any circumstance.”

“No. She will never come back.” He tried to look sure. He tried.

“I’ll break the news to her. In the meantime, you stay here.”

Margaery left on these words. For the first time, she really got angry with Tommen and forced him to do as she said. That wasn’t her usual way, but she was fed up with Tommen’s inability to rule. Her grandmother had been right. She would have been better off with Lord Tyrion. Tommen couldn’t even get a child in her. Margaery was almost jealous of her friend. Sansa was pregnant, on her way to have two kingdoms, and she was about to be reunited with her sister, and maybe her half-brother too. Margaery, on her side, was still waiting for Tommen’s seed to quicken and produce an heir, and had her brother imprisoned.

It had been a shock for everyone. Last week, the Sparrows had taken the Great Sept of Baelor in the favor of the night. Before reports reached the Red Keep of this event, a group of Sparrows had erupted into Maegor’s Holdfast and taken away her brother. No one knew how they entered, nor how they left. All entrances to the Red Keep were guarded, and no one allowed any Sparrow to enter, nor let any leave. None was seen in the corridors. That made no sense. Margaery had guards at the doors of the royal apartments day and night, and kingsguard followed her and Tommen everywhere. She didn’t feel safe inside the Red Keep anymore. Ser Kevan and the Grand Maester assassinated, her brother kidnapped in the light of day, and no one saw anything. Could it be Varys? It was said there were secret passages all over the Red Keep, and that the Spider knew them better than anyone. Was it his doing? But why? What interest would he have in doing so? Margaery had no idea what were the eunuch’s motives. Of course, there was another logical explanation. Varys was working for Cersei, and he was the one who assassinated Pycelle and Kevan and who helped the Sparrows to kidnap Loras. But then, why would Nymeria Sand disappear? Maybe there was no link. However, Margaery had less difficulty than ever to imagine Cersei killing her uncle. Ser Kevan had been Margaery’s ally, and he turned against Cersei at Lord Tyrion’s trial. His death allowed her to stay in the capital and now, Loras was arrested by fanatics inside the Red Keep, no one knowing how they got inside or how they left. This stank of Cersei Lannister more than sheep shift hidden inside a mattress, like Sansa used to say.

Tommen had failed to free Margaery’s brother. He had tried to speak with the High Sparrow several times, only to see his path blocked on the way to the Great Sept of Baelor. Every time, the new High Septon said he was praying. Because the High Sparrow was now the High Septon. Tommen made him High Septon instead of Sorold by royal decree.

When Sorold came to them with the decree, escorted and watched by a dozen of Sparrows, Tommen had been speechless. He didn’t remember signing anything like that. Margaery thought she knew what happened. Tommen never read the decrees he signed. Cersei had certainly put this one among the others he signed one day, then found a way to give it to the High Sparrow. As a result, the High Sparrow was now High Septon, Sorold was kept into custody into the Great Sept, Loras was imprisoned somewhere there as well, and an army of Sparrows, now called the Faith Militia, ran all over the city, smashing barrels of ale, ransacking brothels, assaulting merchants selling religious objects from other devotions, forcing so-called sinners to make walks of shame. Margaery should have taken matters into hand and forced Cersei out of the city immediately after Lord Tarly left. No, she should have forced her to leave much before, right after Ser Kevan was killed. She wouldn’t make the same mistake twice. Cersei Lannister would never come back to King’s Landing.

Margaery walked decisively to the wing of the Red Keep where the apartments of the Queen Mother were located. Her handmaiden told her she asked for the vintage of Arbor Gold the morning Loras was arrested. Doubts may be left about Cersei’s participation to her uncle’s death, but Margaery had none when it came to her brother’s current predicament. She was afraid for him, afraid and terrified. What were they doing to him right now? There were already rumors circulating that the Faith Militia killed men surprised into inappropriate coupling into brothels. What had happened to Loras? What would they do to her little brother?

Two men in Lannister armors were standing guard before the doors that gave access to the Dowager Queen. Margaery had six men of her own and kingsguards. She didn’t want to take any chance. Who knew what Cersei was capable of?

“I wish to speak with the Queen Mother,” Margaery said to the men.

One of them went into the room and came back immediately. “The queen doesn’t wish to be disturbed. She’s resting.”

Did she take Margaery for her son trying to talk with the High Sparrow? “I’m afraid I’ll have to disturb her all the same.” She proceeded to walk, and one of the men got in her way. “You’re blocking the passage to your queen, ser.”
After some hesitation and the look at the eight men behind Margaery, the man stepped aside and let her go in. Margaery’s mother-in-law was sitting in her chair, looking at the wall.

“I said I wanted no visitor,” she said.

“To the opposite of you, your men seem to understand who is the queen,” Margaery harshly retorted. Cersei didn’t like the remark. “It’s not because you’re married to my son…”

“I didn’t come here to listen to you, Cersei. I came here to tell you that you’re leaving.”

Cersei smiled. “I’m not leaving.” She took a glass of wine on her table and drank some of it.

“You are leaving. There’s a litter waiting for you before the Red Keep. You’ll have a carriage to bring you back to Stokeworth once you’ve got through the Iron Gate. I made sure you had everything necessary for the road. Your luggage will be sent to you while you’re riding for the castle. You will have guards and servants…”

“I’m not leaving,” Cersei said. Margaery expected this reaction.

“Yes, you are,” she said loudly. Her men came into the room.

“You think you can threaten me?”

“I think it, because it is true.” Two of her men went on both Cersei’s sides. “You can either follow them willingly to your litter, or shout, yell and fight all the way long, and lose what little dignity you still have.”

“You have no right to threaten me. I am the queen. The fact that you’re married to my son…”

“You are not the queen, Cersei, because you’re not married to the king. I do appreciate these things can get a bit confusing in your family.” Cersei was fuming. “I am the queen, Cersei. To misquote Lord Tarly, your time as queen is over. Go to Stokeworth, and never come back. Try to find some solace in the fact that you could have ended beheaded for your crimes against the king and Lord Tyrion.”

Her men took Cersei’s arms. She threw the arms away, but didn’t try to escape. Instead, she looked at Margaery with more anger and fury than ever. “You won’t get away with this. I will not let you take my son away from me. You will pay for this.”

Margaery smiled. “I’m not taking your son away from you. You’re the one who pushed your son into my arms. You will never see him again. The Lannisters are not the only ones to pay their debts, Cersei, and the Northerners are not the only ones to remember. I will never forget what you did. Make sure you never find yourself again in my presence, because the next time I see you, I will be without pity.”

On that, Margaery left. Her men made sure Cersei left. From the battlements, she saw Cersei get into the litter and leave the Red Keep, escorted by some of Margaery’s guards along with her own. She didn’t struggle, which was a good thing. The last thing Margaery needed was a scene from the Dowager Queen before she left. At least, she was rid of Cersei. She would never allow her to come back to King’s Landing.

Later, in the night, Margaery was lying down on her stomach. She and Tommen had done their marital duty, though Tommen did it without enthusiasm. Margaery was beginning to feel tired of trying to excite him, and to look excited herself. Loras was still in danger. After Cersei left in the morning, Tommen had gone to see the High Sparrow again. Finally, the new High Septon had called for an inquest on Loras. It wasn’t a trial, as he said, and once it was proved that the accusations against Loras were false, he would be released. He had allowed Margaery and Tommen to assist it, and with the kingsguards present as a sign of goodwill, even though swords were forbidden inside the Great Sept of Baelor. He would make an exception for them. Margaery didn’t trust the High Sparrow, but it was their only chance to save Loras. They had to be present, to make sure this was a real hearing and not a show like the one Cersei tried to make at her brother’s trial. They had to save Loras. Anyway, she doubted the High Sparrow would dare anything against her and Tommen. If anything happened to them, all the forces of the Reach, the Westerlands and the Stormlands would march on King’s Landing immediately to free them, and the High Sparrow would be lost.

Margaery was eager to free her brother. Once he was safe, they could deal with the Sparrows. They didn’t have enough men right now, but she sent a raven to Highgarden to tell her uncle Garth to bring reinforcements from the Reach in King’s Landing when he would come to take his position as Master of Whisperers. Then they would have enough men with the City Watch to hunt down the Sparrows and restore Sorold as High Septon. That would cause some problem, since Tommen issued a decree for the Sparrows, but they could still turn it down with another decree. Nothing stopped a king from cancelling a former decree by issuing a new one. They would have to use force against the Sparrows. They were armed now, and their numbers were growing. All the work Ser Kevan, Margaery and Lord Tarly did to neutralize the Sparrows had been for naught. Cersei had all destroyed it within a fortnight. This time, they would have to make sure they captured and killed the High Sparrow when everything would be over.

On the morning, Sera prepared her for the inquiry. She wore a yellow cream gown, with earrings and a necklace with blue pearls. She would see her brother soon.

“Do you want to let two strands fall before your shoulders, my lady?” her handmaiden asked.

“Yes. Yes, let’s do it.” Margaery only half-listened.

“Are you worried, my lady?”

“Yes, I am. I’m worried for Loras. They accuse him of all sorts of crimes. We can’t be sure with the Sparrows. They are fanatics. Who knows what they could do? We thought we dealt with them, but we only needed Cersei to make Tommen sign a piece of paper to see them back, more dangerous than ever.”

“Perhaps you shouldn’t go, my lady. It may be dangerous.”

“No. I must go. Loras needs me. If I’m there, I can have him released. Anyway, we’ll have the kingsguards with us. The Sparrows won’t dare to assault me or Tommen with them at our side. They would lose all support and the whole might of the Reach would march against them.”

“If you say so, my lady.”

Margaery looked at her reflection in the glass. “By the way, Sera, I wrote to Lord Tarwick. It seems he’s interested again.”

Sera stopped to brush her hair. “Really?” Hope was visible both in her voice and on her face.

“Yes. It seems he recovered from your time in prison. He’s open to discussion once more.”

Sera’s smile was wider than all those Margaery ever saw on her face. “My lady… I don’t know what to say.”
“Don’t thank me yet. He only agreed to discuss, not to marry you, but I think I’ll be able to bring him around. I’m the queen, after all. It’s difficult to refuse something to a queen.”

Sera resumed to brush her hair. Her hands were trembling with excitement, which made her work clumsy. “I can’t wait to see him again.”

“You won’t have any reason to be jealous of Mira anymore.”

“No indeed. I wonder where she is right now.”

“She may be riding with her husband’s army to Winterfell, or at White Harbor, with Sansa. You know she’s pregnant? Sansa, not Mira.”

“Yes, I know. I wonder when Mira will be with child.”

Margaery made a sound with her mouth that was close to a muffled laugh. “How strange. Sansa got married with a dwarf, while Mira and I are married to normal men, and yet Sansa is the first one to get pregnant.”

Sera kept brushing her hair with more tact than before. After a moment, she asked something. “My lady, when was your last moonblood?”

Margaery thought about it. “Last month.”

“Aren’t you a few days past? I think you are.”

Margaery shrugged. “Maybe. I’m sure I’ll bleed soon. Tommen doesn’t seem very good at making children. Let’s wait before we jump to conclusions.”

That would be indeed a miracle if she discovered that she was pregnant the day Loras was freed. The gods would really have a strange sense of humor then. Sera finished to brush Margaery’s hair and placed the necklace around her throat. With uncertainty, she left her rooms and joined Tommen.

The way to the Great Sept of Baelor was eventless. She and Tommen shared the same litter. They didn’t talk much. Tommen was trying to reassure her, saying nothing would happen to her brother, but Margaery was afraid. Tommen wasn’t the best person to reassure. He was good with cats, but not with humans. All along the way, she saw Sparrows through the shutters, and people crying at her, praying for her brother’s salvation. She saw a Sparrow hit a person who yelled the gods would save Ser Loras Tyrell from the unfaithful. She didn’t know if the Sparrow beat the man for his words, or because of the glass of ale he had in his hand as he said it. Margaery couldn’t intervene on that.

When they arrived before the Great Sept, a small crowd had gathered. They were praying for her brother. Margaery was quite touched by it. The people didn’t abandon her. The help she provided them bore fruits. They offered good wishes and prayers when Margaery left the litter with Tommen. They had brought about twenty guards with them, but only the kingsguards were allowed to follow them inside. Margaery noticed the great numbers of men with the seven-pointed star carved on their forehead on the steps leading to the Great Sept as they climbed. There were so many. The new High Septon hadn’t lost time to recruit for the Faith Militia. If they ever wanted to kill them or keep them in detention, Margaery, Tommen and her kingsguards wouldn’t stand a chance.

They were introduced in a small room. It was obviously meant to pray more than to make inquiries, but in a chair sat her brother. She restrained herself and only hugged him briefly. He was all covered with filth, his hair unwashed, a beard growing, his clothes dirty.
“Glad to see you, sister,” he said. He looked tired.

“Did they mistreat you?” She tried to see any trace of bruises or cuts on his face or anywhere else on him.

“No. They only let me rot in a cell with only bread to eat and water to drink.”

“Most of the people must content themselves only with that every day.” The High Sparrow was old, and in a much worse state than Loras. He had no shoes. Margaery may have mistaken him for a beggar under other circumstances. “We shall begin. Take place.”

Margaery sat down with Loras on her right while Tommen took place on her left. The six kingsguards (Ser Jaime was with Lord Tarly’s army) stood behind them. If the High Sparrow feared them, he showed no sign of it. There were a few Sparrows in the rooms, all armed, but without armor. A scribe was taking note of everything that was said at a desk.

“This is not a trial. We are only leading an inquiry to see if there is any need for a trial,” said the old man. “If we find out that the suspicions cast upon Ser Loras of House Tyrell were unfounded, he will be free. If we find out that some facts are true, he will face a trial before seven septons. We all hope it won’t come to that. May the Father judge us justly, and may the Crone gives us wisdom.” He cleared his throat. “Ser Loras Tyrell is charged with fornication, buggery, and blasphemy. We call him forward to answer to these charges.”

Her brother walked to the chair where the witness was to take place. He seemed to have some difficulty to walk. “What do you have to say about the charges against you?” asked the High Sparrow.

“They are lies. I don’t know where they come from, but they are false,” her brother answered.

“You are aware of the rumors concerning you and Renly Baratheon?”

“I don’t pay attention to rumors.”

“You were said to be despondent when he died. Witnesses state that you refused to leave his bedside, even as Stannis’s army closed in.”

“He was my friend. He was my king.”

“Wasn’t Joffrey your king? He was anointed by the Seven, not Renly.” Loras just made a mistake, but he tried to catch it back.

“I was wrong to support Renly’s claim, I know that. But I was forgiven by Joffrey. I fought for him at the Battle of Blackwater.”

“Yes, wearing Renly’s armor.” It wasn’t difficult to know what the High Sparrow implied.

“Why does it matter what I wore?”

“Of course, I deny them.” Loras said it as if it was an evidence. Anyone with some brain would know that Loras would never confess such allegations, even if they knew they were true.

“You never lay with Renly Baratheon?”

“Never.”
“Nor any other man?”

“Never.”

“That will be all, Ser Loras.”

Loras left the seat of the witness and came to Margaery’s right, still displaying some hardship to walk. “I believe we have everything we need. My brother is innocent,” stated Margaery. She began to rise.

“The Faith calls Queen Margaery forward.”

“You call me forward?” she asked him, unbelieving.

“Yes, we have some questions for you.”

“I am the queen,” Margaery reminded him.

“You are. And according to the law of the Seven, neither kings nor queens are exempt from testimony at a holy inquest.”

He sounded very serious. Who did he think he was? Margaery sighed. “As you wish, but that won’t make any difference on the outcome of the inquest.”

“The gods will be the judges of that.” Margaery took place on the seat Loras just left. “How do you respond to these charges against your brother?”

“They are lies.” How many times would they have to say it?

“All of them?”

“All of them,” she confirmed.

“Queen Margaery, in the presence of the gods, do you swear that your brother is innocent of these charges against him, to the best of your knowledge?”

“Yes, I swear it.”

“Thank you, your Grace.” He didn’t look happy.

“May I say something?”

“Of course, you can.”

“In the Seven-Pointed Star, each book of each god talks about love. The Book of the Father talks about the love of the family a father is in charge, the Book of the Mother talks about the love a woman feels for her children, the Book of the Maid talks about the love of man for woman and of woman for man…”

“We know that, your Grace.”

“The Book of the Warrior speaks about the love that links a knight to the lord he is sworn to, among other things. My brother squired for Renly Baratheon at Storm’s End when he was only twelve. They developed a powerful bond of respect and friendship, and love during this time. Not a carnal love, but a love that a lord feels for the people sworn to him, and that the people return to him. Loras knew Lord Renly for a very long time. He knew him even better than myself because of that long friendship. I barely knew Renly Baratheon before I married him. I wept for him, when he died. He was my husband, but Loras knew him better than everyone, and wept for the loss of his lord, not a lover. Loras rode with Renly’s armor in the Battle of Blackwater, but it was a trick, to create fear in the minds of Stannis’s men.”

“So you made everyone believe that Renly was back to life?”

“That’s the reaction the soldiers had in the heat of battle. Without that, Lord Stannis would have seized King’s Landing, the witch from Asshai he had at his side would have burned the Great Sept and all the other septs, and she would have made human sacrifices. My brother behaved heroically on that day. He saved the Faith. He fought for the Faith.”

The High Sparrow nodded. “Thank you, your Grace. We will take that into consideration.”

Margaery walked back to her seat. She was eager to leave this place. Before she could sit back, doors opened. When she looked at the people who came in, she realized she knew one of them. It was Olyvar. She saw him with Loras once, during the ceremony for Tommen’s coronation. The last time she heard of him, he was running the brothels of Lord Petyr Baelish. He took place. She looked at Loras. Fear was plain on his face. This was as Margaery feared.

“Do you know this man?” the old man asked him.

“Yes, very well,” he answered. “He is Ser Loras Tyrell, heir to Highgarden.”

“How did you come to meet him?”

“I squired for him. He took a liking to me. He summoned me to his chambers the first day we met.”

“And what occurred in his chamber?”

“We engaged in intimate relations.”

“You lay with him?” She didn’t know if that question was meant for her brother or for Olyvar. Margaery should have known that. The High Sparrow knew what he was doing. Maybe Cersei gave him information.

“That night and many others,” Olyvar confirmed.

“Liar. He’s a liar,” Loras yelled.

“Is there anyone else who can support your claim?”

“No. Not directly. But while I talked with Ser Loras, he confessed that he was Renly Baratheon’s lover, and that his sister knew. He said that Queen Margaery slept in a separate tent while he spent the night with her husband.”

“That’s enough. Are we supposed to listen to such lies?” Margaery said. “This man is a squire, but he doesn’t tell the whole truth.”

“Your Grace…” tried to intervene the High Sparrow.

“He is a prostitute. He runs the brothels of Petyr Baelish. Are we going to believe the word of that man over a knight who saved the city and the future Lord of Highgarden? He didn’t even swear that he was saying the truth.”

“I swear by the Seven that I’m telling the truth,” Olyar said.
“There was a prostitute at a trial, not long ago. She swore by all the gods, including the Seven, that she would tell the truth. The next day, a dozen people destroyed her testimony word by word, proving that her testimony was a pack of lies.”

“He has a birthmark, your Grace. Quite high on his thigh. Wine-colored and roughly the shape of Dorne.”

Loras jumped. “Liar! You’re a liar!” Two Sparrows seized him as he tried to assault Olyvar. Margaery watched, powerless, as they carried her brother away.

“Release him! Now!” she ordered.

“The Faith is satisfied there is enough evidence to bring a formal trial for Ser Loras, and Queen Margaery.”

“What?”

“Bearing false witness before the gods is as grave a sin as any, your Grace. Take her.”

A Sparrow grabbed her arm. She tried to jerk away, but another one seized her by the other arm, just like her brother. “This is an outrage. You’re going to arrest us on the word of a brothelkeeper. How dare you? I am your queen.” They kept bringing her away. “Tommen. No. Tommen!”

She looked desperately at her husband, who was looking everywhere, as if searching for someone to tell him what to do. The kingsguards had their hands on their pommels, but they did nothing. They received no order. The moment when Margaery needed Tommen, he failed her. He did nothing while she was dragged away. Like always, he did nothing.

Chapter End Notes

I know it may look like the Sparrows gained back power too quickly and easily, but there's an explanation to that. Cersei is not the only one to help the High Sparrow. All will be explained in the future chapters. Now we're back to the situation in the show at the end of Season 5.

Please review.

Next chapter: Jon
Jon VI

Chapter Notes

Jon sees someone he hasn't seen in a very long time.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

JON VI

The flap of the tent opened. Jon looked up to the intruder. All wrapped in furs, she looked quite beefy for a girl of her age, but Jon knew that they shouldn’t rely solely on appearances. Lyanna Mormont, daughter of Maege Mormont, Lady of Bear Island, wasn’t to be taken lightly. Her voice commanded respect in the war councils, even among the wildlings. Tormund once told him that whoever would try to kidnap her would have a very hard time. He also said that if he didn’t have a wife already and that she was older, he might have kidnapped her for himself. Jon didn’t think this would end well for Tormund.

“How may I help you, my lady?” he asked.

“We need to talk.” She sat without being invited. “We cannot trust the Lannisters.”

Straight to the point. Jon was still unused to her way of telling things without preamble or greetings or small talk. “My lady, we cannot fight…”

“I know. We cannot fight the Lannisters and the Boltons at the same time, and I’m aware of how dangerous the Blackfish and the Imp can be with a stronger army than ours. That doesn’t mean we should trust them.”

Jon sighed. Everyone in this camp hated the Lannisters, and for good reasons, except maybe the wildlings who never had to deal with them up to now. “Ser Brynden Tully is riding with them, and he always was loyal to my brother Robb. He wouldn’t ride with Tyrion Lannister if he didn’t trust him in some way.”

“Maybe not, but you seem to assume that he is trustworthy only because he saved you once at Castleblack. The Lannisters murdered your father, your brother and our king, his mother. They broke the guest rights, and gave the Riverlands to those who plotted this crime with them.”

“The Riverlands have been given back to the Tullys, by Lord Tyrion himself.”

“He was on the small council when the Red Wedding happened. Do you really think he took no part in it?”

She had a point that Jon couldn’t deny. “My sister Sansa trusts him.”

She looked at him with sorry eyes. “Your sister is a Lannister now, Jon Snow. We cannot trust her either.” She stood up. “Don’t believe the Imp will give up his claim on Winterfell when we free Rickon Stark.”
She left on these words, proud and fierce. Jon wondered if she inherited the wolf blood of his aunt with her name. He admired her in some way. He wished he could be proud like her, but after everything he had done, he couldn’t pretend being proud of anything.

They were barely a week of distance from Winterfell. They were so close. The Lannister army was certainly not far ahead. A scout had gone ahead as far as Winterfell itself. He spotted the banners of House Bolton along with those of House Karstark and House Umber. A part of the army was encamped before the walls. They estimated it to five thousand men at least. They are as many as we are. But while the Boltons and the Lannisters had organized and well equipped armies, the same couldn’t be said about the wildlings, or even the mountain clans. Ramsay’s men had faced battle against Stannis, while Jon’s never faced it for the most, or at least those from the houses who answered his call. Asher Forrester’s men were good at ambush and guerrilla, but not ranged battles. Fights took place each day. Their army was disorganized, and quarrelling. He could only hope the same held for their enemies. And Ser Davos and Lady Forrester hadn’t come back yet.

They needed the Lannisters and the Tullys. They had no choice. Still, even if Jon hated to admit it, Lady Mormont may not be entirely wrong. When they met years ago, Jon was a bastard and Tyrion Lannister was a dwarf. All dwarves are bastards in their father’s eyes, he told him back then. Before he left the Wall, he also told him something else that Jon would always remember. Not all bastards need to be dwarves. Well, they both went high. Jon became Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch, and Lord Tyrion was now Lord of Casterly Rock and Warden of the West. And yet, Jon had been killed, while Lord Tyrion had been accused by his own family of assassinating his father. For Jon, it had meant the end of his watch, but for Tyrion Lannister, it had led to his beginning as a powerful lord. Now they were half-brothers-in-law, and both marching on Winterfell. But what were the Imp’s motivations? Could he be after Winterfell for himself through Sansa? Jon knew that Sansa would never approved of that. Lord Tyrion didn’t strike him for a child’s killer. Lady Stark had arrested him, but he was released, cleared of his charges. And he treated Sansa well. No, he wouldn’t dare to kill Rickon, even if that meant he couldn’t have Winterfell. He gave back Riverrun to the Tullys, who were Lady Stark’s family. Why wouldn’t he give back Winterfell too? Jon would need a good discussion with Sansa when they would meet again. He wondered how she looked like now, and Arya and Rickon, and Bran if he was still alive north of the Wall. It had been so long since they were all together.

Thin snow was falling outside. No storm was coming for now but Jon didn’t want them to linger any longer. They had to reach Winterfell and take it as quickly as possible. They were in open field now, and not in forests any longer. They lost the advantage the mountain clans had when fighting in the woods. The Northerners could say they were used to winter, but it didn’t change the fact that many died during the harsh winters of the North. Snow and cold wouldn’t defeat them as easily as they defeated Stannis, but they could defeat them all the same, or at least weaken them, while the Bolton troops didn’t have to march every day and could still find shelter inside Winterfell, warm and well fed. Jon wondered if they would have enough provisions for winter when all of this would be over, if they lasted through winter.

Another intruder entered the tent. He was about the same age than Lyanna Mormont, but unlike her, he had the right to enter Jon’s tent without asking. Ryon was his squire after all.

“What is it, Ryon?” He smiled at the boy. He remembered him of Rickon, the brother he was trying to save. Jon envied Asher. He still had some of his family with him.

“A wildling said that Ser Davos is back.”

Finally. Jon raised and took his sword belt. “Let’s go greet them.”
He left the tent, Ryon on his heels. Jon had made him his squire only a few weeks ago. The boy wanted to learn how to fight and be a knight someday, and what better way for that than to make him squire. The idea had come to him during a conversation with Asher, and Ryon’s brother had immediately accepted.

Ser Davos arrived in the middle of the camp with the other men Jon sent with him, and two women. Jon was surprised. Gwyn Forrester was one of them, but he never saw the other one. Before she could dismount, he heard a cry next to him.

“Mira!” Ryon ran before him. The young woman dismounted just in time to receive him in her arms. What was going on? But Jon didn’t have time to ask himself more questions.

Ser Davos had dismounted as well, but another shape emerged from behind him. Jon wasn’t sure about what he saw first, but after a second he recognized her. She had grown up, she had her hair arranged differently, but it was her. The same grey eyes, the same brown hair, and she was as skinny as ever, but it was her. She slowly walked to him. Jon didn’t dare to move. Time seemed to slow down. How was it possible? Was he dreaming? How could she be there? He felt multiple gazes upon them. She stopped only one foot from him. Was she real? Was it really her? She smiled, and threw herself in his arms. Jon smiled as well and wrapped his arms around her too. She had to be real. He remembered the last time they hugged. It seemed like a lifetime ago. His little sister, Arya, was back.

Later, in Jon’s tent, Arya was swallowing heartily a bowl of hot stew. “Thank you.”

Jon smiled. He remembered how Arya used to eat everything presented before her with her hands, under the scandalized eyes of her mother, Sansa and her septa. She hadn’t changed in any way. She was still the little sister he knew at Winterfell.

“I hope you won’t throw food at me like you used to do with Sansa,” Jon said. They both giggled.

“I did it with Sansa because it was funny,” she replied.

“Wouldn’t it be funny with me too?” She looked at him for a time, then threw at him a spoon of her stew. New laughs followed as Jon tried to wash his face with his hands. “Glad to see you again, Arya.”

“I’m happy to see you too.” So much passed between their eyes. They had been two outcasts at Winterfell, the bastard and the girl who wanted to play with swords.

“I feared the worst for you. How did you escape Winterfell? Did you see Rickon there?”

Arya looked at him for a long time. She laid down her bowl. “I wasn’t at Winterfell, Jon. I was at Greywater Watch.”

“Greywater Watch?”

“Aye.” She told him everything from the day their father was arrested to her journey in the Neck. “I remained there for all this time. Lord Reed taught me how to fight like his men and I lived with him.”

“So Ramsay lied,” Jon realized. That letter was only a bait, to bring him to Winterfell.

“He may still have Rickon,” Arya specified.

“Aye, you’re right. He may have Rickon.” Their brother was probably still at Winterfell. Jon knew he could still be alive. What they heard told them that he was given to Ramsay by Jon Umber.
“The Imp says he doesn’t believe Rickon is alive.”

Jon came back to reality when Arya mentioned his friend. “You met Tyrion?”

“Aye. I rode with his army to Winterfell, and Lord Reed too.”

Lord Reed was with Lord Tyrion. That meant another house of the North had taken arms against the Boltons. “Who else is with him?”

“The Manderlys, the Hornwoods, the Cerwyns, the Blackfish… and Freys.”

She said the last word with obvious disgust. Jon shared it, but he supposed Tyrion Lannister knew what he was doing if Freys were following him. Jon was relieved for the most. “Well, we should have enough to take back Winterfell.”

“I think he wants Winterfell for himself, Jon. He says he doesn’t think that Rickon could be alive, and the Blackfish agrees with him. They say he was killed by Theon.”

Jon thought about it for some time. “What about Sansa? What does she think of it?”

Arya’s face turned sad, and disappointed. “She says she would rather believe that he’s dead.”

Jon was shocked. Rickon was their brother. How could Sansa give up on him so quickly? He could understand for Tyrion and the Blackfish, after all everyone believed Bran and Rickon were burned at Winterfell, but Sansa? Jon realized something. Sansa believed as well that Bran and Rickon died at Winterfell. She didn’t know that Bran had been seen at the Wall. Arya didn’t know it either.

“She doesn’t know,” said Jon. “That’s not her fault.”

“She’s giving up on him. She prefers to believe that he’s dead, only because she doesn’t want to imagine that he could be tortured. Just like she wanted to believe that Joffrey was her charming prince.”

“Arya, I know that Rickon didn’t die at Winterfell, but Sansa doesn’t.”

His sister looked at him with round eyes. “You know?”

“About two years ago, one of my sworn brothers at the Wall crossed Bran’s path at the Nightfort…”

“Bran is alive!?”

“Aye, he was. But he was going north of the Wall. Summer and Hodor were with him, and two other people, a girl and a boy. He didn’t remember their names, but their clothes were strange, and they were very small.”

A moment went on. “We should try to find him. If Bran is still alive…”

“How? By searching the whole territory beyond the Wall? We can’t find him Arya.” He looked down. “What are the chances of a cripple boy to survive so long north of the Wall?”

“You’re not giving up on him, you too?” She sounded angry.

“I’m not giving up on Bran, Arya, but we have to face the facts. We cannot rescue him. Not now. We have to take Winterfell. If Rickon is there, then we must save him at all cost. We cannot save Bran right now.”
She seemed to accept this logic. “Aye. We must save Rickon.”

They stayed silent for a time. “What about Sansa? How is she?”

He may have been closer to Arya than to Sansa, but both were his sisters. “She was well, the last time I saw her.”

Jon frowned. “The last time you saw her?”

“We met in the Neck when the Lannisters besieged Moat Cailin, but when it fell, we got separated. Sansa went to White Harbor.”

“White Harbor? Why would she go there?” Jon would have thought that Sansa would follow the Lannister army to Winterfell. After all, she was proclaimed Wardeness of the North. Wardens of the North were to lead the armies of the North, and even if Sansa was a woman, she ought to be present when the battle would take place.

Arya looked uncomfortable. “Sansa is pregnant.”

Jon looked at his little sister for some time, trying to catch the meaning of her words. Sansa was pregnant? Pregnant? “Sansa is… with child?”

“Aye.” She didn’t seem to know what to think of it, and Jon didn’t know what to think of it either. “She said she was six months into it when she left. That’s why she didn’t come with us.”

Of course, that explained it very well. If Sansa was bearing a child, she couldn’t follow an army on campaign. Still, for Jon, it seemed quite odd. Sansa was pregnant… from Tyrion Lannister. “Is that really the Imp who’s the father?” he finally asked.

“I think so.”

The idea of Sansa having a child with Lord Tyrion was troubling. Sansa… a mother. Tyrion Lannister being the father of her children. In other circumstances, he would have laughed out loud at the idea. Sansa, who dreamed of knights, handsome princes, married to a dwarf.

“I know it’s strange, but she loves him,” said Arya. Jon looked at her once more.

“She loves him?” he asked, bewildered.

“Aye.” Arya burst into laughs. Jon joined her after a moment. The situation looked so hilarious. Their sister Sansa, in love with Imp! They could have imagined everything, but this?

It was while they were trying to stop their uncontrollable laughing that Ser Davos and Lady Melisandre walked in. They looked puzzled by the sight of their commander laughing this way with his sister. The Red Woman looked particularly surprised by Arya’s appearance.

“Please forgive us to interrupt,” began the Onion Knight, “but I thought that I should…”

“YOU!”

The shout came from Arya. She seized the dagger Jon had at his belt. Instinctively, Jon grabbed her arm. After so much time spent with the Free Folk, he learnt to always be ready in case someone would try to steal his weapons. She struggled without success to escape his grip, shouting curses Jon thought impossible even for Arya. She seemed to be after the Lady Melisandre, and the Red Woman was looking at Arya with a mix of fascination and fear.
“Release me! I’m going to kill her!” Arya kept yelling.

“Calm down!” Jon almost pushed his sister against the table and placed himself between her and the Red Woman. “What’s going on?”

“It seems I was right after all. We were to meet again,” said the Red Priestess.

“Wait a second! You know each other?” asked Ser Davos.

“We met in the Riverlands, two years ago. She was with the Brotherhood Without Banners. That’s where I met Thoros of Myr, the priest who could bring a dead man back to life.”

“She took my friend Gendry. She’s a witch. What is she doing here? What did you do to Gendry?” asked Arya angrily. She and Melisandre were obviously not in good terms. What could have happened for that to happen? Arya wouldn’t hate someone without good reasons.

“Gendry Waters? You knew him?” asked her Ser Davos.

“He was my friend. What happened to him?”

“He’s alive, don’t worry, my lady. Or so I think. We cannot be sure. He left Dragonstone in a bark a long time ago. We don’t know of his whereabouts after that, but as far as I know, he’s alive.”

Jon looked at Melisandre. Arya had told him about the two boys she travelled with while she was in the Riverlands. Gendry was one of them. “Tell me what happened.”

Melisandre looked back at Jon. “After the Battle of Blackwater, I went into the Riverlands. I knew there was a natural son of Robert Baratheon there, and that he was with the Brotherhood Without Banners.”

“Gendry? He was the son of Robert Baratheon?”

“Aye,” confirmed Ser Davos. “I have to admit that myself, he looked a lot like the king when I met him.”

“I found him, and I brought him to Dragonstone,” resumed the Red Woman.

“You took him prisoner,” Arya shouted once more.

“What did you do to him?” Jon asked.

“I used his blood. There is great power in king’s blood. I used it to perform magic.”

“You killed him?” Jon felt anger and horror gain him, just like it gained his sister before.

“No. I needed his blood, not his life. I only made him a few cuts and mixed his blood to leeches that Stannis threw into a fire. It is an ancient spell, that allows the man performing it to say three names of people he wants dead. Stannis did so, and the three people he named died afterwards. That’s all I did. I didn’t kill the boy. His death would have been useless.”

“What she doesn’t say, is that she wanted to kill him,” intervened Ser Davos. “She wanted to make a sacrifice to her god. That’s why I got the boy out of his cell and made him escape in the middle of the night.”

“You tried to kill him!” accused Arya.
“I didn’t kill him,” replied the Red Woman.

“No, you didn’t,” said the Onion Knight. “But you wanted to kill him. You wanted to burn him, just like you burned all these people on Dragonstone because they chose not to follow your god.”

“They were burned because they refused to follow Stannis’s orders, and because Stannis had ordered them to abandon their old gods, and they didn’t do it.”

“Stannis gave them this order because you poisoned his mind and told him that if he sacrificed all these people he would win, and he didn’t. He died all the same. You lied to him and you led him to his grave.”

“I didn’t lie to him. I was wrong.”

“How many died because you were wrong? Thousands of good men! Stannis, Shireen, the queen, and all of those who followed them.”

“She should die! She’s a witch,” declared Arya.

Jon looked at Lady Melisandre. She didn’t seem afraid, but not sure of herself either. She really was no longer the woman who disrobed before him in his solar so long ago. She had almost succeeded in convincing him to lay with her at the time.

“Ser Davos, find a tent for Arya. Make sure she’s comfortable,” Jon said.

The knight nodded. Jon shot a glance to Arya, showing her the exit with a move of his head. She walked away angrily, but stopped next to the Red Woman on her way. “I’ll kill you one day.”

“Maybe you will,” Melisandre answered without emotion. Ser Davos and Arya left.

Jon was all alone with Melisandre now. He doubted it would go the same way than she visited him in his solar at Castleblack. “You really tried to kill that boy?” he asked.

“That was my intent,” she recognized.

“Why?”

“There is great power in king’s blood. I thought that by sacrificing him I could get Stannis his victory over his enemies.”

“You wanted to kill an innocent boy?!” Jon snarled.

“I wanted to make Stannis win this war.”

“By slaughtering innocents? By burning people alive?”

“How many innocents died in your brother’s war?” she asked.

“Joffrey started this war. Robb was only trying to avenge our father.”

“And how many died to avenge your father? How many thousands of people found death in this war Robb Stark led to kill Joffrey? How many died at the Blackwater when Stannis tried to take the city? How many died because Stannis and your brother believed they were right when they started a war?”

“That was different,” said Jon.
Melisandre shook her head. “That wasn’t different, Jon Snow. People died, and they died for nothing. They died fighting each other, when they should have fought side by side against the Great Other. They kept quarrelling around the Iron Throne while the dead came back. At least, this boy’s death would have meant something.”

“Really? I don’t think so.”

She dropped her eyes. “No, you’re right. I was wrong to support Stannis. I thought he was Azor Ahai reborn, that he would defeat the Night King, and lead this country through the Great Night, but he wasn’t the Prince that was Promised. I burned people alive, it’s true. It was a mistake, and I will rue it to the end of my days. Their deaths were useless. I’m glad Ser Davos took the boy Gendry out of Dragonstone. He did the right thing, and he warned us afterwards about the Others coming at the Wall. I cannot undo the things that I’ve done, but I can still help you in the great war yet to come. You saw the dead. You know you’ll need my help.”

“Maybe,” Jon admitted. “But I will not allow any human sacrifice, not while I’m alive.”

“I didn’t intend to make any… unless it was really necessary.”

“No more people burning!”

“You may have to choose to do it one day, Jon Snow.”

“I won’t.” He wouldn’t allow human sacrifices like Stannis did. She may have saved his life, but that didn’t allow her to do as she liked and to give him orders.

“I hope you won’t, but you may have to.”

She bowed and left on these words, the face still defeated. Jon sat down. He owed his life to a woman who burned people alive because they refused to follow her faith, or her king. On the other side, Stannis had ordered people to be burned alive because they refused to bend the knee. Jon knew very well that Stannis bore a part of the blame, but he doubted he would have come to such ways without this woman’s influence. His father always told him that Stannis was a just man. Hard, but just. He wouldn’t let this woman influence him like she influenced Stannis. She had tried to seduce him the way she seduced Stannis, and Jon had resisted. However, he didn’t think she would try to subdue him again. The self-confident woman was gone ever since Stannis was defeated. And she was right, he needed her. Her powers were real. Jon was the living walking proof of it.

Ser Davos came back. “I made arrangements for your sister. She is well settled,” he said.

“Thank you, ser.”

“What will you do about the Red Woman?”

“For now, nothing. I forbade her to make any sacrifice.”

“We cannot be sure she will obey.”

“I don’t think she will perform any.”

“Very well,” grumbled the Onion Knight. “I suppose you want to hear my report of the discussions I had with the Imp.”

“Aye. Go on.”
Ser Davos sat down and began. “Tyrion Lannister agreed to join his forces to ours, but he did it at his own conditions. We are to meet him southwest of Winterfell.”

“Southwest? This means we must get around the castle entirely. The Boltons could attack us anytime while we do it.”

“I tried to explain it to him, but he wouldn’t change his mind, and like he reminded me, we are in no place to demand anything from him.”

Jon sighed angrily. Tyrion Lannister was endangering his army for nothing. “Very well. How many men does he have?”

“Twenty-five thousand. I saw the camp. It is huge. The bulk of the army is made of forces from the Westerlands. There are also lords from the Riverlands, including Freys, a detachment from House Hightower in the Reach, and Northerners. The Manderlys, the Hornwoods, the Reeds, the Cerwyns, and a few others. Now we know why these houses didn’t answer our call. They had already answered the call of the Imp for your sister.”

“She is the Wardeness of the North,” said Jon, not without regret.

He could be Lord of Winterfell if he had accepted Stannis’s offer. His father’s bannermen would have answered if they knew a Stark would rule the North again, and Stannis’s march would have succeeded then. Jon had sentenced Stannis to failure when he refused him. But he had refused, and now the lords of the North were fighting for Sansa’s birthright. She was the Lady of Winterfell and the Wardeness of the North, acknowledged both by the North and the Iron Throne. Well, not all the North. You only had to listen to Lady Mormont. Jon had given up any claim on Winterfell. It had never been his. It belonged to Sansa, to Arya, to Rickon, and to Bran if he was still alive somewhere.

“Jon Snow, you must know that your sister is pregnant,” Ser Davos said carefully.

“Arya told me.”

“If the child is a boy… Tyrion Lannister could push forward his son’s claim on Winterfell.”

Again. No one trusted Jon’s old friend here. “Do you think he could do it?”

“I think he may do so. After all, he keeps saying that we cannot be sure that your brother Rickon is alive. He said it quite often while I was negotiating with him.”

This concurred with Arya’s version. “What about Sansa?”

“I didn’t see her. She was at White Harbor, according to Lord Tyrion, but if what he says is true, she seems to believe your brother is dead. Again, I cannot verify this.” But Arya said she did. Tyrion Lannister was certainly telling the truth then. “I’m afraid. They might try to kill Rickon Stark in the heat of battle, while no one is looking, and have it pass as an accident.”

“Sansa wouldn’t allow something like that.”

“Your sister is not here.”

“I don’t believe Tyrion Lannister could do such a thing.”

“I wish I could be as sure as you were.”

The truth was, Jon wasn’t sure at all. He received ravens from Sansa, but they were all sent from Casterly Rock. Maybe her words were dictated, and she was being controlled. However, it didn’t fit with Arya’s story that their sister was in love with Tyrion. No, Tyrion Lannister really seemed to have taken care of Sansa. Still, Arya believed he wanted Winterfell for himself. Was he to be trusted or not? Jon had trusted his sworn brothers, until they killed him. Mance Rayder had trusted him, until Jon betrayed the man as well. Could they never trust each other? Ser Davos, Arya and Lyanna didn’t trust Tyrion Lannister. Lady Mormont didn’t trust Sansa, nor did Arya. The Free Folk didn’t trust the Northerners, and the Northerners didn’t trust the Free Folk. No one trusted the Red Woman. And here he was, Jon Snow, a bastard of the North, trying to trust people but failing to do so. With everything he heard in the last months, he wasn’t sure anymore if he could trust anybody. Everyone seemed to turn on everyone.

Jon shook his head, trying to make his mind clear. All that didn’t matter. “We know who the real enemy is, Ser Davos. It’s not the Boltons, or the Lannisters, or the Freys. The dead are marching on the Wall. The Lady Melisandre is right about this one thing. We will need the forces of the south to face them. Did you speak of them to Lord Tyrion?”

“I did. He gave me this.” The Onion Knight produced a letter with the sigil of House Lannister. Jon read it.

Glad to see that you didn’t die at the Wall in my absence, bastard.

Coming from someone else, Jon would have taken it for an insult, but Jon knew better when it came from the little lord. He resumed to read.

Your sister Sansa is well and safe at White Harbor. The Manderlys are allies, they will take care of her. We have enough forces to take back Winterfell together, and then to face the other enemy. If you say they are back, I believe you. I will bring my men to fight them, you can be sure of that. Ramsay won’t be able to style himself as King in the North for long.

I hope you like the present I allowed Ser Davos to bring back to you.

Tyrion Lannister

“Did he allow you to bring Arya with you?” Jon asked.

“Aye, he did.”

Maybe they could trust Tyrion Lannister after all, if he allowed Arya to come here. That meant she wasn’t held prisoner, and if Arya was no prisoner, then surely Sansa wasn’t either.

“Do you think we can take Winterfell with the Lannister’s help?” Jon asked his advisor.

“We can, surely. However…”

“Then that’s enough. Thank you for your report, Ser Davos. One last thing. You really didn’t see Sansa?”

“No. I’m afraid I am in no position to give you any news about her.” Jon closed his eyes. He wished he had been able to hear more about his sister. He was glad to see Arya again, but he wanted to know how Sansa was faring. “If you want to know more about your sister, then you should ask the Lady Arya, or Lady Mira.”

Jon frowned. “Lady Mira?”

“Mira Hightower, or Forrester. She is the sister Lord Asher has who was in the south when the war started. She was married into House Hightower not long ago and she brought a contingent of soldiers from the Reach with her husband. We met in the Lannister camp, and she came back with us to see her family.”

“What would she know about Sansa?”

“She was her handmaiden for some time in King’s Landing, and a friend too. If someone knows about Lady Sansa’s time in the south, that’s her.”

Ser Davos left. Jon vaguely remembered Ryon running into a young woman Jon never saw when Ser Davos came back. It had to be this Lady Mira. Jon would have to ask her a few questions, but later. He supposed she wanted to spend some time with her family. He couldn’t blame her for that. Jon wanted the same thing. He walked outside his pavilion. He needed to ask a few questions around to locate the place. He hadn’t asked Ser Davos where he settled her, but he still found her in the end. She jumped from her chair when he came in, and Jon ruffled her hair like he used to do years ago. She was taller than before, but she remained his little sister all the same.

“You’ve grown up,” he said.

“You don’t look as tall as before,” she replied. They both chuckled.

“That’s because you grew up while I didn’t. Did Sansa grow up? Did she change?”

Arya’s smile left her face when he asked her. “She’s more beautiful than ever. No wonder the Imp loves her, but I wonder how she fell in love with him.” There was a pause. “What have you done with the witch?”

“I didn’t kill her, Arya.”

“Why?” she asked angrily.

“Because she saved my life.”

The expression on Arya’s face was one of utter surprise and confusion. “She saved you?”

Jon took a great inspiration. “I died, Arya.”

“What?” Her expression was even more confused than before.

“I died. I was murdered.” Jon untied his doublet to reveal his chest, where the marks of the daggers were still visible. Arya’s eyes widened at the sight. “My sworn brothers. They did this to me at Castleblack.”

She looked at him with round eyes. “But… how?”

“I don’t know.” He closed back his doublet and put back the furs into place. “She just made some ritual. One moment I was dead, and the next one I was alive.”

Arya kept looking at him with an incredulous expression. After a moment, she stammered. “I… I met a man, in the Riverlands, Beric Dondarrion. I saw him die… And there was a Red Priest with him, Thoros of Myr. I saw him bring him back to life after he was killed.”

So, Jon wasn’t the only one who came back. “Well, I went through something similar. Melisandre brought me back, just like Thoros of Myr did for this man.”

“But she’s evil. You can’t keep her.”
“I have to, Arya. She saved my life. How can I send her away after that? And we may need her, some time in the near future.”

Arya didn’t agree. “I don’t trust her, and I don’t trust the Lannisters, or the Imp. I don’t even trust Sansa. They all seem to believe that Rickon is already dead.”

Jon wished they could stop to talk about this for a moment. There was a way to be sure Rickon would live when they took Winterfell. “Listen, Arya. We need the Lannisters to defeat the Boltons. When we take Winterfell, I’ll make sure our men are the first to enter the castle. We will find Rickon, and bring him out of reach of the Lannisters. They won’t be able to kill him if we find him first.”

“Are you sure?”

“Aye, I am. The Lannisters won’t risk killing Rickon in plain sight, even if that’s their intention to let him live. This would turn the entire North against them. Tyrion Lannister is not stupid. They could kill him while the battle is raging and make it look like the Boltons did it, but if we find Rickon first, they won’t be able to do so.”

“So, we’re going to save Rickon?” she asked, her voice full of hope.

“Aye. I’ll do everything to save him.”

He wouldn’t abandon their brother. They wouldn’t lose anyone else.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa XXVII

Chapter Notes

Today, "A Shadow and a Wolf" reached its 100th bookmark. Thank you everyone who added this story to their bookmarks, and also to everyone who left comments and kudos, and of course to everyone who read it. I wouldn't have enough motivation to write if no one read it.

I loved to write this chapter with everything that happened in it and I hope you'll love it too, though some may be disappointed by the way some things will turn out.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

SANSA XXVII

“Do I need to tell you that this is high treason?” Sansa asked.

“My child…”

“I am not a child, Lady Waynwood.” The old woman backed down. “I am Sansa Lannister of House Stark, I am the daughter of Eddard Stark and Catelyn Tully, Lady of the Westerlands by rights of marriage, and Lady of Winterfell and Wardeness of the North by blood right. You are on my lands, and as a traitor, I could sentence you to death.”

She could see the fear in the old lady’s eyes, though she tried to conceal it. “I tried to save her. Many other lords wanted to send her to King’s Landing, or even to execute her. I argued that we should keep her.”

“And yet you handed her to a monster who sold her to another monster?!”

“We couldn’t know he would do that.”

“Are you going to tell me you trusted Littlefinger? If you did, then you’re a fool.”

The Lady of Ironoaks hesitated before she answered. “I had doubts.”

“Then you’re almost a fool.” Sansa didn’t allow the woman to say more. “My men will escort you to Lord Manderly’s solar. You’ll wait here for him. I don’t want you to cause any trouble. If you do, remember that I have full authority to deal with you as it pleases me.”

Sansa turned on her heels while three of her men surrounded Lady Anya Waynwood. Aside from Littlefinger, she was the only highborn person from the Vale to stay in White Harbor after the army marched north last week. Harrold Arryn had left, promising to give Winterfell back to her. She doubted he would arrive at Winterfell before Jon and Tyrion took it by themselves. Sansa left the lady’s room, followed by Brienne who was closer to her than she ever was since Littlefinger arrived in the North. They followed the way to Sansa’s personal rooms in silence. Sansa walked quite quickly. When they were not far away from their destination, she had to put a hand on the wall. She felt a sudden pain in her belly. It wasn’t the first time it happened. She had one similar in the morning.
“My lady, are you all right?” Brienne asked her, concerned.

“I’m alright, Brienne. Don’t worry,” she said.

“I can fetch the maester, if you want.”

“No. I’m alright. It’s gone.”

Sansa resumed her way, breathing deeply. Once in her rooms, she dropped herself into a cushioned chair. She had felt increasingly tired lately, and her child moved more than ever. His movements were more painful to her than before. She looked around in the room. Everything was perfect. To occupy her time, Sansa took a heavy volume she had found in the library of White Harbor. When you could almost not move, you couldn’t make much of your days, except needlework or reading. She understood now why Tyrion read so much when he was young. That was the only thing he could do, being denied the usual education young men received from a master-at-arms. She thought with sadness about Bran, who lost the use of his legs after he fell. Sansa opened the book at the page where she stopped reading yesterday. She was reading a long passage about the reign of Aerys the Second when she happened on a passage that retained her attention.

At the great Anniversary Tourney of 272 AC, held to commemorate Aerys’s tenth year upon the Iron Throne, Joanna Lannister brought her four-years-old twins Jaime and Cersei from Casterly Rock to present before the court. The king (very much in his cups) asked her if giving suck to them had “ruined your breasts, which were so high and proud”. The question greatly amused Lord Tywin’s rivals, who were always pleased to see the Hand slighted or made mock of, but Lady Joanna was humiliated. Tywin Lannister attempted to return his chain of office the next morning, but the king refused to accept his resignation.

Sansa remembered a conversation she had with Cerenna in Casterly Rock, about the Mad King saying something improper about Tyrion’s mother when she visited the capital. Sansa supposed that was it. She could sympathize with this woman, after the humiliation she endured from Joffrey. From what she read about the Mad King in this book, Joffrey looked like a copy of Aerys II Targaryen. Maybe it had something to see with the fact they were both born of incest, or maybe because they spent their childhood knowing they would be king one day and have the right to do whatever they wanted. Sansa resumed her reading.

Aerys II could, of course, have dismissed Tywin Lannister at any time and named his own man as Hand of the King, but instead, for whatever reason, the king chose to keep his boyhood friend close by him, laboring on his behalf, even as he began to undermine him in ways both great and small. Slights and gibes became ever more numerous; courtiers hoping for advancement soon learned that the quickest way to catch the king’s eyes was by making mock of his solemn, humorless Hand. Yet through all this, Tywin Lannister suffered in silence.

Wine poured over his hair. Ordered to act as the king’s cupbearer. The images of Joffrey’s wedding came back to her mind. How he humiliated the man she loved. That was the last time he degraded someone in public. Sansa remembered the long days and nights Tyrion spent working on the Crown’s finances for a king and a father who despised and mocked him at every turn.

In 273 AC, however, Lady Joanna was taken to childbed once again at Casterly Rock, where she died delivering Lord Tywin’s second son. Tyrion, as the babe was named, was a malformed, dwarfish babe born with stunted legs, an oversized head, and mismatched, demonic eyes (some reports also suggested he had a tail, which was lopped off at his father’s comment). Lord Tywin’s Doom, the smallfolk called this ill-made creature, and Lord Tywin’s Bane. Upon hearing of his birth, King Aerys infamously said, “The gods cannot abide such arrogance. They have plucked a fair flower from his hand and given him a monster in her place, to teach him some humility at last.”
Sansa shut the book very hard. That was the first time Tyrion was mentioned in Maester Yandel’s work, and it was only to be called a monster and an ill-made creature with a tail, all the while incensing the man who ordered her family’s slaughter. When she would be back at Casterly Rock, she would order a new history book that would detail all the atrocities committed by Tywin Lannister, and all the efforts his son did to mend his father’s crimes. The people would know the true face of Tywin Lannister. They would know who was the real monster. She would make sure that Joffrey, Cersei, Janos Slynt, Ser Meryn and Ser Boros were described for who they really were as well.

She remained in her seat, waiting. It wouldn’t be long. Still, it looked like an eternity for her, and the pain she felt didn’t make it easier. She wouldn’t show it. She wouldn’t show weakness, not before him. Finally, someone knocked on the door and Sansa heard Willia’s voice from the other side.

“Lady Lannister, Lord Baelish to see you.”

“Let him come in,” Sansa replied.

The former Master of Coin had not made a few steps inside the room, his false smile on his face like always, that someone grabbed his arm and twisted it behind his back. For the first time, Sansa saw terror in Littlefinger’s eyes. His assurance was all gone, and he had all reasons to be terrified. Brienne was holding him with all her strength, gagging his mouth with her hand, placing a dagger on his throat. He looked all around him, and he seemed to realize that Sansa was far from alone in her chambers. A dozen men, Lannister and Tully soldiers, were there as well. They surrounded him. These were the men Sansa trusted the most in her guard.

“If you try to call for help, Lord Baelish, you die,” said Brienne, her voice threatening. Sansa knew she would have no hesitation to kill him, not after everything he did.

The man seemed to realize that it was in his best interest to stay quiet. He made no sound. He only looked at Sansa, obviously not understanding the situation. The last time he saw her, she was a frightened child. Things had changed. She was a married woman now, a lady, the mother of the future Lord of Casterly Rock, and he was nothing more than a brothelkeeper, all in her power. She could order him to be killed right now. She would like that. He deserved to die. Brienne would do it. But Sansa didn’t give the order. Instead, she mischievously smiled.

“I suppose this reminds you something, Lord Baelish. One moment you think you are safe, surrounded by allies, protection, privilege, people you believe you can trust, and the next you find yourself at someone else’s mercy, a dagger at your throat, surrounded by enemies. Doesn’t it ring any bell to you?” she asked, her face growing hard as she spoke.

Brienne withdrew her hand from Littlefinger’s mouth, allowing him to answer, but kept the dagger firmly on his throat. One swift move, and the man who caused so much harm to Sansa’s family would die.

“Sansa, I don’t know what you may have heard, but whatever it is that you were told, remember what I told you. We are all liars in King’s Landing,” he said, still terrified. His life was at stake.

“Indeed, you are right. Everyone is a liar in the capital, and you were the best of them. I believed you when you told me you were my friend.”

“And you were right to believe me. I am your friend. Everything I did, from the beginning of this war and even before, it was for you. Because you are Cat’s daughter. Ever since the moment I saw you, I did everything for you.”
There was something mad in his eyes. Sansa didn’t like it. He didn’t stop looking at her, waiting for her to reply. “I suppose this is why you tried to kidnap me. For myself?”

“I tried to save from you from the Lannisters.”

“You sent a man who threatened to cut my throat when I refused to follow him!” she shouted.

He stood there, motionless. Now he was the one with a dagger on his throat. “I didn’t know. I sent the man who wouldn’t be noticed by anyone. No one gives any attention to fools. No one would have suspected Ser Dontos. I’m sorry. I made a mistake.”

If his voice looked sorry, his eyes didn’t. “I suppose selling my sister to the Boltons was a mistake as well.”

He was taken aback by this. He didn’t expect she would know that. Sansa looked at him, anger building up in her. She thought she could feel her child’s anger too. “I didn’t give your sister to the Boltons.”

“You did. She was at the Eyrie. I know it. Lady Waynwood confessed everything, and I’m quite sure that if I asked the other lords of the Vale, they would say the same. They entrusted Arya to your care, and instead of protecting her you brought her to Winterfell and gave her to the Boltons.”

“I didn’t.”

“You did. Arya is in Winterfell.”

“I didn’t bring her to Winterfell. This is the truth.”

“Then how did she happen there? She disappeared in a puff of smoke, I suppose, while you were not looking?”

“We were ambushed by the Boltons, on our way to the Fingers,” he offered as an explanation. He really was a liar.

“I doubt the Boltons would send men in the Vale and be able to kidnap the daughter of Eddard Stark without anyone stopping them, unless someone called them and gave them Arya.”

“I didn’t deliver your sister to the Boltons.”

“Maybe not. Maybe she escaped before you could, when you were at Moat Cailin.”

Again, utter surprise could be seen in his eyes, but then he smiled. “So, Arya Stark is alive, and safe.”

“She is. The same cannot be said about you. I could have you killed any time.”

“I didn’t hand your sister to the Boltons.”

“No, but you wanted to do it. I doubt that people will believe a brothelkeeper over the daughter of Eddard Stark.”

“Not when your sister already confessed she murdered your aunt. The lords of the Vale will believe the husband of their lady before her murderer.”

“Not when they learn that this husband betrayed Eddard Stark and sold him to Cersei Lannister.”
He chuckled. “I did no such thing.”

“You did. My father asked you to bribe the gold cloaks on his side when he tried to arrest Joffrey, and instead you paid Janos Slynt to fight for Cersei. You had a dagger on my father’s throat just like Brienne has one on yours right now.”

“Who told you this? The Imp?” He seemed to gain some confidence again. “I wouldn’t trust everything he says if I were you. He is a Lannister.”

“So am I.” He grinned for a time, but before her serious expression, he seemed to grow concerned for a moment. “Tyrion wasn’t there when my father was killed. You were. What did you do when Joffrey ordered to bring my father's head? Nothing. You stood there, and did nothing. You watched my father die, and you didn’t try to save him, after he trusted you.”

“I wanted to help him, Sansa, but I couldn’t. If I had tried to save him, I would be dead, and I wouldn’t have been able to help you afterwards.”

“You did nothing. Varys, the Grand Maester, even Cersei tried to stop Joffrey from killing him, but you did nothing. And how did you help me afterwards? You sent me a fool who tried to murder me!”

“I was the only one to try to get you out of King’s Landing.”

“And if you had succeeded, I suppose I would be at Winterfell instead of Arya, married to Ramsay? Or worse? You promised to my mother, to my parents, you would help them, and you betrayed my father. You had him killed. You made my mother believe that Tyrion tried to murder Bran, and this started the war that destroyed my family. My parents, Robb, Bran, Rickon, they’re all dead! Because of you!”

“I tried to help your father. I wanted to help him, but he refused my help.”

“Seeing how the people you help end, who could blame him?”

“I can help you, Sansa. You have rights upon the North through your father, rights upon the Westerlands through your child, and you could have the Vale if you married Harrold Arryn. You could have the Seven Kingdoms. I can help you to get them all. I can help you to rule all Westeros. With my help, you could.”

Sansa laughed. That was so stupid. She, Sansa Stark, ruling the Seven Kingdoms?! “I’m not a child anymore, Lord Baelish. I don’t dream of being queen. The last time I dreamed of it, my father was killed by my betrothed. I’m married to a good man now, someone brave, and gentle, and strong. He will give me back my home, and what’s left of my family that didn’t yet die because of you. I don’t need you. The only man I need is my husband, Tyrion Lannister. I don’t need the help of a brothelkeeper.”

“You’re making a terrible mistake. Remember what he did to his wife…”

“You lied. You always lied to me. You lied to everyone. No one believes you here. We’re not in a brothel. We are at White Harbor, in the North. You are in my lands, and I’m the one to decide here. I’m the one to declare someone guilty or not guilty of any crime, and I say this. Lord Petyr Baelish, you are guilty of starting the War of the Five Kings with the lies you told to my lady mother, Catelyn Stark. You are guilty of high treason against my father, Lord Eddard Stark. You are guilty of attempts of murder against me, the Wardeness of the North, and you are guilty of imprisoning and sequestering my sister, the Lady Arya Stark, and of attempting to give her to traitors. Do you have anything to say?”

He remained silent for a time. The he spoke. “You shouldn’t trust the Imp. He may seem kind to you, but he’s a very good liar. I lied to you, it's true, but I care about you. I want to help you. All Tyrion Lannister wants from you is your claim, and children so he may hold the North and Casterly Rock. Once he’s got a son or two from you, maybe three, he’ll get rid of you, the same way he got rid of the poor girl he married a long time ago.”

A moment went on after he finished to speak. Sansa slowly stood up, and then walked to him. She slapped him even harder than she slapped Black Walder. Brienne’s dagger sank into his throat, and a thread of blood became visible. Baelish looked at her, but differently. It was as if he never saw her before. Indeed, he certainly never saw her like this before. All he ever knew her for was a child who loved knights and princes.

“I’m not going to kill you. Not here,” Sansa said, trying to sound calm, but anger pierced her voice in a very clear way. “You are under the protection of guest rights, and I’m not Walder Frey. There is a ship in the harbor. You’ll be on it when it leaves. My men will make sure you don’t escape. Don’t try to bribe them, I already promised them the double of any amount you would offer. I’m richer than you now. Farewell, Lord Baelish. This is the last time we see each other.”

Sansa backed away, and Brienne released Littlefinger, only for him to be seized by her guards who gagged him, put a bag on his head and tied his hands. They brought him outside, and Sansa had the satisfaction to see the last of Littlefinger. The ship would leave in an hour for King’s Landing. She had given her men a letter for the queen, with a list of accusations and all the details on everything this man had done against the Crown. Margaery would see that he was executed. Considering the role Sansa suspected Littlefinger to have played in Joffrey’s death, she doubted Margaery would relinquish to execute the only man who may reveal the truth about the death of her second husband. She advised Margaery to not let Baelish speak during the trial, and to have him beheaded as quickly as possible. The sooner they got rid of him the better.

Sansa dropped herself in her chair again. She was exhausted. She never felt so exhausted in her life. She cursed Septa Mordane in silence for never telling her about the difficulties of carrying a child. She was never taught about politics or ruling either. What a useless education she received at Winterfell. Singing and threading and playing the harp didn’t prepare you for the true life you would have when you would be married. Of all the things Sansa learned, only riding, sums and writing were really useful. Of the three, there was only in writing that she was better than Arya, and she used writing for poetry and letters telling her family that her father was a traitor. Well, the letters she wrote for Margaery and Lord Manderly today would avenge her father. The man who betrayed him would die soon. She winced as another pain came.

“My lady, are you sure I shouldn’t call the maester?”

“No. I must go to see Lord Manderly.” Sansa forced herself to stand up and refused Brienne's help. It became very difficult to even walk with her swelling belly. “I need to talk with him.”

Very carefully, Sansa walked to the solar of the Lord of White Harbor. Her handmaiden, Brienne and a few other guards followed her. Willia helped her to progress through the castle. She needed twice more time to travel it than when she arrived. Willia seemed to worry about her just like Brienne did, and Sansa thought she saw concern among her guards as well, but she didn’t care about it. She had to speak with the Lord of White Harbor.

The squire before the solar let her in after he announced her presence. Sansa went alone. She found the Lord of White Harbor behind his desk, reading the letter she sent him hours ago. She had told Willia to place it on Lord Manderly’s desk, so he might find it when he would come to work. Lady Waynwood was sitting in front of the desk. She looked at Sansa when she entered, but Lord Manderly’s eyes were locked on Sansa’s letter. He didn’t detach his gaze from it.

“My lady,” said the Lady of Ironoaks, making a curtesy. The Lord of White Harbor did nothing. He was still looking at the letter.

“Lord Manderly?” asked Sansa.

He slowly lifted his eyes. “Is it true, my lady? Is all of this accurate?” he asked.

“It is.” Her words explained in detail all the crimes committed by Petyr Baelish, and also revealed the truth about Arya’s real location.

The Lord of White Harbor looked blankly for a moment right before him, then he slowly crumpled the letter, and threw it on the surface of his desk. “Damn it! I knew I should never have trusted him.”

"Who should you never have trusted?"

"Baelish."

This alarmed Sansa. “You trusted Littlefinger? What did you trust him about?”

He didn’t answer. Lady Waynwood replied in his stead. “It seems that Petyr Baelish convinced Lord Manderly to join a conspiracy to bring back the Starks to power at Winterfell.”

A conspiracy to bring the Starks back to power? “That’s what we’re already doing. We have an army heading for Winterfell, to bring down the Boltons and reinstate my house.”

“To place a grandson of Tywin Lannister at the head of the North, you mean,” countered the fat lord quite sharply.

“My son is going to have the Stark name. I am a Stark. He will be a Stark.”

“He will still be the grandson of Tywin Lannister, the man behind the Red Wedding. And please forgive me, my lady, but I don’t trust the Imp. You may trust him, but I don’t, and no one does in the North.”

A long silence. Then Sansa asked very slowly. “What were you planning with Littlefinger?”

The lord sighed. “The plan was to bring the Knights of the Vale in the North and to join them with the northern forces still loyal to the Starks, and maybe with the lords of the Riverlands. We were supposed to let the Lannisters fight the Boltons and to turn on both during the battle, thus defeating them and giving back the North to its people.”

Sansa couldn’t believe it. She knew the Northerners didn’t trust Tyrion, but this… This was treason! “You wanted to betray Lord Tyrion? All this time you were planning to betray us? To betray me? To kill us?”

“We would never have hurt you, my lady, nor your child. He may be the grandchild of Tywin Lannister and the child of the Imp, but he’s also the grandchild of Eddard Stark. We would never have caused you any harm.”

“But you planned to kill my husband? You planned to murder the father of my son?”

“The father of your son, like you call him, my lady, is a Lannister. The Lannisters killed our liege lord, and slaughtered his lady wife and their eldest son, our king, breaking the sacred laws of guest right. They killed my own son, Wendel. They spoiled the Riverlands and ravaged it for years, and now they come in our lands, seeking to take them for themselves, trying to steal them from us, claiming they come here as liberators, taking the place the Boltons occupy. What did you expect? That I would gladly bend the knee to the Imp after Wendel died?"

“He gave you back your other son, Wylis. He’s back thanks to him.”

“Aye. And I lost Wylis for years because the Lannisters kept him from me. I wasn’t going to let the son of Tywin Lannister take the North and give us one of his sons to replace our king.”

Lord Manderly was unyielding. He really hated the Lannisters. Sansa should have expected that, and truth be told she expected it, but she never thought the Manderlys would attempt to betray them, not when they were trying to save Arya and Rickon.

“So you chose to trust a brothelkeeper?” Sansa asked him.

Rebuffed, Wyman Manderly didn’t look so proud of himself now. “We needed more men to defeat the Lannisters. The Knights of the Vale were the only option available.”

“Littlefinger will tell you what you want to hear. Just a few minutes ago, he was telling me he would help me to rule the Seven Kingdoms one day. I wouldn’t be surprised he’s been sending letters to Cersei Lannister as he brought the Knights of the Vale in the North, promising her he would help to recover her lost powers. He’s manipulating everyone. He did so with my father, and look at what happened to him.”

Another sigh escaped the throat of the fat lord. “I should never have listened to him. Are the Knights of the Vale going to turn against us as we turn against the Lannisters now?”

“No, Lord Arryn would never do that,” intervened Lady Waynwood. “He wouldn’t see it… fair. He is a knight. He wouldn’t stab in the back someone in this way.”

“Maybe not, but that is Littlefinger’s style, and if he had Harrold Arryn’s ear, who knows what he could convince him to do,” Sansa countered. She looked back at the Lord of White Harbor. “You betrayed me, Lord Manderly.”

“My loyalty goes to House Stark, my lady. Not to Tyrion Lannister,” he said gravely.

“And I am a Stark. I am the Lady of Winterfell.”

“Rickon Stark IS the Lord of Winterfell, my lady.”

“My brother is dead. Bran and Rickon died three years ago when Theon Greyjoy killed them. He butchered them. They were burned. They’re dead. You know the truth about my sister now. Littlefinger tried to sell her to the Boltons, but she escaped and was hidden by Lord Reed all this time. The Boltons are lying to us. They lied about Arya, and they’re lying about Rickon too. My brother is dead.”

Rickon was dead. Bran was dead. Robb was dead. Her father and her mother were dead. Even her uncle Benjen was dead. Sansa, Arya and Jon were the only ones left. Hoping that someone else had survived was foolish, because there was no chance for it to be true.

The expression on Lord Manderly’s face softened. “My lady,” he started, “Rickon Stark is still alive.”

“He’s not. He’s dead, and hoping for him to be still alive will not…”
“My lady, please listen. Your brothers didn’t die at Winterfell. The people there believed they were killed, it’s true, but they weren’t. They escaped in the night. Theon Greyjoy was furious, and to not let anyone believe he lost the Stark boys, he had two boys he found somewhere burned, and put on them your brothers’ clothes. Everyone in Winterfell believed they were your brothers, but Brandon and Rickon Stark were away. They didn’t die. Rickon Stark arrived at the Last Hearth not long after the Red Wedding, and Jon Umber took him under his protection. Only, when he died, his son, the Smalljon, decided he didn’t care anymore about his family’s loyalty to the Starks, and he decided to ally with the Boltons. Your brother Rickon is alive, my lady, and unfortunately, he is at Winterfell.”

Sansa couldn’t talk for some time. “And Bran?” she croaked after a moment.

“We know nothing of Brandon Stark’s whereabouts. He didn’t go to the Last Hearth like his brother.”

Her two brothers weren’t dead. Theon hadn’t killed them. Sansa had thought all this time they were dead, just like she thought Arya was dead, but they weren’t. She looked at the fat lord once more. “Why didn’t you tell me?”

“Because we couldn’t take the risk. I couldn’t give the information that Rickon Stark was still alive, or else the Lannisters may have tried to kill him.”

Something dawned on Sansa. “You’ve known for a long time.”

“The Greatjon wrote to me not long after your brother came to him. For some time, we thought about rising in rebellion against Roose Bolton and to proclaim Rickon Stark King in the North, but we couldn’t rely on the Karstarks after your brother executed their lord, and we didn’t have enough men to hope to defeat them by ourselves. We had lost too many in the war. Together, the Boltons and the Karstarks couldn’t be defeated. Our plan was to wait for the next summer, to recover from our losses and to use winter to make alliances with the other minor houses, then to rise against the Boltons when summer would come back with our full forces. But when we heard that your sister Arya may be at Winterfell, I decided we had to act quickly. We couldn’t let Ramsay Bolton get her with child, or else we could lose everything. So I relayed the information to Lord Tyrion, and he marched on the North. With his forces, we would have enough to take back Winterfell.”

“But you didn’t trust him. You said it yourself. You didn’t believe he would acknowledge Rickon as Lord of Winterfell.” A silence followed, and Sansa realized what it was. “This is a trap, isn’t it? You wanted to turn on him once Winterfell was free. You’ve been planning this since the beginning.”

“We did. That was our plan. When we heard the Blackfish was coming with you, we knew that we could have enough forces with the rest of the North to overrun the Lannisters eventually, and when Lord Baelish contacted us, we were sure to have more men than the Lannisters. Of course, now, we don’t know if we can trust the Knights of the Vale.”

“Your men, what are they supposed to do?” Sansa asked.

“What I told you. Betray the Lannisters when the time is right. They have orders to enlist the river lords they can trust.”

“They won’t have any chance on that.”

“Why? The Riverlands lost a lot…”

“My granduncle, Ser Brynden Tully, trusts my husband, to the opposite of you. He won’t let his men turn on him. The moment he hears about their plan, he will put an end to it. Tyrion gave my mother’s family their lands, their titles and everything he could give them back. They won’t betray him, and if you allowed him a chance, you would see just like my mother’s uncle that Tyrion really wants to give Winterfell back to my family, to the Starks.”

“I doubt the Blackfish would trust a Lannister,” commented Anya Waynwood.

“Well, he does, and don’t expect him to stand idle while your men try to betray and kill Lord Tyrion. Because he won’t.” A new pain went through Sansa’s belly. Couldn’t it stop for a moment. It wasn’t the time.

Lord Manderly seemed to think about all this for a moment. He sighed angrily at the end. “I don’t want to trust a Lannister, but I don’t want to trust Petyr Baelish either. I will send riders to my men, telling them to forget about the plan.”

“Very well. And I’ll send a raven to my husband.”

Sansa turned on her heels. She winced a little. “My lady…” began to protest the Lord of White Harbor.

“I will tell him everything. You tried to betray me. Rickon may be still alive, but he is a prisoner, and we don’t know where Bran is. Until further notice, I am the Wardeness of the North, and you plotted against me. You plotted against House Stark. I won’t forget that, Lord Manderly. The North remembers.”

Sansa proceeded to walk to the rookery. Maester Theomore was a Lannister. He wouldn’t disobey her. She had to warn Tyrion as quickly as possible. Castle Cerwyn had fallen not long ago. If she sent a raven… the pain intensified. She stopped. The pain was heavy in her belly. She winced once more.

“My dear, what’s going on?” asked Lady Waynwood. She had risen up and stood next to Sansa now. The pain lasted for some time, more intense than before. Then it faded, like before.

“I’m well,” Sansa said, trying to catch her breath.

“You are with child. How long have been pregnant? You must be quite advanced now.”

“I’m telling that I’m well. I must see…”

Sansa didn’t complete her sentence. She felt something run on her legs. Something liquid. She didn’t think she made water. What was it? Lady Waynwood looked at her queerly. What was Sansa supposed to do? What was she supposed to say?

“I… I…” She stammered. What was going on?

“Your water broke?” Lady Waynwood asked. Sansa remembered hearing a servant ask something like that to her mother once. That was back when she had been pregnant with Rickon, or so she thought. “We must get you to bed immediately. Lord Manderly, fetch the maester right away.”

Unable to say anything, Sansa was almost dragged out of the solar by Lady Waynwood.

Chapter End Notes
Sorry for everyone who hoped we would see the baby. Don't worry, we'll get to see him or her in the next Sansa chapter, though I'm afraid it will take some time before it is uploaded. We have many chapters taking place near Winterfell that are coming, and stuff will be happening in Meereen too.

Please review

Next chapter: Cersei
Cersei IV

Chapter Notes

I'm sorry I didn't update twice last week like I should have. I decided to publish one more chapter in my other fic "A Rose and a Lion". Please read the chapter carefully.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

CERSEI VI

“I hope our guest is satisfied with his new accommodations,” Cersei said.

“I think he is satisfied enough for now,” Qyburn confirmed. A muffled sigh came from the torture room. “He’s sleeping right now. I gave him some potion so he could rest, but the mixture in question will also have the benefit to make his pain stronger when he will wake up.”

“Could you get anything from him up to now?”

“Not as much as I would like, and not what your Grace is looking for. He confessed he slept with several women while he was studying at the Citadel, which is quite common among novices, and that he visited a brothel once since he arrived in the capital, but he refused to say that he slept with Lady Margaery.”

Cersei had given the order to Qyburn to not call Margaery a queen in any circumstance when they were alone. She was glad he obeyed her orders. She liked this man more and more every day. Finally someone who knew where his loyalties should stand.

“Make sure he confesses.”

“If I may say, your Grace, we already have two bards and another servant who confessed they slept with Margaery Tyrell and that she laid with her handmaidens. We even have one who claimed that she shared the same bed with Tyrion Lannister and Sansa Stark.”

“I would rather prefer we have as many witnesses who can testify about this when the time comes. Try to get more confessions from the other prisoners and some that incriminate that little whore from the maester.”

“As you wish, your Grace.”

“Anyway, that’s not as if we had need of Vallis anymore. You perform the duties of Grand Maester better than anyone.”

"I'm not a maester, your Grace, but I'm happy to serve."

Qyburn bowed and left to resume his interrogations. Cersei walked up from the dungeons to the upper levels of the Red Keep, escorted by Ser Boros. The knight had all reasons to remain at her side if he had any hope to remain in the Kingsguard in the future. Cersei had nothing in particular against Maester Vallis, but he was from the Reach. When he sent a missive to alert Randyll Tarly about Margaery’s imprisonment, she had no choice but to leave him to the cares of Qyburn. If the Citadel ever sent them a new Grand Maester, she would make sure he had no ties with Highgarden or the Vallis’s raven posed a problem. Randyll Tarly would receive it sooner or later, and when he would learn that Margaery and her brother were kept prisoners by the Faith, he would turn away from Dorne and come back to the capital immediately. Cersei had Qyburn write an order to Lord Tarly, signed by Tommen’s hand, that ordered him to keep marching on Dorne and that assured him that Margaery would soon be freed when the charges against her would prove to be false. She had no wish to see the Lord of Horn Hill back in the capital. A woman’s war is in the birthing bed. Your wars are over. If he ever showed himself in front of the city, Cersei would show him that her wars were far from over, and that they were far from being limited to the birthing bed. He would be in for a great surprise if he ever approached the city.

If only Cersei had come back sooner. She had returned to the capital two days after being forced into leaving it. The Tyrell guards had run back to the capital when they heard their precious rose was arrested, leaving Cersei with Lannister men only, and they hadn't objected for long when she decided to come back to King's Landing. However, she had needed to be sure first that Margaery and her brother would be well under arrest, which delayed her. Her son didn’t stop her from settling again in the Red Keep. He needed someone at his side, and this someone was Cersei. Sadly, Vallis, who replaced Pycelle while the Citadel was deciding who would become the new Grand Maester, had already sent his raven to Lord Tarly. He wouldn’t do anything else now, but the damage was done. Cersei doubted the Lord of Horn Hill would follow Tommen’s order to keep marching on Dorne. He was a Tyrell bannerman after all. His loyalty was to Highgarden, not to King's Landing. Let him come. He’ll see the lioness has claws.

Cersei walked to the royal apartments. She wanted to spend some time with her son. Tommen may lack the will and the force to be king, but he was her last son. Gold will be their crowns. Gold their shrouds. She wouldn’t let that happen. Margaery was confined somewhere under the Great Sept of Baelor. She wouldn’t take her last son away from his mother.

She found Tommen sitting at his table before full plates of food. He hadn’t touched anything. He didn’t eat anything these times. Cersei didn’t understand. He needed to eat. He wouldn’t save his wife by starving himself to death. When Jaime was captured, or that she was hiding in Maegor’s Holdfast during the Battle of Blackwater, or that she was confined in her rooms by Joffrey or Kevan, she kept drinking and eating. To do otherwise wouldn’t have made her feel better.

"Hello, my love."

She sat in front of him. He said nothing, as if he didn't notice her presence. He was staring at his plate with empty eyes.

"Tommen?" she asked, trying to get his attention. He didn't move. He did nothing. He just sat there, looking to his feet. He had been in this state ever since Cersei came back. It annoyed her. "Starving yourself won't make things any better for her, my love."

Tommenn stood up at this moment. "She's in a prison cell and there is nothing I can do. I am the king! The queen is in prison and there is nothing I can do!"

He walked to the window. That was the first time Cersei ever saw her youngest son get angry, but that was nothing when compared to Joffrey's anger. Joffrey had been strong enough and had the right temper to be king, despite all his other flaws, but Tommen had nothing of the essential to be king. He was too sweet, too kind. A good king couldn't allow himself such weaknesses. Cersei also found it stupider than any of the reasons why Joffrey had ever been angry that Tommen would feel outraged because Margaery was in prison. He should be happy about it. She managed to rid himself of a woman who tried to usurp his power.
She walked to him and took his hands in hers. "No matter who you are, no matter how strong you are, sooner or later, you'll face circumstances beyond your control. Events you couldn't possibly have anticipated or prevented even if you had. You cannot blame yourself for fate. Your father, your brother, your grandfather… I was Queen of the Seven Kingdoms and what could I do? Hold them as they left this world. Kiss their heads after they'd gone."

Tommen had to let go Margaery. He had to, just like Cersei let her father and her two other children go. Gold will be their crowns. Gold their shrouds. They couldn't prevent fate from happening. She wasn't responsible for Myrcella's and Joffrey's death. Tyrion had killed them. She wouldn't let that happen to her last son. She would prevent fate from becoming true.

"I'll call in the army," declared Tommen. "I'll take back the sept and kill every last one of them." Her son might try to look decisive, but his eyes betrayed his uncertainty. "I'll start a war if I have to."

"You know as well as I do who the first casualty of that war would be."

This argument broke Tommen's resolve in an instant. Joffrey would never have surrendered. He would have attacked the sept without caring for his wife, more sensible to the offence the Faith had done against him. If his wife had died in the battle, he would simply have taken another one, better than the former. Cersei would have made sure of it, and she would make sure Tommen would have a better wife once Margaery was dealt with.

"I love her." That stung. Cersei could keep her face impassive, but the fact remained that it stung. "I love her." He said it again, and that stung harder. You'll be queen. For a time. Then comes another, younger, more beautiful, to cast you down and take all you hold dear. No, this couldn't be happening. Tommen didn't know what he was saying, that was all. "And I can't help her."

He walked away to the place where Cersei sat before. He didn't look at her. That was as if she didn't exist for him. She was losing him. Cersei realized that Tommen had the same disease than Tyrion. Love was a poison. A sweet poison, yes, but it killed everyone who had it all the same. No, she couldn't allow that to happen to Tommen. He was all she had left. Joffrey and Myrcella were dead. He was all she had now. She couldn't lose him too. She approached and knelt at his side, taking his hands into hers. She wouldn't let him go.

"We must be strong for those we love," she began. She had to be strong for her son. "We cannot give in to despair." She couldn't despair. If she despaired, then she had lost. Her father wasn't there to help her anymore. She could only rely on herself.

"I will speak with the High Sparrow," her son declared. "There must be something he…"

"Let me talk to him in your behalf. The king cannot sully himself negotiating with an unwashed fanatic."

"You will try to help her?"

"I'll do everything I can to win her freedom and her brother's. Your happiness is all I want in this world."

"I know." He was crying.

"No, you don't. You can't possibly. Not until you have children of your own. I would do anything for you. Anything to keep you from harm. I would burn cities to the ground. You are all that matters. From the moment you came into this world. My boy. My only boy."

As she hugged him, Cersei felt tears rolling on her cheeks, and for a moment, a very short moment, she thought she would actually do everything to save Margaery, only to see her son happy.

Later, she went back to see Qyburn who told her that Vallis confessed to laying with Margaery and her brother, both of them. She also asked him if they received any word from the Arbor, Casterly Rock or Tarly's army. Of course, they had none. It hadn't been long enough since they sent the messages. Cersei had used the last two weeks to strengthen her position in the Red Keep. The Tyrell guards couldn't send her out since the king forbade them to do so and the Lannister guards in the city were on her side. As for the City Watch, they were no threat with the Faith Militia patrolling everywhere and powerless to stop the High Septon. She had all the cards in her hand, at least inside the city. Outside was another story.

She had ordered the Redwyne fleet to turn around and to sail for Planky Town instead of the Iron Islands. The Greyjoys were no threat for now, with their king dead and a new one, an exiled brother, who just arrived. They were disorganized and in civil war. Cersei felt some sympathy for Balon's daughter, whose claim upon the Iron Islands had been discarded by her uncle, just like Cersei's claim on Casterly Rock had been set aside for Tyrion, all that because she was a woman. She wouldn't let the Redwynes approach Casterly Rock.

She also sent another message to Casterly Rock, this time written and signed by her. Those she sent to Tarly and Lord Redwyne were signed by Tommen, who signed everything that was presented to him without a glare like he always did. She asked Genna to send her as many men as she could in the capital. She needed an army at hands for when Tarly would come back, and to face Tyrion eventually. She hadn't forgotten her wretched little brother. She would never forget him, less than ever now that his wife was about to have a child. She would have to deal with them. She would kill Tyrion. She would kill Sansa. She would kill their child. She wouldn't let a child of this creature live so he could try to murder her later. She was the daughter of Tywin Lannister. She would crush her enemies under the ground.

Cersei gave a list of people she wanted on the small council to Qyburn. In the king's absence, she took back the power. She decided to keep Harys Swyft as Master of Coin and to acknowledge Selwyn Tarth as Master of Laws. He was still on his way to the capital. His nomination may keep the Stormlands on their side and the office wasn't very important anyway. Qyburn didn't show much surprise when he saw she named him Master of Whisperers. She also decided to name Aurane Waters, a bastard of House Velaryon, as new Master of Ships in replacement of Lord Paxter Redwyne. Finally, she decided to let Randyll Tarly keep the position of Hand of the King for the duration of the war with Dorne. When it would be over and the Martells were dead, she would reward him with some lands in Dorne along with the charge of governing it and give the badge of Hand to Jaime. Hopefully, the people of Dorne would kill Tarly like they did with a Tyrell whose name she didn't remember.

Cersei felt very happy by the end of the day. She was back in command, ruling like she should always have, and this time no one could stop her. Her father, Kevan, Tyrion, Margaery, Robert… None of them could stop her. She was the queen. It was with these thoughts that she went to see Margaery like she said she would to Tommen. There would be no way for her to get out of it. Not only could she face judgment for perjury, but also for fornication and all the so-called sexual crimes she and the High Sparrow could think about. Cersei had more than enough proofs against her, and by forcing a few of her handmaidens and cousins to confess in order to avoid public humiliation, like Megga Tyrell or the handmaiden, that Sara Mirwell, there would be no way for Margaery to get out of it. She would make sure that other people would follow her in her downfall.

Cersei was escorted to the Great Sept of Baelor by her own guards. Before that, she went to see Tommen once more, to see if he would eat something, but again he didn't. She left after her first attempt. They were welcomed by a band of stinking Sparrows who ordered her men to stay behind.
Before their stubborness, Cersei gave in and told her guards to wait for her. She would need to have a word with the new High Septon about this. However, when she asked to be led to him, the Faith Militia told her he was praying. She could meet him after his prayers were over. Cersei needed to have many good words with the High Sparrow. She couldn't let him believe that prayers had the priority on the queen. Still, she bit her lip. She had to see Margaery first.

A stoic Sparrow led her to the cell. Cersei was glad for his silence. She had nothing to say to beggars. He opened a door for her after looking inside. The things Cersei saw inside were at the same time disgustful and delightful. The little rose turned her head as soon as she entered. She wore nothing but a grey woolen tunic. No jewel, nothing in her hair, no silk or finery, no shoes. Nothing at all. The little whore had found her rightful place. Dirt incrusted every part of her, from her fingernails to her hair. Tommen wouldn't want her back in his bed if he saw her like that. All her beauty was gone. Cersei had never found her pretty. Her beauty was mostly youth and gowns and jewels. Without all that attire, she was nothing. Anyone could have mistaken her for a whore in Flea Bottom. The more beautiful queen was gone. Only men like Robert or Tyrion would want such a woman now, since they wanted every woman.

"This is horrible. Unacceptable. Are they feeding you enough at least?" Cersei asked, faking concern. "I brought you this. Venison. It's quite good. I had it myself at supper only last night." Tommen had asked to bring her some food, so Cersei obliged. She laid the bowl right next to Margaery, who stared away. "We did everything we could from the moment they took your brother. Tommen even went to the sept himself to confront the High Sparrow. But I fear the Faith has left reason behind."

"I know you did this." These were the first words she pronounced. Cersei denied her affirmation.

"We are making every effort on your behalf. I swear to you by all the seven gods."

"Lies come easily to you. Everyone knows that. But innocence, decency, concern, you're not very good at those, I'm afraid. Perhaps that's why your son was so eager to cast you aside for me."

How did she dare? She was locked up in a cell, and she dared to say such things? She knew nothing. Tommen was her son. I love her. I'll start a war if I have to. Tommen was her son.

"You're upset. You're not thinking clearly. I'll visit again when you've had a chance to calm down," said Cersei. If Margaery wanted to stay alone, then she would stay alone, isolated, without any good food, and that would make her even more miserable.

"I don't want to see you again."

Cersei kept the facade. She kept some of it. "I do hope you change your mind about that. I've been told men often go mad in the black bells beneath the Red Keep. Though I suppose your isolation will end when your trial begins."

"You will face trial you too, soon. Leave." She was rambling now.

"Yes. I'm afraid I must. My son needs me now more than ever."

"GET OUT, YOU HATEFUL BITCH!" She threw the bowl on the wall and looked at Cersei directly into the eyes. "YOU WILL PAY FOR THIS! THE LANNISTERS ARE NOT THE ONLY ONES TO PAY THEIR DEBTS!"

Cersei didn't expect this reaction, but she was glad to see it. Someone unlocked the door behind her. She wished a good sleep to her sister before she left. Behind the door was a septa instead of a Sparrow now. She closed the door behind Cersei.

"The High Septon is ready to receive you, your Grace," she said with an accent.

She led Cersei through the corridors. Cersei would remember this conversation with Margaery for a very long time. She was willing to forget about the lack of respect the High Sparrow showed her if he ensured Margaery would be dealt with. Now, she was the queen, the true queen.

The septa brought her to a small room with a very small altar. The High Septon was sitting. He didn't kneel, nor raised, nor even bowed before her. Once this business with Margaery and her brother would be concluded, she would have to remind him of who he stood before.

"Thank you, Septa Yeten."

The septa closed the door behind her, leaving Cersei alone with the High Sparrow.

"You saw her?" he asked.

"Yes."

"And?"

"Her accommodations seem sufficient. What happens to her now?"

"Well, she and her brother are both being held under fair suspicion. A trial will be held for each of them to determine if they're guilty of any acts that might constitute a violation of the tenets of the faith."

"Who will stand judge?"

"Seven septons as it was in all trials before the Targaryens."

"Will you be one of them?"

"I will." He smiled when she asked. She couldn't stop smiling as well.

"If one or both of them were to confess before the trial…"

"Then they will be shown the Mother's mercy."

"And what does the Mother's mercy entail?"

"It depends upon the situation. The acts themselves, the degree of contrition."

"Thank you, High Septon, for bringing them whatever justice they deserve… in the eyes of the Seven," she added after a time. "I led my own inquiries in the Red Keep and found several people who confessed crimes and sins in which Queen Margaery and her brother took part, and who identified other people who took part to these sinful actions. Highborn people, powerful people, protected by privilege as well. I'm afraid some of them are members of my own family."

"Well, in this case, they should come here and confess their crimes to the Seven. This way their souls will be cleaned."

"And they could be asked as witnesses for the trial."

"Eventually."
"Thank you. I'll tell them to come for you, so they can confess and wash themselves from their sins."

Cersei started to walk away. Soon, the Imp and his little bitch of a wife would have the Faith against them. She would have more than enough reason to deprive them of any title or power they had.

"Did you know this chapel is one of the oldest structures in King's Landing?"

Cersei stopped. She had never heard of this. "I think I may have heard at one point."

"Baelor built his sept around it. But men worshipped here long before him. Who carved this altar? Do you know?"

"I'm afraid I don't." Cersei was beginning to get bored. She wasn't in need of a history lesson.

"No one does. There's no name on it or anywhere else in the chapel. No, the people who built this place didn't inflict their vanity on those who came after them the way Baelor did with that great gilded monstrosity up there. Their faith was clean. Strip away the gold and the ornaments, knock down the statues on the pillars, and this is what remains. Something simple and solid and true." He wandered his hand on the rudely made altar. Cersei never saw someone give so much importance to something that had none. "The Tyrell's finery will be stripped away. Their lies knocked down. Their true hearts laid bare for all to see. And so it will be for all of us. High and low alike. What will we find when we strip away your finery?"

He looked straight at her now. Did Cersei hear well? Was he threatening her? He couldn't. Everything he had, he had it thanks to her. He owed his power to her. Everything he had came from her and she could take it away from him whenever it pleased her. He was a beggar, nothing more.

He resumed to speak. "On my way to King's Landing, I met a young man. He was going to join a community on an island. We talked together. He was broken, both in body and spirit. He had so much to strip away. So much weighing him down. But piece by piece, he unburdened himself. I helped him to do so, to find forgiveness and enlightenment. He let go of vanity, pride, sin. I saw him again not long ago. Now his soul is so light, he will float through the Seven Heavens like a bird. He also had much to say about you, and he told us everything."

A door opened in the corner. She heard footsteps. He came in her field of view and stood next to the High Sparrow. His eyes were cast down. He wore a ragged tunic made of wool, just like Margaery. He didn't lift his eyes, but Cersei recognized him. He was just like he was during the trial. He was the man Sansa Stark brought to destroy her. Lancel Lannister. The High Sparrow was looking at her with harshness. It was time to leave.

Cersei turned on her heels and walked to the door. It opened to reveal a septa. She wasn't the one who led Cersei here. She looked straight in front of her, not looking at Cersei. She blocked the way.

"Move." She looked at Cersei on the order she gave. She tried to get past her, but couldn't. "Let me go immediately," Cersei ordered again. Cersei tried to struggle to pass, but instead the septa grabbed her by the arms. "You will order her to let me go. I am the queen! I am the queen! Have you lost your mind? Let me go! Get your filthy hands out of me! Have you lost your mind? I am the queen! Let me go!"

She kept shouting and struggling as she was brought out. She almost managed to escape once, but other septas came to help the other one. They kept bringing her forward, opened a door and threw her inside.

She called after the septa who seized her. "Look at me. Look at my face. It's the last thing you'll see before you die."

The septa's face betrayed no emotion. She closed the door and Cersei heard the locks outside. She was trapped.

Later, four septas came inside her cell and tore her clothes out from her. Cersei resisted, but they prevailed and only left her a tunic of wool, like the one Margaery had before. In a fit of rage, Cersei tore the tunic. They tore her clothes, she would tear their own. She even tore the veil from one of them before they left.

Cersei realized quickly that it had been a mistake. It was very cold down here. Winter was close. She had nothing to wear. She stayed there, shivering, for hours. Finally, the door opened and the septa who showed her the way to the High Sparrow not long before came in, another tunic under her arm, a piece of black bread and a bowl of water in her hands.

"How is my son?" Cersei asked, trying to inspire some pity in the woman. She wasn't with the ones who brought her here or stripped her from her clothes, as far as she knew. She ignored Cersei, dropped the tunic next to her and laid the bread and water on the floor. Her hand toppled the cup of water as she laid the bread and all its content poured on the floor.

"How is my son?" Cersei repeated. "Let me speak to the High Septon."

She looked at Cersei then and smiled. She had the impression she saw it before.

"You will face trial you too, soon. You will pay for your crimes and your sins. The Lannisters are not the only ones to pay their debts."

She grinned at Cersei. She had barely whispered it. Only Cersei could have heard this. She left without any other word. The door closed behind her, leaving Cersei to slowly realize where this accent came from.

Chapter End Notes

Like always, Cersei's schemes work out very well (sarcasm). Now Tommen really has no one at his side. What's the worst? To have only Cersei at your side, or to have no one at all at your side?

Please review

Next chapter: Trystane
There were some mysteries in the previous chapters. To tease you one more time, a few of them will be enlightened in this chapter... only to be replaced by other mysteries.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

"The repairs on the walls are complete. We managed to pay all the workers, something we wouldn't have been able to do a few months ago, and now the construction of the new dromonds is begun. It will take time to build them. The first will be ready in two months, at best."

"I know," Trystane replied to Branfield.

They would never be able to entirely replace the fleet of Meereen, but it would be better to have a few ships than to have none at all, and they needed to go back to Westeros as soon as the Queen would come back. News had arrived from the Seven Kingdoms recently and they weren't good. Ser Kevan Lannister, the Hand of the King, and the Grand Maester Pycelle had been found assassinated inside the Red Keep. The Crown had accused Dorne of the murders. Trystane found it unlikely that his father was behind this. He wanted to delay the war, not precipitate it. However, he had no difficulty to believe that Nymeria was behind this and that she acted of her own will, against his father's orders. He knew she and Tyene were in the capital. He hoped they got killed there. He also hoped Obara died at Oldtown, though she had lesser chance to be found there. As for Sarella... She had no part in the murder. She didn't deserve to die. Trystane hoped she was well.

"Any murder these last days?" he asked.

"None that were the doing of the Sons of the Harpy," replied Branfield with a smile.

"Why are you so happy?" Trystane asked him. Malcolm was more cheerful than usual recently. He hadn't looked that happy when Meereen started to recover and to come back to life.

"Nothing. Only, I got news yesterday, from Oldtown. I have a niece. She was in the south when the war started. She wasn't at Ironrath when it was destroyed. I just learnt she got married." His face saddened a little. "I wish I had been there to assist the ceremony. She's my last niece, and I'm all the family she's got now."

"I'm sorry."

"It's been years since I last saw her. She was still a child when she left Ironrath. She must be a woman now. I wonder how she looks like. She was quite pretty the last time I saw her. She must have grown quite beautiful."

"I'm sure the queen will let you see her when we go back to Westeros."

"Let's hope then she will come back soon. We have no news from Ser Jorah and Daario Naharis."

"She will come back. She must come back."
She really had to. If Daenerys Targaryen didn't come back immediately, House Martell was doomed. His father told him before he left that they didn't have the means to fight the Lannisters and the Tyrells at the same time. They needed Daenerys and her dragons, and her Unsullied, and her mercenaries. They needed everything she could bring them.

"Let's have a drink," declared Malcolm Branfield. "Meereen was about to devour itself not long ago. Now it's like a man reborn. It deserves a toast, and my niece's wedding as well, even if it's months late."

They drank to Meereen and his niece. They were in Trystane's apartments. The pact with the masters of Astapor, Yunkai and Volantis had proved to be a good thing finally. The Sons of the Harpy had stopped killing, and former slaves had stopped killing former masters. Trade had resumed, people were gathering in the streets and the markets. The people were behind Daenerys Targaryen again. It seemed things had worked out well. Trystane drank, though he didn't taste the wine very much. His family was still in danger and they had no word from the queen. Then again, he missed Myrcella. He managed to rule a city without her, but he missed her all the same. A dragon queen wouldn't replace her.

"I do hope me too that the queen will return soon," said Malcolm. "I don't want to linger here longer than necessary and I always feel out of place when I walk in the streets, especially with all these priests preaching everywhere that our queen is the Lord's Chosen One, Azor Ahai reborn and a thousand other things. She already has more than enough titles. There's no need to add more," he said with a nervous chuckle.

"We don't have to introduce her with these in the future," replied Trystane.

"Really? I doubt it."

"What do you mean?"

"The red priests are becoming powerful. They have influence all over the city and this influence keeps growing. The people are listening to them. They could be a threat."

"The High Priestess and her order have helped us so far."

"Yes, so far, but who's telling that they won't turn against us sooner or later?"

"I don't believe they will turn on us, not if they believe that Daenerys is the Prince that was promised."

"Well, that's the problem. Their loyalty is based on their faith. They follow Daenerys because they believe she is their savior. What if they no longer believe she is the savior?"

Trystane laid his cup on the table. "Without Kinvara, Meereen could still be in chaos. She helped us to make peace with the other cities, restored the faith of the people in our queen and helped us chase down the Sons of the Harpy. Thanks to her, we even have eyes in the other cities."

"I don't trust her," declared Malcolm. "She has her own agenda. Have you seen what happened to Stannis Baratheon? He's dead, and he followed a red priestess."

"We're not following her. We're only using her help, and that's not as if she asked us for the other religions to be banned from the city or for the heretics to burn. We've seen nothing of it."

"Still, she has her own goals."
"She says she wants to help Daenerys."

"Then let's hope that for her, help doesn't mean advising to make the Red God the only god in Westeros."

"Do you think our queen would listen to that kind of advice?" Trystane asked. He had no idea what kind of decision Daenerys Targaryen would take.

"I never saw her pray. From what I know, she's not a great believer. I don't think she will let that woman convince her with speeches that she is the Prince that was promised, but still. Her priests are at the source of all the trust the people put in us. They rented and even bought houses for their followers. The last time I saw the High Priestess, she was talking with one of her men about the possibility to build a temple, like the one in Volantis, and recently she went to see the dragons."

"What?!" Trystane couldn't have been more surprised.

"Yes. She entered their cave, stayed there some time, then left. I don't know what she did, but I don't like it. No one has approached the dragons for months, not ever since the queen left. They wouldn't eat anything. But she went in and out, without a scratch."

"Why didn't we tell me?"

"Apparently, the Unsullied in post only reported it much later. They didn't think it was worthy of reporting."

"Not worthy of reporting?!!"

"Some have joined the faith in the Lord of Light. It's not only the people who are gathering around the priests. It's the soldiers too, now."

That was preoccupying. Trystane had welcomed the help that Kinvara provided, but he never thought that the Unsullied would start taking her side. Of course, she was at the origin of most of the peace Meereen knew, but Daenerys was still the queen and she and her clergy always told everyone to serve the Mother of Dragons. However, if soldiers failed to report things like that… They couldn't let anybody go and see the dragons like that.

"We'll have to address this matter soon," Trystane only said.

Once they had reviewed the financial and security matters, Malcolm Branfield left and Trystane found himself alone again. He couldn't support to stay alone. Whenever he was alone, his thoughts would turn to Myrcella or to his family in danger. He needed to go on. Work was the only way he had found to not think about the people he loved and who he lost, or who he may lose. He ordered an Unsullied to summon the High Priestess.

Half an hour later, Kinvara entered Trystane's rooms, all wrapped in her heavy gown. He wondered how she managed to wear it all day without showing any sign of sweat or heat or tiredness.

"You asked for me, Prince Trystane?" she asked.

"Yes. Please, sit." She did so. "I've heard that you paid a visit to the queen's dragons not long ago."

"I did." She didn't seem surprised that he knew it.

"High Priestess, I must order you to not approach the dragons without our consent. No one but the queen approached them before she left and I know she wouldn't want everyone to get near them. We
"I meant no harm to the dragons, and I mean no harm for them in the future," Kinvara interrupted. "I was merely curious. Dragons are fire made flesh and they are Daenerys Stormborn's children. You need not fear when I'm with them."

"No one can approach them," Trystane stated.

"Why?" she asked, still looking as calm as if they were having a glass of wine.

"Because they belong to the queen and we cannot allow…"

"Nothing happened to them, Prince Trystane. I agree the dragons must be protected from the Sons of the Harpy, but they have nothing to fear from me. I serve the queen, and the queen is their mother. In fact, if the dragons were to be protected from someone, it should be from you."

Trystane was quite taken aback by this statement. "What do you mean?"

"You come from a foreign land, Prince Trystane, and yet you rule this city. You never met Daenerys Stormborn, and yet you assume government in her absence. Your people in Westeros have been the staunchest opponents to the Targaryens when they came to this country, and yet you claim you want to help them. You are supposed to marry Daenerys, but we all know your heart belongs to someone else."

Trystane couldn't answer for a time. She kept looking at him, calm. Her face didn't show anger. She almost looked sad. Trystane always felt strange in her presence. Uneasiness always fought serenity when Kinvara was around.

"We both serve Daenerys Stormborn," she said. "As long as you serve her, you can count on my help, but don't presume to tell me everything I should do. Daenerys Targaryen is Queen of Meereen, and neither you or me has any legitimacy in ruling this place since she didn't choose us to rule in her absence. However, if we don't work together, this city will fall before the queen returns. So don't pretend you're capable of giving orders to me. My loyalty is to Daenerys, not to her possible future husband."

She kept talking in a very calm, but also firm voice. There was no place left for discussion about it. The red priests are becoming powerful. They have influence all over the city. The people are listening to them. They could be a threat. Trystane remembered that right before he left, there were rumors of religious fanatics causing trouble in King's Landing. Malcolm Branfield may be right after all. They had to be careful with the followers of the Lord of Light. However, it was obvious he couldn't force Kinvara to not visit the dragons. Still, there was something else he could do.

"May I know what you did in the dragon's cave, at least?" he asked.

Before Kinvara could answer, Bhakaz came inside. "Prince Trystane, there's a man who says he needs to speak to you in the audience chamber. He says it's urgent and needs to speak with you immediately."

"What does he want to speak to me about?" Trystane asked.

"He says the survival of Meereen may depend upon you hearing what he has to say. He says the city is in danger."

"Very well. I'm coming."
Trystane rose and walked to the hall. The High Priestess followed him. He didn't see how he could get rid of her. That wasn't as if he could order the Unsullied to throw her outside. As they entered the audience chamber at the top of the stairs, Trystane saw the man waiting for them. He was plump. He wore a cloak commonly used by travellers and it was obvious he had travelled a long time to come here. He wasn't dressed like people from Slaver's Bay. Trystane would say his garb was more pentoshi or lyseni. He had a very round face and a bald head. He bowed to Trystane when he entered.

"Prince Trystane, it is a pleasure, an honor, and a relief to meet you here," he said.

"Who do I have the honor to speak to?" Trystane asked, skeptical.

"You probably heard about me, my prince. My name is Varys. I am also known as the Spider, and some call me the Eunuch."

Trystane went numb immediately. Lord Varys, the Spider, was the Master of Whisperers, the man who knew everything about everyone in Westeros according to some people. He had worked for the Mad King, then for Robert Baratheon and his two sons after him. Well, he knew they weren't his sons now. He had worked for the children of Cersei and Jaime Lannister. And now here he was, standing before him. His father told Trystane before he left that the Spider gave him information about the Crown and the true parentage of Cersei's children. This man told his lord father that Myrcella was a bastard born of incest. For a moment, Trystane wanted to punch him in the face and break all his teeth. Myrcella wasn't born of incest.

"What are you doing here?" Trystane found himself asking, his voice hard without thinking.

"I have important information for you. Though, before I tell you about it, may I know who is this lady with you?"

Trystane turned to his right. He had almost forgotten that Kinvara was present. "This is the Lady Kinvara. She is the High Priestess of the Red Temple of Volantis."

The plump man looked at the High Priestess with something that looked between fear and hatred. "I will only speak to you, Prince Trystane."

"Why is that, Lord Varys?" the High Priestess asked.

"Forgive me, my lady, but I do not trust fanatics. They always believe they are right. That is the point with being a fanatic. You can never be wrong."

"I am no lady, Lord Varys. No more than you are a lord, in fact. However, if someone was to not be trusted here, it would be you. You served four kings up to now. One of them was the man who killed our queen's brother, and two others were the grandsons of the man who ordered the slaughter of her niece and nephew and the sons of the man who murdered her father. Why should we believe what you say?"

"I will only answer to the queen and to her representative, that is, Prince Trystane of Dorne."

"You will say what you have to say in my presence and in the presence of the High Priestess, or you will say nothing."

Trystane was surprised by his own words. Perhaps it was because he despised Varys for telling his father about his betrothed's origins, perhaps because he trusted Kinvara more than everyone else in this city, but he said it. The eunuch looked taken aback by his words. He hesitated for a moment, then he bowed slightly.
"As you wish, my prince. May we find a more private place, where we could sit. I'm afraid I'm quite tired after the long trip I made."

Trystane agreed. He sent people to fetch Malcolm Branfield and Grey Worm. They needed to be there for this too. An hour later, after Lord Varys had the time to rest a little, they were all in Trystane's quarters. The eunuch deeply drank from a cup of wine.

"Thank you, my prince. This is much appreciated after a long journey," he said.

"Tell us why you're here," said Trystane, his voice still hard. He didn't want to waste his time with this man.

"Oh, yes, you're right. We have no time to lose. Here is why I'm here. Volantis is preparing an attack against Meereen."

It was as if he cast a spell on the room. Everyone went silent, even Kinvara. "Are you sure?"

"Quite sure. In fact, their fleet is approaching. The ship I used to come here wasn't far before their armada. They are only a few days away from the city now."

Trystane couldn't believe it. "Why would they do such a thing? We made peace!"

"I warned you, Prince Trystane. The masters are not going to give up on slavery," Kinvara said.

Trystane turned to her. "Your men in Volantis, have they heard anything about this?"

"As I told you some time ago, a great fleet left the city. The triarchs said it was going to side with Myr against the city of Lys and my men in Volantis didn't find anything that denied this version, but it is possible the fleet is in fact meant to attack Meereen. They may have hidden the true destination to the soldiers. It is quite possible that only the superior officers are aware of their true objective."

"The masters are afraid of the regained prosperity of Meereen," Lord Varys resumed. "They don't want a city without slaves to succeed, or else this will be the end of their power."

Trystane couldn't believe it. He had done everything he could. He made peace with the masters, allowed them to keep their riches and their power, and even allowed them to abolish slavery progressively instead of immediately, and yet they decided to wage war against them. They made a pact, and they decided to ignore it. What were they going to do? They didn't have enough forces to fight Volantis. They just repaired the walls and they had no fleet at all to face the triarchs. And Daenerys was yet to be seen. It was a catastrophe.

"Did they send an army by land?" asked Grey Worm from afar.

"As far as I know, all their forces were sent by sea," replied the eunuch.

"No, they couldn't send soldiers through the land. Everyone in Volantis would have seen it. My order would have warned me," said Kinvara.

"Wait. How can we know this man is telling the truth?" asked Branfield. "He worked for Robert Baratheon, and then for Joffrey and Tommen Baratheon. How do we know this is not a ruse?"

"Why would I lie to you about it, Lord…?" asked the eunuch.

"Malcolm Branfield."

"Well, my lord, why would I lie? What interest would I have in it? Why would I come here myself and risk my head only to warn you about a false attack?"

"Indeed, why? Why would you want to help us?"

"Because Lord Varys is a Targaryen supporter," declared Kinvara. Everyone looked at her. "He's been working for twenty years now to bring back the Targaryens on the Iron Throne. He has several allies in the Free Cities, especially in Pentos. One of his associates, Illyrio Mopatis, organized the marriage between Daenerys Stormborn and Khal Drogo."

Lord Varys seemed quite surprised by this. "I see you are well informed, High Priestess," he said. "Information has made you powerful, Lord Varys, but there's still so much you don't know. Even I, an honest servant of the Lord of Light, don't know everything. But I'm quite sure you must know who killed the Hand of the King and the Grand Maester in King's Landing. After all, you disappeared not long afterwards."

"I know that well enough. Because I'm the one who killed Ser Kevan."

Trystane's eyes widened. "You killed the Hand of the King?"

"I did."

"So it is true," stated Kinvara, her voice sounding harder than usual.

"I regret it, but I had to kill him. I used the help of Prince Trystane's cousin, Lady Nymeria Sand. I made her use secret passages to kill Pycelle, and then I killed Ser Kevan with a bolt in the heart and my little birds did the rest. Lady Nymeria is now safe, on her way back to Dorne. I made sure the murder would look suspicious and that the Tyrells and the Lannisters would suspect each other."

"They didn't," said Trystane, angry. "They declared war against my family. My father was trying to gain time, to let Daenerys come to Westeros before he went to war. Your actions triggered a war my family could lose."

"Well, I knew the Crown would declare war against Dorne, but that is a good thing in the end. Most of the Lannister forces are in the North and will remain there for a long time. Lord Tywin, Ser Kevan and Lord Tyrion were the only people in this family who could lead it well. The first two are dead and the third is far away in the North, fighting for his wife's home. He won't be able to come back in the south before long. The Lannisters are without capable leadership. The Crown relies entirely on the power of the Reach."

"Well, the Reach has declared war against Dorne."

"Dorne should keep them at bay for a time. The kingdom is not easy to conquer. The Targaryens themselves experienced it during Aegon's Conquest. They will hold the Tyrell army long enough to let the necessary events happen in the capital."

"What do you mean?"

"Nymeria Sand is not the only Sand Snake I was in contact with. I also had contacts with Tyene Sand, who just happens to have infiltrated the Sparrows, a group of religious fanatics who worship the Seven." He looked at Kinvara as he said the latter sentence. "The Sparrows have limited their activities recently, giving the impression they had been defeated or that they were gone, but in fact they're waiting for the right moment. Randyll Tarly was named Hand of the King after Ser Kevan died and he left the capital with most of his men. In the Red Keep, the only people left are King Tommen, Queen Margaery Tyrell and Cersei Lannister. The king is a sweet boy who's unable to take decisions, and his wife and mother are fighting to get his attention. Lady Tyene is supposed to make sure the Sparrows start again their uprising once the forces of the Reach are far away. While the Reach is trying to invade Dorne, the Sparrows will take control of the city. The queen and the Queen Mother won't be able to face them. They will lose their time fighting each other. Chaos will reign in the city, and when Daenerys Stormborn comes with her dragons and her army to defeat the Sparrows, deposit the bastard king and bring back peace, the people will side with her. Cersei Lannister will have ruined the alliance between the Lannisters and the Tyrells in the meantime. Once she has succeeded, the Tyrells will have no choice but to side with our queen when she crosses the Narrow Sea, and then it will be the end of the Lannisters. Without allies, they won't stand a chance."

Trystane didn't know if he should find this plan stupid, brilliant or horrible. The eunuch was planning to let religious fanatics take over the city of King's Landing, and his cousin Tyene, who had killed Myrcella, would help them. The fact that Varys cooperated with his two cousins didn't make him more sympathetic in Trystane's eyes. The plan relied on several precise circumstances. They had to hope that Cersei Lannister and Margaery Tyrell would fight each other, that King Tommen couldn't take a decision, that the Sparrows' uprising would work, that his father's army would hold in the Dornish Marches… It depended on so much. There was also one big problem.

"Daenerys Targaryen is not in Meereen," Trystane revealed. "She disappeared on the back of her dragon months ago and we don't know where she is."

"Well, in this case, let's hope she returns quickly. She'll come back. She has to. My heart's been broken too many times already. In all cases, if Meereen falls, I don't give much chance to our queen to ever sail for Westeros."

Another long silence followed as everyone processed the information they just heard. Meereen was in danger.

"I'm still not sure we can trust him," finally said Malcolm.

"He has no reason to lie. He has nothing to gain from it," said Kinvara. "I say we should keep him inside the Great Pyramid under guard. If the Volantenese fleet attack, we'll know he was telling the truth. In the meantime, we should prepare for a siege."

She turned to Trystane. He needed some time before he realized they had to do something. "Yes, we must prepare for their arrival." He nodded to Grey Worm who called two of his men inside the room. They escorted Lord Varys outside and Trystane resumed to speak. "We should double the guard on the battlements and the patrol in the streets, especially at night. The Sons of the Harpy may start again to be active. Do we have any ship to patrol the sea for us?"

"Not yet. The construction just began," answered Malcolm Branfield. "We should take the former masters of the city hostage inside the pyramids. This might make the Sons of the Harpy think twice before they start to murder again."

"The Sons of the Harpy are no longer between the hands of the Great Masters," countered Kinvara. "They will attack no matter what happens to them. However, some former masters could supply information if they are informers for Volantis. I will reveal the coming attack to the people and call them to arms. They will fight for their freedom. The fear of the freedmen should make some masters think twice if we offer them protection for their family against information about the attack."

"I'm not sure it's a good thing to warn the people," said Trystane, uncertain. "We don't know for sure…"

"Lord Varys is saying the truth. He has nothing to gain from this. My priests will warn the people.
We will also bring the children and women to safety. My order had shelters prepared all over the city for this eventuality. We should start preparing for the assault right now."

Trystane was defeated. There was nothing he could do. They needed the people more than ever, and they needed Kinvara to have the people on their side. He wasn't persuaded that it was a good idea to inform the people, in case Varys lied, but if what he said was true, then it would be useful to have the full city ready to fight against the masters of Volantis.

They all spent the next three days in preparation for the upcoming assault. They reinforced the walls, manned the gates and the battlements, increased the patrols and sent fishing ships as far as they could to see if there was any sign of the Volantenese fleet. People started to patrol in the streets in bands as well.

Kinvara had informed the people through her priests. This had the benefit to make the former slaves more willing to help against the coming attack, but this also brought its own set of problems. The former slaves started to sack houses that belonged to families of former masters and to kill their inhabitants. No one from the ancient families dared to leave the pyramids where they lived. Without the Fiery Hand, the city would have fallen into chaos. Kinvara had started to create an elite group of warriors devoted to the Lord of Light, hence under her direct command, on the model of the Fiery Hand that defended the Red Temple of Volantis. While they were a thousand slaves in Volantis to serve in this elite force, she only had time to recruit half of them in Meereen, and here they were free men. The twenty guards from this Fiery Hand in Volantis who had joined their High Priestess in Meereen had trained the members of the new Fiery Hand. Their training was basic, but they were trained to fight in the streets, which made them quite dangerous and efficient. They helped the Unsullied to maintain peace.

Many former masters turned in the Great Pyramid, claiming to have information about the assault or about the Sons of the Harpy. Trystane found out that many of them had no valuable information and were only looking for protection. Some, however, really provided useful details. One in particular had been involved in the attack of Daznak's Pit. He gave many names of people who participated to this. There were people from Meereen, Astapor, Yunkai, Volantis, and even a few masters from other cities like New Ghis and Myr. The ambassadors of Yunkai and Volantis who came two months ago to negotiate were among the organizers. He confirmed Kinvara's information that many Meereenese masters who helped to organize this slaughter died that day, betrayed by their allies from the other cities. Most of the people who came with information had nothing of value. Some only heard rumors, and many invented stories.

On the third night, twelve Unsullied and seven former slaves were assassinated. Everyone concluded this was the work of the Sons of the Harpy. Trystane found out that many of them had no valuable information and were only looking for protection. Some, however, really provided useful details. One in particular had been involved in the attack of Daznak's Pit. He gave many names of people who participated to this. There were people from Meereen, Astapor, Yunkai, Volantis, and even a few masters from other cities like New Ghis and Myr. The ambassadors of Yunkai and Volantis who came two months ago to negotiate were among the organizers. He confirmed Kinvara's information that many Meereenese masters who helped to organize this slaughter died that day, betrayed by their allies from the other cities. Most of the people who came with information had nothing of value. Some only heard rumors, and many invented stories.

As the ships were pelting the city with their projectiles, the Sons of the Harpy made their appearance in numbers. Bands of freedmen and Unsullied fought them in close quarters, and the new Fiery Hand fought them too. They lost many men. By the night, the situation was desperate. The ships kept raining fire on them and the streets were in chaos. They met in the council room, Trystane, Varys, Grey Worm, Kinvara and Malcolm Branfield. They accepted the Master of Whisperers since he told them the truth about the attack.
"We took heavy losses in the streets," exposed Grey Worm. "Our men on the battlements are cut from us and under the fire of the enemy."

"It was a trap," observed the Spider.

"I think we already figured it out," retorted Branfield.

"Perhaps if we try to make a breakthrough through the Sons of the Harpy with a strong squad…" began Trystane.

"No more talking from you. Your talking gave us this," cut Grey Worm. The Commander of the Unsullied wasn't happy. Trystane didn't believe he would stay at the head of Meereen for long.

"The masters would have attacked one day or another, anyway," said Kinvara. "It's not the time to find out who's responsible for this."

"She's right," approved Trystane, happy that she was here again. "We must repel the invaders. We must clear the way to the battlements."

"You're trying to tell me what the army should do. You do not know what the army should do," stated Grey Worm.

Trystane had nothing to reply to his. He had no experience in battle, it was true. He was trained by a master-at-arms, but he had no experience of real battle, nor as a general nor as a soldier.

"All right," conceded the Prince of Dorne. "What should the army do?" he asked around. The question was mostly for Grey Worm and Branfield. They were the only ones with military experience here.

"We won't send men to the battlements," decided Grey Worm. "We would lose more of them and the masters could try to take the pyramids then. The pyramids are the only places in the city we can defend. We stay here. We wait for them to come to us, then we fight them."

"The Unsullied should stay on the pyramids," agreed Branfield. "They're not trained or armed to fight in the streets. However, we should send the Second Sons and the bands of freedmen to try to make a breach from the battlements to the closest pyramids. They are better to fight in streets against assassins than the Unsullied. Let's send them to make a safe corridor though the western part of the city. We would need the men of the High Priestess as well."

"The Fiery Hand is busy helping the people escape the western part of Meereen for the eastern one, far from the docks and the battlements giving on the bay. I'll send a hundred of them with you and they'll help the refugees to escape," said the High Priestess.

"So we wait," said Trystane.

"Too bad we don't have pigshit for the fleet," said Varys with a smile.

"Pigshit?"

"That's how Lord Tyrion Lannister used to call wildfire, while he prepared King's Landing for the attack of Stannis Baratheon. I regret we don't have wildfire here, or him. The little lord could be of help. I wish I had been able to bring him on our queen's side."

"A Lannister? On the side of a Targaryen? His nephew is sitting on the Iron Throne."
"There are many things you don't know about Tyrion Lannister, my prince. You would be surprised. And weren't you betrothed to the king's sister not long ago?"

Trystane had nothing to say to that. The thought of Myrcella was still painful. "How strange you speak so highly of a Lannister, and yet you killed his uncle in cold blood," declared Kinvara.

"I regret that I had to kill Ser Kevan," said Varys. "He was a good man, but he was standing in the way between Daenerys Targaryen and the Iron Throne. I did what was needed to be done."

"How many good men are you ready to kill because they stand in the way between our queen and her throne?"

The Spider didn't have time to answer the question from the priestess. A loud sound was heard, coming from the apex of the pyramid. The floor and the walls shook. The Unsullied took place on Grey Worm's silent command. Trystane and Malcolm Branfield unsheathed their swords. The only time Trystane had ever used his sword in a real fight was when he and Myrcella were attacked by his cousins. He hadn't succeeded to protect her. He had failed her. Did he fail to defend the city as well? Did he fail to save his family? Would his father and his younger cousins die? Loreza, who everyone called Loree, was only seven. Would she end like his aunt's children?

Varys went to hide behind a column. As for Kinvara, she didn't react first. She looked at the ceiling, as if she was examining something. She didn't try to take cover. She had no weapon. Then, an Unsullied opened the door and went outside on the balcony. Kinvara's eyes grew and she fell on her knees, faced turned to the opened door.

"Kinvara, what are you doing?" asked Trystane. Was she hoping to surrender to whoever was on the roof?

Then, all the Unsullied fell on their knees as well. Trystane looked around. Malcolm Branfield, right behind him, had a stunned look. He went on his knees too. Trystane looked at the door again to see a young woman with blond hair and a necklace with something that looked like a bone around her throat, standing there. He never saw blond hair like this. It was blonder than those of Myrcella. He realized everyone was one his knees. She looked at him, and then Trystane understood. He heard a screech far away.

He fell on his knees, the last of all of them, and only found two words to say. "Your Grace."

---

Chapter End Notes

Daenerys is back! It will still be a few chapters before she gets a new POV (there's a great bunch of chapters coming in the North), but she's back in the story after a long absence.

Please review

Next chapter: a northern lady
Mira VIII

Chapter Notes

The northern lady was Mira. Sorry for everyone who hoped they would see Sansa's baby. It will have to wait. But the battles are coming!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

MIRA VIII

She woke up, all alone. She dreamed of playing in the grove behind Ironrath. They were all here with her, all her brothers and Talia, and their parents too, looking at them. Even Ryon was there, though he had been too young to play with them back Mira still lived at home. That was only a dream. However, the dream was far more pleasant than it would have been a month ago. Mira stretched her legs and her arms, then removed the furs. The cold air made her shiver and she was quick to dress. Sansa wasn't the only one who had to get used again to the northern climate. Her tent was simple, but there was a bed with furs at least. It didn't bother her. She may have lived in the south among luxuries for a very long time, but she wasn't about to complain about a lifestyle close to the one she had in Ironrath, back when she was a child.

She covered herself well and went out. Men were already going all around to their occupations. She saw the sparring ground not far away and went there. People were already training. She saw Asher teaching Ryon how to fight. Mira smiled while she looked from a distance at her little brother trying to hold a sword straight. She still couldn't believe they were alive, Asher, Talia and Ryon. She had been sure for so long that they were dead. She should have known it wouldn't be that easy to destroy House Forrester. She was a living proof of that, and her brothers and Talia were Forresters just like her. Ryon had grown up. He was barely a baby when she left. Now he learned how to fight and squired for Jon Snow. She would never forget how he ran towards her when he saw her arrive in the camp. Gwyn had then brought her to the place where the Forrester forces were installed. She never thought she would see the white tree on a black field again. She hadn't recognized most of the men there, but when Gwyn had led her to a tent and brought her inside… Asher was just like she remembered him. He was sharpening his sword when she entered and looked up. There had been an awkward moment, but then after a few seconds he had opened his mouth and his sword had fallen on the ground. Talia was there as well, taller than in Mira's memories, and had a similar reaction, her mouth and eyes wide open. Then they ran to each other and hugged together in an embrace without end. There had been a long time afterwards when they had talked of everything that had happened, how they were all sure that Mira was dead while Mira thought the same about them. They had laughed, cried, and even drunk together. This had been the most wonderful day in her life.

Mira had quickly realized that there were other people around them and that Asher, Talia and Ryon almost considered like family. Of course, there was Gwyn, now Asher's wife. Mira still wasn't sure what to think of it. She found it incredible that Gwyn and Asher got married after everything that happened between their families. Mira didn't hate Gwyn, but she was a Whitehill. Her father and brothers destroyed her family. She seemed genuinely sorry about everything that happened, and Asher obviously loved her just like he did years ago, but still. How could they trust a Whitehill? Mira could only keep her doubts for herself. Talia and Ryon shared the opinion that Gwyn was trustworthy. There was also another woman, Beskha, an Essossi sellsword who was Asher's friend. Ryon seemed to like her very much. She supposed Asher made curious friends in a place as strange as Essos. There were also all these foreign mercenaries who who were under Asher's orders and followed him.

Mira had seen that Asher was a leader, just like Rodrik had been one. He inspired respect and trust to his men, even if they were only with him for money. Some of his men were farmers or hunters, and only a few were soldiers who survived the Battle of Ironrath. Mira recognized only one of them who called after her one afternoon.

"Mira, how are you?" she heard her sister ask on her right. Mira turned to look at Talia.

"I'm right, thank you. And you?"

"I'm fine."

They both smiled at each other. Talia was actually standing right before her. She looked at her two brothers again. "I still can't believe what I see. Even after days, it looks like a dream. You're all here, alive and well."

"Yes. I'm glad you're here too. Though I wish the others were here as well." Talia looked down.

"I'm sorry, Talia, really. For Ethan."

They looked at Asher and Ryon sparring for a time, in silence. They both grieved their brother, but Mira knew it had to be especially difficult for her sister. Ethan was her twin brother, after all. Mira remembered how he played the music well. He was such a sweet boy. It was so unfair.

"You know Mira, there is something else I still have difficulty to believe after all these days."

"What is it?"

"Are you really, really married?"

Mira smiled. "I am, Talia. This is the truth."

Talia laughed a little. "It still seems so absurd to me. One moment we thought you were dead, and the next you appear to us, saying that now you are Mira Hightower." Mira turned the head while smiling. "How did you manage to do it? How did you do to marry a Hightower? They are one of the richest houses in the Reach."

"Queen Margaery interceded for me. Her mother is a Hightower."

"And she could convince them? Only because she was the queen? She convinced the Hightowers to accept you among them only because you were her friend?"

Mira sighed. She had tried to avoid the subject ever since they were reunited, but she knew that sooner or later, she would have to tell them. "Margaery convinced them because they all believed I was the last Forrester alive."

Talia looked strangely at Mira. "They wanted Ironrath. They wanted your claim."

"Yes." There was nothing more to say.

"What will happen now?"

"Once Winterfell is free, we'll ride together to Ironrath, take it back, and then I'll go back to Oldtown."
Talia looked at her, her mouth half-opened. "But you just arrived."

Mira looked at her young sister with sorry eyes. "My place is no longer at Ironrath, Talia. Asher is the lord now, and I'm married to Gerold. My place is by his side. I may stay for a time after we've taken back our home, but once this is all over, I'll have to ride south."

It wouldn't be easy for Mira to leave her home again, when she would have just come back, but she would have to. She expected that going back to the HighTower wouldn't be easy for Gerold either.

"What will your husband's family think? How will they react? And what about him?"

That was something Mira didn't like to think about. "They'll have to live with that. There's nothing they can do about it. I may not stay at the HighTower. I could convince Margaery to take me back as a lady-in-waiting. There are married women who've been waiting on queens before. I'm sure Margaery would like to have me back. I could convince her to include Gerold in her household in King's Landing too. Or I could convince Sansa to take me back at her service once this is all over."

"So, I'll have a sister attending the Queen of the Seven Kingdoms." Talia had a smile on the corner of her lips that Mira returned. It was good to see her. "That's something we'll have to remind everyone in our family for generations. A Forrester waiting after the queen herself."

"There isn't so much in that, Talia. That's not as if I was the queen herself."

"Well, that would be unforgettable for a thousand years." They remained silent for a moment, looking at their brothers sparring. "How is it?"

"What are you talking about?"

"To be married."

"Well, mostly, your life goes on as it always went on. Only, you must share it with someone else. And one day, you find yourself with child."

Talia's eyes widened. "You're pregnant?!"

Mira laughed. "No, Talia, I'm not. Not yet. But one day, I will be. Maybe it will be soon."

"I wonder who I'll be wed to."

"I'm sure Asher will find you a good husband when the time is right."

Talia nodded. "But first, we must take back our home. Here, he comes."

Their brothers had stopped practicing when Jon Snow walked into the practice grounds and spoke to them. Mira and her sister were too far to hear what they said, but they abandoned their practice swords and walked away.

"It seems it's time," Talia observed. Indeed, it was. Jon Snow looked in their direction, then walked towards them.

"My lady, my lady," he said. "We're leaving in an hour. Lady Mira, I suppose you're coming with us."

"Yes, I am."

They were going to the Lannister camp. Mira had followed Jon Snow's army during the last days and both armies were now close to Winterfell. It was time for the commanders to meet and prepare plans for battle, and also to parley with the enemy together.

"Good. May I escort you back to your tent?" he asked.

"Of course." Mira looked at her sister. "We'll meet again soon. Be calm while I'm away," she said teasing Talia.

"I'm always calm. It's Asher who's not."

Talia walked away on these words and Mira followed Jon Snow in the direction of her personal pavilion. "You must be looking forward to present your husband to your siblings," he said.

"Yes, I am."

Mira and Jon Snow had managed to know each other during the last days. The son of Eddard Stark wanted to know more about Sansa and everything that happened to her in the south, and Mira was the one best placed to answer his questions. She remembered how Sansa's half-brother looked stunned and dumbfounded as she told him the details of her sister's life. He asked her a lot of questions about her marriage, and Mira had told him everything she knew. She would never forget his expression when she reported him the discussion she had with Sansa concerning the first kiss she shared with her husband. Sera and Elys would have liked to be there. In return, she told Jon Snow about her own family and how she came in the North, married to a grandson of Lord Hightower. They became friends through all their discussions. Jon Snow may look dull, but you gained a lot by knowing him, and he was very honorable. She could see the similarities between him and his father when he visited Ironrath, long ago.

"My lady," he started, "I'm not a fool and most of the people here are not. Many are of the opinion that you and your husband came here to take Ironrath for yourselves."

"We thought I was the last Forrester alive. I was sure until very recently that all my family was dead."

"I thought the same of my own."

"You still had Sansa."

"Aye, but now the Northerners believe your husband came here to take their seat to the Forresters. They think the same about Lord Tyrion for Winterfell."

Mira knew that only too well. "My husband will never do anything to take Ironrath from my brother. Not as long as I forbid him to."

"He will renounce Ironrath if you tell him, like that?" he asked.

"He would open his veins for me, so… I think he can give up a castle."

Jon Snow smiled. "He would really open his veins for you?"

"Yes, he would." Mira knew he would. Gerold was always ready to do everything for her. The only reason why he didn't make stupid things for her was that she never asked it of him. "And Lord Tyrion would do the same for your sister. You can rest, he won't seize Winterfell for himself."

They had arrived before her tent. "I would have a question for you, my lady. Is Sansa really in love with Lord Tyrion?"
He was very serious. "Yes, she is," she answered.

He nodded, his eyes on the ground, then looked up at her. "Thank you. I'll see you in an hour."

He left and Mira went to prepare herself. She hadn't brought much with her and was ready very quickly. She would follow Jon Snow and his lieutenants to Lord Tyrion's army. She was eager and afraid to see Gerold again. Asher and Gwyn were coming with them. Ryon and Talia would stay behind. There had been no problem when Gwyn had met Gerold, but she was unsure concerning the meeting with Asher.

Her brother was already preparing his mount when she arrived. Mira and Asher had always gotten along quite well. She still had the coin he sent to her from Essos. However, Mira always had a tendency to sermon Asher on his rash and unthought actions. That was the kind of behavior that got him banished. Of course, Mira knew that Asher was not the only responsible in all this. His only mistake had been to fall in love with the wrong woman. Now this same woman was mounting the horse next to his and she was his wife. Mira never had anything against Gwyn truth be told. She hadn't wanted to speak with her when they met in their army's camp at first, but that was because of what her family had done. Before that, on the rare occasions she saw her, she hadn't disliked her. She had much more sense than Asher. In the end, their marriage might be a good thing and soften Asher's temper. If she had really tried to help them, then there was nothing Mira could say against this marriage.

"So, I am to meet the man who wed my sister soon?" he asked to her, in his usual crude way.

"Yes, you are."

"You've lost your accent, Mira. You'll need to get it back."

Mira hadn't lost her accent entirely. In the south, many people could still hear the northern tone in her voice. Now that she was back in the North, people heard the southern tone she had partially adopted through her time in Highgarden, King's Landing and Oldtown.

"Just promise me to be nice with him, Asher," she said. Gerold didn't take japes about him well, except when they came from her.

"I will be, if he can prove he didn't mistreat my little sister in any way."

He made a rough laugh. His sellsword friends spoke the same way that he did. Asher would never have survived in a place like the south, among courts, intrigues, courtesies, and mundane conversations. She could see that Gwyn disapproved from the top of her mare. They exchanged a look. They agreed. Mira prepared her own horse and when Jon Snow arrived with Ser Davos and his sister Arya, they were all ready. One of the wildling chiefs, a Norrey and Lyanna Mormont came with them too.

The camps were at a certain distance, so they needed about fifteen minutes to reach the camp of the Lannisters, the Tullys and the Hightowers. Mira found that the camp was much smaller than it was when she left. She felt somewhat out of place among all these people. She wore warm clothes with furs that were obviously made in the Reach and had nothing to do with the garment of the Northerners. She had taken the simplest clothes she could have at Oldtown, but even those she chose were luxurious for most regions in the North. She really had the looks of a southern lady and it was made more obvious with Arya Stark, Lyanna Mormont and Gwyn not far from her. She understood how Sansa could no longer feel like a Northerner. Mira, on her side, knew who she was. She was a Forrester of Ironrath, the daughter of Lord Gregor. She was born in the North, grew up in the north, and would remain a child of the North forever. She was a Forrester, and would always be a
They arrived at the camp and advanced slowly through it. In the center of it, before a great red pavilion, were waiting the commanders of the great army Tyrion Lannister had gathered around him. Lord Tyron was there, a step before all of them, with Ser Brynden Tully at his side. This army was theirs before it was everyone else. Behind stood Ser Daven Lannister, Ser Perwyn Frey, Lord Smallwood, Lord Reed, Lady Dustin, and finally, Mira's husband, Gerold Hightower. He smiled at her when he saw her and she returned it. She looked nervously at Asher then. Jon Snow dismounted his horse and the others did the same. He walked to Lord Tyron who made a few steps forward. They stood there, a few feet from each other, both eyeing the other.

"Bastard." That was the word to come out of Lord Tyron's mouth. Mira knew the Lord of Casterly Rock had a sharp tongue, she had experienced it herself, but this…

"Dwarf." Jon Snow's reply surprised her even more. A tense moment passed, and then Lord Tyron laughed and Jon Snow joined him. They clasped hands like old friends.

"Well, that's quite an army you assembled on such short notice."

"Smaller than yours, though I expected it would be larger."

"Never rely on appearances, Jon Snow." Lord Tyron looked behind him. "This is Ser Brynden Tully, the Blackfish. Sounds better than the Imp or the Bastard."

Ser Brynden stepped forward to welcome Jon Snow. He offered his hand after he had a closer look to him. "So you're Jon Snow. Welcome."

"Ser, it's an honor," replied Jon, shaking his hand.

Jon introduced the other members of his delegation, beginning with Ser Davos who everyone already knew, the leader of the wildlings called Tormund Giantsbane, Lady Lyanna of House Mormont, Lord Brandon of House Norrey, Gwyn and Asher. Mira looked at her husband while Jon Snow presented her brother. She didn't know how to interpret his expression when he set eyes on Asher. If Asher had been dead like they thought, Mira would be Lady of Ironrath and Gerold would be its lord as a consequence.

Once the presentations were over, they all entered the huge red pavilion before them. Gerold went into it without waiting for her, so Mira stayed close to Gwyn and Asher. Normally, her husband would have waited for her. They crowded around the table. They barely had enough space for all to stand around it. Lord Tyron, Ser Brynden, Jon Snow and Ser Davos Seaworth took place at its head. They were the ones presiding the war council. Ser Bronn and Arya Stark stood in retreat from the table.

"Very well everyone," started the Blackfish. "You all know why we're here. We have a castle to take, and a Bolton who styles himself King in the North to kill."

There were roars of approval among the Northerners and the river lords. Jon Snow stepped into the conversation. "We need to join our forces. We've decided that the command of our combined forces on the battlefield will be left to Ser Brynden Tully, since he's the one here with the most experience in battle."

This was followed with approving nods and mumbling. Ser Brynden was obviously the best choice, not only because he was a seasoned warrior and general, but also because he was the one everyone would trust and respect. The men from the south would reluctantly follow Jon Snow, who was a
Though many would doubt Ser Davos's aptitudes and loyalty because of his former allegiance to Stannis and his reputation as a smuggler, and no Northerner would ever accept to be led by the son of Tywin Lannister. The dwarf was the one to speak next.

"Before we fight, we have to negotiate with the bastard of the Dreadfort. We have a parley with him in two hours. I don't intend to give him terms of surrender. He's too dangerous to be left alive. We cannot let him escape, we cannot give him the choice to go to the Wall, we cannot exile him. He has to die." No one protested. "I intend to offer terms to his allies. We'll offer them a pardon if they give us Ramsay in chains. Then we will only have to execute him. If they refuse, well, there will be no mercy for them. One way or another, Winterfell will belong to the Starks again and go back into the fold."

Again, no one disapproved the words. The Boltons were despised so much that their allies were no better in the eyes of the other Northerners, especially the Umbers who handed Rickon Stark over to Ramsay.

"Will it?" Everyone turned to the Lady of Bear Island who spoke with her usual strong voice. It was strange for Mira to see someone who inspired so much authority at the age of ten. She was all the opposite of Joffrey or Tommen.

"My lady?" asked the Blackfish.

"Will Winterfell really go to the Starks? Because actually, I have the feeling that it's going to be given to Sansa Lannister, if we must rely on the decree that the bastard boy sitting on the Iron Throne released."

A long silence followed, then Lord Norrey agreed with his booming voice. "Winterfell belongs to Rickon Stark, the son of the Ned."

Lord Tyrion seemed to be fuming. Mira knew he heard very often up to now that Sansa wasn't the Lady of Winterfell and that he was fed up with it. He tried to be very calm when he spoke. "We don't know for sure if Rickon Stark is alive, but if he is…"

"Rickon Stark is alive, and he's the prisoner of Ramsay Bolton. Bear Island is loyal to House Stark, not to House Lannister. We are fighting to free Rickon Stark, not to give Winterfell to the Lannisters," strongly stated the lady.

There were approvals among the Northerners, and Mira thought she saw approving nods among the river lords. Lord Tyrion turned to Jon Snow. "Do your men know about your sister?" His half-brother-in-law nodded. "Well, in this case, it's better to say the truth." The Lord of Casterly Rock made a sign towards Ser Bronn who came to the table with Arya Stark. "My lords, my ladies, I present you Arya Stark."

There was a moment of shock. The men with Jon Snow already knew it, but except for Ser Brynden and a few other ones, everyone thought Arya Stark was at Winterfell in this army. Ser Brynden, Lord Tyrion, Lady Arya and Lord Reed explained together how the Lannisters received wrong information that Arya Stark was in Winterfell, only to find out at Moat Cailin that she had been hiding at Greywater Watch for months after escaping Petyr Baelish, who effectively planned to sell her to the Boltons so she could marry Ramsay, but whose plans were destroyed when the young Stark escaped him. The marriage between Ramsay Bolton and Arya Stark was a lie and an invention that the Boltons probably made in the hope to gain support in the North. Jon Snow produced afterwards a letter from the bastard who promised to commit atrocities to all the Starks if he didn't surrender. This only inflamed all the people even more. Then Lord Tyrion revealed that spies he had inside Winterfell and the Winter Town told him that Ramsay very likely killed his father Roose..."
Bolton and that Walda Bolton and her son were last seen entering the kennels where Ramsay Snow kept his dogs. The bastard left the kennels afterwards, but his half-brother and step-mother didn't. Elmar Frey, Roose Bolton's squire, hadn't been seen since the murder of the Lord of Dreadfort either.

All these revelations turned everyone's hatred against the bastard. The Freys for the butchering of Elmar, Walda and her son, the Lannisters for the threat against Sansa who they had come to respect, even more since she got pregnant, the river lords and the Northerners for the crimes of the Boltons at the Red Wedding. The river lords also didn't appreciate that the children of Catelyn Tully were being tortured or threatened. Even Gerold hit the table with his fist in rage. Even if he had no link with anyone the bastard killed, except for Ethan but he never knew Mira's brother, the dog's actions were enough for even the High Septon to shout he would skin him alive.

"Now, let's put something clear," said Lord Tyrion loudly. "The Boltons lied about Arya Stark. They may be lying about Rickon Stark as well, or they may not. Brandon Stark may be alive. If he is alive, he's the Lord of Winterfell. If he's dead, then Rickon Stark could be alive inside Winterfell. If he's alive, he's the Lord of Winterfell. However, if the two are dead, Lady Sansa Lannister of House Stark is the Lady of Winterfell and the Wardeness of the North. But right now, Ramsay Bolton holds Winterfell. We should focus on getting him out of it, and once it's done, we can look for the Stark boys. If one is alive, Lady Sansa will acknowledge him as Warden of the North, and I will follow."

"How can we be sure about that? Why would you give up the North, Lannister?" asked Lyanna Mormont. She hadn't been carried away so easily by the revelations of the bastard's atrocities.

"Because if Brandon or Rickon Stark are alive, they stand before my wife as Lords of Winterfell. My father may have done horrible things, but there's one thing he taught me, it's that family is all that matters. Rickon Stark's sister is my wife. I think this makes him family for me."

Lyanna Mormont didn't seem convinced, but she said nothing more. The council didn't last long afterwards and people scattered before the parley took place. Gerold didn't wait for her again. Mira excused herself to Asher and his wife and went after her husband. She only caught him up when he was in their tent and she entered it without ceremony.

"I thought you would welcome me differently," she told him.

He turned to look at her. He stammered all of a sudden. "I'm... I'm sorry. I... I'm glad to see you back." Awkwardly, he walked to her and kissed her on the lips, though it lacked the warmth it usually had. Mira looked at him straight in the eyes.

"What is it? I'm not stupid, Gerold. I know you. I know you're upset. It's about my brother, isn't it? You're not happy to see him."

He looked at her for a moment, then turned away slowly and sat on their bed. He took his hair in his hand for a time, then took it away. He looked on the ground. "You must think I'm selfish." He scoffed without humor. "We discover that your family is still alive and I can't manage to be happy for you."

Mira said nothing. Of course, she wanted her husband to be happy for her, but on the other hand, she knew very well why she was married to him. Margaery had convinced the Hightowers to make her one of them for the prospect to have Ironrath one day. The odds for this to happen were quite lessened with Asher and Ryon still alive. Gerold hadn't seemed to know how to react when Gwyn had told them everything. In the end, he had managed to look happy for her, as much as he could, and they had made love that night. Mira hadn't wanted to do it, but a few minutes after they got into bed, her husband had just kissed her like that and started to remove her nightclothes. Even if they said they shouldn't do it before Winterfell was retaken, to not risk she would end with child at an inappropriate time, Mira hadn't protested. After all, they were close to take it and she was in the mood for celebrations. Gerold had whispered her name more than usual this night. In the morning, she had had many difficulties to leave their bed. He didn't want to let her go. In the end, he let her go and was there when she left with Ser Davos and Gwyn for Jon Snow's camp. He kissed her for a long time before she left, so long that Arya had cleared her throat quite loudly. Then she left and they had looked at each other while she rode away.

Mira sat at his side. "I didn't know they were alive. I was sure they were dead. I didn't lie to you."

"I never thought you lied to me," he replied, still looking ahead, not glancing at her.

"You won't have Ironrath, Gerold, but Asher won't forget that you helped us. We won't go back to Oldtown empty-handed."

"It's not that. It's just… I thought I was fighting to give you back your home, and now… I'm not eager to face my family. What will Father and Grandfather say when I come back with their men with the news that Ironrath doesn't belong to you. And Altos…"

He said the name of his eldest brother with hatred. Mira didn't think it would be good if the two brothers found themselves alone and that Altos mocked Gerold for going in the North for naught.

"You'll be able to tell him that you won a war, at least," she said.

He faced her. "I want to be happy for you. I am. It's just… I didn't expect that." He kept looking at her. "I love you, Mira, you know."

"I know."

She rested her head on his shoulder. He put an arm around her shoulders, then started to rub her cheek and to pass his hand through her hair. She sighed in relief, a sensation of warmth gaining her. In Oldtown, he used to rub her arm and her shoulder as well, but here in the North, her gowns didn't allow her arms to remain bare. His mouth came to the top of her head and his breath went through her hair. She felt well. A smile came upon her lips.

"I love you."

He said it once more as he began to lower his mouth to her forehead, then her nose, until he reached her lips. This kiss wasn't forced like the one he gave when she entered. His arms entwined around her waist as he guided her on her back. Their tongues met inside their mouths, then he went to kiss her neck. Mira moaned. It felt good. It felt very good.

"Do as if I wasn't there."

Mira turned her head to the right to see her brother standing in the flap of the tent.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: a new POV, Asher
Chapter Notes

Since this chapter follows immediately the previous and it is quite short, I decided to upload it now.

ASHER I

He couldn't stop himself from smiling. Of all the siblings Asher Forrester had, his sister Mira was the last one he expected to find in a situation like this. Mira had always behaved like a perfect lady back when they lived together at Ironrath. She wasn't the type to have anything with someone in bushes or to invite a boy to meet her in secret. He remembered how she lectured him about his secret meetings with Gwyn from time to time. He almost wanted to burst into laugh at the sight of his sister blushing and straightening up in the bed, trying to arrange her hair and take back an appearance of dignity. That had nothing to do with the sister who spent time reading and learning with Maester Ortengryn.

Half of Asher wanted to laugh, but the other one had wanted to break all of Gerold Hightower's teeth. The man had said nothing during all the war council and it was difficult for Asher to have an opinion of him, but it didn't start well. It was his old reflex of brother that made him want to defend anyone from touching his sister that surfaced. He looked at his brother-in-law. Be careful around my sister.

"You could have knocked before coming in," Mira said, reproachful.

"It's difficult to knock on a tent. We're in a war camp, remember."

He could see Mira wasn't happy to be contradicted. It was just like in the old times, when he used to tease her. He liked that.

"Why are you here?" She had gotten on her feet, but her hair was still a little messy.

"Nothing special. Just wanted a word or two with my new brother-in-law." He looked at her sister's husband to emphasize his meaning.

Mira looked at her husband, then to him. "I suppose I am to be excluded from this conversation."

Asher looked in the corner of the tent, as if he was thinking for a moment, then shrugged. "Well, to put it bluntly, yes."

Mira rolled her eyes, but he could see a smile on the corner of her lips. Mira didn't enjoy all his teasing and banter, but she looked past it. They both knew he was only teasing her and that he meant no offence and no insult.

"May I have one minute alone with you before?" she asked him.

"Of course."
Mira cast a look at her husband. Asher thought he saw a reassuring smile on her lips, then she walked out of the tent with him. Mira immediately turned to face him outside.

"Don't be too harsh with him."

"Don't worry, I won't break anything," he replied, still grinning. The image of his sister snuggling with her husband couldn't leave his mind.

"He's been very kind with me, Asher. So please, be gentle with him."

Her expression displayed a mix of order and plea, and it was also a little patronizing, just like she used to be when they were young. Asher had always found it unsettling how Mira remembered him of their father. His father always gave commands like her in this way, gentle but firm. If you added to this the green eyes, the black hair and the ears, Mira was a feminine replication of Lord Gregor Forrester. There was only her jaw who was less prominent than his. It was strange to think how close Mira was to their mother, despite being the one who shared the most physical traits with their father. Only Ethan competed with her for the resemblance, with black hair and green eyes as well. Asher had his father's eyes, but inherited from their mother when it came to his hair.

"Very well, sister." As long as I'm sure he never mistreated you.

Mira kissed him on the cheek and walked away. Before she was too far, Asher added something.

"Mira, I'm not going to forget what I just saw between you and your husband."

He had the satisfaction to see his sister roll her eyes again as she kept going forward. Asher returned to the tent to face his new brother.

"So, here is Ser Gerold Hightower, the man who married my sister Mira."

The man in question had waited standing and looked at Asher with an uncertain gaze. "Lord Asher," he finally said after a moment.

Asher emitted a dry laugh. He would never get used to being called that way. "Call me simply Asher. I don't really like the title with my name next to it, and anyway we're brothers. You're married with Mira."

He walked slowly towards the Hightower as he spoke and eyed him closely. Gerold Hightower was a bit smaller than him, had blue eyes and short brown hair. He wore the armor of his house on him, with the sigil of the tower with fire atop of it. He held Asher's gaze, but he could see that his brother-in-law wasn't comfortable with the situation. Asher didn't have anything negative to tell from his appearance, but neither did he have much positive to say. He had never been sure what kind of husband Mira wanted, but she seemed happy enough with him. It took something to have his sister moan after all. He remembered a few times when they discussed about her husband before, between brothers and sisters, when Mira blushed. Did she redden from shyness or from something else?

Asher raised his arm.

"Glad to meet you, Gerold."

The knight shook his hand. "Glad to meet you... Asher."

Asher did two steps backwards to place some distance between them. "Well, let's forget that you were almost banging my sister a moment ago..."

"I wasn't banging her," the Hightower protested.
"Well, for me, kissing and being about to disrobe someone is banging."

He was agape for a moment. "Oh. You meant… Sorry."

Asher laughed out loud. "What? You thought I meant you were about to hit her, or strike her, or beat her? That's not what I meant." Asher took a more serious expression. "Though I do hope that you never think about doing so."

Gerold Hightower looked at him strongly at the mention of it, then he stepped forward to Asher, closing the distance he just put between them. "I would never ever think about that."

Asher shrugged. "That's a good thing to hear."

"I would never harm her, or let someone else harm her."

He was looking at Asher with intensity. That didn't look like the man he saw before. "Well, I'm pleased to hear it. I would never forgive you if you let something happen to her."

"I don't care if you would forgive me or not. I would never forgive myself if something happened to her. Never."

He didn't look like he was lying. Asher held the gaze of the Hightower, and this time the knight didn't flinch a bit. His attitude reminded him of men and women he met when they fought to the death.

Asher walked away to face him again from a distance. "Now that we know each other better, maybe you could tell me how you ended married to my sister."

His brother-in-law relaxed. "My father and my grandfather organized this. And the queen too."

"I see. You didn't know her before you married, did you?"

"No. We only met when she came to Oldtown, two weeks before our wedding."

"Did you marry her because you thought this would give you Ironrath?"

The knight looked surprised by the question. Asher was always direct, and many people in the North were distraught by his straightforward ways, so he supposed people from the south, who learned courtesies and good manners in the cradle, were to be even more taken aback by this.

"No." That was all the answer he gave.

"No?"

"No."

"Then why did you marry her?"

"Because my family ordered me to."

"That's all? You were wed to her because your father and your mother told you to?"

"Yes." He looked on the ground. Asher found himself sympathizing with his brother-in-law. They could never choose who they married. "But today, I would marry her any time, even if my family was against it. Even if I was to discover tomorrow that she's a peasant girl, I wouldn't care. I wouldn't marry anyone else in the world."
That surprised Asher. Was it...? "Is it a declaration of love?"

Gerold looked uncertain once more. "You can see it that way, yes."

Asher smiled shortly. "Well, in that case... I want to thank you, for taking care of my sister all this time."

"I did my best."

"More than your best. She told me you disfigured your brother for her."

"He slapped her." His face had gone angry again.

"Good doing. I would have done the same in your stead."

After a moment, Ser Gerold smiled back. "I have to admit, I had wanted to do that for a very long time."

They laughed together. "I think we'll get along quite well, Gerold. Just remember. If I ever find out that you mistreated Mira in any way, I'll gut you, I'll kill you and I'll skin you alive. Maybe not in that order, but I'll do it."

"I wouldn't expect less."

They exchanged a last shake of hands and then Asher was gone. He walked through the camp mostly made of red tents. He didn't like the look of it. Mira could say that the Imp was only trying to give Winterfell back to Sansa Stark, he didn't trust the Lannisters. He would sooner have Jon Snow as Lord of Winterfell if Rickon Stark was dead. The bastard knew how to fight and men followed him. Everyone said he looked like his father.

He found the tent he and Gwyn had been given. It was among the small detachment from the Riverlands, though far away from the Freys. Asher was of a mind to thrust his sword through a few Frey hearts, like they did for his father and his brother at the Red Wedding. He didn't understand how Jon Snow could like the Lord of Casterly Rock. That was a complete mystery for him.

He found his wife discussing with his sister when he opened the flap. Mira looked at him with severity.

"Don't worry, little sister. He's whole. You can go back and resume what you were doing before I interrupted."

As expected, Mira didn't appreciate. She stood up and left. "Thank you, Asher."

He was now all alone with his wife. "You shouldn't be so cruel with her," Gwyn told him.

"Why not ask the wolf to spare the chicken while you're at it?"

Gwyn smiled without a sound. "I had forgotten how it was between you and her. She disagreed with our meetings, but she kept our secret well hidden all the same."

"Aye." He sat by her side, on another chair, and took her hand.

"Gerold Hightower seems nice enough."

"He is, though I can't find anything special about him. Except for the fact that he seems genuinely in love with Mira. I suppose that's a good thing."
A memory came to his mind, of a young squire who only had eyes for her when they were at Ironrath. The poor lad never had his chance. Mira never returned his interest. Judging by what he just witnessed, he supposed this was different with her husband. That brought another smile to Asher. He would definitely never forget that sight.

"Do you think he's after Ironrath?" Gwyn asked him.

"He doesn't seem to be, though we should remain careful. When we asked Mira, we couldn't get a clear answer."

"True. It would be better to keep an eye on him."

Asher nodded. He looked at Gwyn's hand, then to her eyes. She was his wife now. He had dreamed of it for so long. Even during his exile in Essos, he could never forget her. There had been times when he still dreamed he could go back to Westeros one day, take her away from her family and ride with her somewhere where they could live together, even if he knew these were foolish thoughts. Still, he kept them. They were the same than those he had that first night.

He had met Gwyn at Ironrath, when they were both about fourteen. Her father had reluctantly come to Ironrath to renew the treaty of peace between the Whitehills and the Forresters. Asher had been standing on the dais with his brothers and sisters and their parents. Ludd Whitehill was already fat at the time, and he had brought all his children with him. He had introduced them, but only his daughter caught Asher's attention. She was beautiful, and breathtaking. Asher would never forget the first time he saw her. Later, at the feast that was thrown, Gwyn had danced with Rodrik as a formality, just like their mother danced with Lord Whitehill. Their father would have danced with Lady Whitehill if she had been alive. There was also Lord Whitehill's eldest son, Torrhen, who danced with Mira. Torrhen. The name filled Asher's heart with rage.

It was obvious that Lord Whitehill took no pleasure in being present. He only did what was required of him to not start a war, but nothing more. Still, Asher had gone to him and asked for the honor to dance with his daughter. Lord Whitehill had been about to burst in outrage, but Gwyn had calmed him and graciously accepted his request. They had danced. The dance they were supposed to have turned into six dances. Later that evening, Asher had brought her to visit the ironwood grove behind the keep. They spent hours talking together, until finally Whitehill's men came to bring Gwyn back to her rooms. They had left early in the morning. Asher didn't see Gwyn for two months, until they met by chance near a small market, in the only village on the Forrester lands. They had spent hours together again. Asher had found her more beautiful than the first time they met. From this time, they had met regularly, lying to both their families about the times they spent outside their homes. With time, some people started to wonder about the real reasons of their prolonged absence. Mira was the first one to discover it. She tried to convince him to stop, and failed. She said nothing to anyone for months. Perhaps she hoped that he would stop on his own will. If she did, she was wrong. Asher and Gwyn kept seeing each other for almost a year. In the end, someone else discovered the truth.

One day, he and Gwyn met again, but this time someone had followed her. Torrhen Whitehill, heir to Highpoint, came out from bushes and accused Asher of luring her sister out of the safety of their keep to take advantage on her. They started to fight and Asher got the upper hand. Gwyn stopped him from killing her brother. He would have killed him if she hadn't been there. Still, Torrhen Whitehill was badly injured. Asher had pierced his right arm and his left leg.

This had been the last time he ever saw Gwyn. Lord Whitehill asked for his head. Asher's father decided to exile him instead to face a war and to not execute his son. Asher still held some grudge against his father for this, even if he knew deep inside that it was the right thing to do. A war may not have allowed him to marry Gwyn anyway. Asher packed his things and sailed for Essos.

He had spent the following years fighting as a sellsword, trying to forget about Gwyn, and failing to do so. He met Beskha during some war around Volantis when she saved his life and they became friends. It never went farther. Despite all this time, Asher could never forget Gwyn. He visited brothels and had many whores during his time in the east, but Gwyn remained in his head and his heart all the time. He and Beskha even laid together one night, when they were dead drunk. He thought one of them, he didn't remember who, vomited in the act, or maybe they both did. It had no long-term consequences. He and Beskha were friends, and neither of them wanted this to go anywhere else. There was only one time afterwards when they talked of this, and it was when Beskha told him he still loved Gwyn because he said her name while they were making love.

Now he was back. He and Gwyn were wed. Sometimes he wondered how she could accept when he proposed to her. He killed her brother, and tried to kill her father. If he had a chance, he would kill Ludd and Torrhen without a single hesitation, and she knew it. Still, she had saved him with Talia's help when they found him at the farm after the battle, gravely injured, and she had accepted to be his wife. Asher didn't know how she could still love him sometimes. Though, when he thought about this, Gwyn's family had killed his parents and two of his brothers, not to mention that they destroyed his home, and he never held her responsible in any way for this. He couldn't hate her for her family's crimes, whatever they were. Maybe it was the same in her eyes. However, she didn't hate Asher's family. Maybe Asher just lost much more than her. She said she loved him and that she knew he tried to stop the madness at the wedding, but failed, and at the end it had been him or Gryff.

Asher kept looking into Gwyn's eyes. There was no trace of hatred or anger in them. Still, he wished things had been different. I saw what you were trying to do. They wouldn't listen to reason... We will overcome this. The words she said when she found him near dead resonated in his head. He wondered if they could still overcome this, after all that happened between their families. He knew that Gwyn still loved her father and her brother.

"We should prepare," she said. "The parley is soon."

Asher agreed. They walked out together to the small group of people who would soon negotiate with the bastard who killed Ethan. Asher looked forward to this. He hoped that Ramsay would give him a reason to kill him during the meeting.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Tyrion (and the parley)
Tyrion XXIV

Chapter Notes

One of the chapters I loved to write the most in a while. Tyrion speaks with many people he never got to meet in the show so far, right before the Second Battle of Winterfell. And he meets Ramsay.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

TYRION XXIV

There was smoke far away, before Winterfell, or maybe it was only fog. Tyrion couldn't know for sure. It should be fog, but something told him it could be fire. They were all waiting in the no man's land between Winterfell and the Wolfswood. Tyrion was on his own horse with Ser Brynden Tully, Jon Snow and Ser Davos Seaworth by his side. Behind them were many other knights, lords and ladies, all representing the might of the North, the Riverlands, the Westerlands and the Reach combined. For the North, there was Lady Lyanna Mormont of Bear Island, Ser Jocelyn Waterfell from White Harbor, Lady Barbrey Dustin of Barrowton, Lord Asher Forrester of Ironrath, Lady Gwyn Whitehill of Highpoint and Lord Howland Reed of Greywater Watch. Ser Perwyn Frey of the Twins, Lord Karyl Vance of Wayfarer's Rest and Lord Clement Piper of Pinkmaiden were there for the Riverlands. For the Westerlands, Daven and Ser Forley Prester were present. There were also Ser Gerold of House Hightower and his wife, Lady Mira Hightower of House Forrester, who were there as the sole representatives of the Reach. There was also this Tormund Giantsbane who was here for the wildlings, or the Free Folk like they called themselves, and also someone else at Lord Reed's side.

They were quite a great number of people. If Ramsay wanted to defeat them, he could try to kill them all here, depriving their army of the most part of their commanders, and probably the best, but they were all on horse and Tyrion had positioned men nearby to intervene if the bastard of the Dreadfort or any Northerner tried anything. Tyrion was eager to be done with this parley. These talks were crucial, but he wouldn't mind once they were over. There was no sign of Ramsay Bolton and his men so far.

"How long is he going to make us wait yet? We've been here for half an hour," complained the Blackfish.

"He thinks he's a king now. I suppose he wants to make us feel that he's important," Tyrion offered as an explanation.

Ser Brynden Tully spat. "King in the North? King of Winterfell, yes. His petty kingdom is limited to the castle. Almost all the North rebelled against him."

"The North didn't only try to rebel against him," Tyrion remarked.

The knight sighed. "No."

"Don't be too harsh on them. Many lost kin during the war against the Lannisters, not to mention the Twins," said Jon Snow.
"I'm not stupid, Jon Snow. I knew very well I wouldn't be welcomed in the North. I thought the first Northerner to cross my path there would try to kill me, and I was right. Too bad Sansa is the one who paid the price."

Jon Snow looked behind him after Tyrion's words. "I'm sure she's fine."

"She will be," assured the Blackfish. "Cat bore five healthy children without problem. There's no reason her daughter cannot do it as well."

"Maybe, but my mother died when I was born. We don't have the good odds from my family's side,“ Tyrion countered on a dark tone.

That was one of Tyrion's greatest worries right now. He didn't even worry about the battle to come, about Ramsay Bolton and his allies, or even about the fragile alliance they had with the other northern houses. The alliance had been close to blow up recently. Tyrion was afraid for Sansa. He thought about her all the time. Not only he missed her, but he wondered what could happen to her at White Harbor. Was she really safe there? Tyrion knew the northern lords couldn't be entirely trusted, nor were the river lords, or the Freys. It was a chance he earned the trust and the respect of some of their commanders, but their officers and their men were another story.

"Here they are," said Ser Davos.

Indeed, they were. It was a small group, smaller than the one they had, bearing the flayed man of House Bolton. Tyrion had always hated this sigil.

"Be careful. I don't trust this bastard," said the Blackfish once more.

"Whoever trusts him is a fool," stated Tyrion. "Or he hopes to gain something from him. But he's still a fool then," he added after a moment.

Tyrion highly doubted the lords who followed Ramsay did it because they actually wanted him as their king. The Ryswells and the Dustins had deserted after Roose Bolton died. Ramsay Bolton only had his bannermen left, and the troops of House Umber and House Karstark. These houses probably chose to support him because they thought the Lannisters were worse... just like the Mormonts, the Manderlys, the Cerwyns and all the other northern houses who sided with them thought the Lannisters were a lesser evil when compared to Ramsay. All these houses, whichever side they picked, would probably turn against them the moment they felt was right.

The delegation stopped at a good distance, then three men came forward on their horses. The one at the center had a crown on his head, made of bronze. He smiled widely when he came closer. He looked like a child about to play.

"Imp," he said.

If he hoped this would affect Tyrion, he was in for a great disappointment. "Who are you?" Tyrion asked.

The huge grin disappeared. A man Tyrion supposed was Harald Karstark spoke up. "This is Ramsay Bolton, the Lord of Winterfell and the King in the North."

"Oh, yes." Tyrion faked surprise. "You're the son of the miller's wife that Roose Bolton raped during a hunting trip because he was bored." The grin that had resurfaced on Ramsay's face faded again.

"What? You thought no one knew it? I'm afraid you were wrong, bastard. There are many people around you who are ready to tell all sorts of secrets about you for the right price, or only because they hate you. Just like they told me how you murdered your father, how you fed Walda Bolton and "We didn't come to listen to your empty threats, bastard," interrupted Ser Brynden. "We're giving you a chance. Get off your horse, drop this stupid crown you have on your head and kneel, confess all your crimes, give us Rickon and Arya Stark, surrender Winterfell and you'll be granted a clean and swift death in the old way. Refuse this chance," the Tully knight took from his bag the letter Ramsay wrote to Jon Snow, "and everything you described in this, we'll do it to you, from the skinning to feeding you to your own dogs. That's your call, bastard."

"I'm afraid I must decline."

"You're surrounded. The North has rebelled against you. Robb Stark was called the King who lost the North, but none of his bannermen ever betrayed him, except your father. All the North rose against you. I would say you lost the North before you even had it. The King who never had the North. You can't hope for any help from the outside. You're no better than Theon Greyjoy when he styled himself the Prince of Winterfell. Your petty kingdom is limited to this castle, just like his."

"I have the Umbers, and the Karstarks at my side, and my own bannermen. They are loyal, to the opposite of those who follow you. I'll give you a chance. Dismount and kneel before me, surrender your army and proclaim me the true Lord of Winterfell and King in the North. I will pardon all of you for invading our homeland. I will pardon the bastard for deserting the Night's Watch. I will pardon the treasonous lords who betrayed my house. Kneel, all of you. Why lead poor souls into slaughter? There's no need for a battle. Thousands don't need to die. Get off your horse, and kneel."

"Are you really as mad as they say? You don't have the men. You don't have the horses."

"I have Winterfell. The castle can hold against tens of thousands with only three hundred men. And I have six thousand. I know you have more, but not that much. Most of your men must have died of the cold and disease. You can't afford a siege. So kneel, and I'll let you go back to where you came from."

Tyrion smiled to himself before he spoke. "You're right, bastard. Winterfell can hold against tens of thousands, but only if the people inside are united. Do you really trust the people with you? How do you think I got all this information about you?"

He saw doubts in the bastard's eyes. It was good. Very good. "Anyway," Tyrion resumed, "we didn't come here to listen to you. We want nothing with mad dogs. We came here to offer you a chance for a painless death, and you refused it. Now, we will speak with lords. Lord Umber, Lord Karstark, do you have anything to say?"

"You will not take the North, Lord Tyrion," declared Lord Karstark. "Winterfell belongs to the Northerners. The North belongs to the Northerners. You won't take it."

"It does, but it doesn't belong to Ramsay," said Jon. "You don't have to follow him. Put him in chains, give him to us, free my brother and my sister, swear loyalty to the Starks as your liege lords again, and you'll be forgiven. You'll keep your lands, your titles, your honor. All you have to do is to give us Ramsay and to make sure that Rickon and Arya are safe."

"We're not going to follow wildling lovers," replied Jon Umber. Proud, but without honor, and without brain. No sane man would side with the bastard of the Dreadfort.

"Or Lannisters," Lord Karstark added, spiteful.

"No, instead you follow a bastard and you turn against your own kin. House Karstark shares blood with the Starks," the Blackfish pointed out.

"The Starks lost my house the day Robb Stark killed my father."

"Your father murdered children."

"Robb Stark refused him his revenge. My father took what was his by right. We have the right to avenge our family."

"Do you have the right to commit murders? Do you consider yourselves over the law?"

"What about you, Blackfish? Don't you consider yourself over the law? The sacred law of guest right? You ride with those behind the Red Wedding."

"And you ride with a kinslayer whose father murdered his own king," Tyrion replied.

A moment of silence followed while Harald Karstark looked at Tyrion with hatred. "You're going to die."

"I suppose this is a refusal then. Very well."

"We offer you life and honor, and you choose death and dishonor?" asked Jon Snow, unbelieving.

"Tell me, will you let your little brother die because you're too proud to surrender? Would you let your sister die as well? Wouldn't you say this is dishonorable?" Ramsay asked to Jon Snow.

"How do we know you have Rickon and Arya? I don't see them," Tyrion asked.

Ramsay whistled, a huge grin on his face. A young woman around the same age as him rode forward. She had a similar grin to the one the mad dog displayed. Tyrion supposed it could be the kennelmaster's daughter, Myranda. She was Ramsay's lover according to some, and one of his favourite hunting partners. She took something in a bag next to her and dropped it on the ground separating them.

It was the head of a wolf, but bigger than a wolf's head should be. It was very similar to Ghost, Jon Snow's direwolf, but its fur was black instead of being white. Tyrion looked at Jon Snow, asking a silent question. Jon Snow nodded. This was his brother's direwolf's head.

Tyrion decided to grin back. "Is that all? A direwolf's head?"

"We have Rickon Stark. Surrender, and he'll live," Ramsay said.

"What's telling us you didn't kill him already? Or that you didn't torture him? I hear that's your favourite hobby. I don't see Rickon Stark. You bring us no proof, bastard. However, we do have our own proofs."

Tyrion looked at Jon who looked behind him and made a sign with his head. She left Lord Reed's side and brought her horse forward to stand between Jon and Tyrion. She wore furs to the Stark colors, no longer the rough garment of the crannogmen. She looked straight at Ramsay's face with hatred. Tyrion wouldn't want to be in the bastard's stead.
"Who's that?" Ramsay asked. He really never saw her before.

"Lord Karstark, Lord Umber, you visited Winterfell before. Surely one of you recognizes her," Jon Snow declared.

Tyrion saw the facial expression of both the lords following Ramsay change. They knew who she was, even though Ramsay didn't. It was Jon Umber who spoke up first and looked angrily at the bastard.

"You told us that Arya Stark was in that tower!" he roared.

"She is," replied the girl who brought the direwolf's head. She hadn't gone back behind. "I visited her before we came. I told her her family was coming to rescue her, but she didn't seem to believe it. I'm afraid she becomes boring." Umber and Karstark didn't seem to appreciate her presence. She was no highborn lady, only Ramsay's mistress.

"I doubt it. Because I am Arya Stark."

It was the first time she spoke. Ramsay looked at her for a moment, an uncertain expression on his face. Then he burst into laughs. "Anyone could come up with a random girl and pretend this is Arya Stark."

"Maybe," said Tyrion, "but your men know who she is, Ramsay. They know you're a liar. You don't have Arya Stark. You never had her. Maybe you have Rickon Stark. Maybe you don't have him…"

Tyrion couldn't end his sentence as Arya Stark interrupted him to speak her own mind. "If you have him, if you killed him or harmed him in any way, I'll do the same thing to you, and worse."

Tyrion definitely wouldn't want to be in Ramsay's shoes, but the bastard only smiled like a child once more. "She's fierce. I like her. Maybe I'll take her to my bed, just to be sure. Myranda is right, my wife became quite boring lately."

"You're going to die tomorrow. Sleep well."

On these words, Arya Stark rode away with one last hateful glance at the bastard of the Dreadfort. Ramsay should be better to not end in Arya's Stark way, though Tyrion feared something bad might happen to Sansa's sister if she tried to kill Ramsay Bolton with too much haste.

"Our offers still hold," resumed Ser Brynden Tully. "You only have to deliver us this mad dog or whatever this is in chains and to free Rickon Stark, and you'll be pardoned. You have until sunrise tomorrow to accept. If you don't, then expect no mercy from us during the battle."

"We'll see each other tomorrow then," said Ramsay, still smiling. He was mad, and probably very stupid. Any man with some brain would know he had no chance to win in open battle.

"Yes," added Tyrion. "if you dare to leave these walls. You're renowned for chasing fleeing enemies, but not much as a fighter, bastard."

"I wonder how long your men will fight for you when they see you don't fight for them," Jon Snow brought forward.

Ramsay obviously didn't like their comments. They were about to turn and ride away, but were stopped by a feminine voice.

"Wait." It was Gwyn Whitehill, Lady Mira's sister-in-law, and the Lady of Ironrath now through her marriage with Asher Forrester. Tyrion expected her to be the Lady of Highpoint once this would all be over. Her family wasn't known for being reasonable and surrender when they were defeated. "I wish to speak to my brother."

For a moment, everything and everyone stood still. Then someone who remained behind on Ramsay's side rode forward on a white stallion. Tyrion looked at him and then to Gwyn Whitehill. They had some features in common.

"So, here you are, Gwyn. It's been a long time." His voice was warm and soft, even pleasant, with a certain sadness.

"Yes, a very long time," Torrhen's sister said.

"How things have changed since that time." His voice took a harder tone, though it still sounded sad. "I never thought you would turn on us."

"I never turned on you."

"And yet here you are, married to a Forrester." He almost spat the name.

"Aye, she is." Asher Forrester had come forward at his wife's side. "Torrhen."

"Asher." Both said their names with venom. There was no trace of kindness here.

"How are your leg and your arm?"

The Whitehill looked furious. "You won't get away with this."

"You failed. I married Gwyn in the end. Your house is about to disappear. I promised Gwyn that I would spare you and your father if you survived the fights, but if I ever meet you on the battlefield, I will kill you without a second thought."

Torrhen Whitehill looked at his sister. "Is that what you want? You want your family to die?"

"You could surrender," said Gwyn. "You'll be allowed to join the Night's Watch."

"Do you think I'm going to freeze myself to the Wall?"

"You would be alive."

"We won't crawl before the Forresters, like we did in the past. This time is over. Maybe it's different for you, since you're one of them now, but we won't kneel before them again. I never thought you would turn against your own blood, Gwyn. You shame our house."

"Do you think you shame our name less by siding with this bastard? He's mad. He's going to kill you for sport as soon as the envy takes him. You won't live long with him. You don't need me to dishonor our house. You, father and Gryff already dishonored our name more than enough."

"You dare to speak of honor? They tried to kill Father at the wedding you organized. They killed Gryff!"

"And we killed Rodrik. We killed Lady Elissa. We helped to kill Lord Gregor and Ethan, and we helped to the slaughter at the Twins. I tried to bring back peace. Lord Forrester did the same thing. He even exiled Asher to prevent a war. Can't you see, Torrhen? Your pride is leading you to your ruin."
"The Forresters took everything from us. Pride is all that's left to us."

"We took nothing from you," Asher retorted. "We shared with you, and you wasted what you had. Gwyn is right. You ruined yourself."

Torrhen Whitehill stared at the Lord of Ironrath. "I hear you have a sister. I'll wed her once this is all over. Since you don't seem to have mistreated Gwyn, I won't mistreat her, but that's all I will do for you, son of a whore. I'll kill all of you to the last, until there's no Forrester left. I'll be in the vanguard tomorrow. I'll be expecting you."

"I look forward to it."

Both men rode away with hateful glares to each other. Tyrion scowled. "Nice family reunion. Your bannermen's words should be More pride than honor. We'll see each other again tomorrow, bastard."

This time, Tyrion left for good with all the people who were present. They returned to the camp of the Lannister army and their allies. The camp of the Northerners under Jon Snow's command had been moved closer, but it was still separate from their own and its paths were very narrow, just like the ones in the other camp. They met in the command tent like they did this morning, only this time they wouldn't talk about negotiations, but about strategy for the upcoming battle.

"Ramsay chose battle," said the Blackfish. "Well, he's going to get one."

"What's telling us he will fight against us? The smarter thing to do is wait for us inside Winterfell. He was right on a few things. We don't have siege engines and it would take time to build them. And even then, he has more than enough men to hold the castle," the Lord of Greywater Watch pointed.

"How long could he last with all the food in Winterfell's storage?" The Blackfish addressed this question to Jon.

"Some time. Depends on how the pantries are filled and how many men he has. If he intends to feed the six thousand, he'll have a hard time. The supplies won't last long, even if the pantries are full."

"Some probably burned with Winterfell when the Ironborn lost it. They probably don't have much," said Tyrion.

"Winterfell can hold with only three hundred men to defend it, but with six thousand inside, the situation will become impossible to hold very quickly," analyzed the Blackfish. "I got rid of all the unnecessary mouths during the siege of Riverrun to hold as long as we could, and we only had enough to hold for two years. Ramsay has thirty time the number of men. I would be surprised if his supplies lasted for more than two months."

"He could try to let us starve outside all the same," said Barbrey Dustin. "Winter is coming. We don't have enough supplies on our own to engage a lasting siege. We may starve before he does."

"Maybe, but that's not his way," intervened Ser Davos. "He knows the North is watching. If he leaves the impression that we can keep him stuck inside a castle, the other houses who still fear him will lose this fear. He cannot allow that. Fear is his power. He'll come for us, give us battle in the field."

"In this case, we should be prepared to meet him in the field," Tyrion remarked.

"Very well. We will place our army at the edge of the Wolfswood. This way, he won't be able to attack us from behind if he tries."
"What about the sides," grumbled Tormund Giantsbane, the wildling chief. "I saw what mounted knights can do to us. You and Stannis cut through us like piss in the snow," he said while looking at Ser Davos.

"We could dig trenches along our flanks," said Jon.

"Bad idea," Tyrion reacted. "This would force our army to stay between them. We would be imprisoned between these trenches. Anyway, we have more horses than Ramsay. There will be squads of cavalry on each flank. If Ramsay tries to attack us there, the horsemen will be able to stop them."

"We can't limit our movements, not when we have the biggest army. Our capacity to adapt to different scenarios will be our force in this battle," approved the Blackfish.

"So, we have more men, more horses. We only have to attack him as soon as he gets through the gates of Winterfell," said Asher Forrester. "With your leave, my lords, I would like to be in the vanguard."

"I'm not a general," said Bronn all of a sudden. He wasn't present at the parley, but he invited himself to the war council. "However, I know one thing, there are many more people who die in an army that fights near an enemy fortress than in an open field battle."

"We will wait for the bastard to come to us," said Ser Brynden, unyielding. "The farther we'll get him from Winterfell, the easier it will be for us to cut him from it and to take the castle with minimal losses."

People listened to him. They didn't doubt his experience or his loyalty, to the opposite of Tyrion. The less the Lord of Casterly Rock spoke in this council, the better it would be.

"What about Rickon Stark?" asked the Norrey man.

"When we take Winterfell, we'll look for him. In the meantime, we must defeat Ramsay, if we are to hope to ever free Winterfell."

It seemed to satisfy the lords. Discussions followed afterwards that proved much more difficult. No one questioned the strategy of Ser Brynden Tully or the general position of the army on the field, but it was more difficult to decide where to place everyone. No one wanted someone they didn't trust behind them. This meant the Northerners didn't want to stand before the Freys or the wildlings or the Lannisters. Tyrion refused to have the great part of his men with Northerners at the back, not after the plot. Mostly, no one wanted the Freys behind them. Ser Perwyn Frey accepted to place his men in the vanguard in the end, saying he hoped this would prove that his house wanted to make amends. As for the Hightowers, they were placed in the rear. They were the only ones that no one hated here, and anyway they weren't enough to really pose a threat. After much discussion, the wildlings ended in the vanguard just like the Freys, including the giant Wun Wun. Tyrion hadn't seen him yet. He was very curious to see a giant for the first time. At one point, Tormund told them they were squabbling worse than the Free Folk in Mance Rayder's army.

Most of the Northerners, especially the Manderlys, the Cerwyns, the Ryswells, the Dustins and the Hornwoods, were positioned in the vanguard as well, but others like the Mormonts were left with the bulk of the army, which consisted essentially of Lannisters and Tullys. Detachments of these were also placed in the vanguard, but it was nothing compared to the size that occupied the bulk. They needed more than an hour to settle all this. Tyrion was very glad when it ended. He found himself alone in the command tent with Jon Snow, Ser Brynden, Ser Davos and Bronn.
"Well, that was something," said Bronn when the last lord had left. "Sure you wouldn’t have liked it if I broke someone's nose?"

"We don't need to make any more enemies, Bronn. Thank you," said Tyrion a warning plain in his voice. Bronn shrugged, as if nothing was amiss.

"I don't think this is right to force the Northerners to fight in the vanguard," said Jon.

"Would you want people in the same army to be behind you when they planned to turn against you in the middle of the battle?"

Jon Snow had nothing to reply to this. He had been dumbfounded when Tyrion and Ser Brynden told him about this a few hours ago. A few houses from the North had been planning to turn against the Lannisters while they fought the Boltons. They found out because Lord Vance was asked by Ser Waterfell to join the plot. They probably hoped that the river lords would be eager to betray the Lannisters and the Freys and to avenge the Red Wedding. However, the conspirators hadn't taken into consideration that Lord Vance was an old friend of Ser Brynden Tully. He had gone immediately to tell the Blackfish about this, and Ser Brynden talked about this with Tyrion.

Three days later, all the leaders of the conspiracy were brought in the command tent and surrounded by Lannister and Tully men. The Northerners had misjudged the hatred of the river lords for the Lannisters. Ser Brynden and Tyrion led the army together, taking their decisions in common, and the knight had come to appreciate him as Sansa's husband. Even some of the river lords began to show some respect for Tyrion, especially after so much time spent with him and Sansa in the Neck. The commanders who participated to the plot were warned and their tents were moved to a section of the camp where they could be watched by Lannister guardsmen all the time. They didn't have the luxury to execute them. They couldn't kill Northerners when their objective was to free the North. This wouldn't help Sansa in ruling, and turn a few houses against them. Instead, they watched closely the northern commanders from now on and gave them no opportunity to betray them. Placing them in the vanguard during the battle would make sure they wouldn't try to turn against the Lannisters, or else they would be stuck with Lannisters on one side and Boltons on the other side.

"Better get some rest," said Jon. "Tomorrow will be a long day."

"I agree. We must be rested for the battle," Ser Brynden approved.

"Well, I'll go and get myself a girl. Anyone's coming with me?" asked Bronn to everyone.

"I'm married now," Tyrion gave as an answer.

"So am I."

Tyrion sent a look to Bronn that gave no place to discussion. The Blackfish and Jon Snow were already gone. The sellsword looked at Ser Davos with questioning eyes.

"No, thank you," said the Onion Knight. Bronn shrugged again and left the tent. Tyrion was alone with Stannis's former Hand. Two former Hands. The Imp and the Onion Knight.

"Not going to sleep?" he asked.

"Eventually, but my sleep is shit," Tyrion answered.

He remembered the night before the Battle of Blackwater. He hadn't been able to sleep, despite the fact of having Shae with him. He told her she could run away, but she hadn't. She could abandon him, run somewhere to safety, but instead she stayed. She should have run away. When Tyrion had fought during the battle, it hadn't been for family only. It had been for her. This is your city Stannis means to sack. If he gets in, it will be your houses he burns, your gold he steals, your women he will rape. Shae would have been raped. Tyrion knew she could defend herself, but it wouldn't have been enough. He had fought for her, among other things. Now he fought for Sansa.

"And you?" Tyrion asked to the knight.

"I can never sleep the night before a battle."

"Maybe we have more in common than we thought, then, Ser Davos." Half a smile appeared on the face of the man. "I'm sorry for your son. I'm sure he didn't deserve to die, but the people inside King's Landing didn't deserve to see their city sacked, to get raped and murdered. They deserved a better king than Joffrey, true, but not at this price."

Ser Davos nodded. "There were good men who died on both sides in this battle. We both served a terrible king at the time."

"And now they're both dead, and we fight on the same side to free Winterfell."

"Aye. A great turn of events, but then, stranger alliances have been made in the past and we both know what's coming for us. It's no more time to fight amongst ourselves."

Tyrion nodded. He liked Ser Davos, truth be told. The man was pragmatic, without arrogance or pride, and had an ability to say things plainly and simply. Tyrion understood why Stannis chose him as his Hand, over highborn lords and knights who thought themselves better than everyone else because they had a title and earned it at their birth.

"Do you want to avenge Stannis?" Tyrion asked him.

"The Boltons didn't defeat Stannis. Stannis defeated himself. I loved him. He lifted me up and made me something."

"After you saved him with a shipment of onions at Storm's End, hence your sigil."

"Aye, but Stannis had demons in his skull whispering foul things."

"Joffrey had much more of them, believe me. I'll never forget how he had Sansa beaten in front of the whole court, and believe me that wasn't the worst he did. He enjoyed these things. He enjoyed cruelty and viciousness, thought he could do as he liked because he was king."

"Stannis thought the same, but he didn't enjoy cruelty. He did cruel things, true, but he did it because he thought it was the only way for him to become king. He did them because he believed there was no other way."

"And because the red witch told him so."

"Aye."

"It still seems strange to me that the woman who burnt so many people alive brought Jon Snow back to life. I'm still not sure if I believe it."

"Well, I can do nothing else but believe it. He was dead right before me a moment, and the next he was breathing, talking and walking. And after everything I saw, and with the White Walkers coming, who knows what's possible and what's impossible."
Indeed, what was the limit between reality and tales now? White Walkers, dead brought back to life, shadows killing kings, dragons… The world wasn't going any logical way now, and Tyrion didn't like it. He would have settled for the dragons.

"I'll try to get some rest, though I doubt I'll get any," Tyrion finally said. "What about you?"

"I'll walk. I'll think and walk. Think and walk until I'm far away from camp that no one can hear me shitting my guts out."

"Well, happy shitting, Onion Knight."

"Happy restless night, Imp."

They left on the grins that followed. Tyrion ordered Podrick to wake him up at first light tomorrow. He undressed and got into bed. He told himself he didn't have to worry. They had more men, more horses, more allies than Ramsay. However, Barbrey Dustin hadn't been wrong when she said Ramsay could let them starve outside. He had done so with Stannis, and now the pretender was dead cold. Tyrion had done everything to provoke him, to instill doubt in his thoughts about his allies, and to make his allies doubt about Ramsay, but what if it failed? Ramsay Bolton was mad enough to murder thousands of people inside Winterfell to last through winter with the provisions inside. However, if he did this, Tyrion doubted his allies would remain on his side. No, this would create a huge battle inside Winterfell between the Karstarks, the Umbers, the Boltons and their bannermen. They would fight tomorrow. That was the only way out for everyone. None of them could wait. Tyrion had placed heavy guards around the camp to make sure the bastard couldn't repeat his feat of destroying Stannis's supplies and siege engines.

Still, Tyrion couldn't sleep. There was still the possibility of losing, and of course the possible betrayals they could face. Did he bring all these men in the North to see them die and kill each other? They were fighting for leftovers. The North had been ravaged by war, its population if not its territory, and they would have to fight dead men once Winterfell was taken back. Tyrion focused on Winterfell. For now, that was their objective. One battle at a time.

Tyrion missed Sansa. He feared for her, in White Harbor. He highly doubted that Ser Jocelyn Waterfell conspired against him without the approval of Lord Manderly. They had sent a raven with veiled threats, informing Lord Manderly of the attempt of betrayal from his men and warning him of the fate that would await anyone trying to betray their coalition. Another raven also warned Sansa about the failed conspiracy and the dangers she might be running in White Harbor. Theomore would make sure only she would see the message. This should keep the Manderlys quiet.

However, Tyrion missed Sansa's presence. He missed their nights together. Since she left, he had thought more than once to bring a camp follower into his tent, but he didn't in the end. Sansa was his wife now, and since his experience with Shae, he had lost a lot of interest in whores and camp followers. He missed her hair, her soft skin, her sweet smell. He missed the time they spent together at dinner, their discussions, their walks, all the time they spent together. Tyrion wondered if Sansa had delivered now. She had to be close to the end of her pregnancy. Tyrion regretted he couldn't be there for the birth of his first child. He wished he could have been there with Sansa, instead of leaving her alone with a bannerman whose loyalty that now they knew was questionable. He wouldn't see his first son or his first daughter come into the world.

Tyrion didn't know if his father had been present for his birth. He never talked about it, except when he reminded Tyrion of his role in his mother's death. Truth be told, Tyrion had never thought about the possibility of becoming a father one day. He never thought about what it implied. When he was young, all girls laughed at him, when he was lucky. He never thought he would marry. Then he had met Tysha and been happy with her for a fortnight. This hadn't been long enough to think about starting a family. They never talked about it. He had just been happy to have someone who loved him. And then of course it had ended, and Tyrion hadn't thought about children furthermore.

Later, when his father told him he would marry Sansa, he said to Shae that he would make sure that their children would have everything they needed, only to be replied that they wouldn't have children if their grandfather would kill them if he ever learnt about their existence and that they could never see their father. Tyrion hadn't really thought about starting a family with Shae at the time. He had said that to reassure her, because he thought it could be a possibility in a far future, and also because he wanted Shae to know that they still had a future despite his marriage with Sansa. As for the children Tyrion thought he would eventually have with Sansa, he only saw it as a duty to his family. He never thought about what it actually meant to be a father. Now he was about to become one.

He wished so much that Sansa was present. They could talk about these things together, make plans for the future, maybe even think about how many children they wanted together. They never talked about these things. Their honey moon at Casterly Rock, after Sansa's name day, had been too short. There had been the false news about her sister, then the march through the Riverlands, the sieges of Riverrun and the Twins, the long months in the Neck, and then they were separated when Tyrion headed north while Sansa went east. They never took time, or had time, to discuss about it. Their thoughts were all focused on the war and freeing Winterfell. Tyrion wished there was a way for him to know how Sansa was. All he could do for her was to take back her home and give her back what was left of her family. If Rickon Stark was inside Winterfell, even though Tyrion still had doubts about it, he had to try to save him. Maybe the direwolf's head came from the time the Greyjoys burned the castle. The head could have been preserved with tar. And if Rickon Stark was in Winterfell, or had been there, then who knew what Ramsay could have done to him, or was doing to him right now?

Tyrion definitely couldn't sleep. He thought again about summoning a camp follower, and again he chased the idea from his head. He was married, to Sansa Stark none the less, and still he thought about bringing a whore into his bed, their bed, the one he shared with his wife so often, the one in which they conceived their child. Tyrion closed his eyes and thought about his wife. He could see her. She wore a red gown, like she often did lately. She was beautiful. So beautiful. Then the image blurred and he saw a great flame, and then a very long shadow. He was in the depths of Casterly Rock, where he used to make a fire and watch it for hours, imagining his father and his sister in it. He saw his father there, the great Tywin Lannister, burning. Then he heard a screech far away. Fire surrounded him. His father came out of the flames. "You disgraced the Lannister name for far too long," he said.

Guards appeared behind him. Tyrion recognized some of them. He could never forget them. A powerful voice rang into his ears, saying something in a language he never heard before. The guards began to scream, their arms and legs twisted, their armor sank into their flesh or melted on them. They fell all around and their bodies were consummated by fire. Tyrion's father stood before him, the face severe, and then something started to change in him. Cracks appeared all over his body, his tongue was out, his eyes were out of their orbits, and soon his body burst, throwing his organs everywhere. Tyrion saw the heart, still beating, eaten by the flames. He thought he heard something coming from it, a woman's voice, asking for something, a promise. Then his father's voice came out, but it was different from any way Tyrion ever heard his father talk. It only said two words. I promise.

The brain was being taken away by the flames as well, and his father's voice, sounding more like himself, came out of it. It's the family name that lives on. It's all that lives on. Tyrion watched his father's blood running on the floor, fire still all around. Tyrion realized at this moment that he held something into his hand. He held it so tight that blood began to came out from his palm as well. He opened his hand and looked at the jewel. It was so long ago. He thought he had forgotten it.
He woke up. It was useless. He wouldn't sleep this night. He got up and decided to follow Ser Davos's example and to walk. He brought four guards with him, just in case, and walked through the camp. He heard muffled noises coming out from many tents. This would be a profitable night for whores, if not a happy one. He knew there were women in the wildling army. Would the men of the North forget they were wildlings for a night? He left the Lannister-Tully camp to go the one Jon Snow erected for his own men. Maybe the bastard would still be awaken and they could talk more about everything that happened for each of them since they parted ways at the top of the Wall years ago.

Jon Snow's camp wasn't far away now. Only five minutes on feet were required to reach it. His war camp was more disorganized than the one where Tyrion's men were. It wasn't easy to make Freys, river lords, Northerners and Lannisters live together, but it seemed it was even worse when it came to do the same with Northerners and wildlings. Tyrion walked through the place, not really trying to find his half-brother-in-law. He only walked, just like Ser Davos said he would do himself. Until someone shouted at him with a booming voice.

"Didn't expect to see you here, Imp."

Tormund Giantsbane sat on a stump or something similar, his thick red beard looking brown in the night. "Can't sleep," Tyrion replied.

"You southerners cannot sleep before a battle."

"I could if I had my wife."

The sound the wildling made was somewhere between laughing and roaring. Maybe it was both. "Can't argue about that." He rose up from his stump and came to Tyrion, a clay cup in his hand. "Want some? Sour goat's milk. Better than any of that grape water you southern twats like sucking on."

Tyrion looked at the white liquid. He didn't think the wildling chief would try to poison him. In some way, he reminded Tyrion of Bronn. Tyrion seized the offered cup and drank carefully, to almost choke it out. Tormund made the same roaring laugh. Tyrion's throat was on fire. He had drunk a lot in his life, and many times he emptied strong wine jugs, but it seemed the wildlings defeated everyone in Westeros when it came to drinking.

"Even I couldn't sleep after this," Tyrion said.

"That's what I need to sleep before a battle. Can replace a girl very well." He took back the cup.

"Normally I drink before going to sleep, but before a battle I would rather keep my mind clear." Tyrion hadn't drunk before the Battle of Blackwater, and he didn't want to try the opposite for this one. "But without drink and without girls, I can't sleep."

"Finally, someone normal here." The wildling emptied the rest of the sour milk, then dropped the recipient on the ground. "Miss your wife?"

"I do."

He nodded. "Jon Snow told me she's kissed by fire."

"What?"

"Kissed by fire. Red hair."
"Oh, yes, she is." Tyrion understood what he meant now.

"Must be small, if you could keep her."

"We don't steal women south of the Wall." Not the way the wildlings does it. We have other methods, methods we believe to be more civilized, but in the end it's the same. We force them to marry us. "In fact, she's taller than her half-brother, and much taller than me."

Tormund looked at him very queerly. "You really have strange customs, you southerners." Tyrion could say the same about his people, but he kept it to himself. "Jon Snow had a girl, but didn't want to take her before she got naked before him. After that, he had her very often."

Tyrion frowned. "Jon Snow? He was with someone."

"While he was among us. Ygritte, that was her name. Kissed by fire. Redder than me. I would have taken her if I had been younger. Jon Snow captured the girl, then she escaped, but he ended with her nonetheless. Worried she would get pregnant or he would shame her, he said, and all other kind of stuff. All that stopped after they fucked the first time."

That was something Tyrion didn't expect. During his discussions with Jon Snow, he had come to realize that the boy was very shy around women and didn't want to take the risk of fathering bastards. That and the fact he was Ned Stark's son, Tyrion was quite ready to believe he would never lay with a woman, but it seemed he had been wrong. After all, Robb Stark failed a promise to marry a Frey girl for a woman from Essos. Sooner or later, every man fell in love, and when it happened, nor family, nor honor, nor promises, nor gods could stop him.

"Where is she now?" Maybe Jon Snow was with her, though he never mentioned her to Tyrion.

"Dead. Got an arrow through her heart at Castleblack. Jon Snow burned her body north of the Wall. That's where she belonged." He made a dry laugh. "She almost succeeded in making him one of us. I believed it myself. And he almost succeeded to make her betray us too. Neither of them succeeded in the end. She shot him three arrows in the back when he escaped us."

Well, that hadn't ended well. Tyrion thought about Shae who betrayed him at the trial. At least, she wasn't dead. "We always want the wrong woman," Tyrion said in a low voice. Tormund looked at him with a questioning gaze. "Nothing. I was looking for Jon Snow. Have any idea where he could be?"

"Last time I saw him, he was heading to visit the red witch."

"Well, I suppose I'll give her a visit too. Make sure you drink enough sour milk to gut every Bolton you come across tomorrow."

"With pleasure." The wildling said it while opening his arms and displaying a huge grin. It wasn't much more difficult to converse with these people than to converse with sellswords and drunk men. They were mostly the same.

It was only later, when Tormund Giantsbane was far away, that Tyrion realized he had no more idea about where the tent of the red priestess was than where Jon Snow's tent was. By chance, he ran into Lady Mira who came back from visiting her family and who indicated him where the tent in question was.

Tyrion found Jon Snow where Tormund said he would be. His back was turned to him and he talked with a woman with red hair who sat before a glass.
"Maybe he brought you here to die again," Tyrion heard the woman say as he came in. It didn't seem to be a very cheering conversation.

"What kind of god would do something like that?" Jon asked.

"The one we've got."

A long silence followed. Then Jon Snow turned to walk, only to face Tyrion. "I was never sure we had a god. Sorry to interrupt. I was told you were here," he said.

Jon Snow nodded. "Something important to tell me?" he asked.

"Not really. Only looking for company. I can't sleep, and I'm not the only one. Ser Davos and even your friend Tormund can't sleep. He's drinking sour milk."

"You drank some, didn't you?" asked Jon Snow, a smile at the corner of his lips.

"I did," Tyrion confessed. His expression surely betrayed him.

"I drank some, once, when I negotiated with Mance Rayder. He said it was a proper northern drink."

"If all wildlings only have that to drink, I understand why they want so much to get south of the Wall."

"A wise man would say we should try to get some sleep."

"Probably, but when have men ever been wise? We keep squabbling and fighting each other for crowns, for lands, for women, and in the end, no one wins. All the while, the dead wait for us to be weak enough to strike, and then we have nothing to oppose them."

"Maybe it's time to change that."

Tyrion couldn't agree more. If only the other northern lords thought the same. "Anyway, I can never sleep. I used to read and drink all night before, and to whore too, but I stopped when I married your sister. She also made me stop drinking. Almost."

Another grin. "Well, all the same, we should try to rest. When Winterfell is free, Sansa will come, and then we'll drink together. Good night, my friend."

On that, Jon Snow left. Tyrion realized the red priestess was looking at him. He had never met Melisandre of Asshai before, since she always stayed in Jon Snow's camp and seldom left her tent, but he knew more than enough about her. She had advised Stannis Baratheon, proclaimed him as the Lord's Chosen One, and burned people alive to have her god by Stannis's side. Judging from the results, both at Blackwater and at Winterfell, it hadn't worked out like she hoped. She wore a deep red gown, something Tyrion supposed was normal for someone serving the Lord of Light. Her face was pale, but gorgeous with generous lips. Her hair was so red that it almost seemed in fire. Sansa's hair looked pale in comparison. Tyrion would give her about forty years. She had to be about Cersei's age. His sister would be jealous before this woman. Some said she was Stannis's mistress. Remembering Selyse Baratheon, Tyrion couldn't blame the man.

The Red Woman kept staring at him and Tyrion grew uncomfortable. In other circumstances, he would have asked her question about Asshai and the other end of the world, since she came from there and that very few people ever visited it, but he didn't like the way she looked at him and he didn't really want to speak with a fanatic who burned people alive, even if she brought Jon Snow back to life. In fact, the latter didn't encourage him to speak with her. It scared him to know that this woman could bring dead back to life.

"I'll take my leave, my lady." He walked away, but was stopped almost immediately.

"You cast a very long shadow for a small man, Tyrion Lannister," she said.

He turned towards her. "You're not the first one to tell me that. And the one who told me this before you was a man without a cock who despised your kind."

"Many people despise my kind."

"For good reasons."

She glanced aside. "I'm not looking for recognition, or love. I'm only trying to do the lord's will."

"What is the lord's will?"

"I don't know. Not for sure. I only try to do what seems to be his will."

"And you believed his will was that Stannis sits on the Iron Throne?"

"I thought Stannis was the savior. A prince born amidst salt and smoke, with the blood of the dragon. I was wrong. Maybe there is a savior. Maybe there isn't one and he is yet to come."

"For myself, I don't believe in saviors."

"What do you believe in then?"

Tyrion sighed. "Everyone's always asking me to believe in things. Family, gods, kings, myself. It was often tempting, even now it is tempting. We like to believe in things, and I wanted me too, until I saw where belief got people. So I said no, thank you to belief."

"We all believe in something."

"Not me."

"What do you think of Jon Snow?" she asked.

"Dull, a lot, but honorable, and we can always count on him. He's a lot like his father. I suppose I should thank you for bringing him back."

"I didn't bring him back. The Lord did this."

"Well, anyway." A moment passed. "I don't believe he's a savior, if that's what you're asking. He's not the only one who came back from the dead, if I'm to believe Thoros of Myr. I don't think a savior will come out from nowhere to save us. But I think men of talents, together, could find a way to defeat the White Walkers."

"So you believe in something."

Tyrion smirked after a moment. "On that, you got me. I'll be going."

"I don't know what are the plans of the Lord of Light for you, Lord Tyrion, but I believe you'll have an important role to play in the war to come. So don't lose tomorrow, and don't get yourself killed."

"I'm not about to wish to die."
He walked away for good this time. He couldn't die, not right now. He had Sansa, and their child, and the North to secure. He couldn't die right now when his life was finally beginning to mean something. He would give back her home to Sansa, and if Tyrion found out that Ramsay Bolton had hurt her brother in any way, even by only making a single scratch on his skin, he would find a way to make him suffer more than any way Cersei could think about.

Chapter End Notes

I'm sorry for all those who hoped this might be the Battle of Bastards. You know how I love to delay things just to spite you :D

There's only one chapter taking place in Meereen left before the battle, I promise.

Please review

Next chapter: Kinvara
Kinvara II

Chapter Notes

The Battle of Meereen.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

KINVARA II

Boulders on fire fell everywhere around them. A great part of the city was burning. They tried to contain the fire to the eastern part, but when the nearest water point was the harbor, and that the harbor was closed and evacuated, it was a great challenge to find enough water to keep the fire at bay. Meereen was plagued with fire as much as she was by traitors, assassins and slavers. Evil had taken his hold on the city.

However, evil hadn't won yet. The people were fighting, against the fires if not against the fleet. The Unsullied kept defending the pyramids, from where they could launch attacks everywhere. The Seconds Sons and the Fiery Hand fought against the Sons of the Harpy and everyone helped to evacuate the population who lived in the eastern part of the city to the western part, where fire was kept away and that the projectiles the fleet threw couldn't reach.

Kinvara kept praying. She was in a house on the terrain where the future Red Temple of Meereen was in construction. For now, the construction had been stopped because of the attack, but it would start again once this was all over. A part of the city was afire, but fire was a gift from the Lord of Light. As long as there was fire, they couldn't be defeated. Boulders didn't hit the place where she was, although it wasn't far from the sea and the harbor. Fire didn't reach it either. Fire couldn't burn places dedicated to the Lord of Light. Daenerys Stormborn was back. The masters didn't know what was waiting for them. They couldn't defeat the servants of the Lord of Light alone. Fire only made them more powerful.

Kinvara wasn't accompanied by any priest. It was time. A great many years ago, to the day, she made her vows. She became a priestess of R'hllor. It seemed so far away, and yet, it was so close. She had to do it alone, and anyway the other priests were all required to rescue the people still near the harbor, to fight the Sons of the Harpy and help installing the refugees. She emptied her mind, only thinking about her Lord, closed her eyes, and began her prayer in High Valyrian.

R'hllor, Lord of Light, Heart of Fire, God of Flame and Shadow

The only true god, who was, who is, and who will ever be

Source of life, origin of joy, goodness itself

I am your servant, my life is yours, as is all life

I am nothing next to you.
I am your servant.

I am your voice.

I am your arm.

The prayer was long. It lasted for an hour. As she prayed, she had glimpses, signs and images that her Lord sent to her. She saw a ship afire. She saw a young woman with blond hair on the back of a dragon. She saw a body on marble. She saw a sword covered with blood, a golden hand next to it. She saw dragons flying over a great castle in a mountain. She saw a great wall made of ice and rock. She saw a shadow on the floor in a cavern. She heard the cries of a baby. She saw two knights with a three-headed dragon fighting half a dozen men near a tower in a country of sand. She saw a great battle in the snow. She had already seen much of it, but she didn't think about that. She let the images, the sounds, the smells pass through her mind, seeing them but not trying to keep them. R'hllor gave them to her, and it wasn't her place to decide if she should keep them longer than he wanted.

Once the prayer was over, she waited, her mind entirely set on R'hllor. She looked into the flames that appeared while she prayed, waiting for something to be seen into them. Shapes began to appear, but they weren't clear enough to have any meaning she could grab. She waited. She waited for a very long time. Precise forms began to pour into the fire. It was snowing. That was a great storm. She saw a long line of men riding in the snow. They were tired. That was the time. That was her vision.

She focused all her attention on it, trying to decipher as many details as she could. She could see the faces of the men riding. Her heart stopped for a moment. An arrow flew and a man died. She brought her attention back to all the line of men. Arrows flew everywhere and more people died. A body was in the snow pierced by half a dozen arrows, but it still moved. Horses attacked from both sides. Death was everywhere. It didn't last long. Everyone was killed. No one survived. No one but a man. He crawled away. The storm continued. He was half dead, and soon snow covered him. Life was leaving him, the heat abandoning his body, the fire fading. Everything went dark. A great shadow loomed over him. It was a very great shadow. It took him, bringing him away from the world of the living. She saw fire in the south.

Kinvara emerged from the vision, panting and sweating, though her magic hid the sweat. Even someone who would touch her wouldn't feel the sweat. It was always like that every year. The worst time had been the year after she said her vows. Or maybe it was two years ago. She was unable to say if this one was really worse, but she couldn't allow herself to think about it now. They were at war, and Daenerys Stormborn needed her.

There wasn't much in Kinvara's chamber, except for a bed, a chair close to the hearth, a desk with another chair in a corner, and a small altar with a recipient where fire took life when needed. That was before this altar that she made her prayer. She brought the altar to life again, summoning her powers to reach her fellow priests. One by one, their faces appeared before her, the flames taking their shape. Yonerro, with tanned skin and deep black eyes, who was in Yunkai right now, appeared first. Then came Tishae, her hair dyed in red, skin white as milk, a flat nose along with pale blue eyes. Native from Lorath, Kinvara had sent her to Astapor, the smallest city of all. Finally, Moqorro's black face, dark as pitch, with pure white hair like the mane of a lion, was the last to take place. They all bowed to her, though Kinvara noticed Moqorro's hesitation.

"How are things going for each of you?" she asked them.

"The western bank is entirely under our control, as is the Long Bridge," Moqorro said fiercely. "The fighting is going well on the eastern bank. All the districts of the west and half of those from the east are in our hands now."

"What about the districts inside the Black Walls? And the harbor?"

"We haven't taken them yet. The Black Walls are almost impossible to take. The immediate districts around them escape our hold. We're focusing our energies on the docks."

"Keep focusing our forces there. If we take the harbor, we can control everything that leaves and enter the city. The masters and the triarchs mustn't be allowed to keep this part of the city, or else they could attack the western bank by sea and bring help from the other Free Cities."

"We're going to imprison them into their walls and starve them out," declared Morroqo.

"That will be impossible. They have enough food to last for years. A siege would be impossible to maintain for that much time. We must bring the masters to surrender."

"That's impossible without starving them. We cannot take the walls, and we have no traitor inside who could help us to open the gates. The only option is starvation."

Kinvara sighed inwardly. For once, she was glad to have Morroqo's military knowledge on her side, but the Lord of Light didn't give to a single man all its gifts. The Second Servant of the Lord of Light was no good when it came to politics.

"The people won't hold if they must starve the masters inside the Black Walls. Or else the slaves might starve as well, with a conflict without ending. Take the harbor and make sure the forces of the masters don't go too far from the walls."

"And then?"

"You wait." Morroqo was obviously displeased... and angry. "Daenerys Stormborn is back in Meereen, with her dragons."

The other priests all looked surprised, and overjoyed. All of them except Morroqo. "I foresaw it," he said.

"As did I."

They both looked at each other with a calm expression, but in fact both hated the other, and they knew it. Morroqo always said that Kinvara wasn't ready to do what was necessary for the Lord of Light. Morroqo believed the red priests should rule the cities and bring the people into the Lord's light this way. Kinvara didn't approve. The Lord of Light didn't want them to rule in his stead. He wanted them to guide the people, not to force them to follow him. At most, they had to help the rulers when their Lord wanted them to, but nothing more. She had been very reluctant to leave Volantis, because it meant Morroqo would lead the Red Temple in her absence. She had had no choice. As the Second Servant of the Lord of Light, it was to Morroqo that came the duty to lead the red priests in Volantis while the First Servant, Kinvara in that case, was away. The longer time she spent far from Volantis, the more dangerous Morroqo would become.

"How many masters did you execute since the rebellion started?" Kinvara asked to black skinned man.

"Most of those we captured were murdered by the crowd. We also sacrificed one each day in plain sight of the guards on the Black Walls."

Fury flared inside Kinvara. "No more sacrifices. And stop the people from slaughtering the masters."
We want those inside the Walls to surrender. If they think they will be murdered by their former slaves as soon as they leave the safety of their walls, they will never surrender."

"Do we really want them to surrender?"

"Yes. We want freedom for the people of Volantis, but it would be very regretful if there were only a few left to be free after all this."

"The masters and the triarchs will never surrender."

"Once we've destroyed their fleet in Meereen, yes, they will. Now go. I remind you of your orders. No sacrifice, no murder of masters, take the harbor. You're dismissed, Morroqo."

She said it firmly. Morroqo bowed his head after a moment. "Yes, First Servant."

His image disappeared. Kinvara closed her eyes. It was a relief for her to be rid of the tall priest. She looked at Yonerro.

"What about Yunkai?"

"There have been several riots and five masters have been murdered by their slaves. The Wise Masters have brought several companies of sellswords who patrol the streets of Yunkai and kill everyone they suspect. The city is falling into chaos, but the masters remain safe inside their houses. We couldn't organize a resistance against the sellswords. There aren't enough people who follow us. Two of my fellow priests have been killed. We must hide."

He said all of this with a very grave voice. His voice was always grave, but this time it was more than usual. Kinvara understood that things didn't go well at all. "Keep a low profile for some time. Don't try anything that could get you killed. I'll speak to you again when the situation in Meereen will have evolved. Just don't leave Yunkai at all cost." She turned to the last priest, the only one who was a woman. "And in Astapor?"

"The city is already ours. Many of the richest masters in Astapor came from Yunkai or Volantis. Daenerys Stormborn murdered most of the original Good Masters when she freed the Unsullied. The new masters are but little loved by the people in the city, both freedmen and slaves. We managed to rise the slaves against their masters again and most of the freedmen joined us. Right now, we organize a government ruled both by freedmen and former slaves. I'm going to have a seat on it."

"Good. When Yunkai hears about that, they might send companies of sellswords against you. Be prepared."

"There's already a company outside the walls, the Stormcrows, but for now they haven't tried anything."

"More might come. Be careful, Tishae." She looked at both of them. "Wait for the next time I summon you."

Their faces faded. Kinvara left her room. She had to go to the Great Pyramid and quickly. Two men of the Fiery Hand were waiting for her in the lobby and six more outside the house. Zanrush was waiting outside as well.

"High Priestess, we moved most of the people living near the zone of bombardment," he told her as they walked toward the Great Pyramid. Explosions were heard everywhere around them as projectiles fell on the city. It was obvious now why the Sons of the Harpy burned the fleet of Meereen. Without ships, they couldn't do anything against the fleet of Volantis. "We managed to help some Unsullied to retreat from the walls as well."

"Very good."

"Why hasn't the queen done anything yet?"

"It could be dangerous to ride her dragons in the night. She will do something very soon, rest…"

Cries came from their right. A man with a golden mask attacked them from this direction, a dagger pointed toward her, but the guard next to her plunged his spear through him before he could get to her. The spear travelled from the right side to the left side of his body. The mask was made in the shape of a harpy. Others popped from all around, trying to get to her. Her guards, however, came from Volantis, and they were the elite of the Fiery Hand. At least ten Sons of the Harpy died trying to get to her, and not a single guard died. Zanrush unsheathed a sword he hid under his robes. He killed two men with it. However, that wasn't enough. More men hiding behind masks came. They didn't dare to attack them. They stayed at distance, blocking the street from both sides. There was a dozen of them before their group, and a dozen behind as well.

The Lord of Light didn't warn her about this. Was it her end? No, that couldn't be. She still had a part to play. The Lord wasn't done with her yet. If he didn't warn her, it was probably because he thought she didn't need to be warned. Kinvara summoned her powers. She created a link with all her men and with Zanrush, telling them to wait. Then she turned against the Sons of the Harpy waiting before them, all with daggers in hand. She created an illusion of twenty more guards of the Fiery Hand behind them, and made one of the false guard shout at them. They all turned. She gave the signal.

Six guards assaulted the twelve Sons of the Harpy who had turned their back to them. It was a slaughter. The others, behind them, decided to attack after a moment of hesitation caused by the surprise, but the two other guards who remained behind were enough to keep them at bay, and Kinvara blinded one of the assailants. It was only temporary, but it made the movements of the servants of the Great Other more difficult. Zanrush and the other guards had enough time to come back. The men who hid behind masks died for the most. Only one managed to escape. Kinvara summoned her powers one last time, even if it cost her a lot, and blinded him as well. He fell on the ground, incapable of seeing anything for a moment, as if the sun had appeared right before him. Zanrush ran to him and plunged his sword into his eye.

Kinvara sighed. She managed to not stumble from the great amount of energy she just used. She had entered the head of nine people at the same time, dazzled two men and created a huge illusion without anything to start with. It was easier to maintain an illusion for a long time when you placed it over something that was already there, like changing the appearance of a person. This time, she had to create something from nothing. Entering her guards' minds hadn't been too difficult, since she had done it before, but for Zanrush, it was the first time she did it. She closed her eyes and allowed herself one second to regain her senses.

"We should go. Before others try to attack us. May the Lord of Light watch over us," she said.

They were on their way without a word. Almost everyone in the Red Temple obeyed her. Morroqo was an exception, one of the few people who contested her decisions, though he never openly questioned her authority. Kinvara was under shock as they climbed the stairs to the top of the Great Pyramid. The Sons of the Harpy were growing bolder. They attacked a red priestess, and the High Priestess among all. Maybe this also showed they were desperate and now truly saw her as a threat. It was time for Daenerys Stormborn to put an end to the crimes of the masters and their mercenaries.

They arrived in the council room. Everyone else was already present. Grey Worm, Malcolm Branfield, Trystane Martell, and even Lord Varys. Of course, Daenerys Targaryen was there as well.
"You're late," she said.

Kinvara bowed to her. She never mastered the curtsy, and anyway it wasn't useful anywhere in Essos. "Forgive me, your Grace. We were attacked on our way by the Sons of the Harpy."

"You escaped them?"

"Yes, they're all dead. My guards and I took care of that."

"Good."

Kinvara could still barely believe it. Daenerys Stormborn, the Mother of Dragons, the Breaker of Chains, stood before her. She had this vision of a young woman with blond hair on a dragon for so long, and it was real. R'hllor kept his promise. He showed her the future. With Daenerys Targaryen back, they could really hope to defeat the masters and the other servants of the Great Other. She could feel the power inside her. She felt it before in some people, who probably had Valyrian blood, but nothing like this. Daenerys Stormborn's dragon blood was pure. Kinvara could feel its power before she saw the one who was promised. There was also something else in her that she had the impression to have felt or seen before.

"Now," began the Queen of Meereen, "Prince Trystane of House Martell, you're the one who ruled Meereen while I was away?"

"I did." The prince obviously didn't feel well.

"Grey Worm, Branfield, may I know how did it come to happen?"

Grey Worm was the one to answer after a moment. "The nobility of Meereen didn't manage to rule the city together. We thought Prince Trystane had more abilities to run it than everyone else here."

An inquisitive look from Daenerys to Malcolm Branfield brought a shrug from the man, meaning he had the same thoughts. "So, you gave the city to a foreigner whose loyalty you couldn't be sure of? Seeing how things are, I wouldn't say it was a good choice."

Kinvara pitied Trystane on that. "Your Grace, if I may, the masters would have attacked no matter what we did. It was their intent to take Meereen from the beginning. They burnt the fleet on purpose. This attack was planned a long time ago. No matter anything anyone would have done, we would be under attack right now. Meereen couldn't be abandoned by the Unsullied while they tried to retake Yunkai and Astapor, or else it could have fallen to the Sons of the Harpy."

Daenerys looked at her sharply. "I heard your men fought side by side with the Unsullied and the Second Sons."

"They are at your disposal, your Grace."

"Very well." She turned to the eunuch. "As for you, Lord Varys, I have no reason to trust you. You oversaw a campaign to have me killed for twenty years and worked for the usurper all this time. I let you live for now since you warned us about the coming fleet, but you'll have to explain yourself later." Varys respectfully bowed his head without saying a word.

Daenerys Stormborn looked at Trystane Martell once more. "But you, Prince Trystane, why should I trust you, seeing to what your rule led?"

"My aunt was married to your brother, your Grace," he began to explain. "She was savagely killed by the men of the usurper when the city was taken. My family never forgot. Ever since, my father has been working to undermine Robert Baratheon and Tywin Lannister. He remained loyal to your house."

The queen considered the prince for a moment. "I read the contract your uncle and Ser Willem Darry made a long time ago. However, I never received any help from Dorne before. The last time I looked, Prince Doran made an alliance with the Lannisters. He even betrothed his son to the sister of the usurper. And you were the son who was betrothed."

The prince obviously had a hard time. It was always difficult for him to hear someone speak about Myrcella Baratheon. Kinvara had seen it over the previous months. "That was an act. My father never planned for me to marry the princess Myrcella. Anyway, she was assassinated not long ago in Dorne."

"On your father's orders?"

"No. But it doesn't matter. The Lannisters and the Tyrells have declared war upon us. We have enough men to defend our territory, but not to take the Iron Throne by ourselves. My father will give you the full strength of Dorne to take it back, but he needs you to come to Westeros to take it. As soon as you set foot on the land, he will support your claim officially."

"And I suppose he wants me to marry you instead of your dead brother."

Trystane nodded very timidly. "He sent me there to propose it to you, but when I arrived…"

"I wasn't there. We'll discuss about it later. For now, we have more pressing issues. We must deal with this invasion. I won't let the masters get away with that, this time. I gave them the choice to live into my new world or to die in their old world. It seems they chose the latter."

"We need to destroy the fleet, but we have no ships to oppose them," said Malcolm Branfield. "We need a plan, and soon."

"I have a plan," said the queen, very calmly. "I will crucify the masters, I will set their fleets afire, kill every last one of their soldiers, and return their cities to the dirt." A silence followed. "That is my plan."

The silence that followed her last sentence was thick. Kinvara didn't stop looking at the queen. She wasn't joking. That was her real plan. Kinvara wanted to see the masters die, it was true, as much as most of the slaves who suffered in their hands, but there were masters in Volantis who followed R’hllor, and even though they had slaves, some didn't mistreat them. There was another reason why she didn't agree with Daenerys Stormborn's plans.

The Mother of Dragons noticed that Kinvara was looking at her. While the others seemed afraid and looked away, she stared at Daenerys. "You don't approve?" she asked the priestess. Kinvara wouldn't look down. When she became a priestess, she stopped looking down when so called superior people looked at her like she was nothing.

"The men on these ships in the bay are slaves, for the most. The other soldiers in the armies of Volantis, Yunkai and Astapor are slaves as well. A large number of the people living in the Free Cities are slaves too. They are their cities, as much as they are the masters'. And even among the masters, there are some who don't deserve to die. Right now, masters are fighting alongside other freedmen and slaves in the other cities against your enemies, your Grace. They're not all against you. These are your allies you will crucify, these are slaves you will burn with these ships, these are slaves you will slaughter by killing the soldiers, and these are the homes of slaves you will burn when you will destroy the cities."
Daenerys Stormborn kept looking at her. Her face remained neutral. Kinvara saw no hint of hatred or anger, but nor of doubt or regret, or even of meditation. Kinvara held her gaze. She faced worse eyes than those of Daenerys Stormborn.

"Your Grace." Prince Trystane talked very carefully.

Daenerys Stormborn kept looking at Kinvara for a long time, not giving any attention to the prince of Dorne. She turned her head in the end, not without still looking at Kinvara from the corner of her eye while she turned it. She finally brought her attention to the prince.

"If I may, your Grace, when your ancestors invaded Westeros, all the kingdoms submitted to their rule. All but Dorne. My own ancestors fought against the Targaryens and resisted. They had less men, no dragons, and were less well armed than Aegon and his allies. Their castles were burned to the ground, their homes destroyed, the people were slaughtered. Still, they resisted. The First Dornish War cost the life to Rhaenys Targaryen, the sister of King Aegon. There were many other wars, and for two hundred years our ancestors fought, without results. You will only accomplish the same thing here if you simply destroy the cities. You will only create for yourself life long enemies. You'll have to fight them forever."

It was obvious now that everyone in the room disapproved the plan of the Dragon Queen. Trystane Martell may be of high birth, but in this case he had more savvy than many slaves, red priests or even freedmen who thought all masters should simply die and that every mean possible was good to reach that goal.

"I may have another solution. Something that wouldn't involve the death of hundreds of thousand people or the ruin of entire cities," Kinvara said.

They listened to her plan. When they all agreed, the queen sent a messenger to the fleet. Then they waited. Two hours later, they went to a large terrace where the emissaries would join them.

"I do hope your plan works out well, priestess," told her Daenerys Stormborn.

"If it doesn't work out well, you can still burn the fleet, Your Grace, but I doubt it will be necessary," she replied.

They waited there with a dozen of Unsullied. All members of the queen's council were there, except for Lord Varys who remained under watch in his chamber. The fights were still going on in the city and the ships kept throwing boulders on it. They wanted to destroy Meereen, not to take it. They wanted to prove that any city that would turn away from slavery was condemned to ruin. Kinvara wouldn't let that happen.

The same ambassadors who had negotiated with Trystane Martell and her months ago came. Yezzan zo Qaggaz, Razdal mo Eraz and Belicho Paenymion all had a satisfied smile on their faces. Their contempt was their weakness. It would always be their weakness. The triarch especially looked more arrogant than ever. He had that smile that Kinvara would never forget. She didn't hide her hatred to him., but he didn't flinch when their eyes met.

"We didn't expect you would want to talk. We expected you would rather die inside your pyramid, rather than face us," said Razdal to the queen without introduction. "Once before, I offered you peace. If you had not been so arrogant, you could have returned to your homeland with a fleet of ships. Instead, you will flee Slaver's Bay on foot like the beggar queen you are."

"You certainly love to listen to yourself, master, but we don't, and your men don't either," Kinvara said. She heard enough highborn people talking like they owned the world and as if everyone was interested by what they said.

"You're not in position to say anything, red woman," said Belicho with spite. He didn't shudder like he usually did in her presence. This would probably be the last time it ever happened. Kinvara held her head high and kept staring at him. He knew nothing.

"Our terms are simple," began the ambassador of Astapor. "You and your foreign friends will abandon the Great Pyramid and the city of Meereen. The Unsullied you stole from Kraznys mo Nakloz will remain to be sold again to the highest bidder. The dragons beneath the Great Pyramid will be slaughtered."

They were fools. If they ever approached the dragons, the beasts would burn them alive. Of course, the masters would send a thousand slaves to death to kill the dragons. As usual, they would use the people as arrow's fodder, dragon's fodder in this case.

"We obviously didn't communicate clearly. We're here to discuss your surrender, not mine," said the queen.

The three ambassadors looked at each other with huge grins, almost laughing. "I imagine it's difficult adjusting to the new reality," said Razdal.

"You couldn't say better," Kinvara interrupted. "You cannot adapt to the new reality. I warned you, the last time we met. I told you the slaves wouldn't abandon their liberty."

"We have nothing to hear from fanatics who make the people believe they have powers with powders and tricks," said the triarch with disdain.

"Then I suppose you don't want to hear that half of Volantis is now controlled by the red priests and your slaves. The masters and the other triarchs are hiding behind walls and are cut from their precious harbor. Without harbor, they have no money. Yunkai is in civil war, riots are breaking up everywhere in the city. And the slaves have taken the city of Astapor. You represent a government that doesn't exist anymore, merchant," she said to Yezzan zo Qaggaz.

"You're lying," said Belicho.

"I never lie," replied Kinvara. She felt the fire coming. It was close. She saw it.

"That's enough. Your reign is over," declared the emissary from Yunkai.

"My reign has just begun," said the queen.

They heard muffled screeches coming from right in front of them. The masters and some of their soldiers looked behind to see the source of that sound. Then it appeared out of nowhere. The black dragon. He flew around them, then landed before Daenerys Stormborn. The queen climbed on his back. Kinvara saw her giving kicks and the dragon took fly. Kinvara looked at it, marvelling at the sight. She saw the other two dragons before, but in the dark, and they were far less impressing than this one. She could feel the power emanating from it. It was the same magic she felt in their mother. Fire made flesh. The fire in the skies. Lightbringer.

She felt something else stirring, several floors under them. She felt them getting free and couldn't stop smiling. Two more dragons joined the biggest one. Trystane Martell would have to revise his opinion about her decision to visit the dragons. If she hadn't freed them, they wouldn't be flying, spreading fire. The ships were still firing. They wouldn't be the only ones soon. The three dragons stopped in the air over one of them, then unleashed their sacred fire. Kinvara felt their power as it was released. She also felt death. Lord of Light, guide them to you. Show them the way. She regretted they had to kill slave soldiers who had no choice in being there, but sometimes sacrifices must be made to ensure victory. She wouldn't forget these men's deaths. She remembered a man she called Father once, speaking of how evil men set fire to their house and many others. The people who died weren't lost. She watched the dragons turn to a second ship and set it ablaze as well. It wouldn't be long before all the armada surrendered. Even from afar, she could glimpse the men jumping overboard.

She turned to the masters, displaying the same arrogant expression they had a minute ago and that was now gone from their face. "Once before, we offered you peace. If you had not been so arrogant, you could have kept your power, your armies, your ships, your riches, your influence, your titles and only lose your slaves. Instead, you will lose everything now," she declared, looking intently to Razdal. Then her gaze turned to Belicho.

"Your men have a choice," said Grey Worm in Low Valyrian. The masters understood it, even if they never used it, but most important, their men understood and used it daily. "Fight and die for masters who would never fight and die for you, or go home to your families."

The choice wasn't hard to make. The soldiers behind the three emissaries ran away, dropping their weapons. More lives that were spared. Kinvara thanked the Lord.

"Thank you for all the ships. They will make a fine replacement for the ones you burned, and that will spare me the trouble of rebuilding our fleet," declared Malcolm Branfield, not without a smile.

"My father once told me that he believed in second chances, but not in third chances," stated Prince Trystane. "Our queen gave you a chance when she took your cities. We gave you a second one when we spoke. We made a treaty of peace, and you just broke it. You declared war to Meereen. It so happens that our queen is of the same mind than my father. She is fond of mercy, but she doesn't believe in third chances either."

"Daenerys Stormborn, the Breaker of Chains and the Mother of Dragons, decided that one of you will die for your crimes against Meereen," said Kinvara. "The choice is yours. I suggest you to think very carefully when you decide who dies."

The three men were at loss. One moment they thought they were all powerful, and the next their fate laid in the hands of former slaves. Yezzan zo Qaggaz, who represented the now fallen government of the Good Masters of Astapor, and who just seemed to realize that it was the truth, stood between the other two. Razdal mo Eraz and Belicho Paenymion looked right there and pushed their colleague forward.

"Him. He should die. He's not one of us. He's an outsider, lowborn. He does not speak for us," said the Yunkaii.

"Yes, him. That's him you must kill," added the triarch of Volantis.

Grey Worm started to walk to them, but before he could make a few steps, Kinvara put a hand on his arm. The Unsullied looked at her strangely, but he stopped all the same. Kinvara was the one to advance. Yezzan was a merchant. He was born among the nobility, though not the highest one. He had made his own fortune in the trade of slaves. He was about to lose this trade now, and his life too. Fear was plain on his face, while fear and hope fought with the other's.

"Please. Please," asked the merchant, falling on his knees as Kinvara stood before him.

She looked down on him. How long did she have to lower her eyes and to kneel or crouch before men who said they were superior? Now it was the opposite. However, she wasn't satisfied. She looked at Razdal who still stood tall.
"On your knees. Bend them," she ordered him. Leftovers of pride made him hesitate, but he knelt.

She turned to Belicho, who knelt immediately. He was the most highborn and the most powerful of them all, and yet he was the one who fell the most easily because he feared for his life. She kept staring at him. Her medallion at her throat glowed and her true self appeared to the triarch of Volantis. He opened his mouth in surprise. Only him could see her as she truly was.

"You don't recognize me, don't you?"

She penetrated in his mind, asking him this question without moving her lips. No, he didn't recognize her. Even without her spells to hide her true self, he didn't remember her. However, she did remember him. She remembered him very well.

Quick as the lighting that produced fire, she took a dagger hidden inside her robes and planted it in the man's neck.

"You don't remember me, but I do remember you. All the girls you raped to test the merchandises before you sold them remember you, Belicho Paenymion. You enjoyed being inside of us. Now pay the price."

With a swift movement, she withdrew the blade from his throat and opened it. She sent her words to his mind as he died. Her words were all that occupied his mind as life left his body, as he choked in his own blood. She saw the man who raped her when she arrived in Volantis, just like he raped so many other young girls to be sure they were nice products, die, feeling great satisfaction. Revenge, at last. She cleaned the blade from the blood covering it. It was a sacred dagger, blessed by R'hllor, and she wouldn't soil it with a monster's blood longer than necessary.

She made a few steps behind and looked at the two remaining masters. "Now, decide which one of you will die," she said.

"But, you told us…" began Razdal.

"The queen asked that one of you dies for your crimes against Meereen. This man died for other crimes he committed. Now, choose which one of you will die for your common crimes against this city."

She looked at Grey Worm, who came at her side. Both the masters were pleading now. Yezzan was crouched on the ground, his head against the sand, while Razdal still knelt. Grey Worm unsheathed his knife and cut Razdal's throat. Kinvara approved the choice, though she didn't feel much pity for Yezzan either.

She looked down on him and put her hand on his shoulder. "You live by the grace of the queen. Tell everyone what you saw today. If anyone comes again with the idea of pulling back slaves into chains, to invade the great city of Meereen or to bring back the Free Cities to what they call glory, remind them what happened when Daenerys Stormborn and her dragons came to Meereen."

She spoke to him on a soft tone, to make him understand he had every interest to do so. She walked to the border of the terrace and looked at the bay. The dragons had stopped throwing their fire. Half a dozen ships were ablaze, and the others were intact and unmoving. They had their fleet. The Lord's Chosen One would have to sail for Westeros soon. The great war was coming.

Kinvara would have to follow her to Westeros. The first part of her mission was ended. The second part was about to begin. She looked at the three dragons, flying high over the fleet. They were beautiful. She smiled while looking at the Mother of Dragons riding her large black dragon. She had foreseen it for so long. Now she saw it for real. Her vision overlapped the reality. R'hllor didn't lie to her. He never lied. The young woman with blond hair, flying on the back of a dragon. Her smile faded as she looked at another dragon.

Chapter End Notes

When I wrote this chapter, I tried to illustrate the order of the red priests, or at least the one from Volantis, as a religious organization, but also as a political organization, with its own rules, its own government and its own internal power struggles. The red priests are surrounded by mysticism and magic, but they are also humans (see the doubts of Thoros of Myr in Season 3 about his own faith and Melisandre's chapter in ADWD) and they have the same flaws and qualities as any other people.

I also keep forging a personality to Kinvara. I'm mostly turning her into an original character since there wasn't much we could tell about her from her short appearance in Season 6.

Please review

Next chapter: Battle of Bastards (Yes, finally. The battle will be split in four chapters from four different POV.)
The Battle of Bastards, or the Second Battle of Winterfell. Four chapters, each one from a different POV. Sorry for the delay, but my thesis took a lot of my time lately.

She was woken up by someone who shook her shoulder. She met the eyes of Howland Reed as she opened hers. He placed a finger on his lips.

"I brought you everything necessary," he said.

He pointed his chin towards the ground near Arya's bed. In the darkness, she discerned a huge bag with something glistening through the opening. A helmet.

"Thank you," she said in a whisper, all smile.

"Let's start right now. You must be ready. The sun is about to rise."

Arya looked through the flap of the tent. It was closed, but through the small slit she distinguished a dark blue sky. Dawn wasn't far indeed.

Howland Reed helped her to don the complete set of armor he brought for her. There was everything she needed. A helmet, a chainmail, an armor in leather with the arms of House Cerwyn, and even a sword, a real sword. It felt heavy when Arya took it. It was far heavier than Needle.

"Where did you find all this?" she asked, as the Lord of Greywater Watch helped to place the belt around her waist.

"There are surpluses everywhere. I picked the things that looked the most at your height. Here."

He placed the helmet on her head. Then he stepped back and looked at her. A smile appeared on his face.

"You make me think more than ever about your aunt."

Arya felt as if she was in a cage, but if all men carried these on their back during battle and could suffer it, then she could as well. Lord Reed had accepted to help her so she may go unnoticed in the army. Jon had refused her to participate to the battle, but Arya didn't care about what he said. She wouldn't stand aside while her brother fought, especially not when Rickon's life was at stake. She was of a very good mind to kill Ramsay, if only for killing Shaggydog. She had added him on her list and he was at the top of it right now. She would take care of Beric Dondarrion and Thoros of Myr later, and maybe of that red witch as well. First, she would have to find out if she really brought Jon back to life. It seemed so impossible for Arya. However, she saw Thoros bring Beric back to life in that cave and Jon wouldn't lie to her. She wished she had been able to kill those who stabbed him, but she didn't blame Jon for killing them himself. That was his right.

"I must go now," Howland said.
"You'll be in the first ranks?"

"No. I'll be with the bulk of the forces. However, you will be in the vanguard, with that tabard of House Cerwyn. Be careful, Arya. Don't get yourself killed."

"I won't."

She had survived worse than battles and she wouldn't die when she was about to go back into her home and take it back from the men who murdered Robb and her mother. When her father's friend was gone, Arya waited for a moment. Then she crouched onto the floor and took something under her bed. She took it off the scabbard and looked at the blade. It wasn't entirely identical, but it was close to the one she had. Needle was with her again.

Jon had brought her a new one yesterday, before she went to bed. Apparently, he ordered a new one from the blacksmith Lyanna Mormont brought from Bear Island, giving him as much detail about it to have a sword exactly like the one he gave her before they left Winterfell. The result wasn't bad. Arya missed Needle for a very long time. It was probably kept somewhere at the Eyrie. She may get it back the day they would kill Littlefinger, but in the meantime, she would contend herself with this one.

Jon had been smiling when he gave it to her last evening, just like he smiled the day he gave her the first one. She missed those days. She missed her home. She looked outside. People were beginning to move around and it had turned more clear. The battle would be soon. She placed back Needle into its scabbard. First lesson: stick them with the pointy end. She would stick Ramsay with it, and poke him full of holes. She was quick enough for that now. She hid the second Needle under the leather jacket to make it less visible. She didn't want to be recognized among the men.

The call to arms came soon and Arya went out. She merged among Lord Cerwyn's men and managed to get her hands on a horse. She spoke to no one, and no one bothered speaking to her. When Lord Cerwyn spoke to all of them and they all had to answer, she used a booming voice to hide the fact she was a girl. Then they followed him to the battlefield, where they took place at the edge of the Wolfswood. The Cerwyn forces were in the center of the vanguard. She missed Needle for a long time. It was probably kept somewhere at the Eyrie. She may get it back the day they would kill Littlefinger, but in the meantime, she would contend herself with this one.

Jon had brought her a new one yesterday, before she went to bed. Apparently, he ordered a new one from the blacksmith Lyanna Mormont brought from Bear Island, giving him as much detail about it to have a sword exactly like the one he gave her before they left Winterfell. The result wasn't bad. Arya missed Needle for a very long time. It was probably kept somewhere at the Eyrie. She may get it back the day they would kill Littlefinger, but in the meantime, she would contend herself with this one.

Jon had been smiling when he gave it to her last evening, just like he smiled the day he gave her the first one. She missed those days. She missed her home. She looked outside. People were beginning to move around and it had turned more clear. The battle would be soon. She placed back Needle into its scabbard. First lesson: stick them with the pointy end. She would stick Ramsay with it, and poke him full of holes. She was quick enough for that now. She hid the second Needle under the leather jacket to make it less visible. She didn't want to be recognized among the men.

The call to arms came soon and Arya went out. She merged among Lord Cerwyn's men and managed to get her hands on a horse. She spoke to no one, and no one bothered speaking to her. When Lord Cerwyn spoke to all of them and they all had to answer, she used a booming voice to hide the fact she was a girl. Then they followed him to the battlefield, where they took place at the edge of the Wolfswood. The Cerwyn forces were in the center of the vanguard. She missed Needle for a very long time. It was probably kept somewhere at the Eyrie. She may get it back the day they would kill Littlefinger, but in the meantime, she would contend herself with this one.

Jon had been smiling when he gave it to her last evening, just like he smiled the day he gave her the first one. She missed those days. She missed her home. She looked outside. People were beginning to move around and it had turned more clear. The battle would be soon. She placed back Needle into its scabbard. First lesson: stick them with the pointy end. She would stick Ramsay with it, and poke him full of holes. She was quick enough for that now. She hid the second Needle under the leather jacket to make it less visible. She didn't want to be recognized among the men.

On the right side, only a few banners could be seen as well. The mountain clans had been placed there. There were also the Freys who made the left flank of the vanguard with their cavalry. Arya hated to see them here. She also saw the golden lion and the silver trout who closed the right flank. Behind them, only trees were visible. Arya thought she saw something move. Ahead of them stood many crosses with dead bodies burning. They were in the space separating them from the Bolton forces.

Arya had never seen a battle. She was there at the Red Wedding, but that hadn't been a real battle. It was a slaughter. This one would be her first. She had to admit she felt powerless in the mass of men she found herself among. She had almost no place to move in the middle of the northern cavalry that took place at the center of their forces. The Bolton army stretched on a great distance before her. Arya knew they had more men than Ramsay, but she still felt small here. She saw Jon advancing on his own horse between their lines. Ser Davos, the one with an onion as a sigil, stood where Jon stopped. The wildling with a red beard wasn't far away as well. Arya looked at her right, towards the red and blue banners. She couldn't see her granduncle, nor the Imp. She wasn't close enough to see them. However, she noticed another red banner on a hill, farther away on her left. There were a few horses there, and she recognized the small frame on one of them. She wanted to spat on the ground. The Imp didn’t even stay with his men. Her father always said a lord should lead his men into battle. Lord Tyrion remained away, on a hill. She didn’t think the Blackfish was with him. She didn’t see him, and there was no banner of House Tully to be seen at the top.

Arya could see the numerous banners of the flayed men right in front of her, despite the distance. The image, along with the dead bodies burning, sent a chill along her spine. She would never see these banners again after this day, once they had killed all the Boltons and their men. The North remembered, and it remembered what the Boltons did at the Twins. She would remind them the price of betraying her family, and she would remind the Karstarks and the Umbers of the same thing as well. When she was near the Twins, she had spotted banners of House Umber, and she failed to understand how people who suffered at the Red Wedding could help the Boltons. That made them worse traitors than the others.

Everything was silent. No one dared to speak. Last evening, the men had drunk while murmuring between themselves for the most. Some had been noisier, but not many. At least there had been some talking. Now there was only silence. They kept waiting. Lord Cerwyn told them they had to wait before they charged the enemy. Jon would give the order.

The Bolton looked as silent as they were. They could hear ravens cawing. Arya even thought she could hear the flames from the crosses far away. Two small figures detached from the army before them. Arya squinted her eyes, trying to see better who they were. After a moment, she recognized Ramsay. She gripped Needle’s pommel. The monster had a reserved place as her next kill. He held something, but she couldn’t see what it was exactly. The other figure was difficult for her to discern. She kept peering at it, until she finally recognized him.

Her heart stopped. Rickon. He was alive. That was him. He was older, taller, but that was him. Sansa had been wrong. Their brother was alive, and he was right there, on the other side of the battlefield. Arya only wanted to ride to him. When she noticed a dagger in the hand of Ramsay, she froze. Before she could do anything, the blade went down.

No. She waited to see her brother’s dead body fall. No, not Rickon too. Arya gripped Needle even more tightly. To her surprise, Rickon’s body didn’t fall on the ground. She saw Ramsay show something with his arms. Then Rickon started to move forward. Was Ramsay freeing him? Why would he do that? It wasn’t long before she understood.

Rickon began running. A bow and a quiver were brought to Ramsay. Arya took a very quick breath. She had to do something. Jon was already riding to help Rickon. She made her horse move. The other horsemen grunted as she moved through them. Couldn’t they get out of her way? She pushed some of them and managed to escape their tight formation to a space between the ranks. She hit the flanks of her horse and he began to run.

Someone tried to stop her but she didn’t care. She left the army and rode, pushing her mount to the highest speed it could reach, always asking it to run faster. She could feel the muscles of the horse working hard. It was as if she was part of him. The wind blew in her face like it didn’t for a very long time. Jon was before her. Arya was a very good rider, but Jon did very well too. Rickon was running in their direction. She had to get to him. She kept moving forward at the highest speed. Rickon was getting close, very close. Jon wasn’t far from him.

Rickon kept running. He was so close. He tumbled and fell on the ground.
Everyone held his breath as Jon Snow rode to save his brother. It had to be Rickon Stark. Who else could it be? Asher didn't know who was the other rider who followed Ned Stark's son. He bore the arms of the Cerwyns. After he broke the ranks, the smuggler and the other commanders ordered the men to keep their lines. Asher, atop his horse, gave the same order to his own men. Beskha was the only one with a mount aside from him. All the others were on foot, including Bloodsong. Even for Asher, it was strange how a killer like him could turn into the most loyal man after you defeated him in single combat. He wished Amaya was still alive.

When Rickon Stark fell on the ground, pierced by an arrow, the silence that followed was thick as mud. Asher saw Jon Snow stop at his brother's side, then he saw the other rider arrive where they were and dismount. He leaned over the dead boy's body. Even from afar, Asher could imagine how the boy looked, probably like Ethan. He stared straight towards the bastard, Ramsay Snow, holding a bow in front of his army. He had killed his brother, and now he killed someone else's brother.

Asher knew what Jon Snow would do. He would do the same in his stead. He turned to Beskha.

"Are you with me?"

"To the end, Asher."

With that answer, he turned to his men. They were only a hundred, but he would fight Ramsay and his entire army by himself if necessary.

"The one who brings me Ramsay's head will have enough gold to never need to fight again in his life. The one who brings me Ramsay alive so I can kill him myself will have so much gold he won't be able to spend it through his entire life."

His declaration was followed by a general uproar from his men. All around, men were already preparing to charge. Asher unsheathed his sword, the sword that had belonged to his father and to his brother before it went to him. The Boltons and the Whitehills had Forrester blood on their hands, and he would soak his family's sword with Bolton and Whitehill blood. Asher knew what to do. He saw Jon Snow charge the enemy, and the other rider too. He roared and joined the charge.

Asher could hear roars all around him, on his sides and behind, but he didn't care. He would kill Ramsay. He would kill Torrhen. He would kill Ludd. He would kill every Bolton and every Whitehill until none of them was left. He looked at the place where he saw Ramsay for the last time. He wasn't there any longer, but Asher was sure he hid behind his lines. He would gut this coward and feed him with his own balls. He charged straight where the bastard had last been seen. He saw the two riders before them fall, and then a wave of cavalry from the other side charge them. Asher hurried his horse. He would kill them all. If they fought for Ramsay, they were his enemies. If they were his enemies, they would die.

The shock came quickly, and Asher was ready for it. He avoided a spear that a man with a white sun on a black field on his tabard destined to him. Instead, he thrust his sword into the man's heart, knocking him off his horse. He held the pommel firm as the body fell on the floor. The sword went to another man on his left. His horse evaded all attacks and Asher killed all the men who attacked him. He turned left when he saw a Whitehill banner. He killed another horseman on his way, then a second. He rode towards the hill with a star over it. Torrhen was in the vanguard. Asher would kill him. He would end what started years ago.

He felt a wave of wind close to his cheek, and then his mount whinnied. Asher was expelled from its back. Looking around, he noticed a few men and horsemen with arrows in their bodies. Asher looked at where the white hill had been a moment ago, but it wasn't there anymore. A man with the flayed man on his armor ran to him. Asher raised his sword and swung it so hard at his opponent that he lost his. Asher only had to swing his father's sword to his throat to end his miserable life.

Asher hacked, smashed, punched, cut, hit, crushed, killed. The heat of battle was on him, and all he could do was kill. He killed for his father. He killed for his mother. He killed for Ethan. He killed for Rodrik. He killed for Gared. He would kill them all. A volley of arrows hit them and killed several people around him. Asher noticed a Whitehill rider among the victims on the ground. He walked to him.

"Where's Torrhen?" he shouted at the man still barely breathing on the ground.

"Fuck you!"

Without hesitation, Asher ended his torments by plunging his sword through his eye. He went back to the battle and fought everyone he met. Sometimes he wasn't even sure of the side they fought for, and he couldn't care less.

Then he saw him, on a white stallion, his family's sigil on his breastplate. The bastard hadn't been knocked out of his horse yet. Asher would remedy this in no time. He seized a nearby lance that was planted into a dead body and threw it at the heir of Highpoint. The lance plunged into the neck of his horse, and Torrhen Whitehill fell on the ground. Arrows fell all around again and Asher saw a man with the hill on his breastplate fall at his feet, two arrows in his back. He looked around for another enemy and ran at a Karstark who was about to kill a wildling on the ground. He slashed his back before the man could finish his opponent. Asher never thought he would kill a Northerner to save a wildling.

He looked where he last saw Torrhen and saw him fight, along with two or three Whitehill soldiers. "Torrhen!"

Asher yelled in his direction, but Gwyn's brother didn't seem to hear him. He walked heavily towards his enemy, the man who had his own father exile him, who ruined his relationship with Gwyn. He would kill him. He came upon one of the Whitehill men and dealt with him without difficulty. Then he found himself face to face with Torrhen. They looked at each other for a moment. Then they started to spar. Attacks, blocks, counter-attacks, feints succeeded. Asher tried to hack his head with a powerful blow, but the heir to Highpoint blocked it easily. Asher had to step back to avoid the next blow. Torrhen was a much better swordsman than he remembered. He hadn't been able to stand before Asher when they fought years ago, but now he managed and stood his ground. Their swords kept meeting. It was only the two of them and the rest of the battle didn't matter at all.

Again, arrows fell on them. Distracted for a moment, Asher couldn't completely stop his opponent's next blow. He felt a pain in his leg, and Torrhen attacked him. Asher could deflect his blows, but not without losing ground. He was falling back each time Torrhen attacked. His brother-in-law had a huge grin on his face. Then the Whitehill delivered a huge blow from over his head, and the force was so great that Asher fell on one of his knees, the pain in his leg, unbearable.
"Finally, you understand where your place is, Forrester. On your knees!"

Torrhen sent another attack over his head. Asher only used one hand to hold his father's sword and waved his sword to deflect Torrhen's. Once it was done, he threw his fist right in the face of the arrogant man. He thought he heard something break. Then Asher was standing again on his two legs and launched series of blows. Now it was the Whitehill who was falling back, barely able to counter Asher's attacks. He kept hammering and smashing Torrhen with his father's sword until one of his blows was so strong that Torrhen almost fell back. He held his sword only with his left hand, and he was defenseless. Asher rushed forward and cut the hand holding it. A scream tore up the air.

Asher hit the heir to Highpoint with all the force of his left fist and heard something else crack. Torrhen Whitehill was on the ground, screaming and holding the stump of his missing hand. A missing hand cut by House Forrester's great sword. Now was time to end the work.

He raised his sword. "Give my regards to Gryff." Then Asher plunged the sword in the throat of his opponent. He gurgled for a second, and then he was dead. Two sons for two sons. Torrhen and Gryff for Rodrik and Ethan.

Asher looked around him. Piles of bodies were to be seen everywhere. There were almost no horses left. Asher ran to the nearest man he saw with the Bolton sigil and killed him easily. The work wasn't over yet. He kept fighting as long shields with the flayed man on them appeared not far away.

Chapter End Notes

Next two chapters tomorrow : Tyrion and Jon.
Tyrion XXV

TYRION XXV

When Jon Snow rode forward to the enemy's lines, Tyrion cursed. What is he doing? He's going to get himself killed. The cavalry charged first, followed behind by the infantry. Tyrion didn't know for sure who was the other rider who followed Jon Snow closely, but he had a good idea of who it could be, especially if they considered how she knelt next to the small boy. Tyrion double cursed. He just witnessed Sansa's little brother die, and now her sister and her half-brother would get themselves killed as well. That was foolish. They were supposed to let Ramsay attack them, to let him make the first move, to let him reveal his strategy. Instead, they charged him without thinking.

Tyrion was standing on a hill with his personal guards, Bronn, Podrick and Ser Forley Prester. His father always took a position like this one during a battle, to have a perfect overview of the whole battlefield. Tyrion had this advantage here. He saw everything happen, and right now he didn't like what he saw.

First, Bolton's archers drew a flight of arrows that knocked Jon Snow and his sister on the ground. The Bolton cavalry charged, as their own cavalry was approaching. Tyrion saw with relief that both his half-brother-in-law and his sister-in-law had gotten on their feet, but with the Bolton cavalry heading towards them, he didn't give them much chance to live. Sansa would never forgive him. The two cavalries collided somewhere at the point where the Stark siblings were standing and Tyrion lost all sight of them. From where he stood, he could hear the clatter of swords, lances, shields and horses clashing together. It wasn't like the Battle of Blackwater at all. Tyrion had looked from afar as the enemy ships were destroyed by wildfire. He had seen the enemy coming close to the battlements. He had seen the battering ram approaching the Mud Gate and heard the crashing sounds each time it hammered the door. Then he had led himself the sortie outside the walls of King's Landing.

The only time Tyrion ever witnesses two armies crashing together in a field battle, he was on the field. He was among the men who fought. This time, he wasn't. It made it look so unreal, to see everything from afar. He heard the noises of battle, but they were faint. Looking at the battle this way gave the impression that it was no big deal, when it was. People were dying right under his eyes, and this looked so abstract. He wasn't in the heat of battle. The men looked like pieces on a board game.

A huge silhouette came at Tyrion's side. He knew it was the Blackfish immediately. "That's not how we imagined things," he said. He sounded as displeased as Tyrion was.

"No, not at all," Tyrion agreed.

Tyrion noticed after a moment something queer. The archers on the Bolton side were loosing arrows. Tyrion could see men falling at each volley. However, the men who were hit by these projectiles were from both sides in the melee.

"He's shooting arrows on our men and his men at the same time," commented Tyrion.

"Aye. Why is he doing this? He's killing his own men. No general would do something like that."

The Blackfish seemed to think that Ramsay was a fool or a monster, probably both. Tyrion, however, had no difficulty to imagine his father ordering his archers to fire on his own men if this could allow him to win the battle, or cover the retreat of his army. Tyrion remembered a great battle where a general ordered all his catapults and archers to fire on the enemy army while they fought his infantry, when it became obvious at the end of the battle that they had lost. It covered his escape. The general lived, only to be exiled when he came back in his city. He died alone on an isolated island a few years later.

"I doubt Ramsay cares about the men under his command," Tyrion said.

"Still, this is suicidal. He's losing men he cannot lose. That's stupid. I never saw something so stupid in my life."

"If we sent more men, they would be caught in the arrows as well."

"Aye," confirmed the Blackfish. "We can't send more. Better wait they run out of arrows."

So they watched. They watched from afar as about ten thousand men from the Westerlands, the Riverlands, the North and from beyond the Wall fought for the castle of Winterfell and the control of the North. Their men on foot had reached the heart of the fight now, but the number of men who fell was so great that corpses were piling everywhere and it was getting difficult to move on the battlefield. Tyrion looked at their own archers who did nothing near the Wolfswood, and at those of Ramsay who kept shooting. The bastard had kept most of his infantry behind. Tyrion noticed the huge shields and the very long lances. They were far longer than those the horsemen normally used. It was so long that Tyrion doubted someone could hold one of these lances with a single arm. Why didn't Ramsay send them to fight?

"Ramsay is keeping most of his infantry behind," he said.

"But he's sacrificing all of his cavalry. He's going to lose everything if he doesn't have any horse left," retorted Ser Brynden.

Men kept dying and bodies accumulated on the ground. "Ramsay killed Rickon Stark right in front of us."

"That's quite obvious," replied the old knight grimly.

"He baited Jon Snow. He wanted to bring him in the center of the battlefield. It was a trap."

"Of course, it was a trap!" snapped the Blackfish. "A trap to kill Jon Snow, and he fell into it like a bloody fool. He should have retreated after that. Our men wouldn't have charged then."

"It's a trap." Tyrion realized it now. "It's a trap." He repeated it louder than before. He looked at the infantry in the Bolton lines, and all the men dying under the arrows. He turned to the knight. "Ser Brynden, we should send our archers into the battle."

"What?"

"Send them in. Order them to join the fray."

"Are you mad? They will only get killed. They won't accomplish anything."

"Don't you understand? This is a trap. Ramsay set all of this. He killed Rickon Stark right before us to bring Jon Snow far, knowing he would charge the Bolton lines all alone, and that his men would follow him. Then he shot arrows at all of them. He didn't only trap Jon Snow. He trapped the whole army. That's what he's doing. It's a trap. He can't be keeping his infantry behind without reason."

"This bastard is mad. He can't think like that."

"He's mad, yes, but that doesn't mean he's an idiot or stupid like Joffrey. From what I heard, he likes toying with people, to use them, to get them to have certain reactions so he can torture them better afterwards. He's been doing this for years. That's what he's doing here. He thinks he's in control. If we want him to reveal his plans, then we have to make him believe he's entirely under control. Let him believe he has no one else to fight. Let's clear the space before the Wolfswood."

Ser Brynden Tully looked at Tyrion, then on both sides of the battlefield. He looked behind him, to one of his men. "Karal, order Ser Davos to send his archers into the melee." The man spun his horse towards their line of archers and rode down below. "I hope you are right, or else we will lose more men."

About thirty seconds later, the archers before the Wolfswood dropped their bows and charged, swords in hand. There was no one left before the Wolfswood. Tyrion watched how Ramsay's army would react. Not long after the northern archers ran into battle, the Bolton infantry moved forward. The huge amount of bodies at the center of the battlefield had almost turned into a hill. Tyrion didn't want to know what a hell it would be to fight into this, and he didn't want to risk his nose a second time. He almost lost it the last time. Going into wars, fighting soldiers, you're terrible at this. Shae had been right on this point.

Tyrion looked very carefully at the movements of the enemy. The fighting kept going on in the middle of the field as reinforcements arrived from both sides. Ser Davos's archers joined the fight, but the Bolton infantry didn't. They formed two columns that got around the heart of the battle. Tyrion noticed again the length of the spears at this moment.

"Ser Brynden, these are not common infantry. It's a phalanx," stated Tyrion.

"What? A phalanx?"

Tyrion got his confirmation not long afterwards. Ramsay's men who carried the shields had formed a full circle around their men and lowered their spears. Tyrion remembered something he once, about a battle that took place thousands of years ago between the Ghiscari Republic, before it became an empire, and another powerful nation that were their main rivals for centuries. As long as the Ghiscaris could keep an unbroken front, to turn first in one direction and then in another to meet the assaults of the enemy, they held out; but the outer files of the circle continually falling, and the circle becoming more and more contracted, they at last were all killed on the field.

"You were right. The bastard had a plan. It was a trap. I must go to my men." The Blackfish rode away without another word.

"Bronn, go to Daven. Don’t get yourself killed, my friend."

"As you command," his friend said with his usual smirk as he obeyed the order.

"Ser Forley, prepare your men."

"Yes, my lord."

The knight left their group as well. They all knew what they had to do. Tyrion had to admit Ramsay Bolton had come up with quite a good plan, only he didn't know what he was up against. During their approach to Winterfell, they made sure no scout approached their camps, especially those left behind. Ser Brynden and the crannogmen were very good at keeping the Bolton scouts away. They tightened the space in their camps that could be seen from Winterfell, and they positioned their army before a forest. As a wise man once said, information is power. They gave the wrong information to Ramsay. I have six thousand. I know you have more, but not that much. Most of your men must have died of the cold and disease. Ramsay didn't know how many they were.

The first blow resonated. A second followed. Tyrion looked at Podrick who blew in his own horn. Tyrion looked as the two columns of cavalry emerged from the Wolfswood. They had been stationed there, hidden by the trees, after they came from a camp more in the south, far from Ramsay's eyes. This charge of cavalry was huge, nothing like those who fought before. The might of the Riverlands and the Westerlands, along with the few horsemen the Hightowers brought with them, charged together. The red knights that Bronn and Daven led attacked the left wing of the Boltons while the Blackfish charged the right wing.

At the same time, the Lannister and Tully infantries emerged from the woods as well. They had been hidden there too and advanced towards the enemy, although it wasn't very useful in the end. As soon as the horsemen hit the wall of Bolton men, the phalanx broke off. Ramsay had completely discarded the possibility that there were other men behind. Once a phalanx was engaged in combat, it could hardly turn around. That was the weakness of the formation, and why it had long ceased to be used in Westeros. The Boltons were in disarray. Now was the time.

"Pod, blow the horn."

His squire did so again. From Tyrion's left, two thousand men in crimson armor emerged from behind the hill they hid behind. Tyrion had kept them under Prester's orders for a very specific task. He turned to look at the place where the bastard stood.

"Now, what are you going to do, bastard?" Tyrion asked with a grin.

Without surprise, Tyrion watched Ramsay Bolton run away from the battlefield. He wouldn't escape. He had nowhere to go now.
Jon VII

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

JON VII

Jon didn't stop to fight for a single second. All the while, he looked all around for Arya, but she was nowhere to be seen. Both their horses had fallen to the enemy's arrows and they were saved by their horsemen who collided with the Bolton cavalry right before they got to them. Jon had lost sight of his sister after that. All he could do was fight now.

His arms were aching from all the swings of sword he made. Men with the sigils of the Umbers, the Karstarks and the Boltons came from the mountain of bodies and Jon kept cutting through them, one after one. He knew the phalanx was pressing them. What were Tyrion and the Blackfish doing? He heard three blows of horn behind him. Jon couldn't turn around and look from where it came. He knew it had to come from their side. Help was finally on its way. He kept fighting, killing everyone who presented himself before him.

Then Jon found himself before Jon Umber. He remembered the arrow who killed Rickon. This man hadn't killed Rickon, but he gave him to Ramsay, the man who killed him. Jon prepared to fight against this man, and their swords clashed. Jon was exhausted. He heard the tales about the Greatjon, and it seemed his son was just like his father, without the honor. His attacks were stronger than Jon's. The Lord of the Last Hearth, who had been the staunchest supporter of his brother, now forced him to pull back. Jon parried all his blows, but he couldn't reach the man. They were at the same level of sword's skill.

At one moment, they found themselves chest against chest, their swords tangled only an inch from their faces, and then they both had the idea. They spit in the other's face. The Smalljon pushed him on the ground and threw his sword down on Jon, attempting to strike the final blow, but Jon stopped it with his own sword. He still had Longclaw in hand. Jon Umber brought his sword down a second, then third time. When he tried a fourth time, a blade ripped through his heart. For the second time today, Jon owed his life to Tormund. His friend helped him to stand up. When Jon looked around him, he saw the Boltons didn't encircle them anymore. Their enemies were the ones to be surrounded, the wildlings and the Northerners on one side, the cavalry with the lion and the trout sigils on the other. The shields with the flayed man were falling everywhere, the men holding them slaughtered by the knights of the Riverlands and the Westerlands. Jon never thought he would be so happy to see Lannisters in the North.

"Too bad they didn't arrive sooner," Tormund said.

Jon agreed, but now wasn't the time. He had to find Arya. He decided to climb the pile of bodies. From there, he could have a better view of the whole battlefield and would have more chance to see his sister, and could know better what was the situation of their enemy. He ignored the screams of the dying men under his feet as he walked on them. The battle wasn't over yet. They would take care of them once this was over. At the top of this small hill of human beings, Jon could have a better measure of the disarray in which the Bolton army was. Their lines were entirely torn down. There was no more organization to their ranks. Not only the horsemen were killing them, but the rest of the infantry that was hidden in the Wolfiswood before the battle began was coming to shut any last issue the Boltons and their allies might have. They were defeated. Arya was still nowhere to be seen. Jon didn't think he would find her in this sea of men who were almost all taller than her. He feared she might have been crushed by the others.
He looked towards the place where the Bolton lines had been standing before the battle began. There was nothing left. Only the crosses with bodies still burning remained there, but they meant nothing now. Jon saw a contingent of men in crimson armor running before him. He recognized one of the men on horse who followed them on the side. Jon came down from the pile of human corpses and ran to the knight.

"Ser Forley! Ser Forley!"

He caught the attention of the knight who served the Lannisters. Ser Forley Prester didn't seem to recognize him first, but then his facial expression changed. "Jon Snow"

"What are you doing?"

"I have orders from Lord Tyrion. We must take Winterfell now."

"How many men do you have?"

"Two thousand. The others are there to make sure no Bolton man escapes." He pointed with his sword towards the battle still raging behind.

"It's not enough. They will still have men inside."

"We have ladders to take the battlements and rams to breach through the gate. They'll be taken by surprise."

"Rams?" Jon hadn't realized Tormund followed him. "Who said we needed rams?"

Tormund turned behind him, and Jon followed his gaze. Wun Wun was there, several arrows into his body. Jon knew immediately what his friend meant. The giant could open the gates by himself. He remembered how Mag got through under the Wall. The king of the giants had also died from this feat. Wun Wun was greatly injured. Jon could see the many open wounds he had.

"Wun Wun. You don't have to do this."

The giant looked at him. "Jon Snow."

Then he ran towards Winterfell. Jon couldn't hope to stop him. He turned to Ser Forley again. "Tell your men to leave the gate to Wun Wun. Occupy the garrison by attacking the battlements."

"Very well." The knight nodded and rode forward to warn his men.

Jon looked behind him when he heard cries. Wildlings, mountain clansmen and Northerners were racing towards Winterfell as well. Tormund stared at him and smiled.

"Looks like the day isn't over," the wildling said.

Jon looked forward and saw his home standing not far away. It was so close. Only a few men stood between him and the place where he grew up. He took a deep breath and raced towards Winterfell.

When he arrived close to the battlements, the Lannisters had already engaged what was left of the Boltons forces. Their archers were firing arrows at them, protected by men who held shields before them. Wun Wun was already hammering the gates. The archers on the battlements tried to kill him by shooting bolts and arrows at him, but they were themselves harassed by the Lannister archers and the men who started to climb the battlements with the ladders they leaned against the walls. They couldn't stop the giant.
Jon stopped his men who charged the gate. They had to wait until it was breached. The Lannister soldiers were doing an excellent work. They were very well trained and organized, and fresh, untired by battle, unlike Jon’s men. The Bolton defense was quite weak. Jon wondered if they even had three hundred men inside. Perhaps Ramsay had been overconfident. They made him believe they were far less numerous than they actually were. Ramsay underestimated them, and now he was paying the price. Jon looked at Wun Wun. He had too many projectiles dug into him. He should have let the Lannisters take care of the gate. They were obviously prepared for this.

Wun Wun roared and pushed heavily the gate that slammed open and ran inside. Jon raised his sword, seeing the pommel with the direwolf’s head for a moment.

"FOR THE NORTH!"

Roars followed as they charged the gate, just like the Lannister men did. When he got inside, everything was chaos. Many Lannisters had gone through the gates first. Their archers, along with the wildlings, shot arrows at every Bolton in sight. A man with a Mormont shield plunged his sword inside the heart of a Bolton. Another in crimson armor almost cut the head of another in two. Lannister infantry men were climbing over the battlements and killing every man they found. A wildling struck another man to death with his fists. A Dustin and a Ryswell cornered another soldier with the flayed man and killed him. The battle was almost over when Jon arrived in the courtyard.

He and Tormund looked at the giant. Wun Wun was heavily injured and breathed heavily. He looked back at Jon. As he tried to place his hand on the huge shoulder of the giant, an arrow flew and dug into his eye. The last of the giant fell on the ground as another arrow pierced his other eye. He had died to free a castle that belonged to people who fought his for thousands of years. Jon looked to where the arrows came from and found Ramsay with a girl standing next to him, bows bent in their hands.

"I heard you believe in fair fights, don't you?" said Ramsay. "I believe in them too. What say you? My lover and I, against your wildling lover right here and you. What do you think of it, Myranda?"

He had looked to Tormund while he spoke of Jon’s lover. The girl next to him raised her bow with a huge smile. "I say it's a wonderful idea."

This man had killed his brother. Jon was about to seize a shield on the ground to stop their arrows when he heard a scream. The girl Ramsay called Myranda fell, an arrow piercing her eye. Ramsay was looking at her, his face showing utter surprise, and even horror.

"Myranda?"

Before he could do anything else, an arrow appeared in his balls. A scream escaped his throat as well as his body dropped on the ground. Jon looked at where the arrows seemed to come from and saw a man with Cerwyn arms on his breastplate, with a bow, but without arrows. Jon knew who it was before she removed her helmet. She walked straight to Ramsay and shoved Jon aside on her way. Ramsay kept crying on the ground. Arya unsheathed a sword from under her jerkin. Needle, the one Jon gave her yesterday to replace the first one she lost.

"Find it funny now, to have an arrow in you?"

His sister didn't wait for a reply and plunged her sword through Ramsay's leg. Another horrible cry escaped from the throat of the monster who killed Rickon, and Arya did the same with the other leg.

"You said you would spoon my brother's eyes out. Very well."
With a swift move, Arya pricked an eye with her sword, then did the same with the other one. Then raised her sword high and plunged it into the body. She repeated the same movement again, and again, and again.

"YOU KILLED RICKON! YOU KILLED RICKON, YOU MONSTER!"

All the while, Ramsay kept screaming as Arya yelled the words over and over again. She said it one last time and plunged Needle right into Ramsay's face. She didn't take it back. It stood straight, dug into the ground. Ramsay was dead.

Jon did nothing as she poked the man full of holes. When she looked back at him, she was limping from her right leg, but the look on her face was savage like Jon never saw it. Everyone was silent in the courtyard before the savagery of Ramsay's death. Until the voice of Tyrion Lannister broke it.

"I suppose the battle is over. We have won."

Chapter End Notes

I must admit that I wish I had made the battle different, but since I try to follow the show and to make the characters behave like they would have, the Battle of Bastards mostly went the same way. Ramsay used Rickon's death as a bait to provoke Jon and tried the same trick than in the series, and Jon took the bait, along with Arya this time.

Still, there were a few changes. The Knights of the Vale didn't show up. They are still on their way to Winterfell. Also, the vanguard itself, with most of the Northerners, the Freys and the wildlings, was larger than the whole army Jon had under his command in the show. Despite this, Ramsay tried to surround his enemies like he did in canon.

We have to understand that Ramsay underestimated his enemy. In the Roose chapters, when the Lannisters besieged Moat Cailin, the garrison of Moat Cailin couldn't tell how many men they brought, since their camp was too extended along the Kingsroad to make a good count. they couldn't see it all. That, and the fact that Tyrion, Brynden, Jon and Davos squeezed their camps, stopped all Ramsay's scouts, and placed a part of the army away in other camps hidden by the Wolfswood, led Ramsay to believe that they only had barely more men than he did. Only, the bulk of the army, both the cavalry and infantry, were hidden behind the vanguard, in the Wolfswood, and waited for Ramsay to engage all his troops to attack.

The citation Tyrion remembers is an actual excerpt from the Histories of Polybius, who is the best source about the Battle of Cannae that took place in 216 B.C., and where the Carthaginians led by Hannibal defeated a great Roman army and almost caused the fall of the Roman Empire. The showrunners did take a lot of inspiration from this battle for the Battle of Bastards, so it seemed appropriate that I include it. As for the general Tyrion is thinking about who ordered to shot on his own men to cover his retreat, this is an adaptation to a medieval context of the decision of Emperor Napoleon at the end of the Battle of Waterloo, when he decided to make his artillery fire on the English lines, as some of his own men were still fighting them, to prevent the enemy from chasing him. The last decision he took on a battlefield was to bombard his own men. The weaknesses Tyrion mentions about the phalanx are real weaknesses this formation had at the end of Antiquity.
When I wrote this version of the Battle of Bastards, I wanted to keep in line with my goal to remain realistic and to imagine the effects of a single change on the whole story. I decided that Ramsay would most likely try the same trick than in the show, and there was no reason for Jon to not react the same way. This time, however, since Arya was present, she would run to help her brother as well and would be part of the fight. I had her chapter to explain the initial position of all the forces in presence and to show Rickon's death from his sister's POV, to know what it was to see your little brother die. Then I switched to Asher, to see the chaos following two armies charging each other, and I included his duel with Torrhen, like it was announced during the parley.

After these two chapters from people on the battlefield, I made a Tyrion chapter, to have a view of the battle as a whole, to have the vision of the strategist instead of the soldier. Then finally I had Jon for the final chapter, the liberation of Winterfell and the death of Ramsay, which was more appropriate to see from someone who actually fought, and because we want to see a part of the battle from Jon's perspective.

Now, there are certain things about this battle that I am less comfortable with. First, because I tried to remain true to the characters and the reactions I thought they would have, it mostly happened the same way, only the Lannister and Tully cavalry replaced the Knights of the Vale, and it was Arya who killed Ramsay here. I even let Wun Wun die again. But I think the main weakness of this battle is that Tyrion and Brynden were able to hide maybe twenty thousand men in the Wolfswood. The charge of cavalry almost seems as unrealistic as the one at the beginning of the movie Gladiator, though it is more likely since in Gladiator, the cavalry charged through a forest and fought inside of it, while here it was only hidden and fought in open field, which is where cavalries were used at the time.

I hope you liked the battle all the same. In fact, what might be much more interesting will be to see the aftermath of the battle. Just to give you a clue, remember that most of the vanguard was made of Northerners and that both Lannisters and Tullys only joined the battle at the end. The consequences of this battle will be important, and quite different from the show.

Please review

Next chapter : Tyrion (Sansa's chapter is right after that)
Chapter Notes

A few hours after the battle. Tyrion must face the consequences of victory. The next chapters in Winterfell will be mostly about politics, with people from four different kingdoms present. The future of the North will be decided soon.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

TYRION XXVI

My dear Sansa,

We have taken Winterfell. Ramsay Bolton is dead. Jon and Arya are alive and well. We summoned all the lords in the North to meet here. We'll need you to be there as well, so they may acknowledge you. Come as soon as you can, but don't push yourself too hard if you're still recovering. Be careful.

I'm sorry to tell you this, but we found out that your brother Rickon really was in Winterfell after all. Ramsay didn't lie about this. He killed him before the battle. I'm so sorry, Sansa.

I love you.

Tyrion

Tyrion read the small scroll again. He had made several attempts to write it the best way possible. How to tell Sansa that her little brother died and that they could do nothing to save him? He didn't have enough space to tell the whole story. Finally, he settled for this message. He would explain her everything when she would arrive. He didn't look forward to it. How could he explain to Sansa that her brother died because of him? He had made Ramsay angry at the parley. What if that brought the bastard to kill Rickon? Tyrion remembered the small boy he saw at Winterfell. How old could he have been at the time? Five? Six?

Tyrion had been almost sure that Sansa's brother was dead. Everyone said he and Bran were burned by the Ironmen, and there was nothing to deny it. The Boltons lied about having Arya Stark, so why wouldn't they lie about her little brother as well? When he had seen the direwolf's head, Tyrion had some doubts, but after all Ramsay Bolton had been the one to besiege Winterfell after the Ironmen took it. He may have found the direwolves then and killed them, or maybe Theon Greyjoy had done it and Ramsay just retrieved chopped heads. Tyrion had almost dismissed the possibility that Rickon Stark could really be in the hands of the bastard. Maybe he hadn't wanted to believe it. Maybe he had wanted Winterfell for him and Sansa, and for their children.

Tyrion didn't know how to ask about their child. Had Sansa delivered now? He was afraid to ask her about it. He was afraid of many things. What if the child was a dwarf, like him? What if the child had died? What if Sansa had died? His mother died when he was born. Did he condemn Sansa to the same fate? Now, faced with the inevitable birth of his first child, all the worries he put aside before came to the surface. He didn't have Sansa's home to take back like before. He didn't have to worry about that anymore, so his mind was filled with repressed worries for his wife. His sweet, young, beautiful Sansa, the only woman who he could be sure who ever loved him. He couldn't support to lose her.
He tried to calm himself. He couldn't assume that something had gone wrong when they still had no news. He needed to wait for the reply. In the meantime, there was still work to do. He had prepared a message for all the northern lords, convoking them to Winterfell to swear their fealty to Sansa, but also to order them to bring to their attention any information about any movement of Brandon Stark. If Rickon Stark had survived, the odds that his older brother survived the Greyjoys were quite high. Tyrion wouldn't lose another brother of Sansa. He would have the messages signed by Jon Snow and Ser Brynden. If it was only signed by him, the northern lords would believe he was only looking after Brandon Stark to kill him. Perhaps he shouldn't sign the messages at all, but he didn't want to be left aside like he always was.

Tyrion's chambers were comfortable enough, but they were stark and cold when compared to the ones he had in King's Landing or Casterly Rock. If only Sansa had been there… He missed her more than ever. If the Manderlys had dared to touch her… Tyrion wiped these thoughts away. He hadn't taken his rooms into Ned Stark's former chambers. He didn't want to attract more criticism from the Northerners and the river lords. He would wait for Sansa to arrive, and then he would move in with her. Until then, he would reside in the guests' quarters of the keep. He had to make sure the people wouldn't see him as if he ruled the North. They didn't trust the Imp, even less now that they weren't united like before by their hatred of Ramsay Bolton. Curiously, this remembered him of his time in King's Landing, as Joffrey's Hand, when people blamed him for the ills of the city. Sometimes Tyrion wondered what was the use of trying to save people when all you got from them in return were insults and blame for the crimes of others. He thought about Jaime and the Mad King.

Podrick came inside his solar at this moment. "My lord, Jon Snow would like to speak with you."

Tyrion nodded and Pod stepped away to let Tyrion's half-brother-in-law walk in. His clothes were still all muddy and dusty from the battle that ended hours ago. Tyrion had barely been able to recognize him at the end of the battle with all the soil on his face. He had washed the said face, but his clothes still bore every mark of the hell through which he had just gone. Tyrion didn’t take part to the battle like him, so he was in a much better shape.

Jon Snow's face was hard. Tyrion supposed this had to be expected. He had every right to be angry. A battle you won at the cost of thousands of your men was quite a bitter victory. A pyrrhic victory, some called it, from the name of a long dead king in Essos. Tyrion himself didn't feel quite proud about their success right now.

"Have you found your brother's body?" Tyrion asked.

"Aye. I had him buried in the crypt."

"I'll go and pay him my respects when it's done. What about your sister?"

"She's all right. The maester says the cut in her leg is superficial. She risks nothing."

Tyrion sighed in relief. He wouldn't have to inform Sansa about any other death among her siblings.

"If he was alive, we can consider it very likely that Bran is alive somewhere."

Tyrion still remembered how the boy looked happy the day he told him he could ride again. If there was a chance to save him, to save another brother of Sansa, he had to try.

"Maybe." Jon Snow's voice sounded hollow.

"Where do you think he may have gone?"
The bastard didn't answer. He looked at Tyrion. "How many men have you lost?"

"About one hundred and fifty."

That was the number Daven gave him not long ago about their losses. Most of them were horsemen they lost in the initial charge of the battle. The rest were a few knights they lost when they took the phalanx of the enemy from the back and what little men died when they assaulted the castle.

"Do you know how many men I lost?" the lad asked.

Tyrion pursed his lips. He wasn't eager to let the number drop. Daven had told him about the losses of everyone. The river lords had lost about a hundred men, which made them those who endured the less casualties, though their men were fewer than those under the Lannister banners. However, that was when they didn't consider the Freys. Of their four thousand men, half were dead, among them Ser Perwyn Frey. Like Daven said, a decent Frey was dead, and everyone knew how rare they were. The wildlings and the Northerners had deeply bled as well. Of the mountain clans and the wildlings, about half of them were dead too. For the northern lords who had their cavalry in the vanguard, they lost it all. The commander of the Manderly forces, Ser Jocelyn Waterfell, was among the victims. Overall, they lost a little more than six thousand men in this battle, and the majority of them were from the North. The opposite army had been entirely slaughtered. No Umber, no Karstark, no Bolton had escaped the battle, or they thought at first. They hadn't yet found the body of Harald Karstark. Within a single battle, over ten thousand men of the North were dead. And of course, there was Rickon Stark. Tyrion knew he would be little loved for this.

"Thousands," he finally replied to Sansa's brother.

Jon Snow walked forward, a look between threat and sadness on his face. "You saw us. You knew that the Boltons were killing us all. You could see it."

"I did," Tyrion confessed.

"And yet you did nothing? You just stood there on your hill and watched us being slaughtered. Why?"

"We came to your rescue. We sent the whole cavalry when you were surrounded."

"Only then? Couldn't you send them before?"

"For what?" Jon and Tyrion turned their heads to look at the Blackfish who stood in the entrance of the room. "To get killed by the arrows Ramsay's men were firing? To reveal our positions and our plans to that bastard?"

"Thousands of good men died while you waited."

"And more would have died if we hadn't waited. You blame us for the men who died today? Listen to me carefully, bastard." A great emphasis was put on the last word. "These men would never have got caught in Ramsay's trap if you hadn't taken the bait. He killed your brother right under your eyes in the hope you would charge him without thinking and that your men would follow you, and you did exactly what he hoped you would do. If you had come back to your men, instead of trying to take Ramsay on your own, these men wouldn't have died in that trap."

"I was in the command of the whole army," Ser Brynden resumed. "I didn't come to your rescue either. Why? Because if I had sent more men to you, they would have gotten caught in the same trap than you, they would have died, and maybe we wouldn't have been able to break the phalanx. So don't blame anyone else when you're the only one to blame, bastard. You acted like a boy today, not like the Lord Commander of the Night's Watch."

It was strange for Tyrion to hear Brynden Tully give a lesson in military strategies to Jon Snow, and even stranger to see the Blackfish take his defense, but he knew the Blackfish had little love for Jon Snow. The knight and the bastard stared at each other for a very long time. Ser Brynden's eyes were as hard as Jon Snow's when he had come to see Tyrion. He supposed Jon Snow's face wasn't much different. The bastard of Winterfell walked out without a word or a glance to Tyrion. The door slammed behind him.

"Thank you," Tyrion said.

Ser Brynden Tully scoffed. "The boy may have been Lord Commander of the Night's Watch, but he has much to learn about leading men. The boy has courage, but he has no brain."

Tyrion wouldn't have gone that far. Jon Snow wasn't a fool and wasn't without experience in strategy or command. He had only been a man who saw his youngest brother die right in front of him. Tyrion thought it was probably Catelyn Stark's uncle who spoke here, from his distaste for the son his niece's husband had with another woman. Tyrion didn't tell to Sansa's granduncle who in his own family would have done exactly the same if he had been the one running.

"Still, he was right about one thing. We stood behind while the Northerners were being killed."

"We all stood behind," said Ser Brynden. "Not just you. I did the same, and it was the right thing to do. If we had sent more men in that battle, before Ramsay sent his infantry, more would have died. It was impossible to fight a ranged battle in that pile of bodies. We would have needed to get around it to attack Ramsay's infantry, on a disadvantageous ground, and with divided forces. We did well to wait, or else this phalanx could have attacked us on the front."

"You don't understand, Ser Brynden. The Northerners bled, fighting each other, and we watched it. Aside from the Freys, the Riverlands and the Westerlands lost less than five hundred men today. Ten thousand Northerners died in that battle if we include those who fought for the Boltons and the wildlings. How do you think the North feels about us right now?"

The Blackfish sighed heavily. "I think I have a pretty good idea."

"They probably believe we used them as arrow fodder, or that we tried to let them slaughter each other until only a few were left."

"Aye. Strange, considering it was Ramsay who used his men as arrow fodder. He shot on them while they fought our men."

"Ramsay is dead. They can no longer blame him. They will look for someone alive to blame, or several someones alive to blame. We are going to be on their list."

"I know." The knight blew some air. "Gods, I hate politics. If they hadn't planned to turn on us in the middle of battle, too. We wouldn't have placed the bulk of the North in the vanguard."

"Too late to be sorry about that."

"Well, you have my support, no matter what happens. We have to make sure Sansa can be proclaimed Lady of Winterfell and Wardeness of the North. We must obtain the surrender of Karhold, the Dreadfort and the Last Hearth, and of their bannermen of course. We must make sure the lords who didn't side with us accept Sansa as their lady."

"A good thing we have many men then. Or it might be a bad thing. They could see us as invaders, “Well, we’ll have to make them understand we are on their side. Let’s summon everyone at Winterfell first, so Sansa can be acknowledged, or else that damn decree of your nephew won’t have any value.”

“We must also search for Brandon Stark.”

The knight nodded. “True. We must.”

“I’ll need you to sign the ravens we will send. I don’t believe they will trust a message if it only comes from me.”

Ser Brynden chuckled without humor. “Probably not. Call for me when it’s ready. I’ll see to my men.”

Tyrion found himself alone again. He looked at the message that was destined to Sansa. He decided to bring it to the maester’s turret right now. Wolkan, the maester in service here at Winterfell, hadn’t looked like he regretted his previous master. He had helped to heal the wounded as soon as he was asked. Anyway, it wouldn’t be in his interest to not serve the new occupants. From what Tyrion had seen, the staff that the Boltons employed hadn’t been reluctant to serve the enemies of Ramsay Bolton. Tyrion couldn’t imagine how someone would be pleased to serve Roose Bolton’s bastard.

Podrick and four guards accompanied him. Tyrion wouldn’t take any chance. Wolkan wasn’t in the turret. Tyrion supposed he was still helping with all the people who were injured. He went to the rookery himself and attached the message to a raven for White Harbor. The sooner it would reach Sansa the better.

Tyrion then went to the courtyard. They had already removed all the bodies, but many wounded men were scattered along the walls. The banners of House Stark were already hung on the walls. Maybe that was only his imagination, but Tyrion thought the wildlings and the Northerners looked at him with more hatred than usual. He saw Bronn walking towards him and stopped. Tyrion was glad that his old friend had survived the battle, though it wasn’t a surprise since Bronn hadn’t been part of the vanguard. He had been with Daven and the Lannister cavalry when they charged the phalanx.

“Anything to report?” Tyrion asked him.

“We found an entire yard with skinned bodies. Looks like the shit decided to flay one of his bannermen along with all his men the night before the battle, as a warning for the others.”

Brons looked like he was about to spew his breakfast or whatever it was he took before or after the battle. Even him couldn’t take in Ramsay’s atrocities.

“How many?”

“Two hundred, probably.” Two hundred men skinned alive. Tyrion wondered if some were on the crosses in the battlefield. “And something else. We questioned the men who survived the battle and the servants. They said there was a girl who Ramsay married. They barely saw her. She was locked in her room all the time and they only had a glance at her during the wedding. They say Ramsay skinned her too last night. They all believed it was Arya Stark.”

Tyrion looked at his friend. “So Ramsay really had someone he wed, and he believed she was Arya Stark?”

“Aye. She was brought here months ago, by a man with an escort from the Vale.” Littlefinger. So the snake brought the Boltons another girl after the real Arya Stark escaped. "They didn't see her a lot, so they couldn't recognize her, but they heard her weep and scream every night, when the bastard visited her." Bronn had a sorry look on his face. "Let's not feel guilty about that. From what I can tell, she suffered much more before he flayed her. Maybe it was a mercy he finally ended her sufferings."

Tyrion tried to not feel guilty, like his friend advised, but he couldn't help it. They had revealed during the parley that the real Arya Stark was with them, hoping this could bring some of Ramsay's allies to desert, but instead they got two hundred flayed men, and the death of an innocent girl along with Rickon Stark's. No matter what Tyrion did, people got hurt. He thought about how Ros paid the price for his actions against Cersei and for his attempt to be generous with her.

"The bodies?" Tyrion asked, trying to shake these memories out of him.

"Buried, for the most. Those left will follow soon."

Tyrion took a deep breath. It was cold out there, and light was beginning to fade. "Care for a drink, my friend, like in the old times? Podrick, will you join us?"

"If you want, my lord," the squire replied shyly.

"Then it's settled," said the sellsword. "Though I'd need a woman too."

Bronn was looking up. Tyrion followed his gaze to the battlements and saw who he was looking at. "I wouldn't try if I were you, my friend."

Bronn made a face as he looked at the red priestess. "You're probably right. Too much red hair. It's more your style."

Tyrion sighed. "I'm a married man, Bronn, and I'll have a child soon if he's not already there."

"And? I'm married, I have a child. That doesn't stop from having a girl when I need one."

Tyrion was startled. "You have a child?"

"Aye. Daisy was pregnant when we left."

"You never told me."

Bronn shrugged. "Never thought it was necessary to say. So, about the drink."

Before they could walk to his solar, Tyrion's attention was caught by a commotion near the kennels. Tyrion remembered this place from his last visit in Winterfell. Some of his men were dragging someone outside. Tyrion blinked when the man was thrown on the ground. He walked forward to see what it was about. One of his captains stood as he approached.

"My lord, we found the bastard's dogs in the kennels. What do you want us to do with them?"

The famous dogs that Ramsay used to hunt down girls in the woods. "Kill them all. I don't want anything left to remind us that Ramsay Bolton was once the master of Winterfell," Tyrion said, not without disgust.

"Don't do it." The man they dragged from the kennels spoke with a quivering voice. "Don't do it. He's going to hurt you if you kill his dogs. It will get worse."

Tyrion heard this voice before. He approached the man who was crouched on the ground, his messy long hair falling before his face, making it impossible to discern it. He stank worse than horseshit.

"What by the Seven Hells is that?" asked Bronn, clearly referring to the man on his hands and knees before them. Tyrion noticed one of his hands only had two fingers, and the other one had three.

"We found him in the kennels. We couldn't get much from him. He kept saying the same thing all the time," answered the captain.

Tyrion was sure he had seen him before. He took him by the chin and forced him to look at him. He didn't expect that.

"Theon Greyjoy."

Immediately, Eddard Stark's former squire backed down. "My name is Reek. My name is Reek. My name is Reek," he repeated frantically.

"That's all he's been able to say since we found him."

Tyrion barely gave any attention to the captain. Theon Greyjoy was believed to be dead. First Arya Stark, then Rickon Stark, and now Theon Greyjoy. Tyrion looked at his fingers again. Ramsay had taken Winterfell. It seemed that instead of killing the heir to the Iron Islands, he decided to make him his toy. Tyrion would almost pity the man if he hadn't betrayed his wife's family and burned her brothers… or pretended to burn them. He never liked the Greyjoys, and he liked this one even less.

"Captain, bring him to a cell. We'll interrogate him later."

His men obeyed Tyrion's orders. He wanted to rest. He would take care of that new element tomorrow. He walked to his solar with Pod, Bronn and his other guards. They spent the evening drinking, until Bronn left them to find himself a woman. Tyrion was tempted to follow him. He longed for Sansa's presence. Pod left not long later, Tyrion advising him to find himself a girl too.

As usual, Tyrion could barely sleep. When he did, it was only to dream about Sansa, and he dreamed she was dying in her bed, giving birth to a twisted little creature. After the third time he woke up, Tyrion pushed aside the furs with a grunt. He went to the library, only to find out the place where he read the last time he was in Winterfell had been burnt years ago. He found the new place where the books were kept, and brought some with him back to his rooms. He tried to forget about his nightmares. He only half succeeded. Then the sun rose, he laid back the book he was reading on the table and went to look after Jon Snow and Ser Brynden Tully. They had to get to work. He ran into a wildling who couldn't tell him where the Blackfish was, but who pointed the Great Hall when Tyrion asked about Jon Snow.

When he reached the hall where everything began years ago, Tyrion was surprised to see Jon Snow with Melisandre of Asshai.

"When we had feasts, our family would sit up here, and I'd sit down there." He pointed the end of the hall. He couldn't see Tyrion, not yet. He hadn't walked in the hall yet.

"Could have been worse, Jon Snow. You had a family. You had feasts."

"For once, I agree with the lady." Tyrion made his presence known and came in.

"Hi, my friend." That was much better than what Tyrion feared after yesterday.

He looked around. "Four years ago, we were all here, feasting together. The king, my sister, my brother, my nephews and my niece, your father, your uncle, your brothers and your sisters. Now we're back, and look at what's left of it. How many of them died?"

He thought about Myrcella, about the king who Cersei had killed, about Eddard Stark and his wife. He remembered seeing Arya throwing food at Sansa. He remembered the discussion he had with Jon Snow at the time.

You're Tyrion Lannister, the queen's brother?

My greatest accomplishment. And you, you're Ned Stark's bastard, aren't you?

And now? Tyrion's father was dead, and the little girl who was supposed to marry Joffrey at the time was his wife. Jon Snow had become Lord Commander of the Night's Watch, and he had a girl for a time according to that Tormund Giantsbane. He would have to ask about her later.

"Aye. Many things have changed. If someone had told me at the time that you would marry Sansa one day..." Jon said, chuckling.

"I suppose you would have had a good laugh at your sister's expense, you and Arya."

"Aye." The atmosphere turned sour again. "We should never have left."

Tyrion wasn't sure what to think about it. True, if they hadn't left, Sansa may never have lost her father, or her mother, or her brothers, but Tyrion would never have met her either. She was only thirteen when he first came to Winterfell, a little girl on the cusp of maidenhood. He barely noticed her at the time, and he was sure Sansa had barely cast a glance toward him. Who could blame her? Why would a pretty little girl like her, who loved knights, dresses and flowers, look at the ugly dwarf when she was supposed to marry the handsome prince?

Tyrion tried to find something else to talk about. He turned to the red priestess. "I suppose you never came to Winterfell before, my lady."

"No. I saw it in my visions, but I never set foot in it."

She looked at Tyrion, the same way she looked at him two nights ago. Tyrion found himself wondering how she looked like without her clothes for a moment. Gods, Sansa was away for two months and he only needed another red head to feel his breeches tighten. Damn you, Bronn. I never paid you to put evil notions in my head.

"I can feel the power in this place," she added, still looking at Tyrion, then turning her face to Jon Snow.

Before Tyrion could ask what she meant, he heard footsteps behind him. Tyrion turned in time to see Ser Davos Seaworth enter the hall. He threw something to the Red Woman, like some called her, and she caught it. When Tyrion looked at what it was, he realized it was a small figurine in the shape of a stag or a unicorn.

"What is that?" Jon Snow asked the question before Tyrion could.

Tyrion looked at the Onion Knight. Ser Davos was staring at Melisandre, anger plain on his face. "Tell them. Tell them who it belonged to."

Tyrion looked back at the priestess. She was looking at the floor, turning the figurine in her hands, obviously hesitating to speak. Something told him he wouldn't be pleased by what he was about to hear.
"The Princess Shireen." Her voice was shivering.

"Tell them what you did to her. Tell them!" Ser Davos yelled the last order.

"We burned her at the stake."

She managed to stammer these few words after a long hesitation. The room went silent immediately. Tyrion looked at the woman. She didn't dare to look at anybody. The Princess Shireen. Tyrion hadn't seen her a lot. While her father had served as Master of Ships in King's Landing, she spent most of her time on Dragonstone, and she seldom appeared at court. Surely Stannis didn't want to show his only daughter when she was disfigured by greyscale. Tyrion had thought more than once that his father might try one day to arrange a marriage between him and Stannis's daughter. After all, a dwarf and a greyscaled daughter didn't seem a bad match. Tyrion had only seen her closely once, if he recalled well, about a year before Stannis left the capital. She had come with her mother, Selyse Baratheon, to visit the king and Tyrion had found her reading a huge leather book about the Targaryen wars. Half her face was covered by the greyscale. Her expression had been uncertain when she had looked at Tyrion, but he thought this was more curiosity than fear or revulsion. She had to be at most seven at this time. Now she was dead. We burned her at the stake. She was burned alive. A child of ten.

"Why?" Ser Davos asked.

"The army was trapped. The horses were dying. It was the only way," the lady in red explained quickly.

"You burned a little girl alive!"

"I only do what my Lord commands."

"If he commands you to burn children, your Lord is evil." Tyrion couldn't have agreed more with it.

"We are standing here because of him. Jon Snow is alive because the Lord willed it."

"I loved that girl like she was my own." The Onion Knight was close to tears. It was obvious he had been close to Stannis's daughter. "She was good. She was kind. And you killed her!"

"So did her father. So did her mother. Her own blood knew it was the only way."

Tyrion had heard enough. He heard septons and septas say stupidities and nonsense all his life, but that was too much.

"The only way for what?" Tyrion asked. "Did the sacrifice save Stannis? Did it save his army? I heard the Boltons killed them all the same. Did it really help? Did your Lord tell you to murder a child so Stannis and his men could be slaughtered by Ramsay, instead of dying from cold and disease?"

The Red Woman had nothing to reply to this. "You told everyone Stannis was the one," resumed Ser Davos. "You had him believing it, all of them fooled. And you lied."

"I didn't lie. I was wrong." Tyrion thought he heard a lump in her voice.

"Aye, you were wrong. How many died because you were wrong? I ask your leave to execute this woman for murder. She admits to the crime."

It made sense. Tyrion had to admit he would say the same in Ser Davos' place. However, there was something in Melisandre of Asshai that made him hesitate to call for her head immediately as well.

"Do you have anything to say for yourself?" Jon Snow's voice was hard.

"I've been ready to die for many years. If the Lord was done with me, so be it, but he's not. You've seen the Night King, Jon Snow. You know the great war is still to come. You know the army of the dead will be upon us soon. And you know I can help you win that war," she said.

A moment passed. Then Jon Snow proceeded to walk towards the red lady.

"Snow." He stopped at Tyrion's voice. "May I speak for a moment with you, alone?"

Tyrion didn't know why he did this. She confessed she burned a child alive, only so the man who she thought was a savior could become king, and she had burned many other people alive. Still, he felt he had to speak with Jon Snow before he gave his decision.

Ned Stark's son nodded. Tyrion looked at the Red Woman, who looked back at him with pleading eyes. Tyrion turned away and walked with Jon Snow to a corner of the hall, far away from the others. Maybe it was because, unlike Janos Slynt, this woman looked like she regretted what she did, or maybe it was something else, but he felt he had to try.

"I think we shouldn't kill her," Tyrion whispered to the lad.

"She killed a child, no more than twelve."

"Yes, but she regrets it. Unlike Rickard Karstark or Janos Slynt."

"That doesn't erase what she did."

"She really brought you back to life?"

"Aye, she did." Jon Snow's face showed regret after anger.

"Her powers are real?"

"Aye."

"I'm not saying she doesn't deserve to die, but we're going to fight the dead very soon. We're going to fight things we barely understand, magical things, and she's the only magic we have right now. We may need her, even if we don't like it. Let's place her in a cell under guard. She'll still be at hand when the White Walkers come."

Tyrion looked at the woman. Ser Davos Seaworth was still staring at her in full hatred and she kept looking on the floor. Why did he feel pity for a woman who burned hundreds of people alive for a so-called god?

"I can't let that go," Jon Snow finally said. Tyrion saw he wouldn't change his mind. He inherited more than Ned Stark's looks. He had his mind, and his honor. The same honor that got Sansa's father killed.

"Let's wait for Sansa to arrive, at least. She's the Lady of Winterfell and the crime was committed in the North. That's her duty to judge her."

Jon Snow was unflinching. "She followed me here. She's under my orders. It's my decision to take."

He went back to the lady in red and gave his sentence. "Ride south today. If you return to the North, I'll have you hanged as a murderer."

Jon Snow had finally decided to not execute her, but that wasn't much better. They wouldn't be able to use her help against the dead, no matter she was executed or exiled. Resigned, Melisandre laid down the figurine on the high table. On her way to the exit, Ser Davos stopped her.

"If you ever come back this way, I will execute you myself."

She moved past him and left the hall.

Later, Tyrion was looking at her ride away from Winterfell along the Kingsroad. She deserved much more than exile, and yet he feared they might have just made a terrible mistake. What if she could really have helped them? He thought about the ranging of Jeor Mormont, the ranging that never came back. The Old Bear had died fighting the dead. Tyrion had failed to send him the necessary help after he and Maester Aemon explained to him how much they needed it. What if more men died because of that decision?

"I'm having the lord's chamber prepared for you."

Tyrion was quite startled by Jon Snow's words. He was standing next to him on the battlements. "You really want me to sleep in your father's bed?" he asked, half-joking.

"Sansa is the Lady of Winterfell, and you're her husband."

It was a tempting offer, but Tyrion had to refuse it for very good reasons. "There's still your brother Bran. He's probably somewhere, still alive."

A silence settled between the two. "Bran went north of the Wall two years ago. One my sworn brothers met him at the Nightfort while he was heading there." Jon Snow looked at him, his face tired. "What are the chances that he's still alive, cripple like he was?"

That was news for Tyrion. He closed his eyes. He had dared to hope he could at least find her other brother for Sansa. Now he was probably dead as well, lost somewhere north of the Wall, in lands that very few people knew.

"We should wait for Sansa," Tyrion decided. "I'm not the Warden of the North. I'm only a consort here. You would be more at your place in these rooms than me."

"I'm not a Stark."

"You're more than I am. You don't have the name, but you have the blood. I have none." I only have a Stark wife who doubts she even is still a Stark.

"I apologize for yesterday. Ser Brynden was right. I fell into Ramsay's trap like a fool, and thousands of men died."

"Most of the people would have done the same than you. I know my brother would have, if I had been the one running." He wondered what was Jaime doing right now. He missed him.

"Without you, I wouldn't be here. The battle would have been lost without your help and Ser Brynden. The Boltons would still be ruling the North." He looked straight into Tyrion's eyes. "I thank you."

Tyrion moved his eyes to look at the horizon where the Red Woman was fading away. "What I did, I did it for Sansa, for the most."
"Well then, I'm glad to have you as my brother-in-law."

Tyrion raised an eyebrow. "Half-brother-in-law."

Jon Snow smiled. "No matter. Glad you're in the family, my friend."

The bastard left him there and went to other duties. Tyrion looked at the castle from the battlements where he stood, over the South Gate. The last time he had come, the hospitality of Winterfell had been refused to him. Robb Stark thought I had tried to kill his brother. Despite this, he gave Brandon Stark a plan for a special saddle that would allow him to ride again, because Tyrion promised his brother to help him, and a Lannister always pays his debts. The hospitality had been granted to him in the end, but he had flatly refused it, preferring to spend the night in the brothel with Ros. Now Ros was dead, murdered by Joffrey who used her as a target practice with his crossbow. Yoren, who accompanied him on the road until the accident at the inn, was dead, killed during the war by his father's men. The boy who looked so happy when he told him he could ride again was probably dead, and the Lord of Winterfell who had welcomed him so harshly was murdered at a wedding on his father's orders. Even the two guards who followed Tyrion at the time died on their way to the Vale, and so were many of the people who had been at Winterfell back then. Of all the people present this day, only Theon Greyjoy still lived. There really was no justice in this world.

He thought about Sansa's brothers. He wished he had the chance to know them better. Now they were all gone, and all that Sansa had left was Arya and Jon, the two siblings she had the most difficulty with.

Tyrion looked at the Great Keep. This was Sansa's castle now, and his in some way as a consequence. But it would never really be his. Winterfell belonged to the Starks. Only a Stark could rule Winterfell, and this Stark was his wife. This place would never belong to him, a stranger whose father almost succeeded in annihilating one of the most ancient houses in Westeros. His wife's family. Arya Stark was safe, and so was Jon Snow, but right when they learned Bran and Rickon could still be alive, they lost them again. Tyrion couldn't let another Stark die. He couldn't allow it.

He turned his gaze to the south. Snow was falling on the fields before him, and the trees were covered of white. Far away, at the other end of the North, Sansa was waiting for news of the battle. Tyrion wished there were faster ways to communicate and to travel. He wanted to see her again. He wanted to see that he hadn't killed her, like he killed his mother.

Chapter End Notes

Please review

Next chapter: Sansa
Sansa XXVIII

Chapter Notes

Here it is, the chapter everyone was waiting for. It is quite short. The reason is that this chapter wasn't supposed to exist at the origin. We were only supposed to see Sansa again when she would come back at Winterfell, but I thought finally that we needed to know at least how were things at White Harbor, and there were so many people who asked me when we would get to see Sansa's child that I decided to make this one.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

SANSA XXVIII

She woke up in the twilight. The shutters of her window were closed, but a faint light filtered through. Sansa turned on herself to face the opposite wall and tried to go back into sleep. She felt well in her bed sheets and didn't want to leave them. But no matter what she tried, she couldn't fall asleep again. Finally, grunting, she sat in her bed. If Tyrion was there, he would remind her a lady shouldn't make such unlady noises. The memory of her husband's humor brought a smile on her lips, but also caused her worries to emerge again. She hoped they would take Winterfell, and that they would take it soon. If not... The gods wouldn't dare to take away another person she loved. And yet, they had taken so many already.

Sansa looked at her red locks she smoothed with her fingers. Tyrion loved to wander his hand in them. He pretended it was to disentangle them, though in truth this only made the mess her hair was worse when she woke up. Her handmaidens had the difficult task to do the disentanglement themselves the following morning. Slowly, cautiously, Sansa let her right foot land on the stone floor. She shuddered. It was cold. Still taking all her time, she laid the other foot on the stone, feeling the same sensation on the second palm. She stood up, leaving behind her the warmth of her bed. She shivered in her nightclothes. She didn't remember feeling that cold when she was young.

Slowly, Sansa walked to the window and opened the panels. A gust of wind hit her immediately. Outside, the sun had barely begun to rise. Ships were to be seen in both harbors despite the cold rain. Sansa was happy to not be outside. She closed the panels. The fire was extinct in the hearth. She would ask Willia to make another one. They had kept the fire fed all the time while she labored. The memory to these days still haunted Sansa's mind. To think that her mother had gone through this five times... She looked at the door. She was about to walk to it when knocks at the other door startled her.

"Lady Lannister, Maester Theomore would like to see you. He says it's urgent." It was one of her guards who spoke. She had four before the two chambers at all time. Brienne was actually resting, so she wasn't among them for the moment.

"Wait a minute." Sansa seized a heavy night gown that covered most of her and made her warmer. "Let him in," she said when she had adjusted it well enough.

The maester of the New Castle came in. Theomore Lannister was a fat man, with thick lips and golden curls. He had been the one to supervise Sansa's delivery, and since he was a Lannister of Lannisport, Sansa trusted him. Theomore had shown more respect to Sansa than to the Manderlys the few times she saw him, but though his manners were respectful, Sansa never saw him smile, not even once. His face was cold as ice and hard as stone. He did his duty and nothing more. It was quite a contrast with Luwin and Creylen.

"I hope you are well, my lady," he said, his eyes betraying no expression.

"Yes, I am."

"Do you feel any pain, dizziness, itching, urge, weakness that are unusual?"

"No."

"Very well, then. Everything seems under control. You're recovering very well. Much better than I expected. The birth went without problem and there doesn't seem to be any sequelae left from it." He said it as if they talked about the weather. Had he come this early in the morning, when the castle barely began to awake, only to ask her questions about her health and examine her if necessary?

"We received a message from Winterfell, my lady." That caught Sansa's attention. "It was written by Lord Tyrion himself."

Sansa almost snatched the small scroll from the maester's hand as soon as he handed it. Her heart hadn't beaten more frantically since the birth of her child. Reading the first lines, Sansa could barely hold her joy. Ramsay Bolton was dead and Winterfell was free. Jon and Arya were well. She didn't think she could have been happier.

Then she read the second part of the message that her husband wrote with his fine handwriting. Rickon really was in Winterfell. Ramsay didn't lie about this. He killed him before the battle. Sansa needed to read the passage a few times before she could register the information. Her hand was shaking.

"Do you need me for anything else, my lady?" Theomore asked. His face wore no expression. If he knew about her brother's death, he showed no sign of it, and no sign of grief or regret.

"No. You may leave."

Bowing, the maester left. Sansa returned to the scroll. Rickon. She thought her little brother was dead, but then learned he was alive, only to learn again that he was dead. Tears didn't come to her face. Maybe she had drained all the reserves of tears she had from all the losses she endured these last years, or maybe she didn't grieve her brother because she had already grieved his loss two years go. In fact, she barely felt anything. Her mind was hollow, numb, empty. She rolled the scroll and hid it in the folds of her gown. She asked for Willia and had her prepare for the day. Sansa went to the godswood where she prayed for Rickon. The concept of death was overall absent from the religion of the Old Gods of the North, but Sansa needed to be alone and she knew there would be no one in the godswood while there would certainly be someone in the sept at this hour, even if that was only the septon. She also took the habit of praying to the Old Gods much more often than to the Seven, and she thought it was only fitting for the Lady of Winterfell to honor the gods of the North before those of the south.

An hour later, she thought she felt at peace over the loss of Rickon. She cried, silently, letting tears roll on her cheeks. She let him go, just like she had let her parents go and Robb and Bran. Was it possible that Bran still lived somewhere? She was sure most of the northern lords wished it right now. She was the Wardeness of the North, and if the Manderlys and their allies were any indication, no one wanted of her as their lady. A raven she received from Tyrion during her delivery stated they eluded a conspiracy involving half the northern houses in their army, which was the conspiracy Lord Manderly confessed to her two weeks ago. Sansa felt betrayed more than ever, and she took dispositions to remain safe under protection all the time. Tywin Lannister had married her to Tyrion in the hope that a Lannister would rule the North one day, but judging from what happened so far, the previous Lord of Casterly Rock had misjudged the people of the North. He probably gave her in marriage to Tyrion in the hope that he would get killed when he would arrive in the North, thus getting rid of a son he always despised. Sansa was glad that the Old Lion was dead.

When she came back to her personal rooms, Brienne was standing there. She faced Sansa as soon as she arrived.

"My lady, Lord Manderly came to see you, but since you weren't here I didn't allow him to enter."

"You did well." Sansa didn't want anyone in service of the Manderlys to be alone in her rooms or with her without at least one of her guards present, not even Lord Manderly himself. She didn't forgive him his betrayal. "I'll go to see him right now."

Not entering the rooms she was heading for a moment ago, she turned around to seek the Lord of White Harbor. She would come back later. Someone was waiting for her. Wyman Manderly was in his solar and she entered it with Brienne at her side. He rose from his seat and greeted her very politely, more than usual, before he invited her to sit and offered her a glass of wine. Sansa didn't think the Manderlys would poison her. They wanted to take her hostage at worst, not to kill her. She was still the daughter of Eddard Stark, no matter her family name.

"Lady Sansa, I believe I owe you an apology, and probably more than one." The Lord of White Harbor looked tired. Very tired. "We were fools to trust a man like Petyr Baelish."

"Only a fool trusts Littlefinger. "You were not the first." Hopefully, he will be the last. "Lord Baelish will pay for his crimes very soon." Good riddance.

"My lady, I want you to know that House Manderly only wants to restore the rule of House Stark in the North, no matter what happens. As long as Lord Tyrion is doing the same, we will remain at your side. We won't try to betray you. Our plan was only to ensure that a Stark would rule Winterfell."

It was a little too late for this kind of declaration. "Lord Manderly, there was a battle at Winterfell. The Boltons have been defeated and Ramsay is dead."

There was a huge flash of surprise on the face of the Lord of White Harbor. "Really? How do you know that?"

It seemed Theomore didn't tell the content of the raven she received to Lord Manderly. Was it ignorance because he didn't read it, or did he know what the message was about and didn't tell Lord Manderly all the same?

"I received a message from Winterfell. You were right, my brother was there."

"He really was? They found him? Lord Rickon is alive?"

"No. Ramsay Bolton killed him before the battle. He's dead, and for good this time."

Sansa's voice was hard. The Lord of White Harbor looked quite remorseful. "What a loss. I'm so sorry, my lady. You have all my condolences."

She was quite sure he regretted even more the fact that now he had no one to oppose her rule as Wardeness of the North. "Lord Manderly, I will make something clear. My brother Bran may still be alive somewhere. I will do everything to find him. He's my brother. When we find him, I will step aside and let him rule the North as Lord of Winterfell. My lord husband will do the same and we will return to Casterly Rock. In the meantime, I expect you to obey my orders and to follow my rule. I will not tolerate another betrayal."

The Lord of White Harbor seemed to think for a moment. Only a moment. "Of course, my lady. House Manderly has always been loyal to House Stark, and we will remain loyal to House Stark forever."

She noticed he didn't give her a personal pledge. He was loyal to the Starks, not to her, but it wouldn't do any good to press the matter. "You will receive very soon a summon to go to Winterfell. All the lords of the North will gather there. We should leave as quickly as possible."

"Very well. We can leave tomorrow at dawn if that is your wish and that you feel good enough."

"Maester Theomore assures me I am in perfect health. We'll leave tomorrow." She didn't want to stay here one more moment.

The meeting ended on this. Sansa walked back to her quarters with Brienne and three other men following her, two with the crimson armor of the Lannisters and one with the trout of House Tully on his tabard.

"I'm sorry, my lady," said Brienne as they progressed. "I never thought the Northerners would turn against you."

"Lord Manderly may claim the opposite, but when they look at me they don't see the daughter of Eddard Stark. They see a Lannister, the Lady of Casterly Rock." The grey gowns she wore recently wouldn't be enough to change the perception the people of the North had of her.

"I don't. There are times I look at you and I wonder if your mother truly died."

"My mother was a Tully before she was a Stark, Brienne."

For the first time in her life, Sansa wished she had an appearance closer to Arya. She had always been proud of her beauty and the resemblance with her lady mother, but now looking more like her father would be quite useful.

Sansa went back to her personal room and wrote a reply to Tyrion's letter. She sent Willia to bring it to Maester Theomore, then walked in the adjacent chamber that communicated with her own through a door. There was a woman in the thirties who sat into a chair against the wall, and a Tully guard at the door giving on the corridor. She never left someone in this room without a guard.

"My lady." The woman stood up.

"Everything is well?" Sansa asked her.

"Yes, my lady."

"Leave us alone. You too." She addressed the woman and the soldier.

When they were gone, Sansa turned her gaze to the cradle at the center of the room. She slowly walked to it, unable to keep a smile out of her face. The labor had been horrible. It was as if she was being torn apart from the inside. The slaps she received from Joffrey and his kingsguards were nothing compared to this. She was afraid more than once that she would die. She kept pushing and breathing and following the instructions Theomore gave her, until finally it was over. When she received her child in her arms for the first time, all the pain, all the suffering, all the ordeals she faced had disappeared immediately. She wished Tyrion had been there.

She had his eyes. They were green and big, and they looked at her all the time. She already had a blond duvet over her head. Her daughter took much after her father from what Sansa could tell. Tears were close in her eyes. Little arms tried to reach her in vain. She remembered something Cersei told her, the day she bled for the first time. Love no one but your children. On that front, a mother has no choice. Sansa had asked if she should love Joffrey at the time, and Cersei had answered her she could try. What would she have answered if Sansa had asked her whether she should love Tyrion or not? Cersei once told her that Tyrion wanted to be loved and that it was a disease. How could that be a disease? How could something so beautiful, that made you so whole, so happy, be a disease?

Sansa took her little daughter into her arms and sat nearby, her daughter resting comfortably in her lap, and sang her a lullaby she heard her lady mother sing to Rickon when he was still a babe. By the time it was over, she was sleeping peacefully, just like when she was still in her mother's belly. Tears threatened to leave Sansa's eyes, but they were of joy, not of grief or sadness. She didn't want to be sad for Rickon, even if he was dead. She wanted to be happy. Had her mother felt like this when she was born? Sansa understood better now why her lady mother had loved all her children so much, because she felt it for her own daughter right now. She was so beautiful.

Sansa just sat there for a long time, rocking her little girl and continuing to sing. She never thought she would sing again so much. She had lost the taste for music after she came to King's Landing, and in Casterly Rock she mostly listened to music, with all her duties. She brought her back to the cradle and laid her down in it carefully. Her daughter was so calm and looked so peaceful this way. Sansa approached her face from hers and whispered something.

"We're going to leave very soon. You're going to meet your father, my little Joanna." Sansa kissed her on the forehead with all the love she had.

Chapter End Notes

So, this is it. Tyrion and Sansa have a daughter. Concerning the name, I thought there were mostly two choices that Sansa would consider: her mother's name, or the name of Tyrion's mother. She could also have chosen her aunt's name, or her sister's name. The choice she made is in part motivated by political reasons. Their daughter is so far their only child, so she is the heir to Casterly Rock, before she is the heir to Winterfell (something that is not certain). So it makes sense to give her a Lannister name. The choice is also another proof of Sansa's strong identification to House Lannister now. Finally, we've seen through some chapters Sansa come into indirect contact with Tyrion's mother (the discussions she had with Genna and Cerenna when she arrived at Casterly Rock, or when she read Maester Yendel's work at White Harbor) and to feel some connection with this woman she never knew, because they faced similar situations. Hence the name that is chosen. However, it might not help for the Northerners to see her as one of them.

Please review

Next chapter : Jaime
The column marched forward in what looked like a slow pace. Jaime knew that Lord Randyll Tarly had ordered a forced march on King's Landing as soon as he received the news that Loras Tyrell had been imprisoned by the High Sparrow, but since they learned that Margaery and Cersei were arrested as well, Jaime could only think that they didn't progress quickly enough.

The raven had come from Storm's End and it reached Lord Tarly as they had begun to march to the Boneway. The Lord of Horn Hill had gritted his teeth, obviously furious. He let his son lead his army to the Boneway against the Yronwoods while another army led by another Reach lord went through the Prince's Pass. All in all, Randyll Tarly brought two thousand men with him to King's Landing. Jaime had decided to follow him to the capital. After all, it was his son's brother-in-law who was arrested. When he learned that Cersei was in the same situation, it increased his resolve to come back. Jaime didn't understand how the fanatics they took care of before they left could have come back so quickly.

Most of the men in the army that followed them were from the Reach. Jaime seldom spoke with them and ate alone. Many looked at his golden hand with disdain, or maybe it was because he was the Kingslayer. Either way, he stayed away from the other men and they stayed away from him. Lord Randyll invited him to dine with him from time to time, since he was a kingsguard, but it was obvious the Lord of Horn Hill did this out of duty and for nothing else. Jaime never missed the disapproving look he had on his face when he looked at his forged hand. You'd be better to sell that hand and use the money to equip a few men for the war. The gold would be far more useful in that case, he told him one day.

Lord Randyll's son was a little better than the father. While they marched on Dorne, he went to see Jaime sometimes and asked him questions about the wars he took part in, the Mad King and his time as kingsguard. At one moment, their discussion had turned to the time he spent as a squire in Renly Baratheon's army.

"I respected Lord Renly," Dickon said. "He was a good man. He would have made a good king. Though the Iron Throne wasn't his."

"And yet your father followed him," Jaime said bitterly.

"My father followed his liege lord. My family swore loyalty to the Tyrells hundreds of years ago." The boy was loyal to his father, Jaime had to give him that. Sometimes, Randyll Tarly reminded him of Lord Tywin.

"Yes, just like all the other lords of the Reach and the Stormlands. You fought for the Targaryens during Robert's Rebellion, then you knelt before him, then you sided with Renly before going to Joffrey when he died. You switched your cloak thrice in the last twenty years. But then, many are worse. The lords of the Stormlands rebelled against the Mad King as well, then they sided with Renly during the last war, only then to switch to Stannis and then to Joffrey. That makes four instead of three."

The heir of Horn Hill replied nothing to this. Maybe Jaime shouldn't have been so harsh on him. He was only a squire after all. "You didn't fight during the Robert's Rebellion, didn't you?"

"No," Jaime sighed. "My sworn brothers fought him at the Trident, but I didn't. I was to stay in the capital to protect the king. Instead I shoved my sword through his heart before Ned Stark could do it himself." And he despised me for that. He would have respected me if I had died protecting a man who tried to destroy the city and kill all its inhabitants.

"Lord Renly was killed by one of his kingsguards too," said Dickon as a matter of fact.

Jaime scoffed. "Brienne didn't do this."

"She was alone with him."

"She loved Renly. Why would she kill the man she loved?"

"But she did."

"Believe me, lad, she didn't."

"She should never have been in his army," Lord Randyll's son had continued after a moment. "Armies are not a place for women, at least not with swords. When I was there, the knights started to make a gamble about who would get her maidenhead. They were so many to put money on this that the man who would have won would have gotten very rich. My father put a stop to that before it went too far. He told her to leave at this moment, but she refused."

A contest for Brienne's cunt. Jaime never thought he would hear of that one day. He thought about all his nights with Cersei, how they were good. He never had been with another woman. He didn't know what it was to be with someone else than Cersei. Maybe he should ask Tyrion when he would come back from the North. His brother had had two wives, not to mention his many whores. Surely he could tell him what it was like.

"Truth be told, lad, I saw Brienne of Tarth fight, and she's better than many knights in Westeros, and more honorable than most. She might be a woman, but she will always be more a knight than almost all these men who boast that title." Myself included.

Jaime had ended their conversation with these words. Dickon Tarly would certainly not listen to him and side with his father. Which son wouldn't? Jaime missed their discussions, and he envied the lad who was going to war against Dorne while Jaime was stuck to save his sister. Cersei had been supposed to leave the capital. How did she end up there so the Sparrows could arrest her? Jaime wouldn't be surprised if she was behind the arrest of both Margaery and Loras Tyrell.

He was tempted more than once to ride all alone to King's Landing to save his sister, but he knew that would do no good. He needed to be patient. It killed him. He needed to get to the capital and now. He raged daily against the Sparrows for imprisoning Cersei.

Finally, they saw them far away, the Red Keep and the Great Sept of Baelor that towered everything else, along with the Dragonpit on Rhaeny's Hill. As they approached, Jaime spotted banners with the Seven-Pointed Star hanging from the battlements over the gates. That wasn't something he expected. When they came close enough, Jaime distinguished men with dark robes over the battlements of the gates. The Sparrows literally took control of the city.

Randyll Tarly sent men to the King's Gate, but they only returned to say that the gates wouldn't open. Jaime was accepted in Tarly's council, but mostly as an observer. He wasn't allowed to talk very much.
"The men at the gates had a star carved on their foreheads. All of them," explained the captain. "They were armed with clubs and sticks. None had a sword. They said no sword was allowed in the city anymore."

"No sword in King's Landing? What's this madness?" scoffed the Lord of Horn Hill.

"They say King Tommen proclaimed King's Landing a holy city of the Realm, and that hence no sword was allowed behind its walls. They wouldn't let us go in, but they said the High Septon would be ready to receive us in an hour. They said he would wait for us into the Great Sept of Baelor."

"And I suppose we must come without weapons?"

"I suppose, yes, my lord."

"Then go back to these Sparrows and tell them we will meet their leader before the gates and nowhere else. If he's not there at the hour he gave us, we're going to storm the gates and take the city. Make it clear."

"Yes, my lord."

The captain looked afraid as he left. He had every right to be. Jaime wasn't sure if it was a good idea to storm the city. Cersei, Queen Margaery and Ser Loras were still the prisoners of these Sparrows. What if they killed them the moment they breached the gates? If they were quick enough and that the Sparrows were disorganized, this might work, but there was a risk. As his commanders left the tent, Jaime found himself alone with the Lord of Horn Hill.

"If you want, Ser Jaime, you can be there for the negotiations with the High Sparrow, or for the battle, whatever happens, but I would advise you to remain behind. You're not known for your talents in diplomacy and neither are you known for your feats with a sword now that you only have one hand," the lord said coldly.

"I am the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard. I must be present," Jaime argued.

"A Lord Commander of the Kingsguard who can't fight." Another scoff. "Have you ever seen something like this. I will never understand why your nephew got rid of Ser Barristan Selmy. It was stupid and insulting. It would be a good thing to have him with us right now. Instead, he went to Meereen to serve that Targaryen girl."

"And he died there," Jaime counteracted.

"I think it would have been preferable if he died for our king, instead of the Mad King's daughter. Wouldn't you agree?"

Jaime couldn't oppose this. Ser Barristan thought that he should trade his white cloak for a black one after he killed the Mad King, but despite this Jaime admired the man. He died a true knight, serving someone he believed in. What had Jaime done on his side? Serve as a dignified bodyguard, the way his lord father put it, for a mad man he murdered, a drunken fool, and two boys he had with his own sister.

"Let us be clear about something, Ser Jaime," said Lord Tarly as he sat behind his desk. "Our priority is to free the queen and her brother. Ser Loras Tyrell is the only son of Mace Tyrell and the heir to Highgarden. Queen Margaery is the wife of the king. They are the two people we must try to save at all cost."

"And Cersei. She's the Queen Mother."
"Yes, she is. And I wonder what she's doing in King's Landing when I made it clear she should leave." Jaime hadn't been the only one to notice the incongruity of Cersei's imprisonment. "Cersei Lannister is secondary. The queen and her brother are the ones we must focus on."

"You're not going to abandon my sister in the hands of these fanatics?" Jaime asked, angry.

"I'm not abandoning your sister, but she's not the reason why I'm here. I'm here to save the queen and the heir to Highgarden. The alliance between the Crown and the Reach relies on that. Is Cersei Lannister vital to this alliance?"

"Of course, she is."

"Then you're a fool to believe that. Cersei Lannister murdered her husband, the king. She slept with her own cousin who helped her to murder he king. She tried to have her brother killed in front of hundreds of people. There are even some to pretend she laid with you."

"That's a lie!"

"Lie or not, people believe it. I think your sister caused more than enough trouble to the Crown and our alliance. Everywhere she is, disaster seems to follow her. If she gets out of here, we will send her to somewhere in the Reach to spend the rest of her days. She will never be allowed to see the king or the capital ever again. And this time, she won't have guards from your house to watch her. Her guards will be from the house where she resides, or provided by House Tyrell."

"You can't do that! Cersei..."

"I didn't ask for your opinion, Ser Jaime. I merely informed you so you might not be surprised when her release is not among my demands to the Sparrows when we'll negotiate... if we negotiate. You are Lord Commander of the Kingsguard. Your duty is to the king, not his mother. I don't care if there's anything special between you, whatever it might be, but the fact she is your sister doesn't matter here. You serve the Crown, not the Queen Mother who almost destroyed the Crown with her decisions. Now leave. You're dismissed."

Jaime left, his left hand clenched into a fist. If he still had his right hand, it would be clenched as well, and he would certainly have tried to kill Lord Tarly on the spot with his sword, but to do that only with his left hand would be foolish, and he wouldn't help Cersei by dying. He wouldn't abandon her. The moment he had a chance, he would enter the city and save her. He couldn't let Cersei die.

An hour later, the parley took place between Randyll Tarly and the High Sparrow who was now High Septon. The man was old, unshaven, unwashed, without shoes. Jaime never thought he would see a High Septon like this. Tyrion had wanted to become High Septon when he was young. He said a crown would make him look taller. This High Septon wore absolutely nothing that would tell someone he actually was the High Septon. He had four men with him, all armed with clubs. They wouldn't stand a chance against knights, swords and crossbows. Their men over the battlements didn't even seem to have arrows.

"We order you to release the queen, Margaery Tyrell, and her brother, Ser Loras Tyrell," demanded the lord roughly, not caring for introductions.

"The gods wait for Queen Margaery and Ser Loras to confess their crimes and seek their mercy. We must wait as well," replied the High Sparrow.

"Do you think I give a shit about what the gods want? You're just a fool in dirty clothes who hear voices in his head and believe he's doing the god's work. If you care for your life, I suggest you free them right now."

"I am at the service of the gods. I only do their will."

"Then the god's will must be that you die, because that's what will happen if you don't release the queen and her brother."

"Go on, then." The High Sparrow advanced and offered his throat to the Lord of Horn Hill. "I deserve it. We all do. We are weak, vain creatures. We live only by the Mother's mercy."

The Lord of Horn Hill burst into a humorless, cold laugh. "You really are mad. I'm not stupid or without honor enough to kill a man at a parley, even you. You only live by my mercy. Nothing stops me from storming these gates and killing all of you. You don't have the men to face us, nor the weapons."

"No doubt many of us would fall. But who are we? We have no names, no family. Every one of us is poor and powerless. And yet together, we can overthrow an empire."

"I wonder if you will say the same after I stop any wagon or people to get inside the city. When the people will starve and when they know that not only you imprisoned their queen, but also took bread away from their hands, I wonder for how long you will survive in a city full of thousands who want you dead."

The High Sparrow chuckled. "Have you ever sowed the field, Lord Tarly? Have you ever reaped the grain? Has anyone in House Tarly? Or House Tyrell? Or any great house in Westeros? A lifetime of wealth and power has left you blind in one eye. You are the few, we are the many. And when the many stop fearing the few, the few have no more power over them."

"I wonder if you will say the same when the whole population of King's Lading is after you, and when my men put yours to the sword. How many are you? A few hundreds? I don't call that many. What I have under my orders, I call that many."

The old man kept smiling. "The gods will wait for Margaery and Loras Tyrell to atone for their sins, and so we will. And we will fast."

"You will fast to death then. I warned you, old man. King's Landing is under siege from now on. Let's see if your faith can feed you. I won't kill you now, but when we take the city, my men won't hesitate to kill you, even if you take refuge in the Great Sept of Baelor."

"You would spill blood in this holy place?"

"The gods won't mind. They spilled more blood through history than kings. You can rejoice in the fact they will appreciate your sacrifice, as far as I'm concerned."

"You should be careful, Lord Tarly. You should look at your sins, the same way the Queen Mother looked at them."

That drew Jaime's attention. "What do you mean?" he asked to the old man.

The High Sparrow looked at him. "You must be Ser Jaime. Good. You will be happy to hear that your sister confessed her sins. She confessed of laying out of the bonds of marriage." Jaime's heart stopped. No, Cersei would never do that. That would mean her death, his death, and their last son's death. Cersei would never put at risk her children's life.
"You're lying."

"I never lie. Your sister sought the god's mercy and atoned for her sin."

"What of my sins? I broke a sacred oath and stabbed my king in the back. What sort of atonement is required from me? Come, make me atone."

Jaime put his left hand on the pommel of his sword. The old man didn't move. Jaime wished he did, so he may have an opportunity to kill him. "Your sister made her walk of shame. She was stripped from her clothes and fineries, and she made a walk naked through the streets, showing to the people who she really was." Jaime gripped the pommel more tightly as anger flowed through his veins. "Soon, the queen and Ser Loras will do the same."

"I doubt it." It was Lord Randyll who talked again. Someone gripped Jaime's arm. "Cersei Lannister committed crimes, we all knew it. The queen, however, has no crimes to atone for."

"The queen committed perjury at an holy inquest. She lied in front of the gods."

"That's what I said. She committed no crime. This is your last chance to free her and Ser Loras Tyrell." The old man said nothing and just stood there. "Very well. Let's see if the Seven will send you bread and meat from the skies when there's nothing left to eat in this city."

Lord Tarly turned away. Jaime wanted to stay to disembowel the High Sparrow, but a knight forced him to ride away with them. He would kill the High Sparrow, and all the Sparrows if necessary.

Back into camp, Randyll Tarly talked to him as he dismounted. "It seems Cersei Lannister won't need our help in the end. She finally confessed her crimes. It was about time."

"They humiliated her. She's the mother of the king." Jaime said, angry.

"She is, and it seems she has no will. I respect Queen Margaery. Even though she doesn't know her place, she's strong. Not like your sister. At the first challenge, she crumbles on the floor like a shy maid of twelve. She doesn't deserve a family who tries to free her."

The Lord of Horn Hill walked away. He called for one of his commanders. "Do you have any idea where Lord Selwyn Tarth could be?"

"We don't know, my lord," answered the knight. "We heard nothing about him. Maybe he arrived in the city before all this madness began."

"Find him. We need all the help we can get. He should have arrived in the capital by now."

Chapter End Notes

A short chapter, far from being one of the most exciting I admit. It's mostly there to know what's going on in King's Landing while the main action has been in the North all this time.

Please review

Next chapter: Jon (a new character appear, a character that some have been asking for) Winterfell, about a month after the battle. Let's see how Lannisters, Northerners, Tullys and wildlings fare together. And let's see who's the new character.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

"I didn't bring my men here to see the North invaded by wildlings."

"They didn't invade. They were settled in the Gift as part of a deal with the Night's Watch," Jon explained to the lord.

"They are not in the Gift right now. They are camping right outside of Winterfell and they wander in the castle daily and freely."

"They helped to free this castle and the North. The same cannot be said about you, Lord Arryn."

Harrold Arryn, new Lord Protector of the Vale, turned red. "I brought my men here, ten thousand men, to help to free the North."

"We appreciate your assistance, but we appreciate the assistance of the Free Folk too. They lost hundreds in the battle. How many men have you lost?" The lord had no answer. "When you have lost as many men as they have, we'll talk again about sending them away. The Free Folk will be allowed to remain stationed at Winterfell until all the lords of the North arrive, then everyone will go his way."

"As you wish, Jon Snow. But I warn you, I won't let these savages plunder the North, and don't expect me and my men to become friends with them."

"I'm not asking you to be their friends. Just keep your men in line and I'll make sure they keep theirs quiet. I don't want any other fight between them."

"Very well."

The Lord of the Eyrie turned away to go back to his men. The Knights of the Vale had arrived two weeks after the battle. They had been quite disappointed to discover they had missed the fight, and their lord more than everyone else. Jon didn't understand at first why the men of the Vale had come in the North. Ser Brynden Tully and Tyrion Lannister didn't know either why they had come, though since then Jon's friend told him about the machinations of Lord Petyr Baelish. He suspected this could be linked with that. They had received a raven from Sansa from White Harbor, announcing she was coming to Winterfell, but also saying that the brothelkeeper wouldn't last long. Jon was suspicious towards the Vale men since then, much more suspicious than towards the men of the Westerlands. He hadn't appreciated that they didn't come to their help before late in the battle, but the Blackfish had done the same. Taking a step back, Jon understood why they waited for the Bolton infantry to be engaged to send their cavalry. Furthermore, Lord Tyrion was a friend and a member of his family now that he was married to Sansa.
Tents were everywhere around Winterfell. The standards of House Arryn, House Lannister, House Tully and House Hightower flew everywhere, with the standards of their bannermen spread all around. There were the tents of the Free Folk too, easy to distinguish with their skins, and by the absence of banners. The castle was packed full, and so was the Winter Town, at the exception of rooms they left empty for the northern lords who hadn't arrived yet. Lady Eddara Tallhart of Torrhen's Square had come a few days ago, and Robett Glover of Deepwood Motte had arrived yesterday. His behavior had changed a lot since he refused to help Jon to take back Winterfell. Many more were still to come. Jon supposed Sansa would only arrive when almost all the northern lords would already be there. That is, all the lords who answered the call. They didn't receive answers from some families. Without surprise, the Dreadfort, Karhold and the Last Hearth were silent. They dispatched battalions to these three places to force them to surrender. These detachments were mostly composed of forces from the Westerlands and the Riverlands, the ones who suffered the fewer losses during the battle. There was also the Hightower army that marched with the Forrester forces on Ironrath. Mira and Talia Forrester were the ones to stay behind to represent their families at Winterfell in the meantime.

Jon looked at his home. Over it, only the Stark banner flew. Tyrion didn't want to upset the northern lords by hanging a golden lion on a crimson field next to the direwolf, but to not spite his own bannermen, they also decided no other banner than the Stark direwolf was to be seen anywhere inside Winterfell or on its walls. No falcon, no trout, no single or twin towers were to be seen over the castle. That was the best compromise they could come with. Despite his friendship with his sister's husband, he wasn't eager to see a red banner hanging on the battlements of his family's home.

Jon went back to his horse and rode it back to Winterfell. If banners were forbidden, the armors and garbing of the men walking all over in the courtyards and the corridors testified of the fact that Winterfell was now controlled by men from all Westeros, from Oldtown to Hardhome. They were all armed from head to toes. Jon thought it was difficult to bring all the wildlings together, and then to bring them to fight along the Night's Watch against the dead, but compared to this, it looked like a child's game. While he walked to the guests' rooms, he saw at least two Lannisters, three Tullys, two Arryns, three Northerners, one Frey and one wildling eyeing someone else suspiciously. They would really need the dead to bring all these people together. Sometimes he wondered how Tyrion and Ser Brynden managed to keep all this army in one single piece. Within the last month, they had a minimum of two brawls every day, most of the time over insignificant reasons.

The squire was waiting before Lord Tyrion's door. He announced Jon and let him go in. Lord Tyrion was busy looking into accounts, a frown on his forehead. He made a sign for Jon to take a seat, not leaving the scroll he held for a moment.

"It seems Ramsay wouldn't have lasted long at all against a siege. There isn't enough food in storage, not at all. We'll have to ask for foodstuffs to King's Landing and the Reach." He dropped the paper on the desk and looked at Jon, tired. "Easier to conquer a land than to rule it."

"You and Sansa will have a lot of work to do when she arrives," Jon commented.

"Hmm. No need to remind me. I wonder if we'll have any time for our daughter."

A smile crossed the dwarf's scarred face, like it did each time his daughter was mentioned. Despite the fortnight that passed since they received the news, Jon still found it funny to believe that his sister had a child with Tyrion Lannister. Less disconcerting was the fact that he had a niece now.

"You must be eager to see her again," Jon said.

"I am. Just like me. Four years that I haven't seen her, and she was thirteen when I left. How does she look like now?" I wish the same could be said of the Northerners. Finding your brother would help us a great deal."

Jon averted his eyes. If only they knew exactly where Bran was, he could send a searching party north of the Wall, but without any idea of his location, they couldn't send people to wander in the wilderness with dead men lurking everywhere.

"The Knights of the Vale are growing restless. They don't like being left out," Jon informed his friend.

"They should have arrived in time for the battle, then we would have given their lords rooms inside Winterfell. Though I'm not unhappy they arrived late, if what Sansa discovered in White Harbor was true."

Jon sighed. "All this, that was a plot from Petyr Baelish." Lord Manderly had confessed to Sansa his plans to turn against the Lannisters during the battle with the help of the Vale, and the role the former acting Lord Protector of the Vale had played in this. "I do hope he dies soon."

"Me too. I wish he had been the one to betray me to Cersei when I was Hand of the King. I would have had a good reason to execute him."

"We must send forces to the Wall as quickly as possible," Jon said, changing of subject.

"First, we have to take back the Last Hearth. The lands of the Umbers are in the way, and I don't believe they will let us pass without saying a word."

"Still, we must hurry. All our men will grow restless doing nothing here for too long, and we must garrison the other castles on the Wall, before the White Walkers come. Winter is here now. The dead cannot be far any longer."

"According to the ravens that the new Lord Commander Eddison Tolett sent us, there are no signs of wights or White Walkers or Night King anywhere near the Wall. It seems for now they won't try anything."

"Let's hope they don't know how to climb it."

"Well, I read some of the books you still have in your library, and according to some historians, the Wall has a certain magic that prevents the White Walkers from going through it. If that's the truth, then we only have to make sure the Wall doesn't crumble. It doesn't seem much difficult to me."

"Maybe, but I don't trust magics or visions." He thought, not without anger, and neither without regret, of the Lady Melisandre.

"Strange for someone who's alive thanks to it."

Jon brushed aside the subject. "We need weapons against our enemies. Swords and arrows will not be enough."

"Ah yes, I've been thinking about it lately. You told me that Valyrian steel swords can defeat the White Walkers."

"Aye."

Tyrion Lannister grimaced. "Too bad there are only a few dozens left through all the Seven Kingdoms. Although thanks to my father, the number increased of one recently."
"What do you mean?"

The Lord of Casterly Rock seemed to hesitate for a time. "After the Red Wedding, my lord father had your father's sword, Ice, melted."

"What?" Jon stood up, anger filling his mind and body. Ice had been his father's greatsword and that of many Starks before him. For four hundred years, it belonged to the Lord of Winterfell. And now it was gone.

"My father made two swords with it. He gave one to Joffrey for his wedding, and he gave the other one to my brother, Jaime." Ice, in the hands of Joffrey and the Kingslayer. Jon couldn't believe it. "The smaller one is with Tommen in the capital right now, but the longest one that went to my brother is with Sansa. He gave it to a woman who's protecting her at White Harbor. I'm sorry, Jon Snow. If I had known, I would have sent it back to your brother along with your father's bones."

That didn't make Jon any less angry. The Imp looked uneasy as he talked about mining dragonglass on Dragonstone and asking his nephew to send shipments of it to Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. Then the door opened. Jon didn't expect something that could make his anger worse, but here it was all the same. Two men in Lannister armor brought forward what was left of a man, but Jon couldn't feel any pity for it all the same.

"Time to question our prisoner again. I suppose you'll want to stay, Jon Snow." That wasn't a question Lord Tyrion asked, and he didn't need to ask one. Jon would stay of course.

They forced the body into a chair, his chains clicking as they moved him. They had questioned Theon many times since they found him in the kennels. At first, it had been very difficult. He barely seemed to recognize them and murmured incoherent words. Whenever he was called Theon, or Greyjoy, or Theon Greyjoy, he kept saying My name is Reek all the time. Still, one conversation at a time, they managed to gather information from him. They had the confirmation that he never burned Bran and Rickon, and that he killed two farm boys instead who he made everyone believe they were Bran and Rickon. He claimed he had no idea where they were and that he didn't know Rickon was at the Last Hearth until Jon Umber brought him to Winterfell. Jon wasn't ready to believe him. He also claimed he didn't burn Winterfell and that it was Ramsay's work. Jon didn't believe him at first when he said so, but after questioning Maester Wolkan, people living nearby and the few Bolton prisoners they had, they obtained a confirmation from one who had been part of Ramsay's army that besieged Winterfell when Theon held it that it was Ramsay who burned the castle and skinned the Ironmen alive when they surrendered. Theon also confessed that he was the one to kill Ser Rodrik Cassel, and that he betrayed Robb, which were no secrets.

Jon sat, staring at the man Robb trusted and who rewarded his trust with betrayal and treachery. Jon had never liked Theon particularly, but still, he had been their father's ward, and only for the children's murder, he deserved to be hated and more.

"So, can you tell us who you are?" Tyrion asked. Jon had almost forgotten for a moment that he was present. His anger from learning the fate of his father's sword had almost dissipated before Theon's arrival.

"I... I am... My name is Theon Greyjoy. I am the son of Balon Greyjoy. I have a sister, Yara, and two brothers who are dead. I was given to Lord Stark as a ward after my father rebelled. I fought with Robb Stark at the Whispering Wood. I betrayed him. I took Winterfell. I was betrayed by my own men and delivered to..."

That was, overall, a very good summary, though he forgot to mention the two boys he burned and Ser Rodrik's murder. "Very well, Greyjoy. Now, can you tell us where Brandon Stark is?"
"I don't know. I didn't kill him. I didn't kill Rickon. I didn't kill them."

"No, you didn't, but you certainly have an idea where they were heading."

"I have none."

"Are you telling us that this is a pure coincidence that Ramsay got his hands on Rickon while you were at Winterfell and that you knew he was still alive?"

"I didn't know Rickon was at the Last Hearth."

"Are you really going to tell us that you said nothing to Ramsay about the Stark boys?"

Theon had looked down all the time. He dared to look up for a moment to Jon, and he lowered his face again, all shaking. "I... I told him I didn't kill them. I told him they weren't dead. I told him that when Roose Bolton was there."

"Ramsay knew that Rickon was alive because of you?" Jon asked, fury flaring inside of him once again.

"I didn't know where they were. They thought they might be heading for Castleblack. They sent a man, someone named Locke, to find them there."

Jon remembered that name. "Locke?"

Theon nodded quickly. "I know that name," said Tyrion. "He was the one who took my brother prisoner as he escaped and cut his hand."

That was something Jon didn't know. It seemed there were many things he didn't know about Locke. He should have done better than believing his story about entering the Night's Watch instead of losing a hand for hunting a partridge. Locke had come with them north of the Wall, and he died at Craster's Keep. If he was hired by the Boltons to kill Bran and Rickon, then that would explain why he was so eager to take his vows and go north with Jon. Jon highly doubted the man had a chance to put his plan to execution before he died.

"Have you ever heard of this man?" Tyrion asked this question to Jon.

"He joined the Night's Watch, but he died not long after."

"Well, no need to worry about him anymore. He never came back, I suppose?" This time, he asked to Theon.

"I never saw him again. I told them nothing else about the boys. I didn't know where they were. That's why I killed the two farm boys. I swear, I don't know where Bran and Rickon are..."

Jon jumped from his chair and took Theon by the collar. "Look at me. Look at me!" Jon shook him until Theon did as he was told. He stank. "Do you think that because you didn't kill Bran and Rickon you will live? You killed Ser Rodrik. You betrayed Robb. You took Winterfell with your men. And you burned two children all the same. It doesn't matter that it wasn't Bran or Rickon. You burned two children! Do you think Robb would spare you if he was still alive, when he executed Lord Karstark for killing two Lannister children?"

"I don't want to be spared. I deserved what happened to me, and worse."

Jon released him, dropping him into the chair, Theon's self-pity making him hate his father's ward more than ever. The door burst opened at this moment. Arya came in, still limping a little from the arrow she received in the leg during the battle. She kept practicing every day despite this, shooting arrows and sparring with the other men, mostly wildlings since they had no problem with women fighting. None dared anything against her. The story of how she killed Ramsay had spread, quick as the wind.

"What is he doing here?" She came to stand between the desk where Tyrion Lannister sat and Theon and looked at both of them. Jon didn't know at who she looked with the most disdain. "Why is he still alive? He should be dead. We should kill him right now."

"Arya, this man is probably the only one who could give us some information about the location of your brother Bran. Do you want to see your brother again someday?" Tyrion's question startled Arya, who didn't seem to know what to answer. Jon doubted Theon could tell them more than he already told. "He will stand trial for his crimes when Sansa arrives, and his fate will be decided then." Jon agreed on that. They had to maintain justice, and traitors had to be executed like every other criminal.

"And he will die?"

"I doubt Sansa will let him live."

Theon had no reaction as she talked, but when she looked back at him, he lifted his head and his eyes widened in surprise. "Arya? But... you're dead. Lord Bolton killed you."

Jon's sister looked straight in Theon's eyes. "I'm not dead, but Rickon is. You know what Ramsay did to him?" Theon dropped his eyes on the floor. "Where is Bran?"

"I don't know."

"You're lying. Where is Bran?" No answer. "Look at me!" She forced Theon to face her. "I lost two brothers because of you. You betrayed us. You betrayed my family, you betrayed my father, Robb, Rickon, Bran. Tell me where he is or I'll gut you like I did for Ramsay!"

"I'd tell you if I knew where he was."

Jon would have felt pity for Theon in other circumstances, seeing him broken and crying like he actually did. He had nothing to see with the Theon he once knew. Jon was also aware of the torture he had to endure in the hands of Ramsay. Although he found what Ramsay did disgusting, he could barely sympathize with their father's ward after everything he did. He even helped the Boltons to take the North and did nothing while Rickon was being held prisoner.

"You don't deserve to die." Jon was surprised by Arya's words. She looked at him. "We should skin him alive. He watched Ramsay do that to everyone and he did nothing. It's time he suffers as well."

Jon didn't like that side of Arya. It was the side he saw when she killed Ramsay. "Arya, I think he suffered more than enough. He will be judged and sentenced to death..." he tried to reason her.

"That's not enough! Have you forgotten everything he did? Rickon died because of him. He didn't even try to save him. He's a traitor!"

"She's right," Theon's voice was weak. "I deserve to suffer. I should have saved Rickon. I should have saved that girl. She asked me to help her escape and I refused. I said it would only get worse if she tried to flee. I warned her. She tried to escape one day, and..." Theon's voice broke.

"It's a little too late to have regrets," Tyrion said. "Rickon and the girl are dead. If you hoped for forgiveness, you should have saved them when you had the chance."

"I don't want to be forgiven. I was there the wedding night. Ramsay forced me to watch. He said, watch her become a woman. I should have killed him at the time."

"I think we heard enough," said Jon. He had heard more than enough about Ramsay Bolton's atrocities. He didn't need to listen to the details Theon would give. "Better to send him back to his cell." He didn't say he had certainly nothing more to tell about Bran, or else he feared Arya might kill him on the spot. She had Needle at her belt. Not that he would mind so much if Theon died at this very moment, but he didn't want Arya to kill him.

Tyrion raised his hand. "Wait. That girl that Ramsay married, you knew her?"

Theon was shaking uncontrollably. "She had to make him believe she was Arya. Or else he would have killed her. That night before the battle… He… He went to his chambers with the other girl… and he… She took a knife and she…"

"I don't think we need more details about Ramsay's horrible games. Who was the girl? Who was Ramsay's wife?"

A long silence followed. Theon was sobbing now and his voice was only a whisper when he gave the name. Jon barely heard it. "Jeyne."

"Jeyne? Jeyne Poole?" asked Arya.

"I have the impression I heard this name before," said Tyrion, his face showing clearly he was searching his mind. Jon gave him the details in a tired voice.

"Jeyne Poole was the daughter of Varyon Poole, the steward of Winterfell. She was Sansa's best friend."

"Oh, yes. I think I remember now. Sansa talked about her a few times."

"You let that monster hurt Jeyne?!!" asked Arya.

"I think we should send him back to his cell," Jon quickly said.

"I agree. Bronn!" The dwarf's man cam inside immediately with two other men in crimson armor. "Take him back to where he came from."

"The sea? To drown him?" the knight asked with a grin.

"You know what I'm talking about."

"Very well. Boys!"

Without much care, they forced Theon to stand. Balon Greyjoy's last son was half-dragged half-kicked outside the room. Jon didn't know what to do of this man. Ser Bronn of the Blackwater was quite similar to Tormund, but Jon didn't get the occasion to know him yet. Still, if Tyrion trusted him, he surely had good reasons. Jon had seen Free Folk behave with more honor than members of the Night's Watch or high lords, so why couldn't a mercenary be better than a proper knight?

"He must die," said Arya.

"He will," Lord Tyrion assured her.
"He must die NOW."

"I must go and see to the encampments outside the walls. Arya, will you follow me?" Jon asked her.

"Aye," his sister replied after a moment, not without reluctance.

Jon nodded to the Lord of Casterly Rock who seemed to thank him. The discussions between him and Arya were never very courteous, and as they left Arya shot him an angry glare again. Jon suspected Arya held him responsible in part for Rickon's death, and maybe also for letting the Northerners being slaughtered by Ramsay's arrows during the battle. Jon blamed him as well at the start, but in this case he should blame the Blackfish as well. He didn't send his troops either when the vanguard charged. Jon knew he should have gone back to their ranks after Rickon died. Lord Tyrion's remark that his brother would have done the same in his place didn't lift his spirits, if that had been the intent.

Jon looked at his sister, the little sister to who he gave a sword before they went separate ways. However, he didn't like the way she changed. The ordeals she went through these last years had changed her from the little girl who played with swords for fun into a soon-to-be woman who wanted to kill everyone who wronged her and their family. Jon couldn't get out of his mind the savagery of the way she killed Ramsay, even though he deserved it. She was no longer a little girl. Jon regretted she wasn't. When he thought about it, he had been but a boy when he left for the Wall. Now he was a deserter of the Night's Watch, a former Lord Commander who died, murdered by his own sworn brothers, and a dead brought back to life. Had Sansa changed very much as well? According to Arya, she had. Although Sansa was always polite and had never been evil with him, she had always maintained a certain distance with him. He wasn't even sure the Sansa he knew four years ago would have written to him at the Wall, and he knew for sure that girl of thirteen he had known would never have fallen in love with Tyrion Lannister. The comic side of the situation brought a smile to his lips.

"What's funny?"

"Nothing, Arya."

Jon chased the smile from his face. When he looked back upon Arya, he saw how dark her face was. He couldn't remember her smiling a single time after their reunion.

"Theon will die, Arya. Don't doubt about it."

"I know," she said gloomily. "I just wish we could kill him more painfully, right away and be done with it."

"He must be executed. We must follow the old way."

"Why?"

"Because that's our way. The man who passes the sentence must swing the sword. Because he must be sure that the man he executes is guilty, or else he couldn't kill him himself." He remembered swinging it himself a few times. He remembered Olly's lifeless body hanging from a rope by the neck.

"But we're sure that he's guilty."

"Aye, but that's not the way to do it. We must give him a trial."

"Why give him a trial? Everyone knows he's guilty."
"Not everyone. We must wait for the northern lords to all come, then expose Theon’s crimes, and execute him before all of them."

"Do you think Father had a trial? Or Mother? Or Robb? Rickon? Do you think Theon gave Ser Rodrik a trial before he killed him?"

Jon took his time to answer. "I want to see Theon die as much as you want, but we have to give him a trial, or else we wouldn't be better than those who murdered our father, or your mother, or than Theon himself."

Arya didn’t seem convinced by his words and looked straight before her as they arrived to the stables. "I don't care about the way Theon dies. As long as he dies. I'd kill him with a chicken wing if I had to. I want to kill him myself."

Jon wondered how she would do that. As stableboys prepared their mounts, Jon turned to Arya once more. Something had come to his mind, but he said nothing as they placed their saddles on the beasts and climbed on them. Sansa was the Lady of Winterfell as long as they didn't find Bran, so she would be the one to sentence Theon to die. The man who passes the sentence should swing the sword. Their father had taught this to all his sons, even the bastard. Jon didn't imagine Sansa swinging the sword on Theon, so maybe Arya would be the one to kill him. After all, after Sansa, she was second in line to inherit Winterfell. There was Sansa's daughter before her, of course, but she was still a babe. Jon thought for a moment that Sansa hadn't told them how she named the child. He would to make sure Arya wouldn't be the one to execute Theon. He had to speak with Sansa as soon as she arrived and arrange for himself to be the one to carry out the execution. They would also need to tell her about Jeyne. She had always been Sansa's best friend here, and now she was dead. Someone else was gone.

"You might still get your chance to kill Theon," Jon finally said as they rode through the gates, without thinking. "I will."

Jon had already visited the different camps previously today. In fact, he had given this as an excuse to get Arya and Tyrion as far away from each other as possible. He headed to the Free Folk tents, deciding it would be best to see his friends there again, then perhaps pay a visit to the northern lords. The main tensions were still between Northerners from beyond the Wall and Northerners from south of the Wall. Thousands of years of uninterrupted wars wouldn't disappear after a single battle.

As they rode towards Tormund's camp, a rider came in their direction and stopped before them. He wore the sigil of House Lefford. "Jon Snow, you should come to our camp. There are Karstarks who just arrived."

"Karstarks?"

"Yes. I'm on my way to warn Lord Tyrion, but I believe it would be better if you were present. They're kept inside our trenches for now."

"Very well. I'm going there."

The messenger resumed his path. As Jon rode to the sea of red tents that spread to his right, he wondered if the Karstarks had decided to surrender in the end. Harald Karstark hadn't seemed the type of man to surrender during the parley. He never forgave his father's execution. Arya followed him. Jon spotted the banner of House Karstark somewhere in the center of the camp. Their small group of about fifteen men was surrounded by several soldiers in red armed with every possible weapon the Westerlands could provide. They made way for Jon as he approached. A young woman about his age, still on her horse, turned to face him.

"Jon Snow. It's been a long time. My house and yours are bound by blood and honor, though there's been a lot of blood and few honor between us lately."

Jon looked at her. I know this girl. She was tall and skinny, her brown hair was woven in a thick braid and bound with strips of leather, she had a long face with a pointy chin and small ears. For a moment, the memory eluded him. Then it came.

"Alys Karstark."

That brought a smile to her lips. "I wasn't sure you would remember. I was six the last time you saw me."

Jon nodded. "You came to Winterfell with your father." The father Robb beheaded. "What are you doing here?"

"I bring you a present." Two men with the white sun on their chest came forward, holding a third one in shackles who struggled.

"How dare you?! I'm your lord!" he shouted.

One of the two guards punched him in the stomach and the others shoved him forward into the mud. Jon had seen him at the parley with Ramsay. He was the one who escaped from the battle alive. Harald Karstark, Lord of Karhold, bound by fists and ankles.

"What does that mean?" Jon asked to the young lady.

"My brother fought with Ramsay against you and he lost. I give him to you as a traitor. I only ask in return that my house keeps Karhold. I will swear loyalty to your sister and what men my family still has will help you against your enemies."

Jon looked at the fallen Lord of Karhold, then to his sister. "You're really giving up on your brother?"

She scoffed. "Truth be told, I never loved him. I loved Eddard and Torrhen, they were kind, but while they went south to fight the Lannisters and died in the war, Harald remained behind to play with little boys in his chambers. I advised against siding with the Boltons, but he didn't listen to me. I suppose he liked Ramsay because of their mutual tastes. The people of Karhold are loyal to me now. None really loved my brother anyway."

"Be careful, Jon Snow." Ser Daven Lannister stepped forward from the circle around them. "Her father murdered two of my cousins in their cells, boys without weapons. He killed my father and was later beheaded by your brother Robb Stark. And let's not forget that her brother fought against us not long ago."

"My father is dead, and so are Robb Stark, your cousins, your father, two of my brothers, and I don't care what you do with the one I have left. I warned him to not fight alongside Ramsay and he didn't listen. But we are still living, the three of us." She looked at Ser Daven, then to Jon. "Is there blood feud between us, Lord Snow?"

"If every man, or woman, were held accountable for the actions of every relative, we'd all hang." Jon looked at Lord Tyrion's cousin. "Ser Daven, have your men bring Lord Harald to the cells. My sister, Lady Sansa, will decide what to do with him."
Daven gave orders to four men to bring the fallen Lord of Karhold, who cursed all the way. Jon brought back his attention on Lady Alys. "Lady Karstark, the hospitality of Winterfell is yours. I'll allow you to move inside the castle with a servant and two guards to protect you, but your other men will have to stay outside. Lady Sansa will decide of Karhold's fate."

She shrugged. "I'm in no position to negotiate. Very well, but I suggest you chop my brother's head as soon as possible."

"Come, I'll escort you."

As they rode toward the castle with the Karstark lady, her three men and several Lannister soldiers, Arya said something for the first time they went out the castle. "We could kill Lord Harald right now, if she wants it so much."

"You must be Arya Stark," said Alys Karstark from behind. "We meet again."

"We never met."

"We did, only you don't remember. You had just been born. Your sister Sansa was three and already behaving like a lady back then. I'm glad we can meet properly for the first time. Thank you for thinking my brother should die immediately."

Chapter End Notes

So, as ALEXK supposed, the new character was indeed Alys Karstark. She appears in the A Dance with Dragons and there are rumors that she will appear in Season 7. Even if some of these rumors say that he would have red hair, I decided to keep her physical appearance from the books. Her behaviour towards her last living brother is different from the books because the last son of Rickard Karstark is quite different in the series from who he is in the books, at least from what we know.

Please review

Next chapter: Daenerys
For the first time in this fic, Daenerys gets an original chapter. I tried to write it in a way that would make the events from the show more realistic, filling gaps. It wasn't very likely that they only needed to defeat the armada in Meereen to have all the other cities go on their knees immediately. War and peace are never that simple. Nothing is ever over in one single great battle. GRRM does a very good job in the books to show that, but sadly the show lacks it and simplify things in an unrealistic way, perhaps because of time constraints.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Daenerys III

You could still see the marks left by the fires in some districts near the harbor. From her balcony at the top of the Great Pyramid of Meereen, Daenerys looked at the city. Entire pans of the city had been destroyed because of the masters' attack. The people had started to rebuild their homes, but the reconstruction was slow. The money that Volantis and Yunkai had sent was still on its way, so they would need time before the inhabitants of Meereen could fully bring back their city to what it looked like before the war. Still, things were better than when she left. The Sons of the Harpy were all dead or arrested, as far as they knew. Lord Varys had put to their disposition his network of little birds and came up with several crucial members of the organization, though the red priests and the Unsullied brought as much if not more. The ships were almost ready. They would set sail for Westeros in a few hours. This was the last time Daenerys would ever see Meereen.

The two months that followed the Battle of Meereen had gone quickly and yet she had accomplished a lot. She flew to Yunkai, Astapor and Volantis and made treaties of peace with the governments of all these cities. In Astapor, she was welcomed as a savior by everyone. The new council of the city, led by former slaves, freedmen and red priests, was very enthusiastic about her arrival. She didn't have much to do there. The masters had been kicked off the city or murdered quite easily by the people, and the sellsword companies had abandoned their farce of a siege when they heard the Wise Masters were defeated in Meereen. She contented herself with a public declaration that every slave was now free and the rest of the stay was mostly about festivities. The people would have liked her to stay longer, but she left after one day. She had more pressing matters to attend. She stayed long enough to enjoy a play about her and how she saved Slaver's Bay, though it wasn't very true to what happened. There were a few other plays, including one that was called the Bloody Hand and that showed the events that happened in Westeros during the War of the Five Kings, mostly centered around the dwarf son of Tywin Lannister, now the Lord of Casterly Rock. There were also musicians and singers. Surprisingly, one of the red priestess, Tishae, came to perform a beautiful version of The Seasons of My Love, a Myrish song Daenerys heard a long time ago. Then she performed another song specially made for Daenerys, Mother of Flame.
Through high walls
Tyrants of toil will fall

Queen of the free
The breaker of chains
Winter will cry out my name
Look to the sea
To follow my claim
Become the mother of flame

The situation she found in Yunkai had been quite different. The masters still held a part of the city, but when Daenerys came with her dragon, they only needed two hours to surrender. Daenerys forced the masters to pay an amend for the damage their fleet caused to Meereen, then constituted a council made of both freedmen and former slaves to rule the city. She also included a red priest on the council and chose freedmen who took part to the rebellion or masters who opposed the war with Meereen and the repression against the slaves to have a seat on it. Then the sellswords companies were sent away without payment. Drogon's sight was enough for most of them to fly away quicker than her dragons could followed them, and those who remained and demanded their payment didn't have the opportunity to demand anything else for the rest of their lives.

If Yunkai had been difficult, Volantis had been a hell. The masters were still resisting inside the Black Walls and refused to surrender. Even the sight of her dragons didn't make them flinch. Daenerys had no choice. She made her three dragons come and attacked with all of them the buildings inside the Black Walls. Viserion was almost shot by a scorpion during the first day of the attack, so Daenerys waited for the night and launched her attack while no one could see her and her children. All the palaces, courtyards, temples and bridges inside these walls burned for three days and three nights before the triarchs surrendered in the name of all the masters of Volantis. The city had fallen. It took four more days to extinguish all the fires. The city inside the Black Walls had burned for an entire week. For once, the rich were the ones to suffer while the poor were safe, protected from the fire by the walls of dragonstone.

Creating a government was much harder than for Volantis. Daenerys had forced the masters to pay an amend as well for the damage they caused to Meereen, which left them with almost nothing since most of their possessions inside the Black Walls had already burned. With the masters and the triarchs neutralized, the red priest Moqorro proposed that the Red Temple took responsibility of ruling Volantis. Back in Meereen, before she left, Kinvara had strongly advised her to not trust Moqorro, and even told her to not leave the government in the hands of the Red Temple. Since this came from the High Priestess herself, who was the leader of the Red Temple, Daenerys supposed this really had to be serious. She decided to keep the political model of Volantis with three triarchs, but added a council of ten people to advise it, and decided that everyone in the city, no matter their birth or their riches, could vote for the triarchs and their advisors. She put into place a council of transition to make sure the elections would go well, excluding Moqorro from it, while still allowing him to present himself for the vote.
She had only come back two days ago and made an alliance with Yara Greyjoy, supporting her claim on the Iron Islands in exchange for her help in taking the Iron Throne. With the masters' armada, the Grejoy and the Dornish ships, they had enough to bring all her Dothrakis and the Unsullied across the Narrow Sea. On her way, she had thought about changing the political system of Astapor and Yunkai to turn it into something like she did in Volantis, but she had already given her word to the rulers in place in the two cities, and she couldn't come back on it. However, she established the same measures in Meereen than she did in Volantis. She would be the last Queen of Meereen. She looked again below her. It was the last time she would enjoy this view. The sea called for her. Her homeland was waiting for her. She didn't know much about it. She couldn't rely on what Viserys told her. She had Lord Varys, of course, but she wasn't ready to trust him, not entirely. Of course, there was Malcolm Branfield and Prince Trystane, and Jorah as well. She accepted him back into her service. He saved her. How could she maintain his exile after everything he did for her, despite the fact she sent him away?

"This is a great city, when we look from here."

Daenerys knew to who this voice belonged. "It is," she replied shortly.

"There are many changes coming for it, and for its people."

"But will they accept change?"

"They will. They have to. If you don't change, you die. Many men don't want to understand this, and most of the time they die." Kinvara came to stand next to her. "The Great Masters believed Meereen was great. When you look at it from here, that's the impression you have. You see temples, pyramids, high walls, a great harbor, huge mansions there and there. You can even distinguish the smaller houses. But you don't see the people living in it. You can't distinguish them. You can't put a name on their faces. They are like ants for you. You only see the buildings. No wonder the masters never cared about the people. They didn't see them. All they saw were statues, columns and pyramids, all that to display their riches to the eyes of the world and to their eyes. And all the while, people suffered, and they didn't see it."

"Perhaps they saw it, but they didn't care," Daenerys suggested.

"Probably, too. It's difficult to care for ants. Do we?"

"No, but the people are not ants."

"No, they're not. You'll make a good queen, Daenerys Stormborn. I don't need visions in the fire to see it. What the people of Westeros will gain from you, those of the Bay of Dragons will lose."

"It's the end of slavery," Daenerys stated. "I fought so that no child born into Slaver's Bay would ever know what it meant to be bought or sold. But this is not my home. It's time for others to make sure that slavery never returns."

"There are good men and women who will fight for freedom after you've left, though it won't be easy. Lys, Myr, Lorath, Pentos, New Ghis… There are still many cities were slavery is practiced, but with the trade disrupted, Volantis on its knees and Braavos who is still the most powerful of the Free Cities and where slavery is banned, it will only be a matter of time before slavery disappears from most of the cities of Essos. Will it ever see you again?"

"Not before a long time."

That was strange for Daenerys. She had lived in Essos for about twenty years, and yet it had never felt like home, except when she was a child and she lived with Ser Willem Darry in the house with a red door. She would be home soon, her real home.

"I heard you're coming to Westeros with us," Daenerys said at the intention of the High Priestess.

"You heard well."

"May I ask why?"

Kinvara looked at her. "I must advise the queen, if she would have me."

"You've been a great help here in Meereen. I thought you'd stay."

"Zanrush will make a very good job, and although I don't trust him entirely, Moqorro is capable. Besides, I believe it's time for the word or R'hllor to reach the Seven Kingdoms. The priests who went there these last years did poorly."

"I have no wish to prevent any people from preaching their faith, but don't expect me to give you a special treatment or to force my people to follow your god."

"He's not my god. He's our god to us all, but you don't have to worry about me. R'hllor wants people to choose him and to follow him with a true faith. If I was to force people to follow him, they wouldn't have faith. It wouldn't be a choice and R'hllor is a choice."

"From what Lord Varys is telling me, there are fanatics in King's Landing who don't share your views about this when it comes to their own gods."

She heard the High Priestess muffle a chuckle. "If these Sparrows really read the Seven-Pointed Star, they would discover that the teachings of these gods are full of contradictions and incongruities. One of the texts tells a story about a general who promised to the Father that he would offer in sacrifice the first person he would see when he would get back home if he granted him the victory. The Father gave him what he asked for, but when the general went back home, the first person he saw was his daughter, his only child. He sacrificed her and the Father was overjoyed by this."

That didn't look like the things Viserys told her about the Seven. "You read the holy texts of the Seven?" Daenerys found it strange that a High Priestess of R'hllor read the Seven-Pointed Star.

"The Seven came from Essos at the origin. And how could you discuss with people if you don't understand them? How could you understand them if you don't understand their faith? Furthermore, the people who follow the Seven are looking for R'hllor. They're just looking at the wrong place, and they don't know exactly what they're looking for." She paused. "Even if I had no word to bring from the Lord, I must go to Westeros all the same. The great war yet to come is coming. You'll have to face your greatest enemy soon, Daenerys Stormborn."

Daenerys didn't care to ask. The High Priestess was often talking in strange terms and she didn't want to engage her on a religious discussion. Meereen was already full of priests talking of a great war yet to come, of Azor Ahai reborn, of a certain Great Other, and much more.

All in all, Daenerys wasn't displeased that Kinvara would come to Westeros. She had proved to be very useful while she was away from Meereen. Her priests and soldiers were vital in the keeping of the peace and the fights they had against the masters. And she had powers, just like the Undying. Daenerys didn't know where the powers of the red priests came from, nor did she know where dragons came from and why her eggs in stone hatched, but if the red priests were ready to help her, she would take it. Where she was going, she would need allies. So far, Kinvara's advices had proven very useful. She hoped they would remain so in a foreign land. Of the three people who arrived in Meereen in her absence, Daenerys trusted the High Priestess more than Trystane Martell or the Spider.

"A conspiracy of women, it seems. I do hope it's that and not the other thing I think it might be."

Daenerys turned to see Daario Naharis standing before her, brushing the pommel of his dagger displaying a naked woman. She turned to the High Priestess and silently ordered her to leave. The woman bowed and left the room, leaving Daenerys all alone with her captain.

"Your ships are nearly ready. I saw them painting the sails." He grabbed a cup of wine and poured himself a cup from the flagon. He was about to take a sip, then after a moment of hesitation poured another one and brought it to her, looking at her intently, smiling. "I'm curious to see how the Dothraki do on the poison water."

He took another sip, his eyes full of desire. Daenerys walked away for a moment. She couldn't look into his eyes, not now, or she might not find the courage to do it. She had delayed long enough. She had to do it now, or never. And she couldn't allow herself to never do it.

"You're not coming with us." She turned to look at him. There was some space between them, which was much better.

Daario frowned. "New strategy? You want the Second Sons to attack from the west coast? If we take Casterly Rock, the Lannisters will have nowhere to run when you hit King's Landing."

"You're not going to Westeros." She said it quickly. She wanted it to be over. It had to be done. "You're staying here with the Second Sons. There's finally peace in Meereen. You will keep the peace while the people choose their own leaders."

The captain of the Second Sons had no reaction for a moment. "Fuck Meereen. Fuck the people. I'm here for you, not them."

"You promised me. My sword is yours. My life is yours. This is what I command," she said, unflinching. Then she explained. "If I'm going to rule in Westeros, I'll need to make alliances. The best way to make alliances is with marriage."

Daario's face broke down as she spoke. He laid his cup down on the nearby table. Daenerys still had her own in hand. Her captain sighed. "Who are you marrying this time? This prince?"

"Maybe. I don't know. Maybe no one."

"I never thought you would marry this young fellow. You reassure me, but still… You need to lure all the noble houses to the table?" She didn't need to explain everything finally. "Are you a queen or fish bait?"

She looked at him. Fish bait? "I can't bring a lover to Westeros," she said, her voice hard.

"A king wouldn't think twice about it," he almost shouted.

"So that's what you want? To be my mistress?"

"I'm not proud. I don't care what perfumed aristocrat sits beside you in the throne room. I don't want a crown. I want you." He approached her very closely. "I love you. And I make you happy. You know I do. Bring me with you. Let me fight for you."

That was the first time Daario begged something from her. She didn't think it would turn out like this.
She placed her hand on his cheek. She had to do it. Now. There would be no turning back after this.

"I can't."

Daario turned away after a moment, then looked back at her. She wanted to tell him she was sorry, but what good would it do?

"Who told you to do this?"

"No one tells me to do anything," she replied.

"Was it Jorah the Andal? Or the eunuch? Or was it that priestess you talked with just before? Or this prince?" He waved his hand. "No matter. I can't argue with the logic. I'm no use to you over there."

"Don't get angry," Daenerys said softly.

"I'm not angry. I'm full of self-pity. Who comes after you? Who can ever follow Daenerys Stormborn, the Mother of Dragons?"

"A great number of women, I imagine." He cast his eyes down. They both knew each other too well. They knew they would both find someone else. They were not romantic people. "Specific orders will be left for you regarding the welfare of Meereen and the Bay of Dragons."

"Bay of Dragons?"

"We can't call it Slaver's Bay anymore, can we?"

Daario seized the cup he previously abandoned on the table. "You'll get that throne you want so badly, I'm sure of it. I hope it brings you happiness." He took a sip of wine. "I pity the lords of Westeros. They have no idea what's coming for them."

He had half a smile on his face. Perhaps she should tell him something else, but nothing came to her mind. "Farewell, Daario Naharis."

With a bow and a forced smile, the sellsword left. She would never see him again. It was done. She looked at her own cup and emptied it. She felt the wine going down through her throat, but except for the sour taste of it, she felt nothing. She said farewell to a man who loved her, a man she thought she cared for, and that was all she felt. She was just glad it was over and done.

"He seemed to take it quite well." The statement came from the High Priestess. She was back.

"You were eavesdropping?" Daenerys accused her.

"I only heard. You didn't forbid me to stay close."

This almost sounded like something the Spider would do. "I forbid you, in the future."

"As you wish, your Grace." She refused wine when Daenerys offered her some. "Are you afraid, your Grace?"

That was quite a personal question, but Daenerys was in no mood to sermon the woman. So she nodded to make it known that she was.

"There's nothing wrong with fear itself. The only mistakes we can make is to fear the wrong things."

"What do you fear?"
The High Priestess looked at her with a hollow face. "To fail."

"I thought the Lord of Light was with you."

"He is with everyone. And yet, everyone fails, one time or another."

They remained silent for a moment, the queen and the red priestess. Then Bhakaz appeared at the entrance. "Your Grace, Prince Trystane is asking for an audience with you."

She just sent away a lover and a possible betrothed now wanted to see her. "Tell him to wait in the audience chamber." Bhakaz left. She turned to the priestess. "Come with me."

The High Priestess followed her. The corridors of the Great Pyramid looked empty. Daenerys had reduced her personal guard to the minimum because of the preparations for their leaving and the reconstruction of the city. The Unsullied were needed all over the city. Furthermore, the resistance had crumbled after the defeat of the masters. Very few would try an attempt of assassination against her. On their way to the Hall, they came upon Ser Jorah.

"So, you did it?" he asked.

"I did," she replied a little too coldly.

"Look, I know… I'm sorry…"

"No, you're not."

She walked past him. Maybe she was unfair. Jorah had been right when he advised her to break up with Daario, but she knew very well he didn't advise her only for political goals. She knew her bear wasn't be unhappy to see the sellsword far away from them, and far away from her, while he stayed close.

Prince Trystane of House Martell was waiting in the audience chamber. He bent the knee when she entered. A ward was standing behind him, holding a box in his hands. He knelt as well. "Your Grace."

"Rise, Prince Trystane," she told him. The young man stood up as Daenerys sat on the ebony bench. It would probably be the last time she sat on it. "You wanted to see me?"

"Yes, alone if possible, if you allow me."

She knew who he was talking about. Kinvara was standing behind her, in retreat. "My advisors are welcomed to my audiences. All my advisors."

After a moment, he conceded. "As you wish, your Grace."

Ever since she arrived, Daenerys had kept a good distance with the Prince of Dorne. Despite Kinvara's and Malcolm's assurances, she didn't find his ruling of Meereen in her absence very brilliant, and she had suspicions about him because of that marriage contract. They had never been alone. Daenerys had to admit he was handsome in his own way, though a few years younger than her. Still, he couldn't compete with Drogo or Daario. He had come here because his father wanted him to marry her in exchange for Dorne's help in her quest of the Iron Throne. The fact she sent her lover away a few minutes ago didn't place her in good dispositions towards the prince.

"I think you may want to know that the ships my father sent are ready for the sailing," the prince said.
"I'm already aware of this." She meant that if he had nothing else to say, he could go now, instead of wasting her time.

The prince seemed to hesitate. "Your Grace, maybe that's not the right moment, but we both know why I'm here, why my father, Prince Doran Martell, sent me here. I think we ought to discuss it."

He didn't look as if he wanted to discuss about it. Daenerys found it queer.

"Prince Trystane, I will not waste your time. I'm not going to marry you." Surprise was plain on the young man's face. "Not yet. I will consider your father's offer concerning the joining of our houses, and once I take the Iron Throne, I will give you an answer, but only when I take the Iron Throne. A marriage between us would be useless if I didn't take my family's throne."

"Hmm, your Grace, my father offered…"

"I accept his alliance. Your father is already at war with the other kingdoms. I will help you and your kin, and bring you the vengeance you are looking for. I will destroy the Baratheon and Lannister usurpers and bring you justice for the crimes against your family. But we will not discuss a marriage between our two houses before I sit on the Iron Throne. You and your father will get your answer at this moment."

The boy was stammering. "My father will not like this, your Grace. For him, the marriage is part…"

"You claim that your father is loyal to my house, that he remained loyal to my house for the last twenty years and that he worked to bring down the usurpers all this time."

"Yes, your Grace."

"Then in this case, I expect your armies to fight alongside mine as loyal bannermen to my house, and I will make sure you are rewarded. I don't believe we need a marriage to ensure this alliance. If your father refuses to honor this alliance, then he cannot expect me to help you against your enemies. Furthermore, the contract that was signed years ago was about a marriage between me and Prince Quentyn Martell. There's nothing in that document concerning an union between you and me."

A moment passed. Finally, the prince nodded. "I think he will accept, your Grace. My father is loyal to House Targaryen."

"Good."

She didn't have to engage with Prince Trystane. Right now, the Martells needed her more than she needed them. She might need another alliance once in Westeros, and it wouldn't be easy to make one if she was already betrothed, and even more difficult if she was married. She had to keep her hand free for any possibility, and she didn't want to marry her again, not for now. But she would marry eventually, if this was for the benefit of her people. The prince didn't look very sad. All she could see on his face was resignation.

"Was there anything else?" she asked.

"Yes, there is, your Grace." The boy who waited behind him stepped forward. "This is a gift that my father is sending for you. I brought it with me from Dorne and waited for you to come back to offer it. I hope this will prove our loyalty."

Curious, Daenerys made a sign for the boy to advance. The box was small. It could barely have contained one of the dragon eggs Illyrio Mopatis gave to her.
"Open it," she ordered to the ward when he was close enough, but not too much. He opened the box.

Daenerys squinted her eyes first to see the content, shadows making it too difficult to discern. Then the boy inclined the box and light made what was inside shine. It was a circle made of steel, with big square-cut rubies all around. A crown. She ordered without a word to the boy to approach more and she took the crown. The steel didn't feel like any steel she ever held or touched. It was quite a simple crown, but obviously made of costly materials. She looked at the prince.

"What is it?"

"This is the crown that your ancestor, Aegon, wore when he was crowned King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar," he explained.

Daenerys stared at the crown, then looked again to the son of Doran Martell. "I thought this crown was lost."

"It was, your Grace, until recently. The crown was lost when Daeron the First invaded Dorne, one hundred fifty years ago. A man in service of one of my family's bannermen recuperated it when the king died and they kept it for the years that followed. My father discovered its existence and where it was a few years ago. He would have given it back to you, but you were no longer in Westeros, so he kept it at Sunspear. We believe it belongs to you now."

Daenerys studied the crown closely, turning it all around to see every detail. There were no frontside and no backside. It was identical no matter from where you looked at it. Her mother's crown that Viserys sold years ago had to be at least four or five times more massive than this one, and it was made of gold, not of steel. Viserys told her once that Aegon's crown had disappeared when he was killed by the Dornish, but he never told her what the crown looked like. And yet, she could feel it was this one. She didn't know how, but she knew this was the crown of Aegon the Conqueror. And she had it in her hands.

She placed it back into the box. "I will wear it proudly the day I seize the Iron Throne. But not before," she declared.

"Of course, your Grace."

"I thank you for your present, Prince Trystane, and for your services as well. You ruled the city while I was absent, and most of my advisors recognize you did very well." Grey Worm didn't. "I count on you to help me in Westeros as much as you did here in Meereen."

"You can rely on me, your Grace. House Martell will fight for you."

"Then I suppose it's time to leave."

Hours later, they were leaving the harbor and sailing for Westeros, the people of Meereen crying and begging her to stay. Daenerys regretted to leave them, but she had to. She was going home, at last. She was going home with an army, her three dragons roaring in the sky as they sailed for Westeros.

Chapter End Notes

For those who remember, Trystane placed something very precious in a box when he arrived in Meereen in his first chapter, Trystane I. Now you know what it was.

The song about Daenerys is a real song, "Mother of Flame", by Miracle of Sound. It can be found here: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gmJF9a7-g9c

The story Kinvara tells about the general sacrificing his daughter is a real episode from the Bible, the history of Jephthah's daughter (Judges 11, 29-40). My intent here is not to criticize religions or one religion in particular. I am a Christian myself. However, it shows us well what consequences can come out when fanatics follow blindly religious texts.

Please review

Next chapter: Margaery
Margaery VIII

Chapter Notes

A chapter for Margaery, to know how she's doing as a prisoner.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

MARGAERY VIII

You could hear the thunder outside, and the rain hitting the stone walls of the Great Sept of Baelor. Margaery shivered. She didn't fear the storm. She was only cold. She was afraid of many things, yes, but not the storm. She was afraid of the High Sparrow and the other Sparrows, and what they could do to her and Loras. Neither of them had yet confessed. Cersei had confessed and made her walk of atonement, but she was still to stand for trial. Margaery had felt a burst of delight when she learnt this, and the three pieces of white bread she was given for the occasion had made her day. Cersei had thrown her here, only to be thrown in a cell too, and now she was the one everyone saw for who she really was. Margaery hadn't been so happy in weeks when it happened.

However, joy quickly left place to worry again. Her situation was very precarious. She knew that Randyll Tarly was besieging the city now, and that it would starve very soon, but if he ever attacked it, Margaery knew very well what would be the last thing the Sparrows would do before they all died. They needed a rebellion among the Sparrows themselves, or from the people against the Sparrows, to hope for freedom. Surely there were secret passages under the Great Sept of Baelor to the Red Keep, or that led outside the city. If only Lord Varys was still with them, they could have used them. Though he may not have revealed their existence.

Water was dripping from the small opening at the top of one of the walls. Margaery was glad of it, truth be told. Water rain had allowed her to get rid of most of her dirt, and she felt cleaner than she had for weeks. She had never realized what it was to live like this, without baths regularly, or perfumes, or comfortable and warm clothes to cover you. She always felt pity for the poor, but she never truly understood what it was to live like them. Now she did, and she knew what it was to live in a way worse than theirs. Not only was she living in complete misery, but she was a prisoner. At least the people she helped were free. She wasn't.

She looked at her hands. There had been pus under the nail of one of her fingers for the last few days. She washed it first with the rain, but she knew it wouldn't be enough. She was also afraid for something else. She was afraid for someone else, aside from Loras. She hadn't bled at all for three months now. Why did it have to happen now? She felt tears come to her eyes. The moment she got the child she wanted, she was imprisoned by fanatics. Would they let her leave if she told them she was pregnant? She couldn't know for sure. She didn't even tell Yeten.

The septa was her only contact with the real world. She said she was Dornish, and Margaery could see from her accent and her physical appearance that it was the case, and that she wanted the same thing than her. Revenge and justice. When she was the one to bring her food, she always brought some more, hidden in her robes. She didn't mistreat Margaery like Unella when she came to make her the lecture of the Seven-Pointed Star. She said she couldn't help Margaery to escape right now. They would only make a few steps before they were arrested. They had to wait for a battle or another opportunity, when no one would notice them. They would have to free Loras at the same time. Margaery had to be patient and endure the fanatics who tried to make her confess. Yeten tried to make things more bearable for her. The septas woke her up every night, stopping her from sleeping long enough to recover. Yeten omitted to wake her sometimes, giving her a few opportunities to rest. She entered her cell and didn't get her out of sleep. Still, it was very difficult.
Margaery had to hold. She wouldn't confess crimes she didn't commit. She was raised in the Faith of the Seven, she believed in them, but she didn't think they wanted that from her. She never thought she was perfect, but she wasn't a monster either. She didn't deserve this, no more than Loras. Her family had tried to make Loras take an interest in women, many times, but there was nothing to do. It was like a disease. He wasn't responsible for that. He didn't control that. There were far worse crimes than a go beneath sheets between two men. Loras was arrogant, that was his main flaw, but if they were to imprison everyone who was arrogant, there wouldn't be much free people left. Joffrey had been a monster, there were killers all over Flea Bottom, and the Sparrows did nothing against them.
They didn't do the will of the gods. They wouldn't break her. She had to be strong, for her family.
She was a Tyrell.

Her door opened. The High Sparrow entered, in rags like always. Margaery wondered what had happened to Sorold. She had him named High Septon herself. He was a good man.

"You seem much better today, your Grace," the High Sparrow said. She still didn't know his name.
There was another crash of thunder.

"Rain helps to wash away the dirt," she said, not hiding what she did.

She remembered one day, a long time ago, she had to be no more than seven. There was a thunder like this outside. Loras was afraid and hid into a corner. To show him there was nothing to fear, she went out in the godswood with her cousins and her friends, under the rain, without anything to protect them from it but the clothes on their shoulders. She wanted to show her brother that it was only rain, and that the sounds they heard were harmless. They all danced, walls of water falling over them. Some climbed to the trees. After a moment, Loras had shyly joined them, and a few minutes later he was playing with them, as if there was no storm at all. He had forgotten there was one. They ended throwing mud at each other. It didn't stay long on their skin. They only had to scrub it with water. However, their clothes were ruined at the end of the day. Their lady mother had been furious, and she had good reasons to be. Margaery and Loras both caught a cold, despite the hot bath they took immediately when they came inside.

She thought about her brother. Was he thinking about it right now? Did he even remember? He was only five or four back then. Did he think about the times he ended on the ground, all muddy and stinking, when he first began to train with Ser Vortimer, their master-at-arms in Highgarden? How was he? Yeten assured her he was alive and still in his cell, and as well as she was.

"Yes. When we have nothing, we must resort to that kind of things," said the old man.

"This is not the first time I do it."

"Really?"

"No, but most of the time at Highgarden, we bathed all together in the Mander. I did it very often when I was a child. People from all the surroundings came to let their children bathe in the river.
There was no difference between us, highborn or lowborn, rich or poor. It didn't matter there that I was the daughter of the Lord of Highgarden. I was just a child like all the others."

The High Sparrow smiled. This was a true story, but she doubted he would let her go for that. Still, it could help. He sat on a nearby stool.
"We are all equal in the face of the Seven. They made us to their image. We all have some of them in us. The Father, the Mother, the Warrior, the Smith, the Maid, the Crone, and the Stranger of course. Have you ever wondered why the Stranger is the only one of the Seven without a face?"

"Both men and women have the evil inside of them. Book of the Stranger, verse 34."

"True." He looked impressed. "It seems Septa Unella and Septa Yeten did their work well. But that's not the only reason. The reason is that evil cannot be seen by the eye. It's hidden, under our skin, under our flesh. There's evil and sin in each of us. Sin leads us away from the sacred. And only confession can purge sin."

"If you have come to order me to confess, you're losing your time. Septa Unella does it with a ladle of water every day and she got nothing from it. Only wasted water that could have been given to the poor. I have nothing to confess."

He nodded. "I'm sorry for Septa Unella's behavior. She can be overzealous at times. I'll speak with her. But do you believe you are pure? Perfect? Wholly without sin?"

She shook her head. She never thought she was perfect. She wasn't Cersei. "None of us are."

"You have started down the path. But you have many miles to go. If I were to let you leave right now, where would you go? What would you seek out?"

She needed no time to know where she would go. "I'd go to my brother, my family. My husband," she added after a moment. She missed Tommen. She was worried about Loras, but she worried about him too. And about Sera, and all her friends and cousins at the Red Keep. Tommen had done nothing wrong. He wasn't a monster like Joffrey. And he was probably alone with Cersei now. Who knew what she could be whispering in his ear at this very moment? She hoped Lord Selwyn Tarth had enough good sense to shut her behind closed doors until she faced her trial.

"Of course, but for you, that means seeking out money, finery, power. Seeking out your family means seeking out sin."

Maybe, but she hadn't thought about this when she said that. All she wanted was to be reunited with those she loved. That was all that mattered for her right now. Later, she would worry about money, finery and power.

"I'm not maligning you," resumed the old man. "I sought those things out, too."

"All of us do, sooner or later, at one moment of our life," Margaery replied.

"You're right. We are like this. The gods gave us freedom, and with freedom comes sins. We wouldn't know what a sin is if we didn't have it in us at the start. We're all tempted, all the time, from the king to the beggar in the streets. And that's why we must all confess. Your husband misses you dearly, you know. The love between a man and wife is sacred. It reflects the love the gods have for all of us. Confession sets us free."

"I thought the gods made us all free."

He chuckled. "They did, but sin makes prisoners of us all."

She had nothing to gain from arguing with that man. Maybe the High Sparrow looked like a sympathetic old man at first sight, but he was still a fanatic who believed he had the truth about everything, even though he didn't realize it himself. He and Cersei were more alike than both of them would like to admit.
The High Sparrow stood up. "I'll let you time to meditate and pray about it. Your Grace."

Margaery was alone again in her cell. Maybe she should have told him that she was pregnant. Maybe that would have been a reason sufficient enough to set her free, but she couldn't be sure. She could be sure of nothing. If all this kept going on the same way, she wasn't sure the child would survive. She had to take a decision, and quickly. She had to think about her son or her daughter.

She remained in the darkness for a very long time, with the the sound of rain and thunder as companions. Was it raining too in Highgarden right now? Was it raining or snowing in Winterfell? Sansa was certainly there now, and Mira too. Surely the Boltons had fallen. Her friend had managed to free her husband when he stood for trial. Maybe Sansa could help her if she was there. At least, if she had been at Casterly Rock, she could have received the news of her imprisonment and she would have come to her help. Margaery and Sansa were friends, and allies. They both helped each other, and a Lannister always pays her debts. Her husband knew some of the secret passages under the city. He had held King's Landing on the brink of uprising and used one of these passages to attack Stannis's army from behind at the Battle of Blackwater. He would have known what to do with these Sparrows, and surely he would have known a way to rescue her. Or Ser Kevan would have come out with a solution. To the opposite of Cersei, they knew they needed the Tyrells to remain in power. But Lord Tyrion and Sansa were far away in the North, and Ser Kevan was dead. Her allies were all outside the city. She was all alone. She could only rely on herself.

She dozed off. You became tired so easily in this cell. She was in a dark place, a very dark place, but it wasn't a dreadful place like her cell or a dungeon. There were torches hanging from pillars, all lit up. The ground under her bare feet was made of sand and rock. Before her was a vast pool, or something that looked like it. It was a great body of water, more than large enough for dozens of people to easily swim in it. She could see stalactites and stalagmites all over and around the pool.

Her shoes laid next to her. She had removed them. She removed her gown, then her smallclothes as well, then unbraided her hair. She felt it fall in curls behind her back and over her shoulders, covering her breasts. The place was warm, and she could feel a soft breeze run all over her skin, tickling between her legs, under the laps of her arms, on the region under her chin, in the space between her ears and her head, between her fingers, between her toes. She slowly walked to the pool, sand and pebbles crunching under her bare feet, until the left one sunk into the dark water. A pleasant chilly sensation reached the extremity of her toes as sand filled the spaces between. The right feet sunk next to the first. She kept going forward, water submerging her ankles, her knees, her thighs, her entire legs, her hips, her tummy… She realized it was bigger than usual. Smiling, she resumed her path, always forward. Her breasts, her arms and hands, her ribs, her shoulders, her neck followed under the water, until only her face emerged. She waved her arms and legs to remain at the surface, then dipped her head into the water.

Water was surrounding her. It was cold, but no different from the water in the rivers and lakes of the Reach. She opened her eyes, and could see nothing. It was complete darkness. Her hair was dangling all around her face. She pushed with her legs and feet and came back to the surface, pushing aside her hair that fell on her eyes. She breathed deeply and laid on her back, letting the water carry her, her eyes closed. The tip of her head hit something hard. It was a column with stalagmites around the base. She swam away, feeling at peace as she travelled from one end of the pool to the other.

She came back on the shore. There were a few towels laid on the ground. She rested her back on them, letting the water roll on her immobile body, covering her eyes with her arm to not let the light of the torches bother her. It was an intimidating place from some perspective, and yet a pleasant one, where she was alone, safe, quiet. You could hear the thunder over your head but you knew you were safe here. She looked again at the dark water, wondering how deep the bottom was. Why not try to find out? There was a natural platform not far away, about four or five meters over the pool. She went there, and jumped from it. Water flew all around her when she hit the surface. She heard it. She sunk deep, without touching the ground. She came back at the surface, took a deep breath, then dived again. She kept going down, deeper and deeper. Finally, her hand touched something. She felt sand as she rubbed the surface, but as she kept tossing the sand away, she realized that under, the surface was smooth, yet solid. She couldn't see anything with the darkness around her. Keeping her breath began to be difficult. She gave herself a good push with her legs on the ground and swam with all the energy she could muster to come back to the surface. She let go the air in her lungs. There was a troubled light ahead. She had to reach it. Her strokes became more desperate. She had to reach the light.

She woke up, her breathing jerky. That was only a dream. She realized a thin water net was falling on her head. Her throat was dry. She couldn't ask for water. They wouldn't bring her anything, unless she confessed and even then... She leaned her head from behind and let the water fall into her mouth. To be true, it was better than the tepid one they gave her every day with black bread. When she had satiated her thirst, she went to the heavier waterfall from the opening and washed again the dirt off her hands, arms, legs and face. Better to use it while she had it. There weren't storms like this every day. Another thunder crashed.

The door was unlocked and opened to reveal Yeten. Again, she had a plate with only a black piece of bread and a cup of lukewarm water. Margaery highly doubted it was fitting to be drunk, but if she didn't drink it, she would die of thirst. She first ate the bread, and Yeten gave her a second one when it was over, like she always did. She dipped her head in silent thanks. When she brought the cup at her lips, she almost choked. The water was fresh. The Dornish girl smiled.

Margaery whispered as low as she could. "Thank you."

Once it was all over, the septa, or whoever she was since Margaery couldn't be sure that she was actually a septa, produced an exemplary of the Seven-Pointed Star. She began to read aloud, in a very clear voice.

"The Seven Hells brim with the souls of saintly men. They scream in agony and their shame is so great, they do not feel the flames, for now they see if not for a single sin they concealed, they were saved."

"I'd like to see my brother," Margaery said. She always asked the same question every time.

"Confess." Yeten added in a barely audible whisper, "he's still alive, and well."

"Please. How is he? At least tell me that." That meant she wanted to know more.

"Confess," the septa said on a harder tone, before adding in another whisper that only Margaery could hear. "The city is starving. People are openly talking of rebellion."

She turned a page and began to read again. Margaery let some time go. Then she spoke again. "I am the queen and I demand to see my brother."

"Sinners don't make demands. They make confessions."

She closed her book with a great sound, then hit it hard with the palm of her hand. Margaery emitted a wail, to make everyone believe she was stroke. Yeten knelt and whispered once more, lower than ever.

"It won't be long now. Cersei's trial is next week. We will have our revenge soon. Everything is planned. Be ready to escape at this moment."

She hit the book again, and Margaery made another wail. She and Yeten couldn't stop from exchanging a smile, and Margaery would have laughed out loud if she wasn't afraid that the fraud would be discovered. Oberyn Martell had been a friend of Loras. They both had particular tastes, and Margaery suspected they spent more than one night together, and maybe not alone together. Dorne and the Reach may have had a long history of war and violence, but now her best chance for escape was a Dornish woman. They both wanted the same thing. Another lightning followed by another crash of thunder, more powerful than the previous.

Yeten started again to read aloud. She couldn't be sure about the septa, but she had no choice. She was her only chance. She said that she would help two days after Margaery was imprisoned, and without her the hell she was going through now would be far worse.

She resigned herself to listen to the Seven-Pointed Star all over again. This time, it was the Book of the Maid. Certain passages should have made all the High Septons through history redden if they hadn't ignored what they really said. Perhaps they didn't and kept these passages for this reason. In one week, Margaery would be free. She had to hold until Cersei stood trial. Another thunder crash was heard.

Chapter End Notes

I like very much this character and writing about her, so getting in her head while she is in a cell was something I enjoyed, despite her difficult situation. After all, this is the first time Margaery actually finds herself in a difficult situation and where she can only rely on herself, so this offers a new perspective on the person.

Please review

Next chapter : Jaime
JAIME VI

Rain was falling heavily on his armor, bouncing on it, making its way through the steel and under his helmet. Thunder kept crashing regularly. His clothes underneath were all wet. It was almost impossible to discern anything. The rain was no better than a thick fog and you could barely distinguish the Red Keep and the Great Sept of Baelor through it. Jaime could have retreated under the safety and warmth of his own pavilion. Genna had dispatched five hundred men to King's Landing after he asked her for help. That was all they could spare. The rest was for the invasion of the Iron Islands, strangely aborted for the time being, or in the North. Tyrion, where are you when we need you the most? Tyrion would have found a way to break the siege and to rescue the queen and her brother without killing them, or their lord father would have found a way. Instead, they stood there for weeks like chumps, waiting for the Sparrows to starve so much that they would give in, or that the people of the city would rebel against them.

Jaime hated waiting. He hated it when he kept guard for Robert, he hated it when he was a prisoner for the Starks, he hated it when he besieged Riverrun. That was why he had run to Robb Stark's vanguard when they attacked at the Whispering Wood, and that was how he got caught. Later, his father blamed him for his impatience and his foolish actions that cost them an entire army. Tyrion would have done no such thing. He would have set a trap for the enemy, or let him advance to reveal his strategy, or found a way to fight him on favorable grounds. Jaime just ran into battle, not thinking of the consequences.

Randyll Tarly was a man of war, and you could see it. Jaime never saw such a disciplined army. Even the Lannister army paled in comparison. More, although the man was harsh, he was fair as well. He punished his men with severity, but only when they committed crimes. Jaime could understand why his men were following him. He inspired both respect and fear, just like his father. Jaime, on the other hand, could inspire none. The five hundred men he had under his command followed him because he was the brother of the Lord of Casterly Rock and Lord Tywin's son, nothing more. He couldn't inspire anything as a commander or as a soldier. He had lost his right hand. Everything he was had gone. Only his family name survived. He didn't have Tyrion's mind to help him. His little brother had succeeded to escape the Starks and the Arryns. Jaime had needed his help and Catelyn Stark's will to see her daughters again to be free, and without Brienne he would never have made it to King's Landing.

Couldn't something happen? He would give his other hand for a fight, anything. Cersei was somewhere in the Red Keep. It was the only place in the city where the Tyrell and Lannister banners still hung. The Seven-Pointed Star was everywhere else, on the battlements, over the gates and hanging from the Great Sept. They were close, and yet he couldn't reach her.

He raged from the inside. Why was he helping her at all? He had never been with anyone else than Cersei, while he knew that her… She fucked their cousin, Lancel Lannister, and after he came back, she rejected him, tried to have their little brother murdered, and who knew what else she did. Why did he still love her? He always thought there was something special between him and Cersei, ever since they were born, a natural bond that linked them together for life. Now he began to wonder if this bond had ever existed. When it was believed that she would marry Rhaegar Targaryen, Cersei had kept her distance from him, only to come back after the Mad King outright refused their father's offer. When she was betrothed to Robert Baratheon, she put an end to their relationship, to come back again when Robert turned out to be a drunken fool in love with a dead body. He had thought she came back to him every time because they were destined to be together, but now he wondered if that was only a fantasy of him. He thought Tyrion was the dreamer of the family, asking a dragon for his name day, but now… Jaime had joined the Kingsguard, the highest rank a knight could aspire to, only to find out the kingsguards were mostly here to stand by while kings laughed, drank, tortured and murdered. He came to King's Landing hoping to spend more time with Cersei, only to discover that their father resigned as Hand and left with his sister as soon as he learned that his heir was stolen from him. He came back to King's Landing after his captivity, hoping to reunite with Cersei, and she only pushed him aside. Who was the one dreaming in their shit family?

Still, Jaime was there, ready to fight to save his sister. He didn't know why. Would Cersei try to save him, if their roles were reversed? Tyrion would. He did, when Jaime was a prisoner. But Cersei? How many times had Jaime done something for her and their children, and when was the last time she did something for him? Jaime couldn't remember. His eyes fell on his golden hand. Now he remembered, but that didn't bring him much joy.

He shivered. Another thunderbolt. He decided to go back to his tent. He had to keep his forces for the upcoming battle, if there was any. Inside, his squire helped him to remove his armor. Jaime couldn't even put it on by himself. Damn this Locke. If he ever met him again… What would he do? Knock him out with his golden hand? Even Tyrion would have more chance to kill him than Jaime now. He heard his little brother fought quite courageously at Blackwater. Once he got rid of his set of armor, he warmed up his fingers over the fire.

"What's your name?" he asked to his squire. He never thought about asking him up to now. He always called him squire.

"Torrhen of House Musgood, ser."

"Musgood? You must be good at something, then."

"I'm quite capable as a squire, ser."

"Where are you from?"

"Musgood Hall, in the Stormlands, ser."

"Not very imaginative with names, your family."

"I don't know, ser."

He wasn't very talkative, this one. "Do you have family?"

"I have a sister, my lord. She's my twin."

"I also have a twin. She just made a walk of shame, naked before everyone in the city." The men who assisted to it were not the first to see her without clothes. Surely they called her the Whore Queen as she walked through the streets.
"A shame, ser." The thunder was heard again.

"Yes, a shame." Jaime wondered what he would have done if he had been there. "And your sister, where is she?"

"She's a septa, ser."

"A septa? I pity her."

"My father had no dowry to give her a marriage."

"If only the same had been true for mine." She would have had no one but him.

"If you say so, ser."

Did he think he and Cersei laid together countless times? That wouldn't surprise Jaime. The whole Realm knew about it. "Do you think my sister deserved what happened to her?"

"It's not my place to judge a queen, ser."

"I'm not asking for judgement about the queen. I'm asking about your opinion."

"Is it possible to give our opinion on the Queen Mother without judging her?"

Jaime gave a sigh. "You're free to judge her for this time. You can criticize her, even curse her if you want. I want your opinion, no matter what this is."

The young man hesitated. Another lightning followed by another terrible sound came from the outside. The young man had to be around eighteen. "King Robert was my family's liege lord. We were bannermen for him, his father before him and their fathers before for hundreds of years. We served them loyally. And… knowing that she probably killed him, and that she laid with her cousin… I don't approve the Sparrows, but I think the Queen Mother had it coming."

Jaime nodded. "Do you think I had it coming me too, for my hand?" He raised the golden one to make it clear.

"You killed your king, ser." There was no accusation in his voice. He only stated a fact.

"I did. You know, we blame my sister for fucking my dear nephew and perhaps killing her husband, but we never blame Robert for the death of Rhaegar's children, or his wife, or for the order he gave to have the two other children of the Mad King killed. One was only a baby at the time. We never blame him for shaming his queen all the time. I was his kingsguard for years, and every day, he would shame her. He liked to do it when I was on duty. Sometimes, I tried to guess how many they were, inside his rooms. I would count seven different women leaving by the door, and I would still hear his Grace shouting and at least one more woman moaning. We never talk about it, but we talk about my sister's infidelity at length."

The squire said nothing. He was only staring at Jaime.

"What would your sister say? Must only women remain faithful, or should the husband be as well?" Jaime asked.

"Normally, yes, ser."

"Normally," Jaime echoed. "How often does it happen? You know, my brother used to be like our king. Drinking all the time, visiting brothels day and night, gambling, making bawdy jokes… But when he got married, not anymore. Almost. Why? Why would someone who had so much taste for brothels and women stopped within a single night, all that because he was married?"

A moment of silence passed. "Perhaps he was only looking for love."

Jaime looked back at the squire. "That's probably the most clever thing you said today. I'm going out for a piss now."

He patted the young man's shoulder, grabbed a cloak and left his tent. Rain welcomed him outside. He pulled the hood over his head. No one would recognize him without his kingsguard armor, or so he hoped. He still had the golden hand. He went to the woods and there relieved himself, managing to keep his breeches up enough to not get them all muddy. As the yellow liquid fell on the ground, he heard the thunder behind him. It hit several times. It wasn't the first time it happened today, that several crashes of thunder happened almost at the same time.

Jaime managed to bring back his breeches in place despite his useless hand. Tarly may be right. It would be more useful if he sold it. He walked back into the camp, among the red tents. The Lannisters were stationed near the Iron Gate, close to Rhaenys's Hill and the Dragonpit. The Tarly men were watching the other gates. Jaime was about to enter into his tent when something caught his attention. He looked at the city. He had the impression something was shining. As Jaime walked towards a nearby hill to see what it was, one of his men ran into him.

"Gone? What do you mean gone?"

"It's no longer there. It was… destroyed."

"Destroyed? But how?" Jaime didn't understand.

"I don't know, ser. I never saw something like that. One moment it was there, then there was a great flash of green. It blinded us all. When we looked back, the sept was gone."

This made no sense. Wait, a flash of green! "Is there fire in the city?"

"Yes, ser."

"And the flames? Are they green as well."

"Yes, I think so."

No, that couldn't be. Burn them all. How…? "Go and find Lord Tarly. Tell him what you saw and tell him we're attacking the city."

"Ser?"

"Go now! We have no time to lose."

The soldier didn't have to be told the same twice. Jaime summoned the five hundred men he had with him and positioned them for battle. It took time. Some of them weren't wearing their armors already, just like him, and the rain made it difficult to organize the troops. None of that would have been an obstacle for his father or Randyll Tarly. When the men were all assembled, Jaime was about to deliver a speech when the soldier he sent to Tarly camp came back.

"Ser, Lord Tarly forbids you to attack."
"What?" Jaime shouted, right in front of all his men. Did he hear well? Maybe he misheard the words because of the thunder over their heads.

"He says we're to wait. We're not to enter the city until further instructions are given."

_Damn, what's the meaning of this? "Are you telling me Tarly is going to do nothing?"

"Well, he made his men charge while he sent me away, ser."

"Tarly is taking the city, and he doesn't want us to join? Is that what you're telling me?"

"He said we are to remain behind, ser. As a reserve."

That was an outright lie. Tarly didn't trust the Lannisters, that was all. He didn't want the men of the Westerlands to fight side by side with his own. He made it clear that he didn't trust them during the last days. The Lord of Horn Hill was certain now that Cersei was behind Ser Loras and Queen Margaery's arrest. The worse was that Jaime knew it was quite possibly the truth.

"Ser Lantell," Jaime shouted to a man behind him. The knight in question rode to him. "Go with ten men as close to the walls as you can and tell me if you see anything. Any trap, any defender on the battlements, anything suspicious."

"Yes, ser."

The little group of horsemen went away and Jaime waited. Once more, he waited. He had no way to know how things were going inside the city. Was Tarly winning the fight? He didn't think the Sparrows had the means to face the disciplined army of the Reach. He hadn't disobeyed Tarly's orders. Not yet. He only sent a few men as scouts. He couldn't see anything on the walls from where he was. The rain made the visibility too low. These men could even provide a distraction and prevent any resistance near the Iron Gate to send reinforcements elsewhere in the city. His men returned a few minutes later, all dirty and muddy, but alive and without even a trace of injury.

"The walls are undefended, ser. There's no one over there," the Lantell knight told him as a report. The mud on them was only a consequence of the watery terrain. Jaime took a decision. They had to find Cersei.

"All right, men. Bring forth the battering ram. Let's take back this city."

His voice was barely heard among the heavy rain falling all around and the thunder crashing, but when he raised his sword the men followed him. The ram was slow in the muddy ground. Jaime sent forward a few men on foot to see if the gates could be opened without a ram.

Another thunder. Many more thunders. Green lights arose before them, coming from inside the city. Then a great blow from the gate right before them sent Jaime off his horse. He fell, his face first in the mud as a strident sound pierced his ears. He looked back at the city and saw blocks flying everywhere. Green flames were visible before him. The Iron Gate was gone. New blows took place as other pans of the battlements disappeared. _Burn them all._ That couldn't be. He had thought about it, when he heard how the Great Sept disappeared, but he didn't really believe this was actually going to happen. He looked all around him. His men had all been thrown away just like him, and the horses were running all around in panic, gone in every direction without anyone to control them.

He got on his feet and went running into the city. Some stones on the ground before the walls were on fire. _Wildfire is so powerful that it can burn stone_, he remembered Rossart saying, a devilish look in his eyes. He got through the remnants of the gate and saw the devastation inside. The city was in flames. The rain seemed unable to put out the fires. Jaime ran through the streets, not caring about the people whose paths he crossed. He only had one thing in mind. Cersei.

He arrived at the main square in the center of the city and saw there that the Great Sept of Baelor was gone without any doubt. He saw a bell that seemed to have crushed a few houses when it flew around, and other debris everywhere. He saw a man with the huntsman on his armor lying on the ground, his face covered by blood. Some of Tarly's men had made it up to here. He then looked east and thought he saw the Red Keep through the rain that clouded his eyes. From there, he had the impression the castle could be damaged. He followed the paved road to it, meeting many people who were calling for help or running away, but again he paid no attention to them. When he finally reached Aegon's Hill, he thought that finally the Red Keep wasn't touched by the fires. It looked intact when you were closer. He climbed the hill until he arrived before the gatehouse. It was closed and the bridge leading to it was raised. Jaime saw men over it.

"OPEN THE GATE!" he shouted with all the force of his lungs.

"Who are you?" he heard one of the guards replied.

"Ser Jaime Lannister. Open the damn gate!"

"It's the truth!" Jaime realized someone stood next to him. It was Ser Lantell who spoke. He and a few of his men had followed him, or perhaps they just came to the Red Keep by different ways.

"Open the gate!" shouted someone from inside the battlements.

The bridge was lowered, and then the portcullis was lifted, too slowly for Jaime's taste. He ran inside to find a man with the Tyrell arms waiting.

"Where is my sister?" Jaime asked immediately.

"She's inside Maegor's Holdfast, ser, but…"

Not letting the man explain anything more, Jaime ran forward. The same operation than when he arrived at the gatehouse of the Red Keep took place with the gatehouse of Maegor's Holdfast. When he finally was inside, Jaime ran to go into the castle, but as he climbed the steps to the holdfast, he stumbled on something. Cursing, he looked at what it was. A body. A body with a crown laying next to it.

It was the body of a young boy with fine clothes, face against the ground. The neck was obviously broken, twisted in an awkward position, and so was one of the arms. There was blood all around. Jaime got on his knees, looking at the lifeless form before him. Someone was shaking him by the shoulder, but he paid no attention. The arm left him alone after a moment. Slowly, Jaime turned the body and looked at the face. It was a bloody mess, but there was no mistake when it came to the hair. He had the same blond hair than his mother, and his father. A new thunder resonated in the air as a lightning illuminated the scene and allowed Jaime to see clearly the color of the boy's eyes. He had his eyes.

He didn't know how long he remained there, on his knees, under the rain, looking at his son. A son he never felt like he was his son. A son who never had a real father. Now he was dead. Did Jaime feel something about it? He couldn't say. What could have happened for that to come? Shivering, probably from the rain, he took the boy under his legs and arms, and raised his body. He was easy to carry, even with a golden hand. There was no one around. Cersei had to be inside. He walked there.

His feet brought him without thinking to the Throne Room. He thought he saw a few bodies on the floor as he progressed through the corridors he used so often before. When he arrived before the Throne Room, the doors were wide open. He saw a Lannister, his back turned on him, cut the throat of someone he held prisoner. When the prisoner fell on the floor, his eyes met Jaime's. He seemed to be in his fifties. He had a quarterly sigil on his arms, two yellow suns on a rose field and two white crescents on a blue field. His eyes were blue, a blue Jaime knew only too well. They looked at Jaime as life left his body.

When Jaime looked up, the man in crimson had stepped aside and Cersei was standing before him, her hair unusually short and looking triumphant, a hugely satisfied smile on her lips. As she looked at Jaime and the inanimate body in his arms, the smile faded away from her face.

Chapter End Notes

The scale of the explosion was much larger than in the show. In fact, from what Jaime saw, a large part of the city might have been destroyed here. The reasons for that will be highlighted in a future chapter.

I will take another break of "A Shadow and a Wolf". I have two chapters left to upload next week, then I will wait for July to post again. The reason is simple: I am in the last round of my Master in Economics and I have a lot of work to do, with my thesis to write. I just have no choice, too much work. I'll be back, don't worry. And Tyrion will meet his daughter before I take my break. :)

Please review

Next chapter : Tyrion
Chapter Notes

Just before you read this chapter, you must consider that it takes place very shortly after the events of last chapter. The news of the catastrophe in King’s Landing didn't reach Winterfell yet.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

TYRION XXVII

We will need additional food stocks to last through winter. We can bring some from the Westerlands, but that won't be enough for our needs. With the Riverlands spent, we will need the other kingdoms to contribute. The winter that is coming will be the longest in living memory.

"You could listen to me when I talk," said an angry voice. Tyrion didn't avert his attention from the letter he was writing, just like his father used to. It was much more satisfying to use it against someone than to suffer it yourself. He heard what the man before him told him, but he wasn't about to make as if he gave any concern to his complaints.

"I hear what you say, Lord Arryn," Tyrion replied, not lifting his gaze from the parchment.

"Then you could act as if you did, in the least."

"Why? Does it hurt your pride?"

"I am the Lord Protector of the Vale!"

"My father would say that any man who must say I am the Lord Protector of the Vale is no Lord Protector of the Vale."

"Be careful about what you say, Imp." His tone was sharp, but Tyrion wasn't hurt by the nickname. He had made it his own a long time ago. No one could hurt him with it.

"And I would be careful about what I do if I were you, Ser Hardyng."

"I am a lord!"

"And any man who must say he is a lord is no true lord."

He stood up abruptly as Tyrion was done writing the letter to his nephew. "If you think I'll stand here and take this from you, dwarf."

That brought Tyrion old memories. "The last time someone talked to me this way, I sent him to the Wall and Jon Snow executed him after he refused to obey his orders."

"Are you threatening me?"

"No, I'm just reminiscing." He folded the letter.

"You think that because you're the Lord of Casterly Rock you can do as you like? That everyone must do as you say because your father had people murdered during a wedding?"
"Well, not really. But I do think that when Jon Snow, Ser Brynden Tully, Ser Davos Seaworth, the wildling leaders, the river lords, my own commanders and myself agree that you should pack your things and go back to the Vale, then you should pack your things and go back to the Vale."
"I brought ten thousand men with me here. They came to fight for the freedom of the North."
"And I brought over fifteen thousand with me, and they actually fought for the North. They bled and rolled in the mud for the North. Have your men done so?" Tyrion stamped the letter with his seal. "We don't need you here in the North, Lord Arryn. We can free it without your help."
"Free it? All you want is to take the North for yourself. Everyone knows it."
"No, that's what you believe I want." Tyrion took another piece of parchment and started writing another message for the garrison of the Dreadfort. "My brother-in-law and Ser Brynden Tully don't seem to share your opinion, as do many lords of the Riverlands. Perhaps you think I fooled them all?"
"That's exactly what I believe."
"Then you're even more a fool than I thought."
A sword was drawn and the end was at an inch from Tyrion's face. He had to look up this time. "All right. Let's solve this with steel."
Bronn slammed the door open and came into the room along with four more men, their swords unsheathed as well. "Very well, boy. Drop that sword of yours and cause no trouble," Bronn warned, his own sword on the back of Harrold Arryn.
"I'm not a boy. I'm a lord."
"A lord who takes up his sword and threatens another lord at the first insult," Tyrion commented. "This is how a boy behaves, but not a lord."
"You wouldn't dare to speak this way if you faced me in the courtyard with steel in your hand."
"And you wouldn't dare to speak to me this way if you weren't the Lord of the Eyrie. But who are you really, Harrold Arryn? Until recently, your name was Harrold Hardyng and you were a ward to Lady Anya Waynwood. You are unmarried, but you already have two bastards from two different women. You won your knighthood in a small melee against other squires at Runestone two years ago, won the tourney for the Brotherhood of Winged Knights and became Lord of the Eyrie at this moment because Robin Arryn died in strange circumstances before the tourney was over, and because there was no one else in his family to succeed him. You never fought on a battlefield, nor commanded an army in war, and you never ruled anything since you left the Vale at the moment you became its Lord Protector. We have no need of green boys here in the North."
"You can speak. You are a dwarf," the young lord spat, as if that meant something. He kept pointing his sword at Tyrion's face.
"I fought at the Battle of the Green Fork and the Battle of Blackwater. I served as Hand of the King, then as Master of Coin, and then I ruled the Westerlands for almost a year. I led three sieges, one at Riverrun, one at Moat Cailin and one at Castle Cerwyn, each of them were successful, and commanded my men at the Second Battle of Winterfell, which we won. I led thousands of men into the North through the Neck with minimum losses. I even killed a man of the mountain clans, saving Lady Catelyn Stark in the process, and I killed him with a shield. Have you ever tried to kill a man who was attempting to kill you, boy? Have you ever participated to a real battle? Don't talk to me about the tourneys you took part to, it doesn't count. This is jousting, not war, and this is men of war we need here. You are not a man of war. You're nothing but a boy trying to prove himself and the world that he's a man. Even some of your bannermen agree that you should go back home, boy."

The young Lord of the Eyrie was red of anger, and Tyrion knew he had nothing to reply to everything he just heard. It was all true.

"Now," Tyrion resumed, "put that sword away and go back to your home behind your mountains to play the chivalric knight while we try to bring peace in the North."

"A peace you broke, when you had Robb Stark killed at the Red Wedding," the lord countered, seething.

"If you want to continue to look at the past, then so be it, but I had nothing to see with the events at the Twins. Keep thinking the contrary if you want, but you will believe something untrue then. The North requires my attention."

"So you can control it. I won't allow you to do so. You are not the Lord of Winterfell."

"Nor do I pretend to be. But my wife, the Lady Sansa, is the Lady of Winterfell and I intend to protect her interests the best I can."

"Protect her interests?" The Lord of the Eyrie scoffed. "You forced her to marry you. You forced yourself upon her and put a child in her belly. A child she never wanted."

It was useless to argue with that cunt. "Time for you to leave, boy. If you refuse to, my friends here will make you do."

"I'm not over with you yet." As soon as he said the words, Tyrion made a sign of head to Bronn who seized Harrold Arryn by the neck and slammed his head hard against the desk. Tyrion heard a crack, and ducked under the desk just in time to avert the swing of the young man's sword. There were sounds of a very short battle, and when it died off, Tyrion looked at the scene where Harrold Arryn was rolled over the ground, obviously in pain at the level of his balls.

"Hit him with my knee there. I don't think he will father new bastards before some time," said Bronn.

The men behind chuckled at Bronn's jape, though Tyrion didn't find it funny as much as he would have liked. "Take him away to his camp. Tell the Knights of the Vale what happened," Tyrion ordered to his men. The four took the Lord of the Eyrie by the arms and escorted him outside the solar.

"You could have gone easier," he said to Bronn when they were gone. "It's the Lord of the Eyrie."

"Well, there wasn't really another way. And the lad is a cunt." Tyrion thought the same. "Almost everyone despises him here. Even the northern lords who plotted against you find him insufferable."

"Who wouldn't?" A couple of fair maids to who he spoke in an entirely different manner, Tyrion supposed. Well, with his broken nose, the fair maids may think twice before following him to bed. "Maybe that will teach him some humility."

Bronn shrugged, unconvincing. "There's no cure for being a cunt."

Tyrion sighed. There was blood on his desk, result from the broken nose of Lord Harrold Arryn. Jon Snow, the Blackfish, Ser Davos, Arya Stark, that Tormund Giantsbane and most of the lords here were of opinion that he should leave and go back to the Vale. They didn't have enough food to feed all their men, and the ten thousand the lad had brought had made things worse. Furthermore, they gave no help in defeating the Boltons. A few of their men had gone to besiege the Dreadfort and the Last Hearth, but they were very few. They had no use for all these knights who came late into a war in the hope they could get some glory. By chance, Harrold Arryn was insufferable and almost everyone was unable to suffer his presence any longer. Some lords of the Vale were also of an opinion to go back home, with winter coming and the main threat of the Boltons defeated. They saw no reason to stay here.

"Bronn, go and make sure the Knights of the Vale leave Winterfell with their lord without causing any problem," Tyrion ordered him.

"Oh, and what if they cause any problem?"

"Then remind them they are surrounded by Lannisters and Tullys."

"And if they cause problems all the same?"

"Then deal with them like you did with their lord a moment ago."

With a smirk, Ser Bronn of the Blackwater left. That didn't mean the Knights of the Vale would leave the North immediately, but they just kicked their lord paramount out of Winterfell. Hopefully, his bannermen could talk some sense into him. Still, Tyrion wished they hadn't broken his nose. This could make the men of the Vale angry and they didn't need it, but it was difficult to negotiate with the Harrold Arryns of this world. He wondered how Sansa and Lord Manderly did to suffer him at White Harbor.

Tyrion tried to erase the marks left by the blood on his desk and made a ball with the paper he was writing on, useless from the red on it. He then went back to writing his letter. He was done with it when Jon Snow came inside.

"I saw Lord Arryn leave with a broken nose," said Jon as he took a seat. "He didn't take it well, didn't he?"

"No. I'm afraid we're not done yet with him. I never saw someone so stubborn, and I've met quite a lot of them in my life."

"Do you think he could leave before Sansa arrives?"

"We can hope. But if he stays, we won't be able to stop him from being there when Sansa will be recognized Lady of Winterfell. If only we could."

The exchanged an amused look. "That's not as if we can force him to leave. To throw him outside Winterfell is one thing, but to force ten thousand armed men to turn back is another one. Why did they come here at all? What interest did they have in coming here in the North?"

"According to your sister, it was all part of a plot by Littlefinger to destroy my army during the battle."

"I know, but what do they get in all this?"

"No idea. Maybe Baelish wanted them to turn against he Northerners afterwards and have the North for himself. We can never know what his plans are. Hopefully my nephew will take care of him quickly and swiftly." Sansa told them what she did with Littlefinger in her last raven, and all the details about the plot of the Manderlys. Some details were unknown to them before.

"I've been thinking about something lately. What are we going to do about the houses that fought with Ramsay?"

"Well, as for the Karstarks, I suppose we can let Lady Alys keep it, as long as she bends the knee to Sansa. For the Dreadfort, however, the Boltons have entirely disappeared, unless Roose Bolton has a cousin somewhere that we're not aware of."

"The Dustins and the Ryswells had ties with Roose Bolton. They might try to claim it."

"They already have." Lady Dustin had come to Tyrion about this matter long ago, right after the battle. "But I don't think this would be a good idea. The Dustins and the Ryswells were on Roose Bolton's side before he died. I can't trust them with the Dreadfort."

"As you say. This is not untrue."

"As for the Umbers, did the Smalljon have children?"

"No, but I know the Greatjon had at least two daughters, and another son. He must be very young. I never met him."

"So, he's the Lord of the Last Hearth now?"

"Aye, and he will certainly fight against us. The Umbers are proud. They won't let the death of their lord go without punishment. Even if the new lord is too young, his uncles Mors and Hother will fight."

"So, in this case, the war is not over."

"Maybe not."

Tyrion joined his hands. "Listen, Snow. We have a big problem. Sansa is officially Wardeness of the North, but there's also no one in the North who wants to support her. Those who helped us when we travelled the Neck plotted to kill my men during the battle against the Boltons. The other houses deserted the Boltons after Ramsay killed his father, and the others either followed you when you asked for their help or chose to follow Ramsay. The thing is… I'm afraid Sansa will not remain the Lady of Winterfell for long."

"By right, Winterfell belongs to Sansa. Unless Bran is alive somewhere."

"By right, yes, but your fellow Northerners see her as a Lannister. They fought with us because we fought against Ramsay. Now Ramsay is gone and they blame us for not rescuing you in time during the battle. Sansa has my support and the support of the Westerlands, and I think most of the river lords are ready to support her as well, but in the North, I'm afraid Howland Reed is probably the only one who is genuinely ready to accept her as his liege. The others will rebel sooner or later when our armies will go back home."

"For now, it doesn't matter. What matters is the enemy beyond the Wall. They are the real threat."

Tyrion knew that, but they couldn't act as if they only had to defeat the dead and that nothing would come after. "Maybe, but if we beat this enemy, we must make sure the peace in the North lasts for more than a few years. The Karstarks have bent the knee, but you say the Umbers will keep fighting and any rebellion might be joined by half the kingdom. I need to strengthen Sansa's position. The best way for that is to give her bannermen who will remain loyal to her."
Jon looked at him queerly. "Are you talking about replacing the Umbers?"

"Do you think it's possible, Snow?"

Jon Snow slowly shook his head. "That's impossible. The Umbers have ruled their lands for thousands of years. If you depose them, their people will rise in rebellion. And if you were to kill every Umber left, it would be a slaughter. There are children among them."

He could see Jon Snow was totally against the idea. "I'm not my father, Jon Snow. I don't kill children." Though now he understood better why his father did kill children. It made it much easier to overthrow a house and prevent its return if you killed every last member of this house, no matter they were men, women or children. "I just wanted to know if it was possible to depose them and replace them, and you tell me it's not. Let's forget about this. We will submit the Umbers and let them keep their lands if they acknowledge Sansa. What about the Dreadfort? Is it possible to create a new house there?"

"Aye, I think so." Jon Snow looked thoughtful. "You might give it to Arya. It will create a minor branch of House Stark."

That wasn't an option Tyrion could consider. "I'm afraid I can't do this."

The bastard frowned. "Why?"

"In the eventuality of a rebellion, who do you think the northern lords will turn to to replace Sansa?"

Jon Snow's eyes grew wide. "Arya would never turn against Sansa."

Tyrion had his doubts about it. Arya and Sansa were sisters, but they always had difficulty to get along. Family hadn't stopped Stannis and Renly from fighting each other. "Maybe she won't, not herself, but whoever marries her will be Lord of the Dreadfort and might be tempted to seize Winterfell as his own. We need to place someone Sansa could rely on without doubt and who would pose no threat."

"Who then?"

"Someone from the Westerlands, maybe, or from the Riverlands if the other option is impossible."

"You want to make a man from south of the Neck one of the most powerful lords in the North?" Jon Snow asked, unbelieving.

"Unless you can find me a Northerner who could be entirely loyal to Sansa, yes. I must face these choices, Jon Snow. Sansa is married with me, and she is the Lady of Casterly Rock. We won't be able to stay in the North forever. I must go back in the south, in the Westerlands, and Sansa will have to come with me. I'll need to leave people I can trust behind, and people who will be ready to prepare the future Lord of Winterfell when he will be born."

Jon shook his head. "Do that, and the Northerners will see you as invaders. They will really say that you are trying to take control of the North. Don't do that."

"What do you suggest then? I know one thing with the actual situation, Sansa will face a rebellion within the next years at least, many rebellions in the worst case scenario."

Jon Snow took some time to answer. "My father used to say we find our true friends on the battlefield. The dead are coming. If your men fight by side by side with the Northerners, if the North really see them fighting to protect it, they will accept Sansa."
"They will forget about the Red Wedding?" Tyrion asked, skeptical.

"No, they won't. The North remembers. But it will also remember you helped us against the dead. They won't forget it."

Tyrion reflected about it for a moment. This war with the dead could ironically turn into a blessing… if they survived this war. Still, many issues remained. "We'll still have to decide about the Dreadfort. Well, that will be Sansa's decision at the end. Let's wait for her to arrive before we decide. She probably only has a few days before arriving."

Jon Snow nodded. Tyrion hoped he didn't turn Ned Stark's son against him with that discussion, but he preferred to have his opinion rather than ask some other lord of the North that would immediately believe he was trying to make the North a protectorate of the Westerlands.

"As soon as Sansa id acknowledged Lady of Winterfell, we must…" Jon Snow began, but he was interrupted by Podrick who came in.

"My lords, they've spotted Manderly banners. She's coming."

Podrick had a huge smile as he said it. Tyrion and Jon Snow were motionless for a moment. She was already back. Jon Snow ran out of the room, while Tyrion urged Podrick to help him prepare by donning his cloak and gloves. Then Tyrion went to the main courtyard as quickly as his short legs allowed him. People were already gathering to welcome the Lady of Winterfell. Tyrion stood at the first rank with Sansa's immediate family, which meant Jon Snow and Arya Stark. Ser Brynden Tully also took place with them. The rest of the courtyard was filled with the commanders, knights and lords of the Westerlands, the Riverlands, the Vale and the North. Tyrion spotted Lady Mira Hightower with her sister somewhere in the waiting crowd, as well as Lady Tallhart, Lady Mormont, Lord Royce, Lord Piper, Lord Bracken, Ser Prester, Daven and many others. The Lord of the Eyrie shined by his absence, certainly a consequence of his broken nose. Bronn and Podrick weren't far behind Tyrion, along with Daven. Olyvar Frey looked quite alone without his brother.

Snow was falling outside as they waited. It didn't fall heavily, but enough to leave a thin white cover on the ground. It was no surprise that Sansa needed about two months to travel from White Harbor to Winterfell. The banners of House Tully and House Lannister, but also of House Stark, were brought forward as Sansa's personal guard went through the gate. Sansa came after them with Brienne of Tarth at her side. Tyrion couldn't lift his eyes from his wife as soon as she entered. She looked pale from where he stood. She had to be, after going through a pregnancy and a birthing, then two months on the road, all that after learning that her little brother was dead.

Still, Sansa dismounted quite easily as everyone bowed their heads. She looked at him, and Tyrion had to refrain himself from running to her. She knelt and pulled him into a long embrace, then kissed him.

"I missed you," she said.

"I missed you too, my lady."

He tried to make the embrace last as long as he could. He had been so afraid for her, and now here she was, after all these months. They finally broke their embrace after a moment and she stood to face her half-brother.

"Jon." She threw her arms around his neck, then released him. "It's good to see you again."

"You too," he said. "You grew up. You're taller than me, now." They all chuckled.
"I have so much to tell you, Jon."

"We'll have all the time to talk later."

He turned to his left, where Arya was standing, and Sansa shared an embrace with her as well, and then with her granduncle. Lord Manderly arrived as well and plated the courteous lord. He was best to not try anything again.

"We should get you inside," Tyrion said to his wife after a moment. "It's cold out there."

"Of course," Sansa answered. "Go ahead, I'll join you." The other people in the courtyard understood it was time to scatter. She turned to him and whispered. "I have someone to present you." She said that before he could ask. He took the hand she offered him. Even through the gloves, he felt her shaking.

"Are you sure you don't want to go inside for that? We had your chamber prepared."

"No. Come." He followed her to a carriage that had followed her in the courtyard. She opened the door, and her handmaiden came out. "Is she awake?"

"Yes, my lady," she answered.

Sansa climbed into the carriage and invited Tyrion to join her. He followed her and closed the door behind him. There was a cradle with a lot of furs on one of the cushioned bench. Sansa approached it and took something inside with her two arms. Tyrion heard soft wails coming from a mass of blankets she held in her arms. She looked at him and came on her knees, showing him the content of the blankets.

Inside was the most beautiful human being Tyrion had ever seen. Her green eyes were looking at him with curiosity. It was the same eyes Jaime and Cersei had. The same eyes he had. A beginning of blond hair was visible on the top of her head. He could only stare at her for a moment, as he felt his eyes filled with water. Then slowly, he got closer to her, and then approached a hand from her face to caress her small cheek with one of his fingers. Her small fist closed around his index, and he couldn't help but let a tear roll in his cheek.

"She's… She's beautiful."

His lips were shaking. That was all he could say. For one of the rare times in his life, he was speechless. He had tried to imagine how she would look like, but he wasn't sure what to expect. Sansa only told him in the raven she sent before leaving White Harbor that he was now the father of a little lady, and that they were both well. And here she was, his daughter.

"You want to hold her?" Sansa asked. He looked at her. She was smiling as well, like he never saw her smile. "She's your daughter as much as mine."

Slowly, very carefully, Tyrion took his daughter into his arms. A wide smile had appeared on her face as well and her arms were moving in the air. Her arms weren't too small, her head wasn't too large. She was perfect. Who could have foreseen that he could have such a lovely little daughter?

"I'm sorry you have the ugliest father in the world," he told her.

"Don't say that," Sansa almost spat. "She looks like you."

Tyrion let a short laugh escape his throat. "No, she doesn't."
"Of course, she does. She has your eyes and your hair."

"She's not a dwarf."

He looked at Sansa, into her beautiful blue eyes he missed so much these last months. She smiled at him with empathy after a moment, then slowly approached him and laid a soft kiss on his lips. Then she leaned her face against his so they could both looked at their daughter.

"She's so beautiful." His voice was almost breaking up. He was afraid this could all shatter. He held her very cautiously. He was afraid he could drop her by accident. She looked so fragile, so innocent, so vulnerable, just like Sansa when they met in King's Landing.

"I…" Sansa started, but she seemed to have difficulty to talk as well. "I know we didn't discuss about it, but… I decided to call her Joanna. For your mother."

He looked at her for a moment, speechless once more. She couldn't have made him happier. "Thank you." He struggled to make the words leave his throat, knotted as it was. Then he looked back at his daughter, Joanna, and just stayed there, looking at her with his wife. For a very long time, they were alone, he, Sansa and Joanna, and there was nothing else in the world that mattered.

Later, they were all dining together in the Great Hall. In normal times, they would organize a feast, but with the winter that settled recently and the lack of provisions, that was a luxury they couldn't afford. Still, they made their best and Winterfell's cook, who happened to be the same than when Sansa left (he somehow managed to survive the destruction of the castle and the Boltons) made all Sansa's favorite plates, including lemon cakes for dessert. They were all at the high table, Tyrion, Sansa, Jon Snow, Arya and Ser Brynden. Ser Davos, Lord Yohn Royce, Lord Norbert Vance and Lord Manderly were guests invited to seat with them, and Sansa also welcomed Lady Mira and her sister as personal friends.

Their daughter wasn't with them. They installed her in a room adjacent to theirs, under the watch of Willia Marbrand, Sansa's handmaiden, and of Lady Brienne. The ambience was good, though it could have been merrier. After she had introduced him to their daughter, Sansa had showed her to her siblings and the Blackfish. Jon Snow was very happy for her while Arya didn't seem to know what to think, but even she made an effort to look happy for her sister. As for the Blackfish, he looked disappointed at first, maybe because Joanna looked more like her father than her mother, but he had held her in his arms with joy all the same and kissed Sansa on both cheeks. Tyrion had to admit there was a part of him that wished their daughter had inherited more of Sansa's looks.

However, the reunion was soured by a few elements, one being their visit to the crypt, where Rickon Stark was buried. Sansa lit a candle for him, before his grave, where a statue would be made soon. She also lit candles for her father, her mother, her brother Robb and for her aunt Lyanna, her uncle Brandon and her grandfather Rickard Stark. Tyrion accompanied her with her siblings and that made the general mood much darker. But that was something she had to do and Tyrion didn't blame her. It was his family who destroyed hers, and their daughter wouldn't replace the void his father, his sister and his nephew created.

They also told her before the feast about the presence of Theon Greyjoy, and after the initial shock, Sansa had asked why he was still alive. The two Stark sisters had agreed for a moment they should have killed Theon before. The most difficult part had been to reveal to Sansa the truth about her friend Jeyne. Tyrion had told her that when they were alone in their new chambers. He spared her the details of what she endured from Ramsay, but he didn't hide the fact that Ramsay killed her after he revealed they had the real Arya Stark with them. Sansa had only wept, her face buried on his shoulder. She hadn't yelled at him. She wasn't even angry at him, but Tyrion felt guilty for that girl all the same. Revealing the Bolton's trickery hadn't caused the problems he hoped for in the enemy ranks, and an innocent girl died. The birth of their first child was darkened by the war, and they had another one ahead.

Still, they all made their best to look merry, even Arya. Many toasts were made for those who died in battle, Sansa's brother the first. Ser Brynden made one for Ser Perwyn Frey, stating he honored his house more than anyone else in this family, which was more than accurate. There were toasts made for Sansa as well, for Jon Snow, the Blackfish, and the bastard of Winterfell even made one for Tyrion, which the Northerners shared grudgingly. Tyrion also knew the toast for Sansa should have been more cheering. Considering there was no fight, thanks to a careful organization that placed wildlings and Northerners at two far sides of the hall, that was a pleasant time, quite relaxing when compared to the last months of warfare.

Later that night, for the first time in what looked like an eternity, Tyrion slept in a real bed with his wife. Her head lied on his chest, like she did so often at Casterly Rock, and he caressed her red hair like he used to long ago. He inhaled the familiar scent of her red locks. She was here, finally. They had taken back Winterfell, freed the North from the Boltons, Roose and Ramsay Bolton were dead, her little sister was alive and safe, and she was even reunited with her half-brother. Over all that, Sansa had given birth to a beautiful little girl, and the pregnancy hadn't left her weak. Her pale appearance when she arrived seemed to be only the result of her tiredness from two months on the road. She was simply exhausted, nothing more. Why then didn't he feel happy about all that?

Sansa was resting peacefully against him, his arms around her shoulders, one on her back and the other one in her hair. She was more beautiful than ever. Tyrion could tell from her breathing that she wasn't sleeping. He thought about the lullaby she sang to their daughter before they went to bed together. Joanna had fallen asleep almost at the precise moment when Sansa gave the last words of the song. Only a closed door separated them from their daughter and there was a wetnurse to watch over her all the time.

"You're awake?" Sansa asked him, her voice muffled.

"We both are," he said after a sigh. "You know how my sleep is shit."

"It seems you gave it to me."

They both chuckled nervously. A moment of silence went on. "I'm sorry for Jeyne," Tyrion finally said.

"It's not your fault."

"If I hadn't told Ramsay…"

"Ramsay killed her." She removed her head from his chest to lean over him. "He's dead now. Don't ever say it's your fault again, or I allow Arya to poke you full of holes like she did for him."

She had said it with a soft, but firm voice. Tyrion half-smirked and surrendered. "Your roof, your rules."

She smirked back at him and kissed him slowly. Her lips… It had been so long. She rested her head again in the crack of his neck and Tyrion resumed to wander his hand through her hair.

"Do you think Bran is alive, somewhere?" Sansa asked him.

What could he answer to that? A cripple boy north of the Wall, with White Walkers and wights looming everywhere. "I hope he is."
"I thought Rickon was dead, and he was alive. I abandoned him. I gave him up." One of her hands was wrapped around his arm. She squeezed it more strongly. Tyrion massaged her back and her neck, trying to calm her the best he could.

"We will find Bran. I promise." If Sansa's last brother was alive somewhere, they could find him, and they would bring him back home. Tyrion wouldn't let another Stark die because of his family. The Lannisters already made Sansa and her siblings suffer too much.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you enjoyed Tyrion meeting his daughter for the first time, and the reunion of the two main characters of this fic after being apart for over twenty chapters.

Please review

Next chapter : Mira
Mira IX

Chapter Notes

Quite a long chapter, with a lot happening.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

MIRA IX

Mira had seen many godswoods through her life. She used to pray in the one at Ironrath as a child. It was a place of devotion, made for prayer and to honor the Old Gods. Their godswood was populated of ironwood trees, just like the grove behind their home. Even the Old Gods couldn't escape ironwood at Ironrath. Then she had gone to Highgarden. Its godswood was entirely different, a beautiful place, natural yet it had nothing to envy to the most wonderful gardens of the Reach, with three weirwoods. The godswood of King's Landing showed no great interest and Mira seldom spent time in it. To her regret and shame, she had neglected the Old Gods while she stayed in the south. Margaery followed the Seven and always prayed in the sept of Highgarden, and Mira followed her when she prayed as her handmaiden. Being risen in both faiths by her father and mother, Mira had no problem praying in a sept or a godswood. Still, in Highgarden, the godswood was such a marvelous place that people almost used it as a garden and Mira spent some time there with Sera and Margaery. She said short silent prayers whenever they went in it. However, in King's Landing, they seldom walked into it and Mira kept praying with the queen. When she had gone to the Hightower, she had continued to pray in the sept mostly. From time to time, she would visit the godswood to pray, but again it was rarely that she did it.

Now here she was, back in the North, and she prayed to the Old Gods in the godswood of Winterfell. She had stopped there on her way to Highgarden the first time, years ago, but since they had arrived late in the evening, she hadn't gotten the opportunity to meet Sansa or her brothers and sister. None had any memory of the Forrester child who stayed one night in their home. Mira didn't even have the time to visit the godswood on this occasion. Now she had. The godswood of Winterfell was renowned through all the North and now Mira could see why. You could feel the presence of the Old Gods here. She shouldn't have set them aside while she was in the south. She was a Northerner, and the Old Gods were part of her.

Snow was quietly falling all around her. She closed her eyes and let the natural smell of three acres of nature untouched for ten thousand years fill her lungs. She could almost imagine she was home, in the grove of Ironrath. There were ironwoods here in the godswood of Winterfell, which made it easier to believe. She prayed for her brothers and her sister, for Gared and Malcolm, for Gerold, for Sansa, for Margaery and the king, for her brother-in-law Garlan, for Elys, and even for her other brother-in-law, Altos, though she didn't forget the fist on her cheek.

They received news not long ago that Gerold and Asher had reached Ironrath. Their home was burned to the ground, and there were no Whitehills to be seen. They knew that there had been a garrison at Ironrath after Ludd Whitehill sacked it, but it seemed he abandoned the place after his son was killed at Winterfell. Now they were marching against Highpoint, where Ludd Whitehill and his last men were. She hoped everything would go well. Asher had fought in the thick of the battle here, and he had been injured. It was nothing serious, only a cut in the leg, but they were lucky it didn't fester. As soon as he had recovered enough, he had ridden to Ironrath with his men and Gerold.
Gwyn followed him.

Mira hadn't been sure how Gwyn would react when her brother died. Asher had killed him, and he didn't hide it. He didn't boast about it, especially when Gwyn was around, but he wasn't reluctant to say it either. Gwyn seemed to take it all with philosophy. Mira had gone to talk to her about it, a few days after the battle, and she had tried to apologize for the death of her brother. Mira didn't feel any regret over Torrhen Whitehill's death, especially after he declared he would marry her or Talia once the battle would be over, but she could understand Gwyn's grief all the same. She knew what it was to lose two brothers. Gwyn's answer surprised her.

"I knew it would come to that. I tried to make peace between our two families, and I failed. And they were wrong to support Ramsay. As soon as Roose Bolton died, they should have deserted, but they didn't. All I want now is to save my father, convince him to join the Night's Watch. If I can't… Then I hope Asher is not the one to kill him. If he was to kill my father… I don't know what I would do."

Mira knew how much Asher loved Gwyn. He almost started a war for her. He would go to war for her. But Asher also loved Ethan and Rodrik, and he would never forgive the Whitehills what they did. She knew her brother, and she knew he would kill Ludd Whitehill if he had the opportunity. If he did, then he could lose Gwyn. Mira was afraid of what her brother could do. Talia and Ryon were safe with her at Winterfell, but Asher was in danger. His rage could get himself in dangerous situation. He could lose his life, and his wife.

Gerold was the other person she was worried about. She hadn't seen the Battle of Winterfell. She stayed away with an escort that would bring her to safety if the battle was lost. Still, she had been glad to hear that the Hightowers were placed in the rear of the army. That meant her husband would be relatively safe. He had come back from the battle without a single graze. However, he had been gloomy after the battle. He hadn't wanted to discuss about it at the moment, so she hadn't pressed the matter, but she had asked him the night before he left for Ironrath and received an answer.

That night had been beautiful. At the time, Mira had thought that if she wasn't already pregnant, she would certainly be before the morning. However, she hadn't forgotten the sour mood of her husband these last days. She asked what troubled him, and this time she didn't leave him be. He finally confessed.

"Do you think I'm useless, Mira?"

The question had startled her. "Why would I think something like that?"

He had looked away from her face. "Altos always says that I'm useless, that there's nothing I can do. I wonder now if he's right."

"He's not!" Mira snapped. "How can you think that a single moment?"

"Can you tell me what I did during the battle?" He looked straight at her, frustration plain on his face. That wasn't the first time she saw him like that. "How did I contribute to the victory? I stayed behind while the others fought. Even when the cavalry charged, I didn't join the battle."

"You were in the reserves, Gerold. If they had needed reinforcements or cover for retreat, you would have been crucial in that eventuality."

"But it didn't happen," he retorted angrily. He turned his back on her. "I brought an army in the North to give you back your home, only to discover that you didn't need it, that your brother already had one. I sent my men to death at Moat Cailin. I stood there like a chump here, while your brother was risking his life in the vanguard. What am I? A useless third born son."
He told her that, speaking in the other direction. She didn't like to see him like this. She moved over him and leaned on his back, burying her face into his neck. A beard had begun to grow on his jaw during their campaign in the North, which made his face sharp to the touch, but he had shaved it after their victory. She liked it more to be honest. That was how he was when they met. As she moved her hand over his back and his chest, she felt the new muscles that appeared through their journey to Winterfell.

"I don't care if you fought in the vanguard or were left out of the battle. Asher may have fought bravely, but he was injured. He could have died. What's the use to be hailed a battle hero if you die?
They may sing songs about you for decades to come, maybe centuries, if you die heroically in battle, but you'll be dead. A life is not worth a song. And if you die... I don't know what I'll do."

She felt water come to her eyes. Gerold took her hand wandering on his chest and brought to his lips to kiss it. "I won't die. I promise."

They had remained in this position for a very long time. Mira never really thought she would cherish these moments with her husband. Her parents always talked about marriage as a duty. Feelings were never part of the discussion when they talked about it, and with Margaery, marriage was a question of opportunity, not of duty or love. Mira's marriage had gone in a direction no one ever prepared her for.

"I wonder what they're doing at the Hightower right now," her husband said.

"I suppose Elys is still preparing her scandal if it hasn't gotten out already."

Gerold made a sound between a chuckle and a scoff. "She shouldn't turn around that squire. I bet she's not even in love with him." Mira knew she wasn't, but Elys wanted to bring life to the Hightower with a small scandal of her own. "Anyway, my lord father would refuse to marry her to him. He's not highborn enough." This brought the memory of another squire to Mira, one who looked at her very often. Asher used to tease her about this. The squire couldn't look at her after she left for Highgarden.

"I think they're probably laughing at me, thinking how I must be freezing here," Gerold said, bitter again.

"Well, I know a few parts of you that remain warm."

He turned his head to look at her, they smiled and exchanged a quick laugh. Her husband turned on himself to lie on his back and their chests found themselves against each other. They kissed and soon they were doing it again. The night went in a blur. Mira hadn't felt good like this in a very long time.
She didn't want it to end, but it did. Day came.

On the morning, as he was getting dressed, she asked a favor to her husband. "Gerold, could you keep an eye on Asher?"

Her husband looked unsure. "He seems to be able to look after himself."

"I know." She had sighed. "I'm not worried that he could die. He survived to so much... But I'm afraid of what he could do in the heat of battle."

"What do you mean?" Gerold had frowned.

"He loves Gwyn, and she loves him, but he already killed two of her brothers. I can't imagine how difficult it is for her to stay married with him. But this time, if he kills her father... I'm afraid he will lose her, forever. I don't want that to happen. Asher wants to avenge Ethan and Rodrik, but I'm afraid he could lose Gwyn to avenge our family. If that was to happen, it would destroy him."

She had witnessed the beginning, the evolution and the end of Asher's relationship with Gwyn before his exile, and she knew they both loved each other. Losing Gwyn a second time would kill him.

"I'll make sure he doesn't kill him. I promise," Gerold told her.

"Thank you." She looked at him, and he looked at her. That was the same way he looked at her the day they were wed, when they recited their vows. Many things had changed, but the way he looked at her hadn't changed in the slightest. "Be careful out there."

"I will." He closed the distance between and kissed her. Mira returned the kiss and took his face between her hands. That would be the last time she would see him before some time, and the first time she let him go. They had always been together so far. When they broke the kiss, after a very long time, he looked at her again.

"I love you," he said.

"I love you too." He kissed her one last time, then walked away, but before he reached the door, Mira told him one last thing. "Gerold, I'm sure your family is worrying about you right now. All of them."

"Even Altos?" he asked, doubtful.

She rolled her eyes. "I suppose he's the exception that confirms the rule."

They smiled at each other and he left. Weeks later, Mira was on her knees, praying for him in the godswood before the trials. In an hour or two, the trials of Theon Greyjoy and Harald Karstark would take place. Their fates would be decided today. They had waited for Sansa to come back. Her first action as Lady of Winterfell would be to judge the two men for their crimes against the North. Then they would discuss the dispositions to take for war, and in the evening all the lords of the North would pledge their houses to her as Wardeness of the North.

The godswood was all silence. You would hear a fly if there were any. Mira heard indistinct voices from afar, then the voices came close and she could understand what they said.

"You really saw him? The Night King?" She recognized Sansa's voice. Her brother answered.

"Aye. And they were all slaughtered. The Free Folk who are here are those who survived this battle."

"How many men…? How many of these things does he have in his army?"

"Tens of thousands. I'm not lying, Sansa."

"No, I don't think you're lying," she replied quickly. "Tyrion believes you, and he's not the sort to believe in these things."

"It's imperative to keep your men in the North. As soon as the Dreadfort and the Last Hearth have surrendered, we must go to the Wall and garrison the castles. Oakenshield, Greyguard, Icemark, the Nightfort, all of them. We must be prepared. We have to defend the Wall."

"I understand, Jon, but even if we can convince the northern lords and the wildlings, how will we do for the lords of the Westerland and the Riverlands? And what about the Vale? They won't believe us.
White Walkers haven't been seen for thousands of years. They are legends to them."

"We have to persuade them. If the dead get through the Wall, there won't be any safe place left in the Seven Kingdoms. They will invade the North, kill everyone living here and turn them into their own kind, and continue south until they reach Dorne and that there's nothing left of Westeros. Nothing living, at least."

A silence followed. "What about the Knights of the Vale? I don't trust them."

"We need all the help we can get."

"Can the White Walkers get through the Wall?"

"I don't know. I hope not."

"We don't have enough food for our own men already. We already have twenty thousand without the ten thousand the Vale brought. It should be more than enough to garrison all the Wall. I don't trust Harrold Arryn. Littlefinger is behind his presence here. We can't rely on them. Tyrion believes we should order them to go home as soon we're done today."

"You say that Littlefinger is dead. He's no longer a danger, and I don't think people like Yohn Royce…"

"Maybe not him, but others. I don't trust them. I don't trust them at all. They let Baelish bring Arya in the North. He plotted with the Manderlys to turn against us in the middle of battle. We have to get rid of them. We can trust the Lannisters and the Tullys, even the wildlings if you say so, but not the men of the Vale."

Another silence followed. "You're the Lady of Winterfell. It's your decision. We'll see each other later."

Mira heard footsteps on the ground covered with snow. After a moment, she saw Sansa emerge from the other side of the weirwood. She stopped when she noticed Mira on her knees.

"Did you hear us?" Sansa asked.

"I was praying here. I'm sorry, I didn't mean to eavesdrop your discussion." Sansa nodded in acknowledgement. "So, White Walkers?"

"Yes. That sounds completely… mad. As mad as my brother dying, then coming back to life. I can't believe everything I've heard since I arrived yesterday."

"There was someone at Ironrath. My father's squire. He went to the Wall after the Red Wedding, and he disappeared north of it. If the dead are really back…?" Mira couldn't complete her sentence.

She wasn't superstitious or the kind to believe in prophecies or myths, but Mira had grown up in the North and they were taught to respect these myths, like the one of Brandon the Builder. Jon Snow didn't strike her for a mad man, Lord Tyrion neither, and they both believed the White Walkers were back. Lady Lyanna Mormont told her that her uncle, Jeor Mormont, had died north of the Wall after a battle against the dead. Had Gared turned into a wight?

"My brother Bran may be there as well." Mira looked up at Sansa. She saw worry on her face. "Someone saw him going there. Who knows what happened to him?"

Brandon Stark north of the Wall? These were bad news. "I'm sorry, Sansa. Really, I am." Another brother was lost.

Sansa looked down on the ground. She came to stand next to Mira and faced the tree. "I came here every day when I was a girl. I prayed to be somewhere else. Back then I only thought about what I wanted, never about what I had. I was a stupid girl."

Sansa almost spat the last words. "You were only a child, Sansa. We all have dreams when we are children. We think of what we could be, not who we are. About what we could have, not what we have," Mira told her as she stood up. Her legs were beginning to freeze in the snow. She thought of Asher who had wanted Gwyn, and this led to his exile.

"What did you dream about when you were young?" Sansa asked her.

Mira thought about it for a moment. "I don't really know. I was happy at Ironrath. I wanted to visit some places around the world, but I didn't really want to have another home. To be honest, I didn't know what to expect of Highgarden when my mother sent me there. I had never left the North before."

"But it turned out well."

"Yes, it did, mostly. I think that's a good thing I was sent away. My vision of the world was too limited at Ironrath. I was blind in some way, just like you." They exchanged a look, then faced the weirwood again. "How is Joanna?"

That brought a smile to Sansa's lips. "She's right. The wet nurse is keeping an eye on her."

Mira smiled in return. Joanna Lannister had brought joy to Winterfell since she arrived. At least she brought some to the Lannisters and to Sansa's family and friends. The same couldn't be said about a few lords of the North. Still, it allowed to lighten the mood and to clear their minds from all the worries they had from time to time. Lord Tyrion and Sansa were happy whenever their daughter was around. Mira couldn't wait to have her own child. Gerold would like it.

"She's very beautiful," Mira said.

"Thank you." Sansa's smile was wider than ever. "She already has shining blond hair. They shine more than Tyrion's. And she has his eyes." Sansa sighed, but the smile didn't leave her face. "I wish my father and my mother could see her."

Mira sympathized. She had wished a few times that her own lord father and lady mother could meet Gerold, but they were gone. Both their parents would never know that their daughter was married and that they had grandchildren.

"Tyrion loves her too," Sansa resumed. "I never saw him so happy. Except when I told him that I loved him for the first time." Her expression turned sad. "I wish we didn't have all these problems. The northern lords don't trust us, and the Knights of the Vale are still here. What am I to do to rule the North? They mistrust the Lannisters and everyone from the Westerlands even more than they hate the wildlings. Tyrion believes we should arrange marriages between the families of the Westerlands and the North, but I fear it might make things worse. I'm not sure what to do. Perhaps I shouldn't be the Lady of Winterfell."

"Why do you say that? You are the Wardeness of the North. Robb Stark is dead and you are his heir."

"Yes, but because of my marriage with Tyrion and all the time I spent in the south, they believe I am a Southerner. I'm afraid if Tyrion and I have a son and that he rules Winterfell, he might spend his They remained silent for a moment. Then Mira spoke. "You are a Stark of Winterfell. You must show them and they will follow you."

"How?"

"I don't know. But you must show them." Snow kept coming on the ground around them. Mira looked at the sky and all she could see was white. "How long before the maesters of the Citadel say that winter is here?" Maester Ortengryn told her one day that the Citadel was deciding officially when winter began and when it ended. He explained her in detail how the Archmaesters took the decision together from the reports maesters sent through all the Seven Kingdoms, considering where the reports came from and the many details they gave.

"A raven came from the Citadel this morning." Mira turned to look at Sansa. "A white raven. Winter is here."

"Your family was right, as always."

They stayed together in the godswood for some more time, then they both returned to their rooms. Mira went to see Talia who just sat there, doing nothing, when she entered.

"Where is Ryon?" Mira asked.

"Riding outside with one of the patrols?"

"What?"

"He said he didn't want to be there for the trial. He said it's boring."

Mira sighed. Ryon should have been present as Asher's heir. "He has more of Asher than Rodrik in him."

Talia smiled as a timid smile formed on her lips. Asher couldn't suffer politics, and Ryon looked well engaged on the same path. "Beskha is with him. He's not in danger. I can be there in his stead."

"Thank you."

Someone from House Forrester had to be present for the trial, but Mira already represented House Hightower. If Ryon wasn’t there, the duty fell on Talia's shoulders. Mira still marveled at how her little sister had grown up. She was becoming a beautiful young woman, but she was also hardened by Ethan's death. Talia was present when Ethan died. Mira was not. They both lost the same brothers and parents, but Mira hadn't seen any of them die with her own eyes. It wasn't the same. She remained comfortable in King's Landing and at the Hightower while her kin were being slaughtered and chased all over the North. It was easy to not turn bloodthirsty when your family died far away.

"It's about to begin. We should go," Mira finally said. She and Talia walked to the Great Hall of Winterfell together. "Have you thought about what we talked a few days ago?"

"Oh. Yes, I have," Talia replied.

"And?"

"I don't know. What do you know of Gawen Glover?"

"Not much. We know more of his uncle. Father always said Galbart Glover was a good man, but" this tells us nothing of his nephew. We should meet him at least to have a better idea, but right now he is at Deepwood Motte. We could go there once this is all over."

"Agree."

"Anyway, he must ask Asher first. We can use that as a reason to delay for the time being."

Lord Robett Glover had come to her a few days ago, proposing to betroth Talia to his son and heir, Gawen Glover. His son was still quite young, one or two years under Talia, so they could wait for the marriage, but he said no one was worthier to be the future Lady of Deepwood Motte than the daughter of Gregor Forrester, his late brother's friend and most loyal bannerman, and the sister of Asher Forrester, his only bannerman who did the right thing and followed Jon Snow to fight the Boltons. Mira assured him they would consider his offer, but reminded him that only Asher, as Lord of Ironrath, could accept the betrothal. Mira though with irony that her little sister might get a higher position than her as Lady of Deepwood Motte. Mira didn't envy her. She was happy with Gerold, and the Hightowers were a powerful house, even if she was married with someone who didn't have much chance to inherit anything. She only wanted to be sure that Talia would marry a good man before Asher accept any offer from Lord Glover.

The Great Hall was crowded with people from all over the Seven Kingdoms and beyond. The wildlings were completely on the right side, with the lords of the Westerlands and the Riverlands. On the other side were the lords of the Vale and the North. Mira and Talia joined their fellow Northerners. Mira bowed to Lord Glover when they passed before him. They found a place between him and Alys Karstark. They only sat for a few minutes when Lord Tyrion, Sansa, Jon Snow, Arya and Ser Brynden emerged together from the back door behind the platform. They took place at the high table, Sansa in the middle, Jon Snow at her left and Tyrion Lannister at her right. Ser Brynden sat next to Lord Tyrion at one extremity of the table while Arya sat besides her half-brother at the other end. The Hall went silent. Sansa stood up.

"My lords, my ladies," she said, "we are gathered here today for the trial of two men. Two men who betrayed the North, who turned against their people and committed crimes that no true man of the North would do. They will be judged and sentenced accordingly to their crimes. Justice will be given. Bring the first of the accused."

They heard shackles rattling and scraping against the floor as Theon Greyjoy was brought forward. He had a horrible appearance and Mira saw that everyone could smell him as much as she could. Only the wildlings didn't look shocked by his presence. However, there was more than discomfort in everyone's eyes. There was hatred. The son of Balon Greyjoy had betrayed the North, fought with Robb Stark before he turned against him, seized Winterfell and pretended he killed Sansa's brothers. Mira couldn't say she had much pity for the Ironman herself. Robb Stark trusted him and as a reward, he betrayed him. Worse, he killed innocent children. It didn't matter they were not Bran and Rickon Stark. She had visited many poorhouses and orphanages with Margaery in King's Landing. The two boys he killed could have been among them.

The two guards who brought the traitor sat him without caution on a chair that was placed before the high table. They attached his wrists and ankles to the chair and left him there. Mira looked at Sansa. She looked straight at her father's former ward, a man she knew most of her life. If there was any pity, any compassion in her heart for the atrocities he endured under Ramsay's hand, she didn't show it. Her eyes were unyielding, merciless, hateful.

"Theon Greyjoy," Sansa started. Her voice said the same than her eyes. "You are accused of treason against the North, of reaving, of murder and of rape. How do you plead?"

It took time before the accused spoke. When he did, only one word came out of his mouth. "Guilty."
Then more words came out before Sansa could speak again. "I wish to confess. I wish to confess."

"You wish to confess?" Sansa said, hard as the stones of the walls.

"I do."

Theon Greyjoy told the whole story from the moment Robb Stark sent him to the Iron Islands to negotiate a treaty with his father. According to him, it was his idea to recognize Balon Greyjoy King of the Iron Islands in exchange for his help against the Lannisters. Balon Greyjoy had flatly refused the offer, saying he would take his own crown. He decided to invade the North against Theon's advice, barely acknowledging him as his son. Theon had tried to convince him to attack the Westerlands instead of the North, to no avail. He also wrote a letter to Robb Stark to warn him of his father's intentions, but burned the message in the end and decided to follow his family. He recognized he raided fishing villages, then decided to take Winterfell since it seemed a worthier prize. He made Brandon and Rickon prisoners and killed Ser Rodrik to prove to his men that he was a true Ironborn. He burned two farm boys on one of his men's advice when he couldn't find the Stark boys, then he was betrayed by his own men when Ramsay besieged Winterfell. Ramsay had his men burn the castle once it had fallen. He described the torture he endured, how Ramsay made him think that his name was Reek and not Theon Greyjoy, how he used him to make the Ironborn holding Moat Cailin surrender before skinning them alive. He told them about Ramsay's marriage with Jeyne, how she pleaded him to help her to escape, and how he refused because it would only have made things worse when Ramsay would catch them. He told them everything Jeyne went through, how she spent her days weeping in her chamber, locked from the outside, cut out from the rest of the world, waiting for Ramsay to come at night to hurt her. He told them about Rickon's captivity. He confessed everything he did, and everything he did not.

As he made his confessions, expressions of horror, disgust, hatred, and pity sometimes, came and left people's face. Even Lord Tyrion seemed to pity the Greyjoy in some way, though his face was hard as well. Sansa, however, strangely looked like her sister in this very moment. She was unflinching, looked down on Theon as if he was some trash, worse than a monster. The lords and knights had shouted him accusations and insults as he spoke and Ser Brynden, Jon Snow and Lord Tyrion had to intervene more than once to have silence. Sansa never said a word. She kept looking at Theon Greyjoy, the man who betrayed her brother.

When she spoke, the whole room was silent. "I recall something Lord Tyrion once told me. He was on his way back from the Wall and he stopped at Winterfell. You had a little discussion with him then, Greyjoy. When he talked about how your uncles burned the fleet at Lannisport during the last rebellion, you said that it must have been a pretty sight. Tell me. Did you find it pretty to watch two children burn to death?"

As fitting, the silence that followed was a death's silence. Theon Greyjoy had his head bowed down and didn't dare to look up.

"You say you're sorry about my brothers, about Jeyne, about Robb, about Ser Rodrik. You say you are sorry about everything, but I'm going to tell you what I think. You're only sorry because you were tortured after everything you did. You're sorry because of the things you endured. If Ramsay Bolton hadn't tortured you, you would still be prancing around, calling yourself the son and heir of Balon Greyjoy and saying you managed to take a castle full of servants and children with thirty men. You are arrogant, a coward, a traitor. You deserve what Ramsay did to you. Without you, my brothers would still be alive, and many more people would still be alive. If you were truly sorry about what you did, you would have tried to save Jeyne and Rickon. Instead, you did nothing. You didn't rape Jeyne, but it's as if you raped her. You didn't kill Rickon, but you might as well have killed him yourself. You made yourself a partner in Ramsay Bolton's crimes with your inaction. My family welcomed you at our table when your own abandoned you, we shared our bread with you. You trained with Robb in the courtyard, he welcomed you at his war councils, and you rewarded his trust with treason. You were among the first to declare my brother King in the North. You haven't broken the guest rights, you're not a kinslayer or a kingslayer, it's true, but you committed all the other crimes a man can commit in life."

Sansa remained seated from the moment Theon Greyjoy was brought forward. Now she stood up. Everyone was looking at her, but she only looked at the accused, who didn't dare to return her stare. "Theon Greyjoy, son of Balon Greyjoy, in the name of my brother, Robb Stark, the Lord of Winterfell and the King in the North you betrayed, and in the name of Tommen of the House Baratheon, First of His Name, King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, and Lord of the Seven Kingdoms, I, Sansa Stark, Lady of Winterfell, Lady of Casterly Rock, Lady of the Westerlands and Wardeness of the North, I hereby sentence you to death. You will be executed as soon as the trial for Harald Karstark is over. Get him out of my sight now."

So ended the trial for Theon Turncloak. The lords cheered, but they also spat at the son of Balon Greyjoy as he was brought outside by his men. Some hit him as well. Mira didn't join them. She wouldn't bring herself down to that level. She looked at Sansa, and for a moment she saw uncertainty on her face. Her husband seemed to be holding her hand under the table.

The assembly didn't have time to calm when they brought in the fallen Lord of Karhold, chained just like his predecessor. Well chosen shouts were prepared for him as well, and they needed some time to bring back order when he was attached to the chair. Once it was brought, Harald Karstark broke it.

"So here she is, the Lannister whore."

One of the guards near him hit his cheek with his fist. Sansa looked hard at him, like she looked at Theon Greyjoy. "You will not speak unless you're asked to, Harald Karstark," Sansa said.

"I do not obey to the Lannisters and their lackeys."

Another fist. Sansa made a sign to the guard who did this, and he stepped back. "You are in Winterfell, Lord Karstark. You are in my home, and you will do as I say."

"Why? Else you will kill me, like your brother killed my father? You would turn yourself into a kinslayer like the King who lost the North? You would kill the son after your brother killed the father?"

Sansa smiled, but her smile was cruel. "You speak boldly, Harald Karstark. I wonder, did you speak so boldly when you were with Ramsay Bolton? Did you speak to him on this tone? I'm surprised he didn't skin you alive."

He smiled in return. "You will never understand Ramsay Bolton."

"What I understand is that he was a monster and that you conspired with him. You are accused of treason. How do you plead?"

"I committed no treason. Roose Bolton was the Warden of the North. Have you forgotten? Your own nephew gave him the title."

Sansa's face was stone. There was no sign that his words affected her. "Bring forward Maester Wolkan." The maester who had been in service to Roose Bolton at Winterfell came to face Sansa, but remained at good distance from Harald Karstark. "Do you swear by all the gods that your testimony will be true and honest?"

"I swear, my lady," replied the maester.

"Maester Wolkan, it has come to our knowledge that you were there when Roose Bolton died. Can you tell us how he died?"

"He was murdered, my lady."

"How?"

"He was stabbed in the heart by his son, Ramsay. Then he ordered me to write to every house and tell them he was poisoned by his enemies. I had no choice…"

"You're not the one on trial, maester. Was there someone else present when Roose Bolton, the Warden of the North…" she emphasized on the words, looking at Lord Karstark, "was assassinated?"

"Yes. Lord Karstark was there. He didn't look surprised. He did nothing as Lord Bolton died. He ordered me to show respect to Lord Ramsay immediately. Then Lord Ramsay ordered me to bring him Lady Bolton and her son. She had just given birth. He fed them to his dogs."

"Did Lod Karstark do anything to prevent that to happen?"

"No, my lady."

"Thank you, maester."

Maester Wolkan left. Harald Karstark snickered. "Don't tell me you're going to execute me for the death of Roose Bolton. You hated the man. He killed your brother," he said.

"You just said you served the Warden of the North, and yet you conspired to have him killed. You helped a man killed his father, his mother-in-law and his brother in the same day. In my opinion, helping someone to commit kinslaying is no better than being a kinslayer ourselves."

The Lord of Karhold burst. "You dare to call me kinslayer? Your brother killed my father. We are of the same blood. Stark and Karstark."

"You share no blood with me, Harald Karstark. I am a Stark, and I know a Stark would never murder children. Your father forfeited his blood links with my family the day he murdered innocent boys."

"It was vengeance, not murder. Just like it would have been vengeance if your brother had killed Joffrey."

"It wouldn't have been vengeance. It would have been justice." Sansa's declaration brought a silence in the Hall as she didn't speak for a moment afterwards. "Joffrey murdered my lord father. I was there when he was executed. I saw his head roll from the steps of the Great Sept of Baelor on Joffrey's order. He had agreed to let Lord Eddard Stark live if he confessed his crimes. My lord father did so, and Joffrey ordered his execution all the same. Everyone else who was present this day opposed the decision. The queen, the Grand Maester, the High Septon, the Master of Whisperers, everyone but Joffrey. What Joffrey did was murder, and my brother waged war to bring justice to him. He didn't fight to kill all the Lannisters, he fought to execute the man who killed our father. Your father decided to murder children because they were cousins of Ser Jaime Lannister. My brother did right when he executed him. He executed an assassin." The Lord of Karhold was
"You conspired with Ramsay Bolton. You conspired to kill an innocent woman and a baby still at her breast, and you betrayed the North. You raped innocent boys while your father and brothers were away at war. Your sister, Lady Karstark, can testify about this."

"I can," the young woman sitting next to Mira interrupted. "He did it very often."

"You are no better than Joffrey. When I was a hostage in King's Landing, I often wished I could kill him, but someone else took care of that. I will take care of you myself. Harald Karstark, I sentence you to death. Bring him in the courtyard, he will be executed immediately."

Two guards grabbed the Lord of Karhold and brought him without care to the courtyard. Sansa left the high table, accompanied by her husband, her brother and sister, and her granduncle. An execution block was already in place in the yard and the condemned was brought and forced to place his head on it. The lords and ladies gathered around to see the execution. Lady Brienne was at Sansa's side now. She took the sword she had at her belt and gave it to Sansa who brought it to Jon Snow. She told him something, but Mira couldn't hear what it was from there. Jon Snow unsheathed the sword. It was a Valyrian steel sword.

"You're not going to kill me the Old Way? The man who passes the sentence should swing the sword," the man with his head on the block mocked.

"I'm not a man," Sansa replied. "I suppose women are not expected to swing a sword in your house. Do you have any last words, Harald Karstark?"

"BETTER TO DIE FREE THAN SERVE A LANNISTER BITCH!"

Jon Snow brought the sword up and down, and the head left the shoulders. Harald Karstark, Lord of Karhold, last living son of Rickard Karstark, was dead. Theon Greyjoy was brought forward right after and placed in a similar position. Sansa asked him the same thing that she asked to the other man a moment ago.

"What is dead may never die," Theon Greyjoy said. Then the sword was brought down and the last son of Balon Greyjoy was no more.

Normally, the executions took place outside castles, so that only selected people could witness them, but this time they were carried out before everyone's eyes. Mira's parents had always kept her away from the sight of these executions, keeping it for Rodrik and Asher. The sight of the headless bodies was shocking, but Mira had already seen people dead or injured on a battlefield before, both here and at Moat Cailin. Still, an execution was different. She saw these dead people after the battle was done. She didn't actually witness them die. Now she did. She knew these two men deserved what they got, but it still shook her. Sansa looked shaken as well as her brother gave her back the sword. Mira noticed the handle made of gold with a lion's head.

A few minutes later, they were all gathered again in the Great Hall. Mira was again with her sister between Lord Glover and Lady Karstark. The Lord of Deepwood Motte was speaking to Talia about his son. Mira turned to Lady Alys.

"How do you feel?" she asked.

"I'm fine," the lady replied. "Don't worry about me. Harald was my brother, yes, but he did so many horrible things… I will regret my last brother, but not Harald himself. Or at least not who he became these last years," she added, seeing Mira's concerned look.

"I lost brothers in this war me too, and my father as well."
"I know, but now this is over." Alys Karstark. "I wish Eddard and Torrhen hadn't both gone to war. They wouldn't have died."

"In peace sons bury their fathers, but in war fathers bury their sons. War violates the order of nature." A Braavosi historian named Herodotus once wrote that. She read it while she was at Oldtown.

"True, unless war is the natural order of things," Alys Karstark replied bitterly.

"Silence, everyone." Jon Snow called the people to order and they obeyed. The Northerners respected Jon Snow, as former Lord Commander of the Night's Watch and because he fought with them on the battlefield. It was mostly thanks to him that Northerners and wildlings didn't fight more than they actually did.

"My lords, my ladies," Sansa started, "it's time to address a few matters of importance for the North. After discussions with my brother Jon Snow and the leaders of the Free Folk, I decided to honor the alliance forged between them and the Night's Watch. Ramsay Bolton threatened to kill the Free Folk when they lived on the lands of the Gift, lands that are not under the responsibility of the North. I will allow the men and women of the Free Folk to settle on the Gift in peace, as long as they do not trouble the people living out of the Gift. If any of them is found violating laws on the lands of any lord of the North, he will have full authority to punish them accordingly to their crimes."

"Wait a minute, my lady." For the first time today, Harrold Arryn, Lord of the Eyrie, intervened. "You cannot allow wildling invaders to settle on your lands."

"We didn't invade. We were invited," Tormund Giantsbane, leader of the wildlings, said.

"Not by me," the Warden of the East retorted.

"They didn't need to be invited by you, Lord Arryn," Sansa said sharply. "These are not your lands. The people who settle on the Gift are none of your concerns."

"I brought my men here to give back Winterfell to you, my lady. Not to see your lands taken away by monsters."

Jon Snow stood up at this moment. "The Free Folk, the Northerners, the men of the Riverlands, the Westerlands and the Reach fought bravely, fought together, and we won. My father used to say we find our true friends on the battlefield. The Free Folk bled with us for Winterfell and the North, so don't come and tell us how to behave with our friends, Lord Arryn. You didn't fight for Winterfell."

"We wanted to. We were late, that's all."

"You always seem to be late, Lord Arryn," Sansa said. "If you can't arrive in time to a battle, perhaps it would be time for you to go back and hide behind your mountains like you did during the war. Your lords allowed Petyr Baelish to bring my sister to Ramsay Bolton. I defend you from speaking here. You are no friend of mine."

That shut the mouth of the Lord of the Eyrie quite efficiently. He sat back. Some of the lords of the Vale seemed angry, but others looked ashamed. Not far from Mira, Lord Cerwyn rose.

"The Boltons are defeated. The war is over. Winter has come. If the maesters are right, it'll be the coldest one in a thousand years. We should ride home and wait out the coming storms."

"The war is not over," Jon Snow declared, his voice dark. "And I promise you, friend, the true enemy won't wait out the storm. He brings the storm."
Men began to murmur immediately. Mira saw Sansa speak to her brother. She didn't seem happy. It was obvious many people were skeptical about Jon Snow's declaration.

"What is he talking about?" Alys Karstark asked.

"White Walkers," Mira replied, almost reluctantly.

"White Walkers?" She didn't believe it.

"Jon Snow claims he fought them at Hardhome. They slaughtered tens of thousand wildlings and added them to their army."

"White Walkers?" She didn't sound convinced in any way.

"I know, it sounds completely impossible, but Lord Tyrion Lannister believes they are real as well, and he's not superstitious, believe me. And Jon Snow doesn't strike me for a liar."

The Lady of Karhold looked at the bastard son of Eddard Stark who now spoke with his brother-in-law. "Me neither. The Starks are known for their honesty," she conceded.

"Did you receive any raven from Castle Black about that?" Mira asked her.

"Yes." She looked back at Mira. "So it is true."

A girl of ten stood up at this moment. "Your ward, Domerick Bolton, was killed by Ramsay Bolton, Lady Dustin, and you lost men at the Red Wedding, but despite this, you fought for Roose Bolton against the Starks at the beginning," Lyanna Mormont declared. Her voice was powerful and everyone went silent as she spoke. She turned her head in Mira's direction. "You swore allegiance to House Stark, Lord Glover, but in their hour of greatest need, you refused to answer their call. And you, Lord Cerwyn, your father was skinned alive by Ramsay Bolton. Still, you fought for him before Lady Sansa's forces besieged you."

The Lord of Cerwyn lowered his head. Mira had seen many people lower their head like this in King's Landing, before Joffrey and Tommen, but they did it because they were afraid of Joffrey or because they were forced to do so before Tommen. They did it before Lyanna Mormont because they felt ashamed and because they actually respected her. If only she had been one of Cersei's children. All this war would never have happened.

"But House Mormont remembers," she resumed. "The North remembers. We know no king but the King in the North whose name is Stark." Mira felt something fall in her throat. Did she hear well? "I don't care if he's a bastard. Ned Stark's blood runs through his veins. He's my king, from this day until his last day."

New murmurs erupted. What is she doing? She just said Jon Snow was her king. At the high table, they didn't seem to know how to react, and things were no better on the benches and seats down below.

"Wait a minute." Ser Daven Lannister was the first one to intervene. His long hair and beard almost gave him the appearance of a Northerner. "We brought men from the Westerlands and the Riverlands, with winter at our doors, to give back Winterfell to its proper lady. Now you want to replace her with a bastard? Sansa Lannister is the Wardeness of the North."

Mira immediately knew nothing good would come out from that. He just called Sansa by the name Lannister. Lord Manderly got on his feet immediately. "Lady Mormont speaks harshly and truly. My son died for Robb Stark, the Young Wolf. I thought his brother Rickon could be our next king, a worthy successor. When he died, I feared there was no chance for us to find another king in my lifetime. But I was wrong. Jon Snow avenged the Red Wedding. He is the White Wolf. The King in the North."

The Lord of White Harbor unsheathed his word and went on his knees as he said the last words. Shouts followed, some approving Lord Manderly, many others opposing. Out of all this, the Lord of the Eyrie decided to say something again.

"You can't exchange the legitimate daughter of Eddard Stark for a bastard!"

"Better a bastard who fought with us on the battlefield than a knight hiding behind mountains," the lord of White Harbor replied before turning to Ser Daven. "Or butchers who hide behind trees while we die by the thousands."

"Lady Mormont's men were with us in these woods," the Lannister knight countered. "They watched you fight from afar as much as we did. And maybe if your king hadn't charged the Bolton lines mindlessly, you wouldn't have been caught in his trap and slaughtered."

The hall went into confusion. Everything was shouts, cures, insults, yells. Fists were brandished. Ser Brynden, Jon Snow, Lord Tyrion and even Sansa tried to bring back the order but they couldn't. There was too much hatred between everyone here. This would end up in another war. Another war that would cost the life to thousands of people, right at the moment they could less afford it.

There was a decrease in the shouting at one moment, and Mira seized the opportunity. She had to do something. "Lord Manderly," she said clearly. The Lord of White Harbor looked at her, and a few other people as well, though many kept arguing between themselves. "You lost your son Wendel in the last war. Ser Daven, you lost your father at Oxcross. Lord Glover, your lost your brother in the war as well. You, Lady Karstark, lost your father and your three brothers. Ser Davos Seaworth’s son died on the Blackwater." Almost everyone was looking at her now. "And you, Lady Mormont." She stared at the child of ten who held her gaze. "Your mother Maege and your sister Dacey both died in the war. I lost my parents and two brothers. The War of the Five Kings only brought death to the North, and to everyone. We started a war because Joffrey Baratheon murdered Eddard Stark. He was a monster. I know it. I was a handmaiden for Margaery Tyrell, his betrothed, and she told me herself one day. Joffrey is a monster. But Joffrey is dead. Tywin Lannister is dead. The Freys and the Boltons behind the Red Wedding are dead. We have no more reasons to fight. Tommen Baratheon is the opposite of his brother. He’s not a tyrant. Torrhen Stark bent the knee to Aegon Targaryen three hundred years ago because he couldn’t defeat him, because fighting would have been useless. If we are to believe Jon Snow, we have a new enemy, much more dangerous than any king or lord of the south. We have been weakened by the wars. We don’t have enough men to fight this enemy on our own, and even less the means to fight it and to fight the southern kingdoms at the same time. To choose our independence right now wouldn’t be to choose freedom. It would be to choose death. It would be to choose to lose everything we have left. It would be to choose the destruction of the North."

She sat back, shaking from the words she just said. She couldn’t allow to lose anyone else from her family. Fighting Tommen, Margaery and Lord Tyrion was as stupid as it was useless. Lord Glover rose from his seat and looked at her.

"Lady Hightower, you speak wisely, I’ll give you that, but you spent all these last years in the south. You weren’t with us while our brothers and sisters of the North died in the hands of the Lannisters and the Boltons. You cannot understand what we feel. You haven’t been in the North for years."

"I lost people I loved all the same, Lord Glover. I know how you feel. It was as painful for me to hear that the people I loved were dead from a great distance than if I had seen them die with my own eyes. I remained loyal to the North through all these years. My service for Queen Margaery Tyrell and my marriage into House Hightower didn't change that. I am a Forrester, and I will always be a Forrester."

The Lord of Deepwood Motte looked at her sternly, and he had a sorry expression on his face as well. "I don't doubt it a second, my lady, but there is something every one of you must know. Something I hid so far, and that I shouldn't have." He looked straight before him, in the direction of the high table. "I was wrong to deny you help in your time of need. I know Robb Stark would have wanted me to do it." He produced something from his cloak. It was a sealed parchment. "This is the last decree Robb Stark wrote before he died. He made it before he learned that his wife was pregnant, to name his successor. He entrusted the decree to my brother, and Galbart gave it to me not long before his death."

Everyone was looking at Lord Glover and the scroll in his hand. Robb Stark's last decree. Her father had ridden with him. He and Rodrik were supposed to ride in the vanguard when they would march on Casterly Rock. Ser Brynden Tully left the high table and walked to Lord Glover.

"Show it to me," he said.

Lord Glover slowly gave it to the knight of House Tully who looked at the scroll very carefully. He looked behind to his grandniece. "Robb Stark's seal. Unbroken." He broke it and began to read it aloud. "I, Robb Stark, Lord of Winterfell and King in the North, hereby proclaim my half-brother, Jon Snow, heir to all my titles and lands in the eventuality that I was to die without child. I release him from his vows to the Night's Watch and promise fair and appropriate compensation to the Watch in return. Signed by Lady Maege Mormont of Bear Island and Lord Galbart Glover of Deepwood Motte as witnesses. This is the signature of the king."

Murmurs started all over again. Ser Brynden Tully was well known by everyone here, and Mira knew him for a man of honor. He wouldn't lie about such a thing. She looked at Sansa, who seemed lost. Lord Tyrion had a grave expression. Lord Glover stepped forward to stand right before Sansa's brother and next to Lord Manderly. The words he said were meant for Jon Snow.

"I did not fight beside you on the field and I will regret that until my dying day. A man can only admit when he was wrong and ask forgiveness."

"There's nothing to forgive, my lord." Jon Snow looked as lost as everyone else.

"There will be more fights to come. House Glover will stand behind House Stark as we have for a thousand years. And I will stand behind Jon Snow…" He unsheathed his sword and held it up. "The King in the North!"

He knelt. "The King on the North!" someone followed. Then many swords were drawn in the air. All the lords of the North were cheering together.

"THE KING IN THE NORTH! THE KING IN THE NORTH! THE KING IN THE NORTH!
THE KING IN THE NORTH! THE KING IN THE NORTH!"

Mira heard her sister join the common outcry. She stood up to see better. There were lords from the Riverlands who began to shout the same. The Blackfish remained in the middle of the Hall, silent, still holding Robb Stark's last decree, while everyone was confused at the high table. No one from the Westerlands or the Vale of Arryn joined the Northerners. She saw Lord Tyrion whispering something in his wife's ear. He and Sansa left the high table and walked off the room, getting through the alley in the center of the room, followed by the knights and lords of the Westerlands, then by Harrold Arryn and his bannermen. When they were gone, only the Riverlands and the North were still present. Mira noticed Ser Davos who was hailing Jon Snow as well. Ser Brynden Tully the Blackfish remained in the alley. He had given way to let the Lannisters and the Arryns leave the Hall, but hadn't left it himself. Not yet, since he carefully placed the scroll on the table next to Lord Glover, then walked away with a resigned look. As he did, some river lords followed him, and soon the hailing was over as everyone realized how empty the Great Hall of Winterfell had become.

Mira had done nothing all this time. She just remained here, standing. She didn't hail Jon Snow, but she didn't turn her back on him either. Robb Stark's last decree wasn't far from her. She looked at it and saw the first lines. I, Robb Stark, Lord of Winterfell and King in the North, hereby proclaim my half-brother, Jon Snow, heir to all my titles and lands… The direwolf sigil was next to his signature. Without any doubt, the decree was from Robb Stark. It was his last decree, his will. The will of the man her family served. The will of the man her father hailed as his king. What was she going to do? She didn't know. So far, she did nothing.

Chapter End Notes

Last chapter before a while. I'm sorry. My master's thesis takes too much of my time and I will only come back at the beginning of July. I'm at the end of my studies at the university and I must really focus on it.

We've reached the equivalent of the end of Season 6 in the timeline. The events that will follow will be entirely original and not based on the events of the next seasons, since the outline of the future events of this fic are already decided.

Let me know what you think of this fic so far. Don't fall back if you want to criticize it.

Please review
Sansa XXIX

Chapter Notes

Hi everyone! I'm back, with two chapters every week!

Previously, in "A Shadow and a Wolf":
Jon Snow was hailed King in the North after the Second Battle of Winterfell. However, his situation is far from being strong, the lords of the Westerlands and the Vale opposing him for Sansa. In the meantime, Daenerys finally defeated the slavers in Slaver's Bay and is sailing back to Westeros with Prince Trystane Martell, Ser Jorah Mormont, Varys and the High Priestess Kinvara by her side, along with a powerful army. Cersei Lannister believes she eliminated all her enemies in King's Landing when she blew up the Great Sept of Baelor, but someone survived. With the death of King Tommen who committed suicide, war and chaos is spreading through Westeros. Winter has come, and no one is safe.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

SANSA XXIX

"I sent a raven to Edmure. I'm waiting for his answer. Until I receive one, I can't do anything."

Sansa kept rocking Joanna as her granduncle spoke. Taking care of her daughter was her only way to escape all her worries for the last two days. She envied her little child. She slept peacefully now, ignoring what was going on out there, unaware of all the suspicion and tension that gained Winterfell since the day Jon was hailed King in the North by the Northerners.

"Don't you think the lords of the North could abandon their idea of making Jon king if they saw that no river lord supported them?" she asked.

"Northerners are proud, Sansa, and they just chose Jon Snow for their king, just as they chose your brother Robb before. That's not a choice that can be undone easily, and I'm not sure this choice must be undone."

"What do you mean?"

"These were the last words of your brother, Sansa," Ser Brynden explained to her very carefully. "The last wishes of Robb Stark, of the king I served. Can I go against them?"

Sansa couldn't believe what she heard. "Don't you realize what this will do? The North just declared its independence. That's a rebellion against the Crown."

"The Crown that killed your father. Tommen Baratheon may not have killed Eddard Stark, but his brother did."

"That's not it. There's going to be a war. Margaery is a good person, but she will never let the North rebel against her and Tommen. They will order us to put it down. I will have to fight against my own brother."

She said so in despair. They had come here in the hope to end this war once and for all, and instead the northern lords decided to start it all over again. Sansa felt betrayed by her father's men. She was his daughter, and they chose Jon, a bastard, because she was married to a Lannister. It was so unfair. They brought their men, risked their lives for the North, and now she was set aside and they would to go to war again.

Winterfell and all its surroundings had become like a battlefield. There had been no battle so far, luckily enough, but each camp was entrenched and each army eyed the others closely, waiting for someone to make the first move. It was as if they were in peace, but on the brink of war. A single spark and everything would go aflame, like wildfire. Winterfell itself was divided between the sections controlled by the Lannisters, the Northerners, the wildlings and the Tullys. There were guards everywhere from every kingdom. The wildlings and the Northerners supported Jon while the lords of the Westerlands and the Vale supported Sansa. The river lords were divided.

"You said the queen is your friend," her granduncle said. "Do you think you could convince her to allow the North to remain independent? I think Edmure would accept to stay in the Seven Kingdoms in exchange, I can arrange that."

Sansa shook her head. "Margaery will not let one of the kingdoms leave the Realm. She is kind, but she wants to be queen of all the Seven Kingdoms, not six of them." Sansa looked at her daughter. She slept peacefully. If she knew everything that was going on right now… "Was the decree from Robb, really?"

"It was," the Blackfish confirmed. "It had his seal and his signature, and when your husband and I went to see Jon Snow, he showed us the decree. Lord Tyrion himself recognized this was from Robb Stark. He said he recognized the writing from the declaration of independence he sent to King's Landing and that his sister tore off when they received it."

"I hope he didn't do like her."

"No, he didn't."

Sansa allowed half a smile to appear on her lips for a very short moment. She kept rocking Joanna. "Why did Robb make Jon his heir?"

"For the same reason his bannermen chose Jon as their king instead of you as their Wardeness. Because you're married to the Imp." His voice wasn't hard. It was soft, and sorry as well.

"He disinherited me because he thought I was a Lannister?" Her voice was weak.

"He believed the Lannisters were going to kill you as soon as as they would have a son from you."

"Tyrion would never have done that!" she shouted.

Wailing followed her outcry. Sansa was immediately sorry. She just woke up Joanna. She hushed and brought her in the other room, singing a lullaby. Once she was asleep, Sansa left her there in her cradle with the wet nurse and a guard. She didn't want to trouble her daughter's first months with all this.

When she came back, her mother's uncle was still there. "I'm sorry that Robb disinherited you, Sansa, but you have to understand he wasn't the only one to think the same about your husband. Even I and your mother thought that Tyrion Lannister was going to get rid of you someday. We agreed with Robb's decision to name another heir."

"My mother should have known he wouldn't do it. Tyrion saved her life on the Eastern Road, after she arrested him. Without him, she would have died long before the Red Wedding."
"We were at war with the Lannisters, Sansa. We couldn't allow them to take the North if Robb was to die childless. Your sister and your other brothers were supposed dead. Jon Snow was the only option, aside from some distant cousins in the Vale."

Sansa remained silent for a moment. Then a question came to her mind. "Tell me, Uncle. When Tyrion offered to exchange me for Ser Jaime, what did Robb do?"

"He refused. He sent men to capture the Kingslayer again when your mother set him free."

Sansa's breathing came quickly. "He refused to get me back… to keep the Kingslayer his prisoner." Sansa felt broken, betrayed. "Tyrion and I brought a whole army in the North, we risked our lives and thousands of other lives, only to save Arya. And you tell me that my own family, when they had the chance to save me, refused?"

Her own blood… Her mother… Robb… They abandoned her. As soon as they learnt she was married with Tyrion, and even before that, they abandoned her. They gave up on her. Now her half-brother turned on her, was declared King in the North, took the North that should have gone to her, and Arya was on his side. All her family had turned on her.

"Your brother didn't have an easy choice to make," explained a man who had Tully blood in his veins, just like her. "We were at war. His bannermen had declared him king. He had duties."

"So he put his crown before me." Sansa sat. Tears were rolling on her cheeks. "I loved Robb. He was my brother, and you say he could save me and he didn't, all that to keep an useless prisoner."

"Ser Jaime Lannister was the son of Tywin Lannister," he countered.

"Tywin Lannister never did anything to save his son. I prayed every day so that my brother would come and save me from that hell where I was, and you say he gave up on me the moment he heard I was forced to marry into another family, and even before?" She was yelling now, but she didn't care.

"Your brother loved you, but he thought you were lost, Sansa. I'm sorry. He did what he thought was the best for the North."

"Not for his family it seems. Or did he think I was a Lannister now, like you thought when you saw me at Riverrun? Like all the northern lords seem to think now? I was no longer his sister?"

"He always thought of you as his sister. But you must admit it is difficult for everyone who sees you to see the daughter of Eddard Stark, when you arrive dressed in the fashions of the south and with a golden necklace displaying a lion. I know it hides a direwolf, but they don't know it. They don't see the direwolf. They only see the lion and the gold. Lannister gold."

Sansa looked at the necklace she always wore. The golden lion was as shining as usual. She thought about opening the necklace to look at the direwolf, but she couldn't bring herself to do it. Tears kept streaming from her eyes as she thought about her father who killed Lady, about Robb who refused to exchange Ser Jaime Lannister for her safe return, about her mother who approved Robb's decision to disinherit her, about Jon, her bastard brother, who just turned their father's bannermen against her, about Arya who almost killed her in the Neck… She knew she was being unfair, but right now she could only think about that. They only saw the golden lion. She was abandoned by her own family.

She thought about Tyrion who refused to share her bed as long as she didn't want on their wedding night. She thought of Genna who showed her Tyrion's mother on the tapestry. She thought of Dorna who she prayed with in the sept at Casterly Rock. She thought of Janei playing with her hair. She thought of Ser Kevan, asking her to take care of Tyrion. She thought of Cerenna, playing the harp with her. She thought of Joy, how she taught the little girl to pray to the Old Gods. She even thought of Ser Jaime, who helped her to free his brother.

She kept looking at the golden lion, and something she read at White Harbor came back to her mind. The king (very much in his cups) asked her if giving suck to them had “ruined your breasts, which were so high and proud”. The question greatly amused Lord Tywin’s rivals, who were always pleased to see the Hand slighted or made mock of, but Lady Joanna was humiliated. Her mother had never been humiliated in public. She didn’t marry in the Great Sept of Baelor. She didn’t marry a Lannister. She never was Lady of Casterly Rock. She didn’t marry a man older than her. She never lived in King’s Landing. She was never friend with a queen. Sansa may look like her lady mother, but the life she had was more similar to the one of the late Lady of Casterly Rock and her husband’s mother, the woman her only child was named after.

She didn’t open the necklace. The golden lion was all that was needed to be seen. That was the only thing to see. Her own family hadn’t tried to help her. Was she a Stark if the other Starks didn’t believe she was one of them? She had held the necklace in her hand all this time. She let it fall under her collarbone. She was wearing gold, a lion made of gold. She was Sansa Lannister, Lady of Casterly Rock and Lady of the Westerlands.

Tyrion came into the room at this moment. Her true family was here. Tyrion didn't look at her as he entered. He closed the door, walked past her and her granduncle, threw a paper on the desk and went to the wall, placing a hand on it. Something was wrong.

"Tyrion?" she asked him, worried.

He slowly turned to face her and was about to speak, but he stopped. "Have you cried?"

Sansa realized she still had dried tears on her cheeks. She wiped them out of her face with her sleeve. "That's nothing. What's going on?"

Tyrion looked queerly at her, then to the Blackfish, but her granduncle seemed to tell him silently to leave her be. Tyrion looked back at her and gulped before he spoke. "Tommen is dead."

After everything she went through, Sansa thought nothing could surprise her anymore, but she was wrong. "What happened?" she asked quietly.

"If we are to believe my sweet sister, the fanatics who call themselves the Sparrows killed him. They also destroyed the Great Sept of Baelor according to the raven I just received."

Tommen was gone. Sansa remembered him riding against a quintain during Joffrey's name day after her father died. He had always been a sweet boy. First Myrcella, now Tommen. Margaery just lost her third husband. *Margaery."

"Wait. You say the raven was sent by Cersei?" she asked.

"Yes." Tyrion obviously wasn't happy about this fact.

"But what is she doing in King’s Landing?"

"She found a way to come back, it seems."

"But Margaery would never have allowed that," Sansa opposed. Her husband looked down. "Tyrion?" She feared the answer he might give her.

"Margaery is dead as well. And her brother too." This hit much more than the news of Tommen’s death. "I'm sorry, Sansa."

Margaery. She was dead. Margaery, who managed to control Joffrey, who was prepared to face King's Landing. Her friend. The person who tried to reassure her when she was betrothed to Tyrion, who helped to free him later, who was her main ally in the capital. Gone. She was gone. First Jeyne, now Margaery.

"The king and the queen," her granduncle slowly said from far away. "Both dead, within the same day?"

Tyrion scoffed. "And that's not the best. Cersei proclaimed herself queen."

This brought Sansa back to the reality she drifted away from for a moment. "Queen?" she said.

"Yes. Since there was no one else to occupy the throne, she decided to seize it and to declare she was queen of all the Seven Kingdoms."

Her husband didn't enjoy this prospect anymore than her. "On what ground did she do that?" Ser Brynden Tully wore an expression that clearly showed he didn't understand how the situation could have come to this. "She has absolutely no claim on the Iron Throne. She was a queen consort and her husband and all her children are dead."

"That kind of things never stopped Cersei. She removed Ser Barristan from the Kingsguard to have my brother as Lord Commander. She's wanted the Iron Throne all her life. Now she won't hesitate to do anything to keep it. I wouldn't be surprised she's the one behind Tommen's and Margaery's deaths."

"She killed her own son?!" If killing your king was a horrible crime, killing someone of your own blood was worse than anything. The one who did this was accused by all the gods of the north and the south. Her mother's uncle displayed very well what everyone would think of Cersei if they knew it.

"Not on purpose, but it wouldn't surprise me if she plotted to have his wife killed and that somehow Tommen got caught between two fires. You can say whatever you want about my sister, she loves her children. That's her one redeeming quality. And now they're all gone. I'm afraid her sole redeeming quality went into smoke." Sadness was plain on Tyrion's face. Sansa knew how much he loved his youngest nephew and his niece, to the opposite of Joffrey. "But it doesn't matter now. My sister is sitting on the Iron Throne, and she has wanted me dead for longer than I can remember. She will try again soon, if she hasn't planned something already."

"Well, I will never bend the knee to that woman. Edmure can say what he wants, I won't follow the woman who imprisoned Eddard Stark and had him executed, and who killed her own son. On purpose or not, it doesn't matter, she did it, the whore."

Tyrion nodded in approval. "Very appropriate word. When we left King's Landing, the people were calling her the Whore Queen in the streets." Ser Brynden let escape a muffled laugh. "It's out of question that I bend the knee to her me neither, not after she tried to have me killed. And now that she killed the two children of Mace Tyrell, I imagine the Reach will go to war against her, just like Dorne already did. I don't intend to follow her to her grave when she would gladly push me in that grave before she's pushed in her turn. Anyway, as soon as she learns that Jon Snow was hailed King in the North, she will use it as an excuse to brand me a traitor and order my death. And she will make sure Sansa dies as well. And our daughter."

"She will never do that!" Sansa said all of a sudden. "I won't allow her." Cersei wouldn't touch her daughter.

"I don't doubt it", the Blackfish said. "However, we have another problem now. If we refuse to bend the knee before Cersei Lannister, we need another king."

"It's a good thing we have one then," replied her husband.

Sansa looked at him. "You want to support Jon?" she asked.

"I don't think we have another option. I wouldn't call a choice between my sister and your half-brother a choice."

"You're right." Sansa had to recognize this was true. "Jon is my brother. He will fight for us against Cersei."

"I think I can convince Edmure to side with Jon Snow as well. My nephew is not the most brilliant man in Westeros, but he's not stupid either. He'll see that he can't lend his support to Cersei. That would be foolish and dishonorable," the knight said.

"Good," Tyrion declared. He tried to sound cheerful, but Sansa knew he wasn't. That was his black humor that returned. "Now we only have to convince Harrold Arryn and maybe we'll have a chance to overthrow my sister and place Jon Snow on the Iron Throne in her stead."

A heavy silence followed his declaration. Then her granduncle spoke the question she was about to.
"Wait a minute. You want Jon Snow to sit on the Iron Throne?"

Tyrion shrugged. "Don't you think he would make a better king than Cersei? I think a crown suits him better."

"Maybe," her mother's uncle recognized, though he still sounded skeptical, "but that won't work.
You heard the Knights of the Vale, or at least their lord paramount. He will never accept a bastard of the North as his king, and I doubt the Reach and Dorne will accept it either. Jon Snow, King, in the North, aye, but Lord of the Seven Kingdoms? I don't think so. Robb was a trueborn son, and even him never thought of ruling all of Westeros. His bastard brother will never succeed there either."

He was right. Sansa didn't see Mace Tyrell bend the knee before Jon, and from what she saw of Oberyn Martell and the other lords of Dorne in King's Landing, they would doubtfully accept a bastard from the other side of the world. Margaery's father would sooner proclaim himself king instead of seeing the crown fall on Jon's head. Tyrion told her Doran Martell was a very cautious man, so he may accept Jon if all the other kingdoms did, but the Stormlands and the Vale? Harrold Arryn had been unflinching on that point. He said clearly the North should be hers, but he was wrong. The North couldn't be hers. She was a Lannister. Everyone knew it.

"No, it's true." Tyrion acknowledged the truth of her granduncle's words with a very low voice.
"They will never accept a bastard of the North." Tyrion seemed lost in his mind. He was pacing near the table. He did it sometimes, when he was thinking very hardly and was already standing. When it happened while he sat, he would only look down and frown for a long moment. "But they could accept someone else."

He wasn't talking to them now. He was talking to himself. He was lost in his thoughts. He walked to the door and called for Podrick. He whispered something into the squire's ear. Podrick had to stoop to hear it. He nodded and left with a yes, my lord. Tyrion shut the door behind.

"What did you tell him?" she asked.
"I ordered him to fetch someone who could solve the problem of Jon-Snow-not-being-able-to-be-king."

"Who?"

"You'll find out soon. In the meantime, I suppose we could drink to our sovereigns' deaths. It will make us pass the time."

As a man of his word, Tyrion took the decanter on the table and poured three glasses of wine. Sansa accepted it. She needed it, after hearing about her friend's death. She hadn't been close to Tommen, but she regretted his death too. To her relief, Ser Brynden took the cup her husband was offering him.

"To King Tommen," Tyrion said as he took his own glass.

"To Queen Margaery," Sansa added, imitating his movement.

"To Ser Loras," finished their uncle in the same gesture. They all drank. Sansa inhaled deeply once she gulped her first sip.

"I'm sorry for your nephew," her granduncle said at the attention of Tyrion. "Bastard or not, he was still your nephew."

That reminded her of what Tyrion replied to Joffrey the day they met. Her father was a confessed traitor. Tyrion had replied but still her father.

"Before you ask, Blackfish, I will answer you. My nephews and my niece were bastards born of incest. My brother was their father. He laid with my sister on several occasions, even before she was wed to the king. Stannis Baratheon told the truth from the beginning."

Tyrion's confession sank deep in the room. Sansa didn't think he would say that so openly, despite the moderate friendship he established with her granduncle. Ser Brynden's face was even as he spoke. "That was no secret for anybody." That was all he said.

"Before you judge me, ask yourself what you would have done in my stead, if two members of your family, of your own blood, did the same. Would you have turned against them?"

"I'm not judging you," he replied after a moment. "Family, duty, honor. Family comes first. I would have done the same if, I don't know, if Edmure and Lysa had been laying together. Though I can't imagine them doing such a thing."

"No, your youngest niece preferred the company of Littlefinger."

Her granduncle was displeased by the comment, but he said nothing. They remained silent for a long time until Podrick knocked on the door and announced Lord Howland Reed and Lady Arya Stark. Sansa didn't see her little sister since Jon was hailed king. She supported Jon, and how could Sansa blame her. Jon had been a good brother to Arya whenever Sansa was at best an inappropriate sister. Arya barely acknowledged her presence. It was Tyrion she looked at, and her gaze was everything but benevolent.

"I don't remember asking for your presence, Lady Arya." He did it on purpose. He knew Arya hated to be called this way. Sansa appreciated Tyrion's sense of humor, but this wasn't the time for this. Not when everyone's nerves were on edge and that Arya had Needle at her belt. Jon had told her about how she killed Ramsay and Sansa didn't want to see her sister repeat her feat with Tyrion.
"She came here because she doesn't trust you," Howland Reed answered in her sister's place. "I couldn't refuse her."

Tyrion made a face that showed it didn't matter. "It's probably for the better. She might want to hear what we're about to discuss."

"If you summoned me to try and convince me again to support the Lady Sansa, then I must warn you that my answer is still the same than the last time. I will not fight against my best friend's son, not when all my compatriots chose him as their king, and when this was the last wish of Robb Stark. He was my king, whether you like it or not."

Howland Reed had been more hesitary to hail Jon king at the summit two days ago, but he had hailed him all the same in the end. Tyrion and Sansa had tried to turn him on their side the following day. They didn't want to start a war against Jon, only rally enough northern lords on her side to convince the others that there was no point supporting Jon. They had miserably failed. Every lord they asked had refused, some with courtesy, saying they regretted the situation but that it was the last wish of her brother and that they had to obey it. Others, however, almost insulted them, claiming they would stand behind a true son of Eddard Stark.

"Are you with him?" Arya was asking this question to her. "You want to fight against Jon? You want to take his place?"

"Not at all." Tyrion answered before Sansa could. "Quite the opposite. I asked you to come, Lord Reed, because I decided not only to recognize Jon Snow as King in the North, but also to recognize him as my king."

Arya was speechless, eyes and mouth all round. The Lord of Greywater Watch was no better. They regained their composure after some time and looked at Tyrion with curiosity.

"Is this some joke, Lannister?" Arya asked.

"No, it's not." Her granduncle stepped into the conversation. He put the scroll Tyrion had brought with him under the nose of her father's friend. "Read, Reed. Tommen Baratheon and Margaery Tyrell are dead. And the Lannister bitch decided to take the empty place they left." He explained it as Howland Reed read the message Tyrion received.

"And since my sister tried to have me killed several times in the past, and will certainly try again now, I'm not in a great hurry to run to King's Landing and to pledge my house to her," Tyrion added.

"But she's your sister," Arya said.

"A sister who tried to kill me. And not by mistake. My sister did want to kill me."

Sansa saw shame on Arya's face as she looked at her after Tyrion said those words.

"So now you want to support Jon Snow?" Lord Reed asked as he gave back the small scroll to her granduncle.

"Yes. I think King of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm would sound much better with Jon Snow before it. As for me, my ears bleed when I hear my sister's name instead."

"You want Jon Snow to rule the Seven Kingdoms?" Howland Reed asked, all bewildered.

"Yes, though we have a certain problem with that. Ser Brynden kindly observed that Jon Snow was unlikely to be accepted by some people, like the Dornishmen. I hoped you could help us with that."

"Me?" Sansa was as confused as the Lord of Greywater Watch as he spoke. "How could I help with that?"

"You could begin by telling us what really happened at the Tower of Joy twenty years ago."

For a reason totally unknown to Sansa, Lord Reed first froze, then he went blank as a sheet. "I don't know what you're talking about," the lord spat.

"Very well." Tyrion began to walk to the door. "I'll go and tell the king myself."

The Lord of Greywater was in the way and he stopped him with a quick move, holding Tyrion by the shoulder. "What are you going to tell him? What do you know?" She had never seen her father's friend so panicked.

"Oh, so there is something to know," Tyrion said. His back was turned on her, but she knew from his voice that he was smirking.

"Tyrion, what is it about? What is it with the Tower of Joy?" Sansa asked.

The Tower of Joy was a place in Dorne where one of the most famous sword fight of history took place. All children in Westeros were told about this. That was where her father had killed Ser Arthur Dayne, the Sword in the Morning. It was also there that her aunt Lyanna had died at the end of the war. Tyrion didn't reply to her. He kept staring at the Lord of Greywater Watch.

"There is nothing to know," the lord in question quickly said. Sansa didn't understand his behavior. It was as if he saw a White Walker.

Tyrion inclined his head. She knew he was smiling wickedly. "Lord Reed, I visited the Wall years ago before the war and I travelled to the Wall with Jon Snow. I asked him indirectly at the time if he ever made dreams of dragons. He didn't answer, but his reaction told me everything. There's one kind of people in Westeros who often dream of dragons, and there aren't many left."

Howland Reed looked entirely lost. Sansa didn't understand why, but what her husband told him seemed to have taken him unaware.

"Lord Reed," he resumed, "maybe it's time to tell the truth."

"Why should I tell you?" the crannogman almost spat.

"Because I want to help Jon Snow to take the Iron Throne. Some lords will not accept a bastard of the North, but they might accept someone else."

"By the Seven Hells, can someone tell me what's going on?" Sansa's granduncle asked. "What's the link between dragons, Jon Snow and the Tower of Joy?" Sansa and Arya were as lost as he was. Only Tyrion and Howland Reed seemed to understand what they were talking about.

"I swore to never talk about it," Lord Reed said after a moment.

"Why? To protect him? I'm afraid it's too late for that. He's King in the North now, and if history can teach us something, it's that ever since Aegon came to Westeros with his sisters, there's only enough place for one king in the Seven Kingdoms. My sister will try to have my half-brother-in-law killed before long. The truth could help us to overthrow her. Don't you think?" Howland Reed's face was hard, indecipherable. "And don't you think it's time he knew the truth? He doesn't know, does he?"
The Lord of Greywater Watch turned his back on her husband and walked to the wall, his hand wandering on his jaw. Arya looked at him for a moment, then turned to Tyrion, a hostile attitude. "What are you talking about? What do you want with Jon?"

"Stop, Arya," the crannogman said. "Lord Tyrion may be right this time."

"Right about what?"

Sansa didn't understand what was going on. She was as clueless as everyone else in this room, except for Tyrion and Howland Reed. Only they seemed to understand what they were talking about.

"There's something you should know, but I want you to promise me that you won't repeat it to anybody before I speak to Jon Snow," the lord said slowly and firmly.

"You have my word," replied Tyrion. He went to a chair and sat comfortably in it.

"But what is it you're talking about?" Sansa asked. What was going on? Tyrion kept his eyes locked on Howland Reed. He wouldn't look at her for a second. She couldn't get to understand the matter he spoke with Howland Reed. What could have caused such a reaction with Howland Reed when dreams of dragon, the Tower of Joy, Jon and the Iron Throne were concerned?

"You must give me your word," Lord Reed repeated. “All of you.”

"Very well, you have my word," Sansa finally said. If that was the price to know what they were talking about.

"You have mine," her granduncle said, who looked intrigued at both men.

"All right," Arya just said.

The Lord of Greywater Watch looked to the floor, then sighed a few times, before he looked at each of them in turn. "What I'm about to tell you is something that I've hidden for years, and for very good reasons. But considering the recent developments, it might be appropriate to reveal it now. Anyway, there's no one left to hurt with the truth." He inhaled deeply. "You all know how Robert's Rebellion started?"

"Of course," her mother's uncle scoffed. "It's difficult to forget how he burned the Lord of Winterfell and strangled his son."

"No. The events that led to the war took place a year before, at the Tourney of Harrenhal."

"Yes, I know." Sansa may not have focused on the most important things in her education, but she had learned the essential facts about the history of the Seven Kingdoms and the history of her family. "Rhaegar Targaryen won the final tilt against Ser Barristan Selmy, and instead of crowning his wife queen of love and beauty, he crowned our aunt Lyanna."

"Aye," Ser Brynden confirmed. "I was there. One moment everyone was cheerful after the prince won, and the next moment everyone was silent as death. I never saw so many people silent. Your aunt was already betrothed to Robert Baratheon. He was there, and your father and your uncles as well. You can imagine the atmosphere."

"And later he kidnapped her and raped her," Sansa concluded.

"So much for a crown," Tyrion said bitterly. "Though normally this is no the kind of crown that How many people wouldn't have died if Rhaegar Targaryen hadn't chosen her aunt this day? Though she didn't see what was the link with Jon.

"Yes," Howland Reed resumed. "Rhaegar Targaryen kidnapped her and raped her. That's what everyone believes, and that's what I believed at the time too. But you don't know the whole story. You may have heard that a mystery knight participated to the lists."

"Oh yes. The Mad King believed it was my brother, but I'm afraid once again he was wrong. Jaime was not at Harrenhal at the time," Tyrion said.

"It wasn't him," Arya said sharply. "It was my aunt."

Sansa looked at her sister. "What? Aunt Lyanna? She rode in the tourney?"

"Aye, she did."

"It's the truth," Howland Reed confirmed. "I was there as well and I arrived in the middle of the tourney. I was ambushed and beaten by three squires and Lyanna saved me. She beat them with a tourney sword. Then she rode in the lists under a false appearance and defeated the knights these squires were serving, and forced them to teach a lesson to their squires. She only did that to defend me. She didn't participate to the rest of the tourney. All she wanted was to have the squires punished. Only her shield was found abandoned in a tree. But…"

Sansa's father never spoke of his sister. Sansa found it strange, even if she died almost when he found her at the end of the war. Maybe he considered himself responsible for not rescuing her in time and speaking of her brought back memories too painful to bear.

"But what?" Ser Brynden abruptly said. "What does it have to do with Jon Snow?" He was growing impatient. Lord Reed raised a hand to ask for patience.

"I believe," he began to say, "I believe it is possible that Lyanna wasn't abducted by Prince Rhaegar."

"What are you saying?" Her granduncle was more bewildered than ever, and Sansa was too.

"I was there at Harrenhal. Lyanna was betrothed to Robert, but she never spent time with him, except when she was forced to, and each time she didn't seem to enjoy it. At feasts, Robert would join in drinking contests and dance with almost every lady in the room, all but Lyanna. She didn't seem to give him the slightest attention. But the first day I was here, the prince performed a song and I saw Lyanna cry as he played, and I know the king sent Rhaegar after the mysterious knight. Maybe he found out who she was. The thing is… I believe it's possible that Lyanna escaped with Rhaegar Targaryen later. Maybe she wanted to avert her marriage with Robert, maybe she was in love with the prince…"

"That's impossible," Ser Brynden declared. "Lyanna was a Stark. Ladies of great houses don't flee like that."

"You didn't know Lyanna Stark. I did. I look at Arya and I almost have the impression that her aunt came back to life. They have the same behavior. She would have been capable of fleeing. Maybe later Rhaegar kept her against her will, but I believe it's possible that she wasn't kidnapped first."

Sansa would never have thought such a thing possible, but she had to admit it wasn't totally unlikely. She remembered Robert Baratheon, a fat man who spent his time drinking and eating, making...
bawdy jokes, and who brought whores into his bed all the time. Sansa had thought of escaping King's Landing, of abandoning her husband. Thinking of how things turned out, she was glad she didn't. That had been one of the best decisions in her life. However, imagining herself married with Robert… She could easily picture that any woman would try to flee from him if that was possible, and if their aunt had been like Arya, Sansa had no difficulty to believe she could do it.

"You know what happened afterwards," the Lord of Greywater Watch resumed. "Brandon and Rickard Stark were killed by the Mad King in King's Landing, and Ned, Jon Arryn, Hoster Tully and Robert Baratheon raised their banners against him. Rhaegar Targaryen was slain at the Trident, the Mad King was murdered and Robert was crowned king. Ned continued on his way south and lifted the siege of Storm's End, but after that we went to Dorne, to a place called the Tower of Joy. That was where Lyanna was being held. We were six. Ned, me, William Dustin, Ethan Glover, Martyn Cassel and Mark Ryswell. Ser Arthur Dayne and Ser Gerold Hightower were guarding the tower. There was a combat. Ned and I were the only ones to survive, but I was injured. I stayed behind to look at the others who were dead. Ned climbed in the tower alone. He found his sister, but she was dying already. We couldn't save her."

Lord Howland seemed close to tears. Sansa knew he was a great friend of her father, and he seemed to have loved her aunt as well.

"Only…" He started again, but stopped before he tried again. "Only… When Ned came back from the tower, he wasn't alone. There were two women with him, servants of House Dayne. One of them had a baby in her arms."

"A baby?" Sansa asked, surprised.

"Yes, the son of your aunt Lyanna." A moment passed. "She didn't die of a disease. She died in childbirth."

A deep silence sank into the room again. "Just like my own lady mother," Tyrion said in a very low voice after a long moment.

"Who was the father?" Ser Brynden Tully asked.

"I think you already know, ser."

No, that couldn't be. "Rhaegar Targaryen." Her granduncle said what she thought. "Why did Eddard Stark never tell?"

"Because he promised to never talk about this. Lyanna made him swear to never talk about the boy. If he had revealed the truth, that Rhaegar Targaryen still had one living child, the baby would have died."

"My father would have made sure of that," Tyrion commented without any hint of enthusiasm. Sansa knew it was true. Everyone knew how Tywin Lannister's men murdered Rhaenys and Aegon Targaryen. Aegon was still a babe in the cradle, maybe no older than Sansa's own daughter was right now.

"We went to Starfall after that. Ned wanted to bring back Dawn, the sword of Ser Arthur, to his sister, the Lady Ashara. She and Ned had met at Harrenhal. They knew each other. The thing is… Ser Arthur Dayne was there at the Tower of Joy to defend Prince Rhaegar's son. That was his mission. That was why they kept Lyanna there. Ned had the intention to leave the baby in Ashara’s care so she could raise him like her son, but the day after we arrived, she jumped from one the towers of Starfall into the sea. We never found her body."
"What happened to Aunt Lyanna's son then?" Arya asked.

Howland Reed looked very tired now. He looked at Tyrion who returned the gaze. He looked down one last time, then said it. "Ned did the only thing he could do to honor the promise he made to Lyanna. He brought the boy back with him to Winterfell, and he said he was his."

This time, the silence lasted longer than ever. He said he was his. He said he was his son. Apart from the children he had with her lady mother, her lord father had only claimed one other son.

"Jon?" Sansa barely managed to articulate this simple word of three letters. How could that be?

"Are you really telling us that Jon Snow is the son of Rhaegar Targaryen?" her granduncle asked. Howland Reed nodded.

"That's impossible!" Arya shouted. "Jon is our brother. Father told us all the time."

"He lied to you," Lord Reed said flatly.

"No, he didn't. I know he didn't. When I was with the Brotherhood without Banners, Lord Beric had a squire with him, Edric Dayne. He told me Jon's mother was his wet nurse, a woman named Wylla. He swore it on his honor."

"Because that's what people say at Starfall, and they believe it is the truth. That's the official version, the one Ned gave to Robert Baratheon when they met again in the capital at the end of the war. Wylla was a servant close to Ashara Dayne. She was the servant who held Jon in her arms when Ned left the Tower of Joy. She accepted to make everyone believe she was his mother. She was only a servant. No one would pay any attention to her. You were not the only ones to who Ned lied about the boy. He lied to his king. He lied to the other lords, to his bannermen, to his friends, to his family. He even lied to his wife."

"Wait. Catelyn never knew about it?" Ser Brynden asked. "Her husband never told her?"

"No, as far as I know, she never knew."

Sansa knew her father certainly never told her. Her mother had always hated Jon. When Sansa was young, she assumed her mother only kept her distance from him because he wasn't her son and because he was a bastard. She was naïve. Sansa had been cruel with Jon as well, putting him aside, calling him half-brother all the time instead of calling him by his name, when he was her brother. Now she knew he never was her brother, but still. She had no reason at the time to treat him any different than Robb or Bran or Rickon, but her mother convinced her that since he was a bastard, she had to stay away from him.

"He lied to her," her granduncle said angrily.

"He lied to everyone. Even Benjen Stark was never told about this," Lord Reed replied.

"She was his wife! She had the right to know this, instead of thinking her husband cheated on her."

"And if he told her, she could have told her father, her brother, her sister, or you, and the word would have spread."

"He could have made her swear to never talk about this to anyone else."

"We couldn't take the risk," the Lord of Greywater Watch finally shouted. "We only needed one wrong ear to hear about it and the Spider would have known it immediately. Robert Baratheon would have asked for the boy's head right away, and Tywin Lannister would have given it to him. Ned and I were present in King's Landing when the children of the prince were murdered. We saw them all wrapped in red cloaks to hide the blood on their body. They were barely recognizable. Robert Baratheon said nothing before that. He just turned away. Lyanna died begging Ned to protect her son. His life was too important to risk everything by telling one person, even his wife.

No one said anything for a long time. Lord Reed and her granduncle were staring at each other, both angry. Sansa had gone numb. She looked at Arya, who looked just the same. Jon wasn't their brother. He wasn't their brother.

"Now, since we know, perhaps it's time for the main interested party to be made aware of the situation," Tyrion stated.

Lord Reed turned his gaze away from Ser Brynden. "I'm going to see him right away. I'm sorry."

He addressed the last words to Sansa and Arya, but before he left, Tyrion asked one last thing. "My lord, I doubt Jon Snow is his real name."

"I don't know his real name." Then he opened and was gone.

Sansa looked at her husband. "You knew?" she asked.

"I suspected," he answered. "Sorry I didn't tell you before, but I had no proof, and anyway it would have been of no use to tell the truth about it when someone could have ordered your brother's death… even if he's not really your brother. My family had already killed more than enough."

"When the northern lords learn who Jon Snow really is… They will never accept a Targaryen bastard as their king. Even less when they hear that his father raped Lyanna Stark," her mother's uncle said.

"We don't know if he raped her. According to Howland Reed, she may have fled with him."

"Maybe, but to be honest I have a hard time thinking that, and the other lords will probably not believe it either. Jon Snow cannot be King in the North."

"The northern lords already hailed him," Tyrion countered very calmly. "And although he's not the son of Eddard Stark, he is his nephew. He is still a Stark through his mother. And now, since all the Baratheons, true or supposed, are dead, Jon Snow's real parentage might be our solution to the Cersei problem."

Sansa understood now. All Robert Baratheon's brothers and supposed children were dead, and Jon was the last living son of Rhaegar Targaryen. And before he died, Rhaegar Targaryen was the heir to the Iron Throne.

"Jon has a stronger claim on the Iron Throne than anyone else in the Seven Kingdoms," Sansa said.

"Exactly," her husband confirmed. "The only one who could oppose him would be his aunt, but she's in Essos and the last time I heard of her, Daenerys Targaryen had disappeared in Meereen and her city was being attacked by an alliance of the Free Cities of Volantis, Astapor and Yunkai. She doesn't seem about to come back to Westeros."
From now on, since we outstriped Season 6 and that I cannot be sure of what will happen in Season 7 (despite all the leaks), the events that will take place from now on in this story will not take into consideration what will happen in Season 7. Anyway, more than enough already changed from the canon.

Please review

Next chapter : Jon
JON IX

Jon IX

Chapter Notes

The sequel to Sansa XXIX. Happens right after Howland Reed's revelations.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

JON IX

Jon stood there, motionless. Lord Howland Reed had spent the last half-hour explaining him that he wasn't the son of Eddard Stark. You are a Stark. You might not have my name, but you have my blood. His father didn't tell him he was his son. Because he wasn't his father. He looked at the Lord of Greywater Watch.

"This is not some kind of joke, Lord Reed?" Jon asked.

"No, it's not. I'm sorry." How could that be? "I know this is a lot to take. I know you must wonder why Ned never told you…"

"Of course, I'm wondering! Why did he never tell me?" Jon shouted.

"He couldn't tell you while you were a child. When you left for the Wall, you were still barely a man. Perhaps he wanted to tell you later, when he thought you would be old enough to understand, to deal with it." Howland Reed answered very calmly.

The next time we see each other… "The day I left for the Wall, he told me the next time we'd meet, we would talk about my mother. He promised."

"I'm sorry." Howland Reed looked sincere, and although Jon tried to find a reason for him to lie, he couldn't find any. He had been among the lords to hail him king two days ago, and his father had been a great friend of this man. And this man said that Lord Eddard Stark wasn't Jon's father.

Jon dropped himself into the chair behind the desk. He covered his face with his hands. He had wondered all his life who his mother was. He grew up without her, he had dreamed of her sometimes, always wished he knew her, but his father always refused to tell him who she was. All he had instead were the scowls and disapproving glares of Lady Stark every time he did something slightly bad or that he was better than Robb at anything. And when he left Winterfell, instead of a woman who hugged him before he left, he had the mother of his half-siblings telling him she wanted him to go. The mother of the people he thought were his half-siblings.

"Please, leave me alone. Go," Jon ordered to Lord Reed.

The Lord of Greywater Watch walked to the door, but before he left, he said one last thing. "For what it's worth, your mother died asking Ned to protect you. I can't speak for your father, I didn't know him, but your mother loved you. And I'm sure Ned loved you like his own son."

When Jon was alone, he couldn't think clearly for a very long time. He cried, too. I am the son of Rhaegar Targaryen and Lyanna Stark. He repeated the words in his head over and over. He had thought about all the possibilities concerning his lady mother. He considered she could be higborn or lowborn, a great lady or a tavern girl, a knight's daughter or a girl from a whorehouse. Maybe she had been a camp follower. He never expected his mother was in reality the sister of the man who called himself his father, and that his real father was a prince, a man who abducted her and kept her prisoner and raped her. He never considered that eventuality. That was the one thing he could be certain of, that his father was Eddard Stark. If Lady Stark had known, would she have despised him the way she did? Maybe that would have made no difference. After all, his father raped his mother. She may not have looked at him of a more favorable eye. He would still have been a bastard, the cause of the war that burned the Seven Kingdoms for an entire year. His grandfather was the one to kill Brandon Stark, her first betrothed, and to burn the grandfather of her children, who also happened to be Jon's own grandfather.

And now here he was, King in the North, bearing a title he had no right upon. He wasn't a Stark, not even before he learned the truth. He hadn't known how to react when Lady Mormont said he was her king. Strange now that Jon thought about it, but she was named after his real mother. And then Lord Manderly and after that Lord Glover had supported her. There had been strong exchanges, and of course Lady Mira's speech against naming a new King in the North. Jon knew she was right. They couldn't hope to defeat the White Walkers on their own if they got through the Wall. The Free Folk and the Northerners wouldn't be enough. Robb's will had changed everything. Jon had never thought that his brother... no, his cousin, would name him his heir. At the time, Bran and Rickon were thought to be dead, so Sansa was Robb's heir. His discussions with the northern lords these last days taught him that Robb didn't want the Lannisters to get a hold on the North. However, he doubted Lady Stark had approved Robb in his choice. He had looked at the decree, and this was Robb's signature and writing without any doubt. Could he go against Robb's last wish? Then, Robb didn't know Tyrion Lannister well enough, and his friend wanted to name his son who would get Winterfell after Sansa's name. He would be a Stark, not a Lannister.

Someone burst into the room. It was Arya, as dishevelled as always, her face red too. His little sister. Not anymore. He forced a smile on his face.

"Hi."

Arya didn't smile. "Howland Reed told you?"

"Aye, he did. Seems we're not brother and sister."

"Of course, we are," she protested.

Jon let a laugh without humor escape his throat. "We're still relatives. My mother was your aunt, and your father was my uncle, but we're not siblings. We are cousins."

She slowly turned around the desk and came to stand next to him. She had grown up a lot and stood taller than him when he was sitting, just like now. She looked at him for a moment, straight into his eyes. "I don't care who your father or your mother is. You're my brother. You'll always be."

Then she threw herself against him and wrapped her arms around his neck, just like before they left Winterfell years ago. The chair almost fell behind under the force of the impact. He wrapped his arms around her as well and tousled her hair like he used to do. He heard her laugh.

"You should let your hair grow again," he said as he put her back onto the floor. "It's better for ruffling, and your mother wouldn't approve. It's not fitting for a lady."

"I'm not a lady." That was his sister for sure.

"You reassure me. I won't have to find you a husband."
They both laughed. Arya had grown up, but she would never be a lady like Sansa. That made Jon think about the woman, Brienne of Tarth, who was Sansa's personal shield. That was someone Arya surely admired.

It was the moment Tyrion Lannister chose to come in. He looked at the scene before him, probably surprised to find them both laughing madly.

"Did I interrupt something funny?" he asked.

"What do you want?" Arya asked. All laugh was gone from her face. She had a similar expression to the one she had when they talked about how she killed Ramsay Bolton.

"Only a little conversation with your… brother. Alone, if possible."

Arya obviously didn't want to leave, so Jon put an end to this. "It's all right, Arya. You may leave us."

Arya left, not without looking in the same hostile way she always looked at Tyrion. She slammed the door behind her.

"I pity whoever will marry her," Jon's friend said.

"I decided to not force her into a marriage," Jon said with a smile.

"You did well. There's someone who will be much happier in life for it," the small lord said with a grin. He came to sit in front of Jon. The desk was still separating them though. "So, how does it feel, your Grace?"

"It depends. Being a king, or discovering that you're not at all who you believed to be?"

"Well, I suppose it's more about how you feel after learning that for years you thought you knew who were your parents, or at least one of them, and suddenly you discover that other people were your real parents. I can claim to know what it is to be a bastard, but I'm afraid I have no idea how I would feel if I were to discover tomorrow that my father wasn't my actual father. Who knows, maybe my mother slept with another man and that's why my father hated me so much."

The movements he made with his arms and his face displayed very well the ridicule of the suggestion. Tyrion Lannister was a dwarf, but he was the son of Tywin Lannister without any doubt. If he had been a bastard, his father would have had no hesitation to acknowledge him as such.

"Not only my parents weren't who I thought," Jon said, "but my father kidnapped and raped my mother."

"Oh, we can't be sure about that. Howland Reed believes your mother might have fled with him."

"And she would have stayed away while her own family was at risk?"

"She was pregnant, with you," Tyrion offered as an explanation.

"What am I to do now?"

"A bastard must assume who he is. A dwarf must assume who he is. And everyone must assume who his parents are."

As always, Tyrion Lannister's advice were very helpful. "I'm sorry I did nothing to stop it, two days ago." Especially now that he knew his true origins, Jon regretted he did nothing.
"It's difficult to refuse when people offer you a crown and you didn't expect it."

"But now, I cannot be King in the North."

His friend frowned. "How so?"

"I'm a lie. I'm not the son of Eddard Stark. I shouldn't be king. Robb chose me without knowing who I really was. I'm not his brother."

"True, but you're his cousin. He might have chosen you even if he had known the truth. You'd still be his only relative he believed to be still alive apart from Sansa at the time."

"Winterfell belongs to Sansa. She is Lord Stark's daughter. I'm only a nephew, and a bastard nephew with that."

Tyrion Lannister joined his hands. "Listen to me carefully, Jon Snow. You saw the lords of the North a few days ago. They didn't want Sansa as their lady. They jumped on the first reason to name you king. She is a Lannister for them. Even if you give up the crown of the North, they won't accept her, or if they do, they will rebel at the first opportunity. The only way to make sure the North would remain in the hands of our son, even if we give him the Stark name, would be to place knights and lords of the Westerlands at key positions in the North, like giving one the Dreadfort and marrying other to ladies like Alys Karstark or Lord Manderly's granddaughters. This will never be possible. The North will be impossible to rule for Sansa and I, and for our children as well. We need someone the northern lords will respect and follow willingly, and they just chose you."

"They don't know who I am. The moment they hear about it, they won't want me anymore for their king. If that's really impossible for Sansa, then give up any claim on the North and make Arya Lady of Winterfell. They will accept her. And if we find Bran somewhere, she will step aside without a word. She will never turn against him."

"We both know your brother Bran is very unlikely to ever come back again, and you just said your sister wouldn't marry. That will be a major complication. If she dies childless, Sansa's children will be next in line and we'll have exactly the same problem. The North doesn't want any tie with House Lannister."

"So what do I do? We keep lying to them? We hide the truth and make them believe a true Stark is ruling from Winterfell?"

"You are a true Stark. Have you heard this girl of ten two days ago? Ned Stark's blood runs through your veins. Maybe not in the way they all thought, but it runs all the same. Your mother was a Stark."

"I'm not the son of the Warden of the North, and my father's family slaughtered and abducted Starks. And why are you so keen to convince me to remain king? Not long ago, you were still defending Sansa's rights on Winterfell."

Tyrion took a moment to answer. "A new situation arose. My nephew is dead, and his wife too."

"I'm sorry," Jon said after the initial shock. He didn't remember Tommen Baratheon well, but as far he could say, he hadn't seemed spoiled or cruel like his older brother when he visited Winterfell. He thought he remembered seeing him and Bran spar with wooden swords. His friend had lost the last of his nephews and niece, right when he just had a daughter.

"The problem is, my sister decided to declare herself queen. If you doubt my word, read this." He tossed a raven's scroll to him and Jon read. This was no joke. Cersei Lannister proclaimed herself Queen of the Andals and the First Men, Protector of the Seven Kingdoms. "All the Baratheons are dead, true or false. And there's only one other family who ever sat on the Iron Throne since it was forged."

Jon looked at him. He couldn't believe what he just heard. "You want me to sit on the Iron Throne?" Tyrion's expression showed he wasn't japing. "I can't."

"You are the last living son of Rhaegar Targaryen."

"I'm still a bastard."

"You're still his last son. When no legitimate children can be found, we must look on the side of the illegitimate ones."

"Then why not look at the bastard sons of Robert Baratheon? I heard he has dozens."

"He never acknowledged any of them and we don't know where they are. Besides, they're all born from lowborn girls from what we know. You are the son of a prince and a lady, Jon Snow, and your father's family ruled the Seven Kingdoms for over two hundred years. The Baratheons ruled them for twenty at most. Your claim is far stronger than any Baratheon bastard there could be, and I think Dorne and the Reach would like you much more than Cersei. Would you rather have the woman who arrested your uncle on the Iron Throne? To that, I might add she will try to have you killed soon enough, and she will try the same for me, Sansa and Joanna. She may let your sister Arya live, but that will be to marry her to some man she trusts and make him her Warden of the North. Is that what you want, Jon Snow?"

That was too much. In a single hour, he learnt that he was the son of a Targaryen prince and a lady he kidnapped, and now someone was sitting there asking him to become Lord of the Seven Kingdoms. Jon never asked for this. He never wanted this.

"Leave me. I'll think about that. One thing is sure, I will tell the other lords. They must know."

"As you wish, your Grace."

Tyrion left. Jon mostly wanted to get rid of him this time. He, Jon Snow, king not only of the North, but of all the Seven Kingdoms? That was absurd. He was a bastard. He had refused Stannis's offer to become Lord of Winterfell. He wouldn't use the fact that his father kidnapped his mother, or may have kidnapped her, to be crowned. With being King in the North, it had been different. Robb wanted him to succeed him. This was entirely different. He didn't want Cersei Lannister to rule the Seven Kingdoms, but he wasn't the man to replace her. His place wasn't in King's Landing. He didn't know where it was, but it wasn't there.

Surely they could find a cousin of Robert Baratheon to take his place, or someone else with Targaryen blood. They chose Robert Baratheon for king after the war because his grandmother was a Targaryen. Jon knew there were also Targaryens among the ancestors of the current Lord of Sunspear. He thought about something else as well. Tyrion Lannister was Lord of Casterly Rock, a good and clever man, the uncle of two previous kings, and he was very powerful. Jon remembered a time at Winterfell, when he saw the little lord enter the Great Hall. It was night and the light from the inside had thrown his shadow clear across the yard. For just a moment, Tyrion Lannister had stood tall as a king. He would make a far better king than Jon. His own place was here, in the North, to fight the White Walkers.

A few hours later, all the lords and leaders of the Free Folk were gathered in the Great Hall. Jon had called a great meeting to solve the problem of who would rule the North. He managed to convince the northern lords and the Free Folk to attend, while Tyrion and the Blackfish did the same for their own men. The Knights of the Vale participated as well, probably to not be left aside. Everyone was on edge. Jon sat alone at the high table. He wouldn't be there for long.

"Everyone, please listen," he said loudly. "I asked you all to come here because I have news of great importance to tell you. First, some of you are already aware of that, but Tommen Baratheon and Margaery Tyrell, his wife, are dead." People started to talk immediately. Jon kept speaking more loudly. "Cersei Lannister proclaimed herself queen. She's the one who arrested Lord Eddard Stark, and for myself I will never bend the knee to this woman."

"Nor will I!" The shout came from someone of the North and was picked up by many more, not only from the North but also from the Riverlands and the Vale of Arryn. Even among Tyrion's men, many didn't seem very happy about it.

"There's also something else," Jon resumed. That was the hardest part. "Something I learnt today, and I think you ought to know."

He told them everything Howland Reed said. He omitted no detail. From the abduction of Lyanna Stark to his arrival at Winterfell, he hid nothing. The reactions were different from one person to another, but everyone was dismayed, except the few ones who already knew. Jon saw Ser Daven Lannister speak in murmurs to Tyrion.

"If you want any more precision or if you doubt what I say, I can only ask for the testimony of Lord Howland Reed. He was with Lord Stark when all those events took place and he saw everything. He can testify that everything I said is true." Everyone was looking at him now. Only the Free Folk seemed unaffected by what he said, but it wasn't a surprise since among them kidnapping a woman was as common as hunting. "Now, you know the truth. Some of you chose me to be their king, but you did so as you assumed that my father was Lord Eddard Stark. He's not. I'm not his son. And when my b… Robb Stark chose me as his heir, he believed as well that I was his brother. I give you a chance to change your mind. If you don’t want of me as your king, then I won't try to convince you otherwise."

The lords all began to speak to each other. Jon waited. He looked at Lord Manderly and Lord Glover more than anyone else, and also to Lady Mormont. They were the first ones to hail him king. Lyanna Mormont was of the few to speak with no one. She was only looking at him. She said nothing. She just stared.

The first intervention came from the last person he expected. "It doesn't matter who are Jon's parents," Arya declared. "He grew up at Winterfell with us. I saw him spar with Robb in the yards every day. They learned to shoot arrows together, went to the executions with our father at the same time, he followed the same lessons than Robb with Maester Luwin. He ate at our table, shared the same bread than us every day. And I remember very well what my father told us all one day, when Sansa said Jon shouldn't be at the high table with us because he was a bastard." She looked at Sansa while she said it. "Jon is of the same blood than you. He is a Stark as much as you all are. Our father brought him up like his own son. The only person who really ever asked that Jon was sent away was our lady mother, and our father always refused. He saw Jon like his own son. It's not important that he's the son of my aunt Lyanna. He will always be my brother, until the day I die and after."

Jon was touched by Arya's words. He had been touched by her words in his solar before, but this time he was even more since she said it in public, before half of Westeros. He looked at her, and she smiled. You’re my brother. You’ll always be.

"I think the Lady Arya is right," Alys Karstark said. "I didn't know Robb Stark personally. I was six the last time we met, but from what I heard of him, I don't believe he would have made a different decision if he had known that Jon Snow was his cousin and not his brother. They are still kin. As for me, I won't change my decision. Jon Snow is our king."

Many northern lords approved. Was this really happening? Did the lords of the North really want to keep him as their king, knowing who he was? This surprise was nothing compared to what came next.

"My lords," Tyrion Lannister said loudly, "as we all know now, my sister, Cersei Lannister, is sitting on the Iron Throne. I know my sister very well. I only have one advice to give you. Never ever bend the knee or make an alliance with her. She will stab you in the back the first chance she gets." There were shouts of surprise all over the Hall. "She was the one who had Eddard Stark arrested. She took his daughter, my wife, the Lady Sansa, hostage, and slaughtered all his men in King's Landing. I disapproved of her actions before, but I kept protecting her because she was of my blood. Now, however, I'm afraid nothing can stop her. My family tried to keep her away from King's Landing and the politics, and we failed. Within a few months, I lost my niece, my uncle, my nephew and his wife.
And I can tell you my sister wouldn't hesitate to murder people of her own family. I don't believe this is a coincidence that so many people died while she was in the capital. And when I stood for trial after my lord father died, we discovered she plotted with a cousin of ours to murder Robert Baratheon." Many reactions of horror followed. "So far, I tried to protect her while keeping her away from power because she was my sister, but I will not follow her after everything she's done, and may have done. I will not stand for a woman who may have murdered her own son."

The small lord turned to face Jon Snow. "If you would have us, your Grace, as Lord of Casterly Rock and Lord of the Westerlands, I pledge my armies to your service and ask you to accept the Westerlands as part of the Kingdom of the North."

To Jon's utter surprise, his friend bent the knee, and Sansa and his bannermen imitated him. Most drew their swords, just like Lord Manderly and Lord Glover did two days ago. They had opposed them at the time, but now they wanted him to be their king.

The fat Lord of White Harbor rose from his seat at this moment. "I never thought I would agree with a Lannister, but I do. The North will never bend the knee to a Lannister whore."

The Lord of White Harbor looked straight at Tyrion Lannister. The Lord of Casterly Rock only shrugged. "That's a very good way to describe my sister, I won't argue with this."

Many laughed across the room, though many others seemed to not know what to think about it.

"The North will fight for his freedom and against everyone who dares to attack us," Lord Manderly resumed. "And we will stand behind Jon Snow, our king. We will all stand behind him, whether we are from the North, from the Riverlands, the Westerlands, or the Vale. We will stand behind the King in the North!"

"THE KING IN THE NORTH! THE KING IN THE NORTH!"

Jon looked at all the lords in the room who raised their swords. All those from the North, from the Riverlands and the Westerlands did the same. Some from the Vale of Arryn joined them as well, including Yohn Royce. Soon, all the Vale lords stood as well, repeating the same words than everybody else. Harrold Arryn joined his bannermen after some time, and even the Blackfish unsheathed his sword. Arya was brandishing Needle in the air. Jon stood up.

He looked at Tyrion Lannister, who was grinning towards him like he always did. At this moment, as he took the entire scene with his eyes, Jon understood. He was king, and there was nothing he could do against it, just like there was nothing Robb could have done when his men hailed him years ago. The fight against the dead was coming, and he would lead this fight. As a king.

Chapter End Notes

Please review.

Next chapter: Cersei
Cersei VII

Chapter Notes

Before the first episode of Season 7 is broadcasted, I offer you a chapter digging deeply into Cersei after her children’s death and how she rules. We also get to see Jaime’s reaction to his sister’s actions.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

CERSEI VII

The Great Hall was empty. She could feel the sharp edges of the thousand melted blades against her legs, her back and her arms. It was said that the Iron Throne was made to remind the king to always remain vigilant. Cersei was no king, she was the queen. She hadn’t needed the Iron Throne to remain vigilant. She had been vigilant all her life, expecting and looking for treason everywhere. Now, with the blades against her skin, only thread and silk separating the two, Cersei was more aware than ever of the dangers surrounding her. This is what ruling was: lying on a bed of weeds, ripping them out by the root, one by one, before they strangle you in your sleep. Every time she thought someone couldn't pose a threat, she proved to be wrong. These people had turned against her. Each time this happened, they made her stronger. She showed them what the Lannisters did to their enemies.

Now here she was, Cersei of the House Lannister, First of Her Name, Queen of the Andals, the First Men and the Rhoynar, Protector of the Seven Kingdoms. Her coronation took place two weeks ago. It hadn't been like she always imagined it. There were barely enough people to fill the room as Qyburn placed the crown upon her head. Everyone was silent as guards in crimson and her Queensguard watched them closely. Still, she was the queen. She had all she ever wanted. All she ever wanted.

Her children were buried under the Great Sept, or more precisely once were buried there. Nothing was left of it. The explosion destroyed all the district around the Great Sept of Baelor, including the tombs below it. After her walk of shame, Cersei had sworn to take her revenge on all those who wronged her. With the help of Qyburn, who knew some of the secret passages in the Red Keep and under city and who managed to control some of Varys's little birds, they found an ancient hide of wildfire left under the Great Sept at the time of the Mad King. They put fire to it and destroyed the Great Sept, with most of the Sparrows and the High Sparrow inside, alongside the Tyrell whore and her brother. Then they waited for Randyll Tarly's forces to storm the city, and when all his forces were inside, Qyburn started a new series of fires that destroyed everything around the main streets, killing Tarly and all his men. They hadn't found the body of the Lord of Horn Hill yet, but it wouldn't take long.

This had been a great victory for Cersei. She had been confined to her rooms after she left the Great Sept by Selwyn Tarth, who had arrived to serve as Master of Laws not long after the Sparrows imprisoned her. He used the situation to usurp the power and almost acted as Hand of the King, with the help of Harys Swyft the Master of Coin. It was a chance that among the few secret tunnels Qyburn knew there was one that gave directly into her chambers. This way they met without anyone noticing. Cersei could think about her plan and execute it without problem, and once the Sparrows and the Tarlys were dealt with, she rallied the Lannister guards still in the Red Keep and went after her enemies inside the castle. They betrayed her. They betrayed Tommen, their king, and she made them pay. First, she dealt with Harys Swyft and had him executed on the spot for treason. Tarth proved more difficult since his own guards were as many as her own. Among the chaos, the Tyrell guards didn't know what to do. She was surprised when Lannister soldiers arrived in the Red Keep, but she used them nonetheless against both men from the Reach and the Stormlands. It was chaos and many died, but in the end her men prevailed and she had Selwyn Tarth executed right in front of her eyes, to her great satisfaction. It was then that Jaime had entered the Great Hall with the body in his arms.

Her last son was dead. At the thought, tears threatened to break into her eyes. Gold will be their crowns. Gold their shrouds. The witch told her. It was fate. She told her she would lose her children. She told her she would marry the king but have no children from him. You'll be queen. For a time. Then comes another, younger, more beautiful, to cast you down and take all you hold dear. She was queen now. And when your tears have drowned you, the valonqar shall wrap his hands about your pale white throat and choke the life from you. She had been right all the time. Cersei had tried to make the prophecy untrue, but to no avail. Joffrey, Myrcella, Tommen, they were all dead now, their ashes under the ruins of the Great Sept. The witch never lied to her like she thought back then. Her little brother would kill her. Tyrion would kill her. She had the confirmation of what she suspected for many years now.

She thought about Sansa. She had never thought it could be her. She thought Margaery was the queen the witch told her about, but Margaery was dead. She had never found Margaery beautiful. She was pretty, in some sort of way, but that was mostly youth. Sansa, however… Her hand gripped the arms of the throne. She had welcomed her as her daughter-in-law back when she was Joffrey's betrothed, and the little whore who married her little monster of a brother rewarded her trust by turning against her. She should have known. She suspected, for a very short time, during the trial. She thought about Maggy's words, but she should have known Sansa was the real danger then. Cersei was queen now, and Tyrion would want to overthrow her, to become king with his little wife by her side. She was more dangerous than Margaery. Cersei should have her killed immediately after her father was arrested. She wouldn't make the same mistake twice.

Her children were all dead, and Tyrion had killed them. He killed their father to have the freedom of action he needed. After he failed to have Joffrey killed during the Battle of Blackwater, he decided to have him poisoned on his wedding night. Then he arranged for the Martells to murder Myrcella in Dorne. As for Tommen… his actions led to Tommen's death. If her father had been alive, Tommen would never be dead, and Tyrion killed her father. He killed her son, her last son. Now he wanted the Iron Throne for himself. She wouldn't let him have it. The throne was hers, and only hers. She wouldn't let the Imp and his filthy cow wife take what was hers, and she wouldn't allow the offspring of a dwarf and a whore to have the Rock one day. All this belonged to her and only to her. It would have belonged to her children as well if they were alive, but Tyrion killed them. She would have his head for that, and the head of his wife, his daughter, and everyone who helped them.

"Your Grace, your brother is waiting in the small council chamber," he informed her.

Slowly, careful to not scratch herself with the blades of the throne, Cersei stood up and walked towards the room where the small council used to meet. No small council had ever been of any help to her. Its members were always traitors or incompetent. Whatever people tried to help her on it had proved themselves to be useless. Among them were Gyles Rosby, Pycelle and Janos Slynt. Varys, Littlefinger, Kevan, Tyrion and even Harys Swyft, all of them worked against her, and her lord father never deigned to listen to what she had to say. Instead, when she neutralized the Starks, he sent Tyrion to serve as Hand of the King and to set her aside. She was his daughter, and the great Tywin Lannister sentenced her to the life of a married woman, to be ridden by a man like a horse. If he had listened to her, her father wouldn't be dead by the hand of the Imp who murdered her mother.

Jaime was waiting for her at the long table. He still wore his uniform of Lord Commander of the Kingsguard, now the Queensguard. Cersei had also named him Lord Commander of the City Watch after the Sparrows were defeated. The previous Commander died in the fires that ravaged the city or before. She wasn't sure. The Sparrows might have killed him as far as she was concerned. Cersei wore a long dress made of leather, similar to one of the doublets her lord father used to wear. She never understood why she was forced to dress like a woman. She had more balls than many men. She was the daughter of Tywin Lannister and she would display it to the face of the whole world to see. She sat at the head of the long table, Qyburn on her right. Jaime was almost at the other end of the table. They seldom spoke to each other in the last few days, since he appeared with Tommen's body in the Great Hall.

"I don't remember seeing the small council so small. It was much bigger before," Jaime said dryly.

"This is no small council. I appointed people to take care of the duties the former members of the council were in charge of. From now on, there will be no small council," Cersei said. She didn't need people to advise her.

"No small council? What is this then?"

"A private reunion with the only two people I trust in this city."

"No wonder. Half the city burned." Jaime's face was hard.

"The Sparrows did this," she stated plainly.

"The Sparrows? How did they learn there was wildfire under the city?"

"That is none of your concern as Lord Commander of the Queensguard."

"I still wonder. Why would the Sparrows destroy the Great Sept of Baelor? And the rest of the city? If they wanted to blow up something, I think they would destroy the Red Keep. Strangely, the flames never reached it. And why would they kill themselves?"

Cersei was growing impatient with this argument. "The Sparrows are fanatics and mad men. They didn't know how to use wildfire. They used it the wrong way," she said in a voice that allowed no argument.

"Of course, Cersei." He almost spat her name.

She turned to Qyburn. "What news?"

"So far, my spies are telling me that Lord Mace Tyrell is gathering an army near Highgarden. We can assume it is meant to attack King's Landing. He'll have heard about his daughter's death by now," her Hand said.

"What about Dorne?"

"No news from there. As far as we know, the Martells and the Tyrells may still be fighting each other, but I wouldn't be too much confident about it. However, I received word that a great fleet was spotted near Meereen…"
"It doesn't concern us. What are the odds that the Martells will keep fighting the Tyrells?" The two families were known for hating each other, and Cersei worried much more about them two than about some movement of ships at the other side of the world.

"I couldn't say, your Grace. Maybe they will keep fighting, maybe not, but I do believe the Tyrells will move against us, that is beyond doubt. Still, I think we should concern ourselves with the fleet in Slaver's Bay. My spies..."

"I don't want to hear another single word about the other continent!" she snapped. "We have enemies here, and that's all that matters. I want them all dead!"

"As you wish, your Grace." Qyburn bowed his head. She had more than enough people who opposed and disobeyed her all her life because she was a woman. She wouldn't have any of it now. She was the queen. Then comes another, younger, more beautiful, to cast you down and take all you hold dear. She had no need to take interest in what happened in the Free Cities. Her lord father always held them in contempt. Their wars didn't concern her. She had her own wars to win.

Cersei turned to her brother. "How many men do we have in the City Watch?"

He looked back at her. He seemed to have looked away while she talked with Qyburn. "The City Watch? There is no City Watch left. All the gold cloaks have abandoned their post. We are locked inside the Red Keep as if we were under siege. The five hundred men we have barely dare to leave the compound. Five have been murdered in the streets or in taverns as they walked alone. The city is in chaos since you destroyed it."

His look was challenging. Cersei felt anger grow in her stomach. She forced herself to speak calmly. "The Sparrows destroyed the city. I was locked up in a cell, then forced to walk naked all the way between the Great Sept and the Red Keep by those beggars, only to be locked again in my own rooms by Selwyn Tarth. Then the explosions took place. I was as surprised as you. I managed to convince our men to let me go when that happened, and I saw Selwyn Tarth have Harys Swyft die, our own aunt's father. He betrayed us. He conspired against us. I did what I had to do to protect the family!"

She did what was necessary to protect her son. And he died. "Too bad you didn't think about that before you tried to have Tyrion killed."

"Don't talk about him!"

"Why? He is family, and you tried to have him killed. That's no good way to protect the family, from what I know."

"This monster is a traitor!"

"Oh, really? What did he do this time? I suppose he's the one who pushed Tommen. I wonder how he managed to travel all the way from Winterfell to here within only a few days."

She had enough of this. She wouldn't let Jaime contradict her. It wouldn't surprise her that Tyrion hired someone to kill Tommen. She had all the servants who went into the king's rooms in the twenty-four hours preceding his death put to the sword for more safety the day after he died.

"Qyburn, show him," she said more softly that she should have. Her Hand produced a raven scroll that arrived two hours ago and gave it to Jaime. Cersei didn't wait for him to read. "This little worm turned against us. He gave our banners to that bastard boy that his wife's father had from some wench."
"We have good reasons to believe that this message was sent all over the Seven Kingdoms, to every great house. The Imp and his allies made their position very clear," Qyburn added.

Jaime's brow dug as he looked at the small piece of paper. When he looked up to her, he asked the last thing she expected. "Do you think he's telling the truth when he claims that Ned Stark's bastard is in fact the son of Rhaegar Targaryen and Lyanna Stark?"

Couldn't her brother be serious for a moment? Even if he didn't smirk, this was no time for jokes. "Don't you understand? He betrayed us!"

"No, Cersei. I fear you're the one to not understand. Is it possible that Jon Snow is Rhaegar's son?"

She scoffed. How could her brother be so ridicule? "Of course not. I saw him at Winterfell. He's got nothing to see with that prince." The Starks had done well to hide him when they visited, but she saw him all the same. He was Ned Stark's bastard without any doubt, nothing to see with the prince she dreamed of marrying thirty years ago.

"I have to admit he didn't strike me as a Targaryen bastard when I talked to him, but… Ned Stark did go at the Tower of Joy at the end of the war, and Rhaegar Targaryen left the two best swordsmen in the Kingsguard to guard that tower. Why?" Jaime looked thoughtful. "That could explain a lot of things. And if Tyrion says that…"

"Tyrion is lying!" Cersei stated angrily.

"How can you be so sure?"

"He always lies. That's in his nature. He's a little monster who lies at every turn. He wants me dead!" She shouted the last sentence. A moment of silence passed.

"Who could blame him?" Jaime finally said.

Cersei stared in shock at her twin. "What?"

"Who could blame him?" Her brother stood up and started to pace near the table. "How many times have you tried to kill him?" he asked angrily. She had never seen Jaime with that look of hatred, not directed towards her.

"I tried to save the family."

"Family? You wanted to save family by killing a member of our family?"

"He killed our mother, our father, Joffrey…"

"Oh, shut up, Cersei! Everyone knows you killed Joffrey."

"I didn't!"

"Of course, you did. You gave Ser Meryn the poison. It doesn't matter the target was Margaery Tyrell, it was Joffrey that the poison killed in the end."

"No. That's false." She never gave any poison to Ser Meryn. She didn't try to kill Margaery that night, though she wished she had, for it would have saved her son.

"And you killed Tommen," her brother added accusingly.

"I didn't. He… He killed himself. He committed suicide," she said faintly. Her last sweet boy had killed himself.

"Because you murdered his wife. You killed him when you killed Margaery."

"No, I didn't kill him." That wasn't her fault. "Tyrion did this. Without him and that whore, none of this would ever have happened."

"Oh yes, of course. It's always Tyrion's fault. It's never yours." He was mocking her.

"Tyrion is a traitor. He turned against us. He wants the throne for himself."

"Come on, sister. If Tyrion wanted the Iron Throne for himself, he would have declared himself king. He wouldn't give his support to a bastard and pretend he is Rhaegar's son."

"He would. That bastard is his wife's brother."

"Half-brother," Jaime corrected. "And according to Tyrion, he's more a cousin than a brother."

"Once they place him on the Iron Throne, Tyrion only has to kill him and he will be king with Sansa, that bitch, next to him!" He would make Sansa his queen. Then comes another, younger, more beautiful, to cast you down and take all you hold dear. "We must gather our forces. We have to defeat them."

"How? With what forces? According to that raven, the North, the Vale of Arryn, and the Westerlands already declared for Jon Snow. It's only a matter of time before Riverrun follows. Who will fight for us? We are at war with Dorne. We just killed the children of Lord Tyrell and you executed Selwyn Tarth. None of the Seven Kingdoms will help us and half of them are already at war with us. We can barely levy a few thousand men from the Crownlands and they will desert the moment they realize we cannot win."

"We can find more men." She looked at Qyburn.

"We sent a raven to Euron Greyjoy," the Hand of the Queen declared.

"Euron Greyjoy?" Jaime asked in bewilderment.

"Balon Greyjoy's brother, and now the King of the Iron Islands. We will let him plunder the territories he wants against his help and let him rule these tiny islands he calls a kingdom."

Cersei was very happy of the effect her words had on her brother. He was speechless for a moment. She had the idea herself. "Have you gone mad?"

He asked the question very slowly, detaching each word very carefully. Anger boiled in Cersei. "What did you say?"

"Euron Greyjoy is the man who burned Father's fleet during the last rebellion. You're going to make an alliance with that man?"

"Why not? The enemies of our enemies are our friends." And the Greyjoys were enemies of the Reach and the North. If Cersei gave to that Euron his crown, his petty kingdom and the right to plunder her enemies' lands without constraint, he would help her. No one could offer him better.

"Robb Stark tried to make an alliance with the Greyjoys. Have you forgotten where he is now?"

"I'm not Robb Stark," she replied coldly. "And I'm not the one who was defeated by Robb Stark."
Jaime had nothing to reply for a moment. "No," he admitted. "You're the woman who tried to murder the Lord of Casterly Rock."

She frowned. "What do you mean?" She never tried to kill their father. "Tyrion killed him."

"No, but you did try to kill Tyrion after our father died. And unless you forgot, Tyrion was Father's heir. After he died, you attempted to kill Tyrion as he was the rightful Lord of Casterly Rock."

"He's not." Jaime was really stupid, but he was one of the few she could trust. "You are the Lord of Casterly Rock. Father always wanted you to be his heir. You should be there, ruling."

"I'm sorry, Cersei, but I am a kingsguard. Kingsguards can't inherit."

"Queensguard, now. You're no longer a kingsguard either way. I released you from your vows and named you Warden of the West."

Jaime took a quizzical expression. "How?"

"I am the queen," she reminded him.

"Can I see the decree then?" She turned to Qyburn who gave him the parchment in question. Jaime read it. "Jaime Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock and Warden of the West." He chuckled. To her utter surprise, he tore off the paper in two, then in four, and finally into eight parts and let them drop onto the floor. "These words are as valuable as those Robert wrote when he made Ned Stark Joffrey's regent."

That was too much. "Stop being an imbecile and do what you should always have done for the family. It's no longer time for you to play the honorable fool. You must become who you were meant to be. The family needs you. I need you."

"You sound like Father."

"I am his daughter, and you are his son."

"Maybe, but unlike you think, you are not Tywin Lannister with tits. Father and Kevan tried to force me into becoming Lord of Casterly Rock and I refused. Do you think you'll succeed where they failed? That I will accept only because you're the one asking? And weren't you the one who convinced Aerys to make me a kingsguard at the beginning? Now you want to remove me?"

"You would turn your back on your family when it needs you the most?!" She couldn't contain her anger anymore.

"I'm not the one this family needs. We need Tyrion right now, but he decided to swear his banners to someone else. We have no chance to win against all the other kingdoms, even if Euron Greyjoy helps us. If you want to live, then I suggest you abdicate and ride to Casterly Rock right now. Drop that crown on your head. Tyrion and Genna will send you to live your life in exile very comfortably across the Narrow Sea."

"You would have your sister live as an exile?"

"Better to be exiled than to be dead, and after all the people you've killed, you can consider yourself lucky if we get this for you."

He dared to oppose her. He was her brother, she was the queen, and he dared to question her. "Leave. Now!"
Jaime smirked and left. "I love you too, sister."

As he walked away and left the small council chamber, Cersei glared at his back. She gave him the lordship of Casterly Rock and he flatly refused her. Their father had been wrong all this time. He should never have made Jaime his heir. If only he made her his heir. She wouldn't have burned that will so long ago, and she could use it to claim the Rock for herself. Instead, she was stuck with her stupid twin who refused to take his responsibilities. All fell on her shoulders, as always.

"Shall we proceed with the other matters at hand, your Grace?"

She turned to her Hand. "Of course," she said.

"Although Ser Jaime proved to be quite insulting, he was right about a few things. The City Watch no longer exists, except in name. Most of the officers died in the... recent events, and Ser Jaime didn't replace them."

"Replace them yourself, then. We don't need Jaime. He is a bloody fool who laughs about everything and takes nothing seriously. He will be of no help to us."

"Still, without Ser Jaime, it will be much more difficult to take control of Casterly Rock..."

